the Supreme Court decided unanimously and correctly that these rare, unpleasant demonstrations are expressions of speech and therefore protected by the First Amendment, there have been many such attempts. Fortunately, all have failed.

Unfortunately, enthusiasm for this amendment appears to have grown even as flag-burning incidents have vanished as a means of political protest. The last time I saw an image of the U.S. flag being desecrated in this way was nearly 20 years ago, when the court issued its decision. Thus this amendment -- never appropriate in the oldest democracy on earth -- has become even less necessary. But necessity is not always the mother of legislation.

In defense of speech I do not like, I recall a ceremony I have come to love: a military funeral. The finest of all is conducted at Arlington National Cemetery. At graveside, an honor guard holds the American flag while taps are played as a final farewell. The guards then fold the flag into a triangle and deliver it to the next of kin.

It is as if the flag becomes the fallen. In the hands of a widow or mother it is much more than a symbol of the nation. At that moment the American flag is a sacred object that holds the sweet memory of a life given to a higher cause. Or so it seems to me each time I am witness to these hallowed events.

To others the ceremony may mean something entirely different. I recall vividly one such situation: A mother of a friend who was killed in Vietnam recoiled when the flag was offered to her. She would not take it. In her heart the American flag had become a symbol of dishonor, treachery and betrayal. At the time, and perhaps to her dying day, she wanted nothing to do with it.

If our First Amendment is altered to permit laws to be passed prohibiting flag desecration, would we like to see our police powers used to arrest an angry mother who burns a flag? Or a brother in arms whose disillusionment leads him to defile this symbol of the nation? I hope the answer is no. I hope we are strong enough to tolerate such rare and wrenching moments. I hope our desire for calm and quiet does not make it a crime for any to demonstrate in such a fashion. In truth, if I know anything about the spirit of our compatriots, some Americans might even choose to burn their flag in protest of such a law.

No doubt the sponsors and advocates of this amendment mean well. They believe it is a reasonable and small sacrifice of our freedoms. They believe no serious consequence will come of this change.

No doubt, too, some of the increasing interest in limiting free speech is a response to the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States. It was a remarkable moment, when the hearts of most of us filled with a kind of pure patriotism we had never felt before. It was a patriotism that bound liberty to equality and fraternity. It was a patriotism that brought us together, friend and stranger alike. We discovered heroes who inspired us. No longer did we say, "It's good to see you," and not mean it.

Most impressive to me was that the "we" included men and women of many nations, every religion and every ethnic group. The "we" was global. The patriotism we felt extended beyond our boundaries and beyond the cramped spaces of ritual nationalistic fervor. We understood that the vulnerability of our freedom bound us together more than any symbol or slogan can. Millions of Americans, then and now, proudly flew their flags because they wanted to, not because any law told them to.

All the more reason, then, for patriotism to turn aside the understandable impulse to protect our flag by degrading the constitutional freedoms for which it stands. Real patriotism cannot be coerced. Our freedom to speak was attacked -- not our flag. The former, not the latter, needs the protection of our Constitution and our laws.

The writer, a former Democratic senator from Nebraska, is president of the New School, a university in New York.

Let Gay Men Donate Blood (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A 1980s-era ban no longer makes any practical sense.

SOON AFTER THE FIRST AIDS CASES appeared in the U.S. in the early 1980s, the Food and Drug Administration, which oversees the nation's blood supply, permanently banned practically all gay men from donating blood. At the time, the policy made sense. But a quarter of a century later, there is no longer any scientific reason to continue it.

In the 1980s, thousands of people a year unknowingly contracted HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, from blood transfusions. Gay men were the primary group with HIV-infected blood, and there was no adequate technology to screen for HIV, so the FDA banned gay men from donating if they had been sexually active since 1977.

Today, all donated blood is tested for nine infectious diseases, including hepatitis B, HIV and syphilis. With HIV, two tests are used: The first searches for antibodies produced after an infection; the second, which was added to the process six years ago, looks for the genetic material of the virus. With the two tests, the odds of an HIV-infected batch entering the blood supply are about 1 in 2 million. That means about a dozen people a year contract the virus from transfusions. This result is unfortunate but inevitable; transfusions always carry a certain amount of risk because screening isn't perfect. About 85 people contract hepatitis C through transfusions each year, for instance, and about 12 are infected with hepatitis B. Roughly 15,000 people die of hepatitis in the U.S. each year, about the same number as die of AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0034244

Moreover, although there is no way to know how many Americans die each year because of blood shortages, allowing gay men to donate would increase the blood supply and potentially save lives.

The nation's leading blood donation agencies, including the American Red Cross, asked the FDA this year to change its policy. Currently, only gay men, prostitutes, intravenous drug users and people who have a history of cancer or other blood-borne diseases are banned from donating for life. The blood banks have recommended that gay men who haven't had sex in a year be allowed to donate.

A temporary ban for gay men would still be needed. There's a window during which an individual can be infected with HIV and not test positive. And gay men in the U.S. have a much higher incidence of HIV infections than the rest of the population. So it's necessary to exclude those who have recently had sex, even with condoms. But the new tests can detect the virus within 11 days, on average, after infection. A ban of several weeks or months should be sufficient.

Another issue is that current guidelines fail to adequately take donor behavior into account. Questionnaires don't routinely ask about risky behavior, so even promiscuous heterosexuals can donate. Is blood from a monogamous, HIV-negative gay man more unsafe than blood from a heterosexual man who is sexually active with multiple partners?

The FDA must continue to monitor the nation's blood supply, and it may be necessary to bar donations from those who engage in risky behavior or who are part of a population that is at a much higher risk for a disease. But those decisions should be made according to science.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Seeks Info On Calif. Newspaper Deals (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- McClatchy Co. said Wednesday it has received antitrust clearance for the sale of two Philadelphia newspapers as part of its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc. But it also said federal regulators are seeking more information about a separate deal involving the sale of two California papers.

McClatchy, which is based in Sacramento, Calif., said in a statement that it received early termination of Hart-Scott-Rodino inquiries into the sale of The Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News. Those papers are being acquired by an investor group including Bruce Toll, co-founder of homebuilder Toll Brothers Inc., and advertising executive Brian Tierney.

The company also said it received a request from the Department of Justice for more information regarding the proposed sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times to MediaNews Group Inc. of Denver. MediaNews owns several other newspapers in that area of northern California, including The Oakland Tribune.

The Philadelphia and California newspapers are among 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy doesn't intend to keep after it closes its purchase of the San Jose, Calif.-based newspaper company.

McClatchy said in a statement that it would respond promptly to the DOJ request, and said that it would not have an impact on the closing of its acquisition of Knight Ridder.

Knight Ridder was forced to put itself up for sale last fall by its three largest shareholders, who were dissatisfied with its lagging stock price. McClatchy agreed in March to buy the company for $4.5 billion in cash and stock, plus the assumption of about $2 billion in debt.

McClatchy said at the time that it intends to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers, mainly because they didn't meet McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets. The company also sold the St. Paul Pioneer Press in Minnesota, where it would have faced antitrust concerns because of its ownership of the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis.

DOJ Extends Review Of MediaNews' Purchase Plans (DENVERBIZ)

Denver Business Journal, June 15, 2006

Federal regulators want more time to review MediaNews Group Inc.'s proposed purchase of two California newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion.

The U.S. Department of Justice told McClatchy it needs more information about its sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times to MediaNews, McClatchy said Wednesday.

Based in Denver, MediaNews is headed by William Dean Singleton and owns The Denver Post among other papers.

The MediaNews acquisition is part McClatchy's larger play for Knight Ridder Inc. (NYSE: KRI) of San Jose, Calif., and its 32 newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0034245

McClatchy (NYSE: MNI) wants to sell 12 Knight Ridder papers -- including the two to MediaNews -- to help finance its $6.5 billion acquisition of Knight Ridder. The purchase price includes $4.5 billion in cash and stock, and the assumption of $2 billion in debt.

The justice department is vetting the deal to make sure it doesn't violate antitrust laws.

MediaNews, with Hearst Corp., agreed in April to buy four Knight Ridder papers for roughly $1 billion, with the Denver company and its partners paying the lion's share of $736.8 million cash.

The Colorado company's partners, Gannett Co. Inc. (NYSE: GCI) and Stephens Group Inc., will contribute $325 million toward MediaNews' part of the purchase price.

Hearst is buying the Monterey Herald of California and the St. Paul Pioneer Press in Minnesota for $263.2 million.

McClatchy said in a statement that it would respond quickly to the justice department's request for information. The publishing company also said the request shouldn't affect the closing of the Knight Ridder deal.

McClatchy also revealed May financial information on Wednesday.

For last month, the company reported a 3.2 percent increase in total revenue to $96.7 million, with consolidated advertising revenue up 4.8 percent to $82.6 million.

But May circulation dropped 4.3 percent to 12.1 million.

Judge Approves Hillenbrand Antitrust Settlement (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

A federal judge on Wednesday approved hospital bed and casket maker Hillenbrand Industries Inc.'s agreement to pay $316 million to settle an antitrust class-action lawsuit that challenged its "bundled pricing" discounting of specialty hospital beds.

Spartanburg Regional Healthcare System of Spartanburg, S.C., sued Hillenbrand in June 2003, alleging attempted monopolization of the hospital bed market with discounting practices that violated federal antitrust rules.

The deal approved by the judge in South Carolina calls for Batesville, Ind.-based Hillenbrand to pay about $21 million less than what it had agreed to under a settlement announced in November.

Hillenbrand _ the nation's largest maker of caskets and hospital beds _ said the reduction was because of customers who opted out of the settlement.

The company had paid $50 million into an escrow account in March. It anticipates paying the remaining $266 million by mid-August.

"We believe the claims in this case are without merit, but we also believe it is in our company's and customers' best interests to put this matter behind us," Hillenbrand President and CEO Peter Soderberg said.

Spartanburg had said the proceeds were to be distributed to most U.S. buyers or renters of products from Hillenbrand subsidiary Hill-Rom Inc. since 1990. Those include more than 6,000 hospitals and thousands of other health care facilities across the country.

Hillenbrand shares rose 11 cents to close at $48.80 Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Telecom Mows Down Grassroots Efforts In Net Neutrality Battle (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 15, 2006

If the current lobbying fight over the future of Internet freedom could be cast in biblical terms, the telecommunications industry would be a natural Goliath, while the technology companies would be an intrinsic David. Though in this version, David can't seem to handle his stone and sling.

The tech community, made up of once-scrappy West Coast upstarts, is still feeling its way around Washington's power circles. While its lobbying efforts, in a classical, work-the-committees kind of way, are lacking, it has assembled a vocal grass-roots coalition arguing for network neutrality. Many believe that broadband operators have plans to turn the Internet into a cable system with operators deciding what fees, in addition to normal access rates, can be tacked on to content and service providers. And they want Congress to put the principle of "Internet freedom" in writing.

But their anemic D.C. presence has been no match for the long-standing telecom industry, a giant in Washington's circles that has pounded Capitol Hill and the public with an advertisement blitzkrieg courtesy of the United States Telecom Association, the industry's chief trade group, urging Congress not to regulate the Internet.

Though the techies have managed to throw some wrenches into the debate, they've arrived late to the game and haven't been able to strategize well beyond their baseline grass-roots support. Their tardiness may seem surprising, since at stake, many techies argue, is the very existence of the Internet.

"We really believe that the future of the Internet hangs on the congressional decision on net neutrality. ... It's the number-one priority," says Ben Scott, policy director for Free Press, a consumer advocate organization in Washington that has partnered with two unlikely bedfellows -- the reliably conservative Christian Coalition of America and the liberal MoveOn.org Civic Action -- for a "Save the Internet" campaign.

The debate began last August, when the Federal Communications Commission deregulated broadband. Content providers such as Google, Yahoo and Amazon.com say the move paved the way for the telecom industry to control the Internet. Their worst fears were confirmed last year, they say, when AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre Jr. noted in a BusinessWeek article that investment in high-speed pipes has been expensive. "What [Google, Vonage and others] would like to do is use my pipes free. But I ain't going to let them do that," he was quoted as saying.

But cable and phone companies such as Verizon Communications, AT&T and BellSouth Corp. say they have no such intentions and that the tech community is hyperventilating.

"There's a very significant overreaction [by net neutrality proponents] on this issue," says Gregory Rohde, president of e-Copernicus, which represents BellSouth. "What they are asking for is akin to seeing someone walking down the street and saying, 'This person is capable of murder; let's tie them up.'"

The tech industry has pushed legislation to reinstate the FCC rules on broadband. But its effort failed last week in the House when a net neutrality amendment, offered up by Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., was killed by the Republican leadership. The industry's focus now shifts to Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D. and a network neutrality amendment he introduced in the Senate.

Despite all the rhetoric, the tech community's Hill presence has been spotty. The exceptions: attendance at a Senate hearing nearly two weeks ago as well as the eleventh-hour D.C. fly-in last week by Google co-founder Sergey Brin, who came to lobby the Senate, decked in silver-mesh sneakers and jeans. No tie. No jacket.

The tech industry's late entry into the game and less-than-stellar effort have not been lost on lawmakers or analysts.

"The high-tech folks in cities got started on this late," Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who backs net neutrality, told Legal Times. "Coming up with an effective fight when you start way behind is hard. They are not where they should or ought to be."

The buzz on K Street is that content providers are doing a miserable job working the issue. Lobbyists on both sides of the aisle speak almost embarrassingly of their weak Hill presence and ponder whether this is indeed a priority for the industry.

"You can hire the best lobbying team in the world, but if your executive suite and boardroom isn't attuned to it, it's a lot of wasted effort," says one prominent Bell lobbyist. "It's like a 33-year-old veteran pitching against a 19-year-old rookie."

Even so, the techies have been very successful at mobilizing their supporters on a grass-roots level -- a virtual cheering section the telecommunications industry doesn't have. "The Internet has been used to organize before but has never been successful on an issue so arcane," says Scott. "This doesn't hit people in the gut like immigration or health care."

But if the tech community is waiting for an army of bloggers to leap to its rescue, it might have to wait awhile. Opponents say the online community still isn't getting it and that if you look closely at online blogs and e-mail, supporters rarely have elevated their conversations to discussing the details of the legislation or what the language in a proposed amendment should or shouldn't be.

LIKE A ROLLING STONE

For all the success the tech industry has had on the grass-roots level, its Washington presence next to the well-greased telecom lobbying apparatus has been next to invisible. It's understandable. The bell companies have been on Capitol Hill for nearly a century, while the content companies have remained on the Washington sidelines. It wasn't until it was faced with an antitrust suit that Microsoft felt the need to spearhead a D.C. office.

To hear folks like Paul Misener, vice president of global public policy at Amazon, tell it, it all boils down to time. "Time is on our side," he says, then, in a contradiction, adds, "If we had more time to shine light on the facts, we would be in great shape."

Misener takes criticism that content providers have not been working the Hill aggressively as a source of pride.

"They [opponents] prioritize how well they do in Washington. We prioritize how well we do with our customers," he says.

And yet, when asked if a deleterious outcome on net neutrality would harm Amazon customers, Misener says it would, "to some extent."

"This is why time is on our side," he says. "Maybe I'm Pollyanna talking, but I'm hoping the way to achieve the right outcome is to look at the facts. We've been losing so far on getting the facts out there."

And one of telecom's longtime allies has been at the forefront of the issue for the tech industry. Former Rep. Vin Weber, R-Minn. is no stranger to the lobbying tactics of the bells. His firm, Clark and Weinstock, has represented AT&T for years, though they parted last year when the firm began pursuing existing clients eBay and Microsoft's interest in net neutrality.

Weber calls the telecom lobby one of the best-oiled machines in town. "They are well organized, sophisticated and have a lot of experience lobbying the Hill," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0034247

So what type of advice has Weber offered to the tech community? The former lawmaker says he's uncomfortable discussing such counsel but adds he's dished up "the best advice" he has.

And though his Republican friends on the Hill are "slow to understand the issue," he reminds them not to confuse a sophisticated lobbying effort with grass-roots sentiment.

Although MoveOn.org's involvement has been a source of heartburn for some lobbyists pushing the issue -- "For a lot of Republicans, that's a blinking light," notes one lobbyist supportive of net neutrality, referring to conservative unease at the mere mention of the ultraliberal giant -- the coalition was successful at lobbying Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. to take a position on the issue.

Cable lobbyists don't seem bothered by Pelosi's strong endorsement. She's not urging her members to support net neutrality, says one prominent cable lobbyist.

"If she were to whip the caucus on it, like [the Central American Free Trade Agreement] or something, then you'd have a higher level of concern," says the lobbyist. "But there has not been the indication that she's twisting arms of the members, saying, 'Hey, this is part of the Democratic agenda.'"

Still, the tech community presses on, in pure Pollyanna mode.

"We don't have a lobbyist in the traditional sense," says Adam Green, civic communications director at MoveOn.org Civic Action. "Our lobbyists are everyday people."

Joe Crea can be contacted at jcrea@alm.com.

European Nations Pressure Apple On ITunes (AP)

By May Wong

AP, June 15, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Portable media player maker Creative Technology Ltd. said Wednesday the U.S. International Trade Commission agreed to investigate whether Apple Computer Inc.'s rival iPod infringes on one of its patents.

Singapore-based Creative filed the ITC complaint and a federal lawsuit alleging that iPods infringed on its patent for a navigation system used to organize and access music on portable players. Creative dubbed the patent, the "Zen patent," after its brand-name Zen media players.

Under the ITC complaint, Creative asked the agency to block imports of the Cupertino-based company's market-leading iPods, which are manufactured abroad.

The ITC will reach a conclusion as soon as possible, setting a target date within 45 days of the investigation's launch, Creative said.

The probe is the latest development in an increasingly twisted patent battle between the two companies. In court documents, Apple has maintained no wrongdoing and has since filed two patent-infringement countersuits against Creative.

Apple representatives declined to comment Wednesday.

Findings by the trade agency typically come at a faster pace than patent cases in the court system, but the ITC's conclusions would not necessarily affect a judge's ruling, said Stefani Shanberg, a patent attorney with Perkins Coie LLP in San Francisco.

AXA To Purchase Winterthur Unit Of Credit Suisse (WSJ)

By Katharina Bart And Digby Larner

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

ZURICH -- AXA SA said it agreed to buy the Winterthur insurance unit from Credit Suisse Group for 12.3 billion Swiss francs ($9.9 billion), giving AXA a major presence in Switzerland and bolstering its activities elsewhere in Europe and emerging markets.

Paris-based AXA, one of Europe's largest insurers, will finance the deal with new shares and €4.8 billion ($6 billion) in debt. AXA will sell €4.1 billion of shares, offering investors one new share for every nine held at €19.80 apiece -- a deep discount to Tuesday's close of €24.30 a share.

AXA's shares fell 1.8%, or 43 European cents, to €23.87 in Paris. Credit Suisse rose 1.4%, or 85 centimes, to 63.70 francs in Zurich, with analysts welcoming the bank's clean exit from insurance.

AXA said it expects the integration of Winterthur to deliver pretax cost synergies of as much as €280 million by the end of 2008. AXA will take restructuring charges of €520 million in 2007.

Under terms of the deal, AXA will refinance €1.6 billion of Winterthur's debt upon closing, expected around year end after regulatory approvals.

DOJ_NMG_0034248

Winterthur has some 13 million customers. The purchase gives AXA the largest property-and-casualty insurer in Switzerland. AXA said Winterthur's U.S. property-and-casualty business is under strategic review.

For Credit Suisse, the sale means forgoing a planned initial public offering of stock for Winterthur. "I don't believe we could have done an IPO for over 12 billion francs and certainly not in current market conditions," Credit Suisse Chief Executive Oswald Grübel said during a conference call.

Zurich-based Credit Suisse said it is sticking with its target of 8.2 billion francs in net profit next year, even after the sale of Winterthur.

"We will invest the capital from the sale of Winterthur to compensate for the loss of earnings," Mr. Grübel said.

Credit Suisse paid $9 billion for Winterthur in 1997, but the unit fared badly in the insurance-market downturn after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in the U.S. Winterthur was forced to book write-downs and needed two capital injections from Credit Suisse to stay afloat.

Since then, Credit Suisse has installed new management at Winterthur and cleaned up its balance sheet.

---- Hans Schoemaker in Zurich and Goran Mijuk in Johannesburg contributed to this article.

Write to Katharina Bart at katharina.bart@dowjones.com1 and Digby Larner at digby.larner@dowjones.com2

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Plans Vast Protected Sea Area In Hawaii (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

President Bush will create the world's largest protected marine area today, designating as a national monument a 1,200-mile-long chain of small Hawaiian islands and surrounding waters and reefs that are home to a spectacular array of sea life, senior administration officials said last night.

In his second use of the 100-year old National Antiquities Act, which empowers the president to protect important cultural or geological resources instantly, Mr. Bush will enact a suite of strict rules for the area, including a five-year phasing out of commercial and sport fishing, officials said.

The chain of largely uninhabited atolls, seamounts, reefs and shoals, which sweeps northwest from the big islands of Hawaii, is called the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and is home to some 7,000 species of marine life, including endangered green sea turtles and Hawaiian monk seals and millions of breeding seabirds.

Earlier yesterday, the region, which at 140,000 square miles is nearly the size of California, was to have been named a national marine sanctuary, a different kind of protection that could have taken a year to enact.

But Mr. Bush, in a last meeting to consider the plan and timetable, decided to cut things short, said a senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to take attention away from Mr. Bush's public statement today. "He said, Look, I've got this authority, I'm going to use it," the official said.

"What we avoid is another year or more in process when we already have consensus," he said, noting that national-monument status avoided the prospect of lawsuits over proposed sanctuary regulations. Since the Clinton administration, environmental campaigners had pushed for marine sanctuary status for the area, and as recently as early last night they were girding for months of public debate over the proposed sanctuary rules with a few groups representing Pacific fish-processing companies and fishing fleets.

Last night, representatives of the conservation groups were at first startled by the sudden switch, but were then exultant.

"This is really for the first time saying the primary purpose of this area of the ocean is to be a pristine, or nearly pristine, kind of place," said David Festa of a private group. "It would take it off the books as a fishing ground. That's really the first time we'll have done that in any kind of sizable area."

Some environmentalists noted yesterday that the extra protection was an easy call for the administration, in part because there was little significant opposition in Hawaii or Washington. The move could also help the re-election prospects of Linda Lingle, Hawaii's first Republican governor, who last fall banned commercial activities in state waters in the area and endorsed the federal sanctuary plan.

They noted that there were only eight commercial fishing boats licensed to fish in the remote islands, and that rising fuel costs had made such trips less and less profitable.

Still, representatives of groups seeking to sustain Pacific fishing activity expressed concern as news of the new designation spread.

DOJ_NMG_0034249

Kittie M. Simonds, executive director of the Western Pacific Fishery Management Council, one of eight regional advisory bodies to federal fisheries agencies, said the group planned to fight a complete closing of fishing in the area.

"We supported the sanctuary concept but wanted the continuation of our healthy bottom fisheries up there," Ms. Simonds said in a telephone interview.

The move builds on actions of several previous presidents, notably Theodore Roosevelt and Bill Clinton. In 1909, Roosevelt designated much of the island chain a national wildlife refuge. At the end of his second term, Mr. Clinton issued two executive orders protecting marine resources around the refuge and ordering federal marine agencies to prepare for the marine sanctuary designation.

Jean-Michel Cousteau, the marine explorer and filmmaker, said it was important to ensure that the designation came with meaningful rules and enough money to protect and further study the region's biological resources. He recently spent five weeks filming in the area and showed the resulting documentary at the White House in April.

A senior administration official said the film had a powerful effect on Mr. Bush and Laura Bush. Only once before, in February, has Mr. Bush created a national monument: at the African Burial Ground in Lower Manhattan. Some 400 remains of enslaved and free Africans from the 17th and 18th centuries were discovered there in 1991.

Bush To Designate Largest Marine Sanctuary (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Islands near Hawaii will be a monument

President Bush is expected today to create the world's largest marine sanctuary in a chain of uninhabited islands and atolls 1,200 miles northwest of the main Hawaiian Islands.

White House officials say Bush will elevate the area now known as the Northwestern Hawaiian Island Coral Reef Ecosystem Reserve to national-monument status. The designation will immediately afford the region the strongest legal protections, with fishing and commercial operations immediately outlawed and visitors primarily limited to scientific researchers.

“It's the ocean equivalent of Yellowstone, Yosemite and the Grand Canyon all rolled into one,” says Joshua Reichert, director of the environmental program of the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia.

The area comprises 140,000 square miles of ocean dotted with dozens of coral reefs and tiny islands; it is a 1,400-mile-long, 100-mile-wide swath of pristine marine habitat larger than all U.S. national parks combined.

The area is considered an ecological jewel. It is a nesting and breeding site to more than 14 million seabirds and home to 7,000 marine and terrestrial species, more than a quarter of which are found nowhere else in the world.

It is an important nesting area for the threatened Hawaiian green sea turtle and home to the endangered Hawaiian monk seal, of which only 1,300 remain. The coral reefs of the region provide vital breeding and nursery habitat for numerous fish and other marine species.

The president can create a national monument under the special authority of the Antiquities Act, which allows the White House to set aside an area of particular national importance for protection, conservation or preservation, says James Connaughton, a senior environmental adviser to the president.

In 1909, President Theodore Roosevelt designated the area a refuge to stop the slaughter of seabirds by Japanese poachers who took the feathers for use in ladies' hats.

In the 1990s, overfishing caused the collapse of the lobster population, leading to the deaths of many monk seal pups that depend upon the crustaceans for food. In 2000, President Clinton increased the protections by issuing an executive order.

Bush had been expected to turn the reserve into a marine sanctuary, a process that had been underway for the past five years.

But after talking to federal and state officials and native Hawaiian leaders, the White House decided there was sufficient consensus to instead grant the region immediate monument status.

The area is home to numerous ancient Hawaiian religious and archaeological sites.

Although most of the islands will be closed to all but scientific researchers, a public visitation center will be created at Midway Islands, the scene of an important World War II battle, using old military buildings.

Hawaiian Marine Reserve To Be World's Largest (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Bush to Designate National Park in Pacific Waters

DOJ_NMG_0034250

President Bush plans to designate an island chain spanning nearly 1,400 miles of the Pacific northwest of Hawaii as a national monument today, creating the largest protected marine reserve in the world, according to sources familiar with the plan.

Establishing the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands as a strictly protected marine reserve, which Bush is slated to announce this afternoon, could prove to be the administration's most enduring environmental legacy. The roughly 100-mile-wide area encompasses a string of uninhabited islands that support more than 7,000 marine species, at least a fourth of which are found nowhere else on Earth.

The islands include almost 70 percent of the nation's tropical, shallow-water coral reefs, a rookery for 14 million seabirds, and the last refuge for the endangered Hawaiian monk seal and the threatened green sea turtle. The area also has an abundance of large predatory fish at a time when 90 percent of such species have disappeared from the world's oceans.

Encompassing nearly 140,000 square miles, an area nearly the size of Montana and larger than all the national parks combined, the reserve will just surpass Australia's Great Barrier Reef Marine Park as the largest protected marine area in the world. It will also, however, be one of the least accessible.

"This is a landmark conservation event," said Joshua Reichert, who heads the Pew Charitable Trusts' environment programs and had pushed to have the area designated as a marine sanctuary. "The government is saying in certain places, for certain reasons, it is important to restrict activities that have the potential to damage the marine environment, of which fishing is a big one."

"The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands represent an incredible opportunity to preserve nature much as it was, or has been, for millions of years, because the hand of man has not wreaked the same kind of havoc as we have elsewhere in the world," said Rep. Ed Case (D-Hawaii), who has lobbied for the designation since he was elected in 2002.

The plan had been resisted by local Hawaiian fishing interests that feared losing access to traditional fishing grounds.

The nation has 13 marine sanctuaries scattered from the Florida Keys to the Channel Islands off the California coast. They provide varying levels of protection and have had mixed success in preserving sensitive ecosystems. In areas where fishing was banned outright, scientists have charted a resurgence of larger fish and coral reefs, but in areas that allow commercial and recreational fishing, damaged ecosystems have struggled to rebound.

Administration officials declined to comment on the record, but one senior official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging the president's announcement, said the plan will end fishing in the area within five years. It will allow Hawaiians to have access to the area for other traditional activities and will include the Midway World War II memorial, a facility that is open for research, education and ecotourism. Visitors wishing to snorkel, dive or take photographs in the area will have to obtain a permit, and no one may take fish, wildlife, corals or minerals from the region.

President Theodore Roosevelt established a bird sanctuary on some of the islands in 1909. President Bill Clinton created a coral-reef ecosystem reserve in the area by executive orders in late 2000 and early 2001, but he stopped short of designating a permanent sanctuary. Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) sent the White House a letter in February hailing the sanctuary plan as "a marvelous opportunity to leave a historic mark on U.S. and world conservation history." Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle (R) also endorsed the idea.

The proposal has had a cooler reception from Democratic Sens. Daniel K. Inouye and Daniel K. Akaka, who have traditionally been protective of local fishermen, but the administration is relying on a coalition of environmental groups -- headed by the Pew Charitable Trusts -- to raise the money for buying out the fishermen.

By declaring the islands a national monument, Bush will circumvent a year-long congressional approval process required in the designation of an area as a marine sanctuary, and will provide the area the highest regulatory protection possible under the law. Clinton designated several terrestrial and marine national monuments toward the end of his tenure, though he did not name a marine monument of this scope.

"Declaring the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument will mean immediate protection, immediate implementation of the management measures included in the plan that was developed in the marine sanctuary process," the senior official said last night.

Ellen Athas of the Ocean Conservancy said the monument designation is "permanent and does not undergo periodic review like a marine sanctuary." She added: "National monuments can provide lasting protection for the environment."

Eight Hawaiians hold permits to fish commercially in the area, targeting red snapper, black grouper and other species. The fishery made a profit of only $300,000 in 2003, and one of the permitted fishermen, Zenen Ozoa, has lobbied to close it on the grounds that it is too environmentally destructive.

The island archipelago is remote -- it takes fishermen two days to reach the area from the main islands -- but debris from vessels that troll the Pacific have ensnared marine animals and damaged the delicate ecosystem. Filmmaker Jean-Michel

DOJ_NMG_0034251

Cousteau, son of legendary marine explorer Jacques Cousteau, spent six weeks there in 2003 and found debris from 52 countries, including cigarette lighters and toy soldiers.

"That was really shocking," said Cousteau, who produced two one-hour documentaries that aired on public television in April. "There's a lot of really nasty stuff happening over there."

Although the islands are remote, they remain vulnerable: Fishing vessels took about 12 million lobsters from the area between 1977 and 1997, and though a federal judge ordered the lobster fishery closed in 2000, the area has yet to recover.

In contrast to the controversies over administration stands on a number of other environmental issues, advocacy groups, activists and Democrats hailed Bush's work on this matter. Case, the Hawaii congressman, said the president "deserves credit" for undertaking "the most revolutionary act by any president, any administration, in terms of marine resources."

James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, toured the islands in December with Cousteau and Lingle.

First lady Laura Bush has also taken a personal interest in the island chain, said the senior administration official. She and the president hosted a White House screening of Cousteau's film on April 5.

Case, whose district includes the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands, said that, ironically, the designation means fewer Americans will see the region.

"We are all going to have to take it on faith that it's that special, because . . . most of us will never see it, and we never should see it," Case said. "We're just going to have to let it go."

Bush To Create World's Largest Marine Protected Area Near Hawaii (LAT)

By Kenneth R. Weiss

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A swath of the Pacific near Hawaii will be the largest such preserve in the world. The president was inspired to act by a Cousteau film.

President Bush today will create the world's largest marine protected area, a total of 140,000 square miles of Pacific Ocean surrounding a necklace of islands and atolls that stretch from the main Hawaiian Islands to Midway Atoll and beyond, senior administration officials said.

The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument will be larger than all of America's national parks combined. Fishing will be phased out, and the mining of coral for jewelry will be prohibited, along with other practices that can damage delicate reefs.

"With a stroke of a pen, the president not only can accomplish the single largest act of conservation in U.S. history, but he can inspire the American public on the broader importance of our ocean and coastal environments," said a senior administration official who requested anonymity so as to not upstage Bush's announcement today.

The decision is a turnaround for the administration, which five years ago considered stripping more limited protections from the area that President Clinton had declared a coral reef ecosystem reserve. It's also a sharp departure for an administration that has pushed to privatize some federal lands and has designated less wilderness than most presidents over the last 40 years.

A turning point came in April, when Bush sat through a 65-minute private White House screening of a PBS documentary that unveiled the beauty of — and perils facing — the archipelago's aquamarine waters and its nesting seabirds, sea turtles and sleepy-eyed monk seals, all threatened by extinction.

The film seemed to catch Bush's imagination, according to senior officials and others in attendance. The president popped up from his front-row seat after the screening; congratulated filmmaker Jean-Michel Cousteau, son of the late underwater explorer Jacques Cousteau; and urged the White House staff to get moving on protecting these waters.

"He was enthusiastic," Cousteau said. "The show had a major impact on him, the way my father's shows had on so many people. I think he really made a discovery — a connection between the quality of our lives and the oceans."

The northwest Hawaiian Islands are a collection of reefs and 10 points of emergent lands — islands, atolls and pinnacles. Although the total emergent landmass is small, the isolation has kept these islands relatively undisturbed and increased their importance to wildlife.

About 14 million seabirds, including albatross and various species of terns, nest on the islands. Pods of spinner dolphins frolic in lagoons, leaping ahead of boats and making full twists in the air.

About 90% of Hawaii's green turtles nest in these remote beaches, as do nearly all monk seals. So far, scientists have identified about 7,000 species in the Hawaiian Islands, about one-third of which are found nowhere else in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0034252

All of these islands are part of the state of Hawaii, except for Midway Atoll, the site of the historic World War II battle, which is a U.S. territory. The United States has the power to control fishing in its Exclusive Economic Zone, which extends 200 miles from the nearest point of land.

Bush's decision was strongly encouraged by Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle, a Republican. She signed rules last year to ban fishing in state waters around these atolls and urged Bush to extend protections to federal waters.

Protection of the northwest Hawaiian Islands has emerged as a widely popular move, receiving more than 50,000 letters of support over the last five years. These islands have no resident fishermen who might be hurt by tightening rules. Only a remnant fleet of eight commercial boats now makes the long cruise from the main Hawaiian Islands to fish the reefs for snappers and grouper — often a marginal operation given soaring fuel prices.

At today's White House ceremony, the president will invoke the 1906 Antiquities Act for the second time in his presidency. The only other time was to declare a burial ground in Lower Manhattan as one of the nation's ancient cultural sites. The site, where about 20,000 slaves and free black people were buried in the 18th century, is only about half an acre.

Bush's declaration today will be on a much larger scale. The strip of protected ocean, about 1,200 miles long and 100 miles wide, will dwarf all of the nation's marine sanctuaries as well as national parks on land.

Initially, Bush was going to propose that the area be protected as a national marine sanctuary. But he wanted to move faster, a senior official said.

"Because it's a presidential action, under the authority of a congressional act, it becomes law immediately without going through a prolonged rule-making process and the inevitable legal action that follows," a top aide said. "We can immediately begin with protection and management."

Bush in recent weeks enlarged the boundaries of the new protected area, giving him bragging rights for creating the largest marine protected area in the world. At 139,793 square miles, it will be bigger than Australia's 128,960-square-mile Great Barrier Reef Marine Park.

"This is the best thing that President Bush has done for the environment since he took office," said Elliott A. Norse, president of the Marine Conservation Biology Institute. "Having discussed this with him, I know that the president is personally committed to this."

Norse was one of the 50 guests who witnessed Bush's excitement after the screening of Cousteau's "Voyage to Kure" in the White House. Bush and his wife, Laura, were amazed by photos of the Northwest Hawaiian Islands that appeared in National Geographic magazine, an aide said.

Afterward, the president had dinner with Cousteau, National Geographic explorer-in-residence Sylvia Earle, and other marine scientists and advocates.

Bush was surprised, as are many Americans, that national marine sanctuaries do not forbid fishing except in specially designated areas. That evening, he repeatedly asked James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, how this new marine protected area could end fishing.

That same question has bedeviled the proposed expansion of no-fishing zones in the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary off Southern California. In 2002, California banned fishing in 175 square miles of state waters, and it has urged federal officials to extend those no-fishing zones into federal waters. Little has happened since then, except for strong objections from the industry-dominated regional fishery management council.

Even as a new monument, however, the area won't be immune from the infighting that goes on between wildlife managers and the fishery management council, which ferociously guards its control over commercial fishing.

Kitty Simonds, director of the Western Pacific Fishery Management Council, has long opposed any change of status that would further curtail fishing in the Northwest Hawaiian Islands. She was unavailable for comment Wednesday.

The monument will phase out the remaining eight fishing boats over five years — a timeline that conservation groups hope to accelerate by buying out the fishing permits. The Pew Charitable Trusts has brought in a retired judge in Hawaii to broker a deal with fishermen, who in 2003 caught about $1.3 million in snappers and groupers, for a net profit of only $300,000.

"For a buyout to work, it will have to include all of the permit holders," said Joshua S. Reichert, director of Pew's environmental division. Reichert said conservation groups do not want to buy out some of the fishermen only to have the others increase the amount of their catch.

"Although it seems that eight fishing vessels cannot do much damage, we know it can in fragile areas like the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands," Reichert said.

As an example, he pointed out the history of the dozen or fewer commercial boats that caught an estimated 15 million spiny lobster and slipper lobster around the island chain from 1977 to 1998. The lobster populations crashed, wildlife biologists said, robbing newly weaned Hawaiian monk seals of an important, easy-to-catch food.

DOJ_NMG_0034253

Treasure Islands (NYT)

By Joshua Reichert And Theodore Roosevelt IV

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

PRESIDENT Bush is expected to declare the northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument today, thereby creating the largest marine reserve on earth. The president's decision caps a century of protection efforts by both Republican and Democratic presidents beginning with Theodore Roosevelt and including Lyndon Johnson, Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton. But none ever proposed the sweeping level of protection for these islands that is being put in place by the Bush administration.

While we and others in the conservation community have not always agreed with President Bush's environmental policies, we believe it is important to acknowledge a significant policy achievement when it occurs — and one is about to occur.

Beginning 160 miles northwest of Kauai, and extending roughly 1,200 miles into the Pacific Ocean, the uninhabited islands, reefs, shoals and atolls of this archipelago make up one of the most remote and relatively undisturbed coral reef systems in the world. The area marked for protection covers roughly 140,000 square miles of ocean, larger than all of America's national parks combined.

Almost 70 percent of the tropical, shallow-water coral reefs in American waters are in this one place, together with 7,000 species of marine and terrestrial life, a quarter of which aren't found anywhere else. More than 14 million seabirds make these islands their home for at least a part of the year, along with the last population of the endangered Hawaiian monk seal.

The president's plan for the monument designation has the distinction of receiving broad support from the Hawaiian people and from Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, who recently closed state waters in the northwestern Hawaiian Islands — everything up to three miles from shore — to commercial activities, including fishing. Many Native Hawaiians, who consider these islands an important part of their cultural and religious heritage, would also like to see commercial fishing ended in federal waters, which stretch three to 50 miles from shore.

In the plan to be announced by the White House, commercial fishing will be phased out over five years. What's more, the president's action will spur efforts to compensate the few remaining fishermen in the area for surrendering their permits to the government, which would then retire them. While it is still too early to know whether these efforts will be successful, such a buyout package would provide for an early end to fishing in the archipelago and offer reasonable compensation to the fishermen who have earned part of their livelihood there.

Just as we have protected spectacular areas on land from destructive activity, we know it is equally important to do so for the sea. The president's announcement is an important step in what we hope will be greater efforts to safeguard the ocean, while also addressing broader problems of overfishing, pollution and habitat destruction.

There are few opportunities for a president to protect such a large swath of ocean or land at little cost to the government, while garnering strong regional support. This is one, and we applaud Mr. Bush for taking the initiative to preserve one of the world's most spectacular marine environments.

Sparks Fly At Forum Over Energy Policy (MJS)

By Daniel W. Reilly

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, June 15, 2006

Washington - Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman and U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) sparred Wednesday over progress on reducing America's dependence on foreign oil at a forum on energy efficiency sponsored by Milwaukee-based Johnson Controls Inc.

In the face of skyrocketing gas prices and an unstable oil supply, officials agree that more needs to be done to reduce dependence on foreign oil and on the importance of alternative fuels such as ethanol. But Bodman and Clinton diverged on whether the nation is on the right path.

Clinton said that accounting for inflation, the Bush administration has cut the budget for energy efficiency programs by one-third over the past five years.

"I believe our present system of energy delivery and use is . . . hurting our pocketbooks, violating our common values and threatening our children's future," Clinton said. She also said "our failed energy policy dictates our national security."

Clinton said in recent years there has been a lack of "evidence-based decision-making" on energy policy.

She accused the Bush administration of talking tough on energy efficiency, then cutting the budget for key programs such as weatherization for low-income family homes and for the State Energy Program, which provides federal grants to states to adopt emerging renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies.

Bodman accused Clinton of "cherry-picking" statistics and said that the Department of Energy is "very committed" to the issue of energy efficiency.

DOJ_NMG_0034254

Bodman said he "disagreed strenuously with the issue that our energy policy has had a negative impact on our foreign policy."

In his keynote speech, Bodman said energy independence is one of President Bush's top concerns and that the answer to high energy costs is the comprehensive approach being pursued by the administration, which includes diversifying energy supply, developing new domestic sources and an increased reliance on efficiency and conservation.

Johnson Controls Vice President for Government Relations Mark Wagner said he was "very encouraged" by the Bush administration's approach to energy conservation but said he would like to see more done, especially on the Energy Savings Performance Contracts, a federal program that finances energy efficiency upgrades for federal buildings and installations.

The program was cut in 2004 but was reinstated in the latest energy bill, which passed last year. Wagner said he wanted to see the program "ramped up" as quickly as possible.

Wagner said the company would also like to see the Bush administration extend more tax credits for energy conservation, especially for commercial and residential building energy efficiency.

Johnson Controls is a leader in interior experience, building energy efficiency and power solutions. The company also runs a consulting business performing energy audits for corporations, school districts and other non-profit organizations, helping to reduce energy costs.

Now in its 17th year, The Energy Efficiency Forum was created by Johnson Controls to raise awareness of energy conservation issues in Washington. This year's forum, at the National Press Club, was co-sponsored by the U.S. Energy Association.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, a Democrat, also spoke at the event. Bush, who visited the company headquarters in Milwaukee in February, addressed the forum last year.

The New Drilling Battle (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

More than a mile beneath the surface of the Gulf of Mexico lies a tract of sea floor that is bigger than New Jersey and that oil and gas companies believe holds a trove of natural gas and a measure of salvation for corporate and residential consumers.

But the area, three-quarters of which is closed to development, also lies at the center of a fight in Congress over the future of offshore drilling, with billions of dollars at stake. The battle lines pit Republicans against Republicans, Democrats against Democrats, and industry against environmentalists.

Ever since a disastrous 1969 oil spill off Santa Barbara, Calif., drilling off U.S. coastlines has been a sensitive subject. For 25 years, a congressional moratorium, renewed annually, has barred exploration on 85 percent of the Outer Continental Shelf, from three miles offshore, where federal waters begin, to 200 miles out, where U.S. jurisdiction ends. An order issued by President George H.W. Bush and extended by President Bill Clinton through 2012 provides additional protection.

"We don't need to sacrifice our beaches, coastal waters and economies to meet America's energy needs," says the Sierra Club, which favors alternative energy sources and energy-efficiency measures.

Yet the spike in natural-gas prices last fall has inspired a coalition of industrial users and a variety of lawmakers to try again to modify the moratorium, citing the harm high natural-gas prices do to American competitiveness and the benefits of reducing U.S. dependence on foreign energy sources. Drillers also want to win changes before the Interior Department's 2007-12 leasing plan takes effect.

Even as gay marriage and immigration grab headlines, top House and Senate members have been bargaining in private to reach a compromise over new contours for offshore drilling. Much of the haggling has been over the New Jersey-size tract, known as Lease 181.

At the moment, the chances of a compromise don't look good. But the wrangling provides a glimpse of how U.S. energy policy is made -- or isn't made -- when Congress and the White House try to balance big business interests, political supporters, environmental concerns and national energy needs.

The fight has made some strange bedfellows. President Bush, though seen as friendly to oil and gas interests, has done little to break the impasse, in deference to his brother Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) and Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who have opposed offshore drilling, citing the need to protect the state's tourism industry from the harm a spill would do.

That has angered conservative Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.), who together with liberal Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) tried to strike the words "natural gas" from the moratorium, which would allow natural-gas wells within three miles of U.S. coasts. Without the support of either party's leadership, this political odd couple came within a handful of votes of prevailing. Now the two are seeking support to allow drilling at least 20 miles from shore, far enough to be out of sight of beach-going tourists.

DOJ_NMG_0034255

Each of the lawmakers has taken on his own party. Peterson, who tried and failed to win Bush's support during a flight last summer on Air Force One, says the president argued that the most "doable" cure for tight-natural gas markets was to build more terminals for liquefied-natural-gas imports -- the opposite of what Bush argues when he cites foreign dependence as a reason for opening the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve in Alaska.

"I'm surprised because we have two oil people at the top," Peterson said of the administration. "Yet two states are controlling the most important part of our energy policy," he said of Florida and California.

In the Democratic camp, Abercrombie has criticized what he calls an "environmental Taliban" for opposing offshore natural-gas drilling, and 38 House Democrats defied their minority leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and voted in May to keep the Peterson-Abercrombie change in the moratorium.

"I said, 'Nancy, you're wrong on this,' " Abercrombie said of a conversation he had with Pelosi. "I think that the Democratic party should get out in front on this issue instead of standing off to the side."

Florida's senators, Republican Martinez and Democrat Bill Nelson, have teamed up to guard against drilling that they say could mar the shorelines. They have their own proposal to extend the presidential drilling ban on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts until 2020, carve out a slice of Lease 181 to allow some new drilling there, have the federal government buy back other leases closer to Florida's west coast, and permanently ban drilling within 150 miles of Florida's shores.

Some drilling advocates note that Cuba recently decided to allow drilling in its waters, just 50 miles from the tip of Florida, closer than prime U.S. drilling prospects that fall under the moratorium.

But Nelson and Martinez have enlisted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who wrote a letter in November asserting that the Gulf of Mexico from the west coast of Florida all the way into Lease 181 are essential for military training. "In those areas . . . drilling structures and associated development would be incompatible with military activities, such as missile flights, low-flying drone aircraft, weapons testing and training," Rumsfeld wrote to Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Oil and gas companies have long eyed the Outer Continental Shelf. The Interior Department's Minerals Management Service estimates that the OCS holds 420 trillion cubic feet of undiscovered natural gas, which Anadarko Petroleum Corp.'s exploration manager for the Gulf of Mexico, Stuart Strife, notes is enough to heat every home in the United States for the next 80 years. In the past, Strife notes, the MMS estimates of potential reserves have been, if anything, too conservative.

That's why Anadarko bet on the portion of Lease 181 that was sold in 2001, offering more than a third of the $341 million worth of winning bids. It has drilled, with partners, 10 wells in 8,000 feet of water to reservoirs 10,000 feet below the ocean floor. The company has already found 1 trillion to 2 trillion cubic feet of gas reserves, which travel by pipeline to Louisiana.

Strife says fears of oil spills are overblown. So far Anadarko has only found natural gas, but even if it found oil the industry could handle it well. "People still think back to Santa Barbara in '69 and think that's the state of the industry," Strife says. "The industry has made leaps and bounds since then."

But environmentalists say a single incident can do extensive and possibly irreparable damage to natural habitats. Richard Charter, co-chair of the National OCS Coalition, says, "There is no such thing as a 100 percent failsafe petroleum process."

Despite strong environmental concerns, high natural-gas prices have made the politics of offshore drilling more fluid. Abercrombie has been courting union support, citing job losses to other low-gas-cost countries. Meanwhile, a Quinnipiac University poll in mid-May showed that Floridians, by 51 percent to 42 percent, favored drilling as close as 100 miles from shore, though 55 percent to 36 percent opposed drilling as little as nine miles from the coast.

"A number of Floridians realize that their state is dependent on natural-gas supplies," said Donna Harman, vice president of congressional affairs for the American Forest and Paper Association. "Some of their members are saying that they need to look at this in a more rational way."

But as with so much else in Congress, the issue is fractious. Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.) has a proposal that would erase the moratorium but force states to petition for continued drilling bans off their shores. Jindal appealed to lawmakers who favor more power for states, but other lawmakers see a grab for power and money by Louisiana. His proposal would funnel to the states 75 percent of royalties from wells within 12 miles of shore and 50 percent from those further out. Under current law, that money belongs to the federal government.

The best chances for a deal rest with Sens. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) and Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M), who want to open up almost all of Lease 181 while leaving the moratorium on other U.S. waters largely intact. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has also been involved in talks with Florida senators over whether to trade the opening of more offshore territory for the extension of the wider moratorium past 2012.

In the House, Reps. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) and Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.) have been seeking compromises. But it isn't clear whether Pombo will pursue the issue if he faces a tough reelection contest. The Sierra Club has run ads citing oil and gas company campaign contributions to Pombo, who also favors opening up the Arctic wildlife reserve. Last fall, Pombo had floated a plan similar to Jindal's but with a buffer zone for Florida's coasts.

DOJ_NMG_0034256

Talking to reporters last week, Jeb Bush hinted that he might be ready to make a deal. "We're kind of on the sideline waiting for a partner to engage with," he said. He said Pombo's proposal was "very fair" and added, "I think people now regret not taking it in the Florida delegation." The governor said, "A degree of certainty for the protection of our coastline is what we're looking for."

Yet Charter says Americans are sensitive about their beaches and predicts that election-year attempts to lift the moratorium will turn out to be "much ado about nothing."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Officials Seeking Source Of Lethal Heroin Mixture (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO, June 14 — The police and health authorities are struggling to track down the source of a doctored, intensely powerful heroin that has killed at least 130 people in and around Chicago and Detroit and sent hundreds more to hospitals in cities from St. Louis to Philadelphia.

In the labyrinthine and often paranoid world of illicit drugs, tales of killer heroin have come and gone before. But this time is different, law enforcement and health officials say.

The pattern of cases is broader, involving many markets at once, suggesting, they say, a larger and more sophisticated distribution network. The additive has been traced to laboratories in Mexico, which has traditionally supplied much of the Midwest heroin, raising fears that other hybrid pharmaceutical street drugs might emerge.

"The biggest new thing is the high mortality rate," said Dr. Carl Schmidt, the chief medical examiner for Wayne County, Mich., which includes Detroit and suburbs. The county has had more than 70 deaths since September related to the altered heroin mixture, Dr. Schmidt said, including those of three people found together in a car in April. The three were overcome so quickly that no one could get out to summon help.

The additive, called fentanyl, was developed as a commercial painkiller in the 1960's and surfaced as street-drug compound in the mid-80's on the West Coast, where it killed perhaps 100 people over as many as eight years. It made waves again in the early 90's in the New York metropolitan region, where it killed dozens of people who bought fentanyl-laced heroin under the street brand Tango and Cash.

Fentanyl, which is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine, is not a contaminant or filler, drug experts say, but rather a deliberately introduced enhancement intended to improve the product. It kills by shutting down a victim's respiratory system when too much is taken, an easy mistake because of the potency.

Much has changed in the drug world since fentanyl first became a killer. In many parts of the country, the use of synthetic, laboratory-produced drugs like methamphetamine, or meth, has surged. A sharp increase in prescriptions for narcotics, depressants and stimulants has also contributed to an increase in drugs diverted for illicit use and has created drug users familiar with pharmaceuticals, according to a report this year by the National Drug Intelligence Center, a unit of the Justice Department.

And a national crackdown on illegal drug laboratories in the United States has recently pushed more meth production to Mexico, where local police officers and federal Drug Enforcement Administration officials say they think Chicago's fentanyl was produced.

The Chicago police superintendent, Philip J. Cline, said in an interview that his officers working with the D.E.A. were looking for connections among clusters of overdose cases and then trying to track back from there through undercover purchases, arrests and laboratory tests to understand the pipeline.

"Everybody is looking for a signature," Superintendent Cline said. "Is it the same here as in Philly? We're not sure on that yet."

Superintendent Cline said city officials had been frustrated because warnings appeared to have partly backfired. Drug dealers were even seen waving the fliers the city distributed this year, advertising that they were selling the very thing the police were so worried about.

"The biggest problem is that we have willing victims," he said.

One former heroin user, Justin Sorci, said the wave of deaths had given him a mission, to warn people he knows are still using.

DOJ_NMG_0034257

"The thinking of an addict is that 'I won't be the one,' " said Mr. Sorci, 27, who went on Wednesday morning to a mobile treatment van on the North Side of Chicago to receive the methadone tablets that blunt his craving for heroin. "People who are still out there — I'm warning them to be careful."

Fentanyl's re-emergence has revived old fears among some experts that underworld chemists could one day learn to manipulate opiate molecules to produce superdrugs of devastating malevolence — more addictive or corrosive to society than heroin, alcohol or cocaine at their worst. Others say the wave of deaths proves that such a formula has not been perfected, since the fentanyl makers are killing off their own customers.

But people who study the market say more laboratory-produced drugs, of whatever quality, are probably inevitable because the process is cheaper than harvesting and transporting agricultural drugs and can be done anywhere.

"It is becoming easier to manufacture mind-altering substances, and the Internet has spread that knowledge all over the world," said Martin Y. Iguchi, a professor of public health at the University of California, Los Angeles, who was running a drug treatment clinic in New Jersey when the Tango and Cash cases unfolded in the 90's. "That's got to have an impact longer term."

But drug treatment workers and addicts have a tool against overdoses that was not widely available in the past, an injectable medicine called naloxone or narcan that can reverse respiratory failure.

The Chicago Recovery Alliance, a group that works to improve the health of intravenous drug users and runs the methadone van where Mr. Sorci stopped, pioneered the effort to get naloxone into the hands of the city's drug users in 1999. Baltimore, San Francisco and other cities now have anti-overdose programs using the medication, as well.

The group's medical director, Dr. Sarz Maxwell, said she knew of at least five people in Chicago who had stopped breathing after using heroin-fentanyl and were saved by friends.

"We even heard of a couple of complete strangers who found somebody, had naloxone and saved a life," Dr. Maxwell said.

One heroin user, Sean H., 20, who was visiting the treatment van and spoke only on the condition that his last name not be used, said a friend died six weeks ago from a fentanyl-related overdose. The man, 24, specifically sought out fentanyl, Sean said, and had just recovered from one overdose. His body was found on a train.

Sean says he and his brother, who also uses heroin, are more careful now and always have naloxone on hand when they take drugs, though he thinks that none of the heroin they have taken has contained the additive. But the talk about the intensity of the fentanyl experience has intrigued him, he said.

"From an addict's point of view," he said, "that intensity is what you want."

Deadly Heroin Focus Of DEA's Chicago Conference (WMAQ)

WMAQ-TV, June 14, 2006

CHICAGO -- More than 60 deaths in the Chicago area -- and dozens more around the country -- are blamed on heroin that has been tainted with a deadly ingredient.

Chicago police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration on Wednesday began a two-day conference on the tainted heroin, which is now showing up around the country.

Two young men die after allegedly consuming tainted heroin in this South side parking lot…

Justin Jobgen and Josh Serpliss were the eleventh and twelfth victims of what authorities now say are a string of more than 60 deaths attributed to a mixture of heroin and the prescription pain killer Fentanyl.

"Our focus is the influx of Fentanyl-laced heroin that has recently plagued our city," said Frank Limon, with the Chicago Police Department.

Timothy Ogden, special agent in charge with the DEA, said there was a "large spike" in drug overdoses in cities across the country.

The Fentanyl-laced heroin goes by the street name "drop dead" and has been seen on Chicago's West and South sides. Law-enforcement officials want to know where it is coming from and who is bringing it.

Ironically, law enforcement success may also play a factor in the drug's arrival, NBC5's Charlie Wojciechowski reported. Experts say getting drugs and dealers off the streets essentially destabilizes the drug markets.

"When the drug markets are destabilized through the police enforcement of the law, then customers need a new place to go," said Dan Bigg, with the Chicago Recovery Alliance.

Bigg has been an addictions counselor for the last 25 years. His Chicago Recovery Alliance works to improve the health of drug users and those suffering from AIDS and HIV.

Bigg said the Fentanyl-laced heroin provides cost-conscious drug users with more perceived bang for their buck.

"What Fentanyl does is it renders people unconscious. It renders people dead," Bigg said.

DOJ_NMG_0034258

One possible source of the tainted heroin is Mexico. Last week, Mexican police raided an illegal Fentanyl lab in the city of Toluca. Five people, including the alleged chemist, were arrested.

Killer Drug Overlooked, Until Flurry Of Deaths (DN)

By Brad Heath

Detroit News, June 15, 2006

TAYLOR -- Their roommate found them after midnight, dead together in bed.

When the police arrived at the tiny bungalow in a middle-class Taylor neighborhood, they found pills on the bedroom floor. Their roommate told them the man and woman, both 31 years old, were drug users. The medical examiner suspected they had committed suicide that January day because overdose victims almost always die alone.

Weeks later, toxicology tests showed the pair had taken heroin and the painkiller fentanyl.

Their bodies were among the first clues to the escalating damage being inflicted in Wayne County by fentanyl-laced drugs. But for months, police and health officials were unable to make sense of a growing scattering of evidence -- drug users dying suddenly and in groups, growing stacks of toxicology reports mentioning the drug, and a warning from federal agents dating back to November that lethal quantities had been found on the street.

But it wasn't until 12 people died from apparent drug overdoses May 18 and 19 that officials realized the extent of the problem, officials said in interviews. The clues became clear: Fentanyl was most likely to blame.

"People think it's easy to look at the crystal ball and see what's in there," said Dr. Carl Schmidt, Wayne County's chief medical examiner. "I guess it's easy to look. But it's discerning what's in there that's the hard part."

Authorities now suspect the painkiller, mixed with heroin or cocaine, is responsible for a sudden increase in overdose deaths; the toll is 79 deaths in Wayne County over the past four weeks. The drug has been linked to another 130 deaths since January 2005.

Since April, cities in at least eight other states have similarly reported a sudden surge in overdoses now the subject of a nationwide investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and police departments from Philadelphia to Chicago.

But for months, as fentanyl-related deaths accumulated, authorities in Detroit said, some of the clues that could have alerted them earlier to the growing toll were obscured by the regular toll of drug deaths in the county, and by testing limitations that kept them from quickly linking any of the deaths to the lethal mixture.

By the time Wayne County issued its May 19 alert, the number of fentanyl-linked deaths had been increasing since November -- a trend that did not become apparent until months later.

Extent of problem hidden

At first, the corpses came one at a time, collected from suburban bedrooms, inner-city drug houses and emergency rooms where friends dumped them from moving cars. The extent of the problem remained hidden behind overall overdose numbers that fluctuate wildly from month to month: The number of deaths ultimately linked to fentanyl increased from 18 to 22 between February and March, but the total number of overdose deaths dropped from 52 to 49.

Adding to the difficulty, Schmidt said, are toxicology tests that can take as long as six weeks to complete because the county typically stores samples and tests them in batches to save money. The result is that it takes at least a month for investigators to know what blend of drugs a person had taken before they died -- and even then, most drug users have taken so many it's almost impossible to say which killed them.

On top of that, Wayne County has no systematic way to track toxicology results to determine whether a particular drug is killing more people. Instead, officials review pending cases at a weekly meeting. Schmidt said he began seeing fentanyl more often in toxicology results in February, but that there was not enough evidence to think the deaths amounted to a broader health threat. He said the tests typically showed only that people had taken fentanyl before they died, not that the painkiller had killed them. Most had also taken other potentially lethal drugs.

Even today, they can't say with certainty that fentanyl is to blame. Authorities won't know that until they get the results of toxicology tests. But Schmidt said that as soon as he saw overdose deaths spike in May, he suspected the drug's involvement. By then, it had been discovered in the man and woman found dead in Taylor in January, and had been detected in three other people who died together in a car in Detroit. Those cases, he said, offered a good indication that fentanyl was capable of causing such clusters of deaths.

County Executive Robert Ficano said there was little debate about what to do next: County officials summoned television cameras and sounded an alarm about the tainted drugs. Drug treatment workers -- even recovering addicts -- worked parts of Detroit known to be drug havens to warn about the dangers.

Did cocktail disappear?

DOJ_NMG_0034259

The daily death toll from overdoses has since dropped to two or three a day, numbers that were typical for the county before fentanyl surfaced. Public health officials have said it is too soon to know whether that means the lethal cocktail has disappeared from Detroit, though nationwide the drug has vanished suddenly from the streets of several cities.

"It pops up, and then it just goes away," DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said.

State and county officials said they generally are pleased with the county's response. Ficano said health officials made a "reliable and quick determination" of what was going on.

Others said that while they were satisfied with the county's response, they'll review the case to see whether similar cases could be detected more quickly in the future. "We'll review this situation -- I think all parties involved will -- and make any adjustments we need to," said Dr. Dean Sienko, acting chief medical executive of the state Department of Community Health. There were earlier warnings, too. In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with "potentially lethal" levels of fentanyl. The Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, Schmidt said. He said the alert did not lead them to suspect that the fentanyl was causing more people to die from overdoses, because the total number of deaths was largely unchanged.

In interviews, police, medical examiners and health officials in other cities afflicted by fentanyl said they too discovered the problem only when the number of overdoses -- fatal or not -- shot up suddenly.

In Harrisburg, Pa., officials sounded the alarm the day after police reported three heroin overdoses -- none of them fatal -- in one night. "Normally we're lucky if we see one a month," city spokesman Randy King said. In Camden, N.J., outside Philadelphia, police knew there was a problem after three people overdosed in a day. In Chicago, officials said they knew there was a problem when firefighters saw a surge in ambulance runs linked to drug overdoses.

Most of those cities don't know exactly how many people died from fentanyl because most medical examiners don't regularly test for it. Chicago's medical examiner has traced deaths going back at least six months; in Detroit, officials documented more than 130 deaths linked to fentanyl between January 2005 and April.

Detroit police and firefighters said they saw no such increase here. Hospitals said they had not treated anyone for fentanyl overdoses -- though most typically do not test for the drug -- and poison control centers said they had seen no increase in calls linked to the drug.

Instead, the problem surfaced in the morgue.

"You know there are a lot more people who are using this stuff who are alive than end up dying," Schmidt said. He said the best way to quickly detect such outbreaks in the future is in patients who use them and survive.

More Bad Heroin (WPVI)

By Dann Cuellar

WPVI-TV, June 14, 2006

Agents Cracking Down - Looking For Sources

CHESTER, PA - June 14, 2006 - There were a number of developments Wednesday in the growing problem of bad heroin on the streets.

First, Chester authorities confirmed what they had suspected, seven overdose cases within a 15-hour period in the city, all linked to heroin spiked with the powerful painkiller fentanyl.

Meanwhile members of a major task force including agents from Philadelphia and New Jersey met in Chicago Wednesday. They now believe the stuff is coming from a lab in Mexico.

The fentanyl-laced heroin has killed more than 100 people in 8 states, including 28 in Philadelphia, at least 20 in New Jersey, and more than a dozen in Delaware. Fentanyl is more that 80 times more potent than morphine and it inhibits breathing.

In an effort to combat the crisis, DEA agents from around this area met with taskforce counterparts in Chicago to determine where the stuff was coming from.

They now believe the primary source was an illegal lab near the western city of Guadalajara, Mexico. It was raided by U.S. and Mexican agents recently. Among those arrested was the man believed to be the chemist. Authorities say the fentanyl-laced heroin is still being sold by dealers looking for a competitive edge.

The undercover strike force continues to gather intelligence. Officials expect to make more arrests in this ongoing criminal investigation.

Physician Gets Life For Drug Deaths (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034260

He overprescribed painkillers and 2 died

A Bath Township physician was sentenced to life in prison Friday because the massive doses of painkillers he prescribed led to the deaths of two patients.

Dr. Jorge Martinez's conviction under a statute punishing health-care fraud resulting in death was the first in the country, as was his life sentence, U.S. Attorney Greg White said.

Martinez remained adamant in federal court in Cleveland that he did the best he could to treat desperate patients whose lives were consumed by chronic pain. Patients often came to his clinics in Parma and Boardman wailing in pain, he said.

"There was nothing else but to numb those nerves," Martinez said. "The responsibility I had was to treat the patient."

But U.S. District Judge Donald Nugent told Martinez his prescriptions of OxyContin, Zoloft and Valium caused more harm than good.

"People came to you in desperation," Nugent said. "You continued to prescribe medication that would continue that downward spiral."

The packed courtroom erupted in applause when Nugent announced the sentence. Relatives of the two dead men, John "Jack" Lancaster and Blair Knight, wiped tears and hugged prosecutors.

In January, after a five-week trial, a jury convicted Martinez of 56 charges, including health care fraud resulting in death, health care fraud and distribution of a controlled substance.

Martinez prescribed painkillers only after patients agreed to receive injections to treat pain, Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Betzer said. Martinez could then bill Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private insurers for the injections.

Martinez submitted paperwork claiming he routinely saw more than 100 patients a day from 1998 through 2004, prosecutors said.

He gave patients only cursory exams but billed insurers for sophisticated treatment, prosecutors said. He submitted $60 million in fraudulent claims to insurers and received payment on about $12 million - half of which came from the BWC.

Some of the 2,500 patients Martinez saw became addicted to the painkillers he prescribed. Martinez ignored the symptoms and continued prescribing more.

"The defendant pumped people full of pills, jabbed them with needles and lied to insurers solely to get rich," Assistant U.S. Attorney Virginia Hearey said. "And people died."

Jurors ruled that in the cases of Lancaster, 42, of Parma Heights, and Knight, 35, of Ravenna, those prescriptions contributed to their deaths.

Knight's brother was relieved by Nugent's sentence.

"I'm thankful he's gone for life," Chuck Knight said of Martinez. "I'm glad he can't hurt anyone else."

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

mtobin@plaind.com, 216-999-4128

Doctor Gets Life Sentence In Deaths Of Two Patients (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

CLEVELAND - A doctor was sentenced to life in prison Friday for committing health care fraud that resulted in the deaths of two patients.

Jorge Martinez is the first to be convicted under the health care fraud resulting in death statute passed in 1996, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in Cleveland.

Martinez, 54, of Bath Township, was convicted in January of 56 counts, including drug distribution and mail, wire and health care fraud for prescribing unnecessary drugs for patients suffering from chronic pain.

Prosecutors say Martinez often prescribed medication such as OxyContin, Zoloft and Valium to people already hooked on drugs. He rarely gave a prescription until after the patient agreed to receive injections to treat pain.

He then billed Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private health insurance plans for the injections.

Martinez contended his clinics in Lorain, Parma and Boardman in northeast Ohio offered people relief from chronic pain.

John "Jack" Lancaster, 42, of Parma Heights, and Blair Knight, 35, of Ravenna, died while under Martinez's care.

On Sept. 5, 2001, Lancaster fell unconscious in Martinez's office for several hours after he received two injections of Zoloft. He overdosed on multiple drugs two days later and died on Sept. 13, 2001.

Martinez submitted $60 million in fraudulent claims to Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private health insurance plans and was paid more than $12 million. More than $7 million has been recovered.

U.S. District Judge Donald Nugent will hold a hearing in August to determine how the money is divided among the victims and government agencies.

Drugs Again Found In Home Depot Cabinets (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

SOUTHWICK — For the fifth time in a week, a stash of drugs was found in a cabinet purchased at a Home Depot store in Massachusetts.

A plumber in Southwick discovered 40 pounds of marijuana and 3 kilograms of cocaine stashed in a bathroom vanity he'd purchased at a Home Depot in Chicopee for a home renovation.

Southwick Police Lt. David Ricardi said a second stash was found at the Chicopee store and at least two more were discovered at a Tewksbury Home Depot. Police found more drugs in a fifth cabinet, but Ricardi would not say where or when it was discovered.

One of the Tewksbury stashes was discovered June 8 after a homeowner brought home a cabinet and found 50 pounds of marijuana.

"It's a smuggling operation gone bad," Ricardi said. "Somebody owes some money."

Tony Pettigrew, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration, confirmed yesterday that his agency was investigating, but declined further comment.

A statement from Atlanta-based Home Depot said the company was cooperating with investigators. The company declined further comment.

Ricardi said the plumber discovered the drugs in Southwick on Monday after he bought the vanity. The man noticed the vanity top hadn't been included in the package and instead found two plastic bags containing the drugs stuffed inside. Ricardi said the drugs were worth $200,000.

Customer Discovered Stash In Vanity From Home Depot (BMI)

By Margaret Smith And Linda Kush

Billerica Minuteman, June 15, 2006

A Billerica resident getting ready to install a new vanity and sink he bought at Home Depot in Tewksbury found 50 pounds of marijuana in the package, Police Sgt. Roy Frost said.

Frost said the resident, whose name was not given, reported the discovery June 8, after he purchased a two-piece vanity and sink and had a plumber assist in the installation.

"He found that it contained, instead of the sink top, about 50 pounds of marijuana," said Frost, adding that the find could fetch as much as $100,000 on the street.

Frost said Billerica and Tewksbury police are working with Home Depot, along with the federal Drug Enforcement Agency. Frost said investigators hope to determine whether the marijuana find is linked to a larger distribution problem, with distributors knowingly or unknowingly enlisted to help transport drugs large distances - a practice known as "muling."

"There is no evidence to suggest that there was a recipient in the Tewksbury or Billerica area. However, there is no evidence to suggest there wasn't," Frost said.

Frost added, "This is very unusual, but not an unusual situation in the broader scope of things. Larger corporations doing shipping nationally and internationally will the subject of muling, whether they know it or not."

Frost said "progress is being made" in determining the marijuana's origin, but decline to comment as the investigation is ongoing.

A Home Depot spokesman confirmed the customer's discovery of the marijuana and believes the customer discovered the marijuana after bringing the vanity home.

"We are working with the local authorities in their ongoing investigation, just making sure they have the information they need," said Yancy Casey, a spokesman for the Home Depot corporate office in Atlanta.

A Drug Enforcement Agency official declined to comment on the case.

Drug Caches Found In Home Depot Vanities (CNN)

CNN, June 14, 2006

(CNN) -- Large quantities of drugs were found inside merchandise from at least two Home Depot stores in Massachusetts, and authorities are investigating, police said Wednesday.

A contractor late last week discovered two 50-pound "bricks" of marijuana wrapped in plastic bags inside a bathroom vanity he had purchased at a Home Depot store in Tewksbury, said Chief of Detectives Lt. Dennis Peterson.

The estimated street value of the marijuana is around $145,000, Peterson said. (Watch as do-it-yourself goes to pot -- 1:30)

Similar incidents have occurred in other parts of the state.

A plumber purchased a vanity in western Massachusetts on Monday in which he later found 3 kilograms of cocaine and around 40 pounds of marijuana, with a total estimated street value of $250,000, according to the Southwick Police Department.

Southwick Police Lt. David A. Ricardi said the item was purchased at "a local hardware store" but would not confirm it came from The Home Depot.

According to Peterson, a third individual discovered large quantities of illegal drugs inside Home Depot merchandise.

Peterson would not provide the details of that incident but said it was part of the overall investigation and that Tewksbury police were working with their Southwick counterparts and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Tewksbury police and DEA officials conducted a search Tuesday of about 12 Home Depot stores statewide and found other bathroom vanities that contained drugs, Peterson said. He would not elaborate on how many drug caches were discovered in the search.

In each incident being investigated by Tewksbury Police, all of the merchandise boxes originated from a Texas location and were distributed through one Massachusetts warehouse, Peterson said.

"I'm sure the packages were being shipped to the distribution center and someone was supposed to intercept them," Peterson said. "So that person [who was supposed to intercept the packages] either wasn't on duty that day or the packages were marked wrong."

The Southwick and Tewksbury Police Departments both said The Home Depot was cooperating fully with their investigations, and no one employed by the company is a suspect at this time.

Both departments also said none of the customers who purchased the vanities that contained drugs are suspects.

In a written statement, The Home Depot said, "The company is cooperating with authorities as they investigate this matter, and we will support law enforcement in any way possible to help bring those responsible to justice."

Drugs Found In Home Depot Merchandise (UPI)

United Press International, June 15, 2006

TEWKSBURY, Mass. (UPI) -- Massachusetts police are trying to determine how two 50-pound bricks of marijuana wound up in merchandise at two Home Depot stores.

The value of the drug cache was estimated at $145,000.

CNN reports the latest find was at Home Depots in Tewksbury and Chief of Detectives Lt. Dennis Peterson said similar finds have been made elsewhere in the state.

Peterson said a plumber found three kilograms of cocaine and 40 pounds of marijuana in a vanity he bought in Southwick. Peterson said a third individual found a large quantity of drugs inside Home Depot merchandise.

State and federal drug agents searched a dozen Home Depots Tuesday. Peterson said drugs were found in other merchandise but would not elaborate. The boxes containing the merchandise originated from Texas, Peterson said.

Home Depot said it was cooperating fully with investigators.

Martin's Sentence Is 10 Years (BNNJ)

By Sean C. Mccullen, Staff Writer

Bridgeton News (NJ), June 14, 2006

CAMDEN -- A U.S. District Court judge on Tuesday sentenced Kamal Martin, the reputed leader of Bridgeton street gang 30 Deep, to 10 years in federal prison on a drug-trafficking charge, according to authorities.

Martin, 28, was arrested July 21, 2005, at the Cumberland County Jail, where he was serving a 20-day sentence for driving with a suspended license, and charged federally with distributing and possessing with intent to distribute more than five grams of crack cocaine.

He pleaded guilty to distributing a significant amount of crack cocaine on several dates in early 2005 on Jan. 12. He and his attorney in the matter, Assistant Federal Public Defender Christopher O'Malley, had approved the plea deal last November.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Kugler sentenced Martin Tuesday to 10 years in prison, with the prison term to be followed by five years of supervised release, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson.

The judge also imposed a $250,000 fine against Martin, Richardson said.

Bridgeton Police hope Martin's sentence on the drug charge will serve as a deterrent to those planning future gang-related and drug-dealing activity in the city.

DOJ_NMG_0034263

"I hope this sentence sends a message to anyone who is involved or contemplating getting involved in gang activity, in drug distribution or in organized or random violent acts," Police Chief Jeff Wentz said.

Wentz commended the work of his department, the FBI, the DEA and the Cumberland County Narcotics Task Force in building the case against Martin.

Martin was facing up to 40 years in prison on the charge, according to Bridgeton Det. Lt. Michael Gaimari, but his cooperation with local, state and federal authorities on several investigations, including homicides and other gang-related crimes, resulted in the shorter sentence.

The minimum sentence for the crack cocaine distribution charge Martin faced is five years, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office,.

However, Greg Reinert, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Camden, had said in January that Martin likely was facing 15 to 20 years in prison since he was deemed to be a "career offender" based on prior convictions for terroristic threats and aggravated assault with a deadly weapon.

As part of his cooperation, Martin also turned over a semi-automatic machine gun, according to Gaimari.

Gaimari, who attended Tuesday's sentencing with Bridgeton Det. Rick Pierce, said while he was pleased to see Martin sentenced to time in prison, it was distressing to hear what Martin's daughter said to her father in the Camden courtroom.

"What was sad was hearing (Martin's) small child telling (him) that she loved him as they were leading him away," Gaimari said. "Not only do these individuals destroy their own lives when they get involved in this type of activity, they fail to realize how it affects friends and families.

"It's a no-win situation for everyone involved, but we, along with federal, state and county authorities, are committed to going after every single person involved in these activities with the same vengeance as we pursued Mr. Martin."

Martin still is facing a handgun possession charge in connection with the Aug. 31, 2003, shoot-out at the Samuel J. Roberts Elks Lodge on South Avenue in Bridgeton, in which two men were slain, and still is suspected of being involved in the April 30, 2004, killing of 24-year-old Stephen Jackson on Colfax Street.

Gaimari expressed gratitude for the work of the following individuals and agencies in building and working on the case against Martin: the U.S. Attorney's Office; FBI Special Agent James Lisle; DEA Special Agent James Kerrigan; county narcotics task force Lt. Rosemary Parks; and Bridgeton detectives, especially Pierce for targeting Martin for more than a year.

Secretary In LaWall's Office Quits, Was Arrested (ADS)

By Kim Smith

Arizona Daily Star, June 14, 2006

A Pima County Attorney's Office secretary who was arrested by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency in May has resigned.

Erlinda Alegria-Perez submit-ted her resignation letter Tuesday afternoon, effective immediately. She had worked as a legal secretary in the Pima County Attorney's Office since 1991 and has been on paid administrative leave since May 4.

Perez and her husband, Abraham, were indicted and arrested as the result of a yearlong DEA investigation that began in Harrisburg, Pa.

According to DEA officials, the couple, along with at least five others from Tucson, California and Pennsylvania, conspired to transport marijuana to Pennsylvania.

A pre-action meeting to discuss her side of the story had been scheduled for 1 p.m. Tuesday, but she left a message asking for it to be postponed until today.

Following the meeting, Perez could have been disciplined, at which point she could have resigned, accepted her punishment or appealed to the Merit Commission, but she opted to resign without going through the meeting.

By tendering her resignation, Perez waived her right to the pre-action meeting.

In her letter, Perez thanked County Attorney Barbara LaWall for the opportunity to serve the citizens of Pima County.

"The knowledge and experience I take with me is priceless," Perez wrote.

Officer Quits Amid Inquiry: Dallas: She Was On Leave For Dating Drug Suspect; More Firings Likely Today (DMN)

Dallas Morning News, June 15, 2006

One troubled Dallas officer's name won't be on the short list as Police Chief David Kunkle prepares for his next round of firings.

Officer Kesha Thomas abruptly resigned Wednesday, a day before it was widely expected that she would be fired for her relationship with an Arkansas man accused of dealing drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0034264

In the last two weeks, Chief Kunkle has fired nine officers for misconduct as part of a housecleaning aimed at changing the culture of his nearly 3,000-member department. As many as four firings are expected today.

Ms. Thomas' story illustrates the challenge the chief faces. She was on paid leave for about 10 months after police officials were informed of her relationship with Fred Green, who faces federal charges of drug trafficking in Arkansas.

Another officer, Roshonda Parker, is also being investigated, accused of associating with Mr. Green. She remains on paid administrative leave, and Chief Kunkle may decide her fate today.

"What the heck has taken so long?" said James Whalen, Officer Parker's attorney. "Either it's clear-cut or it's not."

Mr. Whalen said Officer Parker did not associate with Mr. Green.

Ms. Thomas' attorney said she became frustrated with the slow pace of the investigation and resigned because she found out about the status of her case through media reports.

"She didn't really think that was fair and didn't want to continue to work for somebody that treats her that way," said the attorney, Phil Burleson Jr.

Mr. Burleson said Ms. Thomas cooperated with investigators.

"When she learned of the extent of [the trouble Mr. Green was in], that's when she broke it off," he said of the relationship.

In May 2005, state troopers seized 13 kilograms (about 29 pounds) of cocaine that investigators linked to Mr. Green, 31. Federal agents soon learned through phone records of Ms. Thomas' relationship with Mr. Green.

Ms. Thomas told federal agents that Officer Parker introduced them in the spring of 2004. Mr. Green had already served prison time on a felony drug conviction.

Ms. Thomas and Mr. Green, who was living in Arkansas and owned two cellphone stores, struck up a long-distance romance.

Police and Drug Enforcement Administration records state that Ms. Thomas once saw a gun in Mr. Green's trunk and that he had asked her to wire money for him several times, but that she didn't question either of those things.

Ms. Thomas told investigators that in mid-2004, Mr. Green told her he had a warrant out for his arrest. She said he told her it was a case of mistaken identity.

"Her side of the story is that she had no indication that the individual she was dating had a criminal problem," Mr. Burleson said. "She thought he was a decent guy."

Department rules prohibit officers from associating with felons and people involved in criminal activity.

Ms. Thomas initially told investigators she stopped dating Mr. Green after she confirmed that he was wanted by authorities by using her patrol car computer in mid-2004 to check his record. She said she told him he needed to take care of the warrant.

Click here to learn more about e911 and its impact on VoIP

Click Here to Learn How You Can Profit from IP Communications. Live, in Person at INTERNET TELEPHONY Conference & EXPO West 2006 in San Diego.

See Live Demos of Today's Most Useful Enterprise and Service Provider IP Solutions at the World's Only VoIP Demo Event. August 8-10 in Santa Clara.

Get Your IMS Education from The Expert Team at INTERNET TELEPHONY Magazine and TMCnet. This Fall in San Diego at IMS Expo.

Records show she checked his warrant status four times between November 2004 and June 2005.

Ms. Thomas later admitted that she continued to date Mr. Green.

"I did not take any police action, because I believed this was a personal matter of Mr. Green and since he had hired an attorney, the matter would be resolved," she told investigators.

Ms. Thomas also told investigators that she allowed Mr. Green to give her money after she knew about the warrant. His gifts included $6,000 for a down payment on a house.

Officer Parker told investigators that she'd had an on-again, off-again relationship with Mr. Green's cousin and that she'd known Mr. Green since her days at the University of Arkansas at Pine Bluff in the mid-'90s.

She told investigators that while in college, she once walked into a room in Mr. Green's house and saw a bale of marijuana. She said she closed the door, walked outside and didn't ask questions. She also said Mr. Green once gave her $400 for a car payment after she became a police officer.

Officer Parker said she last saw Mr. Green at Ms. Thomas' home outside of Dallas in the winter of 2004. She'd also been present once when Ms. Thomas checked him on her squad car computer.

"Parker stated she did not arrest Green on this occasion because she was out of her jurisdiction, and she did not contact the local police because she did not want to be involved," according to DEA records of the interview.

Mr. Whalen, Officer Parker's attorney, said his client has been drawn into the investigation unfairly. "Roshonda did not associate with Fred Green," Mr. Whalen said. "Kesha was the one who ran him on the computer."

Officer Parker, hired in 1999, graduated last in her class of 43 recruits. She has been disciplined repeatedly for being tardy to work and missing court dates. She also received a 15-day suspension for a 2003 incident in Cedar Hill in which she hit an ex-boyfriend's car with a tire iron.

In July 2005, U.S. marshals arrested Mr. Green, who was then living in DeSoto. They seized 450 grams (1 pound) of crack cocaine, 180 grams (0.4 pounds) of methamphetamine, $13,000 in cash and several weapons.

Federal investigators notified Dallas police on Aug. 10 of his connections to the officers, who were soon placed on administrative leave.

The slow pace of such investigations has been frustrating to top brass at the department, where Chief Kunkle is approaching the end of his second year on the job. The chief said he hopes the resignation is a signal that the rank and file are beginning to get the message.

"We have to change the environment where people believe that they don't have to follow the rules," Chief Kunkle said. "I'm going to try to make sure that they do it, because they have to."

Meth Myth Busted? Study Says Drug Rarely Used (AP)

AP, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A group that advocates non-prison punishment for drug criminals says methamphetamine use is not a raging epidemic.

The Sentencing Project issued a report that says meth – while dangerous -- is really among the least commonly used drugs. The group also contends usage rates have been stable since 1999, and that fewer teens are taking meth.

The report's author claims reports of meth being an epidemic spreading across the country are "grossly overstated." The report cites overheated rhetoric, unsupported assertions and factual errors about the use of the drug.

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy did not immediately comment on the report.

Study: Meth Use Rare In Most Of The U.S. (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, June 15, 2006

A pouch containing crystalized methamphetamine and a homemade pipe are shown March 21, 2006 in Window Rock, Ariz. An advocacy group says meth use is rare in most of the U.S., not a raging epidemic described by politicians and the news media. (AP Photo/Matt York, FILE)

WASHINGTON -- Methamphetamine use is rare in most of the United States, not the raging epidemic described by politicians and the news media, says a study by an advocacy group.

Meth is a dangerous drug but among the least commonly used, The Sentencing Project policy analyst Ryan King wrote in a report issued Wednesday. Rates of use have been stable since 1999, and among teenagers meth use has dropped, King said.

"The portrayal of methamphetamine in the United States as an epidemic spreading across the country has been grossly overstated," King said. The Sentencing Project is a not-for-profit group that supports alternatives to prison terms for convicted drug users and other criminals.

Overheated rhetoric, unsupported assertions and factual errors about the use of the drug - including frequent, misguided comparisons between meth and crack cocaine - lead to poor decisions about how to spend precious public dollars combating drug addiction, King said.

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy did not immediately comment on the report.

The report cites statistics compiled by the government to make its case, including a 2004 survey that estimated 583,000 people used meth in the past month, or two-10ths of 1 percent of the U.S. population. Four times as many people use cocaine regularly and 30 times as many use marijuana, King said.

A separate survey of high-school students showed a 36 percent drop in meth use between 2001 and 2005.

The report acknowledged that methamphetamine is more widely used today than it was 10 years ago. Data from the jail populations of a handful of cities on the West Coast also show what King called a "highly localized" problem.

Among men arrested in Phoenix, 38.3 percent tested positive for methamphetamine. Figures for other cities are: Los Angeles, 28.7 percent; Portland, Ore., 25.4; San Diego, 36.2 percent; and San Jose, Calif., 36.9 percent.

But nationally, just 5 percent of men who had been arrested had meth in their systems. By contrast, 30 percent tested positive for cocaine and 44 percent for marijuana, the report said, citing government statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0034266

Treatment programs for meth also have been portrayed inaccurately, with news reports suggesting that meth users do not respond as well to treatment as users of other drugs, King said. The Bush administration's recent methamphetamine control strategy also referred to a "common misperception that methamphetamine is so addictive that it is impossible to treat."

Programs in 15 states have had promising results, King said.

"Mischaracterizing the impact of methamphetamine by exaggerating its prevalence and consequences while downplaying its receptivity to treatment succeeds neither as a tool of prevention nor a vehicle of education," he wrote.

King called for a tempered approach to the problem, keeping the focus on local trouble spots and using federal money to beef up treatment programs.

On the Net:

The Sentencing Project: http://www.sentencingproject.org

White House Office of National Drug Control Policy: http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov

NCAA Looks To Keep Drugs Off Diamond In Wake Of MLB Scandals (USAT)

By Steve Wieberg, Usa Today

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Prompted in part by the Major League Baseball scandal, the NCAA is stepping up testing for steroid use in college baseball.

For the first time, all 64 teams in the association's Division I baseball tournament were assured of being tested at regionals this year. The NCAA held out the threat of further screening at last week's super regionals and the College World Series, which opens Friday in Omaha.

More significantly, officials say, the association is expanding its year-round random screening for steroids and masking agents into the summer, focusing first on baseball and football. The first of those tests will be conducted next week.

Ten players — five in both baseball and football — from 22 schools ultimately will be tested. Selected at random, they'll be sought out at home or other summer locations and given no more than 48 hours' notice.

"These guys know they're going to be tested at the championship," says Frank Uryasz, president of the Kansas City, Mo., based National Center for Drug Free Sport, which runs the program for the NCAA.

"What we needed to do was fill the obvious hole in the program, and that was the two or 21/2 months in the summer when they simply knew they weren't going to be drug-tested. To fill that time up with some random, short-notice drug testing, I think, is a huge accomplishment."

The additional testing will cost the NCAA $150,000.

Baseball and football players are among those most likely to admit steroid use — 2.3% in both sports, compared with 1.2% of responding athletes across the board — according to the NCAA's most recent substance-use survey.

Revelations and allegations of the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs in Major League Baseball heightened the concern.

"It did have an impact on the folks who were asking for more testing," said Mary Wilfert, liaison to the association's Committee on Competitive Safeguards and Medical Aspects of Sports.

The NCAA has tested during its baseball championships since 1986, though not continuously.

It previously tested some years at regionals, others at super regionals or the College World Series.

Six randomly selected players from each of the 64 participating teams were screened during regionals this month.

In addition to steroids, testing at NCAA championships targets drugs such as amphetamines, marijuana and other recreational substances.

Galante Wants Out Of Prison, Back In Business (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- An imprisoned Danbury businessman wants to get out of jail and return to the helm of his trash empire, setting the stage for a court battle over control of southern Connecticut's garbage industry.

James Galante, whose businesses handle about 80 percent of southwestern Connecticut's garbage, was arrested in a Mafia case Friday and ordered held without bail.

A federal judge said Wednesday that she'll reconsider that order and Galante's defense attorneys were preparing to challenge a court order putting federal marshals in charge of his businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0034267

"First things first. We've got to get him out," defense attorney Hugh Keefe said. "I can't represent him if he's in Rhode Island and incarcerated. We'll take care of the business thing in due course."

Federal prosecutors say Galante carved out exclusive routes for his companies and paid Genovese crime family boss Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello $120,000 a year for mob muscle to enforce his territories. That meant higher prices for businesses and homeowners, authorities said.

It's a traditional moneymaking scheme for the mob, but unlike New York trash cases involving murders and assaults, no such violence is alleged in Connecticut's case.

Given that fact, Keefe argued in court papers Wednesday that Galante is being treated unfairly. He is the only person among 29 charged being held without bail, his family's bank accounts are frozen and his multimillion-dollar trash conglomerate is being run by federal marshals.

Marshals say they'll eventually turn over operation of Galante's businesses to a professional management company.

"Running the business is where he belongs," said company attorney H. James Pickerstein, who said he will file a motion Thursday regarding the federal takeover.

Prosecutors say Galante is too dangerous to be released. The FBI recorded telephone conversations in which Galante at times talks menacingly about his competitors.

"'What I have to do,' tell him, 'is hurt you,'" Galante was recorded instructing a subordinate during a 2005 dispute with a rival company.

Most of the threats played in court, however, were delivered by subordinates who were released on bail. And Ianniello, the 85-year-old charged as the muscle behind Galante's threats, was also released.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns will hear arguments for Galante's release June 27. He is being held in a Rhode Island detention center that houses federal prisoners from the region.

IMMIGRATION:

2,100 Are Arrested On Immigration Violations (NYT)

By Jennifer 8. Lee And Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

In a nationwide sweep, law enforcement officials have arrested more than 2,100 people in the past three weeks for immigration violations, including 116 in New Jersey and 114 in New York State, the Department of Homeland Security announced yesterday. About a third of those arrested were in California.

The sweep, which started on May 26, was a cooperative effort between local law enforcement agencies and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement branch of the Department of Homeland Security.

"The fugitives captured in this operation threatened public safety in hundreds of neighborhoods and communities around the country," Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, said in a statement.

Those arrested fell into three broad categories: convicted criminals, members of gangs, and fugitives who had violated deportation orders, the authorities said.

Nearly half of those arrested had been convicted of crimes that made them eligible for deportation, including 146 who had committed sexual crimes involving minors. About 350 of those arrested were known to be involved in violent street gangs. About 650 were fugitives who were ignoring or violating deportation orders.

About 800 of those arrested have already been deported.

In Suffolk County, 19 men were arrested because they had been convicted of crimes that made them eligible for deportation, according Dennis Caine, chief of detectives for the Suffolk County Police Department.

Their names were determined by cross-referencing county lists of convicted sex offenders and known gang members with a federal immigration database. Of those men, 14 were sexual offenders convicted of offenses ranging from endangering the welfare of a child, a misdemeanor, to felony rape, robbery or negligent homicide.

In New Jersey, agents broke up a narcotics ring operating in Plainfield that imported cocaine from Guatemala to members of the Mara Salvatrucha gang and associates, the authorities said.

Agents also arrested 22 suspected members of the Los Cafeteros gang and the Sureno 13 gang in Red Bank. All of the suspected gang members are being held on immigration charges, but many also have criminal records, the authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0034268

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said that at least four people were arrested as late as yesterday morning in New York City. "Border security doesn't stop at the border," he said. "It requires a robust interior enforcement effort."

Most of those arrested in the New York metropolitan area were from Latin American countries, but the nationwide sweep also caught immigrants from Africa, East and Southeast Asia, and Europe.

Sweep Nets Nearly 2,100 Illegal Immigrants (AP)

By Andrew Ryan

AP, June 15, 2006

BOSTON (AP)— A blitz by federal agents during the last three weeks captured nearly 2,100 illegal immigrants across the country in raids targeting child molesters, violent gang members and past deportees who re-entered the country.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials credited the roundup to a network of 35 fugitive apprehension teams.

"This is a massive operation," said Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for immigration enforcement or ICE, which is part of the Department of Homeland Security. "We are watching the country's borders from the inside."

The crackdown, dubbed "Operation Return to Sender," kicked off May 26. An Associated Press reporter and photographer accompanied a fugitive task force as it made raids Tuesday night and early Wednesday.

A swarm of immigration agents had sped silently, headlights off, down a Boston side street and surrounded an apartment house.

"Police! Policia! Police!" Monico yelled, holding his badge to a window where someone had pulled back the curtain. "Open the door!"

Soon agents led a dazed-looking Jose Ferreira Da Silva, 35, out in handcuffs. The Brazilian had been arrested in 2002 and deported, but had slipped back into the country. He now faces up to 20 years in prison.

"This sends a message," said Daniel Monico, a deportation officer, after a successful raid early Wednesday. "When we deport you, we're serious."

The operation has caught more than 140 immigrants with convictions for sexual offenses against children; 367 known gang members, including street soldiers in the deadly Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13; and about 640 people who had already been deported once, immigration officials said. The numbers include more than 720 arrests in California alone.

More than 800 people arrested already have been deported.

ICE's 2006 budget increased the number of fugitive task forces to 52, and the Bush administration is pushing for 70 by 2007. The teams face a mounting challenge.

There are more than 500,000 "fugitive aliens" who have been deported by judges and either slipped back into the country or never left. There is often a disconnect between local and state prisons and the federal government that allows illegal immigrants to serve time and be released without being transferred to federal officials for deportation.

The government has conducted large scale sweeps from time to time, including on April 20, when Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced a new get-tough policy. That day, agents rounded up 1,100 illegal immigrants in 40 cities.

During the raid late Tuesday, the federal squad, which includes a Boston police sergeant detective, wore bulging bulletproof vests and stiff Kevlar gloves to protect their hands from needles, knives and rusty fences.

Badges dangled on chains around their necks as they passed around wanted posters and shined flashlights on the face of a 24-year-old Latvian man who had served prison time for assaulting a police officer.

The team moved in the dark, climbing fences and hiding behind parked cars to encircle a three-story house in Boston's Allston-Brighton neighborhood. All at once they emerged from the shadows. A half-dozen agents filled the front porch, their knocks on the door echoing down the block. The target had moved, the agents learned, and a team split off and caught him in Weymouth, about 15 miles south of the city.

Another man caught in the recent blitz was a Salvadoran gang member who was convicted in a stabbing that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed. Agents caught him working at Budget Rental Car at Boston's Logan Airport.

"The problems with immigration aren't going to be solved overnight," Raimondi said as the team sped toward another raid. "You start chipping away at it … The more teams we get up and running, the more dangerous people we are going to get off the streets."

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANT SWEEP NABS 2,179 (HC)

By Rosanna Ruiz

Houston Chronicle, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034269

The operation targets criminals, fugitives; 120 in Houston among those arrested

Immigration officers arrested 2,179 criminal immigrants and fugitives during a nationwide operation touted as a response to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's call for greater interior enforcement, what some argue is a political maneuver meant to mollify critics.

Among the people arrested in "Operation Return to Sender," many are illegal immigrants with criminal convictions while others are people who defied final deportation orders.

Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said during a news conference in Houston on Wednesday that those arrested represented "the worst of the worst."

"Clearly our communities are much safer with individuals such as these off the streets," Myers said. "We're also sending a clear message that we will no longer allow the interior of the United States to be a safe haven for illegal aliens. There's no question America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes or come here illegally."

The operation comes at a time when ICE is under increasing pressure to rid the country of illegal immigrants. The debate about immigration policy reform rages from the halls of Congress to the U.S.-Mexico border, where National Guard troops are being deployed to assist border patrol efforts.

"There's absolutely some symbolism going on," said John Keeley, spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington, D.C.-based think tank that supports tougher immigration reforms. "In the interior of the U.S. you're seeing enforcement activity, and it's standing out because there's any of it at all."

At least 800 people arrested in the operation, which began May 26 and concluded Tuesday, already have been deported, Myers said.

There were 424 immigrants arrested in Texas, including 120 in Houston.

Keeley said the operation and Chertoff's interior enforcement efforts as a whole seem somewhat incongruent with the Bush administration's "unwillingness to enforce immigration laws."

A combination of public opinion polls, anti-illegal-immigration groups such as the Minuteman Project and dramatic rallies by immigration-rights advocates across the country have forced President Bush to address the issue. Still, Keeley said, ICE remains underfunded and understaffed.

Michael Cutler, a former New York immigration agent who has testified before an immigration subcommittee in Congress, called Wednesday's announcement nothing more than a "dog and pony show," meant to deceive the public.

"They're doing it simply because they're trying to show they have the desire and commitment to enforce the laws and legislation is pending on the issue," Cutler said.

Charles Foster, a Houston lawyer who has advised Bush on immigration, said the president recognized early on the need to overhaul the legal process to attain citizenship.

"Damned if you do, damned if you don't," he said. "If they're not enforcing the law they're subject to criticism, and if they do enforce the law it's said to be a political statement."

Foster said it should be difficult to criticize ICE for targeting criminal immigrants given the uproar about the need for greater enforcement.

"Whether it's politics or not, every agency has the survival mechanism in place to put the best foot forward," Foster said. "Once you try to do something you might as well get credit for it."

Foster agreed, however, that ICE suffers from a manpower shortage.

Myers said there are 35 fugitive teams set up in its field offices across the country, three times as many as at the start of the year. Eighteen more teams will be added if a Bush administration budget proposal gains approval, she added.

ICE estimates that there are 11 million to 12 million undocumented immigrants in the United States. About 590,000 are fugitives, according to the agency.

Feds Nab Thousands In Immigration Sweep (CHIT)

By Oscar Avila, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 15, 2006

Federal authorities said Wednesday that they had arrested 75 immigrants in Illinois as part of a 19-day nationwide sweep of immigrants who should not be in the U.S. because they have committed crimes or ignored deportation orders.

Officials with the U.S. Department of Homeland Security said they arrested 2,179 immigrants nationwide as part of Operation Return to Sender, which ended Tuesday.

More than two-thirds of the immigrants arrested in Illinois are from Mexico, but those arrested also included immigrants from Bangladesh, China, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Iraq, Jamaica, Poland, Peru, South Korea and Turkey.

DOJ_NMG_0034270

Those arrested in Illinois included an Ecuadorean man who was a high-ranking member of the Gangster Disciples street gang and a Chinese gang member who had remained in the country even after his deportation date following a conviction for human smuggling, drug dealing and other crimes.

Most of those arrested in Illinois were gang members, primarily from the Sureno 13 gang, said Tim Counts, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman. Nearly 30 immigrants were arrested for violating deportation orders, Counts said.

The operation was no different from the day-to-day work of existing fugitive operations teams, formed four years ago. Yet government officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, highlighted the arrests as proof of a new emphasis on enforcement.

Counts discounted skepticism he has heard that the Bush administration is seeking high-profile arrests to address calls from conservatives for stricter immigration enforcement.

"This has been a focus long before the debate on immigration heated up," he said.

424 Criminal Immigrants Are Arrested In State (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, June 15, 2006

Dallas gang member among 2,179 nabbed nationwide in sweep

HOUSTON – A Dallas gang member was among 424 criminal illegal immigrants rounded up in Texas and nearly 2,200 arrested nationwide in a three-week sweep by federal agents, officials said Wednesday.

The sweep by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents resulted in the arrests of 2,179 criminal fugitives from other countries. Their crimes include sexual assault, burglary, drug dealing and other violent offenses, and most had ignored deportation orders from immigration judges.

"We're sending a message that we can't allow the nation's interior to be a safe haven for criminal illegal immigrants," ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said during a Houston news conference. "Our communities are safer with these people off the streets."

The sweep was announced by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security in April as the national debate over border enforcement reached a pitch. Ms. Myers was asked if the operation is related to the continuing debate in Congress.

"We're just doing our job," she said. "We're enforcing the laws on the books."

Nearly 150 of those arrested were convicted sex offenders. An additional 367 – about 17 percent of the total – were members or associates of violent street gangs, including MS-13.

Type of offenders

One man, Angel Lira-Alvarez, 26, an illegal immigrant from Mexico, is a member of the East Side Homeboys gang in Dallas. He has convictions on drug and burglary charges and had been deported. He re-entered the U.S. and was arrested again on a marijuana charge.

When ICE agents arrested him last week, Dallas police wanted Mr. Lira-Alvarez on a parole violation.

"These are exactly the kind of offenders we must prevent from entering our country in the first place," said U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, chairman of the Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship subcommittee.

Most of those taken into custody were arrested on immigration violations and are in the process of being deported. About 829 have already been sent back to their home countries.

"There is no hard data on how many criminal illegal immigrants are now in the U.S.," Ms. Myers said. "ICE's job is to focus on the worst of the worst and get them out of this country."

The operation started May 26. ICE fugitive teams, working with local authorities, began gathering information, identifying criminal immigrants and making arrests. Eventually, there were arrests in 34 states. Texas' 424 arrests trailed only California's 722. Massachusetts was next with 157.

'No particular hot spot'

The result shows criminal activity by illegal immigrants is not restricted to border states, said Marcy Forman, director of ICE's Office of Investigations.

"There is no particular hot spot. Criminal activity by illegal immigrants has spread across the country, particularly through street gangs," she said.

She noted that MS-13, a virulently violent gang now associated as enforcers for Mexican drug organizations, started in Los Angeles as a Salvadoran immigrant criminal gang. It has now spread across the nation, Ms. Forman said.

DOJ_NMG_0034271

At least two MS-13 members were picked up in Boston on June 6, including Franklin Ademir Rodriguez, 25, of El Salvador, who has a lengthy criminal record, including a gang attack that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed.

Mr. Rodriguez was arrested at his job at a car rental agency at Logan International Airport after he failed to appear for an immigration hearing.

Ms. Myers said her agency's focus on criminal illegal immigrants would continue.

ICE already has increased the number of fugitive investigation teams from 18 to 35, and there will be 52 by the end of the year, she said. President Bush's budget calls for 70 teams.

County Arrests Account For One-fifth Of National Immigration Sweep (SDUT)

By Debbi Farr Baker, Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 15, 2006

SAN DIEGO – U.S. immigration officials Wednesday announced a countywide immigration roundup of 402 foreigners – including criminal aliens, fugitives and gang members.

It was part of a national six-day sweep – dubbed "Operation Return to Sender" – in which agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement ensnared 2,179 people in more than 30 states.

All of those arrested were in the country illegally and are to be deported or, in some cases, prosecuted.

The foreign nationals arrested in San Diego County accounted for nearly one-fifth of all those picked up in the national sweep. California had the most arrests of any state, a total of 722.

Most of those arrested here are from Mexico; several are from Guatemala. They have all been sent back to their home countries, according to local immigration agency spokeswoman Lauren Mack.

The nationwide operation was conducted on six non-consecutive days beginning May 26. Almost half of those arrested in the nationwide sweep had criminal records involving such offenses as drug trafficking, assault with a deadly weapon, burglary, abduction and sexual assault on a minor, Julie L. Myers, the assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a news release.

One of the men arrested in San Diego County had been convicted of molesting a 14-year-old girl in 2003, Mack said.

Of the total arrested nationwide, about 830 have been deported so far, Mack said. Approximately 146 of those arrested had convictions for sexual offenses involving minors and about 367 were members or associates of violent street gangs, authorities said.

Among the others taken into custody were a violent Salvadoran gang member with a long criminal history who was convicted in a stabbing that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed, and a Mexican national whose violent criminal history dates back to 1985, with arrests for drug trafficking, aggravated robbery and making terrorist threats.

Immigration agents specifically targeted people who had been issued final orders of deportation, but at some of the addresses they checked they also found others in the country illegally, and took them into custody as well.

They said they apprehended 121 people on criminal charges.

"America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes. ICE will leave no stone unturned in hunting down and deporting aliens who victimize our communities," Myers said in a news release.

The operation, which started on May 26, involved virtually every field office in the nation and resulted in arrests from coast to coast.

While California had the most arrested, Mack said it was followed by Texas, with 424; Massachusetts, with 157; New Jersey, with 116; and New York and Michigan, which both had 110.

In Louisiana, 78 people were apprehended, and in Arizona, 49.

The arrestees hailed from countries from all over the world including Angola, Bangladesh, Egypt, Iraq, Italy, Pakistan, Peru, Poland and Uzbekistan.

The arrests are the part of the interior immigration enforcement strategy that was announced in April 20 by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Public Warms To Bush Immigration Stance (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Republicans Are Unlikely to Benefit in November Amid Weak Poll Results for Congress, President

WASHINGTON -- Add this to the list of things that have gone right lately for President Bush: Americans appear to be drawing closer to his view on the immigration debate.

DOJ_NMG_0034272

But that hasn't alleviated the squeeze on Republican candidates in the fall elections. A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that the party's conservative electoral base remains at odds with broader public opinion on the issue, including sentiment of the nation's swelling Latino population.

By 50%-33%, the survey shows, Americans support the views expressed by President Bush and also by businesses, Hispanics and Democratic leaders: that steps to strengthen border security should be combined with a guest-worker program for prospective immigrants and those who have been in the U.S. for at least two years. Yet a 44% plurality of conservatives back an agenda combining border security and deportation of illegal immigrants -- making it difficult for Republican politicians to embrace the majority opinion.

IN THE POLLS

1 • The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll2

• Track Bush's approval ratings3

On immigration, President Bush "is where the American public is," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. "The difficulty is, the base of the Republican Party is marching in the other direction."

Moreover, conservatives are disproportionately likely to say immigration will be important to their vote. Among Americans calling immigration a top-tier issue, 72% say they are more likely to back a candidate seeking a fence along the Mexican border, while just 37% say they are more likely to support one who favors a guest-worker program.

Mr. Hart's Republican counterpart, Bill McInturff, adds that the guidance Republican lawmakers will take from the findings is "don't blink" from the tough border-security position staked out by the House in negotiations with the more-moderate Senate. Yet that strategy could prove self-defeating, if it sinks prospects for a compromise, because the poll also shows that conservatives will be most upset if Congress doesn't act. The survey of 1,002 adults, conducted June 9-12, has a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

Republicans and Mr. Bush are both ill-positioned to suffer further political setbacks. The poll, conducted before Bush adviser Karl Rove was cleared of potential charges in the Central Intelligence Agency leak case but after U.S. forces killed Iraq's al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi, showed Mr. Bush's overall job-approval rating essentially unchanged at 37%.

Optimism about the war edged up slightly, with 53% of Americans saying that Mr. Zarqawi's death would improve the situation in Iraq at least a little. But Americans no longer share the president's assertion that "I made the right decision" to go to war in the first place. A 53% majority calls attacking Iraq "the wrong decision," while 41% side with Mr. Bush.

A 61% majority called things in America "off on the wrong track," more than twice the 27% who said things are headed in the right direction." Approval of Congress remained at an abysmal level -- 23% -- while Americans sided with Democrats on most opinion measures. By 49%-38%, respondents said they want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress after November's elections.

The contours of individual congressional districts make it difficult for Democrats to translate such advantages into the 15 seats they need to recapture control of the House; Democrats must gain six seats to regain a Senate majority. But the poll suggests that Republicans' 2006 woes are both broad and deep.

By 51%-36%, Americans say they worry less about a different Democratic direction than about the possibility that Republicans remain in power and keep the same policies. And they prefer Democrats by a wide margin on issues such as health care, gasoline prices and the economy, while traditional Republican advantages on values and terrorism have shrunk.

Five months before Election Day, Democrats also enjoy an edge on voter intensity. Some 60% of self-described Democrats expressed a very high level of interest in fall elections, compared with 52% of self-described Republicans.

One early source of solace for the president's party is that such a differential didn't fuel outsize Democratic turnout in last week's special House election in California won by Republican Brian Bilbray. In part, that may be because neither of America's main political parties currently enjoys a good reputation. While the Republican Party is viewed negatively by 47%-34%, so is the Democratic Party by 39%-35%.

"Somebody has to win this," Mr. McInturff says. But "if there were a 'none of the above' option, people would seriously consider it."

The economy -- an issue Republicans, as the governing party, hoped to capitalize on -- is providing little traction. Reminded of a host of positive statistics on job growth, overall growth and tax cuts, just one in four Americans say those reflect their personal view of the economy.

Even among Americans earning more than $75,000 a year, just one-third embrace the positive view. The top economic concerns cited by respondents: health-care and education costs, gas prices, the federal budget deficit and inflation.

Mr. Bush has fared better in the debate over immigration, which now trails only the Iraq war as a top-priority national issue for voters as a whole. Among Republicans, it outranks even Iraq in importance.

DOJ_NMG_0034273

The survey indicates that Mr. Bush has achieved his goal of "a civil debate" on the issue, despite the cultural, social and economic passions aroused by the presence of 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. In December, Americans by 53%-37% said immigration hurts the country more than it helps.

Today, despite predictions of a backlash from demonstrations this spring demanding immigrants' rights, the public is more evenly split. Some 44% say immigration helps the country, while 45% say it hurts.

Moreover, Americans in all regions of the country back the approach supported by Mr. Bush and embodied in recent Senate legislation calling for a 370-mile fence on parts of the Mexican border and a guest-worker program. Conservatives -- almost alone among age, income and demographic categories -- prefer the House approach of building 700 miles of fencing and deporting illegal immigrants.

Immigration Reform Doubts Rise On Hill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are increasingly doubtful that Congress will pass any sort of immigration reform legislation this year.

"My gut [feeling] is that it's undoable," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said yesterday about a compromise this year between the House and Senate bills. "The bills are too different. The sides are really polarized."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and leading critic of the approach favored by Mrs. Feinstein, yesterday gave immigration legislation a 20 percent chance of passage this year.

A poll of lawmakers published in this week's National Journal found that 44 percent of those anonymously surveyed said they doubt any compromise can be reached this year.

The most optimistic predictions found in an informal survey conducted yesterday by The Washington Times suggested a perfect tossup.

"Fifty-fifty," answered Sen. Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican who has been a key supporter of the Senate bill that many say grants "amnesty" to about 10 million illegal aliens.

"We're right on the bubble," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican and harsh critic of the Senate bill. "I think it could go either way."

Whom to blame and who will pay the price in November's elections are more debatable.

"It's increasingly clear that opponents of comprehensive immigration reform are prepared to use every tool possible to defeat any effort to pass immigration reform," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

The two bills await conference committee, where House and Senate negotiators will hammer out the differences. Those negotiations already have stalled because of a technical, though constitutional, issue with the Senate version of the legislation.

Republicans blame Mr. Reid for refusing to agree to a simple fix that would allow negotiations to begin. Mr. Manley said Mr. Reid wants more assurances that House negotiators won't rip apart the Senate bill.

Republicans say Mr. Reid and other Democrats are trying to quietly scuttle any bill from emerging in order to deny the Republican-led Congress a significant legislative victory before the fall elections.

"Failure is the worst thing we can do," Mr. Graham said. He was countering the mantra of House Republicans, who say a bill that grants a path to citizenship for illegals is worse than no bill at all.

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat, called the Senate bill a "non-starter" in the House because of Republican opposition. He said the Republicans' victory in California last week by Brian P. Bilbray, who campaigned for a congressional seat on a tough immigration stance, assured that House Republicans will not back down from their tough border security bill.

GOP Vs. GOP On Borders (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Out of the past and into the current controversy dividing the Republican Party came former California governor Pete Wilson, charging into Washington this week to argue that he had been right all along in trying to slam the door on illegal immigration.

Far from dooming Republicans to a series of defeats in the most populous state, Wilson argued, his championing in 1994 of Proposition 187, denying health care and educational services to illegal immigrants and their children, anticipated the kind of hard-line policy many Republicans endorsed this year.

DOJ_NMG_0034274

The old Marine, as unyielding now at 72 as he was during his eight years as governor, may not be the spokesman the embattled House Republicans would choose for their fight with the White House and the Senate over the immigration reform bill now headed for conference committee. Wilson is blamed by many Republicans, including those around President Bush, for so alienating the growing Hispanic vote in California that the state's hoard of electoral votes has moved permanently into the Democratic column.

But Wilson, a former senator, rejected that charge at a Hudson Institute talk in Washington. And, despite being a Bush appointee (to the Defense Policy Board, a Pentagon advisory panel), he called on his former colleagues to resist White House pressure on the House and Senate to pass a compromise bill that preserves elements of the president's more generous approach and that includes a path to citizenship for the millions of illegal immigrants already here. He said the only reason the Senate voted for a more generous bill was that many senators had been "intimidated."

Wilson said House Republicans are right in insisting that the Mexican border be closed before any thought is given to a guest worker program or anything resembling amnesty. That was also the message the winner of last week's House special election in the San Diego area, Republican Brian Bilbray, said voters were sending when they chose him.

Build a wall the entire 2,000-mile length of the border, and do it first, Wilson said, or else "you'll have 20 million, 35 million, 50 million" illegal immigrants in the country.

Wilson, a former mayor of San Diego, offered a revisionist history of California politics in defending his position. The 1994 campaign ad for which he became famous -- a nighttime shot of shadowy figures sneaking across the border, while the announcer intoned, "They keep coming" -- was falsely depicted in the media, he said, as an anti-immigrant message. It was aimed strictly at illegal immigrants, Wilson said, and in defense of California taxpayers.

Did it cost Republicans California? Many have said so, noting that Democrats have won every presidential race, every Senate contest and every regular election for governor since Prop. 187 passed.

Arnold Schwarzenegger's victory in the 2003 recall election broke that spell, Wilson said, and the blame for the earlier defeats can be assigned to the men who were "nice guys but not good candidates." As for the presidential races, he said Bob Dole in 1996 and George W. Bush in his two campaigns really didn't try hard enough to get California.

That's his story, and he's sticking to it. But Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), one of the principal sponsors of the Senate bill, isn't buying any of it. "He really misreads this," Hagel told me. "The intimidation was all coming from the other side," in the form of e-mails and phone calls denouncing the 23 Republicans who, like Hagel, voted for the Senate bill.

Hagel said the 2,000-mile fence "is just not practical" and the "20 million, 35 million, 50 million" illegal immigrants flooding in are numbers Wilson pulled out of the air. And Wilson's interpretation of California political history is equally unpersuasive. "California has become a wasteland for Republicans," Hagel said, "with not one elected official except the governor, who got there by accident. And you can't blame that all on candidates. Parties get a reputation from the policies they support."

Hagel made one other point: Those who, like Wilson, want only a border-closing bill offer no policy for dealing with "the 11 million illegals living in our country or their 3 million legal children. Is the party of Abraham Lincoln going to allow a permanent second class of people waiting to be citizens?"

The next few months of House-Senate negotiation will determine whether Pete Wilson and Brian Bilbray or Chuck Hagel and George Bush speak for the Republican Party.

E Pluribus Pluribus? (USAT)

By Former Presidential Candidate Gary Bauer

USA Today, June 15, 2006

"Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all." — Theodore Roosevelt

While much of the immigration debate focuses on financial issues — whether illegal immigrants hurt or help the economy — the missing link to understanding Americans' anxiety over the issue is the reality that we are failing to build a citizenry that loves America first. The unasked question is whether we are building allegiance to anything other than the almighty dollar.

For much of our history, immigrants took their first steps onto American soil understanding that coming to this country meant pledging allegiance to one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all. They were enthusiastic about learning our language, our history, our laws and our traditions. They recognized what it meant to become an American.

Today, hyphenated Americans put other countries and affiliations first, and they drive a wedge into the heart of "one nation." A recent poll of Hispanics in America by Investor's Business Daily shows that 64% consider themselves "mostly Hispanic," but that only 15% see themselves as "mostly American." The survey further reveals that 31% speak "only Spanish" in the home, while just 6% speak "only English." Finally, 69% of respondents said they lived in predominantly Hispanic neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0034275

Even more distressing

While these data are troubling, they become downright distressing when one considers that 27% of the survey sample had lived in the USA for more than 25 years, while only 15% lived here fewer than six years.

Whatever your opinion of amnesty and "guest worker" programs, the truth is that for many Hispanics residing in the USA, the great metaphor of America as a "melting pot" has ceded to the notion of America as a "salad bowl" of mutually exclusive groups.

If many immigrants are not assimilating, part of the blame lies with America's academic and political elites. We live in an era where the Pledge of Allegiance is under attack in many schools. Several schools banned the flying of U.S. flags.

Today, multiculturalism is considered a civic virtue — in which accepting foreign traditions, values, laws and languages is put ahead of promoting immigrants' integration into our society. When Hispanics can do so much of their business in Spanish, vote in Spanish, take a driver's license exam in Spanish and send their kids to bilingual public schools, what reason do they have to learn English?

Our shared respect

The United States stands proudly as a nation of legal immigrants. This is not a chance collection of separate peoples united merely by geography or economic opportunity. Rather, this is a nation of citizens united in our shared respect for the inviolable freedoms and rights found in our great documents. As Teddy Roosevelt said, "We have room for but one flag ... but one language ... but one sole loyalty and that is a loyalty to the American people."

A recent news report identified four U.S. servicemen who had died that day in Iraq. Three of the four men had Hispanic surnames. By making the ultimate sacrifice for their country, they represented the true embodiments of the American ideal.

The unmentioned undercurrent in the immigration debate is the lack of Americanization of those who come here unwilling to pledge allegiance to a new flag, and the lack of effort by those in leadership to make one people out of many —E pluribus unum.

The term "earned citizenship" has been employed to describe proposals requiring illegal immigrants to pay fines and back taxes before applying for legal status. But if "earned citizenship" means anything, it surely means a commitment to assimilating into the American way of life. It must mean joining together under one flag, not just one currency.

Former presidential candidate Gary Bauer is president of American Values and chairman of Campaign for Working Families.

A Tip Of The Cap To Pro Baseball (USAT)

By Tim Wendel op-ed

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Junior Noboa stands in the shade of the first-base dugout and surveys his baseball kingdom. The former second baseman for the Montreal Expos operates one of the 30 or so baseball academies now in the Dominican Republic.

Establishments such as Noboa's are modeled, in large part, after Days Inns or Holiday Inns. The effect can be jarring. Dirt roads in the jungle dead-end at vast complexes with emerald-green fields and residence hotels that would be at home off any U.S. interstate.

"We try to make it as close as we can to what they'd find in America," Noboa says. "If we don't, the odds of them making it aren't too high."

In the back-and-forth debate over immigration reform, one footnote likely to be overlooked is the fact that Major League Baseball (MLB) has its own type of a guest-worker program. Despite decades of frustration and failure, the national pastime learned that an effective policy for immigrant labor not only made business sense, it was good citizenship, too. The approach has allowed the sport to foster young stars and a new fan base.

Often, baseball seems antiquated compared with the rest of popular culture. American kids won't play the game because it isn't as high-paced as video games or as cool as the sport du jour, basketball. But when it comes to demographics, MLB surprisingly is cutting-edge.

This season, more than one quarter of the players on U.S. major-league teams are foreign-born. At the minor-league level, overseas players make up 45% of the roster openings, with the majority coming from the Dominican Republic, which is the top exporter of baseball talent. Fans who might object to day laborers have little problem cheering on immigrant stars. After all, MLB's attendance reached an all-time high last season.

'A great boon'

DOJ_NMG_0034276

"Without the influx of Latin players, we certainly wouldn't have 30 major-league teams," Chicago White Sox executive Roland Hemond told The Kansas City Star. "So they've been a great boon for our game, its growth in franchises as well as in quality of play."

Almost sixty years ago, Jackie Robinson broke the color barrier in U.S. sports. While the MLB didn't volunteer for the role, it did show the rest of the country that black and white could not just get along, but could also work hand-in-hand on the same team. A similar evolution continues today between white and brown.

But assimilation in baseball hasn't been easy. Soon after Robinson, Orestes "Minnie" Minoso arrived from Cuba to play for the Chicago White Sox. Early on, he faced many of the same biases and insults that plagued Robinson.

"When I played, I sometimes had to play the clown," he once told me. "I had to listen and laugh, even if I was crying inside. But never did I let them see that it bothered me."

In the early '60s, San Francisco Giants manager Alvin Dark declared that only English would be spoken in the clubhouse and dugout. His edict very well might have kept a team filled with Latino stars — Orlando Cepeda, Juan Marichal, the Alou brothers — from ever winning a World Series. In the hypercompetitive world of professional sports, such division in a locker room is poison for team chemistry.

Though that was four decades ago, today's immigration debate echoes similar themes. Throughout this country's history, immigrants — legal or not — have faced resentment for economic and cultural reasons.

"They take our jobs."

"They don't speak the language."

"They're changing our communities."

In fact, the Senate recently passed immigration legislation that declared English to be the national language of the United States. Another measure deemed it the "common unifying language." It can be, if used as a tool to bring people together rather than a wedge to drive people apart. Unifying? Just ask the Giants team of the early '60s.

Lessons for the rest

But baseball's own model of assimilation can provide good lessons for the nation as a whole, even if they can't be duplicated on such a massive scale.

Major leaguers are afforded the same work permits reserved for internationally recognized artists and entertainers. Today, many teams have bilingual coaches, trainers and front office personnel from rookie ball on up to the majors. The Cleveland Indians and New York Mets not only teach their top prospects English, but they've also begun to send them to school in the Dominican Republic so the prospects receive a high school education while they're playing for their organizations.

"Even if they fail as ballplayers, they are given tools that enable them to go on with life," says Alan Klein, author of Growing the Game: The Globalization of Major League Baseball. "This isn't the case in other (U.S.) industries making use of temporary workers."

So in today's game, these players fold into U.S. society — whether they become U.S. citizens or not. David "Big Papi" Ortiz from the Dominican Republic has become a folk hero in Boston. Another Dominican, Vladimir Guerrero, is a crowd favorite in Southern California. In New York, Omar Minaya, the first Latino general manager at the major-league level, has created "Los Mets," with Pedro Martinez, Carlos Beltran, Carlos Delgado and Julio Franco.

Major League Baseball makes America accessible to these players, thus making these players accessible to American fans.

If other industries dependent on immigrant labor — in the agriculture and construction trades, for instance — would make even slight efforts to help their workers assimilate, the benefits would flow through American society.

And then perhaps instead of two sides screaming at each other across a divide, we could have a civilized debate about immigration reform — regardless of what language we're speaking.

Tim Wendel is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. His books include The New Face of Baseball: The One-Hundred-Year Rise and Triumph of Latinos in America's Favorite Sport.

More Than 2,000 Illegal Immigrants Nabbed In Sweep (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, June 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Federal agents have arrested more than 2,000 illegal immigrants, many of them convicted criminals, child predators, gang members and fugitives, in sweeps across the country over the past three weeks, authorities said Wednesday.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Operation Return to Sender was the latest in a series of crackdowns on illegal immigrants since Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff promised a tougher enforcement effort in April.

DOJ_NMG_0034277

"America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes," ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said in Houston, where she announced 2,179 arrests.

The arrests came in every region of the country — 34 states and the District of Columbia. The most, 722, were in California and included 402 in San Diego, site of the busiest U.S. border crossing with Mexico.

Elsewhere in Southern California, agents focused on illegal immigrants with a record of sexual offenses against children, said Kumar Kibble, assistant special agent in charge for Orange County. He said the agency "targeted the greatest threats" with its operation, which began May 26 and concluded with the announcement.

"Our efforts continue," Kibble said.

Nationwide, those arrested included 146 people previously convicted of sex offenses involving minors; 367 members or associates of violent gangs; and 640 fugitive immigrants who had failed to comply with orders to leave. An additional 121 people were arrested on charges of felony re-entry after deportation, illegal alien possession of a firearm and similar charges.

Among those arrested were Franklin Ademir Rodriguez, 25, a Salvadoran with a criminal history and membership in the violent street gang Mara Salvatrucha, the agency said. He was arrested at his job at a car rental agency at Boston's Logan Airport. Another, Wilber Kuk, 24, is a Mexican national and member of the 18th Street gang in Washington, D.C. Kuk has convictions for abduction, malicious wounding and robbery.

Kibble said agents tracked down people by examining lists of sex offenders, checking criminal and other records and following up on tips.

Some of those arrested fell into the net by accident: In San Marcos near San Diego, agents arrested two illegal immigrants after their car struck an ICE patrol vehicle from the rear, ICE spokeswoman Lauren Mack said.

TAX:

Hold That Back-Tax Chase (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Two years ago, Congress authorized the Internal Revenue Service to hire private debt collectors to find individual taxpayers who acknowledge that they owe taxes but have not paid up.

The agency estimated the debt collectors could pull in about $1.4 billion over 10 years and free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats. The IRS selected three firms to track down the tax delinquents, but the project has been slowed somewhat by a bid protest and hasn't gotten underway.

Then, last week, the debt-collection project took a surprise hit. By two votes, the House Appropriations Committee approved an amendment to a fiscal 2007 spending bill that would prohibit the IRS from setting up the program. When the bill came to the House floor this week, Republican leaders did not challenge the amendment, allowing it to stand.

To some degree, the IRS setback reflects the unease created by the security breach at the Department of Veterans Affairs, in which at least 26.5 million veterans and military personnel were put at risk of identity theft when a laptop was stolen from a VA employee's home.

Rep. Steven R. Rothman (D-N.J.), who wrote the amendment, argued to the committee that it makes no sense to turn over taxpayer data to private debt-collection companies when identity theft seems to be on the rise.

Yesterday, Rothman teamed with Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, to press his case against what he called "the outrageous proposal."

Under the IRS plan, companies would be paid commissions on a sliding scale -- from 21 cents to 24 cents for each dollar collected. If one of the companies determined that a targeted taxpayer is bankrupt or dead, it would receive a $100 "administrative resolution fee."

In addition to his privacy concerns, Rothman contends the contracts are a waste because it costs the government only 3 cents for each dollar collected by an IRS employee. He also objects to the project's cost -- about $50 million in the first three years.

The project's initial phase would focus on more than 10,000 people who owe taxes, an IRS spokesman said. Over a two-year period, the debt-collection companies would be asked to track down about 100,000 who are in arrears. Starting in 2008, the IRS intends to hire up to 10 firms to provide collection services.

DOJ_NMG_0034278

IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson has promised "tough safeguards" to protect taxpayer rights and privacy. Employees of the private firms would undergo background checks and mandatory training, the agency said. The fees that would be paid to the firms would be in line with industry standards, according to the agency.

Yesterday, Everson said he was disappointed by funding provided the agency in the House spending bill. The measure falls $104.5 million short of what the Bush administration requested and "would result in personnel reductions within the IRS." He noted that "using private collection agencies would bring in extra money and help reduce the deficit."

Kelley, however, said a similar IRS project failed about a decade ago and pointed to the irony of the government linking contract fees to the amount of tax dollars collected, a performance measurement that Congress has prohibited IRS managers from using when evaluating their employees.

Rothman's amendment must clear the Senate and subsequent negotiations between the House and Senate later this year -- a tough climb in the face of Bush administration opposition. But, Kelley said, "the House action is an indication that things are turning a bit in our favor."

Citing the VA loss of veterans' names, Social Security numbers and other personal information, she suggested that concern about privacy rights might help the union's effort to kill the IRS project. "Closer and closer to election time, everyone understands that this proposal is very unpopular with the public," she said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Adviser Who Shaped Bush's Speeches Is Leaving (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — Michael Gerson, the White House speechwriter and policy adviser who shaped nearly every major address of George W. Bush's presidency, said Wednesday that he was leaving the administration to pursue new career options.

Mr. Gerson has been one of Mr. Bush's closest aides and is credited with giving voice to both the "compassionate conservatism" that Mr. Bush espouses and his more hawkish lines, like "axis of evil."

Mr. Gerson follows two other close Bush advisers who have left in recent weeks: Andrew H. Card Jr., the former White House chief of staff, and Scott McClellan, the former White House press secretary.

But officials said Mr. Gerson's departure was not part of the staff shakeup instigated by Mr. Card's successor, Joshua B. Bolten, who has tried to invigorate and re-energize Mr. Bush's staff with new faces.

Mr. Gerson, 42, who has worked for Mr. Bush for seven years, said he had been contemplating leaving the administration for some time. Mr. Gerson, who had a heart attack when he was 40, said he told the president four months ago that he was serious about leaving soon. He said he chose now in part because the White House is having a run of good news and the time seemed right. "This was a case where many good things are coming together at the White House," he said. "And it to some extent makes it easier to leave." He said he plans to continue a career in writing.

White House officials said there were no plans to name a successor to Mr. Gerson. "There's no way to replace him — he is a once in a generation," said Karl Rove, a White House deputy chief of staff. "He helped take the president on his best day and represent what was in the president's spirit and soul."

Mr. Gerson was known to have infused Mr. Bush's addresses with the religious allusions for which they became known. It was Mr. Gerson who changed the words "axis of hatred" to the more biblical "axis of evil." Mr. Gerson complained in an interview that the line was often misrepresented to apply directly to Iran, North Korea and Iraq, which were but examples of rogue states.

Asked to cite his favorite addresses, Mr. Gerson pointed to those that immediately followed the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, specifically a line from an address given three days afterward, at the National Cathedral: "Grief and tragedy and hatred are only for a time. Goodness, remembrance, and love have no end. And the Lord of life holds all who die, and all who mourn."

Bush's Favorite Author Leaving The White House (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Top Aide Michael Gerson Knew Just How to Address the President

DOJ_NMG_0034279

Michael J. Gerson, one of President Bush's most trusted advisers and the author of nearly all of his most famous public words over the past seven years, plans to step down in the next couple of weeks in a decision that colleagues believe will leave a hole in the White House at a critical period.

Gerson said in an interview that he has been talking with Bush for many months about leaving for writing and other opportunities but waited until the White House political situation stabilized somewhat. "It seemed like a good time," he said. "Things are back on track a little. Some of the things I care about are on a good trajectory."

Since first joining the presidential campaign as chief speechwriter in 1999, Gerson has evolved into one of the most central figures in Bush's inner circle, often considered among the three or four aides closest to the president. Beyond shaping the language of the Bush presidency, Gerson helped set its broader direction.

He was a formulator of the Bush doctrine making the spread of democracy the fundamental goal of U.S. foreign policy, a policy hailed as revolutionary by some and criticized as unrealistic by others. He led a personal crusade to make unprecedented multibillion-dollar investments in fighting AIDS, malaria and poverty around the globe. He became one of the few voices pressing for a more aggressive policy to stop genocide in Darfur, even as critics complained of U.S. inaction.

"He might have had more influence than any White House staffer who wasn't chief of staff or national security adviser" in modern times, said William Kristol, who was top aide to Vice President Dan Quayle and now edits the Weekly Standard. "Mike was substantively influential, not just a wordsmith, not just a crafter of language for other people's policies, but he influenced policy itself."

"He is the best and most influential presidential speechwriter since Ted Sorenson," said Peter H. Wehner, director of White House strategic initiatives, referring to the adviser to President John F. Kennedy. "Mike is one of the key intellectual architects of the Bush presidency, whether we're talking about compassionate conservatism at home or the freedom agenda abroad."

Gerson is the latest in a series of longtime Bush aides to leave, following White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., press secretary Scott McClellan and Treasury Secretary John W. Snow. But newly installed Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said in an interview that the departure is not part of his broader shakeup of the president's operation. No one is being tapped to take Gerson's most recent assignment as senior adviser.

"He's one of the few people who is irreplaceable," Bolten said. "He's a policy provoker, a grand strategist and a conscience who in many cases has not only articulated but reflected the president's heart."

Gerson, 42, said he had originally planned to leave after Bush's 2004 reelection but decided to stay when he was asked to shift from chief speechwriter to senior adviser with an office a few doors from the Oval Office. He had a heart attack in December 2004 but said his health is now fine and was not an issue in his decision. "It was never my intention to stay to the end," Gerson said.

He plans to look at writing, speaking and think-tank opportunities, with help from Robert B. Barnett, the high-powered lawyer who represents major figures such as former president Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Gerson stood out in a White House known for swagger. A somewhat slight, pale, bespectacled and soft-spoken Midwesterner, he nonetheless forged a strong bond with the outgoing, backslapping Texan president, in part through their shared conservative Christian faith. He found a way to channel Bush's thoughts, colleagues said, transforming a sometimes inarticulate president into an occasionally memorable speaker.

Gerson wrote or co-wrote every major speech Bush gave since announcing his candidacy, including convention and inaugural addresses and State of the Union messages. He crafted the two speeches after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that will probably be recorded as Bush's signal moments of national leadership: the service at the Washington National Cathedral and the address to Congress.

He crafted the State of the Union language that labeled Iraq, Iran and North Korea an "axis of evil" and the inaugural address that committed the United States to "ending tyranny in our world." He came up with the phrase "soft bigotry of low expectations" to focus on minority education problems.

Gerson believed strongly in the "compassionate" part of Bush's "compassionate conservatism," saying he wanted to pursue liberal goals through conservative means. To that end, he helped promote the president's No Child Left Behind education initiative, the Medicare prescription drug program and grants to faith-based charities. "It's a more activist approach," Gerson said. "That was a major change from what came before."

He also pushed for a $15 billion program to combat HIV and AIDS worldwide, telling Bush in the Oval Office that they would never be forgiven if they passed up the chance. Although he kept a hand in major speeches during the second term, he became increasingly focused on Africa and traveled there four times to see Darfur and other places firsthand, returning to describe searing scenes to his White House colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0034280

While toiling for an uncommonly polarizing president, he made few, if any, enemies, even finding admirers in circles often not friendly to Republicans.

"Mike Gerson has been an important voice," said the Rev. David Beckmann, president of Bread for the World, a global anti-poverty organization.

Although groups have grievances about how some programs have been administered, it did not redound on Gerson, said David Gartner, policy director for the Global AIDS Alliance. "He's been committed and effective," Gartner said. "To get a moral issue the kind of attention it deserves, I'm sure is not easy to do."

Health Chief Defends Extensive Use Of CDC Jet (USAT/AP)

By Kevin Freking

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt on Wednesday defended his extensive use of a jet leased to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention for emergencies.

Leavitt said he could not have overseen the implementation of the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit, plus help prepare states for a potential flu pandemic, without the use of the plane.

His explanation came at a House Ways and Means Committee hearing, where Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., accused Leavitt of using the jet to “do public relations for the president” on the drug benefit.

Lewis cited an Atlanta Journal-Constitution article that analyzed the Gulfstream III's flight log and found that the 14-seat jet has been used primarily by Leavitt to attend news conferences promoting the drug plan and meetings with state officials about their flu pandemic plans. The flights have cost more than $700,000 since January, the newspaper reported.

Since January, Leavitt has taken the jet on 19 trips to visit more than 90 cities, said his spokeswoman, Christina Pearson. During the same period, CDC officials said they had used the aircraft to respond to three emergencies and conduct three training exercises.

The newspaper reported that during two emergencies, the CDC was forced to use another plane because Leavitt was using the Gulfstream jet.

“I think this is unbelievable, irresponsible and just dead wrong,” Lewis said.

Lewis' questioning riled some of his Republican colleagues. The Republicans jumped to Leavitt's defense.

“It is important that our national spokesman get out there to where the people are,” said Rep. Nancy Johnson, R-Conn.

Rep. E. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., said lawmakers use federal jets all the time when going on fact-finding missions.

Leavitt said the newspaper article was accurate and that he tried to use commercial jets whenever possible.

The aircraft has cost taxpayers $2.1 million this year, CDC and HHS officials said.

Senate GOP To Push Fix Of Budget (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Top Senate Republicans yesterday threw their support behind a package of new tools to rein in federal spending, including spending caps, a presidential line-item veto authority and a two-year budget.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, flanked by about a dozen Senate Republicans, said the budget process is broken and encourages spending instead of saving.

The bill, dubbed "S.O.S.: Stop Over-Spending," will reform the budget process, said Mr. Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, who along with Mr. Frist is stepping up his role in the Republican Party's election-year war on spending.

House Republicans have been more proactive in advancing budget reform ideas this year, and yesterday, the House Budget Committee approved line-item-veto legislation that will likely reach the House floor next week, along with a commission to set sunset dates for wasteful federal programs, both of which were demanded by House conservatives.

"We're just glad they're finally getting on board," one House Republican aide said of the Senate.

The senators' budget reform effort comes as the Senate prepares today to clear for President Bush a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill for Iraq, the war on terror, hurricane recovery, avian flu and border security. The Senate's version of the bill ballooned to about $109 billion and contained a host of unrelated items, but House and Senate negotiators cut about $14 billion from the final bill, avoiding a presidential veto.

Mr. Gregg's committee will vote on his new budget reform package next week, but it'll likely have a tougher time after that.

Mr. Frist said, "We'll do as much (of the package) as we possibly can."

The Senate bill would:

DOJ_NMG_0034281

•Switch to federal budgets that cover two years to free up time for more congressional oversight.

•Establish a process to reduce the deficit and balance the budget by 2012, including automatic reductions in the growth of entitlement programs if Congress doesn't meet targets.

•Set caps on discretionary spending and enforce them through across-the-board cuts if Congress doesn't voluntarily adhere.

•Allow the president to target specific spending items in bills and ask Congress to kill the items.

•Create a commission to set sunset dates for wasteful federal programs and another commission to examine ways to fix entitlement programs like Social Security and Medicare.

Still, even bill supporters admit that the package will be a heavy lift for many senators, especially those who dole out the money each year.

Former Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, was skeptical.

"I'm going to have to study it and see if there's a way we can live with it," he said.

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, blasted the bill as election-year cover for nervous Republicans.

"It's a political ploy to make up for the fact that under Republican leadership, we've run up the largest deficits," he said.

Striking A Balance On Earmarks (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 15, 2006

Call it the Coburn clause.

Senate Republicans say they are trying to salvage a spending-reform provision empowering individual senators to strip new earmarks out of conference reports without handing the rank and file unlimited power to wage wars of attrition to defeat bills they do not like.

"Writing the language in such a way that gets done what we want to accomplish has been very difficult," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), chairman of the Rules Committee, said yesterday. "You don't want to make it possible for troublemakers to tie up conference reports at the end of a session indefinitely with points of order."

Lott did not single out any such "troublemakers," but Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) proved last month that he is willing to use all available weapons in a floor fight.

Coburn offered a rare "clay pigeon" amendment to the war supplemental, under which each of the 19 pieces was subject to a vote. Rank-and-file Republican spending hawks have been battling leadership-written bills on the floors of both chambers, and the conference-report provision would give them a brand-new tool with which to fight.

Aides to Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) spent an hour with the Senate parliamentarian earlier this week trying to hammer out language that would preserve the original intent but not lead to nightmarish legislative delays, Ensign said yesterday. But Ensign, who is considering attaching his version to another bill, said he has not yet discussed the matter with Lott. If not well-crafted, the new rule could let senators impede legislation, he said.

The backroom maneuvering on earmark rules comes as lawmakers in both chambers are also waging public battles over spending.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) angered many of his GOP colleagues yesterday by trying to strike their district-specific earmarks from a bill funding transportation and housing programs. Flake's home-state Republican colleague, John McCain, introduced a Senate amendment to the defense authorization bill that is designed to prod the Bush administration into providing estimates of war-funding needs to Congress in its annual budgets.

And Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) unveiled an omnibus budget-process-overhaul measure yesterday that would establish enforcement mechanisms for caps on mandatory and discretionary spending, create a modified line-item veto and convert the federal government to biennial budgeting.

Flake lost roll calls on his amendments, McCain's amendment is unenforceable and even Republicans predicted that Gregg's budget-process omnibus has little chance of passage. But the effect of the Senate-specific earmark language could be far-reaching if it is included in a conference report on lobbying reform.

Conservatives hailed the original Senate language as a powerful tool they could use to limit "immaculate" earmarks — those that appear for the first time in conference reports. One Republican aide called the provision "the holy grail" of budget-process reforms.

Under that language, senators could raise points of order against conference provisions that did not appear in either the House or Senate version of a bill. If supporters of offending provision could not muster 60 votes to keep them in, they would be struck and the revised conference report would be sent back to the House.

DOJ_NMG_0034282

That, however, raises the prospect of a single senator raising such a point of order, waiting for the House to act on the revised bill, raising a second point of order against a separate provision and repeating the process as a means of killing a bill.

"That's why we're trying to carefully craft the language," Ensign said. "I think it may be used often early, then less often later."

The basic concept has proponents on both sides of the partisan divide, but the devil remains in the details.

"I do like the idea," said Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), "but I also am wary of anything that would just be designed to rope-a-dope the process."

The final language could include a limitation on the number of points of order available to senators, Lott said.

But while some lawmakers and aides hope to finish a lobbying bill before the July 4 recess, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) declined to set a deadline yesterday.

"I'm not talking about any timelines," Hastert said.

However, in a joint statement last week, Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said they are aiming to pass a final bill by July 4.

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans rolled out Gregg's budget-process bill, dubbed the Stop Over-Spending — or SOS — Act of 2006.

"We must regain control of this runaway train before it is too late," Gregg said.

Democrats seized on the offering as a "Save Our Seats" plan and predicted it would be a loser on the floor.

Conrad pointed to the GOP's inability to pass a budget this year and mounting debt as evidence of Republicans' fiscal irresponsibility.

"They're cursing the darkness. Whose darkness is it?" Conrad said. "Why didn't they light a candle?"

House Panel Approves Line-item Veto Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, June 15, 2006

Congress is moving to give President Bush and his successors greater power to try to weed bills of certain spending, though the new power would pale compared with the line-item veto law struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998.

The House Budget Committee on Wednesday approved by a 24-9 vote a bill to allow the president to single out wasteful items contained in appropriations bills he signs into law, and it would require Congress to vote on those items again.

Under the proposal, it would take a simple majority in both House and Senate to approve the items over the president's objections.

The idea is that wasteful "pork barrel" spending would be vulnerable since Congress might vote to reject such items once they are no longer protected by their inclusion in bigger bills that the president has little choice but to sign.

This is a far weaker version of the line-item veto that Republicans in Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. That bill allowed Clinton to strike items from appropriations and tax bills unless Congress mustered a two-thirds margin to override him. The bill was found unconstitutional since it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress.

Most members of Congress simply said good riddance. Clinton's use of the line-item veto against a military projects bill had provoked howls of outrage on Capitol Hill and Congress promptly overrode them.

But Bush in March proposed the new, watered-down version in concert with conservatives such as Rep. Paul Ryan (news, bio, voting record), R-Wis., sponsor of Wednesday's bill.

"Even if the president identifies numerous pork-barrel projects ... he is unlikely to use his veto power because it must be applied to the bill as a whole and cannot be used to target individual items," said Ryan. "Does he veto an entire spending bill because of a few items of pork when this action may jeopardize funding for our troops, for our homeland security or for the education of our children?"

Ryan made several changes to the measure in a bid to ease criticism from Democrats and others who said the original version was tilted too far in the president's favor.

The new plan modified the Bush proposal to ensure he could not paper Congress with spending-cut proposals and require repeated votes on the same item. The new power would expire after a six-year trial. But Ryan also narrowed the measure's application against special interest tax breaks so that, as a practical matter, few such provisions could be targeted by the president.

"It is so watered down that it is not a line-item veto," said Rep. Jim Cooper (news, bio, voting record), D-Tenn.

DOJ_NMG_0034283

Nonetheless, Cooper was one of the four Democrats on the panel to support the bill. Others such as top panel Democrat John Spratt Jr. of South Carolina opposed the bill despite supporting similar measures in the 1990s that were weaker alternatives to the line-item veto.

Meanwhile, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., unveiled a broader budget overhaul plan. In addition to a similar mechanism to require revotes on projects deemed wasteful by the president, the bill would revive the old Gramm-Rudman mechanism of setting hard deficit targets and requiring across-the-board cuts if they are not met. The measure sets a target of a reducing the deficit to .5 percent of the size of the economy within six years.

"It will lead to a balanced budget for sure by 2012," Gregg said.

Unlike the Gramm-Rudman law, the across-the-board cuts would apply not just to programs passed by Congress each year but also to benefit programs such as Medicare, welfare and unemployment insurance.

Gregg's proposal, which is likely to clear the Budget Committee but stall thereafter, would also put Congress on a two-year budget cycle and establish a commission to make recommendations to keep Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid solvent.

"The Republican majority simply has no credibility when it comes to our nation's budget. Under their watch, record surpluses have turned into record deficits," said Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D. "A Republican effort to change budget process rules now is like having the foxes change how they guard the chickens."

Earmarker In Chief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

The Congressional debate over "earmarks" continues, and not in a way that makes the GOP majority look good. This week the Members are pushing through another 1,500 special spending projects, even as the controversy has engulfed California's Jerry Lewis, who as House Appropriations Chairman is earmarker in chief.

Federal investigators are examining whether Mr. Lewis abused his position by steering earmarks to his political friends and former employees. In one case, the Justice Department is investigating whether defense industry lobbyists were urged to contribute money to a political action committee run by Mr. Lewis's stepdaughter, with a good portion of the money used for her own salary.

Another aspect of the probe is said to be whether Mr. Lewis steered hundreds of millions of dollars in earmarked projects to the clients of his friend, campaign contributor and former House colleague Bill Lowery. One of Mr. Lowery's clients is an unindicted co-conspirator in the bribery scandal that sent former Republican Congressman Duke Cunningham to jail for approving earmarks to defense contractors in exchange for personal gifts.

The lobbying firm's defense clients receive hundreds of millions of dollars in federal contracts from Appropriations. Two of the top rainmakers at Mr. Lowery's firm have been former Appropriations staffers who worked for Mr. Lewis. This week, the Los Angeles Times reported that Mr. Lowery's firm paid one of those staffers, Jeffrey Shockey, nearly $2 million when he left the firm and returned to Appropriations when Mr. Lewis became Chairman in 2005. Roll Call newspaper also reported this week that Mr. Shockey's former lobbying firm received more than $1 million in higher fees from government contractors shortly after he returned to Capitol Hill.

Mr. Lewis recently hired a top criminal defense team and denies any wrongdoing. He says that all earmarks and contracts went for projects with the "highest standards of public benefit." But even if all of this is technically legal, the cronyism and revolving door between Congress and lobbyists look terrible and certainly won't help Republicans restore an image of fiscal rectitude before November.

More broadly, the Lewis episode underscores the link between Member-steered earmarks and the opportunity for corruption. Convicted super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff openly boasted that earmarks were his political currency and he called the Appropriations Committee that doles them out a "favor factory" for lobbyists. Duke Cunningham parlayed earmarks into a Rolls Royce in his driveway, until his greed landed him in the pokey. We also now know that one of the major beneficiaries of the most notorious earmark from last year -- the $300 million Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska -- is a relative of GOP Senator Lisa Murkowski.

This spring, House Republicans elected new leaders and promised to restrain earmarking. But this week the House is busily approving a $68 billion Treasury, Transportation and Housing and Urban Development spending bill stuffed with more than 1,500 new earmarks at a cost of some $900 million.

They include $500,000 for a scenic trail in Monterey, California; $1.5 million for the William Faulkner Museum in Oxford, Mississippi; $500,000 for a swimming pool in Columbus, Ohio; and $500,000 for an athletic facility in Yucaipa, California. Several of these projects, including the athletic facility, have been promoted by Bill Lowery's lobbying firm -- the very firm in the middle of the Jerry Lewis probe.

DOJ_NMG_0034284

Yesterday, Jeff Flake of Arizona and other Members offered amendments to strip the earmarks, but they lost those floor votes by a wide margin. Our favorite: a $500,000 earmark for renovating a swimming pool in Banning, California. The same pool had already received a $250,000 earmark in each of the previous two years. Mr. Flake's floor proposal to strike the swimming hole subsidy got all of 61 votes.

In a rare bit of good news, Congressman Mark Kirk of Illinois prevailed on his amendment to prohibit any federal funds for the Alaska bridge project. The House Budget Committee also passed yesterday, on a 24-9 bipartisan vote, a modified line-item veto that would give Presidents the ability to strip out some of the worst of these projects. One of the loudest critics of the item veto is, ahem, Mr. Lewis. But meanwhile, in the spending bills where it matters, Congress is earmarking as usual.

If Republicans aren't spooked by the Lewis investigation, they should be. Here is one of their major barons under investigation for the kind of high-handed spending favoritism that voters detest about Washington. Republicans won the House in 1994 in part because the House Bank and Post Office scandals revealed the arrogance of a Democratic majority that believed it could do anything and voters would never send them packing. If Republicans don't change their behavior, earmarking could be the story that does the same for them this year.

House, Senate Members Disclose Finances (AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP, June 15, 2006

Lawmakers caught up in ethics investigations have plenty of cash — just in case they someday face hefty lawyers' bills.

House and Senate members detailed their finances Wednesday in the midst of public and government scrutiny of certain dealings that have caused Congress' popularity to drop.

The reports require lawmakers to list last year's assets and debts, along with any income beyond the $162,100 salary for the rank-and-file House and Senate members. Rules require lawmakers to donate their speaking fees to charity and to limit gifts from any individual to $100 in a year.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., holds blind trusts worth $7.5 million to $36 million. He reported making $5 million last year from the largest, worth between $5 million to $25 million.

Frist faces a Securities and Exchange Commission insider trading investigation over selling stock in a hospital company his family founded. He denies any wrongdoing and said he ordered the sales to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest as he considers running for president in 2008.

Rep. Charles Taylor (news, bio, voting record), R-N.C., founder and chairman of Blue Ridge Savings and Loan in Asheville, N.C., reported stock in a holding company for the bank worth more than $50 million. He also purchased 80 percent of a Russian bank and founded a Russian investment company.

State Democrats have called for congressional ethics and conflict of interest investigations into Taylor's banking activities and links to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in a federal bribery investigation.

Republican Tom DeLay of Texas, who resigned his House seat last week, showed his legal troubles have led him into sizable debt. DeLay reported owing $250,001 to $500,000 to four separate lawyers and law firms.

DeLay also reported individual and corporate contributions to a legal defense fund worth $588,320. He has predicted that legal bills will cost him $3 million.

Not every lawmaker under ethical scrutiny, who might amass large legal bills, can count on large bank accounts.

Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, under investigation at the Justice Department and the House ethics committee for his ties to Abramoff, reported no major assets or liabilities, nor any major outside sources of unearned income.

Ney, one of the recipients of an Abramoff golfing trip to Scotland, also reported no privately funded travel. He and his staff have said they stopped allowing any outside groups to pay for trips.

Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La., under investigation by the FBI for bribery, owns two tracts of farmland in Louisiana, each worth $50,001 to $100,000. He loaned $100,001 to $250,000 each to his mayoral and gubernatorial campaigns, as well as $50,001 to $100,000 to "Jefferson Interests." His office would not provide additional details.

Jefferson also reported three major liabilities. He owes between $50,001 and $100,000 each to Dryades Bank and Noah Samara, chairman and CEO of Worldspace Satellite Radio. He also has a $15,001 to $50,000 loan from Liberty Bank of New Orleans.

The FBI claims agents found $90,000 in bribe money stashed in Jefferson's home freezer. Jefferson has not been indicted and has denied all wrongdoing in connection with a federal investigation.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., this week acknowledged some inaccuracies in past financial statements and amended reports dating back to 2000, but he has denied improperly benefiting from his office. He reported owning part or all of properties in West Virginia, Washington and North Carolina, and he earned rent from several of those properties.

DOJ_NMG_0034285

Books proved a lucrative source of income for multiple lawmakers.

Sen. Robert Byrd (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., earned $103,095 in royalties for "Losing America: Confronting a Reckless and Arrogant President." He used the money to pay for medical care for his wife, Erma, who died in March, spokesman Tom Gavin said.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., made $872,891 from her memoir, "Living History." She has reported earning $8.7 million from the work in prior years. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., reported royalties and a book advance. He revealed that with permission of the Senate Ethics Committee, he agreed with Random House to a $1.9 million advance against royalties for writing two nonfiction books and one children's book. He intends to donate $200,000 to charity.

Sen. Byron Dorgan (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D., received an advance of $42,500 to write a book titled, "Take This Job and Ship It: How Corporate Greed and Brain Dead Politics is Selling Out America." Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., earned $5,175 in royalties for a reprinting of his 2003 book, "A Call to Service."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., received royalties worth $15,001 to $50,000 from publication of "Speaker: Lessons from Forty Years of Coaching and Politics." Sen. Trent Lott (news, bio, voting record), R-Miss., received a partial book advance of $106,210.

Some lawmakers were lucky last year. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, took home $2,700 in slot machine winnings. Sen. Judd Gregg (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H., won an $853,492 share of a $340 million multistate Powerball lottery jackpot.

Finances Are Laid Bare (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton And Elana Schor

The Hill, June 15, 2006

In filing financial disclosure forms along with other members of Congress last month, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) made scant reference to his business interests now being investigated by the FBI.

He reported that his wife, Andrea, drew a salary of undisclosed amount from the ANJ Group LLC, according to forms that were made public yesterday.

Jefferson's family set up ANJ in 2001, and by 2005 it had received $455,000 in payments from a company owned by Vernon Jackson, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson with the money, according to court records.

Jefferson's disclosure form gives no hint of three other businesses connected to the Justice Department's investigation of him. There is no mention of W2 International Broadband Services, a company registered in 2004 in Nigeria in which four of the lawmaker's daughters hold equity; no mention of International Broad Band Services, a company similarly structured as W2 but registered last year in Ghana; and no reference to Global Energy & Environmental Services, in which Jefferson's daughters were principals, according to legal documents.

If Jefferson's daughters have financial interests in those firms, Jefferson would not have to report it on the disclosure forms unless they were dependent children. Jefferson's spokeswoman, Melanie Roussell, declined to comment on alleged financial interests not listed on the form.

Meanwhile, the slew of filings made public yesterday brought to light a broad array of personally revealing and sometimes quirky details of lawmakers' private lives.

PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS

Two senators weighing White House bids in 2008 incurred new family credit-card debt last year. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) placed between $15,000 and $50,000 in a Senate Federal Credit Union account. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) reported three small new charge-card debts and one American Express Platinum debt of $100,001-$250,000, all in his wife's name.

The McCains maintain a multimillion-dollar asset portfolio, most of it stemming from Cindy McCain's lucrative family liquor-distribution business.

McCain's partner in campaign-finance reform, Sen. Russl Feingold (D-Wis.), reported a more modest net worth of no more than $116,000. He took out a second mortgage on his home last year, worth between $50,001 and $100,000.

GAMBLING

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) reported winning $2,700 playing slot machines at the Kewadin Casinos on Michigan's Upper Peninsula. Rep. Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.) reported winning $19,500 at the Cities of Gold Casino in Pojoaque, N.M. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) reported winning more than $800,000 last year playing the lottery.

BOOK ROYALTIES

DOJ_NMG_0034286

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) reported a $250,000 advance on his book, Herding Cats: A Life in Politics. Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) reported more than $100,000 in royalties from Losing America: Confronting a Reckless and Arrogant Presidency. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) inked a deal last January giving him a $1.9 million advance for two nonfiction books and a children's book. At least two likely presidential hopefuls have reported plans to write books that could serve as campaign tools. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) reported that he has agreed to write a book with his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, on the environment. McCain revealed that he has "several agreements" with Random House to write books.

SPOUSES

A few lawmakers reported large income streams from their spouses. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) reported that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, received $7.5 million for speeches worldwide. His highest fee was $350,000 for speeches in the Canary Islands and Toronto.

Other congressional spouses drew new salaries last year from campaign work, including the wife of House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas).

LANDOWNERS

Several members made a profit on real estate. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) sold 31 of his 41 acres of farmland in Stafford, Mo., in a deal valued at $100,000-$250,000, while Jefferson sold a New Orleans house in that same price range.

The wife of Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) acquired a second home in Thessaloniki, Greece, which had been his father-in-law's family home, according to disclosures. Ney reported $15,000-$50,000 of income on the European abode but listed it as a rental property.

Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.) continued buying land in Nicaragua, spending $50,001-$100,000 for a lot in San Juan del Sur. He recently married the daughter of a deposed Guatemalan leader and alleged dictator.

Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) complemented his interest in the Central Valley ranch long owned by his family with a new rental property in his wife's name, valued at $250,000-$500,000. Pombo faces ethics questions over his ranching, including a complaint last month from the left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) over legislative acts allegedly intended to benefit his family.

Across the aisle, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) reported enhanced value on property he owns in Sunny Isles, Fla., in addition to a Dominican villa that held steady in value. Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) sold farmland in Phillips City, Ark., a deal worth $100,000-$250,000.

PAYING DOWN DEBT

Several lawmakers reported paying off the lion's share of their credit-card balances in 2005. Rep. Bobby Scott (D-Va.) cleared up charge-card debt that had hit at least $80,000 in 2003 but reported higher margin loans with three brokerage houses that could have helped fund multiple new mutual-fund investments he made last year.

Rep. Gary Ackerman's ((D-N.Y.) form reported two cards with outstanding balances of $25,000-$65,000, an improvement from last year's assorted credit-card liabilities worth as much as $100,000. Ackerman's asset-backed personal-loan debt, however, more than tripled since 2003 and now stands $50,000-$100,000.

Barton closed his revolving charge account with Bank One, and Rep. Howard Berman (Calif.), the ethics committee's new ranking Democrat, reported clearing out MBNA and Citibank balances of $10,000-$15,000. Berman still has $10,000-$15,000 on a Discover card, according to his report.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) reported a new spousal charge balance $10,000-$15,000, but he noted that the Visa debt was paid off within 30 days. Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.) paid off outstanding charges in full, and Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) reported no more debt on Target and SunTrust credit cards along with a remaining balance on a Citibank business account.

Jefferson amended his disclosure to add a revolving charge account with MBNA that held a $15,001-$50,000 balance.

Erica Flint, Natalie McGill, and Ari Ruben contributed to this report.

Many Lawmakers Accepted Free Travel In 2005 (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Singed by controversy over complimentary travel, many members of Congress nevertheless accepted free trips in 2005, according to annual financial disclosure reports released yesterday.

Rep. Michael Oxley (R., Ohio), chairman of the Financial Services Committee, reported two trips, including six days of travel to Edinburgh, Scotland, paid for by the Transatlantic Policy Network, a group promoting U.S.-European relations sponsored by big companies such as Boeing Co. and Siemens AG.

DOJ_NMG_0034287

Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.), head of the House Judiciary Committee, took six trips, including a week's sojourn through Paris, Liechtenstein and Stuttgart, Germany, paid for by the International Management and Development Institute, a corporate-funded group run by a lobbyist; and another weeklong trip to Sydney covered by the American Australian Association. The National Cable and Telecommunications Association paid for Mr. Sensenbrenner and a relative to travel to San Francisco for a three-day trip, and the National Association of Broadcasters funded travel to Las Vegas.

Lobbyist-sponsored travel has figured in recent Capitol Hill scandals and driven down public opinion of Congress. Senate hearings brought to light that former lobbyist Jack Abramoff had brought former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and other lawmakers on trips to Scotland and the Marianas Islands. Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who is the subject of a federal influence-peddling investigation, reported no gifts or trips. He is under scrutiny for joining a 2002 Abramoff trip to Scotland.

While the House and Senate reports showed scant evidence that members were grounding themselves, or paying their own way, the scandals seem to have persuaded many to make extra efforts to note anything that could come back to haunt them, on the campaign trail or in a prosecutor's office, in what normally is a routine, annual release of assets and debts by all members of Congress.

Although nonpartisan watchdog groups have called on Congress to ban such travel, lawmakers distanced themselves from such a provision after businesses -- led by the National Association of Manufacturers -- objected, saying the measure would unfairly restrict a legitimate way by which organizations and businesses educate lawmakers about their issues.

Some Democrats also were frequent travelers in 2005. New York Rep. Charles Rangel, the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, took a four-day trip to Taipei, care of the Democratic Pacific Assembly, which promotes U.S.-Taiwan relations. He also went to St. Thomas for a three-day trip covered by the New York Carib News, a weekly newspaper for Caribbean-Americans, as did Rep. David Scott (D., Ga.).

Rep. Anna Eshoo (D., Calif.) reported a nine-day, $6,900 trip to Dublin with family members, sponsored by the Aspen Congressional Institute.

As for Mr. DeLay -- who left Congress just last week -- his forms show little official travel in 2005, although he used his legal-expense fund to pay for trips related to his legal troubles. For instance, the fund ferried him three times from Houston to Austin, where a grand jury was reviewing the allegations against him.

Facing money-laundering charges in Texas, he said he owes as much as $1.4 million in legal fees. In his disclosure, Mr. DeLay reported contributions to his legal defense fund of $588,000 in 2005. That money, plus an infusion of donations earlier this year, helped pay down Mr. DeLay's legal fees to the levels roughly estimated in his disclosure report, said Brent C. Perry, an attorney overseeing the fund.

Another legislator facing a criminal probe, Louisiana Democrat Rep. William J. Jefferson, suspected of taking bribes, has paid nearly $100,000 in legal bills, according to his report.

--John R. Wilke and Christopher Cooper contributed to this article.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", June 12, 2006

Libby Defense Team Considers Memory Expert

The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year.

Libby is charged with five counts of lying to federal investigators and the grand jury and obstructing an investigation into whether Bush administration officials wrongfully disclosed the identity of a CIA agent. He has pleaded not guilty.

Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony. At a status hearing Monday, Libby's attorneys said they would notify the judge by July 17 if they plan to call such a witness, and the government could then object. – Anne Marie Squeo

Clintons Say Their Income Topped $8 Million Last Year (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton had income of more than $8 million last year, mainly from speaking fees Mr. Clinton collected, according to disclosure forms released by the senator's office yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0034288

The Senate disclosure also shows that Mrs. Clinton earned $872,891 from her book "Living History," which was published in 2003 and has been released in paperback. That is down from last year, when she reported earning $2.3 million in royalties from her memoir. In 2001, Simon & Schuster paid her nearly $8 million to write the book.

The disclosure did not detail Mr. Clinton's earnings from sales of his book "My Life," which when published in 2004 was widely estimated to have generated $10 million to $12 million in income. Mrs. Clinton was required to disclose only that her husband received at least $1,000 in payments for his memoir.

Mrs. Clinton's disclosure was among scores of statements that senators, who must publicly report their personal finances each year, filed in the Senate. The disclosures give a rough financial picture, with assets reported within a range rather than in exact dollar amounts.

In the senator's disclosure on Tuesday, she and her husband reported having a joint bank account worth $5 million to $25 million, as well as a blind trust worth $5 million to $25 million. That was the same amount they reported last year but substantially greater than in 2003, when reports valued their assets at a minimum of $2 million.

One major source of income was the speaking fees Mr. Clinton collected. The statement showed that he earned more than $7.5 million for 43 speeches that he gave to groups as varied as the Goldman Sachs Group, the Lancaster, Pa., Chamber of Commerce, the Young Presidents' Organization and Leading Minds in Dubai in the United Arab Emirates.

The $7.5 million far surpassed the $875,000 he earned for speaking engagements in 2004, when his speaking schedule was slowed because he was busy releasing his memoir, traveling around the nation promoting it, opening his presidential library in Arkansas and undergoing heart surgery.

In 2003, he earned more than $4 million for speeches given worldwide.

Mrs. Clinton also reported that her husband received at least $1,000 in payments from Yucaipa Companies, a California private equity firm controlled by one of his best friends, the billionaire Ronald W. Burkle. After leaving the White House in 2001, Mr. Clinton agreed to be an adviser to a family of funds run by the Yucaipa Companies.

Local Politicians' Asset Reports Released (WP)

By Bill Turque And Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Sen. George Allen, a likely contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, listed assets of between $1.8 million and $3.6 million, according to financial disclosure reports filed by Virginia, Maryland and District lawmakers that were released yesterday.

The annual reports, which cover calendar year 2005, show that the bulk of Allen's wealth comes from commercial rental property in Charlottesville valued at more than $1 million and 98.5 undeveloped acres in Albermarle County valued at between $250,000 and $500,000.

The rest is held in stocks and bonds, including shares in Dominion Resources Inc. that are held by Allen's wife, Susan, and are worth between $100,000 and $250,000, according to the filings.

Susan Allen resigned her seat on the board of directors of the Richmond-based electric and natural gas utility last year after Allen's appointment to the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee raised conflict-of-interest questions. The company is one of Allen's steadiest campaign contributors.

Allen (R-Va.), in a reelection fight against Republican-turned-Democrat James Webb in November, listed as his sole liability a mortgage on investment property in Winston-Salem, N.C., valued at between $50,000 and $100,000. Lawmakers are required to provide ranges of dollar values instead of precise amounts.

The report also shows that Allen took relatively few privately funded trips last year, traveling to Palm Springs, Colorado Springs, Las Vegas and Florida for speeches and conferences for the Heritage Foundation, the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation, the Consumer Electronics Association and the Faith and Politics Institute.

Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), reported assets of between $780,000 and $1.7 million, a sharp drop from past disclosures. A spokesman for Warner said the dip is attributable to his purchase of a home in Alexandria, which is not listed as an asset.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who reported assets of between $435,000 and $1.2 million, received perhaps the most lavish gift reported by a member of the region's congressional delegation. He and his wife, state Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), were flown to Italy last year by real estate developer Robert F. Pence, who was celebrating his 60th birthday and is a longtime friend of Rep. Davis and a prominent GOP campaign contributor. The trip included a chartered cruise along the Amalfi coast and a visit to Venice.

DOJ_NMG_0034289

Davis said that he initially thought the trip, valued at $13,110, was "a stretch" of House ethics rules. But it was cleared by the House Ethics Committee.

Among Maryland lawmakers, Paul S. Sarbanes (D), 73, who is retiring after 30 years in the Senate, reported assets of between $167,000 and $430,000, in addition to a house valued between $250,000 and $500,000. Long active in Greek American groups, Sarbanes received a marble vase valued at $837 from Hellenic Public Radio-Cosmos FM as part of an award for public service, according to the filing. A member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he reported six privately funded trips last year to Princeton University, his alma mater, where he serves as a trustee.

Barbara A. Mikulski (D), first elected to the Senate in 1986, reported assets of between $172,000 and $572,000. She did not report the value of any real estate.

In the House, Maryland's two Republicans and six Democrats reported taking few privately financed trips. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), who is vying to succeed Sarbanes, took what has become an annual trip funded by the Commonwealth Fund and Harvard in January 2005, attending a weekend health policy conference in January in Florida. Cardin's room and board were paid for, but not airfare. The costs were not disclosed.

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D) disclosed 11 privately funded trips, many of them to appear before African American groups or on behalf of the Democratic Party. He reported donating speaking fees totaling about $8,000 to charity.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D), the House minority whip, traveled to New Orleans, Birmingham, Montgomery and Selma, Ala., and to Israel on privately funded trips. The travel tabs were picked up by the Democratic Leadership Council, the Faith and Politics Institute, and the American Israel Education Fund, respectively.

Other Maryland lawmakers -- Democratic Reps. Chris Van Hollen and Albert R. Wynn, C. A. "Dutch" Ruppersberger, and Republican Reps. Roscoe G. Bartlett and Wayne T. Gilchrest, reported no privately subsidized trips.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) reported assets of between $843,000 and $2.2 million. She listed four privately financed trips: to Queenstown, Md.; Hartford, Conn.; and two to New York. The trips were sponsored by the Public Governance Institute, Yale University, the American Federation of Teachers and the New York Human Rights Commission.

Hastert Staffer Pulled Senators' Forms (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

A senior aide to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pulled the financial disclosure forms of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and at least three other Republican Senators late last month, Senate records show.

According to those records, Hastert aide Tim Kennedy accessed the financial records for Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski and Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana in addition to Frist on May 19.

The motive for the request is unclear, and neither Kennedy nor Hastert aides Ted Van Der Meid and Ron Bonjean responded to several requests for comment.

The documents are publicly available. But while several veteran Senators declined to comment on the story, they visibly were taken aback when asked about Kennedy's research and indicated they had never heard of one chamber's leader researching the finances of Members of the other chamber.

A review of news stories during the week of May 19 do not show any particular tensions that involved all four Senators, and they do not all serve on a single committee.

But the Senate and House leaderships regularly have been at odds this year, with simmering differences over both substance and process exacerbated by a general Republican fracturing amid President Bush's decline in popularity.

The period when the files were taken, for instance, coincided with a stretch of bicameral sniping over the size of the fiscal 2006 supplemental spending bill.

Burns' office declined to comment. A spokesman for Murkowski said, "It's public information and anyone has the right to it." A spokeswoman for Frist did not return requests for comment, while a Stevens spokeswoman echoed the sentiments of Murkowski's office.

A Democratic Senate aide questioned the review, noting it was particularly surprising that Hastert's aides were looking into the finances of other Republicans. And while "there could be a good reason that they're looking, ... it's a good sign [for Democrats] that they're turning on themselves," the aide said.

Kennedy works under two of Hastert's top aides, Van Der Meid and Michael Stokke. A source close to Hastert said it was unlikely the Speaker knew his office was researching the finances of Senate Republicans. However, the source did say that Kennedy is a key staffer for Van Der Meid and Stokke with a wide range of duties, including working with the National Republican Congressional Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0034290

Two days before Kennedy trekked across the Capitol to access Frist's financial forms in the Senate Records Room, Hastert harshly rejected a Senate proposal to make an across-the-board cut to the supplemental spending bill.

In a statement released May 17, Hastert rejected the proposal, saying, "Any calls from the Senate for an across-the-board cut to make room for a bloated supplemental will be met by a busy signal in the House. The House will not join a shell-game spending spree with taxpayer dollars."

Frist's proposal was made in part to help make room for a number of proposals either authored by one of the four Members Kennedy researched or that would benefit their constituents.

For instance, Frist himself penned a massive avian flu spending package that the Senate included in its version of the supplemental. Burns strongly backed an amendment that added millions of dollars in new disaster relief spending for agriculture. And the bill included numerous earmarks that would have benefited Alaska, Tennessee and Montana.

A Mountain Of Riches On Capitol Hill (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Richard Simon And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

Annual disclosure data offer a look at the finances of lawmakers and their top aides.

WASHINGTON — A top aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) reported Wednesday that he received more money than he previously disclosed from a lobbying firm that has come under scrutiny for its ties to Lewis.

The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, corrected his financial disclosure reports to reveal that his salary in 2004 from Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White totaled about $500,000 more than he had reported.

He also collected nearly $2 million from the firm as a payout when he left to return to work for Lewis in 2005.

The firm, whose partners include former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-San Diego), a longtime Lewis friend, is being examined as part of a federal investigation into the practice among lawmakers of slipping federal money for special-interest projects into spending bills.

Lowery's firm represents a number of cities, institutions and businesses in Lewis' district that have received federal funds. The firm also has helped Lewis raise tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions, which helped his drive to gain the Appropriations Committee chairmanship in 2005.

On Friday, Shockey released advance copies of his disclosure report showing that he had received far more than had generally been known — $1.96 million — as a payout from the lobbying firm. On Wednesday, Shockey disclosed that in addition to that payment, he received a higher salary from the firm than previously reported, up from $1.5 million to over $2 million.

Lawyers for Shockey, who also had worked for Lewis before he joined the lobbying firm, said in a letter that the $1.5-million figure was his salary in 2003. They said the error involving his 2004 salary was discovered this week during a review of his financial accounts.

Shockey's high level of compensation — as he moved from Capitol Hill to the lobbying world and back again — shows the value corporate and other interests place on obtaining help in getting federal spending directives, known as earmarks, put onto federal spending bills.

Lewis and Shockey, through his lawyers, say they have done nothing wrong in the roles they have played in the earmarking process and have not been contacted by investigators. Shockey's lawyers point out that their client asked the Ethics Committee to review his compensation from the lobbying firm at the time he returned to public service.

Shockey's report was just one of hundreds released Wednesday by members of Congress and their senior aides. The annual disclosure reports offer a glimpse into the private financial affairs of lawmakers, and although assets and liabilities are detailed only within broad ranges, the information makes it clear that most legislators are well-off.

The reports show that at least 22 of California's 53 House members have assets of more than $1 million.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and her husband, investment banker Richard Blum, have assets that have been estimated to exceed $35 million. She filed one of the thickest reports: 172 pages.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), in her 10-page statement, reported that her assets consist almost entirely of a blind trust valued at $1 million to $5 million.

Investments by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and her husband include a St. Helena vineyard valued at $5 million to $25 million.

Several California lawmakers were given more time to file their reports, including Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Vista), who previously has ranked among the wealthiest House members.

DOJ_NMG_0034291

The report filed by Lewis and his wife, Arlene Willis, who is his chief of staff, showed them with assets valued at $715,000 to $1.6 million, with no liabilities.

According to the report, the 71-year-old congressman sold stock and a parcel of land in 2005 with a combined value of $30,000 to $100,000.

In the wake of several scandals that raised concerns about influence peddling on Capitol Hill, many lawmakers appear to be taking fewer trips paid for by special interests.

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), who has faced criticism for a 2002 visit to Scotland arranged by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, took no trips last year.

Earlier this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to charges that included defrauding clients and engaging in schemes to bribe members of Congress.

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.), the subject of a federal probe into possible links between his personal business activities and his duties as a member of the House Appropriations Committee, on Tuesday released amendments to his disclosure reports from 1999 to 2004 to correct what he called "a limited number of inadvertent errors."

Also, he released a chronology showing how his assets grew from less than $550,000 in 2000 to more than $8 million in 2005.

Mollohan resigned from the House Ethics Committee earlier this year after federal agents began probing his personal finances.

Mollohan's 2005 disclosure statement revealed that he received a loan valued at $15,000 to $50,000 from Don and Laura K. Kuhns.

Laura Kuhns is a former Mollohan aide who invested in real estate with Mollohan and also heads a West Virginia foundation that received earmarks requested by the congressman. Mollohan reported that he repaid the loan from the Kuhnses with 6% interest.

Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), the target of a bribery investigation by federal agents who last year found $90,000 in his kitchen freezer, has debts ranging from $130,000 to as much as $300,000, according to his report.

Jefferson acquired the debt last year without any significant change in his assets, the report indicates.

He had listed no liabilities in the previous two years.

Jefferson's debts include as much as $150,000 to two New Orleans banks and up to $50,000 on a revolving charge with MBNA, a subsidiary of Bank of America.

He also reported owing up to $100,000 to Noah A. Samara, chief executive of WorldSpace Inc., which works to provide digital satellite services to emerging markets in Africa and Asia.

Jefferson was caught on videotape accepting $100,000 from a business associate, whom he allegedly agreed to help win overseas telecommunications contracts in exchange for a third of the profits.

FBI agents later searched Jefferson's freezer and found $90,000 of that money wrapped in foil, according to an affidavit.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing. No charges have been filed, but his legal bills have begun to mount.

His disclosure report showed contributions to his legal defense fund totaling nearly $85,000.

Many lawmakers found a variety of ways to supplement their congressional salary, currently $165,200 a year for those not serving in top leadership positions.

The wives of six California House members — Republicans John T. Doolittle of Roseville, Richard W. Pombo of Tracy, Elton Gallegly of Simi Valley and Dana Rohrabacher of Huntington Beach; and Democrats Pete Stark of Fremont and Bob Filner of Chula Vista — earned money working on their husbands' campaigns.

Lawmakers are not required to list spouses' salaries on the forms. But Rohrabacher reported that his wife earned $41,055 from his campaign committee.

Stark said his wife was paid $2,400 a month to work on his campaign. Filner said his wife's salary was about $45,000.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former President Clinton earned more than $8 million from speeches and book royalties.

The former president was paid for 43 speeches, collecting up to $350,000 for an appearance.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) earned $50,000 in royalties from a book about his dog, "My Senator and Me." He was one of about a dozen senators who received money from books. Boxer took in about $16,000 from a novel she wrote.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) reported $2,700 in slot machine winnings.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) did better: He collected $853,492 in the Powerball lottery.

Lewis Aide Restates ’04 Income (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0034292

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Acknowledging a $500,000 error in income disclosure for a top aide to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), lawyers filed corrected disclosure reports Wednesday to show that Jeff Shockey earned more than $2 million in 2004, his final year with a lobbying firm that specializes in appropriations earmarks.

Shockey, the committee's deputy staff director, initially had reported that he earned $1.5 million during his last year with the firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, which is now under a federal probe regarding its connections to Lewis.

After a flurry of media reports about Copeland Lowery and the $2 million buyout Shockey received from the firm in 2005, Shockey's lawyers and accountants scrubbed his finances and discovered that he had misreported his 2004 income on a financial disclosure report filed in April 2005.

His income for 2003 was $1.5 million, according to a letter from William Oldaker, Shockey's lawyer, while the 2004 income from Copeland Lowery actually topped $2 million.

Combined with the buyout package he received in 2005 — which was paid out in full by Aug. 1 of that year — Shockey was paid more than $5.5 million by Copeland Lowery over little more than two and a half years.

"The need to adjust the amount of income disclosed on Mr. Shockey's new employee report [from 2005] was discovered earlier this week and immediately thereafter his accountants were consulted to ensure the accuracy of the information," Oldaker and his partner, William Farah, of Oldaker, Biden and Belair, wrote Wednesday in a letter to the Clerk of the House.

Late last month, the FBI examined the financial disclosure form Shockey filed last year, along with additional reports from those of Lewis, Lewis' wife and another former committee aide now working at Copeland Lowery. Federal investigators have subpoenaed records from at least seven clients of Copeland Lowery seeking records relating to their retaining the firm and anything related to Lewis.

Lewis, the firm and Shockey's lawyers have denied any wrongdoing.

Oldaker said Shockey's taxes were not completed in the spring of 2005, when he needed to file his disclosure report, and that the lobbying firm's complicated partnership payouts did not allow him to know his precise income until August. Without precise information, he reported his 2003 income instead.

A source close to Shockey called it "inadvertent human error" that he didn't correct the income report until this week, nearly 10 months after his final 2004 taxes were filed. The source said Shockey had no incentive to misreport his income.

Also, Shockey's camp believes this latest disclosure may further justify and explain the size of his buyout package, which came in at $1.96 million spread across several payments last year while he was on Lewis' staff.

"This shows that his business was growing. It wasn't a dramatic increase from one year to the next," the source said.

The amount Shockey earned in 2004 also indicates that it is likely the firm was billing clients for consulting work performed that it didn't consider lobbying and was not reported publicly. As Roll Call reported Wednesday, Shockey's clients paid the firm about $1.74 million in 2004.

According to documents in his disclosure reports, Shockey's partnership deal called for him to receive all revenues he brought in after subtracting 18 percent for administrative costs. With a little more than $1.7 million in lobbying revenue, Shockey likely would have had to bring in several hundred thousand dollars of additional revenue to get more than $2 million in pay from the firm in 2004.

The size of the buyout package has raised eyebrows among government watchdogs.

The payout was predicated on the projected revenue stream of Shockey's former clients in the first half of 2005, who in the first half of 2004 had paid just $580,000 in publicly reported revenue.

Copeland Lowery estimated in January 2005 that Shockey's clients would produce $1.5 million in revenue for the firm in the first half of that year; that sum, along with another $420,000 in payments based on profits and already performed work, led to the size of the buyout package, according to Shockey's lawyers.

In terms of publicly reported lobbying revenue, the firm hit its estimate almost exactly, as Shockey's former clients paid $1.46 million to Copeland Lowery by mid-2005.

It's unclear whether there were additional, non-lobbying consulting payments on top of that to the firm from the aide's former clients.

Shockey's lawyers have said he is acting ethically and within all bounds of laws, noting that he is not in charge of the earmark projects on the committee that Copeland Lowery and his former clients are pursuing. And he officially has recused himself from dealing with any clients of Alexandra Shockey, his wife, who is doing subcontracting work for the firm on behalf of an undisclosed number of former clients of her husband.

DOJ_NMG_0034293

At least 19 of his former clients — out of 49 in 2004, according to his disclosure forms — have been picked up by Letitia White, a former Lewis staffer who went to work for the firm in 2003. Her financial disclosure forms from her final four years working on Capitol Hill were reviewed by the FBI last month.

Jefferson Vote Expected Today (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson's (La.) fight to retain his seat on the Ways and Means Committee will come to a head this afternoon, with the House Democratic Caucus reconvening at 5 p.m. to resume debate on a motion that was tabled last week to strip him of the plum position.

Even Jefferson's backers, who contend the Louisianan is being singled out for reprisal by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), concede the numbers don't look good for him.

"It would appear to me that the leader has the support of the Caucus," acknowledged Rep. Donald Payne (D-N.J.), an outspoken critic of the Pelosi-initiated drive for Jefferson's expulsion from the panel.

Jefferson, who is caught up in a federal bribery probe, has steadfastly resisted Pelosi's calls to leave the exclusive committee "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus."

His options seemed exhausted last Thursday night, when Pelosi called a surprise meeting of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, a 50-member body dominated by the Leader's allies, which formally recommended Jefferson's removal. Within hours, the full Caucus was called into session to ratify the motion, but before a vote could be taken, Rep. Mel Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, complained that the hasty scheduling of the meeting violated Caucus bylaws. The proceedings were then postponed for one week.

Later that night, Watt issued a public statement blasting the pending move — a step he had warned Pelosi weeks earlier that he would take if she acted to force Jefferson out before he was actually charged with any crime. In the intervening days, some CBC members have echoed Watt's defense of their colleague, noting that other Members suspected of wrongdoing but who had not been charged have not faced the loss of exclusive committee assignments.

The debate has been somewhat muted, with some leading CBC figures, including Reps. Charlie Rangel (N.Y.) and James Clyburn (S.C.), noticeably seeking to stay out of the mix. Clyburn is also the chairman of the Democratic Caucus and is an ally of Pelosi. Rangel, insiders say, has viewed Jefferson with suspicion for years, believing his Ways and Means colleague too often sides with Republicans on free trade issues. Watt, too, has refused to say much beyond his initial statement, ducking reporters during House votes this week.

One source estimated that about two-thirds of the CBC's 43 members were opposed to Jefferson's ouster. And there were some CBC members, most notably Payne and Maryland Rep. Albert Wynn, who went out of their way to press Jefferson's case in public this week. Jefferson also received some help from the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus, a group of 32 legislators from his home state who sent Pelosi a letter last week arguing that Jefferson's role on Ways and Means was vital to Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

"Your request that Congressman William Jefferson resign his seat on the Ways and Means Committee will result in penalizing the citizens who, though displaced, still proudly call the Second Congressional District home," state Rep. Cedric Richmond, the group's chairman, wrote.

The lack of unanimity among CBC members is likely the result of two factors: a sense from some that Jefferson's indictment is imminent and that a fight is, thus, futile; and Jefferson's past alienation from some of the group's members. Indeed, Jefferson was defeated when he vied with Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.) for the CBC's chairmanship in 1996.

Mindful that a loud outcry from black leaders in Washington, D.C., could create a ballot-box backlash among what is one of her party's most reliable voting blocs, Pelosi granted several interviews to black print and broadcast outlets this week, seeking to explain away any concerns about her posture.

Thursday's Caucus meeting should last a little over an hour, Clyburn indicated today, with each side being given 30 minutes to make its case. Clyburn, who once again refused to express his opinion on the matter, said he will ask unanimous consent to allow Jefferson to speak.

If passed, Jefferson's committee removal will then go to the House floor under a unanimous consent agreement. Technically, a Member of either party could object and force a floor debate. It's doubtful Republicans would do so since they might be seen as aiding an ethically compromised politician. Watt indicated he hadn't reviewed parliamentary options and had no idea if he or other CBC members would pursue the matter beyond the Caucus vote.

"I'm focused on the fact that there is no historical precedent and no rule that is being applied consistently," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034294

Senator's HHS Trip For Antibiotic Data Yields Only Ire (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

After months of trying to get firsthand information from a government official familiar with a controversial new antibiotic, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) marched into the Department of Health and Human Services headquarters yesterday asserting his congressional right to receive the data.

After a brief meeting with senior HHS and Food and Drug Administration officials, Grassley departed empty-handed and angry.

"This is extraordinary for me," the senior Republican said outside the headquarters. "I haven't had to go to an agency like this since 1983 to get information I requested.

"I smell a coverup."

FDA officials denied any impropriety, saying they were cooperating with Grassley's staff and had sent 400 boxes of documents related to the approval and safety of the drug, Ketek. Some information had to be withheld, the agency said, because of continuing investigations.

The senator, a persistent critic of the FDA, said he went to HHS out of frustration over the agency's refusal to make available one employee involved with an investigation into the antibiotic. A powerful drug approved in 2004 for the treatment of chronic lung and sinus infections, it has been at the center of the newest controversy over the agency's actions in reviewing new drugs and monitoring their safety.

Liver failure and disease associated with the drug have been reported, but the overriding issue involves the integrity of the clinical trials done to establish its safety and efficacy.

The agency acknowledges that there were major improprieties in a 25,000-patient clinical trial done for the drug's developer, Aventis. One person has gone to prison for fraud in connection with that trial, data from several other trial sites have been discarded because basic standards were not met, and the agency told the company it could not say anything about the trial results on its product label.

Nonetheless, the FDA allowed Aventis to use much of the data to support the company's contention that the drug is safe. It also allowed Aventis to present the data to an FDA advisory panel without telling its members of the widespread fraud allegations clouding the trial. Documents show that some FDA employees argued that the trial should have been discarded because of the company's inadequate oversight.

Grassley has pressed to speak with an agent in the FDA's Division of Scientific Investigations who, he said, "is key to understanding what the FDA did when it became clear that the safety study required by the FDA in order to approve the drug was fraudulent and faulty. Did FDA managers turn a blind eye and let the drug maker off too easy, or did the FDA do the right thing?"

In reply, FDA spokeswoman Susan Bro said: "We would like to do whatever we can to help [Grassley] fulfill his constitutional duty as well as ours to the American people. However, we will not compromise an ongoing investigation."

FDA officials also said that having a senator interview a government investigator in the midst of an inquiry raised the possibility of politicizing criminal proceedings.

Ketek is one of the few antibiotics developed and approved in recent years. The agency has made a priority of encouraging companies to work in the field of antibiotics, which inevitably become less useful as bacteria become resistant.

"We don't want to disincentivize companies interested in going after these bad bugs," Bro said.

The maker of Ketek, now named Sanofi-Aventis, did not return a phone call. Earlier this month, the company stopped recruiting children for a study of pediatric use of Ketek. The "pause" followed reports of four cases of serious liver damage in adults using the drug.

Bro said that the FDA-required labeling identifies the risks and that "we are currently looking at whether new data merits additional warnings."

Grassley has emerged in the past two years as a harsh critic of the FDA, which he accuses of being too close to the drug industry. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which oversees Medicare and Medicaid payments, he called a high-profile hearing in 2004 into the FDA's handling of the withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, and yesterday he said he is contemplating calling another regarding Ketek.

"I'm tired of the runaround," he said after leaving the HHS headquarters. He said that he told the agencies' officials that "I know it's probably not your intent to protect companies, to cover for companies."

"But I said that every time that you stand in the way of information getting out that ought to be public, that's the impression you give the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0034295

House Deals Blow To 'Open Skies' As It Passes Latest Spending Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House approved a $139.6 billion transportation-and-housing bill after voting to deny funding for a Bush administration plan that would permit greater foreign ownership control of U.S. airlines in the future.

The 291-137 vote was the clearest test yet of political sentiment on the pending rules change, which the White House wants as part of its effort to negotiate an "open skies" agreement with the European Union deregulating trans-Atlantic air traffic.

As many as 97 Republicans joined Democrats in opposition; together with organized labor, Continental Airlines pressed hard for the amendment, at the expense of distressed carriers like Northwest Airlines and UAL Corp.'s United, which could benefit from more access to overseas capital and landing slots.

The action capped two days of budget debate in which the House softened Republican cuts from Amtrak passenger rail services and Internal Revenue Service operations. And by a 214-214 tie vote, the leadership turned back a Democratic amendment to protect older cities' claims to leased housing vouchers.

The greatest political bloodshed stemmed from an internal party fight over conservative attempts to strip out often small home-state projects inserted by the Appropriations leadership.

At stake were federal grants, running from $100,000 to $1.5 million and covering everything from a William Faulkner museum in Mississippi to a community swimming pool in California and road improvements benefiting Xerox Corp. in upstate New York. Arizona Rep. Jeff Flake forced a series of votes that were doomed from the outset but gave him the opportunity to challenge the expenditures, including two sponsored by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis.

When an exasperated Texas Rep. Henry Bonilla bluntly suggested it was "insanity" for Mr. Flake to persist, the 44-year-old lawmaker snapped back, "The definition of insanity is assuming the taxpayers are buying this." Even before the bill passed last night, Mr. Flake issued a news release with the headline at the expense of Mr. Lewis already caught up in lobbying scandals: "California Gets Swimming Pool, Taxpayers Take a Bath."

The floor action came as the House Appropriations panel gave initial approval to the last of the dozen annual spending bills, a $62.9 billion measure funding the departments of State, Justice and Commerce as well as major science and regulatory agencies. Combined spending for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and National Science Foundation would increase by $551 million. But within the Commerce Department, more than $631 million would be cut, chiefly from the advanced technology program and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Among regulatory agencies, the Securities and Exchange Commission would get $880.5 million, a net increase of $17 million. But in the effort to find extra money to preserve popular law-enforcement programs, the Appropriations panel pared legal services to the poor, juvenile justice and Indian tribal programs.

The larger transportation-and-housing measure, adopted 406-22, is among the most unwieldy of the annual spending bills, covering three cabinet departments as well as the federal judiciary. The Treasury Department stands out in the mix, and with it, the IRS budget, which has become a regular target for amendments.

In a surprise for many tax writers, an amendment to block funding for an IRS plan to hire private-sector debt collectors to pursue delinquent taxpayers survived, despite opposition from Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Calif.). But the Appropriations leadership agreed on the floor to restore about a third of what had been a $63 million cut from this year's funding level for the IRS.

The airline foreign ownership rules fight has been brewing for months, with Continental a major player in promoting efforts to block the rule, since it doesn't believe the open-skies agreement will be to its advantage. Northwest and United have powerful allies in Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R., Mich.), the bill's manager, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.).

But much like the Dubai Ports World controversy earlier this year, the issue has hit a national-security chord, and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.) weighed in against the rules change because the airlines are used to move troops when needed.

The Sky's The Limit (WP)

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Here's a trade deal that could actually happen.

PROSPECTS FOR a breakthrough in global trade talks are slim, and most bilateral trade deals hold out only modest economic benefits. But there is an opportunity for valuable progress in the airline industry, one of the most regulated and protected corners of business. Last year the United States and the European Union negotiated an "open skies" agreement, which would scrap restrictions on transatlantic travel: All U.S. airlines would be free to bid for slots at all European airports; a carrier such as Air France would be free to offer flights between, say, Milan and Chicago, rather than being restricted to a few France-U.S. routes. But this deal, which promises convenient connections and lower fares for travelers, may never be implemented. European ministers are refusing to ratify it until they see the outcome of a separate effort to deregulate U.S. domestic airlines, which has become the subject of a fierce lobbying battle in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0034296

The congressional battle revolves around restrictions on foreign investment in American airlines. Because of anachronistic nationalism, foreigners can't own more than 25 percent of the voting stock in a U.S. airline, and they are not allowed to influence commercial decisions on fares, routes and so on. President Bush's Transportation Department, which has also advanced sensible reforms for the rail network, has proposed a slight relaxation in these restrictions. This promises a double win. Foreign capital and management ideas might revive flagging U.S. carriers. And liberalization would help to persuade European transport ministers to ratify the open-skies agreement.

This win-win formula is opposed by Continental Airlines, which jealously guards its access to London's Gatwick Airport and fears open-skies competition. To block the deal, Continental has joined with labor unions to lobby against relaxation of the rules on foreign ownership. The firm's officials assert that foreign investment in U.S. airlines would compromise national security. But foreigners would be barred from influence over safety or security, and the administration's proposal has the blessing of the Defense Department.

Continental is looking out for its own business interests, pure and simple. The shame is that a powerful caucus in Congress is prepared to accept its specious arguments. Yesterday the House passed a measure that would delay the administration's reform for more than a year, jeopardizing a deal that could save travelers billions of dollars. The Senate has yet to vote on the issue. It should put national interests before vested interests.

House Panel Passes Bill To Look Closer At Foreign Investors (WSJ)

By Robert Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Financial Services Committee unanimously approved a bill that would change the process for reviewing proposed foreign investments in the U.S.

The bill would require all transactions involving state-owned companies to get an additional 45-day review and would allow more of the deal-approval process to be made public.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., an interagency group led by the Treasury Department that reviews foreign investments, came under fire for approving a Dubai-based company's application to operate U.S. ports. The transaction was scuttled after members of Congress and others worried the deal could endanger national security.

To become law, the bill must clear the House, be reconciled with a Senate measure and signed by President Bush.

Business groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Business Roundtable and the Financial Services Forum praised the House bill, saying it will improve the process for vetting foreign investments without discouraging interest in doing business in the U.S. The bill also creates a role for the director of national intelligence to review proposed deals.

House Panel Backs Credit-Rating Revamp (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Financial Services Committee voted to approve legislation that would overhaul the credit-rating business.

The bill, approved on a voice vote by the panel, would bring sweeping changes to the industry. House lawmakers said legislation is needed to increase competition in a business now dominated by only a few companies.

Critics say the Securities and Exchange Commission has been part of the problem because it has designated just five credit-rating firms as "nationally recognized," making it hard for new competitors to enter the business. Under the bill, the SEC would no longer designate rating firms as nationally recognized, but would register them under a streamlined three-month process.

The SEC would get new power to discipline rating firms and rating-firm employees, and to ban business practices that are coercive or abusive. Rating firms evaluate debt issued by public companies and have come under fire for failing to detect deteriorating credit quality at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Health Care Report Urges Dialogue On Reform (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Consumers across USA shared thoughts

DOJ_NMG_0034297

Affordable health care should be available to all Americans by 2012, with protection in the meantime from "very high out-of-pocket medical costs," say initial recommendations from a 15-member panel created by Congress.

The Citizens' Health Care Working Group's 12-page report, which some say may prompt debate before national elections in November and in 2008, does not specify exactly how to pay for such benefits or what they should include.

Before drawing up its recommendations, the panel conducted more than 35 meetings nationwide, along with several Internet polls, to gauge what Americans think of the health system and how they want to change it. The report is thought to be the first wide-ranging effort sponsored by the government to poll average citizens on health care policy. It comes as federal efforts at health reform are minimal, health spending is growing faster than inflation and action on helping the uninsured is heating up in some states.

Members of the working group included professors, a union leader, an advocate for the disabled, hospital administrators, nurses, doctors, a Motorola executive and Michael Leavitt, secretary of Health and Human Services. It has a two-year, $5.5 million budget — about half of which was spent on contractors who organized and ran the meetings — authorized by Congress as part of 2003's Medicare Modernization Act.

At most of the town hall meetings, including a March meeting in Los Angeles covered by USA TODAY, the majority of participants called for a health system in which everyone is covered, generally with a wide-ranging set of health services, including medical, dental and vision care. Significant, but smaller percentages, of participants wanted a so-called single payer system in which the government finances health care through taxes, as in Canada and much of Europe. Others wanted to keep the current employer-based system of health insurance.

Bigger splits were seen when participants were asked how such programs should be paid for and whether some people, such as the wealthy or those who smoke, should pay more.

Rather than outlining in detail the results of the community meetings, the report summarized them this way: "We heard a common message: Americans should have a health care system where everyone participates, regardless of their financial resources or health status, with benefits that are sufficiently comprehensive to provide access to appropriate, high-quality care without endangering individual or family financial security."

After 90 days of public comment, a final version of the recommendations will go to Congress and the president, probably in October. The report can be read online, and comments submitted, at www.citizenshealthcare.gov. Such timing "was clearly designed to force the issue to political discourse this fall," says Len Nichols, a health policy expert at the New America Foundation, a moderate think tank in Washington.

Whether health reform will be a focus of the November elections is questionable, Nichols and others say, because voters are concerned about other sharply divisive issues, such as the war in Iraq and immigration reform. But health care reform may be a hot topic in the next presidential election.

"The report may serve as an important reminder for candidates on both parties who want to seek the presidency in 2008 that they need to develop a serious health care agenda," says Ron Pollack of the liberal advocacy group Families USA.

There is little agreement on how to reform the health care system. Since the demise of the Clinton administration's sweeping reform proposal in the early 1990s, there has been little action in Washington. But this year, state lawmakers have acted to support coverage for the uninsured. Massachusetts approved a complex proposal that would require all individuals to buy coverage. Vermont, Illinois and West Virginia also have approved new programs.

The working group report says that deciding what should be included in a core set of benefits should be up to an appointed panel of experts and citizens. While it says no financing method is "optimal," the report says "multiple financing sources" will be needed. Those could include enrollee contributions or taxes on income, businesses or products.

The group promises greater detail and explanation of its findings before its final report.

Criticism of the report's initial recommendations came from both the right and the left.

Don McCanne of Physicians for a National Health Program, a liberal group that wants a single, government-financed health care system, says the report seemed worded to support Bush administration policies, including high-deductible insurance.

"They carefully crafted this interim report to satisfy policy issues for many of the special interests," says McCanne.

But Joseph Antos at the conservative American Enterprise Institute sees in the report a call for far too much government involvement in health care.

"It would make health care a 'right' and give everyone cradle-to-grave security through the government," Antos said in an e-mail. "That's unrealistic and irresponsible."

Some of the participants at the Los Angeles town hall meeting, which drew more than 400 people, felt the report did not go far enough and said they were disappointed in its recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0034298

"This is pretty generic," says attorney Yolanda Jackson, who said participants in Los Angeles had much more forceful opinions about changes needed in the health system. "My reading of this is that it's not that different from what we currently have. "

Ara Najarian, who also participated in the Los Angeles meeting and who is a senior partner at social-marketing firm Latino Consultants, says he was also disappointed. "Saying we need a core benefit package is great, but what does core mean? That's still to be debated, as is the definition of affordable," he says. "It's hard to see where the debate ends and actual action takes place."

The working-group effort was added to the Medicare reform act by Sens. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., and Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. Both say they are happy that the initial recommendations are in.

"It's good to have these ideas down on paper to drive a national dialogue on health care, and I'm looking forward to the public comments," Hatch said in a written statement.

Hearings on the report's findings are required, but Congress need not take action. Those hearings are not expected until next year. Wyden says it would be helpful if the report gave more details.

"Now the challenge is to get as much specific meat behind these particular areas as possible," Wyden says. "The more specifics Congress gets, the more opportunity there is to write a bill in line with what the people are saying."

OTHER NEWS:

Rise In Inflation Puts Pressure On US Rates (FT)

By Christopher Swann And Krishna Guha In Washington And Jennifer Hughes In New York

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

US inflation rose more quickly than expected for the third successive month in May, raising the prospect that interest rates will continue to rise beyond this month.

The core consumer price index – which excludes volatile food and energy prices – rose 0.3 per cent last month, taking the annual rate to 2.4 per cent.

The figures heighten the dilemma for the Federal Reserve, which may feel forced to continue to raise rates in spite of growing signs that the economy is slowing.

The futures market on Wednesday priced in a near 100 per cent certainty that the Fed would raise interest rates to 5.25 per cent this month, and doubled the chance, to 44 per cent, of another rise in August.

The Fed's beige book of economic activity reported widespread business concern about high or rising costs, and added "just three districts, Boston, Dallas and Philadelphia, reported that retailers are having success raising retail prices".

The stock market absorbed the news calmly, with the S&P 500 index rising 0.5 per cent.

However, Treasury bonds fell sharply. Yields on two-year Treasuries rose almost 10 basis points to 5.11 per cent, the highest since December 2000. The yield curve inverted further, suggesting the market thinks it increasingly likely that more rate rises will slow the economy.

President George W. Bush told reporters "the Fed is watching inflation very carefully…that's Ben Bernanke's job."

Mr Bernanke, the Fed chairman, will on Thursday give what is expected to be an important speech on the economy.

The May inflation rise pushed the three-month annualised rate of core inflation up from 3.2 per cent to 3.8, the highest since March 1995. "It does raise the probability of a further rate rise in August," said Jan Hatzius, chief US economist at Goldman Sachs. Such a move would increase the likelihood of a hard landing next year, he said.

The rise was driven by a rapid increase in "owners' equivalent rent" – an estimate of the cost of living in your own home, based on what it would cost to rent a similar property. This was due to a technical adjustment and a pick-up in rents as high prices and a cooling-off of house price inflation encouraged more Americans to rent rather than buy.

Excluding this element, the core inflation rate was in line with market forecasts. Headline inflation, including energy costs, rose 0.4 per cent, boosted by a 4.9 per cent increase in petrol prices. There was some evidence higher energy prices were being passed on, with air fares rising 2.6 per cent over the month.

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America, said: "There has been a clear upward drift in inflation and it is going to continue through year-end. The Fed would definitely like to pause but I don't think it will be able to."

Inflation Spreads Beyond Energy (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

DOJ_NMG_0034299

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Prices outpace workers' wages

WASHINGTON — Consumer inflation jumped again in May as higher prices for gasoline, housing and other items pushed up costs at a faster pace than workers' pay, the government said Wednesday.

"Inflation was uncomfortably high pretty much across the board," says Allen Sinai, president of Decision Economics, a consulting group.

Consumer prices rose 0.4% in May following a 0.6% gain in April, the Labor Department said. Excluding the often volatile food and energy sectors, the "core" index, considered a better gauge of inflation trends, rose 0.3% in May for the third consecutive month.

In addition to gasoline, prices rose for clothing, medical care, used cars, food, housing and education. Prices were down for just a handful of items, including personal computers and cigarettes.

The gains in May are just the latest this year. In the first five months, the consumer price index rose at a 5.2% seasonally adjusted annual rate, up from a 3.4% gain in 2005. From January to May, the core index rose at a 3.1% rate after increasing 2.2% last year.

Wages have not kept up with price gains. Adjusted for inflation, average weekly earnings for hourly workers fell 0.7% in May, the biggest decline since September.

The price increases in May strengthened predictions that Federal Reserve policymakers, many of whom have recently expressed concerns about inflation, will continue to raise interest rates to curb borrowing and spending, thus putting a damper on price increases. Chairman Ben Bernanke last week said inflation had risen to an "unwelcome" level.

Fed officials are likely to raise interest rates by a quarter percentage point when they meet June 28-29. That would bring the Fed's target for short-term rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, to 5.25%. That would be the highest in 51/2 years, although still below the 6.5% peak hit in the last rate-increase cycle in 2000.

Still, many economists, including those at JPMorgan Chase, Moody's Economy .com and Putnam, said inflationary pressures aren't as bad as they appear and there's a risk the Fed could overreact.

The CPI measures housing prices based on how much consumers would pay to rent their homes. But rents are increasing rapidly while home sales and prices are slowing, leading to a possible distortion in the numbers. Changes in utilities prices could also be skewing the data, economists say.

"The inflation story is probably being blown out of proportion," Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says.

Investors took a similar view, focusing on stock upgrades by investment banks. The Dow Jones industrial average ended a recent losing streak, jumping 111 points to 10,817.

Strong competition is continuing to make it hard for retailers to increase prices, the Fed said in an anecdotal report out Wednesday. That suggests inflation pressures at the consumer level are not increasing rapidly.

The report also found signs of moderation in economic growth in parts of the USA. A number of economists expect that such slowing from the rapid pace seen earlier in the year will ease inflation pressures later in 2006. "I don't think the outlook is all that scary," Briefing.com chief economist Timothy Rogers says.

Uptick In Inflation Gnaws At Economy (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A key indicator of inflation rose for the third consecutive month in May, the government said today, a report that analysts said will likely put pressure on the Federal Reserve to continue hiking interest rates.

The Labor Department announced that the Consumer Price Index rose a seasonally adjusted 0.4% from April because energy prices continued to surge.

What troubled many economists, however, was a larger than expected 0.3% gain in the core index, which strips out volatile energy and food costs. About half of the increase was related to higher housing costs, according to the Labor Department.

Economist Joshua Shapiro said the results from May's CPI report "guarantees" that Federal Reserve policymakers will bump the nation's benchmark short-term interest rate by a quarter point when they meet June 29. Last month, the Fed, headed by its new chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, approved the 16th quarter-point increase in the federal funds rate to 5%.

"Language in the policy statement will leave the door open for further action down the road," Shapiro said in a research note.

In Washington, President Bush today took credit for strong economic growth and said it was up to the Fed to keep inflation in check.

DOJ_NMG_0034300

Asked at a news conference about the economy and other recent signs of a rebound in inflation, Bush said, "That's Ben Bernanke's job."

Bush said the tax cuts enacted in his first term were responsible for what he called a solid economy with strong growth in employment and productivity. Most of those tax cuts are scheduled to end in 2010 and 2011, and Bush urged Congress to make them permanent.

"Pro-growth economic policies work," he said.

The CPI report did not prove very troubling to Wall Street investors, who saw strong gains after a string of declines. The Dow Jones industrial average shot up 110.78 points, or more than 1%, to close at 10,816.92.

Reports Intensify Pressure On Fed To Boost Rates (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

The third month of faster-than-expected price increases raised pressure on the Federal Reserve to back up its tough rhetoric on inflation with higher interest rates, despite more signs the economy is cooling.

Two reports yesterday underscored the dilemma facing central-bank policy makers. The economy appears to be slowing due to higher energy prices and the impact of the cumulative four-percentage-point increase in short-term rates. A slowing economy would normally encourage the Fed to place its interest-rate increases on hold and perhaps eventually cut rates, but the slowing occurs as inflation edges above the zone where most Fed officials are comfortable.

That isn't unusual: typically after the Fed raises rates, the economy, with a lag, slows, and with an additional lag, that weaker economy alleviates inflation pressure. In recent weeks, however, a stream of tough anti-inflation rhetoric from Fed officials coupled with yesterday's price report have convinced markets that short-term interest rates will be raised to 5.25% from 5% at the June 28-29 meeting. Moreover, futures markets now see a roughly 50% probability that the Fed will raise rates again to 5.5% at its Aug. 8 meeting.

Consumer prices rose 0.4% in May from April, the Labor Department said yesterday, and were up 4.2% from a year earlier. More ominously, "core" prices, which exclude volatile food and energy, rose 0.3% in May, the third consecutive increase of that magnitude, and were up 2.4% from a year earlier. That's the highest rate of core inflation in more than a year.

At the same time, the Fed released a report that found economic activity has softened in recent weeks. "Economic activity continued to expand from mid-April to early June, but there were some signs of deceleration," the Fed's "beige book" said.

The beige book, a roundup of anecdotes on business conditions from the Fed's 12 districts, said consumer spending growth "had slowed" and "residential real-estate markets continued to cool across the country....Some districts mentioned that sales were slowing or weaker than anticipated at discount stores or to lower-income customers," perhaps because of higher gasoline prices.

By raising rates later this month, the Fed may dispel doubts about its anti-inflation resolve. But "rate increases heighten the chance the Fed will overshoot the target and prompt greater slowing than necessary to curb inflation," Société Générale SA economist Stephen Gallagher warned in a research note. World stock markets have swooned in recent weeks in part over that concern, although yesterday they were mostly higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 110.78 points to 10816.92. (See related article4.)

Tom Gallagher, a Fed watcher at investment firm ISI Group, said a rate increase may also feed the incorrect impression that the Fed is targeting current inflation, rather than where inflation will be in six to 12 months. Economists say inflation is a lagging indicator of the impact of monetary policy.

Until early May, Fed officials had indicated an inclination to pause in their rate increases at their late June meeting to assess the impact of prior increases. But the rise in inflation and signs that the public's expectations of inflation were edging up prompted a shift in rhetoric.

Last week, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said the recent rise in inflation had been "unwelcome" and a parade of other officials echoed that sentiment. Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas President Richard Fisher yesterday called the recent rise in inflation and expectations "discomforting" and "unacceptable." Earlier this week, Sandra Pianalto, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland, said, "The recent news on inflation troubles me," but at 5%, rates are "near a point that is consistent with a gradual improvement in the inflation outlook."

The Fed may conclude it would rather risk more slowing in the economy than allowing the recent rise in inflation to become entrenched. If so, yesterday's reports may have made a decision to raise rates later this month easier, though still unpleasant. Lou Crandall, an economist at Wrightson Associates, a financial-research firm, said Mr. Bernanke may have painted himself into a corner with his hawkish rhetoric, but given the latest inflation number, "it turns out to be a corner they want to be in anyway."

DOJ_NMG_0034301

The biggest contributor to the latest rise in inflation is shelter, whose 0.4% rise accounted for more than half of May's overall price rise. The category includes hotels, tenants' rents and the "owners' equivalent rent," a measure of how much homeowners would pay to rent their own homes. The equivalent rent, the biggest component of shelter prices, was up 0.6% in May following gains of 0.4% in April and March.

Because owners' equivalent rent is more closely linked to tenants' rents than housing prices, some analysts argue recent inflation has been overstated because rents are picking up even as house appreciation slows. Another factor is that the Bureau of Labor Statistics subtracts an estimate of gas utility costs from tenant rents in calculating owners' equivalent rent, with the result that when natural-gas prices are declining, as they have recently, it can put upward pressure on owners' equivalent rent.

The second big contributor to inflation is energy, which rose 2.4% last month following a 3.9% gain in April. The run-up in oil and gas prices earlier this spring appears to be affecting consumers in many places besides the pumps. NY Waterway, which operates commuter ferries to New York City, recently raised fares to compensate for the increase in marine diesel over the past year. A one-way ticket from Weehawken, N.J., to Manhattan rose to $9 from $7.75, while a monthly pass rose to $280 from $257.

Similarly, major airlines have increased fares several times already this year. Overall, transportation costs as measured by the CPI rose 1.5% in May following a 2.4% jump in April. Gasoline was up 33% from last year.

On the other hand, the beige book found little evidence that higher energy and material costs are leaking more broadly into the economy. Half of manufacturers surveyed in New England "have raised their selling prices in recent months or plan to do so shortly" due to rising commodity costs yet there were "few reports" that such increases were broadly reaching the retail level.

Write to Greg Ip at greg.ip@wsj.com5 and Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com6

Inflation Mounted Swiftly In May (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Price Increases Outstrip Wages As Gas Takes Toll

Consumer prices rose briskly again in May, led by rising costs for gasoline and housing, the Labor Department reported yesterday, boosting the likelihood that the Federal Reserve will keep raising rates to restrain inflation.

With many motorists paying more than $3 a gallon for gasoline, landlords hiking rents and businesses passing on more of their rising energy and materials costs to shoppers, the department's consumer price index rose 0.4 percent last month after a 0.6 percent increase the month before.

Inflation is eroding consumers' purchasing power, as prices rise faster than most workers' wages, the department said in another report. After adjusting for inflation, average weekly earnings declined 0.7 percent last month and bought 0.2 percent less than in May last year.

"Inflation is definitely on the rise . . . and it will be troubling for many consumers, particularly those at the lower end of the income scale," said Richard Yamarone, director of research for Argus Research Corp., a financial analysis firm. Even so, he added, "inflation is not at a level that is going to cripple the economy, and it appears the Fed is on top of things and will indeed combat these mounting pressures."

Stock markets rose yesterday after sinking for weeks on concerns about inflation and tightening credit. "There's a pause in the panic," said Bank of America market strategist Joseph Quinlan. "Some brave souls are stepping back into the market to buy" blue-chip stocks and other companies they consider to be safe investments.

The Dow Jones industrial average of 30 of the largest companies gained 1.03 percent. The Standard and Poor's 500-stock and the Nasdaq composite index each rose less than 1 percent.

Stocks in Europe, Japan and other developed economies also jumped for the first time in more than a week, though some in less-developed emerging markets continued to fall. "We think we will see a slowdown of this sell-off and a bit of consolidation . . . but the equity markets are still going to be quite nervous for a while," said Anton Pil, head of global fixed-income trading for JPMorgan Private Bank.

Analysts widely predict the Fed will raise its key short-term interest rate to 5.25 percent from 5 percent at their meeting in two weeks, for a 17th consecutive increase.

If inflation pressures ease in coming months, Fed policymakers might leave the rate unchanged for a while at 5.25 percent. But if not, they could raise it to 5.5 percent at their meeting in August.

Fed officials think that the recent spurt of inflation will probably prove to be temporary and that price pressures will be dampened as the economy loses steam. But they are not sure of this forecast and worry that inflation might be more persistent given the economy's underlying strength, low unemployment and higher-than-expected oil prices.

DOJ_NMG_0034302

The Fed's latest survey of regional economic conditions, also released yesterday, found that "high energy costs were fueling price increases in manufacturing and, to a much lesser extent, retail" from mid-April through early June. "Reports of costs being passed forward varied considerably but were more prevalent" than in the previous survey.

The CPI has risen at a 5.2 percent annual rate this year, after adjusting for seasonal variations, a much hotter pace than the 3.4 percent increase recorded for all of last year.

More than half of the May CPI increase reflected higher rents and hotel and motel rates. Rents have been rising as the housing market cools, vacancy rates fall and many landlords boost their prices to cover higher energy bills and property taxes. Lodging companies are raising room rates, and airlines are increasing fares as demand strengthens.

The CPI also got a boost from energy prices, which rose 2.4 percent in May, and were up at a 30.8 percent annual rate in the first five months of the year.

Gasoline prices, in particular, rose 4.9 percent last month, to a level higher than the previous peak in September after Hurricane Katrina battered Gulf Coast refineries and pipelines, the department said.

Prices also rose broadly last month in other categories, as consumers paid more for food, clothing, medical care, education, furnishings, used cars and trucks, and tickets to shows and sporting events.

The May price increases more than offset falling prices for electricity, natural gas, new vehicles, toys, video and audio goods, sporting goods, telephone services, computers and equipment.

Many economists look for signs of whether high energy costs are seeping into other prices by studying so-called core inflation measures, which exclude food and energy items. The core CPI rose 0.3 percent last month, the third consecutive monthly increase at that rate -- and a troubling trend for financial markets and the Fed.

The string of recent core inflation readings "provides a strong signal that producers are gaining some leverage in passing higher energy and materials costs through to consumers," wrote Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist for Global Insight Inc., in an analysis of the report.

Core inflation has risen at a 3.8 percent annual rate over the past three months and at a 2.9 percent pace over the past six months -- exceeding the comparable April figures Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke cited last week as "unwelcome."

Bernanke vowed then that the Fed would not allow the recent uptick in core inflation to continue, sending a strong signal to financial markets that interest rates are headed higher.

While Fed officials often focus on core inflation, they also worry that trends in overall inflation affect consumers' and businesses' expectations of future inflation, which can be self-fulfilling. Before Bernanke's speech, both consumer surveys and the bond market indicated a small rise in inflation expectations, which rattled the central bank.

"Expectations can quickly become reality," Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech yesterday. "We can ill afford to somehow encourage expectations that inflation might gain momentum."

Led By Higher Rents, Prices Continue To Climb (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Prices at the retail level continued to climb in May, led by rising fuel costs and rents.

The government reported today that the so-called core rate of the Consumer Price Index, a closely watched measure of prices excluding the volatile food and energy categories, rose a slightly higher than expected 0.3 percent, reaffirming the belief among many economists and investors that the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates again later this month.

The price data came as a Fed official said in a speech today that recent inflationary pressures have been "corrosive."

The Labor Department said that overall consumer prices rose 0.4 percent in May, a slight deceleration from April's 0.6 percent increase. But compared with last May, prices have jumped 4.2 percent, the government said. That is considerably higher than the 3.9 percent increase economists forecast. The core rate, meanwhile, rose at an annual pace of 2.4 percent in May, up from a 2.3 percent pace in April.

The cost of housing accounted for more than half of the 0.3 increase in the core rate from April to May, the Labor Department said.

Investors, wary that another interest rate increase by the Federal Reserve could slow down economic growth, have pushed stock prices lower worldwide recently.

The stock market appeared to shrug off the news, with the leading market indexes closing higher for the day. But bond prices fell sharply, as the data on prices gave traders more reason to expect interest rates to increase.

DOJ_NMG_0034303

Some economists said today's report on consumer prices not only reaffirmed that the Fed would raise interest rates for the 17th straight time when it meets on June 28 and 29, but it raised the likelihood of yet another increase at the Fed's meeting in August.

"With the core rate of inflation coming in even higher than April, not only does this remove any lingering doubt," about a rate increase, said Rob Carnell, an economist with the financial services company ING, "but it does raise a serious possibility of an August hike as well."

Ian Shepherdson, chief United States economist for High Frequency Economics, said: "A June 29 hike is a done deal. We just hope sense will prevail in August."

In Europe, stocks declined right after the Labor Department report was released, but they cut their losses toward the end of the trading day there. In Asia, leading indexes finished higher after one of their worst trading days in years on Tuesday.

The government report about rising prices came as Richard Fisher, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech that it was his duty to be "relentlessly bird-dogging" inflation. His were the latest comments from a growing number of Fed officials who are vowing publicly to combat inflation.

Also today, the Federal Reserve issued its quarterly economic overview, known as the beige book, which said the American economy continued to expand from mid-April to June but showed "some signs of deceleration." The report said the labor market continued to contract while consumer spending tightened.

Neither the Mr. Fisher's remarks nor the Fed report had an obvious impact on the financial markets this afternoon.

Prices Rise, And Interest Rates Sure To Follow (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

It could be a summer of rising interest rates.

That's the sobering prospect for the US economy following news that the inflation rate is running at a quickening pace. Higher prices for such things as airline tickets, housing, healthcare - and of course, gasoline - are now starting to eat into consumer pocketbooks.

Wednesday, the Labor Department reported the May Consumer Price Index (CPI) rose 0.4 percent, after a 0.6 percent rise in April. This is well above the comfort level of the Federal Reserve, the nation's chief inflation-fighter.

The latest numbers just about guarantee the Fed will hike interest rates at the end of the month. Its new chairman, Ben Bernanke, an avowed inflation-fighter, may follow that with yet another increase in August.

The inflation pop, however, comes at a time when the economy may be starting to cool. This could keep the Fed from hitting the brakes too hard.

"The Fed is going to have to raise rates more out of a desire to keep the market from thinking the new sheriff in town is not serious about fighting inflation," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JP Morgan Private Client Services in Columbus, Ohio. "Prices are rising against a backdrop of weakening housing and other parts of the economy."

Economists are most concerned that rising prices seem to have moved beyond the energy sector. Removing food and energy - typically the most volatile prices - from the inflation rate indicates that "core" prices in May rose 0.3 percent. Over the past three months, the core rate of inflation is up to an annual rate of 3.8 percent, the fastest pace in more than a decade.

"We're seeing a near-term acceleration in the core rate," says Gregory Miller, chief economist at Suntrust Banks in Atlanta. "An increase of half a percentage point at the next Fed meeting is a strong possibility before the Fed decides to back away."

However, Mr. Chan reports that such a large rate hike is not likely. In the past, Mr. Bernanke has said previously, the Fed has tended to "overshoot" by raising rates too high or dropping them too low. The central bank would then have to change directions, confusing the markets.

"I don't think Bernanke is going to put in a strong case for a half a percentage point increase," Chan says.

Though the inflation rate is accelerating, the economy has changed considerably since the last major period of inflation in the 1970s, Chan says. Back then, whenever the consumer price index rose, wages automatically ticked up via "cost of living adjustments." Most of those arrangements are now gone, he says, particularly at manufacturing facilities, like General Motors Corp., where total remuneration is being cut, not raised.

"A slowing economy will eventually lead to diminished pricing pressures," Chan says.

Until that happens, consumers are starting to feel the effects of rising prices on their pocketbooks. For example, airfares rose 2.6 percent in May, according to the CPI report. Brian Hoyt, a spokesman for Orbitz.com, says airline ticket prices this summer are up 10 percent over last year's.

DOJ_NMG_0034304

Amy Kelley of Calverton, N.Y., can attest to this. She's been searching for less expensive tickets for a vacation to Seattle. "I can't find the bargains I used to," she says.

While the higher airline prices are related to the rising cost of jet fuel, the CPI also points to rising medical expenses, which were up 0.3 percent in May.

In Philadelphia, Warren West, president of Greentree Brokerage Services, says the cost of providing medical benefits to his employees rose 16 percent this year. "There is no way to pass this on to the end user. We don't have that kind of pricing power," he says.

In fact, inflation in services is a growing issue, says economist Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York.

"The last two months there has been service-sector wage pressure," Mr. Brusca says, pointing out that two-thirds of the jobs in the economy are service-related.

"Inflation pressure on goods is not that bad, but in services they seem to be building."

Part of the reason for the service-sector price increases is supply and demand, says Sandy Horwitz, an accountant in Coral Gables, Fla. His firm, Goldstein Schechter Price Lucas Horwitz & Co., has raised its billing rates 5 to 7 percent this year, he estimates.

"There is a shortage of accountants and pretty strong demand out there, so we need to meet people's salary requirements," he says.

Miami lawyer Matthew Krieger says demand for his legal specialty, immigration law, is so strong he has been able to increase his billing rates from 10 to 20 percent this year.

"There is a shortage of good attorneys in our area," he says. "It's a very complex area of the law."

In terms of prices, "rents" is one of the fastest ascending groups. The government calculates rents by determining what individuals would pay for housing if they were renting to themselves. Last month, rents rose 0.6 percent, the fastest pace in years. Since housing represents 25 percent of the CPI, it is a significant contributor to the overall inflation jump.

In Miami, landlord David Lombardy says tenants are now seeing rents climb - up about 30 percent in the past year, he estimates. A one-bedroom apartment at the Mirador on South Beach is now renting for $1,400 a month, up from $1,000 a month last year, he says.

Still, Mr. Lombardy expects rents to drop eventually due to the rising number of luxury condominiums coming on the market.

"All those people who bought on speculation will try to flip them, and when they can't do that they will try to rent them. So this will bring rents down in 12 to 18 months," he says.

Housing, Energy Costs Boost Inflation (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Higher housing and energy costs drove inflation to a 5.7 percent rate in the past three months, the highest in a decade, sealing expectations yesterday that the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates further this summer and add to the costs weighing on consumers.

Yesterday's consumer price report from the Labor Department raised red flags at the central bank, where officials express dismay at the underlying, or "core," rate of inflation, which accelerated to 3.8 percent last month in the biggest increase since 1995. The core rate is dominated by housing costs and, though it excludes the skyrocketing gas and electricity costs consumers pay directly, it reflects moves by businesses to pass those costs on to consumers.

"That is just too corrosive to be accepted by a virtuous central banker," the president of the Fed's Dallas reserve bank, Richard Fisher, said in a speech in Texas. The Fed must be "relentlessly bird-dogging inflation to prevent a debasement of your dollars."

The uptick in inflation this year has raised consumers' expectations of price increases to 3.2 percent a year -- a rate that would erode the purchasing power of a dollar to as little as 73 cents in a decade, he said.

"To me, this is more than discomforting. It is unacceptable," he said, adding that the Fed should no longer adhere to its practice under former Chairman Alan Greenspan of mostly ignoring volatile spikes in energy and food prices. "People have to eat, drive and air-condition their homes," he said.

The Fed's redoubled attention to energy and housing-driven inflation, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, has heightened the importance and effect of inflation reports on the financial markets and economy. Yesterday's bad inflation news was widely anticipated, however, and markets took it in stride, rallying after a series of tumbles in stock indexes around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0034305

The Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday added 111 points, recouping some of the 540-point loss it suffered in the past week since Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke inspired fears that the central bank would take the hammer to any increase in inflation. The move to 10,817 put the Dow back in positive territory for the year.

Some analysts say the Fed's focus on housing and energy costs is ironic, and perhaps unwise, because the central bank has little control over either and its campaign to raise interest rates will add to the higher housing costs consumers have to bear.

About half of new home purchases in recent years were financed through adjustable-rate loans that will be adjusted sharply higher as a result of the Fed's actions in the months ahead. Homeowners with fixed-rate mortgages do not face sharp increases unless they sell or refinance their homes.

Previous Fed moves to raise short-term rates by 4 percentage points since June 2004 already have contributed to a slowdown in the housing market and are pushing more people to rent rather than seek homeownership. The rush into rentals is driving up rent prices and is the principal force driving up the core rate of inflation, analysts say.

A critical component of the price index designed to track the cost of homeownership for the 69 percent of Americans who own homes actually measures what it would cost to rent the single-family homes they own. That rental index jumped by 0.6 percent last month, the most since 1990.

The Fed is in a "true dilemma" because "the origins of higher consumer prices are currently beyond their scope" and cannot be cured with higher rates, said Roger M. Kubarych, chief economist at HVB Group.

"Higher rates would speed up the slowdown of the housing boom and put further pressure on rents" and housing inflation, he said.

While Fed officials from Mr. Bernanke on down have left little doubt they are bent on raising rates, that is "no longer appropriate for the weakening economy," Mr. Kubarych said. "Overdoing the tightening bears the risk of a recession -- which ultimately would lower rents and [inflation] -- a costly approach."

Other analysts support the Fed's war against inflation.

"The chairman has rediscovered his monetary manhood and is doing the right thing," said Lawrence Kudlow of Kudlow & Co. "Price stability is the key to economic growth."

President Bush expressed confidence that Mr. Bernanke and other Fed governors he appointed will get inflation under control.

"Obviously, the Fed is watching the signals for inflation very carefully," he said at a press conference. "That's Ben Bernanke's job."

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America Corp., said the Fed has little choice but to raise rates when faced with yesterday's inflation numbers, which included a 35 percent leap in energy costs, 20.9 percent surge in transportation costs, 7.3 percent jump in clothing costs and 4.5 percent rise in health care costs over the past three months.

"It's not that the Fed is losing its grip, but it will have to hike rates to maintain its inflation-fighting credibility," he said. "I believe the Fed would like to pause, but I think a continued upward drift in core inflation numbers will not allow them to."

Consumer Spending Drops Sharply In May (WP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

If Not for Higher Energy Costs, Retail Sales Would Have Been in Negative Territory

Consumers cut back sharply on their spending in May, providing further evidence that the economy is slowing, but it is still an open question whether the slowdown is coming soon enough to keep inflation under control.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that wholesale prices rose by 0.2 percent in May, a big drop from the past two months. But core inflation, excluding food and energy, increased 0.3 percent, faster than analysts had expected.

The Commerce Department reported that retail sales edged up only 0.1 percent last month and would have been in negative territory had it not been for a big rise in the price of gasoline.

Inflation worries and signs of a weakening economy meant another bad day on Wall Street. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 86.44 points to close at 10,706.14, erasing the last of its gains for this year.

Fears that higher inflation will trigger further interest rate increases from the Federal Reserve and contribute to a sharper U.S. economic slowdown are not only depressing U.S. investors but have contributed to a global stock sell-off in recent days.

Without the higher payout at gas stations, retail sales would have fallen 0.1 percent last month. The declines were widespread, with sales falling at auto dealerships, furniture stores and hardware stores. Sales at department stores and specialty clothing stores posted modest increases.

DOJ_NMG_0034306

Analysts said consumers, who have been the driving force in the four-year-old economic expansion, are beginning to flag in their shopping zeal under an array of adverse forces.

"With employment growth slowing, interest rates rising, stock prices falling, housing markets cooling and energy prices still elevated, there is much weighing on the minds of consumers," said Michael Gregory, an economist at BMO Nesbitt Burns, a Toronto investment bank.

Consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of total economic activity, helped the economy grow 5.3 percent in the first three months of the year. Analysts think economic growth will slow to around 3 percent in the current quarter, reflecting a weaker consumer sector.

"The persistence of high gasoline prices coupled with lower equity prices and badly bruised consumer sentiment will effectively take the wind out of the sales of real consumer spending in the second quarter," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., a private forecasting firm.

The tiny 0.1 percent rise in May retail sales was held back by a 1.6 percent drop in auto sales, weakness that has caused automakers to bring back incentive offers this month.

The small 0.2 percent increase in wholesale inflation was the best performance since a 1.3 percent drop in February. Food prices actually fell by 0.5 percent, and energy costs, which had jumped by 4 percent in April, slowed to a much smaller 0.4 percent rise in May.

But outside food and energy, price pressures mounted, with the 0.3 percent increase in core inflation coming after two moderate gains of 0.1 percent in March and April.

While this could raise concerns at the Federal Reserve, analysts said the more important inflation figure will be consumer prices for May, which are to be released today.

In advance of that report, economists were looking for overall prices to be up 0.4 percent, a slower pace than the 0.6 percent jump in April, and core consumer prices to show a modest 0.2 percent increase, down from a 0.3 percent rise in April.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke contributed to a 199-point drop in the Dow on June 5 when he called recent increases in inflation "unwelcome" developments, sending a signal that the central bank could boost rates for a 17th time at its June 28-29 meeting.

Dow Ditches Doldrums With Big Bounce (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK — The bleeding on Wall Street subsided Wednesday — at least for a day — with the Dow bouncing back more than 100 points and the Nasdaq composite breaking its eight-session losing streak.

The gains came despite a bigger-than-expected rise in consumer prices in May. Investors have been monitoring inflation data for any signs of an increase, since rising prices are likely to make it more difficult for the Federal Reserve to stop raising short-term interest rates.

The core consumer price index rose 0.3% in May, slightly higher than expected (story, 1A). However, investors shrugged off the news, since it merely confirmed earlier data, says Andy Brooks, head trader at T. Rowe Price.

“The market has sold off considerably in recent weeks, and a lot of the negative news on inflation was already priced into prices,” says Todd Leone, head of listed trading at SG Cowen. He added that it was important that the market held its big gains rather than selling off at the close.

Led by a 6.5% gain in aerospace giant Boeing, the Dow Jones industrial average gained 110.78 points, or 1.0%, to 10,816.92, which pushed it back into the black for 2006. Tuesday, the Dow closed with a year-to-date deficit for the first time since late January. The Nasdaq composite ended its eight-session skid, rising 13.53 points, or 0.7% to 2086.00. The Standard & Poor's 500 index added 6.35 points, or 0.5%, to 1230.04.

Still, it's too early to say stocks have bottomed out, adds Brooks, although he says the sell-off in the past few weeks has created some buying opportunities. Investors who “pick through the ruins might pick up some values,” he says.

The rally might have reflected belief that the worst of the stock market's slide is behind it, Goldman Sachs' chief U.S. investment strategist Abby Joseph Cohen said Wednesday.

Bank stocks fell amid worries that inflation will drive short-term interest rates higher and crimp bank profits. Bank of America lost 43 cents to $46.64, Citigroup sank 41 cents to $47.80, and JPMorgan Chase eased 56 cents to $39.97.

•Union Pacific rallied $1.08 to $87.59. The nation's largest railroad said mild weather helped it haul a record amount of coal during the first five months of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0034307

Dow Back In Positive Territory For Year (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK, June 14 -- Stocks rebounded Wednesday, pulling Wall Street out of a two-week decline that had wiped out the year's gains in every major indicator.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 110.78, or 1 percent, to 10,816.92. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 6.35, or 0.5 percent, to 1230.04, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 13.53, or 0.7 percent, to 2086. Wednesday gains put the Dow back into positive territory for the year, but the S&P 500 and the Nasdaq remain lower.

Stocks gained momentum in late afternoon trading after a largely lackluster session marked by mixed reactions to the Commerce Department's consumer price index inflation data. Consumer-level inflation grew in May at an annual rate of 2.4 percent, making another Federal Reserve rate hike a near certainty and putting an end to traders' fretting about the possibility.

The Wall Street adage "sell on the rumor, buy on the fact" held for most of the session. While broad indicators turned negative for part of the afternoon, they saw nothing like the dramatic sell-offs of previous sessions.

Bonds fell, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note rising to 5.06 percent from 4.97 percent late Tuesday. The U.S. dollar was down against most major currencies. Gold prices also fell, closing at $562.30 a troy ounce, far below their recent highs above $700.Movers

Boeing rose $5.03, to $82.01, after Singapore Airlines said it would buy 20 Boeing 787-9 aircraft for $4.52 billion, hours after it expressed unhappiness about delays in Airbus's delivery of its A380 superjumbo.

Bayer AG rose $3.07, to $41.28, following an agreement that could clear the way for Bayer to take over Schering.

Schering rose $2.54, to $111.55.

Tribune rose 89 cents, to $31.94, after the media company's second-largest shareholder called for a breakup of the company.

Taser International rose 55 cents, to $8.02, after Chairman Phillips W. Smith bought $762,000 worth of the stun-gun maker's stock.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 60.55, to 7780.33.

American Stock Exchange index rose 3.54, to 1814.11.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 4.37, to 677.09.Volume

NYSE: 2.82 billion shares, down from 3.31 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 10 to 9.

Nasdaq: 2.12 billion shares, down from 2.54 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 9 to 8.Commodities

Crude oil for July delivery: $69.14, up 58 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $562.30 a troy ounce, down from $562.50 on Tuesday.

Economy Expands, But Signs Show Slowing Growth (USAT)

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. economy expanded from mid-April to early June, amid warning signs of slower growth and rising costs, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

In its beige book, an anecdotal look at conditions named for the color of its cover, central bank economists noted that growth in economic activity slowed in four of the 12 Fed districts — Atlanta, Kansas City, Richmond and San Francisco. New York businesses were growing concerned about the outlook. Philadelphia firms were more optimistic.

In further evidence the record housing market is declining, 10 Fed districts reported slower existing home sales. Commercial real estate was surging, however, to the point that officials in the Boston, Chicago and Dallas districts warned of possible overinvestment in the sector. Consumer spending grew, but less quickly. Employers had trouble finding skilled workers, but wage pressures were generally mild.

Manufacturers were pinched by high materials and energy prices. Still, only four Fed districts said manufacturers had been able to raise selling prices, and just three districts said retailers had done so.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues will consider the beige book, along with other data including Wednesday's report that consumer inflation rose at a brisk clip in May (story, 1A), as they debate interest rate policy. Economists expect the Fed to raise rates a quarter point to 5.25% at its June 28-29 meeting. USA TODAY economics reporters Sue Kirchhoff and Barbara Hagenbaugh looked at the report.

Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, most of Connecticut. The economy expanded, with the software and information technology sector citing higher revenues. Tourism was brisk in the Boston area, reaching some of the highest levels since 1999-2000. Commercial real estate improved: Downtown Boston's vacancy rate fell to 10%. About half of manufacturers contacted said they had raised selling prices or plan to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0034308

New York, northern New Jersey, Fairfield County, Conn. Expansion was moderate, with businesses reporting "increasingly widespread cost pressures." Broadway attendance rose. New Jersey home builders lowered sales projections, and some let their options for new projects expire. Manhattan's rental market is picking up, though there is a rising supply of condos for sale. Construction employment is softening. Office markets were steady to better. Bankers see across-the-board weakening in loan demand.

Delaware, southern New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania. Conditions improved. The job market was good, and manufacturing expanded, though not as quickly as in previous months. Auto dealers expect sluggish sales through the end of 2006. Bank lending was good. Sales of homes in resort areas have dropped sharply. Manufacturers noted shortages and delays in delivery for metals, wood products and electronic components. College job recruiting was up over 2005.

Ohio, eastern Kentucky, western Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia. Most manufacturers had steady to increasing output, though activity at auto plants was notably below 2005. Commercial construction was up. About half the construction and manufacturing contacts were trying to recoup some of their higher costs. Firms were more successful in passing price increases on to smaller firms than larger customers. About a quarter of home builders raised prices to make up for higher materials costs, but a larger share sweetened sales incentives.

Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, southern West Virginia, District of Columbia. Activity expanded more slowly, as a decline in housing sales was joined by "some downshifting" in manufacturing and retail. A regional hardware and building supply chain got a boost as consumers bought generators and other products ahead of the coming hurricane season. Realtors said prices were holding steady, even though softening in home sales was more widespread.

Alabama, Florida, Georgia, eastern Tennessee, southern Louisiana, southern Mississippi. Activity was mixed. Some cruise lines offered discounts on late-summer cruises in the Caribbean, due to hurricane worries. Florida's tony resorts did booming business. Residential construction remained steady, though Florida condo sales weakened. A growing number of South Florida firms were having trouble finding workers, due to high housing costs.

Iowa, northern Indiana, northern Illinois, southern Michigan, southern Wisconsin. Consumer spending increased "modestly," as demand for clothing, lawn and garden items and electronics rose. Business travel to Chicago was up, in part because of strong convention activity. Firms reported a small net gain in hiring, and manufacturers said they were holding job fairs to find skilled workers for the first time in years. The housing market continued to slow. A few retailers said they were able to increase prices, but most said strong competition was making that difficult.

Arkansas, southern Illinois, southern Indiana, western Kentucky, northern Mississippi, eastern Missouri, western Tennessee. Car dealers in the district reported sales declines, and more than half said their inventories were too high, primarily for new cars. Manufacturers said they were concerned about increasing transportation costs. Contacts in the freight transportation, warehousing and utilities industries said they planned to expand operations in the region.

Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, upper Michigan, northern Wisconsin. The area economy "grew at a steady pace" marked by gains in consumer spending and tourism. The housing market continued to cool, with new listings in Minneapolis-St. Paul up 18% from a year ago, while pending sales were down 21%. Ethanol plants were springing up across the region. Wages increased slightly.

Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Wyoming, western Missouri, northern New Mexico. The job market continued to strengthen, and "wage pressures increased somewhat." Engineers, auto technicians, nurses, oil and gas workers and skilled manufacturing workers were reported to be in short supply. Drought conditions got worse. The winter wheat crop in some parts of the region was expected to be half that of last year.

Texas, northern Louisiana, southern New Mexico. Retailers reported mixed results. Sales were weakest at stores geared toward lower-income consumers, in part because of higher gas prices. Demand for lower-priced homes in the region also declined because of higher interest rates, rising energy prices and tighter lending standards. But housing activity continued to be "solid at very high levels." The job market continued to tighten as firms in both the manufacturing and services sectors were hiring.

Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington. Travel and tourism were "vigorous," as hotel occupancy rates were high and room rates rose. The housing market cooled significantly in the region except in Utah and the Pacific Northwest, where markets "remain hot." There was little upward pressure on wages in most occupations, and companies reported that strong competition and productivity gains meant they were not passing along higher prices to customers. Hiring slowed in parts of California.

DOJ_NMG_0034309

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Moping media

"June has been a miserable month for our left-wing media," New York Post columnist Ralph Peters writes.

"First, the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi forced the alleged 'massacre' at Haditha off Page One, frustrating media attempts to manufacture a sequel to Abu Ghraib. Then, President Bush made a midnight ride to Baghdad to put one very important pair of boots on the ground. He didn't hug the airport, either, but crossed the city to the Green Zone for a face-to-face with Iraq's new prime minister. It was a brave and inspiring act. And a worthy one," Mr. Peters said.

"Strategically wise, good for Iraqi and American morale -- and, yes, politically savvy -- the president's trip blew apart the media's effort to recover from their loss of Zarqawi. It also shut down their bid to refocus our attention on the suicides of three poor, deprived terrorists at Guantanamo -- thugs we're expected to mourn as victims of our inhumanity. Hate-America journalists just can't get a break these days.

"But they're still trying. One cable-news anchor [Tuesday] asked if Bush's visit to Iraq was a 'publicity stunt.' Her own network's correspondent shot that down, on-air. True reporters know a missile can kill a president as easily as a private. The Gitmo suicide-trifecta was the real publicity stunt. This accurate statement should never have been retracted: It was an act of asymmetrical warfare. And every save-the-terrorists jerk behind a mike knows it in his or her shriveled bleeding heart."

An opportunity

"Presidents rarely recover from second-term slumps, but President Bush may be on the verge of at least a modest upturn and perhaps a strong recovery," Fred Barnes writes at www.weeklystandard.com.

"For sure, his plunge in job approval over the past year has been halted. He's bottomed out. But how significant will his recovery be and how durable? Those are the questions," Mr. Barnes said.

"The Bush decline in 2005 and 2006 was caused, in part, by intensified terrorist attacks in Iraq, the failure of his Social Security reform initiative, and bad luck in the form of hurricane Katrina and the Dubai ports deal. The president's approval rating in the Gallup Poll plummeted from 51 percent on the day of his second inauguration to 31 percent in May, 16 months later.

"But in recent days, Bush has been blessed with good news. Last week, Americans found and killed the chief jihadist in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, eliminating the top strategist and operational leader of the insurgency. And on Monday, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald informed Karl Rove, one of Bush's most influential advisers, that he has no plans to seek an indictment of Rove in the case of a CIA official whose name was disclosed to the press."

"[And] in the bellwether special House election in San Diego last week, Democrats failed to pull off an upset and capture the Republican-leaning district. The Democratic candidate got the usual Democratic vote, suggesting a Democratic landslide is unlikely in the midterm election on Nov. 7."

Decision time

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, warily watching his primary challenger advance in the polls, must soon decide whether to start collecting signatures for a possible independent bid this November.

Mr. Lieberman's campaign says it is focused only on winning the Aug. 8 primary, but the Democrat has not ruled out petitioning his way onto the November ballot as part of a backup plan to secure a fourth term in the Senate.

"I am not going to close out any options," the senator recently told reporters.

Mr. Lieberman has until Aug. 9 -- the day after the Democratic primary -- to collect 7,500 signatures from registered voters to gain a spot on the ballot as an unaffiliated candidate.

But any effort to gather signatures before the primary would be a sign of weakness, indicating that Mr. Lieberman, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2000, fears that he could lose to businessman Ned Lamont, the Associated Press said. The effort also would rile Democrats who already question Mr. Lieberman's party loyalty and his perceived closeness to President Bush.

The senator has been a strong backer of the Iraq war.

Bill's big bucks

Life after the White House has proven lucrative for Bill Clinton, who made nearly $7.5 million in speaking fees last year and sometimes earned as much as $350,000 for a single appearance.

Mr. Clinton earned $650,000 for just two appearances in two days before major gatherings in Canada by motivational speaker Tony Robbins, according to the financial-disclosure report filed yesterday by his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0034310

In 2004, Mr. Clinton earned just $875,000 for speeches as he recovered from heart-bypass surgery and finished his memoirs. Last year, he made eight times as much on the speech circuit, the Associated Press reports.

Spokesman Jay Carson said the former president had "an exceptionally busy schedule" and paid speeches were sandwiched around charity work on global HIV/AIDS, childhood obesity and other causes.

"Between the foundation and work on Katrina and the tsunami, paid speeches are actually a very small part of his schedule," Mr. Carson said.

'The shade look'

President Bush, who often teases members of the White House press corps, apologized yesterday after he poked fun at a reporter for wearing sunglasses without realizing they were needed to stem vision loss, the Associated Press reports.

The exchange occurred at a press conference in the Rose Garden. Mr. Bush called on Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Wallsten and asked whether he was going to ask his question with his "shades" on.

"For the viewers, there's no sun," Mr. Bush said to the television cameras.

But even though the sun was behind the clouds, Mr. Wallsten still needs sunglasses because he has Stargardt's disease, a form of macular degeneration that causes progressive vision loss. The condition causes Mr. Wallsten to be sensitive to glare and even on a cloudy day can cause pain and increase the loss of sight.

Mr. Wallsten said Mr. Bush called his cellular phone later in the day to apologize and tell him that he didn't know he had the disease. Mr. Wallsten said he interrupted and told the president that no apology was necessary and that he didn't feel offended because he hadn't told anyone at the White House about his condition.

"He said, 'I needle you guys out of affection,' " Mr. Wallsten said. "I said, 'I understand that, but I don't want you to treat me any differently because of this.' "

Mr. Wallsten said the president told him that he would not treat him differently, so Mr. Wallsten encouraged him to "needle away."

"[Mr. Bush] said, 'I will. Next time, I'll just use a different needle,' " the reporter said.

Mr. Wallsten said he thought that was a pretty good line. And said his only complaint is that the president didn't answer his question at the press conference.

•Greg Pierce can be reached at 202/636-3285 or gpierce@washington times.com.

Lieberman Weighs Re-election Bid Options (AP)

By Susan Haigh, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman, warily watching his primary challenger advance in the polls, must soon decide whether to start collecting signatures for a possible independent bid this November.

Lieberman's campaign contends that it's focused only on winning the Aug. 8 primary, but the Democrat has not ruled out petitioning his way onto the November ballot as part of a backup plan to secure a fourth term in the Senate.

"I am not going to close out any options," the senator recently told reporters.

Lieberman's spokeswoman, Marion Steinfels, said he is "already the party's endorsed candidate and on Aug. 8 he will win the primary, the Democratic primary."

Lieberman has until Aug. 9 — the day after the Democratic primary — to collect 7,500 signatures from registered voters to gain a spot on the ballot as an unaffiliated candidate.

But any effort to gather signatures before the primary would be a sign of weakness, indicating that Lieberman, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2000, fears that he could lose to businessman Ned Lamont. The effort also would rile Democrats who already question Lieberman's party loyalty and his perceived closeness to President Bush.

The senator has been a strong backer of the Iraq war.

Christopher Kukk, an associate political science professor at Western Connecticut State University, said it's a risk Lieberman may be willing to take as Lamont continues to make gains in the polls.

"I think he'll alienate Democratic voters, but to be honest with you, I think he already has alienated Democratic voters," Kukk said. "If Lamont is gaining ... I think you'll see Lieberman jump."

According to a recent Quinnipiac University Poll, 57 percent of registered Democrats in Connecticut said they would vote for Lieberman, compared to 32 percent for Lamont. A month ago, Lieberman drew 65 percent to Lamont's 19 percent.

The poll found that if Lieberman runs as an independent, he would win with 56 percent of the vote, compared to 18 percent for Lamont and 8 percent for Republican Alan Schlesinger. Lieberman enjoys higher ratings among Republicans and unaffiliated voters than Democrats, the poll found. Unaffiliated voters are the state's largest bloc of voters, followed by Democrats and then Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0034311

Lamont, a multimillionaire owner of a cable television company, launched an ad campaign this week asking for Lieberman's support should he win the primary, and promising to back Lieberman should the senator prevail.

"What do you say, Senator?" Lamont asks in the radio ad. "May the best Democrat win."

Lamont's campaign manager, Tom Swan, said Democrats want to know what Lieberman will do.

"If Joe Lieberman is considering abandoning the Democratic Party, the people have a right to know it," Swan said. "Ned is agreeing to abide by the process and respect the choice of the people. Will Joe?"

No matter what Lieberman does, Kukk said he believes the veteran senator will win re-election. Lieberman still enjoys a strong lead over Lamont, and Kukk said if Lieberman runs as an unaffiliated candidate, it likely won't hurt him with the general electorate because party loyalty isn't very strong anymore.

"I think they are thinking of it," Kukk said of a possible Lieberman independent run. "If you're looking for your political survival, you'd be silly not to."

Webb Poses Challenge To Allen In Va. Race (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, June 15, 2006

National Democratic leaders on Wednesday relished the prospect of James Webb, a war hero and former Reagan Navy secretary, challenging Republican Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record) this November. But beating Allen, a well-liked former Virginia governor who's also weighing a White House bid, will be a struggle, even for a Republican-turned-Democrat with Webb's made-for-the-movies portfolio.

With the blessing of leading Senate Democrats, Webb, 60, beat party stalwart and traditional liberal Harris Miller, thanks to overwhelming support in the suburbs of Washington, D.C., where congressional politics resonate.

"If you had to construct a candidate who would be a great opponent to Allen, it would be Jim Webb," Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y. and chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said in an interview Wednesday.

"On some positions, he's conservative. On some others, he's more moderate. But he is who he is. He's genuine," said Schumer, who gave Webb the DSCC's rare preprimary endorsement.

National party leaders, including Schumer, Democratic chairman Howard Dean, 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry and former Gov. Mark R. Warner, a 2008 presidential prospect, have all pledged financial and campaign support.

Unlike most Democratic candidates, Webb is pursuing a populist strategy aimed at returning so-called "Reagan Democrats" — moderate, middle-class and largely rural whites — to the Democratic Party.

Those voters have been unshakably loyal to the folksy, cowboy-booted Allen in two successful statewide campaigns and Allen remains formidable as he seeks re-election.

As of late May, he had about $7.5 million on hand to barely $220,000 for Webb. Allen is already running television ads, something Webb has never done. Allen's come-from-behind election as governor in 1993 rescued the GOP from irrelevance and began its resurgence in Virginia, giving him an enormous base of volunteers. He's the one Virginia Republican who thoroughly unifies the party's feuding moderate and conservative wings.

Webb remains unknown to most Virginia voters despite his White House experience and the six best-selling war novels he's written. That gives Allen the opportunity to define Webb before Webb can, said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams.

"We don't know where Webb is on the issues. He's taken two positions on immigration reform, three or four different positions on affirmative action, two positions on gay marriage," Wadhams said.

"He's even taken two positions on George Allen," Wadhams said with a chuckle, noting that Webb endorsed Allen for the Senate in 2000.

Webb is a key player in the Democrats' fall strategy to win the six seats necessary to take control of the Senate. He calls Allen a rubber stamp for President Bush on Iraq, a crushing federal debt and economic policies that Webb says punish the middle class.

"This raises the visibility of the Virginia Senate race in national politics and it at least makes it competitive," said Merle Black, professor of politics at Emory University in Atlanta. "Allen's still expected to win, but at least he has to work for it now."

If the race is an referendum on Iraq in particular, Webb brings credibility to the debate.

In newspaper columns he wrote in 2002, Webb warned of a Vietnam-style quagmire in Iraq, where U.S. troops would be viewed as an occupying force. After the invasion, he broke with the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0034312

Webb was wounded commanding a Marine rifle company in Vietnam's bloodiest fighting. Now he campaigns in the buff-colored desert combat boots his son, a Marine, will wear in Iraq this fall.

Webb's war record is "beyond reproach," said Christopher LaCivita, architect of the 2004 Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

"But he's wrong on the issues. We know Webb opposed the war, but where do we go from here?" said LaCivita, a trusted Allen adviser who is also a Marine combat veteran. "It's very easy to be against something, but what are you for? We don't know because Webb hasn't articulated that."

Allen Faces A Unifier With Webb In Race (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Sen. George Allen's seat once seemed so safe that Democrats were searching for candidates to challenge him, but national heavy-hitters are now saying James H. Webb Jr.'s win in the Democratic primary Tuesday should have the Republicans running scared.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who voted for Mr. Allen in 2000, has the full support of the local and national Democratic machines as he tries to unseat the incumbent in the November election, party leaders said yesterday.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) added the Virginia seat to its list of potential Republican grabs.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat who heads the DSCC, said primary voters bucked conventional wisdom and chose the more electable candidate by picking Mr. Webb over longtime local party activist Harris N. Miller.

"The victory by Jim Webb is a sure sign that Virginia is really ready to dump George Allen," Mr. Schumer told reporters, noting that Mr. Webb attracts "Bush voters and Reagan Democrats."

Mr. Miller, a technology lobbyist, won the backing of many state legislators, while Mr. Webb attracted Washington Democrats, including 2004 Democratic presidential nominee Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Mr. Miller and the local activists said they will join Mr. Webb in trying to beat Mr. Allen.

"I think he can win this thing," said Virginia Senate Minority Leader Richard L. Saslaw, Fairfax County Democrat, who previously endorsed Mr. Miller.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Brian J. Moran, who remained neutral in the race, predicted that Democrats would rally around Mr. Webb. "We will be very united," the Alexandria Democrat said.

Former Gov. Mark Warner, the state's most popular politician, will lend his support to Mr. Webb, said Warner spokeswoman Ellen Qualls.

Mr. Warner, who also is exploring a presidential bid, didn't endorse either candidate but raised money for both before the primary.

"The governor is going to do his part. He believes the senator is vulnerable," Miss Qualls said.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat who also didn't endorse any candidate in the primary, said: "I look forward to working with [Mr. Webb] during the upcoming campaign."

Mr. Allen, 54, has served as state delegate, a U.S. representative and Virginia governor, an office limited to one term by the state constitution. He ousted Democratic incumbent Sen. Charles S. Robb from his seat in Congress in 2000.

Mr. Webb, 60, a former Marine and decorated Vietnam veteran, was President Reagan's Secretary of the Navy. He left the Republican Party because he opposes the war in Iraq, and he felt the party is too extreme on social issues. His 25-year-old son, Jim, is heading to Iraq later this year.

Mr. Webb, also a best-selling author, never has run for elected office.

Some Democrats said privately that Mr. Webb needs a campaign overhaul because his primary operation made him appear to be disorganized and less energized than Mr. Miller.

Mr. Schumer said the DSCC is working with all Senate campaigns to make sure they have top-notch staffs.

Mr. Webb will need help with fundraising. He had less than $220,000, as of May 24.

Mr. Allen already has dipped into his $7.5 million campaign war chest to air a television advertisement in the expensive Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads markets.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said Mr. Webb had no chance at winning the primary before the national endorsements, which now make him "beholden" to Washington Democrats.

Mr. Allen, who led the Republican senate campaign arm in 2004 when the party strengthened its majority, has long predicted that national Democrats with a grudge against him will funnel cash into Virginia.

He has further attracted national Democratic ire by traveling to key states such as Iowa and New Hampshire in what many view as an early attempt to test the presidential waters for 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0034313

Mr. Webb and Mr. Miller have criticized Mr. Allen for his national travel, a theme that is sure to continue through the campaign.

Democrats Can't Get Enough Of Newt Gingrich's Slogan (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, June 15, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) raised eyebrows Tuesday when she used a campaign phrase suggested for the Democrats early this year by former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

But it turns out that Pelosi is not alone.

Democratic candidates for Congress across the country have been employing the phrase "Had Enough?" in speeches and on their campaign websites.

After national Democrats unveiled their 2006 slogan, "Together We Can Do Better," Gingrich in March said Democrats would be better off using "Had Enough?"

A month later, former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.) wrote an op-ed in The New York Times urging Democrats to embrace the phrase "Had Enough? Vote Democratic!"

In an interview yesterday, Roemer said the idea for the op-ed came to him after reading a story about Harry Truman that recounted that an advertising executive in 1946 suggested "Had Enough?" to the Republican Party, which adopted the slogan. Later that year, Republicans gained control of both chambers of Congress.

During her speech to the liberal group Campaign for America's Future this week, Pelosi asked the crowd, "Have you had enough?"

"Yeah!" the crowd replied, as it did to each of her "had enough" questions:

"Have you had enough of a war that has failed to make America more secure? Have you had enough of paying higher prices for gasoline and prescription drugs in order to increase the profits of pharmaceutical and oil companies? Have you had enough of seeing America led in the wrong direction?"

She concluded, "I thought so."

The campaign slogan of Ed Perlmutter, running in the Democratic primary in Colorado's 7th District, is "Had Enough? Time for a change." The incumbent in that district, Republican Bob Beauprez, is retiring.

Perlmutter told The Hill that he is not following Gingrich's lead but added, "I haven't liked a lot of things [Gingrich] has done. I'll take that."

If he wins the primary, Perlmutter would face Republican Rick O'Donnell — who used to work for Gingrich's Progress and Freedom Foundation.

Other Democratic candidates who have used the "Had Enough?" phrase include Lois Murphy, who is looking to defeat Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.), and Dr. David Hunter, who is facing an uphill battle to replace retiring Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.).

But it didn't help certain Democrats in their quest for Congress. Ken Longmyer and Ron Shapiro, who favored the "Had Enough?" slogan, lost in their recent primaries in Virginia and Mississippi, respectively.

Spokespeople for these candidates disputed any connection to Gingrich, with some of them noting that the phrase is common in the English language.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), however, acknowledged Gingrich's help — and praised it. During a speech in Ohio earlier this month, Obama said, "I never thought that I'd hear myself say this at a Democratic Party dinner, but Newt Gingrich made a great point the other day" on the "Had Enough?" slogan.

Obama then attracted several standing ovations by using the phrase on port security, healthcare and U.S. dependence on oil.

Democratic strategist James Carville can also claim credit for the phrase. He wrote a book published in 2003 titled Had Enough? A Handbook for Fighting Back.

Regardless, there are some Democrats who believe that "Had Enough?" is better than "Together We Can Do Better."

Liberal commentator Arianna Huffington has called for Democrats to dump "Together We Can Do Better," calling it the "lamest" message she could imagine, according to a report in The Washington Post.

Gingrich told The Hill this week that his advice to Democrats rankled some of his Republican colleagues but added that he is concerned that the GOP is not evolving. He said the reason why Democrats stayed in the majority for decades before 1994 was because they were constantly coming up with new ideas.

Alexander Bolton, Elana Schor and Natalie McGill contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0034314

Bill Richardson: Looking Like A Go For 2008 (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg, Roll Call Contributing Writer

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Officially, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) is focused on his November re-election race, even though it's expected to be relatively easy. And as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association, Richardson also hopes to lead his party to a gain of at least a few more governorships.

But some Democratic insiders insist that Richardson has more on his mind than that. They say he is telling friends and political allies that he has decided to run for president in 2008.

When I spoke with the governor recently, he would only say, "After November, I will reassess my plan." But Richardson, 58, has long been mentioned for higher office as part of a Democratic national ticket, and I'd be flabbergasted if he didn't take the presidential plunge for 2008.

In 1984, less than two years after he was elected to a new Congressional district created by reapportionment and redistricting, Richardson already was being touted as a possible Senate candidate against Republican Sen. Pete Domenici.

Richardson never made that run, but he subsequently built an unusually impressive political résumé that includes everything from New Mexico Democratic Party executive director, Member of Congress, secretary of Energy, ambassador to the United Nations and chairman of the 2004 Democratic National Convention. He even has served as a hostage-release negotiator.

Then, in 2002, he was elected governor of New Mexico.

More than 20 years ago, observers tagged Richardson as a political up-and-comer, and they were right.

The 1984 edition of the Almanac of American Politics said he "is obviously a young man in a hurry, and one with a well-developed sense of political strategy." Only 10 years later, Congressional Quarterly's Politics in America referred to him as "one of the nation's top Hispanic politicians."

Now, savvy political insiders in the state give Richardson high marks as governor, praising his "bold initiatives," his willingness to take on challenging issues and his ability to sell his agenda. "He is a huge salesman, and a very good one," said one observer.

As governor, he has supported a state income tax cut for most New Mexico residents and has taken steps to cut the state's considerable driving-while-intoxicated rate. He has declared 2006 the "Year of the Child" in the state and offered an agenda that promotes children's health, education and safety — not a bad platform from which to launch a national campaign.

Whether because of Richardson's policies or just plain good luck, New Mexico's economy has been strong, another considerable asset if he makes a White House run.

The governor's greatest asset as a presidential candidate is the breadth of his political experience. He has been in the political trenches as a political operative and as an aide to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; served as a legislator; had executive experience as governor; and has been involved in formulating and articulating U.S. foreign policy. Few other Democratic contenders are likely to have such experience.

What sets Richardson apart from other potential presidential hopefuls, however, is the fact that he is a Hispanic. Richardson's mother was Mexican, and he was raised in Mexico City. He is fluent in Spanish and is very popular in the Hispanic community.

Richardson's ethnicity could be a powerful asset in states such as New Mexico, Arizona, Florida and even Texas — all states with significant Hispanic populations, and all states carried by President Bush in 2004.

Richardson is also widely regarded as an extremely likable, down-to-earth guy. Unlike some recent (unsuccessful) Democratic presidential nominees who proved to be cold, distant and even artificial, the New Mexico Democrat connects with people.

But Richardson is not without his vulnerabilities.

He had to admit that he had misled people into believing that he was drafted by a Major League Baseball organization (the Kansas City Athletics) in 1966. When an investigation by the Albuquerque Journal found no evidence the he had been drafted by anyone, Richardson acknowledged that he might have been mistaken and was told that he could or would be drafted. Richardson pitched for Tufts University, a Division III school that is better known for its academics than its sports program.

More importantly, Washington, D.C., insiders who have observed Richardson for years raise questions about his self-discipline. They say he overextends himself and often loses focus. And they whisper that he hasn't always carried himself in a style befitting a high elected official.

In December 2005, the Albuquerque Journal carried a front-page article on Richardson's penchant for touching people.

"He hugs, pokes, jabs and tickles. If he sees a man with a bald pate, he rubs it," wrote staff writer Leslie Linthicum.

DOJ_NMG_0034315

The piece quoted Lt. Gov. Diane Denish (D) as saying that his touching and poking is “irritating and annoying,” and that she tries to avoid the physical contact by “trying not to stand or sit next to him.”

“It’s my way of connecting to people,” the governor told the newspaper when asked about his tendency to touch people. “I guess that’s what I get for being friendly,” he added.

But Richardson’s physicality is part of a potentially larger problem. Even admirers acknowledge that he can sometimes be “sophomoric” and overly informal.

But Richardson’s informality also reflects his “regular guy” persona that many voters and reporters will likely find so appealing. (Some state lawmakers, no doubt, would add that the nice-guy governor can be an overpowering bully when he wants to get his way.)

The New Mexico governor is a man of considerable talent. Measured by commitments, money and organization in the early states, Richardson starts behind many of the other contenders for the Democratic nomination. But his résumé and charisma have the potential to carry him a long way in the race. He’s worth keeping an eye on.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Name That Candidate (NYT)

By Calvin Trillin

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

MY excitement at the news that Senator Chris Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, is considering a bid for president in 2008 is easy to explain: his name has enormous rhyming potential. We all have our own issues.

Rhyme is not my only one; I am also intensely interested in meter. I happen to be a deadline poet, responsible for commenting on the events of the day in verse. Someone in my position tends to see Ross Perot and John McCain as two peas in a pod — blessedly iambic candidates with nearly unlimited rhyming possibilities. During my 16 years in the deadline poetry game, though, we've had nobody with a name like Ross Perot or John McCain in the White House. I've had to deal with presidents whose names are an affront to rhyme and meter. Given the rhyming difficulties of Bill Clinton's name, in fact, I believe future historians will think of him as the "orange" of American presidents.

It's not as if a deadline poet has an easy lot to begin with. Obviously there are those constant deadlines. Without wanting to knock the competition, I might just point out that, say, the romantic poets — Wordsworth and that crowd — could mosey along the countryside for days without feeling any pressure at all to come up with a sunset they considered worth writing about.

Also, the pay is limited. Two years ago, it was revealed that National Review was paying its deadline poet, William H. von Dreele, precisely the same per poem as The Nation magazine pays me — $100. I was shaken by that news.

For years, I've referred to the editor who retained my services for the Nation as "the wily and parsimonious Victor S. Navasky," but I'd always thought that National Review's William F. Buckley Jr. was, whatever our political differences, a considerate and generous-hearted man. I could only conclude that society as a whole undervalues deadline poets. Given those burdens, the last thing we deserved was a second president whose name rhymes with almost nothing beyond "push" and "tush."

I don't want to appear unappreciative. At times George W. Bush has seemed interested in making my life easier. He must have known before the appointments were made, for instance, that Condoleezza Rice's name fits exactly into the meter of "The March of the Siamese Children" from "The King and I" ("Condoleezza Rice, who is cold as ice, is precise with her advice") and that Alberto Gonzales rhymes with "loyal über alles."

Still, as the names of potential 2008 presidential candidates begin to get tossed around, you can't blame us for looking forward to having someone in the Oval Office who is more compatible with our needs. That is why I groan every time the eminently rhymable Bill Frist shoots himself in the foot. That is why I keep trying to reassure myself that the Republican base would never permit the nomination of Rudolph Giuliani. That is why, in a conversation about the possibility that the governor of Massachusetts could enter the race, I might burst out, "To me, Romney is just another Clinton."

Reading about the renewed interest lately in Al Gore, whom I once referred to in a poem as "a man-like object," I have to admit that his name rhymes with more than "bore" and "snore." My worries about the Democrats go beyond the growing sense that their leading candidate is literally another Clinton. They have a tendency to thrust forward candidates whose names we can't even imagine at this point in the process; witness Jimmy Carter and Howard Dean.

In my more pessimistic contemplations of the 2008 campaign, I see myself telling some political operative that I've made my peace with the possibility that the Democrats, desperate for some charisma, could turn to Barack Obama — a man whose rhymes I long ago used up in trying to deal with Osama bin Laden.

"But Obama's not the only Illinois contender," the operative says. "There's also the governor."

"The governor?"

DOJ_NMG_0034316

"The governor," he repeats. "Rod Blagojevich."

Emergency System Called Very Ill (USAT)

By Robert Davis, Usa Today

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's emergency medical system — from the 911 centers that take phone calls for help to the emergency rooms that have become primary treatment centers for millions of Americans — is in a dangerous state of crisis, says a new series of landmark reports.

The Institute of Medicine on Wednesday released the Future of Emergency Care reports, which were prepared by a 40-member board after a two-year investigation. The IOM advises the government on science, medical and health issues.

The reports warn that the U.S. lifesaving system is not only failing to handle daily emergencies but also could break down in the face of national disasters, including hurricanes, disease outbreaks or terrorist attacks.

“We are not prepared,” says Brent Eastman, a board member and chief medical officer at Scripps Health in San Diego. “We struggle to survive day-to-day.”

Nels Sanddal, board member and president of the Critical Illness and Trauma Foundation in Bozeman, Mont., agrees. “To ramp up” to treat high numbers of patients, he says, “we have to have backbone.”

The reports say that, on average, in every minute of every day an ambulance carrying a patient is turned away from a hospital on “diversion,” when an emergency room says it's too full to take more patients.

That must end, says Arthur Kellermann, director of the Center for Injury Control at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta. “We cannot let the most time-sensitive portal in the hospital get gridlocked.”

The IOM reports detail how hundreds of thousands of lives are affected every year by EMS deficiencies that are not obvious. “What the public perceives and what is real, in many cases, there is a disconnect,” says Gail Warden, president emeritus of the Henry Ford Health System in Detroit, who chaired the panel. “In most communities, there is a crisis under the surface.”

Many emergency rooms barely can handle their daily patient loads, children don't always get good care, and the quality of rescue services is erratic, the reports say.

And geography determines survival.

“There is a wide disparity,” says Shirley Gamble, a United Way board member in Austin. She cited a 2003 USA TODAY probe that found a 10-fold difference between major cities in cardiac arrest survival rates.

The reports say that by following the lead of those cities that save more lives, entire regions can raise the quality of their care.

Improvements to emergency medical services, Eastman says, “should be built on islands of excellence that exist today.”

Crisis Seen In Nation's ER Care (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Capacity, Expertise Are Found Lacking

Emergency medical care in the United States is on the verge of collapse, with the nation's declining number of emergency rooms dangerously overcrowded and often unable to provide the expertise needed to treat seriously ill people in a safe and efficient manner.

That's the grim conclusion of three reports released yesterday by the Institute of Medicine, the product of an extensive two-year look at emergency care.

Long waits for treatment are epidemic, the reports said, with ambulances sometimes idling for hours to unload patients. Once in the ER, patients sometimes wait up to two days to be admitted to a hospital bed.

As a system, U.S. emergency care lacks stability and the capacity to respond to large disasters or epidemics, according to the 25 experts who conducted the study. It provides care of variable and often unknown quality and depends on the willingness of doctors and hospitals to lose large amounts of money.

Fixing the problems is likely to cost billions of dollars and will require the leadership of a new federal agency, which Congress should create in the next two years, they wrote.

"This is a crisis that could jeopardize everyone in this room, and all their loved ones," A. Brent Eastman, a surgeon and chief medical officer of the ScrippsHealth hospitals in San Diego, said at a daylong conference on the reports, which were prepared by the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0034317

"There is just such a gap between what the public knows, or thinks it knows, and the reality. And it is getting worse," said Robert B. Giffin, the Institute of Medicine staffer who headed the study.

The reports -- on hospital ERs, on pediatric emergency care and on pre-hospital care given by ambulance services -- were embraced by the 24,000-member American College of Emergency Physicians, and its president said that the endorsement was telling.

"What other industry says, 'Hey, look at us, our whole system is broken'?" said the group's president, Frederick C. Blum, a physician in Morgantown, W.Va.

Two key steps for improving emergency care are regional planning and creating a standard way to measure outcomes, so that low-quality ERs and ambulance services can be identified and fixed, the committee wrote.

Emergency medical care is a legal right for all Americans. Under a law enacted in 1986, emergency rooms must evaluate and stabilize anyone who shows up. That requirement -- bolstered by physicians' ethical duty to treat the ill -- has made hospital emergency departments subject to unique pressures.

From 1993 to 2003, the U.S. population grew by 12 percent but emergency room visits grew by 27 percent, from 90 million to 114 million. In that same period, however, 425 emergency departments closed, along with about 700 hospitals and nearly 200,000 beds.

ERs are notorious money losers. About 14 percent of ER patients are uninsured. About 16 percent are covered by Medicaid, the federal-state insurance program for the poor, and 21 percent by Medicare, the program for the elderly. More than half of hospitals report losing money on emergency care of both groups of government-insured patients.

All of this has led to extreme bottlenecks in ERs, manifested by delays in every step of treatment, according to the reports.

In 2003, 501,000 ambulances were diverted from the hospital where they normally would have delivered a patient because the ER was full. In 2004, 70 percent of urban hospitals reported that their emergency departments had been "on diversion" at least once.

Nationwide, about 14 percent of ER patients end up admitted to the hospital. A study by the Government Accountability Office in 2003 found that 20 percent of emergency departments had to "board" patients in hallways or other temporary space, for an average of eight hours, before a bed opened. The American College of Emergency Physicians several years ago surveyed 90 emergency departments on a single Monday evening. Seventy-three percent reported that they had two or more patients boarding.

A 2004 study found that ERs at university-based hospitals were classified as crowded 35 percent of the time, meaning all emergency beds were occupied, patients were in the hallways, the waiting room was full, and the waiting time for treatment was more than one hour.

Another hazard largely unrecognized by Americans is that hospitals, especially in rural areas, often cannot find specialists such as orthopedic surgeons and neurosurgeons willing to cover the ER.

In some cases, this is because doctors are unwilling to treat high-risk patients with complicated ailments, many of them uninsured, at inconvenient times. Sometimes it is simply a function of shortages. In 2002, there were fewer practicing neurosurgeons in the United States (about 3,000) than a decade earlier.

Largely unknown is the human cost of these problems.

Many studies have shown that high-stress, chaotic environments contribute to errors. One from 1991 showed that though relatively few "adverse outcomes" occur in the ER, it was the site of 70 percent of those attributable to negligence.

The number of deaths caused by a delay in treatment or lack of expertise is especially uncertain, though it may not be small. San Diego established a trauma system in 1984 after autopsies of accident victims who died after reaching the ER suggested that 22 percent of the deaths were preventable, said Eastman, one of the Institute of Medicine committee members.

Trauma care in many ways is the model on which the committee hopes the emergency care system will be rebuilt.

Some states and urban areas have systems in which the level of trauma care every hospital is capable of providing is known and a centralized dispatching agency directs patients based on real-time information about each hospital's capacity and staffing.

Although the vast majority of ER patients have not suffered trauma, about half need attention within an hour of arrival at the hospital, according to a study in 2003. Because not every hospital or even every city can provide all services, "the committee supports further regionalization of emergency care services," the authors wrote.

Even without systemwide reform, hospitals can do many things to make the flow of patients more efficient and to be ready for predictable spikes in demand, said Benjamin K. Chu, an ER physician and regional president of a Kaiser Health Plan in California who was also on the expert panel.

DOJ_NMG_0034318

The report on ambulance service called for standardizing the training of paramedics and creating guidelines for pre-hospital care based on research.

The report on pediatric care emphasized that 27 percent of ER patients are children and that many hospitals lack the expertise or the equipment to meet the needs of those who are critically ill.

The District's emergency and trauma services measure up well. A report this year gave the city an A-plus in "its support of an emergency care system."

Though the assessment was somewhat skewed by the District's compact geography and urban makeup, population-adjusted numbers showed more emergency departments, board-certified emergency doctors, hospital-staffed beds and trauma centers than in any state, and probably more than in many local jurisdictions, although the report did not look so narrowly.

Still, the American College of Emergency Physicians noted, emergency services in the city "are regularly reaching their capacity, and patients are frequently and increasingly diverted to other facilities." In 2004, for example, Washington Hospital Center's ER was "on diversion" for nearly 2,100 hours. Howard University Hospital's ER turned away patients for the same reasons for almost 1,200 hours.

Staff writer Susan Levine contributed to this report.

Stopwatch Ticking For Dan Rather (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

CBS to Drop Ex-Anchor From '60 Minutes'

NEW YORK -- CBS executives have decided there is no future role at the network for Dan Rather, making it certain that the man who sat in the anchor chair for 24 years will depart by this fall.

These executives recognize Rather's contributions over four decades and are not trying to boot him because of the controversy surrounding his botched story on President Bush and the National Guard, say network sources who declined to be named while discussing a sensitive personnel matter. But the executives concluded there was no room for Rather at "60 Minutes," particularly with incoming anchor Katie Couric planning to report a half-dozen stories a year and the hiring of CNN's Anderson Cooper as a part-time contributor.

Rather's contract expires in November, but the sources say he might leave before that, depending on negotiations with CBS.

Rather, 74, declined to discuss his future this week. "I'm contracted to be a full-time '60 Minutes' correspondent, and I'm working on that contract," he said. People familiar with Rather's situation say he has had no serious negotiations with any of the cable networks but has attracted interest from people developing projects for television.

Rather has said several times that "my best work is still ahead of me." He is described by friends as hurt and puzzled by the attitude of CBS management.

Rather joined "60 Minutes II" after leaving the anchor job in March 2005, and was shifted to the original Sunday night program when the weekday edition was canceled months later. But with the Sunday program's team of correspondents -- Ed Bradley, Morley Safer, Lesley Stahl and Steve Kroft -- having been joined by such former "60 II" reporters as Scott Pelley and Bob Simon and part-timers such as Lara Logan, executive producer Jeff Fager has a glut of contributors.

Rather has done eight pieces for the program this season, ranging from interviews with Bill Clinton and George Clooney to a segment on the Whole Foods grocery chain to a report on his visit to North Korea. But with "60 Minutes" largely in reruns for the summer, Rather has had little to do since then and is not in the program's plans for the fall season.

Some CBS staffers are sad about the turn of events, viewing it as a difficult moment for a man who once interviewed world leaders and went into war zones for the network. They question why the network can't find a suitable place for Rather in light of his long service to CBS.

The CBS executives hope a dignified exit can be arranged and that Rather can find a second career, perhaps in cable, the sources say. But they also believe that with Couric debuting as anchor in September, the news division needs to move on from the Rather era. And the fallout over his 2004 piece alleging that the Guard had given Bush favorable treatment -- based on documents that the network later acknowledged could not be authenticated -- has been a complicating factor.

Rather has accumulated his share of detractors at the network over the years. Mike Wallace, the "60 Minutes" veteran who recently relinquished his full-time duties, has said Rather should have resigned over the Guard story in a gesture of solidarity with his colleagues who worked on the segment. Three top CBS News executives quit under pressure, and Rather's producer Mary Mapes was fired, after an independent panel found that they had "failed miserably" to verify the disputed documents and that some had made misleading statements in defending the story.

DOJ_NMG_0034319

Rather, who apologized on the air for the segment, relinquished the anchor chair earlier than he had planned. He made the announcement weeks before the panel, headed by former U.S. attorney general Dick Thornburgh and former Associated Press chief executive Lou Boccardi, released its findings.

CBS is also trying to attract a younger audience for "60 Minutes," which has been on the air since 1968, and Rather's age is hardly consistent with giving the broadcast a fresher look.

Pictures of Rather reporting from around the world still line the corridors at CBS, a reminder of the storied if controversial career of the man who covered John F. Kennedy's assassination and succeeded Walter Cronkite in 1981. Rather's broadcast was No. 1 among the evening newscasts for several years, and when "CBS Evening News" slipped into third place in the 1990s, Rather cast himself as a hard-news champion in an era when television was increasingly focusing on softer features, crime and celebrities.

Interim CBS anchor Bob Schieffer has made the program more competitive with ABC's second-place "World News Tonight," which last month handed the anchor reins to Charlie Gibson.

From his talking back to President Richard Nixon at a 1973 news conference about Watergate to his confrontational 1988 interview with then-Vice President George Bush over Iran-contra, Rather became a lightning rod for conservatives who argued that he leaned to the left. But he also had a knack for landing big interviews and big stories. Rather was the last Western journalist to interview Saddam Hussein before the 2003 war, and the following year disclosed the first photos of Iraqi prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib.

At his peak, Rather anchored the evening news, contributed to "60 Minutes," hosted "48 Hours" and did regular radio commentaries, often sprinkling his delivery with the down-home Texas sayings that became known as "Dan-isms."

Changing Attack In Poverty Tactics, An Old Debate: Who Is At Fault? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

More than 40 years ago, Lyndon Johnson launched his War on Poverty with an ambitious declaration: "We know what must be done, and this nation of abundance can surely afford to do it."

Despite decades of economic growth and technological progress, tens of millions of Americans still live in poverty. Efforts to reduce the ranks of the poor persist, but they have moved underground. Today's War on Poverty isn't marked by lofty presidential rhetoric. It is a guerrilla war with platoons of idealistic crusaders and skeptical scholars, with dozens of small-scale experiments and local initiatives that largely escape public notice.

Sprawling government Great Society programs are out. And it has been a full decade since Bill Clinton signed a Republican-backed bill "to end welfare as we know it." Except for a flicker of attention in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina last year, poverty is neither in the headlines nor on the lips of politicians. When President Bush refers to it, he usually is referring to other countries. ("Free trade is the only proven path out of poverty for developing nations," he says.)

Yet to a surprising degree, an intense subterranean debate over what causes poverty and what to do about it continues, and it has echoes of a debate that has hardly changed for a century. In a 1894 treatise regarded as the first U.S. social-welfare textbook, Amos Griswold Warner wrote words that could easily have figured in the 1990s congressional debate over revamping welfare: "Nearly all the experiences in this country indicate" that welfare "is a source of corruption to politics, of expense to the community, and of degradation and increased pauperization to the poor," he said. "The more generous public relief, the more likely the poor will prefer it to working," argued Mr. Warner, a social-work pioneer and the District of Columbia's first superintendent of charities.

"Either you blame the poor -- 'the poverty is in the people' -- or you blame the system," says James T. Patterson, a Brown University historian. "It is a constant divide." If the poor are primarily responsible for their plight, then government ought to prod them to change their ways. If poverty is primarily the consequence of economic and social forces largely beyond their control, then government ought to give them money and change the rules of the economy.

Among those who dominate American politics and poverty policy today, the argument that government programs create dependency rather than foster independence has stuck. There is little appetite among governing Republicans for sweeping federal antipoverty initiatives, or even for fine-tuning Mr. Clinton's 1996 law that limits the time any person can remain on welfare. Eliminating poverty for all time isn't even a slogan anymore; the problem is seen as far more intractable and complex. Republicans read the decline in poverty during the boom of the 1990s as evidence that the best way to fight poverty is to promote a growing economy, and they offer tax cuts to that end.

So the pendulum has swung toward using tax credits, vouchers, rules and penalties to prod individuals to make choices that steer them away from lives of poverty, by getting and staying married, for instance, or taking even low-paid jobs to stay off welfare. In place of big government programs, boutique experiments proliferate. There are intensive community efforts to discourage teen pregnancy, widely seen as a precursor to a life of poverty, and experiments with offering frequent-flier style points to encourage public-housing residents to show up for work on time. All reflect a continuing struggle to find an effective combination of carrots and sticks to help the poverty-prone avoid the abyss of privation and reliance on government benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0034320

Democrats fault the economy for creating too few good jobs and for inequitably distributing the fruits of economic growth. They say they would, if in power, raise the minimum wage, alter the tax code to take more from the rich and spend more on programs that appear successful. But even many of them -- the children and grandchildren of those who forged big-government antipoverty programs of Lyndon Johnson and Franklin Roosevelt -- embrace the notion that the government should make the poor take more responsibility for their circumstances.

Democrats say they have learned one lesson in political reality: "If people believe your ideas about alleviating poverty are value-based -- that you expect the poor to work, expect them to be responsible, to keep their part of the bargain -- then people have a positive response," says John Edwards, the unsuccessful 2004 Democratic vice presidential candidate who now heads a University of North Carolina center on poverty. "If they believe it's just another government program that creates dependency, then they won't," he says. * * *

Eradicating poverty in the U.S. is an old goal. In the frothy days of 1928, Herbert Hoover said, "We shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished in the nation." Incomes did rise sharply in the 1920s; the working class did better; life expectancy grew. But he was wrong about poverty.

When the prosperity of the 1920s gave way to the Great Depression, Franklin Roosevelt responded with programs that laid the foundation for generations of big government. "Government had to respond to rising expectations, and as government reacted, appetites were whetted still more, expanding...a bureaucracy whose business was to serve its customers," the people who got government benefits, Mr. Patterson writes in his history of 20th-century antipoverty efforts. "The early welfare state thereby acquired two assets that proved invaluable...an organized constituency and a bureaucratic momentum that could not easily be stopped."

Although the vigorous economy of the late 1940s and 1950s boosted living standards for many, poverty didn't vanish. Yet as a public concern, it was nearly invisible until activist Michael Harrington jolted the nation with a 1962 book that described "the other America," which he said was "populated by failures, by those driven from the land and bewildered by the city, by old people suddenly confronted with the torments of loneliness and poverty, and by minorities facing a wall of prejudice."

Just two years later, President Johnson launched his War on Poverty, declaring, "We cannot and need not wait for the gradual growth of the economy to lift this forgotten fifth of our nation above the poverty line." He wasn't nuts. His economic advisers were certain the economy would continue to grow as robustly as it had for decades and told him poverty was beatable.

But neither LBJ's determination, tens of billions of dollars nor the enthusiasm of poverty fighters in and out of government eliminated poverty. "I guess you could say: Poverty won the War," Ronald Reagan quipped famously in 1986. That isn't precisely true. The poverty rate fell more in the 1960s than in any decade since, and remains below the level confronted by the Kennedy-Johnson administration. Back in 1960, nearly one in every four elderly Americans was below the official poverty line; today, less than one in 10 is. In 1960, one in every six households lacked complete indoor-plumbing facilities; today, one in 166 do.

But at last count, according to the Census Bureau, there were 37 million Americans below the official, albeit flawed and controversial, poverty line. That is 12.7% of the population, about the same fraction as in 1968. Alternative measures that take account of tax credits, food stamps and other noncash government aid put many fewer Americans below the line, but most show a similar trend: ups and downs with the economy, but little sustained, significant progress in the past three decades. (See sidebar: Counting the Poor7.)

The 1960s

In retrospect, the War on Poverty was "not a choice among policies so much as a collection of them," Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who was a Labor Department official in the 1960s, wrote years later. There was an attempt to avoid dependency-creating programs of the past by promoting "maximum feasible participation" of the poor themselves, a strategy that sowed the seeds of grass-roots activism in the years that followed. There was Mr. Johnson's prediction that "the days of the dole...are numbered."

But mostly the pendulum swung toward government doing more. There were scores of federal programs, some of which endured. Head Start now enrolls more than 900,000 low-income children in early childhood education at a cost of close to $7 billion a year -- despite continuing debates over its long-term benefits. The Job Corps, designed to put 16- to 24-year-olds on the path to good jobs, is regarded as successful, though costly.

Even after 40 years, there is still debate over the War on Poverty's diagnosis and prescriptions. The effort rested on a widespread conviction that the U.S. had figured out how to avoid recessions and could afford to lick poverty. "We were extremely rich and extremely secure about our ability to continue getting richer," recalls Charles Murray, a conservative critic of the War on Poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0034321

But it also reflected a Kennedy-Johnson view that economic growth alone wouldn't pull people out of poverty. "If the poor included many who did not gain from economic growth -- mostly people outside the labor market -- then they probably needed handouts of some sort," Mr. Patterson explains. Yet the notion of a permanent class of welfare recipients made planners and Congress so uncomfortable that the War on Poverty instead emphasized enhancing opportunity -- with education, training, health care, urban renewal. That suggested they believed that the economy would lift those who were properly equipped. Such programs offered "a hand, not a handout," as Mr. Johnson put it.

Some Johnson aides, sensing a contradiction, wanted a large government jobs program. But they wanted a cigarette tax to pay for it, and LBJ rejected that.

"The problem with the '60s programs is essentially we stopped before we finished," Peter Edelman, who was an aide to Robert Kennedy and to President Clinton, said at a recent University of North Carolina forum. "But we were especially weak on this question of helping people gain access to the job market...and on the question of concentrated poverty,"

Modern-day critics of the War on Poverty suggest that it sometimes made things worse. "They did induce dependency, they did not emphasize work nearly enough, and the watchword of the War on Poverty seemed to be spend more, demand less," says Ron Haskins, a former Republican congressional staffer now at the Brookings Institution think tank.

The 1970s

While fighting poverty often was politically popular, welfare wasn't. Created in the Depression to keep mothers of young children out of the work force, the program drew fire from a later generation of politicians. "The present welfare system has to be judged a colossal failure," Richard Nixon said in 1969. Between 1960 and 1974, welfare rolls more than tripled to 10.8 million people.

Inspired by such strange bedfellows as conservative Milton Friedman and liberal James Tobin, both later Nobel laureates in economics, Mr. Nixon advanced a proposal that would put him to the left of most Democrats today: a Family Assistance Program (FAP) that would have guaranteed every adult the equivalent of about $2,700 a year in today's dollars and every child $1,620.

Sometimes called a "negative income tax," it was a simple approach for curing poverty: Give money to those who don't have it, no strings attached. Mr. Friedman's notion was to use it to replace all other antipoverty programs, and eliminate the need for social workers and bureaucrats. Liberals saw it as a supplement to other safety-net programs. In any event, Congress rejected it. Liberals thought it too stingy; conservatives thought it an expensive way to coddle those who didn't work.

Congress did create a miniversion in 1972 that put a floor under the incomes of the old, blind and disabled. Dubbed the Supplemental Security Income, it now pays 7.2 million people an average of $450 a month. A few years later, Sen. Russell Long, a Democrat who chaired the Senate Finance Committee and detested the notion of paying people for not working, successfully crafted an alternative to the Nixon plan that was offered only to low-income people with jobs. Though few saw the potential when the Earned Income Tax Credit was born, the program has blossomed with bipartisan support into the largest federal antipoverty program outside of health care.

The U.S. economy weakened in the 1970s in ways that would be cruel to the working poor, restraining their wages. What economic growth did occur after 1979 was shared less evenly than it had been in previous decades; in a significant change, those at the top did better than those at the bottom.

Looking back, economists Sheldon Danziger and Peter Gottschalk cite the slower growth and widening of inequality as the primary reason that poverty fell much more slowly after 1970 than in preceding decades. Had "incomes grown as rapidly...as they had had during the economic 'golden age' after World War II," the poverty rate in 2002 would have been half what it actually was," they wrote in a 2005 book of essays published by the Russell Sage Foundation and Population Reference Bureau.

The 1980s and 1990s

The poverty rate was rising before Mr. Reagan took office. Inflation was eroding the spending power of welfare checks. Jimmy Carter had begun to put the brakes on spending. And then came the deep recession. By 1983, the official poverty rate had risen to where it had been in the late 1960s.

Mr. Reagan, decrying "welfare queens," pared spending on food stamps, unemployment compensation, child nutrition, vocational education, the Job Corps and welfare. The "goal of social policy in the Johnson (and even the Nixon) years had started with the question, 'How can we help the poor?' Reagan, in contrast, tended to ask 'How can we cut costs, and how can we get people to work?' " Mr. Patterson writes.

If liberal Michael Harrington's "The Other America" had been the defining text for the 1960s, then Mr. Murray's 1984 "Losing Ground" sought to play that role in the 1980s. Assailing the programs of the 1960s as failures, he argued that welfare gave poor people, particularly inner-city blacks, incentives to shun work and marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0034322

By the 1990s, as the U.S. suffered another recession followed by another boom, there was no longer bold talk from the White House about eliminating poverty. The new slogans were Mr. Clinton's "end welfare as we know it" and Harvard University professor (and later Clinton adviser) David Ellwood's "If you play by the rules you shouldn't be poor." The decade represented another lurch toward pushing the poor to take responsibility for their circumstances, with an offer of government aid to reward those who did.

With loud dissents from liberals, Mr. Clinton joined Republicans in 1996 to replace the old welfare program with a new Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF.) Among things, it required able-bodied recipients to leave welfare for work after two years.

Liberals were pleasantly surprised by the results. "That experiment with welfare reform has been far more successful than I certainly anticipated and than most people anticipated," says Isabel Sawhill, a former Clinton official who now oversees economic studies at Brookings. "We all remember Senator Moynihan saying children would be sleeping on grates. And although I'm sure there are some children who have not been helped and have, in fact, been harmed, I think that on average families have been better off -- helped by a strong economy, to be sure."

The welfare rolls have fallen from 3.9 million families in fiscal 1997 to 1.9 million in fiscal 2005, according to federal data. A growing fraction of unmarried women with children are working.

If government made it harder to stay on welfare, Mr. Clinton argued, it had to make sure that those who worked rose above poverty. "We will reward the work of working poor Americans by realizing the principle that if you work 40 hours a week, and you've got a child in the house, you will no longer be in poverty," he said in his first State of the Union address.

Raising the minimum wage in the 1990s from $3.35 an hour to $5.15 was one response. The other was a massive expansion of the Earned Income Tax Credit, which had already been sweetened by Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. The federal government will spend more than $38 billion this year on the Earned Income Tax Credit -- both in reducing taxes owed by low-wage workers and, for those who don't owe taxes, giving them cash -- twice what it spends on Temporary Assistance for Needy Families. More than 22 million households, roughly one-fifth of the total, benefit.

The Clinton welfare overhaul came just as the economy roared and unemployment fell to the lowest level in more than a generation. Wages rose even at the very bottom of the economy for the first time in years -- and the poverty rate, by almost every measure, fell.

The 2000s

The end of the 1990s boom reversed some of the progress made against poverty in the late 1990s. And though Mr. Bush hasn't made reducing poverty central to his agenda, intellectual ferment over poverty continues. And so does the debate over whether it is the poor themselves or the economy that is primarily at fault.

One major plank in today's response to poverty is the promotion of marriage, a reaction to the perception that old-style welfare contributed to an unhealthy breakup of the family. "The contract we promulgated was very simple: You can to get access cash...so long as...you don't go to work and you don't marry someone who's working. And so what we got was a lot more out-of-wedlock childbearing and a lot less family formation; no great mystery, we told them don't do it," says Wade Horn, an assistant secretary of Health and Human Services, echoing Mr. Murray's 1984 argument. "What's extraordinary in the last five years or so is that we started to have a public conversation about the need for more-friendly public policy when it comes to family formation," he says.

Indeed, liberals such as Ms. Sawhill and former Sen. Edwards, who argue that those who play by the rules ought not to be poor, have expanded their working definition of what it means to play by the rules: "Perhaps it should...include such things as finishing school, at least high school; perhaps it should include delaying child-bearing until you're old enough to support a child, or at least make a good effort at supporting a child -- then maybe we link some new benefits to those new kinds of responsibility," Ms. Sawhill says. Dissenters say marriage, despite its economic advantages, is oversold as an antipoverty strategy.

Another concept drawing favor across the political spectrum is to help poor people build nest-eggs, an approach that fits with Mr. Bush's enthusiasm for an "ownership society." Prominent proponent Michael Sherraden of Washington University in St. Louis argues that a "small amount of wealth" in the hands of a poor family can be important if it "enables a family to move to a better neighborhood, or enables an investment in education or training that wouldn't happen otherwise, or enables a purchase of a home."

There is today, however, a different sense about the potency of any government response to poverty than when the War on Poverty was born. "There was a sense in those early...days that the possibilities were endless," Lisbeth Schorr, who worked in the Johnson White House, recalled at a recent retrospective sponsored by the Brookings Institution and Georgetown University. "Of course," she said, "nobody knows what would have happened if we had been able to continue and expand what we started."

DOJ_NMG_0034323

Counting The Poor: Methods And Controversy (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Who are the poor?

By the official measure, there were 37 million people living below the poverty line in 2004. Most (55%) were between 18 and 64, and most (68%) were white. But the poor are disproportionately children and disproportionately black: While 12.7% of the total population was below the poverty line, 17.8% of children under 18 and 24.7% of blacks were.

What is the official poverty line?

Developed in the early 1960s by Mollie Orshansky of the Social Security Administration, it is three times the amount of money the Agriculture Department estimated it would cost to feed a family, adjusted for inflation using the consumer-price index. The poverty line varies by family size. For a single mother with one child, it was $13,461 in 2005; for a two-parent, two-child family, it was $19,806.

What income counts in determining whether a family is above the official poverty line?

All cash income before taxes, whether from wages or government benefits, counts. Capital gains, noncash government benefits such as Medicaid, food stamps or housing subsidies don't count, nor does the Earned Income Tax Credit.

Does that make sense?

No. But efforts to change the official poverty measure are mired in political controversy. There is even controversy over which alternatives to the official measure should be published by the Census Bureau. Until recently, it published 17 alternatives based on recommendations by a National Academy of Sciences panel. Most showed a poverty rate above the official number because they used a higher poverty line. Influenced by the arguments of Douglas Besharov, of the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank, the Census Bureau this year adopted a new approach and published alternatives to the official measure that put poverty rates below the official one.

What do alternative measures show?

Almost anything you want. One Census Bureau calculation, based on the NAS recommendations, adds food stamps, housing subsidies, discount school lunches, capital gains and the Earned Income Tax Credit to family income, and then subtracts federal and state taxes and the cost of getting to work and caring for children. This would put 16% of Americans below the poverty line for 2003, well above the 12.5% official measure. One of the new Census Bureau approaches incorporates many of those changes to calculating income and adds an "imputed return of home equity" for those who own homes -- but doesn't adjust the poverty threshold. That approach brings the 2003 poverty rate down to 9%, relying on the consumer-price index to adjust Ms. Orshansky's numbers, and to 7.4% by applying what many economists say is a more accurate measure of inflation over time.

Do the alternatives show different trends?

No. Most measures show that poverty fell in the 1990s as a result of a booming economy and changes in government policies, such as an increase in the minimum wage. Most measures also show that poverty has risen since the end of the 1990s.

How do other countries measure poverty?

In contrast to the U.S. approach of setting an absolute threshold and adjusting it for inflation, Europeans tend to use a relative measure, adjusting the thresholds so they rise not just with inflation but with the incomes of typical families. Such an approach would produce a higher number of Americans living in poverty than the current official measure because the typical American family's income has risen far more than the poverty line has.

Charity Bingo Trying 'to Reinvent Itself' (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Groups boost payoffs, fun to win players back from casinos

Julia Eddy has volunteered at bingo games for more than 20 years. She remembers the glory days.

"It used to be 180 to 200 (people) whenever you opened the doors. It didn't matter what time of day," says Eddy, 39, who manages three charity bingo games a week in Aurora, Colo., near Denver.

Now on a Saturday morning, fewer than half that number show up. Several bingo halls in the area have closed in the past year for lack of business, she says.

Charities that run bingo games for money to sponsor food pantries, recreation programs for poor children and other activities are scrambling to find new customers. That's because many players who once crowded fraternal lodges and community centers to play bingo are flocking to casinos instead, drawn by bigger jackpots and flashier surroundings.

DOJ_NMG_0034324

To help charities compete, gaming regulators are enabling non-profit groups to increase jackpots and use electronic gadgets that make it easier for customers to play several bingo cards at once. They're also requiring bingo hall owners to spruce up their venues to make them more fun for players.

"You can't make much with bake sales and car washes," says Corky Kyle, executive director of the Colorado Charitable Bingo Association. "The non-profits just cannot compete with the for-profit gaming industry unless they're given the opportunity to conduct their gaming the same way. … Bingo needs to reinvent itself."

Profits for charities from bingo and other gaming dropped about 13% from 2001 to 2003 before rebounding about 1% in 2004 in about 30 states that track the business, says Mary Magnuson, legal counsel for the Minnesota-based National Association of Fundraising Ticket Manufacturers.

"Clearly, the commercial gambling is having an impact," Magnuson says. Other factors that have diminished bingo's appeal are smoking bans that prevent players from lighting up and the game's image as a pastime for seniors, she says.

Bingo's decline coincides with the explosion of legalized gambling across the USA in the past 15 years. States have sanctioned commercial casinos and expanded lotteries to raise revenue and avoid hiking taxes to pay for services. More recently, states such as Iowa and Louisiana have begun allowing slot machines at racetracks. Utah and Hawaii are the only states that ban gambling.

Steps states are taking or considering to help charity gaming:

•Last week, Minnesota began allowing several bingo halls to link up for a single game via the Internet, potentially increasing the jackpot from hundreds to thousands of dollars. "It's one of the things … (for) charitable foundations to help them raise money," says Tom Barrett, executive director of the state's Gambling Control Board.

•Michigan will require bingo halls to meet minimum appearance standards by Oct. 1 to make them more appealing to patrons, says Robert Blessing, gaming director of the charitable gaming division of Michigan's Bureau of State Lottery. "We're trying to make our bingo halls more like other gambling venues … so as we attract new players, they'll be willing to continue playing." Hall owners will get credit for such things as good lighting and smudge-free walls.

•In Pennsylvania, a bill that would double the amount of bingo prize money groups can award in a single day to $8,000 was approved by the state House of Representatives last year and awaits action in the Senate.

The fall in bingo proceeds has "become disastrous," says Kristine Corn, 63, founder of Ride to Walk, a program in Lincoln, Calif., that provides therapeutic horseback rides for children who have neurological disabilities stemming from accidents and illnesses such as cerebral palsy.

In November, the program ended its Tuesday night bingo games in nearby Sacramento because they were losing money, Corn says. Before the nearby Thunder Valley Casino opened in June 2003, she says, the games grossed up to $10,000 a month and financed most of the program. Corn says she now must charge families $45 a ride. Ride to Walk is trying new activities, including a barn dance and a golf tournament, to fill the gap.

"I think that the casinos are trying to support the community," she says. Thunder Valley donated $10,000 to the program, she says, though her group asked for $50,000. "I think with the kind of money they're bringing in, they probably could be more charitable … particularly to the little charities running things like bingo, because they do take away from us."

The United Auburn Indian Community, owner of the Thunder Valley Casino, has given more than $1 million a year to local non-profit groups such as Ride to Walk, spokesman Douglas Elmets says. He also says casinos don't compete for players with charity games. "I do think there's a different crowd," he says.

In 2004, Michigan gave non-profits a new weapon to lure players at special fundraisers: Texas Hold 'Em poker. After the popular poker game was introduced, the number of licenses issued to charities to hold the fundraisers, known as "millionaire parties," jumped to 1,417 in 2005 from 684 in 2004, Blessing says. "It's been a real attractive venue for our non-profits to make money," he says.

Changes also are occurring in Minnesota, where earnings for charity bingo dropped roughly 4% each of the past five years, Barrett says. "Industry representatives came to us and said bingo has lost its sizzle and pop — 'it's a game my parents played,' " Barrett says. "We're proposing new alternatives to an old game."

Linking several bingo halls over the Internet is important, says Bob Matson, executive director of the North Suburban Youth Foundation in Roseville, Minn. "We're counting on it," says Matson, whose group raises about $150,000 a year for youth programs in St. Paul and two suburban school districts.

Reviving bingo's fortunes is vital to non-profit groups, advocates say. "In many instances, it is (their) primary source of money," Magnuson says. "What happens to the volunteer fire department if they can't raise money through bingo?"

Changing Bedfellows (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0034325

By David Brooks

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

If American politics could start with a clean slate today, the main argument wouldn't be between liberalism and conservatism, words that have become labels without coherent philosophies. The main fight would pit populist nationalism against progressive globalism.

The populist nationalist party would be liberal on economics, conservative on values and realist on foreign policy. It would bring together a wide array of people who are disenchanted with their respective parties' elites, and who would find they have a lot in common. It would bring Kevin Phillips together with Pat Buchanan, the Virginia senatorial candidate James Webb together with Lou Dobbs, Al Sharpton together with James Dobson.

Here's how a populist nationalist candidate would sound: "We are the ordinary, burden-bearing people of this country. We are the ones who work hard and build communities. It's time for us to come together and recognize that our loyalty to our fellow Americans comes first.

"That means we can't waste our precious blood and treasure on poorly planned, pie-in-the-sky wars to bring democracy to the Middle East. We need to get out of Iraq now. That means we can't sell our ports to our enemies. That means we must secure our borders against terrorists and illegal immigrants who break the law, take our jobs and drive down wages.

"We need to stand up to the big money interests who value their own profits more than their own countrymen, who outsource jobs to China and India, who destroy unions and control Washington. We need to fight off their efforts to take away our Social Security and Medicare. Instead of widening inequality and a race to the bottom, we need universal health care and decent wages. We need a government that will stand up to Internet porn and for decent family values.

"We're tired of both the corporate elites and the cultural elites. We want leaders who understand our anxieties and are, like us, tired of a world where nothing is safe, where everything can be swept away by a serious illness, a divorce or a terrorist's bomb."

Populist nationalism of this sort would be politically potent. It would be against the war without seeming naïve and dovish. It would be against corporate power without seeming socialist. It would tap the passions aroused by immigration and outsourcing and cohere with the populist uprisings taking place in different forms around the world.

The progressive globalists, on the other hand, would be market-oriented on economics, liberal on values and multilateral interventionists in foreign affairs. The leading spokesman for this movement would be Tony Blair. Domestically, it would be led by the major presidential aspirants, who don't differ much: John McCain, Hillary Clinton, Mitt Romney, Mark Warner and Rudy Giuliani.

Here's how a globalist might sound: "We're inspired by the opportunities a globalizing and flattening world open up before us. We embrace technological dynamism and cultural diversity and reject beggar-thy-neighbor policies. But we understand that globalization means interdependence, and we have to build institutions to ensure everybody shares the new prosperity.

"We have to reform education and improve skills so that more people succeed. We need to reform entitlements so the economy can remain flexible and not buried by debt. We have to work together to address global warming, oil dependence and protectionist barriers. We have to understand that this open, diverse world has enemies. We have to confront Islamic extremism ideologically and militarily, and battle it at its roots with democracy and freedom. We need to manage the movement of peoples without shutting off the flow, open up trade, not shut it down."

This modernizing progressivism would also be politically potent. It would thrive among the educated, among aspiring suburbanites, among hawks and among immigrants who look to the future more than the past.

Of course these alignments won't come about instantaneously. Our political institutions and habits have staying power, and the politics of globalization is lagging far behind the reality of it. But the issues that realigned politics in the 1960's are fading, and issues like immigration, trade and interdependence are rising to the fore. Politics is becoming less about left versus right and more about open versus closed. Or, to put it in starker terms, the populists are getting more populist while the elitists are getting more elitist.

Where The Hogs Come First (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Think pork. Sizzling bacon and breakfast sausage. Juicy chops and ribs and robust holiday hams.

The pork capital of the planet is this tiny town in the Cape Fear River basin, not far from the South Carolina border. Spending a few days in Tar Heel and the surrounding area — dotted with hog farms, cornfields and the occasional Confederate flag — is like stepping back in time. This is a place where progress has slowed to a crawl.

DOJ_NMG_0034326

Tar Heel's raison d'être (and the employment anchor for much of the region) is the mammoth plant of the Smithfield Packing Company, a million-square-foot colossus that is the largest pork processing facility in the world.

You can learn a lot at Smithfield. It's a case study in both the butchering of hogs (some 32,000 are slaughtered there each day) and the systematic exploitation of vulnerable workers. More than 5,500 men and women work at Smithfield, most of them Latino or black, and nearly all of them undereducated and poor.

The big issue at Smithfield is not necessarily money. Workers are drawn there from all over the region, sometimes traveling in crowded vans for two hours or more each day, because the starting pay — until recently, $8 and change an hour — is higher than the pay at most other jobs available to them.

But the work is often brutal beyond imagining. Company officials will tell you everything is fine, but serious injuries abound, and the company has used illegal and, at times, violent tactics over the course of a dozen years to keep the workers from joining a union that would give them a modicum of protection and dignity.

"It was depressing inside there," said Edward Morrison, who spent hour after hour flipping bloody hog carcasses on the kill floor, until he was injured last fall after just a few months on the job. "You have to work fast because that machine is shooting those hogs out at you constantly. You can end up with all this blood dripping down on you, all these feces and stuff just hanging off of you. It's a terrible environment.

"We've had guys walk off after the first break and never return."

Mr. Morrison's comments were echoed by a young man who was with a group of Smithfield workers waiting for a van to pick them up at a gas station in Dillon, S.C., nearly 50 miles from Tar Heel. "The line do move fast," the young man said, "and people do get hurt. You can hear 'em hollering when they're on their way to the clinic."

Workers are cut by the flashing, slashing knives that slice the meat from the bones. They are hurt sliding and falling on floors and stairs that are slick with blood, guts and a variety of fluids. They suffer repetitive motion injuries.

The processing line on the kill floor moves hogs past the workers at the dizzying rate of one every three or four seconds.

Union representation would make a big difference for Smithfield workers. The United Food and Commercial Workers Union has been trying to organize the plant since the mid-1990's. Smithfield has responded with tactics that have ranged from the sleazy to the reprehensible.

After an exhaustive investigation, a judge found that the company had threatened to shut down the entire plant if the workers dared to organize, and had warned Latino workers that immigration authorities would be alerted if they voted for a union.

The union lost votes to organize the plant in 1994 and 1997, but the results of those elections were thrown out by the National Labor Relations Board after the judge found that Smithfield had prevented the union from holding fair elections. The judge said the company had engaged in myriad "egregious" violations of federal labor law, including threatening, intimidating and firing workers involved in the organizing effort, and beating up a worker "for engaging in union activities."

Rather than obey the directives of the board and subsequent court decisions, the company has tied the matter up on appeals that have lasted for years. A U.S. Court of Appeals ruling just last month referred to "the intense and widespread coercion prevalent at the Tar Heel facility."

Workers at Smithfield and their families are suffering while the government dithers, refusing to require a mighty corporation like Smithfield to obey the nation's labor laws in a timely manner.

The defiance, greed and misplaced humanity of the merchants of misery at the apex of the Smithfield power structure are matters consumers might keep in mind as they bite into that next sizzling, succulent morsel of Smithfield pork.

Iran Quietly Learns Of Penalties In A Nuclear Incentives Deal (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And William J. Broad

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

PARIS, June 14 — When a formal incentives package by six nations to encourage Iran to curb its nuclear program was presented in writing in Tehran last week, it omitted a long list of potential punishments should Iran reject it, according to senior officials familiar with the package.

Instead, it was left to Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, to deliver news about the sticks — only orally.

In a one-on-one meeting without aides, Mr. Solana told Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian negotiator, that there would be "serious consequences" against Iran in the United Nations Security Council if Iran did not suspend key nuclear activities and embrace the offer, the officials added.

The decision to focus on the benefits for Iran and to leave no paper trail about possible penalties reflects a new international negotiating strategy toward Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0034327

The six nations — the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany — have decided to treat Iran not as an errant child whose behavior must be modified or a rogue state that must be punished, but as a potential responsible negotiating partner.

The possible punishments were kept separate and informal for two reasons: to prevent Iran from rejecting the offer out of hand and to maintain the fragile unity of the six nations that authored it, officials said.

"In the past, we were told we didn't have enough respect" for the Iranians, one senior official said. "Maybe we're learning, and this time our approach was different, more respectful."

The strategy also reflects the recent shift in the policy of the Bush administration, which has long portrayed Iran as the world's worst state perpetrator of terrorism, determined to become a nuclear power. It follows a decision last month by the administration to sit at the same negotiating table with Iran — if Iran fully suspended its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Iran had rejected as insulting a previous 31-page proposal presented by France, Britain and Germany last August that promised some incentives in exchange for tough measures to freeze Iran's activities related to enriching uranium, which can be used to fuel nuclear reactors or atom bombs.

This time, the United States, Russia and China are full partners in the negotiations, with all six nations determined to give Iran a package so generous that it would have no reason to say no.

The disclosure that the formal written proposal omitted disincentives came to light after extracts were published Wednesday by Agence France-Presse. The text was read to The New York Times by an official.

Some officials involved in the negotiations expressed dismay that the tightly held document had leaked, and that its elements could be misunderstood, in part because only part of it is written down.

For example, those in the United States opposed to any reconciliation with Iran could use it to criticize the administration for appearing to abandon its tough line. Those in Iran who want the country to continue its enrichment-related activities could fault it for depriving Iran of what is widely considered a sovereign right.

"We need private diplomacy and this is very bad," said one senior official. "The paper presented only tells part of the story."

Indeed, an earlier written draft of the proposal listed a variety of possible punitive measures, like an embargo on goods and technologies and a ban on financial transactions related to Iran's nuclear program.

Now, the lack of clarity about what constitutes possible penalties could give the Iranians the impression that they could seek even more concessions, as they have done in the past.

Two weeks ago, on the day before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with her five counterparts in Vienna to work out the final package, she gave the impression it included both incentives and disincentives.

But Ms. Rice was swayed by the Europeans, particularly the Russians and the Germans, that the best way to get the Iranians on board was to formally offer carrots, and informally offer sticks, an administration official said.

The Russians, in particular, who have opposed Security Council sanctions against Iran, argued that the incentives option had to be exhausted first. Mr. Solana, a nuclear physicist by training, was given the leeway on how to present what was called the "two pathways," officials said.

All officials spoke on the condition of anonymity under normal rules of diplomacy.

One key goal of the offer, according to the text, is "to develop relations and cooperation with Iran based on mutual respect," the first time the Bush administration has indicated that it is prepared to deal with Iran in such a positive way.

Many elements of the proposal were already known, but the disclosure of the text was the first authoritative rendering of its details.

It includes such technical inducements as international commitments to support joint projects with Tehran for building new light-water reactors to make electricity.

The offer lays out two ways that Tehran could fuel such reactors without resorting to its own enrichment of uranium for the production of nuclear fuel — the central objection of the West because such material can be used to fuel not only nuclear reactors but also atom bombs.

The first alternative would have Iran participate in an "international facility" in Russia that would enrich uranium, an idea that Tehran has consistently rejected.

The second would have Iran draw on a commercial supply of nuclear fuel that the International Atomic Energy Agency would supervise and that would act as a "buffer stock" lasting for up to five years.

In exchange, the proposal requires Iran to "suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities" and to commit to continue the suspension throughout negotiations on the incentives package.

DOJ_NMG_0034328

In an indication that informal negotiations with Iran have essentially begun, Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani spoke by phone on Wednesday. They "touched base and compared notes," but did not discuss the substance of the proposal, an aide to Mr. Solana said.

Mr. Solana called it "a constructive conversation," adding, "It will be followed by others."

Ahmadinejad Seeks Chinese, Russian Support (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

Iran's hard-line president is doing more than just attending an Asian security summit in China: Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seeks to gain Russian and Chinese support at a critical moment for his country's nuclear program.

He also aims to prove that his country is not isolated, despite U.S. claims to the contrary.

Past trips to Asia have been a chance for Ahmadinejad to tap into anti-U.S. sentiment and tout himself as a leader who is standing up to Washington. Last month, he was cheered by Indonesian students and by a crowd shouting "Fight America! Fight Israel!" outside a Jakarta mosque where he performed prayers.

His visit to China, which began Wednesday, will likely be more dedicated to intense diplomacy. Ahmadinejad is expected to hold separate meetings with his Chinese and Russian counterparts, Hu Jintao and Vladimir Putin, on the sidelines of the regional summit in Shanghai.

It will be a chance to sound out his two allies on a package of incentives offered by the Big Five Powers at the U.N., plus Germany, seeking to persuade Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment program. If Iran agrees, Tehran would then be able to enter negotiations with the United States and Europe over a long-term resolution to the standoff over its nuclear program.

Russia and China have backed the incentives package. But the two countries — longtime allies and trading partners of Iran who hold veto powers at the U.N. — have opposed any move to impose sanctions, which Washington seeks if Tehran turns down the offer.

A key question for Iran is likely to be how much change it can seek in the package and still keep Moscow and Beijing's implicit protection.

Iran has said it finds parts of the package acceptable but that other parts should be removed. And it has said the key issue of uranium enrichment remains unclear and needs further explanation. Tehran has outright rejected demands it scrap enrichment and has been highly reluctant to suspend it.

Tehran has not yet responded to the offer, given to it a week ago.

"Iran is taking its own time (in responding) to get Russia and China to modify the Western pressures on Tehran," said political analyst Davoud Hermidas Bavand.

Ahmadinejad will likely urge Moscow and Beijing to "follow their independent policy and don't go the U.S. way," said analyst Mostafa Kavakebian.

The Iranian president will try to push his own ideas, seeking a compromise that will guarantee his country's right to enrich uranium and at the same time offer guarantees that its nuclear program won't be diverted toward weapons, he said.

In Shanghai, Ahmadinejad joins the leaders of Russia, China and four Central Asian countries who comprise the Shanghai Cooperation Organization.

The trip is also a chance to show that Iran has friends around the world despite U.S. attempts to isolate it. Iran has made clear it is adjusting its relations with nations based on the nuclear standoff.

"We are redefining our relations with the world," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told a television program last week. "We are managing our relations with other countries based on our national interests and the way we are treated (over the nuclear dispute)."

Iran has repeatedly said it will offer giant economic projects to countries that support its nuclear program and punish those who vote against it.

China's state energy company has signed long-term deals for natural gas. Those deals display the growing disregard for Washington's priorities. In 1996 the U.S. said it would consider sanctions on any company that invests more than $20 million annually in the Iranian oil and gas sectors. The threat was never enforced.

Ahmadinejad's participation in the Shanghai summit, as an observer, is a particular irritant to the United States, which views the body as an attempted counterweight against Western influence in Central Asia and the presence of American bases there.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld last week chided China and Russia for backing Tehran's participation in the summit, saying he found it strange to bring the "leading terrorist nation in the world into an organization that says it's against terror."

DOJ_NMG_0034329

But host China dismissed the criticism. "We cannot abide by other countries calling our observer nations sponsors of terror," Shanghai Cooperation Organization chief Zhang Deguang said.

Group Linked To Al Qaeda Tightening Grip On Somalia (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

An Islamist group with ties to al Qaeda is quickly solidifying its grip on parts of Somalia and moving toward setting up a Taliban-style Islamist regime in the country, according to U.S. officials familiar with events in the region.

Armed militias of the group known as the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) defeated a U.S.-backed group of Somali warlords called Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism last week and control large sections of Mogadishu and seized a key town yesterday.

The officials familiar with terrorism and the Horn of Africa, including some who were recently in Somalia, said the Islamists now are seeking to publicly distance themselves from al Qaeda, which also is seeking to play down its ties to the ICU to avoid provoking a military response from the United States or other nations in the region.

"We missed the center of gravity when we engaged with the warlords and did not stand up to the ICU," one official said.

The ICU is "putting on a good face" after its military gains, the official said, warning that the ICU is engaged in a disinformation campaign that is designed to hide its true goals.

The situation in the East African country, which has not had a central government in over a decade, is fluid. Yesterday, ICU militias took over the town of Jowhar, northeast of Mogadishu, an area that was the last stronghold of the counterterrorism group warlords. The group now may focus attacks on Baidoa, where a non-Islamist Somali-led transitional government is based.

Retired Vice Adm. Scott Redd, director of the National Counterterrorism Center, said at a Senate hearing Tuesday that "obviously, there have been some things going on inside Somalia."

"I would not jump to the conclusion, however, that that means that al Qaeda now owns Somalia, by any stretch of the imagination," said Adm. Redd, who commanded a task force that evacuated United Nations peacekeepers from Somalia in 1995.

State Department Coordinator for Counterterrorism Henry Crumpton, appearing with Adm. Redd at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, said last week's rise to power of the ICU was "not anticipated."

Mr. Crumpton said the administration is cautious about statements from the ICU that it is not an Islamist regime.

"We still have some concern because, despite their public overtures, we're not sure what Islamic Courts really want in terms of their strategies and in terms of their relationship with al Qaeda," he said.

Behind the scenes, the Islamic Courts group is taking steps to institute Shariah, or Islamic law, and to install an Islamist, Taliban-style government, other U.S. officials said.

The ICU's most significant step has been to take over all schools in areas that it controls and to change the curriculum to Islamist-centered teaching.

The Bush administration decided to help the counterterrorism group of warlords against the ICU, mainly with funding, but rejected providing support for what is known as the Transitional Federal Government, or TFG, currently located in Baidoa. The TFG has some international support and controls some areas of Mogadishu, but lacks forces sufficient to challenge the ICU on its own, the officials said.

That government includes Hussein Mohamed Farrah, a pro-Western former U.S. Marine and son of the late Somali warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid, who fought U.S. military forces in the early 1990s during the failed U.S. humanitarian operation. Aidid's forces were behind the deadly 1993 shootout in Mogadishu that led to the deaths of 18 U.S. soldiers and up to 1,000 Somalis.

The U.S. Central Command currently has several hundred troops, including special operations commandos, in Djibouti as part of Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa.

Intelligence reports from the region indicate that the ICU has close ties to a small group of al Qaeda terrorists who are left over from the terrorist cell that launched the 1998 operation to bomb the U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya. The al Qaeda cell is providing advice to the ICU and is helping facilitate support for the group from radical Wahhabi Muslims in Saudi Arabia, Yemen and elsewhere, the officials said.

Islamic Militias Extend Control In Southern Somalia (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Stronghold of Secular Warlords Falls; Transitional Government Calls for Foreign Peacekeepers

DOJ_NMG_0034330

NAIROBI, June 14 -- Islamic militias asserted control over southern Somalia on Wednesday by routing once-powerful secular warlords from one of their last remaining strongholds and moving closer to the headquarters of the country's fragile, U.N.-backed government.

The town of Jowhar, about 60 miles north of the militias' base in the capital, Mogadishu, fell in a morning attack that left at least four people dead and prompted several remaining warlords to flee in heavily armed pickup trucks, according to news reports.

More than 300 Somalis have died in fighting in recent months as the Islamic militias have driven the secular warlords, who have had U.S. support, from most of southern Somalia.

The militias immediately declared a nighttime curfew in Jowhar and announced plans to impose Islamic law, or sharia , which in recent years has brought some order to lawless Mogadishu.

...

Fearing an attack, members of the country's largely powerless transitional government voted Wednesday to invite foreign peacekeepers to enter Somalia. The government is based in Baidoa, about 130 miles from Jowhar. The town is one of the last significant places in the southern region not controlled by the militias.

The Islamic militias have repeatedly rejected calls for foreign peacekeepers, fearing that neighboring countries, especially Somalia's historic enemy, Ethiopia, would use such a deployment as a pretext to meddle in Somalia's affairs. That fear has been sharpened by the reportedly warm relations between Ethiopia and the president of the transitional government, Abdullahi Yusuf.

"They will back Yusuf. They will come to Mogadishu," said Abdurahman Osman, a representative of the Islamic militias, speaking in Nairobi.

The issue threatened to drive apart the militias and the transitional government at a time when international officials are pushing the groups to negotiate a solution to Somalia's lasting trouble. Islamic militia leaders warned repeatedly in the past week that they would end discussions with the transitional government if it invited foreign troops to Somalia.

Somalia has been without an effective central government since largely clan-based warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The warlords then began fighting one another, turning the country into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms. Central and northern Somalia became largely self-governed as the nominal capital descended into chaos.

The United States reportedly became involved in supporting the warlords as it sought help in capturing terrorism suspects hiding in Somalia. Among the leaders of the Islamic militias, U.S. officials have said, are extremists with links to al-Qaeda. Since taking control of Mogadishu last week, however, militia leaders have made repeated overtures to the United States and sought to portray themselves as moderates seeking to stabilize a chaotic country.

U.S. Meeting Europeans To Forge Policy On Somalia (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — American officials will sit down Thursday with their European counterparts to try to come up with an answer to this central question: Is there anyone left with any authority in Somalia with whom the United States can do business?

The hurriedly convened Contact Group meeting in New York represents a State Department effort to form a new policy on Somalia after more than a decade of neglect. Diplomats are asserting more control over Somalia policy from the Central Intelligence Agency, on the ground that an approach that by many accounts has consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords has been counterproductive.

That came into stark relief last week when the American-backed warlords fighting a proxy war for the United States against Islamists believed to be harboring operatives of Al Qaeda were run out of Mogadishu, the capital, by those Islamists. For the United States, the lawless place that spawned "Black Hawk Down" was suddenly back, this time as a potent symbol of America's faltering counterterrorism efforts. Washington had backed the losing side, Somalia was now under new management, and the United States had few allies on the ground.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since early 1991, when largely clan-based warlords overthrew its dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. An interim government, formed with United Nations support, has not even been able to enter Mogadishu, and has instead been stuck in Baidoa, about 150 miles away.

"We need to have legitimate actors inside Somalia with whom we can work," Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department's top counterterrorism official, told a Senate committee on Tuesday. "That's probably the most difficult challenge right now."

Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group, would have to be at the top of the list of people who exert power in Somalia. Mr. Ahmed has sought to moderate the image of his Islamic Courts Union, which is seen in the West as wanting to impose a Taliban-style government on Somalia, with strict religious codes and a willingness to harbor Qaeda members. He sent a conciliatory letter last week to foreign governments, including the United States, that said the Islamists wanted a "friendly relationship with the international community."

DOJ_NMG_0034331

American officials have maintained that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering Qaeda operatives who were indicted in the 1998 bombings of the United States Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Since those bombings, American officials have been tracking a Qaeda cell whose members are believed to move freely among Somalia, Kenya, Ethiopia and parts of the Middle East. The American payments to the warlords were intended at least in part to help achieve the capture of the Qaeda operatives.

Shortly after an attack on a hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, and the failed attempt to shoot down a plane bound for Israel from the Mombasa airport — both in November 2002 — the United States began informally reaching out to Somali clans in the hope that local forces might provide intelligence about people suspected of being members of Al Qaeda in Somalia, said a recent report by the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization with extensive experience in Somalia.

That approach brought a few successes. Militiamen loyal to the warlord Mohammed Deere caught Suleiman Abdalla Salim Hemed, who was suspected of being a Qaeda operative, in April 2003 and turned him over to American officials.

Bush administration officials say that they are willing to take Mr. Ahmed's letter at "face value," but that they believe that Qaeda operatives remain in Somalia. "We're still not quite sure what the Islamic courts really want in terms of their strategies and in terms of their relationship with Al Qaeda," Mr. Crumpton said.

But the United States cannot continue to view Somalia solely through the prism of counterterrorism. Critics say that is why America has no real allies in a country that has become a haven for terrorists.

"These guys are very different from the Taliban," said Robert Rotberg, author of "Terrorism in the Horn of Africa" and director of the intrastate conflict program at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "They have a potential to be a buffer between terrorism and chaos, and that's a good role if we can find a way to talk to them sensibly."

Palestinians Mount Violent Protest Over Lack Of Paychecks (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 14 — Palestinian civil servants stormed the parliament building in the West Bank on Wednesday demanding back pay and chanting "We are hungry!"

Fistfights broke out as protesters hurled plastic water bottles at legislators from Hamas, the militant group that controls parliament, forcing the speaker to flee the building.

It was the second violent protest this week at parliament, in Ramallah, and underscored growing pressure on the Hamas government on several fronts.

Much of the Western aid that had been used to run the Palestinian Authority has been withheld since Hamas took over the government after winning January elections. Many Muslim nations had pledged their support, but international banks, most tied to the American system, have refused to transfer money from other donors.

So on Wednesday, the Hamas foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, crossed over into Gaza from Egypt carrying what Palestinian officials said was $20 million in cash in his suitcases. He was returning from a long trip to Indonesia, Malaysia, Brunei, China, Pakistan, Iran and Egypt.

Hamas, responsible for many of the deadliest suicide attacks against Israel, has refused to renounce violence or recognize the Israeli state since it won control of parliament in January.

Though a substantial sum, the $20 million is a fraction of $120 million the Palestinian Authority needs each month just for the salaries of its 165,000 employees, most of whom have not been paid for four months. Its current budget would require an additional $45 million for all costs other than salaries.

A power struggle between Hamas and Fatah, the party it ousted from power, continues to worsen. About two dozen people have been killed in recent weeks in factional fighting, including a Hamas gunman in southern Gaza on Wednesday. The protesters at the parliament, which was also attacked Monday night along with two cabinet buildings, were reported largely to be loyal to Fatah.

"We deplore and regret these incidents," Ismail Haniya, the prime minister and a top Hamas leader, said after the death of the gunman, The Associated Press reported. "The government is going to carry out its responsibilities along with the security branches in order to maintain law and order."

To defuse the tensions, Mr. Haniya and Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority and a member of Fatah, have agreed to a series of talks, which continued on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0034332

Mr. Abbas, a moderate, has been pressing Hamas to accept even implicit recognition of Israel, a move aimed at freeing up foreign money and restarting peace talks with Israel. Barring that, Mr. Abbas has said he will schedule a referendum next month calling for a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, a proposal that polls indicate most Palestinians support.

Hamas's leadership strongly opposes the referendum as illegal and an effort to undermine the party's election victory.

But there were indications on Wednesday that the two sides might have made progress on the difficult question of the Hamas militia, which is still outside government control. Fatah officials said Hamas had agreed to steps to integrate about 3,000 fighters into the security forces, though no timetable was given. Hamas has already agreed in principle to such a move.

Mr. Zahar was allowed to bring his cash into Gaza on Wednesday. Since the international banks refused to transfer funds to the Palestinians, at least two other Hamas leaders have been stopped at the border between Egypt and Gaza carrying large amounts of cash.

The earlier shipments, totaling some $5 million, had been confiscated but then released, supposedly to the Palestinian government. Some employees received part of their back pay a week ago, but some Palestinians suggested that the money might not have gone to the Finance Ministry but instead was used by Hamas to pay its loyalists.

The conflict between Palestinians and the Israeli military was largely quiet on Wednesday. The Israeli military reported that Palestinians had fired a rocket toward Israel from Gaza, but that it landed in the desert without hitting anyone.

In recent months, the number of rocket attacks has increased significantly, to nearly 100 this month alone. Last week, during an Israeli retaliatory attack, seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on a beach in Gaza, causing Hamas to call off its 16-month truce.

On Tuesday, however, the Israeli military contended that an internal investigation showed its munitions had not been responsible, a finding rejected by the Palestinians.

The deaths, and 10 more in Gaza on Tuesday, among them 8 civilians, came at a sensitive time, as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made his first trip in office to Europe. He met Wednesday with President Jacques Chirac of France, trying to persuade Mr. Chirac to accept Israeli plans to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank in the absence of a peace with the Palestinians.

"The realignment plan is inevitable," he told reporters in France. "It will be implemented."

Europe Plan To Aid Palestinians Stalls Over U.S. Salary Sanctions (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — A European proposal to provide aid for Palestinian health care has stalled because of concerns by the Bush administration that the plan may violate an American ban on paying salaries to a Hamas government.

Despite what has been described as a humanitarian crisis in Gaza and the West Bank, American and European officials say they strongly doubt that any aid will reach the Palestinians quickly, given the violent chaos in Palestinian areas and Hamas's declared intention to scrap a truce with Israel.

The Europeans have proposed that the World Bank set up a "mechanism" through which donations from Europe and the Arab world can get to the Palestinians.

But American and European officials say that might violate American sanctions laws, which could lead to penalties against any bank that allows a transfer of money to employees in a Hamas government, even if the transaction is overseen by the World Bank.

"This is a nasty situation," said a European diplomat, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue. "No bank wants to run afoul of American banking laws and get shut down by the Treasury Department."

The United States Treasury has barred almost all financial dealings with the Palestinian Authority in response to Hamas's rise to power, under a federal law that makes it a crime to provide funds to terrorist groups.

A senior administration official, also speaking anonymously, noted that the Palestinian situation was a vivid illustration of the reach of American sanctions laws.

"What you've got is a system of banks, even Arab banks, that cannot ignore the risk to their reputations of doing business with terrorists," the official said. "That's quite apart from what they might actually face as a legal risk, which could be substantial."

Hamas, which is on the State Department's list of terrorist organizations, took office in April. Europe and the United States then cut off most of the $1 billion that outside donor governments have given annually to keep the Palestinian Authority afloat. Some 160,000 employees have had their pay suspended or delayed, and banks have halted the transfer of money to the government out of fear of violating American sanctions laws.

DOJ_NMG_0034333

Faced with criticism from Arab countries, the United States joined with Russia, Europe and the United Nations in early May on a plan to speed aid to the Palestinians, bypassing the Hamas government. At the time, officials expressed concerns that some of this money might end up paying nurses, doctors, teachers and others previously on the government payroll, thereby helping to finance Hamas.

But as negotiations on the plan proceeded, a rift opened between the Bush administration and its allies in the Middle East negotiating process. The World Bank is now caught in the middle, various officials said.

The bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, the deputy defense secretary in President Bush's first term, has told European negotiators that he wants to help the Palestinians but that the bank has not received adequate guidance from the United States and the Europeans about where the money is to go.

"The World Bank would like to facilitate the delivery of assistance that a number of donors are eager to provide, so that the Palestinian people do not suffer from a lack of social services, particularly health and education," Mr. Wolfowitz said Wednesday.

On top of these disputes is a fundamental difference in the American and European assessment of the situation in the West Bank and Gaza, officials on both sides say.

European officials charge that there is a real humanitarian crisis because of the aid cutoff, and some say the Bush administration may actually be seeking to block funds in order to promote chaos and eventually bring down the Hamas government. Bush administration officials strongly deny the accusation.

"There is no humanitarian crisis in the Palestinian territories," the senior administration official said. "There is a political and security crisis, and the Hamas government has to make some responsible decisions about how to handle it." The best way, he said, would be for Hamas to reject violence and recognize Israel.

Palestinian Suicide Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Regarding the increasingly violent Palestinian feud between Hamas and Fatah partisans, it's tempting to recall Henry Kissinger's quip about the Iran-Iraq War: "It's a pity both sides can't lose." The tragedy is that the certain losers will be average Palestinians.

Fatah is the political party founded by Yasser Arafat and now nominally led by Palestinian President Mamoud Abbas. On Monday, several hundred Fatah "soldiers" stormed and then set fire to the Hamas-dominated Palestinian Parliament in the West Bank city of Ramallah, reportedly in retaliation for a Hamas attack on a Fatah building in the Gaza Strip. That's only the latest in a series of clashes and assassinations that now claim more Palestinian lives than the Israeli army. For once, the term "cycle of violence" actually applies.

The two groups are currently at loggerheads over the so-called Prisoners' Document, a manifesto by Palestinians jailed by Israel, which proposes terms for a future Palestinian state in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem. Mr. Abbas, sensing an opportunity to corner Hamas politically, wants the document put to a vote in a July 26 referendum. Hamas, which calls the referendum procedurally illegal, objects to its implicit recognition of Israel. Both Hamas and Fatah field well-armed militias, and there is a real possibility that the episodic shooting and looting of the past months could descend into full-scale civil war.

That's not something anyone should wish for, but it hardly comes as a surprise. Both Israel and the U.S. urged Mr. Abbas to confront Hamas when he came to power in January 2005. He dithered and was taken by surprise when Hamas swept parliamentary elections earlier this year. Nor did Mr. Abbas do much to rein in the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the Fatah paramilitary outfit responsible for dozens of suicide bombings in Israel. Instead, he made heroes of the prisoners, even calling on President Bush to lean on Israel for their release despite their terrorist records.

As for Hamas, it recently reaffirmed its murderous bona fides when it mourned the death of "brother" Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, "who was martyred at the hands of the savage crusade campaign" of the U.S. in the Middle East. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel, though the Palestinian Authority is itself a product of the 1993 Oslo Accords, which affirm Israel's right to live "in peace and security."

Both sides in the Palestinian divide have thus contributed to a cult of violence and terror that now engulfs them. Israel's full withdrawal last year from Gaza was supposed to have given the Palestinians an opportunity to demonstrate their ability to govern themselves. What it has shown so far is how little Israel's occupation had to do with the deepest sources of Palestine's grief.

Too many Palestinians have postponed serious consideration of just what sort of state they wish to have, fixating instead on their endless and unreal claims on Israel: full withdrawal to the 1967 armistice lines, the "right of return" for the refugees of 1948 and their descendants, and so on. What is happening now in Ramallah is the result of that kind of political escapism. Until the Palestinians realize that they can't elect a terrorist group without consequence, there will never be any hope for their state, whenever its birth, whatever its borders.

DOJ_NMG_0034334

U.N. Eyes Links To Hariri Slaying (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- The chief U.N. investigator into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri told the Security Council yesterday that he was seeking links between that death and the killings of 14 other critics of the Syrian regime.

Serge Brammertz also asked for an extension and expansion of his mandate and said he had received generally satisfactory cooperation from Syria.

The international inquiry has already determined many of the facts behind the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of Mr. Hariri, which also killed 22 others, Mr. Brammertz said in a report to the council. However, the identities of the people or groups behind it are still largely unknown.

He said his group's probes of the 14 other killings -- all believed to be connected to the victims' outspoken rejection of Syrian interference in Lebanon -- were largely stalled.

Mr. Brammertz said he has been examining the cases with two objectives -- to solve the individual murders, and to establish any connections among them.

"Analytically, the cases can be linked in a number of different ways and from varying perspectives, notably in the similarities in the modus operandi, and their intent." he said, "However, in terms of evidence, none of the cases is developed to an extent that would allow identification and linking of perpetrators."

The Security Council is expected today to extend the inquiry for another year, and to authorize its staff to help Lebanese authorities investigate other "terrorist attacks" committed since Oct. 2004.

Mr. Brammertz, a former Belgian prosecutor who took up the inquiry six months ago, said the Syrian government has "generally responded to all requests in a timely manner." His predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, had more difficulty with Damascus.

The government of Lebanon has been supportive of the commission's work and has actively sought U.N. legal assistance to set up a hybrid court of international and Lebanese judges to try the perpetrators.

Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program for Human Rights Watch, said he is delighted that the Lebanese authorities want to bring international law to the Middle East, a region where few countries have signed onto the International Criminal Court or other international legal mechanisms.

"If they are all linked, the 14 and the Hariri killings, and if they are part of a systematic plan by a group or a government, they would be crimes against humanity," Mr. Dicker said.

"Look at the definition: It includes murder committed as part of a systematic or widespread attack on a civilian population [or] as part of a plan or policy of a group to advance its objectives. The stakes here are really quite historic in terms of an internationalized court."

The 14 assassinations over the last two years have targeted critics of Syrian interference, including two journalists, human rights advocates and Lebanese lawmakers.

Muslims' Anti-U.S. Sentiment Up (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Anti-American sentiment in the Muslim world has reached startling levels, but positive U.S. policies like disaster-relief efforts can help reverse the trend, according to poll results released yesterday.

The data also showed that large numbers of people in several of Iran's neighboring countries -- including 70 percent in Pakistan -- would favor a nuclear-armed Iran.

Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan, nonprofit organization with Sen. John McCain and several members of the 9/11 commission on its advisory board, commissioned the wide-ranging poll on nuclear programs and anti-Western sentiment among Iran's neighbors.

When asked how they viewed the United States, 89 percent in Saudi Arabia, 84 percent in the United Arab Emirates, 71 percent in Turkey and 64 percent in Pakistan answered "unfavorable." Additionally, 66 percent of Pakistanis opposed the U.S.-led fight against terrorism.

Ken Ballen, president of Terror Free Tomorrow and a former federal prosecutor and counsel to the Iran-Contra committee, said the poll results were "startling" and showed that radical anti-Western views were becoming the consensus in the Muslim world.

DOJ_NMG_0034335

"U.S. policy-makers need to take these opinions into account. I know we don't make policies based on poll data, but we need to try to understand why these radical ideas are gaining traction and figure out if our policies are being counterproductive," said Mr. Ballen.

According to the polls, 67 percent in both Pakistan and Turkey and 65 percent in Saudi Arabia viewed a series of Danish cartoons lampooning the prophet Muhammad as evidence that the West is antagonistic toward Islam.

Wayne White, former deputy director of the State Department's Middle East intelligence shop, said, "Unfortunately, a lot of this is true. [Al Qaeda leader Osama] bin Laden succeeded in generating an impression that there is a war of cultures, a divide between East and West, Christian and Muslim."

Mr. Ballen said there was "a silver lining" to the poll results. "Positive U.S. policies like earthquake relief in Pakistan and tsunami aid in Indonesia improved pro-Western attitudes."

The polls showed that U.S. aid promoted a more favorable view of the United States among 75 percent of Pakistanis and 63 percent of Indonesians.

"Many people in that region have seen too much of the military side of the U.S. and not enough of the humanitarian side," Mr. White said. "But it's hard for the U.S. to step up programs there because with budget constraints and financing the war in Iraq, the money just isn't there to do everything."

Among Palestinians, 68 percent had an unfavorable opinion of the United States, but 60 percent said that they wanted the United States to do more to help resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Mr. White said, "This seems confusing because the U.S. is seen as such a big ally of Israel. The Palestinians might not like a lot of the things that the U.S. does, but they know if there is anyone on the globe who can talk Israel into being more reasonable, it's Washington."

When asked about nuclear programs in Iran, 68 percent in Pakistan, 46 percent in Saudi Arabia and 44 percent in Turkey said that they would prefer the United States to accept a nuclear Iran rather than intervene to prevent it.

"I don't think they really support nuclear weapons in Iran," Mr. White said. "It's probably more of a pushback against the U.S., basically saying that they'd mind that a lot less than more U.S. involvement in the region."

Frederic Grare, a South Asia specialist at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said the nearly 70 percent support for Iranian nuclear weapons in Pakistan simply reflected that country's own interests.

"If you ask the elite in Pakistan, they are increasingly insecure with nuclear weapons in Iran. But there is always the fear that if steps are taken to limit Iran, they might be next. Pakistan has only two main interests: Kashmir and nuclear weapons. And they will protect them.

"Also, Pakistan wants to keep good relations with Iran right now, because they are getting closer to India, a rival of Pakistan," he said.

Kenyan Teen's Death Exposes Gaps Seen In HIV/AIDS Support Network (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A 14-year-old who was infected with the virus and orphaned by the disease was brutally beaten by an uncle who struggled to care for him. Some blame not the killer, but an inadequate community of care.

WANDUMBI, Kenya — After losing his parents to AIDS, Isaiah Gakuyo spent most of his short life shuttled among relatives who said the boy had only himself to blame for the beatings and abuse they heaped upon him. "He was always looking for trouble," an aunt said of the HIV-positive 14-year-old.

By the time AIDS activists came to move Isaiah to a rescue home, relatives had banished him to a woodshed, where he was forced to use a separate cup and plate and wasn't allowed to play with a younger cousin.

Their intervention would not be enough. On a wet morning this spring, one of Isaiah's uncles hacked him to death with a forked hoe. As the boy lay bleeding, relatives and neighbors watched in horror, but none offered help until plastic gloves arrived from the local dispensary.

Many describe Isaiah's brutal slaying as an "honor killing," symptomatic of the hatred and discrimination faced by millions of people living with HIV in Africa. Efforts to arrest the 26-year-old uncle have failed, police say, because family members are taking food to him in the forest.

"The family wanted him dead," Nazlin Omar Rahput, an outspoken political activist in Kenya, said of Isaiah. "They saw him as an eyesore."

But even as the killing has shaken Kenyans and sparked a national debate over care and support for those living with HIV, it has also divided the country. Some sympathize with the family, characterizing the attack as a spontaneous fit of rage by an overburdened caretaker. The killing, they say, exposes deep gaps in the nation's AIDS support network, particularly for the 750,000 children, like Isaiah, orphaned by the disease.

DOJ_NMG_0034336

"I can only imagine the pressures of taking care of a child you know is dying," said Wangari Muta Maathai, the Nobel Peace Prize-winning environmentalist and parliament member who represents the Nyeri district, where the family lives. "We are all angry at the uncle, but how many of us tried to help him when he was taking care of the boy?"

Isaiah's problems began shortly after his birth in 1991. When his parents learned they were HIV-positive, his father abandoned the family, forcing his mother to return here to her family homestead near Nyeri, a quiet, impoverished community in the Rift Valley in central Kenya. She died in 1994, and Isaiah and a baby sister were taken in by their grandmother.

Soon AIDS would decimate the family. Isaiah's young sister died. Then two aunts. Then the grandmother. By 2000, the family's suffering was apparent around the community. "Everybody knew," said Daniel Gathuku, 53, a neighbor.

Isaiah ended up in the custody of Justice Ndumia, one of the several uncles who cared for the boy. This one was prone to abandoning his own family for months at a time.

Though Isaiah was beginning to suffer health problems, he excelled in school.

"He was a very bright boy," recalled Marwa Kihumba, headmaster of Wandumbi Primary School. Isaiah was so eager to be accepted at a top secondary school that he decided to repeat the eighth grade and retake his graduation exams because he believed he could score higher, Kihumba said.

But clashes at home with his uncle were growing. Isaiah complained about feeling sick and developed skin rashes. His hair fell out in patches, which he tried to cover with headbands and hooded jackets. When the uncle threatened to whip the boy for failing to do his chores, Isaiah ran away.

After Isaiah stayed briefly with neighbors, tribal leaders persuaded a distant relative, a Presbyterian Church elder, to shelter the boy.

Worried he might infect their grandson, who was also living at their farm, Charles Kariuki, 65, and his wife, Grace, put Isaiah in a shack once used for chickens. They bought him a strong disinfectant soap, hoping it would clear up his boils and sores.

"We had another little boy here to think about," Kariuki said.

After Isaiah complained to teachers about mistreatment at home, they contacted AIDS activists. By the time Isaiah arrived at a Nyeri rescue center, his CD4 count, a key indicator of the body's immune system, was 2. Normal CD counts range from 500 to 1,500.

Doctors at the center, run by the Kenya Network of Women with AIDS/HIV, immediately prescribed a daily regimen of antiretroviral drugs and began treating possible tuberculosis. Center officials say the gaunt, 4-foot-6 boy thrived, playing with other HIV-positive children, watching cartoons and learning for the first time about his disease.

"People hated him because of his appearance, so it was a good environment for him," said Francis Muiruri, head of the Nyeri center.

During group therapy and counseling, Isaiah frequently broke into tears while recalling his life and the treatment by his family, counselors said. But they said he appeared to accept his HIV status, even mentoring younger children about the disease.

After a month, Isaiah was asked whether there was anyone in the family who could care for him. He mentioned a young uncle, John Kiboi.

At 26, Kiboi was barely able to care for himself. An orphan like Isaiah, he was unemployed, uneducated and unmarried. Relatives and villagers considered the young man, known for drinking and pot smoking, an unsuitable choice, but no one intervened.

In the fall of 2005, the arrangement seemed to be working. Isaiah returned to school, and Kiboi appeared to be taking an interest, fetching the free food and medicine offered at the center, officials said.

But Isaiah's mood began to darken, friends and family members say.

"After he came back from the rescue center, he said he didn't want to take his medicine anymore," said Ann Mumbi, 18, a neighbor and friend who often cooked for Isaiah and washed his clothes. "He said he just wanted to die."

His behavior became more erratic. Once he burned his clothes and bed blankets, according to an aunt. Another day he announced he planned to dig up his mother's grave to retrieve a watch he believed was buried with her.

"He did all that just so he would be beaten," said Mary Njeri, an aunt married to Ndumia, the uncle who had driven Isaiah to run away.

Isaiah repeated his exams at the end of 2005. He not only scored worse, but his mark was below the minimum required to be accepted at any secondary school.

At the center's Christmas party, volunteers from the AIDS/HIV network tried to bolster his mood, promising they would intervene with school officials to find someplace willing to accept him. They promised to raise the money for his school fees.

DOJ_NMG_0034337

The arrangement with Kiboi was beginning to strain. The young man expected other family members to share in Isaiah's care, but none stepped forward. He tried to return Isaiah to the rescue center, but the boy pleaded to return home with him.

"He was fed up with taking care of the boy," said Nancy Macharia, a center counselor. A week before the attack, Isaiah showed up at the center complaining he wasn't being fed.

Mumbi said tensions peaked the night before the attack. Uncle and nephew quarreled after Kiboi accused Isaiah of disclosing Kiboi's secret courtship of a local girl to the girl's mother.

Mumbi said she spent that night in Isaiah and Kiboi's home, and when they awoke she sent the boy to a neighbor's for fire or matches to cook breakfast. But no one was home there. When the boy returned, Kiboi became enraged, hitting Isaiah with his fists, Mumbi said. She said she'd seen such beatings before, and she fled up the hill to wait until it was over.

A few moments later, she saw Kiboi running away and heard hysterical screaming from one of Isaiah's cousins, who had been working nearby in a field.

Mumbi and a dozen other neighbors rushed to find Isaiah lying on his stomach, deep punctures and gashes on the left side of his head. Eyes open and breathing steadily, Isaiah bled profusely and appeared to be unconscious. Next to him lay the bloodied hoe.

Bystanders were too afraid to bandage his wounds and sent someone to fetch a doctor.

"No one touched him," said Ann Wanjiku, 23, a neighbor. About 40 minutes later, someone returned with plastic gloves, and they carried Isaiah to a clinic a mile away.

"By the time he got here he already was in a deep coma," said Gichuki Nderitu, head of Wandumbi Health Dispensary. Nderitu said he'd treated Isaiah many times over the years and had deep reservations about Kiboi's ability to care for the boy. "I wasn't surprised it ended this way," he said.

Few members of Isaiah's family attended the funeral. Neighbors and tribal elders also stayed away. Instead, the boy's coffin was carried by AIDS activists and his friends at the rescue center.

At Isaiah and Kiboi's now vacant home, new padlocks keep visitors out. But a few reminders of the struggle can be seen by peering inside. Two broken windows. A picture of Isaiah's mother askew on the wall.

Today, only the aunt, Njeri, is left, supporting three children. Her husband died of AIDS in December. She said she hadn't seen Kiboi since he fled.

Tilling the soil around her home, she denied that AIDS had devastated the family, blaming Isaiah for the family's troubles. "It was all the boy," she said.

Less than 50 feet away is Isaiah's grave, a mound of red soil overlooking a sweeping green valley. Njeri said she thought Isaiah was buried near his mother, next to the cornfield, but no one could remember the exact location of her grave.

There is no marker or stone. Land is considered too valuable to dedicate for burial ground. After a few years, the mound will simply erode. Grasses and plants will take over. Eventually Isaiah's grave, like his mother's, will disappear under the cornfield.

Mexican Opinion Polls Predict López Obrador Win (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

Andrés Manuel López Obrador, Mexico's leftwing candidate, is on course to become the country's next president in the July 2 election, according to two opinion polls out this week.

Mr López Obrador, who is running for the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD), has now inched into the lead with 37 per cent of the vote against 35 per cent for Felipe Calderón, the centre-right candidate for the ruling National Action Party (PAN).

The poll, published in the Reforma daily newspaper, reinforces the results of a second poll published on Monday, which puts the leftwing candidate 3.2 per cent ahead of Mr Calderón.

While both polls show a technical tie – the margin of error in each is more than 2 per cent – they also show a clear improvement in Mr López Obrador's standings since last month, and suggest that he will win the July 2 election if the trend holds.

In the case of Wednesday's Reforma poll, for example, it is the first time the PRD candidate has led since March. The newspaper's previous poll, published on May 24, had Mr López Obrador trailing his main rival by four points.

"López Obrador is definitely rising," said Rafael Fernández de Castro, a professor of politics at Mexico City's ITAM university, on Wednesday.

A third poll, due to be published on Wednesday by the GEA consultancy in Mexico City, showed Mr López Obrador regaining seven points from his main rival since last month – although it still has Mr Calderón in the lead by two points.

Political analysts on Wednesday said the biggest reason for Mr López Obrador's recovery was the perception that he had won an informal round of mud-slinging following this month's live presidential debate between the main candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0034338

His allegations that Mr Calderón's brother-in-law had won lucrative state contracts during Mr Calderón's brief stint as energy secretary have been the centrepiece of up-market dinner parties and downtown cantina tequila sessions alike this week.

Mr Fernández de Castro said: "Independently of how much truth there is in the allegations, López Obrador managed to complicated life for a candidate who has presented himself as a man with clean hands."

Even so, pollsters still say it is too close to pick a winner. Guillermo Valdés of GEA said on Wednesday that Mr Calderón is likely to continue promising stability and economic security while attacking Mr López Obrador with suggestions that he is a radical and dangerous leftist.

He said Mr López Obrador would likely try to maximise the mileage from last week's muckraking, and promote his economic platform of providing benefits to the poor.

Mexico's Lopez Obrador: A Common Man Bent On Change (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

Presidential front-runner Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador is seen as a salvation by some, a danger by others. One thing is sure: He knows politics.

MEXICO CITY — The candidate has a certain sex appeal. Imagine a mestizo Bill Clinton: cappuccino-colored skin, a full head of white hair and a charismatic stage presence. Sometimes, his arrival at a campaign stop will provoke a scream from a woman who, a second later, realizes she's too old to be acting that way.

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador is the candidate of the common man (and, clearly, of the common woman) in this year's presidential campaign. His critics call him an irresponsible populist who will ruin Mexico's precarious economic stability, but to millions of others, the 52-year-old standard-bearer for the leftist Democratic Revolution Party is hope incarnate, a warrior and father figure rolled into one.

Polls released this week show he has retaken the lead from conservative, free-market candidate Felipe Calderon.

Lopez Obrador fought off impeachment as mayor of Mexico City, took care of the capital's "little grandmothers" with a monthly subsidy check and launched the most ambitious transportation projects in the traffic-choked metropolis in a generation. Now he's on a crusade to bring the most ambitious social and economic reforms Mexico has seen in decades.

As mayor, he drove a white Nissan Tsuru, a variation of the Sentra sold in the U.S., and the kind of unassuming vehicle favored here by penny-pinching office workers. Today, while his opponents charter jets, Lopez Obrador crisscrosses the country on commercial flights and in a caravan of white SUVs.

From the Indian villages near the Guatemalan border to the barrios of Tijuana, he revels in oddities of local protocol. They give him silly belts to wear in Jalisco and crowns of pink roses in Chiapas, and he never hesitates to put them on. Very often, women float near the front of his rallies wearing yellow T-shirts emblazoned with the catch phrase, "Andres Manuel, you are my rooster!"

In the quaint town of San Martin de Hidalgo near Guadalajara, roustabout men and young mothers sweat in the shade of the central plaza's few trees as Lopez Obrador launches into his standard stump speech.

His is an undeniably populist vision of Mexico's problems. He makes the crowd laugh and hiss as he strikes out at favorite punching bags, such as former President Carlos Salinas de Gortari, reviled by many as a symbol of corruption, or the banker Roberto Hernandez, one of the richest men in Mexico.

"I could have made a deal with those men, but I didn't," he says. "We don't want to go down the same old path…. The country is tired of cosmetic changes. We need major surgery."

Sometimes he gets carried away. So far on the campaign trail this year, Lopez Obrador has called outgoing conservative President Vicente Fox a "puppet" of the United States and a "squawking bird," earning widespread criticism each time.

In fact, Lopez Obrador's rough-and-tumble campaign has many Mexicans wondering exactly what kind of president he might be if were to win the election July 2.

Is he a demagogue in waiting? Or is he a democratic reformer who will finally earn the poor a seat at the table with the country's political elite?

Or will he simply continue to be Lopez Obrador: the son of a humble family from the gulf coast state of Tabasco who's never quite shaken his provincial air, but who is widely acknowledged to be the most talented political fighter in Mexico?

Lopez Obrador was born in 1953, the eldest of eight children of a lower-middle-class family in the village of Tepetitan, a place of slow-moving rivers where baseball, not soccer, is the favorite pastime.

"Back then, Tepetitan had 600 people or so," Lopez Obrador recalled in a recent interview with filmmaker Luis Mandoki. "There was no high school, no roads. All the communication was by river. Tabasco is water. We have as much water as sky."

DOJ_NMG_0034339

His parents ran a small store. Andres Manuel the child was as headstrong as Lopez Obrador the politician would grow up to be. Because he tensed up every time his parents found fault in his behavior, he earned the family nickname "The Rock."

The young Lopez Obrador's dream was to make it to baseball's major leagues, said Luis Alonso Torres, a childhood friend. "We weren't from rich families. Like every public school student, he had to make a lot of sacrifices to continue his education."

In the 1960s, his family moved to the nearby oil-patch boomtown of Villahermosa, and he joined the party that dominated all aspects of Mexico's political life, the Revolutionary Institutional Party, known by its Spanish initials, PRI.

Lopez Obrador was a true believer in the PRI and even wrote the lyrics to the PRI's Tabasco anthem. But by 1988, he and other dissenters were accusing the party of betraying the poor and soon formed the new Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD.

Lopez Obrador became the PRD leader in Tabasco. In 1994, he ran for governor and lost to the PRI candidate, Roberto Madrazo. He denounced the result as a fraud and launched a protest campaign to force the federal government to overturn the result. It left him bloodied by police.

The fight in Tabasco helped propel Lopez Obrador to national prominence. Two years later, he was elected national president of the PRD. And in 2000, he won election as mayor of Mexico City.

Lopez Obrador quickly made it clear that he would be unlike any mayor the city had ever seen. He scheduled daily 6:30 a.m. news conferences. The news day began with Lopez Obrador, and often it ended that way.

"It was the first time a politician had made himself available to the Mexico City press corps every day without reading from a script," said Hector Aguilar Camin, an author here.

His government began building elevated roads and special bus lanes to relieve traffic congestion, the most important public works in the city in 20 years.

Lopez Obrador also bucked the fiscal austerity of Fox's government by launching monthly subsidies for all residents over 70. His popularity soared.

Though he charmed many with his lilting Tabasco accent and often acerbic commentary, the Mexico City elite squirmed.

"He is a man of deep prejudices, and he doesn't think much of the Mexican bourgeoisie," said Rossana Fuentes Berain, a political analyst at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico.

Political analysts widely agreed that he was the favorite to win the presidential election, with his pledge to fight poverty by increasing social spending and using government funds to stimulate the economy.

Then, last April, PRI and National Action Party legislators joined in an effort to impeach Lopez Obrador on an obscure charge, a move that would have prohibited him from running for president.

The political drama that followed polarized Mexico.

Addressing a crowd of thousands in Mexico City's central square on the day he was to be removed from office by Congress, the tough politician looked, if only for a moment, thoroughly beaten. He wiped his brow as he approached the microphone, struggling to hold back tears.

"I was worried," he would tell friends later.

"I asked people what I could do to hold on. The best they could tell me was, 'Breathe deeply.' "

In the end, it was the "hard and angry tone" of the opening lines of his speech that saved him, he said.

Congress voted to impeach him. Within days, more than half a million of his supporters took to the streets of Mexico City. A local judge tossed out the original complaint. The attorney general resigned, and Fox announced that the case would not proceed. "The Rock" had won.

Lopez Obrador returned to the mayor's office more popular than ever: Three polls gave him approval ratings above 80%.

"He is the most talented politician we have," Fuentes Berain said. "He is creative, inventive and has a tremendous capacity for response under fire."

Months later, as the presidential campaign got underway in earnest, Lopez Obrador made what is widely regarded as a crucial mistake. He refused to respond to a series of attack ads by Calderon, the National Action Party candidate, including one that compared him to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the bete noir of Latin American conservatives.

Then he chose not to show up for the first presidential debate.

By late May, however, the old Lopez Obrador was back, firing with ads and interviews on TV news programs.

"I hate to use the media, because it's ridiculously expensive," he told one interviewer. This was the same man, after all, who still lived in a modest Mexico City apartment rather than the sprawling residential compounds favored by many top politicos here.

Lopez Obrador says he doesn't want to lose his authenticity, the qualities that keep him close to the common people. At nearly every rally, he repeats the same promise: "I will not steal, I will not lie, and I will not betray the people."

If Lopez Obrador wins the presidential election next month, it will be because millions of Mexicans believe he will keep that promise.

DOJ_NMG_0034340

Cecilia Sanchez of The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

In Mexico, Migration Issue Gets No Traction (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Ahead of July Vote, Presidential Candidates Find Little to Gain From Highly Charged Debate in U.S.

HUEJUTLA, Mexico -- The illegal immigration debate draws millions of protesters to the streets of U.S. cities. It touches off podium-pounding on Capitol Hill and passions among talking heads.

But the same debate here in Mexico, the country of origin of most illegal immigrants in the United States, is far from a blockbuster issue in this year's presidential contest. Even though developments in the United States have forced candidates to discuss migration more often in the past two months than in the early stages of the race, none of the three major contenders has made the issue a central tenet of his campaign.

Their calculus is simple, according to political analysts and advisers to the candidates: They don't think it will help them win the July 2 election.

"Foreign policy doesn't give you any votes in Mexico," Jorge MontaÃ±o, a former Mexican ambassador to the United States and to the United Nations, said in an interview. "The candidates have been extremely practical."

Beyond the political calculation, the candidates' strategies are grounded in fundamentals, including the reality that a Mexican president has no control over U.S. immigration law, and in hard numbers. Expectations that huge numbers of Mexicans living in the United States would register to vote went unmet. After 1 million absentee ballots were printed, only 40,800 of an estimated 4 million eligible Mexicans living in the United States registered.

Recent political history also plays into the calculation, illustrating the risks candidates face by emphasizing migration. After his victory in 2000, President Vicente Fox staked much of his political capital on hopes of reaching an immigration accord with the United States. Those hopes disintegrated when the United States tightened its border policy following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, leaving the perception that Fox had failed in one of his most important missions.

All three leading contenders in this year's race, Felipe CalderÃ³n of Fox's National Action Party, or PAN; AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador of the Democratic Revolutionary Party, or PRD; and Roberto Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, have said they want an immigration accord with the United States. But none has guaranteed they will deliver. On the stump they tend to race past any mention of an accord and on to pledges that they will stem migration by improving the economy.

"I would rather see a Huastecan working in a packing house in Huejutla than in a packing house in California," CalderÃ³n said during a recent campaign stop in Huejutla, a mountain town in eastern Mexico, 120 miles northeast of Mexico City, where indigenous Huastecan women placed a mound of flower petals on his head.

CalderÃ³n, who has spoken against building more fences along the U.S.-Mexico border, is proposing that Mexico solicit aid funds from the United States and Canada, another major destination of Mexican workers, for development programs in impoverished areas of Mexico that send the most illegal migrants abroad.

Arturo Sarukhan, a former Mexican consul general in New York who is CalderÃ³n's lead foreign policy adviser, said he expects candidates to address migration more often in the final weeks of the campaign. But he believes the discussion has to be presented through the prism of the economy of Mexico, where, the World Bank has estimated, half the population lives in poverty.

"The immigration issue, per se, does not weigh significantly in the campaign," Sarukhan said in an interview. "At the end of the day, the debate is about job creation."

LÃ³pez Obrador, who is tied with or slightly ahead of CalderÃ³n in new opinion polls, is taking a similar tack. In a televised presidential debate last week, LÃ³pez Obrador said Mexico needed to address the root causes of illegal immigration by providing more jobs, and he promised not to insert Mexico into the "internal lives of other countries and other governments."

"If we make things good in Mexico, if we clean our house, if there is progress in our country, if there is justice, if there is security, if there is political and social stability, they will respect us on the outside," he said.

LÃ³pez Obrador asserts that Mexico must convince the United States that illegal migration will not be slowed by building more fences and "militarizing the border," a reference to President Bush's decision to deploy 6,000 National Guard troops to support the U.S. Border Patrol. But the main thrust of his campaign has been trained on domestic issues, primarily promises to help poor voters, who form his political base, to lower their gas and electricity bills.

Migration "is a very important issue, but it will not define the Mexican elections," JosÃ© MarÃ-a PÃ©rez Gay, a former Mexican ambassador to Portugal, who is LÃ³pez Obrador's chief foreign policy adviser, said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0034341

The migration question is particularly ticklish for CalderÃ³n. He has positioned himself as a candidate who will continue policies instituted by Fox, whose historic victory ended 70 years of PRI rule, an era marked by corruption and rigged elections. But he also faces the fact that the number of Mexicans living illegally in the United States has surged during Fox's six-year term to a record 6.2 million, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

By linking his political identity to Fox, CalderÃ³n has given the other candidates an opening to indirectly slam his candidacy by criticizing Fox during flashpoints in the U.S. immigration debate. LÃ³pez Obrador and Madrazo, who is a distant third in most opinion polls, went on the attack last month after Fox applauded a U.S. Senate vote that preserved proposals to create a guest-worker program and to develop a process for migrants living illegally in the United States to gain legal status.

LÃ³pez Obrador accused Fox, who is prohibited by Mexican law from campaigning for his party's candidate, of acting as CalderÃ³n's unofficial campaign manager and of being a puppet of the United States. Madrazo, who has pledged to slow migration by creating 9 million jobs in six years, accused Fox of "losing the battle" with the U.S. Congress.

"It's a deceit," Roberta Lajous, a former Mexican ambassador who advises Madrazo on foreign policy, said of Fox's reaction to the Senate vote. "He's acting as if there was a result. Nothing is final."

The uncertainty about the outcome in Congress is creating complications for the candidates here as they try to formulate their stances on migration issues, PÃ©rez Gay said, and it is one of the main reasons migration has not taken a larger role in the campaign.

What is clear, PÃ©rez Gay and the other candidates' campaign advisers say, is that millions of Mexican migrants, legal and illegal, will be in the United States for years to come.

LÃ³pez Obrador has proposed converting all of Mexico's consulates in the United States into offices tasked with protecting Mexican migrants from discrimination. During the presidential debate, which had a pre-formatted question about migration, he described his proposals for the consulates using a Spanish phrase that can mean "branches of the Mexican attorney general's office." PÃ©rez Gay later said that the candidate's wording has been misinterpreted and that consular staff would act in a defense capacity, rather than attempt to be prosecutors.

Nonetheless, CalderÃ³n pounced on the remark, using it to further his contention that LÃ³pez Obrador is "dangerous" and would damage Mexico's relations with other countries.

"Having a dignified relationship with the United States does not necessarily imply having a confrontational relationship," CalderÃ³n said during a speech to a group of migrant leaders on June 7, the day after the presidential debate. "If we sum up the immigration theme, and many other themes, as themes of controversy and hate between the people of the United States and the people of Mexico, we'll be making a mistake and closing doors."

But by the next day, migration had slipped into the background again, and the candidates had moved on to other things.

China Easing Its Stance On Taiwan (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Tolerance Grows For Status Quo

BEIJING -- Gradually and without fanfare, China has substantially softened its stand on Taiwan, according to senior officials and diplomats. President Hu Jintao, they said, has begun to play down China's long-standing vow to recover the self-ruled island by force if necessary and shifted the focus to preventing any move toward formal independence.

The adjustment, which has become clearer in recent months, has brought China's policy on the volatile Taiwan issue closer to that of the United States. Washington has long maintained that the island's half-century-old status quo -- independent in fact but not in law -- should not be changed until Beijing and Taipei can work out a mutually acceptable peaceful solution.

"Before, we never said 'status quo,' " said a Chinese academic who advises Hu's government on Taiwan. "Now we say it all the time."

Officials and diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. One of them, a high-level official, said he had visited Beijing and spoken to Hu privately about Taiwan for several hours. Hu, according to the visitor, said he had no plans to act militarily against Taiwan unless the status quo was changed in a way that risked causing him to "lose face." That concern reflected the ardor for reunification among many Chinese on the mainland.

Despite continuing propaganda about "liberating" Taiwan, Hu said China's bottom line was that it would not allow the island to take decisive steps toward legal independence, the visitor recalled. Backing up that resolution, China has deployed nearly 800 medium- and short-range ballistic missiles in southern China, with targets around the Taiwan Strait, and is steadily building its military forces with Taiwan as a principal focus.

DOJ_NMG_0034342

The government also passed an anti-secession law in March 2005 that legally enshrined the long-standing pledge to use military force as a last resort to prevent independence. But barring changes in the status quo, Hu told the visitor, Beijing's policy is to encourage more economic and other exchanges between Taiwan and the mainland in hopes that, at some undefined point, China will have liberalized enough that peaceful reunification will be possible.

To encourage those ties, the two governments announced on Wednesday, China and Taiwan will launch direct charter passenger flights between them during major holidays. The decision appeared to represent a step toward restoring regular direct flights cut in 1949 during civil war.

As part of China's longer-term strategy, Hu's government has high hopes that Taiwan's strongly pro-independence president, Chen Shui-bian of the Democratic Progressive Party, will be voted out of office in the island's next elections, scheduled for 2008, and will be replaced by Ma Ying-jeou, the Nationalist Party leader, who favors better relations with the mainland.

The Bush administration and allied governments have recognized Hu's shift in Taiwan policy and base their calculations on it, according to U.S. and other veteran diplomats in Asia. As a result, they added, a partnership of sorts has evolved in which Beijing relies on the United States to ensure that Chen does nothing to push China up against a wall.

The United States has long been Taiwan's main ally, wielding heavy influence in Taipei. Since it has promised to help defend Taiwan against any Chinese attack, Washington also has its own reasons for preventing Chen from doing anything that could raise tensions.

According to Chinese sources, senior Chinese officials have explained to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others in Washington that they are concerned Chen might seek to amend the constitution in a way that implies Taiwan is legally independent. In response, they said, U.S. officials have warned Chen in public and private against making substantial changes to the document.

Chen, in a recent interview, said a number of amendments nevertheless would soon be proposed by his Democratic Progressive Party. But he said U.S. and Chinese leaders should not be worried because the opposition Nationalists, who control the legislature, would not allow them to pass. Since then, Chen has been engulfed by financial scandals involving his family; it is unclear what effect this will have on his plans.

China's adjustment was decided at senior levels of the Communist Party in the summer of 2004, shortly after Chen was reelected to a second four-year term and Beijing realized its policy was going nowhere, officials said. The Chinese decided that talk of conquering Taiwan within a short time was not fruitful and that the real answer lay in the longer-term strategy, based on making China more attractive to Taiwan's 23 million inhabitants through economic and political development, explained the academic, who is well connected on the Taiwan issue.

Taiwan has been self-ruled since 1949, when Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist forces, defeated by Mao Zedong's Communists, fled across the strait and set up an exile government. China has always maintained that Taiwan is part of the country and must return to rule by Beijing. But in recent years, Taiwan has developed into a flourishing democracy, creating an additional divide with the mainland's authoritarian, one-party Communist system. Hu's shift was in part a recognition of this new barrier to reunification.

Hu's predecessor, former president Jiang Zemin, had emphasized early reunification, by force if necessary. A number of deadlines were attributed to him -- 10 years, 15 years and 50 years -- although he never laid out a clear road map. In addition, he ordered an acceleration of China's military modernization after the Clinton administration sent two aircraft carrier battle groups into the Taiwan Strait during a period of high tension in the mid-1990s.

This encouraged an enduring public debate, particularly in Taiwan and the United States, about the likelihood of an imminent Chinese military invasion. The discussion also was fed by the defection a half-dozen years ago of a People's Liberation Army colonel who revealed Chinese battle plans against the island and, more recently, by Chen's frequent assertions that China has drawn up a schedule calling for an attack in the coming years.

Secrecy As A Tool Of Government In China (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

BEIJING, June 14 — The trial of a researcher for The New York Times, which is to begin here on Friday, is evidence of China's increasing reliance on state secrecy laws to tighten control over information, experts in human rights and the legal system say.

The researcher, Zhao Yan, 44, who worked in the Beijing bureau of The Times, is charged with fraud and disclosing state secrets. Mr. Zhao denies the charges. The Times also denies that he disclosed state secrets.

DOJ_NMG_0034343

Critics of the case against Mr. Zhao accuse the authorities of applying all-embracing secrecy laws to contain public debate, burgeoning Internet discussion and sometimes rebellious news media.

Even as China's headlong economic boom continues to deliver wider economic and personal freedom, the scope of these laws has been broadened over the last two decades to include almost all information related to the ruling Communist Party and the government.

"The system is actually expanding," said Nicolas Becquelin, a Hong Kong-based researcher for Human Rights Watch. "Basically, anything can be classified as a state secret."

Mr. Zhao has been in custody since his arrest in September 2004. If he is found guilty here in the No. 2 Intermediate People's Court, he could face 10 years or more in prison.

The charges are linked to an article in The Times on Sept. 7, 2004, reporting that the former president, Jiang Zemin, had offered to resign as head of the military. The report proved to be accurate; Mr. Jiang retired less than two weeks later.

But Mr. Zhao's indictment does not allege that he was the conduit for this information.

Instead, the principal evidence against him is a photocopy of a handwritten note he prepared in July 2004 about rumors of the possible promotion of two generals as part of the battle for influence in the military between Mr. Jiang and his eventual successor, Hu Jintao.

This information was included in the Sept. 7 article to illustrate the rivalry between the leaders. Only one of the generals was promoted.

The original note remains in the Beijing office of The Times.

In March, prosecutors dropped the charges against him, and it appeared that Mr. Zhao might be released. But an almost identical set of charges was reinstated last month.

For defense lawyers in China, cases involving state secrecy laws can present formidable obstacles.

A powerful government agency, the State Secrets Bureau, has absolute authority to decide whether disclosed information is a state secret, according to experts on the Chinese legal system. Courts have no power to challenge these rulings.

In addition, the authorities can limit contact between lawyers and their clients, deny access to evidence and hold closed hearings.

After Mr. Zhao's arrest, his lawyer, Mo Shaoping, was repeatedly barred from consulting with his client because the case involved state secrets. Legal experts noted that Mr. Mo must be careful about his public comments on the case because exposing how the law worked could also be deemed an offense.

The scope of the state secrets laws also serves to deter public analysis and criticism of prosecutions. Chinese legal experts approached for comment, for example, insisted that their names not appear in any article about Mr. Zhao's case, for fear of official reprisals.

The legal experts have little doubt that Mr. Zhao, a journalist and social advocate, will be found guilty, because a decision to proceed to trial in China is tantamount to a conviction — particularly in cases involving state secrets or national security.

But Mr. Mo said that he was preparing a robust challenge to the prosecution's handling of the case and that he would contest critical elements of the evidence. He said he would argue that the court should not have agreed to hear the case because prosecutors had reintroduced the same charges against Mr. Zhao, ignoring the requirement to include substantial new evidence.

On the state secrets charge, he said, he will argue that the prosecution's version of events is incomplete because it fails to show how secrets were relayed to The Times. And, he said, he will tell the court that prosecutors are unable to explain how a copy of the handwritten note came to be part of the evidence.

Mr. Mo said he also intended to contest the ruling by the State Secrets Bureau that the note contained state secrets.

With the prosecution relying on what were described as rumors in the note, Mr. Mo said, he intends to ask the court if a rumor can be deemed a state secret. If it is, he said, he plans to ask if a rumor must be accurate to deserve the classification, given that events suggested in the note were only partly borne out.

Mr. Mo said a judge who would preside over the trial, Wang Wantie, had told him that the court would rely heavily on prosecution evidence and Mr. Zhao's testimony on the charge of disclosing state secrets.

Joseph Kahn, bureau chief for The Times in Beijing and writer of the Sept. 7 article, would be the only witness for the defense, Mr. Mo said.

Mr. Kahn has provided written testimony, and Mr. Mo has sought approval for him to appear at the trial, though it does not appear likely that permission will be given.

Judge Wang said only the Foreign Affairs Office of China's highest court, the Supreme People's Court, has the power to approve such an application, according to Mr. Mo.

DOJ_NMG_0034344

Mr. Mo said Judge Wang had also told him there would be no witnesses called on the fraud charge. Prosecution witnesses lived outside Beijing and the cost of travel was deemed too high to require them to attend the hearing, according to the judge. Without prosecution witnesses, there was no need for the defense to call witnesses, Judge Wang told Mr. Mo.

"This may be a trial with no witnesses," Mr. Mo said.

The Journalist As Scapegoat (NYT)

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Over the 22 months that the journalist Zhao Yan has been unjustly held in a Beijing prison, it has become clear that the Chinese government wants to use this case to send a warning. His unfair treatment at the hands of his prosecutors is meant to remind journalists in China that nobody is really safe when reporting on matters of state.

But the trumped-up charges against Mr. Zhao and the trial scheduled to open tomorrow also send another larger message to the world. If Mr. Zhao is convicted, it means that despite China's many advances in recent years, the government and the legal system are moving backward. It means that the government is tightening control over information. And it means that China is willing to abuse its citizens' rights and the country's legal code when it needs a scapegoat in the name of state security.

Mr. Zhao, a prominent expert on rural China and a researcher for The New York Times, has been imprisoned since September 2004 after a Times article that month about a shift in power in China. The article predicted correctly that former President Jiang Zemin would cede his authority over the military to President Hu Jintao. Ten days after the story and a few days before President Hu took control of the military, Mr. Zhao was arrested. He is charged with fraud and disclosing state secrets. Over these long months, he has denied the charges and The Times has repeatedly denied that he was the source of any state secrets.

Charges against Mr. Zhao were dropped in March, at the same time President Hu was visiting the United States, then reinstated — a maneuver that is illegal in China. Despite having two expert Chinese lawyers, his prospects now look grim, since in most cases a trial is tantamount to conviction.

Keeping this journalist in prison will stand as a black mark against the Chinese government and, of course, a tragedy for Mr. Zhao and his friends and family. As Mr. Hu works to modernize his nation, the world will also judge China by how its government and courts treat an individual like Zhao Yan.

China Makes Ultimate Punishment Mobile (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Fatal injections administered from vehicles

CHONGQING, China — Zhang Shiqiang, known as the Nine-Fingered Devil, first tasted justice at 13. His father caught him stealing and cut off one of Zhang's fingers.

Twenty-five years later, in 2004, Zhang met retribution once more, after his conviction for double murder and rape. He was one of the first people put to death in China's new fleet of mobile execution chambers.

The country that executed more than four times as many convicts as the rest of the world combined last year is slowly phasing out public executions by firing squad in favor of lethal injections. Unlike the USA and Singapore, the only two other countries where death is administered by injection, China metes out capital punishment from specially equipped “death vans” that shuttle from town to town.

Makers of the death vans say the vehicles and injections are a civilized alternative to the firing squad, ending the life of the condemned more quickly, clinically and safely. The switch from gunshots to injections is a sign that China “promotes human rights now,” says Kang Zhongwen, who designed the Jinguan Automobile death van in which “Devil” Zhang took his final ride.

For years, foreign human rights groups have accused China of arbitrary executions and cruelty in its use of capital punishment. The exact number of convicts put to death is a state secret. Amnesty International estimates there were at least 1,770 executions in China in 2005 — vs. 60 in the USA, but the group says on its website that the toll could be as high as 8,000 prisoners.

The “majority are still by gunshot,” says Liu Renwen, death penalty researcher at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, a think tank in Beijing. “But the use of injections has grown in recent years, and may have reached 40%.”

China's critics contend that the transition from firing squads to injections in death vans facilitates an illegal trade in prisoners' organs.

DOJ_NMG_0034345

Injections leave the whole body intact and require participation of doctors. Organs can "be extracted in a speedier and more effective way than if the prisoner is shot," says Mark Allison, East Asia researcher at Amnesty International in Hong Kong. "We have gathered strong evidence suggesting the involvement of (Chinese) police, courts and hospitals in the organ trade."

Executions in death vans are recorded on video and audio that is played live to local law enforcement authorities — a measure intended to ensure they are carried out legally.

China's refusal to give outsiders access to the bodies of executed prisoners has added to suspicions about what happens afterward: Corpses are typically driven to a crematorium and burned before relatives or independent witnesses can view them.

Chinese authorities are sensitive to allegations that they are complicit in the organ trade. In March, the Ministry of Health issued regulations explicitly banning the sale of organs and tightening approval standards for transplants.

Even so, Amnesty International said in a report in April that huge profits from the sale of prisoners' organs might be part of why China refuses to consider doing away with the death penalty.

"Given the high commercial value of organs, it is doubtful the new regulations will have an effect," Allison says.

Makers of death vans say they save money for poor localities that would otherwise have to pay to construct execution facilities in prisons or court buildings. The vans ensure that prisoners sentenced to death can be executed locally, closer to communities where they broke the law.

That "deters others from committing crime and has more impact" than executions carried out elsewhere, Kang says.

Jinguan — "Golden Champion" in Chinese — lies an hour's drive from Chongqing in southwestern China, below the green slopes of Cliff Mountain. Along with the death vans, the company also makes bulletproof limousines for the country's rich and armored trucks for banks. Jinguan's glossy death van brochure is printed in both Chinese and English.

From the outside, the vans resemble the police vehicles seen daily on China's roads. A look inside reveals their function.

"I'm most proud of the bed. It's very humane, like an ambulance," Kang says. He points to the power-driven metal stretcher that glides out at an incline. "It's too brutal to haul a person aboard," he says. "This makes it convenient for the criminal and the guards."

The lethal cocktail used in the injections is mixed only in Beijing, something that has prompted complaints from local courts.

"Some places can't afford the cost of sending a person to Beijing — perhaps $250 — plus $125 more for the drug," says Qiu Xingsheng, a former judge working as a lawyer in Chongqing. Death-by-gunshot requires "very little expense," he says.

Qiu has attended executions by firing squad where the kneeling prisoner is shot in the back of the head. The guards "ask the prisoner to open his mouth, so the bullet can pass out of the mouth and leave the face intact," he says.

In the USA, some death row inmates and death penalty opponents want the Supreme Court to declare lethal injections cruel and unusual. A recent lawsuit claimed inmates suffer excruciating pain during executions because they do not get enough anesthetic.

There is no such debate in China, which uses the same three-drug cocktail as the U.S. federal government and most U.S. states: sodium thiopental to make the condemned unconscious, pancuronium bromide to stop breathing, potassium chloride to stop the heart.

People's Daily and other state media describe the mix as a "non-virulent drug," bringing about "immediate clinical death while inflicting no physiological pain."

"It doesn't matter what method you use," Qiu says. "If someone is convicted of a capital crime, they should be executed."

Chinese prisoners condemned to death are not offered a choice of injection over gunshot, but Qiu and others suspect wealth and connections can buy the newer method.

"It is a real phenomenon that gangsters and corrupt officials are killed by injection more than gunshot, so their bodies are intact, and death is less painful," Liu says. "But I doubt it is government policy. These criminals are usually held in cities, where the injection is used. Common criminals are held in county-level facilities, where shooting is more common."

Tycoon Yuan Baojing was executed in March in a death van, in northeast China's Liaoyang city. He had been convicted of arranging the murder of a man trying to blackmail him for attempting to assassinate a business partner.

Sixty-eight different crimes — more than half non-violent offenses such as tax evasion and drug smuggling — are punishable by death in China. That means the death vans are likely to keep rolling.

"If we abolish the death penalty, then crime will grow," Kang says.

U.S. Joins Industry In Piracy War (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Nations Pressed On Copyrights

DOJ_NMG_0034346

The U.S. government has joined forces with the entertainment industry to stop the freewheeling global bazaar in pirated movies and music, pressuring foreign governments to crack down or risk incurring trade barriers.

Last year, for instance, the movie industry lobby suggested that Sweden change its laws to make it a crime to swap copyrighted movies and music for free over the Internet. Shortly after, the Swedish government complied. Last month, Swedish authorities briefly shut down an illegal file-sharing Web site after receiving a briefing on the site's activities from U.S. officials in April in Washington. The raid incited political and popular backlash in the Scandinavian nation.

In Russia, the government's inability, or reluctance, to shut down another unauthorized file-sharing site may prevent that nation's entrance into the World Trade Organization, as effective action against intellectual property theft tops the U.S. government's list of requirements for Russian WTO membership.

As more residents of more nations get high-speed Internet access -- making the downloading of movies and music fast and easy -- the stakes are higher than ever. The intellectual property industry and law enforcement officials estimate U.S. companies lose as much as $250 billion per year to Internet pirates, who swap digital copies of "The DaVinci Code," Chamillionaire's new album and the latest Grand Theft Auto video game for free.

Such entertainment and other copyright exports -- worth about $626 billion annually, or 6 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product -- are as important to today's American economy as autos, steel and coal were to yesterday's.

More than a decade of hard lobbying by two powerful trade groups, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) and the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), has convinced U.S. lawmakers and law enforcement officials that it's worth using America's muscle to protect movie and music interests abroad. Now, lawmakers are calling the trade groups, asking what else Congress and the government can do for the entertainment industry.

Efforts to stem piracy within the United States by targeting peer-to-peer file-sharing networks have produced mixed results. Kazaa -- once the most popular of them and a hard target of the music industry -- has half as many users as it did at its peak three years ago, thanks in part to the music industry's lawsuit and education campaign. At the same time, the total number of peer-to-peer users has grown in the past year, according to Internet traffic researchers.

Overseas, U.S. government officials say, it is in the national interest to work on behalf of Hollywood and other entertainment and intellectual property industries.

The United States does not offer specific dictates on how other nations handle their border controls, said Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Victoria Espinel, "but they need to have an effective intellectual property system for protecting our rights holders abroad."

The U.S. trade representative's office maintains a "priority watch list" of countries that, in its estimate, do not adequately protect intellectual property rights. China and Russia top the most recent list. Unlike the case with Sweden, U.S. government pressure has brought little change in China, home to perhaps the world's most prolific DVD and CD pirates.

An ongoing battle between Swedish authorities and an illegal file-sharing service called the Pirate Bay can be traced to an April meeting in Washington between the Swedes and the U.S. government.

Officials from the State Department, the Department of Commerce and the U.S. trade representative's office told visitors from the Swedish Ministry of Justice in April that Sweden was harboring one of the world's biggest Web sites for enabling the massive and unauthorized distribution of movies, music and games. It uses a file-swapping technology known as BitTorrent that is tougher to contain than earlier systems such as the original Napster, which the U.S. government shut down in 2001, and popular current peer-to-peer services, such as LimeWire.

A little more than a month later, Swedish police hit the headquarters of the Pirate Bay and closed the site. The MPAA crowed, saying it had helped the effort by filing a criminal complaint against the site.

The raid prompted a backlash of criticism in the Swedish press and from some members of government. Politicians and editorialists wanted to know why America was meddling in Swedish affairs.

Claes Hammar, Swedish minister for trade and economic affairs, said U.S. authorities noted that copyrighted Swedish material, as well as U.S. movies and music, was being stolen on the Pirate Bay.

"We don't like to be seen as negligent and losing out rather than cooperating with the U.S. and other markets," Hammar said.

In the aftermath of the raid, members of the Left and Moderate parties in Sweden have proposed scrapping last year's law that criminalized illegal file-sharing, reported the Local, an English-language newspaper in Sweden.

At the same time, hundreds of demonstrators have gathered in Stockholm and Goteborg in recent days, hoisting pirate flags and demanding that the government return the Pirate Bay's seized servers, according to reports.

Several attempts to reach Pirate Bay administrators through the Web site were unsuccessful. They did, however, post a defiant manifesto on a related Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0034347

Shut down on May 31, the Pirate Bay moved to the Netherlands and was back up and running three days later, sporting a logo of a pirate ship sinking the word "Hollywood" with a fusillade of cannon fire and demonstrating how difficult it is to stop anything on the Internet.

Dan Glickman, president of the MPAA, confirmed that his group had asked Sweden to toughen its laws on intellectual property theft.

"What we do is look around the world to look if laws need to be improved, then we make suggestions," Glickman said. He emphasized that the MPAA respects the sovereign rights of foreign nations. As for the backlash, Glickman said, "Yes, I'm sure the pirates in Sweden are upset."

Russia's pirates may cost their country more than domestic unrest.

Entrance into the World Trade Organization would grant the country numerous trading benefits. Each of the WTO's 149 members has veto power over accession and each has key demands of applicants.

For the United States, the focus is on intellectual property. And the U.S. wants to make sure the mistake of China is not repeated.

"We let China in and China has not fully complied with the WTO requirements" for protecting intellectual property, Glickman said. The MPAA has an enforcement division in Hong Kong whose members accompany local law enforcement officials on raids. "The time to get action is now, rather than after they get in," Glickman said.

In Russia, CD and DVD pirates have established manufacturing plants on abandoned Soviet military bases, Glickman and RIAA President Mitch Bainwol said. A Web site called Allofmp3.com is selling millions of songs without authorization from copyright holders. The site looks as professional and legal as Apple Computer Inc.'s popular iTunes online music store. It claims to be licensed by a Russian agency to sell music, but U.S. trade groups aren't satisfied. None of the revenue generated from the 10-cent song downloads on the site goes to the artists, Bainwol said.

Moscow began an investigation of Allofmp3.com, dropped it, then picked it back up again after U.S. pressure was applied, said RIAA Executive Vice President Neil Turkowitz, who has traveled several times to Russia and filed criminal complaints with prosecutors there about the site.

"The Russian government is aware of all really existing problems in the [intellectual property] sphere and makes active efforts to solve them step-by-step," the Russian Ministry of Economic Development and Trade wrote in an April paper translated into English. "We will undertake a complex of additional measures in [the intellectual property] sphere in the nearest future with the intention to speed up the work in this sphere."

Two e-mails to the site administrator of Allofmp3.com went unanswered.

Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Espinel said shutting down Allofmp3.com "is right at the top of the agenda. This is a top-priority issue in terms of our discussion with Russia and the WTO."

As the bilateral talks with Russia continue, congressional leaders are bringing pressure to bear on President Bush, who has vowed to speed that nation's entry into the WTO. Working against Russia, the lawmakers say, are its plans to make intellectual property rights violators subject to civil, rather than criminal, penalties.

The U.S. government and the entertainment industry have a right to raise such issues with foreign nations, the RIAA's Turkowitz said. Movie and music piracy, he said, "is a problem that really doesn't know any borders."

Where Would You Rather Be Sick? (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Is socialized medicine the prescription for better health? A recent study comparing Americans and Canadians, widely reported in the press, seems to suggest just that. But there is much less here than meets the eye.

The study, based on a telephone survey of 3,500 Canadians and 5,200 Americans (conducted by Statistics Canada and the U.S. National Center for Health Statistics), was released by the American Journal of Public Health. According to it, Canadians are healthier and have better access to health care than Americans, and at lower overall cost. So is the Canadian system, where the government pays for and manages the health-care system, superior? "Our study," says co-author Dr. Steffie Woolhandler, "is a terrible indictment of the U.S. health-care system. Universal coverage under a national health insurance system is key to improving health."

It is not so clear that the survey data back up these claims. Consider access. According to the survey, Canadians are more likely to have a regular physician, to have seen a doctor in the past year, and to be able to afford medications. But the data are ambiguous; Americans are more likely to have received a pap test and mammogram, as well as treatment for high blood pressure. Moreover, Americans are generally more satisfied with their health care. (The survey did not ask about access to specialist care or diagnostic imaging.)

DOJ_NMG_0034348

The survey's most trumpeted conclusion was that Canadians are healthier than Americans. According to co-author Dr. David Himmelstein, "We pay almost twice what Canada does for care, more than $6,000 for every American, yet Canadians are healthier, and live two to three years longer." The survey says Americans have higher rates of diabetes (6.7% vs. 4.7%), arthritis (17.9% vs. 16.0%) and high blood pressure (18.3% vs. 13.9%). Americans are also more likely to be obese and lead a sedentary lifestyle. It's damning stuff. But we shouldn't confuse problems in public health with flaws in health-care systems. Americans may be heavier than Canadians, but this speaks more to genetics, diet, exercise and culture than to the accessibility or inaccessibility of health services. The remedy for obese Americans will be found in less fast food and more gym memberships.

So how does American health care actually measure up? If we look at how well it serves its sick citizens, American medicine excels. Prostate cancer is a case in point. The mortality rate from prostate cancer among American men is 19%. In contrast, mortality rates are somewhat higher in Canada (25%) and much higher in Europe (up to 57% in the U.K.). And comparisons in cardiac care -- such as the recent Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada study on post-heart-attack quality of life -- find that American patients fare far better in morbidity. Say what you want about the problems of American health care: For those stricken with serious disease, there's no better place to be than in the U.S.

Socialized health-care systems fall short in these critical cases because governments strictly ration care in order to reduce the explosive growth of health spending. As a result, patients have less access to specialists, diagnostic equipment and pharmaceuticals. Economist David Henderson, who grew up in Canada, once remarked that it has the best health-care system in the world -- if you have only a cold and you're willing to wait in your family doctor's office for three hours. But some patients have more than a simple cold -- and the long waits they must endure before they get access to various diagnostic tests and medical procedures have been documented for years. Montreal businessman George Zeliotis, for example, faced a year-long wait for a hip replacement. He sued and, as the co-plaintiff in a recent, landmark case, got the Supreme Court of Canada to strike down two major Quebec laws that banned private health insurance.

Dr. Karen Lasser, the study's third author, says that "Based on our findings, if I had to choose between the two systems for my patients, I would choose the Canadian system hands down." Perhaps she would. But as a physician licensed in both countries, I'd disagree.

Dr. Gratzer is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Russia's Lid On The Media (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- Earlier this month Moscow hosted a congress of the World Association of Newspapers. The organization's president, Gavin O'Reilly, deplored the Russian government's encroachments on media freedom. Then President Vladimir Putin took the podium to respond. The media's situation has grown better, not worse, he said: "From year to year increasingly favorable conditions are emerging in Russia for media development . . . Mr. O'Reilly spoke about the increasing state presence in the media. I have different information on this point."

In its hypocrisy, its utter lack of credibility, Putin's statement was reminiscent of the most blatant Soviet propaganda. In fact, it's not just foreign observers but also Russian media professionals who are deeply concerned about state control of the media. In the autumn of 2004 a number of members of the Russian Television Academy signed a letter that stated that "Russian television today is not free." They said they were being forced to broadcast official reports "instead of objective information. Propaganda instead of free discussions. Censorship has been basically established on television." And other restrictions, the letter emphasized, had led to self-censorship.

Putin sees it differently: "Our country continues to value talent, honesty and courage on the part of journalists," he declared at the newspaper association's congress.

Speaking of talent: Russia's best television anchor, Leonid Parfyonov; its best daily newspaper editor, Raf Shakirov; and its best newsmagazine editor, Sergei Parkhomenko (he and I founded and edited a newsweekly that was taken over by the state-controlled gas monopoly Gazprom in 2001), have been forced out of their jobs, as have about a dozen other prominent media professionals. One of the latest to go was Olga Romanova, a fiery and incisive political anchor, forced out of her position on a minor TV channel after a change of ownership orchestrated by the Kremlin. Some of the banished have quit journalism altogether. Others have gone to work for outlets with much smaller audiences.

Another way to view infringement on the media under Putin is to track changes in coverage of the news in recent years. Of the many tragedies that have befallen the Russian people during Putin's presidency, the worst were the sinking of the submarine

DOJ_NMG_0034349

Kursk in 2000, the Moscow theater siege in 2002 and the terrorist seizure of the school in Beslan in 2004. Back in 2000 coverage of the Kursk catastrophe was a professional and cohesive effort. Both television and print journalists worked hard to provide honest and thorough coverage, bringing to light things that the government tried to hide. Officials -- civilian and military -- were forced to appear on the air to give comments "live." As they sought to avoid responsibility, their lies, cover-ups and conflicting reports were fully exposed to an angry nation.

Putin did not restrain himself in expressing his anger at the coverage. He publicly blamed media tycoons for the destruction of the army and the navy. But at that time, there was little he could do about it: The media, in the wake of Boris Yeltsin's presidency, were still largely unrestrained.

But by the time terrorists seized a Moscow theater and took some 900 hostages, the state had gone a long way toward regaining control of television. At least one channel, NTV, still had its professional standards and drive, though. It set about investigating the botched rescue operation, which caused the deaths of 129 people in the middle of Moscow. NTV couldn't do much, but at least people in Russia could see that the government wasn't letting the journalists do their jobs. Putin's response? He accused reporters of having base motives. They were mere publicity-seekers, he said, capitalizing on human blood. A few months later the manager of NTV was forced to resign.

State control was fully in place by 2004. The television coverage of Beslan stopped after the operation ended on day three of the monstrous terrorist attack, which left 331 people dead, more than half of them children. No high-ranking official -- security, law enforcement or otherwise -- has appeared on the air to account for what happened. To this day it has not been disclosed who was in charge of the operation. A Duma investigative commission has simply ignored much of the bloodcurdling testimony of witnesses, including that which surfaced during the trial of the only surviving terrorist. The trial itself was barely covered.

Four years into Putin's presidency, television has been tamed and taken securely under government control. Nothing is left to chance: Even seemingly live political talk shows get some editing so that nothing unexpected or unwelcome will appear on the screen. Whatever high-level criticism of Russia might be voiced at the G-8 summit in St. Petersburg next month, Russia's mass TV audience is unlikely to learn about it.

Since the Beslan tragedy, the Kremlin has moved to expand control over minor media, such as small-audience television outlets and, increasingly, print media. The once-respected daily Izvestia was acquired by Gazprom.

Lately there are persistent rumors that the next target may be the publishing house Kommersant and its crown jewel, the newspaper of the same name. This is Russia's most professional and high-quality mainstream daily. If the rumors are true, Kommersant will likely be handled as other media have been: The state will "appoint" a loyal buyer whose editorial line will no longer be a source of concern to the Kremlin.

There are still other, smaller outlets besides Kommersant that have preserved independent editorial stances. But these can barely break the basic media monopoly of Putin's Kremlin. The state television news channels reach 100 percent of the Russian audience, while alternative sources of information have limited circulation. Moreover, the Kremlin has ensured that national television is separated from independent-minded media: Television does not pick up their stories or invite their reporters to appear on the air.

Today's Kremlin is wholly unconstrained. There is nothing, inside or outside the country, to stop Putin and his regime from doing anything they wish on the domestic scene -- political, media or otherwise.

Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal, writes a monthly column for The Post.

How The World Can Combat Nuclear Terrorism (FT)

By Mohamed Elbaradei, Jonas Gahr Store

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

The simplest way to produce an atomic explosion is to slam together two sizeable chunks of high-enriched uranium (HEU) in what is commonly called a “gun-type nuke”. The approach might sound crude, and it is. No country currently uses this design for its nuclear weapons.

But it is worth remembering two things. First, that it was an HEU gun-type nuclear weapon that killed more than 70,000 people at Hiroshima. Second, that terrorists tend to be less focused on elegance of design than on results. This brings us to a critical question: after nearly five years of living under the threat of sophisticated terrorism – and with clear signs of terrorists trying to acquire nuclear material through criminal networks – why are we still moving so sluggishly to get rid of global HEU stockpiles and to minimise civilian uses of HEU?

Much attention is currently being given to the control of uranium enrichment technology, and rightly so. If all enrichment operations were brought under multinational control, it would become far more difficult for any country to divert enriched uranium for use in weapons. But it makes equal sense to protect – or, better, eliminate – the bomb-grade HEU that already exists.

DOJ_NMG_0034350

Experts say there are about 1,850 metric tonnes of HEU in global stockpiles, enough to make tens of thousands of nuclear weapons. The great bulk of this is in military use. On the civilian side, the numbers are much smaller – but the level of security is uneven. Nearly 100 civilian facilities around the world operate with small amounts of weapon-grade HEU – that is, uranium that has been enriched to 90 per cent or greater. These facilities, primarily research reactors, provide important benefits. The isotopes they produce are vital to medical treatments, industrial productivity, water management and many other humanitarian uses. Research conducted at these facilities has greatly enhanced our quality of life.

But most if not all of these benefits could also be achieved using low-enriched uranium (LEU). As far back as the late 1970s, the US and other countries began efforts to convert such facilities from HEU to LEU, to reduce the proliferation risk. In recent years, good progress has been made. Many research reactors have been converted. Large quantities of HEU reactor fuel, both used and unused, have been removed from vulnerable locations and returned to the countries of origin.

Civil society has become involved, raising awareness of the problem and supporting change. A good example is the Nuclear Threat Initiative. Just last year it completed a project with the government of Kazakhstan that successfully "downblended" nearly 3,000kg of fresh HEU fuel to LEU and placed it in secure storage.

But more successes such as these are needed. Many vulnerabilities remain. We need to ratchet up the sense of urgency. We need more coherent global action. First, the countries involved should join forces to minimise and eventually eliminate the civilian use of HEU. Joint research should be conducted to address the remaining technical hurdles involved in converting from HEU to LEU operations. The commercial interests of the companies concerned should be protected. Financing should be made available where needed to assist countries with conversion operations. The HEU fuel should be sent back to the countries of origin for downblending and reuse.

Second, all countries should agree to stop producing fissile material for use in nuclear weapons. The elements are already in place for such an agreement, in the form of a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty. It is high time to negotiate and conclude such a treaty.

Third, to build trust, countries with civilian and military HEU stockpiles should be encouraged to release clear inventories of those stockpiles and to publish a schedule under which the remaining HEU will be verifiably downblended.

By investing in these straightforward measures, we could reduce substantially the risk of nuclear terrorism. The work could be done jointly, as an international community; this is one initiative in which all countries – nuclear weapon states and non-nuclear weapon states alike – could play a role and from which all would clearly benefit.

Mohamed ElBaradei is the director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the winner of the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize. Jonas Gahr Støre is the Norwegian minister of foreign affairs. An International Symposium on the Minimisation of HEU in the Civilian Nuclear Sector begins at the Nobel Peace Centre in Oslo on Saturday

DOJ_NMG_0034351

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Rules That U.S. Has Broad Powers To Detain Noncitizens Indefinitely (NYT) ... 4
Judge: 9/11 Jailings Lawsuit Can Proceed (NEWSDAY) ... 5
Federal Government Tries To Block N.J. Officials From Getting Phone Company Records (AP) ... 5
Specter: 'My Bill Would Light The Way' (USAT) ... 6
Congress Keeps Itself, Public In The Dark On Surveillance (USAT) ... 7
A Leap Of Faith, Off A Cliff (NYT) ... 7
Bush Offers No Timeline For Closing Gitmo Prison (USAT) ... 8
Bush Faces Dilemma Over Demands To Close Guantanamo Bay (KRT) ... 9
Lawyers For Guantanamo Detainees Decry Expulsion Of Journalists (KRT) ... 10
Reporters Expelled From Guantanamo Bay (LAT) ... 11
Delegation Seeks Release Of Afghans Being Held At Guantánamo (NYT) ... 12
Jihadist Or Victim: Ex-Detainee Makes A Case (NYT) ... 12
Bosnia Admits Handing 6 Algerians Over To U.S. (NYT) ... 15
Britain: 2 Held On Terror Charges (NYT) ... 16
25 Sentenced To Up To 10 Years For Plotting Terror Attacks In Paris (NYT) ... 16
Freed Cleric Is Hailed By Students, But Support Could Be Waning (NYT) ... 16
What's Black And White And Red All Over? (WP) ... 17

Homeland Response:

ACLU Tries To Force Pentagon To Turn Over Records On Peace Groups (KRT) ... 18
Secure Flight Program May Finally Take Off (USAT) ... 18
9/11 Families Serve The Greater Good (NYT) ... 19
FEMA Vows To Check IDs To Keep Aid From The Undeserving (SFSS) ... 19
FEMA Official Rejects Katrina Fraud Report (WT/AP) ... 20
Non-Victims Bilk $1.4 Billion From FEMA Katrina Funds (LAT) ... 21
New Orleans Public-housing Plan Set (USAT) ... 22
5,000 Public Housing Units In New Orleans Are To Be Razed (NYT) ... 23
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 23
Government Dines On Katrina Leftovers (WSJ) ... 25
Blind Spot On Katrina (USAT) ... 26

War News:

Bush Rejects Calls For Pullout From Iraq (AP) ... 26
Bush: "Politics" Won't Derail Mission In Iraq (CHIT) ... 28
Bush Rejects Iraq Pullout (WT) ... 28
Bush Tries To Lower Expectations Over Iraq (FT) ... 29
Bush Sees Progress In Iraq (WP) ... 30
U.S. Committed To Democratic Iraq, Bush Says (LAT) ... 31
After Iraq Visit, An Upbeat Bush Urges Patience (NYT) ... 32
Bush Confident About Iraqi Government, U.S. Election (USAT) ... 34
Baghdad Bolsters Security, But Firefights Still Crackle (NYT) ... 34
Iraq Launches Drive To Secure Violent Capital (CSM) ... 36
Security Crackdown Begins In Baghdad (WT) ... 37
Baghdad Violence Dips As Government Cracks Down (USAT/AP) ... 38
Iraq Amnesty Plan May Cover Attacks On U.S. Military (WP) ... 39
Seize The Day (WSJ) ... 40
Iraq's Atomization (WP) ... 41
Funds For Iraq Run Low (CSM) ... 42
Iraq Debate Splits Democrats (RC) ... 43
GOP Resolution Politicizes War, Democrats Say (WT) ... 45
Anti-war Dems Blast Pelosi Over Endgame (HILL) ... 45
GOP Measure Forces House Debate On War (WP) ... 46
The Republican Party's Iraq Offensive (LAT) ... 48
Democrats Urge Disastrous Policy Of 'Out' From Iraq (RC) ... 49
Marine May Call Murtha As Witness (WT) ... 50
Combat Stress Takes Toll (USAT) ... 52
Marine Calls Song About Killings A Joke (NYT/AP) ... 54
Rice: No Guarantees On Iraq, Afghanistan (AP) ... 54
Rice Urges Respect In Gay Marriage Debate (AP) ... 55
U.S. Must Play Role In World, Rice Says (WP) ... 55

Corporate Scandals:

Former Fannie Mae Execs May Face Investigation (USAT) ... 56
Perjury Probe Sought For Ex-Fannie Officials (WP) ... 57
Lawmaker Asks DOJ To Probe Fannie Execs (AP) ... 58
At Fannie, Year End Likely Target For Restatement; Director To Quit (WSJ) ... 59
Michaels Understated Expenses Due To Past Options Backdating (WSJ) ... 60
Tech CEOs' Pay Falls As Firms Cut Out Options (WSJ) ... 60
Grasso Invoked Fifth Amendment In Deposition (WSJ) ... 61

S.E.C. Asked Grasso If He Buoyed Stock (NYT) 63

Criminal Law:

Bush Reaffirms His Confidence In Rove (WP) 64
Bush Says Clearing Of Rove Was A Relief (NYT) 65
Stolen Pistol Used By Roosevelt Returned To Museum (AP) 66
Web Labeling Mandate Surfaces In Senate (CNET) 67
Alabama Awarded $400,000 Grant To Fight Child Predators (AP) 68
Safavian Jury Ends 1st Day Of Deliberations (AP) 68
Missing Girl Found In S.C. (ROT) 69
FBI Agents Locate Missing Girl In South Carolina (WDBJ-TV) ... 69
Girl Kidnapped In Tempe In 1996 Found In South Carolina (AR) 70
Girl Taken From Arizona Found Safe In South Carolina (TSSC) 70
Judge Won't Suppress Wecht Evidence (PPG) 71
Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Wecht Case (KTAE-TV) 71
Judge Allows All Evidence In Wecht Trial (PTR) 72
Lawyers For Wecht Raise Judge's Ire (PTR) 72
Contempt Hearing For Wecht Lawyers (PPG) 72
City's Lawyer Says Buildings Commissioner Ordered Hiring (CHIT) 73
City Hall's Top Lawyer Takes The Stand Again (CBS2CHI) 74
Junior Gotti's Special Session With The Feds (NYS) 74
JUNIOR HAD A 'SINGING' TRYOUT (NYPOST) 74
2 BR Women Plead Guilty, 2 Indicted In Relief Aid Fraud (BRADV) 75
Map Dealer Due In Court (HARTC) 76
3 May Face Federal Death Penalty For Crime Spree That Left 4 Dead (AP) 76
Indianapolis Men Indicted For 18 Day Crime Spree (WISH-TV) . 77
Ex-agent Says FBI Was Warned On Bulger (BOS) 77
N.Y. Judge Who Helped Robbery Suspect Evade Arrest Is Removed (LAW) 78
Suspect Is Held In 4 Stabbings In Manhattan (NYT) 80
Backstory: From Prison Bars To Bar Exam (CSM) 82
Small Cities Hit Hard In Crime Report (NYT) 83
Reporters And Sources (WP) 84

Civil Law:

Lawyers' Gamble On Asbestos Trial Pays Off For Plaintiffs (LAW) 85
Ohio Supreme Court Rejects Class Action On 'Light' Cigarettes (WSJ/AP) 85
The High Court, Hoodwinked On Finance Data (RC) 86

Civil Rights:

DOJ To Review Deaths After Stun Gun Use (AP) 87
U.S. To Review Deaths Of Suspects Subdued With Electric Stun Guns (WSJ) 87
Cop Cleared Of Brutality, Fight Goes On (CTPOST) 88
When Is A Song Too Religious - Even In After-school Show? (CSM) 89
Our Flag And Our Freedom (WP) 90
Let Gay Men Donate Blood (LAT) 91

Antitrust:

DOJ Seeks Info On Calif. Newspaper Deals (AP) 91
DOJ Extends Review Of MediaNews' Purchase Plans (DENVERBIZ) 92
Judge Approves Hillenbrand Antitrust Settlement (AP) 92
Telecom Mows Down Grassroots Efforts In Net Neutrality Battle (LAW) 93
European Nations Pressure Apple On ITunes (AP) 94
AXA To Purchase Winterthur Unit Of Credit Suisse (WSJ) 95

Environment:

Bush Plans Vast Protected Sea Area In Hawaii (NYT) 95
Bush To Designate Largest Marine Sanctuary (USAT) 96
Hawaiian Marine Reserve To Be World's Largest (WP) 97
Bush To Create World's Largest Marine Protected Area Near Hawaii (LAT) 98
Treasure Islands (NYT) 100
Sparks Fly At Forum Over Energy Policy (MJS) 100
The New Drilling Battle (WP) 101

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Officials Seeking Source Of Lethal Heroin Mixture (NYT) 103
Deadly Heroin Focus Of DEA's Chicago Conference (WMAQ) 104
Killer Drug Overlooked, Until Flurry Of Deaths (DN) 105
More Bad Heroin (WPVI) 106
Physician Gets Life For Drug Deaths (CLPD) 107
Doctor Gets Life Sentence In Deaths Of Two Patients (AP) 107
Drugs Again Found In Home Depot Cabinets (AP) 108
Customer Discovered Stash In Vanity From Home Depot (BMI) 108
Drug Caches Found In Home Depot Vanities (CNN) 109
Drugs Found In Home Depot Merchandise (UPI) 109
Martin's Sentence Is 10 Years (BNNJ) 109
Secretary In LaWall's Office Quits, Was Arrested (ADS) 110
Officer Quits Amid Inquiry: Dallas: She Was On Leave For Dating Drug Suspect; More Firings Likely Today (DMN) . 111
Meth Myth Busted? Study Says Drug Rarely Used (AP) 112
Study: Meth Use Rare In Most Of The U.S. (AP) 112
NCAA Looks To Keep Drugs Off Diamond In Wake Of MLB Scandals (USAT) 113
Galante Wants Out Of Prison, Back In Business (AP) 114

Immigration:

2,100 Are Arrested On Immigration Violations (NYT) 114
Sweep Nets Nearly 2,100 Illegal Immigrants (AP) 115
ILLEGAL IMMIGRANT SWEEP NABS 2,179 (HC) 116
Feds Nab Thousands In Immigration Sweep (CHIT) 116
424 Criminal Immigrants Are Arrested In State (DMN) 117
County Arrests Account For One-fifth Of National Immigration Sweep (SDUT) 118
Public Warms To Bush Immigration Stance (WSJ) 118
Immigration Reform Doubts Rise On Hill (WT) 120
GOP Vs. GOP On Borders (WP) 120
E Pluribus Pluribus? (USAT) 121
A Tip Of The Cap To Pro Baseball (USAT) 122
More Than 2,000 Illegal Immigrants Nabbed In Sweep (USAT) 123

DOJ_NMG_0034353

Tax:

Hold That Back-Tax Chase (WP) 124

Congress-Administration:

Adviser Who Shaped Bush's Speeches Is Leaving (NYT)..... 125
Bush's Favorite Author Leaving The White House (WP)..... 125
Health Chief Defends Extensive Use Of CDC Jet (USAT/AP).. 127
Senate GOP To Push Fix Of Budget (WT)..... 127
Striking A Balance On Earmarks (HILL) 128
House Panel Approves Line-item Veto Bill (AP)..... 129
Earmarker In Chief (WSJ)..... 130
House, Senate Members Disclose Finances (AP) 131
Finances Are Laid Bare (HILL) 132
Many Lawmakers Accepted Free Travel In 2005 (WSJ)..... 133
Washington Wire (WSJ)..... 134
Clintons Say Their Income Topped $8 Million Last Year (NYT) 134
Local Politicians' Asset Reports Released (WP) 135
Hastert Staffer Pulled Senators' Forms (RC)..... 136
A Mountain Of Riches On Capitol Hill (LAT)..... 136
Lewis Aide Restates '04 Income (RC) 138
Jefferson Vote Expected Today (RC) 139
Senator's HHS Trip For Antibiotic Data Yields Only Ire (WP) ... 140
House Deals Blow To 'Open Skies' As It Passes Latest Spending Bill (WSJ)..... 141
The Sky's The Limit (WP) 142
House Panel Passes Bill To Look Closer At Foreign Investors (WSJ) 143
House Panel Backs Credit-Rating Revamp (WSJ)..... 143
Health Care Report Urges Dialogue On Reform (USAT) 143

Other News:

Rise In Inflation Puts Pressure On US Rates (FT) 145
Inflation Spreads Beyond Energy (USAT) 145
Uptick In Inflation Gnaws At Economy (LAT)..... 146
Reports Intensify Pressure On Fed To Boost Rates (WSJ) 146
Inflation Mounted Swiftly In May (WP) 148
Led By Higher Rents, Prices Continue To Climb (NYT) 149
Prices Rise, And Interest Rates Sure To Follow (CSM) 149
Housing, Energy Costs Boost Inflation (WT) 151
Consumer Spending Drops Sharply In May (WP) 152
Dow Ditches Doldrums With Big Bounce (USAT) 153
Dow Back In Positive Territory For Year (WP/AP) 153
Economy Expands, But Signs Show Slowing Growth (USAT).. 154
Inside Politics (WT) 155
Lieberman Weighs Re-election Bid Options (AP)..... 157
Webb Poses Challenge To Allen In Va. Race (AP)..... 157
Allen Faces A Unifier With Webb In Race (WT) 158
Democrats Can't Get Enough Of Newt Gingrich's Slogan (HILL)159
Bill Richardson: Looking Like A Go For 2008 (RC) 160
Name That Candidate (NYT) 161
Emergency System Called Very Ill (USAT) 162
Crisis Seen In Nation's ER Care (WP)..... 163
Stopwatch Ticking For Dan Rather (WP)..... 164
Changing Attack In Poverty Tactics, An Old Debate: Who Is At Fault? (WSJ) 165
Counting The Poor: Methods And Controversy (WSJ)..... 169
Charity Bingo Trying 'to Reinvent Itself' (USAT)..... 170
Changing Bedfellows (NYT)..... 171
Where The Hogs Come First (NYT) 172
Iran Quietly Learns Of Penalties In A Nuclear Incentives Deal (NYT) 173
Ahmadinejad Seeks Chinese, Russian Support (AP)..... 174
Group Linked To Al Qaeda Tightening Grip On Somalia (WT) . 175
Islamic Militias Extend Control In Southern Somalia (WP)..... 176
U.S. Meeting Europeans To Forge Policy On Somalia (NYT)... 176
Palestinians Mount Violent Protest Over Lack Of Paychecks (NYT) 177
Europe Plan To Aid Palestinians Stalls Over U.S. Salary Sanctions (NYT) 178
Palestinian Suicide Politics (WSJ) 179
U.N. Eyes Links To Hariri Slaying (WT)..... 180
Muslims' Anti-U.S. Sentiment Up (WT)..... 181
Kenyan Teen's Death Exposes Gaps Seen In HIV/AIDS Support Network (LAT)..... 181
Mexican Opinion Polls Predict López Obrador Win (FT)..... 183
Mexico's Lopez Obrador: A Common Man Bent On Change (LAT) 184
In Mexico, Migration Issue Gets No Traction (WP) 186
China Easing Its Stance On Taiwan (WP)..... 187
Secrecy As A Tool Of Government In China (NYT) 189
The Journalist As Scapegoat (NYT) 190
China Makes Ultimate Punishment Mobile (USAT)..... 190
U.S. Joins Industry In Piracy War (WP)..... 192
Where Would You Rather Be Sick? (WSJ) 193
Russia's Lid On The Media (WP)..... 194
How The World Can Combat Nuclear Terrorism (FT)..... 195

DOJ_NMG_0034354

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules That U.S. Has Broad Powers To Detain Noncitizens Indefinitely (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled yesterday that the government has wide latitude under immigration law to detain noncitizens on the basis of religion, race or national origin, and to hold them indefinitely without explanation.

The ruling came in a class-action lawsuit by Muslim immigrants detained after 9/11, and it dismissed several key claims the detainees had made against the government. But the judge, John Gleeson of United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, allowed the lawsuit to continue on other claims, mostly that the conditions of confinement were abusive and unconstitutional. Judge Gleeson's decision requires top federal officials, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft and Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director, to answer to those accusations under oath.

This is the first time a federal judge has addressed the issue of discrimination in the treatment of hundreds of Muslim immigrants who were swept up in the weeks after the 2001 terror attacks and held for months before they were cleared of links to terrorism and deported. The roundups drew intense criticism, not only from immigrant rights advocates, but also from the inspector general of the Justice Department, who issued reports saying that the government had made little or no effort to distinguish between genuine suspects and Muslim immigrants with minor visa violations.

Lawyers in the suit, who vowed to appeal yesterday's decision, said parts of the ruling could potentially be used far more broadly, to detain any noncitizen in the United States for any reason.

"This decision is a green light to racial profiling and prolonged detention of noncitizens at the whim of the president," said Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represented the detainees. "The decision is profoundly disturbing because it legitimizes the fact that the Bush administration rounded up and imprisoned our clients because of their religion and race."

A spokesman for the government, Charles S. Miller, would not respond to those assertions, saying only that the Justice Department was "very pleased that the court upheld the decision to detain plaintiffs, all of whom were illegal aliens, until national security investigations were completed and plaintiffs were removed from the country." He said the government was reviewing the rest of the opinion to decide whether to appeal the rulings Judge Gleeson made to allow the plaintiffs' other claims to proceed.

In his 99-page ruling, Judge Gleeson rejected the government's argument that the events of Sept. 11 justified extraordinary measures to confine noncitizens who fell under suspicion, or that the attacks heightened top officials' need for government immunity to combat future threats to national security without fear of being sued.

But his interpretation of immigration law gave the government broad discretion to enforce the law selectively against noncitizens of a particular religion, race or national origin, and to detain them indefinitely, for any unspecified reason, after an immigration judge had ordered them removed from the country.

"The executive is free to single out 'nationals of a particular country' and focus enforcement efforts on them," the judge wrote. "This is, of course, an extraordinarily rough and overbroad sort of distinction of which, if applied to citizens, our courts would be highly suspicious."

Yet, he continued, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that Congress and the executive branch, in exercising their broad power over naturalization and immigration, can make rules that would be unacceptable if applied to American citizens.

In the judge's view, the government has the right to detain people indefinitely as long as their eventual removal is "reasonably foreseeable." If that interpretation stands, it could apply to millions of noncitizens, including tourists removable for visa violations, said Gerald L. Neuman, a law professor at Columbia who is an expert in human rights law and was not involved in the case.

"It doesn't seem to limit the motives the government has to have in being slow in removing them; it could even be just basic neglect," he said.

But Professor Neuman cautioned that "it's only a district judge's decision."

"The decision encourages the government to behave this way without fear of financial liability," he said, but it does not carry the weight of a ruling by an appellate court. "This interpretation is attackable even among other judges in Brooklyn, let alone Lower Manhattan."

DOJ_NMG_0034355

But David Cole, a law professor at Georgetown University and a co-counsel in the lawsuit, said the ruling was the only one of its kind and made New York "an equal protection-free zone" because the government can detain immigrants wherever it chooses.

"What this decision says is the next time there is a terror attack, the government is free to round up every Muslim immigrant in the U.S., based solely on their ethnic and religious identity, and hold them on immigration pretexts for as long as it desires," he said. "We saw after 9/11 what the government did in an era of uncertainty about how far it can go. Judge Gleeson has essentially given them a green light to go much further."

The class-action lawsuit, Turkmen v. Ashcroft, is the first and largest of several brought by immigrants held after 9/11. The named plaintiffs in the case include former detainees who came back to the United States this year for depositions and were required to be in the custody of federal marshals at all times. Among them were Hany Ibrahim, a deli worker, and his brother, Yasser, a Web designer, Egyptian Muslims who said then that putting themselves back in the hands of the government they were suing was an act of faith in America.

Yesterday, Yasser Ibrahim, who had lived in New York for three or four years on an expired tourist visa and was delivered in shackles to the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn soon after Sept. 11, said through his lawyers that he was shocked and very disappointed by the judge's decision.

"I can't believe the court would allow this to happen," he said." I am frightened for other Muslims in the United States, who could face the same discrimination and abuse that I suffered."

Judge: 9/11 Jailings Lawsuit Can Proceed (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, Newsday Staff Writer

Newsday, June 15, 2006

A federal judge ruled Wednesday that several illegal immigrants from the Middle East could press a lawsuit in which they claim they were detained after Sept. 11 in unsanitary and overcrowded jails in Brooklyn and New Jersey.

But at the same time, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson said federal agents had the right under the law to detain the men, now deported, for up to seven months after the terror attacks while they tried to determine whether the men were terrorists or could help with criminal investigations.

In a 99-page decision, Gleeson, sitting in Brooklyn, said that even if the government held the immigrants for deportation proceedings as a cover for keeping them in the U.S. for possible criminal cases, the law allows such action.

"An ulterior motive in this context does not render illegal conduct that was within the bounds of the government's authority," said Gleeson. "An officer who wants to search a suspect's car for a handgun can pull him over ... for changing lanes without using his blinker (a traffic violation) even if the officer has no interest in enforcing the laws requiring drivers to signal a lane change.

"Similarly, the government may use its authority to detain illegal aliens pending deportation, even if its real interest is building criminal cases against them," reasoned Gleeson.

The ruling came in a lawsuit filed by eight men from the Mideast who were arrested on immigration violations following the Sept. 11 attacks. All but one of the men is a Muslim. They filed suit over their arrest and confinement, alleging they were held far longer than necessary after final orders of deportation or voluntary departure were issued.

They also said the conditions at the Brooklyn federal detention center and Passaic County jail in New Jersey were harsh, with inadequate medical care and overcrowding.

Gleeson is allowing the claims dealing with jail conditions to go forward. The case was filed in 2002 against then-U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft, FBI director Robert Mueller, and immigration and prison officials.

"The department is very pleased that the court upheld the decision to detain plaintiffs, all of whom were illegal aliens, until national security investigations were completed and plaintiffs removed from the country," said Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller.

Miller said the government was considering whether to appeal Gleeson's decision on the jail claims.

Attorneys for the Center For Constitutional Rights, who represented some of the men, said they, too, are considering an appeal.

Federal Government Tries To Block N.J. Officials From Getting Phone Company Records (AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general and other state officials Wednesday to stop them from seeking information about telephone companies' cooperation with the National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0034356

The unusual filing in U.S. District Court in Trenton, N.J., is the latest effort by federal authorities to halt legal proceedings aimed at revealing whether and how often AT&T, Verizon and other phone companies have provided customer records to the NSA without a court order.

New Jersey Attorney General Zulima Farber, a Democrat, and other officials sent subpoenas to five carriers on May 17, asking for documents that would explain whether they supplied customer records to the NSA, the lawsuit said.

The subpoenas followed by a few days a USA Today report that the phone companies had complied with the secretive agency's request for the phone records of millions of ordinary Americans after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The companies' deadline to respond to the subpoenas is Thursday, the federal lawsuit said.

Farber subpoenaed the phone companies for information because she suspected state consumer protection laws may have been violated if in fact the phone companies were turning over such records, Farber spokesman David Wald said.

``The phone companies were turning over information without any notice to consumers," Wald said. ``We were seeking to protect the people of New Jersey."

The Justice Department said more than 20 lawsuits have been filed around the country alleging that the phone companies illegally assisted the NSA. The government says sensitive national security information would be revealed if judges allow those cases to proceed.

The American Civil Liberties Union also has filed complaints in more than 20 states, including New Jersey, asking state utility commissions and attorneys general to investigate.

In this matter, the federal government said the New Jersey officials are treading on federal turf and that the companies, if forced to comply with the subpoenas, would be confirming or denying the existence of the program. President Bush and other top federal officials have refused to do that.

Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler also warned lawyers for the phone companies that responding to the subpoenas ``would violate federal laws and executive orders."

A separate letter that Keisler, head of the department's Civil Division, sent to Farber made the same points, but it took a softer approach.

``We sincerely hope that you will withdraw the subpoenas, so that litigation over this matter may be avoided," Keisler said.

Associated Press writer Beth DeFalco in Trenton, N.J., contributed to this report.

Specter: 'My Bill Would Light The Way' (USAT)

USA Today, June 15, 2006

My legislation calls for the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to determine the constitutionality of the president's electronic surveillance program. It recognizes the importance of protecting our nation by keeping the program secret while protecting civil rights by providing for judicial review to guarantee the program is lawful.

I believe the program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Notwithstanding that violation, the president might have the authority to order the surveillance under his inherent Article II constitutional authority, which supersedes a statute.

OUR VIEW: Congress keeps itself, public in the dark on surveillance

A determination of whether the president has such power depends on the court's balancing the national security interests against the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures. The president does not have a "blank check." The determination of constitutionality is up to the court, which is uniquely qualified to make that judgment because of its unblemished record for secrecy and expertise.

My bill would not grant retroactive amnesty or immunity for any past violations of law. It would explicitly recognize the president's Article II power, providing it meets the balancing test. My bill, like any statute, would not be able to add or subtract from the president's Article II power. It is what it is.

The Judiciary Committee has deferred, not abandoned, oversight over any presidential program to obtain telephone company records on calls and callers. I did not have enough votes last week to obtain subpoenas or move into closed session.

Congress' ability to conduct effective oversight depends on what political price the president has to pay for resisting congressional scrutiny. The overwhelming vote to confirm Gen. Michael Hayden, the former NSA director, to be CIA director (78 to 15 — my protest vote was the only Republican opposition) suggests the president hasn't yet paid a price with adverse public reaction.

The vice president's immediate, extensive response to my critical letter brought the first administration concession for negotiations on my bill, where progress is being made. There is also the prospect of getting more information on what the phone companies have been doing. My committee and I are determined to fulfill our Constitutional responsibility for oversight. So, stay tuned!

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0034357

Congress Keeps Itself, Public In The Dark On Surveillance (USAT)

USA Today, June 15, 2006

With its wiretapping of international phone calls and collecting a database of domestic phone records, the Bush administration is busy watching for evildoers.

Unfortunately, spying on those who pose a threat is not easily separated from spying on everyone else, and no one is watching the Bush administration with equal attentiveness. Despite lots of rhetoric, Congress has offered little to fulfill its duty to act as a check on the executive branch.

OPPOSING VIEW: Specter says his bill lights the way

Today, six months after The New YorkTimes disclosed that the National Security Agency has been wiretapping international phone calls of U.S. residents without court orders, and one month after USA TODAY revealed that the NSA has been compiling a huge database of domestic phone records, Congress is poised for its first action.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is set to consider a bill by its chairman, Arlen Specter, R-Pa., that would consolidate a gaggle of lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the warrantless wiretapping program. It would send the issue to a special court created by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which approves — or in some rare instances denies — wiretap requests.

Specter's goals are admirable. He wants to ensure that challenges to these programs get their day in court and are not dismissed on technical grounds. But his measure would do more harm than good. It appears to embrace the president's dubious claim that he has the constitutional authority to order wiretaps without the FISA court's approval.

By explicitly stating that the president might have such authority, Congress not only would fail to guard its constituents' privacy, it would also deepen the risk. Its actions could influence the court's thinking on the legality of the wiretaps. (An earlier version of the bill would have retroactively shielded officials who carried out the program from prosecution, raising the question: If the program is perfectly legal, as the administration insists, why would anyone need amnesty?)

A more meaningful approach on the wiretapping would be to reaffirm the FISA court's role and require that the administration either comply with the 1978 FISA law or propose changes if it is inadequate to today's global war on terror.

As for the secret database of phone records, Specter has said that lawmakers are "flying blind," and he threatened to summon telephone company executives before his committee to testify. But, amid pressure from committee Republicans and meddling by Vice President Cheney, Specter backed down — he says temporarily — from calling them.

Apparently not content to ignore Congress, the White House is now trying to run it. In an angry letter to Cheney, Specter said he had been advised that "the telephone companies had been instructed not to provide any information" to his committee.

Congress has a right and a responsibility to learn about these secret programs — whether the vice president likes it or not. The wiretapping program might involve an unlawful expansion of executive power carried out under a cloak of secrecy. The call records program also raises constitutional questions, as well as the likelihood that such a vast database will inevitably be abused, by this administration or a future one.

Fireworks between Congress and the White House might light up headlines. But the public remains largely in the dark about government snooping.

A Leap Of Faith, Off A Cliff (NYT)

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

On Monday, the Bush administration told a judge in Detroit that the president's warrantless domestic spying is legal and constitutional, but refused to say why. The judge should just take his word for it, the lawyer said, because merely talking about it would endanger America. Today, Senator Arlen Specter wants his Judiciary Committee to take an even more outlandish leap of faith for an administration that has shown it does not deserve it.

Mr. Specter wants the committee to approve a bill he drafted that tinkers dangerously with the rules on wiretapping, even though the president has said the law doesn't apply to him anyway, and even though Mr. Specter and most of the panel are just as much in the dark as that judge in Detroit. The bill could well diminish the power of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, known as FISA, which was passed in 1978 to prevent just the sort of abuse that Mr. Bush's program represents.

The committee is considering four bills. Only one even remotely makes sense now: it would give legal standing to groups that want to challenge the spying in court. The rest vary from highly premature (Senator Dianne Feinstein's proposed changes to FISA) to the stamp of approval for Mr. Bush's claims of unlimited power that Senator Mike DeWine drafted.

Mr. Specter's bill is not that bad, but it is fatally flawed and should not go to the Senate floor. He is trying to change the system for judicial approval of government wiretaps in a way that suggests Congress is facing a technical problem with a legislative solution, when in fact it is a constitutional showdown.

DOJ_NMG_0034358

There is also a practical problem: a bill on the floor of this Senate becomes the property of the Republican leadership, which will rewrite it to the specifications of Vice President Dick Cheney, the man in charge of this particular show of imperial power. Mr. Specter, of all people, should have no doubt of that, having been forced to watch in embarrassment last week as Mr. Cheney seized control of the committee's deliberations on the spying issue.

Mr. Specter says his bill would impose judicial review on domestic spying by giving the special court created by FISA power to rule on the constitutionality of the one program that Mr. Bush has acknowledged. But the review would be optional. Mr. Specter's bill would eliminate the vital principle that FISA's rules are the only legal way to eavesdrop on Americans' telephone calls and e-mail. It would give the president power to conduct surveillance under FISA "or under the constitutional authority of the executive." That merely reinforces Mr. Bush's claim that he is the sole judge of what powers he has, and how he exercises them.

Mr. Specter's lawyers have arguments for many of these criticisms, and say the bill is being improved. But the main problem with the bill, like most of the others, is that it exists at all. This is not a time to offer the administration a chance to steamroll Congress into endorsing its decision to ignore the 1978 intelligence act and shred constitutional principles on warrants and on the separation of powers. This is a time for Congress to finally hold Mr. Bush accountable for his extralegal behavior and stop it.

Bush Offers No Timeline For Closing Gitmo Prison (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Justices must rule on how detainees will be tried, president says

President Bush said Wednesday that he'd like to close the U.S. military-run prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where three detainees committed suicide Saturday. He said he was awaiting a Supreme Court decision about how terrorism suspects there could be tried.

“I'd like to close Guantanamo, but I also recognize that we're holding some people there that are darn dangerous and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts,” Bush said at a news conference in the White House Rose Garden.

It was the second time in recent weeks that Bush has said he hoped to eventually shut down the prison, where 460 mostly Muslim foreigners are being held as unlawful enemy combatants.

The suicides on Saturday of two Saudis and a Yemeni, who hanged themselves with bedsheets, have increased pressure from groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch to close the prison. European leaders renewed criticism of the facility and might press the point with Bush when they meet him in Vienna for a European Union summit on June 21.

The White House says detainees are treated fairly and humanely. All receive a review by military officers of their status as enemy combatants and are allowed to contest it. Lawyers for the detainees say they should be charged with crimes or released.

Ten detainees have been charged with crimes.

“The government should be ashamed that it has kept people four years without charges,” said Nancy Hollander, a defense lawyer for a detainee.

There have been 41 reported suicide attempts since the prison opened in January 2002. Periodic hunger strikes have taken place. One last month involved 75 detainees.

Bush acknowledged that the prison has damaged the United States' reputation abroad.

“No question, Guantanamo sends a signal to some of our friends — provides an excuse, for example, to say the United States is not upholding the values that they're trying to encourage other countries to adhere to,” he said.

He reiterated that the detainees are among the world's most dangerous terrorism suspects and that it is legal to hold them until the war on terrorism ends.

Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, commander of Guantanamo, had termed the suicides an act of “asymmetrical warfare” against the United States.

Hollander, the attorney, called the description “despicable.”

“The question to ask at some point is what would our government do if an American were being held in a foreign country under similar circumstances?” she said.

James Yee, the former Army chaplain at Guantanamo who was accused as a traitor and later exonerated, said the deaths more likely reflect the despair the inmates have over being held.

“This is a greater indication that these individuals were crying out for help,” he said.

The suicides are the first at the prison. The military has said it will conduct a review of its operations there. An Afghan delegation returning from a 10-day visit to Guantanamo said Wednesday that conditions there were “humane.”

Bush also said that “eventually, these people will have trials.”

DOJ_NMG_0034359

Military commissions for the 10 men charged were halted when Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni who is accused of serving as a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden and delivering weapons to al-Qaeda, challenged the constitutionality of the military tribunal at which he was scheduled to be tried. The Supreme Court decision on the case is expected before the end of this month.

Mark Denbeaux, a law professor at Seton Hall Law School in New Jersey, said the president doesn't need the high court's ruling to either close the prison or allow detainees to be given hearings challenging the U.S. right to detain them without charges.

"Surely the president is powerful enough to give people he's held for four years a hearing," he said.

Bush Faces Dilemma Over Demands To Close Guantanamo Bay (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Marisa Taylor

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush reiterated Wednesday that he'd like to close the prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, but his administration is facing an awkward political and legal quandary over what to do with the estimated 460 detainees being held there.

Anger over the administration's detention policies, coupled with allegations of prisoner abuse, the force-feeding of hunger strikers and riots at the facility, have caused even some close allies to demand its closure and hobbled the administration's ability to promote democracy and human rights overseas.

Saturday's suicides of three inmates further sullied the United States' image and provoked new calls for shuttering the prison, a demand that Bush will hear again next week from his European counterparts at a summit in Vienna, Austria.

Some legal experts say the administration created its detainee dilemma by deciding after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that when it came to suspected al-Qaida and Taliban militants, America no longer had to abide by its own constitutional guarantees of a public trial or by international treaties on human rights and the laws of war.

"They were too clever by half," said Ret. Adm. John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general who's the dean of the Franklin Pierce Law Center in Concord, N.H. "They thought they could take people and put them in Guantanamo, which the U.S. does not own, and they would be beyond the reach of the law and they could do whatever they wanted with them and no one would care."

More than four years after the prison opened, only 10 suspected Islamic militants face charges before military tribunals, whose legality may be determined within days by the U.S. Supreme Court. But even if they're found to be legal, international legal and human rights experts already have denounced the tribunals as illegitimate.

Approximately 330 other so-called "enemy combatants" linger at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, not charged with any crimes but facing indefinite detention without trial, which the U.N. Human Rights Commission considers a violation of international law.

The Pentagon has found the remaining roughly 120 detainees eligible for transfer or release under a policy aimed at reducing the prison's population to only the most dangerous suspected terrorists.

But these detainees' futures are tied up in complex negotiations by the State Department, the Pentagon and their own governments that began at least two years ago.

U.S. officials are concerned that some detainees would take up arms again if they were released, as have about 30 of some 290 prisoners previously freed.

Before they can be turned over, agreements must be reached on safeguards - such as surveillance, travel bans or incarceration - to be taken by detainees' governments to reduce any threat they might pose.

"We don't want to return them to a country and have them back involved in terrorist activities," said a State Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomacy. "We need to have a level of assurance on the security matters that is substantial."

But some countries have resisted requests to re-incarcerate prisoners because there's no clear evidence that they've broken any laws.

"We don't have many other countries in the world who are stepping up to say this is a problem for the international community. The United States should not have to shoulder this burden alone," John Bellinger, the State Department's top legal officer, complained last month.

In other cases, the United States has to find countries willing to accept foreign prisoners because of concerns that their own governments might torture them. For instance, five ethnic Uighurs from western China waited nine months after their release was approved before U.S. officials could convince Albania to accept them.

"It's a little bit of a Catch 22, but we are working through this," Bush said at a news conference on Wednesday at which he repeated his desire "to close Guantanamo."

DOJ_NMG_0034360

There are other problems. Some countries aren't equipped to hold dangerous detainees. Afghanistan agreed last year to accept all 96 Afghans held at Guantanamo, but won't complete a new maximum-security cellblock until at least December.

Bush acknowledged that the prison has hurt the U.S. image abroad.

"My answer . . . is that we are a nation of laws," he said, maintaining that those held at Guantanamo were "picked up off the battlefield" and are "darn dangerous."

Gitanjali Gutierrez, an attorney with the non-profit Center for Constitutional Rights, which is representing 200 detainees, disputed Bush's contention, saying, "The majority of men in Guantanamo Bay have not committed a crime. There is no basis for detaining them."

Some U.S. lawmakers and European leaders, the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, human rights groups and legal experts all have disputed Bush's authority to maintain the prison, and the Supreme Court has ruled that detainees may challenge their detentions in U.S. courts.

U.S. public opinion is split over Guantanamo, according to a poll conducted in March by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press.

The Supreme Court is due before the end of the month to decide the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver in Afghanistan and one of the 10 detainees facing trials before military tribunals.

Hamdan's lawyers said the prisoners should be freed or tried in federal or regular military courts because the tribunals, as designed by the Pentagon, disregard accepted legal standards by ignoring rules of evidence and permitting secret proceedings.

The administration has argued that the Supreme Court has no authority to hear the case because Congress passed a 2005 law that stripped the detainees of their right to challenge their detentions before U.S. courts.

Even if the administration prevails in the Hamdan case, some U.S. officials and legal experts said it could have a hard time proving its cases because much of evidence against the 10 is weak or gathered through questionable means.

"Whatever the Supreme Court decides, I believe a significant number of these men will be released either because the U.S. government will not have the ability to move forward before the tribunals or the government will realize it can't make the cases against these men," said Jeffrey D. Colman, a Chicago attorney whose firm, Jenner & Block, represents nine detainees.

On May 19, three of his clients were released to Saudi authorities with no explanation. Through family members, they've reported being treated better in Saudi custody than they were at Guantanamo, Colman said.

"They get to visit their families, they get to speak with people in their own language and the conditions are better," he said. "As its stands, they would much rather be in custody in Saudi Arabia than at Guantanamo."

Lawyers For Guantanamo Detainees Decry Expulsion Of Journalists (KRT)

By Lesley Clark And Scott Dodd

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Pentagon decision to expel three newspaper reporters and a photographer from the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center for suspected terrorists came under fire Wednesday from attorneys for the detainees, who accused the Bush administration of "pulling down a wall of secrecy and avoiding public accountability."

The denunciation came as the journalists, who had arrived in Guantanamo on Saturday after the suicides of three detainees, returned to the United States aboard a military flight.

The Pentagon defended its decision, saying the journalists had been allowed to stay for days even though the event they'd been authorized to cover - military hearings against some of the detainees - had been canceled because of the suicides.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr J.D. Gordon said the decision to expel the journalists came after other reporters complained that the four on the island were being given special treatment.

"We had vociferous protests from a variety of other media," he said. He said two reporters, whom he declined to name, threatened lawsuits unless they were given access to Guantanamo. "They insisted they fly in or the others come out," he said.

The four expelled journalists are Carol Rosenberg of The Miami Herald, Michael Gordon and Todd Sumlin of The Charlotte Observer, and Carol Williams of the Los Angeles Times. The Herald and The Observer are both owned by Knight Ridder.

Editors at the newspapers protested the expulsions.

"My belief is that it's in the best interest of the Department of Defense to allow independent news reporting, and I made that argument to them last night in asking that Carol stay, but they were obviously not persuaded," Herald Executive Editor Tom Fiedler said. "This is a story that has drawn international attention, and it's important that the information that is coming from Guantanamo be delivered by the independent news media and not by the Pentagon."

Rosenberg, who has covered the island prison since it opened in January 2002, said she was invited by Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris Jr., who oversees the prison complex, to report on the aftermath of the suicides. She arrived Saturday night on a flight from Miami.

DOJ_NMG_0034361

Gordon and Sumlin were at the base to research and take photos for a profile of Col. Mike Bumgarner, who oversees the complex's guards. Bumgarner is from the Charlotte, N.C., area.

Gordon said he'd been told he could stay a week to research the profile, but when the suicides happened, he switched to reporting that story.

In one story, published Tuesday, Gordon quoted Bumgarner as telling his staff that the suicides had destroyed what little trust existed between the jail guards and the prisoners.

Pentagon spokesman Gordon rejected suggestions that the content of the reporters' dispatches had anything to do with their expulsions. He said that a visit by some reporters that's scheduled to begin Monday would go on as scheduled.

The Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents 200 detainees at the camp and has called for outside investigations of treatment at the camp, decried the move.

"This crackdown on the free press makes everyone ask what else they are hiding down there," said center attorney Gitanjali Gutierrez.

Hours after the reporters were removed from the Navy base, Army Maj. Tom Fleener, a defense attorney for one of the detainees, asked that his client's trial be moved from the remote base to a location where news coverage could be assured.

Reporters Expelled From Guantanamo Bay (LAT)

By James Rainey

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

Editors at the Los Angeles Times and two other newspapers protested the Pentagon decision to expel their reporters Wednesday from Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where the journalists were reporting on the weekend suicides of three prisoners.

Journalists from The Times, Miami Herald and Charlotte Observer all received permission from a local commander to be at the U.S. facility where terrorism suspects are held and interrogated. The three reporters and a photographer from the Charlotte paper left the island Wednesday on orders from the Pentagon.

A civilian spokeswoman at the Pentagon said the reporters had to leave the island in fairness to at least five other media outlets that wanted to cover the suicides but did not get permission from commanders at Guantanamo to do so.

"The Defense Department wants to be fair and impartial," said Cynthia Smith, a civilian spokeswoman for the department. "We got them on the next flight out of Guantanamo Bay to be fair to the rest of the media outlets that did not get a chance to go down there."

Smith said the situation could not have been resolved by granting all the reporters access to the prison. She said military personnel at Guantanamo were preoccupied with investigating the suicides and enhancing security and would not have had time to supervise the other journalists, who she said worked for...Associated Press, CNN and two British newspapers.

But the three newspapers that managed to have reporters at Guantanamo to cover the suicides said the military should be doing everything possible to increase public knowledge about the controversial island prison.

"Expelling Carol Williams and her colleagues represents a Stone Age attitude that only feeds suspicions about what is going on at Guantanamo," said Los Angeles Times Managing Editor Doug Frantz. "If the military hierarchy has nothing to hide, it should have respected the invitation extended by the [prison] commander and the professionalism of the journalists."

The military's more than four-year detention of terrorism suspects at the U.S. military facility in Cuba has been criticized by American allies and human rights groups.

The military reported Saturday that three Mideastern prisoners had hanged themselves in their cells. The deaths led the military to cancel a hearing scheduled to begin Monday for an Ethiopian detainee.

Times reporter Carol Williams, Miami Herald reporter Carol Rosenberg and at least five other journalists had been scheduled to travel to the island prison to cover that hearing.

The Washington-based press operatives for the Pentagon who grant access to such hearings revoked permission for all of the journalists to visit Guantanamo.

The Times and Miami Herald reporters were preparing to depart Saturday afternoon from Fort Lauderdale on a commercial flight at the time the Pentagon Office of Military Commissions revoked their travel authorization.

Both asked and received permission to cover the suicides from Admiral Harry Harris of the Joint Task Force that oversees Guantanamo and were able to proceed.

Reporter Michael Gordon and photographer Todd Sumlin of the Charlotte Observer were already at the base working on a story about a prison official from Charlotte.

On Sunday, the three reporters began conducting interviews, including one with Army Gen. John Craddock, the four-star general who heads the U.S. Southern Command and who came to the prison to review the deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0034362

The other journalists, who had planned to fly Sunday to the prison from Andrews Air Force base outside Washington, apparently did not make a separate request for access through commanders at the prison. They were not allowed to proceed.

Spokeswoman Smith said the Pentagon and U.S. Southern Command will review the situation to try to determine how to avoid such conflicting directives to the media in the future.

Delegation Seeks Release Of Afghans Being Held At Guantánamo (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 14 — An Afghan government delegation to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, said Wednesday that about half of the 94 Afghans being held there were not guilty of serious crimes and should be released.

The remainder, including several high-level members of the former Taliban government, should be tried in Afghan courts, said the leader of the delegation, Abdul Jabar Sabit, a legal adviser to the Ministry of the Interior.

"The delegation concluded that some of the detainees should not stay longer in prison on the basis of the allegations against them and they must be returned to their country," Mr. Sabit, a former prosecutor, said at a news briefing. "We want to assure our people that the detainees will return to the country."

The officials said the Afghan detainees were not being held in bad conditions, and during private interviews, without the presence of American guards or officials, only one or two detainees had complained. "The conditions were humane," Mr. Sabit said.

The nine-member delegation, consisting of representatives of the Interior, Defense and Justice Ministries and National Security officials, made a 10-day visit to Guantánamo at the end of May to interview the Afghan detainees, establish whether they really were Afghans and work on plans for their return home. President Hamid Karzai and President Bush agreed in May 2005 that the Afghan detainees would be returned to Afghanistan once facilities run by Afghans were prepared and personnel trained to handle them.

Gen. Abdul Salaam Bakhshi, the chief of the main prison in Kabul, said Wednesday that it would take months to prepare for the return of the detainees, but that those whose crimes were not serious could be returned and released "soon."

Mr. Sabit said the government delegation had interviewed detainees and drawn up a list of those who could be released immediately. The remainder, who face more serious charges, would be returned and dealt with by the Afghan judicial process.

The American military is financing the refurbishment of a wing of Pul-i-Charkhi prison, the large Russian-built facility on the eastern side of the capital, to house some 650 detainees from Guantánamo and Bagram Air Base, and is training prison personnel to take charge of the detainees. The prison is expected to be ready by next spring.

It has not been decided what kind of judicial process the detainees would face on their return, but being considered are Afghan military tribunals or trials in civilian courts run by the National Security Directorate, which has jurisdiction over terrorism and other serious crimes.

An American official in Kabul said the detainees considered for release could go into the peace and reconciliation program far sooner than next spring. Under the program, former Taliban members are allowed to return home under a guarantee from their communities that they will not fight the government. "The sooner we can get them back and into the reconciliation process the better," said the official, asking not to be named because the negotiations with the Afghan government are still taking place.

Afghan officials have visited Guantánamo before and secured the release of a few prisoners, but this was the first comprehensive survey of all the Afghan detainees.

The detainees were dispersed through the five camps that make up Guantánamo, and many were in the most lenient camp, where they had access to television and radio, Mr. Sabit said. Those who had broken prison rules were under more severe regimens. The delegation asked that all of the Afghan detainees be placed in one block, he said.

The American-led coalition in Afghanistan announced that two coalition soldiers died on Tuesday as a broad offensive against Taliban insurgents in southern Afghanistan was beginning. It will involve 11,000 troops from Canada, Britain, the Netherlands and the United States, an American military spokesman said.

"This is not just about killing or capturing extremists," the spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said at a news briefing in Kabul. "We are going to go into these areas, take out the security threat and establish conditions where government forces, government institutions, humanitarian organizations can move into these areas and begin the real work that needs to be done."

Jihadist Or Victim: Ex-Detainee Makes A Case (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

When President Bush ordered Moazzam Begg's release last year from the Guantánamo prison camp, United States officials say, he did so over objections from the Pentagon, the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. — all of which warned that Mr. Begg could still be a dangerous terrorist.

But American officials may not have imagined the sort of adversary Mr. Begg would become in the war of perception that is now a primary front in the American-led campaign against terrorism.

"The issue here is: Apply the law," Mr. Begg told an audience earlier this spring at the Oxford Literary Festival in England, one of many stops on a continuing lecture tour. "If I've committed a crime, we say, take this to court. After all of that, if they can't produce something in court, then shame on them!"

With a new book about his experiences and a small blizzard of media attention, Mr. Begg, a 37-year-old Briton of Pakistani descent, has emerged over the last few months as a minor celebrity in his home country.

Human rights groups have hailed his courage. University students have invited him to speak. Journalists have generally taken at face value his claim that he is an innocent man, unlawfully seized and arbitrarily held. After the three suicides at Guantánamo last Saturday, Mr. Begg instantly became a sought-after commentator for British newspaper and television reporters.

The respectful reception for Mr. Begg — whom the Pentagon still portrays as a terrorist — is one of many markers of the waning credibility of Washington's detention policies overseas, and particularly in European countries that are closely allied with the United States in fighting terrorists.

A British feature film that is to be released in the United States on June 23, "The Road to Guantánamo," depicts another group of former detainees as innocent, good-natured men cruelly mistreated by their American captors. The British attorney general, Peter Goldsmith, recently called the prison "unacceptable" and said it should be shut down.

Whether Mr. Begg is the potential threat the Pentagon claims or the harmless man he professes to be cannot be fully resolved from the available evidence. But the mystery makes Mr. Begg one of the more intriguing case studies in the trans-Atlantic divide on detention policy.

He and another Briton, Feroz Abbasi, were among the first six Guantánamo detainees designated by Mr. Bush in 2003 as eligible for trial by military commissions there. Pentagon officials say Mr. Begg trained at three terrorist camps, "associated" with an array of operatives of Al Qaeda and was ready to fight American-led forces in Afghanistan but fled into the Tora Bora mountains when the Taliban lines collapsed.

The British government's refusal to accept the Guantánamo tribunals, in which rights of due process are sharply limited, eventually forced American officials to set aside the prosecutions of Mr. Begg and Mr. Abbasi. Officials said they and two other Britons were finally sent home, in January 2005, after Mr. Bush overruled most of his senior national security advisers as a favor to Prime Minister Tony Blair, who was then being harshly criticized for his support of the Iraq war.

Now, the Bush administration finds itself in the awkward position of insisting on the danger of a man it set free. "He has strong, long-term ties to terrorism — as a sympathizer, as a recruiter, as a financier and as a combatant," said a Defense Department spokesman, Bryan Whitman.

In interviews in Britain and in his memoir, which is to be published in the United States on Sept. 11 as "Enemy Combatant: My Imprisonment at Guantánamo, Bagram and Kandahar," Mr. Begg denied that he ever supported terrorism, knowingly associated with Qaeda members or took up arms against the United States. Rather, he offers himself as evidence that the wide American net had trapped many Muslims who never threatened United States interests.

A Professorial Air

A small, soft-spoken man with a professorial air, Mr. Begg has distinguished himself from other former prisoners partly by his tone.

While others have told (and, in some cases, sold) the British press lurid tales of American interrogators' tempting them with prostitutes and torturing them to confess, Mr. Begg avoids the word torture. He was sometimes badly mistreated, he says, and kept in prolonged isolation. But he makes a point of telling audiences of his friendships with some of his military police guards, and he espouses a tolerance that seems incompatible with the hatred of militants to whom American officials link him.

One British interviewer described Mr. Begg as "devastatingly reasonable."

Of nearly 20 American military and intelligence officials who were interviewed about Mr. Begg, none thought he had been wrongly detained. But some said they doubted that he could be tied to any terrorist acts. At Bagram, where he was held for 11 months, Mr. Begg's interrogators nicknamed him Hemingway.

"I don't think he was the mastermind of 9/11, but nor do I think he was just an innocent," said Christopher Hogan, a former military interrogator who oversaw some of Mr. Begg's early questioning there but said he did not have access to top-secret American or British intelligence files on him. "We compared him to somebody who went off to Spain during the civil war — more of a romantic than some sort of ideologically steeled fighter."

DOJ_NMG_0034364

Like other military and intelligence personnel familiar with Mr. Begg's interrogations, Mr. Hogan also described him as having been unusually forthcoming. "He provided us with excellent information routinely," he said.

Yet if Mr. Begg is a more ambiguous figure than the Bush administration now describes, the story of his life before he was seized in Pakistan in January 2002 is also more complicated than the account he has put forward, and full of questions.

Like many from Europe who fell in with Islamic militants in the 1990's, Mr. Begg was a son of immigrants who settled in a working-class environment where economic struggles fueled racial prejudice.

During high school in Birmingham, the industrial capital of the English Midlands, he joined a gang of mostly South Asian teenagers who banded together against skinheads, punk rockers and other anti-immigrant legions of the day. Mr. Begg, who now stands 5-foot-3, was the smallest member of the gang; he said he rarely joined in the fights.

But much of his upbringing did not fit the pattern. His family was relatively comfortable and liberal. His father, a Muslim born in India, was a bank manager who wrote poetry in Urdu. He sent Moazzam and his brother to a Jewish primary school, where they wore blazers with the Star of David.

Inspired by Mujahedeen

Moazzam's interest in Islam was awakened during a trip with relatives to Pakistan and Saudi Arabia in his late teens. On a second visit to Pakistan in late 1993, he writes, he crossed into Afghanistan with some young Pakistanis and visited a camp where mujahedeen rebels were training to fight the Soviet-backed Afghan government.

Inspired by the guerrillas' commitment, he threw himself into helping besieged Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He said he traveled to the Balkans 9 or 10 times with a small aid agency, Convoy of Mercy. But the group's founder, Asad Khan, said he had no recollection of Mr. Begg.

Defense Department officials said one of Mr. Begg's former associates was Omar Saeed Sheikh, who volunteered on a Convoy trip in 1993. Mr. Sheikh was later convicted of kidnapping Western tourists in India and is facing execution in Pakistan for the murder of the Wall Street Journal correspondent Daniel Pearl. Mr. Begg insisted he did not know Mr. Sheikh.

There are some notable gaps in Mr. Begg's memoir. The book does not mention that while working as an interpreter at a government welfare office in 1994, he and a friend were arrested and charged with defrauding the agency. The police found a night-vision sight, a bullet-proof vest and what news reports called "extremist literature" at Mr. Begg's home.

The charges against him were later dropped for lack of evidence, but his friend, Shahid A. Butt, pleaded guilty and served 18 months in prison. Mr. Butt was later convicted with seven other Britons of plotting a terrorist bombing in Yemen, where he served a five-year sentence.

In early 1998 Mr. Begg, by then married, with two small children, moved his family to Peshawar, Pakistan, on the border with Afghanistan. He describes the period as idyllic, with evening strolls through a local park and a quick trip to visit another training camp in Afghanistan, this one run by Iraqi Kurds. He and his wife socialized primarily with members of the town's small Palestinian community, as well as some Arab and Afghan veterans of the anti-Soviet jihad.

But the book does not mention one Palestinian friend, Khalil Deek, who also lived in Peshawar at the time. The United States 9/11 commission described Mr. Deek, a naturalized American, as an associate of Abu Zubaydah, a senior Al Qaeda lieutenant of Palestinian descent who was also in Peshawar then, recruiting new operatives and sending them to train at Afghan camps.

An American counterterrorism official who began tracking Mr. Begg in 1999 said the Central Intelligence Agency and MI5, Britain's domestic intelligence service, suspected Mr. Begg of working with Mr. Deek to create a CD-ROM version of a terrorist manual, "Encyclopedia of Jihad," which Mr. Deek gave to two Palestinians who plotted with Mr. Zubaydah to bomb tourist sites in Jordan.

American intelligence officials also said Mr. Deek helped arrange transportation to Jordan for some operatives in the foiled plot, but after being held in Jordan for 17 months, he was released without charge.

Mr. Begg acknowledged in an interview that he had met Mr. Deek in Bosnia and later invested with him in a small business deal to sell traditional Pakistani clothing. But he said he had never met Abu Zubaydah — something Pentagon officials said he had admitted to his American interrogators.

He also denied an assertion by Mr. Whitman, the Pentagon spokesman, that he spent five days in early 1998 at Derunta, a notorious Al Qaeda-affiliated training camp in Afghanistan, learning about poisons and explosives.

Two Defense Department officials read to a reporter from what they said were lengthy sworn statements Mr. Begg made to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, admitting that he had supported jihad in Chechnya and Kashmir, knew a half-dozen Al Qaeda figures and had trained at Derunta and two other Afghan camps.

Mr. Begg said that he had never told the F.B.I. anything of the sort, but that he did sign some documents in custody because he feared for his life.

DOJ_NMG_0034365

After he returned to Birmingham in the summer of 1998, he and a friend opened an Islamic bookstore, which he described as a meeting place for young Muslims, including some who later fought in the separatist struggle in Kashmir.

Mr. Begg received a first visit from an officer of MI5 soon after the shop opened. A year later, in late 1999, dozens of police agents searched the book shop and Mr. Begg's home. They were raided again in February 2000, and Mr. Begg was arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, but was quickly released without charge.

'It Was Going Too Far'

Mr. Whitman, at the Defense Department, said the British government cited Mr. Begg's "proven or suspected links to persons who have been arrested or convicted of terrorist offenses worldwide," including Richard C. Reid, who was later convicted of trying to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight with a shoe bomb. Mr. Begg said he had never met Mr. Reid or two other men, Ibn al-Shekh al-Libi and Abu Qatada, whom Pentagon officials linked to him.

"Up until this time I had thought it was all just a silly mistake or a fishing trip," Mr. Begg wrote of the security services' interest in his activities, "but now I knew it was going too far."

He said in an interview that he had never even heard of Al Qaeda before 9/11. He knew something about Osama bin Laden, he said, but generally agreed with those who saw Mr. bin Laden's conflict with the United States as counterproductive for Muslims. He said he opposed attacks against civilians but saw justification for jihadi assaults on "military targets" in "times of war."

In July 2001, little more than a year after his brief arrest, Mr. Begg moved his wife and children to Afghanistan. Despite the Taliban's status as an international pariah for its treatment of women and its hospitality toward Al Qaeda, the Beggs saw it as a fine, inexpensive place to raise a family. The memoir describes Mr. Begg's work on charity projects and his fascination with the atmosphere of Kabul. But without television, he writes, he did not grasp the enormity of the Sept. 11 attacks. Only when bombs and cruise missiles began to strike on Oct. 17 did he realize "it was time to go."

But, he said, he became separated from his family and reunited with them only after he crossed the border to Pakistan. They had been in Islamabad only a couple of months when, on Jan. 31, 2002, Pakistani intelligence agents and C.I.A. officers burst into their home, pulled a hood over his head and took him away.

Mr. Begg's memoir recounts a three-year odyssey from a safe house in Pakistan to a prison camp in Kandahar, Afghanistan, to the main military prison at Bagram Air Base and finally to Guantánamo. He describes endlessly repetitive interrogations, with soldiers sometimes demanding information about events that took place after his capture.

Even now, he says, the accusations against him remain maddeningly vague.

"There is no specific allegation; there are no specific charges," he said in one interview. "Whom did I recruit? When did I recruit them? Who told them this? What is the corroborating information — names, times, places?"

After repeated questions about Mr. Begg by The New York Times, Pentagon officials offered some information they said had been declassified from intelligence files. Mr. Whitman said the files showed Mr. Begg to be "a sympathizer, a recruiter and a financier" for terrorists. But officials offered almost nothing to corroborate such assertions other than excerpts they read from the F.B.I. statements.

Still, Mr. Begg has hardly been ignored by the administration. Earlier this year, a State Department public diplomacy official, Colleen P. Graffy, challenged his supporters, saying, "Guantánamo is not a spa, but nor is it an inhumane torture camp." The department's little-known Office of Countermisinformation has also sought to refute Mr. Begg's claims.

But other American officials said their secrecy about the detainees was partly responsible for having Mr. Begg's version of events accepted as credible.

"This has been the story of our lives here in trying to convince the world about the propriety of keeping people in Guantánamo," said one senior administration official in Washington, who asked not to be named because he was criticizing government policies. "It's been difficult to persuade all U.S. government agencies to release enough information publicly to show that individuals like Begg represent a significant threat."

Bosnia Admits Handing 6 Algerians Over To U.S. (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

The government of Bosnia and Herzegovina has confirmed to the Council of Europe, the continent's main human rights watchdog, that it allowed American forces to seize six Algerian-born men in January 2002 for transfer out of the country, the council reported. The men have been detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, since then as enemy combatants. While the seizure and transport of the men has long been known, Bosnia is the only one of the council's 46 members to acknowledge it had breached the European Convention on Human Rights by participating in an extrajudicial seizure of individuals by United States authorities.

Britain: 2 Held On Terror Charges (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

The police in northern England said they had arrested a 21-year-old man and a 16-year-old on charges of conspiracy to murder and of conspiring to "cause a public nuisance by use of poisons and or explosives." Both are to appear in court today. The arrests took place last week at Manchester Airport and in Dewsbury, Yorkshire.

25 Sentenced To Up To 10 Years For Plotting Terror Attacks In Paris (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

PARIS, June 14 — A French court on Wednesday sentenced 25 people convicted of plotting terrorist attacks on the French capital in 2002 to prison terms ranging from 6 months to 10 years.

Prosecutors had charged them with planning attacks on several sites, including the Eiffel Tower. One of the convicts, Menad Benchellali, 32, was accused of trying to concoct chemical or biological weapons at his mother's apartment in a suburb of Lyon.

Twenty-seven people stood trial in the case, which began in December 2002 after chemicals, material for bombs and a chemical weapons protection suit were discovered in an apartment on the outskirts of Paris. The police also found elements for a sophisticated remote control detonator, suggesting that the group was planning a chemical bomb attack.

Mr. Benchellali, whose younger brother, Mourad, had been held in the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and was released two years ago, was sentenced to 10 years in prison with Merouane Benhamed, 33, whom the court described as the group's leader.

Said Arif, 40, who had been extradited from Syria to stand trial, was sentenced to nine years, as was Nourredine Merabet, described as the group's financier.

Shorter terms were handed down for others convicted in the case, including Mr. Benchellali's father, mother and brother, Hafed, who were found guilty of "criminal association in relation with a terrorist enterprise." Two people were acquitted.

French counterterrorism officials and the news media referred to the group as the Chechen network because several of its members trained with Chechen rebels in the Caucasus Mountains.

Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell cited the group as a link between Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and global terrorism in his February 2003 presentation to the United Nations about the threat said to be posed by Iraq. The presentation included a flow chart showing a string of relationships the United States contended existed among Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Benhamed and Mr. Benchellali. Those ties were never proved, but French investigators said a link existed between Mr. Arif and Mr. Zarqawi.

Mr. Arif was born in Oran, Algeria, in 1965 and was a lieutenant in the Algerian Army before joining the Islamist movement. Counterterrorism experts say he trained in Afghanistan and forged close ties with Mr. Zarqawi, among others. They say he associated with members of a terrorist cell in Frankfurt who were arrested and charged with planning an attack on the Strasbourg Cathedral in France in 2000.

In mid-2001, investigators say, Mr. Arif and other members of the group arrested in Paris went to Pankisi Gorge in the republic of Georgia, where they joined other ethnic Arabs from Europe and the Middle East for paramilitary training. The investigators say they met associates of Mr. Zarqawi who had moved to the gorge from Afghanistan.

In March 2002, Mr. Arif and two other members of the French group returned to France by way of Barcelona, Spain, where they were briefly held on suspicion of having stolen a laptop computer from an American. The rest of the group was arrested that December, but Mr. Arif had already vanished. He was later arrested in Syria.

In the apartment the group used in 2002, investigators found two integrated circuit boards, each the size of a stick of gum, hidden in a washing machine. Each board was connected to a nine-volt battery. Experts found they were receivers for touch-tone signals sent by a cellphone.

Freed Cleric Is Hailed By Students, But Support Could Be Waning (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

SOLO, Indonesia, June 14 — Hundreds of Muslim students, thrusting their fists toward the night sky and chanting "God is great" in Arabic, welcomed their revered spiritual leader, the militant Islamic cleric Abu Bakar Bashir, home from prison on Wednesday night.

Mr. Bashir was escorted here from prison by police officers, after serving 26 months for immigration violations and criminal conspiracy.

DOJ_NMG_0034367

He arrived late at night at Al Mukmin, the Islamic boarding school that he helped to found in this central Javanese city, and gave a fiery speech calling on Muslims to fight for Islam, which he called "the only truth," and for the formation of an Islamic state in Indonesia.

With a broad smile, Mr. Bashir condemned Western governments that have lobbied Indonesia for years to keep him locked up. "I need to say to the infidels that your efforts to destroy Islam will be in vain," he said to the raucous supporters gathered in the main courtyard of the school's heavily secured compound. "Someday you will pay the price."

A frail man at 68, Mr. Bashir still commands a powerful voice.

Students guarded the approach to the school's front gates before their teacher's arrival and ran through the streets with banners as local residents looked on. "He is the most Islamic man I know," said a 17-year-old student who said his name was Abdul. "I am very happy about his being released. He is one of our founding fathers."

The crowd, however, did not number in the thousands as many had expected. Mr. Bashir had said he did not want to make too much of his release, and school officials said they had planned only a simple ceremony.

But the low turnout may also indicate that Mr. Bashir no longer enjoys the support he once did. He has been criticized by a number of former followers for his links to terrorist activities.

An Indonesian court acquitted Mr. Bashir in March 2005 of seven terrorism charges involving the 2002 nightclub bombings in Bali that killed more than 200 people and the bombing of the Marriott Hotel in Jakarta in 2003. He was convicted only of conspiracy in the bombings.

During his speech, Mr. Bashir, who is also the spiritual leader of the militant group Jemaah Islamiyah and whom the Bush administration believes was a central operative for Al Qaeda in Southeast Asia, said the suicide bombers who blew up the Bali nightclub were heroes in the fight for Islam. But he added that their methods were wrong, indicating that he would no longer support terrorist activities here.

"The Bali bombers are Islamic heroes," he said. "But they chose the wrong way to fight. They should not have bombed a peaceful area, they should have preached the truth instead."

The bulwark of the membership of Jemaah Islamiyah, which advocates an Islamic state in Indonesia, and a number of people convicted for their involvement in terrorist bombings, are graduates of Al Mukmin. The school has about 1,600 students, mostly young men, from all over Indonesia.

Jemaah Islamiyah's terrorist network has been weakened in recent years as the Indonesian government has prosecuted, killed or sentenced to death most of its top military leaders.

Banners and painted signs adorn the school's walls, promoting an Islamic religious war. A sign near the entrance to the main class building reads, "Be a good Muslim or die."

Mr. Bashir, together with several other Indonesian Muslim leaders, founded Al Mukmin in 1972. Its students receive a general education similar to any public school in Indonesia, but Islamic principles are heavily promoted.

Ibnu Hanifah, vice director of Al Mukmin, said Mr. Bashir would return to the school as a teacher and counselor but would probably spend the majority of his time touring the country and preaching his support for an Islamic state.

What's Black And White And Red All Over? (WP)

By Richard Morin

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

More ink equals more blood, claim two economists who say that newspaper coverage of terrorist incidents leads directly to more attacks.

It's a macabre example of win-win in what economists call a "common-interest game," say Bruno S. Frey of the University of Zurich and Dominic Rohner of Cambridge University.

"Both the media and terrorists benefit from terrorist incidents," their study contends. Terrorists get free publicity for themselves and their cause. The media, meanwhile, make money "as reports of terror attacks increase newspaper sales and the number of television viewers."

The researchers counted direct references to terrorism between 1998 and 2005 in the New York Times and Neue Zuercher Zeitung, a respected Swiss newspaper. They also collected data on terrorist attacks around the world during that period. Using a statistical procedure called the Granger Causality Test, they attempted to determine whether more coverage directly led to more attacks.

The results, they said, were unequivocal: Coverage caused more attacks, and attacks caused more coverage -- a mutually beneficial spiral of death that they say has increased because of a heightened interest in terrorism since Sept. 11, 2001.

One partial solution: Deny groups publicity by not publicly naming the attackers, Frey said. But won't they become known anyway through informal channels such as the Internet?

DOJ_NMG_0034368

Not necessarily, Frey said. "Many experiences show us that in virtually all cases several groups claimed responsibility for a particular terrorist act. I would like the same rule that obtains within a country: Nobody can be called a criminal -- in our case a terrorist -- if this has not been established by a court of law."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ACLU Tries To Force Pentagon To Turn Over Records On Peace Groups (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - A civil rights group sued the Defense Department on Wednesday in an effort to force the Pentagon to turn over information it's collected on peace groups and antiwar activists under a controversial program designed to track terrorists.

The lawsuit, filed in Philadelphia by the American Civil Liberties Union, asks the Defense Department to produce records it's collected under its Threat and Local Observation Notice program. Former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz started TALON in 2003 to track groups and individuals with possible links to terrorists and others who might pose a threat to Defense Department installations and personnel.

ACLU officials say the program has been wrongfully extended to monitor peace groups who were doing nothing more than expressing their views.

"The U.S. military should not be in the business of maintaining secret databases about lawful First Amendment activities," ACLU attorney Ben Wizner said. "It's an abuse of power and an abuse of trust for the military to play any role in monitoring critics of administration policies."

Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a Pentagon spokesman, said it would be inappropriate to comment on ongoing litigation.

TALON was based on an earlier Air Force project launched in 2002 known as "Eagle Eyes," under which military personnel were encouraged to report suspicious activity.

The ACLU said it sued after the Pentagon refused to comply with a Freedom of Information Act request seeking information it had collected on the ACLU, the American Friends Service Committee, Greenpeace, Veterans for Peace, United for Peace and Justice, and 26 other groups and activists.

ACLU affiliates in Florida, Georgia, Rhode Island, Maine, Pennsylvania and Washington state have joined in the lawsuit.

The groups argue that organizations and people monitored by the Pentagon have a right to know what information has been collected about them. The lawsuit seeks to determine whether that information has been shared or will be shared with other federal agencies.

Steven Aftergood, the director of the Federation of American Scientists' Project on Government Secrecy, said the ACLU lawsuit probably would be an uphill battle.

"The courts tend to be deferential to government agencies on issues of national security," he said.

But there are exceptions, and sometimes there's a middle ground under which government agencies will release sensitive information, Aftergood said.

"Sometimes a lawsuit is necessary to get a serious response from the government," he said. "But only rarely is a judge going to force an agency to disclose records it doesn't want to disclose."

News stories about the secret program prompted the Defense Department last December to order a review of TALON to see whether it complied with Pentagon regulations and U.S. law. The review also was supposed to determine whether some records and information had been stored improperly in the program's database.

Maka said he couldn't comment on whether the review had been completed because of the lawsuit.

Aftergood said the biggest problems with TALON were a lack of oversight and improper collection of information on U.S. citizens.

"Certainly, the Pentagon needs to be alert against threats against its facilities," he said. "But they also need to comply with the law and respect the constitutional rights of U.S. citizens."

Secure Flight Program May Finally Take Off (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Passenger background-check plan moves ahead after long delays

DOJ_NMG_0034369

WASHINGTON—The government's long-delayed effort to improve background checks of airline passengers is moving ahead after years of floundering, a congressional investigator told lawmakers Wednesday.

"I've seen very positive steps lately that are encouraging," said Cathleen Berrick, director of homeland security and justice for the Government Accountability Office, the investigative agency of Congress.

Even so, the program, called Secure Flight, is still more than a year away from being implemented, according to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

Airlines currently check domestic passengers' names against incomplete, declassified terrorist watch lists. Secure Flight would differ in that the TSA would check domestic passengers' names against comprehensive terrorist databases kept by the government.

TSA Director Kip Hawley recently told reporters that Secure Flight might start in 2007 and will definitely be in operation in 2008.

Some obstacles remain. Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., said Wednesday that she is concerned the TSA has spent $120 million on developing the program since 2003. "We better have some assurance this is going to work," she said.

The TSA is seeking an additional $40 million in 2007 for Secure Flight.

Berrick's comments to Lowey and other members of a House Homeland Security subcommittee sharply contrasted with her testimony to senators in February that described the program as "at risk of failure."

Berrick said the TSA had hired employees with experience building complex information-technology systems, including Stephanie Rowe, a former Accenture executive who took over Secure Flight planning late last year.

Hawley "really wants to do this right," Berrick said, noting he had started planning Secure Flight again from scratch. Previously, Berrick said, the TSA "was rushing to get something that should have taken two years in six months."

TSA began planning Secure Flight in mid-2004 and aimed to launch it in August 2005. But Hawley, who took over TSA last July, told reporters, "We're not going to put an artificial timeline on it. … That encourages people to look at the clock, not the scoreboard."

The Homeland Security Department, which oversees TSA, made an initial effort to take over background checks in 2003 but killed that program, called CAPPS II, in 2004 partly out of concerns it would not protect passengers' privacy.

Hawley said privacy concerns wouldn't be ignored in Secure Flight. Congress requires the program to protect privacy and minimize cases where travelers are mistaken for terrorists.

9/11 Families Serve The Greater Good (NYT)

By Gov Corzine letter to editor

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

To the Editor:

The Sept. 11 attacks left our nation shocked, confused, angry and hurt. But for those who lost family that day, the pain was far greater.

In times of such tragedy, it's often hard to look past your own personal pain, but somehow the families of the 9/11 victims did just that. They took heartache and turned it into something that could effect change for the greater good (news article, June 8).

If not for the strength of the victims' families, their heartfelt compassion for those who were lost and their concern for safety and security, there would have been no 9/11 commission.

The thorough investigation that exposed dangerous security gaps would not have happened, and there would not have been a thorough re-examination of our national security and vulnerabilities.

If not for the continued vigilance of these families, America would still be in the dark about the oversights that allowed the terrorists to slip through our security net undetected.

We should ask ourselves, if put in their position, would we have had the strength to speak out for the public good? They could have kept their personal and private pain inside, but if they had, would our nation be any safer today?

Their love for their country is as great as their love for their lost ones. Today, their country is safer, and for that, we should all be grateful.

Jon S. Corzine
Governor
Trenton, June 13, 2006

FEMA Vows To Check IDs To Keep Aid From The Undeserving (SFSS)

By William E. Gibson

DOJ_NMG_0034370

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Scorned by government accountants for doling out an estimated $1 billion of fraudulent hurricane aid, the Federal Emergency Management Agency promised on Wednesday to verify the identity of disaster victims before giving them money and housing.

No more debit cards for victims, at least not this hurricane season. No more double payments to applicants. Social Security numbers will be verified before the money flows. And somebody will be checking to see if recipients actually live in disaster zones.

At least that's what a FEMA official told skeptical members of a House panel who were shocked anew by the latest report of millions of dollars wasted on prisoners, undamaged property and fraudulent applicants living large on taxpayer dollars.

The agency learned some hard lessons after spreading money to people who didn't deserve it in Florida in 2004 and in Gulf Coast states in 2005, said Donna M. Dannels, FEMA's acting director of recovery. Now it is moving to implement safeguards while preparing for new storms.

At a hearing on Wednesday, members of the House Subcommittee on Investigations pummeled Dannels with questions about how FEMA could have been so easily defrauded last year after disclosures by the South Florida Sun-Sentinel and other warning signs revealed misspending going back to 2004.

Dannels said FEMA was trying new verification systems last year but was simply overwhelmed by the sheer scale of disaster when Hurricanes Katrina and Rita swept across the Gulf Coast. The agency was faced with a vast population of victims, some pulled from rooftops without even shirts on their backs or any form of identification.

"We did, in fact, put in place never-before-used and untested (verification) processes that clearly, because they were untested, were subject to error and fraud," she said.

"Our system was overwhelmed. People could not get through on our 800 phone number. So we just made a calculated decision that we were going to help as many people as we could, and that we would have to go back and identify the people we had either taken careof or who were defrauding us and deal with them."

Since then, the agency hired a contractor to help spot fraudulent applications over the Internet and abandoned the practice of handing out debit cards for emergency spending. New computer systems have been designed to prevent duplicate applications and verify Social Security numbers. FEMA's data contractor is supposed to help verify residential ownership and occupancy.

FEMA has recouped $16.8 million of disaster relief that was improperly awarded, the agency reports.

A federal task force, meanwhile, continues to investigate. More than 7,000 cases of suspected fraud have been referred to the Justice Department for prosecution.

The congressional panel promised to keep pressure on FEMA to shore up its verification process. "This is an affront to the hard-working American taxpayer, who has been fleeced by the actions of these criminals and by the lack of FEMA fraud prevention," said subcommittee chairman Michael McCaul, R-Texas.

Problems in FEMA's individual aid program first came to light in October 2004, when the Sun-Sentinel reported that thousands of residents in Miami-Dade County were collecting aid after Hurricane Frances, even though the storm struck 100 miles to the north. FEMA ultimately paid $31 million in the county. The money bought rooms full of furniture, new wardrobes, TVs and appliances for people who suffered no damage.

After analyzing claims from 20 disasters across the country, the newspaper later determined that FEMA paid at least $330 million in areas spared the devastating effects of fires, floods, hurricanes and tornadoes. From Los Angeles to Cleveland to Detroit, the pattern was the same: Residents of the nation's poorest neighborhoods called FEMA assistance "free money."

The hearing on Wednesday was prompted by a study just released by the Government Accountability Office, which concluded that FEMA's lax control over payments in the aftermath of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita led to an estimated $1 billion of fraudulent aid.

Gregory Kutz, who led the GAO study, testified that 173 federal prisoners had received expedited aid and rental assistance of about $800,000, and that more than 1,000 state prisoners got aid of $10 million. One recipient's property turned out to be a vacant lot. Another was a cemetery.

Hurricane aid was used to buy a $200 bottle of champagne at a Hooters restaurant, adult videos, a $2,000 Caribbean vacation and season tickets for the New Orleans Saints football games. One recipient used aid to stay at a vacation resort in Orlando from September to November at $249 a night.

"The victim?" Kutz said. "The American taxpayer."

FEMA Official Rejects Katrina Fraud Report (WT/AP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

A FEMA official angered a congressional panel yesterday when she discounted a congressional study that concludes that up to $1.4 billion of the individual aid paid out after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita was misspent for fraudulent reasons.

Donna Dannels, acting deputy director of recovery for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, told a House hearing that the congressional conclusions "represent a fraction of the overall assistance provided."

However, the congressional Government Accountability Office (GAO), using statistical analysis, estimates that 16 percent of the individual assistance distributed after the two hurricanes last year was misspent.

Among the items bought with purchase cards intended for storm relief:

·An all-inclusive, one-week Caribbean vacation in the Punta Cana resort in the Dominican Republic.

·Five season tickets to New Orleans Saints professional football games.

·Videos of "Girls Gone Wild."

·Bottles of Dom Perignon champagne at $200 a bottle.

Miss Dannels told a House Homeland Security subcommittee that the GAO looked only at .01 percent of the 2.5 million applications for assistance and said FEMA only learned of the new estimates last week.

In a sharp exchange, Rep. Christopher Shays, Connecticut Republican, told Miss Dannels: "The amount of fraud outlined in this report ... -- I don't think it's refutable."

Miss Dannels' response was criticized as well by Gregory Kutz, managing director of forensic audits and special investigations for the GAO. He said FEMA may be having trouble accepting the results because its director, R. David Paulison, previously testified the fraud rate was only 2 percent to 3 percent.

The GAO concluded that FEMA, which has been criticized for mismanaging Katrina hurricane relief, paid for such items as season tickets for the New Orleans Saints, a vacation in the tropics and even sex-change surgery. One man spent 70 days at a Hawaiian hotel at government expense; another recipient gave a New Orleans cemetery as his address. Several prisoners got government money for "relocating."

GAO special agent John Ryan said that once an applicant receives the assistance there's no control over how it's spent. FEMA said it has identified more than 1,500 cases of potential fraud and has referred those cases to the Homeland Security Department's inspector general. The agency said it has identified $16.8 million in improperly awarded disaster-relief money, but the GAO said it had determined that FEMA had likely paid out between $600 million and $1.4 billion.

The investigative agency said it found refugees who were lodged in hotels often were paid twice, because FEMA gave them rental assistance and paid hotels directly. California hotels received $8,000 to house one person, who also received three rental-assistance payments for both disasters.

In another instance, FEMA paid a person $2,358 in rental assistance, while paying $8,000 for the same person to stay 70 nights in a Hawaii hotel at more than $100 per night.

"Our forensic audit and investigative work showed that improper and potentially fraudulent payments occurred mainly because FEMA did not validate the identity of the registrant, the physical location of the damaged address, and ownership and occupancy of all registrants at the time of registration," GAO officials said.

Non-Victims Bilk $1.4 Billion From FEMA Katrina Funds (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Caribbean vacation. Pro football tickets. "Girls Gone Wild" videos. Fees for a divorce lawyer. A diamond ring. A sex change operation.

This list is not a celebrity spending spree, but a chronicle of the fraud committed by Americans who said they were victims of Hurricane Katrina and defrauded the federal government of as much as $1.4 billion, according to a report issued Wednesday by the Government Accountability Office.

As many thousands attempted to recover from the loss of their homes in one of the greatest natural disasters to hit U.S. shores, con artists used false addresses -- cemeteries, vacant lots and post office boxes -- and fraudulent Social Security numbers, including some from deceased individuals, to obtain rental assistance checks from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Some of the fraud was committed from prisons.

Others used federal aid designed for immediate food, shelter and clothing needs to go on spending sprees.

The GAO assigned auditors to work undercover from February to June of 2006 to test how easy it was to defraud the federal government. In its report, the GAO estimated that after examining a statistical sample of 247 claims, 16 percent of FEMA's assistance for housing and emergency provisions was misspent, for a total of between $600 million and $1.4 million lost in fraud.

During a hearing Wednesday before the House Homeland Security subcommittee on investigations, Donna M. Dannels, FEMA's acting director for recovery, said that the "questionable purchases" in the GAO investigation totaled "just under $8,000, or 0.02 percent of nearly $39 million" in aid.

As for the rental assistance checks, she argued that the fraudulent cases represented only "a fraction of the overall assistance provided" -- $6.3 billion in housing payments distributed by the agency.

But her arguments did not sway legislators.

"This is an insult to the victims of Katrina and Rita," said Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Texas, the panel's chairman. "The ultimate victim is the American taxpayer."

The committee's top Democrat, Rep. Bob Etheridge of North Carolina, blamed the White House. "The administration's irresponsible contracting processes and lax oversight have cost taxpayers billions," he said.

Nor did Dannels' statements impress the GAO. Sitting next to her during the hearing was Gregory Kutz, the agency's managing director of forensic audits, who said that FEMA was having trouble accepting the results because it had previously estimated the fraud rate at 2 percent to 3 percent, not the 16 percent the GAO now calculates.

At the podium, Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., said the GAO report was so compelling "I don't think it's refutable."

During the hearing, FEMA was attacked for failing to impose controls or checks on the process. Dannels said the agency has taken steps to reduce the potential for fraud, including a new system to verify the identification of individuals registering by telephone.

But McCaul and Etheridge both called for further investigations, this time into contract fraud. In Senate hearings earlier this year, the U.S. government testified that it wasted $900 million on trailers that were too wide to use in housing-deprived flood zones.

The FEMA money was intended to help victims pay for food, housing, clothes and other essentials. The subcommittee said that based on the information in the GAO report, it has referred 7,000 cases to the Justice Department for prosecution.

In its report, the GAO found that prisoners applied for assistance from jail phones. Using false identities, they routed assistance checks to the homes of relatives or friends. One inmate collected $20,000 using a post office box.

A Texas man filed 19 separate applications and used the money for a sex change operation. Elsewhere in Texas, a recipient used FEMA money to buy a diamond ring and other jewelry worth $3,700. FEMA gave an individual $2,358 in rental assistance while paying an additional $8,000 so that same person could stay at a hotel in Hawaii for more than two months.

FEMA funds also purchased for a $2,200 week-long vacation in the Dominican Republic and five season tickets to the New Orleans Saints. In Houston, federal money was used to buy sexual enhancement products and hire a divorce lawyer. And thanks to FEMA, someone in Santa Monica, Calif., purchased $300 worth of "Girls Gone Wild" sex videos.

"There were no controls in place, and a clear lack of management," said McCaul, who is pushing legislation that would require FEMA to set up a database to verify and cross-reference individuals and their Social Security numbers. "Americans have good reason to be angry. That's why we held the hearing, to put some sunlight on it."

New Orleans Public-housing Plan Set (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, June 15, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development announced a plan Wednesday to rebuild the bulk of the city's public housing that was destroyed in Hurricane Katrina.

More than 1,000 public-housing units will reopen by the end of August, enabling more of the city's poor to come home.

HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson also said the agency will increase the amount of its rent-subsidy vouchers and tear down several crumbling complexes so they can be redeveloped as mixed-income neighborhoods.

“We want to ensure the public housing of the future is a source of pride for all residents of the city,” Jackson said.

Today, 1,000 units are occupied in five of the least-damaged housing projects. Before Katrina, residents occupied about 5,000 units in 11 complexes.

Former public-housing residents have expressed outrage at the slow return of subsidized housing to New Orleans, even accusing the government of purposely keeping them out. Jackson said HUD was waiting for a green light from local leaders and for the return of basic services such as utilities and schools. “We couldn't move any faster than we're moving now,” he said.

At least a dozen former public-housing residents are staging a round-the-clock protest by living in tents on a grassy median outside the St. Bernard housing complex, the city's largest. A spray-painted sign reading “Survivors Village” hangs between two trees.

DOJ_NMG_0034373

Behind a high, razor-wire fence, dozens of two-story buildings are vacant, doors and windows gaping, torn curtains and broken blinds flapping in the breeze. The complex is slated to be torn down and redeveloped, a process that could take years, Jackson said Wednesday.

"I'm so homesick," says Rhonda Mingo, 44, who has been living in a tent with her 1-year-old grandson for two weeks. "I've lived in St. Bernard my whole life."

Her sister, Stephanie Mingo, is living in a tent as well. She becomes upset when she hears that St. Bernard will be torn down and redeveloped. "They don't have time for that," she says. "People want to come home now."

Several local elected leaders have proposed requiring public-housing residents to hold jobs, an attempt to cut down on crime in the complexes. That decision lies with the city's housing authority, Jackson said, even though HUD took over the complexes in 2002 because of corruption and mismanagement by local officials.

Several redevelopment plans were in the works before the Aug. 29 hurricane, and now, those will "move forward," Jackson said.

5,000 Public Housing Units In New Orleans Are To Be Razed (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 14 — Federal housing officials announced on Wednesday that more than 5,000 public housing apartments for the poor were to be demolished here and replaced by developments for residents with a wider range of incomes.

The announcement, made by Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso R. Jackson, provoked strong criticism from low-income tenants and their advocates, several of whom noted that thousands of public housing apartments had been closed since Hurricane Katrina. But local officials have for months said they do not want a return to the intense concentrations of poverty in the old projects, where crime and squalor were pervasive.

Acknowledging the immediate need for housing here, Mr. Jackson also said 1,000 apartments in several public housing complexes that were only lightly damaged in the storm would be opened over the next 60 days. Federal housing officials also said they had raised by 35 percent the value of disaster-housing vouchers for displaced residents who wanted to rent market-rate apartments, because the city's housing shortage had caused rents to increase.

The demolition, which is scheduled to begin over the next several months, would be the largest of its kind in the city's history and would erase the sprawling low-rises of the St. Bernard, C. J. Peete, B. W. Cooper and Lafitte housing developments. The four developments were damaged in Hurricane Katrina to varying degrees and have been off-limits — along with most of the city's public housing — to residents ever since.

The four developments represent more than half of all traditional public housing in the city, where only 1,097 units have been opened since the storm. Before the hurricane, the city had close to 8,000 units, although not all were habitable.

"Hurricane Katrina put a spotlight on the condition of public housing in New Orleans," Mr. Jackson said in a teleconference with reporters in Washington. "I'm here to tell you we can do better."

His announcement appeared to heighten the fears of many displaced tenants that they would be pushed out in favor of higher-income families.

"Right now, we feel it's not the time to start huge building projects because there are lots of people who are displaced as we speak and need a place to stay," said Lynette Bickham, who was evacuated from the St. Bernard project. "We're going to continue to fight for our homes."

This month, former residents began demanding the right to return, setting up a tent city outside the St. Bernard project, the largest of the developments. Local and federal officials refused to open the developments, saying they were unsafe.

Mr. Jackson outlined the first official plans for the projects since the storm, and they were incomplete. He did not specify how many units in the new developments would be set aside for public housing or whether there would be units for all the low-income residents who had such housing before the storm. Planning for the new developments, which are to be financed by bonds, tax credits and federal housing money, has not begun, he said.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin responded to Mr. Jackson's announcement enthusiastically.

The proposed demolitions have renewed a debate about the future of the city's enormous poor population, most of which remains displaced.

"I think the people who've been planning the recovery process never wanted poor people to return to the city in the first place," said Lance Hill, the director of the Southern Institute for Education and Research at Tulane University. "And they haven't made it easy."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0034374

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Double-duty 'DNA'

D.C. Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey had to laugh when telling Inside the Beltway that he's been around law enforcement long enough -- three decades and counting -- that "when I used to write the letters DNA all over my police reports, it stood for Does Not Apply."

Chief Ramsey says he still relies on DNA in his police work, albeit today it stands for deoxyribonucleic acid, or the genetic material in humans.

Grandma's boundaries

Speaking of veteran police chiefs -- or, in this case, a former U.S. Park Police chief who was fired by the Interior Department for going public with departmental budget concerns in this age of terrorism -- you'd never know that Teresa Chambers was embroiled in a lawsuit against Uncle Sam over her dismissal.

"People say to me that you must regret [accepting the police chief's job], and I answer, 'Regret? No! It is the greatest place I've ever been. I have the best memories."

Or so Mrs. Chambers, a 30-year police veteran and former police chief in Durham, N.C., told the Northern Virginia Chapter of the American Society for Public Administration during its annual awards dinner Tuesday (where, if we might digress, the Inside the Beltway column was honored with the 2006 Hodding Carter Outstanding Journalism Award).

In remarks centering on ethics in the workplace, the whistleblowing former chief, who accused the Bush administration of silencing dissenting viewpoints such as her own, praised President Bush's father, former President George Bush, for observing that a true leader uses his or her power "to help people ... to serve people."

"A leader leads by good common sense," she recalled. "A leader leads by taking risks."

She cited the popular leadership checklist used by retired Army Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf, particularly his Rule 14: "Do what is right."

However, she pointed out, one need only think of his or her grandmother when confronting an ethical quandary: "Ask yourself, 'What will grandmother say?' Stay within those boundaries, and you'll be OK."

Right restored

The National Rifle Association this week delivered once again on its role of upholding the Second Amendment, as Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco signed into law the NRA-backed Emergency Powers Protection Act.

The law prevents governments in her state from confiscating firearms during a state of emergency, as took place in New Orleans last year.

"The aftermath of Hurricane Katrina became the proving ground for what American gun owners have always feared: the day that government bureaucrats throw the Bill of Rights in the trash and declare freedom to be whatever they say it is," says NRA chief Wayne LaPierre.

Inconsistent Al

Al Gore worries the world's getting hot,
And all over the globe he will trot,
Warmly warning the masses
About grave greenhouse gases
Caused by people who travel a lot.

-- F.R. Duplantier

Hillary and Barney

She's not president -- yet -- but one might gather as much given the language used to tout one speech today to the American Constitution Society for Law and Policy.

"Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton will deliver a major policy address on privacy," the society states, adding that "featured remarks" will then be delivered by Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat.

Oh, well, Mr. Frank already made his waves Tuesday when blasting John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, for his "disastrous tenure" leading to a "diminution of American influence."

"Anyone who doubts the wisdom of the constitutional requirement that important officials be confirmed by the Senate before taking up their jobs should ponder the disastrous example of John Bolton, whom the Senate declined to confirm as ambassador to the U.N., and who received a recess appointment from President Bush," Mr. Frank stated.

Cook book

DOJ_NMG_0034375

Texas native and White House History Fellow Jane Hampton Cook, who served President Bush for five years in various communications positions, will discuss her new book, "The Faith of America's First Ladies," at today's Conservative Women's Network Luncheon at the Heritage Foundation.

She explains in the book how numerous first ladies triumphed over extreme pressures of their positions.

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin@washingtontimes.com.

Government Dines On Katrina Leftovers (WSJ)

By Emily Chamlee-wright And Daniel Rothschild

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- With a history in the Black Panthers and Green Party, Malik Rahim does not fit the stereotype of a property-rights activist. But that is what he's become in the upside-down political world of post-Katrina New Orleans, where government response to the storm is creating some strange bedfellows.

Nine months after the hurricane New Orleans remains in tatters, its population is down to about 200,000 from almost a half-million. Large parts of the city, from posh Lakeview to working-class Mid-City, still have few habitable buildings. Many businesses have not reopened or are gone for good. Almost a quarter of voters in May's mayoral runoff election voted absentee.

To add insult to injury, the rights of property owners who had their homes and businesses damaged by Katrina's wrath now face a more powerful and potent threat. Local government officials, armed with the public health code, eminent domain powers and a bevy of dubious legal techniques, aim to demolish buildings -- and, some fear, strip titles from owners -- in what are being euphemistically called "forced buyouts."

Mr. Rahim is the founder of Common Ground, a homegrown group borne of the aftermath of Katrina. It has established emergency supply distribution centers across southeastern Louisiana, including in the virtually abandoned Lower Ninth Ward, where signs reading "Somebody Lives Here" and "Eminent Domain for Who?" surround the bright blue house that serves as a de facto community center.

Common Ground stepped in where government failed. Its Lower Ninth Ward headquarters is on the only street in the district with electricity or communications. Power was restored the morning after Michelle Shin, coordinator of the group's Lower Ninth Ward Project, mentioned it during an interview on ABC's Nightline. The rest of the ward remains in darkness.

In the last nine months, liberal New Orleans has seen a radical transformation in beliefs about private property. Katrina came on the heels of the Supreme Court's decision on eminent domain in Kelo v. New London. While the city is today using its public safety police powers to justify the demolition of homes, Common Ground activists fear it may turn to full-scale eminent domain takings over the coming months. New Orleans and the surrounding communities will likely serve as a major battleground between the increasingly mainstream view of neighborhood collectivism and the renegades determined to preserve the sanctity of homeowners' rights.

The fight that has been brewing since late last year is now coming to a head. Homeowners were allowed back into the area only in December, about the same time the bulldozers arrived. The city began to "red-tag" homes, or slate them for destruction. In January, residents won an injunction prohibiting the city from demolishing homes without meeting certain criteria: Notice must be given on the city's Web site and printed in the Times-Picayune newspaper for three days, and letters must be sent to the last known address of the owner.

For homes on private property, demolitions could not begin until 30 days after notification. So far, 120 homes on the public right-of-way have been cleared. Of the 5,000 buildings initially red-tagged, some of which were unaffected by the hurricane, some 2,000 (mostly in the Lower Ninth Ward) have been listed in the Times-Picayune for destruction, according to Ms. Shin. She says that the city's Web site has not been kept up to date on these properties, rendering the city in violation of the injunction. A third of the area's housing stock could be razed.

This sends a message that will chill much-needed outside investment. If bulldozing private homes and businesses becomes par for the course after a disaster, investors will take their money elsewhere. In any case, the local government's failures regarding Katrina are by now self-evident; should they just be repeated as New Orleans attempts to rebuild?

In a city with a rich history of patronage and corruption, all this is especially worrisome. Homeowners have the right to appeal the destruction of their homes. However, no process was established; it came down to city lawyers working with Common Ground to create one ad hoc. Thus far, says a Common Ground legal coordinator, every challenge has been successful.

Yet this is often moot for those tossed into the bureaucratic maw. Some -- perhaps many -- residents have seen their homes bulldozed, with notices either arriving late or not arriving at all. Several residents of the Lower Ninth Ward we talked to thought the city was spuriously tagging homes "in imminent danger of collapse," the criterion it is using to demolish houses not on the public right-of-way.

DOJ_NMG_0034376

They also point to the presence of local development magnates on the Bring New Orleans Back Commission and its famous recommendation of extensive use of eminent domain as evidence of perfidy.

Mayor Nagin tentatively rejected calls for widespread use of eminent domain powers, so the issue has not been at the forefront of the debate. But Mr. Rahim says it "always looms over our heads," and many fear that it is being reborn as Katrina fades as an issue for the rest of the country.

It shouldn't. This has become a fight, in many respects, between those who believe in organic urban development and those who favor political central planning.

Mr. Rahim clearly falls into the former camp. While he is no defender of capitalist principles, with hundreds of thousands still displaced, he is engaged in a struggle for what he calls "self-determination." He wants to "rebuild a community that offers opportunities to all its residents." For that to happen, he adds, property rights will have to be sacrosanct.

After Kelo, property-rights activists argued, quite rightly, that the poor and disenfranchised would be most affected by the decision. Mr. Rahim's efforts demonstrate that, on the issue of private property, Americans across the political spectrum have more in common than we often admit.

Ms. Chamlee-Wright, professor of economics at Beloit College, is a senior scholar at the Mercatus Center at George Mason University. Mr. Rothschild is associate director of Mercatus's Global Prosperity Initiative.

Blind Spot On Katrina (USAT)

USA Today (editorial), June 15, 2006

It's a cliché, but it happens to be true: You have to see the Gulf Coast to grasp the magnitude of the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

In the silent Gentilly neighborhood just north of downtown New Orleans, block after block of homes sit empty, neither bulldozed nor renovated. In the city's Lower 9th Ward, Hardin Elementary School is frozen in mold and Delta mud. Flights over the region reveal acres of blue tarps and white foundations.

Perhaps no one needs to see this more than members of Congress, who are responsible for allocating tens of billions of tax dollars to the Gulf recovery effort and overseeing how that money is spent.

Incredibly, only 94 of 435 members of the House of Representatives (22%) and 47 of the 100 U.S. senators have made their way to the Gulf to view one of the greatest disasters in our nation's history. That's according to Women of the Storm, a group tracking visits.

Among the missing: the two Democratic senators from disaster-prone California, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer. Feinstein says she hasn't been able to schedule a visit but has supported every appropriation request. Boxer, who also has supported funding requests, says she "has seen Hurricane Katrina through the eyes of" Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La. But funneling money in blindly is hardly a substitute for a first-hand sense of where it should go — or not go.

It's not as though members of Congress don't like to travel. Over 5½ years, ending last June, lawmakers and their aides have taken $50 million worth of "fact finding" trips financed by private sponsors. Some of the most popular stops were Paris (200 trips) and Hawaii (150), according to a recent study by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service.

Maybe if New Orleans supplied champagne receptions, lobbyists bearing campaign checks and airfields with fighter jets, more members of Congress would deign to witness Katrina's devastation.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Rejects Calls For Pullout From Iraq (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, June 15, 2006

President Bush, just back from Iraq, dismissed calls for a U.S. withdrawal as election-year politics and refused to give a timetable or benchmark for success that would allow troops to come home.

"It's bad policy," Bush said in a Rose Garden news conference Wednesday, about six hours after he returned from Iraq. "I know it may sound good politically. It will endanger our country to pull out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission."

The news conference was arranged to capitalize on Bush's stealthy 5 1/2-hour trip to Baghdad Tuesday. The visit marked his first meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and the president said he was impressed with the new leader's plans and character. "I sense something different happening in Iraq," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0034377

He defended the decision not to tell the prime minister that the U.S. president was in his country until five minutes before they met and denied that it was because of any concern about al-Maliki's inner circle.

"I'm a high-value target for some," Bush said. "I think if there was ample notification that I was coming, perhaps it would have given somebody a chance to plan, and we just didn't want to take that risk."

Bush said he wanted to see a reduction in the deadly violence in Iraq but would not say how much it must drop before troops can begin to withdraw. He offered other ways of measuring progress in Iraq — an increase in oil production or more electricity delivered to cool sweltering homes or growing numbers of Iraqi military units able to handle the fight.

But again, he did not offer any specific targets to measure when Iraqis will be able to govern themselves. Instead, he declared that the government must be able to succeed and that leaving too early would "make the world a more dangerous place."

Democrats criticized Bush for failing to describe plans for a troop withdrawal.

"What we heard from the president today sounds like more of the same — stay the course, which is a slogan, but it is not a plan," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi after leaving a White House meeting with Bush and other congressional leaders. "What we would like is an approach that says, when we reach certain milestones, then we begin a responsible redeployment of our troops and that the commitment is not open-ended."

Several proposals were before Congress to draw down U.S. troops, including one by Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., Bush's 2004 election rival, to withdraw U.S. combat forces by year's end.

"Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand, because it's not going to happen," Bush said.

But it won't be too long before U.S. commanders in Iraq make a recommendation on withdrawals, a senior military leader said Wednesday. Bush said he would make the final decision based on recommendations from his commanders.

Army Brig. Gen. Carter Ham told Pentagon reporters that initial plans for the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, to make such a recommendation this spring had been delayed by the slow progress in forming the new government in Iraq.

"The government didn't form, so the conditions weren't quite right, so clearly the assessment and the recommendations will be pushed a little bit to the right," said Ham, deputy operations chief for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "But I don't think it will be too terribly long."

Pentagon officials said Wednesday that there are currently about 127,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, a drop from more than 130,000 in recent days.

Ham said the decline is due largely to the planned return home of a Pennsylvania National Guard unit — the 2nd Brigade of the 28th Infantry Division — which is at the end of its Iraq rotation. He said it should not be interpreted as the beginning of troop withdrawal from Iraq.

Bush said his recent meeting with al-Maliki gave him confidence that the new government will be a capable partner to get the country back on its feet — but he said the Iraqis still need help from U.S. forces.

"If the United States of America leaves before this Iraqi government can defend itself and sustain itself and govern itself, it will be a major blow in the war on terror," Bush said, pounding his fist on a lectern set up in the Rose Garden.

Bush's news conference lasted nearly an hour and included his trademark teasing of reporters. He complimented one on the fancy handkerchief sticking out of his breast pocket and congratulated another as being knowledgeable for a newcomer to the White House.

Bush also poked fun at a reporter for wearing sunglasses during the news conference — and later apologized in a phone call after learning that the reporter wore sunglasses because he's losing his sight to an eye disease.

Unlike typical presidential press conferences that tend to be more wide-ranging, most of the questions focused on Iraq.

Bush said U.S. agents collected new intelligence in recent days following last week's air raid that killed Iraqi terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and are conducting raids to stop further violence.

The president also said that a crackdown in Baghdad that al-Maliki began Wednesday offered the promise of reducing the violence. That crackdown sent tens of thousands of Iraqi police and soldiers patrolling the streets, searching cars and securing roads.

"The terrorists are vulnerable, and we will strike their network and disrupt their operations and continue to bring their leaders to justice," Bush said.

He spoke anew about an idea he first proposed publicly Monday at the Camp David meeting with his war council — an oil royalty trust that would give citizens across Iraq a stake in how the resources are developed. He suggested it might be structured like Alaska's system, where citizens get a share of the state's royalties from the trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

DOJ_NMG_0034378

Bush also said he was impressed with al-Maliki's ideas for reconciliation after the war, including former supporters of Saddam Hussein. Bush suggested he would not like to see terrorists given amnesty as part of the process. "If somebody has committed a crime, I don't know whether or not they'll be that lenient, frankly," Bush said.

A senior White House official said the Iraqis have indicated that they're looking for "models" in national reconciliation. Another official said al-Maliki had inquired whether Bosnians or South Africans might be able to provide expertise.

Bush: "Politics" Won't Derail Mission In Iraq (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, stressing the importance of success for the new Iraqi government, vowed today that opposition to the war and "American politics" will not divert him from the mission.

"Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand, because it's not going to happen," Bush said at a Rose Garden press conference today, visibly emboldened by his surprise visit to Baghdad. "It is worth it," Bush said of the war. "It is necessary, and we will succeed.

He refused to address any adjustment of troop levels, saying: "My message to the enemy is, 'Don't count on us leaving before we succeed.'"

The president arrived at the White House this morning at 3:30 a.m. EDT after a surprise visit to the fortified Green Zone of Baghdad—and two overnight transatlantic flights on Air Force One in two days. He's pulling out all the stops of the presidential public relations arsenal to make the case that Iraq's new government offers hope for "success" in Iraq after more than three years of costly war.

The summoning of a U.S.-Iraqi summit this week, the surprise trip to Baghdad and now a 9:45 am Rose Garden appearance follow two events that have given the Bush administration new cause for hope that Iraq's security forces can eventually "stand up" and allow U.S. forces to "stand down." One is the seating of the new government, with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki acting swiftly to seek better security in Baghdad and other regions. The other is last week's killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's former leader in Iraq.

"I've just returned from Baghdad, and I was inspired," Bush said. A former jet fighter pilot in the Texas Air National Guard, Bush revealed that he had taken a position in the cockpit of Air Force One and watched the captain steer into Baghdad International Airport the day before.

"It was an unbelievable feeling," the president said.

"Part of the success in Iraq depends on the Iraqis and their will," said Bush, commending the new Iraqi prime minister's plan for restoring security and the economy of the country while seeking "reconciliation" among ethnic and religious factions. "He's got a plan to succeed… It's a tough task, no doubt about it. But I'm confident this government will meet it."

"There's a sense of hopefulness," Bush said.

Underscoring the importance of his visit, he said: "Sitting here in America wondering whether these people have got what it takes creates some uncertainty… I've eliminated that uncertainty."

"I was impressed with the prime minister and I'm impressed by his team," Bush said.

As he has before, Bush refused to set any timetable for withdrawal of U.S. forces, maintaining that "the enemy" desperately awaits that signal.

"The policy of the United States government is to stand with the new government and help them succeed, and we will do what it takes to succeed," Bush said. "Our policy is stand up, stand down. As the Iraqis stand up, we'll stand down, but if we do it too soon, we won't meet our objectives.

"No question, there are concerns whether the United States will stand with this government," Bush said. "I made it very clear to the Iraqis, and I'll make it clear here. We'll stay with them and help them succeed."

Explaining the secrecy of his trip to Baghdad, the president said: "I'm a high-valued target for some… We just wanted to be sure we were extra secret about this deal, and the reason why is, Iraq is a dangerous place."

Bush Rejects Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that "Islamic fascists" must know he will not bow to political pressure to pull out of Iraq, even as the Senate begins debate on setting a timetable.

"Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand, because it's not going to happen," Mr. Bush told reporters at a morning press conference in the White House Rose Garden, seven hours after landing from his surprise trip to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0034379

Mr. Bush backed away from saying the tide has turned in Iraq, instead telling reporters that he senses "something different happening in Iraq" and that the new government is making steady progress. He also announced that he will send Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman to Iraq to help the nation with energy production and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt to the United Nations and then to Baghdad to work on boosting support for the new government.

Of $13 billion pledged to help Iraq, Mr. Bush said that just $3 billion has been paid and that his administration will encourage other nations to "pay up."

The president admitted that he was "fighting off fatigue" as he answered questions for an hour and even appeared to blink back sleep. Most of the questions focused on Iraq, but he also handled questions about inflation fears and how Democrats and Republicans will fare in the upcoming congressional elections.

"What's going to matter is who has got the plan that will enable us to succeed in Iraq and keep the economy growing," Mr. Bush said of the political campaign for control of Congress. "I believe we're going to hold the House and the Senate, because our philosophy is one that is forward-looking and optimistic and has worked. We've got a record to run on."

The president also turned aside two questions asking him to comment further about Karl Rove, his political adviser who was told this week that he won't be indicted in the case stemming from the leaked identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

While saying he trusted Mr. Rove, Mr. Bush refused to say any more about the accusations that the White House leaked Mrs. Plame's identity, pointing to the pending trial against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

"You'll keep asking questions during the course of the trial; we're not going to comment beyond that," Mr. Bush said.

The president also committed a minor faux pas at the press conference, asking Peter Wallsten of the Los Angeles Times whether he was going to ask a question while wearing sunglasses. Mr. Wallsten is legally blind and wears the glasses to slow a genetic eye disorder. According to news reports, Mr. Bush later learned of the Mr. Wallsten's medical condition and called to apologize to the reporter, who said he "wasn't the least bit offended."

Mr. Bush also said he had several messages from his trip.

"My message to the Iraqis is: We're going to help you succeed. My message to the enemy is: Don't count on us leaving before we succeed. My message to our troops is: We support you 100 percent. Keep doing what you're doing. And my message to the critics is, is that we listen very carefully and adjust when needed to adjust."

Senate Democrats are trying to craft a consensus amendment setting a timetable for withdrawing from Iraq and yesterday said they were close.

After meeting with Mr. Bush yesterday afternoon, Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said the president has been clear in sending his message to terrorists that the U.S. isn't leaving, but Mr. Durbin said the concern "is how the Iraqis read that statement."

"When are we going to leave, and if the Iraqis do not believe they have to accept responsibility for their own future, and for their own country, how quickly will they be ready to stand and fight?" the minority whip said.

Some Democrats questioned Mr. Bush's trip to Iraq, with Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat, calling it "more like a well-staged media event than a true investigative mission" and top party leaders saying the visit doesn't constitute a plan for victory.

"I don't even think we have a clear idea of what the mission is in Iraq," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "The message to the Iraqi people has to be that they must have significant transition this year in taking responsibility for their government and for their security."

Republicans seemed to welcome the debate among Democrats.

"I think this is a particularly bad time to send a message to the terrorists in Iraq that we might be thinking of running, just when they're running," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

The White House also said recent weeks prove why the Democrats' amendment is a bad strategy.

"If we had pulled American troops out of Iraq in April, as some Democrats in Congress had advocated, then our troops wouldn't have brought Zarqawi and many other terrorists to justice," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

Bush Tries To Lower Expectations Over Iraq (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington And Roula Khalaf In London

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

President George W. Bush, fresh from a surprise trip to Iraq, on Wednesday sought to lower expectations of what should be defined as success in the country while sketching out a future strategy that did not appear markedly different from the past.

Americans should not have a “zero violence expectation”, Mr Bush said in a news conference.

“Winning means a government that can sustain itself, defend itself and govern itself, and an ally in the war on terror, and we will help this government do that,” he said in a significant departure from the rhetoric that accompanied the 2003 invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0034380

Asked if the US had a specific target level of violence in mind that would be deemed acceptable, Mr Bush answered: "Enough for the government to succeed."

Success should also be measured in terms of economic progress, the president said, mentioning production of oil and electricity, which are hovering at less than pre-war levels, mostly due to sabotage and corruption.

At the same time Mr Bush sought to damp expectations among Americans that significant numbers of US troops would be withdrawn later this year, even if just to stave off what could be a sizeable defeat for Republicans in November's midterm elections.

According to senior officials in Baghdad, Iraq's new government will keep the mandate of United Nations Security Council resolution 1637, which legitimises the presence of foreign troops, when it is reviewed on Thursday.

However, officials say rolling over the mandate in the next review six months from now will prove much more difficult, as pressure for a withdrawal mounts on the government in Baghdad and on the US administration.

But given the security situation, officials say it is unlikely that "substantial" numbers of US troops will be able to leave Iraq before the mid-term elections.

Mr Bush on Wednesday said he had a message for the enemy: "Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand because it's not going to happen. I'm going to make decisions not based upon politics, but based upon what's best for the United States of America."

A top priority, he said, was securing Baghdad. To maintain the momentum gained from the killing last week of the insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Iraqi and US forces on Wednesday launched in Baghdad Operation Together Forward, involving 26,000 Iraqi soldiers, 23,000 police and 7,200 coalition forces.

There were clashes reported between gunmen and Iraqi troops and a car bomb killed two people, but the clampdown appeared to keep violence at bay in a city hit almost daily by carnage and kidnappings.

Mr Bush said General George Casey, the US commander in Iraq, would work with Nuri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, on the important task of bringing militias and other armed groups under government control.

Iraqi officials acknowledge that defeating the insurgency requires ending sectarian killings by Shia militias that are believed to have infiltrated interior ministry and police units. Militia violence has helped insurgent groups fill their ranks with young Sunni Arab recruits.

Mr Bush said a reconciliation process that might draw on South Africa's experience was also part of the Iraqi government's strategy to isolate the insurgency.

But the president dismissed suggestions of an amnesty for those who had committed crimes.

Iraqi officials, however, say reconciliation steps under consideration include an amnesty for insurgents and negotiations with some leaders of armed groups.

Mr Maliki said the door was open for dialogue with "gunmen who oppose the political process and now want to go back to political activity under pledges".

Bush Sees Progress In Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

But He Says U.S. Success Depends on the People There

President Bush said yesterday that the United States is making steady progress in Iraq toward its goal of standing up a government that can sustain and protect the country, but he emphasized that the ultimate success of the U.S.-led venture lies in the hands of Iraqis.

In a Rose Garden news conference just over six hours after his surprise whirlwind visit to Baghdad, Bush said that "I sense something different happening in Iraq" and predicted that "progress will be steady" toward achieving the U.S. mission there.

Bush's measured optimism is at odds with many crucial indicators in Iraq, including oil and electricity production, which are at no better than prewar levels, and the pace of sectarian violence. It also stands in stark contrast to the opinions of many Iraqi citizens, who have expressed growing pessimism about the course of events in their country as well as a growing antipathy toward the presence of U.S.-led coalition forces.

Still, Bush struck an upbeat tone as he pointed to the progress he sees, while emphasizing that Iraqis hold the key to their own future. "Success in Iraq depends upon the Iraqis," Bush said. "If the Iraqis don't have the will to succeed, they're not going to succeed. We can have all the will we want, I can have all the confidence in the ability for us to bring people to justice, but if they choose not to take the -- make the hard decisions and to implement a plan, they're not going to make it."

Bush's remarks followed a recent flurry of good news for his beleaguered presidency and the U.S.-led effort in Iraq. In the past week, U.S. forces killed the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Also, the country recently completed the contentious, months-long effort to form a government that officials hope will balance the interests of the nation's many ethnic and religious factions.

DOJ_NMG_0034381

The recent developments, capped by Bush's meeting Tuesday in Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone with new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, have created a sense of momentum that the Bush administration is trying to capture.

Bush said he plans to dispatch Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt to help Iraq develop a compact that would commit the nation to a series of political, economic and security goals in exchange for more international aid. Bush also promised to redouble efforts to help Iraq collect the balance of the $13 billion pledged by international community, only $3 billion of which has been paid.

Referring to Iraq's reconciliation process, Bush said that membership in Saddam Hussein's Baath Party should not disqualify a person from being part of the Iraqi government. In the immediate aftermath of the U.S. occupation of Iraq, Baath Party members were purged from public life, which many analysts now call a mistake that fueled the Iraqi insurgency.

"Baath Party membership in order to secure a job or to be able to get an advanced degree should be a part -- shouldn't be held against a person," Bush said. "And I think they're willing to balance the difference between terror and -- 'expediency' isn't the right word, but terror and membership of a party to advance one's life."

Asked whether the tide is turning in Iraq, Bush replied cautiously. "I hope there's not an expectation from people that, all of a sudden, there's going to be zero violence -- in other words, it's just not going to be the case," he said. "On the other hand, I do think we'll be able to measure progress. You can measure progress in capacity of Iraqi units. You can measure progress in megawatts of electricity delivered. You can measure progress in terms of oil sold on the market on behalf of the Iraqi people."

The Iraqi government will have to succeed where the U.S.-led coalition has not if those measures are to improve. Crude oil production remains below prewar levels in Iraq, according to State Department figures, a situation that has been largely offset by higher prices. Despite huge investments, electricity is blacked out more than half the day in most of the country, and in Baghdad, electricity is operational an average of eight hours daily, less than half of prewar levels, the State Department said.

"We are treading water as we gradually try to give the Iraqis the ability to fight the war on their own and hopefully do better than we have been doing," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who has been tracking a broad spectrum of indicators to measure progress in Iraq.

The death of Zarqawi is a major boon for efforts to unravel his network, and seizing opportunities created by his demise is a question figuring prominently in Pentagon reevaluations of U.S. strategy in Iraq, according to defense officials.

Still looming large, however, are the long-standing problems of the homegrown Iraqi insurgency, the threat of sectarian violence and the reliability of Iraqi security forces -- all of which are likely to be more important in driving U.S. military strategy in Iraq and the eventual drawdown of the 130,000 U.S. troops.

Sectarian attacks rose dramatically after the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra in February, which pushed Iraq to the brink of civil war. Since February, an average of nearly 1,100 Iraqi civilians and 175 Iraqi and police and military and police members have been killed each month, according to the Iraqi government and Iraq Body Count, an independent group. The Pentagon has reported that at least 250 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since February, and the overall U.S. death toll is approaching 2,500.

Another major concern is that some of the fast-growing Iraqi security forces -- particularly police -- may be perpetrating sectarian violence, officials said.

"How much responsibility can you give to Iraqi security forces when they are susceptible to sectarian agendas?" a defense official said. "Our plan has been to build up the Iraqi security forces to handle it themselves, and it becomes paradoxical and counterproductive if they pursue sectarian agendas," he said.

These factors apparently have left many Iraqis discouraged, and hostile to U.S. forces. A March poll by the International Republican Institute found that only 30 percent of Iraqis felt their country was "headed in the right direction." In March 2004, 51 percent of Iraqis agreed with that assertion. Meanwhile, 76 percent of Iraqis called security conditions in the country "poor." In addition, a January survey by World Public Opinion found that 47 percent of Iraqis approved of attacks on U.S.-led forces.

In his remarks, Bush said he was confident that the elected government in Iraq was up to the task before it. He added that U.S. troops will remain by the government's side as long as is necessary to achieve the mission, despite growing calls for him to set a date certain to withdraw troops.

"One message that I will continue to send to the enemy is, don't count on us leaving before the [mission] is complete," Bush said. "Don't bet on it; don't bet on American politics forcing my hand, because it's not going to happen."

U.S. Committed To Democratic Iraq, Bush Says (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034382

WASHINGTON — President Bush, saying he was "inspired to be able to visit the capital of a free and democratic Iraq," vowed today that the United States will stay as long as necessary to ensure a stable government in Iraq.

"America is a nation that keeps its commitments," Bush said in a Rose Garden news conference that lasted nearly an hour. "It's in our interests that Iraq succeed."

A day after his surprise visit to Baghdad, Bush said that it was important to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and see "firsthand the strength of his character and his deep commitment to succeed."

Asked about poll numbers that suggest most Americans no longer support the war, Bush said there will always be different voices out of America.

"No matter the polls and all this business, it's worth it, it's necessary, and we will succeed," he said.

The president also said that he had a message for Al Qaeda and other terrorists seeking to impose their violence on innocent civilians: "Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand because it's not going to happen."

In his meetings Tuesday with Maliki, Bush discussed how the U.S. administration can help stabilize the Iraqi government. In one critical operation to regain control of Baghdad and rein in militias, Bush announced that 7,200 U.S. troops will help 52,000 Iraqi soldiers and policemen in an effort to "restore the rule of law."

Bush said that he is dispatching Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt to lead efforts to get financial support for the Iraqi government from the international community. Kimmitt will make stops at the United Nations, and in Europe, the Middle East and Asia.

And the president has ordered several members of the U.S. Cabinet to aid their counterparts in Baghdad. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns will travel to Iraq as soon as possible, Bush said, to help on economic development.

Defending the trip's secrecy — "I'm a high value target for some," he said — Bush thanked the cadre of advisors and security personnel who planned for a month to make it happen.

"It worked well. It was an exciting trip," Bush said.

He disclosed that he sat up in the cockpit as the pilot flew into Baghdad. "It was an unbelievable feeling," he said.

And he delighted in walking into Saddam Hussein's former ballroom to meet with U.S. troops. "It was a thrill to be able to shake their hands and look in their eyes and say that America appreciates what they're doing," he said.

Asked if the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi and the naming of an Iraqi government constitute a turning point in the war, Bush said there were some alterations.

"I sense something different happening in Iraq," he said. "The progress will be steady toward a goal that has clearly been defined." Later, he added, "There's a noticeable change."

Bush denied that Iraq has become a quagmire like Vietnam, saying, "No, 12 million people voted."

He defended his decision to go to war. "It was the right thing to get rid of Saddam Hussein," he said. "It is the right thing to stand with the Iraqi government as it builds a new democracy."

Among those with whom Bush met in Baghdad was the speaker of the Parliament, jailed both by Hussein and the U.S. government. "He wouldn't have taken my phone call a year ago," Bush said. Yesterday, Bush reported, the two sat next to each other and enjoyed a conversation.

Bush was also asked about whether the war on Iraq could cost Republicans the House or the Senate in this fall's midterm elections.

"Pulling out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission would endanger our country," he said. "Elections are a long way off. I look forward to campaigning. I believe we will hold the House and the Senate."

After Iraq Visit, An Upbeat Bush Urges Patience (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — Seeking political momentum from his surprise trip to Baghdad, President Bush said Wednesday that Iraqis feared "America will lose its nerve," and pointedly warned Democrats that an early withdrawal of troops would set back counterterrorism efforts and "endanger our country."

Mr. Bush, speaking at a news conference in the Rose Garden just hours after his 3 a.m. return from Baghdad, promised to send American diplomats to Europe, Asia and the Middle East to press countries there to make good on $13 billion in pledges toward Iraq reconstruction. So far, only about $3 billion has been paid, and some donors have expressed concerns that their money would be spent on security, not rebuilding.

The president also said he had directed several cabinet members, including the secretaries of commerce, energy and agriculture, to travel to Iraq to offer support to the nascent government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0034383

While Mr. Bush said he sensed a "tangible difference" in Iraq, he warned that the violence there was far from over. And he acknowledged international unease over the treatment of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

"The challenges that remain are serious," Mr. Bush said, referring to Iraq, "and they will require more sacrifice and patience."

In Baghdad, Mr. Maliki began a new crackdown intended to reduce attacks in the capital by putting as many as 75,000 Iraqi troops and police officers on the streets. Iraqi forces took up positions across the city, searching vehicles and imposing a curfew. [Page A13.]

In Washington, Mr. Bush praised the prime minister for "working to build confidence in the Iraqi security forces."

But with three recent public opinion polls showing a fresh hint of optimism about the prospect for long-term stability in Iraq, the president also turned to American politics, drawing a link between Iraq and the fortunes of Congressional Republicans in the coming midterm elections. Hinting at a return to a strategy that proved successful for his party in 2004, Mr. Bush said he believed his course in Iraq was correct and vowed to "keep talking about it and talking about it."

Spotlighting divisions among Democrats, Mr. Bush cited what he called "an interesting debate in the Democrat Party about how quick to pull out of Iraq." He also said he had a message for terrorists: "Don't bet on American politics forcing my hand, because it's not going to happen."

The news conference was the latest in a week of events, beginning with Monday's cabinet meeting at Camp David, carefully staged by a White House that is determined to take the offensive on Iraq. Yet aides to the president are well aware that if Mr. Bush wades too deeply into partisanship, he risks losing a claim to above-the-fray statesmanship.

So Mr. Bush stopped well short of the combative attacks being lobbed by some of his advisers, including Karl Rove, who in a speech in New Hampshire on Monday attacked Democrats for what he called "that party's old pattern of cutting and running."

And the president hinted at the tension between his competing roles as world leader and leader of the Republican Party, saying that while he looks forward to the fall campaign, "The timing's not right for me to get out there yet."

Though he complained of jet lag and fatigue, Mr. Bush seemed energized by his brief Baghdad trip — a reflection, perhaps, of a string of positive developments for his administration, beginning with the killing last week of the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The president spoke with obvious relish about sitting in the cockpit of Air Force One as he flew into Baghdad. "It was unbelievable — unbelievable feeling," he said. And he recounted meeting the speaker of the Iraqi Parliament, a Sunni Arab who vehemently spoke out against the American invasion and who "wouldn't have taken my phone call a year ago."

Mr. Bush also acknowledged that he was concerned about the image of the United States abroad, particularly in light of the recent suicides of three detainees at the American prison camp at Guantánamo Bay.

"I'd like to close Guantánamo," Mr. Bush said, repeating a comment he made in May, though he quickly added that shutting it down was not feasible in the near future.

"No question Guantánamo sends, you know, a signal to some of our friends," Mr. Bush said. "It provides an excuse, for example, to say the United States is not upholding the values that they're trying to encourage other countries to adhere to."

For Republicans nervous about maintaining control of the House and Senate, Mr. Bush's performance Wednesday morning was a comforting sign. In the afternoon, he met with Congressional leaders to brief them on his trip; afterward, the Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, said he told Mr. Bush that it was "very useful" for the president to focus public attention on Iraq.

Three national polls suggest that Americans may be more hopeful about the prospects for success in Iraq after Mr. Zarqawi's death, though most of the people surveyed still consider the invasion a mistake.

A USA Today/Gallup Poll found 48 percent of respondents thought the United States would probably or definitely win in Iraq, up from 39 percent in April. In a CNN poll, 43 percent said things were going either very or moderately well in Iraq, up from 38 percent in March. A CBS News poll found 60 percent said it was somewhat or very likely that the United State would eventually succeed in Iraq, a slight increase from May.

Still, there are signs that Republicans in Congress will not give Mr. Bush a free pass on the war. As lawmakers prepared to pass an emergency spending bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Senate on Wednesday voted unanimously to force Mr. Bush to submit a formal budget for future war expenditures rather than financing them through such emergency bills, which receive less scrutiny.

The vote came in the thick of an intense debate on Capitol Hill over the administration's policy in Iraq.

In the Senate, Mr. Bush's 2004 Democratic opponent, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, is pressing a resolution calling for Mr. Bush to require the withdrawal of troops by the end of this year. But Mr. Kerry's fellow Democrats are divided over whether and how to call for a withdrawal; the Democratic whip, Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, said the party was trying to come up with an alternative.

DOJ_NMG_0034384

The House, meanwhile, is scheduled to vote Thursday on a Republican-backed resolution declaring that "it is not in the national security interest of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment of troops" in Iraq.

Mr. Bush said that in addition to the security situation, progress in Iraq would be measured in tangible ways: oil sold on the market on behalf of the Iraqi people, megawatts of electricity delivered to Iraqi households. But as with the issue of troop withdrawal, the president refused to set a timetable for when he would like those developments to occur.

"The answer to electricity is, sooner the better," he said. "I mean, it's hot over there!"

Bush Confident About Iraqi Government, U.S. Election (USAT)

By David Jackson, Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Buoyed by his trip to Baghdad a day earlier, President Bush predicted Wednesday that the Republican Party would retain control of Congress in part because of Democrats who want to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq too soon.

Bush said he welcomes a debate with Democrats on the war before elections Nov. 7. “Pulling out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission will make the world a more dangerous place,” he said.

He expressed eagerness to get out on the campaign trail, but not now. “The timing's not right for me to get out there yet,” he said.

Speaking at a Rose Garden news conference, Bush said he breathed a “sigh of relief” upon hearing Tuesday that top political adviser Karl Rove would not be indicted in connection with the leak of the name of a CIA operative.

Some Democrats, including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., have called for Rove's firing. Bush said he trusts Rove, who remains an “integral part of my team.” The president refused further comment because of ongoing legal proceedings against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff Lewis “Scooter” Libby, who was indicted in the matter.

Iraq dominated the 56-minute session, which came a day after Bush flew overnight to Baghdad for a face-to-face meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and members of his Cabinet. Bush said of the prime minister: “I met with the man, and I believe he can make the right decisions.”

Bush said the visit assured him the new government will be able to “sustain itself, govern itself and defend itself,” freeing U.S. troops to come home. He said he has no specific timetable for troops' withdrawal and called Iraq essential to success in the war on terror.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday to Sunday found 51% of Americans said invading Iraq was a mistake.

“It's worth it, it is necessary and we will succeed,” Bush declared.

He cautioned that it is not realistic to expect “zero violence” in Iraq, despite the death last week of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the advent of a democratically elected government.

“There are other measures to determine success,” he said, including generation of more electricity, stepped-up oil production and a stable government that provides “tangible” benefits to its people.

Some Democrats said Bush lacks a coherent plan for extricating U.S. forces.

“If we are not going to leave too soon, when are we going to leave?” asked Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. Durbin spoke with reporters after Bush briefed him and other bipartisan congressional leaders at the White House on the Baghdad trip.

While Democrats hope to retake control of the Senate and House of Representatives in this fall's elections, they remain divided over what to do about Iraq.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who lost the 2004 election to Bush, supports a pullout by the end of the year. Others such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., oppose setting a date for withdrawal. Both are potential 2008 presidential candidates.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democratic differences reflect “the diversity of opinion (on Iraq) in our country.”

Bush said calls for a quick withdrawal “may sound good politically” but would “endanger our country” in the long run by giving terrorists safe haven in Iraq.

Baghdad Bolsters Security, But Firefights Still Crackle (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 14 — On the first day of the new government's security regime in Baghdad, soldiers and police officers took up positions across this exhausted city on Wednesday, poking into glove compartments, opening trunks and even examining a coffin on a roof rack.

DOJ_NMG_0034385

But the pace was relatively languid (a soldier worked a crossword puzzle in east Baghdad), the usual firefights in the usual neighborhoods crackled (a guerilla fired a rocket-propelled grenade at a tank in north Baghdad) and Iraqis went about their business, wondering what, if anything, would be different.

"Not useful," snapped Isra Hashim, an employee in the Ministry of Health, in west Baghdad, where insurgents move freely on the streets. "This plan is no different from any other plan."

Three years after the American invasion, Iraq has a permanent government that includes all religions and ethnicities, a national army and police force and a recent military success, with its most-wanted insurgent leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed last week.

But while politics has fallen into place inside the fortified walls of the Green Zone, Iraqis outside have faced rising death tolls and ever more brutal killings, which in recent weeks have included heads in banana boxes and executions of students. It remains to be seen whether Iraq's new government will be capable of restoring security, particularly in the capital, where some areas are close to anarchy.

Iraq's new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, acknowledged in a speech about the security plan on national television on Wednesday that the task was as much about making Iraqis feel "that life goes on and is not jammed" as it was about killing insurgents. His defense minister said 80 percent of insurgent attacks were against Iraqi civilians, 15 percent struck Iraqi security forces and just 5 percent hit American forces. Death toll statistics tell the tale: The Baghdad morgue is receiving bodies at roughly double the rate of last year at this time.

In many ways, Wednesday felt like more of the same. Iraqi officials trumpeted new checkpoints and security measures carried out by what they said were as many as 75,000 Iraqi soldiers and police officers, in an echo of a similar crackdown announced by the previous government last spring. It took weeks, however, before Iraqis saw signs of increased police presence.

That effort showed just how tricky providing security was in the capital: As soon as its streets finally filled up with police patrols, Sunni Arabs began to accuse the forces of arresting people in large, indiscriminating sweeps, and killing innocents.

The accusations broke into a full-throated scream by November, when abused Sunni Arab men were found in an underground prison run by the Shiite police.

The turn of events went to the heart of Iraq's security quandary, one that Mr. Maliki is now facing: How can forces that are predominantly Shiite patrol areas that are Sunni, when residents fear, despise, and even shoot at them?

Sunni Arab hostility on Wednesday came in the form of a rocket-propelled grenade in Adhamiya, the oldest Sunni Arab quarter in the capital. A young man stood watching as Iraqi tanks entered Antar Square, raised a grenade launcher to his shoulder and fired it at a tank, missing it but hitting a house nearby, according to Riyadh al-Adhadh, a medical doctor in the neighborhood.

"He fired the wrong way," Dr. Adhadh said.

Soldiers began to shoot, and gunfire popped through the neighborhood for a while shortly before noon. No one was killed, Dr. Adhadh said, but there were injuries.

Dr. Adhadh echoed a thought expressed by a number of Iraqis on Wednesday: Now that Sunnis are in government and seem to be participating equally, there may be a real chance for this security effort to be effective.

"If it is seen as fair, it might control the violence," he said.

Mr. Maliki spoke directly to those fears in his speech.

"It is an important national campaign that does not target a certain neighborhood or a district," he said.

His interior minister, Jawad Kadem al-Bolani, also tried to ease Sunni Arab concerns, saying in his first public comments that he had visited a prison with abuses and had ordered improvements.

In a hopeful sign, Baghdad was comparatively quiet on Wednesday. A car bomb near a large Sunni Arab mosque killed 2 Iraqis and wounded 10 others, and 6 bodies were found around the city. Some Iraqis said the added security measures were worth the trouble.

"It's good," said Mazin Muhammed, a burly tool importer, who grinned widely as he stood at a checkpoint under a highway overpass. "This is protection for us."

The checkpoints in neighborhoods across the city on Wednesday appeared to be the beginnings of something bigger. First Lt. Mustafa Zukair of the Iraq Army's Second Brigade, which patrols eastern Baghdad, said the goal was to divide and seal the neighborhoods so other forces could conduct raids.

"Our work is incomplete without raids," said Lt. Col. Muhammad Fakher, who was directing a checkpoint choked with traffic in central Baghdad.

Lieutenant Zukair, who was working a crossword puzzle under the shade of a tree, said he expected the new security regime, including an 8:30 p.m. curfew, to last for two months.

DOJ_NMG_0034386

Mr. Maliki reiterated the government's readiness to talk with resistance fighters, but only those "whose hands are not stained with Iraqi blood." He said he would announce an amnesty on Thursday to prisoners who had not been involved "in Iraqis' blood or in crimes to destabilize security." He did not say how the state would identify them.

"Without security, we can achieve nothing," Colonel Fakher said, as his troops ordered that a coffin that was fastened to the roof of a beat-up minibus be untied.

Ms. Hashim, the Health Ministry employee, lives in Adel, one of the neighborhoods in west Baghdad that has all but fallen to insurgents. She said the government had a long way to go.

"We are an independent state now," she said, referring sardonically to her neighborhood.

Iraq Launches Drive To Secure Violent Capital (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

Iraqi and coalition forces Wednesday began a massive operation to calm city streets.

BAGHDAD

Iraqi and US forces began a security buildup in Baghdad Wednesday in a bid by the newly formed government to control insurgent and sectarian attacks in the capital.

The open-ended clampdown is to be one of the largest security operations in Baghdad since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein.

Operation Forward Together, which involves more than 40,000 Iraqi and some 7,200 Coalition forces, is a key test of the promises made by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to end the bloodshed that has taken more than 6,000 lives already this year.

But one day after President Bush made a triumphant surprise visit to Baghdad - meeting Tuesday with a somber-looking Mr. Maliki, who has tried to assert his independence by criticizing some US actions - Iraqis waited anxiously for the crackdown, closing some shops and stocking up on food.

Senior officers said the clashes would probably break out in the Sunni districts that will be main targets of Shiite-led forces.

"Today we are starting to use tanks and armored personnel carriers - we will deal very strongly if [insurgents] resist us," says an Iraqi Army major. "When we enter hot areas, we will try to keep the people safe, to arrest criminals and insurgents," says the major, on duty in northern Baghdad. "But the solution is not in our hands. It is with tribal sheikhs, the clerics, and the people themselves, because they are the root of this problem."

In an acknowledgment of that, Maliki on Wednesday balanced the military effort with the possibility of holding talks with "rebels who are opposed to the political process." Maliki said that "if their hands are not stained with blood, we will open the door to [insurgents] for dialogue."

Maliki called on all factions to "express their support" for the operation, saying that the sole objective is to "protect the lives of the people."

The strategy is to secure roads into the capital, expand the curfew, and hit insurgent hideouts in raids that could prompt US air attacks in support. Heavy-handed raids during a similar operation in May 2005 led to a spike in insurgent attacks.

Iraqi forces are trying to capitalize on the death last week of Abu Musab al- Zarqawi, the high-profile leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, as well as a squirt of optimism that has come from completing the new government.

"We are expecting that clashes will erupt in predominantly Sunni areas," Maj. Gen. Mahdi al-Gharrawi told the Associated Press. "The terrorists will escalate their violence especially during the first week as revenge for the killing of al-Zarqawi."

The security plan will "enable Iraqis to live in peace in Baghdad," promised Maliki, echoing numerous Iraqi leaders before him. "The raids during this plan will be very tough ... because there will be no mercy toward those who show no mercy to our people."

Iraqis, weary of the constant violence during three years of US occupation and weak Iraqi government, are making preparations. Those in troubled neighborhoods have begun to stock up on food and are moving family members - especially military-age sons - to safer areas. They're also hiding extra guns.

"In this situation, one gun is not enough," says a man called Saif, who lives in a district south of the airport road that is heavily populated by Hussein-era officers, Baathists, and intelligence officials. "Because we don't know who will raid us, we should keep more than one gun."

Each Iraqi family can keep one assault rifle, and many armed civilians emerge at night as locally formed protection committees seal off their own neighborhoods. Saif says any police or military force will need to bring senior officers - or a US escort - if they want to search his house.

"We should attack [insurgents] within their safe houses," says Iraqi policeman Haitham Sami, as he searched a suspect car Wednesday after a car bombing. "As much as we can, we will keep safe neighborhoods safe."

DOJ_NMG_0034387

Sectarian violence has flared since February, largely due to the alleged presence of death squads in the Shiite-led Ministry of Interior and other security forces. In some cases, young Sunni men are attempting to get a second identity card made, that might change their Sunni name "Omar," to the Shiite name "Amar."

As the crackdown loomed, some Iraqis were keeping identity cards close at hand so that they could produce them quickly for officers conducting raids. And they were stocking up on nonperishable canned goods and rice. The cost of 30 eggs jumped from 3,750 Iraqi dinar ($2.55) on Monday to 4,500 dinar ($3.06) the next day.

One focus of the raids will be the insurgent stronghold of Dora, in southern Baghdad. Property prices there have dropped by half in the past year, a sign of the neighborhood's instability. On Wednesday, only a tenth of the shops there opened.

"The militia [death squads] will come with the Iraqi police in a formal way, so they can kidnap and kill us," says one worried Sunni security guard, who asked not to be named.

The man planned to move his wife and three children to another area later in the day Wednesday. He says the police often refuse to collect bodies from the streets, and claims that the killing of Sunnis in Dora by Shiites "is very organized."

But there were many reminders of the daily violence across Baghdad even as the security operation gathered pace. Early in the morning, a university student passed American forces defusing a roadside bomb near his house in southwest Baghdad.

Later, during his exam in the northwest Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiya, gunfire erupted. One witness described a man in a bulletproof vest blasting his gun into the sky.

Iraqi troops who deployed to the main square with five tanks said their arrival sparked shooting into the air from insurgents - and that the soldiers responded by also shooting into the air. Later reports spoke of a gun battle, but there were no reports of injuries.

"Everyone showed their muscle and their power," said one Sunni toy-shop owner nearby. The mutual shooting lasted more than an hour. "These things [sectarian killings] will never end, because of the hatred in the depths of their hearts. Some people even say: 'If my father was a Shiite, I would kill him.' "

Bombs also took their toll, despite the security boost. A woman and her son died when a car bomb ended a shopping trip for a new bedroom set for the soon-to-be groom. The wood panels for the furniture were already loaded into the family's truck in the northern district of Al-Qahirah.

The owner of a building damaged in the blast blamed insurgents, and said it was revenge on the local people for calling the police the day before to disarm another bomb.

"If people don't cooperate, then everything will fail," says Sadiq Hamid, the building owner. "But if people agree to cooperate, [the security operation] will meet success."

Security Crackdown Begins In Baghdad (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Sirens wailed throughout Baghdad yesterday as shoppers rushed out to stock up on food in the face of extended curfews and one of the largest citywide security clampdowns in three years.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers and police stopped almost every car on major roads and conducted random checks at the neighborhood level as they kicked off a massive operation aimed at restoring security to the city of 6 million people.

Over the past five months, bodies shot in the head, decapitated and some with signs of torture have been strewn in the streets on a daily basis as sectarian, insurgent and criminal violence began to spiral out of control.

The operation, which Iraqi soldiers have said will last for at least one month, is expected to build up over the next few days, fueling fears among residents who are not sure what is going to happen next.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki reassured residents there would be no wholesale storming of neighborhoods. Raids would be directed against specific targets and based on intelligence information, he told reporters yesterday.

"We won't neglect the humanitarian aspect, because these measures are aimed at allowing people to live in peace," he said.

Quieter neighborhoods, like Karrada and Jadriyah, had many checkpoints, mainly controlled by Iraqi police.

The military presence was heavier in the city's "hot spots" where gunfights frequently erupt. Neighborhoods like Saydia, Baiya, Ghazaliya and Adhamiya had fewer checkpoints but many more combined U.S.-Iraqi army foot patrols.

Despite the measures, a car bomb exploded killing four persons in the northern area of Qahira, and gunfights broke out in one Sunni neighborhood, the Associated Press reported.

Ali, a doctor who asked that his last name not be used, said he saw multiple military and police checkpoints as he traveled home from work. Where previously there had been one or two checkpoints, now there are three or four, he said. Each checkpoint was manned by five to 10 soldiers. One reporter was checked four times in a 1½-mile stretch.

DOJ_NMG_0034388

"They are closing every major road, and checking every single car for everything. If there is a car with two young guys, they will search them. Families are OK," said Ali. He said traffic was light as most families stayed home, and few students showed up for their annual final exams.

Even Baghdad's popular "Faqma" ice-cream shop, where students normally celebrate the end of classes and get some respite from the 113-degree heat, was empty. Shops closed early, and city streets were practically deserted by 5 p.m., residents said.

The shutdown was welcomed by many who are tired of the daily onslaught of violence.

"We need safety. We want to feel safe when we walk on the street," said Sameer Hachem Mohammed, a 35-year-old ice seller.

"Iraqis are used to a strong hand," agreed Abbas Abdul Jabbar, a generator technician. "The best way to fight terrorism is with an iron fist."

Newspaper headlines focused more on the security plan than President Bush's surprise visit to the city Tuesday, mostly backing the operation which aims to end the daily carnage and get the militias under control.

But an anti-U.S. demonstration by followers of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr -- who has thousands of armed supporters in his Mahdi militia -- was largely shrugged off.

Soldiers manning the checkpoints acknowledged they were tired after weeks of struggling with the deteriorating security situation, but said they were hopeful the new operation would reverse the trend.

"We need the Iraqis to help us so we an help them. Security will come to Baghdad step by step, and God willing we will be safe," said Iraqi soldier Ahmed Acheeb. "The security plan is very good. We start at 6 a.m. until the curfew at 8 p.m., searching every vehicle. We search the hood, the trunk, the person, and check the car papers. We check those cars with a weapon and check the weapon number with the license."

Another soldier, Ali Hussein, 20, said the troops were in it for the long haul: "Day and night, we will be in the street. The Iraqi army has canceled all leave for at least one month."

Baghdad Violence Dips As Government Cracks Down (USAT/AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

USA Today, June 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — Government forces that fanned out across Baghdad on Wednesday set up checkpoints, frisked motorists and caused traffic jams on the first day of the largest security operation in Iraq's capital since Saddam Hussein's ouster three years ago.

Violence dipped slightly in the capital. Baghdad was hit by just one car bombing that killed four people and injured six, police Lt. Ali Mitaab said.

Many stores were closed in Azamiyah and Dora, both strongholds of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Operation Forward Together, involving 75,000 Iraqi army and police forces backed by U.S. troops, began a day after President Bush visited Baghdad to reassure Iraqis of Washington's continued support and a week after the death of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

It was the first major action by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki since his new government of national unity was sworn in May 20.

Tackling security in Baghdad has been the aim of several past counterinsurgency operations including one a year ago. That operation, code-named Lightning, failed to have any impact on the almost daily bombings, shootings and killings in Baghdad.

Al-Maliki pledged Wednesday not to negotiate with those who had shed innocent blood, the latest in a series of tough statements he has made since American bombs killed Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq. Al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, sought to reassure Sunni Arabs that Operation Forward Together would not indiscriminately target their community, which is the heart of the insurgency.

“We are only going to attack areas that are dens for terrorists,” al-Maliki said.

Launching the operation in a televised news conference, al-Maliki said he was prepared to hold talks with insurgent groups opposed to Iraq's U.S.-backed peace process. He made clear that his offer was conditional and excluded terrorist groups.

As part of a national reconciliation initiative he planned to detail this week, he also offered amnesty to detainees found not to have been involved in violence.

“There is also a space for dialogue with insurgents who opposed the political process and now want to join the political process after offering guarantees,” al-Maliki said. He did not specify what guarantees he seeks. “On the other hand, we are not going to negotiate with the criminals who have killed the innocent.”

DOJ_NMG_0034389

The security crackdown in Baghdad includes a curfew extended by 4½ hours — from 8:30 p.m. until dawn — and a weapons ban.

The government did not say how long the crackdown would last and declined to provide the precise number of checkpoints and troops involved.

Iraq Amnesty Plan May Cover Attacks On U.S. Military (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Leader Also Backs Talks With Resistance

BAGHDAD, June 14 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday proposed a limited amnesty to help end the Sunni Arab insurgency as part of a national reconciliation plan that Maliki said would be released within days. The plan is likely to include pardons for those who had attacked only U.S. troops, a top adviser said.

Maliki's declaration of openness to talks with some members of Sunni armed factions, and the prospect of pardons, are concessions that previous, interim governments had avoided. The statements marked the first time a leader from Iraq's governing Shiite religious parties has publicly embraced national reconciliation, welcomed dialogue with armed groups and proposed a limited amnesty.

Reconciliation could include an amnesty for those "who weren't involved in the shedding of Iraqi blood," Maliki told reporters at a Baghdad news conference. "Also, it includes talks with the armed men who opposed the political process and now want to turn back to political activity."

Maliki stressed that he had not yet met with the Sunni resistance and added, "We will talk to those whose hands are not stained with blood, and we hope they would rethink their strategy." He vowed that they "will not be able to interrupt the political process, either by wanting to bring back the old regime, or imposing an ugly, ethnic new regime upon Iraq."

As Maliki spoke, Iraqi soldiers and police led the first day of a security crackdown in Baghdad. A force of more than 30,000 uniformed Iraqi security personnel, backed by more than 30,000 U.S.-led foreign troops, enforced the first day of a dusk-to-dawn curfew and stepped up checkpoints throughout the capital. Iraq's Interior Ministry said Tuesday that no additional troops were brought in for the operation.

Thanks to Wednesday's expanded checkpoints -- one of the first clear efforts of Maliki's new government -- there were traffic-snarling jams across Baghdad. "We have noticed less and less people shopping, but I would rather have security than more customers," said Wisam Saad, 29, who stood in a shop empty of customers, surrounded by cigar boxes, teapots and trinkets.

Iraq's previous, transitional government, led by Ibrahim al-Jafari, a Shiite, launched a similar crackdown last year but it failed to deter the violence. After elections in December selected Iraq's first full-term parliament since the fall of Saddam Hussein, Maliki won appointment as prime minister. His month-old administration has seen rapid movement on some long-standing demands from Sunni opponents of the Shiite governments, such as the U.S.-Iraqi agreement to free thousands of detainees in U.S.-run prisons in Iraq this month. Hundreds are due to be released from the Abu Ghraib prison on Thursday.

Maliki's security crackdown and talk of amnesty and reconciliation came a day after President Bush's unannounced visit to Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone. Bush came with what he said were twin messages for Maliki: The United States would not abandon Iraq, but Iraq needed to do more to tackle its problems.

The violence continued Wednesday. A bomb placed in a parked car exploded in northern Baghdad, missing the police patrol that was its apparent target but killing four civilians.

...

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has long talked of negotiations and a possible limited amnesty to help end Iraq's violence. However, Maliki's statements Wednesday marked the greatest public show of willingness to compromise from governments led by the Shiite religious parties.

The Arab League on Wednesday postponed a reconciliation conference for Iraq that had been set for August. Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, a top adviser to Maliki, said the conference was delayed in part so Iraq could decide who might be eligible for any amnesty. It was not clear how the government would verify which insurgents have been responsible for which types of attacks.

"The government has in mind somehow to do reconciliation, and one way to do it is to offer an amnesty, but not a sort of unconditional amnesty," Kadhimi said in a telephone interview. "We can see if somehow those who are so-called resistance can be accepted if they have not been involved in any kind of criminal behavior, such as killing innocent people or damaging infrastructure, and even infrastructure if it is minor will be pardoned."

The reconciliation effort pioneered by South Africa after the collapse of apartheid might be a model, Kadhimi said. "One way was to admit what you have done and you will be forgiven, and maybe parts of this can be considered. Because once we see people coming forward to admit what they have done, and it's within the areas the government has the right to pardon, it could happen."

DOJ_NMG_0034390

Asked about clemency for those who attacked U.S. troops, he said: "That's an area where we can see a green line. There's some sort of preliminary understanding between us and the MNF-I," the U.S.-led Multi-National Force-Iraq, "that there is a patriotic feeling among the Iraqi youth and the belief that those attacks are legitimate acts of resistance and defending their homeland. These people will be pardoned definitely, I believe."

Asked about pardons for those who had attacked Iraqi forces, he said: "This needs to be carefully studied or designed so maybe the family of those individuals killed have a right to make a claim at the court, because that is a public right. Or maybe the government can compensate them."

U.S. diplomatic officials have said previously that they were encouraging dialogue among Iraq's many rival factions, but none has confirmed U.S. backing for an amnesty offer.

Maliki also addressed the problem of militias allied with his Shiite religious bloc. "Our success in the national reconciliation plan and our success in providing services will give . . . a message that there is no need anymore for militias, because security is under the government's control." He had earlier proposed that militias be absorbed into Iraq's security forces.

Maliki's statements come as there is growing openness to dialogue on all sides of Iraq's ethnic and religious divides. Talabani told reporters at a news conference in the Kurdish north last weekend that he believed 2006 might be the year of peace settlements for Iraq.

Similarly, the top Sunni Arab in Iraq's new government said this week that he believed a peace deal was "very close." Salam al-Zobaie, the deputy prime minister, said in an interview in his Baghdad office this week that the difference this time was that the new Shiite-led government was indicating openness to compromise.

Asked about proposals of amnesty for Sunni insurgents, Zobaie said the previous Shiite governments "closed the door" on the Sunnis "and forced them to take up the gun to defend themselves. We should be talking about an apology, not amnesty."

Bahaa al-Araji, a lawmaker and supporter of Shiite cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr, said Wednesday that members of the governing Shiite alliance were formally asked by their bloc this week to evaluate who might be acceptable partners for dialogue on the Sunni side.

Speaking before Maliki's news conference, Araji rejected some of what he said were too-easy peace terms being floated by Talabani. He said Talabani was speaking from the perspective of a northern Kurd spared the scale of violence that has bloodied the rest of Iraq.

Rather than a reconciliation conference, Araji said, the best step for peace in Iraq would be for leaders of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish blocs in parliament to come to terms among themselves.

"That will take care of 90 percent of the people" in Iraq's conflict. The remaining 10 percent "will then be isolated and exposed, so all their evil steps are obvious to us and to them," Araji said. Military forces could deal with the remaining hard-liners after any reconciliation, he said.

Asked if he was optimistic about prospects for an easing of the killings, Araji cited the Feb. 22 bombing of the golden-domed Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad. Destruction of the shrine spurred sectarian violence to new and lasting heights.

"Not as optimistic as I was six months ago," the Shiite lawmaker said. "More than I was three months ago."

Staff writer Joshua Partlow and special correspondents Omar Fekeiki and Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Seize The Day (WSJ)

By L. Paul Bremer

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

George Bush made his trip to Baghdad, he told the new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, "to look you in the eye." Yet his surprise visit established more than a first-hand connection. It signposted the dramatic events of the past week, which bode well both for Iraq's future and for the broader war on terrorism. As he stood in the hall of one of Saddam's former palaces -- quite literally in the eye of the storm -- Mr. Bush implored the Iraqis to "seize the moment." There are now emerging indications that they are doing just that.

Thanks to the efforts of the men and women of America's military, the prayers of millions of Iraqis were answered with the death of al Qaeda's "prince" in Iraq. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was responsible for the gruesome murder of thousands of innocent Iraqis. He supported al Qaeda's goal of killing Americans and himself beheaded a number of our citizens on video.

Experience with terrorist groups over the past 30 years suggests that his death will help the war on terrorism in three ways. First, taking a terrorist leader off the board has symbolic importance. Terrorist groups are cult-like and depend on a charismatic leader for inspiration. The ramifications of Zarqawi's death go beyond Iraq because of the stakes in the broader war which al

DOJ_NMG_0034391

Qaeda has declared on the West. With bin Laden in hiding, Zarqawi has been al Qaeda's most important operative. Now he is gone.

Second, the incident will exacerbate internal tensions inside al Qaeda. Terrorist organizations are secretive to the point of paranoia. The tip that led us to Zarqawi came from within his organization. This is sure to concern the remaining killers. Which of their colleagues can they trust? In the past such uncertainty has led to devastating internecine squabbling, even war, inside terrorist groups. And intelligence tips from the Iraqi people have increased tenfold in the past year, suggesting that they are fed up with terrorist atrocities.

Third, the death of a terrorist leader has a serious impact on the operational effectiveness of the group, at least in the short term. Group members lack direction; various men struggle to become the new leader. Paranoia and uncertainty will, at a minimum, crimp their ability to conduct a strategy of coordinated attacks.

But while Zarqawi's death is an important milestone, it is not victory. There will certainly be more violence and terrorism.

Al Qaeda is still in Iraq; these killers from the outside have a simple vision for this country, which is to impose by force a Taliban-like extremist government that would support terrorism worldwide. Then there are the Iraqi insurgents, almost exclusively Sunnis. Killers from Saddam's intelligence and security forces, these men have a different, but equally clear, vision for Iraq. They want to shoot their way back into power and install a Saddam-like dictatorship. They share al Qaeda's hatred of democracy, have engaged in some operational coordination with the terrorists, and have given them safe haven.

Finally, Shiite militia have contributed to the violence. This is a new phenomenon of the past two years -- during the 14 months I was in Iraq, the coalition confirmed fewer than 100 deaths attributable to sectarianism.

Zarqawi's stated objective was to provoke a sectarian war between Shiites and Sunnis: He considered all Shiites to be apostates and killed Shiite men, women and children indiscriminately. When the coalition and nascent Iraqi security forces proved unable to stop these attacks, some Shiites turned to their illegal militia. They have been guilty of some horrible acts of revenge.

Despite this terrorism and violence, Iraq has made impressive political progress. Two years ago, in an extraordinary letter, Zarqawi told his followers that democracy was coming to Iraq and that there was no place for them in a democratic Iraq. When the Iraqis held three elections last year, Zarqawi's fear and hatred of democracy was captured in his blunt message to them: "You vote, you die." So every Iraqi who went to the polls was risking his or her life. Yet in the elections on Dec. 15, voter turnout was higher than in any American presidential election in 130 years. It is hard to imagine a more dramatic example of national courage.

By fortunate coincidence, the day Zarqawi died, Mr. Maliki took another important step by completing his cabinet. And in his meetings with President Bush on Tuesday, the prime minister laid out his program. He confirmed his government's intention to prosecute the war to victory. He reiterated that the illegal militia must be brought under central government control. He spoke of reconciliation among Iraqis, while his ministers of defense and interior made stirring calls for unity, stressing their intention to "work for all Iraqis."

The key to success in Iraq is providing security; and the key to security is defeating the Sunni insurgency. This will deny al Qaeda important support and remove the excuse Shiite militia have for taking action into their own hands. It will give the government the opportunity to rebuild the economy and to continue on the path to full democracy.

What is needed is a military campaign to defeat the insurgents. The campaign plan should determine subsidiary questions of the number, type and deployment of coalition forces. The prime minister's announcement Wednesday of a major operation to secure Baghdad may be the first step in such a plan. We should seize the opportunity now to provide all possible support to the Iraqi government. President Bush said at his press conference that ultimate success depends on the Iraqis, and that is true. But he was also right to stress that we will do what is necessary to enable that success.

Some in America instead speak of setting timetables for the withdrawal of our forces. This would be an historic mistake. Withdrawing our troops before Iraqis can defend themselves would endanger American security by encouraging more terrorism. It would betray the democratic government of Iraq and dishonor the sacrifices of American service men and women.

All the audiences to the ongoing drama in Iraq -- the Iraqi people, the American people and terrorists everywhere -- must understand that our objective in Iraq is victory and that we will do whatever is necessary to prevail.

Mr. Bremer was presidential envoy to Iraq and chairman of the bipartisan National Commission on Terrorism.

Iraq's Atomization (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

The dust having settled -- 500-pound bombs can raise, and even manufacture, a lot of dust -- it is time to give the devil his due. To understand the diabolical genius of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, that pornographer of violence, begin with this:

DOJ_NMG_0034392

He was a primitive who understood the wired world and used an emblem of modernity, the Internet, to luxuriate in gore. But although he may have had an almost erotic enjoyment of the gore, it was also in the service of an audacious plan. And he executed it with such brutal efficiency that he became, arguably, the most effective terrorist in history.

That appellation still suits Osama bin Laden because, as the animating mind behind the Sept. 11 attacks, he pulled the world's superpower into a war that provided the occasion for Zarqawi's rise to world prominence. Still, Zarqawi set out to prove that a central premise of the U.S. intervention in Iraq was -- is -- false. Or perhaps it is more precise to say that he decided to make it false. But if he could falsify it, it never was quite true.

The premise was that Iraqis are primarily nationalists and only secondarily sectarians. Zarqawi's wager was that explosives, used with sufficient cruelty, could blow that premise to smithereens. He may have succeeded. If so, the February bombing of the Askariya shrine, although the blast itself killed nobody, may have been the most deadly explosion since the planes hit the twin towers because it provoked sectarian violence that may now constitute a social firestorm.

A firestorm occurs when a fire becomes so hot that rising heat pulls in cold air, an influx of oxygen that feeds the fire. A firestorm is self-perpetuating because, in effect, the fire becomes its own fuel. If Iraq's sectarian violence has reached that point, Zarqawi had made himself somewhat superfluous.

It is sometimes charged that journalism, which considers the phrase "good news" an oxymoron ("We don't report the planes that land safely"), is missing the good news from Iraq. But so pervasive is the violence, and hence so dangerous has Iraq become for journalists, that the Wall Street Journal, hardly a hostile observer of the U.S. undertaking in Iraq, thinks the bad news might be underreported.

Even the good news often has a dark cast to it. At last -- 25 weeks after the voting -- the Iraqi parliament has produced a full government. But its first task is to conquer itself: It must end the sectarian violence being committed by people wearing government uniforms, in the military and police.

It is frequently said that protracted terrorism has an atomizing effect on a polity, reducing civil society to so much human dust. In Iraq it may be having the opposite effect: Rather than disaggregating Iraqis, the force of the explosions -- especially the one on Feb. 22 that demolished the dome of the Askariya shrine in Samarra -- seems to have blown them together, ruinously, into furious Sunni and Shiite blocs.

Just in May, just in Baghdad, sectarian violence killed 1,400 -- and that figure does not include victims of car bombs. It speaks depressing volumes about the U.S. predicament that the new idea is to . . . conquer Baghdad. On April 20 the Iraq war became as long as the Korean War. As of tomorrow the war will be as long -- 1,185 days -- as U.S. involvement in World War II was when U.S. troops captured the Ludendorff railway bridge at Remagen and became the first foreign troops to cross the Rhine since Napoleon's in 1805. And Baghdad beyond the Green Zone is a war zone, which accounts for the flight from the country of many educated and mobile Iraqis.

But it did not take three years of Zarqawi and terrorism and sectarian violence to turn Iraqis into difficult raw material for self-government. For that, give another devil his due: Saddam Hussein's truly atomizing tyranny and terror. On June 20, 2003, just 72 days after the fall of Baghdad, The Post reported this from Fallujah:

"Military engineers recently cleared garbage from a field in Fallujah, resurfaced it with dirt and put up goal posts to create an instant soccer field. A day later, the goal posts were stolen and all the dirt had been scraped from the field. Garbage began to pile up again."

An Army captain asked, "What kind of people loot dirt?" There are many answers to that question. Here is one: a kind of people who are hard to help.

Funds For Iraq Run Low (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

The $20 billion the US gave for reconstruction will be exhausted within months.

Time and money are running out on the US-directed reconstruction effort in Iraq.

The main conduit for American rebuilding aid - the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund (IRRF) - is scheduled to close at the end of this year.

Almost all the cash Congress has allocated for the fund, some $20 billion in all, has been spent, or will be, in coming months.

Yet many important efforts remain unfinished, for reasons ranging from insurgent attacks to incompetence and contractor corruption. More than 75 percent of oil and gas restoration projects are incomplete, as are 50 percent of electrical and 40 percent of water and sanitation projects, according to the April report of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

DOJ_NMG_0034393

The bottom line: Iraqis are facing what US officials call a "reconstruction gap" as they assume responsibility for rebuilding. Meeting already-identified needs might require a further $18 billion to $28 billion, according to one estimate.

Domestic Iraqi resources, and aid from countries other than the US, might help close this gap. But some experts say that additional US funds - beyond what's currently planned - might be needed, or crucial goals could remain unmet.

"You don't want to be penny-wise and pound-foolish here," says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington.

When the US invaded Iraq in 2003, it took control of a nation with a ruined economy and infrastructure. In the 1970s, Iraq's per-capita income was close to that of Spain. Since then it has dropped to that of a sub-Saharan African nation.

In an effort to jump-start economic activity and civic life, US reconstruction efforts have encompassed much more than the rebuilding of infrastructure ruined by war. More than 3,000 schools have been constructed with US funds, according to the US Army Corps of Engineers. US officials have tried to rescue Iraqi agriculture, such as a date palm industry that deteriorated during the years of Saddam Hussein.

But the general course of reconstruction has not been smooth. Insurgent and factional violence has hobbled rebuilding, as it has the country as a whole.

Between 16 and 22 percent of reconstruction dollars pay for armed guards and other costs related to security, James Kunder, an assistant administrator of the US Agency for International Development, told the House International Relations Committee at a hearing last week.

Fraud and abuse have also been problems. Stuart Bowen Jr., the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction (SIGIR), has 72 open investigations into allegations of corruption, according to his latest quarterly report to Congress.

Earlier this year, Robert Stein, who was a regional Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) comptroller, and contractor Philip Bloom pleaded guilty to participation in a scheme to defraud the CPA of more than $8.6 million, the report noted.

Then there's waste, brought about by haste, inattention, incompetence, or a combination of the three. In May, an audit by Mr. Bowen found that a $243 million program to build healthcare clinics would finish just 20 of the 150 that had been planned, unless extra cash is forthcoming.

Forty-one natural-gas turbines bought with US funds, and meant to generate needed electricity, are being run on fuel oil, due to limited natural-gas availability. This cuts their output by 50 percent, according to the US Government Accountability Office, increases maintenance needs three-fold, and reduces the life of the equipment.

US officials defend the rebuilding effort as the best that could be accomplished under the circumstances. The latest SIGIR quarterly report calls reconstruction "a picture of significant progress achieved through a substantial US investment of time, talent, and tax dollars...."

But critics point out that basic services have yet to be restored three years after the US invasion. Oil and electricity production have yet to return to prewar levels. Some 60 percent of clean water produced in Iraq is lost to leakage and contamination.

"The US aid process has failed. It has had some important individual successes, but it has wasted at least half of the some $22 billion in US funds ... it attempted to use to secure and develop Iraq's economy," wrote Anthony Cordesman, a senior expert on Iraq at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in a recent study.

The question is, what next? As the IRRF phases out, most projects will turn to Iraqi control. Further US aid would be funneled through the normal foreign-affairs budget.

Yet many projects won't be completed by the handover date. As of April, 277 electricity projects remained incomplete, with 58 not yet even started. Forty-two oil and gas projects aren't finished - and only 13 are.

US budget plans don't call for big additions to the money already spent. For fiscal 2007, the US requested $770 million in reconstruction funds - and a House committee has trimmed that by $200 million pending final passage. US officials are pressing other nations to pay up pledges of aid they've already made. But a reasonable estimate of the money still needed is $18 billion to $28 billion, according to Mr. Kosiak, and total foreign aid pledges are only $13 billion.

"Even assuming ... that this gap could be covered by drawing equally upon US, international, and Iraqi resources, this suggests that an additional $5 billion to $10 billion in US reconstruction assistance might need to be provided," he wrote in an analysis of reconstruction earlier this year.

Iraq Debate Splits Democrats (RC)

By Ben Pershing And Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

More than 40 months after the House voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq, the chamber will spend several hours today in potentially acrimonious debate over the wisdom of that conflict and the overall war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0034394

Republicans and Democrats have spent the past three days drawing battle lines for today's 10-hour-plus debate, with GOP leaders telling their Members to emphasize recent good news and Democrats objecting that the structure of the debate and the accompanying resolution is designed to embarrass them.

Democrats have complained that the resolution links Iraq and the war on terror in ways that many Iraq critics fundamentally disagree with, and that Republicans have been unfair by not allowing them to offer their own resolution during the debate.

"It's really a hoax," said Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.), the ranking member on the Rules Committee.

Slaughter noted that when Democrats were in charge, the House actually considered three separate resolutions before authorizing the 1991 Gulf War — two offered by Democrats and one presented by then-Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.).

But Republicans dismissed the idea that multiple resolutions were necessary in this case.

"This resolution is America's commitment to fighting the war on terror and winning the war in Iraq," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "What alternative to fighting the war on terror is required?"

The debate is expected to last between 10 and 12 hours and could conceivably continue into Friday morning, since the White House Congressional Picnic — postponed from Wednesday — is scheduled for 6 p.m. today. At press time, Republican leaders had not decided whether to recess for the picnic or to continue the Iraq debate during it. More than 140 Republicans and an unknown number of Democrats are expected to participate in the White House event.

The debate will be divided into four sections, with each of the House committees that contributed to the resolution controlling a portion of the time. An outline of the debate from the Republican leadership described the breakdown as:

· the Intelligence Committee will manage time "discussing the overall Global War on Terror, including our tangible intelligence successes";

· the International Relations panel will cover "the political achievements in Iraq, the Middle East, and beyond";

· the Armed Services Committee will discuss "increasing warfighting capacity of the Iraqi Security Forces and our military successes"; and

· the Judiciary Committee will manage time on Congress' passage of "laws which have protected Americans, including the intelligence accomplishments which have resulted from these laws."

Democrats say they will use the debate to talk about the redeployment of troops, the administration's mishandling of post-invasion planning, pre-war intelligence, and the calls of several retired generals for the firing of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"There's a lot of unity on the Democratic side," said Brendan Daly, spokesman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

More than half of the Democratic Caucus voted against the original war resolution when it came before the House in 2002.

Some Members on Wednesday also talked up the idea of the Caucus voting "present" as a less politically risky way of protesting the content of the GOP-crafted resolution.

"I hope my colleagues will just vote 'present' and be done with it," Slaughter said.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.) said he feared the wording of the resolution would intimidate Democrats into voting with Republicans — thereby allowing war supporters to claim a resounding Congressional mandate.

Referring to his fellow Democrats, DeFazio said, "We need a major focus and strategy going into this."

Late Wednesday, a senior Democratic aide said that Pelosi was not pushing "present" votes, but that she might yet support the idea.

Pelosi had been planning to divvy up the debate time among members of the four committees of jurisdiction, the same arrangement Republicans will employ. But that plan provoked a passionate exchange between the Leader and some of her party's most vehement war opponents at Wednesday morning's Democratic Caucus meeting.

In comments that some witnesses said bordered on outright hostility, Reps. Maxine Waters (Calif.), Lynn Woolsey (Calif.), Barbara Lee (Calif.), Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and DeFazio took turns complaining to Pelosi that the 72-member Out of Iraq Caucus would be marginalized under her floor debate plan, since many of them don't sit on the participating committees.

Pelosi initially refused, telling them they would be treated no differently than other Members, a response that appeared to only enrage the anti-war Democrats. But Pelosi seemed to change her posture later in the day, with a Democratic aide saying it is now likely the Out of Iraq Caucus will be given a chunk of Democrats' floor time on Thursday.

"It was very clear that she was surprised by them bringing it up," a source who attended the Caucus meeting reported. "And so her knee-jerk answer was to say, 'There will be plenty of time for everyone who's against the war to make their point — but not as a bloc.'"

Woolsey, one of the co-founders of the Out of Iraq Caucus, said, "We're pushing for the Out of Iraq voice to be accessible and conveniently brought forward. We don't want to have to fight to say our piece."

DOJ_NMG_0034395

While Democrats have protested that they were shut out of crafting the resolution, Republicans argue that they did allow Democrats into the process at the committee level, though they admitted that the final resolution did not incorporate any of the suggestions made by the minority.

"Democrats were given the resolution last week and the edits they gave back basically omitted every reference to the global war on terror," said a House GOP aide.

Republican leaders have told their members to emphasize during the debate that they are largely united on the issue of Iraq while Democrats are divided. A memo distributed to GOP lawmakers by Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) urged them to "clarify just how wrong the Democrats' weak approach has been."

Not every Republican is on board with the GOP strategy for today's debate. Reps. Walter Jones Jr. (N.C.) and Ron Paul (Texas), who are among the small number of Iraq war critics in the Republican Conference, said they would not participate because they were unhappy with the content of the resolution.

GOP Resolution Politicizes War, Democrats Say (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

House Democrats are accusing Republicans of politicizing the upcoming debate on the Iraq war, saying the majority party has pulled a bait-and-switch by focusing the debate on terrorism instead of about Iraq policy as promised.

Lawmakers today will spend 10 hours discussing a Republican-authored resolution that, among other things, asserts that former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein posed a threat to global peace and declares that the United States is "committed to the completion of the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq." No amendments will be allowed.

"It is inexcusable and indefensible that at a time when we should be discussing the details of [Iraq] policy that they come up with a political document designed for a political message, a political spin and political debate at a time when our men and women are in harm's way," said Rep. Martin T. Meehan, Massachusetts Democrat and Armed Services Committee member.

Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat, called it a "pointless" debate that is "long on rhetoric and short on solution."

Other Democrats complained that Republican leaders had promised a "substantive" discussion on Iraq.

Instead, Republicans delivered a document that "fuzzes together" the war on terrorism with the increasingly unpopular conflict in Iraq, said Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

"Those are two different wars," Mr. Skelton said. "Those that we're fighting have two different goals, and that is being smoothed over by this resolution."

The International Relations Committee took the lead in drafting the resolution, called: "Declaring that the United States will prevail in the global war on terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary."

Democrats on that committee first saw a draft of the resolution Friday afternoon. They had the weekend to read it and, on Monday, offered their edits to the measure, effectively stripping all references to the "global war on terror." They suggested renaming the resolution: "Declaring that the United States will prevail in the struggle to protect freedom from all adversaries including terrorists."

A senior Republican aide criticized the proposed edits, the majority of which were not adopted, saying Democrats are ignoring "America's commitment to fight the global war on terror."

Lynne Weil, spokeswoman for Rep. Tom Lantos of California, the International Relations Committee's top Democrat, said her boss suggested the edits to correct factual errors.

"He feels that this is a missed opportunity. The resolution as drafted is unfortunately not sufficiently bipartisan or broad enough," she said.

Though Democrats such as Mr. Skelton are frustrated by the resolution's language, some said they may vote in favor of it on Friday because it praises the troops and applauds the elimination of terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

Still, Democrats should "have the courage to vote against it," said Rep. Maxine Waters, California Democrat. "It's a sham, a phony debate."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who rarely speaks on measures, will open the debate tomorrow.

Anti-war Dems Blast Pelosi Over Endgame (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 15, 2006

A series of recent internal disputes have sown discontent in some quarters of the House Democratic caucus, threatening to disrupt the unified front Democrats have used to frustrate Republicans in the 109th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0034396

Despite a superior position in the polls and impressive unity on key votes, House Democrats have been feuding in recent weeks over such issues as the seat of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) on the Ways and Means Committee, the ambitions of two of their most respected members to be majority leader in a Democratic House and their long-standing lack of consensus on whether to redeploy troops out of Iraq.

Such tensions were in full display yesterday morning at a caucus meeting on Iraq where three members of the Out of Iraq Caucus clustered around a microphone to berate House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) loudly for failing to take a stronger stand on leaving Iraq.

At times having to speak above her colleagues, one member of the caucus, Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), told Pelosi that the Out of Iraq Caucus members have been "leaders on this issue," according to several attendees, and that they deserve to play a more prominent role in the House's planned debate of Iraq policy today.

"We're all leaders," Pelosi replied.

Several Democrats came to Pelosi's defense. Rep. Anna Eshoo (Calif.) attempted to quiet the increasingly unsettled crowd, while Rep. George Miller (Calif.) approached a handful of Out of Iraq Caucus members, most notably Reps. Lynn Woolsey (Calif.), Barbara Lee (Calif.) and Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.), and engaged in a "heated conversation," one witness said.

"The whole thing was a circus," a Democratic aide said. "The reaction of most people was to leave."

The episode was merely the latest turmoil for a party caucus still reeling from two other distractions: the short-lived majority-leader campaign of Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and the leadership-driven effort to oust Jefferson from Ways and Means while he faces a government corruption investigation.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) said he is worried by recent intracaucus dust-ups.

"I think we have to be careful. If we're going to take the House back, we need to be unified and have a solid message," he said. "When we have these kinds of things popping up, it does not help these efforts and I think members are concerned."

The Murtha campaign, which began Friday and ended abruptly, if temporarily, Tuesday, pitted his allies against those of House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Caught unawares by Murtha's challenge, Hoyer spent five days shoring up support and had contacted nearly all of his colleagues before Murtha called it off. While some members were elated to see Hoyer challenged, many others, perhaps a majority of the caucus, saw the race as ill-timed and felt Hoyer had done well by them as whip and political leader.

Some were upset that Pelosi had not deterred Murtha from launching the bid and had remained silent on the race for days after it had begun.

"The fact that she said nothing about it for so long and that she allowed him to go through with it in the first place, it shows terrible political judgment," one House Democrat said.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said, "The House Democrats are unified, organized and disciplined. They're keeping their focus on winning the House in 2006. Unlike the Republicans, the Democratic Caucus promotes diversity of ideas, and they come from the bottom up, unlike the top-down, rubber-stamp approach that Republicans use."

The Jefferson dispute exposed fissures between Democratic leaders and many members of the Congressional Black Caucus. Democrats are expected to vote today to remove him temporarily from Ways and Means.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) disagreed that Democrats are showing cracks in their unity, dismissing disagreements on Iraq as "not a big division." But he did note that the Murtha campaign had been mishandled.

"It was a mistake about Jack Murtha, to raise that while the Jefferson thing is still pending," Frank said.

He predicted Murtha that would abandon his bid: "Jack learned it was not a good idea. He saw that the basis for a challenge was not there."

But Murtha, despite having publicly ended his campaign, was still firing salvos at Hoyer yesterday and seemed likely to try to chip away at the whip's backing among moderates.

"You look at his record. He ain't moderate. He's more liberal than Nancy," Murtha said.

GOP Measure Forces House Debate On War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Divisions Within Party Likely to Surface

Nearly four years after it authorized the use of force in Iraq, the House today will embark on its first extended debate on the war, with Republican leaders daring Democrats to vote against a nonbinding resolution to hold firm on Iraq and the war on terrorism.

In the wake of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death and President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad, Republican leaders are moving quickly to capitalize on good news and trying to force Democrats on the defensive. Bush continued his own campaign with a morning news conference and a White House meeting with congressional leaders from both parties, while House leaders strategized on today's 10-hour debate.

DOJ_NMG_0034397

A memo from House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) urged House Republican members Tuesday to make the debate "a portrait of contrasts between Republicans and Democrats." After Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) was booed this week by liberal activists for her failure to resolutely oppose the war, Republicans hope to present a united front that highlights the fractures in the Democratic Party.

"As a result of our efforts during this debate, Americans will recognize that on the issue of national security, they have a clear choice between a Republican Party aware of the stakes and dedicated to victory, versus a Democratic Party without a coherent national security policy that sheepishly dismisses the challenges America faces in a post-9/11 world," Boehner wrote.

But the day-long debate will also give voice to some GOP lawmakers' misgivings about Bush administration policy -- and years of congressional support for it -- in an election year in which Iraq will be a central issue. The news of recent days has buoyed Republican spirits, but the party is still saddled with a war that remains deeply unpopular and is imperiling its continued control of Congress. Some House Republicans have complained that their party has taken flight from its responsibility to debate and oversee administration policy.

"I can't help but feel through eyes of a combat-wounded Marine in Vietnam, if someone was shot, you tried to save his life. . . . While you were in combat, you had a sense of urgency to end the slaughter, and around here we don't have that sense of urgency," said Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), a usually soft-spoken Republican who has urged his leaders to challenge the White House on Iraq. "To me, the administration does not act like there's a war going on. The Congress certainly doesn't act like there's a war going on. If you're raising money to keep the majority, if you're thinking about gay marriage, if you're doing all this other peripheral stuff, what does that say to the guy who's about ready to drive over a land mine?"

The last time Iraq dominated the House's attention, the issue was far less politically fluid. In October 2002, many Democrats went along with Bush's resolution of force, fearing the political consequences of opposing a popular president and a bellicose national mood. Now, some Republicans -- especially those representing battleground districts in the Northeast and Midwest -- will be swimming against the tide of public opinion.

Already, the resolution itself -- declaring that the United States will complete the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq and will prevail in the global war on terror -- has attracted strong criticism from lawmakers in both parties. Democrats and antiwar Republicans object to the linkage between the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism, while some Republicans have said it sets unrealistic goals. Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.), who supports the war, called the resolution "strategically nebulous and morally obtuse."

But the strongest misgivings may be practical. Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) called the entire exercise "a dumb idea" that will highlight precisely the issue that is threatening Republican political fortunes.

"When the country is war-weary, when the violence is still playing out on TV, I don't know why we want to highlight all that," he said.

But Gilchrest, who won the Purple Heart and Bronze Star for his Marine service in Vietnam in the 1960s, believes political considerations have already played too large a role in the debate. In November, after Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) announced his support for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, Republican leaders hastily pushed a resolution to the House floor calling for immediate pull-out. But the cursory two-hour debate was noteworthy less for serious policy discourse than for the suggestion by the House's newest member, Rep. Jean Schmidt (R-Ohio), that Murtha, a decorated war veteran, was a coward.

"It was ludicrous," Gilchrest said. "It had nothing to do with saving lives. It had nothing to do with the war. It was one-upsmanship against the Democrats."

That sentiment spurred Gilchrest and four other Republicans to break with their leadership this spring and sign on to a Democratic petition pushing for debate. Boehner pledged to do so weeks ago.

But GOP leaders are trying to make sure today's debate is on Republican terms. The resolution, "declaring that the United States will prevail in the Global War on Terror [and] the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary," was introduced with unabashed partisan overtones. The rules of debate will not allow the resolution to be amended, nor will alternative resolutions be allowed on the floor for a vote.

Some war opponents -- sensing a political trap -- vowed yesterday not to participate. Five House members -- three Democrats and two Republicans -- held a news conference with a yellow rope tied around their hands to denounce the terms of debate.

"This is nothing more or less than really a charade," said Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), who made headlines in the run-up to the Iraq invasion by changing french fries to "freedom fries" in the House dining room but has since turned strongly against the war.

DOJ_NMG_0034398

But Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), whose support for the war has helped put him in his toughest reelection battle yet, said "it is important for everybody to clarify their position, to be clear, and to stop giving mixed messages."

But Gilchrest acknowledged he has ambivalent feelings about the way forward to success in Iraq. Citing his own battlefield experiences, he said this uncertainty is all the more reason for a full debate. "How many members have in their life [experienced] putting the barrel of their gun on another man's chest and pulling the trigger?" he asked in an interview this week. "How many members have experienced the chaos of a 3 a.m. battle, pushing your bayonet through another man's body? How many members have wrapped themselves around a fellow soldier who just lost his legs in a land mine and you feel the last breath and he's dead, calling in airstrikes on a village and walking through, seeing dead babies and others who are still alive, being with someone who's been shot and you can't move, you can't do anything because you're under intense fire and he dies right next to you?"

The Republican Party's Iraq Offensive (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

The war may not be popular, but the GOP is betting that steadiness and clarity are, and that Democrats won't be able to muster enough by November.

WASHINGTON — The Iraq war is the most immediate foreign policy problem besetting the Bush administration. But as a political issue, the White House and top Republican strategists have concluded that the war is a clear winner.

GOP officials intend to base the midterm election campaign partly on talking up the war, using speeches and events to contrast President Bush's policies against growing disagreement among leading Democrats over whether to support immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Bush's surprise visit to Baghdad on Tuesday — and a lengthy Rose Garden news conference Wednesday in which he extolled the new Iraqi government — mark the beginning of a planned months-long effort, which got an unexpected boost with the death last week of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

"There's an interesting debate in the Democrat Party about how quick to pull out of Iraq," Bush said in the news conference Wednesday. "Pulling out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission will make the world a more dangerous place. It's bad policy. I know it may sound good politically."

Bush's comments underscored the renewed effort by the White House to regain its footing in the domestic debate over the war. It also reflected Republican strategists' calculation that although public approval of both the president and the continuing U.S. presence in Iraq have soured, Democratic disarray could give the GOP an advantage in November on an issue that once looked to be a major weakness for Republicans.

Republican lawmakers and strategists said Wednesday that the campaign to frame the Iraq debate would play out over the summer and into the fall, focusing on battleground congressional districts and states with competitive Senate races.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman has already sent an e-mail to 15 million supporters asking them to reject "craven, politically motivated demands for instant withdrawal."

Ed Gillespie, a former Republican National Committee chairman and a key White House advisor, conceded Wednesday that protracted violence in Iraq and voters' rising doubts "have had a dampening effect on the president's approval rating." But, he said, given a choice between Democrats' uncertainty and Bush's firmness, "that choice favors us."

The Democrats' divisions over Iraq came into clearer focus Tuesday, the same day Bush flew to Baghdad.

Addressing a conference of liberal activists in Washington, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) drew boos from some in the audience when she stopped short of calling for a deadline for withdrawing troops.

She was followed by Bush's 2004 challenger, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who earned rousing applause from the same crowd for comparing the conflict in Iraq to Vietnam and calling for a troop withdrawal this year. He called it a "right and an obligation for Americans to stand up to a president who is wrong today."

Republicans in both chambers of Congress have scheduled events and votes on Iraq all week — the Senate as it debates a defense spending bill, the House as it holds a full day of debate today on a resolution on Iraq.

Officially, the House debate will be the first time the chamber has argued the pros and cons of the invasion and occupation of Iraq since the war began more than three years ago. But Democrats, who have repeatedly called for debate on the war, have denounced this week's events as little more than a political trap to embarrass them and force acquiescence with the administration's policy.

The resolution expresses support for U.S. troops and a commitment to combat terrorism. It also unequivocally asserts that the conflict in Iraq is part of a "global war on terror" — an assertion that Democrats and some Republicans dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0034399

Bush hammered that assertion Wednesday. "If we fail in Iraq, it's going to embolden Al Qaeda types," he said. "It will weaken the resolve of moderate nations to stand up to the Islamic fascists. It will cause people to lose their nerve and not stay strong."

Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) complained Wednesday that House leaders were not going to permit Democrats to offer amendments to the resolution, forcing them into a position of either voting against supporting the troops or for the Republican formulation of the war.

"Our hands are tied — literally — on the floor of the people's House," Abercrombie said at a news conference, his hands tied together with yellow rope to symbolize his frustration. "Do not put us through the farce and the fraud of a pseudo-debate."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) was unsympathetic.

"That is not a 'gotcha.' They have a decision to make. That is what we get elected to do," Boehner said.

Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank) said many Democrats might vote "present" on the resolution, rather than yes or no. And during the debate, he said, they would emphasize their points of agreement — that Republicans are "rubber-stamping" the administration's policy.

"It would be better if it was a unified message, but the reality is the country isn't unified about Iraq — Republicans aren't unified about Iraq. We can't fret too much about the fact that our caucus is very diverse and people are coming at it from many different directions," Schiff said.

In the Senate, leading Democrats have met several times to try to forestall an effort by Kerry to introduce an amendment to the defense bill that would require troop withdrawals to begin this year. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has been trying to persuade proponents and opponents of withdrawal to agree on a formulation. One option has been an amendment calling for the administration to "responsibly redeploy" U.S. forces "starting this year."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley denied that Democratic divisions on the war have hurt the party. "We are not going to shy away from this debate," he said. "The American people are demanding accountability."

Senate Democrats met again late in the day to develop a consensus position on the question of withdrawal.

"It would be helpful to show the American people a position that all Democrats can agree to, but I doubt that that's possible," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

One Republican, Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, described the Democrats' disarray as an unlikely gift at a time when events in Iraq and elsewhere might otherwise paint a dismal political picture for Republicans.

"That's what we're going to bet the ranch on," Foley said Wednesday. "We're not doing everything perfectly, but we certainly have help from the other side. They're just not taking advantage of some strategic opportunities presented to them."

Times staff writer Janet Hook contributed to this report.

Democrats Urge Disastrous Policy Of 'Out' From Iraq (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Democrats can't come up with a formal unified stance on Iraq, but it's all too clear what most of the party's leaders want: Out, and Soon. It would be a disaster for America if they prevailed.

Iraq has finally installed a full government that is fighting to establish order against multiple homicidal enemies. Millions of ordinary Iraqis have risked death to vote — a testament to their desire for democracy. Yet Democrats want to pull the plug and abandon them.

President Bush reported following his surprise visit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki this week that Iraq's leaders are "deeply concerned that the stability provided by the coalition forces will be removed and there'll be a vacuum. And they're concerned about what gets into the vacuum."

Bush said, "I assured them that we will keep our commitment" but added, "I also made it clear to them that in order for us to keep our commitment and be successful, they themselves have to do some hard things. They themselves have to set an agenda. They themselves have to get some things accomplished."

Clearly, if there's any hope for success in Iraq — that is, the establishment of a stable, pro-Western democracy — it depends principally on the Iraqis' ability to control sectarian strife, to cleanse the police and army of ethnic militias, to win the war against Saddamist insurgents and Islamic jihadists and to establish an effective, nationally representative government.

It's a gigantic order, and it may prove impossible. Yet any prospect for success will vanish if Iraqis get the idea that the United States will withdraw its forces from the country before Iraqis can replace them.

The vacuum will be filled by murderous thugs. Civil war certainly will ensue, and the entire Gulf region will be destabilized.

DOJ_NMG_0034400

True, as Democrats devoutly wish, Bush will go down as a failed president. But America also will suffer a catastrophic strategic defeat, probably resulting in domination of the region by a nuclear-armed Iran. It's a future no Democratic presidential prospect should want to inherit.

Yet, Democratic leaders are falling all over themselves to hasten the process. They disagree about whether to set a deadline for withdrawal — and, if so, what the deadline should be — but the overwhelming consensus is for withdrawal, not commitment to victory.

Surely the most irresponsible positions are those taken by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and ex-hawk Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), who want virtually immediate withdrawal, and by Sens. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.), who advocate a full departure by the end of 2006.

If something like this suddenly became U.S. policy, one could expect the Iraqi government to collapse much as the South Vietnamese government did in April 1975, after Congress rejected President Gerald Ford's appeal for emergency funds amid North Vietnam's final offensive.

Next in line are those like Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who told the left-wing "Take Back America" convention this week that "the American people are understandably confused and certainly frustrated" by Bush's pledges to "stay the course" while U.S. military commanders leak word of gradual withdrawal plans.

Reid called for "a plan that provides our troops with an exit strategy from this seemingly endless conflict." Reid's policy, of course, would eliminate any confusion or frustration in the mind of the enemy and offer it a blueprint to plan its counter-strategy.

Reid and other Senators are contemplating an amendment requiring a reduction of U.S. forces to 100,000 from the present 130,000 by the end of this year and full withdrawal by the end of 2007.

To her credit, the party's 2008 frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), withstood boos and hisses from the Take Back lefties by saying it isn't "smart strategy" or "in the best interests of our troops" to set a "date certain."

On the other hand, she said it's also not "smart" for "the president to continue with his open-ended commitment." She did not say what strategy she favors — something a prospective president ought to do.

Democratic leaders certainly are responding to the party's rank and file. In the latest Gallup Poll, 24 percent of Democrats (and 17 percent of the total electorate) favor immediate withdrawal, and 47 percent (and 32 percent of all voters) want all U.S. troops out within 12 months.

In other words, 71 percent of Democrats favor either the Pelosi/Murtha or Kerry/Feingold position. Meanwhile, only 42 percent of all voters, including 64 percent of Republicans and 22 percent of Democrats, support Bush's stance of staying until Iraq is secure.

A minuscule 6 percent of voters support the position of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that the U.S. needs to send more troops.

A compelling case has been made by some hawkish intellectuals, including Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute, that the U.S. should temporarily increase its forces for an offensive to help Iraqis clear and hold Baghdad and nearby insurgent strongholds.

Maliki is launching such an operation, but with only 75,000 mostly Iraqi military and police personnel. Kagan argues for adding 22,000 U.S. troops for the effort, believing that the Iraqis cannot handle it alone. He was one of four outside experts who briefed Bush and his Cabinet at Camp David prior to the president's trip to Baghdad.

It would be wonderful if some Democratic presidential candidate would join McCain in pressing Bush to add troops to ensure a victory in Iraq. Once upon a time, the Democratic Party had genuine hawks, including Presidents Harry Truman, John Kennedy, and Lyndon Johnson and Sens. Paul Douglas (Ill.) and Henry Jackson (Wash.).

Nowadays, the remnants of that wing, such as Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) and Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), are lambasted by colleagues and risk the loss of their seats or committee posts.

Republicans plan to brand Democrats as "the party of cut and run" in the election this fall, but that's not what the party should fear the most. Rather, it's the prospect that the U.S. will be defeated in Iraq and a Democratic president will have to deal with the consequences.

Marine May Call Murtha As Witness (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

A criminal defense attorney for a Marine under investigation in the Haditha killings says he will call a senior Democratic congressman as a trial witness, if his client is charged, to find out who told the lawmaker that U.S. troops are guilty of cold-blooded murder.

DOJ_NMG_0034401

Attorney Neal A. Puckett told The Washington Times that Gen. Michael Hagee, the Marine commandant, briefed Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, on the Nov. 19 killings of 24 Iraqis in the town north of Baghdad. Mr. Murtha later told reporters that the Marines were guilty of killing the civilians in "cold blood." Mr. Murtha said he based his statement on Marine commanders, whom he did not identify.

Mr. Puckett said such public comments from a congressman via senior Marines amount to "unlawful command influence." He said potential Marine jurors could be biased by the knowledge that their commandant, the Corps' top officer, thinks the Haditha Marines are guilty.

"Congressman Murtha will be one of the first witnesses I call to the witness stand," Mr. Puckett said yesterday.

Mr. Puckett represents Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, an eight-year Marine who was a key participant in the Haditha operations that resulted in the 24 civilian deaths.

The attorney said Sgt. Wuterich, 26, the married father of two daughters, led the squad of Kilo Company that mounted the four major combat actions on Nov. 19 that resulted in 23 deaths at a traffic stop and in three houses. The 24th Iraqi was killed while fleeing a home by a rooftop-stationed Marine or Marines, Mr. Puckett said.

The attorney said his client strongly rejects accusations in the press from Haditha residents that Marines lined up some of the civilians and executed them. Mr. Puckett said Sgt. Wuterich maintains that such an incident never occurred, and that Marines followed proper procedures in clearing the three houses.

"What's being reported out there, it seems an awful lot of it is inaccurate," Mr. Puckett said. He said his client, stationed at Camp Pendleton, Calif., has been promoted to platoon leader and is not under confinement.

"How would you feel to be falsely accused of killing innocent people," the attorney said. "He was angered and hurt by it because he doesn't understand how the public could think he and his Marines could do such a thing."

Col. Dave Lapan, a spokesman at Marine Corps headquarters at the Pentagon, said Mr. Murtha was one of eight senior House members and senators briefed by Gen. Hagee in May on the investigation. "I don't know what he told them," Col. Lapan said.

A spokesman for Mr. Murtha did not return a message yesterday seeking comment.

The Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) is expected to finish its probe by August, at which time Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, who commands the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force at Pendleton, will decide whether to bring charges that could include murder.

"If the NCIS has done a good job in this investigation, then Marine commanders will not feel compelled to charge these guys with homicide," Mr. Puckett said.

"But since Congressman Murtha has already judged these guys in public and folks have alleged a Marine Corp cover-up, I'm afraid that the Marine Corps will feel compelled to put these guys on trial to prove the Marine Corps hasn't done anything wrong in terms of a cover-up."

On Nov. 19, Haditha remained one of the most dangerous and rebellious towns in Anbar province, a haven for both Sunni Muslim insurgents loyal to ousted dictator Saddam Hussein and foreign jihadists. The U.S. command in Baghdad had sent Marines on a "persistent presence" mission to pacify the area for Dec. 15 parliamentary elections. Lima Company, an Ohio Reserve unit that Kilo Marines replaced, suffered high fatality rates while patrolling Haditha.

That Saturday, Marine units were under attack at various points in Haditha when an improvised explosive device (IED) took out one of the vehicles in Sgt. Wuterich's patrol. The blast killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, a popular member of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment.

Mr. Puckett gave this version of events based on his discussions with Sgt. Wuterich:

After the blast, the Marines set up a defensive perimeter, and called in a quick-reaction force to find out who had placed and remotely detonated the IED.

A car appeared with five Iraqi men inside. Marines, in Arabic, ordered them to halt. The five exited the car. Rather than heed the orders, the men started to run. Sgt. Wuterich and other Marines opened fire, killing the Iraqis. Marines at the time considered Iraqis running after an attack and disobeying orders as confirmation of hostile intent, Mr. Puckett said. He said that sometime after Jan. 1, commanders no longer permitted such a response.

Next, a shot was fired from a home near the perimeter. Someone in the squad recommended clearing the homes along that block. Sgt. Wuterich agreed and gained permission from a second lieutenant platoon leader, who did not take part in the raids.

The Marines then fired grenades to "prep" the first house and went in. All rooms were empty, except one, from where Marines heard "rustling." A Marine, not Sgt. Wuterich, tossed in a grenade and then opened fire, killing all in the room.

The Marines then entered a second house, encountered Iraqis and killed them.

"They're chasing the insurgents who were shooting at them," Mr. Puckett said.

Hours later, they decided to raid a third house based on suspicious behavior. The first Marine to enter spotted four men inside, one holding an AK-47. The Marine's M-16 jammed. He pulled out a 9mm pistol and killed all four.

Sgt. Wuterich, before counting all the bodies, radioed the battalion command and reported that 12 to 15 Iraqis were killed by Marines after the IED attack. He said there was "collateral damage," military speak for civilian deaths.

"My client did nothing contrary to his training on that day," Mr. Puckett said. "Some [of those killed] were innocent. Others, you will never know whether they were innocent civilians or not."

The next day, the 2nd Marine Division released a statement that 15 Iraqis were killed by an IED and firefight. The statement was inaccurate. An Army general is investigating whether it was part of a broad cover-up.

Combat Stress Takes Toll (USAT)

By Kimberly Johnson, Rick Hampson

USA Today, June 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — As the 1st Marine Division moved across the desert into Iraq on March 19, 2003, each of the 25,000 leathernecks got a letter from their commander.

Although Maj. Gen. James Mattis was known as a tough, blunt warrior — he'd later say at a panel discussion in San Diego that "it's fun to shoot some people" — he told his troops to treat civilian non-combatants with "chivalry and soldierly compassion."

"Engage your brain," he instructed, "before you engage your weapon."

If only it were that easy.

Three years later, the Marines face an allegation that, if proved, would constitute one of the worst scandals in their history: that members of a squad killed as many as two dozen civilians last year in the city of Haditha in retaliation for a roadside bombing that killed one Marine. The military is still investigating the Haditha case and the possibility of a coverup. There are two contrasting, if not contradictory, versions of what happened Nov. 19 in the city on the Euphrates River in rebellious Anbar province.

Iraqi civilians have described a massacre in which a squad of angry Marines — from Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marines — deliberately killed innocent, unarmed civilians, some of them children and some of them elderly.

Lawyers for several Marines under suspicion say the killings were justifiable under rules of engagement that allow Marines to storm buildings apparently occupied by insurgents.

Considering the situation in Iraq — 140,000 U.S. troops engaged for three years in a fight against a relentless, faceless, ruthless guerrilla insurgency — military experts say the question is not whether such a violent encounter between troops and civilians can happen, but when.

"If you have so many people with so much power under so much stress, something's going to happen," says Maj. Peter Kilner, an infantry officer who teaches military ethics at West Point. "You can have a good war, and bad things are still going to happen."

Charles Figley, a Florida State University psychologist who has surveyed Vietnam War veterans about war crimes, says the only thing that surprised him about the Haditha reports was "that anyone was surprised. This is what happens in war."

Particularly when it's fought in what Marine Cpl. Michael Compton, writing by e-mail from Ramadi, calls "the most dangerous place in the world. … The threat is all around you."

As a result, says Mike Harmon, an Army medic who served in Iraq, "There's a lot of little things that are never reported, like civilians getting slapped around, sticking rifles in their faces. Some people get off on that kind of power."

Regardless of the pressures American troops face, President Bush made it clear Wednesday that no quick end to U.S. involvement is likely. "If we stand down too soon, it won't enable us to achieve our objectives," the president said one day after a surprise trip to Iraq. Bush also said that any expectation of "zero violence" in Iraq was unreasonable. "That's not going to happen," he added.

Kilner says that no matter what happened at Haditha, U.S. troops in Iraq are the best trained and most humane ever fielded by a major power.

It's a point of pride among men like 2nd Lt. John Warren, a Marine serving in Ramadi: "My unit has been in what is referred to as 'the worst city in Iraq' for three months. They have been in countless combat engagements and have yet to receive a day off. Even in these conditions, I have yet to see one Marine come close to snapping."

Some observations differ.

"I have seen the best of friends fight, and even draw knives on each other, when you know that they don't really mean it," says Compton, the Marine corporal. "It's just the high stress of being in a place where people are trying to kill you every day."

DOJ_NMG_0034403

Marine Lance Cpl. Mike Young restates the issue: “Do we come close to snapping? In our own little personal life we've built within the confines of our bases, yes. The key is, turn off all of those feelings and hostilities when you gear up and head out the door on patrol.”

Marines are trained to deal with combat stress before they snap and turn on civilians. But Compton says “there really is no way of training for it. This is a fight for your life. Your body will compensate accordingly by making you more alert, edgy, and particularly short-tempered than you have ever been.”

Iraq has been a particularly stressful war for American troops. The insurgents wage a vicious urban guerrilla war with no lines and no rules. A cellphone can be a weapon. A child can be a lookout. Air support is of little or no use. The enemy hides in sacred buildings, uses civilians as shields and occasionally commits suicide to kill Americans.

“The threat is all around you,” Compton says. “It could be one of the hundreds of windows facing your direction. … Every window, every piece of trash, every person that looks at you twice, is a possible threat.”

Even being on base doesn't guarantee safety. In December 2004, a suicide bomber slipped into the mess tent at a U.S. base in Mosul and blew himself up, killing 14 U.S. servicemen and four contractors.

As a result, soldiers are under constant stress — “always on your toes, 24/7,” says Harmon, the medic. “You're eating dinner and there's an RPG (rocket-propelled grenade) overhead. You're sleeping with mortars going off in the background. There's the constant fear you could be next.”

The anxiety is compounded by frustration. “A Marine may go a week or more without ever seeing an actual insurgent,” Warren says. “They may get hit with an IED or shot at by a sniper, but even this does not guarantee them a chance for a face-to-face with their assailant. The insurgents simply refuse to come out to play.”

One result is an odd nostalgia for “conventional war,” even though that included such hells-on-earth as the battle of Okinawa, where in 1945 the United States lost five times as many fighters in 2½ months as it has in Iraq in more than three years.

“In conventional war you have a uniformed enemy, and they fight head on,” Compton says. “There is no question about who to kill and who is innocent. The choice is clear, and the fog of war is not nearly as thick.”

Kilner, the West Point instructor, understands. “It was more comforting when you could say, ‘See that tree line? That's the Germans.' It's the randomness of death in Iraq that's so hard to take.”

The chivalry to which Mattis referred in 2003 requires appreciative or at least cooperative recipients. U.S. troops, however, are increasingly estranged from what they view as an apathetic or hostile Iraqi citizenry.

The enemy could be anyone. The translator could be a spy, the base food vendor could be marking off mortar measurements. “You hear it all the time,” Kilner says. “You don't know who you can trust.”

Insurgent hotbeds — like one near the city of Baqouba that Harmon's unit called “RPG Alley” — are the worst. “The kids were OK, but the adults were two-faced,” Harmon says. “They'd say, ‘We love the U.S.,' and later they'd throw rocks at us.”

He was at a checkpoint when an Iraqi woman got out of a car and pulled a gun from under her clothing. “They put her down,” he says of the Army machine gunners. “After that you think, ‘Anything's possible.' ”

The mistrust is the result of civilian casualties, resentment of outside occupiers, the isolation of U.S. troops on their bases. Above all, it's the result of insurgents trying to drive a wedge between the Iraqis and their would-be liberators. The insurgents dress like, and hide among, civilians. When attacked, the Americans usually err on the side of protecting Americans.

“We engage enemy fire with overwhelming force,” says Geoffrey Millard, a sergeant in the Army National Guard who finished an Iraq tour last year. “If you take fire, the procedure is to use the .50 caliber (machine gun) to lay down suppressive fire in the direction the shots came from. It puts soldiers in an impossible position, because if you don't fire back, you're asking to be fired on again.”

He adds: “There's a dehumanizing factor. The Iraqis are called Hajis (by U.S. forces), as in ‘Don't trust these Hajis.' Usually the F-word precedes it.”

Other factors add to the stress:

·The tours pile up. In Vietnam, most soldiers served only one tour. In Iraq, many already have served two or three. The 3rd Marine battalion, whose men were at Haditha, is on its third tour in as many years (although not all its members are).

“Some of the guys have to go three times, and that gets them down,” says Cpl. Dmitry Barkon, a scout sniper who has served in Iraq twice and is now at the Marine base at Twentynine Palms, Calif.

“People say, ‘We want to go back,' but that kind of service can be psychologically debilitating,” leaving troops more jaded, says Aine Donovan, who taught ethics at the Naval Academy for five years.

If they have killed in combat, Kilner wrote in a research paper last year, soldiers are even more likely to suffer from stress-related symptoms such as violent outbursts, nightmares and alcohol abuse.

DOJ_NMG_0034404

"The bigwigs are stretching these guys," Harmon says. After several tours, some soldiers "get desensitized to other people. You just don't care."

Repeated absences lead to problems at home, he says. "Your mind is not on the mission. That can get you killed."

·A brutal climate. Iraq is hot, dry and dusty enough to make some long for Vietnam.

"I can't say it's worse than Vietnam — I wasn't there," Millard says. "But it has all the negatives of Vietnam, plus some more. If you've never been in a desert sandstorm, you don't know bad weather or bad terrain."

·The allure of drugs. Mike Young, the lance corporal, says he deals with the stress of Iraq by strumming a beat-up guitar, working out at the gym and "smoking a lot of Newports."

Others cope by using drugs, Millard says. Part of the problem is boredom. "In Vietnam, you could at least go to Saigon and have a beer," he says. "In Iraq, the Americans don't leave the base unless they're on a mission."

Millard says some troops use amphetamines to keep alert. "Imagine driving around on patrol for 24 hours in 130-degree heat with no air conditioning."

·A dual mission: soldiers or cops? In a counterinsurgency, soldiers must act as police and warriors. Most Marines are trained as the latter.

Balancing those two roles is stressful.

"The complexity of the battlefield is incredibly difficult," Kilner says. "One part of the patrol will be involved in high-intensity fighting while another part is still handing out soccer balls."

Take a sniper. Soldiers go after him and try to kill him. Police, on the other hand, are most concerned about protecting civilians and will wait out the sniper if that's safest. Kilner says, "The Iraqis now expect us to act more like police."

·The objective seems like a mirage. Once a war's goal seems unclear or unreachable, morale sinks and stress rises.

"What makes being a soldier great is the nobility of it — good fighting evil," Kilner says. "If you lose that, all this sacrifice is for no good reason."

Kilner, who organizes online discussion forums for Army field officers, says he recently got an e-mail from an airborne unit commander who said he feared "some of our soldiers are marking time until that inevitable IED or sniper round finds them."

In Ramadi, Compton feels the Marines are fighting "a largely defensive battle, causing us to react rather than act."

Warren says it's difficult to measure progress in the war without yardsticks like territory seized or enemy soldiers killed.

"Soldiers need to see progress," Kilner says. "They can put up with anything if they can see progress."

In the absence of purpose or progress, according to Florida State's Figley, the unit focuses not on its mission but its own preservation — because "no one cares except my buddies."

When one of those buddies is lost — as happened in Kilo Company — the reaction can be extreme and irrational, he says.

Marine Calls Song About Killings A Joke (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

JACKSONVILLE, N.C., June 14 (AP) — A Marine corporal seen in a video singing about killing members of an Iraqi family says the song was a joke.

"It's a song that I made up and it was nothing more than something supposed to be funny, based off a catchy line of a movie," Cpl. Joshua Belile said in an article published Wednesday in The Daily News of Jacksonville.

In a four-minute video called "Hadji Girl," posted on the Internet, a singer who appears to be a marine tells a cheering audience about gunning down members of an Iraqi woman's family after they confront him with automatic weapons. The title uses a variant spelling of hajji, a Muslim who has made the pilgrimage to Mecca. But American troops often use the term as a pejorative for Iraqis.

Corporal Belile, 23, apologized and said the song was not tied in any way to allegations that marines killed as many as two dozen unarmed civilians in Haditha last year.

A Marine spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, said Tuesday that officers were investigating. He called the song "inappropriate and contrary to the high standards expected of all marines."

Rice: No Guarantees On Iraq, Afghanistan (AP)

By Anne Gearan And Tim Whitmire

AP, June 15, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday that the U.S. military interventions in Iraq and Afghanistan do not assure those countries will become successful democracies. But she said the chance for success is worth the price.

DOJ_NMG_0034405

Speaking to a largely conservative audience of more than 12,000 Southern Baptists, Rice said she knows optimism can hard to sustain in the face of daily sectarian carnage and beheadings in Iraq.

Although the three-year-old war is increasingly unpopular at home and President Bush's public opinion ratings have sunk as a result, there was little sign of flagging support in the huge convention hall where Rice spoke.

She got repeated standing ovations for her call for continued U.S. engagement across the globe.

"We're standing together with people everywhere who desire these fundamental freedoms," especially in Afghanistan and Iraq, Rice said in a speech to the annual Southern Baptist Convention.

In those two countries alone, "We have given more than 55 million people an opportunity to flourish in freedom," Rice said. "Not a guarantee of success, but a chance."

Rice said the image of Bush embracing the new democratically elected Iraqi prime minister on Tuesday in Baghdad was a reminder of why the fight is worthwhile. The Bush administration hopes that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can contain the violence and rally support for his government, and allow the United States to begin withdrawing some forces from Iraq.

An AP-Ipsos poll taken last week, before the killing of al-Qaida leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, showed that more Americans than ever thought the war in Iraq was a mistake. The poll showed 59 percent of adults say the United States made a mistake in going to war, and approval of President Bush's handling of Iraq dipped to 33 percent, a new low.

Just 67 percent of Republicans, 63 percent of conservatives, and 57 percent of white evangelicals believed a stable, democratic government is likely.

Only 68 percent of Republicans, 57 percent of white evangelicals and 51 percent of self-described conservatives — key groups in Bush's base of support — approved of his handling of Iraq.

Rice's speech was partly an attempt to appeal to Bush's political base after a series of disappointments for conservatives, including the administration's handling of the Dubai ports deal earlier this year.

Rice, the daughter and granddaughter of Presbyterian ministers, was introduced by outgoing Southern Baptist Convention President Bobby Welch as "a woman of faith and not ashamed to testify to that."

She referred often to God and prayer, and cast U.S. work overseas, from Iraq to Sudan to the attempts to stem the trafficking of human beings for forced labor or sex, in religious terms.

As she left the podium, delegates in the upper arena began to sing "God Bless America." The whole arena joined in the spontaneous anthem.

Diplomatic Correspondent Anne Gearan reported from Washington.

Rice Urges Respect In Gay Marriage Debate (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday urged respect and sensitivity in the debate over gay marriage, but ducked a question about her own views on the question.

"This is an issue that can be debated and can be discussed in our country with respect for every human being," Rice told a newspaper interviewer.

"When we get into difficult debates about social policy, we get into difficult debates that touch people's lives, the only thing that I ask is that Americans do it with a kind of sensitivity that real individuals and real human beings are involved here."

The Senate rejected a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage by a wide margin last week. It was a defeat for President Bush and other Republicans who hope the issue will rally GOP voters for the November elections. The amendment could be brought up again.

Asked for her opinion of the amendment, Rice told The News & Record of Greensboro, N.C., "This is not my area of expertise or, frankly, my area of concentration at this point."

Rice spoke following an address to the Southern Baptist Convention. The newly chosen president of the nation's largest Protestant denomination opposes gay marriage, as does Bush.

"The union of a man and woman in marriage is the most enduring and important human institution," Bush said before the Senate vote. "Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them. And changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure."

Forty-five of the 50 states have acted to define traditional marriage in ways that would ban same-sex marriage — 19 with state constitutional amendments and 26 with statutes.

The proposed federal amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. After approval by Congress, it would have to be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

U.S. Must Play Role In World, Rice Says (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0034406

By Glenn Kessler
The Washington Post, June 15, 2006
Religious Group Applauds Speech

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, addressing 12,000 evangelicals who represent the core of the Bush administration's political base, yesterday sought to counter the stirrings of isolationism in the nation, declaring that the "United States must remain engaged as a leader in events beyond our borders."

"Here, ladies and gentlemen, is the choice before our country, before us as Americans," Rice told the annual meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention in Greensboro, N.C. "Will we lead in the world or will we withdraw? Will we rise to the challenges of our time or will we shrink from them?"

President Bush first raised concerns about isolationism in his State of the Union address this year. Since then, the outrage over the potential sale of U.S. port operations to a Dubai-based company and the drive to build a wall along the border with Mexico have added to the worries of administration officials. They fear that it could result in demands even from the president's strongest traditional supporters to pull out troops from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The venue for Rice's speech -- a religious group meeting in a huge convention hall -- was unusual for a secretary of state. Generally, on domestic trips, the chief diplomat speaks to foreign policy associations or universities. Rice's speech included highly personal references to her faith and religious upbringing, and the crowd broke into a spontaneous singing of "God Bless America" after she spoke.

Rice, a Presbyterian who said she prays every day, noted that she "was born on a Sunday morning" and that for the first three years of her life her family "literally lived in the back of the church in two little rooms where my father preached" and which her grandfather had founded. Her speech was interrupted repeatedly by applause, including seven standing ovations.

Rice did not specifically refer to "isolationism," but her inference was clear as she tried to link Southern Baptist work overseas "digging wells and building dams and strengthening communities" with the administration's goal of promoting democracy overseas. She said the nation could not ignore tyranny and persecution overseas or else it will come back to haunt Americans.

"These are tragedies, but they are also threats in the making," Rice said. "For in today's world, we have learned that whenever freedom and tolerance are on the march, we are secure. But when those ideals are in retreat, we are vulnerable."

Appealing to the evangelicals, Rice asked rhetorically: "If not for America," would issues such as religious liberty, human trafficking, HIV/AIDS prevention and violence in Sudan even be addressed?

Evangelical groups have played a major role in shaping the administration's agenda in many of these issues, such as promoting the "ABC" approach to AIDS prevention, which stands for "Abstain from sex; Be faithful; as a last resort, use a Condom." The administration has targeted prostitution as a key factor in the trade in human beings, and it has launched a diplomatic effort to resolve the conflict in Sudan in part because of Christians living in the south of that country.

Rice said that Bush has made religious liberty a key factor in whether the United States has good relations with another country. "We're mindful that too many people of faith can only whisper to God in the silent sanctuaries of their conscience," she said, citing China as an example of where "you cannot help but marvel at their faith and courage."

Addressing Iraq, Rice conceded the difficulties the administration has faced in prosecuting the war there, but she said "the goal of democracy in Iraq is worth the cost and worth the sacrifice."

"The mission has been extremely difficult," Rice said. "I know it's been far more difficult than many of us imagined it would be. And I realize how hard it can be to remain hopeful when we hear of death squads and beheadings and sectarian strife."

In an interview with the Greensboro News & Record before her speech, Rice ducked a question about her views on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage -- which Southern Baptists strongly support -- but urged that the debate be respectful.

"When we get into difficult debates about social policy, we get into difficult debates that touch people's lives, the only thing that I ask is that Americans do it with a kind of sensitivity that real individuals and real human beings are involved here," Rice said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Fannie Mae Execs May Face Investigation (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith
USA Today, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034407

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., said Wednesday that he has asked the Justice Department to investigate his allegations that two former Fannie Mae executives lied to Congress in October 2004 when they denied manipulating the mortgage-finance giant's income statement to achieve management pay bonuses.

In a letter to the U.S. Attorney's office in Washington, Baker accused former Fannie Mae CEO Franklin Raines and former chief financial officer Tim Howard of misleading a House subcommittee he chairs in testimony that denied any link between the bonuses and a decision to defer about $200 million in non-cash accounting expenses from late 1998 until the next year.

Separate investigations by federal regulators and the company's board of directors since concluded that management did manipulate 1998 earnings to trigger bonuses. Raines and Howard resigned under pressure in late 2004.

Fannie Mae is a government-sponsored enterprise that borrows money from private investors to buy mortgages originated by private banks and brokers, to keep capital flowing in the housing market.

Baker provided the U.S. Attorney's office with an official transcript of his October 2004 hearing at which Raines denied that the company improperly had delayed recording expenses — "There was no decision made to defer any expense from 1998 to 1999," Raines said — and rejected the possibility that he or Howard manipulated that year's earnings to achieve incentive payouts. "We both deny that," Raines said.

Attorneys for Raines and Howard had no comment. A conviction of perjury before Congress, though rare, could lead to prison terms of up to five years.

Federal authorities have taken no action against any former member of Fannie Mae management. But the company has said the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department are investigating.

In February, a law firm representing Fannie Mae's board of directors released the results of its investigation, chaired by former Sen. Warren Rudman. According to that report, "the evidence strongly suggests that management's decision" to record only $240 million of a calculated $439 million in non-cash accounting expenses in 1998 "was motivated by the desire to meet … internal bonus targets."

Last month, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight concluded its own multiyear investigation. OFHEO alleged that Fannie Mae, under Raines and Howard, had manipulated one measure of its profitability, known as earnings per share, to the hundredth of a penny to qualify for the annual bonus payments.

OFHEO said Howard was warned by company auditors in August 1998, only months before failing to properly record that year's expenses, that the SEC was growing suspicious of earnings-management abuses by industry. Last month, OFHEO and the SEC fined the company $400 million in related civil fraud actions.

The SEC said, "Without these improper accounting adjustments, Fannie Mae's management could have received substantially smaller bonuses … or no bonuses at all."

Perjury Probe Sought For Ex-Fannie Officials (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

A key House member has asked federal prosecutors to investigate whether former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines and former chief financial officer J. Timothy Howard lied to Congress two years ago about the company's accounting practices.

The allegations by Rep. Richard H. Baker (R-La.) center on statements made by Raines and Howard at an Oct. 6, 2004, appearance before the House Financial Services subcommittee on capital markets, which Baker oversees. Baker said those statements have been contradicted since then by the company's chief regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which last month issued the findings of its nearly three-year investigation into the company's $10.6 billion accounting scandal.

In a Tuesday letter to U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Kenneth Wainstein, Baker cited testimony in which Raines and Howard deny that they were involved in accounting decisions that investigators later concluded were calculated to maximize executive bonus pay.

"[T]hese men . . . had an opportunity to come clean, swearing under oath to tell the truth, which I believe the evidence shows they clearly and arrogantly flouted," Baker said yesterday in a statement.

Howard's attorney, Steven Salky, said that his client "testified truthfully." He added, "We reject any assertion to the contrary."

Raines's attorney, Kevin M. Downey, did not return messages left at his office.

Justice Department officials confirmed receiving Baker's letter but said they could not comment on whether they intend to follow up. The department is already investigating the extent of the two executives' roles in the company's accounting scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0034408

Separately, Fannie board member Anne Korologos will leave the company July 31, Fannie is expected to announce today at a hearing before the Senate Banking Committee. The company also is expected to say said it will complete by the end of the year its financial restatements for 2001 to 2004.

Perjury in general is difficult to prove, legal experts said.

"Perjury is not about inconsistencies. It has to be a knowing and purposeful misrepresentation," said Adam Hoffinger, a former New York prosecutor.

In cases of congressional testimony, it can depend on how questions are posed and whether they are susceptible to misinterpretation.

"Generally speaking, congressional questioning is inartful and does not provide a proper setting for a perjury prosecution," said Joseph DiGenova, a former U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia and independent counsel. "The truth is the members [of Congress] are generally looking for a forum to make a point, not to make a case."

There have been some notable perjury prosecutions, particularly that of former national security adviser John M. Poindexter after the Iran-contra hearings in the 1980s. His initial conviction was overturned on appeal. Former EPA Superfund director Rita Lavelle served nearly five months in prison after being convicted of lying to Congress about a conflict of interest.

Regardless of the outcome of his referral, Baker said he felt "a strong obligation to make sure witnesses do not mislead Congress and think they can get away with it."

Raines, a former Clinton administration budget director, and Howard were ousted in December 2004, after the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered Fannie Mae to restate its earnings. In addition to the Justice Department probe, both men face shareholder lawsuits and an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The company settled with the SEC and with OFHEO last month, agreeing to pay $400 million in fines. Company officials have said they expect to spend a total of more than $1 billion to update accounting systems and financial results.

In his letter to Wainstein, Baker attached excerpts from the Oct. 6, 2004, hearing. In one exchange, he questioned Raines about a company decision to defer $200 million in expenses from 1998 to 1999.

Raines told Baker: "There was no decision made to defer any expense from 1998 to 1999. . . . We did not make any deferral."

OFHEO found the company did defer the $200 million.

In a separate line of questioning, Baker asked Raines, "Were there any discussions related to the consequences" of deferring the $200 million, which allowed Fannie Mae to hit its 1998 earnings per share target of $3.23 and ensure executives would receive the maximum bonus payments possible? Raines received a bonus of $1.1 million, and Howard received a bonus of $493,750 for the year.

"No," Raines replied.

Baker later asked Raines, "Was there any discussion in which you participated relative to the determination" of the size of the expenses to be deferred, which Fannie Mae employees referred to as "the catch-up" amount?

"No, I did not participate in determining the amount of the catch-up," Raines replied.

According to the OFHEO report, Raines chaired an "earnings alternative meeting" at which the catch-up was discussed.

In another exchange Baker cited, Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) asked Raines and Howard, "You both deny that trying to hit a certain amount so you could get your bonuses was a factor to any extent in your decisions?"

"We both deny that," Raines replied.

"Yes," Howard said.

OFHEO cited an August 10, 1998, memo in which then-executive vice president Larry Small warned Raines, who was just taking office as chief executive, that there wasn't enough money in a certain "piggy bank" for the company to achieve its earnings targets and to trigger larger bonus payments. Such an outcome, Small argued, would hurt the morale of senior executives.

Lawmaker Asks DOJ To Probe Fannie Execs (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON --A senior House lawmaker has asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Fannie Mae's then-chief executive and finance chief lied to Congress in sworn testimony in 2004.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., chairman of the House panel that oversees the government-sponsored mortgage finance company, disclosed Wednesday that he had made a perjury referral regarding former Fannie Mae chief executive Franklin Raines and former chief financial officer Timothy Howard.

The department has been conducting a criminal investigation of Washington-based Fannie Mae, the largest financer and guarantor of home mortgages in the country.

The company's $11 billion accounting scandal came to light in September 2004. Federal regulators found serious accounting problems and alleged that there was a pervasive pattern of earnings manipulation and lax internal controls. The next month, Raines and Howard testified at a hearing before Baker's panel, the House Financial Services subcommittee on capital markets.

They were asked about an episode in 1998 in which Fannie Mae was said to have improperly put off accounting for $200 million in expenses to future periods so that executives could collect $27 million in bonuses.

Raines testified that "there was no decision made" to defer the accounting for expenses. Howard and Raines both denied that they made accounting decisions with the aim of hitting earnings targets to ensure they received full bonuses.

"It is my belief that Mr. Franklin Raines and Mr. Timothy Howard, while testifying under oath ... on Oct. 6, 2004, failed to testify truthfully, in violation of applicable law," Baker said in a letter dated Tuesday to Kenneth Wainstein, the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

"I request that the Department of Justice conduct an investigation and bring any appropriate prosecution," Baker wrote.

Attorneys representing Raines and Howard did not immediately return telephone calls Wednesday.

The two executives were swept from office by Fannie Mae's board in December 2004.

Baker first raised accusations of lying by Raines at a hearing last week. The lawmakers said that in light of information in a new report by the regulators, "there seems to be clear evidence to my mind that Mr. Raines perjured himself."

Also at that hearing, the regulator who oversees Fannie Mae blamed Raines and other senior company officials for accounting failures and alleged manipulations designed to enrich executives.

As a huge housing finance company chartered by Congress, "Fannie Mae has a special mandate and position of public trust. The previous management team, led by chairman and chief executive officer Franklin Raines, violated that trust," said James B. Lockhart, acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight.

Raines, who was a White House budget director in the Clinton administration, earned $90.1 million from 1998 to 2003, according to the regulators. That total included $52 million in bonuses tied to the company hitting earnings targets. Howard made $30.1 million during the same period, including $16 million in bonuses linked to quarterly earnings targets.

They are among 30 current and former Fannie Mae executives and employees who are being reviewed for possible disciplinary action, termination or forfeiture of their bonuses. The current president and chief executive, Daniel Mudd, also is under review.

Raines' lawyer, Robert Barnett, said last month that "Mr. Raines has repeatedly stated that he never authorized, encouraged or was aware of violations of generally accepted accounting principles at Fannie Mae for the purpose of smoothing earnings, reaching bonus targets or for any other improper reason. The facts on the record and conclusions from previous reports support this statement."

Channing Phillips, spokesman for the U.S. attorney, said the office was reviewing Baker's request.

Fannie Mae was fined $400 million, one of the largest civil penalties ever in an accounting fraud case, in a settlement last month with its regulators and the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company also agreed to temporarily cap its mortgage holdings at $727 billion.

On the Net:

Fannie Mae: http://www.fanniemae.com

Rep. Richard Baker: http://www.baker.house.gov

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight: http://www.ofheo.gov

Securities and Exchange Commission: http://www.sec.gov

At Fannie, Year End Likely Target For Restatement; Director To Quit (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Fannie Mae is expected to pledge today to complete a massive restatement of its earnings by year end.

The giant provider of funding for home mortgages previously said only that the restatement wouldn't be ready before the second half, leaving open the possibility that it could slip beyond this year.

The company also is expected to announce that one of its veteran outside directors, Ann Korologos, will step down from the board July 31.

The disclosures appear in testimony that Fannie Mae's chief executive, Daniel Mudd, and Chairman Stephen Ashley are due to deliver today to the Senate Banking Committee. That testimony was made available by congressional aides.

Fannie, which last month agreed to pay a $400 million fine as part of a settlement of accounting-fraud charges, is preparing to restate its earnings for the past several years. The restatement is expected to require the company to recognize about $11 billion of losses on derivatives that had been deferred. The derivatives are financial contracts used to hedge interest-rate risks.

Fannie's regulators have accused the company of manipulating earnings to hit earnings targets that would maximize bonuses for executives. In the prepared testimony, Mr. Mudd argues that Fannie has made considerable progress in improving its internal controls and corporate culture. "We are paying people to do the job -- not hit targets," he says.

The departure of Ms. Korologos, who joined the board in 1994 and took charge of negotiations with regulators in 2004 when the company's accounting scandal erupted, is part of a broader overhaul of the board, which regulators say failed to ask enough tough questions about the company's accounting and controls. In his prepared testimony, Mr. Ashley said she had remained on the board until now because "she felt it was her duty ... to see us through the investigative phase, which is now complete."

Michaels Understated Expenses Due To Past Options Backdating (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Crafts retailer Michaels Stores Inc. said it understated compensation expenses by as much as $60 million between 1990 and 2001 because of stock options it awarded with effective dates that were earlier than the date on which they were approved.

The Irving, Texas, company, which previously delayed reporting financial results for its first quarter ended April 29, said the discovery, which emerged from an internal options investigation, will require reclassification of certain financial results but it doesn't expect to make any restatements. Michaels said it changed its practices in 2001 to give options awards on set dates, and its investigation didn't uncover any anomalies since then.

Stock options give an executive the opportunity to profit if the company's share price advances. Typically, an option is supposed to be granted with a "strike," or exercise, price set at the market value of the stock on the date the company's board approves it. Choosing a different date for the exercise price could potentially violate federal securities laws.

Michaels didn't specify which options were involved or which executives got them. It said that its practice had been to account for "certain nonroutine grants" as if they were awarded on the date a board committee voted for them. However, the strike price of the options was based on an earlier "effective date" of the options. A Michaels spokesman declined to say when or how that effective date was chosen.

Michaels said it is continuing its investigation.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and federal legislators have both said they are interested in writing regulations that prevent backdating of options from the time they are awarded to pick a low point in the stock price to lock in gains.

In other developments, Monster Worldwide Inc., which owns job-search site Monster.com, said the SEC has asked it to "preserve all relevant information" about timing of stock-options grants. Monster was the subject of an article in The Wall Street Journal on Monday on the timing of its options, with strike prices often set at lows for a quarter or year. The New York company previously said that it was conducting an internal investigation and that it had received a subpoena on its options from the U.S. attorney in Manhattan.

Write to William M. Bulkeley at bill.bulkeley@wsj.com4

Tech CEOs' Pay Falls As Firms Cut Out Options (WSJ)

By Pui-wing Tam

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Not everything in Silicon Valley is recovering. Just look at Rick Belluzzo's pay package.

Mr. Belluzzo is chief executive of Quantum Corp., a storage-technology company in San Jose, Calif. While Quantum's stock rose last year, Mr. Belluzzo's pay didn't. In fiscal 2005, his compensation totaled $935,919, down 86% from $6.6 million a year earlier, according to company filings and an analysis of the value of CEO stock options prepared for The Wall Street Journal by compensation-research firm Equilar Inc.

The plunge was driven by a shift in equity compensation. In fiscal 2004, Mr. Belluzzo was awarded stock options valued at $5.9 million. Last year, however, Quantum gave no stock options to the CEO and dished out restricted stock valued at $82,250 instead -- not enough to make up for the move away from stock options. A Quantum spokesman says the stock options the CEO received in 2004 were intended to cover him through fiscal 2007. The spokesman adds that Mr. Belluzzo wasn't available to comment on matters relating to this article.

Mr. Belluzzo has plenty of high-power company to commiserate with in and around San Jose. According to a study by Equilar being released today, CEO pay at Silicon Valley's 150 biggest companies is headed south. In fiscal 2005, the median total compensation of Silicon Valley CEOs dropped to $2.6 million, down 13% from a year ago. Their pay packages are getting hit even as CEO compensation elsewhere rises. Indeed, median total pay for CEOs of companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index increased 2.2% to $8.4 million in 2005, Equilar says.

DOJ_NMG_0034411

The slide in Silicon Valley CEO compensation is largely a result of the shrinking value of stock-option grants. While the average number of options awarded to tech CEOs has stayed at around 150,000 for the past two years, the value of the grants fell 34.9% in 2005 to $1.3 million, Equilar says.

Corporate boards have moved to make up for this falloff by handing out more restricted stock -- the median value of restricted stock awarded to Silicon Valley CEOs rose 33.5% last year to $1.1 million. Cash compensation for Silicon Valley CEOs is also going up. Last year the median salary for tech CEOs rose 5.6% to $465,876 and cash bonuses rose 8.7% to $295,875, Equilar says.

But those moves haven't been enough to compensate for the declining value of stock options. "We're at the front end of a major shift away from stock options to more balanced pay packages of restricted stock and cash bonuses in Silicon Valley," says Steve Fackler, a compensation and benefits attorney at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP in Palo Alto, Calif.

Stock options gain value when a company's share price rises above the "strike" or "exercise" price at which the holder has the option to buy the shares (and then, ostensibly, sell them for a profit). Meanwhile, restricted stock retains value even when a stock falls below a certain price.

The falling pay of Silicon Valley CEOs comes as the high-tech region overall is reviving. Following the dot-com bust earlier this decade, Silicon Valley companies laid off thousands of workers, shifted some jobs overseas and grappled with lackluster stock prices and customer demand. Only last year did the area record a net new increase in jobs for the first time in several years, as the stock prices of many tech companies improved.

That Silicon Valley CEO pay is down amid this revitalization is a sign of how the tech industry is maturing, says Equilar CEO David Chun. Many industries -- driven by new accounting rules that count stock options as an expense -- switched over to restricted stock from stock options over the past few years, Mr. Chun says, and the tech industry was a relative laggard until recently. "Though tech companies are still high-growth, they're starting to act more like companies in Middle America," Mr. Chun says.

Last year 37 of Silicon Valley's 150 biggest companies awarded restricted stock to their employees, up from 23 in 2004. Equilar found that the average number of stock options granted to each rank-and-file tech employee totaled just 1,957 in 2005, down 32.1% from 2,881 options in 2003.

The changes notwithstanding, not all Silicon Valley CEOs are making less. Big-name CEOs such as Yahoo Inc.'s Terry Semel, Cisco Systems Inc.'s John Chambers and Symantec Corp.'s John Thompson continue to reap tens of millions of dollars a year. Even some CEOs who got only restricted stock last year and got no stock options are making out better than before. Bob Swanson, CEO of chip maker Linear Technology Corp., Milpitas, Calif., says the company issued restricted stock last year to employees whose stock options were under water because of the tech bust. "We looked at all kinds of compensation to make up for the underwater options," he says. "Restricted stock has been a big help: There's been very little attrition since." Mr. Swanson himself benefited from this change: He got a restricted stock grant of $10.2 million in fiscal 2005, compared with the stock-option grant of $6 million in fiscal 2004, according to Equilar.

Thian Hoo Tan, CEO of storage-technology company Komag Inc., is another exception. Mr. Tan got no stock options and just a small restricted-stock award of $90,000 in fiscal 2005, far less than the stock-option grant of $541,140 that he received a year earlier, according to company filings and Equilar. But the San Jose company's board also awarded Mr. Tan a bigger cash bonus of $1.2 million last year, more than three times as much as the cash bonus he received in 2004.

The result: Mr. Tan's compensation last year totaled $1.8 million, up from $1.4 million in 2004. Kathy Bayless, Komag's chief financial officer, says the company began switching to restricted stock from stock options in 2005. She declined to comment on Mr. Tan's pay.

Mr. Tan didn't respond to a request for comment. Earlier this year, he announced he would retire from Komag by late 2006.

Overall, while the shrinkage of CEO pay packages prevails in Silicon Valley, it is hard to argue that the affected CEOs are paid badly. A case in point is Peter Van Camp, CEO of Equinix Inc., a company that operates data centers. In fiscal 2004, Mr. Van Camp was awarded $3.85 million in stock options, according to Equilar.

Last year the Foster City, Calif., company stopped giving out stock options to its executive team, switching to restricted stock. Mr. Van Camp got a restricted-stock grant last year valued at $2.9 million, far less than the value of the stock options he got a year earlier.

Write to Pui-Wing Tam at pui-wing.tam@wsj.com1

Grasso Invoked Fifth Amendment In Deposition (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Ian Mcdonald In New York And Kara Scannell In Washington

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Former NYSE Chief Refused To Answer About 150 Queries In SEC Probe of AIG Shares

Dick Grasso, the former head of the New York Stock Exchange, invoked his Fifth Amendment right to not answer questions more than 150 times in a deposition last year looking into potentially improper trading on the exchange.

In that deposition, which took place in June 2005, Securities and Exchange Commission investigators asked specifically whether Mr. Grasso tried to influence an NYSE "specialist" firm -- Spear Leeds & Kellogg Specialists LLC -- to help increase the share price of American International Group Inc., the New York insurer. Specialist firms have responsibility for maintaining orderly trading in specific shares.

At issue is whether Mr. Grasso and former AIG head Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg pressured specialists in recent years to prop up AIG's share price -- particularly in 2001, when AIG was trying to complete a $23 billion purchase of a rival insurer. A falling AIG share price would have made the deal more costly for AIG.

More broadly, the SEC asked questions about how Mr. Grasso policed specialist firms at a time when they were committing widespread infractions, according to later settlements between some of those firms and federal regulators.

Mr. Grasso's decision to invoke his Fifth Amendment protection may reflect a conservative legal strategy, which would have been unsurprising given the string of high-profile white-collar crime cases at that time, such as Martha Stewart, in which defendants' words were used against them. A transcript of the deposition was released yesterday after newspapers, including The Wall Street Journal, requested the document under New York state freedom-of-information law. A second transcript, related to a separate New York state inquiry into Mr. Grasso's pay package, was also released.

It isn't known whether SEC officials were investigating Mr. Grasso specifically, or whether their questioning of him was part of a wider probe of NYSE trading practices. It also isn't known whether or not the investigations are continuing.

A spokesman for Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Spear Leeds' parent company, declined to comment. A spokesman for Mr. Greenberg's legal team said he was reviewing Mr. Grasso's deposition and had no immediate comment on it, but pointed out that during his long term as chief of AIG, Mr. Greenberg was a loud critic of the specialist system and had called for better support of AIG shares. Mr. Greenberg left AIG in 2005. A spokesman for AIG declined to comment. Lawyers for Mr. Grasso said he responded to questions in the SEC interview in the later deposition, conducted by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office. Although the SEC deposition took place last year, questions about NYSE trading practices are back in the headlines. This week, a trial against two former specialists accused of harming investors is about to get under way in New York. In addition, cases involving similar claims against other former specialists are due to come to trial later this year. The claims center on allegations that specialist firms would sometimes not act in the best interest of their clients, but instead execute trades in a way that would increase the firms' own bottom lines.

According to the transcript of the SEC deposition, one question posed to Mr. Grasso by regulators: "Did you use your position as Spear's regulator to influence Spear to manipulate AIG stock price?" In a statement yesterday, Mr. Grasso's lawyer called that question "a ridiculous charge" and added that former Big Board directors had "confirmed Dick Grasso's commitment to regulation."

Mr. Grasso was more outspoken in the second deposition, which took place in April. Mr. Grasso is the subject of a civil lawsuit brought by Mr. Spitzer, who contends Mr. Grasso was overpaid as head of what was then a not-for-profit, member-owned exchange. Mr. Grasso disputes the charge. The case could go to trial later this year or in 2007.

Mr. Grasso told officials in the meeting with Mr. Spitzer's attorneys that at times Mr. Greenberg was "cosmically unhappy" with the way the Big Board handled AIG stock. When that happened, Mr. Grasso said he would walk to the trading floor and discuss the matter with the specialists who oversaw AIG shares -- an unusual step to take for the head of the exchange.

However, Mr. Grasso said he didn't suggest that Spear Leeds traders should buy up AIG shares to please Mr. Greenberg. He pointed out that Spear Leeds at one time held about 200,000 shares of AIG stock in an account outside of its obligations as a specialist firm, and considered increasing that stake to 500,000 shares "as a sign of their faith in AIG." NYSE rules allow specialists to maintain such accounts.

Mr. Grasso also said he didn't hear about widespread trading infractions among specialists until about December 2002, when he said he was informed by the head of his regulatory unit.

The SEC and U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of New York opened an investigation in mid-2004 into whether Mr. Greenberg tried to manipulate shares of AIG to save money on his company's pending acquisition of insurer American General Corp. in August 2001. It isn't known whether those investigations continue. Representatives from the U.S. Attorney couldn't be reached. An SEC spokesman declined to comment.

As reported, Mr. Greenberg called Mr. Grasso's office then to ask him to help shore up the stock's sinking price, people familiar with the case said then. Under terms of the $23 billion acquisition of Houston's American General, AIG would have had to pay more in stock -- possibly much more -- if AIG's share price fell below a certain level in a period shortly before the deal was finalized.

But Mr. Greenberg's complaints about how the Big Board handled trading in AIG shares started well before the American General deal came along, according to Mr. Grasso. The NYSE listed AIG shares in 1984, Mr. Grasso said in his April deposition with Mr. Spitzer's office, adding: "I think he was happy for about six months. So somewhere in 1985 he started complaining."

S.E.C. Asked Grasso If He Buoyed Stock (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Richard A. Grasso, the former chief executive of the New York Stock Exchange, faced questions from federal regulators about whether he prodded traders to support the American International Group's share price while he was head of the exchange and its regulatory unit, government documents released yesterday disclosed.

During Mr. Grasso's deposition, given before the Securities and Exchange Commission in June 2005, he repeatedly invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, in spite of warnings from S.E.C. lawyers that doing so could be used against him in a civil case.

The deposition was part of an investigation by the S.E.C. into the oversight of exchange specialists, who the S.E.C. charged cheated their customers by trading ahead of customer orders. It was released yesterday by Justice Charles E. Ramos of New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan, after he denied Mr. Grasso's motion to keep the file sealed. The motion was part of a lawsuit by the New York State attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, against Mr. Grasso over his $190 million compensation package at the Big Board.

Mr. Grasso's lawyer, Gerson Zweifach, declined to comment yesterday.

S.E.C. lawyers asked Mr. Grasso in the 2005 deposition whether he had tried to placate powerful executives like Maurice R. Greenberg, the chairman and chief executive of A.I.G., by encouraging the A.I.G. specialists — those assigned to manage floor trading in the stock — and their superiors to prop up the price of the stock, going as far as to set up a $17 million fund to buy shares.

While he invoked the Fifth Amendment in front of S.E.C. lawyers in 2005 in response to various questions, in 2006 he answered many of the same questions in a deposition related to Mr. Spitzer's lawsuit. In the deposition, he said he did not encourage the traders to prop up A.I.G. shares.

Mr. Spitzer is expected to make the case that it was important for Mr. Grasso to appease Mr. Greenberg because he was a member of the compensation committee at the exchange from 1996 until 2002. In 2001, Mr. Grasso received $25.6 million in salary, bonus and deferred compensation.

Mr. Spitzer's suit contends that Mr. Grasso's compensation was "unreasonable," a violation of New York's not-for-profit law. The suit also contends that Mr. Grasso's regulatory authority created a conflict of interest because he oversaw regulation of many of the companies whose chief executives approved his pay.

In the 2005 deposition, S.E.C. lawyers questioned Mr. Grasso about whether he put pressure on specialists at Spear, Leeds & Kellogg, a specialist unit of Goldman Sachs, to support A.I.G.'s stock; encouraged and backed Spear's decision to set up a $17 million fund to support the stock; and whether he knew that Mr. Greenberg wanted to maintain a certain price for the stock when A.I.G. announced it would buy AmGen in 2001.

Lawyers also inquired whether Mr. Grasso yelled at the specialists, threatened to take the stock away from them and arranged meetings with top executives at Spear, Leeds to discuss its performance. Mr. Grasso invoked the Fifth Amendment in response.

Specialists are responsible for creating orderly markets, buying when investors are selling and selling when most are buying. They are prohibited from manipulating a share price — for example, buying at higher prices than are displayed.

A lawyer in Mr. Spitzer's office, Avi Schick, said, "What this transcript demonstrates is that Grasso was unable to defend to the S.E.C. his failure to protect investors and regulate traders."

Representatives of Goldman Sachs and Mr. Greenberg declined to comment.

While Mr. Grasso declined to answer questions regarding his relationship with Mr. Greenberg before S.E.C. lawyers, he was more forthcoming in his recent deposition on his pay.

Stating that he had overseen the listing of A.I.G. in 1984, Mr. Grasso said the complaints from Mr. Greenberg started soon thereafter.

"Somewhere after 1985 he started complaining," Mr. Grasso said, according to the deposition. "There were instances when he was unhappy, there were instances when he was extremely unhappy and there were instances when he was cosmically unhappy. And in the last case, I would probably get up and go to the floor."

DOJ_NMG_0034414

During these visits, according to the deposition, Mr. Grasso would relay word of Mr. Greenberg's unhappiness to Spear traders, but he said he did not encourage them to buy the stock to placate Mr. Greenberg.

Mr. Grasso also said he was aware that Spear maintained a separate investment account, distinct from its main specialist portfolio, that S.E.C. lawyers contended was set up to support A.I.G.'s stock and to appease Mr. Greenberg.

Mr. Grasso said that in 2006, to his knowledge, the account held 200,000 A.I.G. shares and that from time to time, Spear traders discussed increasing that to address Mr. Greenberg's concerns.

Asked whether such separate accounts were normal at the exchange, Mr. Grasso said he was "not aware of any."

"There was a period of time when Mr. Greenberg was so patently unhappy that there was some dialogue that the specialists might increase their position in the investment account from 200,000 shares to 500,000 shares," Mr. Grasso said in the deposition. He added that no such increase was made, and that the number of shares was too small to influence the value of so large a company as A.I.G.

Mr. Grasso said that "it might be a nice gesture of faith that you go from 200,000 to 500,000 but don't think that is going to cure his overall belief that the system is not big enough for certain market-cap-sized companies."

Specialists at the exchange, and the oversight of them, have been under scrutiny for years. In 2004, the S.E.C. brought enforcement actions against seven specialist firms. They paid more than $243 million without admitting wrongdoing. In April 2005, federal prosecutors obtained indictments of 15 specialists on charges of illegally trading ahead of customer accounts and of getting between trades, a practice called interpositioning. Last month, two specialists admitted charges of securities fraud, and await sentencing. This week, two former specialists are scheduled to start trials in New York.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Reaffirms His Confidence In Rove (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Critics Say Aide's Role In Leak Calls For Accountability

President Bush yesterday reaffirmed his trust in White House strategist Karl Rove, and GOP allies said the longtime presidential adviser has no reason to apologize for his role in the disclosure of a CIA officer's identity three years ago.

"Along with others in the White House, I took a sigh of relief" when the news broke this week that Rove would not be charged in the CIA leak investigation, Bush told reporters in a Rose Garden news conference. "I trust Karl Rove." A senior White House official said Bush and his staff are eager to "put this behind us" as quickly as possible.

But while Rove appears out of legal jeopardy, partisans are already pressing a question that is likely to hound him and Bush for some time: Should Rove be held to account outside the legal system for his part in unmasking CIA officer Valerie Plame and initially telling the nation he was not involved?

The three-year investigation of the Plame leak did not result in criminal charges against Rove, but it did raise questions about his early denials. In 2003, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said he consulted Rove and was assured that the senior aide played no role in the leaking of Plame's name to the media. The White House left the clear impression that Rove knew nothing of the leak and certainly did not participate in it.

The subsequent federal investigation determined that Rove talked with at least two reporters about Plame before her identity was disclosed by columnist Robert D. Novak in July 2003, and that he relayed word of those conversations to other White House officials.

Republicans close to Rove argued yesterday that, technically speaking, the aide never lied about his role and that, if anything, he is owed an apology by the media and some Democrats. Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie, echoing an argument Rove has made privately to others, said Rove only discussed Plame briefly when questioned by reporters, never mentioned her name specifically and never intended to blow her cover.

"It is now clear he did not leak anybody's name and did not lie about any action," said Gillespie, a close Rove ally.

Democrats dismissed that defense.

"He leaked the name of an intelligence operative at a time of war," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean responded in an interview. "I don't know another president who would not fire someone like this."

Dean said Rove has survived only because Bush suffers from an "incredible blind spot for personal loyalty."

Joseph C. Wilson IV, the former ambassador whose criticism of Bush's use of prewar intelligence set in motion the White House campaign that eventually led to the unmasking of his wife, Plame, said Rove owes them and others an apology -- at the very least.

DOJ_NMG_0034415

"There is contemporaneous evidence that Mr. Rove was the source of compromising Valerie's identity" to two reporters -- Novak and Time's Matthew Cooper, Wilson said. "Is that the conduct one should expect from a senior government servant?"

Wilson and Plame are considering a civil suit against Rove.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said it would be inappropriate to discuss the role of specific officials or whether any apologies are necessary until Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's investigation is concluded.

"Why does not everybody wait to see what the facts are?" Snow said. At his news conference, Bush, too, said it would be wrong to comment on an ongoing case, despite his statements about it moments earlier and aboard Air Force One on Tuesday. As long as Bush sticks to this position, Democrats are likely to keep raising the issue.

Republicans close to the White House said Bush will not push Rove to apologize at any point and is confident the issue will soon fade from the public debate. For many Bush critics, that position contrasts with the ethical standards the president set as a candidate for president and in the earliest days of the leak probe.

In October 2000, Bush told supporters: "In my administration we will not ask only what is legal but what is right, not what the lawyers allow but what the public deserves." Snow would not comment on whether Rove's role in the leak case met this standard.

After news of the leak case broke, Bush said he would "fire anyone" who leaked the name of a covert CIA operative.

But in July 2005, the president set a high threshold for dismissal to cover only those aides who "committed a crime." The timing and threshold change had the potential to benefit Rove. By then, it was clear Rove was involved in the disclosure of Plame's identity even if his actions did not break the law.

Rove yesterday referred questions to Mark Corallo, his spokesman for the leak case. Corallo said he could not comment because of the pending trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of lying to investigators in the leak probe. But Rove's view of the leak controversy was made clear by Gillespie and others who are close to the White House deputy chief of staff.

"He did nothing wrong, he was not involved, he did everything right and owes nobody any apology," said a source close to Rove, who would discuss the topic only if his name was not used. The source said Rove was technically correct when he told CNN in 2004 that "I didn't know her name. I didn't leak her name."

Gillespie said that there was nothing misleading about McClellan's comments in 2003, when the spokesman denied any role for Rove, because it was commonly known the issue was whether the aide leaked the name of a covert CIA agent. But a transcript of McClellan's comments suggests differently.

McClellan was asked if Rove "told any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA?" Rove, he said, "assured me" he was not involved in the leak of such information.

It is true there is no known evidence that Rove leaked Plame's name per se; in one instance, he referred to Plame simply as Wilson's wife. But he confirmed her CIA role to two reporters, according to court filings in the Libby case.

"He did not have a role in leaking anything. In this town, leaking is a proactive action: Someone gets on the phone and calls reporters for a purpose," said the source close to Rove.

Bush Says Clearing Of Rove Was A Relief (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — President Bush said on Wednesday that he "took a sigh of relief" when federal prosecutors decided this week not to indict Karl Rove, his top strategist, in the C.I.A. leak case.

But Mr. Bush, speaking with reporters in the Rose Garden, still faced tough questions about the investigation. One journalist asked if the president believed that Mr. Rove owed any apologies for providing "misleading" statements about his role in the case. Another asked, "Do you have any work to do to rebuild credibility that might have been lost?"

Mr. Bush voiced full support for Mr. Rove, but otherwise declined to go into the details of the investigation, saying, "There's an ongoing trial; it's a serious business."

Certainly the decision by the lead prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, not to indict Mr. Rove is a major break for the administration, cutting off an avenue of investigation that had come close to the Oval Office. But questions remain about how straightforward Mr. Rove, a deputy chief of staff, was about his own role in administration efforts to rebut a war critic — even with his own White House colleagues.

And there is still a trial looming for Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., who is accused of lying to federal investigators who were trying to find out whether the White House intentionally disclosed the name of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson, in an effort to undermine a war critic, her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV.

DOJ_NMG_0034416

In a New York Times Op-Ed article in 2003, Mr. Wilson reported that during a fact-finding mission for the C.I.A. he could not verify claims that Iraq had tried to buy uranium in Africa, a major administration claim in justifying the invasion of Iraq.

White House allies have rallied to Mr. Libby's side, setting up a defense fund to help defray his legal costs. The list of advisers to the group includes major supporters and former officials, like Spencer Abraham, the former energy secretary, and Mary Matalin, a longtime Cheney adviser.

Central to Mr. Libby's defense is his argument that any efforts to push back against Mr. Wilson were legitimate.

In a series of court filings in that case, Mr. Fitzgerald has indicated he may call Mr. Cheney as a witness.

A Republican who is close to several administration officials, and who was granted anonymity to discuss internal thinking at the White House, said the White House was troubled that the Libby trial, which is scheduled to begin in January, has the potential to expose some of the inner workings of the vice president's office.

"There's not concern about showing any illegalities as much as there is a window into the policy process that will be unflattering to the vice president," this person said.

Mr. Fitzgerald has already filed papers discussing a copy of The Times's Op-Ed article that includes handwritten notations from Mr. Cheney in the margins, including one that said: "Do we ordinarily send people out pro bono to work for us? Or did his wife send him on a junket?"

Yet for all that, the case against Mr. Libby has been constricted in ways that are said to be helping officials sleep better at night.

The presiding judge, Reggie B. Walton, has narrowed the issues in the trial to whether Mr. Libby lied under oath to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents about his role in the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's status at the C.I.A. Judge Walton has mostly slammed the door on efforts by Mr. Libby's lawyers' to broaden the trial into an exploration of how the Bush administration dealt with criticism of its decision to go to war in Iraq.

Judge Walton's rulings make it unlikely that if vice president were to testify, he would be asked to comment beyond some simple and straightforward facts, notably whether he informed Mr. Libby of Ms. Wilson's role in her husband's trip.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying when he testified that he first learned of Ms. Wilson's identity in a conversation with Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief of NBC News. Mr. Russert has said that testimony is false. In 2003 Scott McClellan, who was then White House press secretary, told reporters, based on information from Mr. Rove, that Mr. Rove had played no role in disclosing Ms. Wilson's name.

Mr. Rove later admitted to speaking with two reporters, the columnist Robert Novak and Matt Cooper, a reporter for Time magazine, about Ms. Wilson, though associates say he did not know her name. Mr. Rove also initially did not disclose to a grand jury that he had spoken with Mr. Cooper; he said in later testimony that he had forgotten and was reminded by the discovery of an e-mail message he had sent to a White House official recounting the conversation with Mr. Cooper.

An associate of Mr. Rove who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not cleared to speak publicly on the details said Mr. Rove did not intentionally mislead Mr. McClellan.

On Wednesday Mr. Bush was asked what he thought of Mr. Rove's behavior.

"I trust Karl Rove," Mr. Bush said, "and he's an integral part of my team."

Stolen Pistol Used By Roosevelt Returned To Museum (AP)

By Desmond Butler, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- After a 16-year absence, a pistol that Teddy Roosevelt carried during the Spanish-American War was returned Wednesday to Sagamore Hill, his home on Long Island.

The Colt revolver disappeared from a display case at Oyster Bay's Sagamore Hill National Historical Site in 1990.

It was recovered by the FBI after someone called the museum with a tip in September, said Robert Goldman, a former assistant U.S. attorney in Philadelphia.

Goldman, who led the Justice Department's investigation along with the FBI's art crime unit, was among those who attended a ceremony Wednesday marking the return.

The pistol was originally issued to a Navy officer and salvaged from the wreck of the USS Maine, whose mysterious sinking in Havana's harbor fueled the public outrage that led to war.

Roosevelt got the .38 caliber gun from a brother-in-law who served as a Navy captain, and carried it with him when he rode to war with the Rough Riders, a volunteer regiment he helped form. He purportedly had it with him during the Battle of San Juan Hill.

Roosevelt's legendary bravado during the conflict aided the rise of his political career, which culminated in the presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0034417

The pistol became a valued family heirloom, and was later given two inscriptions noting its origins on the USS Maine and its use by Roosevelt, then a colonel, at San Juan Hill.

"This gun symbolizes the diligence and heroism of Roosevelt that propelled him to the national limelight," Goldman said in a telephone interview.

The gun was discovered missing in 1990 during regular visiting hours in the Old Orchard House on the grounds of the museum. Police said a lock had been jimmied open.

The September caller told the museum that he believed he knew where the gun was, Goldman said. Park Rangers then contacted the FBI, who coordinated with Goldman, a specialist in art recovery cases.

Goldman, who owns 150 books by and about Teddy Roosevelt, said he'd long hoped for news of the gun since he clipped a newspaper article when it went missing. He told an FBI investigator years ago: "Before I leave government, we need to find this."

Investigators quickly tracked down the tipster to Daytona Beach, Fla.

Goldman, who left the Justice Department for private practice two months ago, said agents persuaded the caller to turn over the pistol to the FBI. The evidence gathered in the investigation was not sufficient to press charges against anyone, Goldman said.

"This came to us fortuitously," he said. "It was quick and nice and sweet."

On Wednesday, a curator confirmed the authenticity of the gun before the ceremony.

"I felt like was able to give something back to Roosevelt today," Goldman said.

Web Labeling Mandate Surfaces In Senate (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 15, 2006

Operators of commercial Web sites with sexually explicit content would have to post warning labels on each offending page or face imprisonment under a new proposal in the U.S. Senate.

Caving to earlier demands from the U.S. Department of Justice, the 24-page proposed law focuses on a medley of new penalties related to child pornography and other sexual content on the Internet. For instance, Internet service providers that fail to report to authorities any sightings of child pornography on their networks would have to cough up fines that are triple those written into current law: $150,000 for the first violation and $300,000 thereafter.

"The increase in Internet use has given sexual predators new ways to prey on children," said Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, who joined eight members of his party in introducing the bill on Tuesday. "This bill, among other things, is intended to shut down these opportunities, and severely punish the degraded individuals who are involved in the sexual exploitation of our youth."

Called the Stop Adults' Facilitation of the Exploitation of Youth Act, or Internet SAFETY Act, the bill actually beefs up the Justice Department's suggested penalties for negligent Web labelers. It would impose up to 15 years in prison--an increase from the five years suggested in the original proposal--on any commercial site operator who fails to place "clearly identifiable marks or notices" prescribed by the federal government in either the site's code or on the pages themselves, according to a copy of the bill seen by CNET News.com.

The bill would also create a new crime out of "using misleading domain names to direct children to harmful material on the Internet." Conviction would carry a prison sentence of up to 20 years. A similar sentence would apply to anyone who knowingly embeds words or images in the source code of their sites with the intent of deceiving minors into viewing "harmful" content.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales originally called for the new laws while speaking at an event at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in April. He said a mandatory rating system is necessary to "prevent people from inadvertently stumbling across pornographic images on the Internet."

At the same event, Gonzales also raised the possibility of requiring Internet service providers to retain records on their subscribers for a set period of time to aid law enforcement in investigations. The Justice Department has since held several private meetings with ISPs, as first reported by CNET News.com.

No such mandate made it into the Internet SAFETY Act, though other members of Congress have floated proposals bearing those requirements in recent months.

Criticized as ambiguous

The latest proposal drew criticism from civil liberties advocates, who said it presents enough ambiguities to prompt self-censorship of Web content.

DOJ_NMG_0034418

"Whether artistic works or political commentary or any type of images that may arguably come close to this category, people may not publish them for fear of being sent to jail for 15 years," said David Greene, director of a free-speech advocacy group called The First Amendment Project.

It's equally unclear how to draw the line between "commercial" Web sites, covered by the regulations, and "noncommercial" sites, which appear to be exempt, the bill's critics said.

"They may sell T-shirts or do things that are unrelated to the image or the content that is labeled," Greene said. "When their commercial transaction doesn't relate to the image, to the sexual content, there's a great danger in these laws."

To some extent, it was the thorny issue of labeling online news sites, which sometimes feature material considered to be sexually explicit as part of their regular coverage, that caused support for an Internet self-rating system to fizzle out during the Clinton administration years. At that time, in the late-1990s, Sen. Patty Murray, a Democrat from Washington state, proposed that misrating a Web site be made a federal crime.

The Internet SAFETY Act pulls its definition of sexually explicit material from existing federal law. It covers sexual intercourse of all types: bestiality, masturbation, sadistic or masochistic abuse, or lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person.

In practice, courts have interpreted those definitions quite broadly. In one case, U.S. v. Knox, the Supreme Court and an appeals court ruled that the "lascivious exhibition" of the pubic area could include images of clothed people wearing bikini bathing suits, leotards and underwear. That suggests, for instance, that photos of people in leotards and bathing suits would have to be rated as sexually explicit if the commercial Web site owner wanted to avoid going to prison.

The Senate proposal grants just one reprieve: Sexual depictions that constitute a "small and insignificant part" of a large Web site do not have to be labeled.

Also problematic, they said, is that, in addition to the labeling requirement, Web site operators would have to ensure that "any matter that is initially viewable" does not contain sexually explicit content.

"What if someone deep links to an image, and someone clicks on that image, and it's the first one they see?" asked Marv Johnson, legislative counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union. "Has the law been violated?"

CNET News.com's Declan McCullagh contributed to this report.

Alabama Awarded $400,000 Grant To Fight Child Predators (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Alabama is getting $400,000 from the Justice Department to fight child predators. U.S. Sen. Richard Shelby announced the grant yesterday.

He said the funds will be awarded to the Alabama Department of Public Safety's Internet Crimes Against Children's Task Force Program.

The money is earmarked to help the agency to continue working with other law enforcement entities on the federal, state and local level and child welfare organizations.

Shelby said the goal is to target individuals trying to exploit children by way of the Internet.

The Tuscaloosa Republican is co-chair of the Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus.

Safavian Jury Ends 1st Day Of Deliberations (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jurors in the David Safavian trial completed their first day of deliberations Wednesday without deciding whether the former Bush administration executive covered up assistance he gave Republican influence-peddler Jack Abramoff.

The jury of 10 women and two men is weighing charges that while Safavian was the General Services Administration's chief of staff, he obstructed justice and made false statements. He is accused of concealing from GSA ethics officials and Senate investigators how he helped the disgraced lobbyist try to buy or lease two government properties.

In the first trial to arise from the Abramoff scandal, the jury deliberated for about five hours. Jurors were to return Thursday.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman on Wednesday morning dismissed one juror, seated the only remaining alternate juror, a woman, and told the revised jury to "put all your previous deliberations aside and start all over again."

Friedman granted a government motion, over defense objections, to dismiss a female juror for apparently discussing the case with her father in violation of the judge's instructions.

Friedman said he doubted it would be hard to start over from scratch because the jurors had the case for less than two hours on Tuesday and had not discussed it in substantive detail before the problem with the juror arose. The judge questioned that juror and two others Tuesday before sending everyone home while he decided what to do.

DOJ_NMG_0034419

In dismissing the juror, Friedman said he questioned her credibility and she had refused to follow instructions, had done independent research and had talked to people she should not have about the case.

Two jurors told the judge Tuesday they heard the offending juror say she had discussed the costs of a golf trip to Scotland with her father. Safavian's expenses for an August 2002 golf trip to Scotland arranged by Abramoff have been an issue in trial testimony.

Friedman also denied the jury's request for a dictionary and told them to ask him if they needed definitions.

Abramoff, the former business partner of Safavian, was never called to testify, a point Safavian's defense lawyer emphasized in closing arguments Monday.

The defense characterized the trial as a clear case of prosecutorial excess. The government depicted Safavian as an ethically challenged public servant trying to serve two masters.

Prosecutors introduced dozens of e-mails in which Abramoff and Safavian exchanged information about two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients. Many of the e-mails were written in the weeks before Safavian joined the weeklong trans-Atlantic golfing jaunt organized by Abramoff.

Defense lawyer Barbara Van Gelder said Safavian "was trying to do the right thing" when he got approval from GSA ethics officers for the golfing excursion to Scotland and London and paid Abramoff $3,100 for his share of the expenses.

Prosecutors scoffed at the idea anyone could think $3,100 would cover the chartered jet fare, $400 and $500-a-night hotel rooms, $400 rounds of golf at the famed St. Andrews course and $100 rounds of drinks.

Prosecutor Nathaniel Edmonds said Safavian revealed nothing about the three-day London leg of the trip or the extent of the lavish accommodations. Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said if Safavian had told the truth, "there would have been questions" about who was paying for it and what business Abramoff had with GSA. Safavian told the ethics officers that Abramoff did all his work on Capitol Hill, a statement Van Gelder said is "literally true."

She said the government failed to prove its case by not summoning Abramoff to testify.

Prosecutors gave no reason for not calling Abramoff, who would likely be a witness if the Justice Department assembles criminal cases against any members of Congress. Abramoff has pleaded guilty to crimes in federal courts in Washington, D.C., and in Miami.

Missing Girl Found In S.C. (ROT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke (VA) Times, June 15, 2006

An Arizona girl missing for 10 years after she was allegedly abducted by her father has been found safe in South Carolina, officials said.

Rebecca Ann Braun, 12, was located by the Federal Bureau of Investigation at 8 p.m. Tuesday in South Carolina, according to Kevin Foust, supervisory special agent for the FBI in Roanoke. Although Braun's biological father, Danny Arthur Moran, was arrested on fugitive charges in Roanoke on Monday, Foust said Moran has been uncooperative and did not play a role in locating his daughter.

Foust said Braun was healthy and unharmed when she was found at the residence of an unidentified female. Foust was uncertain of the female's relationship with Moran and said she was not taken into custody.

Moran has been wanted by Arizona authorities since Rebecca was abducted while standing alone outside her house in February 1996. At the time, Rebecca was in her mother's custody.

Foust said a citizen tip led authorities to Moran, who was working as contract employee for Norfolk Southern.

FBI Agents Locate Missing Girl In South Carolina (WDBJ-TV)

WDBJ-TV, June 15, 2006

Kidnap victim Rebecca Braun has been found alive and well in South Carolina. Her alleged abductor remains in the Roanoke city jail after his arrest on the job here Monday.

The F-B-I says Denny Arthur Moran has not cooperated at all so far. He refused to tell federal agents where the child was. However, information in Moran's possession led them to Donalds, South Carolina.

The FBI would not say exactly what it was that led them to the small town about 30 miles south of Greenville. The Television show "America's Most Wanted" reports agents tracked his cell phone to a mobile home. Abbeville County Sheriff's office tells News-7 that's where Lillian Jean Kitts has been living with the girl for the past three and a half years.

America's Most Wanted says: A Roanoke woman broke the case by logging onto the "America's Most Wanted" web site to confirm that the man she met here was not Jonathan Richardson- -the alias he used here, but Danny Moran, the man wanted for kidnapping in Arizona in 1996.

Sheriff's Deputy Marion Johnson says kidnap victim Rebecca Braun--now 12 years--had not attended school in Abbeville County, but was supposedly "home-schooled." They'd changed her name to Rebecca Bradley to match the alias of her alleged captor, "Norma Bradley."

The natural mother, Helen Braun now reportedly lives in Wisconsin. A reunion between mother and child is expected soon.

Girl Kidnapped In Tempe In 1996 Found In South Carolina (AR)

By Sarah Muench, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, June 15, 2006

A Tempe girl who had been missing for 10 years was found in South Carolina after FBI agents arrested her father, who was on the FBI's most wanted list in Phoenix.

Rebekah Ann Braun, 12, was found unharmed Tuesday night in a South Carolina mobile home where she had been living with her father, Danny Moran, 57, and a woman who was also arrested.

Braun had been missing since Feb. 24, 1996 when she was kidnapped at age 2 at 6:20 a.m. from her Tempe home in the 1700 block of East Don Carlos, near University and McClintock drives, police said.

"I'm ecstatic," said the girl's mother, Helen Braun, 51, in a phone call from Philadelphia "I was so in shock. I knew that I would always see her, that this moment would come. But how can you prepare for that?"

Braun and Moran were never married.

Phoenix FBI agents continually collected information from family members and tips responding to publicity by media outlets, National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and America's Most Wanted.

Agents arrested Moran on Sunday without incident at his workplace in Roanoke, Va., after receiving a tip from a woman who recognized him from a flier about the kidnapping. He had been commuting there from Donalds, S.C. where he and his daughter lived, said Deborah McArley, a Phoenix FBI office spokeswoman.

"Any caputre is great. . . . We're always thrilled. Some people tend to give up hope, but this case really shows that there's a reason why we put out publicity on stories," said Steve Katz, supervising producer of the television program.

Moran, who had served two years in prison in 1988 in Arizona, had been commuting to a job as computer technician for six months and used the assumed name Jonathan Richardson, according to Virginia media.

Rebekah had been living with Moran and Lillian Jean Kitts, 52, who he apparently met in Arizona, authorities said. Their relationship was not known.

When FBI agents arrested him, Moran refused to give any information on Rebekah's whereabouts, McArley said.

The FBI wouldn't comment on how they were able to track the girl to the mobile home, but America's Most Wanted said agents were able to track his cellphone to the mobile home.

The girl is now in protective custody and a reunion between mother and daughter is expected soon, McArley said. Moran will be extradited to Tempe.

Girl Taken From Arizona Found Safe In South Carolina (TSSC)

The State (SC), June 15, 2006

DONALDS, S.C. - A girl taken from her mother's home in Arizona 10 years ago has been found safe in Abbeville County, the sheriff's department said.

Rebekah Ann Braun, 12, was found by deputies in a home in Donalds Tuesday night, after a man thought to be her father was arrested in Virginia.

The girl was taken from the Tempe, Ariz., home on Feb. 24, 1996, where she lived with her mother, the FBI in Phoenix said.

FBI agents arrested Danny Arthur Moran, 57, in Roanoke, Va., on Monday, where he had been living for about six months under an assumed identity, the Greenwood Index-Journal reported Wednesday.

A citizen tip led authorities to Moran, Kevin Foust, supervisory special agent for the FBI in Roanoke told WSPA-TV in Spartanburg.

Agents in Roanoke determined the girl was possibly in the Upstate. She's been taken into protective custody.

The woman who owns the home where the girl was found is a friend of Moran's and was taken into custody, authorities said.

Tempe police said Helen Braun now lives in Madison, Wis., and the FBI is working to reunite the girl with her mother.

Helen Braun told the Greenwood newspaper she was stunned to find out the FBI had arrested her husband. "Late Tuesday they called and said they did find Rebecca and she was OK. I always knew I'd see her again. I just didn't expect it. I was just in shock - complete shock. I'm still in shock."

DOJ_NMG_0034421

Police say Helen Braun told them on the day her daughter disappeared, the two were heading out of their apartment when the phone rang. Braun said she turned to answer it and no one was on the other end. When she turned back to her daughter, she was gone.

Officers went door-to-door and the mother got a phone call from Moran who said he had taken Rebekah.

A warrant was issued for Moran on custodial interference charges, and the FBI was called in to the case.

It took them a decade to find Moran, who authorities said even made calls to Helen Braun telling her she wasn't going to see her daughter again because she was an unfit mother who smoked in front of the child, authorities said.

Helen Braun said she has been told her now 12-year-old girl looks a lot like a computer-generated age-progression photo posted on the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children Web site.

"She knew she had another mother, but they told her some nasty things about me," Braun said with a shaky voice. "It's going to be a rough trip for both of us."

Judge Won't Suppress Wecht Evidence (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 15, 2006

A federal judge yesterday refused to suppress evidence seized in a search of former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's private offices last year.

That means that documents found in 29 boxes at the Penn Avenue location can be used against him at his criminal trial scheduled to begin in October. Dr. Wecht is charged in an 84-count indictment with misusing his public office for private gain.

His attorneys filed a motion to suppress evidence seized in the April 8, 2005, search, claiming that FBI agents did not adhere to the terms of the warrant.

In a 17-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab said the search and seizure "fit squarely within the scope" of the warrant and that the agents and support staff who executed it acted in "good faith."

Defense attorneys tried to claim, in particular, that one box taken from Dr. Wecht's office should never have been opened.

Box No. 20, which was in the same location as the others, was labeled for "the Wecht Law Firm," which is operated by Dr. Wecht's wife, Sigrid. Defense lawyers said that box should have been off-limits to the FBI.

Judge Schwab disagreed.

"The court has reviewed the contents of box 20, and finds that there are no letterheads, pleadings, statements, correspondence or other documents contained therein that were prepared for, generated by, reviewed by, or used by the Wecht Law Firm," he wrote. "On the contrary, the items in box 20 all appear to have been prepared for ... Wecht Pathology ... for example, invoices and billing records for reimbursement for private autopsy consultations, private limousine services and airfare."

Judge Schwab noted in his opinion that though Mrs. Wecht provided an affidavit with her husband's motion to suppress, she did not testify at the hearing on the matter.

Also yesterday, Judge Schwab issued an order relating to two disciplinary reports against the lead FBI agent investigating Dr. Wecht's case.

Bradley Orsini was transferred to Pittsburgh from Newark, N.J., where, Dr. Wecht's attorneys claim, he was disciplined for urging witnesses to lie to cover up his own misconduct.

Defense attorneys plan to use the information to question Mr. Orsini's credibility, and they, along with several local news organizations, requested that the reports be removed from a protective order so that they can be made public.

Yesterday, Judge Schwab agreed to unseal the reports. But at the same time, he stayed his order, giving the U.S. attorney's office the opportunity to appeal to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

"Even though the material is quite likely irrelevant and not admissible at trial, the government has not established a compelling interest or good cause to justify the continual sealing of [the document]," the judge wrote.

U.S Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said last night that she was unsure if she would appeal. If she does, the appeal must be filed by noon June 29.

Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Wecht Case (KTAE-TV)

KTAE-TV, June 15, 2006

ALLEGHENY COUNTY, Pa. -- A federal judge refused to suppress evidence seized in a search of former Allegheny County coroner Cyril Wecht's private offices last year.

Sources report that the documents found at the Penn Avenue location can be used against him at his criminal trial scheduled to begin in October.

Wecht is charged with misusing his public office for private gain.

His attorneys filed a motion to suppress evidence seized in April 2005, claiming that FBI agents did not adhere to the terms of the warrant.

Judge Allows All Evidence In Wecht Trial (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 15, 2006

The disciplinary records of the lead FBI agent in the case against Dr. Cyril H. Wecht must be made public, a federal judge ruled Tuesday.

The records, however, will remain sealed until June 30 to give the U.S. Attorney's Office time to review the order and decide whether to appeal, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab ruled.

At question are files from an internal FBI investigation into Special Agent Bradley Orsini while he worked in the Newark, N.J., field office. Wecht's lawyers claim Orsini asked a witness to lie on his behalf during that investigation and have said they plan to use that information to raise questions about the agent's credibility at trial.

In addition to Wecht's attorneys, lawyers for several media outlets -- including the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review -- fought to have Orsini's files made public. They argued that the background of the lead agent in the case deserved as much public scrutiny as the accusations against Wecht.

"We're delighted," said David A. Strassburger, who represented the Trib and its television news partner, WTAE. "We think the court was extremely willing to listen to the arguments of the media and reach the right result."

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said she was still reviewing the judge's order and had not decided whether to file an appeal, which could take months to resolve. Wecht's trial is scheduled to begin in October.

He is accused of using his office as Allegheny County coroner for the benefit of his private consulting business, Cyril Wecht & Pathology Associates.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, was indicted in January on 84 counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and theft of honest services.

Lawyers For Wecht Raise Judge's Ire (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Revie, June 15, 2006

Not following a painstakingly crafted court schedule has the lawyers defending Dr. Cyril H. Wecht in trouble with a federal judge.

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab on Wednesday ordered a post-trial contempt hearing to determine whether the conduct of Wecht's attorneys in repeatedly ignoring the pretrial order constitutes contempt. If Schwab determines it does, he said he will then decide the appropriate punishment.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, is represented by Jerry McDevitt and Mark Rush, of the Downtown law firm Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham.

In February, Schwab, Wecht's attorneys and federal prosecutors worked to create deadlines for pretrial matters.

Since then, Schwab accuses defense lawyers of repeatedly ignoring the schedule, including failing to file objections to government trial exhibits by a May 15 deadline. He said Wecht's attorneys claim they did not have time to review the more than 300,000 pages of material but found time to file motions to suppress evidence and dismiss the case well in advance.

On June 6, Wecht's attorneys requested the pretrial schedule be amended. Under their proposal, Schwab wrote in his opinion, "the trial could not occur on October 16, 2006, and probably not on October 16, 2007, and defendant would have successfully delayed the agreed-to trial date -- but the right of the public to have a fair, just and timely determination of the issue raised in this important public corruption case would have been thwarted."

Wecht was indicted Jan. 20 on 84 counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and theft of honest services. He is accused of using his public office as Allegheny County coroner for private gain.

Contempt Hearing For Wecht Lawyers (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 15, 2006

The judge overseeing the federal prosecution of former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril H. Wecht yesterday said he will hold a contempt hearing after the trial for Dr. Wecht's lawyers for "repeatedly ignoring" his orders on how the case will proceed.

In a long opinion explaining his recent decision not to suppress government evidence, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab excoriated the defense team for not adhering to the agreed-upon court schedule he set forth in a pretrial order.

Judge Schwab said he'll hold a hearing to "adjudicate" whether the lawyers' conduct constitutes contempt, and "if so, what would be the appropriate penalty."

Dr. Wecht's trial is scheduled for October. He is charged with numerous counts related to abuse of his office.

City's Lawyer Says Buildings Commissioner Ordered Hiring (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 15, 2006

The top lawyer in Mayor Richard Daley's administration testified Wednesday that she believed the city buildings commissioner—rather than officials in the mayor's office—was responsible for the 2004 hiring of an unqualified 19-year-old building inspector.

Corporation Counsel Mara Georges said John Doerrer, who was director of the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, told her that Buildings Commissioner Stan Kaderbek was to blame.

"He said he had told Stan Kaderbek not to hire the kid, but he did it anyway," Georges told jurors.

Her testimony appeared to contradict prosecutors' assertions that Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and other Intergovernmental Affairs officials orchestrated the hiring of Andrew Ryan, the son of carpenters union official Thomas Ryan.

Testifying in the federal corruption trial of Sorich and three other former city officials, Georges also acknowledged that she had heard allegations in 2004 that Intergovernmental Affairs was involved in Ryan's controversial hiring.

In testimony Tuesday, Georges said that she was not aware Intergovernmental Affairs played any role in hiring for building inspector and other blue-collar jobs covered under the 1983 Shakman decree, which restricts patronage hiring.

Prosecutors allege Sorich and his aide Timothy McCarthy fixed the hiring and promotions for scores of applicants with political clout. Former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery are also charged in the scheme.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins said Wednesday that he expects the government to rest its case Monday.

The defense has tried to show that the defendants' involvement in hiring was widely known in City Hall and that they did not knowingly participate in criminal activity.

Sorich's attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin, suggested Georges' acknowledgment of the allegation linking Intergovernmental Affairs to Ryan conflicted with her testimony Tuesday.

During cross-examination on Wednesday, Georges did not directly respond when Durkin asked whether she knew if Intergovernmental Affairs played a role in Ryan's hiring.

"It would depend what you mean by 'played a role,'" she said.

Georges is the second witness to testify that Kaderbek was more at fault for the Ryan hiring than the mayor's office.

Kaderbek's former managing deputy commissioner in Buildings testified last week that Kaderbek, McCarthy and Doerrer all were involved in the hiring of Ryan. But that witness, Christopher Kozicki, surprised prosecutors by asserting that Kaderbek was the driving force.

McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady, has asked the court to give immunity from prosecution to Doerrer, Kaderbek and Thomas Ryan to testify in the trial. Deady argues that the testimony of the three men would be favorable to McCarthy.

Also Wednesday, the one-time son-in-law of former 11th Ward Ald. Patrick Huels testified that in 1997 he had files deleted from the city's mainframe computer at Sorich's request. Robert Koch, who is divorced from Huels' daughter Allison, managed the city's computer servers.

One day in the fall of 1997, a colleague came to Koch's office and told him FBI agents were examining files on the city's mainframe computer, Koch said.

Koch said he called Huels, who was then his father-in-law, for advice. Huels told him to sit tight, and about an hour later Sorich called Koch, according to his testimony.

Testifying under a grant of immunity, Koch said Sorich asked him to delete files from the city's mainframe.

Prosecutors have charged that Sorich attempted to conceal the alleged hiring scheme by ordering the destruction of lists of politically sponsored job candidates.

On cross-examination, Durkin suggested Koch destroyed the files to protect Huels, who was under federal investigation.

Another witness Wednesday was a city street sweeper driver, who testified that he was promoted in July 2004 after he campaigned for two years for a pro-Daley organization.

Joseph Pratl's promotion has become an important element in the trial because all four defendants are charged with one count of mail fraud based on the promotion letter that Pratl allegedly received in the mail.

But Pratl testified Wednesday that he is not certain that his promotion letter came by mail. "I thought it might have come in the mail," he said.

Pratl said his wife found the original letter only last week in his basement. The letter was not folded and did not have his address anywhere on it, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034424

All of the defendants except Sullivan face other mail fraud charges in the case. Sullivan also is charged with two counts of lying to the FBI.

Michael Sheahan Jr., the son of Cook County Sheriff Michael Sheahan, testified that in the late 1990s, McCarthy regularly provided him with names of job applicants for positions in the Department of Aviation. The younger Sheahan was in charge of personnel in the department. He told jurors that the applicants on McCarthy's lists were always hired.

Sheahan said he sought and received immunity to testify because he feared he could be indicted. A prosecutor "told me that the government's position was that violating the Shakman decree was a criminal offense," Sheahan said.

Tribune staff reporter Todd Lighty contributed to this report.

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

City Hall's Top Lawyer Takes The Stand Again (CBS2CHI)

By Mike Flannery

CBS 2 Chicago, June 15, 2006

Mara Georges Testifies About Corruption Probe

(CBS) CHICAGO City Hall's top lawyer took the stand Wednesday to discuss what she knew about a corruption probe and when she knew about it.

Mara Georges' testimony came at the corruption trial of Mayor Daley's former patronage chief.

Chicago's corporation counsel said she had heard allegations of inappropriate political hiring by the mayor's office months before FBI agents showed up with search warrants.

But, as CBS 2 Political Editor Mike Flannery reports, there was no indication that she or any other top official ever tried to stop it.

Georges declined to discuss Wednesday's trial testimony with reporters.

Mara Georges had sometimes argumentative exchanges with defendant Robert Sorich's lead lawyer, focusing on what she knew about the allegedly inappropriate political hiring that is at the heart of the case against Sorich and three co-defendants. All of them connected at various times to the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs (IGA).

Attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin asked about a series of memos to Mara Georges that he claimed made explicit references to IGA's political hiring activities.

"Did you (know) that IGA played a role in political hiring?" he asked.

Georges shot back: "It depends on what you mean by played a role."

Georges then changed an answer she gave Tuesday, when she said that the FBI's April 2005 raid on City Hall was the first time she learned of the inappropriate hiring allegations. She said Wednesday that she'd heard those allegations at least seven months earlier.

Michael Sheahan, son of the Cook County Sheriff, testified later about rigged political hiring.

Although prosecutors gave him immunity, Sheahan told the defense: "We had a difference of opinion. Prosecutor (Barry) Miller told me violating the Shakman decree was a criminal offense. I didn't agree."

While Judge David Coar prohibited defense lawyers from asking whether she or any other top city officials took action to stop IGA's hiring activities, the defense has claimed that none did, and that the co-defendants were all just mid-level bureaucrats doing what they though their bosses wanted. None had any intention of breaking the law, they said.

Junior Gotti's Special Session With The Feds (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, June 15, 2006

Normally, it's an unpardonable sin for a wiseguy in good standing to sit down with the feds in a so-called proffer session. Mob prince John "Junior" Gotti did just that, sources tell Gang Land.

Also known as "Queen for a Day," such sessions often precede a cooperation agreement and require defendants to confess their crimes, as well as significant offenses by others.

JUNIOR HAD A 'SINGING' TRYOUT (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, June 15, 2006

John "Junior" Gotti broke omerta in a failed bid to win his freedom - a shocking decision his "Dapper Don" dad would have considered the ultimate betrayal.

The younger Gotti disregarded the Mafia oath of silence and ratted out members of the Gambino crime family during a daylong proffer session with federal prosecutors in the spring of 2005, sources familiar with the meeting told The Post.

The mob scion fessed up to a host of crimes and fingered numerous cohorts for mob-related activity in the hopes of getting out from under racketeering charges that threaten to put him behind bars for 30 years and force him to forfeit $25 million.

Sources said Gotti did not cop to any of the crimes he's currently charged with - most notably the high-profile kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Gotti admitted to his long-suspected role in the stabbing of Danny Silva, 24, during a brawl at the Silver Fox Bar in Ozone Park in March 1983, a source familiar with the meeting said.

Gotti admitted he was among a group of men who fought with Silva and that he wielded a knife - but said he suffered serious puncture wounds and acted in self-defense.

His lawyer, Charles Carnesi, said Gotti had never admitted to personally stabbing Silva and said he would neither confirm nor deny that the proffer session took place.

Gotti's bid to become a turncoat fell through after he refused to give the feds the full story - he agreed only to provide incriminating information about certain cohorts but insisted on protecting others, sources said.

Instead, Gotti went on trial for racketeering in August 2005, mounting a ferocious defense in which defense lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman conceded Gotti had run the Gambino crime family for his father - but that he left the mob in 1999.

That trial ended with a hung jury, as did Gotti's retrial in February. He faces a third trial in August.

The Gambinos have seen their share of canaries, including the notorious former underboss Salvatore "Sammy Bull" Gravano and Junior's right-hand man and best friend Michael "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo.

But never before has a blood relation of the famously proud John Gotti Sr. dared to cross that dangerous line.

Lichtman, who stopped representing Gotti in November, refused to comment on last year's proffer session or confirm whether it took place.

"Less than a year ago, the government viewed John's trial as an inquisition, a slam-dunk conviction," Lichtman said.

"Two trials later, the government has been brought to its knees and has responded in the only way it can - through a disgraceful whisper campaign designed to embarrass John and pressure him into taking a plea.

"The government is bullying the wrong guy this time," Lichtman continued.

Since Gotti's failed bid to become a mob turncoat, he has negotiated three potential plea deals - all of which he rejected at the last minute.

He turned down an offer in April for a five-year sentence in exchange for pleading guilty to racketeering. As part of the deal, Gotti would have moved out of the area after his prison term.

Recent court papers filed by prosecutors alluded to "admissions" by Gotti as being one of the "bases" for a new grand-jury probe targeting the Gambino crime family.

Transcripts from Gotti's last trial show that prosecutors and defense lawyers battled over how much the jury should know about his admissions.

2 BR Women Plead Guilty, 2 Indicted In Relief Aid Fraud (BRADV)

By Sonya Kimbrell

Baton Rouge Advocate, June 15, 2006

Two Baton Rouge women pleaded guilty to federal fraud charges, and two other Baton Rouge women were indicted Wednesday for allegedly making false and fraudulent claims to FEMA for disaster relief benefits.

Kim Cummings, 38, and Doretha Francis, 35, were each charged in two-count indictments with making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster assistance benefits and with making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. If convicted, Cummings and Francis could serve five years in prison and pay $250,000 per count.

The two bring the total number of defendants charged in the Baton Rouge-based Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to Hurricane Katrina fraud to 61.

Vinita Lane, 28, and Michelle London, 31, pleaded guilty to making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster relief benefits.

According to court records, Lane filed a false claim by telephone in September stating that her Baton Rouge home was damaged during Katrina. She received $2,000 for her claim.

London also filed a false claim by telephone in September that her Baton Rouge home had been damaged. She received $2,000 in disaster relief.

According to court records, London aided Lane in filing a telephone application with FEMA for disaster relief benefits, claiming that Lane's Baton Rouge home was damaged. Both were indicted on one count of making false and fraudulent claims and one count of making false and fraudulent statements.

Both agreed to plead guilty to the one count of making a false claim and the second counts will be dismissed.

The defendants could be sentenced to five years imprisonment and be fined $250,000.

In September, U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. It is designed to investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes, such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud. The task force includes members of the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Postal Inspector's Office and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys.

Map Dealer Due In Court (HARTC)

By Kim Martineau, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, June 15, 2006

Expected To Admit Thefts From Yale, Other Institutions

NEW HAVEN -- An antique-maps dealer accused of stealing several vintage maps from Yale University's landmark rare books library is expected to admit to those crimes and a broader series of map thefts from prominent institutions across the Northeast in federal and state courts later this month.

E. Forbes Smiley III, 50, who lives on Martha's Vineyard, is due to appear in U.S. District Court in New Haven on June 22 to accept responsibility for a staggering number of thefts, bringing a yearlong FBI investigation to an end.

After his expected plea in federal court, Smiley is then scheduled to go to state Superior Court a block away to resolve the three larceny charges pending against him there.

Sources close to the case who confirmed the plea agreement declined to say what charge or charges Smiley will plead guilty to in federal court or how much prison time, if any, he faces. The British Library in London, the Newberry Library in Chicago and the Boston Public Library have all confirmed that maps are missing from books that Smiley had handled under the guise of scholarly research.

The widely known map dealer started cooperating with the FBI within months of his arrest on Yale University's campus on June 8, 2005. On that morning, Smiley was leafing through books in the reading room of Yale's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library when a librarian found a discarded X-Acto blade on the floor of the library, setting the staff into high alert that a thief might be lurking.

A librarian zeroed in on Smiley after pulling up the map dealer's Web page. She then called over to Yale's Sterling library and confirmed he had been a suspect in an earlier theft, according to his arrest warrant. Hours later, a detective from the Yale Police Department trailed Smiley out of the Beinecke and into the lobby of the Yale Center for British Art a few blocks away and confronted him with the X-Acto blade wrapped in a wad of tissue.

The detective asked Smiley to open his briefcase. Inside lay a cache of maps, including three that Yale later identified as having been sliced out of books earlier that day. Smiley surrendered an additional map, a John Smith map of New England, folded into his blazer pocket that Yale also said had been stolen from the Beinecke.

In all, Yale lost - and recovered - four maps that day. The university pressed charges on three and turned over the fourth map, sliced from Gerard de Jode's 1578 world atlas, "Speculum Orbis Terrarum," to the FBI to launch a larger investigation. Smiley had been caught on tape slicing the map, worth an estimated $150,000, from de Jode's atlas, the warrant states.

News of Smiley's arrest set off alarms far beyond Connecticut. The British Library, the Boston Public Library and the Newberry publicly confirmed that maps were missing from books Smiley had handled. Other libraries he frequented - New York Public Library, Harvard University's Houghton Library and the New York Historical Society - have indicated they, too, may be missing material.

Smiley is scheduled to appear first before U.S. District Judge Janet Arterton on June 22 followed by an appearance before Superior Court Judge Richard Damiani.

3 May Face Federal Death Penalty For Crime Spree That Left 4 Dead (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - Three Indianapolis men killed four people, including a female accomplice, and wounded eight others during an 18-day crime spree that targeted drug and gambling houses in Indianapolis and Evansville, federal prosecutors said Wednesday.

Jarvis Brown and Gabriel Jordan, both 25, and Teddy Weems, 20, face possible sentences including the death penalty and life imprisonment if convicted, Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Brookman said.

They were arrested in Indianapolis on Dec. 31, three days after Brown and Jordan fired five bullets into accomplice Vanessa Hankins, 26, of Indianapolis, on a sidewalk on the near east side of the city.

DOJ_NMG_0034427

Evansville detectives had questioned Hankins the day before she was killed about the Dec. 26 shooting death of drug dealer Jahi Bell, 28, of Evansville, during a drug house robbery in the southwestern Indiana city. The indictment said Brown shot and killed Bell.

Hankins, whose mother lives in Evansville, had been visiting the city at the time, and her SUV was found near the scene of Bell's shooting.

Hankins had been the getaway driver during several of the trio's alleged crimes in Indianapolis, including the Dec. 20 slaying of marijuana dealer Ricky Green, the indictment said.

"Brown and Jordan agreed to murder Hankins to prevent her from providing information to the police," the indictment said.

On the day of their arrests, Brown and Jordan allegedly shot the fourth slaying victim, David Twitty, and robbed him of cash, the indictment said. The shooting occurred at a north side Indianapolis business where Brown and Jordan had planned to steal marijuana from an acquaintance of Twitty.

Brown, Jordan and Weems, armed with an assault rifle, shotguns and various handguns, also robbed various gambling houses in Indianapolis, prosecutors said.

The charges against the three include conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute crack cocaine, cocaine and marijuana; conspiracy to commit robbery; and federal firearms charges related to the use of firearms during the commission of drug trafficking or violent crimes.

It was not immediately clear when initial court hearings for the three would be held before a federal magistrate in Evansville, prosecutors said.

Weems was sentenced June 2 to 11 months in prison for convictions on state charges of theft and receiving stolen property. He is incarcerated at the Reception and Diagnostic Center of the Indiana Department of Correction in Plainfield.

Brown is in the custody of federal marshals, and Jordan is being held at the Marion County Jail.

Indianapolis Men Indicted For 18 Day Crime Spree (WISH-TV)

By Jay Hermacinski

WISH-TV, CBS 8, Indianapolis, IN, June 15, 2006

Wednesday the U.S. Attorney announced the indictments of three Indianapolis men charged with a December shooting rampage that killed four people and wounded eight others. The men could now face capital murder charges. A grand jury indicted 25-year-old Jarvis Brown, 25-year-old Gabriel Jordan and 20-year-old Teddy Weems on multiple federal counts that include robbery and murder.

"All are what we call death eligible in the justice department," said Susan Brooks, U.S. District Attorney.

The indictment claims the trio targeted drug and gambling houses. Police say the men robbed the drug dealers of their cocaine and marijuana, stole their money and using assault rifles and machine pistols shot anyone that got in their way.

"These individuals are very brutal and can become desperate criminals. So we're happy they are in custody and will be brought to justice," said Mike Spears, Indianapolis Police Chief.

Police say one of the murder victims was a key witness in the case. Vanessa Hankin's body was found on North Dorman Street the morning of December 28th. She had been shot in the head. Detectives say Hankin's knew Brown and Jordan and was an accomplice during some of the robberies.

"They killed her from talking to law enforcement about all she knew and had seen," said Brooks.

In all, three people were murdered in Indianapolis and one in Evansville. The crime spree ended with a car chase on December 31. On that day alone police say the suspects robbed and shot one man in the head and murdered another.

Ex-agent Says FBI Was Warned On Bulger (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 15, 2006

Questions raised about reliability

A retired FBI official testified yesterday that he urged his superiors to drop gangster James ``Whitey" Bulger as an informant in the early 1980s, amid allegations that Bulger may have been involved in drug dealing and murder.

After being dispatched to assess Bulger's credibility in a brief meeting at the gangster's Quincy apartment in 1981, the official, Robert Fitzpatrick, testified yesterday that he left believing that Bulger was an egotistical ``big bag of wind."

But Fitzpatrick said that while he was unsuccessfully lobbying to cut Bulger loose, Bulger's handler, FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. , was inviting top agents in the FBI's Boston office to the State House to meet Bulger's younger brother, William, then president of the Massachusetts Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0034428

Recounting how Connolly escorted him to a meeting with William Bulger at his Senate office in 1982, Fitzpatrick said, ``He was a little like his brother, to be honest with you. He did most of the talking. I just listened."

Fitzpatrick was not asked on the stand whether they discussed James Bulger with his politician brother during the meeting.

However, Fitzpatrick told the Globe after the proceedings yesterday that they did not.

Fitzpatrick, who served as an assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office between 1981 and 1986, said it wasn't unusual for top agents in an FBI field office to meet with prominent local officials.

However, he said he was concerned about Connolly's relationship with a powerful politician who was also his informant's brother, and asked him: ``What are you doing with this guy?"

He said Connolly responded that William Bulger ``is the guy who's going to get you the job when you leave [the FBI]. He's going to take care of you."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's third day on the stand in US District Court in Boston, where he was testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the government by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The family says that the government had negligently caused McIntyre's death by mishandling longtime FBI informants Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi .

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for killing McIntyre and nine other people, testified last week that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984 because Connolly warned them McIntyre was cooperating against them.

McIntyre was involved in an unsuccessful effort to ship weapons to the Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler, and had told government agents that Bulger and Flemmi were involved in the plot.

Bulger, who is listed as one of the FBI's 10 most wanted, is charged with 19 murders and has been a fugitive since he fled Boston just before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 of warning him to flee, and is serving a 10-year prison sentence.

William Bulger resigned as president of the University of Massachusetts three years ago after he was grilled by a congressional committee that was investigating the FBI's handling of his brother.

William Bulger testified before the committee that Connolly was a friend who grew up in the same South Boston housing development, and had worked for him on political campaigns. But he said he had never asked Connolly to protect his brother and had not known his brother was an informant until it was publicly disclosed.

Yesterday, Fitzpatrick testified that he was sent to meet James Bulger in 1981 in an effort to evaluate his ``suitability" as an informant.

Bulger wore dark sunglasses that made it impossible to see his eyes. ``He talked about how tough he was," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick recounted how Bulger went into a monologue, showing off his Alcatraz belt buckle and talking about the time he spent at the prison while serving a nine-year sentence for bank robbery in the 1950s and '60s.

Fitzpatrick said he recommended that Bulger be dropped as an informant because he was a gang leader, he allegedly was involved in crimes, and he seemed to be withholding information.

But Fitzpatrick said he was advised by superiors, including Sean McWeeney, chief of the FBI's organized crime section in Washington, ``how valuable" Bulger was in investigations.

Tensions flared in the FBI's Boston office in 1982, according to Fitzpatrick, when other agents began working with another informant, Brian Halloran, who implicated Bulger and Flemmi in the 1981 murder of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler.

Connolly was accused of rifling through FBI files on the Wheeler investigation, which led them to be moved to a safe, according to Fitzpatrick. Halloran was killed in May 1982 and another potential witness in the Wheeler case, John Callahan, was murdered two months later in Florida.

While the investigation into all three murders was underway, the FBI dropped Flemmi as an informant from 1982 to 1986, but continued to use Bulger.

N.Y. Judge Who Helped Robbery Suspect Evade Arrest Is Removed (LAW)

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, June 15, 2006

A divided New York Court of Appeals on Tuesday removed Queens Supreme Court Justice Laura D. Blackburne for helping a robbery suspect evade arrest.

The 5-2 ruling marked a rare and possibly unprecedented case where the court decided that a judge who had no prior disciplinary record, and had committed misconduct that did not involve personal profit, venality, a breach of trust or moral turpitude, is unfit for the bench.

Tuesday's ruling in Matter of Blackburne, 70, made clear that judicial misconduct cases require case-by-case analysis, and that the court retains the discretion to fashion an appropriate sanction to unique cases, no matter what it has decided in other matters.

Here, Blackburne claimed that the court had never removed a judge for a single, seemingly aberrational act of misconduct where there was no personal gain or evidence of venality. But the majority, in a per curiam opinion, essentially responded that it did not matter.

"[W]e have never implied that removal is limited to those categories of cases that have formerly come before us," the court said. "Judicial misconduct cases are, by their very nature, sui generis. That until now no judge has thought to prevent the lawful arrest of a suspected felon cannot shield petitioner from the necessary consequences of her actions."

A two-judge dissent led by Judge George Bundy Smith and joined by Judge Robert S. Smith argued that Blackburne -- who was ridiculed by the New York City tabloids and condemned by public figures such as Governor George E. Pataki and Mayor Michael Bloomberg -- is being treated much more harshly than other jurists.

They referred to the "glaring" disparity in sanctions and expressed concern that the court was breaking with its precedents and determinations of the Commission on Judicial Conduct by removing a judge for a single incident of poor judgment.

"No good reason exists to remove from the bench an outstanding jurist who has made one error in judgment," Bundy Smith wrote. "While it is true that judges should set high standards, it is also true that judges are human and may err. An error in judgment by this judge, approximately two years from retirement, should not lead to dismissal."

The dissent referred to the lengthy list of amici supporting Blackburne. On that list are appellate justices, political leaders and several organizations, including the Association of Justices of the Supreme Court, the Association of Black Women Attorneys and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The NAACP had claimed that Blackburne was the target of right-wing extremists and that her removal would perpetuate the perception that blacks are held to a different standard than whites.

Blackburne's removal is rooted in an incident two years ago, when she was presiding over the Queens Treatment Court where defendant Derek Sterling appeared. Sterling was undergoing court-ordered treatment at a residential drug treatment program.

That June morning, New York City Detective Leonard Devlin appeared at Blackburne's court and advised the court officer that he wanted to question Sterling in connection with a robbery. Devlin waited outside the courtroom and made no attempt to accost the suspect in the courtroom. He waited for the proceeding before Blackburne to conclude.

Meanwhile, the court officer, Sergeant Richard Peterson, informed the judge that Devlin was present and wanted to question Sterling. Blackburne later realized that the detective sought not only to question Sterling, but to arrest him.

Outraged at what she viewed as a "ruse," Blackburne directed Peterson to show Sterling out a secure rear exit to evade the police officer.

Peterson, worried that he would get in trouble if he disregarded Blackburne's directive and fearing that he would be guilty of obstructing justice if he did what she told him, consulted with an assistant district attorney. The prosecutor, Sharon Scott Brooking, agreed it would be inappropriate to help the suspect evade arrest, and so advised both Peterson and Blackburne.

But Blackburne insisted and said that if Peterson did not take Sterling out the back stairwell, she would do so herself.

The court officer, concerned at that point for the judge's safety, reluctantly showed Sterling out.

Sterling was arrested the next day at his drug treatment program and charged with assault and robbery, charges that were ultimately dismissed.

The New York City tabloids had a field day with the incident, denouncing Blackburne as "Let -'Em-Go-Laura" and "Loony Laura" and describing her as a "judicial jerk."

She also was harshly criticized by local and state political leaders.

The Police Benevolent Association, the Detectives Endowment Association and Mayor Bloomberg, through Deputy Mayor for Legal Affairs Carol Robles-Roman, complained to the Commission on Judicial Conduct, which initiated an investigation.

GUILTY OF MISCONDUCT

Following that investigation and a hearing before a referee, former Appellate Division Justice Ernst H. Rosenberger, Blackburne was found guilty of misconduct. The commission then voted 8-2 for removal, with the dissenters contending that censure is a more appropriate penalty for a first-time offense.

On appeal, the sole issue was whether the misconduct in this case was so serious as to warrant the harshest available penalty. For the majority, it seemingly was not a close call.

The majority described Blackburne's conduct as "rash and reckless," and said the judge showed no concern and no respect for the public safety, or, for that matter, for the potential legal predicament in which she was placing Peterson. It said the fact that Sterling returned peacefully to the drug program and apparently did not commit the robbery/assault is of no relevance.

"Things might easily have turned out otherwise," the majority said. "In impeding the legitimate operation of law enforcement by helping a wanted robbery suspect avoid arrest, petitioner placed herself above the law she was sworn to administer, thereby bringing the judiciary into disrepute and undermining public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of her court. [P]etitioner's dangerous actions exceeded all measure of acceptable judicial conduct."

The majority said Blackburne "abandoned her role as a neutral arbiter, and instead became an adversary of the police," a position "completely incompatible with the proper role of an impartial judge."

Judges Bundy Smith and Robert Smith, in dissent, referred to a dozen commission cases in suggesting that Blackburne is being treated more harshly than other jurists who committed equally offensive and even more egregious misconduct, and as harshly as judges whose misconduct was considerably more serious than hers.

"Over the years, this Court and the Commission have removed a number of persons from the bench," the dissenters said. "Not until this case, however, has a judge been removed for one act of bad judgment."

Robert H. Tembeckjian, commission administrator and counsel, said Tuesday that while it is always an "unpleasant and difficult duty to remove a judge from office," he is gratified that the Court of Appeals agreed that removal is the proper sanction here.

'UNFAIR' RULING

Blackburne's attorney, David Godosky of Godosky & Gentile in Manhattan, said the ruling was "unfair and unduly harsh."

"The Court has chosen to ignore its precedents and impose the ultimate sanction on this jurist," Godosky said. "I do think it is unfair to Judge Blackburne because of what was demonstrated to be a rather exemplary 10-year, unblemished career. She did make an error, which she admitted to almost immediately, and has expressed her remorse. To impose this sanction given those factors, given her history, given her career and the character testimony at her hearing is an unfair and unduly harsh result."

In a statement Tuesday, police union president Patrick J. Lynch described Blackburne as a "notorious cop-hater" whose removal by the court amounts to a public service.

"The Patrolmen's Benevolent Association and its 50,000 active and retired members salute the ... Court of Appeals for this courageous decision," Lynch said. "As a judge, Laura Blackburne was a blemish on the outstanding record of service provided to this city by all those who serve on the bench with honor and dignity."

Michael Marr, a spokesman for the governor, said the administration "is pleased that the Court of Appeals has recognized that a judge who assists a suspected felon in avoiding a lawful arrest exceeds all bounds of acceptable judicial conduct and must be removed from office."

Tuesday's ruling has no impact on Blackburne's pension, except to the extent that she will have fewer years of service. She was within two years of retirement. She had been suspended with pay pending the court's consideration of her case.

Suspect Is Held In 4 Stabbings In Manhattan (NYT)

By Al Baker And Kareem Fahim

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

The tourist from Texas was first, stabbed once in the chest on Tuesday while he sat with his girlfriend on a downtown C train. But he was not the last.

In the next 13 hours, the same assailant attacked repeatedly in Manhattan, the police said, plunging a knife into three more people: one man on a subway platform at Rockefeller Center, and two women from Montreal standing on a traffic island at the northern tip of Times Square. The authorities also believe the attacker terrorized workers at a late-night grocery store, menacing them with a knife and throwing a beer at them.

The attack on the women was witnessed by cabbies and a doorman at the W Hotel at Broadway and West 47th Street, the police and the cabbies said. They called 911 on cellphones as they followed the suspect across the street to a McDonald's restaurant, they said.

The suspect was arrested without a struggle around 4:15 a.m. yesterday, the police said. He was identified by officials as Kenny Alexis, 20, a homeless man who has knocked around between New York and Boston.

All four victims survived, though the man from Texas and one of the Canadian women were in critical condition, and the police said there was no known motive for the attacks.

"While it comes as little solace to the victims of such horrific attacks, the fact remains that the subway system has never been safer," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said, adding that crime in the subway system is down 26.7 percent from the comparable period last year. He also said, "When you get four and a half million people a day into the system, every once in a while a really bizarre thing can happen."

DOJ_NMG_0034431

At 1:30 p.m. on Tuesday, two hours before the first attack, police officers stopped Mr. Alexis when he allegedly tried to enter the subway station at 42nd Street and Eighth Avenue without paying. The officers checked for any outstanding warrants, and when they found none, they issued him a summons and let him go, the authorities said.

About 15 hours later, detectives had Mr. Alexis under arrest and were taking him to the Midtown North Precinct station house. There they began to get a picture of his life and how he had spent his most recent hours, partly from Mr. Alexis's own words and partly from police records.

As of last night, the police had charged Mr. Alexis with two counts of second-degree assault in the attack on the two Canadian women, along with two counts of criminal possession of a weapon and one count of unlawful possession of marijuana. In the attack on the C train passenger, Christopher McCarthy, 21, he was charged with attempted murder and criminal possession of a weapon. In the deli incident, the police charged him with robbery.

Witnesses had also picked him out of lineups and identified him in the C train stabbing and the deli fracas. In addition, Mr. Kelly said, he admitted committing all four stabbings in interviews with detectives.

Mr. Alexis told the police he had no home. The authorities said he had been arrested twice in New York — after he tried to board a subway in Harlem on Feb. 28 without paying the fare, and on April 25, after he tried to push his way past a ticket collector for a Chinatown bus headed to Atlantic City. He pleaded guilty in both cases, officials said.

Mr. Kelly said Mr. Alexis's New York record included arrests with sealed records. Boston authorities said he had a criminal record there.

After he was questioned and charged, the police led Mr. Alexis out of the station house just before 9:30 p.m. to take him to Central Booking. Wearing jeans, a blue hospital smock and two diamond earrings, he was silent until he reached the police car, and then called out something unintelligible to reporters nearby.

The attack on the downtown C train occurred at 3:41 p.m. on Tuesday. The victims, a young couple from Houston — Mr. McCarthy and Ganda Krisananuwatara, 20 — were seated directly across from the attacker in the subway train's last car, the police said. As it approached the 110th Street station, he leapt from his seat and stabbed Mr. McCarthy in the upper right chest with a knife with a three-and-a-half-inch blade.

Mr. McCarthy thought he had been punched, not stabbed.

"I was like, 'What just happened?' " Ms. Krisananuwatara said yesterday. "I looked over at my boyfriend. He said, 'The guy just stabbed me.' " The attacker walked away.

Mr. Kelly said the attacker had not made eye contact with the couple, and Mr. McCarthy's father, Joseph McCarthy, who spoke to his son yesterday, said his son had deliberately avoided the man's gaze.

Surgeons at St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital Center spent the next few hours attending to Mr. McCarthy.

Two surgeons, Ray Wedderburn and Clifford Connery, said yesterday that Mr. McCarthy's heart rate was elevated when he arrived, meaning he was in shock, though he was still able to speak to doctors. Roughly a pint of blood was drained from his chest before surgery, they said.

"He's extremely lucky, given the location of his injury," Dr. Wedderburn said.

In the recovery room, Mr. McCarthy's father said he found his son weak but able to smile and squeeze his parents' hands. "He said he was willing to give him whatever he needed, a camera if he wanted it, his wallet, whatever," Mr. McCarthy said. "In spite of that, he said he still forgives him."

At about 3 a.m., a man who detectives believe was Mr. Alexis approached two men sitting on a bench on the southbound F train platform at 50th Street and Avenue of the Americas.

He demanded a cellphone from one of them, Ambrosio Castro, 30, of Brooklyn, and "when the victim didn't respond, Alexis stabbed him twice, once in the stomach and once in the chest," Mr. Kelly said. "Like the victim in the C train attack, the victim on the F train platform initially thought he had been punched."

Again, the attacker walked away.

At 3:30 a.m. at the West Park Market, a delicatessen at 1802 Broadway near Columbus Circle, the police said, the attacker caused a commotion, waving a knife at workers, drinking water, tossing a beer at the workers, and taking a beer as he left.

Then, a half-hour later, four drivers leaning on their cabs at Broadway and 47th Street said the suspect came toward them, saying something unintelligible, and shook the hand of one driver, Samuel Dupiton, 45. They watched as he veered south across 47th Street.

Melanie Carrier, 22, and Audrey Perrier, 25, two students from Montreal, had left the nearby Edison Hotel and were crossing Broadway at West 47th Street when the attacker came at them from behind as they reached the traffic island at Duffy Square, Mr. Kelly said.

Mr. Kelly said Mr. Alexis stabbed the women in the back.

DOJ_NMG_0034432

"One of them fell down," Mr. Dupiton said. "The other tried to give her a hand. They were crying," he said. He and the other drivers ran to the women, and one said, "I got stabbed," Mr. Dupiton said. "She showed me her hands with blood on them."

The women then got to the W hotel, at 1567 Broadway, where some employees came to their assistance. A doorman from the hotel and three or four of the cabbies ran to Broadway and saw Mr. Alexis standing inside the McDonald's at 46th Street and Seventh Avenue, the police said. Officers arrived moments later and arrested him as he came out.

Mr. Castro was in critical but stable condition late yesterday at St. Vincent's Hospital in Greenwich Village. Ms. Carrier underwent surgery late yesterday and was also in critical but stable condition at the same hospital. Ms. Perrier was released from the hospital.

On a seat in the subway car where Mr. McCarthy was attacked, forensic investigators lifted a palm print that the police said belonged to Mr. Alexis. A worker from the delicatessen identified a black and white knife Mr. Alexis was carrying when arrested as the one he brandished in the store.

Backstory: From Prison Bars To Bar Exam (CSM)

By Frank Bures

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

MADISON, WIS.

Christopher Ochoa is late as he walks into the Starbucks on University Avenue here and sits down. He takes off his Yankees hat and apologizes. "I'm sorry about that," he says mildly. I assure him it's no problem, but he seems genuinely distraught. It's the kind of thing he's still getting used to: making appointments and keeping them.

"You learn patience in prison," Mr. Ochoa says. "You learn to live one day at a time. You have to. And I have to get out of the habit, because I miss appointments like this one, because I take one day at a time."

Ochoa is short and quiet and blends easily among the students and soccer moms of this university town. He is shy by nature, a trait that may have helped him survive the 12 years he spent in the Texas prison system for a crime he didn't commit. He kept his head down.

Now, however, Ochoa is holding his head high. He is one of 180 people in the US to be exonerated by DNA evidence - and one of the few to thrive: Last month he became only the second exoneree in US history to graduate from law school. As he now heads out to look for a job in a field - criminal justice - that tragically let him down, Ochoa isn't sure what kind of law he might practice. But he does know some of the values he'll bring to the profession.

"You have to have compassion for your client," says Ochoa. "It doesn't matter how much money he has, or whether he's rich or poor, because that's what makes us better lawyers. And compassion is what makes, in essence, justice."

***

Justice is something that Ochoa, a Hispanic, has learned about the hard way. He'd never been in trouble, when Ochoa and a friend, Richard Danziger, went to a Pizza Hut in Austin, Texas, one day in 1988. The manager of the restaurant had been recently raped and murdered. While there, the two men offered a toast to the woman, they said, to memorialize her. Both worked at a nearby Pizza Hut.

When employees heard the toast, they got suspicious. Police arrested the two men a few days later. During a two-day interrogation, investigators threatened Ochoa with the death penalty if he didn't confess. At one point, one of the detectives threw a chair across the room. Ochoa says he finally gave them what they wanted: This was, after all, Texas - the No. 1 death-penalty state. He was sentenced to life in prison.

After more than a decade behind bars - and a few years after the man who actually committed the crime admitted to it - Ochoa wrote a letter to John Pray, codirector of the Wisconsin Innocence Project, a group at a law school that investigates possible wrongful convictions. The students took up the case. New DNA tests were conducted. Ochoa and Mr. Danziger walked out of prison two years later in 2001 - 12 years after going in.

"I felt like it was a dream," says Ochoa's uncle, Ron Navejas. "We all had our arms around him when he was walking out."

Later that day, Ochoa boarded a plane with family members and Innocence Project workers to fly back to El Paso, Texas, where he grew up. One of the workers, Cory Tennison, noticed that many of the passengers were reading the story about Ochoa in newspapers. So he went to the intercom and made an announcement: Chris Ochoa is on the plane, flying home.

One passenger asked if he could take up a collection for Ochoa, who had no money in his pockets. "So this guy proceeds to walk around the plane with a barf bag," says Mr. Tennison, "and people were throwing in cash. We counted it later that night: It was over $500."

In El Paso, Ochoa went back to school to finish degrees he had started in prison, then began thinking about his future, even if the past wouldn't always let him go. He moved in with his uncle, who remembers how Ochoa wouldn't look him in the eye. "He was always looking down," says Mr. Navejas. "I asked him, 'why don't you look at me?' He said, 'I can't. That's what they taught us in prison. They make you look down at the ground.' And I said, 'Well you're not in prison any more. You can hold your head up high. You're free.' "

DOJ_NMG_0034433

Ochoa was out in the backyard with his uncle one day when he suddenly decided what he wanted to do: get a law degree. His interest had been piqued by a business-law class he had taken and talks he had given at law schools about his ordeal. For the second time, he put something in the mail to the University of Wisconsin-Madison Law School. This time, it was an application.

When Ochoa showed up for classes in 2003, his status as a star exoneree followed him. According to Ochoa's classmate Juan Marchan, some people were drawn to his inspirational story. Others whispered that he was the guy they say killed a woman in Texas.

Ochoa didn't know what to make of the odd looks. He wasn't even sure if they were odd looks. After 12 years in a prison atmosphere of mistrust and keep-to-yourself privacy, he didn't know the rules any more. "I didn't know how to talk to people," Ochoa recalls. "If someone didn't talk to me, I didn't know if that was normal. But as I progressed in law school, people got to know me for who I was. They treated me like one of their own. And that's all an exoneree wants."

***

Many innocent inmates who are freed don't do well on the outside. They struggle for years to put their lives back together. Some end up back in prison for crimes they actually do commit. One problem is that they often get less help than if they were guilty.

"The system is not really set up for that," says Mr. Pray. "If you're on parole, you have a parole officer, and you might be set up with certain services. But if you're exonerated, you're just off. You're on your own."

Ochoa did get some money. Halfway through his first year of law school, when he was struggling financially, he received a $5.3 million settlement from the city of Austin in a civil-rights lawsuit over police misconduct. Ochoa has done better than many exonerees, though, despite the money. Sipping his coffee, he offers one reason why. "The one thing you learn in law school," he says, "is that there's no room for emotion. None whatsoever. Not being angry, or happy. You can have compassion. But there's a fine line."

It would be understandable if Ochoa did harbor some anger, at the detectives who wrote part of his confession - at the people who took 12 years of his life. But he tries to let this go, to avoid letting it consume him. "I try not to think about it," he says. "I try to focus on moving forward and not being angry or bitter. I wouldn't be where I am today, if I had remained angry."

And he wouldn't be going where he's going either: first to Italy and Thailand for a much deserved break after 18 tumultuous years. Later this summer, Ochoa hopes to visit Yankee Stadium to watch his beloved team.

After that, he's not sure what path he'll take. Now 39, Ochoa says he might work in a prosecutor's office, to help prevent wrongful convictions at the outset. Or he may go into something less emotionally charged, like property law. But whatever it is, those around him, like his uncle, expect it to be big. "I know Chris," says Navejas. "He's not done yet."

Small Cities Hit Hard In Crime Report (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

In Jersey City, where the gentrifying waterfront deflects the public eye from unchangingly poor neighborhoods, violent crime rose by 8.4 percent last year. Thirty-eight people were killed, an increase of 15 compared with the previous year.

Paterson and Elizabeth, N.J., fared even worse with violent crime, each registering an increase of about 20 percent. In New York, Syracuse also had a 20 percent increase, and violent crime was up in Stamford, Conn., as well.

In most smaller cities and even in some quiet suburbs in the region, violent crime rose last year, according to preliminary statistics released Monday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The increases were such that New York City, with a slight decline, appeared to be an oasis of relative calm.

Among the 15 other cities with 100,000 or more people in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, 10 had increases in violent crime, including 4 in the double digits. And in those 15 cities, taken together, the number of homicides rose by 28 percent.

The reasons, experts said, included the spread of gangs to smaller cities and suburbs and cuts in federal grant programs to local police agencies. Many attribute the success of bigger cities in part to sophisticated police techniques that they have developed, while smaller ones are just catching up — especially in their approaches to violent offenders.

While experts do not consider homicides to be a very telling gauge of crime, they agree that the increase is striking — even more so than the nationwide figures, which showed a 12.5 percent increase in homicides last year in cities with populations of 50,000 to 249,000. The numbers underscore what they describe as a resurgence of senseless violence among young men in impoverished neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0034434

"These ideas of respect and disrespect and how you have to respond to being disrespected may have started on the mean streets of the core urban areas, but you now see them in smaller places," said David M. Kennedy, the director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

By and large, the numbers in the New York region fit the pattern in the nationwide statistics released on Monday, showing a 2.5 percent increase in violent crime — which comprised homicide, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — after an impressive 15-year decline.

Violent crime in the largest cities declined slightly between 2004 and 2005, with New York City recording a 1.9 percent decrease over all and a 5 percent decline in homicides. In cities with populations under one million, however, violent crime was on the rise. The report did not contain data on individual cities with populations of less than 100,000.

"Right now, comparing anywhere to New York City is kind of a setup because New York City has become extraordinarily safe," Mr. Kennedy said. "It's places not just the size of Albany and Buffalo but places the size of Newburgh that are having big-city crime problems."

Experts also caution that a one-year increase in crime may be just a small bump. It is, nonetheless, a bump visible all over the country. While violent crime in cities of over 1 million dipped by 0.4 percent, it rose 8.3 percent in cities of 500,000 to 999,999, 2.9 percent in cities of 250,000 to 499,999 and 3.4 percent in cities of 100,000 to 249,999. In cities of fewer than 10,000 people, violent crime rose 1.6 percent nationally.

John Klofas, a professor of criminal justice at the Rochester Institute of Technology, said that while "the medium-size cities have been affected the most dramatically" in the latest rise in crime, "it's too tempting to try to read a lot into this at this time."

In Rochester, for example, homicides are down slightly so far in 2006, while aggravated assaults are far ahead of the number in the comparable period of 2005, Professor Klofas said. And the increase in homicides last year, to 53 from 36 in 2004, followed a huge decrease from 2003.

The F.B.I. report led officials in some cities to protest that one year's numbers were no basis for judging their handling of crime. In Jersey City, the report prompted Mayor Jerramiah Healy and Police Chief Robert A. Troy to announce that property crimes have been on a significant decline this year and that homicides — 14 so far — were down significantly compared with the same period last year.

The department has added bicycle patrols and surveillance cameras, has offered cash to people who turned in their handguns and has announced a program called "Operation Little Rascal" to enforce a curfew. "We're going to start bringing these kids off the streets and bringing them to their parents," Mayor Healy said.

In Paterson, a Police Department spokesman, Lt. Anthony Traina, said crime statistics often fluctuated for reasons that might not be immediately apparent, citing one crime wave a few years ago after more than 400 convicts were released from prison and returned home.

As to homicides, which doubled last year, reaching 20, Lieutenant Traina said, "Over the years, we've been over 20 and down to 7."

A few other cities reported numbers just as stark: Hartford had 25 homicides in 2005, up from 16 in 2004, and in Elizabeth the number rose to 17 from 10.

One exception, oddly, was Camden, N.J. — named "America's most dangerous city" for the last two years — which had 35 homicides last year, down from 49 in 2004. The overall violent crime data for Camden, a city of almost 80,000, was not in the F.B.I. report, since it is too small.

And in Newark, where violent crime has slowly receded — declining 1.6 percent in the preliminary 2005 data — homicides increased, to 97 from 84 in 2004.

"To have had an increase in murder for the past two years is very troublesome," said Michael Wagers, the executive director of the Police Institute at Rutgers in Newark. Mr. Wagers said 90 percent of homicides in Newark were committed with guns, compared with 67 percent nationally, in a pattern he saw in other medium-size cities like Hartford and Charlotte, N.C.

"You have an intersection with gangs and guns," he said. "In the typical homicide or shooting, the victim is a gang member in some kind of dispute, disrespecting someone at a party or bumping into them, and then there's an escalation of violence between groups."

Reporters And Sources (WP)

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Congress considers a federal shield law.

PERHAPS AS EARLY as today, the Senate Judiciary Committee could report out a bill to create a modest privilege for reporters to protect their confidential sources in criminal and civil proceedings. Lawyers, priests, psychotherapists and others enjoy varying degrees of such protection for their confidential conversations; so do reporters in almost all state courts. Several recent cases -- the Valerie Plame investigation and the recently settled Wen Ho Lee civil lawsuit most prominently -- have served as reminders of the need for a shield in federal court as well. The issue is whether reporters or their employers should face jail or ruinous fines for doing what they have to do to bring the public the news it expects: honoring their promises of confidentiality to sources.

A bill sponsored by Republican Sens. Richard G. Lugar (Ind.) and Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Democrats Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) would not shield journalists in all situations; far from it. In criminal cases, it would allow prosecutors or defendants to subpoena reporters when they have exhausted alternative means of garnering needed information and when a judge finds disclosure, on balance, in the public interest. In civil cases, a judge could compel disclosure of a confidential source when it was "critical to the successful completion of the civil action" and "nondisclosure . . . would be contrary to the public interest" taking into account "the public interest in newsgathering and in maintaining the free flow of information to the widest possible degree about matters that enter the public sphere."

That free flow of information is what this is about. We don't pretend to be unbiased; representatives of The Washington Post Co. have advocated for the bill. But we firmly believe there's a larger interest here. History makes clear that critical stories, including the exposure of executive malfeasance that we remember as the Watergate scandal, have depended on the confidence of potential sources in journalists' willingness and ability to protect their identities. That ability is under threat. The result could be less reporting on government overreaching and wrongdoing -- and less of the kind of openness on which any democracy depends.

CIVIL LAW:

Lawyers' Gamble On Asbestos Trial Pays Off For Plaintiffs (LAW)

By Greg Land, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, June 15, 2006

A jury in Dallas, Texas, last week awarded $13.5 million to the survivors of a man who contracted an asbestos-related cancer decades after being exposed to a joint-compound product manufactured by Atlanta-based Georgia-Pacific Corp.

Attorneys from Dallas-based Baron & Budd told jurors that Timothy Shawn Bostic, who died of mesothelioma on Sept. 5, 2003, had been exposed to the fire-retardant mineral as a child and teen working with his father. According to Baron & Budd lawyers Charla G. Aldous and Chris Panatier, evidence at trial included documents showing that Georgia-Pacific officials knew of the health hazards caused by asbestos as early as 1966, but the company continued to manufacture asbestos-containing products until 1977.

Bostic's wife and child had been awarded $9.3 million in March 2005 in the case. But, said Aldous, because the trial judge expressed concern over the way the jury had calculated punitive damages, she offered the plaintiffs the opportunity to either accept a reduced award or face a new trial.

"We decided to take a chance on a new trial," said Aldous. "As it turned out, that was a good decision."

After a four-week trial and three hours of deliberations, on June 8 the jury awarded Bostic's survivors $7,554,904 in compensatory damages and $6,038, 910 in punitive damages.

The company will "absolutely" appeal, said Georgia-Pacific spokesman James Malone.

"Georgia-Pacific has always felt that anybody who gets sick because of asbestos in any of our products should be compensated," said Malone. "But we believe Mr. Bostic was exposed to asbestos in other products, not ours."

Malone said the outcome of the Bostic case will have no impact on the dozens of cases pending in Cobb and Fulton counties' Superior Courts, many of which are being handled by Baron & Budd attorneys.

Ohio Supreme Court Rejects Class Action On 'Light' Cigarettes (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- Two smokers can't bring a class-action lawsuit against Philip Morris USA Inc. over the way the tobacco company markets "light" cigarettes, the Ohio Supreme Court ruled.

The smokers had argued that Philip Morris knew cigarettes it marketed as having less tar and nicotine would be as dangerous as regular cigarettes.

The tobacco company, a unit of Altria Group Inc., contended that Ohio law requires a more specific warning from the state on a company's marketing practices before allowing lawsuits to apply beyond individuals to an entire class.

DOJ_NMG_0034436

The high court threw out a lower court's ruling that had been fought by lobbyists for manufacturers and other Ohio businesses.

Writing for the majority, Justice Evelyn Lundberg Stratton said the court didn't rule on the underlying question of whether Philip Morris acted to "deliberately deceive consumers into believing that Marlboro Lights and Virginia Slims Lights are safer or healthier than other cigarettes" -- only on whether the smokers were eligible for class-action status.

For class-action status, she wrote, Philip Morris would have had to act in a way "previously declared to be deceptive" under Ohio law, and the smokers failed to demonstrate the company had.

In a dissent, Justice Paul Pfeifer attacked the majority's "unconscionably narrow reading" of Ohio law, saying it would mean "many deceived parties will have no recourse against the company that deceived them."

Attorneys in the case didn't immediately return calls.

The High Court, Hoodwinked On Finance Data (RC)

By David M. Primo And Jeffrey Milyo

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

The imminent Supreme Court decision in Randall v. Sorrell — the closely watched dispute over the permissibility of highly restrictive campaign spending and contribution limits in Vermont — presents an opportunity to address the disconnect between scholarly research and the conventional wisdom about campaign finance reform.

In short, the most current and best scientific evidence flies in the face of the promises made by reform advocates, and more disturbingly, it reveals that the court jurisprudence upholding campaign finance laws is built on a shaky empirical foundation.

Reform proposals are invariably touted as a way to elevate democracy: higher turnout, improved citizen perceptions of government and increased electoral competition. In a recent Roll Call Guest Observer, Deborah Goldberg of the pro-reform Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School speaks of the “role of contribution limits in combating real and perceived corruption.”

The Supreme Court has recently upheld more severe regulation of campaign financing in the belief that such laws, by reducing the unseemly flow of money in politics, would improve American democracy. Most recently, in McConnell v. FEC, the court appealed to the “eroding of public confidence in the electoral process through the appearance of corruption” to justify limits on contributions to political parties. In a recent public lecture, Associate Justice Stephen Breyer stated that campaign finance laws “seek to democratize the influence that money can bring to bear on the electoral process, thereby building public confidence in the process.”

Tellingly, the court cites only “common sense” and anecdotes to back the claim that campaign finance is critically linked to perceptions of government. The reason: Systematic, scientific evidence does not exist.

In work published in the March 2006 Election Law Journal, we show that there is essentially no connection between the perceptions of government on the one hand and state campaign finance laws on the other. In fact, some types of reforms, such as public funding of candidates in elections, end up having a negative impact on such perceptions.

In an ongoing study, we find a similarly weak link between campaign finance laws and voter turnout, while research by other scholars suggests that increased campaign spending is associated with a better informed electorate and improved perceptions of government.

Finally, the existing empirical evidence on campaign finance reform and electoral competitiveness is at best mixed, with studies finding a modest increase in competitiveness from some laws, but not from others.

In fact, we are aware of no scholarly studies that yield consistent evidence of large and statistically significant effects of campaign finance regulations on electoral competitiveness. Yet in her op-ed, Goldberg misuses some of our own recent research to argue that the Supreme Court needn’t be concerned that Vermont’s low contribution limits may harm electoral competition.

In reality, our study found only that the presence of limits on contributions from individual donors reduced the winning vote margin in gubernatorial elections. We did not estimate the effect of states setting very low contribution limits, as is the case in Vermont. We even cautioned readers explicitly that “we want to be clear that our findings do not suggest that contribution limits cannot have deleterious effects on competition if set too low; our findings here suggest that contribution limits, as enacted in the states, have on net had a modest positive impact on competitiveness. Still, very low limits like those in Vermont, which have concerned even pro-reform Supreme Court Justice Breyer, merit caution.”

We aren’t surprised that pro- reform activists tend to make exaggerated claims that are uninformed or even contradicted by the scientific evidence, but we do expect better of the Supreme Court. Sadly, the reality is that Supreme Court decisions are built on this same shaky foundation. We think it is not too much to expect the court to weigh scientific evidence over anecdote.

DOJ_NMG_0034437

David M. Primo is an assistant professor in political science at the University of Rochester. Jeffrey Milyo is an associate professor in economics and the Truman School of Public Affairs at the University of Missouri.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Review Deaths After Stun Gun Use (AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- With over 180 deaths since 1986 among suspects subdued with stun guns, the government decided the time had come to take stock of this recent law enforcement phenomenom.

The new review by the Justice Department, initially involving 30 such cases, follows the rapid growth in deployment of stun guns as a nonlethal alternative to bullet-firing weapons. The concern is about people who died after being shocked by the electronic control devices.

The department's research arm, the National Institute of Justice, said there have been 184 such deaths in the last 10 years, the overwhelming majority since 2000. Amnesty International, which has called for a moratorium on stun gun use, said there have been roughly 160 deaths in the past five years.

The study will not look at whether the use of stun guns was appropriate, John Morgan, the institute's assistant director, said Wednesday.

Instead, researchers will make medical assessments of the 30 cases, which include deaths that were attributed to a stun gun and some in which authorities could not determine whether a stun gun caused or contributed to a death, he said.

Two deaths occurred in 1986, one in 1990 and the rest since 2000, Morgan added.

In the remaining 154 cases, stun guns were ruled out as a factor in the deaths, but the study could eventually include those deaths as well, he said, saying the review could take up to two years.

"We hope this will help improve less-lethal technology generally," Morgan said. "If we find a particular operating characteristic is contributing to a problem, we hope that will be way to improve that technology."

Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz., the largest maker of stun guns, said that the devices have saved more than 9,000 lives because police officers have been able to the weapon instead of handguns that fire bullets. Tasers deliver a 50,000-volt jolt through two barbed darts that can penetrate clothing.

"Given that the NIJ conducted a similar study on pepper spray which effectively ended the debate regarding its safety, we are hopeful this study will lead to the same outcome regarding electro-muscular disruption devices," Taser vice president Steve Tuttle said.

Dalia Hashad, director of Amnesty's USA Program, said the study is a good first step. "We've been asking the federal government for the last six years to take seriously that people are dying after being shot by this weapon," Hashad said.

A government study last year said more than 7,000 of the nation's 18,000 police agencies used Tasers, up from 1,000 in 2001.

Many of those who died were high on drugs, mentally ill or otherwise agitated, according to an Amnesty International report released in March. Many deaths in the past year occurred after victims were hit by Tasers at least three times and, in some cases, for prolonged periods, the report said.

Some police agencies have tightened their rules on stun-gun use following Taser-related deaths.

One goal of the new study is to get a better understanding of how the body reacts when hit by electricity from the devices.

Researchers will include medical examiners, pathologists, cardiologists and other experts, said Dr. Robert Hunsaker, president of the National Association of Medical Examiners and co-chairman of the group that is designing the study.

The International Association of Chiefs of Police, which has called for careful monitoring of stun gun use, also will be part of the review.

U.S. To Review Deaths Of Suspects Subdued With Electric Stun Guns (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

At the urging of law-enforcement officials, the Justice Department is preparing to conduct a study of deaths among suspects who were subdued with electric stun guns.

The decision to carry out the review was made last year, and the department, along with medical and law-enforcement organizations, expects to begin the two-year-long review this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0034438

The study, which will initially make medical assessments of 30 in-custody deaths, follows the rapid growth in deployment of stun guns as a nonlethal alternative to firearms.

The department's research arm, the National Institute of Justice, said there have been 184 such deaths in the last 10 years, the overwhelming majority since 2000. Amnesty International, which has called for a moratorium on stun-gun use, said there have been roughly 160 deaths in the past five years.

Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz., the largest maker of stun guns, said that the devices have saved more than 9,000 lives, because police officers have been able to use the weapon instead of handguns that fire bullets.

"Given that the [Justice Department] conducted a similar study on pepper spray which effectively ended the debate regarding its safety, we are hopeful this study will lead to the same outcome regarding electro-muscular disruption devices," said Taser Vice President Steve Tuttle.

Cop Cleared Of Brutality, Fight Goes On (CTPOST)

By Richard Weizel

Connecticut Post, June 15, 2006

STRATFORD — A Town Council member and the mother of a teenager arrested in a March melee are asking why the disciplinary record of the arresting officer, who they accuse of brutality, was not considered in the decision to exonerate him.

Meanwhile, the Stratford Police Union on Tuesday called on the council member, Alvin O'Neal, D-2, to resign and for criminal charges to be lodged against him for filing a false report over the incident.

Marcia Mitchell-Davis, the mother of 15-year-old Titasheen Mitchell, said Tuesday she is "irate" previous disciplinary action and complaints against Officer David Gugliotti were not part of the department's lengthy internal affairs report released last Friday.

During a March 21 brawl involving two other teen girls, Gugliotti was accused of using excessive force and making racially derogatory comments while arresting O'Neal and Mitchell outside a market near her mother's restaurant, Caribbean Delights.

The report, released by Mayor James Miron and Police Chief Michael Imbro, said there was no basis to hold Gugliotti responsible for any misconduct.

But Gugliotti, a 12-year Police Department veteran, was reprimanded by superiors for a December 1998 confrontation with a motorist and disciplined for several patrol car accidents, according to personnel records.

In the 1998 confrontation Gugliotti was accused of cursing at a driver stopped for running a stop sign.

The officer was found to have violated the department's policy on conduct unbecoming an officer.

Gugliotti was responsible for eight minor accidents on the job between January 1994, when he joined the police force, and Dec. 26, 1998, and was suspended twice for two days and once for three days on separate occasions. He was required to take driver training in November 1998. He also was partially responsible for an accident March 1, 2002, in which a boat he was helping tow struck the overpass of the East Main Street viaduct.

"I am very disappointed this officer's history was not considered in the final determination he did nothing wrong when brutally arresting my daughter," said Mitchell-Davis, who on Monday contacted the FBI, U.S. Justice Department and Gov. M. Jodi Rell, seeking an independent probe of the incident. Police Capt. Harvey Maxwell said Tuesday that "each investigation is judged on its own merits, based on physical evidence and witnesses. It has nothing to do with what happened before."

Advertisement

"This is as ridiculous as the charges of brutality" against Gugliotti, said Clayton Quinn, the officer's lawyer. "There have been numerous residents who have written to the department commending him for swift and heroic actions that has saved lives."

A Feb. 8, 2006, memo from Imbro to Gugliotti, just a month before the alleged brutality incident, commended the officer for saving the life of a motorist choking at the side of a road. "Your quick action in saving this person's life is to be commended," Imbro wrote in the memo. Quinn said he will file legal action against the town shortly for "illegally" placing Gugliotti on administrative leave, and for "investigating these ridiculously false complaints."

The 100-member Police Union now wants O'Neal to resign.

"He has been allowed to continue to serve as councilman, while David [Gugliotti] was put on leave," said Union President Shawn Farmer. "A councilman who files false charges against an officer should step down and be prosecuted. There is a double standard here when only some people are held accountable for their actions."

O'Neal said Tuesday previous complaints against Gugliotti were not considered in the probe because, "What do you expect when you have the foxes guarding the henhouse?"

"I'm not lying; I still stand by what I saw," he said, responding to calls for his resignation.

O'Neal also said he would be contacting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People shortly to plan a demonstration over the outcome of the investigation.

When Is A Song Too Religious - Even In After-school Show? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

A school superintendent's decision to bar a second-grade girl from singing "Awesome God" in an after-school talent show is developing into an important showdown over the role of religious speech in public elementary schools.

The issue arose in May 2005 when an 8-year-old student in Frenchtown, N.J., was told that the song she'd selected to perform in the show was too religious.

To some religious groups the incident illustrates unconstitutional government hostility toward people of faith.

School officials defend the action, saying they don't op-pose religious songs but that the lyrics of "Awesome God" cross the line into proselytizing and thus are not appropriate for a show performed by and for young students.

Now, a year later, lawyers for both sides are asking a federal judge in Trenton, N.J., to decide whether school officials exercised reasonable judgment as educators in banning the song, or instead violated the second-grader's free speech and religious rights. US District Judge Stanley Chesler is expected to take up the case July 3.

"This is tolerance and political correctness gone awry," says Maryann Turton, the girl's mother. "This is a much bigger picture than just our daughter in our little town. It is going on everywhere."

The case has attracted the attention of the Alliance Defense Fund, an Arizona-based religious rights group that is representing the girl and her parents in a lawsuit against the school district. In addition, the civil rights division of the Justice Department and the New Jersey chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) are filing friend-of-the-court briefs supporting the girl's right to sing "Awesome God" at the talent show.

School officials say the issue is being blown out of proportion. They say they offered to allow the girl to sing a different religious song, but the offer was turned down. Frenchtown School Superintendent Joyce Brennan says the "Awesome God" lyrics were too graphic and violent, and crossed the line into proselytism.

"The problem came with the words in the song that were not espousing what the child believed but rather indicating what other people should be believing," Ms. Brennan says.

The lyrics read in part:

There's thunder in His footsteps
And lightning in His fists
(Our God is an awesome God)
And the Lord wasn't joking
When He kicked 'em out of Eden
It wasn't for no reason
That He shed His blood
His return is very close
And so you better be believing that
Our God is an awesome God.

The US Supreme Court has not directly addressed the issue of religious speech at the elementary school level. The justices have allowed students to use public school classrooms for religious meetings after school, but they have also struck down the offering of a student-led prayer prior to high school football games in Texas.

The Frenchtown case falls somewhere between those two decisions, analysts say. Judge Chesler must decide whether letting the girl sing "Awesome God" would be a school endorsement of a particular religious outlook in violation of the First Amendment's "establishment clause," or merely be a recognition of the girl's right to express her faith under the "free speech" and "free exercise" clauses.

Brennan says part of her job as superintendent of the 136-student Frenchtown school district is deciding what is appropriate in terms of behavior, dress, and atmosphere at school activities. "We have people of all faiths here, not just Christian. And for me to say 'OK, you'd better believe in this thing,' maybe my Muslim parents wouldn't understand that, nor would their children," Brennan says.

The superintendent says she has no objection to students singing devotional songs professing one's own beliefs. "I have approved many religious songs in my day," she says. "But when you cross that line and say that someone else should believe this particular thing or else ... then that is why I made the decision I made, because it did cross that line."

DOJ_NMG_0034440

Mrs. Turton disagrees. "We know there are certain guidelines. We are not talking about having a tent revival meeting in the middle of math class," she says. "We are talking about an after-school talent show where children were supposed to be able to perform something of their own choosing that they enjoyed."

Turton adds, "To take that and make it dirty and wrong and icky - that is just wrong. I didn't like seeing my child made to feel that way and I wouldn't want anybody else's kid to feel that way either."

The school's actions are indefensible, says Turton's lawyer, Demetrios Stratis, allied with the Alliance Defense Fund. "They are sending a message to young impressionable minds that religion is somehow radioactive, and it's not," he says. "Students do have the right to sing about their awesome God, especially in this context and in this forum."

The case involves protected student speech rather than government-endorsed speech, agrees the ACLU's Edward Barocas. "This was not a mandatory assignment. This took place at an after-school event that was voluntary where the individual student could decide what song to sing or what skit to perform," Mr. Barocas says. "It would be a different analysis if the principal sang the song 'Awesome God' over the loudspeaker at school."

School board lawyer Russell Weiss says Superintendent Brennan has been consistent in strictly imposing her view of what was appropriate for a school talent show.

"She required that two other acts be revised to remove content inappropriate for younger students," Mr. Weiss writes in his brief to Judge Chesler. "One was a Bon Jovi song called 'You Give Love a Bad Name,' which was revised to change the word 'Hell' to 'Heck.' The other was a passage from Shakespeare (Macbeth Act IV, Scene 1), known as the 'Witches Scene,' which was revised to delete gruesome images, including the complete elimination of all the lines of the Third Witch."

Our Flag And Our Freedom (WP)

By Bob Kerrey

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

With campaigns at full tilt and the Fourth of July just around the corner, the Senate's new priority is to debate and vote on yet another resolution to amend our remarkable Constitution. This time it's an amendment that would allow Congress to prohibit a form of protest that a large majority of Americans do not like: the burning or desecration of the American flag. Since 1989, when the Supreme Court decided unanimously and correctly that these rare, unpleasant demonstrations are expressions of speech and therefore protected by the First Amendment, there have been many such attempts. Fortunately, all have failed.

Unfortunately, enthusiasm for this amendment appears to have grown even as flag-burning incidents have vanished as a means of political protest. The last time I saw an image of the U.S. flag being desecrated in this way was nearly 20 years ago, when the court issued its decision. Thus this amendment -- never appropriate in the oldest democracy on earth -- has become even less necessary. But necessity is not always the mother of legislation.

In defense of speech I do not like, I recall a ceremony I have come to love: a military funeral. The finest of all is conducted at Arlington National Cemetery. At graveside, an honor guard holds the American flag while taps are played as a final farewell. The guards then fold the flag into a triangle and deliver it to the next of kin.

It is as if the flag becomes the fallen. In the hands of a widow or mother it is much more than a symbol of the nation. At that moment the American flag is a sacred object that holds the sweet memory of a life given to a higher cause. Or so it seems to me each time I am witness to these hallowed events.

To others the ceremony may mean something entirely different. I recall vividly one such situation: A mother of a friend who was killed in Vietnam recoiled when the flag was offered to her. She would not take it. In her heart the American flag had become a symbol of dishonor, treachery and betrayal. At the time, and perhaps to her dying day, she wanted nothing to do with it.

If our First Amendment is altered to permit laws to be passed prohibiting flag desecration, would we like to see our police powers used to arrest an angry mother who burns a flag? Or a brother in arms whose disillusionment leads him to defile this symbol of the nation? I hope the answer is no. I hope we are strong enough to tolerate such rare and wrenching moments. I hope our desire for calm and quiet does not make it a crime for any to demonstrate in such a fashion. In truth, if I know anything about the spirit of our compatriots, some Americans might even choose to burn their flag in protest of such a law.

No doubt the sponsors and advocates of this amendment mean well. They believe it is a reasonable and small sacrifice of our freedoms. They believe no serious consequence will come of this change.

No doubt, too, some of the increasing interest in limiting free speech is a response to the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States. It was a remarkable moment, when the hearts of most of us filled with a kind of pure patriotism we had never felt before. It was a patriotism that bound liberty to equality and fraternity. It was a patriotism that brought us together, friend and stranger alike. We discovered heroes who inspired us. No longer did we say, "It's good to see you," and not mean it.

Most impressive to me was that the "we" included men and women of many nations, every religion and every ethnic group. The "we" was global. The patriotism we felt extended beyond our boundaries and beyond the cramped spaces of ritual nationalistic fervor. We understood that the vulnerability of our freedom bound us together more than any symbol or slogan can. Millions of Americans, then and now, proudly flew their flags because they wanted to, not because any law told them to.

DOJ_NMG_0034441

All the more reason, then, for patriotism to turn aside the understandable impulse to protect our flag by degrading the constitutional freedoms for which it stands. Real patriotism cannot be coerced. Our freedom to speak was attacked -- not our flag. The former, not the latter, needs the protection of our Constitution and our laws.

The writer, a former Democratic senator from Nebraska, is president of the New School, a university in New York.

Let Gay Men Donate Blood (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A 1980s-era ban no longer makes any practical sense.

SOON AFTER THE FIRST AIDS CASES appeared in the U.S. in the early 1980s, the Food and Drug Administration, which oversees the nation's blood supply, permanently banned practically all gay men from donating blood. At the time, the policy made sense. But a quarter of a century later, there is no longer any scientific reason to continue it.

In the 1980s, thousands of people a year unknowingly contracted HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, from blood transfusions. Gay men were the primary group with HIV-infected blood, and there was no adequate technology to screen for HIV, so the FDA banned gay men from donating if they had been sexually active since 1977.

Today, all donated blood is tested for nine infectious diseases, including hepatitis B, HIV and syphilis. With HIV, two tests are used: The first searches for antibodies produced after an infection; the second, which was added to the process six years ago, looks for the genetic material of the virus. With the two tests, the odds of an HIV-infected batch entering the blood supply are about 1 in 2 million. That means about a dozen people a year contract the virus from transfusions. This result is unfortunate but inevitable; transfusions always carry a certain amount of risk because screening isn't perfect. About 85 people contract hepatitis C through transfusions each year, for instance, and about 12 are infected with hepatitis B. Roughly 15,000 people die of hepatitis in the U.S. each year, about the same number as die of AIDS.

Moreover, although there is no way to know how many Americans die each year because of blood shortages, allowing gay men to donate would increase the blood supply and potentially save lives.

The nation's leading blood donation agencies, including the American Red Cross, asked the FDA this year to change its policy. Currently, only gay men, prostitutes, intravenous drug users and people who have a history of cancer or other blood-borne diseases are banned from donating for life. The blood banks have recommended that gay men who haven't had sex in a year be allowed to donate.

A temporary ban for gay men would still be needed. There's a window during which an individual can be infected with HIV and not test positive. And gay men in the U.S. have a much higher incidence of HIV infections than the rest of the population. So it's necessary to exclude those who have recently had sex, even with condoms. But the new tests can detect the virus within 11 days, on average, after infection. A ban of several weeks or months should be sufficient.

Another issue is that current guidelines fail to adequately take donor behavior into account. Questionnaires don't routinely ask about risky behavior, so even promiscuous heterosexuals can donate. Is blood from a monogamous, HIV-negative gay man more unsafe than blood from a heterosexual man who is sexually active with multiple partners?

The FDA must continue to monitor the nation's blood supply, and it may be necessary to bar donations from those who engage in risky behavior or who are part of a population that is at a much higher risk for a disease. But those decisions should be made according to science.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Seeks Info On Calif. Newspaper Deals (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- McClatchy Co. said Wednesday it has received antitrust clearance for the sale of two Philadelphia newspapers as part of its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc. But it also said federal regulators are seeking more information about a separate deal involving the sale of two California papers.

McClatchy, which is based in Sacramento, Calif., said in a statement that it received early termination of Hart-Scott-Rodino inquiries into the sale of The Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News. Those papers are being acquired by an investor group including Bruce Toll, co-founder of homebuilder Toll Brothers Inc., and advertising executive Brian Tierney.

DOJ_NMG_0034442

The company also said it received a request from the Department of Justice for more information regarding the proposed sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times to MediaNews Group Inc. of Denver. MediaNews owns several other newspapers in that area of northern California, including The Oakland Tribune.

The Philadelphia and California newspapers are among 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy doesn't intend to keep after it closes its purchase of the San Jose, Calif.-based newspaper company.

McClatchy said in a statement that it would respond promptly to the DOJ request, and said that it would not have an impact on the closing of its acquisition of Knight Ridder.

Knight Ridder was forced to put itself up for sale last fall by its three largest shareholders, who were dissatisfied with its lagging stock price. McClatchy agreed in March to buy the company for $4.5 billion in cash and stock, plus the assumption of about $2 billion in debt.

McClatchy said at the time that it intends to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers, mainly because they didn't meet McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets. The company also sold the St. Paul Pioneer Press in Minnesota, where it would have faced antitrust concerns because of its ownership of the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis.

DOJ Extends Review Of MediaNews' Purchase Plans (DENVERBIZ)

Denver Business Journal, June 15, 2006

Federal regulators want more time to review MediaNews Group Inc.'s proposed purchase of two California newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion.

The U.S. Department of Justice told McClatchy it needs more information about its sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times to MediaNews, McClatchy said Wednesday.

Based in Denver, MediaNews is headed by William Dean Singleton and owns The Denver Post among other papers.

The MediaNews acquisition is part McClatchy's larger play for Knight Ridder Inc. (NYSE: KRI) of San Jose, Calif., and its 32 newspapers.

McClatchy (NYSE: MNI) wants to sell 12 Knight Ridder papers -- including the two to MediaNews -- to help finance its $6.5 billion acquisition of Knight Ridder. The purchase price includes $4.5 billion in cash and stock, and the assumption of $2 billion in debt.

The justice department is vetting the deal to make sure it doesn't violate antitrust laws.

MediaNews, with Hearst Corp., agreed in April to buy four Knight Ridder papers for roughly $1 billion, with the Denver company and its partners paying the lion's share of $736.8 million cash.

The Colorado company's partners, Gannett Co. Inc. (NYSE: GCI) and Stephens Group Inc., will contribute $325 million toward MediaNews' part of the purchase price.

Hearst is buying the Monterey Herald of California and the St. Paul Pioneer Press in Minnesota for $263.2 million.

McClatchy said in a statement that it would respond quickly to the justice department's request for information. The publishing company also said the request shouldn't affect the closing of the Knight Ridder deal.

McClatchy also revealed May financial information on Wednesday.

For last month, the company reported a 3.2 percent increase in total revenue to $96.7 million, with consolidated advertising revenue up 4.8 percent to $82.6 million.

But May circulation dropped 4.3 percent to 12.1 million.

Judge Approves Hillenbrand Antitrust Settlement (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

A federal judge on Wednesday approved hospital bed and casket maker Hillenbrand Industries Inc.'s agreement to pay $316 million to settle an antitrust class-action lawsuit that challenged its "bundled pricing" discounting of specialty hospital beds.

Spartanburg Regional Healthcare System of Spartanburg, S.C., sued Hillenbrand in June 2003, alleging attempted monopolization of the hospital bed market with discounting practices that violated federal antitrust rules.

The deal approved by the judge in South Carolina calls for Batesville, Ind.-based Hillenbrand to pay about $21 million less than what it had agreed to under a settlement announced in November.

Hillenbrand _ the nation's largest maker of caskets and hospital beds _ said the reduction was because of customers who opted out of the settlement.

The company had paid $50 million into an escrow account in March. It anticipates paying the remaining $266 million by mid-August.

"We believe the claims in this case are without merit, but we also believe it is in our company's and customers' best interests to put this matter behind us," Hillenbrand President and CEO Peter Soderberg said.

Spartanburg had said the proceeds were to be distributed to most U.S. buyers or renters of products from Hillenbrand subsidiary Hill-Rom Inc. since 1990. Those include more than 6,000 hospitals and thousands of other health care facilities across the country.

Hillenbrand shares rose 11 cents to close at $48.80 Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Telecom Mows Down Grassroots Efforts In Net Neutrality Battle (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 15, 2006

If the current lobbying fight over the future of Internet freedom could be cast in biblical terms, the telecommunications industry would be a natural Goliath, while the technology companies would be an intrinsic David. Though in this version, David can't seem to handle his stone and sling.

The tech community, made up of once-scrappy West Coast upstarts, is still feeling its way around Washington's power circles. While its lobbying efforts, in a classical, work-the-committees kind of way, are lacking, it has assembled a vocal grass-roots coalition arguing for network neutrality. Many believe that broadband operators have plans to turn the Internet into a cable system with operators deciding what fees, in addition to normal access rates, can be tacked on to content and service providers. And they want Congress to put the principle of "Internet freedom" in writing.

But their anemic D.C. presence has been no match for the long-standing telecom industry, a giant in Washington's circles that has pounded Capitol Hill and the public with an advertisement blitzkrieg courtesy of the United States Telecom Association, the industry's chief trade group, urging Congress not to regulate the Internet.

Though the techies have managed to throw some wrenches into the debate, they've arrived late to the game and haven't been able to strategize well beyond their baseline grass-roots support. Their tardiness may seem surprising, since at stake, many techies argue, is the very existence of the Internet.

"We really believe that the future of the Internet hangs on the congressional decision on net neutrality. ... It's the number-one priority," says Ben Scott, policy director for Free Press, a consumer advocate organization in Washington that has partnered with two unlikely bedfellows -- the reliably conservative Christian Coalition of America and the liberal MoveOn.org Civic Action -- for a "Save the Internet" campaign.

The debate began last August, when the Federal Communications Commission deregulated broadband. Content providers such as Google, Yahoo and Amazon.com say the move paved the way for the telecom industry to control the Internet. Their worst fears were confirmed last year, they say, when AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre Jr. noted in a BusinessWeek article that investment in high-speed pipes has been expensive. "What [Google, Vonage and others] would like to do is use my pipes free. But I ain't going to let them do that," he was quoted as saying.

But cable and phone companies such as Verizon Communications, AT&T and BellSouth Corp. say they have no such intentions and that the tech community is hyperventilating.

"There's a very significant overreaction [by net neutrality proponents] on this issue," says Gregory Rohde, president of e-Copernicus, which represents BellSouth. "What they are asking for is akin to seeing someone walking down the street and saying, 'This person is capable of murder; let's tie them up.'"

The tech industry has pushed legislation to reinstate the FCC rules on broadband. But its effort failed last week in the House when a net neutrality amendment, offered up by Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., was killed by the Republican leadership. The industry's focus now shifts to Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D. and a network neutrality amendment he introduced in the Senate.

Despite all the rhetoric, the tech community's Hill presence has been spotty. The exceptions: attendance at a Senate hearing nearly two weeks ago as well as the eleventh-hour D.C. fly-in last week by Google co-founder Sergey Brin, who came to lobby the Senate, decked in silver-mesh sneakers and jeans. No tie. No jacket.

The tech industry's late entry into the game and less-than-stellar effort have not been lost on lawmakers or analysts.

"The high-tech folks in cities got started on this late," Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who backs net neutrality, told Legal Times. "Coming up with an effective fight when you start way behind is hard. They are not where they should or ought to be."

The buzz on K Street is that content providers are doing a miserable job working the issue. Lobbyists on both sides of the aisle speak almost embarrassingly of their weak Hill presence and ponder whether this is indeed a priority for the industry.

"You can hire the best lobbying team in the world, but if your executive suite and boardroom isn't attuned to it, it's a lot of wasted effort," says one prominent Bell lobbyist. "It's like a 33-year-old veteran pitching against a 19-year-old rookie."

Even so, the techies have been very successful at mobilizing their supporters on a grass-roots level -- a virtual cheering section the telecommunications industry doesn't have. "The Internet has been used to organize before but has never been successful on an issue so arcane," says Scott. "This doesn't hit people in the gut like immigration or health care."

DOJ_NMG_0034444

But if the tech community is waiting for an army of bloggers to leap to its rescue, it might have to wait awhile. Opponents say the online community still isn't getting it and that if you look closely at online blogs and e-mail, supporters rarely have elevated their conversations to discussing the details of the legislation or what the language in a proposed amendment should or shouldn't be.

LIKE A ROLLING STONE

For all the success the tech industry has had on the grass-roots level, its Washington presence next to the well-greased telecom lobbying apparatus has been next to invisible. It's understandable. The bell companies have been on Capitol Hill for nearly a century, while the content companies have remained on the Washington sidelines. It wasn't until it was faced with an antitrust suit that Microsoft felt the need to spearhead a D.C. office.

To hear folks like Paul Misener, vice president of global public policy at Amazon, tell it, it all boils down to time. "Time is on our side," he says, then, in a contradiction, adds, "If we had more time to shine light on the facts, we would be in great shape."

Misener takes criticism that content providers have not been working the Hill aggressively as a source of pride.

"They [opponents] prioritize how well they do in Washington. We prioritize how well we do with our customers," he says.

And yet, when asked if a deleterious outcome on net neutrality would harm Amazon customers, Misener says it would, "to some extent."

"This is why time is on our side," he says. "Maybe I'm Pollyanna talking, but I'm hoping the way to achieve the right outcome is to look at the facts. We've been losing so far on getting the facts out there."

And one of telecom's longtime allies has been at the forefront of the issue for the tech industry. Former Rep. Vin Weber, R-Minn. is no stranger to the lobbying tactics of the bells. His firm, Clark and Weinstock, has represented AT&T for years, though they parted last year when the firm began pursuing existing clients eBay and Microsoft's interest in net neutrality.

Weber calls the telecom lobby one of the best-oiled machines in town. "They are well organized, sophisticated and have a lot of experience lobbying the Hill," he says.

So what type of advice has Weber offered to the tech community? The former lawmaker says he's uncomfortable discussing such counsel but adds he's dished up "the best advice" he has.

And though his Republican friends on the Hill are "slow to understand the issue," he reminds them not to confuse a sophisticated lobbying effort with grass-roots sentiment.

Although MoveOn.org's involvement has been a source of heartburn for some lobbyists pushing the issue -- "For a lot of Republicans, that's a blinking light," notes one lobbyist supportive of net neutrality, referring to conservative unease at the mere mention of the ultraliberal giant -- the coalition was successful at lobbying Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. to take a position on the issue.

Cable lobbyists don't seem bothered by Pelosi's strong endorsement. She's not urging her members to support net neutrality, says one prominent cable lobbyist.

"If she were to whip the caucus on it, like [the Central American Free Trade Agreement] or something, then you'd have a higher level of concern," says the lobbyist. "But there has not been the indication that she's twisting arms of the members, saying, 'Hey, this is part of the Democratic agenda.'"

Still, the tech community presses on, in pure Pollyanna mode.

"We don't have a lobbyist in the traditional sense," says Adam Green, civic communications director at MoveOn.org Civic Action. "Our lobbyists are everyday people."

Joe Crea can be contacted at jcrea@alm.com.

European Nations Pressure Apple On ITunes (AP)

By May Wong

AP, June 15, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Portable media player maker Creative Technology Ltd. said Wednesday the U.S. International Trade Commission agreed to investigate whether Apple Computer Inc.'s rival iPod infringes on one of its patents.

Singapore-based Creative filed the ITC complaint and a federal lawsuit alleging that iPods infringed on its patent for a navigation system used to organize and access music on portable players. Creative dubbed the patent, the "Zen patent," after its brand-name Zen media players.

Under the ITC complaint, Creative asked the agency to block imports of the Cupertino-based company's market-leading iPods, which are manufactured abroad.

The ITC will reach a conclusion as soon as possible, setting a target date within 45 days of the investigation's launch, Creative said.

DOJ_NMG_0034445

The probe is the latest development in an increasingly twisted patent battle between the two companies. In court documents, Apple has maintained no wrongdoing and has since filed two patent-infringement countersuits against Creative.

Apple representatives declined to comment Wednesday.

Findings by the trade agency typically come at a faster pace than patent cases in the court system, but the ITC's conclusions would not necessarily affect a judge's ruling, said Stefani Shanberg, a patent attorney with Perkins Coie LLP in San Francisco.

AXA To Purchase Winterthur Unit Of Credit Suisse (WSJ)

By Katharina Bart And Digby Larner

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

ZURICH -- AXA SA said it agreed to buy the Winterthur insurance unit from Credit Suisse Group for 12.3 billion Swiss francs ($9.9 billion), giving AXA a major presence in Switzerland and bolstering its activities elsewhere in Europe and emerging markets.

Paris-based AXA, one of Europe's largest insurers, will finance the deal with new shares and €4.8 billion ($6 billion) in debt. AXA will sell €4.1 billion of shares, offering investors one new share for every nine held at €19.80 apiece -- a deep discount to Tuesday's close of €24.30 a share.

AXA's shares fell 1.8%, or 43 European cents, to €23.87 in Paris. Credit Suisse rose 1.4%, or 85 centimes, to 63.70 francs in Zurich, with analysts welcoming the bank's clean exit from insurance.

AXA said it expects the integration of Winterthur to deliver pretax cost synergies of as much as €280 million by the end of 2008. AXA will take restructuring charges of €520 million in 2007.

Under terms of the deal, AXA will refinance €1.6 billion of Winterthur's debt upon closing, expected around year end after regulatory approvals.

Winterthur has some 13 million customers. The purchase gives AXA the largest property-and-casualty insurer in Switzerland. AXA said Winterthur's U.S. property-and-casualty business is under strategic review.

For Credit Suisse, the sale means forgoing a planned initial public offering of stock for Winterthur. "I don't believe we could have done an IPO for over 12 billion francs and certainly not in current market conditions," Credit Suisse Chief Executive Oswald Grübel said during a conference call.

Zurich-based Credit Suisse said it is sticking with its target of 8.2 billion francs in net profit next year, even after the sale of Winterthur.

"We will invest the capital from the sale of Winterthur to compensate for the loss of earnings," Mr. Grübel said.

Credit Suisse paid $9 billion for Winterthur in 1997, but the unit fared badly in the insurance-market downturn after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in the U.S. Winterthur was forced to book write-downs and needed two capital injections from Credit Suisse to stay afloat.

Since then, Credit Suisse has installed new management at Winterthur and cleaned up its balance sheet.

---- Hans Schoemaker in Zurich and Goran Mijuk in Johannesburg contributed to this article.

Write to Katharina Bart at katharina.bart@dowjones.com1 and Digby Larner at digby.larner@dowjones.com2

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Plans Vast Protected Sea Area In Hawaii (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

President Bush will create the world's largest protected marine area today, designating as a national monument a 1,200-mile-long chain of small Hawaiian islands and surrounding waters and reefs that are home to a spectacular array of sea life, senior administration officials said last night.

In his second use of the 100-year old National Antiquities Act, which empowers the president to protect important cultural or geological resources instantly, Mr. Bush will enact a suite of strict rules for the area, including a five-year phasing out of commercial and sport fishing, officials said.

The chain of largely uninhabited atolls, seamounts, reefs and shoals, which sweeps northwest from the big islands of Hawaii, is called the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and is home to some 7,000 species of marine life, including endangered green sea turtles and Hawaiian monk seals and millions of breeding seabirds.

DOJ_NMG_0034446

Earlier yesterday, the region, which at 140,000 square miles is nearly the size of California, was to have been named a national marine sanctuary, a different kind of protection that could have taken a year to enact.

But Mr. Bush, in a last meeting to consider the plan and timetable, decided to cut things short, said a senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to take attention away from Mr. Bush's public statement today. "He said, Look, I've got this authority, I'm going to use it," the official said.

"What we avoid is another year or more in process when we already have consensus," he said, noting that national-monument status avoided the prospect of lawsuits over proposed sanctuary regulations. Since the Clinton administration, environmental campaigners had pushed for marine sanctuary status for the area, and as recently as early last night they were girding for months of public debate over the proposed sanctuary rules with a few groups representing Pacific fish-processing companies and fishing fleets.

Last night, representatives of the conservation groups were at first startled by the sudden switch, but were then exultant.

"This is really for the first time saying the primary purpose of this area of the ocean is to be a pristine, or nearly pristine, kind of place," said David Festa of a private group. "It would take it off the books as a fishing ground. That's really the first time we'll have done that in any kind of sizable area."

Some environmentalists noted yesterday that the extra protection was an easy call for the administration, in part because there was little significant opposition in Hawaii or Washington. The move could also help the re-election prospects of Linda Lingle, Hawaii's first Republican governor, who last fall banned commercial activities in state waters in the area and endorsed the federal sanctuary plan.

They noted that there were only eight commercial fishing boats licensed to fish in the remote islands, and that rising fuel costs had made such trips less and less profitable.

Still, representatives of groups seeking to sustain Pacific fishing activity expressed concern as news of the new designation spread.

Kittie M. Simonds, executive director of the Western Pacific Fishery Management Council, one of eight regional advisory bodies to federal fisheries agencies, said the group planned to fight a complete closing of fishing in the area.

"We supported the sanctuary concept but wanted the continuation of our healthy bottom fisheries up there," Ms. Simonds said in a telephone interview.

The move builds on actions of several previous presidents, notably Theodore Roosevelt and Bill Clinton. In 1909, Roosevelt designated much of the island chain a national wildlife refuge. At the end of his second term, Mr. Clinton issued two executive orders protecting marine resources around the refuge and ordering federal marine agencies to prepare for the marine sanctuary designation.

Jean-Michel Cousteau, the marine explorer and filmmaker, said it was important to ensure that the designation came with meaningful rules and enough money to protect and further study the region's biological resources. He recently spent five weeks filming in the area and showed the resulting documentary at the White House in April.

A senior administration official said the film had a powerful effect on Mr. Bush and Laura Bush. Only once before, in February, has Mr. Bush created a national monument: at the African Burial Ground in Lower Manhattan. Some 400 remains of enslaved and free Africans from the 17th and 18th centuries were discovered there in 1991.

Bush To Designate Largest Marine Sanctuary (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Islands near Hawaii will be a monument

President Bush is expected today to create the world's largest marine sanctuary in a chain of uninhabited islands and atolls 1,200 miles northwest of the main Hawaiian Islands.

White House officials say Bush will elevate the area now known as the Northwestern Hawaiian Island Coral Reef Ecosystem Reserve to national-monument status. The designation will immediately afford the region the strongest legal protections, with fishing and commercial operations immediately outlawed and visitors primarily limited to scientific researchers.

“It's the ocean equivalent of Yellowstone, Yosemite and the Grand Canyon all rolled into one,” says Joshua Reichert, director of the environmental program of the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia.

The area comprises 140,000 square miles of ocean dotted with dozens of coral reefs and tiny islands; it is a 1,400-mile-long, 100-mile-wide swath of pristine marine habitat larger than all U.S. national parks combined.

The area is considered an ecological jewel. It is a nesting and breeding site to more than 14 million seabirds and home to 7,000 marine and terrestrial species, more than a quarter of which are found nowhere else in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0034447

It is an important nesting area for the threatened Hawaiian green sea turtle and home to the endangered Hawaiian monk seal, of which only 1,300 remain. The coral reefs of the region provide vital breeding and nursery habitat for numerous fish and other marine species.

The president can create a national monument under the special authority of the Antiquities Act, which allows the White House to set aside an area of particular national importance for protection, conservation or preservation, says James Connaughton, a senior environmental adviser to the president.

In 1909, President Theodore Roosevelt designated the area a refuge to stop the slaughter of seabirds by Japanese poachers who took the feathers for use in ladies' hats.

In the 1990s, overfishing caused the collapse of the lobster population, leading to the deaths of many monk seal pups that depend upon the crustaceans for food. In 2000, President Clinton increased the protections by issuing an executive order.

Bush had been expected to turn the reserve into a marine sanctuary, a process that had been underway for the past five years.

But after talking to federal and state officials and native Hawaiian leaders, the White House decided there was sufficient consensus to instead grant the region immediate monument status.

The area is home to numerous ancient Hawaiian religious and archaeological sites.

Although most of the islands will be closed to all but scientific researchers, a public visitation center will be created at Midway Islands, the scene of an important World War II battle, using old military buildings.

Hawaiian Marine Reserve To Be World's Largest (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Bush to Designate National Park in Pacific Waters

President Bush plans to designate an island chain spanning nearly 1,400 miles of the Pacific northwest of Hawaii as a national monument today, creating the largest protected marine reserve in the world, according to sources familiar with the plan.

Establishing the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands as a strictly protected marine reserve, which Bush is slated to announce this afternoon, could prove to be the administration's most enduring environmental legacy. The roughly 100-mile-wide area encompasses a string of uninhabited islands that support more than 7,000 marine species, at least a fourth of which are found nowhere else on Earth.

The islands include almost 70 percent of the nation's tropical, shallow-water coral reefs, a rookery for 14 million seabirds, and the last refuge for the endangered Hawaiian monk seal and the threatened green sea turtle. The area also has an abundance of large predatory fish at a time when 90 percent of such species have disappeared from the world's oceans.

Encompassing nearly 140,000 square miles, an area nearly the size of Montana and larger than all the national parks combined, the reserve will just surpass Australia's Great Barrier Reef Marine Park as the largest protected marine area in the world. It will also, however, be one of the least accessible.

"This is a landmark conservation event," said Joshua Reichert, who heads the Pew Charitable Trusts' environment programs and had pushed to have the area designated as a marine sanctuary. "The government is saying in certain places, for certain reasons, it is important to restrict activities that have the potential to damage the marine environment, of which fishing is a big one."

"The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands represent an incredible opportunity to preserve nature much as it was, or has been, for millions of years, because the hand of man has not wreaked the same kind of havoc as we have elsewhere in the world," said Rep. Ed Case (D-Hawaii), who has lobbied for the designation since he was elected in 2002.

The plan had been resisted by local Hawaiian fishing interests that feared losing access to traditional fishing grounds.

The nation has 13 marine sanctuaries scattered from the Florida Keys to the Channel Islands off the California coast. They provide varying levels of protection and have had mixed success in preserving sensitive ecosystems. In areas where fishing was banned outright, scientists have charted a resurgence of larger fish and coral reefs, but in areas that allow commercial and recreational fishing, damaged ecosystems have struggled to rebound.

Administration officials declined to comment on the record, but one senior official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging the president's announcement, said the plan will end fishing in the area within five years. It will allow Hawaiians to have access to the area for other traditional activities and will include the Midway World War II memorial, a facility that is open for research, education and ecotourism. Visitors wishing to snorkel, dive or take photographs in the area will have to obtain a permit, and no one may take fish, wildlife, corals or minerals from the region.

President Theodore Roosevelt established a bird sanctuary on some of the islands in 1909. President Bill Clinton created a coral-reef ecosystem reserve in the area by executive orders in late 2000 and early 2001, but he stopped short of designating a permanent sanctuary. Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) sent the White House a letter in February hailing the sanctuary plan as "a marvelous opportunity to leave a historic mark on U.S. and world conservation history." Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle (R) also endorsed the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0034448

The proposal has had a cooler reception from Democratic Sens. Daniel K. Inouye and Daniel K. Akaka, who have traditionally been protective of local fishermen, but the administration is relying on a coalition of environmental groups -- headed by the Pew Charitable Trusts -- to raise the money for buying out the fishermen.

By declaring the islands a national monument, Bush will circumvent a year-long congressional approval process required in the designation of an area as a marine sanctuary, and will provide the area the highest regulatory protection possible under the law. Clinton designated several terrestrial and marine national monuments toward the end of his tenure, though he did not name a marine monument of this scope.

"Declaring the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument will mean immediate protection, immediate implementation of the management measures included in the plan that was developed in the marine sanctuary process," the senior official said last night.

Ellen Athas of the Ocean Conservancy said the monument designation is "permanent and does not undergo periodic review like a marine sanctuary." She added: "National monuments can provide lasting protection for the environment."

Eight Hawaiians hold permits to fish commercially in the area, targeting red snapper, black grouper and other species. The fishery made a profit of only $300,000 in 2003, and one of the permitted fishermen, Zenen Ozoa, has lobbied to close it on the grounds that it is too environmentally destructive.

The island archipelago is remote -- it takes fishermen two days to reach the area from the main islands -- but debris from vessels that troll the Pacific have ensnared marine animals and damaged the delicate ecosystem. Filmmaker Jean-Michel Cousteau, son of legendary marine explorer Jacques Cousteau, spent six weeks there in 2003 and found debris from 52 countries, including cigarette lighters and toy soldiers.

"That was really shocking," said Cousteau, who produced two one-hour documentaries that aired on public television in April. "There's a lot of really nasty stuff happening over there."

Although the islands are remote, they remain vulnerable: Fishing vessels took about 12 million lobsters from the area between 1977 and 1997, and though a federal judge ordered the lobster fishery closed in 2000, the area has yet to recover.

In contrast to the controversies over administration stands on a number of other environmental issues, advocacy groups, activists and Democrats hailed Bush's work on this matter. Case, the Hawaii congressman, said the president "deserves credit" for undertaking "the most revolutionary act by any president, any administration, in terms of marine resources."

James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, toured the islands in December with Cousteau and Lingle.

First lady Laura Bush has also taken a personal interest in the island chain, said the senior administration official. She and the president hosted a White House screening of Cousteau's film on April 5.

Case, whose district includes the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands, said that, ironically, the designation means fewer Americans will see the region.

"We are all going to have to take it on faith that it's that special, because . . . most of us will never see it, and we never should see it," Case said. "We're just going to have to let it go."

Bush To Create World's Largest Marine Protected Area Near Hawaii (LAT)

By Kenneth R. Weiss

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A swath of the Pacific near Hawaii will be the largest such preserve in the world. The president was inspired to act by a Cousteau film.

President Bush today will create the world's largest marine protected area, a total of 140,000 square miles of Pacific Ocean surrounding a necklace of islands and atolls that stretch from the main Hawaiian Islands to Midway Atoll and beyond, senior administration officials said.

The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument will be larger than all of America's national parks combined. Fishing will be phased out, and the mining of coral for jewelry will be prohibited, along with other practices that can damage delicate reefs.

"With a stroke of a pen, the president not only can accomplish the single largest act of conservation in U.S. history, but he can inspire the American public on the broader importance of our ocean and coastal environments," said a senior administration official who requested anonymity so as to not upstage Bush's announcement today.

DOJ_NMG_0034449

The decision is a turnaround for the administration, which five years ago considered stripping more limited protections from the area that President Clinton had declared a coral reef ecosystem reserve. It's also a sharp departure for an administration that has pushed to privatize some federal lands and has designated less wilderness than most presidents over the last 40 years.

A turning point came in April, when Bush sat through a 65-minute private White House screening of a PBS documentary that unveiled the beauty of — and perils facing — the archipelago's aquamarine waters and its nesting seabirds, sea turtles and sleepy-eyed monk seals, all threatened by extinction.

The film seemed to catch Bush's imagination, according to senior officials and others in attendance. The president popped up from his front-row seat after the screening; congratulated filmmaker Jean-Michel Cousteau, son of the late underwater explorer Jacques Cousteau; and urged the White House staff to get moving on protecting these waters.

"He was enthusiastic," Cousteau said. "The show had a major impact on him, the way my father's shows had on so many people. I think he really made a discovery — a connection between the quality of our lives and the oceans."

The northwest Hawaiian Islands are a collection of reefs and 10 points of emergent lands — islands, atolls and pinnacles. Although the total emergent landmass is small, the isolation has kept these islands relatively undisturbed and increased their importance to wildlife.

About 14 million seabirds, including albatross and various species of terns, nest on the islands. Pods of spinner dolphins frolic in lagoons, leaping ahead of boats and making full twists in the air.

About 90% of Hawaii's green turtles nest in these remote beaches, as do nearly all monk seals. So far, scientists have identified about 7,000 species in the Hawaiian Islands, about one-third of which are found nowhere else in the world.

All of these islands are part of the state of Hawaii, except for Midway Atoll, the site of the historic World War II battle, which is a U.S. territory. The United States has the power to control fishing in its Exclusive Economic Zone, which extends 200 miles from the nearest point of land.

Bush's decision was strongly encouraged by Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle, a Republican. She signed rules last year to ban fishing in state waters around these atolls and urged Bush to extend protections to federal waters.

Protection of the northwest Hawaiian Islands has emerged as a widely popular move, receiving more than 50,000 letters of support over the last five years. These islands have no resident fishermen who might be hurt by tightening rules. Only a remnant fleet of eight commercial boats now makes the long cruise from the main Hawaiian Islands to fish the reefs for snappers and grouper — often a marginal operation given soaring fuel prices.

At today's White House ceremony, the president will invoke the 1906 Antiquities Act for the second time in his presidency. The only other time was to declare a burial ground in Lower Manhattan as one of the nation's ancient cultural sites. The site, where about 20,000 slaves and free black people were buried in the 18th century, is only about half an acre.

Bush's declaration today will be on a much larger scale. The strip of protected ocean, about 1,200 miles long and 100 miles wide, will dwarf all of the nation's marine sanctuaries as well as national parks on land.

Initially, Bush was going to propose that the area be protected as a national marine sanctuary. But he wanted to move faster, a senior official said.

"Because it's a presidential action, under the authority of a congressional act, it becomes law immediately without going through a prolonged rule-making process and the inevitable legal action that follows," a top aide said. "We can immediately begin with protection and management."

Bush in recent weeks enlarged the boundaries of the new protected area, giving him bragging rights for creating the largest marine protected area in the world. At 139,793 square miles, it will be bigger than Australia's 128,960-square-mile Great Barrier Reef Marine Park.

"This is the best thing that President Bush has done for the environment since he took office," said Elliott A. Norse, president of the Marine Conservation Biology Institute. "Having discussed this with him, I know that the president is personally committed to this."

Norse was one of the 50 guests who witnessed Bush's excitement after the screening of Cousteau's "Voyage to Kure" in the White House. Bush and his wife, Laura, were amazed by photos of the Northwest Hawaiian Islands that appeared in National Geographic magazine, an aide said.

Afterward, the president had dinner with Cousteau, National Geographic explorer-in-residence Sylvia Earle, and other marine scientists and advocates.

Bush was surprised, as are many Americans, that national marine sanctuaries do not forbid fishing except in specially designated areas. That evening, he repeatedly asked James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, how this new marine protected area could end fishing.

That same question has bedeviled the proposed expansion of no-fishing zones in the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary off Southern California. In 2002, California banned fishing in 175 square miles of state waters, and it has urged federal officials to extend those no-fishing zones into federal waters. Little has happened since then, except for strong objections from the industry-dominated regional fishery management council.

Even as a new monument, however, the area won't be immune from the infighting that goes on between wildlife managers and the fishery management council, which ferociously guards its control over commercial fishing.

Kitty Simonds, director of the Western Pacific Fishery Management Council, has long opposed any change of status that would further curtail fishing in the Northwest Hawaiian Islands. She was unavailable for comment Wednesday.

The monument will phase out the remaining eight fishing boats over five years — a timeline that conservation groups hope to accelerate by buying out the fishing permits. The Pew Charitable Trusts has brought in a retired judge in Hawaii to broker a deal with fishermen, who in 2003 caught about $1.3 million in snappers and groupers, for a net profit of only $300,000.

"For a buyout to work, it will have to include all of the permit holders," said Joshua S. Reichert, director of Pew's environmental division. Reichert said conservation groups do not want to buy out some of the fishermen only to have the others increase the amount of their catch.

"Although it seems that eight fishing vessels cannot do much damage, we know it can in fragile areas like the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands," Reichert said.

As an example, he pointed out the history of the dozen or fewer commercial boats that caught an estimated 15 million spiny lobster and slipper lobster around the island chain from 1977 to 1998. The lobster populations crashed, wildlife biologists said, robbing newly weaned Hawaiian monk seals of an important, easy-to-catch food.

Treasure Islands (NYT)

By Joshua Reichert And Theodore Roosevelt IV

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

PRESIDENT Bush is expected to declare the northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument today, thereby creating the largest marine reserve on earth. The president's decision caps a century of protection efforts by both Republican and Democratic presidents beginning with Theodore Roosevelt and including Lyndon Johnson, Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton. But none ever proposed the sweeping level of protection for these islands that is being put in place by the Bush administration.

While we and others in the conservation community have not always agreed with President Bush's environmental policies, we believe it is important to acknowledge a significant policy achievement when it occurs — and one is about to occur.

Beginning 160 miles northwest of Kauai, and extending roughly 1,200 miles into the Pacific Ocean, the uninhabited islands, reefs, shoals and atolls of this archipelago make up one of the most remote and relatively undisturbed coral reef systems in the world. The area marked for protection covers roughly 140,000 square miles of ocean, larger than all of America's national parks combined.

Almost 70 percent of the tropical, shallow-water coral reefs in American waters are in this one place, together with 7,000 species of marine and terrestrial life, a quarter of which aren't found anywhere else. More than 14 million seabirds make these islands their home for at least a part of the year, along with the last population of the endangered Hawaiian monk seal.

The president's plan for the monument designation has the distinction of receiving broad support from the Hawaiian people and from Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, who recently closed state waters in the northwestern Hawaiian Islands — everything up to three miles from shore — to commercial activities, including fishing. Many Native Hawaiians, who consider these islands an important part of their cultural and religious heritage, would also like to see commercial fishing ended in federal waters, which stretch three to 50 miles from shore.

In the plan to be announced by the White House, commercial fishing will be phased out over five years. What's more, the president's action will spur efforts to compensate the few remaining fishermen in the area for surrendering their permits to the government, which would then retire them. While it is still too early to know whether these efforts will be successful, such a buyout package would provide for an early end to fishing in the archipelago and offer reasonable compensation to the fishermen who have earned part of their livelihood there.

Just as we have protected spectacular areas on land from destructive activity, we know it is equally important to do so for the sea. The president's announcement is an important step in what we hope will be greater efforts to safeguard the ocean, while also addressing broader problems of overfishing, pollution and habitat destruction.

There are few opportunities for a president to protect such a large swath of ocean or land at little cost to the government, while garnering strong regional support. This is one, and we applaud Mr. Bush for taking the initiative to preserve one of the world's most spectacular marine environments.

Sparks Fly At Forum Over Energy Policy (MJS)

By Daniel W. Reilly

DOJ_NMG_0034451

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, June 15, 2006

Washington - Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman and U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) sparred Wednesday over progress on reducing America's dependence on foreign oil at a forum on energy efficiency sponsored by Milwaukee-based Johnson Controls Inc.

In the face of skyrocketing gas prices and an unstable oil supply, officials agree that more needs to be done to reduce dependence on foreign oil and on the importance of alternative fuels such as ethanol. But Bodman and Clinton diverged on whether the nation is on the right path.

Clinton said that accounting for inflation, the Bush administration has cut the budget for energy efficiency programs by one-third over the past five years.

"I believe our present system of energy delivery and use is . . . hurting our pocketbooks, violating our common values and threatening our children's future," Clinton said. She also said "our failed energy policy dictates our national security."

Clinton said in recent years there has been a lack of "evidence-based decision-making" on energy policy.

She accused the Bush administration of talking tough on energy efficiency, then cutting the budget for key programs such as weatherization for low-income family homes and for the State Energy Program, which provides federal grants to states to adopt emerging renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies.

Bodman accused Clinton of "cherry-picking" statistics and said that the Department of Energy is "very committed" to the issue of energy efficiency.

Bodman said he "disagreed strenuously with the issue that our energy policy has had a negative impact on our foreign policy."

In his keynote speech, Bodman said energy independence is one of President Bush's top concerns and that the answer to high energy costs is the comprehensive approach being pursued by the administration, which includes diversifying energy supply, developing new domestic sources and an increased reliance on efficiency and conservation.

Johnson Controls Vice President for Government Relations Mark Wagner said he was "very encouraged" by the Bush administration's approach to energy conservation but said he would like to see more done, especially on the Energy Savings Performance Contracts, a federal program that finances energy efficiency upgrades for federal buildings and installations.

The program was cut in 2004 but was reinstated in the latest energy bill, which passed last year. Wagner said he wanted to see the program "ramped up" as quickly as possible.

Wagner said the company would also like to see the Bush administration extend more tax credits for energy conservation, especially for commercial and residential building energy efficiency.

Johnson Controls is a leader in interior experience, building energy efficiency and power solutions. The company also runs a consulting business performing energy audits for corporations, school districts and other non-profit organizations, helping to reduce energy costs.

Now in its 17th year, The Energy Efficiency Forum was created by Johnson Controls to raise awareness of energy conservation issues in Washington. This year's forum, at the National Press Club, was co-sponsored by the U.S. Energy Association.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, a Democrat, also spoke at the event. Bush, who visited the company headquarters in Milwaukee in February, addressed the forum last year.

The New Drilling Battle (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

More than a mile beneath the surface of the Gulf of Mexico lies a tract of sea floor that is bigger than New Jersey and that oil and gas companies believe holds a trove of natural gas and a measure of salvation for corporate and residential consumers.

But the area, three-quarters of which is closed to development, also lies at the center of a fight in Congress over the future of offshore drilling, with billions of dollars at stake. The battle lines pit Republicans against Republicans, Democrats against Democrats, and industry against environmentalists.

Ever since a disastrous 1969 oil spill off Santa Barbara, Calif., drilling off U.S. coastlines has been a sensitive subject. For 25 years, a congressional moratorium, renewed annually, has barred exploration on 85 percent of the Outer Continental Shelf, from three miles offshore, where federal waters begin, to 200 miles out, where U.S. jurisdiction ends. An order issued by President George H.W. Bush and extended by President Bill Clinton through 2012 provides additional protection.

"We don't need to sacrifice our beaches, coastal waters and economies to meet America's energy needs," says the Sierra Club, which favors alternative energy sources and energy-efficiency measures.

DOJ_NMG_0034452

Yet the spike in natural-gas prices last fall has inspired a coalition of industrial users and a variety of lawmakers to try again to modify the moratorium, citing the harm high natural-gas prices do to American competitiveness and the benefits of reducing U.S. dependence on foreign energy sources. Drillers also want to win changes before the Interior Department's 2007-12 leasing plan takes effect.

Even as gay marriage and immigration grab headlines, top House and Senate members have been bargaining in private to reach a compromise over new contours for offshore drilling. Much of the haggling has been over the New Jersey-size tract, known as Lease 181.

At the moment, the chances of a compromise don't look good. But the wrangling provides a glimpse of how U.S. energy policy is made -- or isn't made -- when Congress and the White House try to balance big business interests, political supporters, environmental concerns and national energy needs.

The fight has made some strange bedfellows. President Bush, though seen as friendly to oil and gas interests, has done little to break the impasse, in deference to his brother Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) and Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who have opposed offshore drilling, citing the need to protect the state's tourism industry from the harm a spill would do.

That has angered conservative Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.), who together with liberal Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) tried to strike the words "natural gas" from the moratorium, which would allow natural-gas wells within three miles of U.S. coasts. Without the support of either party's leadership, this political odd couple came within a handful of votes of prevailing. Now the two are seeking support to allow drilling at least 20 miles from shore, far enough to be out of sight of beach-going tourists.

Each of the lawmakers has taken on his own party. Peterson, who tried and failed to win Bush's support during a flight last summer on Air Force One, says the president argued that the most "doable" cure for tight-natural gas markets was to build more terminals for liquefied-natural-gas imports -- the opposite of what Bush argues when he cites foreign dependence as a reason for opening the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve in Alaska.

"I'm surprised because we have two oil people at the top," Peterson said of the administration. "Yet two states are controlling the most important part of our energy policy," he said of Florida and California.

In the Democratic camp, Abercrombie has criticized what he calls an "environmental Taliban" for opposing offshore natural-gas drilling, and 38 House Democrats defied their minority leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and voted in May to keep the Peterson-Abercrombie change in the moratorium.

"I said, 'Nancy, you're wrong on this,' " Abercrombie said of a conversation he had with Pelosi. "I think that the Democratic party should get out in front on this issue instead of standing off to the side."

Florida's senators, Republican Martinez and Democrat Bill Nelson, have teamed up to guard against drilling that they say could mar the shorelines. They have their own proposal to extend the presidential drilling ban on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts until 2020, carve out a slice of Lease 181 to allow some new drilling there, have the federal government buy back other leases closer to Florida's west coast, and permanently ban drilling within 150 miles of Florida's shores.

Some drilling advocates note that Cuba recently decided to allow drilling in its waters, just 50 miles from the tip of Florida, closer than prime U.S. drilling prospects that fall under the moratorium.

But Nelson and Martinez have enlisted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who wrote a letter in November asserting that the Gulf of Mexico from the west coast of Florida all the way into Lease 181 are essential for military training. "In those areas . . . drilling structures and associated development would be incompatible with military activities, such as missile flights, low-flying drone aircraft, weapons testing and training," Rumsfeld wrote to Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Oil and gas companies have long eyed the Outer Continental Shelf. The Interior Department's Minerals Management Service estimates that the OCS holds 420 trillion cubic feet of undiscovered natural gas, which Anadarko Petroleum Corp.'s exploration manager for the Gulf of Mexico, Stuart Strife, notes is enough to heat every home in the United States for the next 80 years. In the past, Strife notes, the MMS estimates of potential reserves have been, if anything, too conservative.

That's why Anadarko bet on the portion of Lease 181 that was sold in 2001, offering more than a third of the $341 million worth of winning bids. It has drilled, with partners, 10 wells in 8,000 feet of water to reservoirs 10,000 feet below the ocean floor. The company has already found 1 trillion to 2 trillion cubic feet of gas reserves, which travel by pipeline to Louisiana.

Strife says fears of oil spills are overblown. So far Anadarko has only found natural gas, but even if it found oil the industry could handle it well. "People still think back to Santa Barbara in '69 and think that's the state of the industry," Strife says. "The industry has made leaps and bounds since then."

But environmentalists say a single incident can do extensive and possibly irreparable damage to natural habitats. Richard Charter, co-chair of the National OCS Coalition, says, "There is no such thing as a 100 percent failsafe petroleum process."

Despite strong environmental concerns, high natural-gas prices have made the politics of offshore drilling more fluid. Abercrombie has been courting union support, citing job losses to other low-gas-cost countries. Meanwhile, a Quinnipiac

University poll in mid-May showed that Floridians, by 51 percent to 42 percent, favored drilling as close as 100 miles from shore, though 55 percent to 36 percent opposed drilling as little as nine miles from the coast.

"A number of Floridians realize that their state is dependent on natural-gas supplies," said Donna Harman, vice president of congressional affairs for the American Forest and Paper Association. "Some of their members are saying that they need to look at this in a more rational way."

But as with so much else in Congress, the issue is fractious. Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.) has a proposal that would erase the moratorium but force states to petition for continued drilling bans off their shores. Jindal appealed to lawmakers who favor more power for states, but other lawmakers see a grab for power and money by Louisiana. His proposal would funnel to the states 75 percent of royalties from wells within 12 miles of shore and 50 percent from those further out. Under current law, that money belongs to the federal government.

The best chances for a deal rest with Sens. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) and Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M), who want to open up almost all of Lease 181 while leaving the moratorium on other U.S. waters largely intact. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has also been involved in talks with Florida senators over whether to trade the opening of more offshore territory for the extension of the wider moratorium past 2012.

In the House, Reps. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) and Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.) have been seeking compromises. But it isn't clear whether Pombo will pursue the issue if he faces a tough reelection contest. The Sierra Club has run ads citing oil and gas company campaign contributions to Pombo, who also favors opening up the Arctic wildlife reserve. Last fall, Pombo had floated a plan similar to Jindal's but with a buffer zone for Florida's coasts.

Talking to reporters last week, Jeb Bush hinted that he might be ready to make a deal. "We're kind of on the sideline waiting for a partner to engage with," he said. He said Pombo's proposal was "very fair" and added, "I think people now regret not taking it in the Florida delegation." The governor said, "A degree of certainty for the protection of our coastline is what we're looking for."

Yet Charter says Americans are sensitive about their beaches and predicts that election-year attempts to lift the moratorium will turn out to be "much ado about nothing."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Officials Seeking Source Of Lethal Heroin Mixture (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO, June 14 — The police and health authorities are struggling to track down the source of a doctored, intensely powerful heroin that has killed at least 130 people in and around Chicago and Detroit and sent hundreds more to hospitals in cities from St. Louis to Philadelphia.

In the labyrinthine and often paranoid world of illicit drugs, tales of killer heroin have come and gone before. But this time is different, law enforcement and health officials say.

The pattern of cases is broader, involving many markets at once, suggesting, they say, a larger and more sophisticated distribution network. The additive has been traced to laboratories in Mexico, which has traditionally supplied much of the Midwest heroin, raising fears that other hybrid pharmaceutical street drugs might emerge.

"The biggest new thing is the high mortality rate," said Dr. Carl Schmidt, the chief medical examiner for Wayne County, Mich., which includes Detroit and suburbs. The county has had more than 70 deaths since September related to the altered heroin mixture, Dr. Schmidt said, including those of three people found together in a car in April. The three were overcome so quickly that no one could get out to summon help.

The additive, called fentanyl, was developed as a commercial painkiller in the 1960's and surfaced as street-drug compound in the mid-80's on the West Coast, where it killed perhaps 100 people over as many as eight years. It made waves again in the early 90's in the New York metropolitan region, where it killed dozens of people who bought fentanyl-laced heroin under the street brand Tango and Cash.

Fentanyl, which is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine, is not a contaminant or filler, drug experts say, but rather a deliberately introduced enhancement intended to improve the product. It kills by shutting down a victim's respiratory system when too much is taken, an easy mistake because of the potency.

Much has changed in the drug world since fentanyl first became a killer. In many parts of the country, the use of synthetic, laboratory-produced drugs like methamphetamine, or meth, has surged. A sharp increase in prescriptions for narcotics, depressants and stimulants has also contributed to an increase in drugs diverted for illicit use and has created drug users familiar with pharmaceuticals, according to a report this year by the National Drug Intelligence Center, a unit of the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0034454

And a national crackdown on illegal drug laboratories in the United States has recently pushed more meth production to Mexico, where local police officers and federal Drug Enforcement Administration officials say they think Chicago's fentanyl was produced.

The Chicago police superintendent, Philip J. Cline, said in an interview that his officers working with the D.E.A. were looking for connections among clusters of overdose cases and then trying to track back from there through undercover purchases, arrests and laboratory tests to understand the pipeline.

"Everybody is looking for a signature," Superintendent Cline said. "Is it the same here as in Philly? We're not sure on that yet."

Superintendent Cline said city officials had been frustrated because warnings appeared to have partly backfired. Drug dealers were even seen waving the fliers the city distributed this year, advertising that they were selling the very thing the police were so worried about.

"The biggest problem is that we have willing victims," he said.

One former heroin user, Justin Sorci, said the wave of deaths had given him a mission, to warn people he knows are still using.

"The thinking of an addict is that 'I won't be the one,' " said Mr. Sorci, 27, who went on Wednesday morning to a mobile treatment van on the North Side of Chicago to receive the methadone tablets that blunt his craving for heroin. "People who are still out there — I'm warning them to be careful."

Fentanyl's re-emergence has revived old fears among some experts that underworld chemists could one day learn to manipulate opiate molecules to produce superdrugs of devastating malevolence — more addictive or corrosive to society than heroin, alcohol or cocaine at their worst. Others say the wave of deaths proves that such a formula has not been perfected, since the fentanyl makers are killing off their own customers.

But people who study the market say more laboratory-produced drugs, of whatever quality, are probably inevitable because the process is cheaper than harvesting and transporting agricultural drugs and can be done anywhere.

"It is becoming easier to manufacture mind-altering substances, and the Internet has spread that knowledge all over the world," said Martin Y. Iguchi, a professor of public health at the University of California, Los Angeles, who was running a drug treatment clinic in New Jersey when the Tango and Cash cases unfolded in the 90's. "That's got to have an impact longer term."

But drug treatment workers and addicts have a tool against overdoses that was not widely available in the past, an injectable medicine called naloxone or narcan that can reverse respiratory failure.

The Chicago Recovery Alliance, a group that works to improve the health of intravenous drug users and runs the methadone van where Mr. Sorci stopped, pioneered the effort to get naloxone into the hands of the city's drug users in 1999. Baltimore, San Francisco and other cities now have anti-overdose programs using the medication, as well.

The group's medical director, Dr. Sarz Maxwell, said she knew of at least five people in Chicago who had stopped breathing after using heroin-fentanyl and were saved by friends.

"We even heard of a couple of complete strangers who found somebody, had naloxone and saved a life," Dr. Maxwell said.

One heroin user, Sean H., 20, who was visiting the treatment van and spoke only on the condition that his last name not be used, said a friend died six weeks ago from a fentanyl-related overdose. The man, 24, specifically sought out fentanyl, Sean said, and had just recovered from one overdose. His body was found on a train.

Sean says he and his brother, who also uses heroin, are more careful now and always have naloxone on hand when they take drugs, though he thinks that none of the heroin they have taken has contained the additive. But the talk about the intensity of the fentanyl experience has intrigued him, he said.

"From an addict's point of view," he said, "that intensity is what you want."

Deadly Heroin Focus Of DEA's Chicago Conference (WMAQ)

WMAQ-TV, June 14, 2006

CHICAGO -- More than 60 deaths in the Chicago area -- and dozens more around the country -- are blamed on heroin that has been tainted with a deadly ingredient.

Chicago police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration on Wednesday began a two-day conference on the tainted heroin, which is now showing up around the country.

Two young men die after allegedly consuming tainted heroin in this South side parking lot…

Justin Jobgen and Josh Serpliss were the eleventh and twelfth victims of what authorities now say are a string of more than 60 deaths attributed to a mixture of heroin and the prescription pain killer Fentanyl.

DOJ_NMG_0034455

"Our focus is the influx of Fentanyl-laced heroin that has recently plagued our city," said Frank Limon, with the Chicago Police Department.

Timothy Ogden, special agent in charge with the DEA, said there was a "large spike" in drug overdoses in cities across the country.

The Fentanyl-laced heroin goes by the street name "drop dead" and has been seen on Chicago's West and South sides. Law-enforcement officials want to know where it is coming from and who is bringing it.

Ironically, law enforcement success may also play a factor in the drug's arrival, NBC5's Charlie Wojciechowski reported. Experts say getting drugs and dealers off the streets essentially destabilizes the drug markets.

"When the drug markets are destabilized through the police enforcement of the law, then customers need a new place to go," said Dan Bigg, with the Chicago Recovery Alliance.

Bigg has been an addictions counselor for the last 25 years. His Chicago Recovery Alliance works to improve the health of drug users and those suffering from AIDS and HIV.

Bigg said the Fentanyl-laced heroin provides cost-conscious drug users with more perceived bang for their buck.

"What Fentanyl does is it renders people unconscious. It renders people dead," Bigg said.

One possible source of the tainted heroin is Mexico. Last week, Mexican police raided an illegal Fentanyl lab in the city of Toluca. Five people, including the alleged chemist, were arrested.

Killer Drug Overlooked, Until Flurry Of Deaths (DN)

By Brad Heath

Detroit News, June 15, 2006

TAYLOR -- Their roommate found them after midnight, dead together in bed.

When the police arrived at the tiny bungalow in a middle-class Taylor neighborhood, they found pills on the bedroom floor. Their roommate told them the man and woman, both 31 years old, were drug users. The medical examiner suspected they had committed suicide that January day because overdose victims almost always die alone.

Weeks later, toxicology tests showed the pair had taken heroin and the painkiller fentanyl.

Their bodies were among the first clues to the escalating damage being inflicted in Wayne County by fentanyl-laced drugs. But for months, police and health officials were unable to make sense of a growing scattering of evidence -- drug users dying suddenly and in groups, growing stacks of toxicology reports mentioning the drug, and a warning from federal agents dating back to November that lethal quantities had been found on the street.

But it wasn't until 12 people died from apparent drug overdoses May 18 and 19 that officials realized the extent of the problem, officials said in interviews. The clues became clear: Fentanyl was most likely to blame.

"People think it's easy to look at the crystal ball and see what's in there," said Dr. Carl Schmidt, Wayne County's chief medical examiner. "I guess it's easy to look. But it's discerning what's in there that's the hard part."

Authorities now suspect the painkiller, mixed with heroin or cocaine, is responsible for a sudden increase in overdose deaths; the toll is 79 deaths in Wayne County over the past four weeks. The drug has been linked to another 130 deaths since January 2005.

Since April, cities in at least eight other states have similarly reported a sudden surge in overdoses now the subject of a nationwide investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and police departments from Philadelphia to Chicago.

But for months, as fentanyl-related deaths accumulated, authorities in Detroit said, some of the clues that could have alerted them earlier to the growing toll were obscured by the regular toll of drug deaths in the county, and by testing limitations that kept them from quickly linking any of the deaths to the lethal mixture.

By the time Wayne County issued its May 19 alert, the number of fentanyl-linked deaths had been increasing since November -- a trend that did not become apparent until months later.

Extent of problem hidden

At first, the corpses came one at a time, collected from suburban bedrooms, inner-city drug houses and emergency rooms where friends dumped them from moving cars. The extent of the problem remained hidden behind overall overdose numbers that fluctuate wildly from month to month: The number of deaths ultimately linked to fentanyl increased from 18 to 22 between February and March, but the total number of overdose deaths dropped from 52 to 49.

Adding to the difficulty, Schmidt said, are toxicology tests that can take as long as six weeks to complete because the county typically stores samples and tests them in batches to save money. The result is that it takes at least a month for investigators to know what blend of drugs a person had taken before they died -- and even then, most drug users have taken so many it's almost impossible to say which killed them.

DOJ_NMG_0034456

On top of that, Wayne County has no systematic way to track toxicology results to determine whether a particular drug is killing more people. Instead, officials review pending cases at a weekly meeting. Schmidt said he began seeing fentanyl more often in toxicology results in February, but that there was not enough evidence to think the deaths amounted to a broader health threat. He said the tests typically showed only that people had taken fentanyl before they died, not that the painkiller had killed them. Most had also taken other potentially lethal drugs.

Even today, they can't say with certainty that fentanyl is to blame. Authorities won't know that until they get the results of toxicology tests. But Schmidt said that as soon as he saw overdose deaths spike in May, he suspected the drug's involvement. By then, it had been discovered in the man and woman found dead in Taylor in January, and had been detected in three other people who died together in a car in Detroit. Those cases, he said, offered a good indication that fentanyl was capable of causing such clusters of deaths.

County Executive Robert Ficano said there was little debate about what to do next: County officials summoned television cameras and sounded an alarm about the tainted drugs. Drug treatment workers -- even recovering addicts -- worked parts of Detroit known to be drug havens to warn about the dangers.

Did cocktail disappear?

The daily death toll from overdoses has since dropped to two or three a day, numbers that were typical for the county before fentanyl surfaced. Public health officials have said it is too soon to know whether that means the lethal cocktail has disappeared from Detroit, though nationwide the drug has vanished suddenly from the streets of several cities.

"It pops up, and then it just goes away," DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said.

State and county officials said they generally are pleased with the county's response. Ficano said health officials made a "reliable and quick determination" of what was going on.

Others said that while they were satisfied with the county's response, they'll review the case to see whether similar cases could be detected more quickly in the future. "We'll review this situation -- I think all parties involved will -- and make any adjustments we need to," said Dr. Dean Sienko, acting chief medical executive of the state Department of Community Health. There were earlier warnings, too. In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with "potentially lethal" levels of fentanyl. The Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, Schmidt said. He said the alert did not lead them to suspect that the fentanyl was causing more people to die from overdoses, because the total number of deaths was largely unchanged.

In interviews, police, medical examiners and health officials in other cities afflicted by fentanyl said they too discovered the problem only when the number of overdoses -- fatal or not -- shot up suddenly.

In Harrisburg, Pa., officials sounded the alarm the day after police reported three heroin overdoses -- none of them fatal -- in one night. "Normally we're lucky if we see one a month," city spokesman Randy King said. In Camden, N.J., outside Philadelphia, police knew there was a problem after three people overdosed in a day. In Chicago, officials said they knew there was a problem when firefighters saw a surge in ambulance runs linked to drug overdoses.

Most of those cities don't know exactly how many people died from fentanyl because most medical examiners don't regularly test for it. Chicago's medical examiner has traced deaths going back at least six months; in Detroit, officials documented more than 130 deaths linked to fentanyl between January 2005 and April.

Detroit police and firefighters said they saw no such increase here. Hospitals said they had not treated anyone for fentanyl overdoses -- though most typically do not test for the drug -- and poison control centers said they had seen no increase in calls linked to the drug.

Instead, the problem surfaced in the morgue.

"You know there are a lot more people who are using this stuff who are alive than end up dying," Schmidt said. He said the best way to quickly detect such outbreaks in the future is in patients who use them and survive.

More Bad Heroin (WPVI)

By Dann Cuellar

WPVI-TV, June 14, 2006

Agents Cracking Down - Looking For Sources

CHESTER, PA - June 14, 2006 - There were a number of developments Wednesday in the growing problem of bad heroin on the streets.

First, Chester authorities confirmed what they had suspected, seven overdose cases within a 15-hour period in the city, all linked to heroin spiked with the powerful painkiller fentanyl.

Meanwhile members of a major task force including agents from Philadelphia and New Jersey met in Chicago Wednesday. They now believe the stuff is coming from a lab in Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0034457

The fentanyl-laced heroin has killed more than 100 people in 8 states, including 28 in Philadelphia, at least 20 in New Jersey, and more than a dozen in Delaware. Fentanyl is more that 80 times more potent than morphine and it inhibits breathing.

In an effort to combat the crisis, DEA agents from around this area met with taskforce counterparts in Chicago to determine where the stuff was coming from.

They now believe the primary source was an illegal lab near the western city of Guadalajara, Mexico. It was raided by U.S. and Mexican agents recently. Among those arrested was the man believed to be the chemist. Authorities say the fentanyl-laced heroin is still being sold by dealers looking for a competitive edge.

The undercover strike force continues to gather intelligence. Officials expect to make more arrests in this ongoing criminal investigation.

Physician Gets Life For Drug Deaths (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 15, 2006

He overprescribed painkillers and 2 died

A Bath Township physician was sentenced to life in prison Friday because the massive doses of painkillers he prescribed led to the deaths of two patients.

Dr. Jorge Martinez's conviction under a statute punishing health-care fraud resulting in death was the first in the country, as was his life sentence, U.S. Attorney Greg White said.

Martinez remained adamant in federal court in Cleveland that he did the best he could to treat desperate patients whose lives were consumed by chronic pain. Patients often came to his clinics in Parma and Boardman wailing in pain, he said.

"There was nothing else but to numb those nerves," Martinez said. "The responsibility I had was to treat the patient."

But U.S. District Judge Donald Nugent told Martinez his prescriptions of OxyContin, Zoloft and Valium caused more harm than good.

"People came to you in desperation," Nugent said. "You continued to prescribe medication that would continue that downward spiral."

The packed courtroom erupted in applause when Nugent announced the sentence. Relatives of the two dead men, John "Jack" Lancaster and Blair Knight, wiped tears and hugged prosecutors.

In January, after a five-week trial, a jury convicted Martinez of 56 charges, including health care fraud resulting in death, health care fraud and distribution of a controlled substance.

Martinez prescribed painkillers only after patients agreed to receive injections to treat pain, Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Betzer said. Martinez could then bill Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private insurers for the injections.

Martinez submitted paperwork claiming he routinely saw more than 100 patients a day from 1998 through 2004, prosecutors said.

He gave patients only cursory exams but billed insurers for sophisticated treatment, prosecutors said. He submitted $60 million in fraudulent claims to insurers and received payment on about $12 million - half of which came from the BWC.

Some of the 2,500 patients Martinez saw became addicted to the painkillers he prescribed. Martinez ignored the symptoms and continued prescribing more.

"The defendant pumped people full of pills, jabbed them with needles and lied to insurers solely to get rich," Assistant U.S. Attorney Virginia Hearey said. "And people died."

Jurors ruled that in the cases of Lancaster, 42, of Parma Heights, and Knight, 35, of Ravenna, those prescriptions contributed to their deaths.

Knight's brother was relieved by Nugent's sentence.

"I'm thankful he's gone for life," Chuck Knight said of Martinez. "I'm glad he can't hurt anyone else."

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

mtobin@plaind.com, 216-999-4128

Doctor Gets Life Sentence In Deaths Of Two Patients (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

CLEVELAND - A doctor was sentenced to life in prison Friday for committing health care fraud that resulted in the deaths of two patients.

Jorge Martinez is the first to be convicted under the health care fraud resulting in death statute passed in 1996, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in Cleveland.

DOJ_NMG_0034458

Martinez, 54, of Bath Township, was convicted in January of 56 counts, including drug distribution and mail, wire and health care fraud for prescribing unnecessary drugs for patients suffering from chronic pain.

Prosecutors say Martinez often prescribed medication such as OxyContin, Zoloft and Valium to people already hooked on drugs. He rarely gave a prescription until after the patient agreed to receive injections to treat pain.

He then billed Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private health insurance plans for the injections.

Martinez contended his clinics in Lorain, Parma and Boardman in northeast Ohio offered people relief from chronic pain.

John "Jack" Lancaster, 42, of Parma Heights, and Blair Knight, 35, of Ravenna, died while under Martinez's care.

On Sept. 5, 2001, Lancaster fell unconscious in Martinez's office for several hours after he received two injections of Zoloft. He overdosed on multiple drugs two days later and died on Sept. 13, 2001.

Martinez submitted $60 million in fraudulent claims to Medicare, Medicaid, the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation and private health insurance plans and was paid more than $12 million. More than $7 million has been recovered.

U.S. District Judge Donald Nugent will hold a hearing in August to determine how the money is divided among the victims and government agencies.

Drugs Again Found In Home Depot Cabinets (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

SOUTHWICK — For the fifth time in a week, a stash of drugs was found in a cabinet purchased at a Home Depot store in Massachusetts.

A plumber in Southwick discovered 40 pounds of marijuana and 3 kilograms of cocaine stashed in a bathroom vanity he'd purchased at a Home Depot in Chicopee for a home renovation.

Southwick Police Lt. David Ricardi said a second stash was found at the Chicopee store and at least two more were discovered at a Tewksbury Home Depot. Police found more drugs in a fifth cabinet, but Ricardi would not say where or when it was discovered.

One of the Tewksbury stashes was discovered June 8 after a homeowner brought home a cabinet and found 50 pounds of marijuana.

"It's a smuggling operation gone bad," Ricardi said. "Somebody owes some money."

Tony Pettigrew, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration, confirmed yesterday that his agency was investigating, but declined further comment.

A statement from Atlanta-based Home Depot said the company was cooperating with investigators. The company declined further comment.

Ricardi said the plumber discovered the drugs in Southwick on Monday after he bought the vanity. The man noticed the vanity top hadn't been included in the package and instead found two plastic bags containing the drugs stuffed inside. Ricardi said the drugs were worth $200,000.

Customer Discovered Stash In Vanity From Home Depot (BMI)

By Margaret Smith And Linda Kush

Billerica Minuteman, June 15, 2006

A Billerica resident getting ready to install a new vanity and sink he bought at Home Depot in Tewksbury found 50 pounds of marijuana in the package, Police Sgt. Roy Frost said.

Frost said the resident, whose name was not given, reported the discovery June 8, after he purchased a two-piece vanity and sink and had a plumber assist in the installation.

"He found that it contained, instead of the sink top, about 50 pounds of marijuana," said Frost, adding that the find could fetch as much as $100,000 on the street.

Frost said Billerica and Tewksbury police are working with Home Depot, along with the federal Drug Enforcement Agency. Frost said investigators hope to determine whether the marijuana find is linked to a larger distribution problem, with distributors knowingly or unknowingly enlisted to help transport drugs large distances - a practice known as "muling."

"There is no evidence to suggest that there was a recipient in the Tewksbury or Billerica area. However, there is no evidence to suggest there wasn't," Frost said.

Frost added, "This is very unusual, but not an unusual situation in the broader scope of things. Larger corporations doing shipping nationally and internationally will the subject of muling, whether they know it or not."

Frost said "progress is being made" in determining the marijuana's origin, but decline to comment as the investigation is ongoing.

DOJ_NMG_0034459

A Home Depot spokesman confirmed the customer's discovery of the marijuana and believes the customer discovered the marijuana after bringing the vanity home.

"We are working with the local authorities in their ongoing investigation, just making sure they have the information they need," said Yancy Casey, a spokesman for the Home Depot corporate office in Atlanta.

A Drug Enforcement Agency official declined to comment on the case.

Drug Caches Found In Home Depot Vanities (CNN)

CNN, June 14, 2006

(CNN) -- Large quantities of drugs were found inside merchandise from at least two Home Depot stores in Massachusetts, and authorities are investigating, police said Wednesday.

A contractor late last week discovered two 50-pound "bricks" of marijuana wrapped in plastic bags inside a bathroom vanity he had purchased at a Home Depot store in Tewksbury, said Chief of Detectives Lt. Dennis Peterson.

The estimated street value of the marijuana is around $145,000, Peterson said. (Watch as do-it-yourself goes to pot -- 1:30)

Similar incidents have occurred in other parts of the state.

A plumber purchased a vanity in western Massachusetts on Monday in which he later found 3 kilograms of cocaine and around 40 pounds of marijuana, with a total estimated street value of $250,000, according to the Southwick Police Department.

Southwick Police Lt. David A. Ricardi said the item was purchased at "a local hardware store" but would not confirm it came from The Home Depot.

According to Peterson, a third individual discovered large quantities of illegal drugs inside Home Depot merchandise.

Peterson would not provide the details of that incident but said it was part of the overall investigation and that Tewksbury police were working with their Southwick counterparts and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Tewksbury police and DEA officials conducted a search Tuesday of about 12 Home Depot stores statewide and found other bathroom vanities that contained drugs, Peterson said. He would not elaborate on how many drug caches were discovered in the search.

In each incident being investigated by Tewksbury Police, all of the merchandise boxes originated from a Texas location and were distributed through one Massachusetts warehouse, Peterson said.

"I'm sure the packages were being shipped to the distribution center and someone was supposed to intercept them," Peterson said. "So that person [who was supposed to intercept the packages] either wasn't on duty that day or the packages were marked wrong."

The Southwick and Tewksbury Police Departments both said The Home Depot was cooperating fully with their investigations, and no one employed by the company is a suspect at this time.

Both departments also said none of the customers who purchased the vanities that contained drugs are suspects.

In a written statement, The Home Depot said, "The company is cooperating with authorities as they investigate this matter, and we will support law enforcement in any way possible to help bring those responsible to justice."

Drugs Found In Home Depot Merchandise (UPI)

United Press International, June 15, 2006

TEWKSBURY, Mass. (UPI) -- Massachusetts police are trying to determine how two 50-pound bricks of marijuana wound up in merchandise at two Home Depot stores.

The value of the drug cache was estimated at $145,000.

CNN reports the latest find was at Home Depots in Tewksbury and Chief of Detectives Lt. Dennis Peterson said similar finds have been made elsewhere in the state.

Peterson said a plumber found three kilograms of cocaine and 40 pounds of marijuana in a vanity he bought in Southwick. Peterson said a third individual found a large quantity of drugs inside Home Depot merchandise.

State and federal drug agents searched a dozen Home Depots Tuesday. Peterson said drugs were found in other merchandise but would not elaborate. The boxes containing the merchandise originated from Texas, Peterson said.

Home Depot said it was cooperating fully with investigators.

Martin's Sentence Is 10 Years (BNNJ)

By Sean C. Mccullen, Staff Writer

Bridgeton News (NJ), June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034460

CAMDEN -- A U.S. District Court judge on Tuesday sentenced Kamal Martin, the reputed leader of Bridgeton street gang 30 Deep, to 10 years in federal prison on a drug-trafficking charge, according to authorities.

Martin, 28, was arrested July 21, 2005, at the Cumberland County Jail, where he was serving a 20-day sentence for driving with a suspended license, and charged federally with distributing and possessing with intent to distribute more than five grams of crack cocaine.

He pleaded guilty to distributing a significant amount of crack cocaine on several dates in early 2005 on Jan. 12. He and his attorney in the matter, Assistant Federal Public Defender Christopher O'Malley, had approved the plea deal last November.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Kugler sentenced Martin Tuesday to 10 years in prison, with the prison term to be followed by five years of supervised release, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson.

The judge also imposed a $250,000 fine against Martin, Richardson said.

Bridgeton Police hope Martin's sentence on the drug charge will serve as a deterrent to those planning future gang-related and drug-dealing activity in the city.

"I hope this sentence sends a message to anyone who is involved or contemplating getting involved in gang activity, in drug distribution or in organized or random violent acts," Police Chief Jeff Wentz said.

Wentz commended the work of his department, the FBI, the DEA and the Cumberland County Narcotics Task Force in building the case against Martin.

Martin was facing up to 40 years in prison on the charge, according to Bridgeton Det. Lt. Michael Gaimari, but his cooperation with local, state and federal authorities on several investigations, including homicides and other gang-related crimes, resulted in the shorter sentence.

The minimum sentence for the crack cocaine distribution charge Martin faced is five years, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office,.

However, Greg Reinert, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Camden, had said in January that Martin likely was facing 15 to 20 years in prison since he was deemed to be a "career offender" based on prior convictions for terroristic threats and aggravated assault with a deadly weapon.

As part of his cooperation, Martin also turned over a semi-automatic machine gun, according to Gaimari.

Gaimari, who attended Tuesday's sentencing with Bridgeton Det. Rick Pierce, said while he was pleased to see Martin sentenced to time in prison, it was distressing to hear what Martin's daughter said to her father in the Camden courtroom.

"What was sad was hearing (Martin's) small child telling (him) that she loved him as they were leading him away," Gaimari said. "Not only do these individuals destroy their own lives when they get involved in this type of activity, they fail to realize how it affects friends and families.

"It's a no-win situation for everyone involved, but we, along with federal, state and county authorities, are committed to going after every single person involved in these activities with the same vengeance as we pursued Mr. Martin."

Martin still is facing a handgun possession charge in connection with the Aug. 31, 2003, shoot-out at the Samuel J. Roberts Elks Lodge on South Avenue in Bridgeton, in which two men were slain, and still is suspected of being involved in the April 30, 2004, killing of 24-year-old Stephen Jackson on Colfax Street.

Gaimari expressed gratitude for the work of the following individuals and agencies in building and working on the case against Martin: the U.S. Attorney's Office; FBI Special Agent James Lisle; DEA Special Agent James Kerrigan; county narcotics task force Lt. Rosemary Parks; and Bridgeton detectives, especially Pierce for targeting Martin for more than a year.

Secretary In LaWall's Office Quits, Was Arrested (ADS)

By Kim Smith

Arizona Daily Star, June 14, 2006

A Pima County Attorney's Office secretary who was arrested by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency in May has resigned.

Erlinda Alegria-Perez submit-ted her resignation letter Tuesday afternoon, effective immediately. She had worked as a legal secretary in the Pima County Attorney's Office since 1991 and has been on paid administrative leave since May 4.

Perez and her husband, Abraham, were indicted and arrested as the result of a yearlong DEA investigation that began in Harrisburg, Pa.

According to DEA officials, the couple, along with at least five others from Tucson, California and Pennsylvania, conspired to transport marijuana to Pennsylvania.

A pre-action meeting to discuss her side of the story had been scheduled for 1 p.m. Tuesday, but she left a message asking for it to be postponed until today.

Following the meeting, Perez could have been disciplined, at which point she could have resigned, accepted her punishment or appealed to the Merit Commission, but she opted to resign without going through the meeting.

By tendering her resignation, Perez waived her right to the pre-action meeting.

In her letter, Perez thanked County Attorney Barbara LaWall for the opportunity to serve the citizens of Pima County.

"The knowledge and experience I take with me is priceless," Perez wrote.

Officer Quits Amid Inquiry: Dallas: She Was On Leave For Dating Drug Suspect; More Firings Likely Today (DMN)

Dallas Morning News, June 15, 2006

One troubled Dallas officer's name won't be on the short list as Police Chief David Kunkle prepares for his next round of firings.

Officer Kesha Thomas abruptly resigned Wednesday, a day before it was widely expected that she would be fired for her relationship with an Arkansas man accused of dealing drugs.

In the last two weeks, Chief Kunkle has fired nine officers for misconduct as part of a housecleaning aimed at changing the culture of his nearly 3,000-member department. As many as four firings are expected today.

Ms. Thomas' story illustrates the challenge the chief faces. She was on paid leave for about 10 months after police officials were informed of her relationship with Fred Green, who faces federal charges of drug trafficking in Arkansas.

Another officer, Roshonda Parker, is also being investigated, accused of associating with Mr. Green. She remains on paid administrative leave, and Chief Kunkle may decide her fate today.

"What the heck has taken so long?" said James Whalen, Officer Parker's attorney. "Either it's clear-cut or it's not."

Mr. Whalen said Officer Parker did not associate with Mr. Green.

Ms. Thomas' attorney said she became frustrated with the slow pace of the investigation and resigned because she found out about the status of her case through media reports.

"She didn't really think that was fair and didn't want to continue to work for somebody that treats her that way," said the attorney, Phil Burleson Jr.

Mr. Burleson said Ms. Thomas cooperated with investigators.

"When she learned of the extent of [the trouble Mr. Green was in], that's when she broke it off," he said of the relationship.

In May 2005, state troopers seized 13 kilograms (about 29 pounds) of cocaine that investigators linked to Mr. Green, 31. Federal agents soon learned through phone records of Ms. Thomas' relationship with Mr. Green.

Ms. Thomas told federal agents that Officer Parker introduced them in the spring of 2004. Mr. Green had already served prison time on a felony drug conviction.

Ms. Thomas and Mr. Green, who was living in Arkansas and owned two cellphone stores, struck up a long-distance romance.

Police and Drug Enforcement Administration records state that Ms. Thomas once saw a gun in Mr. Green's trunk and that he had asked her to wire money for him several times, but that she didn't question either of those things.

Ms. Thomas told investigators that in mid-2004, Mr. Green told her he had a warrant out for his arrest. She said he told her it was a case of mistaken identity.

"Her side of the story is that she had no indication that the individual she was dating had a criminal problem," Mr. Burleson said. "She thought he was a decent guy."

Department rules prohibit officers from associating with felons and people involved in criminal activity.

Ms. Thomas initially told investigators she stopped dating Mr. Green after she confirmed that he was wanted by authorities by using her patrol car computer in mid-2004 to check his record. She said she told him he needed to take care of the warrant.

Click here to learn more about e911 and its impact on VoIP

Click Here to Learn How You Can Profit from IP Communications. Live, in Person at INTERNET TELEPHONY Conference & EXPO West 2006 in San Diego.

See Live Demos of Today's Most Useful Enterprise and Service Provider IP Solutions at the World's Only VoIP Demo Event. August 8-10 in Santa Clara.

Get Your IMS Education from The Expert Team at INTERNET TELEPHONY Magazine and TMCnet. This Fall in San Diego at IMS Expo.

Records show she checked his warrant status four times between November 2004 and June 2005.

Ms. Thomas later admitted that she continued to date Mr. Green.

"I did not take any police action, because I believed this was a personal matter of Mr. Green and since he had hired an attorney, the matter would be resolved," she told investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0034462

Ms. Thomas also told investigators that she allowed Mr. Green to give her money after she knew about the warrant. His gifts included $6,000 for a down payment on a house.

Officer Parker told investigators that she'd had an on-again, off-again relationship with Mr. Green's cousin and that she'd known Mr. Green since her days at the University of Arkansas at Pine Bluff in the mid-'90s.

She told investigators that while in college, she once walked into a room in Mr. Green's house and saw a bale of marijuana. She said she closed the door, walked outside and didn't ask questions. She also said Mr. Green once gave her $400 for a car payment after she became a police officer.

Officer Parker said she last saw Mr. Green at Ms. Thomas' home outside of Dallas in the winter of 2004. She'd also been present once when Ms. Thomas checked him on her squad car computer.

"Parker stated she did not arrest Green on this occasion because she was out of her jurisdiction, and she did not contact the local police because she did not want to be involved," according to DEA records of the interview.

Mr. Whalen, Officer Parker's attorney, said his client has been drawn into the investigation unfairly. "Roshonda did not associate with Fred Green," Mr. Whalen said. "Kesha was the one who ran him on the computer."

Officer Parker, hired in 1999, graduated last in her class of 43 recruits. She has been disciplined repeatedly for being tardy to work and missing court dates. She also received a 15-day suspension for a 2003 incident in Cedar Hill in which she hit an ex-boyfriend's car with a tire iron.

In July 2005, U.S. marshals arrested Mr. Green, who was then living in DeSoto. They seized 450 grams (1 pound) of crack cocaine, 180 grams (0.4 pounds) of methamphetamine, $13,000 in cash and several weapons.

Federal investigators notified Dallas police on Aug. 10 of his connections to the officers, who were soon placed on administrative leave.

The slow pace of such investigations has been frustrating to top brass at the department, where Chief Kunkle is approaching the end of his second year on the job. The chief said he hopes the resignation is a signal that the rank and file are beginning to get the message.

"We have to change the environment where people believe that they don't have to follow the rules," Chief Kunkle said. "I'm going to try to make sure that they do it, because they have to."

Meth Myth Busted? Study Says Drug Rarely Used (AP)

AP, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A group that advocates non-prison punishment for drug criminals says methamphetamine use is not a raging epidemic.

The Sentencing Project issued a report that says meth – while dangerous -- is really among the least commonly used drugs. The group also contends usage rates have been stable since 1999, and that fewer teens are taking meth.

The report's author claims reports of meth being an epidemic spreading across the country are "grossly overstated." The report cites overheated rhetoric, unsupported assertions and factual errors about the use of the drug.

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy did not immediately comment on the report.

Study: Meth Use Rare In Most Of The U.S. (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, June 15, 2006

A pouch containing crystalized methamphetamine and a homemade pipe are shown March 21, 2006 in Window Rock, Ariz. An advocacy group says meth use is rare in most of the U.S., not a raging epidemic described by politicians and the news media. (AP Photo/Matt York, FILE)

WASHINGTON -- Methamphetamine use is rare in most of the United States, not the raging epidemic described by politicians and the news media, says a study by an advocacy group.

Meth is a dangerous drug but among the least commonly used, The Sentencing Project policy analyst Ryan King wrote in a report issued Wednesday. Rates of use have been stable since 1999, and among teenagers meth use has dropped, King said.

"The portrayal of methamphetamine in the United States as an epidemic spreading across the country has been grossly overstated," King said. The Sentencing Project is a not-for-profit group that supports alternatives to prison terms for convicted drug users and other criminals.

Overheated rhetoric, unsupported assertions and factual errors about the use of the drug - including frequent, misguided comparisons between meth and crack cocaine - lead to poor decisions about how to spend precious public dollars combating drug addiction, King said.

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy did not immediately comment on the report.

DOJ_NMG_0034463

The report cites statistics compiled by the government to make its case, including a 2004 survey that estimated 583,000 people used meth in the past month, or two-10ths of 1 percent of the U.S. population. Four times as many people use cocaine regularly and 30 times as many use marijuana, King said.

A separate survey of high-school students showed a 36 percent drop in meth use between 2001 and 2005.

The report acknowledged that methamphetamine is more widely used today than it was 10 years ago. Data from the jail populations of a handful of cities on the West Coast also show what King called a "highly localized" problem.

Among men arrested in Phoenix, 38.3 percent tested positive for methamphetamine. Figures for other cities are: Los Angeles, 28.7 percent; Portland, Ore., 25.4; San Diego, 36.2 percent; and San Jose, Calif., 36.9 percent.

But nationally, just 5 percent of men who had been arrested had meth in their systems. By contrast, 30 percent tested positive for cocaine and 44 percent for marijuana, the report said, citing government statistics.

Treatment programs for meth also have been portrayed inaccurately, with news reports suggesting that meth users do not respond as well to treatment as users of other drugs, King said. The Bush administration's recent methamphetamine control strategy also referred to a "common misperception that methamphetamine is so addictive that it is impossible to treat."

Programs in 15 states have had promising results, King said.

"Mischaracterizing the impact of methamphetamine by exaggerating its prevalence and consequences while downplaying its receptivity to treatment succeeds neither as a tool of prevention nor a vehicle of education," he wrote.

King called for a tempered approach to the problem, keeping the focus on local trouble spots and using federal money to beef up treatment programs.

On the Net:

The Sentencing Project: http://www.sentencingproject.org

White House Office of National Drug Control Policy: http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov

NCAA Looks To Keep Drugs Off Diamond In Wake Of MLB Scandals (USAT)

By Steve Wieberg, Usa Today

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Prompted in part by the Major League Baseball scandal, the NCAA is stepping up testing for steroid use in college baseball.

For the first time, all 64 teams in the association's Division I baseball tournament were assured of being tested at regionals this year. The NCAA held out the threat of further screening at last week's super regionals and the College World Series, which opens Friday in Omaha.

More significantly, officials say, the association is expanding its year-round random screening for steroids and masking agents into the summer, focusing first on baseball and football. The first of those tests will be conducted next week.

Ten players — five in both baseball and football — from 22 schools ultimately will be tested. Selected at random, they'll be sought out at home or other summer locations and given no more than 48 hours' notice.

"These guys know they're going to be tested at the championship," says Frank Uryasz, president of the Kansas City, Mo., based National Center for Drug Free Sport, which runs the program for the NCAA.

"What we needed to do was fill the obvious hole in the program, and that was the two or 21/2 months in the summer when they simply knew they weren't going to be drug-tested. To fill that time up with some random, short-notice drug testing, I think, is a huge accomplishment."

The additional testing will cost the NCAA $150,000.

Baseball and football players are among those most likely to admit steroid use — 2.3% in both sports, compared with 1.2% of responding athletes across the board — according to the NCAA's most recent substance-use survey.

Revelations and allegations of the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs in Major League Baseball heightened the concern.

"It did have an impact on the folks who were asking for more testing," said Mary Wilfert, liaison to the association's Committee on Competitive Safeguards and Medical Aspects of Sports.

The NCAA has tested during its baseball championships since 1986, though not continuously.

It previously tested some years at regionals, others at super regionals or the College World Series.

Six randomly selected players from each of the 64 participating teams were screened during regionals this month.

In addition to steroids, testing at NCAA championships targets drugs such as amphetamines, marijuana and other recreational substances.

DOJ_NMG_0034464

Galante Wants Out Of Prison, Back In Business (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- An imprisoned Danbury businessman wants to get out of jail and return to the helm of his trash empire, setting the stage for a court battle over control of southern Connecticut's garbage industry.

James Galante, whose businesses handle about 80 percent of southwestern Connecticut's garbage, was arrested in a Mafia case Friday and ordered held without bail.

A federal judge said Wednesday that she'll reconsider that order and Galante's defense attorneys were preparing to challenge a court order putting federal marshals in charge of his businesses.

"First things first. We've got to get him out," defense attorney Hugh Keefe said. "I can't represent him if he's in Rhode Island and incarcerated. We'll take care of the business thing in due course."

Federal prosecutors say Galante carved out exclusive routes for his companies and paid Genovese crime family boss Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello $120,000 a year for mob muscle to enforce his territories. That meant higher prices for businesses and homeowners, authorities said.

It's a traditional moneymaking scheme for the mob, but unlike New York trash cases involving murders and assaults, no such violence is alleged in Connecticut's case.

Given that fact, Keefe argued in court papers Wednesday that Galante is being treated unfairly. He is the only person among 29 charged being held without bail, his family's bank accounts are frozen and his multimillion-dollar trash conglomerate is being run by federal marshals.

Marshals say they'll eventually turn over operation of Galante's businesses to a professional management company.

"Running the business is where he belongs," said company attorney H. James Pickerstein, who said he will file a motion Thursday regarding the federal takeover.

Prosecutors say Galante is too dangerous to be released. The FBI recorded telephone conversations in which Galante at times talks menacingly about his competitors.

"'What I have to do,' tell him, 'is hurt you,'" Galante was recorded instructing a subordinate during a 2005 dispute with a rival company.

Most of the threats played in court, however, were delivered by subordinates who were released on bail. And Ianniello, the 85-year-old charged as the muscle behind Galante's threats, was also released.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns will hear arguments for Galante's release June 27. He is being held in a Rhode Island detention center that houses federal prisoners from the region.

IMMIGRATION:

2,100 Are Arrested On Immigration Violations (NYT)

By Jennifer 8. Lee And Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

In a nationwide sweep, law enforcement officials have arrested more than 2,100 people in the past three weeks for immigration violations, including 116 in New Jersey and 114 in New York State, the Department of Homeland Security announced yesterday. About a third of those arrested were in California.

The sweep, which started on May 26, was a cooperative effort between local law enforcement agencies and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement branch of the Department of Homeland Security.

"The fugitives captured in this operation threatened public safety in hundreds of neighborhoods and communities around the country," Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, said in a statement.

Those arrested fell into three broad categories: convicted criminals, members of gangs, and fugitives who had violated deportation orders, the authorities said.

Nearly half of those arrested had been convicted of crimes that made them eligible for deportation, including 146 who had committed sexual crimes involving minors. About 350 of those arrested were known to be involved in violent street gangs. About 650 were fugitives who were ignoring or violating deportation orders.

About 800 of those arrested have already been deported.

In Suffolk County, 19 men were arrested because they had been convicted of crimes that made them eligible for deportation, according Dennis Caine, chief of detectives for the Suffolk County Police Department.

DOJ_NMG_0034465

Their names were determined by cross-referencing county lists of convicted sex offenders and known gang members with a federal immigration database. Of those men, 14 were sexual offenders convicted of offenses ranging from endangering the welfare of a child, a misdemeanor, to felony rape, robbery or negligent homicide.

In New Jersey, agents broke up a narcotics ring operating in Plainfield that imported cocaine from Guatemala to members of the Mara Salvatrucha gang and associates, the authorities said.

Agents also arrested 22 suspected members of the Los Cafeteros gang and the Sureno 13 gang in Red Bank. All of the suspected gang members are being held on immigration charges, but many also have criminal records, the authorities said.

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said that at least four people were arrested as late as yesterday morning in New York City. "Border security doesn't stop at the border," he said. "It requires a robust interior enforcement effort."

Most of those arrested in the New York metropolitan area were from Latin American countries, but the nationwide sweep also caught immigrants from Africa, East and Southeast Asia, and Europe.

Sweep Nets Nearly 2,100 Illegal Immigrants (AP)

By Andrew Ryan

AP, June 15, 2006

BOSTON (AP)— A blitz by federal agents during the last three weeks captured nearly 2,100 illegal immigrants across the country in raids targeting child molesters, violent gang members and past deportees who re-entered the country.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials credited the roundup to a network of 35 fugitive apprehension teams.

"This is a massive operation," said Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for immigration enforcement or ICE, which is part of the Department of Homeland Security. "We are watching the country's borders from the inside."

The crackdown, dubbed "Operation Return to Sender," kicked off May 26. An Associated Press reporter and photographer accompanied a fugitive task force as it made raids Tuesday night and early Wednesday.

A swarm of immigration agents had sped silently, headlights off, down a Boston side street and surrounded an apartment house.

"Police! Policia! Police!" Monico yelled, holding his badge to a window where someone had pulled back the curtain. "Open the door!"

Soon agents led a dazed-looking Jose Ferreira Da Silva, 35, out in handcuffs. The Brazilian had been arrested in 2002 and deported, but had slipped back into the country. He now faces up to 20 years in prison.

"This sends a message," said Daniel Monico, a deportation officer, after a successful raid early Wednesday. "When we deport you, we're serious."

The operation has caught more than 140 immigrants with convictions for sexual offenses against children; 367 known gang members, including street soldiers in the deadly Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13; and about 640 people who had already been deported once, immigration officials said. The numbers include more than 720 arrests in California alone.

More than 800 people arrested already have been deported.

ICE's 2006 budget increased the number of fugitive task forces to 52, and the Bush administration is pushing for 70 by 2007. The teams face a mounting challenge.

There are more than 500,000 "fugitive aliens" who have been deported by judges and either slipped back into the country or never left. There is often a disconnect between local and state prisons and the federal government that allows illegal immigrants to serve time and be released without being transferred to federal officials for deportation.

The government has conducted large scale sweeps from time to time, including on April 20, when Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced a new get-tough policy. That day, agents rounded up 1,100 illegal immigrants in 40 cities.

During the raid late Tuesday, the federal squad, which includes a Boston police sergeant detective, wore bulging bulletproof vests and stiff Kevlar gloves to protect their hands from needles, knives and rusty fences.

Badges dangled on chains around their necks as they passed around wanted posters and shined flashlights on the face of a 24-year-old Latvian man who had served prison time for assaulting a police officer.

The team moved in the dark, climbing fences and hiding behind parked cars to encircle a three-story house in Boston's Allston-Brighton neighborhood. All at once they emerged from the shadows. A half-dozen agents filled the front porch, their knocks on the door echoing down the block. The target had moved, the agents learned, and a team split off and caught him in Weymouth, about 15 miles south of the city.

Another man caught in the recent blitz was a Salvadoran gang member who was convicted in a stabbing that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed. Agents caught him working at Budget Rental Car at Boston's Logan Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0034466

"The problems with immigration aren't going to be solved overnight," Raimondi said as the team sped toward another raid. "You start chipping away at it … The more teams we get up and running, the more dangerous people we are going to get off the streets."

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANT SWEEP NABS 2,179 (HC)

By Rosanna Ruiz

Houston Chronicle, June 15, 2006

The operation targets criminals, fugitives; 120 in Houston among those arrested

Immigration officers arrested 2,179 criminal immigrants and fugitives during a nationwide operation touted as a response to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's call for greater interior enforcement, what some argue is a political maneuver meant to mollify critics.

Among the people arrested in "Operation Return to Sender," many are illegal immigrants with criminal convictions while others are people who defied final deportation orders.

Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said during a news conference in Houston on Wednesday that those arrested represented "the worst of the worst."

"Clearly our communities are much safer with individuals such as these off the streets," Myers said. "We're also sending a clear message that we will no longer allow the interior of the United States to be a safe haven for illegal aliens. There's no question America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes or come here illegally."

The operation comes at a time when ICE is under increasing pressure to rid the country of illegal immigrants. The debate about immigration policy reform rages from the halls of Congress to the U.S.-Mexico border, where National Guard troops are being deployed to assist border patrol efforts.

"There's absolutely some symbolism going on," said John Keeley, spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington, D.C.-based think tank that supports tougher immigration reforms. "In the interior of the U.S. you're seeing enforcement activity, and it's standing out because there's any of it at all."

At least 800 people arrested in the operation, which began May 26 and concluded Tuesday, already have been deported, Myers said.

There were 424 immigrants arrested in Texas, including 120 in Houston.

Keeley said the operation and Chertoff's interior enforcement efforts as a whole seem somewhat incongruent with the Bush administration's "unwillingness to enforce immigration laws."

A combination of public opinion polls, anti-illegal-immigration groups such as the Minuteman Project and dramatic rallies by immigration-rights advocates across the country have forced President Bush to address the issue. Still, Keeley said, ICE remains underfunded and understaffed.

Michael Cutler, a former New York immigration agent who has testified before an immigration subcommittee in Congress, called Wednesday's announcement nothing more than a "dog and pony show," meant to deceive the public.

"They're doing it simply because they're trying to show they have the desire and commitment to enforce the laws and legislation is pending on the issue," Cutler said.

Charles Foster, a Houston lawyer who has advised Bush on immigration, said the president recognized early on the need to overhaul the legal process to attain citizenship.

"Damned if you do, damned if you don't," he said. "If they're not enforcing the law they're subject to criticism, and if they do enforce the law it's said to be a political statement."

Foster said it should be difficult to criticize ICE for targeting criminal immigrants given the uproar about the need for greater enforcement.

"Whether it's politics or not, every agency has the survival mechanism in place to put the best foot forward," Foster said. "Once you try to do something you might as well get credit for it."

Foster agreed, however, that ICE suffers from a manpower shortage.

Myers said there are 35 fugitive teams set up in its field offices across the country, three times as many as at the start of the year. Eighteen more teams will be added if a Bush administration budget proposal gains approval, she added.

ICE estimates that there are 11 million to 12 million undocumented immigrants in the United States. About 590,000 are fugitives, according to the agency.

Feds Nab Thousands In Immigration Sweep (CHIT)

By Oscar Avila, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034467

Federal authorities said Wednesday that they had arrested 75 immigrants in Illinois as part of a 19-day nationwide sweep of immigrants who should not be in the U.S. because they have committed crimes or ignored deportation orders.

Officials with the U.S. Department of Homeland Security said they arrested 2,179 immigrants nationwide as part of Operation Return to Sender, which ended Tuesday.

More than two-thirds of the immigrants arrested in Illinois are from Mexico, but those arrested also included immigrants from Bangladesh, China, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Iraq, Jamaica, Poland, Peru, South Korea and Turkey.

Those arrested in Illinois included an Ecuadorean man who was a high-ranking member of the Gangster Disciples street gang and a Chinese gang member who had remained in the country even after his deportation date following a conviction for human smuggling, drug dealing and other crimes.

Most of those arrested in Illinois were gang members, primarily from the Sureno 13 gang, said Tim Counts, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman. Nearly 30 immigrants were arrested for violating deportation orders, Counts said.

The operation was no different from the day-to-day work of existing fugitive operations teams, formed four years ago. Yet government officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, highlighted the arrests as proof of a new emphasis on enforcement.

Counts discounted skepticism he has heard that the Bush administration is seeking high-profile arrests to address calls from conservatives for stricter immigration enforcement.

"This has been a focus long before the debate on immigration heated up," he said.

424 Criminal Immigrants Are Arrested In State (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, June 15, 2006

Dallas gang member among 2,179 nabbed nationwide in sweep

HOUSTON – A Dallas gang member was among 424 criminal illegal immigrants rounded up in Texas and nearly 2,200 arrested nationwide in a three-week sweep by federal agents, officials said Wednesday.

The sweep by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents resulted in the arrests of 2,179 criminal fugitives from other countries. Their crimes include sexual assault, burglary, drug dealing and other violent offenses, and most had ignored deportation orders from immigration judges.

"We're sending a message that we can't allow the nation's interior to be a safe haven for criminal illegal immigrants," ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said during a Houston news conference. "Our communities are safer with these people off the streets."

The sweep was announced by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security in April as the national debate over border enforcement reached a pitch. Ms. Myers was asked if the operation is related to the continuing debate in Congress.

"We're just doing our job," she said. "We're enforcing the laws on the books."

Nearly 150 of those arrested were convicted sex offenders. An additional 367 – about 17 percent of the total – were members or associates of violent street gangs, including MS-13.

Type of offenders

One man, Angel Lira-Alvarez, 26, an illegal immigrant from Mexico, is a member of the East Side Homeboys gang in Dallas. He has convictions on drug and burglary charges and had been deported. He re-entered the U.S. and was arrested again on a marijuana charge.

When ICE agents arrested him last week, Dallas police wanted Mr. Lira-Alvarez on a parole violation.

"These are exactly the kind of offenders we must prevent from entering our country in the first place," said U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, chairman of the Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship subcommittee.

Most of those taken into custody were arrested on immigration violations and are in the process of being deported. About 829 have already been sent back to their home countries.

"There is no hard data on how many criminal illegal immigrants are now in the U.S.," Ms. Myers said. "ICE's job is to focus on the worst of the worst and get them out of this country."

The operation started May 26. ICE fugitive teams, working with local authorities, began gathering information, identifying criminal immigrants and making arrests. Eventually, there were arrests in 34 states. Texas' 424 arrests trailed only California's 722. Massachusetts was next with 157.

'No particular hot spot'

The result shows criminal activity by illegal immigrants is not restricted to border states, said Marcy Forman, director of ICE's Office of Investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0034468

"There is no particular hot spot. Criminal activity by illegal immigrants has spread across the country, particularly through street gangs," she said.

She noted that MS-13, a virulently violent gang now associated as enforcers for Mexican drug organizations, started in Los Angeles as a Salvadoran immigrant criminal gang. It has now spread across the nation, Ms. Forman said.

At least two MS-13 members were picked up in Boston on June 6, including Franklin Ademir Rodriguez, 25, of El Salvador, who has a lengthy criminal record, including a gang attack that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed.

Mr. Rodriguez was arrested at his job at a car rental agency at Logan International Airport after he failed to appear for an immigration hearing.

Ms. Myers said her agency's focus on criminal illegal immigrants would continue.

ICE already has increased the number of fugitive investigation teams from 18 to 35, and there will be 52 by the end of the year, she said. President Bush's budget calls for 70 teams.

County Arrests Account For One-fifth Of National Immigration Sweep (SDUT)

By Debbi Farr Baker, Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 15, 2006

SAN DIEGO – U.S. immigration officials Wednesday announced a countywide immigration roundup of 402 foreigners – including criminal aliens, fugitives and gang members.

It was part of a national six-day sweep – dubbed "Operation Return to Sender" – in which agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement ensnared 2,179 people in more than 30 states.

All of those arrested were in the country illegally and are to be deported or, in some cases, prosecuted.

The foreign nationals arrested in San Diego County accounted for nearly one-fifth of all those picked up in the national sweep. California had the most arrests of any state, a total of 722.

Most of those arrested here are from Mexico; several are from Guatemala. They have all been sent back to their home countries, according to local immigration agency spokeswoman Lauren Mack.

The nationwide operation was conducted on six non-consecutive days beginning May 26. Almost half of those arrested in the nationwide sweep had criminal records involving such offenses as drug trafficking, assault with a deadly weapon, burglary, abduction and sexual assault on a minor, Julie L. Myers, the assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said in a news release.

One of the men arrested in San Diego County had been convicted of molesting a 14-year-old girl in 2003, Mack said.

Of the total arrested nationwide, about 830 have been deported so far, Mack said. Approximately 146 of those arrested had convictions for sexual offenses involving minors and about 367 were members or associates of violent street gangs, authorities said.

Among the others taken into custody were a violent Salvadoran gang member with a long criminal history who was convicted in a stabbing that left a 13-year-old boy paralyzed, and a Mexican national whose violent criminal history dates back to 1985, with arrests for drug trafficking, aggravated robbery and making terrorist threats.

Immigration agents specifically targeted people who had been issued final orders of deportation, but at some of the addresses they checked they also found others in the country illegally, and took them into custody as well.

They said they apprehended 121 people on criminal charges.

"America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes. ICE will leave no stone unturned in hunting down and deporting aliens who victimize our communities," Myers said in a news release.

The operation, which started on May 26, involved virtually every field office in the nation and resulted in arrests from coast to coast.

While California had the most arrested, Mack said it was followed by Texas, with 424; Massachusetts, with 157; New Jersey, with 116; and New York and Michigan, which both had 110.

In Louisiana, 78 people were apprehended, and in Arizona, 49.

The arrestees hailed from countries from all over the world including Angola, Bangladesh, Egypt, Iraq, Italy, Pakistan, Peru, Poland and Uzbekistan.

The arrests are the part of the interior immigration enforcement strategy that was announced in April 20 by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Public Warms To Bush Immigration Stance (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034469

Republicans Are Unlikely to Benefit in November Amid Weak Poll Results for Congress, President

WASHINGTON -- Add this to the list of things that have gone right lately for President Bush: Americans appear to be drawing closer to his view on the immigration debate.

But that hasn't alleviated the squeeze on Republican candidates in the fall elections. A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that the party's conservative electoral base remains at odds with broader public opinion on the issue, including sentiment of the nation's swelling Latino population.

By 50%-33%, the survey shows, Americans support the views expressed by President Bush and also by businesses, Hispanics and Democratic leaders: that steps to strengthen border security should be combined with a guest-worker program for prospective immigrants and those who have been in the U.S. for at least two years. Yet a 44% plurality of conservatives back an agenda combining border security and deportation of illegal immigrants -- making it difficult for Republican politicians to embrace the majority opinion.

IN THE POLLS

1 · The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll2

· Track Bush's approval ratings3

On immigration, President Bush "is where the American public is," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. "The difficulty is, the base of the Republican Party is marching in the other direction."

Moreover, conservatives are disproportionately likely to say immigration will be important to their vote. Among Americans calling immigration a top-tier issue, 72% say they are more likely to back a candidate seeking a fence along the Mexican border, while just 37% say they are more likely to support one who favors a guest-worker program.

Mr. Hart's Republican counterpart, Bill McInturff, adds that the guidance Republican lawmakers will take from the findings is "don't blink" from the tough border-security position staked out by the House in negotiations with the more-moderate Senate. Yet that strategy could prove self-defeating, if it sinks prospects for a compromise, because the poll also shows that conservatives will be most upset if Congress doesn't act. The survey of 1,002 adults, conducted June 9-12, has a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

Republicans and Mr. Bush are both ill-positioned to suffer further political setbacks. The poll, conducted before Bush adviser Karl Rove was cleared of potential charges in the Central Intelligence Agency leak case but after U.S. forces killed Iraq's al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi, showed Mr. Bush's overall job-approval rating essentially unchanged at 37%.

Optimism about the war edged up slightly, with 53% of Americans saying that Mr. Zarqawi's death would improve the situation in Iraq at least a little. But Americans no longer share the president's assertion that "I made the right decision" to go to war in the first place. A 53% majority calls attacking Iraq "the wrong decision," while 41% side with Mr. Bush.

A 61% majority called things in America "off on the wrong track," more than twice the 27% who said things are headed in the right direction." Approval of Congress remained at an abysmal level -- 23% -- while Americans sided with Democrats on most opinion measures. By 49%-38%, respondents said they want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress after November's elections.

The contours of individual congressional districts make it difficult for Democrats to translate such advantages into the 15 seats they need to recapture control of the House; Democrats must gain six seats to regain a Senate majority. But the poll suggests that Republicans' 2006 woes are both broad and deep.

By 51%-36%, Americans say they worry less about a different Democratic direction than about the possibility that Republicans remain in power and keep the same policies. And they prefer Democrats by a wide margin on issues such as health care, gasoline prices and the economy, while traditional Republican advantages on values and terrorism have shrunk.

Five months before Election Day, Democrats also enjoy an edge on voter intensity. Some 60% of self-described Democrats expressed a very high level of interest in fall elections, compared with 52% of self-described Republicans.

One early source of solace for the president's party is that such a differential didn't fuel outsize Democratic turnout in last week's special House election in California won by Republican Brian Bilbray. In part, that may be because neither of America's main political parties currently enjoys a good reputation. While the Republican Party is viewed negatively by 47%-34%, so is the Democratic Party by 39%-35%.

"Somebody has to win this," Mr. McInturff says. But "if there were a 'none of the above' option, people would seriously consider it."

The economy -- an issue Republicans, as the governing party, hoped to capitalize on -- is providing little traction. Reminded of a host of positive statistics on job growth, overall growth and tax cuts, just one in four Americans say those reflect their personal view of the economy.

Even among Americans earning more than $75,000 a year, just one-third embrace the positive view. The top economic concerns cited by respondents: health-care and education costs, gas prices, the federal budget deficit and inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0034470

Mr. Bush has fared better in the debate over immigration, which now trails only the Iraq war as a top-priority national issue for voters as a whole. Among Republicans, it outranks even Iraq in importance.

The survey indicates that Mr. Bush has achieved his goal of "a civil debate" on the issue, despite the cultural, social and economic passions aroused by the presence of 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. In December, Americans by 53%-37% said immigration hurts the country more than it helps.

Today, despite predictions of a backlash from demonstrations this spring demanding immigrants' rights, the public is more evenly split. Some 44% say immigration helps the country, while 45% say it hurts.

Moreover, Americans in all regions of the country back the approach supported by Mr. Bush and embodied in recent Senate legislation calling for a 370-mile fence on parts of the Mexican border and a guest-worker program. Conservatives -- almost alone among age, income and demographic categories -- prefer the House approach of building 700 miles of fencing and deporting illegal immigrants.

Immigration Reform Doubts Rise On Hill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are increasingly doubtful that Congress will pass any sort of immigration reform legislation this year.

"My gut [feeling] is that it's undoable," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said yesterday about a compromise this year between the House and Senate bills. "The bills are too different. The sides are really polarized."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and leading critic of the approach favored by Mrs. Feinstein, yesterday gave immigration legislation a 20 percent chance of passage this year.

A poll of lawmakers published in this week's National Journal found that 44 percent of those anonymously surveyed said they doubt any compromise can be reached this year.

The most optimistic predictions found in an informal survey conducted yesterday by The Washington Times suggested a perfect tossup.

"Fifty-fifty," answered Sen. Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican who has been a key supporter of the Senate bill that many say grants "amnesty" to about 10 million illegal aliens.

"We're right on the bubble," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican and harsh critic of the Senate bill. "I think it could go either way."

Whom to blame and who will pay the price in November's elections are more debatable.

"It's increasingly clear that opponents of comprehensive immigration reform are prepared to use every tool possible to defeat any effort to pass immigration reform," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

The two bills await conference committee, where House and Senate negotiators will hammer out the differences. Those negotiations already have stalled because of a technical, though constitutional, issue with the Senate version of the legislation.

Republicans blame Mr. Reid for refusing to agree to a simple fix that would allow negotiations to begin. Mr. Manley said Mr. Reid wants more assurances that House negotiators won't rip apart the Senate bill.

Republicans say Mr. Reid and other Democrats are trying to quietly scuttle any bill from emerging in order to deny the Republican-led Congress a significant legislative victory before the fall elections.

"Failure is the worst thing we can do," Mr. Graham said. He was countering the mantra of House Republicans, who say a bill that grants a path to citizenship for illegals is worse than no bill at all.

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat, called the Senate bill a "non-starter" in the House because of Republican opposition. He said the Republicans' victory in California last week by Brian P. Bilbray, who campaigned for a congressional seat on a tough immigration stance, assured that House Republicans will not back down from their tough border security bill.

GOP Vs. GOP On Borders (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Out of the past and into the current controversy dividing the Republican Party came former California governor Pete Wilson, charging into Washington this week to argue that he had been right all along in trying to slam the door on illegal immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0034471

Far from dooming Republicans to a series of defeats in the most populous state, Wilson argued, his championing in 1994 of Proposition 187, denying health care and educational services to illegal immigrants and their children, anticipated the kind of hard-line policy many Republicans endorsed this year.

The old Marine, as unyielding now at 72 as he was during his eight years as governor, may not be the spokesman the embattled House Republicans would choose for their fight with the White House and the Senate over the immigration reform bill now headed for conference committee. Wilson is blamed by many Republicans, including those around President Bush, for so alienating the growing Hispanic vote in California that the state's hoard of electoral votes has moved permanently into the Democratic column.

But Wilson, a former senator, rejected that charge at a Hudson Institute talk in Washington. And, despite being a Bush appointee (to the Defense Policy Board, a Pentagon advisory panel), he called on his former colleagues to resist White House pressure on the House and Senate to pass a compromise bill that preserves elements of the president's more generous approach and that includes a path to citizenship for the millions of illegal immigrants already here. He said the only reason the Senate voted for a more generous bill was that many senators had been "intimidated."

Wilson said House Republicans are right in insisting that the Mexican border be closed before any thought is given to a guest worker program or anything resembling amnesty. That was also the message the winner of last week's House special election in the San Diego area, Republican Brian Bilbray, said voters were sending when they chose him.

Build a wall the entire 2,000-mile length of the border, and do it first, Wilson said, or else "you'll have 20 million, 35 million, 50 million" illegal immigrants in the country.

Wilson, a former mayor of San Diego, offered a revisionist history of California politics in defending his position. The 1994 campaign ad for which he became famous -- a nighttime shot of shadowy figures sneaking across the border, while the announcer intoned, "They keep coming" -- was falsely depicted in the media, he said, as an anti-immigrant message. It was aimed strictly at illegal immigrants, Wilson said, and in defense of California taxpayers.

Did it cost Republicans California? Many have said so, noting that Democrats have won every presidential race, every Senate contest and every regular election for governor since Prop. 187 passed.

Arnold Schwarzenegger's victory in the 2003 recall election broke that spell, Wilson said, and the blame for the earlier defeats can be assigned to the men who were "nice guys but not good candidates." As for the presidential races, he said Bob Dole in 1996 and George W. Bush in his two campaigns really didn't try hard enough to get California.

That's his story, and he's sticking to it. But Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), one of the principal sponsors of the Senate bill, isn't buying any of it. "He really misreads this," Hagel told me. "The intimidation was all coming from the other side," in the form of e-mails and phone calls denouncing the 23 Republicans who, like Hagel, voted for the Senate bill.

Hagel said the 2,000-mile fence "is just not practical" and the "20 million, 35 million, 50 million" illegal immigrants flooding in are numbers Wilson pulled out of the air. And Wilson's interpretation of California political history is equally unpersuasive. "California has become a wasteland for Republicans," Hagel said, "with not one elected official except the governor, who got there by accident. And you can't blame that all on candidates. Parties get a reputation from the policies they support."

Hagel made one other point: Those who, like Wilson, want only a border-closing bill offer no policy for dealing with "the 11 million illegals living in our country or their 3 million legal children. Is the party of Abraham Lincoln going to allow a permanent second class of people waiting to be citizens?"

The next few months of House-Senate negotiation will determine whether Pete Wilson and Brian Bilbray or Chuck Hagel and George Bush speak for the Republican Party.

E Pluribus Pluribus? (USAT)

By Former Presidential Candidate Gary Bauer

USA Today, June 15, 2006

"Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all." — Theodore Roosevelt

While much of the immigration debate focuses on financial issues — whether illegal immigrants hurt or help the economy — the missing link to understanding Americans' anxiety over the issue is the reality that we are failing to build a citizenry that loves America first. The unasked question is whether we are building allegiance to anything other than the almighty dollar.

For much of our history, immigrants took their first steps onto American soil understanding that coming to this country meant pledging allegiance to one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all. They were enthusiastic about learning our language, our history, our laws and our traditions. They recognized what it meant to become an American.

Today, hyphenated Americans put other countries and affiliations first, and they drive a wedge into the heart of "one nation." A recent poll of Hispanics in America by Investor's Business Daily shows that 64% consider themselves "mostly Hispanic," but that only 15% see themselves as "mostly American." The survey further reveals that 31% speak "only Spanish" in the home, while just 6% speak "only English." Finally, 69% of respondents said they lived in predominantly Hispanic neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0034472

Even more distressing

While these data are troubling, they become downright distressing when one considers that 27% of the survey sample had lived in the USA for more than 25 years, while only 15% lived here fewer than six years.

Whatever your opinion of amnesty and "guest worker" programs, the truth is that for many Hispanics residing in the USA, the great metaphor of America as a "melting pot" has ceded to the notion of America as a "salad bowl" of mutually exclusive groups.

If many immigrants are not assimilating, part of the blame lies with America's academic and political elites. We live in an era where the Pledge of Allegiance is under attack in many schools. Several schools banned the flying of U.S. flags.

Today, multiculturalism is considered a civic virtue — in which accepting foreign traditions, values, laws and languages is put ahead of promoting immigrants' integration into our society. When Hispanics can do so much of their business in Spanish, vote in Spanish, take a driver's license exam in Spanish and send their kids to bilingual public schools, what reason do they have to learn English?

Our shared respect

The United States stands proudly as a nation of legal immigrants. This is not a chance collection of separate peoples united merely by geography or economic opportunity. Rather, this is a nation of citizens united in our shared respect for the inviolable freedoms and rights found in our great documents. As Teddy Roosevelt said, "We have room for but one flag ... but one language ... but one sole loyalty and that is a loyalty to the American people."

A recent news report identified four U.S. servicemen who had died that day in Iraq. Three of the four men had Hispanic surnames. By making the ultimate sacrifice for their country, they represented the true embodiments of the American ideal.

The unmentioned undercurrent in the immigration debate is the lack of Americanization of those who come here unwilling to pledge allegiance to a new flag, and the lack of effort by those in leadership to make one people out of many —E pluribus unum.

The term "earned citizenship" has been employed to describe proposals requiring illegal immigrants to pay fines and back taxes before applying for legal status. But if "earned citizenship" means anything, it surely means a commitment to assimilating into the American way of life. It must mean joining together under one flag, not just one currency.

Former presidential candidate Gary Bauer is president of American Values and chairman of Campaign for Working Families.

A Tip Of The Cap To Pro Baseball (USAT)

By Tim Wendel op-ed

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Junior Noboa stands in the shade of the first-base dugout and surveys his baseball kingdom. The former second baseman for the Montreal Expos operates one of the 30 or so baseball academies now in the Dominican Republic.

Establishments such as Noboa's are modeled, in large part, after Days Inns or Holiday Inns. The effect can be jarring. Dirt roads in the jungle dead-end at vast complexes with emerald-green fields and residence hotels that would be at home off any U.S. interstate.

"We try to make it as close as we can to what they'd find in America," Noboa says. "If we don't, the odds of them making it aren't too high."

In the back-and-forth debate over immigration reform, one footnote likely to be overlooked is the fact that Major League Baseball (MLB) has its own type of a guest-worker program. Despite decades of frustration and failure, the national pastime learned that an effective policy for immigrant labor not only made business sense, it was good citizenship, too. The approach has allowed the sport to foster young stars and a new fan base.

Often, baseball seems antiquated compared with the rest of popular culture. American kids won't play the game because it isn't as high-paced as video games or as cool as the sport du jour, basketball. But when it comes to demographics, MLB surprisingly is cutting-edge.

This season, more than one quarter of the players on U.S. major-league teams are foreign-born. At the minor-league level, overseas players make up 45% of the roster openings, with the majority coming from the Dominican Republic, which is the top exporter of baseball talent. Fans who might object to day laborers have little problem cheering on immigrant stars. After all, MLB's attendance reached an all-time high last season.

'A great boon'

DOJ_NMG_0034473

"Without the influx of Latin players, we certainly wouldn't have 30 major-league teams," Chicago White Sox executive Roland Hemond told The Kansas City Star. "So they've been a great boon for our game, its growth in franchises as well as in quality of play."

Almost sixty years ago, Jackie Robinson broke the color barrier in U.S. sports. While the MLB didn't volunteer for the role, it did show the rest of the country that black and white could not just get along, but could also work hand-in-hand on the same team. A similar evolution continues today between white and brown.

But assimilation in baseball hasn't been easy. Soon after Robinson, Orestes "Minnie" Minoso arrived from Cuba to play for the Chicago White Sox. Early on, he faced many of the same biases and insults that plagued Robinson.

"When I played, I sometimes had to play the clown," he once told me. "I had to listen and laugh, even if I was crying inside. But never did I let them see that it bothered me."

In the early '60s, San Francisco Giants manager Alvin Dark declared that only English would be spoken in the clubhouse and dugout. His edict very well might have kept a team filled with Latino stars — Orlando Cepeda, Juan Marichal, the Alou brothers — from ever winning a World Series. In the hypercompetitive world of professional sports, such division in a locker room is poison for team chemistry.

Though that was four decades ago, today's immigration debate echoes similar themes. Throughout this country's history, immigrants — legal or not — have faced resentment for economic and cultural reasons.

"They take our jobs."

"They don't speak the language."

"They're changing our communities."

In fact, the Senate recently passed immigration legislation that declared English to be the national language of the United States. Another measure deemed it the "common unifying language." It can be, if used as a tool to bring people together rather than a wedge to drive people apart. Unifying? Just ask the Giants team of the early '60s.

Lessons for the rest

But baseball's own model of assimilation can provide good lessons for the nation as a whole, even if they can't be duplicated on such a massive scale.

Major leaguers are afforded the same work permits reserved for internationally recognized artists and entertainers. Today, many teams have bilingual coaches, trainers and front office personnel from rookie ball on up to the majors. The Cleveland Indians and New York Mets not only teach their top prospects English, but they've also begun to send them to school in the Dominican Republic so the prospects receive a high school education while they're playing for their organizations.

"Even if they fail as ballplayers, they are given tools that enable them to go on with life," says Alan Klein, author of Growing the Game: The Globalization of Major League Baseball. "This isn't the case in other (U.S.) industries making use of temporary workers."

So in today's game, these players fold into U.S. society — whether they become U.S. citizens or not. David "Big Papi" Ortiz from the Dominican Republic has become a folk hero in Boston. Another Dominican, Vladimir Guerrero, is a crowd favorite in Southern California. In New York, Omar Minaya, the first Latino general manager at the major-league level, has created "Los Mets," with Pedro Martinez, Carlos Beltran, Carlos Delgado and Julio Franco.

Major League Baseball makes America accessible to these players, thus making these players accessible to American fans.

If other industries dependent on immigrant labor — in the agriculture and construction trades, for instance — would make even slight efforts to help their workers assimilate, the benefits would flow through American society.

And then perhaps instead of two sides screaming at each other across a divide, we could have a civilized debate about immigration reform — regardless of what language we're speaking.

Tim Wendel is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. His books include The New Face of Baseball: The One-Hundred-Year Rise and Triumph of Latinos in America's Favorite Sport.

More Than 2,000 Illegal Immigrants Nabbed In Sweep (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, June 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Federal agents have arrested more than 2,000 illegal immigrants, many of them convicted criminals, child predators, gang members and fugitives, in sweeps across the country over the past three weeks, authorities said Wednesday.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Operation Return to Sender was the latest in a series of crackdowns on illegal immigrants since Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff promised a tougher enforcement effort in April.

DOJ_NMG_0034474

"America's welcome does not extend to immigrants who come here to commit crimes," ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said in Houston, where she announced 2,179 arrests.

The arrests came in every region of the country — 34 states and the District of Columbia. The most, 722, were in California and included 402 in San Diego, site of the busiest U.S. border crossing with Mexico.

Elsewhere in Southern California, agents focused on illegal immigrants with a record of sexual offenses against children, said Kumar Kibble, assistant special agent in charge for Orange County. He said the agency "targeted the greatest threats" with its operation, which began May 26 and concluded with the announcement.

"Our efforts continue," Kibble said.

Nationwide, those arrested included 146 people previously convicted of sex offenses involving minors; 367 members or associates of violent gangs; and 640 fugitive immigrants who had failed to comply with orders to leave. An additional 121 people were arrested on charges of felony re-entry after deportation, illegal alien possession of a firearm and similar charges.

Among those arrested were Franklin Ademir Rodriguez, 25, a Salvadoran with a criminal history and membership in the violent street gang Mara Salvatrucha, the agency said. He was arrested at his job at a car rental agency at Boston's Logan Airport. Another, Wilber Kuk, 24, is a Mexican national and member of the 18th Street gang in Washington, D.C. Kuk has convictions for abduction, malicious wounding and robbery.

Kibble said agents tracked down people by examining lists of sex offenders, checking criminal and other records and following up on tips.

Some of those arrested fell into the net by accident: In San Marcos near San Diego, agents arrested two illegal immigrants after their car struck an ICE patrol vehicle from the rear, ICE spokeswoman Lauren Mack said.

TAX:

Hold That Back-Tax Chase (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Two years ago, Congress authorized the Internal Revenue Service to hire private debt collectors to find individual taxpayers who acknowledge that they owe taxes but have not paid up.

The agency estimated the debt collectors could pull in about $1.4 billion over 10 years and free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats. The IRS selected three firms to track down the tax delinquents, but the project has been slowed somewhat by a bid protest and hasn't gotten underway.

Then, last week, the debt-collection project took a surprise hit. By two votes, the House Appropriations Committee approved an amendment to a fiscal 2007 spending bill that would prohibit the IRS from setting up the program. When the bill came to the House floor this week, Republican leaders did not challenge the amendment, allowing it to stand.

To some degree, the IRS setback reflects the unease created by the security breach at the Department of Veterans Affairs, in which at least 26.5 million veterans and military personnel were put at risk of identity theft when a laptop was stolen from a VA employee's home.

Rep. Steven R. Rothman (D-N.J.), who wrote the amendment, argued to the committee that it makes no sense to turn over taxpayer data to private debt-collection companies when identity theft seems to be on the rise.

Yesterday, Rothman teamed with Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, to press his case against what he called "the outrageous proposal."

Under the IRS plan, companies would be paid commissions on a sliding scale -- from 21 cents to 24 cents for each dollar collected. If one of the companies determined that a targeted taxpayer is bankrupt or dead, it would receive a $100 "administrative resolution fee."

In addition to his privacy concerns, Rothman contends the contracts are a waste because it costs the government only 3 cents for each dollar collected by an IRS employee. He also objects to the project's cost -- about $50 million in the first three years.

The project's initial phase would focus on more than 10,000 people who owe taxes, an IRS spokesman said. Over a two-year period, the debt-collection companies would be asked to track down about 100,000 who are in arrears. Starting in 2008, the IRS intends to hire up to 10 firms to provide collection services.

IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson has promised "tough safeguards" to protect taxpayer rights and privacy. Employees of the private firms would undergo background checks and mandatory training, the agency said. The fees that would be paid to the firms would be in line with industry standards, according to the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0034475

Yesterday, Everson said he was disappointed by funding provided the agency in the House spending bill. The measure falls $104.5 million short of what the Bush administration requested and "would result in personnel reductions within the IRS." He noted that "using private collection agencies would bring in extra money and help reduce the deficit."

Kelley, however, said a similar IRS project failed about a decade ago and pointed to the irony of the government linking contract fees to the amount of tax dollars collected, a performance measurement that Congress has prohibited IRS managers from using when evaluating their employees.

Rothman's amendment must clear the Senate and subsequent negotiations between the House and Senate later this year -- a tough climb in the face of Bush administration opposition. But, Kelley said, "the House action is an indication that things are turning a bit in our favor."

Citing the VA loss of veterans' names, Social Security numbers and other personal information, she suggested that concern about privacy rights might help the union's effort to kill the IRS project. "Closer and closer to election time, everyone understands that this proposal is very unpopular with the public," she said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Adviser Who Shaped Bush's Speeches Is Leaving (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — Michael Gerson, the White House speechwriter and policy adviser who shaped nearly every major address of George W. Bush's presidency, said Wednesday that he was leaving the administration to pursue new career options.

Mr. Gerson has been one of Mr. Bush's closest aides and is credited with giving voice to both the "compassionate conservatism" that Mr. Bush espouses and his more hawkish lines, like "axis of evil."

Mr. Gerson follows two other close Bush advisers who have left in recent weeks: Andrew H. Card Jr., the former White House chief of staff, and Scott McClellan, the former White House press secretary.

But officials said Mr. Gerson's departure was not part of the staff shakeup instigated by Mr. Card's successor, Joshua B. Bolten, who has tried to invigorate and re-energize Mr. Bush's staff with new faces.

Mr. Gerson, 42, who has worked for Mr. Bush for seven years, said he had been contemplating leaving the administration for some time. Mr. Gerson, who had a heart attack when he was 40, said he told the president four months ago that he was serious about leaving soon. He said he chose now in part because the White House is having a run of good news and the time seemed right. "This was a case where many good things are coming together at the White House," he said. "And it to some extent makes it easier to leave." He said he plans to continue a career in writing.

White House officials said there were no plans to name a successor to Mr. Gerson. "There's no way to replace him — he is a once in a generation," said Karl Rove, a White House deputy chief of staff. "He helped take the president on his best day and represent what was in the president's spirit and soul."

Mr. Gerson was known to have infused Mr. Bush's addresses with the religious allusions for which they became known. It was Mr. Gerson who changed the words "axis of hatred" to the more biblical "axis of evil." Mr. Gerson complained in an interview that the line was often misrepresented to apply directly to Iran, North Korea and Iraq, which were but examples of rogue states.

Asked to cite his favorite addresses, Mr. Gerson pointed to those that immediately followed the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, specifically a line from an address given three days afterward, at the National Cathedral: "Grief and tragedy and hatred are only for a time. Goodness, remembrance, and love have no end. And the Lord of life holds all who die, and all who mourn."

Bush's Favorite Author Leaving The White House (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Top Aide Michael Gerson Knew Just How to Address the President

Michael J. Gerson, one of President Bush's most trusted advisers and the author of nearly all of his most famous public words over the past seven years, plans to step down in the next couple of weeks in a decision that colleagues believe will leave a hole in the White House at a critical period.

Gerson said in an interview that he has been talking with Bush for many months about leaving for writing and other opportunities but waited until the White House political situation stabilized somewhat. "It seemed like a good time," he said. "Things are back on track a little. Some of the things I care about are on a good trajectory."

DOJ_NMG_0034476

Since first joining the presidential campaign as chief speechwriter in 1999, Gerson has evolved into one of the most central figures in Bush's inner circle, often considered among the three or four aides closest to the president. Beyond shaping the language of the Bush presidency, Gerson helped set its broader direction.

He was a formulator of the Bush doctrine making the spread of democracy the fundamental goal of U.S. foreign policy, a policy hailed as revolutionary by some and criticized as unrealistic by others. He led a personal crusade to make unprecedented multibillion-dollar investments in fighting AIDS, malaria and poverty around the globe. He became one of the few voices pressing for a more aggressive policy to stop genocide in Darfur, even as critics complained of U.S. inaction.

"He might have had more influence than any White House staffer who wasn't chief of staff or national security adviser" in modern times, said William Kristol, who was top aide to Vice President Dan Quayle and now edits the Weekly Standard. "Mike was substantively influential, not just a wordsmith, not just a crafter of language for other people's policies, but he influenced policy itself."

"He is the best and most influential presidential speechwriter since Ted Sorenson," said Peter H. Wehner, director of White House strategic initiatives, referring to the adviser to President John F. Kennedy. "Mike is one of the key intellectual architects of the Bush presidency, whether we're talking about compassionate conservatism at home or the freedom agenda abroad."

Gerson is the latest in a series of longtime Bush aides to leave, following White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., press secretary Scott McClellan and Treasury Secretary John W. Snow. But newly installed Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said in an interview that the departure is not part of his broader shakeup of the president's operation. No one is being tapped to take Gerson's most recent assignment as senior adviser.

"He's one of the few people who is irreplaceable," Bolten said. "He's a policy provoker, a grand strategist and a conscience who in many cases has not only articulated but reflected the president's heart."

Gerson, 42, said he had originally planned to leave after Bush's 2004 reelection but decided to stay when he was asked to shift from chief speechwriter to senior adviser with an office a few doors from the Oval Office. He had a heart attack in December 2004 but said his health is now fine and was not an issue in his decision. "It was never my intention to stay to the end," Gerson said.

He plans to look at writing, speaking and think-tank opportunities, with help from Robert B. Barnett, the high-powered lawyer who represents major figures such as former president Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Gerson stood out in a White House known for swagger. A somewhat slight, pale, bespectacled and soft-spoken Midwesterner, he nonetheless forged a strong bond with the outgoing, backslapping Texan president, in part through their shared conservative Christian faith. He found a way to channel Bush's thoughts, colleagues said, transforming a sometimes inarticulate president into an occasionally memorable speaker.

Gerson wrote or co-wrote every major speech Bush gave since announcing his candidacy, including convention and inaugural addresses and State of the Union messages. He crafted the two speeches after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that will probably be recorded as Bush's signal moments of national leadership: the service at the Washington National Cathedral and the address to Congress.

He crafted the State of the Union language that labeled Iraq, Iran and North Korea an "axis of evil" and the inaugural address that committed the United States to "ending tyranny in our world." He came up with the phrase "soft bigotry of low expectations" to focus on minority education problems.

Gerson believed strongly in the "compassionate" part of Bush's "compassionate conservatism," saying he wanted to pursue liberal goals through conservative means. To that end, he helped promote the president's No Child Left Behind education initiative, the Medicare prescription drug program and grants to faith-based charities. "It's a more activist approach," Gerson said. "That was a major change from what came before."

He also pushed for a $15 billion program to combat HIV and AIDS worldwide, telling Bush in the Oval Office that they would never be forgiven if they passed up the chance. Although he kept a hand in major speeches during the second term, he became increasingly focused on Africa and traveled there four times to see Darfur and other places firsthand, returning to describe searing scenes to his White House colleagues.

While toiling for an uncommonly polarizing president, he made few, if any, enemies, even finding admirers in circles often not friendly to Republicans.

"Mike Gerson has been an important voice," said the Rev. David Beckmann, president of Bread for the World, a global anti-poverty organization.

Although groups have grievances about how some programs have been administered, it did not redound on Gerson, said David Gartner, policy director for the Global AIDS Alliance. "He's been committed and effective," Gartner said. "To get a moral issue the kind of attention it deserves, I'm sure is not easy to do."

DOJ_NMG_0034477

Health Chief Defends Extensive Use Of CDC Jet (USAT/AP)

By Kevin Freking

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt on Wednesday defended his extensive use of a jet leased to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention for emergencies.

Leavitt said he could not have overseen the implementation of the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit, plus help prepare states for a potential flu pandemic, without the use of the plane.

His explanation came at a House Ways and Means Committee hearing, where Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., accused Leavitt of using the jet to "do public relations for the president" on the drug benefit.

Lewis cited an Atlanta Journal-Constitution article that analyzed the Gulfstream III's flight log and found that the 14-seat jet has been used primarily by Leavitt to attend news conferences promoting the drug plan and meetings with state officials about their flu pandemic plans. The flights have cost more than $700,000 since January, the newspaper reported.

Since January, Leavitt has taken the jet on 19 trips to visit more than 90 cities, said his spokeswoman, Christina Pearson. During the same period, CDC officials said they had used the aircraft to respond to three emergencies and conduct three training exercises.

The newspaper reported that during two emergencies, the CDC was forced to use another plane because Leavitt was using the Gulfstream jet.

"I think this is unbelievable, irresponsible and just dead wrong," Lewis said.

Lewis' questioning riled some of his Republican colleagues. The Republicans jumped to Leavitt's defense.

"It is important that our national spokesman get out there to where the people are," said Rep. Nancy Johnson, R-Conn.

Rep. E. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., said lawmakers use federal jets all the time when going on fact-finding missions.

Leavitt said the newspaper article was accurate and that he tried to use commercial jets whenever possible.

The aircraft has cost taxpayers $2.1 million this year, CDC and HHS officials said.

Senate GOP To Push Fix Of Budget (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Top Senate Republicans yesterday threw their support behind a package of new tools to rein in federal spending, including spending caps, a presidential line-item veto authority and a two-year budget.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, flanked by about a dozen Senate Republicans, said the budget process is broken and encourages spending instead of saving.

The bill, dubbed "S.O.S.: Stop Over-Spending," will reform the budget process, said Mr. Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, who along with Mr. Frist is stepping up his role in the Republican Party's election-year war on spending.

House Republicans have been more proactive in advancing budget reform ideas this year, and yesterday, the House Budget Committee approved line-item-veto legislation that will likely reach the House floor next week, along with a commission to set sunset dates for wasteful federal programs, both of which were demanded by House conservatives.

"We're just glad they're finally getting on board," one House Republican aide said of the Senate.

The senators' budget reform effort comes as the Senate prepares today to clear for President Bush a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill for Iraq, the war on terror, hurricane recovery, avian flu and border security. The Senate's version of the bill ballooned to about $109 billion and contained a host of unrelated items, but House and Senate negotiators cut about $14 billion from the final bill, avoiding a presidential veto.

Mr. Gregg's committee will vote on his new budget reform package next week, but it'll likely have a tougher time after that.

Mr. Frist said, "We'll do as much (of the package) as we possibly can."

The Senate bill would:

·Switch to federal budgets that cover two years to free up time for more congressional oversight.

·Establish a process to reduce the deficit and balance the budget by 2012, including automatic reductions in the growth of entitlement programs if Congress doesn't meet targets.

·Set caps on discretionary spending and enforce them through across-the-board cuts if Congress doesn't voluntarily adhere.

·Allow the president to target specific spending items in bills and ask Congress to kill the items.

·Create a commission to set sunset dates for wasteful federal programs and another commission to examine ways to fix entitlement programs like Social Security and Medicare.

DOJ_NMG_0034478

Still, even bill supporters admit that the package will be a heavy lift for many senators, especially those who dole out the money each year.

Former Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, was skeptical.

"I'm going to have to study it and see if there's a way we can live with it," he said.

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, blasted the bill as election-year cover for nervous Republicans.

"It's a political ploy to make up for the fact that under Republican leadership, we've run up the largest deficits," he said.

Striking A Balance On Earmarks (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 15, 2006

Call it the Coburn clause.

Senate Republicans say they are trying to salvage a spending-reform provision empowering individual senators to strip new earmarks out of conference reports without handing the rank and file unlimited power to wage wars of attrition to defeat bills they do not like.

"Writing the language in such a way that gets done what we want to accomplish has been very difficult," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), chairman of the Rules Committee, said yesterday. "You don't want to make it possible for troublemakers to tie up conference reports at the end of a session indefinitely with points of order."

Lott did not single out any such "troublemakers," but Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) proved last month that he is willing to use all available weapons in a floor fight.

Coburn offered a rare "clay pigeon" amendment to the war supplemental, under which each of the 19 pieces was subject to a vote. Rank-and-file Republican spending hawks have been battling leadership-written bills on the floors of both chambers, and the conference-report provision would give them a brand-new tool with which to fight.

Aides to Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) spent an hour with the Senate parliamentarian earlier this week trying to hammer out language that would preserve the original intent but not lead to nightmarish legislative delays, Ensign said yesterday. But Ensign, who is considering attaching his version to another bill, said he has not yet discussed the matter with Lott. If not well-crafted, the new rule could let senators impede legislation, he said.

The backroom maneuvering on earmark rules comes as lawmakers in both chambers are also waging public battles over spending.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) angered many of his GOP colleagues yesterday by trying to strike their district-specific earmarks from a bill funding transportation and housing programs. Flake's home-state Republican colleague, John McCain, introduced a Senate amendment to the defense authorization bill that is designed to prod the Bush administration into providing estimates of war-funding needs to Congress in its annual budgets.

And Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) unveiled an omnibus budget-process-overhaul measure yesterday that would establish enforcement mechanisms for caps on mandatory and discretionary spending, create a modified line-item veto and convert the federal government to biennial budgeting.

Flake lost roll calls on his amendments, McCain's amendment is unenforceable and even Republicans predicted that Gregg's budget-process omnibus has little chance of passage. But the effect of the Senate-specific earmark language could be far-reaching if it is included in a conference report on lobbying reform.

Conservatives hailed the original Senate language as a powerful tool they could use to limit "immaculate" earmarks — those that appear for the first time in conference reports. One Republican aide called the provision "the holy grail" of budget-process reforms.

Under that language, senators could raise points of order against conference provisions that did not appear in either the House or Senate version of a bill. If supporters of offending provision could not muster 60 votes to keep them in, they would be struck and the revised conference report would be sent back to the House.

That, however, raises the prospect of a single senator raising such a point of order, waiting for the House to act on the revised bill, raising a second point of order against a separate provision and repeating the process as a means of killing a bill.

"That's why we're trying to carefully craft the language," Ensign said. "I think it may be used often early, then less often later."

The basic concept has proponents on both sides of the partisan divide, but the devil remains in the details.

"I do like the idea," said Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), "but I also am wary of anything that would just be designed to rope-a-dope the process."

The final language could include a limitation on the number of points of order available to senators, Lott said.

DOJ_NMG_0034479

But while some lawmakers and aides hope to finish a lobbying bill before the July 4 recess, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) declined to set a deadline yesterday.

"I'm not talking about any timelines," Hastert said.

However, in a joint statement last week, Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said they are aiming to pass a final bill by July 4.

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans rolled out Gregg's budget-process bill, dubbed the Stop Over-Spending — or SOS — Act of 2006.

"We must regain control of this runaway train before it is too late," Gregg said.

Democrats seized on the offering as a "Save Our Seats" plan and predicted it would be a loser on the floor.

Conrad pointed to the GOP's inability to pass a budget this year and mounting debt as evidence of Republicans' fiscal irresponsibility.

"They're cursing the darkness. Whose darkness is it?" Conrad said. "Why didn't they light a candle?"

House Panel Approves Line-item Veto Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, June 15, 2006

Congress is moving to give President Bush and his successors greater power to try to weed bills of certain spending, though the new power would pale compared with the line-item veto law struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998.

The House Budget Committee on Wednesday approved by a 24-9 vote a bill to allow the president to single out wasteful items contained in appropriations bills he signs into law, and it would require Congress to vote on those items again.

Under the proposal, it would take a simple majority in both House and Senate to approve the items over the president's objections.

The idea is that wasteful "pork barrel" spending would be vulnerable since Congress might vote to reject such items once they are no longer protected by their inclusion in bigger bills that the president has little choice but to sign.

This is a far weaker version of the line-item veto that Republicans in Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. That bill allowed Clinton to strike items from appropriations and tax bills unless Congress mustered a two-thirds margin to override him. The bill was found unconstitutional since it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress.

Most members of Congress simply said good riddance. Clinton's use of the line-item veto against a military projects bill had provoked howls of outrage on Capitol Hill and Congress promptly overrode them.

But Bush in March proposed the new, watered-down version in concert with conservatives such as Rep. Paul Ryan (news, bio, voting record), R-Wis., sponsor of Wednesday's bill.

"Even if the president identifies numerous pork-barrel projects ... he is unlikely to use his veto power because it must be applied to the bill as a whole and cannot be used to target individual items," said Ryan. "Does he veto an entire spending bill because of a few items of pork when this action may jeopardize funding for our troops, for our homeland security or for the education of our children?"

Ryan made several changes to the measure in a bid to ease criticism from Democrats and others who said the original version was tilted too far in the president's favor.

The new plan modified the Bush proposal to ensure he could not paper Congress with spending-cut proposals and require repeated votes on the same item. The new power would expire after a six-year trial. But Ryan also narrowed the measure's application against special interest tax breaks so that, as a practical matter, few such provisions could be targeted by the president.

"It is so watered down that it is not a line-item veto," said Rep. Jim Cooper (news, bio, voting record), D-Tenn.

Nonetheless, Cooper was one of the four Democrats on the panel to support the bill. Others such as top panel Democrat John Spratt Jr. of South Carolina opposed the bill despite supporting similar measures in the 1990s that were weaker alternatives to the line-item veto.

Meanwhile, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., unveiled a broader budget overhaul plan. In addition to a similar mechanism to require revotes on projects deemed wasteful by the president, the bill would revive the old Gramm-Rudman mechanism of setting hard deficit targets and requiring across-the-board cuts if they are not met. The measure sets a target of a reducing the deficit to .5 percent of the size of the economy within six years.

"It will lead to a balanced budget for sure by 2012," Gregg said.

Unlike the Gramm-Rudman law, the across-the-board cuts would apply not just to programs passed by Congress each year but also to benefit programs such as Medicare, welfare and unemployment insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0034480

Gregg's proposal, which is likely to clear the Budget Committee but stall thereafter, would also put Congress on a two-year budget cycle and establish a commission to make recommendations to keep Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid solvent.

"The Republican majority simply has no credibility when it comes to our nation's budget. Under their watch, record surpluses have turned into record deficits," said Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D. "A Republican effort to change budget process rules now is like having the foxes change how they guard the chickens."

Earmarker In Chief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

The Congressional debate over "earmarks" continues, and not in a way that makes the GOP majority look good. This week the Members are pushing through another 1,500 special spending projects, even as the controversy has engulfed California's Jerry Lewis, who as House Appropriations Chairman is earmarker in chief.

Federal investigators are examining whether Mr. Lewis abused his position by steering earmarks to his political friends and former employees. In one case, the Justice Department is investigating whether defense industry lobbyists were urged to contribute money to a political action committee run by Mr. Lewis's stepdaughter, with a good portion of the money used for her own salary.

Another aspect of the probe is said to be whether Mr. Lewis steered hundreds of millions of dollars in earmarked projects to the clients of his friend, campaign contributor and former House colleague Bill Lowery. One of Mr. Lowery's clients is an unindicted co-conspirator in the bribery scandal that sent former Republican Congressman Duke Cunningham to jail for approving earmarks to defense contractors in exchange for personal gifts.

The lobbying firm's defense clients receive hundreds of millions of dollars in federal contracts from Appropriations. Two of the top rainmakers at Mr. Lowery's firm have been former Appropriations staffers who worked for Mr. Lewis. This week, the Los Angeles Times reported that Mr. Lowery's firm paid one of those staffers, Jeffrey Shockey, nearly $2 million when he left the firm and returned to Appropriations when Mr. Lewis became Chairman in 2005. Roll Call newspaper also reported this week that Mr. Shockey's former lobbying firm received more than $1 million in higher fees from government contractors shortly after he returned to Capitol Hill.

Mr. Lewis recently hired a top criminal defense team and denies any wrongdoing. He says that all earmarks and contracts went for projects with the "highest standards of public benefit." But even if all of this is technically legal, the cronyism and revolving door between Congress and lobbyists look terrible and certainly won't help Republicans restore an image of fiscal rectitude before November.

More broadly, the Lewis episode underscores the link between Member-steered earmarks and the opportunity for corruption. Convicted super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff openly boasted that earmarks were his political currency and he called the Appropriations Committee that doles them out a "favor factory" for lobbyists. Duke Cunningham parlayed earmarks into a Rolls Royce in his driveway, until his greed landed him in the pokey. We also now know that one of the major beneficiaries of the most notorious earmark from last year -- the $300 million Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska -- is a relative of GOP Senator Lisa Murkowski.

This spring, House Republicans elected new leaders and promised to restrain earmarking. But this week the House is busily approving a $68 billion Treasury, Transportation and Housing and Urban Development spending bill stuffed with more than 1,500 new earmarks at a cost of some $900 million.

They include $500,000 for a scenic trail in Monterey, California; $1.5 million for the William Faulkner Museum in Oxford, Mississippi; $500,000 for a swimming pool in Columbus, Ohio; and $500,000 for an athletic facility in Yucaipa, California. Several of these projects, including the athletic facility, have been promoted by Bill Lowery's lobbying firm -- the very firm in the middle of the Jerry Lewis probe.

Yesterday, Jeff Flake of Arizona and other Members offered amendments to strip the earmarks, but they lost those floor votes by a wide margin. Our favorite: a $500,000 earmark for renovating a swimming pool in Banning, California. The same pool had already received a $250,000 earmark in each of the previous two years. Mr. Flake's floor proposal to strike the swimming hole subsidy got all of 61 votes.

In a rare bit of good news, Congressman Mark Kirk of Illinois prevailed on his amendment to prohibit any federal funds for the Alaska bridge project. The House Budget Committee also passed yesterday, on a 24-9 bipartisan vote, a modified line-item veto that would give Presidents the ability to strip out some of the worst of these projects. One of the loudest critics of the item veto is, ahem, Mr. Lewis. But meanwhile, in the spending bills where it matters, Congress is earmarking as usual.

If Republicans aren't spooked by the Lewis investigation, they should be. Here is one of their major barons under investigation for the kind of high-handed spending favoritism that voters detest about Washington. Republicans won the House in 1994 in part because the House Bank and Post Office scandals revealed the arrogance of a Democratic majority that believed it could do anything and voters would never send them packing. If Republicans don't change their behavior, earmarking could be the story that does the same for them this year.

DOJ_NMG_0034481

House, Senate Members Disclose Finances (AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP, June 15, 2006

Lawmakers caught up in ethics investigations have plenty of cash — just in case they someday face hefty lawyers' bills.

House and Senate members detailed their finances Wednesday in the midst of public and government scrutiny of certain dealings that have caused Congress' popularity to drop.

The reports require lawmakers to list last year's assets and debts, along with any income beyond the $162,100 salary for the rank-and-file House and Senate members. Rules require lawmakers to donate their speaking fees to charity and to limit gifts from any individual to $100 in a year.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., holds blind trusts worth $7.5 million to $36 million. He reported making $5 million last year from the largest, worth between $5 million to $25 million.

Frist faces a Securities and Exchange Commission insider trading investigation over selling stock in a hospital company his family founded. He denies any wrongdoing and said he ordered the sales to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest as he considers running for president in 2008.

Rep. Charles Taylor (news, bio, voting record), R-N.C., founder and chairman of Blue Ridge Savings and Loan in Asheville, N.C., reported stock in a holding company for the bank worth more than $50 million. He also purchased 80 percent of a Russian bank and founded a Russian investment company.

State Democrats have called for congressional ethics and conflict of interest investigations into Taylor's banking activities and links to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in a federal bribery investigation.

Republican Tom DeLay of Texas, who resigned his House seat last week, showed his legal troubles have led him into sizable debt. DeLay reported owing $250,001 to $500,000 to four separate lawyers and law firms.

DeLay also reported individual and corporate contributions to a legal defense fund worth $588,320. He has predicted that legal bills will cost him $3 million.

Not every lawmaker under ethical scrutiny, who might amass large legal bills, can count on large bank accounts.

Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, under investigation at the Justice Department and the House ethics committee for his ties to Abramoff, reported no major assets or liabilities, nor any major outside sources of unearned income.

Ney, one of the recipients of an Abramoff golfing trip to Scotland, also reported no privately funded travel. He and his staff have said they stopped allowing any outside groups to pay for trips.

Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La., under investigation by the FBI for bribery, owns two tracts of farmland in Louisiana, each worth $50,001 to $100,000. He loaned $100,001 to $250,000 each to his mayoral and gubernatorial campaigns, as well as $50,001 to $100,000 to "Jefferson Interests." His office would not provide additional details.

Jefferson also reported three major liabilities. He owes between $50,001 and $100,000 each to Dryades Bank and Noah Samara, chairman and CEO of Worldspace Satellite Radio. He also has a $15,001 to $50,000 loan from Liberty Bank of New Orleans.

The FBI claims agents found $90,000 in bribe money stashed in Jefferson's home freezer. Jefferson has not been indicted and has denied all wrongdoing in connection with a federal investigation.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., this week acknowledged some inaccuracies in past financial statements and amended reports dating back to 2000, but he has denied improperly benefiting from his office. He reported owning part or all of properties in West Virginia, Washington and North Carolina, and he earned rent from several of those properties.

Books proved a lucrative source of income for multiple lawmakers.

Sen. Robert Byrd (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., earned $103,095 in royalties for "Losing America: Confronting a Reckless and Arrogant President." He used the money to pay for medical care for his wife, Erma, who died in March, spokesman Tom Gavin said.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., made $872,891 from her memoir, "Living History." She has reported earning $8.7 million from the work in prior years. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., reported royalties and a book advance. He revealed that with permission of the Senate Ethics Committee, he agreed with Random House to a $1.9 million advance against royalties for writing two nonfiction books and one children's book. He intends to donate $200,000 to charity.

DOJ_NMG_0034482

Sen. Byron Dorgan (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D., received an advance of $42,500 to write a book titled, "Take This Job and Ship It: How Corporate Greed and Brain Dead Politics is Selling Out America." Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., earned $5,175 in royalties for a reprinting of his 2003 book, "A Call to Service."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., received royalties worth $15,001 to $50,000 from publication of "Speaker: Lessons from Forty Years of Coaching and Politics." Sen. Trent Lott (news, bio, voting record), R-Miss., received a partial book advance of $106,210.

Some lawmakers were lucky last year. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, took home $2,700 in slot machine winnings. Sen. Judd Gregg (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H., won an $853,492 share of a $340 million multistate Powerball lottery jackpot.

Finances Are Laid Bare (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton And Elana Schor

The Hill, June 15, 2006

In filing financial disclosure forms along with other members of Congress last month, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) made scant reference to his business interests now being investigated by the FBI.

He reported that his wife, Andrea, drew a salary of undisclosed amount from the ANJ Group LLC, according to forms that were made public yesterday.

Jefferson's family set up ANJ in 2001, and by 2005 it had received $455,000 in payments from a company owned by Vernon Jackson, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson with the money, according to court records.

Jefferson's disclosure form gives no hint of three other businesses connected to the Justice Department's investigation of him. There is no mention of W2 International Broadband Services, a company registered in 2004 in Nigeria in which four of the lawmaker's daughters hold equity; no mention of International Broad Band Services, a company similarly structured as W2 but registered last year in Ghana; and no reference to Global Energy & Environmental Services, in which Jefferson's daughters were principals, according to legal documents.

If Jefferson's daughters have financial interests in those firms, Jefferson would not have to report it on the disclosure forms unless they were dependent children. Jefferson's spokeswoman, Melanie Roussell, declined to comment on alleged financial interests not listed on the form.

Meanwhile, the slew of filings made public yesterday brought to light a broad array of personally revealing and sometimes quirky details of lawmakers' private lives.

PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS

Two senators weighing White House bids in 2008 incurred new family credit-card debt last year. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) placed between $15,000 and $50,000 in a Senate Federal Credit Union account. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) reported three small new charge-card debts and one American Express Platinum debt of $100,001-$250,000, all in his wife's name.

The McCains maintain a multimillion-dollar asset portfolio, most of it stemming from Cindy McCain's lucrative family liquor-distribution business.

McCain's partner in campaign-finance reform, Sen. Russl Feingold (D-Wis.), reported a more modest net worth of no more than $116,000. He took out a second mortgage on his home last year, worth between $50,001 and $100,000.

GAMBLING

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) reported winning $2,700 playing slot machines at the Kewadin Casinos on Michigan's Upper Peninsula. Rep. Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.) reported winning $19,500 at the Cities of Gold Casino in Pojoaque, N.M. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) reported winning more than $800,000 last year playing the lottery.

BOOK ROYALTIES

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) reported a $250,000 advance on his book, Herding Cats: A Life in Politics. Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) reported more than $100,000 in royalties from Losing America: Confronting a Reckless and Arrogant Presidency. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) inked a deal last January giving him a $1.9 million advance for two nonfiction books and a children's book. At least two likely presidential hopefuls have reported plans to write books that could serve as campaign tools. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) reported that he has agreed to write a book with his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, on the environment. McCain revealed that he has "several agreements" with Random House to write books.

SPOUSES

A few lawmakers reported large income streams from their spouses. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) reported that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, received $7.5 million for speeches worldwide. His highest fee was $350,000 for speeches in the Canary Islands and Toronto.

DOJ_NMG_0034483

Other congressional spouses drew new salaries last year from campaign work, including the wife of House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas).

LANDOWNERS

Several members made a profit on real estate. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) sold 31 of his 41 acres of farmland in Stafford, Mo., in a deal valued at $100,000-$250,000, while Jefferson sold a New Orleans house in that same price range.

The wife of Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) acquired a second home in Thessaloniki, Greece, which had been his father-in-law's family home, according to disclosures. Ney reported $15,000-$50,000 of income on the European abode but listed it as a rental property.

Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.) continued buying land in Nicaragua, spending $50,001-$100,000 for a lot in San Juan del Sur. He recently married the daughter of a deposed Guatemalan leader and alleged dictator.

Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) complemented his interest in the Central Valley ranch long owned by his family with a new rental property in his wife's name, valued at $250,000-$500,000. Pombo faces ethics questions over his ranching, including a complaint last month from the left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) over legislative acts allegedly intended to benefit his family.

Across the aisle, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) reported enhanced value on property he owns in Sunny Isles, Fla., in addition to a Dominican villa that held steady in value. Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) sold farmland in Phillips City, Ark., a deal worth $100,000-$250,000.

PAYING DOWN DEBT

Several lawmakers reported paying off the lion's share of their credit-card balances in 2005. Rep. Bobby Scott (D-Va.) cleared up charge-card debt that had hit at least $80,000 in 2003 but reported higher margin loans with three brokerage houses that could have helped fund multiple new mutual-fund investments he made last year.

Rep. Gary Ackerman's ((D-N.Y.) form reported two cards with outstanding balances of $25,000-$65,000, an improvement from last year's assorted credit-card liabilities worth as much as $100,000. Ackerman's asset-backed personal-loan debt, however, more than tripled since 2003 and now stands $50,000-$100,000.

Barton closed his revolving charge account with Bank One, and Rep. Howard Berman (Calif.), the ethics committee's new ranking Democrat, reported clearing out MBNA and Citibank balances of $10,000-$15,000. Berman still has $10,000-$15,000 on a Discover card, according to his report.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) reported a new spousal charge balance $10,000-$15,000, but he noted that the Visa debt was paid off within 30 days. Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.) paid off outstanding charges in full, and Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) reported no more debt on Target and SunTrust credit cards along with a remaining balance on a Citibank business account.

Jefferson amended his disclosure to add a revolving charge account with MBNA that held a $15,001-$50,000 balance.

Erica Flint, Natalie McGill, and Ari Ruben contributed to this report.

Many Lawmakers Accepted Free Travel In 2005 (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Singed by controversy over complimentary travel, many members of Congress nevertheless accepted free trips in 2005, according to annual financial disclosure reports released yesterday.

Rep. Michael Oxley (R., Ohio), chairman of the Financial Services Committee, reported two trips, including six days of travel to Edinburgh, Scotland, paid for by the Transatlantic Policy Network, a group promoting U.S.-European relations sponsored by big companies such as Boeing Co. and Siemens AG.

Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.), head of the House Judiciary Committee, took six trips, including a week's sojourn through Paris, Liechtenstein and Stuttgart, Germany, paid for by the International Management and Development Institute, a corporate-funded group run by a lobbyist; and another weeklong trip to Sydney covered by the American Australian Association. The National Cable and Telecommunications Association paid for Mr. Sensenbrenner and a relative to travel to San Francisco for a three-day trip, and the National Association of Broadcasters funded travel to Las Vegas.

Lobbyist-sponsored travel has figured in recent Capitol Hill scandals and driven down public opinion of Congress. Senate hearings brought to light that former lobbyist Jack Abramoff had brought former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and other lawmakers on trips to Scotland and the Marianas Islands. Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who is the subject of a federal influence-peddling investigation, reported no gifts or trips. He is under scrutiny for joining a 2002 Abramoff trip to Scotland.

While the House and Senate reports showed scant evidence that members were grounding themselves, or paying their own way, the scandals seem to have persuaded many to make extra efforts to note anything that could come back to haunt them, on the campaign trail or in a prosecutor's office, in what normally is a routine, annual release of assets and debts by all members of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0034484

Although nonpartisan watchdog groups have called on Congress to ban such travel, lawmakers distanced themselves from such a provision after businesses -- led by the National Association of Manufacturers -- objected, saying the measure would unfairly restrict a legitimate way by which organizations and businesses educate lawmakers about their issues.

Some Democrats also were frequent travelers in 2005. New York Rep. Charles Rangel, the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, took a four-day trip to Taipei, care of the Democratic Pacific Assembly, which promotes U.S.-Taiwan relations. He also went to St. Thomas for a three-day trip covered by the New York Carib News, a weekly newspaper for Caribbean-Americans, as did Rep. David Scott (D., Ga.).

Rep. Anna Eshoo (D., Calif.) reported a nine-day, $6,900 trip to Dublin with family members, sponsored by the Aspen Congressional Institute.

As for Mr. DeLay -- who left Congress just last week -- his forms show little official travel in 2005, although he used his legal-expense fund to pay for trips related to his legal troubles. For instance, the fund ferried him three times from Houston to Austin, where a grand jury was reviewing the allegations against him.

Facing money-laundering charges in Texas, he said he owes as much as $1.4 million in legal fees. In his disclosure, Mr. DeLay reported contributions to his legal defense fund of $588,000 in 2005. That money, plus an infusion of donations earlier this year, helped pay down Mr. DeLay's legal fees to the levels roughly estimated in his disclosure report, said Brent C. Perry, an attorney overseeing the fund.

Another legislator facing a criminal probe, Louisiana Democrat Rep. William J. Jefferson, suspected of taking bribes, has paid nearly $100,000 in legal bills, according to his report.

--John R. Wilke and Christopher Cooper contributed to this article.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", June 12, 2006

Libby Defense Team Considers Memory Expert

The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year.

Libby is charged with five counts of lying to federal investigators and the grand jury and obstructing an investigation into whether Bush administration officials wrongfully disclosed the identity of a CIA agent. He has pleaded not guilty.

Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony. At a status hearing Monday, Libby's attorneys said they would notify the judge by July 17 if they plan to call such a witness, and the government could then object. – Anne Marie Squeo

Clintons Say Their Income Topped $8 Million Last Year (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton had income of more than $8 million last year, mainly from speaking fees Mr. Clinton collected, according to disclosure forms released by the senator's office yesterday.

The Senate disclosure also shows that Mrs. Clinton earned $872,891 from her book "Living History," which was published in 2003 and has been released in paperback. That is down from last year, when she reported earning $2.3 million in royalties from her memoir. In 2001, Simon & Schuster paid her nearly $8 million to write the book.

The disclosure did not detail Mr. Clinton's earnings from sales of his book "My Life," which when published in 2004 was widely estimated to have generated $10 million to $12 million in income. Mrs. Clinton was required to disclose only that her husband received at least $1,000 in payments for his memoir.

Mrs. Clinton's disclosure was among scores of statements that senators, who must publicly report their personal finances each year, filed in the Senate. The disclosures give a rough financial picture, with assets reported within a range rather than in exact dollar amounts.

In the senator's disclosure on Tuesday, she and her husband reported having a joint bank account worth $5 million to $25 million, as well as a blind trust worth $5 million to $25 million. That was the same amount they reported last year but substantially greater than in 2003, when reports valued their assets at a minimum of $2 million.

DOJ_NMG_0034485

One major source of income was the speaking fees Mr. Clinton collected. The statement showed that he earned more than $7.5 million for 43 speeches that he gave to groups as varied as the Goldman Sachs Group, the Lancaster, Pa., Chamber of Commerce, the Young Presidents' Organization and Leading Minds in Dubai in the United Arab Emirates.

The $7.5 million far surpassed the $875,000 he earned for speaking engagements in 2004, when his speaking schedule was slowed because he was busy releasing his memoir, traveling around the nation promoting it, opening his presidential library in Arkansas and undergoing heart surgery.

In 2003, he earned more than $4 million for speeches given worldwide.

Mrs. Clinton also reported that her husband received at least $1,000 in payments from Yucaipa Companies, a California private equity firm controlled by one of his best friends, the billionaire Ronald W. Burkle. After leaving the White House in 2001, Mr. Clinton agreed to be an adviser to a family of funds run by the Yucaipa Companies.

Local Politicians' Asset Reports Released (WP)

By Bill Turque And Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Sen. George Allen, a likely contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, listed assets of between $1.8 million and $3.6 million, according to financial disclosure reports filed by Virginia, Maryland and District lawmakers that were released yesterday.

The annual reports, which cover calendar year 2005, show that the bulk of Allen's wealth comes from commercial rental property in Charlottesville valued at more than $1 million and 98.5 undeveloped acres in Albermarle County valued at between $250,000 and $500,000.

The rest is held in stocks and bonds, including shares in Dominion Resources Inc. that are held by Allen's wife, Susan, and are worth between $100,000 and $250,000, according to the filings.

Susan Allen resigned her seat on the board of directors of the Richmond-based electric and natural gas utility last year after Allen's appointment to the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee raised conflict-of-interest questions. The company is one of Allen's steadiest campaign contributors.

Allen (R-Va.), in a reelection fight against Republican-turned-Democrat James Webb in November, listed as his sole liability a mortgage on investment property in Winston-Salem, N.C., valued at between $50,000 and $100,000. Lawmakers are required to provide ranges of dollar values instead of precise amounts.

The report also shows that Allen took relatively few privately funded trips last year, traveling to Palm Springs, Colorado Springs, Las Vegas and Florida for speeches and conferences for the Heritage Foundation, the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation, the Consumer Electronics Association and the Faith and Politics Institute.

Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), reported assets of between $780,000 and $1.7 million, a sharp drop from past disclosures. A spokesman for Warner said the dip is attributable to his purchase of a home in Alexandria, which is not listed as an asset.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who reported assets of between $435,000 and $1.2 million, received perhaps the most lavish gift reported by a member of the region's congressional delegation. He and his wife, state Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), were flown to Italy last year by real estate developer Robert F. Pence, who was celebrating his 60th birthday and is a longtime friend of Rep. Davis and a prominent GOP campaign contributor. The trip included a chartered cruise along the Amalfi coast and a visit to Venice.

Davis said that he initially thought the trip, valued at $13,110, was "a stretch" of House ethics rules. But it was cleared by the House Ethics Committee.

Among Maryland lawmakers, Paul S. Sarbanes (D), 73, who is retiring after 30 years in the Senate, reported assets of between $167,000 and $430,000, in addition to a house valued between $250,000 and $500,000. Long active in Greek American groups, Sarbanes received a marble vase valued at $837 from Hellenic Public Radio-Cosmos FM as part of an award for public service, according to the filing. A member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he reported six privately funded trips last year to Princeton University, his alma mater, where he serves as a trustee.

Barbara A. Mikulski (D), first elected to the Senate in 1986, reported assets of between $172,000 and $572,000. She did not report the value of any real estate.

In the House, Maryland's two Republicans and six Democrats reported taking few privately financed trips. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), who is vying to succeed Sarbanes, took what has become an annual trip funded by the Commonwealth Fund and Harvard in January 2005, attending a weekend health policy conference in January in Florida. Cardin's room and board were paid for, but not airfare. The costs were not disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0034486

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D) disclosed 11 privately funded trips, many of them to appear before African American groups or on behalf of the Democratic Party. He reported donating speaking fees totaling about $8,000 to charity.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D), the House minority whip, traveled to New Orleans, Birmingham, Montgomery and Selma, Ala., and to Israel on privately funded trips. The travel tabs were picked up by the Democratic Leadership Council, the Faith and Politics Institute, and the American Israel Education Fund, respectively.

Other Maryland lawmakers -- Democratic Reps. Chris Van Hollen and Albert R. Wynn, C. A. "Dutch" Ruppersberger, and Republican Reps. Roscoe G. Bartlett and Wayne T. Gilchrest, reported no privately subsidized trips.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) reported assets of between $843,000 and $2.2 million. She listed four privately financed trips: to Queenstown, Md.; Hartford, Conn.; and two to New York. The trips were sponsored by the Public Governance Institute, Yale University, the American Federation of Teachers and the New York Human Rights Commission.

Hastert Staffer Pulled Senators' Forms (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

A senior aide to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pulled the financial disclosure forms of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and at least three other Republican Senators late last month, Senate records show.

According to those records, Hastert aide Tim Kennedy accessed the financial records for Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski and Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana in addition to Frist on May 19.

The motive for the request is unclear, and neither Kennedy nor Hastert aides Ted Van Der Meid and Ron Bonjean responded to several requests for comment.

The documents are publicly available. But while several veteran Senators declined to comment on the story, they visibly were taken aback when asked about Kennedy's research and indicated they had never heard of one chamber's leader researching the finances of Members of the other chamber.

A review of news stories during the week of May 19 do not show any particular tensions that involved all four Senators, and they do not all serve on a single committee.

But the Senate and House leaderships regularly have been at odds this year, with simmering differences over both substance and process exacerbated by a general Republican fracturing amid President Bush's decline in popularity.

The period when the files were taken, for instance, coincided with a stretch of bicameral sniping over the size of the fiscal 2006 supplemental spending bill.

Burns' office declined to comment. A spokesman for Murkowski said, "It's public information and anyone has the right to it." A spokeswoman for Frist did not return requests for comment, while a Stevens spokeswoman echoed the sentiments of Murkowski's office.

A Democratic Senate aide questioned the review, noting it was particularly surprising that Hastert's aides were looking into the finances of other Republicans. And while "there could be a good reason that they're looking, ... it's a good sign [for Democrats] that they're turning on themselves," the aide said.

Kennedy works under two of Hastert's top aides, Van Der Meid and Michael Stokke. A source close to Hastert said it was unlikely the Speaker knew his office was researching the finances of Senate Republicans. However, the source did say that Kennedy is a key staffer for Van Der Meid and Stokke with a wide range of duties, including working with the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Two days before Kennedy trekked across the Capitol to access Frist's financial forms in the Senate Records Room, Hastert harshly rejected a Senate proposal to make an across-the-board cut to the supplemental spending bill.

In a statement released May 17, Hastert rejected the proposal, saying, "Any calls from the Senate for an across-the-board cut to make room for a bloated supplemental will be met by a busy signal in the House. The House will not join a shell-game spending spree with taxpayer dollars."

Frist's proposal was made in part to help make room for a number of proposals either authored by one of the four Members Kennedy researched or that would benefit their constituents.

For instance, Frist himself penned a massive avian flu spending package that the Senate included in its version of the supplemental. Burns strongly backed an amendment that added millions of dollars in new disaster relief spending for agriculture. And the bill included numerous earmarks that would have benefited Alaska, Tennessee and Montana.

A Mountain Of Riches On Capitol Hill (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Richard Simon And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034487

Annual disclosure data offer a look at the finances of lawmakers and their top aides.

WASHINGTON — A top aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) reported Wednesday that he received more money than he previously disclosed from a lobbying firm that has come under scrutiny for its ties to Lewis.

The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, corrected his financial disclosure reports to reveal that his salary in 2004 from Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White totaled about $500,000 more than he had reported.

He also collected nearly $2 million from the firm as a payout when he left to return to work for Lewis in 2005.

The firm, whose partners include former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-San Diego), a longtime Lewis friend, is being examined as part of a federal investigation into the practice among lawmakers of slipping federal money for special-interest projects into spending bills.

Lowery's firm represents a number of cities, institutions and businesses in Lewis' district that have received federal funds. The firm also has helped Lewis raise tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions, which helped his drive to gain the Appropriations Committee chairmanship in 2005.

On Friday, Shockey released advance copies of his disclosure report showing that he had received far more than had generally been known — $1.96 million — as a payout from the lobbying firm. On Wednesday, Shockey disclosed that in addition to that payment, he received a higher salary from the firm than previously reported, up from $1.5 million to over $2 million.

Lawyers for Shockey, who also had worked for Lewis before he joined the lobbying firm, said in a letter that the $1.5-million figure was his salary in 2003. They said the error involving his 2004 salary was discovered this week during a review of his financial accounts.

Shockey's high level of compensation — as he moved from Capitol Hill to the lobbying world and back again — shows the value corporate and other interests place on obtaining help in getting federal spending directives, known as earmarks, put onto federal spending bills.

Lewis and Shockey, through his lawyers, say they have done nothing wrong in the roles they have played in the earmarking process and have not been contacted by investigators. Shockey's lawyers point out that their client asked the Ethics Committee to review his compensation from the lobbying firm at the time he returned to public service.

Shockey's report was just one of hundreds released Wednesday by members of Congress and their senior aides. The annual disclosure reports offer a glimpse into the private financial affairs of lawmakers, and although assets and liabilities are detailed only within broad ranges, the information makes it clear that most legislators are well-off.

The reports show that at least 22 of California's 53 House members have assets of more than $1 million.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and her husband, investment banker Richard Blum, have assets that have been estimated to exceed $35 million. She filed one of the thickest reports: 172 pages.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), in her 10-page statement, reported that her assets consist almost entirely of a blind trust valued at $1 million to $5 million.

Investments by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and her husband include a St. Helena vineyard valued at $5 million to $25 million.

Several California lawmakers were given more time to file their reports, including Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Vista), who previously has ranked among the wealthiest House members.

The report filed by Lewis and his wife, Arlene Willis, who is his chief of staff, showed them with assets valued at $715,000 to $1.6 million, with no liabilities.

According to the report, the 71-year-old congressman sold stock and a parcel of land in 2005 with a combined value of $30,000 to $100,000.

In the wake of several scandals that raised concerns about influence peddling on Capitol Hill, many lawmakers appear to be taking fewer trips paid for by special interests.

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), who has faced criticism for a 2002 visit to Scotland arranged by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, took no trips last year.

Earlier this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to charges that included defrauding clients and engaging in schemes to bribe members of Congress.

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.), the subject of a federal probe into possible links between his personal business activities and his duties as a member of the House Appropriations Committee, on Tuesday released amendments to his disclosure reports from 1999 to 2004 to correct what he called "a limited number of inadvertent errors."

Also, he released a chronology showing how his assets grew from less than $550,000 in 2000 to more than $8 million in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0034488

Mollohan resigned from the House Ethics Committee earlier this year after federal agents began probing his personal finances.

Mollohan's 2005 disclosure statement revealed that he received a loan valued at $15,000 to $50,000 from Don and Laura K. Kuhns.

Laura Kuhns is a former Mollohan aide who invested in real estate with Mollohan and also heads a West Virginia foundation that received earmarks requested by the congressman. Mollohan reported that he repaid the loan from the Kuhnses with 6% interest.

Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), the target of a bribery investigation by federal agents who last year found $90,000 in his kitchen freezer, has debts ranging from $130,000 to as much as $300,000, according to his report.

Jefferson acquired the debt last year without any significant change in his assets, the report indicates.

He had listed no liabilities in the previous two years.

Jefferson's debts include as much as $150,000 to two New Orleans banks and up to $50,000 on a revolving charge with MBNA, a subsidiary of Bank of America.

He also reported owing up to $100,000 to Noah A. Samara, chief executive of WorldSpace Inc., which works to provide digital satellite services to emerging markets in Africa and Asia.

Jefferson was caught on videotape accepting $100,000 from a business associate, whom he allegedly agreed to help win overseas telecommunications contracts in exchange for a third of the profits.

FBI agents later searched Jefferson's freezer and found $90,000 of that money wrapped in foil, according to an affidavit.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing. No charges have been filed, but his legal bills have begun to mount.

His disclosure report showed contributions to his legal defense fund totaling nearly $85,000.

Many lawmakers found a variety of ways to supplement their congressional salary, currently $165,200 a year for those not serving in top leadership positions.

The wives of six California House members — Republicans John T. Doolittle of Roseville, Richard W. Pombo of Tracy, Elton Gallegly of Simi Valley and Dana Rohrabacher of Huntington Beach; and Democrats Pete Stark of Fremont and Bob Filner of Chula Vista — earned money working on their husbands' campaigns.

Lawmakers are not required to list spouses' salaries on the forms. But Rohrabacher reported that his wife earned $41,055 from his campaign committee.

Stark said his wife was paid $2,400 a month to work on his campaign. Filner said his wife's salary was about $45,000.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former President Clinton earned more than $8 million from speeches and book royalties.

The former president was paid for 43 speeches, collecting up to $350,000 for an appearance.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) earned $50,000 in royalties from a book about his dog, "My Senator and Me." He was one of about a dozen senators who received money from books. Boxer took in about $16,000 from a novel she wrote.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) reported $2,700 in slot machine winnings.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) did better: He collected $853,492 in the Powerball lottery.

Lewis Aide Restates '04 Income (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Acknowledging a $500,000 error in income disclosure for a top aide to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), lawyers filed corrected disclosure reports Wednesday to show that Jeff Shockey earned more than $2 million in 2004, his final year with a lobbying firm that specializes in appropriations earmarks.

Shockey, the committee's deputy staff director, initially had reported that he earned $1.5 million during his last year with the firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, which is now under a federal probe regarding its connections to Lewis.

After a flurry of media reports about Copeland Lowery and the $2 million buyout Shockey received from the firm in 2005, Shockey's lawyers and accountants scrubbed his finances and discovered that he had misreported his 2004 income on a financial disclosure report filed in April 2005.

His income for 2003 was $1.5 million, according to a letter from William Oldaker, Shockey's lawyer, while the 2004 income from Copeland Lowery actually topped $2 million.

Combined with the buyout package he received in 2005 — which was paid out in full by Aug. 1 of that year — Shockey was paid more than $5.5 million by Copeland Lowery over little more than two and a half years.

DOJ_NMG_0034489

"The need to adjust the amount of income disclosed on Mr. Shockey's new employee report [from 2005] was discovered earlier this week and immediately thereafter his accountants were consulted to ensure the accuracy of the information," Oldaker and his partner, William Farah, of Oldaker, Biden and Belair, wrote Wednesday in a letter to the Clerk of the House.

Late last month, the FBI examined the financial disclosure form Shockey filed last year, along with additional reports from those of Lewis, Lewis' wife and another former committee aide now working at Copeland Lowery. Federal investigators have subpoenaed records from at least seven clients of Copeland Lowery seeking records relating to their retaining the firm and anything related to Lewis.

Lewis, the firm and Shockey's lawyers have denied any wrongdoing.

Oldaker said Shockey's taxes were not completed in the spring of 2005, when he needed to file his disclosure report, and that the lobbying firm's complicated partnership payouts did not allow him to know his precise income until August. Without precise information, he reported his 2003 income instead.

A source close to Shockey called it "inadvertent human error" that he didn't correct the income report until this week, nearly 10 months after his final 2004 taxes were filed. The source said Shockey had no incentive to misreport his income.

Also, Shockey's camp believes this latest disclosure may further justify and explain the size of his buyout package, which came in at $1.96 million spread across several payments last year while he was on Lewis' staff.

"This shows that his business was growing. It wasn't a dramatic increase from one year to the next," the source said.

The amount Shockey earned in 2004 also indicates that it is likely the firm was billing clients for consulting work performed that it didn't consider lobbying and was not reported publicly. As Roll Call reported Wednesday, Shockey's clients paid the firm about $1.74 million in 2004.

According to documents in his disclosure reports, Shockey's partnership deal called for him to receive all revenues he brought in after subtracting 18 percent for administrative costs. With a little more than $1.7 million in lobbying revenue, Shockey likely would have had to bring in several hundred thousand dollars of additional revenue to get more than $2 million in pay from the firm in 2004.

The size of the buyout package has raised eyebrows among government watchdogs.

The payout was predicated on the projected revenue stream of Shockey's former clients in the first half of 2005, who in the first half of 2004 had paid just $580,000 in publicly reported revenue.

Copeland Lowery estimated in January 2005 that Shockey's clients would produce $1.5 million in revenue for the firm in the first half of that year; that sum, along with another $420,000 in payments based on profits and already performed work, led to the size of the buyout package, according to Shockey's lawyers.

In terms of publicly reported lobbying revenue, the firm hit its estimate almost exactly, as Shockey's former clients paid $1.46 million to Copeland Lowery by mid-2005.

It's unclear whether there were additional, non-lobbying consulting payments on top of that to the firm from the aide's former clients.

Shockey's lawyers have said he is acting ethically and within all bounds of laws, noting that he is not in charge of the earmark projects on the committee that Copeland Lowery and his former clients are pursuing. And he officially has recused himself from dealing with any clients of Alexandra Shockey, his wife, who is doing subcontracting work for the firm on behalf of an undisclosed number of former clients of her husband.

At least 19 of his former clients — out of 49 in 2004, according to his disclosure forms — have been picked up by Letitia White, a former Lewis staffer who went to work for the firm in 2003. Her financial disclosure forms from her final four years working on Capitol Hill were reviewed by the FBI last month.

Jefferson Vote Expected Today (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson's (La.) fight to retain his seat on the Ways and Means Committee will come to a head this afternoon, with the House Democratic Caucus reconvening at 5 p.m. to resume debate on a motion that was tabled last week to strip him of the plum position.

Even Jefferson's backers, who contend the Louisianan is being singled out for reprisal by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), concede the numbers don't look good for him.

"It would appear to me that the leader has the support of the Caucus," acknowledged Rep. Donald Payne (D-N.J.), an outspoken critic of the Pelosi-initiated drive for Jefferson's expulsion from the panel.

Jefferson, who is caught up in a federal bribery probe, has steadfastly resisted Pelosi's calls to leave the exclusive committee "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus."

DOJ_NMG_0034490

His options seemed exhausted last Thursday night, when Pelosi called a surprise meeting of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, a 50-member body dominated by the Leader's allies, which formally recommended Jefferson's removal. Within hours, the full Caucus was called into session to ratify the motion, but before a vote could be taken, Rep. Mel Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, complained that the hasty scheduling of the meeting violated Caucus bylaws. The proceedings were then postponed for one week.

Later that night, Watt issued a public statement blasting the pending move — a step he had warned Pelosi weeks earlier that he would take if she acted to force Jefferson out before he was actually charged with any crime. In the intervening days, some CBC members have echoed Watt's defense of their colleague, noting that other Members suspected of wrongdoing but who had not been charged have not faced the loss of exclusive committee assignments.

The debate has been somewhat muted, with some leading CBC figures, including Reps. Charlie Rangel (N.Y.) and James Clyburn (S.C.), noticeably seeking to stay out of the mix. Clyburn is also the chairman of the Democratic Caucus and is an ally of Pelosi. Rangel, insiders say, has viewed Jefferson with suspicion for years, believing his Ways and Means colleague too often sides with Republicans on free trade issues. Watt, too, has refused to say much beyond his initial statement, ducking reporters during House votes this week.

One source estimated that about two-thirds of the CBC's 43 members were opposed to Jefferson's ouster. And there were some CBC members, most notably Payne and Maryland Rep. Albert Wynn, who went out of their way to press Jefferson's case in public this week. Jefferson also received some help from the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus, a group of 32 legislators from his home state who sent Pelosi a letter last week arguing that Jefferson's role on Ways and Means was vital to Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

"Your request that Congressman William Jefferson resign his seat on the Ways and Means Committee will result in penalizing the citizens who, though displaced, still proudly call the Second Congressional District home," state Rep. Cedric Richmond, the group's chairman, wrote.

The lack of unanimity among CBC members is likely the result of two factors: a sense from some that Jefferson's indictment is imminent and that a fight is, thus, futile; and Jefferson's past alienation from some of the group's members. Indeed, Jefferson was defeated when he vied with Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.) for the CBC's chairmanship in 1996.

Mindful that a loud outcry from black leaders in Washington, D.C., could create a ballot-box backlash among what is one of her party's most reliable voting blocs, Pelosi granted several interviews to black print and broadcast outlets this week, seeking to explain away any concerns about her posture.

Thursday's Caucus meeting should last a little over an hour, Clyburn indicated today, with each side being given 30 minutes to make its case. Clyburn, who once again refused to express his opinion on the matter, said he will ask unanimous consent to allow Jefferson to speak.

If passed, Jefferson's committee removal will then go to the House floor under a unanimous consent agreement. Technically, a Member of either party could object and force a floor debate. It's doubtful Republicans would do so since they might be seen as aiding an ethically compromised politician. Watt indicated he hadn't reviewed parliamentary options and had no idea if he or other CBC members would pursue the matter beyond the Caucus vote.

"I'm focused on the fact that there is no historical precedent and no rule that is being applied consistently," he said.

Senator's HHS Trip For Antibiotic Data Yields Only Ire (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

After months of trying to get firsthand information from a government official familiar with a controversial new antibiotic, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) marched into the Department of Health and Human Services headquarters yesterday asserting his congressional right to receive the data.

After a brief meeting with senior HHS and Food and Drug Administration officials, Grassley departed empty-handed and angry.

"This is extraordinary for me," the senior Republican said outside the headquarters. "I haven't had to go to an agency like this since 1983 to get information I requested.

"I smell a coverup."

FDA officials denied any impropriety, saying they were cooperating with Grassley's staff and had sent 400 boxes of documents related to the approval and safety of the drug, Ketek. Some information had to be withheld, the agency said, because of continuing investigations.

The senator, a persistent critic of the FDA, said he went to HHS out of frustration over the agency's refusal to make available one employee involved with an investigation into the antibiotic. A powerful drug approved in 2004 for the treatment of chronic lung and sinus infections, it has been at the center of the newest controversy over the agency's actions in reviewing new drugs and monitoring their safety.

DOJ_NMG_0034491

Liver failure and disease associated with the drug have been reported, but the overriding issue involves the integrity of the clinical trials done to establish its safety and efficacy.

The agency acknowledges that there were major improprieties in a 25,000-patient clinical trial done for the drug's developer, Aventis. One person has gone to prison for fraud in connection with that trial, data from several other trial sites have been discarded because basic standards were not met, and the agency told the company it could not say anything about the trial results on its product label.

Nonetheless, the FDA allowed Aventis to use much of the data to support the company's contention that the drug is safe. It also allowed Aventis to present the data to an FDA advisory panel without telling its members of the widespread fraud allegations clouding the trial. Documents show that some FDA employees argued that the trial should have been discarded because of the company's inadequate oversight.

Grassley has pressed to speak with an agent in the FDA's Division of Scientific Investigations who, he said, "is key to understanding what the FDA did when it became clear that the safety study required by the FDA in order to approve the drug was fraudulent and faulty. Did FDA managers turn a blind eye and let the drug maker off too easy, or did the FDA do the right thing?"

In reply, FDA spokeswoman Susan Bro said: "We would like to do whatever we can to help [Grassley] fulfill his constitutional duty as well as ours to the American people. However, we will not compromise an ongoing investigation."

FDA officials also said that having a senator interview a government investigator in the midst of an inquiry raised the possibility of politicizing criminal proceedings.

Ketek is one of the few antibiotics developed and approved in recent years. The agency has made a priority of encouraging companies to work in the field of antibiotics, which inevitably become less useful as bacteria become resistant.

"We don't want to disincentivize companies interested in going after these bad bugs," Bro said.

The maker of Ketek, now named Sanofi-Aventis, did not return a phone call. Earlier this month, the company stopped recruiting children for a study of pediatric use of Ketek. The "pause" followed reports of four cases of serious liver damage in adults using the drug.

Bro said that the FDA-required labeling identifies the risks and that "we are currently looking at whether new data merits additional warnings."

Grassley has emerged in the past two years as a harsh critic of the FDA, which he accuses of being too close to the drug industry. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which oversees Medicare and Medicaid payments, he called a high-profile hearing in 2004 into the FDA's handling of the withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, and yesterday he said he is contemplating calling another regarding Ketek.

"I'm tired of the runaround," he said after leaving the HHS headquarters. He said that he told the agencies' officials that "I know it's probably not your intent to protect companies, to cover for companies."

"But I said that every time that you stand in the way of information getting out that ought to be public, that's the impression you give the American people."

House Deals Blow To 'Open Skies' As It Passes Latest Spending Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House approved a $139.6 billion transportation-and-housing bill after voting to deny funding for a Bush administration plan that would permit greater foreign ownership control of U.S. airlines in the future.

The 291-137 vote was the clearest test yet of political sentiment on the pending rules change, which the White House wants as part of its effort to negotiate an "open skies" agreement with the European Union deregulating trans-Atlantic air traffic.

As many as 97 Republicans joined Democrats in opposition; together with organized labor, Continental Airlines pressed hard for the amendment, at the expense of distressed carriers like Northwest Airlines and UAL Corp.'s United, which could benefit from more access to overseas capital and landing slots.

The action capped two days of budget debate in which the House softened Republican cuts from Amtrak passenger rail services and Internal Revenue Service operations. And by a 214-214 tie vote, the leadership turned back a Democratic amendment to protect older cities' claims to leased housing vouchers.

The greatest political bloodshed stemmed from an internal party fight over conservative attempts to strip out often small home-state projects inserted by the Appropriations leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0034492

At stake were federal grants, running from $100,000 to $1.5 million and covering everything from a William Faulkner museum in Mississippi to a community swimming pool in California and road improvements benefiting Xerox Corp. in upstate New York. Arizona Rep. Jeff Flake forced a series of votes that were doomed from the outset but gave him the opportunity to challenge the expenditures, including two sponsored by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis.

When an exasperated Texas Rep. Henry Bonilla bluntly suggested it was "insanity" for Mr. Flake to persist, the 44-year-old lawmaker snapped back, "The definition of insanity is assuming the taxpayers are buying this." Even before the bill passed last night, Mr. Flake issued a news release with the headline at the expense of Mr. Lewis already caught up in lobbying scandals: "California Gets Swimming Pool, Taxpayers Take a Bath."

The floor action came as the House Appropriations panel gave initial approval to the last of the dozen annual spending bills, a $62.9 billion measure funding the departments of State, Justice and Commerce as well as major science and regulatory agencies. Combined spending for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and National Science Foundation would increase by $551 million. But within the Commerce Department, more than $631 million would be cut, chiefly from the advanced technology program and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Among regulatory agencies, the Securities and Exchange Commission would get $880.5 million, a net increase of $17 million. But in the effort to find extra money to preserve popular law-enforcement programs, the Appropriations panel pared legal services to the poor, juvenile justice and Indian tribal programs.

The larger transportation-and-housing measure, adopted 406-22, is among the most unwieldy of the annual spending bills, covering three cabinet departments as well as the federal judiciary. The Treasury Department stands out in the mix, and with it, the IRS budget, which has become a regular target for amendments.

In a surprise for many tax writers, an amendment to block funding for an IRS plan to hire private-sector debt collectors to pursue delinquent taxpayers survived, despite opposition from Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Calif.). But the Appropriations leadership agreed on the floor to restore about a third of what had been a $63 million cut from this year's funding level for the IRS.

The airline foreign ownership rules fight has been brewing for months, with Continental a major player in promoting efforts to block the rule, since it doesn't believe the open-skies agreement will be to its advantage. Northwest and United have powerful allies in Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R., Mich.), the bill's manager, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.).

But much like the Dubai Ports World controversy earlier this year, the issue has hit a national-security chord, and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.) weighed in against the rules change because the airlines are used to move troops when needed.

The Sky's The Limit (WP)

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Here's a trade deal that could actually happen.

PROSPECTS FOR a breakthrough in global trade talks are slim, and most bilateral trade deals hold out only modest economic benefits. But there is an opportunity for valuable progress in the airline industry, one of the most regulated and protected corners of business. Last year the United States and the European Union negotiated an "open skies" agreement, which would scrap restrictions on transatlantic travel: All U.S. airlines would be free to bid for slots at all European airports; a carrier such as Air France would be free to offer flights between, say, Milan and Chicago, rather than being restricted to a few France-U.S. routes. But this deal, which promises convenient connections and lower fares for travelers, may never be implemented. European ministers are refusing to ratify it until they see the outcome of a separate effort to deregulate U.S. domestic airlines, which has become the subject of a fierce lobbying battle in Congress.

The congressional battle revolves around restrictions on foreign investment in American airlines. Because of anachronistic nationalism, foreigners can't own more than 25 percent of the voting stock in a U.S. airline, and they are not allowed to influence commercial decisions on fares, routes and so on. President Bush's Transportation Department, which has also advanced sensible reforms for the rail network, has proposed a slight relaxation in these restrictions. This promises a double win. Foreign capital and management ideas might revive flagging U.S. carriers. And liberalization would help to persuade European transport ministers to ratify the open-skies agreement.

This win-win formula is opposed by Continental Airlines, which jealously guards its access to London's Gatwick Airport and fears open-skies competition. To block the deal, Continental has joined with labor unions to lobby against relaxation of the rules on foreign ownership. The firm's officials assert that foreign investment in U.S. airlines would compromise national security. But foreigners would be barred from influence over safety or security, and the administration's proposal has the blessing of the Defense Department.

DOJ_NMG_0034493

Continental is looking out for its own business interests, pure and simple. The shame is that a powerful caucus in Congress is prepared to accept its specious arguments. Yesterday the House passed a measure that would delay the administration's reform for more than a year, jeopardizing a deal that could save travelers billions of dollars. The Senate has yet to vote on the issue. It should put national interests before vested interests.

House Panel Passes Bill To Look Closer At Foreign Investors (WSJ)

By Robert Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Financial Services Committee unanimously approved a bill that would change the process for reviewing proposed foreign investments in the U.S.

The bill would require all transactions involving state-owned companies to get an additional 45-day review and would allow more of the deal-approval process to be made public.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., an interagency group led by the Treasury Department that reviews foreign investments, came under fire for approving a Dubai-based company's application to operate U.S. ports. The transaction was scuttled after members of Congress and others worried the deal could endanger national security.

To become law, the bill must clear the House, be reconciled with a Senate measure and signed by President Bush.

Business groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Business Roundtable and the Financial Services Forum praised the House bill, saying it will improve the process for vetting foreign investments without discouraging interest in doing business in the U.S. The bill also creates a role for the director of national intelligence to review proposed deals.

House Panel Backs Credit-Rating Revamp (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Financial Services Committee voted to approve legislation that would overhaul the credit-rating business.

The bill, approved on a voice vote by the panel, would bring sweeping changes to the industry. House lawmakers said legislation is needed to increase competition in a business now dominated by only a few companies.

Critics say the Securities and Exchange Commission has been part of the problem because it has designated just five credit-rating firms as "nationally recognized," making it hard for new competitors to enter the business. Under the bill, the SEC would no longer designate rating firms as nationally recognized, but would register them under a streamlined three-month process.

The SEC would get new power to discipline rating firms and rating-firm employees, and to ban business practices that are coercive or abusive. Rating firms evaluate debt issued by public companies and have come under fire for failing to detect deteriorating credit quality at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Health Care Report Urges Dialogue On Reform (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Consumers across USA shared thoughts

Affordable health care should be available to all Americans by 2012, with protection in the meantime from “very high out-of-pocket medical costs,” say initial recommendations from a 15-member panel created by Congress.

The Citizens' Health Care Working Group's 12-page report, which some say may prompt debate before national elections in November and in 2008, does not specify exactly how to pay for such benefits or what they should include.

Before drawing up its recommendations, the panel conducted more than 35 meetings nationwide, along with several Internet polls, to gauge what Americans think of the health system and how they want to change it. The report is thought to be the first wide-ranging effort sponsored by the government to poll average citizens on health care policy. It comes as federal efforts at health reform are minimal, health spending is growing faster than inflation and action on helping the uninsured is heating up in some states.

Members of the working group included professors, a union leader, an advocate for the disabled, hospital administrators, nurses, doctors, a Motorola executive and Michael Leavitt, secretary of Health and Human Services. It has a two-year, $5.5 million budget — about half of which was spent on contractors who organized and ran the meetings — authorized by Congress as part of 2003's Medicare Modernization Act.

At most of the town hall meetings, including a March meeting in Los Angeles covered by USA TODAY, the majority of participants called for a health system in which everyone is covered, generally with a wide-ranging set of health services, including medical, dental and vision care. Significant, but smaller percentages, of participants wanted a so-called single payer system in which the government finances health care through taxes, as in Canada and much of Europe. Others wanted to keep the current employer-based system of health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0034494

Bigger splits were seen when participants were asked how such programs should be paid for and whether some people, such as the wealthy or those who smoke, should pay more.

Rather than outlining in detail the results of the community meetings, the report summarized them this way: "We heard a common message: Americans should have a health care system where everyone participates, regardless of their financial resources or health status, with benefits that are sufficiently comprehensive to provide access to appropriate, high-quality care without endangering individual or family financial security."

After 90 days of public comment, a final version of the recommendations will go to Congress and the president, probably in October. The report can be read online, and comments submitted, at www.citizenshealthcare.gov. Such timing "was clearly designed to force the issue to political discourse this fall," says Len Nichols, a health policy expert at the New America Foundation, a moderate think tank in Washington.

Whether health reform will be a focus of the November elections is questionable, Nichols and others say, because voters are concerned about other sharply divisive issues, such as the war in Iraq and immigration reform. But health care reform may be a hot topic in the next presidential election.

"The report may serve as an important reminder for candidates on both parties who want to seek the presidency in 2008 that they need to develop a serious health care agenda," says Ron Pollack of the liberal advocacy group Families USA.

There is little agreement on how to reform the health care system. Since the demise of the Clinton administration's sweeping reform proposal in the early 1990s, there has been little action in Washington. But this year, state lawmakers have acted to support coverage for the uninsured. Massachusetts approved a complex proposal that would require all individuals to buy coverage. Vermont, Illinois and West Virginia also have approved new programs.

The working group report says that deciding what should be included in a core set of benefits should be up to an appointed panel of experts and citizens. While it says no financing method is "optimal," the report says "multiple financing sources" will be needed. Those could include enrollee contributions or taxes on income, businesses or products.

The group promises greater detail and explanation of its findings before its final report.

Criticism of the report's initial recommendations came from both the right and the left.

Don McCanne of Physicians for a National Health Program, a liberal group that wants a single, government-financed health care system, says the report seemed worded to support Bush administration policies, including high-deductible insurance.

"They carefully crafted this interim report to satisfy policy issues for many of the special interests," says McCanne.

But Joseph Antos at the conservative American Enterprise Institute sees in the report a call for far too much government involvement in health care.

"It would make health care a 'right' and give everyone cradle-to-grave security through the government," Antos said in an e-mail. "That's unrealistic and irresponsible."

Some of the participants at the Los Angeles town hall meeting, which drew more than 400 people, felt the report did not go far enough and said they were disappointed in its recommendations.

"This is pretty generic," says attorney Yolanda Jackson, who said participants in Los Angeles had much more forceful opinions about changes needed in the health system. "My reading of this is that it's not that different from what we currently have. "

Ara Najarian, who also participated in the Los Angeles meeting and who is a senior partner at social-marketing firm Latino Consultants, says he was also disappointed. "Saying we need a core benefit package is great, but what does core mean? That's still to be debated, as is the definition of affordable," he says. "It's hard to see where the debate ends and actual action takes place."

The working-group effort was added to the Medicare reform act by Sens. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., and Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. Both say they are happy that the initial recommendations are in.

"It's good to have these ideas down on paper to drive a national dialogue on health care, and I'm looking forward to the public comments," Hatch said in a written statement.

Hearings on the report's findings are required, but Congress need not take action. Those hearings are not expected until next year. Wyden says it would be helpful if the report gave more details.

"Now the challenge is to get as much specific meat behind these particular areas as possible," Wyden says. "The more specifics Congress gets, the more opportunity there is to write a bill in line with what the people are saying."

DOJ_NMG_0034495

OTHER NEWS:

Rise In Inflation Puts Pressure On US Rates (FT)

By Christopher Swann And Krishna Guha In Washington And Jennifer Hughes In New York

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

US inflation rose more quickly than expected for the third successive month in May, raising the prospect that interest rates will continue to rise beyond this month.

The core consumer price index – which excludes volatile food and energy prices – rose 0.3 per cent last month, taking the annual rate to 2.4 per cent.

The figures heighten the dilemma for the Federal Reserve, which may feel forced to continue to raise rates in spite of growing signs that the economy is slowing.

The futures market on Wednesday priced in a near 100 per cent certainty that the Fed would raise interest rates to 5.25 per cent this month, and doubled the chance, to 44 per cent, of another rise in August.

The Fed's beige book of economic activity reported widespread business concern about high or rising costs, and added "just three districts, Boston, Dallas and Philadelphia, reported that retailers are having success raising retail prices".

The stock market absorbed the news calmly, with the S&P 500 index rising 0.5 per cent.

However, Treasury bonds fell sharply. Yields on two-year Treasuries rose almost 10 basis points to 5.11 per cent, the highest since December 2000. The yield curve inverted further, suggesting the market thinks it increasingly likely that more rate rises will slow the economy.

President George W. Bush told reporters "the Fed is watching inflation very carefully…that's Ben Bernanke's job."

Mr Bernanke, the Fed chairman, will on Thursday give what is expected to be an important speech on the economy.

The May inflation rise pushed the three-month annualised rate of core inflation up from 3.2 per cent to 3.8, the highest since March 1995. "It does raise the probability of a further rate rise in August," said Jan Hatzius, chief US economist at Goldman Sachs. Such a move would increase the likelihood of a hard landing next year, he said.

The rise was driven by a rapid increase in "owners' equivalent rent" – an estimate of the cost of living in your own home, based on what it would cost to rent a similar property. This was due to a technical adjustment and a pick-up in rents as high prices and a cooling-off of house price inflation encouraged more Americans to rent rather than buy.

Excluding this element, the core inflation rate was in line with market forecasts. Headline inflation, including energy costs, rose 0.4 per cent, boosted by a 4.9 per cent increase in petrol prices. There was some evidence higher energy prices were being passed on, with air fares rising 2.6 per cent over the month.

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America, said: "There has been a clear upward drift in inflation and it is going to continue through year-end. The Fed would definitely like to pause but I don't think it will be able to."

Inflation Spreads Beyond Energy (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Prices outpace workers' wages

WASHINGTON — Consumer inflation jumped again in May as higher prices for gasoline, housing and other items pushed up costs at a faster pace than workers' pay, the government said Wednesday.

"Inflation was uncomfortably high pretty much across the board," says Allen Sinai, president of Decision Economics, a consulting group.

Consumer prices rose 0.4% in May following a 0.6% gain in April, the Labor Department said. Excluding the often volatile food and energy sectors, the "core" index, considered a better gauge of inflation trends, rose 0.3% in May for the third consecutive month.

In addition to gasoline, prices rose for clothing, medical care, used cars, food, housing and education. Prices were down for just a handful of items, including personal computers and cigarettes.

The gains in May are just the latest this year. In the first five months, the consumer price index rose at a 5.2% seasonally adjusted annual rate, up from a 3.4% gain in 2005. From January to May, the core index rose at a 3.1% rate after increasing 2.2% last year.

Wages have not kept up with price gains. Adjusted for inflation, average weekly earnings for hourly workers fell 0.7% in May, the biggest decline since September.

DOJ_NMG_0034496

The price increases in May strengthened predictions that Federal Reserve policymakers, many of whom have recently expressed concerns about inflation, will continue to raise interest rates to curb borrowing and spending, thus putting a damper on price increases. Chairman Ben Bernanke last week said inflation had risen to an “unwelcome” level.

Fed officials are likely to raise interest rates by a quarter percentage point when they meet June 28-29. That would bring the Fed's target for short-term rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, to 5.25%. That would be the highest in 51/2 years, although still below the 6.5% peak hit in the last rate-increase cycle in 2000.

Still, many economists, including those at JPMorgan Chase, Moody's Economy .com and Putnam, said inflationary pressures aren't as bad as they appear and there's a risk the Fed could overreact.

The CPI measures housing prices based on how much consumers would pay to rent their homes. But rents are increasing rapidly while home sales and prices are slowing, leading to a possible distortion in the numbers. Changes in utilities prices could also be skewing the data, economists say.

“The inflation story is probably being blown out of proportion,” Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says.

Investors took a similar view, focusing on stock upgrades by investment banks. The Dow Jones industrial average ended a recent losing streak, jumping 111 points to 10,817.

Strong competition is continuing to make it hard for retailers to increase prices, the Fed said in an anecdotal report out Wednesday. That suggests inflation pressures at the consumer level are not increasing rapidly.

The report also found signs of moderation in economic growth in parts of the USA. A number of economists expect that such slowing from the rapid pace seen earlier in the year will ease inflation pressures later in 2006. “I don't think the outlook is all that scary,” Briefing.com chief economist Timothy Rogers says.

Uptick In Inflation Gnaws At Economy (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A key indicator of inflation rose for the third consecutive month in May, the government said today, a report that analysts said will likely put pressure on the Federal Reserve to continue hiking interest rates.

The Labor Department announced that the Consumer Price Index rose a seasonally adjusted 0.4% from April because energy prices continued to surge.

What troubled many economists, however, was a larger than expected 0.3% gain in the core index, which strips out volatile energy and food costs. About half of the increase was related to higher housing costs, according to the Labor Department.

Economist Joshua Shapiro said the results from May's CPI report "guarantees" that Federal Reserve policymakers will bump the nation's benchmark short-term interest rate by a quarter point when they meet June 29. Last month, the Fed, headed by its new chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, approved the 16th quarter-point increase in the federal funds rate to 5%.

"Language in the policy statement will leave the door open for further action down the road," Shapiro said in a research note.

In Washington, President Bush today took credit for strong economic growth and said it was up to the Fed to keep inflation in check.

Asked at a news conference about the economy and other recent signs of a rebound in inflation, Bush said, "That's Ben Bernanke's job."

Bush said the tax cuts enacted in his first term were responsible for what he called a solid economy with strong growth in employment and productivity. Most of those tax cuts are scheduled to end in 2010 and 2011, and Bush urged Congress to make them permanent.

"Pro-growth economic policies work," he said.

The CPI report did not prove very troubling to Wall Street investors, who saw strong gains after a string of declines. The Dow Jones industrial average shot up 110.78 points, or more than 1%, to close at 10,816.92.

Reports Intensify Pressure On Fed To Boost Rates (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

The third month of faster-than-expected price increases raised pressure on the Federal Reserve to back up its tough rhetoric on inflation with higher interest rates, despite more signs the economy is cooling.

Two reports yesterday underscored the dilemma facing central-bank policy makers. The economy appears to be slowing due to higher energy prices and the impact of the cumulative four-percentage-point increase in short-term rates. A slowing economy would normally encourage the Fed to place its interest-rate increases on hold and perhaps eventually cut rates, but the slowing occurs as inflation edges above the zone where most Fed officials are comfortable.

DOJ_NMG_0034497

That isn't unusual: typically after the Fed raises rates, the economy, with a lag, slows, and with an additional lag, that weaker economy alleviates inflation pressure. In recent weeks, however, a stream of tough anti-inflation rhetoric from Fed officials coupled with yesterday's price report have convinced markets that short-term interest rates will be raised to 5.25% from 5% at the June 28-29 meeting. Moreover, futures markets now see a roughly 50% probability that the Fed will raise rates again to 5.5% at its Aug. 8 meeting.

Consumer prices rose 0.4% in May from April, the Labor Department said yesterday, and were up 4.2% from a year earlier. More ominously, "core" prices, which exclude volatile food and energy, rose 0.3% in May, the third consecutive increase of that magnitude, and were up 2.4% from a year earlier. That's the highest rate of core inflation in more than a year.

At the same time, the Fed released a report that found economic activity has softened in recent weeks. "Economic activity continued to expand from mid-April to early June, but there were some signs of deceleration," the Fed's "beige book" said.

The beige book, a roundup of anecdotes on business conditions from the Fed's 12 districts, said consumer spending growth "had slowed" and "residential real-estate markets continued to cool across the country....Some districts mentioned that sales were slowing or weaker than anticipated at discount stores or to lower-income customers," perhaps because of higher gasoline prices.

By raising rates later this month, the Fed may dispel doubts about its anti-inflation resolve. But "rate increases heighten the chance the Fed will overshoot the target and prompt greater slowing than necessary to curb inflation," Société Générale SA economist Stephen Gallagher warned in a research note. World stock markets have swooned in recent weeks in part over that concern, although yesterday they were mostly higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 110.78 points to 10816.92. (See related article4.)

Tom Gallagher, a Fed watcher at investment firm ISI Group, said a rate increase may also feed the incorrect impression that the Fed is targeting current inflation, rather than where inflation will be in six to 12 months. Economists say inflation is a lagging indicator of the impact of monetary policy.

Until early May, Fed officials had indicated an inclination to pause in their rate increases at their late June meeting to assess the impact of prior increases. But the rise in inflation and signs that the public's expectations of inflation were edging up prompted a shift in rhetoric.

Last week, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said the recent rise in inflation had been "unwelcome" and a parade of other officials echoed that sentiment. Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas President Richard Fisher yesterday called the recent rise in inflation and expectations "discomforting" and "unacceptable." Earlier this week, Sandra Pianalto, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland, said, "The recent news on inflation troubles me," but at 5%, rates are "near a point that is consistent with a gradual improvement in the inflation outlook."

The Fed may conclude it would rather risk more slowing in the economy than allowing the recent rise in inflation to become entrenched. If so, yesterday's reports may have made a decision to raise rates later this month easier, though still unpleasant. Lou Crandall, an economist at Wrightson Associates, a financial-research firm, said Mr. Bernanke may have painted himself into a corner with his hawkish rhetoric, but given the latest inflation number, "it turns out to be a corner they want to be in anyway."

The biggest contributor to the latest rise in inflation is shelter, whose 0.4% rise accounted for more than half of May's overall price rise. The category includes hotels, tenants' rents and the "owners' equivalent rent," a measure of how much homeowners would pay to rent their own homes. The equivalent rent, the biggest component of shelter prices, was up 0.6% in May following gains of 0.4% in April and March.

Because owners' equivalent rent is more closely linked to tenants' rents than housing prices, some analysts argue recent inflation has been overstated because rents are picking up even as house appreciation slows. Another factor is that the Bureau of Labor Statistics subtracts an estimate of gas utility costs from tenant rents in calculating owners' equivalent rent, with the result that when natural-gas prices are declining, as they have recently, it can put upward pressure on owners' equivalent rent.

The second big contributor to inflation is energy, which rose 2.4% last month following a 3.9% gain in April. The run-up in oil and gas prices earlier this spring appears to be affecting consumers in many places besides the pumps. NY Waterway, which operates commuter ferries to New York City, recently raised fares to compensate for the increase in marine diesel over the past year. A one-way ticket from Weehawken, N.J., to Manhattan rose to $9 from $7.75, while a monthly pass rose to $280 from $257.

Similarly, major airlines have increased fares several times already this year. Overall, transportation costs as measured by the CPI rose 1.5% in May following a 2.4% jump in April. Gasoline was up 33% from last year.

DOJ_NMG_0034498

On the other hand, the beige book found little evidence that higher energy and material costs are leaking more broadly into the economy. Half of manufacturers surveyed in New England "have raised their selling prices in recent months or plan to do so shortly" due to rising commodity costs yet there were "few reports" that such increases were broadly reaching the retail level.

Write to Greg Ip at greg.ip@wsj.com5 and Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com6

Inflation Mounted Swiftly In May (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Price Increases Outstrip Wages As Gas Takes Toll

Consumer prices rose briskly again in May, led by rising costs for gasoline and housing, the Labor Department reported yesterday, boosting the likelihood that the Federal Reserve will keep raising rates to restrain inflation.

With many motorists paying more than $3 a gallon for gasoline, landlords hiking rents and businesses passing on more of their rising energy and materials costs to shoppers, the department's consumer price index rose 0.4 percent last month after a 0.6 percent increase the month before.

Inflation is eroding consumers' purchasing power, as prices rise faster than most workers' wages, the department said in another report. After adjusting for inflation, average weekly earnings declined 0.7 percent last month and bought 0.2 percent less than in May last year.

"Inflation is definitely on the rise . . . and it will be troubling for many consumers, particularly those at the lower end of the income scale," said Richard Yamarone, director of research for Argus Research Corp., a financial analysis firm. Even so, he added, "inflation is not at a level that is going to cripple the economy, and it appears the Fed is on top of things and will indeed combat these mounting pressures."

Stock markets rose yesterday after sinking for weeks on concerns about inflation and tightening credit. "There's a pause in the panic," said Bank of America market strategist Joseph Quinlan. "Some brave souls are stepping back into the market to buy" blue-chip stocks and other companies they consider to be safe investments.

The Dow Jones industrial average of 30 of the largest companies gained 1.03 percent. The Standard and Poor's 500-stock and the Nasdaq composite index each rose less than 1 percent.

Stocks in Europe, Japan and other developed economies also jumped for the first time in more than a week, though some in less-developed emerging markets continued to fall. "We think we will see a slowdown of this sell-off and a bit of consolidation . . . but the equity markets are still going to be quite nervous for a while," said Anton Pil, head of global fixed-income trading for JPMorgan Private Bank.

Analysts widely predict the Fed will raise its key short-term interest rate to 5.25 percent from 5 percent at their meeting in two weeks, for a 17th consecutive increase.

If inflation pressures ease in coming months, Fed policymakers might leave the rate unchanged for a while at 5.25 percent. But if not, they could raise it to 5.5 percent at their meeting in August.

Fed officials think that the recent spurt of inflation will probably prove to be temporary and that price pressures will be dampened as the economy loses steam. But they are not sure of this forecast and worry that inflation might be more persistent given the economy's underlying strength, low unemployment and higher-than-expected oil prices.

The Fed's latest survey of regional economic conditions, also released yesterday, found that "high energy costs were fueling price increases in manufacturing and, to a much lesser extent, retail" from mid-April through early June. "Reports of costs being passed forward varied considerably but were more prevalent" than in the previous survey.

The CPI has risen at a 5.2 percent annual rate this year, after adjusting for seasonal variations, a much hotter pace than the 3.4 percent increase recorded for all of last year.

More than half of the May CPI increase reflected higher rents and hotel and motel rates. Rents have been rising as the housing market cools, vacancy rates fall and many landlords boost their prices to cover higher energy bills and property taxes. Lodging companies are raising room rates, and airlines are increasing fares as demand strengthens.

The CPI also got a boost from energy prices, which rose 2.4 percent in May, and were up at a 30.8 percent annual rate in the first five months of the year.

Gasoline prices, in particular, rose 4.9 percent last month, to a level higher than the previous peak in September after Hurricane Katrina battered Gulf Coast refineries and pipelines, the department said.

Prices also rose broadly last month in other categories, as consumers paid more for food, clothing, medical care, education, furnishings, used cars and trucks, and tickets to shows and sporting events.

The May price increases more than offset falling prices for electricity, natural gas, new vehicles, toys, video and audio goods, sporting goods, telephone services, computers and equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0034499

Many economists look for signs of whether high energy costs are seeping into other prices by studying so-called core inflation measures, which exclude food and energy items. The core CPI rose 0.3 percent last month, the third consecutive monthly increase at that rate -- and a troubling trend for financial markets and the Fed.

The string of recent core inflation readings "provides a strong signal that producers are gaining some leverage in passing higher energy and materials costs through to consumers," wrote Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist for Global Insight Inc., in an analysis of the report.

Core inflation has risen at a 3.8 percent annual rate over the past three months and at a 2.9 percent pace over the past six months -- exceeding the comparable April figures Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke cited last week as "unwelcome."

Bernanke vowed then that the Fed would not allow the recent uptick in core inflation to continue, sending a strong signal to financial markets that interest rates are headed higher.

While Fed officials often focus on core inflation, they also worry that trends in overall inflation affect consumers' and businesses' expectations of future inflation, which can be self-fulfilling. Before Bernanke's speech, both consumer surveys and the bond market indicated a small rise in inflation expectations, which rattled the central bank.

"Expectations can quickly become reality," Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech yesterday. "We can ill afford to somehow encourage expectations that inflation might gain momentum."

Led By Higher Rents, Prices Continue To Climb (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Prices at the retail level continued to climb in May, led by rising fuel costs and rents.

The government reported today that the so-called core rate of the Consumer Price Index, a closely watched measure of prices excluding the volatile food and energy categories, rose a slightly higher than expected 0.3 percent, reaffirming the belief among many economists and investors that the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates again later this month.

The price data came as a Fed official said in a speech today that recent inflationary pressures have been "corrosive."

The Labor Department said that overall consumer prices rose 0.4 percent in May, a slight deceleration from April's 0.6 percent increase. But compared with last May, prices have jumped 4.2 percent, the government said. That is considerably higher than the 3.9 percent increase economists forecast. The core rate, meanwhile, rose at an annual pace of 2.4 percent in May, up from a 2.3 percent pace in April.

The cost of housing accounted for more than half of the 0.3 increase in the core rate from April to May, the Labor Department said.

Investors, wary that another interest rate increase by the Federal Reserve could slow down economic growth, have pushed stock prices lower worldwide recently.

The stock market appeared to shrug off the news, with the leading market indexes closing higher for the day. But bond prices fell sharply, as the data on prices gave traders more reason to expect interest rates to increase.

Some economists said today's report on consumer prices not only reaffirmed that the Fed would raise interest rates for the 17th straight time when it meets on June 28 and 29, but it raised the likelihood of yet another increase at the Fed's meeting in August.

"With the core rate of inflation coming in even higher than April, not only does this remove any lingering doubt," about a rate increase, said Rob Carnell, an economist with the financial services company ING, "but it does raise a serious possibility of an August hike as well."

Ian Shepherdson, chief United States economist for High Frequency Economics, said: "A June 29 hike is a done deal. We just hope sense will prevail in August."

In Europe, stocks declined right after the Labor Department report was released, but they cut their losses toward the end of the trading day there. In Asia, leading indexes finished higher after one of their worst trading days in years on Tuesday.

The government report about rising prices came as Richard Fisher, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech that it was his duty to be "relentlessly bird-dogging" inflation. His were the latest comments from a growing number of Fed officials who are vowing publicly to combat inflation.

Also today, the Federal Reserve issued its quarterly economic overview, known as the beige book, which said the American economy continued to expand from mid-April to June but showed "some signs of deceleration." The report said the labor market continued to contract while consumer spending tightened.

Neither the Mr. Fisher's remarks nor the Fed report had an obvious impact on the financial markets this afternoon.

Prices Rise, And Interest Rates Sure To Follow (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0034500

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, June 15, 2006

It could be a summer of rising interest rates.

That's the sobering prospect for the US economy following news that the inflation rate is running at a quickening pace. Higher prices for such things as airline tickets, housing, healthcare - and of course, gasoline - are now starting to eat into consumer pocketbooks.

Wednesday, the Labor Department reported the May Consumer Price Index (CPI) rose 0.4 percent, after a 0.6 percent rise in April. This is well above the comfort level of the Federal Reserve, the nation's chief inflation-fighter.

The latest numbers just about guarantee the Fed will hike interest rates at the end of the month. Its new chairman, Ben Bernanke, an avowed inflation-fighter, may follow that with yet another increase in August.

The inflation pop, however, comes at a time when the economy may be starting to cool. This could keep the Fed from hitting the brakes too hard.

"The Fed is going to have to raise rates more out of a desire to keep the market from thinking the new sheriff in town is not serious about fighting inflation," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JP Morgan Private Client Services in Columbus, Ohio. "Prices are rising against a backdrop of weakening housing and other parts of the economy."

Economists are most concerned that rising prices seem to have moved beyond the energy sector. Removing food and energy - typically the most volatile prices - from the inflation rate indicates that "core" prices in May rose 0.3 percent. Over the past three months, the core rate of inflation is up to an annual rate of 3.8 percent, the fastest pace in more than a decade.

"We're seeing a near-term acceleration in the core rate," says Gregory Miller, chief economist at Suntrust Banks in Atlanta. "An increase of half a percentage point at the next Fed meeting is a strong possibility before the Fed decides to back away."

However, Mr. Chan reports that such a large rate hike is not likely. In the past, Mr. Bernanke has said previously, the Fed has tended to "overshoot" by raising rates too high or dropping them too low. The central bank would then have to change directions, confusing the markets.

"I don't think Bernanke is going to put in a strong case for a half a percentage point increase," Chan says.

Though the inflation rate is accelerating, the economy has changed considerably since the last major period of inflation in the 1970s, Chan says. Back then, whenever the consumer price index rose, wages automatically ticked up via "cost of living adjustments." Most of those arrangements are now gone, he says, particularly at manufacturing facilities, like General Motors Corp., where total remuneration is being cut, not raised.

"A slowing economy will eventually lead to diminished pricing pressures," Chan says.

Until that happens, consumers are starting to feel the effects of rising prices on their pocketbooks. For example, airfares rose 2.6 percent in May, according to the CPI report. Brian Hoyt, a spokesman for Orbitz.com, says airline ticket prices this summer are up 10 percent over last year's.

Amy Kelley of Calverton, N.Y., can attest to this. She's been searching for less expensive tickets for a vacation to Seattle. "I can't find the bargains I used to," she says.

While the higher airline prices are related to the rising cost of jet fuel, the CPI also points to rising medical expenses, which were up 0.3 percent in May.

In Philadelphia, Warren West, president of Greentree Brokerage Services, says the cost of providing medical benefits to his employees rose 16 percent this year. "There is no way to pass this on to the end user. We don't have that kind of pricing power," he says.

In fact, inflation in services is a growing issue, says economist Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York.

"The last two months there has been service-sector wage pressure," Mr. Brusca says, pointing out that two-thirds of the jobs in the economy are service-related.

"Inflation pressure on goods is not that bad, but in services they seem to be building."

Part of the reason for the service-sector price increases is supply and demand, says Sandy Horwitz, an accountant in Coral Gables, Fla. His firm, Goldstein Schechter Price Lucas Horwitz & Co., has raised its billing rates 5 to 7 percent this year, he estimates.

"There is a shortage of accountants and pretty strong demand out there, so we need to meet people's salary requirements," he says.

Miami lawyer Matthew Krieger says demand for his legal specialty, immigration law, is so strong he has been able to increase his billing rates from 10 to 20 percent this year.

"There is a shortage of good attorneys in our area," he says. "It's a very complex area of the law."

DOJ_NMG_0034501

In terms of prices, "rents" is one of the fastest ascending groups. The government calculates rents by determining what individuals would pay for housing if they were renting to themselves. Last month, rents rose 0.6 percent, the fastest pace in years. Since housing represents 25 percent of the CPI, it is a significant contributor to the overall inflation jump.

In Miami, landlord David Lombardy says tenants are now seeing rents climb - up about 30 percent in the past year, he estimates. A one-bedroom apartment at the Mirador on South Beach is now renting for $1,400 a month, up from $1,000 a month last year, he says.

Still, Mr. Lombardy expects rents to drop eventually due to the rising number of luxury condominiums coming on the market.

"All those people who bought on speculation will try to flip them, and when they can't do that they will try to rent them. So this will bring rents down in 12 to 18 months," he says.

Housing, Energy Costs Boost Inflation (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Higher housing and energy costs drove inflation to a 5.7 percent rate in the past three months, the highest in a decade, sealing expectations yesterday that the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates further this summer and add to the costs weighing on consumers.

Yesterday's consumer price report from the Labor Department raised red flags at the central bank, where officials express dismay at the underlying, or "core," rate of inflation, which accelerated to 3.8 percent last month in the biggest increase since 1995. The core rate is dominated by housing costs and, though it excludes the skyrocketing gas and electricity costs consumers pay directly, it reflects moves by businesses to pass those costs on to consumers.

"That is just too corrosive to be accepted by a virtuous central banker," the president of the Fed's Dallas reserve bank, Richard Fisher, said in a speech in Texas. The Fed must be "relentlessly bird-dogging inflation to prevent a debasement of your dollars."

The uptick in inflation this year has raised consumers' expectations of price increases to 3.2 percent a year -- a rate that would erode the purchasing power of a dollar to as little as 73 cents in a decade, he said.

"To me, this is more than discomforting. It is unacceptable," he said, adding that the Fed should no longer adhere to its practice under former Chairman Alan Greenspan of mostly ignoring volatile spikes in energy and food prices. "People have to eat, drive and air-condition their homes," he said.

The Fed's redoubled attention to energy and housing-driven inflation, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, has heightened the importance and effect of inflation reports on the financial markets and economy. Yesterday's bad inflation news was widely anticipated, however, and markets took it in stride, rallying after a series of tumbles in stock indexes around the world.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday added 111 points, recouping some of the 540-point loss it suffered in the past week since Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke inspired fears that the central bank would take the hammer to any increase in inflation. The move to 10,817 put the Dow back in positive territory for the year.

Some analysts say the Fed's focus on housing and energy costs is ironic, and perhaps unwise, because the central bank has little control over either and its campaign to raise interest rates will add to the higher housing costs consumers have to bear.

About half of new home purchases in recent years were financed through adjustable-rate loans that will be adjusted sharply higher as a result of the Fed's actions in the months ahead. Homeowners with fixed-rate mortgages do not face sharp increases unless they sell or refinance their homes.

Previous Fed moves to raise short-term rates by 4 percentage points since June 2004 already have contributed to a slowdown in the housing market and are pushing more people to rent rather than seek homeownership. The rush into rentals is driving up rent prices and is the principal force driving up the core rate of inflation, analysts say.

A critical component of the price index designed to track the cost of homeownership for the 69 percent of Americans who own homes actually measures what it would cost to rent the single-family homes they own. That rental index jumped by 0.6 percent last month, the most since 1990.

The Fed is in a "true dilemma" because "the origins of higher consumer prices are currently beyond their scope" and cannot be cured with higher rates, said Roger M. Kubarych, chief economist at HVB Group.

"Higher rates would speed up the slowdown of the housing boom and put further pressure on rents" and housing inflation, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034502

While Fed officials from Mr. Bernanke on down have left little doubt they are bent on raising rates, that is "no longer appropriate for the weakening economy," Mr. Kubarych said. "Overdoing the tightening bears the risk of a recession -- which ultimately would lower rents and [inflation] -- a costly approach."

Other analysts support the Fed's war against inflation.

"The chairman has rediscovered his monetary manhood and is doing the right thing," said Lawrence Kudlow of Kudlow & Co. "Price stability is the key to economic growth."

President Bush expressed confidence that Mr. Bernanke and other Fed governors he appointed will get inflation under control.

"Obviously, the Fed is watching the signals for inflation very carefully," he said at a press conference. "That's Ben Bernanke's job."

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America Corp., said the Fed has little choice but to raise rates when faced with yesterday's inflation numbers, which included a 35 percent leap in energy costs, 20.9 percent surge in transportation costs, 7.3 percent jump in clothing costs and 4.5 percent rise in health care costs over the past three months.

"It's not that the Fed is losing its grip, but it will have to hike rates to maintain its inflation-fighting credibility," he said. "I believe the Fed would like to pause, but I think a continued upward drift in core inflation numbers will not allow them to."

Consumer Spending Drops Sharply In May (WP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

If Not for Higher Energy Costs, Retail Sales Would Have Been in Negative Territory

Consumers cut back sharply on their spending in May, providing further evidence that the economy is slowing, but it is still an open question whether the slowdown is coming soon enough to keep inflation under control.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that wholesale prices rose by 0.2 percent in May, a big drop from the past two months. But core inflation, excluding food and energy, increased 0.3 percent, faster than analysts had expected.

The Commerce Department reported that retail sales edged up only 0.1 percent last month and would have been in negative territory had it not been for a big rise in the price of gasoline.

Inflation worries and signs of a weakening economy meant another bad day on Wall Street. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 86.44 points to close at 10,706.14, erasing the last of its gains for this year.

Fears that higher inflation will trigger further interest rate increases from the Federal Reserve and contribute to a sharper U.S. economic slowdown are not only depressing U.S. investors but have contributed to a global stock sell-off in recent days.

Without the higher payout at gas stations, retail sales would have fallen 0.1 percent last month. The declines were widespread, with sales falling at auto dealerships, furniture stores and hardware stores. Sales at department stores and specialty clothing stores posted modest increases.

Analysts said consumers, who have been the driving force in the four-year-old economic expansion, are beginning to flag in their shopping zeal under an array of adverse forces.

"With employment growth slowing, interest rates rising, stock prices falling, housing markets cooling and energy prices still elevated, there is much weighing on the minds of consumers," said Michael Gregory, an economist at BMO Nesbitt Burns, a Toronto investment bank.

Consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of total economic activity, helped the economy grow 5.3 percent in the first three months of the year. Analysts think economic growth will slow to around 3 percent in the current quarter, reflecting a weaker consumer sector.

"The persistence of high gasoline prices coupled with lower equity prices and badly bruised consumer sentiment will effectively take the wind out of the sales of real consumer spending in the second quarter," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., a private forecasting firm.

The tiny 0.1 percent rise in May retail sales was held back by a 1.6 percent drop in auto sales, weakness that has caused automakers to bring back incentive offers this month.

The small 0.2 percent increase in wholesale inflation was the best performance since a 1.3 percent drop in February. Food prices actually fell by 0.5 percent, and energy costs, which had jumped by 4 percent in April, slowed to a much smaller 0.4 percent rise in May.

But outside food and energy, price pressures mounted, with the 0.3 percent increase in core inflation coming after two moderate gains of 0.1 percent in March and April.

While this could raise concerns at the Federal Reserve, analysts said the more important inflation figure will be consumer prices for May, which are to be released today.

DOJ_NMG_0034503

In advance of that report, economists were looking for overall prices to be up 0.4 percent, a slower pace than the 0.6 percent jump in April, and core consumer prices to show a modest 0.2 percent increase, down from a 0.3 percent rise in April.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke contributed to a 199-point drop in the Dow on June 5 when he called recent increases in inflation "unwelcome" developments, sending a signal that the central bank could boost rates for a 17th time at its June 28-29 meeting.

Dow Ditches Doldrums With Big Bounce (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK — The bleeding on Wall Street subsided Wednesday — at least for a day — with the Dow bouncing back more than 100 points and the Nasdaq composite breaking its eight-session losing streak.

The gains came despite a bigger-than-expected rise in consumer prices in May. Investors have been monitoring inflation data for any signs of an increase, since rising prices are likely to make it more difficult for the Federal Reserve to stop raising short-term interest rates.

The core consumer price index rose 0.3% in May, slightly higher than expected (story, 1A). However, investors shrugged off the news, since it merely confirmed earlier data, says Andy Brooks, head trader at T. Rowe Price.

“The market has sold off considerably in recent weeks, and a lot of the negative news on inflation was already priced into prices,” says Todd Leone, head of listed trading at SG Cowen. He added that it was important that the market held its big gains rather than selling off at the close.

Led by a 6.5% gain in aerospace giant Boeing, the Dow Jones industrial average gained 110.78 points, or 1.0%, to 10,816.92, which pushed it back into the black for 2006. Tuesday, the Dow closed with a year-to-date deficit for the first time since late January. The Nasdaq composite ended its eight-session skid, rising 13.53 points, or 0.7% to 2086.00. The Standard & Poor's 500 index added 6.35 points, or 0.5%, to 1230.04.

Still, it's too early to say stocks have bottomed out, adds Brooks, although he says the sell-off in the past few weeks has created some buying opportunities. Investors who “pick through the ruins might pick up some values,” he says.

The rally might have reflected belief that the worst of the stock market's slide is behind it, Goldman Sachs' chief U.S. investment strategist Abby Joseph Cohen said Wednesday.

Bank stocks fell amid worries that inflation will drive short-term interest rates higher and crimp bank profits. Bank of America lost 43 cents to $46.64, Citigroup sank 41 cents to $47.80, and JPMorgan Chase eased 56 cents to $39.97.

·Union Pacific rallied $1.08 to $87.59. The nation's largest railroad said mild weather helped it haul a record amount of coal during the first five months of this year.

Dow Back In Positive Territory For Year (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK, June 14 -- Stocks rebounded Wednesday, pulling Wall Street out of a two-week decline that had wiped out the year's gains in every major indicator.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 110.78, or 1 percent, to 10,816.92. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 6.35, or 0.5 percent, to 1230.04, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 13.53, or 0.7 percent, to 2086. Wednesday gains put the Dow back into positive territory for the year, but the S&P 500 and the Nasdaq remain lower.

Stocks gained momentum in late afternoon trading after a largely lackluster session marked by mixed reactions to the Commerce Department's consumer price index inflation data. Consumer-level inflation grew in May at an annual rate of 2.4 percent, making another Federal Reserve rate hike a near certainty and putting an end to traders' fretting about the possibility.

The Wall Street adage "sell on the rumor, buy on the fact" held for most of the session. While broad indicators turned negative for part of the afternoon, they saw nothing like the dramatic sell-offs of previous sessions.

Bonds fell, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note rising to 5.06 percent from 4.97 percent late Tuesday. The U.S. dollar was down against most major currencies. Gold prices also fell, closing at $562.30 a troy ounce, far below their recent highs above $700.Movers

Boeing rose $5.03, to $82.01, after Singapore Airlines said it would buy 20 Boeing 787-9 aircraft for $4.52 billion, hours after it expressed unhappiness about delays in Airbus's delivery of its A380 superjumbo.

Bayer AG rose $3.07, to $41.28, following an agreement that could clear the way for Bayer to take over Schering.

Schering rose $2.54, to $111.55.

DOJ_NMG_0034504

Tribune rose 89 cents, to $31.94, after the media company's second-largest shareholder called for a breakup of the company.

Taser International rose 55 cents, to $8.02, after Chairman Phillips W. Smith bought $762,000 worth of the stun-gun maker's stock.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 60.55, to 7780.33.

American Stock Exchange index rose 3.54, to 1814.11.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 4.37, to 677.09.Volume

NYSE: 2.82 billion shares, down from 3.31 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 10 to 9.

Nasdaq: 2.12 billion shares, down from 2.54 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 9 to 8.Commodities

Crude oil for July delivery: $69.14, up 58 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $562.30 a troy ounce, down from $562.50 on Tuesday.

Economy Expands, But Signs Show Slowing Growth (USAT)

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. economy expanded from mid-April to early June, amid warning signs of slower growth and rising costs, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

In its beige book, an anecdotal look at conditions named for the color of its cover, central bank economists noted that growth in economic activity slowed in four of the 12 Fed districts — Atlanta, Kansas City, Richmond and San Francisco. New York businesses were growing concerned about the outlook. Philadelphia firms were more optimistic.

In further evidence the record housing market is declining, 10 Fed districts reported slower existing home sales. Commercial real estate was surging, however, to the point that officials in the Boston, Chicago and Dallas districts warned of possible overinvestment in the sector. Consumer spending grew, but less quickly. Employers had trouble finding skilled workers, but wage pressures were generally mild.

Manufacturers were pinched by high materials and energy prices. Still, only four Fed districts said manufacturers had been able to raise selling prices, and just three districts said retailers had done so.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues will consider the beige book, along with other data including Wednesday's report that consumer inflation rose at a brisk clip in May (story, 1A), as they debate interest rate policy. Economists expect the Fed to raise rates a quarter point to 5.25% at its June 28-29 meeting. USA TODAY economics reporters Sue Kirchhoff and Barbara Hagenbaugh looked at the report.

Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, most of Connecticut. The economy expanded, with the software and information technology sector citing higher revenues. Tourism was brisk in the Boston area, reaching some of the highest levels since 1999-2000. Commercial real estate improved: Downtown Boston's vacancy rate fell to 10%. About half of manufacturers contacted said they had raised selling prices or plan to do so.

New York, northern New Jersey, Fairfield County, Conn. Expansion was moderate, with businesses reporting “increasingly widespread cost pressures.” Broadway attendance rose. New Jersey home builders lowered sales projections, and some let their options for new projects expire. Manhattan's rental market is picking up, though there is a rising supply of condos for sale. Construction employment is softening. Office markets were steady to better. Bankers see across-the-board weakening in loan demand.

Delaware, southern New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania. Conditions improved. The job market was good, and manufacturing expanded, though not as quickly as in previous months. Auto dealers expect sluggish sales through the end of 2006. Bank lending was good. Sales of homes in resort areas have dropped sharply. Manufacturers noted shortages and delays in delivery for metals, wood products and electronic components. College job recruiting was up over 2005.

Ohio, eastern Kentucky, western Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia. Most manufacturers had steady to increasing output, though activity at auto plants was notably below 2005. Commercial construction was up. About half the construction and manufacturing contacts were trying to recoup some of their higher costs. Firms were more successful in passing price increases on to smaller firms than larger customers. About a quarter of home builders raised prices to make up for higher materials costs, but a larger share sweetened sales incentives.

Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, southern West Virginia, District of Columbia. Activity expanded more slowly, as a decline in housing sales was joined by “some downshifting” in manufacturing and retail. A regional hardware and building supply chain got a boost as consumers bought generators and other products ahead of the coming hurricane season. Realtors said prices were holding steady, even though softening in home sales was more widespread.

Alabama, Florida, Georgia, eastern Tennessee, southern Louisiana, southern Mississippi. Activity was mixed. Some cruise lines offered discounts on late-summer cruises in the Caribbean, due to hurricane worries. Florida's tony resorts did booming business. Residential construction remained steady, though Florida condo sales weakened. A growing number of South Florida firms were having trouble finding workers, due to high housing costs.

DOJ_NMG_0034505

Iowa, northern Indiana, northern Illinois, southern Michigan, southern Wisconsin. Consumer spending increased "modestly," as demand for clothing, lawn and garden items and electronics rose. Business travel to Chicago was up, in part because of strong convention activity. Firms reported a small net gain in hiring, and manufacturers said they were holding job fairs to find skilled workers for the first time in years. The housing market continued to slow. A few retailers said they were able to increase prices, but most said strong competition was making that difficult.

Arkansas, southern Illinois, southern Indiana, western Kentucky, northern Mississippi, eastern Missouri, western Tennessee. Car dealers in the district reported sales declines, and more than half said their inventories were too high, primarily for new cars. Manufacturers said they were concerned about increasing transportation costs. Contacts in the freight transportation, warehousing and utilities industries said they planned to expand operations in the region.

Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, upper Michigan, northern Wisconsin. The area economy "grew at a steady pace" marked by gains in consumer spending and tourism. The housing market continued to cool, with new listings in Minneapolis-St. Paul up 18% from a year ago, while pending sales were down 21%. Ethanol plants were springing up across the region. Wages increased slightly.

Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Wyoming, western Missouri, northern New Mexico. The job market continued to strengthen, and "wage pressures increased somewhat." Engineers, auto technicians, nurses, oil and gas workers and skilled manufacturing workers were reported to be in short supply. Drought conditions got worse. The winter wheat crop in some parts of the region was expected to be half that of last year.

Texas, northern Louisiana, southern New Mexico. Retailers reported mixed results. Sales were weakest at stores geared toward lower-income consumers, in part because of higher gas prices. Demand for lower-priced homes in the region also declined because of higher interest rates, rising energy prices and tighter lending standards. But housing activity continued to be "solid at very high levels." The job market continued to tighten as firms in both the manufacturing and services sectors were hiring.

Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington. Travel and tourism were "vigorous," as hotel occupancy rates were high and room rates rose. The housing market cooled significantly in the region except in Utah and the Pacific Northwest, where markets "remain hot." There was little upward pressure on wages in most occupations, and companies reported that strong competition and productivity gains meant they were not passing along higher prices to customers. Hiring slowed in parts of California.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Moping media

"June has been a miserable month for our left-wing media," New York Post columnist Ralph Peters writes.

"First, the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi forced the alleged 'massacre' at Haditha off Page One, frustrating media attempts to manufacture a sequel to Abu Ghraib. Then, President Bush made a midnight ride to Baghdad to put one very important pair of boots on the ground. He didn't hug the airport, either, but crossed the city to the Green Zone for a face-to-face with Iraq's new prime minister. It was a brave and inspiring act. And a worthy one," Mr. Peters said.

"Strategically wise, good for Iraqi and American morale -- and, yes, politically savvy -- the president's trip blew apart the media's effort to recover from their loss of Zarqawi. It also shut down their bid to refocus our attention on the suicides of three poor, deprived terrorists at Guantanamo -- thugs we're expected to mourn as victims of our inhumanity. Hate-America journalists just can't get a break these days.

"But they're still trying. One cable-news anchor [Tuesday] asked if Bush's visit to Iraq was a 'publicity stunt.' Her own network's correspondent shot that down, on-air. True reporters know a missile can kill a president as easily as a private. The Gitmo suicide-trifecta was the real publicity stunt. This accurate statement should never have been retracted: It was an act of asymmetrical warfare. And every save-the-terrorists jerk behind a mike knows it in his or her shriveled bleeding heart."

An opportunity

"Presidents rarely recover from second-term slumps, but President Bush may be on the verge of at least a modest upturn and perhaps a strong recovery," Fred Barnes writes at www.weeklystandard.com.

"For sure, his plunge in job approval over the past year has been halted. He's bottomed out. But how significant will his recovery be and how durable? Those are the questions," Mr. Barnes said.

DOJ_NMG_0034506

"The Bush decline in 2005 and 2006 was caused, in part, by intensified terrorist attacks in Iraq, the failure of his Social Security reform initiative, and bad luck in the form of hurricane Katrina and the Dubai ports deal. The president's approval rating in the Gallup Poll plummeted from 51 percent on the day of his second inauguration to 31 percent in May, 16 months later.

"But in recent days, Bush has been blessed with good news. Last week, Americans found and killed the chief jihadist in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, eliminating the top strategist and operational leader of the insurgency. And on Monday, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald informed Karl Rove, one of Bush's most influential advisers, that he has no plans to seek an indictment of Rove in the case of a CIA official whose name was disclosed to the press."

"[And] in the bellwether special House election in San Diego last week, Democrats failed to pull off an upset and capture the Republican-leaning district. The Democratic candidate got the usual Democratic vote, suggesting a Democratic landslide is unlikely in the midterm election on Nov. 7."

Decision time

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, warily watching his primary challenger advance in the polls, must soon decide whether to start collecting signatures for a possible independent bid this November.

Mr. Lieberman's campaign says it is focused only on winning the Aug. 8 primary, but the Democrat has not ruled out petitioning his way onto the November ballot as part of a backup plan to secure a fourth term in the Senate.

"I am not going to close out any options," the senator recently told reporters.

Mr. Lieberman has until Aug. 9 -- the day after the Democratic primary -- to collect 7,500 signatures from registered voters to gain a spot on the ballot as an unaffiliated candidate.

But any effort to gather signatures before the primary would be a sign of weakness, indicating that Mr. Lieberman, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2000, fears that he could lose to businessman Ned Lamont, the Associated Press said. The effort also would rile Democrats who already question Mr. Lieberman's party loyalty and his perceived closeness to President Bush.

The senator has been a strong backer of the Iraq war.

Bill's big bucks

Life after the White House has proven lucrative for Bill Clinton, who made nearly $7.5 million in speaking fees last year and sometimes earned as much as $350,000 for a single appearance.

Mr. Clinton earned $650,000 for just two appearances in two days before major gatherings in Canada by motivational speaker Tony Robbins, according to the financial-disclosure report filed yesterday by his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In 2004, Mr. Clinton earned just $875,000 for speeches as he recovered from heart-bypass surgery and finished his memoirs. Last year, he made eight times as much on the speech circuit, the Associated Press reports.

Spokesman Jay Carson said the former president had "an exceptionally busy schedule" and paid speeches were sandwiched around charity work on global HIV/AIDS, childhood obesity and other causes.

"Between the foundation and work on Katrina and the tsunami, paid speeches are actually a very small part of his schedule," Mr. Carson said.

'The shade look'

President Bush, who often teases members of the White House press corps, apologized yesterday after he poked fun at a reporter for wearing sunglasses without realizing they were needed to stem vision loss, the Associated Press reports.

The exchange occurred at a press conference in the Rose Garden. Mr. Bush called on Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Wallsten and asked whether he was going to ask his question with his "shades" on.

"For the viewers, there's no sun," Mr. Bush said to the television cameras.

But even though the sun was behind the clouds, Mr. Wallsten still needs sunglasses because he has Stargardt's disease, a form of macular degeneration that causes progressive vision loss. The condition causes Mr. Wallsten to be sensitive to glare and even on a cloudy day can cause pain and increase the loss of sight.

Mr. Wallsten said Mr. Bush called his cellular phone later in the day to apologize and tell him that he didn't know he had the disease. Mr. Wallsten said he interrupted and told the president that no apology was necessary and that he didn't feel offended because he hadn't told anyone at the White House about his condition.

"He said, 'I needle you guys out of affection,' " Mr. Wallsten said. "I said, 'I understand that, but I don't want you to treat me any differently because of this.' "

Mr. Wallsten said the president told him that he would not treat him differently, so Mr. Wallsten encouraged him to "needle away."

"[Mr. Bush] said, 'I will. Next time, I'll just use a different needle,' " the reporter said.

DOJ_NMG_0034507

Mr. Wallsten said he thought that was a pretty good line. And said his only complaint is that the president didn't answer his question at the press conference.

·Greg Pierce can be reached at 202/636-3285 or gpierce@washington times.com.

Lieberman Weighs Re-election Bid Options (AP)

By Susan Haigh, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman, warily watching his primary challenger advance in the polls, must soon decide whether to start collecting signatures for a possible independent bid this November.

Lieberman's campaign contends that it's focused only on winning the Aug. 8 primary, but the Democrat has not ruled out petitioning his way onto the November ballot as part of a backup plan to secure a fourth term in the Senate.

"I am not going to close out any options," the senator recently told reporters.

Lieberman's spokeswoman, Marion Steinfels, said he is "already the party's endorsed candidate and on Aug. 8 he will win the primary, the Democratic primary."

Lieberman has until Aug. 9 — the day after the Democratic primary — to collect 7,500 signatures from registered voters to gain a spot on the ballot as an unaffiliated candidate.

But any effort to gather signatures before the primary would be a sign of weakness, indicating that Lieberman, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2000, fears that he could lose to businessman Ned Lamont. The effort also would rile Democrats who already question Lieberman's party loyalty and his perceived closeness to President Bush.

The senator has been a strong backer of the Iraq war.

Christopher Kukk, an associate political science professor at Western Connecticut State University, said it's a risk Lieberman may be willing to take as Lamont continues to make gains in the polls.

"I think he'll alienate Democratic voters, but to be honest with you, I think he already has alienated Democratic voters," Kukk said. "If Lamont is gaining ... I think you'll see Lieberman jump."

According to a recent Quinnipiac University Poll, 57 percent of registered Democrats in Connecticut said they would vote for Lieberman, compared to 32 percent for Lamont. A month ago, Lieberman drew 65 percent to Lamont's 19 percent.

The poll found that if Lieberman runs as an independent, he would win with 56 percent of the vote, compared to 18 percent for Lamont and 8 percent for Republican Alan Schlesinger. Lieberman enjoys higher ratings among Republicans and unaffiliated voters than Democrats, the poll found. Unaffiliated voters are the state's largest bloc of voters, followed by Democrats and then Republicans.

Lamont, a multimillionaire owner of a cable television company, launched an ad campaign this week asking for Lieberman's support should he win the primary, and promising to back Lieberman should the senator prevail.

"What do you say, Senator?" Lamont asks in the radio ad. "May the best Democrat win."

Lamont's campaign manager, Tom Swan, said Democrats want to know what Lieberman will do.

"If Joe Lieberman is considering abandoning the Democratic Party, the people have a right to know it," Swan said. "Ned is agreeing to abide by the process and respect the choice of the people. Will Joe?"

No matter what Lieberman does, Kukk said he believes the veteran senator will win re-election. Lieberman still enjoys a strong lead over Lamont, and Kukk said if Lieberman runs as an unaffiliated candidate, it likely won't hurt him with the general electorate because party loyalty isn't very strong anymore.

"I think they are thinking of it," Kukk said of a possible Lieberman independent run. "If you're looking for your political survival, you'd be silly not to."

Webb Poses Challenge To Allen In Va. Race (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, June 15, 2006

National Democratic leaders on Wednesday relished the prospect of James Webb, a war hero and former Reagan Navy secretary, challenging Republican Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record) this November. But beating Allen, a well-liked former Virginia governor who's also weighing a White House bid, will be a struggle, even for a Republican-turned-Democrat with Webb's made-for-the-movies portfolio.

With the blessing of leading Senate Democrats, Webb, 60, beat party stalwart and traditional liberal Harris Miller, thanks to overwhelming support in the suburbs of Washington, D.C., where congressional politics resonate.

DOJ_NMG_0034508

"If you had to construct a candidate who would be a great opponent to Allen, it would be Jim Webb," Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y. and chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said in an interview Wednesday.

"On some positions, he's conservative. On some others, he's more moderate. But he is who he is. He's genuine," said Schumer, who gave Webb the DSCC's rare preprimary endorsement.

National party leaders, including Schumer, Democratic chairman Howard Dean, 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry and former Gov. Mark R. Warner, a 2008 presidential prospect, have all pledged financial and campaign support.

Unlike most Democratic candidates, Webb is pursuing a populist strategy aimed at returning so-called "Reagan Democrats" — moderate, middle-class and largely rural whites — to the Democratic Party.

Those voters have been unshakably loyal to the folksy, cowboy-booted Allen in two successful statewide campaigns and Allen remains formidable as he seeks re-election.

As of late May, he had about $7.5 million on hand to barely $220,000 for Webb. Allen is already running television ads, something Webb has never done. Allen's come-from-behind election as governor in 1993 rescued the GOP from irrelevance and began its resurgence in Virginia, giving him an enormous base of volunteers. He's the one Virginia Republican who thoroughly unifies the party's feuding moderate and conservative wings.

Webb remains unknown to most Virginia voters despite his White House experience and the six best-selling war novels he's written. That gives Allen the opportunity to define Webb before Webb can, said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams.

"We don't know where Webb is on the issues. He's taken two positions on immigration reform, three or four different positions on affirmative action, two positions on gay marriage," Wadhams said.

"He's even taken two positions on George Allen," Wadhams said with a chuckle, noting that Webb endorsed Allen for the Senate in 2000.

Webb is a key player in the Democrats' fall strategy to win the six seats necessary to take control of the Senate. He calls Allen a rubber stamp for President Bush on Iraq, a crushing federal debt and economic policies that Webb says punish the middle class.

"This raises the visibility of the Virginia Senate race in national politics and it at least makes it competitive," said Merle Black, professor of politics at Emory University in Atlanta. "Allen's still expected to win, but at least he has to work for it now."

If the race is an referendum on Iraq in particular, Webb brings credibility to the debate.

In newspaper columns he wrote in 2002, Webb warned of a Vietnam-style quagmire in Iraq, where U.S. troops would be viewed as an occupying force. After the invasion, he broke with the GOP.

Webb was wounded commanding a Marine rifle company in Vietnam's bloodiest fighting. Now he campaigns in the buff-colored desert combat boots his son, a Marine, will wear in Iraq this fall.

Webb's war record is "beyond reproach," said Christopher LaCivita, architect of the 2004 Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

"But he's wrong on the issues. We know Webb opposed the war, but where do we go from here?" said LaCivita, a trusted Allen adviser who is also a Marine combat veteran. "It's very easy to be against something, but what are you for? We don't know because Webb hasn't articulated that."

Allen Faces A Unifier With Webb In Race (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Sen. George Allen's seat once seemed so safe that Democrats were searching for candidates to challenge him, but national heavy-hitters are now saying James H. Webb Jr.'s win in the Democratic primary Tuesday should have the Republicans running scared.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who voted for Mr. Allen in 2000, has the full support of the local and national Democratic machines as he tries to unseat the incumbent in the November election, party leaders said yesterday.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) added the Virginia seat to its list of potential Republican grabs.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat who heads the DSCC, said primary voters bucked conventional wisdom and chose the more electable candidate by picking Mr. Webb over longtime local party activist Harris N. Miller.

"The victory by Jim Webb is a sure sign that Virginia is really ready to dump George Allen," Mr. Schumer told reporters, noting that Mr. Webb attracts "Bush voters and Reagan Democrats."

Mr. Miller, a technology lobbyist, won the backing of many state legislators, while Mr. Webb attracted Washington Democrats, including 2004 Democratic presidential nominee Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Mr. Miller and the local activists said they will join Mr. Webb in trying to beat Mr. Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0034509

"I think he can win this thing," said Virginia Senate Minority Leader Richard L. Saslaw, Fairfax County Democrat, who previously endorsed Mr. Miller.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Brian J. Moran, who remained neutral in the race, predicted that Democrats would rally around Mr. Webb. "We will be very united," the Alexandria Democrat said.

Former Gov. Mark Warner, the state's most popular politician, will lend his support to Mr. Webb, said Warner spokeswoman Ellen Qualls.

Mr. Warner, who also is exploring a presidential bid, didn't endorse either candidate but raised money for both before the primary.

"The governor is going to do his part. He believes the senator is vulnerable," Miss Qualls said.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat who also didn't endorse any candidate in the primary, said: "I look forward to working with [Mr. Webb] during the upcoming campaign."

Mr. Allen, 54, has served as state delegate, a U.S. representative and Virginia governor, an office limited to one term by the state constitution. He ousted Democratic incumbent Sen. Charles S. Robb from his seat in Congress in 2000.

Mr. Webb, 60, a former Marine and decorated Vietnam veteran, was President Reagan's Secretary of the Navy. He left the Republican Party because he opposes the war in Iraq, and he felt the party is too extreme on social issues. His 25-year-old son, Jim, is heading to Iraq later this year.

Mr. Webb, also a best-selling author, never has run for elected office.

Some Democrats said privately that Mr. Webb needs a campaign overhaul because his primary operation made him appear to be disorganized and less energized than Mr. Miller.

Mr. Schumer said the DSCC is working with all Senate campaigns to make sure they have top-notch staffs.

Mr. Webb will need help with fundraising. He had less than $220,000, as of May 24.

Mr. Allen already has dipped into his $7.5 million campaign war chest to air a television advertisement in the expensive Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads markets.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said Mr. Webb had no chance at winning the primary before the national endorsements, which now make him "beholden" to Washington Democrats.

Mr. Allen, who led the Republican senate campaign arm in 2004 when the party strengthened its majority, has long predicted that national Democrats with a grudge against him will funnel cash into Virginia.

He has further attracted national Democratic ire by traveling to key states such as Iowa and New Hampshire in what many view as an early attempt to test the presidential waters for 2008.

Mr. Webb and Mr. Miller have criticized Mr. Allen for his national travel, a theme that is sure to continue through the campaign.

Democrats Can't Get Enough Of Newt Gingrich's Slogan (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, June 15, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) raised eyebrows Tuesday when she used a campaign phrase suggested for the Democrats early this year by former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

But it turns out that Pelosi is not alone.

Democratic candidates for Congress across the country have been employing the phrase "Had Enough?" in speeches and on their campaign websites.

After national Democrats unveiled their 2006 slogan, "Together We Can Do Better," Gingrich in March said Democrats would be better off using "Had Enough?"

A month later, former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.) wrote an op-ed in The New York Times urging Democrats to embrace the phrase "Had Enough? Vote Democratic!"

In an interview yesterday, Roemer said the idea for the op-ed came to him after reading a story about Harry Truman that recounted that an advertising executive in 1946 suggested "Had Enough?" to the Republican Party, which adopted the slogan. Later that year, Republicans gained control of both chambers of Congress.

During her speech to the liberal group Campaign for America's Future this week, Pelosi asked the crowd, "Have you had enough?"

"Yeah!" the crowd replied, as it did to each of her "had enough" questions:

"Have you had enough of a war that has failed to make America more secure? Have you had enough of paying higher prices for gasoline and prescription drugs in order to increase the profits of pharmaceutical and oil companies? Have you had enough of seeing America led in the wrong direction?"

DOJ_NMG_0034510

She concluded, "I thought so."

The campaign slogan of Ed Perlmutter, running in the Democratic primary in Colorado's 7th District, is "Had Enough? Time for a change." The incumbent in that district, Republican Bob Beauprez, is retiring.

Perlmutter told The Hill that he is not following Gingrich's lead but added, "I haven't liked a lot of things [Gingrich] has done. I'll take that."

If he wins the primary, Perlmutter would face Republican Rick O'Donnell — who used to work for Gingrich's Progress and Freedom Foundation.

Other Democratic candidates who have used the "Had Enough?" phrase include Lois Murphy, who is looking to defeat Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.), and Dr. David Hunter, who is facing an uphill battle to replace retiring Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.).

But it didn't help certain Democrats in their quest for Congress. Ken Longmyer and Ron Shapiro, who favored the "Had Enough?" slogan, lost in their recent primaries in Virginia and Mississippi, respectively.

Spokespeople for these candidates disputed any connection to Gingrich, with some of them noting that the phrase is common in the English language.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), however, acknowledged Gingrich's help — and praised it. During a speech in Ohio earlier this month, Obama said, "I never thought that I'd hear myself say this at a Democratic Party dinner, but Newt Gingrich made a great point the other day" on the "Had Enough?" slogan.

Obama then attracted several standing ovations by using the phrase on port security, healthcare and U.S. dependence on oil.

Democratic strategist James Carville can also claim credit for the phrase. He wrote a book published in 2003 titled Had Enough? A Handbook for Fighting Back.

Regardless, there are some Democrats who believe that "Had Enough?" is better than "Together We Can Do Better."

Liberal commentator Arianna Huffington has called for Democrats to dump "Together We Can Do Better," calling it the "lamest" message she could imagine, according to a report in The Washington Post.

Gingrich told The Hill this week that his advice to Democrats rankled some of his Republican colleagues but added that he is concerned that the GOP is not evolving. He said the reason why Democrats stayed in the majority for decades before 1994 was because they were constantly coming up with new ideas.

Alexander Bolton, Elana Schor and Natalie McGill contributed to this report.

Bill Richardson: Looking Like A Go For 2008 (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg, Roll Call Contributing Writer

Roll Call, June 15, 2006

Officially, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) is focused on his November re-election race, even though it's expected to be relatively easy. And as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association, Richardson also hopes to lead his party to a gain of at least a few more governorships.

But some Democratic insiders insist that Richardson has more on his mind than that. They say he is telling friends and political allies that he has decided to run for president in 2008.

When I spoke with the governor recently, he would only say, "After November, I will reassess my plan." But Richardson, 58, has long been mentioned for higher office as part of a Democratic national ticket, and I'd be flabbergasted if he didn't take the presidential plunge for 2008.

In 1984, less than two years after he was elected to a new Congressional district created by reapportionment and redistricting, Richardson already was being touted as a possible Senate candidate against Republican Sen. Pete Domenici.

Richardson never made that run, but he subsequently built an unusually impressive political résumé that includes everything from New Mexico Democratic Party executive director, Member of Congress, secretary of Energy, ambassador to the United Nations and chairman of the 2004 Democratic National Convention. He even has served as a hostage-release negotiator.

Then, in 2002, he was elected governor of New Mexico.

More than 20 years ago, observers tagged Richardson as a political up-and-comer, and they were right.

The 1984 edition of the Almanac of American Politics said he "is obviously a young man in a hurry, and one with a well-developed sense of political strategy." Only 10 years later, Congressional Quarterly's Politics in America referred to him as "one of the nation's top Hispanic politicians."

Now, savvy political insiders in the state give Richardson high marks as governor, praising his "bold initiatives," his willingness to take on challenging issues and his ability to sell his agenda. "He is a huge salesman, and a very good one," said one observer.

DOJ_NMG_0034511

As governor, he has supported a state income tax cut for most New Mexico residents and has taken steps to cut the state's considerable driving-while-intoxicated rate. He has declared 2006 the "Year of the Child" in the state and offered an agenda that promotes children's health, education and safety — not a bad platform from which to launch a national campaign.

Whether because of Richardson's policies or just plain good luck, New Mexico's economy has been strong, another considerable asset if he makes a White House run.

The governor's greatest asset as a presidential candidate is the breadth of his political experience. He has been in the political trenches as a political operative and as an aide to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; served as a legislator; had executive experience as governor; and has been involved in formulating and articulating U.S. foreign policy. Few other Democratic contenders are likely to have such experience.

What sets Richardson apart from other potential presidential hopefuls, however, is the fact that he is a Hispanic. Richardson's mother was Mexican, and he was raised in Mexico City. He is fluent in Spanish and is very popular in the Hispanic community.

Richardson's ethnicity could be a powerful asset in states such as New Mexico, Arizona, Florida and even Texas — all states with significant Hispanic populations, and all states carried by President Bush in 2004.

Richardson is also widely regarded as an extremely likable, down-to-earth guy. Unlike some recent (unsuccessful) Democratic presidential nominees who proved to be cold, distant and even artificial, the New Mexico Democrat connects with people.

But Richardson is not without his vulnerabilities.

He had to admit that he had misled people into believing that he was drafted by a Major League Baseball organization (the Kansas City Athletics) in 1966. When an investigation by the Albuquerque Journal found no evidence the he had been drafted by anyone, Richardson acknowledged that he might have been mistaken and was told that he could or would be drafted. Richardson pitched for Tufts University, a Division III school that is better known for its academics than its sports program.

More importantly, Washington, D.C., insiders who have observed Richardson for years raise questions about his self-discipline. They say he overextends himself and often loses focus. And they whisper that he hasn't always carried himself in a style befitting a high elected official.

In December 2005, the Albuquerque Journal carried a front-page article on Richardson's penchant for touching people.

"He hugs, pokes, jabs and tickles. If he sees a man with a bald pate, he rubs it," wrote staff writer Leslie Linthicum.

The piece quoted Lt. Gov. Diane Denish (D) as saying that his touching and poking is "irritating and annoying," and that she tries to avoid the physical contact by "trying not to stand or sit next to him."

"It's my way of connecting to people," the governor told the newspaper when asked about his tendency to touch people. "I guess that's what I get for being friendly," he added.

But Richardson's physicality is part of a potentially larger problem. Even admirers acknowledge that he can sometimes be "sophomoric" and overly informal.

But Richardson's informality also reflects his "regular guy" persona that many voters and reporters will likely find so appealing. (Some state lawmakers, no doubt, would add that the nice-guy governor can be an overpowering bully when he wants to get his way.)

The New Mexico governor is a man of considerable talent. Measured by commitments, money and organization in the early states, Richardson starts behind many of the other contenders for the Democratic nomination. But his résumé and charisma have the potential to carry him a long way in the race. He's worth keeping an eye on.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Name That Candidate (NYT)

By Calvin Trillin

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

MY excitement at the news that Senator Chris Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, is considering a bid for president in 2008 is easy to explain: his name has enormous rhyming potential. We all have our own issues.

Rhyme is not my only one; I am also intensely interested in meter. I happen to be a deadline poet, responsible for commenting on the events of the day in verse. Someone in my position tends to see Ross Perot and John McCain as two peas in a pod — blessedly iambic candidates with nearly unlimited rhyming possibilities. During my 16 years in the deadline poetry game, though, we've had nobody with a name like Ross Perot or John McCain in the White House. I've had to deal with presidents whose names are an affront to rhyme and meter. Given the rhyming difficulties of Bill Clinton's name, in fact, I believe future historians will think of him as the "orange" of American presidents.

DOJ_NMG_0034512

It's not as if a deadline poet has an easy lot to begin with. Obviously there are those constant deadlines. Without wanting to knock the competition, I might just point out that, say, the romantic poets — Wordsworth and that crowd — could mosey along the countryside for days without feeling any pressure at all to come up with a sunset they considered worth writing about.

Also, the pay is limited. Two years ago, it was revealed that National Review was paying its deadline poet, William H. von Dreele, precisely the same per poem as The Nation magazine pays me — $100. I was shaken by that news.

For years, I've referred to the editor who retained my services for the Nation as "the wily and parsimonious Victor S. Navasky," but I'd always thought that National Review's William F. Buckley Jr. was, whatever our political differences, a considerate and generous-hearted man. I could only conclude that society as a whole undervalues deadline poets. Given those burdens, the last thing we deserved was a second president whose name rhymes with almost nothing beyond "push" and "tush."

I don't want to appear unappreciative. At times George W. Bush has seemed interested in making my life easier. He must have known before the appointments were made, for instance, that Condoleezza Rice's name fits exactly into the meter of "The March of the Siamese Children" from "The King and I" ("Condoleezza Rice, who is cold as ice, is precise with her advice") and that Alberto Gonzales rhymes with "loyal über alles."

Still, as the names of potential 2008 presidential candidates begin to get tossed around, you can't blame us for looking forward to having someone in the Oval Office who is more compatible with our needs. That is why I groan every time the eminently rhymable Bill Frist shoots himself in the foot. That is why I keep trying to reassure myself that the Republican base would never permit the nomination of Rudolph Giuliani. That is why, in a conversation about the possibility that the governor of Massachusetts could enter the race, I might burst out, "To me, Romney is just another Clinton."

Reading about the renewed interest lately in Al Gore, whom I once referred to in a poem as "a man-like object," I have to admit that his name rhymes with more than "bore" and "snore." My worries about the Democrats go beyond the growing sense that their leading candidate is literally another Clinton. They have a tendency to thrust forward candidates whose names we can't even imagine at this point in the process; witness Jimmy Carter and Howard Dean.

In my more pessimistic contemplations of the 2008 campaign, I see myself telling some political operative that I've made my peace with the possibility that the Democrats, desperate for some charisma, could turn to Barack Obama — a man whose rhymes I long ago used up in trying to deal with Osama bin Laden.

"But Obama's not the only Illinois contender," the operative says. "There's also the governor."

"The governor?"

"The governor," he repeats. "Rod Blagojevich."

Emergency System Called Very Ill (USAT)

By Robert Davis, Usa Today

USA Today, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's emergency medical system — from the 911 centers that take phone calls for help to the emergency rooms that have become primary treatment centers for millions of Americans — is in a dangerous state of crisis, says a new series of landmark reports.

The Institute of Medicine on Wednesday released the Future of Emergency Care reports, which were prepared by a 40-member board after a two-year investigation. The IOM advises the government on science, medical and health issues.

The reports warn that the U.S. lifesaving system is not only failing to handle daily emergencies but also could break down in the face of national disasters, including hurricanes, disease outbreaks or terrorist attacks.

“We are not prepared,” says Brent Eastman, a board member and chief medical officer at Scripps Health in San Diego. “We struggle to survive day-to-day.”

Nels Sanddal, board member and president of the Critical Illness and Trauma Foundation in Bozeman, Mont., agrees. “To ramp up” to treat high numbers of patients, he says, “we have to have backbone.”

The reports say that, on average, in every minute of every day an ambulance carrying a patient is turned away from a hospital on “diversion,” when an emergency room says it's too full to take more patients.

That must end, says Arthur Kellermann, director of the Center for Injury Control at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta. “We cannot let the most time-sensitive portal in the hospital get gridlocked.”

The IOM reports detail how hundreds of thousands of lives are affected every year by EMS deficiencies that are not obvious. “What the public perceives and what is real, in many cases, there is a disconnect,” says Gail Warden, president emeritus of the Henry Ford Health System in Detroit, who chaired the panel. “In most communities, there is a crisis under the surface.”

Many emergency rooms barely can handle their daily patient loads, children don't always get good care, and the quality of rescue services is erratic, the reports say.

DOJ_NMG_0034513

And geography determines survival.

“There is a wide disparity,” says Shirley Gamble, a United Way board member in Austin. She cited a 2003 USA TODAY probe that found a 10-fold difference between major cities in cardiac arrest survival rates.

The reports say that by following the lead of those cities that save more lives, entire regions can raise the quality of their care.

Improvements to emergency medical services, Eastman says, “should be built on islands of excellence that exist today.”

Crisis Seen In Nation's ER Care (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Capacity, Expertise Are Found Lacking

Emergency medical care in the United States is on the verge of collapse, with the nation's declining number of emergency rooms dangerously overcrowded and often unable to provide the expertise needed to treat seriously ill people in a safe and efficient manner.

That's the grim conclusion of three reports released yesterday by the Institute of Medicine, the product of an extensive two-year look at emergency care.

Long waits for treatment are epidemic, the reports said, with ambulances sometimes idling for hours to unload patients. Once in the ER, patients sometimes wait up to two days to be admitted to a hospital bed.

As a system, U.S. emergency care lacks stability and the capacity to respond to large disasters or epidemics, according to the 25 experts who conducted the study. It provides care of variable and often unknown quality and depends on the willingness of doctors and hospitals to lose large amounts of money.

Fixing the problems is likely to cost billions of dollars and will require the leadership of a new federal agency, which Congress should create in the next two years, they wrote.

"This is a crisis that could jeopardize everyone in this room, and all their loved ones," A. Brent Eastman, a surgeon and chief medical officer of the ScrippsHealth hospitals in San Diego, said at a daylong conference on the reports, which were prepared by the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine.

"There is just such a gap between what the public knows, or thinks it knows, and the reality. And it is getting worse," said Robert B. Giffin, the Institute of Medicine staffer who headed the study.

The reports -- on hospital ERs, on pediatric emergency care and on pre-hospital care given by ambulance services -- were embraced by the 24,000-member American College of Emergency Physicians, and its president said that the endorsement was telling.

"What other industry says, 'Hey, look at us, our whole system is broken'?" said the group's president, Frederick C. Blum, a physician in Morgantown, W.Va.

Two key steps for improving emergency care are regional planning and creating a standard way to measure outcomes, so that low-quality ERs and ambulance services can be identified and fixed, the committee wrote.

Emergency medical care is a legal right for all Americans. Under a law enacted in 1986, emergency rooms must evaluate and stabilize anyone who shows up. That requirement -- bolstered by physicians' ethical duty to treat the ill -- has made hospital emergency departments subject to unique pressures.

From 1993 to 2003, the U.S. population grew by 12 percent but emergency room visits grew by 27 percent, from 90 million to 114 million. In that same period, however, 425 emergency departments closed, along with about 700 hospitals and nearly 200,000 beds.

ERs are notorious money losers. About 14 percent of ER patients are uninsured. About 16 percent are covered by Medicaid, the federal-state insurance program for the poor, and 21 percent by Medicare, the program for the elderly. More than half of hospitals report losing money on emergency care of both groups of government-insured patients.

All of this has led to extreme bottlenecks in ERs, manifested by delays in every step of treatment, according to the reports.

In 2003, 501,000 ambulances were diverted from the hospital where they normally would have delivered a patient because the ER was full. In 2004, 70 percent of urban hospitals reported that their emergency departments had been "on diversion" at least once.

Nationwide, about 14 percent of ER patients end up admitted to the hospital. A study by the Government Accountability Office in 2003 found that 20 percent of emergency departments had to "board" patients in hallways or other temporary space, for an average of eight hours, before a bed opened. The American College of Emergency Physicians several years ago surveyed 90 emergency departments on a single Monday evening. Seventy-three percent reported that they had two or more patients boarding.

DOJ_NMG_0034514

A 2004 study found that ERs at university-based hospitals were classified as crowded 35 percent of the time, meaning all emergency beds were occupied, patients were in the hallways, the waiting room was full, and the waiting time for treatment was more than one hour.

Another hazard largely unrecognized by Americans is that hospitals, especially in rural areas, often cannot find specialists such as orthopedic surgeons and neurosurgeons willing to cover the ER.

In some cases, this is because doctors are unwilling to treat high-risk patients with complicated ailments, many of them uninsured, at inconvenient times. Sometimes it is simply a function of shortages. In 2002, there were fewer practicing neurosurgeons in the United States (about 3,000) than a decade earlier.

Largely unknown is the human cost of these problems.

Many studies have shown that high-stress, chaotic environments contribute to errors. One from 1991 showed that though relatively few "adverse outcomes" occur in the ER, it was the site of 70 percent of those attributable to negligence.

The number of deaths caused by a delay in treatment or lack of expertise is especially uncertain, though it may not be small. San Diego established a trauma system in 1984 after autopsies of accident victims who died after reaching the ER suggested that 22 percent of the deaths were preventable, said Eastman, one of the Institute of Medicine committee members.

Trauma care in many ways is the model on which the committee hopes the emergency care system will be rebuilt.

Some states and urban areas have systems in which the level of trauma care every hospital is capable of providing is known and a centralized dispatching agency directs patients based on real-time information about each hospital's capacity and staffing.

Although the vast majority of ER patients have not suffered trauma, about half need attention within an hour of arrival at the hospital, according to a study in 2003. Because not every hospital or even every city can provide all services, "the committee supports further regionalization of emergency care services," the authors wrote.

Even without systemwide reform, hospitals can do many things to make the flow of patients more efficient and to be ready for predictable spikes in demand, said Benjamin K. Chu, an ER physician and regional president of a Kaiser Health Plan in California who was also on the expert panel.

The report on ambulance service called for standardizing the training of paramedics and creating guidelines for pre-hospital care based on research.

The report on pediatric care emphasized that 27 percent of ER patients are children and that many hospitals lack the expertise or the equipment to meet the needs of those who are critically ill.

The District's emergency and trauma services measure up well. A report this year gave the city an A-plus in "its support of an emergency care system."

Though the assessment was somewhat skewed by the District's compact geography and urban makeup, population-adjusted numbers showed more emergency departments, board-certified emergency doctors, hospital-staffed beds and trauma centers than in any state, and probably more than in many local jurisdictions, although the report did not look so narrowly.

Still, the American College of Emergency Physicians noted, emergency services in the city "are regularly reaching their capacity, and patients are frequently and increasingly diverted to other facilities." In 2004, for example, Washington Hospital Center's ER was "on diversion" for nearly 2,100 hours. Howard University Hospital's ER turned away patients for the same reasons for almost 1,200 hours.

Staff writer Susan Levine contributed to this report.

Stopwatch Ticking For Dan Rather (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

CBS to Drop Ex-Anchor From '60 Minutes'

NEW YORK -- CBS executives have decided there is no future role at the network for Dan Rather, making it certain that the man who sat in the anchor chair for 24 years will depart by this fall.

These executives recognize Rather's contributions over four decades and are not trying to boot him because of the controversy surrounding his botched story on President Bush and the National Guard, say network sources who declined to be named while discussing a sensitive personnel matter. But the executives concluded there was no room for Rather at "60 Minutes," particularly with incoming anchor Katie Couric planning to report a half-dozen stories a year and the hiring of CNN's Anderson Cooper as a part-time contributor.

Rather's contract expires in November, but the sources say he might leave before that, depending on negotiations with CBS.

DOJ_NMG_0034515

Rather, 74, declined to discuss his future this week. "I'm contracted to be a full-time '60 Minutes' correspondent, and I'm working on that contract," he said. People familiar with Rather's situation say he has had no serious negotiations with any of the cable networks but has attracted interest from people developing projects for television.

Rather has said several times that "my best work is still ahead of me." He is described by friends as hurt and puzzled by the attitude of CBS management.

Rather joined "60 Minutes II" after leaving the anchor job in March 2005, and was shifted to the original Sunday night program when the weekday edition was canceled months later. But with the Sunday program's team of correspondents -- Ed Bradley, Morley Safer, Lesley Stahl and Steve Kroft -- having been joined by such former "60 II" reporters as Scott Pelley and Bob Simon and part-timers such as Lara Logan, executive producer Jeff Fager has a glut of contributors.

Rather has done eight pieces for the program this season, ranging from interviews with Bill Clinton and George Clooney to a segment on the Whole Foods grocery chain to a report on his visit to North Korea. But with "60 Minutes" largely in reruns for the summer, Rather has had little to do since then and is not in the program's plans for the fall season.

Some CBS staffers are sad about the turn of events, viewing it as a difficult moment for a man who once interviewed world leaders and went into war zones for the network. They question why the network can't find a suitable place for Rather in light of his long service to CBS.

The CBS executives hope a dignified exit can be arranged and that Rather can find a second career, perhaps in cable, the sources say. But they also believe that with Couric debuting as anchor in September, the news division needs to move on from the Rather era. And the fallout over his 2004 piece alleging that the Guard had given Bush favorable treatment -- based on documents that the network later acknowledged could not be authenticated -- has been a complicating factor.

Rather has accumulated his share of detractors at the network over the years. Mike Wallace, the "60 Minutes" veteran who recently relinquished his full-time duties, has said Rather should have resigned over the Guard story in a gesture of solidarity with his colleagues who worked on the segment. Three top CBS News executives quit under pressure, and Rather's producer Mary Mapes was fired, after an independent panel found that they had "failed miserably" to verify the disputed documents and that some had made misleading statements in defending the story.

Rather, who apologized on the air for the segment, relinquished the anchor chair earlier than he had planned. He made the announcement weeks before the panel, headed by former U.S. attorney general Dick Thornburgh and former Associated Press chief executive Lou Boccardi, released its findings.

CBS is also trying to attract a younger audience for "60 Minutes," which has been on the air since 1968, and Rather's age is hardly consistent with giving the broadcast a fresher look.

Pictures of Rather reporting from around the world still line the corridors at CBS, a reminder of the storied if controversial career of the man who covered John F. Kennedy's assassination and succeeded Walter Cronkite in 1981. Rather's broadcast was No. 1 among the evening newscasts for several years, and when "CBS Evening News" slipped into third place in the 1990s, Rather cast himself as a hard-news champion in an era when television was increasingly focusing on softer features, crime and celebrities.

Interim CBS anchor Bob Schieffer has made the program more competitive with ABC's second-place "World News Tonight," which last month handed the anchor reins to Charlie Gibson.

From his talking back to President Richard Nixon at a 1973 news conference about Watergate to his confrontational 1988 interview with then-Vice President George Bush over Iran-contra, Rather became a lightning rod for conservatives who argued that he leaned to the left. But he also had a knack for landing big interviews and big stories. Rather was the last Western journalist to interview Saddam Hussein before the 2003 war, and the following year disclosed the first photos of Iraqi prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib.

At his peak, Rather anchored the evening news, contributed to "60 Minutes," hosted "48 Hours" and did regular radio commentaries, often sprinkling his delivery with the down-home Texas sayings that became known as "Dan-isms."

Changing Attack In Poverty Tactics, An Old Debate: Who Is At Fault? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

More than 40 years ago, Lyndon Johnson launched his War on Poverty with an ambitious declaration: "We know what must be done, and this nation of abundance can surely afford to do it."

Despite decades of economic growth and technological progress, tens of millions of Americans still live in poverty. Efforts to reduce the ranks of the poor persist, but they have moved underground. Today's War on Poverty isn't marked by lofty presidential rhetoric. It is a guerrilla war with platoons of idealistic crusaders and skeptical scholars, with dozens of small-scale experiments and local initiatives that largely escape public notice.

DOJ_NMG_0034516

Sprawling government Great Society programs are out. And it has been a full decade since Bill Clinton signed a Republican-backed bill "to end welfare as we know it." Except for a flicker of attention in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina last year, poverty is neither in the headlines nor on the lips of politicians. When President Bush refers to it, he usually is referring to other countries. ("Free trade is the only proven path out of poverty for developing nations," he says.)

Yet to a surprising degree, an intense subterranean debate over what causes poverty and what to do about it continues, and it has echoes of a debate that has hardly changed for a century. In a 1894 treatise regarded as the first U.S. social-welfare textbook, Amos Griswold Warner wrote words that could easily have figured in the 1990s congressional debate over revamping welfare: "Nearly all the experiences in this country indicate" that welfare "is a source of corruption to politics, of expense to the community, and of degradation and increased pauperization to the poor," he said. "The more generous public relief, the more likely the poor will prefer it to working," argued Mr. Warner, a social-work pioneer and the District of Columbia's first superintendent of charities.

"Either you blame the poor -- 'the poverty is in the people' -- or you blame the system," says James T. Patterson, a Brown University historian. "It is a constant divide." If the poor are primarily responsible for their plight, then government ought to prod them to change their ways. If poverty is primarily the consequence of economic and social forces largely beyond their control, then government ought to give them money and change the rules of the economy.

Among those who dominate American politics and poverty policy today, the argument that government programs create dependency rather than foster independence has stuck. There is little appetite among governing Republicans for sweeping federal antipoverty initiatives, or even for fine-tuning Mr. Clinton's 1996 law that limits the time any person can remain on welfare. Eliminating poverty for all time isn't even a slogan anymore; the problem is seen as far more intractable and complex. Republicans read the decline in poverty during the boom of the 1990s as evidence that the best way to fight poverty is to promote a growing economy, and they offer tax cuts to that end.

So the pendulum has swung toward using tax credits, vouchers, rules and penalties to prod individuals to make choices that steer them away from lives of poverty, by getting and staying married, for instance, or taking even low-paid jobs to stay off welfare. In place of big government programs, boutique experiments proliferate. There are intensive community efforts to discourage teen pregnancy, widely seen as a precursor to a life of poverty, and experiments with offering frequent-flier style points to encourage public-housing residents to show up for work on time. All reflect a continuing struggle to find an effective combination of carrots and sticks to help the poverty-prone avoid the abyss of privation and reliance on government benefits.

Democrats fault the economy for creating too few good jobs and for inequitably distributing the fruits of economic growth. They say they would, if in power, raise the minimum wage, alter the tax code to take more from the rich and spend more on programs that appear successful. But even many of them -- the children and grandchildren of those who forged big-government antipoverty programs of Lyndon Johnson and Franklin Roosevelt -- embrace the notion that the government should make the poor take more responsibility for their circumstances.

Democrats say they have learned one lesson in political reality: "If people believe your ideas about alleviating poverty are value-based -- that you expect the poor to work, expect them to be responsible, to keep their part of the bargain -- then people have a positive response," says John Edwards, the unsuccessful 2004 Democratic vice presidential candidate who now heads a University of North Carolina center on poverty. "If they believe it's just another government program that creates dependency, then they won't," he says. * * *

Eradicating poverty in the U.S. is an old goal. In the frothy days of 1928, Herbert Hoover said, "We shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished in the nation." Incomes did rise sharply in the 1920s; the working class did better; life expectancy grew. But he was wrong about poverty.

When the prosperity of the 1920s gave way to the Great Depression, Franklin Roosevelt responded with programs that laid the foundation for generations of big government. "Government had to respond to rising expectations, and as government reacted, appetites were whetted still more, expanding...a bureaucracy whose business was to serve its customers," the people who got government benefits, Mr. Patterson writes in his history of 20th-century antipoverty efforts. "The early welfare state thereby acquired two assets that proved invaluable...an organized constituency and a bureaucratic momentum that could not easily be stopped."

Although the vigorous economy of the late 1940s and 1950s boosted living standards for many, poverty didn't vanish. Yet as a public concern, it was nearly invisible until activist Michael Harrington jolted the nation with a 1962 book that described "the other America," which he said was "populated by failures, by those driven from the land and bewildered by the city, by old people suddenly confronted with the torments of loneliness and poverty, and by minorities facing a wall of prejudice."

Just two years later, President Johnson launched his War on Poverty, declaring, "We cannot and need not wait for the gradual growth of the economy to lift this forgotten fifth of our nation above the poverty line." He wasn't nuts. His economic advisers were certain the economy would continue to grow as robustly as it had for decades and told him poverty was beatable.

DOJ_NMG_0034517

But neither LBJ's determination, tens of billions of dollars nor the enthusiasm of poverty fighters in and out of government eliminated poverty. "I guess you could say: Poverty won the War," Ronald Reagan quipped famously in 1986. That isn't precisely true. The poverty rate fell more in the 1960s than in any decade since, and remains below the level confronted by the Kennedy-Johnson administration. Back in 1960, nearly one in every four elderly Americans was below the official poverty line; today, less than one in 10 is. In 1960, one in every six households lacked complete indoor-plumbing facilities; today, one in 166 do.

But at last count, according to the Census Bureau, there were 37 million Americans below the official, albeit flawed and controversial, poverty line. That is 12.7% of the population, about the same fraction as in 1968. Alternative measures that take account of tax credits, food stamps and other noncash government aid put many fewer Americans below the line, but most show a similar trend: ups and downs with the economy, but little sustained, significant progress in the past three decades. (See sidebar: Counting the Poor7.)

The 1960s

In retrospect, the War on Poverty was "not a choice among policies so much as a collection of them," Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who was a Labor Department official in the 1960s, wrote years later. There was an attempt to avoid dependency-creating programs of the past by promoting "maximum feasible participation" of the poor themselves, a strategy that sowed the seeds of grass-roots activism in the years that followed. There was Mr. Johnson's prediction that "the days of the dole...are numbered."

But mostly the pendulum swung toward government doing more. There were scores of federal programs, some of which endured. Head Start now enrolls more than 900,000 low-income children in early childhood education at a cost of close to $7 billion a year -- despite continuing debates over its long-term benefits. The Job Corps, designed to put 16- to 24-year-olds on the path to good jobs, is regarded as successful, though costly.

Even after 40 years, there is still debate over the War on Poverty's diagnosis and prescriptions. The effort rested on a widespread conviction that the U.S. had figured out how to avoid recessions and could afford to lick poverty. "We were extremely rich and extremely secure about our ability to continue getting richer," recalls Charles Murray, a conservative critic of the War on Poverty.

But it also reflected a Kennedy-Johnson view that economic growth alone wouldn't pull people out of poverty. "If the poor included many who did not gain from economic growth -- mostly people outside the labor market -- then they probably needed handouts of some sort," Mr. Patterson explains. Yet the notion of a permanent class of welfare recipients made planners and Congress so uncomfortable that the War on Poverty instead emphasized enhancing opportunity -- with education, training, health care, urban renewal. That suggested they believed that the economy would lift those who were properly equipped. Such programs offered "a hand, not a handout," as Mr. Johnson put it.

Some Johnson aides, sensing a contradiction, wanted a large government jobs program. But they wanted a cigarette tax to pay for it, and LBJ rejected that.

"The problem with the '60s programs is essentially we stopped before we finished," Peter Edelman, who was an aide to Robert Kennedy and to President Clinton, said at a recent University of North Carolina forum. "But we were especially weak on this question of helping people gain access to the job market...and on the question of concentrated poverty,"

Modern-day critics of the War on Poverty suggest that it sometimes made things worse. "They did induce dependency, they did not emphasize work nearly enough, and the watchword of the War on Poverty seemed to be spend more, demand less," says Ron Haskins, a former Republican congressional staffer now at the Brookings Institution think tank.

The 1970s

While fighting poverty often was politically popular, welfare wasn't. Created in the Depression to keep mothers of young children out of the work force, the program drew fire from a later generation of politicians. "The present welfare system has to be judged a colossal failure," Richard Nixon said in 1969. Between 1960 and 1974, welfare rolls more than tripled to 10.8 million people.

Inspired by such strange bedfellows as conservative Milton Friedman and liberal James Tobin, both later Nobel laureates in economics, Mr. Nixon advanced a proposal that would put him to the left of most Democrats today: a Family Assistance Program (FAP) that would have guaranteed every adult the equivalent of about $2,700 a year in today's dollars and every child $1,620.

Sometimes called a "negative income tax," it was a simple approach for curing poverty: Give money to those who don't have it, no strings attached. Mr. Friedman's notion was to use it to replace all other antipoverty programs, and eliminate the need for social workers and bureaucrats. Liberals saw it as a supplement to other safety-net programs. In any event, Congress rejected it. Liberals thought it too stingy; conservatives thought it an expensive way to coddle those who didn't work.

Congress did create a miniversion in 1972 that put a floor under the incomes of the old, blind and disabled. Dubbed the Supplemental Security Income, it now pays 7.2 million people an average of $450 a month. A few years later, Sen. Russell Long, a Democrat who chaired the Senate Finance Committee and detested the notion of paying people for not working, successfully crafted an alternative to the Nixon plan that was offered only to low-income people with jobs. Though few saw the potential when the Earned Income Tax Credit was born, the program has blossomed with bipartisan support into the largest federal antipoverty program outside of health care.

DOJ_NMG_0034518

The U.S. economy weakened in the 1970s in ways that would be cruel to the working poor, restraining their wages. What economic growth did occur after 1979 was shared less evenly than it had been in previous decades; in a significant change, those at the top did better than those at the bottom.

Looking back, economists Sheldon Danziger and Peter Gottschalk cite the slower growth and widening of inequality as the primary reason that poverty fell much more slowly after 1970 than in preceding decades. Had "incomes grown as rapidly...as they had had during the economic 'golden age' after World War II," the poverty rate in 2002 would have been half what it actually was," they wrote in a 2005 book of essays published by the Russell Sage Foundation and Population Reference Bureau.

The 1980s and 1990s

The poverty rate was rising before Mr. Reagan took office. Inflation was eroding the spending power of welfare checks. Jimmy Carter had begun to put the brakes on spending. And then came the deep recession. By 1983, the official poverty rate had risen to where it had been in the late 1960s.

Mr. Reagan, decrying "welfare queens," pared spending on food stamps, unemployment compensation, child nutrition, vocational education, the Job Corps and welfare. The "goal of social policy in the Johnson (and even the Nixon) years had started with the question, 'How can we help the poor?' Reagan, in contrast, tended to ask 'How can we cut costs, and how can we get people to work?' " Mr. Patterson writes.

If liberal Michael Harrington's "The Other America" had been the defining text for the 1960s, then Mr. Murray's 1984 "Losing Ground" sought to play that role in the 1980s. Assailing the programs of the 1960s as failures, he argued that welfare gave poor people, particularly inner-city blacks, incentives to shun work and marriage.

By the 1990s, as the U.S. suffered another recession followed by another boom, there was no longer bold talk from the White House about eliminating poverty. The new slogans were Mr. Clinton's "end welfare as we know it" and Harvard University professor (and later Clinton adviser) David Ellwood's "If you play by the rules you shouldn't be poor." The decade represented another lurch toward pushing the poor to take responsibility for their circumstances, with an offer of government aid to reward those who did.

With loud dissents from liberals, Mr. Clinton joined Republicans in 1996 to replace the old welfare program with a new Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF.) Among things, it required able-bodied recipients to leave welfare for work after two years.

Liberals were pleasantly surprised by the results. "That experiment with welfare reform has been far more successful than I certainly anticipated and than most people anticipated," says Isabel Sawhill, a former Clinton official who now oversees economic studies at Brookings. "We all remember Senator Moynihan saying children would be sleeping on grates. And although I'm sure there are some children who have not been helped and have, in fact, been harmed, I think that on average families have been better off -- helped by a strong economy, to be sure."

The welfare rolls have fallen from 3.9 million families in fiscal 1997 to 1.9 million in fiscal 2005, according to federal data. A growing fraction of unmarried women with children are working.

If government made it harder to stay on welfare, Mr. Clinton argued, it had to make sure that those who worked rose above poverty. "We will reward the work of working poor Americans by realizing the principle that if you work 40 hours a week, and you've got a child in the house, you will no longer be in poverty," he said in his first State of the Union address.

Raising the minimum wage in the 1990s from $3.35 an hour to $5.15 was one response. The other was a massive expansion of the Earned Income Tax Credit, which had already been sweetened by Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. The federal government will spend more than $38 billion this year on the Earned Income Tax Credit -- both in reducing taxes owed by low-wage workers and, for those who don't owe taxes, giving them cash -- twice what it spends on Temporary Assistance for Needy Families. More than 22 million households, roughly one-fifth of the total, benefit.

The Clinton welfare overhaul came just as the economy roared and unemployment fell to the lowest level in more than a generation. Wages rose even at the very bottom of the economy for the first time in years -- and the poverty rate, by almost every measure, fell.

The 2000s

The end of the 1990s boom reversed some of the progress made against poverty in the late 1990s. And though Mr. Bush hasn't made reducing poverty central to his agenda, intellectual ferment over poverty continues. And so does the debate over whether it is the poor themselves or the economy that is primarily at fault.

DOJ_NMG_0034519

One major plank in today's response to poverty is the promotion of marriage, a reaction to the perception that old-style welfare contributed to an unhealthy breakup of the family. "The contract we promulgated was very simple: You can to get access cash...so long as...you don't go to work and you don't marry someone who's working. And so what we got was a lot more out-of-wedlock childbearing and a lot less family formation; no great mystery, we told them don't do it," says Wade Horn, an assistant secretary of Health and Human Services, echoing Mr. Murray's 1984 argument. "What's extraordinary in the last five years or so is that we started to have a public conversation about the need for more-friendly public policy when it comes to family formation," he says.

Indeed, liberals such as Ms. Sawhill and former Sen. Edwards, who argue that those who play by the rules ought not to be poor, have expanded their working definition of what it means to play by the rules: "Perhaps it should...include such things as finishing school, at least high school; perhaps it should include delaying child-bearing until you're old enough to support a child, or at least make a good effort at supporting a child -- then maybe we link some new benefits to those new kinds of responsibility," Ms. Sawhill says. Dissenters say marriage, despite its economic advantages, is oversold as an antipoverty strategy.

Another concept drawing favor across the political spectrum is to help poor people build nest-eggs, an approach that fits with Mr. Bush's enthusiasm for an "ownership society." Prominent proponent Michael Sherraden of Washington University in St. Louis argues that a "small amount of wealth" in the hands of a poor family can be important if it "enables a family to move to a better neighborhood, or enables an investment in education or training that wouldn't happen otherwise, or enables a purchase of a home."

There is today, however, a different sense about the potency of any government response to poverty than when the War on Poverty was born. "There was a sense in those early...days that the possibilities were endless," Lisbeth Schorr, who worked in the Johnson White House, recalled at a recent retrospective sponsored by the Brookings Institution and Georgetown University. "Of course," she said, "nobody knows what would have happened if we had been able to continue and expand what we started."

Counting The Poor: Methods And Controversy (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Who are the poor?

By the official measure, there were 37 million people living below the poverty line in 2004. Most (55%) were between 18 and 64, and most (68%) were white. But the poor are disproportionately children and disproportionately black: While 12.7% of the total population was below the poverty line, 17.8% of children under 18 and 24.7% of blacks were.

What is the official poverty line?

Developed in the early 1960s by Mollie Orshansky of the Social Security Administration, it is three times the amount of money the Agriculture Department estimated it would cost to feed a family, adjusted for inflation using the consumer-price index. The poverty line varies by family size. For a single mother with one child, it was $13,461 in 2005; for a two-parent, two-child family, it was $19,806.

What income counts in determining whether a family is above the official poverty line?

All cash income before taxes, whether from wages or government benefits, counts. Capital gains, noncash government benefits such as Medicaid, food stamps or housing subsidies don't count, nor does the Earned Income Tax Credit.

Does that make sense?

No. But efforts to change the official poverty measure are mired in political controversy. There is even controversy over which alternatives to the official measure should be published by the Census Bureau. Until recently, it published 17 alternatives based on recommendations by a National Academy of Sciences panel. Most showed a poverty rate above the official number because they used a higher poverty line. Influenced by the arguments of Douglas Besharov, of the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank, the Census Bureau this year adopted a new approach and published alternatives to the official measure that put poverty rates below the official one.

What do alternative measures show?

Almost anything you want. One Census Bureau calculation, based on the NAS recommendations, adds food stamps, housing subsidies, discount school lunches, capital gains and the Earned Income Tax Credit to family income, and then subtracts federal and state taxes and the cost of getting to work and caring for children. This would put 16% of Americans below the poverty line for 2003, well above the 12.5% official measure. One of the new Census Bureau approaches incorporates many of those changes to calculating income and adds an "imputed return of home equity" for those who own homes -- but doesn't adjust the poverty threshold. That approach brings the 2003 poverty rate down to 9%, relying on the consumer-price index to adjust Ms. Orshansky's numbers, and to 7.4% by applying what many economists say is a more accurate measure of inflation over time.

DOJ_NMG_0034520

Do the alternatives show different trends?

No. Most measures show that poverty fell in the 1990s as a result of a booming economy and changes in government policies, such as an increase in the minimum wage. Most measures also show that poverty has risen since the end of the 1990s.

How do other countries measure poverty?

In contrast to the U.S. approach of setting an absolute threshold and adjusting it for inflation, Europeans tend to use a relative measure, adjusting the thresholds so they rise not just with inflation but with the incomes of typical families. Such an approach would produce a higher number of Americans living in poverty than the current official measure because the typical American family's income has risen far more than the poverty line has.

Charity Bingo Trying 'to Reinvent Itself' (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Groups boost payoffs, fun to win players back from casinos

Julia Eddy has volunteered at bingo games for more than 20 years. She remembers the glory days.

"It used to be 180 to 200 (people) whenever you opened the doors. It didn't matter what time of day," says Eddy, 39, who manages three charity bingo games a week in Aurora, Colo., near Denver.

Now on a Saturday morning, fewer than half that number show up. Several bingo halls in the area have closed in the past year for lack of business, she says.

Charities that run bingo games for money to sponsor food pantries, recreation programs for poor children and other activities are scrambling to find new customers. That's because many players who once crowded fraternal lodges and community centers to play bingo are flocking to casinos instead, drawn by bigger jackpots and flashier surroundings.

To help charities compete, gaming regulators are enabling non-profit groups to increase jackpots and use electronic gadgets that make it easier for customers to play several bingo cards at once. They're also requiring bingo hall owners to spruce up their venues to make them more fun for players.

"You can't make much with bake sales and car washes," says Corky Kyle, executive director of the Colorado Charitable Bingo Association. "The non-profits just cannot compete with the for-profit gaming industry unless they're given the opportunity to conduct their gaming the same way. … Bingo needs to reinvent itself."

Profits for charities from bingo and other gaming dropped about 13% from 2001 to 2003 before rebounding about 1% in 2004 in about 30 states that track the business, says Mary Magnuson, legal counsel for the Minnesota-based National Association of Fundraising Ticket Manufacturers.

"Clearly, the commercial gambling is having an impact," Magnuson says. Other factors that have diminished bingo's appeal are smoking bans that prevent players from lighting up and the game's image as a pastime for seniors, she says.

Bingo's decline coincides with the explosion of legalized gambling across the USA in the past 15 years. States have sanctioned commercial casinos and expanded lotteries to raise revenue and avoid hiking taxes to pay for services. More recently, states such as Iowa and Louisiana have begun allowing slot machines at racetracks. Utah and Hawaii are the only states that ban gambling.

Steps states are taking or considering to help charity gaming:

·Last week, Minnesota began allowing several bingo halls to link up for a single game via the Internet, potentially increasing the jackpot from hundreds to thousands of dollars. "It's one of the things … (for) charitable foundations to help them raise money," says Tom Barrett, executive director of the state's Gambling Control Board.

·Michigan will require bingo halls to meet minimum appearance standards by Oct. 1 to make them more appealing to patrons, says Robert Blessing, gaming director of the charitable gaming division of Michigan's Bureau of State Lottery. "We're trying to make our bingo halls more like other gambling venues … so as we attract new players, they'll be willing to continue playing." Hall owners will get credit for such things as good lighting and smudge-free walls.

·In Pennsylvania, a bill that would double the amount of bingo prize money groups can award in a single day to $8,000 was approved by the state House of Representatives last year and awaits action in the Senate.

The fall in bingo proceeds has "become disastrous," says Kristine Corn, 63, founder of Ride to Walk, a program in Lincoln, Calif., that provides therapeutic horseback rides for children who have neurological disabilities stemming from accidents and illnesses such as cerebral palsy.

In November, the program ended its Tuesday night bingo games in nearby Sacramento because they were losing money, Corn says. Before the nearby Thunder Valley Casino opened in June 2003, she says, the games grossed up to $10,000 a month and financed most of the program. Corn says she now must charge families $45 a ride. Ride to Walk is trying new activities, including a barn dance and a golf tournament, to fill the gap.

DOJ_NMG_0034521

"I think that the casinos are trying to support the community," she says. Thunder Valley donated $10,000 to the program, she says, though her group asked for $50,000. "I think with the kind of money they're bringing in, they probably could be more charitable … particularly to the little charities running things like bingo, because they do take away from us."

The United Auburn Indian Community, owner of the Thunder Valley Casino, has given more than $1 million a year to local non-profit groups such as Ride to Walk, spokesman Douglas Elmets says. He also says casinos don't compete for players with charity games. "I do think there's a different crowd," he says.

In 2004, Michigan gave non-profits a new weapon to lure players at special fundraisers: Texas Hold 'Em poker. After the popular poker game was introduced, the number of licenses issued to charities to hold the fundraisers, known as "millionaire parties," jumped to 1,417 in 2005 from 684 in 2004, Blessing says. "It's been a real attractive venue for our non-profits to make money," he says.

Changes also are occurring in Minnesota, where earnings for charity bingo dropped roughly 4% each of the past five years, Barrett says. "Industry representatives came to us and said bingo has lost its sizzle and pop — 'it's a game my parents played,' " Barrett says. "We're proposing new alternatives to an old game."

Linking several bingo halls over the Internet is important, says Bob Matson, executive director of the North Suburban Youth Foundation in Roseville, Minn. "We're counting on it," says Matson, whose group raises about $150,000 a year for youth programs in St. Paul and two suburban school districts.

Reviving bingo's fortunes is vital to non-profit groups, advocates say. "In many instances, it is (their) primary source of money," Magnuson says. "What happens to the volunteer fire department if they can't raise money through bingo?"

Changing Bedfellows (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

If American politics could start with a clean slate today, the main argument wouldn't be between liberalism and conservatism, words that have become labels without coherent philosophies. The main fight would pit populist nationalism against progressive globalism.

The populist nationalist party would be liberal on economics, conservative on values and realist on foreign policy. It would bring together a wide array of people who are disenchanted with their respective parties' elites, and who would find they have a lot in common. It would bring Kevin Phillips together with Pat Buchanan, the Virginia senatorial candidate James Webb together with Lou Dobbs, Al Sharpton together with James Dobson.

Here's how a populist nationalist candidate would sound: "We are the ordinary, burden-bearing people of this country. We are the ones who work hard and build communities. It's time for us to come together and recognize that our loyalty to our fellow Americans comes first.

"That means we can't waste our precious blood and treasure on poorly planned, pie-in-the-sky wars to bring democracy to the Middle East. We need to get out of Iraq now. That means we can't sell our ports to our enemies. That means we must secure our borders against terrorists and illegal immigrants who break the law, take our jobs and drive down wages.

"We need to stand up to the big money interests who value their own profits more than their own countrymen, who outsource jobs to China and India, who destroy unions and control Washington. We need to fight off their efforts to take away our Social Security and Medicare. Instead of widening inequality and a race to the bottom, we need universal health care and decent wages. We need a government that will stand up to Internet porn and for decent family values.

"We're tired of both the corporate elites and the cultural elites. We want leaders who understand our anxieties and are, like us, tired of a world where nothing is safe, where everything can be swept away by a serious illness, a divorce or a terrorist's bomb."

Populist nationalism of this sort would be politically potent. It would be against the war without seeming naïve and dovish. It would be against corporate power without seeming socialist. It would tap the passions aroused by immigration and outsourcing and cohere with the populist uprisings taking place in different forms around the world.

The progressive globalists, on the other hand, would be market-oriented on economics, liberal on values and multilateral interventionists in foreign affairs. The leading spokesman for this movement would be Tony Blair. Domestically, it would be led by the major presidential aspirants, who don't differ much: John McCain, Hillary Clinton, Mitt Romney, Mark Warner and Rudy Giuliani.

DOJ_NMG_0034522

Here's how a globalist might sound: "We're inspired by the opportunities a globalizing and flattening world open up before us. We embrace technological dynamism and cultural diversity and reject beggar-thy-neighbor policies. But we understand that globalization means interdependence, and we have to build institutions to ensure everybody shares the new prosperity.

"We have to reform education and improve skills so that more people succeed. We need to reform entitlements so the economy can remain flexible and not buried by debt. We have to work together to address global warming, oil dependence and protectionist barriers. We have to understand that this open, diverse world has enemies. We have to confront Islamic extremism ideologically and militarily, and battle it at its roots with democracy and freedom. We need to manage the movement of peoples without shutting off the flow, open up trade, not shut it down."

This modernizing progressivism would also be politically potent. It would thrive among the educated, among aspiring suburbanites, among hawks and among immigrants who look to the future more than the past.

Of course these alignments won't come about instantaneously. Our political institutions and habits have staying power, and the politics of globalization is lagging far behind the reality of it. But the issues that realigned politics in the 1960's are fading, and issues like immigration, trade and interdependence are rising to the fore. Politics is becoming less about left versus right and more about open versus closed. Or, to put it in starker terms, the populists are getting more populist while the elitists are getting more elitist.

Where The Hogs Come First (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Think pork. Sizzling bacon and breakfast sausage. Juicy chops and ribs and robust holiday hams.

The pork capital of the planet is this tiny town in the Cape Fear River basin, not far from the South Carolina border. Spending a few days in Tar Heel and the surrounding area — dotted with hog farms, cornfields and the occasional Confederate flag — is like stepping back in time. This is a place where progress has slowed to a crawl.

Tar Heel's raison d'être (and the employment anchor for much of the region) is the mammoth plant of the Smithfield Packing Company, a million-square-foot colossus that is the largest pork processing facility in the world.

You can learn a lot at Smithfield. It's a case study in both the butchering of hogs (some 32,000 are slaughtered there each day) and the systematic exploitation of vulnerable workers. More than 5,500 men and women work at Smithfield, most of them Latino or black, and nearly all of them undereducated and poor.

The big issue at Smithfield is not necessarily money. Workers are drawn there from all over the region, sometimes traveling in crowded vans for two hours or more each day, because the starting pay — until recently, $8 and change an hour — is higher than the pay at most other jobs available to them.

But the work is often brutal beyond imagining. Company officials will tell you everything is fine, but serious injuries abound, and the company has used illegal and, at times, violent tactics over the course of a dozen years to keep the workers from joining a union that would give them a modicum of protection and dignity.

"It was depressing inside there," said Edward Morrison, who spent hour after hour flipping bloody hog carcasses on the kill floor, until he was injured last fall after just a few months on the job. "You have to work fast because that machine is shooting those hogs out at you constantly. You can end up with all this blood dripping down on you, all these feces and stuff just hanging off of you. It's a terrible environment.

"We've had guys walk off after the first break and never return."

Mr. Morrison's comments were echoed by a young man who was with a group of Smithfield workers waiting for a van to pick them up at a gas station in Dillon, S.C., nearly 50 miles from Tar Heel. "The line do move fast," the young man said, "and people do get hurt. You can hear 'em hollering when they're on their way to the clinic."

Workers are cut by the flashing, slashing knives that slice the meat from the bones. They are hurt sliding and falling on floors and stairs that are slick with blood, guts and a variety of fluids. They suffer repetitive motion injuries.

The processing line on the kill floor moves hogs past the workers at the dizzying rate of one every three or four seconds.

Union representation would make a big difference for Smithfield workers. The United Food and Commercial Workers Union has been trying to organize the plant since the mid-1990's. Smithfield has responded with tactics that have ranged from the sleazy to the reprehensible.

After an exhaustive investigation, a judge found that the company had threatened to shut down the entire plant if the workers dared to organize, and had warned Latino workers that immigration authorities would be alerted if they voted for a union.

The union lost votes to organize the plant in 1994 and 1997, but the results of those elections were thrown out by the National Labor Relations Board after the judge found that Smithfield had prevented the union from holding fair elections. The judge said the company had engaged in myriad "egregious" violations of federal labor law, including threatening, intimidating and firing workers involved in the organizing effort, and beating up a worker "for engaging in union activities."

DOJ_NMG_0034523

Rather than obey the directives of the board and subsequent court decisions, the company has tied the matter up on appeals that have lasted for years. A U.S. Court of Appeals ruling just last month referred to "the intense and widespread coercion prevalent at the Tar Heel facility."

Workers at Smithfield and their families are suffering while the government dithers, refusing to require a mighty corporation like Smithfield to obey the nation's labor laws in a timely manner.

The defiance, greed and misplaced humanity of the merchants of misery at the apex of the Smithfield power structure are matters consumers might keep in mind as they bite into that next sizzling, succulent morsel of Smithfield pork.

Iran Quietly Learns Of Penalties In A Nuclear Incentives Deal (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And William J. Broad

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

PARIS, June 14 — When a formal incentives package by six nations to encourage Iran to curb its nuclear program was presented in writing in Tehran last week, it omitted a long list of potential punishments should Iran reject it, according to senior officials familiar with the package.

Instead, it was left to Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, to deliver news about the sticks — only orally.

In a one-on-one meeting without aides, Mr. Solana told Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian negotiator, that there would be "serious consequences" against Iran in the United Nations Security Council if Iran did not suspend key nuclear activities and embrace the offer, the officials added.

The decision to focus on the benefits for Iran and to leave no paper trail about possible penalties reflects a new international negotiating strategy toward Iran.

The six nations — the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany — have decided to treat Iran not as an errant child whose behavior must be modified or a rogue state that must be punished, but as a potential responsible negotiating partner.

The possible punishments were kept separate and informal for two reasons: to prevent Iran from rejecting the offer out of hand and to maintain the fragile unity of the six nations that authored it, officials said.

"In the past, we were told we didn't have enough respect" for the Iranians, one senior official said. "Maybe we're learning, and this time our approach was different, more respectful."

The strategy also reflects the recent shift in the policy of the Bush administration, which has long portrayed Iran as the world's worst state perpetrator of terrorism, determined to become a nuclear power. It follows a decision last month by the administration to sit at the same negotiating table with Iran — if Iran fully suspended its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Iran had rejected as insulting a previous 31-page proposal presented by France, Britain and Germany last August that promised some incentives in exchange for tough measures to freeze Iran's activities related to enriching uranium, which can be used to fuel nuclear reactors or atom bombs.

This time, the United States, Russia and China are full partners in the negotiations, with all six nations determined to give Iran a package so generous that it would have no reason to say no.

The disclosure that the formal written proposal omitted disincentives came to light after extracts were published Wednesday by Agence France-Presse. The text was read to The New York Times by an official.

Some officials involved in the negotiations expressed dismay that the tightly held document had leaked, and that its elements could be misunderstood, in part because only part of it is written down.

For example, those in the United States opposed to any reconciliation with Iran could use it to criticize the administration for appearing to abandon its tough line. Those in Iran who want the country to continue its enrichment-related activities could fault it for depriving Iran of what is widely considered a sovereign right.

"We need private diplomacy and this is very bad," said one senior official. "The paper presented only tells part of the story."

Indeed, an earlier written draft of the proposal listed a variety of possible punitive measures, like an embargo on goods and technologies and a ban on financial transactions related to Iran's nuclear program.

Now, the lack of clarity about what constitutes possible penalties could give the Iranians the impression that they could seek even more concessions, as they have done in the past.

Two weeks ago, on the day before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with her five counterparts in Vienna to work out the final package, she gave the impression it included both incentives and disincentives.

DOJ_NMG_0034524

But Ms. Rice was swayed by the Europeans, particularly the Russians and the Germans, that the best way to get the Iranians on board was to formally offer carrots, and informally offer sticks, an administration official said.

The Russians, in particular, who have opposed Security Council sanctions against Iran, argued that the incentives option had to be exhausted first. Mr. Solana, a nuclear physicist by training, was given the leeway on how to present what was called the "two pathways," officials said.

All officials spoke on the condition of anonymity under normal rules of diplomacy.

One key goal of the offer, according to the text, is "to develop relations and cooperation with Iran based on mutual respect," the first time the Bush administration has indicated that it is prepared to deal with Iran in such a positive way.

Many elements of the proposal were already known, but the disclosure of the text was the first authoritative rendering of its details.

It includes such technical inducements as international commitments to support joint projects with Tehran for building new light-water reactors to make electricity.

The offer lays out two ways that Tehran could fuel such reactors without resorting to its own enrichment of uranium for the production of nuclear fuel — the central objection of the West because such material can be used to fuel not only nuclear reactors but also atom bombs.

The first alternative would have Iran participate in an "international facility" in Russia that would enrich uranium, an idea that Tehran has consistently rejected.

The second would have Iran draw on a commercial supply of nuclear fuel that the International Atomic Energy Agency would supervise and that would act as a "buffer stock" lasting for up to five years.

In exchange, the proposal requires Iran to "suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities" and to commit to continue the suspension throughout negotiations on the incentives package.

In an indication that informal negotiations with Iran have essentially begun, Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani spoke by phone on Wednesday. They "touched base and compared notes," but did not discuss the substance of the proposal, an aide to Mr. Solana said.

Mr. Solana called it "a constructive conversation," adding, "It will be followed by others."

Ahmadinejad Seeks Chinese, Russian Support (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 15, 2006

Iran's hard-line president is doing more than just attending an Asian security summit in China: Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seeks to gain Russian and Chinese support at a critical moment for his country's nuclear program.

He also aims to prove that his country is not isolated, despite U.S. claims to the contrary.

Past trips to Asia have been a chance for Ahmadinejad to tap into anti-U.S. sentiment and tout himself as a leader who is standing up to Washington. Last month, he was cheered by Indonesian students and by a crowd shouting "Fight America! Fight Israel!" outside a Jakarta mosque where he performed prayers.

His visit to China, which began Wednesday, will likely be more dedicated to intense diplomacy. Ahmadinejad is expected to hold separate meetings with his Chinese and Russian counterparts, Hu Jintao and Vladimir Putin, on the sidelines of the regional summit in Shanghai.

It will be a chance to sound out his two allies on a package of incentives offered by the Big Five Powers at the U.N., plus Germany, seeking to persuade Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment program. If Iran agrees, Tehran would then be able to enter negotiations with the United States and Europe over a long-term resolution to the standoff over its nuclear program.

Russia and China have backed the incentives package. But the two countries — longtime allies and trading partners of Iran who hold veto powers at the U.N. — have opposed any move to impose sanctions, which Washington seeks if Tehran turns down the offer.

A key question for Iran is likely to be how much change it can seek in the package and still keep Moscow and Beijing's implicit protection.

Iran has said it finds parts of the package acceptable but that other parts should be removed. And it has said the key issue of uranium enrichment remains unclear and needs further explanation. Tehran has outright rejected demands it scrap enrichment and has been highly reluctant to suspend it.

Tehran has not yet responded to the offer, given to it a week ago.

"Iran is taking its own time (in responding) to get Russia and China to modify the Western pressures on Tehran," said political analyst Davoud Hermidas Bavand.

DOJ_NMG_0034525

Ahmadinejad will likely urge Moscow and Beijing to "follow their independent policy and don't go the U.S. way," said analyst Mostafa Kavakebian.

The Iranian president will try to push his own ideas, seeking a compromise that will guarantee his country's right to enrich uranium and at the same time offer guarantees that its nuclear program won't be diverted toward weapons, he said.

In Shanghai, Ahmadinejad joins the leaders of Russia, China and four Central Asian countries who comprise the Shanghai Cooperation Organization.

The trip is also a chance to show that Iran has friends around the world despite U.S. attempts to isolate it. Iran has made clear it is adjusting its relations with nations based on the nuclear standoff.

"We are redefining our relations with the world," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told a television program last week. "We are managing our relations with other countries based on our national interests and the way we are treated (over the nuclear dispute)."

Iran has repeatedly said it will offer giant economic projects to countries that support its nuclear program and punish those who vote against it.

China's state energy company has signed long-term deals for natural gas. Those deals display the growing disregard for Washington's priorities. In 1996 the U.S. said it would consider sanctions on any company that invests more than $20 million annually in the Iranian oil and gas sectors. The threat was never enforced.

Ahmadinejad's participation in the Shanghai summit, as an observer, is a particular irritant to the United States, which views the body as an attempted counterweight against Western influence in Central Asia and the presence of American bases there.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld last week chided China and Russia for backing Tehran's participation in the summit, saying he found it strange to bring the "leading terrorist nation in the world into an organization that says it's against terror."

But host China dismissed the criticism. "We cannot abide by other countries calling our observer nations sponsors of terror," Shanghai Cooperation Organization chief Zhang Deguang said.

Group Linked To Al Qaeda Tightening Grip On Somalia (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

An Islamist group with ties to al Qaeda is quickly solidifying its grip on parts of Somalia and moving toward setting up a Taliban-style Islamist regime in the country, according to U.S. officials familiar with events in the region.

Armed militias of the group known as the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) defeated a U.S.-backed group of Somali warlords called Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism last week and control large sections of Mogadishu and seized a key town yesterday.

The officials familiar with terrorism and the Horn of Africa, including some who were recently in Somalia, said the Islamists now are seeking to publicly distance themselves from al Qaeda, which also is seeking to play down its ties to the ICU to avoid provoking a military response from the United States or other nations in the region.

"We missed the center of gravity when we engaged with the warlords and did not stand up to the ICU," one official said.

The ICU is "putting on a good face" after its military gains, the official said, warning that the ICU is engaged in a disinformation campaign that is designed to hide its true goals.

The situation in the East African country, which has not had a central government in over a decade, is fluid. Yesterday, ICU militias took over the town of Jowhar, northeast of Mogadishu, an area that was the last stronghold of the counterterrorism group warlords. The group now may focus attacks on Baidoa, where a non-Islamist Somali-led transitional government is based.

Retired Vice Adm. Scott Redd, director of the National Counterterrorism Center, said at a Senate hearing Tuesday that "obviously, there have been some things going on inside Somalia."

"I would not jump to the conclusion, however, that that means that al Qaeda now owns Somalia, by any stretch of the imagination," said Adm. Redd, who commanded a task force that evacuated United Nations peacekeepers from Somalia in 1995.

State Department Coordinator for Counterterrorism Henry Crumpton, appearing with Adm. Redd at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, said last week's rise to power of the ICU was "not anticipated."

Mr. Crumpton said the administration is cautious about statements from the ICU that it is not an Islamist regime.

"We still have some concern because, despite their public overtures, we're not sure what Islamic Courts really want in terms of their strategies and in terms of their relationship with al Qaeda," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034526

Behind the scenes, the Islamic Courts group is taking steps to institute Shariah, or Islamic law, and to install an Islamist, Taliban-style government, other U.S. officials said.

The ICU's most significant step has been to take over all schools in areas that it controls and to change the curriculum to Islamist-centered teaching.

The Bush administration decided to help the counterterrorism group of warlords against the ICU, mainly with funding, but rejected providing support for what is known as the Transitional Federal Government, or TFG, currently located in Baidoa. The TFG has some international support and controls some areas of Mogadishu, but lacks forces sufficient to challenge the ICU on its own, the officials said.

That government includes Hussein Mohamed Farrah, a pro-Western former U.S. Marine and son of the late Somali warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid, who fought U.S. military forces in the early 1990s during the failed U.S. humanitarian operation. Aidid's forces were behind the deadly 1993 shootout in Mogadishu that led to the deaths of 18 U.S. soldiers and up to 1,000 Somalis.

The U.S. Central Command currently has several hundred troops, including special operations commandos, in Djibouti as part of Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa.

Intelligence reports from the region indicate that the ICU has close ties to a small group of al Qaeda terrorists who are left over from the terrorist cell that launched the 1998 operation to bomb the U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya. The al Qaeda cell is providing advice to the ICU and is helping facilitate support for the group from radical Wahhabi Muslims in Saudi Arabia, Yemen and elsewhere, the officials said.

Islamic Militias Extend Control In Southern Somalia (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Stronghold of Secular Warlords Falls; Transitional Government Calls for Foreign Peacekeepers

NAIROBI, June 14 -- Islamic militias asserted control over southern Somalia on Wednesday by routing once-powerful secular warlords from one of their last remaining strongholds and moving closer to the headquarters of the country's fragile, U.N.-backed government.

The town of Jowhar, about 60 miles north of the militias' base in the capital, Mogadishu, fell in a morning attack that left at least four people dead and prompted several remaining warlords to flee in heavily armed pickup trucks, according to news reports.

More than 300 Somalis have died in fighting in recent months as the Islamic militias have driven the secular warlords, who have had U.S. support, from most of southern Somalia.

The militias immediately declared a nighttime curfew in Jowhar and announced plans to impose Islamic law, or sharia , which in recent years has brought some order to lawless Mogadishu.

...

Fearing an attack, members of the country's largely powerless transitional government voted Wednesday to invite foreign peacekeepers to enter Somalia. The government is based in Baidoa, about 130 miles from Jowhar. The town is one of the last significant places in the southern region not controlled by the militias.

The Islamic militias have repeatedly rejected calls for foreign peacekeepers, fearing that neighboring countries, especially Somalia's historic enemy, Ethiopia, would use such a deployment as a pretext to meddle in Somalia's affairs. That fear has been sharpened by the reportedly warm relations between Ethiopia and the president of the transitional government, Abdullahi Yusuf.

"They will back Yusuf. They will come to Mogadishu," said Abdurahman Osman, a representative of the Islamic militias, speaking in Nairobi.

The issue threatened to drive apart the militias and the transitional government at a time when international officials are pushing the groups to negotiate a solution to Somalia's lasting trouble. Islamic militia leaders warned repeatedly in the past week that they would end discussions with the transitional government if it invited foreign troops to Somalia.

Somalia has been without an effective central government since largely clan-based warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The warlords then began fighting one another, turning the country into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms. Central and northern Somalia became largely self-governed as the nominal capital descended into chaos.

The United States reportedly became involved in supporting the warlords as it sought help in capturing terrorism suspects hiding in Somalia. Among the leaders of the Islamic militias, U.S. officials have said, are extremists with links to al-Qaeda. Since taking control of Mogadishu last week, however, militia leaders have made repeated overtures to the United States and sought to portray themselves as moderates seeking to stabilize a chaotic country.

U.S. Meeting Europeans To Forge Policy On Somalia (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0034527

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — American officials will sit down Thursday with their European counterparts to try to come up with an answer to this central question: Is there anyone left with any authority in Somalia with whom the United States can do business?

The hurriedly convened Contact Group meeting in New York represents a State Department effort to form a new policy on Somalia after more than a decade of neglect. Diplomats are asserting more control over Somalia policy from the Central Intelligence Agency, on the ground that an approach that by many accounts has consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords has been counterproductive.

That came into stark relief last week when the American-backed warlords fighting a proxy war for the United States against Islamists believed to be harboring operatives of Al Qaeda were run out of Mogadishu, the capital, by those Islamists. For the United States, the lawless place that spawned "Black Hawk Down" was suddenly back, this time as a potent symbol of America's faltering counterterrorism efforts. Washington had backed the losing side, Somalia was now under new management, and the United States had few allies on the ground.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since early 1991, when largely clan-based warlords overthrew its dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. An interim government, formed with United Nations support, has not even been able to enter Mogadishu, and has instead been stuck in Baidoa, about 150 miles away.

"We need to have legitimate actors inside Somalia with whom we can work," Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department's top counterterrorism official, told a Senate committee on Tuesday. "That's probably the most difficult challenge right now."

Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group, would have to be at the top of the list of people who exert power in Somalia. Mr. Ahmed has sought to moderate the image of his Islamic Courts Union, which is seen in the West as wanting to impose a Taliban-style government on Somalia, with strict religious codes and a willingness to harbor Qaeda members. He sent a conciliatory letter last week to foreign governments, including the United States, that said the Islamists wanted a "friendly relationship with the international community."

American officials have maintained that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering Qaeda operatives who were indicted in the 1998 bombings of the United States Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Since those bombings, American officials have been tracking a Qaeda cell whose members are believed to move freely among Somalia, Kenya, Ethiopia and parts of the Middle East. The American payments to the warlords were intended at least in part to help achieve the capture of the Qaeda operatives.

Shortly after an attack on a hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, and the failed attempt to shoot down a plane bound for Israel from the Mombasa airport — both in November 2002 — the United States began informally reaching out to Somali clans in the hope that local forces might provide intelligence about people suspected of being members of Al Qaeda in Somalia, said a recent report by the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization with extensive experience in Somalia.

That approach brought a few successes. Militiamen loyal to the warlord Mohammed Deere caught Suleiman Abdalla Salim Hemed, who was suspected of being a Qaeda operative, in April 2003 and turned him over to American officials.

Bush administration officials say that they are willing to take Mr. Ahmed's letter at "face value," but that they believe that Qaeda operatives remain in Somalia. "We're still not quite sure what the Islamic courts really want in terms of their strategies and in terms of their relationship with Al Qaeda," Mr. Crumpton said.

But the United States cannot continue to view Somalia solely through the prism of counterterrorism. Critics say that is why America has no real allies in a country that has become a haven for terrorists.

"These guys are very different from the Taliban," said Robert Rotberg, author of "Terrorism in the Horn of Africa" and director of the intrastate conflict program at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "They have a potential to be a buffer between terrorism and chaos, and that's a good role if we can find a way to talk to them sensibly."

Palestinians Mount Violent Protest Over Lack Of Paychecks (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 14 — Palestinian civil servants stormed the parliament building in the West Bank on Wednesday demanding back pay and chanting "We are hungry!"

Fistfights broke out as protesters hurled plastic water bottles at legislators from Hamas, the militant group that controls parliament, forcing the speaker to flee the building.

It was the second violent protest this week at parliament, in Ramallah, and underscored growing pressure on the Hamas government on several fronts.

DOJ_NMG_0034528

Much of the Western aid that had been used to run the Palestinian Authority has been withheld since Hamas took over the government after winning January elections. Many Muslim nations had pledged their support, but international banks, most tied to the American system, have refused to transfer money from other donors.

So on Wednesday, the Hamas foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, crossed over into Gaza from Egypt carrying what Palestinian officials said was $20 million in cash in his suitcases. He was returning from a long trip to Indonesia, Malaysia, Brunei, China, Pakistan, Iran and Egypt.

Hamas, responsible for many of the deadliest suicide attacks against Israel, has refused to renounce violence or recognize the Israeli state since it won control of parliament in January.

Though a substantial sum, the $20 million is a fraction of $120 million the Palestinian Authority needs each month just for the salaries of its 165,000 employees, most of whom have not been paid for four months. Its current budget would require an additional $45 million for all costs other than salaries.

A power struggle between Hamas and Fatah, the party it ousted from power, continues to worsen. About two dozen people have been killed in recent weeks in factional fighting, including a Hamas gunman in southern Gaza on Wednesday. The protesters at the parliament, which was also attacked Monday night along with two cabinet buildings, were reported largely to be loyal to Fatah.

"We deplore and regret these incidents," Ismail Haniya, the prime minister and a top Hamas leader, said after the death of the gunman, The Associated Press reported. "The government is going to carry out its responsibilities along with the security branches in order to maintain law and order."

To defuse the tensions, Mr. Haniya and Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority and a member of Fatah, have agreed to a series of talks, which continued on Wednesday.

Mr. Abbas, a moderate, has been pressing Hamas to accept even implicit recognition of Israel, a move aimed at freeing up foreign money and restarting peace talks with Israel. Barring that, Mr. Abbas has said he will schedule a referendum next month calling for a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, a proposal that polls indicate most Palestinians support.

Hamas's leadership strongly opposes the referendum as illegal and an effort to undermine the party's election victory.

But there were indications on Wednesday that the two sides might have made progress on the difficult question of the Hamas militia, which is still outside government control. Fatah officials said Hamas had agreed to steps to integrate about 3,000 fighters into the security forces, though no timetable was given. Hamas has already agreed in principle to such a move.

Mr. Zahar was allowed to bring his cash into Gaza on Wednesday. Since the international banks refused to transfer funds to the Palestinians, at least two other Hamas leaders have been stopped at the border between Egypt and Gaza carrying large amounts of cash.

The earlier shipments, totaling some $5 million, had been confiscated but then released, supposedly to the Palestinian government. Some employees received part of their back pay a week ago, but some Palestinians suggested that the money might not have gone to the Finance Ministry but instead was used by Hamas to pay its loyalists.

The conflict between Palestinians and the Israeli military was largely quiet on Wednesday. The Israeli military reported that Palestinians had fired a rocket toward Israel from Gaza, but that it landed in the desert without hitting anyone.

In recent months, the number of rocket attacks has increased significantly, to nearly 100 this month alone. Last week, during an Israeli retaliatory attack, seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on a beach in Gaza, causing Hamas to call off its 16-month truce.

On Tuesday, however, the Israeli military contended that an internal investigation showed its munitions had not been responsible, a finding rejected by the Palestinians.

The deaths, and 10 more in Gaza on Tuesday, among them 8 civilians, came at a sensitive time, as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made his first trip in office to Europe. He met Wednesday with President Jacques Chirac of France, trying to persuade Mr. Chirac to accept Israeli plans to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank in the absence of a peace with the Palestinians.

"The realignment plan is inevitable," he told reporters in France. "It will be implemented."

Europe Plan To Aid Palestinians Stalls Over U.S. Salary Sanctions (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 14 — A European proposal to provide aid for Palestinian health care has stalled because of concerns by the Bush administration that the plan may violate an American ban on paying salaries to a Hamas government.

DOJ_NMG_0034529

Despite what has been described as a humanitarian crisis in Gaza and the West Bank, American and European officials say they strongly doubt that any aid will reach the Palestinians quickly, given the violent chaos in Palestinian areas and Hamas's declared intention to scrap a truce with Israel.

The Europeans have proposed that the World Bank set up a "mechanism" through which donations from Europe and the Arab world can get to the Palestinians.

But American and European officials say that might violate American sanctions laws, which could lead to penalties against any bank that allows a transfer of money to employees in a Hamas government, even if the transaction is overseen by the World Bank.

"This is a nasty situation," said a European diplomat, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue. "No bank wants to run afoul of American banking laws and get shut down by the Treasury Department."

The United States Treasury has barred almost all financial dealings with the Palestinian Authority in response to Hamas's rise to power, under a federal law that makes it a crime to provide funds to terrorist groups.

A senior administration official, also speaking anonymously, noted that the Palestinian situation was a vivid illustration of the reach of American sanctions laws.

"What you've got is a system of banks, even Arab banks, that cannot ignore the risk to their reputations of doing business with terrorists," the official said. "That's quite apart from what they might actually face as a legal risk, which could be substantial."

Hamas, which is on the State Department's list of terrorist organizations, took office in April. Europe and the United States then cut off most of the $1 billion that outside donor governments have given annually to keep the Palestinian Authority afloat. Some 160,000 employees have had their pay suspended or delayed, and banks have halted the transfer of money to the government out of fear of violating American sanctions laws.

Faced with criticism from Arab countries, the United States joined with Russia, Europe and the United Nations in early May on a plan to speed aid to the Palestinians, bypassing the Hamas government. At the time, officials expressed concerns that some of this money might end up paying nurses, doctors, teachers and others previously on the government payroll, thereby helping to finance Hamas.

But as negotiations on the plan proceeded, a rift opened between the Bush administration and its allies in the Middle East negotiating process. The World Bank is now caught in the middle, various officials said.

The bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, the deputy defense secretary in President Bush's first term, has told European negotiators that he wants to help the Palestinians but that the bank has not received adequate guidance from the United States and the Europeans about where the money is to go.

"The World Bank would like to facilitate the delivery of assistance that a number of donors are eager to provide, so that the Palestinian people do not suffer from a lack of social services, particularly health and education," Mr. Wolfowitz said Wednesday.

On top of these disputes is a fundamental difference in the American and European assessment of the situation in the West Bank and Gaza, officials on both sides say.

European officials charge that there is a real humanitarian crisis because of the aid cutoff, and some say the Bush administration may actually be seeking to block funds in order to promote chaos and eventually bring down the Hamas government. Bush administration officials strongly deny the accusation.

"There is no humanitarian crisis in the Palestinian territories," the senior administration official said. "There is a political and security crisis, and the Hamas government has to make some responsible decisions about how to handle it." The best way, he said, would be for Hamas to reject violence and recognize Israel.

Palestinian Suicide Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

Regarding the increasingly violent Palestinian feud between Hamas and Fatah partisans, it's tempting to recall Henry Kissinger's quip about the Iran-Iraq War: "It's a pity both sides can't lose." The tragedy is that the certain losers will be average Palestinians.

Fatah is the political party founded by Yasser Arafat and now nominally led by Palestinian President Mamoud Abbas. On Monday, several hundred Fatah "soldiers" stormed and then set fire to the Hamas-dominated Palestinian Parliament in the West Bank city of Ramallah, reportedly in retaliation for a Hamas attack on a Fatah building in the Gaza Strip. That's only the latest in a series of clashes and assassinations that now claim more Palestinian lives than the Israeli army. For once, the term "cycle of violence" actually applies.

The two groups are currently at loggerheads over the so-called Prisoners' Document, a manifesto by Palestinians jailed by Israel, which proposes terms for a future Palestinian state in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem. Mr. Abbas, sensing an opportunity to corner Hamas politically, wants the document put to a vote in a July 26 referendum. Hamas, which calls the referendum procedurally illegal, objects to its implicit recognition of Israel. Both Hamas and Fatah field well-armed militias, and there is a real possibility that the episodic shooting and looting of the past months could descend into full-scale civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0034530

That's not something anyone should wish for, but it hardly comes as a surprise. Both Israel and the U.S. urged Mr. Abbas to confront Hamas when he came to power in January 2005. He dithered and was taken by surprise when Hamas swept parliamentary elections earlier this year. Nor did Mr. Abbas do much to rein in the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the Fatah paramilitary outfit responsible for dozens of suicide bombings in Israel. Instead, he made heroes of the prisoners, even calling on President Bush to lean on Israel for their release despite their terrorist records.

As for Hamas, it recently reaffirmed its murderous bona fides when it mourned the death of "brother" Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, "who was martyred at the hands of the savage crusade campaign" of the U.S. in the Middle East. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel, though the Palestinian Authority is itself a product of the 1993 Oslo Accords, which affirm Israel's right to live "in peace and security."

Both sides in the Palestinian divide have thus contributed to a cult of violence and terror that now engulfs them. Israel's full withdrawal last year from Gaza was supposed to have given the Palestinians an opportunity to demonstrate their ability to govern themselves. What it has shown so far is how little Israel's occupation had to do with the deepest sources of Palestine's grief.

Too many Palestinians have postponed serious consideration of just what sort of state they wish to have, fixating instead on their endless and unreal claims on Israel: full withdrawal to the 1967 armistice lines, the "right of return" for the refugees of 1948 and their descendants, and so on. What is happening now in Ramallah is the result of that kind of political escapism. Until the Palestinians realize that they can't elect a terrorist group without consequence, there will never be any hope for their state, whenever its birth, whatever its borders.

U.N. Eyes Links To Hariri Slaying (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- The chief U.N. investigator into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri told the Security Council yesterday that he was seeking links between that death and the killings of 14 other critics of the Syrian regime.

Serge Brammertz also asked for an extension and expansion of his mandate and said he had received generally satisfactory cooperation from Syria.

The international inquiry has already determined many of the facts behind the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of Mr. Hariri, which also killed 22 others, Mr. Brammertz said in a report to the council. However, the identities of the people or groups behind it are still largely unknown.

He said his group's probes of the 14 other killings -- all believed to be connected to the victims' outspoken rejection of Syrian interference in Lebanon -- were largely stalled.

Mr. Brammertz said he has been examining the cases with two objectives -- to solve the individual murders, and to establish any connections among them.

"Analytically, the cases can be linked in a number of different ways and from varying perspectives, notably in the similarities in the modus operandi, and their intent." he said, "However, in terms of evidence, none of the cases is developed to an extent that would allow identification and linking of perpetrators."

The Security Council is expected today to extend the inquiry for another year, and to authorize its staff to help Lebanese authorities investigate other "terrorist attacks" committed since Oct. 2004.

Mr. Brammertz, a former Belgian prosecutor who took up the inquiry six months ago, said the Syrian government has "generally responded to all requests in a timely manner." His predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, had more difficulty with Damascus.

The government of Lebanon has been supportive of the commission's work and has actively sought U.N. legal assistance to set up a hybrid court of international and Lebanese judges to try the perpetrators.

Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program for Human Rights Watch, said he is delighted that the Lebanese authorities want to bring international law to the Middle East, a region where few countries have signed onto the International Criminal Court or other international legal mechanisms.

"If they are all linked, the 14 and the Hariri killings, and if they are part of a systematic plan by a group or a government, they would be crimes against humanity," Mr. Dicker said.

"Look at the definition: It includes murder committed as part of a systematic or widespread attack on a civilian population [or] as part of a plan or policy of a group to advance its objectives. The stakes here are really quite historic in terms of an internationalized court."

DOJ_NMG_0034531

The 14 assassinations over the last two years have targeted critics of Syrian interference, including two journalists, human rights advocates and Lebanese lawmakers.

Muslims' Anti-U.S. Sentiment Up (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, June 15, 2006

Anti-American sentiment in the Muslim world has reached startling levels, but positive U.S. policies like disaster-relief efforts can help reverse the trend, according to poll results released yesterday.

The data also showed that large numbers of people in several of Iran's neighboring countries -- including 70 percent in Pakistan -- would favor a nuclear-armed Iran.

Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan, nonprofit organization with Sen. John McCain and several members of the 9/11 commission on its advisory board, commissioned the wide-ranging poll on nuclear programs and anti-Western sentiment among Iran's neighbors.

When asked how they viewed the United States, 89 percent in Saudi Arabia, 84 percent in the United Arab Emirates, 71 percent in Turkey and 64 percent in Pakistan answered "unfavorable." Additionally, 66 percent of Pakistanis opposed the U.S.-led fight against terrorism.

Ken Ballen, president of Terror Free Tomorrow and a former federal prosecutor and counsel to the Iran-Contra committee, said the poll results were "startling" and showed that radical anti-Western views were becoming the consensus in the Muslim world.

"U.S. policy-makers need to take these opinions into account. I know we don't make policies based on poll data, but we need to try to understand why these radical ideas are gaining traction and figure out if our policies are being counterproductive," said Mr. Ballen.

According to the polls, 67 percent in both Pakistan and Turkey and 65 percent in Saudi Arabia viewed a series of Danish cartoons lampooning the prophet Muhammad as evidence that the West is antagonistic toward Islam.

Wayne White, former deputy director of the State Department's Middle East intelligence shop, said, "Unfortunately, a lot of this is true. [Al Qaeda leader Osama] bin Laden succeeded in generating an impression that there is a war of cultures, a divide between East and West, Christian and Muslim."

Mr. Ballen said there was "a silver lining" to the poll results. "Positive U.S. policies like earthquake relief in Pakistan and tsunami aid in Indonesia improved pro-Western attitudes."

The polls showed that U.S. aid promoted a more favorable view of the United States among 75 percent of Pakistanis and 63 percent of Indonesians.

"Many people in that region have seen too much of the military side of the U.S. and not enough of the humanitarian side," Mr. White said. "But it's hard for the U.S. to step up programs there because with budget constraints and financing the war in Iraq, the money just isn't there to do everything."

Among Palestinians, 68 percent had an unfavorable opinion of the United States, but 60 percent said that they wanted the United States to do more to help resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Mr. White said, "This seems confusing because the U.S. is seen as such a big ally of Israel. The Palestinians might not like a lot of the things that the U.S. does, but they know if there is anyone on the globe who can talk Israel into being more reasonable, it's Washington."

When asked about nuclear programs in Iran, 68 percent in Pakistan, 46 percent in Saudi Arabia and 44 percent in Turkey said that they would prefer the United States to accept a nuclear Iran rather than intervene to prevent it.

"I don't think they really support nuclear weapons in Iran," Mr. White said. "It's probably more of a pushback against the U.S., basically saying that they'd mind that a lot less than more U.S. involvement in the region."

Frederic Grare, a South Asia specialist at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said the nearly 70 percent support for Iranian nuclear weapons in Pakistan simply reflected that country's own interests.

"If you ask the elite in Pakistan, they are increasingly insecure with nuclear weapons in Iran. But there is always the fear that if steps are taken to limit Iran, they might be next. Pakistan has only two main interests: Kashmir and nuclear weapons. And they will protect them.

"Also, Pakistan wants to keep good relations with Iran right now, because they are getting closer to India, a rival of Pakistan," he said.

Kenyan Teen's Death Exposes Gaps Seen In HIV/AIDS Support Network (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0034532

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

A 14-year-old who was infected with the virus and orphaned by the disease was brutally beaten by an uncle who struggled to care for him. Some blame not the killer, but an inadequate community of care.

WANDUMBI, Kenya — After losing his parents to AIDS, Isaiah Gakuyo spent most of his short life shuttled among relatives who said the boy had only himself to blame for the beatings and abuse they heaped upon him. "He was always looking for trouble," an aunt said of the HIV-positive 14-year-old.

By the time AIDS activists came to move Isaiah to a rescue home, relatives had banished him to a woodshed, where he was forced to use a separate cup and plate and wasn't allowed to play with a younger cousin.

Their intervention would not be enough. On a wet morning this spring, one of Isaiah's uncles hacked him to death with a forked hoe. As the boy lay bleeding, relatives and neighbors watched in horror, but none offered help until plastic gloves arrived from the local dispensary.

Many describe Isaiah's brutal slaying as an "honor killing," symptomatic of the hatred and discrimination faced by millions of people living with HIV in Africa. Efforts to arrest the 26-year-old uncle have failed, police say, because family members are taking food to him in the forest.

"The family wanted him dead," Nazlin Omar Rahput, an outspoken political activist in Kenya, said of Isaiah. "They saw him as an eyesore."

But even as the killing has shaken Kenyans and sparked a national debate over care and support for those living with HIV, it has also divided the country. Some sympathize with the family, characterizing the attack as a spontaneous fit of rage by an overburdened caretaker. The killing, they say, exposes deep gaps in the nation's AIDS support network, particularly for the 750,000 children, like Isaiah, orphaned by the disease.

"I can only imagine the pressures of taking care of a child you know is dying," said Wangari Muta Maathai, the Nobel Peace Prize-winning environmentalist and parliament member who represents the Nyeri district, where the family lives. "We are all angry at the uncle, but how many of us tried to help him when he was taking care of the boy?"

Isaiah's problems began shortly after his birth in 1991. When his parents learned they were HIV-positive, his father abandoned the family, forcing his mother to return here to her family homestead near Nyeri, a quiet, impoverished community in the Rift Valley in central Kenya. She died in 1994, and Isaiah and a baby sister were taken in by their grandmother.

Soon AIDS would decimate the family. Isaiah's young sister died. Then two aunts. Then the grandmother. By 2000, the family's suffering was apparent around the community. "Everybody knew," said Daniel Gathuku, 53, a neighbor.

Isaiah ended up in the custody of Justice Ndumia, one of the several uncles who cared for the boy. This one was prone to abandoning his own family for months at a time.

Though Isaiah was beginning to suffer health problems, he excelled in school.

"He was a very bright boy," recalled Marwa Kihumba, headmaster of Wandumbi Primary School. Isaiah was so eager to be accepted at a top secondary school that he decided to repeat the eighth grade and retake his graduation exams because he believed he could score higher, Kihumba said.

But clashes at home with his uncle were growing. Isaiah complained about feeling sick and developed skin rashes. His hair fell out in patches, which he tried to cover with headbands and hooded jackets. When the uncle threatened to whip the boy for failing to do his chores, Isaiah ran away.

After Isaiah stayed briefly with neighbors, tribal leaders persuaded a distant relative, a Presbyterian Church elder, to shelter the boy.

Worried he might infect their grandson, who was also living at their farm, Charles Kariuki, 65, and his wife, Grace, put Isaiah in a shack once used for chickens. They bought him a strong disinfectant soap, hoping it would clear up his boils and sores.

"We had another little boy here to think about," Kariuki said.

After Isaiah complained to teachers about mistreatment at home, they contacted AIDS activists. By the time Isaiah arrived at a Nyeri rescue center, his CD4 count, a key indicator of the body's immune system, was 2. Normal CD counts range from 500 to 1,500.

Doctors at the center, run by the Kenya Network of Women with AIDS/HIV, immediately prescribed a daily regimen of antiretroviral drugs and began treating possible tuberculosis. Center officials say the gaunt, 4-foot-6 boy thrived, playing with other HIV-positive children, watching cartoons and learning for the first time about his disease.

"People hated him because of his appearance, so it was a good environment for him," said Francis Muiruri, head of the Nyeri center.

During group therapy and counseling, Isaiah frequently broke into tears while recalling his life and the treatment by his family, counselors said. But they said he appeared to accept his HIV status, even mentoring younger children about the disease.

DOJ_NMG_0034533

After a month, Isaiah was asked whether there was anyone in the family who could care for him. He mentioned a young uncle, John Kiboi.

At 26, Kiboi was barely able to care for himself. An orphan like Isaiah, he was unemployed, uneducated and unmarried. Relatives and villagers considered the young man, known for drinking and pot smoking, an unsuitable choice, but no one intervened.

In the fall of 2005, the arrangement seemed to be working. Isaiah returned to school, and Kiboi appeared to be taking an interest, fetching the free food and medicine offered at the center, officials said.

But Isaiah's mood began to darken, friends and family members say.

"After he came back from the rescue center, he said he didn't want to take his medicine anymore," said Ann Mumbi, 18, a neighbor and friend who often cooked for Isaiah and washed his clothes. "He said he just wanted to die."

His behavior became more erratic. Once he burned his clothes and bed blankets, according to an aunt. Another day he announced he planned to dig up his mother's grave to retrieve a watch he believed was buried with her.

"He did all that just so he would be beaten," said Mary Njeri, an aunt married to Ndumia, the uncle who had driven Isaiah to run away.

Isaiah repeated his exams at the end of 2005. He not only scored worse, but his mark was below the minimum required to be accepted at any secondary school.

At the center's Christmas party, volunteers from the AIDS/HIV network tried to bolster his mood, promising they would intervene with school officials to find someplace willing to accept him. They promised to raise the money for his school fees.

The arrangement with Kiboi was beginning to strain. The young man expected other family members to share in Isaiah's care, but none stepped forward. He tried to return Isaiah to the rescue center, but the boy pleaded to return home with him.

"He was fed up with taking care of the boy," said Nancy Macharia, a center counselor. A week before the attack, Isaiah showed up at the center complaining he wasn't being fed.

Mumbi said tensions peaked the night before the attack. Uncle and nephew quarreled after Kiboi accused Isaiah of disclosing Kiboi's secret courtship of a local girl to the girl's mother.

Mumbi said she spent that night in Isaiah and Kiboi's home, and when they awoke she sent the boy to a neighbor's for fire or matches to cook breakfast. But no one was home there. When the boy returned, Kiboi became enraged, hitting Isaiah with his fists, Mumbi said. She said she'd seen such beatings before, and she fled up the hill to wait until it was over.

A few moments later, she saw Kiboi running away and heard hysterical screaming from one of Isaiah's cousins, who had been working nearby in a field.

Mumbi and a dozen other neighbors rushed to find Isaiah lying on his stomach, deep punctures and gashes on the left side of his head. Eyes open and breathing steadily, Isaiah bled profusely and appeared to be unconscious. Next to him lay the bloodied hoe.

Bystanders were too afraid to bandage his wounds and sent someone to fetch a doctor.

"No one touched him," said Ann Wanjiku, 23, a neighbor. About 40 minutes later, someone returned with plastic gloves, and they carried Isaiah to a clinic a mile away.

"By the time he got here he already was in a deep coma," said Gichuki Nderitu, head of Wandumbi Health Dispensary. Nderitu said he'd treated Isaiah many times over the years and had deep reservations about Kiboi's ability to care for the boy. "I wasn't surprised it ended this way," he said.

Few members of Isaiah's family attended the funeral. Neighbors and tribal elders also stayed away. Instead, the boy's coffin was carried by AIDS activists and his friends at the rescue center.

At Isaiah and Kiboi's now vacant home, new padlocks keep visitors out. But a few reminders of the struggle can be seen by peering inside. Two broken windows. A picture of Isaiah's mother askew on the wall.

Today, only the aunt, Njeri, is left, supporting three children. Her husband died of AIDS in December. She said she hadn't seen Kiboi since he fled.

Tilling the soil around her home, she denied that AIDS had devastated the family, blaming Isaiah for the family's troubles. "It was all the boy," she said.

Less than 50 feet away is Isaiah's grave, a mound of red soil overlooking a sweeping green valley. Njeri said she thought Isaiah was buried near his mother, next to the cornfield, but no one could remember the exact location of her grave.

There is no marker or stone. Land is considered too valuable to dedicate for burial ground. After a few years, the mound will simply erode. Grasses and plants will take over. Eventually Isaiah's grave, like his mother's, will disappear under the cornfield.

Mexican Opinion Polls Predict López Obrador Win (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

Andrés Manuel López Obrador, Mexico's leftwing candidate, is on course to become the country's next president in the July 2 election, according to two opinion polls out this week.

Mr López Obrador, who is running for the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD), has now inched into the lead with 37 per cent of the vote against 35 per cent for Felipe Calderón, the centre-right candidate for the ruling National Action Party (PAN).

The poll, published in the Reforma daily newspaper, reinforces the results of a second poll published on Monday, which puts the leftwing candidate 3.2 per cent ahead of Mr Calderón.

While both polls show a technical tie – the margin of error in each is more than 2 per cent – they also show a clear improvement in Mr López Obrador's standings since last month, and suggest that he will win the July 2 election if the trend holds.

In the case of Wednesday's Reforma poll, for example, it is the first time the PRD candidate has led since March. The newspaper's previous poll, published on May 24, had Mr López Obrador trailing his main rival by four points.

"López Obrador is definitely rising," said Rafael Fernández de Castro, a professor of politics at Mexico City's ITAM university, on Wednesday.

A third poll, due to be published on Wednesday by the GEA consultancy in Mexico City, showed Mr López Obrador regaining seven points from his main rival since last month – although it still has Mr Calderón in the lead by two points.

Political analysts on Wednesday said the biggest reason for Mr López Obrador's recovery was the perception that he had won an informal round of mud-slinging following this month's live presidential debate between the main candidates.

His allegations that Mr Calderón's brother-in-law had won lucrative state contracts during Mr Calderón's brief stint as energy secretary have been the centrepiece of up-market dinner parties and downtown cantina tequila sessions alike this week.

Mr Fernández de Castro said: "Independently of how much truth there is in the allegations, López Obrador managed to complicated life for a candidate who has presented himself as a man with clean hands."

Even so, pollsters still say it is too close to pick a winner. Guillermo Valdés of GEA said on Wednesday that Mr Calderón is likely to continue promising stability and economic security while attacking Mr López Obrador with suggestions that he is a radical and dangerous leftist.

He said Mr López Obrador would likely try to maximise the mileage from last week's muckraking, and promote his economic platform of providing benefits to the poor.

Mexico's Lopez Obrador: A Common Man Bent On Change (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2006

Presidential front-runner Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador is seen as a salvation by some, a danger by others. One thing is sure: He knows politics.

MEXICO CITY — The candidate has a certain sex appeal. Imagine a mestizo Bill Clinton: cappuccino-colored skin, a full head of white hair and a charismatic stage presence. Sometimes, his arrival at a campaign stop will provoke a scream from a woman who, a second later, realizes she's too old to be acting that way.

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador is the candidate of the common man (and, clearly, of the common woman) in this year's presidential campaign. His critics call him an irresponsible populist who will ruin Mexico's precarious economic stability, but to millions of others, the 52-year-old standard-bearer for the leftist Democratic Revolution Party is hope incarnate, a warrior and father figure rolled into one.

Polls released this week show he has retaken the lead from conservative, free-market candidate Felipe Calderon.

Lopez Obrador fought off impeachment as mayor of Mexico City, took care of the capital's "little grandmothers" with a monthly subsidy check and launched the most ambitious transportation projects in the traffic-choked metropolis in a generation. Now he's on a crusade to bring the most ambitious social and economic reforms Mexico has seen in decades.

As mayor, he drove a white Nissan Tsuru, a variation of the Sentra sold in the U.S., and the kind of unassuming vehicle favored here by penny-pinching office workers. Today, while his opponents charter jets, Lopez Obrador crisscrosses the country on commercial flights and in a caravan of white SUVs.

From the Indian villages near the Guatemalan border to the barrios of Tijuana, he revels in oddities of local protocol. They give him silly belts to wear in Jalisco and crowns of pink roses in Chiapas, and he never hesitates to put them on. Very often, women float near the front of his rallies wearing yellow T-shirts emblazoned with the catch phrase, "Andres Manuel, you are my rooster!"

In the quaint town of San Martin de Hidalgo near Guadalajara, roustabout men and young mothers sweat in the shade of the central plaza's few trees as Lopez Obrador launches into his standard stump speech.

DOJ_NMG_0034535

His is an undeniably populist vision of Mexico's problems. He makes the crowd laugh and hiss as he strikes out at favorite punching bags, such as former President Carlos Salinas de Gortari, reviled by many as a symbol of corruption, or the banker Roberto Hernandez, one of the richest men in Mexico.

"I could have made a deal with those men, but I didn't," he says. "We don't want to go down the same old path…. The country is tired of cosmetic changes. We need major surgery."

Sometimes he gets carried away. So far on the campaign trail this year, Lopez Obrador has called outgoing conservative President Vicente Fox a "puppet" of the United States and a "squawking bird," earning widespread criticism each time.

In fact, Lopez Obrador's rough-and-tumble campaign has many Mexicans wondering exactly what kind of president he might be if were to win the election July 2.

Is he a demagogue in waiting? Or is he a democratic reformer who will finally earn the poor a seat at the table with the country's political elite?

Or will he simply continue to be Lopez Obrador: the son of a humble family from the gulf coast state of Tabasco who's never quite shaken his provincial air, but who is widely acknowledged to be the most talented political fighter in Mexico?

Lopez Obrador was born in 1953, the eldest of eight children of a lower-middle-class family in the village of Tepetitan, a place of slow-moving rivers where baseball, not soccer, is the favorite pastime.

"Back then, Tepetitan had 600 people or so," Lopez Obrador recalled in a recent interview with filmmaker Luis Mandoki. "There was no high school, no roads. All the communication was by river. Tabasco is water. We have as much water as sky."

His parents ran a small store. Andres Manuel the child was as headstrong as Lopez Obrador the politician would grow up to be. Because he tensed up every time his parents found fault in his behavior, he earned the family nickname "The Rock."

The young Lopez Obrador's dream was to make it to baseball's major leagues, said Luis Alonso Torres, a childhood friend. "We weren't from rich families. Like every public school student, he had to make a lot of sacrifices to continue his education."

In the 1960s, his family moved to the nearby oil-patch boomtown of Villahermosa, and he joined the party that dominated all aspects of Mexico's political life, the Revolutionary Institutional Party, known by its Spanish initials, PRI.

Lopez Obrador was a true believer in the PRI and even wrote the lyrics to the PRI's Tabasco anthem. But by 1988, he and other dissenters were accusing the party of betraying the poor and soon formed the new Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD.

Lopez Obrador became the PRD leader in Tabasco. In 1994, he ran for governor and lost to the PRI candidate, Roberto Madrazo. He denounced the result as a fraud and launched a protest campaign to force the federal government to overturn the result. It left him bloodied by police.

The fight in Tabasco helped propel Lopez Obrador to national prominence. Two years later, he was elected national president of the PRD. And in 2000, he won election as mayor of Mexico City.

Lopez Obrador quickly made it clear that he would be unlike any mayor the city had ever seen. He scheduled daily 6:30 a.m. news conferences. The news day began with Lopez Obrador, and often it ended that way.

"It was the first time a politician had made himself available to the Mexico City press corps every day without reading from a script," said Hector Aguilar Camin, an author here.

His government began building elevated roads and special bus lanes to relieve traffic congestion, the most important public works in the city in 20 years.

Lopez Obrador also bucked the fiscal austerity of Fox's government by launching monthly subsidies for all residents over 70. His popularity soared.

Though he charmed many with his lilting Tabasco accent and often acerbic commentary, the Mexico City elite squirmed.

"He is a man of deep prejudices, and he doesn't think much of the Mexican bourgeoisie," said Rossana Fuentes Berain, a political analyst at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico.

Political analysts widely agreed that he was the favorite to win the presidential election, with his pledge to fight poverty by increasing social spending and using government funds to stimulate the economy.

Then, last April, PRI and National Action Party legislators joined in an effort to impeach Lopez Obrador on an obscure charge, a move that would have prohibited him from running for president.

The political drama that followed polarized Mexico.

Addressing a crowd of thousands in Mexico City's central square on the day he was to be removed from office by Congress, the tough politician looked, if only for a moment, thoroughly beaten. He wiped his brow as he approached the microphone, struggling to hold back tears.

"I was worried," he would tell friends later.

"I asked people what I could do to hold on. The best they could tell me was, 'Breathe deeply.' "

In the end, it was the "hard and angry tone" of the opening lines of his speech that saved him, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034536

Congress voted to impeach him. Within days, more than half a million of his supporters took to the streets of Mexico City. A local judge tossed out the original complaint. The attorney general resigned, and Fox announced that the case would not proceed. "The Rock" had won.

Lopez Obrador returned to the mayor's office more popular than ever: Three polls gave him approval ratings above 80%.

"He is the most talented politician we have," Fuentes Berain said. "He is creative, inventive and has a tremendous capacity for response under fire."

Months later, as the presidential campaign got underway in earnest, Lopez Obrador made what is widely regarded as a crucial mistake. He refused to respond to a series of attack ads by Calderon, the National Action Party candidate, including one that compared him to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the bete noir of Latin American conservatives.

Then he chose not to show up for the first presidential debate.

By late May, however, the old Lopez Obrador was back, firing with ads and interviews on TV news programs.

"I hate to use the media, because it's ridiculously expensive," he told one interviewer. This was the same man, after all, who still lived in a modest Mexico City apartment rather than the sprawling residential compounds favored by many top politicos here.

Lopez Obrador says he doesn't want to lose his authenticity, the qualities that keep him close to the common people. At nearly every rally, he repeats the same promise: "I will not steal, I will not lie, and I will not betray the people."

If Lopez Obrador wins the presidential election next month, it will be because millions of Mexicans believe he will keep that promise.

Cecilia Sanchez of The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

In Mexico, Migration Issue Gets No Traction (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Ahead of July Vote, Presidential Candidates Find Little to Gain From Highly Charged Debate in U.S.

HUEJUTLA, Mexico -- The illegal immigration debate draws millions of protesters to the streets of U.S. cities. It touches off podium-pounding on Capitol Hill and passions among talking heads.

But the same debate here in Mexico, the country of origin of most illegal immigrants in the United States, is far from a blockbuster issue in this year's presidential contest. Even though developments in the United States have forced candidates to discuss migration more often in the past two months than in the early stages of the race, none of the three major contenders has made the issue a central tenet of his campaign.

Their calculus is simple, according to political analysts and advisers to the candidates: They don't think it will help them win the July 2 election.

"Foreign policy doesn't give you any votes in Mexico," Jorge MontaÃ±o, a former Mexican ambassador to the United States and to the United Nations, said in an interview. "The candidates have been extremely practical."

Beyond the political calculation, the candidates' strategies are grounded in fundamentals, including the reality that a Mexican president has no control over U.S. immigration law, and in hard numbers. Expectations that huge numbers of Mexicans living in the United States would register to vote went unmet. After 1 million absentee ballots were printed, only 40,800 of an estimated 4 million eligible Mexicans living in the United States registered.

Recent political history also plays into the calculation, illustrating the risks candidates face by emphasizing migration. After his victory in 2000, President Vicente Fox staked much of his political capital on hopes of reaching an immigration accord with the United States. Those hopes disintegrated when the United States tightened its border policy following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, leaving the perception that Fox had failed in one of his most important missions.

All three leading contenders in this year's race, Felipe CalderÃ³n of Fox's National Action Party, or PAN; AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador of the Democratic Revolutionary Party, or PRD; and Roberto Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, have said they want an immigration accord with the United States. But none has guaranteed they will deliver. On the stump they tend to race past any mention of an accord and on to pledges that they will stem migration by improving the economy.

"I would rather see a Huastecan working in a packing house in Huejutla than in a packing house in California," CalderÃ³n said during a recent campaign stop in Huejutla, a mountain town in eastern Mexico, 120 miles northeast of Mexico City, where indigenous Huastecan women placed a mound of flower petals on his head.

CalderÃ³n, who has spoken against building more fences along the U.S.-Mexico border, is proposing that Mexico solicit aid funds from the United States and Canada, another major destination of Mexican workers, for development programs in impoverished areas of Mexico that send the most illegal migrants abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0034537

Arturo Sarukhan, a former Mexican consul general in New York who is CalderÃ³n's lead foreign policy adviser, said he expects candidates to address migration more often in the final weeks of the campaign. But he believes the discussion has to be presented through the prism of the economy of Mexico, where, the World Bank has estimated, half the population lives in poverty.

"The immigration issue, per se, does not weigh significantly in the campaign," Sarukhan said in an interview. "At the end of the day, the debate is about job creation."

LÃ³pez Obrador, who is tied with or slightly ahead of CalderÃ³n in new opinion polls, is taking a similar tack. In a televised presidential debate last week, LÃ³pez Obrador said Mexico needed to address the root causes of illegal immigration by providing more jobs, and he promised not to insert Mexico into the "internal lives of other countries and other governments."

"If we make things good in Mexico, if we clean our house, if there is progress in our country, if there is justice, if there is security, if there is political and social stability, they will respect us on the outside," he said.

LÃ³pez Obrador asserts that Mexico must convince the United States that illegal migration will not be slowed by building more fences and "militarizing the border," a reference to President Bush's decision to deploy 6,000 National Guard troops to support the U.S. Border Patrol. But the main thrust of his campaign has been trained on domestic issues, primarily promises to help poor voters, who form his political base, to lower their gas and electricity bills.

Migration "is a very important issue, but it will not define the Mexican elections," JosÃ© MarÃ-a PÃ©rez Gay, a former Mexican ambassador to Portugal, who is LÃ³pez Obrador's chief foreign policy adviser, said in an interview.

The migration question is particularly ticklish for CalderÃ³n. He has positioned himself as a candidate who will continue policies instituted by Fox, whose historic victory ended 70 years of PRI rule, an era marked by corruption and rigged elections. But he also faces the fact that the number of Mexicans living illegally in the United States has surged during Fox's six-year term to a record 6.2 million, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

By linking his political identity to Fox, CalderÃ³n has given the other candidates an opening to indirectly slam his candidacy by criticizing Fox during flashpoints in the U.S. immigration debate. LÃ³pez Obrador and Madrazo, who is a distant third in most opinion polls, went on the attack last month after Fox applauded a U.S. Senate vote that preserved proposals to create a guest-worker program and to develop a process for migrants living illegally in the United States to gain legal status.

LÃ³pez Obrador accused Fox, who is prohibited by Mexican law from campaigning for his party's candidate, of acting as CalderÃ³n's unofficial campaign manager and of being a puppet of the United States. Madrazo, who has pledged to slow migration by creating 9 million jobs in six years, accused Fox of "losing the battle" with the U.S. Congress.

"It's a deceit," Roberta Lajous, a former Mexican ambassador who advises Madrazo on foreign policy, said of Fox's reaction to the Senate vote. "He's acting as if there was a result. Nothing is final."

The uncertainty about the outcome in Congress is creating complications for the candidates here as they try to formulate their stances on migration issues, PÃ©rez Gay said, and it is one of the main reasons migration has not taken a larger role in the campaign.

What is clear, PÃ©rez Gay and the other candidates' campaign advisers say, is that millions of Mexican migrants, legal and illegal, will be in the United States for years to come.

LÃ³pez Obrador has proposed converting all of Mexico's consulates in the United States into offices tasked with protecting Mexican migrants from discrimination. During the presidential debate, which had a pre-formatted question about migration, he described his proposals for the consulates using a Spanish phrase that can mean "branches of the Mexican attorney general's office." PÃ©rez Gay later said that the candidate's wording has been misinterpreted and that consular staff would act in a defense capacity, rather than attempt to be prosecutors.

Nonetheless, CalderÃ³n pounced on the remark, using it to further his contention that LÃ³pez Obrador is "dangerous" and would damage Mexico's relations with other countries.

"Having a dignified relationship with the United States does not necessarily imply having a confrontational relationship," CalderÃ³n said during a speech to a group of migrant leaders on June 7, the day after the presidential debate. "If we sum up the immigration theme, and many other themes, as themes of controversy and hate between the people of the United States and the people of Mexico, we'll be making a mistake and closing doors."

But by the next day, migration had slipped into the background again, and the candidates had moved on to other things.

China Easing Its Stance On Taiwan (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Tolerance Grows For Status Quo

DOJ_NMG_0034538

BEIJING -- Gradually and without fanfare, China has substantially softened its stand on Taiwan, according to senior officials and diplomats. President Hu Jintao, they said, has begun to play down China's long-standing vow to recover the self-ruled island by force if necessary and shifted the focus to preventing any move toward formal independence.

The adjustment, which has become clearer in recent months, has brought China's policy on the volatile Taiwan issue closer to that of the United States. Washington has long maintained that the island's half-century-old status quo -- independent in fact but not in law -- should not be changed until Beijing and Taipei can work out a mutually acceptable peaceful solution.

"Before, we never said 'status quo,' " said a Chinese academic who advises Hu's government on Taiwan. "Now we say it all the time."

Officials and diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. One of them, a high-level official, said he had visited Beijing and spoken to Hu privately about Taiwan for several hours. Hu, according to the visitor, said he had no plans to act militarily against Taiwan unless the status quo was changed in a way that risked causing him to "lose face." That concern reflected the ardor for reunification among many Chinese on the mainland.

Despite continuing propaganda about "liberating" Taiwan, Hu said China's bottom line was that it would not allow the island to take decisive steps toward legal independence, the visitor recalled. Backing up that resolution, China has deployed nearly 800 medium- and short-range ballistic missiles in southern China, with targets around the Taiwan Strait, and is steadily building its military forces with Taiwan as a principal focus.

The government also passed an anti-secession law in March 2005 that legally enshrined the long-standing pledge to use military force as a last resort to prevent independence. But barring changes in the status quo, Hu told the visitor, Beijing's policy is to encourage more economic and other exchanges between Taiwan and the mainland in hopes that, at some undefined point, China will have liberalized enough that peaceful reunification will be possible.

To encourage those ties, the two governments announced on Wednesday, China and Taiwan will launch direct charter passenger flights between them during major holidays. The decision appeared to represent a step toward restoring regular direct flights cut in 1949 during civil war.

As part of China's longer-term strategy, Hu's government has high hopes that Taiwan's strongly pro-independence president, Chen Shui-bian of the Democratic Progressive Party, will be voted out of office in the island's next elections, scheduled for 2008, and will be replaced by Ma Ying-jeou, the Nationalist Party leader, who favors better relations with the mainland.

The Bush administration and allied governments have recognized Hu's shift in Taiwan policy and base their calculations on it, according to U.S. and other veteran diplomats in Asia. As a result, they added, a partnership of sorts has evolved in which Beijing relies on the United States to ensure that Chen does nothing to push China up against a wall.

The United States has long been Taiwan's main ally, wielding heavy influence in Taipei. Since it has promised to help defend Taiwan against any Chinese attack, Washington also has its own reasons for preventing Chen from doing anything that could raise tensions.

According to Chinese sources, senior Chinese officials have explained to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others in Washington that they are concerned Chen might seek to amend the constitution in a way that implies Taiwan is legally independent. In response, they said, U.S. officials have warned Chen in public and private against making substantial changes to the document.

Chen, in a recent interview, said a number of amendments nevertheless would soon be proposed by his Democratic Progressive Party. But he said U.S. and Chinese leaders should not be worried because the opposition Nationalists, who control the legislature, would not allow them to pass. Since then, Chen has been engulfed by financial scandals involving his family; it is unclear what effect this will have on his plans.

China's adjustment was decided at senior levels of the Communist Party in the summer of 2004, shortly after Chen was reelected to a second four-year term and Beijing realized its policy was going nowhere, officials said. The Chinese decided that talk of conquering Taiwan within a short time was not fruitful and that the real answer lay in the longer-term strategy, based on making China more attractive to Taiwan's 23 million inhabitants through economic and political development, explained the academic, who is well connected on the Taiwan issue.

Taiwan has been self-ruled since 1949, when Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist forces, defeated by Mao Zedong's Communists, fled across the strait and set up an exile government. China has always maintained that Taiwan is part of the country and must return to rule by Beijing. But in recent years, Taiwan has developed into a flourishing democracy, creating an additional divide with the mainland's authoritarian, one-party Communist system. Hu's shift was in part a recognition of this new barrier to reunification.

Hu's predecessor, former president Jiang Zemin, had emphasized early reunification, by force if necessary. A number of deadlines were attributed to him -- 10 years, 15 years and 50 years -- although he never laid out a clear road map. In addition, he ordered an acceleration of China's military modernization after the Clinton administration sent two aircraft carrier battle groups into the Taiwan Strait during a period of high tension in the mid-1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0034539

This encouraged an enduring public debate, particularly in Taiwan and the United States, about the likelihood of an imminent Chinese military invasion. The discussion also was fed by the defection a half-dozen years ago of a People's Liberation Army colonel who revealed Chinese battle plans against the island and, more recently, by Chen's frequent assertions that China has drawn up a schedule calling for an attack in the coming years.

Secrecy As A Tool Of Government In China (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

BEIJING, June 14 — The trial of a researcher for The New York Times, which is to begin here on Friday, is evidence of China's increasing reliance on state secrecy laws to tighten control over information, experts in human rights and the legal system say.

The researcher, Zhao Yan, 44, who worked in the Beijing bureau of The Times, is charged with fraud and disclosing state secrets. Mr. Zhao denies the charges. The Times also denies that he disclosed state secrets.

Critics of the case against Mr. Zhao accuse the authorities of applying all-embracing secrecy laws to contain public debate, burgeoning Internet discussion and sometimes rebellious news media.

Even as China's headlong economic boom continues to deliver wider economic and personal freedom, the scope of these laws has been broadened over the last two decades to include almost all information related to the ruling Communist Party and the government.

"The system is actually expanding," said Nicolas Becquelin, a Hong Kong-based researcher for Human Rights Watch. "Basically, anything can be classified as a state secret."

Mr. Zhao has been in custody since his arrest in September 2004. If he is found guilty here in the No. 2 Intermediate People's Court, he could face 10 years or more in prison.

The charges are linked to an article in The Times on Sept. 7, 2004, reporting that the former president, Jiang Zemin, had offered to resign as head of the military. The report proved to be accurate; Mr. Jiang retired less than two weeks later.

But Mr. Zhao's indictment does not allege that he was the conduit for this information.

Instead, the principal evidence against him is a photocopy of a handwritten note he prepared in July 2004 about rumors of the possible promotion of two generals as part of the battle for influence in the military between Mr. Jiang and his eventual successor, Hu Jintao.

This information was included in the Sept. 7 article to illustrate the rivalry between the leaders. Only one of the generals was promoted.

The original note remains in the Beijing office of The Times.

In March, prosecutors dropped the charges against him, and it appeared that Mr. Zhao might be released. But an almost identical set of charges was reinstated last month.

For defense lawyers in China, cases involving state secrecy laws can present formidable obstacles.

A powerful government agency, the State Secrets Bureau, has absolute authority to decide whether disclosed information is a state secret, according to experts on the Chinese legal system. Courts have no power to challenge these rulings.

In addition, the authorities can limit contact between lawyers and their clients, deny access to evidence and hold closed hearings.

After Mr. Zhao's arrest, his lawyer, Mo Shaoping, was repeatedly barred from consulting with his client because the case involved state secrets. Legal experts noted that Mr. Mo must be careful about his public comments on the case because exposing how the law worked could also be deemed an offense.

The scope of the state secrets laws also serves to deter public analysis and criticism of prosecutions. Chinese legal experts approached for comment, for example, insisted that their names not appear in any article about Mr. Zhao's case, for fear of official reprisals.

The legal experts have little doubt that Mr. Zhao, a journalist and social advocate, will be found guilty, because a decision to proceed to trial in China is tantamount to a conviction — particularly in cases involving state secrets or national security.

But Mr. Mo said that he was preparing a robust challenge to the prosecution's handling of the case and that he would contest critical elements of the evidence. He said he would argue that the court should not have agreed to hear the case because prosecutors had reintroduced the same charges against Mr. Zhao, ignoring the requirement to include substantial new evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0034540

On the state secrets charge, he said, he will argue that the prosecution's version of events is incomplete because it fails to show how secrets were relayed to The Times. And, he said, he will tell the court that prosecutors are unable to explain how a copy of the handwritten note came to be part of the evidence.

Mr. Mo said he also intended to contest the ruling by the State Secrets Bureau that the note contained state secrets.

With the prosecution relying on what were described as rumors in the note, Mr. Mo said, he intends to ask the court if a rumor can be deemed a state secret. If it is, he said, he plans to ask if a rumor must be accurate to deserve the classification, given that events suggested in the note were only partly borne out.

Mr. Mo said a judge who would preside over the trial, Wang Wantie, had told him that the court would rely heavily on prosecution evidence and Mr. Zhao's testimony on the charge of disclosing state secrets.

Joseph Kahn, bureau chief for The Times in Beijing and writer of the Sept. 7 article, would be the only witness for the defense, Mr. Mo said.

Mr. Kahn has provided written testimony, and Mr. Mo has sought approval for him to appear at the trial, though it does not appear likely that permission will be given.

Judge Wang said only the Foreign Affairs Office of China's highest court, the Supreme People's Court, has the power to approve such an application, according to Mr. Mo.

Mr. Mo said Judge Wang had also told him there would be no witnesses called on the fraud charge. Prosecution witnesses lived outside Beijing and the cost of travel was deemed too high to require them to attend the hearing, according to the judge. Without prosecution witnesses, there was no need for the defense to call witnesses, Judge Wang told Mr. Mo.

"This may be a trial with no witnesses," Mr. Mo said.

The Journalist As Scapegoat (NYT)

The New York Times, June 15, 2006

Over the 22 months that the journalist Zhao Yan has been unjustly held in a Beijing prison, it has become clear that the Chinese government wants to use this case to send a warning. His unfair treatment at the hands of his prosecutors is meant to remind journalists in China that nobody is really safe when reporting on matters of state.

But the trumped-up charges against Mr. Zhao and the trial scheduled to open tomorrow also send another larger message to the world. If Mr. Zhao is convicted, it means that despite China's many advances in recent years, the government and the legal system are moving backward. It means that the government is tightening control over information. And it means that China is willing to abuse its citizens' rights and the country's legal code when it needs a scapegoat in the name of state security.

Mr. Zhao, a prominent expert on rural China and a researcher for The New York Times, has been imprisoned since September 2004 after a Times article that month about a shift in power in China. The article predicted correctly that former President Jiang Zemin would cede his authority over the military to President Hu Jintao. Ten days after the story and a few days before President Hu took control of the military, Mr. Zhao was arrested. He is charged with fraud and disclosing state secrets. Over these long months, he has denied the charges and The Times has repeatedly denied that he was the source of any state secrets.

Charges against Mr. Zhao were dropped in March, at the same time President Hu was visiting the United States, then reinstated — a maneuver that is illegal in China. Despite having two expert Chinese lawyers, his prospects now look grim, since in most cases a trial is tantamount to conviction.

Keeping this journalist in prison will stand as a black mark against the Chinese government and, of course, a tragedy for Mr. Zhao and his friends and family. As Mr. Hu works to modernize his nation, the world will also judge China by how its government and courts treat an individual like Zhao Yan.

China Makes Ultimate Punishment Mobile (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, June 15, 2006

Fatal injections administered from vehicles

CHONGQING, China — Zhang Shiqiang, known as the Nine-Fingered Devil, first tasted justice at 13. His father caught him stealing and cut off one of Zhang's fingers.

Twenty-five years later, in 2004, Zhang met retribution once more, after his conviction for double murder and rape. He was one of the first people put to death in China's new fleet of mobile execution chambers.

The country that executed more than four times as many convicts as the rest of the world combined last year is slowly phasing out public executions by firing squad in favor of lethal injections. Unlike the USA and Singapore, the only two other countries where death is administered by injection, China metes out capital punishment from specially equipped “death vans” that shuttle from town to town.

DOJ_NMG_0034541

Makers of the death vans say the vehicles and injections are a civilized alternative to the firing squad, ending the life of the condemned more quickly, clinically and safely. The switch from gunshots to injections is a sign that China “promotes human rights now,” says Kang Zhongwen, who designed the Jinguan Automobile death van in which “Devil” Zhang took his final ride.

For years, foreign human rights groups have accused China of arbitrary executions and cruelty in its use of capital punishment. The exact number of convicts put to death is a state secret. Amnesty International estimates there were at least 1,770 executions in China in 2005 — vs. 60 in the USA, but the group says on its website that the toll could be as high as 8,000 prisoners.

The “majority are still by gunshot,” says Liu Renwen, death penalty researcher at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, a think tank in Beijing. “But the use of injections has grown in recent years, and may have reached 40%.”

China's critics contend that the transition from firing squads to injections in death vans facilitates an illegal trade in prisoners' organs.

Injections leave the whole body intact and require participation of doctors. Organs can “be extracted in a speedier and more effective way than if the prisoner is shot,” says Mark Allison, East Asia researcher at Amnesty International in Hong Kong. “We have gathered strong evidence suggesting the involvement of (Chinese) police, courts and hospitals in the organ trade.”

Executions in death vans are recorded on video and audio that is played live to local law enforcement authorities — a measure intended to ensure they are carried out legally.

China's refusal to give outsiders access to the bodies of executed prisoners has added to suspicions about what happens afterward: Corpses are typically driven to a crematorium and burned before relatives or independent witnesses can view them.

Chinese authorities are sensitive to allegations that they are complicit in the organ trade. In March, the Ministry of Health issued regulations explicitly banning the sale of organs and tightening approval standards for transplants.

Even so, Amnesty International said in a report in April that huge profits from the sale of prisoners' organs might be part of why China refuses to consider doing away with the death penalty.

“Given the high commercial value of organs, it is doubtful the new regulations will have an effect,” Allison says.

Makers of death vans say they save money for poor localities that would otherwise have to pay to construct execution facilities in prisons or court buildings. The vans ensure that prisoners sentenced to death can be executed locally, closer to communities where they broke the law.

That “deters others from committing crime and has more impact” than executions carried out elsewhere, Kang says.

Jinguan — “Golden Champion” in Chinese — lies an hour's drive from Chongqing in southwestern China, below the green slopes of Cliff Mountain. Along with the death vans, the company also makes bulletproof limousines for the country's rich and armored trucks for banks. Jinguan's glossy death van brochure is printed in both Chinese and English.

From the outside, the vans resemble the police vehicles seen daily on China's roads. A look inside reveals their function.

“I'm most proud of the bed. It's very humane, like an ambulance,” Kang says. He points to the power-driven metal stretcher that glides out at an incline. “It's too brutal to haul a person aboard,” he says. “This makes it convenient for the criminal and the guards.”

The lethal cocktail used in the injections is mixed only in Beijing, something that has prompted complaints from local courts.

“Some places can't afford the cost of sending a person to Beijing — perhaps $250 — plus $125 more for the drug,” says Qiu Xingsheng, a former judge working as a lawyer in Chongqing. Death-by-gunshot requires “very little expense,” he says.

Qiu has attended executions by firing squad where the kneeling prisoner is shot in the back of the head. The guards “ask the prisoner to open his mouth, so the bullet can pass out of the mouth and leave the face intact,” he says.

In the USA, some death row inmates and death penalty opponents want the Supreme Court to declare lethal injections cruel and unusual. A recent lawsuit claimed inmates suffer excruciating pain during executions because they do not get enough anesthetic.

There is no such debate in China, which uses the same three-drug cocktail as the U.S. federal government and most U.S. states: sodium thiopental to make the condemned unconscious, pancuronium bromide to stop breathing, potassium chloride to stop the heart.

People's Daily and other state media describe the mix as a “non-virulent drug,” bringing about “immediate clinical death while inflicting no physiological pain.”

“It doesn't matter what method you use,” Qiu says. “If someone is convicted of a capital crime, they should be executed.”

Chinese prisoners condemned to death are not offered a choice of injection over gunshot, but Qiu and others suspect wealth and connections can buy the newer method.

DOJ_NMG_0034542

"It is a real phenomenon that gangsters and corrupt officials are killed by injection more than gunshot, so their bodies are intact, and death is less painful," Liu says. "But I doubt it is government policy. These criminals are usually held in cities, where the injection is used. Common criminals are held in county-level facilities, where shooting is more common."

Tycoon Yuan Baojing was executed in March in a death van, in northeast China's Liaoyang city. He had been convicted of arranging the murder of a man trying to blackmail him for attempting to assassinate a business partner.

Sixty-eight different crimes — more than half non-violent offenses such as tax evasion and drug smuggling — are punishable by death in China. That means the death vans are likely to keep rolling.

"If we abolish the death penalty, then crime will grow," Kang says.

U.S. Joins Industry In Piracy War (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

Nations Pressed On Copyrights

The U.S. government has joined forces with the entertainment industry to stop the freewheeling global bazaar in pirated movies and music, pressuring foreign governments to crack down or risk incurring trade barriers.

Last year, for instance, the movie industry lobby suggested that Sweden change its laws to make it a crime to swap copyrighted movies and music for free over the Internet. Shortly after, the Swedish government complied. Last month, Swedish authorities briefly shut down an illegal file-sharing Web site after receiving a briefing on the site's activities from U.S. officials in April in Washington. The raid incited political and popular backlash in the Scandinavian nation.

In Russia, the government's inability, or reluctance, to shut down another unauthorized file-sharing site may prevent that nation's entrance into the World Trade Organization, as effective action against intellectual property theft tops the U.S. government's list of requirements for Russian WTO membership.

As more residents of more nations get high-speed Internet access -- making the downloading of movies and music fast and easy -- the stakes are higher than ever. The intellectual property industry and law enforcement officials estimate U.S. companies lose as much as $250 billion per year to Internet pirates, who swap digital copies of "The DaVinci Code," Chamillionaire's new album and the latest Grand Theft Auto video game for free.

Such entertainment and other copyright exports -- worth about $626 billion annually, or 6 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product -- are as important to today's American economy as autos, steel and coal were to yesterday's.

More than a decade of hard lobbying by two powerful trade groups, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) and the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), has convinced U.S. lawmakers and law enforcement officials that it's worth using America's muscle to protect movie and music interests abroad. Now, lawmakers are calling the trade groups, asking what else Congress and the government can do for the entertainment industry.

Efforts to stem piracy within the United States by targeting peer-to-peer file-sharing networks have produced mixed results. Kazaa -- once the most popular of them and a hard target of the music industry -- has half as many users as it did at its peak three years ago, thanks in part to the music industry's lawsuit and education campaign. At the same time, the total number of peer-to-peer users has grown in the past year, according to Internet traffic researchers.

Overseas, U.S. government officials say, it is in the national interest to work on behalf of Hollywood and other entertainment and intellectual property industries.

The United States does not offer specific dictates on how other nations handle their border controls, said Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Victoria Espinel, "but they need to have an effective intellectual property system for protecting our rights holders abroad."

The U.S. trade representative's office maintains a "priority watch list" of countries that, in its estimate, do not adequately protect intellectual property rights. China and Russia top the most recent list. Unlike the case with Sweden, U.S. government pressure has brought little change in China, home to perhaps the world's most prolific DVD and CD pirates.

An ongoing battle between Swedish authorities and an illegal file-sharing service called the Pirate Bay can be traced to an April meeting in Washington between the Swedes and the U.S. government.

Officials from the State Department, the Department of Commerce and the U.S. trade representative's office told visitors from the Swedish Ministry of Justice in April that Sweden was harboring one of the world's biggest Web sites for enabling the massive and unauthorized distribution of movies, music and games. It uses a file-swapping technology known as BitTorrent that is tougher to contain than earlier systems such as the original Napster, which the U.S. government shut down in 2001, and popular current peer-to-peer services, such as LimeWire.

A little more than a month later, Swedish police hit the headquarters of the Pirate Bay and closed the site. The MPAA crowed, saying it had helped the effort by filing a criminal complaint against the site.

DOJ_NMG_0034543

The raid prompted a backlash of criticism in the Swedish press and from some members of government. Politicians and editorialists wanted to know why America was meddling in Swedish affairs.

Claes Hammar, Swedish minister for trade and economic affairs, said U.S. authorities noted that copyrighted Swedish material, as well as U.S. movies and music, was being stolen on the Pirate Bay.

"We don't like to be seen as negligent and losing out rather than cooperating with the U.S. and other markets," Hammar said.

In the aftermath of the raid, members of the Left and Moderate parties in Sweden have proposed scrapping last year's law that criminalized illegal file-sharing, reported the Local, an English-language newspaper in Sweden.

At the same time, hundreds of demonstrators have gathered in Stockholm and Goteborg in recent days, hoisting pirate flags and demanding that the government return the Pirate Bay's seized servers, according to reports.

Several attempts to reach Pirate Bay administrators through the Web site were unsuccessful. They did, however, post a defiant manifesto on a related Web site.

Shut down on May 31, the Pirate Bay moved to the Netherlands and was back up and running three days later, sporting a logo of a pirate ship sinking the word "Hollywood" with a fusillade of cannon fire and demonstrating how difficult it is to stop anything on the Internet.

Dan Glickman, president of the MPAA, confirmed that his group had asked Sweden to toughen its laws on intellectual property theft.

"What we do is look around the world to look if laws need to be improved, then we make suggestions," Glickman said. He emphasized that the MPAA respects the sovereign rights of foreign nations. As for the backlash, Glickman said, "Yes, I'm sure the pirates in Sweden are upset."

Russia's pirates may cost their country more than domestic unrest.

Entrance into the World Trade Organization would grant the country numerous trading benefits. Each of the WTO's 149 members has veto power over accession and each has key demands of applicants.

For the United States, the focus is on intellectual property. And the U.S. wants to make sure the mistake of China is not repeated.

"We let China in and China has not fully complied with the WTO requirements" for protecting intellectual property, Glickman said. The MPAA has an enforcement division in Hong Kong whose members accompany local law enforcement officials on raids. "The time to get action is now, rather than after they get in," Glickman said.

In Russia, CD and DVD pirates have established manufacturing plants on abandoned Soviet military bases, Glickman and RIAA President Mitch Bainwol said. A Web site called Allofmp3.com is selling millions of songs without authorization from copyright holders. The site looks as professional and legal as Apple Computer Inc.'s popular iTunes online music store. It claims to be licensed by a Russian agency to sell music, but U.S. trade groups aren't satisfied. None of the revenue generated from the 10-cent song downloads on the site goes to the artists, Bainwol said.

Moscow began an investigation of Allofmp3.com, dropped it, then picked it back up again after U.S. pressure was applied, said RIAA Executive Vice President Neil Turkowitz, who has traveled several times to Russia and filed criminal complaints with prosecutors there about the site.

"The Russian government is aware of all really existing problems in the [intellectual property] sphere and makes active efforts to solve them step-by-step," the Russian Ministry of Economic Development and Trade wrote in an April paper translated into English. "We will undertake a complex of additional measures in [the intellectual property] sphere in the nearest future with the intention to speed up the work in this sphere."

Two e-mails to the site administrator of Allofmp3.com went unanswered.

Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Espinel said shutting down Allofmp3.com "is right at the top of the agenda. This is a top-priority issue in terms of our discussion with Russia and the WTO."

As the bilateral talks with Russia continue, congressional leaders are bringing pressure to bear on President Bush, who has vowed to speed that nation's entry into the WTO. Working against Russia, the lawmakers say, are its plans to make intellectual property rights violators subject to civil, rather than criminal, penalties.

The U.S. government and the entertainment industry have a right to raise such issues with foreign nations, the RIAA's Turkowitz said. Movie and music piracy, he said, "is a problem that really doesn't know any borders."

Where Would You Rather Be Sick? (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034544

Is socialized medicine the prescription for better health? A recent study comparing Americans and Canadians, widely reported in the press, seems to suggest just that. But there is much less here than meets the eye.

The study, based on a telephone survey of 3,500 Canadians and 5,200 Americans (conducted by Statistics Canada and the U.S. National Center for Health Statistics), was released by the American Journal of Public Health. According to it, Canadians are healthier and have better access to health care than Americans, and at lower overall cost. So is the Canadian system, where the government pays for and manages the health-care system, superior? "Our study," says co-author Dr. Steffie Woolhandler, "is a terrible indictment of the U.S. health-care system. Universal coverage under a national health insurance system is key to improving health."

It is not so clear that the survey data back up these claims. Consider access. According to the survey, Canadians are more likely to have a regular physician, to have seen a doctor in the past year, and to be able to afford medications. But the data are ambiguous; Americans are more likely to have received a pap test and mammogram, as well as treatment for high blood pressure. Moreover, Americans are generally more satisfied with their health care. (The survey did not ask about access to specialist care or diagnostic imaging.)

The survey's most trumpeted conclusion was that Canadians are healthier than Americans. According to co-author Dr. David Himmelstein, "We pay almost twice what Canada does for care, more than $6,000 for every American, yet Canadians are healthier, and live two to three years longer." The survey says Americans have higher rates of diabetes (6.7% vs. 4.7%), arthritis (17.9% vs. 16.0%) and high blood pressure (18.3% vs. 13.9%). Americans are also more likely to be obese and lead a sedentary lifestyle. It's damning stuff. But we shouldn't confuse problems in public health with flaws in health-care systems. Americans may be heavier than Canadians, but this speaks more to genetics, diet, exercise and culture than to the accessibility or inaccessibility of health services. The remedy for obese Americans will be found in less fast food and more gym memberships.

So how does American health care actually measure up? If we look at how well it serves its sick citizens, American medicine excels. Prostate cancer is a case in point. The mortality rate from prostate cancer among American men is 19%. In contrast, mortality rates are somewhat higher in Canada (25%) and much higher in Europe (up to 57% in the U.K.). And comparisons in cardiac care -- such as the recent Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada study on post-heart-attack quality of life -- find that American patients fare far better in morbidity. Say what you want about the problems of American health care: For those stricken with serious disease, there's no better place to be than in the U.S.

Socialized health-care systems fall short in these critical cases because governments strictly ration care in order to reduce the explosive growth of health spending. As a result, patients have less access to specialists, diagnostic equipment and pharmaceuticals. Economist David Henderson, who grew up in Canada, once remarked that it has the best health-care system in the world -- if you have only a cold and you're willing to wait in your family doctor's office for three hours. But some patients have more than a simple cold -- and the long waits they must endure before they get access to various diagnostic tests and medical procedures have been documented for years. Montreal businessman George Zeliotis, for example, faced a year-long wait for a hip replacement. He sued and, as the co-plaintiff in a recent, landmark case, got the Supreme Court of Canada to strike down two major Quebec laws that banned private health insurance.

Dr. Karen Lasser, the study's third author, says that "Based on our findings, if I had to choose between the two systems for my patients, I would choose the Canadian system hands down." Perhaps she would. But as a physician licensed in both countries, I'd disagree.

Dr. Gratzer is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Russia's Lid On The Media (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, June 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- Earlier this month Moscow hosted a congress of the World Association of Newspapers. The organization's president, Gavin O'Reilly, deplored the Russian government's encroachments on media freedom. Then President Vladimir Putin took the podium to respond. The media's situation has grown better, not worse, he said: "From year to year increasingly favorable conditions are emerging in Russia for media development . . . Mr. O'Reilly spoke about the increasing state presence in the media. I have different information on this point."

In its hypocrisy, its utter lack of credibility, Putin's statement was reminiscent of the most blatant Soviet propaganda. In fact, it's not just foreign observers but also Russian media professionals who are deeply concerned about state control of the media. In the autumn of 2004 a number of members of the Russian Television Academy signed a letter that stated that "Russian television today is not free." They said they were being forced to broadcast official reports "instead of objective information. Propaganda instead of free discussions. Censorship has been basically established on television." And other restrictions, the letter emphasized, had led to self-censorship.

DOJ_NMG_0034545

Putin sees it differently: "Our country continues to value talent, honesty and courage on the part of journalists," he declared at the newspaper association's congress.

Speaking of talent: Russia's best television anchor, Leonid Parfyonov; its best daily newspaper editor, Raf Shakirov; and its best newsmagazine editor, Sergei Parkhomenko (he and I founded and edited a newsweekly that was taken over by the state-controlled gas monopoly Gazprom in 2001), have been forced out of their jobs, as have about a dozen other prominent media professionals. One of the latest to go was Olga Romanova, a fiery and incisive political anchor, forced out of her position on a minor TV channel after a change of ownership orchestrated by the Kremlin. Some of the banished have quit journalism altogether. Others have gone to work for outlets with much smaller audiences.

Another way to view infringement on the media under Putin is to track changes in coverage of the news in recent years. Of the many tragedies that have befallen the Russian people during Putin's presidency, the worst were the sinking of the submarine Kursk in 2000, the Moscow theater siege in 2002 and the terrorist seizure of the school in Beslan in 2004. Back in 2000 coverage of the Kursk catastrophe was a professional and cohesive effort. Both television and print journalists worked hard to provide honest and thorough coverage, bringing to light things that the government tried to hide. Officials -- civilian and military -- were forced to appear on the air to give comments "live." As they sought to avoid responsibility, their lies, cover-ups and conflicting reports were fully exposed to an angry nation.

Putin did not restrain himself in expressing his anger at the coverage. He publicly blamed media tycoons for the destruction of the army and the navy. But at that time, there was little he could do about it: The media, in the wake of Boris Yeltsin's presidency, were still largely unrestrained.

But by the time terrorists seized a Moscow theater and took some 900 hostages, the state had gone a long way toward regaining control of television. At least one channel, NTV, still had its professional standards and drive, though. It set about investigating the botched rescue operation, which caused the deaths of 129 people in the middle of Moscow. NTV couldn't do much, but at least people in Russia could see that the government wasn't letting the journalists do their jobs. Putin's response? He accused reporters of having base motives. They were mere publicity-seekers, he said, capitalizing on human blood. A few months later the manager of NTV was forced to resign.

State control was fully in place by 2004. The television coverage of Beslan stopped after the operation ended on day three of the monstrous terrorist attack, which left 331 people dead, more than half of them children. No high-ranking official -- security, law enforcement or otherwise -- has appeared on the air to account for what happened. To this day it has not been disclosed who was in charge of the operation. A Duma investigative commission has simply ignored much of the bloodcurdling testimony of witnesses, including that which surfaced during the trial of the only surviving terrorist. The trial itself was barely covered.

Four years into Putin's presidency, television has been tamed and taken securely under government control. Nothing is left to chance: Even seemingly live political talk shows get some editing so that nothing unexpected or unwelcome will appear on the screen. Whatever high-level criticism of Russia might be voiced at the G-8 summit in St. Petersburg next month, Russia's mass TV audience is unlikely to learn about it.

Since the Beslan tragedy, the Kremlin has moved to expand control over minor media, such as small-audience television outlets and, increasingly, print media. The once-respected daily Izvestia was acquired by Gazprom.

Lately there are persistent rumors that the next target may be the publishing house Kommersant and its crown jewel, the newspaper of the same name. This is Russia's most professional and high-quality mainstream daily. If the rumors are true, Kommersant will likely be handled as other media have been: The state will "appoint" a loyal buyer whose editorial line will no longer be a source of concern to the Kremlin.

There are still other, smaller outlets besides Kommersant that have preserved independent editorial stances. But these can barely break the basic media monopoly of Putin's Kremlin. The state television news channels reach 100 percent of the Russian audience, while alternative sources of information have limited circulation. Moreover, the Kremlin has ensured that national television is separated from independent-minded media: Television does not pick up their stories or invite their reporters to appear on the air.

Today's Kremlin is wholly unconstrained. There is nothing, inside or outside the country, to stop Putin and his regime from doing anything they wish on the domestic scene -- political, media or otherwise.

Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal, writes a monthly column for The Post.

How The World Can Combat Nuclear Terrorism (FT)

By Mohamed Elbaradei, Jonas Gahr Store

Financial Times, June 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034546

The simplest way to produce an atomic explosion is to slam together two sizeable chunks of high-enriched uranium (HEU) in what is commonly called a “gun-type nuke”. The approach might sound crude, and it is. No country currently uses this design for its nuclear weapons.

But it is worth remembering two things. First, that it was an HEU gun-type nuclear weapon that killed more than 70,000 people at Hiroshima. Second, that terrorists tend to be less focused on elegance of design than on results. This brings us to a critical question: after nearly five years of living under the threat of sophisticated terrorism – and with clear signs of terrorists trying to acquire nuclear material through criminal networks – why are we still moving so sluggishly to get rid of global HEU stockpiles and to minimise civilian uses of HEU?

Much attention is currently being given to the control of uranium enrichment technology, and rightly so. If all enrichment operations were brought under multinational control, it would become far more difficult for any country to divert enriched uranium for use in weapons. But it makes equal sense to protect – or, better, eliminate – the bomb-grade HEU that already exists.

Experts say there are about 1,850 metric tonnes of HEU in global stockpiles, enough to make tens of thousands of nuclear weapons. The great bulk of this is in military use. On the civilian side, the numbers are much smaller – but the level of security is uneven. Nearly 100 civilian facilities around the world operate with small amounts of weapon-grade HEU – that is, uranium that has been enriched to 90 per cent or greater. These facilities, primarily research reactors, provide important benefits. The isotopes they produce are vital to medical treatments, industrial productivity, water management and many other humanitarian uses. Research conducted at these facilities has greatly enhanced our quality of life.

But most if not all of these benefits could also be achieved using low-enriched uranium (LEU). As far back as the late 1970s, the US and other countries began efforts to convert such facilities from HEU to LEU, to reduce the proliferation risk. In recent years, good progress has been made. Many research reactors have been converted. Large quantities of HEU reactor fuel, both used and unused, have been removed from vulnerable locations and returned to the countries of origin.

Civil society has become involved, raising awareness of the problem and supporting change. A good example is the Nuclear Threat Initiative. Just last year it completed a project with the government of Kazakhstan that successfully “downblended” nearly 3,000kg of fresh HEU fuel to LEU and placed it in secure storage.

But more successes such as these are needed. Many vulnerabilities remain. We need to ratchet up the sense of urgency. We need more coherent global action. First, the countries involved should join forces to minimise and eventually eliminate the civilian use of HEU. Joint research should be conducted to address the remaining technical hurdles involved in converting from HEU to LEU operations. The commercial interests of the companies concerned should be protected. Financing should be made available where needed to assist countries with conversion operations. The HEU fuel should be sent back to the countries of origin for downblending and reuse.

Second, all countries should agree to stop producing fissile material for use in nuclear weapons. The elements are already in place for such an agreement, in the form of a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty. It is high time to negotiate and conclude such a treaty.

Third, to build trust, countries with civilian and military HEU stockpiles should be encouraged to release clear inventories of those stockpiles and to publish a schedule under which the remaining HEU will be verifiably downblended.

By investing in these straightforward measures, we could reduce substantially the risk of nuclear terrorism. The work could be done jointly, as an international community; this is one initiative in which all countries – nuclear weapon states and non-nuclear weapon states alike – could play a role and from which all would clearly benefit.

Mohamed ElBaradei is the director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the winner of the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize. Jonas Gahr Støre is the Norwegian minister of foreign affairs. An International Symposium on the Minimisation of HEU in the Civilian Nuclear Sector begins at the Nobel Peace Centre in Oslo on Saturday

DOJ_NMG_0034547

Ames, Andrew

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, June 15, 2006 11:23 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/15/06 Civil Division News

Judge Rules That U.S. Has Broad Powers to Detain Noncitizens Indefinitely

Officials sued over phone records access

ACLU Sues Pentagon for Monitoring

Ex-agent says FBI was warned on Bulger, Questions raised about reliability

Editorial: Give Kempthorne a chance on Cobell

New York Times

June 15, 2006

Judge Rules That U.S. Has Broad Powers to Detain Noncitizens Indefinitely

By NINA BERNSTEIN

A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled yesterday that the government has wide latitude under immigration law to detain noncitizens on the basis of religion, race or national origin, and to hold them indefinitely without explanation.

The ruling came in a class-action lawsuit by Muslim immigrants detained after 9/11, and it dismissed several key claims the detainees had made against the government. But the judge, John Gleeson of United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, allowed the lawsuit to continue on other claims, mostly that the conditions of confinement were abusive and unconstitutional. Judge Gleeson's decision requires top federal officials, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft and Robert S.

Mueller III, the F.B.I. director, to answer to those accusations under oath.

This is the first time a federal judge has addressed the issue of discrimination in the treatment of hundreds of Muslim immigrants who were swept up in the weeks after the 2001 terror attacks and held for months before they were cleared of links to terrorism and deported. The roundups drew intense criticism, not only from immigrant rights advocates, but also from the inspector general of the Justice Department, who issued reports saying that the government had made little or no effort to distinguish between genuine suspects and Muslim immigrants with minor visa violations.

Lawyers in the suit, who vowed to appeal yesterday's decision, said parts of the ruling could potentially be used far more broadly, to detain any noncitizen in the United States for any reason.

"This decision is a green light to racial profiling and prolonged detention of noncitizens at the whim of the president," said Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represented the detainees. "The decision is profoundly disturbing because it legitimizes the fact that the Bush administration rounded up and imprisoned our clients because of their religion and race."

A spokesman for the government, Charles S. Miller, would not respond to those assertions, saying only that the Justice Department was "very pleased that the court upheld the decision to detain plaintiffs, all of whom were illegal aliens, until national security investigations were completed and plaintiffs were removed from the country." He said the government was reviewing the rest of the opinion to decide whether to appeal the rulings Judge Gleeson made to allow the plaintiffs' other claims to proceed.

In his 99-page ruling, Judge Gleeson rejected the government's argument that the events of Sept. 11 justified extraordinary measures to confine noncitizens who fell under suspicion, or that the attacks heightened top officials' need for government immunity to combat future threats to national security without fear of being sued.

But his interpretation of immigration law gave the government broad discretion to enforce the law selectively against noncitizens of a particular religion, race or national origin, and to detain them indefinitely, for any unspecified reason, after an immigration judge had ordered them removed from the country.

"The executive is free to single out 'nationals of a particular country' and focus enforcement efforts on them," the judge wrote. "This is, of course, an extraordinarily rough and overbroad sort of distinction of which, if applied to citizens, our courts would be highly suspicious."

Yet, he continued, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that Congress and the executive branch, in exercising their broad power over naturalization and immigration, can make rules that would be unacceptable if applied to American citizens.

In the judge's view, the government has the right to detain people indefinitely as long as their eventual removal is "reasonably foreseeable." If that interpretation stands, it could apply to millions of noncitizens, including tourists removable for visa violations, said Gerald L. Neuman, a law professor at Columbia who is an expert in human rights law and was not involved in the case.

"It doesn't seem to limit the motives the government has to have in being slow in removing them; it could even be just basic neglect," he said.

But Professor Neuman cautioned that "it's only a district judge's decision."

"The decision encourages the government to behave this way without fear of financial liability," he said, but it does not carry the weight of a ruling by an appellate court. "This interpretation is attackable even among other judges in Brooklyn, let alone Lower Manhattan."

But David Cole, a law professor at Georgetown University and a co-counsel in the lawsuit, said the ruling was the only one of its kind and made New York "an equal protection-free zone" because the government can detain immigrants wherever it chooses.

"What this decision says is the next time there is a terror attack, the government is free to round up every Muslim immigrant in the U.S., based solely on their ethnic and religious identity, and hold them on immigration pretexts for as long as it desires," he said. "We saw after 9/11 what the government did in an era of uncertainty about how far it can go. Judge Gleeson has essentially given them a green light to go much further."

The class-action lawsuit, Turkmen v. Ashcroft, is the first and largest of several brought by immigrants held after 9/11. The named plaintiffs in the case include former detainees who came back to the United States this year for depositions and were required to be in the custody of federal marshals at all times. Among them were Hany Ibrahim, a deli worker, and his brother, Yasser, a Web designer, Egyptian Muslims who said then that putting themselves back in the hands of the government they were suing was an act of faith in America.

Yesterday, Yasser Ibrahim, who had lived in New York for three or four years on an expired tourist visa and was delivered in shackles to the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn soon after Sept. 11, said through his lawyers that he was shocked and very disappointed by the judge's decision.

"I can't believe the court would allow this to happen," he said." I am frightened for other Muslims in the United States, who could face the same discrimination and abuse that I suffered."

END

AP

Officials sued over phone records access

By MARK SHERMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

WASHINGTON -- The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general and other state officials Wednesday to stop them from seeking information about telephone companies' cooperation with the National Security Agency.

The unusual filing in U.S. District Court in Trenton, N.J., is the latest effort by federal authorities to halt legal proceedings aimed at revealing whether and how often AT&T, Verizon and other phone companies have provided customer records to the NSA without a court order.

New Jersey Attorney General Zulima Farber, a Democrat, and other officials sent subpoenas to five carriers on May 17, asking for documents that would explain whether they supplied customer records to the NSA, the lawsuit said.

The subpoenas followed by a few days a USA Today report that the phone companies had complied with the secretive agency's request for the phone records of millions of ordinary Americans after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The companies' deadline to respond to the subpoenas is Thursday, the federal lawsuit said.

Farber subpoenaed the phone companies for information because she suspected state consumer protection laws may have been violated if in fact the phone companies were turning over such records, Farber spokesman David Wald said.

"The phone companies were turning over information without any notice to consumers," Wald said. "We were seeking to protect the people of New Jersey."

The Justice Department said more than 20 lawsuits have been filed around the country alleging that the phone companies illegally assisted the NSA. The government says sensitive national security information would be revealed if judges allow those cases to proceed.

The American Civil Liberties Union also has filed complaints in more than 20 states, including New Jersey, asking state utility commissions and attorneys general to investigate.

In this matter, the federal government said the New Jersey officials are treading on federal turf and that the companies, if forced to comply with the subpoenas, would be confirming or denying the existence of the program. President Bush and other top federal officials have refused to do that.

Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler also warned lawyers for the phone companies that responding to the subpoenas "would violate federal laws and executive orders."

A separate letter that Keisler, head of the department's Civil Division, sent to Farber made the same points, but it took a softer approach.

"We sincerely hope that you will withdraw the subpoenas, so that litigation over this matter may be avoided," Keisler said.

END

Reuters

Jun, 14, 2006

ACLU Sues Pentagon for Monitoring

PHILADELPHIA -- The American Civil Liberties Union sued the U.S. Defense Department Wednesday to demand information it says the government has collected on groups opposed to the war in Iraq.

The group says the Pentagon has been monitoring antiwar groups and individuals and has compiled lists on people it sees as potential threats but who the ACLU says are exercising their free-speech rights.

The suit was the ACLU's first attempt to force the Pentagon to disclose domestic surveillance and followed similar suits by the organization against the FBI and the Justice Department.

"It's absolutely improper for the U.S. military to keep databases on lawful First Amendment activities," said ACLU attorney Ben Wizner. "These are peaceful, law-abiding groups and individuals that oppose U.S. war policy but pose no threat to the military."

The ACLU said the Defense Department shared the information with other government agencies through the database, known as the Threat and Local Observation Notice, or Talon.

A Pentagon spokeswoman said the Defense Department never commented on pending lawsuits.
In April, the Pentagon said a review found it had collected data on U.S. peace activists and discovered that about 260 entries in the Talon database should not have been kept there or should have been removed.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court for eastern Pennsylvania, charges the Pentagon is refusing to comply with requests by the ACLU to declare who had been monitored.

The ACLU filed the requests after learning through an NBC News report of Pentagon surveillance of peace groups.

The ACLU has also challenged President Bush's order authorizing the National Security Agency to tap into private phone calls without court permission.

The latest suit is filed on behalf of some 30 groups, including the Americans Friends Service Committee, also known as the Quakers.

END

Boston Globe

June 15, 2006

Ex-agent says FBI was warned on Bulger, Questions raised about reliability

By Shelley Murphy

A retired FBI official testified yesterday that he urged his superiors to drop gangster James ``Whitey" Bulger as an informant in the early 1980s, amid allegations that Bulger may have been involved in drug dealing and murder.

After being dispatched to assess Bulger's credibility in a brief meeting at the gangster's Quincy apartment in 1981, the official, Robert Fitzpatrick, testified yesterday that he left believing that Bulger was an egotistical ``big bag of wind."

But Fitzpatrick said that while he was unsuccessfully lobbying to cut Bulger loose, Bulger's handler, FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. , was inviting top agents in the FBI's Boston office to the State House to meet Bulger's younger brother, William, then president of the Massachusetts Senate.

Recounting how Connolly escorted him to a meeting with William Bulger at his Senate office in 1982, Fitzpatrick said, ``He was a little like his brother, to be honest with you. He did most of the talking. I just listened."

Fitzpatrick was not asked on the stand whether they discussed James Bulger with his politician brother during the meeting.

However, Fitzpatrick told the Globe after the proceedings yesterday that they did not.
Fitzpatrick, who served as an assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office between 1981 and 1986, said it wasn't unusual for top agents in an FBI field office to meet with prominent local officials.

However, he said he was concerned about Connolly's relationship with a powerful politician who was also his informant's brother, and asked him: ``What are you doing with this guy?"

He said Connolly responded that William Bulger ``is the guy who's going to get you the job when you leave [the FBI]. He's going to take care of you."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's third day on the stand in US District Court in Boston, where he was testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the government by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The family says that the government had negligently caused McIntyre's death by mishandling longtime FBI informants Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for killing McIntyre and nine other people, testified last week that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984 because Connolly warned them McIntyre was cooperating against them.

McIntyre was involved in an unsuccessful effort to ship weapons to the Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler, and had told government agents that Bulger and Flemmi were involved in the plot.

Bulger, who is listed as one of the FBI's 10 most wanted, is charged with 19 murders and has been a fugitive since he fled Boston just before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 of warning him to flee, and is serving a 10-year prison sentence.
William Bulger resigned as president of the University of Massachusetts three years ago after he was grilled by a congressional committee that was investigating the FBI's handling of his brother.

William Bulger testified before the committee that Connolly was a friend who grew up in the same South Boston housing development, and had worked for him on political campaigns. But he said he had never asked Connolly to protect his brother and had not known his brother was an informant until it was publicly disclosed.

Yesterday, Fitzpatrick testified that he was sent to meet James Bulger in 1981 in an effort to evaluate his ``suitability" as an informant.

Bulger wore dark sunglasses that made it impossible to see his eyes. ``He talked about how tough he was," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick recounted how Bulger went into a monologue, showing off his Alcatraz belt buckle and talking about the time he spent at the prison while serving a nine-year sentence for bank robbery in the 1950s and '60s.
Fitzpatrick said he recommended that Bulger be dropped as an informant because he was a gang leader, he allegedly was involved in crimes, and he seemed to be withholding information.

But Fitzpatrick said he was advised by superiors, including Sean McWeeney, chief of the FBI's organized crime section in Washington, ``how valuable" Bulger was in investigations.

Tensions flared in the FBI's Boston office in 1982, according to Fitzpatrick, when other agents began working with another informant, Brian Halloran, who implicated Bulger and Flemmi in the 1981 murder of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler.

Connolly was accused of rifling through FBI files on the Wheeler investigation, which led them to be moved to a safe, according to Fitzpatrick. Halloran was killed in May 1982 and another potential witness in the Wheeler case, John Callahan, was murdered two months later in Florida.

While the investigation into all three murders was underway, the FBI dropped Flemmi as an informant from 1982 to 1986, but continued to use Bulger.

END

Indianz.com

June 15, 2006

Editorial: Give Kempthorne a chance on Cobell

"Being found in contempt of court may become part of the job description for whoever heads the U.S. Department of Interior.

But Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, the former governor of Idaho, has been on the job less than a month and he's already been dragged into a 10-year-old class-action lawsuit filed by American Indians who are demanding an accounting for more than a century's worth of alleged federal mismanagement of tribal trust funds.

In a motion filed Friday, plaintiffs asked U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth to make Kempthorne the third successive interior secretary held in contempt of court in the lawsuit. They charge the Interior Department has continued to conceal computer security problems in violation of a 2005 court ruling requiring it to report weaknesses that could put Indian records at risk.

As of this writing, no decision has been made, but there's plenty of precedent in both the Bush and Clinton administrations. Lamberth has found Kempthorne's predecessors, Bruce Babbitt and Gale Norton, in contempt, outraged at what he saw as Interior's refusal to cooperate.

But, in all fairness, Kempthorne really hasn't even had a chance to cooperate. He certainly hasn't had time to be found in contempt of court."

END

Wulf, David M.

From: Wulf, David M.

Sent: Thursday, June 15, 2006 6:29 PM

To: Vasaio, Tony; Scolinos, Tasia; Rybicki, James E; Gorsuch, Neil M; Ferber, Alan L; Burton, Faith; Bradbury, Steve; Allen, Michael (JMD); Jezierski, Crystal; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); McIntosh, Brent; Hart, Rosemary; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Vargas, Omar; McAtamney, James A; Cagigas, Jaime (DHS); Tzitzon, Nicholas; [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; Schofield, Regina; Palma, Josephine; Hagy, David; Gillis, John; Carter, Judy (USPC); [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; Rubin, Jim (ENRD); Vanyur, John; Trono, Robert (USMS); Snelson, William (USMS); Schmitz, Fran (CTS); [redacted] (USMS); McManamon, Michael J; Conley, Joyce; [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; Scavo, Tara; O'Keefe, Kevin C.; Bukovac, Michael A.; Zellers, Steven S.; Metzger, C. Michael; Augustine, Donald P.; Graham-Wyatt, Nina; Metzger, C. Michael; Drake, Herbert W.; Augustine, Donald P.; James.Burch@usdoj.gov; [redacted]@usda.gov; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; [redacted]@do.treas.gov; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@usss.dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@DOC.gov; Martin, Mark D.; [redacted]; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; Chait, Mark R.; Lowrey, Stuart L.; [redacted]@oig.treas.gov; [redacted]@secureskies.net; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@ic.fbi.gov; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov; [redacted]@secureskies.net; [redacted]@epa.gov; [redacted]@va.gov; [redacted]@bop.gov; [redacted]@usmint.treas.gov; [redacted]@hud.gov; [redacted]@dhs.gov; [redacted]@who.eop.gov; Vargas, Omar

Cc: Goddard, Valerie J.; Rowley, Raymond G.

Attachments: [redacted]-Phone list.pdf

ESF-13 National Steering Committee Members:

As we move forward with our planning efforts for this summer and beyond, we would like to gather the names and contact information for law-enforcement personnel from your agencies who will be available to staff ESF-13 (by serving as members of the ESF-13 coordinating committees and/or as ESF-13 desk officers) at Joint Field Offices in the gulf-coast region and elsewhere. Also, with respect specifically to our planning efforts for the State of Louisiana, we are hoping you might provide us with a description of the law-enforcement resources (personnel, equipment, etc.) that you would be prepared to "surge" into Louisiana in the event of a hurricane. If you could please send this information to me, with a cc to Val Goddard, within the next week, it would be very much appreciated.

Also, for your planning purposes, please be advised that we anticipate holding another National Steering Committee meeting during the week of June 25. Attached very belatedly is the sign-in sheet from our May 17 kickoff meeting.

As always, thanks very much for your support.

[redacted]

Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives
United States Department of Justice
[redacted]

CONTACT SHEET

Name	Agency	Phone#	Email Address
1. [redacted]	DEA	[redacted]	[redacted]
2. [redacted]	BOP	[redacted]	[redacted]
3. [redacted]	DEA	[redacted]	[redacted]
4. [redacted]	Texas 16	[redacted]	[redacted]
5. [redacted]	ATF	[redacted]	[redacted]
6. [redacted]	FAMS	[redacted]	[redacted]
7. [redacted]	ATF	[redacted]	[redacted]
8. [redacted]	ICE	[redacted]	[redacted]
9. [redacted]	ICE . ICE	[redacted]	[redacted]
10. [redacted]	[redacted]	[redacted]	[redacted]
11. [redacted]	FBI	[redacted]	[redacted]
12. [redacted]	DOJ	[redacted]	[redacted]
13. [redacted]	USDA-FS	[redacted]	[redacted]
14. [redacted]	ATF	[redacted]	[redacted]
15. [redacted]	DHS	[redacted]	[redacted]
16. [redacted]	USMS	[redacted]	[redacted]
17. [redacted]	TSA-FAMS	[redacted]	[redacted]
18. [redacted]	DOJ/OASG	[redacted]	[redacted]
19. [redacted]	DOJ·OIPL	[redacted]	[redacted]
20. [redacted]	DOI	[redacted]	[redacted]
21. [redacted]	EPA	[redacted]	[redacted]
23. [redacted]	VA	[redacted]	[redacted]

CONTACT SHEET CONTINUED

Name	Agency	Phone#	Email Address
24 [redacted]	Treas. US. Mint		[redacted]
25 [redacted]	HUD-CPD Grants		[redacted]
26. [redacted]	DHS/ICE/APS,		[redacted]
27. [redacted]	Hart DOJ/OLC		[redacted]
28. [redacted]	HSC	[redacted]	[redacted]
29.
30.
31.
32.
33.
34.
35.
36.
37.
38.
39.
40.
41.
42.
43.
44.
45.

Contact Sheet Continued

Name	Agency	Phone#	Email Address
46.
47.
48.
49.
50.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, June 16, 2006 8:32 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, June 16, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060616.pdf; agnb060616.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena NSA Surveillance Documents 3
Bush's Comments On Hamdan Case Could Signal Detainee About-Face 3
New Jersey Seeks Telephone Surveillance Data From US 4
Defense Lawyer Says FBI Agent Tricked Georgia Terror Suspect Into Confessing 4
Some Canadian Muslim Leaders Urge Crackdown On Extremists 5
Plaintiffs Lawyer Compares Ruling In 9/11 Case To Japanese Internment 5
Kinsley Condemns Administration Anti-Terror Tactics 5

Homeland Response:

DHS Stands By Risk-Analysis Process For Anti-Terror Funding 5
"Unusual Circumstances" Surrounding DHS Limo Contract Outlined At Hearing 6
Rumsfeld Attends Ground Breaking For Pentagon 9/11 Memorial 6
Pataki, Bloomberg Hear Recommendations For WTC Memorial 7

War News:

Senate Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Measure As Both Chambers Debate War 7
Purported Al Qaeda Documents Suggest US Counter-Insurgency Effort Working 10
US Death Toll In Iraq Reaches "Sad Benchmark" Of 2,500 Dead 11
Suicide Attack On Shiite Mosque Kills At Least Seven 11
Iraqi Prime Minister Indicates Government May Offer Limited Amnesty To Insurgents 11
US Transition Teams Aid Iraqi Troops In Baghdad Crackdown 11
US Commanders Release Photo Of New Al Qaeda In Iraq Leader 12
Shiite Militias Said To Control Iraqi Prison System 12
Alleged Iraq Agent Charged With Lying To FBI About Oil-For-Food Role 12
Military Investigates Killing Of Three Civilians At Northern Iraq Checkpoint 12
Sources Expect Marines To Face Charges Over Haditha Incident 13
US Reservist Becomes Attraction On Armed Forces Radio In Iraq 13
Louisiana Center Prepares Soldiers For Iraqi Battlefield 13
Bomb Kills Eight On Bus Taking Workers To Afghan Air Base 13
Taliban's Appeal Grows In Pakistani Tribal Areas 13
Pet Projects Said To Trump Strategic Priorities In Defense Spending Boom 14

Corporate Scandals:

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud 14
Enron Defense Firm Still Waiting For Fees 14
Former HealthSouth Executive Sentenced To Eight Years 15
US Subpoenas Medarex In Option Backdating Probe 15
EMI Settles Payola Probe With Spitzer For $3.75 Million 15
Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings 15
Accountant Firms Prove To Be Financial Beneficiaries Of Sarbanes-Oxley 16
WSJournal Weighs In On Milberg Weiss Indictments 16

Criminal Law:

House Democrats Vote 99-58 To Remove Jefferson From Ways And Means 16

Jury To Resume Deliberations In Safavian Case Today 17
Former Chicago Official Told FBI He Copied Hiring Files Out Of Fear For His Life 17
Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge Still At Large 18
DOJ Official Says Online Threats On The Rise 18
Supreme Court Rules Evidence Seized In Searches Without Knocking Admissible 19
Former Prosecutor Relishes Role In Recovering Roosevelt Pistol 20
Kentucky High Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed 20
Maryland Police Have No Evidence Linking VA Theft To Other Burglaries 20
Malvo Told Police Of Other Shootings 20
Maryland Governor To Sign Bill Strengthening Laws On Sex Offenders 21

Civil Law:

Honeywell Settles Whistleblower Charges With US For $2.6 Million 21
St. Barnabas Health Care To Pay $265 Million Medicare Fraud Settlement 21

Civil Rights:

Former DOJ Attorney Pleads Guilty To Conflict Charges In California 22
FBI Investigating Alleged Racist Firing By Washington State Police Chief 22
Los Angeles Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Police Shooting .. 23
Senate Panel Approves Flag Desecration Amendment 23
Louisiana Senate Alters Bill To Change Open Primary Elections 23
Baltimore Police, Jail Sued For Arrests Without Charges 23
California Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job 24
Ehrlich Fires Appointee Over Remarks On Gays 24
WPost Criticizes House Over Military Rules On Religious Expression 24

Antitrust:

Official Pleads Guilty To Military Bid-Rigging 24
Bill Gates To Relinquish Day-To-Day Control Of Microsoft For Philanthropy 25
Vinci Rebuffs Veolia's Merger Proposal 25

Environment:

Bush Authorizes Marine Reserve In Northwest Hawaiian Islands 26
Democrats Say EPA Blocked Information About Toxic Sites . 27
Sago Mine Disaster Survivor Attends Mine Safety Bill Signing 27
Bill Clinton Applauds Evangelical Focus On Global Warming 27
Alaska Seen As Front Line In US Battle Against Bird Flu 27

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Solicits Bids To Create Nationwide Crime Data Network 28
North Carolina FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation For Ethics Violation 28
FBI Approval At 42% In Wall Street Journal Poll 28
DEA Arrests 22 In Heroin-Smuggling Investigation 28
Report: Fentanyl Linked To Nearly 200 Deaths 28
DC Man Acquitted Of Drug, Conspiracy Charges 29
Selig Writes Letter To Fans, Says MLB Will Fund HGH Study 29
Mail, Garbage Provided Clues In Federal Steroid Investigation 29
CA: Thousands Of Marijuana Plants Found On Forest Service Land 29
US Charges New York Jeweler In Cocaine Money-Laundering Scheme 29
Mississippi Man Arrested In Federal Witness Slaying 30
West Virginia Attorney Jailed On Gun Charges 30
House Appropriators Approve Explosives Fee To Help Fund ATF 30

Immigration:

Report Says Senate Bill Would Grant Amnesty To 14.4 Million Illegal Immigrants 30

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Supplemental Spending Bill 31
Bush Signs Bill Boosting Broadcast Indecency Fines 32
Senate Confirms Bush FDIC Nominee 32
Bush Hosts Congressional Picnic 32
Bush Apologizes For Teasing Sight-Impaired Reporter Over Sunglasses 32
Spellings Has Undertaken Extensive Foreign Travel 32
Credit Overhaul Bill Seen As Gaining Momentum 32
Transition To Medicare Prescription Drug Plan From Medicaid Still Problematic 33
Bush Approval Up To 40% In Fox News Poll 33
Federal Retirees Could Get A Large COLA In January 33

Other News:

Bernanke Says Economy Can Handle Increased Energy Prices 33
Glut Looms For US Natural Gas Industry 34
Democrats Hope To Make Electoral Gains In Suburbs 34
Cheney Confident Of GOP Prospects In 2006 35
Differences Examined Between 1994, 2006 Election Cycles 35

DOJ_NMG_0034562

Election Officials Make Preparations For Midterms 35
Judge Dismisses Much Of GOP Phone-Jamming Lawsuit ... 35
Rather To Leave CBS 35
Research On Genetics, Intelligence Generates Controversy 36
Responsible Fatherhood Pioneer Profiled 36
Friedman Suggests Creation Of New Green Party 36
Political Center Said To Be Regaining Power 36
NYTimes Criticizes Effort To End Public Financing Of Presidential Elections 36
WPost Criticizes Maryland Effort To Deal With Rising Electricity Rates 37
Ahmadinejad Reaches Out To Russia, China 37
Hamas Recommits To Cease-Fire 38
North Korea Said To Be Moving Toward Missile Test 38
Bush To Push For Trade Deal As Doha Deadline Looms 38
US Will Drop Opposition To Unified Asian Currency 39
Sri Lankan Violence Could Portend War 39
Syrians Feel Pressure Is Off As Hariri Investigation Continues 39
Somalia Contact Group Holds First Meeting 39
Senate Approves $60 Million For UN Darfur Peacekeeping Mission 40
US, Russia Extend Program For Eradicating Soviet WMD 40
Former Liberian Leader May Serve Sentence In UK 40
Cholera Epidemic Spreading In Angola 41
Top Uganda Officials Accused Of Corruption 41
Annan Confident UN Will Avoid Shutdown Despite Dispute With US 41
Chavez Popular With US Leftists 41
China Seeks Tighter Controls Over Economic Growth 41
Krauthammer Criticizes Palestinians For Failing To Accept Negotiated Peace 42
O'Grady Sees Private Investment As Remedy For Mexican Economy 42
WSJournal Blames Airbus Meltdown On European Subsidies 42
NYTimes Sees Benefits In Russian Experiment With Young Politicians 42

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 42

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 43

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena NSA Surveillance Documents. The AP (6/16, Kellman) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter cranked up his dispute with the Bush administration over executive power on Thursday, threatening to subpoena documents on the White House's warrantless surveillance program." The AP continues, "Specter said he had not received a response to his request that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appear before the panel this month to answer questions about the surveillance program and other touchy subjects – such as the FBI raid on a lawmaker's office last month. … 'I will ask for authorization for a subpoena if we do not get an adequate response,' Specter told the committee." The AP adds, "Such prodding may not be necessary, according to the Bush administration. … 'We are currently working with Chairman Specter to set a date for the attorney general to appear,' Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said."

Congress Struggles To Resume Oversight Of Executive Branch. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Chaddock, 61K) reports the debates in Congress over the Iraq war, emergency spending bills, and NSA domestic surveillance "signal that Congress is trying - again - to revive its flagging oversight role of an executive branch that is claiming broad wartime powers. It's doing so, analysts say, because control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections could turn on the issue." Brookings Institution analyst Thomas Mann said, "The broader motivation in Congress by the majority party is clearly the sinking political fortunes of the president and the party and the fear of retribution in November." The Monitor adds that so far, "however, both chambers of Congress have struggled to make headway. Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, for example, has repeatedly been stymied in his bid to bring the government's secret eavesdropping program in line with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act."

Bush's Comments On Hamdan Case Could Signal Detainee About-Face. The Legal Times (6/16, Mauro) reports, "It is rare for a president to comment on a pending Supreme Court case. But President George W. Bush has been doing just that in recent weeks, making several mentions of the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case that will decide the fate of the military commissions he ordered to handle detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … 'We're waiting on our Supreme Court to act,' Bush said at a press conference Wednesday, one of several comments that indicate he is eager to follow the Court's lead, even if it rules against his claim of broad power to deal with the detainees outside the established military and civilian court system." The Times continues, "Bush's remarks and tone have confounded opponents of the military commissions, leaving some wondering if Bush is trying to soften the blow of an expected defeat -- or already preparing the public for civilian alternatives to military commissions. … Covington & Burling partner David Remes, one of the coordinators of the legal effort against the administration position, says Bush's comments have led him to ask 'why Bush made Hamdan a test of presidential power in the first place. If Bush could accomplish his goals within the existing legal framework, why did he confront the judicial branch with such breathtaking claims of presidential power?'" The Times adds, "The presidential commentary on the case was so frequent in recent days that expectations were high that the Court might hand down the decision on Thursday. The two lawyers who argued against each other in the case -- Solicitor General Paul Clement and Georgetown University Law Center's Neal Katyal -- were in the courtroom, but the justices instead handed down four criminal and business law cases. The Court will convene again next Monday and Thursday to issue more decisions in its push toward adjournment by month's end."

DOJ_NMG_0034563

New Jersey Seeks Telephone Surveillance Data From US. The New York Times (6/16, Chen, Richtel) reports, "The New Jersey attorney general has issued subpoenas to five telephone companies to determine whether any of them violated the state's consumer protection laws by providing records to the National Security Agency. Experts say it is the first legal move by a state to question the agency's program to compile calling records to track terrorist activities." The Times continues, "On Wednesday, the United States filed a lawsuit to block the subpoenas, setting up a legal showdown pitting the state's authority to protect consumers' rights against the federal government's national security powers. … 'People in New Jersey and people everywhere have privacy rights,' the state's attorney general, Zulima V. Farber, said on Thursday. 'What we were trying to determine was whether the phone companies in New Jersey had violated any law or any contractual obligations with their consumers by supplying information to some government entity, simply by request, and not by any court order or search warrant.'" The Times adds, "This latest confrontation over the invocation of national security began last month, when Ms. Farber issued the subpoenas to the companies — AT&T, Verizon, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Cingular Wireless — to determine whether they had turned over the phone records to the federal government without a court order, in possible violation of state laws. … But when the Justice Department filed suit in United States District Court here to block those subpoenas — a suit that Ms. Farber received on Thursday — it asserted that the state was straying into a federal matter, and that compliance with the subpoenas would imperil national security."

Defense Lawyer Says FBI Agent Tricked Georgia Terror Suspect Into Confessing. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Weber) reports, "Investigators preyed on a Georgia Tech student's devotion to Islam to get him to help their terrorism probe and then reneged on their promise not to arrest him if he told the truth, the suspect's lawyer said in court papers Thursday. The allegations by Jack Martin, a lawyer for 21-year-old Syed Ahmed, were contained in a motion in which Martin seeks to suppress Ahmed's statements to the FBI or make the government abide by the alleged agreement not to prosecute him. … Martin said an FBI agent and a task force investigator who questioned Ahmed…told him that as long as he told the truth he would not be arrested. He said one of the investigators told Ahmed that he, too, was a Muslim and used that to get a statement from Ahmed." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett said the agency would have no comment."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/16, Torpy, 430K) adds, "In the motion…Martin argued that the U.S. Supreme Court and other courts have determined that a statement is involuntary if induced 'by significant and powerful promises or threats, such as the promise of nonprosecution here and the threat of arrest if the defendant did not "cooperate."' The motion quotes an agent telling Ahmed, 'You have the rest of your life in front of you. ... You know eventually you are going to have to get a job some day. Do you want any type of criminal record?'" The Journal-Constitution also reports, "In a separate filing, Martin asks the court to force prosecutors to divulge any wiretaps or electronic surveillance the government used to keep track of his client."

DOJ_NMG_0034564

Some Canadian Muslim Leaders Urge Crackdown On Extremists. USA Today (6/16, For, 2.31M) reports, "Some Canadian Muslim leaders are urging a crackdown on extremists within their community two weeks after 17 males, including five teenagers, were arrested in suburban Toronto on terrorism-related charges." The response to the arrests" has exposed a rift between Muslim leaders. Some reject the notion that a violent ideology may have taken root in their community; others argue that Muslims must acknowledge radicalism in their midst and work harder to extinguish it. … Some Canadian Muslim leaders say they're offended by the suggestion they should be responsible for combating radical influences. … Others say radicals are spreading extremism and the danger can no longer be ignored. 'They were young kids, and they were taken down this road by someone'" says Sheik Husain Patel, cleric at the Toronto Islamic Center, where one suspect occasionally worshiped."

Plaintiffs Lawyer Compares Ruling In 9/11 Case To Japanese Internment. In a Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) op-ed, Georgetown law professor and Turkmen vs. Ashcroft plaintiffs co-counsel David Cole writes that with his ruling this week upholding US authority to arrest foreign nationals on immigration charges and detain them indefinitely, US District Judge John Gleeson, "in essence…authorized a repeat of the Japanese internment — as long as the internment is limited to foreign nationals charged with visa violations (a group that at last count numbered about 11 million people)." Cole concludes that Gleeson's ruling gives "federal authorities…explicit permission to let prejudice and fear run roughshod over the most basic of human rights — the rights to equal treatment and liberty."

Kinsley Condemns Administration Anti-Terror Tactics. In a Washington Post column (6/16, A25), Michael Kinsley writes, "It is not yet clear -- though there is little reason for optimism -- whether the courts will let them get away with it, but the official position of the executive branch under President Bush is that the US government can lock you up anywhere in the world, torture you and tell no one about it. And if someone does find out and starts talking trash like 'habeas corpus' or 'Fourth Amendment,' too bad: It's all okay under the president's inherent powers as commander in chief. Congress -- unbeknownst to Congress -- approved it all in its resolution shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, urging the president to fight terrorism. And the president deputized the CIA and other agencies to go forth and use this authority, in documents that you can't have and that may or may not exist." In "a twist fully worthy of Kafka, or at least Joseph Heller ("Catch-22"), the very suspicion that bad things are going on is a reason you can't find out."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Stands By Risk-Analysis Process For Anti-Terror Funding. The Washington Post (6/16, B3, Layton, 744K) reports DHS Undersecretary for Preparedness George W. Foresman faced "criticism and pointed questioning yesterday" during a hearing of the House Committee on Government Reform, but stood by the agency's "decision to cut anti-terror grants for Washington and New York by 40 percent." Foresman said he felt "confident in the risk analysis process and the peer review process," for distributing the grants and said the agency needed to do "a better job in communicating with the communities." However, "Foresman appeared to have a difficult time communicating with" lawmakers, who called DHS' "decision-making process 'mind-boggling,' 'a mystery' and 'goofy' and said it doesn't appear to meet its stated goal -- distributing federal dollars to regions that face the greatest risk of attack."

DHS Analysis Finds Most Cities, States Lack Adequate Disaster Preparedness. The AP (6/16, Jordan) reports that an analysis by DHS that was delivered to Congress yesterday has found that "shortcomings in emergency planning" in a majority of American cities and states are cause "for significant national concern." The AP continues, "Although emergency plans appear to be stronger in 18 states along the nation's 'Hurricane Belt,' the analysis cited preparedness gaps in 131 state and city emergency response plans." The report "is the latest in a series of government and expert analyses since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast," almost all of which "have found lacking preparedness levels for large-scale disasters."

DOJ_NMG_0034565

"Unusual Circumstances" Surrounding DHS Limo Contract Outlined At Hearing. The Washington Post (6/16, A4, Hsu, Babcock, 744K) reports congressional investigators told a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing yesterday that Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc. "offered its services to the Department of Homeland Security more than three months before the agency sought bids for a transportation contract, and eventually won contracts worth $25 million over six years." Rep. Mike Rogers said the "unusual circumstances" surrounding the contract didn't "look right," and that he couldn't see why Shirlington President Christopher D. Baker had a letter recommending the company for the contract from convicted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, "instead of his own congressman or some congressman of the district where the business will be conducted." DHS "officials previously denied the existence" of such a letter. Rep. Bennie Thompson "called for DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson to appear before Congress to discuss 'major missteps,'" adding, "It is unconscionable to think that the agency charged with tracking down terrorists cannot even track down letters of recommendation."

In an article appearing on at least 77 news websites, the AP (6/16, Werner) reports Cunningham's letter "prompted renewed protests from lawmakers about the Homeland Security Department's awarding of two contracts to Shirlington despite the company's history of problems." Rep. Peter King noted Baker's "criminal record and business dealings with a defense contractor named as an unindicted coconspirator in the prosecution of Cunningham. 'And then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company. If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is.' … Outside the hearing, King questioned the department's failure to find Cunningham's letter. 'Did somebody clean out the file?' he asked. Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said that never happened."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Gehlert, 958K) reports, "Homeland Security's chief procurement officer, Elaine Duke, said that her agency made a distinction between company owners and drivers, and that the drivers had undergone background checks. No such checks on the company or its owner were required by law. 'The drivers have a clean slate,' she said."

Long Island Newsday (6/16, Palmer) reports, "House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King said the information might warrant a Justice Department examination. 'It all adds up to a pretty strong case of DHS incompetence or a special deal was made,' said King."

Rumsfeld Attends Ground Breaking For Pentagon 9/11 Memorial. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and family member of those killed on September 11, 2001 attended the ground breaking for a memorial at the Pentagon yesterday. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It will feature 184 trees and 184 benches, one for each victim." The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 4, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "At the two-acre memorial site, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld read the inscription carved on the cornerstone." Secretary Rumsfeld: "To honor the 184 people whose lives were lost, their families, and all those who sacrifice, that we may live in freedom. We will never forget." NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "An emotional Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said, 'Today, we claim this ground for them.'"

The Washington Post (6/16, B1, Dwyer, 744K) reports, "When the ceremony ended, Rumsfeld stayed behind. For about an hour, he stood in the bright sunlight, shaking hand after hand, autographing programs and taking pictures with family members. He stayed until every person who wanted a word with him got the opportunity. 'If there is anything these families felt,' he said in a brief interview, 'it's that we must not forget what took place. This is visible progress, and the memorial, when it is completed, is going to be a very special place. It is going to be about memories and reflections, to be sure. But it is going to be a place to think about today and tomorrow and the next day and the world.'" The AP (6/16, Barakat) notes Rumsfeld "said he wanted the memorial to convey to future Americans 'that their countrymen's grief was turned toward the cause of their nation's defense.'"

Fox News (6/15, 7:09 p.m., Smith) called it "an emotional groundbreaking." Secretary Rumsfeld "appearing to choke up as he talked about the 184 people who died on the attacks there, saying they shared a tragic destiny. He said the spot where they were killed is sacred ground." CNN Headline News (6/15, 5:34 p.m.) called it "an emotional afternoon at the Pentagon," saying "the usually-stoic Rumsfeld seemed to get a little choked up while talking about those who shared a tragic destiny that day." CNN (6/15, 3:13 p.m.) also said Rumsfeld was "emotional, perhaps unexpectedly emotional." The Washington Times (6/16, Emerling, 90K) also calls the ceremony "an emotional affair."

DOJ_NMG_0034566

WUSA-TV Washington (6/15, 11:09 p.m.) said, "It's been a long time coming, but today ground was finally broken" for the memorial. WTTG-TV Washington (6/15, 11:17 p.m.) said, "Even if you wanted to, you'll never forget where you were or what you were doing" on 9/11, but now "families of victims are taking back that area of the Pentagon where 184 men, women and children died" and "the crash site is turning into a place of peace." WRC-TV Washington (6/15, 6:02 p.m.) also had a report.

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, 7:22 p.m.) and MSNBC (6/15, 2:46 p.m.) ran brief reports on the event. CNN (6/15, 2:13 p.m.) also interviewed Joey Rickets, "a boy scout from Lynchburg, Virginia" who "has his own plans for a 9/11 memorial."

On CNN (6/15, 1:18 p.m.), reporter Barbara Starr said, "This is not a day for politics, of course, but a day of remembrance. And what many people remember is that this building did not shut down. The headquarters of the U.S. Military, attacked, in flames, people, of course were tending to the dead and the wounded, but this building did not shut down, it kept going. And one of the major reasons this building kept going was because Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld flat-out refused to leave. There was certainly advice to do that. He didn't leave. That meant his top staff didn't leave. The view here, if they were going down, they were all going down together." Starr also said, "Secretary Rumsfeld and his wife made a very significant private contribution to this memorial."

Pataki, Bloomberg Hear Recommendations For WTC Memorial. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "The World Trade Center Memorial faces simplification of its design, including moving carved-in-stone names of Sept. 11 victims to ground level, possibly eliminating or scaling back waterfalls and reducing the size of a museum." Those were among "the recommendations made yesterday to New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg in a closed-door meeting, according to people close to the situation. A formal report on the redesign will be released next week."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Measure As Both Chambers Debate War. The AP (6/16, Sidoti) reports, "Congress plunged into divisive election-year debate on the Iraq war Thursday as the US military death toll reached 2,500. The Senate soundly rejected a call to withdraw combat troops by year's end, and House Republicans laid the groundwork for their own vote. In a move Democrats criticized as gamesmanship, Senate Republicans brought up the withdrawal measure and quickly dispatched it -- for now -- on a 93-6 vote." Across Capitol Hill "in a daylong House debate," Republicans "defended the Iraq war as a key part of the global fight against terrorism while Democrats assailed President Bush's war policies and called for a new direction in the conflict."

The Washington Times (6/16, Bellantoni, 90K) says Republicans "attempted to embarrass Sen. John Kerry by forcing a vote on a measure identical to one he had drafted calling for troop withdrawal by the end of 2006. Senators opposed the measure on a 93-6 vote, which was forced to the Senate floor by Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican." Kerry "said he is crafting the withdrawal proposal with other Democrats, and said he was frustrated at what he called political games by the Republicans." Majority Leader Bill Frist said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/15) that the Senate vote "was 93-6 about cutting and running in Iraq. I think it does help the American people crystallize where they are, by looking where their representatives are. So the cut and run amendment came to the floor of the Senate about two hours ago and in terms of tabling it, overwhelmingly 93-6 is the support of staying the course there and supporting that democracy until they can take over their own security."

The debate on both chambers of Congress is receiving extensive media coverage, much of it describing it with adjectives such as "heated," "fierce" or "raucous." Media accounts depict both parties as seeking the political edge on the issue with eye on the November elections. Republicans are portrayed as seizing "the initiative," though some analysts believe their strategy very risky. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Rogers, 2.11M) says Republicans "seized the offensive, taking advantage of divisions among Democrats to force quick votes against withdrawal." But "on the day that U.S. troop deaths in Iraq reached 2,500, the partisan tone distressed members in both parties and could create a backlash against the majority."

DOJ_NMG_0034567

The New York Times (6/16, Toner, Zernike, 1.19M) says the House debate "came after three days in which President Bush and his aides had sought to portray Iraq as moving gradually toward a stable, functioning democracy, and to portray Democrats as lacking the will to see the conflict through to victory." Democrats, throughout the day, "countered, at times with barely controlled fury." The AP (6/16, Sidoti) says the House "erupted in impassioned, election year debate over Iraq war." The war was "a grotesque mistake," said the Democratic leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi," adding that "the Administration continues to dig a hole. They refuse to come up and see the light."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Reynolds, 958K) notes the "rancor" in both chambers, adding "many Republicans believe that discussing the war works to their party's favor politically, allowing them to press the assertion that Democrats are weak and indecisive on national security issues." In a news analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/16, Brownstein, 958K) says the "new Republican drive to focus attention on the Iraq war represents a high-stakes gamble: that doubts about the direction Democrats might set on national security exceed anxieties about the course charted by…Bush." The Times adds Republicans "are aiming to portray Democrats as too soft and too divided to steer the Iraq conflict to a successful conclusion." But "in the process, Republicans risk deepening their identification with a war that, surveys show, still sparks skepticism and concern among most Americans."

USA Today (6/16, Stone, 2.31M) reports John Pitney, a political scientist at California's Claremont McKenna College, "said that while the strategy 'diminishes the Democratic advantage on the issue,' speeches aren't enough. 'The situation in Iraq would have to improve dramatically before it became a net plus for the GOP,' he said."

ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said the Iraq debate "will shape this year's congressional elections. Republicans in the House arguing the war is critical on the war on terror." Rep. Rick Renzi: "This is about taking the fight to those who will strike America again and will wound this nation and kill our innocent civilians. America must endure, endure and prevail." Rep. Charles Norwood: "Many, not all, but on the other side of the aisle, lack the will to win. The American people needs to no precisely who they are. The public can decide the course of this war in November, by hopefully throwing the defeatists out of office." Gibson: "Democrats fired back, branding the President's handling of the war a failure." Rep. John Murtha: "I know what rhetoric is. And I know what fighting in the front lines are. I know the difference between them. I know standing here does not solve the problem. It hasn't gotten better. It's gotten worse. That's the problem."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 3, 1:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A fierce debate over the war broke out in both the House and the Senate today, and the House Republicans defended the war, and the Senate, by a 93-6 vote, turned back a proposal to bring home American troops by the end of the year." CBS (Attkisson) added, "In the House, think of it not so much as a real debate with a real chance of changing anything in the war on Iraq. It's more of a political dare, a nonbinding resolution that Republicans are putting to a vote, calling for the US to stand firm in Iraq and the war on terror, and who in their right mind would vote against that?" But Democrats "argued that a timeframe for getting US troops out is what's needed, rather than a symbolic vote in favor of victory." To "counter arguments from war opponents like John Murtha, the Pentagon handed out this unusual debate prep book to congressional supporters, and it suggests things that they could say in the floor debate."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 6, 2:05, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "In a debate that ranged from raucous to solemn, supporters of the Iraq war, mostly Republicans, called for total defeat of a brutal enemy." Rep. Mike Rogers, Michigan: "They'll behead you, they'll shoot you, they'll blow you up; they don't care." Rep. Henry Hyde, Illinois: "To trust our fate to those who would destroy us is to die." Reid: "The only option, they said, is to stay the course." There was "agreement on one thing, a moment of silence to honor Americans who've died in Iraq. But critics of the war, mostly Democrats, said the growing death toll is one of the best reasons for getting the troops out." Rep. John Murtha, Pennsylvania: "Americans are realizing there is a better way to support our troops than just sending more of them off to be killed."

The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Weisman, Babington, 744K) says that "though the day's rhetoric was often partisan in tone, the discontent over the status quo in Iraq was evident on both sides. Dozens of lawmakers spoke emotionally -- recriminations mixed with appeals to patriotism -- on how the nation should proceed in the three-year-old conflict that has become more protracted, deadly and complex than most of them had expected at its outset."

DOJ_NMG_0034568

A similar analysis in the Chicago Tribune (6/16, Zuckman, 643K) says Democrats "are trying to capitalize on voters' disenchantment, while Republicans are trying to portray themselves as resolute and strong." House Speaker Dennis Hastert was first to speak in the House debate, "casting the debate in sweeping, historic terms as a means to protect Americans from terrorists at home and to nurture a way of life." Democrats, however, "called the proceedings undemocratic because Republicans would not allow them to offer amendments. And they accused the president of politicizing intelligence, barreling into the war without a plan and making repeated mistakes along the way." Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan, for example, said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/15), "I think, frankly, we should have had a discussion about the war in Iraq. We should have discussed oversight of the war in Iraq and we should have had a real debate. There are no other options. It's not a debate when the Republican leadership that control the Senate, the House, and the White House say, you vote up or down."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Blitzer) spoke of a "bitter war of words" in both chambers, adding that in the House "the sparks…were flying." Knight Ridder (6/16, Kuhnhenn, Douglas) disagrees with the other characterization of the House debate. It was an "election-year debate…freighted with politics," as Republicans "seized on recent upbeat news from Iraq to portray Democratic calls for troop withdrawals as a policy of 'cut and run.'" Yet "for all the political overtones, the tone of the House debate was strikingly civil, sober and morally serious." Knight Ridder also says, "The Democrats' stance against Bush belied deep divisions within their party on whether to withdraw from Iraq, and if so, how fast. In the Senate, an expected debate on a Democratic measure calling for gradual withdrawal wallowed on hold all day amid disputes among Democrats over the precise language of their proposal."

Meanwhile, a Washington Post (6/16, A2, 744K) piece by Dana Milbank takes a rather flippant look at Cher's attendance of a House Armed Services subcommittee meeting. The singer is an activist for a group that provides helmets to soldiers in Iraq. Milbank writes that "everybody was performing his own version of 'If I Could Turn Back Time'" Thursday, with the House spending "10 hours re-debating the decision to invade Iraq in 2003 -- at least until several of them left for a picnic at the White House."

Pentagon Aide Mistakenly Distributed Iraq Debate Document. The Washington Post (6/16, A23, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that it "seems Traci Scott, who works in the Pentagon's legislative affairs office, sent an e-mail Wednesday to a group of Hill folks with an attachment titled 'Iraq Floor Debate Prep Book.' The 74-page attachment, just in time for the House floor debate yesterday, is full of great facts and fine political arguments. Section 3, for example, 'Victory in Iraq,' summarizes Saddam Hussein's 'support for terrorist groups' and 'his defiance of the world community' and how he 'wanted WMD.'" Though "coming from the Pentagon, the prep book reads like a White House playbook -- which, a Pentagon spokesman said, it is." The document "rebuts all those arguments from the 'cut and run' crowd about prewar intelligence manipulation, or how the war in Iraq has made the world more dangerous for Americans. Problem is that the e-mail was sent to some of those cutters and runners."

More Commentary. Democratic Rep. John Murtha writes in USA Today (6/16, 2.31M), "Iraq is not the center of the global war on terrorism, and nor is it overwhelmed by foreign terrorist groups, as this administration would like Americans to believe. … The American people are not naive. They know a failed policy when they see one. Iraq is a failed policy. It's time to redeploy." In an editorial, USA Today (6/16, 2.31M) disagrees, saying "US troops should not stay in Iraq, as in Vietnam, purely for pride in a hopeless battle. They should remain, however, as long as there is a reasonable chance that they can bring some stability, reinforce the fledgling democratic government and prevent Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists. Announcing a timetable for withdrawal…would just invite the insurgents to wait out the American presence."

Nina Kamp and Michael O'Hanlon, of the Brookings Institution in Washington, and Amy Unikewicz, a graphic designer in South Norwalk, CT, write in the New York Times (6/16, 1.19M), "Those looking for signs of promise in Iraq can still find footholds beyond the killing of the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The security forces, particularly the Iraqi Army, continue to improve in technical proficiency -- even if their interethnic cohesiveness remains suspect. Reductions in consumer subsidies have strengthened the financial standing of the government, and high oil prices compensate for Iraq's anemic production levels." But "overall, it is increasingly hard to describe Iraq as a glass half-full."

In the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K), Eugene Robinson writes, "Iraq is just one theater in Bush's 'war.' Elsewhere, Afghanistan is once again ablaze as the resurgent Taliban counterattacks. Somalia is coming under the sway of an Islamic militia that may harbor al-Qaeda militants. America's popularity in the world continues to fall." But Bush "forges ahead, trying vainly to kill a poisonous, retrograde ideology with bullets and bombs. His 'war' is self-perpetuating, and no one even knows what victory would look like. Long after he's gone, we'll still be looking for a way to end the mess he began."

DOJ_NMG_0034569

Purported Al Qaeda Documents Suggest US Counter-Insurgency Effort Working. The Iraqi national security adviser, Mowafak al Rubaie, yesterday released documents attributed to al Qaeda in Iraq that suggest the insurgents felt the US and Iraqi forces had gained the upper hand. However, some experts questioned the authenticity of the documents. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "To prevent a strong leader from emerging, the Iraqi government today tried to demoralize al Qaeda. The government released a document it claimed was found at an al Qaeda safe house." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Advisor: "This is the beginning of the end of al Qaeda in Iraq." Engel: "The purported al Qaeda document complains about US and Iraqi successes in killing their leaders and cutting off finances. It suggests trying to bog down American troops by triggering an American war with Iran. It would be a major coup, a terror blueprint uncovered, but tonight some US officials are skeptical of authenticity and origin."

ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 6, 2:45, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "The documents, if they are authentic, suggest that the US strategy in Iraq is working extremely well, in almost every respect. But there are questions being raised about authenticity." One document describe what it calls "'the current bleak situation,' and says, 'Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance.'" But US officials "said the document was not, in fact, found on or near Zarqawi's body, but in a raid three weeks earlier on other targets." On the CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M), Mouwafak Al-Rubaie was shown saying, "We believe that this is the beginning of the end of al Qaeda in Iraq."

The AP (6/16, Quinn) reports "there was no way to confirm the authenticity of the information attributed to al-Qaida, and U.S. and Iraqi officials offered conflicting accounts of when and where it was seized." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office "said Iraqi forces found the document in al-Zarqawi's hideout after the June 7 U.S. airstrike that killed him." However, US Maj. Gen. William Caldwell "said the document had been taken from a computer in a raid during the three-week operation to track down al-Zarqawi." Caldwell "said sweeps across Iraq since al-Zarqawi's death led to 28 significant arms caches. He said the raids included 255 joint operations and 143 by Iraqi forces alone." The Al Qaeda document "said its insurgency was being hurt by an increase in U.S.-trained Iraqi forces, by widespread arrests and seizures of weapons, and by a crackdown on financial outlets."

USA Today (6/16, Soriano, 2.31M) says "a copy of the original document, handwritten in Arabic, was provided to USA TODAY by al-Rubaie. He also released an English translation. … It is not clear who wrote the document. The US military says it appears to be from someone influential in al-Qaeda's Iraq operation. '"It seems to be from an author who has insight from within al-Qaeda because a number of strategies and tactics are noted,' said Navy Lt. Christina Skacan, a military spokeswoman."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Peterson, 61K) runs a similar story titled "Picture Of A Weakened Iraqi Insurgency," in which it also says the document "could not be independently authenticated."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Vause) reported, "While CNN cannot verify the authenticity, there are extensive details of al Qaeda's concern over the growing number of Iraqi forces, the inability to attract new recruits, confiscation of weapons and ammunition, and a squeeze on funds."

Harman Calls Zarqawi Killing "Huge Tactical Victory." Rep. Jane Harman said on Fox News' The Big Story with John Gibson (6/15), "I think the takedown of Zarqawi was a huge tactical victory. I want to commend those who did it. It really was the kind of intelligence action we need to see more of and it also was a tribute to the Iraqis who originally tipped us off to this spiritual healer whom we traced and then he led us to Zarqawi."

Document Says Terrorists Considered Trying To Trigger US War Against Iran. USA Today (6/16, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "A captured al-Qaeda in Iraq document says the terrorist group considered drawing the United States into a war with Iran in order to undermine the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in weakening the organization."

The Washington Times (6/16, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The group's major goal is to get the US involved in a new war, this one against the Shi'ites in Iraq and Iran, and to provoke another war between Iraqi Shi'ites and Sunni countries in the Middle East. One option, the paper says, is to blow up targets in the West and plant evidence that the bombing was done by Iranians."

DOJ_NMG_0034570

US Death Toll In Iraq Reaches "Sad Benchmark" Of 2,500 Dead. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is a sad milestone to be noted in the Iraq war. The Pentagon announced today that 2,500 American servicemen and women have now died in Iraq. On Capitol Hill, both the House and the Senate stood and observed a moment of silence."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 3, 0:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Today, the US death toll reached 2,500. The President's spokesman called the milestone a 'sad benchmark' and said that President Bush is committed to insuring no American sacrifice will be in vain."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was also a grim milestone today. US military deaths in Iraq now total 2,500. White House press secretary Tony Snow called it a sad benchmark."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Blitzer) also referred to "another grim milestone." Knight Ridder (6/16, Brown, Youssef) reports on the "death toll in Iraq," while the AP (6/16, Raum) says "the story of the Iraq war can be told in stark numbers and mournful milestones as the death toll for US troops reached 2,500 on Thursday and the price tag rose to $320 billion."

Suicide Attack On Shiite Mosque Kills At Least Seven. The AP (6/16) is reporting this morning, "A suicide bomber struck a Shiite mosque during Friday prayers in Baghdad, killing at least seven people and wounding 18, police said, as violence persisted despite a driving ban and increased security measures aimed at restoring order in the capital." The attacker "was wearing an explosives belt and blew himself up at the Buratha mosque in northern Baghdad, police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said."

More Sectarian Killings Reported In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The US military and Iraqi governments are now focused on stopping al Qaeda in Iraq from recovering after Zarqawi's death, but the daily sectarian killings here seem to be continuing unaffected. More killing on both sides today -- gunmen in Tikrit shot dead four Sunni worshipers in a mosque. In Baquba, ten Shiite workers were forced off a bus and executed."

Iraqi Prime Minister Indicates Government May Offer Limited Amnesty To Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's prime minister, though, did indicate that he would be willing to offer a limited amnesty program for some of those insurgents, but late tonight, especially after the Pentagon announced that the official US military death toll here in Iraq had topped 2500, both US and Iraqi officials were quick to insist that amnesty would not be extended to anyone found guilty of killing either US troops or Iraqi civilians."

Maliki Accepts Resignation Of Aide Who Discussed Amnesty. The Washington Post (6/16, A22, Knickmeyer, Finer, 744K) reports, "Maliki's office on Thursday accepted the resignation of an aide who had told a reporter that Maliki was considering a limited amnesty that would likely include guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops, the aide said." The aide, "Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, stood by his account of amnesty considerations." He "said Maliki had indicated the same position less directly in public." The Prime Minister's office earlier Thursday issued a statement saying, "Mr. Adnan Kadhimi doesn't represent the Iraqi government in this issue, and Mr. Kadhimi is not an advisor or spokesman for the prime minister."

US Transition Teams Aid Iraqi Troops In Baghdad Crackdown. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 5, 1:50, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Trying to stop the insurgency from disrupting daily life in Baghdad is the focus of a new US-Iraqi campaign that's now underway." NBC (Boettcher) added, "Tanks roaring down a crowded Baghdad street today, intimidating but mostly symbolic in Iraq's new operation, Together Forward, intended to secure Baghdad from insurgents. But a more realistic way of defeating the insurgency, according to senior US military officers, is with this strategy -- Iraqi troops on the ground advised by small numbers of American soldiers called military transition, or MiTT teams. We traveled with this US Army team from the 101st Airborne Division, which constantly questions and prods units of Iraq's new army." Their job, "mentor a growing but still immature military force and to win their loyalty. The MiTT teams say one of the biggest problems they face is to get the Iraqi army to be proactive rather than reactive, be the hunter, not the hunted."

DOJ_NMG_0034571

US Commanders Release Photo Of New Al Qaeda In Iraq Leader. The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time, US military commanders revealed the face of the man they believe is the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, a wide-eyed Egyptian named Abu Ayyub al-Masri, with a resume of violence that is decades long."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported the military "says al-Masri is in his 30s, trained in Afghanistan, is an expert in making car bombs and an associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, but there are still power struggles within al Qaeda here. Some are not convinced al-Masri is going to be Iraq's next top terror leader." Stephen Hadley, US National Security Advisor: "That's clearly one of the leading names, but we're going to need a little bit of time."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 2, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "CBS consultant and former CIA analyst, Michael Scheuer, believes al-Masri is Osama bin Laden's personal choice to replace Zarqawi." Michael Scheuer, CBS News analyst: "Bin Laden's choice for major military commanders have always been Egyptian, and if this man – if this man is an Egyptian, al-Masri means Egyptian, then I would – I would imagine it is bin Laden's direct choice."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) reports Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for US-led forces in Iraq, "said US officials debated for days before deciding to release the photo and a brief biographical sketch of the alleged insurgent leader. They worried that bolstering his media profile would play into his hands." The AP (6/16, Gamel, Thayer), New York Times (6/16, Filkins, 1.19M) and Washington Post (6/16, Knickmeyer, Wilgoren, 744K) run similar reports.

Shiite Militias Said To Control Iraqi Prison System. The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Finer, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "Iraq's prison system is overrun with Shiite Muslim militiamen who have freed fellow militia members convicted of major crimes and executed Sunni Arab inmates, the country's deputy justice minister said in an interview this week." Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, an ethnic Kurd, said, "We cannot control the prisons. It's as simple as that. … Our jails are infiltrated by the militias from top to bottom, from Basra to Baghdad." The Post adds, "As a result, Yei has asked US authorities to suspend plans to transfer prisons and detainees from American to Iraqi control."

489 Released From Abu Ghraib. The Washington Post (6/16, A22, Partlow, 744K) reports on the "489 detainees who walked under a harsh sun out of the chain-link pen at Iraq's most infamous prison. The mass release, part of a larger plan to free 2,500 prisoners this month, is intended to bolster Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's efforts to defuse the Sunni Arab insurgency. … The prisoner release on Thursday was the third this month. Before walking out in single file, the men stood quietly behind the fence as Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie addressed them from atop a wooden platform."

Alleged Iraq Agent Charged With Lying To FBI About Oil-For-Food Role. The AP (6/16) reports, "A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food scandal has been charged with lying to the FBI. On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned an indictment accusing Tongsun Park of falsely telling investigators in 2004 that he played no role more than a decade ago in the adoption of the U.N. resolution that set up the oil-for-food program." The new "indictment also says Park made false statements when he said he had no business dealings with an unidentified U.N. official, and when he told the FBI that he did not exchange money with an unidentified Iraqi-American, and that he had never been to that person's office." Bloomberg (6/15, O'Reilly) noted that Park, "accused of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq, was charged in a new case with making false statements to the FBI.

Military Investigates Killing Of Three Civilians At Northern Iraq Checkpoint. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Barnes, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The US military is investigating the killing of three Iraqi civilians by American forces in northern Iraq." The inquiry into the May 9 deaths "was requested by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq." The military is investigating whether the Iraqis who were killed "were threatening American troops or whether the troops acted improperly and had no cause to use force against the civilians."

DOJ_NMG_0034572

Sources Expect Marines To Face Charges Over Haditha Incident. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "As more reporters travel to Haditha…the stories about what U.S. Marines did in the town Nov. 19 get more and more gruesome. Defense attorneys deny assertions by some residents that Marines lined up unarmed civilians and executed them. They say the Marines of Kilo Company, after being fired upon, did three house-clearing operations in which civilians, and suspected insurgents, some armed, some not, were killed. Some of the 24 were women and children. … Marine Corps defenders also are questioning the authenticity of a video, purportedly of the victims and made by a Sunni man. They question why the images did not surface until months afterward. Still, sources close to the case expect Marines to face criminal charges once an investigation is complete."

62% Believe Haditha Deaths Will Harm US Relationship With Muslim World. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "In Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 62% say reported massacre of Iraqi civilians will harm U.S. relationship with Muslim world. But by 49%-33%, they want reprimands rather than criminal charges." The Journal adds, "Optimism rises after Zarqawi's death, but 57% still want US forces cut."

General Leading Investigation Praised. The Washington Post (6/16, A8, Tyson, 744K) runs a story titled "General Leading Haditha Probe Known For Integrity, Toughness," in which it says "the two-star Army general leading the main inquiry into the killings of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is a decorated Delta Force operative known among his peers for integrity and uncanny judgment in combat." Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell "rose from a Special Forces staff sergeant in Vietnam to commander of the secretive Delta Force, earning a reputation as an unusually skilled fighter who bluntly confronted superiors to get what he needed for his men. He is one of the Army's most highly decorated soldiers on active duty."

US Reservist Becomes Attraction On Armed Forces Radio In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 11, 2:25, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Finally tonight, an unlikely star emerging from the war in Iraq. She is southern comfort to the troops on the front lines. They are tuning in like crazy to a girl from Louisiana who is sharing her love for country music and providing just the right distraction." NBC (Maceda) added, "What gets an American soldier in Iraq through his dangerous day? If he hails from the South or the West, it's likely to be..." Specialist Kristen King: "You've got Specialist Kristen King on Freedom Radio, AFN, Iraq. If you've got a request, go ahead and get those in to me now." Maceda: "In only weeks, this 21-year-old Louisiana deejay, a compact bundle of energy has become a phenomenon. Her live, 4-hour, one-woman Armed Forces radio show, called 'Country Convoy', is the most listened to English language program in Iraq, a high-charged mix of country hits and homey chat, weather reports, and public service announcements."

Louisiana Center Prepares Soldiers For Iraqi Battlefield. The Washington Times (6/16, Axe, 90K) profiles a "combat readiness training center" at Fort Polk in Louisiana, reporting, "the focus of the training is fighting insurgents in crowded Iraqi villages with cultural sensitivity and limiting civilian casualties. A cluster of fabricated neighborhoods represents Iraq's chaotic urban battlefield. Combat brigades numbering as many as 5,000 soldiers spend three weeks living and fighting there." Soldiers have complained that the training "is harder than combat in Iraq. Center commander Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero says that is the point." The Times reports, "With the spread of small wars and insurgencies like those in Iraq and Afghanistan, …winning hearts and minds is as important as winning firefights."

Bomb Kills Eight On Bus Taking Workers To Afghan Air Base. The New York Times (6/16, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "A bomb exploded on a bus taking workers to the United States military air base at Kandahar in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing 8 people and wounding at least 16 others, among them 4 children." The "bomb was the first specifically directed at civilians working at the base." The Times says, "NATO troops are taking over military command of southern Afghanistan from American forces and Taliban insurgents appear intent on disrupting the transfer."

Taliban's Appeal Grows In Pakistani Tribal Areas. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Montero, 61K) reports that in Pakistan's Federally Administered Tribal Areas "the tribal system, once strong and proud, is now falling apart," leading many young people to embrace the Taliban. The tribal areas' "problems were exacerbated when the Pakistani military entered the tribal areas for the first time in 2003." The Monitor reports, "In such strife, pragmatism draws young people to the Taliban. They are building a new form of social capital, a network that offers the opportunities and prestige that the tribal system once did." The integration of the tribal areas with the rest of Pakistan is "a dream shared by many, and perhaps the best way to dampen the appeal of groups like the Taliban, analysts say."

DOJ_NMG_0034573

Pet Projects Said To Trump Strategic Priorities In Defense Spending Boom. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Karp, 2.11M) reports "the US defense machine is still churning out weapons made for old-style, conventional conflicts, even as it needs new tools to battle terrorists and insurgents. One big reason is the sclerotic nature of the procurement process, in which the military, the White House, the defense industry and Congress fight for pet projects that aren't always in synch with strategic priorities." Although the increase in defense spending "has been a blessing" for Lockheed Martin, Northrop Grumman, General Dynamics, and Boeing, "it has done little to change the military." The Journal reports, "Military budgets have long been shaped by pork and pet projects," but "[t]he problem is particularly acute right now because of the huge increase in defense spending and the Pentagon's new strategic shift to fight terrorism."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud. The Washington Post (6/16, Hilzenrath, Shin, 744K) reports Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd "came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud." Mudd was "chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses." Sen. Chuck Hagel said, "I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution. Have you thought about resigning?" The Post adds Mudd, who was "promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like 'the old Fannie Mae' any more than Hagel did and was 'as shocked as anyone' when Fannie's accounting problems came to light." Mudd said he "thought about leaving but is 'not a quitter' and stayed to fix Fannie's problems. Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision."

Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit." Pressuring the company "to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges." But Democrats "on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing."

Enron Defense Firm Still Waiting For Fees. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Johnson) reports, "To the list of employees, investors and businesses who suffered financial misfortune in Enron Corp.'s demise, add this one: the law firm defending former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling." The Post continues, "Los Angeles-based O'Melveny & Myers LLP, which has represented Skilling on both civil and criminal charges since 2001, collected what in a typical case would be a fat payday: $23 million from its client and $17 million more from his insurance policies. … But, true to form, Enron is still destroying financial expectations. Even before the trial began in January, Skilling's team of more than 20 lawyers, paralegals and support staff burned through those funds, leaving the law firm holding the bag for 'multiple tens of millions' of dollars in unpaid fees and expenses racked up during the four-month trial, Skilling's lead defense lawyer said. While Daniel M. Petrocelli declined to provide an exact tally, one source put the price tag at more than $25 million on top of the $40 million O'Melveny already collected." The Post adds, "The trial, which culminated in the convictions of Skilling and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay last month, featured 56 witnesses and some of the most sophisticated business deals ever to make their way into a courtroom. The Skilling defense, which experts say may be one of the most expensive in history, is a case study in how high the stakes can rise in white-collar criminal representation. … 'This is almost a carte blanche to the lawyers: Do everything you can to keep me out of jail,' said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control Inc., a New Jersey firm that monitors legal fees in bankruptcies and for Fortune 500 clients. 'Very little thought is given to cost. It is not a concern.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034574

Former HealthSouth Executive Sentenced To Eight Years. The Wall Street Journal (6/16) reports, "The only HealthSouth Corp. executive convicted by jurors in a $2.7 billion fraud was sentenced to eight years in federal prison Thursday, the longest term given to anyone in the huge accounting scam at the rehabilitation chain." The Journal continues, "Hannibal 'Sonny' Crumpler, a former vice president and division controller, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Virginia Emerson Hopkins after the defense urged her to impose probation or a combination of house arrest and parole. Mr. Crumpler's attorneys said they may appeal. … Prosecutors sought a far tougher penalty, asking the judge to send Mr. Crumpler to prison for 15 years on his conviction on charges of conspiracy and making false statements to auditors. They described the sentence as too lenient." The Journal adds, "Fifteen former HealthSouth executives avoided trial by pleading guilty in plea deals, and fired Chief Executive Richard Scrushy was acquitted on all charges a year ago after a six-month trial. Mr. Crumpler also opted for a trial but was convicted in November. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Crumpler was in on the fraud while at HealthSouth and maintained a role even after he became finance chief at a related company, Source Medical Solutions. While at Source Medical, Mr. Crumpler sent HealthSouth auditors a letter overstating Source Medical's debt to HealthSouth by $20 million, prosecutors said."

US Subpoenas Medarex In Option Backdating Probe. The AP (6/16) reports, "Biotech company Medarex Inc. said Thursday it recently received a a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey over the timing of its stock options grants." The AP continues, "The company has already received a letter of informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over the matter. Medarex said it is cooperating fully with both investigations. … In addition, Medarex said two shareholder derivative lawsuits have been filed in New Jersey, naming the company and certain current and former directors and officers as defendants. Medarex said the lawsuits allege breach of fiduciary duty associated with its stock options grants practices, as well as federal securities laws violations. The lawsuits seek unspecified damages." The AP adds, "More than 40 companies are under SEC or Justice Department investigations looking into whether executives backdated stock options grants."

EMI Settles Payola Probe With Spitzer For $3.75 Million. The AP (6/16, Gormley) reports, "EMI Music North America, the third largest recording label in the world, has settled for $3.75 million a pay-for-play investigation into radio air time sold or traded to benefit artists including the Rolling Stones, Coldplay and Norah Jones." The AP continues, "The settlement was the latest during more than two years of a 'payola' investigation by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'When a record label engages in an elaborate scheme to purchase air time for its artists, it violates state and federal law and presents consumers with a skewed picture of the country's proclaimed "best" and "most popular" music,' Spitzer said." The AP adds, "He said payola - a term coined during a 1950s scandal combining the words pay and Victrola, an early record player - also hurts struggling artists who are not judged on the merits of their music. … Spitzer said the compensation for radio airplay was paid by EMI, which includes Virgin Records America, Capitol Records, EMI Christian Music Group and S Curve Records. One deal included tickets to a Rolling Stones concert in Toronto that were given to a radio program director for his personal use."

Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit." Pressuring the company "to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges." But Democrats "on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing."

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud. The Washington Post (6/16, Hilzenrath, Shin, 744K) reports

DOJ_NMG_0034575

Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd "came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud." Mudd was "chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses." Sen. Chuck Hagel said, "I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution. Have you thought about resigning?" The Post adds Mudd, who was "promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like 'the old Fannie Mae' any more than Hagel did and was 'as shocked as anyone' when Fannie's accounting problems came to light." Mudd said he "thought about leaving but is 'not a quitter' and stayed to fix Fannie's problems. Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision."

Accountant Firms Prove To Be Financial Beneficiaries Of Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (6/16, Guerrera) reports, "Accountancy firms have emerged as surprise long-lasting beneficiaries of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, as US-listed companies have been forced to pay their auditors larger fees to comply with the tough corporate governance rules, according to a new study" by the law firm Foley & Lardner. The Times notes, "US-listed companies paid auditors $4.9m (€3.9m) on average in 2005, 3 per cent more than in 2004 and 11 per cent more than in 2001, the year before the passage of the Act, according to the study which analysed public findings from more than 850 US-listed companies. The rise in total fees came despite a dramatic fall in non-audit fees as companies hired third-party consultants to avoid conflicts of interest. Non-audit fees paid by US companies fell 42 per cent in 2005, contributing to a 97 per cent collapse in these type of payments to accountancy firms since 2001. 'This decline in other fees has been more than made up by a rise in audit fees,' said Thomas Hartman at Foley & Lardner. 'Companies are paying the same amount, or more, to their auditors as they were before Sarbanes-Oxley.'"

WSJournal Weighs In On Milberg Weiss Indictments. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) says in an editorial that Rep. Charles Rangel "was in full voice this week -- along with fellow New York Democrats Carolyn McCarthy and Gary Ackerman, as well as Florida's Robert Wexler -- about the injustice federal prosecutors had visited on plaintiffs' firm Milberg Weiss. The four released a statement lambasting Justice for going after the 'entire' firm rather than just the partners accused of wrongdoing, claiming this could rob 'average' citizens of Milberg's services." The Journal adds, "We couldn't have said it better, though we've been saying exactly that for years -- ever since the Justice Department in 2003 issued new guidelines, via the 'Thompson memo,' on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations." Federal prosecutors have "since threatened to destroy any company that doesn't 'cooperate' by waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off accused employees from legal support. Milberg Weiss stood by its due-process rights, and duly received a potential corporate death sentence."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Democrats Vote 99-58 To Remove Jefferson From Ways And Means. After a three-hour, closed-door meeting last night, the House Democratic Caucus voted 99-58 to remove Rep. William Jefferson from his seat on the Ways and Means Committee in light of the ongoing FBI bribery investigation. If Jefferson does not voluntarily quit the committee, the question will move to the full House for a final vote.

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Espo) notes that Democrats were "determined to make an election-year point about ethics" and reports, "The rank and file acted despite a last-minute plea by the embattled Louisiana lawmaker and persistent complaints from the Congressional Black Caucus that there was neither rule nor precedent for the action." After the vote, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said, "This isn't about proof in a court of law. This is about an ethical standard. I wish the White House would follow our lead on this."

USA Today (6/16, 4A, 2.31M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, and the Baton Rouge Advocate (6/16, Shields) calls the vote "an unprecedented move" and reports, "Pelosi had called on Jefferson to observe the 'high ethical standard of the House Democratic caucus,'" but last night, she "did not gloat. 'It's not about victory,' Pelosi said. 'It's very sad. Our Democratic caucus said it would hold a high ethical standard, and now we're doing it.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034576

The New York Times (6/16, Zernike, 1.19M) adds that the Democrats voted to remove Jefferson "as they tried to avoid any taint of scandal in a year when they want to ride accusations of Republican corruption to election victories. … Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus have supported Mr. Jefferson," but Pelosi said that Jefferson "had been afforded due process," and she "sought to draw a line between Republican scandals and what she called 'individual mistakes.'" Pelosi added, "The entire Republican caucus condoned, enabled and benefited from the culture of corruption, and that is what I will continue to rail against."

The Washington Post (6/16, Murray, 744K) also reports Pelosi "sought to take a strong election-year stance on ethics, while Jefferson's allies -- mainly fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus -- protested that he was being singled out for unfair treatment." CBC "members said their concern was the lack of any rule pertaining to lawmakers in Jefferson's situation. He has not been indicted in the case but could face serious charges." The Post notes, "The pressure from Pelosi and others was stepped up when the FBI revealed it videotaped Jefferson accepting $100,000 in $100 bills from a government witness."

The Washington Times (6/16, DeBose, 90K) reports Pelosi "denied any racial bias in her effort to oust Mr. Jefferson but not Rep. Alan B. Mollohan…who is white and is suspected of using his House Appropriations Committee seat to funnel money and contracts to numerous nonprofit groups and a business-partner relative. … 'Mr. Jefferson has had two people plead guilty to bribing him,' she said. 'We don't know if Mr. Mollohan is even being investigated.'"

Under the headline "Black Caucus Opposes Democrats' Move to Take Jefferson Off Key Committee," the Los Angeles Times (6/16, Hook,, 958K) notes, "Some Democrats have expressed concern that the dispute will undercut Pelosi's efforts to forge party cohesiveness in the House ahead of the 2006 elections. But she dismissed such worries. … 'We can withstand debate; it isn't stifled,'" Pelosi said after the vote.

CQ (6/16, Ferrechio) reports, "The next move is up to Rep. James E. Clyburn…who is a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. It would be Clyburn's responsibility as Democratic Caucus chairman to introduce a privileged resolution in the House calling for Jefferson's removal from the exclusive committee."

FBI Raid Pulls House General Counsel Office Into Limelight. The New York Times (6/16, von Zielbauer, 1.19M) reports that "the F.B.I.'s raid last month on the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson…has drawn" the House Office of the General Counsel "and the woman who leads it, Geraldine R. Gennet, into a rare public fight with the executive branch. … The Justice Department, which prevented lawyers from Ms. Gennet's office to be present during the search, has defended it as a perfectly legal act." But in support of Jefferson's suit to have the seized items returned, Gennet "filed a 90-page memorandum criticizing the raid as a 'grave threat'" to Congressional independence.

Judge To Hear Arguments In Jefferson Documents Lawsuit Today. MSNBC.com (6/15, Seidman) reports, "The federal judge who signed the search warrant allowing the FBI to enter…Jefferson's Capitol Hill office…will preside at a potentially contentious hearing Friday – a hearing pitting the executive and legislative branches of government in a showdown over the United States Constitution." MSNBC notes, "It is still not known exactly what was seized from Jefferson's office," because "the materials…have been kept on ice, so-to-speak. In a move designed to allow the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Justice Department enough time to try to resolve the issue, President George W. Bush ordered the seized material sealed and kept in the Solicitor General's office until mid-July."

Jury To Resume Deliberations In Safavian Case Today. The AP (6/16, Yost) reports the jury in the corruption case of former Bush Administration procurement official David Safavian "deliberated for a second day Thursday without reaching a verdict in the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." Jurors "are to resume on Friday trying to decide whether" Safavian "covered up his assistance to Republican influence-peddler Jack Abramoff."

Former Chicago Official Told FBI He Copied Hiring Files Out Of Fear For His Life. The Chicago Tribune (6/16, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "The former son-in-law of a prominent ex-alderman told federal investigators that he copied and saved city computer files 'because he was scared that he may be killed,' according to portions of an FBI interview cited Thursday in the City Hall corruption trial. Robert Koch, a former manager of city computer servers, said later that he may have exaggerated those fears." Koch "testified that he had files deleted at the behest of Mayor Richard Daley aide Robert Sorich in 1997. But under cross-examination by Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin, Koch acknowledged that he secretly saved a copy of the files from the mayor's office in his locker at a gym. 'You told the FBI you were afraid because you had been at family events with the Huelses and the Daleys where other people had talked about getting people knocked off?' Durkin asked. 'I'm not going to admit that,' Koch replied," but after Durkin showed him the FBI record of agents' meeting with him, "Koch finally acknowledged that he did express fear to authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0034577

FBI Agent Testifies About Conversation With Sorich About Hiring Records. The Chicago Tribune (6/16, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) also reports, "A veteran FBI agent testified later Thursday that he questioned Sorich about hiring records in preparation for the 1997 corruption trial of former Water Department Commissioner John Bolden. FBI Agent Reges Fay said that while investigating Bolden for taking kickbacks from Water Department job applicants, he learned Sorich might have had a role in the applicants' hiring. Sorich told Fay in a telephone conversation in 1997 that he referred 10 applicants to Bolden, Fay said. Sorich said the names came from local community leaders, and that his office kept no records of the applicants, Fay testified. Fay said Sorich provided him no other information about his alleged role in hiring applicants in Water or any other department."

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/16, Korecki, Warmbir) reports, "Durkin suggested Koch was trying to protect his father-in-law by saying he destroyed the files for Sorich." Then-Alderman Patrick Huels "was under FBI investigation after the Chicago Sun-Times exposed a questionable loan he received." But "Fay testified Thursday that the FBI didn't even open its investigation into Huels until October of 1997 -- about a month after Koch had the computer files destroyed."

Library Records Subpoenaed In FBI Investigation Of Suburban Chicago Mayor. The Niles Herald-Spectator (6/15, Johnson) reported, "The Niles Public Library was subpoenaed Monday by the U.S. Attorney's Office and told to supply all financial information regarding the library's dealings with the insurance agency of Ralph Weiner & Associates. Library Administrator Cary Czarnecki said staff is cooperating with authorities and in the process of gathering the required information. During an FBI investigation into possible fraudulent dealings involving Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase and the Weiner agency, agents raided the insurance company's Wheeling office June 6 and uncovered check vouchers for payments to S.M.P. Insurance Service, Inc., noting the Niles Public Library in the description line."

Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge Still At Large. The AP (6/16, Gardner) reports, "A man sought by police Thursday in the slaying of his estranged wife and the attack on a family court judge left a phone message saying he wanted 'the true story' to get out to the public, his cousin said." The AP continues, "Authorities have searched for Darren Mack since Monday when the judge was shot and wounded in his office by a sniper. Mack was charged the next day with murder in the stabbing death of Charla Mack, 39. … His cousin, Jeffrey Donner, said he received a phone message from Mack shortly after the shooting, saying, 'If anything happens to me, please make sure that the true story about the injustices that are going on in that courtroom get out to the media and the public.'" The AP adds, "Donner said his cousin had complained about Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling Mack's divorce case, for the past year and got the impression the judge was biased and made decisions before he heard all the facts. … 'He was just obsessed with bringing this judge down. Not physically. I never heard anything like that, but by reputation,' Donner said of Mack. … Police said Weller, 53, who was shot once in the chest, was released from the hospital on Tuesday to an undisclosed, secure location. … The Justice Department also charged Mack Thursday with unlawful flight to avoid prosecution."

DOJ Official Says Online Threats On The Rise. CNET News (6/16, Evers) reports, "Authorities are cracking down on phishing and botnets, but the threats are advancing instead of diminishing, two law enforcement officials said." CNET continues, "Cybercrooks are organizing better and moving to more sophisticated tactics to get their hands on confidential data and turn PCs of unwitting users into bots, representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Air Force Office of Special Investigations said in separate presentations here at the Computer Security Institute's NetSec event this week." CNET adds, "Law enforcement has had increased successes in catching, prosecuting and convicting phishers and bot herders over the past couple of years. However, catching the bad guys is getting tougher as the criminals become more professional, the representatives said. … 'We're seeing increasingly sophisticated groups online that are more indicative of crime groups,' Jonathan Rusch, special counsel for fraud prevention at the Justice Department, said in a presentation. The criminals who have been caught range from teenagers to retirees, he said. … Rusch spoke about phishing, a prevalent type of online attack that combines e-mail spam and fraudulent Web sites made to look like trusted sites, which are aimed at tricking a user into giving up sensitive information such as a credit card or Social Security number. Almost 17,500 phishing Web sites were reported to the Anti-Phishing Working Group in April. … A top phishing concern is the increased use of malicious software, Rusch said."

DOJ_NMG_0034578

Supreme Court Rules Evidence Seized In Searches Without Knocking Admissible. The Supreme Court yesterday announced a decision in a 4th Amendment case that increases the leeway of police in home searches. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 9, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government won a major Supreme Court victory today. The court ruled that police who have a warrant can break into homes and seize evidence even if they don't knock and identify themselves first. President Bush's two appointees sided with the majority as the court decided the case on a 5-4 vote."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 9, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is no dispute here that police in Detroit conducted an illegal search, violating the rule that requires them to knock first, announce what they are up to, and then wait a bit before barging in to protect the homeowner's privacy. In the past, the courts would have thrown out the evidence from such an illegal search, hoping to encourage police to follow the rules, but today the Supreme Court said excluding the evidence goes too far. The court said there are other ways to discourage police misconduct, such as a recent law that allows citizens to sue the police. The court split 5-4 on this with the two newest members in the majority, Sam Alito and the Chief Justice John Roberts. But the dissenters say this takes away the strongest incentive for getting the police to follow the knock-and-announce rule."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Savage, 958K) notes that in 1995, "the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually required officers to knock on the door and call out 'Police!' before they burst into a home. This rule helped protect the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then." Until now, however, "it was not clear whether the police would be penalized if they ignored this rule. Officers were told they should usually wait about 20 seconds after announcing their presence before they tried to enter a house. They may move faster if they suspect the residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet, the court said."

USA Today (6/16, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the decision "undercuts a nearly century-old rule that says evidence found during an unlawful search cannot be used." The decision also "offers a sign that the court might be more apt to strengthen the hand of police with Justice Samuel Alito in the place of retired justice Sandra Day O'Connor." The New York Times (6/16, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the "knock-and-announce" rule "dates to 13th-century England as protection against illegal entry by the police into private homes."

The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Lane, 744K) reports "the broadly worded majority opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., suggested that the nation has moved into a new era of improved policing in which such strong medicine may no longer be justified." The ruling "underscored the court's rightward shift."

The Legal Times (6/16, Mauro) reports, "Scalia's ruling was confined to the context of the knock-and-announce rule, but some elements of it could apply more broadly, possibly setting the stage for a future attack on the exclusionary rule, which excludes from use at trial any evidence that is illegally obtained by police. That rule, first established by the Supreme Court for federal courts in 1914 and applied to states in 1961, has been a hardy but controversial tool for discouraging police misconduct." The Times adds, "Law enforcement advocates applauded the ruling. 'Today's decision not to expand the exclusionary rule is very important to law enforcement,' said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. 'Justice is best served when juries are allowed to consider all relevant evidence.'"

The decision is generally being described as an expansion of police powers. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Richey, 61K), for example, titles its report "Supreme Court Gives Police More Power," with the AP (6/16, Holland), Los Angeles Times (6/16, Savage, 958K) and Washington Times (6/16, Seper, 90K) running similar stories.

Knight Ridder (6/16, Henderson) reports Justice Stephen Breyer "penned a sharp dissent that accused the court of misreading its own precedents and defying 'elementary logic.'" The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Bravin, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) notes the dissent "noted many exceptions to the knock-and-announce rule already exist, including when police reasonably suspect that obeying it would expose them to danger or allow suspects to destroy evidence."

DOJ_NMG_0034579

NYTimes, LATimes Criticize Decision. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "This decision should offend anyone, liberal or conservative, who worries about the privacy rights of ordinary Americans. … For those who worry that Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito will take the court in a radically conservative direction, it is sobering how easily the majority tossed aside a principle that traces back to 13th-century Britain, and a legal doctrine that dates to 1914, to let the government invade people's homes." Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) editorializes that "Scalia's opinion gives the police exactly" a "blank check by removing the best deterrent to police misconduct: the exclusion of evidence at trial."

Former Prosecutor Relishes Role In Recovering Roosevelt Pistol. Under the headline "A TR 'Nut' Savors His Big Find," the Philadelphia Inquirer (6/16, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "For 17 years, Robert Goldman policed the art world as a federal prosecutor based in Philadelphia. He helped recover $150 million worth of stolen artifacts," but "it wasn't until this week that Goldman snagged his white whale," Theodore Roosevelt's "priceless Colt revolver." Goldman told the Inquirer, "I felt like a kid returning it. I'm a Roosevelt nut." The Inquirer notes, "Goldman and his former partner, FBI agent Robert Wittman, returned the gun to Cove Neck during a brief ceremony Wednesday." Discussing the tip which led to the gun's recovery, Sagamore Hill curator Amy Verone said, "It was not exactly a rugged investigation. A guy calls you on the phone and gives you a gift. Hey, I'm happy to have the gift." But "it was a bit more than a gift, the FBI agent said. 'Luck is the result of a lot of preparation that allows you take advantage of situations when they happen,' Wittman said."

Kentucky High Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed. The AP (6/16, Barrouquere) reports, "The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the mental age of a death row inmate does not prevent the state from executing him." The AP continues, "An attorney for Thomas Clyde Bowling had argued that the inmate had the mental capacity of an 11-year-old when he killed two people in Lexington in 1990, citing testimony from psychologists." The AP adds, "The state high court in Frankfort noted the U.S. Supreme Court's decision last year barring executions for killers who were not at least 18 years old at the time of the crime, but said the ruling did not specifically prohibit putting to death someone with a mental age below that. … 'There is simply no language to support such a conclusion,' Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in a 5-0 opinion. … Johnstone wrote that there is some validity to the idea put forth by Bowling's attorneys, but that the federal high court intentionally established chronological age, not mental age, as the deciding factor."

Implementation Of Death Penalty Said To Be Lawless. In a New York Times op-ed (6/16), David R. Dow, a law professor at the University of Houston, says, "Earlier this week, the Supreme Court decided, in a 5-to-3 opinion, that a Tennessee prison inmate named Paul G. House was entitled to prove he did not commit the crime for which he was sent to death row." The House case "will make it hard for abolitionists to shift their focus from the question of innocence, but that is what they ought to do. They ought to focus on the far more pervasive problem: that the machinery of death in America is lawless, and in carrying out death sentences, we violate our legal principles nearly all of the time."

Maryland Police Have No Evidence Linking VA Theft To Other Burglaries. The AP (6/16, Yen) reports police "investigating the theft of private data on 26.5 million veterans and military troops said Thursday they have no evidence the crime is related to other burglaries in which computers were resold after the hard drives were erased." Police said they "still believe the May 3 burglary was random and that thieves were not aware of the data when they stole a personal laptop and external hard drive from a Veterans Affairs employee's Aspen Hill, Md., home." Last week, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson "told Congress that the VA remained hopeful that the May 3 burglary was a random theft, noting there had been no evidence any of the information had been used for identity theft." But police in Montgomery County, Md., "investigating the theft said that was not necessarily the case."

Malvo Told Police Of Other Shootings. The Washington Post (6/16, A1Ernesto Londoã±, Rich) reports, "Lee Boyd Malvo told law enforcement officials this spring that he and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad are responsible for four shootings across the country that have not been publicly attributed to them, a source familiar with the case said." The Post continues, "A second source confirmed that investigators have received information implicating the snipers in those shootings, which claimed the lives of two men and wounded two others in the months before the October 2002 slayings that terrorized the Washington region. The sources declined to speak for attribution because of the sensitivity of the information." The Post adds, "Malvo was interviewed extensively by law enforcement officials in preparation for his testimony at Muhammad's trial last month in Maryland. … It is unclear to what degree, if any, authorities have corroborated Malvo's new claims. He has provided conflicting accounts of shootings in the past and testified last month that he lied to investigators after he and Muhammad were arrested. … The claims bring the list of confirmed and suspected sniper shootings to 27, including 17 homicides, and add two states to the list of jurisdictions that could file charges against Muhammad and Malvo."

DOJ_NMG_0034580

Maryland Governor To Sign Bill Strengthening Laws On Sex Offenders. The Washington Post (6/16, B1, Mosk) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr. (R) "said that he would sign legislation passed in the predawn hours yesterday that would enhance the monitoring of convicted sex offenders and impose mandatory minimum sentences for those who prey on minors. … The legislation passed yesterday provides for more stringent monitoring of released offenders and gives police the authority to notify a broader list of community leaders when an offender moves into a neighborhood. Offenders would be required to check in with police more frequently and regularly update their photographs for an online database. It also calls for a team, which includes a mental health professional, to evaluate sex offenders before they are released and to determine appropriate monitoring methods, including the option of a Global Positioning System chip in an ankle bracelet."

Private Developers Banning Sex Offenders. USA Today (6/16, Koch) reports, "A Texas-based company, I&S Investment Group, is breaking ground this summer on a 154-lot development in Lenexa, Kan., that will bar registered sex offenders. If someone is convicted of a sex crime while living there, the subdivision will fine the person $1,500 daily until he or she moves. The group has sold out all 150 lots in its first such development in Lubbock, Texas, begun 10 months ago, and plans to offer 250 more lots there this fall. … 'The sex offender deal has improved demand. It's probably increased our sales three to four times,' says I&S partner Clayton Isom, 24. 'We're fighting sex offenders head on.'" USA continues, "Another Texan, Taylor Goodman, today launched a website, Blockwatcher.com, listing homes for sale that have no registered sex offenders living within a half-mile radius. He says only 20% of available homes will qualify. … The new private efforts complement an accelerating push by states and cities to bar sex offenders from living near schools or playgrounds. Hundreds of cities, including more than a dozen this year alone, have approved such ordinances, some of which block out entire downtowns. … At least 15 states have enacted such laws, including three (Nebraska, Mississippi and South Dakota) that did so for the first time this year and two (Georgia and Indiana) that expanded prior restrictions. Others, including California and Pennsylvania, restrict offenders on parole or probation. The restrictions have increased despite U.S. data showing sex crimes against children have decreased in the last decade."

CIVIL LAW:

Honeywell Settles Whistleblower Charges With US For $2.6 Million. The AP (6/16, Gold) reports, "Honeywell International Inc. has paid the federal government $2.625 million to settle charges it failed to properly test packaging for sensitive parts used by the Defense Department and NASA, authorities said Thursday." The AP continues, "Fifteen percent of the settlement, or $393,750, went to a California company and one of its executives, who brought a whistleblower lawsuit several years ago against Morris Township-based Honeywell." The AP adds, "Honeywell was accused of violating the False Claims Act over testing of electrostatic protective metallic sheets that were to package more than 186,000 sensitive parts, the Justice Department said. … A Justice spokesman, Charles Miller, said he could not comment on the nature of the parts but said none were damaged because of the packaging. … The lawsuit charged that Honeywell knowingly made and sold sheets that did not meet military specifications. Honeywell disputed the allegations, said court papers unsealed with the settlement."

St. Barnabas Health Care To Pay $265 Million Medicare Fraud Settlement. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Parry) reports, "New Jersey's largest health care provider will pay $265 million to settle federal charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars by inflating charges for seriously ill patients, prosecutors said Thursday. The agreement between prosecutors and Saint Barnabas Health Care System, which operates nine hospitals and a behavioral treatment center in New Jersey, concerns a program Medicare provides to supplement its normal payments. … As part of the settlement, under which Saint Barnabas did not admit wrongdoing, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years." FBI Newark SAC Les Wiser Jr. said, "Saint Barnabas was a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling. If he were alive today, he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name." The Newark Star-Ledger (6/16, Martin, 420K) notes, "The settlement…represented a first-of-its-kind agreement for a form of health care fraud that has been largely invisible to patients but has cost taxpayers billions of dollars in the past decade." Wiser "noted that Saint Barnabas was 'a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling.' 'If he was alive today,' Wiser said, 'he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034581

The Legal Intelligencer (6/16, Duffy) reports, "In the suits, the whistleblowers claimed Saint Barnabas was abusing a Medicare provision that provides for supplemental payments for unusually expensive cases, referred to as 'outliers.' … Justice Department lawyers said yesterday that between October 1995 and August 2003, the nine hospitals operated by West Orange, N.J.-based Saint Barnabas "purposefully inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care to make these cases appear more costly than they actually were."

The New York Times (6/16, Smothers, 1.19M) reports, "St. Barnabas officials said they welcomed a resolution to the federal inquiry, and the United States attorney's office here emphasized that the settlement was not an admission of guilt to any criminal charges. But federal investigators accused the hospital network of 'gaming the system and exploiting loopholes' to increase its revenues. 'St. Barnabas was a man who gave up his worldly wealth to help others,' said Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office here. 'If he were alive today he would be ashamed.'" The Wall Street Journal (6/16, B2, 2.11M) also reports on the settlement.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former DOJ Attorney Pleads Guilty To Conflict Charges In California. The Fremont (CA) Argus (6/16, Richman) reports, "A former U.S. Justice Department civil rights attorney admits he was angling for a state job to monitor and reform California's youth prisons even as he led a federal probe of one of those facilities in Stockton." The Argus continues, "Ryan Rainey, 48, has pleaded guilty to one count of violating the federal conflict-of-interest law and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 15 by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Facciola of Washington, D.C. … A civil lawsuit challenging the living conditions in youth prisons had required the appointment of a 'special master' to monitor and oversee reforms." The Argus adds, "Rainey admits that while leading the federal probe he was negotiating with state Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office for the special master's job, even though he knew the state had a financial interest in the findings and recommendations of the probe he was conducting. … The maximum sentence for the crime is a year in prison and a $100,000 fine but Rainey's May 26 plea agreement indicates the government will seek a zero-to-six-month term and won't oppose a sentence carrying no time behind bars. … Rainey was a senior trial attorney in the Special Litigation Section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from January 2002 through April 2005. Earlier he'd been a federal prosecutor in Washington, D.C., for seven years."

FBI Investigating Alleged Racist Firing By Washington State Police Chief. The Oregonian (6/16, Gilbert, 346K) reports, "Ridgefield, Wash., Police Chief Bruce Hall should be replaced, according to two Kirkland, Wash., police lieutenants who investigated allegations of racism in the firing of Ridgefield's only African American officer," Carl Mealing. "Now, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has begun its own investigation in Ridgefield. Council member Scott Hanson said Thursday that he talked with the FBI earlier this week but declined to say what about. Interim Ridgefield City Manager Justin L. Clary said an FBI agent attended meetings with him, interim Ridgefield Police Chief Erin Nolan and Clark County Sheriff Garry Lucas, but he declined to say what was discussed. An FBI probe 'was not something requested by the city,' Clary said. An FBI spokeswoman in Seattle declined to confirm or deny an investigation was under way."

DOJ_NMG_0034582

Los Angeles Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Police Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Winton) reports, "Faced with the third case in a year of deputies firing scores of shots at a suspect, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca on Thursday said he had ordered an investigation into whether six deputies used too much force earlier this week when they unleashed 70 rounds at a suspect." The Times continues, "Scrutiny of the shooting intensified as officials Thursday revealed that at least one deputy had fired so many shots that he reloaded his weapon during the Walnut Park incident, which left 27-year-old Carl Williams dead. … 'Obviously, we have to look at this very closely. We will get to the bottom of this fast,' Baca said. 'We will know the motivation of each of the shooters. They know what the policy is here. Because it is the heat of battle, it doesn't dismiss your objectivity.'" The Times adds, "The shooting comes a year after deputies in Compton had fired 120 rounds at a suspect they were chasing on a residential street. Some of the bullets flew into nearby homes and embedded in walls. … After that incident, the Sheriff's Department imposed rules that made it more difficult for deputies to fire at moving cars and to fire multiple times. Baca said he was concerned that the shooting could have been a case of "contagious fire," in which deputies fire their weapons because they hear a gunshot. He said he hoped that the new rules would reduce such problems. … But in January, deputies fired more than 50 shots into a Compton house where a suspect was holed up. That case is being investigated by the department's Internal Affairs detectives."

Senate Panel Approves Flag Desecration Amendment. The Washington Times/AP (6/16) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee gave a nod yesterday to a constitutional amendment to protect the American flag from desecration, moving it to the Senate floor, where vote counters on both sides say it could be within one vote of passing. The 11-7 vote sent the amendment to the floor. Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, has said the measure will get a Senate vote this month."

Bloomberg (6/16) reports GOP Sen. Orrin Hatch "said he believed more than 67 senators, or two-thirds, would support the measure if they were 'allowed to vote their consciences.'' Both sides "predict a close Senate vote." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "supports the proposed amendment. The Senate's No. 2 Republican, Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, opposes it."

Louisiana Senate Alters Bill To Change Open Primary Elections. The AP (6/16) reports, "If Louisiana is going to shed its unique 'open primary' system, then the state must make sure independent voters are allowed to cast ballots in the new party primary elections, the House voted on Thursday." The AP continues, "Sen. Cleo Fields introduced a bill that would replace the state's open primaries with Republican and Democratic primaries in congressional races, leaving it up to the parties to decide whether independents and third-party voters are allowed to cast ballots. … The House decided to change the measure slightly, adding a provision that would allow an independent voter to pick one or the other party's primaries to vote in. They then passed the measure 58-35, sending it back to the Senate for approval of the change." The AP adds, "Despite the change, Rep. Joel Robideaux of Lafayette, who has no party affiliation, said it was unfair to independent candidates. Robideaux said the measure would make it increasingly difficult for independents to run for Congress because they would wait on the sidelines until the general election. … Fields, D-Baton Rouge, a former congressman, has tried for years to get rid of open primaries, arguing that the current system often results in Louisiana's newly elected members of Congress getting a late start - and less desirable committee assignments - on Capitol Hill because the state holds its runoff elections in December, a month later than other states. … If it becomes law, voters could cast ballots in two party primaries, then a November runoff, to select their congressmen and U.S. senators. … The measure would also need approval from the U.S. Justice Department, because any change to Louisiana election law needs federal approval, a restriction stemming from the Voting Rights Act of 1965."

Baltimore Police, Jail Sued For Arrests Without Charges. The Baltimore Sun (6/16, Bykowicz, Yakaitis) reports, "The NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union sued the Baltimore Police Department and the state-run city jail Thursday, using the experiences of five men to allege a broad pattern of abuse in which they say thousands of people are routinely arrested and held for hours without being charged with a crime." The Sun continues,

DOJ_NMG_0034583

"The lawsuit, filed in Baltimore Circuit Court by the Maryland ACLU, condemns the practice of jailing citizens for so-called quality-of-life crimes such as loitering -- one of the central strategies employed by police here and in other cities in their efforts to drive down crime. … The issue emerged just over a year ago with reports in The Sun of overcrowding at the Central Booking and Intake Facility." The Sun adds, "The plaintiffs, including a 19-year-old Morgan State engineering student and two Pennsylvania residents visiting Baltimore for a bachelor party, allege that city police officers routinely make arrests without probable cause and do so 'under a pattern and practice set and enforced by city officials.' … City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler said the plaintiffs 'will not be able to prove their truly wild allegations.' … 'The illegal arrests claim rests largely on a false equation,' he said. 'The fact that the state's attorney declines to charge in many cases does not suggest that the arrest was illegal.'"

California Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Lait, Rubin) reports, "Police officers assigned to protect Compton schools against vandalism and other campus crimes have been asleep at the wheel, quite literally, according to photographs and sworn testimony in a racial discrimination lawsuit." The Times continues, "The photographs appear to show several uniformed school officers in the driver's seats of parked squad cars with eyes shut and, in some cases, heads leaning back." The Times adds, "The pictures emerged in a suit against the Compton Unified School District, which operates the 34-member police department. The case was filed by a white ex-officer and two Latino officers who contend that they were treated differently from black colleagues within the predominantly African American department. … Former Officer Mark Shiva, who at one time served as president of the police officers union, and current Officers Victor Ayala and Sergio Reynoso allege that they were hit with racial slurs, ridiculed and retaliated against after lodging complaints against black colleagues. … Shiva, who was fired after the suit was filed in 2005, took the photographs within the last two years, according to testimony in the case. Shiva shot the pictures to prove that colleagues were sleeping on duty. … According to testimony, all of the officers accused of sleeping in patrol cars are black. But in the background of one photo, a white officer also appears to be sleeping. When the conduct was brought to the attention of supervisors, none of the officers were disciplined, authorities said."

Ehrlich Fires Appointee Over Remarks On Gays. The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Sun, Mosk, 744K) reports Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "yesterday fired Robert J. Smith, his appointee on the Metro transit authority board, for referring to gay people as sexual deviants on a cable television show." In a statement, Ehrlich said, "Robert Smith's comments were highly inappropriate, insensitive and unacceptable. They are in direct conflict to my administration's commitment to inclusiveness, tolerance and opportunity."

WPost Criticizes House Over Military Rules On Religious Expression. The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) says in an editorial, "The military has been making a good-faith effort in recent months to write rules on religious activities that preserve both the rights of free expression among service members and the separation of church and state. It's unfortunate, therefore, that the House of Representatives, responding to pressure from evangelical Christian groups, has unnecessarily inserted itself into this debate, with a provision in the recent defense authorization bill aimed at ensuring that evangelical chaplains can pray in Jesus's name at public ceremonies. The Senate is debating a version that wisely leaves out the House provision and lets the military services continue to work out this complex issue the right way -- without congressional interference."

ANTITRUST:

Official Pleads Guilty To Military Bid-Rigging. The Virginian-Pilot (6/16, Mcglone) reports, "An executive with a marine products company has agreed to plead guilty to conspiring to rig bids in the sale of foam buoys and fenders to the Navy and the Coast Guard, the Justice Department announced Thursday" The V-P continues, "Gerald Thermos, president of Marine Fenders International, based in Wilmington, Calif., was charged in Norfolk federal court this week with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. … The Justice Department said Thermos has agreed to plead guilty to the felony, serve four months in jail and four months of home detention, and pay a $50,000 fine. No court date has been set." The V-P adds, "The department said that from June 2000 to August 2005, Thermos and other unidentified co-conspirators schemed to fix prices for marine fenders and buoys that were sold to the Navy, the Coast Guard and other government and private entities. … 'Price fixing and bid rigging are serious concerns when it relates to products and services procured by the Department of Defense,' Rick Gwin, special agent in charge of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, western field office, said in a news release."

DOJ_NMG_0034584

Bill Gates To Relinquish Day-To-Day Control Of Microsoft For Philanthropy. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Microsoft founder Bill Gates "announced today he will step down in two years, giving up day-to-day responsibility at Microsoft. Rather than making money, now, he wants to devote his life to giving it away." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Speaking at Microsoft headquarters in Seattle, he announced he will give up the helm of the world's largest software company to commit himself full-time to philanthropy." The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (6/15, lead story, 3:30, Brown, 9.87M) also reported the story.

USA Today (6/16, Acohido, Kessler) reports, "Microsoft chairman Bill Gates announced Thursday that he will let loose the reins of the company he co-founded in college and shaped into a behemoth, to focus on philanthropy." USA continues, "Gates, 50, who was also Microsoft's chief software architect, will give up day-to-day duties in July 2008, retaining the title of chairman. … That will leave Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer and Chief Technical Officers Ray Ozzie and Craig Mundie to carry out a transition the software giant is struggling to make from lumbering supplier of desktop computer software to nimble competitor in a rapidly changing tech market." USA adds, "Gates insisted that the change announced Thursday 'is not a retirement.' He plans to spend most of his time working for his charity, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. … Gates says he plans to have a relationship with Microsoft for many years."

Antitrust Battles Have Marked Gates' Tenure. The Financial Times (6/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft's battles with antitrust regulators on both sides of the Atlantic have been a consistent feature of Bill Gates' tenure." The Times continues, "While the software group managed to broker a deal with the US authorities in 2002 that ended its regulatory troubles in the country, Microsoft's fight with the European Commission in Brussels is still very much alive." The Times adds, "In a landmark ruling in March 2004, the Commission found Microsoft guilty of violating European Union competition rules by abusing its dominant position in the market for personal computer operating systems. Microsoft was fined a record €497m ($628m) and told to change its business practices. … The group was told to share more information about its flagship Windows programme with rival companies and to stop bundling its Windows Media Player software with the operating system. … The ruling, which is under appeal, has since sparked a new case against Microsoft, because the Commission alleges that the group has not implemented the ruling properly. It has threatened to impose fresh fines of up to €2m a day unless Microsoft complies with the Brussels ruling speedily. … Adding to Microsoft's regulatory worries in Europe is the fact that Brussels is also taking aim at Vista, the operating system set to replace Windows next year."

Microsoft Wins Patent Case Using "eBay Argument." The California Recorder (6/16, Kobylarz) reports, "Microsoft Corp. appears to be the first company to benefit from the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision to end the long-standing presumption in patent cases that an injunction should be issued almost automatically when infringement is found." The Recorder continues, "Applying the Supreme Court's May ruling in MercExchange v. eBay, a Texas federal judge denied the request of Z4 Technologies Inc., a tiny Michigan software firm, to bar Microsoft from selling, making and using its infringing Windows and Office products." The Recorder adds, "The ruling, issued on Thursday by Judge Leonard Davis in the Eastern District of Texas, signals a major shift in patent litigation practice and is the first indication of how the eBay ruling has quickly become important to the way companies fight patent infringement claims. … In April, a Texas jury found Microsoft and Autodesk willfully infringed two of Z4's patents covering methods for limiting unauthorized use of computer software. Both Microsoft and Autodesk use the anti-piracy program in some of their products. The jury ordered the two companies to pay Z4 a combined $133 million in damages, the biggest award ever in a patent case to come out of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas."

Vinci Rebuffs Veolia's Merger Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (6/16) reports, "Vinci SA rejected a merger approach from French water utility Veolia Environnement SA, calling it unsolicited and hostile." The Journal continues, "In rejecting the proposal, Vinci, a French construction company, said a merger of the two entities 'would have no strategic interest, would not create synergies and would not create value for its shareholders.'" The Journal adds, "Veolia's board had asked Veolia's chairman Wednesday to study a friendly merger with Vinci, a move that would create a utility and services company valued at about €34 billion, or $43 billion. … After Vinci rejected the proposal, Veolia said it 'regrets Vinci's opposition to review the interest of a potential friendly alliance.' … Veolia, the world's largest water utility by revenue, has been looking to expand its concessions business and is eager to increase its €16.9 billion market capitalization to compete with larger, more financially powerful conglomerates such as water and energy utility Suez SA. Vinci's market capitalization is €19 billion."

DOJ_NMG_0034585

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Authorizes Marine Reserve In Northwest Hawaiian Islands. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 9, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush today created the world's largest protected marine reserve, the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands. The chain of uninhabited islands, 100 hundred miles wide, stretches across the Pacific Ocean for 1,400 miles. If laid across the continental United States, they'd reach from Idaho to Missouri."

The move was widely praised by conservation advocates. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 8, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The President has had his battles with environmentalists. But tonight, they are cheering." ABC (Potter) added, "These islands and the vast coral around them are so wild and so remote, that even the most adventurous of us will likely never see them." President Bush "had put a low priority on a far away corals. It took a bit of celebrity to change his mind." In April, "at a White House dinner, Jean Michelle Cousteau, son of the famous explorer Jacques Cousteau, showed this documentary he had made, showing how seabirds were choking on debris from thousands of miles away." People "who were there said the President was moved."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 8, 2:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported "nearly all" conservationists "are thrilled about his decision to make one of the most spectacular places on earth, a chain of Hawaiian islands, a new national monument, giving them extraordinary protection for years to come." After President Bush "screened a documentary by Jacques Cousteau's son, Jean-Michel, he went further, demanding the stronger protections allowed for a national monument. Now, ship traffic, trash dumping, and most recreational activities will be prohibited. And over a five-year period, commercial fishing will be phased out completely."

The Washington Times and Los Angeles Times, among other newspapers, run an AP story (6/16) reporting, "It is only the second time that Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features. The law itself turned 100 this month." The President "had planned as late as Wednesday to use instead the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others to the decision, said a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity so as not to upstage Bush." But he "opted at the last minute to create a national monument after realizing the process had gone on for five years and elicited thousands of comments." The Washington Post (6/16, A6, Baker, 744K) mentions the marine reserve announces as part of a story on he President signing a bill boosting broadcast indecency fines,

The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Spotts, 61K) reports that "several analysts add that, in some respects, the move is a political no-brainer for the White House. Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, has imposed similar restrictions in the region out to the state's three-mile limit, which built local support for expanding the restrictions." The Monitor adds, "Except for a handful of commercial fishermen, the proposal has drawn virtually no opposition from other commercial interests because the region lacks oil deposits and other easily exploitable resources."

NYTimes, WPost Praise Bush. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "An unfamiliar but highly appealing side of President Bush showed itself at the White House yesterday. It was Mr. Bush the compassionate conservationist, friend of green sea turtles, seabirds and Hawaiian monk seals, savior of coral reefs and spiny lobsters, creator of the largest ocean sanctuary on the planet." Bush "made exemplary use of presidential power yesterday. We hope he does more of it."

The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) editorializes, "This administration and future ones should follow up with similar actions to protect other ecologically sensitive marine systems. America began protecting its land-based national parks and monuments a century ago, but the country has lagged in shielding its underwater treasures." Bush's action "offers an exciting example of assertive action to put essential areas beyond further human destruction."

DOJ_NMG_0034586

Democrats Say EPA Blocked Information About Toxic Sites. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Miller, 958K) reports. "Senate Democrats on Thursday accused the Bush administration of withholding key details about toxic waste sites that present risks of exposure to nearby residents." At a congressional hearing, Sen. Barbara Boxer "said the Environmental Protection Agency had designated as confidential the details of about 140 Superfund sites where toxic exposure remains uncontrolled." Boxer and other Democrats "said the secret data included information about how much money and time it would take to clean up the dangerous sites, including one where the EPA predicted it would take 26 years to close off access to toxics." The EPA "said that it had only blocked information related to law enforcement and that the public had access to all relevant health risk data for the sites, seven of which are in California."

Sago Mine Disaster Survivor Attends Mine Safety Bill Signing. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 12, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a very emotional event at the White House today. The only man to survive the Sago West Virginia mine explosion, Randall McCloy was there, for the signing into law of sweeping, new mine safety rules. Relatives of the men who died also attended the ceremony."

The AP (6/16, Zuckerbrod) reports "the new law, the first of its kind since 1977, requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen on hand while they work, rather than one." Bush said yesterday, "We make this promise to American miners and their families: We'll do everything possible to prevent mine accidents and make sure you're able to return safely to your loved ones."

Bill Clinton Applauds Evangelical Focus On Global Warming. The AP (6/16) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton praised evangelical Christians on Thursday for their recent efforts on global warming and debt relief for poor nations and said he sees growing understanding between people of different faiths." He "said religion is a problem for both liberals and conservatives in the United States." Clinton said, "For people in America who are a part of my political tradition, our great sin has often been ignoring religion or denying its power or refusing to engage it because it seemed hostile to us. … For ... the so-called Christian right and its allies, their great sin has been believing they were in full possession of the truth."

Dionne Sees Moderation Of Evangelical Agenda. E. J. Dionne in his column in the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K) sees the recent election the moderate Rev. Frank Page as president of the Southern Baptist Convention as "one of many signs that new breezes are blowing through the broader evangelical Christian world." Recently "the evangelical political agenda is broadening as new voices insist on the urgency of issues such as Third World poverty and the fights against AIDS and human trafficking." Evangelicals are "going through a quiet evolution as believers reflect on the perils of partisanship and ideology and their reasons for being Christian. This will probably affect the nation's political life, but it will certainly affect the country's spiritual direction. My hunch is that not only moderates and liberals but also many solid conservatives welcome the departure."

Alaska Seen As Front Line In US Battle Against Bird Flu. In a front page article, USA Today (6/16, A1, Kasindorf, 2.31M) profiles the USDA's Alaskan early-warning project, which it calls "the front line of a $29 million federal program to test thousands of birds in 50 states this year to guard against a possible [avian flu] pandemic." Bird testing by the US and Canadian governments will be "more extensive this year," with US scientists planning to sample 75,000 to 100,000 birds, including 19,000 in Alaska. In addition, poultry flocks will be monitored, the USDA says. If a sample tests positive, "the finding will be announced by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns or Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne," says USDA spokeswoman Gail Keirn.

New Death Reported In Indonesia Deepens Fears Of Bird Flu Spread. The New York Times (6/16, McNeil, Jr., 1.19M) reports, "The death of a 38th person from avian flu in Indonesia was confirmed yesterday by the World Health Organization and the situation in that country continued to worsen." The number of human cases reported in Indonesia is "climbing rapidly," and the World Bank said Monday that Indonesia's response to the flu was "disorganized and underfinanced." Also raising concern is a report this week by The Jakarta Post quoting "several local health experts as saying that the government was not disclosing how widespread the disease was or how many times human-to-human transmission might have occurred."

DOJ_NMG_0034587

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Solicits Bids To Create Nationwide Crime Data Network. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/15) reported, "The FBI has quietly put out a Request for Proposal for bidders to build an unprecedented, national network linking together records from local, state and federal law enforcement agencies." The National Data Exchange would be "a giant, electronic catalog of incident data and other criminal records from over 18,000 law enforcement bodies. 'It's every criminal incident' along with the software to analyze them, explains one insider, who estimates the initial cost at over $20 million, and up to $100 million as the project expands nationally. … Investigators hope to use N-Dex to better track patterns of robberies, arsons and other crimes across city and county lines. Among concerns voiced by critics: that N-Dex will suck away money from other needed homeland security projects, such as intelligence centers and training; that it will squander scarce funds in trying to link up thousands of rural districts; and that the FBI, which has had years of headaches in trying to manage its own case files, is not the best manager for the project."

North Carolina FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation For Ethics Violation. The Charlotte Observer (6/16, Morrill, 234K) reports US District Judge Carlton Tilley "Thursday sentenced former Charlotte FBI agent Erik Blowers, who was the ethics adviser to agents across North Carolina, to two years probation for failing to disclose gifts and favors from a one-time informant. … He was the first FBI agent ever charged in the state." The Observer adds, "Documents filed by U.S. Justice Department prosecutors claimed Blowers misled supervisors, lied to investigators and had extensive business dealings with a convicted drug trafficker." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16) notes Tilley's lawer, Chris Fialko, said after the sentencing, "We are pleased that the judge found that Erik did not adversely effect (sic) the integrity of any FBI investigation."

FBI Approval At 42% In Wall Street Journal Poll. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, A4, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "IRAN-CONTRA VETERANS North, Secord, Hall and Clarridge gather to salute 1980s-era anti-Sandinista rebels before Nicaragua's November elections. U.S. attitudes on CIA are 31% positive; FBI draws a 42% positive mark." The Journal notes, "The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points."

DEA Arrests 22 In Heroin-Smuggling Investigation. The Washington Times (6/16, Seper) reports federal drug agents "have disrupted an international heroin smuggling ring responsible for shipping more than $14 million worth of the drug into the United States since 2004, arresting 22 suspected gang members and seizing more than 60 pounds of heroin." Rusty Payne "said agents also confiscated more than $220,000 in cash during raids with authorities in Trinidad and Ecuador, as well as heroin abandoned by drug couriers in a Guayaquil, Ecuador, hotel, at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston, at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York and at Piarco International Airport in Trinidad. … The arrests culminated a 10-month undercover investigation led by Justice Department's Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and, Mr. Payne said, involved multiple confidential witnesses and sources, court-authorized wiretaps, surveillance and a controlled heroin delivery."

Report: Fentanyl Linked To Nearly 200 Deaths. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 7, 2:10, Brown) reported, "A more potent and lethal form of heroin is now creating a trail of death that stretches from the Midwest to the East Coast." NBC (Tibbles) added, "On the street, drug users have a simple name for it." Unidentified male: "The bomb." Tibbles: "Emergency room doctors call it a killer." Dr. Chuck Thomas, Norwegian American Hospital, Chicago: "It goes to the central nervous system, and they, they almost immediately stop breathing." Tibbles: "Super-charged heroin mixed with the powerful painkiller, fentanyl, up to 100 times stronger than morphine, is rampaging through drug communities. It's already killed nearly 200 people this year. Police have seen a spike in overdose deaths in cities from Chicago, St. Louis and Detroit in the Midwest to Philadelphia, Camden, New Jersey and Wilmington, Delaware. Today in Chicago, law enforcement agencies from across the country discussed plans to address the threat." Scott Burns, Office of National Drug Control Policy: "If you are addicted to heroin, there has never been a better time to stop."

The Detroit Free Press (6/15, Norris) reports, "Timothy Ogden, Drug Enforcement Administration associate special agent… likened the use of illegal drugs to playing Russian roulette with a single bullet, but with fentanyl, he said, 'It's like playing Russian roulette with six bullets in the gun.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034588

The Washington Times/UPI (6/15) cites yesterday's New York Times story on the fentanyl-related overdoses.

Drug Enforcement Officials Coordinate Fentanyl-Related Investigations At Summit. From Chicago, the AP (6/15, Tarm) reports drug enforcement officials from around the country "ended two days of discussions Thursday on the possible source of the bad heroin that killed…at least 100 [people] from Chicago to Philadelphia. … The summit provided officials from 12 states and Washington D.C. the chance to coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the beginning of this year. There were outbreaks of fentanyl-laced heroin in the '80s and early '90s, said Arlington, Va.-based DEA spokeswoman Mary Irene Cooper, who was in Chicago for the meeting. The difference is that the outbreaks aren't isolated this time to one city."

In a sidebar, the AP (6/15) provides more details about fentanyl and its side effects.

Health Commission In Illinois To Discuss Alerting Public About Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The Park Ridge (IL) Herald Advocate (6/15) reports, "Members of the city's Health Commission, which has set a goal of tackling addiction in the community, say parents need to know that heroin use exists among teens. … At the Health Commission's next meeting, on June 22…the group will discuss how to alert the community to what is taking place, particularly regarding the distribution of fentanyl-laced heroin and its deadly consequences."

DC Man Acquitted Of Drug, Conspiracy Charges. The Washington Post (6/16, B4, Weiss) reports, "Corey A. Moore, the D.C. street legend who has slipped through the hands of prosecutors again and again, has survived another trial -- one that featured his half brother as the key government witness. Moore, 30, was acquitted yesterday by a federal jury of drug, firearms and conspiracy charges -- clearing the way for his release after nearly two years of denying wrongdoing and awaiting trial. … He had said that he was living a law-abiding life when authorities arrested him in August 2004, holding jobs as a youth counselor and car salesman. Prosecutors saw it differently: Moore, they said, had participated in a drug conspiracy with others for at least two years and helped supply crack cocaine and heroin."

Selig Writes Letter To Fans, Says MLB Will Fund HGH Study. The New York Times (6/16, Curry) reports, "Nine days after federal agents reported that pitcher Jason Grimsley had admitted using performance-enhancing substances, Commissioner Bud Selig issued an open letter to fans about the development. Selig acknowledged that 'there are problems' in Major League Baseball and said he was 'committed to protecting our game.' … He noted that baseball tests for steroids and amphetamines, and that human growth hormone is banned. But Selig also explained that there is no effective blood test to detect human growth hormone and said it 'represents a threat to all sports everywhere.'"

According to USA Today (6/16, Bodley), in the letter, Selig said, "We are committed to funding a study of HGH and how to detect it. … Also, we are willing to make additional contributions to fund other studies to determine how to detect HGH and are currently reaching out to experts in the field to ascertain what other studies can immediately begin."

Mail, Garbage Provided Clues In Federal Steroid Investigation. The Albany (NY) Times Union (6/15, Higgins) reports a two-year federal investigation of a North Greenbush man "included intercepting his mail and, on one occasion, rifling through his trash before authorities charged him with attempting to receive anabolic steroids from China. Christopher Magnano, 33, faces charges connected to what officials described as an Internet-based sales operation of the illegal substances, which were seized from his North Greenbush home following his May 19 arrest. Police said the seizure of anabolic steroids and human growth hormone was the largest ever in the Capital Region."

CA: Thousands Of Marijuana Plants Found On Forest Service Land. The Sacramento Bee (6/15) reports, "An anonymous tip led Placer County sheriff's investigators on Wednesday to more than 17,000 marijuana plants being grown on U.S. Forest Service land between Auburn and Foresthill. … Authorities warned people to be careful when hiking off-trail in the wilderness, since marijuana growers often are armed."

US Charges New York Jeweler In Cocaine Money-Laundering Scheme. The New York Post (6/16, Cornell, Mangan) reports, "The famed Manhattan purveyor of diamond-encrusted 'bling' to Madonna, Diddy, hoop star Allen Iverson and other celebs was busted yesterday on charges he helped two coke kingpins launder some of their $270 million in dirty drug profits by selling them jewelry." The Post continues, "Jacob 'The Jeweler' Arabo received 'large sums of currency' for various pieces of jewelry from the leaders of the so-called Black Mafia Family drug ring and their flunkies, according to a Detroit federal-court indictment unsealed yesterday that also charges 15 others with drug and laundering crimes." The Post adds, "The 41-year-old Uzbeki immigrant, born Jakov Arabov, then either failed to file tax forms required for business transactions totaling more than $10,000, or submitted false tax forms that declared the purchasers were people other than the actual buyers, the indictment claims. … The scheme allegedly was designed to conceal that the jewelry purchases were made with proceeds from the Black Mafia Family's sales of thousands of kilos of cocaine in Detroit, California, Kentucky, Georgia, Texas and elsewhere, and to hide the true ownership of those funds. … The gang's alleged leaders operate BMF Entertainment, a rap-music label, and have extensive connections in the hip-hop world, as does Arabo."

DOJ_NMG_0034589

Mississippi Man Arrested In Federal Witness Slaying. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (6/16) reports, "A 24-year-old Clarksdale (MS) man has been arrested in connection with the slaying of a federal witness found dead earlier this month on a Coahoma County road." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Kenneth C. Walker was arrested by an ATF violent crime federal task force for his alleged involvement in the retaliation against a federal witness and on a charge of discharge/possession of a firearm during a federal violent crime. … William Christopher Haro, 27, a witness in a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives case, was found shot multiple times June 9. … Walker was arrested without incident Tuesday and made an initial appearance before a federal judge."

West Virginia Attorney Jailed On Gun Charges. The Charleston Gazette (6/16, Searls) reports, "Federal authorities want to keep Charleston attorney Dante di Trapano in jail until a trial on gun charges related to drug addiction, contending he could be a danger to the community." The Gazette continues, "Di Trapano was indicted on two counts Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Charleston and arrested Thursday morning. Federal authorities argued he could be a danger to the community and pointed out his former law firm has hired an off-duty Charleston police officer for protection against him. … Di Trapano was indicted based on eight guns found in an April raid federal agents conducted on his South Hills residence." The Gazette adds, "Already charged in March with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine in Florida, di Trapano had said then he was checking himself into a drug rehabilitation program. Wednesday's indictment charged him with being 'an unlawful user of and addicted to a controlled substance' while in possession of the guns and for allegedly lying on a federal form when he purchased a gun Feb. 4, stating he was not addicted to or using drugs. … While his attorney, Michael Del Giudice, requested an immediate bond hearing, U.S. attorneys said di Trapano needed to be locked up for at least three days while the probation office prepares a report. U.S. Magistrate Judge Mary Stanley agreed and set a hearing for Tuesday at 2 p.m. on the government's motion to detain him without bond until trial."

House Appropriators Approve Explosives Fee To Help Fund ATF. The House Appropriations Committee approved a new half-cent per pound fee on explosives as lawmakers and the Administration debate funding for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The Washington Post (6/16, A3, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The debate over the fee comes at a time of mounting budget difficulties for ATF, which is already facing rising costs on a new headquarters building in Washington." The DOJ IG is investigating allegations of budgetary mismanagement by the ATF and some senior ATF officials "said ATF's budget could be crippled without the explosives fee at a time when terrorists are seeking materials for bombs."

IMMIGRATION:

Report Says Senate Bill Would Grant Amnesty To 14.4 Million Illegal Immigrants. The Washington Times (6/16, Seper, 90K) reports more than "9.9 million illegal aliens now in the United States will receive amnesty under an immigration-reform bill passed by the Senate, though about a quarter will do so fraudulently, and the bill allows for 4.5 million family members to join them in the United States, according to a report." The report, "released yesterday by the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies (CIS)," says, "Of the 14.4 million illegals and their family members who will receive amnesty, we estimate that

DOJ_NMG_0034590

13.5 million will eventually become permanent residents, which means they can stay as long as they wish and apply for citizenship."

States Trying To Limit Services To Immigrants. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Oliver, 61K) reports that with "no resolution of immigration-reform legislation at the federal level, states have been pressing ahead with their own measures intended to discourage illegal immigration and curtail costs of providing services to that population." Lawmakers in Kansas, Iowa, and Arizona "have voted this year to restrict certain social services to illegal immigrants, following similar action last year in Virginia. Other states have passed legislation cracking down on employers of illegal immigrants and those who sell forged documents to illegals." In all, state legislatures "have seen some 500 immigration-reform bills introduced in 2006, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL)." But even as lawmakers "try to make it harder for illegals to live in their states, they are bumping into one roadblock after another, rendering their efforts toothless and mostly symbolic. For one, states cannot sidestep federal law by simply denying certain services, such as public education and emergency healthcare, to undocumented people. For another, the courts often ruled against their immigration-control proposals."

National Guard Deployment Seen As Not Discouraging Illegal Immigrants. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 6, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been exactly one month since President Bush addressed the nation on his plan to reform immigration policy and ordered thousands of National Guard soldiers to the Mexican border, but is the growing military presence slowing down the flood of illegal crossings?" CBS (Cobiella) added, "Washington hopes the sight of soldiers on the border fixing roads and building fences will scare away would-be illegals. But even on this small stretch of border in New Mexico, with the National Guard in plain view and just a quarter of a mile from the end of their fence, people are still walking across the border. The only deterrent for this group was the summer sun."

Chertoff Wants Social Security To Provide ICE With No-Match Data. Secretary Chertoff, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/16, 90K) writes that worksite enforcement is a "key part" of President Bush's "comprehensive vision for immigration reform." While employers need to be given "better tools to verify the legal status of their employees," ICE must also be given "a better way to determine which employers are habitually using or providing fraudulent Social Security information. One way to do that is by giving our agents sufficient access to no-match data. Under current law, the Social Security Administration does not provide sufficient access in sharing this information. This is simply wrong, and Congress needs to change the law."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Supplemental Spending Bill. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 5, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported President Bush "signed a bill providing $94.5 billion more for war spending and hurricane relief. The measure brings the total authorized for Iraq, Afghanistan and the war on terror, to almost $500 billion."

The New York Times (6/16, Pear, 1.19M) notes Bush "acted hours after the Senate approved the $94.5 billion bill by a 98-to-1 vote. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, voted against the measure, saying it did not provide enough for domestic health and education programs. … Final approval of the bill was accompanied by growing frustration on Capitol Hill over the use of emergency spending measures to pay for overseas military operations."

The AP (6/16, Taylor) says Bush "praised Congress for providing funds to 'fight terrorism, defend our homeland, enforce our borders, and fulfill our moral obligation to help our fellow Americans in need.'"

The Washington Post (6/16, A7, Murray, 744K) reports, "Faced with a White House veto threat, House and Senate negotiators stripped out $14 billion in unrelated funding that the Senate had added to its version of the legislation. But the final bill did include a few unrelated items. 'We've made considerable progress toward limiting unnecessary and wasteful spending,' Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in a statement after the vote. 'But more can be done.'"

The Washington Times (6/16, Fagan, 90K) headlines its report "Reduced Spending Bill Approved In Senate," and says Senate leaders "credited Republicans in both chambers for saving the legislation. 'Republican-led efforts ensured the bill didn't exceed the president's emergency request while focusing our resources on the critical priorities,'" said Frist. But "others said the spending bill would have ballooned out of control without the hard line drawn by House leaders, especially Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican. 'It would have been much higher without the insistence of the House,' said Rep. C.W. Bill Young, Florida Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0034591

Bush Signs Bill Boosting Broadcast Indecency Fines. The Washington Post (6/16, A6, Baker, 744K) reports, "Complaining that television and radio shows in recent years have 'too often pushed the bounds of decency,' President Bush signed legislation yesterday to escalate dramatically the penalties against broadcasters who violate federal standards." The White House "decided to showcase the signing of the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act at a time when Bush and Republican congressional allies are trying to reassure disaffected conservative supporters that they remain committed to conservative causes. With midterm elections approaching, Bush recently gave two speeches promoting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and the Senate plans to vote on another amendment that outlaws flag burning."

Senate Confirms Bush FDIC Nominee. The AP (6/16) reports, "Sheila Bair, President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., was approved by the Senate on Thursday along with nominees for three other government positions." The four "were confirmed without dissent. In addition to Bair, they are: James B. Lockhart as director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight; Kathleen Casey as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission; and Robert Couch as president of the Government National Mortgage Association, known as Ginnie Mae."

Bush Hosts Congressional Picnic. The AP (6/16, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush was the host of the annual congressional picnic Thursday at the White House, but it was his chief of staff's band that came close to stealing the show. 'We got some interesting entertainment for you tonight,' Bush told lawmakers and their families to the picnic, called 'Rodeo on the South Lawn.' 'We got some people who can play music and some people who think they can play music,' the president said." The AP adds, "The Compassionates, Joshua Bolten's band, and the Second Amendments, a bipartisan congressional band, were the opening acts. The featured entertainment came from Riders in the Sky, professional musicians who played in fancy chaps and Western attire." Bush "was upbeat, although still weary from his trip this week to Baghdad. … Spotted in the crowd were Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, CIA chief Michael Hayden and Bush's top political adviser Karl Rove. The national intelligence director, John Negroponte, showed up in jeans and a cowboy hat."

Bush Apologizes For Teasing Sight-Impaired Reporter Over Sunglasses. The New York Times (6/16, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports on President Bush's apology to Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Wallsten for wearing sun glasses during a news conference. Wallsten suffers from a kind of macular degeneration. Afterward, "staff members told Mr. Bush that Mr. Wallsten was not wearing the sunglasses to look hip, but for health reasons. Mr. Wallsten has Stargardt's disease, a degenerative condition that causes blindness and can be painfully exacerbated by sunlight. By late afternoon Mr. Bush called Mr. Wallsten to apologize."

Spellings Has Undertaken Extensive Foreign Travel. The AP (6/16, Ben Feller) reports, "Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has put a passport stamp on her job, taking more overseas trips since 2005 than her predecessor did in four years. In less than a year and a half, Spellings has taken seven overseas trips, traveling to Afghanistan, England, Egypt, France, India, Italy, Japan, Jordan and Russia. She plans to visit Greece and Spain later this month." The AP adds, "Transportation, food and lodging for her overseas travel cost $36,981, according to Education Department records. The total cost of her travel was thousands of dollars higher because other agencies picked up the tab for a few trips." It's "not a matter of wanderlust, Spellings says. In her view, the top school official ought to see the nations that the United States is helping and competing against." In an interview with the AP, Spellings said, "We believe that education is a universally shared value. … We are looked to and admired around the world as people who know how to do education for the masses."

Credit Overhaul Bill Seen As Gaining Momentum. USA Today (6/16, Smith, 2.31M) reports, "A move to more closely regulate the major Wall Street credit-rating agencies at the tail end of an era of corporate scandals gained momentum this week, when the House Financial Services Committee approved reform legislation that moves to the full House for review." The bill, sponsored by GOP Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick, "is dubbed the Credit Rating Agency Duopoly Relief Act, a dig at the two biggest US credit-rating firms, Moody's and Standard and Poor's." The legislation "would require the firms to file confidential financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, publish regular reports on how well their ratings perform, and make mandatory the practice of employing compliance officers to ensure the firms comply with securities laws." The Senate Banking Committee "plans to introduce similar legislation this summer."

DOJ_NMG_0034592

Transition To Medicare Prescription Drug Plan From Medicaid Still Problematic. USA Today (6/16, Wolf, 2.31M) reports the problems "that plagued low-income seniors and people with disabilities during the rollout of Medicare's prescription-drug program in January have continued on a smaller scale, causing some new beneficiaries to lose coverage or spend their own money at pharmacy counters." The problems "occur when people turn 65 or become eligible for Medicare disability benefits and are involuntarily switched from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare plan. Thousands lose Medicaid drug coverage, typically for two to six weeks, before Medicare kicks in. Health counselors say the trouble dominates their caseloads."

Bush Approval Up To 40% In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (6/15, Hume) reported, "The latest Fox News opinion dynamics poll out today shows President Bush's approval rating up a full five points from a month ago up to 40%. The first time the President's rating has been out of the 30's since February. But the survey taken on the day the President went to Baghdad and the following day found 58% of Americans now disprove of the job Mr. Bush is doing in Iraq. That's up from 55% back in jab."

Federal Retirees Could Get A Large COLA In January. The Washington Post (6/16, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "With consumer prices on the rise, federal retirees are paying more attention to inflation trends and what they mean for their pensions. Several callers this week pointed to a notice posted by the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association that showed that most government retirees have banked 2.9 percent toward their next cost-of-living adjustment. The calculation, based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in May, suggests that federal retirees could be in line for a jumbo COLA in January Of course, it's too early to tell if the run-up in inflation -- a reflection of $3-a-gallon gasoline and other, higher consumer prices -- will continue into the fall, when officials will crunch the numbers for the 2007 COLA."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy Can Handle Increased Energy Prices. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 2, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "had some news for the rest of us today on the high cost of energy. He said it isn't likely to change anytime soon, but he said the American economy can handle it as long as those prices don't rise even more."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bernanke "was speaking to the Economic Club in Chicago, and he said that the impact of higher energy prices appear to be manageable and suddenly it was off to the races at the markets."

The Financial Times (6/16, Guha) says Bernanke "eased nerves on Thursday with a measured assessment of the threat posed by higher energy prices to inflation and growth, as stocks advanced worldwide."

The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Blackstone, 2.11M) reports "economists expect that, in light of the recent rise in core inflation and some hawkish inflation remarks by Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials in recent days, the central bank will most likely raise official interest rates a 17th consecutive time at its June 28-29 meeting, to 5.25%."

Stocks Rally For Second Day. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 2, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's message on energy costs "may have helped the stock market rally today, the Dow up 198 points [to close at 11,015.19], the NASDAQ up more than 58 [to close at 2,144.15.]" ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was "the second rally in a row on Wall Street." The New York Times (6/16, Bajaj, 1.19M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 26.12 points, or 2.1 percent, to close at 1,256.16."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We've been talking about the market and the fear of inflation, and suddenly the stock market goes up today like a skyrocket. What, what's happened?" CBS (Mason) added, "It took off. It was almost a 200-point rally today. It's the biggest rally the Dow has had in more than a year. It climbed back over 11,000 [to close at 11,015.19]. We've had two days of increases now to over 309 points and we're back in positive territory for the year, so that's very encouraging."

DOJ_NMG_0034593

The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Browning, 2.11M) and Washington Post/AP (6/16, D3) also report the stock numbers, while USA Today (6/16, Shell, 2.31M) reports that "while professional investors welcomed the Dow Jones industrial average's 309-point gain to 11,015 on Wednesday and Thursday, they said it did not repair all the damage caused by the 8% swoon it suffered over the past five weeks and advised investors to tread cautiously."

39% Expect Economy To Get Worse Next Year. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "By 39%-16%, Americans expect economy to get worse in next year; 43% say it'll stay the same. Democrats lead on handling the economy by the largest margin, 16 percentage points, since 1993." The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll's margin of error "is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points. Among independents, 25% worry Democrats will too quickly raise taxes and spending. But 37% say Bush's party isn't sufficiently curbing spending and shrinking the deficit. As House and Senate near minimum-wage clashes next week, 55% of independents are more likely to support a candidate who backs an increase."

Factory Output Declines. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Conkey, lp, 2.11M) reports, "Factory output fell slightly last month as manufacturers adjusted to milder consumer demand, and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sounded a guardedly optimistic note on inflation." In "another sign the economy has entered a period of slower growth," the Fed said "industrial production declined 0.1% in May after three consecutive monthly gains, but output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities is still running 4.3% higher than a year earlier. Lower auto production last month spurred a 0.1% decline in the manufacturing sector and mining output dropped as well."

Krugman Says Fed Overreacting To Inflation Threat. In his New York Times column (6/16), Paul Krugman writes he is worried about "the Fed's overreaction," because "when it comes to inflation, the main thing we have to fear is fear itself. Discussions of inflation can be numbingly arcane -- are you a core C.P.I. type or a trimmed-mean P.C.E. person? But the real issue is whether there's a serious risk that inflation will become embedded in the economy. … It would be an exaggeration to say that there's no inflation threat at all," but "it's much easier to think of ways in which the Federal Reserve, wrongly focused on the phantom menace of a new wage-price spiral, could be slow to respond to bigger threats, like a rapidly deflating housing bubble. So I don't fear inflation nearly as much as I fear the fear of inflation. And I wish the Fed would lighten up on the subject."

Glut Looms For US Natural Gas Industry. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Mufson, 744K) reports the "whole world is talking about energy shortages, but for the moment, the U.S. natural gas business is looking at a potential glut." Thanks "in part to a warm winter, inventories of natural gas have built up to levels far greater than normal for this time of year. And terminals built to handle imports of liquefied natural gas from other countries are operating at about half of their capacity." But it is "unfortunately for consumers, a situation that may not last. Energy traders are still pricing futures contracts at high levels, and natural gas producers are planning for big increases in U.S. demand over the coming years." The "only things that can rescue natural gas producers from having to slash prices later this year: another big hurricane or a hot summer."

Altman Says Debate Over High Energy Prices Focused On Wrong Issues. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/16), Roger Altman of Evercore Partners says that in dealing with the US' dependence on foreign energy sources, "Washington is still focused on the wrong issues. Recent talk of price gouging, windfall profits and CEO pay is a distraction. Yes, there may be abuses, but no actions in those areas will have any impact whatsoever on energy prices or supply. Incessant pledges of energy independence within 15 or 20 years, i.e., national self-sufficiency, are completely unattainable and thus misleading. The sweeping embrace of wind, solar and hydrogen power is similarly misplaced, as these are not among the most promising alternatives." What is "needed from Washington are three big steps. First, to confess to the public that America is in deep trouble from its oil dependence and its carbon emissions. Second, to impel oil conservation through deep new incentives and mandates. Third, to finance an acceleration of those technologies which could truly replace oil and gas."

Democrats Hope To Make Electoral Gains In Suburbs. The New York Times (6/16, Egan, 1.19M) reports, "After years in which Republicans capitalized on rapid growth in outlying areas, Democrats now see an opportunity to make gains in close-in suburbs where changes in the composition of the population are working in their favor. In a dozen or so Congressional districts that are leading battlegrounds in the midterm elections, older, more densely packed suburbs are trending Democratic, helping to offset Republican dominance on the sprawling exurban frontier."

DOJ_NMG_0034594

Cheney Confident Of GOP Prospects In 2006. The AP (6/16) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday that the Republicans will prevail in the midterm elections because of a strong economy and the ability of the Bush administration to prevent another terrorist attack." Although polls show the public supports a switch to Democrats, Cheney "cited an economy that's 'kicking along in very good shape' and President Bush's record in the war on terror."

Differences Examined Between 1994, 2006 Election Cycles. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Calmes, 2.11M) reports examines the possibility of a Democratic takeover of Congress by comparing the current political environment with 1994 and noting key differences. Polls currently favor Democrats, but "The number of competitive seats is lower than in 1994, due largely to partisan gerrymandering of the House's 435 districts and to the particular lineup of Senate seats up for election this year." The Bush Administration has had similar domestic policy failures but "the issue dragging down Mr. Bush's standing and Congress's is an unpopular war. 'There was nothing like Iraq in 1994,'" said former NRCC chairman Bill Paxon. Republicans are also facing similar problems with ethics allegations and Democrats appear to be energized, but "Democrats lack a unifying figure like former Rep. Newt Gingrich. … Also, congressional Republicans worked in tandem with then-party chairman Haley Barbour…whereas Democratic leaders have assailed party chairman Howard Dean for not providing enough financial support." And Republicans won key special election victories in formerly safe Democrat districts 1994, but Democrats failed to accomplish that recently in the special election to replace former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Barone Says Democratic Hopes For Watergate-Era Repeat Not Materializing. Michael Barone writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M), "It has been a tough 10 days for those who see current events through the prisms of Vietnam and Watergate. First, the Democrats failed to win a breakthrough victory in the California 50th special election -- a breakthrough that would have summoned up memories of Democrats winning Gerald Ford's old congressional district in a special election in 1974. Instead the Democratic nominee got 45% of the vote, just 1% more than John Kerry did in the district in 2004. Second, US forces with a precision air strike killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on the same day that Iraqis finished forming a government. … Third, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald announced that he would not seek an indictment of Karl Rove. The leftward blogosphere had Mr. Rove pegged for the role of Bob Haldeman and John Ehrlichman. Theories were spun about plea bargains that would implicate Vice President Dick Cheney. Talk of impeachment was in the air. But it turns out that history doesn't repeat itself. George W. Bush, whether you like it or not, is not a second Richard Nixon." Barone later writes, "The pursuit of Karl Rove by the left and the press has been just the latest episode in the attempted criminalization of political differences. Is there any hope that it might turn out to be the last?"

Election Officials Make Preparations For Midterms. The AP (6/16, Lester) reports, "With memories of the disputed 2000 presidential election still fresh, the Election Assistance Commission is encouraging careful preparation by election supervisors, aggressive recruitment of new poll workers and thorough education of voters." It "is sending out a 'Quick Start Management Guide for New Voting Systems' to 6,700 local election officials around the country. The guide is necessary as about a third of voters will be using new machines this year and many longtime poll workers have retired because the punch-card and lever voting machines have been replaced."

Judge Dismisses Much Of GOP Phone-Jamming Lawsuit. The AP (6/16, Wang) reports, "A judge has dismissed most of a Democratic lawsuit against Republicans stemming from the jamming of Democratic phone lines in the November 2002 elections, a crime that led to criminal convictions against three former GOP officials." Representing the Republicans, lawyer Ovide Lamontagne said, "What the court has basically done is reduced this claim, this lawsuit, to a small claims complaint. … A thousand dollars of damage is what we think they could probably show for the interruption of phones for an hour and a half."

Rather To Leave CBS. USA Today (6/16, Johnson, 2.31M) reports Dan Rather, "who stepped down as anchor of

DOJ_NMG_0034595

The CBS Evening News 15 months ago in the wake of the Memogate scandal, said Thursday that he'll soon leave the network after 44 years — at the request of network executives." Rather said, "They wanted this resolution, and I'm willing to accept that and move on."

Research On Genetics, Intelligence Generates Controversy. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Regalado, 2.11M) reports last September, Bruce Lahn, "a professor of human genetics at the University of Chicago, stood before a packed lecture hall and reported the results of a new DNA analysis: He had found signs of recent evolution in the brains of some people, but not of others." But Dr. Lahn "had touched a raw nerve in science: race and intelligence. What Dr. Lahn told his audience was that genetic changes over the past several thousand years might be linked to brain size and intelligence. He flashed maps that showed the changes had taken hold and spread widely in Europe, Asia and the Americas, but weren't common in sub-Saharan Africa." Web sites and magazines "promoting white 'racialism' quickly seized on Dr. Lahn's suggestive scientific snapshot. One magazine that blames black and Hispanic people for social ills hailed his discovery as 'the moment the antiracists and egalitarians have dreaded.'" Dr. Lahn has "drawn sharp fire from other leading genetics researchers. They say the genetic differences he found may not signify any recent evolution -- and even if they do, it is too big a leap to suggest any link to intelligence."

Responsible Fatherhood Pioneer Profiled. The Washington Times (6/16, Wetzstein, 90K) reports Charles Augustus Ballard has "overcome the loss of his coal-miner father, functional illiteracy, a stint in prison and unwed fatherhood. His experiences led him to found in 1982 a national organization that was one of the first -- if not the first -- to promote "responsible fatherhood" as a social policy, the Institute for Responsible Fatherhood and Family Revitalization (IRFFR)." Last month, "one of his dreams came true: The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) announced the availability of its first funding stream dedicated to 'responsible fatherhood' programs." But "for Mr. Ballard, the $32 million announcement comes amid a difficult personal struggle: He came home Wednesday from a Bowie rehabilitation center, where he has been recovering from a devastating stroke suffered in January." Ballard and his wife, Frances, are "already in discussions with several organizations about partnering with the IRFFR. Applications for the new grants are due in two weeks."

Friedman Suggests Creation Of New Green Party. In his New York Times column (6/16), Thomas Friedman says the "recent focus of the Republican-led Congress on divisive diversions, like gay marriage and flag burning, coupled with the unveiling of Unity '08, an Internet-based third party that plans to select its presidential candidate through online voting, has intensified the chatter that a third party, and maybe even a fourth, will emerge in the 2008 election." Most of that talk "has been about how a third party might galvanize voters, using the Web, rather than what it would actually galvanize them to do. I'd like to toss out an idea in the hopes that some enterprising politician or group of citizens — or Unity '08 — will develop it. It's the concept I call 'Geo-Green.'" Its centerpiece "would be a $1 a gallon gasoline tax, called 'The Patriot Tax,' which would be phased in over a year. People earning less than $50,000 a year, and those with unusual driving needs, would get a reduction on their payroll taxes as an offset." The Patriot Tax "would increase the price of gasoline to a level that would ensure that many of the most promising alternatives — ethanol, biodiesel, coal gasification, solar energy, nuclear energy and wind — would all be economically competitive with oil and thereby reduce both our dependence on crude and our emissions of greenhouse gases. In short: the Geo-Green party could claim that it has a plan for shoring up America's energy security, environmental security, economic security and Social Security with one move."

Political Center Said To Be Regaining Power. In his Washington Post column (6/16, A25), David Ignatius says, "For a change, the extreme wings of the two parties aren't calling the shots; bad ideas pitched by one-issue zealots are falling flat; the news out of Iraq is upbeat; the Bush administration is appointing Rockefeller Republicans to top positions." David Brooks of the New York Times "has argued that we're seeing a reanimation of the political center, and I think he's right. The middle is getting tired of the tyranny of the extremes. One sign is the launch this month of Unity08, a bipartisan group that plans to hold an online convention to nominate a split Democratic-Republican 2008 presidential ticket."

NYTimes Criticizes Effort To End Public Financing Of Presidential Elections. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) says in an editorial that, "The nation is fortunate that a sudden attempt to kill one of the hallowed anticorruption reforms from the Watergate scandal — the option of public financing in presidential elections — was smoked out in the House this week." Rep. John Doolittle, the sponsor, "may try another day with his plan to block the flow of taxpayers' voluntary contributions from the government treasury. Mr. Doolittle has such faith in private money-raising that he boosted his family income by setting up his wife, Julie, as a consultant being paid a 15 percent commission on every dollar his campaign raises. Call it family values. Call it brazen. But the missus has received $180,000 since late 2001, operating this private business out of the couple's suburban Virginia home, including among her clients the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The pathetic state of Congressional ethics is that such nepotic profiteering is deemed legal so long as the compensation is 'consistent with the market rate.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034596

WPost Criticizes Maryland Effort To Deal With Rising Electricity Rates. The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) says in an editorial, "In Maryland's efforts to cushion the blow of soaring electricity bills for consumers, there is the distinctive whiff of post-Soviet economic adjustment. Much like the disoriented subjects of former communist regimes a decade ago, Marylanders -- coddled for years by artificially low energy prices -- are suddenly confronted by the trauma of having to pay market rates. Unsurprisingly, they don't like it a bit. And the politicians in Annapolis, just like those hapless old apparatchiks in Moscow, are scrambling for cover." In a "special session of the state legislature, a number of Republican lawmakers broke ranks with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and joined Democrats in providing some rate relief to Baltimore Gas and Electric's 1.2 million residential customers. Instead of bearing the full brunt of a 72 percent increase in their electricity bills next month, BGE ratepayers, mostly around Baltimore but also in some Washington suburbs, will initially be hit with jumps of just 15 percent starting July 1."

Ahmadinejad Reaches Out To Russia, China. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "urged China, Russia and Central Asian nations to increase cooperation and blunt the interference of 'domineering powers' in global affairs -- an apparent reference to the U.S. -- while dangling Iran's energy supplies as an inducement to work together." Ahmadinejad is "under mounting pressure from Washington to curb his country's nuclear ambitions," and in remarks at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, "emphasized that Iran's large reserves of crude oil provide 'conducive grounds' for these countries to cooperate with Tehran." The Journal notes that he "appeared alongside the leaders of Russia and China…in a move that Iran apparently hopes will strengthen its hand and undercut that of its rivals before it enters into potential negotiations with the U.S. and other countries over the future of Tehran's nuclear programs." Meanwhile, the Journal says, US delegation head Greg Schulte told the IAEA that Tehran is "'withholding cooperation' from international inspectors and warned that further intransigence risks the 'weight of the Security Council.' He called on Iran to accept a proposal for multilateral talks."

Also reporting on the Central Asia-focused summit, the Financial Times (6/16, Smyth, Dyer, Khalaf) says Russian President Vladimir Putin "struck an optimistic note on Iran's nuclear crisis, saying Tehran had responded positively to the six-nation package of incentives designed to persuade it to curb its nuclear programme" and "was 'ready to negotiate' with world powers over the proposal. However, it was far from clear that Tehran had in fact accepted the conditions for talks – the suspension of uranium enrichment." The Washington Post (6/16, A14, Cody, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Iran Seeks Aid In Asia In Resisting The West."

The AP (6/16, Karimi) says Tehran "sent mixed signals Thursday on how it will respond to the world's incentives to give up uranium enrichment, with its supreme leader vowing his country would never back down, while the president and chief envoy to the U.N. nuclear watchdog said Tehran was prepared to negotiate." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he fully expected Iran to try any number of ways to shape the debate over its nuclear program. 'I think it is safe to say they will try to test the unity' of the [US and European allies], Snow said."

Senate Endorses Bush Approach To Iran. Separately, the AP (6/16) is also reporting the US Senate "endorsed" by a 99-0 vote "President Bush's diplomatic approach to the problem of Iran's nuclear program after rejecting a proposal that would have increased sanctions against the Tehran government and those helping it."

DOJ_NMG_0034597

Hamas Recommits To Cease-Fire. The Washington Times/AP (6/16, Barzak) reports the Hamas-dominated Palestinian government "offered Thursday to restore a cease-fire with Israel, several days after calling off the truce to protest a deadly explosion on a Gaza beach, but said the calm would depend on Israel's response. Hamas said it is ready to put pressure on other militant groups to halt rocket fire against Israel," which has provoked Israeli retaliations. "Israel welcomed the gesture" and "said Thursday it appeared Hamas was serious about restoring the truce, though the decision was likely a short-term tactical maneuver. They said the group apparently had second thoughts after Israeli threats to kill Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and other government figures."

Chinese Intelligence Officer Reportedly Aided Hamas. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "A Chinese intelligence officer is engaged in covertly aiding the ruling Palestinian Hamas terrorist group, according to a Paris-based intelligence newsletter. Gong Xiaosheng was identified as a Ministry of State Security (MSS) official who has worked out of Ramallah since November 2002, Intelligence Online reported in its June 9 edition. … According to the report, Mr. Gong in the past was constantly seen in the company of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat but has since begun helping Hamas."

Rockets Fired From Gaza Could Ignite Conflict. The New York Times (6/16, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "The Qassam rocket is not much to look at: a 70-pound tube of rough steel and hand-mixed explosive, like the one that pounded through the roof of Universe Packaging here on Thursday. Tons of falling concrete just missed Lior Levi, 28, a worker there. … However crude, the Qassam rocket, fired by Palestinian militants from Gaza into Israel, has nonetheless won its spot as symbol of the moment in the long conflict here. At a delicate time, the rocket is not only raising tensions between Palestinians and Israelis, as usual, but is also dividing Palestinian from Palestinian, Israeli from Israeli." The Times adds, "Most immediately, the number of rockets fired by Palestinians from Gaza, and whether they happen to hit anyone, will be crucial in determining whether the Israeli-Palestinian conflict explodes again into high-intensity warfare."

North Korea Said To Be Moving Toward Missile Test. The Financial Times (6/16, Sevastopul, Fifield) reports remarks by "a Bush administration official" that "North Korean preparations for a possible long-range missile test have advanced to where Pyongyang could launch a Taepodong-2 missile on 'very short notice.' A senior Bush administration official last week said the US was not yet 'on the edge of our seat.' But another official on Thursday said more recent intelligence suggested Pyongyang was now much closer to being ready to conduct a test." The Times adds, "Taking the threat of a possible test very seriously, the Pentagon has positioned military assets to deal with any launch." The Times notes NSA Stephen Hadley said this week that "it would be a 'bad idea' for North Korea to conduct a test, and urged Pyongyang to return to the six-party talks which have been stalled since last September."

US "Defensive Measures" Costing North Korea Millions. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, 90K) reports, "US economic 'defensive measures' aimed at curbing illegal activities by North Korea have cost the Pyongyang regime millions of dollars in lost cash over the past several months through banking restrictions and other actions, US officials estimate." The Times adds, "One sign that the economic measures are hurting the communist regime in North Korea is Pyongyang's continued refusal to rejoin six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the United States lifts what it regards as sanctions, said Bush administration officials involved in Asia matters."

Bush To Push For Trade Deal As Doha Deadline Looms. With time running out on the World Trade Organization's Doha round of trade talks, the Wall Street Journal (6/16, A6, Hitt, 2.11M) reports President Bush "hopes to kick-start negotiations on a visit to Europe next week. But major issues remain, particularly over cuts in farm subsidies." In a speech yesterday, the president "pressed major players in negotiations to look past their differences," saying the talks are "at a critical moment." The Journal says his remarks "represent a rare direct foray into the global trade debate. But they come as the Bush administration is making a more concerted effort to raise the US profile overseas."

The Washington Times (6/16, Dinan, 90K) notes that the Administration bas "been pushing for the broader agreement," but Thursday's speech by the president "elevates the stakes and the pressure to complete an agreement." The AP (6/15, Riechmann) also reports on the president's comments.

DOJ_NMG_0034598

WTO Failure Would Be "Huge Disappointment" For White House. The New York Times (6/16, Weisman, 1.19M) reports the newly confirmed US Trade Representative Susan Schwab has "a deadline of six weeks or so to succeed or fail." While President Bush praised his new envoy on Thursday as "a good, hard negotiator," Schwab "faces long odds as trade diplomats struggle to salvage a global accord that the Bush administration hopes will be one of its signal economic achievements." If trade officials are unable to resolve at "a critical meeting in late July," the Times says the "failure to achieve a deal could prove a huge disappointment for the White House." Schwab is "certainly prepared to step into the role," but critics her appointment was "a sign that the Bush administration was scaling back its hopes for a successful Doha negotiation."

US Will Drop Opposition To Unified Asian Currency. The Financial Times (6/16, Guha, Mallet) reports, "The US on Thursday signalled it would not fight efforts to create an Asian currency unit, turning the page on over a decade of largely consistent opposition to Asian monetary integration." US "officials said the move is intended to show that the US does not fear greater monetary co-operation between Asia's rising economic powers and wants to play a constructive role in helping to shape it." The Times adds, "The green light from the US is a big boost for Japan, which has been pushing the idea of an Asian currency unit loosely modelled on the European currency unit, the precursor to the euro, in face of considerable regional scepticism. It comes at a time of growing diplomatic closeness between Washington and Tokyo."

Sri Lankan Violence Could Portend War. The New York Times (6/16, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports the Sri Lankan military "pounded rebel posts in the northern and eastern parts of the country by land, sea and air on Thursday, …after a land mine explosion ripped through a crowded passenger bus on Thursday morning in northern Sri Lanka." The Times calls the bus bombing "the most serious attack on civilians since the government and rebels signed a cease-fire four years ago," and adds, "The greater uncertainty was whether the deadly events on Thursday were the beginning of full-scale war. Despite mounting violence, neither side has been willing to explicitly renounce the February 2002 cease-fire." This year has seen "several months of carnage" between the government, the Tigers and the eastern-based Karuna Group.

The Financial Times (6/16, Merchant) says the government in Colombo "unleashed military attacks against Tamil targets after rebels blew up a bus killing at least 64 civilians in the worst terrorist atrocity since a ceasefire four years ago." This violence follows "intense diplomatic activity designed to forestall what many neutral observers say is a slow slide into a civil war." The Washington Times/AP (6/16, Ganguly) and Los Angeles Times (6/16, Chu, 958K) also report on the attacks.

Syrians Feel Pressure Is Off As Hariri Investigation Continues. The New York Times (6/126, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that there is a sense in Damascus that "the pressure was off" and Syria "was no longer in danger of being charged or punished by the international community," even as the UN Security Council voted yesterday to extend the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. There was also "a feeling here that Syria might simply be sitting in the eye of the storm. Officials at the highest levels fear that the new low-key investigator, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, may in the long run prove more dangerous than his high-profile predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, according to political analysts and people who work with the government." The Times adds, "Faced with such uncertainty, but also empowered by the release of immediate pressure, the leadership here has tried to shore up its position, bracing for the day when, or if, a damning report is produced."

Somalia Contact Group Holds First Meeting. The AP (6/16, Wadhams) reports that the International Somalia Contact Group, a US-organized group of nations concerned about the growing power of Islamic militants in Somalia, held its first meeting yesterday and lent its support "to the country's weak interim government and demanded unfettered access so aid groups can help its impoverished people." The group "also called for dialogue between the government and the Islamic militants who have taken over the capital Mogadishu and other areas of the lawless country after months of fighting that have killed more than 330. … U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier, who co-chaired the meeting, said the group 'will help to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034599

The New York Times (6/16, Cooper, 1.19M) reports, "The countries in the group are the United States, Britain, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Tanzania. The document represents a resurgence for the State Department, where officials have been critical of the Bush administration's policy on Somalia, which consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords to help them defeat the Islamists." The Times also notes that Washington "is adopting a more conciliatory approach to the Islamists. Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's top Africa official, had kind words yesterday about a second letter from Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group."

Demonstrators Oppose Foreign Peacekeepers In Somalia. Meanwhile, in a separate story, the AP (6/16, Hassan) reports, "Hundreds of supporters of the Islamic group that holds Somalia's capital and much of the south demonstrated Thursday against a proposal to deploy foreign peacekeepers. … In Mogadishu, the demonstrators gathered at the main stadium carrying placards that read, 'We don't need foreign peacekeepers,' and 'We can restore peace and stability ourselves.'"

Knight Ridder (6/16, Allam) reports, "To many Somalis, the Islamist takeover was the natural culmination of a religious movement that took root with the withdrawal of international forces in 1995 and blossomed as residents turned to faith in the absence of any government. … To many Somalis struggling to raise families in their anarchic city, a pious lifestyle is a small price to pay for security."

Somali Leaders Say US Can't Afford To Ignore Ayro. Knight Ridder (6/16, Allam) reports, "Even in the violent, anarchic landscape of Mogadishu, Adan Hashi Ayro stands out. Some describe him as a ruthless holy warrior, a student of the Taliban and a relentless fighter who can scale walls and jump from moving trucks without dropping his weapon. Others offer a more sympathetic portrait of a misguided young militant who is at odds with his own clan, bitter over foreign meddling in Somalia and the scapegoat of U.S. agents who needed to put a face on their enemy. Somali community leaders agree, however, that the United States can't afford to ignore Ayro, who they say was crucial to the recent victory of the militant Islamic Courts Union over U.S.-backed warlords. If Ayro splits with the Islamic Courts' relatively moderate leadership, he could form an army of extremists prepared to attack American interests in the Horn of Africa, they fear."

Islamic Militia Leader Decries Terrorists. The Washington Post (6/16, A14, Timberg, 744K) reports that Sharif Ahmed, the leader of Somalia's increasingly powerful Islamic militias "sent a letter to the United States this week asserting that they would assist international efforts to prevent the fractured, chaotic country from becoming "a transit route or hiding ground" for terrorists." The letter "gives a direct though conciliatory response to concerns by U.S. officials that the Islamic militias harbor terrorists linked to attacks across East Africa, including the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania." In the letter, Ahmed, chairman of the "loosely organized confederation of Islamic militias that took control of Mogadishu" last week, "compared international terrorists such as al-Qaeda to the brutal warlords who had ruled the city since 1991."

Senate Approves $60 Million For UN Darfur Peacekeeping Mission. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 7, 4:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate today approved $60 million for a UN peacekeeping mission in the Darfur region of Western Sudan, where three years of fighting between rebels and government-backed Arab militias have killed 180,000 people and left 2 million homeless."

US, Russia Extend Program For Eradicating Soviet WMD. USA Today (6/16, Eisler, 2.31M) reports, "U.S. and Russian officials have agreed on terms for a seven-year extension of programs that provide U.S. money and expertise to secure and destroy Soviet-era caches of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons." USA Today adds, "Bush has hailed the programs as an important part of the administration's efforts to keep terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction. But the programs' future has been in flux since 2004 due to a U.S.-Russian dispute over liability protections for U.S. companies, workers and government personnel working at Russian weapons sites."

Former Liberian Leader May Serve Sentence In UK. The New York Times (6/16, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "Britain said on Thursday that the former Liberian president, Charles Taylor, might serve his sentence in a British prison if he is convicted at his forthcoming war crimes trial." Other European countries had refused to take Taylor but British foreign minister Margaret Beckett "said the decision to take in

DOJ_NMG_0034600

Mr. Taylor…was evidence of Britain's "commitment to international justice."

The Washington Post (6/16, A16, Lynch, 744K) notes, "U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the decision. 'I am very grateful to Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett for this statesmanlike decision, which marks another step forward in our battle against impunity for the most heinous crimes,' Annan said."

Cholera Epidemic Spreading In Angola. The New York Times (6/16, LaFraniere, 1.19M) reports that despite the wealth Angola has earned from its oil industry, the country's poor living conditions have led to a cholera epidemic. Experts blame the government which "seems powerless to address even the basic issues of clean water and sewers that would make such epidemics entirely preventable — a paradox that critics attribute to corruption, incompetence or the hangover of a 27-year civil war that flooded the capital with refugees, or all three."

Top Uganda Officials Accused Of Corruption. The Washington Times (6/16, Witter, 90K) reports, "Uganda, which continues to win praise from President Bush and others as a model of success battling AIDS, is reeling from the disclosure that top officials, their relatives and colleagues siphoned off tens of millions of dollars in grants from the Geneva-based Global Fund." The Times notes, "Money went to charities that did not exist, into the personal bank accounts of government employees and even to fund a nationwide campaign to scrap term limits so that President Yoweri Museveni could run for a third term in office."

Annan Confident UN Will Avoid Shutdown Despite Dispute With US. The New York Times (6/16, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Secretary General Kofi Annan said Thursday that he thought the United Nations would avoid a threatened budget showdown at the end of this month over management changes, but he warned against threats to 'pull the plug' on the organization if it did not meet some countries' expectations." US ambassador John Bolton "has periodically hinted that if sufficient changes are not made, the United States Congress will move to withhold its United Nations dues." But "Annan predicted that the progress being made now would be sufficient to forestall a crisis" and "that the tactic pressed by the United States had provoked a strong reaction from many nations."

The Washington Times (6/16, Pisik, 90K) reports, "U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who negotiated the six-month spending authority with other countries in late December, said yesterday that the Bush administration, European Union and Japan have been meeting with the powerful bloc of 132 developing nations and were working toward a consensus on how to streamline the organization to mutual satisfaction." Bolton said, "Our positions were quite in accord with one another. … We have tried not to draw lines in the sand."

US Seen As Reluctantly Working With Allies. Philip Stephens in his column in the Financial Times (6/16) writes that "For all Mr Bolton's bluster, George W. Bush's administration has acknowledged that acting effectively in the world requires legitimacy as well as power. No one hates the idea of admitting this more than its ambassador in New York." But "If the wilder ambitions of Mr Bolton have been decisively checked by Iraq, America remains the indispensable power. How it exercises that power determines the shape and stability of the global system. We can probably expect no more of this administration than its reluctant conversion to pragmatism. But one of these days an American president needs to explain that Roosevelt and Truman were not altruists. They built the UN because, for all its inevitable flaws, it serves American interests."

Chavez Popular With US Leftists. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, A1, Davis, 2.11M) in a front page story reports, "To a slice of the American left," Venezuelan president Hugo Chávez "has become a revolutionary hero nearly on a par with Che Guevara and Fidel Castro." Whenever "Chávez clashes with Mr. Bush -- most recently over the Venezuelan's torpedoing of a U.S. effort to create a hemispheric free-trade agreement -- his stock rises with the amalgam of college students, antiglobalization protesters and graying allies of Central American rebels."

China Seeks Tighter Controls Over Economic Growth. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "China's premier, Wen Jiabao, has ordered banks and local governments to tighten financing for construction projects, the state media reported Thursday, signaling growing unease among top leaders that an ongoing surge of investment is imperiling the world's fastest-growing major economy." The Post notes, "China's leaders are again grappling with the prospect that excessive economic growth -- erecting more factories and office towers than even this giant country can use -- could give way to a disastrous bust and cause prices to plunge. That could leave China's banks, stocked with about $500 billion in bad loans, facing an even larger toll."

DOJ_NMG_0034601

Krauthammer Criticizes Palestinians For Failing To Accept Negotiated Peace. Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K) blames the Palestinians for the recent deaths of a family after an Israeli missile reportedly struck a beach in Gaza because the Palestinians have failed to accept offers of peace. The Palestinians "are offered an independent state. They are given all of Gaza. And they respond with rocket attacks into peaceful Israeli towns -- in pre-1967 Israel proper, mind you." Krauthammer asks, "What can Israel do but try to take out those rocket bases and their crews? What would the United States do if rockets were raining into San Diego from across the border with Mexico? Now look again at that terrible photograph and ask yourself: Who is responsible for the heart-rending grief of that poor Palestinian girl?"

O'Grady Sees Private Investment As Remedy For Mexican Economy. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her column in the Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) asks "Why, in the midst of this energy boom, is Mexico so poor, while Alberta lives large? My guess is that it has to do with the fact that the Canadian province welcomes private-sector investment (otherwise known as money) in its energy sector while Mexico has a government-owned oil monopoly (Pemex) and forbids private-sector risk capital." O'Grady states, "Mexico's President Vicente Fox likes to talk about his concerns for the dignity of Mexican migrants in the U.S. But as long as the country clings to the Pemex monopoly, it will be hard to take Mr. Fox or any Mexican president seriously when he feigns concern for jobless Mexicans."

WSJournal Blames Airbus Meltdown On European Subsidies. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "Airbus is fast becoming the current airborne testament to the hubris of state-led industrial policy in Europe. Driven as much by political ego as business sense, the aircraft maker flew for the sun only, like Icarus, to see its wings start to melt away." The meltdown in its stock prices last week, "is portrayed as a blow to European pride rather than to the company's shareholders and millions of air travelers, who will suffer directly. This is the real trans-Atlantic gap. Americans tend to judge corporations by the bottom line, not the national flag. Europeans relate to big companies as to their World Cup teams. In this they get plenty of encouragement from politicians, in particular the Gallic variety, who think business is their business." But without the "subsidies and politics, Airbus would be free to behave like a normal company. It is not that today."

NYTimes Sees Benefits In Russian Experiment With Young Politicians. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "If the young will line up to sing badly for national attention or eat worms for money, why not get them to compete for political office?" The idea "has apparently taken hold in parts of Russia, where political leaders have begun to worry that their Parliament is a little too heavy on middle-aged men." The Times conclude, "Russian politics is not exactly a model of democracy, of course, but maybe, for those trying to interest young American voters, a political reality show might not be such a bad idea. Let's face it, looking at the demographics, it could hardly hurt."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Congress Wages Partisan Battle Over Iraq War."
"A Long Fight To Free Man Convicted Of Child Abuse Killing."
"Bill Gates Programs New Life As Donor."
"Mexico's Calderon: Chasing A Legacy."
"Assembly Speaker Warns Villaraigosa That School Takeover Plan Is In Serious Trouble."
"Supreme Court Weakens Police 'Knock And Announce' Rule."

USA Today:

"Justices Allow No-Knock Searches."
"Alaska Is Front Line Vs. Avian Virus."
"Drug-Plan Shuffle Disrupts Coverage."

New York Times:

"Congress Erupts In Partisan Fight Over War In Iraq."
"U.S. Portrayal Helps Flesh Out Zarqawi's Heir."
"In Oil-Rich Angola, Cholera Preys Upon Poorest."
"Gates To Cede Software Reins In Era Change."
"'06 Race Focuses On The Suburbs, Inner And Outer."

DOJ_NMG_0034602

"U.S.-Style Pay Deals For Chiefs Become All The Rage In Europe."

Washington Post:

"Parties Face Off Over Iraq War In 11-Hour Debate."
"Militias Hold Sway In Prisons, Iraqi Says."
"Malvo Claims 4 Other Shootings, Source Says."
"Court Eases 'No Knock' Search Ban."
"Metro Board Member Fired For Comment On Gays."
"Bill Gates, Version 2.0: Full-Time Philanthropist."

Washington Times:

"Papers Reveal Weakening Terror Group."
"Uganda Shaken By Fund Scandal."
"U.S. Troop Pullout From Iraq From Iraq Rejected By Senate."
"Pioneer Urges 'Responsible Fatherhood.'"
"Bash Set For Tai Shan's Birthday."
"Baghdad On The Bayou."
"IPods Offer Athletes Easy Access To Game Videos."

Detroit Free Press:

"Tiger Stadium: It's History."
"Soon, Urban Drivers Can Go 70 M.P.H."
"Cops Don't Have To Knock."
"Dude, Where's My Gun?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Atlanta To Launch N.Y.-Style Marathon."
"Airlines Jump On Fare Hike."
"State Reworks New Grading System."
"Out Of The Hospital, But Into A Flap Over Risk-Prone Athletes."
"Life After GM: Early Retiree Feels At Home With Homeless."

Houston Chronicle:

"High Court Back No-Knock Search."
"Something In The Air At Bush?"
"Battle Breaks Out In Congress On Pros, Cons Of U.S. Pullout."
"List Of Teen Deaths Grows With Two More Shootings."
"Like Many At Rice, Coach Is A True Scholar In His Field."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Gates Stepping Down; Gates-Philanthropy; Stock Markets; Iraq-2500 US KIAs; Bush-Supplemental Spending Bill; Al Qaeda Documents; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve; Supreme Court-Police Searches; Pittsburgh QB Released; LA-Conjoined Twins; Mine Safety Bill; Woman Bowler.

CBS: Iraq-Zarqawi's Successor; Zarqawi's Successor-Background; Congress-Iraq War; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Gates Stepping Down; Mexican Border-National Guard; South Sudan-Aid Needs; Pittsburgh QB Released; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve.

NBC: Gates Stepping Down; Bernanke-Energy Prices; Iraq-2500 US KIAs; Iraq-Zarqawi's Successor; Baghdad Crackdown; Congress-Iraq War; Killer Heroin; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve; Supreme Court-Police Searches; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Iraq-American Deejay.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: House-Iraq Resolution; Jefferson Removed From Ways And Means; Wall Street; Foreign Stock Markets.

CBS: Iraq-Security; Iran-Nuclear Program; India-Flooding; Jefferson Removed From Ways And Means; Prostate Cancer.

NPR: Iran-Nuclear Program; Iraq-US Death Toll; National Guard-Border Patrols; Oil Prices; Foreign Stock Markets; Taylor Trial; Microsoft-Gates Stepping Down.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Friends of Dave Reichert and Washington State Republican Party reception, Private residence, Medina, Wash.; attends Heather Wilson for Congress reception, Hyatt Regency Albuquerque.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks at a Jon Kyl for Senate luncheon, Hilton Scottsdale Resort, Scottsdale, Ariz.; attends performance of Tomas and the Library Lady, Boys and Girls Club of the East Valley, Guadalupe, Ariz.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Routine morning business until 10:45am. Highlights: After morning business, Senate resumes consideration of S. 2766, Defense Authorization.

10 a.m. HUMAN RIGHTS-ROMA _ Helsinki Commission holds briefing on the Roma human rights situation, spotlighting the Europes largest ethnic minority. Witnesses: Madga Matache; Romani Center for Social Intervention and Studies, Romania; Timea Junghaus, Arts and Culture Network Program, Open Society Institute, Hungary; Tano Bechev, Regional Policy Development Centre, Bulgaria; Nicolae Gheorghe, Office for Democratic

DOJ_NMG_0034603

Institutions and Human Rights, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Location: Room 226 Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.Res.861 - Declaring that th U.S. will prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary.

9 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on the synthetic drug control strategy. Scott Burns, Deputy Director for State and Local Affairs, White House Office of National Drug Control Policy; Uttam Dhillon, Director of Office of Counter-Narcotics Enforcement, Department of Homeland Security; Joseph Rannazzissi, Deputy Assistant Administrator, Office of Diversion Control, Drug Enforcement Administration; Don Young, Acting Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, Department of Health and Human Services; Ron Brooks, President of National Narcotic Officers' Associations' Coalition; Eric Coleman, Oakland County Commissioner (Mich.); Lewis E. Gallant, Executive Director, National Association of State Alcohol and Drug Abuse Directors; Sherry Green, Executive Director, National Alliance for Model State Drug Laws; Sue Thau, Public Policy Consultant, Community Anti-Drug Coalition of America. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on services for the disabled in the District of Columbia. Testimony from Robert Bobb, Deputy Mayor/City Administrator, DC; Brenda Donald Walker, Deputy Mayor of Children, Youth, Families, and Elders; Marsha Thompson, Former Director, Mental Retardation Development and Disabilities Administration; Holly Morrison, Vice President and Chief Administrative Officer, The Council on Quality and Leadership; Robert M. Gettings, Executive Director, National Association of State Directors of Developmental Disabilities Services. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee. Hearing on legislation dealing with security screening processes for trucks. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

Other: KATRINA COMMISSION _ The Katrina National Justice Commission, sponsored by the the Samuel DeWitt Proctor Conference, holds its first round of hearings to discuss successes and failures regarding Hurricane Katrina. Location: Lutheran Church of the Reformation, 212 E Capitol St.

AMERICAN-ARAB ANTI-DISCRIMINATION _ The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee holds its 26th annual convention. Highlights: 12 p.m. Session on the media, with Helen Thomas, Mike Wallace and Jim Naureckas of Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting. Washington Rooms 1-2. 1:30 p.m. Luncheon session, with Rep. Mary Rose Oakar and retired Col. Larry Wilkerson. Cotillion Ballroms. 3 p.m. Session on Lebanon, with Amb. Farid Abboud, others. Washington Rooms 1-2. 7 p.m. Banquet, with awards to Mike Wallace of 60 Minutes; Osama Siblani of Arab American News; actor Ghassan Massoud; movie director Hany Abu-Assad; and Lifetime Achievement Award to actor Omar Sharif. Marriott Ballroom. Location: Washington Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

COPENHAGEN CONSENSUS _ The Copenhagen Consensus Center and Georgetown University, along with nine UN ambassadors, hold a conference on how to cope with major global challenges with limited funds. Highlights: 8 a.m. Media briefing on malnutrition and hunger. 9:30 a.m. Media briefing with US Amb. to the UN John Bolton, India Amb. to the UN Nirupam Sen, and Bjorn Lomborg, director of the Copenhagen Consensus Center. 12 p.m. Media briefing on climate change. Location: Georgetown University, unless otherwise noted.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW _ The American Constitution Society for Law and Policy holds its national convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton delivers a ``major'' speech on privacy rights. 9:45 a.m. Plenary session on separation of powers, with former Sen. Gary Hart, others. 1:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker: Rep. Barney Frank. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Captiol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

TAX POLICY _ 9 a.m. Tax Analysts holds an event on key issues in tax policy, with Katherine Baicker of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, others. Location: National Press Club.

US-INDIA-ENERGY _ 9 a.m. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman delivers remarks at the National Academies U.S.-India Conference, along with Vice Chairman Montek Singh Ahluwalia. Location: National Academy of Sciences, 2100 C St.NW.

EMPLOYERS-HEALTH INSURANCE _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings Institution-New America Foundation hosts a forum, ``Employment-Based Health Insurance: A Prominent Past, but Does it Have a Future?'' Panel one participants are:

DOJ_NMG_0034604

Moderator Henry Aaron, senior fellow, Brookings Institution; and Andrew Stern, president, Service Employees International Union. Panel two participants are: Moderator Len Nichols, director, Health Policy Program, New America Foundation; John Matthews, senior vice president, Costco; and Todd McCracken, president, National Small Business Association. Location: Falk Auditorium, The Brookings Institution, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NET NEUTRALITY _ 9:15 a.m. The Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet holds a discussion on ``Net Neutrality," with Mike McCurry of the Hands Off the Internet group, Paul Misener of Amazon, others. Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW.

FEMA BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. FEMA Director David Paulison and senior FEMA officials hold pen-and-pad media briefing on hurricane preparations and operations. Location: Discovery Room, FEMA HQ, 500 C St. NW.

JOHANNS _ 10 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks at the 2006 Allard Capital Conference. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

NUCLEAR RENAISSANCE _ 10 a.m. Dr. Nils J. Diaz, Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, will be the guest at a media breakfast, sponsored by The Energy Daily and cosponsor BP America. Location: Suite 1003, 1325 G St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-AGENDA _ 10:15 a.m. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, and members of the House and Senate Democratic leadership hold a news conference to ``announce a new direction for America." discuss Democrats' commitment to fighting for a new direction for America." Location: S-207, US Capitol.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, commander of the Multi-National Division-Baghdad, will brief live from Iraq at 9 a.m. EDT. Location: Pentagon briefing room.

NUCLEAR STATES _ 12 p.m. The Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council holds a briefing on the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs, with David Albright of the Institute for Science and International Security, Thomas Donnelly of AEI, and Robert Gallucci of the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn.

MEDICAID _ 12:15 p.m. The Alliance for Health Reform and the Commonwealth Fund hold a luncheon briefing on improving coverage stability for kids in Medicaid and SCHIP, with Laura Summer of Georgetown University, Stan Dorn of the Economic and Social Research Institute, others. Location: Room 325, Russell.

CHAO _ 1:30 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao speaks at the Clare Boothe Luce Policy Institute seminar. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena NSA Surveillance Documents .. 3
Bush's Comments On Hamdan Case Could Signal Detainee About-Face ... 3
New Jersey Seeks Telephone Surveillance Data From US ... 3
Defense Lawyer Says FBI Agent Tricked Georgia Terror Suspect Into Confessing ... 4
Some Canadian Muslim Leaders Urge Crackdown On Extremists ... 4
Plaintiffs Lawyer Compares Ruling In 9/11 Case To Japanese Internment ... 4
Kinsley Condemns Administration Anti-Terror Tactics ... 4

Homeland Response:

DHS Stands By Risk-Analysis Process For Anti-Terror Funding .. 4
"Unusual Circumstances" Surrounding DHS Limo Contract Outlined At Hearing ... 5
Rumsfeld Attends Ground Breaking For Pentagon 9/11 Memorial ... 5
Pataki, Bloomberg Hear Recommendations For WTC Memorial .. 6

War News:

Senate Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Measure As Both Chambers Debate War ... 6
Purported Al Qaeda Documents Suggest US Counter-Insurgency Effort Working ... 8
US Death Toll In Iraq Reaches "Sad Benchmark" Of 2,500 Dead 9
Suicide Attack On Shiite Mosque Kills At Least Seven ... 9
Iraqi Prime Minister Indicates Government May Offer Limited Amnesty To Insurgents ... 10
US Transition Teams Aid Iraqi Troops In Baghdad Crackdown .. 10
US Commanders Release Photo Of New Al Qaeda In Iraq Leader ... 10
Shiite Militias Said To Control Iraqi Prison System ... 10
Alleged Iraq Agent Charged With Lying To FBI About Oil-For-Food Role ... 11
Military Investigates Killing Of Three Civilians At Northern Iraq Checkpoint ... 11
Sources Expect Marines To Face Charges Over Haditha Incident ... 11
US Reservist Becomes Attraction On Armed Forces Radio In Iraq ... 11
Louisiana Center Prepares Soldiers For Iraqi Battlefield ... 11
Bomb Kills Eight On Bus Taking Workers To Afghan Air Base ... 12
Taliban's Appeal Grows In Pakistani Tribal Areas ... 12
Pet Projects Said To Trump Strategic Priorities In Defense Spending Boom ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud ... 12
Enron Defense Firm Still Waiting For Fees ... 12
Former HealthSouth Executive Sentenced To Eight Years ... 13
US Subpoenas Medarex In Option Backdating Probe ... 13
EMI Settles Payola Probe With Spitzer For $3.75 Million ... 13
Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings ... 13
Accountant Firms Prove To Be Financial Beneficiaries Of Sarbanes-Oxley ... 14
WSJournal Weighs In On Milberg Weiss Indictments ... 14

Criminal Law:

House Democrats Vote 99-58 To Remove Jefferson From Ways And Means ... 14
Jury To Resume Deliberations In Safavian Case Today ... 15
Former Chicago Official Told FBI He Copied Hiring Files Out Of Fear For His Life ... 15
Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge Still At Large ... 16
DOJ Official Says Online Threats On The Rise ... 16
Supreme Court Rules Evidence Seized In Searches Without Knocking Admissible ... 16
Former Prosecutor Relishes Role In Recovering Roosevelt Pistol ... 17
Kentucky High Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed ... 17
Maryland Police Have No Evidence Linking VA Theft To Other Burglaries ... 18
Malvo Told Police Of Other Shootings ... 18
Maryland Governor To Sign Bill Strengthening Laws On Sex Offenders ... 18

Civil Law:

Honeywell Settles Whistleblower Charges With US For $2.6 Million ... 19
St. Barnabas Health Care To Pay $265 Million Medicare Fraud Settlement ... 19

Civil Rights:
Former DOJ Attorney Pleads Guilty To Conflict Charges In California ... 19
FBI Investigating Alleged Racist Firing By Washington State Police Chief ... 20
Los Angeles Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Police Shooting ... 20
Senate Panel Approves Flag Desecration Amendment ... 20
Louisiana Senate Alters Bill To Change Open Primary Elections 20
Baltimore Police, Jail Sued For Arrests Without Charges ... 20
California Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job ... 21
Ehrlich Fires Appointee Over Remarks On Gays ... 21
WPost Criticizes House Over Military Rules On Religious Expression ... 21

Antitrust:
Official Pleads Guilty To Military Bid-Rigging ... 21
Bill Gates To Relinquish Day-To-Day Control Of Microsoft For Philanthropy ... 21
Vinci Rebuffs Veolia's Merger Proposal ... 22

Environment:
Bush Authorizes Marine Reserve In Northwest Hawaiian Islands 22
Democrats Say EPA Blocked Information About Toxic Sites ... 23
Sago Mine Disaster Survivor Attends Mine Safety Bill Signing ... 23
Bill Clinton Applauds Evangelical Focus On Global Warming ... 24
Alaska Seen As Front Line In US Battle Against Bird Flu ... 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
FBI Solicits Bids To Create Nationwide Crime Data Network ... 24
North Carolina FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation For Ethics Violation ... 24
FBI Approval At 42% In Wall Street Journal Poll ... 24
DEA Arrests 22 In Heroin-Smuggling Investigation ... 25
Report: Fentanyl Linked To Nearly 200 Deaths ... 25
DC Man Acquitted Of Drug, Conspiracy Charges ... 25
Selig Writes Letter To Fans, Says MLB Will Fund HGH Study ... 25
Mail, Garbage Provided Clues In Federal Steroid Investigation ... 26
CA: Thousands Of Marijuana Plants Found On Forest Service Land ... 26
US Charges New York Jeweler In Cocaine Money-Laundering Scheme ... 26
Mississippi Man Arrested In Federal Witness Slaying ... 26
West Virginia Attorney Jailed On Gun Charges ... 26
House Appropriators Approve Explosives Fee To Help Fund ATF ... 26

Immigration:
Report Says Senate Bill Would Grant Amnesty To 14.4 Million Illegal Immigrants ... 27

Congress-Administration:
Bush Signs Supplemental Spending Bill ... 27
Bush Signs Bill Boosting Broadcast Indecency Fines ... 28
Senate Confirms Bush FDIC Nominee ... 28
Bush Hosts Congressional Picnic ... 28
Bush Apologizes For Teasing Sight-Impaired Reporter Over Sunglasses ... 28
Spellings Has Undertaken Extensive Foreign Travel ... 28
Credit Overhaul Bill Seen As Gaining Momentum ... 28
Transition To Medicare Prescription Drug Plan From Medicaid Still Problematic ... 29
Bush Approval Up To 40% In Fox News Poll ... 29
Federal Retirees Could Get A Large COLA In January ... 29

Other News:
Bernanke Says Economy Can Handle Increased Energy Prices 29
Glut Looms For US Natural Gas Industry ... 30
Democrats Hope To Make Electoral Gains In Suburbs ... 30
Cheney Confident Of GOP Prospects In 2006 ... 30
Differences Examined Between 1994, 2006 Election Cycles ... 30
Election Officials Make Preparations For Midterms ... 31
Judge Dismisses Much Of GOP Phone-Jamming Lawsuit ... 31
Rather To Leave CBS ... 31
Research On Genetics, Intelligence Generates Controversy ... 31
Responsible Fatherhood Pioneer Profiled ... 31
Friedman Suggests Creation Of New Green Party ... 32
Political Center Said To Be Regaining Power ... 32
NYTimes Criticizes Effort To End Public Financing Of Presidential Elections ... 32
WPost Criticizes Maryland Effort To Deal With Rising Electricity Rates ... 32
Ahmadinejad Reaches Out To Russia, China ... 32
Hamas Recommits To Cease-Fire ... 33
North Korea Said To Be Moving Toward Missile Test ... 33
Bush To Push For Trade Deal As Doha Deadline Looms ... 34
US Will Drop Opposition To Unified Asian Currency ... 34
Sri Lankan Violence Could Portend War ... 34
Syrians Feel Pressure Is Off As Hariri Investigation Continues ... 34
Somalia Contact Group Holds First Meeting ... 34
Senate Approves $60 Million For UN Darfur Peacekeeping Mission ... 35
US, Russia Extend Program For Eradicating Soviet WMD ... 35
Former Liberian Leader May Serve Sentence In UK ... 35
Cholera Epidemic Spreading In Angola ... 36
Top Uganda Officials Accused Of Corruption ... 36
Annan Confident UN Will Avoid Shutdown Despite Dispute With US ... 36
Chavez Popular With US Leftists ... 36
China Seeks Tighter Controls Over Economic Growth ... 36
Krauthammer Criticizes Palestinians For Failing To Accept Negotiated Peace ... 36
O'Grady Sees Private Investment As Remedy For Mexican Economy ... 37
WSJournal Blames Airbus Meltdown On European Subsidies ... 37
NYTimes Sees Benefits In Russian Experiment With Young Politicians ... 37

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 37

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington ... 38

DOJ_NMG_0034607

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena NSA Surveillance Documents. The AP (6/16, Kellman) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter cranked up his dispute with the Bush administration over executive power on Thursday, threatening to subpoena documents on the White House's warrantless surveillance program." The AP continues, "Specter said he had not received a response to his request that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appear before the panel this month to answer questions about the surveillance program and other touchy subjects – such as the FBI raid on a lawmaker's office last month. … 'I will ask for authorization for a subpoena if we do not get an adequate response,' Specter told the committee." The AP adds, "Such prodding may not be necessary, according to the Bush administration. … 'We are currently working with Chairman Specter to set a date for the attorney general to appear,' Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said."

Congress Struggles To Resume Oversight Of Executive Branch. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Chaddock, 61K) reports the debates in Congress over the Iraq war, emergency spending bills, and NSA domestic surveillance "signal that Congress is trying - again - to revive its flagging oversight role of an executive branch that is claiming broad wartime powers. It's doing so, analysts say, because control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections could turn on the issue." Brookings Institution analyst Thomas Mann said, "The broader motivation in Congress by the majority party is clearly the sinking political fortunes of the president and the party and the fear of retribution in November." The Monitor adds that so far, "however, both chambers of Congress have struggled to make headway. Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, for example, has repeatedly been stymied in his bid to bring the government's secret eavesdropping program in line with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act."

Bush's Comments On Hamdan Case Could Signal Detainee About-Face. The Legal Times (6/16, Mauro) reports, "It is rare for a president to comment on a pending Supreme Court case. But President George W. Bush has been doing just that in recent weeks, making several mentions of the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case that will decide the fate of the military commissions he ordered to handle detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … 'We're waiting on our Supreme Court to act,' Bush said at a press conference Wednesday, one of several comments that indicate he is eager to follow the Court's lead, even if it rules against his claim of broad power to deal with the detainees outside the established military and civilian court system." The Times continues, "Bush's remarks and tone have confounded opponents of the military commissions, leaving some wondering if Bush is trying to soften the blow of an expected defeat -- or already preparing the public for civilian alternatives to military commissions. … Covington & Burling partner David Remes, one of the coordinators of the legal effort against the administration position, says Bush's comments have led him to ask 'why Bush made Hamdan a test of presidential power in the first place. If Bush could accomplish his goals within the existing legal framework, why did he confront the judicial branch with such breathtaking claims of presidential power?'" The Times adds, "The presidential commentary on the case was so frequent in recent days that expectations were high that the Court might hand down the decision on Thursday. The two lawyers who argued against each other in the case -- Solicitor General Paul Clement and Georgetown University Law Center's Neal Katyal -- were in the courtroom, but the justices instead handed down four criminal and business law cases. The Court will convene again next Monday and Thursday to issue more decisions in its push toward adjournment by month's end."

New Jersey Seeks Telephone Surveillance Data From US. The New York Times (6/16, Chen, Richtel) reports, "The New Jersey attorney general has issued subpoenas to five telephone companies to determine whether any of them violated the state's consumer protection laws by providing records to the National Security Agency. Experts say it is the first legal move by a state to question the agency's program to compile calling records to track terrorist activities." The Times continues, "On Wednesday, the United States filed a lawsuit to block the subpoenas, setting up a legal showdown pitting the state's authority to protect consumers' rights against the federal government's national security powers. … 'People in New Jersey and people everywhere have privacy rights,' the state's attorney general, Zulima V. Farber, said on Thursday. 'What we were trying to determine was whether the phone companies in New Jersey had violated any law or any contractual obligations with their consumers by supplying information to some government entity, simply by request, and not by any court order or search warrant.'" The Times adds, "This latest confrontation over the invocation of national security began last month, when Ms. Farber issued the subpoenas to the companies — AT&T, Verizon, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Cingular Wireless — to determine whether they had turned over the phone records to the federal government without a court order, in possible violation of state laws. … But when the Justice Department filed suit in United States District Court here to block those subpoenas — a suit that Ms. Farber received on Thursday — it asserted that the state was straying into a federal matter, and that compliance with the subpoenas would imperil national security."

DOJ_NMG_0034608

Defense Lawyer Says FBI Agent Tricked Georgia Terror Suspect Into Confessing. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Weber) reports, "Investigators preyed on a Georgia Tech student's devotion to Islam to get him to help their terrorism probe and then reneged on their promise not to arrest him if he told the truth, the suspect's lawyer said in court papers Thursday. The allegations by Jack Martin, a lawyer for 21-year-old Syed Ahmed, were contained in a motion in which Martin seeks to suppress Ahmed's statements to the FBI or make the government abide by the alleged agreement not to prosecute him. … Martin said an FBI agent and a task force investigator who questioned Ahmed…told him that as long as he told the truth he would not be arrested. He said one of the investigators told Ahmed that he, too, was a Muslim and used that to get a statement from Ahmed." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett said the agency would have no comment."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/16, Torpy, 430K) adds, "In the motion…Martin argued that the U.S. Supreme Court and other courts have determined that a statement is involuntary if induced 'by significant and powerful promises or threats, such as the promise of nonprosecution here and the threat of arrest if the defendant did not "cooperate."' The motion quotes an agent telling Ahmed, 'You have the rest of your life in front of you. ... You know eventually you are going to have to get a job some day. Do you want any type of criminal record?'" The Journal-Constitution also reports, "In a separate filing, Martin asks the court to force prosecutors to divulge any wiretaps or electronic surveillance the government used to keep track of his client."

Some Canadian Muslim Leaders Urge Crackdown On Extremists. USA Today (6/16, For, 2.31M) reports, "Some Canadian Muslim leaders are urging a crackdown on extremists within their community two weeks after 17 males, including five teenagers, were arrested in suburban Toronto on terrorism-related charges." The response to the arrests" has exposed a rift between Muslim leaders. Some reject the notion that a violent ideology may have taken root in their community; others argue that Muslims must acknowledge radicalism in their midst and work harder to extinguish it. … Some Canadian Muslim leaders say they're offended by the suggestion they should be responsible for combating radical influences. … Others say radicals are spreading extremism and the danger can no longer be ignored. 'They were young kids, and they were taken down this road by someone'" says Sheik Husain Patel, cleric at the Toronto Islamic Center, where one suspect occasionally worshiped."

Plaintiffs Lawyer Compares Ruling In 9/11 Case To Japanese Internment. In a Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) op-ed, Georgetown law professor and Turkmen vs. Ashcroft plaintiffs co-counsel David Cole writes that with his ruling this week upholding US authority to arrest foreign nationals on immigration charges and detain them indefinitely, US District Judge John Gleeson, "in essence…authorized a repeat of the Japanese internment — as long as the internment is limited to foreign nationals charged with visa violations (a group that at last count numbered about 11 million people)." Cole concludes that Gleeson's ruling gives "federal authorities…explicit permission to let prejudice and fear run roughshod over the most basic of human rights — the rights to equal treatment and liberty."

Kinsley Condemns Administration Anti-Terror Tactics. In a Washington Post column (6/16, A25), Michael Kinsley writes, "It is not yet clear -- though there is little reason for optimism -- whether the courts will let them get away with it, but the official position of the executive branch under President Bush is that the US government can lock you up anywhere in the world, torture you and tell no one about it. And if someone does find out and starts talking trash like 'habeas corpus' or 'Fourth Amendment,' too bad: It's all okay under the president's inherent powers as commander in chief. Congress -- unbeknownst to Congress -- approved it all in its resolution shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, urging the president to fight terrorism. And the president deputized the CIA and other agencies to go forth and use this authority, in documents that you can't have and that may or may not exist." In "a twist fully worthy of Kafka, or at least Joseph Heller ("Catch-22"), the very suspicion that bad things are going on is a reason you can't find out."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Stands By Risk-Analysis Process For Anti-Terror Funding. The Washington Post (6/16, B3, Layton, 744K) reports DHS Undersecretary for Preparedness George W. Foresman faced "criticism and pointed questioning yesterday" during a hearing of the House Committee on Government Reform, but stood by the agency's "decision to cut anti-terror grants for Washington and New York by 40 percent." Foresman said he felt "confident in the risk analysis process and the peer review process," for distributing the grants and said the agency needed to do "a better job in communicating with the communities." However, "Foresman appeared to have a difficult time communicating with" lawmakers, who called DHS' "decision-making process 'mind-boggling,' 'a mystery' and 'goofy' and said it doesn't appear to meet its stated goal -- distributing federal dollars to regions that face the greatest risk of attack."

DOJ_NMG_0034609

DHS Analysis Finds Most Cities, States Lack Adequate Disaster Preparedness. The AP (6/16, Jordan) reports that an analysis by DHS that was delivered to Congress yesterday has found that "shortcomings in emergency planning" in a majority of American cities and states are cause "for significant national concern." The AP continues, "Although emergency plans appear to be stronger in 18 states along the nation's 'Hurricane Belt,' the analysis cited preparedness gaps in 131 state and city emergency response plans." The report "is the latest in a series of government and expert analyses since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast," almost all of which "have found lacking preparedness levels for large-scale disasters."

"Unusual Circumstances" Surrounding DHS Limo Contract Outlined At Hearing. The Washington Post (6/16, A4, Hsu, Babcock, 744K) reports congressional investigators told a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing yesterday that Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc. "offered its services to the Department of Homeland Security more than three months before the agency sought bids for a transportation contract, and eventually won contracts worth $25 million over six years." Rep. Mike Rogers said the "unusual circumstances" surrounding the contract didn't "look right," and that he couldn't see why Shirlington President Christopher D. Baker had a letter recommending the company for the contract from convicted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, "instead of his own congressman or some congressman of the district where the business will be conducted." DHS "officials previously denied the existence" of such a letter. Rep. Bennie Thompson "called for DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson to appear before Congress to discuss 'major missteps,'" adding, "It is unconscionable to think that the agency charged with tracking down terrorists cannot even track down letters of recommendation."

In an article appearing on at least 77 news websites, the AP (6/16, Werner) reports Cunningham's letter "prompted renewed protests from lawmakers about the Homeland Security Department's awarding of two contracts to Shirlington despite the company's history of problems." Rep. Peter King noted Baker's "criminal record and business dealings with a defense contractor named as an unindicted coconspirator in the prosecution of Cunningham. 'And then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company. If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is.' … Outside the hearing, King questioned the department's failure to find Cunningham's letter. 'Did somebody clean out the file?' he asked. Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said that never happened."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Gehlert, 958K) reports, "Homeland Security's chief procurement officer, Elaine Duke, said that her agency made a distinction between company owners and drivers, and that the drivers had undergone background checks. No such checks on the company or its owner were required by law. 'The drivers have a clean slate,' she said."

Long Island Newsday (6/16, Palmer) reports, "House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King said the information might warrant a Justice Department examination. 'It all adds up to a pretty strong case of DHS incompetence or a special deal was made,' said King."

Rumsfeld Attends Ground Breaking For Pentagon 9/11 Memorial. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and family member of those killed on September 11, 2001 attended the ground breaking for a memorial at the Pentagon yesterday. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It will feature 184 trees and 184 benches, one for each victim." The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 4, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "At the two-acre memorial site, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld read the inscription carved on the cornerstone." Secretary Rumsfeld: "To honor the 184 people whose lives were lost, their families, and all those who sacrifice, that we may live in freedom. We will never forget." NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "An emotional Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said, 'Today, we claim this ground for them.'"

The Washington Post (6/16, B1, Dwyer, 744K) reports, "When the ceremony ended, Rumsfeld stayed behind. For about an hour, he stood in the bright sunlight, shaking hand after hand, autographing programs and taking pictures with family members. He stayed until every person who wanted a word with him got the opportunity. 'If there is anything these families felt,' he said in a brief interview, 'it's that we must not forget what took place. This is visible progress, and the memorial, when it is completed, is going to be a very special place. It is going to be about memories and reflections, to be sure. But it is going to be a place to think about today and tomorrow and the next day and the world.'" The AP (6/16, Barakat) notes Rumsfeld "said he wanted the memorial to convey to future Americans 'that their countrymen's grief was turned toward the cause of their nation's defense.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034610

Fox News (6/15, 7:09 p.m., Smith) called it "an emotional groundbreaking." Secretary Rumsfeld "appearing to choke up as he talked about the 184 people who died on the attacks there, saying they shared a tragic destiny. He said the spot where they were killed is sacred ground." CNN Headline News (6/15, 5:34 p.m.) called it "an emotional afternoon at the Pentagon," saying "the usually-stoic Rumsfeld seemed to get a little choked up while talking about those who shared a tragic destiny that day." CNN (6/15, 3:13 p.m.) also said Rumsfeld was "emotional, perhaps unexpectedly emotional." The Washington Times (6/16, Emerling, 90K) also calls the ceremony "an emotional affair."

WUSA-TV Washington (6/15, 11:09 p.m.) said, "It's been a long time coming, but today ground was finally broken" for the memorial. WTTG-TV Washington (6/15, 11:17 p.m.) said, "Even if you wanted to, you'll never forget where you were or what you were doing" on 9/11, but now "families of victims are taking back that area of the Pentagon where 184 men, women and children died" and "the crash site is turning into a place of peace." WRC-TV Washington (6/15, 6:02 p.m.) also had a report.

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, 7:22 p.m.) and MSNBC (6/15, 2:46 p.m.) ran brief reports on the event. CNN (6/15, 2:13 p.m.) also interviewed Joey Rickets, "a boy scout from Lynchburg, Virginia" who "has his own plans for a 9/11 memorial."

On CNN (6/15, 1:18 p.m.), reporter Barbara Starr said, "This is not a day for politics, of course, but a day of remembrance. And what many people remember is that this building did not shut down. The headquarters of the U.S. Military, attacked, in flames, people, of course were tending to the dead and the wounded, but this building did not shut down, it kept going. And one of the major reasons this building kept going was because Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld flat-out refused to leave. There was certainly advice to do that. He didn't leave. That meant his top staff didn't leave. The view here, if they were going down, they were all going down together." Starr also said, "Secretary Rumsfeld and his wife made a very significant private contribution to this memorial."

Pataki, Bloomberg Hear Recommendations For WTC Memorial. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "The World Trade Center Memorial faces simplification of its design, including moving carved-in-stone names of Sept. 11 victims to ground level, possibly eliminating or scaling back waterfalls and reducing the size of a museum." Those were among "the recommendations made yesterday to New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg in a closed-door meeting, according to people close to the situation. A formal report on the redesign will be released next week."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Measure As Both Chambers Debate War. The AP (6/16, Sidoti) reports, "Congress plunged into divisive election-year debate on the Iraq war Thursday as the US military death toll reached 2,500. The Senate soundly rejected a call to withdraw combat troops by year's end, and House Republicans laid the groundwork for their own vote. In a move Democrats criticized as gamesmanship, Senate Republicans brought up the withdrawal measure and quickly dispatched it -- for now -- on a 93-6 vote." Across Capitol Hill "in a daylong House debate," Republicans "defended the Iraq war as a key part of the global fight against terrorism while Democrats assailed President Bush's war policies and called for a new direction in the conflict."

The Washington Times (6/16, Bellantoni, 90K) says Republicans "attempted to embarrass Sen. John Kerry by forcing a vote on a measure identical to one he had drafted calling for troop withdrawal by the end of 2006. Senators opposed the measure on a 93-6 vote, which was forced to the Senate floor by Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican." Kerry "said he is crafting the withdrawal proposal with other Democrats, and said he was frustrated at what he called political games by the Republicans." Majority Leader Bill Frist said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/15) that the Senate vote "was 93-6 about cutting and running in Iraq. I think it does help the American people crystallize where they are, by looking where their representatives are. So the cut and run amendment came to the floor of the Senate about two hours ago and in terms of tabling it, overwhelmingly 93-6 is the support of staying the course there and supporting that democracy until they can take over their own security."

The debate on both chambers of Congress is receiving extensive media coverage, much of it describing it with adjectives such as "heated," "fierce" or "raucous." Media accounts depict both parties as seeking the political edge on the issue with eye on the November elections. Republicans are portrayed as seizing "the initiative," though some analysts believe their strategy very risky. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Rogers, 2.11M) says Republicans "seized the offensive, taking advantage of divisions among Democrats to force quick votes against withdrawal." But "on the day that U.S. troop deaths in Iraq reached 2,500, the partisan tone distressed members in both parties and could create a backlash against the majority."

DOJ_NMG_0034611

The New York Times (6/16, Toner, Zernike, 1.19M) says the House debate "came after three days in which President Bush and his aides had sought to portray Iraq as moving gradually toward a stable, functioning democracy, and to portray Democrats as lacking the will to see the conflict through to victory." Democrats, throughout the day, "countered, at times with barely controlled fury." The AP (6/16, Sidoti) says the House "erupted in impassioned, election year debate over Iraq war." The war was "a grotesque mistake," said the Democratic leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi," adding that "the Administration continues to dig a hole. They refuse to come up and see the light."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Reynolds, 958K) notes the "rancor" in both chambers, adding "many Republicans believe that discussing the war works to their party's favor politically, allowing them to press the assertion that Democrats are weak and indecisive on national security issues." In a news analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/16, Brownstein, 958K) says the "new Republican drive to focus attention on the Iraq war represents a high-stakes gamble: that doubts about the direction Democrats might set on national security exceed anxieties about the course charted by…Bush." The Times adds Republicans "are aiming to portray Democrats as too soft and too divided to steer the Iraq conflict to a successful conclusion." But "in the process, Republicans risk deepening their identification with a war that, surveys show, still sparks skepticism and concern among most Americans."

USA Today (6/16, Stone, 2.31M) reports John Pitney, a political scientist at California's Claremont McKenna College, "said that while the strategy 'diminishes the Democratic advantage on the issue,' speeches aren't enough. 'The situation in Iraq would have to improve dramatically before it became a net plus for the GOP,' he said."

ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said the Iraq debate "will shape this year's congressional elections. Republicans in the House arguing the war is critical on the war on terror." Rep. Rick Renzi: "This is about taking the fight to those who will strike America again and will wound this nation and kill our innocent civilians. America must endure, endure and prevail." Rep. Charles Norwood: "Many, not all, but on the other side of the aisle, lack the will to win. The American people needs to no precisely who they are. The public can decide the course of this war in November, by hopefully throwing the defeatists out of office." Gibson: "Democrats fired back, branding the President's handling of the war a failure." Rep. John Murtha: "I know what rhetoric is. And I know what fighting in the front lines are. I know the difference between them. I know standing here does not solve the problem. It hasn't gotten better. It's gotten worse. That's the problem."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 3, 1:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A fierce debate over the war broke out in both the House and the Senate today, and the House Republicans defended the war, and the Senate, by a 93-6 vote, turned back a proposal to bring home American troops by the end of the year." CBS (Attkisson) added, "In the House, think of it not so much as a real debate with a real chance of changing anything in the war on Iraq. It's more of a political dare, a nonbinding resolution that Republicans are putting to a vote, calling for the US to stand firm in Iraq and the war on terror, and who in their right mind would vote against that?" But Democrats "argued that a timeframe for getting US troops out is what's needed, rather than a symbolic vote in favor of victory." To "counter arguments from war opponents like John Murtha, the Pentagon handed out this unusual debate prep book to congressional supporters, and it suggests things that they could say in the floor debate."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 6, 2:05, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "In a debate that ranged from raucous to solemn, supporters of the Iraq war, mostly Republicans, called for total defeat of a brutal enemy." Rep. Mike Rogers, Michigan: "They'll behead you, they'll shoot you, they'll blow you up; they don't care." Rep. Henry Hyde, Illinois: "To trust our fate to those who would destroy us is to die." Reid: "The only option, they said, is to stay the course." There was "agreement on one thing, a moment of silence to honor Americans who've died in Iraq. But critics of the war, mostly Democrats, said the growing death toll is one of the best reasons for getting the troops out." Rep. John Murtha, Pennsylvania: "Americans are realizing there is a better way to support our troops than just sending more of them off to be killed."

The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Weisman, Babington, 744K) says that "though the day's rhetoric was often partisan in tone, the discontent over the status quo in Iraq was evident on both sides. Dozens of lawmakers spoke emotionally -- recriminations mixed with appeals to patriotism -- on how the nation should proceed in the three-year-old conflict that has become more protracted, deadly and complex than most of them had expected at its outset."

A similar analysis in the Chicago Tribune (6/16, Zuckman, 643K) says Democrats "are trying to capitalize on voters' disenchantment, while Republicans are trying to portray themselves as resolute and strong." House Speaker Dennis Hastert was first to speak in the House debate, "casting the debate in sweeping, historic terms as a means to protect Americans from terrorists at home and to nurture a way of life." Democrats, however, "called the proceedings undemocratic because Republicans would not allow them to offer amendments. And they accused the president of politicizing intelligence, barreling into the war without a plan and making repeated mistakes along the way." Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan, for example, said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/15), "I think, frankly, we should have had a discussion about the war in Iraq. We should have discussed oversight of the war in Iraq and we should have had a real debate. There are no other options. It's not a debate when the Republican leadership that control the Senate, the House, and the White House say, you vote up or down."

DOJ_NMG_0034612

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Blitzer) spoke of a "bitter war of words" in both chambers, adding that in the House "the sparks…were flying." Knight Ridder (6/16, Kuhnhenn, Douglas) disagrees with the other characterization of the House debate. It was an "election-year debate…freighted with politics," as Republicans "seized on recent upbeat news from Iraq to portray Democratic calls for troop withdrawals as a policy of 'cut and run.'" Yet "for all the political overtones, the tone of the House debate was strikingly civil, sober and morally serious." Knight Ridder also says, "The Democrats' stance against Bush belied deep divisions within their party on whether to withdraw from Iraq, and if so, how fast. In the Senate, an expected debate on a Democratic measure calling for gradual withdrawal wallowed on hold all day amid disputes among Democrats over the precise language of their proposal."

Meanwhile, a Washington Post (6/16, A2, 744K) piece by Dana Milbank takes a rather flippant look at Cher's attendance of a House Armed Services subcommittee meeting. The singer is an activist for a group that provides helmets to soldiers in Iraq. Milbank writes that "everybody was performing his own version of 'If I Could Turn Back Time'" Thursday, with the House spending "10 hours re-debating the decision to invade Iraq in 2003 -- at least until several of them left for a picnic at the White House."

Pentagon Aide Mistakenly Distributed Iraq Debate Document. The Washington Post (6/16, A23, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that it "seems Traci Scott, who works in the Pentagon's legislative affairs office, sent an e-mail Wednesday to a group of Hill folks with an attachment titled 'Iraq Floor Debate Prep Book.' The 74-page attachment, just in time for the House floor debate yesterday, is full of great facts and fine political arguments. Section 3, for example, 'Victory in Iraq,' summarizes Saddam Hussein's 'support for terrorist groups' and 'his defiance of the world community' and how he 'wanted WMD.'" Though "coming from the Pentagon, the prep book reads like a White House playbook -- which, a Pentagon spokesman said, it is." The document "rebuts all those arguments from the 'cut and run' crowd about prewar intelligence manipulation, or how the war in Iraq has made the world more dangerous for Americans. Problem is that the e-mail was sent to some of those cutters and runners."

More Commentary. Democratic Rep. John Murtha writes in USA Today (6/16, 2.31M), "Iraq is not the center of the global war on terrorism, and nor is it overwhelmed by foreign terrorist groups, as this administration would like Americans to believe. … The American people are not naive. They know a failed policy when they see one. Iraq is a failed policy. It's time to redeploy." In an editorial, USA Today (6/16, 2.31M) disagrees, saying "US troops should not stay in Iraq, as in Vietnam, purely for pride in a hopeless battle. They should remain, however, as long as there is a reasonable chance that they can bring some stability, reinforce the fledgling democratic government and prevent Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists. Announcing a timetable for withdrawal…would just invite the insurgents to wait out the American presence."

Nina Kamp and Michael O'Hanlon, of the Brookings Institution in Washington, and Amy Unikewicz, a graphic designer in South Norwalk, CT, write in the New York Times (6/16, 1.19M), "Those looking for signs of promise in Iraq can still find footholds beyond the killing of the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The security forces, particularly the Iraqi Army, continue to improve in technical proficiency -- even if their interethnic cohesiveness remains suspect. Reductions in consumer subsidies have strengthened the financial standing of the government, and high oil prices compensate for Iraq's anemic production levels." But "overall, it is increasingly hard to describe Iraq as a glass half-full."

In the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K), Eugene Robinson writes, "Iraq is just one theater in Bush's 'war.' Elsewhere, Afghanistan is once again ablaze as the resurgent Taliban counterattacks. Somalia is coming under the sway of an Islamic militia that may harbor al-Qaeda militants. America's popularity in the world continues to fall." But Bush "forges ahead, trying vainly to kill a poisonous, retrograde ideology with bullets and bombs. His 'war' is self-perpetuating, and no one even knows what victory would look like. Long after he's gone, we'll still be looking for a way to end the mess he began."

Purported Al Qaeda Documents Suggest US Counter-Insurgency Effort Working. The Iraqi national security adviser, Mowafak al Rubaie, yesterday released documents attributed to al Qaeda in Iraq that suggest the insurgents felt the US and Iraqi forces had gained the upper hand. However, some experts questioned the authenticity of the documents. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "To prevent a strong leader from emerging, the Iraqi government today tried to demoralize al Qaeda. The government released a document it claimed was found at an al Qaeda safe house." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Advisor: "This is the beginning of the end of al Qaeda in Iraq." Engel: "The purported al Qaeda document complains about US and Iraqi successes in killing their leaders and cutting off finances. It suggests trying to bog down American troops by triggering an American war with Iran. It would be a major coup, a terror blueprint uncovered, but tonight some US officials are skeptical of authenticity and origin."

DOJ_NMG_0034613

ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 6, 2:45, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "The documents, if they are authentic, suggest that the US strategy in Iraq is working extremely well, in almost every respect. But there are questions being raised about authenticity." One document describe what it calls "'the current bleak situation,' and says, 'Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance.'" But US officials "said the document was not, in fact, found on or near Zarqawi's body, but in a raid three weeks earlier on other targets." On the CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M), Mouwafak Al-Rubaie was shown saying, "We believe that this is the beginning of the end of al Qaeda in Iraq."

The AP (6/16, Quinn) reports "there was no way to confirm the authenticity of the information attributed to al-Qaida, and U.S. and Iraqi officials offered conflicting accounts of when and where it was seized." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office "said Iraqi forces found the document in al-Zarqawi's hideout after the June 7 U.S. airstrike that killed him." However, US Maj. Gen. William Caldwell "said the document had been taken from a computer in a raid during the three-week operation to track down al-Zarqawi." Caldwell "said sweeps across Iraq since al-Zarqawi's death led to 28 significant arms caches. He said the raids included 255 joint operations and 143 by Iraqi forces alone." The Al Qaeda document "said its insurgency was being hurt by an increase in U.S.-trained Iraqi forces, by widespread arrests and seizures of weapons, and by a crackdown on financial outlets."

USA Today (6/16, Soriano, 2.31M) says "a copy of the original document, handwritten in Arabic, was provided to USA TODAY by al-Rubaie. He also released an English translation. … It is not clear who wrote the document. The US military says it appears to be from someone influential in al-Qaeda's Iraq operation. "'It seems to be from an author who has insight from within al-Qaeda because a number of strategies and tactics are noted,' said Navy Lt. Christina Skacan, a military spokeswoman."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Peterson, 61K) runs a similar story titled "Picture Of A Weakened Iraqi Insurgency," in which it also says the document "could not be independently authenticated."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Vause) reported, "While CNN cannot verify the authenticity, there are extensive details of al Qaeda's concern over the growing number of Iraqi forces, the inability to attract new recruits, confiscation of weapons and ammunition, and a squeeze on funds."

Harman Calls Zarqawi Killing "Huge Tactical Victory." Rep. Jane Harman said on Fox News' The Big Story with John Gibson (6/15), "I think the takedown of Zarqawi was a huge tactical victory. I want to commend those who did it. It really was the kind of intelligence action we need to see more of and it also was a tribute to the Iraqis who originally tipped us off to this spiritual healer whom we traced and then he led us to Zarqawi."

Document Says Terrorists Considered Trying To Trigger US War Against Iran. USA Today (6/16, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "A captured al-Qaeda in Iraq document says the terrorist group considered drawing the United States into a war with Iran in order to undermine the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in weakening the organization."

The Washington Times (6/16, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The group's major goal is to get the US involved in a new war, this one against the Shi'ites in Iraq and Iran, and to provoke another war between Iraqi Shi'ites and Sunni countries in the Middle East. One option, the paper says, is to blow up targets in the West and plant evidence that the bombing was done by Iranians."

US Death Toll In Iraq Reaches "Sad Benchmark" Of 2,500 Dead. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is a sad milestone to be noted in the Iraq war. The Pentagon announced today that 2,500 American servicemen and women have now died in Iraq. On Capitol Hill, both the House and the Senate stood and observed a moment of silence."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 3, 0:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Today, the US death toll reached 2,500. The President's spokesman called the milestone a 'sad benchmark' and said that President Bush is committed to insuring no American sacrifice will be in vain."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was also a grim milestone today. US military deaths in Iraq now total 2,500. White House press secretary Tony Snow called it a sad benchmark."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/15, Blitzer) also referred to "another grim milestone." Knight Ridder (6/16, Brown, Youssef) reports on the "death toll in Iraq," while the AP (6/16, Raum) says "the story of the Iraq war can be told in stark numbers and mournful milestones as the death toll for US troops reached 2,500 on Thursday and the price tag rose to $320 billion."

Suicide Attack On Shiite Mosque Kills At Least Seven. The AP (6/16) is reporting this morning, "A suicide bomber struck a Shiite mosque during Friday prayers in Baghdad, killing at least seven people and wounding 18, police said, as violence persisted despite a driving ban and increased security measures aimed at restoring order in the capital." The attacker "was wearing an explosives belt and blew himself up at the Buratha mosque in northern Baghdad, police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said."

DOJ_NMG_0034614

More Sectarian Killings Reported In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The US military and Iraqi governments are now focused on stopping al Qaeda in Iraq from recovering after Zarqawi's death, but the daily sectarian killings here seem to be continuing unaffected. More killing on both sides today -- gunmen in Tikrit shot dead four Sunni worshipers in a mosque. In Baquba, ten Shiite workers were forced off a bus and executed."

Iraqi Prime Minister Indicates Government May Offer Limited Amnesty To Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's prime minister, though, did indicate that he would be willing to offer a limited amnesty program for some of those insurgents, but late tonight, especially after the Pentagon announced that the official US military death toll here in Iraq had topped 2500, both US and Iraqi officials were quick to insist that amnesty would not be extended to anyone found guilty of killing either US troops or Iraqi civilians."

Maliki Accepts Resignation Of Aide Who Discussed Amnesty. The Washington Post (6/16, A22, Knickmeyer, Finer, 744K) reports, "Maliki's office on Thursday accepted the resignation of an aide who had told a reporter that Maliki was considering a limited amnesty that would likely include guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops, the aide said." The aide, "Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, stood by his account of amnesty considerations." He "said Maliki had indicated the same position less directly in public." The Prime Minister's office earlier Thursday issued a statement saying, "Mr. Adnan Kadhimi doesn't represent the Iraqi government in this issue, and Mr. Kadhimi is not an advisor or spokesman for the prime minister."

US Transition Teams Aid Iraqi Troops In Baghdad Crackdown. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 5, 1:50, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Trying to stop the insurgency from disrupting daily life in Baghdad is the focus of a new US-Iraqi campaign that's now underway." NBC (Boettcher) added, "Tanks roaring down a crowded Baghdad street today, intimidating but mostly symbolic in Iraq's new operation, Together Forward, intended to secure Baghdad from insurgents. But a more realistic way of defeating the insurgency, according to senior US military officers, is with this strategy -- Iraqi troops on the ground advised by small numbers of American soldiers called military transition, or MiTT teams. We traveled with this US Army team from the 101st Airborne Division, which constantly questions and prods units of Iraq's new army." Their job, "mentor a growing but still immature military force and to win their loyalty. The MiTT teams say one of the biggest problems they face is to get the Iraqi army to be proactive rather than reactive, be the hunter, not the hunted."

US Commanders Release Photo Of New Al Qaeda In Iraq Leader. The CBS Evening News (6/15, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time, US military commanders revealed the face of the man they believe is the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, a wide-eyed Egyptian named Abu Ayyub al-Masri, with a resume of violence that is decades long."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 4, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported the military "says al-Masri is in his 30s, trained in Afghanistan, is an expert in making car bombs and an associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, but there are still power struggles within al Qaeda here. Some are not convinced al-Masri is going to be Iraq's next top terror leader." Stephen Hadley, US National Security Advisor: "That's clearly one of the leading names, but we're going to need a little bit of time."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 2, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "CBS consultant and former CIA analyst, Michael Scheuer, believes al-Masri is Osama bin Laden's personal choice to replace Zarqawi." Michael Scheuer, CBS News analyst: "Bin Laden's choice for major military commanders have always been Egyptian, and if this man – if this man is an Egyptian, al-Masri means Egyptian, then I would – I would imagine it is bin Laden's direct choice."

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) reports Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for US-led forces in Iraq, "said US officials debated for days before deciding to release the photo and a brief biographical sketch of the alleged insurgent leader. They worried that bolstering his media profile would play into his hands." The AP (6/16, Gamel, Thayer), New York Times (6/16, Filkins, 1.19M) and Washington Post (6/16, Knickmeyer, Wilgoren, 744K) run similar reports.

Shiite Militias Said To Control Iraqi Prison System. The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Finer, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "Iraq's prison system is overrun with Shiite Muslim militiamen who have freed fellow militia members convicted of major crimes and executed Sunni Arab inmates, the country's deputy justice minister said in an interview this week." Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, an ethnic Kurd, said, "We cannot control the prisons. It's as simple as that. … Our jails are infiltrated by the militias from top to bottom, from Basra to Baghdad." The Post adds, "As a result, Yei has asked US authorities to suspend plans to transfer prisons and detainees from American to Iraqi control."

DOJ_NMG_0034615

489 Released From Abu Ghraib. The Washington Post (6/16, A22, Partlow, 744K) reports on the "489 detainees who walked under a harsh sun out of the chain-link pen at Iraq's most infamous prison. The mass release, part of a larger plan to free 2,500 prisoners this month, is intended to bolster Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's efforts to defuse the Sunni Arab insurgency. … The prisoner release on Thursday was the third this month. Before walking out in single file, the men stood quietly behind the fence as Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie addressed them from atop a wooden platform."

Alleged Iraq Agent Charged With Lying To FBI About Oil-For-Food Role. The AP (6/16) reports, "A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food scandal has been charged with lying to the FBI. On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned an indictment accusing Tongsun Park of falsely telling investigators in 2004 that he played no role more than a decade ago in the adoption of the U.N. resolution that set up the oil-for-food program." The new "indictment also says Park made false statements when he said he had no business dealings with an unidentified U.N. official, and when he told the FBI that he did not exchange money with an unidentified Iraqi-American, and that he had never been to that person's office." Bloomberg (6/15, O'Reilly) noted that Park, "accused of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq, was charged in a new case with making false statements to the FBI.

Military Investigates Killing Of Three Civilians At Northern Iraq Checkpoint. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Barnes, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The US military is investigating the killing of three Iraqi civilians by American forces in northern Iraq." The inquiry into the May 9 deaths "was requested by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq." The military is investigating whether the Iraqis who were killed "were threatening American troops or whether the troops acted improperly and had no cause to use force against the civilians."

Sources Expect Marines To Face Charges Over Haditha Incident. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "As more reporters travel to Haditha…the stories about what U.S. Marines did in the town Nov. 19 get more and more gruesome. Defense attorneys deny assertions by some residents that Marines lined up unarmed civilians and executed them. They say the Marines of Kilo Company, after being fired upon, did three house-clearing operations in which civilians, and suspected insurgents, some armed, some not, were killed. Some of the 24 were women and children. … Marine Corps defenders also are questioning the authenticity of a video, purportedly of the victims and made by a Sunni man. They question why the images did not surface until months afterward. Still, sources close to the case expect Marines to face criminal charges once an investigation is complete."

62% Believe Haditha Deaths Will Harm US Relationship With Muslim World. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "In Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 62% say reported massacre of Iraqi civilians will harm U.S. relationship with Muslim world. But by 49%-33%, they want reprimands rather than criminal charges." The Journal adds, "Optimism rises after Zarqawi's death, but 57% still want US forces cut."

General Leading Investigation Praised. The Washington Post (6/16, A8, Tyson, 744K) runs a story titled "General Leading Haditha Probe Known For Integrity, Toughness," in which it says "the two-star Army general leading the main inquiry into the killings of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is a decorated Delta Force operative known among his peers for integrity and uncanny judgment in combat." Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell "rose from a Special Forces staff sergeant in Vietnam to commander of the secretive Delta Force, earning a reputation as an unusually skilled fighter who bluntly confronted superiors to get what he needed for his men. He is one of the Army's most highly decorated soldiers on active duty."

US Reservist Becomes Attraction On Armed Forces Radio In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 11, 2:25, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Finally tonight, an unlikely star emerging from the war in Iraq. She is southern comfort to the troops on the front lines. They are tuning in like crazy to a girl from Louisiana who is sharing her love for country music and providing just the right distraction." NBC (Maceda) added, "What gets an American soldier in Iraq through his dangerous day? If he hails from the South or the West, it's likely to be..." Specialist Kristen King: "You've got Specialist Kristen King on Freedom Radio, AFN, Iraq. If you've got a request, go ahead and get those in to me now." Maceda: "In only weeks, this 21-year-old Louisiana deejay, a compact bundle of energy has become a phenomenon. Her live, 4-hour, one-woman Armed Forces radio show, called 'Country Convoy', is the most listened to English language program in Iraq, a high-charged mix of country hits and homey chat, weather reports, and public service announcements."

Louisiana Center Prepares Soldiers For Iraqi Battlefield. The Washington Times (6/16, Axe, 90K) profiles a "combat readiness training center" at Fort Polk in Louisiana, reporting, "the focus of the training is fighting insurgents in crowded Iraqi villages with cultural sensitivity and limiting civilian casualties. A cluster of fabricated neighborhoods represents Iraq's chaotic urban battlefield. Combat brigades numbering as many as 5,000 soldiers spend three weeks living and fighting there." Soldiers have complained that the training "is harder than combat in Iraq. Center commander Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero says that is the point." The Times reports, "With the spread of small wars and insurgencies like those in Iraq and Afghanistan, …winning hearts and minds is as important as winning firefights."

DOJ_NMG_0034616

Bomb Kills Eight On Bus Taking Workers To Afghan Air Base. The New York Times (6/16, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "A bomb exploded on a bus taking workers to the United States military air base at Kandahar in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing 8 people and wounding at least 16 others, among them 4 children." The "bomb was the first specifically directed at civilians working at the base." The Times says, "NATO troops are taking over military command of southern Afghanistan from American forces and Taliban insurgents appear intent on disrupting the transfer."

Taliban's Appeal Grows In Pakistani Tribal Areas. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Montero, 61K) reports that in Pakistan's Federally Administered Tribal Areas "the tribal system, once strong and proud, is now falling apart," leading many young people to embrace the Taliban. The tribal areas' "problems were exacerbated when the Pakistani military entered the tribal areas for the first time in 2003." The Monitor reports, "In such strife, pragmatism draws young people to the Taliban. They are building a new form of social capital, a network that offers the opportunities and prestige that the tribal system once did." The integration of the tribal areas with the rest of Pakistan is "a dream shared by many, and perhaps the best way to dampen the appeal of groups like the Taliban, analysts say."

Pet Projects Said To Trump Strategic Priorities In Defense Spending Boom. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Karp, 2.11M) reports "the US defense machine is still churning out weapons made for old-style, conventional conflicts, even as it needs new tools to battle terrorists and insurgents. One big reason is the sclerotic nature of the procurement process, in which the military, the White House, the defense industry and Congress fight for pet projects that aren't always in synch with strategic priorities." Although the increase in defense spending "has been a blessing" for Lockheed Martin, Northrop Grumman, General Dynamics, and Boeing, "it has done little to change the military." The Journal reports, "Military budgets have long been shaped by pork and pet projects," but "[t]he problem is particularly acute right now because of the huge increase in defense spending and the Pentagon's new strategic shift to fight terrorism."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud. The Washington Post (6/16, Hilzenrath, Shin, 744K) reports Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd "came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud." Mudd was "chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses." Sen. Chuck Hagel said, "I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution. Have you thought about resigning?" The Post adds Mudd, who was "promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like 'the old Fannie Mae' any more than Hagel did and was 'as shocked as anyone' when Fannie's accounting problems came to light." Mudd said he "thought about leaving but is 'not a quitter' and stayed to fix Fannie's problems. Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision."

Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit." Pressuring the company "to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges." But Democrats "on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing."

Enron Defense Firm Still Waiting For Fees. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Johnson) reports, "To the list of employees, investors and businesses who suffered financial misfortune in Enron Corp.'s demise, add this one: the law firm defending former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling." The Post continues, "Los Angeles-based O'Melveny & Myers LLP, which has represented Skilling on both civil and criminal charges since 2001, collected what in a typical case would be a fat payday: $23 million from its client and $17 million more from his insurance policies. … But, true to form, Enron is still destroying financial expectations. Even before the trial began in January, Skilling's team of more than 20 lawyers, paralegals and support staff burned through those funds, leaving the law firm holding the bag for 'multiple tens of millions' of dollars in unpaid fees and expenses racked up during the four-month trial, Skilling's lead defense lawyer said. While Daniel M. Petrocelli declined to provide an exact tally, one source put the price tag at more than $25 million on top of the $40 million O'Melveny already collected." The Post adds, "The trial, which culminated in the convictions of Skilling and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay last month, featured 56 witnesses and some of the most sophisticated business deals ever to make their way into a courtroom. The Skilling defense, which experts say may be one of the most expensive in history, is a case study in how high the stakes can rise in white-collar criminal representation. … 'This is almost a carte blanche to the lawyers: Do everything you can to keep me out of jail,' said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control Inc., a New Jersey firm that monitors legal fees in bankruptcies and for Fortune 500 clients. 'Very little thought is given to cost. It is not a concern.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034617

Former HealthSouth Executive Sentenced To Eight Years. The Wall Street Journal (6/16) reports, "The only HealthSouth Corp. executive convicted by jurors in a $2.7 billion fraud was sentenced to eight years in federal prison Thursday, the longest term given to anyone in the huge accounting scam at the rehabilitation chain." The Journal continues, "Hannibal 'Sonny' Crumpler, a former vice president and division controller, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Virginia Emerson Hopkins after the defense urged her to impose probation or a combination of house arrest and parole. Mr. Crumpler's attorneys said they may appeal. … Prosecutors sought a far tougher penalty, asking the judge to send Mr. Crumpler to prison for 15 years on his conviction on charges of conspiracy and making false statements to auditors. They described the sentence as too lenient." The Journal adds, "Fifteen former HealthSouth executives avoided trial by pleading guilty in plea deals, and fired Chief Executive Richard Scrushy was acquitted on all charges a year ago after a six-month trial. Mr. Crumpler also opted for a trial but was convicted in November. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Crumpler was in on the fraud while at HealthSouth and maintained a role even after he became finance chief at a related company, Source Medical Solutions. While at Source Medical, Mr. Crumpler sent HealthSouth auditors a letter overstating Source Medical's debt to HealthSouth by $20 million, prosecutors said."

US Subpoenas Medarex In Option Backdating Probe. The AP (6/16) reports, "Biotech company Medarex Inc. said Thursday it recently received a a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey over the timing of its stock options grants." The AP continues, "The company has already received a letter of informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over the matter. Medarex said it is cooperating fully with both investigations. … In addition, Medarex said two shareholder derivative lawsuits have been filed in New Jersey, naming the company and certain current and former directors and officers as defendants. Medarex said the lawsuits allege breach of fiduciary duty associated with its stock options grants practices, as well as federal securities laws violations. The lawsuits seek unspecified damages." The AP adds, "More than 40 companies are under SEC or Justice Department investigations looking into whether executives backdated stock options grants."

EMI Settles Payola Probe With Spitzer For $3.75 Million. The AP (6/16, Gormley) reports, "EMI Music North America, the third largest recording label in the world, has settled for $3.75 million a pay-for-play investigation into radio air time sold or traded to benefit artists including the Rolling Stones, Coldplay and Norah Jones." The AP continues, "The settlement was the latest during more than two years of a 'payola' investigation by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'When a record label engages in an elaborate scheme to purchase air time for its artists, it violates state and federal law and presents consumers with a skewed picture of the country's proclaimed "best" and "most popular" music,' Spitzer said." The AP adds, "He said payola - a term coined during a 1950s scandal combining the words pay and Victrola, an early record player - also hurts struggling artists who are not judged on the merits of their music. … Spitzer said the compensation for radio airplay was paid by EMI, which includes Virgin Records America, Capitol Records, EMI Christian Music Group and S Curve Records. One deal included tickets to a Rolling Stones concert in Toronto that were given to a radio program director for his personal use."

Senate Republicans Press Fannie Mae On Bill To Restrict Mortgage Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit." Pressuring the company "to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges." But Democrats "on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing."

DOJ_NMG_0034618

Fannie Mae CEO Grilled Over Accounting Fraud. The Washington Post (6/16, Hilzenrath, Shin, 744K) reports Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd "came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud." Mudd was "chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses." Sen. Chuck Hagel said, "I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution. Have you thought about resigning?" The Post adds Mudd, who was "promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like 'the old Fannie Mae' any more than Hagel did and was 'as shocked as anyone' when Fannie's accounting problems came to light." Mudd said he "thought about leaving but is 'not a quitter' and stayed to fix Fannie's problems. Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision."

Accountant Firms Prove To Be Financial Beneficiaries Of Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (6/16, Guerrera) reports, "Accountancy firms have emerged as surprise long-lasting beneficiaries of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, as US-listed companies have been forced to pay their auditors larger fees to comply with the tough corporate governance rules, according to a new study" by the law firm Foley & Lardner. The Times notes, "US-listed companies paid auditors $4.9m (€3.9m) on average in 2005, 3 per cent more than in 2004 and 11 per cent more than in 2001, the year before the passage of the Act, according to the study which analysed public findings from more than 850 US-listed companies. The rise in total fees came despite a dramatic fall in non-audit fees as companies hired third-party consultants to avoid conflicts of interest. Non-audit fees paid by US companies fell 42 per cent in 2005, contributing to a 97 per cent collapse in these type of payments to accountancy firms since 2001. 'This decline in other fees has been more than made up by a rise in audit fees,' said Thomas Hartman at Foley & Lardner. 'Companies are paying the same amount, or more, to their auditors as they were before Sarbanes-Oxley.'"

WSJournal Weighs In On Milberg Weiss Indictments. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) says in an editorial that Rep. Charles Rangel "was in full voice this week -- along with fellow New York Democrats Carolyn McCarthy and Gary Ackerman, as well as Florida's Robert Wexler -- about the injustice federal prosecutors had visited on plaintiffs' firm Milberg Weiss. The four released a statement lambasting Justice for going after the 'entire' firm rather than just the partners accused of wrongdoing, claiming this could rob 'average' citizens of Milberg's services." The Journal adds, "We couldn't have said it better, though we've been saying exactly that for years -- ever since the Justice Department in 2003 issued new guidelines, via the 'Thompson memo,' on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations." Federal prosecutors have "since threatened to destroy any company that doesn't 'cooperate' by waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off accused employees from legal support. Milberg Weiss stood by its due-process rights, and duly received a potential corporate death sentence."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Democrats Vote 99-58 To Remove Jefferson From Ways And Means. After a three-hour, closed-door meeting last night, the House Democratic Caucus voted 99-58 to remove Rep. William Jefferson from his seat on the Ways and Means Committee in light of the ongoing FBI bribery investigation. If Jefferson does not voluntarily quit the committee, the question will move to the full House for a final vote.

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Espo) notes that Democrats were "determined to make an election-year point about ethics" and reports, "The rank and file acted despite a last-minute plea by the embattled Louisiana lawmaker and persistent complaints from the Congressional Black Caucus that there was neither rule nor precedent for the action." After the vote, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said, "This isn't about proof in a court of law. This is about an ethical standard. I wish the White House would follow our lead on this."

USA Today (6/16, 4A, 2.31M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, and the Baton Rouge Advocate (6/16, Shields) calls the vote "an unprecedented move" and reports, "Pelosi had called on Jefferson to observe the 'high ethical standard of the House Democratic caucus,'" but last night, she "did not gloat. 'It's not about victory,' Pelosi said. 'It's very sad. Our Democratic caucus said it would hold a high ethical standard, and now we're doing it.'"

The New York Times (6/16, Zernike, 1.19M) adds that the Democrats voted to remove Jefferson "as they tried to avoid any taint of scandal in a year when they want to ride accusations of Republican corruption to election victories. … Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus have supported Mr. Jefferson," but Pelosi said that Jefferson "had been afforded due process," and she "sought to draw a line between Republican scandals and what she called 'individual mistakes.'" Pelosi added, "The entire Republican caucus condoned, enabled and benefited from the culture of corruption, and that is what I will continue to rail against."

DOJ_NMG_0034619

The Washington Post (6/16, Murray, 744K) also reports Pelosi "sought to take a strong election-year stance on ethics, while Jefferson's allies -- mainly fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus -- protested that he was being singled out for unfair treatment." CBC "members said their concern was the lack of any rule pertaining to lawmakers in Jefferson's situation. He has not been indicted in the case but could face serious charges." The Post notes, "The pressure from Pelosi and others was stepped up when the FBI revealed it videotaped Jefferson accepting $100,000 in $100 bills from a government witness."

The Washington Times (6/16, DeBose, 90K) reports Pelosi "denied any racial bias in her effort to oust Mr. Jefferson but not Rep. Alan B. Mollohan…who is white and is suspected of using his House Appropriations Committee seat to funnel money and contracts to numerous nonprofit groups and a business-partner relative. … 'Mr. Jefferson has had two people plead guilty to bribing him,' she said. 'We don't know if Mr. Mollohan is even being investigated.'"

Under the headline "Black Caucus Opposes Democrats' Move to Take Jefferson Off Key Committee," the Los Angeles Times (6/16, Hook,, 958K) notes, "Some Democrats have expressed concern that the dispute will undercut Pelosi's efforts to forge party cohesiveness in the House ahead of the 2006 elections. But she dismissed such worries. … 'We can withstand debate; it isn't stifled,'" Pelosi said after the vote.

CQ (6/16, Ferrechio) reports, "The next move is up to Rep. James E. Clyburn…who is a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. It would be Clyburn's responsibility as Democratic Caucus chairman to introduce a privileged resolution in the House calling for Jefferson's removal from the exclusive committee."

FBI Raid Pulls House General Counsel Office Into Limelight. The New York Times (6/16, von Zielbauer, 1.19M) reports that "the F.B.I.'s raid last month on the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson…has drawn" the House Office of the General Counsel "and the woman who leads it, Geraldine R. Gennet, into a rare public fight with the executive branch. … The Justice Department, which prevented lawyers from Ms. Gennet's office to be present during the search, has defended it as a perfectly legal act." But in support of Jefferson's suit to have the seized items returned, Gennet "filed a 90-page memorandum criticizing the raid as a 'grave threat'" to Congressional independence.

Judge To Hear Arguments In Jefferson Documents Lawsuit Today. MSNBC.com (6/15, Seidman) reports, "The federal judge who signed the search warrant allowing the FBI to enter…Jefferson's Capitol Hill office…will preside at a potentially contentious hearing Friday – a hearing pitting the executive and legislative branches of government in a showdown over the United States Constitution." MSNBC notes, "It is still not known exactly what was seized from Jefferson's office," because "the materials…have been kept on ice, so-to-speak. In a move designed to allow the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Justice Department enough time to try to resolve the issue, President George W. Bush ordered the seized material sealed and kept in the Solicitor General's office until mid-July."

Jury To Resume Deliberations In Safavian Case Today. The AP (6/16, Yost) reports the jury in the corruption case of former Bush Administration procurement official David Safavian "deliberated for a second day Thursday without reaching a verdict in the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." Jurors "are to resume on Friday trying to decide whether" Safavian "covered up his assistance to Republican influence-peddler Jack Abramoff."

Former Chicago Official Told FBI He Copied Hiring Files Out Of Fear For His Life. The Chicago Tribune (6/16, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "The former son-in-law of a prominent ex-alderman told federal investigators that he copied and saved city computer files 'because he was scared that he may be killed,' according to portions of an FBI interview cited Thursday in the City Hall corruption trial. Robert Koch, a former manager of city computer servers, said later that he may have exaggerated those fears." Koch "testified that he had files deleted at the behest of Mayor Richard Daley aide Robert Sorich in 1997. But under cross-examination by Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin, Koch acknowledged that he secretly saved a copy of the files from the mayor's office in his locker at a gym. 'You told the FBI you were afraid because you had been at family events with the Huelses and the Daleys where other people had talked about getting people knocked off?' Durkin asked. 'I'm not going to admit that,' Koch replied," but after Durkin showed him the FBI record of agents' meeting with him, "Koch finally acknowledged that he did express fear to authorities."

FBI Agent Testifies About Conversation With Sorich About Hiring Records. The Chicago Tribune (6/16, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) also reports, "A veteran FBI agent testified later Thursday that he questioned Sorich about hiring records in preparation for the 1997 corruption trial of former Water Department Commissioner John Bolden. FBI Agent Reges Fay said that while investigating Bolden for taking kickbacks from Water Department job applicants, he learned Sorich might have had a role in the applicants' hiring. Sorich told Fay in a telephone conversation in 1997 that he referred 10 applicants to Bolden, Fay said. Sorich said the names came from local community leaders, and that his office kept no records of the applicants, Fay testified. Fay said Sorich provided him no other information about his alleged role in hiring applicants in Water or any other department."

DOJ_NMG_0034620

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/16, Korecki, Warmbir) reports, "Durkin suggested Koch was trying to protect his father-in-law by saying he destroyed the files for Sorich." Then-Alderman Patrick Huels "was under FBI investigation after the Chicago Sun-Times exposed a questionable loan he received." But "Fay testified Thursday that the FBI didn't even open its investigation into Huels until October of 1997 -- about a month after Koch had the computer files destroyed."

Library Records Subpoenaed In FBI Investigation Of Suburban Chicago Mayor. The Niles Herald-Spectator (6/15, Johnson) reported, "The Niles Public Library was subpoenaed Monday by the U.S. Attorney's Office and told to supply all financial information regarding the library's dealings with the insurance agency of Ralph Weiner & Associates. Library Administrator Cary Czarnecki said staff is cooperating with authorities and in the process of gathering the required information. During an FBI investigation into possible fraudulent dealings involving Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase and the Weiner agency, agents raided the insurance company's Wheeling office June 6 and uncovered check vouchers for payments to S.M.P. Insurance Service, Inc., noting the Niles Public Library in the description line."

Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge Still At Large. The AP (6/16, Gardner) reports, "A man sought by police Thursday in the slaying of his estranged wife and the attack on a family court judge left a phone message saying he wanted 'the true story' to get out to the public, his cousin said." The AP continues, "Authorities have searched for Darren Mack since Monday when the judge was shot and wounded in his office by a sniper. Mack was charged the next day with murder in the stabbing death of Charla Mack, 39. … His cousin, Jeffrey Donner, said he received a phone message from Mack shortly after the shooting, saying, 'If anything happens to me, please make sure that the true story about the injustices that are going on in that courtroom get out to the media and the public.'" The AP adds, "Donner said his cousin had complained about Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling Mack's divorce case, for the past year and got the impression the judge was biased and made decisions before he heard all the facts. … 'He was just obsessed with bringing this judge down. Not physically. I never heard anything like that, but by reputation,' Donner said of Mack. … Police said Weller, 53, who was shot once in the chest, was released from the hospital on Tuesday to an undisclosed, secure location. … The Justice Department also charged Mack Thursday with unlawful flight to avoid prosecution."

DOJ Official Says Online Threats On The Rise. CNET News (6/16, Evers) reports, "Authorities are cracking down on phishing and botnets, but the threats are advancing instead of diminishing, two law enforcement officials said." CNET continues, "Cybercrooks are organizing better and moving to more sophisticated tactics to get their hands on confidential data and turn PCs of unwitting users into bots, representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Air Force Office of Special Investigations said in separate presentations here at the Computer Security Institute's NetSec event this week." CNET adds, "Law enforcement has had increased successes in catching, prosecuting and convicting phishers and bot herders over the past couple of years. However, catching the bad guys is getting tougher as the criminals become more professional, the representatives said. … 'We're seeing increasingly sophisticated groups online that are more indicative of crime groups,' Jonathan Rusch, special counsel for fraud prevention at the Justice Department, said in a presentation. The criminals who have been caught range from teenagers to retirees, he said. … Rusch spoke about phishing, a prevalent type of online attack that combines e-mail spam and fraudulent Web sites made to look like trusted sites, which are aimed at tricking a user into giving up sensitive information such as a credit card or Social Security number. Almost 17,500 phishing Web sites were reported to the Anti-Phishing Working Group in April. … A top phishing concern is the increased use of malicious software, Rusch said."

Supreme Court Rules Evidence Seized In Searches Without Knocking Admissible. The Supreme Court yesterday announced a decision in a 4th Amendment case that increases the leeway of police in home searches. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 9, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government won a major Supreme Court victory today. The court ruled that police who have a warrant can break into homes and seize evidence even if they don't knock and identify themselves first. President Bush's two appointees sided with the majority as the court decided the case on a 5-4 vote."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 9, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is no dispute here that police in Detroit conducted an illegal search, violating the rule that requires them to knock first, announce what they are up to, and then wait a bit before barging in to protect the homeowner's privacy. In the past, the courts would have thrown out the evidence from such an illegal search, hoping to encourage police to follow the rules, but today the Supreme Court said excluding the evidence goes too far. The court said there are other ways to discourage police misconduct, such as a recent law that allows citizens to sue the police. The court split 5-4 on this with the two newest members in the majority, Sam Alito and the Chief Justice John Roberts. But the dissenters say this takes away the strongest incentive for getting the police to follow the knock-and-announce rule."

DOJ_NMG_0034621

The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Savage, 958K) notes that in 1995, "the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually required officers to knock on the door and call out 'Police!' before they burst into a home. This rule helped protect the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then." Until now, however, "it was not clear whether the police would be penalized if they ignored this rule. Officers were told they should usually wait about 20 seconds after announcing their presence before they tried to enter a house. They may move faster if they suspect the residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet, the court said."

USA Today (6/16, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the decision "undercuts a nearly century-old rule that says evidence found during an unlawful search cannot be used." The decision also "offers a sign that the court might be more apt to strengthen the hand of police with Justice Samuel Alito in the place of retired justice Sandra Day O'Connor." The New York Times (6/16, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the "knock-and-announce" rule "dates to 13th-century England as protection against illegal entry by the police into private homes."

The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Lane, 744K) reports "the broadly worded majority opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., suggested that the nation has moved into a new era of improved policing in which such strong medicine may no longer be justified." The ruling "underscored the court's rightward shift."

The Legal Times (6/16, Mauro) reports, "Scalia's ruling was confined to the context of the knock-and-announce rule, but some elements of it could apply more broadly, possibly setting the stage for a future attack on the exclusionary rule, which excludes from use at trial any evidence that is illegally obtained by police. That rule, first established by the Supreme Court for federal courts in 1914 and applied to states in 1961, has been a hardy but controversial tool for discouraging police misconduct." The Times adds, "Law enforcement advocates applauded the ruling. 'Today's decision not to expand the exclusionary rule is very important to law enforcement,' said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. 'Justice is best served when juries are allowed to consider all relevant evidence.'"

The decision is generally being described as an expansion of police powers. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Richey, 61K), for example, titles its report "Supreme Court Gives Police More Power," with the AP (6/16, Holland), Los Angeles Times (6/16, Savage, 958K) and Washington Times (6/16, Seper, 90K) running similar stories.

Knight Ridder (6/16, Henderson) reports Justice Stephen Breyer "penned a sharp dissent that accused the court of misreading its own precedents and defying 'elementary logic.'" The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Bravin, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) notes the dissent "noted many exceptions to the knock-and-announce rule already exist, including when police reasonably suspect that obeying it would expose them to danger or allow suspects to destroy evidence."

NYTimes, LATimes Criticize Decision. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "This decision should offend anyone, liberal or conservative, who worries about the privacy rights of ordinary Americans. … For those who worry that Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito will take the court in a radically conservative direction, it is sobering how easily the majority tossed aside a principle that traces back to 13th-century Britain, and a legal doctrine that dates to 1914, to let the government invade people's homes." Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (6/16, 958K) editorializes that "Scalia's opinion gives the police exactly" a "blank check by removing the best deterrent to police misconduct: the exclusion of evidence at trial."

Former Prosecutor Relishes Role In Recovering Roosevelt Pistol. Under the headline "A TR 'Nut' Savors His Big Find," the Philadelphia Inquirer (6/16, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "For 17 years, Robert Goldman policed the art world as a federal prosecutor based in Philadelphia. He helped recover $150 million worth of stolen artifacts," but "it wasn't until this week that Goldman snagged his white whale," Theodore Roosevelt's "priceless Colt revolver." Goldman told the Inquirer, "I felt like a kid returning it. I'm a Roosevelt nut." The Inquirer notes, "Goldman and his former partner, FBI agent Robert Wittman, returned the gun to Cove Neck during a brief ceremony Wednesday." Discussing the tip which led to the gun's recovery, Sagamore Hill curator Amy Verone said, "It was not exactly a rugged investigation. A guy calls you on the phone and gives you a gift. Hey, I'm happy to have the gift." But "it was a bit more than a gift, the FBI agent said. 'Luck is the result of a lot of preparation that allows you take advantage of situations when they happen,' Wittman said."

Kentucky High Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed. The AP (6/16, Barrouquere) reports, "The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the mental age of a death row inmate does not prevent the state from executing him." The AP continues, "An attorney for Thomas Clyde Bowling had argued that the inmate had the mental capacity of an 11-year-old when he killed two people in Lexington in 1990, citing testimony from psychologists." The AP adds, "The state high court in Frankfort noted the U.S. Supreme Court's decision last year barring executions for killers who were not at least 18 years old at the time of the crime, but said the ruling did not specifically prohibit putting to death someone with a mental age below that. … 'There is simply no language to support such a conclusion,' Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in a 5-0 opinion. … Johnstone wrote that there is some validity to the idea put forth by Bowling's attorneys, but that the federal high court intentionally established chronological age, not mental age, as the deciding factor."

DOJ_NMG_0034622

Implementation Of Death Penalty Said To Be Lawless. In a New York Times op-ed (6/16), David R. Dow, a law professor at the University of Houston, says, "Earlier this week, the Supreme Court decided, in a 5-to-3 opinion, that a Tennessee prison inmate named Paul G. House was entitled to prove he did not commit the crime for which he was sent to death row." The House case "will make it hard for abolitionists to shift their focus from the question of innocence, but that is what they ought to do. They ought to focus on the far more pervasive problem: that the machinery of death in America is lawless, and in carrying out death sentences, we violate our legal principles nearly all of the time."

Maryland Police Have No Evidence Linking VA Theft To Other Burglaries. The AP (6/16, Yen) reports police "investigating the theft of private data on 26.5 million veterans and military troops said Thursday they have no evidence the crime is related to other burglaries in which computers were resold after the hard drives were erased." Police said they "still believe the May 3 burglary was random and that thieves were not aware of the data when they stole a personal laptop and external hard drive from a Veterans Affairs employee's Aspen Hill, Md., home." Last week, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson "told Congress that the VA remained hopeful that the May 3 burglary was a random theft, noting there had been no evidence any of the information had been used for identity theft." But police in Montgomery County, Md., "investigating the theft said that was not necessarily the case."

Malvo Told Police Of Other Shootings. The Washington Post (6/16, A1Ernesto Londoã±, Rich) reports, "Lee Boyd Malvo told law enforcement officials this spring that he and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad are responsible for four shootings across the country that have not been publicly attributed to them, a source familiar with the case said." The Post continues, "A second source confirmed that investigators have received information implicating the snipers in those shootings, which claimed the lives of two men and wounded two others in the months before the October 2002 slayings that terrorized the Washington region. The sources declined to speak for attribution because of the sensitivity of the information." The Post adds, "Malvo was interviewed extensively by law enforcement officials in preparation for his testimony at Muhammad's trial last month in Maryland. … It is unclear to what degree, if any, authorities have corroborated Malvo's new claims. He has provided conflicting accounts of shootings in the past and testified last month that he lied to investigators after he and Muhammad were arrested. … The claims bring the list of confirmed and suspected sniper shootings to 27, including 17 homicides, and add two states to the list of jurisdictions that could file charges against Muhammad and Malvo."

Maryland Governor To Sign Bill Strengthening Laws On Sex Offenders. The Washington Post (6/16, B1, Mosk) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr. (R) "said that he would sign legislation passed in the predawn hours yesterday that would enhance the monitoring of convicted sex offenders and impose mandatory minimum sentences for those who prey on minors. … The legislation passed yesterday provides for more stringent monitoring of released offenders and gives police the authority to notify a broader list of community leaders when an offender moves into a neighborhood. Offenders would be required to check in with police more frequently and regularly update their photographs for an online database. It also calls for a team, which includes a mental health professional, to evaluate sex offenders before they are released and to determine appropriate monitoring methods, including the option of a Global Positioning System chip in an ankle bracelet."

Private Developers Banning Sex Offenders. USA Today (6/16, Koch) reports, "A Texas-based company, I&S Investment Group, is breaking ground this summer on a 154-lot development in Lenexa, Kan., that will bar registered sex offenders. If someone is convicted of a sex crime while living there, the subdivision will fine the person $1,500 daily until he or she moves. The group has sold out all 150 lots in its first such development in Lubbock, Texas, begun 10 months ago, and plans to offer 250 more lots there this fall. … 'The sex offender deal has improved demand. It's probably increased our sales three to four times,' says I&S partner Clayton Isom, 24. 'We're fighting sex offenders head on.'" USA continues, "Another Texan, Taylor Goodman, today launched a website, Blockwatcher.com, listing homes for sale that have no registered sex offenders living within a half-mile radius. He says only 20% of available homes will qualify. … The new private efforts complement an accelerating push by states and cities to bar sex offenders from living near schools or playgrounds. Hundreds of cities, including more than a dozen this year alone, have approved such ordinances, some of which block out entire downtowns. … At least 15 states have enacted such laws, including three (Nebraska, Mississippi and South Dakota) that did so for the first time this year and two (Georgia and Indiana) that expanded prior restrictions. Others, including California and Pennsylvania, restrict offenders on parole or probation. The restrictions have increased despite U.S. data showing sex crimes against children have decreased in the last decade."

DOJ_NMG_0034623

CIVIL LAW:

Honeywell Settles Whistleblower Charges With US For $2.6 Million. The AP (6/16, Gold) reports, "Honeywell International Inc. has paid the federal government $2.625 million to settle charges it failed to properly test packaging for sensitive parts used by the Defense Department and NASA, authorities said Thursday." The AP continues, "Fifteen percent of the settlement, or $393,750, went to a California company and one of its executives, who brought a whistleblower lawsuit several years ago against Morris Township-based Honeywell." The AP adds, "Honeywell was accused of violating the False Claims Act over testing of electrostatic protective metallic sheets that were to package more than 186,000 sensitive parts, the Justice Department said. … A Justice spokesman, Charles Miller, said he could not comment on the nature of the parts but said none were damaged because of the packaging. … The lawsuit charged that Honeywell knowingly made and sold sheets that did not meet military specifications. Honeywell disputed the allegations, said court papers unsealed with the settlement."

St. Barnabas Health Care To Pay $265 Million Medicare Fraud Settlement. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16, Parry) reports, "New Jersey's largest health care provider will pay $265 million to settle federal charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars by inflating charges for seriously ill patients, prosecutors said Thursday. The agreement between prosecutors and Saint Barnabas Health Care System, which operates nine hospitals and a behavioral treatment center in New Jersey, concerns a program Medicare provides to supplement its normal payments. … As part of the settlement, under which Saint Barnabas did not admit wrongdoing, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years." FBI Newark SAC Les Wiser Jr. said, "Saint Barnabas was a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling. If he were alive today, he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name." The Newark Star-Ledger (6/16, Martin, 420K) notes, "The settlement…represented a first-of-its-kind agreement for a form of health care fraud that has been largely invisible to patients but has cost taxpayers billions of dollars in the past decade." Wiser "noted that Saint Barnabas was 'a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling.' 'If he was alive today,' Wiser said, 'he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name.'"

The Legal Intelligencer (6/16, Duffy) reports, "In the suits, the whistleblowers claimed Saint Barnabas was abusing a Medicare provision that provides for supplemental payments for unusually expensive cases, referred to as 'outliers.' … Justice Department lawyers said yesterday that between October 1995 and August 2003, the nine hospitals operated by West Orange, N.J.-based Saint Barnabas "purposefully inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care to make these cases appear more costly than they actually were."

The New York Times (6/16, Smothers, 1.19M) reports, "St. Barnabas officials said they welcomed a resolution to the federal inquiry, and the United States attorney's office here emphasized that the settlement was not an admission of guilt to any criminal charges. But federal investigators accused the hospital network of 'gaming the system and exploiting loopholes' to increase its revenues. 'St. Barnabas was a man who gave up his worldly wealth to help others,' said Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office here. 'If he were alive today he would be ashamed.'" The Wall Street Journal (6/16, B2, 2.11M) also reports on the settlement.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former DOJ Attorney Pleads Guilty To Conflict Charges In California. The Fremont (CA) Argus (6/16, Richman) reports, "A former U.S. Justice Department civil rights attorney admits he was angling for a state job to monitor and reform California's youth prisons even as he led a federal probe of one of those facilities in Stockton." The Argus continues, "Ryan Rainey, 48, has pleaded guilty to one count of violating the federal conflict-of-interest law and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 15 by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Facciola of Washington, D.C. … A civil lawsuit challenging the living conditions in youth prisons had required the appointment of a 'special master' to monitor and oversee reforms." The Argus adds, "Rainey admits that while leading the federal probe he was negotiating with state Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office for the special master's job, even though he knew the state had a financial interest in the findings and recommendations of the probe he was conducting. … The maximum sentence for the crime is a year in prison and a $100,000 fine but Rainey's May 26 plea agreement indicates the government will seek a zero-to-six-month term and won't oppose a sentence carrying no time behind bars. … Rainey was a senior trial attorney in the Special Litigation Section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from January 2002 through April 2005. Earlier he'd been a federal prosecutor in Washington, D.C., for seven years."

DOJ_NMG_0034624

FBI Investigating Alleged Racist Firing By Washington State Police Chief. The Oregonian (6/16, Gilbert, 346K) reports, "Ridgefield, Wash., Police Chief Bruce Hall should be replaced, according to two Kirkland, Wash., police lieutenants who investigated allegations of racism in the firing of Ridgefield's only African American officer," Carl Mealing. "Now, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has begun its own investigation in Ridgefield. Council member Scott Hanson said Thursday that he talked with the FBI earlier this week but declined to say what about. Interim Ridgefield City Manager Justin L. Clary said an FBI agent attended meetings with him, interim Ridgefield Police Chief Erin Nolan and Clark County Sheriff Garry Lucas, but he declined to say what was discussed. An FBI probe 'was not something requested by the city,' Clary said. An FBI spokeswoman in Seattle declined to confirm or deny an investigation was under way."

Los Angeles Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Police Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Winton) reports, "Faced with the third case in a year of deputies firing scores of shots at a suspect, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca on Thursday said he had ordered an investigation into whether six deputies used too much force earlier this week when they unleashed 70 rounds at a suspect." The Times continues, "Scrutiny of the shooting intensified as officials Thursday revealed that at least one deputy had fired so many shots that he reloaded his weapon during the Walnut Park incident, which left 27-year-old Carl Williams dead. … 'Obviously, we have to look at this very closely. We will get to the bottom of this fast,' Baca said. 'We will know the motivation of each of the shooters. They know what the policy is here. Because it is the heat of battle, it doesn't dismiss your objectivity.'" The Times adds, "The shooting comes a year after deputies in Compton had fired 120 rounds at a suspect they were chasing on a residential street. Some of the bullets flew into nearby homes and embedded in walls. … After that incident, the Sheriff's Department imposed rules that made it more difficult for deputies to fire at moving cars and to fire multiple times. Baca said he was concerned that the shooting could have been a case of "contagious fire," in which deputies fire their weapons because they hear a gunshot. He said he hoped that the new rules would reduce such problems. … But in January, deputies fired more than 50 shots into a Compton house where a suspect was holed up. That case is being investigated by the department's Internal Affairs detectives."

Senate Panel Approves Flag Desecration Amendment. The Washington Times/AP (6/16) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee gave a nod yesterday to a constitutional amendment to protect the American flag from desecration, moving it to the Senate floor, where vote counters on both sides say it could be within one vote of passing. The 11-7 vote sent the amendment to the floor. Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, has said the measure will get a Senate vote this month."

Bloomberg (6/16) reports GOP Sen. Orrin Hatch "said he believed more than 67 senators, or two-thirds, would support the measure if they were 'allowed to vote their consciences.'' Both sides "predict a close Senate vote." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "supports the proposed amendment. The Senate's No. 2 Republican, Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, opposes it."

Louisiana Senate Alters Bill To Change Open Primary Elections. The AP (6/16) reports, "If Louisiana is going to shed its unique 'open primary' system, then the state must make sure independent voters are allowed to cast ballots in the new party primary elections, the House voted on Thursday." The AP continues, "Sen. Cleo Fields introduced a bill that would replace the state's open primaries with Republican and Democratic primaries in congressional races, leaving it up to the parties to decide whether independents and third-party voters are allowed to cast ballots. … The House decided to change the measure slightly, adding a provision that would allow an independent voter to pick one or the other party's primaries to vote in. They then passed the measure 58-35, sending it back to the Senate for approval of the change." The AP adds, "Despite the change, Rep. Joel Robideaux of Lafayette, who has no party affiliation, said it was unfair to independent candidates. Robideaux said the measure would make it increasingly difficult for independents to run for Congress because they would wait on the sidelines until the general election. … Fields, D-Baton Rouge, a former congressman, has tried for years to get rid of open primaries, arguing that the current system often results in Louisiana's newly elected members of Congress getting a late start - and less desirable committee assignments - on Capitol Hill because the state holds its runoff elections in December, a month later than other states. … If it becomes law, voters could cast ballots in two party primaries, then a November runoff, to select their congressmen and U.S. senators. … The measure would also need approval from the U.S. Justice Department, because any change to Louisiana election law needs federal approval, a restriction stemming from the Voting Rights Act of 1965."

Baltimore Police, Jail Sued For Arrests Without Charges. The Baltimore Sun (6/16, Bykowicz, Yakaitis) reports, "The NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union sued the Baltimore Police Department and the state-run city jail Thursday, using the experiences of five men to allege a broad pattern of abuse in which they say thousands of people are routinely arrested and held for hours without being charged with a crime." The Sun continues, "The lawsuit, filed in Baltimore Circuit Court by the Maryland ACLU, condemns the practice of jailing citizens for so-called quality-of-life crimes such as loitering -- one of the central strategies employed by police here and in other cities in their efforts to drive down crime. … The issue emerged just over a year ago with reports in The Sun of overcrowding at the Central Booking and Intake Facility." The Sun adds, "The plaintiffs, including a 19-year-old Morgan State engineering student and two Pennsylvania residents visiting Baltimore for a bachelor party, allege that city police officers routinely make arrests without probable cause and do so 'under a pattern and practice set and enforced by city officials.' … City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler said the plaintiffs 'will not be able to prove their truly wild allegations.' … 'The illegal arrests claim rests largely on a false equation,' he said. 'The fact that the state's attorney declines to charge in many cases does not suggest that the arrest was illegal.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034625

California Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Lait, Rubin) reports, "Police officers assigned to protect Compton schools against vandalism and other campus crimes have been asleep at the wheel, quite literally, according to photographs and sworn testimony in a racial discrimination lawsuit." The Times continues, "The photographs appear to show several uniformed school officers in the driver's seats of parked squad cars with eyes shut and, in some cases, heads leaning back." The Times adds, "The pictures emerged in a suit against the Compton Unified School District, which operates the 34-member police department. The case was filed by a white ex-officer and two Latino officers who contend that they were treated differently from black colleagues within the predominantly African American department. … Former Officer Mark Shiva, who at one time served as president of the police officers union, and current Officers Victor Ayala and Sergio Reynoso allege that they were hit with racial slurs, ridiculed and retaliated against after lodging complaints against black colleagues. … Shiva, who was fired after the suit was filed in 2005, took the photographs within the last two years, according to testimony in the case. Shiva shot the pictures to prove that colleagues were sleeping on duty. … According to testimony, all of the officers accused of sleeping in patrol cars are black. But in the background of one photo, a white officer also appears to be sleeping. When the conduct was brought to the attention of supervisors, none of the officers were disciplined, authorities said."

Ehrlich Fires Appointee Over Remarks On Gays. The Washington Post (6/16, A1, Sun, Mosk, 744K) reports Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "yesterday fired Robert J. Smith, his appointee on the Metro transit authority board, for referring to gay people as sexual deviants on a cable television show." In a statement, Ehrlich said, "Robert Smith's comments were highly inappropriate, insensitive and unacceptable. They are in direct conflict to my administration's commitment to inclusiveness, tolerance and opportunity."

WPost Criticizes House Over Military Rules On Religious Expression. The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) says in an editorial, "The military has been making a good-faith effort in recent months to write rules on religious activities that preserve both the rights of free expression among service members and the separation of church and state. It's unfortunate, therefore, that the House of Representatives, responding to pressure from evangelical Christian groups, has unnecessarily inserted itself into this debate, with a provision in the recent defense authorization bill aimed at ensuring that evangelical chaplains can pray in Jesus's name at public ceremonies. The Senate is debating a version that wisely leaves out the House provision and lets the military services continue to work out this complex issue the right way -- without congressional interference."

ANTITRUST:

Official Pleads Guilty To Military Bid-Rigging. The Virginian-Pilot (6/16, Mcglone) reports, "An executive with a marine products company has agreed to plead guilty to conspiring to rig bids in the sale of foam buoys and fenders to the Navy and the Coast Guard, the Justice Department announced Thursday " The V-P continues, "Gerald Thermos, president of Marine Fenders International, based in Wilmington, Calif., was charged in Norfolk federal court this week with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. … The Justice Department said Thermos has agreed to plead guilty to the felony, serve four months in jail and four months of home detention, and pay a $50,000 fine. No court date has been set." The V-P adds, "The department said that from June 2000 to August 2005, Thermos and other unidentified co-conspirators schemed to fix prices for marine fenders and buoys that were sold to the Navy, the Coast Guard and other government and private entities. … 'Price fixing and bid rigging are serious concerns when it relates to products and services procured by the Department of Defense,' Rick Gwin, special agent in charge of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, western field office, said in a news release."

Bill Gates To Relinquish Day-To-Day Control Of Microsoft For Philanthropy. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Microsoft founder Bill Gates "announced today he will step down in two years, giving up day-to-day responsibility at Microsoft. Rather than making money, now, he wants to devote his life to giving it away." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Speaking at Microsoft headquarters in Seattle, he announced he will give up the helm of the world's largest software company to commit himself full-time to philanthropy." The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (6/15, lead story, 3:30, Brown, 9.87M) also reported the story.

DOJ_NMG_0034626

USA Today (6/16, Acohido, Kessler) reports, "Microsoft chairman Bill Gates announced Thursday that he will let loose the reins of the company he co-founded in college and shaped into a behemoth, to focus on philanthropy." USA continues, "Gates, 50, who was also Microsoft's chief software architect, will give up day-to-day duties in July 2008, retaining the title of chairman. … That will leave Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer and Chief Technical Officers Ray Ozzie and Craig Mundie to carry out a transition the software giant is struggling to make from lumbering supplier of desktop computer software to nimble competitor in a rapidly changing tech market." USA adds, "Gates insisted that the change announced Thursday 'is not a retirement.' He plans to spend most of his time working for his charity, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. … Gates says he plans to have a relationship with Microsoft for many years."

Antitrust Battles Have Marked Gates' Tenure. The Financial Times (6/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft's battles with antitrust regulators on both sides of the Atlantic have been a consistent feature of Bill Gates' tenure." The Times continues, "While the software group managed to broker a deal with the US authorities in 2002 that ended its regulatory troubles in the country, Microsoft's fight with the European Commission in Brussels is still very much alive." The Times adds, "In a landmark ruling in March 2004, the Commission found Microsoft guilty of violating European Union competition rules by abusing its dominant position in the market for personal computer operating systems. Microsoft was fined a record €497m ($628m) and told to change its business practices. … The group was told to share more information about its flagship Windows programme with rival companies and to stop bundling its Windows Media Player software with the operating system. … The ruling, which is under appeal, has since sparked a new case against Microsoft, because the Commission alleges that the group has not implemented the ruling properly. It has threatened to impose fresh fines of up to €2m a day unless Microsoft complies with the Brussels ruling speedily. … Adding to Microsoft's regulatory worries in Europe is the fact that Brussels is also taking aim at Vista, the operating system set to replace Windows next year."

Microsoft Wins Patent Case Using "eBay Argument." The California Recorder (6/16, Kobylarz) reports, "Microsoft Corp. appears to be the first company to benefit from the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision to end the long-standing presumption in patent cases that an injunction should be issued almost automatically when infringement is found." The Recorder continues, "Applying the Supreme Court's May ruling in MercExchange v. eBay, a Texas federal judge denied the request of Z4 Technologies Inc., a tiny Michigan software firm, to bar Microsoft from selling, making and using its infringing Windows and Office products." The Recorder adds, "The ruling, issued on Thursday by Judge Leonard Davis in the Eastern District of Texas, signals a major shift in patent litigation practice and is the first indication of how the eBay ruling has quickly become important to the way companies fight patent infringement claims. … In April, a Texas jury found Microsoft and Autodesk willfully infringed two of Z4's patents covering methods for limiting unauthorized use of computer software. Both Microsoft and Autodesk use the anti-piracy program in some of their products. The jury ordered the two companies to pay Z4 a combined $133 million in damages, the biggest award ever in a patent case to come out of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas."

Vinci Rebuffs Veolia's Merger Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (6/16) reports, "Vinci SA rejected a merger approach from French water utility Veolia Environnement SA, calling it unsolicited and hostile." The Journal continues, "In rejecting the proposal, Vinci, a French construction company, said a merger of the two entities 'would have no strategic interest, would not create synergies and would not create value for its shareholders.'" The Journal adds, "Veolia's board had asked Veolia's chairman Wednesday to study a friendly merger with Vinci, a move that would create a utility and services company valued at about €34 billion, or $43 billion. … After Vinci rejected the proposal, Veolia said it 'regrets Vinci's opposition to review the interest of a potential friendly alliance.' … Veolia, the world's largest water utility by revenue, has been looking to expand its concessions business and is eager to increase its €16.9 billion market capitalization to compete with larger, more financially powerful conglomerates such as water and energy utility Suez SA. Vinci's market capitalization is €19 billion."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Authorizes Marine Reserve In Northwest Hawaiian Islands. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 9, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush today created the world's largest protected marine reserve, the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands. The chain of uninhabited islands, 100 hundred miles wide, stretches across the Pacific Ocean for 1,400 miles. If laid across the continental United States, they'd reach from Idaho to Missouri."

DOJ_NMG_0034627

The move was widely praised by conservation advocates. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 8, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The President has had his battles with environmentalists. But tonight, they are cheering." ABC (Potter) added, "These islands and the vast coral around them are so wild and so remote, that even the most adventurous of us will likely never see them." President Bush "had put a low priority on a far away corals. It took a bit of celebrity to change his mind." In April, "at a White House dinner, Jean Michelle Cousteau, son of the famous explorer Jacques Cousteau, showed this documentary he had made, showing how seabirds were choking on debris from thousands of miles away." People "who were there said the President was moved."

NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 8, 2:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported "nearly all" conservationists "are thrilled about his decision to make one of the most spectacular places on earth, a chain of Hawaiian islands, a new national monument, giving them extraordinary protection for years to come." After President Bush "screened a documentary by Jacques Cousteau's son, Jean-Michel, he went further, demanding the stronger protections allowed for a national monument. Now, ship traffic, trash dumping, and most recreational activities will be prohibited. And over a five-year period, commercial fishing will be phased out completely."

The Washington Times and Los Angeles Times, among other newspapers, run an AP story (6/16) reporting, "It is only the second time that Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features. The law itself turned 100 this month." The President "had planned as late as Wednesday to use instead the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others to the decision, said a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity so as not to upstage Bush." But he "opted at the last minute to create a national monument after realizing the process had gone on for five years and elicited thousands of comments." The Washington Post (6/16, A6, Baker, 744K) mentions the marine reserve announces as part of a story on he President signing a bill boosting broadcast indecency fines,

The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Spotts, 61K) reports that "several analysts add that, in some respects, the move is a political no-brainer for the White House. Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, has imposed similar restrictions in the region out to the state's three-mile limit, which built local support for expanding the restrictions." The Monitor adds, "Except for a handful of commercial fishermen, the proposal has drawn virtually no opposition from other commercial interests because the region lacks oil deposits and other easily exploitable resources."

NYTimes, WPost Praise Bush. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "An unfamiliar but highly appealing side of President Bush showed itself at the White House yesterday. It was Mr. Bush the compassionate conservationist, friend of green sea turtles, seabirds and Hawaiian monk seals, savior of coral reefs and spiny lobsters, creator of the largest ocean sanctuary on the planet." Bush "made exemplary use of presidential power yesterday. We hope he does more of it."

The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) editorializes, "This administration and future ones should follow up with similar actions to protect other ecologically sensitive marine systems. America began protecting its land-based national parks and monuments a century ago, but the country has lagged in shielding its underwater treasures." Bush's action "offers an exciting example of assertive action to put essential areas beyond further human destruction."

Democrats Say EPA Blocked Information About Toxic Sites. The Los Angeles Times (6/16, Miller, 958K) reports. "Senate Democrats on Thursday accused the Bush administration of withholding key details about toxic waste sites that present risks of exposure to nearby residents." At a congressional hearing, Sen. Barbara Boxer "said the Environmental Protection Agency had designated as confidential the details of about 140 Superfund sites where toxic exposure remains uncontrolled." Boxer and other Democrats "said the secret data included information about how much money and time it would take to clean up the dangerous sites, including one where the EPA predicted it would take 26 years to close off access to toxics." The EPA "said that it had only blocked information related to law enforcement and that the public had access to all relevant health risk data for the sites, seven of which are in California."

Sago Mine Disaster Survivor Attends Mine Safety Bill Signing. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 12, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a very emotional event at the White House today. The only man to survive the Sago West Virginia mine explosion, Randall McCloy was there, for the signing into law of sweeping, new mine safety rules. Relatives of the men who died also attended the ceremony."

The AP (6/16, Zuckerbrod) reports "the new law, the first of its kind since 1977, requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen on hand while they work, rather than one." Bush said yesterday, "We make this promise to American miners and their families: We'll do everything possible to prevent mine accidents and make sure you're able to return safely to your loved ones."

DOJ_NMG_0034628

Bill Clinton Applauds Evangelical Focus On Global Warming. The AP (6/16) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton praised evangelical Christians on Thursday for their recent efforts on global warming and debt relief for poor nations and said he sees growing understanding between people of different faiths." He "said religion is a problem for both liberals and conservatives in the United States." Clinton said, "For people in America who are a part of my political tradition, our great sin has often been ignoring religion or denying its power or refusing to engage it because it seemed hostile to us. … For ... the so-called Christian right and its allies, their great sin has been believing they were in full possession of the truth."

Dionne Sees Moderation Of Evangelical Agenda. E. J. Dionne in his column in the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K) sees the recent election the moderate Rev. Frank Page as president of the Southern Baptist Convention as "one of many signs that new breezes are blowing through the broader evangelical Christian world." Recently "the evangelical political agenda is broadening as new voices insist on the urgency of issues such as Third World poverty and the fights against AIDS and human trafficking." Evangelicals are "going through a quiet evolution as believers reflect on the perils of partisanship and ideology and their reasons for being Christian. This will probably affect the nation's political life, but it will certainly affect the country's spiritual direction. My hunch is that not only moderates and liberals but also many solid conservatives welcome the departure."

Alaska Seen As Front Line In US Battle Against Bird Flu. In a front page article, USA Today (6/16, A1, Kasindorf, 2.31M) profiles the USDA's Alaskan early-warning project, which it calls "the front line of a $29 million federal program to test thousands of birds in 50 states this year to guard against a possible [avian flu] pandemic." Bird testing by the US and Canadian governments will be "more extensive this year," with US scientists planning to sample 75,000 to 100,000 birds, including 19,000 in Alaska. In addition, poultry flocks will be monitored, the USDA says. If a sample tests positive, "the finding will be announced by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns or Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne," says USDA spokeswoman Gail Keirn.

New Death Reported In Indonesia Deepens Fears Of Bird Flu Spread. The New York Times (6/16, McNeil, Jr., 1.19M) reports, "The death of a 38th person from avian flu in Indonesia was confirmed yesterday by the World Health Organization and the situation in that country continued to worsen." The number of human cases reported in Indonesia is "climbing rapidly," and the World Bank said Monday that Indonesia's response to the flu was "disorganized and underfinanced." Also raising concern is a report this week by The Jakarta Post quoting "several local health experts as saying that the government was not disclosing how widespread the disease was or how many times human-to-human transmission might have occurred."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Solicits Bids To Create Nationwide Crime Data Network. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/15) reported, "The FBI has quietly put out a Request for Proposal for bidders to build an unprecedented, national network linking together records from local, state and federal law enforcement agencies." The National Data Exchange would be "a giant, electronic catalog of incident data and other criminal records from over 18,000 law enforcement bodies. 'It's every criminal incident' along with the software to analyze them, explains one insider, who estimates the initial cost at over $20 million, and up to $100 million as the project expands nationally. … Investigators hope to use N-Dex to better track patterns of robberies, arsons and other crimes across city and county lines. Among concerns voiced by critics: that N-Dex will suck away money from other needed homeland security projects, such as intelligence centers and training; that it will squander scarce funds in trying to link up thousands of rural districts; and that the FBI, which has had years of headaches in trying to manage its own case files, is not the best manager for the project."

North Carolina FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation For Ethics Violation. The Charlotte Observer (6/16, Morrill, 234K) reports US District Judge Carlton Tilley "Thursday sentenced former Charlotte FBI agent Erik Blowers, who was the ethics adviser to agents across North Carolina, to two years probation for failing to disclose gifts and favors from a one-time informant. … He was the first FBI agent ever charged in the state." The Observer adds, "Documents filed by U.S. Justice Department prosecutors claimed Blowers misled supervisors, lied to investigators and had extensive business dealings with a convicted drug trafficker." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/16) notes Tilley's lawer, Chris Fialko, said after the sentencing, "We are pleased that the judge found that Erik did not adversely effect (sic) the integrity of any FBI investigation."

FBI Approval At 42% In Wall Street Journal Poll. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, A4, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "IRAN-CONTRA VETERANS North, Secord, Hall and Clarridge gather to salute 1980s-era anti-Sandinista rebels before Nicaragua's November elections. U.S. attitudes on CIA are 31% positive; FBI draws a 42% positive mark." The Journal notes, "The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points."

DOJ_NMG_0034629

DEA Arrests 22 In Heroin-Smuggling Investigation. The Washington Times (6/16, Seper) reports federal drug agents "have disrupted an international heroin smuggling ring responsible for shipping more than $14 million worth of the drug into the United States since 2004, arresting 22 suspected gang members and seizing more than 60 pounds of heroin." Rusty Payne "said agents also confiscated more than $220,000 in cash during raids with authorities in Trinidad and Ecuador, as well as heroin abandoned by drug couriers in a Guayaquil, Ecuador, hotel, at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston, at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York and at Piarco International Airport in Trinidad. … The arrests culminated a 10-month undercover investigation led by Justice Department's Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and, Mr. Payne said, involved multiple confidential witnesses and sources, court-authorized wiretaps, surveillance and a controlled heroin delivery."

Report: Fentanyl Linked To Nearly 200 Deaths. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 7, 2:10, Brown) reported, "A more potent and lethal form of heroin is now creating a trail of death that stretches from the Midwest to the East Coast." NBC (Tibbles) added, "On the street, drug users have a simple name for it." Unidentified male: "The bomb." Tibbles: "Emergency room doctors call it a killer." Dr. Chuck Thomas, Norwegian American Hospital, Chicago: "It goes to the central nervous system, and they, they almost immediately stop breathing." Tibbles: "Super-charged heroin mixed with the powerful painkiller, fentanyl, up to 100 times stronger than morphine, is rampaging through drug communities. It's already killed nearly 200 people this year. Police have seen a spike in overdose deaths in cities from Chicago, St. Louis and Detroit in the Midwest to Philadelphia, Camden, New Jersey and Wilmington, Delaware. Today in Chicago, law enforcement agencies from across the country discussed plans to address the threat." Scott Burns, Office of National Drug Control Policy: "If you are addicted to heroin, there has never been a better time to stop."

The Detroit Free Press (6/15, Norris) reports, "Timothy Ogden, Drug Enforcement Administration associate special agent… likened the use of illegal drugs to playing Russian roulette with a single bullet, but with fentanyl, he said, 'It's like playing Russian roulette with six bullets in the gun.'"

The Washington Times/UPI (6/15) cites yesterday's New York Times story on the fentanyl-related overdoses.

Drug Enforcement Officials Coordinate Fentanyl-Related Investigations At Summit. From Chicago, the AP (6/15, Tarm) reports drug enforcement officials from around the country "ended two days of discussions Thursday on the possible source of the bad heroin that killed…at least 100 [people] from Chicago to Philadelphia. … The summit provided officials from 12 states and Washington D.C. the chance to coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the beginning of this year. There were outbreaks of fentanyl-laced heroin in the '80s and early '90s, said Arlington, Va.-based DEA spokeswoman Mary Irene Cooper, who was in Chicago for the meeting. The difference is that the outbreaks aren't isolated this time to one city."

In a sidebar, the AP (6/15) provides more details about fentanyl and its side effects.

Health Commission In Illinois To Discuss Alerting Public About Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The Park Ridge (IL) Herald Advocate (6/15) reports, "Members of the city's Health Commission, which has set a goal of tackling addiction in the community, say parents need to know that heroin use exists among teens. … At the Health Commission's next meeting, on June 22…the group will discuss how to alert the community to what is taking place, particularly regarding the distribution of fentanyl-laced heroin and its deadly consequences."

DC Man Acquitted Of Drug, Conspiracy Charges. The Washington Post (6/16, B4, Weiss) reports, "Corey A. Moore, the D.C. street legend who has slipped through the hands of prosecutors again and again, has survived another trial -- one that featured his half brother as the key government witness. Moore, 30, was acquitted yesterday by a federal jury of drug, firearms and conspiracy charges -- clearing the way for his release after nearly two years of denying wrongdoing and awaiting trial. … He had said that he was living a law-abiding life when authorities arrested him in August 2004, holding jobs as a youth counselor and car salesman. Prosecutors saw it differently: Moore, they said, had participated in a drug conspiracy with others for at least two years and helped supply crack cocaine and heroin."

Selig Writes Letter To Fans, Says MLB Will Fund HGH Study. The New York Times (6/16, Curry) reports, "Nine days after federal agents reported that pitcher Jason Grimsley had admitted using performance-enhancing substances, Commissioner Bud Selig issued an open letter to fans about the development. Selig acknowledged that 'there are problems' in Major League Baseball and said he was 'committed to protecting our game.' … He noted that baseball tests for steroids and amphetamines, and that human growth hormone is banned. But Selig also explained that there is no effective blood test to detect human growth hormone and said it 'represents a threat to all sports everywhere.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034630

According to USA Today (6/16, Bodley), in the letter, Selig said, "We are committed to funding a study of HGH and how to detect it. … Also, we are willing to make additional contributions to fund other studies to determine how to detect HGH and are currently reaching out to experts in the field to ascertain what other studies can immediately begin."

Mail, Garbage Provided Clues In Federal Steroid Investigation. The Albany (NY) Times Union (6/15, Higgins) reports a two-year federal investigation of a North Greenbush man "included intercepting his mail and, on one occasion, rifling through his trash before authorities charged him with attempting to receive anabolic steroids from China. Christopher Magnano, 33, faces charges connected to what officials described as an Internet-based sales operation of the illegal substances, which were seized from his North Greenbush home following his May 19 arrest. Police said the seizure of anabolic steroids and human growth hormone was the largest ever in the Capital Region."

CA: Thousands Of Marijuana Plants Found On Forest Service Land. The Sacramento Bee (6/15) reports, "An anonymous tip led Placer County sheriff's investigators on Wednesday to more than 17,000 marijuana plants being grown on U.S. Forest Service land between Auburn and Foresthill. … Authorities warned people to be careful when hiking off-trail in the wilderness, since marijuana growers often are armed."

US Charges New York Jeweler In Cocaine Money-Laundering Scheme. The New York Post (6/16, Cornell, Mangan) reports, "The famed Manhattan purveyor of diamond-encrusted 'bling' to Madonna, Diddy, hoop star Allen Iverson and other celebs was busted yesterday on charges he helped two coke kingpins launder some of their $270 million in dirty drug profits by selling them jewelry." The Post continues, "Jacob 'The Jeweler' Arabo received 'large sums of currency' for various pieces of jewelry from the leaders of the so-called Black Mafia Family drug ring and their flunkies, according to a Detroit federal-court indictment unsealed yesterday that also charges 15 others with drug and laundering crimes." The Post adds, "The 41-year-old Uzbeki immigrant, born Jakov Arabov, then either failed to file tax forms required for business transactions totaling more than $10,000, or submitted false tax forms that declared the purchasers were people other than the actual buyers, the indictment claims. … The scheme allegedly was designed to conceal that the jewelry purchases were made with proceeds from the Black Mafia Family's sales of thousands of kilos of cocaine in Detroit, California, Kentucky, Georgia, Texas and elsewhere, and to hide the true ownership of those funds. … The gang's alleged leaders operate BMF Entertainment, a rap-music label, and have extensive connections in the hip-hop world, as does Arabo."

Mississippi Man Arrested In Federal Witness Slaying. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (6/16) reports, "A 24-year-old Clarksdale (MS) man has been arrested in connection with the slaying of a federal witness found dead earlier this month on a Coahoma County road." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Kenneth C. Walker was arrested by an ATF violent crime federal task force for his alleged involvement in the retaliation against a federal witness and on a charge of discharge/possession of a firearm during a federal violent crime. … William Christopher Haro, 27, a witness in a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives case, was found shot multiple times June 9. … Walker was arrested without incident Tuesday and made an initial appearance before a federal judge."

West Virginia Attorney Jailed On Gun Charges. The Charleston Gazette (6/16, Searls) reports, "Federal authorities want to keep Charleston attorney Dante di Trapano in jail until a trial on gun charges related to drug addiction, contending he could be a danger to the community." The Gazette continues, "Di Trapano was indicted on two counts Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Charleston and arrested Thursday morning. Federal authorities argued he could be a danger to the community and pointed out his former law firm has hired an off-duty Charleston police officer for protection against him. … Di Trapano was indicted based on eight guns found in an April raid federal agents conducted on his South Hills residence." The Gazette adds, "Already charged in March with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine in Florida, di Trapano had said then he was checking himself into a drug rehabilitation program. Wednesday's indictment charged him with being 'an unlawful user of and addicted to a controlled substance' while in possession of the guns and for allegedly lying on a federal form when he purchased a gun Feb. 4, stating he was not addicted to or using drugs. … While his attorney, Michael Del Giudice, requested an immediate bond hearing, U.S. attorneys said di Trapano needed to be locked up for at least three days while the probation office prepares a report. U.S. Magistrate Judge Mary Stanley agreed and set a hearing for Tuesday at 2 p.m. on the government's motion to detain him without bond until trial."

House Appropriators Approve Explosives Fee To Help Fund ATF. The House Appropriations Committee approved a new half-cent per pound fee on explosives as lawmakers and the Administration debate funding for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The Washington Post (6/16, A3, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The debate over the fee comes at a time of mounting budget difficulties for ATF, which is already facing rising costs on a new headquarters building in Washington." The DOJ IG is investigating allegations of budgetary mismanagement by the ATF and some senior ATF officials "said ATF's budget could be crippled without the explosives fee at a time when terrorists are seeking materials for bombs."

DOJ_NMG_0034631

IMMIGRATION:

Report Says Senate Bill Would Grant Amnesty To 14.4 Million Illegal Immigrants. The Washington Times (6/16, Seper, 90K) reports more than "9.9 million illegal aliens now in the United States will receive amnesty under an immigration-reform bill passed by the Senate, though about a quarter will do so fraudulently, and the bill allows for 4.5 million family members to join them in the United States, according to a report." The report, "released yesterday by the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies (CIS)," says, "Of the 14.4 million illegals and their family members who will receive amnesty, we estimate that 13.5 million will eventually become permanent residents, which means they can stay as long as they wish and apply for citizenship."

States Trying To Limit Services To Immigrants. The Christian Science Monitor (6/16, Oliver, 61K) reports that with "no resolution of immigration-reform legislation at the federal level, states have been pressing ahead with their own measures intended to discourage illegal immigration and curtail costs of providing services to that population." Lawmakers in Kansas, Iowa, and Arizona "have voted this year to restrict certain social services to illegal immigrants, following similar action last year in Virginia. Other states have passed legislation cracking down on employers of illegal immigrants and those who sell forged documents to illegals." In all, state legislatures "have seen some 500 immigration-reform bills introduced in 2006, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL)." But even as lawmakers "try to make it harder for illegals to live in their states, they are bumping into one roadblock after another, rendering their efforts toothless and mostly symbolic. For one, states cannot sidestep federal law by simply denying certain services, such as public education and emergency healthcare, to undocumented people. For another, the courts often ruled against their immigration-control proposals."

National Guard Deployment Seen As Not Discouraging Illegal Immigrants. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 6, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been exactly one month since President Bush addressed the nation on his plan to reform immigration policy and ordered thousands of National Guard soldiers to the Mexican border, but is the growing military presence slowing down the flood of illegal crossings?" CBS (Cobiella) added, "Washington hopes the sight of soldiers on the border fixing roads and building fences will scare away would-be illegals. But even on this small stretch of border in New Mexico, with the National Guard in plain view and just a quarter of a mile from the end of their fence, people are still walking across the border. The only deterrent for this group was the summer sun."

Chertoff Wants Social Security To Provide ICE With No-Match Data. Secretary Chertoff, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/16, 90K) writes that worksite enforcement is a "key part" of President Bush's "comprehensive vision for immigration reform." While employers need to be given "better tools to verify the legal status of their employees," ICE must also be given "a better way to determine which employers are habitually using or providing fraudulent Social Security information. One way to do that is by giving our agents sufficient access to no-match data. Under current law, the Social Security Administration does not provide sufficient access in sharing this information. This is simply wrong, and Congress needs to change the law."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Supplemental Spending Bill. ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 5, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported President Bush "signed a bill providing $94.5 billion more for war spending and hurricane relief. The measure brings the total authorized for Iraq, Afghanistan and the war on terror, to almost $500 billion."

The New York Times (6/16, Pear, 1.19M) notes Bush "acted hours after the Senate approved the $94.5 billion bill by a 98-to-1 vote. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, voted against the measure, saying it did not provide enough for domestic health and education programs. … Final approval of the bill was accompanied by growing frustration on Capitol Hill over the use of emergency spending measures to pay for overseas military operations."

The AP (6/16, Taylor) says Bush "praised Congress for providing funds to 'fight terrorism, defend our homeland, enforce our borders, and fulfill our moral obligation to help our fellow Americans in need.'"

The Washington Post (6/16, A7, Murray, 744K) reports, "Faced with a White House veto threat, House and Senate negotiators stripped out $14 billion in unrelated funding that the Senate had added to its version of the legislation. But the final bill did include a few unrelated items. 'We've made considerable progress toward limiting unnecessary and wasteful spending,' Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in a statement after the vote. 'But more can be done.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034632

The Washington Times (6/16, Fagan, 90K) headlines its report "Reduced Spending Bill Approved In Senate," and says Senate leaders "credited Republicans in both chambers for saving the legislation. 'Republican-led efforts ensured the bill didn't exceed the president's emergency request while focusing our resources on the critical priorities,'" said Frist. But "others said the spending bill would have ballooned out of control without the hard line drawn by House leaders, especially Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican. 'It would have been much higher without the insistence of the House,' said Rep. C.W. Bill Young, Florida Republican."

Bush Signs Bill Boosting Broadcast Indecency Fines. The Washington Post (6/16, A6, Baker, 744K) reports, "Complaining that television and radio shows in recent years have 'too often pushed the bounds of decency,' President Bush signed legislation yesterday to escalate dramatically the penalties against broadcasters who violate federal standards." The White House "decided to showcase the signing of the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act at a time when Bush and Republican congressional allies are trying to reassure disaffected conservative supporters that they remain committed to conservative causes. With midterm elections approaching, Bush recently gave two speeches promoting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and the Senate plans to vote on another amendment that outlaws flag burning."

Senate Confirms Bush FDIC Nominee. The AP (6/16) reports, "Sheila Bair, President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., was approved by the Senate on Thursday along with nominees for three other government positions." The four "were confirmed without dissent. In addition to Bair, they are: James B. Lockhart as director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight; Kathleen Casey as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission; and Robert Couch as president of the Government National Mortgage Association, known as Ginnie Mae."

Bush Hosts Congressional Picnic. The AP (6/16, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush was the host of the annual congressional picnic Thursday at the White House, but it was his chief of staff's band that came close to stealing the show. 'We got some interesting entertainment for you tonight,' Bush told lawmakers and their families to the picnic, called 'Rodeo on the South Lawn.' 'We got some people who can play music and some people who think they can play music,' the president said." The AP adds, "The Compassionates, Joshua Bolten's band, and the Second Amendments, a bipartisan congressional band, were the opening acts. The featured entertainment came from Riders in the Sky, professional musicians who played in fancy chaps and Western attire." Bush "was upbeat, although still weary from his trip this week to Baghdad. … Spotted in the crowd were Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, CIA chief Michael Hayden and Bush's top political adviser Karl Rove. The national intelligence director, John Negroponte, showed up in jeans and a cowboy hat."

Bush Apologizes For Teasing Sight-Impaired Reporter Over Sunglasses. The New York Times (6/16, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports on President Bush's apology to Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Wallsten for wearing sun glasses during a news conference. Wallsten suffers from a kind of macular degeneration. Afterward, "staff members told Mr. Bush that Mr. Wallsten was not wearing the sunglasses to look hip, but for health reasons. Mr. Wallsten has Stargardt's disease, a degenerative condition that causes blindness and can be painfully exacerbated by sunlight. By late afternoon Mr. Bush called Mr. Wallsten to apologize."

Spellings Has Undertaken Extensive Foreign Travel. The AP (6/16, Ben Feller) reports, "Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has put a passport stamp on her job, taking more overseas trips since 2005 than her predecessor did in four years. In less than a year and a half, Spellings has taken seven overseas trips, traveling to Afghanistan, England, Egypt, France, India, Italy, Japan, Jordan and Russia. She plans to visit Greece and Spain later this month." The AP adds, "Transportation, food and lodging for her overseas travel cost $36,981, according to Education Department records. The total cost of her travel was thousands of dollars higher because other agencies picked up the tab for a few trips." It's "not a matter of wanderlust, Spellings says. In her view, the top school official ought to see the nations that the United States is helping and competing against." In an interview with the AP, Spellings said, "We believe that education is a universally shared value. … We are looked to and admired around the world as people who know how to do education for the masses."

Credit Overhaul Bill Seen As Gaining Momentum. USA Today (6/16, Smith, 2.31M) reports, "A move to more closely regulate the major Wall Street credit-rating agencies at the tail end of an era of corporate scandals gained momentum this week, when the House Financial Services Committee approved reform legislation that moves to the full House for review." The bill, sponsored by GOP Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick, "is dubbed the Credit Rating Agency Duopoly Relief Act, a dig at the two biggest US credit-rating firms, Moody's and Standard and Poor's." The legislation "would require the firms to file confidential financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, publish regular reports on how well their ratings perform, and make mandatory the practice of employing compliance officers to ensure the firms comply with securities laws." The Senate Banking Committee "plans to introduce similar legislation this summer."

DOJ_NMG_0034633

Transition To Medicare Prescription Drug Plan From Medicaid Still Problematic. USA Today (6/16, Wolf, 2.31M) reports the problems "that plagued low-income seniors and people with disabilities during the rollout of Medicare's prescription-drug program in January have continued on a smaller scale, causing some new beneficiaries to lose coverage or spend their own money at pharmacy counters." The problems "occur when people turn 65 or become eligible for Medicare disability benefits and are involuntarily switched from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare plan. Thousands lose Medicaid drug coverage, typically for two to six weeks, before Medicare kicks in. Health counselors say the trouble dominates their caseloads."

Bush Approval Up To 40% In Fox News Poll. Fox News' Special Report (6/15, Hume) reported, "The latest Fox News opinion dynamics poll out today shows President Bush's approval rating up a full five points from a month ago up to 40%. The first time the President's rating has been out of the 30's since February. But the survey taken on the day the President went to Baghdad and the following day found 58% of Americans now disprove of the job Mr. Bush is doing in Iraq. That's up from 55% back in jab."

Federal Retirees Could Get A Large COLA In January. The Washington Post (6/16, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "With consumer prices on the rise, federal retirees are paying more attention to inflation trends and what they mean for their pensions. Several callers this week pointed to a notice posted by the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association that showed that most government retirees have banked 2.9 percent toward their next cost-of-living adjustment. The calculation, based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in May, suggests that federal retirees could be in line for a jumbo COLA in January Of course, it's too early to tell if the run-up in inflation -- a reflection of $3-a-gallon gasoline and other, higher consumer prices -- will continue into the fall, when officials will crunch the numbers for the 2007 COLA."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy Can Handle Increased Energy Prices. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 2, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "had some news for the rest of us today on the high cost of energy. He said it isn't likely to change anytime soon, but he said the American economy can handle it as long as those prices don't rise even more."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bernanke "was speaking to the Economic Club in Chicago, and he said that the impact of higher energy prices appear to be manageable and suddenly it was off to the races at the markets."

The Financial Times (6/16, Guha) says Bernanke "eased nerves on Thursday with a measured assessment of the threat posed by higher energy prices to inflation and growth, as stocks advanced worldwide."

The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Blackstone, 2.11M) reports "economists expect that, in light of the recent rise in core inflation and some hawkish inflation remarks by Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials in recent days, the central bank will most likely raise official interest rates a 17th consecutive time at its June 28-29 meeting, to 5.25%."

Stocks Rally For Second Day. NBC Nightly News (6/15, story 2, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's message on energy costs "may have helped the stock market rally today, the Dow up 198 points [to close at 11,015.19], the NASDAQ up more than 58 [to close at 2,144.15.]" ABC World News Tonight (6/15, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was "the second rally in a row on Wall Street." The New York Times (6/16, Bajaj, 1.19M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 26.12 points, or 2.1 percent, to close at 1,256.16."

The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 5, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We've been talking about the market and the fear of inflation, and suddenly the stock market goes up today like a skyrocket. What, what's happened?" CBS (Mason) added, "It took off. It was almost a 200-point rally today. It's the biggest rally the Dow has had in more than a year. It climbed back over 11,000 [to close at 11,015.19]. We've had two days of increases now to over 309 points and we're back in positive territory for the year, so that's very encouraging."

The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Browning, 2.11M) and Washington Post/AP (6/16, D3) also report the stock numbers, while USA Today (6/16, Shell, 2.31M) reports that "while professional investors welcomed the Dow Jones industrial average's 309-point gain to 11,015 on Wednesday and Thursday, they said it did not repair all the damage caused by the 8% swoon it suffered over the past five weeks and advised investors to tread cautiously."

39% Expect Economy To Get Worse Next Year. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "By 39%-16%, Americans expect economy to get worse in next year; 43% say it'll stay the same. Democrats lead on handling the economy by the largest margin, 16 percentage points, since 1993." The Wall

DOJ_NMG_0034634

Street Journal/NBC News poll's margin of error "is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points. Among independents, 25% worry Democrats will too quickly raise taxes and spending. But 37% say Bush's party isn't sufficiently curbing spending and shrinking the deficit. As House and Senate near minimum-wage clashes next week, 55% of independents are more likely to support a candidate who backs an increase."

Factory Output Declines. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Conkey, lp, 2.11M) reports, "Factory output fell slightly last month as manufacturers adjusted to milder consumer demand, and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sounded a guardedly optimistic note on inflation." In "another sign the economy has entered a period of slower growth," the Fed said "industrial production declined 0.1% in May after three consecutive monthly gains, but output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities is still running 4.3% higher than a year earlier. Lower auto production last month spurred a 0.1% decline in the manufacturing sector and mining output dropped as well."

Krugman Says Fed Overreacting To Inflation Threat. In his New York Times column (6/16), Paul Krugman writes he is worried about "the Fed's overreaction," because "when it comes to inflation, the main thing we have to fear is fear itself. Discussions of inflation can be numbingly arcane -- are you a core C.P.I. type or a trimmed-mean P.C.E. person? But the real issue is whether there's a serious risk that inflation will become embedded in the economy. … It would be an exaggeration to say that there's no inflation threat at all," but "it's much easier to think of ways in which the Federal Reserve, wrongly focused on the phantom menace of a new wage-price spiral, could be slow to respond to bigger threats, like a rapidly deflating housing bubble. So I don't fear inflation nearly as much as I fear the fear of inflation. And I wish the Fed would lighten up on the subject."

Glut Looms For US Natural Gas Industry. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Mufson, 744K) reports the "whole world is talking about energy shortages, but for the moment, the U.S. natural gas business is looking at a potential glut." Thanks "in part to a warm winter, inventories of natural gas have built up to levels far greater than normal for this time of year. And terminals built to handle imports of liquefied natural gas from other countries are operating at about half of their capacity." But it is "unfortunately for consumers, a situation that may not last. Energy traders are still pricing futures contracts at high levels, and natural gas producers are planning for big increases in U.S. demand over the coming years." The "only things that can rescue natural gas producers from having to slash prices later this year: another big hurricane or a hot summer."

Altman Says Debate Over High Energy Prices Focused On Wrong Issues. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/16), Roger Altman of Evercore Partners says that in dealing with the US' dependence on foreign energy sources, "Washington is still focused on the wrong issues. Recent talk of price gouging, windfall profits and CEO pay is a distraction. Yes, there may be abuses, but no actions in those areas will have any impact whatsoever on energy prices or supply. Incessant pledges of energy independence within 15 or 20 years, i.e., national self-sufficiency, are completely unattainable and thus misleading. The sweeping embrace of wind, solar and hydrogen power is similarly misplaced, as these are not among the most promising alternatives." What is "needed from Washington are three big steps. First, to confess to the public that America is in deep trouble from its oil dependence and its carbon emissions. Second, to impel oil conservation through deep new incentives and mandates. Third, to finance an acceleration of those technologies which could truly replace oil and gas."

Democrats Hope To Make Electoral Gains In Suburbs. The New York Times (6/16, Egan, 1.19M) reports, "After years in which Republicans capitalized on rapid growth in outlying areas, Democrats now see an opportunity to make gains in close-in suburbs where changes in the composition of the population are working in their favor. In a dozen or so Congressional districts that are leading battlegrounds in the midterm elections, older, more densely packed suburbs are trending Democratic, helping to offset Republican dominance on the sprawling exurban frontier."

Cheney Confident Of GOP Prospects In 2006. The AP (6/16) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday that the Republicans will prevail in the midterm elections because of a strong economy and the ability of the Bush administration to prevent another terrorist attack." Although polls show the public supports a switch to Democrats, Cheney "cited an economy that's 'kicking along in very good shape' and President Bush's record in the war on terror."

Differences Examined Between 1994, 2006 Election Cycles. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Calmes, 2.11M) reports examines the possibility of a Democratic takeover of Congress by comparing the current political environment with 1994 and noting key differences. Polls currently favor Democrats, but "The number of competitive seats is lower than in 1994, due largely to partisan gerrymandering of the House's 435 districts and to the particular lineup of Senate seats up for election this year." The Bush Administration has had similar domestic policy failures but "the issue dragging down Mr. Bush's standing and Congress's is an unpopular war. 'There was nothing like Iraq in 1994,'" said former NRCC chairman Bill Paxon. Republicans are also facing similar problems with ethics allegations and Democrats appear to be energized, but

DOJ_NMG_0034635

"Democrats lack a unifying figure like former Rep. Newt Gingrich. … Also, congressional Republicans worked in tandem with then-party chairman Haley Barbour…whereas Democratic leaders have assailed party chairman Howard Dean for not providing enough financial support." And Republicans won key special election victories in formerly safe Democrat districts 1994, but Democrats failed to accomplish that recently in the special election to replace former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Barone Says Democratic Hopes For Watergate-Era Repeat Not Materializing. Michael Barone writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M), "It has been a tough 10 days for those who see current events through the prisms of Vietnam and Watergate. First, the Democrats failed to win a breakthrough victory in the California 50th special election -- a breakthrough that would have summoned up memories of Democrats winning Gerald Ford's old congressional district in a special election in 1974. Instead the Democratic nominee got 45% of the vote, just 1% more than John Kerry did in the district in 2004. Second, US forces with a precision air strike killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on the same day that Iraqis finished forming a government. … Third, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald announced that he would not seek an indictment of Karl Rove. The leftward blogosphere had Mr. Rove pegged for the role of Bob Haldeman and John Ehrlichman. Theories were spun about plea bargains that would implicate Vice President Dick Cheney. Talk of impeachment was in the air. But it turns out that history doesn't repeat itself. George W. Bush, whether you like it or not, is not a second Richard Nixon." Barone later writes, "The pursuit of Karl Rove by the left and the press has been just the latest episode in the attempted criminalization of political differences. Is there any hope that it might turn out to be the last?"

Election Officials Make Preparations For Midterms. The AP (6/16, Lester) reports, "With memories of the disputed 2000 presidential election still fresh, the Election Assistance Commission is encouraging careful preparation by election supervisors, aggressive recruitment of new poll workers and thorough education of voters." It "is sending out a 'Quick Start Management Guide for New Voting Systems' to 6,700 local election officials around the country. The guide is necessary as about a third of voters will be using new machines this year and many longtime poll workers have retired because the punch-card and lever voting machines have been replaced."

Judge Dismisses Much Of GOP Phone-Jamming Lawsuit. The AP (6/16, Wang) reports, "A judge has dismissed most of a Democratic lawsuit against Republicans stemming from the jamming of Democratic phone lines in the November 2002 elections, a crime that led to criminal convictions against three former GOP officials." Representing the Republicans, lawyer Ovide Lamontagne said, "What the court has basically done is reduced this claim, this lawsuit, to a small claims complaint. … A thousand dollars of damage is what we think they could probably show for the interruption of phones for an hour and a half."

Rather To Leave CBS. USA Today (6/16, Johnson, 2.31M) reports Dan Rather, "who stepped down as anchor of The CBS Evening News 15 months ago in the wake of the Memogate scandal, said Thursday that he'll soon leave the network after 44 years — at the request of network executives." Rather said, "They wanted this resolution, and I'm willing to accept that and move on."

Research On Genetics, Intelligence Generates Controversy. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Regalado, 2.11M) reports last September, Bruce Lahn, "a professor of human genetics at the University of Chicago, stood before a packed lecture hall and reported the results of a new DNA analysis: He had found signs of recent evolution in the brains of some people, but not of others." But Dr. Lahn "had touched a raw nerve in science: race and intelligence. What Dr. Lahn told his audience was that genetic changes over the past several thousand years might be linked to brain size and intelligence. He flashed maps that showed the changes had taken hold and spread widely in Europe, Asia and the Americas, but weren't common in sub-Saharan Africa." Web sites and magazines "promoting white 'racialism' quickly seized on Dr. Lahn's suggestive scientific snapshot. One magazine that blames black and Hispanic people for social ills hailed his discovery as 'the moment the antiracists and egalitarians have dreaded.'" Dr. Lahn has "drawn sharp fire from other leading genetics researchers. They say the genetic differences he found may not signify any recent evolution -- and even if they do, it is too big a leap to suggest any link to intelligence."

Responsible Fatherhood Pioneer Profiled. The Washington Times (6/16, Wetzstein, 90K) reports Charles Augustus Ballard has "overcome the loss of his coal-miner father, functional illiteracy, a stint in prison and unwed fatherhood. His experiences led him to found in 1982 a national organization that was one of the first -- if not the first -- to promote "responsible fatherhood" as a social policy, the Institute for Responsible Fatherhood and Family Revitalization (IRFFR)." Last month, "one of his dreams came true: The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) announced the availability of its first funding stream dedicated to 'responsible fatherhood' programs." But "for Mr. Ballard, the $32 million announcement comes amid a difficult personal struggle: He came home Wednesday from a Bowie rehabilitation center, where he has been recovering from a devastating stroke suffered in January." Ballard and his wife, Frances, are "already in discussions with several organizations about partnering with the IRFFR. Applications for the new grants are due in two weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0034636

Friedman Suggests Creation Of New Green Party. In his New York Times column (6/16), Thomas Friedman says the "recent focus of the Republican-led Congress on divisive diversions, like gay marriage and flag burning, coupled with the unveiling of Unity '08, an Internet-based third party that plans to select its presidential candidate through online voting, has intensified the chatter that a third party, and maybe even a fourth, will emerge in the 2008 election." Most of that talk "has been about how a third party might galvanize voters, using the Web, rather than what it would actually galvanize them to do. I'd like to toss out an idea in the hopes that some enterprising politician or group of citizens — or Unity '08 — will develop it. It's the concept I call 'Geo-Green.'" Its centerpiece "would be a $1 a gallon gasoline tax, called 'The Patriot Tax,' which would be phased in over a year. People earning less than $50,000 a year, and those with unusual driving needs, would get a reduction on their payroll taxes as an offset." The Patriot Tax "would increase the price of gasoline to a level that would ensure that many of the most promising alternatives — ethanol, biodiesel, coal gasification, solar energy, nuclear energy and wind — would all be economically competitive with oil and thereby reduce both our dependence on crude and our emissions of greenhouse gases. In short: the Geo-Green party could claim that it has a plan for shoring up America's energy security, environmental security, economic security and Social Security with one move."

Political Center Said To Be Regaining Power. In his Washington Post column (6/16, A25), David Ignatius says, "For a change, the extreme wings of the two parties aren't calling the shots; bad ideas pitched by one-issue zealots are falling flat; the news out of Iraq is upbeat; the Bush administration is appointing Rockefeller Republicans to top positions." David Brooks of the New York Times "has argued that we're seeing a reanimation of the political center, and I think he's right. The middle is getting tired of the tyranny of the extremes. One sign is the launch this month of Unity08, a bipartisan group that plans to hold an online convention to nominate a split Democratic-Republican 2008 presidential ticket."

NYTimes Criticizes Effort To End Public Financing Of Presidential Elections. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) says in an editorial that, "The nation is fortunate that a sudden attempt to kill one of the hallowed anticorruption reforms from the Watergate scandal — the option of public financing in presidential elections — was smoked out in the House this week." Rep. John Doolittle, the sponsor, "may try another day with his plan to block the flow of taxpayers' voluntary contributions from the government treasury. Mr. Doolittle has such faith in private money-raising that he boosted his family income by setting up his wife, Julie, as a consultant being paid a 15 percent commission on every dollar his campaign raises. Call it family values. Call it brazen. But the missus has received $180,000 since late 2001, operating this private business out of the couple's suburban Virginia home, including among her clients the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The pathetic state of Congressional ethics is that such nepotic profiteering is deemed legal so long as the compensation is 'consistent with the market rate.'"

WPost Criticizes Maryland Effort To Deal With Rising Electricity Rates. The Washington Post (6/16, A24, 744K) says in an editorial, "In Maryland's efforts to cushion the blow of soaring electricity bills for consumers, there is the distinctive whiff of post-Soviet economic adjustment. Much like the disoriented subjects of former communist regimes a decade ago, Marylanders -- coddled for years by artificially low energy prices -- are suddenly confronted by the trauma of having to pay market rates. Unsurprisingly, they don't like it a bit. And the politicians in Annapolis, just like those hapless old apparatchiks in Moscow, are scrambling for cover." In a "special session of the state legislature, a number of Republican lawmakers broke ranks with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and joined Democrats in providing some rate relief to Baltimore Gas and Electric's 1.2 million residential customers. Instead of bearing the full brunt of a 72 percent increase in their electricity bills next month, BGE ratepayers, mostly around Baltimore but also in some Washington suburbs, will initially be hit with jumps of just 15 percent starting July 1."

Ahmadinejad Reaches Out To Russia, China. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "urged China, Russia and Central Asian nations to increase cooperation and blunt the interference of 'domineering powers' in global affairs -- an apparent reference to the U.S. -- while dangling Iran's energy supplies as an inducement to work together." Ahmadinejad is "under mounting pressure from Washington to curb his country's nuclear ambitions," and in remarks at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, "emphasized that Iran's large reserves of crude oil provide 'conducive grounds' for these countries to cooperate with Tehran." The Journal notes that he "appeared alongside the leaders of Russia and China…in a move that Iran apparently hopes will strengthen its hand and undercut that of its rivals before it enters into potential negotiations with the U.S. and other countries over the future of Tehran's nuclear programs." Meanwhile, the Journal says, US delegation head Greg Schulte told the IAEA that Tehran is "'withholding cooperation' from international inspectors and warned that further intransigence risks the 'weight of the Security Council.' He called on Iran to accept a proposal for multilateral talks."

DOJ_NMG_0034637

Also reporting on the Central Asia-focused summit, the Financial Times (6/16, Smyth, Dyer, Khalaf) says Russian President Vladimir Putin "struck an optimistic note on Iran's nuclear crisis, saying Tehran had responded positively to the six-nation package of incentives designed to persuade it to curb its nuclear programme" and "was 'ready to negotiate' with world powers over the proposal. However, it was far from clear that Tehran had in fact accepted the conditions for talks – the suspension of uranium enrichment." The Washington Post (6/16, A14, Cody, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Iran Seeks Aid In Asia In Resisting The West."

The AP (6/16, Karimi) says Tehran "sent mixed signals Thursday on how it will respond to the world's incentives to give up uranium enrichment, with its supreme leader vowing his country would never back down, while the president and chief envoy to the U.N. nuclear watchdog said Tehran was prepared to negotiate." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he fully expected Iran to try any number of ways to shape the debate over its nuclear program. 'I think it is safe to say they will try to test the unity' of the [US and European allies], Snow said."

Senate Endorses Bush Approach To Iran. Separately, the AP (6/16) is also reporting the US Senate "endorsed" by a 99-0 vote "President Bush's diplomatic approach to the problem of Iran's nuclear program after rejecting a proposal that would have increased sanctions against the Tehran government and those helping it."

Hamas Recommits To Cease-Fire. The Washington Times/AP (6/16, Barzak) reports the Hamas-dominated Palestinian government "offered Thursday to restore a cease-fire with Israel, several days after calling off the truce to protest a deadly explosion on a Gaza beach, but said the calm would depend on Israel's response. Hamas said it is ready to put pressure on other militant groups to halt rocket fire against Israel," which has provoked Israeli retaliations. "Israel welcomed the gesture" and "said Thursday it appeared Hamas was serious about restoring the truce, though the decision was likely a short-term tactical maneuver. They said the group apparently had second thoughts after Israeli threats to kill Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and other government figures."

Chinese Intelligence Officer Reportedly Aided Hamas. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "A Chinese intelligence officer is engaged in covertly aiding the ruling Palestinian Hamas terrorist group, according to a Paris-based intelligence newsletter. Gong Xiaosheng was identified as a Ministry of State Security (MSS) official who has worked out of Ramallah since November 2002, Intelligence Online reported in its June 9 edition. … According to the report, Mr. Gong in the past was constantly seen in the company of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat but has since begun helping Hamas."

Rockets Fired From Gaza Could Ignite Conflict. The New York Times (6/16, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "The Qassam rocket is not much to look at: a 70-pound tube of rough steel and hand-mixed explosive, like the one that pounded through the roof of Universe Packaging here on Thursday. Tons of falling concrete just missed Lior Levi, 28, a worker there. … However crude, the Qassam rocket, fired by Palestinian militants from Gaza into Israel, has nonetheless won its spot as symbol of the moment in the long conflict here. At a delicate time, the rocket is not only raising tensions between Palestinians and Israelis, as usual, but is also dividing Palestinian from Palestinian, Israeli from Israeli." The Times adds, "Most immediately, the number of rockets fired by Palestinians from Gaza, and whether they happen to hit anyone, will be crucial in determining whether the Israeli-Palestinian conflict explodes again into high-intensity warfare."

North Korea Said To Be Moving Toward Missile Test. The Financial Times (6/16, Sevastopul, Fifield) reports remarks by "a Bush administration official" that "North Korean preparations for a possible long-range missile test have advanced to where Pyongyang could launch a Taepodong-2 missile on 'very short notice.' A senior Bush administration official last week said the US was not yet 'on the edge of our seat.' But another official on Thursday said more recent intelligence suggested Pyongyang was now much closer to being ready to conduct a test." The Times adds, "Taking the threat of a possible test very seriously, the Pentagon has positioned military assets to deal with any launch." The Times notes NSA Stephen Hadley said this week that "it would be a 'bad idea' for North Korea to conduct a test, and urged Pyongyang to return to the six-party talks which have been stalled since last September."

US "Defensive Measures" Costing North Korea Millions. The Washington Times (6/16, Gertz, 90K) reports, "US economic 'defensive measures' aimed at curbing illegal activities by North Korea have cost the Pyongyang regime millions of dollars in lost cash over the past several months through banking restrictions and other actions, US officials estimate." The Times adds, "One sign that the economic measures are hurting the communist regime in North Korea is Pyongyang's continued refusal to rejoin six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the United States lifts what it regards as sanctions, said Bush administration officials involved in Asia matters."

DOJ_NMG_0034638

Bush To Push For Trade Deal As Doha Deadline Looms. With time running out on the World Trade Organization's Doha round of trade talks, the Wall Street Journal (6/16, A6, Hitt, 2.11M) reports President Bush "hopes to kick-start negotiations on a visit to Europe next week. But major issues remain, particularly over cuts in farm subsidies." In a speech yesterday, the president "pressed major players in negotiations to look past their differences," saying the talks are "at a critical moment." The Journal says his remarks "represent a rare direct foray into the global trade debate. But they come as the Bush administration is making a more concerted effort to raise the US profile overseas."

The Washington Times (6/16, Dinan, 90K) notes that the Administration bas "been pushing for the broader agreement," but Thursday's speech by the president "elevates the stakes and the pressure to complete an agreement." The AP (6/15, Riechmann) also reports on the president's comments.

WTO Failure Would Be "Huge Disappointment" For White House. The New York Times (6/16, Weisman, 1.19M) reports the newly confirmed US Trade Representative Susan Schwab has "a deadline of six weeks or so to succeed or fail." While President Bush praised his new envoy on Thursday as "a good, hard negotiator," Schwab "faces long odds as trade diplomats struggle to salvage a global accord that the Bush administration hopes will be one of its signal economic achievements." If trade officials are unable to resolve at "a critical meeting in late July," the Times says the "failure to achieve a deal could prove a huge disappointment for the White House." Schwab is "certainly prepared to step into the role," but critics her appointment was "a sign that the Bush administration was scaling back its hopes for a successful Doha negotiation."

US Will Drop Opposition To Unified Asian Currency. The Financial Times (6/16, Guha, Mallet) reports, "The US on Thursday signalled it would not fight efforts to create an Asian currency unit, turning the page on over a decade of largely consistent opposition to Asian monetary integration." US "officials said the move is intended to show that the US does not fear greater monetary co-operation between Asia's rising economic powers and wants to play a constructive role in helping to shape it." The Times adds, "The green light from the US is a big boost for Japan, which has been pushing the idea of an Asian currency unit loosely modelled on the European currency unit, the precursor to the euro, in face of considerable regional scepticism. It comes at a time of growing diplomatic closeness between Washington and Tokyo."

Sri Lankan Violence Could Portend War. The New York Times (6/16, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports the Sri Lankan military "pounded rebel posts in the northern and eastern parts of the country by land, sea and air on Thursday, …after a land mine explosion ripped through a crowded passenger bus on Thursday morning in northern Sri Lanka." The Times calls the bus bombing "the most serious attack on civilians since the government and rebels signed a cease-fire four years ago," and adds, "The greater uncertainty was whether the deadly events on Thursday were the beginning of full-scale war. Despite mounting violence, neither side has been willing to explicitly renounce the February 2002 cease-fire." This year has seen "several months of carnage" between the government, the Tigers and the eastern-based Karuna Group.

The Financial Times (6/16, Merchant) says the government in Colombo "unleashed military attacks against Tamil targets after rebels blew up a bus killing at least 64 civilians in the worst terrorist atrocity since a ceasefire four years ago." This violence follows "intense diplomatic activity designed to forestall what many neutral observers say is a slow slide into a civil war." The Washington Times/AP (6/16, Ganguly) and Los Angeles Times (6/16, Chu, 958K) also report on the attacks.

Syrians Feel Pressure Is Off As Hariri Investigation Continues. The New York Times (6/126, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that there is a sense in Damascus that "the pressure was off" and Syria "was no longer in danger of being charged or punished by the international community," even as the UN Security Council voted yesterday to extend the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. There was also "a feeling here that Syria might simply be sitting in the eye of the storm. Officials at the highest levels fear that the new low-key investigator, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, may in the long run prove more dangerous than his high-profile predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, according to political analysts and people who work with the government." The Times adds, "Faced with such uncertainty, but also empowered by the release of immediate pressure, the leadership here has tried to shore up its position, bracing for the day when, or if, a damning report is produced."

Somalia Contact Group Holds First Meeting. The AP (6/16, Wadhams) reports that the International Somalia Contact Group, a US-organized group of nations concerned about the growing power of Islamic militants in Somalia, held its first meeting yesterday and lent its support "to the country's weak interim government and demanded unfettered access so aid groups can help its impoverished people." The group "also called for dialogue between the government and the Islamic militants who have taken over the capital Mogadishu and other areas of the lawless country after months of fighting that have killed more than 330. … U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier, who co-chaired the meeting, said the group 'will help to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support.'"

DOJ_NMG_0034639

The New York Times (6/16, Cooper, 1.19M) reports, "The countries in the group are the United States, Britain, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Tanzania. The document represents a resurgence for the State Department, where officials have been critical of the Bush administration's policy on Somalia, which consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords to help them defeat the Islamists." The Times also notes that Washington "is adopting a more conciliatory approach to the Islamists. Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's top Africa official, had kind words yesterday about a second letter from Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group."

Demonstrators Oppose Foreign Peacekeepers In Somalia. Meanwhile, in a separate story, the AP (6/16, Hassan) reports, "Hundreds of supporters of the Islamic group that holds Somalia's capital and much of the south demonstrated Thursday against a proposal to deploy foreign peacekeepers. … In Mogadishu, the demonstrators gathered at the main stadium carrying placards that read, 'We don't need foreign peacekeepers,' and 'We can restore peace and stability ourselves.'"

Knight Ridder (6/16, Allam) reports, "To many Somalis, the Islamist takeover was the natural culmination of a religious movement that took root with the withdrawal of international forces in 1995 and blossomed as residents turned to faith in the absence of any government. … To many Somalis struggling to raise families in their anarchic city, a pious lifestyle is a small price to pay for security."

Somali Leaders Say US Can't Afford To Ignore Ayro. Knight Ridder (6/16, Allam) reports, "Even in the violent, anarchic landscape of Mogadishu, Adan Hashi Ayro stands out. Some describe him as a ruthless holy warrior, a student of the Taliban and a relentless fighter who can scale walls and jump from moving trucks without dropping his weapon. Others offer a more sympathetic portrait of a misguided young militant who is at odds with his own clan, bitter over foreign meddling in Somalia and the scapegoat of U.S. agents who needed to put a face on their enemy. Somali community leaders agree, however, that the United States can't afford to ignore Ayro, who they say was crucial to the recent victory of the militant Islamic Courts Union over U.S.-backed warlords. If Ayro splits with the Islamic Courts' relatively moderate leadership, he could form an army of extremists prepared to attack American interests in the Horn of Africa, they fear."

Islamic Militia Leader Decries Terrorists. The Washington Post (6/16, A14, Timberg, 744K) reports that Sharif Ahmed, the leader of Somalia's increasingly powerful Islamic militias "sent a letter to the United States this week asserting that they would assist international efforts to prevent the fractured, chaotic country from becoming "a transit route or hiding ground" for terrorists." The letter "gives a direct though conciliatory response to concerns by U.S. officials that the Islamic militias harbor terrorists linked to attacks across East Africa, including the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania." In the letter, Ahmed, chairman of the "loosely organized confederation of Islamic militias that took control of Mogadishu" last week, "compared international terrorists such as al-Qaeda to the brutal warlords who had ruled the city since 1991."

Senate Approves $60 Million For UN Darfur Peacekeeping Mission. The CBS Evening News (6/15, story 7, 4:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate today approved $60 million for a UN peacekeeping mission in the Darfur region of Western Sudan, where three years of fighting between rebels and government-backed Arab militias have killed 180,000 people and left 2 million homeless."

US, Russia Extend Program For Eradicating Soviet WMD. USA Today (6/16, Eisler, 2.31M) reports, "U.S. and Russian officials have agreed on terms for a seven-year extension of programs that provide U.S. money and expertise to secure and destroy Soviet-era caches of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons." USA Today adds, "Bush has hailed the programs as an important part of the administration's efforts to keep terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction. But the programs' future has been in flux since 2004 due to a U.S.-Russian dispute over liability protections for U.S. companies, workers and government personnel working at Russian weapons sites."

Former Liberian Leader May Serve Sentence In UK. The New York Times (6/16, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "Britain said on Thursday that the former Liberian president, Charles Taylor, might serve his sentence in a British prison if he is convicted at his forthcoming war crimes trial." Other European countries had refused to take Taylor but British foreign minister Margaret Beckett "said the decision to take in Mr. Taylor…was evidence of Britain's "commitment to international justice."

The Washington Post (6/16, A16, Lynch, 744K) notes, "U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the decision. 'I am very grateful to Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett for this statesmanlike decision, which marks another step forward in our battle against impunity for the most heinous crimes,' Annan said."

DOJ_NMG_0034640

Cholera Epidemic Spreading In Angola. The New York Times (6/16, LaFraniere, 1.19M) reports that despite the wealth Angola has earned from its oil industry, the country's poor living conditions have led to a cholera epidemic. Experts blame the government which "seems powerless to address even the basic issues of clean water and sewers that would make such epidemics entirely preventable — a paradox that critics attribute to corruption, incompetence or the hangover of a 27-year civil war that flooded the capital with refugees, or all three."

Top Uganda Officials Accused Of Corruption. The Washington Times (6/16, Witter, 90K) reports, "Uganda, which continues to win praise from President Bush and others as a model of success battling AIDS, is reeling from the disclosure that top officials, their relatives and colleagues siphoned off tens of millions of dollars in grants from the Geneva-based Global Fund." The Times notes, "Money went to charities that did not exist, into the personal bank accounts of government employees and even to fund a nationwide campaign to scrap term limits so that President Yoweri Museveni could run for a third term in office."

Annan Confident UN Will Avoid Shutdown Despite Dispute With US. The New York Times (6/16, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Secretary General Kofi Annan said Thursday that he thought the United Nations would avoid a threatened budget showdown at the end of this month over management changes, but he warned against threats to 'pull the plug' on the organization if it did not meet some countries' expectations." US ambassador John Bolton "has periodically hinted that if sufficient changes are not made, the United States Congress will move to withhold its United Nations dues." But "Annan predicted that the progress being made now would be sufficient to forestall a crisis" and "that the tactic pressed by the United States had provoked a strong reaction from many nations."

The Washington Times (6/16, Pisik, 90K) reports, "U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who negotiated the six-month spending authority with other countries in late December, said yesterday that the Bush administration, European Union and Japan have been meeting with the powerful bloc of 132 developing nations and were working toward a consensus on how to streamline the organization to mutual satisfaction." Bolton said, "Our positions were quite in accord with one another. … We have tried not to draw lines in the sand."

US Seen As Reluctantly Working With Allies. Philip Stephens in his column in the Financial Times (6/16) writes that "For all Mr Bolton's bluster, George W. Bush's administration has acknowledged that acting effectively in the world requires legitimacy as well as power. No one hates the idea of admitting this more than its ambassador in New York." But "If the wilder ambitions of Mr Bolton have been decisively checked by Iraq, America remains the indispensable power. How it exercises that power determines the shape and stability of the global system. We can probably expect no more of this administration than its reluctant conversion to pragmatism. But one of these days an American president needs to explain that Roosevelt and Truman were not altruists. They built the UN because, for all its inevitable flaws, it serves American interests."

Chavez Popular With US Leftists. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, A1, Davis, 2.11M) in a front page story reports, "To a slice of the American left," Venezuelan president Hugo Chávez "has become a revolutionary hero nearly on a par with Che Guevara and Fidel Castro." Whenever "Chávez clashes with Mr. Bush -- most recently over the Venezuelan's torpedoing of a U.S. effort to create a hemispheric free-trade agreement -- his stock rises with the amalgam of college students, antiglobalization protesters and graying allies of Central American rebels."

China Seeks Tighter Controls Over Economic Growth. The Washington Post (6/16, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "China's premier, Wen Jiabao, has ordered banks and local governments to tighten financing for construction projects, the state media reported Thursday, signaling growing unease among top leaders that an ongoing surge of investment is imperiling the world's fastest-growing major economy." The Post notes, "China's leaders are again grappling with the prospect that excessive economic growth -- erecting more factories and office towers than even this giant country can use -- could give way to a disastrous bust and cause prices to plunge. That could leave China's banks, stocked with about $500 billion in bad loans, facing an even larger toll."

Krauthammer Criticizes Palestinians For Failing To Accept Negotiated Peace. Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (6/16, A25, 744K) blames the Palestinians for the recent deaths of a family after an Israeli missile reportedly struck a beach in Gaza because the Palestinians have failed to accept offers of peace. The Palestinians "are offered an independent state. They are given all of Gaza. And they respond with rocket attacks into peaceful Israeli towns -- in pre-1967 Israel proper, mind you." Krauthammer asks, "What can Israel do but try to take out those rocket bases and their crews? What would the United States do if rockets were raining into San Diego from across the border with Mexico? Now look again at that terrible photograph and ask yourself: Who is responsible for the heart-rending grief of that poor Palestinian girl?"

DOJ_NMG_0034641

O'Grady Sees Private Investment As Remedy For Mexican Economy. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her column in the Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) asks "Why, in the midst of this energy boom, is Mexico so poor, while Alberta lives large? My guess is that it has to do with the fact that the Canadian province welcomes private-sector investment (otherwise known as money) in its energy sector while Mexico has a government-owned oil monopoly (Pemex) and forbids private-sector risk capital." O'Grady states, "Mexico's President Vicente Fox likes to talk about his concerns for the dignity of Mexican migrants in the U.S. But as long as the country clings to the Pemex monopoly, it will be hard to take Mr. Fox or any Mexican president seriously when he feigns concern for jobless Mexicans."

WSJournal Blames Airbus Meltdown On European Subsidies. The Wall Street Journal (6/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "Airbus is fast becoming the current airborne testament to the hubris of state-led industrial policy in Europe. Driven as much by political ego as business sense, the aircraft maker flew for the sun only, like Icarus, to see its wings start to melt away." The meltdown in its stock prices last week, "is portrayed as a blow to European pride rather than to the company's shareholders and millions of air travelers, who will suffer directly. This is the real trans-Atlantic gap. Americans tend to judge corporations by the bottom line, not the national flag. Europeans relate to big companies as to their World Cup teams. In this they get plenty of encouragement from politicians, in particular the Gallic variety, who think business is their business." But without the "subsidies and politics, Airbus would be free to behave like a normal company. It is not that today."

NYTimes Sees Benefits In Russian Experiment With Young Politicians. The New York Times (6/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "If the young will line up to sing badly for national attention or eat worms for money, why not get them to compete for political office?" The idea "has apparently taken hold in parts of Russia, where political leaders have begun to worry that their Parliament is a little too heavy on middle-aged men." The Times conclude, "Russian politics is not exactly a model of democracy, of course, but maybe, for those trying to interest young American voters, a political reality show might not be such a bad idea. Let's face it, looking at the demographics, it could hardly hurt."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Congress Wages Partisan Battle Over Iraq War."
"A Long Fight To Free Man Convicted Of Child Abuse Killing."
"Bill Gates Programs New Life As Donor."
"Mexico's Calderon: Chasing A Legacy."
"Assembly Speaker Warns Villaraigosa That School Takeover Plan Is In Serious Trouble."
"Supreme Court Weakens Police 'Knock And Announce' Rule."

USA Today:
"Justices Allow No-Knock Searches."
"Alaska Is Front Line Vs. Avian Virus."
"Drug-Plan Shuffle Disrupts Coverage."

New York Times:
"Congress Erupts In Partisan Fight Over War In Iraq."
"U.S. Portrayal Helps Flesh Out Zarqawi's Heir."
"In Oil-Rich Angola, Cholera Preys Upon Poorest."
"Gates To Cede Software Reins In Era Change."
"'06 Race Focuses On The Suburbs, Inner And Outer."
"U.S.-Style Pay Deals For Chiefs Become All The Rage In Europe."

Washington Post:
"Parties Face Off Over Iraq War In 11-Hour Debate."
"Militias Hold Sway In Prisons, Iraqi Says."
"Malvo Claims 4 Other Shootings, Source Says."
"Court Eases 'No Knock' Search Ban."
"Metro Board Member Fired For Comment On Gays."
"Bill Gates, Version 2.0: Full-Time Philanthropist."

Washington Times:
"Papers Reveal Weakening Terror Group."
"Uganda Shaken By Fund Scandal."
"U.S. Troop Pullout From Iraq From Iraq Rejected By Senate."
"Pioneer Urges 'Responsible Fatherhood.'"
"Bash Set For Tai Shan's Birthday."
"Baghdad On The Bayou."
"IPods Offer Athletes Easy Access To Game Videos."

Detroit Free Press:
"Tiger Stadium: It's History."
"Soon, Urban Drivers Can Go 70 M.P.H."
"Cops Don't Have To Knock."
"Dude, Where's My Gun?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Atlanta To Launch N.Y.-Style Marathon."
"Airlines Jump On Fare Hike."
"State Reworks New Grading System."
"Out Of The Hospital, But Into A Flap Over Risk-Prone Athletes."
"Life After GM: Early Retiree Feels At Home With Homeless."

DOJ_NMG_0034642

Houston Chronicle:
"High Court Back No-Knock Search."
"Something In The Air At Bush?"
"Battle Breaks Out In Congress On Pros, Cons Of U.S. Pullout."
"List Of Teen Deaths Grows With Two More Shootings."
"Like Many At Rice, Coach Is A True Scholar In His Field."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Gates Stepping Down; Gates-Philanthropy; Stock Markets; Iraq-2500 US KIAs; Bush-Supplemental Spending Bill; Al Qaeda Documents; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve; Supreme Court-Police Searches; Pittsburgh QB Released; LA-Conjoined Twins; Mine Safety Bill; Woman Bowler.
CBS: Iraq-Zarqawi's Successor; Zarqawi's Successor-Background; Congress-Iraq War; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Gates Stepping Down; Mexican Border-National Guard; South Sudan-Aid Needs; Pittsburgh QB Released; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve.
NBC: Gates Stepping Down; Bernanke-Energy Prices; Iraq-2500 US KIAs; Iraq-Zarqawi's Successor; Baghdad Crackdown; Congress-Iraq War; Killer Heroin; Bush-Hawaii Marine Reserve; Supreme Court-Police Searches; Pentagon-9/11 Memorial; Iraq-American Deejay.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: House-Iraq Resolution; Jefferson Removed From Ways And Means; Wall Street; Foreign Stock Markets.
CBS: Iraq-Security; Iran-Nuclear Program; India-Flooding; Jefferson Removed From Ways And Means; Prostate Cancer.
NPR: Iran-Nuclear Program; Iraq-US Death Toll; National Guard-Border Patrols; Oil Prices; Foreign Stock Markets; Taylor Trial; Microsoft-Gates Stepping Down.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Friends of Dave Reichert and Washington State Republican Party reception, Private residence, Medina, Wash.; attends Heather Wilson for Congress reception, Hyatt Regency Albuquerque.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks at a Jon Kyl for Senate luncheon, Hilton Scottsdale Resort, Scottsdale, Ariz.; attends performance of Tomas and the Library Lady, Boys and Girls Club of the East Valley, Guadalupe, Ariz.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Routine morning business until 10:45am. Highlights: After morning business, Senate resumes consideration of S. 2766, Defense Authorization.

10 a.m. HUMAN RIGHTS-ROMA _ Helsinki Commission holds briefing on the Roma human rights situation, spotlighting the Europes largest ethnic minority. Witnesses: Madga Matache; Romani Center for Social Intervention and Studies, Romania; Timea Junghaus, Arts and Culture Network Program, Open Society Institute, Hungary; Tano Bechev, Regional Policy Development Centre, Bulgaria; Nicolae Gheorghe, Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Location: Room 226 Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.Res.861 - Declaring that th U.S. will prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary.

9 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on the synthetic drug control strategy. Scott Burns, Deputy Director for State and Local Affairs, White House Office of National Drug Control Policy; Uttam Dhillon, Director of Office of Counter-Narcotics Enforcement, Department of Homeland Security; Joseph Rannazzissi, Deputy Assistant Administrator, Office of Diversion Control, Drug Enforcement Administration; Don Young, Acting Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, Department of Health and Human Services; Ron Brooks, President of National Narcotic Officers' Associations' Coalition; Eric Coleman, Oakland County Commissioner (Mich.); Lewis E. Gallant, Executive Director, National Association of State Alcohol and Drug Abuse Directors; Sherry Green, Executive Director, National Alliance for Model State Drug Laws; Sue Thau, Public Policy Consultant, Community Anti-Drug Coalition of America. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on services for the disabled in the District of Columbia. Testimony from Robert Bobb, Deputy Mayor/City Administrator, DC; Brenda Donald Walker, Deputy Mayor of Children, Youth, Families, and Elders; Marsha Thompson, Former Director, Mental Retardation Development and Disabilities Administration; Holly Morrison, Vice President and Chief Administrative Officer, The Council on Quality and Leadership; Robert M. Gettings, Executive Director, National Association of State Directors of Developmental Disabilities Services. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee. Hearing on legislation dealing with security screening processes for trucks. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

Other: KATRINA COMMISSION _ The Katrina National Justice Commission, sponsored by the the Samuel DeWitt Proctor Conference, holds its first round of hearings to discuss successes and failures regarding Hurricane Katrina. Location: Lutheran Church of the Reformation, 212 E Capitol St.

DOJ_NMG_0034643

AMERICAN-ARAB ANTI-DISCRIMINATION _ The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee holds its 26th annual convention. Highlights: 12 p.m. Session on the media, with Helen Thomas, Mike Wallace and Jim Naureckas of Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting. Washington Rooms 1-2. 1:30 p.m. Luncheon session, with Rep. Mary Rose Oakar and retired Col. Larry Wilkerson. Cotillion Ballroms. 3 p.m. Session on Lebanon, with Amb. Farid Abboud, others. Washington Rooms 1-2. 7 p.m. Banquet, with awards to Mike Wallace of 60 Minutes; Osama Siblani of Arab American News; actor Ghassan Massoud; movie director Hany Abu-Assad; and Lifetime Achievement Award to actor Omar Sharif. Marriott Ballroom. Location: Washington Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

COPENHAGEN CONSENSUS _ The Copenhagen Consensus Center and Georgetown University, along with nine UN ambassadors, hold a conference on how to cope with major global challenges with limited funds. Highlights: 8 a.m. Media briefing on malnutrition and hunger. 9:30 a.m. Media briefing with US Amb. to the UN John Bolton, India Amb. to the UN Nirupam Sen, and Bjorn Lomborg, director of the Copenhagen Consensus Center. 12 p.m. Media briefing on climate change. Location: Georgetown University, unless otherwise noted.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW _ The American Constitution Society for Law and Policy holds its national convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton delivers a ``major'' speech on privacy rights. 9:45 a.m. Plenary session on separation of powers, with former Sen. Gary Hart, others. 1:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker: Rep. Barney Frank. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Captiol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

TAX POLICY _ 9 a.m. Tax Analysts holds an event on key issues in tax policy, with Katherine Baicker of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, others. Location: National Press Club.

US-INDIA-ENERGY _ 9 a.m. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman delivers remarks at the National Academies U.S.-India Conference, along with Vice Chairman Montek Singh Ahluwalia. Location: National Academy of Sciences, 2100 C St.NW.

EMPLOYERS-HEALTH INSURANCE _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings Institution-New America Foundation hosts a forum, ``Employment-Based Health Insurance: A Prominent Past, but Does it Have a Future?'' Panel one participants are: Moderator Henry Aaron, senior fellow, Brookings Institution; and Andrew Stern, president, Service Employees International Union. Panel two participants are: Moderator Len Nichols, director, Health Policy Program, New America Foundation; John Matthews, senior vice president, Costco; and Todd McCracken, president, National Small Business Association. Location: Falk Auditorium, The Brookings Institution, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NET NEUTRALITY _ 9:15 a.m. The Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet holds a discussion on ``Net Neutrality,'' with Mike McCurry of the Hands Off the Internet group, Paul Misener of Amazon, others. Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW.

FEMA BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. FEMA Director David Paulison and senior FEMA officials hold pen-and-pad media briefing on hurricane preparations and operations. Location: Discovery Room, FEMA HQ, 500 C St. NW.

JOHANNS _ 10 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks at the 2006 Allard Capital Conference. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

NUCLEAR RENAISSANCE _ 10 a.m. Dr. Nils J. Diaz, Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, will be the guest at a media breakfast, sponsored by The Energy Daily and cosponsor BP America. Location: Suite 1003, 1325 G St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-AGENDA _ 10:15 a.m. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, and members of the House and Senate Democratic leadership hold a news conference to ``announce a new direction for America.'' discuss Democrats' commitment to fighting for a new direction for America.'' Location: S-207, US Capitol.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, commander of the Multi-National Division-Baghdad, will brief live from Iraq at 9 a.m. EDT. Location: Pentagon briefing room.

NUCLEAR STATES _ 12 p.m. The Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council holds a briefing on the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs, with David Albright of the Institute for Science and International Security, Thomas Donnelly of AEI, and Robert Gallucci of the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn.

MEDICAID _ 12:15 p.m. The Alliance for Health Reform and the Commonwealth Fund hold a luncheon briefing on improving coverage stability for kids in Medicaid and SCHIP, with Laura Summer of Georgetown University, Stan Dorn of the Economic and Social Research Institute, others. Location: Room 325, Russell.

CHAO _ 1:30 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao speaks at the Clare Boothe Luce Policy Institute seminar. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0034645

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, June 16, 2006 8:34 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, June 16, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060616.pdf; dojclips060616.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena White House Documents On Surveillance Program (AP) 4
Congress Struggles To Ramp Up Oversight (CSM) 5
Is Bush Signaling An About-Face On Detainees? (LAW) 6
New Jersey Demands Data On Phone Call Surveillance And Is Sued By U.S. (NYT) 7
Lawyer Says Investigators Tricked Ga. Terror Suspect (AP) 9
Attorney Says FBI Lied To Terror Suspect Agents Promised Not To Arrest Ga. Tech Student (AJC) 9
Canadian Muslims Urged To Keep Eye On Extremism (USAT) 10
Manzanar Redux? (LAT) 11
The Name Is Kafka . . . Franz Kafka (WP) 12

Homeland Response:

DHS Stands By Anti-Terror Cuts (WP) 13
Agency: States Unprepared For Disasters (AP) 15
Limo Company Offered To Aid DHS Prior To Bid (WP) 15
Cunningham Said To Have Helped Limo Firm (AP) 16
House Panel Probes Limo Firm's Deal (LAT) 18
Congress Probes Limousine Deal (NSDY) 19
9/11 Pentagon Memorial To Reflect Pangs Of Loss, Recollections Of Joy (WP) 19
Pentagon Breaks Ground On 9/11 Memorial (AP) 20
Remembering 9/11 (WT) 21
New Plan Calls For Scaling Back WTC Memorial (WSJ) 22

War News:

Senate Rejects US Troop Pullout In Iraq (AP) 23
US Troop Pullout From Iraq Rejected By Senate (WT) 24
Congress Boosts Iraq War Funds But Debates How Long To Stay (WSJ) 25
Congress Erupts In Partisan Fight Over War In Iraq (NYT) 26
House Debate On Iraq War Gets Under Way (AP) 28
Congress Becomes A Battleground In Iraq War (LAT) 29
Iraq Debate Pits Uncertainty Against Anxiety (LAT) 31
GOP Bill Would Reject Deadline For Withdrawal (USAT) 32
Parties Face Off Over Iraq War In 11-Hour Debate (WP) 33
Congress Debates War As Death Toll Rises (CHIT) 35
Congressional Debate On Iraq War More About Politics Than Policy (KRT) 36
They Don't Know Why They Did The Things They Did (WP) 38
On Keeping Current (WP) 39
"Enough Is Enough" (USAT) 40
Setting Deadline For Troops' Withdrawal Will Backfire (USAT) 41
The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT) 41
Stay The Course? What Course? (WP) 42
Captured Papers Show Weakening Insurgency (AP) 43
Iraqi Leaders: Memo Details Al-Qaeda Plans (USAT) 44
Picture Of A Weakened Iraqi Insurgency (CSM) 46
Papers Reveal Weakening Terror Group (WT) 47
US Deaths In Iraq Reach 2,500 As The Country Is Torn By Violence (KRT) 48
Newsview: Iraq War Has Mournful Milestones (AP) 49
Maliki Aide Who Discussed Amnesty Leaves Job (WP) 50
US Military Releases Image Of Zarqawi's Successor (LAT) 53
US Military Shows Al-Zarqawi's Successor (AP) 54
U.S. Portrayal Helps Flesh Out Zarqawi's Heir (NYT) 55
Al-Masri Identified As Apparent Zarqawi Successor (WP) 57
Shiite Militias Control Prisons, Official Says (WP) 58
After A Dark Time, A Walk Into The Sun (WP) 60
S. Korean Charged In Oil - For - Food Scandal (NYT/AP) 61
South Korean Businessman Hit With Another Indictment (HC/BLOOM) 61
Military Investigates U.S. Killings Of Iraqis At Checkpoint (LAT) 62
Inside The Ring (WT) 62

Americans Fear Haditha Fallout (WSJ) 64
General Leading Haditha Probe Known For Integrity, Toughness (WP) 65
Baghdad On The Bayou (WT) 67
Eight Afghans Killed On Way To Work At U.S. Air Base (NYT) 67
Why The Taliban Appeal To Pakistani Youth (CSM) 68
Weapons Permit In Military-Spending Boom, Expensive Pet Projects Prevail (WSJ) 69

Corporate Scandals:

Senators Grill Fannie Mae Chief (WP) 72
Republicans Push Fannie To Accept Operating Limits (WSJ) 73
After The Enron Trial, Defense Firm Is Stuck With The Tab (WP) 74
Former HealthSouth Official Receives Eight-Year Sentence (WSJ) 76
Medarex Subpoenaed Over Options Grants (AP) 77
EMI Settles Pay-for-play Probe For $3.75 Million (AP) 77
Sarbanes-Oxley Gives Accountants Fees Bonanza (FT) 78
Milberg Mores (WSJ) 79

Criminal Law:

House Dems Strip Jefferson Of Panel Seat (AP) 80
Fellow Dems Vote To Take Jefferson Off Panel (USAT) 80
Jefferson Voted Off House Panel (BRADV) 81
Democrats Vote To Force Jefferson Aside (NYT) 82
Party Urges Jefferson To Leave Committee (WP) 83
Democrats Vote Jefferson Off Panel (WT) 84
Black Caucus Opposes Democrats' Move To Take Jefferson Off Key Committee (LAT) 85
Little Office Becomes Big Player After Raid By The F.B.I. (NYT) 86
Separation Of Powers Showdown Friday (MSNBC) 88
Safavian Jury Yet To Reach Verdict (AP-Y2) 88
Corruption Trial Witness Feared For His Life (CHIT) 89
Did Witness Fear For Life? It 'may Have Crossed My Mind' (CHIST) 90
FBI Subpoenas Records From Library's Policy (NILESHS) ... 91
Man Sought In Nev. Wants 'Truth' To Emerge (AP) 92
Online Threats Outpacing Law Crackdowns (CNET) 92
Court Rules Warrant Is Enough (LAT) 94
Justices Allow No-knock Searches (USAT) 95
Court Limits Protection Against Improper Entry (NYT) 95
Court Eases 'No Knock' Search Ban (WP) 97
High Court Eases 'Knock And Announce' Rule For Police (LAW) 98
Supreme Court Gives Police More Power (CSM) 99
Top Court Upholds No-knock Police Search (AP-Y2) 100
Supreme Court Weakens Police 'Knock And Announce' Rule (LAT) 101
Evidence Allowed In No-knock Raid (WT) 103
Supreme Court Backs Wide Police Search Powers (KRT) .. 104
High Court Allows Use Of Evidence Taken In Violation Of Knock Rule (WSJ) 105
The Don't-Bother-to-Knock Rule (NYT) 106
Court To Cops: Knock The Door Down (LAT) 106
A TR 'Nut' Savors His Big Find (PHI) 107
Ky. Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed (FINDLAW/AP) 108
The End Of Innocence (NYT) 109
VA Data Theft Not Linked To Other Crimes (AP) 110
Malvo Claims 4 Other Shootings, Source Says (WP) 110
Offender Bill To Get Nod From Governor (WP) 113
Developments Bar Sex Offenders (USAT) 114

Civil Law:

Honeywell Agrees To Pay U.S. $2.6M To Settle False Claims Charges (AP) 115
Feds: NJ Hospital Co. To Pay $265M In Medicare Billing Settlement (SDUT/AP) 115
Saint Barnabas To Settle Fraud Charges (NSL) 116
Hospital Chain To Pay $265M To Settle Whistleblower Suits (LAW) 118
Health Care Group To Repay $265 Million To Medicare (NYT) 119
Saint Barnabas Settles Medicare Case (WSJ) 120

Civil Rights:

Ex-federal Attorney Enters Guilty Plea (FREMARG) 121
Outsiders Recommend New Chief In Ridgefield (OREG) 121
L.A. Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Barrage (LAT) 122
Panel Advances Old Glory Protection (WT/AP) 124
Senate Panel Advances U.S. Flag-Burning Ban Proposal (Update2) (BLOOM) 124
Senate Alters Bill To Transform La. Congressional Elections (AP) 125
Baltimore Sued For Arrests Without Charges (BSUN) 126
Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job (LAT) 128
Metro Board Member Fired For Comment On Gays (WP) ... 129
Prayers In The Military (WP) 130

Antitrust:

Executive Pleads Guilty In Military Bid-rigging Case Over Foam Sales (VP) 131
Microsoft's Gates To Step Back (USAT) 132

DOJ_NMG_0034648

After US Regulators, Came The Europeans . . . And It's Not Over Yet (FT) 134
Microsoft Wins Patent Case With 'EBay' Argument (LAW) 134
France's Vinci Snubs Merger Proposal From Utility Veolia DOW JONES NEWSWIRES (WSJ/DJN) 136

Environment:

Bush Creates Marine Sanctuary (WT/AP) 136
Pacific Sanctuary Gets Bush's Signature (LAT/AP) 137
Bush Signs Legislation On Broadcast Decency (WP) 138
Bush Plan: World's Largest Ocean Reserve (CSM) 139
Islands Apart (NYT) 140
Saving The Islands (WP) 140
Senate Democrats Cry Foul Over Toxic Waste Sites (LAT) . 141
Bush Signs Bill Overhauling Mine Safety (AP-Y2) 142
Clinton Praises Evangelical Christians (AP-Y2) 143
A Shift Among The Evangelicals (WP) 144
Alaska Is Front Line Vs. Avian Virus (USAT) 145
Another Death In Indonesia Deepens Fears Of Bird Flu's Spread (NYT) 147

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Sentenced (CO) 148
Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation (KCS) 148
22 Suspects Arrested As U.S. Targets Global Drug Network (WT) 148
Officials Gather To Fight Deadly Fentanyl Outbreak (DFP) . 149
130 Dead From New U.S. Super-heroin (WT/UPI) 150
Amid Fentanyl Deaths, Investigation, Addicts Keep Using (AP) 150
Some Facts About Fentanyl (AP) 151
Death Ignites New Discussion On Drug Use In Park Ridge (PRHA) 151
D.C.'s 'Teflon Defendant' Acquitted In Latest Trial (WP) 152
Selig Admits Baseball's 'Problems' (NYT) 153
MLB To Fund HGH Detection Study (USAT) 154
Garbage Held Clues In Steroid Import Case (ALBANYTU) .. 154
Deputies Find Remote Pot Garden (SACBEE) 155
KING OF BLING BUSTED (NYPOST) 155
Clarksdale Man Arrested In Slaying Of Federal Witness (JACKCL) 157
Lawyer Jailed On Gun Charges (CHASGAZ) 157
House Panel Backs ATF Fee, At A Discount (WP) 157

Immigration:

14 Million Aliens Forecast To Get Amnesty (WT) 158
States Struggle To Cut Costs Of Immigration (CSM) 159
Immigration Enforcement (WT) 160

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Spending Bill For Wars And Hurricanes (NYT) .. 162
Senate Sends Bush $94.5B For Iraq, Katrina (AP) 163
Senate Approves $94.5B For War, Hurricane Funds (WP) ... 164
Reduced Spending Bill Approved In Senate (WT) 164
Senate Approves Bush Nominee To Head FDIC (AP-Y2) 165
Bush Hosts Annual Congressional Picnic (AP-Y2) 165
A Little Needling From Bush, And Then A Call Of Regret (NYT) 166
Spellings Goes Overseas To Tout Education (AP-Y2) 166
Credit-rating Agencies Closer To Tough Regulations (USAT) 168
Drug-plan Shuffle Disrupts Coverage (USAT) 168
Counting On COLAs To Bring Relief (WP) 169

Other News:

Bernanke Speech Soothes Nerves On Economy (FT) 170
Bernanke Highlights Inflation Risks, But Sounds Somewhat Dovish Note (WSJ) 171
Stocks Post Sharp Gains In Rebound From Sell-Off (NYT) . 171
Blue Chips (WSJ) 172
Stocks Extend Rally; Dow Over 11,000 (WP/AP) 174
Dow's Rally 'does Not Mean That Much' (USAT) 174
Factory Output Fell Slightly In May (WSJ) 175
The Phantom Menace (NYT) 176
As Natural Gas Glut Looms, Producers Eye The Weather (WP) 177
The Beltway's Energy (WSJ) 178
'06 Race Focuses On The Suburbs, Inner And Outer (NYT) 180
Cheney Sees GOP Winning Midterm Elections (AP-Y2) 181
Bipartisan Query: Will 2006 Reprise 1994? (WSJ) 182
Vietnam, Watergate And Rove (WSJ) 183
Officials Prepare For Midterm Elections (AP-Y2) 184
Judge Dismisses Most Of Phone-jamming Suit (AP-Y2) 185
Dan Rather Will Leave CBS After 44 Years (USAT) 186
Head Examined Scientist's Study Of Brain Genes Sparks A Backlash (WSJ) 186
Pioneer Urges 'Responsible Fatherhood' (WT) 189
Seeds For A Geo-Green Party (NYT) 190
New Gravity For The Political Center (WP) 191
Politics Begins At Home (NYT) 192
Power Struggles In Maryland (WP) 193
Iran Lobbies China, Russia To Help Curb U.S. (WSJ) 194
Iran "ready To Negotiate" Over Nuclear Stance (FT) 195
Iran Seeks Aid In Asia In Resisting The West (WP) 196
Iran Sends Mixed Signals On Response (AP) 197
Senate Backs President's Iran Policies (AP) 198

DOJ_NMG_0034649

Hamas Offers To Revive Cease-fire (WT/AP) 198
How Clumsy, Inaccurate Gaza Rockets Could Start A War (NYT) 199
US Warns On Readiness Of North Korean Missile (FT).....201
U.S. Sanctions Cost North Korea Millions (WT) 202
Bush Pushes For Trade Deal As A Deadline Looms (WSJ) .202
Bush Pledges To Push EU To Cut Agriculture Subsidies (WT).....203
Bush: 'Tough Sledding' For Poverty Talks (AP).....204
A New Trade Envoy, With A Battle On Her Hands (NYT).....205
US Drops Opposition To Asian Currency Unit (FT) 206
Sri Lankan Military Attacks Rebels In Response To Fatal Bus Blast (NYT) 207
Sri Lanka Retaliates After 64 Civilians Killed (FT) 208
Explosion Kills 64, Shakes Cease-fire (WT/AP).....208
Sri Lankans Seek Escape Across The Sea (LAT).....209
As U.N. Inquiry Drags On, Syrians Ask If They Should Relax (NYT) 211
Somalia Contact Group Meets For First Time (AP).....212
Six Nations Urge Talks In Somalia For Exiled Rulers And Islamists (NYT) 213
Somalia Demonstrators Reject Peacekeepers (AP).....214
Somalis Welcome The Quiet Brought By Islamist Takeover (KRT) 214
US Can't Afford To Ignore Young Militant, Somali Leaders Say (KRT).....216
Somali Militias Decry Terrorists (WP) 217
US, Russia Reach Deal On Securing Soviet WMD (USAT) .219
Britain May Take Liberian Ex-Ruler (NYT).....219
Britain To Imprison Liberia's Taylor If He's Convicted (WP) .220
In Oil-Rich Angola, Cholera Preys Upon Poorest (NYT).....221
Uganda Shaken By Fund Scandal (WT) 223
Annan Sees No Standoff Over Budget At The U.N. (NYT).....224
U.N. Given Reprieve On Spending Cap By U.S., EU (WT)....225
The UN Serves US Interests (FT) 226
Move Over, Che: Chávez Is New Icon Of Radical Chic (WSJ)227
Financing Controls Ordered In China (WP).....229
Who Is To Blame For Grief On A Beach? (WP) 230
A Tale Of Two Oil Patches (WSJ).....231
Icarus Inc. (WSJ).....233
Young? Bored? Win A Parliament Seat (NYT).....234

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena White House Documents On Surveillance Program (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press

AP, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter cranked up his dispute with the Bush administration over executive power on Thursday, threatening to subpoena documents on the White House's warrantless surveillance program.

Specter said he had not received a response to his request that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appear before the panel this month to answer questions about the surveillance program and other touchy subjects – such as the FBI raid on a lawmaker's office last month.

"I will ask for authorization for a subpoena if we do not get an adequate response," Specter told the committee.

Such prodding may not be necessary, according to the Bush administration.

"We are currently working with Chairman Specter to set a date for the attorney general to appear," Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said.

The Pennsylvania Republican, who won the administration's goodwill by ushering two of its nominees onto the Supreme Court in the last year, has engaged in an increasingly tense standoff with the White House over matters he believes could amount to abuses of executive power.

Under that umbrella fall several administration policies that Specter wants to examine and the White House has resisted explaining. The administration argues that the details are matters of national security and subject to executive privilege.

DOJ_NMG_0034650

The policies include a probe into Bush's domestic surveillance program that has been dropped by Gonzales' Office of Professional Responsibility; revelations that the government, aided by telephone companies, is keeping records of calls made by Americans; the government's attempts to investigate and prosecute journalists who refuse to reveal their sources; and the FBI's raid last month on Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill offices as part of a bribery probe.

Specter also wants to examine the statements Bush issues when he signs bills into law, in which the president enumerates how he will interpret them.

"There's a whole litany of questions that the attorney general is going to have to answer," Specter said this week. "We're going to press him as hard as we can."

Congress Struggles To Ramp Up Oversight (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

Forty-four months after authorizing the use of force in Iraq, the House Thursday opened the floor to its first day-long debate about the war. A key theme: Keeping the White House accountable.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the Capitol, the Senate voted Wednesday to pay for future war costs through the regular budget process, rather than through "emergency" spending bills. It's a move lawmakers say will increase congressional oversight of the war.

At the same time, a Senate panel will grapple next week with how to oversee the National Security Agency's (NSA) warrantless surveillance of communication between Americans and suspected terrorists abroad.

The moves signal that Congress is trying - again - to revive its flagging oversight role of an executive branch that is claiming broad wartime powers. It's doing so, analysts say, because control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections could turn on the issue.

"The broader motivation in Congress by the majority party is clearly the sinking political fortunes of the president and the party and the fear of retribution in November," says Thomas Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a center-left think tank in Washington.

So far, however, both chambers of Congress have struggled to make headway. Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, for example, has repeatedly been stymied in his bid to bring the government's secret eavesdropping program in line with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. On Thursday, the Judiciary Committee he chairs postponed the consideration of four versions of legislation to require more oversight. The Senate Intelligence Committee is developing its own plan to strengthen supervision of the NSA program. "Congress's ability to conduct effective oversight depends on what political price the president has to pay for resisting congressional scrutiny," wrote Senator Specter, in an opinion piece Thursday.

So far, that price has not been high. And this week, one of the few congressional committees that had been cruising on a bipartisan basis stalled out on party lines over the issue of congressional oversight.

Last week, Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee called on Chairman Duncan Hunter (R) of California to reestablish the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which traditionally led probes of the Pentagon. Republicans did away with that panel when they took back the House in 1995.

"At the end of [Thursday's] debate, we are still going to be left with a House Armed Services Committee that is not doing the kind of oversight ... as has been done in past wars and past Congresses, regardless of what administration is in power," said Rep. Marty Meehan (D) of Massachusetts at a press conference on Wednesday.

Inertia has been strongest on the highest- profile investigations. Nearly two years after promising a report on whether the prewar intelligence on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq was politically manipulated, the Senate intelligence panel is still gridlocked over the terms of completing the investigation.

"[Democrats] keep moving the goal posts and asking for more information," says Sen. Pat Roberts (R) of Kansas, who chairs the Select Committee on Intelligence. In comments off the floor of the Senate, he said he expected the report to be completed by mid-July.

DOJ_NMG_0034651

Senate Democrats, who can't offer any detail on the panel's secret work, say the Republicans are dragging their feet. "It's like the marquee on an old movie house that always reads: 'Coming soon'," says Sen. Ron Wyden (D) of Oregon, a member of the Intelligence committee. "It's critically important that this be wrapped up quickly."

Some observers see the low level of supervision as a function of partisan deference. Republicans are "afraid if you do look at anything out there, it could prove embarrassing," says Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank in Washington.

But history suggests that one party's dominance need not preclude meaningful oversight. Nine months after German tanks rolled into Paris, the junior senator from Missouri called for a probe of the US buildup in World War II to "head off scandals before they started."

The Truman Committee, created at a time when Democrats controlled the presidency and both houses of Congress, set the gold standard for congressional investigations - and gave Harry Truman a leg up to the presidency. Between 1941 and 1948, this panel held 432 public hearings and 300 executive sessions, and is credited with saving the government billions of dollars.

"Presidents are well served by a Congress that aggressively but responsibly pursues its oversight responsibilities. It helps keep them from making mistakes and helps administrations make corrections in a more timely fashion," says Mr. Mann.

Is Bush Signaling An About-Face On Detainees? (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 16, 2006

It is rare for a president to comment on a pending Supreme Court case. But President George W. Bush has been doing just that in recent weeks, making several mentions of the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case that will decide the fate of the military commissions he ordered to handle detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"We're waiting on our Supreme Court to act," Bush said at a press conference Wednesday, one of several comments that indicate he is eager to follow the Court's lead, even if it rules against his claim of broad power to deal with the detainees outside the established military and civilian court system.

Bush's remarks and tone have confounded opponents of the military commissions, leaving some wondering if Bush is trying to soften the blow of an expected defeat -- or already preparing the public for civilian alternatives to military commissions.

Covington & Burling partner David Remes, one of the coordinators of the legal effort against the administration position, says Bush's comments have led him to ask "why Bush made Hamdan a test of presidential power in the first place. If Bush could accomplish his goals within the existing legal framework, why did he confront the judicial branch with such breathtaking claims of presidential power?"

The presidential commentary on the case was so frequent in recent days that expectations were high that the Court might hand down the decision on Thursday. The two lawyers who argued against each other in the case -- Solicitor General Paul Clement and Georgetown University Law Center's Neal Katyal -- were in the courtroom, but the justices instead handed down four criminal and business law cases. The Court will convene again next Monday and Thursday to issue more decisions in its push toward adjournment by month's end.

The Hamdan case asks whether the president has constitutional or statutory authority to establish the commissions -- and whether federal courts have jurisdiction over the issue. Lawyers challenging the commissions say the limited rules of evidence and trial procedures violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions on prisoners of war. The administration has argued that Bush has ample authority to decide that military necessity requires a special process for handling the detainees outside the court system.

But during a joint press conference June 9 with the prime minister of Denmark, Bush said he thought Guantanamo detainees "ought to be tried in courts here in the United States. We will file such court claims once the Supreme Court makes its decision as to whether or not -- as to the proper venue for these trials." That comment seemed to some to contradict his legal position, which was that the detainees should be tried by military commissions at Guantanamo, not courts in the United States.

"This is a dramatic about-face from the Administration's position in the high court, and an admission that the detainees have been right all along," said Katyal, who argued on behalf of detainee Salim Ahmed Hamdan before the justices on March 28.

DOJ_NMG_0034652

"These cases belong in our courts, not in a makeshift military system that lacks credibility. President Bush's statement reaffirms that national security doesn't require this makeshift system, which is precisely what Mr. Hamdan has been saying for three years."

On Wednesday, at a press conference after his surprise visit to Iraq, Bush seemed to amend his comments, emphasizing that he had military, not civilian courts in mind. "I'd like to close Guantanamo," Bush said, "but I also recognize that we're holding some people that are darn dangerous, and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts. And the best way to handle ... these types of people is through our military courts. And that's why we're waiting on the Supreme Court to make a decision."

But on May 7, in comments during an interview on a German television network, Bush seemed indifferent about which courts the detainees ultimately face. "I very much would like to get people to a court," Bush said, according to the transcript. "And we're waiting for our Supreme Court to give us a decision as to whether the people need to have a fair trial in a civilian court or in a military court. But in either case, they will get a trial which they, themselves, were unwilling to give to the people that they're willing to kill."

Richard Samp of the Washington Legal Foundation, which filed a brief in support of the Bush Administration's position on military commissions, said not much should be made of these remarks.

"He has been talking to a lot of foreign leaders lately about Guantanamo, and I am sure he wants to not appear insensitive to their concerns," said Samp. Samp adds that it is prudent for the administration to be planning now for the ramifications of a high court ruling -- no matter which way it comes down.

Deborah Pearlstein of Human Rights First, a leading critic of the commissions, agrees that Bush's comments about the case reflect "national and international pressure on the administration to finally come up with some definitive -- and lawful -- resolution to a global detention system that long ago stopped serving U.S. policy interests in promoting freedom, or in protecting its own security."

But she too was astonished at Bush's seeming acceptance of trials for the detainees, no matter where they take place. "The suggestion that the Guantanamo detainees should be tried at all, much less tried in U.S. courts, contradicts the administration's position all along that the President can just detain, without trial if he wants, the 'worst of the worst' at Guantanamo forever."

New Jersey Demands Data On Phone Call Surveillance And Is Sued By U.S. (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

TRENTON, June 15 — The New Jersey attorney general has issued subpoenas to five telephone companies to determine whether any of them violated the state's consumer protection laws by providing records to the National Security Agency. Experts say it is the first legal move by a state to question the agency's program to compile calling records to track terrorist activities.

On Wednesday, the United States filed a lawsuit to block the subpoenas, setting up a legal showdown pitting the state's authority to protect consumers' rights against the federal government's national security powers.

"People in New Jersey and people everywhere have privacy rights," the state's attorney general, Zulima V. Farber, said on Thursday. "What we were trying to determine was whether the phone companies in New Jersey had violated any law or any contractual obligations with their consumers by supplying information to some government entity, simply by request, and not by any court order or search warrant."

This latest confrontation over the invocation of national security began last month, when Ms. Farber issued the subpoenas to the companies — AT&T, Verizon, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Cingular Wireless — to determine whether they had turned over the phone records to the federal government without a court order, in possible violation of state laws.

But when the Justice Department filed suit in United States District Court here to block those subpoenas — a suit that Ms. Farber received on Thursday — it asserted that the state was straying into a federal matter, and that compliance with the subpoenas would imperil national security.

As a matter of national security policy, the dispute represents the latest twist in the controversy over the boundaries of domestic spying and personal privacy. But as a matter of government practice and legal precedent, the dispute is significant because it transforms what had primarily been a fight between the federal government and civil liberties groups into a far knottier one pitting federal authorities against state ones.

DOJ_NMG_0034653

Clifford Fishman, a professor at Catholic University Law School who is an expert on electronic-surveillance law, also said the actions by both state and federal government were laden with political overtones.

Professor Fishman said New Jersey's subpoenas — issued by a Democratic administration — appeared to be "a political move to try to embarrass the Bush administration as well as the phone companies." But he added that "the Bush administration is responding with a howitzer instead of a sniper."

The professor, who noted that he had not seen the government's suit, said each party had alternatives to what he saw as a significant development over the disputed reach of the National Security Agency. He said the federal government need not have sued New Jersey to make its argument against the subpoenas, and he said the state could have allowed numerous private parties to pursue litigation against the phone companies, rather than getting involved.

In the lawsuit, the federal government invokes the state-secrets privilege, in which the government asserts that any discussion of a given lawsuit's claims would threaten national security.

"Compliance with the subpoenas issued by those officers would first place the carriers in a position of having to confirm or deny the existence of information that cannot be confirmed or denied without causing exceptionally grave harm to national security," Assistant United States Attorney Irene Dowdy claimed in the government's complaint. "And if particular carriers are indeed supplying foreign intelligence information to the federal government, compliance with the subpoenas would require disclosure of the details of that activity."

But in an interview on Thursday, Ms. Farber said that it was incumbent upon her to insure that the phone companies were not violating state law if they had turned in any phone records to the N.S.A. The New York Times first reported in December that President Bush had authorized the security agency to conduct eavesdropping without warrants. Last month, USA Today reported that the N.S.A. had created a large database of phone calls made by customers of several phone companies.

A few days after the USA Today article was published, Ms. Farber issued subpoenas to phone companies that operate in New Jersey. Yet few people outside of state government and the phone companies knew about them.

Ms. Farber had originally demanded responses by May 30. She said that telephone company representatives, unable to persuade her to withdraw the subpoenas, had asked for an extension until Thursday. One day before that extended deadline, the federal government filed its lawsuit.

The question of whether phone companies have turned over customer records to the spy agency already has spawned a handful of lawsuits. Some companies have denied surrendering the records; others denied wrongdoing or declined to comment. For instance, a federal judge in San Francisco has scheduled a hearing for next Friday in a lawsuit filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a privacy-rights advocacy group that seeks to enjoin phone companies from turning over records and seeks damages for affected customers.

Selim Bingol, a spokesman for AT&T, said that the lawsuit filed by the federal government to block New Jersey's subpoenas showed that the phone companies should not be the ones that have to address these policy issues.

The American Civil Liberties Union has filed complaints in 22 states demanding that attorneys general and utility regulators officials investigate whether consumer protection laws have been violated. Officials in a few states in addition to New Jersey. including Vermont, Maine and Washington, have promised to investigate.

"All we're really trying to do is to make sure that the phone companies have followed the law," said David J. O'Brien, Vermont's commissioner of the Department of Public Service.

But none had gone as far as New Jersey, according to Barry Steinhardt, director of the A.C.L.U.'s Technology and Liberty Project.

According to some critics, one potential weakness of the government's state-secrets claim is that Ms. Farber — as well as Gov. Jon S. Corzine and Richard L. Cañas, the state director of homeland security — has top federal security clearance, and might well not divulge any sensitive national security information she received as a result of the subpoenas.

"Our state officials are cleared for security purposes all the time," said Bruce Afran, a lawyer in Princeton, N.J., who, with his partner, Carl Mayer, filed a federal suit in Manhattan last month against Verizon.

DOJ_NMG_0034654

Lawyer Says Investigators Tricked Ga. Terror Suspect (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

AP, June 16, 2006

ATLANTA - Investigators preyed on a Georgia Tech student's devotion to Islam to get him to help their terrorism probe and then reneged on their promise not to arrest him if he told the truth, the suspect's lawyer said in court papers Thursday.

The allegations by Jack Martin, a lawyer for 21-year-old Syed Ahmed, were contained in a motion in which Martin seeks to suppress Ahmed's statements to the FBI or make the government abide by the alleged agreement not to prosecute him.

In a subsequent motion, Martin insisted that the government be forced to say whether the National Security Agency used its power to obtain phone records for Ahmed or conduct other electronic surveillance of him without a warrant.

"All the defendant asks for now is notice and access to the relevant information and documents, " Martin said.

Since the arrest, the FBI has said that Ahmed and another man from the Atlanta area, Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, may have had contact with some of the 17 people arrested in Canada earlier this month on terrorism-related charges.

Martin said an FBI agent and a task force investigator who questioned Ahmed on March 10 at his Atlanta apartment told him that as long as he told the truth he would not be arrested. He said one of the investigators told Ahmed that he, too, was a Muslim and used that to get a statement from Ahmed.

"Allah does not want you to go to jail, "the investigator told Ahmed, according to the motion. "I want you to help us. Obviously, that is why we are talking to you.'"

As a result, Ahmed spoke to investigators for more than 12 hours over several days, identified videos and photographs, and assisted the agents in investigating Internet sites, Martin said. The motion does not say what Ahmed told investigators. Martin said in a telephone interview that no lawyer was present for the questioning. He refused to comment further.

On March 23, Ahmed was indicted on a single charge of providing material support to terrorists and has been held in custody since then, the motion says.

FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett said the agency would have no comment. A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta, Patrick Crosby, said, "The motions filed today were expected, and we will respond to them in court at the appropriate time.'"

According to previously released court papers, Ahmed and Sadequee are accused of traveling to Canada to meet with Islamic extremists to discuss "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike.'"

Both men, who are U.S. citizens who grew up in the Atlanta area, met with at least three other targets of ongoing FBI terrorism investigations during a trip to Canada in March 2005, the documents say.

The documents say the men discussed attacks against military bases and oil refineries and planned to travel to Pakistan to get military training at a terrorist camp, which authorities said Ahmed attempted.

Attorney Says FBI Lied To Terror Suspect Agents Promised Not To Arrest Ga. Tech Student (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 16, 2006

Six statements by a Georgia Tech student arrested on terrorism-related charges should be thrown out because of false promises and implied threats from investigators, the man's attorney said in court filings Thursday.

Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, talked to FBI agents after being told he would not be arrested if he cooperated. Ahmed did talk — six interviews over a week's time — and then was arrested, his court-appointed attorney Jack Martin said.

The agents also "prey[ed] on the defendant's devotion to Islam" to gain his trust and cooperation, he said.

"Office [Khalid] Sediqui, who revealed that he was a devout Muslim himself, stated 'Allah does not want you to go to jail. I want you to help us,' " the motion states.

Sediqui told Ahmed if he answered the investigators' questions, "then we are going to leave you alone," the motion states.

Ahmed gave more than 12 hours of statements, totaling 400 pages of transcripts, and identified photographs and videos. On March 23, he was indicted on a charge of providing material support to terrorists.

Another Georgia man, Ehsanul Sadequee, 19, of Roswell, a friend of Ahmed's, was arrested in April while traveling in Bangladesh. The two men allegedly took a Greyhound bus to Toronto in March 2005 to meet with "like-minded extremists" and plot "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike."

The men allegedly made contact with two of the 17 suspects arrested this month in Toronto on terrorism charges, according to documents filed in Canadian court.

The two men also allegedly discussed traveling to Pakistan to receive military-style training. Prosecutors say Ahmed tried to do that last summer.

In April 2005, a month after the Canada visit, the two allegedly shot some "casing videos" of sites in Washington. Those videos were found on the computer of a man arrested in London on terrorism charges.

In the motion filed Thursday, Martin argued that the U.S. Supreme Court and other courts have determined that a statement is involuntary if induced "by significant and powerful promises or threats, such as the promise of nonprosecution here and the threat of arrest if the defendant did not 'cooperate.' "

The motion quotes an agent telling Ahmed, "You have the rest of your life in front of you. ... You know eventually you are going to have to get a job some day. Do you want any type of criminal record?"

Ahmed answered, "No."

In a separate filing, Martin asks the court to force prosecutors to divulge any wiretaps or electronic surveillance the government used to keep track of his client.

The FBI declined to comment on the case. Patrick Crosby, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said, "The motions filed today were expected, and we will respond to them at the appropriate time."

Canadian Muslims Urged To Keep Eye On Extremism (USAT)

By Rebecca Cook Dube

USA Today, June 16, 2006

TORONTO — Some Canadian Muslim leaders are urging a crackdown on extremists within their community two weeks after 17 males, including five teenagers, were arrested in suburban Toronto on terrorism-related charges.

“We knew of these children. We'd see them coming to our mosque wearing military fatigues, and we didn't think much of it,” says Asad Dean, chairman of Meadowvale Islamic Center in a western suburb of Toronto. Several of the suspects occasionally attended services there, he says. “We need to be more vigilant.”

The response to the arrests has exposed a rift between Muslim leaders. Some reject the notion that a violent ideology may have taken root in their community; others argue that Muslims must acknowledge radicalism in their midst and work harder to extinguish it.

The allegations that 17 Muslim men and boys, most of whom were born and raised in Canada, plotted to blow up buildings and behead the prime minister caused ripples as far away as Iraq.

Iraq's most senior Shiite Muslim cleric issued a religious decree Wednesday addressing the charges against the men in Canada. “Muslims have undertaken to obey the laws of a country of their residence, and thus they must be faithful to that undertaking,” read the fatwa, or legal opinion, issued by the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

The suspects, all but two of whom are younger than 26, were arrested in raids across the Toronto area June 2 and 3. Gary Batasar, a lawyer for one of the accused men, said the government alleges the group planned to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper and possibly blow up the headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

The suspects, who are being held in solitary confinement at a prison southwest of Toronto, await bail hearings and trials.

The young men are part of a Muslim community that has more than doubled, according to the government's Statistics Canada agency, from about 250,000 in 1991 to nearly 580,000 in 2001 — about 2% of Canada's population. The Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington-based research group, estimates the Muslim population in the USA at 2 million, or almost 1% of the total population.

Some Canadian Muslim leaders say they're offended by the suggestion they should be responsible for combating radical influences.

DOJ_NMG_0034656

At a news conference the day after the arrests were announced, several Muslim leaders denounced the idea that their mosques might include extremists, even on the fringes.

"That is a scandalous allegation," said Zafar Bangash of the Institute of Contemporary Islamic Thought in Toronto.

Others say radicals are spreading extremism and the danger can no longer be ignored. "They were young kids, and they were taken down this road by someone," says Sheik Husain Patel, cleric at the Toronto Islamic Center, where one suspect occasionally worshiped.

"It's about time Muslims owned up to the fact it's a Muslim problem," Farzana Hassan-Shahid of the Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) said after a meeting last weekend between Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Muslim community leaders.

The CIC issued a flier in October that warns the Muslim community of attempts by extremists to influence children and advises parents on how to watch for and counter radicalism.

Yasmin Ratansi, a Liberal member of Parliament from Toronto, is among those who agree with Patel and the CIC that parents and Muslim leaders need to pay closer attention to what children learn at mosques and on the Internet.

"Canadian youths of Muslim faith have been unduly influenced by radical thought," Ratansi says.

Dean blames Saudi-funded organizations for spreading fundamentalist Islam in North America and Europe.

Saudi Arabia's puritanical Wahhabist strain of Islam urges a literal interpretation of the Quran, Islam's holy book, that puts its followers at odds with many other Muslims. "We should not have Saudi Wahhabi literature in North America and Europe," Dean says. "We have to address the root of this problem."

He says several suspects in the terror case approached him about hosting a religious program.

When he turned them down, Dean says, they urged other Muslims to boycott his suburban mosque.

"They view the traditional Muslims as compromisers, as collaborators, as wimps," he says. "It's a serious crisis. These kids were born and raised in Canada, and there could be more of these kids out there. That's what concerns me."

Manzanar Redux? (LAT)

By David Cole

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

'WHAT WILL they do to us if there is another attack? Will they intern us like they interned the Japanese?"

That is the single most common question I get when speaking about counter-terrorism policies and civil liberties to Arab and Muslim audiences. Until Wednesday, I assured them that such a response was unthinkable. The Japanese internment during World War II is now so widely recognized as morally, legally and ethically wrong, I told them , that it could not possibly be repeated.

But after a decision by a federal judge in New York, I'm no longer confident that I can be so reassuring. Dismissing a case challenging the detention of Arab and Muslim foreign nationals in the weeks after 9/11, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled that it is constitutionally permissible to round up foreign nationals on immigration charges based solely on their race, religion or country of origin. What's more, he said that they can be detained indefinitely, even after they have agreed to be removed to their home countries.

In essence, he authorized a repeat of the Japanese internment — as long as the internment is limited to foreign nationals charged with visa violations (a group that at last count numbered about 11 million people).

The case, Turkmen vs. Ashcroft, was filed on behalf of Arab and Muslim foreign nationals swept up on the pretext of immigration charges in the weeks after 9/11. Many were initially arrested on no charges at all — only to be served with immigration papers days, weeks or sometimes months later. All were arrested in secret — in many cases without being allowed to contact anyone — and hundreds were tried in closed hearings that even their family members were not allowed to attend.

They were picked up on the slightest of suspicions. In one representative case, according to the Justice Department's inspector general, the FBI arrested several men on a tip that "too many" Middle Eastern men worked at a convenience store down the street.

DOJ_NMG_0034657

Many of those arrested admitted that they had violated their visas and agreed to leave the country, but they were kept locked up for months so that the FBI could investigate them. They were not allowed to go until they were "cleared" of any connection to terrorism. In a complete reversal of the American system of justice, they were treated as guilty until proved innocent.

In all, the government detained more than 1,000 foreign nationals in the first seven weeks after 9/11, and more than 5,000 in the first two years after the attack. Yet as of today, not one of these persons stands convicted of a terrorist crime. From a security standpoint, the roundups were an utter failure.

In Turkmen vs. Ashcroft, the detainees argued that the government denied them equal protection of the law when it rounded them up on the basis of their race and religion, and violated their due-process rights when it kept them after their immigration cases were resolved. The district court rejected both claims, concluding that the government is free to detain deportable foreigners for as long as it wants as long as their ultimate removal is "reasonably foreseeable." And the judge concluded that using race or religion to select the foreign nationals subject to such detention was neither "irrational" nor "outrageous" because the 9/11 hijackers, after all, were Arab foreign nationals belonging to an Islamic fundamentalist group, Al Qaeda.

In other words, the next time we are attacked, the government is free to round up all foreign nationals with alleged visa violations who share the race or religion of the attacker and to keep them behind bars as long as it wishes. If the attack is perpetrated by an Arab Muslim, all Arab and Muslim immigrants are vulnerable. If the attacker is a Latino Christian, the government could round up all Latino Christians with alleged visa problems.

It's true that the World War II internment included citizens as well as foreign nationals, and in many cases, it rounded up people who had done nothing wrong. But what was most offensive about it was the fact that people were selected based on their race. And just as racial profiling of drivers is not acceptable merely because black and Latino drivers stopped are allegedly speeding, so racial profiling of immigrants is not acceptable even if the immigrants are alleged to have violated their immigration status.

WHEN THE Supreme Court in Korematsu vs. United States upheld the legality of the Japanese internment, Justice Robert Jackson warned in his dissent that the precedent would "lie about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need."

Until Wednesday, I thought history had proved Jackson wrong. Virtually every living Supreme Court justice has condemned Korematsu as wrongly decided — Justice Antonin Scalia has compared it to the Dred Scott decision of 1857, in which the court refused to recognize that slaves were "persons." Congress has formally apologized to the survivors of the internment and paid reparations for their injuries.

Yet the Turkmen decision has taken the loaded weapon out of the closet, dusted it off and handed it to federal authorities, giving them explicit permission to let prejudice and fear run roughshod over the most basic of human rights — the rights to equal treatment and liberty.

David Cole, a law professor at Georgetown University and volunteer attorney with the Center for Constitutional Rights, was co-counsel to the plaintiffs in Turkmen vs. Ashcroft.

The Name Is Kafka . . . Franz Kafka (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

"So put aside your Captain Crunch decoder ring," recommends the Central Intelligence Agency, "for the moment." This is on the Internet site of the CIA's legal department. It's part of a pitch for recruits so startlingly moronic -- even as an attempt at adorable self-mockery -- that you think it must be some subtle comment on the double meaning of the word "intelligence." In good hall-of-mirrors fashion, it's lifted from some book, but the book quotes supposedly real CIA employees. Whatever, this is the agency's self-presentation on its own Web site.

"If the theme music from Mission Impossible runs through your head," it says, "or you get the urge to order a martini 'shaken, not stirred,' at the mention of the letters 'CIA,' " -- why, then, you're just the kind of lawyer we want!

DOJ_NMG_0034658

"We've been a major player in developing the law of national security vs. the First Amendment," the agency deadpans. "Or the Fourth Amendment. . . ." When "Americans [abroad] come across on our screen, they've got constitutional rights we've got to think about . . . . Or electronic surveillance . . . . In areas like that, we're helping to create the law, and that's a real rush."

And it's all true. The CIA is in the forefront of efforts to make sure that democracy, individual rights and stuff like that don't get in the way of our crusade for the spread of democracy, individual rights and stuff like that.

For years, all the intelligence agencies have been tussling with the American Civil Liberties Union over documents about the innovative Bush administration policy of locking people up in foreign countries where they can be tortured without the inconvenience of anyone knowing about it or bringing up, you know, like, the Constitution. It is not yet clear -- though there is little reason for optimism -- whether the courts will let them get away with it, but the official position of the executive branch under President Bush is that the U.S. government can lock you up anywhere in the world, torture you and tell no one about it. And if someone does find out and starts talking trash like "habeas corpus" or "Fourth Amendment," too bad: It's all okay under the president's inherent powers as commander in chief. Congress -- unbeknownst to Congress -- approved it all in its resolution shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, urging the president to fight terrorism. And the president deputized the CIA and other agencies to go forth and use this authority, in documents that you can't have and that may or may not exist.

In a twist fully worthy of Kafka, or at least Joseph Heller ("Catch-22"), the very suspicion that bad things are going on is a reason you can't find out. As a CIA legal document explains: "CIA confirmation of the existence of [evidence] would confirm a CIA interest in or use of specific intelligence methods and activities." After all, the agency gaily reasons, the "CIA would not request . . . authorization from the president for intelligence activities in which it had no interest."

Meanwhile, in another federal court, the ACLU has been arguing with the National Security Agency about the wiretapping of international phone calls to and from the United States. The 1978 intelligence reform law made clear as cellophane that these agencies had no authority to wiretap citizens of this country and in this country without permission from a judge. So clear, in fact, that the president doesn't deny that his wiretapping program violates the 1978 law. Instead, he says that Congress overruled that law in its 2001 resolution to oppose terrorism. That, plus the usual inherent powers of the presidency.

What's more, government lawyers say, they can prove all this. Or at least they could, but they can't, because the evidence must remain secret for national security reasons. And what are those reasons? Well, the reasons why the reasons why the program is okay are also secret. And without this evidence, there cannot be a trial. Sorry.

It's true that you and I are not being grabbed on the streets and sent to a former secret police torture-training camp in Godforsakistan. Nor is the government eavesdropping on your international phone calls or mine. Probably. Because I like you, I'll forgo the usual ominous warning about how they came after him and then they came after her and then they came after you. I'll even skip the liberal sermonette about how even bad guys have rights.

But your rights and mine are not supposed to be at the whim of the government, let alone the president. They are based in the Constitution and the willingness of those we put in power to obey it -- even as interpreted by judges they may disagree with. The most distressing aspect of this story is the apparent attitude of our current rulers that the Constitution is an obstacle to be overcome -- by conducting dirty business abroad or by wildly disingenuous interpretations of laws and the Constitution.

Just look at what these supposed worshipers at the shrine of "strict constructionism" and "original meaning" have done to the 2001 anti-terrorism resolution. Did any senator who voted for this resolution have any idea that he or she was, in essence, voting to repeal all the protections for individuals against government agency abuse that Congress enacted in 1978?

The fact that there are countries in this world where the government can torture people in secret and without fear of courts is supposed to be a tragedy -- not a convenience.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Stands By Anti-Terror Cuts (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034659

A top official at the Department of Homeland Security said the agency will not reconsider its decision to cut anti-terror grants for Washington and New York by 40 percent, despite criticism and pointed questioning yesterday by congressional representatives from those regions.

George W. Foresman, DHS undersecretary for preparedness, stood by the complicated formulas used by a secret panel of reviewers to divide $711 million in 2006 funds for urban areas across the country. The result was that Washington and New York, the two areas targeted on Sept. 11, 2001, will get less than last year, while Omaha, Charlotte, Louisville and other cities will receive more.

"I feel confident in the risk analysis process and the peer review process," Foresman said at a congressional hearing, calling his agency's risk analysis "incredible." "What we need to do is a better job in communicating with the communities."

But Foresman appeared to have a difficult time communicating with the congressional panel. Lawmakers from both parties lambasted DHS and called its decision-making process "mind-boggling," "a mystery" and "goofy" and said it doesn't appear to meet its stated goal -- distributing federal dollars to regions that face the greatest risk of attack.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) called it "one of the greatest displays of incompetence."

More than two hours into the hearing, a top Maryland official attending the session said he still did not understand why his state is receiving only $24 million in a separate grant program when it expected as much as $40 million. "To be honest with you, I'm mystified still," said Dennis Schrader, Maryland's director of homeland security.

The Washington region, which received $77 million in the urban anti-terrorism program last year, is slated to get $46 million. It had requested $160 million.

Foresman, the former homeland security chief for Virginia, said it wasn't that the risk has dropped in New York or the Washington region but that federal officials have a better understanding of the national picture. The number of urban areas that federal officials consider under threat has grown from seven to more than 100, he said.

He tried to correct earlier statements by DHS officials that the District and New York got less money because of weak applications. "They were not deficient in their applications," he said. "Effectiveness measures were reviewed in relation to others around the country and ranked."

And Foresman dismissed recent statements from some area elected leaders that politics may have played a part. "It's an incorrect allegation that this was driven by politics," he said.

This marked the first time that DHS used risk as a key factor in evaluating competing requests for money from cities and states. The lawmakers and heads of homeland security in Virginia, Maryland and the District applauded that goal but not its execution.

Edward D. Reiskin, the District's deputy mayor for public safety, said the outcomes "don't seem to square with professional and common sense."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who called the hearing as chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, got into a back-and-forth with Foresman, pressing him to explain why the District will get less money than Montana in one grant program.

"Do you think Montana is at greater risk than D.C.?" Davis asked.

"We don't rate one community against another," Foresman said.

"Doesn't it seem on risk alone, D.C. would have a higher risk than Montana?" Davis said.

"On just risk, D.C. would have scored higher," Foresman said, adding that other factors were involved, including an analysis of the way each community intended to spend its grant, whether that plan would be effective and whether it advanced national homeland security goals.

Davis wasn't swayed. "How in the world is a risk or threat or anything in Montana or North Dakota or South Dakota higher than in the District?" he asked. "I don't think it passes the laugh test."

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) calculated that his state was receiving $4.50 per resident while Wyoming was getting $16 per resident.

"We're protecting the grizzly bears in Wyoming, as opposed to the people who work around Fort Meade and NSA," Ruppersberger said.

Agency: States Unprepared For Disasters (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, June 16, 2006

Most American cities and states remain unprepared for catastrophes, a government analysis concludes, calling the shortcomings in emergency planning a cause "for significant national concern."

Nearly five years after the 9/11 attacks and 10 months after Hurricane Katrina, the Homeland Security Department concluded that local response plans for major disasters are often antiquated and uncoordinated.

Although emergency plans appear to be stronger in 18 states along the nation's "Hurricane Belt," the analysis cited preparedness gaps in 131 state and city emergency response plans. Planning for evacuations, too, remain "an area of profound concern," the review found.

"We rely to a troubling extent on plans that are created in isolation, are insufficiently detailed and are not subject to adequate review," concluded the department's 160-page review of findings and annexes that was delivered to Congress on Thursday evening. A copy of the review was obtained by The Associated Press.

"Time and again, these factors extract a severe penalty in the midst of a crisis: precious time is consumed in the race to correct the misperceptions of federal, state and local responders about roles, responsibilities and actions," the review found. "The result is uneven performance and repeated and costly operational miscues."

President Bush ordered the review of state and city emergency plans in a speech in New Orleans last Sept. 15, weeks after Katrina ravaged the city. It analyzes response and evacuation procedures for all 50 states, the nation's 75 largest cities and six U.S. territories.

Documents made available to the AP did not cite individual cities or states, and a Homeland Security official suggested that portion of the report will be released later.

It criticized the states and cities in several key areas, including:

• Failing to address emergency needs for sick, elderly or poor people unable to help themselves.

• Being too slow to issue disaster warnings and other alerts to the public.

• Failing to designate a clear chain of command during major disasters.

"Most review participants have demonstrated that they are able to successfully manage commonly experienced incidents, yet are not fully prepared for a catastrophic event," the review concluded. It called the gaps cause "for significant national concern."

But it found that 18 hurricane-prone states, from Maine to Texas, appeared to be better prepared for disasters than the rest of the country.

Those states hugging the Atlantic and Gulf coasts were judged by peers to have emergency plans "that were more likely to be rated sufficient ... than other states," the review noted. Plans by Hurricane Belt states to manage resources, health and medical issues and communications were "noticeably stronger" in comparison, it found.

Similarly, cities in Hurricane Belt states also were rated more likely to be prepared in issuing warnings, managing resources, distributing emergency public information and mass care. But in a glaring exception, the cities were judged as comparatively not sufficient in planning for evacuations.

The review is the latest in a series of government and expert analyses since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast last Aug. 29. Nearly all have found lacking preparedness levels for large-scale disasters. The Sept. 11 commission and other panels have also found shortcomings in preparedness for another terrorist attack.

The latest report was released as the Senate sent President Bush a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill that included funds for new aid for Gulf Coast hurricane victims.

The review noted several failings on the federal government's part, citing a need for clearer guidance and up-to-date preparedness data to state and local officials. It also urged better collaboration with private businesses to help evacuate disabled people and with charities and other non-governmental services to stockpile aid for disaster victims.

Limo Company Offered To Aid DHS Prior To Bid (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0034661

By Spencer S. Hsu And Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A limousine company linked to a congressional bribery investigation offered its services to the Department of Homeland Security more than three months before the agency sought bids for a transportation contract, and eventually won contracts worth $25 million over six years, congressional investigators disclosed yesterday.

The local firm, Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc., also told DHS that it held special status under a federal program designed to help small businesses in economically distressed areas before it applied for and won such a designation, lawmakers said yesterday. That designation turned out to be a condition for obtaining the contracts.

Recently convicted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) recommended Shirlington Limousine to the DHS in an April 2004 letter to the department, according to a written affidavit provided to House investigators by Shirlington Limousine President Christopher D. Baker.

The unusual circumstances laid out at a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing yesterday created more controversy for the company, whose executives have been questioned in an investigation of whether it helped provide prostitutes to Cunningham and other lawmakers on behalf of a California defense contractor. The company has denied wrongdoing.

"It just doesn't seem to be a reasonable sequence of events if there was not some political manipulation of the bid process. . . . This doesn't look right," said Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), chairman of the management, integration and oversight subcommittee, which held the hearing.

Rogers added, "I can't understand why [Baker has] a letter from a California congressman as to his character or competence and quality, instead of his own congressman or some congressman of the district where the business will be conducted."

DHS procurement director Elaine Duke said the department routinely receives all sorts of offers from vendors, and DHS officials spoke with Baker around January 2004. But such a conversation is not a formal proposal, and all rules were followed, department spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

"I don't think it's fishy," Orluskie said. "They wanted to turn it [the contract] really fast, but I know they did it in accordance with federal acquisition regulations."

Duke said the department has no copy of Cunningham's letter. However, the department provided investigators with an April 20 e-mail from Shirlington Limousine in which the company said it had faxed a letter of recommendation from Cunningham, as well as a request for an advance -- seven days before DHS publicly awarded the contract and six days after DHS sought bids.

Rogers said lawmakers invited Baker and Shirlington Limousine's vice president to testify, but they declined because of a federal grand jury investigation. But both are cooperating by answering written questions, he said.

Agents are examining the relationship between Shirlington Limousine and Brent R. Wilkes, a San Diego businessman who is under investigation for bribing Cunningham in return for millions of dollars in federal contracts. Cunningham is serving more than eight years in prison for his part in the scheme.

The FBI is also investigating whether former CIA executive director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo steered contracts to Wilkes.

Michael York, one of Baker's attorneys, said yesterday that his client has been to San Diego and talked to the FBI, prosecutors and a grand jury. But he disputed any suggestion that Cunningham's letter improperly influenced the department's decision to award the firm contracts to provide limousine and shuttle services.

Homeland Security officials previously denied the existence of a Cunningham letter.

In comments released by his press secretary, House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter T. King (R-N.Y.) said: "If there's a reference to a letter, [Cunningham] is involved and DHS has not been truthful. . . . Did somebody clean out the file?"

The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), called for DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson to appear before Congress to discuss "major missteps."

"It is unconscionable to think that the agency charged with tracking down terrorists cannot even track down letters of recommendation," Thompson wrote.

Cunningham Said To Have Helped Limo Firm (AP)

By Erica Werner

The AP, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - A limousine company involved in congressional prostitution and bribery allegations got a Homeland Security contract after then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham interceded on the company's behalf, the company's president has told lawmakers.

The statement by the president of Shirlington Limousine was made in an affidavit discussed at a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing Thursday.

It prompted renewed protests from lawmakers about the Homeland Security Department's awarding of two contracts to Shirlington despite the company's history of problems.

Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., noted that Shirlington president Christopher Baker had a criminal record and business dealings with a defense contractor named as an unindicted coconspirator in the prosecution of Cunningham.

"And then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company. If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is," King lectured government witnesses.

Cunningham is serving more than eight years in prison after admitting accepting $2.4 million in bribes from the defense contractor and others. Federal officials are investigating whether the contractor also supplied the California Republican lawmaker with prostitutes and limousines from Baker's company. Baker did not testify Thursday because a federal grand jury investigation is under way.

DHS Chief Procurement Officer Elaine Duke said department officials turned up no evidence they actually received a letter from Cunningham except for a reference to it in an e-mail from the limousine company.

