Beyond that, Skilling took heart from a Dec. 12 decision of the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that identified "serious frailties" in many of his convictions because of the reversal in the Enron-Nigeria case.

But that same appellate decision raised no specific doubts about five convictions for lying to auditors, and it concluded that Skilling should remain in prison because he is unlikely to win a reversal on all his crimes.

Columbia University law professor Jack Coffee doubts any change in public sentiment will alter the outcome of Skilling's appeal, particularly since the next most prominent corporate criminal--WorldCom's Ebbers--had his conviction and sentence upheld. "The odds are very much against him," Coffee says.

No surprise, Skilling's attorney sees it differently.

"As balance, reason and common sense creep back into the environment ... this will be extremely helpful to his appeal," Petrocelli says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Attorney General Agrees To Take Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C., Jan. 13 — North Carolina's attorney general said Saturday that his office would immediately assume control of the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case referred to him on Friday by the Durham County district attorney.

"I wish I could tell you that this case would be resolved quickly," the attorney general, Roy A. Cooper, said at a news conference here on Saturday afternoon. "Since we have not been involved in the investigation or the prosecution of these cases, all of the information will be new to our office. Any case with such serious criminal charges requires a careful and deliberate review."

The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, had asked Mr. Cooper to take over the prosecution, citing the conflict of interest he faced from having to respond to an ethics complaint from the North Carolina Bar Association. Mr. Nifong was "very disappointed" at giving up the case, his lawyer, David B. Freedman, said Saturday, but pleased with Mr. Cooper's assignment of two veteran prosecutors.

Defense lawyers and families of the defendants welcomed the news that the case would be in the hands of the attorney general's office.

"We are taking a completely new, fresh look at this case, so anything could happen," Mr. Cooper said. "We are looking at all the facts. Whatever charges, if any, are appropriate, they will be pursued."

Mr. Cooper said his office would obtain the case files next week and then meet with defense lawyers and reinterview witnesses, including the accuser. He said he did not know if a pretrial hearing scheduled for Feb. 5 would have to be postponed.

Mr. Cooper, 49, a Democrat, is a former legislator who wrote a crime victim's bill of rights. He is serving his second term and has announced plans to run for re-election in 2008.

He assigned James J. Coman, head of the attorney general's Law Enforcement and Prosecutions Division, and Mary D. Winstead of the Special Prosecutions Division, to the case. But Mr. Cooper said he would make the final decisions in the case.

"We accept the case with our eyes wide open to the evidence, but with blinders on for all other distractions," Mr. Cooper said.

From the start, the Duke case has been politically charged by race and class. A black woman hired to strip at a Duke lacrosse team party last March 13 accused three white students of gang rape. Protests erupted, and Mr. Nifong expressed with a certainty that a crime had occurred.

But in the last 10 months, his case floundered as defense lawyers offered time-stamped photographs challenging the stripper's account, prosecution reports highlighting the lack of DNA evidence and inconsistencies in the woman's story. Defense lawyers have insisted that the woman, 28, is a false accuser and have painted Mr. Nifong, 55, as a renegade with political motives.

Sexual offense and kidnapping charges are pending against Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y.; Reade W. Seligmann, of Essex Fells, N.J.; and David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. The three were initially charged with rape, but Mr. Nifong dismissed that charge after the accuser told an investigator she could not be sure what had penetrated her.

At State Level, Official Promises Careful Review Of Duke Case (WP)

By Sylvia Adcock, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C., Jan. 13 -- North Carolina's attorney general on Saturday promised a "careful and deliberate review" of the sexual abuse case against three Duke lacrosse players but noted that "anything can happen," even new charges, as his office reviews the evidence.

"Agreeing to accept the prosecution of these cases doesn't guarantee a trial, nor does it suggest a dismissal," Attorney General Roy Cooper said at a news briefing, one day after Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong asked Cooper's office to take over the case against the three players accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party last spring.

He emphasized that his prosecutors will be looking at this case with fresh eyes, and that while the review could lead to dropped charges, it could also lead to new charges or reinstatement of rape charges dropped last month.

"Whatever charges -- if any -- are appropriate would be pursued," he said.

Cooper also said his office would not talk about details of the case while it is reviewing the sexual assault and kidnapping charges against Reade Seligmann of Essex Fells, N.J., Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y., and David Evans of Bethesda.

The takeover of the case comes after Nifong sought to recuse himself, and follows weeks of increasing criticism of his handling of the case. Last month, the North Carolina State Bar charged Nifong with ethics violations.

The new lawyers appointed to the case -- career prosecutors Mary D. Winstead and James J. Coman -- will begin by going through the case files, which will be transferred from Durham to Raleigh.

Cooper also said parts of the case may need to be reinvestigated. "I anticipate that our prosecutors will seek to meet with witnesses, with investigators and with defense attorneys." He said that would probably include re-interviewing the accuser.

The work is likely to mean the rescheduling of a Feb. 5 hearing on the police lineup procedures used by Nifong's office, procedures that defense attorneys characterized as giving the accuser "a multiple choice test in which there were no wrong answers." The defense has also filed a motion to move the trial from Durham.

The case has been portrayed as one of race and privilege, pitting the white lacrosse players against a young black woman. But Nifong's actions and statements have received more attention even as the accuser changed her version of events.

On Dec. 15 it was revealed in court that Nifong and the director of a private DNA testing lab had withheld evidence from defense attorneys.

On Dec. 22, Nifong dropped rape charges against the three, but the defendants are still charged with first-degree sexual abuse and first-degree kidnapping.

2 Officers Suspended; Report Was Not Fully Reviewed (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

Two police officers have been suspended without pay for failing to adequately investigate a 15-year-old girl's complaint that a man had tried to kidnap her, the police said yesterday. The man, a paroled sex offender, is now suspected of abducting and raping a 17-year-old girl just two hours after the complaint, the police said.

The officers, who have not been identified by the police, are assigned to the 101st Precinct in Queens, said Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman.

The suspect, Eric McCoy, was arrested on Jan. 3 and has been charged with committing two rapes in Queens in a little more than four weeks. In each case, he posed as a police officer and raped his victims inside motel rooms, the police said.

In the first assault, which occurred on Dec. 4, Mr. McCoy abducted a woman, 27, as she was getting off a bus in Jamaica and forced her to a motel, the police said. In the second episode, the authorities said, Mr. McCoy approached a 17-year-old girl on Jan. 2 in Kew Gardens and identified himself as a "police special investigator." He said he had a gun and took her to a motel where he raped her, the police said.

Hours before the second rape, Mr. McCoy had told a 15-year-old girl that he was a police officer investigating an assault. After showing her a fake badge, he told her to wait inside a laundry. Inside, she talked about the encounter with a woman, who called 911, the police said.

Once the police arrived, Mr. McCoy approached the squad car and told the officers that two girls had been in a fight. When the girl came to the car, they asked whether she had been fighting. They told her to get into the car, drove her to a subway station and told her to go to school, the authorities said.

The officers failed to check whether Mr. McCoy had a criminal record and, apparently, to question others at the scene, the police said. Mr. McCoy was arrested after one victim remembered that he had identified himself as "Investigator McCoy."

'GANGLAND' G-MAN SENT RAT INTO TRAP (NYPOST)

By Erin Calabrese, And Brad Hamilton

The New York Post, January 14, 2007

January 14, 2007 -- It was the FBI's version of a planned hit.

That's what mob turncoat Carmine Imbriale says he faced in 1992 after former G-man Lindley DeVecchio rigged him with a wire and sent him to gather evidence against Gregory Scarpa, the boss of the Colombo crime family.

What Imbriale didn't know, he says, was that DeVecchio - the allegedly corrupt FBI supervisor facing charges he helped Scarpa carry out gangland executions - had tipped off the mobster about Imbriale's deal.

Sending him back on the street meant "I could have been killed at any time," Imbriale told The Post.

"It was amazing I wasn't killed," said the former loan shark, who is in witness protection. "[DeVecchio] had no right letting Greg know about me."

Only a two-week battle with migraines saved him, Imbriale said.

"They came to my house three times to take me out," Imbriale said. "I could not move. I was vomiting and everything."

A hit-team member, Joey Ambrosino, kept trying to draw him out.

"I said, 'Joey, look at me. I was throwing my guts up. I can't walk.' . . . He couldn't get me out of the house."

In a congressional report obtained by The Post - prepared by "G-mom" Angela Clemente, a private mob investigator who aided the DeVecchio probe - an internal FBI document sheds light on how Imbriale was sold out.

Just hours after Imbriale agreed to turn state's witness, DeVecchio got a call from Scarpa, FBI agent Christopher Favo said in the report.

DeVecchio "listened to the caller and then said, 'I don't know what he's saying about you. We haven't even talked to him yet,' " the report says.

The Favo report will likely become a key piece of evidence against DeVecchio in his upcoming trial - and in ex-NYPD Detective Joe Simone's bid to get back his pension.

Simone was blamed for the leaks to Scarpa and was indicted but never tried. Simone says DeVecchio pointed the finger at him to throw off suspicion of himself.

"They treated me like garbage," said the ex-cop.

Probe Has Long, Sharp Edge (SPREP)

By Jack Flynn

Springfield (MA) Republican, January 14, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - Thirty-three victories in 34 cases.

Half a dozen public agencies under new management.

Five million in swindled tax dollars being pumped back into a financially depleted city.

DOJ_NMG_0116848

Half a decade after it started, Springfield's clean government makeover, courtesy of the FBI, IRS and other federal agencies, just keeps going. Since August, 17 defendants have pleaded guilty to stealing public money earmarked for the poor, sick and homeless.

But behind the flurry of recent prosecutions, the U.S. Justice Department's landmark corruption probe is undergoing its own transformation, with three top investigators leaving the case since August and no high-profile indictments or raids in more than a year.

For the first time since 2003, when indictments began cascading from U.S. District Court here, Springfield's seemingly endless corruption probe appears to be winding down.

Not so fast, says the region's FBI bureau chief, Michael G. O'Reilly.

"Certainly, some of the urgency has drained away with all the success we've had," said O'Reilly, who took over the Springfield office in 2001. "But after terrorism, fighting organized crime is still our No. 1 priority."

Those convicted run the gamut from powerful and well connected - former Police Commission Chairman Gerald A, Phillips, two-term state Rep. Christopher P. Asselin, homeless shelter director Francis G. Keough III - to little-known building contractors, a no-show bakery employee and a convicted sex offender with a patronage job on the city Health and Human Services Department payroll.

Several defendants, including Phillips, were convicted on whittled-down versions of the original charges, and some received probation or short prison sentences. Phillips, ordered to serve 21 months in a Pennsylvania prison, is finishing out the term at a Ludlow pre-release center.

The only outright defeat for prosecutors came in October, when a judge threw out racketeering and bid-rigging charges against a Springfield Housing Authority contractor because the five-year statute of limitations had expired.

Twelve other defendants, including Housing Authority Director Raymond B. Asselin, who resigned in 2003 before being indicted, had already accepted plea deals in the case.

For the moment at least, the investigation seems to be a victim of its own success.

Lead prosecutor Assistant U.S. Attorney William M. Welch II and FBI special agent Susan M. Kossler took promotions in Washington, D.C., and FBI agent Clifford W. Hedges - lead investigator in the corruption probe - has been assigned to other cases in Springfield.

The higher-ups who authorized the investigation are moving on, too. Boston FBI chief Kenneth W. Kaiser was recently tapped for a new post in Washington and the state's U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan is now doubling as acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

In Springfield, several key investigators - including FBI special agent William T. Wittrock and IRS special agent Michael Brin - remain on the case, joined by Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven H. Breslow.

The sudden shift in the probe coincided with Breslow's arrival last summer. A prosecutor in the Brooklyn, N.Y., office, Breslow was transferred here to work with Welch, then wound up with his job and caseload.

For all the turbulence, Kevin O'Regan, a prosecutor and former supervisor of the Springfield U.S. Attorney's Office, said public corruption is still a top priority.

"These cases have a significant deterrent value," said O'Regan, now working with Breslow on corruption cases. "But equally important is the restoration of the public confidence."

Whatever its future, the investigation has rerouted the power grid of Springfield - from the mayor's office, reclaimed by 79-year old Charles V. Ryan as an honest-government candidate in 2004, to the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, now run by a new director and reorganized advisory board.

The investigation also created a cottage industry for the region's defense lawyers, and snarled several agencies in red tape for months. Three SHA managers, for example, were suspended with pay in late 2003, reinstated in 2004 and then fired within a year.

To handle its scandal management chores, the PVTA hired four outside lawyers before terminating its staff lawyer, who responded with a lawsuit against the agency.

Northampton defense lawyer John P. Pucci said the immediate future of the probe is difficult to predict, given the secrecy of grand jury investigations and the sheer number cases churned out in the last three years.

"There was no public corruption investigations in Springfield for a very long time," said Pucci, a former federal prosecutor. "So the corruption that was there continued. People were emboldened."

The trial of former mayoral aide Anthony M. Ardolino, his brother Chester J. Ardolino, an ex-police officer, and developer Matthew D. Campagnari, is set for April 4. The trio has pleaded innocent to skimming $700,000 from two downtown bars they owned while Anthony Ardolino was chief of staff for Mayor Michael J. Albano.

No trial date has been set for former Chicopee Mayor Richard R. Goyette, indicted in 2005 for allegedly shaking down a towing contractor for campaign donations.

Conspicuously absent from the legal drama has been Albano, whose tenure at City Hall from 1996 to 2003 attracted the most aggressive federal scrutiny.

After Phillips was indicted in 2003, his lawyer said the FBI was pressuring his client for incriminating information on Albano. But the four-term Democrat was never identified as a target, and his name never surfaced in court documents.

Now living in East Longmeadow, Albano, 56, was in federal court in Boston last month, testifying in a wrongful imprisonment suit by two men who spent three decades behind bars for a killing committed by Mafia hitman-turned-FBI informant.

A member of the Massachusetts Parole Board in the 1980s, Albano said he was pressured by two FBI agents to keep the innocent men behind bars. Both agents were later implicated in an FBI corruption scandal, and one convicted in 2002 of racketeering and obstruction of justice.

Asked about corruption in Springfield last week, Albano changed the subject to Boston.

"I just testified against the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in the biggest civil suit against the government in history," he said.

Asked again about the Springfield case, Albano responded: "I'm awaiting the outcome of that (the Boston) trial."

Even At 96, Alleged Mobster Is Not Beyond Reach Of Law (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

Albert Facchiano may be the oldest person indicted by the U.S.

MIAMI — With his trial on racketeering charges set to begin next month, Albert "The Old Man" Facchiano may be living proof that the only way to leave the mafia is feet first.

Facchiano, 96, is believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by the federal government and would likely be the country's most senior of senior-citizen inmates if convicted and sent to prison for alleged violent service to the Genovese crime family.

A federal grand jury last year issued a six-count indictment of Facchiano and six other South Florida men tied to the New York mob, alleging they ran the mafia's Miami operations and engaged in "a pattern of racketeering activity" that included extortion, robbery, money laundering and loan sharking.

It is unclear from the Florida indictment whether Facchiano is suspected of actually pulling a trigger or wielding a lead pipe. But a parallel New York indictment of 30 reputed Genovese members specifically accuses the nonagenarian of trying to intimidate or eliminate a witness in the federal government's case against the nation's most powerful crime family.

Facchiano's attorney, Brian McComb, said he was trying to negotiate a plea bargain for his client, whom he describes as having "a lot of medical problems" but still able to participate effectively in his own defense. The accused, who will turn 97 on March 10, is in full possession of his mental faculties "so far," McComb said. "I think this is going to end up being worked out," the lawyer from the Florida Gold Coast city of Stuart predicted.

But the U.S. attorney's office for south Florida reports that its prosecution of Facchiano is on track to begin Feb. 22 in the court of U.S. District Judge James I. Cohn.

"I think the judge gave us sufficient time, and I think he intends to go forward. We're ready to go to trial," said Assistant U.S. Atty. Jeffrey N. Kaplan.

The federal prosecutor said he couldn't comment on whether a plea bargain was underway. He also said the defendant's age was not a matter for consideration, at least at this stage of the case. Kaplan said federal guidelines allude to the issue of a defendant's age or infirmity only in sentencing provisions.

An undercover FBI operation supported by federal tax authorities led to the grand jury indictment in June, which details extensive mob-related activities by the Florida defendants from 1994 to 2006. The FBI wouldn't have brought the charges against Facchiano if it wasn't committed to prosecuting the man despite his age, said the bureau's Miami spokeswoman, Judy Orihuela.

"When they indict someone, they pretty much already know the person's background," she said, suggesting that if age was a consideration, it had been rejected as an obstacle to prosecution.

After a reputed life of crime that began before the Great Depression, Facchiano is no stranger to the inside of the federal prison network. His first conviction, on robbery and fencing charges, stemmed from a 1932 arrest, and he was also jailed for mob activity in 1936 and 1944. His last incarceration, an eight-year stretch on a 25-year sentence for racketeering, ended in 1989.

Jerry Capeci, a mafia historian and operator of the website Gang Land — http://www.ganglandnews.com — mentioned Facchiano last month in his weekly account of mob developments. He quoted from a reported FBI wiretap of another elderly mobster deriding the notion that he and Facchiano could have committed the crimes with which they were accused.

"I tell you, if we pull the trigger, we woulda fell on the floor," alleged Genovese capo John "Buster" Ardito told an associate wearing a wire for the FBI, according to Capeci.

Facchiano is free on his personal recognizance and a signature bond, said McComb. He is living with a daughter in upscale Bal Harbour, and will not speak to the media until his case is resolved, McComb said.

Neither the Federal Bureau of Prisons nor the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics could say definitively that there are no prisoners as old as Facchiano currently incarcerated. But officials at both offices, as well as McComb, speculated that the 96-year-old was the nation's oldest alleged criminal.

"We don't have that information. We would need a database of every single prisoner incarcerated in the United States and we don't" have one, said Justice Department statistician Paige Harrison. She noted that less than half of 1% of the country's 1.5 million prisoners are older than 55 — the highest age category on which the department keeps statistics — "so if you start getting into 'older than 80' or 'older than 90,' you're talking about really, really small numbers."

If convicted, Facchiano, also known as "Chinky," could confront a prison sentence of as much as 60 years and fines up to $750,000, according to the federal prosecution statement issued at the time of his indictment. Even then, age alone isn't expected to be a factor in determining the length of time he serves.

"There are some jurisdictions that do compassionate releases based on illness, which may be coupled with the age factor," Harrison said. "But they're not going to release anyone simply because they're old."

Advocates of sentencing reform contend there would be little purpose in imprisoning a man of Facchiano's age.

"What benefit is society going to get from incarcerating an individual who is 96 years old? Does he demonstrate a threat to anyone? If the answer is no, the question is whether there are other means of addressing his sentencing other than prison," said Ryan King, policy analyst for the Washington-based Sentencing Project, a nonprofit group that urges alternatives to incarceration in cases with extenuating circumstances.

"If an individual is elderly and offers less of a threat of escape or other risks, he could be put in a lower-security facility" or allowed to serve his time under house arrest or electronic supervision, King added. "I'm not saying if an individual is found guilty, he shouldn't be given some sort of punishment — the question is, what kind of punishment is appropriate?"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

The End Of An Era For Marion County Schools (OCALASB)

By Joe Callahan, STAR-BANNER

Ocala (FL) Star-Banner, January 14, 2007

Officials expect longstanding desegregation order will end

OCALA - Marion County Public Schools likely will be released from a 28-year-old federal desegregation order Tuesday when they head back to the U.S. District Court in Jacksonville and ask that the order be lifted, according to the School District's attorney.

Department of Justice officials also will ask U.S. District Judge Harvey E. Schlesinger to give Marion County unitary status, meaning it will no longer be under the government's microscope, said Michael W. Kirk, the Washington, D.C.-based attorney representing Marion County.

There are 15,000 school districts in the country and fewer than 3 percent, or 280 districts, are still under court orders, including Marion County. Another 120 districts are affected by individual lawsuits.

Justice officials inspected area schools last year, and Kirk said they seem satisfied. He said Marion's public schools have complied with all requirements, including recruiting minority teachers, balancing of race in schools and stopping student and teacher transfers.

The Justice Department did not return calls for comment.

Kirk said he believes Schlesinger will uphold the school district's request. Tuesday's 10:30 a.m. hearing may only last a few hours.

Kirk said many statistics show progress and an independent review by the Star-Banner indicates Marion County ranks second out of medium-sized Florida school districts (25,000-49,999 students) in the ratio of minority students per minority teacher.

Only Leon County, which had a ratio of 1 minority teacher per 79.3 minority students, was better than Marion County's 93.4, which is roughly the state average.

"That just shows you the effort they have made," Kirk said.

The federal lawsuit, first filed by the federal government in 1978, was modified in 1995 and again two years ago when Marion failed to prove it was in compliance.

The school system has not reached the required 25 percent minority makeup of faculty. However, Justice officials recognize that minorities tend to go to larger districts for better pay.

Minority teachers now total 19 percent of the faculty, which is 50 percent greater than the state average in similar-size districts.

Even during a time when there is an overall teacher shortage, recruiters were still able to sign up 105 new minority teachers for this school year, or 23 percent of all hires.

The court order also required that all elementary school faculties be within 5 percentage points of the 25 percent goal and secondary schools be within 10 percentage points.

Of the 43 schools, all but six met the goals in March, and all the schools were within 15 percentage points of the overall goal.

When it comes to students, 22 of 27 elementary schools, eight of nine middle schools and all high schools were within the racial balance criteria.

The schools not meeting the goals fall under court exemptions because the schools are considered rural or have been affected by demographic shifts.

Diana Greene, the school system superintendent in charge of making sure conditions of the desegregation order are met, said she is pleased with the progress.

"Everything has been done," said Greene, adding it will be up to the school administration and School Board to make sure they stay on the road after they are declared unitary.

School Board member Sue Mosley said many parents, students and teachers have been affected by the desegregation order, especially when it comes to transfers.

"We have done everything we have been asked," Mosley said. "It will be great when we are lifted out from underneath this."

School Board officials know, however, that they will have to continue operating as if the desegregation order is still in effect. But the lifting of the order will mean some freedom.

"It will finally give us back our autonomy," School Board member Kurt Kelly said. "When it comes right down to it, we will continue in good faith to maintain the intent of the order."

Ron Crawford, the senior Marion County School Board member and chairman, said he is pleased that the order that has been hovering over Marion County is almost gone.

"It's something that has been with us since I started on the board eight years ago," Crawford said. "I am glad this was completed under my watch."

Retired Dunnellon High School Principal Bobby James, however, said that even though Marion County may get unitary status more work still needs to be done.

James, who launched his career in the 1971-72 school year, said he believes school administrators need to make a concerted effort to recruit a proper balance of qualified minority students into honors or advanced placement courses.

"If you really want to truly know if you have an integrated school system, then look at the racial balances in these honors courses," he said. "There are very few blacks or other minorities for that matter. These classes tend to be for the wealthy white kids. That is one area that needs to be looked into."

Crawford said he wasn't aware of such imbalances and urges anyone with concerns to address the School Board.

Meanwhile, Marion Lenon, who retired as an assistant principal at Fort King Middle School last May, remembers when he started teaching in 1971-72 school year.

Lenon was one of the first black teachers to experience integration, an experience he will never forget. Back then, he was assigned to a predominately white middle school.

Lenon, who has seen the school system grow throughout the years, saluted Superintendent of Schools Jim Yancey and Greene for their work in hopes of getting the order removed.

"Mr. Yancey and Diana Greene did an excellent job in stepping up and getting this resolved," Lenon said. "You can't blame them for something that happened that long ago. In fact, they are the ones who wanted to fight to get this off our shoulders."

From 1983 to 1995, not much was done to comply with the desegregation order. Then in 1995, U.S. Justice officials brought Marion County back to court.

But still, not much headway was being made.

When Jim Yancey became superintendent in 2003, he made meeting the conditions of the desegregation order a top priority, and he assigned Greene the job of spearheading the oversight.

"I really do feel we should have been released from the order in 2003," Yancey said, adding the numbers are basically the same now as back then. "We will be glad to get unitary status."

Reports: Reviews Rarely Find Fault With Police Use Of Force (AP)

AP, January 14, 2007

Internal reviews and grand jury investigations rarely find fault with police officers who fire their guns or otherwise use force in making arrests, newspapers in Cleveland and Columbus reported.

Departments rarely involve outside reviewing agencies and records often reveal only scant details about the incidents, The Columbus Dispatch and The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer reported on Sunday.

All 4,427 uses of non-deadly force by Cleveland police were ruled justified in a nearly three-year period from 2003 through last September. One case involving an off-duty officer using pepper spray was deemed "inappropriate" but justified, The Plain Dealer reported.

The investigations were done by district supervisors who directly oversee the officers involved - a practice that the U.S. Justice Department warned the city in 2002 could create a conflict of interest.

The Dispatch reviewed 112 police shootings in Columbus from 1996 through 2005. Of those, six ended with rulings that officers violated department policy. One was fired. Franklin County grand juries independently reviewed only the 25 shootings that resulted in deaths. Most 2006 cases are still under review.

The newspapers noted either missing records or a dearth of public information.

About 30 percent of the cases reviewed by The Plain Dealer - after making a database from 238,000 electronic records and 2,000 paper ones including arrests, use of force reports and citizen complaints - were incorrectly logged or had missing records. The department itself was not analyzing data or tracking which officers used force most often.

"How do you look for patterns or trends if you're not even paying attention to it?" said Geoffrey Alpert, who studies law enforcement at the University of South Carolina.

The newspaper said Patrolman Martin Rudin used non-deadly force in 36 incidents, or 12 percent of his arrests over the 44 months reviewed - and the most among the department's 1,600 officers. Rudin also was involved in three shootings from 1990 to 2004. One shooting killed the suspect.

Rudin said he patrols dangerous areas overnight and follows department rules. The police union also defended his record.

"In a perfect world, bad guys would stop and put their hands behind their backs," said Steve Loomis, president of the Cleveland Police Patrolmen's Association. "The reality is they don't. They run, they fight, they spit, they shoot."

Cleveland Police Chief Michael McGrath has ordered officers to keep complete and accurate records and start analyzing data to look for officers who most frequently use force and attract complaints. Police officials also said they would simplify the form officers use to report incidents so fewer mistakes are made while entering data.

Columbus police say the few cases of unjustified shootings show good training for the city's 1,870 officers. Police say suspects threatened officers with a weapon or vehicle in 85 percent of the shootings.

However, the department routinely keeps secret all but the most basic details of the shootings, the Dispatch reported.

Officer James Scanlon, who was involved in two shootings in the 10-year period reviewed, said the department should release more information. He said friends and relatives of the suspects often fill in the gaps with rumor, and officers already under stress then face criticism without a public response from their bosses.

"The brass could be more proactive by coming out with enough to counter some of the misinformation, a few facts that would indicate the officers did what they had to do," Scanlon said. "The facts are always going to benefit us."

Fred Gittes, a Columbus civil-rights attorney and frequent police critic, said a citizen commission to review officers' use of force would boost public confidence.

"Police policing the police doesn't work very well," he said. "And a grand jury isn't a substitute for an independent review. It's all done in secret."

In Cincinnati, where a police slaying of an unarmed black man in 2001 triggered rioting, the department has agreed to use a court-appointed outside monitor to review its traffic stops and use-of-force policies as part of a 2002 settlement of a racial profiling lawsuit.

Cleveland Police Always Justify Using Force (CLPD)

DOJ_NMG_0116853

By Gabriel Baird, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 14, 2007

Cleveland police supervisors reviewed 4,427 incidents in which police used non-deadly force in the last four years and determined the officers were justified in every case.

The only way police could rule that every single use-of-force incident was justified, some experts said, was to rubber-stamp rather than to investigate them.

Dennis J. Kenney, a professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York who specializes in police use of force, said that either Cleveland's officers are unbelievably well-trained or their investigations are cursory.

His opinion echoed criticism the U.S. Department of Justice leveled against Cleveland police. In 2000, the Justice Department opened an investigation into whether the city's police routinely violated citizens' constitutional rights.

After two years of investigating, they found widespread problems with police guidelines for using force and investigating these incidents.

The chief of the Justice Department's Special Litigation Section lambasted Cleveland police in a 2002 letter, questioning "the competency, thoroughness, and impartiality of use of force investigations."

To avoid the possibility of federal sanctions suffered by other cities, Cleveland police promised improvements.

"The Division of Police made the changes the Department of Justice asked us to make," Chief Michael McGrath said. "They decided we took the appropriate steps."

Still, more than four years later, many of the problems persist.

'Shots Fired' (COLDISP)

By John Futty, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, January 14, 2007

Columbus police are stingy with records of police shootings, but reports indicate officers who pull the trigger almost always get it right

Columbus police officers who shoot someone are almost always justified in the eyes of their supervisors.

Most 2006 cases, including two in November in which officers killed suspects, are under review. In 112 shootings from 1996 through 2005, six officers violated division policies, according to records reviewed by The Dispatch. One was fired.

None of the 153 officers was charged with a crime. The 25 shootings that resulted in deaths were reviewed by Franklin County grand juries; nonfatal shootings are rarely reviewed independently as in some other cities.

Police brass say the dearth of unjustified shootings reflects good training and restraint by the city's 1,870 officers. But few people, even within police ranks, know case details or how often officers are cleared because the division is so secretive. It routinely withholds all but basic details. Even officers' names are usually not disclosed until a day or two after the incident.

The division can take years to fulfill simple records requests. To conduct this study, The Dispatch filed its first request for public records more than 2½ years ago.

"I don't believe they are saying enough," said Officer James Scanlon, who was involved in two shootings during the decade and a fatal shooting in 1991, all as a member of the SWAT team. "There is a void."

An analysis of the 112 officerinvolved shootings from the past decade found little evidence to refute that most were justified. The review identified only four cases in which officers fired at a suspect under the mistaken impression that the person was armed. All were ruled justified.

Deadly-force expert Tom Aveni said that statistic "would suggest to me that they are better than the national average. I'd have to say they're doing something right."

Too often, Scanlon said, the information void is filled by misinformation and criticism from friends and relatives of those shot by police. Officers, often traumatized by the experience, face additional stress when they are second-guessed by the public without response from police officials, he said.

"The brass could be more proactive by coming out with enough to counter some of the misinformation, a few facts that would indicate the officers did what they had to do," Scanlon said. "The facts are always going to benefit us."

Lack of information is one of the biggest frustrations for relatives of those who die in police shootings, said Fred Gittes, a Columbus civil-rights lawyer.

"They are desperately trying to piece things together, but they are operating in the dark," he said. "The police don't even tell the family as much as they tell (the media)."

DOJ_NMG_0116854

Officer Jim Gilbert, a 10-year veteran who was involved in a fatal shooting in 2000, was elected president of the local police union last month with a campaign pledge to be a more vocal supporter of officers.

"It is up to the union to step up and speak for the officers involved because the division has shown they're not going to do it," said Gilbert, who heads Fraternal Order of Police Capital City Lodge No. 9.

Deputy Chief John Rockwell said police administrators have no choice but to limit the information released while an officer-involved shooting is under investigation.

"It's a dilemma for us. We want to get information out as quickly as possible, to put people at ease," he said, "but there are concerns about jeopardizing the case."

In response to Dispatch questions raised during interviews for this story, the division began issuing news releases last month to report the outcome of its investigations of officerinvolved shootings.

Similar questions prompted Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien to say that his office, which presents all fatal officer-involved shootings to a grand jury, will issue news releases to announce grand-jury decisions.

Other communities do more. In Denver, which boasts of the most-open officer-involvedshooting protocol in the country, the district attorney reviews police shootings that injure or kill someone and then issues a letter explaining the case and whether charges will be filed. After an internal investigation, the Denver public-safety manager issues a more detailed report and says whether the shooting followed policy.

"We try to make the process as transparent as possible," said Chuck Lepley, first assistant district attorney. "It's for the protection of the officer as much as anyone."

In Columbus, police have been slow to respond to requests for information from past shooting investigations.

In August 2004, The Dispatch first asked to review the division's investigative files on police shootings, and it took 2½ years for the division to make available all files from 2003 and 2004.

The Dispatch also filed a series of public-records requests in search of a comprehensive accounting of the decade's shootings. Some records from the 1990s no longer exist, including many of the decision letters from the Firearms Board of Inquiry, which reviews shootings by officers.

Aveni, co-founder of the Police Policy Studies Center in Spofford, N.H., said most police officials distrust the news media and resist providing information about officerinvolved shootings.

"There is a mistaken belief that a lot of this stuff will be misconstrued, and that when it appears in the media, it will paint a negative picture of the way police use deadly force," he said.

"Just the opposite is true. Most studies show that the use of force is very judicious and very infrequent."

Deadly force appears to be a last resort for Columbus officers. In 2005, 17 officer-involved shootings occurred — the highest annual total of the decade. That year, one in every 68,548 Columbus police incidents resulted in officers firing shots.

Officers reported using force 2,957 times that year. They fired their weapons in less than onehalf of 1 percent of those cases.

The most fatal shootings by officers during one year in that decade was six, in 2000. That number was matched in 2006, but those cases, along with eight nonfatal shootings, were not included in the Dispatch review because several remain under investigation.

A majority of the people shot at by police during the decade were black, which is in line with the demographics encountered by officers investigating violent crime, officials said.

"High-crime areas have a high population of blacks," said Columbus Police Chief James G. Jackson, who is black.

Of the people shot at by officers during the decade whose identities were available through public records, 64 percent were black, 32 percent white, 2 percent Hispanic and 2 percent Asian.

Of the 25 who died, 12 were white, 11 black and two Hispanic.

Of the 153 officers involved in shootings during the decade, 88 percent were white. The police force is 86 percent white, the safety director's office says.

Sgt. Dana Winship, a firearms supervisor, said the division strives to provide firearms training for each officer four times a year. In addition to shooting at stationary targets and qualifying with their weapons annually, officers might be sent through a maze where they face pop-up targets that represent threats, other officers or innocent bystanders.

"It's all about decision-making," he said. "Once you have identified a threat, what is your next step? "

Whenever an officer shoots at someone, members of the division's Critical Incident Response Team investigate. The team of 10 experienced homicide detectives and two sergeants was created more than a decade ago.

"It used to be that some of these investigations were done by street lieutenants with very little experience and few resources," said detective James McCoskey, one of the team's founding members. "Some of those investigations got screwed up. We started talking about putting together our most senior investigators (to give) street officers the best investigations we can."

With oversight from the division's internal affairs bureau, the team interviews officers and all witnesses at the scene. Crime-scene and ballistic specialists investigate all shootings, and the coroner's office investigates deaths.

The result is an investigative packet that can number hundreds of pages and goes to the Firearms Board of Inquiry, which comprises three commanders. In fatal shootings, the packet first goes to the prosecutor's office for grand jury review.

Firearms Board members offer an opinion about whether the shooting followed policy. That opinion is reviewed by the officer's chain of command, with a deputy chief making the final decision.

Since 2000, the earliest year for which complete records are available, the average investigation has taken nearly seven months. One case from October 2005 is still being reviewed by the Firearms Board.

It's worse elsewhere. In Cleveland, where the city law director decides whether to file criminal charges, some cases languished so long that the mayor called in a special prosecutor last year to review five shootings, one of them 2 years old.

Columbus police officials say the length of their investigations results from a thoroughness that makes a cover-up unlikely.

"There is so much oversight by so many different units within the division, plus the coroner's office and the prosecutor's office when there is a death," said Paul Denton, a former Columbus police commander who became chief of the Ohio State University Police Department in November. "You'd have to have a large conspiracy to think that anyone could taint an investigation of that type."

Division policy permits officers to use deadly force when they "have reason to believe the response is objectively reasonable to protect themselves or others from the imminent threat of death or serious physical harm."

And case law gives officers much leeway when they shoot because of a perceived threat. The U.S. Supreme Court, in the 1989 Graham vs. Connor decision, ruled that police actions must be judged against how a reasonable officer would act under the same circumstances, "rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight."

A 1994 ruling by the 4 th Circuit Court of Appeals said the court "will not second-guess the split-second judgment of a trained police officer merely because that judgment turns out to be mistaken, particularly where inaction could result in death or serious injury to the officer or others."

Gittes, a frequent critic of police misconduct, conceded that most officer-involved shootings are justified.

"Other kinds of force are a much bigger problem," he said. "Officers are more willing to use other kinds of force because the consequences are not as serious."

He is among those who say a citizen-review commission is the only way to ensure public confidence in investigations of deadly force.

"Police policing the police doesn't work very well," he said. "And a grand jury isn't a substitute for an independent review. It's all done in secret."

Division and FOP leaders have opposed a citizen commission, and only a minority of City Council members have expressed interest in the idea.

"I believe it can be a useful tool if done the right way," said Councilman Kevin Boyce. "So far, there hasn't been the right proposal."

Scanlon said the current system is daunting enough that it likely causes officers to hesitate before pulling the trigger.

"In this day and age, the aftermath is in the back of the officer's mind," he said. "They know what they'll go through. You hope that officers put that out of their mind in a deadlyforce situation, but it's always there."

Rockwell said the restraint shown by officers who find themselves in potentially lifethreatening situations is difficult to measure.

"How many officers could use deadly force and don't? " he asked. "There is no statistic for that."

Revival Of Akaka Bill Planned (HSB)

By Richard Borreca

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, January 14, 2007

The congressman is optimistic about its passage with the new Democratic majority

WASHINGTON » U.S. Sen. Daniel Akaka will again seek passage of a native Hawaiian recognition bill possibly as early as this week, some seven months after a procedural defeat on the Senate floor.

Cheered by his new Democratic majority, Akaka was rounding up signatures of both new and old supporters last week. As soon as he gets what is a politically viable number, Akaka said, he will introduce the so-called Akaka Bill.

"I wanted to drop (introduce) it this week, but there were some members I wanted for co-sponsor," Akaka said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0116856

ON ASSIGNMENTHonolulu Star-Bulletin Capitol Bureau Chief Richard Borreca will be filing reports from Washington, D.C., all this week on Hawaii's congressional delegation as the new Democratic majority in Congress takes power.

Last year, Akaka had the backing of the Democrats, but was not able to get the 60 votes needed to stop a GOP filibuster of the measure and bring it to the floor for a vote.

Haunani Apoliona, Office of Hawaiian Affairs chairwoman, said, "It's good news that immediate introduction will be occurring."

She added: "We look forward to passage early rather than later in 2007. There's a lot at stake for the present and future of native Hawaiians."

Because it is a new piece of legislation this year, the Akaka Bill will have to go back to committee. Akaka said he is confident it will get a good reception at the Indian Affairs committee, because the new Democratic chairman, Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., "is excited about getting the bill passed."

Akaka's timetable is to have the Hawaiian recognition bill clear the Senate by as early as March. It would then have to be approved by the House before it could go to President Bush.

The measure has had a confusing legislative history since it was first introduced by Akaka and fellow Hawaii Democrat Sen. Daniel Inouye in 2000.

The bill, officially called the Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, would recognize native Hawaiians' status as an indigenous people, and establish a process for official U.S. recognition of a future native Hawaiian representative body.

Akaka said he is optimistic after six years of delays as the bill was rejected or stalled by GOP opponents, and then blocked by a last-minute letter of objections from the Justice Department last year.

"I would say we are better off, and we are in the majority. We will have a better chance working with the majority," Akaka said.

Last year, Akaka and the administration of Republican Gov. Linda Lingle, which also supports the bill, negotiated much of the summer to meet objections from the White House and the Justice Department.

To get the bill to the floor for a vote, Akaka and Lingle had agreed to a series of amendments, which legal consultants said wouldn't change the impact of the measure, but would make it palatable to the GOP administration.

Charles Wilkinson, a University of Colorado law professor, wrote last year that the proposed amendments would still accomplish the bill's purpose.

"Without question, the central thrust of the bill -- especially the overarching goal of establishing a sovereign native Hawaii government, recognized by the United States and assuming responsibility for the significant financial and land resources currently administered by state agencies -- remains completely intact," Wilkinson said in an opinion posted on the OHA Web site.

Opponents have said the Akaka Bill illegally discriminates in favor of one race and would not be constitutional, while supporters say the bill is about the former Hawaiian nation and not an ethnic group.

Akaka said his plan is to introduce a bill that incorporates the amendments, and that should be more convincing to opponents.

"The bill will include the substitute amendments that the Justice Department and the administration had concerns about," Akaka said in an interview here.

"I think the substitute amendments will show that they had a hand in this and they can't say it is unconstitutional because this bill indicates they just wanted some clarifications and they are in the bill," he said.

DEA Reportedly Wants 3 New Offices Along Border (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo, Express-News Border Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, January 14, 2007

LAREDO — Reports that the Drug Enforcement Administration has asked the Mexican government to approve new DEA offices along the border abound, but officials on both sides of the border are keeping mum on the details.

The DEA wants to expand its presence in Mexico by placing agents in offices in the border cities of Matamoros , Nuevo Laredo and Nogales , the Mexico City newspaper Reforma and the Houston Chronicle reported, citing anonymous officials.

“DEA has a very strong relationship with Mexican authorities, but any talk of new offices is premature,” agency spokesman Steve Robertson said. “No decision has been made yet.”

But privately, agents along the border are excited and are following the developments closely, a border law enforcement source said.

The proposed offices would cost about $4.5 million a year and would be staffed by five to seven people each, the Houston Chronicle reported.

If the plan is approved, it would place U.S. agents in an area plagued by drug-related violence for much of the past three years.

Matamoros and Nuevo Laredo are strongholds for the Gulf Cartel, and violence regularly flares up in the region as other criminal organizations battle for the same smuggling routes into the United States.

The DEA already has a large presence in Mexico, with offices in Mexico City, Guadalajara, Hermosillo, Mazatlan and Monterrey . According to the agency, it has 62 special agents, 19 intelligence specialists and two chemists in Mexico.

Citing Mexican diplomatic sources, Reforma reported the U.S. government's request was under review by the offices of Mexico's secretary of foreign relations and attorney general.

But officially, authorities have made no public comment about a request.

At an impromptu news conference in Mexico City on Monday, Mexico's secretary of foreign relations, Patricia Espinosa , said she had no information on the DEA request when asked about it, spokeswoman Amparo Hernandez said.

Hernandez declined to comment beyond what Espinosa told reporters.

News of the planned expansion coincided with a visit to Mexico by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales , who met with his counterpart, Eduardo Medina Mora , on Thursday.

In remarks after their meeting, Gonzales touted the need for expanded cooperation but didn't mention the request for more U.S. agents in Mexico.

“Clearly, Mexico and the United States have a shared responsibility to make our communities safer from the drug traffickers and criminals who are threatening our way of life,” Gonzales said. “Both Attorney General Medina Mora and I wholeheartedly agree that our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust if we are going to be able to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all.”

Once Its Star, Agent Assails ATF (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 14, 2007

Leaders dispute picture of a bureau run amok

Jay Dobyns is no stranger to dangerous adversaries.

Within days of becoming a sworn agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, Dobyns was taken hostage and shot during a Tucson sting operation.

A year later, he was run over by gangsters in a getaway car.

advertisement

Since then, he has gone undercover to bust bombmakers, murderers, drug dealers, gunrunners and prison thugs. Three years ago, he infiltrated the Hells Angels so completely that he was offered membership in the biker club.

Now, after nearly two decades of service, after being praised by ATF as a hero and earning national awards, the man known as "Jaybird" is battling his most formidable foe yet: his employer.

Dobyns, 45, is one of dozens of current and former agents to allege mismanagement and misconduct in the ATF, a federal agency responsible for enforcing America's gun laws and preventing terrorist bombings. More than a dozen lawsuits, administrative claims, grievances, ATF documents and letters to Congress reviewed by The Arizona Republic accused administrators of betraying their own field investigators and operatives out of arrogance or incompetence.

A 2006 inspector general's report also found that the agency was plagued by poor management and questionable judgment. The ATF director resigned amid the inspector general's investigation. But agents, lawyers and experts say problems persist, and if left unchecked, a troubled agency will continue to spin out of control.

"The public needs to know," said Kay Kubicki, a Detroit attorney and former agent who has represented about 25 ATF employees in cases against the bureau, winning half of them and obtaining settlements in some others. "This has a lot to do with homeland security."

Life undercover, under fire Jay Dobyns is a picture-perfect undercover man.

Tough and profane, he wears a pointy goatee and silver rings on all his fingers. He is heavily tattooed. And he keeps a dark wool cap pulled low to the brow.

All this, even when he is not trying to infiltrate the Hells Angels or take part in some sting operation.

Dobyns, among the most celebrated agents within the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, has lived on the edge from the beginning of his career.

In 1988, 10 days after getting his shield, Dobyns was part of a task force chasing an ex-con on foot. Near a Tucson trailer park, the felon took Dobyns hostage at gunpoint. The rookie agent was dragged into a car as other agents converged.

Dobyns described the incident in Angels of Death, a book published last year. He said it was clear he was going to be killed if he let the crook drive away, and he preferred to die among friends. So he tried to escape and took a bullet in the back as the criminal was gunned down.

"I was lying on the desert thinking, 'I got shot before I even got my first paycheck.' "

Dobyns survived and, one year later, got into another shootout while on duty in Chicago. This time, as described in Angels of Death, he was working a sting on gunrunners. As the takedown began, two suspects leaped into a car and drove directly at Dobyns.

He opened fire, wounding the driver. But Dobyns was still knocked through the air - and back into the hospital.

Claims of abuse In grievances filed with the ATF, Dobyns claimed the agency failed to protect him when he was threatened in the line of duty and then harassed him when he complained about the lack of security. He has submitted a multimillion-dollar claim alleging the bureau ignored death threats against him and his family.

According to a grievance Dobyns filed in May, ATF administrators sought to undermine his credibility by spreading false allegations that he was psychologically unfit for duty and a danger to himself or others. Dobyns alleged in that 83-page record that he was subjected to unwanted transfers, denied security, accused of fraud and blocked from getting a Medal of Valor.

In internal probes, the ATF has dismissed most of Dobyns' complaints.

Dobyns' allegations were lodged first in ATF grievances, followed by complaints to the Justice Department's Inspector General's Office, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and members of Congress. According to those filings, the conflict escalated as Dobyns challenged bosses, complaining up the chain of command.

Other bureau employees, some of whom have similar problems with the ATF, say Dobyns' transformation from hero to scapegoat is just one example of mismanagement that pervades the agency.

ATF Acting Director Michael J. Sullivan declined to speak about Dobyns' complaints, related investigations or allegations about the agency but said he believes the bureau is "working very hard to carry out a mission on behalf of the American people."

Sullivan believes no other federal law enforcement agency provides taxpayers with a greater return per agent when it comes to arrests and convictions. Field agents, he said, make that possible.

Their security "should be one of our highest priorities," Sullivan said. "This is their agency. . . . If there are things that aren't working well, we should know that and do everything we can to correct it."

But Kubicki claimed managers routinely abuse their authority and are more interested in self-promotion than ATF's mission. "There's a saying in ATF: 'Big cases, big problems. Little cases, little problems. No cases, no problems,' " she said. "But you're supposed to do big cases in the federal government."

Others say the ATF, with about 5,000 employees and a $980 million budget, is foundering due to ethical failures, rogue investigations, spending abuses and decaying morale.

Vincent Cefalu of Modesto, Calif., a 20-year agent with grievances pending, recently sent a letter to Sullivan complaining about "unethical practices and widespread distrust."

Cefalu accused administrators of "wasting thousands of man-hours and millions of dollars" because internal investigations are mismanaged.

Billy Queen, a former agent who wrote Under and Alone, a book about his infiltration of the Mongols biker gang, said he retired in 2003 after enduring four years of harassment from ATF administration. Queen said he still loves the bureau but believes it is beleaguered by incompetent bully managers.

Such criticisms are supported, at least in part, by the government. A 173-page inspector general's report faulted former ATF Director Carl Truscott, who resigned in August, for misconduct.

Among the conclusions: Truscott overspent on a lavish new headquarters, improperly used employees to help with his nephew's high school documentary and squandered resources on a personal protection team. Perhaps more telling than that behavior, according to the report, was Truscott's dishonesty and finger-pointing when confronted.

The inspector general's probe was prompted by an anonymous letter written by midlevel managers at the ATF, assailing their boss. In the aftermath, line agents wrote a second letter saying those supervisors were equally guilty of mismanagement.

The condemnations are hardly new. In a blistering 1995 report, Time magazine described the ATF as "the most hated federal agency in America . . . a divided and troubled agency far more likely to abuse the rights of its own employees than those of law-abiding citizens." The overall finding: The ATF's in-house scandals and abuses impaired its law enforcement mission.

ATF missteps Last month, Dobyns' attorney, James B. Reed of Phoenix, filed a $3.3 million claim, preliminary to a lawsuit, with ATF headquarters.

Reed wrote that Dobyns was damaged by over 50 acts of "mismanagement, retaliation, harassment and defamation."

DOJ_NMG_0116859

An 83-page grievance submitted in May to Edgar Domenech, ATF deputy director, said the problems started after a series of murder plots against Dobyns by the Hells Angels and other criminal outfits.

The grievance said that after the threats came in, the ATF's Office of Operations Security prepared a risk analysis, placing the danger level at "critical." A list of safety measures was drawn up. Yet, according to Dobyns' filings, administrators disputed the danger and denied protections.

"The ATF Field Division was clearly aware of threats," Dobyns wrote in his grievance. "This apathetic attitude . . . is, at a minimum, malfeasance of their office and a dereliction of their duties."

In one instance, Dobyns claimed, the ATF failed to warn him that a prison inmate had discussed plans to kill him and torture his teenage daughter.

"I have served ATF faithfully for over 19 years," Dobyns wrote. "For this, I have been subjected to a calculated attack by members of ATF management."

In a Nov. 20 letter to Dobyns marked, "Notice of grievance decision," Domenech said "many parts of ATF failed to maintain open and effective communication with you" regarding threats. He also acknowledged "significant issues in carrying out appropriate risk assessment procedures."

Despite that, Domenech concluded, the mistakes were unintentional, and the bureau had "implemented new policies and procedures to redouble its efforts in this regard."

"Therefore," Domenech said, "the personal relief that you seek . . . hereby is denied."

Dobyns, now on leave from the bureau, declined to publicly discuss details of his case beyond an e-mail statement:

"I have been honored to serve ATF. . . . Unfortunately, a wide gap has evolved between the management of the bureau and its front-line field agents. I have high hopes that our new acting director will be able to close that gap."

"I am now a man without a country," Dobyns added. "I am up against the crime syndicate that I infiltrated and the agency that abandoned me. . . . My family lives in fear."

Sheree Mixell, an ATF spokeswoman, said the bureau does not discuss pending investigations or personnel issues. But she noted that in a 2004 survey by the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, the ATF finished first among federal law enforcement agencies in employee satisfaction.

Bureau's star player For most of his life, Jay Dobyns seemed comfortable living on the edge.

At the University of Arizona, he was a star wide receiver, featured on the cover of the Wildcats team program in 1984.

After playing briefly in the Canadian league and now-defunct World Football League, Dobyns looked for an alternative career. Miami Vice lured him into law enforcement, and he chose the ATF because of its Gonzo-style investigations.

Over 18 years, Dobyns, tough, frenetic and profane, worked the Oklahoma City bombing case and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He captured a Mexican drug-cartel kingpin, busted Aryan Brotherhood gangsters and bought hand grenades from the Mexican Mafia.

Finally, he infiltrated the Hells Angels in the Arizona case known as Operation Black Biscuit. Dobyns and several other operatives went underground for 21 months in one of the ATF's largest undercover investigations. It resulted in the indictment of 16 members and associates of the biker club.

But a strange thing happened once the charges got into court. ATF agents and federal prosecutors turned on one another.

Explanations are conflicting. By one account, ATF agents failed to tell the U.S. Attorney's Office about key evidence and informers. By another, prosecutors received the materials but withheld them.

Either way, the case collapsed last year. Most Arizona defendants were set free. The government dropped its key charge that the Hells Angels club is a racketeering enterprise. A Las Vegas trial ended with ignominy when the Hells Angels claimed victory.

ATF embarrassment grew.

And accusations about mismanagement in the agency mounted.

Amid the turmoil, a key informer named James "Pops" Blankenship went public, telling The Arizona Republic that Black Biscuit was a rogue operation. His allegations were followed by a $1 million lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court two months ago, claiming the ATF endangered his life, ruined him financially and misled him about the government's witness protection program.

The bureau has not responded.

Living in fear Today, Blankenship is in hiding and at odds with the ATF.

Dobyns has moved his family and taken an alias. His damage claim listed a new threat allegedly issued by a Hells Angels member awaiting trial for murder. The claim said the inmate wrote jail mail to an associate describing how Dobyns could "end up getting AIDS from a dirty needle and die a slow miserable death . . . (or) he will get a bad dose of steroids, send a blood clot to his brain, have a stroke and be (expletive) retarded." There was also graphic wording about how Dobyns' wife could be tortured.

The damage claim said ATF supervisors learned of that threat just days before Domenech promised reforms yet failed to react appropriately.

"This letter is not mere musing by an incarcerated suspect," wrote Reed, Dobyns' attorney. "(The inmate) has demonstrated the ability, willingness and resources necessary" to have the acts carried out.

"For an agent who time and again placed his safety and life on the line for his agency, the failure of ATF to take protective measures on that agent's behalf against known, specific and credible threats from known criminals is unacceptable."

Life undercover, under fire Jay Dobyns is a picture-perfect undercover man.

All this, even when he is not trying to infiltrate the Hells Angels or take part in some sting operation.

Evangelical Christians say the issue of illegal aliens in the United States often creates a conflict between their allegiance to the Gospels and their loyalty to the government.

"On one hand, they really want to minister to people, but on the other hand, [illegal aliens] have broken the law -- and that's a problem for people," said John Clifford Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Several conservative Christian groups sent a letter Monday to President Bush asking that his plan to resolve the immigration crisis include strong border security, amnesty for illegals who are related to U.S. citizens and already are in the country and an end to birthright citizenship.

"Whether this will attract majority support among evangelicals remains to be seen," Mr. Green said.

Most evangelicals agree that something needs to be done.

"There's a general acknowledgment that the current system is broken and needs fixing," said the Rev. Richard Cizik, vice president for governmental affairs of the National Association of Evangelicals, an umbrella organization of about 45,000 conservative churches representing about 30 million people. "Our population is growing by leaps and bounds -- often by illegal immigration -- at the expense of those who want to legally enter the country, and that's not right."

The Wheaton, Ill.-based association issued a resolution last October citing the need for secure borders but calling for "immigration reform that reflects human dignity, compassion and justice."

The resolution also cites passages from Scripture admonishing Christians to minister to all people.

"Most evangelicals are caught in between wanting to have responsible border policy with compassion for the alien," Mr. Cizik said. "It makes coming up with a fair balance here very difficult."

At issue, said Mr. Green of the Pew Forum, is a discord between public policy and private action.

"Some evangelicals say, 'We're in favor of stricter law enforcement, but we're not going to turn in people in our community,' " he said.

DOJ_NMG_0116861

Evangelical Christians also have close ties to the Hispanic community in the United States.

"Evangelicals have had so much success evangelizing among immigrants that they have a real sympathy with those communities," Mr. Green said.

Hispanics are one of the fastest-growing segments of evangelical Christianity in America because of high conversion rates in the United States and Latin America and high birthrates among Hispanic evangelicals, said Gaston Espinosa, an assistant professor of religious studies at Claremont McKenna College in California.

"The Latino evangelical community is much more sympathetic to immigration reform ... because a significant percentage of their community is undocumented," said Mr. Espinosa, a specialist on religious trends among Hispanics. "They don't support any sort of proposal that would send them over the border."

There's more consensus on immigration among other faith groups.

The Roman Catholic Church in America traditionally has supported immigrant-friendly policies.

The Virginia Catholic Conference, the lobbying arm of the Catholic dioceses of Arlington and Richmond, supports allowing children of illegal immigrants to attend Virginia's public colleges. The conference also supports localities that wish to establish day-laborer centers for immigrants.

"We provide for the immediate needs for the individual that presents himself or herself," Executive Director Jeff Caruso said. "If someone needs food or shelter, we don't screen for immigration status. We do what Christ asks us to do."

The Jewish Community Relations Council, the lobbying arm of the Jewish community in the Washington region, holds similar policy positions. The council opposes legislation that prohibits illegal immigrants from obtaining public social services.

"Most of our community in Washington can remember when grandparents or great-grandparents came over from Europe and the hostile reason for which they came over," said Debra Linick, a program director who handles Virginia legislation.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Newly In The Minority, G.O.P. Shows Signs Of Division On Iraq And Domestic Policies (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — After years of rock-solid party discipline and fealty to President Bush, Congressional Republicans have suddenly fractured in their new role as members of the minority, with some prominently deserting the White House on Iraq and others bolting from their leadership on popular domestic issues.

“We have got a lot of free agents,” said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, referring to the Republican backlash over the president’s proposal for a troop increase in Iraq.

Facing as much internal party dissension as he has seen since taking office, Mr. Bush invited Republican leaders of the House and Senate to his Camp David retreat this weekend to plot strategy only days after his plan for a troop buildup ran into scorching Republican resistance on Capitol Hill. While Republican unrest about Iraq was the most visible party division, others were starkly reflected in the ease with which House Democrats pushed through initial elements of their 100-hour legislative program with substantial Republican backing.

Only one House Republican opposed changes in ethics rules. Eighty-two Republicans joined Democrats in approving an increase in the minimum wage; 68 Republicans backed the new majority’s measure that puts into force remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission; 48 supported a return to pay-as-you-go budget rules, and 37 endorsed expanded embryonic stem cell research.

The numbers dipped a bit on Friday, when only two dozen Republicans voted with Democrats to allow the federal government to negotiate Medicare drug prices, an issue where Republican free-market ideology clashes with the Democratic vision of the role of government. But in the often-polarized House, crossing the aisle in such numbers on major legislation is rare.

Equally telling was a little-noticed procedural vote when more than 50 Republicans rejected their party’s alternative to the Democratic minimum wage legislation, normally a statement of party loyalty. “I thought it was a sham,” Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, said of his own party’s substitute.

The developments left many wondering whether recent days represented a permanent shift in the relationship between the White House and Congressional Republicans and a long-term weakening of party identity, or whether the combination of the magnitude of the war and the shock of losing the majority has only temporarily altered the terrain.

Democrats were bolstered by the turn of events. “I think we are where the majority of America is, and you are seeing that even on Iraq,” said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, who like other Democrats said rank-and-file Republicans were responding to the results from November.

"I think they recognize that the last election was a call for a new direction, and they don't want to get swept away by that," Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, a member of the Democratic leadership, said.

Leaders of both parties pointed to the president's poor poll numbers, the unpopularity of the war in Iraq and the pent-up demand for some of the legislative proposals pushed by Democrats as the explanation for the Republican splintering.

Representative Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference, said he expected some Republicans flirting with Democrats to return to the fold once the new majority got past its opening legislation and moved to tougher issues.

"The Democratic 'Six for '06' agenda was a very well-polled, message-tested agenda," Mr. Putnam said. "We are not surprised at the level of support they are finding. In past changeovers in Congress, people come in with a lot of momentum."

Mr. Putnam agreed, however, that Republicans were feeling much freer to express concern about Iraq. The harsh comments about the troop plan from well-known Republican critics like Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was one thing. But strong statements coming from less prominent Republicans who have been Bush loyalists were quite another.

"We don't need more American troops caught in the crosshairs of a civil war," Representative Ric Keller of Florida, a usually reliable Bush ally, said on the House floor Thursday night as he laid out his opposition to the troop buildup.

Representative Candice S. Miller, a party stalwart from Michigan, said in her response, "I am extremely hesitant to embrace the president's strategy at this point," citing the lack of a timetable for success.

Republican leaders in the House and Senate are still rallying to Mr. Bush. Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the minority leader, this week promised to vigorously fight Democratic efforts to bring up a resolution challenging the buildup even as he conceded the political damage the war has inflicted.

"I think the lack of progress in Iraq was the single biggest issue costing my party the House and the Senate," he said.

Mr. McConnell, one of those who was invited to Camp David this weekend, said they "discussed the need to find bold solutions for other big issues."

He and other Republicans believe their best chance is to keep the party as united as possible behind Mr. Bush in hopes of improving conditions in Iraq, while trying to maneuver Democrats into a position where they are caught between their opposition to the war and backing for troops.

It is not going to be easy. Republicans say the past election is looming large in the minds of lawmakers, with the next one looming even larger for some.

"People are probably still a little skittish from Nov. 7, and they are trying to sort through what the voters were telling us," Senator John Cornyn of Texas, a member of the Republican leadership, said. "Obviously people who are in re-election cycle, particularly in tough places in the country, are going to need a little flexibility."

The only comparable episode where Mr. Bush had encountered such rebellion in the ranks was over the administration's approval of a deal to turn over some American port operations to a Dubai company. The administration was forced to relent on that issue.

But Republican leaders have in the past been able to tamp down most discord, arguing that the fates of the president and Congressional Republicans were inextricably linked. And, particularly in the House, there was also a fear of retribution.

There were signs this week that the House Republican leadership was not going to tolerate too much dissension when two lawmakers known for challenging the party orthodoxy — Representatives Jeff Flake of Arizona, a critic of pork-barrel spending, and Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, a war opponent — were denied coveted committee slots.

And Republicans have been quietly building their own political case against Democrats, inserting policies popular with swing voters into their procedural alternatives, hoping to spring them later as 30-second advertisements.

Democrats have their own divisions, with some more liberal members of the party urging an aggressive push against spending on the Iraq war. Others view that as a political blunder that could threaten the majority. For now, the party seems willing to focus on symbolic votes against the buildup, leaving the money fight for later.

And leaving Republican leaders confronting the reality that nervous party members, uncertain of Mr. Bush's handling of the war and their own party's legislative appeal, are no longer so tightly bound to the cause.

"Everybody is scared spitless," Mr. Thune, the South Dakota senator, said.

House GOP Shows Its Fractiousness In The Minority (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

House Republican leaders, who confidently predicted they would drive a wedge through the new Democratic majority, have found their own party splintering, with Republican lawmakers siding with Democrats in droves on the House's opening legislative blitz.

DOJ_NMG_0116863

Freed from the pressures of being the majority and from the heavy hand of former leaders including retired representative Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), many back-bench Republicans are showing themselves to be more moderate than their conservative leadership and increasingly mindful of shifting voter sentiment. The closest vote last week -- Friday's push to require the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare -- pulled 24 Republicans. The Democrats' homeland security bill attracted 68 Republicans, the minimum wage increase 82.

"You're freer to vote your conscience," said Rep. Jo Anne Emerson (R-Mo.), who received an 88 percent voting record from the American Conservative Union in 2005 but has so far sided with Democrats on new budget rules, Medicare prescription-drug negotiations, raising the minimum wage and funding stem cell research. "Or, really, I feel free to represent my constituents exactly as they want me to be."

"Times have changed. I don't want to be someone who they say is too stubborn to change too," said Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose 92 percent conservative rating did not stop him from voting with Democrats on the homeland security and minimum-wage bills.

After their stinging defeat in November, Republican leaders in the House had gamely promised to draft procedural motions and parliamentary gambits that they said would split the new majority. With so many new Democrats hailing from moderate-to-conservative districts, even some Democrats saw the pledge as plausible.

In theory, Republicans have made good on their promises. Republicans argued vociferously against Democratic measures over the past two weeks, saying new deficit-control rules would guarantee tax increases, stringent homeland security measures would cripple commerce, and a minimum-wage increase would hurt the economy.

To counter the prescription-drug bill, GOP leaders drafted a parliamentary move that they said would ensure senior citizens' access to local pharmacists and the full panoply of prescription drugs. They tried to beat back the stem cell bill with a popular alternative, a ban on federal funds for human cloning. And they countered the minimum-wage bill with a motion to send it back to be redrafted to include tax breaks and health-insurance benefits for small businesses. On the minimum-wage bill, Republican leadership aides even offered a list of 25 Democrats they could pull over to their side.

The results? Eighty-two Republicans joined a unanimous Democratic front to vote to increase the minimum wage, while 54 Republicans voted against their leadership's counteroffer. Eighteen Republicans defied their leadership by opposing the parliamentary move against stem cells.

The homeland security bill -- designed to implement most of the remaining recommendations of the commission that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks -- even garnered the vote of Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the Homeland Security Committee last year, thwarted one of its central provisions, the screening of all shipping containers heading to U.S. ports.

Some Republicans, such as Reps. Todd R. Platts (Pa.) and Jim Ramstad (Minn.), sided with the Democrats on every major vote. But it was not just closet mavericks.

Last year, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio) was a powerful member of the Republican leadership, responsible for uniting her fractious colleagues behind a single message. After narrowly escaping defeat in November, the swing-district Republican bolted from her party's leadership last year. Last week, she virtually bolted from the party.

With just one exception, Pryce sided with the new Democratic majority on every major bill and rule change that came to a vote in the past two weeks, even voting against her party on a procedural vote, a move considered heretical in the years of GOP control.

The Democrats "deserve the same credit that we got in 1995," when Republicans took control, said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.). "They've picked up on the really big issues of the day, the ones they won the election on, and the ones that really resonate in Republican districts."

Democratic leaders say even they have been surprised by their margins of victory, but they were always counting on GOP votes. Republicans from swing districts who have been beat up for years over their party-line voting have been liberated by their minority status, said Rep. John B. Larson (Conn.), vice chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

"They've really been the ones that have been oppressed," he said.

GOP leaders were quick to dismiss the significance of the Democratic winning streak, however. For one thing, the Democrats' opening legislative blitz is being conducted under parliamentary rules that run roughshod over the Republicans, foreclosing any chance to actually amend the bills. But Democratic leaders have promised to give the GOP more latitude once the so-called 100-hours agenda runs its course next week.

For another, the Democrats will soon exhaust their carefully constructed opening list of bills that were designed to appeal across party lines.

DOJ_NMG_0116864

"Republican discipline was critically important when we were passing legislation and moving an agenda," House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said. "The Democrats will soon move from these issues that poll at 80, 90 percent to issues that really matter."

Conservatives See Validation In Fight Over "Pork" (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

Republicans sought to burnish their tarnished credentials as foes of pork-barrel projects last week, winning cheers from spending critics but a wait-and-see response from other conservatives and the party's grass roots.

"Like mosquitoes in a nudist colony, Republicans will have more than enough opportunities to show the voters we deserve our conservative brand back by fighting wasteful spending," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Texas, chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee. "Our voters are clamoring for us to fight on behalf of taxpayers."

Led by South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint, conservative Republicans overcame initial opposition from Democratic leaders to a broader definition of pork in a rules change that will require full disclosure from each lawmaker who sponsors so-called "earmark" provisions.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada had wanted a narrower definition of pork, which Mr. DeMint and his supporters said would have only applied to 5 percent of the billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending that Congress approves each year.

After Republicans, with the help of a handful of Democrats, beat back an attempt to table or kill the DeMint amendment, Mr. Reid refused to move to a final vote Thursday -- an attempt that triggered an outcry from Republicans and conservative bloggers.

When the smoke cleared Friday after a bitter two-day exchange of charges and countercharges, Mr. Reid agreed to an "earmark disclosure that is even stronger than what I had originally proposed," Mr. DeMint said.

It was a strategic victory for Republicans, who had lost the support of many fiscally conservative voters angered by the pork-ridden bills the Republican Congress enacted over the past several years. A number of Republican state chairmen said pork-barrel spending was one of the reasons behind the party's House and Senate losses in November's midterm elections.

"American citizens want to see earmarking come to an end, and now that they have to put their names to it, the real question is, will this stop earmarking? Have we really accomplished much?" said Ron Carey, chairman of the Minnesota Republican Party.

"I think it is going to take more than one specific action to show we are serious about getting back to our bedrock conservative principles," Mr. Carey said Friday. "While this is encouraging, we need to see consistent adherence to conservative values over a sustained period of time before we are going to declare that our Republican leaders have gotten back on track."

Former Pennsylvania Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the pro-tax-cut group Club for Growth, said it was "a solid first step, but by itself it is not enough for the Republicans to re-establish their credentials as fiscal conservatives."

"After all, this is just about disclosure," Mr. Toomey said. "It doesn't actually limit or prevent these kinds of earmarks. That will require the necessary follow-through by Republicans."

Former House Majority Leader Dick Armey, who heads Freedom Works, another conservative grass-roots group, was similarly dubious about what the disclosures would achieve.

"Democrats are not going to get into trouble because of this disclosure because of the public's disposition for pork projects in their Democratic districts. It may diminish Republican pork, but it will not result in any reduction in Democratic pork," Mr. Armey said.

A Discordant Chorus Questions Visions For A Bush Library At Southern Methodist (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 13 — With growing faculty unease over plans to enshrine President Bush's official papers and a policy institute at Southern Methodist University in Dallas, the process of creating the nation's 13th presidential library is off to a familiar start: discord.

On Thursday, 68 theologians, professors and other faculty members present and past, citing complaints about President Bush's "poor marks" on civil liberties, the environment, gay rights and the war in Iraq, sent the university president a letter questioning whether visions of the library were consistent with the school's religious and academic values.

"According to George Bush's closest associates, the half-billion-dollar endowment will be used by the institute to hire conservative scholars to agree to 'write papers and books favorable to the president's policies,' " said the letter calling for a campuswide dialogue on the affiliation.

Starting with Franklin D. Roosevelt, presidents have handed over their records and memorabilia for scholars and the public to study and to memorialize their administrations. But their ever more expensive, privately erected libraries, study centers and museums have been bedeviled by complex disputes over executive orders governing access to the material. Mr. Bush issued his own order in November 2001 that in part granted a former president the right to assert a privilege to keep certain records secret.

His legacy and Southern Methodist's role in preserving and advancing it is now a divisive issue at the 11,000-student university long identified with the Bushes, former residents of Dallas, who are Methodists. Laura Bush graduated from Southern Methodist and sits on the board of trustees.

After years of considering other university partners, a site selection committee announced on Dec. 21 that it was pursuing exclusive discussions with Southern Methodist for a library and museum, and a policy institute reporting not to the university but to a Bush foundation.

The location has not been announced but a likely site is a garden apartment condominium complex bought with a $35 million gift from Ray L. Hunt, a trustee and son of the oil magnate H. L. Hunt. The gift, though matching the largest ever given the university, was not announced at the time. Some evicted tenants have sued.

At a meeting on Tuesday, close to 150 faculty members raised concerns about the project and formulated what became 35 questions for the university president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship between the university and the Bush library and policy center. The questions included, "How would the institute affect the intellectual integrity of S.M.U.?"

Faculty members voiced concerns that the policy center and the university could merge roles, giving administration figures like Karl Rove an academic forum.

Others said security was an issue, a theme that the community has aired in letters to the editor and blogs.

In an e-mail message in December to Mayor Laura Miller of Dallas, Sam Boyd, a longtime neighbor of Southern Methodist, a trial lawyer and a former Green Beret in Vietnam, wrote: "Once completed the $500 million George Bush Library will become the number one (#1) US edifice terrorist target in the world."

A woman in Garland, Deborah Lewis, wrote The Fort Worth Star-Telegram that Dallas was already infamous for the assassination of President John F. Kennedy: "now it probably will be known for honoring the worst president ever."

Indeed the history of presidential libraries is replete with controversy. They are peculiarly American institutions, a vital scholarly resource, a 2004 study by the Center for Arts and Cultural Policy Studies at Princeton found. But it said they have also become "the accepted way to memorialize our presidents and promote an appreciation, some would say exaggeration, of their character, performance and legacy."

Over the years, through battles over the Watergate tapes and other revealing documents, presidents have issued executive orders to limit access to certain records, and to this day, scholars say, it is not clear what material is in the public domain and when.

In the case of Southern Methodist, Dr. Turner will address the faculty letter in an open spring faculty meeting next Wednesday, said Brad Cheves, vice president for development and external affairs.

"It's a call to dialogue," said Mr. Cheves, noting that the signatories numbered less than 10 percent of the 609 active faculty members and 137 retired members. "We continue to believe that a strong majority of the university community is supportive of efforts to receive the museum, library and institute if we're so fortunate to be selected," he said.

The letter, sent by e-mail, was largely identical to an unsigned draft dated Dec. 16, 2006, which mysteriously popped up in university e-mails and was picked up by news organizations.

Susanne Johnson, associate professor of Christian Education at the Perkins School of Theology, a mainstay of the Methodist-owned university, said it had been her doing. The draft was on her computer screen, she said, when her dog climbed on the keyboard and hit "send." "I should have said my dog prematurely sent it but they wouldn't believe it," Dr. Johnson said. "I wouldn't take that excuse from my students."

In the signed letter resent Thursday, Dr. Johnson and her colleagues said there were "at least two irreconcilable visions" of the role of the library. One held it to be "a neutral space" where scholars would pursue "nonpartisan, academic inquiry into his presidency."

"In another vision, the library will be a partisan space," the letter continued. "Going by various terms, such as conservative think tank, institute or policy center, the library will hire conservative scholars to pursue a partisan agenda in favor of the president's policies and programs."

The letter-writers argued for a nonpartisan approach but said they wondered if it could prevail given news accounts of Mr. Bush's affinity for a conservative policy center along the lines of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, which has had a rocky relationship with its liberal-leaning host, Stanford University in California.

Citing an article in The New York Daily News quoting associates of the president calling for an institute to "spread the gospel of a presidency that now gets poor marks," the letter continued:

"The 'poor marks' come from those Americans who question the wisdom of certain attitudes and actions of President Bush during his term in office. Among things they've so named: erosion of habeas corpus, denial of global warming, disrespect of international treaties, alienation of longtime U.S. allies, environmental predation, disregard for the rights of gay persons, a pre-emptive war based on false premises, and other perceived forms of disrespect for the created order and global community."

She and a Perkins colleague, the Rev. Bill McElvaney, professor emeritus of preaching and worship and a former president of the United Methodist Seminary in Kansas City, Mo., first raised questions about the library in an op-ed article last November in the student paper, The Daily Campus. They asked: "Do we want S.M.U. to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad public opinion?"

While many faculty members said they had no problem with a library, Dr. McElvaney said in an interview, "I happen to be concerned about both; either one gives us a permanent Bush presence on our campus."

In convening Tuesday's faculty meeting, Rhonda Blair, president of the faculty Senate and a professor of theater, credited the "thoughtful and challenging" op-ed article of Dr. Johnson and Dr. McElvaney with generating the discussion.

But Dr. Turner in a letter to faculty, staff and students on Jan. 5 made no mention of the two theologians and said that through the Bush library, museum and institute "visiting scholars and dignitaries will be available for interaction who otherwise would not be in residence and accessible to our campus community."

With the Lyndon B. Johnson Library at the University of Texas in Austin and the George H. W. Bush Library at Texas A&M in College Station, if Southern Methodist were chosen for a library, Dr. Turner said, "it would be part of a historic triumvirate of presidential resources in Texas."

The House That Jack Built (NYT)

By Norman J. Ornstein

The New York Times Book Review, January 14, 2007

Like the spot on Lady Macbeth's hand, the Jack Abramoff scandal can't be washed away. Abramoff was sentenced to five years and 10 months on fraud charges, former Representative Bob Ney is scheduled to begin his two-year-plus prison term, former DeLay staff members Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy and Ed Buckham await their sorry fates (as does Tom DeLay himself) and several other miscreants, including lawmakers, staffers and top administration officials, are praying that the continuing, aggressive investigation by prosecutors will pass them by.

But the revelations are far from over. The House Government Reform Committee reported in late September that Abramoff's billing records showed a robust 485 contacts between Abramoff and his lobbyist team and key White House officials, including 10 or more direct contacts between Abramoff himself and Karl Rove. Subsequently, Rove's top assistant, Susan B. Ralston, who had worked for Abramoff and who accepted a number of high-priced tickets to concerts and sporting events from him while she was in the White House, resigned. Meantime, David Safavian, the former White House chief of government procurement (and Abramoff aide), who had been convicted of false statements and obstruction of justice, was sentenced last October to 18 months in prison.

In the 37 years I have been in Washington, I have known hundreds of lobbyists, including a few (or more) who were shady characters, a number who were empty suits, some who were legends in their own time and many others who were savvy insiders and integral (and constructive) parts of the policy process. None were quite like Jack Abramoff. As the subtitle of "Heist" suggests, Abramoff was a "superlobbyist," a larger-than-life figure who made a fortune while having an outsize impact on politics in Washington and an outsize ego in a town of superegos. He loved to flaunt his wealth and influence. He rose rapidly and fell hard.

Abramoff began his career as an officer in College Republicans, a training ground for future party operatives, where he built enduring relationships with conservative powerhouses like Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed (and where he met Karl Rove). He behaved so badly in that job — his politics were confrontational, his financial practices questionable — that he was denounced and repudiated by Rich Bond, then the chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Abramoff was unfazed. He quickly found his niche in the lobbying world, beginning as a front man for the apartheid regime in South Africa and moving on to represent such upstanding clients as sweatshop operators in the Marianas Islands before hitting the jackpot with Internet gambling companies, Russian energy magnates, and Indian tribes looking out for their casinos, among others. Soon his wealth was such that he opened two high-priced restaurants, started a foundation to support favored causes, bought several ultra-expensive skyboxes at sports stadiums and arenas in Washington, and became a major Republican donor.

How did Jack Abramoff, who earned a law degree but never practiced law, who had no feel for or experience with the legislative process, and who had no obvious area of expertise, become such a huge success? Simple. He was the right guy in the right place at the right time — jumping into the field in 1994, just as the Republicans took the majority in the House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years and eagerly sought to put their own people in positions of influence. A key to those desires was the K Street Project, an effort masterminded by Grover Norquist, Tom DeLay and Rick Santorum, among others, to place conservative Republicans in key positions in law firms, lobbying operations, trade associations and individual company offices. The K Street Project was not just an employment service — the goal was to get trusted people into jobs where they could use campaign cash to help Republicans stay in power while enabling them to live comfortably by sharing in the munificence of the moneyed interests.

The attitude of the new majority — to the victors go the spoils — meshed perfectly with Abramoff's style. Playing off his conservative, activist politics, his religious beliefs as an Orthodox Jew, his hyperaggressive approach to getting clients and his close relationships with Norquist, Reed and DeLay, Abramoff promised clients a direct link to the most powerful leaders in Congress and, subsequently, in the Bush White House. Eventually, he decided the traditional lobbying practice — charging, like law firms, by the hour — was for chumps. Instead, he demanded huge commissions that represented a cut of the enormous sums a big government could provide his clients. He then went a step further by channeling consulting contracts to associates like Scanlon for enormously inflated fees and splitting the profits through kickbacks.

Of course, the Republicans in power did not invent the idea of putting their own people into lobbying jobs, working out sweetheart relationships with interest groups, conducting shakedowns for campaign cash or parlaying influence into high-priced jobs for themselves when they left office. But the scope and brazenness of Abramoff and of the broader K Street Project were on a wholly different scale from what we had seen during the years Democrats ruled Washington — indeed, from anything in the last century.

If some of Abramoff's misdeeds were known to Washington insiders and reported over the years by regional news media — the Seattle papers when he lobbied for the Marianas for a Seattle-based firm, Preston Gates; The Miami Herald when he moved to buy the local SunCruz gambling boats — they were largely ignored in Washington until 2004, when The Washington Post jumped on the story. One long investigative piece in The Post, on Indian gambling, was the beginning of the end for Abramoff. Since then, there have been many excellent investigative pieces, and a devastating report from the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Now Peter H. Stone, a veteran reporter with The National Journal who has covered the Abramoff beat for the past two years, has written a short, concise and lively book pulling the Senate findings and the media reporting together to chronicle Abramoff's career and misdeeds.

"Heist" is a one-stop shop for anyone wanting to know what this scandal is all about, why the fuss has been so substantial, what made Abramoff tick and how he succeeded. It follows on the heels of another book that set out some months earlier to do the same thing, "The K Street Gang" by Matthew Continetti of The Weekly Standard. There is substantial overlap, naturally, between the two books, with Continetti providing more detail and Stone a more contemporaneous and concise account.

Both books will make the average reader, even one sophisticated in the ways of Washington, want to take a shower. Of all the miscreants we have had in our lifetimes in American politics — and we have had plenty — few have been more distasteful, amoral or outrageous than Abramoff and his cronies, including Scanlon, Buckham and Reed — not to mention his close friend Tom DeLay. To anyone who cares about our political institutions and their integrity, this story is simply revolting.

But for all the value of a concise account of their misdeeds, what "Heist" is missing is the broader context. Jack Abramoff was not a lone scoundrel — or one of a narrow band of individual scoundrels. He was part of an organized effort to transform Washington, to bend it to the will of one party, with the aim of creating a self-reinforcing loop, where a majority could use its clout to dominate all of Washington, work alliances with moneyed interests who would pay to get their way, provide campaign cash to keep their friends in power and benefit from the majority's policy largesse along the way.

This dynamic will not just disappear with the change in power. Democratic lobbyists are salivating at the prospect of new, huge fees. The candidates' shakedown of lobbyists for campaign cash began literally the day after the November elections. It will take a major reform effort, and steely resolve, to change a town virtually awash in money. We are still waiting for a full or definitive treatment of the new Gilded Age that Abramoff typified — although his own glory days may be over now that he has been sentenced to a long term in a federal pen.

Income inequality is on the rise. The rich are getting better at passing their advantages on to their kids. Lifestyle and values gaps are widening between the educated and uneducated. So the big issue is: Will Americans demand new policies to reverse these trends — to redistribute wealth, to provide greater economic security? Are we about to see a mass populist movement in this country?

Nobody was smarter on this subject than Seymour Martin Lipset, the eminent sociologist who died at 84 on New Year's Eve. Lipset had been a socialist in the hothouse atmosphere of City College during the 1940s, and though he later became a moderate Democrat, he continued to wonder, with some regret, why America never had a serious socialist movement, why America never adopted a European-style welfare state.

Lipset was aware of the structural and demographic answers to such questions. For example, racially diverse nations tend to have lower levels of social support than homogeneous ones. People don't feel as bound together when they are divided on ethnic lines and are less likely to embrace mutual support programs. You can have diversity or a big welfare state. It's hard to have both.

But as he studied these matters, Lipset moved away from structural or demographic explanations (too many counterexamples). He drifted, as Tocqueville and Werner Sombart had before him, to values.

America never had a feudal past, so nobody has a sense of social place or class-consciousness, Lipset observed. Meanwhile, Americans have inherited from their Puritan forebears a sense that they have a spiritual obligation to rise and succeed.

Two great themes run through American history, Lipset wrote in his 1963 book "The First New Nation": achievement and equality. These are often in tension because when you leave unequally endowed people free to achieve, you get unequal results.

Though Lipset never quite put it this way, the clear message from his writings is that when achievement and equality clash in America, achievement wins. Or to be more precise, the achievement ethos reshapes the definition of equality. When Americans use the word "equality," they really mean "fair opportunity." When Americans use the word "freedom," they really mean "opportunity."

Lipset was relentlessly empirical, and rested his conclusions on data as well as history and philosophy. He found that Americans have for centuries embraced individualistic, meritocratic, antistatist values, even at times when income inequality was greater than it is today.

Large majorities of Americans have always believed that individuals are responsible for their own success, Lipset reported, while people in other countries are much more likely to point to forces beyond individual control. Sixty-five percent of Americans believe hard work is the key to success; only 12 percent think luck plays a major role.

In his "American Exceptionalism" (1996), Lipset pointed out that 78 percent of Americans endorse the view that "the strength of this country today is mostly based on the success of American business." Fewer than a third of all Americans believe the state has a responsibility to reduce income disparities, compared with 82 percent of Italians. Over 70 percent of Americans believe "individuals should take more responsibility for providing for themselves" whereas most Japanese believe "the state should take more responsibility to ensure everyone is provided for."

America, he concluded, is an outlier, an exceptional nation. And though his patriotism pervaded his writing, he emphasized that American exceptionalism is "a double-edged sword."

Political movements that run afoul of these individualistic, achievement-oriented values rarely prosper. The Democratic Party is now divided between moderates — who emphasize individual responsibility and education to ameliorate inequality — and progressive populists, who advocate an activist state that will protect people from forces beyond their control. Given the deep forces in American history, the centrists will almost certainly win out.

Indeed, the most amazing thing about the past week is how modest the Democratic agenda has been. Democrats have been out of power in Congress for 12 years. They finally get a chance to legislate and they push through a series of small proposals that are little pebbles compared to the vast economic problems they described during the campaign.

They grasp the realities Marty Lipset described. They understand that in the face of inequality, Americans have usually opted for policies that offer more opportunity, not those emphasizing security or redistribution. American domestic policy is drifting leftward, but there are sharp limits on how far it will go.

A Living Wage We Can Live With (LAT)

By Robert Pollin

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

THE UNITED States appears ready to support a national living wage. Last week, the House of Representatives voted to raise the federal minimum wage in three steps to $7.25 an hour as of mid-2009. The Senate is expected to link the raise to tax breaks for business, but passage seems assured. And President Bush has said that he will sign legislation to increase the wage, which would be the first hike since 1997, when the current $5.15 minimum became law.

But Congress shouldn't stop there because $7.25 an hour is not close to a living wage. Adjusted for inflation, it would represent an increase of just about 4% from the current $5.15.

The political foundation of the move to raise the federal minimum wage was built by the living wage movement, which has organized and won victories throughout the country for more than a decade. In November's elections, voters in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio passed minimum-wage increases by wide margins. As of February, the minimum wage in 29 states and the District of Columbia, representing nearly 70% of the U.S. population, will exceed the current federal one.

Beyond this, more than 140 municipalities have some version of a living-wage law that mandates a wage from $9 an hour to $11 an hour.

The federal minimum wage peaked in 1968, when its value was about $9 an hour in today's dollars. Although average worker productivity has more than doubled since then, the wage has not kept pace. Typically, as productivity increases, hourly wages can rise without cutting into business profits.

Raising the federal minimum wage too high, or too rapidly, probably would discourage businesses from hiring low-wage workers, as many critics contend. But at what point would it be too high or too fast?

From 2001 to 2005, in the 11 states with minimum wages higher than the federal one, employment growth was slightly faster than in those states with the $5.15 minimum.

Studies on the effects of living-wage laws in L.A. and Boston, which require businesses that have city contracts to pay a certain wage, show that the affected firms continued to hire low-wage workers at basically the same rates as before the wage was implemented.

The story is similar in San Francisco and Santa Fe, N.M., even though their living wage laws have a broader application. In Santa Fe, where the law applies to all businesses with at least 25 employees, job growth in restaurants and hotels, which heavily employ low-wage workers, was 3.2% the year the law went into affect (mid-2004 to 2005).

The Santa Fe ordinance is a model for how Congress might move toward establishing a national living wage of between $9 and $11. It is set up to raise the minimum wage from $8.50 to $10.50 as of January 2008 in three steps. But before each scheduled increase, the city determines whether the previous hike hurt employment. For instance, the wage in Santa Fe reached $9.50 an hour in January only after the city established that employment growth under the $8.50 regime was healthy.

Congress could follow Santa Fe's lead by passing the current proposal, then follow up with legislation that would allow for increases every two years after 2009 if the higher wage did not negatively affect employment growth. The increase in 2011 could raise the federal minimum to $9 an hour, roughly today's low end in many cities.

Further increases could be tied to inflation and average labor productivity. If inflation and productivity trends of the last decade continue, this would translate into a 10% to 12% increase in the federal minimum wage every two years, to $10 an hour in 2013.

Yet even that wage probably would be inadequate in most of the country, so cities and states also would need to adjust their minimums to ensure a living wage. But the idea of raising the minimum wage in line with average productivity and inflation, after taking account of employment effects, should move the country closer to what more and more voters have demonstrated they support and what the economy can provide.

Bush's Proposal For Iraq Adds To '08 Intrigue (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — On Friday morning, as the capital was enmeshed in a debate over President Bush's decision to send thousands more troops to Iraq, no one was more obviously searching for an alternate plan than Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat and likely candidate for president.

Mrs. Clinton was airborne for Iraq, a visit that offered a platform to examine and perhaps alter her views on a war that she once voted to authorize but now criticizes. Asked in a telephone interview from Kuwait whether this trip might lead her to support setting a firm deadline for the withdrawal of all American troops, which would be a change in her position, she responded: "Those are questions that we'll be better able to answer later. Obviously I'll have more to say when I get back."

DOJ_NMG_0116870

Around the same time in Washington, Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican and likely candidate for president, threw the White House something of a lifeline during a Congressional hearing (which Mrs. Clinton herself was supposed to attend), vigorously defending Mr. Bush's decision.

"Potentially catastrophic consequences of failure demand that we do all we can to prevail in Iraq," Mr. McCain said.

As the politics of the war continue to shift, no prospective presidential candidates face more intensive scrutiny of their views or greater risk to their ambitions than Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton.

Long a proponent of sending more American forces into the fight, Mr. McCain now more than ever is linked to a war that has splintered his party and lost public support.

Viewed with suspicion by elements of her party because she has not explicitly repudiated her October 2002 vote authorizing military action against Iraq, Mrs. Clinton, who was in Baghdad on Saturday, has been trying to shore up her credentials as a critic of the war without exposing herself to charges of indecisiveness or flip-flopping of the sort that so damaged Senator John Kerry in his unsuccessful race against Mr. Bush in 2004.

More than any other single event in recent months, Mr. Bush's call for more troops has not only illuminated the positions taken by Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton and the differences between them, but it has also led the field of declared and prospective candidates circling them within their own parties to stake out more clearly defined positions on the war.

Among Republicans, a result has been a deep split suggesting that Mr. McCain will face challenges on the war from fellow Republicans long before he has to worry about Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats. Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts who had until this week declined to say whether he supported more troops, issued brief remarks supporting the president. Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, also supported it, comparing it to what he did in fighting crime as mayor.

But Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who is positioning himself as an alternative to Mr. McCain among conservatives, denounced Mr. Bush's plan, as did Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who like Mr. McCain is a Vietnam veteran but who long ago broke with the White House over its handling of the war.

Among Democrats, opposition to Mr. Bush's plan highlighted the political threat Mrs. Clinton faces from the left. John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina who voted for the war in 2002 but who, unlike Mrs. Clinton, later renounced his vote, sent an e-mail message to his supporters urging them to oppose Mr. Bush's action.

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who joined the Senate in 2005 and thus escaped the Iraq vote that has come to haunt Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kerry, used the platform of Senate hearings to lacerate the Bush Iraq policy and affirm his own opposition to the war.

Their actions offered an obvious contrast with those of Mrs. Clinton, who put out a measured statement opposing the troop increase but has stayed away from the Senate vanguard opposing Mr. Bush's latest strategy.

Still, none of the other potential 2008 presidential candidates have seen their ambitions complicated by the events this week as much as Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton have. Their responses to Mr. Bush's actions offered insights into their views on Iraq and the styles they would bring to a presidential campaign.

Mr. McCain embarked on a high-profile television tour announcing his support for Mr. Bush's move. In an interview, he said he would have preferred that the White House send in even more troops, and noted that he had pressed this position on the White House, unsuccessfully until now, for more than two years. It is a position that Mr. McCain and his advisers — and some other Republicans — said could end up destroying his presidential ambitions.

"Friends, advisers, enemies said this could be very damaging," Mr. McCain said. "I can't worry about that, and I'm not going to worry about that."

Some Republicans suggested that Mr. McCain's position could help him, albeit to a limited extent, among conservative Republican primary voters who have been wary of his view on social issues. And, as Mr. McCain's own remarks suggested, his stance fits neatly into his effort over the years to present himself as a politician given to candor even if it means telling voters things they do not want to hear.

Still, by any measure, support for the war could make things extremely difficult for Mr. McCain in a general election if the situation in Iraq does not improve and public opinion in the United States does not shift in favor of continued engagement.

Mr. McCain did not dispute the political risks entailed in the stance he had taken.

"The consequences of failure are more important than a political career," he said. "It could hurt me in a primary and it could hurt me in a general election. This could hurt me in history."

He said he was hopeful that this new Iraq strategy would work but did not know how long it would take, a crucial question in trying to gauge how central an issue this will be as the campaign engages.

In a hint of what next year could be like, Mr. Edwards has taken to calling the Bush proposal an endorsement of "the McCain doctrine," a description that Mr. McCain and his aides have gamely embraced.

"I was glad to see that Romney and Giuliani have come around to embracing the McCain doctrine, as John Edwards would say," said Terry Nelson, the head of Mr. McCain's presidential exploratory committee.

If Mr. McCain has flaunted his unpopular position, Mrs. Clinton has clearly kept a lower altitude as she tries to deal with a barrage of conflicting pressures. Unlike Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama, who were everywhere on television the night of Mr. Bush's speech, Mrs. Clinton simply issued a late-evening e-mail statement saying that based on what Mr. Bush had said, she did not support the increase.

Last year, Mrs. Clinton took a leading role in criticizing Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the secretary of defense, over his management of the war. Over the past two years, she has voted in favor of resolutions calling for a phased withdrawal of troops without setting fixed deadlines.

Even though Mrs. Clinton has never gone as far as Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kerry with a renunciation of her 2002 vote, she has subtly expanded her position recently in recognition, her advisers said, of how much that vote accounted for the resistance to her among some Democrats.

In a little-noticed interview on the "Today" show just before Christmas, Mrs. Clinton made a significant addition to her standard remark about the 2002 vote. Asked if she considered the vote a mistake, she responded: "Obviously if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote, and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way."

The last eight words are new for her.

Some Democrats suggested that Mrs. Clinton's trip this weekend was intended to give her an opportunity to move further away from that vote and against the president's policy.

"I will be spending time with the Iraqi leaders and sitting down and trying to get my own personal assessment of what their intentions are, what do they intend to do to take responsibility for their own security," she said in the interview. "If they're not going to step up and try to bring some stability and end the violence in Baghdad, I don't care how many troops the president sends — it's not going to be successful."

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. McCain have no doubt learned a lesson from Mr. Kerry's problems in 2004 when he appeared to switch his position on the war: that inconsistency may well prove to be a bigger political sin than taking a position out of step with the electorate. Mrs. Clinton's associates have expressed concern that if she tries to switch her views on the war, reflecting what her advisers said was concern, she would appear weak as she campaigned during a time of war to become the nation's first female president.

Defiant McCain Back As Maverick (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. John McCain has never spent much time worrying about what other people think.

Five and a half years as a prisoner of war in the nightmarish Hanoi Hilton liberated the Arizona Republican to speak his mind--and not to worry about offending colleagues who might be angry about his campaign-finance proposals, objections to pork barrel projects or crackdown on gifts and meals from lobbyists.

In the latter part of his political life, he has made that trait an almost singular virtue. He propelled his presidential campaign in 2000 aboard "The Straight Talk Express," and he is a top-tier contender to succeed President Bush.

But now his unflinching insistence on boosting the number of troops in Iraq, and his position as one of the president's most vocal supporters of the war, could imperil his White House ambitions, even among the GOP faithful.

"George W. Bush may pay a price in the eyes of history, but John McCain may pay a practical, political price," said Byron Shafer, a political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Bush's plan for a new start in Iraq has been greeted frostily this week on Capitol Hill by Democrats and a number of Republicans, including at least one, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who will compete with McCain for the nomination.

Undeterred, McCain--a former Navy fighter pilot, and son and grandson of admirals--won't back off his position to step up the war effort.

"We need troops in the numbers required to do the job, in place for as long as it takes to complete their mission," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It would be far better to have too many reinforcements in Iraq than to suffer, once again, the tragic results of insufficient force levels."

At odds with fellow vets

It is a view McCain has held for more than three years, and one he tried repeatedly to impress upon former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as well as the president. But it's also a view that puts him at odds with his fellow Vietnam veterans in the Senate--Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), Jim Webb (D-Va.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.).

DOJ_NMG_0116872

"I think John sees military force as a way toward a solution in a sense more than I do," said Webb, who has known McCain for 30 years and considers him a friend. "I think that there are limits to the use of military force, particularly in that part of the world."

If the situation in Iraq continues to deteriorate, the nation's frustration with the war could tarnish McCain much as it damaged Republicans at the polls during the midterm elections.

That's something McCain, known for taking controversial stands, refuses to entertain.

"I do not worry about that," he said during a break in the hearings. "I do not worry about it. I do not worry about it. This is too important an issue."

After Bush's address to the nation Wednesday, McCain was similarly emphatic about the intersection of the war and his presidential dreams: "I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said on CNN's "Larry King Live."

Friends take heart that McCain advocated a change of strategy well before others realized the plan wasn't working.

"Iraq could rub off on McCain in a negative way. But McCain's been right from the beginning saying we need more troops," said Scott Reed, who managed Bob Dole's presidential campaign in 1996. "He supported the Powell doctrine . . . and McCain understands that pulling out and losing would be a disaster in the region and how we're viewed around the world."

Aides to McCain say that taking unpopular stands is nothing new for their boss, and managing the fallout is nothing new for them.

"All I can tell you is McCain is basing his position on what he thinks is in the best interest of this country," said Mark Salter, the senator's longtime chief of staff. "There's nothing we can do about it, either. It's his position, it's why we admire him, and that's that."

John Weaver, the architect of McCain's presidential operation, said the senator's position on the war has not slowed fundraising or deterred political activists or operatives from joining the campaign.

"We don't worry about it. Is it our job to deal with it? Yes," Weaver said. "At the early stage, it has not kept people from encouraging the senator to run or from signing up and taking leadership positions."

To some degree, McCain has a credibility that comes from enduring torture by his North Vietnamese captors and being kept in solitary confinement for three of his 5 1/2 years in the Hoa Lo prison camp.

"He probably has a level of insulation on this issue that nobody else does on the Republican side," said William Mayer, an expert on the presidential primary process at Northeastern University. "Nobody . . . is going to accuse him of not caring about what happens to American soldiers."

Indeed, McCain has an even more personal stake in how the war is conducted. One son just finished Marine Corps boot camp and is likely to be sent to Iraq. Another son attends the Naval Academy and could wind up in Iraq too.

Nevertheless, McCain remains defiant as he fights to bring in more troops and allow Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead a counterinsurgency campaign.

"Those who want us to withdraw within four to six months have an obligation to tell us what they'll do when chaos ensues," said McCain.

He acknowledged that the push in Congress for a non-binding resolution opposing the escalation in Iraq would be a setback for his position. But he offers his opponents a challenge he is certain they will not take.

"The legitimate question is if you feel that strongly that you want to disagree with the president's policy, Congress has a right to cut off funds--why not a resolution to cut off funds?" he suggested. "I think that's a more legitimate way of pursuing this issue, frankly."

Bush's Legacy Vs. The 2008 Election (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

DURING the midterm elections, a question nagged at Republicans who agreed to follow the White House script on the Iraq war: Does the president care more about his legacy than the party's in pushing his course?

By last week, many Republicans on Capitol Hill had come to believe that their interests and the president's may be diverging even wider.

On one end of Pennsylvania Avenue is a president who argues that history will judge him favorably on the war; on the other are increasingly skeptical Republicans who blame the president's stay-the-course strategy for the loss of majority status in Congress and fear that it may cost them again in 2008.

The unusual circumstances of the 2008 election may only aggravate the situation. Congressional Republicans face high stakes, particularly in the Senate, where 21 are up for re-election, compared with just 12 Democrats. And the Democrats have already put targets on senators in the Northeast and Midwest where antiwar sentiment helped Democrats sweep into office.

The president, on the other hand, cannot run again, and has no chosen successor, leaving him unbound to electoral concerns.

Like any president, however, he is concerned with how history will judge him. Mr. Bush has frequently likened himself to Harry Truman, an unpopular president when he left office, but one applauded by history.

"To coin a phrase, he's no Harry Truman," said Robert Dallek, a presidential historian. "Truman is now seen as a near great president because he put in place the containment doctrine boosted by the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan and NATO, which historians now see as having been at the center of American success in the cold war."

"If you ask yourself, what is Bush's legacy, what is there?" Mr. Dallek asked. "What's his larger design to meet the dangers of Islamic terrorism?"

The parallels, some historians say, are more to Lyndon Johnson.

Robert A. Caro, the Johnson biographer, says that the similarities are striking if you look at newspapers from 1967 as the nation headed into the tumultuous election year of 1968.

"You see this pouring in of the national treasure, this rise in troops against the background of failure," he said. "The opposition to this starts to be expressed more and more on the floor of Congress. You have a president who is unbending in each case."

President Johnson was increasingly concerned about his legacy. He wanted it to be the Great Society, but more and more he feared it would be overwhelmed by failure in Vietnam. "Both presidents seem absolutely convinced that their course is correct," Mr. Caro said. "They both feel that if they're only allowed by public opinion to pursue that course, they will win."

Mr. Johnson faced most of his opposition from within his own party. In 1964, only two senators voted against the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, escalating the American involvement in Vietnam. By 1966, Senator J. William Fulbright, who voted for the resolution, gave a speech at Johns Hopkins University on the arrogance of power, and the next year, Senator Eugene McCarthy announced that he would challenge Mr. Johnson for the Democratic presidential nomination. By 1968, Mr. Johnson announced he would not seek re-election.

Republicans are not close to such an all-out revolt, but their opposition last week was a striking turnaround from just six months ago, when all but one member of the Republican majority in the Senate rejected a plan to begin withdrawing troops within the year.

Seven Republican senators have said publicly that they oppose the president's plan. Many more have said they will wait for more information to make a decision, or have expressed only qualified support; a Washington Times survey late in the week found only 21 of 49 Republicans expressing "unqualified support."

Those opposing the plan include senators facing tough re-elections, like Senator Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who Democrats have already declared one of their top three targets for 2008.

Those who oppose or express reservations about the president's plan say it is not primarily a matter of politics; they question the Iraqi government's commitment to deliver on promises, and have had their doubts reinforced by visits to Iraq and the excruciating pain of calling families who have lost loved ones in the war.

"Politics is lurking beneath the surface but the facts themselves compel, repeat compel, our colleagues to dig deeper," said Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is a member, and was recently chairman, of the Armed Services Committee. He says he wants to study the president's proposal before deciding whether to support it.

But they also recognize public opinion.

"Many Republicans, like Americans, are increasingly disappointed in the lack of resolution in Iraq," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who has argued to withdraw, not increase, troops in Baghdad. "The fact that the strategy that the administration has pushed in the past did not work leaves me, and many of us, to ask questions about the president's new strategy."

The split seems likely only to widen. Some lawmakers called to the White House to discuss the plan last week said Mr. Bush did not seem interested in what one called "an exchange of views."

Ms. Collins said she was struck by "how confident he was."

"I think this issue is so thorny and so plagued with uncertainty, and yet he seems so certain," she said.

On the Hill, meanwhile, even those who did support the president's plan in Iraq offered less than the hearty endorsements of the troop surge. Some, like Mr. Warner, said they needed more information before they committed to any increase. At an Armed Services Committee hearing on Friday, Mr. Warner asked the Pentagon to provide results of the war game analyses it has done to evaluate the results of adding more troops.

In the House, as fierce a partisan as Representative Jack Kingston said he was not ready to lend full support, but looked forward to hearings on the plan.

Other Republicans supported the president but emphasized that the commitment in Iraq must not be open-ended — a Democratic refrain. And they argued for the need for benchmarks to evaluate the success of the increase, all of which leaves room for them to peel away from the president if the war does not show more success soon.

Heading toward 2008, Republicans are no longer expecting the kind of party discipline on the war that they expected in 2006. Instead, party leaders say members must speak their consciences.

"Voters will recognize a phony and a fraud," said Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who is leading the Republicans' 2008 efforts to gain back the majority they lost in the House. "If you believe the president is right you should say so. If you have a legitimate and honest difference with the president, you shouldn't hesitate to draw that difference."

"Bad Behavior"? (NOVAK)

By Robert D. Novak

Robert Novak, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Minority Leader John Boehner, who had promised last May that "bad behavior" by House Republicans who voted against their leadership would not be rewarded, announced to a party conference Wednesday that reform Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona was being removed from the Judiciary Committee.

With the change in House control, several Republicans had to be removed from committees. However, Flake was about halfway up the Judiciary panel in seniority, and this was his priority appointment. The decision was made by the Republican Steering Committee, dominated by Appropriations members who resent Flake's vigorous campaign against earmarks.

Boehner later told Flake he was purged because of his verbal attacks on party leaders. Flake was undone by his critical remarks on CBS's "60 Minutes" just before the election.

DEMOCRATIC DISCIPLINE

The House vote Tuesday passing a Democratic-sponsored homeland security bill showed that Republicans are unaccustomed to being in the minority for the first time in 12 years, while the Democrats are exercising iron discipline in the majority.

Although the full Republican leadership attacked the bill as expensive and ineffective, 68 Republicans voted for it while 128 were in opposition. The supporters included such ranking Republican committee members as Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida (Foreign Affairs) and Peter King of New York (Homeland Security).

All 231 Democrats voting were in support of the bill, as Speaker Nancy Pelosi began the Democratic "first 100 hours" of rapid-fire legislation. Pharmaceutical industry lobbyists could not find a single Democratic member against a party plan to force down drug prices. One moderate freshman congressman said he was opposed to the measure but felt obliged to vote for a bill that was in the Pelosi 100 hours as a "leadership issue."

EXPLORER OBAMA

Sen. Barack Obama informed a major Democratic financial contributor that he probably will announce formation of a 2008 presidential exploration committee this coming week, which starts with Martin Luther King Jr. Day Monday.

A political source close to Obama told this column he was not sure the exploratory committee would be named that early but added that probably would happen during the next three weeks. Actual announcement of his candidacy would come later.

A footnote: Obama canceled tentative plans to deliver the keynote address for Martin Luther King Jr. Day ceremonies at Virginia Tech in Blacksburg, Va. University officials speculated that Obama's travel has been temporarily suspended as he approaches the start of his presidential candidacy.

ROMNEY VS. REAGAN

Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney's 1994 effort to unseat Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in Massachusetts continues to haunt him. A Democratic blogger named SoThisIsWashington posted a video clip on YouTube of a debate with Kennedy in which Romney deliberately separates himself from Ronald Reagan.

The video, from their campaign debate, shows Kennedy telling Romney that "your economic program" is "the program of Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush." Romney responded: "Look, I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush. I'm not trying to return to Reagan-Bush."

In the same debate, Romney promised to "sustain and support" the Roe v. Wade abortion decision. Romney also was damaged with conservatives by a 1994 letter in which he claimed he was more pro-gay rights than Kennedy.

"DR. MULTIMILLIONAIRE"

Newly elected Rep. Steven Kagen, a rich allergist who self-financed his campaign in Wisconsin, by his own account taunted President and Mrs. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and presidential adviser Karl Rove during a White House function for new members of Congress in December.

Kagen told a group of activists that after he found himself in the restroom with Rove, he blocked the White House deputy chief of staff's departure by holding the door closed. According to Kagen, he then said: "You're in the White House and you think you're safe. . . . My name's Dr. Multimillionaire and I kicked your ass."

The new congressman said he said separately to both Bush and Cheney: "Thank you for coming to Green Bay. I couldn't have won without you coming." Kagen also said he approached Laura Bush and purposely called her Barbara, the name of the president's mother. Kagen's remarks were reported in "The Scene," published in Appleton, Wis.

Obama's Charm Lost On America's Black Activists (LONT)

By Tony Allen

Times of London, January 14, 2007

HE is a media darling, a paparazzi target and a source of inspiration for millions of Democrats who dream of retaking the White House in 2008. But Senator Barack Obama, the charismatic African-American who is shaking up the presidential primary race, has not impressed some of America's most powerful black activists.

Civil rights leaders who have dominated black politics for much of the past two decades have pointedly failed to embrace the 45-year-old Illinois senator who is considering a bid to become America's first black president.

At a meeting of activists in New York last week, the Rev Jesse Jackson, the first black candidate to run for president, declined to endorse Obama. "Our focus right now is not on who's running, because there are a number of allies running," Jackson said.

The Rev Al Sharpton, the fiery New York preacher who joined the Democratic primary race in 2004, said he was considering another presidential run of his own. And Harry Belafonte, the calypso singer who became an influential civil rights activist, said America needed to be "careful" about Obama: "We don't know what he's truly about."

The unexpected coolness between the old civil rights guard and the new Democratic hopeful has added an intriguing twist to the budding rivalry between Obama and Senator Hillary Clinton, who hopes to emulate her husband, former president Bill Clinton, in attracting support from black voters.

The importance of the black vote — and the still-potent influence of community leaders such as Jackson and Sharpton — was underlined last week when both Clinton and Obama appeared at different times in New York at a black business conference organised by Jackson's Rainbow/Push Coalition.

Clinton was applauded at a breakfast meeting for her attacks on President George W Bush's economic policies of "tax breaks for the rich". She added: "It is not rich Americans who have made this country great. It is hard-working Americans who have worked hard to lift themselves and their children up."

Delayed by bad weather, Obama turned up in the evening to pay respectful homage to Jackson's presidential bids in the 1980s. "I owe him a great debt," Obama said. "I would not be here had it not been for 1984 . . . for 1988. If I'm on the cover of Ebony (an African-American magazine), it's not because of me. It's because a whole bunch of folks did the work to put me there."

Yet Obama's charm and eloquence have not wooed the old guard.

"They are basically jealous," said a Democratic strategist who has not yet decided which candidate he intends to support. "They've been toiling in the trenches for decades, and along comes this son of a Kenyan farmer and suddenly he's measuring the drapes in the Oval Office."

Sharpton, 52, is widely considered to have no better chance of winning the Democratic nomination than in 2004, when he never amassed more than a few percentage points in the polls but still made a national impact with his barnstorming performances in the televised primary debates.

When asked about Obama's likely candidacy, the preacher, renowned for outrageous self-publicising antics, shrugged: "Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle. I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat, or if there's some real meat there."

Belafonte, who returns to British cinema screens shortly with a small role in Bobby, the new Emilio Estevez film about the assassination of Robert F Kennedy, also cast doubt on Obama's credentials as a legitimate candidate.

"He's a young man in many ways to be admired," Belafonte said. "Obviously very bright, speaks very well, cuts a handsome figure. But all of that is just the king's clothes. Who's the king?" There were contrasting views on the likely impact on Obama's campaign of black competition or criticism. One analyst argued that a Sharpton candidacy would "put Obama on the spot" by forcing him to address awkward civil rights issues such as police brutality and racial profiling that he tends to steer clear of. One Democratic blogger argued that Sharpton was "just what the doctor ordered to keep Obama on the straight and narrow".

Others suggested that Sharpton would help Clinton by dividing black primary voters. In one interview last week, Sharpton warned that Obama could not take the black vote for granted. A strategist pointed out, however, that Obama could emerge as a "model of reason, compared to that blowhard Al (Sharpton)".

Romney Retreats On Gun Control (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 14, 2007

ORLANDO , Fla. -- Former governor Mitt Romney, who once described himself as a supporter of strong gun laws, is distancing himself from that rhetoric now as he attempts to court the gun owners who make up a significant force in Republican primary politics.

In his 1994 US Senate run, Romney backed two gun-control measures strongly opposed by the National Rifle Association and other gun-rights groups: the Brady Bill, which imposed a five-day waiting period on gun sales, and a ban on certain assault weapons.

"That's not going to make me the hero of the NRA," Romney told the Boston Herald in 1994.

At another campaign stop that year, he told reporters: "I don't line up with the NRA."

And as the GOP gubernatorial candidate in 2002, Romney lauded the state's strong laws during a debate against Democrat Shannon O'Brien. "We do have tough gun laws in Massachusetts; I support them," he said. "I won't chip away at them; I believe they protect us and provide for our safety."

Today, as he explores a presidential bid, Romney is sending a very different message on gun issues, which are far more prominent in Republican national politics than in Massachusetts.

He now touts his work as governor to ease restrictions on gun owners. He proudly describes himself as a member of the NRA -- though his campaign won't say when he joined. And Friday, at his campaign's request, top officials of the NRA and the National Shooting Sports Foundation led him around one of the country's biggest gun shows.

Romney says he still backs the ban on assault weapons, but he won't say whether he stands by the Brady Bill. And after the gun show tour, his campaign declined to say whether he would still describe himself as a supporter of tough gun laws.

"He believes Americans have the right to own and possess firearms as guaranteed under the US Constitution," spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom wrote in an e-mail. "He's proud to be among the many decent, law-abiding men and women who safely use firearms. Like President Bush, he supports restrictions on assault weapons, but Mitt Romney has also worked with gun owners and sportsmen to ease the gun-licensing laws in Massachusetts."

Romney appears to be stepping up his efforts to portray himself as a gun-friendly candidate, though some gun-rights activists in important primary states say his past positions will hurt him politically.

On Wednesday, Romney said on an Internet podcast, "The Glenn and Helen Show," that he hopes states would continue to ease regulations on gun owners, and he expressed enthusiasm for guns and hunting. "I have a gun of my own. I go hunting myself. I'm a member of the NRA and believe firmly in the right to bear arms," Romney said.

Asked by reporters at the gun show Friday whether he personally owned the gun, Romney said he did not. He said one of his sons, Josh, keeps two guns at the family vacation home in Utah, and he uses them "from time to time." The guns are a Winchester hunting rifle and a Glock 9mm handgun, which Romney uses for target shooting . Romney also described himself as a sportsman who learned to shoot as a boy rabbit hunting in Idaho with a .22 rifle. He fondly recalled shooting quail last year at a Republican Governors Association event in Georgia.

"I . . . had a good time and actually knocked down a couple of birds," he said.

Fehrnstrom said Romney had taken steps to support gun rights as governor, including his signing of an NRA-backed bill last year that reduced a testing requirement on certain pistol-makers before they could sell guns in Massachusetts.

In 2002, even as he was pledging to uphold the state's strong gun laws, Romney still garnered a "B" grade from the NRA.

Also, in 2005, Romney designated May 7 as "The Right to Bear Arms Day" in Massachusetts to honor "the right of decent, law-abiding citizens to own and use firearms in defense of their families, persons, and property and for all lawful purposes, including the common defense."

But perhaps the most significant gun legislation Romney signed as governor was a 2004 measure instituting a permanent ban on assault weapons. The Legislature mirrored the law after the federal assault weapons ban, which was set to expire. According to activists at the time, the bill made Massachusetts the first state to enact its own such ban, and Romney hailed the move.

"These guns are not made for recreation or self-defense," he was quoted as saying. "They are instruments of destruction with the sole purpose of hunting down and killing people."

The bill enjoyed the support of Massachusetts gun owners because it also encompassed several measures they favored -- including a lengthening of the terms of firearm identification cards and licenses to carry. (Asked about the bill Friday, Romney described it as a "consensus measure" and a "positive step.")

But the NRA and many local affiliates do not support assault weapons bans, arguing that the arms are rarely used in crimes and have a legitimate purpose in hunting, target shooting, and self-protection. Romney's signing of that bill, despite its progun provisions, will be problematic politically, activists say.

"Why don't you just not take away [rights] from us?" Michael Thiede, president of the group Michigan Gun Owners, said last week. He said Romney's support for the assault-weapons ban and the Brady Bill will "absolutely" give him friction.

Gerald W. Stoudemire, president of Gun Owners of South Carolina, agreed, saying Romney has been "basically antigun on some issues."

"They're going to be a big scratch on his record," Stoudemire said. "He's going to have to not just get over them, but show a different direction if he's going to pick up voters."

The NRA officials who led Romney around the trade show declined to discuss his positions. "We meet with candidates all over the country at every level," said Chris W. Cox, who heads the NRA's political and legislative work.

Romney's past positions on gun control have also drawn some attention in the blogosphere, though not nearly as much as his statements in support of abortion rights and gay rights. (He's now antiabortion and takes a harder line on gay rights.) "Wait until the 2d amendment crowd gets a hold of Mitt's views on gun control," one blogger wrote on punditreview.com .

Romney was clearly trying to allay such concerns by attending the massive Shooting, Hunting, Outdoor Trade Show and Conference at Orlando's Orange County Convention Center. Romney, joined by his wife, Ann, and trailed by local television stations and a few reporters, chatted enthusiastically with vendors displaying a wide variety of weapons.

"Let's see your shotguns here," Romney said to Michael F. Golden, CEO of the Springfield-based gunmaker Smith & Wesson. Romney's dark suit stood out in a sea of camouflage, but he gamely introduced himself to anyone in his path.

At one booth, he met exhibition shooter Tom Knapp , who gave Romney some hunting advice: When you miss an animal, pretend you did it on purpose, because you want the animal to breed lots of offspring (read: targets).

"That's a great hunting tip!" Romney said with a laugh.

The trade show illustrated the work that lies ahead for Romney in broadening his name recognition. Though many people knew who he was -- "I was just pitching you last night!" one man said enthusiastically -- many others did not.

"Who is that?" a woman at the Crossman gunmaker booth asked quietly after Romney walked away.

"A governor," someone said.

"Where?" she asked.

"Massachusetts -- may be running for president."

Moments later, a different woman gestured in his direction: "Is that Jeb Bush?"

"No, it's Mitt Romney," Fehrnstrom corrected.

Tancredo In Iowa To Test '08 Bid (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 14, 2007

Washington - U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo is in the key caucus state of Iowa this weekend, assessing whether he should formally announce a bid for the presidency.

"What comes out of this weekend will determine whether or not he sets up an exploratory committee," Tancredo spokesman Carlos Espinosa said Friday.

Tancredo, R-Colo., officially is in Iowa to publicize his book, "In Mortal Danger." But while he's there, he's talking to state Republican leaders.

"Fighting for 3rd place"

Tancredo often talks about running for president as a way to publicize his hard-line views on the immigration issue. If he decides to announce, Espinosa said, it's for that cause and not because he thinks he can win the election.

"Any bid that Tom would put up, it would be fighting for third place," Espinosa said. "Third place would be a huge victory for Tom Tancredo."

Tancredo is eyeing Iowa because, in his view, there are only two Republican front- runners who plan to compete in the caucus there: Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Iowa also is the first of the Republican presidential caucus states.

"The reality is, McCain is not a very popular guy in Iowa," Espinosa said. "That leaves a very big void in Iowa."

DOJ_NMG_0116878

Tancredo objects to McCain's position on immigration reform. McCain was one of the sponsors of the Senate bill on immigration that passed last year. It would have created a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. Tancredo opposes giving any legal status to illegal immigrants.

Press jumps the gun

The Des Moines Register's website Friday reported that Tancredo was announcing a run for the presidency, which Espinosa said isn't true. Reaction to Tancredo's visit to the state, he said, "is being blown way out of proportion."

In addition to evaluating Iowa, Tancredo is also waiting to see whether Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., decides to run for re-election in 2008, Espinosa said. Tancredo has said he's interested in that office.

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

THE GOVERNOR OF the nation's largest state was reelected in a landslide in November, even though his Republican Party is a minority in California. He works with Democrats in a way that offers the rest of the country a model of much-needed bipartisanship. To kick off his second term, he has proposed the most ambitious healthcare and environmental reforms in the country, and he is also committed to a massive reconstruction of the state's infrastructure.

Yet, oddly enough, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is not on the list of potential presidential candidates in 2008.

Why? Because the founders were worried in the 18th century that our fledgling nation might go the way of Poland and be overtaken by a foreign monarchy. Hence the constitutional qualifier that only "natural-born citizens" are eligible for the presidency of the United States.

In their wisdom, however, the Constitution's authors adopted a mechanism for the nation's founding document to be amended. Amendments should be undertaken sparingly, we agree, but it's a good thing that slavery was done away with and that suffrage has been expanded.

And now that we can all rest assured that no foreign monarch is going to move into the White House, it's long past due for this nation of immigrants to amend the Constitution to allow naturalized Americans to aspire to the presidency. This is precisely the type of defining issue — what it means to be American — that the amendment process was designed to address.

Supporting Schwarzenegger for governor (we did) does not necessarily lead to supporting him for president (we don't — yet). But why should Californians have their governor sidelined from the race? And why can't voters across the country be entrusted to decide for themselves whether the governor of California is sufficiently "American" to earn their vote? It's insulting, really.

Yes, the nation will manage without Schwarzenegger at the helm. But his situation is a reminder of this constitutional flaw. The issue is also important at a symbolic level. It isn't that there aren't enough qualified "natural-born" Americans to run for the highest office in the land, it's that there is an asterisk attached to the citizenship of many great Americans.

Think about it. Someone could come to the U.S. at the age of 2 from Britain or China or Peru, become a citizen, join the military, win a Medal of Honor, cure cancer — but that person would still not be "good enough" for the White House.

One of the exceptional qualities of this meritocratic nation of immigrants is its sense of possibility. Americans like to tell their kids that they can be anything they want to be when they grow up — including president. But for millions of patriotic Americans, the Constitution says otherwise. The idea of citizenship only as a birthright is a decidedly foreign notion. And the idea that voters cannot elect as their leader a naturalized citizen is decidedly undemocratic.

That's why California's representatives in Washington should support a constitutional amendment. If the United States is a nation of immigrants, California is a state of immigrants. And California leaders who want to hold on to the 18th century prohibition against naturalized citizens running for the presidency are not doing a very good job representing their constituents.

We asked every member of Congress representing California two questions: 1) As a Californian, do you think it's fair that our governor can't run for president because he's a naturalized citizen? And 2) Would you support a constitutional amendment to allow naturalized citizens to seek the presidency?

We have posted their answers on our website at latimes.com/opinion.

We realize there are further debates to be had about the exact terms and language of the amendment. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, for instance, does favor such an amendment but wants a 35-year residency requirement for naturalized citizens; Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) would require individuals to have been a citizen for a quarter of a century. But it's remarkable that 18 out of 55 members failed to get back to us on this issue altogether, three refused to comment and 11 others couldn't muster a simple "yes" or "no" answer to these fundamental questions. These include both Democratic senators, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer. Feinstein reminded us that she had serious concerns about such an amendment the last time the issue was looked at by the Senate Judiciary Committee, but that she would keep an open mind on future proposals. Boxer simply said she'd want to look at the specific language of any proposed amendment before taking a position, but she wouldn't even answer the first question regarding Schwarzenegger's predicament.

The good news is that of those who did give us straightforward answers, 14 members of the House of Representatives said they would support a constitutional amendment, while nine wouldn't. That's a start.

Plenty of members seem to feel like this is a minor issue — Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) says it is not important enough to deal with, and she'd rather see an equal rights amendment to the Constitution. Others may even feel that it is too radioactive against the backdrop of arguments over illegal immigration.

A number of representatives overlook the symbolic importance of the barrier to naturalized citizens, focusing on the fact that we already have a talented pool of people from which to choose a president. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) got the bipartisan spirit of our endeavor, saying he'd favor a constitutional amendment to allow naturalized citizens to run for president, "even those I may not support myself." We hope mere partisanship isn't driving the views of others.

In any case, we will persevere in coming months to try to keep the issue on the minds of our representatives, and maybe, as they reflect on what it means to represent this state built by immigrants, we can hear back from more of them.

A Preview Of Arnold's Second Act (LAT)

By Bill Whalen

THERE ARE two ways to view Arnold Schwarzenegger's skiing mishap: His fractured femur was a bad break, or it's the latest example of bad luck to befall a newly reelected California governor.

Hearken back to 1995, the last time a Republican governor began a second term. Pete Wilson underwent surgery on his vocal chords and lost his public voice — and his dream of being president. Gray Davis, a Democrat, experienced an even more painful procedure during the first — and last — year of his second term: a voter recall.

So, odd though it may sound (and as painful as it assuredly is), Schwarzenegger has so far gotten off easy: His voice can still be heard, and he still has his job.

Odd is a good word to describe the governor's coordinates on the political landscape. Schwarzenegger lives in rarified air — an American politician the world knows on a first-name basis. That said, his sky has a ceiling. Term limits will force him to step down in 2011, and the Constitution stands in the way of a presidential run.

That leaves the U.S. Senate as an alternative. Some option. Watch five minutes of C-SPAN2 and you'll understand why that chamber's deliberative style is an awkward fit for a thrill-seeking executive such as Schwarzenegger.

So, time is running out on the governor's political career. And that might explain why his second term is off to such a fast start. It also may explain what kind of politician he truly is.

Will Schwarzenegger get his way on the healthcare front? That largely depends on his interpersonal skills, beginning with his ability to offer lawmakers the right mix of carrots and sticks to keep the reform effort on a steady course.

Those talents were missing two years ago when the governor and Legislature couldn't work out a deal that would have spared California a special election.

If that history repeats itself, healthcare reform could collapse under its own weight — or, worse for California, emerge from the Legislature as a "Franken-fix," a last-minute, slapdash job certain to haunt the next governor.

Schwarzenegger will need the same people skills to repair another fracture on his right — his deteriorating relationship with the legislative wing of the Republican Party. Right now, that relationship is headed from critical condition to "do not resuscitate."

LEGISLATIVE Republicans have every reason to gripe. The governor's most notable "conservative" accomplishments are defensive in nature: He hasn't raised taxes (now debatable, depending on how one interprets the revenue provisions of his universal healthcare plan); he hasn't signed a same-sex marriage law; and he refuses to provide driver's licenses to illegal immigrants. Also, to date, Schwarzenegger's post-partisanship style has consisted almost entirely of him moving left of center and Democratic legislators leaning a little to the right.

There is an underlying irony to his conflict with conservative Republicans. Probably the most appealing idea in the governor's new budget to GOP lawmakers is cutting welfare benefits to encourage recipients to enter the workforce. But the Republicans suffer from a different form of dependency — the urge to whine and complain instead of offering concrete ideas to move forward. Maybe it's what comes from being a political underclass. But it's not productive. And it won't work with an optimist like the governor.

Still, is Schwarzenegger truly a Republican when his ideas aren't well received by party regulars? It's a fair question. And it's worth remembering that Hiram Johnson, the great reformer and Schwarzenegger's first gubernatorial role model, started out as a Republican governor before joining Theodore Roosevelt and the "Bull Moose" Progressive Party after only two years in Sacramento.

Our nonconformist governor may be best described as a "utopian." Schwarzenegger aspires to a pristine environment, economic progress across class lines and healthcare for all. His basis for action is a kind of "political transcendentalism" — a personal belief that within California's political system there exists a spiritual desire that outweighs the worst of partisan urges. Healthcare reform will put that faith to its strongest test.

No one is going to confuse our crowd-loving, glamour-seeking governor with the stark isolation of a 19th century transcendentalist such as Henry David Thoreau — Sun Valley and Walden Pond have little in common.

But it's the latter's writing that strikes a chord. "If one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined," Thoreau observed, "he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours."

Time will tell if the uncommon politician finds expected success in his next four years.

Gov. Attuned To Waning Of Party Loyalty (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Rolling out his agenda last week, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proudly elevated his eclectic approach to a kind of political doctrine: Republicans and Democrats might be invested in the fight for supremacy, but voters aren't.

Seeing that party loyalties are dwindling, Schwarzenegger is confident that he faces no real repercussions if he disappoints the state's GOP leadership.

Siphoning ideas from both major parties, he remains a Republican by registration, but he is acting, speaking and governing increasingly like an independent. Like a party of one.

In the first week of his new term, Schwarzenegger's moves were nearly impossible to categorize. He was left, right and center all at once, a method he cast as "post-partisan."

He called for scaling back state welfare benefits but also proposed new assessments on business to underwrite his ambitious healthcare plan. The governor wants more money to combat global warming, but also to build new prisons and reservoirs — projects important to Republicans.

"There's something positive for everyone, and there appears to be something negative for everyone," said Lewis Uhler, president of the nonprofit National Tax Limitation Committee.

Schwarzenegger's approach reflects a careful reading of the California electorate. Since 1990, Republican and Democratic party membership in California has dropped, while the proportion of independent voters has climbed.

Independents account for nearly 19% of the electorate today, compared with 9% in 1990. In his Jan. 5 inaugural speech, the governor said that if these trends continue, independents will outnumber each of the major parties in 20 years.

Across a broader swath of the country, analysts have spotted the same pattern.

From 1994 to 2006, Democratic Party registration dropped from 48% to 42%; Republican, from 34% to 33%, according to data compiled in 27 states by Rhodes Cook, author of a northern Virginia-based political newsletter. Independents and those registered to other parties rose from 18% to 25% during those years.

There are no data available for all 50 states.

Schwarzenegger is positioning himself ahead of that onrushing wave, political analysts said.

"He's looking at where the voters are going," said Tony Quinn, co-editor of the California Target Book, which analyzes state races. "He's where the curve is."

Republican Party leaders say they are alarmed. State Sen. Tom McClintock (R-Thousand Oaks), an icon for California fiscal conservatives, said the governor's healthcare proposal involves an unacceptable tax on business.

Schwarzenegger "shattered" a campaign promise that was vital to his reelection, McClintock said.

Does it matter what conservative activists think? Political analysts say no.

Schwarzenegger, after all, captured 91% of the GOP vote when he won reelection. The only statewide offices that Republicans won in the November election were those of governor and insurance commissioner. Even with an incumbent candidate, the GOP lost the secretary of state post.

For the moment, the party's best and perhaps only asset in California is Schwarzenegger.

"The problem with the McClintock wing is that they're in great danger of making the Republicans completely irrelevant to the process," Quinn said. " … They lost. They went to the voters with their ideas, and they weren't the ones who got elected."

One advisor to the governor privately said that Schwarzenegger's new identity is not so much post-partisan as "post-Republican."

With his first term behind him, Schwarzenegger has decided that aligning himself with Republican lawmakers is futile. He tried that in 2005, when he called a special election with conservative goals such as curbing state spending and restricting labor's political clout.

Voters defeated the governor's program, and his approval rating sank to the 30s.

Ever pragmatic, Schwarzenegger saw that pushing a classic Republican agenda was a dead end and that if he was to avoid failure — a Schwarzenegger imperative — he had to adapt.

Those who know him say there's a degree of self-interested calculation in the post-partisan stew.

"The governor may remain a Republican by name, but from a political standpoint he doesn't see a lot to be gained in terms of promoting his party membership," said Mark Baldassare, a pollster with the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California.

Determined to reach the biggest audience possible, Schwarzenegger may be planning to take his message on the road. Aides have said he may travel to New Hampshire and Iowa during the presidential primary season, hoping to become part of the national conversation.

"What he has had to say in the last week has put him back on the national stage, talking about healthcare reform and global warming and post-partisanship," Baldassare said.

"So while he can't run for president, he can certainly position himself as a national political leader by talking about the value of thinking beyond partisanship."

Gov. Riley Says No To VP Talk (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) - Bob Riley adds the title of "two-term governor" on Monday. But with potential presidential candidate John McCain attending the inauguration, Riley is trying to stymie speculation that he wants to trade his new title for "vice presidential candidate" next year.

Riley says he is not interested in running a national campaign in 2008 or leaving the governor's office before the end of his new four-year term.

"This sounds so hokey I hate to even say it, but Alabama truly is positioned to do something that is incredible, and I can't think of a better way to spend four years than to finally be able to make all the education reforms we can, develop a new ethical standard, and watch this state continue to grow in a way it has never grown before," Riley said in an interview.

David Lanoue, chairman of the political science department at the University of Alabama, said Riley does not appear to be an "overly ambitious" politician. But he said, "Politicians are like football coaches. They say they don't want the job until they take it."

Riley and McCain visited U.S. troops in Iraq early last year. Then as McCain's presidential aspirations grew, he donated $10,000 to Riley's re-election campaign and stumped across the state in October to help the Republican governor win a second term.

During that tour, the Arizona senator called Riley a friend and lavished him with the kind of adjectives that politicians like to hear. Reporters asked questions about whether Riley might become a running mate, but both men dodged them.

Speculation popped up again at Riley's victory party on Nov. 7, when some supporters held up signs saying "President" and "2008."

Now, the talk is heating up again with McCain planning to be on the Capitol steps Monday when Riley takes the oath of office for a second term.

"The senator believes Governor Riley has been a strong leader in Alabama that has instituted reform policies that have grown the economy, invested in education and fought to protect families," McCain spokesman Danny Diaz said Friday.

Lanoue said he suspects McCain's main reason for visiting Alabama again is to build support for the state's early presidential preference primary, but the visit gives him another opportunity to get to know Riley.

"Is the vice presidency on McCain's mind when he comes down here? Sure," Lanoue said.

State Democratic Party Chairman Joe Turnham, who lost a congressional race to Riley in 1998, said he believes "the Riley team is looking at national politics."

He said Riley's three terms in the U.S. House combined with his two terms as governor make him an attractive figure, and he would provide geographic balance to a western candidate like McCain or a northeastern candidate like former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani or former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

A Riley resignation to move to Washington would be a boost for Turnham's party because Democratic Lt. Gov. Jim Folsom Jr. would move up to the governor's office.

When reporters bring up presidential politics, Riley tries to quiet the talk by recounting his goals for his new term.

They include, he says:

DOJ_NMG_0116882

-raising Alabama's income tax threshold for a second time.

-removing the state income tax from the first $10,000 of taxable retirement income.

-giving workers a tax break for returning to school to learn new skills.

-providing a tax break to help small businesses provide health insurance to their employees.

-putting distance learning labs and offering at least eight Advanced Placement courses in every Alabama high school, no matter how small or how remote.

"The disparity between the best education and the worst education is just too wide in this state. We have the technology and the know how to level the playing field," he said.

Riley's tax breaks and spending plans would affect taxes dedicated to Alabama's public schools and teachers' pay.

And that means his second term will be similar to his first. He will have regular battles with Paul Hubbert, executive secretary of the Alabama Education Association and vice chairman of the Alabama Democratic Party.

"The governor's agenda is going to have problems with cutting money from schools," Hubbert said.

"When people say this is going to hurt education, it's exactly the opposite," Riley said.

He said the tax breaks will stimulate the economy, create more jobs and provide even more tax revenue for public schools.

When the governor's battles with Hubbert and others are over and his term comes to an end, Riley said he wants to return to his farm in Ashland.

"Politics is exciting and I enjoy it. But the life we had back in Clay County was something that meant a lot to both Patsy and myself," he said.

And is there any interest in moving into the home at One Observatory Circle in Washington when Dick Cheney moves out?

"No," he said.

McCain-Clinton '08? Obama-Hagel? That's The Ticket (WP)

By Lanny J. Davis

Imagine this scenario: The country is so deeply divided that the media have color-coded the map of the United States to indicate the partisan chasm -- one color covers the South and most of the border states, the other drenches the North.

As the presidential election year nears, one candidate, a shoo-in for his party's nomination, has an obvious choice for running mate. Yet he also senses the uniqueness of the moment. So he makes a risky decision: He asks a leader of the opposition to run for vice president alongside him, forming the first bipartisan presidential ticket in U.S. history.

This is no fantasy. It's the decision Abraham Lincoln made when, running for reelection in 1864, he asked his Republican vice president, Hannibal Hamlin, to quit the ticket in favor of the highly partisan Democrat Andrew Johnson.

Lincoln's experiment in bipartisanship was tragically cut short when he was assassinated less than a month after his 1865 inauguration. But if ever there was a time to give it a second try, it's now.

Today's national unease and rabid partisanship -- so similar to the circumstances of 1864 -- raise the challenge for someone to form a bipartisan ticket in 2008. The lingering trauma of 9/11, the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism call for an administration open to bipartisan solutions to the crises that confront the country.

Last year's congressional elections showed that voters are tired of the partisan gridlock in Washington. They want some solutions from liberals and others from conservatives. That's the new politics of our age, as exemplified by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's reelection in Connecticut as an "independent" Democrat. Though he has voted mostly with his fellow Democrats over the years, Lieberman is open to both liberal and conservative approaches.

The most important reason for a bipartisan presidency in 2008 is the need to find solutions to the war in Iraq and to avoid delaying the end of significant U.S. involvement over fear of partisan recriminations. Solving the dilemma of Iraq -- how to get U.S. troops out of harm's way in a civil war yet not leave behind a rogue state dominated by terrorists -- will require bipartisan effort and support.

A bipartisan administration is also essential for enacting new taxes. Most responsible political leaders in both parties know -- though few are willing to admit it publicly -- that there is no way to pay for the war in Iraq, even as it winds down, and reduce the deficit while also addressing health care, energy independence, global warming and Social Security other than by raising taxes. Only a bipartisan presidency pushing leaders on both sides of the aisle can make it possible to tackle that issue honestly.

So how do you put a bipartisan ticket together? Theodore Sorenson, speechwriter for President John F. Kennedy, wrote a book in 1984 describing the various ways it might be done.

The Democratic and/or Republican nominee could do what Lincoln did -- reach out to a leader of the other party as a running mate at the nominating convention. Another scenario, which I prefer, would be for the two parties to nominate their respective tickets and wage a traditional partisan campaign on the issues, so that voters could see each party's approach and weigh their preferences. After the election, the winner would ask his or her vice president-elect to step down (and become, for example, secretary of state) while inviting the defeated presidential or vice presidential candidate from the other party to serve as vice president. This plan would ideally be announced during the campaign -- with the vice presidential candidate agreeing to act as a placeholder on the ticket -- so that the electorate would be aware of the commitment to a bipartisan presidency.

In this scenario, the vice president could be selected after the election by the Electoral College, which would presumably honor the president-elect's request to vote for the president or vice president of the defeated party. Or the selection could occur after the inauguration, with the newly sworn-in vice president resigning and the resulting vacancy filled, under the 25th Amendment, by a majority vote in both houses of Congress. The advantage of this latter method is that it would receive Congress's ratification of the concept of a bipartisan presidency.

In forming his administration, the new president would continue to adhere to the ideal of bipartisanship, selecting a 50-50 Cabinet and choosing judicial nominees on the basis of merit rather than party.

There are any number of provocative possibilities for a bipartisan ticket in 2008. Imagine the buzz if Republican John McCain and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton committed to making the other vice president in the event that either won the election. Pick any combination of other names in the current field of potential candidates: Democrat Barack Obama and Republican Chuck Hagel; Democrat Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Republican Mitt Romney; Democrat John Edwards and Republican Michael Bloomberg; Democrat Bill Richardson and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani. Any of these bipartisan pairings, in any permutation, would create a stir -- and a dynamite ticket. (Okay, strike one possible combination -- there's no way we'll see a Clinton-Giuliani ticket, or vice versa; not only does the Constitution forbid it, as they're both from the same state, but their personal chemistry would preclude it, too.)

Will it happen? In the end, political realism will be the determining factor. If it appears that a bipartisan ticket could enhance the chances of victory, and if any party leader embraces the need to make this a reality for the country's sake, then yes, it's likely to happen.

You don't have to go back 143 years to Abraham Lincoln for an example of such a judgment. Less than three years ago, Democrat John F. Kerry reportedly saw the political wisdom in asking McCain to be his vice presidential candidate, even though he knew the idea would be vehemently opposed by the Democratic Party's liberal base, which disagreed with McCain's positions on abortion, the Iraq war and other issues. Though McCain declined the invitation, it seems evident in hindsight that a Kerry-McCain ticket would have had a better chance of picking up an extra state (or turning 75,000 votes in Ohio) to win the 2004 election.

And whether or not either party takes the dramatic step of committing to a bipartisan ticket, there could be one nonetheless. A well-funded group of national political experts from both parties called "Unity '08," led by Republican pollster Douglas Bailey and former Democratic presidential aide Hamilton Jordan, is ready to fill the void and run a third, bipartisan ticket that would be nominated online through a virtual convention.

But I'm betting that such a third ticket won't be necessary, because eitherDemocrats or Republicans -- or both -- will nominate a bipartisan ticket in 2008 or commit to a bipartisan presidency after the election. And I'll wager that if only one of the parties does it, that party will win.

Nothing Perks Up A President Like Death (LAT)

By David Greenberg

WHEN Calvin Coolidge left the presidency in March 1929, having forsworn what surely would have been a reelection romp, he was basking in public adulation of a rare kind. Credited with six years of "Coolidge prosperity," praised for restoring integrity to Washington after the Teapot Dome scandal, admired for avoiding foreign wars, Silent Cal decamped to his native New England a man beloved. Back in Northampton, Mass., reporters peered in his car window, and one tried to enter his bathroom while he was showering.

Just four years later, however, when Coolidge died suddenly from a heart attack, he already seemed a relic. With the Depression and renewed European hostilities, his economic program had come to appear blinkered rather than sensible, his foreign policy self-deluding rather than statesmanlike and his hands-off governing style flaccid rather than prudent. The country had just swept Franklin Delano Roosevelt into office, a man whose ideas Coolidge had disparaged as "socialistic."

"We are in a new era," Coolidge lamented to a friend just before his death, "to which I do not belong." His public image has never recovered.

Coolidge may have been the last American president whose reputation plummeted after his term ended. The national hoopla surrounding the deaths of Richard Nixon in 1994, Ronald Reagan in 2004 and last month — to the astonishment of historians, as well as most other Americans over 30 — Gerald Ford suggests that nothing helps a chief executive's standing with the public so much as his demise.

After all, Ford, notwithstanding his much-celebrated Midwestern decency, will likely escape notice in the next century's history textbooks, except perhaps as the man who let Nixon go free — an act, lest we forget, that also permitted vital "what did the president know" questions go unanswered. Nixon, for his part, was not the internationalist visionary his eulogists canonized but a mean-hearted, power-hungry lawbreaker who thought himself above the Constitution (and one whose foreign policy legacy actually remains mixed).

Reagan, though adored in certain quarters, was deeply reviled in others — loathed as much as the current incumbent for his ultraconservatism, his simple-mindedness and his scorn for the welfare state.

Of course, we shouldn't construe the sonorous eulogies and lofty pronouncements about history's judgment of Nixon, Ford and Reagan as proof of their permanent rehabilitation. De mortuis nil nisi bonum, says a Latin proverb: Of the dead say nothing unless it is kind. Funerals aren't the time for carping — whether to dwell on Ford's fecklessness, Reagan's callousness or Nixon's criminality.

Nonetheless, it certainly appears that leaving office does wonders for one's reputation. Bill Clinton, defying forecasts that the Monica Lewinsky scandal would shape his legacy, has seen his popularity rating rise to 70% since leaving the White House. George H.W. Bush — turned out of office in 1992 with the lowest share of the popular vote of any incumbent since William Howard Taft — now wins kudos from old critics who contrast his multilateralism and wartime restraint with his son's heedlessness. Even Jimmy Carter, a failed president if ever there was one, notched a Nobel Prize 20 years after leaving office — though whether he'll recover from the self-inflicted wound of his latest book, which has been faulted for anti-Israel bias and intellectual dishonesty, remains uncertain.

Going back further, Dwight Eisenhower, once derided for blithely tolerating McCarthyism and Jim Crow, now smiles from the grave as the model of moderation. And John F. Kennedy has weathered three decades of attacks from the left and the right for sins ranging from policy blunders such as the Bay of Pigs invasion to personal failings such as lying about his medical ailments. Yet my students (born in the 1980s) still declare themselves suckers for Camelot.

Why do we venerate our former presidents so much more than our sitting ones? One argument is that when they take up humanitarian causes in their retirement, they gain respect from across the partisan divide. Bush the elder and Clinton were back in the public eye after the 2004 tsunami and again after Hurricane Katrina to raise money for the victims; Carter, for years, has built homes for the poor.

Yet this alone can't explain the trend. Ford saw retirement mainly as a chance to golf. Reagan, even before his Alzheimer's disease worsened, engaged in little public service.

A more plausible explanation rests not on the presidents but on our expectations of them. Starting in the 1960s, several developments uncorked a new cynicism toward presidents. Television — combined with a newly populist style among politicians — made these once-august figures seem all too human and familiar. With Watergate and the Vietnam War, journalists and the public felt freer to serve up sharp, even vitriolic criticism of the president. And the era's general skepticism toward authority made questioning and mocking our leaders seem as American as the Kentucky Derby.

In this environment, scholars began to wonder if the popular expectations of the office had simply become too great for anyone to fulfill. The federal government now promised Americans a great deal — from vast social programs to consumer and workplace protections to an expanding litany of rights. The president, who embodies the government, was held responsible for delivering more and more: a bountiful economy and efficient services, moral vision and practical policy solutions, ethical leadership and national security without foreign entanglements. The room for error shrank.

But if presidents suffered under burdensome expectations, ex-presidents were another story. The contempt for the individual in the White House obscured an ongoing reverence for the presidential office. Americans have continued to indulge our leaders' posh inaugurations, resplendent mansion and exorbitantly expensive private plane.

We like to imagine former presidents as belonging to an elite club of veteran wise men. Having earned their battle stars and scars, we figure, they now deserve a certain respect. "Saturday Night Live" has even had a running animated bit called the "X-Presidents," which imagines the former chiefs as a gang of superheroes — parodic, but also paying homage to the special role these men hold in public life. Ex-presidents, freed of the demands placed on sitting leaders, can enjoy esteem from citizens while steering clear of controversial topics (Jimmy Carter, take note!) that bring on sniping.

That doesn't mean we should view the upward revisions of ex-presidents' reputations as correct, or final. Our encomiums to former officeholders often reflect nothing more than sentimentalism. We forget the errors of judgment or wrongheaded ideological choices for which we once rightly excoriated them. The appraisal rendered on a president's death is no more reliable than the one delivered during his tenure. Often the post-mortem boom fades: After a brief rise at the time of his death, for instance, Nixon's popularity, as tracked by Gallup, sank back to abysmal levels.

For many months now, George W. Bush has been speaking about Harry Truman — another president, maligned in his own time, whom history has come to treat more charitably for sticking to his guns in the early years of a long, global conflict. And although this comparison strikes most historians of the Cold War as strained, it's perhaps conceivable that someday Bush's successful steps in the war on terrorism will come to be seen as justifying his wrongs.

A more likely outcome, though, is that he'll follow in the steps of Lyndon Johnson — who also failed to end a degenerating war despite mounting popular discontent. For all his achievements, LBJ has emerged as the only postwar president (besides Nixon) who has failed to benefit from the ratings bounce that death or retirement brings.

History delivers few final verdicts. What's important is to maintain a humility about those judgments we offer. When presidents make news for heading up disaster-relief efforts or chairing commissions or being laid to rest, we should bear in mind that some of those whom we consider heroes may soon be remembered as rogues, some sinners as saints, and some men of decency as nullities who just happened to briefly hold the most powerful office in the world.

Rice Backs Mideast Moderates, But Offers No Plan (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 13 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her Israeli counterpart declared their mutual backing on Saturday for a bilateral diplomatic strategy that would support moderate political leaders across the Middle East, but after a first evening of talks here offered little new to push ahead any agreement with the Palestinians.

Ms. Rice played down expectations for any breakthrough during her travels.

“I expect this trip to really be one in which we have intensive consultations,” she said to open weeklong travels across the Middle East and the Persian Gulf before consulting with allies in Western Europe. “I’m not coming with a proposal. I’m not coming with a plan.”

The focus of her first two days is to push Israeli and Palestinian leaders to move forward on a number of smaller issues, and then she will speak with other regional allies to try to gather support for President Bush’s new strategy for Iraq.

Tzipi Livni, the Israeli foreign minister, said after a meeting with Ms. Rice that the two countries were joined in an “ongoing mutual effort to empower the moderates throughout the region in the struggle against extremism and terror.”

Asked to describe whether plans were being drawn to accelerate or skip portions of the long sidelined road map — the 2002 plan backed by the United Nations, Russia, the United States and the European Union that describes sequential measures to be carried out by Israelis and Palestinians to reach a full political settlement — Ms. Livni defended the process as balancing the need to give Palestinians “a political horizon” while cutting “the process into phases.”

Ms. Rice sought to describe signs of optimism, especially after recent contacts between Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, and Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister.

“I think there are openings now that are there as a result of this alignment, there as a result of the obvious desire of Prime Minister Olmert and President Abbas to move forward,” she said. “So I think the opening is there, but I can’t really judge until I’ve had a chance to really talk to all the interested parties how we can accelerate the road map, how quickly we can accelerate the road map and how we begin to talk about the political horizon that everybody is interested in.

In Palestinian developments on Saturday, the two main factions, Fatah and Hamas, were again stepping up efforts to form a unity government. The process has going on for months without agreement, and has frequently broken down amid street battles between the rivals.

But envoys for Mr. Abbas have been in contact with Hamas’s exiled political chief, Khaled Mashal, who is in Damascus, Syria, Palestinian officials said.

Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman in the Gaza Strip, said this was “one of several Arab and Palestinian efforts to solve the differences.”

Mr. Radwan also said he believed that Mr. Abbas and Mr. Mashal were likely to meet relatively soon.

In a related matter, Mr. Abbas traveled from the West Bank city of Ramallah to neighboring Jordan to discuss the political developments with King Abdullah II, who has sought to mediate in the Palestinian infighting. Mr. Abbas returned to the West Bank later on Saturday, and will meet with Ms. Rice on Sunday.

A Palestinian unity government would seek to end the internecine fighting and establish a leadership acceptable to Western countries, which cut off financing after Hamas, the radical Islamic faction, came to power early last year. Hamas controls the current cabinet, though Mr. Abbas also has substantial powers as the president.

Also on Saturday, some 80,000 Palestinian government workers, about half of the total, agreed to end a strike that had lasted for months. Most of the striking workers are from the West Bank, and many are considered sympathetic to Fatah. In Gaza, where Hamas is much stronger, government workers have not gone on prolonged strikes.

The workers were protesting the government's inability to pay wages. The Hamas government has paid salaries only partly and sporadically because of the cutoff of money that previously came from the Western countries and from tax revenues collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinians.

The government workers are to receive one month's salary immediately, with overdue wages to be paid over the next six months, Palestinian officials said.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, speaking on Palestinian television, said, "The American and Israeli policies seek to push the Palestinian people toward civil war and internal conflict so that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict becomes a Palestinian-Palestinian conflict."

"I call on the Palestinian people and factions, in particular Hamas and Fatah, to halt internal clashes," Mr. Haniya said.

In Washington, the State Department said Friday that the Bush administration would seek Congressional approval for $86 million in "nonlethal assistance" to strengthen branches of the Palestinian security forces directly linked to Mr. Abbas.

Rice Begins Push In The Middle East (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 13 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embarked Saturday on a new push for Israeli-Palestinian peace but set modest goals for herself, saying she was coming without a particular plan or proposal but instead wanted to gather ideas from Israelis, Palestinians and key Arab figures in the region.

"If you don't lay the groundwork very well, then it's not going to succeed," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "And I think no plan can be made in America."

Rice appears to be seeking to lower the temperature of a region shaken by the turmoil in Iraq and last summer's war between Israel and the Islamic group Hezbollah. Aides said she wants to use the Israeli-Palestinian issue as a vehicle to dampen historic animosities and perhaps build a common front against the rising threat of Iran.

U.S. officials have encouraged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to say positive words about a long-dormant Saudi peace plan as well as meetings between Olmert and Palestinian and Egyptian leaders. The sessions are part of an effort to strengthen ties between what Rice calls "mainstream" forces in order to counter extremism. Rice has taken particular interest in the 2002 Saudi peace plan, which held out the prospect of recognition of Israel, in contrast to the vows of Iran and the radical Palestinian group Hamas to eliminate the Jewish state.

Rice is encouraging Israel to take steps to bolster beleaguered Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, such as lifting roadblocks and freeing Palestinian prisoners. The Bush administration is also lobbying Congress for approval of an $86 million package to equip and train security forces loyal to Abbas, who has struggled against Hamas since it won legislative elections last year.

Prospects for peace are hindered, however, because Abbas and Olmert are weak politically, with Olmert receiving only 14 percent approval among those surveyed in a new opinion poll.

After arriving, Rice held a late-night meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Rice plans to meet with Abbas on Sunday at his headquarters in Ramallah in the West Bank before traveling to Amman, Jordan, to meet with King Abdullah. She plans to hold talks with Olmert on Monday before traveling to Egypt.

On Saturday, Abbas met in Amman with Abdullah, and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a top Hamas official, said in Gaza that Hamas was willing to have "serious" talks with Abbas's Fatah movement about a unity government after days of calm in factional fighting.

"The United States and Israel are working and pushing the Palestinian people into a civil war . . . in order to turn this struggle from a Palestinian-Israeli struggle into a Palestinian-Palestinian struggle," Haniyeh said.

Rice had pressed for the elections that unexpectedly brought Hamas to power, a result that Livni told reporters had made the situation "more complicated and more dangerous." Unlike Fatah, which had ruled the Palestinian Authority since its creation following the 1993 Oslo peace accords, Hamas has refused to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, complicating efforts to forge a comprehensive peace agreement.

Rice told reporters she was hoping to "accelerate" a U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map." The plan has been effectively dormant since it was launched shortly before the Iraq invasion.

The road map envisions three stages in the creation of a Palestinian state, but progress is dependent on a series of reciprocal steps by each side, including a crackdown on militant groups such as Hamas by the Palestinian government and a halt to settlement activity by the Israelis. But U.S. officials acknowledge that one flaw of the road map is that it can grind quickly to a halt if either side fails to fulfill one of the steps.

Livni has spoken about finding some way of moving quickly to the second stage of the road map, creating an interim state with provisional borders, as part of a package deal that would resolve Israeli security concerns -- and in turn help bolster Abbas's status among Palestinians. "Part of our responsibility is to give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon while providing the Israelis security," Livni said at a news conference with Rice before their meeting.

Rice, speaking to reporters as she flew to Israel, did not rule out such an approach but expressed caution. "We also have to recognize that there are certain conditions that we're also going to have to be creating on the ground, and we don't want to lose sight of those for a vision that then can't be fulfilled," she said.

Palestinian officials are wary of creating an interim state, believing that it would lock them into a semi-legal status for years. They prefer to go directly to final-status talks on creating a permanent Palestinian state.

Rice Aims To Restart Mideast Peace Bid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 14, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice explored opportunities Saturday for a fresh start in the stalled effort at a political compromise between Israel and the Palestinians. At the start of a weeklong trip to the region, she warned that an enduring peace cannot be stamped "made in America."

Rice said she did not carry a specific plan and she tried to lower expectations for quick changes. Any progress would require political risk-taking from weakened Israeli and Palestinian leaders, and some resolution to escalating divides in the Palestinian ranks.

One idea on the table is a bold stroke — sketching the rough outlines of an eventual Palestinian state even though that day is far off. Other approaches include finding ways to speed up elements of an existing U.S.-backed peace plan.

"This is a very important and challenging time in the Middle East, but a time that I believe does have promise if we exercise our responsibilities with creativity and with resolve," Rice said before an evening meeting with Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni.

Her references were to new strategies and the underlying commitment to freeze the ruling Islamic Palestinian Hamas faction and others she branded extremists, bent on denying peace and democracy to the rest of the Middle East.

"We are determined to resist their efforts, but also to strengthen the hands of those who wish to resist their efforts," Rice said.

The United States wants to move more swiftly to shore up Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. He is in a power struggle with Hamas and grasping for ways to demonstrate progress. Abbas has told U.S. diplomats he needs to offer Palestinians a vision of a political future that makes the frustrating effort to seek peace with Israel seem worthwhile.

To reward Abbas for standing firm against Hamas, the Bush administration soon will ask Congress to approve $85 million to train and equip Abbas' security forces. Israel supports the plan.

"Part of our responsibility is to give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon while providing the Israelis security," Livni said.

Ahead of Rice's visit to Jerusalem and the Palestinian-controlled West Bank, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas contended Saturday that Israel and the U.S. were trying to fan the flames of a Palestinian civil war.

Rice also is promoting President Bush's new strategy for the Iraq war to sometimes skeptical Arab allies and asking those nations to do more to help the struggling government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Rice plans to see leaders of Jordan, home to 700,000 Iraq refugees, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait in the coming days, along with diplomats from Persian Gulf states whose governments generally are friendly to Washington.

Most of the Arab states with the most at stake if Iraq falls apart are also those pressing the U.S. to do more to reinvigorate the stalled Arab-Israeli peace process. Several of those Sunni states are alarmed by the rise of Shiite Iranian influence in Iraq and elsewhere.

Although Rice seemed eager to switch focus from Iraq, the Israeli-Palestinian problems may prove equally difficult.

"I'm not coming with a proposal. I'm not coming with a plan," Rice told reporters on the way to the region. She said two things are always true about Middle East peace efforts.

"If you don't lay the groundwork very well, then it's not going to succeed," Rice said. "And I think no plan can be made in America. There are too many important stakeholders and any progress on the Palestinian-Israeli front is going to require all of the parties."

U.S officials are dismayed at the yearlong drift in peace efforts since Hamas won parliamentary elections and now controls the Palestinian Cabinet and Parliament.

Hamas refuses to renounce violence or recognize Israel, leading the West to cut off vital international aid.

Abbas was elected separately and retains his post, but he has limited power. He has been unable to negotiate a compromise unity government with Hamas, but he has improved his international standing.

The U.S. money for Abbas' security services would be a significant vote of confidence because those forces have a troubled history of corruption and rights violations under Abbas' predecessor, the late Yasser Arafat.

Hamas accuses Washington of trying to provoke a broader intra-Palestinian military confrontation between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah faction, and Hamas points to the money for arms as evidence. Rice stressed that the money would pay for training and other things apart from weaponry, and that it comes with strings attached.

The Palestinians' two main factions have been engaged in a violent power struggle that has claimed 35 lives in recent weeks, although there was reported progress Saturday in secret coalition talks between the two sides.

In the Palestinian-controlled Gaza Strip, Haniyeh called on Hamas and on Abbas' Fatah to halt the violent power struggle.

"Enough, I say enough," he said in a televised speech. "All forms of internal fighting must stop."

In Israel, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has been weakened by allegations of corruption and last summer's Lebanon war that many Israelis believed ultimately undermined their security.

Rice Set For Key Mid-East Meeting (BBC)

BBC.com, January 14, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is due to meet the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, on the second day of a week-long visit to the Middle East.

Ms Rice will see Mr Abbas in Ramallah, a day after saying a "creative" solution is needed to end the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

Arab governments are thought to want a greater US involvement in the conflict in return for support over Iraq.

Later on Sunday she travels to Amman for dinner with Jordan's King Abdullah.

She will then meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem on Monday.

Ms Rice has admitted that she did not head to the Middle East with any specific plan to end the lingering conflict.

She met Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni on Saturday, and declared her hope that some solution could be found.

"This is a very important and challenging time in the Middle East, but a time that I believe does have promise if we exercise our responsibilities with creativity and with resolve." Extremists

Ms Rice's trip will also take her to a series of Arab capitals in an attempt to drum up support for President George W Bush's new strategy in Iraq.

The BBC's Katya Adler, in Jerusalem, says Arab states have made it clear - if the US wants their support in Iraq it must engage more in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Speaking at a joint news conference with Ms Livni, Ms Rice said they were discussing how to push forward the international peace plan for the Middle East, known as the roadmap.

"It is a time when extremist forces are attempting to make it impossible to have the kind of Middle East in which Israelis and Palestinians and other people of the Middle East can live in peace, and in which democracy can make progress," Ms Rice said.

Correspondents say Ms Rice's comments relate to efforts to shore up Mr Abbas in an ongoing power struggle with the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

"We are determined to resist their efforts, but also to strengthen the hands of those who wish to resist their efforts," she said.

Iraq strategy

Ms Rice's week-long tour will also take in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Ms Rice has said Arab leaders have every incentive to help as a stable Iraq is also in their interests.

Both President Bush and Ms Rice have said this week that they intend to step up measures against those threatening to destabilise Iraq.

Mr Bush announced an increase in US troop numbers in an effort to defeat extremists and insurgents in Iraq.

Ms Rice has warned that the US would oppose any Iranian or Syrian interference in Iraq, and said the US would not let either country continue activities that endangered American soldiers in Iraq.

Iranian President Visits Venezuela To Strengthen Ties (NYT)

By Simon Romero

DOJ_NMG_0116889

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 13 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran arrived here on Saturday for talks with President Hugo Chávez, on the first leg of a Latin American visit to enhance Tehran's stature with governments where distrust of the Bush administration already runs deep.

It is Mr. Ahmadinejad's second visit to Venezuela in the past five months, and the two leaders were scheduled to talk about strengthening their economic ties. From here, the Iranian president is to visit Ecuador and Nicaragua, where leftist presidents aligned with Mr. Chavez are taking office this month.

Venezuela's government promoted the visit as an example of Middle Eastern solidarity with Mr. Chávez's opposition to American foreign policy. Venezuela has been a vociferous defender of Iran as the United States steps up efforts to circumscribe Mr. Ahmadinejad's government, most recently through military raids this week on people suspected of being Iranian operatives in Iraq.

The two countries said Saturday night that they would use a $2 billion investment fund to finance projects in Venezuela and Iran, as well as in other countries. In addition, they said they were considering ventures to train teachers and produce manioc starch in Venezuela. Mr. Chávez also said Venezuela and Iran would press for output cuts within OPEC in an effort to push oil prices up from a 19-month low.

State television here showed images of Mr. Chávez embracing Mr. Ahmadinejad and of Iranian cars rolling off an assembly line at a recently inaugurated factory in the city of Maracay. Fifty cadets from Venezuela's naval academy were on hand to receive the Iranian president at the international airport in Maiquetía.

"Welcome, fighter for just causes," Mr. Chávez said in a speech here before the National Assembly, describing Mr. Ahmadinejad as a "revolutionary" and a "brother."

The two countries said Saturday night that they would use a $2 billion investment fund to finance projects in Venezuela and Iran, as well as in other countries. In addition, they said they were considering ventures to train teachers and produce manioc starch in Venezuela. Mr. Chávez also said Venezuela and Iran would press for exporting cuts within OPEC in an effort to push oil prices up from a 19-month low.

Nowhere has Iran's search for allies in Latin America been more fruitful than in Venezuela. The two countries have signed an array of agreements in recent months, pledging to work together here in exploring for oil, building low-income housing and assembling tractors and bicycles, among other ventures.

The tightening alliance with Iran comes as Mr. Chávez pushes for broad changes in Venezuela's political and economic structures. Just this week, Mr. Chávez's government said it would nationalize the entire electricity industry and the country's largest phone company.

Mr. Chávez also announced a plan which, according to some interpretations, would reconfigure municipal governments by replacing them with entities called communal councils. The president's supporters in Congress say the project is inspired by the Paris Commune, the socialist government that briefly ruled Paris in 1871. Critics of the plan, which also includes the construction of entirely new cities in Venezuela's interior, say it would effectively eliminate some of the few elected politicians who remain opposed to the government.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's visit has alarmed Jewish organizations here and elsewhere because of his aggressive talk in relation to Israel. Heinz Sonntag, a prominent Venezuelan sociologist and political commentator, said the visit by Mr. Ahmadinejad was an "affront and an eventual threat to our fellow countrymen who are Jewish."

"The invitation of this personality is the finishing touch on Chávez's announcements this week," said Mr. Sonntag.

Venezuela has a long history of close relations with Middle Eastern countries, dating to the founding of OPEC in Baghdad in 1960 by Venezuela, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, in an effort to keep oil prices high. Mr. Chávez has strengthened those ties through overtures to Iran, and more recently Syria, where Venezuela and Iran have plans to build an oil refinery capable of processing 150,000 barrels a day.

"There is a desire by Chávez to accelerate what he views as a strategic alliance with Iran," said Alberto Garrido, author of "Chávez's Wars," a book recently published here that explores Venezuela's ties to the Middle East. "The Venezuelan left has for decades considered alliances with Muslim countries as one of the ways to create a new civilization through the toppling of American values."

For the time being, Venezuela's relations with Iran have revolved around Mr. Chávez's defense of Iran's uranium enrichment plans, while the two countries deepen their cooperation in oil-related areas. For instance, Venezuela said last month that it would buy four oil tankers from Iran, part of Venezuela's plan to increase its 21-ship tanker fleet through the acquisition of 42 additional vessels.

Iran and Venezuela, the world's fourth- and fifth-largest oil exporters, are also exploring for oil together in Venezuela's Orinoco region. And they have plans for a joint oil trading company, part of an ambition by Caracas and Tehran to price oil in euros instead of dollars in order to weaken the influence of the United States in the international oil market.

Iran seems to have also found a welcome in Ecuador, an oil-exporting country where Mr. Ahmadinejad will attend the inauguration of Rafael Correa, a leftist economist elected president last year. And in Nicaragua, Mr. Ahmadinejad will meet with Daniel Ortega, the former guerrilla leader who assumed the presidency this month.

Iran And Venezuela Plan Anti-U.S. Fund (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, January 13, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela — Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — fiery anti-American leaders whose moves to extend their influence have alarmed Washington — said Saturday they would help finance investment projects in other countries seeking to thwart U.S. domination.

The two countries had previously revealed plans for a joint $2 billion fund to finance investments in Venezuela and Iran, but the leaders said Saturday the money would also be used for projects in friendly countries throughout the developing world.

"It will permit us to underpin investments ... above all in those countries whose governments are making efforts to liberate themselves from the (U.S.) imperialist yoke," Chavez said.

"This fund, my brother," the Venezuelan president said, referring affectionately to Ahmadinejad, "will become a mechanism for liberation."

"Death to U.S. imperialism!" Chavez said.

Ahmadinejad, who is starting a tour of left-leaning countries in the region, called it a "very important" decision that would help promote "joint cooperation in third countries," especially in Latin America and Africa.

It was not clear if the leaders were referring to investment in infrastructure, social and energy projects — areas that the two countries have focused on until now — or other types of financing.

Iran and Venezuela are members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, and Chavez said Saturday that they had agreed to back a further oil production cut in the cartel to stem a recent fall in crude prices.

"We know today there is too much crude in the market," Chavez said. "We have agreed to join our forces within OPEC ... to support a production cut and save the price of oil."

OPEC reduced output by 1.2 million barrels a day in November, then announced an additional cut of 500,000 barrels a day, due to begin on Feb. 1. Dow Jones Newswires reported Friday that OPEC is discussing holding an emergency meeting later this month to reduce output by another 500,000 barrels a day. Venezuela and Iran have been leading price hawks within OPEC.

Ahmadinejad's visit Saturday — his second to Venezuela in less than four months — comes as he seeks to break international isolation over his country's nuclear program and possibly line up new allies in Latin America. He is also expected to visit Nicaragua and Ecuador, which both recently elected leftist governments.

Chavez and Ahmadinejad have been increasingly united by their deep-seated antagonism toward the Bush administration. Chavez has become a leading defender of Iran's nuclear ambitions, accusing the Washington of using the issue as a pretext to attack Tehran.

Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, has called Chavez "the champion of the struggle against imperialism."

U.S. officials have accused Chavez — a close ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro — of authoritarian tendencies, and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said recently in an annual review of global threats that Venezuela's democracy was at risk.

The U.S. also believes Iran is seeking to use its nuclear program to develop an atomic bomb. Tehran says its program is peaceful and geared toward the production of energy.

The increasingly close relationship between Chavez and Ahmadinejad has alarmed some Chavez critics, who accuse him of pursuing an alliance that does not serve Venezuela's interests and jeopardizes its ties with the United States, the country's top oil buyer. Venezuela is among the top five suppliers of crude to the U.S. market.

In a speech earlier Saturday, Chavez called for the U.S. government to accept "the new realities of Latin America," as he brushed aside restrictions that limit presidents to two consecutive terms. He vowed to stay in office beyond 2013, when his term expires, saying he would revise the constitution to get rid of presidential term limits.

But Chavez also said in his state of the nation address to government officials and legislators that he had personally expressed hope to a high-ranking U.S. official for better relations between their two countries.

DOJ_NMG_0116891

Chavez said he spoke with Thomas Shannon, head of the U.S. State Department's Western Hemisphere affairs bureau, on the sidelines of Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega's inauguration earlier this week.

"We shook hands and I told him: 'I hope that everything improves,'" Chavez said. "I'm not anyone's enemy."

Chavez prompted a crash in Venezuelan share prices this past week when he announced he would seek special powers from the legislature to push through "revolutionary" reforms, including a string of nationalizations and unspecified changes to business laws and the commerce code.

He also announced plans for the state to take control of the country's largest telecommunications company, its electricity and natural gas sectors and four heavy crude upgrading projects now controlled by some of the world's top oil companies.

He said Saturday, however, that private companies would be allowed to own minority stakes in the lucrative Orinoco River basin oil projects.

The government has already taken majority ownership of all other oil-producing operations in the country through joint ventures controlled by the state oil company. Most companies have shown a willingness to continue investing despite the tightening terms, which have also included tax and royalty increases.

Presidents Of Iran, Venezuela Plan $2-billion Project Fund (LAT)

By Mery Mogollon, Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez agreed Saturday to create a $2-billion social investment fund, the latest sign of the deepening ties between their oil-rich, anti-U.S. countries.

The fund will finance projects in their countries and others in Latin America and in Africa. Previous cooperative efforts included building joint-venture cement, tractor and automobile factories in Venezuela.

"We must be comrades in the construction of both our countries," Ahmadinejad said at a ceremony at the Miraflores presidential palace here. "We have the potential of being among the most advanced countries in the world."

All the problems of the world, he said, are the result of "powerful countries that only seek economic benefits and do not value human rights because all they are concerned with is lining the pockets of their multinational companies."

Ahmadinejad's Latin American tour is also to take him to Nicaragua, which last week swore in to office a leftist president, and to Ecuador for the inauguration Monday of leftist President-elect Rafael Correa.

U.S. government officials have expressed concern over closer ties between Iran and Venezuela, citing what it has described as Iran's sponsorship of Hezbollah, the militant group in Lebanon believed to have been involved in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center in Buenos Aires that left 85 people dead.

Ahmadinejad and Chavez signed 10 other agreements addressing energy, administration and other topics. Chavez said the two countries were undergoing the "same revolution" and would work together to maintain oil prices at current levels.

"Imperialism won't rest in its effort to weaken us, and one of the strategies is to weaken the price of oil and dominate our reserves," he said. "Our answer will be to defend prices and cut production."

Iran And Venezuela Back Oil Cuts (BBC)

BBC.com, January 13, 2007

The presidents of Venezuela and Iran have called for a cut in oil production by the members of the Opec oil cartel.

Speaking in Caracas, Hugo Chavez and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said they wanted to co-ordinate the group to reduce the amount of crude oil on the market.

Mr Ahmadinejad is visiting Venezuela at the start of a tour aimed at boosting ties with Latin America.

Venezuela has been a strong ally of Iran in its controversial pursuit of a nuclear power programme.

Mr Chavez welcomed Mr Ahmadinejad to Caracas, calling him a "fighter for just causes, to a revolutionary and a brother".

He said the world oil market was oversupplied with crude, and said Opec should act to stop falling prices.

Both countries are major oil producers and members of Opec.

Venezuela and Iran have also agreed to establish a $2 billion fund for projects across the developing world, he added.

US opponents

While in Latin America, the Iranian president will also meet the leftist leaders of Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua.

Mr Ahmadinejad's talks with some of the US's most vocal critics is likely to alarm Washington, says one of the BBC's Latin America correspondents, Duncan Kennedy.

With his eyes fixed firmly on the Middle East, the last thing President Bush wants is another hostile diplomatic front opening up in his own backyard.

Iran insists that it nuclear programme aims to provide energy

But with the arrival of the Iranian president in the region, that is exactly what some commentators are predicting.

The most worrying alliance for Washington is that being forged between Iran and Venezuela, our correspondent says.

Mr Chavez and Mr Ahmadinejad are expected to sign a series of new trade and economic co-operation agreements.

"Iran and Venezuela are two important allies on a global level, the two countries have important industrial and oil projects, which we will follow up in this trip," Mr Ahmadinejad said ahead of his trip, according to the state-run Irna agency.

Uneasy relations

Washington will be watching closely for any concrete measures or policies that develop - chief among them, any sign of Venezuela pursuing its own nuclear programme in conjunction with Iran.

That would be unacceptable to Washington and would turn what are now uneasy relations between the two states into something much more serious, our correspondent says.

Mr Ahmadinejad will also visit Nicaragua, where Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista revolutionary, took office this week following his convincing election victory.

The Iranian president will also attend the swearing-in ceremony of President-elect Rafael Correa in Ecuador on Monday.

Ecuador's new president opposes a free-trade agreement with Washington, arguing it is damaging to Ecuadorean industry.

Mr Ahmadinejad is also expected to meet other South American leaders, including Bolivia's Evo Morales, on the sidelines of the ceremony.

Argentina Pursues Iran In '94 Blast As Neighbors Court Ahmadinejad (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

BUENOS AIRES -- As Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visits Latin America this weekend to strengthen economic and political ties with the region, Argentina's N?stor Kirchner will not be in the line of presidents turning out to greet him.

Kirchner's government has reinvigorated attempts to prosecute Iranian figures for their alleged role in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community center here, recently issuing arrest warrants for nine former Iranian officials. Among those sought is former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, accused of ordering the attack that killed 85 people and injured more than 200.

The pursuit of Iran has been frustrated over the years by blatant corruption in the Argentine judicial system and accusations of coverups. The latest efforts to resolve the case come as much of the region is expanding relations with Iran, and several of Argentina's regional allies are pledging support for Ahmadinejad's government.

The Iranian leader plans to meet this week with Venezuela's Hugo Ch?vez, Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega, Ecuador's Rafael Correa, Bolivia's Evo Morales and possibly others. They are expected to discuss broadening bilateral agreements, such as the technology-sharing deals that Ch?vez signed with Iran last year.

"Clearly the actors driving all of this are Ch?vez and Ahmadinejad," said Michael Shifter, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum in Washington. "Both of them see themselves as global players, and so it's nice for them to build these sorts of alliances and coalitions, which people like Correa and Morales are inclined to join in."

Although Argentina maintains friendly relations with each of those leaders, Kirchner's domestic agenda is driving him in a different direction. For example, he canceled plans to attend Correa's inauguration ceremony Monday after Ahmadinejad announced that he would attend.

The continuing U.S. conflict with Iran complicates matters further: Some critics contend that Kirchner's government has been manipulated by a regionally unpopular U.S. government that wants to use the Argentine court rulings to stir international outrage against Iran.

When one of Kirchner's most loyal and high-profile domestic allies -- former street activist Luis D'Elia -- recently suggested that U.S. and Israeli pressure was fueling Argentina's pursuit of Iran, he was forced to resign from his government post two days later.

For many people in Argentina, the indictments have been a bright spot in a case that has been marred for years by botched attempts to bring the bombers to justice.

"Now at least there is hope, a small light that can be seen in the darkness," said Luis Sergio Grynwald, president of the Argentine-Israeli Mutual Association, the community organization targeted in the attack. "That light hasn't been reached yet, and we'd like it to be bigger, but it's still a light."

The bombing was the second attack on a Jewish target in Argentina. In 1992, a suicide bomber struck the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, killing 29.

Shortly after the community center blast, then-Argentine President Carlos Menem blamed the attack on Islamic extremists from Iran. Menem was eventually saddled with some of the blame for the derailed investigations that followed: In 2002, a former

Iranian intelligence official alleged that Menem, by then out of office, had received $10 million to cover up Tehran's role in the attack. Menem vigorously denied the accusation, but it nonetheless damaged his standing.

The judge investigating the community center bombing -- Juan Jos? Galeano -- was also criticized for undermining the case. He was impeached after being found guilty of misdeeds including paying a defendant $400,000 to testify. He also lost hundreds of hours of wiretap recordings and other evidence.

The only suspects to be tried in the case have been four Argentine police officers and a car thief who were charged as accessories for providing the van used in the bombing. They were acquitted for lack of proof.

Following the judicial missteps, prosecutor Alberto Nisman has been leading a team of investigators dedicated solely to the community center bombing. In late October, Nisman said that his team traced the bombing to a planning session held in 1993 in the Iranian city of Mashhad. He said the motive for the attack had been Argentina's decision to withdraw some of its support for Iran's nuclear ambitions and for its decision to strengthen relations with the United States and Israel.

In November, an Argentine judge said that Nisman's team had provided convincing evidence and issued arrest warrants for the nine former Iranian officials, including Rafsanjani, who was president from 1989 to 1997.

Iran has repeatedly proclaimed its officials had nothing to do with the bombing. In the weeks since Iran said it would ignore the extradition requests, Rafsanjani has maintained a high public profile in Iran, running for a seat in a council of clerics in December.

Even Nisman acknowledges that arresting the suspects is a long shot as long as they stay in Iran. But he insisted that people who criticize his request for the warrants -- particularly those who say he did it solely to bolster the U.S. political case against Iran -- are wrong.

"Unfortunately, there's an upside-down analysis that's happening here," Nisman said. "Instead of analyzing all of this in terms of the proof we have compiled, people are analyzing the case in terms of political convenience."

Officials: Abbas Envoys, Hamas Head Meet (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 14, 2007

Significant progress has been made in secret coalition talks between the top Hamas leader and envoys of moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, officials from both sides said Saturday, signaling a sudden shift after several weeks of deadly internal fighting.

In another unexpected show of unity, the civil servants' union dominated by Abbas' Fatah movement announced Saturday that it was ending a strike it had launched four months ago to protest non-payment of salaries by the Hamas-led government.

And in Gaza, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh called on his Hamas movement and on Fatah to halt their increasingly violent power struggle that has claimed 35 lives in recent weeks.

"Enough, I say enough," he said in a televised speech. "All forms of internal fighting must stop."

The secret coalition talks started in Syria two weeks ago between top Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal and two Abbas envoys, independent legislator Ziad Abu Amr and Mohammed Rashid, a former adviser to Abbas' predecessor, the late Yasser Arafat, officials from both sides said.

The two envoys were heading to Damascus on Saturday for another round of talks, the officials said. Abbas is to visit the Syrian capital later this month. If a coalition agreement is reached, Abbas would meet with Mashaal in Damascus, Abbas aides and Hamas officials said.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy head of Hamas' political bureau in Damascus, confirmed the secret talks and said Abbas was expected to meet with Mashaal during his upcoming visit to Syria.

Abbas unexpectedly left for Jordan on Saturday to brief Jordan's King Abdullah II on the developments. On Sunday, he is to be back in the West Bank, to meet with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is touring the Middle East.

Hamas and Fatah, bitter political rivals, had made repeated attempts in recent months to form a coalition, but talks failed because of disagreements over the political program and control over key Cabinet posts, such as interior, finance and foreign affairs. Hamas balked at international demands that any Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace deals.

Under the emerging coalition deal, former Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, who is close to Fatah, would return to the job, Abu Amr would be named foreign minister and Haniyeh would remain prime minister, a senior Hamas official said.

Two key sticking points in previous talks — the government's program and who will control most of the security forces — have not yet been resolved.

"We are optimistic today," said Nasser Shaer, the deputy prime minister from Hamas.

It remains unclear whether Hamas and Fatah can end the yearlong political deadlock and reach a power-sharing agreement. Hamas, the winner of parliament elections a year ago, controls the Cabinet and parliament, while Abbas, elected separately, wields considerable power as president.

Last month, in a challenge to Hamas, Abbas threatened to call early election legislative and presidential elections, saying the Islamic militants — hit hard by an international aid boycott — have failed to provide basic services to the Palestinian people. Hamas accused Abbas of trying to bring down an elected government by illegal means, and vowed it would prevent elections from being held ahead of schedule.

Meanwhile, the civil servants' union announced its members were ending a four-month strike. The Palestinian Authority is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza, with some 165,000 people on the payroll.

Since Hamas came to power in March, it has only paid partial salaries because of the international aid boycott. The workers ended the strike Saturday without assurances that they would be paid in full. Most of the civil servants already had returned to work before the announcement.

Amnesty For Fatah Fighters A Mideast Hurdle (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Kamel Ghannam, a 31-year-old Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade commander, is the kind of battle-hardened veteran that the Palestinian Authority president needs in his often-violent power struggle with Hamas.

But President Mahmoud Abbas can't have him right now because the warrior is on Israel's "wanted terrorists" list. He is hiding to elude an Israeli army crackdown in the West Bank.

Though Israeli officials would like to see Abbas prevail over Hamas and start negotiating a peace deal with him, they doubt he can fully control militants such as Ghannam and prevent them from turning their guns against Israelis.

That is why Israel is reluctant to give Abbas one of the concessions he wants most: to take hundreds of fighters from his Fatah movement off the wanted list and stop trying to kill or arrest them.

The question of whether Israel should grant such an amnesty for one of the two Palestinian factions is an example of how their armed feud has become entangled with the Israeli-Arab conflict, complicating the Middle East diplomacy that U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice resumed Saturday as she arrived in Israel.

While coaxing the Israelis and Palestinians toward peace, the Bush administration is also trying to help Abbas sideline Hamas, the Iran-backed Islamic movement that controls the Palestinian Authority government, resists peace overtures to Israel and is branded by the United States and Israel as a terrorist group.

Rice told reporters on her flight from Washington that she was coming for "intensive consultations" with Israeli and Palestinian leaders but bringing no proposal. She met Saturday with Israel's defense and foreign ministers and was to hold talks with Abbas today and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday.

In a Dec. 23 meeting that U.S. officials helped arrange, Olmert promised Abbas several concessions as the two men began exploring ways to revive full-scale peace talks that collapsed six years ago.

Mood has soured

But the optimistic mood in Abbas' Fatah camp after that meeting has soured. Israel has been slow to keep its promises, and the army has stepped up its raids in the West Bank, seizing more than 20 Palestinians a day over the last week, many of them Fatah members.

Ghannam, the militia commander, has vanished from the streets of Ramallah.

"From what we heard after the meeting, we relaxed a little," he said of Abbas and Olmert's talk. "The leadership told us we could come out of hiding and live normal lives, get jobs and return to our families, but now we find that we cannot do this."

Ghannam spoke at one of several safe houses he uses here. He moves at night from one to another, avoiding the home of his wife and two small children. He feels betrayed.

"The leadership keeps promising things and failing to deliver," he said. "We cannot trust them anymore."

His bitter remarks echo wider criticism that Abbas is weak as a leader and negotiating partner with Israel.

Abbas lacks a solid base within Fatah's splintered ranks, which face a smaller but more disciplined Hamas fighting force. Trying to wrest political control from an elected Hamas government, Abbas has wavered between threats to call new elections and negotiations with Hamas on sharing power.

He risks losing credibility and strengthening Hamas' argument for violent resistance against Israel if he cannot win Israeli concessions through dialogue.

But Olmert is not in a position to deliver much.

Bruised by last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon and recent corruption scandals, the Israeli leader is unpopular at home and reluctant to take risks. He has yet to make good on his promise to Abbas last month to deliver $100 million in tax and customs revenue that Israel had collected for the Palestinian Authority or to significantly relax travel restrictions for commuters within the West Bank.

Larger issues

Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian official, said Abbas would ask Rice to prod Olmert to move beyond peripheral issues and start negotiating the outlines of an agreement to create a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

Rice discussed such an approach Saturday with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who said she agreed that the talks with Abbas should "give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon," a vision of what a final settlement might look like, while providing for Israel's security.

But Olmert and Abbas are at odds over the security issue.

In their meeting, Abbas called for a cease-fire in the West Bank, extending one he and Olmert established in the Gaza Strip in late November. Abbas proposed that Israel withdraw its troops from the West Bank and entrust his Fatah movement with the task of keeping the militants on Israel's wanted list disarmed and under control.

Olmert rejected a West Bank cease-fire. But the two leaders agreed to form a joint committee to review the wanted list, allowing Palestinian officials to lobby for amnesty for some. Israel has yet to name its members to the panel.

Such a committee was set up in 2005 after the Palestinians declared a unilateral cease-fire in their conflict with Israel. The panel reviewed the status of about 500 wanted Fatah militants who had agreed to stop their attacks, but the truce broke down and the meetings stopped late that year.

Reviving the amnesty effort "is Abbas' way of recruiting militant elements against Hamas," said Shmuel Bar, a former intelligence officer who is now with Israel's Institute for Policy and Strategy. "He's saying, 'Hamas cannot get the Israelis off your backs, but I can.' "

Israel's wanted list is compiled by its intelligence agency and distributed to the army and the police. The government has not said how many names are on it.

'Quiet' militants

Palestinian officials involved in the 2005 review say many of the Fatah militants who stopped their attacks that year are still pursued in army raids and take up arms against the Israelis only to defend themselves.

The officials say these "quiet" militants who should get amnesty include Ghannam, who swears he has not fired his M-16 rifle at an Israeli in nearly four years, and Rabe Hamed, a militia commander who was wounded Jan. 4 in a bungled Israeli undercover operation to seize him in Ramallah. Hamed escaped and went into hiding, but four Palestinians were killed in the two-hour gun battle.

Abbas condemned the raid, saying it belied Olmert's promises to lower tensions in the West Bank. It was taken as a signal that the Israeli government had "more or less lost control over the army, which will make political agreements impossible to carry out," said Mouin Rabbani, a senior Middle East analyst for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit think tank based in Brussels.

Israeli officials say they are not enthusiastic about an amnesty arrangement and doubt one would work. They say Abbas is unwilling or unable to control militants either in Hamas or his own Fatah movement who are still intent on sending suicide bombers into Israel from the West Bank.

The army says 187 militants among the thousands seized in the West Bank last year were allegedly plotting suicide attacks.

A senior army official who meets monthly in the West Bank with one of Abbas' security officials said they never act on his requests to arrest Palestinians suspected of violent activity.

"We sit together, drink, eat, and whatever he might say, I know that he's not going to do anything against the terrorists, and he knows that I know it," said the officer. "And so I continue to arrest his people every day, every night, whenever I like to."

The officer and other Israeli officials said the army made it a priority to pursue active militants, not those on old wanted lists, and was not aiming to dismantle Fatah's militia or weaken Abbas.

"We don't blame Abbas personally," said Mark Regev, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, "but there are those in his Fatah structure who remain hands-on terrorist operatives. If he had the ability to discipline his entire military apparatus, if it weren't such a fragmented organization, the sort of operations we do now would be superfluous."

Kin And Rights Groups Search For Pakistan's Missing (NYT)

By Salman Masood

DOJ_NMG_0116896

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan, Jan. 9 — Amina Masood Janjua has been fighting for some word on the fate of her husband since he vanished from a bus station here in July 2005. In recent months, she and her two teenage sons and 11-year-old daughter have begun a campaign of court petitions, protests and press releases.

More than 30 families of other missing men have joined her, all seeking to locate what they and human rights groups say are hundreds of people who have disappeared into the hands of the country's feared intelligence agencies in the last few years.

The Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, an independent group, estimates that 400 citizens have been abducted and detained across the country since 2001. Amnesty International says many have been swept up in a campaign against people suspected of being extremists and terrorists. But some here also charge that the government is using the pretext of the war on terror to crack down on opponents.

In addition to some with ties to extremist groups, those missing include critics of the government, nationalists, journalists, scientists, researchers and social and political workers, the groups say. Mrs. Janjua says she has compiled a list of 115 missing persons, and says the list could grow as more families gain the courage to come out in the open.

Pakistani officials deny any involvement in extrajudicial detentions or any knowledge of the men's whereabouts.

This week a Supreme Court judge nonetheless ordered the government to speed up the process of finding 41 men listed as missing by Mrs. Janjua and her supporters after the court took up their cases in an unprecedented decision in October.

At the court hearing on Monday, the government acknowledged that it had located 25 of the 41 men listed by Mrs. Janjua, "who are now free," according to Nasir Saeed Sheikh, the deputy attorney general, though it refused to say from where they had been released.

Mrs. Janjua and others said the men were held in detention centers and safe houses of military intelligence, though most of those freed were reluctant to talk about their experiences. Mrs. Janjua maintained that only 18 persons had actually been freed.

Her husband, Masood Ahmed Janjua, 45, an educator and businessman, was not among them. Mr. Sheikh told the court that, according to a report by the Interior Ministry, all intelligence agencies had denied detaining Mr. Janjua.

Mr. Janjua left his home around 9:30 a.m. on July 30, 2005. He was heading to Peshawar in the northwest to attend a religious gathering with a friend, Faisal Fraz, 26, a mechanical engineer from the eastern city of Lahore.

Both had reservations on a 10 o'clock bus bound for Peshawar, but never made it to their destination, according to the families. "Before even reaching the bus stop, somewhere on the way, they were picked up," Mrs. Janjua says.

Relatives of missing persons and rights advocates here say Mr. Janjua and the others are among the many "forced disappearances" or "illegal detentions" that were rare before 2001. In many cases, family members have received no news of the presumed detainees for months and even years.

"Hundreds of people suspected of links to Al Qaeda or the Taliban have been arbitrarily arrested and detained," a report by Amnesty International issued in September said. "Scores have become victims of enforced disappearances; some of these have been unlawfully transferred (sometimes in return for money) to the custody of other countries, notably the U.S.A.," the report said.

"The clandestine nature of the arrest and detention of terror suspects make it impossible to ascertain exactly how many people have been subjected to arbitrary detention or enforced disappearance," it added.

I. A. Rahman, director of the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, said the government was using the cover of a war on terrorism to flout the law. "Unstable states like Pakistan are taking full advantage of 'war on terror,' " Mr. Rahman said. He said the government was using the antiterror campaign to crack down on its opponents and critics, especially in Baluchistan, where government forces are fighting a nationalist insurrection.

"It is correct that many of those arrested or detained were connected with Al Qaeda or extremist organizations," he said. "But a number of people have been taken into custody whose only crime seems to be that they are nationalists in Baluchistan or Sindh. In Baluchistan, there is no Al Qaeda activity," he said.

In cases that are brought before a court, he noted, a government denial of detention basically closes the case on a habeas corpus petition. "It was only in the end of 2006 that the Supreme Court said the government must find out where are these people," he said.

While many of those missing persons were suspected of having links to extremist or terrorist activities or have been involved in them, many among them were innocent, the relatives maintained.

Majid Khan, 26, a computer engineer, disappeared from of Karachi, a southern port city, four years ago and is now in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, said his wife, Rabiya Majid. "We don't why he was arrested," she said.

Mrs. Janjua, too, says she has no clue as to why her husband disappeared. The Janjua family lives in Rawalpindi, in the neighborhood of Westridge, a relatively well-off enclave inhabited mostly by active and retired military officers.

Before his disappearance, Mr. Janjua, who holds a bachelor's degree in marine engineering, was working as managing director of a private institute here, the College of Information and Technology. He was also running a travel agency and involved in charity work, his wife said.

"He had no links with any extremist organization," Mrs. Janjua said, though she acknowledged that he worked "off and on" with Tablighi Jamaat. The group characterizes itself as a nonpolitical, nonviolent movement that seeks to spread Orthodox Islam by proselytizing, but it has also come under suspicion by authorities as a potential recruiting ground for extremists.

Since her husband's disappearance, Mrs. Janjua has taken over his business and his work at the college in addition to leading the drive, with the other families, to find the missing. Together they have formed a group called Defense of Human Rights.

In the last week of December, wives, daughters and sisters of dozens of missing men, led by Mrs. Janjua, gathered in Rawalpindi, holding up posters and portraits of the missing men and shouting, "Give our loved ones back."

But their protest was quickly thwarted by the police. The photographs of the missing men were snatched. The posters were confiscated.

Mrs. Janjua's eldest son, Muhammad, 17, was beaten by the police, who removed his pants to humiliate him before they whisked him away in a police van. He was freed that evening but the next morning the image of Muhammad with his baggy trousers pulled down by the police appeared in newspapers across the country. Op-ed columnists and editorials expressed outrage at police "brutality" and sympathy for the missing people's families surged.

Some of those released, like Muhammad Tariq, 35, have returned home. He is one of the few willing to talk. Mr. Tariq acknowledges that he formerly belonged to Jaish-e-Muhammad, a banned extremist group, but says he just gave the group money and was not an active member.

Mr. Tariq, a business owner from Gujranwala in the east who sells iron pipe, was "picked up in broad daylight on June 14, 2004, by around a dozen plainclothesmen and elite police commandos," his father, Nizamud Din, said in an interview.

Mr. Din said he had been unsuccessful in locating his son through the courts, police officials and even the Senate's Standing Committee on Human Rights. "He was portrayed as a big catch — a big terrorist," Mr. Din said.

President Pervez Musharraf even alluded to the case, without mentioning Mr. Tariq by name, in his book "In the Line of Fire" in connection with a failed assassination attempt in December 2003, Mr. Din said.

General Musharraf wrote in his memoirs that a person from Gujranwala gave refuge to Abu Faraj al-Libbi, the No. 3 Qaeda leader. He was arrested in Pakistan in May 2005 and accused of organizing the failed assassination.

"It is all nonsense," Mr. Tariq said. "I have no link. I don't even know Libbi."

Mr. Tariq says he was singled out because in 2003 he briefly put up a family, introduced to him through a friend, of an Arab man who had been arrested in Quetta.

Mr. Tariq, a father of five, stammers while recounting his time in detention.

"For two years, I did not see the sky, the sun or the moon," he said. He said he was kept in a 4 foot by 7 foot cell in this city, was interrogated by Pakistani military officers, mostly about Mr. Libbi, and endured "all kinds of imaginable torture."

He was released Nov. 27 and pushed from a vehicle at night at an intersection near Islamabad. He said he had never been brought before a court. Mr. Din and Mr. Tariq said they believed the release was a result of the pressure from Mrs. Janjua's group and the Supreme Court case.

Mrs. Janjua hopes her husband will return the same way, some day soon. "At every doorbell," she said, "I think he is back."

Southeast Asians Agree To Trade Zone (NYT)

By Carlos H. Conde

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

CEBU, the Philippines, Jan. 13 — The Association of Southeast Asian Nations made progress toward its goal of economic and political integration at a summit meeting here on Saturday, but it was sidetracked by tensions over how to deal with Myanmar, which has come under fire for its poor human rights record.

Leaders of the 10 members of the organization, known as Asean, agreed to establish a free-trade zone by 2015, intensify their fight against terrorism, protect the region's migrant workers and improve their campaign against H.I.V./AIDS. They also agreed to draft a new charter with broad enforcement powers — a break from the 40-year-old group's tradition of consensus and noninterference.

"We want to advance the sense of community in our shared interest to look after each other in terms of justice, economic development and common security," President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo of the Philippines said during her speech at the opening of the meeting.

Mrs. Arroyo emphasized Asean's drive to expand trade, "to create one of the world's greatest trading blocs."

But the group failed to find common ground on Myanmar, formerly Burma. On Friday, China and Russia vetoed a United States resolution in the United Nations Security Council that criticized Myanmar's persecution of opposition groups.

"How are we going to help you if you are not making progress?" Indonesia's president, Bambang Susilo Yudhoyono, told Myanmar's officials late Friday, according to [a news organization].

Nitya Pibulsonggram, Thailand's foreign minister, told reporters on Saturday that Asean should redouble its efforts "to see what we can do to help one another," to give the Myanmar issue what he called "a regional focus" rather than "have it internationalized."

Asean's new charter, which will be drafted this year, is expected to include mechanisms to monitor and enforce agreements among members, along the lines of the European Union's charter.

Two years ago, Asean formed a body called the Eminent Persons Group to create guidelines for the new charter. On Friday, it released a list of 28 recommendations, including the "strengthening of democratic values, good governance, rejection of unconstitutional and undemocratic changes of government, respect of the rule of law, including international humanitarian law, human rights and fundamental freedoms."

In a sense, the charter is a bid to remain relevant as the economic power of China and India grows, something the group itself acknowledged. "While the Asean charter will bring about a long overdue legal framework, Asean must reposition itself," it said in a statement. "It must address the growing challenges and opportunities of regional integration, the major shifts in the Asian landscape brought about by the rise of China and India, and Asia's widening links with the rest of the world." China and India are not members of Asean.

Asean leaders also signed a counterterrorism agreement that, among other things, makes it obligatory for each member country to share information about terrorist suspects and possibly allow their extradition. The accord called on members to disrupt terrorist financing and to train counterterrorism forces.

Southeast Asia is home to some of the world's deadliest terrorist groups, among them Jemaah Islamiyah, which has links to Al Qaeda, and Abu Sayyaf, a group in the southern Philippines.

Asean's members are Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Chirac's Party Chooses Nominee Amid Intrigue (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

PARIS -- When Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy is nominated Sunday as the uncontested presidential candidate for the center-right Popular Movement party of President Jacques Chirac, it should be a moment of personal and political triumph, capping Sarkozy's four-year campaign for France's highest office.

But bitter rivalries within the ruling Popular Movement party, or UMP, have left Sarkozy wounded and weakened, political analysts and party insiders say. Even though he is the only person on the party's internal primary ballot, he has not won the endorsement of its heaviest hitters, including Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, National Assembly President Jean-Louis Debr?, Defense Minister Mich?le Alliot-Marie or Chirac.

Villepin said last week that he would not even vote for Sarkozy in the primary because he is holding out hope that Chirac will decide at the last minute to run for a third term. When Villepin addressed a meeting of his party's lawmakers after making his comments, he drew a chorus of boos, catcalls and heckling.

"There's so much hatred," said Nicole Bacharan, an analyst at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris. "This should be Sarkozy's moment, but it's not happening for him because his party is split, and he's not getting the momentum from his family that he should."

In fact, some in Sarkozy's camp fear that Chirac could secretly work to sabotage Sarkozy's campaign.

"It's not paranoia -- it's a real possibility," a senior Sarkozy aide said on condition of anonymity. "At the end of the day, we believe Chirac will join Sarkozy. But only at the end of the day. It's a complex relationship. There's a lot of love and hate, admiration and despair."

In the meantime, the aide said, Sarkozy is breaking with tradition and refusing to leave the cabinet while running for president "because the ministry offers a kind of protection for him," leaving him less vulnerable to attack from people inside the government.

Sarkozy, a self-styled reformer who wants to modernize France and reverse its sense of national decline, has broad and enthusiastic support among the party's rank and file, his aides say, and the backing of more than 80 percent of the UMP's 499 lawmakers in the National Assembly and Senate. By late last week, about 60 percent of the party's 340,000 registered members had voted in the primary, most over the Internet. Results will be announced at the party's convention Sunday.

According to recent polls, Sarkozy is in a dead heat with the Socialist Party's nominee, S?gol?ne Royal, 53, in France's two-stage presidential contest. Surveys show that in the first round of voting April 22, which will probably include at least a dozen candidates, Sarkozy and Royal are expected to lead the pack with about a third of the vote each. If both advance to the two-person runoff May 6, polls show each garnering about 50 percent.

After her own tough primary, Royal managed to unify the party around her, at least publicly. But continuing division in the UMP is starting to threaten Sarkozy's candidacy, party insiders say.

The party faithful are saying, "Why on earth can't you stop your division and act in the interest of France?" said UMP Sen. Jo?lle Garriaud-Maylam. "They are really upset and say that if you keep on like this, we're going to abstain."

Political analysts say the heart of the problem dates to 1995, when Sarkozy, who had been considered a Chirac protege and heir apparent, abandoned his mentor and supported a party rival, ?douard Balladur, for president. Chirac won and reportedly never forgave Sarkozy. Today, Villepin, whom Chirac appointed prime minister in May 2005, is widely considered Chirac's favorite to succeed him.

But Villepin, a debonair former diplomat who has never been elected to public office, imploded as prime minister, buffeted first by minority youth rioting outside Paris shortly after he took office, followed five months later by the worst student and labor strike in decades, called to protest an employment bill the prime minister had proposed. His approval rating tanked, killing his presidential hopes.

Chirac's popularity also plummeted. In a poll last week, 81 percent said they did not want the president to stand for reelection.

Nonetheless, Chirac has refused to rule out running for a third term, and Villepin also has kept his options open; under French election law, both men have until March 16 to declare their intentions. Chirac has indicated that he is afraid of becoming a lame duck if he announces a decision not to run too soon, but many analysts believe he wants to leave Sarkozy on tenterhooks.

"At the end, the president will support Sarkozy, but only at the last minute," said Dominique Moisi, a political analyst. "He wants Sarkozy to owe him his victory."

Much of Sarkozy's popularity rests on his opposition to the old statist, Gaullist France that Chirac stands for. In a clear swipe at Chirac, who has overseen an era of deep national despondency, Sarkozy has called for a less imperial presidency and a "rupture" with the past.

"The 'rupture' is a fresh way of doing things, new methods and new ideas," a senior Sarkozy aide said. "Sarkozy says to France that we cannot afford to continue doing things the same way. We are declining."

Aides say Sarkozy supports affirmative action-style programs to help minorities, favors free market reforms and globalization, wants to improve relations with the United States and believes that France should reduce the number of civil servants and cut its bureaucracy.

"The UMP is getting more and more conservative with Sarkozy, and I think that with him, we'll only get right-wing votes," said Jean-Pierre Grance, a UMP National Assembly deputy from southern France who refused to vote for Sarkozy in the primary, hoping Chirac will throw his hat into the ring.

Political analysts say Sarkozy is also suffering from a fear factor. Some people say they are afraid of him, citing his alleged divisiveness and authoritarianism, and the image of him as the nation's top cop who referred to rioting youths outside Paris in the fall of 2005 as "scum," which some critics say fueled the violence.

"There's something in him that's not reassuring people, and there's something in the people around him that really scares people," said Moisi, the analyst. "He's conquered the party, but he is not conquering the hearts of a sufficient majority of the French people."

"There's a difference between image and reality," a Sarkozy aide responded. "He knows he has an image as a scary guy, and he knows he needs to change it, because it doesn't fit with his nature. He's much more lenient and open than people think."

But the aide said Sarkozy's time as interior minister has had its advantages, too, boosting his image as a serious politician at the forefront of two of the country's biggest issues -- security and immigration. In a poll published Friday in Le Parisien newspaper, 80 percent of those surveyed thought the term "courageous" applied to Sarkozy, 68 percent found him "competent" and 57 percent said he would be "able to reform the country."

Sarkozy To Get Party Nomination At Paris Congress (AFP)

AFP, January 14, 2007

French presidential hopeful Nicolas Sarkozy is set to be nominated as an official candidate by the ruling Union for a Popular Movement (UMP), at a party congress that is intended as a triumphant launch-pad for his election campaign.

Some 50,000 supporters of the interior minister and UMP boss have come to Paris on special train and coach services for a day of fanfare and speeches at an exhibition centre on the capital's ring-road.

Early in the afternoon results will be read out of an internal party ballot to designate a candidate in April's presidential election but there is no doubt about the result because Sarkozy was the only contender. He will then deliver a keynote address to the nation.

Polls show that Sarkozy, 51, a hard-hitting rightwinger who promises a "clean break" from France's past, is the only politician who can prevent Socialist favourite Segolene Royal, 53, from becoming the country's first ever woman president.

However his progress has been hampered by bitter feuding inside his own camp, with President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin openly keeping alive the chance of an alternative right-wing candidate -- with Chirac possibly seeking a third term.

Sarkozy supporters are hopeful that a corner has been turned in recent days with endorsements from several politicians normally seen as Chirac loyalists. These include former prime minister Alain Juppe, who praised Sarkozy's "capacity for action".

The candidate plans to move swiftly after Sunday's act of consecration from the party, moving straight away into campaign headquarters in central Paris and leaving for Normandy on the first of regular twice-weekly speaking engagements in the provinces.

The first round of France's presidential election takes place on Sunday April 22, with a second round two weeks later between the two front-runners if -- as is almost certain -- no candidate gets an overall majority.

The latest opinion poll, to be published on Sunday in the weekly newspaper Journal du Dimanche, shows that 75 percent of French people think Sarkozy could attract the support of voters from across the entire right-wing spectrum, not just from his UMP, in a second-round election run-off.

But this is tempered by public concerns about the ambitious, populist interior minister. Fifty-one percent of those questioned in the poll said he "worried" them.

Spanish Prime Minister Takes Political Heat After Airport Attack By Basque Group (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 12 — At his year-end news conference on Dec. 29, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero proclaimed that the peace initiative he had started with the Basque separatist movement ETA months before was making progress.

“Are we better off now with a permanent cease-fire, or when we had bombs, car bombs and explosions?” he asked. “This time next year, we will be better off than we are today.”

The next morning, a bomb ETA had planted in a Renault van exploded in the five-story parking garage of Madrid’s new air terminal, killing two people and causing tens of millions of dollars of damage to Spain’s glittery showpiece of modernity.

Instead of bringing the political establishment of Spain together, the attack ripped it apart. It has left Mr. Zapatero more isolated than at any time in his nearly three years in power and sent the country’s politicians into a frenzy of finger-pointing and backbiting.

“We don’t have a long tradition of democracy, and we’re not used to dialogue,” said Begoña Lasagabaster, a parliamentary deputy from the tiny Basque nationalist party Eusko Alkartasuna. “Instead, we say to each other: ‘I’m right. You’re not.’ If your enemy is a terrorist organization and you can make your political opponent appear to be close to your enemy, you can gain politically.”

Since the attack, the opposition Popular Party has stepped up its criticism of Mr. Zapatero and the dialogue he initiated with ETA, which is listed as a terrorist group by the European Union and the United States, after its announcement of a “permanent cease-fire” last March.

“The government and the prime minister made a mistake in the strategy of their negotiation,” Ana Pastor, a senior Popular Party official, said in an interview. “They’ve got to correct that mistake. They believed in people who kept their pistols nearby.”

Interior Minister Alfredo Pérez Rubalcaba called such criticism “politically perverse.” He pointed out that the Socialists consistently supported the antiterrorism policies of the Popular Party when it was in power, even after ETA broke an earlier truce. “It never occurred to us to criticize,” he said in an interview.

But Mr. Zapatero, who had staked his political reputation on a risky strategy of luring ETA into talks in an attempt to end four decades of separatist violence, has hurt his position by appearing oddly detached since the bombing.

Spain, said Mariano Rajoy, the president of the Popular Party, “is a ship drifting without a rudder.”

Although Mr. Zapatero cut short his family vacation and headed back to Madrid immediately after the bombing, it took him five days to visit the vast bomb site. Mr. Rajoy, who lost to Mr. Zapatero in the 2004 election and may run again next year, was there two days earlier.

Even after the bombing, Mr. Zapatero seemed reluctant to end talks with ETA. In his first public statement to the nation on the night of the bombing, he ordered only a "suspension."

The straight-talking Mr. Rubalcaba changed course three days later, saying that the dialogue had been "broken off, liquidated, finished."

After a closed-door meeting with Mr. Zapatero early this week, Mr. Rajoy called a news conference at party headquarters in which he accused Mr. Zapatero of withholding from him information about the bomb attack and failing to lay out a strategy for combating terrorism in the future.

At the same time, Mr. Zapatero's deputy prime minister, María Teresa Fernández de la Vega, held her own news conference in which she accused Mr. Rajoy of turning "a deaf ear" to working with the government in forging a common antiterrorism strategy.

The local Spanish-language CNN channel flipped back and forth between the news conferences, underscoring the political rivalry.

At a meeting of regional presidents on Friday, Mr. Zapatero made an unfortunate verbal slip, at first referring to the terrorist attack as a "tragic accident," then immediately correcting himself and calling it a "tragic attack."

The opposition Popular Party jumped on him again. Pedro Sanz, the Popular Party president of Rioja, criticized Mr. Zapatero for not apologizing. Manuel Chaves, the Socialist president of Andalucía, shot back that the criticism was "indecent."

The bickering has even filtered down to planning for demonstrations on Saturday called by Spain's large Ecuadorean community and the country's labor unions to mourn the two Ecuadoreans who died in the bombing.

Endless negotiations have occurred throughout the week with the Popular Party, which said it would not participate because it objected to the demonstration's banner, "For Peace and Against Terrorism." The banner also should have called for the defeat of ETA, party officials said.

Ultimately, the Popular Party chose not to take part, the first time a major party has avoided an anti-ETA demonstration since democracy returned to Spain in the 1970s.

[Otherwise, the demonstrations went smoothly, with hundreds of thousands of people marching in Madrid, Bilbao and other cities, mostly in silence and carrying signs with slogans including "For peace — against terrorism," "We are all victims of ETA" and "Peace is the task of all of us."

[But the absence of the Popular Party prompted other slogans as well, including "Absences help ETA" and "Where is Gallardón?" — a reference to the Popular Party mayor of Madrid, Alberto Ruiz Gallardón.]

"The dead are being used for political purposes," said Joffre Pinzón, who is responsible for social affairs for an Ecuadorean citizens' group. "We're talking about the pain that comes from the death of two of our countrymen. How can you have a country with such a high economic level that is so politically immature?"

Some government officials and politicians also find the political bickering unseemly. There are still suspicions that that the center-right party is seeking revenge for its electoral loss in March 2004 by undermining the current government's ability to rule and trying to position itself for national elections in 14 months.

The 2004 election occurred only three days after train bombings by Islamic terrorists in Madrid killed 191 people. At the time, Popular Party leaders said the party was the victim of circumstances, that the Socialist government was illegitimate and that the election was a triumph for terrorists.

"Some people since March 2004 have been using terrorism as a political weapon and that is very dangerous," said Judge Baltasar Garzón, the country's most prominent investigative magistrate, in an interview. "Some people unfortunately want terrorism to be the main plank in election politics. Instead of being united against the terrorists, it gets us fighting among ourselves. It gets us playing the terrorists' game."

Mr. Zapatero is not alone among Spanish leaders in not anticipating an imminent terrorist attack. On March 10, 2004, the departing prime minister, José María Aznar of the Popular Party, boasted in an interview that Spain had enjoyed eight years of "spectacular economic growth" under his leadership and that terrorism "is a lot weaker than it was" when he took office.

The next day, terrorists set off bombs on commuter trains in Madrid, the most deadly terrorist attack in Spain's modern history.

Climate Trumps Terror In Europe (WT)

By Gareth Harding, The Washington Times

BRUSSELS -- A European Commission proposal to slash greenhouse-gas emissions by the end of the next decade has highlighted a growing trans-Atlantic split over global warming that is further stressed by a recent poll that shows Europeans are more concerned about climate change than terrorism.

In a major package of measures aimed at combatting global warming last week, the European Union's executive arm urged the bloc's 27 member states to unilaterally cut emissions of greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide, by one-fifth by 2020 compared with 1990 figures.

It also called on the United States -- which has rejected mandatory curbs on emissions -- and developing countries such as China and India to join it in signing up to a 30 percent reduction in greenhouse gases by the same date.

"Europe must lead the world into a new -- or maybe, one should say, post-industrial -- revolution: the development of a low-carbon economy," Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said while announcing the plan in Brussels on Wednesday.

"We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future," he said.

The European Union is currently committed to cutting a basket of six greenhouse gases by 8 percent by 2010, compared with 1990 figures. However, recent data from the European Environment Agency shows this target is unlikely to be reached without additional measures.

The commission says its new goal can be reached if member states improve energy efficiency, accept competition between national energy suppliers, agree to produce 20 percent of their energy from renewable sources such as wind and solar power by 2020 and ensure that 10 percent of gasoline consumed is made from biofuels by the same date.

The commission's plan, which was slammed as "unambitious" by green groups and members of the European Parliament, underlines the radically different approaches to tackling climate change in Europe and the United States.

A poll released by the France 24 TV channel on Jan. 5 showed global warming to be a greater planetary challenge than terrorism in four of the five European countries where the survey was conducted.

In France, for example, 54 percent said the greatest challenge to the planet was global warming, compared with 26 percent who cited terrorism. By contrast, 49 percent of Americans cited terrorism as the biggest threat, while 30 percent mentioned climate change.

Simon Tilford, an analyst at the London-based think tank Center for European Reform, said Americans and Europeans differed over climate change because "in Europe, global warming is accepted as a fact, whereas for a lot of people in the United States, the jury is still out."

However, Mr. Tilford said, attitudes toward global warming were changing in the United States and "whoever wins the next presidential election will take a very different line to the current administration."

In similar polls, such as the German Marshall Fund's annual Trans-Atlantic Trends survey, terrorism has been the No. 1 concern of both Europeans and Americans since the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. But global warming has shot to the top of the political agenda in recent months owing in part to former Vice President Al Gore's film "An Inconvenient Truth," stern warnings from scientific advisory bodies and hard-to-ignore evidence that climate change is already happening.

The 10 hottest years since recordkeeping began in Europe have occurred in the past 11 years and the commission's report paints a grim picture of a continent battered by floods in the north and drought in the south if temperatures rise by 3 percent, as some scientists predict.

Nathalie Labalme, an analyst at the Paris office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States, said concern about terrorism was less on the "old Continent" because Europeans have lived with it longer than Americans.

"Because of that, Europeans believe you cannot win the war on terrorism, you can only contain it."

However, the France 24 poll, which was conducted in early December among 12,570 persons in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Britain and the United States, revealed that Europeans are more worried about the challenge of religious fanaticism than Americans. In Italy, Spain and Germany, it was cited as the No. 1 threat to the planet.

200 Die In Darfur During Week Of Intertribal Battles (WP/AP)

By Mohamed Osman

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Jan. 13 -- More than 200 people have died in clashes between ethnic African farmers and nomadic Arabs in South Darfur in the past week, leading the Sudanese government to send emissaries to try to reconcile the tribes involved, officials said Saturday.

The fighting was the latest outburst in a nearly four-year-long conflict that has caused as many as 450,000 deaths and chased 2.5 million people from their homes in Sudan's vast Darfur region, where nomadic tribes and farming communities have long wrangled over access to scarce water.

The war began when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the Arab-dominated government in February 2003, charging it with neglect. The government is accused of responding by unleashing an Arab militia known as the Janjaweed that has been blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict. The Sudanese government rejects the allegations.

The latest fighting involved Habania Arab nomads and Falata ethnic African farmers, Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardhi told the independent newspaper Al-Rai Al-Aam. He said that more than 200 people had been killed over the past week, mainly nomads, and that the government had sent reconciliation missions to try to end the fighting.

"The situation between the two sides remains flammable," he said.

Witnesses who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals said the clashes began a week ago in an area south of Nyala when Habania nomads killed nine Falata tribesmen they accused of stealing cows. Habania fighters later attacked a Falata settlement but suffered heavy casualties, the witnesses said.

Sudanese Interior Minister Zubair Bashir Taha appealed to tribal leaders to stop the killing and "resort to the voice of wisdom," the state-run SUNA news agency said.

The government's casualty estimate could not be independently verified because the government has barred foreign journalists from Darfur for months.

The African Union peacekeeping mission deployed in Darfur said it had not investigated the violence. "But we encourage reconciliation missions to avoid this kind of fighting over resources," A.U. spokesman Noureddine Mezni said.

He said the African Union was also aware of separate clashes between other tribes of nomads and farmers that killed 42 people elsewhere in Darfur earlier in the week, according to Sudanese media.

About 7,000 A.U. peacekeepers have struggled to maintain a cease-fire in Darfur since the government and one of the rebel groups signed a peace agreement in May. Khartoum has opposed a U.N. Security Council effort to take over command of the peacekeeping force and bring in 20,000 U.N. soldiers and police officers.

Brazil Gambles On Monitoring Of Amazon Loggers (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

REALIDADE, Brazil — A Brazilian government plan set to go into effect this year will bring large-scale logging deep into the heart of the Amazon rain forest for the first time, in a calculated gamble that new monitoring efforts can offset any danger of increased devastation.

The government of President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, in an attempt to create Brazil's first coherent, effective forest policy, is to begin auctioning off timber rights to large tracts of the rain forest. The winning bidders will not have title to the land or the right to exploit resources other than timber, and the government says they will be closely monitored and will pay a royalty on their activities.

The architects of the plan say it will also help reduce tensions over land ownership in the Amazon, the world's largest tropical forest, which loses an area the size of New Jersey every year to clear-cutting and timbering.

In theory, 70 percent of the jungle is public land, but miners, ranchers and especially loggers have felt free to establish themselves in unpoliced areas, strip the land of valuable resources and then move on, mostly in the so-called arc of destruction on the eastern and southern fringes of the jungle.

But the called-for monitoring of the loggers allowed into the rain forest's largely untouched center will come from a new, untested Forest Service with only 150 employees and from state and municipal governments. That concerns environmental and civic groups because local officials are more vulnerable to the pressures of powerful economic interests and to corruption.

Further, the new system assumes that the world community will also play a part and buy timber only from merchants who are properly licensed and will avoid unscrupulous dealers.

The plan "can be a good idea in places where the situation is already chaotic," said Philip Fearnside, a researcher at the National Institute for Amazon Research in Manaus who recently visited this remote area. "But it's a different story in areas where hardly any logging or deforestation has taken place, where you are actually going to be encouraging the introduction of predatory forces that don't exist there now."

On paper and in principle, said Stephan Schwartzman, an Amazon specialist at Environmental Defense in Washington, "I think everyone agrees that this system is an improvement over the current situation, which is totally out of control."

But in the end, he added, "everything is going to depend on how it is done and whether the financial and human resources are there to make it work."

Here in this small settlement called Reality, along the rutted Highway BR-319, those resources do not yet exist, as residents have discovered. When outsiders recently appeared to fish out of season, wiping out protected species and killing three manatees, the peasants here went to the authorities looking for help, only to be turned away.

"They told us that we had to be the monitors ourselves, but we don't have the ability to do that," said Antonio Marfoni, a settler. "There's no working phone here, and we don't have the money or the time to be able to take the bus into town to denounce violations."

Last October, during the final debate of the presidential campaign, the opposition candidate, Geraldo Alckmin, called the plan "irresponsible," accused Mr. da Silva of wanting to "privatize the Amazon" and added, "If today there is no supervision, imagine what will happen if you hand it over to the private sector."

Though the environmental movement was one of the founding constituencies of Mr. da Silva's Workers' Party, he made it clear after being re-elected to another four year term that his main goal was to get the Brazilian economy growing at 5 percent a year.

In November, he complained of "all the obstacles I have with the environment" and with "the Indian question," which he said were hindering Brazil's development.

But the proposal's supporters dismiss criticisms as unfounded. Jorge Viana, who is a member of Mr. da Silva's party and was governor of the Amazon state of Acre until Jan. 1, contends that "this is one of the most important initiatives that Brazil has ever adopted in the Amazon precisely because you are bringing the forest under state control, not privatizing it."

"This is a battle Brazil has to win," he added. "There's only one way to save the forest, and that is by using it, responsibly and rationally."

Claudio Langone, executive secretary of the Environment Ministry, said in a telephone interview from Brasília: "Brazil today is losing money due to the illegal exploitation of timber. With this new dynamic of management, legal deforestation and sustainable development, we want to create barriers to predatory advancement and increase the value of the forest."

But some here fear that increased value will bring with it the kind of violence that has struck other more-developed areas of the Amazon.

Ivonete Aparecida Paes, a Roman Catholic nun who is the coordinator of the church's Justice and Peace Commission in this area, said, "Since none of the settlers already here have titles to their tracts, that creates the possibility of greater conflicts over land ownership."

After much debate, it was decided that the leases would run for 30 years. But Paulo Adario, director of Greenpeace's Amazon campaign, said that "some species need 45 years or more to regenerate," and that loggers might thus lack an economic incentive to care properly for a tract that would no longer be theirs when the trees they replaced reached harvestable size.

Already, there are signs of logging interests establishing themselves here. A sawmill opened just down the highway in mid-2005 and was operating at full capacity during a recent visit. Along the highway itself, there is now a clearing in which logs are piled haphazardly, like giant sticks.

"No one has the authorization to cut so much wood, even with a forest management plan," said Leila Mattos, the director of Pacto Amazônico, an environmental group based in Humaitá, the closest town of any size. "I came by here at the beginning of November, and none of this was here. This is more than a year's worth of timber."

In addition, peasant settlers unable to obtain land of their own in Rondonia, a state south of here, have also begun moving up the highway and flocking to the area. Theirs is a pre-emptive action, aimed at establishing themselves on land that may go to logging companies later and thus forcing the government to give them other homesteads in return.

During an interview in Humaitá, Francisco Araujo, the director of the regional office of the governmental environmental agency, said that no matter who ended up in charge of supervising the timber extraction plan, the task would be hard. He complained of a shortage of gasoline and personnel and a lack of police protection for his agents.

"In reality, these conservation areas were created without very precise field studies," Mr. Araujo said. "Only now are the technicians looking at the problems in the area. The infrastructure is very precarious. There is no equipment or physical base from which to operate, just a shack in which to stay, without a telephone."

In the absence of the needed resources, he said, government policy envisions "a new partnership with society." But those who work most closely with the peasant settlers who are being asked to bear that burden remain skeptical.

"To think that they can monitor violations in the absence of the state is a dream," Sister Paes said. "The Amazon has no tradition of the poor standing up to the powerful. People simply don't know how to do that."

Don't Ban Your Instincts, Ban Ki-moon (WP)

By John R. Bolton

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the new U.N. secretary general, has done some unusual things to kick off his tenure. At the recent annual dinner of the U.N. Correspondents Association in New York, for instance, he entertained the guests briefly by singing, to the tune originally written for Santa Claus, his own arrangement: "Ban Ki-moon is coming to town."

DOJ_NMG_0116905

On Tuesday, Ban is coming to this town, his first visit since assuming office on Jan. 1. The former South Korean foreign minister has already made it clear that he intends to be a different kind of "SG" from his predecessor. The United States backed Ban for his new post, largely with such a change in mind. Nonetheless, his first few days in office have already raised some questions. The struggle is underway to determine what sort of leader Ban will be: Will the status quo of the U.N. system overwhelm him, or will he follow his instincts and those of his supporters, including Washington?

Consider the following issues:

First, responding to Iraq's recent execution of Saddam Hussein, Ban said that the decision of whether to invoke the death penalty is a matter for each U.N. member state to decide for itself. This provoked howls of outrage from the international high-minded, who over the past decade had successfully encouraged U.N. resolutions opposing the death penalty from the U.N. Human Rights Commission (a body that eventually was abolished because it had only an incidental relationship with human rights). "The U.N. is against the death penalty!" the high-minded complained, arguing that Ban's comments amounted to a retreat from Kofi Annan's public outspokenness for the so-called U.N. position. Shaken by this barrage, Ban partly backed down later, urging the Iraqi government to stay the execution of the two men sentenced to death along with Hussein.

But his first instinct was the right one. The real controversy here is not about the death penalty, but more fundamentally about the proper role of the United Nations itself, and especially of the secretary general. The United Nations as an institution cannot have a legitimate position on a domestic issue such as the death penalty when there is such fundamental disagreement among its sovereign members -- and especially where democratically legitimate governments have different views. To say that the secretary general must mouth the position adopted by a majority of countries in some U.N. body, whether legitimately or not, is a prescription for endless trouble. Were earlier secretaries supposed to declare routinely that "Zionism is a form of racism," as the General Assembly solemnly and overwhelmingly decided in 1975?

According to the U.N. Charter, the secretary general is the institution's "chief administrative officer" -- not its chief moralizer. Those who complain that Ban's comment forfeited the role that Annan so ardently played should understand instead that Annan's proclivities were not ultimately helpful to the world body. If he had spent less time moralizing and more time doing his day job, the United Nations may have been spared the oil-for-food scandal, procurement fraud and widespread sexual exploitation and abuse by its peacekeepers.

Even more problematic than the death penalty debate was another matter Ban raised during his first week on the job. In an interview, he argued that "if the issues with the conflicts between Israel and Palestine go well," other issues, such as Iran and Lebanon, "are likely to follow suit." This position is unquestionably the received wisdom in Turtle Bay, and also reflects the view of Ban's predecessor.

It is unclear whether Ban was articulating his personal view or was merely following the talking points provided by the U.N. secretariat. The idea that Hezbollah's efforts to destabilize and overthrow the democratically elected government of Lebanon might be curtailed or eliminated by progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front is hard to take seriously. Similarly, believing that peace and stability would emerge in Iraq if only those troublesome Israelis could be brought into line is more a matter of faith than of logic.

Ban's reliance on this favorite U.N. clich?, however, is more than simply a lapse in judgment; it may well reveal his intentions for future involvement in the Middle East, an involvement embodied in the "Quartet," an ungainly occasional gathering of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the secretary general. U.S. policymakers should start working overtime now to correct the misimpression that Ban may have obtained from his briefers. In the even worse case that Ban's comment reflects his own views, the need for corrective action is even more acute.

Much to his credit, Ban has already made history early in his tenure. He announced last week that he will make public his financial disclosure report, the first U.N. secretary general ever to do so -- and something that Annan repeatedly refused to do. Ban has stressed that he wants to restore trust and confidence in the United Nations, which it sorely needs. And although much more must follow to even approximate the recommendations of the Volcker Commission in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal, Ban's disclosure will be a good first step.

Accountability begins with transparency, and within the U.N. system, the secretary general is especially well-placed to lead by example. That Ban's decision was even newsworthy underscores how much work still remains, and how easy it was to start. As a longtime civil servant in South Korea, Ban is likely to offer a short and boring financial report, as one may have also expected from Annan, a longtime U.N. civil servant. In fact, Annan could go a long way toward regaining trust and confidence even now by disclosing his U.N.-era finances.

Finally, Ban also made the courageous decision to call for the resignations of all senior secretariat officials, about 60 altogether, except those chosen with the concurrence of other U.N. bodies. This was a change that Washington had urged, one that can make clear that high-level U.N. jobs are not entitlements, either for the individuals involved or their countries of origin.

Because this sort of transitional "cleaning house" is unfamiliar to the U.N. system, U.S. advocacy of the concept raised questions, and Ban's decision to implement it will undoubtedly raise more.

Ban need not accept all of the resignations, although he should accept the vast majority, for the same salutary reason why incoming U.S. administrations bring in new people at the top levels of government. The key is to shake up the secretariat's entrenched baronies, and to let them know that new management is in charge. Although it may not be noteworthy to Americans, Ban's decision on resignations was striking within the United Nations. On the hiring side, he has not made enough appointments to judge whether he is assembling a team with the right stuff -- this obviously warrants close U.S. attention.

No one of these four incidents, nor all of them together, tell the complete story of Ban Ki-moon. Where he has followed his instincts -- deferring to member governments, supporting U.N. reform and demonstrating personal integrity -- he has done well. When he has followed the conventional wisdom inside the U.N. bubble on First Avenue in New York -- on matters of U.N. theology such as the death penalty and the Middle East -- he has not. In Washington this week, the president and others will again have the chance to take his measure.

Based on what we have seen so far, I hope they encourage him to let Ban be Ban.

John R. Bolton, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, served as U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations from August 2005 to December 2006.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Stormy Outlook As Gonzales Faces Senate Democrats (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who has faced controversy throughout his two-year tenure, is likely to enter an even stormier phase next Thursday when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for the first time since control fell to the Democrats.

But he shows little anxiety about more vehement criticism of his stewardship at the Justice Department.

“They have an institutional interest to gather up information about what the executive branch is doing,” Mr. Gonzales said Friday, in an interview in which he adopted the mildly juridical tone of a law professor.

Referring to the Justice Department, he said: "We likewise have an institutional interest in maintaining the confidentially of certain kinds of information. From my perspective, there are two competing institutional interests. This is not a partisan issue. It's an institutional issue of interests that have to be accommodated."

But there seems to be little likelihood that the Judiciary Committee will be satisfied with that kind of summation.

Mr. Gonzales's chief antagonist is likely to be the panel's chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, a Democrat who in recent public statements has castigated the Bush administration for years of "corrosive unilateralism" in refusing to cooperate with Congress and said he would enforce the committee's demands for information with subpoenas if necessary.

"The very nature of the job means I'm going to be in the middle, the department will be in the middle, of all the hard issues, all the difficult issues that the Congress will be very, very interested in," Mr. Gonzales said. "You're not going to have total agreement, it's not going to be a love fest necessarily between the Congress and the attorney general of the United States."

It was Mr. Gonzales, a former Texas judge, who as White House counsel provided legal thinking to support some of the administration's most hotly debated operations, like its program of surveillance without warrants. He also wrote a draft memo in January 2002 that said captured members of Al Qaeda should not be covered by the Geneva Conventions — a position later adopted by the administration. He succeeded John Ashcroft as attorney general in 2005.

Although Mr. Leahy recently had lunch with Mr. Gonzales and the two men are on cordial personal terms, the senator has ripped into the Justice Department for ignoring or rejecting his requests over the years for dozens of internal documents and for failing to turn over information about a host of activities, mostly related to counterterrorism policies.

Even so, Mr. Gonzales said he was looking forward to testifying. "I view these hearings as an opportunity to tell our story," he said. "I think in many ways we have a good story to tell. Sometimes we are constrained because we are in a period of war in giving out as much information as we'd like because there are things we'd like to talk to about."

In the interview, he said he would seek a conciliatory relationship with Democrats, when and where he can, but would continue to protect zealously what he regards as the department's core interests. He said the Justice Department had already provided a great deal of information to Congress according to traditional practice and court decisions on the subject.

He said the Justice Department would review each Congressional request in an effort to comply with Congressional demands: "Is there a way to limit the scope of the request? Is there a way to give them the information without actually turning over the documents? Would it suffice to provide a briefing without compromising something that would be extremely damaging to the national security of our country? Could we provide a summary, a written summary, that they would want to see? Perhaps someone in the executive branch would read a portion of a document. We have legal obligation to see what can be done."

Mr. Gonzales expressed the hope that battles with Congress would not undermine his efforts to accomplish his goals at the Justice Department. "The American people lose if we spend the next two years fighting over documents," he said.

Mr. Gonzales said he hoped that Congress would work with the Justice Department on other administration priorities, like the protection of children against predators and pedophiles, an overhaul of immigration laws, the elimination of disparities in prison sentences and a crackdown on online pharmacies that sell drugs to teenagers.

He said that he had realized when he took over at the Justice Department that he was likely to be thrust into controversies between law and politics. "I came into this job with my eyes wide open, understanding what the challenges would be, and I have not been disappointed. It's tough. At the same time, it's exhilarating."

Official Attacks Top Law Firms Over Detainees (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — The senior Pentagon official in charge of military detainees suspected of terrorism said in an interview this week that he was dismayed that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms were representing prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and that the firms' corporate clients should consider ending their business ties.

The comments by Charles D. Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, produced an instant torrent of anger from lawyers, legal ethics specialists and bar association officials, who said Friday that his comments were repellent and displayed an ignorance of the duties of lawyers to represent people in legal trouble.

"This is prejudicial to the administration of justice," said Stephen Gillers, a law professor at New York University and an authority on legal ethics. "It's possible that lawyers willing to undertake what has been long viewed as an admirable chore will decline to do so for fear of antagonizing important clients.

"We have a senior government official suggesting that representing these people somehow compromises American interests, and he even names the firms, giving a target to corporate America."

Mr. Stimson made his remarks in an interview on Thursday with Federal News Radio, a local Washington-based station that is aimed at an audience of government employees.

The same point appeared Friday on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal, where Robert L. Pollock, a member of the newspaper's editorial board, cited the list of law firms and quoted an unnamed "senior U.S. official" as saying, "Corporate C.E.O.'s seeing this should ask firms to choose between lucrative retainers and representing terrorists."

In his radio interview, Mr. Stimson said: "I think the news story that you're really going to start seeing in the next couple of weeks is this: As a result of a FOIA request through a major news organization, somebody asked, 'Who are the lawyers around this country representing detainees down there?' and you know what, it's shocking." The F.O.I.A. reference was to a Freedom of Information Act request submitted by Monica Crowley, a conservative syndicated talk show host, asking for the names of all the lawyers and law firms representing Guantánamo detainees in federal court cases.

Mr. Stimson, who is himself a lawyer, then went on to name more than a dozen of the firms listed on the 14-page report provided to Ms. Crowley, describing them as "the major law firms in this country." He said, "I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms, and I think that is going to have major play in the next few weeks. And we want to watch that play out."

Karen J. Mathis, a Denver lawyer who is president of the American Bar Association, said: "Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law. To impugn those who are doing this critical work — and doing it on a volunteer basis — is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans."

In an interview on Friday, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said he had no problem with the current system of representation. "Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases," he said.

Neither the White House nor the Pentagon had any official comment, but officials sought to distance themselves from Mr. Stimson's view. His comments "do not represent the views of the Defense Department or the thinking of its leadership," a senior Pentagon official said. He would not allow his name to be used, seemingly to lessen the force of his rebuke. Mr. Stimson did not return a call on Friday seeking comment.

The role of major law firms agreeing to take on the cases of Guantánamo prisoners challenging their detentions in federal courts has hardly been a secret and has been the subject of many news articles that have generally cast their efforts in a favorable light. Michael Ratner, who heads the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York-based human rights group that is coordinating the legal representation for the Guantánamo detainees, said about 500 lawyers from about 120 law firms had volunteered their services to represent Guantánamo prisoners.

When asked in the radio interview who was paying for the legal representation, Mr. Stimson replied: "It's not clear, is it? Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving moneys from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

Lawyers expressed outrage at that, asserting that they are not being paid and that Mr. Stimson had tried to suggest they were by innuendo. Of the approximately 500 lawyers coordinated by the Center for Constitutional Rights, no one is being paid, Mr. Ratner said. One Washington law firm, Shearman & Sterling, which has represented Kuwaiti detainees, has received money from the families of the prisoners, but Thomas Wilner, a lawyer there, said they had donated all of it to charities related to the September 2001 terrorist attacks. Mr. Ratner said that there were two other defense lawyers not under his group's umbrella and that he did not know whether they were paid.

Christopher Moore, a lawyer at the New York firm Cleary, Gottlieb, Steen & Hamilton who represented an Uzbeki detainee who has since been released, said: "We believe in the concept of justice and that every person is entitled to counsel. Any suggestion that our representation was anything other than a pro bono basis is untrue and unprofessional." Mr. Moore said he had made four trips to Guantánamo and one to Albania at the firm's expense, to see his client freed.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, wrote to President Bush on Friday asking him to disavow Mr. Stimson's remarks.

Mr. Stimson, who was a Navy lawyer, graduated from George Mason University Law School. In a 2006 interview with the magazine of Kenyon College, his alma mater, Mr. Stimson said that he was learning "to choose my words carefully because I am a public figure on a very, very controversial topic."

Lawyers Blast Pentagon Official (MH/KR)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald/Knight Ridder, January 13, 2007

A Defense Department official has stirred up a maelstrom in the American legal community by calling on corporate America to boycott law firms that help represent captives at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Speaking to a morning radio talk show Thursday, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, rattled off a list of some of the most prestigious law firms in the nation.

Each apparently has attorneys providing pro-bono, or no-charge, legal representation to captives at the U.S. Navy Base, where the Bush administration is holding some 395 men and teens as enemy combatants.

"It's shocking," said Stimson, 43, a former federal attorney and Navy lawyer. ``The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees."

By late Friday, major U.S. legal advocacy groups condemned his remarks -- and a senior defense official distanced the Pentagon from them as well.

"Mr. Cully Stimson's comments in a recent media interview about law firms representing Guantánamo detainees do not represent the views of the Defense Department or the thinking of its leadership," said Bryan Whitman, the senior Pentagon spokesman.

Stimson was speaking to a Washington, D.C., radio station, Federal News Radio, which runs long interviews for commuting government workers.

"I think quite honestly when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists that hit their bottom line in 2001," he said, ``those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms."

None of the Guantánamo captives has been convicted of crimes.

Into this vacuum, 500 U.S. lawyers, ranging from small solo practitioners to major national law firm partners, have filed unlawful detention lawsuits on behalf of Guantánamo detainees.

Moreover, private attorneys arguing on behalf of the captives have also handed the Bush administration two major defeats at the U.S. Supreme Court.

Miami defense attorney Neal Sonnett, who has not worked on the cases but has been an American Bar Association observer at Guantánamo, called Stimson's remarks "irresponsible" and ``shameful."

"It's not only an attack on corporate America," he said, ``but an attack on the rule of law."

Stimson, a former George W. Bush administration deputy U.S. attorney, rattled off such a complete list of the major law firms that Sonnett concluded it was part of a choreographed campaign ``to intimidate lawyers and their law firms who are rendering important public service."

Sonnett described pro-bono representation of someone who can't defend himself -- regardless of a captive's guilt or innocence -- as a bedrock American value.

Also Friday, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., wrote President Bush a letter of protest, calling Stimson's remarks "reprehensible" and ``especially appalling . . . from a senior defense official responsible for U.S. detention policy."

"I hope you will immediately disavow Mr. Stimson's statements and take the appropriate action against this official," said Leahy, a lawyer and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0116914

Among the firms Stimson named were Pillsbury Winthrop, Jenner & Block, Wilmer Cutler Pickering, Covington & Burling, Sutherland Asbill & Brennan, Paul Weiss Rifkin, Mayer Brown, Weil Gottshal, Pepper Hamilton, Venable, Alston & Bird, Perkins Coie, Hunton & Williams, Fulbright Jaworski.

They are identified in the U.S. District Court docket in Washington, D.C., where Guantánamo captives have filed their lawsuits against the Bush administration.

But Stimson said the list was compiled in response to a Freedom of Information Act request by a major news organization, which he did not name.

The Washington Post led the charge in condemnation on Friday morning in an editorial, 'Unveiled Threats: A Bush appointee's crude gambit on detainees' legal rights."

Separately, the American Bar Association issued a statement Friday condemning the comments.

"Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law," said ABA President Karen J. Mathis.

``To impugn those who are doing this critical work -- and doing it on a volunteer basis -- is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans."

The American Civil Liberties Union took a slightly different approach in its condemnation:

"What Mr. Stimson condemns are precisely the values we should be trying to defend in the war on terror," said ACLU National Director Steven R. Shapiro.

Round Up The Usual Lawyers (NYT)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

No one who has followed President Bush's policies on detainees should be surprised when a member of his team scorns American notions of justice. But even by that low standard, the administration's new attack on lawyers who dare to give those prisoners the meager representation permitted them is contemptible.

Speaking this week on Federal News Radio, a Web site and AM radio station offering helpful hints for bureaucrats and helpful news for the administration, Cully Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, tried to rally American corporations to stop doing business with law firms that represent inmates of the Guantánamo internment camp.

It does not seem to matter to Mr. Stimson, who is a lawyer, that a great many of those detainees did not deserve imprisonment, let alone the indefinite detention to which they are subjected as "illegal enemy combatants." And forget about the fundamental American right that everyone should have legal counsel, even the most heinous villain.

In his interview, reported yesterday by The Washington Post editorial page, Mr. Stimson rattled off some of the most respected law firms in the country that, after initial hesitation, have courageously respected that right. He called it "shocking" that they were "representing detainees down there" and suggested that when corporate America got word of this dastardly behavior, "those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms." He added: "We want to watch that play out."

When his interviewer asked who was paying these firms for the work, Mr. Stimson said, "It's not clear, is it?"

Actually, it is quite clear. Mr. Stimson surely knows that the vast majority of those cases are being handled for free by law firms that have not signed on to Mr. Bush's post-9/11 revision of the American rules of justice. Still, he persisted, saying some lawyers were "receiving monies from who knows where."

The interview was a greatest-hits remix of Bush administration nonsense about Guantánamo, including Mr. Stimson's message to corporate executives that lawyers "are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001." The only terrorists at Guantánamo associated with 9/11 were transferred there recently after being held for years in secret C.I.A. prisons where no lawyer could enter.

Not only do we find Mr. Stimson's threats appalling, we differ with him about 9/11. The tragedy and crime of that day was that thousands of innocents were slaughtered — not that it hurt some companies' profit margins.

Democrats May Push To Shutter War Prisons (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democratic leaders yesterday outlined plans to try to force the Bush administration to close the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the Guantanamo Bay detention facility in Cuba, taking aim at two sites that have sparked an international furor over the Bush administration's war policy.

Representative John P. Murtha, the chairman of the powerful Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said he wants to close both prisons by cutting their funding, "to restore our credibility worldwide." If he succeeds, it would force the administration to find a new location for high-value terrorism suspects.

"We have the role, as elected officials, to exert our influence through the power of the purse -- that's what it's all about," said Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat whose committee will hold hearings on Iraq next week. "We try not to micromanage the Defense Department, but I tell you, they need micromanagement. They're out of control."

The effort to close the prisons, which Murtha said Pelosi supports, illustrates how congressional Democrats are confronting the president over his war policies. The aggressive push to change the war's course has intensified after the president's address Wednesday night in which he announced plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

Democratic leaders will try to include the measure to close the prisons in a spending bill designed to pay for war operations, Murtha said. He acknowledged that closing Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo would be more symbolic than substantive. Abu Ghraib gained international infamy in 2004 after pictures emerged of US soldiers torturing and sexually abusing Iraqi prisoners there. The Guantanamo facility, which has housed Al Qaeda members and other terror suspects for more than five years, has emerged as a lightning rod for criticism of US policies in combating terrorism.

Numerous human rights groups and a United Nations commission have called for it to be shuttered, citing widespread reports of prisoner mistreatment. Starting last fall, Bush has used the prison as a holding place for suspects who were previously held in secret CIA prisons.

"My action is trying to restore credibility in the Middle East," Murtha said.

Bush has defended the detention center as a "necessary" part of the war on terror.

"I'd like to close Guantanamo, but I also recognize that we're holding some people that are darn dangerous and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts," Bush said in June.

A Pelosi spokesman, Brendan Daly, said the speaker isn't going to make a final judgment on whether the prisons should be closed until after Murtha's committee has hearings on the issue.

"She has encouraged him to look into it," Daly said.

Murtha's plan emerged as a new series of volleys over the president's war plans played out on Capitol Hill.

House and Senate Democratic leaders say they still hope to change the president's mind about the troop "surge" by passing a non binding resolution of disapproval in the coming weeks. But a growing number of Democrats say that -- because Bush is almost certain to ignore such a resolution -- more must be done to hasten the end of the war.

The most likely step, many Democrats say, would involve spending restrictions on the war budget.

"The non binding resolution is symbolic, and that's nice to do if you've got the time to do it," said Representative John F. Tierney, a Salem Democrat. But lawmakers have to use their power over the budget to stop the war, he said.

"That's where we're going to find out which Democrats and which Republicans are going to take a stand on this," Tierney said.

Though some Republicans are also skeptical of Bush's plan, they indicated they will resist Murtha's attempts to close prisons and control war policy.

"You can't conduct a war or a battle from the House chamber or a committee room," said Representative C.W. Bill Young of Florida, the ranking Republican on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee.

Still, in an indication of the president's waning support in Congress, House Republican leaders held a "listening session" yesterday morning to hear out GOP members' concerns, and Republican leaders have been invited to join the president at Camp David for further talks this weekend.

Bush yesterday made calls to King Abdullah II of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt to rally support in the Middle East. And for a second straight day, lawmakers grilled top administration officials about the plan on Capitol Hill.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted that the White House has no plans to attack targets in Iran. He also said he believes that having more US troops in Iraq will succeed because Iraqi leaders say they are committed to reaching political settlements to pacify the nation.

"If they fail to do those things, then I think it's incumbent upon the administration and incumbent upon me to recommend looking at whether this is the right strategy," Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The White House got some support from Senator John McCain of Arizona, the committee's top Republican and a 2008 Republican presidential prospect. McCain said the troop increase will give Iraqis "the best possible chances to succeed."

But Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the US mission has changed substantially since Congress gave the president the authority to destroy weapons of mass destruction and depose Saddam Hussein.

"Why not come back to the Congress? Why not come back and permit us to have a vote on this surge?" Kennedy asked.

Gates said he would pass that message on to the president, but "I think he feels that he has the authority that he needs to proceed."

That is driving much of Democrats' interest in forcing the president's hand. Kennedy and other Democrats have proposed keeping the president from sending more troops to Iraq by blocking the money he would need to do it.

Representative James P. McGovern, a Worcester Democrat, said he is preparing a bill that would go even further, cutting off funds for nearly all troops after six months and allocating only enough resources to provide for the "safe and orderly withdrawal" of US forces.

Florida: Delay In Trial For Padilla (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

A federal judge ordered a three-month delay for the trial of Jose Padilla, accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, in part to allow time for a full evaluation of Mr. Padilla's mental competency. The judge, Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami, set a new trial date of April 16 for Mr. Padilla and two others. It was the third time the case had been postponed. Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old American, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists.

Leftists Fire Rocket Into U.S. Embassy (WT/AP)

By Derek Gatopoulos

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

ATHENS -- An anti-tank rocket slammed into the U.S. Embassy yesterday, causing limited damage and no injuries but reviving fears of a resurgence of far-left Greek militant groups that carried out deadly attacks over three decades.

The shoulder-fired rocket narrowly missed a large blue-and-white U.S. seal on the embassy's facade and damaged a third-floor bathroom near the ambassador's office.

U.S. Ambassador Charles Ries called the attack "very serious." He said no warning had been given.

"There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence," he told reporters outside the cordoned-off embassy, which officials closed for the day. "The good news is no one was hurt and [there was] minimal damage."

Greek authorities blamed domestic militant groups that have carried out bombings against police and government buildings despite a crackdown on terrorism before the Athens Olympics in 2004.

Police are examining the authenticity of two calls taking responsibility from the group Revolutionary Struggle, which has carried out six bombings since 2003. The shadowy group criticized the United States in past statements, citing treatment of prisoners at the U.S. military detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"It is very likely that this is the work of a domestic group," Public Order Minister Vyron Polydoras said. "We believe this effort to revive terrorism is deplorable and will not succeed."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States saw no early signs of international involvement. The Pentagon received a report on the attack, but no request for any action, a U.S. military official said.

The blast shortly before 6 a.m. shattered windows in nearby buildings. Traffic in the downtown area came to a standstill for three hours as police blocked streets around the building to gather evidence -- dusting cars for fingerprints and gathering discarded chewing gum and cigarette butts from the street.

The government said it was seeking permission from the courts to view video from traffic cameras, which under Greek privacy laws is officially excluded from the police investigation.

The attack resembled methods used by members of the far-left terrorist group called November 17, which eluded police between 1975 and eventual capture and conviction in 2003.

But the type of weapon used has not been seen in previous Greek attacks: a 2.36-inch rocket, which police said was probably fired from an extendable Russian-made launcher.

Public opposition to U.S. policies has remained strong in Greece since Washington provided support for a 1967-to-1974 military dictatorship.

Government and opposition party officials strongly condemned the attack, the third against the U.S. Embassy since the mid-1970s.

Foreign Minister Dora Bakoyannis went to the scene, where she expressed "the solidarity of the Greek people following this deplorable action." State television said she wrote to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and promised full cooperation in finding the attacker.

Greece's conservative government came under criticism over the attack.

"How is such an attack on the American Embassy possible, when the site is the No. 1 target in the country?" said Alekos Papadopoulos, spokesman for public order of the opposition Socialist Party. "This points to problems with the police's capabilities."

A police task force to investigate the attack will be headed by a former counterterrorism chief who eradicated the November 17 group.

November 17 carried out a similar rocket attack on the embassy in 1996 -- causing minor damage and no injuries. It also bombed buses carrying U.S. servicemen and assassinated four U.S. military and embassy officials. In all, the group was blamed for killing 23 persons.

Grenade Hits U.S. Embassy In Athens (NYT)

By Ian Fisher, Anthee Carassava

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

ATHENS, Jan. 12 — An antitank grenade was fired into the heavily fortified American Embassy here on Friday just before dawn. The building was empty, but the attack nonetheless underscored deep anti-American sentiment here and revived fears of a new round of homegrown terror.

Greek officials said they doubted that the attack was the work of foreign or Islamic terrorists, but rather that of regrouped extreme leftists aiming at a specific, symbolic target: the huge American seal, with an eagle against a blue background, affixed to the front of the boxy, modern embassy near downtown.

The grenade narrowly missed the seal, punching through a window a few feet above and landing in a bathroom on the embassy's third story, where the ambassador has his office.

The damage was described as minimal. But the ambassador, Charles Ries, said: "We treat it as a very serious attack. There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence."

Panayiotis Stathis, a spokesman for the Public Order Ministry, said, "This was a violent act aimed to provoke Greek public opinion and disturb relations with the United States."

As Mr. Stathis spoke to reporters Friday evening outside the embassy, a demonstrator waved a sign that underscored Greece's often uneasy relations with the United States on issues from the war in Iraq and the longstanding tensions between Greece and Turkey to the American-supported military dictatorship that ruled Greece from 1967 to 1974. "The C.I.A. was behind this," the sign read.

Greek officials said a phone call placed anonymously to a private security company used by the embassy stated that the attack had been carried out by Revolutionary Struggle, a Marxist group with strong anti-American sentiments.

Homegrown terror has largely waned since the Greek authorities dismantled the most deadly groups before the 2004 Olympic Games here. But in that relative lull, Revolutionary Struggle has emerged as the most active of a new generation of small, shadowy terrorist groups.

It has claimed responsibility for a bombing at a court building in Athens in 2003 and one at the Economics Ministry 13 months ago, an attack that wounded two people. It also claimed responsibility for an attempt last May to assassinate the culture minister.

Greek officials did not immediately accept the claim of responsibility for Friday's incident, as they waited for a more detailed proclamation from the attackers.

"We're investigating whether in fact this claim is true," Vyron Polydoras, the public order minister, told reporters after visiting the embassy, which was closed for the day, its flag hung at half-staff.

Maria Bossis, one of Greece's top terrorism experts, speculated that the attack had a purpose beyond making a strong and violent anti-American statement. She said she believed that the group was also aiming at establishing supremacy among the 10 groups in competition since the government dismantled November 17, the most notorious of the leftist terrorist groups.

"This attack will determine who the boss is among the terrorists," said Ms. Bossis, a professor at the Greek College of Defense and former government adviser.

She also said the Greek government had not remained as aggressive against terrorists as it had been before the Olympics.

The grenade was launched at 5:58 a.m., apparently from across the six lanes of Vassilisis Sophia Boulevard, the main north-south road in the central Athens neighborhood of Ilissia.

Tassoula Foumeli, a retired seamstress, said she had been in bed when the blast shattered the windows in her ground-floor bedroom.

"The explosion was so loud I couldn't even hear the smashing of the windows," she said. "I'm nervous and I'm mad."

Mad, she and other residents said, partly at the anti-American demonstrators who have rallied, at times violently, for years in front of the embassy. But she said some of her anger was at American policies that she said provoked demonstrators and angered many ordinary citizens.

"Not everything is justified," she said, referring to violent protests. "But at the same time, you kind of wonder why the United States is meddling in the affairs of other states. This is shown most recently in Iraq. Doesn't the United States have its own state? Does it have to poke its nose elsewhere? I am seeing suffering in Iraq."

Mr. Stathis, the Public Order Ministry spokesman, said the grenade used in the attack was of Russian design, a model manufactured in several Eastern European counties. He said Greek and American officials were collecting evidence from the debris left by the explosion, from surrounding buildings and from security cameras posted around the embassy.

They've Got Mail (WP)

IS THE FEDERAL government opening citizens' mail without obtaining warrants? Was a statement that was quietly issued when the president signed an obscure Postal Service reform bill last month a new assertion of power by the administration to engage in such warrantless searches? The answer to both these questions is disturbingly unclear.

No reasonable person doubts that in emergency circumstances -- a ticking bomb inside a package -- government agents shouldn't have to wait for court approval to open private mail. That authority has been clear for years. In signing the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act, President Bush took pains to note that he would interpret the law "in a manner consistent . . . with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

That's not troubling if, as administration officials contend, the signing statement simply reinforces existing law. "There is nothing new here," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Okay, but what does present law allow? Does the administration contend, as in the case of its warrantless wiretaps, that the president has the inherent constitutional authority, or power granted by the post-Sept. 11 Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF), to open mail without going through the process outlined in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act? Administration officials have been less than eager to answer these questions.

At a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee last February, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales whether the administration believed that the AUMF also permitted the warrantless opening of mail:

Mr. Gonzales: "There is all kinds of wild speculation out there about what the president has authorized and what we're actually doing. And I'm not going to get into a discussion, Senator, about hypotheticals."

Mr. Leahy: "Mr. Attorney General, you're not answering my question . . . Does this law -- you're the chief law enforcement officer of the country. Does this law authorize the opening of first-class mail of U.S. citizens -- yes or no -- under your interpretation?"

Mr. Gonzales: "Senator, I think -- I think that, again, that is not what is going on here. We're only focused on communications -- international communications where one part of the communication is al-Qaeda. That's what this program is all about."

Mr. Leahy: "You haven't answered my question."

Given the president's signing statement, given his demonstrated willingness to stretch the boundaries of his authority and dispense with inconvenient legal niceties, it seems necessary to ask again.

They're Refugees, Not Terrorists (LAT)

By Anna Husarska

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

Sherkole refugee camp, Ethiopia — DOMINIC KUR is, in many ways, a typical Dinka. Like almost all the men in his ethnic group, he has had his forehead marked with ornamental scarification, and by custom, his bottom front four teeth have been knocked out, which makes him lisp a bit.

As was expected of young Dinka men from southern Sudan in the mid-1980s, he joined the armed resistance, known as the Sudan People's Liberation Army, in its civil war against the ruling government in Khartoum.

Kur fought with the group for nine years. "I felt I had to defend my country against the Arabs," he explained. But he grew disenchanted with his unit's treatment of its troops, and with no mechanism in place for officially resigning from the guerrilla organization, he simply left and moved to Khartoum, where he worked on a construction site and married his childhood sweetheart from the village of Madol. In 2002, he crossed the border and came to the Sherkole camp.

The war dragged on, taking the lives of 2 million Sudanese over 20 years. But ultimately the international community legitimized the SPLA by recognizing its participation in the peace process. This culminated in the signing of a comprehensive peace accord on Jan. 9, 2005, a resolution that was hailed by Washington.

Now, with the war over, the refugees — 4 1/2 million people who were either displaced within the country or who fled to neighboring countries — are going home to southern Sudan. In the Sherkole camp, bulletin-board posters explain schematically the peace agreement's military and political arrangements for return and resettlement. The Uduk ethnic group went back last December. And there is already anticipation and joy in Zone F of the camp, where 2,000 Dinkas live.

But there is no joy for Kur and his family. They would like to go home too, but Kur fears that some people in the SPLA consider him a deserter. In view of the still-volatile situation in his country, he worries that if he were to return to the south, he would get into trouble. Considering the difficulties the country has had creating a police force in southern Sudan and ensuring public safety, his fears are not unreasonable. (In the Sherkole camp, there are other former Sudanese fighters who have similar apprehensions.)

So Kur has been proposed by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees for resettlement to a third country. His application — for himself, his wife Angelina and their six children — was submitted to the United States by the commissioner's office.

After telling me this, Kur led me through a typically low doorway into the dark but nicely decorated interior of their round, thatched mud hut, or tukul, and fished out the letters received from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security: Angelina and the kids are welcome to come to the United States, the letters said. Kur, however, has been denied entry.

His letter says: "You were found to be inadmissible to the United States pursuant to INA ? 212(a)(8 USC ? 1182(a) pertaining to 212 (a)(3)(B)." The letter notes, "A waiver is not available for the inadmissibility cited above," and the words "is not available" are circled by hand. In the U.S. Immigration and Nationality Act — I know it; Kur doesn't — provision 212 (a)(3)(B) means "involvement in terrorist activities." Ironically, Kur's letter from the Homeland Security Department labeling him a terrorist arrived on July 20, the same day that Salva Kiir, the leader of the SPLA who is now president of southern Sudan, was welcomed to the White House by President Bush.

Kur's case is not isolated. In the last six months, I have met many refugees around the world — Burmese Karen in Thailand, Burmese Chin in Malaysia, Lao Hmong in Thailand, Eritreans in Ethiopia — whose cases were put "on hold" by U.S. authorities because the organizations to which the refugees had belonged were later designated as terrorist. But I never saw a blunt refusal until I saw Kur's letter.

What's particularly upsetting is that those "on hold" are, in many cases, heroic freedom fighters who struggled for democracy against brutal dictatorships (like the Burmese junta or the Laotian communists) or even, sometimes, people who had been recruited to fight by the Unites States (like the Lao Hmong or the Vietnamese Montagnards).

The reason for this bizarre treatment is that in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. adopted a very broad definition of "terrorist activity" in American law. This overzealous legislative approach means that thousands of genuine refugees who participated in armed insurgencies — even those friendly to (and in some cases supported by) the United States — are now treated as a threat to American security.

It's not just those who participated in the insurgencies. Those who provided "material support" to these combatants can be barred too. The global effect of this draconian law has been devastating: Of the 70,000 slots allotted in 2006 for new refugees by the traditionally hospitable U.S. resettlement program, only 41,000 were filled. According to estimates from the International Rescue Committee and other refugee organizations, about half of the 29,000 excluded were due to the "terrorist" and "material support" provisions.

IT IS POSSIBLE to overcome these provisions through a waiver process, but it is so limited and cumbersome that only three waivers have been granted so far, to specific Burmese freedom-fighter groups.

On Thursday, the Bush administration acknowledged the "unintended consequences" of the post-9/11 laws. Officials from the departments of Justice, State and Homeland Security announced plans to expand the waiver program, some of which will require a vote in Congress. The officials named in particular Cuban, Tibetan and additional Burmese freedom-fighter groups whose supporters and members could get special consideration for admission to the United States.

This is a step in the right direction, but the waiver program remains a partial solution to the problem. It will continue to require case-by-case decisions at high levels in Washington, and it will undoubtedly leave behind, or on indefinite hold, many thousands who pose no threat to the United States.

And for now that includes Dominic and Angelina Kur. They are faced with an excruciating dilemma: Should they split up, which is almost unthinkable, especially because Angelina is again pregnant? Should Angelina give up a chance of a normal life outside the refugee camp for herself and the children? Or should they go back to Madol and hope that the southern Sudanese government will not take revenge on him?

Not much news from abroad comes to their tukul, so the Dinka couple does not even imagine that there could be a solution to their problem. But there is. Congress must act to broadly amend the immigration law so that all bona fide refugees can be easily and fairly considered for refugee or asylum status, not punished for the courage and commitment they demonstrated fighting for peace and democracy in their homelands.

U.S. News and World Report, January 13, 2007

He wouldn't say it directly, but this week FBI Director Robert Mueller in effect told Congress the bureau has 8,000 people under investigation for terrorism. The FBI is reluctant to release an official figure, as many of those under investigation play only minor roles or turn out to be innocent. Instead, Mueller did it by inference, comparing America's record with that of Great Britain.

In his January 11 testimony to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, the FBI chief cited "a recent and rare" disclosure from MI-5 –the British Security Service–that "the United Kingdom is tracking 1,600 individuals who are part of at least 200 networks that are actively plotting terrorist attacks." By comparison, Mueller added, "in general, the number of subjects we are monitoring is proportional to the number of subjects BSS is monitoring–based on gross national population."

Well, that's not hard to figure out. America's population of 300 million is five times that of Britain's 60 million. Multiply Britain's 1,600 terrorism suspects by five and you get 8,000. FBI officials confirm that's a ballpark figure, but decline to put the figure on the record.

"You can draw your own conclusions," says one veteran agent.

One reason for the caution is that FBI officials see few operational cells in America and don't want the public thinking there are 8,000 terrorists running around. In the British disclosure, back in November, MI-5 chief Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller revealed that the Brits are following at least 30 plots, many using British-born operatives and tied to al Qaeda in Pakistan. By contrast, noted Mueller, "We see relatively fewer active plots involving physical attacks within the United States, less defined networks of extremists, and less developed attack planning compared to those described by the BSS director."

That's the good news–and helps explain why America hasn't had a major terrorist attack since 9/11. But then what are all those U.S. terrorism suspects up to? Lots of support activity, officials say. One FBI agent ticked off the list: raising money, recruiting, logistics, surveillance, communications. Still, a handful of operational cells are out there, investigators believe, and that's what they lose sleep over.

"It's like a hockey game," says a counterterrorism agent. "If you let one goal get scored, you've lost the game."

Canadians Fear Fallout Of U.S. Passport Rules (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

TORONTO, Jan. 12 -- Canadian and U.S. citizens are lining up for passports to meet tougher U.S. border rules that take effect this month, and Canadian authorities fear the rules will keep more Americans at home.

Starting Jan. 23, all airline passengers landing in the United States will have to carry a passport, not just the driver's license and birth certificate that can now be used by Canadians crossing the border and by U.S. citizens returning from Canada, Mexico, the Bahamas and the Caribbean.

The result has been brisk business at passport offices here and in the United States. Applications for passports are up 53 percent in the United States and 33 percent in Canada from the previous year.

"The passport offices are swamped. We're at capacity and running into delays," said Fabien Lengelle, a spokesman for Passport Canada in Gatineau, Quebec.

U.S authorities say the rush proves that the tighter border controls being instituted five years after Sept. 11, 2001, are working to improve security. The rules will be extended to the busy land borders with Canada and Mexico by June 1, 2009.

"The proof is in the numbers. Four years ago, we issued 7 million passports a year. This year, it will be 16 million," Frank Moss, deputy secretary of state for passport services, said from Washington on Friday.

"Americans are coming into compliance. We believe we will wind up with a more secure border, and that people on the planes are who they claim to be," he said. As more travelers have passports, "I can't believe the borders won't work more smoothly."

Canadian business executives are less optimistic, predicting confusion and delays. The $50 billion tourism industry is already struggling with a 28 percent drop in visitors from the United States over the past five years.

"This just aggravates the problem," said Christopher Jones, vice president of the Tourism Industry Association of Canada. "We are already experiencing a precipitous drop in tourism. It's adding salt to the wound."

Fewer Americans are coming to Canada largely because of the increase in value of the Canadian dollar, which has erased cross-border shopping bargains. High gas prices, the 2003 epidemic of the viral illness SARS, increased security, confusion over the border rules and now the looming requirement for a passport have also hurt business, said Laurie Karson, who represents Canadian duty-free shops at the land borders.

"Tourism in general has suffered," Karson said. "We've been trying to educate our customers about getting a passport. Eventually, everyone is going to have to have a passport to travel."

Many airlines have launched similar education campaigns for passengers. The Nassau/Paradise Island Promotion Board has offered to refund to American tourists who come to the Bahama Islands the $97 passport fee if they need to get a passport. Some hotels in Jamaica are offering discounts to offset the fees.

Canadian tourism officials are worried the coming land border restrictions will stop the busy two-way traffic along the 3,145-mile land border. School trips will stop, they fear, bus journeys by senior citizens to Niagara Falls, Ontario, will dwindle, convention planners will bypass Canada, and communities that straddle the border will be split because many citizens don't want the bother or expense of getting a passport.

"An American family of two adults and two children would be required to pay at least $358 in fees for passports" and might decide against a vacation in, say, Niagara Falls, the tourism trade group said in written comments on the new rules.

An estimated 27 percent of U.S. citizens have passports, according to the State Department. In Canada, the rate is 40 percent. Critics have urged both countries to make their passports cheaper and easier to get. In Canada, an adult's passport costs the equivalent of $75 U.S. and is good for five years. A U.S. adult passport, costing about $22 more, is good for 10 years.

U.S. officials are still trying to come up with a cheaper, plastic card that could be used instead of a passport. They have proposed a wallet-size version embedded with a miniature radio-frequency chip that could bring up computerized information on a visitor quickly at the border.

Canada Unveils Border Security Plan (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown

AP, January 12, 2007

WINDSOR, Ontario — Canada unveiled a major border security and prosperity initiative Friday, saying it would spend $431.6 million over the next five years to protect its border from terrorist, economic and environmental threats, according to the Canada Border Services Agency's website.

Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day made the announcement at the Canada-U.S. border crossing between Windsor and Detroit, where one-third of the $1.6 billion in daily trade between the North American neighbors passes.

"I even sometimes surprise my American friends when I remind them that the trade that comes across the Ambassador Bridge in total is greater than all of the trade that exists between the United States and Japan," Day told a news conference.

Security experts have long criticized the lack of security measures along Canada's side of the 4,000-mile border with the United States, particularly since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper pledged when he was elected nearly a year ago to strengthen the frontier between the world's largest trading partners, including these new security measures and eventually arming Canada's border guards.

The bulk of the money, $337 million, is for the electronic-Manifest program, which allows for computer-automated risk assessments of cargo shipments before they reach Canada.

The 18,000 trucks that cross the U.S.-Canada border each day, as well as all railroad, air and marine cargo carriers, will eventually be required to file electronic manifests before their shipments arrive. This will allow border service agents to determine in advance whether the cargo, or those who deliver it, should be further screened.

The eManifest program will ensure that background checks on crew and risk assessments of cargo are in the hands of the Canada Border Services Agency 24 hours in advance of the arrival of shipments by sea; and several hours ahead of railroad, highway and air cargo.

The program was developed in cooperation with U.S. Department of Homeland Security and is part of the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, launched in 2005 by then-Prime Minister Paul Martin, President Bush and then-Mexican President Vicente Fox.

Day would not give a precise date of when the electronic manifests would become mandatory at the 119 border crossings.

"There's still going to be that human element at the border, to look at material and talk to the driver, but the amount of time that's going to be saved is going to be significant," he said of the requirement to file electronic manifests in advance of cargo shipments.

Another $20 million has been earmarked for business leaders and emergency responders to plan for the immediate resumption of trade across the border in the event of a terrorist attack, medical pandemic or natural disaster.

Perrin Beatty, president of the Canadian Manufacturers & Exporters, said his and other associations would work with governments and emergency response teams on both sides of the border to stage exercises and develop protocols that would get trade moving within hours of an emergency.

"If al-Qaeda can damage us, either physically or economically, they win," Beatty told the news conference, referring to Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization. "It would be foolish for us to assume that there will not be any further incidents along the border."

Another $10 million will expand the existing Partners in Protection program, a voluntary scheme in which businesses and their employees help border agents detect and prevent contraband smuggling of drugs and weapons.

Suit Against Times To Be Tossed Out (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

A federal judge said yesterday that he will throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation lawsuit a former Army scientist filed against the New York Times Co. over columns that he contends blamed him for the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Saying that the Times's motion to dismiss the case "should be granted," U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria canceled a trial set for Jan. 29, according to the court's docket. Hilton indicated that he would explain his reasoning in a subsequent order throwing out the case.

The development is a victory for Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit filed by Steven J. Hatfill in 2004. Hatfill said the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a "likely culprit" in the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17.

Hatfill has been identified by authorities as a "person of interest" in the attacks, but no one has been charged.

David McCraw, assistant general counsel for the Times Co., said the paper is "extremely gratified" by Hilton's decision. "In the end, we think the law worked the way it should, which is to protect aggressive journalism," he said.

Kristof said the decision is an important victory for journalists, who have suffered a series of court defeats recently in efforts to shield news-gathering activities from the legal process. Kristof had earlier refused to disclose confidential sources used for the anthrax columns.

"It's been a very difficult few years for journalists entangled in the law, and so today feels like a victory," Kristof said.

An attorney for Hatfill, a former researcher at the Army's infectious disease research laboratory at Fort Detrick in Frederick, did not return telephone calls late yesterday.

Hilton first threw out the case in 2004, ruling that Kristof accurately reported that the scientist was a focus of the FBI probe. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit reinstated the suit in 2005 and said Kristof's columns could be read as blaming Hatfill for the attacks.

As the case moved toward trial, the Times argued that Kristof did not intend to implicate Hatfill and was only trying to jump-start the FBI investigation. In the 2002 columns, Kristof said the FBI had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z and wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Hatfill's attorneys argued that Kristof labeled Hatfill as the anthrax killer and deliberately ruined his reputation.

Judge Rejects Defamation Suit Against The Times (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A federal judge on Friday dismissed a suit against The New York Times by a former government scientist who said he was defamed by a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings in 2001.

The judge, Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., granted a motion by The Times to dismiss the suit but did not provide an immediate explanation. He is expected to file a detailed written opinion in coming days.

It was the latest and, perhaps, final chapter in a suit that has gone to the Supreme Court.

The scientist, Dr. Stephen J. Hatfill, a specialist in biological weapons, had said in his suit that the columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the anthrax mailings had defamed him.

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist whom he initially identified as Mr. Z, saying he had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. In August 2002, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill, a former scientist at the Army bioweapons center at Fort Detrick, Md., had come forward and identified himself as Mr. Z and said the news media had treated him unfairly.

Five people died in the anthrax attacks. Although federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a “person of interest,” he was never charged with any crime, and the attacks remain unsolved.

The Times argued in its dismissal motion that Dr. Hatfill was a public figure, at least for the purposes of the suit, in that he had thrust himself into the public debate about preparedness for a biological attack. That would present him with a far greater burden in showing that he was defamed and could, as the newspaper argued, prevent such a judgment.

The Times also argued that the columns did not blame Dr. Hatfill for the attacks, as he said in his suit. Instead, the paper’s lawyers said, the columns were aimed at pressing the Federal Bureau of Investigation to move more swiftly and either charge or clear Dr. Hatfill as a suspect.

Judge Hilton had dismissed the suit earlier, saying that no defamation had occurred. A three-judge appeals panel voted, 2 to 1, to reinstate the suit, saying a jury should decide whether the columns were defamatory.

The full appeals court, based in Richmond, Va., split, and the Supreme Court refused to intervene.

Judge Hilton’s latest dismissal, when his opinion is published, is expected to rest on a fuller argument than the last time and could thus be less vulnerable to being overturned. It is likely to deal with the issues raised in The Times’s dismissal motion and Dr. Hatfill’s response, including the question of whether he is a public figure for the purposes of defamation law.

Whether there is any leeway for Dr. Hatfill to mount an appeal as he did before would depend on how Judge Hilton fashions his ruling.

A lawyer for Dr. Hatfill, Mark A. Grannis, said, “Obviously we can’t make any statements as to what we’ll do until we see the ruling.”

Mr. Grannis said he did not believe that the case was over.

“It has always been our position,” he said, “that the evidence of defamation was extremely strong and Mr. Kristof fabricated parts of his column to falsely implicate Dr. Hatfill in the anthrax attacks.”

David E. McCraw, a lawyer for The Times, said in a statement: “We are gratified by the judge’s ruling today. In making our summary judgment motion, we believed that the plaintiff had failed to come up with the evidence necessary to bring this case to trial, and we are pleased that the court agreed.”

Mr. McCraw said the case had required a significant investment of time and money on the part of the newspaper, “but in the end, the law of defamation worked the way it was supposed to, by protecting aggressive, important journalism.”

Judge Dismisses Anthrax Libel Case (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0116925

AP, January 12, 2007

McLEAN, Va. (AP) -- A federal judge on Friday dismissed a libel lawsuit filed against The New York Times by a former Army scientist once identified as a person of interest in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton in Alexandria dismissed the case a week after lawyers for the Times argued that Steven Hatfill should be considered a public figure under libel law, which makes it much more difficult for a public figure to win a judgment than a private citizen.

The judge did not explain his ruling in the order issued Friday.

Hatfill's lawyers had argued that even if Hatfill qualified as a public figure, they could still prevail at trial because they had uncovered serious flaws in the reporting of columnist Nicholas Kristof.

Fenty, Kaine, O'Malley Vow To Cooperate In Crisis Planning (WP)

By Lori Aratani

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

In their first joint meeting as the Washington region's top elected officials, District Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley pledged yesterday to cooperate on homeland security issues.

"This is a historic day," Fenty said. "The fact that we are [meeting] about homeland security and counterterrorism is no accident. It is deliberate, and we think it is the priority going into the future."

The meeting, held at the Unified Communications Center in Southeast Washington, lasted more than an hour.

Fenty said that one of the leaders' goals is to prioritize homeland security issues as the region begins to apply for federal grants. He said that they plan to meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next month.

The three men, all Democrats, said they were pleased that the Department of Homeland Security has revamped the process for distributing federal funds to local jurisdictions to provide more money to high-risk urban areas.

Chertoff announced this month that more than half -- $411 million -- of the $747 million in Urban Area Security Initiative money would be directed to six areas, including the Washington region.

Still, it is not clear whether that will mean more money will go to the D.C. area, which will have to compete with five jurisdictions -- New York-northern New Jersey, Los Angeles-Long Beach, Chicago, the San Francisco Bay area and Houston -- for funding.

Fenty said area priorities include communicating among jurisdictions, public preparedness, handling mass casualties, protecting critical infrastructure, improving overall planning, sharing intelligence and coping with a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack.

Kaine, who dubbed the trio the "three amigos," said that their experience as local officials -- all were city council members and mayors -- rather than their party label will make them effective regional leaders. He said that their future discussions will include developing a "first-hour plan" for how local areas would cooperate in the early stages of an emergency.

"In an increasingly small world, it's critically important that we cooperate across borders," said O'Malley, who will be sworn in next week.

In future meetings, the three plan to pursue regional approaches to issues such as transportation and the environment.

Yesterday's meeting was the seventh in a series of regional summits, which were initiated in 2003 by former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner.

Fenty, Kaine, O'Malley Hold Summit On Security (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The chief executives of the District, Maryland and Virginia said yesterday they will pursue federal funding to help prepare the Washington area for homeland security emergencies.

"It is not an exaggeration or hyperbole to say that in this entire world there probably is not a more important place or not a more important region where we would be focused on homeland security and counterterrorism than right here in the National Capital Region," said D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, who met with Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley at a regional summit in Southeast yesterday.

The National Capital Region, created and defined by Congress, includes the District, Prince George's and Montgomery counties in Maryland, and Arlington, Fairfax, Loudoun and Prince William counties and Alexandria in Virginia.

"It is critically important that we cooperate across borders and pursue our common goals," said Mr. O'Malley, who takes office next week. "None of them more urgent, or more important than making this whole region ... safer and more secure."

The collaborative effort will work toward improving, among other things, communications among jurisdictions, public preparedness, critical infrastructure protection planning, intelligence sharing and the ability to deal with chemical, biological, nuclear and explosive attacks.

Mr. Fenty said protecting the Metro transit system, which branches out into all three jurisdictions, is a "huge priority."

"If we get the adequate level of resources we will again be a world leader in making sure we are protecting our residents," Mr. Fenty said.

The three Democrats said they will discuss their financial wish list as early as next month with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who announced last week that the District, New York and four other "highest-risk" metropolitan areas will compete for $411 million to subsidize their efforts to guard against terrorist attacks.

"It is just up to us to make our best case in meeting with Secretary Chertoff and DHS in the grant proposal we put together and the work we do with our combined congressional delegations," Mr. Kaine said.

Homeland security issues have taken on a greater importance locally since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the Pentagon.

Mr. Kaine said he is optimistic that DHS this year will give the NCR extra financial considerations now that it has been branded as a "highest risk" area.

"It's been hard to plan with numbers that go up and go down," Mr. Kaine said.

Last year, the D.C. area lost out on $31 million in homeland security money after Congress cut DHS grant money by $700 million.

The three executives, whom Mr. Kaine dubbed the "three amigos," said their backgrounds as city council members and big city mayors -- Mr. Kaine in Richmond and Mr. O'Malley in Baltimore -- is more important to homeland security than belonging to the same political party because they have an understanding of what local responders go through during catastrophic events.

"So much of the response is initially generated from local governments, and that will continue to be the case," Mr. Kaine said.

This was the first such meeting for Mr. Fenty and Mr. O'Malley, who were elected to their current office last fall, and the seventh such meeting since 2003 when the three jurisdictions first started discussing mutual interests such as air quality, transportation, the Chesapeake Bay and tourism.

Yesterday's summit was held at the Unified Communications Center, which opened in Southeast last fall.

The three leaders said they were optimistic about their working relationship going forward.

"We are all one community and we need to act that way," Mr. Kaine said.

Box Sent To Clinton Causes Scare (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, Jan. 12 (AP) — A post office was evacuated as the police, the Westchester County Bomb Squad and Secret Service agents responded to a report of a suspicious package addressed to former President Bill Clinton.

The cause of all the fuss? A box of cookies.

Postal officials at a post office in New Castle discovered a suspicious package addressed to Mr. Clinton on Thursday, said Kim Bruce, a Secret Service spokeswoman.

An incorrect address for the Chappaqua home of Mr. Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton raised the authorities' suspicions, Ms. Bruce said.

After the post office was evacuated, a member of the county's bomb squad, dressed in protective gear, approached the 3-foot-by-3-foot package and checked it with a portable X-ray device. When no bomb parts were seen, the package was opened, revealing the cookies.

The cookies were then turned over to the Secret Service, and the post office was reopened.

Ms. Bruce declined to say who sent the cookies to Mr. Clinton or whether they were ever delivered to the home.

WAR NEWS:

Gates Denies US Forces Will Enter Iran (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

Robert Gates, the US defence secretary, on Friday dismissed concerns that the Pentagon would send US troops across the Iraqi border into Iran to disrupt networks allegedly supplying weapons to Shia militias in Iraq.

President George W. Bush this week raised alarm that the US might be considering military operations against Iran. In his speech to the nation announcing the surge in US troops in Iraq, Mr Bush accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on US forces in Iraq.

But Mr Gates on Friday said the US planned only to disrupt Iranian activities within Iraq.

"It refers strictly to operations inside the territory of Iraq, not crossing the border," Mr Gates said in his first appearance as Pentagon chief before the Senate armed services committee.

General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, added that "from a military standpoint, [there was] no need to cross the Iranian border". US forces this week apprehended five Iranian nationals in a raid on an Iranian liaison office near Irbil in northern Iraq.

Mr Gates and Gen Pace faced a less hostile reception than Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, received before the Senate foreign relations committee on Thursday when she was lambasted her over administration's plan to send an extra 21,500 US troops to Iraq. But most Democrats, and some Republicans, on the armed services committee strongly questioned whether Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his commitments to send more Iraqi troops into Baghdad.

Democrats have argued that there is little evidence that Mr Maliki is willing to crack down on Shia militias. Bush administration officials have argued that he is 100 per cent supportive of the plan, which they say he developed. But Susan Collins, a moderate Maine Republican, asked Mr Gates what had changed since Mr Maliki told her three weeks ago that he did not want more US troops in Iraq.

Mr Gates responded: "There is no question in my mind that Prime Minister Maliki wanted to do this operation on his own."

"I think what happened is that as his own military and security leaders began looking at the operation and began working out the details and then began talking and consulting with General Casey and the American military planners, that they essentially persuaded the prime minister that additional American forces were necessary in order to make his plan successful."

When asked whether he believed Mr Maliki was completely supportive of the plan to pacify Baghdad, Gen Pace would only say that he believed the "Iraqi leadership is 'saying' they are 100 per cent on board".

Carl Levin, the Democrat chairman of the committee, asked Mr Gates why the American public should have any faith that Mr Maliki would fulfil his pledges to the US when he had repeatedly failed to do so in the past.

Gates Ties Iraq Push To Drawdown (WP)

By Josh White, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

President Bush's new operation to secure Baghdad will begin in earnest with a push by thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops in the first week of February, and its chances of success should be evident within a few months, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told lawmakers yesterday.

If the plan works, the United States could begin drawing down troop levels by the end of the year, Gates said. If the Iraqi government does not deliver troops and political and economic support, he said, the United States could withhold many of the 21,500 additional troops Bush has ordered to secure the most violent parts of Iraq.

Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also assured members of the Senate Armed Services Committee that there are no plans to take military operations into Iran, clarifying remarks Bush made on Wednesday in announcing the new Iraq package.

"From a military standpoint," Pace said while responding to questions, there is "no need to cross the Iranian border."

Gates said a brigade of several thousand Iraqi troops is expected to arrive in Baghdad in about three weeks to beef up security, part of an effort to bring in 8,000 more Iraqi troops to quell sectarian violence. The first additional U.S. brigade is expected to arrive in Baghdad in the coming days to support Iraqi forces as they clear and hold neighborhoods throughout the city.

"I think that what's perhaps the newest part of this is that it really does put the onus on the Iraqis to come through," Gates said. He later acknowledged that the Iraqi government's "record of fulfilling the commitments is not an encouraging one" but said that Iraqis "really do seem to be eager to take control of this security situation."

Gates said it will be easy to tell if Iraqis live up to their end of the bargain, prompting members of the committee to point out that the Iraqi government sent only two of six promised battalions for an operation in Baghdad last summer.

Gates and Pace said that they think they have assurances from the Iraqi government, but that there is no specific deadline for success or clear benchmarks for progress.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the committee's new chairman, sharply criticized sending more U.S. troops into Iraq and said the move reinforces a "flawed strategy" that has failed thus far.

"Deepening our involvement in Iraq would be a mistake, but deepening our involvement in Iraq on the assumption that the Iraqis will meet future benchmarks and commitments, given their track record, would be a compounding of that mistake," Levin said. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) urged the administration to put it to a congressional vote.

Some Republicans questioned the immediate need for thousands of U.S. troops, with Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) saying he would rather send in a small complement of troops to see if the Iraqis become full partners.

"My point being, it seems to me, shouldn't we walk a few steps along this line and then see how quickly, hopefully, the Iraqis begin to take up their responsibilities, rather than this massive plan pushing forward all at once?" Warner asked. Gates replied that the phased introduction of troops over the coming months will have the same effect.

Gates also said there are no plans for a long-term U.S. presence: "We don't want permanent bases in Iraq."

Senators questioned Gates and Pace about Bush's vow on Wednesday to stop Iran and Syria from supporting violence in Iraq. In his televised prime-time speech, the president promised to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Pace said the military will conduct those efforts within Iraq; they include two recent raids in northern Iraq that resulted in the capture of several Iranians. A State Department spokesman said yesterday that coalition forces raided a facility in Irbil because of information linking it to Iran's Revolutionary Guard. Contrary to the assertions of Iraqi officials, the site "was not a diplomatic facility; it did not have the standing of a consulate," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

The raids were authorized under an order that Bush issued several months ago, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the New York Times yesterday. Rice was vague about when the president issued the order, the Times reported, but she said it allows the U.S. military to target Iranian "networks" in Iraq.

White House press secretary Tony Snow yesterday addressed what he called the "urban legend" of pending U.S. action against Iran and Syria. He told reporters that there is no intent to go to war with either country, and that the administration is committed to diplomatic efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program.

The idea of a significant troop increase in Iraq has been championed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), and he said yesterday that a small, short troop boost would be the "worst of all worlds" because he believes the U.S. military needs a sustained, robust presence. McCain also accused detractors of not presenting viable alternatives.

"I believe that those who disagree with this new policy should indicate what they would propose to do if we withdraw and Iraq descends into chaos," McCain said.

The troop increase in Iraq will require the Army "very soon" to alert a number of National Guard combat brigades that they will have to deploy in about a year -- earlier than anticipated -- to provide relief for busy active-duty Army units, a senior military official told reporters.

With more troops comes a need for more equipment, requiring the Army to use two brigades' worth of pre-positioned stocks of tanks, Humvees and other gear in Kuwait that it had built up after depleting the stocks for the invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

"We're having to redistribute equipment right now," the official said. The Army plans to build as many as six new combat brigades under a plan unveiled by Gates to expand the service by 7,000 active-duty soldiers a year, to a total of 547,000.

Republicans On Panel Back President's Plan, Masking Divisions (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee came to the defense of President Bush on Friday, lending support to his decision to send more troops to Iraq and hoping to head off a Senate resolution criticizing the plan.

In contrast to the bipartisan barrage of criticism a day earlier by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Republicans on the armed services panel with few exceptions portrayed the troop increase as a risky but necessary move to regain control of Baghdad, and they portrayed Democrats as lacking the will to see the war through to victory.

"To my colleagues, I would ask, at least in the short term here, that we measure our words, that we not have a political stampede to declare the war lost when it's not yet lost, or to embrace strategies that would lead to defeat," said Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina.

But the public show of support for the White House plan masked deep concern about sending additional troops among some Republicans and outright opposition among others. Senate Democrats are preparing a nonbinding resolution opposing the plan that Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said might attract enough Republican votes to overcome parliamentary hurdles and pass if Democrats bring it to a vote.

To reassure senators worried about an indefinite commitment of more American troops, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told the panel that, while there is no explicit time limit on how long they will stay, he viewed the deployment as likely to last "months, not years."

He added that withdrawals were possible this year if the additional troops being sent to Baghdad reduce the violence significantly.

Testifying on Capitol Hill about the plan for the second straight day, Mr. Gates said that Iraqi lawmakers might decide to replace Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, if he failed to take steps to carry out the new plan to regain control of Baghdad.

"The first consequence that he has to face is the possibility that he'll lose his job," Mr. Gates said. "There are beginning to be some people around that may say, 'I can do better than he's doing,' in terms of making progress."

Administration officials have discussed among themselves whether they might need to withdraw support for Mr. Maliki if he doesn't perform, notably by building a new coalition in the Iraqi Parliament. Mr. Gates's statement was the first mention of the subject in public by a senior administration official.

Mr. Gates and other administration officials have had trouble explaining to lawmakers why they are confident that Mr. Maliki will carry out promises to send more Iraqi troops to Baghdad and to permit them and the additional American forces to operate in Shiite neighborhoods, where they have been blocked from conducting operations in the past.

Mr. Gates conceded that the Iraqi government's record of fulfilling its commitments is "not an encouraging one," but said Mr. Maliki now seemed to him "eager" to follow the plan worked out with American commanders.

He acknowledged that Mr. Maliki initially had wanted to carry out the intensified military effort in Baghdad without more American troops. In addition, American military commanders feared that, without American forces monitoring their operations, there could been even worse sectarian bloodshed.

"There's no question in my mind that Prime Minister Maliki wanted to do this operation on his own," Mr. Gates said, but he was "persuaded that additional American forces were needed in order to make his plan succeed."

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, seemed to sum up the skepticism about Mr. Maliki among lawmakers in both parties when she noted that he "did not seem to welcome" the idea of sending more American forces when she met with him in Iraq just weeks ago.

"I'm really skeptical that the prime minister has really bought into this plan," she said.

On Friday, Mr. Bush invited the top Republican leaders in the Senate and the House to Camp David for a weekend session. The retreat was planned in advance, aides said, but took on new meaning as the White House sought to prevent further Republican defections over the administration's Iraq strategy.

Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate minority leader, and Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House minority leader, and their deputies were scheduled to spend the evening at Camp David on Friday with the president.

Asked by CBS News on Friday whether he believed he had the authority to send additional troops to Iraq no matter what Congress wants, Mr. Bush replied that "in this situation I do."

The president's Iraq strategy remained a deeply divisive subject during a private Senate Republican Conference breakfast meeting on Friday. Republicans began discussing an alternative resolution, senior aides said, offering lawmakers an avenue to express their opposition without joining the Senate resolution to be offered by Democrats as early as next week.

At the closed-door session, Senator John McCain of Arizona urged senators to spend time reading the president's plan and studying intelligence reports before making up their minds. Mr. McCain, one of the administration's biggest allies on Iraq who has been arguing for months for a troop increase, also began meeting privately with undecided senators in hopes of slowing Republican fallout.

Despite a torrent of criticism from Republicans about the plan, it remained an open question whether every senator who has spoken against a troop increase would cast a recorded vote in opposition to the president. Senior Republican officials disputed an assertion from the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, that 12 Republican senators would support a nonbinding Democratic resolution opposing the president.

The most vocal Republican opposition to expanding the military operation in Iraq, for now, has been largely contained to senators in the party's moderate wing. But Republican Congressional leaders said they feared the discontent could grow when lawmakers hear from their constituents during the three-day weekend.

"People have strong views. They are well informed by their own constituents, by their consciences, and there are a lot of different voices on this," said Senator John Thune, a South Dakota Republican. "This is the dominant issue of the time. It eclipses everything else."

Republicans were keeping a close watch on public opinion polls, particularly a survey by CNN and the Opinion Research Corporation on Friday showing that 66 percent of Americans oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

Democrats Eye Alternative To U.S. Troop Surge Plan (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

WASHINGTON -- While Democrats seem to have won the moment by effectively pillorying President Bush's plan to inject 21,500 more U.S. troops into the Iraq war, a strategy that garnered little public support and has proved divisive on Capitol Hill, they now face the dilemma of coming up with a better alternative to stem the sectarian bloodletting.

Earlier this week, Democrats floated a plan to stop the escalation by blocking funding of the war. But Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, acknowledged that such action was unlikely because it would "send the wrong message to the troops."

Still, Levin, who has called for a phased withdrawal to begin in four to six months, said he hoped to garner bipartisan support for a non-binding resolution voicing dissatisfaction with Bush's Iraq policy. Levin said that passing such a resolution could help lay the groundwork for the start of a drawdown of troops in the coming months.

"It's just an open-ended policy," Levin said. "There are no deadlines for the Iraqis, no consequences for failure to meet their commitments."

As Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified on Capitol Hill for the second straight day Friday, the Democrats continued to criticize the plan, although at a lower volume than on Thursday.

Gates and Pace attempted to counter their doubters with assurances that a temporary increase in U.S. troops was the best way to create a stable Iraq and the conditions that would permit a reduction in U.S. forces.

The two also said there are no immediate plans to attack targets in Iran. In his speech this week, Bush vowed to disrupt Iran's aid to insurgents in Iraq and "destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Those comments refer "strictly to operations inside the territory of Iraq, not crossing the border," Gates said, later adding that "any kind of military action inside Iran itself, that would be a very last resort."

The Bush administration has attempted to characterize the plan to bolster security in Baghdad and Anbar province as an Iraqi-designed strategy, but Democrats, who questioned Gates and Pace at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Friday, seemed incredulous.

In November, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki suggested to Bush that American forces push back to the outskirts of Baghdad, and that Iraqi forces would be able to effectively rout out the insurgents and militiamen that now control much of the Iraqi street. But Bush eventually rejected that plan.

Gates insisted that the plan was ultimately the creation of the Iraqi military. While al-Maliki initially wanted Iraqis to take complete control of pacifying Baghdad, the prime minister and his military commanders came to the conclusion that U.S. involvement was necessary, Gates said.

On Thursday, the prime minister failed to show up for a press conference where he was certain to face questions about the new strategy, and the Iraqi government spokesman gave the plan only tepid support.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass), who has been one of the most vociferous critics of the so-called "surge," called on Bush to return to Congress for approval before sending more troops to Iraq.

"Why not come back to the Congress?" Kennedy said. "Why not come back and permit us to have a vote on this surge? Let the American people speak through their elected representatives."

Bush invited top Republican leaders from the House and the Senate to Camp David for at least part of the holiday weekend.

After hearing Levin repeat the refrain that Bush's plan to increase troop levels would be a grave mistake during Friday's hearing, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) weighed in with his own critique of those who believe the president should be talking about drawing down instead of ramping up.

"Do they truly believe we can walk away from Iraq?" McCain said. "I believe these individuals ... have a responsibility to tell us what they believe are the consequences of withdrawal in Iraq. If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

Gates and Pace's second day on Capitol Hill was far more civil than the previous day, which included the comment from one Democrat member in the House that the plan was the "craziest, dumbest" idea.

But Friday's visit to the Senate Armed Services Committee, whose members include Bush loyalists Sens. John Cornyn of Texas, Jeff Sessions of Alabama and Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, did not include any heated exchanges.

Gates and Pace attempted to assuage some critics' concerns with assurance that the plan would be reviewed over time, and adjusted in consultation with U.S. commanders on the ground.

But Gates also tried to underscore to skeptical lawmakers that the next year or two would be critical to determining whether Americans would be successful in establishing a semblance of a working democracy in Iraq.

"Mistakes certainly have been made by the United States in Iraq, but however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable," Gates said.

Bush's Surge Already In Latest Budget (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The White House yesterday said there already is enough money in the budget to pay for President Bush's proposed troop surge in Iraq, leaving Congress almost no viable way to stop him before he commits the troops.

Some members of Congress had proposed using the power of the purse to cut off funds for the new troops, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said there's already enough money in the pipeline to begin the deployment of more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad to quell Sunni-Shi'ite violence and another 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to go after al Qaeda fighters.

"Funding for the forces and to dispatch them to the region, it's already in the budget. So we're going to proceed with those plans," Mr. Snow said.

That leaves Congress with few other options.

One possibility, proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, would rescind Congress' 2002 blanket grant of authority to use force in Iraq, and would require Mr. Bush to gain congressional approval before boosting forces.

Yesterday, Mr. Kennedy asked the administration to hold off on deploying the troops to give Congress more time to consider the issue.

"It took the president ... two months to make this judgment. Let us have 10 days to try and make a judgment and a decision whether the American people are behind this," he told Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

"I take your point. I will certainly pass the message to the president," Mr. Gates replied.

The president, in an interview to be aired tomorrow on CBS' "60 Minutes," said he is convinced he has the authority to move forward with his plan.

"I think in this situation I do and I fully understand [Congress] could try to stop me from doing it," Mr Bush said. "But I made my decision. We're going forward."

Mr. Gates said if the plan succeeds, it will rebuild the public's confidence.

"I remember that when [the] first President Bush made the decision to throw Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, the polls showed about 15 percent of the American people supported that action," he said. "After it was successful, about 90 percent supported it."

Mr. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, were hammered by Democrats and by rank-and-file Republicans on Capitol Hill this week as they presented the details of Mr. Bush's proposal.

In addition to the extra troops, Mr. Bush is expecting Iraq to add more units to the fight in Baghdad, and for the Iraqi troops to be free of political or sectarian restrictions that had prevented them from going after some of the militias that now control parts of the city.

The White House says the plan's success depends on the Iraqis' meeting their commitments, and Mr. Gates said that will be evident in a matter of months. Still, Mr. Snow said they are not yet willing to entertain what-if questions if the Iraqis fail.

Administration officials said the additional troops will cost $5.6 billion this year, and that will be added to a $100 billion emergency war-spending bill they already planned to send to Congress early next month.

But Mr. Snow said there is already enough money in the regular fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill -- one of only two regular spending bills Congress passed last year -- to cover the early costs of the war, including the new deployments, through May or June.

The emergency spending bill will fund the overall war effort for the final months of the fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

Mr. Snow said Congress will have a chance to take votes later this year.

Democratic leaders have been cool to Mr. Kennedy's proposal. Instead, they said this week, they want to have votes in the House and Senate next week on nonbinding resolutions to show a majority of Congress disapproves of the president's plan.

But they are under pressure from liberal activists and interest groups to go further and exercise their newfound majority status to try to force Mr. Bush to begin withdrawing troops.

Mr. Snow yesterday acknowledged the reception to the president's plan has been hostile, but said the administration thinks that after studying the proposal more, members of Congress and the American public will conclude there is no alternative if they want success in Iraq.

"You ask yourself, can the Iraqis do it all by themselves right now? If the answer is yes, then, OK, bring everybody home. If the answer is no, the answer is what do you do to try to build that capacity so Americans can come home," he said. "That becomes the focal point of the debate."

Murtha: Anti-war Movement "Way Ahead Of Me" (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

Rep. John P. Murtha yesterday distanced himself from the anti-war movement's demands to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq immediately, but said he is exploring ways to block funding for additional troops.

"This group here today, they're way ahead of me," the Pennsylvania Democrat said of the Out-of-Iraq Caucus and the Congressional Progressive Caucus, which are comprised of the most ardently anti-war members of Congress.

Mr. Murtha, a member of the House Appropriations Committee, spoke to the groups yesterday during a forum about using the budget to prevent the Bush administration from boosting troop levels.

"I'm doing what I think needs to be done, and I'm doing it as quickly as I can," said Mr. Murtha, a former Marine who rose to national prominence in 2005 by calling for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, softened their tone in the second day of hearings with administration officials on the Iraq war.

"I can't help but note the difference in the tenor of this meeting today," Sen. Bill Nelson, Florida Democrat, said to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee with Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

Mr. Nelson was referring to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's testimony Thursday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The low point of that hearing came when Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said Miss Rice would not pay any price for sending U.S. troops to Iraq because she has no children.

Mr. Gates told the panel that President Bush's plan for increasing troops was designed in part by Gen. George Casey Jr., the outgoing top military commander in Iraq, in conjunction with the Iraqi government. Opponents of the troop increase have said the president is ignoring advice from his generals.

Mr. Gates said the U.S. military thinks Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government "finally have the will to act" to restrain Shi'ite death squads.

Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, has been faulted for cracking down only on Sunni militias, which are engaged in a fierce sectarian conflict with the Shi'ites.

"This is, I think, a pivot point -- the pivot point -- in Iraq, as the Iraqi government insists on assuming the mantle of leadership in the effort to regain control of its own capital," Mr. Gates said.

Democratic leaders face a dilemma. They want to block funding for more troops in Iraq, without withholding funds for those already on the ground.

"We must cut off the funds," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat, during yesterday's anti-war forum.

But the Democratic chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David R. Obey of Wisconsin, has said he does not think Democrats can block some funds while approving others.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's focus is on bringing a non-binding resolution against a troop increase to the Senate floor, possibly next week. The Nevada Democrat hopes that up to a dozen Republicans will vote against the increase.

WASHINGTON (CNN) --As President Bush wrestles with the continuing war in Iraq, he's currently reading a book about another difficult war: "A Savage War of Peace," by Alistair Horne, a senior White House source tells CNN.

It is a dense and detailed history of the battle between France and revolutionaries in its colony of Algeria, describing an unsuccessful war against a bloody terrorist insurgency. A resistance movement rose in 1954 to resist French occupation. It quickly turned into a civil war between factions that became a costly, unpopular conflict for the French.

In Europe And Elsewhere, Bush's New War Strategy Is Greeted With Skepticism (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 12 — Whatever the impact of President's Bush's new strategy for Iraq in Baghdad or in Baquba, it has won few converts across a worried world, where dismay and hostility toward the American expedition have grown while support trickles away.

Perhaps, some people whispered Friday in the Middle East, Arab leaders might privately welcome the effect of 20,000 more American soldiers, but would not say so publicly unless their presence swung the battle for Baghdad. Maybe, others ventured, this moment recalled President Nixon's invasion of Cambodia — "extension of the fight amid promises of withdrawal," as a German columnist put it. But even Britain, the onetime cheerleader for the White House, offered only an ambiguous response to the president's announcement, saying London remained on track to withdraw its forces, not increase them.

For some, the response was a study in haughty indifference.

"It hasn't changed anything," said Bernard Bot, the Dutch Foreign Minister, whose country withdrew its troops from the Iraq coalition in 2005.

Others painted their analogies in a more apocalyptic hue. In France, the newspaper Le Monde — which, after the Sept. 11 attacks, had declared, "We are all Americans" — published a cartoon depicting President Bush as a bulldozer driver shoveling American soldiers into a ditch in the shape of Iraq.

In Germany, the liberal Süddeutsche Zeitung wrote, "Bush hopes to douse the Iraqi fire with the blood of Americans."

Mr. Bush's announcement had been awaited across the globe, particularly since the publication of a report by the Iraq Study Group had fed speculation that Mr. Bush might adopt a strategy avoiding higher troop levels and including diplomacy toward Syria and Iran. But the president's speech Wednesday night dashed those hopes, confirming for some the sense that Europe and the United States will not overcome a fundamental rift between American interventionism and a softer European approach.

"Europeans and Germans believe you have to talk to regimes you don't like," said Eberhard Sandschneider, the director of the Research Institute of the German Council on Foreign Relations. (Pointedly, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, declined to discuss Iraq in an interview with correspondents on Thursday.)

Indeed, said Philippe Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, only a broad political strategy would enable Iraq to "recover stability, and beyond Iraq, stability in the region." That was the view, too, among Spanish officials. "Only political solutions can solve the crisis which affects stability in the region," said Miguel Ángel Moratinos, the foreign minister.

At the same time, there was some sympathy — if not always explicit — for the American quandary: this was, many analysts sensed, a defining event, a last throw of the dice that would measure American prestige and credibility against the clamor of its adversaries.

"This is a dangerous gamble," said the liberal newspaper Asahi Shimbun in Tokyo, where the government formally supported the new American strategy. In London, the antiwar Independent newspaper declared in an editorial, "The U.S. military is now being called upon to fight the battle for Baghdad all over again, in circumstances that are infinitely more complex than they were the first time around."

In both the Arab world and Israel, analysts expressed a keen sense that Iraq could turn into a zero-sum game, even if America scaled back its avowed ambitions for a democratic Iraq and aimed simply to mold stability and moderation.

"If the U.S. gets out before achieving these limited aims, Iraq is going to descend into mass chaos — we can see the country splinter," said Chuck Freilich, a former deputy national security adviser in Israel and now a senior fellow at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. "The region will be further radicalized. Iran would become the regional hegemon."

That same fear pervades many Arab societies. "The withdrawal would signify defeat, which would result in strengthening all the enemies' desire for expansion, such as Iran's persistence in developing its nuclear weapons, and Al Qaeda would double its activities in Iraq and the whole region," said an opinion article in the Thursday issue of the pan-Arab newspaper Asharq Alawsat, which is close to the Saudi royal family and published in London.

Some saw the Arab approach in more nuanced terms. Mansoor al-Jamri, editor in chief of the Bahraini newspaper Al Wasat, said he thought it likely that some Arab leaders supported the increase in troops — if for no other reason than to offset Iran's rising influence — but that they would never publicly express such an opinion. "There is a mixed feeling," Mr. Jamri said. "If America is involved more in some way to secure Iraqi politics and secure the situation, I think some Iraqis and some Arab governments will like it."

But there is a deeper pessimism, reflecting a widely held Arab view that the American presence is the source of Iraq's woes.

"Bush's strategy of surging troops is nothing new," said Bassem Alim, a Saudi lawyer and political writer. "He did that last year when he announced an additional 40,000 troops were being sent to Iraq. That didn't do the job, and I don't think that an additional 20,000 troops will do the job either." He added, "Either Bush doesn't understand the situation, or he is blinded by his evangelical beliefs."

Yet an immediate American withdrawal would be deeply troubling in many parts of the Arab world. An Egypt-based Arab diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, so as not to antagonize Americans, put it like this: "The other side of the coin is the immediate departure of American troops will leave such a vacuum in power, it will have two results — Iran will fill the vacuum where it can, and the whole country will explode."

Or, as John Howard, the Australian prime minister and a close ally of Mr. Bush, put it: "You have to understand that if America, the most powerful country in the world, our strongest ally, is defeated in Iraq or retreats in circumstances of defeat in Iraq, that would be the greatest propaganda victory the terrorists could ever win."

Yet Russia bemoaned America's seeming rejection of regional diplomacy. "It seems that the calculation remains the same: to achieve a settlement of the Iraq crisis by force and not to consider proposals to establish a dialogue with Iraq's main groups with the support of all its neighbors, including Syria and Iran," said Mikhail I. Kamynin, the Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman.

In Eastern Europe, the grinding campaign in Iraq has created divisions and splintered support.

"President Bush's arguments should be understood, because leaving Iraq by Americans would be a tragedy," argued Stefan Niesiolowski, a senator for the left-leaning opposition Civic Platform party in Poland. He argued that the 1,000-odd Polish soldiers serving in Iraq should stay. "It would not be nice if we would say to Americans, 'It's your problem, not ours.' "

But on the Polish right, opinions were less sanguine. Kazimiera Szczuka, a literary critic, said, "Americans should find a way to withdraw honorably from Iraq as soon as possible. Polish troops should not stay there any longer."

In the Czech Republic, there is a sort of unspoken pity for Mr. Bush's predicament and skepticism of his new Iraq plan. "The prospect for success is not large," wrote Adam Cerny, a columnist for Hospodarske Noviny, a Czech business daily. "Why — when similar attempts have not worked earlier — should the same procedure lead to different results today?"

"At the very most," he wrote, "President Bush will not find critics but very cautious partners among other Europeans."

That process has gone much further in Italy, once a staunch ally of President Bush under former Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi.

But in an interview with a French television network on Thursday, Prime Minister Romano Prodi, Mr. Berlusconi's successor, criticized President Bush's new Iraq plan directly. "He should listen to the Baker report and to the American public," Mr. Prodi said.

Gov. Backs Bush's Plan For Iraq (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Bucking the disenchanted views of most Americans about the war, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday that he supports President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

"I think we should give it everything," Schwarzenegger responded when asked in a pre-taped television interview whether he supported Bush's plan to send an additional 21,000 troops. "We should give it everything in order to be victorious."

In the interview to be broadcast Sunday on ABC News' "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," Schwarzenegger said he does not want the U.S. to "pull out of this war as losers." That would be "disastrous" for the Middle East, he said, according to portions of the interview distributed by the network Friday.

Schwarzenegger did break with the president by reiterating his support for a timeline for American troops to withdraw so that the Iraqis fully understand that they have "got to be independent," according to the ABC excerpt.

The comments come as Schwarzenegger has been facing harsh criticism for his plan to place new requirements and fees on employers, hospitals and doctors to pay for a plan that would ensure health coverage for all Californians.

But Schwarzenegger has also drawn a good deal of praise for his new self-definition as a "post-partisan" governor, one who draws on ideas favored by the electorate regardless of where the notions fall in the ideological spectrum.

"I don't try to please the conservatives; I don't try to please the liberals," he said in a part of the interview broadcast by ABC on Friday. "I like to please the people. I'm a public servant. I'm not a politician."

But the governor's position on the war is not in line with the majority of the electorate's views. A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last week found that 12% of those surveyed supported sending more troops and that 85% favored withdrawing.

Of those supporting withdrawal, 15% wanted to do so immediately, 39% favored it over the next 12 months and 31% thought it should be done over as many years as needed.

"This will be a blow to anyone who has hopes that Schwarzenegger is in the center," said Bob Mulholland, who was a senior advisor to Phil Angelides, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger in last year's election.

During the campaign, Angelides tried unsuccessfully to use Californians' antipathy toward Bush against Schwarzenegger because of the Republican governor's support for the president.

Dan Schnur, a GOP consultant, disagreed with Mulholland. "This is what being a post-partisan governor looks like," Schnur said. "He leans left on some things and right on others. For every universal healthcare plan, there's a troop surge. It all balances out in the center."

Dave Gilliard, a Republican consultant who has clashed on occasion with the administration, said he did not think Schwarzenegger made the comments for political purposes.

"I'm not Schwarzenegger's biggest fan, but in this case I don't think there's politics involved," he said. "It's probably a heartfelt position — not a particularly popular one, even with Republicans."

Schwarzenegger, who had campaigned for Bush in 2004, named two Republicans he might support in 2008: former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain of Arizona. He also praised Michael Bloomberg, the Democrat-turned-Republican mayor of New York City, who is said to be considering an independent presidential bid.

"I think that if it's Rudy Giuliani, I think that if it is McCain, he's a terrific candidate, even Bloomberg, all of those guys are terrific," he said.

The Two Vacuums (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

I had the odd and wholly unexpected experience of feeling supportive of a troop increase until I saw the president's speech arguing for it. What a jarring, furtive-seeming thing it was.

Surely the Iraq endeavor and those who've fought in it and put their hopes in it deserve more than collapse, withdrawal and calamity. But...20,000 more troops, who'll start to arrive over the next few months, and we'll press the Iraqi government to be tougher? A young journalist who is generally supportive of the president said, "So this is it? The grand strategy is to repeat a strategy they weren't able to execute the first time they tried it?"

What a dreadful mistake the president made when he stiff-armed the Iraq Study Group report, which had bipartisan membership, an air of mutual party investment, the imprimatur of what remains of or is understood as the American establishment, and was inherently moderate in its proposals: move diplomatically, adjust the way we pursue the mission, realize abrupt withdrawal would yield chaos. There were enough good ideas, anodyne suggestions and blurry recommendations (blurriness is not always bad in foreign affairs -- confusion can buy time!) that I thought the administration would see it as a life raft. Instead they pushed it away. Like the old woman in the flood who took to the roof and implored God to send a boat to save her. A hunk of wood floated by as she prayed with fervor. A busted wooden door floated by as the waters rose and she doubled her prayers. Finally she cried "God, I asked you to save me and you didn't send a boat!" And the voice of God answered: "I sent you a hunk of wood and a door!"

We don't always recognize deliverance when it arrives.

There was something unnerving about the speech, from the jumpy beginning to the stumbles to the sound glitches. A jittery affair, and some dusk hung over it. At the end I suspected the president's aides had instructed him again and again not to strut or have an edge. He perhaps understood that as: Got it -- don't be me. He couldn't do wounded wisdom, but he could repress cocky cowboy. The result was that he seemed not chastened but effaced, not there. It was odd. One couldn't find the personal geography of the speech.

Nothing in it really worked. "I had a sinking feeling," said a conservative journalist afterward. An old Republican hand: "He looked like he was over his head." Of the call for bipartisanship: "A tad late."

John McCain looked pale -- he looked like a ghost among the pillars -- as he gave reaction on Fox from the Capitol. His voice was soft, feathery, like a speaker who'd been knocked flat on the way to the podium. "I'd much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said. I wondered if he was thinking, Once again this man sinks my fortunes. It's South Carolina all over again! Dianne Feinstein seemed grave on CNN. "Oh, my heart fell," she said of the president's proposal. "I was very disappointed by it." She wanted more attention to Mideast peace efforts.

Pat Buchanan on MSNBC warned of what would happen if the U.S. simply withdrew or maintained the status quo: "I think the president's gonna get this last chance, but I think it's the last one." There has been something gallant in the old battler who'd opposed the war taking no pleasure in the current crisis. Democratic foreign affairs veteran Richard Holbrooke on PBS: The speech was "an astonishing event....The president is doubling down on every bad bet." Republican veteran Ken Duberstein: "I found myself watching the speech thinking, 'I want to believe.'" He did not hide his skepticism.

The question that suddenly began to crop up in all the talk after the speech was: What will fill the vacuum if America simply says, "We gave it our best, but the Iraqi people didn't seem to want to cooperate in their freedom, so we will have to leave"? The talk was grim and believable. Ethnic cleansing, religious warfare, geopolitical machinations potentially harmful -- almost certainly harmful, and deeply so -- to America and the West. One argument seems tired and not true. It is that if we leave Iraq, the terrorists of the world will have a safe place in which to gather, coalesce, plan and move. They already have such places, in the Mideast and outside it, and maybe here. Terrorists hide, and the world is full of hiding places.

But there are two vacuums in the Iraq story. The first is the vacuum that would be filled in Iraq if America withdrew tomorrow. The second is the power vacuum that will be created in Washington if the administration is, indeed, collapsing. The Democrats of Capitol Hill will fill that one. And they seem -- and seemed in their statements after the president's speech -- wholly unprepared to fill it, wholly unserious in their thoughts and approach. They seem locked into habits that no longer pertain, and absorbed by the small picture of partisan advancement at the expense of the big picture, which is that the nation is in trouble and needs their help. They are sunk in the superficial.

When Nancy Pelosi showed up at the White House Wednesday to talk with the president it was obvious she'd spent a lot of time thinking about...what to wear. She wrapped herself in a rich red shawl. Dick Morris said it looked like a straitjacket. I thought she looked like a particularly colorful mummy. She complained that the president had not asked for her input as he put together his plan. He should have. But what would she have brought to the table if she'd been asked to it? It is still -- still! -- unclear.

The other night after the speech, Rahm Emanuel, on PBS, was pressed for what he would have the president do. He blinked as if the question were a diversion. He was there to say Bush is Bad. Why bother with what might be good?

Right now, in the deepest levels of the American government, intelligence and military planners should be ordered to draw up serious plans for an American withdrawal, and serious strategies for dealing with the realities withdrawal will bring. It would not be the worst thing if the Maliki government knew those plans were being drawn up. It might concentrate the mind.

What is paramount is a hard, cold-eyed and even brutal look at America's interests. We have them. I'm not sure they've been given sufficient attention the past few years. In fact, I am sorry to say I believe they have not.

Therapy For Nation Builders (WP)

By Henry Allen

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Here's an idea to play with:

Give it to him, give the president everything he wants for the war in Iraq. Money, troops, the support of Congress, all of it.

Give everything that's requested by everybody in the military-industrial-political-intellectual-media complex, or at least the ones who got us into this war and still think they can get us out of it with a win.

For one thing, there's always a chance, however slight, that they will. That would be nice indeed.

After all, our vision for Iraq is way nicer than our enemies' alternatives. South Vietnam would be better off, too, if we'd won. It's nice to think that if we'd achieved our goals in Cuba, instead of the Bay of Pigs fiasco, or in Somalia instead of the "Black Hawk Down" embarrassment, or Lebanon instead of the barracks-bombing catastrophe, they'd be better off, too.

A loss in Korea would have been far worse than the stalemate we settled for.

Right now, a nice outcome seems unlikely in Iraq.

But then, the proposal on the table here, a sort of thought experiment, addresses a problem that is a lot bigger than Iraq.

The problem, if we lose in Iraq, is that America is apt to keep on doing what it's been doing for decades when it loses, which is to say learn nothing and have years of hissy fits about who's to blame. And set itself up for another fiasco someplace else.

We have had successes: the liberation of Kuwait and our intervention in the Balkans. And, most important of all, we won the Cold War without ever having to match armies and nuclear arsenals with the Soviet Union.

But our combat fiascos are coming to define America both to the world and to itself. They are also demonstrating that we are incapable of winning ground wars against some of the poorest people on Earth, if those wars last more than a week.

After Vietnam, one hoped that we could salvage pride in the courage with which our soldiers fought, and in the knowledge that we had learned our lesson well enough that we would never again send them to die in such a doomed cause.

As we watched our helicopters abandon our terrified allies on the roof of our Saigon embassy, it seemed reasonable to assume that the shame of that moment would lead to a new sanity.

Instead, our failed ground combat interventions and nation building continue like a sort of neurosis, the kind that has been defined as doing the same thing over and over in expectation of a different result, in the manner of France fighting and losing one colonial war after another after World War II.

In America, however, this syndrome is a legacy not of colonialism but of World War II itself -- of a triumphalism of the sort John Kennedy perpetuated when he boasted of being from the generation born of that war, and said that the lesson to be learned was that we should pay any price, bear any burden, to assure the success of liberty.

How good we feel about ourselves, sharing this dream. Without the illusion that we can make it come true, we would be like Britain without its empire, like France without its mission civilatrice, a nation tinged by shabby resentment and existential resignation. The problem is that reality may leave us with nothing better in the end.

As part of our thought experiment, think now of our mind-set as an American sickness, an addiction in the form of a belief.

If it were an addiction, we would create a 12-step program to cure it. The first step would be recognizing that our governing establishment is powerless over it, and that our attitude toward our role in the world has become unmanageable.

Recovering alcoholics will say that they didn't begin their recovery until they "hit bottom." It turns out that it was a mistake to believe we hit bottom while watching those helicopters in 1975, or any of the smaller failures that have followed. And so, the proposal here is to make sure that this time we hit bottom hard enough to prove to ourselves once and for all that the very nation-building that George W. Bush swore off before the 2000 election still has him -- and, more important, us -- helpless in its grip.

On the other hand, maybe if we give the president everything he wants he'll turn this thing around. How nice. Then we can be off to invade Iran, barrel across the DMZ into North Korea, liberate Tibet . . .

From Dr. King, A Reminder On Iraq (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Forty years ago, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., whom the nation will honor on Monday, took to the pulpit of Riverside Church in New York City at a meeting organized by Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam. The date was April 4, 1967, one year before his assassination in Memphis.

King said he was in New York because his conscience had left him no choice. In his speech, "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence," King declared: "That time has come for us in relation to Vietnam."

King acknowledged the reluctance of some people to speak out on Vietnam -- the same hesitation some Americans may have today over voicing their concerns about Iraq. People, he explained, "do not easily assume the task of opposing their government's policy, especially in time of war."

But King concluded that too much was at stake. He and the other religious and lay leaders were moved by what the conflict in Vietnam was doing to the United States. Vietnam, King said, was consuming American troops and money like "some demonic, destructive suction tube" even as that war was laying waste to the Vietnamese people and to America's standing in the world.

More than 3,000 Americans have been killed in Iraq, while 22,000 others have been wounded. Billions of dollars that could have been invested here at home have been spent there, a lot of it wasted, some of it stolen, plenty of it unaccounted for. And Iraqis in Baghdad, who cowered for decades under a brutal dictator, have been living in the midst of violence almost continuously since Saddam Hussein was deposed.

"We are creating enemies faster than we can kill them" read a bumper sticker in Washington this week.

Now enter George W. Bush -- the president who got America into this debacle through a series of misjudgments that would make Alfred E. Neuman look brilliant. This week Bush announced plans to plop down thousands of additional troops in the middle of a sectarian war and to shell out billions of additional dollars to pacify a war-weary Iraqi population that, truth be told, wants America gone.

Why trust this administration?

Contrary to what Bush and his allies said:

-- There were no weapons of mass destruction poised to strike America and her allies.

-- A quick defeat of Hussein did not lead to chocolates and flowers in the streets of Baghdad.

-- An American invasion did not produce a unified, nonsectarian and Western-oriented Iraq or spark a desire for U.S.-style governance throughout the Arab world.

-- De-Baathification and the imposition of a market economy at gunpoint did not usher in a period of tranquility or the flowering of capitalism.

The Bush administration struck first because it had the power to strike and the arrogance to think, foolishly, that it could win and dominate the conquered on the cheap.

King spoke in '67 about "the Western arrogance of feeling that it has everything to teach others and nothing to learn from them." Witness the Bush team in Iraq.

Today they have a bloodbath on their hands to show for their labors, and Iran is on the verge of getting an Iraqi neighbor beyond its wildest dreams.

Yet even now, neoconservatives inside and outside of government are counseling Bush to remain in Iraq for years to prevent the Shiite-dominated regime from collapsing. They also are encouraging him to prepare for battle with Iran and Syria if those countries start meddling in Iraq -- as if they aren't now. With what exactly and for how long we are supposed to do battle with Tehran and Damascus, the militaristic neocon noncombatants in Washington don't say. But then again, they have a tolerance for risk and cost that exceeds that of those who actually do the fighting and dying.

Forty years ago at Riverside Church, people of conscience declared that "a time comes when silence is betrayal." They went beyond using their voices and votes when they agreed to break their silence. They responded, as King had urged, by matching their words with actions. "We are at the moment when our lives must be placed on the line if our nation is to survive its own folly. Every man of humane convictions must decide on the protest that best suits his convictions, but we must all protest," King preached that day.

Yes, this is a different time and a different world. Global terrorism is a sobering reality. And America is on the right side in that war. To not fight back is tantamount to indulging a death wish.

But the first blow in Iraq, which was not a battleground for terrorism, was struck by Bush. He now, stubbornly and in the face of legitimate opposition, proposes to make matters worse.

Remember King and the words: "A time comes when silence is betrayal."

Bush Authorized Iranians' Arrest In Iraq, Rice Says (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A recent series of American raids against Iranians in Iraq was authorized under an order that President Bush decided to issue several months ago to undertake a broad military offensive against Iranian operatives in the country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday.

“There has been a decision to go after these networks,” Ms. Rice said in an interview with The New York Times in her office on Friday afternoon, before leaving on a trip to the Middle East.

Ms. Rice said Mr. Bush had acted “after a period of time in which we saw increasing activity” among Iranians in Iraq, “and increasing lethality in what they were producing.” She was referring to what American military officials say is evidence that many of the most sophisticated improvised explosive devices, or I.E.D.’s, being used against American troops were made in Iran.

Ms. Rice was vague on the question of when Mr. Bush issued the order, but said his decision grew out of questions that the president and members of his National Security Council raised in the fall.

The administration has long accused Iran of meddling in Iraq, providing weapons and training to Shiite forces with the idea of keeping the United States bogged down in the war. Ms. Rice’s willingness to discuss the issue seemed to reflect a new hostility to Iran that was first evident in Mr. Bush’s speech to the nation on Wednesday night, in which he accused Tehran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond.

Until now, despite a series of raids in which Iranians have been seized by American forces in Baghdad and other cities in Iraq, administration officials have declined to say whether Mr. Bush ordered such actions.

The White House decision to authorize the aggressive steps against Iranians in Iraq appears to formalize the American effort to contain Iran’s ambitions as a new front in the Iraq war. Administration officials now describe Iran as the single greatest threat the United States faces in the Middle East, though some administration critics regard the talk about Iran as a diversion, one intended to shift attention away from the spiraling chaos in Iraq.

In adopting a more confrontational approach toward Iran, Mr. Bush has decisively rejected recommendations of the Iraq Study Group that he explore negotiations with Tehran as part of a new strategy to help quell the sectarian violence in Iraq.

In the interview on Friday, Ms. Rice described the military effort against Iranians in Iraq as a defensive “force protection mission,” but said it was also motivated by concerns that Iran was trying to further destabilize the country.

Mr. Bush’s public warning to Iran was accompanied by the deployment of an additional aircraft carrier off Iran’s coast and advanced Patriot antimissile defense systems in Persian Gulf countries near Iran’s borders. Both the White House and the secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, insisted Friday that the United States was not seeking to goad Iran into conflict, and that it had no intention of taking the battle into Iranian territory. The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, warned reporters away from "an urban legend that's going around" that Mr. Bush was "trying to prepare the way for war" with Iran or Syria.

Mr. Gates said that the United States did not intend to engage in hot pursuit of the operatives into Iran.

"We believe that we can interrupt these networks that are providing support, through actions inside the territory of Iraq, that there is no need to attack targets in Iran itself," Mr. Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "I continue to believe what I told you at the confirmation hearing," he added, referring to last month's hearings on his nomination, "that any kind of military action inside Iran itself would be a very last resort."

Ms. Rice's comments came just a day after the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, issued a sharp warning to the administration about the recent raids against Iranians in Iraq, including one in Erbil early Thursday.

He said the vote to authorize the president to order the use of force to topple Saddam Hussein was not a vehicle for mounting attacks in Iran, even to pursue cells or networks assisting insurgents or sectarian militias. "I just want the record to show — and I would like to have a legal response from the State Department if they think they have authority to pursue networks or anything else across the border into Iran and Iraq — that will generate a constitutional confrontation here in the Senate, I predict to you," Mr. Biden said.

In the view of American officials, Iran is engaged in a policy of "managed chaos" in Iraq. Its presumed goal, both policymakers and intelligence officials say, is to raise the cost to the United States for its intervention in Iraq, in hopes of teaching Washington a painful lesson about the perils of engaging in regime change.

Toward this end, American officials charge, Iran has provided components, including explosives and infrared triggering devices, for sophisticated roadside bombs that are designed to penetrate armor. They have also provided training for several thousand Shiite militia fighters, mostly in Iran. Officials say the training is carried out by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards and the Ministry of Intelligence and Security.

In the interview on Friday, Ms. Rice said, "We think they are providing help to the militias as well, and maybe even the more violent element of these militias."

In addition, American officials say the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Quds Force is active in Iraq. A senior military official said last week that one of the Iranians seized in Baghdad late last month was the No. 3 Quds official. He said American forces uncovered maps of neighborhoods in Baghdad in which Sunnis could be evicted, and evidence of involvement in the war during the summer in Lebanon.

That Iranian official was ordered released, by Ms. Rice among others, after Iran claimed he had diplomatic status.

This week, American forces in Iraq conducted at least two raids against suspected Iranian operatives, including the raid in Erbil. The United States is currently detaining several individuals with Iranian passports who were picked up in those raids. The Iranians have said that they were in the process of establishing a consulate, but American officials said that the Erbil operation was a liaison office and that the workers there did not have diplomatic passports.

A defense official said Friday that such raids would continue. "We are going to be more aggressive," he said, referring to the suspected Iranian operatives. "We are going to look for them and to try to do what we can to get them into custody."

BBC.com, January 12, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has denied that the US intends to escalate the war in Iraq by confronting Iranian groups operating there.

Ms Rice backed a pledge by President Bush to run search and destroy missions against groups suspected of building bombs for use within Iraq.

"That's not an escalation, that's good policy," Ms Rice told the BBC.

Ms Rice spoke ahead of a visit to the Middle East, a visit that will focus on Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

The week-long tour will take in Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, as well as Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Crosshead here

Speaking before leaving the US, Ms Rice insisted that the United States was not going to let either Iran or Syria continue activities that endangered US soldiers in Iraq.

"I don't think there is a government in the world that would sit by and let the Iranians in particular run networks inside Iraq that are building explosive devices of a very high quality that are being used to kill their soldiers.

"That's not an escalation, that's just good policy."

Earlier this week the US raided the Iranian consulate in Irbil, northern Iraq, detaining five people.

Both President George W Bush and Ms Rice have said this week that they intend to step up measures against those threatening to destabilise Iraq.

The president announced 21,500 extra troops for Iraq in an effort to dampen violence across the country, especially in the capital, Baghdad.

Last year an influential report led by former Secretary of State James Baker urged the Bush administration to begin negotiations with Iran and Syria in a bid to find a solution in Iraq.

Reasonable voices

As well as Iraq, Ms Rice will also discuss the Israel-Palestinian conflict during her stay in the Middle East.

However, she admitted she was not travelling to the region with a plan to end the conflict.

"I think anything that is an American plan is bound to fail," she said.

"The United States is not going to succeed in this alone. This has to have an Arab voice - Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia.

"It certainly has to have the voice of the reasonable factions among the Palestinians, like Abu Mazen [Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas]. And it has to have an Israeli voice."

White House Softens Iran Tone (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration sought to assure lawmakers and the public Friday that despite harsh new rhetoric, it did not intend to go to war with Iran, even as U.S. sources charged that Iranians captured in Irbil, Iraq, were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards.

President Bush accused Iran in a speech this week of helping launch attacks against U.S. troops in Iraq. His remarks were followed by combative comments from his top war advisors, new moves by U.S. naval forces and a raid Thursday in the Kurdish-controlled city of Irbil.

The administration moved Friday to defuse concerns that it was planning or inviting a confrontation with Tehran. At a news conference, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed as an "urban legend" suggestions that the United States was preparing for another war. Similar denials were issued by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But other U.S. officials pressed the case that the Islamic Republic was helping foment violence in neighboring Iraq.

One Western official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, charged that the Iranians captured in Irbil were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards and were suspected of involvement in bomb smuggling.

The raid followed another U.S. operation last month in Baghdad that netted several high-level members of the Quds Force, an elite intelligence and special operations group within the Revolutionary Guards, who were involved in transferring Iranian explosives to Shiite militias in Iraq, the source said.

Iraqi officials say the building raided Thursday was a long-standing Iranian liaison office. The Kurdistan government said it was a consulate and called for the U.S. to immediately release the detainees, who it said were protected by the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.

But Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. Army spokesman, said that it was not an accredited consulate and that the officials did not identify themselves as diplomats or have diplomatic credentials when detained. Although witnesses reported gunfire, Garver said the soldiers used only nonlethal concussion grenades to force the Iranians from the building. They surrendered without incident, he said.

"The operation was conducted without a single shot," Garver said.

He declined to say where in Iraq the Iranians were being held.

U.S. officials said both raids were intended to disrupt Iranian interference in Iraq. The Revolutionary Guards have been linked to transfers of Iranian-made bombs that are designed to focus a cone of concussive force so powerful that it can punch through a tank.

Increasing numbers of U.S. troops in Iraq are being killed by the bombs, particularly in Diyala, Kirkuk, Baghdad and other areas where Shiite militias have a strong presence, commanders say.

U.S. officials believe the Quds Force is in control of elements of two powerful Shiite paramilitary organizations, the Badr Brigade and the Al Mahdi army.

In his national address Wednesday, Bush accused Iran of providing "material support" for attacks against U.S. troops. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," he said. "We'll interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

His comments were part of his new strategy on Iraq, a plan to add 21,500 U.S. troops that was unveiled to widespread opposition. He announced he was moving a second aircraft carrier group into the Persian Gulf and pledged to stop the attacks and Iranian support for insurgents in Iraq. Military officials also had announced plans to send Patriot missile batteries to the gulf region.

At a hearing Thursday in Washington, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice whether Bush "has plans to cross the Syrian and-or Iranian border."

Rice did not answer directly. "Obviously, the president isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq," she told Biden.

Speaking to reporters Friday on her plane at the beginning of a trip to the Middle East and Europe, Rice said Friday that the United States would find ways to "adjust over time" to any difficulties in its new plan for Iraq.

Aides said during a fuel stop in Shannon, Ireland, that the raids against Iranian targets were not separately authorized by the president but were authorized under a decision made several months ago about how to approach Iranian influence in Iraq.

Congress showed concern over what could happen.

"Now we see the specter of a new war front in Iran," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.).

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) said an administration move against Iran would be reminiscent of the secretive U.S. incursion into Cambodia in 1970 under the Nixon administration.

After the criticism, Snow tried to temper the administration's rhetoric by emphasizing that war preparations were not underway for Iran or Syria.

At a meeting Friday of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) evoked Vietnam and again asked whether U.S. forces intended to cross into Iran in pursuit of the Iranian networks.

Gates and Pace said U.S. military forces in Iraq would not enter Iranian territory.

But both Gates and Pace emphasized that they believed Iranians were responsible for the deaths of American troops.

Iraq FM Defends Detained Iranians (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Five Iranians detained by U.S.-led forces were working in a decade-old government liaison office that was in the process of being upgraded to a consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said Friday.

But Deputy U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington that the U.S.-led forces entered the building because information linked it to Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

Tehran condemned the raid in the Kurdish-controlled northern city of Irbil and urged Iraq to push for the Iranians' release.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said the building where the Iranians were detained Thursday had operated with Iraqi government approval for 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0116944

"We are now in the process of changing these offices to consulates," he said. "It is not a new office. This liaison office has been there for a long time."

He also echoed concerns the U.S. and Iran were dragging Iraq into their fight.

"We don't want Iraq to be a battleground for settling scores with other countries," Zebari, a Kurd, told CNN.

The diplomatic tussle came at an unwelcome time for the United States as President Bush faces criticism over his new strategy for ending the violence in Iraq. Bush also vowed to isolate Iran and Syria, which the U.S. has accused of fueling attacks in Iraq.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani plans a trip to Syria on Sunday, the highest-level Iraqi visit to the country in more than 24 years. The neighbors restored diplomatic relations in December that were cut in 1982 amid ideological disputes between Damascus and the regime of Saddam Hussein.

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's office, meanwhile, rejected Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq as part of an effort to curb sectarian attacks.

"We reject Bush's new strategy and we think it will fail," said Abdul-Razzaq al-Nidawi, a senior official in al-Sadr's office. He said Iraq's problems were due to the presence of U.S. troops and called for their withdrawal.

Local leaders of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, which has been blamed for much of the sectarian violence, said they were bracing for an attack and avoiding appearing in public with their weapons.

Zebari's Iranian counterpart, Manouchehr Mottaki, called on the Iraqi government to secure the release of the five Iranians, Iranian state television reported. "Such illegal and adventurous acts by the U.S. should be stopped," the broadcast quoted Mottaki as saying.

Mottaki condemned the raid, saying it contravened the Vienna Convention. "This behavior by the United States contradicts its claims of providing security in Iraq," he was quoted as saying.

Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin also harshly criticized the detentions, calling them a "flagrant violation" of international conventions.

"It's absolutely unacceptable when the military storms a foreign consular office on the territory of another state," Kamynin said. "The unlawful actions by the U.S. servicemen mark an open abuse of a mandate issued to the multinational forces in Iraq."

The 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations says consular premises are "inviolable," but it was not clear how that would apply as the building was not a consulate.

Casey said there was no truth to reports that Iran was carrying out legitimate diplomatic activity at the site.

"It did not have the standing of a consulate nor did it have any other international diplomatic standing to speak of," Casey said.

He said the Iranian elements included Revolutionary Guards, a key part of armed support for Iran's Islamic government since it took power in 1979.'

Zebari also said U.S. forces tried to seize more people at the airport in Irbil, 220 miles north of Baghdad, prompting a confrontation with Kurdish troops.

A Pentagon official in Washington said that after troops detained the Iranians, they learned another person might have escaped and fled to the airport. An American team went to the airport, where they "surprised" Kurdish forces, who apparently had not been informed they were coming, said the Defense Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about the incident.

Meanwhile, sectarian violence persisted. Suspected Shiite militiamen attacked a Sunni mosque in a religiously mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, prompting clashes that wounded two guards, police said.

Attackers later blew up a Shiite mosque that was under construction in the northern city of Kirkuk, police Col. Anwar Hassan said. No casualties were reported.

At least 19 people were reported killed or dead nationwide, including 10 bullet-riddled bodies found in Baghdad and an Iraqi journalist who was killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Mosul.

Khudr Younis al-Obaidi was the second journalist killed this year. Associated Press staffer Ahmed Hadi Naji was found shot in the back last week.

A Risky Game Of Risk (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

I feel good about the new war with Iran.

How can you not have confidence in the crackerjack team that brought you Operation Iraqi Freedom, which foundered and led to Operation Together Forward, which stumbled and led to Operation Together Forward II, which collapsed and was replaced by The New Way Forward, the Surge now being launched even though nobody's together and everything's going backward?

I say, bring it on. If a pre-emptive war in Iraq doesn't work, why not try a pre-emptive war on Iran in Iraq?

Although Tony Snow dismissed the idea of war with Iran as an "urban legend" yesterday, Condi Rice revealed to New York Times reporters that President Bush acted months ago to parry Iran's ambitions, issuing orders for a military campaign against the Iranian Revolutionary Guard forces sneaking into Iraq. Using diplomatic passports, the agents have been smuggling in sophisticated bomb-making components and infrared trigger devices, which could be used to blow up American soldiers.

The move against Iran allows the president and Dick Cheney — who was, natch, militating for the Surge — to blow off, once more, the Iraq Study Group and Congress, to push back rather than make up.

James Baker and Lee Hamilton had recommended playing nice with the mad mullahs, which even they acknowledged was a long shot, given that the Bush administration can offer them little except acquiescence in their nuclear weapons program, which is not going to happen.

Joe Biden, the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, warned Condi on Thursday that Mr. Bush did not have the authority to pursue the networks over the border into Iran or Syria. On Friday, Bob Gates assured the Senate Armed Services Committee that the Iranians they target won't be in Iran.

We're trying to stanch a self-inflicted wound: our failed occupation gave Iran the opening in Iraq we're now trying to shut down.

The White House had to admit this week what has been obvious to everybody else for eons, including a list of lame assumptions they embraced during the first few years of the occupation: "Majority of Iraqis will support the coalition and Iraqi efforts to build a democratic state" has now been supplanted by "Iraqis increasingly disillusioned with coalition efforts."

It's a remarkable moment, W. standing nearly alone, deserted by more and more Republicans, generals and Americans, risking it all on a weak reed like Prime Minister Maliki.

It's impossible to know what W. was really thinking as he stiffly delivered his fantasy scheme in the White House library. The whole capital was fraught, but the president may simply have been musing to himself: "I'm hungry ... I wonder what time the game starts on ESPN? ...Has anybody read all these books?"

W. always acts like he's upping the ante in a board game where you roll the dice and bet your plastic army divisions on the outcome. This doesn't surprise some of his old classmates at Yale, who remember Junior as the riskiest Risk player of them all, known for dropping by the rooms of friends, especially when they were trying to study for exams, for extended bouts of "The Game of Global Domination."

Junior was known as an extremely aggressive player in the venerable Parker Brothers board game, a brutal contest that requires bluster and bluffing as you invade countries, all the while betraying alliances. Notably, it's almost impossible to win Risk and conquer the world if you start the game in the Middle East, because you're surrounded by enemies.

His gamesmanship extended to sports — he loved going into overtime and demanding that points be played over because he wasn't quite ready.

As Graydon Carter recollects in the new Vanity Fair, Gail Sheehy wrote an article for the magazine about W. that made this point: "Even if he loses, his friends say, he doesn't lose. He'll just change the score, or change the rules, or make his opponent play until he can beat him."

W.'s best friend when he was a teenager in Houston, Doug Hannah, told Ms. Sheehy: "If you were playing basketball and you were playing to 11 and he was down, you went to 15."

Even if it was clear who was winning, W. wanted to go further to see what would happen. It was a technique that worked well in Tallahassee in 2000, but not so well in Tikrit.

Word is that even as they Surge, the Bush team is already working on Plan C, or as they will no doubt call it, The New, New Way Forward II.

Iraqi Leader Goes Own Way To Fill Top Post (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has filled the top military job in Baghdad with a virtually unknown officer chosen over the objections of U.S. and Iraqi military commanders, officials from both governments said.

Iraqi political figures said Friday that Maliki also had failed to consult the leaders of other political factions before announcing the appointment of Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar.

The appointment is highly significant because it is Maliki's first public move after President Bush's announcement that he was sending more troops to Iraq. The prime mission of those troops is to reduce violence in Baghdad, much of which is blamed on sectarian fighters.

As the Iraqi commander for the capital, Qanbar would play a central role in that campaign, and any ties he might have to sectarian groups could undermine the new U.S. effort.

In his speech Wednesday, in which he announced the troop increase, Bush said political and sectarian interference in security matters would no longer be tolerated.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people," Bush said. "The prime minister understands this."

Maliki's decision to push through his own choice for one of the country's most sensitive military posts — and to reject another officer who was considered more qualified by the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey — has renewed questions about the prime minister's intentions.

"It's a delicate situation," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker who questioned the choice of Qanbar. "It's very dangerous if it turns out that he has affiliations," he said, naming Maliki's political party and the anti-American Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr.

U.S. officials are skeptical of Qanbar not only because of the way he was named, but because they know little about him. Moreover, they have questioned the degree to which Maliki's government is reliant on sectarian figures, particularly Sadr. Maliki essentially is asking American officials to take Qanbar on trust at a time when they have little left.

Qanbar, a commander in the navy during Saddam Hussein's reign, has not worked with American military officials, who say they know little about him other than that he hails from Amarah, a city in Iraq's Shiite-dominated south, and that he was taken prisoner by American forces near Kuwait during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

U.S. commanders have said that officials in Maliki's government have intervened several times to block them from combating Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, which is accused of being behind much of the bloodshed in Baghdad. When U.S. forces did raid the militia's stronghold of Sadr City, a largely Shiite neighborhood of east Baghdad, Maliki's government publicly criticized them. On several occasions, Maliki ordered the release of suspected militiamen captured there, frustrating U.S. commanders.

The appointment of Qanbar comes as the U.S. military is debating whether to attack Sadr City. As the Iraqi commander, Qanbar could have advance knowledge of U.S. operations. He would command 18 brigades of Iraqi forces that are supposed to be deployed to work with the Americans.

U.S. officials have said the decision on whether to move into Sadr City will be left to the Iraqi government. Privately, senior military officials say that new rules of engagement negotiated with the Iraqis would allow them to go into the neighborhood and target individual insurgent and militia leaders.

At least some Pentagon planners appear to relish the opportunity to target the Al Mahdi militia.

"This time we have a commitment from Maliki and other key players in the Iraqi government … to have a no-holds-barred arrangement for neighborhoods in Baghdad," said a senior military official who requested anonymity in order to freely discuss military planning. Sadr City "will not be a safe haven" for militias, he said.

Within the Pentagon, not everyone agrees that attacking Sadr City is advisable.

Crucial to the decision will be the incoming U.S. commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus. He has not commented on the tactics he plans to pursue, but for the last two years he has overseen the development of the military's new counterinsurgency field manual, which appears to argue against a large-scale invasion of a neighborhood such as Sadr City, particularly in the early part of the new Baghdad security campaign.

The manual's first chapter, which Petraeus is known to have aggressively rewritten, advises commanders that though largescale offensives against insurgents may be necessary, they should be limited.

"Killing every insurgent is normally impossible," the manual says. "Attempting to do so can be counterproductive in some cases; it risks generating popular resentment, creating martyrs that motivate new recruits, and producing cycles of revenge."

An influential plan for Baghdad security drawn up by retired Army Gen. Jack Keane and military analyst Frederick Kagan strongly advised against moving into Sadr City. The plan, which was highly influential within the White House and is considered to mirror Petraeus' thinking, argued that an attack on Sadr City would unite now-splintered Shiite factions against U.S. forces.

"We have an opportunity now to keep the Shiite parties separate and to avoid a full-scale military conflict with them," Kagan said. "If we go into Sadr City, that will not be the case. We will find ourselves in a full-scale, very bloody operation, which probably will look something like Fallouja."

There is even more division over whether to target Sadr himself.

Senior military officials refused to discuss which insurgents and militia commanders might be in the crosshairs. They have been vague about whether Sadr could be detained or killed.

"The people we target are not fundamentally political leaders," said the senior military official. "We're targeting people who are directly involved with promoting violence either against our Iraqi partners or, in some instances, against us."

To quell the concerns U.S. commanders have about Qanbar, American officials and the Iraqi government have agreed on a complicated system in which another layer would be added to the command structure between Maliki and Qanbar. That layer would include the top U.S. commander, a high-ranking American official said.

But that decision did not appease Iraqi politicians who object that they were not consulted on Qanbar's appointment.

"Nobody asked us," said Adnan Dulaimi, a lawmaker with a main Sunni bloc. "This is the first I've heard."

Battling With Sadr For Iraqi Soldiers' Hearts (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The Iraqi soldiers broke into chants to commemorate the 86th anniversary of the creation of their army.

"Muhammad, Haider, Fatima, Hasan and Husayn!" shouted a group of dancing soldiers, bellowing the names of the prophet and other long-dead Islamic icons revered by Shiite Muslims.

A second later, the name of a living Shiite figure came out of the din. "Moqtada! Moqtada!" one soldier exclaimed, invoking the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric and leader of the Mahdi Army militia that American officials blame for many of the worst acts of violence in Baghdad.

Standing quietly in the crowd were four U.S. Army officers, there to represent the team of American soldiers advising the Iraqis. "Sounds like the Mahdi militia is in the tent," said their interpreter, Mohammed Noshi.

Moments before the chanting began, at a rally last Saturday morning at the soldiers' shared base in eastern Baghdad, a brigade commander in the Iraqi army's 6th Division had called the troops the "hope of this country."

"Some people are trying to create sectarian violence to divide this country," said the colonel, who asked that his name not be published out of fear for his life. "It is our job to keep this country in one piece."

At best, said several U.S. soldiers interviewed at the base this month, some of the Iraqi troops they advise are sympathetic to Sadr and his army. At worst, they said, some are members of the militia, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi. Despite the uneasiness of the alliance, 100 U.S. troops and 500 Iraqi soldiers have conducted joint raids and shared a base on the eastern side of the Tigris River, once a mixed area that is becoming predominantly Shiite.

Training Iraq's police and army to the point where they can operate on their own is key to any reduction of U.S. forces, American commanders have said. Five thousand U.S. troops are already embedded with Iraqi units as advisers.

U.S. military officers say that the Iraqi police force is deeply infiltrated by militiamen and predict that the army will be quicker to operate independently. But a four-day visit to the base known as Old MOD, for the former Ministry of Defense complex, showed that the army is not immune to the militias' influence. According to the Americans, most of the Iraqi soldiers are Shiites, and some come from Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum that is a Mahdi Army stronghold. Some carry pictures of Sadr.

"Does it mean that they're Jaish al-Mahdi? No," said Lt. Col. Edward Taylor, head of the U.S. military transition team, which is attached to the 2nd Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade, based at Fort Carson, Colo.

The U.S. military would not let a reporter interview the Iraqi soldiers. But during a meeting with Taylor, the Iraqi brigade commander responded to a question about the presence of militias in his unit. "It's just rumor," he said.

Taylor said that despite sectarianism in the army, many of the soldiers are making progress. They no longer show up in mismatched uniforms or turn to the Americans to make every decision, he said. Now they plan their own missions.

"I think we're definitely pushing these guys in the right direction to get to the point where they'll take over," said Capt. Peter Mahmood, 36, of Colorado Springs, who is on his third tour in Iraq.

During a recent house-to-house search in the mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Adhamiyah, Taylor and his crew followed Iraqi soldiers as they banged on doors and hunted for weapons caches. At times, the Iraqis appeared disorganized, gathering in large numbers in one spot on a street known to have snipers or taking breaks to buy bread. But they survived two gunfights with no casualties, rescued three kidnapping victims, found a large weapons cache and detained possible foreign fighters.

"They know what they want to do. They have a vision. They have a plan," Taylor said.

There are also signs that Iraqi commanders are willing to attack Shiites as well as Sunnis. At a staff meeting last Saturday morning, the Iraqi colonel suggested to his deputies that they consider conducting operations in Sadr City.

On the base, the two armies have separate living quarters and dining facilities, for security reasons. The Americans scrutinize the Iraqis' missions to make sure they are not targeting Sunnis more than Shiites. In addition, the Americans say, they suspect that some members of the Iraqi army have leaked information about raids.

"I have to operate under the assumption that within this unit there are people loyal to Jaish al-Mahdi and actively working for Jaish al-Mahdi," Taylor said. "I have to make that assumption so I have the proper security measures in place to protect my soldiers."

Sitting in his room on the base, Capt. James Ojeda, 32, of Logan, W.Va., a newlywed who hopes to quit the Army soon, gestured out his door toward the building where the Iraqi soldiers live. "You never know who's a bad guy over there," he said.

That sentiment is a window onto the complexity of the conflict: Taylor's soldiers said it is often unclear who the enemy is.

"One minute your neighbor is waving at you. The next minute he's got a mask on and telling you to get in a car," said Pfc. Kyle Buckingham, 20, of Marion, Ohio, describing the kidnappings that have become common in Baghdad.

No figure seems more of an enigma to these soldiers than Sadr. His militia battled U.S. forces in the spring and summer of 2004 in the southern holy city of Najaf, then he reinvented himself as a political leader whose loyalists won 30 seats in parliament. In a sign of Sadr's political influence, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who relies on the Shiite cleric for support, has banned most U.S. forces from conducting operations in Sadr City, home to 2.5 million people.

During a visit last week to another Shiite area in eastern Baghdad, known as Fadhil, about a dozen American soldiers walked through an empty square ringed with bullet-riddled buildings. On the wall of a bank was a picture of Sadr walking on an American flag.

"I see pictures of him walking on the American flag. Is that irritating?" Taylor said. "It's irritating, but Sadr is not my enemy. He is not considered a terrorist." Sadr, he added, is "a guy who can be part of the government or considered to be someone you want to negotiate with, and at the same time he has his hands in things you want to stamp out."

Ojeda put it more bluntly: "He's just another terrorist leader. He's just another bad guy."

DOJ_NMG_0116949

Sgt. 1st Class Eric Radecki, 36, of Sacramento, a father of two who fought in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, said he believes that U.S. leaders have to engage in talks with Sadr.

"He's not some sort of Osama bin Laden sitting in a cave in Afghanistan," Radecki said. "He goes to parliament."

Some of the soldiers said they were frustrated that Sadr City, which is about 1 1/2 miles from their base, is off-limits.

"Personally, I feel we should be there," Buckingham said. "That's the root of where everything is coming from. That's the bad of Baghdad."

As the war approaches its fifth year and the death toll mounts, some of the troops said they wonder whether it was a good idea for the United States to overthrow Iraq's government.

"I don't really know all the thought processes behind invading the country," said Capt. Sean Powell, 30, of Fort Carson. "I knew it was going to be longer than what they said, though. I knew it was going to take long because you don't topple a government and the country rebounds within two weeks."

Sgt. 1st class Matt MacClellan, 37, a father of two who trains another division of Iraqis but lives on Old MOD, said he is not in Iraq to fight the war on terrorism. If anything, he said, the United States spread terrorism by invading Iraq. "Now that we are here, though, it definitely has morphed into the war on terror," he said. "We took over a country that had structure and took that structure away."

The soldiers say they want to leave a stable country but also want to get out alive. "I don't think you can use the word 'winnable,' " MacClellan said. "Really, I've scrubbed that from the vocabulary of my thinking. 'Subdued' would be about the best."

Dismantling An Insurgent Power Base (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

TURKI, IRAQ — U.S. and Iraqi forces have denied Sunni Arab insurgents an important power base in a lawless region east of Baghdad, the commander of a joint offensive said Friday.

The challenge now, U.S. Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said in an interview, is to ensure that the militants do not return to the region in the eastern province of Diyala. When U.S. forces conducted previous large operations, insurgents often returned as soon as the military withdrew.

Poppas plans to open a patrol station in the area, which until recently had been a virtual no-go zone for Iraqi security forces. U.S. soldiers were scouting possible sites Friday as they slopped past adobe farmhouses in bone-chilling rain and ankle-deep mud.

The Iraqi army has dedicated a company to the new patrol station, which will be paired with a U.S. company until it is ready to stand alone, Poppas said. The military also will work with local authorities to improve conditions, including providing clean water, regular electricity and new roads.

Big push

The strategy is part of stepped-up efforts to train Iraqi forces to assume security control so U.S. forces can start going home.

Nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have swept through more than 77 square miles of farmland in the last week, combing isolated hamlets and pushing insurgents toward the canal system outside Turki village, where the advancing forces surrounded them, Poppas said.

Insurgents linked to the powerful Daini tribe, which includes top officers in former President Saddam Hussein's army, had carved a network of hide-outs, fighting positions and weapons caches out of the vast canal system. The area, which U.S. forces said served as a logistics and training base for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups, is strategically located between Baghdad, Baqubah and the Iranian border.

U.S. forces met fierce resistance on their last major sweep through the area in November, but this time the fighting was minimal. Poppas said many men with machine guns were killed in the days before the final push in the canal district.

"We've had continual engagements over the past 72 hours, and although we don't like to do body counts, we've killed over 100 individuals maneuvering against us with weapons," Poppas said as he surveyed the efforts to use Humvees to drag stranded

Iraqi army vehicles from the mud. "Those who did survive and escaped will not come back here because they know it is not a safe haven."

Four Iraqi soldiers were killed Sunday by an antitank mine in the area.

Some insurgents probably hid their weapons and blended back into the civilian population. Many more military-age men were seen in Turki and nearby villages than on previous visits, Poppas conceded.

He said heavy rain, which stalled the offensive for two days, worked to his forces' advantage, since they were better-equipped to withstand the elements than were fighters hiding in the canals.

During this time, groups of as many as a dozen insurgents repeatedly approached U.S. positions in an apparent search for a seam through which they could escape, Poppas said. In most cases, U.S. forces called in air or artillery strikes against them. At least 55 others were detained on suspicion of having insurgent ties.

Key arrests

Although some key insurgent leaders remained at large Friday, U.S. forces said they had arrested at least six leading members of the Council, a regional umbrella group that they say draws in elements of Al Qaeda, Ansar al Sunna and the 1920 Revolutionary Army, among others.

The detainees include Mohammed Turki, the Council's alleged financier, and Muthana Abdul Lateef, a lower-ranking member who U.S. forces said had killed his brother and sister when they refused to join the group.

The mission does not end here, Poppas said.

"We're still going 30 kilometers farther south," he said. "There aren't a lot more villages, but there are weapons caches that we are already exploiting to deny them the resources to keep on attacking."

At least 31 weapons caches have been found, including one containing more than 1,000 Katyusha rockets, more than 1,000 rocket-propelled grenades, 171 TOW missiles, army uniforms and gas masks.

By containing the insurgent threat, U.S. forces hope to pave the way for displaced Shiite Muslims to return. Scores fled after a series of mass abductions and slayings last year, blamed on Daini militants.

U.S. forces detained 14 people Friday who were accused by rival Shiite tribesmen of participating in the November abduction of 27 people from a village. Most of the abductees were later found decapitated and shot. The lone survivor told U.S. forces he hid under the bodies of relatives and neighbors and played dead as they were dumped into a canal.

Terrorists "Use Google Maps To Hit UK Troops" (LTEL)

By Thomas Harding

London Telegraph, January 13, 2007

Terrorists attacking British bases in Basra are using aerial footage displayed by the Google Earth internet tool to pinpoint their attacks, say Army intelligence sources.

Documents seized during raids on the homes of insurgents last week uncovered print-outs from photographs taken from Google.

The satellite photographs show in detail the buildings inside the bases and vulnerable areas such as tented accommodation, lavatory blocks and where lightly armoured Land Rovers are parked.

Written on the back of one set of photographs taken of the Shatt al Arab Hotel, headquarters for the 1,000 men of the Staffordshire Regiment battle group, officers found the camp's precise longitude and latitude.

"This is evidence as far as we are concerned for planning terrorist attacks," said an intelligence officer with the Royal Green Jackets battle group. "Who would otherwise have Google Earth imagery of one of our bases?

"We are concerned that they use them to plan attacks. We have never had proof that they have deliberately targeted any area of the camp using these images but presumably they are of great use to them.

"We believe they use Google Earth to identify the most vulnerable areas such as tents."

One soldier has been killed in the past six months following a mortar attack and there have been several injuries.

Since the maps were found intelligence chiefs have been keeping track of where rounds land to see if the insurgents are using them to pinpoint weakly protected areas.

DOJ_NMG_0116951

The British camps experience mortar and rocket attacks on a daily basis.

Salvos are fired from up to four miles away and are increasingly accurate.

Yesterday three rounds were fired into Basra Palace at a block close to where The Daily Telegraph was staying. No one was injured.

Intelligence sources also believe that the insurgents are receiving more training and weaponry from Iran to improve their fighting skills. But the British are gathering more intelligence on mortar crews and launching several "strike operations" to detain the operators.

Anyone with the internet can sign up to Google Earth and by simply typing in the name of a location they can receive very detailed imagery down to identifying types of vehicles.

The company is one of several internet outlets that buy aerial imagery, usually taken by aircraft but sometimes by satellite, from governments or mapping companies.

It is unclear how old the maps are but it is believed the Basra images were made within the past two years.

Major Charlie Burbridge, the British military spokesman in Iraq, said: "We take the security of our bases very seriously and we constantly review the means to provide secure accommodation for our soldiers.

"There is a constant threat of reconnaissance missions to access our bases and using these internet images is just another method of how this is conducted."

A Google spokesman said the information could be used for "good and bad" and was available to the public in many forms. "Of course we are always ready to listen to governments' requests," he said.

"We have opened channels with the military in Iraq but we are not prepared to discuss what we have discussed with them. But we do listen and we are sensitive to requests."

There have also been reports that the images are being sold to rogue militias in the market place in Basra.

The British security services are concerned that terrorists will be able to examine in detail sensitive infrastructure such as electricity stations, military basis, and their own headquarters in London.

Soldiers from the Royal Green Jackets based at the Basra Palace base said they had considered suing Google Earth if they were injured by mortar rounds that had been directed on the camp by the aerial footage.

"Even if they did blank out the areas where we are based it is a bit after the horse has bolted as the terrorist now have the maps and know exactly where we eat, sleep and go to the toilet," one soldier said.

Rice Criticizes Sen. Boxer's Comment On War (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday criticized Sen. Barbara Boxer's suggestion that, because she does not have family in harm's way, she will pay no "personal price" in the Iraq war.

"In retrospect, gee, I thought single women had come further than that, that the only question is, 'Are you making good decisions because you have kids?' " Rice said on Fox News.

Boxer's comment came during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing Thursday, in which Rice was grilled on President Bush's new war strategy in Iraq.

"Who pays the price?" Boxer (D-Calif.) asked Rice, who is unmarried and has no children. "I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old, and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with immediate family. So who pays the price? The American military and their families."

Boxer defended herself in a statement. "I spoke the truth at the committee hearing, which is that neither Secretary Rice nor I have family members that will pay the price for this escalation," she said.

White House Rips Boxer Over Rice (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The White House and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday accused Democrats of suggesting that the secretary's childlessness, race and sex are to blame for mistakes in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116952

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Sen. Barbara Boxer's comments that Miss Rice won't "pay the price" for her decisions in the Iraq war because she is unmarried and without children was a "great leap backward for feminism."

"I don't know if she was intentionally that tacky, but I do think it's outrageous," he told Fox News.

"Here you've got a professional woman, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Barbara Boxer is sort of throwing little jabs because Condi doesn't have children, as if that means that she doesn't understand the concerns of parents."

But Mrs. Boxer and Democrats are making no apologies.

Rep. Neil Abercrombie of Hawaii called Miss Rice "the most overrated, underperforming individual in executive authority that I have ever seen."

"She constantly gets a pass," he told the Honolulu Star Bulletin this week, days before the nation celebrates Martin Luther King Day. "Who knows if the whole question of race and gender come into it, but ... I can't account for it, except to say she isn't up to the mark."

But it was Mrs. Boxer's remarks about Miss Rice that generated the most outrage yesterday.

"Now, the issue is who pays the price, who pays the price?" Mrs. Boxer said to Miss Rice during a Senate Armed Services hearing Thursday. "I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old, and my grandchild is too young."

Then she told Miss Rice: "You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, within immediate family. So, who pays the price? The American military and their families, and I just want to bring us back to that fact."

Miss Rice replied that she does understand the sacrifice Americans and their families are making in Iraq.

"Let me just say, I fully understand the sacrifice that the American people are making, and especially the sacrifice that our soldiers are making, men and women in uniform," she told the committee. "I visit them. I know what they're going through. I talk to their families. I see it."

Mrs. Boxer didn't budge.

"Madam Secretary, please, I know you feel terrible about it," she replied. "That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

Later, Miss Rice said she was confused by the whole exchange, which is hardly the first time Miss Rice and Mrs. Boxer have exchanged sharp words.

"I guess that means I don't have kids. Was that the purpose?" Miss Rice said later on Fox News. "At the time I just found it a bit confusing, frankly, in retrospect, I thought single women had come further than that. The only question is, are you making good decisions because you have kids?"

Mrs. Boxer stood by her questioning of Miss Rice yesterday.

"I spoke the truth at the committee hearing, which is that neither Secretary Rice nor I have family members that will pay the price for this escalation," she said. "My point was to focus attention on our military families who continue to sacrifice because this administration has not developed a political solution to the situation in Iraq."

Passing Exchange Becomes Political Flashpoint (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A passing exchange during a Senate hearing on Thursday turned into a political flashpoint overnight as Senator Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice accused one another of insensitivity in comments about motherhood and the war in Iraq.

In an interview with The New York Times on Friday, Ms. Rice suggested that Ms. Boxer had set back feminism by suggesting during the hearing that the childless Ms. Rice had paid no price in the Iraq war.

“I thought it was O.K. to be single,” Ms. Rice said. “I thought it was O.K. to not have children, and I thought you could still make good decisions on behalf of the country if you were single and didn’t have children.”

During the Thursday hearing, Senator Boxer told Ms. Rice: “Who pays the price? I’m not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old and my grandchild is too young. You’re not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with an immediate family. So who pays the price? The American military and their families. And I just want to bring us back to that fact.”

DOJ_NMG_0116953

In an interview on Friday, Senator Boxer said her comments had been misunderstood and were now being turned against her by the White House and by Republicans. "What I was trying to do in this exchange was to find common ground with Condi Rice," she said. "My whole point was to focus on the military families who pay the price."

Senator Boxer added: "I'm saying, she's like me, we do not have families who are in the military. What they are doing is a really tortured way to attack a United States senator who voted against the war."

The exchange between Senator Boxer and Ms. Rice came during a hostile Senate hearing in which Ms. Rice, seeking to sell President Bush's new Iraq plan to a skeptical Congress, faced an almost solid wall of opposition from both Democrats and Republicans. Senator Boxer several times repeated the question, "Who pays the price?"

Senator Boxer read excerpts from a radio interview with an American family who had lost a son in Iraq. "You can't begin to imagine how you celebrate any holiday or birthday," she said. "There's an absence. It's not like the person's never been there. They always were there and now they're not, and you're looking at an empty hole."

Ms. Rice replied, "I can never do anything to replace any of those lost men and women in uniform, or the diplomats, some of whom ——"

Senator Boxer cut her off. "Madam Secretary, please, I know you feel terrible about it. That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

During the hearing itself, Ms. Rice did not appear to take issue with Senator Boxer's comments. During the interview, she addressed them only in response to a question. But the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, suggested earlier on Friday that Senator Boxer's comments were antifeminist.

"I don't know if she was intentionally tacky," Mr. Snow said in an interview on Fox News. "It's a great leap backward for feminism."

A number of members of Congress have children in the military who are serving in Iraq or are likely to do so, including Senators John McCain of Arizona and Jim Webb of Virginia.

Senator Boxer's comments and the claims and counterclaims about what she meant have captivated the blogs and received extensive coverage on Fox News and other cable channels. One blog, called Swampland, labeled it "Womb Wars."

Conservative blogs and commentators were quick to seize on the issue. "One Great Leap (Backwards) for Womankind," read one blog, Bikini Politics. "They will be known by their Fruits," read another, Macsmind, which billed itself as "Conservative News, Commentary and Common Sense." Rush Limbaugh also got into the act. "Here you have a rich white chick with a huge, big mouth, trying to lynch this, an African-American woman, right before Martin Luther King Day, hitting below the ovaries here," Mr. Limbaugh said on his radio show.

Deneen Borelli, a fellow with Project 21, which describes itself as a "leading voice in the African-American community," said, "I am deeply appalled by Senator Barbara Boxer's cruel and callous attack on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice."

"The debate should have been about the war in Iraq and not a platform to demean Secretary Rice," Ms. Borelli said in a statement issued by the organization.

Some Democratic Senate staffers said Senator Boxer's exchange with Ms. Rice allowed the Bush administration to turn the tables on Iraq critics and sidestep the larger issue of the almost uniform opposition to the president's plan to send 20,000 more American soldiers to Iraq.

There was no rush from Democrats to defend Senator Boxer, although one blogger on the Swampland blog called Senator Boxer's comments "fair, as far as it goes." During the interview with the Times, Ms. Rice said she had expected the skepticism that she received from Congress the day before. "I've been through things like this before," she said.

NATO's Afghan Struggle: Build, And Fight Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

SPERWAN GHAR, Afghanistan — The road that cuts through the heart of Panjwai district here tells all that is going wrong with NATO's war in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0116954

To fight their way into this area and clear it of Taliban insurgents, NATO troops bulldozed through orchards, smashed down walls and even houses, and churned vineyards and melon fields to dust.

Reconstruction projects were planned, but never materialized. Now NATO countries are championing the thoroughfare as a $5 million gift to local people.

Displaced and buffeted by fighting since May, the Afghans are homeless, fearful and far from being won over. They say the road was built for the troops' benefit and forced on them, at the cost of their land and livelihoods.

"We are compelled to be happy about the road," said Hajji Baran, 48, a farmer from Panjwai. "They are building the road and they are not going to stop, but in fact we are not happy about it. We have been displaced for nine months and no one has asked us how are we managing. This is a kind of cruelty.

"In fact, we are selling our wives' jewelry to support our families."

The conflict over the road is just the most apparent of the many things that Afghans, diplomats and aid workers cite in explaining why NATO's war looks uncertain in southern Afghanistan. Others include what local people see as the indiscriminate killing of civilians by NATO forces, and corruption and incompetence among local officials.

Panjwai and an adjoining district, Zhare, just west of Kandahar, the provincial capital, are considered vital because the Taliban presence there has directly threatened Kandahar, and thus all of southern Afghanistan.

Yet so far not much has gone according to plan.

There has been little coordination between the military operations and reconstruction projects, which has frustrated aid workers and diplomats almost as much as local people.

After NATO troops and United States Special Forces mounted their operation to clear the area of insurgents in September, the assistance programs were not ready. Then the troops pulled back, and the Taliban were active again within days.

"We are all scratching our heads as to why the aid has not rolled out faster," said a Western diplomat familiar with Panjwai. "It's not for a lack of resources. We are meeting basic needs, but when it comes to sustainable livelihoods and jobs, it's not happening."

NATO's struggle to secure the area inevitably hampered reconstruction and deterred the thousands of displaced villagers from returning home. Aid workers who started to venture into the area to kick-start assistance programs complained of continued insecurity and even of coming under fire from NATO forces. The result was that very little assistance arrived.

"There was a lull, and for three weeks they did nothing," said Andrew Douglas, operations manager of an agricultural development group in Afghanistan. "They were going round talking and handing out candy." He did not want his organization named because his comments were personal remarks.

It took a second military operation at the end of the year finally to expel the Taliban. Already on everyone's mind — in the government, the military, the police and among villagers — is how to stop the Taliban from infiltrating back for a new offensive in the spring, which in this southern region will come in February.

Without the support of the local people, that task will be virtually impossible, military and government officials and local elders said.

Now finally villagers are trickling home. Yet the mood is at best resigned.

"They bombed our orchards and fields and we have nothing now," said Hajji Abdul Wahab Kutaisi, 65, a farmer from Pashmul. "They made a road through my land."

His house was destroyed in the fighting and he and his extended family now live in two rented rooms in Kandahar. He said he had not received any compensation.

He was sitting with several other men on the stony ground in the Panjwai district police station waiting for permission from the military to work in his fields, close to a Canadian military checkpoint. "When we don't inform them, they shoot at us," he said. Minutes after he spoke a Canadian tank fired a round from the nearby base, shattering the calm, sunny morning.

"They did not come to bring peace for us, they came to destroy us," said Hajji Abdul Ghafar, 60, an elder on the Sperwan village council, who was waiting for permission to pass through a checkpoint to reach his house. "There are 3,000 families hoping to go back to their houses. If they lose hope, this would be very bad for the government," he warned.

"We are angry with both sides, the foreigners and the Taliban," he added. "It is impossible to talk to the Taliban," he said, shaking his head. "And the foreigners don't listen to anyone."

Sperwan Ghar, the district center of Panjwai, is a quiet, country one-street town, with small shops, two schools and a police station. For the NATO forces here, which are led by Canada, the town, at least, is a success story. By December it was peaceful, commerce had returned, the school was repaired and children were back in class.

Yet the place looks like a fortified camp, with soldiers and sandbags blocking the street, an armored vehicle parked outside the school, and guard posts on all the hills looking down into everyone's yard. The local police admit the guard posts are not popular because they violate one of the most important codes of behavior for the Pashtun: privacy and respect for their women.

Maj. Stephen Murray, the acting military commander of the Provincial Reconstruction Team, a NATO unit, defended its efforts, saying the team had spent $100,000 in just a few weeks providing jobs for people in the cleanup.

The team members were assessing the battle damage and compensation claims with government officials, and consulting with village councils, he said. Rushing things would leave people out and only aggravate local tensions, he said.

"There are lots of challenges," Major Murray said. "We have to go step by step."

As for the new road, he said the military needed a straight road that was more easily secured. Over the past few months, Canadian troops were repeatedly ambushed on the old road, which twisted and turned through the hamlets and walled farmsteads. He is having intensive discussions with the local people to work out a fair deal for those whose land it crosses, he said.

Yet Pashmul, the village most affected by the road, remains one of the most unsettled areas of the two districts, partly because the population remains divided over whom to support, the Taliban or the foreigners.

The Afghan people will withhold their support until they can see some material assistance, said the development manager, Mr. Douglas. "The Afghans don't trust anyone," he added. "They have seen military coming in all colors before."

Corrupt and ineffective local leaders have done as much to turn people against the government and its foreign backers as have any failings in reconstruction, said Joanna Nathan of the International Crisis Group, a research group.

At the same time it is becoming clear that development assistance to an area does not lead to security in a community or district, she said. NATO has mapped where the international assistance has gone, and found that there is little connection between the amount of aid spent on an area and the level of security, she said.

Regarding the Taliban, "they are not very popular, even in the south, but they have spread," said Tom Koenigs, the head of the United Nations assistance mission in Afghanistan. "We have to be prepared to have these levels of conflict for some time."

But that conflict increasingly threatens to alienate NATO's local supporters. As suicide bombings have taken their toll on the troops, who took over command in southern Afghanistan from the Americans last year, the soldiers have frequently resorted to lethal force, calling in airstrikes and firing on approaching cars, often killing and wounding civilians and further worsening the public mood.

"They said we came to bring peace to this country," said Abdur Rahim, 35, an auto mechanic, as he lay in a hospital bed. He was shot in the back by British soldiers after their convoy had been hit by a suicide bomber. The soldiers shot at least eight civilians as they drove through the town.

"Why are they shooting the people?" he asked. "Is this peace?"

After suffering 13 suicide bombings in 14 days in Kandahar, some Canadian soldiers had to be repatriated because they were reacting badly to the stress, according to one diplomat in Kabul.

"The people are saying, 'If the British are scared, why did they come to our country?' " said Mullah Naqibullah, leader of one of Kandahar's largest tribes. "They should not view the people as the same as the Taliban."

Then there is the nagging feeling behind every conversation in southern Afghanistan that the Taliban cannot be beaten and that the government will have to find a way to accommodate them.

Several important elders like Mullah Naqibullah and a former Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Salam Rocketi, advocate talking to the Taliban.

At the very least, there should be stronger protection for those Taliban commanders who want to come over to the government, said Mullah Rocketi, a member of Parliament, because at the moment few trust the government and the foreign forces not to imprison them.

The biggest test for NATO forces, together with their Afghan military and police counterparts, is to prevent the Taliban from returning. With the ordinary people still ambivalent, that job is going to be much harder.

"We need a huge effort," said the United Nations official, Mr. Koenigs. "We cannot believe it will resolve itself at the pace we have now."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Foreign Convoy South Of Kabul (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A suicide bomber rammed his explosives-filled car into a two-vehicle convoy carrying foreigners south of Kabul on Friday, wounding at least one Afghan civilian, police said.

One of the vehicles was on fire and police had cordoned off the area in Logar province's Muhammad Agha district, provincial police chief Gen. Muhammad Mustafa said.

It was not immediately clear who the foreigners were or if any were hurt in the blast some 25 miles south of Kabul.

The attack comes a day after NATO said its forces killed scores of insurgents who crossed from Pakistan in the biggest battle of the Afghan winter, while Pakistan's army fired artillery at trucks supplying militants on the other side of the border.

NATO said it had tracked the suspected Taliban militants through air surveillance while the fighters were still in Pakistan. Once they crossed the frontier, NATO and Afghan soldiers attacked the two separate groups with ground fire and airstrikes during a nine-hour battle that began Wednesday evening.

Gen. Murad Ali, the Afghan army regional deputy corps commander, said the insurgents traveled into Afghanistan's southern Paktika province with several trucks of ammunition. Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a U.S. military spokesman, said it was likely they were going to carry out an immediate attack, given the size of the groups.

Taliban militants last year launched a record number of attacks in Afghanistan, and an estimated 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence, the bloodiest year since the U.S.-led coalition ousted the Taliban regime in 2001. Afghan and Western officials say the militants operate from sanctuaries in Pakistan, but Islamabad insists it does all it can to stop them.

The offensive in Paktika province was the first major engagement of 2007 and appeared to be the largest battle since a multi-day operation killed more than 500 Taliban fighters in southern Kandahar province in September.

Fitzpatrick said 130 fighters were killed or wounded in the attack. The Afghan Defense Ministry put the death toll at 80. As is common in Afghanistan, independent confirmation of the death toll at the remote battle site was not immediately possible.

Pakistani army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said the army attack on the militants' trucks Wednesday night shows the army can act swiftly and effectively if it is given "real-time" intelligence.

"We don't deny that some people are coming from this side. That's why we seek intelligence in real time. We are keen to stop it," he said.

It was the Pakistani army's first reported offensive in the North Waziristan tribal region since a September peace deal between the government and pro-Taliban militants that critics say has provided a sanctuary for insurgents.

John Negroponte, the U.S. national intelligence director, told a Senate committee on Thursday that Pakistan represents a major source of Islamic extremism and is a refuge for top terror leaders.

Negroponte said in testimony before the Senate Intelligence Committee that "eliminating the safe haven that the Taliban and other extremists have found in Pakistan's tribal areas is not sufficient to end the insurgency in Afghanistan, but it is necessary."

Afghanistan A Source Of Worry (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

Sen. Clinton says more troops needed to fight Taliban, not in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116957

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates expressed deep concern Friday over the stability of Afghanistan, and a top U.S. military official said additional troops might be needed to strengthen the government in Kabul, which is under growing pressure from Taliban forces.

Gates plans to travel soon to the region to look for ways to aid the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Speaking to the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates appeared worried by the rising violence in Afghanistan, where military commanders have warned that the spring thaw may bring one of the most brutal fighting seasons since the 2001 U.S. invasion.

"We mustn't let this one slip out of our attention and, where we have had a victory, put it at risk," Gates told senators in describing his upcoming trip. "One of the things that I am focused on particularly is, what will it take to reverse the trend line in Afghanistan and to strengthen the Karzai government?"

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, indicated that he was open to raising troop levels in Afghanistan as well as Iraq. Despite concerns that U.S. land forces are overstretched by their growing commitment in Iraq, the Pentagon could sustain an increase of forces in Afghanistan as well, he said.

About 22,000 U.S. military personnel are in Afghanistan; about half of them are fighting along with 32,000 other foreign troops under the command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is to stop in Afghanistan during a trip to the Middle East starting this weekend, said she believed that President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq was misguided and that new troops instead should be sent to Afghanistan, where, she said, U.S. policy was on "autopilot."

"I wish we were discussing additional troops for Afghanistan," Clinton said, speaking in Washington. "We are hearing increasingly troubling reports out of Afghanistan, and we will be searching for accurate information about the true state of affairs both militarily and politically."

The comments by Gates and Pace came at a hearing on the Bush administration's revised Iraq policy.

The Armed Services panel includes several senators — Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) — who have been outspoken supporters of a troop buildup.

McCain said those who want to begin withdrawing troops "have a responsibility to tell us what they believe are the consequences of withdrawal in Iraq. If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

Still, Democrats voiced skepticism about the administration's new strategy. The new committee chairman, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), advocates a timetable for troop withdrawals and opposes the new plan.

"The reality behind the president's new rhetoric is that the open-ended commitment continues," Levin said.

Gates said he thought that Bush, who "has a longer view," at times had to make decisions that didn't "have broad support of the American people."

In Afghan Valley, A Peaceful War (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

SURJAI, Afghanistan -- Inside a green tent pitched on an ice-crusted field and guarded by armed troops, a young boy winced in pain Wednesday as a military doctor slowly injected medicine into his nose and cheek, red and swollen from the parasitic disease leishmaniasis.

Nearby, soldiers tossed sacks of rice, beans, tea and sugar into wheelbarrows pushed by local villagers. At a third spot, cargo trucks piled with firewood and tin stoves were surrounded by excited, shoving crowds until a local mullah carrying a list of names restored order.

"Andiamo!" -- Let's go! -- called a rifleman near the food supplies, beckoning to the next family in line.

Col. Antonio Maggi, who commanded the day-long operation by Italian troops in the snow-coated Mushai Valley, strode watchfully among the tents and trucks. He often stopped to chat with local elders, an interpreter at his side.

To Maggi, who heads NATO's 2,000-member Italian military contingent in Afghanistan, the day's humanitarian mission was a small piece of a long-term, strategic plan to win the support and collaboration of the valley's 20,000 inhabitants for the Afghan central government and the international troops who support it.

Like most of the 26 foreign military contingents that comprise the 20,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, the Italians have been banned by their government from conducting combat missions, except for 72-hour emergency sorties to aid other NATO forces.

Only British, Canadian and Dutch combat troops operate in the four southern provinces where clashes with Taliban insurgents are constant and dozens of foreign soldiers have died. A separately commanded mission of about 20,000 U.S. troops is based in eastern Afghanistan, conducting combat and aid operations.

But officials say the work of troops from Italy, Turkey, France and other nations, which are bringing security, training, aid and development to impoverished and potentially hostile areas of central and northern Afghanistan, can be more effective than military raids, which can invade homes, create casualties and alienate communities.

"This valley is important because there have been problems with security in the past," Maggi said. "Now we are present, listening to the people's problems, meeting with the leaders, bringing assistance, doing joint patrols with the police. Our message to everyone is that there can be no reconstruction in the valley without security."

Lying about an hour's drive south of Kabul, the capital, the Mushai Valley has a history of strategic importance in Afghanistan's succession of conflicts. Militia commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, who with U.S. backing fought Soviet troops during the 1980s, maintained his stronghold near here. Later, he turned against the Western powers and is today a renegade insurgent leader.

During the years of Taliban rule, from 1996 to 2001, some foreign Arab militia groups lived in compounds nearby.

The largely unprotected valley is just across a low ridge of mountains from the border with Pakistan. NATO and Afghan officials say insurgent fighters from the revived Taliban militia receive training and weapons there and then infiltrate Afghanistan to launch attacks.

One of Maggi's principal roles, since the Mushai operation began in October, has been to help recruit, equip and train local police. The Italians have provided them with pickup trucks, radios, boots and wool winter uniforms. They are also building a brick police and administrative headquarters to replace the rudimentary hillside compound that is now the government's only structure in the district.

"Things have changed a lot since the colonel came," said the Mushai police chief, Commander Arif. "We are in an open area where people can come across from Pakistan, and we had no checkpoints before. Now we have three new checkpoints, joint patrols and 112 police officers getting trained. The people are collaborating 100 percent, so the insurgents cannot do their work."

The skill level of the police is still low, and Wednesday's giveaway program was briefly marred when an argument broke out around a truck laden with firewood. One inexperienced policeman hit a man with his rifle, bloodying his nose and angering the crowd.

But in general, the welcome received here by Maggi's forces, who attend regular meetings with local leaders, has stood in sharp contrast to the angry resentment aroused last fall when U.S. combat forces staged a raid looking for Taliban and al-Qaeda insurgents. Residents said the troops entered houses at night, herded women and children outside in the rain and shot one civilian dead.

"They did many wrong things, and the people were unhappy," said Maulvi Shirin Agha, a senior cleric in the valley, who helped organize the aid distribution this week. "They were looking for al-Qaeda, but there has been no al-Qaeda here for the last five years. The Italians behave very well with the people, and everyone likes them," he said. "The Taliban can only dream of coming back."

Aside from the improved security, leaders in the Mushai Valley said they were most grateful to the Italians for providing free medical aid. The area has no clinics, and families said that when they take sick children to hospitals in Kabul, they are turned away or given inadequate treatment.

On Wednesday, parents lined up all day outside the tent clinic where Lidia Sarntaro, a doctor and Italian army lieutenant, treated their children for coughs, headaches, rashes and more serious ailments. Twice she administered a local anesthetic and removed shrapnel fragments from a child's arm, bending over a metal cot with a scalpel and gauze to stanch the bleeding.

Lala Gul brought in his son Akmal, 7, who was left with a fragment in his arm last year when a shell he and another boy were handling exploded.

Gul worriedly watched the boy's frightened face while Sarntaro stitched up his arm. The second boy waited outside.

"I took them to the city, but nobody helped us. All the doctors asked us for too much money," said Gul, a farm laborer with eight children. He said he was taking home a bundle of food supplies, though he did not fully understand who had donated them. "The elders told us to come here today to get help," he said. "It is free, so I am happy."

Pakistan Says It's Not A Terrorist Haven; Asks U.S. For Intelligence On Al-Qaeda (AP)

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Pakistan on Friday rejected allegations by America's spy chief that it is a refuge for terrorist leaders and demanded that his intelligence networks share information on the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda figures.

The statements Thursday by U.S. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte that Pakistan is a haven for al-Qaeda and Taliban terrorists are "incorrect," Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said.

"In breaking the back of al-Qaeda, Pakistan has done more than any other country in the world," ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. "The proper way to do this would be to share the intelligence with us."

Negroponte said that despite Pakistan's vital role in the war on terrorism, leaders of both al-Qaeda and Afghanistan's former ruling Taliban militia are sheltering in its lawless frontier areas, largely beyond reach of U.S. or Pakistani fighters.

NATO and the Afghan government also say Taliban and al-Qaeda guerrillas are launching attacks on their forces in Afghanistan from neighboring Pakistan. Violence rose sharply in Afghanistan in 2006, with fighting killing about 4,000 people in what was the deadliest year since the U.S.-led coalition swept the Taliban from power in 2001.

In his testimony before the Senate Intelligence Committee, Negroponte said that "eliminating the safe haven that the Taliban and other extremists have found in Pakistan's tribal areas is not sufficient to end the insurgency in Afghanistan, but it is necessary."

U.S. officials have previously said they believe bin Laden and other top terrorist commanders are taking refuge in the region, likely on the Pakistani side of the border. Pakistan has repeatedly rejected such claims.

Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao, the top civilian security official in Pakistan, told The Associated Press that the U.S. intelligence agencies had not shared any "specific intelligence with Pakistan on the whereabouts of al-Qaeda or the Taliban."

"We always act swiftly whenever any intelligence is shared with us. There are no al-Qaeda safe havens in Pakistan," he said.

But in a sign that insurgents are crossing from Pakistan to fight in Afghanistan, the bodies of 25 militants killed in a fierce battle with NATO were repatriated Friday to their tribal villages in Pakistan, where Taliban activists urged mass attendance at their funerals, residents said.

NATO on Thursday reported killing or wounding 130 suspected Taliban who had crossed from Pakistan to mount attacks in eastern Afghanistan. Pakistan's army also said it attacked militant supply trucks on its side of the border in Pakistan's tense North Waziristan region.

Aslam acknowledged that "there may be al-Qaeda elements" in Pakistan. But she said their presence was just like "in the Middle East or other world countries."

Visiting U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher paid tribute to Pakistan's counterterrorism efforts and said more action was needed on both sides of the border.

"There continues to be a high rate of cross-border activity," he told reporters after meeting with President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. "I'm not just saying Pakistan hasn't succeeded yet, but we have not succeeded yet ourselves in Afghanistan. There's more effort required of all of us."

Insurgents Killed In Afghan Fighting Reportedly Are Sent Back To Pakistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 12 -- The bodies of two dozen Islamic insurgents killed in a clash with NATO and Afghan army forces near the border with Pakistan were sent back Friday to Pakistan, where Taliban leaders asked that they be given funerals as "martyrs," according to news reports here.

The reports appeared to bolster Afghan and U.S. assertions, repeatedly denied by Pakistani officials, that Pakistan's tribal regions along the border with Afghanistan have provided a haven for Islamic militia groups seeking to destabilize the Western-backed government of Afghanistan.

The funeral preparations were reported to take place in villages in Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani officials brokered a truce in September that they said was aimed at curbing Islamic extremist activities in the area. Afghan and NATO officials have said cross-border insurgent infiltration has actually increased since then.

Also Friday, Afghan police reported that a suicide bomber rammed a vehicle into two others on a highway south of Kabul. The two-vehicle convoy was carrying foreign police advisers, according to Associated Press reports. One adviser and an Afghan civilian were injured, the news agency reported.

In Washington, the U.S. national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, said at a Senate hearing Thursday that Pakistani tribal areas were functioning as a haven for terrorists and that Pakistani officials needed to do more to control them.

In response, officials from Pakistan's Foreign and Interior ministries denied their country was offering shelter to extremists. A Pakistani military spokesman said that the country's army forces had fired on trucks carrying Islamic insurgents toward the Afghan border and that Pakistan was "keen to stop" such cross-border infiltration.

The bodies of fighters sent back to Pakistan included both Pakistanis and Afghans, according to news reports. They were said to be casualties of a major clash Wednesday between NATO and Afghan troops and Islamic insurgents in Afghanistan's Paktika province. NATO said 150 insurgents had been killed, while Afghan officers put the figure at 80.

Pentagon Sees Move In Somalia As Blueprint (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Military operations in Somalia by American commandos, and the use of the Ethiopian Army as a surrogate force to root out operatives for Al Qaeda in the country, are a blueprint that Pentagon strategists say they hope to use more frequently in counterterrorism missions around the globe.

Military officials said the strike by an American gunship on terrorism suspects in southern Somalia on Sunday showed that even with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld from the Pentagon, Special Operations troops intended to take advantage of the directive given to them by Mr. Rumsfeld in the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks.

American officials said the recent military operations have been carried by the Pentagon's Joint Special Operations Command, which directs the military's most secretive and elite units, like the Army's Delta Force.

The Pentagon established a desolate outpost in the Horn of Africa nation of Djibouti in 2002 in part to serve as a hub for Special Operations missions to capture or kill senior Qaeda leaders in the region.

Few such "high value" targets have materialized, and the Pentagon has gradually relocated members of the covert Special Operations units to more urgent missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But officials in Washington said this week that the joint command had quietly been returning troops and weaponry to the region in recent weeks in anticipation of a mission against members of a Qaeda cell believed to be hiding in Somalia.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told members of Congress on Friday that the strike in Somalia was executed under the Pentagon's authority to hunt and kill terrorism suspects around the globe, a power the White House gave it shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks.

It was this authority that Mr. Rumsfeld used to order commanders to develop plans for using American Special Operations troops for missions within countries that had not been declared war zones.

But since the retreat of the Taliban in 2001, when American Special Forces worked with Afghan militias, Mr. Rumsfeld's ambitious agenda for Special Operations troops has been slow to materialize.

The problem has partly been a shortage of valuable intelligence on the whereabouts of top terrorism suspects. Mr. Rumsfeld also dispatched teams of Special Operations forces to work in American embassies to collect intelligence and to develop war plans for future operations.

Pentagon officials said it is still not known whether any senior Qaeda suspects or their allies were killed in the airstrike on Sunday, carried out by an AC-130 gunship. A small team of American Special Operations troops has been to the scene of the airstrike, in a remote stretch near the Kenya border, to collect forensic evidence in the effort to identify the victims.

Some critics of the Pentagon's aggressive use of Special Operations troops, including some Democratic members of Congress, have argued that using American forces outside of declared combat zones gives the Pentagon too much authority in sovereign nations and blurs the lines between soldiers and spies.

The State Department and Pentagon took control of Somalia policy in the summer, after a failed effort by the Central Intelligence Agency to use Somali warlords as proxies to hunt down the Qaeda suspects.

The trail of the terrorism suspects in Somalia, blamed for the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, had long gone cold. But American military and intelligence officials said that the Ethiopian offensive against the Islamist forces who ruled Mogadishu and much of Somalia until last month flushed the Qaeda suspects from their hide-outs and gave American intelligence operatives fresh information about their whereabouts.

The Bush administration has all but officially endorsed the Ethiopian offensive, and Washington officials have said that Ethiopia's move into Somalia was a response to "aggression" by the Islamists in Mogadishu.

In the weeks before the military campaign began, State Department and Pentagon officials said that they had some concerns about the impending Ethiopian government's offensive in Somalia.

But as the Ethiopian's march toward war looked more likely, Americans began providing Ethiopian troops with up-to-date intelligence on the military positions of the Islamist fighters in Somalia, Pentagon and counterterrorism officials said.

According to a Pentagon consultant with knowledge about Special Operations, small teams of American advisers crossed the border into Somalia with the advancing Ethiopian army.

"You're not talking lots of guys," the Pentagon consultant said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "You're talking onesies and twosies."

As Somalia's Leaders Meet, 8 Militiamen Die In Gunfight (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 12 — More violence erupted Friday in Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked capital, and this time it was literally at the doorstep of the newly arrived government.

According to witnesses, presidential guards killed at least eight men of a rival militia at the gates of the presidential palace as top leaders were sitting inside discussing a new disarmament program.

The bloodshed seemed to be more evidence of a steady breakdown of law and order in Mogadishu, and plunged the disarmament plans into uncertainty.

The fight apparently started over where to park a technical, the term coined in Somalia for a heavily armed pickup truck. Militiamen of Mohammed Qanyare Afrah, one of Mogadishu's more powerful warlords, insisted on parking their truck inside the presidential palace, but the guards said no.

The two sides starting arguing and young men with big guns crowded around. Someone shot first and each side blamed the other. That set off an intense barrage with bullets flying, windows shattering and women selling mangoes outside the palace gates scrambling for cover.

"They just opened up on us," said Abdi Hassan Ahmed, a guard for Mr. Qanyare.

Mr. Ahmed, 22, lay in a hospital bed on Friday afternoon with a bullet hole in his thigh. Next to him was another young guard, totally unresponsive, his eyes wide open and his head in a gauze cocoon. He had been shot through the brain, doctors said.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said Mr. Qanyare's militia might have been upset about the prospects of being disarmed.

"They got restless and started shooting," he said. "So we answered fire with fire."

Mr. Hassan said he still considered the meeting a success, despite the fact that eight young men lay dead outside, because several of Mogadishu's top warlords, each of whom command well-armed militias, told President Yusuf that they agreed, in principle, to surrender their weapons and help form a national army.

Still, no firm details have been worked out for weapons collection and no timetable has been set. The warlords and government officials said they would appoint representatives to study the issue further.

Such promises hardly excite most residents. Several times already, Mogadishu's warlords and clan elders have pledged to hand over their weapons, but so far very few have done so.

The streets here still bristle with a staggering amount of military-grade firepower. It is not uncommon to see a high-powered antiaircraft gun in the hands of a teenager wearing a T-shirt, jeans and flip-flops. Boys as young as 12 bounce around the back of the armed trucks, providing an adolescent army for the city's various powers: the warlords, clan elders, religious leaders and businessmen.

Collecting weapons has been the top priority for the transitional government since it arrived in the capital two weeks ago. With the help of the Ethiopian military, the transitional government swiftly defeated Somalia's Islamist forces, which until last month controlled a good chunk of the country.

Ethiopian soldiers are still battling the last remnants of the Islamist forces in a remote corner of southern Somalia. Earlier this week, American military forces joined in, dropping bombs on the fleeing Islamists, who American officials said were sheltering terrorists from Al Qaeda.

The Islamists have vowed to carry on as an underground army and overthrow the transitional government, which is Somalia's first politically viable central government since 1991, when the dictator Gen. Mohammed Siad Barre fled the country and let loose 15 years of clan-versus-clan warfare.

As events on Friday showed, those days may not be over. Mr. Yusuf is from the powerful Darod clan and Mr. Qanyare is from the powerful Hawiye clan.

Despite the talk of reconciliation, many Somalis, especially members of the Hawiye clan, fear that the transitional government will selectively disarm certain clans while allowing others to keep their guns.

"We fear not just for ourselves," said Mohammed Uluso, chairman of the political leadership council for the Ayr, a branch of the Hawiye clan tree. "We fear for all of Somalia."

Islamists Lose Last Bastion (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Ethiopian-backed government forces have captured the last stronghold of the Islamist movement in southern Somalia, the Somali defense minister said yesterday just hours after warlords met with the president and promised to enlist their militiamen in the army.

The southern town of Ras Kamboni fell after five days of heavy fighting, Defense Minister Col. Barre Aden Shire said.

He said government troops backed by Ethiopian forces and MiG fighter aircraft chased fleeing Islamists into nearby forests and that the fighting would continue. He did not give casualty figures.

Ras Kamboni is in a rugged coastal area a few miles from the Kenyan border. It is not far from the site of a U.S. air strike Monday on suspected al Qaeda terrorists -- the first U.S. offensive in Somalia since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0116963

The report of the town's fall came after Somalia's warlords met with President Abdullahi Yusuf in the capital of Mogadishu and pledged to disarm their militias, a major step toward bringing calm to this city after years of chaos.

The meeting sought to establish enough security in the capital so international peacekeepers cancome in to protect the government until it can establish an effective police force and army.

Outside the peace talks, however, a fight over where to park an armored car left at least six persons dead and 10 wounded. Clan gunmen fired a rocket-propelled grenade and briefly exchanged gunfire with government troops during the dispute.

Nevertheless, government officials said the meeting between Mr. Yusuf and three top warlords was successful.

"The warlords and the government have agreed to collaborate for the restoration of peace in Somalia," said government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari.

One of Somalia's most powerful warlords, Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, said after the meeting the clans were "fed up" with guns and ready to cooperate.

But another warlord issued a warning to the government.

"If the government is ready to reconcile its people and chooses the right leadership, I hope there is no need to revolt against it," said Muse Sudi Yalahow, whose fighters control northern Mogadishu. "If they fail and lose the confidence of the people, I think they would be called new warlords."

The government was only able to enter Mogadishu after Ethiopian troops routed an Islamic movement that had controlled most of southern Somalia for the past six months. Now it must deal with clan divisions that have spoiled the 13 attempts to form an effective government since the last one collapsed in 1991.

The United States, United Nations and the African Union all want to deploy peacekeepers to stop Somalia from returning to clan-based violence and anarchy. But so far no African governments have responded to the call for an 8,000-strong peacekeeping force for the country, although Uganda has indicated it is willing to send 1,500 peacekeepers as part of a wider mission.

Lam Stays Silent About Losing Job (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton And Onell R. Soto, Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 13, 2007

Law enforcement defends her record

Amid news reports that she has been asked to step down, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam declined repeated interview requests yesterday and did not address the matter with her staff.

At a weekly managers meeting, Lam was stoic, conducting business as usual and discussing next week's caseload, according to people who attended. She made no mention of a resignation request by the Bush administration, nor did anyone ask about it.

However, she did discuss the matter with at least one law enforcement colleague. Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego, said he spoke to Lam several times yesterday and he feels the criticism and the way the situation was handled are unfair.

“I don't think it's the right way to treat anybody. What's the decision based on?” Dzwilewski said. “I don't share the view of whoever's making the decision back there in Washington that they'd like her to resign. I feel Carol has an excellent reputation and has done an excellent job given her limited resources.”

Dzwilewski said he sympathized with Lam on issues of stretching budgets to meet priorities and felt that criticism that she wasn't giving proper attention to smuggling, drugs and gun crimes was off-base. “What do you expect her to do? Let corruption exist?” he said.

Lam's continued employment as U.S. attorney is crucial to the success of multiple ongoing investigations, the FBI chief said.

As for the reason for any pressure to resign, Dzwilewski said: “I can't speak for what's behind all that, what's the driving force behind this or the rationale. I guarantee politics is involved.”

Dzwilewski declined to discuss Lam's demeanor during their conversations, her state of mind, when or if she will resign or her future plans.

“It will be a huge loss from my perspective,” Dzwilewski said. “What she's going to do, my guess is she's still trying to figure that out herself.”

Other members of the law enforcement community also defended Lam.

“She's been by far the most outstanding U.S. attorney we've ever had,” City Attorney Michael Aguirre said. “By far, she's done more to clean up the corruption in this city than anyone else, and she has won a national reputation as one of the top prosecutors in the country.

Sources have told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam was asked to step down because she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a priority, choosing instead to focus on fewer cases that she considered more significant, such as public corruption and white-collar crime.

Some lawyers theorized yesterday that it wasn't just misplaced priorities that led to her impending ouster. The Randy “Duke” Cunningham case has spawned other corruption probes of Republicans in Washington, leading to conjecture that politics played a part in the decision to force her out.

However, Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney in San Antonio, Texas, said everybody in the position knows it's not a permanent job.

“We go when the president goes and sometimes before,” he said.

Some lawyers said that shifting resources to cases she considered more important was not enough to bring about her firing. What mattered, they said, was her track record.

The Cunningham corruption case, which grew from an article in the Union-Tribune, was a high-profile success. But she has also stumbled. For instance, the corruption prosecution of political consultant Larry Remer was bargained down to a misdemeanor after a hung jury.

And although Lam's office achieved corruption convictions of then-San Diego City Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey T. Miller acquitted Zucchet of most charges and granted a new trial on the remaining two counts.

Lam spent almost a year personally prosecuting a national hospital chain that she said used complex agreements to pay off local doctors in return for referrals. That case ended in a second mistrial. The chain eventually agreed to a civil settlement.

And U.S. District Judge Roger T. Benitez has raised concerns about whether the case against five former San Diego city pension officials should proceed.

Still, corruption and white-collar cases are notoriously hard to prosecute, and some lawyers applauded Lam for making the effort.

If Lam refuses to resign, she could be fired by the president, as former U.S. Attorney William Kennedy was in 1982. Justice Department officials asked for his resignation after he confirmed to The San Diego Union that the CIA interfered in favor of a suspect in a car-theft ring.

He would not resign, and President Reagan fired him. Kennedy is now a Superior Court judge.

Former U.S. Attorney Peter Nuñez wasn't surprised by Lam's silence.

“What else can she do at this point?” he asked. “She's not going to have a press conference. . . . I'm sure this is not one of the better days of her life. She's been publicly humiliated by her bosses.”

Legal Community Stunned By Lam Report (NCT)

By TERI FIGUEROA And WILLIAM FINN BENNETT, Staff Writers

North County (CA) Times, January 13, 2007

Speculation that the Bush administration allegedly has asked San Diego-based U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the region's chief federal prosecutor, to step down was met with disbelief and dropped jaws by legal community members with ties to federal court.

"I was in a state of shock," said Peter Nunez, who served as the U.S. attorney in charge of the San Diego offices from 1982 to 1988. "It's just like nothing I've ever seen before in 35-plus years. To be asked to resign and to be publicly humiliated by leaking this to the press is beyond any bounds of decency and behavior. It shocks me. It really is outrageous."

Nunez and others said they had not even heard rumblings that Lam was in the cross hairs for possible removal.

Lam's spokeswoman Friday declined to address the rumor.

"We have no comment," Debra Hartman, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, wrote in an e-mail to the North County Times.

A spokesman for the attorney general's office in Washington, D.C., declined to comment Friday.

The North County Times could not independently confirm a published report in The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam had been asked to resign.

Lam may not be the only U.S. attorney politely being asked to pack her bags.

In a Thursday news release, U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein announced that she and two other senators were introducing legislation that would prevent the executive branch from trying to do an end run on the Senate's prerogative of confirming U.S. attorneys.

According to the newspaper report, which appeared Friday and cited unnamed sources, Lam was targeted for not making the prosecution of smuggling and gun cases a top priority.

Nunez said the question he has is, "Why?"

"What sin has she committed that justifies asking her to submit her resignation and publicly humiliating her in the process?" Nunez said. "If the reasons are anything close to the newspaper reports, that's crazy, especially when this administration is so weak on immigration."

Lam's office has made white-collar crime a priority, and has taken on a number of high-profile cases ---- among them the successful prosecution of then-Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham on charges of bribery and tax evasion ---- since her 2002 appointment by the Bush administration.

Other cases that came during her tenure included December's criminal convictions of the chiefs of Golden State Fence Co. for hiring illegal immigrants, and the potential death penalty case for the long-sought and recently nabbed Francisco Javier Arrellano-Felix, the alleged head of a Mexican drug cartel.

Lam is a former San Diego Superior Court judge who at one time presided over criminal trials at the courthouse in Vista. Nunez, who said he hired Lam as an assistant U.S. attorney about 20 years ago, called her a "bright, hardworking, conscientious, diligent person."

Also surprised by the report was Charles La Bella, who served a stint as the interim U.S. attorney in 1998. La Bella said Friday that he found the resignation request, if it is true, to be "unusual."

"In my years with the department, I never saw anything like this," La Bella said.

It's difficult to say whether Lam's case priorities might have been a factor, he said.

"The only people who know are in Washington," La Bella said.

Escondido-based defense attorney Mark Chambers, who handles a lot of cases in federal court, said there was a "change of emphasis" when Lam took over.

"There appeared to be a drop-off in the prosecutions of what we call 'border busts,' people arrested for bringing drugs across the border," Chambers said. "There were major increases in large conspiracy cases that involved a great deal of resources to prosecute and investigate. She went after the big fish."

Chambers said he, too, was surprised by the rumor.

"I'm at a loss to determine the reason. It doesn't make sense to me. I think the U.S. attorney's responsibility is to prosecute high-profile, complicated cases, and I think she was doing that."

As a defense attorney, Chambers said, he often feels that the people who are prosecuted are at the "extreme low end of the pole, and some prosecutorial discretion should have been applied."

"Since she took over the office, I haven't felt that," Chambers said. "The people who were getting prosecuted were clearly high profile, high culpability."

La Bella and Nunez said that while politics can play a role in the appointment of each of the nearly eight dozen U.S. attorneys, once a person steps into the job, politics fall by the wayside.

U.S. attorneys serve by the appointment of, and at the pleasure of, the president, and are subject to confirmation by the U.S. Senate. It is common for an incoming president to appoint new people to the 94 positions.

Nunez, reached by his cell phone Friday, said it is "extremely rare" for an administration to ask one of its own appointees to step down.

"The only time this happens is when there has been an allegation of misconduct," Nunez said. "That doesn't mean the president doesn't have the authority to do this. If he wants to, he can fire them. There's nothing wrong with that ---- but if you are going to fire them, you better have a good reason."

Feinstein and the other senators used strong words in the news release describing their proposed legislation.

"It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U.S. Attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation," Feinstein wrote.

And in a Tuesday letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Feinstein also hinted at her suspicions that something might be afoot. While she did not refer specifically to Lam, Feinstein wrote that the Department of Justice had asked "several" U.S. attorneys to step down by the end of the month, "without cause."

"We ... understand the intention is to have your office appoint interim replacements and potentially avoid the Senate confirmation process altogether," she wrote.

A little-known provision in the Patriot Act reauthorization last year changed existing law so that if a vacancy occurs, the attorney general can appoint a replacement for an indefinite period of time.

A spokesman for Feinstein said Friday that he would have no comment beyond the statements that the senator made in her letter.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said by phone Friday that Gonzales is certainly not trying to avoid the Senate confirmation process. There are 93 U.S. attorneys in the country, he said, and at any given time, "a number of them are coming and going."

"In every case, it is the goal of this administration to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate," he said.

For years, U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa has criticized Lam for not doing enough to prosecute smugglers of illegal immigrants. In an October 2005 letter to Attorney General Gonzales, Issa blasted Lam's office for failing to prosecute two cases of smugglers who were repeat offenders.

"This lax prosecutorial standard virtually guarantees that both of these individuals will be arrested on U.S. soil in the future for committing further serious crimes," Issa wrote.

Lam had complained that her office simply lacked the funding to pursue many smuggling cases.

On Friday, Issa spokesman Frederick Hill said that Issa would have no comment on the matter without confirmation that Lam had in fact been asked to step down.

The president of the National Patrol Council, which represents rank-and-file U.S. Border Patrol agents, said Friday that he wishes Lam well and said he hopes that whomever follows her in the job is willing to do whatever is necessary to prosecute immigration smuggling cases.

President T.J. Bonner said that because Lam was so picky about what she was willing to pursue "that it was nearly impossible to prosecute cases in San Diego."

Was Asked To Quit, U.S. Attorney Says (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116967

A day after three U. S. senators, including Arkansas ' Mark Pryor, proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U. S. attorneys, Bud Cummins acknowledged that the U. S. Justice Department asked him in June to leave his post to make room for a successor. Cummins, 47, the U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas from Dec. 21, 2001 until Dec. 20, 2006, had previously avoided directly answering whether he was "forced out," as rumor had it. He instead said in late August that he had always known his political appointment was temporary and that he had informally "let it be known" over the previous year that he expected to leave before President Bush's second term ended in late 2008.

When contacted on Friday, Cummins said that while all that was true, he wanted to clarify the situation because the proposed legislation had focused a new wave of attention on his and other U. S. attorneys' recent departures, reportedly at the administration's request.

In a news release issued jointly Thursday by Pryor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., Feinstein said, "It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U. S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation.... We don't know how many U. S. Attorneys have been asked to resign — it could be two, it could be ten, it could be more. No one knows."

On Friday, the San Diego Union-Tribune reported that according to a law enforcement official, the Bush administration had quietly asked San Diego U. S. Attorney Carol Lam, a 2002 Bush appointee, to resign. The newspaper also quoted New Mexico U. S. Attorney David Iglesias as saying, "I was asked to resign. I asked [why] and wasn't given any answers."

Pryor had publicly complained in late December, when the department announced that attorney Tim Griffin would take over Cummins ' job in a matter of days, that the administration was trying to circumvent the normal nomination process to reward a political insider, without the normal checks and balances.

Griffin, who had a reputation as an aggressive Republican campaign researcher, had previously worked under Karl Rove, Bush's main political adviser and deputy chief of staff. Pryor's spokesman, Michael Teague, said Friday that the senator understands that such appointments are political, "which is fine — but they should go through the confirmation process."

U. S. attorneys are usually nominated by the president and then confirmed by the Senate. But a provision added in last year's reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act allows the U. S. attorney general to appoint interim U. S. attorneys for indefinite terms, when vacancies arise, without going through the confirmation process.

Teague noted Friday that the provision was intended to aid the country in times of crisis — such as after the Sept. 11 terrorist acts — but has been stretched beyond that intent.

Both Pryor and Feinstein voted for the USAPATRIOT Act's reauthorization. Leahy did not.

The proposed legislation aims to restore the law to its previous wording that puts district courts in charge of filling interim vacancies and puts a 120-day limit on the temporary appointments.

Cummins reiterated on Friday that the request that he step down was "entirely within the prerogative of the White House."

"The only reason I haven't specifically responded before was I thought it was going to be a short-term issue and I didn't want it to be misconstrued, but at this point I'm feeling I am being deceptive" in not answering fully, he added.

Much like Cummins, Iglesias said he was "OK with" being asked to leave, noting that chief federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. But Lam, unlike Cummins, reportedly was asked to leave because of the way she performed her job — specifically, for failing to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority.

Lam had been criticized by members of Congress and the Border Patrol for failing to prosecute certain cases. But Cummins' performance has been routinely praised in the Arkansas legal community and by Pyror and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, DArk.

Cummins said Friday that he asked if his job performance was a problem when he got a call in June from the director of the Executive Office of U. S. Attorneys in Washington telling him to be prepared to resign when his successor was ready.

"He assured me it was exactly the contrary," Cummins said. "He said it was not about me but about their desire to give someone else the opportunity to have the appointment."

Cummins added, "I didn't know who they were going to appoint, and it didn't matter to me. I wasn't offended. I had no problem with it then and I have no problem with it now."

He acknowledged, however, that if not for that telephone call, "I might have stayed another year or two. But I always knew, because of the nature of this job, I couldn't stay in it forever."

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said Friday that there have been 11 U. S. attorney vacancies across the country since March 9. He said that in five of those cases, including the one created by Cummins ' departure, the department filled the vacancy with someone from within the U. S. Attorney's office other than the first assistant. Griffin had been working in the office for several months as an assistant prosecutor.

Roehrkasse said that in another five cases, the first assistant was appointed to the interim position. Cummins' first assistant, Jane Duke, had just taken maternity leave.

In one case, Roehrkasse said, the first assistant resigned at the same time as the chief prosecutor, and an interim was appointed from outside the office.

The spokesman also said that four of the 11 went through the normal nomination process, "and we are interviewing for the other seven positions," which would include the position now occupied by Griffin.

Teague has complained that since Griffin is the White House's only choice to replace Cummins — "There's no one else on their list" — he should immediately go through the nomination process.

Roehrkasse replied, "In every single case, it is the goal of this administration to have a U. S. attorney who is confirmed by the Senate. It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Roehrkasse could not say when the nomination process might begin in Griffin's case.

Griffin, 38, reached Friday at a conference in South Carolina, declined to comment on the matter. Cummins, meanwhile, is considering whether his next job will be in private practice or unrelated to the law. He said that being asked to leave "doesn't change anything for me. I'm still appreciative of the president for giving me this job, and I don't have any hard feelings." He noted that out of 93 U. S. attorneys across the country who started at roughly the same time as he did, with a new Republican administration, "well over a third, and probably close to half, have moved on for one reason or another. So it is not uncommon to move on."

Is cronyism behind bid to oust Lam?

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is a tough-minded prosecutor who has won a string of high-profile convictions against corrupt public officials, including Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet. She is widely respected for her personal integrity and her commitment to curbing white-collar crime. Her aggressive prosecutions have sent a needed message that political corruption will not be tolerated in San Diego.

Why, then, is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pressuring Lam behind the scenes to step down?

The answer to this question is far from clear, but it appears to be rooted in questionable political machinations in Washington and has nothing to do with Lam's impressive record on the job. A recent example that may shed light on Lam's dilemma is the firing of H.E. "Bud" Cummins from his job as U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark. He was replaced by a close associate of White House political adviser Karl Rove. Tellingly, the new appointee in Little Rock occupied the post without gaining Senate confirmation.

This was made possible by a revision last year in the controversial Patriot Act. The change allows the White House to appoint interim U.S. attorneys when a midterm vacancy occurs, and such appointees are not subject to Senate confirmation. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has accused the Justice Department of forcing out U.S. attorneys without cause "under the cloak of secrecy" and bypassing the Senate confirmation process.

The Bush administration's actions appear to be motivated by cronyism, a desire to reward the president's supporters with Justice Department posts. In Lam's case, certainly, there are no legitimate performance issues to justify stripping her of her position. Gonzales is set to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits. We urge the senator to seize this opportunity to pull back the "cloak of secrecy" and reveal the truth about the attorney general's bid to remove Lam.

Prosecutor's Hurdles Include Money, Time (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The new U.S. attorney for Washington has a very plum title. But in the current circumstances, Jeffrey A. Taylor may find it hard to leave a major mark, and he's taking some fire before he truly gets moving.

Taylor, who was selected by the Justice Department in the fall to run the largest office of local federal prosecutors in the country, faces the dual challenges of worsening budget constraints and a likely two-year time limit on his tenure.

Then there are the external pressures. A former national security adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Taylor is facing criticism that he lacks local know-how, having spent most of his career in San Diego, where he was an assistant U.S. attorney. And with Democrats now in control of Congress, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) is pushing again for a bill to create the post of a locally elected prosecutor to pursue local crimes in the District.

Gonzales appointed Taylor to be interim U.S. attorney in September, replacing Kenneth L. Wainstein, who became assistant attorney general for national security . The president usually nominates U.S. attorneys for Senate confirmation but has often chosen to let the Justice Department make appointments for interim or short-term posts.

Personable and practical, Taylor acknowledged that it would be unwise for him to launch a series of new initiatives with less money, fewer people and such a short window to act. Still, he declared, "I wouldn't be interested in this job to just be a caretaker."

He took over an office with 30 vacancies among its 360 authorized slots for lawyers -- jobs that will not be filled in the budget crunch. Thirty of 350 support staff jobs are also unfilled and will remain vacant.

Taylor, 41, disputes water-cooler gossip that he's a place-holder until President Bush's term ends in two years. He said he'll focus on three top priorities of cases: violent crime, public corruption and national security.

But even that will be hard in the current budget climate.

"In a perfect world, we'd like more money," Taylor said. "We could keep another 100 prosecutors busy in this office. But that is not reality."

In addition, he's fighting the complaint that the administration's decision to appoint a West Coast prosecutor with important friends is a slight to D.C. concerns. Taylor came to Washington in 1999 and worked on Capitol Hill and at the Justice Department, where he made important political ties.

Unlike the system in other communities, the U.S. attorney's office in Washington serves as both the federal prosecutor, hunting terrorists and drug gangs, and the local district attorney, pursuing everything from street killings to simple assaults. In 2002, D.C. voters overwhelmingly passed a ballot measure favoring a locally elected prosecutor, but such a move would require the approval of Congress.

"The post is used as a patronage appointment to handle local District of Columbia matters," Norton said. Taylor's past experience, she said, "has next to nothing to do with the District of Columbia."

Norton said she sees a lack of sensitivity in the way U.S. attorneys under Bush have repeatedly sought the death penalty on federal charges in Washington, though polls show District voters oppose capital punishment. The U.S. attorney's office has taken two capital murder cases to trial in U.S. District Court during the Bush administration; in both, the defendants received life sentences with no chance of parole. Another case is about to get underway.

Taylor said he is properly sensitized to the concerns.

"No matter what I do, people are going to be unhappy that they don't have an elected district attorney," he said. "I understand that. The best I can hope for is they say, 'Hey, he wasn't my choice, but he's doing a good job.' "

Taylor vowed that local violent crimes prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court won't get short shrift to terrorism and conspiracy cases.

"Superior Court is incredibly important to people in the community," he said. "That's where we do the lion's share of our front-line work. We're going to make sure we have enough prosecutors to handle the homicides, rapes and other violent crimes there."

DOJ_NMG_0116970

Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. attorney who later became second in charge at the Justice Department, said he thinks Taylor has a chance to make a difference if he picks two or three targets.

"I get the sense there's a human side of him that wants to do the right thing," said Holder, now in private practice. "If he makes contact with the right people, not just the mayor and council, and admits he doesn't know everything, I think he can be effective and have an impact. You can't come in saying, 'I'm going to do 10 or 15 things." You have to really focus."

Taylor has made an effort to reach out to Norton, the new mayor, Adrian M. Fenty (D), and new D.C. council members. He also has attended neighborhood meetings and points out that he has owned a house on Capitol Hill since 1999.

Taylor graduated from Stanford University in 1987 and Harvard Law School in 1991. He worked in private practice for a brief time. From 1995 to 1999, he specialized in prosecuting large drug trafficking networks while an assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego. From 1999 to 2001, he worked on a detail for the Senate Judiciary Committee, then returned to the San Diego U.S. attorney's office briefly.

In 2002, he returned to the District for good, as counselor to Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and then Gonzales, with a focus on national security and terrorism.

Taylor's wife, Marcia, has long worked for Democratic causes. She worked for the late senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (N.Y.) and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and now works for the Partnership for a Drug-Free America. They live with their dog on Capitol Hill, and Taylor said he would love to be a father someday.

Taylor's own father died when he was a child. His mother and grandfather raised him on a farm in Northern California, and he speaks lovingly and gratefully of them and his modest rural upbringing. Over Christmas, he celebrated the holidays with them out West.

Then he was back in Washington to make what his new colleagues call "the $100 decisions." His salary in Washington is capped at $142,000, and under the pay scale, his senior aides make $100 less a year. When they come to his desk for his approval on a tough call, Taylor said, they take the chance to rib him with the same line:

"This is why you get that extra $100."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrutiny For Loans By Allied Unit (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Federal investigations into small-business loans issued by a unit of the Allied Capital Corporation are growing, as a former executive of the unit faces fraud charges in Michigan.

The former executive, Patrick J. Harrington, is accused of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years, according to an indictment that was handed up on Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Michigan. Mr. Harrington has not entered a plea to the charges.

Federal investigators are now looking at loans issued by the unit, Business Loan Express, in other parts of the country, according to several people briefed on the investigation.

And the federal Small Business Administration — which typically guarantees 75 percent of the value of these small-business loans — is considering suspending the preferred lending status of Business Loan Express, pending the outcome of an investigation. That would mean that every loan Business Loan Express issues would have to be vetted by the agency, those people said.

The S.B.A. this week also suspended the unit's ability to sell the loans it issues to large institutional investors in the secondary market, which could affect the ability of Business Loan Express to make loans, those people said. The unit can still originate loans, but only if it intends to hold those loans on its own books, which is not something the firm has historically done.

There have been questions over lax controls and oversight at the Small Business Administration, and the latest investigations are likely to spur further scrutiny. In recent years, the S.B.A. has come under sharp criticism for its lack of oversight in special loans after the Sept. 11 attacks, which wound up being used by businesses in Texas and Iowa, and for its delayed response in providing disaster loans after Hurricane Katrina.

"The concern is that this situation is emblematic of a larger management problem at the S.B.A.," Kate L. Davis, a spokeswoman for Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York, the new chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, said in a statement. "There are indications that this situation has been developing over the past few years."

The House committee, which oversees the S.B.A. has begun its own investigation of the loans in Michigan, and possibly in other states, she said.

"The committee will be investigating S.B.A.'s involvement and how the agency could have failed to detect this," she said.

The S.B.A. said in a statement, "We welcome the opportunity to work with the committee and share information about the steps we have taken and will take, and work with them to share ideas on how to further refine the process."

The S.B.A., which has paid out more than $28 million in claims for loans that originated from the Michigan office of Business Loan Express that later defaulted, has said it has the authority to recover any funds lost to fraud.

As part of the investigation, the S.B.A. plans to re-examine more than five years of loans issued by the Allied unit and could seek restitution if there are additional cases of fraud, according to people familiar with the investigation.

Lanny J. Davis, a Washington-based lawyer for Business Loan Express, said, "This is a good company, with good people, and I believe, in the final analysis, this will be borne out."

The broadening investigation and the indictment are blows to Allied, which in recent years has been battling with hedge funds that have contended, among other things, that the Business Loan Express unit was profiting through obtaining fraudulent loans. Since reports of the indictment appeared on Wednesday, Allied's stock has tumbled 7 percent.

Based in Washington, Allied is known for its strong ties with the capital's elite. One of its directors, for instance, is Marc F. Racicot, the former governor of Montana and the former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Designated a "business development company," Allied invests in small- and midsize private companies that it also typically lends to. Business Loan Express, which constitutes about 6 percent of the assets of Allied, is the company's largest holding.

One of the most vocal critics of Allied's Business Loan Express unit has been David Einhorn, the founder and manager of Greenlight Capital, a hedge fund with more than $4 billion under management. Mr. Einhorn first publicly challenged aspects of Allied's accounting and business model at a charity dinner in the spring of 2002.

In letters to directors on Allied's board dating back to March 2005, Mr. Einhorn told Allied's directors that Allied and Business Loan Express were involved in a scheme "dependent on the commission of systematic fraud against the Small Business Administration and, as a result, against the taxpaying citizens of the United States."

"Allied has been aware of misconduct by Mr. Harrington for half a decade and it won't be hard to find many more similarly fraudulent loans in other parts of the country," Mr. Einhorn said.

In the summer of 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the United States attorney's office in Washington began an investigation into Allied that focused on Business Loan Express, according to regulatory filings by Allied.

While those investigations continue, red flags were being raised about Business Loan Express loans inside the Small Business Administration about a year ago.

The S.B.A. works with more than 2,200 lenders — big and small — across the country to make loans to small businesses. Lenders who undergo an exhaustive examination of their internal controls, procedures and underwriting standards, and whose performance of their overall loan portfolio meets certain criteria can participate in the S.B.A.'s preferred lender program. Members of the program have virtually none of their loan applications examined by the S.B.A.'s district or regional offices. The S.B.A. does, however, conduct random audits of all loans it guarantees.

About a year ago the S.B.A., which gives its lenders an internal rating on a one-to-five scale, lowered Business Loan Express to the lowest rating that would allow it to remain in the preferred lending program, based on a rising level of late payments and defaults on loans it had made, according to people involved in the investigation.

One of Business Loan Express's branches that had a rising level of defaults was in Troy, Mich., which Mr. Harrington headed until it was closed on Aug. 1, 2006.

From early 2000 to July 2006, Mr. Harrington, working with a number of other people, qualified buyers for the S.B.A.-guaranteed loans by fraudulently misrepresenting the buyers' financial status, their work experience, as well as the value of the property, according to the indictment. Several Michigan residents were charged in criminal complaints as acting as borrowers in the scheme, according to court filings.

A lawyer for Mr. Harrington questioned the value of the loans federal prosecutors contend were fraudulent. "He says he made a mistake, but not near to the extent that the government claims," said the lawyer, Clyde B. Pritchard.

A federal prosecutor in Michigan said the investigation into Business Loan Express was continuing.

H.P. Investigator Pleads Guilty To Identity Theft And Conspiracy (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif., Jan. 12 (AP) — Federal prosecutors scored their first victory in the investigation of boardroom spying at Hewlett-Packard on Friday, when a private investigator pleaded guilty to identity theft and conspiracy charges.

The investigator, Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to the two felony counts during his initial appearance in United States District Court in San Jose.

As part of the plea deal, Mr. Wagner admitted to illegally obtaining Social Security numbers and other personal information to snoop on the private telephone records of journalists, former Hewlett-Packard directors, and their family members as part of the company's effort to ferret out the source of boardroom leaks to the media.

Mr. Wagner acknowledged using a form of subterfuge known as "pretexting," or pretending to be someone else, to fool telephone companies into releasing records on former two former H.P. directors — Thomas J. Perkins and George A. Keyworth II — and two reporters, Pui-Wing Tam of The Wall Street Journal and Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks.

Mr. Wagner admitted using personal information to set up online accounts in the names of the four people from April 2005 to September 2006 to access their call logs and billing records.

His lawyer, Stephen Naratil, said his client would testify for prosecutors as they pursue other figures in the case. He declined to say whom Mr. Wagner would testify against or what he had told prosecutors.

Mr. Wagner's sentencing was set for June 20 in San Jose federal court.

Mr. Naratil has described his client as the "little guy" who was tricked by others into thinking the investigative methods were legal. Mr. Wagner never had any contact with anyone inside the company, Mr. Naratil said. "He was your classic dupe," Mr. Naratil said.

In court, Assistant United States Attorney Mark L. Krotoski said Mr. Wagner was hired by Matthew DePante of the Action Research Group in Florida to unearth the telephone records and distribute them to other unnamed coconspirators.

Mr. DePante has not been charged in the case. A call to his lawyer, Richard Preira of Miami Beach, Fla., was not immediately returned.

Mr. Wagner and Mr. DePante were charged in October in state court along with the former H.P. chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who initiated the investigation; the former H.P. ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker, who directed the inquiry; and Ronald R. DeLia, a security contractor who runs a Boston detective firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions. The four others have pleaded not guilty.

Full Disclosure Companies Trim Executive Perks To Avoid Glare (WSJ)

By Erin White And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Jet Rides, Club Dues On Chopping Block As SEC Rules Kick In

Some CEOs may soon learn there's no such thing as a free ride -- on the corporate jet, anyway.

Personal air travel on the company dime is among an array of executive perks some companies have begun trimming as new compensation-disclosure rules take effect.

On Jan. 1, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Lockheed Martin Corp. stopped paying executives' country-club dues. In December, directors of General Mills Inc. capped free personal rides on company aircraft for its chief executive officer. And E*Trade Financial Corp. said it no longer would help top executives pay taxes on their severance benefits if the company is sold.

The changes come amid sweeping new Securities and Exchange Commission requirements for additional disclosure about executive pay and perks. The rules, which took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 14, require companies to reveal perks for top executives that add up to $10,000 or more apiece; the old rules required disclosure of perks valued above $50,000.

The number of companies dropping or curbing perks is unclear. Most won't file their annual proxy statements, detailing executive compensation, until March or April. Of 110 large companies surveyed by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in November, 14 said they had eliminated perks or were considering doing so because of the new regulations.

But some compensation consultants and directors expect the number to grow as more boards consider the hazards of publicizing perks amid a burgeoning national outcry over executive compensation. In recent weeks, investor anger has been stoked by exit packages in the neighborhood of $200 million for the CEOs of Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., both of whom left under fire for poor shareholder returns.

The enhanced compensation-disclosure rules "will for sure accelerate the cutbacks" in perks, says William G. Bowen, a director at drug-maker Merck & Co. who previously sat on the boards of American Express Co. and Reader's Digest Association Inc. With their reputations on the line, board members "don't want to be embarrassed" by executive-pay practices, he says. Mr. Bowen declined to comment on whether Merck's board is considering dropping any perks for CEO Richard Clark, who now receives a company car, limited personal use of corporate aircraft and financial counseling, among other benefits.

Information about perks that Merck provided its top executives last year will be described in the company's 2007 proxy, a spokeswoman said.

Perks coming under greater scrutiny include country-club dues, company cars, private use of corporate jets, financial-planning services and instances where companies pay executives to cover those officials' tax payments due on other compensation. Many such items typically aren't very costly, but can attract shareholder protests.

They are also fairly common. A Mercer study of proxies last year found that 55% of 350 large companies said they allow personal use of company aircraft. About 50% said they paid for financial counseling, 43% for company cars, and 27% paid club dues, the study indicated.

Mark Reilly, a partner at Compensation Consulting Consortium, a consulting firm in Chicago, says many of his clients are considering trimming perks. "The discussion is, 'How will our employees and shareowners perceive these perquisites?' " he says. "It just sort of provides ammunition to employee groups and unions to attack your pay policy."

The companies changing perquisite policies in recent months may still have to disclose 2006 payments for those benefits in their proxies. The companies may hope to damp investor criticism by announcing curbs on perks ahead of, or at the same time as, the disclosures.

The tactic may not quiet shareholder activists, however. "If executives think that preemptive perk reductions will help them escape shareholder scrutiny, they are badly mistaken," says Cornish F. Hitchcock, outside counsel for Amalgamated Bank's LongView Funds. The union-backed activist funds have objected to executive-pay practices at concerns such as Dynegy Inc., CA Inc., and Halliburton Co.

Meredith Miller, an assistant state treasurer in Connecticut, whose public-employee pension fund has about $26 billion of assets, says she is encouraged by the recent moves to curb senior-management perks. "Transparency is one of the best antiseptics for executive pay," she says.

But she predicts activist shareholders will continue to pressure companies that eliminate highly visible perks without tackling other controversial forms of executive compensation. "Many of the same board members who approved these perks in the past are still sitting on the board," she says. "The day of accountability will still come."

In fact, executives don't necessarily lose in these new arrangements. Compensation consultants expect many companies to increase other forms of compensation to make up for the lost perks.

Becton, Dickinson and Co., for example, raised CEO Edward Ludwig's salary $4,000, to $994,000, after eliminating a financial-planning perk in 2005, which had cost the Franklin Lakes, N.J., medical-technology company as much as $9,000.

Lockheed Martin said in an SEC filing that it gave executives a "one-time salary adjustment" after cutting benefits including country-club dues and financial counseling. On Dec. 1, CEO Robert Stevens got a $40,000 raise in his base salary, to $1.52 million. Robert Coutts, Lockheed's executive vice president for electronic systems, got a $25,000 raise, to $850,000. A Lockheed spokesman declined to comment on whether the changes were prompted by the new SEC rules, but noted that "perks have received increased scrutiny."

Some companies had been chipping away at perks even before the SEC rules surfaced. Becton, Dickinson in October 2005 stopped reimbursing top executives for personal financial-planning services. In December 2005, it struck an agreement with Mr. Ludwig under which he reimburses the company for most of the cost of his personal use of company aircraft. Becton, Dickinson said the changes were prompted by efforts to improve corporate governance.

More perks have been disappearing in recent months, as the broader disclosures required by the new rules draw nearer. Exxon Mobil directors dropped the country-club dues perk because they decided it looked silly when executives earn enough to foot those bills themselves, according to a person familiar with the matter. Former CEO Lee R. Raymond was reimbursed $67,035 for membership fees in 2005, according to Exxon Mobil's most recent proxy. A spokesman declined to comment on whether the change, which took effect Jan. 1, was influenced by the new rules.

In November, Avaya Inc. halted payments to cover taxes levied on executives for personal use of company aircraft, according to a recent SEC filing. A spokeswoman for the Basking Ridge, N.J., maker of telecommunications software and equipment says the change was "part of our normal process of examining compensation and benefits" and unrelated to the SEC rules.

In December, General Mills began to require that Chief Executive Stephen W. Sanger reimburse the company for personal use of corporate aircraft beyond $50,000 per year; Mr. Sanger's perk used to be unlimited. His personal use of company aircraft was valued at $73,001 in the company's 2006 fiscal year, according to an SEC filing. A spokesman says directors approved the change, proposed by Mr. Sanger. The CEO "felt that there should be a cap," says spokesman Thomas Forsythe. He says the change wasn't prompted by the new SEC rules.

Other companies acknowledge that the looming disclosure requirements played at least some role in new curbs on executive perks. Ryder System Inc., a Miami provider of transportation and logistics services, recently decided to discontinue certain severance perks for executives that had included a car allowance and financial-planning services, according to an SEC filing on Thursday. The board decided that those perks were primarily job related, so it didn't make sense to continue to provide them once the executives were no longer employed, says Flora Perez, Ryder's assistant general counsel. The change was partly prompted by the new disclosure rules, but more so by a desire to practice good governance, she adds.

"We certainly had our eye on the new disclosure rules," says John Daniel, manager of employee services at First Horizon National Corp. The Memphis, Tenn., bank-holding company last month stopped reimbursing executives for taxes paid on benefits such as a car allowance, disability-insurance premiums and personal use of corporate aircraft.

Mr. Daniel says First Horizon's board compensation committee dropped the tax reimbursements primarily because they aren't seen as good governance. When a company covers a senior official's taxes, "the perception is that the executive is getting something special," Mr. Daniel said. "All of us in the corporate world are looking at what's the best practice in this governance environment."

NYSE Seat-Holder Suits Allowed To Proceed (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Lawsuits by three former New York Stock Exchange membership-seat holders over disclosures by the Big Board and its chief executive, John Thain, before details of its merger with Archipelago Holdings Inc. became public can proceed, a state judge has ruled.

In an order filed Wednesday, New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos said some of the allegations in cases brought by onetime seat holders Janet Hyman, Sylvia Lief and D. Paul Rittmaster can go forward.

The three cases have been consolidated for pretrial proceedings.

Without ruling on the merits of the claim, Justice Ramos allowed to proceed allegations that representations made at a Feb. 3, 2005, town hall meeting with seat holders and a Feb. 15, 2005, announcement were incomplete and/or misleading. The meeting and announcement concerned the formation of an advisory committee to explore the possibility of converting the NYSE from a nonprofit to a for-profit company, which is now called NYSE Group Inc.

The judge dismissed claims that the NYSE and Mr. Thain breached their fiduciary duty or were negligent for failing to keep the merger negotiations confidential in order to prevent speculative or premature market fluctuations.

The former seat holders sold their seats in March 2005. In April 2005, the NYSE and Archipelago publicly announced their merger, which was completed last year.

An NYSE spokesman declined comment on Justice Ramos's ruling Friday.

Big Accounting Firms Still Pay For Scandals (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Corporate scandals that erupted earlier this decade are still causing pain at accounting firms, which continue to pay big bucks to atone for their failure to spot, or stop, fraud.

The latest example: Deloitte & Touche's Italian arm on Friday agreed to pay $149 million to settle lawsuits brought by former audit client Parmalat SpA, which collapsed in December 2003 after the discovery of Europe's biggest corporate fraud.

Under the terms of the agreement between Deloitte's Italian arm, Deloitte & Touche SpA, and Parmalat, the Italian company will drop all claims against various Deloitte arms it is suing in federal court in New York. In turn, Deloitte will drop counterclaims against the company, whose former managers allegedly engaged in a fraud that left Parmalat with an $18 billion hole on its books.

Specific terms of the agreement, beyond the settlement amount, weren't disclosed. A spokeswoman for Deloitte in the U.S. declined to comment on whether the $149 million would be covered in part or whole by insurance.

A joint statement from Parmalat and Deloitte didn't say whether the accounting firm acknowledged any wrongdoing. Deloitte, which signed off on Parmalat's books from 1999 to 2003, has previously said it acted in accordance with laws in place in Italy at the time.

The settlement follows a deal announced last month by Deloitte's U.S. arm, Deloitte & Touche LLP, to pay $210 million to resolve claims related to Adelphia Communications Corp., the cable company once run by the Rigas family that filed for bankruptcy in 2002. While the Adelphia and Parmalat settlements don't eclipse a record $335 million payout in 1999 by Ernst & Young LLP in a case related to Cendant Corp., they are within the top-10 settlement awards paid by auditors over the past 10 years for work for a single client.

The Adelphia settlement was significant because Deloitte's $210 million payout represented about 45% of the total $455 million Deloitte, Bank of America Corp. and 38 other banks agreed to pay investors. Auditors typically account for between 10% and 15% of total settlements in such cases, according to executives at other big accounting firms.

As a result, other big firms have been left to wonder if Adelphia is an aberration or the start of a trend toward higher proportionate payouts by accounting firms.

A Former No. 2 Official Becomes Suspect In Siemens Bribery Probe (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

BERLIN -- An international corruption investigation at Siemens AG is climbing the corporate ladder after a former No. 2 executive was named a suspect amid allegations a complex bribery scheme spanned several units at the far-flung German conglomerate.

Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, the chief financial officer of Siemens from 1998 until he resigned in April, was questioned by German prosecutors Tuesday and released in a widening probe into nearly half a billion dollars in suspicious payments.

A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich confirmed that Mr. Neubürger is being treated as a suspect, not a witness, in the cross-border investigation. At least one other suspect has alleged to prosecutors that Mr. Neubürger was aware of illegal payments and didn't do enough to stop them, according to lawyers familiar with the investigation.

More than 200 German police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several current and former employees; they were released just before Christmas after agreeing to cooperate. Investigators suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe customers abroad.

Munich-based Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Last month, it flagged €420 million ($542 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years -- double the amount uncovered by German prosecutors in November. Until now, the investigation had been confined to the company's telecommunications network division. Siemens, Europe's largest engineering firm by sales, has blamed the alleged fraud on "individual acts."

Mr. Neubürger is the second former management-board member of Siemens to become a suspect. Thomas Ganswindt, who oversaw the telecommunications business until resigning last September, was arrested last month before being released.

A lawyer for Mr. Neubürger declined to make his client available for comment. A lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt said his client is innocent.

Mr. Neubürger, 54 years old, last year cited personal reasons for resigning from Siemens half a year before his contract was due to expire. Last month he denied any wrongdoing in interviews with German newspapers after his name surfaced amid the allegations. He currently is a nonexecutive director at KKR Private Equity Investors, an investment vehicle of U.S.-based Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.

Police searched offices of management-board members -- including Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld -- last November. Prosecutors say they are treating Mr. Kleinfeld as a witness, not a suspect. A company spokesman said Friday he had no knowledge of any current management-board members being called in for questioning by authorities. Mr. Kleinfeld has said that Siemens has "zero tolerance" for wrongdoing.

Some prosecutors in neighboring countries who are working with German authorities say Siemens has done too little in recent years to crack down on bribe payments. Robert Wallner, lead prosecutor in Vaduz, Liechtenstein, says Siemens officials asked him not to investigate a suspicious account in Liechtenstein that was uncovered in late 2004 and later linked to the bribery investigation.

Lawyers familiar with the matter say several suspects told German prosecutors that the compliance department of Siemens was informed of the money-laundering investigations in Liechtenstein, Switzerland and Italy but took no action to assist authorities. Siemens recently filed slander charges against the lawyer for one of the suspects after the lawyer made the allegations on German television. A prosecutor spokesman declined to comment.

At least one suspect has told prosecutors that he helped transfer money from a slush fund in the telecommunications division to pay bribes at other units of the company, according to a lawyer familiar with the investigation. A Siemens spokesman declined Friday to comment on the allegations, citing the continuing investigation.

Prosecutors say they suspect bribes were paid to acquire new business in several countries. Among the suspicious transactions tied to the telecommunications unit between 2002 and 2004 are more than €7.5 million in Egypt, €4 million in Saudi Arabia, €3 million in Vietnam, €2.6 million in Indonesia, €1.8 million in Greece and €1.6 million in Kuwait, according to a court document. Siemens booked €87 billion in revenue in the fiscal year ended September 2006 and is active in almost 200 countries, making everything from medical scanners to high-speed trains and light bulbs.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Government Report Describes Leak (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan And Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

Justice Dept. won't tell details

Washington -- The Justice Department is fighting in court to keep secret a government report concluding that it leaked confidential and damaging information against a former prosecutor accused of bungling a high- profile terror trial.

Justice attorneys say they can't disclose all the contents of the December 2004 report by the department's inspector general without violating employees' privacy.

However, ex-Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino of Detroit said the Justice Department violated his own privacy rights by revealing to the media that he was the subject of an internal ethics inquiry after he criticized the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy.

Two people who have seen the full report confirmed it rules out Convertino as a suspect in the leak case. Those people described the report's findings to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because it is sealed under a Justice Department protective order.

A heavily edited version of the report is included in court documents filed in Washington. It concludes that investigators "did not find sufficient evidence to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, who leaked this information."

It narrowed the source to about 30 prosecutors and other Justice Department officials, in Washington and Detroit, all of whom denied leaking the information. The full report also concluded that Convertino was not the source, according to related court documents filed by his attorneys.

Convertino's attorney, Stephen Kohn, would not comment on details in the government's sealed report. But he accused the Justice Department of sealing it to cover up its own misconduct.

A department spokesman declined to comment. But in documents filed in federal court, government attorneys rejected Convertino's request as "an attempt to discredit or embarrass individuals who were the subjects of that investigation."

For two years, Convertino led the government's case in the nation's first terrorism trial after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. He was removed in 2003 after the Justice Department concluded he withheld evidence that could have proved the innocence of the four defendants accused of being a Detroit terror cell.

Convictions of three of the four men were later overturned because of prosecutorial misconduct. The fourth was acquitted.

Four months after he was taken off the case, a January 2004 article in the Detroit Free Press cited anonymous Justice Department sources saying Convertino was under investigation for misconduct during the trial.

Convertino maintains he was targeted because, shortly before he was removed from the case, he criticized the Bush administration during a Senate hearing on funding for terrorism prosecutions. The sealed report does not cite that congressional hearing or identify it as a motive for the leak, according to the people who have seen the report.

Convertino was indicted last March for obstructing justice in the terror trial and in another case. The criminal case continues against Convertino, as does his civil lawsuit against the Justice Department.

Prosecutor Seeks To Bow Out Of Duke Case (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey And Sylvia Adcock, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Embattled DA Asks State to Take Over

After months of stinging criticism about his handling of the Duke University sexual assault investigation, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong sought to bow out of the case yesterday, requesting that the North Carolina Attorney General's Office handle the prosecution.

His decision to recuse himself was welcomed by the defense team representing the three Duke lacrosse players initially accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party.

"We feel very good about this. It's a fresh set of eyes looking at the case," said William Cotter of Raleigh, one of three attorneys for Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y. "We think it's more likely that they will listen to us and we will certainly be cooperative with him or her."

The defense believes that another prosecutor would, after reviewing the contradictions of the alleged victim's accounts and the paucity of physical evidence, drop the case.

Attorney General Roy Cooper's office deferred questions about Nifong's action until a news conference scheduled for Saturday.

Nifong's request closely follows a formal ethics complaint made by the North Carolina State Bar, charging Nifong with violating ethics rules by engaging in "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" and by making comments that stirred "public condemnation of the accused." The bar complaint creates an ethical conflict that prevents Nifong from continuing the prosecution, lawyers said.

The case -- involving a black accuser and white suspects -- initially touched off a national debate about racism and privilege, as Nifong labeled the team from the elite university a "bunch of hooligans" and some portrayed reported actions at the party as the result of campus racism.

Since then, however, the case against the three has been staggered by contradictions in the alleged victim's story and Nifong's withholding of exculpatory evidence.

The victim's account has changed repeatedly on key points -- such as whether she was penetrated by a penis. The change prompted Nifong to drop rape charges against the three men Dec. 22, but they still face charges of sexual offense and kidnapping, which carry significant prison terms.

At the same time, some of Nifong's initial statements about the strength of the evidence he had gathered have proved to have been misleading.

The director of a private DNA-testing laboratory said it had omitted from its report that DNA from multiple men -- none a match to the defendants -- was found on vaginal and rectal swabs, on the accuser's body and on her underwear. Brian Meehan, the lab director, said he and Nifong had agreed to leave out that information because the case was so "explosive."

"Everyone just got run over by this guy who made these statements for which there was no support," said Duke Law School professor James E. Coleman Jr., who is African American and chaired the faculty committee that prepared a report looking into the lacrosse team's past.

Nifong "prejudged the case and injected inflammatory opinions that it was racially motivated," Coleman said, but "he had not done the investigation, so he had no idea what happened."

Calls to the District Attorney's Office after hours yesterday were not returned.

On Thursday, more contradictions in the victim's account were revealed in a motion by defense attorneys.

In an interview last month with a district attorney's investigator, the alleged victim said she had been attacked by two players -- not three, as she had said in previous accounts.

"The accuser's most recent recollections of events demonstrates clearly that she cannot accurately recall and describe her attackers and that any identification made by her is necessarily unreliable," defense attorneys wrote.

While the defense attorneys hold out hope that a new prosecutor may decide to drop the case, the move could also enable the prosecution to go forward -- if there is any suitable evidence.

Joe Kennedy, an associate professor of law at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, said that if there is strong evidence that a crime was committed, a new prosecutor could divorce himself from Nifong's ethical problems. The new prosecutor could argue that the withholding of DNA evidence from defense attorneys was wrong but still argue that a crime had been committed.

He described the move as a "win-win" for both sides of the case.

But one of the lead defense attorneys in the case, Joseph B. Cheshire said he is "very confident" that a new prosecutor in the case would drop the charges after a review of the evidence.

"We are extremely pleased to be rid of him," Cheshire said of Nifong. "The word of the accuser changes every time she opens her mouth. Anybody who takes an objective look at this case will dismiss it."

Whoriskey reported from Miami; Adcock, from Durham, N.C.

DA Asks Out Of Duke Rape Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The embattled district attorney in the Duke rape investigation, who faces disbarment for suspected "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" in statements he made about the case, has asked that the prosecution be moved to the state attorney general's office.

According to sources close to the 10-month-old prosecution, Durham County District Attorney Michael Nifong sent a letter yesterday to North Carolina Attorney General Roy Cooper asking that Mr. Cooper's office appoint a special prosecutor to take over the case.

Mr. Nifong has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the investigation and was named Dec. 28 in an ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. The complaint accuses him of breaking four rules of professional conduct while speaking to reporters about the investigation.

The complaint said Mr. Nifong made "extrajudicial statements" to reporters that "he knew or reasonably should have known would be disseminated ... and would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" the case.

The veteran prosecutor faces a preliminary state bar hearing on Jan. 24. A trial date has tentatively been scheduled for May 11.

Mr. Nifong was not available yesterday for comment. Noelle Talley, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cooper, confirmed last night in an e-mail that Mr. Nifong had asked for the appointment of a special prosecutor, but she was not available to comment on the request. The Nifong letter to Mr. Cooper was first reported by ABC News.

"We are pleased, and we offer the attorney general our full and complete cooperation," said Wade Smith, defense attorney for Collin Finnerty, one of the three men charged in the case. "We will meet with them at any time, and we are glad that people with such qualifications are going to take over the case."

Mr. Nifong's request came a day after he met with the accuser -- the first time the two had actually talked face to face about the case. He spoke with her briefly after the accusations first surfaced in March, but -- according to court records -- had never specifically discussed the case.

While she was at Mr. Nifong's office on Thursday, the accuser was served a subpoena to appear at a Feb. 5 hearing on a defense motion to suppress her identification of the three lacrosse players.

The Duke athletes -- Mr. Finnerty, Reade Seligmann and David Evans -- originally had been charged with rape after the woman, a student at North Carolina Central University who also worked as a stripper, said she was sexually assaulted during an off-campus party attended by Duke University students.

Mr. Nifong, who declared himself the lead prosecutor in the case, told reporters the 28-year-old woman was "gang raped" and beaten at the March 13 party thrown by Duke's lacrosse team.

He later dropped the sexual assault charges a few days before Christmas to lesser sexual offenses and kidnapping when the woman said during a Dec. 21 interview with an investigator from Mr. Nifong's office that she was not certain Mr. Seligmann had taken part in the assault and was unsure whether she had been penetrated by anyone.

The motion, filed in state court, said the accuser told investigator Linwood Wilson 10 months after the original accusations she was not now 100 percent certain that a rape as defined by the state of North Carolina occurred. That disclosure led Mr. Nifong to reduce the charges.

During an earlier interview with authorities, the woman said she was "100 percent" sure Mr. Seligmann had sexually assaulted her.

The Thursday meeting coincided with a defense motion asking a judge to prohibit the photo lineup in which the accuser identified the three lacrosse players.

Judge Osmond Smith, who is assigned as the sole judge to the case, is expected to rule on the admissibility of the photo lineup at the Feb. 5 hearing.

Prosecutor Asks To Exit Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson And David Barstow

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

DURHAM, N.C., Jan. 12 — The district attorney in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case asked the state attorney general on Friday to take over the troubled prosecution, saying he faced a conflict of interest because of ethics charges filed against him by the state bar, officials involved in the case said.

The decision by the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, throws new doubt on the future of a prosecution that has already suffered several sharp setbacks.

A spokeswoman for Roy Cooper, North Carolina's attorney general, confirmed that the office had received Mr. Nifong's request and said it would be discussed on Saturday. If Mr. Cooper agrees to review the case, it will remove a prosecutor who has become a lightning rod for fierce and unrelenting criticism.

Defense lawyers were jubilant, openly predicting that no prosecutor in the state would continue with a case that hangs almost entirely on the shifting accounts of the alleged victim, a stripper who claims she was assaulted after performing at a team party in March. The woman, who was consulted before Friday's recusal, remained firm in her desire for the case to go forward against the three former lacrosse players, an official involved in the case said.

The players face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense that could put them in prison for decades.

Speaking of the recusal, Joseph B. Cheshire, the lawyer for David Evans, one of the defendants, said: "We're very heartened by it. He should have done it weeks or months ago. For the first time, someone who is honest and objective and doesn't have an agenda will look at this case. We feel confident that when they do, these young men will be exonerated and this case will be dismissed."

Mr. Cheshire added that the attorney general should also look at possible obstruction of justice and manipulation of evidence by Mr. Nifong.

Friday's action marked a stinging professional defeat for Mr. Nifong, who has faced accusations of incompetence, prosecutorial misconduct and ethical violations for his handling of the case. In his letter to Mr. Cooper, Mr. Nifong said the accusations of ethical wrongdoing, which were brought last month by the state bar, presented him with a conflict of interest between defending his own conduct and prosecuting this case.

"He feels very disappointed that he can't go on for her," said David B. Freedman, Mr. Nifong's lawyer in the ethics case. "Mike at this point, as a result of the bar complaint, doesn't want to be a distraction to the case or take away from the prosecution of the case, which the witness still feels very strongly about."

According to friends, Mr. Nifong's resolve had begun to falter even before the ethics charges were brought against him.

At a court hearing on Dec. 15, a DNA laboratory director admitted that he and Mr. Nifong had deliberately withheld exculpatory information from a report. Mr. Nifong prided himself on integrity, having been a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, yet the laboratory director's testimony and his acknowledgment of the error undercut his reputation.

Things only worsened from there.

Some fellow district attorneys advised Mr. Nifong privately in Raleigh on Dec. 19 to take himself off the case. Mr. Nifong felt stunned and subdued, friends say, yet still could not bring himself to exit. In an interview with The New York Times two days later, he described such a step as tantamount to letting defendants handpick their own prosecutors.

But then the North Carolina State Bar filed an ethics complaint on Dec. 28, taking him to task for his early public comments about the case. It was an unprecedented rebuke for a prosecutor in the middle of a legal brawl. The next day, the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys issued a news release asking him to recuse himself immediately.

Mr. Nifong's friends told him he had two choices: dismiss the case or ask the attorney general to take it over. It was a bitter decision, friends said. His reputation hung in the balance. Mr. Nifong decided he had to do something he had left to his investigators over the 10 months since the alleged assault: talk about it directly with the woman he called "my victim."

In a two-hour meeting at his office on Thursday, Mr. Nifong and an aide talked about the choices, an official involved in the case said. He told the accuser that a trial would be brutal, but that he had already talked with the attorney general's special prosecutions unit and trusted that office to give the case a fair review. He asked what she wanted to do.

She was concerned about the effect of the case on Mr. Nifong's career, the official recalled. She wanted to sleep on the decision. She continued to insist she had been sexually assaulted.

On Friday, she and Mr. Nifong spoke by telephone. She again said she wanted to go forward. Although she was not happy about Mr. Nifong's giving up of the case, the official said, she said she understood his reasoning and pledged to cooperate with any new team.

In Durham, Mr. Nifong's exit was greeted with relief on all sides.

Irving Joyner, a law professor who has been monitoring the case for the N.A.A.C.P, expressed hope that the attorney general would bring new energy to the case. John F. Burness, senior vice president for public affairs at Duke, said the university hoped "this change will lead to a fair and speedy resolution of this case."

Over 10 turbulent months, all the protagonists in the racially charged case have undergone sharp transformations in the pitiless glare of national publicity.

The defendants, who are white, were initially portrayed as boys gone wild. But in time, with the fraying of the evidence and careful maneuvering by their legal team, they emerged in news accounts as victims of a kind of reverse discrimination, promising young men whose lives were being destroyed by concocted accusations.

The accuser, who is black, was at first embraced at candlelight vigils. Investigators depicted her as the victim of a brutal assault. But her shifting and inconsistent accounts of what happened, combined with the absence of incriminating DNA evidence, have resulted in her being branded a false accuser.

But no one was more fully transformed in this case than Mr. Nifong. Once an obscure but respected career prosecutor, he is now routinely portrayed as having recklessly and stubbornly pursued a weak case for political gain.

Mr. Nifong compounded his troubles with seemingly avoidable blunders, most in the earliest weeks, before anyone was indicted. He ordered a lineup that violated standard police procedures. He spoke misleadingly in public about evidence in the case and disparaged the Duke lacrosse team as "hooligans" whose "daddies" would "buy them big-time lawyers." He refused to hear out defense lawyers who proffered photographs and phone records intended to prove their clients' innocence. Most significantly, he mishandled the DNA test results by failing to turn them over to defense lawyers for seven months.

After the indictments, he was repeatedly outgunned and outmaneuvered in the courts and in the news media by some of the best defense lawyers in North Carolina.

Never was the mismatch clearer than on Dec. 15, when defense lawyers pounced on his handling of the DNA test results. In court that day, with family and friends of the defendants in the audience, Mr. Nifong seemed almost disengaged, slumping in his seat, asking few questions as the defense team delivered body blows to his case.

Even before the DNA hearing, dozens of people had filed complaints against Mr. Nifong with the state bar. Mr. Nifong initially responded by saying he welcomed a review of all the lawyers — once the case was over.

He misjudged the bar.

A special section of the bar's ethics code applies to public comments by prosecutors — but not private lawyers — and the bar had opened an investigation on March 30, just three days after Mr. Nifong began his media blitz.

The investigation culminated in last month's formal complaint, which accused Mr. Nifong of making improper, inflammatory and misleading comments about the case. Mr. Nifong is to appear before a bar disciplinary committee on May 11.

Tom Lunsford, executive director of the state bar, said the complaint started with a grievance filed by a private lawyer.

Was it a lawyer from the defense team? "Can't say," he replied.

Nevertheless, no one can remember the North Carolina bar ever filing a complaint against a prosecutor for prejudicial publicity, much less in the middle of a case.

Not only did Mr. Nifong misjudge the bar, he misjudged the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys. Back in September, the conference had sent Mr. Nifong a letter offering help with the case, including support staff, a shadow jury and advice on responding to defense leaks.

"We try to take care of our own," Thomas J. Keith, one of four district attorneys who signed the letter, said in an interview this month. Mr. Keith recalled Mr. Nifong's response: "Tom, thanks for the letter, but I don't need any help right now."

As the public criticism of Mr. Nifong escalated, his fellow district attorneys began to hear rumblings that some state legislators were threatening to seek new oversight laws for all district attorneys. The DNA revelations on Dec. 15 only heightened their alarm.

On Dec. 19, several district attorneys met with Mr. Nifong and advised him to hand the case to a special prosecutor.

He had hoped they would stand together; instead they wanted him to pull out. Mr. Nifong was stunned.

Any hope he had of regaining their support probably ended three days later, on Dec. 22, when Mr. Nifong dropped rape charges against all three defendants, though he continued to press other sex offense charges. Mr. Nifong said he had acted after the woman told his investigator she could not be certain she had been penetrated by a penis. Although he did not say so at the time, the woman also changed several other major aspects of her story during that interview, including that just two, not three, lacrosse players had taken part in the attack. The third, she said, had only stood by.

Among his peers, the questions were obvious: Why had he not closely questioned his victim months earlier? How could he pursue a case with such divergent accounts from the key witness? Where was the proof?

The state bar filed its complaint on Dec. 28. Better than anyone, the district attorneys understood its rarity and potential political significance.

“That is what pushed us into action,” Mr. Keith said.

Two weeks later, Mr. Nifong asked the state attorney general to take over the case.

Duke Lacrosse District Attorney Asks For Special Prosecutor In Sexual Assault Case (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) — As he aggressively pursued sexual assault charges against three Duke lacrosse players for nearly 10 months, Mike Nifong never wavered publicly in his commitment to take the oft-sensationalized case to trial.

But facing ethics charges that could lead to his disbarment, the Durham County district attorney quietly asked to be removed from the case Friday — faxing a letter to the state attorney general asking for a special prosecutor to take over the case that is sure to define his nearly three-decade career.

"His withdrawing from the case has nothing to do with how he feels about the merit of the case," Nifong's attorney, David Freedman, told the Associated Press. "He's disappointed he has to get out of the case. He likes to see things from beginning to end."

What comes next in the troubled prosecution of Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans will likely be determined by the lawyer appointed by State Attorney General Roy Cooper. His office declined to comment Friday night, but a spokeswoman said officials would speak with reporters Saturday.

"If he decides to take it, his staff is going to spend a significant amount of time to review the case files, interviewing the witnesses and making a determination on what is the proper process," said Peg Dorer, director of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys.

Dorer said that could take a month or more. Defense attorneys said they weren't worried about the prospect of such a delay, and instead cheered Nifong's decision to recuse himself.

"We've tried to cooperate with Mr. Nifong, and he's refused," said Joseph Cheshire, an attorney for Evans. "We look forward to working with whoever the new prosecutor is and we're confident that after that review is made, the case will be dismissed."

Under North Carolina law, only a district attorney can formally request a special prosecutor. The request can be made when there are potential conflicts of interest, when a case is particularly complex or when there are other unusual circumstances.

Once the ethics charges were filed, Nifong "had a conflict of interest with respect with the case," said Ron Sullivan, a criminal law professor at Yale University. "It's probably safe to say that Nifong felt that he couldn't be completely objective."

Nifong led the investigation into allegations a 28-year-old student at North Carolina Central University — hired to perform as a stripper — was gang-raped and beaten at a March 13 party thrown by Duke's highly ranked lacrosse team. His frequent interviews with news agencies in the early days of the case generated much scrutiny; at one point, he called the lacrosse team "a bunch of hooligans."

But as he started to hand over his evidence to the defense, the case appeared to unravel. Legal experts and observers have said it appears to be based only on the testimony of an accuser who has told wildly different versions of the alleged assault — a shifting story that led Nifong to drop rape charges on Dec. 22. The three players remain charged with sexual offense and kidnapping.

Last month, the North Carolina State Bar charged Nifong with violating four rules of professional conduct for making misleading and inflammatory comments about the athletes under suspicion. He faces penalties ranging from admonishment to removal from the bar.

"He feels as a result of the accusations against him that he would be a distraction and he wants to make sure the accuser receives a fair trial," said Freedman, who said Nifong met with the accuser this week to tell her of his decision.

"He still believes in the case," Freedman said. "He just believes his continued presence would hurt her."

2 Missing Boys Found Alive In Mo. Home (NSDY/AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 13, 2007

BEAUFORT, Mo. -- A 13-year-old boy who vanished from the gravel road near his home five days ago was found alive Friday about 60 miles away in a suburban St. Louis home, along with a 15-year-old boy missing since 2002, authorities said.

Sharp-eyed police and suspicions about a white truck led police to the Kirkwood apartment of Michael Devlin, 41, who has been charged with one count of first-degree kidnapping, Sheriff Gary Toelke said.

The sheriff said both boys appeared unharmed. William Ownby who goes by Ben, appeared somewhat dazed as he walked inside the sheriff's department, where he was reunited with his family who had been searching for him since Monday.

"His eyes lit up like silver dollars," said the boy's uncle, Loyd Bailie, who was escorted to the sheriff's department with Ben's parents. Everyone broke into tears and Ben's parents embraced him as tightly as they could, Bailie said.

The straight-A student and Boy Scout was last seen after he stepped off his school bus and ran toward his Beaufort home down a gravel road on Monday.

A friend who left the bus with the boy told authorities that after the two parted, he saw a small white pickup with a camper shell speeding away from where Ben had been walking.

Searchers on foot, horseback and all-terrain vehicles looked for Ben in the hilly area about 60 miles southwest of St. Louis.

Toelke said the break in the case came Thursday night. Kirkwood city police officers were serving a warrant on an apartment complex when they noticed a white truck matching the description of a vehicle authorities had been searching for in the Ownby investigation.

Kirkwood officers contacted the Franklin County Sheriff's Department and determined where the owner of the truck was and then searched Devlin's house.

Toelke said authorities found Ben and were surprised to find another boy who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck.

Hornbeck disappeared from his Richwoods in October 2002, when he was 11. He went for a bike ride and never returned.

Hornbeck's parents, Pam and Craig Akers, were reunited with their son, Toelke said.

Later, both boys were taken to SSM Cardinal Glennon Children's Hospital in St. Louis for evaluation. Hospital spokesman Bob Davidson said both were in good spirits.

"The boys were smiling and appeared very pleased to be with their families," Davidson said. "Obviously the families were incredibly tickled to have the boys back. It's a thrilling night."

Hornbeck's parents have devoted themselves to bringing missing people home since Hornbeck vanished over four years ago from his hometown 65 miles southwest of St. Louis.

His parents, dozens of volunteers and sniffer dogs searched for weeks. The couple set up a Web site and listened to anyone who offered a tip.

Craig Akers, Shawn's stepfather, quit his job as a software designer to devote his time to a foundation bearing his son's name. They depleted their savings, borrowed against their retirement and talked to psychics. The financial strain forced both of them back to work.

A retired police officer volunteered to work on the case until Shawn was found.

Even though so much time had passed, Pam Akers said her son is frozen in her memory as an 11-year-old boy.

DOJ_NMG_0116984

"It's been four years," she said on the anniversary of his disappearance last fall. "But for me, it's just been one long continuous day."

Toelke said authorities were still investigating the motive behind the abductions. Franklin County Prosecutor Robert Parks said more charges are likely to be filed.

"There are a lot of things we don't know right now," Toelke said.

Neighbor Rick Butler, 43, said the FBI came to his door Thursday night and showed a picture of Ben, asking if he had seen him. He said he had not. But he had seen a boy he now believes was Hornbeck.

He said he saw no evidence that the boy now believed to be Hornbeck was scared or trying to get away. He had seen Devlin and the teen pitch a tent in the courtyard.

"I didn't see or hear anything odd or unusual from the apartment," Butler said. "I just figured them for father and son."

Devlin worked at a local pizzeria and an overnight shift answering phones at a funeral home, the St. Louis Post Dispatch reported.

"He just acted like a relatively normal guy. Nothing unusual stuck out at me," his former landlord, Marvin Reid, told the newspaper.

Their Dreams Come True (SLPD)

By Kim Bell, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

UNION — Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby spent an ecstatic Saturday reuniting with family and friends as authorities intensified their investigation of the pizza parlor manager accused of kidnapping the boys.

Michael J. Devlin, 41, of Kirkwood is being held in lieu of $1 million bail, facing a single Franklin County charge of abducting Ben after the 13-year-old got off a school bus near his Beaufort home six days ago. Shawn, then 11, disappeared in 2002 from his Richwoods neighborhood, in Washington County, about 30 miles from Beaufort.

Further state and federal charges are possible.

Neither Shawn nor Ben was allowed Saturday to take questions or discuss the ordeal when they appeared in separate news conferences with their families.

"I feel like I'm in a dream," said Shawn's mother, Pam Akers, who had not seen her son since Oct. 6, 2002, when he left his Washington County home to visit a friend. "Only now it's a good dream, not the nightmare I've had for the last 4½ years."

At Ben's family news conference here at the Franklin County Courthouse, his mother, Doris Ownby, was asked to describe her reunion with her son.

"I didn't say anything," she said. "I grabbed him and held him."

Shawn clutched his mother's hands and laid his head on her shoulder as he entered the gymnasium of Richwoods Elementary, his former school, Saturday where 75 friends and neighbors waited to greet him.

Now 15, Shawn is of course taller than the 11-year-old who went missing, and he sports a piercing in his lower lip.

In a statement Saturday night, Devlin's family expressed gratitude for the "professionalism" the various agencies investigating the case demonstrated Friday.

"As parents, the Devlin family along with all compassionate people have prayed for the safe return of these young men to their loved ones — and yesterday those prayers were answered," said the statement, issued by the attorneys retained by the family, Ethan Corlija and Michael Kielty of Clayton. "Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed."

Portrait of a suspect

As Beaufort and Richwoods came to grips with the surreal events of Friday, conflicting portraits of the man sitting in the Franklin County Jail emerged.

At the Kirkwood Imo's where Devlin was a manager, co-workers remembered him as reliable and amiable. They said he often teased them.

Devlin was viewed far differently by neighbors at the nearby apartment complex where he lived, apparently with Hornbeck.

DOJ_NMG_0116985

They said another side of Devlin surfaced in a dispute last fall over a parking place that drew the attention of Kirkwood police.

"I warned my children to stay away from him," said Krista Jones, 25, a neighbor.

Corlija said he met with Devlin Friday at the Franklin County Jail. He described him as "very calm, soft-spoken, somewhat articulate and other than that polite, very polite."

Devlin will be arraigned this week on the kidnapping charge, Corlija said.

He would not discuss reports that Devlin had confessed to police.

Neighbors described the young man living with Devlin as a slightly withdrawn teenager who favored black clothing, and enjoyed video games, bicycle trips to Wal-Mart with a friend and, lately, the company of what may have been his girlfriend. They believed he was Devlin's son.

"He seemed like a troubled teen, but he seemed normal," Jones said.

Anatomy of an arrest

The case came together Thursday night when Kirkwood police, at the apartment complex on an unrelated case, saw the white Nissan pickup believed to have been used in Ben's abduction.

After police arrested Devlin Friday morning, authorities went to the apartment. The first FBI agent to enter saw a familiar face.

FBI Special Agent Roland Corvington said Ben Ownby had one question:

"Young Ben was sitting there and looked up … and said, 'Are you going to take me home?'"

The agent turned to the other youth, who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck.

Authorities said they don't yet know what happened in that apartment.

Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke and Washington County Sheriff Kevin Schroeder did not press the boys for details because they want to give them time to adjust to life with their families.

"I don't want to push it, shock him, where he feels he has to be defensive," Schroeder said of Shawn.

The sheriffs agreed they may need the help of a mental health professional in interviewing the boys.

Hornbeck's family said Saturday they want to let Shawn share details of the abduction at his own pace.

Ben and his family met with Franklin County investigators Saturday afternoon, according to an uncle, Loyd Bailie.

In the coming days and weeks, the boys and their families will be counseled by experts in the reunification of abducted children.

Being Ben

At the news conference here Saturday, Doris Ownby said she only reluctantly let Ben out of her sight since his return.

"He's Ben," she said. Her son, drawn in his father's tight embrace, smiled broadly throughout the 15-minute appearance before the media. "It's a little overwhelming for him," said Doris Ownby.

Even so, added Ben's dad, William, "You can't believe how good we're doing."

For the time being, William Ownby said, Devlin is not his family's concern.

"Our focus is on our son, we're not going to think about him," he said.

After four days spent away, his parents said Ben was happy to return to the routine of home.

When he finally broke free of his parent's embraces Friday night, Ben retreated to his room to play some of his favorite video games. It was after 1 a.m.

"Don't stay up too late," his mother said.

The first thing she did Saturday on awakening was check his room to make sure Ben was still there.

Missing Boys Found: Questions Accompany Elation VIDEO (KCS)

By Kevin Murphy

The Kansas City Star, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116986

Two kidnapped Missouri boys — one held for four years, the other for four days — emerged calm and smiling before the public Saturday, but questions remained about their captivity.

Authorities were mum on what Shawn Hornbeck, 15, and Ben Ownby, 13, went through at the hands of their alleged abductor, a suburban St. Louis pizza restaurant manager who had no apparent criminal record.

The euphoria of the last two days was evident Saturday as Shawn, Ben and their parents held nationally televised news conferences to recount their dramatic reunions after police found the boys unharmed Friday in a Kirkwood apartment.

Now comes the gritty process of piecing together the details of the almost unbelievable crime that thrust Shawn and Ben into the national spotlight and will keep them there for months to come.

Troubling and potentially embarrassing questions must be asked. Psychological wounds must heal. Foremost in many minds is how an abductor could have held Shawn captive four years despite an intense search that included the placement of posters around Kirkwood.

"It's just mind-boggling that it was so easy to hide someone in plain sight," said Craig Akers, Shawn's stepfather. "It's hard to believe anyone could be that brazen."

Akers said Shawn told him Friday that he saw one poster on a bench in a neighborhood supermarket — and he didn't like the picture.

Both boys were abducted in rural areas southwest of St. Louis — Shawn on Oct. 6, 2002, in Washington County and Ben on Monday in Franklin County. Michael Devlin, 41, is being held on a kidnapping charge as the investigation continues.

"We still have quite a bit of work to do on Mr. Devlin," said Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke.

Police found the boys unharmed after officers spotted a pickup truck at Devlin's apartment building that matched one seen when Ben was abducted.

Pam Akers called the recovery of her son, Shawn, "a miracle."

"We have a lot of catching up do," she said. "He has grown up on me, that's for sure."

Shawn was 11 when he was abducted while riding his bike.

Craig Akers said Shawn came home Friday to find his clothes in his dresser just the way he left them four years ago.

"I guess we are going to have to get rid of those and find some new ones," Akers said.

Doris Ownby said she and her husband, William Ownby Sr., had not talked to Ben about his captivity. Ben was kidnapped after getting off his school bus, authorities said.

"We are just excited and happy to have him home," Doris Ownby said. "We grabbed him and didn't let him go."

Neither boy spoke at his family's news conference. The events were held about two hours apart Saturday morning. Each boy smiled often and hugged his parents.

Rick Butler, who lives in an apartment building next to Devlin's, told The Kansas City Star on Saturday that he often would see Devlin in the parking lot and would occasionally see Shawn. Butler said he once saw the two pitch a tent on the building's lawn. He assumed they were father and son.

"It made me think they were getting ready for a camping trip," Butler said.

Butler said that about a year ago he found a cell phone on the ground that turned out to be Devlin's. Shawn went to Butler's apartment to pick it up.

"He just came over and said thanks," Butler said. "He seemed a little nervous but didn't act like there was anything terribly wrong." Butler said he now wonders why the boy didn't say, "I'm in trouble, this guy is keeping me over there. Call for help."

Craig Akers said Shawn did not go to school during the four years he was missing. Kirkwood district spokeswoman Ginger Fletcher said that school officials had no indication that neighbors called to check on why Shawn was not in class. Fletcher said that an adult would not have needed approval to homeschool Shawn but would have had to prove he was if anyone investigated.

Authorities would not say Saturday what they knew about either boy's captivity.

Psychological experts contacted by The Star on Saturday said an abductor could use many techniques to exert control.

Grace Ketterman, a noted Kansas City psychiatrist, compared the experience to the Stockholm syndrome, a condition in which captives begin to identify with or become sympathetic to their captors.

"When kids are abducted, they may be threatened severely," Ketterman said. "The person who kidnaps them may use brainwashing techniques. They can really convince the child he belongs to them."

The exertion of control can be so great that the child may be convinced not to talk with playmates or strangers and may even ignore his own picture on a bus-stop poster.

Ketterman said that many times the child is told that if he tries to escape, his family will be killed.

The control can be even stronger if there also is sexual abuse. Sex can be "a powerful force" over a child, she said.

Ketterman said that helping children who have lived a long time with an abductor can require intense therapy for the child and family. Parents must be patient because it can take time to rekindle family bonds and the child may have long-term trouble with self-identity.

David Barker, an Overland Park therapist, said that sometimes the child reaches a point where he feels safe with his kidnapper and won't seek help.

Barker said it will be an "emotional and difficult task to integrate the kid (Shawn) back into the family, even if that is possible." That could require therapy to help the family deal with feelings of guilt, anger, insecurity and uncertainty.

"Parents may feel guilty about letting this happen to their child. They may feel ashamed that everyone knows about it. For the kid, there may be the feeling, 'Why didn't my parents come and get me?' "

The reunion of the family can be traumatic.

Barker said that Shawn might feel the same as a soldier returning from war. The family may have adjusted to his absence.

Craig Akers said Saturday that he had not discussed the captivity with Shawn.

"That will come in due time, and when Shawn is ready to discuss it, we will," Akers said.

Devlin's family released a statement Saturday expressing their gratitude to local authorities and the FBI "for their professionalism in safely reuniting Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck with their families," according to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch's Web site.

"Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed," said the statement, released through a law firm.

Devlin, by most accounts, seemed an unlikely suspect in a kidnapping. Besides working as an assistant manager for an Imo's Pizza restaurant near his home, he worked two late-night shifts each week taking phone calls at Bopp Chapel, a Kirkwood funeral home.

"He was prompt, well-mannered and efficient in receiving calls," the funeral home's operators said in a statement Saturday. Funeral director Matt Shockley called Devlin quiet and said Devlin never talked about his personal life.

Andrew Habben of Kirkwood said he was surprised so few people in the tight-knit community of 26,000 seemed to know Devlin or Shawn.

"It goes to show you that you never know. Everyone's got their own life," Habben said.

Devlin is scheduled to make his first court appearance this week in Franklin County on a charge of kidnapping Ben Ownby, but other charges are possible, Prosecutor Bob Parks said. Washington County, where Shawn Hornbeck's family lives, has not filed charges.

The FBI also may file charges, based on evidence recovered from Devlin's apartment, agent Roland Corvington said at a Saturday news conference.

Corvington said that when FBI agents entered Devlin's apartment Friday, Ben asked them, "Are you going to take me home?" They then asked Shawn to identify himself.

"After that, it was quite euphoric, obviously," Corvington said.

The boys' parents said Saturday that they hope their sons' safe return gives hope to the families of other kidnap victims.

"Good things can happen," Craig Akers said. "Things don't always end badly."

Elation Greets Recovery Of 2 Boys After Abduction (NYT)

By Malcolm Gay

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

UNION, Mo., Jan. 13 — On Thursday evening, they were captives in the same tiny two-bedroom apartment in suburban St. Louis. Abducted four years apart, William Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck were freed on Friday, and they smiled sheepishly on Saturday as their families held back-to-back news conferences to discuss their boys' astonishing rescue.

Dressed in a checked shirt, blue jeans and a pair of oval glasses, William, 13, who is known as Ben, was instructed not to speak to reporters. Looking up occasionally, Ben clung close to his family as they rejoiced at the turn of events.

"We're just ecstatic," Ben's mother, Doris Ownby, said. "We don't want to let him go out of our sight."

Sheriff Gary Toelke of Franklin County said the kidnapping suspect, Michael Devlin, 41, had confessed, but added that he could not discuss details of the investigation.

Robert Parks, the Franklin County prosecuting attorney, has charged Mr. Devlin, a pizzeria manager, with one count of first-degree kidnapping. He was being held on $1 million bond.

Emotions ran high in neighboring Washington County, where Shawn entered the balloon-festooned gymnasium at Richwoods Elementary, his old school. Wearing a blue hooded sweatshirt and sporting a shaggy head of hair and pierced lower lip, Shawn grasped his mother's hands. Also told not to speak to reporters, he laid his head on his mother's shoulder as she spoke.

"I still feel like I'm in a dream, only this time it's a good dream, not the nightmare I've had to live for the past four-and-a-half years," his mother, Pam Akers, told reporters.

Shawn's stepfather, Craig Akers, said he and his wife had been in disbelief when they were all reunited.

"There was that split second of shock," Mr. Akers said. "Once I saw the face, I said, 'Oh my God, that's my son.' "

Shawn, now 15, vanished on Oct. 6, 2002, when he was 11. His parents reported that he had last been seen wearing a Little League jersey as he rode a bicycle to a friend's house in Richwoods, Mo., a rural town about 65 miles southwest of St. Louis.

Ben, a Boy Scout and a straight-A student, disappeared on Monday afternoon after stepping off a school bus and running down a gravel road toward home in the rural town of Beaufort, Mo., about 60 miles west of St. Louis.

Ben's disappearance prompted an intense search of hilly Franklin County. Investigators said they had been following about 500 leads in the case, though they had focused on a tip from one of Ben's friends who had reported seeing a dilapidated white pickup with a camper shell speeding away from the place where Ben disappeared.

"Basically, that's all we had," Sheriff Toelke said.

Investigators got a break on Thursday when Kirkwood police officers, Gary Wagster and Chris Nelson, arrived at Mr. Devlin's apartment complex in suburban St. Louis. They were serving a warrant in an unrelated case but noticed a small white truck matching the description of the one in the Ownby investigation.

After questioning Mr. Devlin at the pizzeria, officers searched his ground-floor apartment on Friday.

Sheriff Toelke said Shawn identified himself to officers as having been missing for four-and-a-half-years when they entered the home.

Roland Corvington, special agent for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, told reporters that when officers entered the apartment, Ben asked: "Are you going to take me home?"

The boys had no visible injuries. Ben's parents said that on Friday night he was eager to play video games and go to bed.

Mr. Devlin, who managed an Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, also worked part-time answering phones overnight at Bopp Chapel funeral home there.

"He was prompt, well-mannered and very efficient," Jim Moyers, a funeral director at Bopp Chapel, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0116989

Neighbors who lived across from Mr. Devlin's run-down red brick apartment were less generous. They described Mr. Devlin as an immense, bearded man with wire-rimmed glasses who kept to himself. They said that he did not appear to have been keeping secrets, but that he was combative and antisocial.

One neighbor, Mario Emanuel, 29, said that about three months ago Mr. Devlin called the police on a visitor who took his parking space.

Referring to Shawn, Mr. Emanuel, an installation technician for DirecTV, said, "When the police came, they talked to Devlin and the son — who turned out not to be the son — they talked to the police. If they would have investigated across the board, they would have had him."

Tom Ballman, a Kirkwood police officer, confirmed that Mr. Devlin had summoned the police to the apartment complex, a two-story working-class enclave in the otherwise well-to-do suburb.

Another neighbor said her husband had also had tense encounters with Mr. Devlin over the space.

"The parking spot thing was weird," the neighbor, Krista Jones, said. "He woke us up one night because he was honking in the parking lot at like 2 o'clock in the morning. Someone had parked in his space."

"My husband almost beat him up," she added.

Ms. Jones said that Mr. Devlin kept the blinds drawn, though she would occasionally see Shawn riding his bike in the evening and that the boy was occasionally visited by what appeared to be a friend and a girlfriend.

A check of Mr. Devlin's name with the Missouri Highway Patrol's sex-offender registry turned up nothing. And a search of Missouri court records revealed no criminal history.

Mr. Parks declined to divulge information about how the boys had spent their time in captivity, but added that more charges were likely to come. "It's my hope that he never sees the outside of jail in his natural life," Mr. Parks said.

Mr. Corvington of the F.B.I. said his agency was also looking into federal charges.

For the time being, though, the families said they were more interested in reconnecting with their rescued sons than worrying about Mr. Devlin's fate.

"We've got a lot of catching up to do," said a tearful Pam Akers, marveling at her teenage son's growth. "He's grown up on me, that's for sure."

Case Of Missing Boys Stands Out (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 13, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo. (AP) — For more than four years, Shawn Hornbeck seemed to have had every chance to escape, left alone for hours to ride his bike, play video games and walk past missing-child posters showing his own age-progressed image.

But mental health experts say this troubling case is hardly so simple, and that Hornbeck was likely kept mentally shackled by terror and domination from the man accused of kidnapping him, 41-year-old Michael Devlin.

"I think it's a real mistake to judge this child. Whatever he did to this point to stay alive is to his credit," said Terri Weaver, an associate psychology professor at Saint Louis University.

Weaver, an expert on post traumatic stress disorder, said children in such situations kick into survival mode, "doing what needs to be done to keep yourself going day-to-day."

Devlin, a 300-pound pizza parlor manager, is accused of abducting Hornbeck four years ago when the slight boy, taken as he was riding his bike, was just 11. Now a gangly 15-year-old with floppy hair and a pierced lip, he was found by surprise Friday when police acting on a tip went to Devlin's modest-two-bedroom apartment in this St. Louis suburb to rescue 13-year-old Ben Ownby, who had been snatched four days earlier on his way home from school.

Now investigators are piecing together the details of Hornbeck's captivity and Ownby's abduction, trying to discover how the boys could have been kept captive in an apartment where neighbors often heard banging, shouting and arguing.

Internet profiles posted as far back as two years ago that were created using pictures of Hornbeck emerged over the weekend when a blog mentioned them. A Kirkwood detective said Sunday that he had heard about the profiles but didn't know what role they might be playing in the investigation.

A Yahoo user homepage belonging to "xxdevildevlinxx" was created in April 2004 and shows a partial picture of a boy, strongly resembling recent photos of Hornbeck, with an eyebrow piercing. On Saturday, the boy had a lip ring and three ear piercings.

Another Yahoo profile using the same picture is registered to an "mdevlin" in Kirkwood, Mo.

A website called the True Crime Blog mentioned the pages this weekend.

Residents in Hornbeck's hometown of Richwoods were shocked the boy could have so much contact with the outside world but remain at his captor's side — refusing to flee even as Devlin worked two jobs that forced him to leave Hornbeck and, later, Ownby, alone.

Weaver said repeated contact with outsiders can actually reinforce an abducted child's sense of helplessness.

"Over time, your safety has been threatened. You are a child. You may have been traumatized in other ways. You may feel helpless to reach out to other people," she said.

The case is reminiscent of the Elizabeth Smart kidnapping. The Salt Lake City teen was taken for nine months by a religious zealot and passed up several chances to escape.

Stephen Golding, a forensic psychologist who examined the suspect in the Smart case, said captors often establish control over their victims through fear.

"People are led to believe, through someone taking advantage of their vulnerabilities, that leaving is not an option, that things will get worse for them or will get worse for others," Golding said.

Neighbors describe Devlin as a loner with a quick temper. He obsessed over a reserved parking space at his apartment complex.

Rob Bushelle, who lives in Devlin's complex, said he made that mistake last fall. Devlin arrived in his white pickup with an adolescent boy in his passenger seat, whom Bushelle now recognizes as Hornbeck. Devlin became furious and began shouting at Bushelle, demanding he move. Bushelle refused, and Devlin called police.

While Devlin spoke with officers, Hornbeck got out of Devlin's truck and walked into the building, Bushelle said.

Devlin was raised in the St. Louis suburb of Webster Groves. His family released a statement Saturday praising law enforcement agencies for returning Ownby and Hornbeck to their families. Devlin's relatives said they prayed for Ownby's safe return when they learned last week he was kidnapped, and said "the past few days have been incredibly difficult.

"Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed."

Devlin's childhood neighbors told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Devlin was adopted and one of six children.

Sarah Sullivan described him as a quiet child in an otherwise outgoing family. He was always big for his age and avoided sports. He had a hot temper and spent a lot of time in his room, she said.

Devlin got a job at Imo's Pizza when he was in high school. He never left the pizza parlor over the years. He has no apparent criminal past, except for a pair of traffic fines, officials said.

"He's smarter than most people, so he liked to be a smart aleck," co-worker Gus Nanos told the newspaper.

"In his calmer moments, he would be an incredibly nice and thoughtful person," Nanos said.

Co-workers noticed that Devlin became more withdrawn in 2002, the year Hornbeck was abducted. That was also the year Devlin, a diabetic, had a toe amputated.

"He went from being such a teaser to a much quieter person. I felt like he had been humbled by all of his health problems," Nanos said.

Devlin was being held Sunday in the Franklin County jail in lieu of $1 million bail and is charged with first-degree kidnapping.

It was unclear Sunday whether Devlin had a lawyer. Jail officials would not comment, and the county public defender's office was closed.

DOJ_NMG_0116991

Police say Devlin drove his pickup to Beaufort, Mo., Monday and kidnapped Ownby. A witness spotted his truck and its description was broadcast in an Amber Alert.

Kirkwood police officers Gary Wagster and Chris Nelson spotted the truck Thursday night outside Devlin's apartment.

"Are you seeing what I'm seeing?" Wagster asked Nelson, according to the Post-Dispatch.

A neighbor said the truck belonged to Devlin, and the officers saw him leave his apartment to empty his trash into a trash bin. They questioned Devlin in the parking lot, and he was friendly and cooperative.

Devlin's demeanor quickly changed when the officers started asking him specific questions, Wagster said. He became agitated and defensive.

"It was a total 180 degrees from where he was," Wagster said.

The Kirkwood officers remained outside the apartment all night, and watched as Devlin left the apartment in the morning.

FBI agents and Franklin County sheriff's deputies arrested Devlin at his job the next day, Wagster said.

A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said that FBI agents went to Imo's Pizza, where Devlin was a manager, and that the suspect revealed details giving agents probable cause to arrest him and search his apartment. They then found the boys, said the source, who refused to be identified because he was unauthorized to speak publicly about the case.

The families of both boys have refused to comment beyond a pair of news conferences they held Saturday, during which the boys were told not to talk to reporters. Lawyers for the families did not answer phone calls to their offices Sunday.

2 Missing Boys Are Found Near St. Louis (NYT)

By Patrick Mcgeehan

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

When the police entered an apartment near St. Louis yesterday looking for a 13-year-old boy who had disappeared 60 miles away on Monday, they found him and a bonus: another Missouri teenager who had been missing for more than four years.

Officers found William Ownby, who vanished after stepping off a school bus in Beaufort on Monday afternoon, and Shawn Hornbeck, a 15-year-old who was last seen riding a bicycle near his home in Richwoods in October 2002, inside the rental apartment, in Kirkwood, Mo.

Sheriff Gary Toelke of Franklin County told reporters that both boys appeared dazed but unharmed.

Officers arrested Michael Devlin, 41, who lived in the apartment, and charged him with one count of first-degree kidnapping. Mr. Devlin was being held on $1 million bond.

Robert Parks, the prosecuting attorney of Franklin County, told reporters that Mr. Devlin had confessed to the crime and added that more charges were likely to be filed in the case.

Sheriff Toelke said officers were questioning Mr. Devlin, who worked as a pizza-delivery dispatcher and on the overnight shift in a funeral home, to try to determine a motive behind the abductions. Mr. Devlin's name was not found in a check of the Missouri Highway Patrol's registry of sex offenders. Similarly, a search of Missouri court records revealed no criminal history.

In Beaufort, family and friends of William, a Boy Scout known as Ben, had been conducting a full-scale search yesterday for the boy. He was last seen dashing home from the school bus on Monday. A schoolmate told the authorities that he saw a dilapidated white pickup truck with a camper shell speeding away from the spot.

An intense hunt ensued in rural Franklin County. Members of the Ownby family appeared on television to make tearful appeals for the boy's return. Community members plastered fliers throughout the area and ventured out on foot, horseback and all-terrain vehicles looking for clues.

The break in the case came Thursday evening when two Kirkwood police officers, out to serve a warrant at the apartment complex where Mr. Devlin lived, spotted a white truck that matched the description, Sheriff Toelke said. The blocklong single-story complex is just off Interstate 44 near a collection of industrial buildings.

The Kirkwood police contacted the Franklin County Sheriff's Department, located Mr. Devlin's address and returned the next day to find Ben and, to their surprise, Shawn Hornbeck, in the apartment, he said.

Sheriff Toelke said that Shawn identified himself to officers when they entered the home. He had disappeared on Oct. 6, 2002, when he was 11. His parents had reported him missing after he rode to a friend's house on a lime-green mountain bike wearing a Little League jersey but never arrived.

Ben, who was wearing a red shirt and jeans yesterday, appeared somewhat dazed when he was reunited with his family around 5 p.m. at the sheriff's office, Sheriff Toelke said. He added that Shawn's parents were coming to meet their son at the same location.

"There are a lot of things we don't know right now," he said.

At Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, where Mr. Devlin worked, a manager declined to comment. At the Bopp Chapel, where he worked the overnight shift, Susan Waterman, a funeral director, declined to comment on the situation, saying the chapel would release a statement today.

Boy Had Web Access, Apparent Profiles (NSDY/AP)

By Jim Salter, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 13, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo. -- Internet postings and online profiles overlooked during teenager Shawn Hornbeck's four years in captivity may become clues now that he's free.

While his alleged kidnapper was at work, Shawn or someone pretending to be him put photos of him online and posted a chilling message on a site created by his desperate parents: "How long are you planning to look for your son?"

The postings, along with others, came to light after Shawn's rescue from an apartment in Kirkwood last week. Since then, Web users have discovered a profile at mindviz.com, and online comments have flooded in.

"Welcome home Shawn," wrote one of the nearly 40,000 visitors to Shawn's site on Monday. "I have prayed for you and I know many others have as well. Glad you are safe and healthy."

Investigators would not comment on the postings, and it was not immediately known if they were, in fact, created by Shawn or by someone else. Either way, they add to the long list of clues that no one seemed to pick up on during the 4 1/2 years that the boy was missing.

Shawn, now 15, was 11 when he was kidnapped in 2002 while riding his bike near his rural home. Astonished police found him Friday in a suburban St. Louis apartment where they also discovered 13-year-old Ben Ownby, who had been missing for four days.

Their alleged abductor, Michael Devlin, a 41-year-old pizza shop employee who also held a job answering telephones at night at a funeral home, was jailed on $1 million bail. So far, he is charged in the kidnapping of Ben, but authorities expect to charge him with abducting Shawn.

Neither boy has spoken publicly about what happened, but in an interview with the Ownby family to be broadcast Tuesday on NBC's "Today" show, Ben thanked a classmate who gave police the tip they needed to find him, the description of a white pickup truck.

"Thank you for being such a great big help in this entire thing," Ben said.

Investigators have given no motive for the crime and no details on what the boys went through. Officials said Devlin did not appear to have a criminal record. Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he has not seen any evidence and will enter a not guilty plea at an arraignment later this week.

Many mysteries remain about Shawn. He appeared to have ample opportunity to flee or call for help. Devlin's two jobs often took him away from the modest two-bedroom apartment they shared, which had a landline phone and a cell phone, as well as a computer.

A series of Web postings, some under the name "Shawn Devlin," have raised questions about whether he was trying to send clues about his real identity.

At 1:59 a.m. on Dec. 1, 2005, a "Shawn Devlin" asked in a forum on the Shawn Hornbeck Foundation Web site: "How long are you planing (sic) to look for your son?" Shawn's parents, Craig and Pam Akers, started the foundation to help find their son and other missing youngsters.

Later that same day, at 2:56 p.m., Shawn Devlin wrote to ask if he could compose a poem for the family. The poem never appeared in future postings.

Other Web profiles also appeared to be of Shawn, including the profile on mindviz.com, which described "Shawn" as a single atheist with a pet cat living in Kirkwood.

Dr. Juliet Francis, a clinical psychologist and consultant for the National Center For Missing and Exploited Children, said it is not unusual for a bond to develop between an abductor and the child.

"It developed when someone feels that their life is being threatened, but they aren't killed," she said.

Some neighbors said they never saw Shawn with books or a backpack. Neighbor Krista Jones, a stay-at-home mom, noticed Shawn wearing black clothes and piercings in his ear and lip. She said she figured he was either a dropout or attended an alternative school.

Larry Douglas said his younger brother, Tony, and Shawn were best friends and often went skateboarding and biking. He said Tony had no idea of Shawn's real identity. Larry Douglas said his family was not allowing his brother to speak to reporters.

Before Tony Douglas' family made him unavailable to the media, he told Fox News that on three occasions, police stopped the two for being out beyond curfew. Officers gave the boys a lift home, unaware of Shawn's real identity, Tony said.

Tony sometimes spent the night at Shawn's apartment, but rarely spoke with Devlin. Larry Douglas said his brother saw no indication of abuse, or clues that Shawn was a captive.

"He just hopes to see his friend again," Douglas said. "He's happy for Shawn."

Officials Are Mum, Move Methodically To Seek Answers (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler And Aisha Sultan, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

Klm Evans, owner and operator of Bardenheier Wine Cellars in Richwoods, talks with Shawn Hornbeck's grandmother Sunday at the restaurant. Evans has taken on the unofficial role of media organizer and family go-between for the Akers family.

(Jerry Naunheim Jr./P-D)

With Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby safe at home with their families, authorities on Sunday turned to their next most pressing task — getting some answers.

Exactly how did the two teens end up in the Kirkwood apartment of pizzeria manager Michael J. Devlin?

What were his intentions for them? Did he harm them? And why did Shawn stay with him for 4 1/2 years, apparently posing as his son, while his real family pleaded for his return?

Investigators interviewed both boys Saturday, but the public will have to wait for any insight into the ordeals they faced. Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke said Sunday that he could not disclose anything that was discussed.

Devlin remained at the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail on a charge of kidnapping Ben. Authorities said they expect to set an arraignment on Tuesday.

Washington County Sheriff Kevin Schroeder said he expected criminal charges to be filed Wednesday or Thursday in Shawn's case.

"We're plotting our course, taking our time, formulating the right questions," he said.

This morning, the uncle of a 13-year-old boy rescued four days after he was snatched on his way home from school said on Monday that no one is pushing the boy to talk about his ordeal.

Ownby's uncle told CBS' "Early Show" today that the boy was talking only with FBI counselors.

"No one's pushing him at this point to answer these questions," said the uncle, Loyd Bailie. "The biggest concern right now is all of the media coverage ... that somebody's going to ask the wrong question." But Bailie added, "At this point, everyone has been very respectful of Ben and his family."

Kidnapping Suspect's Co-Workers Stunned (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo., Jan. 15 — Behind the counter at Imo's, a pizzeria on one of the main strips in this affluent suburb southwest of St. Louis, the cooks and cleaners have a penchant for joking around. So when they realized that a kidnapping suspect in the area had a vehicle that matched the description of the manager's white pickup truck, they had a few rounds of fun with it.

"The guys noticed the similarities immediately," Mike Prosperi, Imo's owner, said Monday. "People were joking about it because no one thought it could possibly be him. He was just too nice a guy."

Everybody had a good laugh except the manager himself, Michael Devlin, 41, who was later apprehended near the kitchen where he had worked, by all accounts, as a model employee since age 15. Mr. Devlin was arrested Friday and charged with one count of kidnapping; he is being held on $1 million bail. The authorities said that he had confessed, and that more charges were likely.

The police had spotted the white truck outside Mr. Devlin's apartment, and inside the apartment on Friday, officers found a 13-year-old boy, William Ownby, known as Ben, who had disappeared just days earlier, and, even more to their surprise, a 15-year-old boy, Shawn Hornbeck, who had been missing for more than four years from his home in a rural town about 60 miles from Kirkwood. Both boys had no visible injuries and have been reunited with their parents in what some are calling the Missouri Miracle.

Mr. Devlin, not known as one to take vacation or sick days, had been at work on Thursday and Friday, not watching over either boy. He even mentioned to Mr. Prosperi that the authorities were bothering him, snooping around his apartment building.

Mr. Prosperi said he told Mr. Devlin on Friday morning that he should cooperate, as there must have been some sort of mix-up. But things changed as soon as the Federal Bureau of Investigation showed up to take Mr. Devlin away.

"The situation looks pretty grave," Mr. Prosperi said.

In minutes, Mr. Devlin went from unassuming and good-natured pizza cook to accused mastermind child abductor — and the people who were most surprised were among those who knew him best. "Everything is so shocking because it's completely out of character," Mr. Prosperi said. "I still can't believe I'm sitting here talking about this."

But perhaps what has confounded people around here most is how Mr. Devlin managed to keep the older of the boys, Shawn, under his control. Neighbors who knew the two said it appeared that Shawn had a considerable amount of freedom.

He was often seen playing with a close friend in the courtyard of the apartment. He seemed to love bikes, skateboarding and computer games. Some neighbors assumed he was a dropout. They thought nothing of his being around all day, not in school.

And, they said, Mr. Devlin certainly did not behave like a man in hiding. He called the police a few months ago to report someone who had parked in his assigned spot. He was known as a stickler for the rules.

"We've always known him as the dad," said Mario Emanuel, a neighbor. "That's how they walked; that's how they talked. The kid even used his truck every once in a while."

"Shawn was out every day in the evening riding his bike," Mr. Emanuel added. "He seemed like a cool kid."

No one knows why Shawn did not use the truck or his bike to leave, but it is the question that everyone wants answered. He may have had access to a cellphone. The Associated Press reported that a neighbor found a cellphone outside the apartment last fall and when he dialed the number on it, Shawn came to retrieve it.

Shawn may even have had Internet access. Someone calling himself Shawn Devlin posted a guestbook entry on Dec. 1 to a Web site run by Shawn Hornbeck's parents that asked, "How long are you planning to look for your son?"

Within minutes there was another message: "Hey sorry about that last thing I put on there. I write poems and I was wondering if it would be O.K. to write a poem for the Hornbeck family."

The messages have not been verified as authentic, however, and the F.B.I., which had been assisting with the search for Shawn for years, would not comment on them.

"There's a lot of work still to be done and a lot of questions to be answered," said Peter Krusing, the spokesman for the F.B.I. in the bureau's St. Louis field office.

Law enforcement officials have released few details. The boys' parents did not return calls for comment, nor did the local prosecutor. Mr. Devlin could be arraigned on the kidnapping charge, which involves only the younger boy at this point, as early as Tuesday. Detective Michael Bales of the Kirkwood Police Department said officers had been summoned to Mr. Devlin's apartment complex once or twice a month — occasionally at Mr. Devlin's request.

"He was kind of a nondescript guy," said Detective Bales, who often went to Imo's for pizza. "This is a small community. You see the same people over and over. He was one of them. He was kind of a fixture."

The squat, two-story apartment complex has become a local attraction, with cars approaching slowly so passengers can get a glimpse and take pictures.

People have also taken out some of their anger on Imo's and Mr. Prosperi. "This morning when I came in people tried to throw rocks through the front window," he said. "Friday night I got calls saying: 'Why on earth didn't you do a background check? You hired a sex predator.' "

Mr. Prosperi continued: "Mike had no history. No history of this sort of thing at all."

EXCLUSIVE: Indictment Changes In Bakersfield Military Secrets Case (BFLDC)

By Jessica Logan, Californian staff writer

The Bakersfield Californian, January 13, 2007

A Bakersfield business owner gave military secrets and equipment to Yemen as an agent of that country, a new indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office alleges.

Amen Ahmed Ali, 56, of Bakersfield was escorted to vehicles by law enforcement officials from the District Attorney's building on 18th Street in Bakersfield last August after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Theresa Goldner.

Amen Ahmed Ali purchased what he believed were secret U.S. government documents and military equipment and shipped them to Yemen as an agent of the Yemeni government from 2005 to 2006, according to the indictment filed Thursday.

Ali was previously charged with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but he was not previously charged with doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller.

Under the new indictment, Ali is charged with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, attempted unlawful export of defense articles, conspiracy to gather, possess and transmit defense information and gathering defense information.

The new charges ratchet up the number of years Ali faces in prison from 30 to 45.

Ali's attorney, David Torres, said the new charges are not true. They were filed to block Ali's release from custody as he awaits trial, Torres said. The attorney cobbled together more than $1 million in assets to secure Ali's return to court if the judge releases him; Torres will make a request to release him Tuesday.

Faller said this is not true. He said further investigation since Ali's September arrest gave rise to the new charges.

The U.S. Attorney's office has since learned that Ali organized a Bakersfield branch of a Yemeni government-run organization known as the National Association of Yemeni Immigrants after being a member and at times the president of the Delano branch, according to the new indictment.

He received instructions from the Yemeni government from as far back as 1987, according to the indictment.

Since then, Ali acted as an agent of the Yemeni government when he directed the divorce of two other people in 2000 and ordered the arrest of another individual in 2002 when that person returned to Yemen, the indictment alleges.

Ali's friend Hifthallah Alrowhany said Faller has mischaracterized Ali and the National Association of Yemeni Immigrants.

"We know this man forever," Alrowhany said. "He is a family man."

He said Ali would never have reason to hurt the U.S. government.

Alrowhany also said the association is not run by Yemen. Rather it helps immigrants who have difficulty with the Yemeni government.

"We (in the Yemeni community) have disputes and the association acts as a mediator," said Alrowhany, who is also a member of the association.

Faller believes Ali and others helped to transport and sell the U.S. military goods. Ibrahim A. Omer is indicted with transporting these goods and Mohamed al-Rahimi is indicted with conspiracy to possess stolen government property. Their charges have not changed.

Omer faces 15 years in prison and is out of custody on bail.

Al-Rahimi faces five years in prison, but the government has been unable to find him.

Authorities launched an investigation into Ali after a U.S. Customs officer discovered boxes addressed to Yemen full of bullet-proof vests, chemical protective suits and U.S. military equipment in 2003, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

The federal government never found out who supplied Ali with the goods, but sent an undercover agent in 2004 to offer Ali stolen military property.

Through this connection, Ali acquired what he believed were stolen military secrets and tried to ship them to Yemen. He also bought and ordered the shipment of military laptop computers, night vision goggles and ballistic vests to Yemen, according to the indictment.

Then, al-Rahimi allegedly flew to Yemen to sell property in late 2005. Al-Rahimi called Ali from Yemen to discuss the sale and Ali faxed a sheet with prices for the military equipment to Yemen in early 2006, according to the indictment.

Ali and Omer are expected to return to federal court in Fresno Tuesday to discuss the new indictment, Ali's bail and other issues.

Bakersfield Man Accused Of Being Yemeni Secret Agent (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 13, 2007

BAKERSFIELD – A Bakersfield man acted as a Yemeni spy when he shipped what he believed were secret U.S. military secrets and equipment to Yemen, an indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office states.

Amen Ahmed Ali, Bakersfield businessman, purchased what he believed were secret documents and military equipment and shipped them to Yemen from 2005 to 2006, according to the indictment filed Thursday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said Ali was charged previously with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but that the new charges state he was doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government.

The new indictment charges Ali with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, among other charges.

Ali faces a possible 30 t0 45 years in prison if convicted of all counts.

Ali's attorney, David Torres, disputed the new charges and said they were filed to block Ali's release from custody as he awaits trial.

The U.S. Attorney's Office launched an investigation into Ali after a U.S. Customs officer discovered boxes addressed to Yemen full of bulletproof vests, chemical protective suits and U.S. military equipment in 2003.

Amateur Sleuthing Lands Grisham In Real-Life Court (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

He's a lawyer. He's a best-selling author. Now he's The Client.

The Virginia Supreme Court ruled yesterday that John Grisham must face a jury for his actions in a real-life whodunit.

Grisham, author of "The Pelican Brief," "The Firm" and "The Runaway Jury," among other bestsellers, lives outside Charlottesville. His son attended the private St. Anne's-Belfield School, where he played baseball for Alan Swanson, the head coach. Grisham and Swanson became friends, according to court papers, and Grisham is on the school's board of trustees.

In 1996, Swanson's wife, Donna Swanson, began receiving harassing anonymous letters, which included allegations that her husband was cheating on her, according to the ruling. Grisham also received an anonymous letter.

In 1998, according to a lawsuit, "Grisham was intrigued by the idea of trying to 'get to the bottom' of who was writing them, and he decided to play amateur detective."

Grisham and the Swansons targeted another St. Anne's parent, Katharine Almy of Charlottesville, who has three children.

Grisham and the Swansons took the letters to a handwriting expert, who told them that he needed more samples.

Both sides agree that Grisham and Alan Swanson then obtained enrollment and medical release forms from the school filled out by Almy and stamped "strictly confidential." They provided the forms to the handwriting expert, who issued a report saying the letters "possibly" were written by Almy, the lawsuit states.

Grisham provided the expert's report and the letters to the Albemarle County police, and a detective visited Almy. The lawsuit states that she was horrified that she was being investigated and repeatedly denied writing the letters. The detective reportedly told her to stop writing the letters. The lawsuit says that Almy provided handwriting samples to another examiner, who cleared her, and that she passed a polygraph test.

But Almy alleges that she was devastated by the accusations and the investigation. And when she later found out that forms had been taken from school for use in the investigation, she was further humiliated.

Almy was on the board of directors of a support group for victims of domestic abuse, the lawsuit says, and led weekly meetings and coordinated services for victims.

In 2000, even as the letters kept coming, Almy sued Grisham and the Swansons for intentional infliction of emotional distress. She withdrew the suit in 2003 but refiled it in 2004. A year later, Albemarle County Circuit Court Judge William R. Shelton threw it out, saying the case had no merit.

Almy appealed. And yesterday, in an opinion written by Justice Barbara Milano Keenan, the high court ruled that Shelton was wrong for judging the case on its merits. The defense motion to dismiss the case should have been evaluated strictly on whether Almy had enough legal basis to get the case to trial, Keenan wrote, determining that Almy's claims of severe distress and depression were sufficient.

No one answered the phone at Grisham's home yesterday. His attorney, Thomas Albro, said the author "had no intention of causing this woman any emotional distress or harm. It is clear from the evidence . . . that everything he did was in good faith and was designed to find out who was sending the harassing letters." The Swansons' attorney did not return a call.

Bernard J. DiMuro, Almy's attorney, said that the story "could have come directly out of one of Mr. Grisham's novels" and that Almy "became the victim and wrongful target of a Barney Fife-style investigation instigated by Mr. Grisham and the Swansons that tarnished her reputation in the community while inflicting severe emotional distress."

The cliffhanger? The author of the letters. That remains a mystery.

Emotions Run High As Journalist's Assailant Gets 65-Year-Term (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The man convicted of delivering the blow last year that killed New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum was sentenced yesterday to spend what will almost certainly be the rest of his life behind bars.

Convicted last fall in D.C. Superior Court of first-degree murder, Percey Jordan, 43, was sentenced to 65 years in prison.

The punishment was handed down yesterday morning in an emotion-filled courtroom, with a prosecutor telling the judge that he should take away Jordan's "hope," a defense attorney asking for a measure of mercy and a grieving family grasping for justice.

"I can't imagine a punishment that would fit this crime," said a shaken Daniel Rosenbaum, the victim's son.

He was speaking to Judge Erik P. Christian but staring at Jordan, a few feet away. Rosenbaum's hands were trembling, and as he started to walk back to his seat, he paused for a moment and looked at Jordan, whose face betrayed little.

Christian, who presided over Jordan's trial in October, said he hoped that during his imprisonment Jordan would eventually acknowledge what he had done.

Last week, Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to his part in the robbery and was sentenced to 26 years. As part of his plea agreement, Hamlin testified against Jordan.

Despite the prospect of such testimony, Jordan had chosen to go to trial. On Oct. 24, he was convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit robbery and robbery of a senior citizen.

Rosenbaum, 63, died Jan. 8, 2006, two days after he was robbed and beaten on Gramercy Street NW while taking an after-dinner walk in his neighborhood. The random attack soon evolved into a scandal as investigators uncovered a string of errors concerning the emergency medical care provided to Rosenbaum at the scene, in the ambulance and at Howard University Hospital, where he died.

Jordan told the judge that he had nothing to say. Standing next to him was his attorney, Michael Starr, who said that Jordan plans to appeal his conviction and had been advised not to comment.

With his client facing a mandatory minimum of 30 years, Starr could only urge the judge to impose a penalty less than life without possibility of release, available as a sentence because Jordan was found to have murdered a vulnerable person.

Starr argued that no one had claimed that Jordan intended to murder Rosenbaum or anyone else. Although that did not make the Rosenbaums' loss less painful, Starr said, it distinguished the death from a premeditated killing.

Jordan and Hamlin were charged within days of the attack. Each surrendered separately after surveillance footage showing them using stolen credit cards was broadcast on local television stations.

The attack on Rosenbaum was far from the first robbery they had committed, according to prosecutors. In a sentencing memorandum to the court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines said Hamlin testified before a grand jury that he and Jordan had carried out numerous crimes over a period of many months: an ATM holdup in Takoma Park, several supermarket purse-snatchings in Maryland and Virginia, and spraying a man with Mace during a robbery in Silver Spring.

They also noted the November 2005 beating and robbery of a retired police officer in Southeast Washington. Only after Rosenbaum's death was Jordan linked to that crime, which D.C. police detectives had not fully investigated.

"If they had done that, this all wouldn't have happened," the retired officer, James Rose, said after attending Jordan's sentencing.

Second Man Sentenced In Killing Of Ex-Reporter (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

The second of two men convicted in the killing of a retired reporter for The New York Times was sentenced to 65 years in prison. The man, Percey Jordan Jr., 43, was convicted of first-degree murder in October. He faced a maximum of life without the possibility of parole for the attack on the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, last January. Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, who was sentenced to 26 years for his role in the death, testified that Mr. Jordan had struck the former reporter over the head with a pipe while he took his wallet. Last week, Mr. Hamlin was sentenced after pleading guilty late last year to second-degree murder.

Recording Industry Wins Judgment In Piracy Case (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, Jan. 12 (AP) — Less than a month after the recording industry dropped a music piracy case against a well-known opponent, it has won a default judgment against her 20-year-old daughter.

Judge Stephen C. Robinson of United States District Court ordered the daughter, Michelle Santangelo, to pay $750 for each of the 41 songs she is accused of downloading illegally — a total of $30,750 — because she failed to respond to the record companies' claims.

It was not clear whether the default judgment would end the case. Under federal rules, such judgments are often later set aside so lawsuits can be decided on their merits.

Ms. Santangelo's lawyer, Jordan Glass, said he was not permitted to comment on the judgment, which was returned on Wednesday. He would not elaborate.

Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the Recording Industry Association of America, which is coordinating the thousands of piracy suits filed by the record companies, also declined to comment.

Michelle Santangelo is the oldest of five children of Patricia Santangelo, who became a defendant in the battle against illegal downloading. When the elder Ms. Santangelo, 42, of Wappingers Falls, N.Y., was sued in 2005 by five record companies, she said she had never downloaded music. If her children did, she said, the file-sharing programs, not the parents, should be blamed.

Ms. Santangelo refused to settle with the record companies and took her case to newspapers and national television. She became a heroine to defenders of Internet freedom, who helped raise money for her defense.

When the case against her was dropped, the record companies said they would pursue the case against her daughter and her son, Robert, 16. No default judgment was filed against Robert.

The recording industry has filed more than 18,000 piracy lawsuits in federal courts, many against minors, and thousands have been settled with payments to the record companies.

FBI Log: Troutman Raids Turned Up 'Suspect' Drugs, Gun (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 13, 2007

Federal documents made public Friday show the scope of the investigation into Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman and indicate the FBI may not be done looking into her connections to street gangs.

Evidence logs from searches of Troutman's home and office on Monday also show that agents allegedly found suspected drugs, drug paraphernalia and a handgun.

Earlier this week, authorities charged Troutman with accepting a bribe to smooth the way for a mixed-use development on the South Side. Troutman has denied the accusations.

The documents show some of the suspected drugs were recovered in Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue, where the revolver also was found. A "white powdery substance in Ziploc plastic bag" was found in her office at 5958 S. State St., the documents state, noting it was found in a desk drawer.

FBI spokesman Ross Rice said laboratory testing of the substances was not complete.

Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said he believes that testing will show the powder was a vitamin supplement.

"Anybody who knows anything about Arenda Troutman can tell you she is a health freak," Adam said. "She hasn't eaten meat in years; she's a vegetarian.

"Arenda Troutman does not do drugs," he said. "We need to wait until these lab tests come back and see what we're talking about here."

Troutman, the 20th Ward alderman, has been under law enforcement scrutiny in the past for her association with Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who has fled to avoid drug conspiracy charges.

Agents were to seize "records and documents of press releases issued by Arenda Troutman, her aldermanic office, her committeeman office, her campaign committees or her employees regarding law-enforcement issues and street-gang activity."

Aldermen are an exception to Chicago's ban on handguns, and Adam said he believes Troutman's gun was lawfully owned and kept.

Adam said Troutman needed protection in the economically depressed area where she lives and serves. Her home has been broken into in the past, and the gun was registered to a private detective who left it for her, Adam said.

"She didn't go up to the North Shore to run, or to the southwest suburbs among the affluent to make things better," he said. "She's right there in the 'hood."

Troutman said Thursday the charges do not deter her from running for another term in the Feb. 27 election, but opponent Willie B. Cochran called on her to resign Friday.

The search warrants in the Troutman case included lists of items to be seized. Included were bank records, lists and receipts; income and expense summaries; cash disbursement journals, and other financial information. Also listed were computer equipment and documents.

The Berger Files (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0117000

The more we learn about Sandy Berger's brilliant career as a document thief, the clearer it becomes that there is plenty we still don't know and may never learn. On Tuesday, the House Government Reform Committee released its report on Mr. Berger's pilfering of classified documents from the National Archives.

The committee's 60-page report makes it clear that Mr. Berger knew exactly what he was doing and knew that what he was doing was wrong. According to interviews with National Archives staff, Mr. Berger repeatedly arranged to be left alone with highly classified documents by feigning the need to make personal phone calls, and he used those moments alone with the files to stuff them in his pockets and briefcase.

One incident is particularly suggestive. By his fourth and final visit to review documents and prepare for testimony before the 9/11 Commission, the Archives staff had grown suspicious of how Mr. Berger was handling the documents, so they numbered each one he was given in pencil on the back of the document. When one of them -- No. 217 -- was apparently removed from the files by Mr. Berger, the staff reprinted a copy and replaced it for his review. According to the report, Mr. Berger then proceeded to slip the second copy "under his portfolio also." In other words, he stole the same document twice.

This gives the lie to Mr. Berger's story that he was taking the documents for his own convenience, to assist with his preparation for testimony to the commission. If that were the whole story, one copy of document 217 would surely have been sufficient. That document was an email pertaining to a draft of the Millennium After-Action Report on the attempted bombing of Los Angeles International Airport. The episode suggests that Mr. Berger had some other motive for removing No. 217, even if he was ultimately unsuccessful in doing so. But neither his April 2005 plea agreement, nor the Congressional report, nor the report of the Archives' Inspector General shed any light on what that motive might have been.

Another telling revelation concerns Mr. Berger's access to original, uncopied and uninventoried documents from the files of former NSC antiterror official Richard Clarke, among others. At the time Mr. Berger made his misdemeanor plea agreement, we were assured by then-federal prosecutor Noel Hillman that there was no evidence that Mr. Berger destroyed or intended to destroy any original documents. That was, strictly speaking, true. But during three of Mr. Berger's four visits to the Archives in 2002 and 2003, the former National Security Adviser did have access to original documents of which no adequate inventory existed or exists.

This seems relevant, given the concern that Mr. Berger's breaches of national security might have denied evidence to history of the Clinton Administration's approach to al Qaeda and the threat of terrorism. And yet the Justice Department clearly gave the impression that there was no danger that Mr. Berger abridged the historical record. We now know that this was not true. Mr. Berger was in a position to remove documents from Mr. Clarke's files, and thanks to lax security, breaches of protocol and undue deference on the part of Archives staff, we may never know whether Mr. Berger took documents other than the five he's admitted to removing.

It is true that there is no affirmative evidence he did so. But it is equally true that he had opportunity and a demonstrated willingness to breach security in his handling of the documents. As for motive, this remains shrouded in mystery, in part because the documents Mr. Berger has admitted to taking remain highly classified, so the precise nature of his interest is unclear.

Thanks to Justice's and the Archives' leniency, or laxity, or both, Mr. Berger's plea deal expires in 2008 -- just in time, perhaps, for the next Clinton Administration.

CIVIL LAW:

SAN FRANCISCO Abortion Amendment Challenged State Fights Federal Regulation That Could Cost It $37 Billion (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 13, 2007

A state lawyer urged a judge Friday to head off a collision between California health laws and a federal anti-abortion amendment that could cost the state a ruinous $37 billion in funding if it penalized doctors or hospitals for refusing to perform emergency abortions.

Deputy Attorney General Timothy Muscat argued that the conflict could be avoided if federal laws that require doctors to provide emergency medical care were interpreted to include performing an abortion when necessary to save a woman's life or prevent serious health damage. But a Bush administration lawyer said such an interpretation would be improper.

"We cannot rewrite a statute," Justice Department attorney James Gilligan told U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White at a hearing in San Francisco. Gilligan said the legislation that the state is challenging does not require doctors or hospitals to perform abortions, even in emergencies, if they would find the procedures morally offensive.

White heard arguments from opposing lawyers, including those from Christian medical organizations that support the federal amendment, and did not indicate how or when he would rule.

The amendment, part of a spending bill that President Bush signed in December 2004, denies a wide range of federal funding to states that discriminate against any health provider, health maintenance organization or insurer that does not offer abortions or abortion referrals.

California was the only state to challenge the amendment. In a suit filed in January 2005, schools Superintendent Jack O'Connell and Attorney General Bill Lockyer argued that the amendment violated women's rights and the state's constitutional autonomy by in effect overturning a California law that requires any hospital or clinic to perform an abortion in an emergency.

California, like most states, allows doctors and hospitals to refuse to perform abortions for religious or moral reasons. But all doctors are required to perform abortions in an emergency in which childbirth would threaten the woman's life or health.

Muscat acknowledged that the state has no record of ever ordering a doctor or health facility to perform an emergency abortion, or of penalizing one for refusing to do so. But he told White that the state is entitled to enforce its law, and can do so only if the federal amendment is declared unconstitutional or is interpreted in harmony with the California law.

"The United States is turning its back on the fundamental rights of women," requiring California to step in, the state lawyer said. "No California official is ever going to risk losing $37 billion," more than one-third of the state's annual budget, he said.

Gilligan, the Justice Department lawyer, said the federal amendment "protects the rights of conscience" of anti-abortion health care providers. He also argued that the suit was premature because the state is not being threatened with an imminent loss of funding.

In addition, Gilligan said, the federal abortion amendment is scheduled to lapse Feb. 15, when a short-term funding measure passed by last year's Republican-controlled Congress is due to expire. He told the judge he didn't know whether the restriction would remain in effect after that.

Blind Want Changes In Currency (RTD)

By Robin Farmer, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

Some in Richmond area oppose Bush administration efforts to block federal ruling

Judith Vido has signed an online petition protesting the Bush administration's decision to oppose a court-ordered redesign of the nation's currency to help the blind.

A blogger and author, Vido was the 640th person to do so this week. As of yesterday, more than 3,600 names appeared on the petition, which can be found at www.petitiononline.com/mfaacp/petition.html.

Blinded as a teen because of complications from diabetes, she uses her computer with the aid of screen-reading technology for her writing, which includes books of several genres, including romance.

"The judge has said this is violation of our civil rights. I happen to agree." Vido, of Richmond, said. "I have problems when my partner isn't here and I grab money from my savings. I can't always identify it. Yes, I keep certain amounts in my wallet that I fold. But I don't always know what I have."

The administration's appeal seeks to overturn a ruling in November by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who ordered the Department of the Treasury to find ways for the blind to recognize the different denominations of currency. Robertson noted that of 180 nations printing paper currency, only the United States makes no effort to make it discernable without vision.

Justice Department lawyers filed the appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on behalf of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson last month.

Robertson had ruled in a lawsuit brought by the American Council of the Blind. The council proposed several options for changes, including printing different size bills or changing the texture by adding embossed dots or foil.

Not all advocates for the blind support Robertson's ruling.

The National Federation of the Blind said in December it plans to support Treasury in the appeal process, saying the ruling misinterpreted the meaning of discrimination. . . . "If it is allowed to stand unchal- lenged, this ruling will do real harm to the blind by making our goal of full and equal participation in society virtually impossible to achieve."

Jeffrey Lovitky, an attorney for the American Council of the Blind, has said he planned to petition the appeals court to reject the appeal until Robertson makes a decision on what remedies the government should pursue. A hearing on the government's recommendations is scheduled for this month.

"I don't know why it requires a court case," said Henrico County resident Malcolm Coe, who was blind at birth. "It seems pretty obvious it should be done."

When Coe trained as an operator of a vending stand he was cheated by a customer who repeatedly gave him $1 bills and said they were $20 bills.

"He seemed friendly and he always chatted. I nicknamed him Mr. Alaska because he talked about going," Coe recalled. "I guess he was using his own method to save to do that. Fortunately for me, it wasn't my money, but it was the operator of the business that lost the money."

Coe believes part of the government's resistance to altering the money stems from not having "a large enough population that is upset about it to make the public aware that something needs to be done."

But the number of people with vision problems will jump as baby boomers age, said Tara Cortes, president of Lighthouse International, an advocacy group for the blind.

There are 1.3 million people in the United States who are legally blind, and there will be millions more as people fall victim to diseases that can affect vision, such as diabetes, which is on the rise, Cortes said.

In the government's appeal, Justice Department lawyers argued that visually impaired people are not denied meaningful access to money by the way the nation's currency is designed.

Portable reading devices exist to determine the denomination of paper money and the blind can also use credit cards, the lawyers said.

Several blind people interviewed by the Times-Dispatch have said the reading devices cost hundred of dollars and using credit cards still requires sight to ensure the amount charged is correct.

The government argues that if currency sizes were altered, it would cost up to $178 million initially and up to $50 million in new printing plates.

Cortes said the new bills could be phased in over 5 to 10 years to reduce costs.

For Vido, altered currency would ensure her independence about what's in her own wallet.

"It would be nice," Vido said, "if I didn't have to ask somebody"

Navy Halts Lockheed Contract (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Navy yesterday ordered Lockheed Martin to stop work on a $260 million ship after the company warned of a significant cost increase that has also spurred the service to reconsider the way it purchases the vessels.

The unusual order, which lasts 90 days, is a blow to Lockheed and is among a series of cost overruns in Navy shipbuilding programs.

Lockheed of Bethesda is one of two contractors building the new ships. The Navy plans to buy 55 of the vessels, making the program potentially worth billions of dollars to Lockheed if it wins even half the work.

The 378-foot-longship, known as a littoral combat ship, is supposed to be capable of operating in less than 13 feet of water, allowing the Navy to maneuver in "littoral" waters close to shore to hunt submarines and destroy underwater mines.

Navy and Lockheed officials said they do not know the extent of the cost overrun. The increase is related to "contractor poor performance" and increased labor costs, Navy spokesman Lt. John Gay said. For example, a key part of the propulsion system was delayed 27 weeks because of a manufacturing error, driving up costs, he said.

"We're disappointed that the Navy made that decision," said company spokesman Craig Quigley. The company has warned the Navy about the cost increase since March, he said.

The order applies to the second of two vessels that Lockheed is building for the Navy. Work on the first one, which is 70 percent completed, is to continue so the Navy can launch it and evaluate the design, a Navy statement said.

While it is not uncommon for the cost of the first versions of a new line of ships to increase, Lockheed knew the requirements, Gay said. "It remained unchanged, that is why we are concerned," he said.

Lockheed acknowledged a problem with a part related to the propulsion system, saying it had been cut incorrectly by a subcontractor, but the company also blamed changes the Navy made to the way the ship was to be constructed and a shortage of the kind of steel it required.

The stricter construction standard is "a positive change because it's going to be a far more resilient, tough vessel, but there is a cost impact," said Quigley.

A Navy official was unavailable last night to respond to Lockheed's claims, but earlier said steel-related cost issues already had been accounted for.

The cost of stopping and restarting the program could be about $14 million, Quigley said, adding that Lockheed is likely to attempt to recoup those costs from the Navy.

Some in Congress have questioned whether a littoral combat ship, or LCS, is necessary if submarines, tanks and guns would suffice. "The Navy is committed to the LCS program and it remains the cornerstone of the future fleet. It will provide critical capability," Gay said.

Falls Church-based General Dynamics Corp. has received contracts to build two of the littoral ships. The first ship, which will be 400 feet long and hold a crew of 40, is half done, and construction on the second hasn't begun, said company spokesman Rob Doolittle. "We're focused on delivering a very capable, affordable ship to the United States Navy," he said. But, Doolittle said, "it's premature to discuss the final construction cost because we're so early in the process."

Chastang To Keep Seat -- For Now (MR)

By Jeff Amy, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 13, 2007

Mobile County Commissioner Juan Chastang will keep his seat, at least for a little while.

A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery agreed to give the state time to appeal a U.S. Justice Department ruling that says Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Chastang was invalid.

"The state of Alabama is allowed additional time to seek timely reconsideration of the decision," wrote Judges Stanley Marcus, Myron Thompson and Harold Albritton in an order filed Thursday.

Plaintiffs in the court case, which ultimately led to the Justice Department ruling, had asked the court this week to set an election within 90 days. Chastang, a black Republican, has said he would run in the election, though the majority-black district has historically elected Democrats.

But campaigning will be on hold. The court told Riley to file his request for reconsideration with the Justice Department, and to check in on the first day of every month, starting in February, with a status update.

Keith Miller, Alabama's chief deputy attorney general, said he expected the request to be filed in "days, not weeks."

Cecil Gardner, the lawyer for Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark, three Democrats who filed the case to force an election, said he had no objection to the order. He did say he planned to file a motion next week asking the court to order the state to file within 10 days, to prevent any delays meant to extend Chastang's time in office.

The Justice Department ruling, issued Monday, would essentially void an earlier 1988 state Supreme Court decision that said governors should appoint replacement commissioners when a vacancy occurs between elections.

The state court case had overturned a 1985 law calling for a special election to fill any vacancies when more than a year remains in an electoral term. But the Justice Department ruled that the state had failed to get Justice Department to sign off that the court decision wouldn't harm minority voting rights, saying the 1985 law was back in effect.

Under the Voting Rights Act, Alabama is supposed to get such federal approval, called pre-clearance, before making any change in election procedures. Pre-clearance is required because of the state's history of discriminating against black voters. The court ruled that pre-clearance covered not only administrative changes and those approved by lawmakers, but also those imposed by state courts.

The state can also appeal the case to U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, but Miller said the state was focused on swaying U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"We're hopeful he's going to reverse the decision of his staff," Miller said. "You have a federal agency telling the state that you have to follow a state statute that violates the state constitution."

Chastang, appointed by Riley in 2005 after Sam Jones won election as Mobile mayor and resigned his commission seat, said he remains confident of ultimate victory. "This appointment has been legal from the beginning," he said.

ANTITRUST:

Delta Pilots To Fight Takeover Union Devotes $15 Million To Cause (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 13, 2007

Delta Air Lines' pilots union is devoting $15 million to the fight against US Airways' hostile buyout bid and temporarily moving leaders to Washington so they can lobby politicians and investors.

Union leaders were already in Washington this week plotting strategy and buttonholing politicians when US Airways upped its offer for Delta by $1.7 billion, to about $10.3 billion.

Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association unit, said in a letter to pilots that the merger poses a "clear and present danger to the careers of all Delta employees."

He said the fattened offer would add more debt to the merged airline and that it raises questions about US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker's credibility.

"Two weeks ago, Parker definitively stated that he had no intention of increasing his offer. [Wednesday], he increased his offer, while at the same time reaffirming his 'plan' for no 'frontline' employee furloughs," Moak wrote.

"But on the same day, Parker's No. 2 man was openly discussing additional divestitures beyond those originally disclosed to quell antitrust concerns that US Airways claims don't exist in the first place. With divestitures come job losses. Make no mistake — Parker's plan will result in thousands of job losses regardless of Parker's empty promises," Moak wrote.

He said Parker "will soon come to realize that we cannot be ignored, that we are not going away, and that the Delta pilots will not be 'synergized.' "

Union spokeswoman Kelly Collins said the $15 million from the union's general treasury will be used for lobbying, legal and public relations expenses.

Industry experts say the battle for Delta is likely to escalate in the wake of US Airways' sweetened bid. US Airways has given Delta's bankruptcy court creditors a Feb. 1 deadline to indicate support.

Delta management opposes the US Airways bid, but the creditors, who will hold substantial equity in Delta when it emerges from Chapter 11, could force it to pursue the deal.

One creditor faction, representing about 15 percent of claims, has already urged Delta to take preliminary steps in that direction in light of the new offer. But the court-appointed unsecured creditors committee — which includes major suppliers, banks and ALPA — hasn't indicated a position.

Their decision is largely financial. But they also must gauge the chances that a merger can gain approval from federal regulators — which Delta and ALPA argue is unlikely — as well as whether the two companies could be smoothly integrated and make their stock more valuable in the future.

Moak repeated earlier criticisms that the merger plan ignores elements of the Delta pilot contract that would block or complicate integration.

"Parker mistakenly believes that he can somehow magically overcome the ... protections built into our contract and to date refuses to discuss the contract in anything other than superficial terms," Moak wrote in the letter to pilots.

He added: "The Delta pilots will not change any provision of our contract in order to facilitate the hostile takeover of our company."

In an e-mailed statement, a US Airways representative responded: "We have committed to no layoffs of frontline employees, just as there were no layoffs of frontline employees in the America West-US Airways merger. We will comply with provisions of the Delta ALPA contract [and our own contracts]."

The current US Airways was created by the 2005 buyout of that carrier by America West, which adopted the name.

Moak did not address reports that Delta might be talking to Northwest Airlines about a possible post-Chapter 11 merger of those two carriers, as an alternative to a US Airways deal.

But he said: "I want to caution you about the many press reports you will read and see in the coming days and weeks regarding both the US Airways' hostile merger attempt and any other industry merger activity.

"I want to make this perfectly clear. Delta remains committed to emerging from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline, and the [union leadership] shares that commitment. Nothing will distract us from the task at hand."

Northwest filed its initial reorganization plan Friday but omitted details on how it plans to finance its emergence from bankruptcy this spring, and won the judge's permission to delay filing a more detailed disclosure statement until mid-February.

Newspapers Tribune's Bid Deadline Nears With Few Suitors Signaling Keen Interest (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Wednesday night, as the final deadline for bids for Tribune Co. arrives, the company could be throwing the first large-cap media party that nobody shows up for.

While a few private-equity firms are likely to band together in a half-hearted bid for the media group, compared with the spirited competitions for such properties as Clear Channel Communications Inc. and Univision, Tribune's sale process has generated mostly shrugs from the private-equity world. And there isn't a McClatchy-like suitor either, as there was with the sale of Knight Ridder last year.

Instead, most of the attention lavished on Tribune has come from so-called vanity buyers, such as David Geffen and Ron Burkle, who are interested in the Los Angeles Times.

But Tribune, like many other newspaper firms, is saddled with tax issues that make selling itself in pieces prohibitively expensive for would-be buyers. Tribune's last and best hopes may lie with its own major shareholders: either a bid from the Chandler family, the company's largest shareholder and the one that, ironically, triggered the whole public auction process; or a management-led buyout aided by its own McCormick Tribune foundation, the management-controlled charity that is the company's second-largest shareholder.

If Tribune ends up without a good bid for the entire company, it will be back where it started more than seven months ago: with a lagging stock price, disgruntled investors and no certain path for how to solve its overarching strategic problems. Oddly, that could be a partial vindication of Tribune management.

Dennis FitzSimons and his board had explored Tribune's options in private a year ago, before pursuing the modest route of a stock buyback. It was then that the Chandlers, who have little faith in the newspaper business, decided that a public fight had a better chance of boosting the stock price than any long-term management strategy.

In the end, Tribune could decide to split up the company, with TV stations and newspapers going their separate ways. This, too, was an option that was on the table seven months ago, and the rift between Tribune management and the Chandlers arose partly over its timing.

As it turns out, if the company pursues a spinoff of the TV stations, Tribune management will have gotten the delay they were looking for. And the Chandlers will have to wonder if it was worth the fight. For the family, this experience increasingly is looking like it should be filed in the be-careful-what-you-wish-for category.

The auction process has helped buoy Tribune's shares, which have held up better than many of its peers. Whatever the outcome, it is likely to be a sharp lesson to investors hoping to shake up the newspaper industry and save their investment. If the Tribune auction shows anything, it is that there is no easy solution for public newspaper companies. Neither private-equity firms nor wealthy individuals can undo the fundamentals of declining readership and advertising. And Tribune management might come out looking surprisingly smart.

One often-heard complaint from private-equity executives: Tribune has been too tightly run, and there is little fat left to cut.

Cablevision Struggle Looms After Dolans Sweeten Offer (WSJ)

By Peter Grant And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

A potential showdown over the fate of Cablevision Systems Corp. stands to test the limits of how well board directors and shareholders can organize to fight a "take private" plan offered by controlling shareholders of a public company.

On Friday, Cablevision's controlling Dolan family increased by about $1 billion to $8.9 billion its privatization offer first made in October. Such increases are usually part of a friendly back-and-forth negotiation between big shareholders and independent board members representing public owners.

But judging from the combative tone of the Dolans' news release, fissures have developed between the two sides, which left in doubt whether the Dolans would prevail.

The family declared its most recent offer "best and final" and noted that the length of negotiations was creating potentially harmful uncertainty to the company. The family also imposed a deadline on the process, saying that its offer would expire by close of business Wednesday, according to a letter sent to a special committee of directors by Cablevision founder Charles Dolan and his son, James Dolan, the company's chief executive.

The Dolans noted their increased offer of $30 a share represents an 11.1% increase over their $27 offer in October and a 23.7% premium to what the cable operator's 52-week high was at that time. The Dolans also added a few sweeteners that indicate the committee, consisting of two independent directors, may be balking on the price. The family has agreed to put the deal to a majority vote of public shareholders, which would exclude the Dolans who own 20% of the company but control 70.4% of the voting shares.

In addition, the Dolans have offered new assurances to shareholders that their plan isn't to sell the company for a profit soon after taking it private. Shareholders have worried about this because large cable operators, particularly Time Warner Inc., have made it clear they would be interested in buying Cablevision, based in Bethpage, N.Y. The letter indicates the family would be willing to include a provision in a deal that would allow shareholders to share in the profits if that happens.

Despite these measures, a number of large Cablevision stockholders reacted negatively to the new offer, indicating they might vote against it if it came to a vote.

"On a relative basis, the offer is far worse today," said John Linehan, a portfolio manager at mutual-fund company T. Rowe Price Group Inc., which holds more than two million Cablevision shares.

Cablevision shares fell Friday, a sign that investors believe the Dolans aren't going to increase their offer and that the deal may not be approved. As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, its stock was down $1.21, or 4.1%, at $28.39.

Rising Tortilla Prices Hit Poor Mexicans Hard (AP)

By Peter Orsi, The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

MEXICO CITY - Soaring international demand for corn has caused a spike in prices for Mexico's humble tortilla, hitting the poor and forcing President Felipe Calderon's business-friendly government into an uncomfortable confrontation with powerful monopolies.

Tortilla prices jumped nearly 14 percent during the past year, a move Mexico's Central Bank Gov. Guillermo Ortiz called "unjustifiable" in a country where inflation ran about 4 percent. Ortiz pinned the blame on companies' monopolizing the market and blocking competition.

"We clearly have a problem of speculation," he said.

Economists also blame increased U.S. production of ethanol from corn as an alternative to oil. The battle over the tortilla, the most basic staple of the Mexican diet especially among the poor, demonstrates how increasing economic integration is felt on the street level.

"This is direct evidence of the way globalization is affecting all walks of life in Mexico and all over the world," said David Barkin, an economics professor at the Xochimilco campus of the Autonomous Metropolitan University in Mexico City.

The federal government's antitrust watchdog announced this week it was investigating allegations companies were manipulating corn prices and making deals to limit the supply of corn to boost prices of tortillas.

Officials from the world's largest tortilla maker, Monterrey, Mexico-based Gruma SA, were not immediately available for comment. The company has 89 tortilla plants worldwide and sells tortillas in the U.S. under the Mission brand.

Big retailers, mostly supermarkets, have kept tortilla prices steady about $0.55 per kilogram, but in Mexico City, some shops are selling them for $0.90 per kilogram, up from $0.73.

For low-income Mexicans, who earn about $18 a day on average, the increasing prices have hit hard. According to the government, about half of the country's 107 million citizens live in poverty.

"When there isn't enough money to buy meat, you do without," said Bonifacia Ysidro as she wrapped an embroidered towel around a foot-high stack of tortillas to cart home. Tortillas, she added, "you can't do without."

Ysidro said she paid $2.27 - about a sixth of her household's combined daily income - for enough tortillas to feed her family of six.

"If I don't have that much, I'll have to buy less," she said.

Leticia Balino, who runs a tortilla shop behind the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City, said many are complaining, especially those with large families.

"They say, 'How is it possible that the price could rise so much in such a short time?'" she said.

The U.S. Agriculture Department said Friday that ethanol plants and foreign buyers are gobbling U.S. corn supplies, pushing prices as high as $3.40 per bushel, the highest in more than a decade.

Nationwide in the United States, supplies of corn are expected to drop to 752 million bushels, a drop from last month's forecast of 935 million bushels and a steep decline from last year's supply of 1.967 billion bushels.

Responding to the outcry, Mexican lawmakers are demanding the government impose price controls, but Calderon instead has vowed to watch out for tortilla sellers who gouge consumers. He also asked his agriculture secretary to import corn from anywhere.

"I don't care if it's brought from thousands of kilometers away, the most important thing is that this (shortage) is not used as an excuse to raise prices," he said Thursday.

Mexico's Economy Department said it will expand its white corn quotas under the 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement to drive down tortilla prices, while the federal consumer protection agency has launched an inspection campaign to ensure tortilla sellers post their prices.

DOJ_NMG_0117008

On Thursday, the Federal Competition Commission said it was looking into allegations the major companies were price gouging and reaching deals that were contributing to the shortage.

"If we detect monopolistic practices, we could impose fines of up to $6.4 million," the agency's director, Eduardo Perez Motta, said in a news release.

The agency said that since 2004 it has applied sanctions in six cases against anticompetitive practices in the corn and tortilla markets. Last year, the agency blocked Gruma's takeover of Mexican corn processor Agroinsa, saying it would have given it too much control over the market.

Many consumer goods are expensive in Mexico, but historically, government subsidies and price controls have kept basic foodstuffs within reach of even the poorest Mexicans.

The government eliminated its decades-old subsidy for tortillas in 1999 just as cheap corn imports were rising from the United States under NAFTA.

Mexican consumers also are coping with higher prices for other staples. The cost of white bread and fresh fruit and vegetables all rose more than inflation in 2006, according to the central bank.

The tortilla increase outpaced inflation and minimum-wage hikes of about 4 percent for the past year.

Grains traders forecast tortilla prices will rise by 20 to 25 percent during the first quarter of 2007.

That prospect worries Ysidro, who said: "If it goes higher, what am I going to give my children?"

New Forestry Chief (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Gail Kimbell, a Montana forester, was named the new chief of the United States Forest Service. Ms. Kimbell, the first woman to lead the service, succeeds Dale Bosworth, who will step down on Feb. 2. Ms. Kimbell has been a top official at the Forest Service, helping President Bush develop the “healthy forests” program that lets companies log large, commercially valuable trees in national forests in exchange for clearing smaller trees and brush. Environmentalists called it a giveaway to logging companies that supported Mr. Bush.

Down But Not Out (WP)

ARECENT admission by an Environmental Protection Agency official that the Chesapeake Bay is not getting cleaner fast enough is as obvious as it is late. "If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two," EPA administrator Rich Batiuk told a meeting of an advisory group on the bay's health last week. To that, Roy Hoagland of the nonprofit Chesapeake Bay Foundation responded with a resounding "duh."

After missing targets set in 1987 and repledging in 2000 to make progress on a range of bay indicators by 2010, the states responsible for the bay's continued ill health immediately fell behind their pollution reduction goals. In 2006 they trailed them by wide margins. For example, the Chesapeake's oyster population, which used to efficiently filter bay water, stands at only 7 percent of the goal set for 2010. Some states have done better than others. Virginia, for example, is far behind Maryland in cutting the amount of nitrate pollution it dumps into the bay. But even Maryland, with its laudable new flush tax, is on track to reduce its nitrate pollution by only half of its goal by 2010, according to a study from the Chesapeake Bay Foundation.

Since 2000, large numbers of people moved to the bay's regional watershed, decreasing the net effects of the pollution controls that bay states have enacted. Meanwhile, many of the Chesapeake's ecosystems continued to ail. In 2005, "dead zones," devoid of oxygen and unable to sustain fish and crabs, made up a distressing 4.5 percent of the bay.

With numbers like these, it is tempting to give up hope and decline to spend more money on a dying body of water. But given the right conditions, the bay can still heal. Last year, underwater grasses repopulated the bay at a greater rate than scientists expected, and the number of dead zones plummeted because of an unusually dry spring, the time of year in which polluted runoff does the most damage. If bay states prevented more pollution at sewage plants and farms, these and other improvements could be sustained, rain or shine.

As 2007 begins, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the federal government must resolve to more aggressively pursue pollution reduction targets. In all three states a number of proposals are on the table that would use bond issues to fund sewage treatment plant improvements or pollution-reducing agricultural projects. Passage would bring these bay states much closer to their 2010 goals. If Democrats in Congress are serious about proposals to retool farm legislation to subsidize rural conservation, they must remember the Chesapeake watershed when drafting their farm bill.

Jury Acquits Former Crow Official Accused Of Lying (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

A former Crow tribal official has been acquitted of charges that he lied to the U.S. Department of Justice about his finances, to avoid paying restitution owed the tribe for criminal activity in the 1990s.

A federal jury Friday acquitted Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., indicted on three counts of false statements. The indictment alleged that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution.

``I'm absolutely relieved," Hogan said after the acquittal. ``There is justice in Montana."

Hogan was the Crow Indian Tribe's secretary in the 1970s and 1980s.

In the 1990s he was convicted in a corruption scandal while executive director of the Crow Tribal Housing Authority, and received a prison sentence of two years. U.S. District Judge Jack Shanstrom also ordered $35,100 in restitution to the tribe, which Hogan finished paying last February. The indictment alleging false statements was filed two months later.

In the case decided Friday, prosecutors charged Hogan claimed he had few or no assets, yet received money from investors and gave money to relatives and tribal officials. Prosecutors said Hogan's offenses included failing to report his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co.

Hogan and Ted Hogan and Associates of Sedona have sought investors for minerals development on the Crow reservation. Some investors have complained of major losses. One of them, Elaine Roulidis of Springfield, Va., is named in a defamation lawsuit filed by Hogan last year, a suit seeking $361 million. Roulidis has responded with a suit seeking $350,000.

Hogan's lawyer in the Justice Department case sought to have it dismissed, on grounds the restitution was paid. Shanstrom, again the presiding judge, ruled against that motion and refused to let the jury hear that Hogan paid the restitution.

Deal Would To Keep DEA Supplied With Army Helicopters In Bahamas (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, January 13, 2007

MIAMI - Army air support would continue for U.S.-Bahamas drug interdiction efforts even after the Pentagon withdraws its Blackhawk helicopters later this year under an agreement announced Friday by U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson.

Nelson, D-Fla., said the Army has offered to give the Drug Enforcement Administration three Sikorsky S-76 helicopters by 2008 to replace the Blackhawks and spend $3.4 million a year for the next five years to maintain the "Hawk's Nest" helicopter base in the Bahamas.

"This will keep cocaine and marijuana smugglers from operating off Florida's coast," said Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "With the Army's continued support, the U.S.-Bahamas antidrug effort will remain fully operational."

The announcement came as Nelson departed Friday on a two-day trip that includes stops in Haiti and a flight with the DEA over the Bahamas.

Nelson was among several members of Congress and the Bush administration who raised objections to a proposal last year by then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld to redeploy the seven Bahamas Blackhawks because of war needs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who oversees the DEA, was among those questioning the move.

The DEA considers the helicopters a vital part of its Operation Bahamas, Turks and Caicos -or OPBAT for short - which is credited with seizing thousands of tons of cocaine and marijuana since 1982 and with helping drive drug smugglers away from the vast island chain.

Without the Army helicopters, the DEA would have only one helicopter in the Bahamas along with three Coast Guard Jayhawks.

Under the agreement, which must be approved by the White House, the Pentagon will give the DEA three Sikorsky helicopters in 2008 and provide other assets to temporarily fill the gap created when the Blackhawks are withdrawn by Oct. 1 of this year, according to Nelson's office.

The Other Losing War (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Kingston, Jamaica

Preoccupation with Iraq has drawn attention from another unwinnable American war that has been far more destructive of life both at home and abroad and has caused far greater collateral damage in other countries, in addition to spreading contempt for American foreign engagements. This is the failed war on drugs.

It was Nixon who, in 1971, first declared war on drugs. As with Iraq, the strategy is flawed in its conception and execution, made worse by a refusal to change course in the face of failure. It strongly emphasizes eradicating the source of drugs, interdiction of traffic and draconian punishment for offenders. It neglects what nearly every expert believes — and European experience has shown — to be the only successful strategy: a demand-side emphasis on preventive programs and rehabilitation of addicts. The present administration's claims of a shift to preventive measures is belied by the budget of its drug control office, which allocates a 94 percent share to disrupting the supply, mainly through environmentally hazardous spraying in Latin America and the Caribbean that alienates local farmers.

The domestic results are tragic: an enormous increase in the incarceration of young, disproportionately minority Americans, resulting in the waste of human resources and the creation of a prison culture that converts nonviolent addicts into hardened criminals, without any impact on drug use. Within a year of release, 43.5 percent of drug offenders are rearrested. Recent surveys indicate a steady increase in the use of illicit drugs: more than 40 percent of Americans over 12 have used them at some point. Nearly all Caribbean societies are involved with narcotrafficking and, in the case of Jamaica, large-scale production and export of marijuana. In 2001, illicit drug shipments in the region were worth more money than the top five legitimate exports combined. The results have been devastating. Political corruption and payment in arms threatens the sovereignty and stability of many states. In 1985, the chief minister and minister of commerce of the Turks and Caicos Islands were arrested in Miami and imprisoned in America for drug offenses.

Drug addiction and violent crime are now endemic in Jamaica, Puerto Rico and even small islands like St. Kitts. The corruption of the police and other security forces has reached a crisis point in Jamaica, where an officer can earn the equivalent of half a year's salary by simply looking the other way. Last year, 1,300 people were murdered here, in a population of only three million — and that was an improvement on the previous year.

Dr. Peter Phillips, Jamaica's very competent minister of national security, estimates that 60 percent of the murders are drug related. Calling cocaine trafficking and use the "taproot" of a "web of criminality," he said drugs sustain a "self-perpetuating culture of extreme violence" extending to many areas of the society.

The drug culture is highly transnational and organized, exemplified by the Jamaican "posses" that terrorized America in the 1980s with some 4,900 murders. Traffickers increasingly operate offshore, taking advantage of better arms, faster boats and more efficient tracking equipment than those available to local security forces.

Phillips is puzzled by America's inflexible emphasis on eradication and interdiction and its refusal to provide help where it is most needed, like the rebuilding of corrupted police forces. He provided a telling example of the futility of current approaches. With Americans and Jamaicans working closely together recently, the percentage of transshipments of Colombian cocaine to the U.S. that went through Jamaica was reduced from 20 to 2. But this had no effect on the amount of cocaine entering America — the traffickers simply changed routes — and it increased violent crime in Jamaica. Drug dons became more murderous in turf wars, as there was less cocaine and money to go around.

America's unwillingness to recognize the socioeconomic context of the drug crisis at home and abroad, to see that being surrounded by failing states threatens its security, to provide aid where it is most effective, and to acknowledge that the root cause of this hemispheric disaster is not supply but its own citizens' insatiable demand for illicit drugs, is as incomprehensible as the quagmire in Iraq.

IMMIGRATION:

Agents Broke Law, White House Says (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

President Bush's spokesman yesterday said the case of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are seeking a pardon for having shot a fleeing suspected drug dealer has been mischaracterized and the agents violated regulations.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said there has been "a characterization that somehow the government is turning a blind eye toward the law in enforcing the law," but said the facts of the case show the two agents broke the law.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

Border Patrol advocates say the punishment is too harsh, particularly compared with more lenient penalties for more serious offenses by other immigration authorities. Some Republicans in Congress want Mr. Bush to pardon the agents or, short of that, allow the men to remain free while an appeal is pending.

"We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said of Mr. Bush in a press conference this week. "If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies."

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a potential drug case. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned near Fabens, Texas, near the U.S.-Mexico border.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande. Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Mr. Snow would not comment on a pardon yesterday when asked about the case, but said the government is not coddling a drug dealer.

"We think it's incumbent to go after drug dealers, and we also think that it's vitally important to make sure that we provide border security so our people are secure," he said. "We also believe that the people who are working to secure that border themselves obey the law."

The spokesman said the agents picked up their shell casings after the shooting and didn't make the proper report -- both violations of regulations.

"Now, at the time this happened, they did not know if he was an illegal. They did not know that there were 700 pounds of marijuana. They didn't know any of those things," Mr. Snow said.

In a statement released as the case proceeded, U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton said he prosecuted the agents "because they had fired their weapons at a man who had attempted to surrender by holding his open hands in the air, at which time Agent Compean attempted to hit the man with the butt of Compean's shotgun, causing the man to run in fear of what the agents would do to him next."

He said both agents saw the man was not armed.

Colorado: Judge Demands Accounting Of Raid (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0117012

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

A federal judge demanded that immigration officials disclose the whereabouts of 265 people arrested in a meatpacking-plant raid last month. The judge, John L. Kane of Federal District Court in Denver, gave Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials until Jan. 22 to submit a list accounting for all the detainees, including those who have been deported. Union lawyers are contesting the arrests at the Swift & Company meat processing plant in Greeley, one of six Swift plants in six states that were raided on Dec. 13.

Colo. Judge Scrutinizes Swift Raids (DENP)

Denver Post, January 13, 2007

The government's high-profile crackdown on alleged identity theft by foreign workers at Swift meatpacking plants in Colorado and five other states faces mounting challenges in court.

A federal judge in Denver on Friday ordered immigration officials in Colorado to account for all workers detained and deported.

U.S. District Court Judge John Kane - noting "confusion on all sides" as to the whereabouts, legal status and even identities of detainees - also ordered officials to make sure detainees have had bond hearings within 48 hours.

And Kane said any workers who signed agreements to voluntarily return to their home countries now must be allowed to withdraw that agreement if they wish.

"The government is on notice that this court is monitoring its actions" in handling detainees, Kane said at a court hearing Friday.

United Food and Commercial Workers union attorneys had filed a petition contending that arrests in the raids violated workers' constitutional due process rights. Immigration officials deny that.

No federal criminal charges have been filed in Colorado, where some 261 workers were arrested at Swift's plant in Greeley.

Simultaneous raids at Swift plants in Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Texas and Utah led to 1,282 arrests overall. U.S.Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials on Friday said 219 face state or federal criminal charges.

At the court hearing in Denver, Kane told Justice Department attorneys defending the government as well as lawyers representing unions and workers to meet and discuss the shared challenge of sorting out who is being held where.

ICE agents conducting the raids used "a very orderly process," said Mark Pestal, an assistant U.S. Attorney in Colorado. "The chaos is created because (workers) are using multiple names."

Scared workers giving armed authorities false names likely is a factor in the confusion, said John Bowen, chief counsel representing the union.

Now the workers "are being held improperly" with access to lawyers impaired, Bowen said.

"We want to make sure these people have an opportunity to find out what their rights are," he said. "It is important to us that Judge Kane has made it clear he intends to ensure the process works properly."

After the raids, federal authorities bused workers to a federal compound near Denver for questioning, then to various facilities around the country. Detained workers currently are thought to be held at federal immigration detention facilities in Aurora and El Paso, Texas.

Several claimed in affidavits that the raids left them scared, uncertain about legal options, and inclined to sign voluntary departure agreements.

ICE agents addressed workers in Spanish. But workers, some of them illiterate migrants who use indigenous languages as well as Spanish, claimed in affidavits that they were unclear on what was happening.

TAX:

No New Taxes (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0117013

By Mike Pence

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

The administration hasn't learned from last year. Despite electoral defeats, it is still advancing Social Security reform as an argument over solvency. The centerpiece of George Bush's plan was to have been personal retirement accounts for workers who wanted to establish their own nest egg -- a much better deal for them and a down payment on the huge liabilities owed by the entire system. Unfortunately, his plan faltered.

The American people did not reject Social Security reform or personal retirement accounts. They rejected the entire debate and how it unfolded. They rejected the notion that the predominant goal was to make the numbers add up or, in the language of the wonks and actuaries, to make it "solvent." Such a yardstick expresses no opinion on how to fix an increasingly bankrupt program, and as a result, blesses both benefit cuts and tax increases alike.

While Mr. Bush has reiterated his opposition to tax increases, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has repeatedly said that everything is on the table for negotiations with the Democratic Congress. When Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the White House was ruling out a tax increase in Social Security reform, he replied, "No, I'm not."

This is all code for the administration's willingness to consider raising taxes in exchange for reductions in promised benefits. Such a tax increase would likely lift or eliminate the cap on the amount of salary and wages subject to the payroll tax, currently at $94,200. Raising payroll taxes would prove devastating to working Americans, small business and the economy as a whole. Worse, it would only serve as a short-term band-aid to Social Security's financial woes.

According to the Heritage Foundation, eliminating the cap will increase taxes by $484 billion over five years. This 12.4 percentage point marginal tax rate increase would hit middle-income families struggling to make ends meet, pay for college and save for retirement. Much of this increase will be borne by three million small-business owners who pay both the employer and employee portion of the tax hike. These entrepreneurs are on the forefront of job creation, and such a tax would cause millions of layoffs. Overall, the entire economy would slow by 2% to 3%, threatening the standard of living and economic opportunities of every American. In exchange for this massive tax increase, Social Security's financing will be preserved for roughly seven years.

Despite the fact that Republicans have already turned off millions of conservative Americans by runaway federal spending, some conservatives are expressing support for a Republican tax increase. They believe that through shrewd negotiating, the administration will get Democrats to agree to benefit reductions without a net tax increase, meaning a removal of the payroll cap could lead to a reduction in the payroll tax or the offering of tax credits to low-income workers. Such hope is folly disguised. Democrats are not likely to agree to reductions in promised benefits without exacting an actual tax increases, unless of course, "tax credits" are a thinly veiled attempt at passing a new entitlement for low-income workers through the tax code.

We have been down this road before. In 1990, I was a young candidate for Congress when the last Bush administration sided with a Democrat majority in Congress to pass the largest tax increase in history, all in the name of bipartisanship and compromise. This compromise ushered in economic recession and a two-term Democratic administration in the White House. We cannot walk down the 1990 road to "compromise" again.

First, the administration needs to be clear that a Social Security compromise must reject tax increases of any kind. That means no increase in the payroll tax rate and no change in the cap apart from the current indexing that already increases eligible income on an annual basis. Tell the Democratic Congress to read your lips, Mr. President: no new taxes.

Second, Social Security reform must be properly understood. It is not about achieving solvency; it is about improving the system so that it offers a better deal for younger Americans through personal savings accounts. Focusing on solvency will lead inevitably to tax increases and benefit cuts. Focusing on personal retirement accounts improves the chance of enacting sound public policy that also makes the system solvent.

Third, the administration should submit a budget that fully protects the Social Security surplus from being used to subsidize government largesse, which Patrick Moynihan once described as "embezzlement." Voters have repeatedly said loudly and clearly that they object to raiding the Social Security surplus. It is time for the administration to either offer a budget aligned with those expectations, or propose cutting the payroll tax immediately to end the historic practice of over-collecting for a pay-as-you-go system. Doing both would quickly restore the public's shattered confidence in the way we spend their money.

Republicans don't have to pass a bad Social Security reform bill. If we lack the votes now to pass legislation that will actually preserve the system and protect our nation's economic expansion, we would be wise to spend the next two years seeking to win the debate and leave a foundation of arguments that will not unravel.

Mr. Pence is a Republican representative from Indiana.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Medicare Drug Bill (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The House voted yesterday to require the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries. But the measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate, a veto threat from President Bush, and considerable doubts from experts about whether it would save elderly and disabled Americans much money.

The vote was 255 to 170, with 24 Republicans joining 231 Democrats in approving the legislation.

The bill overturns a provision of the 2003 law pushed through by a Republican-controlled Congress that left drug-price negotiations under the new Medicare drug benefit to the private insurers that offer government-subsidized drug plans for seniors in each state.

Backers of the current system, mainly Republicans, say it pits insurers against one another in a healthy competition to negotiate the lowest prices from drugmakers and offer seniors the most attractive monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies.

But critics, mainly Democrats, say the system is a boon to drug companies because it prohibits the government -- perhaps the one force powerful enough to take on the pharmaceutical industry -- from using its bargaining muscle on behalf of seniors.

"This legislation is a common-sense effort to do right by the 43 million Americans enrolled in Medicare," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "This bill is a very important first step in making prescription drugs more affordable."

The bill would require Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt to pursue negotiations with drug companies and report to Congress in six months.

Medicare "pays more than the VA pays for the same prescription pharmaceuticals," said House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), the lead sponsor of the bill, referring to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"The reason is no one is able to negotiate on behalf of the citizens," he added. "You've got a bunch of coldhearted prescription pharmaceutical people . . . who are fixing the prices that are paid by seniors citizens. . . . It's time that we correct this."

Leavitt and other Republicans countered that the year-old program is working, with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) reporting overall costs coming in billions of dollars lower than expected and average plan premiums being lower this year than in 2006. Moreover, polls conducted last fall by the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and other nonpartisan groups found that the overwhelming majority of seniors were satisfied with their drug plans.

"Many of us believe that competition and using free-market principles in the long run produce better results, lower costs, higher quality and more satisfaction among seniors. And that's exactly what we've seen with this plan," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Republicans also pointed to separate analyses this week from the CMS and the Congressional Budget Office that concluded that the House bill would have little or no effect on spending.

"It's flat wrong to think the government is going to negotiate a lower price than the competitive marketplace," said Rep. Joe L. Barton (Tex.), ranking Republican on the Energy and Commerce Committee.

W.J. "Billy" Tauzin, president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the House bill may lead to the government limiting which medicines will be covered. "That should not be acceptable to anyone," the former GOP congressman said.

DOJ_NMG_0117015

The White House issued a statement this week saying that Bush would veto the bill if it reached his desk. "Government interference impedes competition, limits access to life-saving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries, and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike," the statement said.

Medicare provides health-care coverage to most elderly Americans, as well as to about 7 million younger people with disabilities.

Although the measure moved quickly through the House, its prospects are murkier in the Senate, where no companion bill has been introduced. Sens. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) introduced legislation this week that calls for government price negotiations in certain instances, such as for drugs with no competing substitutes or when the research behind a drug was funded mostly by taxpayers.

"We do think that there is an opportunity to get some additional value for seniors and additional value for taxpayers," Wyden said.

There is considerable pressure on lawmakers to do something. A poll last month by Kaiser and the Harvard School of Public Health found that 85 percent of adults surveyed -- including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), whose committee would vet any Medicare drug bill, said in a statement this week that he favors eliminating the ban on government price negotiations -- a stance that increases the chances that some kind of legislation will pass.

But he added that he opposes "heavy-handed" intervention such as price controls. He said that wants to explore options such as expanding government studies on drug effectiveness and increasing the scrutiny on whether insurers are passing on the discounts they get from drug companies to consumers.

"The HHS secretary has a gold mine of data, the ability to get more data, dozens of agencies and tens of thousands of public servants at his disposal," he said. "That is quite a tool box with which to seek fair drug prices for seniors. It is time to open that tool box for Medicare."

House Democrats Pass Bill On Medicare Drug Prices (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Defying a veto threat, the House on Friday passed a bill to require the government to negotiate with drug manufacturers to obtain lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries.

The vote, 255 to 170, was cast with lightning speed eight days after the new Congress convened. No Democrat voted against it, while 24 Republicans joined the 231 Democrats voting in favor.

Representative Christopher S. Murphy, a freshman Democrat from Connecticut, said, “This bill has symbolic importance, breaking the grasp of the drug industry on this town.”

It is, Mr. Murphy added, “the beginning of a process to repair the Medicare drug benefit.”

The measure is unlikely to become law in its current form. But some version, focusing on certain types of very expensive drugs, has bipartisan support in the Senate and could eventually be included in a measure to revamp the drug benefit, which a Republican-led Congress created in 2003.

The bill, which fulfills a Democratic campaign promise, says the secretary of health and human services “shall negotiate with pharmaceutical manufacturers the prices that may be charged” to Medicare drug plans.

The 2003 law prohibits such negotiations. The drug benefit is delivered by private insurers, subsidized by the government. These companies have negotiated substantial discounts with drug manufacturers. Under the House bill, insurers could seek discounts deeper than those negotiated by the government.

Representative Joe L. Barton, Republican of Texas, predicted that the bill would die “a nice benign death.”

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said, “If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it.”

Democrats, who like to portray Republicans as a tool of special interests, said a veto would hand them an issue that could be used to good effect in the 2008 elections.

Some experts, including the Congressional Budget Office and Medicare actuaries, say they doubt that the bill would save money for older people or the government.

If the government, for example, tried to negotiate a discount for a particular drug and the manufacturer refused to lower its price, it is not clear what, if any, recourse Medicare would have. Without the ability to steer patients to particular drugs, the budget office said, Medicare would not have the leverage to obtain significant discounts.

Representative Tom Price, Republican of Georgia, described the bill as "a solution in search of a problem." The cost of the drug benefit is lower than expected, Mr. Price said, and the number of drug plans available to beneficiaries — more than 40 in every state — is higher than expected.

In the House debate, each party used somewhat contradictory arguments. Republicans said the bill would not save any money because the government could not restrict access to drugs. But then they said the legislation would limit the drugs available to doctors and patients.

"A government bureaucrat will be empowered to determine what kinds of drugs our seniors have access to," the Republican whip, Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, said. "If the government could not reach a deal with a drug company, seniors would not have access to those drugs."

For their part, Democrats said Medicare was overpaying for drugs and could obtain much lower prices if it negotiated with drug manufacturers, as the Department of Veterans Affairs does. But Democrats said they did not want to give Medicare two of the most powerful tools used by the veterans agency: the ability to establish a "federal ceiling price" and a uniform list of covered drugs, known as a national formulary.

While sketchy about details of their proposal, Democrats were clear that their purpose was to help beneficiaries and to reduce drug companies' profits in the Medicare market.

Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan and chief sponsor of the bill, said, "Those who insist that the sky will fall if drug companies negotiate lower prescription prices are arguing that those companies should continue to skin a fat hog at the expense of taxpayers and beneficiaries."

Another Democrat, Representative Lois Capps of California, said: "We can vote in favor of large drug companies that have raked in record profits under the Medicare drug plan. Or we can vote in favor of our senior constituents. Common sense tells me that the big drug and insurance companies would not be so adamantly opposed to this bill if they did not fear that it could result in actual price reductions."

Republicans said Medicare drug plans already had the power to negotiate drug prices and were using it. But Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey, said, "This power is splintered now among numerous private plans."

The Medicare bill was one of the high-priority measures that Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised to pass in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

House OKs Bill On Cost Of Drugs (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

The measure requiring officials to negotiate prices isn't a hit with the Senate or Bush, but it could shape debate.

WASHINGTON — Defying a threatened presidential veto, the House approved a bill Friday to require federal officials to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices for the 23 million senior citizens who have signed up for Medicare's prescription drug coverage.

Although the bill is unlikely to become law, it is likely to help shape the debate that could result in a more limited measure that allows some dickering between the government and the pharmaceutical industry over drug costs.

Supporters of such efforts argue that the huge scale of the Medicare program would result in larger discounts for prescriptions than private insurers can obtain.

At the least, the House bill signals a shift in Washington from President Bush's view that private enterprise and individual citizens should play the most prominent role in the decisions that determine healthcare costs.

DOJ_NMG_0117017

The legislation passed 255 to 170, with 24 Republicans joining 231 Democrats in backing it. All those voting against it were Republicans.

The bill would repeal a ban on letting the government negotiate with manufacturers for lower prices — a provision that was part of the GOP-sponsored 2003 measure that created the prescription drug program.

Under the House bill, the secretary of Health and Human Services would be required to seek the best prescription-drug prices for Medicare participants.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) called the bill "a very important first step in making prescription drugs more affordable."

Drug companies strongly opposed the legislation, which is one of the measures that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) promised that Democrats would enact within the first 100 working hours after taking control of the House. Several companies bought full-page newspaper ads urging Congress not to tinker with the Medicare benefit.

"Give it a chance," said the ads. "It's working."

The White House agrees with the industry.

"We have a Medicare prescription drug reform that has been saving people significant amounts of money; it is effective," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Friday. "If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it."

The bill's Senate chances appear slim.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) has said he favors a bill that would allow but not order federal haggling with pharmaceutical companies.

And the committee's ranking Republican, Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, said the House bill could "block access to drugs that a senior might need, make it harder to get your medicine at the local pharmacy, and result in higher drug prices for younger people."

But Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) made clear she would push for some version of the House bill. "Now is the time for the Senate … to harness the buying power of millions of seniors to give them a better value for their healthcare dollar."

The Medicare drug benefit narrowly passed the GOPcontrolled Congress in 2003 and was promoted by Bush during his reelection campaign as a key accomplishment.

The program's rollout last year had problems, but the benefit has proved popular among seniors.

Polls show that an overwhelming majority of beneficiaries support having Medicare negotiate prices.

Currently, private insurers negotiate with the drug industry and offer various plans; seniors pick the one that suits them best.

In Friday's House debate, Republicans argued that requiring federal officials to negotiate drug prices would foist government controls onto pharmaceutical companies.

They also disputed the assertion that the process would lower drug prices.

"The measure before us will lead to higher prices and, frankly, fewer choices for American seniors," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Democrats countered that the current program benefited the drug industry more than it benefited seniors.

"Today's bill is a genuine prescription for lower prices that should have been filled long ago," said Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas).

Democrats Take On Health Care (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House passage Friday of legislation taking a swipe at drug companies is just the first front in the new Democratic Congress's battle with the health-care industry. The next target: insurers, who will face demands for cuts in their Medicare subsidies.

On a 255-to-170 vote, the House passed legislation that would require the government to negotiate prescription prices with the pharmaceutical industry. Currently, private insurers handle the negotiations for Medicare and the government is barred from getting involved, an arrangement that critics say leads to higher prices than if the government used its clout. Twenty-four Republicans joined the Democratic majority in backing the measure, but its prospects are less certain in the closely divided Senate, and President Bush has threatened a veto.

The price-negotiation bill is just the new Congress's first maneuver on health care, after many Democrats promised on the campaign trail to lower drug costs in Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly and disabled. Beyond that, key Democrats are attacking another big change Republicans brought to Medicare while they controlled Congress. As part of 2003 Medicare drug-benefit legislation, lawmakers seeking to inject more private-sector involvement in the program dramatically increased federal payments to private insurance plans operating in the Medicare Advantage arm of the program.

In Medicare Advantage, private insurers provide seniors a full range of medical benefits as an alternative to the government-run program. Seniors automatically become eligible for Medicare when they turn 65, but then have the choice to sign up instead for coverage through a private Medicare Advantage plan.

Democrats say the payment increases in the legislation -- projected to be worth as much as $46 billion over the decade beginning in 2004 -- are a waste of taxpayer money, and they view Medicare Advantage as an attempt by Republicans to privatize the traditional program. Now, some Democrats want to reduce payments to the private plans, and budgetary concerns are heightening the pressure on the payments to insurers.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program, a federal block grant, will soon need to be reauthorized, and many Democrats would like to expand it. Congress is also likely to boost Medicare payments to doctors. At a time when Democrats are aiming to be fiscally responsible, such spending would likely have to be offset.

"There are precious few areas where we can save money. Medicare Advantage is a prime target to pick up a few dollars," says Rep. Pete Stark, the California Democrat who heads the House Ways and Means panel's health subcommittee. In the Senate, a Democratic aide predicts Medicare Advantage money will become "the standard pay-for" in lawmakers' legislative proposals.

Following a lobbying and advertising blitz by drug companies to block the Democratic attacks, health insurers are preparing their own counterattack. America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry's Washington-based trade group, is telling lawmakers that cuts in insurer subsidies would be tantamount to cuts in benefits for constituents, and it has readied maps to show the growth of Medicare Advantage plans throughout the country, compared to relatively sparse numbers before government payments increased.

It will tap the Coalition for Medicare Choices, a group for Medicare Advantage beneficiaries that AHIP started and funds, to bring satisfied customers to Congress. And AHIP will highlight research showing that a large portion of Medicare Advantage beneficiaries are minorities or have low incomes -- populations shown to suffer disproportionately from chronic health problems that plans say they can manage better than the government.

Of about 44 million Medicare beneficiaries, 7.6 million, or 17%, were in Medicare Advantage plans as of December 2006. That compares with about 6.1 million, or 14%, who were enrolled in the plans in December 2005.

"This is the ultimate in constituency politics," says Karen Ignagni, AHIP'S president and chief executive.

Beyond their philosophical complaints, many Democrats say Medicare Advantage wastes government money. Former House Democratic aide Brian Biles has done a study concluding that, on average, the government is spending $922 more each year for every beneficiary in Medicare Advantage, compared to what would have been spent if the person had remained in regular Medicare.

In 2005, the "overpayment," as Democrats call it, totaled $5.2 billion, according to a November 2006 report by Mr. Biles and others for the Commonwealth Fund, a private, nonprofit foundation that supports health research. An independent panel that advises Congress on Medicare also documented the payment differential. "It's a problem because it causes us to waste a lot of taxpayer money," Mr. Stark says. "I see no reason to do it."

AHIP disagrees with the methodology used in the study, and it points to Medicare data showing that Medicare Advantage beneficiaries save an average of $82 a month, in reduced out-of-pocket costs and extra benefits, compared to people in the traditional program. Insurers say the program has also succeeded in extending and expanding Medicare Advantage to rural areas, where it was lacking. And that means they can count on rural-state legislators to battle the Democratic attacks.

"We wanted equity in those plans....We've got it now," says Iowa Republican Sen. Charles Grassley. "People in Iowa ought to have the same choices as those in New York, Miami and Los Angeles."

The Wrong Prescription (WP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

HOUSE Democrats delivered on a campaign promise yesterday, passing a bill that would require the government to negotiate the price of pharmaceuticals covered by the new Medicare drug benefit. The idea is that government negotiators could force prices down, generating savings that could be used to make the benefit more generous. But the measure is misguided.

The Democrats point to the Department of Veterans Affairs, which manages to negotiate discounts for the drugs covered in the veterans' health program. But the department can do this because it is free to deny coverage for drugs whose makers refuse to provide discounts: Fully 3,000 of the 4,300 medicines covered by Medicare are unavailable under the veterans' program. Restricting the list of covered drugs saves money, but it also reduces the quality of the benefit -- 1.5 million veterans are sufficiently unhappy with the result that they opt to buy the more inclusive Medicare coverage. Recognizing that narrow formularies are unpopular, the Democratic plan does not permit Medicare to establish one. But if drugmakers know that Medicare must buy their pills, why would they grant a discount? The Congressional Budget Office estimated this week that savings from direct negotiation would be "negligible."

Not only are the Democrats too optimistic about government negotiation; they are also too pessimistic about the current system in which private insurers administering Medicare drug benefits do the price bargaining. These private insurers stand to profit if they can secure discounts and cut premiums and thus attract more customers: Witness the fact that the average monthly premium has fallen since the program began a year ago. Private insurers can do this precisely because they are free to establish formularies, but market discipline ensures that these lists are not unappealingly narrow. The insurers need to keep customers.

The Democrats' stance is troubling because it suggests an excessively government-led view of health-care reform. One of the key challenges in health policy is to understand which drugs, tests and therapies are most cost-effective; although it will take government pressure on doctors and hospitals to disclose the information necessary to figure out what works, solutions are most likely to be found by competing private entities. In drugs, for example, there needs to be a culture of paying handsomely for new ones that really do add value -- and refusing to pay for pseudo-new drugs that merely mimic cheap generics. Striking the right balance is not easy, and it won't be accomplished by government fiat. The better approach is to let each insurer offer its own version of the right balance, see whether it attracts customers -- and then adapt flexibly.

In Reversal, Senate Endorses Plan On Disclosing Earmarks (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Senate Democratic leaders on Friday embraced a proposal to shed light on the murky practice of Congressional earmarks, reversing themselves after trying to block an almost identical measure the day before.

The Democrats' switch makes it likely that the Senate will follow the new House rules requiring the disclosure of the sponsor as well as the cost and the purpose of any earmark. That would bring into public view for the first time a practice that last year allowed lawmakers to direct federal money to more than 12,000 pet projects worth more than $64 billion by tucking them into complicated spending bills, often anonymously. Lawmakers tend to use the projects to reward constituents and contributors.

The reversal follows a White House statement of support for the measure and a day of news coverage noting that Senate Democrats were opposing a rule that their House counterparts had just adopted a week ago. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said he had come around to the measure after some adjustments that he said had strengthened it.

"Yesterday was a rather difficult day, as some days are," Mr. Reid said, appearing to apologize for his effort to kill the measure Thursday. "There is a lot of confusion as to what people were trying to accomplish."

While debating a proposed package of ethics and lobbying rule changes that would include the earmark disclosure requirements, the Senate also voted 87 to 0 to deny federal pension benefits to any member of Congress convicted of fraud or corruption charges.

Sponsors of the measure said its inspiration was former Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California. He is in prison for selling earmarked defense contracts worth tens of millions of dollars in exchange for gifts and cash worth over $2.4 million, but he still receives his federal pension of $40,000 a year, becoming the latest in a long chain of corrupt law makers whose retirement benefits have galled taxpayers.

But while Mr. Cunningham's actions provoked the Senate vote, he will continue to collect his pension. The main sponsors, Senators John Kerry of Massachusetts and Ken Salazar of Colorado, both Democrats, said Congress could not revoke the pension of Mr. Cunningham or other former lawmakers, only future Congressional criminals.

The Cunningham scandal also helped inspire bipartisan calls for more earmark disclosure last year. But any restrictions have always drawn the fierce opposition of the powerful House and Senate Appropriations Committees, which dole out earmarks to other lawmakers as they write spending bills. In part because of internal resistance, the leaders of both parties initially proposed a weak earmark disclosure requirement with loopholes that excluded all but a small part of all earmarks. The Senate had approved the same provision last year under Republican control.

A bipartisan agreement to settle for the weaker earmark measure fell apart Thursday when Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, sought to impose the new House rule on the Senate. "Our version of earmark disclosure was going to be an embarrassment to the Senate, especially after Nancy Pelosi placed a much stronger version on the House side," Mr. DeMint said. "Some of the Democrats bought that argument."

A move by Senate Democratic leaders to kill Mr. DeMint's amendment unexpectedly failed, with nine Democrats, the independent Joseph I. Lieberman and 41 Republicans voting to keep it alive. The surprise threw the Senate into chaos as the Democratic leaders sought to block its immediate passage and regain control of the debate.

On Friday, Democratic aides said Republican leaders failed to deliver on a pledge to support the weaker measure. Republicans aides said there was no such agreement.

Senate Of One Mind On Ethics (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The Senate yesterday voted unanimously to bar congressional lawmakers convicted of corruption from collecting federal pensions, and Democrats vowed to drop opposition to a comprehensive approach to pork-barrel-spending reform.

The pension measure, an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill in the new Democratic-controlled Senate, applies to current and future lawmakers convicted of bribery, conspiracy and perjury charges. It passed 87-0.

"With this vote, we are preventing members of Congress who steal or cheat from receiving a lifelong pension that is paid for by the taxpayers," said Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, co-sponsor of the pension proposal with fellow Democrat Sen. Ken Salazar of Colorado.

"Those lawmakers deserve nothing but shame."

Democrats lauded yesterday's vote as a victory over the "culture of corruption" they say permeated Congress under Republican rule. They regularly cited former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican, who was convicted of bribery in 2005.

The measure, however, is not retroactive, so Cunningham will receive his $64,000 pension annually as will at least 16 other convicted lawmakers, 12 Democrats and four Republicans. Former Rep. Dan Rostenkowski of Illinois, who was convicted of mail fraud in 1996, will collect about $126,000 annually.

Meanwhile, Democratic leaders said they will now allow a vote on a Republican pork-reform proposal that was imperiled Thursday when Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, used a procedural tactic to delay a vote.

DOJ_NMG_0117021

The pork reform proposal by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican -- also an amendment to the ethics bill -- would require that members of Congress disclose all requests for pork projects, also known as earmarks, that often are buried in complicated legislation.

Immediately before Mr. Reid stopped a vote Thursday on the amendment, the Senate expressed its support by rejecting a bid to kill it on a 51-46 vote.

The maneuver gave Mr. Reid time to turn Democrats against the measure, which is similar to the ethics rules adopted with fanfare last week by the new Democratic-led House.

The episode Thursday drew comparisons between House Republicans extending voting time on the 2003 Medicare prescription drug benefit to allow leaders to persuade members to change their votes -- a tactic criticized by Democrats at the time.

Mr. Reid gave a conciliatory speech on the Senate floor yesterday morning, announcing that he was seeking a bipartisan compromise on the proposal to fully disclose pork-barrel spending.

"It was a rather difficult day, as some days are," Mr. Reid said. "We tend to get in a hurry around here sometimes when we shouldn't be. We tend to spend a lot of time doing things that accomplish nothing."

An agreement was reached late yesterday to bring the DeMint amendment to a vote Tuesday evening, after lawmakers return from the Martin Luther King holiday. A vote on the entire ethics bill could come as soon as Wednesday.

Mr. DeMint thanked Mr. Reid for "agreeing to do the right thing" and drafting a compromise amendment that is stronger than his original amendment.

The Senate pension amendment does not go as far as a House bill by Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, which would withhold congressional pensions from lawmakers convicted of any of 21 different felonies.

The Kirk bill includes the felonies of solicitation of political contributions, intimidation to secure political contributions, promises of appointment by a candidate and expenditures to influence voting.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said the chamber next week would take up a proposal by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that lawmakers expect will resemble the Senate measure. It had not been filed as of yesterday.

Senate Wants No Pension For Convicted Lawmakers (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

The chamber expands the list of crimes that could lead to denial of the benefit.

WASHINGTON — With disgraced ex-California Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham eligible to collect a congressional pension from behind bars, the Senate on Friday voted to deny taxpayer-funded retirement benefits to lawmakers convicted in the future of serious ethics offenses.

The action came as the Senate moved toward overhauling its ethics rules, including stricter guidelines to end the secrecy around earmarking, a controversial practice that contributed to congressional scandals involving Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Critics have denounced the practice, in which lawmakers secretly slip pet projects into spending bills, often without public notice and at the request of lobbyists who contribute to their campaigns. And they had accused the Senate's new Democratic leadership of writing a loophole-riddled bill that would have failed to publicly identify the sponsors of most earmarks.

But on Friday, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a leading critic of earmarking, said he and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) reached an agreement "so that every earmark is disclosed."

The deal came as the Senate voted 87 to 0 to expand the list of crimes under which a former lawmaker could be denied a pension to include bribery, conspiracy and perjury. Federal employees in all branches of government forfeit their pensions if convicted of "crimes against the United States," such as treason.

"The best way to restore and rebuild the trust of the American people is to ensure that we stand firmly against members of Congress who betray the public trust," said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), the measure's sponsor.

The legislation would not apply retroactively; Kerry said such a law would be unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0117022

Cunningham, a Republican from Rancho Santa Fe, is serving an eight-year prison term after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors who sought earmarks and to evading more than $1 million in taxes.

He is eligible for an estimated $64,000 annual pension with his military service, including $36,000 a year from his eight terms in Congress.

An attorney for Cunningham declined to comment.

The measure has strong bipartisan support in the House.

"The fact that the Senate passed it puts a lot of pressure on the House to do the same," said Rep. Lee Terry (R-Neb.), sponsor of a similar measure in the House.

At least 20 former lawmakers convicted of crimes are eligible for taxpayer-funded pensions, some as high as $125,000 a year, according to the National Taxpayers Union, which supports denying pensions to lawmakers turned felons.

Former Rep. James A. Traficant Jr. (D-Ohio), serving eight years after his 2002 conviction for bribery, racketeering and tax evasion, could be pulling in $40,000 a year, the group estimated. The figures are estimates because federal officials decline to disclose pension records for retired members of Congress.

Former House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who served time for mail fraud and was later pardoned by President Clinton, might be collecting more than $125,000 a year, the group said.

Pete Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union said that some former lawmakers convicted of crimes had even used their pensions to help pay their fines.

The Senate is expected to complete work on its ethics bill next week.

Bill Strips Ethics-challenged Legislators Of Pensions (CNN)

CNN.com, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Senate on Friday approved a measure stripping taxpayer-funded pensions from members of Congress who are convicted of serious ethics offenses, such as bribery and conspiracy.

The vote was 87-0.

Sens. John Kerry, D-Massachusetts, and Ken Salazar, D-Colorado, attached the amendment to an ethics reform bill earlier this week.

"The only thing crazier than giving a member of Congress convicted of a crime a federal pension is the fact that we still need a bill to prevent a convict from receiving their pension," Salazar said at the time. "A member of Congress who abuses their position of authority for their personal profit deserves a prison sentence, not a government pension."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Maryland, said Friday that the House will take up a similar bill next Friday.

If passed by the House and signed into law by President Bush, the bill would eliminate pensions only for future members of Congress convicted of ethics offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0117023

Ex-congressmen such as Randall "Duke" Cunningham -- collecting an estimated $64,000 a year although he pleaded guilty to charges of accepting bribes -- and James Traficant -- convicted of taking bribes, among other charges, and collecting an estimated $40,000 a year -- will get to keep their pensions.

The bill also would not affect former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in September after he was found to have sent inappropriate e-mails and messages to House pages. Foley is the subject of a criminal investigation in Florida, but has not been charged.

Energy Big Oil, In House Sights, Hopes Senate Cools Debate (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Big Oil is set to take a beating from House Democrats on Thursday when they are prepared to vote on a bill they say will "roll back" about $13 billion worth of subsidies the executive branch and Congress have given oil companies.

The move is part of the House Democrats' 100-hour legislative blitz. Once the bill reaches the Senate, however, the race will turn into more of a marathon. George Washington once said the difference between the two houses is that the Senate provides a "cooling saucer" for the passions of the moment to die down.

The new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, reminded senators of President Washington's words earlier this month with a memo saying the Senate could take "several months" to analyze the package. The delay will give the nation's independent oil producers a chance to make their argument, which is that the House Democrats are throwing a boomerang that could strike the wrong companies and then loop back and hit the nation in the form of higher fuel prices and even greater reliance on foreign oil.

The House Democrats' package includes three major items. One will impose a "conservation fee" on about 40 companies producing oil in the Gulf of Mexico that have leases from 1998 and 1999 and which failed to include a clause requiring royalty payments if oil prices rose, which they have. The omission was caused by an Interior Department error, but if the companies don't pay the fee, the proposal would bar them from getting new leases.

Democrats will also reduce accelerated tax write-offs for oil- and gas-exploration expenses, and shrink a tax-depreciation measure, contained in a 2004 jobs bill, that gives companies producing oil and gas in the U.S. the equivalent of a 1% corporate-tax reduction.

The Senate will ponder the impact of the changes at a time when 60.2% of the nation's oil comes from overseas and when 82% of the nation's domestically produced gas and 68% of its crude oil come from wells drilled by independent oil companies, many of which are midsize or smaller.

"This will have a bigger effect on us, and we have fewer places to raise and spend our revenue," says Lee Fuller, vice president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, referring to the exploration subsidies.

If gasoline prices rise in the spring, though, George Washington's proverbial saucer may not work. The issue could heat up again.

House Democrats Detail Energy Plan (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

House Democrats introduced the energy piece of their legislative agenda, a measure that would curtail tax breaks and incentives for oil and gas companies and invest the funds in renewable energy.

The bill is projected to raise $13 billion in revenue over five years, and would set that money aside in a "fund" to be used for spending and tax breaks for renewable energy sources, not including nuclear power.

Natural Resources Committee Chairman Nick J. Rahall (D-W.Va.) and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) introduced the bill, which trims breaks for geological work and excludes oil and gas from a 2004 measure that would effectively reduce their tax rate to 32 percent, from 35 percent.

It also takes aim at oil and gas companies that signed federal leases in 1998 and 1999 with incentives for offshore exploration in deep water. Those leases neglected to include price thresholds. As a result, the leaseholders do not pay royalties regardless of how high oil and gas prices soar.

DOJ_NMG_0117024

The House measure says companies with those leases cannot bid on new federal leases unless they renegotiate the contracts or pay "conservation" fees of $9 a barrel on oil and $1.25 per thousand cubic feet on gas produced under the old leases.

Oil Companies Attack Legislation Aimed At Tax Incentives (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — The nation's oil and gas companies, hoping to fend off an attack by Congress on their tax breaks and subsidies, angrily denounced an effort by House Democratic leaders Friday that would repeal billions of dollars worth of incentives and plow the money into renewable energy projects.

"This bill takes capital from U.S. oil and natural gas companies that otherwise would be spent on domestic energy exploration," said Barry Russell, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, which represents about 5,000 smaller oil and gas producers. "If the goal is to lessen our dependence on foreign oil, then this bill falls far short."

The giant integrated oil companies, like Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have been more resigned about losing some of their tax breaks but are quietly resisting pressure to renegotiate leases that allow them to pump billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from publicly owned waters without paying royalties to the government.

House Democratic leaders unveiled a bill on Friday that could raise more than $10 billion by repealing half a dozen incentives created in the last several years by the Republican-led Congress or by the Bush administration.

One measure would pressure companies to give up a lucrative loophole that the government inadvertently included in offshore drilling leases for the Gulf of Mexico.

The leases, signed in 1998 and 1999, allow companies drilling in deepwater to escape royalty payments on as much as 87.5 million barrels of oil per lease. Because of an error that officials ignored for six years, the leases omitted a standard escape clause that eliminates the incentives if oil prices climb above $34 a barrel.

Government officials have estimated that the mistake could cost the Treasury $10 billion over the next five years. The Bush administration has asked companies to voluntarily renegotiate, but only five companies have signed new agreements.

The House bill would punish companies that refuse to change their leases by either charging them a "conservation fee" of $9 for each barrel of oil they produce or prohibiting them from acquiring any additional leases in federal waters.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own," said Representative Nick J. Rahall, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee.

But Mr. Russell, representing the independent petroleum producers, accused the Democrats of breaking valid contracts.

A few oil giants, including BP and Shell, agreed to give up the loopholes. But industry executives said one big player in the gulf, Exxon Mobil, has refused to renegotiate, arguing that it signed the leases in good faith. Chevron, which with several partners recently announced the discovery of a giant oil field that may include two of the flawed leases, said it had submitted a "reasonable" proposal but had not reached an accord.

The House bill would also repeal several other royalty incentives. It would prohibit "royalty relief" for natural gas produced from very deep wells in shallow waters. It would also repeal similar "relief" for companies drilling off the coast of Alaska.

On the tax front, the House bill would repeal a provision passed in 2004 that entitles oil companies to tax credits for "domestic manufacturing" and a $2 billion tax break for "geological and geophysical" expenses in exploration.

Lawmakers in both parties predicted on Friday that the House would easily pass the measure next week. But the industry may have more clout in the Senate, where Democrats have more tenuous control.

Minimum-Wage Hike May Reach To Samoa (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), dogged by Republican charges of a double standard, said yesterday that American Samoa may join the Northern Mariana Islands as U.S. territories that would have to comply with a higher federal minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0117025

Under the minimum-wage increase approved by the House this week, employers on the Northern Marianas would for the first time have to pay their workers the minimum wage, which would rise from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. For years, Republicans -- with the help of convicted lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff -- have fended off efforts to bring the islands under federal labor laws.

The bill would leave American Samoa as the only territory not covered by the $7.25 rate, and because Samoa is represented by a Democrat, Del. Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, Republicans cried foul.

Faleomavaega's campaign coffers have been well stocked by the tuna industry that dominates his island economy, but Republicans picked up on another issue: StarKist owns one of the largest canneries on the island, and Del Monte Foods, StarKist's parent company, is based in San Francisco, which Pelosi represents.

"I have asked the Education and Labor Committee, as they go forward with the legislation, to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Pelosi announced yesterday.

Pelosi aides said the committee would be asked to work toward having all territories use the same wage standard.

Pelosi Moves To Close Samoa Wage Loophole (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi yesterday said Democrats will close a loophole in the House-passed minimum wage increase that exempts American Samoa -- an action taken after it was revealed that one of the U.S. territory's main employers is based in her congressional district.

"I have asked the Education and Labor Committee as they go forward with the legislation to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Mrs. Pelosi said.

The decision follows criticism over the exemption, reported earlier this week by The Washington Times, to allow tuna canneries in American Samoa to continue paying $3.26 an hour -- nearly $4 less than the $7.25 minimum wage passed by the House Wednesday.

Republicans, after the vote, pointed out that StarKist Tuna, one of two companies that employs about 75 percent of the Samoan work force, is owned by Del Monte, which is headquartered in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district.

"Simply put: It is unethical to provide a special benefit to a company in any member of Congress' hometown," said Rep. John B. Shadegg, Arizona Republican. "For Democrats to act in such a manner so early on in their tenure is hypocritical at best and criminal at worst."

Democrats involved in the legislation say that neither Del Monte nor StarKist has lobbied Mrs. Pelosi or the committee on the matter. And records show that while Del Monte political action committees have given $5,300 in the past five years to Republicans, neither they nor Del Monte executives have given to any Democrats.

The bill, which raises the federal minimum wage $2.10 from $5.15, pointedly extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the Northern Marianas Islands, another U.S. territory in the Pacific with similarly low wages.

Democrats defended the exemption earlier in the week, saying that the Northern Marianas territory has a long history of work-force abuses that require immediate action. But they also acknowledged that the wages in both places are essentially the same and, they said, need to be raised.

One person who is concerned about enforcing the federal minimum wage in American Samoa is non-voting Rep. Eni Faleomavaega, who echoed the arguments of many conservatives against raising the minimum wage in poorer regions of the U.S. mainland.

A "decrease in production or departure of one or both of the two canneries in American Samoa could devastate the local economy, resulting in massive layoffs and insurmountable financial difficulties," he said in a statement provided to The Times.

"The truth is the global tuna industry is so competitive that it is no longer possible for the federal government to demand mainland minimum wage rates for American Samoa without causing the collapse of our economy and making us welfare wards of the federal government."

Melissa Murphy Brown, vice president for Del Monte, warned in a statement yesterday that applying the minimum wage at the tuna packing plants in American Samoa would "severely cripple the local economy."

"For over 50 years, the Federal Department of Labor has provided that wages in U.S. territories, including American Samoa, be set by a federally appointed wage board, following public hearings," she said in a background statement compiled by StarKist and Chicken of the Sea.

"The wage board takes into accounts several factors including standards of living and recognizes that wages cannot increase to a level that substantially curtails employment."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on the House floor yesterday that the decision to exempt American Samoa "was not an oversight."

"The minimum wage in America Samoa, unlike the Marianas or Guam, is set by the Department of Labor and Industry Committee so that it is determined in a different way than the others, including our states," he said.

Wages paid in American Samoa are often lower than the $3.05 minimum wage in effect in the Northern Marianas. Wages in American Samoa for manual labor range from $2.70 up to about $3.60, according to the U.S. Department of Labor.

House Democrats Propose Cut In Student Loan Rates (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — House Democrats on Friday unveiled a bill that would cut interest rates on federally subsidized loans to college students by half over the next five years.

They said they would finance the $6 billion measure by increasing costs that lenders pay to the government and reducing the largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits.

The bill, one of half a dozen that the new House majority had placed on its 100-hour agenda, underscores the Democrats' all-out effort to consolidate gains made in November among middle-class voters.

"How to pay for a college education has become a primary concern for students and families across this country, a concern that Congress must urgently address as part of our goal of strengthening America's middle class," said Representative George Miller, chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

The measure is expected to pass in the House, where it is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday. Its future in the Senate is less certain, although the concept behind it is supported by Democratic leaders there, including Edward M. Kennedy, chairman of the education committee, who is planning to introduce a similar bill.

House Republicans, who in trying to contain college costs have focused in recent years on restraining tuition increases, complained Friday of being shut out of the process of writing the new bill and said they would offer amendments before Wednesday's vote.

"I'm hopeful we can work in a bipartisan way to build upon it, including with reforms that actually make college more affordable and more accessible for low- and middle-income students," said Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the ranking Republican on Mr. Miller's committee.

That theme was echoed at the White House. Blain Rethmeier, a spokesman, said the Bush administration would support efforts in Congress to ease students' burden, but added that "colleges have the central role to play in ensuring access to affordable higher education."

Student debt has grown exponentially in recent years, in tandem with college costs that routinely outpace inflation. The average college student now graduates with nearly $18,000 in debt. The Democratic proposal would benefit many such students: the 5.5 million a year who receive subsidized Stafford loans.

The measure unveiled Friday would make good only in part on Democrats' campaign promise to halve the interest rates on student loans. Democrats had never said that the cut would not fully take effect until 2012 or that the pledge applied only to subsidized Stafford loans.

Unlike Pell grants, which go to students with family incomes under $40,000, Stafford loans are also tapped by middle-income students. Some 75 percent of students holding Stafford loans come from families with household incomes under $67,000, just above the median income for a family of four, which is $65,000, said Luke Swarthout, advocate for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group Higher Education Project.

The bill would cut the interest rates on subsidized Stafford loans for undergraduates — loans to graduate students would not be affected — to 3.4 percent from the current rate of 6.8 percent, in stages. The first reductions would affect new loans made after July 1.

According to the Project on Student Debt, a nonprofit group, the bill would save a student who graduates from college with $20,000 in debt about $4,000 over the 10-year life of a loan.

Under the program of subsidized Stafford loans, the government guarantees lenders a rate of return that can be higher than the interest rate paid by the student. In trying to finance their proposal, House Democrats decided that for the largest lenders, the bill would lower that rate by 0.1 percentage point. It would also raise fees that lenders pay to the government, and cut payments that lenders receive if a student defaults.

While applauded by student advocacy groups, the bill drew immediate criticism from the student loan industry, which complained that it had already absorbed $12 billion in reduced payments from the government as part of a larger, Republican-led deficit reduction effort last year.

"What we're really seeing is Peter being robbed to pay Paul," said Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, the nation's largest holder of student loans. "When you continue to cut and cut again, eventually who you're hurting is not the banks but the students and the parents themselves," said Mr. Joyce, suggesting that such reductions would ultimately impair services to borrowers.

Mr. Swarthout, of the Higher Education Project, called the bill "a good first step to making college more affordable." He added, "It will save millions of students thousands of dollars on their debt." He said that by showcasing the issue in its first days in power, the new Congress was sending a strong signal to student borrowers, and creating high expectations among them for further aid.

"You cannot put college affordability as a top agenda item and then walk away after cutting interest rates," he said.

While Democrats in the Senate have embraced the goals of halving interest rates, action there will not be as swift as in the House. Melissa Wagoner, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy, said committee hearings would most likely begin on Jan. 25.

Mr. Kennedy's bill would phase in similar cuts in interest rates not only in subsidized Stafford loans but also in another loan program . It is broader than the House bill in other ways as well, raising Pell grants to a maximum of $5,100 a year, from $4 ,050.

Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman for Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said Ms. Spellings supported an increase in the Pell grants.

Clock Ticking On Dems' 100-hour Agenda (AP)

By Kasie Hunt

AP, January 12, 2007

The clock is ticking for House Democrats, but it's hard to tell what time it is.

On Friday, for example, the House was in session for a little more than eight hours. Only five of them, however, ticked off on new Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for quickly passing a six-bill agenda that Democrats promised voters last fall.

With passage of a bill to make the government negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices, Pelosi, D-Calif., is two-thirds of the way done — in under a quarter of the allotted hours, according to her count.

That's because just as the official clock for a basketball or football game stops for time-outs and commercial breaks, Democrats aren't counting the minutes spent on business unrelated to those six designated bills.

So while the House had been in session for nearly 56 hours since the 110th Congress was sworn in Jan. 4, the clock on Pelosi's Web site suggested that less than half that time — 23 hours, 34 minutes — had elapsed by the close of business Friday.

"We're just counting the legislative hours," Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill explained.

Regardless of which clock is used, Democrats appear well on their way to accomplishing their promise. They have only two bills to go and both are scheduled for votes next week. Aiding their endeavor is Monday's Martin Luther King Jr. federal holiday, when neither clock will be running.

DOJ_NMG_0117028

Finished are new rules on ethics, lobbying and budgeting — part of the Democrats' 100-hour promise in November but not included on Pelosi's clock. Also completed are the passage of four bills: anti-terrorism measures, a minimum-wage increase,and expanding federally funded stem cell research, in addition to Friday's Medicare measure.

The final two bills are cutting interest rates on some student loans and recouping more money from oil royalties and redistributing it to renewable energy technologies.

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the clock — no matter how time is kept — is irrelevant.

"The clock is just a distraction to the hypocrisy they've exhibited and continued to exhibit in the first 100 hours," Kennedy said, referring to House Democrats' refusal to allow the GOP minority a chance to offer amendments or have any role in writing the bills. Democrats had leveled the same criticism that Republicans, then in the majority, denied them those opportunities.

No time was run on either clock Monday, when many lawmakers attended the BCS championship football game in Arizona between Ohio State and Florida.

Competing House Clocks Tick At Different Speeds As Members Get Down To Business (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — How much bipartisanship is really possible if Democrats and Republicans can't even agree on how to tell time?

After House Democrats posted a digital clock on their Web site on Tuesday to mark how much time had elapsed as they pushed through their First 100 Hours agenda, Republicans retaliated with their own online clock on Wednesday. They are counting down the hours passed by "a Democrat caucus fresh out of ideas."

All week, members of Congress demonstrated a much more exacting sense of the clock than usual.

"It has been an interesting 58 hours and 48 minutes as of this morning," said Representative Marsha Blackburn, Republican of Tennessee, in a floor speech Friday. But by the Democratic clock, only 23 hours and 34 minutes had passed. Ms. Blackburn criticized Democrats as engaging in "creative clock-keeping."

Democrats say they are measuring only "legislative hours," meaning the time spent on lawmaking activities. But like dog years and the last two minutes of an N.B.A. game, "legislative time" does not necessarily correspond to "real time."

As the clocks ticked:

MONDAY, LATE AFTERNOON Senate Democrats would have started their clock on Monday, except that they did not have a clock. It's a House thing. Still, the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, was eager to get to work and is a stickler for punctuality. He said he was committed to operating the chamber more efficiently — meaning, on time. Senator Bernie Sanders, independent of Vermont and newly elected, missed what would have been his first vote despite a last-minute dash through the Capitol hallways.

TUESDAY, 1:15 P.M. "I have no idea what time it is," said Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska. And then he indulged in an elaborate metaphor to summarize the cyclical nature of things.

"I look upon life as the wheel in the barnyard," Mr. Young said. "Politics is the rooster on the wheel saying cock-a-doodle-doo. Some of the Democrats on the top of the wheel think the sun's going to shine all day. They don't realize that the wheel is turning and that there's someone else coming up from the bottom of the wheel."

Behold, the clarity.

WEDNESDAY, 3 P.M. TO 4 P.M. Off the House floor, in the ornate area known as the Speaker's Lobby, the shift in power was on full display. Members of the press swarmed to the left side of the lobby to meet Democrats coming off the floor. Republicans trickling off to the right were essentially left alone.

"People seem to be paying more attention to me now that I'm in the majority," said Representative Henry Cuellar, Democrat of Texas. Standing under the official portrait of former Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Mr. Cueller wore the "look, Mom!" face of a sudden big shot, or bigger shot than before.

DOJ_NMG_0117029

Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, was slumped on the other side of the lobby, complaining that he had just been kicked off the Judiciary Committee by members of his own party.

"I think I was punished for speaking too freely," Mr. Flake said, specifically for his willingness to compromise with Democrats on immigration overhaul.

Representative Ed Perlmutter, a freshman Democrat from Colorado, had spent much of his week on the House floor. Even when there was nothing doing, no votes scheduled and few members on the floor, he sat and just watched. One of his goals for the first 100 hours is simply to learn the names of his new colleagues. "I could probably identify about 100 right now," Mr. Perlmutter said, leaving 334 to go.

THURSDAY, NOON For all the talk of the Democrats' "flurry of legislation" in the first 100 hours, the war in Iraq clearly dominated the day. President Bush addressed the nation the night before. Top administration figures appeared at Congressional hearings.

Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York, was eating lunch in his office, lingering in a conversation about Buffalo sports teams. Not too long ago, he was a member of the leadership team of the majority party, head of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee and in a tough re-election campaign. "I just finished up '06 with two full-time jobs," he said, referring to his posts as congressman and head of the campaign committee. Now he was sprawled out in his office eating a ham sandwich. "Washington loves survivors," he said.

FRIDAY, 4 P.M. Representative Joe Courtney, a freshman Democrat from Connecticut, was walking briskly and hoping to catch a flight to Hartford. Earlier, he gave his first floor speech as a member of Congress, a five-minute talk about Medicare. He was nervous at first, but was fine once he got going.

"I meant to say 'Mr. Speaker' and 'thank you, Mr. Stark,' " Mr. Courtney said. "But I wound up saying 'Thank you, Mr. Spark.' Oh well."

He shrugged and headed out for the weekend, promising to do better next time.

By the end of the day Friday, the Democratic clock read 23 hours and 34 minutes, while the Republican clock, which was counting down from 100, read 75 hours.

Lawmaker's Wife Out As Fundraiser (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) said yesterday that he will no longer employ his wife as his campaign fundraiser, an arrangement that allowed her to collect a 15 percent cut of donations to his campaign and political action committees -- more than $100,000 since 2003.

Doolittle, who has drawn criticism for links to disgraced lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff, said he will hire an outside fundraiser. He made the announcement in a commentary article he distributed to newspapers in his Northern California district, noting his tough battle for reelection.

"After winning my election with less than 50 percent of the vote, I recognize that change is needed for me to rebuild the trust and support of my constituents," Doolittle wrote.

The change was one of 10 steps that Doolittle pledged to take after a campaign clouded by questions about Julie Doolittle's fundraising and his ties to Abramoff.

Doolittle accepted campaign donations from Abramoff and interceded with the Bush administration on behalf of the lobbyist's tribal clients. His former chief of staff, Kevin A. Ring, went to work with Abramoff and, sources told The Washington Post, later played a role in the hiring of Julie Doolittle's consulting firm by Abramoff and his firm, Greenberg Traurig.

Doolittle also promised to spend more time in his district and make himself more available to the media.

Doolittle beat Democrat Charlie Brown in November, 49 percent to 46 percent.

Cheney Enters The Twilight Of His Career (AP)

By Tom Raum,

AP, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117030

One by one, the hardline conservatives like Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Bolton who stood shoulder to shoulder with Vice President Dick Cheney in pushing President Bush's decision to invade Iraq have left the administration.

Yet while Cheney himself is in the twilight days of his political career, he's still there, with little evidence that his influence with Bush has waned.

Bush's decision to boost troops in Iraq and to continue to challenge Iran and Syria runs counter to recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, the new Democratic majority in Congress and many Republicans — yet reflects Cheney's long-held hawkish views.

The vice president, who generally has kept a low public profile since the midterm elections, is about to get some unwanted exposure in another area. He's expected to be a witness in the perjury and obstruction trial of his former top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, in the CIA leak case.

Jury selection starts Tuesday. Cheney did not resist being called as a defense witness.

Once viewed as adding an air of gravitas to an inexperienced president, Cheney, 64, is now seen by many Americans as a driving force behind Bush's most divisive initiatives: the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program, harsh detention and interrogation policies and an aggressive push for expanded executive authority.

Bad as Bush's poll numbers are, Cheney's are worse. And while he's still beloved by conservatives, it seems unlikely he will be a big draw on the 2008 campaign circuit.

None of that seems to matter to Bush.

"Cheney and Bush have a quite personal relationship. Cheney has been loyal from the beginning and is loyal to this day. And the Bush family, if they have any family trait, is to return loyalty," said GOP consultant Rich Galen.

Cheney is expected to be an active salesman for Bush's new Iraq policy, which includes sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq. The plan, which Bush announced this week in a speech to the nation, has drawn wide condemnation from Democrats and many Republicans. Polls show a majority of Americans oppose increasing U.S. troops in Iraq.

Cheney appears ready for the fight, his health holding up despite a long history of heart disease.

In the meantime, his fellow hard-liners in the administration are, for the most part, gone.

Rumsfeld resigned as defense secretary under pressure. Bolton, unable to win Senate confirmation, had to give up his temporary assignment as U.N. ambassador. Former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz left some time ago to head the World Bank.

Douglas Feith, a former deputy defense secretary, and Richard Perle, a former Pentagon adviser, have gone on to other things.

Cheney is the only member of Bush's original national security team still holding the same job.

"The neo-cons are gone. Cheney is the last one, and you can't get rid of him," said Paul C. Light, a New York University professor of public service.

Still, "his influence has never been more at the mercy of the president than today," said Light.

"For his first four years perhaps, maybe even a little bit longer, when he spoke the president listened. Now the president speaks and Cheney must listen. And it's the president who is setting the vice president's agenda and not vice versa."

Both parties have been freshly reminded of Cheney's constitutional duties as president of the Senate as control of that chamber has continued to ride on the health of Sen. Tim Johnson. The South Dakota Democrat remains hospitalized four weeks after surgery for a brain hemorrhage.

If Johnson cannot complete his term, the Republican governor of South Dakota would be likely to appoint a Republican, effectively creating a 50-50 Senate and allowing Republicans to regain control by virtue of Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Cheney played a lightning-rod role as a leading advocate for invading Iraq and has continued to call for an aggressive stance there, even after last November's midterm elections stripped Republicans of control of both House and Senate.

"Some in our country may believe in good faith that retreating from Iraq would make America safer. Recent experience teaches the opposite lesson," Cheney said in a speech to a conservative group several weeks after the election.

When Bush decided to replace the controversial Rumsfeld with Robert Gates at the Pentagon, Cheney said at a farewell ceremony last month for his old friend, "Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of defense this nation has ever had."

DOJ_NMG_0117031

"I think Cheney remains a powerful force within the administration and there's no indication he's changed his views," said Michele Flournoy, a former Pentagon defense strategist now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"That said, the president is still the president," she said.

"But there's not a lot of indication the president's changed his views, either," Flournoy said. She said the net effect is that "the two leaders at the top are still driving the train in the same direction despite calls for them to change course."

Bush still clearly values Cheney's counsel.

The vice president traveled to Saudi Arabia in late November to sound out the Saudis on the conflict in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis. And he was at Bush's side as the president met with various groups to help reshape his Iraq policy.

"Cheney's role is back to what it was at the beginning, which is the behind-the-scenes organizer, the guy who gets things done," said GOP pollster Frank Luntz. "And Cheney is so much a man of principle and so not a man of polls. So for him, it's not that he's going the other way (from more moderate voices on Iraq). He is sticking to principle."

Luntz said it doesn't really matter that Cheney may be losing political influence among other Republicans and may be a liability with the new Democratic Congress. "Now that the last campaign is done, there's not much for him to do politically."

Libby Trial May Show Cheney's Role In Run-Up To War (BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly, Holly Rosenkrantz

Bloomberg, January 12, 2007

Jan. 12 (Bloomberg) -- The perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, may provide ammunition for Democrats looking to attack the White House for its conduct in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Libby, 56, is charged with perjury and obstruction for lying to a grand jury probing the leak of a CIA agent's name. He faces as many as 30 years in prison if convicted. The trial starts on Jan. 16 in Washington.

Defense lawyers say they'll call Cheney as a witness to bolster claims Libby was too busy with security matters to accurately remember events. His testifying is risky for both men. What Cheney recalls may undermine Libby's too-busy defense while exposing the vice president to probes by Congress of how the Bush administration promoted the war, legal experts said.

``Litigation begets litigation," said Stanley Brand, a former U.S. House counsel who specializes in representing public officials accused of wrongdoing. ``Every time you haul someone to court, it makes it more likely someone else is going to haul him to court. It's the Martha Stewart problem. Once you're under oath, people can take pot shots at you about what you said.''

Ted Wells, a Paul Weiss Rifkind attorney representing Libby, told U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton during a hearing last month that he plans to call Cheney to the stand. He and co-counsel William Jeffress of Baker Botts did not return telephone calls this week seeking comment.

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Ann McBride declined to say whether a subpoena has been received. ``We have cooperated fully with the investigation and will continue to do so," McBride said.

Rare Testimony

If Cheney takes the stand, he would be the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal case in at least 100 years, according to Joel Goldstein, a vice presidential scholar at St. Louis University. Rulings by Walton may limit the scope of Cheney's testimony, though he is likely to discuss events in the months leading up to the invasion of Iraq in 2003, the period in which prosecutors say Libby committed perjury and obstruction.

``The suggestion has been that Vice President Cheney's office has really almost created an alternative national security council," Goldstein said. ``To that extent, the trial may be indicative in showing how the vice president's office has been involved in the planning and selling of the war."

Libby was Cheney's closest adviser, having served as the vice president's national security adviser as well as his chief of staff. He worked with Cheney at the Pentagon during the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

Not First on Trial

Libby is one of the highest-ranking White House officials ever to be tried, though not the only member of the Bush administration. David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget, was sentenced to 18 months in prison in October for lying and obstructing justice during the corruption investigation of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now in prison for fraud.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Peter Zeidenberg, who won a conviction of Safavian, is a working with U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor in the Libby case.

Fitzgerald, normally based in Chicago, would probably handle any cross-examination of Cheney. He ``is the special prosecutor in the Libby case, and he is personally responsible and more involved in that case, than in any of his Chicago cases," said Robert Kent, a former federal prosecutor in Fitzgerald's office who left two months ago to join the Baker McKenzie law firm.

Fitzgerald's cases include the prosecution of Conrad Black, the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman charged with looting the company.

Plame's Name

Libby was indicted in October 2005 on charges of lying to investigators and a grand jury probing whether Bush administration officials intentionally revealed the identity of Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame to reporters, a violation of federal law.

Plame's name was published by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, after her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly accused President George W. Bush of twisting intelligence to justify the Iraq war.

Libby is accused of lying and obstructing the probe. No one has been charged with the leak of Plame's name. In September, ex- U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage said he was the person who first told Novak that Plame was a CIA officer.

Court papers filed in the Libby case portray Cheney as having a central role in events during the period in 2003 that the administration was defending itself against critics of Bush's decision to invade Iraq. Cheney told Libby on June 12, 2003, that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA, according to the indictment. Libby told investigators that he believed Cheney learned it from the agency.

`No Control'

Cheney's testimony may undermine Libby's argument that he was too focused on national security matters by showing, for example, how often he discussed Wilson and Plame with his boss, according to Elizabeth de la Vega, a former federal prosecutor.

``This is Libby's trial," she said. ``He's on trial for perjury and false statements, so Cheney is not going to be able to control anything. It's not completely wide open, but there's quite a bit of leeway in questioning him on matters leading up to the disclosure" of Plame's name.

News organizations including Bloomberg News asked Walton Jan. 4 to ensure media access to the jury selection process, and to release audio recordings of the proceedings. Walton denied the latter request in a Jan. 9 order and will allow only two journalists in the courtroom. He said the court has taken extraordinary steps to ensure public access.

Other reporters and members of the public can observe the proceedings in a second courtroom that will have live audio and video of the proceedings, he said.

``At no time in the history of this courthouse have such accommodations been provided to the public and the press in a criminal case," Walton said in the order.

The case is U.S. vs. Libby, 05-394, U.S. District Court, the District of Columbia.

Cheney Is Forced To Testify In Case Of The Crime That Never Was (LONT)

By Tim Reid

Times of London, January 13, 2007

A politically charged courtroom drama centred on the Iraq war, a blonde bombshell spy and a vice-president in the witness box begins next week when Dick Cheney's former chief of staff goes on trial for his alleged role in the CIA leak scandal.

The prosecution of Lewis "Scooter" Libby is set to become a political show trial to be relished by opponents of the Iraq war. The roots of the scandal that led to his being charged with perjury lie in how the White House justified the invasion, and the subsequent spin operation that it mounted after the failure to find weapons of mass destruction.

In one key respect the six- week trial, which begins on Tuesday, is unprecedented: the relentlessly secretive Mr Cheney will enter the witness box as part of Mr Libby's defence. It makes him the first sitting vice-president to testify in a criminal prosecution. He is expected to be cross-examined on his efforts to rebut critics of the war aggressively as it began to turn sour in 2003, an experience he will find detestable.

Mr Libby denies lying to the FBI and a grand jury about who gave the press the name of Valerie Plame, a former covert CIA agent with stunning good looks. He faces up to 30 years in jail if convicted.

No Bush Administration official, including Mr Libby, was charged with leaking Ms Plame's identity. It became clear last year that the accusation that triggered the special prosecutor's investigation — that the White House knew that Ms Plame was an undercover operative and leaked her identity deliberately to discredit her husband, a war critic — was unfounded. Mr Libby is now accused of a covering up a non-existent crime that did not need to be hidden.

The genesis of the Plame scandal lies in a CIA-sponsored trip that Joseph Wilson, Ms Plame's husband and a former ambassador, made to Niger in 2002 to investigate reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium there. In July 2003 he accused the Bush Administration of ignoring his report that there was no Iraq-Niger link, and of twisting prewar intelligence.

A week later Robert Novak, a conservative columnist, wrote that Mr Wilson had been sent to Niger by Ms Plame, the first time that her name had been made public. The report caused a political storm after Mr Wilson claimed that his wife was a covert agent and that her name had been leaked as retribution for his criticism of the war. It is a crime knowingly to reveal the identity of a covert official.

Soon after Mr Novak's column, several other journalists wrote about Ms Plame. They told Patrick Fitzgerald, the investigating prosecutor, that they learnt about her from Mr Libby and Karl Rove, Mr Bush's chief adviser. Mr Libby is charged with lying to investigators because he claimed that he first learnt about Ms Plame from the reporters. One journalist, Judith Miller, was jailed for 85 days after refusing to reveal that her source was Mr Libby.

Claims of a White House operation to destroy the Wilsons were all but demolished after it emerged recently that Mr Novak's source was Richard Armitage, Colin Powell's former deputy at the State Department. He was a war critic and mentioned the Plame-Wilson connection as "idle gossip".

Mr Fitzgerald will try to show that Mr Cheney was obsessed with pushing back against Mr Wilson and that it was a "high priority" for his chief of staff — and that Mr Libby tried to obscure that fact.

SMU Faculty Members Oppose Bush Library (AP)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 13, 2007

Negotiations to build George W. Bush's presidential library at Southern Methodist University have divided the campus, pitting the administration and some alumni against liberal-leaning faculty members who say the project would be an embarrassment to the school.

Some professors have complained that the combined library, museum and think tank would celebrate a presidency that unnecessarily took the country into a war.

The fear is that the library "will continue to espouse the philosophy and practice of the Bush administration, which has seriously divided our nation and has brought the ire of other countries," said William McElvaney, a retired professor at SMU's theology school and co-author a November opinion piece in the campus newspaper titled "The George W. Bush Library: Asset or Albatross?"

SMU emerged as the front-runner in the competition last month when the library site selection committee said it was entering further discussions with the 11,000-student, private university in one of Dallas's wealthiest neighborhoods. The project will be financed with a private fund drive aimed at raising at least $200 million.

Bush connections to SMU run deep. First lady Laura Bush is a graduate and is on the board of trustees. Vice President Dick Cheney previously served on the board. Presidential adviser Karen Hughes and former White House counsel Harriet Miers are both graduates.

SMU officials said the project is unlikely to be derailed by the faculty opposition, and said the professors opposed to it are in the minority.

Brad Cheves, vice president for external affairs and development, said the library could help recruit students, attract visitors and increase giving. "It raises the profile of SMU no matter how people feel about President Bush," he said.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino declined to comment. And a spokesman for former Bush administration Commerce Secretary Don Evans, chairman of the library search committee, would not comment on whether the objections from some of the 600 faculty members would affect the panel's final decision, expected in a few months.

Other faculty say they would welcome the library.

"This takes us to a whole new level," said Rita Kirk, a politics professor who has done research at other presidential libraries.

As for the students, Luis Arango, a 21-year-old junior and political science major, said on campus Friday: "This school has a very conservative vibe, and most of the students like Bush. The only people who don't seem to be the faculty. I know for a fact that some are real liberal and I don't think should be teaching here."

As for the alumni, many of them are wealthy and conservative. And Mike Boone, who is on SMU's board of trustees and earned undergraduate and law school degrees from SMU, said an overwhelming majority of alumni support the Bush library project.

"It's prestigious and brings a lot of value to a university," said Boone, a Dallas lawyer who has known Bush since he was Texas governor.

The other finalists are Baylor University in Waco, near the Bushes' Crawford ranch, and the University of Dallas.

McElvaney warned that not only could the library hurt SMU's reputation, it could also become a target for terrorists or others who want to strike back at Bush, McElvaney said.

"Dallas is already known as the city in which President Kennedy was assassinated, so does Dallas want a Bush library that could become a prime terrorist target?" McElvaney asked.

The library of the president's father is on the Texas A&M University campus in College Station.

Universities often compete to host presidential libraries. But this is not the first time that the political passions of the day have stirred resistance to such a project.

In 1981, Duke University faculty members, by one vote, voted against continuing discussions to build Richard Nixon's library there. Nixon graduated from Duke Law School in North Carolina. Duke's trustees voted to build the library anyway, but negotiations with Nixon officials eventually broke down. The Nixon library was eventually built in Yorba Linda, in his native California.

"It was obvious this was going to be a memorial to glorify the career of Richard Nixon rather than be a repository of his papers," said Lawrence Evans, a retired Duke physics professor.

Native Texan Lyndon B. Johnson's library was built on the University of Texas campus in Austin during the Vietnam area. During the 1971 opening ceremony, hundreds of protesters chanted anti-war slogans and released black balloons. Demonstrators also marched around campus, throwing bottles, cans and rocks at police, and dozens were arrested.

For Teachers, Being "Highly Qualified" Is A Subjective Matter (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

To overhaul public education, the No Child Left Behind law required a massive expansion of student testing. But it also called for states to ensure that all teachers in core academic subjects are "highly qualified" to help students succeed -- an unprecedented mandate that has delivered less than promised.

The law, which turned five years old this week, has held schools to increasingly higher standards for student achievement. For teachers, however, standards meant to guarantee that they know their subjects are often vague and open to broad interpretation.

Legal loopholes and uneven implementation by states and the U.S. Department of Education have diluted the law's impact on the teaching workforce, some education experts say. They say that meeting the standards of quality is more about shuffling paper than achieving two vital goals: ensuring that teachers are prepared to help students succeed and reducing the teacher talent gap between rich and poor schools.

"Meeting the qualifications has become an exercise in bureaucratic compliance," said Andrew J. Rotherham, a member of the Virginia Board of Education and a former education adviser in the Clinton administration. "It's not a process that gets at the fundamental issues of quality or effectiveness." Congress may soon tackle those issues as it considers renewing the law.

The career path of Maria Lewis Ramadane shows what the mandate was meant to accomplish and its confusing results. The meaning of highly qualified, it turns out, varies sharply from place to place.

When Ramadane started teaching at Graham Park Middle School near Dumfries in 2003, the special education teacher didn't meet the law's standard because she had a provisional license. But after earning a master's degree and completing a 30-hour literacy class, she obtained full certification, and Virginia now deems her highly qualified to teach language arts.

In Maryland and the District, however, Ramadane would be asked for more: another standardized test, more professional coursework. Tougher rules are probably one reason Maryland and the District report lower rates of classrooms with highly qualified teachers: 79 percent in Maryland and 51 percent in the District, compared with 95 percent in Virginia. D.C. public schools -- and some in Maryland -- also face major recruiting obstacles.

This week, senior Democratic lawmakers discussed an extension of No Child Left Behind with President Bush. In the coming congressional debate over the law, teacher quality is likely to be a key issue. Some experts favor shifting the emphasis from "highly qualified" to "highly effective" teachers, requiring states to look not just at credentials but how well individual teachers help students learn and perform on tests.

U.S. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor, said in an interview that teacher quality is one of his highest priorities. He has proposed spending more money to recruit and retain qualified teachers, particularly in low-income districts.

Miller said the current standards for subject matter competence and certification are the "bare minimum" and said that the government should establish systems to increase teacher effectiveness. "The law itself does not make you highly qualified," he said.

Some leaders of teacher unions say that raising salaries and improving working conditions are better ways to raise the caliber of the workforce. Princess Moss, president of the Virginia Education Association, questioned what she called "paperwork and needless requirements," particularly in areas with persistent teacher shortages, such as special education.

Ramadane said she has not found Virginia's requirements difficult, and she has taken extra classes in reading and writing instruction so she can keep challenging her Prince William County students. "Most teachers that I know go above and beyond," she said.

The Bush administration has pushed aggressively to hold schools accountable for raising student test scores and narrowing achievement gaps, but it has been more flexible on teacher quality.

In late 2005, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings pushed back a June 2006 deadline for states to reach full compliance with the highly qualified teacher requirement, giving them a one-year pass if they could demonstrate progress. Spellings said states would not lose federal funding if they submitted a plan with an acceptable definition of highly qualified teachers, accurate data and steps to ensure that experienced and qualified teachers are spread equitably among rich and poor schools.

By August, only Maryland and eight other states had plans that met all requirements. The rest, including Virginia, had to make revisions to address the equity issue, as did the District.

U.S. education officials and independent analysts cite some advances. Data show that about nine out of 10 classrooms nationwide in 2005 were headed by a highly qualified teacher; in 2003, the rate was closer to eight out of 10. Experts note that states have created incentives and opportunities for teachers to obtain additional training and have reversed a long-standing reliance on emergency credentials to fill classrooms. In some cities, including the District, school systems have fired teachers who are not fully licensed.

Spellings said the drive for content expertise has improved the workforce.

"The whole notion that you have to have grounding in the subject area that you're teaching makes a lot of sense to policymakers and to moms and dads," she said. "You know, the old you-can't-teach-what-you-don't-know philosophy."

According to the federal law, to become highly qualified, a first-year teacher must have a college degree, a full state license and some mastery of content -- provable by coursework or a standardized test.

The first two requirements are straightforward. The third has been interpreted in many ways, particularly for veteran teachers -- defined in Virginia and Maryland as those with at least one year of experience -- for whom the law is more lenient.

To prove expertise, teachers can choose from a menu of options that often have little to do with subject matter.

In Maryland, teachers can show they know their subjects in part by taking education courses or earning teaching awards. Virginia offers credit for developing curricula, mentoring other teachers or attending a 30-hour "content knowledge institute."

Last year, the Bush administration objected to a Virginia policy allowing new high school special education teachers to take a less-rigorous middle school content test. It also faulted a policy letting veteran teachers assert that they are sufficiently knowledgeable if they hold an advanced degree in any subject, not just in the subject they teach. Virginia tightened the rules, but state officials said the policies in question affected only about 155 of the state's 99,000 teachers.

Virginia officials report only a small teacher-quality gap, with 6 percent of classrooms in the state's poorest schools lacking highly qualified teachers, compared with 3 percent in the richest schools.

In Maryland, the disparity is greater: Nearly 40 percent of classes in the poorest schools lack highly qualified teachers, compared with about 10 percent in the richest schools. Especially in Baltimore and Prince George's County, administrators often must resort to hiring inexperienced teachers who move on after a few years.

But Maryland has made progress -- the portion of classrooms with highly qualified teachers rose from 67 percent in 2004 to more than 79 percent in 2006.

At Benjamin Tasker Middle School in Bowie, the compliance rate rose from 52 percent in 2004 to 76 percent in 2006. But the hunt for highly qualified teachers remains intense.

As this school year approached, Principal Karen Coley said she found herself waiting for a seventh-grade science teacher to "drop from the sky."

The school system's recruiter, known as the "rainmaker," found a candidate who was promising but not rated highly qualified. One recent morning, that teacher quizzed students about the difference between chemical and physical properties. "A natural," Coley called her.

But in the future, Coley is hoping to find a more reliable stream of highly qualified teachers.

High Court Adds Death-Penalty And Tobacco Cases To Docket (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Supreme Court added four cases to its docket for the current term yesterday, including a review of a judge's decision to dismiss a potential juror from a death-penalty case because of the man's equivocal statements about capital punishment.

A federal appeals court overturned the trial judge's ruling in a rape and murder trial in the state of Washington. One of the issues in the case is whether federal courts should defer to a trial judge who is in a position to actually talk to and observe a potential juror in making the decision about his ability to carry out the law.

The court has added 11 cases to its slimmer-than-usual caseload in the past eight days, all of which are scheduled to be argued and decided before the term's usual close at the end of June. Among the cases justices said yesterday that they will decide is a question of whether a cigarette manufacturer can move a lawsuit against it to federal jurisdiction and out of the state courts, where judgments against tobacco companies have been mounting.

The death-penalty case , Uttecht v. Brown (06-413), stems from the 1991 conviction of Cal Coburn Brown. One of the prospective jurors in the case indicated on a questionnaire that he could support a death sentence if convinced beyond a shadow of a doubt that the accused had killed and would kill again, and that he would have severe doubts without that. Because the only other alternative sentence for Brown would be life in prison without parole, he was told it would be unlikely such evidence would be presented.

After additional questioning, the prosecution asked that the juror be dismissed, and the defense did not object. The Washington state Supreme Court and a federal district judge upheld the state judge's decision to dismiss.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, with which the Supreme Court has already disagreed on a death-penalty case this year, reversed the sentence. The potential juror's statement that he "would impose the death penalty when the defendant would be likely to kill again did not exclude the possibility that he would vote to impose the death penalty in other circumstances as well," the court ruled.

And it said that automatically deferring to the trial judge's judgment because "unknown facial expression or body language" might contradict the actual words of the potential juror would make appellate review "obsolete."

The cigarette case, Watson v. Philip Morris (05-1284), comes from Arkansas, where consumers alleged that the company had violated the state's deceptive-advertising law with claims about its "light" cigarettes. Similar class-action lawsuits have been filed around the country.

But Phillip Morris, whose parent company is now known as Altria Group Inc., was successful in having the case transferred to federal courts, saying that its advertising is regulated by the Federal Trade Commission, and that made it a "person acting under" a federal officer.

The Bush administration said it disagreed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit ruling upholding the lower court's decision. Nevertheless, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement had recommended the Supreme Court not take the case, saying it did not warrant the court's review.

Those who sued said the move to federal court denies the right of states to be the primary forum for adjudicating state laws.

The court also took Struhs, et al., v. Wyner (06-531), about who should pay lawyer fees in a case involving nude protesters in a Florida park, and Hinck v. U.S. (06-376), a jurisdictional question about the U.S. Tax Court.

Justices To Review Death Penalty Case (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

Once again, the 9th Circuit Appeals Court's sentence overturning will be reconsidered.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to reconsider another death penalty decision from the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, this one overturning the death sentence for a man who abducted a young Seattle woman then raped and tortured her for two days before killing her.

It will be the fourth case before the justices this term in which the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit had reversed a murder conviction or a death sentence.

In all four, state prosecutors appealed to the high court, arguing the judges of the appeals court had overstepped their authority and wrongly second-guessed a state court's decision.

In November, the high court reversed the 9th Circuit and restored a death sentence for a Central Valley man who robbed and fatally clubbed a young woman in 1982. In December, the justices unanimously restored the murder conviction for a man who shot and killed the fiancé of his estranged wife in San Jose. The 9th Circuit had overturned the conviction because the parents and a brother of the murder victim were seen wearing a small photo of him in the courtroom.

The third case, heard Tuesday, concerned an Arizona murderer whose death sentence was overturned by the 9th Circuit on the grounds that his lawyer failed to present "mitigating evidence" on his behalf, even though the defendant, Jeffrey Landrigan, told the judge during the sentencing hearing that he did not want mitigating evidence presented on his behalf.

The new case, from Seattle, focuses on a potential juror who was excluded because of his views on the death penalty.

The facts of the case were described as "sickening" by the dissenting judges on the 9th Circuit.

On May 23, 1991, Holly Washa, 21, was leaving her job at a hotel near the Seattle-Tacoma Airport when Cal Brown stopped her to say her tire was flat. He jumped in her car and put a knife to her throat. He forced her to take money from her bank account.

Brown took her to a motel where he kept her in handcuffs and raped her. On the third day, he slit her throat and left her to die in the trunk of her car.

From there, Brown flew to Palm Springs, where he abducted, tortured and stabbed a second woman. Despite a slit throat, she was able to call the hotel desk when Brown left the room. Police arrested Brown when he returned.

Brown gave a detailed confession to both crimes. In Seattle, he was tried, convicted and sentenced to die in 1993 for Washa's murder. State courts and a federal judge in Seattle upheld the conviction and sentence.

"This was not a case where there was any doubt about who committed the murder," John J. Samson, an assistant attorney general from Washington, said Friday.

In December 2005, however, Brown's appeal came before a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit, which reversed the death sentence on the grounds that one of the potential jurors was improperly excluded from the trial.

During voir dire, the process in which prosecutors and defense attorneys question prospective jurors, either side may move to exclude someone they think may have a strong bias.

When questioned, the potential juror, referred to as "Juror Z," said he favored the death penalty only "in severe situations" and when it was "very obvious the person would re-offend."

Under Washington law, a defendant convicted of aggravated first-degree murder would be sentenced to death or life in prison without the possibility of parole. That meant that Brown would have no chance to "re-offend" outside prison.

A death sentence may be imposed in Washington only if all 12 jurors agree. Because this potential juror would presumably reject a death sentence for Brown, the prosecutor sought to remove him from the jury pool. "We have no objection," the defense lawyer replied, and the trial judge dismissed "Juror Z" from the case's jury pool.

Writing for the appeals court, Judge Alex Kozinski of Pasadena said "Juror Z" was not flatly opposed to the death penalty. "Most importantly, he promised he would 'follow the law' without reservation," he wrote.

Because "Juror Z was erroneously excluded," Brown was denied his right to a fair trial, Kozinski concluded. His opinion was joined by Judges Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marcia Berzon of San Francisco.

In June, 2006, when a petition to rehear the case was denied by the appeals court, five of its judges joined in a dissent, saying the decision ignored a 1996 law which says U.S. judges should defer to reasonable decisions made by state courts.

In September, Washington Atty. Gen. Rob McKenna appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the trial judge had handled the jury selection reasonably and in line with the law.

The justices voted Friday to hear the case of Uttecht vs. Brown in April and to issue a ruling by late June.

Early Loss Overcome, Dow Sets A Record (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Wall Street rebounded from an early loss yesterday to send the Dow Jones industrial average to its second consecutive record close as investors embraced robust economic data and shrugged off several profit warnings.

Stocks held their gains despite a warning from the chip maker Advanced Micro Devices, considered one of the bellwether stocks in the technology sector, that its revenue would fall short of forecasts.

The market was helped by the recent decline in oil prices and by a Commerce Department report that retail sales rose in December at their strongest pace in five months, an indication that holiday sales might have been better than expected.

The retail sales report was another sign that the economy remains healthy, and that central bankers might be inclined to keep interest rates where they are. Investors have been hoping the Federal Reserve might lower rates in the near future.

Some of yesterday's fluctuations were probably a result of adjustments in the positions of investors ahead of a three-day weekend. The markets are closed on Monday for Martin Luther King's Birthday.

"You've had a pretty good week, and people always tend to even up positions on a Friday, especially before a holiday," said Alexander Paris, an economist for Barrington Research in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0117039

The Dow Jones industrials jumped 41.10 points, or 0.33 percent, to 12,556.08. It was the index's 24th record close since the start of October.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 6.91 points, or 0.49 percent, to 1,430.73, and the Nasdaq composite index increased 17.97 points, or 0.72 percent, to 2,502.82.

The Dow Jones industrials rose 1.27 percent this week, while the S.& P. 500 advanced 1.49 percent and the Nasdaq picked up 2.82 percent.

"The mood isn't negative," said Brian Williamson, an equity trader at the Boston Company Asset Management, a subsidiary of the Mellon Financial Corporation. "You take the economic news as it comes. Things are changing so rapidly, and there's so much information right now, but you react and then look ahead. That's what the market is doing."

Oil prices, which touched 19-month lows in the session, were erratic as traders weighed speculation that the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries might consider an emergency meeting to cut production. The February crude oil contract settled up $1.11 at $52.99 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange; despite the advance, oil is still down 13 percent since the start of the year.

Investors pushed oil stocks higher on the belief a production cut could help anchor profits. ConocoPhillips, also helped by plans for a share buyback, rose $2.01, or 3.3 percent, to $63.83.

Exxon Mobil gained $1.68, rising to $72.66.

Murphy Oil, an oil and gas refiner, rose 36 cents, to $46.61, as investors shrugged off a fourth-quarter profit warning.

Technology stocks, which have been among the market's biggest gainers so far this year, extended their advance despite a warning late Thursday from Advanced Micro that fourth-quarter results would be lower than expected because of a price battle with Intel. Advanced Micro fell $1.92, or 9.5 percent, to $18.26.

A warning from the business software maker SAP that quarterly profit and revenue would fall short of expectations caused a round of downgrades by analysts. The stock was able to stay in positive territory, however, rising $1.52, or 3.1 percent, to $50.02.

Apple backed off a record high reached this week after it unveiled plans to roll out its iPhone later this year. A trademark lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems challenged Apple's right to the name and helped push its shares lower by $1.18, to $94.62. Shares of Cisco rose 23 cents, to $28.92.

Cablevision Systems fell after the Dolan family, which founded the company, raised its buyout bid in what the family called the "best and final offer." Investors sent the stock down $1.21, or 4.1 percent, to $28.39, apparently concluding that a more lucrative offer is unlikely.

The bond market, which has been pricing in the potential of a cut in interest rates sometime in the first half of the year, was disturbed by the economic reports yesterday. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note declined 11/32, to a price of 98 26/32. The note's yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.77 percent from 4.73 percent Thursday.

Dollar Ends Three-Day Advance But Could Be Poised For Gains (WSJ)

By Isabelle Lindenmayer

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Is that the end of the dollar rally, or just a pause?

The dollar ended its three-day advance Friday, largely shrugging off a series of positive data releases. But analysts say they expect the currency to post further gains this coming week as the market focuses on renewed optimism about the state of the U.S. economy.

After starting the session little changed, the dollar climbed on the back of a better-than-expected retail-sales report. Yet the dollar reversed course shortly thereafter, retracing all its gains and slipping notably lower against the euro.

In late-afternoon trading in New York, the euro stood at $1.2919 from $1.2894 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 120.37 yen from 120.50 yen late Thursday. The euro was at 155.50 yen from 155.37 yen.

The dollar stood at 1.2481 Swiss francs from 1.2491 francs, while sterling was at $1.9587 from $1.9455 late Thursday.

"The dollar saw an after-the-fact selloff following better-than-expected retail-sales numbers for December," Naomi Fink, currency strategist at BNP Paribas, said.

DOJ_NMG_0117040

"More likely than not, investors felt as though the dollar's three-day rally preceding the release had compensated adequately for the upside surprise," she said.

Other analysts pointed to the retail report itself as a potential reason for the dollar's slip, as the report included a 0.4% downward revision in November's retail-sales data.

The dollar rose initially on the news but then reversed, "perhaps on the view that some of the details in the December sales data and the revisions were not as strong as seen at first glance," Michael Carey, chief economist for North America at Calyon Corporate & Investment Bank, said.

Investors can look forward to a slew of fresh U.S. data in the coming week, with December producer-price-index and consumer-price-index reports due, plus December housing starts.

December Retail Sales Jump 0.9% Amid Robust Holiday Shopping Season (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales, Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

As it turned out, shoppers spent more freely during the just-ended holiday season than had been thought, helping some retailers end the year on strong footing and suggesting that economic growth could be rebounding faster than expected.

Retail sales jumped 0.9% in December from the month before, to a seasonally adjusted $369.9 billion, the Commerce Department said Friday. December's growth was up from a gain of 0.6% in November and was the strongest rate of growth in retail sales since July. When compared to December a year ago, retail sales were up 5.4% compared with December-to-December growth of 5.7% in 2005.

Although full-year growth in 2006 was lower than in 2005, economists noted that sales in the final three months of last year were regaining momentum.

"The consumer was pretty lively" last month, said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc. "We ended the year on a strong note -- there's no doubt about that."

Economists said consumer spending last month benefited from a host of factors that offset the effect of a slowing housing market: Energy prices fell and stronger-than-expected job creation bolstered wage and income gains. Moreover, unseasonably warm weather and heavy discounting drew shoppers to the mall in greater numbers than usual.

The retail-sales figures, coming on the heels of last week's employment report that showed strong job creation, prompted some economists to raise their estimates of economic growth.

In an email sent to clients Friday, economists at Morgan Stanley said they believe consumer spending rose about 4.3% in the fourth quarter, a performance they said "has been exceeded on only a handful of occasions" over the course of the current expansion. They also said that "signs are pointing" to a much stronger pace of economic growth for the first quarter of 2007. The firm expects inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, the value of the nation's output, would be up "at least" 3.5% in the current quarter. Earlier, Morgan Stanley economists estimated first-quarter GDP growth would be between 2.3% and 2.5%.

The retail-sales report also bolsters the view that the Federal Reserve is unlikely to reduce interest rates soon and is likely to keep short-term interest rates at the current level. "There's no way the Fed will lower rates while" economic activity accelerates and inflation remains elevated, said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, of Princeton Junction, N.J. "It's just not in the cards. The economy is stronger than we thought earlier."

Not everyone agrees. Mr. Shapiro said that retail sales were "exaggerated" by warm weather. He expects consumer spending will ease to an annualized growth rate of 2.5% to 3% in the first quarter and slow even further for the rest of the year. "There's still a tug of war going on" between the slumping housing market and the healthy labor market, he said.

The holiday season's big winners included electronics and appliance stores, where sales rose 3% in December from a month earlier and 15% from a year earlier. A host of products fed that surge, including new videogame consoles, such as Nintendo Co.'s Wii, digital music players, and flat-panel television sets. Prices on flat-panel, high-definition TV sets have plummeted in recent months -- in some cases to below $500 -- as mass-market retailers charged into the category.

Heavy discounting has lifted revenues at some of the nation's largest electronics retailers, including Best Buy Co., Richfield, Minn. Best Buy recently reported that sales at stores open at least a year rose 7% in December. "In flat-panel televisions, we did a tremendous amount of business, but that wasn't a surprise," the company's chief financial officer, Darren Jackson, said Friday. "What was a surprise is" that sales also remained robust for a range of other products, including notebook computers, digital music players and digital photography goods, he said.

Sales at nonstore retailers, essentially online and catalogue merchants, were up 0.3% last month and were up 7.9% from a year earlier. Sales at bars and restaurants rose 2.3% in December from a month earlier and 9.3% from a year earlier, the Commerce Department reported. Sales at general merchandise stores rose 0.9% in December from a month earlier, and 5.4% from a year earlier. Sales also rose at stores that sell cars and parts, furniture, clothing and health- and personal-care goods. However, sales at building-material and garden-equipment stores fell 1.1% in December from a month earlier and were down 0.8% from a year earlier, which economists said was due to the housing slowdown.

Separately, the Labor Department said Friday that import prices in December climbed 1.1% from November, and 2.5% from a year earlier. Excluding petroleum, import prices in December rose 0.4% from November and 1.7% from a year earlier.

US Retail Sales Better Than Expected (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

US retail sales rose more than expected last month as consumers spent heavily over the holiday period on electronics, government figures showed.

Total sales rose 0.9 per cent in December while the closely-watched measure of purchases excluding autos rose by 1 per cent, according to the data.

The steady rise suggests consumer spending helped support economic growth in the last quarter of the year, offsetting a sharp correction in the housing sector and weakness in manufacturing.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said the gain was “very strong”, adding: “clearly the trajectory for consumer spending into the first quarter is decent and the consumer sector overall looks very healthy.”

The sales rise underlines the Federal Reserve’s forecast that the economy will grow at a modest rate next year, as consumers continue to spend despite the ongoing housing slowdown.

The report from the Commerce Department showed sales at electricals stores rose 15 per cent compared to the last holiday season.

Figures for the full year also showed a strong rise in consumers’ use of the web to make purchases as online and catalogue sales also rose 11.3

Overall retail sales for the full year rose by 6 per cent, a slower pace than the 6.9 per cent gain achieved in 2005 - reflecting a weaker economy last year.

The Results Are In And Retailers Can Exhale (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Commerce Department released the final results on the holiday shopping season yesterday as the retail industry seemed to breathe a collective sigh of relief.

December sales grew nearly 5 percent from a year ago, to $332.44 billion, excluding motor vehicles, auto parts and food services, according to the report. For the past two months, sales increased 4.6 percent, to $662.5 billion, compared with the same period in 2005.

Retail groups had mixed reactions to the numbers, depending largely on how closely their forecasts matched the Commerce Department's figures. But even groups that had predicted stronger growth still considered the all-important holiday season to be a solid one.

The Commerce figures are based on monthly sales results from about 5,000 companies. The numbers released yesterday could be revised after additional data from 12,000 businesses are reviewed over the coming weeks. November's sales growth, for example, was downgraded to 0.6 percent from 1.1 percent the previous month. December retail sales increased 0.7 percent from the month before.

The undisputed leader of the season was consumer electronics. Sales last month skyrocketed 15 percent over December 2005, to $9.67 billion, the largest percentage jump of any category. Health and personal-care stores' sales grew 10.2 percent, to $19.64 billion. Apparel fared better than many industry experts expected, considering the unseasonably warm winter in some parts of the country. Shoppers spent 5.5 percent more -- $18.11 billion -- for clothing and accessories in December than they did a year earlier.

"It was a very good season," said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group. "It really is again on the heels of this huge electronic bonanza."

He said the Commerce Department results suggested that the season was stronger than he expected. The council tracks sales at national chain stores open at least a year typically found in malls and other shopping centers. They include such retailers as Wal-Mart, Kohl's and American Eagle but not home supply stores such as Home Depot and Lowe's. The group measured sales growth at its stores at 2.8 percent for November and December, in line with their projections, but slower than last year.

"You [can] say it's just been chugging along," Niemira said.

Meanwhile, ShopperTrak RCT put the sales increase for the past two months of 2006 at 5.1 percent over the same period in 2005, narrowly besting its 5 percent forecast. The research firm based its analysis on the Commerce Department's results for sales of general merchandise, apparel, furniture, sporting goods, electronics, books and related categories.

"I think that a lot of retailers met their expectations," said Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak. "But I think it really indicated more of the consumers' behavior in their willingness to continue to spend."

Martin also noted that while retailers rang up more sales, foot traffic fell 1.7 percent, compared with the same period last year. He said consumers likely had consolidated their shopping trips to save time and gasoline. The drop also could be because shoppers made fewer purchases, choosing to spend big bucks on one must-have item, such as a flat-screen TV set, Martin said.

For the National Retail Federation, an industry trade group, the Commerce Department's numbers were a bit of a disappointment. The group had predicted retail sales growth would hit 5 percent. Instead, its analysis showed they rose only 4.4 percent in November and December, not including automobile, gas station and restaurant sales.

Retail federation spokesman Scott Krugman attributed the difference largely to lackluster results from a soft housing market affecting home-improvement stores. And though apparel sales held up, he said warm winter still took a toll.

"The question is, how much stronger could that category have been if the weather would have cooperated?" he said.

Still, the group called the season's gains as "average," if "subdued."

"We'll try again next year," Krugman said.

Retail Sales Rise In December At Fastest Rate In 5 Months (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Retail sales rose in December at the strongest pace in five months, indicating that the all-important holiday shopping season turned out better than original reports indicated.

The Commerce Department said Friday that retail sales increased 0.9% last month, strongest showing since a 1.4% increase in July.

The increase was better than the 0.7% gain economists had forecast and provided evidence that consumer spending was ending the year on firmer footing than initially thought.

The government report presented a better picture of spending than initial reports from the nation's big chain retail stores. They complained that holiday sales had fallen below expectations as mild weather depressed sales of winter clothing.

The National Retail Federation said sales grew 4.4% in 2006, falling short of expectations. The group had forecast a 5% increase in sales for November and December. That figure is derived from Commerce Department data, stripping out sales of automobiles and at gas stations and restaurants.

"Unseasonably warmer weather and the slower housing market had a clear impact on consumer spending," said NRF Chief Economist Rosalind Wells . "NRF expects these subdued gains to continue into the first half of 2007."

In other news, business inventories held on shelves and backlots rose 0.4% in November, biggest gain in three months. That reflected a 0.2% rise in stockpiles being held by manufacturers and a 1.3% rise in wholesale inventories, which was offset somewhat by a 0.3% drop in inventories held by retailers.

With the November increase, inventory accumulation may not be as much of a drag on overall economic growth in the final three months of the year as had been previously feared.

For all 2006, retail sales rose 6%, a solid showing but down from a 6.9% increase in 2005.

That slowdown reflects the fact that consumer spending, after a sizzling start to the year, slowed in the spring and remained at lower levels the rest of the year as Americans were battered by soaring gasoline prices, rising interest rates and a cooling housing market.

Consumer spending is closely watched because it accounts for two-thirds of economic activity. The 0.9% December advance should bolster the belief that the Federal Reserve is on track to achieve a so-called soft landing for the economy in which growth slows enough to keep inflation under control without pushing the country into a recession.

December gains in retail sales included a 3% jump in sales at electronics and appliance stores, following an even bigger 5.8% surge in November. Those increases reflected the introduction of sought-after video game consoles such as Sony's Playstation 3 and Nintendo's Wii.

Sales were up 3.8% at gasoline stations, reflecting in part higher pump prices. But pump prices were still below the $3-plus records set last summer.

Auto sales rose 0.3% after being flat in November.

Excluding the volatile gasoline and auto sectors, retail sales would have risen 0.7% in December, best showing since January 2006.

The 0.9% overall gain pushed retail sales to a seasonally adjusted total of $369.9 billion in December after a 0.6% November increase, which had originally been reported as a stronger 1% gain.

Sales at department stores and other general merchandise stores rose 0.9% while sales at specialty clothing stores were up 0.6%. However, sales at hardware stores fell 1.1%, reflecting the continued troubles in the once-booming housing industry.

CNN/WMUR/Union Leader To Host First Presidential Debates (CNN)

By Mark Preston

CNN.com, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- New Hampshire's two leading news organizations will partner with CNN to host two presidential debates in April, executives with the three media companies announced Friday.

CNN, WMUR and The New Hampshire Union Leader will hold the back-to-back debates on April 4 and 5, the first such events to be held of the 2008 presidential campaign. CNN's Wolf Blitzer will moderate the debates with questions coming from WMUR's Scott Spradling and Union Leader's John DiStaso. WMUR's Jennifer Vaughn will be moderating questions from the audience. The debate will be televised live nationally on CNN and throughout New Hampshire on WMUR.

"We are thrilled to provide our viewers with the information to make the most informed decision possible when they are voting in their presidential primaries or caucusing," said CNN/U.S. president Jon Klein.

New Hampshire, a crucial proving ground for 2008 candidates, will be the first state to cast votes in the Republican and Democratic presidential primaries. Republican and Democratic candidates have been visiting the Granite State since the conclusion of the 2004 presidential election in an effort to woo these influential voters in 2008.

"We think it only makes sense that the state with the first-in-the-nation primary also has the first-in-the-nation presidential debate," said Jeff Bartlett, WMUR general manager. "Many candidates and potential candidates have already made numerous trips to New Hampshire, and we felt that April would be a good time for the voters here to get their first impression about how the candidates stack up against one another."

Joseph W. McQuaid, president and publisher of the Union Leader, said, "The issues facing the next administration are as crucial as they have ever been for this country. It is not too early for the first primary state to present a forum to explore the views and the competence of serious candidates."

West Is Going In Democrats' Direction (WP)

By T.R. Reid

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

When the major political parties gathered for their national conventions in 2004, Colorado had a Republican governor, a Republican-controlled legislature and a Republican edge of 5 to 2 in the state's congressional delegation. Today, Colorado's governor is a Democrat. The Democrats control both houses of the legislature. Four of the seven congressional seats are held by Democrats.

That transformation, mirrored in varying degrees across the Rocky Mountain West, is a key reason the Democratic Party decided this week to hold its 2008 nomination convention in Denver, the financial, governmental and transit hub of the mountain states. As party leaders ponder how they can regain the White House in the next election, the region looks more and more essential to an electoral-vote victory.

"I have long believed that the essence of a Democratic victory goes through the West," Democratic National Chairman Howard Dean said Thursday, when he announced that Denver had edged out New York to be the convention city.

"If we are going to have a national party, we are going to have to have Westerners vote Democratic again on a reliable basis."

In fact, the Mountain West has been reliably Republican in recent presidential elections. George W. Bush dominated the region in both of his campaigns; he won seven of eight mountain states (all but New Mexico) in 2000, and all eight in 2004.

Below the presidential level, however, the Bush years have been good years for Western Democrats.

In 2000, all eight mountain states had Republican governors; now five governors are Democrats.

Republicans still win most Senate and House races in the West. But Democrats have gained five new House seats in the region in the past six years. Democrat Ken Salazar won a previously Republican U.S. Senate seat in Colorado in 2004, and Democrat Jon Tester unseated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana in 2006.

Although the West is famous for offering "land, lots of land, 'neath the starry skies above," the population is heavily urbanized. Most people -- and, thus, most of the congressional seats -- are clustered in and around cities, such as Denver, Phoenix, Albuquerque, Salt Lake City and Boise. Those urban centers, their populations swelling with Hispanics, have become deep wells of Democratic votes.

This change has not been lost on national political planners. In the 2004 presidential campaign, Democrats devoted considerable sums and significant amounts of Sen. John F. Kerry's time to the West, focusing on Nevada, Colorado and New Mexico.

"There was nothing wrong with that strategy," said Denver-based Democratic consultant Terry Snyder. "The votes could be there, for the right candidate. But a liberal senator from Massachusetts turned out to be the wrong guy to make the sale in the West."

Some Democratic strategists, and such party-loyalist Internet sites as the Emerging Democratic Majority WebLog, have been urging party leaders to look west in 2008. In his book "Whistling Past Dixie," Thomas F. Schaller, a political scientist at the University of Maryland Baltimore County, argues that Democrats should effectively concede the "Solid South" to Republicans and focus on electoral votes in the Midwest and Mountain West.

Candidates are paying attention. Indeed, a win-the-West strategy is a key element in the thinking of a likely Democratic presidential contender in 2008, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

The Democrats' choice of Denver for the convention, to be held Aug. 25-28, 2008, in a downtown basketball and hockey arena, had become almost a foregone conclusion in recent months.

In the initial jostling to be host city, New Orleans seemed to be the front-runner, because a convention there would remind voters of the Bush administration's much-criticized response to Hurricane Katrina. When New Orleans officials dropped out of the competition last summer -- the city said it couldn't afford to host a convention in the midst of rebuilding -- New York and Denver became the finalists.

DOJ_NMG_0117045

But New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) showed considerable reluctance about hosting the event. He told Democrats his city would not come up with the money required to put on the convention. By the time Dean announced his choice Thursday, Denver was the only candidate still standing.

The War Within Sen. McCain (WP)

By Dan Balz, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

There is no mistaking the anguish of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Sitting in his Senate office, he is uncharacteristically subdued, his voice at times almost inaudible.

Although the Bush administration this week finally embraced his long-standing call to send more troops to Iraq, McCain believes the way it has handled the war "will go down as one of the worst" mistakes in the history of the American military.

"One of the most frustrating things that's ever happened in my political life," he said, "is watching this train wreck."

McCain, an all but announced presidential candidate, offered those assessments toward the end of a lengthy interview Thursday night. No politician in the United States is more clearly identified with President Bush's new policy, and no politician has more to lose if it fails. Democratic opponents have already coined a name for the troop "surge": the McCain Doctrine.

McCain made it clear that he supports Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq as the only way to prevent that country from slipping further into chaos. "I cannot guarantee success, but I can guarantee failure if we don't adopt this new strategy," he said.

But he also voiced deep frustration over what the war has done, both to this country and to Iraq. "I think many things that have happened in the world that are unfavorable to the United States are the result of our weakness in the Iraqi conflict," he said.

Asked how the war may affect his candidacy, McCain shrugged off the question. "I can't think about it or worry about it," he said. "I have to do what I think is right."

On the night of Bush's speech, he told CNN's Larry King: "I would much rather lose an election than lose a war."

The risk now is that both could be lost.

As a forceful advocate for a policy that appears to fly in the face of the message voters sent in November, the politician who has long played for the center of the electorate now finds himself isolated on the right.

"The war is going badly, and he is now the leading public advocate of more of the same or even much more of the same," said Ron Klain, a Democratic strategist and chief of staff to then-Vice President Al Gore. "That's an odd place to be."

At a time when many Republicans are voicing opposition to Bush's plan, McCain is not budging. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), one of McCain's closest friends in the Senate, explained the political stakes in the simplest terms. "If we're successful, he'll get the benefit," Graham said, referring to Iraq. "If we fail, he'll get the blame."

Two Democratic presidential candidates, former senator John Edwards of North Carolina and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, have cast McCain as the architect of the troop increase. MoveOn.org's political action committee plans television ads in Iowa and New Hampshire next week attacking McCain on the issue.

Would the Arizona senator describe the new policy as the embodiment of a McCain Doctrine for Iraq? "No, but I am willing to accept it as a McCain principle," he said Thursday night. "And that is, when I sign up, when I raise my hand and vote to go to war, that I want to see the completion of the mission."

McCain said the policy's defenders must work harder to change public opinion. "I admit that this is a challenge to us," he said. "But I can make the counterargument that withdrawal means defeat and chaos." Advocates for withdrawal, he said, must explain why that would not result in even greater chaos.

"What happens when Americans are no longer there?" he asked. "I think you could see some pretty horrific scenes on television sets in America."

It is a considerable irony, given their histories, that McCain's political future is now so closely tied to the president's ability to bring the Iraq war to a successful conclusion.

The two battled bitterly over the 2000 GOP presidential nomination. In 2004, they brokered a rapprochement that appeared politically beneficial to both: Bush gained the high-profile support of the Republican with the broadest appeal to independent voters, and McCain gained respect and admiration from conservative Republicans who had opposed his candidacy in 2000 and who are critical to his hopes for the nomination in 2008.

At the 2004 Republican National Convention, McCain offered lavish praise for Bush as a wartime president. Bush, he said, "has been tested and has risen to the most important challenge of our time. . . . He has not wavered. He has not flinched from the hard choices. He will not yield. And neither will we."

McCain said he has no regrets over the role he played in helping Bush win reelection, given his belief that the administration has so badly mismanaged the war. "Did I support the strategy? No, I didn't," he said. "But I certainly didn't see his opponent, who was advocating withdrawal, as advocating any kind of viable proposal," he added, referring to Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

His differences with the administration, he said, were well known as far back as 2004 -- his lack of confidence in then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his belief even then that the administration needed to send more troops to Iraq. "Every hearing, every opportunity that I had -- my staff has compiled it already a hundred times where I said, 'This is not going right. You've got to get more people on the ground here,' " he said.

McCain has long tried to balance his advocacy for the mission in Iraq with his criticism of the administration, always putting some distance between himself and the White House. He did the same in the days before Bush's prime-time speech Wednesday night. "There are two keys to any surge of U.S. troops," he said at a forum at the American Enterprise Institute. "To be of value, the surge must be substantial and it must be sustained."

Does the new policy meet those tests? McCain offers an equivocal answer. He said he has been assured by Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the president's choice to take over command in Iraq, that 20,000 additional troops should be enough, but that if they are not, Petraeus can ask Bush for more.

"He tells me, 'I think I can do it with this number,' " McCain said. "So I'm supposed to be a Monday-morning quarterback? I'm not going over there and command. I'm only sitting here trying to figure out the best way we can win this conflict."

His advisers dismiss suggestions that McCain has shrewdly left himself room to argue that Bush's plan for more troops was not substantial or sustained enough to ensure success. They, like the possible candidate, see the perils of his position -- but potential benefits as well.

"At the core of the issue is who he is, and that's what generates his popularity," said Rick Davis, one of McCain's top political advisers. "It's that he puts principle ahead of politics, that he tells it like he sees it regardless of the political ramifications."

McCain's character was shaped by the previous great conflict that divided America -- the Vietnam War -- and is being tested by the current conflict, which has done the same. A prisoner of war in Vietnam, McCain is now a hostage of a different sort -- his political future tied in part to the president, the Pentagon and an Iraqi government in which he has limited confidence.

McCain, who has helped broker many deals between Republicans and Democrats over the years, sees no opportunity to do so on Iraq. He opposed the only bipartisan plan on the table -- the report of the Iraq Study Group, which called for the withdrawal of most combat forces by early next year -- and finds himself at odds with most Democratic friends (one exception being Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, reelected as an independent) and longtime Republican allies such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

"We've either got to do what's necessary, in my considered view, that can lead to success in Iraq, or withdrawal, which in my view is going to lead to catastrophic consequences," he said. "I don't know where you find a middle ground there."

Tancredo For President? (COX)

By Eunice Moscoso

Cox Newspapers, January 13, 2007

The list of presidential wannabes could get a little longer soon. Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who has gained a national following — and the ire of some Latino groups — as a staunch opponent of illegal immigration, hinted Friday that he is ready to pursue the Oval Office.

When asked whether he plans to take action to start an official bid for the GOP nomination he said, “That is a distinct possibility.”

DOJ_NMG_0117047

Tancredo wouldn't be the only candidate with a "tough on border security" platform. Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, a major force behind constructing fences along the U.S.-Mexico border, formed an exploratory committee last year.

Allard Keeps '08 Plans Under Wraps (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 13, 2007

Washington - Sen. Wayne Allard has made up his mind about whether he will seek a third term in 2008, but he's keeping his decision secret a bit longer.

Only Allard and his wife know his plans, press secretary Steve Wymer said Friday, confirming a report posted Thursday on Congressional Quarterly's website, CQPolitics.com.

Allard has not said when he will announce his choice.

His decision has major implications for Colorado, the Senate and the Republican Party.

"It's a big deal for the Republican Party because they're facing another tough election cycle and they want all their incumbents running," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics. "And it's Colorado, which has been rapidly moving from the Republican column into the Democratic column."

Allard's seat has been called one of the nation's most competitive for 2008, regardless of whether he runs again. Jennifer Duffy, an analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, puts it in the three most closely contested Senate races nationwide.

Allard, 63, pledged in 1996 to serve just two Senate terms, but late last year he told The Denver Post that he believes voters now view term limits differently.

Potential Republican candidates for Allard's seat have been waiting for his decision before announcing their intentions.

Among them is former U.S. Rep. Scott McInnis, who said Friday that there is "no question I will run" if Allard opts not to.

McInnis said that if Allard bows out, he will file campaign finance paperwork and start pulling together supporters. He said he has nearly $1million in his war chest already, "and I'm confident we could raise the necessary funds."

But if Allard chooses to run again, McInnis said, "I'd be 100 percent fine with that."

Republicn U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo has also expressed some interest in the race if Allard decides not to run.

As for Democrats, U.S. Rep. Mark Udall has already announced his candidacy.

"Mark has always said that when you run for office you don't get to pick your opponent," Udall spokesman Lawrence Pacheco said Friday when asked about Allard's plans. "You don't run against somebody; you run for a vision."

Udall has raised $1.4 million in campaign funds.

Allard has just $148,000 in his war chest, but he is known to raise most of his campaign money closer to an election.

Fed Chairman May Face Heat At Hearings (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

When Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies on monetary policy next month, he is likely to get far more scrutiny than usual.

By law, the Fed chairman must testify twice a year to Congress: in February and July. Ordinarily, each installment lasts two days, one before the Senate Banking Committee, the other before the House Financial Services Committee. There are no other witnesses.

In a break with that tradition, Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who took over the House panel this month, said he plans to hold an additional day of hearings in which witnesses, such as economists and labor experts, will give their views on what Mr. Bernanke said.

Mr. Frank's plans, which he described in an interview Friday with The Wall Street Journal, suggest Mr. Bernanke, who has held the job for just under a year and is to testify on monetary policy on Feb. 14 and 15, could face added political heat for unpopular steps such as raising interest rates. It also raises the importance of his cultivating lawmakers to pursue potentially contentious initiatives, such as a numerical inflation target.

Mr. Frank said that while he opposes an inflation target, the Fed has the authority to implement one without Congress's approval.

Mr. Frank said the Fed shouldn't allow a target to result in employment being subordinated to inflation, and he wouldn't allow the Federal Reserve Act to be amended to allow that to happen.

However, Mr. Bernanke has argued an inflation target doesn't require the act to be amended, and in fact enhances the Fed's ability to boost employment. The FOMC is now in the midst of a lengthy internal discussion over how it communicates, including whether it should adopt a target.

Mr. Frank appeared open to that argument. He also said he was "impressed" by Mr. Bernanke's performance as Fed chairman. While Wall Street often interprets rising wages as inflationary and bad, he noted Mr. Bernanke has said it isn't bad as long as the rise in wages is matched by productivity and doesn't result in businesses trying to raise prices.

Political opposition is one of the greatest stumbling blocks to Fed adoption of an inflation target, and assuaging Mr. Frank's concerns would go a long way toward removing that obstacle. Senate Banking Committee Chairman Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) said in a statement Friday that he is "open to examining ways to help further the Fed's efforts to achieve [its] dual mandate" of maximum employment and stable prices and "will view any proposals under the broader lens of their effect on keeping our economy strong and improving opportunity for all."

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Under the plan, California would require all individuals to purchase health insurance or face tax penalties. California has more uninsured residents than any other state, and the plan could prompt others to follow suit. Efforts to reduce the number of uninsured, now at 46.6 million in the U.S., come after more than a decade of federal inaction, since Congress killed President Bill Clinton's proposal for universal health coverage in 1994.

State budgets have borne the brunt of the swelling ranks of uninsured. That's because states pay 43% of all costs for Medicaid, the program that covers health care for the poor without insurance. Medicaid spending has doubled from 11.5% of state budgets in 1988 to 22.9% in the 2005 fiscal year. If the plan is enacted, California would follow Massachusetts in requiring health insurance for all. Maine and Vermont have enacted more modest plans.

Here's a closer look at different state plans:

California: The Golden State's intended plan is the most ambitious. Nearly 19% of Californians are uninsured, almost twice Massachusetts's rate of 10.7% and more than the national average of 15.7%, according to the Census Bureau.

Under the plan, employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer health insurance or pay at least 4% of their payroll into a government program. Doctors would contribute 2% and hospitals 4% of their gross earnings to the program. Insurers, who would see millions of new customers, would have to offer coverage to everyone regardless of health and could spend no more than 15% of patients' premiums on administrative costs.

The downsides: The state is bound to face challenges from the powerful lobbies -- doctors, hospitals, insurers and employers -- that would share the plan costs. Moreover, some fear that businesses that already spend more than 4% of their payroll on insurance might reduce coverage or drop their plans altogether and just pay the 4% fee. Labor groups worry about a middle-class squeeze: A family of four that makes $50,000 a year, for example, would not receive a subsidy but would be required to buy health insurance. Some members of the governor's own Republican Party oppose his proposal because it would extend Medicaid coverage to the children of illegal immigrants.

Massachusetts: The state will be the first to require all residents to purchase health insurance when a new law takes effect in July. Low-income individuals receive subsidies to buy their own insurance. Residents can purchase plans through a private insurance market created by the state that connects buyers and sellers.

The $1.3 billion plan includes only $125 million in new state money and $50 million from penalties on businesses that don't provide insurance. The rest comes from reallocating an existing $1 billion in government money.

The downsides: A vague exception says that if an "affordable" plan isn't available, residents don't have to buy health insurance. The state hasn't yet defined what constitutes an "affordable" plan.

DOJ_NMG_0117049

Maine: The state-subsidized DirigoChoice insurance plan is optional and offered by private companies. Enrollment is limited to small businesses, the self-employed and the uninsured. Subsidies to low-income uninsured are funded by federal money; participating employers, who pay 60% of the health costs for their employees; and insurance firms, which pay an annual fee calculated as the amount saved in bad debt and charity care.

The downsides: The program covers only 13,000 so far, despite a target of 30,000 in its first year and all 130,000 uninsured by 2009.

Vermont: Private insurance companies will offer the state-subsidized Catamount Health plan this October. The state has raised tobacco taxes and charged employers $365 a year for each uninsured employee to cover these subsidies for low-income uninsured. Individuals are not required to buy insurance, and the plan is open only to the uninsured. The state hopes to cover 96% of its 60,000 uninsured by 2010.

FACTS

Hawaii has required employers to provide medical insurance for employees since 1974.

Young adults are the most likely group to be uninsured. Those between ages 18 and 34 account for 25% of the population but 41% of those without insurance.

It costs $91 to treat a patient for strep throat in a doctor's office, compared with $310 in a hospital emergency room, according to a Health Partners study.

Health-care costs now account for one-sixth of the economy, compared with one-tenth in the early 1980s.

The U.S. spent $2 trillion on health care, or $6,697 a person, in 2005.

Last year, 61% of businesses offered health benefits to at least some employees, down from 69% in 2000.

POINTS OF VIEW

"California's medical care, its medical knowledge, its medical technology is as strong as a bodybuilder. Yet our health-care system is a sick old man."

-- California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger

"Reform has to come from Washington, but it's possible that a handful of case-study states can show the way."

---- Drew E. Altman, Kaiser Family Foundation president, CEO

Schwarzenkennedy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger once extolled "the power of the market" in Milton Friedman's "Free to Choose" PBS series. So it's probably just as well that the late, great economist won't see the regulated mess that his admirer is proposing to make of California's health insurance market. As speaker of the state assembly Fabian Nunes remarked, "This is a plan assembly Democrats could have written."

In fact, they already have -- in 2003, when Democrat Gray Davis was Governor. Candidate Schwarzenegger campaigned against that measure, which was less onerous than his own new proposal mandating that business provide health insurance to all employees. Arnold even helped to gather signatures for a 2004 state referendum in which voters overturned that bill. But now he's taking on a new political acting challenge, this time playing Gray Davis as apparently channeled through his chief of staff Susan Kennedy (who used to work for Mr. Davis).

Or perhaps the GOP Governor is trying to replicate the media hosannas that former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney garnered last year with his "universal" coverage law. As with the Romney plan, Governor Schwarzenegger builds his proposal around an "individual mandate" that would require people to buy health insurance or face penalties such as garnishment of wages. This compulsion is supposedly justified on grounds that treating "free riders" in emergency rooms is a significant driver of overall health costs. But studies have shown that the cost of this problem is less than 3% of overall health-care spending.

Far worse are Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposals for California's employment and insurance markets. The Governor is proposing that businesses with 10 or more employees be required to provide insurance, or else pay 4% of their taxable Social Security wages into a fund to subsidize insurance for the working uninsured. The likely reaction of many California businesses to this new and costly mandate: outsourcing to Nevada, or India.

Mr. Schwarzenegger goes far beyond the Romney plan in proposing to help pay for his scheme by taxing hospitals 4% and doctors 2% of their gross revenues. That's right, institutions operating at or near a loss would have to pay the tax. So California doctors could soon be spending more time with their accountants than with patients -- assuming they can afford to keep their practices running at all.

Yes, we know, the Governor calls it a "fee" or "dividend," rather than a tax. This is no doubt because the California constitution requires that any new "tax" pass both houses of the legislature with two-thirds majorities. So call the elephant in the room a hippo and hope the public buys it. We trust this Hollywood action stunt will be tested in court, if not in another referendum.

Like all such political schemes, Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan also works at cross-purposes. It includes new subsidies to help the uninsured obtain coverage, but at the same time it would impose new coverage mandates that would make insurance a lot more expensive. Two rules in particular have all but ruined the market for individually owned coverage in every other state where they've been tried.

The first is called "guaranteed issue," which means insurers are required to write you a policy even if you wait until you're sick to ask for it. It is precisely this "guarantee" that many people use as an excuse to remain "uninsured." Why not buy a new car rather than health insurance when you're healthy if you know you can always buy insurance if you get cancer?

The second rule is "community rating," which means insurance premiums cannot vary based on age or health status. This is akin to telling auto insurers that they can't charge higher premiums to 18-year-old males with a history of speeding tickets than they do 45-year-old mothers. Both rules raise the cost of insurance for everyone.

This is all especially regrettable because California has had more market-friendly insurance regulations than most other large states. And this has meant lower insurance premiums. According to eHealthinsurance.com, a single 35-year-old man in Beverly Hills can buy decent coverage for as little as $69 a month. But Arnold's plan would move those rates in the direction of community-rated New York, where that same man would pay $416 for any coverage at all.

Like Mr. Romney before him, Mr. Schwarzenegger is playing on the political appeal of allegedly "universal" coverage. Mr. Romney hopes to ride it to the GOP Presidential nomination, and Arnold is basking in new media admiration. About the best we can say for their plans is that these state policy experiments will show other states what not to do. But they are also providing cover for the proponents of greater government control of health care. Right on cue, Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed "universal" coverage this week too. * * *

The better alternative, as Milton Friedman understood, is to expand tax-advantaged health savings accounts and to improve access and affordability by creating a national market for private health insurance. Consumers in California and Massachusetts, especially, are going to need that safety valve when the bill comes due for their Governors' attention-seeking but poorly considered plans.

A Taste Of Family Life In U.S., But Adoption Is In Limbo (NYT)

By Jane Gross

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

TERRYVILLE, Conn. — During the two weeks that Marino and Debbie Prozzo welcomed a Ukrainian orphan in their home, they fell head over heels for a 7-year-old child they may never be able to adopt.

While the Prozzos were giving Alona Malyovana her first bubble bath, teaching her to use the remote control, and buying her a pink velvet dress trimmed in bunny fur, the chaotic system of adoption in Ukraine was growing more chaotic.

The director of Ukraine's new Department for Adoptions resigned, leaving the fate of the nation's 90,000 orphans in limbo. A new application process required foreign families to quickly update security clearances and other time-sensitive information. Prospective parents anxiously scanned the State Department's Web site and bulletins from the embassy in Kiev for clarification of rules and rumors.

Hosting programs, like the one that brought Alona to an American family this Christmas, showcase older children, generally from orphanages in former Soviet bloc nations. The programs have long been hailed as an effective marketing tool by adoption experts, who say 8 of 10 families would not adopt these children without a trial run.

In the largely unregulated world of international adoptions, these programs often lead to happily-ever-after, but sometimes end painfully. Ukraine and Russia place formidable obstacles in the path of parents, among them inaccurate information about children's availability and health status. Multiple families can wind up competing for the same child. And children themselves know they are auditioning for what the industry calls their "forever families." Then there is an entrenched system of favors — requests for cash or gifts from facilitators, translators, judges and others who handle the mechanics of adoption overseas.

Conditions in both countries have grown so unsettled, some agencies have suspended hosting programs, and the debate is growing about the ratio of risk to reward. Do the many success stories for older orphans make up for the heartbreak when adoption is thwarted?

The Prozzos had been deceived before by an intermediary who showed them a photograph of an adorable child they later learned was not available. So their guard was up before Alona's visit in December.

"We won't let this child call us 'mama' or 'papa' because we aren't," Mr. Prozzo said. But Alona's visit had barely begun when she jumped into his outstretched arms and called him "papa."

"Now what?" Mr. Prozzo said, melting. "Now what?"

The quandary for agencies in the United States these days is how to balance optimism and pessimism when the prospect of a successful adoption is anyone's guess. "In an ideal world we wouldn't be doing it this way," said Adam Pertman, executive director of the Evan B. Donaldson Adoption Institute, a research organization. "But we haven't come up with a better solution."

The fee for the two-week hosting visits, organized by adoption agencies and humanitarian organizations, is $2,500 per child, which includes travel, bilingual escorts and a sizable donation back to the orphanages (subsequent adoption costs average $25,000).

Often, the formal disclaimers and informal predictions by program directors seem at odds. Frontier Horizon, the humanitarian agency that last month brought over 50 orphans, Alona among them, states unambiguously in its printed materials that it is "a travel program not an adoption program."

But Vincent Rosini, president of the organization, says that his group has been host to 300 Ukrainian orphans since 2000 and that only five families have been unable to adopt the children they wanted. One hundred of Frontier Horizon's children have been successfully adopted, Mr. Rosini said.

"Is there a good chance?" Mr. Rosini asked. "Yes. Is it 100 percent? No."

Adoption experts on both sides of the hosting debate agree that the children know they are auditioning for adoption, and that the families quickly grow attached.

"The child has raised expectations, regardless of what they're told," said Judy Stigger, director of international adoption for the Cradle, an agency in Evanston, Ill. "And the parents become more emotionally invested than they appreciated because when you hold a specific child in your arms, your whole body feels it, responds and remembers. That child quickly becomes yours."

In countries like Ukraine, it is all but impossible to manage expectations. Adoption authorities insist that families cannot request children who spent time in their homes, but rather must come to Kiev, by invitation, look at pictures and go to orphanages to meet the children offered to them.

Both the Cradle and Maine Adoption Placement Services, an agency that suspended its Russian hosting program in 2004, are known for their excellent connections in former Soviet bloc nations and are sometimes hired as "fixers" by families who went through other agencies when the children visited only to find they could not adopt them.

At MAPS, Betsy Bewsey, the director of international adoption, said that "right now things are as volatile as I've ever seen them." She cited stringent regulations in China, announced last month, which will complicate adoption in the country, long considered the "fail-safe" because of an efficient bureaucracy and healthy infants. The volatility in these countries, and especially the suspension of several hosting programs from Ukraine and Russia, has contributed to a dip in overall international adoptions by Americans, according to Thomas DiFilipo, the president of the Joint Council on International Children's Services.

The high-water mark came in 2004, when 22,884 immigrant visas were issued to orphans in the process of formal adoption — more than triple the number in 1990. In 2006, visas fell to 20,679. In that two-year span, visas to children from Ukraine fell to 460, from 723. Russia's visas dropped to 3,706, from 5,865.

Families like the Prozzos can be easy marks for scoundrels. Agencies that do international adoptions need not be accredited, although that will change if the United States ratifies a treaty to regulate intercountry adoption, expected some time this year. More than 300 agencies have applied. By all accounts, only one international adoption facilitator in America has been shut down, Yunona USA of Napa, Calif., in 2005. Yunona allegedly defrauded at least 100 would-be adoptive parents of more than $1.1 million by posting photos of Russian and Ukrainian children on its Web site, taking deposits from families and later saying the children were not available. The Prozzos chose a child from the Yunona Web site but had not yet paid a deposit when they learned she was unavailable.

Yunona's president, Ivan Jerdev, faces a $386,000 default civil judgment. He is believed to have fled to his native Russia after the police raided his office in December 2005, law enforcement officials said. The Yunona case, which did not involve hosting programs, led California to pass the nation's strictest law regulating adoption facilitators, which went into effect on Jan. 1.

In a complaint against Adopt-A-Miracle, in Evergreen, Colo., investigated by the Denver Better Business Bureau, Lourdes Blanco of Miami said she had selected a Ukrainian infant off the agency's Web site, learned the baby girl had already been adopted but was assured she would find a comparable child if she traveled to Kiev. Ms. Blanco made two trips, she said, only to be told there were no healthy children. The case was settled when the agency refunded $10,000 of more than $20,000 in fees and travel expenses.

In responding to the bureau, Adopt-A-Miracle's executive director, Charlotte Allen, described the process as "enormously challenging" because simple information about a child's status is often unavailable. "It may seem incredible," Ms. Allen wrote. "But this is the way it is."

Faya Fromm, 13, formerly of Siberia, knows well how expectations can be dashed in an orphanage. Twice, she was told "we're sending you to a family in America who might want to adopt you." The first time she was not chosen for the hosting trip. The second time she wound up with Linda Fromm, 56, of Ridgewood, N.J., who had three grown children from an early marriage.

When a summer hosting program ended, Ms. Fromm "skated around" what to tell Faya, saying she would "fly like the birds and swim like the fish to come visit you." It took her nine months to assemble her dossier and take a second mortgage on her home to pay for the 2003 adoption. During that time, Ms. Fromm could not call the orphanage. But she sent Faya notes and photos albums, with $5 bills tucked between the pages.

It was a long, uncertain wait for the girl, who described another disappointment: She was shown to an Italian family, then told they would be back for her the next day. Faya was kept out of school, dressed in her best clothes and waited in the director's office. The family never returned.

Siberia at that time encouraged families to adopt children after a home visit. Not so Ukraine today. At Faya's urging, Ms. Fromm invited Ira and Olga Chyrkova, 9-year-old twin girls, to spend the holiday as a trial run for adoption.

It was Faya who told the twins her mother's plans "She will try to bring you back next summer," Faya told them. "And she's going to try to adopt you."

Then midway through, Ms. Fromm was crushed to learn that Olga and Ira were not cleared for adoption yet. Their mother had been murdered, but her death certificate was missing and necessary to prove the girls' status as orphans.

Mr. Rosini did not directly reassure Ms. Fromm he could pull strings at the orphanage, but mentioned, in passing, that the director had recently asked for a new coat.

Such requests, Mr. Rosini said, are common. One orphanage director threatened to cancel a hosting trip unless he helped her raise money for a new health clinic. A Frontier Horizon family who donated $25,000 is now scheduled to adopt a child who visited four times. Families might be asked by an orphanage director for $400 for a new meat slicer, Mr. Rosini said, or a facilitator will tell them that two weeks' worth of paperwork could be expedited in two days if he had a fax machine. "We're used to it," Mr. Rosini said.

DOJ_NMG_0117053

The children come off the plane with the clothes on their backs and a small knapsack. Some, veterans of hosting programs who had never been chosen, also arrive with their defenses up. Twelve-year-old Lesya Otya was slow to warm to Jeannie Fillatti, 49, of Avon, Conn., until it was nearly time to go.

But, in the car headed to the airport — with newly pierced ears, her first brassiere and a ski tag on her parka from a weekend in Vermont — the girl buried her head in Ms. Fillatti's lap, unconsolable.

A promise from Ms. Fillatti that Lesya could return for next summer's hosting program was unpersuasive. "They don't know what to think, how to hope, whether to hope," said Ms. Fillatti, who had tried before to bring back a child and been rebuffed.

When the time came to pass through the security doors, Lesya wailed her protest, in the English she had recently learned: "No! No! Not yet!"

This was Alona's first visit, and with no history of disappointment, her departure, with her Christmas bounty of designer jeans and cowboy boots, was composed. Mrs. Prozzo, without eye makeup because she was prepared for a tearful parting, sent her off with a kiss and a murmured "I love you." She and her husband had plenty to talk about when they got home.

The couple — he is a 53-year-old engineer and she is a 48-year-old librarian, re-examining in middle age their decision not to have children — knew from the start that Alona might not be available for adoption or that she might be snapped up by another family while they prepared their dossier.

They vowed that they understood the long odds. "But that was two weeks ago," Mr. Prozzo said after Alona returned to rural Zaporozhye. "Now it's a different story. I love this child."

And so he hatched a plan. The Prozzos would ready themselves to travel to Ukraine and consider the children offered. Only then, with great deference, would he beg officials to match them with Alona.

"When I'm sitting in front of the guy, man-to-man," Mr. Prozzo said, "I'll say, 'Sir, can you understand this?' "

Meanwhile, Mr. Prozzo said he had made a donation to a charity in Zaporozhye that was raising money for hospital equipment. Maybe the donation will improve his adoption chances. If not, Mr. Prozzo said, at least it will improve medical care for the orphans left behind.

Ford Once Called Carter A "Disaster" (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- In 25 years of interviews with his hometown paper that could be released only after his death, former president Gerald R. Ford expressed mixed opinions of Jimmy Carter, once calling him a "disaster," and said that Ronald Reagan received far too much credit for ending the Cold War.

"It makes me very irritated when Reagan's people pound their chests and say that, because we had this big military buildup, the Kremlin collapsed," Ford told the Grand Rapids Press.

Ford contended that his own negotiation of the Helsinki accords on human rights did more to win the Cold War than Reagan's military buildup.

The best president of his lifetime, Ford said, was a more moderate Republican: Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Harry S. Truman "would get very high marks" for his handling of foreign crises, Ford said. He also praised Richard Nixon as a foreign policy master, despite the Watergate scandal that drove him from office.

Ford considered John F. Kennedy overrated and Bill Clinton average. He admired George H.W. Bush's handling of the Persian Gulf War.

In 1981, five years after Carter defeated him, Ford said: "I think Jimmy Carter would be very close to Warren G. Harding. I feel very strongly that Jimmy Carter was a disaster, particularly domestically and economically. I have said more than once that he was certainly the poorest president in my lifetime."

But two years later, he praised Carter's performance on the Panama Canal Treaty, China and the Middle East. And in 1998, he said Carter "will be looked on as a better president than some comments we hear today."

"He was a very decent, fine individual," Ford told the newspaper. "There were no major mistakes. There just weren't a lot of exciting results."

Ford gave the interviews on the condition that his remarks be withheld until after his death.

DOJ_NMG_0117054

According to the newspaper, Ford declined to rate President Bush, saying he did not know him well enough.

Ford said that Reagan, who challenged him unsuccessfully for the GOP nomination in 1976, was "a great spokesman for attractive political objectives," such as a balanced budget and defeating communism, "but when it came to implementation, his record never matched his words."

Reagan was "probably the least well informed on the details of running the government of any president I knew," Ford said. In a separate interview, he said Reagan "was just a poor manager, and you can't be president and do a good job unless you manage."

Under the 1975 Helsinki accords signed by Ford, the United States recognized borders in Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe in exchange for the Soviets' pledge to respect basic human rights.

Rice Seeks Arab Backing For Iraq Plan (AFP)

AFP, January 13, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice headed for the Middle East on Friday to rally Arab support for a new US strategy in the Iraq war and to counter Iran's alleged interference in Iraq.

The week-long tour also will seek to bolster efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with Rice scheduled to hold talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories on Saturday and Sunday.

Rice will then travel to Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain before returning to Washington on January 19.

The trip comes two days after President George W. Bush presented his last-ditch strategy to quell violence in Iraq with the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops.

Bush also declared a new initiative against Iranian and Syrian elements which the United States accuses of destabilizing Iraq, while stepping up the US military presence in the Gulf.

Signalling a tougher approach, US forces on Thursday detained six Iranians in a night-time swoop on an office in northern Iraq, prompting protests from Iran.

Before her departure, Rice told lawmakers in Congress her trip "will focus heavily on rallying the support of those responsible Arab states to support the government of Iraq, to support what needs to be done there, to support, of course, also Lebanon and the moderate Palestinians."

In an interview with the BBC's Arabic television released Friday, Rice said it was ultimately up to the Iraqi leadership to restore security.

Bush's plan "very much puts Iraqis at the center of responsibility for dealing with what is their most urgent problem," Rice said.

"Their most urgent problem is that the population has lost confidence that the government of Iraq can and will defend them in an even-handed fashion, whether they are Sunni or Shia," Rice said.

Describing the Middle East as divided between moderate and extremist forces, Rice said on Thursday it was vital to counter Iranian influence in Iraq and the region.

"What we are ... looking at is the need to solidify the consensus, the interest of these states that all fear Iran's moves in the region, fear the regional aggression of Iran," Rice said.

"I think you will see that the United States is not going to simply stand idly by and let these activities continue," she said.

Although Iraq threatened to dominate the trip, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Rice viewed her diplomatic tour as a chance to advance tentative peace prospects in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"One of the things that's important to her is that we be able to have talks with Palestinian and Israeli oficials as well as regional officials about how we can move the process forward," Casey said.

"We believe that there are opportunities to move forward with that process," said Casey.

Rice appeared to face an uphill battle on promoting Bush's new war plan in the region nearly four years after the US-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Newspaper commentators across the Middle East cast doubt Friday on the strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0117055

The Qatari newspaper Al-Raya said: "This strategy, which does not even convince Americans, is doomed to an unavoidable and appalling failure."

"Iraq does not need reinforcements. It needs to be saved from the situation created by the US presence, which has turned the lives of Iraqi people into a nightmare... The solution is not military, but political."

In Cairo, the Rose Al-Yussuf newspaper said that Bush's strategy would have only a "temporary" effect, and proved that Bush "understands nothing".

"Bush's vision is limited to the capital," it said, referring to Baghdad. "He does not realise that it is all Iraq that is in crisis".

The trip comes as Tehran continues to scorn international efforts to convince it to halt nuclear fuel enrichment work, which major powers believe is aimed at developing nuclear weapons.

Amid rising tension between the United States and Iran, Washington announced Thursday two aircraft carrier battle groups would stay in the Gulf for several months.

It was the first time Washington had moved two carriers to the region since 2003 when the United States invaded Iraq, a US military official said.

Rice's visit to Kuwait will include a meeting with foreign ministers from the Gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Qatar and Bahrain, as well as Egypt and Jordan.

Scepticism Awaits Rice On Tour (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

Facing a barrage of opposition at home over the new Iraq policy, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, takes the White House's case to the Middle East this weekend to try to drum up regional support.

But there too she is likely to find plenty of scepticism that deploying another 20,000 troops mostly in Baghdad can bring an end to the raging sectarian conflict.

President George W. Bush's decision to ignore calls for a withdrawal from Iraq and to take a hard line on Iran in his speech on Wednesday night will find backing in Israel as well as some of the pro-western Arab states that rely on US protection and are increasingly paranoid about Iranian influence.

But Arab officials on Friday questioned Mr Bush's emphasis on a military solution and lamented the only brief mention of peace between Israel and Palestinians – the issue Arab rulers consider the top priority.

"The focus for Iraq was mainly on troops, while we believe the focus should be directed on a political resolution," said one Arab diplomat.

Comments in the Arab media have been more scathing, with Saudi Arabia's English-language Arab News saying the new American initiative "speaks volumes about desperation yet is a sure path to damnation".

Ms Rice's tour includes stops in Israel and the occupied Palestinian territories, and a meeting in Kuwait with foreign ministers from the Gulf plus Egypt and Jordan – the camp the US sees as "moderate" in the struggle against Iran, Syria and militant groups backed by the two states.

The tour is designed to enlist support for the new Iraq policy by pressing Sunni governments to use their influence with Iraq's Sunni Arabs and help stabilise Iraq, and to step up their diplomatic backing for the elected government of Nouri al-Maliki.

Arab officials, including in Saudi Arabia, have been arguing against a short-term US withdrawal, fearing it would worsen Iraq's civil conflict and force them to intervene on the side of the Sunni Arab minority. They want Iraq's Shia-dominated government to crack down on Shia militias and agree to political concessions that would give the Sunni – marginalised since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein – a greater stake in the new state.

"We don't see the Iraqi government as having great determination or the tools for an inclusive political process," said one Arab official.

But the Bush administration is also looking to create an Israeli-Sunni Arab front against Shia Iran. On Wednesday Mr Bush coupled tough warnings to Tehran with a promise of increased intelligence co-operation with Arab allies and the deployment of Patriot missiles in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0117056

While most pro-western states are desperate to check Iran's power and its ability to pursue a nuclear programme, senior officials say working more closely with the US on Iran requires first that Washington champions a new drive to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Arab enthusiasm for weakening Iran is also balanced against fears that US-Iranian tensions could drag the region into another military conflict. The stand-off between the US and Iran over Iraq and the nuclear programme is already hardening sectarian tensions across the Middle East.

Few observers believe the Bush administration has the political will to engage seriously in a new peace process, particularly at a time when Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, has been weakened by the war with Lebanon's Hizbollah, and the Palestinians are locked in a violent internal struggle.

Senior Arab officials, however, say quiet moves in recent months – including a reported meeting between senior Israeli and Saudi officials – give them some hope that Washington might be prompted to push for a revival of Palestinian-Israeli negotiations on the basis of a 2002 Arab peace initiative that the US ignored at the time and Israel rejected. ¦Jalal Talabani, Iraq's president, will travel to Syria tomorrow in an effort to normalise relations with a country that is accused of allowing its territory to be used as a supply conduit for Sunni Arab insurgents, writes Steve Negus.

The visit, in the wake of President George W. Bush's new Iraq strategy – which takes a hardline attitude towards Syria – fits what seems to be an emerging good cop/bad cop dynamic in the relationship between the three countries,

Security issues that are a priority for Iraq include "border control, the activities of a number of members of Saddam's regime, control over the flow of foreign fighters", said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign -minister.

Russia, China Veto Resolution On Burma (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 12 -- China and Russia on Friday jointly vetoed a U.S.-sponsored resolution criticizing Burma's human rights record, striking a blow to the Bush administration's year-long campaign to use the U.N. Security Council to spotlight the repressive rule of Burma's military junta.

Friday's vote was part of a broader diplomatic effort by Beijing and Moscow to prevent the United States and its Western allies from using the 15-nation council to censure some of the countries particularly known for rights abuses, including governments in Belarus, Sudan and Zimbabwe.

They were joined by one of the council's most influential Third World countries, South Africa. It also opposed the U.S. resolution on the grounds that the Security Council has no mandate to scold or sanction Burma, also known as Myanmar, for abuses on its own soil.

"We believe that the situation in this country does not pose any threat to international or regional peace; this opinion is shared by a large number of states, including most importantly those neighboring Myanmar," Russia's ambassador, Vitaly I. Churkin, told the council. "We find that attempts aimed at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside its purview are unacceptable."

The United States secured nine votes for the resolution in the 15-nation council. Congo, Qatar and Indonesia abstained, arguing that the U.N. Human Rights Council is the appropriate venue for addressing Burma's human rights record.

Despite the tepid support for the U.S. initiative, virtually all council members -- including China -- expressed concerns about Burma's behavior. Indonesia's envoy, Rezlan Ishar Jenie, urged Burma's government to heed international calls to restore "democracy and human rights" to the country.

Burma's ambassador, Kyaw Tint Swe, praised China, Russia and South Africa for opposing the resolution, which he said was based on "patently false information."

The Bush administration's acting U.N. ambassador, Alejandro Wolff, said the United States was "deeply disappointed" by the council's failure to confront Burma. But he said the United States decided to force a vote to assure the Burmese people that "we won't forget you."

DOJ_NMG_0117057

The vote initially faced resistance from some officials within the State Department and from European envoys, who feared it would damage U.S. and European relations with China while exposing the depth of Third World opposition to Security Council interference in Burma's affairs.

But President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice decided it was worth making the point on a matter of principle, according to U.S. officials.

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, challenged suggestions that the effort had backfired, highlighting a growing rift between the West and the developing world over human rights. "We don't consider this a defeat," Burns said. "We did the right thing. We stood up for universal human values."

Burma's generals have ruled the country since 1962, presiding over one of the world's most repressive governments. U.N. rights monitors have accused the government of conducting a brutal counterinsurgency campaign that has displaced more than 1 million people. The government has also held Nobel Peace Prize laureate Aung San Suu Kyi under house arrest for most of the period since her political party, the National League for Democracy, won a landslide election victory in 1990. The military refused to recognize the election results.

The defeated resolution called on Burma's rulers to release Suu Kyi and more than 1,100 of her political supporters, cease attacks on the country's ethnic minority, and begin a democratic transition. It also called on Burma to halt the widespread use of rape by the armed forces and to back efforts by the International Labor Organization to end forced labor in Burma.

China led opposition to the U.S. initiative, highlighting its emergence as an increasingly assertive diplomatic force at the United Nations. Last year, it played a central role in the selection of South Korean Ban Ki Moon as the United Nations' first Asian secretary general in more than 35 years.

This is only the fifth time that China's Communist government has cast its veto since it joined the United Nations in 1971, a tiny fraction of the 254 vetoes cast by the other four permanent members of the Security Council. The United States, for instance, has cast its veto 82 times and Russia (formerly the Soviet Union) has cast its veto 122 times. The last time China and Russia cast a double veto was in 1972.

"No country is perfect," Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya told the council. "Similar problems exist in other countries as well."

U.S. Rebuke To Myanmar Is Defeated By U.N. Vetoes (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 12 — China and Russia vetoed an American-drafted resolution on Friday calling for the military rulers of Myanmar to release all political prisoners, cease attacks on ethnic minorities and speed a transition to democracy.

The vote was 9 to 3 with South Africa joining China and Russia in opposition, and three other countries, Congo Republic, Indonesia and Qatar, abstaining.

The Security Council's five permanent members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — hold veto power over most resolutions.

China and Russia argued that they shared concerns about conditions in Myanmar but considered them internal matters that did not constitute threats to international peace and security, the category of crisis subject to Security Council action.

"Not a single one of the neighboring countries regards the situation in Myanmar as a threat to them, and on the basis of that, there were no grounds for the Security Council to consider the matter," said Vitaly I. Churkin, Russia's ambassador.

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said, "Of course there are problems in Myanmar, but we believe that these problems do not constitute a threat to international peace and security."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador, said he was "deeply disappointed" at the outcome but noted even countries voting against the measure made clear in explanatory statements that they were not defending Myanmar's government. "This was a jurisdictional issue behind the split vote here," he said. "There was no disagreement about the content and substance behind this resolution."

DOJ_NMG_0117058

Mr. Wolff was asked why the United States risked dividing the Council and muddling its message to the repressive rulers of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

"The only mixed message here is whether this issue deserved to be on the Security Council agenda," he said. "There is no mixed message, no mixed signal at all, about how the international community, how this Council feels about the situation in Burma."

The resolution mentioned by name the most prominent political prisoner, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, the Nobel Peace Prize-winning opposition leader, who is under house arrest.

It also accused Myanmar's armed forces of attacking and raping civilians from the country's ethnic minorities and causing a refugee crisis in the region, enabling narcotics traffic and permitting international transmission of communicable diseases like H.I.V./AIDS and avian flu.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, said he had no doubt that the abuses by Myanmar posed a threat beyond its borders. "When a million people flee the country because of the abusive practices of the government, that's a threat to international peace and security," he said in a telephone interview from Washington.

"When you have a political movement jailed," he said, "led by a woman who is one of the greatest people in the world, that's a threat to international peace and security."

He dismissed suggestions that the proper United Nations forum for Myanmar was the Geneva-based Human Rights Council, not the Security Council. "We forced this onto the agenda for one reason," he said. "The Security Council is the only place that can deal with human rights. The Human Rights Council is a discredited institution. All it has done is to bash Israel; it has ignored North Korea, it has ignored Sudan and it has ignored Burma."

After the vote, Kyaw Tint Swe, Myanmar's ambassador, thanked China and Russia for blocking the move and said the charges against his country in the resolution were "patently false."

The double veto was the first multiple veto in the Security Council since 1989, when Britain, France and the United States blocked a resolution on Panama.

China, Russia Veto Myanmar Resolution (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

China and Russia cast a rare double veto Friday of a U.S. resolution calling on Myanmar's military government to release all political prisoners, speed up progress toward democracy, and stop attacks against ethnic minorities.

The vote in the Security Council was 9-3 with three abstentions. South Africa, a new non-permanent member of the council without veto power, joined China and Russia in opposing the resolution.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya and Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin both said the Security Council was not the proper place to discuss Myanmar because the country does not pose a threat to international peace and security.

"We find that attempts aimed at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside its view are unacceptable," Churkin said, noting that problems in Myanmar were being addressed by other U.N. bodies.

While Wang said the council was the wrong place to deal with Myanmar, he urged the country, also known as Burma, to move toward "inclusive democracy" and "speed up the process of dialogue and reform."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff called for the vote knowing in advance the resolution would be vetoed.

"The United States is deeply disappointed by the failure of the council to adopt this resolution," Wolff said. "This resolution would have been a strong and urgently needed statement by the Security Council about the need for change in Burma."

But he added that the people of Myanmar "should not be disheartened" because the vote reflected differences over the Security Council's jurisdiction, not about their plight.

All 15 council members "recognize that there are problems in the areas of human rights, social issues, political freedom," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0117059

The country's "military regime arbitrarily arrests, tortures, rapes and executes its own people, wages war on minorities within its own borders, and builds itself new cities while looking the other way as refugee flows increase, narcotics and human trafficking grow, and communicable diseases remain untreated," he said.

The United States softened the resolution late Thursday in an attempt to win greater support for it.

The revised text dropped a statement that would have expressed the Security Council's "gravest concern that the overall situation in Myanmar has deteriorated and poses serious risks to peace and security in the region."

Instead, the new draft underlined "the need for tangible progress in the overall situation in Myanmar in order to minimize the risks to peace and security in the region."

Former Secretary-General Kofi Annan sent Undersecretary-General for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari to Myanmar twice last year to meet with government leaders. He was allowed to meet pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi, who is under house arrest.

Gambari appealed to the government to release all political prisoners, allow all political parties, stop hostilities against ethnic minorities and allow unhindered humanitarian access.

Myanmar's junta took power in 1988 after crushing the democracy movement led by Suu Kyi. In 1990, it refused to hand over power when Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy won a landslide election victory. Since then, Suu Kyi has been in and out of detention, kept in near-solitary confinement at her home.

Myanmar's U.N. Ambassador Kyaw Tint Swe thanked China and Russia and the countries that abstained, stressing that his country posed no threat. Had the resolution been adopted "it would have created a dangerous precedent," he said.

Wolff said Gambari had wanted the resolution to support the secretary-general's "good offices" mission and expressed regret that the council didn't give him its backing. Wang and Churkin said their governments supported the mission despite their vetoes.

A National Convention in Myanmar has been drafting guidelines for a new constitution, the first of seven steps outlined in a "roadmap to democracy" which the junta says will culminate in free elections. But the convention suspended work in late December, and no timetable has been announced for completion of the process.

The defeated draft expressed "deep concern at the slow pace of tangible progress in the process towards national reconciliation." It called on the government "to begin without delay a substantive political dialogue, which would lead to a genuine democratic transition."

The final draft also called on the government "to cease military attacks against civilians in ethnic minority regions," including widespread sexual violence.

Double Veto For Burma Resolution (BBC)

BBC.com, January 12, 2007

China and Russia have cast a double veto in the UN Security Council, to stop a US draft resolution calling for an end to human rights abuses in Burma.

The two countries' ambassadors said the resolution was outside the remit of the Security Council as Burma posed no threat to international security.

US envoy Alejandro Wolff said he was "deeply disappointed" by Russia and China's first joint veto since 1972.

South Africa, a new non-permanent member, also opposed the document.

Qatar, Indonesia and the Republic of Congo abstained while the nine other members voted for.

Detainees released

The draft resolution urged Burma's military rulers to end persecution of minorities and opposition groups.

It called for the release of all political prisoners, including opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi, who is currently under house arrest, and for all political groups to operate freely.

"The United States is deeply disappointed by the failure of the council to adopt this resolution," acting US ambassador Alejandro Wolff said.

DOJ_NMG_0117060

Bu Russia's representative, Vitaly Churkin, said he opposed "attempts at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside the purview".

Burma released 40 political detainees last week to coincide with the 59th anniversary of independence.

Another five activists were freed on Thursday, in what pressure groups say could have been a move designed to scupper the UN resolution.

The UN estimates that there are about 1,100 political prisoners in Burma.

U.S. Official Sees Opening For Revival Of Trade Talks (NYT)

By John Zarocostas

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

GENEVA, Jan. 12 — The United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said Friday that she was optimistic the collapsed Doha trade negotiations could be restarted, but added that there were still obstacles to a revival of the talks.

"I am more optimistic than I have been in many months that we are on a path that could help reach a successful conclusion of the Doha round," Ms. Schwab said after a three-hour meeting with the head of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy.

But she added that "ultimately it will be substance that dictates when there's a breakthrough."

The next few weeks are considered critical to whether the new political impetus could be maintained.

Mr. Lamy, who will meet with Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain in London on Tuesday as part of his step-by-step diplomacy, is also expected to visit India. In the next few weeks, he is scheduled to visit a group of African countries and make stops in Brussels and Washington. The meetings of about 25 trade ministers in late January during the World Economic Forum meeting in Davos, Switzerland, are also considered crucial.

Ms. Schwab distanced herself on Friday from the upbeat assessment of Peter Mandelson, the European trade commissioner, who said the talks were approaching "the endgame." She reiterated that an agreement on important issues, like agricultural market access, would dictate whether a deal could be hammered out.

In recent weeks, diplomatic activity and support for a deal at high levels in capitals around the world have lifted hopes that the talks could be revived. The talks, which were started in Doha, Qatar, in November 2001, collapsed in late July because of major differences over agricultural subsidies and tariffs primarily among countries like the United States, the European Union, Japan, India, Australia and Brazil.

President Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, meeting Monday in Washington, instructed their negotiators to push ahead with the talks.

Many developing countries are apprehensive, about the latest push by the United States and Europe.

Blair Urges Britain To Pursue An Aggressive Foreign Policy (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 12 — As he seeks to define his legacy and stamp his imprint on the future, Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday urged his successors to maintain the warlike foreign policy that he promoted, sending troops into battle in Africa and the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq.

To retreat in the face of global terrorism, he said, would be "a catastrophe."

Mr. Blair, who has said he will leave office this year, made his appeal in the sixth of a series of lectures on social, political and defense issues, offering a valedictory résumé of his almost 10 years in power.

He spoke one day after Britain said it would not follow the United States in committing more troops to Iraq, prompting speculation among analysts that the trans-Atlantic allies had begun to follow markedly divergent strategies, after years of close partnership.

Mr. Blair chose to give his speech to an audience of military specialists aboard the Albion, a transport vessel moored near Plymouth. The choreography recalled President Bush's "mission accomplished" address aboard the aircraft carrier Abraham

Lincoln in May 2003. While Mr. Blair avoided any triumphalism, he advocated a muscular commitment by Britain to overseas military deployment alongside what he called softer options.

"There are two types of nations similar to ours today," he said. "Those who do war fighting and peacekeeping and those who have, effectively, except in the most exceptional circumstances, retreated to peacekeeping alone. Britain does both. We should stay that way," he said.

Some left-wing critics dismissed the prime minister's attempt to justify his use of military action as a tool of foreign policy. "He has made the world much more dangerous, much more divided," said Clare Short, a former minister who quit the government as the Iraq campaign unfolded.

John Kampfner, an author and the editor of The New Statesman, said in a radio interview: "I say with regret that this calamity that has been Iraq has diminished not just Britain and its role in the world, but has set back this cause that Tony Blair espouses" of "humanitarian intervention to do things around the world which are for the broader good."

Mr. Blair's remarks, Mr. Kampfner said, also offered a challenge to his probable successor, Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer, "to say: what would you do in my position?" Like Mr. Bush, Mr. Blair is suffering from declining popularity because of the wars, particularly in Iraq, and it is not at all certain that his successors — even in his own party — will adhere to his policies.

To some extent, Mr. Blair's speech reprised an address he gave in Chicago in 1999 that set out a doctrine to justify intervention beyond Britain's borders. He made a similar argument on Friday.

"The frontiers of our security no longer stop at the Channel," he said. "What happens in the Middle East affects us. What happens in Pakistan, or Indonesia, or in the attenuated struggles for territory and supremacy in Africa for example, in Sudan or Somalia — the new frontiers for our security are global."

"Our armed forces will be deployed in the lands of other nations far from home, with no immediate threat to our territory, in environments and in ways unfamiliar to them," he said. "They will usually fight alongside other nations, in alliance with them; notably, but probably not exclusively, with the U.S.A."

The speech offered a response to ever-more-vociferous complaints by serving and former high-ranking officers that the British Army, in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan and deployments elsewhere, is overstretched, badly equipped and poorly housed in its home barracks in this country.

"My choice," Mr. Blair said, "is for armed forces that are prepared to engage in this difficult, tough, challenging campaign, to be war fighters as well as peacekeepers; for a British foreign policy keeps our American alliance strong and is prepared to project hard as well as soft power; and for us as a nation to be as willing to fight terrorism and pay the cost of that fight wherever it may be."

But, he said: "The covenant between armed forces, government and people has to be renewed. For our part, in government, it will mean increased expenditure on equipment, personnel and the conditions of our armed forces, not in the short run but for the long term."

As he has done in the past, Mr. Blair said he believed that the campaign against jihadist terrorism would be long. "It has taken a generation for the enemy to grow," he said. "It will, in all probability, take a generation to defeat."

Blair Says Britain Cannot Isolate Itself (AP)

By Jennifer Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday that Britain's influence on the world stage and ability to right global wrongs depends on active engagement, and the country cannot defend itself from terrorism by retreating into isolationism.

He told Royal Navy personnel aboard a warship that Britain must be willing to commit to military action when necessary to pursue laudable goals.

Diplomacy alone cannot solve the world's problems, Blair said in a policy lecture to British servicemen and women aboard HMS Albion, in Plymouth harbor, southwestern England. It needs the military to complement it.

DOJ_NMG_0117062

"The risk ... is that the politicians decide it's all too difficult and default to an unstated, passive disengagement, that doing the right thing slips almost unconsciously into doing the easy thing," Blair said. "Many countries are already in this position, but the consequences for Britain are hugely significant."

The lecture was the sixth in a series of policy speeches he has made since the middle of last year.

The prime minister said terrorism cannot be defeated without military force, despite flagging public opinion. The war in Iraq has been deeply unpopular from the beginning, causing major political trouble for Blair and helping fuel a rebellion in his Labour Party.

He said the public must see operations in places like Iraq and Afghanistan as a "necessary engagement" to protect security and advance British interests globally.

Blair is to leave office later this year, but he has not said when. The speech appeared to lay out his beliefs on what British foreign policy should be once he leaves Downing Street.

He encouraged a continuation of Britain's alliance with the United States, and urged Britain to extend its influence in the world.

"My choice is ... for us as a nation to be as willing to fight terrorism and pay the cost of that fight wherever it may be, as we are to be proud champions of the causes of peace in the Middle East, action against poverty, or the struggle to halt the degradation of our environment," he said.

The End Of The Blair Era (LAT)

ALTHOUGH HE IS yoked to President Bush in their common Iraq policy and lame-duck status, British Prime Minister Tony Blair has more in common with former President Clinton. The litany of likenesses includes a belief in a "third way" between old-style liberalism and the free market, a fluency in public that critics dismiss as glibness, a wife who was a successful lawyer, a willingness to accept the hospitality of show-business celebrities and, finally, a reputation for running an ethically challenged administration.

It's this last, and lowest, common denominator with Clinton that has lately bedeviled Blair. Last month, he was questioned by police about allegations that his Labor Party nominated supporters for seats in the House of Lords and other plum positions in exchange for campaign loans. The Scotsman newspaper put it this way: "As Tony Blair approached his tenth anniversary in office, his ambition was to secure a place in history. And he's certainly done that by being the first serving prime minister to be interviewed in a criminal investigation whilst in office."

Americans cannot expect to be rewarded for their public or political service with ermine-lined capes or the right to call yourself "Sir." In fact, the Constitution says that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States." So Clinton couldn't dispense knighthoods to friends and political allies, but he gave some of them something better: their freedom. As the clock was ticking on his presidency in 2001, Clinton announced several ill-advised pardons, including one of fugitive financier Marc Rich, whose ex-wife gave an estimated $450,000 to the Clinton Presidential Library Fund.

Blair's current troubles, like Clinton's in 2001, may be intensified by his past indiscretions. The "honors" scandal isn't exactly the first time Blair's government has been accused of wallowing in sleaze. As early as 1997, the government came under fire for providing an exemption from a ban on tobacco advertising for a race-car organization that had donated $1.7 million to the Labor Party. In the years since, leading figures in the Blair Cabinet have found themselves in financial or sexual scrapes. Just last month, Blair, citing national security, ordered his attorney general to drop an investigation into whether a British defense firm had paid bribes to Saudi officials in the 1980s.

Political psychologists can argue about why two farsighted politicians allowed their substantial legacies to be sullied by sleaze. Maybe the answer is as simple as power inevitably corrupting. Whatever the explanation, like his friend Bill, Tony may leave office with people talking not about his vision but about his blind spots.

Russians To Take Poisoning Inquiry To London (WP)

By Peter Finn, Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117063

MOSCOW, Jan. 12 -- Russian officials who have launched their own investigation into the death of former Russian domestic security officer Alexander Litvinenko want to interview more than 100 people in London and conduct dozens of searches across the city, a senior Russian prosecutor said in a newspaper interview.

Prosecutors declined to name any of the people they wish to question. "I cannot fully satisfy your healthy curiosity due to the interests of the inquiry," said Deputy Prosecutor General Alexander Zvyagintsev, in an interview with the official newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta that appeared Friday. "Moreover, our request is a voluminous document, which consists of 110 pages. It is hard to retell it."

Litvinenko, who became a British citizen, died Nov. 23 after being poisoned in London with polonium-210, a radioactive substance.

The Russian plan far exceeds the scope of British inquiries in Moscow, which amounted to a few interviews with Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the suspected date of the poisoning. Those interviews were conducted by Russian investigators. Detectives from Scotland Yard were allowed to attend but could not question the witnesses.

The prospective inquiry is likely to unsettle some Russians who live in London and are fiercely opposed to the rule of President Vladimir Putin. Litvinenko's friends in the city included Boris Berezovsky, the exiled tycoon, and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist, both of whom the Russians would like to extradite. Previous efforts to have them returned to Moscow failed.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's who has acted as a family spokesman, described any Russian inquiry in London as a "stunt." Goldfarb said Russian officials "obstructed justice when the British went to Moscow" and now they are trying to "create an impression of reciprocity" by traveling to London and carrying out their own investigation.

Berezovsky's office said he had not received any request to talk to Russian officials. Previously, Berezovsky and Litvinenko's wife, Marina, said they would meet with Russian officials only if they were first checked to ensure they were not carrying polonium-210.

A spokeswoman for the Home Office said British authorities had not received an official request to investigate in London. "We would consider any request for assistance in consultation with the police," said the spokeswoman, who following British government policy spoke on condition of anonymity.

Among those interviewed in Moscow by Russian detectives with the British police present were Andrei Lugovoy and Dmitry Kovtun, two Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1.

Lugovoy and Kovtun have denied any involvement in the poisoning. Both men were hospitalized in Moscow for radiation exposure, but Lugovoy checked out last week. Kovtun's whereabouts and condition remain unknown.

Russian officials have said that Kovtun was a victim, and they are also investigating his exposure. "We have a lot of questions about this case," Zvyagintsev said. "We are asking to question more than 100 witnesses and carry out dozens of searches."

Zvyagintsev added: "We hope that our U.K. colleagues will respond to our request as promptly as we did recently."

Spy Case Comes To U.S. As Agency Urges Testing (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Health officials in the United States have begun to tell some people who traveled to London last year that they may want to be tested for exposure to the radioactive poison that killed a former Russian spy.

Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said yesterday that the notification process began this week after health authorities in London gave them a list of people who may have been exposed to polonium 210, a radioactive substance that killed Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former spy. He died on Nov. 23.

As the criminal investigation into his death has progressed, British health authorities have slowly widened the circles of people known to have been exposed and those suspected of having been exposed to the substance. On Thursday, in a news conference, the British authorities said they were working with officials from 48 countries to evaluate the health of about 450 people who were in London around Nov. 1, when the authorities suspect Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned.

In Atlanta, C.D.C. officials said that they were notifying particular states and that state health authorities were in turn notifying people who might have been exposed to or poisoned by polonium 210. The officials refused to disclose the number of states or people involved.

Bernadette Burden, a spokeswoman for the centers, said that agency officials had decided to keep the figures confidential "to keep down hysteria," but that they might eventually release the overall numbers.

"We're going through a very careful process to make the notifications," Ms. Burden said. "People are being made aware that the possibility of exposure is significant."

Urine testing is the standard way of detecting polonium 210 in the body. Ms. Burden said that the people were being advised to talk to their doctors and that the physicians could in turn have the analysis done by two companies, Eberline Services in Richmond, Calif., and General Engineering Laboratories in Charleston, S.C.

Ex-bank Chief Heads Bangladesh Government (FT)

By Jo Johnson And Tom Felix Joehnk

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

A fresh attempt to break the deadlock between Bangladesh's two feuding political families had a shaky start on Friday night as a new head of a caretaker government took office under the cover of an army-backed state of emergency.

Fakhruddin Ahmed, a former governor of the Bangladeshi central bank, replaced President Iajuddin Ahmed as head of the caretaker government, whose principal function had been to oversee free and fair elections later this month. But there is now no indication of when they may take place.

Accused of bias by the main opposition Awami League, which had threatened to boycott the poll, the president resigned the post on Thursday, declaring a state of emergency and postponing the fraught January 22 parliamentary election.

Analysts on Friday night likened the situation in the fourth most populous Muslim nation to a "hidden coup", saying they expected that a team of technocrats would govern Bangladesh for a lengthy period before it would hold fresh polls.

Under Bangladesh's constitution, many fundamental rights are suspended in a state of emergency. Political activities on the streets have been curtailed and media restrictions put in place.

The army, seen as one of the few functioning political institutions in the country, was in little evidence on the streets yesterday, leaving analysts to speculate as to its exact role in this latest twist in the nation's political drama.

The Awami League, which had objected to what it said was a fraudulent voters' register and bias in the caretaker government, called the president's move to resign a late, but "necessary" step towards credible elections.

But it is uncertain whether the president's capitulation will lower tensions in this coup-prone nation as the Bangladeshi National party of outgoing prime minister Khaleda Zia had vigorously fought the suspension of elections.

The BNP-led four-party governing alliance on Friday boycotted Mr Ahmed's swearing-in ceremony, an event that foreign diplomats from all major countries made a point of attending.

The US State Department called on all parties "to refrain from violence and provocation and to work together to find solutions that would return democratic stability and represent the best interests of the Bangladeshi people."

As calm returned to the capital, Dhaka metropolitan police on Friday night said that the government had lifted a night-time curfew imposed a day earlier in more than 60 cities and towns in one of the most densely populated countries in the world.

In a country that suffers from endemic corruption, changes of power are associated with legal purges.

Local media reported that airports had been given a list of people who were to be prevented from leaving the country.

The army made several arrests of activists and politicians from both parties.

Hossain Zillur Rahman, a Dhaka-based political commentator, predicted that from now on "action would go against the BNP".

In a signifiant move, the house and offices of Ghiasuddin al-Mamun, a business partner of Tarique Rahman, Mrs Zia's son, were raided, but it was not clear whether he had been arrested.

In the popular mind, the young clique of leaders surrounding Mrs Zia's son is seen as having been the real power in the land in recent years, and one reason why Bangladesh scores so badly in global corruption rankings.

DOJ_NMG_0117065

The appointment of Mr Ahmed put a temporary end to renewed speculation that Muhammad Yunus, recent winner of the Nobel Peace Prize and a potential unifying force in the sharply polarised, would take on the position.

Earning A Bad Reputation (NYT)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Bangladesh is lurching in a dangerous direction. After weeks of violent protests that left at least 40 people dead, the government has declared martial law. Only strong pressure from the United States and international help will keep this huge country from slipping further off a democratic path.

For weeks, a broad coalition of parties has protested what it charges is a clear attempt by the government to rig parliamentary elections, originally scheduled for later this month. It claimed that the voter rolls were padded; the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, an American monitoring group working in Bangladesh, surveyed the voter lists and found 13 million fake names. The coalition also charged that President Iajuddin Ahmed, who had the job of overseeing the elections, was biased in favor of a rival party.

The United Nations agreed that the run-up to the elections had been so flawed that the results could not be "considered credible or legitimate." International election monitors pulled out of Bangladesh, saying the existing conditions did not allow for a meaningful vote.

On Thursday, Mr. Ahmed yielded to international pressure, resigning as the election caretaker and postponing the vote. Mr. Ahmed, who will stay on as president, a largely ceremonial position, said a clean voter roll was needed for "free, fair and credible" elections.

Unfortunately, at the same time he declared a state of emergency, which revokes many basic rights and allows the army to enforce order. This is a particularly disturbing development in a country that has been subjected to long periods of military rule since gaining its independence in 1971.

The United States should use its substantial political influence to urge the government to restore suspended rights immediately. The United Nations should quickly send an envoy to mediate among Bangladesh's parties to ensure that this time the elections move forward in a clean and transparent manner. Both the U.N. and the Bush administration should encourage the protest's leaders to avoid further violence, assuring them that their demands are being heard. And they should redeploy their monitors once a new election date is set.

Bangladesh is one of the poorest and most politically polarized countries in the world. The international community needs to help it build a stable democracy — the best underpinning for development — starting with swift, internationally guaranteed elections.

China Given Credit For Darfur Role (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 12 -- The U.S. special envoy to Sudan said Friday that China has pushed the Sudanese government recently to help resolve the bloody Darfur conflict and ease the plight of the region's nearly 3 million refugees.

The Chinese intervention marked a shift from past policy under which Beijing seemed reluctant to use its influence in Sudan, according to the envoy, Andrew S. Natsios. "I think they're engaging much more aggressively," Natsios said at a news briefing after four days of talks here with Chinese officials.

President Hu Jintao announced during a Chinese-African summit conference last November that he had urged the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, to work with U.N. and other envoys to end the fighting, Natsios recalled. In addition, he said, China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, was critical to securing Sudan's participation in a recent international accord aimed at replacing a flagging African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur with a larger U.N. contingent.

The Bush administration has long urged China to put more pressure on the Sudanese government, citing large-scale Chinese oil purchases, investment and weapons sales as tools that could be used to persuade Bashir to cooperate more fully with U.N. attempts to broker a peace accord.

China, however, has viewed Sudan mainly as an important source of petroleum, a key element in Chinese foreign policy as the booming economy here creates a growing thirst for energy imports. In contrast, the United States in recent years has regarded Sudan mainly in the context of its Islamic-oriented government and the humanitarian tragedy caused by the fighting in western Sudan's Darfur region.

As many as 450,000 people have been killed or have died from disease in Darfur since largely black African rebel groups rose up in 2003 against the Arab-run government. Human rights groups and the United Nations say the government responded by unleashing a militia, called the Janjaweed, which has been accused of atrocities. Natsios said 2.8 million people fleeing raids by government troops and militiamen have been driven into refugee camps supported by U.N. and other nongovernmental aid agencies.

Bashir announced Wednesday that he would abide by a 60-day cease-fire and expand access for international aid workers. His government followed up Thursday by saying it would also be willing to enter a new round of peace talks with the rebels.

Bashir's agreement to the cease-fire came after talks with Gov. Bill Richardson (D) of New Mexico, who traveled to Khartoum on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition, a Washington-based humanitarian group. Richardson said several of the eight rebel movements had also agreed to hold their fire. Thursday's embrace of peace talks followed Bashir's meeting with Jan Eliasson, the new U.N. special envoy to Darfur, who was seeking cooperation with the U.N. plan to send more peacekeepers.

Bashir's government had opposed plans to replace the 7,000 African Union troops with a U.N. force that Natsios said could include as many as 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers. But Bashir recently agreed to allow in as many as 2,500, Natsios added.

US Envoy Says Talks With China On Sudan A Success (AFP)

AFP, January 13, 2007

The US special envoy on Sudan said he had held surprisingly positive talks in Beijing this week and that he expected China to play a greater role in helping to end the conflict in Darfur.

Wrapping up a four-day visit, envoy Andrew Natsios said Chinese engagement was critical in getting Sudan's military government to agree last month to an expanded UN presence in Darfur and he expected China's role to grow.

"Our policy and the Chinese policy are closer than I realized they were and I think the Chinese are going to play an increasingly important role in helping us to resolve this," Natsios told a press briefing before departing Beijing.

Natsios, who was appointed by President George W. Bush in September, came to Beijing to seek further cooperation on the issue from China, which has close commercial ties with Sudan's government.

The government-backed Janjaweed militia is blamed for killing thousands of civilians in the southern Darfur region, where Khartoum is battling rebels.

The conflict has left around 200,000 dead and displaced two million others in nearly four years, according to UN figures disputed by the Sudanese authorities.

Natsios declined to offer further details of his talks in Beijing, which he said included a meeting with State Councillor Tang Jiaxuan -- one of China's top diplomats -- and officials with the foreign ministry.

But he said the United States and China agreed in principle to cooperate on securing a negotiated peace to the conflict.

"I think the visit was a very successful one because we found many more areas of common agreement, both about our objectives and our strategies for achieving those objectives," he said.

"We agreed to continue to cooperate on this issue."

China's ties with Sudan have been criticized in the west as motivated by the need for Sudan's oil. Groups such as the US-based Council on Foreign Relations accuse Beijing of selling arms to the Sudanese government.

Natsios was asked whether he had requested China to alter its Sudan policies.

"We made a whole series of requests but I'm not going to tell you what they all were," he said.

"I could end up making a very successful trip not so successful."

China's foreign ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Argentine Ex-President Charged With Rights Abuses (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0117067

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO, Jan. 12 — Acting at the request of Argentine officials, the Spanish police on Friday detained María Estela de Perón, the former president of Argentina and the widow of the founder of the ruling party, as part of a broadening investigation by the Peronist government of Argentina into past human rights abuses there.

A judge in the provincial city of Mendoza had issued an order on Thursday that Ms. Perón, known as Isabel, who lives in exile in Spain and gives her age as 75, be detained there for questioning regarding the disappearance of a student during her time in power. Almost simultaneously, a judge in Buenos Aires authorized the arrest of two other officials with ties to the late José López Rega, who was Gen. Juan Perón's private secretary and later Ms. Perón's closest adviser.

Those moves were made less than two weeks after Argentina requested that Spain extradite another notorious figure from that era. In each case, the proceedings focus on the Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance, or "Triple A," a shadowy right-wing paramilitary death squad controlled by Mr. López Rega that first emerged when General Juan Perón was in power and accelerated its activities during his widow's tenure.

Ms. Perón governed Argentina for less than two years, from her husband's death in July 1974 until she was overthrown by a military coup on March 24, 1976. Human rights groups have blamed the Triple A for the killings of at least 1,500 political opponents, most of which occurred when Ms. Perón, a former cabaret dancer who was the general's third wife, was in power.

Ms. Perón's defense has always been that as "a poor ignorant woman" with no political experience or skills, as she put it in testimony in Spain in 1997, she had no idea what was being done in her name. But the Mendoza judge rejected that argument, saying in an interview with a local radio station that "she was the chief executive of the nation" and the abductions of people later killed "were made on the basis of decrees" she had signed.

Civilian democratic rule in Argentina was restored nearly 25 years ago. At that time, human rights and political leaders said, political parties negotiated an agreement that, at the insistence of the Peronists, effectively made human rights abuses that occurred before the military coup off limits to official investigations.

But President Néstor Kirchner, himself a Peronist, has taken a different attitude, which the judges have apparently heeded. "When the president said he hadn't left his convictions at the entrance of the seat of government and that there weren't going to be deals on impunity with anybody, that included everyone, Ms. Perón too," Interior Minister Aníbal Fernández said in an interview on Friday with a Buenos Aires radio station.

The Peronist movement is a broad one containing some factions that are regarded as right-wing and others that lean left, with Mr. Kirchner belonging to the latter group. At the time Ms. Perón was in power he and his wife, Cristina, now a powerful senator, were college students with friends who belonged to the leftist Montonero group and were later abducted and killed.

A presidential election is scheduled for this year in Argentina, and while Mr. Kirchner has not declared himself as a candidate for re-election, he has been trying to build an alliance that would include left-wing groups outside his own movement. The move against Ms. Perón, which enhances his credentials as a crusader and nonconformist who fears nothing and no one, helps cement his ties with the left.

"No federal judge would make rulings like that of requesting the capture of former president Isabel Perón or to investigate the crimes of the Triple A if he perceived that such acts would perturb the national government," Fernando Laborda wrote Friday in the conservative Buenos Aires daily La Nación. The timing "is not coincidental," he added, but stems from what "is clearly a political decision."

Spain Arrests Former Argentine President (AP)

By Harold Heckle, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Former Argentine President Isabel Peron was detained Friday at her home in Madrid as part of investigations into the South American country's past human rights abuses, police said.

Later in the day, Spain's National Court ordered her conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina. The court said Argentina has 40 days to file an extradition request and Peron has to appear at a police station every 15 days.

DOJ_NMG_0117068

Police acted on an arrest warrant from an Argentine judge who said he had questions about Peron's chaotic 20-month rule, a time when shadowy right-wing violence destabilized Argentina. The third wife of three-time president Juan Domingo Peron was ousted in the March 1976 coup that ushered in a seven-year dictatorship that waged a "dirty war" against its opponents.

Her arrest marked the expansion of Argentina's human rights investigations beyond dictatorship-era crimes to the death squads that terrorized the nation prior to the 1976 coup.

Peron, 75, who has lived in exile in Spain since 1981, was taken into custody at her villa in the wealthy northern Madrid neighborhood of Villanueva de la Canada. She was seen being driven to the National Court in Madrid.

Peron was wanted for questioning about three decrees she approved in her brief presidential tenure, calling on armed forces to crack down on "subversive elements." She was also wanted for questioning in connection with the disappearance of leftist Hector Aldo Fagetti Gallego one month before the coup.

Maria Estela Martinez de Peron — known as Isabel — was sworn in as president in 1974 after the death of her husband, the former strongman and father of Argentina's ruling political party. She struggled to hold on to power as Argentina was convulsed by violence from leftist guerrillas and reprisals by death squads.

Her detention followed the recent arrests in Argentina and Spain of two suspected leaders of the "Triple A" death squad that human rights groups call a precursor to state-sponsored terror waged by the country's military rulers from 1976-83.

Political analyst Felipe Noguera noted that dozens of former police and military officers have been summoned for questioning since Argentina's Supreme Court in 2005 annulled a pair of 1980s amnesty laws blocking prosecution of human rights cases.

"What might be different is that her surname is Peron," Noguera said. "So this seems to drive home the point that a lot of violence against the left wing started during the Peronist time, before and not during the junta."

Previously, efforts to bring alleged human rights abusers to justice focused on crimes committed during the dictatorship when at least 13,000 suspected leftists and other opponents of the regime were killed or disappeared.

Peron testified in 1997 in Madrid as a witness in a Spanish case probing crimes during the military dictatorship. She said then she recalled signing a law authorizing the "annihilation" of leftist guerrillas, but did not remember details. She also said that she was unaware of human rights abuses that began during her tenure and expanded after the military overthrew her.

Adolfo Perez Esquivel, the 1980 Nobel Peace laureate for his human rights work, told The Associated Press he believed the Triple A, short for the Argentina Anticommunist Alliance, was effectively part of a state structure and thus the beginnings of state-backed terror.

"Once and for all, we have to get to the bottom of this problem and find out how this terrorism was generated by the state," Perez Esquivel said. "The search for the truth must go in every direction."

In Argentina, families of the victims of the repression celebrated Peron's arrest.

"I believe state terror began before the coup," said Maria Adela Antokoletz, whose brother, a lawyer who defended leftists, was kidnapped shortly before the 1976 coup. "Those who signed these decrees knew perfectly well the nature of the campaign and what this repression would involve."

Human rights groups blame Triple A for at least 1,500 killings of government opponents from 1973 to 1976. The dead included leftists, trade activists, opposition lawmakers and intellectuals.

Some victims were abducted off streets and never seen again while others were found dead of bullet wounds, some with their hands hacked off or burned.

The violence set the stage for the dictatorship's crackdown on dissent, a campaign known as the "dirty war." Nearly 13,000 people are officially listed as dead or missing from that era, but human rights groups say the total is closer to 30,000. Civilian rule was restored in 1983.

Isabel Peron's Arrest Signals Shift In Argentina (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

DOJ_NMG_0117069

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

BUENOS AIRES — The arrest Friday of former Argentine President Isabel Peron in Spain signaled an expansion of human rights cases here beyond the former military junta to the epoch of ex-strongman Juan Domingo Peron, father of Argentina's ruling party.

The 75-year-old former president, whose full name is Maria Estela Martinez de Peron, was arrested at her home near Madrid after a federal judge in Argentina issued a warrant for her detention, officials said. A Spanish tribunal ordered her conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina.

She is wanted for questioning in connection with the disappearance of a student activist in February 1976, during the final weeks of her presidency.

Isabel Peron is the widow and successor in office of Juan Peron, three times elected president and still an iconic and controversial figure in his homeland. As the sitting vice president, the ex-dancer assumed the presidency when her husband died in July 1974.

Argentina's only woman president never enjoyed the popularity of Peron's previous wife, the charismatic Eva "Evita" Peron, who is still idolized here more than half a century after her death. Economic and political turmoil marked the reign of Isabel Peron, who was toppled in a military coup in March 1976.

The strongman's admirers have largely ignored his dark side, such as his regime's welcoming of Nazi war criminals after World War II and the right-wing death squads that sprung up during his final term. Critics call him a demagogue who stifled freedoms and crushed dissent while admiring European fascists such as Benito Mussolini of Italy.

The current Peronist administration has aggressively targeted hundreds of abusers from the junta that succeeded Peron and his wife. The former military leaders are widely despised here, and Argentines have generally applauded their prosecutions.

But Juan Peron, with his exaltation of the working classes and strong ties to labor unions, remains a beloved figure for many. His political movement, which embraced elements of the left and right, continues to dominate Argentine politics.

Investigators are now zeroing in on government-linked death squads that, human rights groups say, operated with impunity during the tumultuous 1970s rule of Peron and his widow. The sanctioned killers, these groups say, set the stage for the subsequent "dirty war" under military rule that cost as many as 30,000 lives during a dictatorship that lasted from 1976 to 1983.

Isabel Peron is being sought in connection with decrees she signed in office that called on security forces to "annihilate … subversive elements throughout the country." By then, the Peronists had turned violently against their former left-wing allies and forced them underground.

A separate judicial inquiry is examining a right-wing death squad called the Argentine Anticommunist Alliance, known as Triple A, that operated during the administrations of both Perons. Rights groups say Triple A was responsible for about 1,500 extrajudicial assassinations.

A judge in the capital has ordered the arrest of several former Triple A leaders. Whether the various inquiries will lead to the late Peron himself and sully his image remains unclear. Many believe it is unlikely Peron will ever be despised as much as the former military rulers who "disappeared" thousands of opponents and led Argentina to the ruinous Falklands War in 1982.

Argentines have shifted much of the blame for abuses during the Peron governments to a now-deceased former aide, Jose Lopez Rega, a thuggish figure often described as the founder of Triple A.

But critics say it is inconceivable that the strong-willed Peron himself didn't approve of the government-backed death squads created during his reign.

"Eventually people must ask themselves if it's plausible that the president and person in charge when the Triple A was set up knew nothing about it," said James Neilson, a columnist for the newsmagazine Noticias.

Argentine President Nestor Kirchner is a lifelong Peronist and leftist who has made bringing military abusers to justice a centerpiece of his administration. He seldom publicly invokes the memory of Peron, and has signaled no opposition to the aggressive prosecution of Peron-era figures linked to death squads — even if it leads to the founder of the movement he represents.

"We want reconciliation, but without impunity," Kirchner told the daily Clarin after the judge's order for Isabel Peron's arrest in Spain. "The truth has to be known, whatever it is."

Reach Out To Cuba's People (WSJ)

By Mario Loyola

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

With Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visiting Venezuela today, it might be a good time to consider another "change in course" for U.S. policy. The isolation of Cuba, a legacy of the Cold War, is pushing that country closer to America's most dangerous enemies.

In a recent open letter to President Bush, several major Cuban dissident groups called for an end to U.S. restrictions on travel and remittances to Cuba. Now joining their call is the Miami-based Cuban Consensus, a coalition of 20 pro-democracy groups including the "hard-line" Cuban-American National Foundation. The advocates for the current policy -- chiefly three intransigent Cuban-American representatives in Congress -- are increasingly alone.

If we don't lift the travel and remittance restrictions now, it is not just the Cuban people who stand to suffer. Allowing Cuba to slip further under the influence of Venezuela's newly reelected Hugo Chávez, the proud new ally of Iran, would be terrible for the U.S.

These restrictions are regulatory, which means that the president could eliminate them tomorrow. But the Helms-Burton law freezes the larger economic embargo in place until the communist regime dismantles its security apparatus and calls for free elections -- and until both Raúl and Fidel Castro are gone. With the changing of the guard in Havana, there will be opportunities for incremental reform. The new Congress must amend Helms-Burton to give the president the flexibility he will need to seize them.

Any major opening -- such as diplomatic talks or relaxation of the embargo -- should be conditioned on Cuba's release of political prisoners, economic reforms, freedom of speech and a dismantling of the neighborhood spy system that has driven Cuban society into such a heartbreaking state of paranoia. But Helms-Burton's rigid, all-or-nothing approach creates no incentive for Cuba's communists to undertake even the most minor reform.

For many supporters of the current policy, isolating Cuba has become almost an end in itself. Nothing could be more perverse. If Cuban culture is exposed to globalization, it will fuel yearning for the freedoms of modernity. If we expand diplomatic contact, we will begin to discover allies within the regime. Allowing Cuba to join the international trade and finance system (which U.S. law largely prevents) will multiply the incentives to liberalize. By isolating Cuba and driving it into the arms of Hugo Chávez, the only real beneficiaries are communist hard-liners -- and their patrons.

Cuba's communist regime has two conflicting needs -- isolation and money. Ending isolation will rebuild the bridges between Cubans and their most natural allies -- the American people. It would also likely expose Cubans to the political and commercial culture of one of the most spectacularly successful immigrant communities in the U.S. -- that of their exiled family members in Miami.

Relaxing the flow of funds from the U.S. would also turn a communist need to our advantage. The more Cuba depends financially on the U.S., the more leverage we will gain in pushing for economic and political reform. Cutting the regime off from sources of financing may have made sense after the fall of the Soviet Union, when Cuba had nowhere else to turn. But now it has Venezuela.

With Fidel Castro's removal from power and imminent demise, the key obstacle to reform within the regime has disappeared. A new generation of bureaucrats now has a chance to gain influence. Many of today's younger "communists" are less interested in the Revolution than in maintaining stability -- and much less interested in Venezuela's patronage than in normalizing relations with the U.S. For Cuba's proud armed forces, the prospect of becoming servants to Mr. Chávez is not attractive. Unfortunately, U.S. stubbornness leaves them little choice.

Cuba's increasing dependence on Mr. Chávez is dangerous for the U.S. Venezuela uses oil money to fuel a global campaign against America. Venezuelan intelligence services set up shop wherever they can in Latin America to eradicate government officials educated in the U.S. or suspected of pro-American sympathies. Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua are falling firmly into Venezuela's orbit. And throughout the Non-Aligned Movement, Mr. Chávez trades oil money for diplomatic support against the U.S. in a new kind of Cold War. Worse, after his recent election victory, Mr. Chávez seems to be claiming a mandate for an even more stridently Castroist and anti-American position -- all of which will influence the direction of the Cuban regime.

DOJ_NMG_0117071

Looming on the horizon is an even greater threat. Iran's intelligence services -- perhaps the most prolific and sophisticated terrorist organization in the world -- use diplomatic channels to build their network. And there are clear indications of a renewed Hezbollah effort in South America. Thus Venezuela's new alliance with Iran represents a grave danger to the whole hemisphere. Venezuela is already putting enormous pressure on Cuba to expand its ties with Iran; an Iranian foothold just 90 miles from our own shores would be a catastrophic setback in the war on terror.

Relaxing Cuba's isolation would help diminish a gathering threat to national security, and bring hope to Cubans everywhere that the long tragedy of communism and exile may finally be coming to an end.

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who has faced controversy throughout his two-year tenure, is likely to enter an even stormier phase next Thursday when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for the first time since control fell to the Democrats.

But he shows little anxiety about more vehement criticism of his stewardship at the Justice Department.

"They have an institutional interest to gather up information about what the executive branch is doing," Mr. Gonzales said Friday, in an interview in which he adopted the mildly juridical tone of a law professor.

Referring to the Justice Department, he said: "We likewise have an institutional interest in maintaining the confidentially of certain kinds of information. From my perspective, there are two competing institutional interests. This is not a partisan issue. It's an institutional issue of interests that have to be accommodated."

But there seems to be little likelihood that the Judiciary Committee will be satisfied with that kind of summation.

Mr. Gonzales's chief antagonist is likely to be the panel's chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, a Democrat who in recent public statements has castigated the Bush administration for years of "corrosive unilateralism" in refusing to cooperate with Congress and said he would enforce the committee's demands for information with subpoenas if necessary.

"The very nature of the job means I'm going to be in the middle, the department will be in the middle, of all the hard issues, all the difficult issues that the Congress will be very, very interested in," Mr. Gonzales said. "You're not going to have total agreement, it's not going to be a love fest necessarily between the Congress and the attorney general of the United States."

It was Mr. Gonzales, a former Texas judge, who as White House counsel provided legal thinking to support some of the administration's most hotly debated operations, like its program of surveillance without warrants. He also wrote a draft memo in January 2002 that said captured members of Al Qaeda should not be covered by the Geneva Conventions — a position later adopted by the administration. He succeeded John Ashcroft as attorney general in 2005.

Although Mr. Leahy recently had lunch with Mr. Gonzales and the two men are on cordial personal terms, the senator has ripped into the Justice Department for ignoring or rejecting his requests over the years for dozens of internal documents and for failing to turn over information about a host of activities, mostly related to counterterrorism policies.

Even so, Mr. Gonzales said he was looking forward to testifying. "I view these hearings as an opportunity to tell our story," he said. "I think in many ways we have a good story to tell. Sometimes we are constrained because we are in a period of war in giving out as much information as we'd like because there are things we'd like to talk to about."

In the interview, he said he would seek a conciliatory relationship with Democrats, when and where he can, but would continue to protect zealously what he regards as the department's core interests. He said the Justice Department had already provided a great deal of information to Congress according to traditional practice and court decisions on the subject.

He said the Justice Department would review each Congressional request in an effort to comply with Congressional demands: "Is there a way to limit the scope of the request? Is there a way to give them the information without actually turning over the documents? Would it suffice to provide a briefing without compromising something that would be extremely damaging to the national security of our country? Could we provide a summary, a written summary, that they would want to see? Perhaps someone in the executive branch would read a portion of a document. We have legal obligation to see what can be done."

Mr. Gonzales expressed the hope that battles with Congress would not undermine his efforts to accomplish his goals at the Justice Department. "The American people lose if we spend the next two years fighting over documents," he said.

Mr. Gonzales said he hoped that Congress would work with the Justice Department on other administration priorities, like the protection of children against predators and pedophiles, an overhaul of immigration laws, the elimination of disparities in prison sentences and a crackdown on online pharmacies that sell drugs to teenagers.

He said that he had realized when he took over at the Justice Department that he was likely to be thrust into controversies between law and politics. "I came into this job with my eyes wide open, understanding what the challenges would be, and I have not been disappointed. It's tough. At the same time, it's exhilarating."

Official Attacks Top Law Firms Over Detainees (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — The senior Pentagon official in charge of military detainees suspected of terrorism said in an interview this week that he was dismayed that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms were representing prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and that the firms' corporate clients should consider ending their business ties.

The comments by Charles D. Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, produced an instant torrent of anger from lawyers, legal ethics specialists and bar association officials, who said Friday that his comments were repellent and displayed an ignorance of the duties of lawyers to represent people in legal trouble.

"This is prejudicial to the administration of justice," said Stephen Gillers, a law professor at New York University and an authority on legal ethics. "It's possible that lawyers willing to undertake what has been long viewed as an admirable chore will decline to do so for fear of antagonizing important clients.

"We have a senior government official suggesting that representing these people somehow compromises American interests, and he even names the firms, giving a target to corporate America."

Mr. Stimson made his remarks in an interview on Thursday with Federal News Radio, a local Washington-based station that is aimed at an audience of government employees.

The same point appeared Friday on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal, where Robert L. Pollock, a member of the newspaper's editorial board, cited the list of law firms and quoted an unnamed "senior U.S. official" as saying, "Corporate C.E.O.'s seeing this should ask firms to choose between lucrative retainers and representing terrorists."

In his radio interview, Mr. Stimson said: "I think the news story that you're really going to start seeing in the next couple of weeks is this: As a result of a FOIA request through a major news organization, somebody asked, 'Who are the lawyers around this country representing detainees down there?' and you know what, it's shocking." The F.O.I.A. reference was to a Freedom of Information Act request submitted by Monica Crowley, a conservative syndicated talk show host, asking for the names of all the lawyers and law firms representing Guantánamo detainees in federal court cases.

Mr. Stimson, who is himself a lawyer, then went on to name more than a dozen of the firms listed on the 14-page report provided to Ms. Crowley, describing them as "the major law firms in this country." He said, "I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms, and I think that is going to have major play in the next few weeks. And we want to watch that play out."

Karen J. Mathis, a Denver lawyer who is president of the American Bar Association, said: "Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law. To impugn those who are doing this critical work — and doing it on a volunteer basis — is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans."

In an interview on Friday, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said he had no problem with the current system of representation. "Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases," he said.

Neither the White House nor the Pentagon had any official comment, but officials sought to distance themselves from Mr. Stimson's view. His comments "do not represent the views of the Defense Department or the thinking of its leadership," a senior Pentagon official said. He would not allow his name to be used, seemingly to lessen the force of his rebuke. Mr. Stimson did not return a call on Friday seeking comment.

The role of major law firms agreeing to take on the cases of Guantánamo prisoners challenging their detentions in federal courts has hardly been a secret and has been the subject of many news articles that have generally cast their efforts in a favorable light. Michael Ratner, who heads the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York-based human rights group that is coordinating the legal representation for the Guantánamo detainees, said about 500 lawyers from about 120 law firms had volunteered their services to represent Guantánamo prisoners.

When asked in the radio interview who was paying for the legal representation, Mr. Stimson replied: "It's not clear, is it? Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving moneys from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

Lawyers expressed outrage at that, asserting that they are not being paid and that Mr. Stimson had tried to suggest they were by innuendo. Of the approximately 500 lawyers coordinated by the Center for Constitutional Rights, no one is being paid, Mr. Ratner said. One Washington law firm, Shearman & Sterling, which has represented Kuwaiti detainees, has received money from the families of the prisoners, but Thomas Wilner, a lawyer there, said they had donated all of it to charities related to the September 2001 terrorist attacks. Mr. Ratner said that there were two other defense lawyers not under his group's umbrella and that he did not know whether they were paid.

Christopher Moore, a lawyer at the New York firm Cleary, Gottlieb, Steen & Hamilton who represented an Uzbeki detainee who has since been released, said: "We believe in the concept of justice and that every person is entitled to counsel. Any suggestion that our representation was anything other than a pro bono basis is untrue and unprofessional." Mr. Moore said he had made four trips to Guantánamo and one to Albania at the firm's expense, to see his client freed.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, wrote to President Bush on Friday asking him to disavow Mr. Stimson's remarks.

Mr. Stimson, who was a Navy lawyer, graduated from George Mason University Law School. In a 2006 interview with the magazine of Kenyon College, his alma mater, Mr. Stimson said that he was learning "to choose my words carefully because I am a public figure on a very, very controversial topic."

Lawyers Blast Pentagon Official (MH/KR)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald/Knight Ridder, January 13, 2007

A Defense Department official has stirred up a maelstrom in the American legal community by calling on corporate America to boycott law firms that help represent captives at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Speaking to a morning radio talk show Thursday, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, rattled off a list of some of the most prestigious law firms in the nation.

Each apparently has attorneys providing pro-bono, or no-charge, legal representation to captives at the U.S. Navy Base, where the Bush administration is holding some 395 men and teens as enemy combatants.

"It's shocking," said Stimson, 43, a former federal attorney and Navy lawyer. ``The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees."

By late Friday, major U.S. legal advocacy groups condemned his remarks -- and a senior defense official distanced the Pentagon from them as well.

"Mr. Cully Stimson's comments in a recent media interview about law firms representing Guantánamo detainees do not represent the views of the Defense Department or the thinking of its leadership," said Bryan Whitman, the senior Pentagon spokesman.

Stimson was speaking to a Washington, D.C., radio station, Federal News Radio, which runs long interviews for commuting government workers.

"I think quite honestly when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists that hit their bottom line in 2001," he said, ``those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms."

None of the Guantánamo captives has been convicted of crimes.

Into this vacuum, 500 U.S. lawyers, ranging from small solo practitioners to major national law firm partners, have filed unlawful detention lawsuits on behalf of Guantánamo detainees.

Moreover, private attorneys arguing on behalf of the captives have also handed the Bush administration two major defeats at the U.S. Supreme Court.

Miami defense attorney Neal Sonnett, who has not worked on the cases but has been an American Bar Association observer at Guantánamo, called Stimson's remarks "irresponsible" and ``shameful."

"It's not only an attack on corporate America," he said, ``but an attack on the rule of law."

Stimson, a former George W. Bush administration deputy U.S. attorney, rattled off such a complete list of the major law firms that Sonnett concluded it was part of a choreographed campaign ``to intimidate lawyers and their law firms who are rendering important public service."

Sonnett described pro-bono representation of someone who can't defend himself -- regardless of a captive's guilt or innocence -- as a bedrock American value.

Also Friday, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., wrote President Bush a letter of protest, calling Stimson's remarks "reprehensible" and ``especially appalling . . . from a senior defense official responsible for U.S. detention policy."

"I hope you will immediately disavow Mr. Stimson's statements and take the appropriate action against this official," said Leahy, a lawyer and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Among the firms Stimson named were Pillsbury Winthrop, Jenner & Block, Wilmer Cutler Pickering, Covington & Burling, Sutherland Asbill & Brennan, Paul Weiss Rifkin, Mayer Brown, Weil Gottshal, Pepper Hamilton, Venable, Alston & Bird, Perkins Coie, Hunton & Williams, Fulbright Jaworski.

They are identified in the U.S. District Court docket in Washington, D.C., where Guantánamo captives have filed their lawsuits against the Bush administration.

But Stimson said the list was compiled in response to a Freedom of Information Act request by a major news organization, which he did not name.

The Washington Post led the charge in condemnation on Friday morning in an editorial, 'Unveiled Threats: A Bush appointee's crude gambit on detainees' legal rights."

Separately, the American Bar Association issued a statement Friday condemning the comments.

"Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law," said ABA President Karen J. Mathis.

``To impugn those who are doing this critical work -- and doing it on a volunteer basis -- is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans."

The American Civil Liberties Union took a slightly different approach in its condemnation:

"What Mr. Stimson condemns are precisely the values we should be trying to defend in the war on terror," said ACLU National Director Steven R. Shapiro.

Round Up The Usual Lawyers (NYT)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

No one who has followed President Bush's policies on detainees should be surprised when a member of his team scorns American notions of justice. But even by that low standard, the administration's new attack on lawyers who dare to give those prisoners the meager representation permitted them is contemptible.

Speaking this week on Federal News Radio, a Web site and AM radio station offering helpful hints for bureaucrats and helpful news for the administration, Cully Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, tried to rally American corporations to stop doing business with law firms that represent inmates of the Guantánamo internment camp.

It does not seem to matter to Mr. Stimson, who is a lawyer, that a great many of those detainees did not deserve imprisonment, let alone the indefinite detention to which they are subjected as "illegal enemy combatants." And forget about the fundamental American right that everyone should have legal counsel, even the most heinous villain.

In his interview, reported yesterday by The Washington Post editorial page, Mr. Stimson rattled off some of the most respected law firms in the country that, after initial hesitation, have courageously respected that right. He called it "shocking" that they were "representing detainees down there" and suggested that when corporate America got word of this dastardly behavior, "those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms." He added: "We want to watch that play out."

When his interviewer asked who was paying these firms for the work, Mr. Stimson said, "It's not clear, is it?"

Actually, it is quite clear. Mr. Stimson surely knows that the vast majority of those cases are being handled for free by law firms that have not signed on to Mr. Bush's post-9/11 revision of the American rules of justice. Still, he persisted, saying some lawyers were "receiving monies from who knows where."

The interview was a greatest-hits remix of Bush administration nonsense about Guantánamo, including Mr. Stimson's message to corporate executives that lawyers "are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001." The only terrorists at Guantánamo associated with 9/11 were transferred there recently after being held for years in secret C.I.A. prisons where no lawyer could enter.

Not only do we find Mr. Stimson's threats appalling, we differ with him about 9/11. The tragedy and crime of that day was that thousands of innocents were slaughtered — not that it hurt some companies' profit margins.

Democrats May Push To Shutter War Prisons (BOS)

By Rick Klein

DOJ_NMG_0117078

The Boston Globe, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democratic leaders yesterday outlined plans to try to force the Bush administration to close the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the Guantanamo Bay detention facility in Cuba, taking aim at two sites that have sparked an international furor over the Bush administration's war policy.

Representative John P. Murtha, the chairman of the powerful Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said he wants to close both prisons by cutting their funding, "to restore our credibility worldwide." If he succeeds, it would force the administration to find a new location for high-value terrorism suspects.

"We have the role, as elected officials, to exert our influence through the power of the purse -- that's what it's all about," said Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat whose committee will hold hearings on Iraq next week. "We try not to micromanage the Defense Department, but I tell you, they need micromanagement. They're out of control."

The effort to close the prisons, which Murtha said Pelosi supports, illustrates how congressional Democrats are confronting the president over his war policies. The aggressive push to change the war's course has intensified after the president's address Wednesday night in which he announced plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

Democratic leaders will try to include the measure to close the prisons in a spending bill designed to pay for war operations, Murtha said. He acknowledged that closing Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo would be more symbolic than substantive. Abu Ghraib gained international infamy in 2004 after pictures emerged of US soldiers torturing and sexually abusing Iraqi prisoners there. The Guantanamo facility, which has housed Al Qaeda members and other terror suspects for more than five years, has emerged as a lightning rod for criticism of US policies in combating terrorism.

Numerous human rights groups and a United Nations commission have called for it to be shuttered, citing widespread reports of prisoner mistreatment. Starting last fall, Bush has used the prison as a holding place for suspects who were previously held in secret CIA prisons.

"My action is trying to restore credibility in the Middle East," Murtha said.

Bush has defended the detention center as a "necessary" part of the war on terror.

"I'd like to close Guantanamo, but I also recognize that we're holding some people that are darn dangerous and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts," Bush said in June.

A Pelosi spokesman, Brendan Daly, said the speaker isn't going to make a final judgment on whether the prisons should be closed until after Murtha's committee has hearings on the issue.

"She has encouraged him to look into it," Daly said.

Murtha's plan emerged as a new series of volleys over the president's war plans played out on Capitol Hill.

House and Senate Democratic leaders say they still hope to change the president's mind about the troop "surge" by passing a non binding resolution of disapproval in the coming weeks. But a growing number of Democrats say that -- because Bush is almost certain to ignore such a resolution -- more must be done to hasten the end of the war.

The most likely step, many Democrats say, would involve spending restrictions on the war budget.

"The non binding resolution is symbolic, and that's nice to do if you've got the time to do it," said Representative John F. Tierney, a Salem Democrat. But lawmakers have to use their power over the budget to stop the war, he said.

"That's where we're going to find out which Democrats and which Republicans are going to take a stand on this," Tierney said.

Though some Republicans are also skeptical of Bush's plan, they indicated they will resist Murtha's attempts to close prisons and control war policy.

"You can't conduct a war or a battle from the House chamber or a committee room," said Representative C.W. Bill Young of Florida, the ranking Republican on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee.

Still, in an indication of the president's waning support in Congress, House Republican leaders held a "listening session" yesterday morning to hear out GOP members' concerns, and Republican leaders have been invited to join the president at Camp David for further talks this weekend.

Bush yesterday made calls to King Abdullah II of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt to rally support in the Middle East. And for a second straight day, lawmakers grilled top administration officials about the plan on Capitol Hill.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted that the White House has no plans to attack targets in Iran. He also said he believes that having more US troops in Iraq will succeed because Iraqi leaders say they are committed to reaching political settlements to pacify the nation.

"If they fail to do those things, then I think it's incumbent upon the administration and incumbent upon me to recommend looking at whether this is the right strategy," Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The White House got some support from Senator John McCain of Arizona, the committee's top Republican and a 2008 Republican presidential prospect. McCain said the troop increase will give Iraqis "the best possible chances to succeed."

But Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the US mission has changed substantially since Congress gave the president the authority to destroy weapons of mass destruction and depose Saddam Hussein.

"Why not come back to the Congress? Why not come back and permit us to have a vote on this surge?" Kennedy asked.

Gates said he would pass that message on to the president, but "I think he feels that he has the authority that he needs to proceed."

That is driving much of Democrats' interest in forcing the president's hand. Kennedy and other Democrats have proposed keeping the president from sending more troops to Iraq by blocking the money he would need to do it.

Representative James P. McGovern, a Worcester Democrat, said he is preparing a bill that would go even further, cutting off funds for nearly all troops after six months and allocating only enough resources to provide for the "safe and orderly withdrawal" of US forces.

Florida: Delay In Trial For Padilla (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

A federal judge ordered a three-month delay for the trial of Jose Padilla, accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, in part to allow time for a full evaluation of Mr. Padilla's mental competency. The judge, Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami, set a new trial date of April 16 for Mr. Padilla and two others. It was the third time the case had been postponed. Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old American, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists.

Leftists Fire Rocket Into U.S. Embassy (WT/AP)

By Derek Gatopoulos

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

ATHENS -- An anti-tank rocket slammed into the U.S. Embassy yesterday, causing limited damage and no injuries but reviving fears of a resurgence of far-left Greek militant groups that carried out deadly attacks over three decades.

The shoulder-fired rocket narrowly missed a large blue-and-white U.S. seal on the embassy's facade and damaged a third-floor bathroom near the ambassador's office.

U.S. Ambassador Charles Ries called the attack "very serious." He said no warning had been given.

"There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence," he told reporters outside the cordoned-off embassy, which officials closed for the day. "The good news is no one was hurt and [there was] minimal damage."

Greek authorities blamed domestic militant groups that have carried out bombings against police and government buildings despite a crackdown on terrorism before the Athens Olympics in 2004.

Police are examining the authenticity of two calls taking responsibility from the group Revolutionary Struggle, which has carried out six bombings since 2003. The shadowy group criticized the United States in past statements, citing treatment of prisoners at the U.S. military detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"It is very likely that this is the work of a domestic group," Public Order Minister Vyron Polydoras said. "We believe this effort to revive terrorism is deplorable and will not succeed."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States saw no early signs of international involvement. The Pentagon received a report on the attack, but no request for any action, a U.S. military official said.

The blast shortly before 6 a.m. shattered windows in nearby buildings. Traffic in the downtown area came to a standstill for three hours as police blocked streets around the building to gather evidence -- dusting cars for fingerprints and gathering discarded chewing gum and cigarette butts from the street.

The government said it was seeking permission from the courts to view video from traffic cameras, which under Greek privacy laws is officially excluded from the police investigation.

The attack resembled methods used by members of the far-left terrorist group called November 17, which eluded police between 1975 and eventual capture and conviction in 2003.

But the type of weapon used has not been seen in previous Greek attacks: a 2.36-inch rocket, which police said was probably fired from an extendable Russian-made launcher.

Public opposition to U.S. policies has remained strong in Greece since Washington provided support for a 1967-to-1974 military dictatorship.

Government and opposition party officials strongly condemned the attack, the third against the U.S. Embassy since the mid-1970s.

DOJ_NMG_0117080

Foreign Minister Dora Bakoyannis went to the scene, where she expressed "the solidarity of the Greek people following this deplorable action." State television said she wrote to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and promised full cooperation in finding the attacker.

Greece's conservative government came under criticism over the attack.

"How is such an attack on the American Embassy possible, when the site is the No. 1 target in the country?" said Alekos Papadopoulos, spokesman for public order of the opposition Socialist Party. "This points to problems with the police's capabilities."

A police task force to investigate the attack will be headed by a former counterterrorism chief who eradicated the November 17 group.

November 17 carried out a similar rocket attack on the embassy in 1996 -- causing minor damage and no injuries. It also bombed buses carrying U.S. servicemen and assassinated four U.S. military and embassy officials. In all, the group was blamed for killing 23 persons.

Grenade Hits U.S. Embassy In Athens (NYT)

By Ian Fisher, Anthee Carassava

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

ATHENS, Jan. 12 — An antitank grenade was fired into the heavily fortified American Embassy here on Friday just before dawn. The building was empty, but the attack nonetheless underscored deep anti-American sentiment here and revived fears of a new round of homegrown terror.

Greek officials said they doubted that the attack was the work of foreign or Islamic terrorists, but rather that of regrouped extreme leftists aiming at a specific, symbolic target: the huge American seal, with an eagle against a blue background, affixed to the front of the boxy, modern embassy near downtown.

The grenade narrowly missed the seal, punching through a window a few feet above and landing in a bathroom on the embassy's third story, where the ambassador has his office.

The damage was described as minimal. But the ambassador, Charles Ries, said: "We treat it as a very serious attack. There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence."

Panayiotis Stathis, a spokesman for the Public Order Ministry, said, "This was a violent act aimed to provoke Greek public opinion and disturb relations with the United States."

As Mr. Stathis spoke to reporters Friday evening outside the embassy, a demonstrator waved a sign that underscored Greece's often uneasy relations with the United States on issues from the war in Iraq and the longstanding tensions between Greece and Turkey to the American-supported military dictatorship that ruled Greece from 1967 to 1974. "The C.I.A. was behind this," the sign read.

Greek officials said a phone call placed anonymously to a private security company used by the embassy stated that the attack had been carried out by Revolutionary Struggle, a Marxist group with strong anti-American sentiments.

Homegrown terror has largely waned since the Greek authorities dismantled the most deadly groups before the 2004 Olympic Games here. But in that relative lull, Revolutionary Struggle has emerged as the most active of a new generation of small, shadowy terrorist groups.

It has claimed responsibility for a bombing at a court building in Athens in 2003 and one at the Economics Ministry 13 months ago, an attack that wounded two people. It also claimed responsibility for an attempt last May to assassinate the culture minister.

Greek officials did not immediately accept the claim of responsibility for Friday's incident, as they waited for a more detailed proclamation from the attackers.

"We're investigating whether in fact this claim is true," Vyron Polydoras, the public order minister, told reporters after visiting the embassy, which was closed for the day, its flag hung at half-staff.

Maria Bossis, one of Greece's top terrorism experts, speculated that the attack had a purpose beyond making a strong and violent anti-American statement. She said she believed that the group was also aiming at establishing supremacy among the 10 groups in competition since the government dismantled November 17, the most notorious of the leftist terrorist groups.

"This attack will determine who the boss is among the terrorists," said Ms. Bossis, a professor at the Greek College of Defense and former government adviser.

She also said the Greek government had not remained as aggressive against terrorists as it had been before the Olympics.

The grenade was launched at 5:58 a.m., apparently from across the six lanes of Vassilisis Sophia Boulevard, the main north-south road in the central Athens neighborhood of Ilissia.

DOJ_NMG_0117081

Tassoula Foumeli, a retired seamstress, said she had been in bed when the blast shattered the windows in her ground-floor bedroom.

"The explosion was so loud I couldn't even hear the smashing of the windows," she said. "I'm nervous and I'm mad."

Mad, she and other residents said, partly at the anti-American demonstrators who have rallied, at times violently, for years in front of the embassy. But she said some of her anger was at American policies that she said provoked demonstrators and angered many ordinary citizens.

"Not everything is justified," she said, referring to violent protests. "But at the same time, you kind of wonder why the United States is meddling in the affairs of other states. This is shown most recently in Iraq. Doesn't the United States have its own state? Does it have to poke its nose elsewhere? I am seeing suffering in Iraq."

Mr. Stathis, the Public Order Ministry spokesman, said the grenade used in the attack was of Russian design, a model manufactured in several Eastern European counties. He said Greek and American officials were collecting evidence from the debris left by the explosion, from surrounding buildings and from security cameras posted around the embassy.

They've Got Mail (WP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

IS THE FEDERAL government opening citizens' mail without obtaining warrants? Was a statement that was quietly issued when the president signed an obscure Postal Service reform bill last month a new assertion of power by the administration to engage in such warrantless searches? The answer to both these questions is disturbingly unclear.

No reasonable person doubts that in emergency circumstances -- a ticking bomb inside a package -- government agents shouldn't have to wait for court approval to open private mail. That authority has been clear for years. In signing the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act, President Bush took pains to note that he would interpret the law "in a manner consistent . . . with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

That's not troubling if, as administration officials contend, the signing statement simply reinforces existing law. "There is nothing new here," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Okay, but what does present law allow? Does the administration contend, as in the case of its warrantless wiretaps, that the president has the inherent constitutional authority, or power granted by the post-Sept. 11 Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF), to open mail without going through the process outlined in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act? Administration officials have been less than eager to answer these questions.

At a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee last February, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales whether the administration believed that the AUMF also permitted the warrantless opening of mail:

Mr. Gonzales: "There is all kinds of wild speculation out there about what the president has authorized and what we're actually doing. And I'm not going to get into a discussion, Senator, about hypotheticals."

Mr. Leahy: "Mr. Attorney General, you're not answering my question . . . Does this law -- you're the chief law enforcement officer of the country. Does this law authorize the opening of first-class mail of U.S. citizens -- yes or no -- under your interpretation?"

Mr. Gonzales: "Senator, I think -- I think that, again, that is not what is going on here. We're only focused on communications -- international communications where one part of the communication is al-Qaeda. That's what this program is all about."

Mr. Leahy: "You haven't answered my question."

Given the president's signing statement, given his demonstrated willingness to stretch the boundaries of his authority and dispense with inconvenient legal niceties, it seems necessary to ask again.

They're Refugees, Not Terrorists (LAT)

By Anna Husarska

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

Sherkole refugee camp, Ethiopia — DOMINIC KUR is, in many ways, a typical Dinka. Like almost all the men in his ethnic group, he has had his forehead marked with ornamental scarification, and by custom, his bottom front four teeth have been knocked out, which makes him lisp a bit.

As was expected of young Dinka men from southern Sudan in the mid-1980s, he joined the armed resistance, known as the Sudan People's Liberation Army, in its civil war against the ruling government in Khartoum.

Kur fought with the group for nine years. "I felt I had to defend my country against the Arabs," he explained. But he grew disenchanted with his unit's treatment of its troops, and with no mechanism in place for officially resigning from the guerrilla organization, he simply left and moved to Khartoum, where he worked on a construction site and married his childhood sweetheart from the village of Madol. In 2002, he crossed the border and came to the Sherkole camp.

The war dragged on, taking the lives of 2 million Sudanese over 20 years. But ultimately the international community legitimized the SPLA by recognizing its participation in the peace process. This culminated in the signing of a comprehensive peace accord on Jan. 9, 2005, a resolution that was hailed by Washington.

Now, with the war over, the refugees — 4 1/2 million people who were either displaced within the country or who fled to neighboring countries — are going home to southern Sudan. In the Sherkole camp, bulletin-board posters explain schematically the peace agreement's military and political arrangements for return and resettlement. The Uduk ethnic group went back last December. And there is already anticipation and joy in Zone F of the camp, where 2,000 Dinkas live.

But there is no joy for Kur and his family. They would like to go home too, but Kur fears that some people in the SPLA consider him a deserter. In view of the still-volatile situation in his country, he worries that if he were to return to the south, he would get into trouble. Considering the difficulties the country has had creating a police force in southern Sudan and ensuring public safety, his fears are not unreasonable. (In the Sherkole camp, there are other former Sudanese fighters who have similar apprehensions.)

So Kur has been proposed by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees for resettlement to a third country. His application — for himself, his wife Angelina and their six children — was submitted to the United States by the commissioner's office.

After telling me this, Kur led me through a typically low doorway into the dark but nicely decorated interior of their round, thatched mud hut, or tukul, and fished out the letters received from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security: Angelina and the kids are welcome to come to the United States, the letters said. Kur, however, has been denied entry.

His letter says: "You were found to be inadmissible to the United States pursuant to INA ? 212(a)(8 USC ? 1182(a) pertaining to 212 (a)(3)(B)." The letter notes, "A waiver is not available for the inadmissibility cited above," and the words "is not available" are circled by hand. In the U.S. Immigration and Nationality Act — I know it; Kur doesn't — provision 212 (a)(3)(B) means "involvement in terrorist activities." Ironically, Kur's letter from the Homeland Security Department labeling him a terrorist arrived on July 20, the same day that Salva Kiir, the leader of the SPLA who is now president of southern Sudan, was welcomed to the White House by President Bush.

Kur's case is not isolated. In the last six months, I have met many refugees around the world — Burmese Karen in Thailand, Burmese Chin in Malaysia, Lao Hmong in Thailand, Eritreans in Ethiopia — whose cases were put "on hold" by U.S. authorities because the organizations to which the refugees had belonged were later designated as terrorist. But I never saw a blunt refusal until I saw Kur's letter.

What's particularly upsetting is that those "on hold" are, in many cases, heroic freedom fighters who struggled for democracy against brutal dictatorships (like the Burmese junta or the Laotian communists) or even, sometimes, people who had been recruited to fight by the Unites States (like the Lao Hmong or the Vietnamese Montagnards).

The reason for this bizarre treatment is that in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. adopted a very broad definition of "terrorist activity" in American law. This overzealous legislative approach means that thousands of genuine refugees who participated in armed insurgencies — even those friendly to (and in some cases supported by) the United States — are now treated as a threat to American security.

It's not just those who participated in the insurgencies. Those who provided "material support" to these combatants can be barred too. The global effect of this draconian law has been devastating: Of the 70,000 slots allotted in 2006 for new refugees by the traditionally hospitable U.S. resettlement program, only 41,000 were filled. According to estimates from the International Rescue Committee and other refugee organizations, about half of the 29,000 excluded were due to the "terrorist" and "material support" provisions.

IT IS POSSIBLE to overcome these provisions through a waiver process, but it is so limited and cumbersome that only three waivers have been granted so far, to specific Burmese freedom-fighter groups.

On Thursday, the Bush administration acknowledged the "unintended consequences" of the post-9/11 laws. Officials from the departments of Justice, State and Homeland Security announced plans to expand the waiver program, some of which will require a vote in Congress. The officials named in particular Cuban, Tibetan and additional Burmese freedom-fighter groups whose supporters and members could get special consideration for admission to the United States.

This is a step in the right direction, but the waiver program remains a partial solution to the problem. It will continue to require case-by-case decisions at high levels in Washington, and it will undoubtedly leave behind, or on indefinite hold, many thousands who pose no threat to the United States.

And for now that includes Dominic and Angelina Kur. They are faced with an excruciating dilemma: Should they split up, which is almost unthinkable, especially because Angelina is again pregnant? Should Angelina give up a chance of a normal life outside the refugee camp for herself and the children? Or should they go back to Madol and hope that the southern Sudanese government will not take revenge on him?

Not much news from abroad comes to their tukul, so the Dinka couple does not even imagine that there could be a solution to their problem. But there is. Congress must act to broadly amend the immigration law so that all bona fide refugees can be easily and fairly considered for refugee or asylum status, not punished for the courage and commitment they demonstrated fighting for peace and democracy in their homelands.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Investigating 8,000 For Terrorism (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, January 13, 2007

He wouldn't say it directly, but this week FBI Director Robert Mueller in effect told Congress the bureau has 8,000 people under investigation for terrorism. The FBI is reluctant to release an official figure, as many of those under investigation play only minor roles or turn out to be innocent. Instead, Mueller did it by inference, comparing America's record with that of Great Britain.

In his January 11 testimony to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, the FBI chief cited "a recent and rare" disclosure from MI-5 –the British Security Service–that "the United Kingdom is tracking 1,600 individuals who are part of at least 200 networks that are actively plotting terrorist attacks." By comparison, Mueller added, "in general, the number of subjects we are monitoring is proportional to the number of subjects BSS is monitoring–based on gross national population."

Well, that's not hard to figure out. America's population of 300 million is five times that of Britain's 60 million. Multiply Britain's 1,600 terrorism suspects by five and you get 8,000. FBI officials confirm that's a ballpark figure, but decline to put the figure on the record.

"You can draw your own conclusions," says one veteran agent.

One reason for the caution is that FBI officials see few operational cells in America and don't want the public thinking there are 8,000 terrorists running around. In the British disclosure, back in November, MI-5 chief Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller revealed that the Brits are following at least 30 plots, many using British-born operatives and tied to al Qaeda in Pakistan. By contrast, noted Mueller, "We see relatively fewer active plots involving physical attacks within the United States, less defined networks of extremists, and less developed attack planning compared to those described by the BSS director."

That's the good news–and helps explain why America hasn't had a major terrorist attack since 9/11. But then what are all those U.S. terrorism suspects up to? Lots of support activity, officials say. One FBI agent ticked off the list: raising money, recruiting, logistics, surveillance, communications. Still, a handful of operational cells are out there, investigators believe, and that's what they lose sleep over.

"It's like a hockey game," says a counterterrorism agent. "If you let one goal get scored, you've lost the game."

Canadians Fear Fallout Of U.S. Passport Rules (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

TORONTO, Jan. 12 -- Canadian and U.S. citizens are lining up for passports to meet tougher U.S. border rules that take effect this month, and Canadian authorities fear the rules will keep more Americans at home.

Starting Jan. 23, all airline passengers landing in the United States will have to carry a passport, not just the driver's license and birth certificate that can now be used by Canadians crossing the border and by U.S. citizens returning from Canada, Mexico, the Bahamas and the Caribbean.

The result has been brisk business at passport offices here and in the United States. Applications for passports are up 53 percent in the United States and 33 percent in Canada from the previous year.

"The passport offices are swamped. We're at capacity and running into delays," said Fabien Lengelle, a spokesman for Passport Canada in Gatineau, Quebec.

U.S authorities say the rush proves that the tighter border controls being instituted five years after Sept. 11, 2001, are working to improve security. The rules will be extended to the busy land borders with Canada and Mexico by June 1, 2009.

"The proof is in the numbers. Four years ago, we issued 7 million passports a year. This year, it will be 16 million," Frank Moss, deputy secretary of state for passport services, said from Washington on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0117084

"Americans are coming into compliance. We believe we will wind up with a more secure border, and that people on the planes are who they claim to be," he said. As more travelers have passports, "I can't believe the borders won't work more smoothly."

Canadian business executives are less optimistic, predicting confusion and delays. The $50 billion tourism industry is already struggling with a 28 percent drop in visitors from the United States over the past five years.

"This just aggravates the problem," said Christopher Jones, vice president of the Tourism Industry Association of Canada. "We are already experiencing a precipitous drop in tourism. It's adding salt to the wound."

Fewer Americans are coming to Canada largely because of the increase in value of the Canadian dollar, which has erased cross-border shopping bargains. High gas prices, the 2003 epidemic of the viral illness SARS, increased security, confusion over the border rules and now the looming requirement for a passport have also hurt business, said Laurie Karson, who represents Canadian duty-free shops at the land borders.

"Tourism in general has suffered," Karson said. "We've been trying to educate our customers about getting a passport. Eventually, everyone is going to have to have a passport to travel."

Many airlines have launched similar education campaigns for passengers. The Nassau/Paradise Island Promotion Board has offered to refund to American tourists who come to the Bahama Islands the $97 passport fee if they need to get a passport. Some hotels in Jamaica are offering discounts to offset the fees.

Canadian tourism officials are worried the coming land border restrictions will stop the busy two-way traffic along the 3,145-mile land border. School trips will stop, they fear, bus journeys by senior citizens to Niagara Falls, Ontario, will dwindle, convention planners will bypass Canada, and communities that straddle the border will be split because many citizens don't want the bother or expense of getting a passport.

"An American family of two adults and two children would be required to pay at least $358 in fees for passports" and might decide against a vacation in, say, Niagara Falls, the tourism trade group said in written comments on the new rules.

An estimated 27 percent of U.S. citizens have passports, according to the State Department. In Canada, the rate is 40 percent. Critics have urged both countries to make their passports cheaper and easier to get. In Canada, an adult's passport costs the equivalent of $75 U.S. and is good for five years. A U.S. adult passport, costing about $22 more, is good for 10 years.

U.S. officials are still trying to come up with a cheaper, plastic card that could be used instead of a passport. They have proposed a wallet-size version embedded with a miniature radio-frequency chip that could bring up computerized information on a visitor quickly at the border.

Canada Unveils Border Security Plan (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown

AP, January 12, 2007

WINDSOR, Ontario — Canada unveiled a major border security and prosperity initiative Friday, saying it would spend $431.6 million over the next five years to protect its border from terrorist, economic and environmental threats, according to the Canada Border Services Agency's website.

Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day made the announcement at the Canada-U.S. border crossing between Windsor and Detroit, where one-third of the $1.6 billion in daily trade between the North American neighbors passes.

"I even sometimes surprise my American friends when I remind them that the trade that comes across the Ambassador Bridge in total is greater than all of the trade that exists between the United States and Japan," Day told a news conference.

Security experts have long criticized the lack of security measures along Canada's side of the 4,000-mile border with the United States, particularly since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper pledged when he was elected nearly a year ago to strengthen the frontier between the world's largest trading partners, including these new security measures and eventually arming Canada's border guards.

The bulk of the money, $337 million, is for the electronic-Manifest program, which allows for computer-automated risk assessments of cargo shipments before they reach Canada.

The 18,000 trucks that cross the U.S.-Canada border each day, as well as all railroad, air and marine cargo carriers, will eventually be required to file electronic manifests before their shipments arrive. This will allow border service agents to determine in advance whether the cargo, or those who deliver it, should be further screened.

The eManifest program will ensure that background checks on crew and risk assessments of cargo are in the hands of the Canada Border Services Agency 24 hours in advance of the arrival of shipments by sea; and several hours ahead of railroad, highway and air cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0117085

The program was developed in cooperation with U.S. Department of Homeland Security and is part of the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, launched in 2005 by then-Prime Minister Paul Martin, President Bush and then-Mexican President Vicente Fox.

Day would not give a precise date of when the electronic manifests would become mandatory at the 119 border crossings.

"There's still going to be that human element at the border, to look at material and talk to the driver, but the amount of time that's going to be saved is going to be significant," he said of the requirement to file electronic manifests in advance of cargo shipments.

Another $20 million has been earmarked for business leaders and emergency responders to plan for the immediate resumption of trade across the border in the event of a terrorist attack, medical pandemic or natural disaster.

Perrin Beatty, president of the Canadian Manufacturers & Exporters, said his and other associations would work with governments and emergency response teams on both sides of the border to stage exercises and develop protocols that would get trade moving within hours of an emergency.

"If al-Qaeda can damage us, either physically or economically, they win," Beatty told the news conference, referring to Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization. "It would be foolish for us to assume that there will not be any further incidents along the border."

Another $10 million will expand the existing Partners in Protection program, a voluntary scheme in which businesses and their employees help border agents detect and prevent contraband smuggling of drugs and weapons.

Suit Against Times To Be Tossed Out (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

A federal judge said yesterday that he will throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation lawsuit a former Army scientist filed against the New York Times Co. over columns that he contends blamed him for the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Saying that the Times's motion to dismiss the case "should be granted," U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria canceled a trial set for Jan. 29, according to the court's docket. Hilton indicated that he would explain his reasoning in a subsequent order throwing out the case.

The development is a victory for Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit filed by Steven J. Hatfill in 2004. Hatfill said the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a "likely culprit" in the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17.

Hatfill has been identified by authorities as a "person of interest" in the attacks, but no one has been charged.

David McCraw, assistant general counsel for the Times Co., said the paper is "extremely gratified" by Hilton's decision. "In the end, we think the law worked the way it should, which is to protect aggressive journalism," he said.

Kristof said the decision is an important victory for journalists, who have suffered a series of court defeats recently in efforts to shield news-gathering activities from the legal process. Kristof had earlier refused to disclose confidential sources used for the anthrax columns.

"It's been a very difficult few years for journalists entangled in the law, and so today feels like a victory," Kristof said.

An attorney for Hatfill, a former researcher at the Army's infectious disease research laboratory at Fort Detrick in Frederick, did not return telephone calls late yesterday.

Hilton first threw out the case in 2004, ruling that Kristof accurately reported that the scientist was a focus of the FBI probe. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit reinstated the suit in 2005 and said Kristof's columns could be read as blaming Hatfill for the attacks.

As the case moved toward trial, the Times argued that Kristof did not intend to implicate Hatfill and was only trying to jump-start the FBI investigation. In the 2002 columns, Kristof said the FBI had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z and wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Hatfill's attorneys argued that Kristof labeled Hatfill as the anthrax killer and deliberately ruined his reputation.

Judge Rejects Defamation Suit Against The Times (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A federal judge on Friday dismissed a suit against The New York Times by a former government scientist who said he was defamed by a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0117086

The judge, Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., granted a motion by The Times to dismiss the suit but did not provide an immediate explanation. He is expected to file a detailed written opinion in coming days.

It was the latest and, perhaps, final chapter in a suit that has gone to the Supreme Court.

The scientist, Dr. Stephen J. Hatfill, a specialist in biological weapons, had said in his suit that the columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the anthrax mailings had defamed him.

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist whom he initially identified as Mr. Z, saying he had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. In August 2002, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill, a former scientist at the Army bioweapons center at Fort Detrick, Md., had come forward and identified himself as Mr. Z and said the news media had treated him unfairly.

Five people died in the anthrax attacks. Although federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a "person of interest," he was never charged with any crime, and the attacks remain unsolved.

The Times argued in its dismissal motion that Dr. Hatfill was a public figure, at least for the purposes of the suit, in that he had thrust himself into the public debate about preparedness for a biological attack. That would present him with a far greater burden in showing that he was defamed and could, as the newspaper argued, prevent such a judgment.

The Times also argued that the columns did not blame Dr. Hatfill for the attacks, as he said in his suit. Instead, the paper's lawyers said, the columns were aimed at pressing the Federal Bureau of Investigation to move more swiftly and either charge or clear Dr. Hatfill as a suspect.

Judge Hilton had dismissed the suit earlier, saying that no defamation had occurred. A three-judge appeals panel voted, 2 to 1, to reinstate the suit, saying a jury should decide whether the columns were defamatory.

The full appeals court, based in Richmond, Va., split, and the Supreme Court refused to intervene.

Judge Hilton's latest dismissal, when his opinion is published, is expected to rest on a fuller argument than the last time and could thus be less vulnerable to being overturned. It is likely to deal with the issues raised in The Times's dismissal motion and Dr. Hatfill's response, including the question of whether he is a public figure for the purposes of defamation law.

Whether there is any leeway for Dr. Hatfill to mount an appeal as he did before would depend on how Judge Hilton fashions his ruling.

A lawyer for Dr. Hatfill, Mark A. Grannis, said, "Obviously we can't make any statements as to what we'll do until we see the ruling."

Mr. Grannis said he did not believe that the case was over.

"It has always been our position," he said, "that the evidence of defamation was extremely strong and Mr. Kristof fabricated parts of his column to falsely implicate Dr. Hatfill in the anthrax attacks."

David E. McCraw, a lawyer for The Times, said in a statement: "We are gratified by the judge's ruling today. In making our summary judgment motion, we believed that the plaintiff had failed to come up with the evidence necessary to bring this case to trial, and we are pleased that the court agreed."

Mr. McCraw said the case had required a significant investment of time and money on the part of the newspaper, "but in the end, the law of defamation worked the way it was supposed to, by protecting aggressive, important journalism."

Judge Dismisses Anthrax Libel Case (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

McLEAN, Va. (AP) -- A federal judge on Friday dismissed a libel lawsuit filed against The New York Times by a former Army scientist once identified as a person of interest in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton in Alexandria dismissed the case a week after lawyers for the Times argued that Steven Hatfill should be considered a public figure under libel law, which makes it much more difficult for a public figure to win a judgment than a private citizen.

The judge did not explain his ruling in the order issued Friday.

Hatfill's lawyers had argued that even if Hatfill qualified as a public figure, they could still prevail at trial because they had uncovered serious flaws in the reporting of columnist Nicholas Kristof.

Fenty, Kaine, O'Malley Vow To Cooperate In Crisis Planning (WP)

By Lori Aratani

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

In their first joint meeting as the Washington region's top elected officials, District Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley pledged yesterday to cooperate on homeland security issues.

DOJ_NMG_0117087

"This is a historic day," Fenty said. "The fact that we are [meeting] about homeland security and counterterrorism is no accident. It is deliberate, and we think it is the priority going into the future."

The meeting, held at the Unified Communications Center in Southeast Washington, lasted more than an hour.

Fenty said that one of the leaders' goals is to prioritize homeland security issues as the region begins to apply for federal grants. He said that they plan to meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next month.

The three men, all Democrats, said they were pleased that the Department of Homeland Security has revamped the process for distributing federal funds to local jurisdictions to provide more money to high-risk urban areas.

Chertoff announced this month that more than half -- $411 million -- of the $747 million in Urban Area Security Initiative money would be directed to six areas, including the Washington region.

Still, it is not clear whether that will mean more money will go to the D.C. area, which will have to compete with five jurisdictions -- New York-northern New Jersey, Los Angeles-Long Beach, Chicago, the San Francisco Bay area and Houston -- for funding.

Fenty said area priorities include communicating among jurisdictions, public preparedness, handling mass casualties, protecting critical infrastructure, improving overall planning, sharing intelligence and coping with a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack.

Kaine, who dubbed the trio the "three amigos," said that their experience as local officials -- all were city council members and mayors -- rather than their party label will make them effective regional leaders. He said that their future discussions will include developing a "first-hour plan" for how local areas would cooperate in the early stages of an emergency.

"In an increasingly small world, it's critically important that we cooperate across borders," said O'Malley, who will be sworn in next week.

In future meetings, the three plan to pursue regional approaches to issues such as transportation and the environment.

Yesterday's meeting was the seventh in a series of regional summits, which were initiated in 2003 by former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner.

Fenty, Kaine, O'Malley Hold Summit On Security (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The chief executives of the District, Maryland and Virginia said yesterday they will pursue federal funding to help prepare the Washington area for homeland security emergencies.

"It is not an exaggeration or hyperbole to say that in this entire world there probably is not a more important place or not a more important region where we would be focused on homeland security and counterterrorism than right here in the National Capital Region," said D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, who met with Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley at a regional summit in Southeast yesterday.

The National Capital Region, created and defined by Congress, includes the District, Prince George's and Montgomery counties in Maryland, and Arlington, Fairfax, Loudoun and Prince William counties and Alexandria in Virginia.

"It is critically important that we cooperate across borders and pursue our common goals," said Mr. O'Malley, who takes office next week. "None of them more urgent, or more important than making this whole region ... safer and more secure."

The collaborative effort will work toward improving, among other things, communications among jurisdictions, public preparedness, critical infrastructure protection planning, intelligence sharing and the ability to deal with chemical, biological, nuclear and explosive attacks.

Mr. Fenty said protecting the Metro transit system, which branches out into all three jurisdictions, is a "huge priority."

"If we get the adequate level of resources we will again be a world leader in making sure we are protecting our residents," Mr. Fenty said.

The three Democrats said they will discuss their financial wish list as early as next month with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who announced last week that the District, New York and four other "highest-risk" metropolitan areas will compete for $411 million to subsidize their efforts to guard against terrorist attacks.

"It is just up to us to make our best case in meeting with Secretary Chertoff and DHS in the grant proposal we put together and the work we do with our combined congressional delegations," Mr. Kaine said.

Homeland security issues have taken on a greater importance locally since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the Pentagon.

Mr. Kaine said he is optimistic that DHS this year will give the NCR extra financial considerations now that it has been branded as a "highest risk" area.

"It's been hard to plan with numbers that go up and go down," Mr. Kaine said.

Last year, the D.C. area lost out on $31 million in homeland security money after Congress cut DHS grant money by $700 million.

The three executives, whom Mr. Kaine dubbed the "three amigos," said their backgrounds as city council members and big city mayors -- Mr. Kaine in Richmond and Mr. O'Malley in Baltimore -- is more important to homeland security than belonging to the same political party because they have an understanding of what local responders go through during catastrophic events.

"So much of the response is initially generated from local governments, and that will continue to be the case," Mr. Kaine said.

This was the first such meeting for Mr. Fenty and Mr. O'Malley, who were elected to their current office last fall, and the seventh such meeting since 2003 when the three jurisdictions first started discussing mutual interests such as air quality, transportation, the Chesapeake Bay and tourism.

Yesterday's summit was held at the Unified Communications Center, which opened in Southeast last fall.

The three leaders said they were optimistic about their working relationship going forward.

"We are all one community and we need to act that way," Mr. Kaine said.

Box Sent To Clinton Causes Scare (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, Jan. 12 (AP) — A post office was evacuated as the police, the Westchester County Bomb Squad and Secret Service agents responded to a report of a suspicious package addressed to former President Bill Clinton.

The cause of all the fuss? A box of cookies.

Postal officials at a post office in New Castle discovered a suspicious package addressed to Mr. Clinton on Thursday, said Kim Bruce, a Secret Service spokeswoman.

An incorrect address for the Chappaqua home of Mr. Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton raised the authorities' suspicions, Ms. Bruce said.

After the post office was evacuated, a member of the county's bomb squad, dressed in protective gear, approached the 3-foot-by-3-foot package and checked it with a portable X-ray device. When no bomb parts were seen, the package was opened, revealing the cookies.

The cookies were then turned over to the Secret Service, and the post office was reopened.

Ms. Bruce declined to say who sent the cookies to Mr. Clinton or whether they were ever delivered to the home.

WAR NEWS:

Gates Denies US Forces Will Enter Iran (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

Robert Gates, the US defence secretary, on Friday dismissed concerns that the Pentagon would send US troops across the Iraqi border into Iran to disrupt networks allegedly supplying weapons to Shia militias in Iraq.

President George W. Bush this week raised alarm that the US might be considering military operations against Iran. In his speech to the nation announcing the surge in US troops in Iraq, Mr Bush accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on US forces in Iraq.

But Mr Gates on Friday said the US planned only to disrupt Iranian activities within Iraq.

"It refers strictly to operations inside the territory of Iraq, not crossing the border," Mr Gates said in his first appearance as Pentagon chief before the Senate armed services committee.

General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, added that "from a military standpoint, [there was] no need to cross the Iranian border". US forces this week apprehended five Iranian nationals in a raid on an Iranian liaison office near Irbil in northern Iraq.

Mr Gates and Gen Pace faced a less hostile reception than Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, received before the Senate foreign relations committee on Thursday when she was lambasted her over administration's plan to send an extra 21,500 US troops to Iraq. But most Democrats, and some Republicans, on the armed services committee strongly questioned whether Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his commitments to send more Iraqi troops into Baghdad.

Democrats have argued that there is little evidence that Mr Maliki is willing to crack down on Shia militias. Bush administration officials have argued that he is 100 per cent supportive of the plan, which they say he developed. But Susan

Collins, a moderate Maine Republican, asked Mr Gates what had changed since Mr Maliki told her three weeks ago that he did not want more US troops in Iraq.

Mr Gates responded: "There is no question in my mind that Prime Minister Maliki wanted to do this operation on his own."

"I think what happened is that as his own military and security leaders began looking at the operation and began working out the details and then began talking and consulting with General Casey and the American military planners, that they essentially persuaded the prime minister that additional American forces were necessary in order to make his plan successful."

When asked whether he believed Mr Maliki was completely supportive of the plan to pacify Baghdad, Gen Pace would only say that he believed the "Iraqi leadership is 'saying' they are 100 per cent on board".

Carl Levin, the Democrat chairman of the committee, asked Mr Gates why the American public should have any faith that Mr Maliki would fulfil his pledges to the US when he had repeatedly failed to do so in the past.

Gates Ties Iraq Push To Drawdown (WP)

By Josh White, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

President Bush's new operation to secure Baghdad will begin in earnest with a push by thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops in the first week of February, and its chances of success should be evident within a few months, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told lawmakers yesterday.

If the plan works, the United States could begin drawing down troop levels by the end of the year, Gates said. If the Iraqi government does not deliver troops and political and economic support, he said, the United States could withhold many of the 21,500 additional troops Bush has ordered to secure the most violent parts of Iraq.

Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also assured members of the Senate Armed Services Committee that there are no plans to take military operations into Iran, clarifying remarks Bush made on Wednesday in announcing the new Iraq package.

"From a military standpoint," Pace said while responding to questions, there is "no need to cross the Iranian border."

Gates said a brigade of several thousand Iraqi troops is expected to arrive in Baghdad in about three weeks to beef up security, part of an effort to bring in 8,000 more Iraqi troops to quell sectarian violence. The first additional U.S. brigade is expected to arrive in Baghdad in the coming days to support Iraqi forces as they clear and hold neighborhoods throughout the city.

"I think that what's perhaps the newest part of this is that it really does put the onus on the Iraqis to come through," Gates said. He later acknowledged that the Iraqi government's "record of fulfilling the commitments is not an encouraging one" but said that Iraqis "really do seem to be eager to take control of this security situation."

Gates said it will be easy to tell if Iraqis live up to their end of the bargain, prompting members of the committee to point out that the Iraqi government sent only two of six promised battalions for an operation in Baghdad last summer.

Gates and Pace said that they think they have assurances from the Iraqi government, but that there is no specific deadline for success or clear benchmarks for progress.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the committee's new chairman, sharply criticized sending more U.S. troops into Iraq and said the move reinforces a "flawed strategy" that has failed thus far.

"Deepening our involvement in Iraq would be a mistake, but deepening our involvement in Iraq on the assumption that the Iraqis will meet future benchmarks and commitments, given their track record, would be a compounding of that mistake," Levin said. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) urged the administration to put it to a congressional vote.

Some Republicans questioned the immediate need for thousands of U.S. troops, with Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) saying he would rather send in a small complement of troops to see if the Iraqis become full partners.

"My point being, it seems to me, shouldn't we walk a few steps along this line and then see how quickly, hopefully, the Iraqis begin to take up their responsibilities, rather than this massive plan pushing forward all at once?" Warner asked. Gates replied that the phased introduction of troops over the coming months will have the same effect.

Gates also said there are no plans for a long-term U.S. presence: "We don't want permanent bases in Iraq."

Senators questioned Gates and Pace about Bush's vow on Wednesday to stop Iran and Syria from supporting violence in Iraq. In his televised prime-time speech, the president promised to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Pace said the military will conduct those efforts within Iraq; they include two recent raids in northern Iraq that resulted in the capture of several Iranians. A State Department spokesman said yesterday that coalition forces raided a facility in Irbil because of information linking it to Iran's Revolutionary Guard. Contrary to the assertions of Iraqi officials, the site "was not a diplomatic facility; it did not have the standing of a consulate," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

DOJ_NMG_0117090

The raids were authorized under an order that Bush issued several months ago, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the New York Times yesterday. Rice was vague about when the president issued the order, the Times reported, but she said it allows the U.S. military to target Iranian "networks" in Iraq.

White House press secretary Tony Snow yesterday addressed what he called the "urban legend" of pending U.S. action against Iran and Syria. He told reporters that there is no intent to go to war with either country, and that the administration is committed to diplomatic efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program.

The idea of a significant troop increase in Iraq has been championed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), and he said yesterday that a small, short troop boost would be the "worst of all worlds" because he believes the U.S. military needs a sustained, robust presence. McCain also accused detractors of not presenting viable alternatives.

"I believe that those who disagree with this new policy should indicate what they would propose to do if we withdraw and Iraq descends into chaos," McCain said.

The troop increase in Iraq will require the Army "very soon" to alert a number of National Guard combat brigades that they will have to deploy in about a year -- earlier than anticipated -- to provide relief for busy active-duty Army units, a senior military official told reporters.

With more troops comes a need for more equipment, requiring the Army to use two brigades' worth of pre-positioned stocks of tanks, Humvees and other gear in Kuwait that it had built up after depleting the stocks for the invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

"We're having to redistribute equipment right now," the official said. The Army plans to build as many as six new combat brigades under a plan unveiled by Gates to expand the service by 7,000 active-duty soldiers a year, to a total of 547,000.

Republicans On Panel Back President's Plan, Masking Divisions (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee came to the defense of President Bush on Friday, lending support to his decision to send more troops to Iraq and hoping to head off a Senate resolution criticizing the plan.

In contrast to the bipartisan barrage of criticism a day earlier by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Republicans on the armed services panel with few exceptions portrayed the troop increase as a risky but necessary move to regain control of Baghdad, and they portrayed Democrats as lacking the will to see the war through to victory.

"To my colleagues, I would ask, at least in the short term here, that we measure our words, that we not have a political stampede to declare the war lost when it's not yet lost, or to embrace strategies that would lead to defeat," said Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina.

But the public show of support for the White House plan masked deep concern about sending additional troops among some Republicans and outright opposition among others. Senate Democrats are preparing a nonbinding resolution opposing the plan that Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said might attract enough Republican votes to overcome parliamentary hurdles and pass if Democrats bring it to a vote.

To reassure senators worried about an indefinite commitment of more American troops, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told the panel that, while there is no explicit time limit on how long they will stay, he viewed the deployment as likely to last "months, not years."

He added that withdrawals were possible this year if the additional troops being sent to Baghdad reduce the violence significantly.

Testifying on Capitol Hill about the plan for the second straight day, Mr. Gates said that Iraqi lawmakers might decide to replace Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, if he failed to take steps to carry out the new plan to regain control of Baghdad.

"The first consequence that he has to face is the possibility that he'll lose his job," Mr. Gates said. "There are beginning to be some people around that may say, 'I can do better than he's doing,' in terms of making progress."

Administration officials have discussed among themselves whether they might need to withdraw support for Mr. Maliki if he doesn't perform, notably by building a new coalition in the Iraqi Parliament. Mr. Gates's statement was the first mention of the subject in public by a senior administration official.

Mr. Gates and other administration officials have had trouble explaining to lawmakers why they are confident that Mr. Maliki will carry out promises to send more Iraqi troops to Baghdad and to permit them and the additional American forces to operate in Shiite neighborhoods, where they have been blocked from conducting operations in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0117091

Mr. Gates conceded that the Iraqi government's record of fulfilling its commitments is "not an encouraging one," but said Mr. Maliki now seemed to him "eager" to follow the plan worked out with American commanders.

He acknowledged that Mr. Maliki initially had wanted to carry out the intensified military effort in Baghdad without more American troops. In addition, American military commanders feared that, without American forces monitoring their operations, there could been even worse sectarian bloodshed.

"There's no question in my mind that Prime Minister Maliki wanted to do this operation on his own," Mr. Gates said, but he was "persuaded that additional American forces were needed in order to make his plan succeed."

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, seemed to sum up the skepticism about Mr. Maliki among lawmakers in both parties when she noted that he "did not seem to welcome" the idea of sending more American forces when she met with him in Iraq just weeks ago.

"I'm really skeptical that the prime minister has really bought into this plan," she said.

On Friday, Mr. Bush invited the top Republican leaders in the Senate and the House to Camp David for a weekend session. The retreat was planned in advance, aides said, but took on new meaning as the White House sought to prevent further Republican defections over the administration's Iraq strategy.

Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate minority leader, and Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House minority leader, and their deputies were scheduled to spend the evening at Camp David on Friday with the president.

Asked by CBS News on Friday whether he believed he had the authority to send additional troops to Iraq no matter what Congress wants, Mr. Bush replied that "in this situation I do."

The president's Iraq strategy remained a deeply divisive subject during a private Senate Republican Conference breakfast meeting on Friday. Republicans began discussing an alternative resolution, senior aides said, offering lawmakers an avenue to express their opposition without joining the Senate resolution to be offered by Democrats as early as next week.

At the closed-door session, Senator John McCain of Arizona urged senators to spend time reading the president's plan and studying intelligence reports before making up their minds. Mr. McCain, one of the administration's biggest allies on Iraq who has been arguing for months for a troop increase, also began meeting privately with undecided senators in hopes of slowing Republican fallout.

Despite a torrent of criticism from Republicans about the plan, it remained an open question whether every senator who has spoken against a troop increase would cast a recorded vote in opposition to the president. Senior Republican officials disputed an assertion from the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, that 12 Republican senators would support a nonbinding Democratic resolution opposing the president.

The most vocal Republican opposition to expanding the military operation in Iraq, for now, has been largely contained to senators in the party's moderate wing. But Republican Congressional leaders said they feared the discontent could grow when lawmakers hear from their constituents during the three-day weekend.

"People have strong views. They are well informed by their own constituents, by their consciences, and there are a lot of different voices on this," said Senator John Thune, a South Dakota Republican. "This is the dominant issue of the time. It eclipses everything else."

Republicans were keeping a close watch on public opinion polls, particularly a survey by CNN and the Opinion Research Corporation on Friday showing that 66 percent of Americans oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

Democrats Eye Alternative To U.S. Troop Surge Plan (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- While Democrats seem to have won the moment by effectively pillorying President Bush's plan to inject 21,500 more U.S. troops into the Iraq war, a strategy that garnered little public support and has proved divisive on Capitol Hill, they now face the dilemma of coming up with a better alternative to stem the sectarian bloodletting.

Earlier this week, Democrats floated a plan to stop the escalation by blocking funding of the war. But Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, acknowledged that such action was unlikely because it would "send the wrong message to the troops."

Still, Levin, who has called for a phased withdrawal to begin in four to six months, said he hoped to garner bipartisan support for a non-binding resolution voicing dissatisfaction with Bush's Iraq policy. Levin said that passing such a resolution could help lay the groundwork for the start of a drawdown of troops in the coming months.

"It's just an open-ended policy," Levin said. "There are no deadlines for the Iraqis, no consequences for failure to meet their commitments."

DOJ_NMG_0117092

As Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified on Capitol Hill for the second straight day Friday, the Democrats continued to criticize the plan, although at a lower volume than on Thursday.

Gates and Pace attempted to counter their doubters with assurances that a temporary increase in U.S. troops was the best way to create a stable Iraq and the conditions that would permit a reduction in U.S. forces.

The two also said there are no immediate plans to attack targets in Iran. In his speech this week, Bush vowed to disrupt Iran's aid to insurgents in Iraq and "destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Those comments refer "strictly to operations inside the territory of Iraq, not crossing the border," Gates said, later adding that "any kind of military action inside Iran itself, that would be a very last resort."

The Bush administration has attempted to characterize the plan to bolster security in Baghdad and Anbar province as an Iraqi-designed strategy, but Democrats, who questioned Gates and Pace at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Friday, seemed incredulous.

In November, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki suggested to Bush that American forces push back to the outskirts of Baghdad, and that Iraqi forces would be able to effectively rout out the insurgents and militiamen that now control much of the Iraqi street. But Bush eventually rejected that plan.

Gates insisted that the plan was ultimately the creation of the Iraqi military. While al-Maliki initially wanted Iraqis to take complete control of pacifying Baghdad, the prime minister and his military commanders came to the conclusion that U.S. involvement was necessary, Gates said.

On Thursday, the prime minister failed to show up for a press conference where he was certain to face questions about the new strategy, and the Iraqi government spokesman gave the plan only tepid support.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass), who has been one of the most vociferous critics of the so-called "surge," called on Bush to return to Congress for approval before sending more troops to Iraq.

"Why not come back to the Congress?" Kennedy said. "Why not come back and permit us to have a vote on this surge? Let the American people speak through their elected representatives."

Bush invited top Republican leaders from the House and the Senate to Camp David for at least part of the holiday weekend.

After hearing Levin repeat the refrain that Bush's plan to increase troop levels would be a grave mistake during Friday's hearing, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) weighed in with his own critique of those who believe the president should be talking about drawing down instead of ramping up.

"Do they truly believe we can walk away from Iraq?" McCain said. "I believe these individuals ... have a responsibility to tell us what they believe are the consequences of withdrawal in Iraq. If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

Gates and Pace's second day on Capitol Hill was far more civil than the previous day, which included the comment from one Democrat member in the House that the plan was the "craziest, dumbest" idea.

But Friday's visit to the Senate Armed Services Committee, whose members include Bush loyalists Sens. John Cornyn of Texas, Jeff Sessions of Alabama and Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, did not include any heated exchanges.

Gates and Pace attempted to assuage some critics' concerns with assurance that the plan would be reviewed over time, and adjusted in consultation with U.S. commanders on the ground.

But Gates also tried to underscore to skeptical lawmakers that the next year or two would be critical to determining whether Americans would be successful in establishing a semblance of a working democracy in Iraq.

"Mistakes certainly have been made by the United States in Iraq, but however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable," Gates said.

Bush's Surge Already In Latest Budget (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The White House yesterday said there already is enough money in the budget to pay for President Bush's proposed troop surge in Iraq, leaving Congress almost no viable way to stop him before he commits the troops.

Some members of Congress had proposed using the power of the purse to cut off funds for the new troops, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said there's already enough money in the pipeline to begin the deployment of more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad to quell Sunni-Shi'ite violence and another 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to go after al Qaeda fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0117093

"Funding for the forces and to dispatch them to the region, it's already in the budget. So we're going to proceed with those plans," Mr. Snow said.

That leaves Congress with few other options.

One possibility, proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, would rescind Congress' 2002 blanket grant of authority to use force in Iraq, and would require Mr. Bush to gain congressional approval before boosting forces.

Yesterday, Mr. Kennedy asked the administration to hold off on deploying the troops to give Congress more time to consider the issue.

"It took the president ... two months to make this judgment. Let us have 10 days to try and make a judgment and a decision whether the American people are behind this," he told Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

"I take your point. I will certainly pass the message to the president," Mr. Gates replied.

The president, in an interview to be aired tomorrow on CBS' "60 Minutes," said he is convinced he has the authority to move forward with his plan.

"I think in this situation I do and I fully understand [Congress] could try to stop me from doing it," Mr Bush said. "But I made my decision. We're going forward."

Mr. Gates said if the plan succeeds, it will rebuild the public's confidence.

"I remember that when [the] first President Bush made the decision to throw Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, the polls showed about 15 percent of the American people supported that action," he said. "After it was successful, about 90 percent supported it."

Mr. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, were hammered by Democrats and by rank-and-file Republicans on Capitol Hill this week as they presented the details of Mr. Bush's proposal.

In addition to the extra troops, Mr. Bush is expecting Iraq to add more units to the fight in Baghdad, and for the Iraqi troops to be free of political or sectarian restrictions that had prevented them from going after some of the militias that now control parts of the city.

The White House says the plan's success depends on the Iraqis' meeting their commitments, and Mr. Gates said that will be evident in a matter of months. Still, Mr. Snow said they are not yet willing to entertain what-if questions if the Iraqis fail.

Administration officials said the additional troops will cost $5.6 billion this year, and that will be added to a $100 billion emergency war-spending bill they already planned to send to Congress early next month.

But Mr. Snow said there is already enough money in the regular fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill -- one of only two regular spending bills Congress passed last year -- to cover the early costs of the war, including the new deployments, through May or June.

The emergency spending bill will fund the overall war effort for the final months of the fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

Mr. Snow said Congress will have a chance to take votes later this year.

Democratic leaders have been cool to Mr. Kennedy's proposal. Instead, they said this week, they want to have votes in the House and Senate next week on nonbinding resolutions to show a majority of Congress disapproves of the president's plan.

But they are under pressure from liberal activists and interest groups to go further and exercise their newfound majority status to try to force Mr. Bush to begin withdrawing troops.

Mr. Snow yesterday acknowledged the reception to the president's plan has been hostile, but said the administration thinks that after studying the proposal more, members of Congress and the American public will conclude there is no alternative if they want success in Iraq.

"You ask yourself, can the Iraqis do it all by themselves right now? If the answer is yes, then, OK, bring everybody home. If the answer is no, the answer is what do you do to try to build that capacity so Americans can come home," he said. "That becomes the focal point of the debate."

Murtha: Anti-war Movement "Way Ahead Of Me" (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

Rep. John P. Murtha yesterday distanced himself from the anti-war movement's demands to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq immediately, but said he is exploring ways to block funding for additional troops.

"This group here today, they're way ahead of me," the Pennsylvania Democrat said of the Out-of-Iraq Caucus and the Congressional Progressive Caucus, which are comprised of the most ardently anti-war members of Congress.

Mr. Murtha, a member of the House Appropriations Committee, spoke to the groups yesterday during a forum about using the budget to prevent the Bush administration from boosting troop levels.

DOJ_NMG_0117094

"I'm doing what I think needs to be done, and I'm doing it as quickly as I can," said Mr. Murtha, a former Marine who rose to national prominence in 2005 by calling for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, softened their tone in the second day of hearings with administration officials on the Iraq war.

"I can't help but note the difference in the tenor of this meeting today," Sen. Bill Nelson, Florida Democrat, said to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee with Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

Mr. Nelson was referring to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's testimony Thursday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The low point of that hearing came when Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said Miss Rice would not pay any price for sending U.S. troops to Iraq because she has no children.

Mr. Gates told the panel that President Bush's plan for increasing troops was designed in part by Gen. George Casey Jr., the outgoing top military commander in Iraq, in conjunction with the Iraqi government. Opponents of the troop increase have said the president is ignoring advice from his generals.

Mr. Gates said the U.S. military thinks Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government "finally have the will to act" to restrain Shi'ite death squads.

Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, has been faulted for cracking down only on Sunni militias, which are engaged in a fierce sectarian conflict with the Shi'ites.

"This is, I think, a pivot point -- the pivot point -- in Iraq, as the Iraqi government insists on assuming the mantle of leadership in the effort to regain control of its own capital," Mr. Gates said.

Democratic leaders face a dilemma. They want to block funding for more troops in Iraq, without withholding funds for those already on the ground.

"We must cut off the funds," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat, during yesterday's anti-war forum.

But the Democratic chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David R. Obey of Wisconsin, has said he does not think Democrats can block some funds while approving others.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's focus is on bringing a non-binding resolution against a troop increase to the Senate floor, possibly next week. The Nevada Democrat hopes that up to a dozen Republicans will vote against the increase.

The President's Bookshelf (CNN)

By Wolf Blitzer, Dugald McConnell

CNN.com, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) --As President Bush wrestles with the continuing war in Iraq, he's currently reading a book about another difficult war: "A Savage War of Peace," by Alistair Horne, a senior White House source tells CNN.

It is a dense and detailed history of the battle between France and revolutionaries in its colony of Algeria, describing an unsuccessful war against a bloody terrorist insurgency. A resistance movement rose in 1954 to resist French occupation. It quickly turned into a civil war between factions that became a costly, unpopular conflict for the French.

In Europe And Elsewhere, Bush's New War Strategy Is Greeted With Skepticism (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 12 — Whatever the impact of President's Bush's new strategy for Iraq in Baghdad or in Baquba, it has won few converts across a worried world, where dismay and hostility toward the American expedition have grown while support trickles away.

Perhaps, some people whispered Friday in the Middle East, Arab leaders might privately welcome the effect of 20,000 more American soldiers, but would not say so publicly unless their presence swung the battle for Baghdad. Maybe, others ventured, this moment recalled President Nixon's invasion of Cambodia — "extension of the fight amid promises of withdrawal," as a German columnist put it. But even Britain, the onetime cheerleader for the White House, offered only an ambiguous response to the president's announcement, saying London remained on track to withdraw its forces, not increase them.

For some, the response was a study in haughty indifference.

"It hasn't changed anything," said Bernard Bot, the Dutch Foreign Minister, whose country withdrew its troops from the Iraq coalition in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0117095

Others painted their analogies in a more apocalyptic hue. In France, the newspaper Le Monde — which, after the Sept. 11 attacks, had declared, "We are all Americans" — published a cartoon depicting President Bush as a bulldozer driver shoveling American soldiers into a ditch in the shape of Iraq.

In Germany, the liberal Süddeutsche Zeitung wrote, "Bush hopes to douse the Iraqi fire with the blood of Americans."

Mr. Bush's announcement had been awaited across the globe, particularly since the publication of a report by the Iraq Study Group had fed speculation that Mr. Bush might adopt a strategy avoiding higher troop levels and including diplomacy toward Syria and Iran. But the president's speech Wednesday night dashed those hopes, confirming for some the sense that Europe and the United States will not overcome a fundamental rift between American interventionism and a softer European approach.

"Europeans and Germans believe you have to talk to regimes you don't like," said Eberhard Sandschneider, the director of the Research Institute of the German Council on Foreign Relations. (Pointedly, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, declined to discuss Iraq in an interview with correspondents on Thursday.)

Indeed, said Philippe Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, only a broad political strategy would enable Iraq to "recover stability, and beyond Iraq, stability in the region." That was the view, too, among Spanish officials. "Only political solutions can solve the crisis which affects stability in the region," said Miguel Ángel Moratinos, the foreign minister.

At the same time, there was some sympathy — if not always explicit — for the American quandary: this was, many analysts sensed, a defining event, a last throw of the dice that would measure American prestige and credibility against the clamor of its adversaries.

"This is a dangerous gamble," said the liberal newspaper Asahi Shimbun in Tokyo, where the government formally supported the new American strategy. In London, the antiwar Independent newspaper declared in an editorial, "The U.S. military is now being called upon to fight the battle for Baghdad all over again, in circumstances that are infinitely more complex than they were the first time around."

In both the Arab world and Israel, analysts expressed a keen sense that Iraq could turn into a zero-sum game, even if America scaled back its avowed ambitions for a democratic Iraq and aimed simply to mold stability and moderation.

"If the U.S. gets out before achieving these limited aims, Iraq is going to descend into mass chaos — we can see the country splinter," said Chuck Freilich, a former deputy national security adviser in Israel and now a senior fellow at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. "The region will be further radicalized. Iran would become the regional hegemon."

That same fear pervades many Arab societies. "The withdrawal would signify defeat, which would result in strengthening all the enemies' desire for expansion, such as Iran's persistence in developing its nuclear weapons, and Al Qaeda would double its activities in Iraq and the whole region," said an opinion article in the Thursday issue of the pan-Arab newspaper Asharq Alawsat, which is close to the Saudi royal family and published in London.

Some saw the Arab approach in more nuanced terms. Mansoor al-Jamri, editor in chief of the Bahraini newspaper Al Wasat, said he thought it likely that some Arab leaders supported the increase in troops — if for no other reason than to offset Iran's rising influence — but that they would never publicly express such an opinion. "There is a mixed feeling," Mr. Jamri said. "If America is involved more in some way to secure Iraqi politics and secure the situation, I think some Iraqis and some Arab governments will like it."

But there is a deeper pessimism, reflecting a widely held Arab view that the American presence is the source of Iraq's woes.

"Bush's strategy of surging troops is nothing new," said Bassem Alim, a Saudi lawyer and political writer. "He did that last year when he announced an additional 40,000 troops were being sent to Iraq. That didn't do the job, and I don't think that an additional 20,000 troops will do the job either." He added, "Either Bush doesn't understand the situation, or he is blinded by his evangelical beliefs."

Yet an immediate American withdrawal would be deeply troubling in many parts of the Arab world. An Egypt-based Arab diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, so as not to antagonize Americans, put it like this: "The other side of the coin is the immediate departure of American troops will leave such a vacuum in power, it will have two results — Iran will fill the vacuum where it can, and the whole country will explode."

Or, as John Howard, the Australian prime minister and a close ally of Mr. Bush, put it: "You have to understand that if America, the most powerful country in the world, our strongest ally, is defeated in Iraq or retreats in circumstances of defeat in Iraq, that would be the greatest propaganda victory the terrorists could ever win."

Yet Russia bemoaned America's seeming rejection of regional diplomacy. "It seems that the calculation remains the same: to achieve a settlement of the Iraq crisis by force and not to consider proposals to establish a dialogue with Iraq's main groups with the support of all its neighbors, including Syria and Iran," said Mikhail I. Kamynin, the Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman.

In Eastern Europe, the grinding campaign in Iraq has created divisions and splintered support.

DOJ_NMG_0117096

"President Bush's arguments should be understood, because leaving Iraq by Americans would be a tragedy," argued Stefan Niesiolowski, a senator for the left-leaning opposition Civic Platform party in Poland. He argued that the 1,000-odd Polish soldiers serving in Iraq should stay. "It would not be nice if we would say to Americans, 'It's your problem, not ours.' "

But on the Polish right, opinions were less sanguine. Kazimiera Szczuka, a literary critic, said, "Americans should find a way to withdraw honorably from Iraq as soon as possible. Polish troops should not stay there any longer."

In the Czech Republic, there is a sort of unspoken pity for Mr. Bush's predicament and skepticism of his new Iraq plan. "The prospect for success is not large," wrote Adam Cerny, a columnist for Hospodarske Noviny, a Czech business daily. "Why — when similar attempts have not worked earlier — should the same procedure lead to different results today?"

"At the very most," he wrote, "President Bush will not find critics but very cautious partners among other Europeans."

That process has gone much further in Italy, once a staunch ally of President Bush under former Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi.

But in an interview with a French television network on Thursday, Prime Minister Romano Prodi, Mr. Berlusconi's successor, criticized President Bush's new Iraq plan directly. "He should listen to the Baker report and to the American public," Mr. Prodi said.

Gov. Backs Bush's Plan For Iraq (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Bucking the disenchanted views of most Americans about the war, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday that he supports President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

"I think we should give it everything," Schwarzenegger responded when asked in a pre-taped television interview whether he supported Bush's plan to send an additional 21,000 troops. "We should give it everything in order to be victorious."

In the interview to be broadcast Sunday on ABC News' "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," Schwarzenegger said he does not want the U.S. to "pull out of this war as losers." That would be "disastrous" for the Middle East, he said, according to portions of the interview distributed by the network Friday.

Schwarzenegger did break with the president by reiterating his support for a timeline for American troops to withdraw so that the Iraqis fully understand that they have "got to be independent," according to the ABC excerpt.

The comments come as Schwarzenegger has been facing harsh criticism for his plan to place new requirements and fees on employers, hospitals and doctors to pay for a plan that would ensure health coverage for all Californians.

But Schwarzenegger has also drawn a good deal of praise for his new self-definition as a "post-partisan" governor, one who draws on ideas favored by the electorate regardless of where the notions fall in the ideological spectrum.

"I don't try to please the conservatives; I don't try to please the liberals," he said in a part of the interview broadcast by ABC on Friday. "I like to please the people. I'm a public servant. I'm not a politician."

But the governor's position on the war is not in line with the majority of the electorate's views. A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last week found that 12% of those surveyed supported sending more troops and that 85% favored withdrawing.

Of those supporting withdrawal, 15% wanted to do so immediately, 39% favored it over the next 12 months and 31% thought it should be done over as many years as needed.

"This will be a blow to anyone who has hopes that Schwarzenegger is in the center," said Bob Mulholland, who was a senior advisor to Phil Angelides, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger in last year's election.

During the campaign, Angelides tried unsuccessfully to use Californians' antipathy toward Bush against Schwarzenegger because of the Republican governor's support for the president.

Dan Schnur, a GOP consultant, disagreed with Mulholland. "This is what being a post-partisan governor looks like," Schnur said. "He leans left on some things and right on others. For every universal healthcare plan, there's a troop surge. It all balances out in the center."

Dave Gilliard, a Republican consultant who has clashed on occasion with the administration, said he did not think Schwarzenegger made the comments for political purposes.

"I'm not Schwarzenegger's biggest fan, but in this case I don't think there's politics involved," he said. "It's probably a heartfelt position — not a particularly popular one, even with Republicans."

Schwarzenegger, who had campaigned for Bush in 2004, named two Republicans he might support in 2008: former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain of Arizona. He also praised Michael Bloomberg, the Democrat-turned-Republican mayor of New York City, who is said to be considering an independent presidential bid.

"I think that if it's Rudy Giuliani, I think that if it is McCain, he's a terrific candidate, even Bloomberg, all of those guys are terrific," he said.

The Two Vacuums (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

I had the odd and wholly unexpected experience of feeling supportive of a troop increase until I saw the president's speech arguing for it. What a jarring, furtive-seeming thing it was.

Surely the Iraq endeavor and those who've fought in it and put their hopes in it deserve more than collapse, withdrawal and calamity. But...20,000 more troops, who'll start to arrive over the next few months, and we'll press the Iraqi government to be tougher? A young journalist who is generally supportive of the president said, "So this is it? The grand strategy is to repeat a strategy they weren't able to execute the first time they tried it?"

What a dreadful mistake the president made when he stiff-armed the Iraq Study Group report, which had bipartisan membership, an air of mutual party investment, the imprimatur of what remains of or is understood as the American establishment, and was inherently moderate in its proposals: move diplomatically, adjust the way we pursue the mission, realize abrupt withdrawal would yield chaos. There were enough good ideas, anodyne suggestions and blurry recommendations (blurriness is not always bad in foreign affairs -- confusion can buy time!) that I thought the administration would see it as a life raft. Instead they pushed it away. Like the old woman in the flood who took to the roof and implored God to send a boat to save her. A hunk of wood floated by as she prayed with fervor. A busted wooden door floated by as the waters rose and she doubled her prayers. Finally she cried "God, I asked you to save me and you didn't send a boat!" And the voice of God answered: "I sent you a hunk of wood and a door!"

We don't always recognize deliverance when it arrives.

There was something unnerving about the speech, from the jumpy beginning to the stumbles to the sound glitches. A jittery affair, and some dusk hung over it. At the end I suspected the president's aides had instructed him again and again not to strut or have an edge. He perhaps understood that as: Got it -- don't be me. He couldn't do wounded wisdom, but he could repress cocky cowboy. The result was that he seemed not chastened but effaced, not there. It was odd. One couldn't find the personal geography of the speech.

Nothing in it really worked. "I had a sinking feeling," said a conservative journalist afterward. An old Republican hand: "He looked like he was over his head." Of the call for bipartisanship: "A tad late."

John McCain looked pale -- he looked like a ghost among the pillars -- as he gave reaction on Fox from the Capitol. His voice was soft, feathery, like a speaker who'd been knocked flat on the way to the podium. "I'd much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said. I wondered if he was thinking, Once again this man sinks my fortunes. It's South Carolina all over again! Dianne Feinstein seemed grave on CNN. "Oh, my heart fell," she said of the president's proposal. "I was very disappointed by it." She wanted more attention to Mideast peace efforts.

Pat Buchanan on MSNBC warned of what would happen if the U.S. simply withdrew or maintained the status quo: "I think the president's gonna get this last chance, but I think it's the last one." There has been something gallant in the old battler who'd opposed the war taking no pleasure in the current crisis. Democratic foreign affairs veteran Richard Holbrooke on PBS: The speech was "an astonishing event....The president is doubling down on every bad bet." Republican veteran Ken Duberstein: "I found myself watching the speech thinking, 'I want to believe.'" He did not hide his skepticism.

The question that suddenly began to crop up in all the talk after the speech was: What will fill the vacuum if America simply says, "We gave it our best, but the Iraqi people didn't seem to want to cooperate in their freedom, so we will have to leave"? The talk was grim and believable. Ethnic cleansing, religious warfare, geopolitical machinations potentially harmful -- almost certainly harmful, and deeply so -- to America and the West. One argument seems tired and not true. It is that if we leave Iraq, the terrorists of the world will have a safe place in which to gather, coalesce, plan and move. They already have such places, in the Mideast and outside it, and maybe here. Terrorists hide, and the world is full of hiding places.

But there are two vacuums in the Iraq story. The first is the vacuum that would be filled in Iraq if America withdrew tomorrow. The second is the power vacuum that will be created in Washington if the administration is, indeed, collapsing. The Democrats of Capitol Hill will fill that one. And they seem -- and seemed in their statements after the president's speech -- wholly unprepared to fill it, wholly unserious in their thoughts and approach. They seem locked into habits that no longer pertain, and absorbed by the small picture of partisan advancement at the expense of the big picture, which is that the nation is in trouble and needs their help. They are sunk in the superficial.

When Nancy Pelosi showed up at the White House Wednesday to talk with the president it was obvious she'd spent a lot of time thinking about...what to wear. She wrapped herself in a rich red shawl. Dick Morris said it looked like a straitjacket. I thought she looked like a particularly colorful mummy. She complained that the president had not asked for her input as he put together his plan. He should have. But what would she have brought to the table if she'd been asked to it? It is still -- still! -- unclear.

The other night after the speech, Rahm Emanuel, on PBS, was pressed for what he would have the president do. He blinked as if the question were a diversion. He was there to say Bush is Bad. Why bother with what might be good?

Right now, in the deepest levels of the American government, intelligence and military planners should be ordered to draw up serious plans for an American withdrawal, and serious strategies for dealing with the realities withdrawal will bring. It would not be the worst thing if the Maliki government knew those plans were being drawn up. It might concentrate the mind.

What is paramount is a hard, cold-eyed and even brutal look at America's interests. We have them. I'm not sure they've been given sufficient attention the past few years. In fact, I am sorry to say I believe they have not.

Therapy For Nation Builders (WP)

By Henry Allen

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Here's an idea to play with:

Give it to him, give the president everything he wants for the war in Iraq. Money, troops, the support of Congress, all of it.

Give everything that's requested by everybody in the military-industrial-political-intellectual-media complex, or at least the ones who got us into this war and still think they can get us out of it with a win.

For one thing, there's always a chance, however slight, that they will. That would be nice indeed.

After all, our vision for Iraq is way nicer than our enemies' alternatives. South Vietnam would be better off, too, if we'd won. It's nice to think that if we'd achieved our goals in Cuba, instead of the Bay of Pigs fiasco, or in Somalia instead of the "Black Hawk Down" embarrassment, or Lebanon instead of the barracks-bombing catastrophe, they'd be better off, too.

A loss in Korea would have been far worse than the stalemate we settled for.

Right now, a nice outcome seems unlikely in Iraq.

But then, the proposal on the table here, a sort of thought experiment, addresses a problem that is a lot bigger than Iraq.

The problem, if we lose in Iraq, is that America is apt to keep on doing what it's been doing for decades when it loses, which is to say learn nothing and have years of hissy fits about who's to blame. And set itself up for another fiasco someplace else.

We have had successes: the liberation of Kuwait and our intervention in the Balkans. And, most important of all, we won the Cold War without ever having to match armies and nuclear arsenals with the Soviet Union.

But our combat fiascos are coming to define America both to the world and to itself. They are also demonstrating that we are incapable of winning ground wars against some of the poorest people on Earth, if those wars last more than a week.

After Vietnam, one hoped that we could salvage pride in the courage with which our soldiers fought, and in the knowledge that we had learned our lesson well enough that we would never again send them to die in such a doomed cause.

As we watched our helicopters abandon our terrified allies on the roof of our Saigon embassy, it seemed reasonable to assume that the shame of that moment would lead to a new sanity.

Instead, our failed ground combat interventions and nation building continue like a sort of neurosis, the kind that has been defined as doing the same thing over and over in expectation of a different result, in the manner of France fighting and losing one colonial war after another after World War II.

In America, however, this syndrome is a legacy not of colonialism but of World War II itself -- of a triumphalism of the sort John Kennedy perpetuated when he boasted of being from the generation born of that war, and said that the lesson to be learned was that we should pay any price, bear any burden, to assure the success of liberty.

How good we feel about ourselves, sharing this dream. Without the illusion that we can make it come true, we would be like Britain without its empire, like France without its mission civilatrice, a nation tinged by shabby resentment and existential resignation. The problem is that reality may leave us with nothing better in the end.

As part of our thought experiment, think now of our mind-set as an American sickness, an addiction in the form of a belief.

If it were an addiction, we would create a 12-step program to cure it. The first step would be recognizing that our governing establishment is powerless over it, and that our attitude toward our role in the world has become unmanageable.

Recovering alcoholics will say that they didn't begin their recovery until they "hit bottom." It turns out that it was a mistake to believe we hit bottom while watching those helicopters in 1975, or any of the smaller failures that have followed. And so, the proposal here is to make sure that this time we hit bottom hard enough to prove to ourselves once and for all that the very nation-building that George W. Bush swore off before the 2000 election still has him -- and, more important, us -- helpless in its grip.

On the other hand, maybe if we give the president everything he wants he'll turn this thing around. How nice. Then we can be off to invade Iran, barrel across the DMZ into North Korea, liberate Tibet . . .

From Dr. King, A Reminder On Iraq (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Forty years ago, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., whom the nation will honor on Monday, took to the pulpit of Riverside Church in New York City at a meeting organized by Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam. The date was April 4, 1967, one year before his assassination in Memphis.

King said he was in New York because his conscience had left him no choice. In his speech, "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence," King declared: "That time has come for us in relation to Vietnam."

King acknowledged the reluctance of some people to speak out on Vietnam -- the same hesitation some Americans may have today over voicing their concerns about Iraq. People, he explained, "do not easily assume the task of opposing their government's policy, especially in time of war."

But King concluded that too much was at stake. He and the other religious and lay leaders were moved by what the conflict in Vietnam was doing to the United States. Vietnam, King said, was consuming American troops and money like "some demonic, destructive suction tube" even as that war was laying waste to the Vietnamese people and to America's standing in the world.

And on this Martin Luther King Jr. Day, in 2007?

More than 3,000 Americans have been killed in Iraq, while 22,000 others have been wounded. Billions of dollars that could have been invested here at home have been spent there, a lot of it wasted, some of it stolen, plenty of it unaccounted for. And Iraqis in Baghdad, who cowered for decades under a brutal dictator, have been living in the midst of violence almost continuously since Saddam Hussein was deposed.

"We are creating enemies faster than we can kill them" read a bumper sticker in Washington this week.

Now enter George W. Bush -- the president who got America into this debacle through a series of misjudgments that would make Alfred E. Neuman look brilliant. This week Bush announced plans to plop down thousands of additional troops in the middle of a sectarian war and to shell out billions of additional dollars to pacify a war-weary Iraqi population that, truth be told, wants America gone.

Why trust this administration?

Contrary to what Bush and his allies said:

-- There were no weapons of mass destruction poised to strike America and her allies.

-- A quick defeat of Hussein did not lead to chocolates and flowers in the streets of Baghdad.

-- An American invasion did not produce a unified, nonsectarian and Western-oriented Iraq or spark a desire for U.S.-style governance throughout the Arab world.

-- De-Baathification and the imposition of a market economy at gunpoint did not usher in a period of tranquility or the flowering of capitalism.

The Bush administration struck first because it had the power to strike and the arrogance to think, foolishly, that it could win and dominate the conquered on the cheap.

King spoke in '67 about "the Western arrogance of feeling that it has everything to teach others and nothing to learn from them." Witness the Bush team in Iraq.

Today they have a bloodbath on their hands to show for their labors, and Iran is on the verge of getting an Iraqi neighbor beyond its wildest dreams.

Yet even now, neoconservatives inside and outside of government are counseling Bush to remain in Iraq for years to prevent the Shiite-dominated regime from collapsing. They also are encouraging him to prepare for battle with Iran and Syria if those countries start meddling in Iraq -- as if they aren't now. With what exactly and for how long we are supposed to do battle with Tehran and Damascus, the militaristic neocon noncombatants in Washington don't say. But then again, they have a tolerance for risk and cost that exceeds that of those who actually do the fighting and dying.

Forty years ago at Riverside Church, people of conscience declared that "a time comes when silence is betrayal." They went beyond using their voices and votes when they agreed to break their silence. They responded, as King had urged, by matching their words with actions. "We are at the moment when our lives must be placed on the line if our nation is to survive its own folly. Every man of humane convictions must decide on the protest that best suits his convictions, but we must all protest," King preached that day.

Yes, this is a different time and a different world. Global terrorism is a sobering reality. And America is on the right side in that war. To not fight back is tantamount to indulging a death wish.

DOJ_NMG_0117100

But the first blow in Iraq, which was not a battleground for terrorism, was struck by Bush. He now, stubbornly and in the face of legitimate opposition, proposes to make matters worse.

Remember King and the words: "A time comes when silence is betrayal."

Bush Authorized Iranians' Arrest In Iraq, Rice Says (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A recent series of American raids against Iranians in Iraq was authorized under an order that President Bush decided to issue several months ago to undertake a broad military offensive against Iranian operatives in the country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday.

"There has been a decision to go after these networks," Ms. Rice said in an interview with The New York Times in her office on Friday afternoon, before leaving on a trip to the Middle East.

Ms. Rice said Mr. Bush had acted "after a period of time in which we saw increasing activity" among Iranians in Iraq, "and increasing lethality in what they were producing." She was referring to what American military officials say is evidence that many of the most sophisticated improvised explosive devices, or I.E.D.'s, being used against American troops were made in Iran.

Ms. Rice was vague on the question of when Mr. Bush issued the order, but said his decision grew out of questions that the president and members of his National Security Council raised in the fall.

The administration has long accused Iran of meddling in Iraq, providing weapons and training to Shiite forces with the idea of keeping the United States bogged down in the war. Ms. Rice's willingness to discuss the issue seemed to reflect a new hostility to Iran that was first evident in Mr. Bush's speech to the nation on Wednesday night, in which he accused Tehran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond.

Until now, despite a series of raids in which Iranians have been seized by American forces in Baghdad and other cities in Iraq, administration officials have declined to say whether Mr. Bush ordered such actions.

The White House decision to authorize the aggressive steps against Iranians in Iraq appears to formalize the American effort to contain Iran's ambitions as a new front in the Iraq war. Administration officials now describe Iran as the single greatest threat the United States faces in the Middle East, though some administration critics regard the talk about Iran as a diversion, one intended to shift attention away from the spiraling chaos in Iraq.

In adopting a more confrontational approach toward Iran, Mr. Bush has decisively rejected recommendations of the Iraq Study Group that he explore negotiations with Tehran as part of a new strategy to help quell the sectarian violence in Iraq.

In the interview on Friday, Ms. Rice described the military effort against Iranians in Iraq as a defensive "force protection mission," but said it was also motivated by concerns that Iran was trying to further destabilize the country.

Mr. Bush's public warning to Iran was accompanied by the deployment of an additional aircraft carrier off Iran's coast and advanced Patriot antimissile defense systems in Persian Gulf countries near Iran's borders. Both the White House and the secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, insisted Friday that the United States was not seeking to goad Iran into conflict, and that it had no intention of taking the battle into Iranian territory. The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, warned reporters away from "an urban legend that's going around" that Mr. Bush was "trying to prepare the way for war" with Iran or Syria.

Mr. Gates said that the United States did not intend to engage in hot pursuit of the operatives into Iran.

"We believe that we can interrupt these networks that are providing support, through actions inside the territory of Iraq, that there is no need to attack targets in Iran itself," Mr. Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "I continue to believe what I told you at the confirmation hearing," he added, referring to last month's hearings on his nomination, "that any kind of military action inside Iran itself would be a very last resort."

Ms. Rice's comments came just a day after the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, issued a sharp warning to the administration about the recent raids against Iranians in Iraq, including one in Erbil early Thursday.

He said the vote to authorize the president to order the use of force to topple Saddam Hussein was not a vehicle for mounting attacks in Iran, even to pursue cells or networks assisting insurgents or sectarian militias. "I just want the record to show — and I would like to have a legal response from the State Department if they think they have authority to pursue networks or anything else across the border into Iran and Iraq — that will generate a constitutional confrontation here in the Senate, I predict to you," Mr. Biden said.

In the view of American officials, Iran is engaged in a policy of "managed chaos" in Iraq. Its presumed goal, both policymakers and intelligence officials say, is to raise the cost to the United States for its intervention in Iraq, in hopes of teaching Washington a painful lesson about the perils of engaging in regime change.

DOJ_NMG_0117101

Toward this end, American officials charge, Iran has provided components, including explosives and infrared triggering devices, for sophisticated roadside bombs that are designed to penetrate armor. They have also provided training for several thousand Shiite militia fighters, mostly in Iran. Officials say the training is carried out by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards and the Ministry of Intelligence and Security.

In the interview on Friday, Ms. Rice said, “We think they are providing help to the militias as well, and maybe even the more violent element of these militias.”

In addition, American officials say the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Quds Force is active in Iraq. A senior military official said last week that one of the Iranians seized in Baghdad late last month was the No. 3 Quds official. He said American forces uncovered maps of neighborhoods in Baghdad in which Sunnis could be evicted, and evidence of involvement in the war during the summer in Lebanon.

That Iranian official was ordered released, by Ms. Rice among others, after Iran claimed he had diplomatic status.

This week, American forces in Iraq conducted at least two raids against suspected Iranian operatives, including the raid in Erbil. The United States is currently detaining several individuals with Iranian passports who were picked up in those raids. The Iranians have said that they were in the process of establishing a consulate, but American officials said that the Erbil operation was a liaison office and that the workers there did not have diplomatic passports.

A defense official said Friday that such raids would continue. “We are going to be more aggressive,” he said, referring to the suspected Iranian operatives. “We are going to look for them and to try to do what we can to get them into custody.”

Rice Denies US "Escalating Iraq" (BBC)

BBC.com, January 12, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has denied that the US intends to escalate the war in Iraq by confronting Iranian groups operating there.

Ms Rice backed a pledge by President Bush to run search and destroy missions against groups suspected of building bombs for use within Iraq.

"That's not an escalation, that's good policy," Ms Rice told the BBC.

Ms Rice spoke ahead of a visit to the Middle East, a visit that will focus on Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

The week-long tour will take in Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, as well as Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Crosshead here

Speaking before leaving the US, Ms Rice insisted that the United States was not going to let either Iran or Syria continue activities that endangered US soldiers in Iraq.

"I don't think there is a government in the world that would sit by and let the Iranians in particular run networks inside Iraq that are building explosive devices of a very high quality that are being used to kill their soldiers.

"That's not an escalation, that's just good policy."

Earlier this week the US raided the Iranian consulate in Irbil, northern Iraq, detaining five people.

Both President George W Bush and Ms Rice have said this week that they intend to step up measures against those threatening to destabilise Iraq.

The president announced 21,500 extra troops for Iraq in an effort to dampen violence across the country, especially in the capital, Baghdad.

Last year an influential report led by former Secretary of State James Baker urged the Bush administration to begin negotiations with Iran and Syria in a bid to find a solution in Iraq.

Reasonable voices

As well as Iraq, Ms Rice will also discuss the Israel-Palestinian conflict during her stay in the Middle East.

However, she admitted she was not travelling to the region with a plan to end the conflict.

"I think anything that is an American plan is bound to fail," she said.

"The United States is not going to succeed in this alone. This has to have an Arab voice - Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia.

"It certainly has to have the voice of the reasonable factions among the Palestinians, like Abu Mazen [Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas]. And it has to have an Israeli voice."

White House Softens Iran Tone (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117102

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration sought to assure lawmakers and the public Friday that despite harsh new rhetoric, it did not intend to go to war with Iran, even as U.S. sources charged that Iranians captured in Irbil, Iraq, were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards.

President Bush accused Iran in a speech this week of helping launch attacks against U.S. troops in Iraq. His remarks were followed by combative comments from his top war advisors, new moves by U.S. naval forces and a raid Thursday in the Kurdish-controlled city of Irbil.

The administration moved Friday to defuse concerns that it was planning or inviting a confrontation with Tehran. At a news conference, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed as an "urban legend" suggestions that the United States was preparing for another war. Similar denials were issued by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But other U.S. officials pressed the case that the Islamic Republic was helping foment violence in neighboring Iraq.

One Western official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, charged that the Iranians captured in Irbil were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards and were suspected of involvement in bomb smuggling.

The raid followed another U.S. operation last month in Baghdad that netted several high-level members of the Quds Force, an elite intelligence and special operations group within the Revolutionary Guards, who were involved in transferring Iranian explosives to Shiite militias in Iraq, the source said.

Iraqi officials say the building raided Thursday was a long-standing Iranian liaison office. The Kurdistan government said it was a consulate and called for the U.S. to immediately release the detainees, who it said were protected by the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.

But Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. Army spokesman, said that it was not an accredited consulate and that the officials did not identify themselves as diplomats or have diplomatic credentials when detained. Although witnesses reported gunfire, Garver said the soldiers used only nonlethal concussion grenades to force the Iranians from the building. They surrendered without incident, he said.

"The operation was conducted without a single shot," Garver said.

He declined to say where in Iraq the Iranians were being held.

U.S. officials said both raids were intended to disrupt Iranian interference in Iraq. The Revolutionary Guards have been linked to transfers of Iranian-made bombs that are designed to focus a cone of concussive force so powerful that it can punch through a tank.

Increasing numbers of U.S. troops in Iraq are being killed by the bombs, particularly in Diyala, Kirkuk, Baghdad and other areas where Shiite militias have a strong presence, commanders say.

U.S. officials believe the Quds Force is in control of elements of two powerful Shiite paramilitary organizations, the Badr Brigade and the Al Mahdi army.

In his national address Wednesday, Bush accused Iran of providing "material support" for attacks against U.S. troops. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," he said. "We'll interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

His comments were part of his new strategy on Iraq, a plan to add 21,500 U.S. troops that was unveiled to widespread opposition. He announced he was moving a second aircraft carrier group into the Persian Gulf and pledged to stop the attacks and Iranian support for insurgents in Iraq. Military officials also had announced plans to send Patriot missile batteries to the gulf region.

At a hearing Thursday in Washington, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice whether Bush "has plans to cross the Syrian and-or Iranian border."

Rice did not answer directly. "Obviously, the president isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq," she told Biden.

Speaking to reporters Friday on her plane at the beginning of a trip to the Middle East and Europe, Rice said Friday that the United States would find ways to "adjust over time" to any difficulties in its new plan for Iraq.

Aides said during a fuel stop in Shannon, Ireland, that the raids against Iranian targets were not separately authorized by the president but were authorized under a decision made several months ago about how to approach Iranian influence in Iraq.

Congress showed concern over what could happen.

"Now we see the specter of a new war front in Iran," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.).

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) said an administration move against Iran would be reminiscent of the secretive U.S. incursion into Cambodia in 1970 under the Nixon administration.

After the criticism, Snow tried to temper the administration's rhetoric by emphasizing that war preparations were not underway for Iran or Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0117103

At a meeting Friday of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) evoked Vietnam and again asked whether U.S. forces intended to cross into Iran in pursuit of the Iranian networks.

Gates and Pace said U.S. military forces in Iraq would not enter Iranian territory.

But both Gates and Pace emphasized that they believed Iranians were responsible for the deaths of American troops.

Iraq FM Defends Detained Iranians (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Five Iranians detained by U.S.-led forces were working in a decade-old government liaison office that was in the process of being upgraded to a consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said Friday.

But Deputy U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington that the U.S.-led forces entered the building because information linked it to Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

Tehran condemned the raid in the Kurdish-controlled northern city of Irbil and urged Iraq to push for the Iranians' release.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said the building where the Iranians were detained Thursday had operated with Iraqi government approval for 10 years.

"We are now in the process of changing these offices to consulates," he said. "It is not a new office. This liaison office has been there for a long time."

He also echoed concerns the U.S. and Iran were dragging Iraq into their fight.

"We don't want Iraq to be a battleground for settling scores with other countries," Zebari, a Kurd, told CNN.

The diplomatic tussle came at an unwelcome time for the United States as President Bush faces criticism over his new strategy for ending the violence in Iraq. Bush also vowed to isolate Iran and Syria, which the U.S. has accused of fueling attacks in Iraq.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani plans a trip to Syria on Sunday, the highest-level Iraqi visit to the country in more than 24 years. The neighbors restored diplomatic relations in December that were cut in 1982 amid ideological disputes between Damascus and the regime of Saddam Hussein.

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's office, meanwhile, rejected Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq as part of an effort to curb sectarian attacks.

"We reject Bush's new strategy and we think it will fail," said Abdul-Razzaq al-Nidawi, a senior official in al-Sadr's office. He said Iraq's problems were due to the presence of U.S. troops and called for their withdrawal.

Local leaders of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, which has been blamed for much of the sectarian violence, said they were bracing for an attack and avoiding appearing in public with their weapons.

Zebari's Iranian counterpart, Manouchehr Mottaki, called on the Iraqi government to secure the release of the five Iranians, Iranian state television reported. "Such illegal and adventurous acts by the U.S. should be stopped," the broadcast quoted Mottaki as saying.

Mottaki condemned the raid, saying it contravened the Vienna Convention. "This behavior by the United States contradicts its claims of providing security in Iraq," he was quoted as saying.

Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin also harshly criticized the detentions, calling them a "flagrant violation" of international conventions.

"It's absolutely unacceptable when the military storms a foreign consular office on the territory of another state," Kamynin said. "The unlawful actions by the U.S. servicemen mark an open abuse of a mandate issued to the multinational forces in Iraq."

The 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations says consular premises are "inviolable," but it was not clear how that would apply as the building was not a consulate.

Casey said there was no truth to reports that Iran was carrying out legitimate diplomatic activity at the site.

"It did not have the standing of a consulate nor did it have any other international diplomatic standing to speak of," Casey said.

He said the Iranian elements included Revolutionary Guards, a key part of armed support for Iran's Islamic government since it took power in 1979.'

Zebari also said U.S. forces tried to seize more people at the airport in Irbil, 220 miles north of Baghdad, prompting a confrontation with Kurdish troops.

A Pentagon official in Washington said that after troops detained the Iranians, they learned another person might have escaped and fled to the airport. An American team went to the airport, where they "surprised" Kurdish forces, who apparently had not been informed they were coming, said the Defense Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about the incident.

Meanwhile, sectarian violence persisted. Suspected Shiite militiamen attacked a Sunni mosque in a religiously mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, prompting clashes that wounded two guards, police said.

Attackers later blew up a Shiite mosque that was under construction in the northern city of Kirkuk, police Col. Anwar Hassan said. No casualties were reported.

At least 19 people were reported killed or dead nationwide, including 10 bullet-riddled bodies found in Baghdad and an Iraqi journalist who was killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Mosul.

Khudr Younis al-Obaidi was the second journalist killed this year. Associated Press staffer Ahmed Hadi Naji was found shot in the back last week.

A Risky Game Of Risk (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

I feel good about the new war with Iran.

How can you not have confidence in the crackerjack team that brought you Operation Iraqi Freedom, which foundered and led to Operation Together Forward, which stumbled and led to Operation Together Forward II, which collapsed and was replaced by The New Way Forward, the Surge now being launched even though nobody's together and everything's going backward?

I say, bring it on. If a pre-emptive war in Iraq doesn't work, why not try a pre-emptive war on Iran in Iraq?

Although Tony Snow dismissed the idea of war with Iran as an "urban legend" yesterday, Condi Rice revealed to New York Times reporters that President Bush acted months ago to parry Iran's ambitions, issuing orders for a military campaign against the Iranian Revolutionary Guard forces sneaking into Iraq. Using diplomatic passports, the agents have been smuggling in sophisticated bomb-making components and infrared trigger devices, which could be used to blow up American soldiers.

The move against Iran allows the president and Dick Cheney — who was, natch, militating for the Surge — to blow off, once more, the Iraq Study Group and Congress, to push back rather than make up.

James Baker and Lee Hamilton had recommended playing nice with the mad mullahs, which even they acknowledged was a long shot, given that the Bush administration can offer them little except acquiescence in their nuclear weapons program, which is not going to happen.

Joe Biden, the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, warned Condi on Thursday that Mr. Bush did not have the authority to pursue the networks over the border into Iran or Syria. On Friday, Bob Gates assured the Senate Armed Services Committee that the Iranians they target won't be in Iran.

We're trying to stanch a self-inflicted wound: our failed occupation gave Iran the opening in Iraq we're now trying to shut down.

The White House had to admit this week what has been obvious to everybody else for eons, including a list of lame assumptions they embraced during the first few years of the occupation: "Majority of Iraqis will support the coalition and Iraqi efforts to build a democratic state" has now been supplanted by "Iraqis increasingly disillusioned with coalition efforts."

It's a remarkable moment, W. standing nearly alone, deserted by more and more Republicans, generals and Americans, risking it all on a weak reed like Prime Minister Maliki.

It's impossible to know what W. was really thinking as he stiffly delivered his fantasy scheme in the White House library. The whole capital was fraught, but the president may simply have been musing to himself: "I'm hungry ... I wonder what time the game starts on ESPN? ...Has anybody read all these books?"

W. always acts like he's upping the ante in a board game where you roll the dice and bet your plastic army divisions on the outcome. This doesn't surprise some of his old classmates at Yale, who remember Junior as the riskiest Risk player of them all, known for dropping by the rooms of friends, especially when they were trying to study for exams, for extended bouts of "The Game of Global Domination."

Junior was known as an extremely aggressive player in the venerable Parker Brothers board game, a brutal contest that requires bluster and bluffing as you invade countries, all the while betraying alliances. Notably, it's almost impossible to win Risk and conquer the world if you start the game in the Middle East, because you're surrounded by enemies.

His gamesmanship extended to sports — he loved going into overtime and demanding that points be played over because he wasn't quite ready.

As Graydon Carter recollects in the new Vanity Fair, Gail Sheehy wrote an article for the magazine about W. that made this point: "Even if he loses, his friends say, he doesn't lose. He'll just change the score, or change the rules, or make his opponent play until he can beat him."

DOJ_NMG_0117105

W.'s best friend when he was a teenager in Houston, Doug Hannah, told Ms. Sheehy: "If you were playing basketball and you were playing to 11 and he was down, you went to 15."

Even if it was clear who was winning, W. wanted to go further to see what would happen. It was a technique that worked well in Tallahassee in 2000, but not so well in Tikrit.

Word is that even as they Surge, the Bush team is already working on Plan C, or as they will no doubt call it, The New, New Way Forward II.

Iraqi Leader Goes Own Way To Fill Top Post (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has filled the top military job in Baghdad with a virtually unknown officer chosen over the objections of U.S. and Iraqi military commanders, officials from both governments said.

Iraqi political figures said Friday that Maliki also had failed to consult the leaders of other political factions before announcing the appointment of Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar.

The appointment is highly significant because it is Maliki's first public move after President Bush's announcement that he was sending more troops to Iraq. The prime mission of those troops is to reduce violence in Baghdad, much of which is blamed on sectarian fighters.

As the Iraqi commander for the capital, Qanbar would play a central role in that campaign, and any ties he might have to sectarian groups could undermine the new U.S. effort.

In his speech Wednesday, in which he announced the troop increase, Bush said political and sectarian interference in security matters would no longer be tolerated.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people," Bush said. "The prime minister understands this."

Maliki's decision to push through his own choice for one of the country's most sensitive military posts — and to reject another officer who was considered more qualified by the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey — has renewed questions about the prime minister's intentions.

"It's a delicate situation," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker who questioned the choice of Qanbar. "It's very dangerous if it turns out that he has affiliations," he said, naming Maliki's political party and the anti-American Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr.

U.S. officials are skeptical of Qanbar not only because of the way he was named, but because they know little about him. Moreover, they have questioned the degree to which Maliki's government is reliant on sectarian figures, particularly Sadr. Maliki essentially is asking American officials to take Qanbar on trust at a time when they have little left.

Qanbar, a commander in the navy during Saddam Hussein's reign, has not worked with American military officials, who say they know little about him other than that he hails from Amarah, a city in Iraq's Shiite-dominated south, and that he was taken prisoner by American forces near Kuwait during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

U.S. commanders have said that officials in Maliki's government have intervened several times to block them from combating Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, which is accused of being behind much of the bloodshed in Baghdad. When U.S. forces did raid the militia's stronghold of Sadr City, a largely Shiite neighborhood of east Baghdad, Maliki's government publicly criticized them. On several occasions, Maliki ordered the release of suspected militiamen captured there, frustrating U.S. commanders.

The appointment of Qanbar comes as the U.S. military is debating whether to attack Sadr City. As the Iraqi commander, Qanbar could have advance knowledge of U.S. operations. He would command 18 brigades of Iraqi forces that are supposed to be deployed to work with the Americans.

U.S. officials have said the decision on whether to move into Sadr City will be left to the Iraqi government. Privately, senior military officials say that new rules of engagement negotiated with the Iraqis would allow them to go into the neighborhood and target individual insurgent and militia leaders.

At least some Pentagon planners appear to relish the opportunity to target the Al Mahdi militia.

"This time we have a commitment from Maliki and other key players in the Iraqi government … to have a no-holds-barred arrangement for neighborhoods in Baghdad," said a senior military official who requested anonymity in order to freely discuss military planning. Sadr City "will not be a safe haven" for militias, he said.

Within the Pentagon, not everyone agrees that attacking Sadr City is advisable.

Crucial to the decision will be the incoming U.S. commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus. He has not commented on the tactics he plans to pursue, but for the last two years he has overseen the development of the military's new counterinsurgency field manual, which appears to argue against a large-scale invasion of a neighborhood such as Sadr City, particularly in the early part of the new Baghdad security campaign.

The manual's first chapter, which Petraeus is known to have aggressively rewritten, advises commanders that though largescale offensives against insurgents may be necessary, they should be limited.

"Killing every insurgent is normally impossible," the manual says. "Attempting to do so can be counterproductive in some cases; it risks generating popular resentment, creating martyrs that motivate new recruits, and producing cycles of revenge."

An influential plan for Baghdad security drawn up by retired Army Gen. Jack Keane and military analyst Frederick Kagan strongly advised against moving into Sadr City. The plan, which was highly influential within the White House and is considered to mirror Petraeus' thinking, argued that an attack on Sadr City would unite now-splintered Shiite factions against U.S. forces.

"We have an opportunity now to keep the Shiite parties separate and to avoid a full-scale military conflict with them," Kagan said. "If we go into Sadr City, that will not be the case. We will find ourselves in a full-scale, very bloody operation, which probably will look something like Fallouja."

There is even more division over whether to target Sadr himself.

Senior military officials refused to discuss which insurgents and militia commanders might be in the crosshairs. They have been vague about whether Sadr could be detained or killed.

"The people we target are not fundamentally political leaders," said the senior military official. "We're targeting people who are directly involved with promoting violence either against our Iraqi partners or, in some instances, against us."

To quell the concerns U.S. commanders have about Qanbar, American officials and the Iraqi government have agreed on a complicated system in which another layer would be added to the command structure between Maliki and Qanbar. That layer would include the top U.S. commander, a high-ranking American official said.

But that decision did not appease Iraqi politicians who object that they were not consulted on Qanbar's appointment.

"Nobody asked us," said Adnan Dulaimi, a lawmaker with a main Sunni bloc. "This is the first I've heard."

Battling With Sadr For Iraqi Soldiers' Hearts (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The Iraqi soldiers broke into chants to commemorate the 86th anniversary of the creation of their army.

"Muhammad, Haider, Fatima, Hasan and Husayn!" shouted a group of dancing soldiers, bellowing the names of the prophet and other long-dead Islamic icons revered by Shiite Muslims.

A second later, the name of a living Shiite figure came out of the din. "Moqtada! Moqtada!" one soldier exclaimed, invoking the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric and leader of the Mahdi Army militia that American officials blame for many of the worst acts of violence in Baghdad.

Standing quietly in the crowd were four U.S. Army officers, there to represent the team of American soldiers advising the Iraqis. "Sounds like the Mahdi militia is in the tent," said their interpreter, Mohammed Noshi.

Moments before the chanting began, at a rally last Saturday morning at the soldiers' shared base in eastern Baghdad, a brigade commander in the Iraqi army's 6th Division had called the troops the "hope of this country."

"Some people are trying to create sectarian violence to divide this country," said the colonel, who asked that his name not be published out of fear for his life. "It is our job to keep this country in one piece."

At best, said several U.S. soldiers interviewed at the base this month, some of the Iraqi troops they advise are sympathetic to Sadr and his army. At worst, they said, some are members of the militia, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi. Despite the uneasiness of the alliance, 100 U.S. troops and 500 Iraqi soldiers have conducted joint raids and shared a base on the eastern side of the Tigris River, once a mixed area that is becoming predominantly Shiite.

Training Iraq's police and army to the point where they can operate on their own is key to any reduction of U.S. forces, American commanders have said. Five thousand U.S. troops are already embedded with Iraqi units as advisers.

U.S. military officers say that the Iraqi police force is deeply infiltrated by militiamen and predict that the army will be quicker to operate independently. But a four-day visit to the base known as Old MOD, for the former Ministry of Defense complex, showed that the army is not immune to the militias' influence. According to the Americans, most of the Iraqi soldiers are Shiites, and some come from Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum that is a Mahdi Army stronghold. Some carry pictures of Sadr.

"Does it mean that they're Jaish al-Mahdi? No," said Lt. Col. Edward Taylor, head of the U.S. military transition team, which is attached to the 2nd Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade, based at Fort Carson, Colo.

The U.S. military would not let a reporter interview the Iraqi soldiers. But during a meeting with Taylor, the Iraqi brigade commander responded to a question about the presence of militias in his unit. "It's just rumor," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0117107

Taylor said that despite sectarianism in the army, many of the soldiers are making progress. They no longer show up in mismatched uniforms or turn to the Americans to make every decision, he said. Now they plan their own missions.

"I think we're definitely pushing these guys in the right direction to get to the point where they'll take over," said Capt. Peter Mahmood, 36, of Colorado Springs, who is on his third tour in Iraq.

During a recent house-to-house search in the mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Adhamiyah, Taylor and his crew followed Iraqi soldiers as they banged on doors and hunted for weapons caches. At times, the Iraqis appeared disorganized, gathering in large numbers in one spot on a street known to have snipers or taking breaks to buy bread. But they survived two gunfights with no casualties, rescued three kidnapping victims, found a large weapons cache and detained possible foreign fighters.

"They know what they want to do. They have a vision. They have a plan," Taylor said.

There are also signs that Iraqi commanders are willing to attack Shiites as well as Sunnis. At a staff meeting last Saturday morning, the Iraqi colonel suggested to his deputies that they consider conducting operations in Sadr City.

On the base, the two armies have separate living quarters and dining facilities, for security reasons. The Americans scrutinize the Iraqis' missions to make sure they are not targeting Sunnis more than Shiites. In addition, the Americans say, they suspect that some members of the Iraqi army have leaked information about raids.

"I have to operate under the assumption that within this unit there are people loyal to Jaish al-Mahdi and actively working for Jaish al-Mahdi," Taylor said. "I have to make that assumption so I have the proper security measures in place to protect my soldiers."

Sitting in his room on the base, Capt. James Ojeda, 32, of Logan, W.Va., a newlywed who hopes to quit the Army soon, gestured out his door toward the building where the Iraqi soldiers live. "You never know who's a bad guy over there," he said.

That sentiment is a window onto the complexity of the conflict: Taylor's soldiers said it is often unclear who the enemy is.

"One minute your neighbor is waving at you. The next minute he's got a mask on and telling you to get in a car," said Pfc. Kyle Buckingham, 20, of Marion, Ohio, describing the kidnappings that have become common in Baghdad.

No figure seems more of an enigma to these soldiers than Sadr. His militia battled U.S. forces in the spring and summer of 2004 in the southern holy city of Najaf, then he reinvented himself as a political leader whose loyalists won 30 seats in parliament. In a sign of Sadr's political influence, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who relies on the Shiite cleric for support, has banned most U.S. forces from conducting operations in Sadr City, home to 2.5 million people.

During a visit last week to another Shiite area in eastern Baghdad, known as Fadhil, about a dozen American soldiers walked through an empty square ringed with bullet-riddled buildings. On the wall of a bank was a picture of Sadr walking on an American flag.

"I see pictures of him walking on the American flag. Is that irritating?" Taylor said. "It's irritating, but Sadr is not my enemy. He is not considered a terrorist." Sadr, he added, is "a guy who can be part of the government or considered to be someone you want to negotiate with, and at the same time he has his hands in things you want to stamp out."

Ojeda put it more bluntly: "He's just another terrorist leader. He's just another bad guy."

Sgt. 1st Class Eric Radecki, 36, of Sacramento, a father of two who fought in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, said he believes that U.S. leaders have to engage in talks with Sadr.

"He's not some sort of Osama bin Laden sitting in a cave in Afghanistan," Radecki said. "He goes to parliament."

Some of the soldiers said they were frustrated that Sadr City, which is about 1 1/2 miles from their base, is off-limits.

"Personally, I feel we should be there," Buckingham said. "That's the root of where everything is coming from. That's the bad of Baghdad."

As the war approaches its fifth year and the death toll mounts, some of the troops said they wonder whether it was a good idea for the United States to overthrow Iraq's government.

"I don't really know all the thought processes behind invading the country," said Capt. Sean Powell, 30, of Fort Carson. "I knew it was going to be longer than what they said, though. I knew it was going to take long because you don't topple a government and the country rebounds within two weeks."

Sgt. 1st class Matt MacClellan, 37, a father of two who trains another division of Iraqis but lives on Old MOD, said he is not in Iraq to fight the war on terrorism. If anything, he said, the United States spread terrorism by invading Iraq. "Now that we are here, though, it definitely has morphed into the war on terror," he said. "We took over a country that had structure and took that structure away."

The soldiers say they want to leave a stable country but also want to get out alive. "I don't think you can use the word 'winnable,' " MacClellan said. "Really, I've scrubbed that from the vocabulary of my thinking. 'Subdued' would be about the best."

Dismantling An Insurgent Power Base (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

DOJ_NMG_0117108

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

TURKI, IRAQ — U.S. and Iraqi forces have denied Sunni Arab insurgents an important power base in a lawless region east of Baghdad, the commander of a joint offensive said Friday.

The challenge now, U.S. Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said in an interview, is to ensure that the militants do not return to the region in the eastern province of Diyala. When U.S. forces conducted previous large operations, insurgents often returned as soon as the military withdrew.

Poppas plans to open a patrol station in the area, which until recently had been a virtual no-go zone for Iraqi security forces. U.S. soldiers were scouting possible sites Friday as they slopped past adobe farmhouses in bone-chilling rain and ankle-deep mud.

The Iraqi army has dedicated a company to the new patrol station, which will be paired with a U.S. company until it is ready to stand alone, Poppas said. The military also will work with local authorities to improve conditions, including providing clean water, regular electricity and new roads.

Big push

The strategy is part of stepped-up efforts to train Iraqi forces to assume security control so U.S. forces can start going home.

Nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have swept through more than 77 square miles of farmland in the last week, combing isolated hamlets and pushing insurgents toward the canal system outside Turki village, where the advancing forces surrounded them, Poppas said.

Insurgents linked to the powerful Daini tribe, which includes top officers in former President Saddam Hussein's army, had carved a network of hide-outs, fighting positions and weapons caches out of the vast canal system. The area, which U.S. forces said served as a logistics and training base for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups, is strategically located between Baghdad, Baqubah and the Iranian border.

U.S. forces met fierce resistance on their last major sweep through the area in November, but this time the fighting was minimal. Poppas said many men with machine guns were killed in the days before the final push in the canal district.

"We've had continual engagements over the past 72 hours, and although we don't like to do body counts, we've killed over 100 individuals maneuvering against us with weapons," Poppas said as he surveyed the efforts to use Humvees to drag stranded Iraqi army vehicles from the mud. "Those who did survive and escaped will not come back here because they know it is not a safe haven."

Four Iraqi soldiers were killed Sunday by an antitank mine in the area.

Some insurgents probably hid their weapons and blended back into the civilian population. Many more military-age men were seen in Turki and nearby villages than on previous visits, Poppas conceded.

He said heavy rain, which stalled the offensive for two days, worked to his forces' advantage, since they were better-equipped to withstand the elements than were fighters hiding in the canals.

During this time, groups of as many as a dozen insurgents repeatedly approached U.S. positions in an apparent search for a seam through which they could escape, Poppas said. In most cases, U.S. forces called in air or artillery strikes against them. At least 55 others were detained on suspicion of having insurgent ties.

Key arrests

Although some key insurgent leaders remained at large Friday, U.S. forces said they had arrested at least six leading members of the Council, a regional umbrella group that they say draws in elements of Al Qaeda, Ansar al Sunna and the 1920 Revolutionary Army, among others.

The detainees include Mohammed Turki, the Council's alleged financier, and Muthana Abdul Lateef, a lower-ranking member who U.S. forces said had killed his brother and sister when they refused to join the group.

The mission does not end here, Poppas said.

"We're still going 30 kilometers farther south," he said. "There aren't a lot more villages, but there are weapons caches that we are already exploiting to deny them the resources to keep on attacking."

At least 31 weapons caches have been found, including one containing more than 1,000 Katyusha rockets, more than 1,000 rocket-propelled grenades, 171 TOW missiles, army uniforms and gas masks.

By containing the insurgent threat, U.S. forces hope to pave the way for displaced Shiite Muslims to return. Scores fled after a series of mass abductions and slayings last year, blamed on Daini militants.

U.S. forces detained 14 people Friday who were accused by rival Shiite tribesmen of participating in the November abduction of 27 people from a village. Most of the abductees were later found decapitated and shot. The lone survivor told U.S. forces he hid under the bodies of relatives and neighbors and played dead as they were dumped into a canal.

Terrorists "Use Google Maps To Hit UK Troops" (LTEL)

By Thomas Harding

London Telegraph, January 13, 2007

Terrorists attacking British bases in Basra are using aerial footage displayed by the Google Earth internet tool to pinpoint their attacks, say Army intelligence sources.

Documents seized during raids on the homes of insurgents last week uncovered print-outs from photographs taken from Google.

The satellite photographs show in detail the buildings inside the bases and vulnerable areas such as tented accommodation, lavatory blocks and where lightly armoured Land Rovers are parked.

Written on the back of one set of photographs taken of the Shatt al Arab Hotel, headquarters for the 1,000 men of the Staffordshire Regiment battle group, officers found the camp's precise longitude and latitude.

"This is evidence as far as we are concerned for planning terrorist attacks," said an intelligence officer with the Royal Green Jackets battle group. "Who would otherwise have Google Earth imagery of one of our bases?

"We are concerned that they use them to plan attacks. We have never had proof that they have deliberately targeted any area of the camp using these images but presumably they are of great use to them.

"We believe they use Google Earth to identify the most vulnerable areas such as tents."

One soldier has been killed in the past six months following a mortar attack and there have been several injuries.

Since the maps were found intelligence chiefs have been keeping track of where rounds land to see if the insurgents are using them to pinpoint weakly protected areas.

The British camps experience mortar and rocket attacks on a daily basis.

Salvos are fired from up to four miles away and are increasingly accurate.

Yesterday three rounds were fired into Basra Palace at a block close to where The Daily Telegraph was staying. No one was injured.

Intelligence sources also believe that the insurgents are receiving more training and weaponry from Iran to improve their fighting skills. But the British are gathering more intelligence on mortar crews and launching several "strike operations" to detain the operators.

Anyone with the internet can sign up to Google Earth and by simply typing in the name of a location they can receive very detailed imagery down to identifying types of vehicles.

The company is one of several internet outlets that buy aerial imagery, usually taken by aircraft but sometimes by satellite, from governments or mapping companies.

It is unclear how old the maps are but it is believed the Basra images were made within the past two years.

Major Charlie Burbridge, the British military spokesman in Iraq, said: "We take the security of our bases very seriously and we constantly review the means to provide secure accommodation for our soldiers.

"There is a constant threat of reconnaissance missions to access our bases and using these internet images is just another method of how this is conducted."

A Google spokesman said the information could be used for "good and bad" and was available to the public in many forms. "Of course we are always ready to listen to governments' requests," he said.

"We have opened channels with the military in Iraq but we are not prepared to discuss what we have discussed with them. But we do listen and we are sensitive to requests."

There have also been reports that the images are being sold to rogue militias in the market place in Basra.

The British security services are concerned that terrorists will be able to examine in detail sensitive infrastructure such as electricity stations, military basis, and their own headquarters in London.

Soldiers from the Royal Green Jackets based at the Basra Palace base said they had considered suing Google Earth if they were injured by mortar rounds that had been directed on the camp by the aerial footage.

"Even if they did blank out the areas where we are based it is a bit after the horse has bolted as the terrorist now have the maps and know exactly where we eat, sleep and go to the toilet," one soldier said.

Rice Criticizes Sen. Boxer's Comment On War (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday criticized Sen. Barbara Boxer's suggestion that, because she does not have family in harm's way, she will pay no "personal price" in the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0117110

"In retrospect, gee, I thought single women had come further than that, that the only question is, 'Are you making good decisions because you have kids?' " Rice said on Fox News.

Boxer's comment came during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing Thursday, in which Rice was grilled on President Bush's new war strategy in Iraq.

"Who pays the price?" Boxer (D-Calif.) asked Rice, who is unmarried and has no children. "I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old, and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with immediate family. So who pays the price? The American military and their families."

Boxer defended herself in a statement. "I spoke the truth at the committee hearing, which is that neither Secretary Rice nor I have family members that will pay the price for this escalation," she said.

White House Rips Boxer Over Rice (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The White House and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday accused Democrats of suggesting that the secretary's childlessness, race and sex are to blame for mistakes in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Sen. Barbara Boxer's comments that Miss Rice won't "pay the price" for her decisions in the Iraq war because she is unmarried and without children was a "great leap backward for feminism."

"I don't know if she was intentionally that tacky, but I do think it's outrageous," he told Fox News.

"Here you've got a professional woman, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Barbara Boxer is sort of throwing little jabs because Condi doesn't have children, as if that means that she doesn't understand the concerns of parents."

But Mrs. Boxer and Democrats are making no apologies.

Rep. Neil Abercrombie of Hawaii called Miss Rice "the most overrated, underperforming individual in executive authority that I have ever seen."

"She constantly gets a pass," he told the Honolulu Star Bulletin this week, days before the nation celebrates Martin Luther King Day. "Who knows if the whole question of race and gender come into it, but ... I can't account for it, except to say she isn't up to the mark."

But it was Mrs. Boxer's remarks about Miss Rice that generated the most outrage yesterday.

"Now, the issue is who pays the price, who pays the price?" Mrs. Boxer said to Miss Rice during a Senate Armed Services hearing Thursday. "I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old, and my grandchild is too young."

Then she told Miss Rice: "You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, within immediate family. So, who pays the price? The American military and their families, and I just want to bring us back to that fact."

Miss Rice replied that she does understand the sacrifice Americans and their families are making in Iraq.

"Let me just say, I fully understand the sacrifice that the American people are making, and especially the sacrifice that our soldiers are making, men and women in uniform," she told the committee. "I visit them. I know what they're going through. I talk to their families. I see it."

Mrs. Boxer didn't budge.

"Madam Secretary, please, I know you feel terrible about it," she replied. "That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

Later, Miss Rice said she was confused by the whole exchange, which is hardly the first time Miss Rice and Mrs. Boxer have exchanged sharp words.

"I guess that means I don't have kids. Was that the purpose?" Miss Rice said later on Fox News. "At the time I just found it a bit confusing, frankly, in retrospect, I thought single women had come further than that. The only question is, are you making good decisions because you have kids?"

Mrs. Boxer stood by her questioning of Miss Rice yesterday.

"I spoke the truth at the committee hearing, which is that neither Secretary Rice nor I have family members that will pay the price for this escalation," she said. "My point was to focus attention on our military families who continue to sacrifice because this administration has not developed a political solution to the situation in Iraq."

Passing Exchange Becomes Political Flashpoint (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117111

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — A passing exchange during a Senate hearing on Thursday turned into a political flashpoint overnight as Senator Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice accused one another of insensitivity in comments about motherhood and the war in Iraq.

In an interview with The New York Times on Friday, Ms. Rice suggested that Ms. Boxer had set back feminism by suggesting during the hearing that the childless Ms. Rice had paid no price in the Iraq war.

"I thought it was O.K. to be single," Ms. Rice said. "I thought it was O.K. to not have children, and I thought you could still make good decisions on behalf of the country if you were single and didn't have children."

During the Thursday hearing, Senator Boxer told Ms. Rice: "Who pays the price? I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with an immediate family. So who pays the price? The American military and their families. And I just want to bring us back to that fact."

In an interview on Friday, Senator Boxer said her comments had been misunderstood and were now being turned against her by the White House and by Republicans. "What I was trying to do in this exchange was to find common ground with Condi Rice," she said. "My whole point was to focus on the military families who pay the price."

Senator Boxer added: "I'm saying, she's like me, we do not have families who are in the military. What they are doing is a really tortured way to attack a United States senator who voted against the war."

The exchange between Senator Boxer and Ms. Rice came during a hostile Senate hearing in which Ms. Rice, seeking to sell President Bush's new Iraq plan to a skeptical Congress, faced an almost solid wall of opposition from both Democrats and Republicans. Senator Boxer several times repeated the question, "Who pays the price?"

Senator Boxer read excerpts from a radio interview with an American family who had lost a son in Iraq. "You can't begin to imagine how you celebrate any holiday or birthday," she said. "There's an absence. It's not like the person's never been there. They always were there and now they're not, and you're looking at an empty hole."

Ms. Rice replied, "I can never do anything to replace any of those lost men and women in uniform, or the diplomats, some of whom ——"

Senator Boxer cut her off. "Madam Secretary, please, I know you feel terrible about it. That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

During the hearing itself, Ms. Rice did not appear to take issue with Senator Boxer's comments. During the interview, she addressed them only in response to a question. But the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, suggested earlier on Friday that Senator Boxer's comments were antifeminist.

"I don't know if she was intentionally tacky," Mr. Snow said in an interview on Fox News. "It's a great leap backward for feminism."

A number of members of Congress have children in the military who are serving in Iraq or are likely to do so, including Senators John McCain of Arizona and Jim Webb of Virginia.

Senator Boxer's comments and the claims and counterclaims about what she meant have captivated the blogs and received extensive coverage on Fox News and other cable channels. One blog, called Swampland, labeled it "Womb Wars."

Conservative blogs and commentators were quick to seize on the issue. "One Great Leap (Backwards) for Womankind," read one blog, Bikini Politics. "They will be known by their Fruits," read another, Macsmind, which billed itself as "Conservative News, Commentary and Common Sense." Rush Limbaugh also got into the act. "Here you have a rich white chick with a huge, big mouth, trying to lynch this, an African-American woman, right before Martin Luther King Day, hitting below the ovaries here," Mr. Limbaugh said on his radio show.

Deneen Borelli, a fellow with Project 21, which describes itself as a "leading voice in the African-American community," said, "I am deeply appalled by Senator Barbara Boxer's cruel and callous attack on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice."

"The debate should have been about the war in Iraq and not a platform to demean Secretary Rice," Ms. Borelli said in a statement issued by the organization.

Some Democratic Senate staffers said Senator Boxer's exchange with Ms. Rice allowed the Bush administration to turn the tables on Iraq critics and sidestep the larger issue of the almost uniform opposition to the president's plan to send 20,000 more American soldiers to Iraq.

There was no rush from Democrats to defend Senator Boxer, although one blogger on the Swampland blog called Senator Boxer's comments "fair, as far as it goes." During the interview with the Times, Ms. Rice said she had expected the skepticism that she received from Congress the day before. "I've been through things like this before," she said.

NATO's Afghan Struggle: Build, And Fight Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117112

SPERWAN GHAR, Afghanistan — The road that cuts through the heart of Panjwai district here tells all that is going wrong with NATO's war in Afghanistan.

To fight their way into this area and clear it of Taliban insurgents, NATO troops bulldozed through orchards, smashed down walls and even houses, and churned vineyards and melon fields to dust.

Reconstruction projects were planned, but never materialized. Now NATO countries are championing the thoroughfare as a $5 million gift to local people.

Displaced and buffeted by fighting since May, the Afghans are homeless, fearful and far from being won over. They say the road was built for the troops' benefit and forced on them, at the cost of their land and livelihoods.

"We are compelled to be happy about the road," said Hajji Baran, 48, a farmer from Panjwai. "They are building the road and they are not going to stop, but in fact we are not happy about it. We have been displaced for nine months and no one has asked us how are we managing. This is a kind of cruelty.

"In fact, we are selling our wives' jewelry to support our families."

The conflict over the road is just the most apparent of the many things that Afghans, diplomats and aid workers cite in explaining why NATO's war looks uncertain in southern Afghanistan. Others include what local people see as the indiscriminate killing of civilians by NATO forces, and corruption and incompetence among local officials.

Panjwai and an adjoining district, Zhare, just west of Kandahar, the provincial capital, are considered vital because the Taliban presence there has directly threatened Kandahar, and thus all of southern Afghanistan.

Yet so far not much has gone according to plan.

There has been little coordination between the military operations and reconstruction projects, which has frustrated aid workers and diplomats almost as much as local people.

After NATO troops and United States Special Forces mounted their operation to clear the area of insurgents in September, the assistance programs were not ready. Then the troops pulled back, and the Taliban were active again within days.

"We are all scratching our heads as to why the aid has not rolled out faster," said a Western diplomat familiar with Panjwai. "It's not for a lack of resources. We are meeting basic needs, but when it comes to sustainable livelihoods and jobs, it's not happening."

NATO's struggle to secure the area inevitably hampered reconstruction and deterred the thousands of displaced villagers from returning home. Aid workers who started to venture into the area to kick-start assistance programs complained of continued insecurity and even of coming under fire from NATO forces. The result was that very little assistance arrived.

"There was a lull, and for three weeks they did nothing," said Andrew Douglas, operations manager of an agricultural development group in Afghanistan. "They were going round talking and handing out candy." He did not want his organization named because his comments were personal remarks.

It took a second military operation at the end of the year finally to expel the Taliban. Already on everyone's mind — in the government, the military, the police and among villagers — is how to stop the Taliban from infiltrating back for a new offensive in the spring, which in this southern region will come in February.

Without the support of the local people, that task will be virtually impossible, military and government officials and local elders said.

Now finally villagers are trickling home. Yet the mood is at best resigned.

"They bombed our orchards and fields and we have nothing now," said Hajji Abdul Wahab Kutaisi, 65, a farmer from Pashmul. "They made a road through my land."

His house was destroyed in the fighting and he and his extended family now live in two rented rooms in Kandahar. He said he had not received any compensation.

He was sitting with several other men on the stony ground in the Panjwai district police station waiting for permission from the military to work in his fields, close to a Canadian military checkpoint. "When we don't inform them, they shoot at us," he said. Minutes after he spoke a Canadian tank fired a round from the nearby base, shattering the calm, sunny morning.

"They did not come to bring peace for us, they came to destroy us," said Hajji Abdul Ghafar, 60, an elder on the Sperwan village council, who was waiting for permission to pass through a checkpoint to reach his house. "There are 3,000 families hoping to go back to their houses. If they lose hope, this would be very bad for the government," he warned.

"We are angry with both sides, the foreigners and the Taliban," he added. "It is impossible to talk to the Taliban," he said, shaking his head. "And the foreigners don't listen to anyone."

Sperwan Ghar, the district center of Panjwai, is a quiet, country one-street town, with small shops, two schools and a police station. For the NATO forces here, which are led by Canada, the town, at least, is a success story. By December it was peaceful, commerce had returned, the school was repaired and children were back in class.

DOJ_NMG_0117113

Yet the place looks like a fortified camp, with soldiers and sandbags blocking the street, an armored vehicle parked outside the school, and guard posts on all the hills looking down into everyone's yard. The local police admit the guard posts are not popular because they violate one of the most important codes of behavior for the Pashtun: privacy and respect for their women.

Maj. Stephen Murray, the acting military commander of the Provincial Reconstruction Team, a NATO unit, defended its efforts, saying the team had spent $100,000 in just a few weeks providing jobs for people in the cleanup.

The team members were assessing the battle damage and compensation claims with government officials, and consulting with village councils, he said. Rushing things would leave people out and only aggravate local tensions, he said.

"There are lots of challenges," Major Murray said. "We have to go step by step."

As for the new road, he said the military needed a straight road that was more easily secured. Over the past few months, Canadian troops were repeatedly ambushed on the old road, which twisted and turned through the hamlets and walled farmsteads. He is having intensive discussions with the local people to work out a fair deal for those whose land it crosses, he said.

Yet Pashmul, the village most affected by the road, remains one of the most unsettled areas of the two districts, partly because the population remains divided over whom to support, the Taliban or the foreigners.

The Afghan people will withhold their support until they can see some material assistance, said the development manager, Mr. Douglas. "The Afghans don't trust anyone," he added. "They have seen military coming in all colors before."

Corrupt and ineffective local leaders have done as much to turn people against the government and its foreign backers as have any failings in reconstruction, said Joanna Nathan of the International Crisis Group, a research group.

At the same time it is becoming clear that development assistance to an area does not lead to security in a community or district, she said. NATO has mapped where the international assistance has gone, and found that there is little connection between the amount of aid spent on an area and the level of security, she said.

Regarding the Taliban, "they are not very popular, even in the south, but they have spread," said Tom Koenigs, the head of the United Nations assistance mission in Afghanistan. "We have to be prepared to have these levels of conflict for some time."

But that conflict increasingly threatens to alienate NATO's local supporters. As suicide bombings have taken their toll on the troops, who took over command in southern Afghanistan from the Americans last year, the soldiers have frequently resorted to lethal force, calling in airstrikes and firing on approaching cars, often killing and wounding civilians and further worsening the public mood.

"They said we came to bring peace to this country," said Abdur Rahim, 35, an auto mechanic, as he lay in a hospital bed. He was shot in the back by British soldiers after their convoy had been hit by a suicide bomber. The soldiers shot at least eight civilians as they drove through the town.

"Why are they shooting the people?" he asked. "Is this peace?"

After suffering 13 suicide bombings in 14 days in Kandahar, some Canadian soldiers had to be repatriated because they were reacting badly to the stress, according to one diplomat in Kabul.

"The people are saying, 'If the British are scared, why did they come to our country?' " said Mullah Naqibullah, leader of one of Kandahar's largest tribes. "They should not view the people as the same as the Taliban."

Then there is the nagging feeling behind every conversation in southern Afghanistan that the Taliban cannot be beaten and that the government will have to find a way to accommodate them.

Several important elders like Mullah Naqibullah and a former Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Salam Rocketi, advocate talking to the Taliban.

At the very least, there should be stronger protection for those Taliban commanders who want to come over to the government, said Mullah Rocketi, a member of Parliament, because at the moment few trust the government and the foreign forces not to imprison them.

The biggest test for NATO forces, together with their Afghan military and police counterparts, is to prevent the Taliban from returning. With the ordinary people still ambivalent, that job is going to be much harder.

"We need a huge effort," said the United Nations official, Mr. Koenigs. "We cannot believe it will resolve itself at the pace we have now."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Foreign Convoy South Of Kabul (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A suicide bomber rammed his explosives-filled car into a two-vehicle convoy carrying foreigners south of Kabul on Friday, wounding at least one Afghan civilian, police said.

One of the vehicles was on fire and police had cordoned off the area in Logar province's Muhammad Agha district, provincial police chief Gen. Muhammad Mustafa said.

DOJ_NMG_0117114

It was not immediately clear who the foreigners were or if any were hurt in the blast some 25 miles south of Kabul.

The attack comes a day after NATO said its forces killed scores of insurgents who crossed from Pakistan in the biggest battle of the Afghan winter, while Pakistan's army fired artillery at trucks supplying militants on the other side of the border.

NATO said it had tracked the suspected Taliban militants through air surveillance while the fighters were still in Pakistan. Once they crossed the frontier, NATO and Afghan soldiers attacked the two separate groups with ground fire and airstrikes during a nine-hour battle that began Wednesday evening.

Gen. Murad Ali, the Afghan army regional deputy corps commander, said the insurgents traveled into Afghanistan's southern Paktika province with several trucks of ammunition. Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a U.S. military spokesman, said it was likely they were going to carry out an immediate attack, given the size of the groups.

Taliban militants last year launched a record number of attacks in Afghanistan, and an estimated 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence, the bloodiest year since the U.S.-led coalition ousted the Taliban regime in 2001. Afghan and Western officials say the militants operate from sanctuaries in Pakistan, but Islamabad insists it does all it can to stop them.

The offensive in Paktika province was the first major engagement of 2007 and appeared to be the largest battle since a multi-day operation killed more than 500 Taliban fighters in southern Kandahar province in September.

Fitzpatrick said 130 fighters were killed or wounded in the attack. The Afghan Defense Ministry put the death toll at 80. As is common in Afghanistan, independent confirmation of the death toll at the remote battle site was not immediately possible.

Pakistani army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said the army attack on the militants' trucks Wednesday night shows the army can act swiftly and effectively if it is given "real-time" intelligence.

"We don't deny that some people are coming from this side. That's why we seek intelligence in real time. We are keen to stop it," he said.

It was the Pakistani army's first reported offensive in the North Waziristan tribal region since a September peace deal between the government and pro-Taliban militants that critics say has provided a sanctuary for insurgents.

John Negroponte, the U.S. national intelligence director, told a Senate committee on Thursday that Pakistan represents a major source of Islamic extremism and is a refuge for top terror leaders.

Negroponte said in testimony before the Senate Intelligence Committee that "eliminating the safe haven that the Taliban and other extremists have found in Pakistan's tribal areas is not sufficient to end the insurgency in Afghanistan, but it is necessary."

Afghanistan A Source Of Worry (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

Sen. Clinton says more troops needed to fight Taliban, not in Iraq.

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates expressed deep concern Friday over the stability of Afghanistan, and a top U.S. military official said additional troops might be needed to strengthen the government in Kabul, which is under growing pressure from Taliban forces.

Gates plans to travel soon to the region to look for ways to aid the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Speaking to the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates appeared worried by the rising violence in Afghanistan, where military commanders have warned that the spring thaw may bring one of the most brutal fighting seasons since the 2001 U.S. invasion.

"We mustn't let this one slip out of our attention and, where we have had a victory, put it at risk," Gates told senators in describing his upcoming trip. "One of the things that I am focused on particularly is, what will it take to reverse the trend line in Afghanistan and to strengthen the Karzai government?"

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, indicated that he was open to raising troop levels in Afghanistan as well as Iraq. Despite concerns that U.S. land forces are overstretched by their growing commitment in Iraq, the Pentagon could sustain an increase of forces in Afghanistan as well, he said.

About 22,000 U.S. military personnel are in Afghanistan; about half of them are fighting along with 32,000 other foreign troops under the command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is to stop in Afghanistan during a trip to the Middle East starting this weekend, said she believed that President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq was misguided and that new troops instead should be sent to Afghanistan, where, she said, U.S. policy was on "autopilot."

"I wish we were discussing additional troops for Afghanistan," Clinton said, speaking in Washington. "We are hearing increasingly troubling reports out of Afghanistan, and we will be searching for accurate information about the true state of affairs both militarily and politically."

DOJ_NMG_0117115

The comments by Gates and Pace came at a hearing on the Bush administration's revised Iraq policy.

The Armed Services panel includes several senators — Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) — who have been outspoken supporters of a troop buildup.

McCain said those who want to begin withdrawing troops "have a responsibility to tell us what they believe are the consequences of withdrawal in Iraq. If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

Still, Democrats voiced skepticism about the administration's new strategy. The new committee chairman, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), advocates a timetable for troop withdrawals and opposes the new plan.

"The reality behind the president's new rhetoric is that the open-ended commitment continues," Levin said.

Gates said he thought that Bush, who "has a longer view," at times had to make decisions that didn't "have broad support of the American people."

In Afghan Valley, A Peaceful War (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

SURJAI, Afghanistan -- Inside a green tent pitched on an ice-crusted field and guarded by armed troops, a young boy winced in pain Wednesday as a military doctor slowly injected medicine into his nose and cheek, red and swollen from the parasitic disease leishmaniasis.

Nearby, soldiers tossed sacks of rice, beans, tea and sugar into wheelbarrows pushed by local villagers. At a third spot, cargo trucks piled with firewood and tin stoves were surrounded by excited, shoving crowds until a local mullah carrying a list of names restored order.

"Andiamo!" -- Let's go! -- called a rifleman near the food supplies, beckoning to the next family in line.

Col. Antonio Maggi, who commanded the day-long operation by Italian troops in the snow-coated Mushai Valley, strode watchfully among the tents and trucks. He often stopped to chat with local elders, an interpreter at his side.

To Maggi, who heads NATO's 2,000-member Italian military contingent in Afghanistan, the day's humanitarian mission was a small piece of a long-term, strategic plan to win the support and collaboration of the valley's 20,000 inhabitants for the Afghan central government and the international troops who support it.

Like most of the 26 foreign military contingents that comprise the 20,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, the Italians have been banned by their government from conducting combat missions, except for 72-hour emergency sorties to aid other NATO forces.

Only British, Canadian and Dutch combat troops operate in the four southern provinces where clashes with Taliban insurgents are constant and dozens of foreign soldiers have died. A separately commanded mission of about 20,000 U.S. troops is based in eastern Afghanistan, conducting combat and aid operations.

But officials say the work of troops from Italy, Turkey, France and other nations, which are bringing security, training, aid and development to impoverished and potentially hostile areas of central and northern Afghanistan, can be more effective than military raids, which can invade homes, create casualties and alienate communities.

"This valley is important because there have been problems with security in the past," Maggi said. "Now we are present, listening to the people's problems, meeting with the leaders, bringing assistance, doing joint patrols with the police. Our message to everyone is that there can be no reconstruction in the valley without security."

Lying about an hour's drive south of Kabul, the capital, the Mushai Valley has a history of strategic importance in Afghanistan's succession of conflicts. Militia commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, who with U.S. backing fought Soviet troops during the 1980s, maintained his stronghold near here. Later, he turned against the Western powers and is today a renegade insurgent leader.

During the years of Taliban rule, from 1996 to 2001, some foreign Arab militia groups lived in compounds nearby.

The largely unprotected valley is just across a low ridge of mountains from the border with Pakistan. NATO and Afghan officials say insurgent fighters from the revived Taliban militia receive training and weapons there and then infiltrate Afghanistan to launch attacks.

One of Maggi's principal roles, since the Mushai operation began in October, has been to help recruit, equip and train local police. The Italians have provided them with pickup trucks, radios, boots and wool winter uniforms. They are also building a brick police and administrative headquarters to replace the rudimentary hillside compound that is now the government's only structure in the district.

"Things have changed a lot since the colonel came," said the Mushai police chief, Commander Arif. "We are in an open area where people can come across from Pakistan, and we had no checkpoints before. Now we have three new checkpoints, joint patrols and 112 police officers getting trained. The people are collaborating 100 percent, so the insurgents cannot do their work."

The skill level of the police is still low, and Wednesday's giveaway program was briefly marred when an argument broke out around a truck laden with firewood. One inexperienced policeman hit a man with his rifle, bloodying his nose and angering the crowd.

But in general, the welcome received here by Maggi's forces, who attend regular meetings with local leaders, has stood in sharp contrast to the angry resentment aroused last fall when U.S. combat forces staged a raid looking for Taliban and al-Qaeda insurgents. Residents said the troops entered houses at night, herded women and children outside in the rain and shot one civilian dead.

"They did many wrong things, and the people were unhappy," said Maulvi Shirin Agha, a senior cleric in the valley, who helped organize the aid distribution this week. "They were looking for al-Qaeda, but there has been no al-Qaeda here for the last five years. The Italians behave very well with the people, and everyone likes them," he said. "The Taliban can only dream of coming back."

Aside from the improved security, leaders in the Mushai Valley said they were most grateful to the Italians for providing free medical aid. The area has no clinics, and families said that when they take sick children to hospitals in Kabul, they are turned away or given inadequate treatment.

On Wednesday, parents lined up all day outside the tent clinic where Lidia Sarntaro, a doctor and Italian army lieutenant, treated their children for coughs, headaches, rashes and more serious ailments. Twice she administered a local anesthetic and removed shrapnel fragments from a child's arm, bending over a metal cot with a scalpel and gauze to stanch the bleeding.

Lala Gul brought in his son Akmal, 7, who was left with a fragment in his arm last year when a shell he and another boy were handling exploded.

Gul worriedly watched the boy's frightened face while Sarntaro stitched up his arm. The second boy waited outside.

"I took them to the city, but nobody helped us. All the doctors asked us for too much money," said Gul, a farm laborer with eight children. He said he was taking home a bundle of food supplies, though he did not fully understand who had donated them. "The elders told us to come here today to get help," he said. "It is free, so I am happy."

Pakistan Says It's Not A Terrorist Haven; Asks U.S. For Intelligence On Al-Qaeda (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Pakistan on Friday rejected allegations by America's spy chief that it is a refuge for terrorist leaders and demanded that his intelligence networks share information on the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda figures.

The statements Thursday by U.S. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte that Pakistan is a haven for al-Qaeda and Taliban terrorists are "incorrect," Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said.

"In breaking the back of al-Qaeda, Pakistan has done more than any other country in the world," ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. "The proper way to do this would be to share the intelligence with us."

Negroponte said that despite Pakistan's vital role in the war on terrorism, leaders of both al-Qaeda and Afghanistan's former ruling Taliban militia are sheltering in its lawless frontier areas, largely beyond reach of U.S. or Pakistani fighters.

NATO and the Afghan government also say Taliban and al-Qaeda guerrillas are launching attacks on their forces in Afghanistan from neighboring Pakistan. Violence rose sharply in Afghanistan in 2006, with fighting killing about 4,000 people in what was the deadliest year since the U.S.-led coalition swept the Taliban from power in 2001.

In his testimony before the Senate Intelligence Committee, Negroponte said that "eliminating the safe haven that the Taliban and other extremists have found in Pakistan's tribal areas is not sufficient to end the insurgency in Afghanistan, but it is necessary."

U.S. officials have previously said they believe bin Laden and other top terrorist commanders are taking refuge in the region, likely on the Pakistani side of the border. Pakistan has repeatedly rejected such claims.

Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao, the top civilian security official in Pakistan, told The Associated Press that the U.S. intelligence agencies had not shared any "specific intelligence with Pakistan on the whereabouts of al-Qaeda or the Taliban."

"We always act swiftly whenever any intelligence is shared with us. There are no al-Qaeda safe havens in Pakistan," he said.

But in a sign that insurgents are crossing from Pakistan to fight in Afghanistan, the bodies of 25 militants killed in a fierce battle with NATO were repatriated Friday to their tribal villages in Pakistan, where Taliban activists urged mass attendance at their funerals, residents said.

DOJ_NMG_0117117

NATO on Thursday reported killing or wounding 130 suspected Taliban who had crossed from Pakistan to mount attacks in eastern Afghanistan. Pakistan's army also said it attacked militant supply trucks on its side of the border in Pakistan's tense North Waziristan region.

Aslam acknowledged that "there may be al-Qaeda elements" in Pakistan. But she said their presence was just like "in the Middle East or other world countries."

Visiting U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher paid tribute to Pakistan's counterterrorism efforts and said more action was needed on both sides of the border.

"There continues to be a high rate of cross-border activity," he told reporters after meeting with President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. "I'm not just saying Pakistan hasn't succeeded yet, but we have not succeeded yet ourselves in Afghanistan. There's more effort required of all of us."

Pakistan became a U.S. ally in the war against terrorism after it severed support for the Taliban militia in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Insurgents Killed In Afghan Fighting Reportedly Are Sent Back To Pakistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 12 -- The bodies of two dozen Islamic insurgents killed in a clash with NATO and Afghan army forces near the border with Pakistan were sent back Friday to Pakistan, where Taliban leaders asked that they be given funerals as "martyrs," according to news reports here.

The reports appeared to bolster Afghan and U.S. assertions, repeatedly denied by Pakistani officials, that Pakistan's tribal regions along the border with Afghanistan have provided a haven for Islamic militia groups seeking to destabilize the Western-backed government of Afghanistan.

The funeral preparations were reported to take place in villages in Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani officials brokered a truce in September that they said was aimed at curbing Islamic extremist activities in the area. Afghan and NATO officials have said cross-border insurgent infiltration has actually increased since then.

Also Friday, Afghan police reported that a suicide bomber rammed a vehicle into two others on a highway south of Kabul. The two-vehicle convoy was carrying foreign police advisers, according to Associated Press reports. One adviser and an Afghan civilian were injured, the news agency reported.

In Washington, the U.S. national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, said at a Senate hearing Thursday that Pakistani tribal areas were functioning as a haven for terrorists and that Pakistani officials needed to do more to control them.

In response, officials from Pakistan's Foreign and Interior ministries denied their country was offering shelter to extremists. A Pakistani military spokesman said that the country's army forces had fired on trucks carrying Islamic insurgents toward the Afghan border and that Pakistan was "keen to stop" such cross-border infiltration.

The bodies of fighters sent back to Pakistan included both Pakistanis and Afghans, according to news reports. They were said to be casualties of a major clash Wednesday between NATO and Afghan troops and Islamic insurgents in Afghanistan's Paktika province. NATO said 150 insurgents had been killed, while Afghan officers put the figure at 80.

Pentagon Sees Move In Somalia As Blueprint (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Military operations in Somalia by American commandos, and the use of the Ethiopian Army as a surrogate force to root out operatives for Al Qaeda in the country, are a blueprint that Pentagon strategists say they hope to use more frequently in counterterrorism missions around the globe.

Military officials said the strike by an American gunship on terrorism suspects in southern Somalia on Sunday showed that even with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld from the Pentagon, Special Operations troops intended to take advantage of the directive given to them by Mr. Rumsfeld in the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks.

American officials said the recent military operations have been carried by the Pentagon's Joint Special Operations Command, which directs the military's most secretive and elite units, like the Army's Delta Force.

The Pentagon established a desolate outpost in the Horn of Africa nation of Djibouti in 2002 in part to serve as a hub for Special Operations missions to capture or kill senior Qaeda leaders in the region.

Few such "high value" targets have materialized, and the Pentagon has gradually relocated members of the covert Special Operations units to more urgent missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0117118

But officials in Washington said this week that the joint command had quietly been returning troops and weaponry to the region in recent weeks in anticipation of a mission against members of a Qaeda cell believed to be hiding in Somalia.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told members of Congress on Friday that the strike in Somalia was executed under the Pentagon's authority to hunt and kill terrorism suspects around the globe, a power the White House gave it shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks.

It was this authority that Mr. Rumsfeld used to order commanders to develop plans for using American Special Operations troops for missions within countries that had not been declared war zones.

But since the retreat of the Taliban in 2001, when American Special Forces worked with Afghan militias, Mr. Rumsfeld's ambitious agenda for Special Operations troops has been slow to materialize.

The problem has partly been a shortage of valuable intelligence on the whereabouts of top terrorism suspects. Mr. Rumsfeld also dispatched teams of Special Operations forces to work in American embassies to collect intelligence and to develop war plans for future operations.

Pentagon officials said it is still not known whether any senior Qaeda suspects or their allies were killed in the airstrike on Sunday, carried out by an AC-130 gunship. A small team of American Special Operations troops has been to the scene of the airstrike, in a remote stretch near the Kenya border, to collect forensic evidence in the effort to identify the victims.

Some critics of the Pentagon's aggressive use of Special Operations troops, including some Democratic members of Congress, have argued that using American forces outside of declared combat zones gives the Pentagon too much authority in sovereign nations and blurs the lines between soldiers and spies.

The State Department and Pentagon took control of Somalia policy in the summer, after a failed effort by the Central Intelligence Agency to use Somali warlords as proxies to hunt down the Qaeda suspects.

The trail of the terrorism suspects in Somalia, blamed for the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, had long gone cold. But American military and intelligence officials said that the Ethiopian offensive against the Islamist forces who ruled Mogadishu and much of Somalia until last month flushed the Qaeda suspects from their hide-outs and gave American intelligence operatives fresh information about their whereabouts.

The Bush administration has all but officially endorsed the Ethiopian offensive, and Washington officials have said that Ethiopia's move into Somalia was a response to "aggression" by the Islamists in Mogadishu.

In the weeks before the military campaign began, State Department and Pentagon officials said that they had some concerns about the impending Ethiopian government's offensive in Somalia.

But as the Ethiopian's march toward war looked more likely, Americans began providing Ethiopian troops with up-to-date intelligence on the military positions of the Islamist fighters in Somalia, Pentagon and counterterrorism officials said.

According to a Pentagon consultant with knowledge about Special Operations, small teams of American advisers crossed the border into Somalia with the advancing Ethiopian army.

"You're not talking lots of guys," the Pentagon consultant said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "You're talking onesies and twosies."

As Somalia's Leaders Meet, 8 Militiamen Die In Gunfight (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 12 — More violence erupted Friday in Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked capital, and this time it was literally at the doorstep of the newly arrived government.

According to witnesses, presidential guards killed at least eight men of a rival militia at the gates of the presidential palace as top leaders were sitting inside discussing a new disarmament program.

The bloodshed seemed to be more evidence of a steady breakdown of law and order in Mogadishu, and plunged the disarmament plans into uncertainty.

The fight apparently started over where to park a technical, the term coined in Somalia for a heavily armed pickup truck. Militiamen of Mohammed Qanyare Afrah, one of Mogadishu's more powerful warlords, insisted on parking their truck inside the presidential palace, but the guards said no.

The two sides starting arguing and young men with big guns crowded around. Someone shot first and each side blamed the other. That set off an intense barrage with bullets flying, windows shattering and women selling mangoes outside the palace gates scrambling for cover.

"They just opened up on us," said Abdi Hassan Ahmed, a guard for Mr. Qanyare.

DOJ_NMG_0117119

Mr. Ahmed, 22, lay in a hospital bed on Friday afternoon with a bullet hole in his thigh. Next to him was another young guard, totally unresponsive, his eyes wide open and his head in a gauze cocoon. He had been shot through the brain, doctors said.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said Mr. Qanyare's militia might have been upset about the prospects of being disarmed.

"They got restless and started shooting," he said. "So we answered fire with fire."

Mr. Hassan said he still considered the meeting a success, despite the fact that eight young men lay dead outside, because several of Mogadishu's top warlords, each of whom command well-armed militias, told President Yusuf that they agreed, in principle, to surrender their weapons and help form a national army.

Still, no firm details have been worked out for weapons collection and no timetable has been set. The warlords and government officials said they would appoint representatives to study the issue further.

Such promises hardly excite most residents. Several times already, Mogadishu's warlords and clan elders have pledged to hand over their weapons, but so far very few have done so.

The streets here still bristle with a staggering amount of military-grade firepower. It is not uncommon to see a high-powered antiaircraft gun in the hands of a teenager wearing a T-shirt, jeans and flip-flops. Boys as young as 12 bounce around the back of the armed trucks, providing an adolescent army for the city's various powers: the warlords, clan elders, religious leaders and businessmen.

Collecting weapons has been the top priority for the transitional government since it arrived in the capital two weeks ago. With the help of the Ethiopian military, the transitional government swiftly defeated Somalia's Islamist forces, which until last month controlled a good chunk of the country.

Ethiopian soldiers are still battling the last remnants of the Islamist forces in a remote corner of southern Somalia. Earlier this week, American military forces joined in, dropping bombs on the fleeing Islamists, who American officials said were sheltering terrorists from Al Qaeda.

The Islamists have vowed to carry on as an underground army and overthrow the transitional government, which is Somalia's first politically viable central government since 1991, when the dictator Gen. Mohammed Siad Barre fled the country and let loose 15 years of clan-versus-clan warfare.

As events on Friday showed, those days may not be over. Mr. Yusuf is from the powerful Darod clan and Mr. Qanyare is from the powerful Hawiye clan.

Despite the talk of reconciliation, many Somalis, especially members of the Hawiye clan, fear that the transitional government will selectively disarm certain clans while allowing others to keep their guns.

"We fear not just for ourselves," said Mohammed Uluso, chairman of the political leadership council for the Ayr, a branch of the Hawiye clan tree. "We fear for all of Somalia."

Islamists Lose Last Bastion (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Ethiopian-backed government forces have captured the last stronghold of the Islamist movement in southern Somalia, the Somali defense minister said yesterday just hours after warlords met with the president and promised to enlist their militiamen in the army.

The southern town of Ras Kamboni fell after five days of heavy fighting, Defense Minister Col. Barre Aden Shire said.

He said government troops backed by Ethiopian forces and MiG fighter aircraft chased fleeing Islamists into nearby forests and that the fighting would continue. He did not give casualty figures.

Ras Kamboni is in a rugged coastal area a few miles from the Kenyan border. It is not far from the site of a U.S. air strike Monday on suspected al Qaeda terrorists -- the first U.S. offensive in Somalia since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993.

The report of the town's fall came after Somalia's warlords met with President Abdullahi Yusuf in the capital of Mogadishu and pledged to disarm their militias, a major step toward bringing calm to this city after years of chaos.

The meeting sought to establish enough security in the capital so international peacekeepers cancome in to protect the government until it can establish an effective police force and army.

Outside the peace talks, however, a fight over where to park an armored car left at least six persons dead and 10 wounded. Clan gunmen fired a rocket-propelled grenade and briefly exchanged gunfire with government troops during the dispute.

Nevertheless, government officials said the meeting between Mr. Yusuf and three top warlords was successful.

"The warlords and the government have agreed to collaborate for the restoration of peace in Somalia," said government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari.

One of Somalia's most powerful warlords, Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, said after the meeting the clans were "fed up" with guns and ready to cooperate.

But another warlord issued a warning to the government.

"If the government is ready to reconcile its people and chooses the right leadership, I hope there is no need to revolt against it," said Muse Sudi Yalahow, whose fighters control northern Mogadishu. "If they fail and lose the confidence of the people, I think they would be called new warlords."

The government was only able to enter Mogadishu after Ethiopian troops routed an Islamic movement that had controlled most of southern Somalia for the past six months. Now it must deal with clan divisions that have spoiled the 13 attempts to form an effective government since the last one collapsed in 1991.

The United States, United Nations and the African Union all want to deploy peacekeepers to stop Somalia from returning to clan-based violence and anarchy. But so far no African governments have responded to the call for an 8,000-strong peacekeeping force for the country, although Uganda has indicated it is willing to send 1,500 peacekeepers as part of a wider mission.

Lam Stays Silent About Losing Job (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton And Onell R. Soto, Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 13, 2007

Law enforcement defends her record

Amid news reports that she has been asked to step down, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam declined repeated interview requests yesterday and did not address the matter with her staff.

At a weekly managers meeting, Lam was stoic, conducting business as usual and discussing next week's caseload, according to people who attended. She made no mention of a resignation request by the Bush administration, nor did anyone ask about it.

However, she did discuss the matter with at least one law enforcement colleague. Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego, said he spoke to Lam several times yesterday and he feels the criticism and the way the situation was handled are unfair.

“I don't think it's the right way to treat anybody. What's the decision based on?” Dzwilewski said. “I don't share the view of whoever's making the decision back there in Washington that they'd like her to resign. I feel Carol has an excellent reputation and has done an excellent job given her limited resources.”

Dzwilewski said he sympathized with Lam on issues of stretching budgets to meet priorities and felt that criticism that she wasn't giving proper attention to smuggling, drugs and gun crimes was off-base. “What do you expect her to do? Let corruption exist?” he said.

Lam's continued employment as U.S. attorney is crucial to the success of multiple ongoing investigations, the FBI chief said.

As for the reason for any pressure to resign, Dzwilewski said: “I can't speak for what's behind all that, what's the driving force behind this or the rationale. I guarantee politics is involved.”

Dzwilewski declined to discuss Lam's demeanor during their conversations, her state of mind, when or if she will resign or her future plans.

“It will be a huge loss from my perspective,” Dzwilewski said. “What she's going to do, my guess is she's still trying to figure that out herself.”

Other members of the law enforcement community also defended Lam.

“She's been by far the most outstanding U.S. attorney we've ever had,” City Attorney Michael Aguirre said. “By far, she's done more to clean up the corruption in this city than anyone else, and she has won a national reputation as one of the top prosecutors in the country.

Sources have told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam was asked to step down because she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a priority, choosing instead to focus on fewer cases that she considered more significant, such as public corruption and white-collar crime.

Some lawyers theorized yesterday that it wasn't just misplaced priorities that led to her impending ouster. The Randy "Duke" Cunningham case has spawned other corruption probes of Republicans in Washington, leading to conjecture that politics played a part in the decision to force her out.

However, Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney in San Antonio, Texas, said everybody in the position knows it's not a permanent job.

"We go when the president goes and sometimes before," he said.

Some lawyers said that shifting resources to cases she considered more important was not enough to bring about her firing. What mattered, they said, was her track record.

The Cunningham corruption case, which grew from an article in the Union-Tribune, was a high-profile success. But she has also stumbled. For instance, the corruption prosecution of political consultant Larry Remer was bargained down to a misdemeanor after a hung jury.

And although Lam's office achieved corruption convictions of then-San Diego City Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey T. Miller acquitted Zucchet of most charges and granted a new trial on the remaining two counts.

Lam spent almost a year personally prosecuting a national hospital chain that she said used complex agreements to pay off local doctors in return for referrals. That case ended in a second mistrial. The chain eventually agreed to a civil settlement.

And U.S. District Judge Roger T. Benitez has raised concerns about whether the case against five former San Diego city pension officials should proceed.

Still, corruption and white-collar cases are notoriously hard to prosecute, and some lawyers applauded Lam for making the effort.

If Lam refuses to resign, she could be fired by the president, as former U.S. Attorney William Kennedy was in 1982. Justice Department officials asked for his resignation after he confirmed to The San Diego Union that the CIA interfered in favor of a suspect in a car-theft ring.

He would not resign, and President Reagan fired him. Kennedy is now a Superior Court judge.

Former U.S. Attorney Peter Nuñez wasn't surprised by Lam's silence.

"What else can she do at this point?" he asked. "She's not going to have a press conference. . . . I'm sure this is not one of the better days of her life. She's been publicly humiliated by her bosses."

Legal Community Stunned By Lam Report (NCT)

By TERI FIGUEROA And WILLIAM FINN BENNETT, Staff Writers

North County (CA) Times, January 13, 2007

Speculation that the Bush administration allegedly has asked San Diego-based U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the region's chief federal prosecutor, to step down was met with disbelief and dropped jaws by legal community members with ties to federal court.

"I was in a state of shock," said Peter Nunez, who served as the U.S. attorney in charge of the San Diego offices from 1982 to 1988. "It's just like nothing I've ever seen before in 35-plus years. To be asked to resign and to be publicly humiliated by leaking this to the press is beyond any bounds of decency and behavior. It shocks me. It really is outrageous."

Nunez and others said they had not even heard rumblings that Lam was in the cross hairs for possible removal.

Lam's spokeswoman Friday declined to address the rumor.

"We have no comment," Debra Hartman, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, wrote in an e-mail to the North County Times.

A spokesman for the attorney general's office in Washington, D.C., declined to comment Friday.

The North County Times could not independently confirm a published report in The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam had been asked to resign.

Lam may not be the only U.S. attorney politely being asked to pack her bags.

In a Thursday news release, U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein announced that she and two other senators were introducing legislation that would prevent the executive branch from trying to do an end run on the Senate's prerogative of confirming U.S. attorneys.

According to the newspaper report, which appeared Friday and cited unnamed sources, Lam was targeted for not making the prosecution of smuggling and gun cases a top priority.

Nunez said the question he has is, "Why?"

"What sin has she committed that justifies asking her to submit her resignation and publicly humiliating her in the process?" Nunez said. "If the reasons are anything close to the newspaper reports, that's crazy, especially when this administration is so weak on immigration."

Lam's office has made white-collar crime a priority, and has taken on a number of high-profile cases ---- among them the successful prosecution of then-Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham on charges of bribery and tax evasion ---- since her 2002 appointment by the Bush administration.

Other cases that came during her tenure included December's criminal convictions of the chiefs of Golden State Fence Co. for hiring illegal immigrants, and the potential death penalty case for the long-sought and recently nabbed Francisco Javier Arrellano-Felix, the alleged head of a Mexican drug cartel.

Lam is a former San Diego Superior Court judge who at one time presided over criminal trials at the courthouse in Vista. Nunez, who said he hired Lam as an assistant U.S. attorney about 20 years ago, called her a "bright, hardworking, conscientious, diligent person."

Also surprised by the report was Charles La Bella, who served a stint as the interim U.S. attorney in 1998. La Bella said Friday that he found the resignation request, if it is true, to be "unusual."

"In my years with the department, I never saw anything like this," La Bella said.

It's difficult to say whether Lam's case priorities might have been a factor, he said.

"The only people who know are in Washington," La Bella said.

Escondido-based defense attorney Mark Chambers, who handles a lot of cases in federal court, said there was a "change of emphasis" when Lam took over.

"There appeared to be a drop-off in the prosecutions of what we call 'border busts,' people arrested for bringing drugs across the border," Chambers said. "There were major increases in large conspiracy cases that involved a great deal of resources to prosecute and investigate. She went after the big fish."

Chambers said he, too, was surprised by the rumor.

"I'm at a loss to determine the reason. It doesn't make sense to me. I think the U.S. attorney's responsibility is to prosecute high-profile, complicated cases, and I think she was doing that."

As a defense attorney, Chambers said, he often feels that the people who are prosecuted are at the "extreme low end of the pole, and some prosecutorial discretion should have been applied."

"Since she took over the office, I haven't felt that," Chambers said. "The people who were getting prosecuted were clearly high profile, high culpability."

La Bella and Nunez said that while politics can play a role in the appointment of each of the nearly eight dozen U.S. attorneys, once a person steps into the job, politics fall by the wayside.

U.S. attorneys serve by the appointment of, and at the pleasure of, the president, and are subject to confirmation by the U.S. Senate. It is common for an incoming president to appoint new people to the 94 positions.

Nunez, reached by his cell phone Friday, said it is "extremely rare" for an administration to ask one of its own appointees to step down.

"The only time this happens is when there has been an allegation of misconduct," Nunez said. "That doesn't mean the president doesn't have the authority to do this. If he wants to, he can fire them. There's nothing wrong with that ---- but if you are going to fire them, you better have a good reason."

Feinstein and the other senators used strong words in the news release describing their proposed legislation.

"It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U.S. Attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation," Feinstein wrote.

And in a Tuesday letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Feinstein also hinted at her suspicions that something might be afoot. While she did not refer specifically to Lam, Feinstein wrote that the Department of Justice had asked "several" U.S. attorneys to step down by the end of the month, "without cause."

"We ... understand the intention is to have your office appoint interim replacements and potentially avoid the Senate confirmation process altogether," she wrote.

A little-known provision in the Patriot Act reauthorization last year changed existing law so that if a vacancy occurs, the attorney general can appoint a replacement for an indefinite period of time.

A spokesman for Feinstein said Friday that he would have no comment beyond the statements that the senator made in her letter.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said by phone Friday that Gonzales is certainly not trying to avoid the Senate confirmation process. There are 93 U.S. attorneys in the country, he said, and at any given time, "a number of them are coming and going."

"In every case, it is the goal of this administration to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate," he said.

For years, U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa has criticized Lam for not doing enough to prosecute smugglers of illegal immigrants. In an October 2005 letter to Attorney General Gonzales, Issa blasted Lam's office for failing to prosecute two cases of smugglers who were repeat offenders.

"This lax prosecutorial standard virtually guarantees that both of these individuals will be arrested on U.S. soil in the future for committing further serious crimes," Issa wrote.

Lam had complained that her office simply lacked the funding to pursue many smuggling cases.

On Friday, Issa spokesman Frederick Hill said that Issa would have no comment on the matter without confirmation that Lam had in fact been asked to step down.

The president of the National Patrol Council, which represents rank-and-file U.S. Border Patrol agents, said Friday that he wishes Lam well and said he hopes that whomever follows her in the job is willing to do whatever is necessary to prosecute immigration smuggling cases.

President T.J. Bonner said that because Lam was so picky about what she was willing to pursue "that it was nearly impossible to prosecute cases in San Diego."

Was Asked To Quit, U.S. Attorney Says (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, January 13, 2007

A day after three U. S. senators, including Arkansas ' Mark Pryor, proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U. S. attorneys, Bud Cummins acknowledged that the U. S. Justice Department asked him in June to leave his post to make room for a successor. Cummins, 47, the U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas from Dec. 21, 2001 until Dec. 20, 2006, had previously avoided directly answering whether he was “forced out,” as rumor had it. He instead said in late August that he had always known his political appointment was temporary and that he had informally “let it be known” over the previous year that he expected to leave before President Bush’s second term ended in late 2008.

When contacted on Friday, Cummins said that while all that was true, he wanted to clarify the situation because the proposed legislation had focused a new wave of attention on his and other U. S. attorneys’ recent departures, reportedly at the administration’s request.

In a news release issued jointly Thursday by Pryor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., Feinstein said, “It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U. S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation.... We don’t know how many U. S. Attorneys have been asked to resign — it could be two, it could be ten, it could be more. No one knows.”

On Friday, the San Diego Union-Tribune reported that according to a law enforcement official, the Bush administration had quietly asked San Diego U. S. Attorney Carol Lam, a 2002 Bush appointee, to resign. The newspaper also quoted New Mexico U. S. Attorney David Iglesias as saying, “I was asked to resign. I asked [why] and wasn’t given any answers.”

Pryor had publicly complained in late December, when the department announced that attorney Tim Griffin would take over Cummins ' job in a matter of days, that the administration was trying to circumvent the normal nomination process to reward a political insider, without the normal checks and balances.

Griffin, who had a reputation as an aggressive Republican campaign researcher, had previously worked under Karl Rove, Bush’s main political adviser and deputy chief of staff. Pryor’s spokesman, Michael Teague, said Friday that the senator understands that such appointments are political, “which is fine — but they should go through the confirmation process.”

U. S. attorneys are usually nominated by the president and then confirmed by the Senate. But a provision added in last year’s reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act allows the U. S. attorney general to appoint interim U. S. attorneys for indefinite terms, when vacancies arise, without going through the confirmation process.

Teague noted Friday that the provision was intended to aid the country in times of crisis — such as after the Sept. 11 terrorist acts — but has been stretched beyond that intent.

Both Pryor and Feinstein voted for the USAPATRIOT Act’s reauthorization. Leahy did not.

The proposed legislation aims to restore the law to its previous wording that puts district courts in charge of filling interim vacancies and puts a 120-day limit on the temporary appointments.

Cummins reiterated on Friday that the request that he step down was “entirely within the prerogative of the White House.”

“The only reason I haven’t specifically responded before was I thought it was going to be a short-term issue and I didn’t want it to be misconstrued, but at this point I’m feeling I am being deceptive” in not answering fully, he added.

Much like Cummins, Iglesias said he was "OK with" being asked to leave, noting that chief federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. But Lam, unlike Cummins, reportedly was asked to leave because of the way she performed her job — specifically, for failing to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority.

Lam had been criticized by members of Congress and the Border Patrol for failing to prosecute certain cases. But Cummins' performance has been routinely praised in the Arkansas legal community and by Pyror and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, DArk.

Cummins said Friday that he asked if his job performance was a problem when he got a call in June from the director of the Executive Office of U. S. Attorneys in Washington telling him to be prepared to resign when his successor was ready.

"He assured me it was exactly the contrary," Cummins said. "He said it was not about me but about their desire to give someone else the opportunity to have the appointment."

Cummins added, "I didn't know who they were going to appoint, and it didn't matter to me. I wasn't offended. I had no problem with it then and I have no problem with it now."

He acknowledged, however, that if not for that telephone call, "I might have stayed another year or two. But I always knew, because of the nature of this job, I couldn't stay in it forever."

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said Friday that there have been 11 U. S. attorney vacancies across the country since March 9. He said that in five of those cases, including the one created by Cummins ' departure, the department filled the vacancy with someone from within the U. S. Attorney's office other than the first assistant. Griffin had been working in the office for several months as an assistant prosecutor.

Roehrkasse said that in another five cases, the first assistant was appointed to the interim position. Cummins' first assistant, Jane Duke, had just taken maternity leave.

In one case, Roehrkasse said, the first assistant resigned at the same time as the chief prosecutor, and an interim was appointed from outside the office.

The spokesman also said that four of the 11 went through the normal nomination process, "and we are interviewing for the other seven positions," which would include the position now occupied by Griffin.

Teague has complained that since Griffin is the White House's only choice to replace Cummins — "There's no one else on their list" — he should immediately go through the nomination process.

Roehrkasse replied, "In every single case, it is the goal of this administration to have a U. S. attorney who is confirmed by the Senate. It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Roehrkasse could not say when the nomination process might begin in Griffin's case.

Griffin, 38, reached Friday at a conference in South Carolina, declined to comment on the matter. Cummins, meanwhile, is considering whether his next job will be in private practice or unrelated to the law. He said that being asked to leave "doesn't change anything for me. I'm still appreciative of the president for giving me this job, and I don't have any hard feelings." He noted that out of 93 U. S. attorneys across the country who started at roughly the same time as he did, with a new Republican administration, "well over a third, and probably close to half, have moved on for one reason or another. So it is not uncommon to move on."

Editorial: Gonzales' Ploy (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 13, 2007

Is cronyism behind bid to oust Lam?

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is a tough-minded prosecutor who has won a string of high-profile convictions against corrupt public officials, including Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet. She is widely respected for her personal integrity and her commitment to curbing white-collar crime. Her aggressive prosecutions have sent a needed message that political corruption will not be tolerated in San Diego.

Why, then, is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pressuring Lam behind the scenes to step down?

The answer to this question is far from clear, but it appears to be rooted in questionable political machinations in Washington and has nothing to do with Lam's impressive record on the job. A recent example that may shed light on Lam's dilemma is the firing of H.E. "Bud" Cummins from his job as U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark. He was replaced by a close associate of White House political adviser Karl Rove. Tellingly, the new appointee in Little Rock occupied the post without gaining Senate confirmation.

This was made possible by a revision last year in the controversial Patriot Act. The change allows the White House to appoint interim U.S. attorneys when a midterm vacancy occurs, and such appointees are not subject to Senate confirmation.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has accused the Justice Department of forcing out U.S. attorneys without cause “under the cloak of secrecy” and bypassing the Senate confirmation process.

The Bush administration's actions appear to be motivated by cronyism, a desire to reward the president's supporters with Justice Department posts. In Lam's case, certainly, there are no legitimate performance issues to justify stripping her of her position. Gonzales is set to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits. We urge the senator to seize this opportunity to pull back the “cloak of secrecy” and reveal the truth about the attorney general's bid to remove Lam.

Prosecutor's Hurdles Include Money, Time (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The new U.S. attorney for Washington has a very plum title. But in the current circumstances, Jeffrey A. Taylor may find it hard to leave a major mark, and he's taking some fire before he truly gets moving.

Taylor, who was selected by the Justice Department in the fall to run the largest office of local federal prosecutors in the country, faces the dual challenges of worsening budget constraints and a likely two-year time limit on his tenure.

Then there are the external pressures. A former national security adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Taylor is facing criticism that he lacks local know-how, having spent most of his career in San Diego, where he was an assistant U.S. attorney. And with Democrats now in control of Congress, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) is pushing again for a bill to create the post of a locally elected prosecutor to pursue local crimes in the District.

Gonzales appointed Taylor to be interim U.S. attorney in September, replacing Kenneth L. Wainstein, who became assistant attorney general for national security . The president usually nominates U.S. attorneys for Senate confirmation but has often chosen to let the Justice Department make appointments for interim or short-term posts.

Personable and practical, Taylor acknowledged that it would be unwise for him to launch a series of new initiatives with less money, fewer people and such a short window to act. Still, he declared, "I wouldn't be interested in this job to just be a caretaker."

He took over an office with 30 vacancies among its 360 authorized slots for lawyers -- jobs that will not be filled in the budget crunch. Thirty of 350 support staff jobs are also unfilled and will remain vacant.

Taylor, 41, disputes water-cooler gossip that he's a place-holder until President Bush's term ends in two years. He said he'll focus on three top priorities of cases: violent crime, public corruption and national security.

But even that will be hard in the current budget climate.

"In a perfect world, we'd like more money," Taylor said. "We could keep another 100 prosecutors busy in this office. But that is not reality."

In addition, he's fighting the complaint that the administration's decision to appoint a West Coast prosecutor with important friends is a slight to D.C. concerns. Taylor came to Washington in 1999 and worked on Capitol Hill and at the Justice Department, where he made important political ties.

Unlike the system in other communities, the U.S. attorney's office in Washington serves as both the federal prosecutor, hunting terrorists and drug gangs, and the local district attorney, pursuing everything from street killings to simple assaults. In 2002, D.C. voters overwhelmingly passed a ballot measure favoring a locally elected prosecutor, but such a move would require the approval of Congress.

"The post is used as a patronage appointment to handle local District of Columbia matters," Norton said. Taylor's past experience, she said, "has next to nothing to do with the District of Columbia."

Norton said she sees a lack of sensitivity in the way U.S. attorneys under Bush have repeatedly sought the death penalty on federal charges in Washington, though polls show District voters oppose capital punishment. The U.S. attorney's office has taken two capital murder cases to trial in U.S. District Court during the Bush administration; in both, the defendants received life sentences with no chance of parole. Another case is about to get underway.

Taylor said he is properly sensitized to the concerns.

"No matter what I do, people are going to be unhappy that they don't have an elected district attorney," he said. "I understand that. The best I can hope for is they say, 'Hey, he wasn't my choice, but he's doing a good job.' "

Taylor vowed that local violent crimes prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court won't get short shrift to terrorism and conspiracy cases.

"Superior Court is incredibly important to people in the community," he said. "That's where we do the lion's share of our front-line work. We're going to make sure we have enough prosecutors to handle the homicides, rapes and other violent crimes there."

Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. attorney who later became second in charge at the Justice Department, said he thinks Taylor has a chance to make a difference if he picks two or three targets.

"I get the sense there's a human side of him that wants to do the right thing," said Holder, now in private practice. "If he makes contact with the right people, not just the mayor and council, and admits he doesn't know everything, I think he can be effective and have an impact. You can't come in saying, 'I'm going to do 10 or 15 things." You have to really focus."

Taylor has made an effort to reach out to Norton, the new mayor, Adrian M. Fenty (D), and new D.C. council members. He also has attended neighborhood meetings and points out that he has owned a house on Capitol Hill since 1999.

Taylor graduated from Stanford University in 1987 and Harvard Law School in 1991. He worked in private practice for a brief time. From 1995 to 1999, he specialized in prosecuting large drug trafficking networks while an assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego. From 1999 to 2001, he worked on a detail for the Senate Judiciary Committee, then returned to the San Diego U.S. attorney's office briefly.

In 2002, he returned to the District for good, as counselor to Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and then Gonzales, with a focus on national security and terrorism.

Taylor's wife, Marcia, has long worked for Democratic causes. She worked for the late senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (N.Y.) and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and now works for the Partnership for a Drug-Free America. They live with their dog on Capitol Hill, and Taylor said he would love to be a father someday.

Taylor's own father died when he was a child. His mother and grandfather raised him on a farm in Northern California, and he speaks lovingly and gratefully of them and his modest rural upbringing. Over Christmas, he celebrated the holidays with them out West.

Then he was back in Washington to make what his new colleagues call "the $100 decisions." His salary in Washington is capped at $142,000, and under the pay scale, his senior aides make $100 less a year. When they come to his desk for his approval on a tough call, Taylor said, they take the chance to rib him with the same line:

"This is why you get that extra $100."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrutiny For Loans By Allied Unit (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Federal investigations into small-business loans issued by a unit of the Allied Capital Corporation are growing, as a former executive of the unit faces fraud charges in Michigan.

The former executive, Patrick J. Harrington, is accused of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years, according to an indictment that was handed up on Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Michigan. Mr. Harrington has not entered a plea to the charges.

Federal investigators are now looking at loans issued by the unit, Business Loan Express, in other parts of the country, according to several people briefed on the investigation.

And the federal Small Business Administration — which typically guarantees 75 percent of the value of these small-business loans — is considering suspending the preferred lending status of Business Loan Express, pending the outcome of an investigation. That would mean that every loan Business Loan Express issues would have to be vetted by the agency, those people said.

The S.B.A. this week also suspended the unit's ability to sell the loans it issues to large institutional investors in the secondary market, which could affect the ability of Business Loan Express to make loans, those people said. The unit can still originate loans, but only if it intends to hold those loans on its own books, which is not something the firm has historically done.

There have been questions over lax controls and oversight at the Small Business Administration, and the latest investigations are likely to spur further scrutiny. In recent years, the S.B.A. has come under sharp criticism for its lack of oversight in special loans after the Sept. 11 attacks, which wound up being used by businesses in Texas and Iowa, and for its delayed response in providing disaster loans after Hurricane Katrina.

"The concern is that this situation is emblematic of a larger management problem at the S.B.A.," Kate L. Davis, a spokeswoman for Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York, the new chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, said in a statement. "There are indications that this situation has been developing over the past few years."

DOJ_NMG_0117127

The House committee, which oversees the S.B.A.. has begun its own investigation of the loans in Michigan, and possibly in other states, she said.

"The committee will be investigating S.B.A.'s involvement and how the agency could have failed to detect this," she said.

The S.B.A. said in a statement, "We welcome the opportunity to work with the committee and share information about the steps we have taken and will take, and work with them to share ideas on how to further refine the process."

The S.B.A., which has paid out more than $28 million in claims for loans that originated from the Michigan office of Business Loan Express that later defaulted, has said it has the authority to recover any funds lost to fraud.

As part of the investigation, the S.B.A. plans to re-examine more than five years of loans issued by the Allied unit and could seek restitution if there are additional cases of fraud, according to people familiar with the investigation.

Lanny J. Davis, a Washington-based lawyer for Business Loan Express, said, "This is a good company, with good people, and I believe, in the final analysis, this will be borne out."

The broadening investigation and the indictment are blows to Allied, which in recent years has been battling with hedge funds that have contended, among other things, that the Business Loan Express unit was profiting through obtaining fraudulent loans. Since reports of the indictment appeared on Wednesday, Allied's stock has tumbled 7 percent.

Based in Washington, Allied is known for its strong ties with the capital's elite. One of its directors, for instance, is Marc F. Racicot, the former governor of Montana and the former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Designated a "business development company," Allied invests in small- and midsize private companies that it also typically lends to. Business Loan Express, which constitutes about 6 percent of the assets of Allied, is the company's largest holding.

One of the most vocal critics of Allied's Business Loan Express unit has been David Einhorn, the founder and manager of Greenlight Capital, a hedge fund with more than $4 billion under management. Mr. Einhorn first publicly challenged aspects of Allied's accounting and business model at a charity dinner in the spring of 2002.

In letters to directors on Allied's board dating back to March 2005, Mr. Einhorn told Allied's directors that Allied and Business Loan Express were involved in a scheme "dependent on the commission of systematic fraud against the Small Business Administration and, as a result, against the taxpaying citizens of the United States."

"Allied has been aware of misconduct by Mr. Harrington for half a decade and it won't be hard to find many more similarly fraudulent loans in other parts of the country," Mr. Einhorn said.

In the summer of 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the United States attorney's office in Washington began an investigation into Allied that focused on Business Loan Express, according to regulatory filings by Allied.

While those investigations continue, red flags were being raised about Business Loan Express loans inside the Small Business Administration about a year ago.

The S.B.A. works with more than 2,200 lenders — big and small — across the country to make loans to small businesses. Lenders who undergo an exhaustive examination of their internal controls, procedures and underwriting standards, and whose performance of their overall loan portfolio meets certain criteria can participate in the S.B.A.'s preferred lender program. Members of the program have virtually none of their loan applications examined by the S.B.A.'s district or regional offices. The S.B.A. does, however, conduct random audits of all loans it guarantees.

About a year ago the S.B.A., which gives its lenders an internal rating on a one-to-five scale, lowered Business Loan Express to the lowest rating that would allow it to remain in the preferred lending program, based on a rising level of late payments and defaults on loans it had made, according to people involved in the investigation.

One of Business Loan Express's branches that had a rising level of defaults was in Troy, Mich., which Mr. Harrington headed until it was closed on Aug. 1, 2006.

From early 2000 to July 2006, Mr. Harrington, working with a number of other people, qualified buyers for the S.B.A.-guaranteed loans by fraudulently misrepresenting the buyers' financial status, their work experience, as well as the value of the property, according to the indictment. Several Michigan residents were charged in criminal complaints as acting as borrowers in the scheme, according to court filings.

A lawyer for Mr. Harrington questioned the value of the loans federal prosecutors contend were fraudulent. "He says he made a mistake, but not near to the extent that the government claims," said the lawyer, Clyde B. Pritchard.

A federal prosecutor in Michigan said the investigation into Business Loan Express was continuing.

H.P. Investigator Pleads Guilty To Identity Theft And Conspiracy (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif., Jan. 12 (AP) — Federal prosecutors scored their first victory in the investigation of boardroom spying at Hewlett-Packard on Friday, when a private investigator pleaded guilty to identity theft and conspiracy charges.

DOJ_NMG_0117128

The investigator, Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to the two felony counts during his initial appearance in United States District Court in San Jose.

As part of the plea deal, Mr. Wagner admitted to illegally obtaining Social Security numbers and other personal information to snoop on the private telephone records of journalists, former Hewlett-Packard directors, and their family members as part of the company's effort to ferret out the source of boardroom leaks to the media.

Mr. Wagner acknowledged using a form of subterfuge known as "pretexting," or pretending to be someone else, to fool telephone companies into releasing records on former two former H.P. directors — Thomas J. Perkins and George A. Keyworth II — and two reporters, Pui-Wing Tam of The Wall Street Journal and Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks.

Mr. Wagner admitted using personal information to set up online accounts in the names of the four people from April 2005 to September 2006 to access their call logs and billing records.

His lawyer, Stephen Naratil, said his client would testify for prosecutors as they pursue other figures in the case. He declined to say whom Mr. Wagner would testify against or what he had told prosecutors.

Mr. Wagner's sentencing was set for June 20 in San Jose federal court.

Mr. Naratil has described his client as the "little guy" who was tricked by others into thinking the investigative methods were legal. Mr. Wagner never had any contact with anyone inside the company, Mr. Naratil said. "He was your classic dupe," Mr. Naratil said.

In court, Assistant United States Attorney Mark L. Krotoski said Mr. Wagner was hired by Matthew DePante of the Action Research Group in Florida to unearth the telephone records and distribute them to other unnamed coconspirators.

Mr. DePante has not been charged in the case. A call to his lawyer, Richard Preira of Miami Beach, Fla., was not immediately returned.

Mr. Wagner and Mr. DePante were charged in October in state court along with the former H.P. chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who initiated the investigation; the former H.P. ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker, who directed the inquiry; and Ronald R. DeLia, a security contractor who runs a Boston detective firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions. The four others have pleaded not guilty.

Full Disclosure Companies Trim Executive Perks To Avoid Glare (WSJ)

By Erin White And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Jet Rides, Club Dues On Chopping Block As SEC Rules Kick In

Some CEOs may soon learn there's no such thing as a free ride -- on the corporate jet, anyway.

Personal air travel on the company dime is among an array of executive perks some companies have begun trimming as new compensation-disclosure rules take effect.

On Jan. 1, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Lockheed Martin Corp. stopped paying executives' country-club dues. In December, directors of General Mills Inc. capped free personal rides on company aircraft for its chief executive officer. And E*Trade Financial Corp. said it no longer would help top executives pay taxes on their severance benefits if the company is sold.

The changes come amid sweeping new Securities and Exchange Commission requirements for additional disclosure about executive pay and perks. The rules, which took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 14, require companies to reveal perks for top executives that add up to $10,000 or more apiece; the old rules required disclosure of perks valued above $50,000.

The number of companies dropping or curbing perks is unclear. Most won't file their annual proxy statements, detailing executive compensation, until March or April. Of 110 large companies surveyed by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in November, 14 said they had eliminated perks or were considering doing so because of the new regulations.

But some compensation consultants and directors expect the number to grow as more boards consider the hazards of publicizing perks amid a burgeoning national outcry over executive compensation. In recent weeks, investor anger has been stoked by exit packages in the neighborhood of $200 million for the CEOs of Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., both of whom left under fire for poor shareholder returns.

The enhanced compensation-disclosure rules "will for sure accelerate the cutbacks" in perks, says William G. Bowen, a director at drug-maker Merck & Co. who previously sat on the boards of American Express Co. and Reader's Digest Association Inc. With their reputations on the line, board members "don't want to be embarrassed" by executive-pay practices, he says. Mr. Bowen declined to comment on whether Merck's board is considering dropping any perks for CEO Richard Clark, who now receives a company car, limited personal use of corporate aircraft and financial counseling, among other benefits.

Information about perks that Merck provided its top executives last year will be described in the company's 2007 proxy, a spokeswoman said.

Perks coming under greater scrutiny include country-club dues, company cars, private use of corporate jets, financial-planning services and instances where companies pay executives to cover those officials' tax payments due on other compensation. Many such items typically aren't very costly, but can attract shareholder protests.

They are also fairly common. A Mercer study of proxies last year found that 55% of 350 large companies said they allow personal use of company aircraft. About 50% said they paid for financial counseling, 43% for company cars, and 27% paid club dues, the study indicated.

Mark Reilly, a partner at Compensation Consulting Consortium, a consulting firm in Chicago, says many of his clients are considering trimming perks. "The discussion is, 'How will our employees and shareowners perceive these perquisites?' " he says. "It just sort of provides ammunition to employee groups and unions to attack your pay policy."

The companies changing perquisite policies in recent months may still have to disclose 2006 payments for those benefits in their proxies. The companies may hope to damp investor criticism by announcing curbs on perks ahead of, or at the same time as, the disclosures.

The tactic may not quiet shareholder activists, however. "If executives think that preemptive perk reductions will help them escape shareholder scrutiny, they are badly mistaken," says Cornish F. Hitchcock, outside counsel for Amalgamated Bank's LongView Funds. The union-backed activist funds have objected to executive-pay practices at concerns such as Dynegy Inc., CA Inc., and Halliburton Co.

Meredith Miller, an assistant state treasurer in Connecticut, whose public-employee pension fund has about $26 billion of assets, says she is encouraged by the recent moves to curb senior-management perks. "Transparency is one of the best antiseptics for executive pay," she says.

But she predicts activist shareholders will continue to pressure companies that eliminate highly visible perks without tackling other controversial forms of executive compensation. "Many of the same board members who approved these perks in the past are still sitting on the board," she says. "The day of accountability will still come."

In fact, executives don't necessarily lose in these new arrangements. Compensation consultants expect many companies to increase other forms of compensation to make up for the lost perks.

Becton, Dickinson and Co., for example, raised CEO Edward Ludwig's salary $4,000, to $994,000, after eliminating a financial-planning perk in 2005, which had cost the Franklin Lakes, N.J., medical-technology company as much as $9,000.

Lockheed Martin said in an SEC filing that it gave executives a "one-time salary adjustment" after cutting benefits including country-club dues and financial counseling. On Dec. 1, CEO Robert Stevens got a $40,000 raise in his base salary, to $1.52 million. Robert Coutts, Lockheed's executive vice president for electronic systems, got a $25,000 raise, to $850,000. A Lockheed spokesman declined to comment on whether the changes were prompted by the new SEC rules, but noted that "perks have received increased scrutiny."

Some companies had been chipping away at perks even before the SEC rules surfaced. Becton, Dickinson in October 2005 stopped reimbursing top executives for personal financial-planning services. In December 2005, it struck an agreement with Mr. Ludwig under which he reimburses the company for most of the cost of his personal use of company aircraft. Becton, Dickinson said the changes were prompted by efforts to improve corporate governance.

More perks have been disappearing in recent months, as the broader disclosures required by the new rules draw nearer. Exxon Mobil directors dropped the country-club dues perk because they decided it looked silly when executives earn enough to foot those bills themselves, according to a person familiar with the matter. Former CEO Lee R. Raymond was reimbursed $67,035 for membership fees in 2005, according to Exxon Mobil's most recent proxy. A spokesman declined to comment on whether the change, which took effect Jan. 1, was influenced by the new rules.

In November, Avaya Inc. halted payments to cover taxes levied on executives for personal use of company aircraft, according to a recent SEC filing. A spokeswoman for the Basking Ridge, N.J., maker of telecommunications software and equipment says the change was "part of our normal process of examining compensation and benefits" and unrelated to the SEC rules.

In December, General Mills began to require that Chief Executive Stephen W. Sanger reimburse the company for personal use of corporate aircraft beyond $50,000 per year; Mr. Sanger's perk used to be unlimited. His personal use of company aircraft was valued at $73,001 in the company's 2006 fiscal year, according to an SEC filing. A spokesman says directors approved the change, proposed by Mr. Sanger. The CEO "felt that there should be a cap," says spokesman Thomas Forsythe. He says the change wasn't prompted by the new SEC rules.

Other companies acknowledge that the looming disclosure requirements played at least some role in new curbs on executive perks. Ryder System Inc., a Miami provider of transportation and logistics services, recently decided to discontinue certain severance perks for executives that had included a car allowance and financial-planning services, according to an SEC filing on Thursday. The board decided that those perks were primarily job related, so it didn't make sense to continue to provide them once the executives were no longer employed, says Flora Perez, Ryder's assistant general counsel. The change was partly prompted by the new disclosure rules, but more so by a desire to practice good governance, she adds.

"We certainly had our eye on the new disclosure rules," says John Daniel, manager of employee services at First Horizon National Corp. The Memphis, Tenn., bank-holding company last month stopped reimbursing executives for taxes paid on benefits such as a car allowance, disability-insurance premiums and personal use of corporate aircraft.

Mr. Daniel says First Horizon's board compensation committee dropped the tax reimbursements primarily because they aren't seen as good governance. When a company covers a senior official's taxes, "the perception is that the executive is getting something special," Mr. Daniel said. "All of us in the corporate world are looking at what's the best practice in this governance environment."

NYSE Seat-Holder Suits Allowed To Proceed (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Lawsuits by three former New York Stock Exchange membership-seat holders over disclosures by the Big Board and its chief executive, John Thain, before details of its merger with Archipelago Holdings Inc. became public can proceed, a state judge has ruled.

In an order filed Wednesday, New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos said some of the allegations in cases brought by onetime seat holders Janet Hyman, Sylvia Lief and D. Paul Rittmaster can go forward.

The three cases have been consolidated for pretrial proceedings.

Without ruling on the merits of the claim, Justice Ramos allowed to proceed allegations that representations made at a Feb. 3, 2005, town hall meeting with seat holders and a Feb. 15, 2005, announcement were incomplete and/or misleading. The meeting and announcement concerned the formation of an advisory committee to explore the possibility of converting the NYSE from a nonprofit to a for-profit company, which is now called NYSE Group Inc.

The judge dismissed claims that the NYSE and Mr. Thain breached their fiduciary duty or were negligent for failing to keep the merger negotiations confidential in order to prevent speculative or premature market fluctuations.

The former seat holders sold their seats in March 2005. In April 2005, the NYSE and Archipelago publicly announced their merger, which was completed last year.

An NYSE spokesman declined comment on Justice Ramos's ruling Friday.

Big Accounting Firms Still Pay For Scandals (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Corporate scandals that erupted earlier this decade are still causing pain at accounting firms, which continue to pay big bucks to atone for their failure to spot, or stop, fraud.

The latest example: Deloitte & Touche's Italian arm on Friday agreed to pay $149 million to settle lawsuits brought by former audit client Parmalat SpA, which collapsed in December 2003 after the discovery of Europe's biggest corporate fraud.

Under the terms of the agreement between Deloitte's Italian arm, Deloitte & Touche SpA, and Parmalat, the Italian company will drop all claims against various Deloitte arms it is suing in federal court in New York. In turn, Deloitte will drop counterclaims against the company, whose former managers allegedly engaged in a fraud that left Parmalat with an $18 billion hole on its books.

Specific terms of the agreement, beyond the settlement amount, weren't disclosed. A spokeswoman for Deloitte in the U.S. declined to comment on whether the $149 million would be covered in part or whole by insurance.

A joint statement from Parmalat and Deloitte didn't say whether the accounting firm acknowledged any wrongdoing. Deloitte, which signed off on Parmalat's books from 1999 to 2003, has previously said it acted in accordance with laws in place in Italy at the time.

The settlement follows a deal announced last month by Deloitte's U.S. arm, Deloitte & Touche LLP, to pay $210 million to resolve claims related to Adelphia Communications Corp., the cable company once run by the Rigas family that filed for bankruptcy in 2002. While the Adelphia and Parmalat settlements don't eclipse a record $335 million payout in 1999 by Ernst & Young LLP in a case related to Cendant Corp., they are within the top-10 settlement awards paid by auditors over the past 10 years for work for a single client.

DOJ_NMG_0117131

The Adelphia settlement was significant because Deloitte's $210 million payout represented about 45% of the total $455 million Deloitte, Bank of America Corp. and 38 other banks agreed to pay investors. Auditors typically account for between 10% and 15% of total settlements in such cases, according to executives at other big accounting firms.

As a result, other big firms have been left to wonder if Adelphia is an aberration or the start of a trend toward higher proportionate payouts by accounting firms.

A Former No. 2 Official Becomes Suspect In Siemens Bribery Probe (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

BERLIN -- An international corruption investigation at Siemens AG is climbing the corporate ladder after a former No. 2 executive was named a suspect amid allegations a complex bribery scheme spanned several units at the far-flung German conglomerate.

Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, the chief financial officer of Siemens from 1998 until he resigned in April, was questioned by German prosecutors Tuesday and released in a widening probe into nearly half a billion dollars in suspicious payments.

A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich confirmed that Mr. Neubürger is being treated as a suspect, not a witness, in the cross-border investigation. At least one other suspect has alleged to prosecutors that Mr. Neubürger was aware of illegal payments and didn't do enough to stop them, according to lawyers familiar with the investigation.

More than 200 German police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several current and former employees; they were released just before Christmas after agreeing to cooperate. Investigators suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe customers abroad.

Munich-based Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Last month, it flagged €420 million ($542 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years -- double the amount uncovered by German prosecutors in November. Until now, the investigation had been confined to the company's telecommunications network division. Siemens, Europe's largest engineering firm by sales, has blamed the alleged fraud on "individual acts."

Mr. Neubürger is the second former management-board member of Siemens to become a suspect. Thomas Ganswindt, who oversaw the telecommunications business until resigning last September, was arrested last month before being released.

A lawyer for Mr. Neubürger declined to make his client available for comment. A lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt said his client is innocent.

Mr. Neubürger, 54 years old, last year cited personal reasons for resigning from Siemens half a year before his contract was due to expire. Last month he denied any wrongdoing in interviews with German newspapers after his name surfaced amid the allegations. He currently is a nonexecutive director at KKR Private Equity Investors, an investment vehicle of U.S.-based Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.

Police searched offices of management-board members -- including Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld -- last November. Prosecutors say they are treating Mr. Kleinfeld as a witness, not a suspect. A company spokesman said Friday he had no knowledge of any current management-board members being called in for questioning by authorities. Mr. Kleinfeld has said that Siemens has "zero tolerance" for wrongdoing.

Some prosecutors in neighboring countries who are working with German authorities say Siemens has done too little in recent years to crack down on bribe payments. Robert Wallner, lead prosecutor in Vaduz, Liechtenstein, says Siemens officials asked him not to investigate a suspicious account in Liechtenstein that was uncovered in late 2004 and later linked to the bribery investigation.

Lawyers familiar with the matter say several suspects told German prosecutors that the compliance department of Siemens was informed of the money-laundering investigations in Liechtenstein, Switzerland and Italy but took no action to assist authorities. Siemens recently filed slander charges against the lawyer for one of the suspects after the lawyer made the allegations on German television. A prosecutor spokesman declined to comment.

At least one suspect has told prosecutors that he helped transfer money from a slush fund in the telecommunications division to pay bribes at other units of the company, according to a lawyer familiar with the investigation. A Siemens spokesman declined Friday to comment on the allegations, citing the continuing investigation.

Prosecutors say they suspect bribes were paid to acquire new business in several countries. Among the suspicious transactions tied to the telecommunications unit between 2002 and 2004 are more than €7.5 million in Egypt, €4 million in Saudi Arabia, €3 million in Vietnam, €2.6 million in Indonesia, €1.8 million in Greece and €1.6 million in Kuwait, according to a court document. Siemens booked €87 billion in revenue in the fiscal year ended September 2006 and is active in almost 200 countries, making everything from medical scanners to high-speed trains and light bulbs.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Government Report Describes Leak (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan And Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

Justice Dept. won't tell details

Washington -- The Justice Department is fighting in court to keep secret a government report concluding that it leaked confidential and damaging information against a former prosecutor accused of bungling a high- profile terror trial.

Justice attorneys say they can't disclose all the contents of the December 2004 report by the department's inspector general without violating employees' privacy.

However, ex-Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino of Detroit said the Justice Department violated his own privacy rights by revealing to the media that he was the subject of an internal ethics inquiry after he criticized the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy.

Two people who have seen the full report confirmed it rules out Convertino as a suspect in the leak case. Those people described the report's findings to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because it is sealed under a Justice Department protective order.

A heavily edited version of the report is included in court documents filed in Washington. It concludes that investigators "did not find sufficient evidence to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, who leaked this information."

It narrowed the source to about 30 prosecutors and other Justice Department officials, in Washington and Detroit, all of whom denied leaking the information. The full report also concluded that Convertino was not the source, according to related court documents filed by his attorneys.

Convertino's attorney, Stephen Kohn, would not comment on details in the government's sealed report. But he accused the Justice Department of sealing it to cover up its own misconduct.

A department spokesman declined to comment. But in documents filed in federal court, government attorneys rejected Convertino's request as "an attempt to discredit or embarrass individuals who were the subjects of that investigation."

For two years, Convertino led the government's case in the nation's first terrorism trial after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. He was removed in 2003 after the Justice Department concluded he withheld evidence that could have proved the innocence of the four defendants accused of being a Detroit terror cell.

Convictions of three of the four men were later overturned because of prosecutorial misconduct. The fourth was acquitted.

Four months after he was taken off the case, a January 2004 article in the Detroit Free Press cited anonymous Justice Department sources saying Convertino was under investigation for misconduct during the trial.

Convertino maintains he was targeted because, shortly before he was removed from the case, he criticized the Bush administration during a Senate hearing on funding for terrorism prosecutions. The sealed report does not cite that congressional hearing or identify it as a motive for the leak, according to the people who have seen the report.

Convertino was indicted last March for obstructing justice in the terror trial and in another case. The criminal case continues against Convertino, as does his civil lawsuit against the Justice Department.

Prosecutor Seeks To Bow Out Of Duke Case (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey And Sylvia Adcock, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Embattled DA Asks State to Take Over

After months of stinging criticism about his handling of the Duke University sexual assault investigation, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong sought to bow out of the case yesterday, requesting that the North Carolina Attorney General's Office handle the prosecution.

His decision to recuse himself was welcomed by the defense team representing the three Duke lacrosse players initially accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party.

"We feel very good about this. It's a fresh set of eyes looking at the case," said William Cotter of Raleigh, one of three attorneys for Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y. "We think it's more likely that they will listen to us and we will certainly be cooperative with him or her."

DOJ_NMG_0117133

The defense believes that another prosecutor would, after reviewing the contradictions of the alleged victim's accounts and the paucity of physical evidence, drop the case.

Attorney General Roy Cooper's office deferred questions about Nifong's action until a news conference scheduled for Saturday.

Nifong's request closely follows a formal ethics complaint made by the North Carolina State Bar, charging Nifong with violating ethics rules by engaging in "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" and by making comments that stirred "public condemnation of the accused." The bar complaint creates an ethical conflict that prevents Nifong from continuing the prosecution, lawyers said.

The case -- involving a black accuser and white suspects -- initially touched off a national debate about racism and privilege, as Nifong labeled the team from the elite university a "bunch of hooligans" and some portrayed reported actions at the party as the result of campus racism.

Since then, however, the case against the three has been staggered by contradictions in the alleged victim's story and Nifong's withholding of exculpatory evidence.

The victim's account has changed repeatedly on key points -- such as whether she was penetrated by a penis. The change prompted Nifong to drop rape charges against the three men Dec. 22, but they still face charges of sexual offense and kidnapping, which carry significant prison terms.

At the same time, some of Nifong's initial statements about the strength of the evidence he had gathered have proved to have been misleading.

The director of a private DNA-testing laboratory said it had omitted from its report that DNA from multiple men -- none a match to the defendants -- was found on vaginal and rectal swabs, on the accuser's body and on her underwear. Brian Meehan, the lab director, said he and Nifong had agreed to leave out that information because the case was so "explosive."

"Everyone just got run over by this guy who made these statements for which there was no support," said Duke Law School professor James E. Coleman Jr., who is African American and chaired the faculty committee that prepared a report looking into the lacrosse team's past.

Nifong "prejudged the case and injected inflammatory opinions that it was racially motivated," Coleman said, but "he had not done the investigation, so he had no idea what happened."

Calls to the District Attorney's Office after hours yesterday were not returned.

On Thursday, more contradictions in the victim's account were revealed in a motion by defense attorneys.

In an interview last month with a district attorney's investigator, the alleged victim said she had been attacked by two players -- not three, as she had said in previous accounts.

"The accuser's most recent recollections of events demonstrates clearly that she cannot accurately recall and describe her attackers and that any identification made by her is necessarily unreliable," defense attorneys wrote.

While the defense attorneys hold out hope that a new prosecutor may decide to drop the case, the move could also enable the prosecution to go forward -- if there is any suitable evidence.

Joe Kennedy, an associate professor of law at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, said that if there is strong evidence that a crime was committed, a new prosecutor could divorce himself from Nifong's ethical problems. The new prosecutor could argue that the withholding of DNA evidence from defense attorneys was wrong but still argue that a crime had been committed.

He described the move as a "win-win" for both sides of the case.

But one of the lead defense attorneys in the case, Joseph B. Cheshire said he is "very confident" that a new prosecutor in the case would drop the charges after a review of the evidence.

"We are extremely pleased to be rid of him," Cheshire said of Nifong. "The word of the accuser changes every time she opens her mouth. Anybody who takes an objective look at this case will dismiss it."

DA Asks Out Of Duke Rape Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The embattled district attorney in the Duke rape investigation, who faces disbarment for suspected "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" in statements he made about the case, has asked that the prosecution be moved to the state attorney general's office.

According to sources close to the 10-month-old prosecution, Durham County District Attorney Michael Nifong sent a letter yesterday to North Carolina Attorney General Roy Cooper asking that Mr. Cooper's office appoint a special prosecutor to take over the case.

Mr. Nifong has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the investigation and was named Dec. 28 in an ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. The complaint accuses him of breaking four rules of professional conduct while speaking to reporters about the investigation.

The complaint said Mr. Nifong made "extrajudicial statements" to reporters that "he knew or reasonably should have known would be disseminated ... and would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" the case.

The veteran prosecutor faces a preliminary state bar hearing on Jan. 24. A trial date has tentatively been scheduled for May 11.

Mr. Nifong was not available yesterday for comment. Noelle Talley, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cooper, confirmed last night in an e-mail that Mr. Nifong had asked for the appointment of a special prosecutor, but she was not available to comment on the request. The Nifong letter to Mr. Cooper was first reported by ABC News.

"We are pleased, and we offer the attorney general our full and complete cooperation," said Wade Smith, defense attorney for Collin Finnerty, one of the three men charged in the case. "We will meet with them at any time, and we are glad that people with such qualifications are going to take over the case."

Mr. Nifong's request came a day after he met with the accuser -- the first time the two had actually talked face to face about the case. He spoke with her briefly after the accusations first surfaced in March, but -- according to court records -- had never specifically discussed the case.

While she was at Mr. Nifong's office on Thursday, the accuser was served a subpoena to appear at a Feb. 5 hearing on a defense motion to suppress her identification of the three lacrosse players.

The Duke athletes -- Mr. Finnerty, Reade Seligmann and David Evans -- originally had been charged with rape after the woman, a student at North Carolina Central University who also worked as a stripper, said she was sexually assaulted during an off-campus party attended by Duke University students.

Mr. Nifong, who declared himself the lead prosecutor in the case, told reporters the 28-year-old woman was "gang raped" and beaten at the March 13 party thrown by Duke's lacrosse team.

He later dropped the sexual assault charges a few days before Christmas to lesser sexual offenses and kidnapping when the woman said during a Dec. 21 interview with an investigator from Mr. Nifong's office that she was not certain Mr. Seligmann had taken part in the assault and was unsure whether she had been penetrated by anyone.

The motion, filed in state court, said the accuser told investigator Linwood Wilson 10 months after the original accusations she was not now 100 percent certain that a rape as defined by the state of North Carolina occurred. That disclosure led Mr. Nifong to reduce the charges.

During an earlier interview with authorities, the woman said she was "100 percent" sure Mr. Seligmann had sexually assaulted her.

The Thursday meeting coincided with a defense motion asking a judge to prohibit the photo lineup in which the accuser identified the three lacrosse players.

Judge Osmond Smith, who is assigned as the sole judge to the case, is expected to rule on the admissibility of the photo lineup at the Feb. 5 hearing.

Prosecutor Asks To Exit Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson And David Barstow

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

DURHAM, N.C., Jan. 12 — The district attorney in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case asked the state attorney general on Friday to take over the troubled prosecution, saying he faced a conflict of interest because of ethics charges filed against him by the state bar, officials involved in the case said.

The decision by the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, throws new doubt on the future of a prosecution that has already suffered several sharp setbacks.

A spokeswoman for Roy Cooper, North Carolina's attorney general, confirmed that the office had received Mr. Nifong's request and said it would be discussed on Saturday. If Mr. Cooper agrees to review the case, it will remove a prosecutor who has become a lightning rod for fierce and unrelenting criticism.

Defense lawyers were jubilant, openly predicting that no prosecutor in the state would continue with a case that hangs almost entirely on the shifting accounts of the alleged victim, a stripper who claims she was assaulted after performing at a team party in March. The woman, who was consulted before Friday's recusal, remained firm in her desire for the case to go forward against the three former lacrosse players, an official involved in the case said.

The players face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense that could put them in prison for decades.

Speaking of the recusal, Joseph B. Cheshire, the lawyer for David Evans, one of the defendants, said: "We're very heartened by it. He should have done it weeks or months ago. For the first time, someone who is honest and objective and doesn't have an agenda will look at this case. We feel confident that when they do, these young men will be exonerated and this case will be dismissed."

Mr. Cheshire added that the attorney general should also look at possible obstruction of justice and manipulation of evidence by Mr. Nifong.

Friday's action marked a stinging professional defeat for Mr. Nifong, who has faced accusations of incompetence, prosecutorial misconduct and ethical violations for his handling of the case. In his letter to Mr. Cooper, Mr. Nifong said the accusations of ethical wrongdoing, which were brought last month by the state bar, presented him with a conflict of interest between defending his own conduct and prosecuting this case.

"He feels very disappointed that he can't go on for her," said David B. Freedman, Mr. Nifong's lawyer in the ethics case. "Mike at this point, as a result of the bar complaint, doesn't want to be a distraction to the case or take away from the prosecution of the case, which the witness still feels very strongly about."

According to friends, Mr. Nifong's resolve had begun to falter even before the ethics charges were brought against him.

At a court hearing on Dec. 15, a DNA laboratory director admitted that he and Mr. Nifong had deliberately withheld exculpatory information from a report. Mr. Nifong prided himself on integrity, having been a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, yet the laboratory director's testimony and his acknowledgment of the error undercut his reputation.

Things only worsened from there.

Some fellow district attorneys advised Mr. Nifong privately in Raleigh on Dec. 19 to take himself off the case. Mr. Nifong felt stunned and subdued, friends say, yet still could not bring himself to exit. In an interview with The New York Times two days later, he described such a step as tantamount to letting defendants handpick their own prosecutors.

But then the North Carolina State Bar filed an ethics complaint on Dec. 28, taking him to task for his early public comments about the case. It was an unprecedented rebuke for a prosecutor in the middle of a legal brawl. The next day, the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys issued a news release asking him to recuse himself immediately.

Mr. Nifong's friends told him he had two choices: dismiss the case or ask the attorney general to take it over. It was a bitter decision, friends said. His reputation hung in the balance. Mr. Nifong decided he had to do something he had left to his investigators over the 10 months since the alleged assault: talk about it directly with the woman he called "my victim."

In a two-hour meeting at his office on Thursday, Mr. Nifong and an aide talked about the choices, an official involved in the case said. He told the accuser that a trial would be brutal, but that he had already talked with the attorney general's special prosecutions unit and trusted that office to give the case a fair review. He asked what she wanted to do.

She was concerned about the effect of the case on Mr. Nifong's career, the official recalled. She wanted to sleep on the decision. She continued to insist she had been sexually assaulted.

On Friday, she and Mr. Nifong spoke by telephone. She again said she wanted to go forward. Although she was not happy about Mr. Nifong's giving up of the case, the official said, she said she understood his reasoning and pledged to cooperate with any new team.

In Durham, Mr. Nifong's exit was greeted with relief on all sides.

Irving Joyner, a law professor who has been monitoring the case for the N.A.A.C.P, expressed hope that the attorney general would bring new energy to the case. John F. Burness, senior vice president for public affairs at Duke, said the university hoped "this change will lead to a fair and speedy resolution of this case."

Over 10 turbulent months, all the protagonists in the racially charged case have undergone sharp transformations in the pitiless glare of national publicity.

The defendants, who are white, were initially portrayed as boys gone wild. But in time, with the fraying of the evidence and careful maneuvering by their legal team, they emerged in news accounts as victims of a kind of reverse discrimination, promising young men whose lives were being destroyed by concocted accusations.

The accuser, who is black, was at first embraced at candlelight vigils. Investigators depicted her as the victim of a brutal assault. But her shifting and inconsistent accounts of what happened, combined with the absence of incriminating DNA evidence, have resulted in her being branded a false accuser.

But no one was more fully transformed in this case than Mr. Nifong. Once an obscure but respected career prosecutor, he is now routinely portrayed as having recklessly and stubbornly pursued a weak case for political gain.

DOJ_NMG_0117136

Mr. Nifong compounded his troubles with seemingly avoidable blunders, most in the earliest weeks, before anyone was indicted. He ordered a lineup that violated standard police procedures. He spoke misleadingly in public about evidence in the case and disparaged the Duke lacrosse team as “hooligans” whose “daddies” would “buy them big-time lawyers.” He refused to hear out defense lawyers who proffered photographs and phone records intended to prove their clients’ innocence. Most significantly, he mishandled the DNA test results by failing to turn them over to defense lawyers for seven months.

After the indictments, he was repeatedly outgunned and outmaneuvered in the courts and in the news media by some of the best defense lawyers in North Carolina.

Never was the mismatch clearer than on Dec. 15, when defense lawyers pounced on his handling of the DNA test results. In court that day, with family and friends of the defendants in the audience, Mr. Nifong seemed almost disengaged, slumping in his seat, asking few questions as the defense team delivered body blows to his case.

Even before the DNA hearing, dozens of people had filed complaints against Mr. Nifong with the state bar. Mr. Nifong initially responded by saying he welcomed a review of all the lawyers — once the case was over.

He misjudged the bar.

A special section of the bar’s ethics code applies to public comments by prosecutors — but not private lawyers — and the bar had opened an investigation on March 30, just three days after Mr. Nifong began his media blitz.

The investigation culminated in last month’s formal complaint, which accused Mr. Nifong of making improper, inflammatory and misleading comments about the case. Mr. Nifong is to appear before a bar disciplinary committee on May 11.

Tom Lunsford, executive director of the state bar, said the complaint started with a grievance filed by a private lawyer.

Was it a lawyer from the defense team? “Can’t say,” he replied.

Nevertheless, no one can remember the North Carolina bar ever filing a complaint against a prosecutor for prejudicial publicity, much less in the middle of a case.

Not only did Mr. Nifong misjudge the bar, he misjudged the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys. Back in September, the conference had sent Mr. Nifong a letter offering help with the case, including support staff, a shadow jury and advice on responding to defense leaks.

“We try to take care of our own,” Thomas J. Keith, one of four district attorneys who signed the letter, said in an interview this month. Mr. Keith recalled Mr. Nifong’s response: “Tom, thanks for the letter, but I don’t need any help right now.”

As the public criticism of Mr. Nifong escalated, his fellow district attorneys began to hear rumblings that some state legislators were threatening to seek new oversight laws for all district attorneys. The DNA revelations on Dec. 15 only heightened their alarm.

On Dec. 19, several district attorneys met with Mr. Nifong and advised him to hand the case to a special prosecutor.

He had hoped they would stand together; instead they wanted him to pull out. Mr. Nifong was stunned.

Any hope he had of regaining their support probably ended three days later, on Dec. 22, when Mr. Nifong dropped rape charges against all three defendants, though he continued to press other sex offense charges. Mr. Nifong said he had acted after the woman told his investigator she could not be certain she had been penetrated by a penis. Although he did not say so at the time, the woman also changed several other major aspects of her story during that interview, including that just two, not three, lacrosse players had taken part in the attack. The third, she said, had only stood by.

Among his peers, the questions were obvious: Why had he not closely questioned his victim months earlier? How could he pursue a case with such divergent accounts from the key witness? Where was the proof?

The state bar filed its complaint on Dec. 28. Better than anyone, the district attorneys understood its rarity and potential political significance.

“That is what pushed us into action,” Mr. Keith said.

Two weeks later, Mr. Nifong asked the state attorney general to take over the case.

Duke Lacrosse District Attorney Asks For Special Prosecutor In Sexual Assault Case (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) — As he aggressively pursued sexual assault charges against three Duke lacrosse players for nearly 10 months, Mike Nifong never wavered publicly in his commitment to take the oft-sensationalized case to trial.

But facing ethics charges that could lead to his disbarment, the Durham County district attorney quietly asked to be removed from the case Friday — faxing a letter to the state attorney general asking for a special prosecutor to take over the case that is sure to define his nearly three-decade career.

"His withdrawing from the case has nothing to do with how he feels about the merit of the case," Nifong's attorney, David Freedman, told the Associated Press. "He's disappointed he has to get out of the case. He likes to see things from beginning to end."

What comes next in the troubled prosecution of Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans will likely be determined by the lawyer appointed by State Attorney General Roy Cooper. His office declined to comment Friday night, but a spokeswoman said officials would speak with reporters Saturday.

"If he decides to take it, his staff is going to spend a significant amount of time to review the case files, interviewing the witnesses and making a determination on what is the proper process," said Peg Dorer, director of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys.

Dorer said that could take a month or more. Defense attorneys said they weren't worried about the prospect of such a delay, and instead cheered Nifong's decision to recuse himself.

"We've tried to cooperate with Mr. Nifong, and he's refused," said Joseph Cheshire, an attorney for Evans. "We look forward to working with whoever the new prosecutor is and we're confident that after that review is made, the case will be dismissed."

Under North Carolina law, only a district attorney can formally request a special prosecutor. The request can be made when there are potential conflicts of interest, when a case is particularly complex or when there are other unusual circumstances.

Once the ethics charges were filed, Nifong "had a conflict of interest with respect with the case," said Ron Sullivan, a criminal law professor at Yale University. "It's probably safe to say that Nifong felt that he couldn't be completely objective."

Nifong led the investigation into allegations a 28-year-old student at North Carolina Central University — hired to perform as a stripper — was gang-raped and beaten at a March 13 party thrown by Duke's highly ranked lacrosse team. His frequent interviews with news agencies in the early days of the case generated much scrutiny; at one point, he called the lacrosse team "a bunch of hooligans."

But as he started to hand over his evidence to the defense, the case appeared to unravel. Legal experts and observers have said it appears to be based only on the testimony of an accuser who has told wildly different versions of the alleged assault — a shifting story that led Nifong to drop rape charges on Dec. 22. The three players remain charged with sexual offense and kidnapping.

Last month, the North Carolina State Bar charged Nifong with violating four rules of professional conduct for making misleading and inflammatory comments about the athletes under suspicion. He faces penalties ranging from admonishment to removal from the bar.

"He feels as a result of the accusations against him that he would be a distraction and he wants to make sure the accuser receives a fair trial," said Freedman, who said Nifong met with the accuser this week to tell her of his decision.

"He still believes in the case," Freedman said. "He just believes his continued presence would hurt her."

2 Missing Boys Found Alive In Mo. Home (NSDY/AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 13, 2007

BEAUFORT, Mo. -- A 13-year-old boy who vanished from the gravel road near his home five days ago was found alive Friday about 60 miles away in a suburban St. Louis home, along with a 15-year-old boy missing since 2002, authorities said.

Sharp-eyed police and suspicions about a white truck led police to the Kirkwood apartment of Michael Devlin, 41, who has been charged with one count of first-degree kidnapping, Sheriff Gary Toelke said.

The sheriff said both boys appeared unharmed. William Ownby who goes by Ben, appeared somewhat dazed as he walked inside the sheriff's department, where he was reunited with his family who had been searching for him since Monday.

"His eyes lit up like silver dollars," said the boy's uncle, Loyd Bailie, who was escorted to the sheriff's department with Ben's parents. Everyone broke into tears and Ben's parents embraced him as tightly as they could, Bailie said.

The straight-A student and Boy Scout was last seen after he stepped off his school bus and ran toward his Beaufort home down a gravel road on Monday.

A friend who left the bus with the boy told authorities that after the two parted, he saw a small white pickup with a camper shell speeding away from where Ben had been walking.

Searchers on foot, horseback and all-terrain vehicles looked for Ben in the hilly area about 60 miles southwest of St. Louis.

Toelke said the break in the case came Thursday night. Kirkwood city police officers were serving a warrant on an apartment complex when they noticed a white truck matching the description of a vehicle authorities had been searching for in the Ownby investigation.

Kirkwood officers contacted the Franklin County Sheriff's Department and determined where the owner of the truck was and then searched Devlin's house.

Toelke said authorities found Ben and were surprised to find another boy who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck.

Hornbeck disappeared from his Richwoods in October 2002, when he was 11. He went for a bike ride and never returned.

DOJ_NMG_0117138

Hornbeck's parents, Pam and Craig Akers, were reunited with their son, Toelke said.

Later, both boys were taken to SSM Cardinal Glennon Children's Hospital in St. Louis for evaluation. Hospital spokesman Bob Davidson said both were in good spirits.

"The boys were smiling and appeared very pleased to be with their families," Davidson said. "Obviously the families were incredibly tickled to have the boys back. It's a thrilling night."

Hornbeck's parents have devoted themselves to bringing missing people home since Hornbeck vanished over four years ago from his hometown 65 miles southwest of St. Louis.

His parents, dozens of volunteers and sniffer dogs searched for weeks. The couple set up a Web site and listened to anyone who offered a tip.

Craig Akers, Shawn's stepfather, quit his job as a software designer to devote his time to a foundation bearing his son's name. They depleted their savings, borrowed against their retirement and talked to psychics. The financial strain forced both of them back to work.

A retired police officer volunteered to work on the case until Shawn was found.

Even though so much time had passed, Pam Akers said her son is frozen in her memory as an 11-year-old boy.

"It's been four years," she said on the anniversary of his disappearance last fall. "But for me, it's just been one long continuous day."

Toelke said authorities were still investigating the motive behind the abductions. Franklin County Prosecutor Robert Parks said more charges are likely to be filed.

"There are a lot of things we don't know right now," Toelke said.

Neighbor Rick Butler, 43, said the FBI came to his door Thursday night and showed a picture of Ben, asking if he had seen him. He said he had not. But he had seen a boy he now believes was Hornbeck.

He said he saw no evidence that the boy now believed to be Hornbeck was scared or trying to get away. He had seen Devlin and the teen pitch a tent in the courtyard.

"I didn't see or hear anything odd or unusual from the apartment," Butler said. "I just figured them for father and son."

Devlin worked at a local pizzeria and an overnight shift answering phones at a funeral home, the St. Louis Post Dispatch reported.

"He just acted like a relatively normal guy. Nothing unusual stuck out at me," his former landlord, Marvin Reid, told the newspaper.

Their Dreams Come True (SLPD)

By Kim Bell, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

UNION — Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby spent an ecstatic Saturday reuniting with family and friends as authorities intensified their investigation of the pizza parlor manager accused of kidnapping the boys.

Michael J. Devlin, 41, of Kirkwood is being held in lieu of $1 million bail, facing a single Franklin County charge of abducting Ben after the 13-year-old got off a school bus near his Beaufort home six days ago. Shawn, then 11, disappeared in 2002 from his Richwoods neighborhood, in Washington County, about 30 miles from Beaufort.

Further state and federal charges are possible.

Neither Shawn nor Ben was allowed Saturday to take questions or discuss the ordeal when they appeared in separate news conferences with their families.

"I feel like I'm in a dream," said Shawn's mother, Pam Akers, who had not seen her son since Oct. 6, 2002, when he left his Washington County home to visit a friend. "Only now it's a good dream, not the nightmare I've had for the last 4½ years."

At Ben's family news conference here at the Franklin County Courthouse, his mother, Doris Ownby, was asked to describe her reunion with her son.

"I didn't say anything," she said. "I grabbed him and held him."

Shawn clutched his mother's hands and laid his head on her shoulder as he entered the gymnasium of Richwoods Elementary, his former school, Saturday where 75 friends and neighbors waited to greet him.

Now 15, Shawn is of course taller than the 11-year-old who went missing, and he sports a piercing in his lower lip.

In a statement Saturday night, Devlin's family expressed gratitude for the "professionalism" the various agencies investigating the case demonstrated Friday.

"As parents, the Devlin family along with all compassionate people have prayed for the safe return of these young men to their loved ones — and yesterday those prayers were answered," said the statement, issued by the attorneys retained by the family, Ethan Corlija and Michael Kielty of Clayton. "Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed."

Portrait of a suspect

As Beaufort and Richwoods came to grips with the surreal events of Friday, conflicting portraits of the man sitting in the Franklin County Jail emerged.

At the Kirkwood Imo's where Devlin was a manager, co-workers remembered him as reliable and amiable. They said he often teased them.

Devlin was viewed far differently by neighbors at the nearby apartment complex where he lived, apparently with Hornbeck.

They said another side of Devlin surfaced in a dispute last fall over a parking place that drew the attention of Kirkwood police.

"I warned my children to stay away from him," said Krista Jones, 25, a neighbor.

Corlija said he met with Devlin Friday at the Franklin County Jail. He described him as "very calm, soft-spoken, somewhat articulate and other than that polite, very polite."

Devlin will be arraigned this week on the kidnapping charge, Corlija said.

He would not discuss reports that Devlin had confessed to police.

Neighbors described the young man living with Devlin as a slightly withdrawn teenager who favored black clothing, and enjoyed video games, bicycle trips to Wal-Mart with a friend and, lately, the company of what may have been his girlfriend. They believed he was Devlin's son.

"He seemed like a troubled teen, but he seemed normal," Jones said.

Anatomy of an arrest

The case came together Thursday night when Kirkwood police, at the apartment complex on an unrelated case, saw the white Nissan pickup believed to have been used in Ben's abduction.

After police arrested Devlin Friday morning, authorities went to the apartment. The first FBI agent to enter saw a familiar face.

FBI Special Agent Roland Corvington said Ben Ownby had one question:

"Young Ben was sitting there and looked up … and said, 'Are you going to take me home?'"

The agent turned to the other youth, who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck.

Authorities said they don't yet know what happened in that apartment.

Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke and Washington County Sheriff Kevin Schroeder did not press the boys for details because they want to give them time to adjust to life with their families.

"I don't want to push it, shock him, where he feels he has to be defensive," Schroeder said of Shawn.

The sheriffs agreed they may need the help of a mental health professional in interviewing the boys.

Hornbeck's family said Saturday they want to let Shawn share details of the abduction at his own pace.

Ben and his family met with Franklin County investigators Saturday afternoon, according to an uncle, Loyd Bailie.

In the coming days and weeks, the boys and their families will be counseled by experts in the reunification of abducted children.

Being Ben

At the news conference here Saturday, Doris Ownby said she only reluctantly let Ben out of her sight since his return.

"He's Ben," she said. Her son, drawn in his father's tight embrace, smiled broadly throughout the 15-minute appearance before the media. "It's a little overwhelming for him," said Doris Ownby.

Even so, added Ben's dad, William, "You can't believe how good we're doing."

For the time being, William Ownby said, Devlin is not his family's concern.

"Our focus is on our son, we're not going to think about him," he said.

After four days spent away, his parents said Ben was happy to return to the routine of home.

When he finally broke free of his parent's embraces Friday night, Ben retreated to his room to play some of his favorite video games. It was after 1 a.m.

"Don't stay up too late," his mother said.

The first thing she did Saturday on awakening was check his room to make sure Ben was still there.

Missing Boys Found: Questions Accompany Elation VIDEO (KCS)

By Kevin Murphy

The Kansas City Star, January 13, 2007

Two kidnapped Missouri boys — one held for four years, the other for four days — emerged calm and smiling before the public Saturday, but questions remained about their captivity.

Authorities were mum on what Shawn Hornbeck, 15, and Ben Ownby, 13, went through at the hands of their alleged abductor, a suburban St. Louis pizza restaurant manager who had no apparent criminal record.

The euphoria of the last two days was evident Saturday as Shawn, Ben and their parents held nationally televised news conferences to recount their dramatic reunions after police found the boys unharmed Friday in a Kirkwood apartment.

Now comes the gritty process of piecing together the details of the almost unbelievable crime that thrust Shawn and Ben into the national spotlight and will keep them there for months to come.

Troubling and potentially embarrassing questions must be asked. Psychological wounds must heal. Foremost in many minds is how an abductor could have held Shawn captive four years despite an intense search that included the placement of posters around Kirkwood.

"It's just mind-boggling that it was so easy to hide someone in plain sight," said Craig Akers, Shawn's stepfather. "It's hard to believe anyone could be that brazen."

Akers said Shawn told him Friday that he saw one poster on a bench in a neighborhood supermarket — and he didn't like the picture.

Both boys were abducted in rural areas southwest of St. Louis — Shawn on Oct. 6, 2002, in Washington County and Ben on Monday in Franklin County. Michael Devlin, 41, is being held on a kidnapping charge as the investigation continues.

"We still have quite a bit of work to do on Mr. Devlin," said Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke.

Police found the boys unharmed after officers spotted a pickup truck at Devlin's apartment building that matched one seen when Ben was abducted.

Pam Akers called the recovery of her son, Shawn, "a miracle."

"We have a lot of catching up do," she said. "He has grown up on me, that's for sure."

Shawn was 11 when he was abducted while riding his bike.

Craig Akers said Shawn came home Friday to find his clothes in his dresser just the way he left them four years ago.

"I guess we are going to have to get rid of those and find some new ones," Akers said.

Doris Ownby said she and her husband, William Ownby Sr., had not talked to Ben about his captivity. Ben was kidnapped after getting off his school bus, authorities said.

"We are just excited and happy to have him home," Doris Ownby said. "We grabbed him and didn't let him go."

Neither boy spoke at his family's news conference. The events were held about two hours apart Saturday morning. Each boy smiled often and hugged his parents.

Rick Butler, who lives in an apartment building next to Devlin's, told The Kansas City Star on Saturday that he often would see Devlin in the parking lot and would occasionally see Shawn. Butler said he once saw the two pitch a tent on the building's lawn. He assumed they were father and son.

"It made me think they were getting ready for a camping trip," Butler said.

Butler said that about a year ago he found a cell phone on the ground that turned out to be Devlin's. Shawn went to Butler's apartment to pick it up.

"He just came over and said thanks," Butler said. "He seemed a little nervous but didn't act like there was anything terribly wrong." Butler said he now wonders why the boy didn't say, "I'm in trouble, this guy is keeping me over there. Call for help."

Craig Akers said Shawn did not go to school during the four years he was missing. Kirkwood district spokeswoman Ginger Fletcher said that school officials had no indication that neighbors called to check on why Shawn was not in class. Fletcher said that an adult would not have needed approval to homeschool Shawn but would have had to prove he was if anyone investigated.

Authorities would not say Saturday what they knew about either boy's captivity.

Psychological experts contacted by The Star on Saturday said an abductor could use many techniques to exert control.

Grace Ketterman, a noted Kansas City psychiatrist, compared the experience to the Stockholm syndrome, a condition in which captives begin to identify with or become sympathetic to their captors.

"When kids are abducted, they may be threatened severely," Ketterman said. "The person who kidnaps them may use brainwashing techniques. They can really convince the child he belongs to them."

The exertion of control can be so great that the child may be convinced not to talk with playmates or strangers and may even ignore his own picture on a bus-stop poster.

Ketterman said that many times the child is told that if he tries to escape, his family will be killed.

The control can be even stronger if there also is sexual abuse. Sex can be "a powerful force" over a child, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0117141

Ketterman said that helping children who have lived a long time with an abductor can require intense therapy for the child and family. Parents must be patient because it can take time to rekindle family bonds and the child may have long-term trouble with self-identity.

David Barker, an Overland Park therapist, said that sometimes the child reaches a point where he feels safe with his kidnapper and won't seek help.

Barker said it will be an "emotional and difficult task to integrate the kid (Shawn) back into the family, even if that is possible." That could require therapy to help the family deal with feelings of guilt, anger, insecurity and uncertainty.

"Parents may feel guilty about letting this happen to their child. They may feel ashamed that everyone knows about it. For the kid, there may be the feeling, 'Why didn't my parents come and get me?' "

The reunion of the family can be traumatic.

Barker said that Shawn might feel the same as a soldier returning from war. The family may have adjusted to his absence.

Craig Akers said Saturday that he had not discussed the captivity with Shawn.

"That will come in due time, and when Shawn is ready to discuss it, we will," Akers said.

Devlin's family released a statement Saturday expressing their gratitude to local authorities and the FBI "for their professionalism in safely reuniting Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck with their families," according to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch's Web site.

"Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed," said the statement, released through a law firm.

Devlin, by most accounts, seemed an unlikely suspect in a kidnapping. Besides working as an assistant manager for an Imo's Pizza restaurant near his home, he worked two late-night shifts each week taking phone calls at Bopp Chapel, a Kirkwood funeral home.

"He was prompt, well-mannered and efficient in receiving calls," the funeral home's operators said in a statement Saturday. Funeral director Matt Shockley called Devlin quiet and said Devlin never talked about his personal life.

Andrew Habben of Kirkwood said he was surprised so few people in the tight-knit community of 26,000 seemed to know Devlin or Shawn.

"It goes to show you that you never know. Everyone's got their own life," Habben said.

Devlin is scheduled to make his first court appearance this week in Franklin County on a charge of kidnapping Ben Ownby, but other charges are possible, Prosecutor Bob Parks said. Washington County, where Shawn Hornbeck's family lives, has not filed charges.

The FBI also may file charges, based on evidence recovered from Devlin's apartment, agent Roland Corvington said at a Saturday news conference.

Corvington said that when FBI agents entered Devlin's apartment Friday, Ben asked them, "Are you going to take me home?" They then asked Shawn to identify himself.

"After that, it was quite euphoric, obviously," Corvington said.

The boys' parents said Saturday that they hope their sons' safe return gives hope to the families of other kidnap victims.

"Good things can happen," Craig Akers said. "Things don't always end badly."

Elation Greets Recovery Of 2 Boys After Abduction (NYT)

By Malcolm Gay

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

UNION, Mo., Jan. 13 — On Thursday evening, they were captives in the same tiny two-bedroom apartment in suburban St. Louis. Abducted four years apart, William Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck were freed on Friday, and they smiled sheepishly on Saturday as their families held back-to-back news conferences to discuss their boys' astonishing rescue.

Dressed in a checked shirt, blue jeans and a pair of oval glasses, William, 13, who is known as Ben, was instructed not to speak to reporters. Looking up occasionally, Ben clung close to his family as they rejoiced at the turn of events.

"We're just ecstatic," Ben's mother, Doris Ownby, said. "We don't want to let him go out of our sight."

Sheriff Gary Toelke of Franklin County said the kidnapping suspect, Michael Devlin, 41, had confessed, but added that he could not discuss details of the investigation.

Robert Parks, the Franklin County prosecuting attorney, has charged Mr. Devlin, a pizzeria manager, with one count of first-degree kidnapping. He was being held on $1 million bond.

Emotions ran high in neighboring Washington County, where Shawn entered the balloon-festooned gymnasium at Richwoods Elementary, his old school. Wearing a blue hooded sweatshirt and sporting a shaggy head of hair and pierced lower lip, Shawn grasped his mother's hands. Also told not to speak to reporters, he laid his head on his mother's shoulder as she spoke.

"I still feel like I'm in a dream, only this time it's a good dream, not the nightmare I've had to live for the past four-and-a-half years," his mother, Pam Akers, told reporters.

Shawn's stepfather, Craig Akers, said he and his wife had been in disbelief when they were all reunited.

"There was that split second of shock," Mr. Akers said. "Once I saw the face, I said, 'Oh my God, that's my son.' "

Shawn, now 15, vanished on Oct. 6, 2002, when he was 11. His parents reported that he had last been seen wearing a Little League jersey as he rode a bicycle to a friend's house in Richwoods, Mo., a rural town about 65 miles southwest of St. Louis.

Ben, a Boy Scout and a straight-A student, disappeared on Monday afternoon after stepping off a school bus and running down a gravel road toward home in the rural town of Beaufort, Mo., about 60 miles west of St. Louis.

Ben's disappearance prompted an intense search of hilly Franklin County. Investigators said they had been following about 500 leads in the case, though they had focused on a tip from one of Ben's friends who had reported seeing a dilapidated white pickup with a camper shell speeding away from the place where Ben disappeared.

"Basically, that's all we had," Sheriff Toelke said.

Investigators got a break on Thursday when Kirkwood police officers, Gary Wagster and Chris Nelson, arrived at Mr. Devlin's apartment complex in suburban St. Louis. They were serving a warrant in an unrelated case but noticed a small white truck matching the description of the one in the Ownby investigation.

After questioning Mr. Devlin at the pizzeria, officers searched his ground-floor apartment on Friday.

Sheriff Toelke said Shawn identified himself to officers as having been missing for four-and-a-half-years when they entered the home.

Roland Corvington, special agent for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, told reporters that when officers entered the apartment, Ben asked: "Are you going to take me home?"

The boys had no visible injuries. Ben's parents said that on Friday night he was eager to play video games and go to bed.

Mr. Devlin, who managed an Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, also worked part-time answering phones overnight at Bopp Chapel funeral home there.

"He was prompt, well-mannered and very efficient," Jim Moyers, a funeral director at Bopp Chapel, said in a statement.

Neighbors who lived across from Mr. Devlin's run-down red brick apartment were less generous. They described Mr. Devlin as an immense, bearded man with wire-rimmed glasses who kept to himself. They said that he did not appear to have been keeping secrets, but that he was combative and antisocial.

One neighbor, Mario Emanuel, 29, said that about three months ago Mr. Devlin called the police on a visitor who took his parking space.

Referring to Shawn, Mr. Emanuel, an installation technician for DirecTV, said, "When the police came, they talked to Devlin and the son — who turned out not to be the son — they talked to the police. If they would have investigated across the board, they would have had him."

Tom Ballman, a Kirkwood police officer, confirmed that Mr. Devlin had summoned the police to the apartment complex, a two-story working-class enclave in the otherwise well-to-do suburb.

Another neighbor said her husband had also had tense encounters with Mr. Devlin over the space.

"The parking spot thing was weird," the neighbor, Krista Jones, said. "He woke us up one night because he was honking in the parking lot at like 2 o'clock in the morning. Someone had parked in his space."

"My husband almost beat him up," she added.

Ms. Jones said that Mr. Devlin kept the blinds drawn, though she would occasionally see Shawn riding his bike in the evening and that the boy was occasionally visited by what appeared to be a friend and a girlfriend.

A check of Mr. Devlin's name with the Missouri Highway Patrol's sex-offender registry turned up nothing. And a search of Missouri court records revealed no criminal history.

Mr. Parks declined to divulge information about how the boys had spent their time in captivity, but added that more charges were likely to come. "It's my hope that he never sees the outside of jail in his natural life," Mr. Parks said.

Mr. Corvington of the F.B.I. said his agency was also looking into federal charges.

DOJ_NMG_0117143

For the time being, though, the families said they were more interested in reconnecting with their rescued sons than worrying about Mr. Devlin's fate.

"We've got a lot of catching up to do," said a tearful Pam Akers, marveling at her teenage son's growth. "He's grown up on me, that's for sure."

Case Of Missing Boys Stands Out (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 13, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo. (AP) — For more than four years, Shawn Hornbeck seemed to have had every chance to escape, left alone for hours to ride his bike, play video games and walk past missing-child posters showing his own age-progressed image.

But mental health experts say this troubling case is hardly so simple, and that Hornbeck was likely kept mentally shackled by terror and domination from the man accused of kidnapping him, 41-year-old Michael Devlin.

"I think it's a real mistake to judge this child. Whatever he did to this point to stay alive is to his credit," said Terri Weaver, an associate psychology professor at Saint Louis University.

Weaver, an expert on post traumatic stress disorder, said children in such situations kick into survival mode, "doing what needs to be done to keep yourself going day-to-day."

Devlin, a 300-pound pizza parlor manager, is accused of abducting Hornbeck four years ago when the slight boy, taken as he was riding his bike, was just 11. Now a gangly 15-year-old with floppy hair and a pierced lip, he was found by surprise Friday when police acting on a tip went to Devlin's modest-two-bedroom apartment in this St. Louis suburb to rescue 13-year-old Ben Ownby, who had been snatched four days earlier on his way home from school.

Now investigators are piecing together the details of Hornbeck's captivity and Ownby's abduction, trying to discover how the boys could have been kept captive in an apartment where neighbors often heard banging, shouting and arguing.

VIDEO: Ownby family ecstatic Ben's home

Internet profiles posted as far back as two years ago that were created using pictures of Hornbeck emerged over the weekend when a blog mentioned them. A Kirkwood detective said Sunday that he had heard about the profiles but didn't know what role they might be playing in the investigation.

A Yahoo user homepage belonging to "xxdevildevlinxx" was created in April 2004 and shows a partial picture of a boy, strongly resembling recent photos of Hornbeck, with an eyebrow piercing. On Saturday, the boy had a lip ring and three ear piercings.

Another Yahoo profile using the same picture is registered to an "mdevlin" in Kirkwood, Mo.

A separate profile was taken out under the name Shawn Devlin in November 2005, according to the Yahoo page. It contains a full picture of a young boy similar to pictures of Hornbeck; the page says the user lives in Kirkwood, Mo.

A website called the True Crime Blog mentioned the pages this weekend.

Residents in Hornbeck's hometown of Richwoods were shocked the boy could have so much contact with the outside world but remain at his captor's side — refusing to flee even as Devlin worked two jobs that forced him to leave Hornbeck and, later, Ownby, alone.

Weaver said repeated contact with outsiders can actually reinforce an abducted child's sense of helplessness.

"Over time, your safety has been threatened. You are a child. You may have been traumatized in other ways. You may feel helpless to reach out to other people," she said.

The case is reminiscent of the Elizabeth Smart kidnapping. The Salt Lake City teen was taken for nine months by a religious zealot and passed up several chances to escape.

Stephen Golding, a forensic psychologist who examined the suspect in the Smart case, said captors often establish control over their victims through fear.

"People are led to believe, through someone taking advantage of their vulnerabilities, that leaving is not an option, that things will get worse for them or will get worse for others," Golding said.

Neighbors describe Devlin as a loner with a quick temper. He obsessed over a reserved parking space at his apartment complex.

Rob Bushelle, who lives in Devlin's complex, said he made that mistake last fall. Devlin arrived in his white pickup with an adolescent boy in his passenger seat, whom Bushelle now recognizes as Hornbeck. Devlin became furious and began shouting at Bushelle, demanding he move. Bushelle refused, and Devlin called police.

While Devlin spoke with officers, Hornbeck got out of Devlin's truck and walked into the building, Bushelle said.

Devlin was raised in the St. Louis suburb of Webster Groves. His family released a statement Saturday praising law enforcement agencies for returning Ownby and Hornbeck to their families. Devlin's relatives said they prayed for Ownby's safe return when they learned last week he was kidnapped, and said "the past few days have been incredibly difficult.

"Just as we are relieved that both Ben and Shawn are now safe, we hope that Michael will be safe as the facts of his case are revealed."

Devlin's childhood neighbors told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Devlin was adopted and one of six children.

Sarah Sullivan described him as a quiet child in an otherwise outgoing family. He was always big for his age and avoided sports. He had a hot temper and spent a lot of time in his room, she said.

Devlin got a job at Imo's Pizza when he was in high school. He never left the pizza parlor over the years. He has no apparent criminal past, except for a pair of traffic fines, officials said.

"He's smarter than most people, so he liked to be a smart aleck," co-worker Gus Nanos told the newspaper.

"In his calmer moments, he would be an incredibly nice and thoughtful person," Nanos said.

Co-workers noticed that Devlin became more withdrawn in 2002, the year Hornbeck was abducted. That was also the year Devlin, a diabetic, had a toe amputated.

"He went from being such a teaser to a much quieter person. I felt like he had been humbled by all of his health problems," Nanos said.

Devlin was being held Sunday in the Franklin County jail in lieu of $1 million bail and is charged with first-degree kidnapping.

It was unclear Sunday whether Devlin had a lawyer. Jail officials would not comment, and the county public defender's office was closed.

Police say Devlin drove his pickup to Beaufort, Mo., Monday and kidnapped Ownby. A witness spotted his truck and its description was broadcast in an Amber Alert.

Kirkwood police officers Gary Wagster and Chris Nelson spotted the truck Thursday night outside Devlin's apartment.

"Are you seeing what I'm seeing?" Wagster asked Nelson, according to the Post-Dispatch.

A neighbor said the truck belonged to Devlin, and the officers saw him leave his apartment to empty his trash into a trash bin. They questioned Devlin in the parking lot, and he was friendly and cooperative.

Devlin's demeanor quickly changed when the officers started asking him specific questions, Wagster said. He became agitated and defensive.

"It was a total 180 degrees from where he was," Wagster said.

The Kirkwood officers remained outside the apartment all night, and watched as Devlin left the apartment in the morning.

FBI agents and Franklin County sheriff's deputies arrested Devlin at his job the next day, Wagster said.

A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said that FBI agents went to Imo's Pizza, where Devlin was a manager, and that the suspect revealed details giving agents probable cause to arrest him and search his apartment. They then found the boys, said the source, who refused to be identified because he was unauthorized to speak publicly about the case.

The families of both boys have refused to comment beyond a pair of news conferences they held Saturday, during which the boys were told not to talk to reporters. Lawyers for the families did not answer phone calls to their offices Sunday.

2 Missing Boys Are Found Near St. Louis (NYT)

By Patrick Mcgeehan

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

When the police entered an apartment near St. Louis yesterday looking for a 13-year-old boy who had disappeared 60 miles away on Monday, they found him and a bonus: another Missouri teenager who had been missing for more than four years.

Officers found William Ownby, who vanished after stepping off a school bus in Beaufort on Monday afternoon, and Shawn Hornbeck, a 15-year-old who was last seen riding a bicycle near his home in Richwoods in October 2002, inside the rental apartment, in Kirkwood, Mo.

Sheriff Gary Toelke of Franklin County told reporters that both boys appeared dazed but unharmed.

Officers arrested Michael Devlin, 41, who lived in the apartment, and charged him with one count of first-degree kidnapping. Mr. Devlin was being held on $1 million bond.

Robert Parks, the prosecuting attorney of Franklin County, told reporters that Mr. Devlin had confessed to the crime and added that more charges were likely to be filed in the case.

Sheriff Toelke said officers were questioning Mr. Devlin, who worked as a pizza-delivery dispatcher and on the overnight shift in a funeral home, to try to determine a motive behind the abductions. Mr. Devlin's name was not found in a check of the Missouri Highway Patrol's registry of sex offenders. Similarly, a search of Missouri court records revealed no criminal history.

In Beaufort, family and friends of William, a Boy Scout known as Ben, had been conducting a full-scale search yesterday for the boy. He was last seen dashing home from the school bus on Monday. A schoolmate told the authorities that he saw a dilapidated white pickup truck with a camper shell speeding away from the spot.

An intense hunt ensued in rural Franklin County. Members of the Ownby family appeared on television to make tearful appeals for the boy's return. Community members plastered fliers throughout the area and ventured out on foot, horseback and all-terrain vehicles looking for clues.

The break in the case came Thursday evening when two Kirkwood police officers, out to serve a warrant at the apartment complex where Mr. Devlin lived, spotted a white truck that matched the description, Sheriff Toelke said. The blocklong single-story complex is just off Interstate 44 near a collection of industrial buildings.

The Kirkwood police contacted the Franklin County Sheriff's Department, located Mr. Devlin's address and returned the next day to find Ben and, to their surprise, Shawn Hornbeck, in the apartment, he said.

Sheriff Toelke said that Shawn identified himself to officers when they entered the home. He had disappeared on Oct. 6, 2002, when he was 11. His parents had reported him missing after he rode to a friend's house on a lime-green mountain bike wearing a Little League jersey but never arrived.

Ben, who was wearing a red shirt and jeans yesterday, appeared somewhat dazed when he was reunited with his family around 5 p.m. at the sheriff's office, Sheriff Toelke said. He added that Shawn's parents were coming to meet their son at the same location.

"There are a lot of things we don't know right now," he said.

At Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, where Mr. Devlin worked, a manager declined to comment. At the Bopp Chapel, where he worked the overnight shift, Susan Waterman, a funeral director, declined to comment on the situation, saying the chapel would release a statement today.

Boy Had Web Access, Apparent Profiles (NSDY/AP)

By Jim Salter, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 13, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo. -- Internet postings and online profiles overlooked during teenager Shawn Hornbeck's four years in captivity may become clues now that he's free.

While his alleged kidnapper was at work, Shawn or someone pretending to be him put photos of him online and posted a chilling message on a site created by his desperate parents: "How long are you planning to look for your son?"

The postings, along with others, came to light after Shawn's rescue from an apartment in Kirkwood last week. Since then, Web users have discovered a profile at mindviz.com, and online comments have flooded in.

"Welcome home Shawn," wrote one of the nearly 40,000 visitors to Shawn's site on Monday. "I have prayed for you and I know many others have as well. Glad you are safe and healthy."

Investigators would not comment on the postings, and it was not immediately known if they were, in fact, created by Shawn or by someone else. Either way, they add to the long list of clues that no one seemed to pick up on during the 4 1/2 years that the boy was missing.

Shawn, now 15, was 11 when he was kidnapped in 2002 while riding his bike near his rural home. Astonished police found him Friday in a suburban St. Louis apartment where they also discovered 13-year-old Ben Ownby, who had been missing for four days.

Their alleged abductor, Michael Devlin, a 41-year-old pizza shop employee who also held a job answering telephones at night at a funeral home, was jailed on $1 million bail. So far, he is charged in the kidnapping of Ben, but authorities expect to charge him with abducting Shawn.

Neither boy has spoken publicly about what happened, but in an interview with the Ownby family to be broadcast Tuesday on NBC's "Today" show, Ben thanked a classmate who gave police the tip they needed to find him, the description of a white pickup truck.

"Thank you for being such a great big help in this entire thing," Ben said.

Investigators have given no motive for the crime and no details on what the boys went through. Officials said Devlin did not appear to have a criminal record. Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he has not seen any evidence and will enter a not guilty plea at an arraignment later this week.

Many mysteries remain about Shawn. He appeared to have ample opportunity to flee or call for help. Devlin's two jobs often took him away from the modest two-bedroom apartment they shared, which had a landline phone and a cell phone, as well as a computer.

A series of Web postings, some under the name "Shawn Devlin," have raised questions about whether he was trying to send clues about his real identity.

At 1:59 a.m. on Dec. 1, 2005, a "Shawn Devlin" asked in a forum on the Shawn Hornbeck Foundation Web site: "How long are you planing (sic) to look for your son?" Shawn's parents, Craig and Pam Akers, started the foundation to help find their son and other missing youngsters.

Later that same day, at 2:56 p.m., Shawn Devlin wrote to ask if he could compose a poem for the family. The poem never appeared in future postings.

Other Web profiles also appeared to be of Shawn, including the profile on mindviz.com, which described "Shawn" as a single atheist with a pet cat living in Kirkwood.

Dr. Juliet Francis, a clinical psychologist and consultant for the National Center For Missing and Exploited Children, said it is not unusual for a bond to develop between an abductor and the child.

"It developed when someone feels that their life is being threatened, but they aren't killed," she said.

Some neighbors said they never saw Shawn with books or a backpack. Neighbor Krista Jones, a stay-at-home mom, noticed Shawn wearing black clothes and piercings in his ear and lip. She said she figured he was either a dropout or attended an alternative school.

Larry Douglas said his younger brother, Tony, and Shawn were best friends and often went skateboarding and biking. He said Tony had no idea of Shawn's real identity. Larry Douglas said his family was not allowing his brother to speak to reporters.

Before Tony Douglas' family made him unavailable to the media, he told Fox News that on three occasions, police stopped the two for being out beyond curfew. Officers gave the boys a lift home, unaware of Shawn's real identity, Tony said.

Tony sometimes spent the night at Shawn's apartment, but rarely spoke with Devlin. Larry Douglas said his brother saw no indication of abuse, or clues that Shawn was a captive.

"He just hopes to see his friend again," Douglas said. "He's happy for Shawn."

Officials Are Mum, Move Methodically To Seek Answers (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler And Aisha Sultan, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

KIm Evans, owner and operator of Bardenheier Wine Cellars in Richwoods, talks with Shawn Hornbeck's grandmother Sunday at the restaurant. Evans has taken on the unofficial role of media organizer and family go-between for the Akers family.

(Jerry Naunheim Jr./P-D)

With Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby safe at home with their families, authorities on Sunday turned to their next most pressing task — getting some answers.

Exactly how did the two teens end up in the Kirkwood apartment of pizzeria manager Michael J. Devlin?

What were his intentions for them? Did he harm them? And why did Shawn stay with him for 4 1/2 years, apparently posing as his son, while his real family pleaded for his return?

Investigators interviewed both boys Saturday, but the public will have to wait for any insight into the ordeals they faced. Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke said Sunday that he could not disclose anything that was discussed.

Devlin remained at the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail on a charge of kidnapping Ben. Authorities said they expect to set an arraignment on Tuesday.

Washington County Sheriff Kevin Schroeder said he expected criminal charges to be filed Wednesday or Thursday in Shawn's case.

"We're plotting our course, taking our time, formulating the right questions," he said.

This morning, the uncle of a 13-year-old boy rescued four days after he was snatched on his way home from school said on Monday that no one is pushing the boy to talk about his ordeal.

Ownby's uncle told CBS' "Early Show" today that the boy was talking only with FBI counselors.

"No one's pushing him at this point to answer these questions," said the uncle, Loyd Bailie. "The biggest concern right now is all of the media coverage ... that somebody's going to ask the wrong question." But Bailie added, "At this point, everyone has been very respectful of Ben and his family."

Kidnapping Suspect's Co-Workers Stunned (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

KIRKWOOD, Mo., Jan. 15 — Behind the counter at Imo's, a pizzeria on one of the main strips in this affluent suburb southwest of St. Louis, the cooks and cleaners have a penchant for joking around. So when they realized that a kidnapping suspect in the area had a vehicle that matched the description of the manager's white pickup truck, they had a few rounds of fun with it.

"The guys noticed the similarities immediately," Mike Prosperi, Imo's owner, said Monday. "People were joking about it because no one thought it could possibly be him. He was just too nice a guy."

Everybody had a good laugh except the manager himself, Michael Devlin, 41, who was later apprehended near the kitchen where he had worked, by all accounts, as a model employee since age 15. Mr. Devlin was arrested Friday and charged with one count of kidnapping; he is being held on $1 million bail. The authorities said that he had confessed, and that more charges were likely.

The police had spotted the white truck outside Mr. Devlin's apartment, and inside the apartment on Friday, officers found a 13-year-old boy, William Ownby, known as Ben, who had disappeared just days earlier, and, even more to their surprise, a 15-year-old boy, Shawn Hornbeck, who had been missing for more than four years from his home in a rural town about 60 miles from Kirkwood. Both boys had no visible injuries and have been reunited with their parents in what some are calling the Missouri Miracle.

Mr. Devlin, not known as one to take vacation or sick days, had been at work on Thursday and Friday, not watching over either boy. He even mentioned to Mr. Prosperi that the authorities were bothering him, snooping around his apartment building.

Mr. Prosperi said he told Mr. Devlin on Friday morning that he should cooperate, as there must have been some sort of mix-up. But things changed as soon as the Federal Bureau of Investigation showed up to take Mr. Devlin away.

"The situation looks pretty grave," Mr. Prosperi said.

In minutes, Mr. Devlin went from unassuming and good-natured pizza cook to accused mastermind child abductor — and the people who were most surprised were among those who knew him best. "Everything is so shocking because it's completely out of character," Mr. Prosperi said. "I still can't believe I'm sitting here talking about this."

But perhaps what has confounded people around here most is how Mr. Devlin managed to keep the older of the boys, Shawn, under his control. Neighbors who knew the two said it appeared that Shawn had a considerable amount of freedom.

He was often seen playing with a close friend in the courtyard of the apartment. He seemed to love bikes, skateboarding and computer games. Some neighbors assumed he was a dropout. They thought nothing of his being around all day, not in school.

And, they said, Mr. Devlin certainly did not behave like a man in hiding. He called the police a few months ago to report someone who had parked in his assigned spot. He was known as a stickler for the rules.

"We've always known him as the dad," said Mario Emanuel, a neighbor. "That's how they walked; that's how they talked. The kid even used his truck every once in a while."

"Shawn was out every day in the evening riding his bike," Mr. Emanuel added. "He seemed like a cool kid."

No one knows why Shawn did not use the truck or his bike to leave, but it is the question that everyone wants answered. He may have had access to a cellphone. The Associated Press reported that a neighbor found a cellphone outside the apartment last fall and when he dialed the number on it, Shawn came to retrieve it.

Shawn may even have had Internet access. Someone calling himself Shawn Devlin posted a guestbook entry on Dec. 1 to a Web site run by Shawn Hornbeck's parents that asked, "How long are you planning to look for your son?"

Within minutes there was another message: "Hey sorry about that last thing I put on there. I write poems and I was wondering if it would be O.K. to write a poem for the Hornbeck family."

The messages have not been verified as authentic, however, and the F.B.I., which had been assisting with the search for Shawn for years, would not comment on them.

"There's a lot of work still to be done and a lot of questions to be answered," said Peter Krusing, the spokesman for the F.B.I. in the bureau's St. Louis field office.

Law enforcement officials have released few details. The boys' parents did not return calls for comment, nor did the local prosecutor. Mr. Devlin could be arraigned on the kidnapping charge, which involves only the younger boy at this point, as early as Tuesday. Detective Michael Bales of the Kirkwood Police Department said officers had been summoned to Mr. Devlin's apartment complex once or twice a month — occasionally at Mr. Devlin's request.

"He was kind of a nondescript guy," said Detective Bales, who often went to Imo's for pizza. "This is a small community. You see the same people over and over. He was one of them. He was kind of a fixture."

The squat, two-story apartment complex has become a local attraction, with cars approaching slowly so passengers can get a glimpse and take pictures.

People have also taken out some of their anger on Imo's and Mr. Prosperi. "This morning when I came in people tried to throw rocks through the front window," he said. "Friday night I got calls saying: 'Why on earth didn't you do a background check? You hired a sex predator.' "

Mr. Prosperi continued: "Mike had no history. No history of this sort of thing at all."

EXCLUSIVE: Indictment Changes In Bakersfield Military Secrets Case (BFLDC)

By Jessica Logan, Californian staff writer

The Bakersfield Californian, January 13, 2007

A Bakersfield business owner gave military secrets and equipment to Yemen as an agent of that country, a new indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office alleges.

Amen Ahmed Ali, 56, of Bakersfield was escorted to vehicles by law enforcement officials from the District Attorney's building on 18th Street in Bakersfield last August after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Theresa Goldner.

Amen Ahmed Ali purchased what he believed were secret U.S. government documents and military equipment and shipped them to Yemen as an agent of the Yemeni government from 2005 to 2006, according to the indictment filed Thursday.

Ali was previously charged with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but he was not previously charged with doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller.

Under the new indictment, Ali is charged with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, attempted unlawful export of defense articles, conspiracy to gather, possess and transmit defense information and gathering defense information.

The new charges ratchet up the number of years Ali faces in prison from 30 to 45.

Ali's attorney, David Torres, said the new charges are not true. They were filed to block Ali's release from custody as he awaits trial, Torres said. The attorney cobbled together more than $1 million in assets to secure Ali's return to court if the judge releases him; Torres will make a request to release him Tuesday.

Faller said this is not true. He said further investigation since Ali's September arrest gave rise to the new charges.

The U.S. Attorney's office has since learned that Ali organized a Bakersfield branch of a Yemeni government-run organization known as the National Association of Yemeni Immigrants after being a member and at times the president of the Delano branch, according to the new indictment.

He received instructions from the Yemeni government from as far back as 1987, according to the indictment.

Since then, Ali acted as an agent of the Yemeni government when he directed the divorce of two other people in 2000 and ordered the arrest of another individual in 2002 when that person returned to Yemen, the indictment alleges.

Ali's friend Hifthallah Alrowhany said Faller has mischaracterized Ali and the National Association of Yemeni Immigrants.

"We know this man forever," Alrowhany said. "He is a family man."

He said Ali would never have reason to hurt the U.S. government.

Alrowhany also said the association is not run by Yemen. Rather it helps immigrants who have difficulty with the Yemeni government.

"We (in the Yemeni community) have disputes and the association acts as a mediator," said Alrowhany, who is also a member of the association.

Faller believes Ali and others helped to transport and sell the U.S. military goods. Ibrahim A. Omer is indicted with transporting these goods and Mohamed al-Rahimi is indicted with conspiracy to possess stolen government property. Their charges have not changed.

Omer faces 15 years in prison and is out of custody on bail.

Al-Rahimi faces five years in prison, but the government has been unable to find him.

Authorities launched an investigation into Ali after a U.S. Customs officer discovered boxes addressed to Yemen full of bullet-proof vests, chemical protective suits and U.S. military equipment in 2003, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

The federal government never found out who supplied Ali with the goods, but sent an undercover agent in 2004 to offer Ali stolen military property.

Through this connection, Ali acquired what he believed were stolen military secrets and tried to ship them to Yemen. He also bought and ordered the shipment of military laptop computers, night vision goggles and ballistic vests to Yemen, according to the indictment.

Then, al-Rahimi allegedly flew to Yemen to sell property in late 2005. Al-Rahimi called Ali from Yemen to discuss the sale and Ali faxed a sheet with prices for the military equipment to Yemen in early 2006, according to the indictment.

Ali and Omer are expected to return to federal court in Fresno Tuesday to discuss the new indictment, Ali's bail and other issues.

Bakersfield Man Accused Of Being Yemeni Secret Agent (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 13, 2007

BAKERSFIELD – A Bakersfield man acted as a Yemeni spy when he shipped what he believed were secret U.S. military secrets and equipment to Yemen, an indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office states.

Amen Ahmed Ali, Bakersfield businessman, purchased what he believed were secret documents and military equipment and shipped them to Yemen from 2005 to 2006, according to the indictment filed Thursday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said Ali was charged previously with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but that the new charges state he was doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government.

The new indictment charges Ali with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, among other charges.

Ali faces a possible 30 t0 45 years in prison if convicted of all counts.

Ali's attorney, David Torres, disputed the new charges and said they were filed to block Ali's release from custody as he awaits trial.

The U.S. Attorney's Office launched an investigation into Ali after a U.S. Customs officer discovered boxes addressed to Yemen full of bulletproof vests, chemical protective suits and U.S. military equipment in 2003.

Amateur Sleuthing Lands Grisham In Real-Life Court (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

He's a lawyer. He's a best-selling author. Now he's The Client.

The Virginia Supreme Court ruled yesterday that John Grisham must face a jury for his actions in a real-life whodunit.

Grisham, author of "The Pelican Brief," "The Firm" and "The Runaway Jury," among other bestsellers, lives outside Charlottesville. His son attended the private St. Anne's-Belfield School, where he played baseball for Alan Swanson, the head coach. Grisham and Swanson became friends, according to court papers, and Grisham is on the school's board of trustees.

In 1996, Swanson's wife, Donna Swanson, began receiving harassing anonymous letters, which included allegations that her husband was cheating on her, according to the ruling. Grisham also received an anonymous letter.

In 1998, according to a lawsuit, "Grisham was intrigued by the idea of trying to 'get to the bottom' of who was writing them, and he decided to play amateur detective."

Grisham and the Swansons targeted another St. Anne's parent, Katharine Almy of Charlottesville, who has three children.

Grisham and the Swansons took the letters to a handwriting expert, who told them that he needed more samples.

Both sides agree that Grisham and Alan Swanson then obtained enrollment and medical release forms from the school filled out by Almy and stamped "strictly confidential." They provided the forms to the handwriting expert, who issued a report saying the letters "possibly" were written by Almy, the lawsuit states.

Grisham provided the expert's report and the letters to the Albemarle County police, and a detective visited Almy. The lawsuit states that she was horrified that she was being investigated and repeatedly denied writing the letters. The detective reportedly told her to stop writing the letters. The lawsuit says that Almy provided handwriting samples to another examiner, who cleared her, and that she passed a polygraph test.

But Almy alleges that she was devastated by the accusations and the investigation. And when she later found out that forms had been taken from school for use in the investigation, she was further humiliated.

Almy was on the board of directors of a support group for victims of domestic abuse, the lawsuit says, and led weekly meetings and coordinated services for victims.

In 2000, even as the letters kept coming, Almy sued Grisham and the Swansons for intentional infliction of emotional distress. She withdrew the suit in 2003 but refiled it in 2004. A year later, Albemarle County Circuit Court Judge William R. Shelton threw it out, saying the case had no merit.

Almy appealed. And yesterday, in an opinion written by Justice Barbara Milano Keenan, the high court ruled that Shelton was wrong for judging the case on its merits. The defense motion to dismiss the case should have been evaluated strictly on whether Almy had enough legal basis to get the case to trial, Keenan wrote, determining that Almy's claims of severe distress and depression were sufficient.

No one answered the phone at Grisham's home yesterday. His attorney, Thomas Albro, said the author "had no intention of causing this woman any emotional distress or harm. It is clear from the evidence . . . that everything he did was in good faith and was designed to find out who was sending the harassing letters." The Swansons' attorney did not return a call.

DOJ_NMG_0117150

Bernard J. DiMuro, Almy's attorney, said that the story "could have come directly out of one of Mr. Grisham's novels" and that Almy "became the victim and wrongful target of a Barney Fife-style investigation instigated by Mr. Grisham and the Swansons that tarnished her reputation in the community while inflicting severe emotional distress."

The cliffhanger? The author of the letters. That remains a mystery.

Emotions Run High As Journalist's Assailant Gets 65-Year-Term (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The man convicted of delivering the blow last year that killed New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum was sentenced yesterday to spend what will almost certainly be the rest of his life behind bars.

Convicted last fall in D.C. Superior Court of first-degree murder, Percey Jordan, 43, was sentenced to 65 years in prison.

The punishment was handed down yesterday morning in an emotion-filled courtroom, with a prosecutor telling the judge that he should take away Jordan's "hope," a defense attorney asking for a measure of mercy and a grieving family grasping for justice.

"I can't imagine a punishment that would fit this crime," said a shaken Daniel Rosenbaum, the victim's son.

He was speaking to Judge Erik P. Christian but staring at Jordan, a few feet away. Rosenbaum's hands were trembling, and as he started to walk back to his seat, he paused for a moment and looked at Jordan, whose face betrayed little.

Christian, who presided over Jordan's trial in October, said he hoped that during his imprisonment Jordan would eventually acknowledge what he had done.

Last week, Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to his part in the robbery and was sentenced to 26 years. As part of his plea agreement, Hamlin testified against Jordan.

Despite the prospect of such testimony, Jordan had chosen to go to trial. On Oct. 24, he was convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit robbery and robbery of a senior citizen.

Rosenbaum, 63, died Jan. 8, 2006, two days after he was robbed and beaten on Gramercy Street NW while taking an after-dinner walk in his neighborhood. The random attack soon evolved into a scandal as investigators uncovered a string of errors concerning the emergency medical care provided to Rosenbaum at the scene, in the ambulance and at Howard University Hospital, where he died.

Jordan told the judge that he had nothing to say. Standing next to him was his attorney, Michael Starr, who said that Jordan plans to appeal his conviction and had been advised not to comment.

With his client facing a mandatory minimum of 30 years, Starr could only urge the judge to impose a penalty less than life without possibility of release, available as a sentence because Jordan was found to have murdered a vulnerable person.

Starr argued that no one had claimed that Jordan intended to murder Rosenbaum or anyone else. Although that did not make the Rosenbaums' loss less painful, Starr said, it distinguished the death from a premeditated killing.

Jordan and Hamlin were charged within days of the attack. Each surrendered separately after surveillance footage showing them using stolen credit cards was broadcast on local television stations.

The attack on Rosenbaum was far from the first robbery they had committed, according to prosecutors. In a sentencing memorandum to the court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines said Hamlin testified before a grand jury that he and Jordan had carried out numerous crimes over a period of many months: an ATM holdup in Takoma Park, several supermarket purse-snatchings in Maryland and Virginia, and spraying a man with Mace during a robbery in Silver Spring.

They also noted the November 2005 beating and robbery of a retired police officer in Southeast Washington. Only after Rosenbaum's death was Jordan linked to that crime, which D.C. police detectives had not fully investigated.

"If they had done that, this all wouldn't have happened," the retired officer, James Rose, said after attending Jordan's sentencing.

Second Man Sentenced In Killing Of Ex-Reporter (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

The second of two men convicted in the killing of a retired reporter for The New York Times was sentenced to 65 years in prison. The man, Percey Jordan Jr., 43, was convicted of first-degree murder in October. He faced a maximum of life without the possibility of parole for the attack on the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, last January. Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, who was sentenced to 26 years for his role in the death, testified that Mr. Jordan had struck the former reporter over the head with a pipe while he took his wallet. Last week, Mr. Hamlin was sentenced after pleading guilty late last year to second-degree murder.

Recording Industry Wins Judgment In Piracy Case (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, Jan. 12 (AP) — Less than a month after the recording industry dropped a music piracy case against a well-known opponent, it has won a default judgment against her 20-year-old daughter.

Judge Stephen C. Robinson of United States District Court ordered the daughter, Michelle Santangelo, to pay $750 for each of the 41 songs she is accused of downloading illegally — a total of $30,750 — because she failed to respond to the record companies' claims.

It was not clear whether the default judgment would end the case. Under federal rules, such judgments are often later set aside so lawsuits can be decided on their merits.

Ms. Santangelo's lawyer, Jordan Glass, said he was not permitted to comment on the judgment, which was returned on Wednesday. He would not elaborate.

Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the Recording Industry Association of America, which is coordinating the thousands of piracy suits filed by the record companies, also declined to comment.

Michelle Santangelo is the oldest of five children of Patricia Santangelo, who became a defendant in the battle against illegal downloading. When the elder Ms. Santangelo, 42, of Wappingers Falls, N.Y., was sued in 2005 by five record companies, she said she had never downloaded music. If her children did, she said, the file-sharing programs, not the parents, should be blamed.

Ms. Santangelo refused to settle with the record companies and took her case to newspapers and national television. She became a heroine to defenders of Internet freedom, who helped raise money for her defense.

When the case against her was dropped, the record companies said they would pursue the case against her daughter and her son, Robert, 16. No default judgment was filed against Robert.

The recording industry has filed more than 18,000 piracy lawsuits in federal courts, many against minors, and thousands have been settled with payments to the record companies.

FBI Log: Troutman Raids Turned Up 'Suspect' Drugs, Gun (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 13, 2007

Federal documents made public Friday show the scope of the investigation into Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman and indicate the FBI may not be done looking into her connections to street gangs.

Evidence logs from searches of Troutman's home and office on Monday also show that agents allegedly found suspected drugs, drug paraphernalia and a handgun.

Earlier this week, authorities charged Troutman with accepting a bribe to smooth the way for a mixed-use development on the South Side. Troutman has denied the accusations.

The documents show some of the suspected drugs were recovered in Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue, where the revolver also was found. A "white powdery substance in Ziploc plastic bag" was found in her office at 5958 S. State St., the documents state, noting it was found in a desk drawer.

FBI spokesman Ross Rice said laboratory testing of the substances was not complete.

Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said he believes that testing will show the powder was a vitamin supplement.

"Anybody who knows anything about Arenda Troutman can tell you she is a health freak," Adam said. "She hasn't eaten meat in years; she's a vegetarian.

"Arenda Troutman does not do drugs," he said. "We need to wait until these lab tests come back and see what we're talking about here."

Troutman, the 20th Ward alderman, has been under law enforcement scrutiny in the past for her association with Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who has fled to avoid drug conspiracy charges.

Agents were to seize "records and documents of press releases issued by Arenda Troutman, her aldermanic office, her committeeman office, her campaign committees or her employees regarding law-enforcement issues and street-gang activity."

Aldermen are an exception to Chicago's ban on handguns, and Adam said he believes Troutman's gun was lawfully owned and kept.

Adam said Troutman needed protection in the economically depressed area where she lives and serves. Her home has been broken into in the past, and the gun was registered to a private detective who left it for her, Adam said.

DOJ_NMG_0117152

"She didn't go up to the North Shore to run, or to the southwest suburbs among the affluent to make things better," he said. "She's right there in the 'hood."

Troutman said Thursday the charges do not deter her from running for another term in the Feb. 27 election, but opponent Willie B. Cochran called on her to resign Friday.

The search warrants in the Troutman case included lists of items to be seized. Included were bank records, lists and receipts; income and expense summaries; cash disbursement journals, and other financial information. Also listed were computer equipment and documents.

The Berger Files (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

The more we learn about Sandy Berger's brilliant career as a document thief, the clearer it becomes that there is plenty we still don't know and may never learn. On Tuesday, the House Government Reform Committee released its report on Mr. Berger's pilfering of classified documents from the National Archives.

The committee's 60-page report makes it clear that Mr. Berger knew exactly what he was doing and knew that what he was doing was wrong. According to interviews with National Archives staff, Mr. Berger repeatedly arranged to be left alone with highly classified documents by feigning the need to make personal phone calls, and he used those moments alone with the files to stuff them in his pockets and briefcase.

One incident is particularly suggestive. By his fourth and final visit to review documents and prepare for testimony before the 9/11 Commission, the Archives staff had grown suspicious of how Mr. Berger was handling the documents, so they numbered each one he was given in pencil on the back of the document. When one of them -- No. 217 -- was apparently removed from the files by Mr. Berger, the staff reprinted a copy and replaced it for his review. According to the report, Mr. Berger then proceeded to slip the second copy "under his portfolio also." In other words, he stole the same document twice.

This gives the lie to Mr. Berger's story that he was taking the documents for his own convenience, to assist with his preparation for testimony to the commission. If that were the whole story, one copy of document 217 would surely have been sufficient. That document was an email pertaining to a draft of the Millennium After-Action Report on the attempted bombing of Los Angeles International Airport. The episode suggests that Mr. Berger had some other motive for removing No. 217, even if he was ultimately unsuccessful in doing so. But neither his April 2005 plea agreement, nor the Congressional report, nor the report of the Archives' Inspector General shed any light on what that motive might have been.

Another telling revelation concerns Mr. Berger's access to original, uncopied and uninventoried documents from the files of former NSC antiterror official Richard Clarke, among others. At the time Mr. Berger made his misdemeanor plea agreement, we were assured by then-federal prosecutor Noel Hillman that there was no evidence that Mr. Berger destroyed or intended to destroy any original documents. That was, strictly speaking, true. But during three of Mr. Berger's four visits to the Archives in 2002 and 2003, the former National Security Adviser did have access to original documents of which no adequate inventory existed or exists.

This seems relevant, given the concern that Mr. Berger's breaches of national security might have denied evidence to history of the Clinton Administration's approach to al Qaeda and the threat of terrorism. And yet the Justice Department clearly gave the impression that there was no danger that Mr. Berger abridged the historical record. We now know that this was not true. Mr. Berger was in a position to remove documents from Mr. Clarke's files, and thanks to lax security, breaches of protocol and undue deference on the part of Archives staff, we may never know whether Mr. Berger took documents other than the five he's admitted to removing.

It is true that there is no affirmative evidence he did so. But it is equally true that he had opportunity and a demonstrated willingness to breach security in his handling of the documents. As for motive, this remains shrouded in mystery, in part because the documents Mr. Berger has admitted to taking remain highly classified, so the precise nature of his interest is unclear.

Thanks to Justice's and the Archives' leniency, or laxity, or both, Mr. Berger's plea deal expires in 2008 -- just in time, perhaps, for the next Clinton Administration.

SAN FRANCISCO Abortion Amendment Challenged State Fights Federal Regulation That Could Cost It $37 Billion (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 13, 2007

A state lawyer urged a judge Friday to head off a collision between California health laws and a federal anti-abortion amendment that could cost the state a ruinous $37 billion in funding if it penalized doctors or hospitals for refusing to perform emergency abortions.

Deputy Attorney General Timothy Muscat argued that the conflict could be avoided if federal laws that require doctors to provide emergency medical care were interpreted to include performing an abortion when necessary to save a woman's life or prevent serious health damage. But a Bush administration lawyer said such an interpretation would be improper.

"We cannot rewrite a statute," Justice Department attorney James Gilligan told U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White at a hearing in San Francisco. Gilligan said the legislation that the state is challenging does not require doctors or hospitals to perform abortions, even in emergencies, if they would find the procedures morally offensive.

White heard arguments from opposing lawyers, including those from Christian medical organizations that support the federal amendment, and did not indicate how or when he would rule.

The amendment, part of a spending bill that President Bush signed in December 2004, denies a wide range of federal funding to states that discriminate against any health provider, health maintenance organization or insurer that does not offer abortions or abortion referrals.

California was the only state to challenge the amendment. In a suit filed in January 2005, schools Superintendent Jack O'Connell and Attorney General Bill Lockyer argued that the amendment violated women's rights and the state's constitutional autonomy by in effect overturning a California law that requires any hospital or clinic to perform an abortion in an emergency.

California, like most states, allows doctors and hospitals to refuse to perform abortions for religious or moral reasons. But all doctors are required to perform abortions in an emergency in which childbirth would threaten the woman's life or health.

Muscat acknowledged that the state has no record of ever ordering a doctor or health facility to perform an emergency abortion, or of penalizing one for refusing to do so. But he told White that the state is entitled to enforce its law, and can do so only if the federal amendment is declared unconstitutional or is interpreted in harmony with the California law.

"The United States is turning its back on the fundamental rights of women," requiring California to step in, the state lawyer said. "No California official is ever going to risk losing $37 billion," more than one-third of the state's annual budget, he said.

Gilligan, the Justice Department lawyer, said the federal amendment "protects the rights of conscience" of anti-abortion health care providers. He also argued that the suit was premature because the state is not being threatened with an imminent loss of funding.

In addition, Gilligan said, the federal abortion amendment is scheduled to lapse Feb. 15, when a short-term funding measure passed by last year's Republican-controlled Congress is due to expire. He told the judge he didn't know whether the restriction would remain in effect after that.

Blind Want Changes In Currency (RTD)

By Robin Farmer, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, January 13, 2007

Some in Richmond area oppose Bush administration efforts to block federal ruling

Judith Vido has signed an online petition protesting the Bush administration's decision to oppose a court-ordered redesign of the nation's currency to help the blind.

A blogger and author, Vido was the 640th person to do so this week. As of yesterday, more than 3,600 names appeared on the petition, which can be found at www.petitiononline.com/mfaacp/petition.html.

Blinded as a teen because of complications from diabetes, she uses her computer with the aid of screen-reading technology for her writing, which includes books of several genres, including romance.

"The judge has said this is violation of our civil rights. I happen to agree." Vido, of Richmond, said. "I have problems when my partner isn't here and I grab money from my savings. I can't always identify it. Yes, I keep certain amounts in my wallet that I fold. But I don't always know what I have."

The administration's appeal seeks to overturn a ruling in November by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who ordered the Department of the Treasury to find ways for the blind to recognize the different denominations of currency. Robertson noted that of 180 nations printing paper currency, only the United States makes no effort to make it discernable without vision.

Justice Department lawyers filed the appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on behalf of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson last month.

Robertson had ruled in a lawsuit brought by the American Council of the Blind. The council proposed several options for changes, including printing different size bills or changing the texture by adding embossed dots or foil.

Not all advocates for the blind support Robertson's ruling.

The National Federation of the Blind said in December it plans to support Treasury in the appeal process, saying the ruling misinterpreted the meaning of discrimination. . . . "If it is allowed to stand unchal- lenged, this ruling will do real harm to the blind by making our goal of full and equal participation in society virtually impossible to achieve."

Jeffrey Lovitky, an attorney for the American Council of the Blind, has said he planned to petition the appeals court to reject the appeal until Robertson makes a decision on what remedies the government should pursue. A hearing on the government's recommendations is scheduled for this month.

"I don't know why it requires a court case," said Henrico County resident Malcolm Coe, who was blind at birth. "It seems pretty obvious it should be done."

When Coe trained as an operator of a vending stand he was cheated by a customer who repeatedly gave him $1 bills and said they were $20 bills.

"He seemed friendly and he always chatted. I nicknamed him Mr. Alaska because he talked about going," Coe recalled. "I guess he was using his own method to save to do that. Fortunately for me, it wasn't my money, but it was the operator of the business that lost the money."

Coe believes part of the government's resistance to altering the money stems from not having "a large enough population that is upset about it to make the public aware that something needs to be done."

But the number of people with vision problems will jump as baby boomers age, said Tara Cortes, president of Lighthouse International, an advocacy group for the blind.

There are 1.3 million people in the United States who are legally blind, and there will be millions more as people fall victim to diseases that can affect vision, such as diabetes, which is on the rise, Cortes said.

In the government's appeal, Justice Department lawyers argued that visually impaired people are not denied meaningful access to money by the way the nation's currency is designed.

Portable reading devices exist to determine the denomination of paper money and the blind can also use credit cards, the lawyers said.

Several blind people interviewed by the Times-Dispatch have said the reading devices cost hundred of dollars and using credit cards still requires sight to ensure the amount charged is correct.

The government argues that if currency sizes were altered, it would cost up to $178 million initially and up to $50 million in new printing plates.

Cortes said the new bills could be phased in over 5 to 10 years to reduce costs.

For Vido, altered currency would ensure her independence about what's in her own wallet.

"It would be nice," Vido said, "if I didn't have to ask somebody"

Navy Halts Lockheed Contract (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Navy yesterday ordered Lockheed Martin to stop work on a $260 million ship after the company warned of a significant cost increase that has also spurred the service to reconsider the way it purchases the vessels.

The unusual order, which lasts 90 days, is a blow to Lockheed and is among a series of cost overruns in Navy shipbuilding programs.

Lockheed of Bethesda is one of two contractors building the new ships. The Navy plans to buy 55 of the vessels, making the program potentially worth billions of dollars to Lockheed if it wins even half the work.

The 378-foot-longship, known as a littoral combat ship, is supposed to be capable of operating in less than 13 feet of water, allowing the Navy to maneuver in "littoral" waters close to shore to hunt submarines and destroy underwater mines.

Navy and Lockheed officials said they do not know the extent of the cost overrun. The increase is related to "contractor poor performance" and increased labor costs, Navy spokesman Lt. John Gay said. For example, a key part of the propulsion system was delayed 27 weeks because of a manufacturing error, driving up costs, he said.

"We're disappointed that the Navy made that decision," said company spokesman Craig Quigley. The company has warned the Navy about the cost increase since March, he said.

The order applies to the second of two vessels that Lockheed is building for the Navy. Work on the first one, which is 70 percent completed, is to continue so the Navy can launch it and evaluate the design, a Navy statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0117155

While it is not uncommon for the cost of the first versions of a new line of ships to increase, Lockheed knew the requirements, Gay said. "It remained unchanged, that is why we are concerned," he said.

Lockheed acknowledged a problem with a part related to the propulsion system, saying it had been cut incorrectly by a subcontractor, but the company also blamed changes the Navy made to the way the ship was to be constructed and a shortage of the kind of steel it required.

The stricter construction standard is "a positive change because it's going to be a far more resilient, tough vessel, but there is a cost impact," said Quigley.

A Navy official was unavailable last night to respond to Lockheed's claims, but earlier said steel-related cost issues already had been accounted for.

The cost of stopping and restarting the program could be about $14 million, Quigley said, adding that Lockheed is likely to attempt to recoup those costs from the Navy.

Some in Congress have questioned whether a littoral combat ship, or LCS, is necessary if submarines, tanks and guns would suffice. "The Navy is committed to the LCS program and it remains the cornerstone of the future fleet. It will provide critical capability," Gay said.

Falls Church-based General Dynamics Corp. has received contracts to build two of the littoral ships. The first ship, which will be 400 feet long and hold a crew of 40, is half done, and construction on the second hasn't begun, said company spokesman Rob Doolittle. "We're focused on delivering a very capable, affordable ship to the United States Navy," he said. But, Doolittle said, "it's premature to discuss the final construction cost because we're so early in the process."

Chastang To Keep Seat -- For Now (MR)

By Jeff Amy, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 13, 2007

Mobile County Commissioner Juan Chastang will keep his seat, at least for a little while.

A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery agreed to give the state time to appeal a U.S. Justice Department ruling that says Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Chastang was invalid.

"The state of Alabama is allowed additional time to seek timely reconsideration of the decision," wrote Judges Stanley Marcus, Myron Thompson and Harold Albritton in an order filed Thursday.

Plaintiffs in the court case, which ultimately led to the Justice Department ruling, had asked the court this week to set an election within 90 days. Chastang, a black Republican, has said he would run in the election, though the majority-black district has historically elected Democrats.

But campaigning will be on hold. The court told Riley to file his request for reconsideration with the Justice Department, and to check in on the first day of every month, starting in February, with a status update.

Keith Miller, Alabama's chief deputy attorney general, said he expected the request to be filed in "days, not weeks."

Cecil Gardner, the lawyer for Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark, three Democrats who filed the case to force an election, said he had no objection to the order. He did say he planned to file a motion next week asking the court to order the state to file within 10 days, to prevent any delays meant to extend Chastang's time in office.

The Justice Department ruling, issued Monday, would essentially void an earlier 1988 state Supreme Court decision that said governors should appoint replacement commissioners when a vacancy occurs between elections.

The state court case had overturned a 1985 law calling for a special election to fill any vacancies when more than a year remains in an electoral term. But the Justice Department ruled that the state had failed to get Justice Department to sign off that the court decision wouldn't harm minority voting rights, saying the 1985 law was back in effect.

Under the Voting Rights Act, Alabama is supposed to get such federal approval, called pre-clearance, before making any change in election procedures. Pre-clearance is required because of the state's history of discriminating against black voters. The court ruled that pre-clearance covered not only administrative changes and those approved by lawmakers, but also those imposed by state courts.

The state can also appeal the case to U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, but Miller said the state was focused on swaying U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"We're hopeful he's going to reverse the decision of his staff," Miller said. "You have a federal agency telling the state that you have to follow a state statute that violates the state constitution."

Chastang, appointed by Riley in 2005 after Sam Jones won election as Mobile mayor and resigned his commission seat, said he remains confident of ultimate victory. "This appointment has been legal from the beginning," he said.

ANTITRUST:

Delta Pilots To Fight Takeover Union Devotes $15 Million To Cause (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 13, 2007

Delta Air Lines' pilots union is devoting $15 million to the fight against US Airways' hostile buyout bid and temporarily moving leaders to Washington so they can lobby politicians and investors.

Union leaders were already in Washington this week plotting strategy and buttonholing politicians when US Airways upped its offer for Delta by $1.7 billion, to about $10.3 billion.

Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association unit, said in a letter to pilots that the merger poses a "clear and present danger to the careers of all Delta employees."

He said the fattened offer would add more debt to the merged airline and that it raises questions about US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker's credibility.

"Two weeks ago, Parker definitively stated that he had no intention of increasing his offer. [Wednesday], he increased his offer, while at the same time reaffirming his 'plan' for no 'frontline' employee furloughs," Moak wrote.

"But on the same day, Parker's No. 2 man was openly discussing additional divestitures beyond those originally disclosed to quell antitrust concerns that US Airways claims don't exist in the first place. With divestitures come job losses. Make no mistake — Parker's plan will result in thousands of job losses regardless of Parker's empty promises," Moak wrote.

He said Parker "will soon come to realize that we cannot be ignored, that we are not going away, and that the Delta pilots will not be 'synergized.' "

Union spokeswoman Kelly Collins said the $15 million from the union's general treasury will be used for lobbying, legal and public relations expenses.

Industry experts say the battle for Delta is likely to escalate in the wake of US Airways' sweetened bid. US Airways has given Delta's bankruptcy court creditors a Feb. 1 deadline to indicate support.

Delta management opposes the US Airways bid, but the creditors, who will hold substantial equity in Delta when it emerges from Chapter 11, could force it to pursue the deal.

One creditor faction, representing about 15 percent of claims, has already urged Delta to take preliminary steps in that direction in light of the new offer. But the court-appointed unsecured creditors committee — which includes major suppliers, banks and ALPA — hasn't indicated a position.

Their decision is largely financial. But they also must gauge the chances that a merger can gain approval from federal regulators — which Delta and ALPA argue is unlikely — as well as whether the two companies could be smoothly integrated and make their stock more valuable in the future.

Moak repeated earlier criticisms that the merger plan ignores elements of the Delta pilot contract that would block or complicate integration.

"Parker mistakenly believes that he can somehow magically overcome the ... protections built into our contract and to date refuses to discuss the contract in anything other than superficial terms," Moak wrote in the letter to pilots.

He added: "The Delta pilots will not change any provision of our contract in order to facilitate the hostile takeover of our company."

In an e-mailed statement, a US Airways representative responded: "We have committed to no layoffs of frontline employees, just as there were no layoffs of frontline employees in the America West-US Airways merger. We will comply with provisions of the Delta ALPA contract [and our own contracts]."

The current US Airways was created by the 2005 buyout of that carrier by America West, which adopted the name.

Moak did not address reports that Delta might be talking to Northwest Airlines about a possible post-Chapter 11 merger of those two carriers, as an alternative to a US Airways deal.

But he said: "I want to caution you about the many press reports you will read and see in the coming days and weeks regarding both the US Airways' hostile merger attempt and any other industry merger activity.

"I want to make this perfectly clear. Delta remains committed to emerging from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline, and the [union leadership] shares that commitment. Nothing will distract us from the task at hand."

Northwest filed its initial reorganization plan Friday but omitted details on how it plans to finance its emergence from bankruptcy this spring, and won the judge's permission to delay filing a more detailed disclosure statement until mid-February.

Newspapers Tribune's Bid Deadline Nears With Few Suitors Signaling Keen Interest (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Wednesday night, as the final deadline for bids for Tribune Co. arrives, the company could be throwing the first large-cap media party that nobody shows up for.

While a few private-equity firms are likely to band together in a half-hearted bid for the media group, compared with the spirited competitions for such properties as Clear Channel Communications Inc. and Univision, Tribune's sale process has generated mostly shrugs from the private-equity world. And there isn't a McClatchy-like suitor either, as there was with the sale of Knight Ridder last year.

Instead, most of the attention lavished on Tribune has come from so-called vanity buyers, such as David Geffen and Ron Burkle, who are interested in the Los Angeles Times.

But Tribune, like many other newspaper firms, is saddled with tax issues that make selling itself in pieces prohibitively expensive for would-be buyers. Tribune's last and best hopes may lie with its own major shareholders: either a bid from the Chandler family, the company's largest shareholder and the one that, ironically, triggered the whole public auction process; or a management-led buyout aided by its own McCormick Tribune foundation, the management-controlled charity that is the company's second-largest shareholder.

If Tribune ends up without a good bid for the entire company, it will be back where it started more than seven months ago: with a lagging stock price, disgruntled investors and no certain path for how to solve its overarching strategic problems. Oddly, that could be a partial vindication of Tribune management.

Dennis FitzSimons and his board had explored Tribune's options in private a year ago, before pursuing the modest route of a stock buyback. It was then that the Chandlers, who have little faith in the newspaper business, decided that a public fight had a better chance of boosting the stock price than any long-term management strategy.

In the end, Tribune could decide to split up the company, with TV stations and newspapers going their separate ways. This, too, was an option that was on the table seven months ago, and the rift between Tribune management and the Chandlers arose partly over its timing.

As it turns out, if the company pursues a spinoff of the TV stations, Tribune management will have gotten the delay they were looking for. And the Chandlers will have to wonder if it was worth the fight. For the family, this experience increasingly is looking like it should be filed in the be-careful-what-you-wish-for category.

The auction process has helped buoy Tribune's shares, which have held up better than many of its peers. Whatever the outcome, it is likely to be a sharp lesson to investors hoping to shake up the newspaper industry and save their investment. If the Tribune auction shows anything, it is that there is no easy solution for public newspaper companies. Neither private-equity firms nor wealthy individuals can undo the fundamentals of declining readership and advertising. And Tribune management might come out looking surprisingly smart.

One often-heard complaint from private-equity executives: Tribune has been too tightly run, and there is little fat left to cut.

Cablevision Struggle Looms After Dolans Sweeten Offer (WSJ)

By Peter Grant And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

A potential showdown over the fate of Cablevision Systems Corp. stands to test the limits of how well board directors and shareholders can organize to fight a "take private" plan offered by controlling shareholders of a public company.

On Friday, Cablevision's controlling Dolan family increased by about $1 billion to $8.9 billion its privatization offer first made in October. Such increases are usually part of a friendly back-and-forth negotiation between big shareholders and independent board members representing public owners.

But judging from the combative tone of the Dolans' news release, fissures have developed between the two sides, which left in doubt whether the Dolans would prevail.

The family declared its most recent offer "best and final" and noted that the length of negotiations was creating potentially harmful uncertainty to the company. The family also imposed a deadline on the process, saying that its offer would expire by close of business Wednesday, according to a letter sent to a special committee of directors by Cablevision founder Charles Dolan and his son, James Dolan, the company's chief executive.

DOJ_NMG_0117158

The Dolans noted their increased offer of $30 a share represents an 11.1% increase over their $27 offer in October and a 23.7% premium to what the cable operator's 52-week high was at that time. The Dolans also added a few sweeteners that indicate the committee, consisting of two independent directors, may be balking on the price. The family has agreed to put the deal to a majority vote of public shareholders, which would exclude the Dolans who own 20% of the company but control 70.4% of the voting shares.

In addition, the Dolans have offered new assurances to shareholders that their plan isn't to sell the company for a profit soon after taking it private. Shareholders have worried about this because large cable operators, particularly Time Warner Inc., have made it clear they would be interested in buying Cablevision, based in Bethpage, N.Y. The letter indicates the family would be willing to include a provision in a deal that would allow shareholders to share in the profits if that happens.

Despite these measures, a number of large Cablevision stockholders reacted negatively to the new offer, indicating they might vote against it if it came to a vote.

"On a relative basis, the offer is far worse today," said John Linehan, a portfolio manager at mutual-fund company T. Rowe Price Group Inc., which holds more than two million Cablevision shares.

Cablevision shares fell Friday, a sign that investors believe the Dolans aren't going to increase their offer and that the deal may not be approved. As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, its stock was down $1.21, or 4.1%, at $28.39.

Rising Tortilla Prices Hit Poor Mexicans Hard (AP)

By Peter Orsi, The Associated Press

AP, January 13, 2007

MEXICO CITY - Soaring international demand for corn has caused a spike in prices for Mexico's humble tortilla, hitting the poor and forcing President Felipe Calderon's business-friendly government into an uncomfortable confrontation with powerful monopolies.

Tortilla prices jumped nearly 14 percent during the past year, a move Mexico's Central Bank Gov. Guillermo Ortiz called "unjustifiable" in a country where inflation ran about 4 percent. Ortiz pinned the blame on companies' monopolizing the market and blocking competition.

"We clearly have a problem of speculation," he said.

Economists also blame increased U.S. production of ethanol from corn as an alternative to oil. The battle over the tortilla, the most basic staple of the Mexican diet especially among the poor, demonstrates how increasing economic integration is felt on the street level.

"This is direct evidence of the way globalization is affecting all walks of life in Mexico and all over the world," said David Barkin, an economics professor at the Xochimilco campus of the Autonomous Metropolitan University in Mexico City.

The federal government's antitrust watchdog announced this week it was investigating allegations companies were manipulating corn prices and making deals to limit the supply of corn to boost prices of tortillas.

Officials from the world's largest tortilla maker, Monterrey, Mexico-based Gruma SA, were not immediately available for comment. The company has 89 tortilla plants worldwide and sells tortillas in the U.S. under the Mission brand.

Big retailers, mostly supermarkets, have kept tortilla prices steady about $0.55 per kilogram, but in Mexico City, some shops are selling them for $0.90 per kilogram, up from $0.73.

For low-income Mexicans, who earn about $18 a day on average, the increasing prices have hit hard. According to the government, about half of the country's 107 million citizens live in poverty.

"When there isn't enough money to buy meat, you do without," said Bonifacia Ysidro as she wrapped an embroidered towel around a foot-high stack of tortillas to cart home. Tortillas, she added, "you can't do without."

Ysidro said she paid $2.27 - about a sixth of her household's combined daily income - for enough tortillas to feed her family of six.

"If I don't have that much, I'll have to buy less," she said.

Leticia Balino, who runs a tortilla shop behind the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City, said many are complaining, especially those with large families.

"They say, 'How is it possible that the price could rise so much in such a short time?'" she said.

The U.S. Agriculture Department said Friday that ethanol plants and foreign buyers are gobbling U.S. corn supplies, pushing prices as high as $3.40 per bushel, the highest in more than a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0117159

Nationwide in the United States, supplies of corn are expected to drop to 752 million bushels, a drop from last month's forecast of 935 million bushels and a steep decline from last year's supply of 1.967 billion bushels.

Responding to the outcry, Mexican lawmakers are demanding the government impose price controls, but Calderon instead has vowed to watch out for tortilla sellers who gouge consumers. He also asked his agriculture secretary to import corn from anywhere.

"I don't care if it's brought from thousands of kilometers away, the most important thing is that this (shortage) is not used as an excuse to raise prices," he said Thursday.

Mexico's Economy Department said it will expand its white corn quotas under the 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement to drive down tortilla prices, while the federal consumer protection agency has launched an inspection campaign to ensure tortilla sellers post their prices.

On Thursday, the Federal Competition Commission said it was looking into allegations the major companies were price gouging and reaching deals that were contributing to the shortage.

"If we detect monopolistic practices, we could impose fines of up to $6.4 million," the agency's director, Eduardo Perez Motta, said in a news release.

The agency said that since 2004 it has applied sanctions in six cases against anticompetitive practices in the corn and tortilla markets. Last year, the agency blocked Gruma's takeover of Mexican corn processor Agroinsa, saying it would have given it too much control over the market.

Many consumer goods are expensive in Mexico, but historically, government subsidies and price controls have kept basic foodstuffs within reach of even the poorest Mexicans.

The government eliminated its decades-old subsidy for tortillas in 1999 just as cheap corn imports were rising from the United States under NAFTA.

Mexican consumers also are coping with higher prices for other staples. The cost of white bread and fresh fruit and vegetables all rose more than inflation in 2006, according to the central bank.

The tortilla increase outpaced inflation and minimum-wage hikes of about 4 percent for the past year.

Grains traders forecast tortilla prices will rise by 20 to 25 percent during the first quarter of 2007.

That prospect worries Ysidro, who said: "If it goes higher, what am I going to give my children?"

New Forestry Chief (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Gail Kimbell, a Montana forester, was named the new chief of the United States Forest Service. Ms. Kimbell, the first woman to lead the service, succeeds Dale Bosworth, who will step down on Feb. 2. Ms. Kimbell has been a top official at the Forest Service, helping President Bush develop the “healthy forests” program that lets companies log large, commercially valuable trees in national forests in exchange for clearing smaller trees and brush. Environmentalists called it a giveaway to logging companies that supported Mr. Bush.

Down But Not Out (WP)

ARECENT admission by an Environmental Protection Agency official that the Chesapeake Bay is not getting cleaner fast enough is as obvious as it is late. "If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two," EPA administrator Rich Batiuk told a meeting of an advisory group on the bay's health last week. To that, Roy Hoagland of the nonprofit Chesapeake Bay Foundation responded with a resounding "duh."

After missing targets set in 1987 and repledging in 2000 to make progress on a range of bay indicators by 2010, the states responsible for the bay's continued ill health immediately fell behind their pollution reduction goals. In 2006 they trailed them by wide margins. For example, the Chesapeake's oyster population, which used to efficiently filter bay water, stands at only 7 percent of the goal set for 2010. Some states have done better than others. Virginia, for example, is far behind Maryland in cutting the amount of nitrate pollution it dumps into the bay. But even Maryland, with its laudable new flush tax, is on track to reduce its nitrate pollution by only half of its goal by 2010, according to a study from the Chesapeake Bay Foundation.

Since 2000, large numbers of people moved to the bay's regional watershed, decreasing the net effects of the pollution controls that bay states have enacted. Meanwhile, many of the Chesapeake's ecosystems continued to ail. In 2005, "dead zones," devoid of oxygen and unable to sustain fish and crabs, made up a distressing 4.5 percent of the bay.

With numbers like these, it is tempting to give up hope and decline to spend more money on a dying body of water. But given the right conditions, the bay can still heal. Last year, underwater grasses repopulated the bay at a greater rate than scientists expected, and the number of dead zones plummeted because of an unusually dry spring, the time of year in which polluted runoff does the most damage. If bay states prevented more pollution at sewage plants and farms, these and other improvements could be sustained, rain or shine.

As 2007 begins, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the federal government must resolve to more aggressively pursue pollution reduction targets. In all three states a number of proposals are on the table that would use bond issues to fund sewage treatment plant improvements or pollution-reducing agricultural projects. Passage would bring these bay states much closer to their 2010 goals. If Democrats in Congress are serious about proposals to retool farm legislation to subsidize rural conservation, they must remember the Chesapeake watershed when drafting their farm bill.

Jury Acquits Former Crow Official Accused Of Lying (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

A former Crow tribal official has been acquitted of charges that he lied to the U.S. Department of Justice about his finances, to avoid paying restitution owed the tribe for criminal activity in the 1990s.

A federal jury Friday acquitted Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., indicted on three counts of false statements. The indictment alleged that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution.

``I'm absolutely relieved," Hogan said after the acquittal. ``There is justice in Montana."

Hogan was the Crow Indian Tribe's secretary in the 1970s and 1980s.

In the 1990s he was convicted in a corruption scandal while executive director of the Crow Tribal Housing Authority, and received a prison sentence of two years. U.S. District Judge Jack Shanstrom also ordered $35,100 in restitution to the tribe, which Hogan finished paying last February. The indictment alleging false statements was filed two months later.

In the case decided Friday, prosecutors charged Hogan claimed he had few or no assets, yet received money from investors and gave money to relatives and tribal officials. Prosecutors said Hogan's offenses included failing to report his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co.

Hogan and Ted Hogan and Associates of Sedona have sought investors for minerals development on the Crow reservation. Some investors have complained of major losses. One of them, Elaine Roulidis of Springfield, Va., is named in a defamation lawsuit filed by Hogan last year, a suit seeking $361 million. Roulidis has responded with a suit seeking $350,000.

Hogan's lawyer in the Justice Department case sought to have it dismissed, on grounds the restitution was paid. Shanstrom, again the presiding judge, ruled against that motion and refused to let the jury hear that Hogan paid the restitution.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Deal Would To Keep DEA Supplied With Army Helicopters In Bahamas (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, January 13, 2007

MIAMI - Army air support would continue for U.S.-Bahamas drug interdiction efforts even after the Pentagon withdraws its Blackhawk helicopters later this year under an agreement announced Friday by U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson.

Nelson, D-Fla., said the Army has offered to give the Drug Enforcement Administration three Sikorsky S-76 helicopters by 2008 to replace the Blackhawks and spend $3.4 million a year for the next five years to maintain the "Hawk's Nest" helicopter base in the Bahamas.

"This will keep cocaine and marijuana smugglers from operating off Florida's coast," said Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "With the Army's continued support, the U.S.-Bahamas antidrug effort will remain fully operational."

The announcement came as Nelson departed Friday on a two-day trip that includes stops in Haiti and a flight with the DEA over the Bahamas.

Nelson was among several members of Congress and the Bush administration who raised objections to a proposal last year by then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld to redeploy the seven Bahamas Blackhawks because of war needs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who oversees the DEA, was among those questioning the move.

The DEA considers the helicopters a vital part of its Operation Bahamas, Turks and Caicos -or OPBAT for short - which is credited with seizing thousands of tons of cocaine and marijuana since 1982 and with helping drive drug smugglers away from the vast island chain.

Without the Army helicopters, the DEA would have only one helicopter in the Bahamas along with three Coast Guard Jayhawks.

Under the agreement, which must be approved by the White House, the Pentagon will give the DEA three Sikorsky helicopters in 2008 and provide other assets to temporarily fill the gap created when the Blackhawks are withdrawn by Oct. 1 of this year, according to Nelson's office.

The Other Losing War (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Kingston, Jamaica

Preoccupation with Iraq has drawn attention from another unwinnable American war that has been far more destructive of life both at home and abroad and has caused far greater collateral damage in other countries, in addition to spreading contempt for American foreign engagements. This is the failed war on drugs.

It was Nixon who, in 1971, first declared war on drugs. As with Iraq, the strategy is flawed in its conception and execution, made worse by a refusal to change course in the face of failure. It strongly emphasizes eradicating the source of drugs, interdiction of traffic and draconian punishment for offenders. It neglects what nearly every expert believes — and European experience has shown — to be the only successful strategy: a demand-side emphasis on preventive programs and rehabilitation of addicts. The present administration's claims of a shift to preventive measures is belied by the budget of its drug control office, which allocates a 94 percent share to disrupting the supply, mainly through environmentally hazardous spraying in Latin America and the Caribbean that alienates local farmers.

The domestic results are tragic: an enormous increase in the incarceration of young, disproportionately minority Americans, resulting in the waste of human resources and the creation of a prison culture that converts nonviolent addicts into hardened criminals, without any impact on drug use. Within a year of release, 43.5 percent of drug offenders are rearrested. Recent surveys indicate a steady increase in the use of illicit drugs: more than 40 percent of Americans over 12 have used them at some point. Nearly all Caribbean societies are involved with narcotrafficking and, in the case of Jamaica, large-scale production and export of marijuana. In 2001, illicit drug shipments in the region were worth more money than the top five legitimate exports combined. The results have been devastating. Political corruption and payment in arms threatens the sovereignty and stability of many states. In 1985, the chief minister and minister of commerce of the Turks and Caicos Islands were arrested in Miami and imprisoned in America for drug offenses.

Drug addiction and violent crime are now endemic in Jamaica, Puerto Rico and even small islands like St. Kitts. The corruption of the police and other security forces has reached a crisis point in Jamaica, where an officer can earn the equivalent of half a year's salary by simply looking the other way. Last year, 1,300 people were murdered here, in a population of only three million — and that was an improvement on the previous year.

Dr. Peter Phillips, Jamaica's very competent minister of national security, estimates that 60 percent of the murders are drug related. Calling cocaine trafficking and use the "taproot" of a "web of criminality," he said drugs sustain a "self-perpetuating culture of extreme violence" extending to many areas of the society.

The drug culture is highly transnational and organized, exemplified by the Jamaican "posses" that terrorized America in the 1980s with some 4,900 murders. Traffickers increasingly operate offshore, taking advantage of better arms, faster boats and more efficient tracking equipment than those available to local security forces.

Phillips is puzzled by America's inflexible emphasis on eradication and interdiction and its refusal to provide help where it is most needed, like the rebuilding of corrupted police forces. He provided a telling example of the futility of current approaches. With Americans and Jamaicans working closely together recently, the percentage of transshipments of Colombian cocaine to the U.S. that went through Jamaica was reduced from 20 to 2. But this had no effect on the amount of cocaine entering America — the traffickers simply changed routes — and it increased violent crime in Jamaica. Drug dons became more murderous in turf wars, as there was less cocaine and money to go around.

America's unwillingness to recognize the socioeconomic context of the drug crisis at home and abroad, to see that being surrounded by failing states threatens its security, to provide aid where it is most effective, and to acknowledge that the root cause of this hemispheric disaster is not supply but its own citizens' insatiable demand for illicit drugs, is as incomprehensible as the quagmire in Iraq.

IMMIGRATION:

Agents Broke Law, White House Says (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

President Bush's spokesman yesterday said the case of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are seeking a pardon for having shot a fleeing suspected drug dealer has been mischaracterized and the agents violated regulations.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said there has been "a characterization that somehow the government is turning a blind eye toward the law in enforcing the law," but said the facts of the case show the two agents broke the law.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

Border Patrol advocates say the punishment is too harsh, particularly compared with more lenient penalties for more serious offenses by other immigration authorities. Some Republicans in Congress want Mr. Bush to pardon the agents or, short of that, allow the men to remain free while an appeal is pending.

"We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said of Mr. Bush in a press conference this week. "If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies."

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a potential drug case. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned near Fabens, Texas, near the U.S.-Mexico border.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande. Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Mr. Snow would not comment on a pardon yesterday when asked about the case, but said the government is not coddling a drug dealer.

"We think it's incumbent to go after drug dealers, and we also think that it's vitally important to make sure that we provide border security so our people are secure," he said. "We also believe that the people who are working to secure that border themselves obey the law."

The spokesman said the agents picked up their shell casings after the shooting and didn't make the proper report -- both violations of regulations.

"Now, at the time this happened, they did not know if he was an illegal. They did not know that there were 700 pounds of marijuana. They didn't know any of those things," Mr. Snow said.

In a statement released as the case proceeded, U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton said he prosecuted the agents "because they had fired their weapons at a man who had attempted to surrender by holding his open hands in the air, at which time Agent Compean attempted to hit the man with the butt of Compean's shotgun, causing the man to run in fear of what the agents would do to him next."

He said both agents saw the man was not armed.

Colorado: Judge Demands Accounting Of Raid (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

A federal judge demanded that immigration officials disclose the whereabouts of 265 people arrested in a meatpacking-plant raid last month. The judge, John L. Kane of Federal District Court in Denver, gave Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials until Jan. 22 to submit a list accounting for all the detainees, including those who have been deported. Union lawyers are contesting the arrests at the Swift & Company meat processing plant in Greeley, one of six Swift plants in six states that were raided on Dec. 13.

Colo. Judge Scrutinizes Swift Raids (DENP)

Denver Post, January 13, 2007

The government's high-profile crackdown on alleged identity theft by foreign workers at Swift meatpacking plants in Colorado and five other states faces mounting challenges in court.

DOJ_NMG_0117163

A federal judge in Denver on Friday ordered immigration officials in Colorado to account for all workers detained and deported.

U.S. District Court Judge John Kane - noting "confusion on all sides" as to the whereabouts, legal status and even identities of detainees - also ordered officials to make sure detainees have had bond hearings within 48 hours.

And Kane said any workers who signed agreements to voluntarily return to their home countries now must be allowed to withdraw that agreement if they wish.

"The government is on notice that this court is monitoring its actions" in handling detainees, Kane said at a court hearing Friday.

United Food and Commercial Workers union attorneys had filed a petition contending that arrests in the raids violated workers' constitutional due process rights. Immigration officials deny that.

No federal criminal charges have been filed in Colorado, where some 261 workers were arrested at Swift's plant in Greeley.

Simultaneous raids at Swift plants in Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Texas and Utah led to 1,282 arrests overall. U.S.Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials on Friday said 219 face state or federal criminal charges.

At the court hearing in Denver, Kane told Justice Department attorneys defending the government as well as lawyers representing unions and workers to meet and discuss the shared challenge of sorting out who is being held where.

ICE agents conducting the raids used "a very orderly process," said Mark Pestal, an assistant U.S. Attorney in Colorado. "The chaos is created because (workers) are using multiple names."

Scared workers giving armed authorities false names likely is a factor in the confusion, said John Bowen, chief counsel representing the union.

Now the workers "are being held improperly" with access to lawyers impaired, Bowen said.

"We want to make sure these people have an opportunity to find out what their rights are," he said. "It is important to us that Judge Kane has made it clear he intends to ensure the process works properly."

After the raids, federal authorities bused workers to a federal compound near Denver for questioning, then to various facilities around the country. Detained workers currently are thought to be held at federal immigration detention facilities in Aurora and El Paso, Texas.

Several claimed in affidavits that the raids left them scared, uncertain about legal options, and inclined to sign voluntary departure agreements.

ICE agents addressed workers in Spanish. But workers, some of them illiterate migrants who use indigenous languages as well as Spanish, claimed in affidavits that they were unclear on what was happening.

TAX:

No New Taxes (WSJ)

By Mike Pence

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

The administration hasn't learned from last year. Despite electoral defeats, it is still advancing Social Security reform as an argument over solvency. The centerpiece of George Bush's plan was to have been personal retirement accounts for workers who wanted to establish their own nest egg -- a much better deal for them and a down payment on the huge liabilities owed by the entire system. Unfortunately, his plan faltered.

The American people did not reject Social Security reform or personal retirement accounts. They rejected the entire debate and how it unfolded. They rejected the notion that the predominant goal was to make the numbers add up or, in the language of the wonks and actuaries, to make it "solvent." Such a yardstick expresses no opinion on how to fix an increasingly bankrupt program, and as a result, blesses both benefit cuts and tax increases alike.

While Mr. Bush has reiterated his opposition to tax increases, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has repeatedly said that everything is on the table for negotiations with the Democratic Congress. When Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the White House was ruling out a tax increase in Social Security reform, he replied, "No, I'm not."

This is all code for the administration's willingness to consider raising taxes in exchange for reductions in promised benefits. Such a tax increase would likely lift or eliminate the cap on the amount of salary and wages subject to the payroll tax, currently at $94,200. Raising payroll taxes would prove devastating to working Americans, small business and the economy as a whole. Worse, it would only serve as a short-term band-aid to Social Security's financial woes.

According to the Heritage Foundation, eliminating the cap will increase taxes by $484 billion over five years. This 12.4 percentage point marginal tax rate increase would hit middle-income families struggling to make ends meet, pay for college and save for retirement. Much of this increase will be borne by three million small-business owners who pay both the employer and employee portion of the tax hike. These entrepreneurs are on the forefront of job creation, and such a tax would cause millions of layoffs. Overall, the entire economy would slow by 2% to 3%, threatening the standard of living and economic opportunities of every American. In exchange for this massive tax increase, Social Security's financing will be preserved for roughly seven years.

Despite the fact that Republicans have already turned off millions of conservative Americans by runaway federal spending, some conservatives are expressing support for a Republican tax increase. They believe that through shrewd negotiating, the administration will get Democrats to agree to benefit reductions without a net tax increase, meaning a removal of the payroll cap could lead to a reduction in the payroll tax or the offering of tax credits to low-income workers. Such hope is folly disguised. Democrats are not likely to agree to reductions in promised benefits without exacting an actual tax increases, unless of course, "tax credits" are a thinly veiled attempt at passing a new entitlement for low-income workers through the tax code.

We have been down this road before. In 1990, I was a young candidate for Congress when the last Bush administration sided with a Democrat majority in Congress to pass the largest tax increase in history, all in the name of bipartisanship and compromise. This compromise ushered in economic recession and a two-term Democratic administration in the White House. We cannot walk down the 1990 road to "compromise" again.

First, the administration needs to be clear that a Social Security compromise must reject tax increases of any kind. That means no increase in the payroll tax rate and no change in the cap apart from the current indexing that already increases eligible income on an annual basis. Tell the Democratic Congress to read your lips, Mr. President: no new taxes.

Second, Social Security reform must be properly understood. It is not about achieving solvency; it is about improving the system so that it offers a better deal for younger Americans through personal savings accounts. Focusing on solvency will lead inevitably to tax increases and benefit cuts. Focusing on personal retirement accounts improves the chance of enacting sound public policy that also makes the system solvent.

Third, the administration should submit a budget that fully protects the Social Security surplus from being used to subsidize government largesse, which Patrick Moynihan once described as "embezzlement." Voters have repeatedly said loudly and clearly that they object to raiding the Social Security surplus. It is time for the administration to either offer a budget aligned with those expectations, or propose cutting the payroll tax immediately to end the historic practice of over-collecting for a pay-as-you-go system. Doing both would quickly restore the public's shattered confidence in the way we spend their money.

Republicans don't have to pass a bad Social Security reform bill. If we lack the votes now to pass legislation that will actually preserve the system and protect our nation's economic expansion, we would be wise to spend the next two years seeking to win the debate and leave a foundation of arguments that will not unravel.

Mr. Pence is a Republican representative from Indiana.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Medicare Drug Bill (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The House voted yesterday to require the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries. But the measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate, a veto threat from President Bush, and considerable doubts from experts about whether it would save elderly and disabled Americans much money.

The vote was 255 to 170, with 24 Republicans joining 231 Democrats in approving the legislation.

The bill overturns a provision of the 2003 law pushed through by a Republican-controlled Congress that left drug-price negotiations under the new Medicare drug benefit to the private insurers that offer government-subsidized drug plans for seniors in each state.

Backers of the current system, mainly Republicans, say it pits insurers against one another in a healthy competition to negotiate the lowest prices from drugmakers and offer seniors the most attractive monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies.

But critics, mainly Democrats, say the system is a boon to drug companies because it prohibits the government -- perhaps the one force powerful enough to take on the pharmaceutical industry -- from using its bargaining muscle on behalf of seniors.

"This legislation is a common-sense effort to do right by the 43 million Americans enrolled in Medicare," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "This bill is a very important first step in making prescription drugs more affordable."

DOJ_NMG_0117165

The bill would require Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt to pursue negotiations with drug companies and report to Congress in six months.

Medicare "pays more than the VA pays for the same prescription pharmaceuticals," said House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), the lead sponsor of the bill, referring to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"The reason is no one is able to negotiate on behalf of the citizens," he added. "You've got a bunch of coldhearted prescription pharmaceutical people . . . who are fixing the prices that are paid by seniors citizens. . . . It's time that we correct this."

Leavitt and other Republicans countered that the year-old program is working, with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) reporting overall costs coming in billions of dollars lower than expected and average plan premiums being lower this year than in 2006. Moreover, polls conducted last fall by the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and other nonpartisan groups found that the overwhelming majority of seniors were satisfied with their drug plans.

"Many of us believe that competition and using free-market principles in the long run produce better results, lower costs, higher quality and more satisfaction among seniors. And that's exactly what we've seen with this plan," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Republicans also pointed to separate analyses this week from the CMS and the Congressional Budget Office that concluded that the House bill would have little or no effect on spending.

"It's flat wrong to think the government is going to negotiate a lower price than the competitive marketplace," said Rep. Joe L. Barton (Tex.), ranking Republican on the Energy and Commerce Committee.

W.J. "Billy" Tauzin, president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the House bill may lead to the government limiting which medicines will be covered. "That should not be acceptable to anyone," the former GOP congressman said.

The White House issued a statement this week saying that Bush would veto the bill if it reached his desk. "Government interference impedes competition, limits access to life-saving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries, and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike," the statement said.

Medicare provides health-care coverage to most elderly Americans, as well as to about 7 million younger people with disabilities.

Although the measure moved quickly through the House, its prospects are murkier in the Senate, where no companion bill has been introduced. Sens. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) introduced legislation this week that calls for government price negotiations in certain instances, such as for drugs with no competing substitutes or when the research behind a drug was funded mostly by taxpayers.

"We do think that there is an opportunity to get some additional value for seniors and additional value for taxpayers," Wyden said.

There is considerable pressure on lawmakers to do something. A poll last month by Kaiser and the Harvard School of Public Health found that 85 percent of adults surveyed -- including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), whose committee would vet any Medicare drug bill, said in a statement this week that he favors eliminating the ban on government price negotiations -- a stance that increases the chances that some kind of legislation will pass.

But he added that he opposes "heavy-handed" intervention such as price controls. He said that wants to explore options such as expanding government studies on drug effectiveness and increasing the scrutiny on whether insurers are passing on the discounts they get from drug companies to consumers.

"The HHS secretary has a gold mine of data, the ability to get more data, dozens of agencies and tens of thousands of public servants at his disposal," he said. "That is quite a tool box with which to seek fair drug prices for seniors. It is time to open that tool box for Medicare."

House Democrats Pass Bill On Medicare Drug Prices (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Defying a veto threat, the House on Friday passed a bill to require the government to negotiate with drug manufacturers to obtain lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries.

The vote, 255 to 170, was cast with lightning speed eight days after the new Congress convened. No Democrat voted against it, while 24 Republicans joined the 231 Democrats voting in favor.

DOJ_NMG_0117166

Representative Christopher S. Murphy, a freshman Democrat from Connecticut, said, "This bill has symbolic importance, breaking the grasp of the drug industry on this town."

It is, Mr. Murphy added, "the beginning of a process to repair the Medicare drug benefit."

The measure is unlikely to become law in its current form. But some version, focusing on certain types of very expensive drugs, has bipartisan support in the Senate and could eventually be included in a measure to revamp the drug benefit, which a Republican-led Congress created in 2003.

The bill, which fulfills a Democratic campaign promise, says the secretary of health and human services "shall negotiate with pharmaceutical manufacturers the prices that may be charged" to Medicare drug plans.

The 2003 law prohibits such negotiations. The drug benefit is delivered by private insurers, subsidized by the government. These companies have negotiated substantial discounts with drug manufacturers. Under the House bill, insurers could seek discounts deeper than those negotiated by the government.

Representative Joe L. Barton, Republican of Texas, predicted that the bill would die "a nice benign death."

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said, "If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it."

Democrats, who like to portray Republicans as a tool of special interests, said a veto would hand them an issue that could be used to good effect in the 2008 elections.

Some experts, including the Congressional Budget Office and Medicare actuaries, say they doubt that the bill would save money for older people or the government.

If the government, for example, tried to negotiate a discount for a particular drug and the manufacturer refused to lower its price, it is not clear what, if any, recourse Medicare would have. Without the ability to steer patients to particular drugs, the budget office said, Medicare would not have the leverage to obtain significant discounts.

Representative Tom Price, Republican of Georgia, described the bill as "a solution in search of a problem." The cost of the drug benefit is lower than expected, Mr. Price said, and the number of drug plans available to beneficiaries — more than 40 in every state — is higher than expected.

In the House debate, each party used somewhat contradictory arguments. Republicans said the bill would not save any money because the government could not restrict access to drugs. But then they said the legislation would limit the drugs available to doctors and patients.

"A government bureaucrat will be empowered to determine what kinds of drugs our seniors have access to," the Republican whip, Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, said. "If the government could not reach a deal with a drug company, seniors would not have access to those drugs."

For their part, Democrats said Medicare was overpaying for drugs and could obtain much lower prices if it negotiated with drug manufacturers, as the Department of Veterans Affairs does. But Democrats said they did not want to give Medicare two of the most powerful tools used by the veterans agency: the ability to establish a "federal ceiling price" and a uniform list of covered drugs, known as a national formulary.

While sketchy about details of their proposal, Democrats were clear that their purpose was to help beneficiaries and to reduce drug companies' profits in the Medicare market.

Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan and chief sponsor of the bill, said, "Those who insist that the sky will fall if drug companies negotiate lower prescription prices are arguing that those companies should continue to skin a fat hog at the expense of taxpayers and beneficiaries."

Another Democrat, Representative Lois Capps of California, said: "We can vote in favor of large drug companies that have raked in record profits under the Medicare drug plan. Or we can vote in favor of our senior constituents. Common sense tells me that the big drug and insurance companies would not be so adamantly opposed to this bill if they did not fear that it could result in actual price reductions."

Republicans said Medicare drug plans already had the power to negotiate drug prices and were using it. But Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey, said, "This power is splintered now among numerous private plans."

The Medicare bill was one of the high-priority measures that Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised to pass in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

House OKs Bill On Cost Of Drugs (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

The measure requiring officials to negotiate prices isn't a hit with the Senate or Bush, but it could shape debate.

DOJ_NMG_0117167

WASHINGTON — Defying a threatened presidential veto, the House approved a bill Friday to require federal officials to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices for the 23 million senior citizens who have signed up for Medicare's prescription drug coverage.

Although the bill is unlikely to become law, it is likely to help shape the debate that could result in a more limited measure that allows some dickering between the government and the pharmaceutical industry over drug costs.

Supporters of such efforts argue that the huge scale of the Medicare program would result in larger discounts for prescriptions than private insurers can obtain.

At the least, the House bill signals a shift in Washington from President Bush's view that private enterprise and individual citizens should play the most prominent role in the decisions that determine healthcare costs.

The legislation passed 255 to 170, with 24 Republicans joining 231 Democrats in backing it. All those voting against it were Republicans.

The bill would repeal a ban on letting the government negotiate with manufacturers for lower prices — a provision that was part of the GOP-sponsored 2003 measure that created the prescription drug program.

Under the House bill, the secretary of Health and Human Services would be required to seek the best prescription-drug prices for Medicare participants.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) called the bill "a very important first step in making prescription drugs more affordable."

Drug companies strongly opposed the legislation, which is one of the measures that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) promised that Democrats would enact within the first 100 working hours after taking control of the House. Several companies bought full-page newspaper ads urging Congress not to tinker with the Medicare benefit.

"Give it a chance," said the ads. "It's working."

The White House agrees with the industry.

"We have a Medicare prescription drug reform that has been saving people significant amounts of money; it is effective," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Friday. "If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it."

The bill's Senate chances appear slim.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) has said he favors a bill that would allow but not order federal haggling with pharmaceutical companies.

And the committee's ranking Republican, Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, said the House bill could "block access to drugs that a senior might need, make it harder to get your medicine at the local pharmacy, and result in higher drug prices for younger people."

But Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) made clear she would push for some version of the House bill. "Now is the time for the Senate … to harness the buying power of millions of seniors to give them a better value for their healthcare dollar."

The Medicare drug benefit narrowly passed the GOPcontrolled Congress in 2003 and was promoted by Bush during his reelection campaign as a key accomplishment.

The program's rollout last year had problems, but the benefit has proved popular among seniors.

Polls show that an overwhelming majority of beneficiaries support having Medicare negotiate prices.

Currently, private insurers negotiate with the drug industry and offer various plans; seniors pick the one that suits them best.

In Friday's House debate, Republicans argued that requiring federal officials to negotiate drug prices would foist government controls onto pharmaceutical companies.

They also disputed the assertion that the process would lower drug prices.

"The measure before us will lead to higher prices and, frankly, fewer choices for American seniors," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Democrats countered that the current program benefited the drug industry more than it benefited seniors.

"Today's bill is a genuine prescription for lower prices that should have been filled long ago," said Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas).

Democrats Take On Health Care (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117168

WASHINGTON -- House passage Friday of legislation taking a swipe at drug companies is just the first front in the new Democratic Congress's battle with the health-care industry. The next target: insurers, who will face demands for cuts in their Medicare subsidies.

On a 255-to-170 vote, the House passed legislation that would require the government to negotiate prescription prices with the pharmaceutical industry. Currently, private insurers handle the negotiations for Medicare and the government is barred from getting involved, an arrangement that critics say leads to higher prices than if the government used its clout. Twenty-four Republicans joined the Democratic majority in backing the measure, but its prospects are less certain in the closely divided Senate, and President Bush has threatened a veto.

The price-negotiation bill is just the new Congress's first maneuver on health care, after many Democrats promised on the campaign trail to lower drug costs in Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly and disabled. Beyond that, key Democrats are attacking another big change Republicans brought to Medicare while they controlled Congress. As part of 2003 Medicare drug-benefit legislation, lawmakers seeking to inject more private-sector involvement in the program dramatically increased federal payments to private insurance plans operating in the Medicare Advantage arm of the program.

In Medicare Advantage, private insurers provide seniors a full range of medical benefits as an alternative to the government-run program. Seniors automatically become eligible for Medicare when they turn 65, but then have the choice to sign up instead for coverage through a private Medicare Advantage plan.

Democrats say the payment increases in the legislation -- projected to be worth as much as $46 billion over the decade beginning in 2004 -- are a waste of taxpayer money, and they view Medicare Advantage as an attempt by Republicans to privatize the traditional program. Now, some Democrats want to reduce payments to the private plans, and budgetary concerns are heightening the pressure on the payments to insurers.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program, a federal block grant, will soon need to be reauthorized, and many Democrats would like to expand it. Congress is also likely to boost Medicare payments to doctors. At a time when Democrats are aiming to be fiscally responsible, such spending would likely have to be offset.

"There are precious few areas where we can save money. Medicare Advantage is a prime target to pick up a few dollars," says Rep. Pete Stark, the California Democrat who heads the House Ways and Means panel's health subcommittee. In the Senate, a Democratic aide predicts Medicare Advantage money will become "the standard pay-for" in lawmakers' legislative proposals.

Following a lobbying and advertising blitz by drug companies to block the Democratic attacks, health insurers are preparing their own counterattack. America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry's Washington-based trade group, is telling lawmakers that cuts in insurer subsidies would be tantamount to cuts in benefits for constituents, and it has readied maps to show the growth of Medicare Advantage plans throughout the country, compared to relatively sparse numbers before government payments increased.

It will tap the Coalition for Medicare Choices, a group for Medicare Advantage beneficiaries that AHIP started and funds, to bring satisfied customers to Congress. And AHIP will highlight research showing that a large portion of Medicare Advantage beneficiaries are minorities or have low incomes -- populations shown to suffer disproportionately from chronic health problems that plans say they can manage better than the government.

Of about 44 million Medicare beneficiaries, 7.6 million, or 17%, were in Medicare Advantage plans as of December 2006. That compares with about 6.1 million, or 14%, who were enrolled in the plans in December 2005.

"This is the ultimate in constituency politics," says Karen Ignagni, AHIP'S president and chief executive.

Beyond their philosophical complaints, many Democrats say Medicare Advantage wastes government money. Former House Democratic aide Brian Biles has done a study concluding that, on average, the government is spending $922 more each year for every beneficiary in Medicare Advantage, compared to what would have been spent if the person had remained in regular Medicare.

In 2005, the "overpayment," as Democrats call it, totaled $5.2 billion, according to a November 2006 report by Mr. Biles and others for the Commonwealth Fund, a private, nonprofit foundation that supports health research. An independent panel that advises Congress on Medicare also documented the payment differential. "It's a problem because it causes us to waste a lot of taxpayer money," Mr. Stark says. "I see no reason to do it."

AHIP disagrees with the methodology used in the study, and it points to Medicare data showing that Medicare Advantage beneficiaries save an average of $82 a month, in reduced out-of-pocket costs and extra benefits, compared to people in the traditional program. Insurers say the program has also succeeded in extending and expanding Medicare Advantage to rural areas, where it was lacking. And that means they can count on rural-state legislators to battle the Democratic attacks.

"We wanted equity in those plans....We've got it now," says Iowa Republican Sen. Charles Grassley. "People in Iowa ought to have the same choices as those in New York, Miami and Los Angeles."

The Wrong Prescription (WP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

HOUSE Democrats delivered on a campaign promise yesterday, passing a bill that would require the government to negotiate the price of pharmaceuticals covered by the new Medicare drug benefit. The idea is that government negotiators could force prices down, generating savings that could be used to make the benefit more generous. But the measure is misguided.

The Democrats point to the Department of Veterans Affairs, which manages to negotiate discounts for the drugs covered in the veterans' health program. But the department can do this because it is free to deny coverage for drugs whose makers refuse to provide discounts: Fully 3,000 of the 4,300 medicines covered by Medicare are unavailable under the veterans' program. Restricting the list of covered drugs saves money, but it also reduces the quality of the benefit -- 1.5 million veterans are sufficiently unhappy with the result that they opt to buy the more inclusive Medicare coverage. Recognizing that narrow formularies are unpopular, the Democratic plan does not permit Medicare to establish one. But if drugmakers know that Medicare must buy their pills, why would they grant a discount? The Congressional Budget Office estimated this week that savings from direct negotiation would be "negligible."

Not only are the Democrats too optimistic about government negotiation; they are also too pessimistic about the current system in which private insurers administering Medicare drug benefits do the price bargaining. These private insurers stand to profit if they can secure discounts and cut premiums and thus attract more customers: Witness the fact that the average monthly premium has fallen since the program began a year ago. Private insurers can do this precisely because they are free to establish formularies, but market discipline ensures that these lists are not unappealingly narrow. The insurers need to keep customers.

The Democrats' stance is troubling because it suggests an excessively government-led view of health-care reform. One of the key challenges in health policy is to understand which drugs, tests and therapies are most cost-effective; although it will take government pressure on doctors and hospitals to disclose the information necessary to figure out what works, solutions are most likely to be found by competing private entities. In drugs, for example, there needs to be a culture of paying handsomely for new ones that really do add value -- and refusing to pay for pseudo-new drugs that merely mimic cheap generics. Striking the right balance is not easy, and it won't be accomplished by government fiat. The better approach is to let each insurer offer its own version of the right balance, see whether it attracts customers -- and then adapt flexibly.

In Reversal, Senate Endorses Plan On Disclosing Earmarks (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — Senate Democratic leaders on Friday embraced a proposal to shed light on the murky practice of Congressional earmarks, reversing themselves after trying to block an almost identical measure the day before.

The Democrats' switch makes it likely that the Senate will follow the new House rules requiring the disclosure of the sponsor as well as the cost and the purpose of any earmark. That would bring into public view for the first time a practice that last year allowed lawmakers to direct federal money to more than 12,000 pet projects worth more than $64 billion by tucking them into complicated spending bills, often anonymously. Lawmakers tend to use the projects to reward constituents and contributors.

The reversal follows a White House statement of support for the measure and a day of news coverage noting that Senate Democrats were opposing a rule that their House counterparts had just adopted a week ago. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said he had come around to the measure after some adjustments that he said had strengthened it.

"Yesterday was a rather difficult day, as some days are," Mr. Reid said, appearing to apologize for his effort to kill the measure Thursday. "There is a lot of confusion as to what people were trying to accomplish."

While debating a proposed package of ethics and lobbying rule changes that would include the earmark disclosure requirements, the Senate also voted 87 to 0 to deny federal pension benefits to any member of Congress convicted of fraud or corruption charges.

Sponsors of the measure said its inspiration was former Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California. He is in prison for selling earmarked defense contracts worth tens of millions of dollars in exchange for gifts and cash worth over $2.4 million, but he still receives his federal pension of $40,000 a year, becoming the latest in a long chain of corrupt lawmakers whose retirement benefits have galled taxpayers.

But while Mr. Cunningham's actions provoked the Senate vote, he will continue to collect his pension. The main sponsors, Senators John Kerry of Massachusetts and Ken Salazar of Colorado, both Democrats, said Congress could not revoke the pension of Mr. Cunningham or other former lawmakers, only future Congressional criminals.

The Cunningham scandal also helped inspire bipartisan calls for more earmark disclosure last year. But any restrictions have always drawn the fierce opposition of the powerful House and Senate Appropriations Committees, which dole out earmarks to other lawmakers as they write spending bills. In part because of internal resistance, the leaders of both parties initially proposed a weak earmark disclosure requirement with loopholes that excluded all but a small part of all earmarks. The Senate had approved the same provision last year under Republican control.

A bipartisan agreement to settle for the weaker earmark measure fell apart Thursday when Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, sought to impose the new House rule on the Senate. “Our version of earmark disclosure was going to be an embarrassment to the Senate, especially after Nancy Pelosi placed a much stronger version on the House side,” Mr. DeMint said. “Some of the Democrats bought that argument.”

A move by Senate Democratic leaders to kill Mr. DeMint’s amendment unexpectedly failed, with nine Democrats, the independent Joseph I. Lieberman and 41 Republicans voting to keep it alive. The surprise threw the Senate into chaos as the Democratic leaders sought to block its immediate passage and regain control of the debate.

On Friday, Democratic aides said Republican leaders failed to deliver on a pledge to support the weaker measure. Republicans aides said there was no such agreement.

Senate Of One Mind On Ethics (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

The Senate yesterday voted unanimously to bar congressional lawmakers convicted of corruption from collecting federal pensions, and Democrats vowed to drop opposition to a comprehensive approach to pork-barrel-spending reform.

The pension measure, an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill in the new Democratic-controlled Senate, applies to current and future lawmakers convicted of bribery, conspiracy and perjury charges. It passed 87-0.

"With this vote, we are preventing members of Congress who steal or cheat from receiving a lifelong pension that is paid for by the taxpayers," said Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, co-sponsor of the pension proposal with fellow Democrat Sen. Ken Salazar of Colorado.

"Those lawmakers deserve nothing but shame."

Democrats lauded yesterday's vote as a victory over the "culture of corruption" they say permeated Congress under Republican rule. They regularly cited former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican, who was convicted of bribery in 2005.

The measure, however, is not retroactive, so Cunningham will receive his $64,000 pension annually as will at least 16 other convicted lawmakers, 12 Democrats and four Republicans. Former Rep. Dan Rostenkowski of Illinois, who was convicted of mail fraud in 1996, will collect about $126,000 annually.

Meanwhile, Democratic leaders said they will now allow a vote on a Republican pork-reform proposal that was imperiled Thursday when Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, used a procedural tactic to delay a vote.

The pork reform proposal by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican -- also an amendment to the ethics bill -- would require that members of Congress disclose all requests for pork projects, also known as earmarks, that often are buried in complicated legislation.

Immediately before Mr. Reid stopped a vote Thursday on the amendment, the Senate expressed its support by rejecting a bid to kill it on a 51-46 vote.

The maneuver gave Mr. Reid time to turn Democrats against the measure, which is similar to the ethics rules adopted with fanfare last week by the new Democratic-led House.

The episode Thursday drew comparisons between House Republicans extending voting time on the 2003 Medicare prescription drug benefit to allow leaders to persuade members to change their votes -- a tactic criticized by Democrats at the time.

Mr. Reid gave a conciliatory speech on the Senate floor yesterday morning, announcing that he was seeking a bipartisan compromise on the proposal to fully disclose pork-barrel spending.

"It was a rather difficult day, as some days are," Mr. Reid said. "We tend to get in a hurry around here sometimes when we shouldn't be. We tend to spend a lot of time doing things that accomplish nothing."

An agreement was reached late yesterday to bring the DeMint amendment to a vote Tuesday evening, after lawmakers return from the Martin Luther King holiday. A vote on the entire ethics bill could come as soon as Wednesday.

Mr. DeMint thanked Mr. Reid for "agreeing to do the right thing" and drafting a compromise amendment that is stronger than his original amendment.

The Senate pension amendment does not go as far as a House bill by Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, which would withhold congressional pensions from lawmakers convicted of any of 21 different felonies.

DOJ_NMG_0117171

The Kirk bill includes the felonies of solicitation of political contributions, intimidation to secure political contributions, promises of appointment by a candidate and expenditures to influence voting.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said the chamber next week would take up a proposal by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that lawmakers expect will resemble the Senate measure. It had not been filed as of yesterday.

Senate Wants No Pension For Convicted Lawmakers (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

The chamber expands the list of crimes that could lead to denial of the benefit.

WASHINGTON — With disgraced ex-California Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham eligible to collect a congressional pension from behind bars, the Senate on Friday voted to deny taxpayer-funded retirement benefits to lawmakers convicted in the future of serious ethics offenses.

The action came as the Senate moved toward overhauling its ethics rules, including stricter guidelines to end the secrecy around earmarking, a controversial practice that contributed to congressional scandals involving Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Critics have denounced the practice, in which lawmakers secretly slip pet projects into spending bills, often without public notice and at the request of lobbyists who contribute to their campaigns. And they had accused the Senate's new Democratic leadership of writing a loophole-riddled bill that would have failed to publicly identify the sponsors of most earmarks.

But on Friday, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a leading critic of earmarking, said he and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) reached an agreement "so that every earmark is disclosed."

The deal came as the Senate voted 87 to 0 to expand the list of crimes under which a former lawmaker could be denied a pension to include bribery, conspiracy and perjury. Federal employees in all branches of government forfeit their pensions if convicted of "crimes against the United States," such as treason.

"The best way to restore and rebuild the trust of the American people is to ensure that we stand firmly against members of Congress who betray the public trust," said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), the measure's sponsor.

The legislation would not apply retroactively; Kerry said such a law would be unconstitutional.

Cunningham, a Republican from Rancho Santa Fe, is serving an eight-year prison term after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors who sought earmarks and to evading more than $1 million in taxes.

He is eligible for an estimated $64,000 annual pension with his military service, including $36,000 a year from his eight terms in Congress.

An attorney for Cunningham declined to comment.

The measure has strong bipartisan support in the House.

"The fact that the Senate passed it puts a lot of pressure on the House to do the same," said Rep. Lee Terry (R-Neb.), sponsor of a similar measure in the House.

At least 20 former lawmakers convicted of crimes are eligible for taxpayer-funded pensions, some as high as $125,000 a year, according to the National Taxpayers Union, which supports denying pensions to lawmakers turned felons.

Former Rep. James A. Traficant Jr. (D-Ohio), serving eight years after his 2002 conviction for bribery, racketeering and tax evasion, could be pulling in $40,000 a year, the group estimated. The figures are estimates because federal officials decline to disclose pension records for retired members of Congress.

Former House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who served time for mail fraud and was later pardoned by President Clinton, might be collecting more than $125,000 a year, the group said.

Pete Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union said that some former lawmakers convicted of crimes had even used their pensions to help pay their fines.

The Senate is expected to complete work on its ethics bill next week.

Bill Strips Ethics-challenged Legislators Of Pensions (CNN)

CNN.com, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Senate on Friday approved a measure stripping taxpayer-funded pensions from members of Congress who are convicted of serious ethics offenses, such as bribery and conspiracy.

The vote was 87-0.

Sens. John Kerry, D-Massachusetts, and Ken Salazar, D-Colorado, attached the amendment to an ethics reform bill earlier this week.

"The only thing crazier than giving a member of Congress convicted of a crime a federal pension is the fact that we still need a bill to prevent a convict from receiving their pension," Salazar said at the time. "A member of Congress who abuses their position of authority for their personal profit deserves a prison sentence, not a government pension."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Maryland, said Friday that the House will take up a similar bill next Friday.

If passed by the House and signed into law by President Bush, the bill would eliminate pensions only for future members of Congress convicted of ethics offenses.

Ex-congressmen such as Randall "Duke" Cunningham -- collecting an estimated $64,000 a year although he pleaded guilty to charges of accepting bribes -- and James Traficant -- convicted of taking bribes, among other charges, and collecting an estimated $40,000 a year -- will get to keep their pensions.

The bill also would not affect former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in September after he was found to have sent inappropriate e-mails and messages to House pages. Foley is the subject of a criminal investigation in Florida, but has not been charged.

Energy Big Oil, In House Sights, Hopes Senate Cools Debate (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Big Oil is set to take a beating from House Democrats on Thursday when they are prepared to vote on a bill they say will "roll back" about $13 billion worth of subsidies the executive branch and Congress have given oil companies.

The move is part of the House Democrats' 100-hour legislative blitz. Once the bill reaches the Senate, however, the race will turn into more of a marathon. George Washington once said the difference between the two houses is that the Senate provides a "cooling saucer" for the passions of the moment to die down.

The new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, reminded senators of President Washington's words earlier this month with a memo saying the Senate could take "several months" to analyze the package. The delay will give the nation's independent oil producers a chance to make their argument, which is that the House Democrats are throwing a boomerang that could strike the wrong companies and then loop back and hit the nation in the form of higher fuel prices and even greater reliance on foreign oil.

The House Democrats' package includes three major items. One will impose a "conservation fee" on about 40 companies producing oil in the Gulf of Mexico that have leases from 1998 and 1999 and which failed to include a clause requiring royalty payments if oil prices rose, which they have. The omission was caused by an Interior Department error, but if the companies don't pay the fee, the proposal would bar them from getting new leases.

Democrats will also reduce accelerated tax write-offs for oil- and gas-exploration expenses, and shrink a tax-depreciation measure, contained in a 2004 jobs bill, that gives companies producing oil and gas in the U.S. the equivalent of a 1% corporate-tax reduction.

The Senate will ponder the impact of the changes at a time when 60.2% of the nation's oil comes from overseas and when 82% of the nation's domestically produced gas and 68% of its crude oil come from wells drilled by independent oil companies, many of which are midsize or smaller.

"This will have a bigger effect on us, and we have fewer places to raise and spend our revenue," says Lee Fuller, vice president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, referring to the exploration subsidies.

If gasoline prices rise in the spring, though, George Washington's proverbial saucer may not work. The issue could heat up again.

House Democrats Detail Energy Plan (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

House Democrats introduced the energy piece of their legislative agenda, a measure that would curtail tax breaks and incentives for oil and gas companies and invest the funds in renewable energy.

The bill is projected to raise $13 billion in revenue over five years, and would set that money aside in a "fund" to be used for spending and tax breaks for renewable energy sources, not including nuclear power.

Natural Resources Committee Chairman Nick J. Rahall (D-W.Va.) and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) introduced the bill, which trims breaks for geological work and excludes oil and gas from a 2004 measure that would effectively reduce their tax rate to 32 percent, from 35 percent.

It also takes aim at oil and gas companies that signed federal leases in 1998 and 1999 with incentives for offshore exploration in deep water. Those leases neglected to include price thresholds. As a result, the leaseholders do not pay royalties regardless of how high oil and gas prices soar.

The House measure says companies with those leases cannot bid on new federal leases unless they renegotiate the contracts or pay "conservation" fees of $9 a barrel on oil and $1.25 per thousand cubic feet on gas produced under the old leases.

Oil Companies Attack Legislation Aimed At Tax Incentives (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — The nation's oil and gas companies, hoping to fend off an attack by Congress on their tax breaks and subsidies, angrily denounced an effort by House Democratic leaders Friday that would repeal billions of dollars worth of incentives and plow the money into renewable energy projects.

"This bill takes capital from U.S. oil and natural gas companies that otherwise would be spent on domestic energy exploration," said Barry Russell, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, which represents about 5,000 smaller oil and gas producers. "If the goal is to lessen our dependence on foreign oil, then this bill falls far short."

The giant integrated oil companies, like Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have been more resigned about losing some of their tax breaks but are quietly resisting pressure to renegotiate leases that allow them to pump billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from publicly owned waters without paying royalties to the government.

House Democratic leaders unveiled a bill on Friday that could raise more than $10 billion by repealing half a dozen incentives created in the last several years by the Republican-led Congress or by the Bush administration.

One measure would pressure companies to give up a lucrative loophole that the government inadvertently included in offshore drilling leases for the Gulf of Mexico.

The leases, signed in 1998 and 1999, allow companies drilling in deepwater to escape royalty payments on as much as 87.5 million barrels of oil per lease. Because of an error that officials ignored for six years, the leases omitted a standard escape clause that eliminates the incentives if oil prices climb above $34 a barrel.

Government officials have estimated that the mistake could cost the Treasury $10 billion over the next five years. The Bush administration has asked companies to voluntarily renegotiate, but only five companies have signed new agreements.

The House bill would punish companies that refuse to change their leases by either charging them a "conservation fee" of $9 for each barrel of oil they produce or prohibiting them from acquiring any additional leases in federal waters.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own," said Representative Nick J. Rahall, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee.

But Mr. Russell, representing the independent petroleum producers, accused the Democrats of breaking valid contracts.

A few oil giants, including BP and Shell, agreed to give up the loopholes. But industry executives said one big player in the gulf, Exxon Mobil, has refused to renegotiate, arguing that it signed the leases in good faith. Chevron, which with several partners recently announced the discovery of a giant oil field that may include two of the flawed leases, said it had submitted a "reasonable" proposal but had not reached an accord.

The House bill would also repeal several other royalty incentives. It would prohibit "royalty relief" for natural gas produced from very deep wells in shallow waters. It would also repeal similar "relief" for companies drilling off the coast of Alaska.

On the tax front, the House bill would repeal a provision passed in 2004 that entitles oil companies to tax credits for "domestic manufacturing" and a $2 billion tax break for "geological and geophysical" expenses in exploration.

Lawmakers in both parties predicted on Friday that the House would easily pass the measure next week. But the industry may have more clout in the Senate, where Democrats have more tenuous control.

Minimum-Wage Hike May Reach To Samoa (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), dogged by Republican charges of a double standard, said yesterday that American Samoa may join the Northern Mariana Islands as U.S. territories that would have to comply with a higher federal minimum wage.

Under the minimum-wage increase approved by the House this week, employers on the Northern Marianas would for the first time have to pay their workers the minimum wage, which would rise from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. For years, Republicans -- with the help of convicted lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff -- have fended off efforts to bring the islands under federal labor laws.

The bill would leave American Samoa as the only territory not covered by the $7.25 rate, and because Samoa is represented by a Democrat, Del. Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, Republicans cried foul.

Faleomavaega's campaign coffers have been well stocked by the tuna industry that dominates his island economy, but Republicans picked up on another issue: StarKist owns one of the largest canneries on the island, and Del Monte Foods, StarKist's parent company, is based in San Francisco, which Pelosi represents.

"I have asked the Education and Labor Committee, as they go forward with the legislation, to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Pelosi announced yesterday.

Pelosi aides said the committee would be asked to work toward having all territories use the same wage standard.

Pelosi Moves To Close Samoa Wage Loophole (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 13, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi yesterday said Democrats will close a loophole in the House-passed minimum wage increase that exempts American Samoa -- an action taken after it was revealed that one of the U.S. territory's main employers is based in her congressional district.

"I have asked the Education and Labor Committee as they go forward with the legislation to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Mrs. Pelosi said.

The decision follows criticism over the exemption, reported earlier this week by The Washington Times, to allow tuna canneries in American Samoa to continue paying $3.26 an hour -- nearly $4 less than the $7.25 minimum wage passed by the House Wednesday.

Republicans, after the vote, pointed out that StarKist Tuna, one of two companies that employs about 75 percent of the Samoan work force, is owned by Del Monte, which is headquartered in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district.

"Simply put: It is unethical to provide a special benefit to a company in any member of Congress' hometown," said Rep. John B. Shadegg, Arizona Republican. "For Democrats to act in such a manner so early on in their tenure is hypocritical at best and criminal at worst."

Democrats involved in the legislation say that neither Del Monte nor StarKist has lobbied Mrs. Pelosi or the committee on the matter. And records show that while Del Monte political action committees have given $5,300 in the past five years to Republicans, neither they nor Del Monte executives have given to any Democrats.

The bill, which raises the federal minimum wage $2.10 from $5.15, pointedly extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the Northern Marianas Islands, another U.S. territory in the Pacific with similarly low wages.

Democrats defended the exemption earlier in the week, saying that the Northern Marianas territory has a long history of work-force abuses that require immediate action. But they also acknowledged that the wages in both places are essentially the same and, they said, need to be raised.

One person who is concerned about enforcing the federal minimum wage in American Samoa is non-voting Rep. Eni Faleomavaega, who echoed the arguments of many conservatives against raising the minimum wage in poorer regions of the U.S. mainland.

A "decrease in production or departure of one or both of the two canneries in American Samoa could devastate the local economy, resulting in massive layoffs and insurmountable financial difficulties," he said in a statement provided to The Times.

"The truth is the global tuna industry is so competitive that it is no longer possible for the federal government to demand mainland minimum wage rates for American Samoa without causing the collapse of our economy and making us welfare wards of the federal government."

DOJ_NMG_0117175

Melissa Murphy Brown, vice president for Del Monte, warned in a statement yesterday that applying the minimum wage at the tuna packing plants in American Samoa would "severely cripple the local economy."

"For over 50 years, the Federal Department of Labor has provided that wages in U.S. territories, including American Samoa, be set by a federally appointed wage board, following public hearings," she said in a background statement compiled by StarKist and Chicken of the Sea.

"The wage board takes into accounts several factors including standards of living and recognizes that wages cannot increase to a level that substantially curtails employment."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on the House floor yesterday that the decision to exempt American Samoa "was not an oversight."

"The minimum wage in America Samoa, unlike the Marianas or Guam, is set by the Department of Labor and Industry Committee so that it is determined in a different way than the others, including our states," he said.

Wages paid in American Samoa are often lower than the $3.05 minimum wage in effect in the Northern Marianas. Wages in American Samoa for manual labor range from $2.70 up to about $3.60, according to the U.S. Department of Labor.

House Democrats Propose Cut In Student Loan Rates (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — House Democrats on Friday unveiled a bill that would cut interest rates on federally subsidized loans to college students by half over the next five years.

They said they would finance the $6 billion measure by increasing costs that lenders pay to the government and reducing the largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits.

The bill, one of half a dozen that the new House majority had placed on its 100-hour agenda, underscores the Democrats' all-out effort to consolidate gains made in November among middle-class voters.

"How to pay for a college education has become a primary concern for students and families across this country, a concern that Congress must urgently address as part of our goal of strengthening America's middle class," said Representative George Miller, chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

The measure is expected to pass in the House, where it is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday. Its future in the Senate is less certain, although the concept behind it is supported by Democratic leaders there, including Edward M. Kennedy, chairman of the education committee, who is planning to introduce a similar bill.

House Republicans, who in trying to contain college costs have focused in recent years on restraining tuition increases, complained Friday of being shut out of the process of writing the new bill and said they would offer amendments before Wednesday's vote.

"I'm hopeful we can work in a bipartisan way to build upon it, including with reforms that actually make college more affordable and more accessible for low- and middle-income students," said Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the ranking Republican on Mr. Miller's committee.

That theme was echoed at the White House. Blain Rethmeier, a spokesman, said the Bush administration would support efforts in Congress to ease students' burden, but added that "colleges have the central role to play in ensuring access to affordable higher education."

Student debt has grown exponentially in recent years, in tandem with college costs that routinely outpace inflation. The average college student now graduates with nearly $18,000 in debt. The Democratic proposal would benefit many such students: the 5.5 million a year who receive subsidized Stafford loans.

The measure unveiled Friday would make good only in part on Democrats' campaign promise to halve the interest rates on student loans. Democrats had never said that the cut would not fully take effect until 2012 or that the pledge applied only to subsidized Stafford loans.

Unlike Pell grants, which go to students with family incomes under $40,000, Stafford loans are also tapped by middle-income students. Some 75 percent of students holding Stafford loans come from families with household incomes under $67,000, just above the median income for a family of four, which is $65,000, said Luke Swarthout, advocate for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group Higher Education Project.

The bill would cut the interest rates on subsidized Stafford loans for undergraduates — loans to graduate students would not be affected — to 3.4 percent from the current rate of 6.8 percent, in stages. The first reductions would affect new loans made after July 1.

According to the Project on Student Debt, a nonprofit group, the bill would save a student who graduates from college with $20,000 in debt about $4,000 over the 10-year life of a loan.

DOJ_NMG_0117176

Under the program of subsidized Stafford loans, the government guarantees lenders a rate of return that can be higher than the interest rate paid by the student. In trying to finance their proposal, House Democrats decided that for the largest lenders, the bill would lower that rate by 0.1 percentage point. It would also raise fees that lenders pay to the government, and cut payments that lenders receive if a student defaults.

While applauded by student advocacy groups, the bill drew immediate criticism from the student loan industry, which complained that it had already absorbed $12 billion in reduced payments from the government as part of a larger, Republican-led deficit reduction effort last year.

"What we're really seeing is Peter being robbed to pay Paul," said Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, the nation's largest holder of student loans. "When you continue to cut and cut again, eventually who you're hurting is not the banks but the students and the parents themselves," said Mr. Joyce, suggesting that such reductions would ultimately impair services to borrowers.

Mr. Swarthout, of the Higher Education Project, called the bill "a good first step to making college more affordable." He added, "It will save millions of students thousands of dollars on their debt." He said that by showcasing the issue in its first days in power, the new Congress was sending a strong signal to student borrowers, and creating high expectations among them for further aid.

"You cannot put college affordability as a top agenda item and then walk away after cutting interest rates," he said.

While Democrats in the Senate have embraced the goals of halving interest rates, action there will not be as swift as in the House. Melissa Wagoner, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy, said committee hearings would most likely begin on Jan. 25.

Mr. Kennedy's bill would phase in similar cuts in interest rates not only in subsidized Stafford loans but also in another loan program . It is broader than the House bill in other ways as well, raising Pell grants to a maximum of $5,100 a year, from $4,050.

Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman for Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said Ms. Spellings supported an increase in the Pell grants.

Clock Ticking On Dems' 100-hour Agenda (AP)

By Kasie Hunt

AP, January 12, 2007

The clock is ticking for House Democrats, but it's hard to tell what time it is.

On Friday, for example, the House was in session for a little more than eight hours. Only five of them, however, ticked off on new Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for quickly passing a six-bill agenda that Democrats promised voters last fall.

With passage of a bill to make the government negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices, Pelosi, D-Calif., is two-thirds of the way done — in under a quarter of the allotted hours, according to her count.

That's because just as the official clock for a basketball or football game stops for time-outs and commercial breaks, Democrats aren't counting the minutes spent on business unrelated to those six designated bills.

So while the House had been in session for nearly 56 hours since the 110th Congress was sworn in Jan. 4, the clock on Pelosi's Web site suggested that less than half that time — 23 hours, 34 minutes — had elapsed by the close of business Friday.

"We're just counting the legislative hours," Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill explained.

Regardless of which clock is used, Democrats appear well on their way to accomplishing their promise. They have only two bills to go and both are scheduled for votes next week. Aiding their endeavor is Monday's Martin Luther King Jr. federal holiday, when neither clock will be running.

Finished are new rules on ethics, lobbying and budgeting — part of the Democrats' 100-hour promise in November but not included on Pelosi's clock. Also completed are the passage of four bills: anti-terrorism measures, a minimum-wage increase,and expanding federally funded stem cell research, in addition to Friday's Medicare measure.

The final two bills are cutting interest rates on some student loans and recouping more money from oil royalties and redistributing it to renewable energy technologies.

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the clock — no matter how time is kept — is irrelevant.

"The clock is just a distraction to the hypocrisy they've exhibited and continued to exhibit in the first 100 hours," Kennedy said, referring to House Democrats' refusal to allow the GOP minority a chance to offer amendments or have any role in writing the bills. Democrats had leveled the same criticism that Republicans, then in the majority, denied them those opportunities.

No time was run on either clock Monday, when many lawmakers attended the BCS championship football game in Arizona between Ohio State and Florida.

Competing House Clocks Tick At Different Speeds As Members Get Down To Business (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0117177

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12 — How much bipartisanship is really possible if Democrats and Republicans can't even agree on how to tell time?

After House Democrats posted a digital clock on their Web site on Tuesday to mark how much time had elapsed as they pushed through their First 100 Hours agenda, Republicans retaliated with their own online clock on Wednesday. They are counting down the hours passed by "a Democrat caucus fresh out of ideas."

All week, members of Congress demonstrated a much more exacting sense of the clock than usual.

"It has been an interesting 58 hours and 48 minutes as of this morning," said Representative Marsha Blackburn, Republican of Tennessee, in a floor speech Friday. But by the Democratic clock, only 23 hours and 34 minutes had passed. Ms. Blackburn criticized Democrats as engaging in "creative clock-keeping."

Democrats say they are measuring only "legislative hours," meaning the time spent on lawmaking activities. But like dog years and the last two minutes of an N.B.A. game, "legislative time" does not necessarily correspond to "real time."

As the clocks ticked:

MONDAY, LATE AFTERNOON Senate Democrats would have started their clock on Monday, except that they did not have a clock. It's a House thing. Still, the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, was eager to get to work and is a stickler for punctuality. He said he was committed to operating the chamber more efficiently — meaning, on time. Senator Bernie Sanders, independent of Vermont and newly elected, missed what would have been his first vote despite a last-minute dash through the Capitol hallways.

TUESDAY, 1:15 P.M. "I have no idea what time it is," said Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska. And then he indulged in an elaborate metaphor to summarize the cyclical nature of things.

"I look upon life as the wheel in the barnyard," Mr. Young said. "Politics is the rooster on the wheel saying cock-a-doodle-doo. Some of the Democrats on the top of the wheel think the sun's going to shine all day. They don't realize that the wheel is turning and that there's someone else coming up from the bottom of the wheel."

Behold, the clarity.

WEDNESDAY, 3 P.M. TO 4 P.M. Off the House floor, in the ornate area known as the Speaker's Lobby, the shift in power was on full display. Members of the press swarmed to the left side of the lobby to meet Democrats coming off the floor. Republicans trickling off to the right were essentially left alone.

"People seem to be paying more attention to me now that I'm in the majority," said Representative Henry Cuellar, Democrat of Texas. Standing under the official portrait of former Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Mr. Cueller wore the "look, Mom!" face of a sudden big shot, or bigger shot than before.

Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, was slumped on the other side of the lobby, complaining that he had just been kicked off the Judiciary Committee by members of his own party.

"I think I was punished for speaking too freely," Mr. Flake said, specifically for his willingness to compromise with Democrats on immigration overhaul.

Representative Ed Perlmutter, a freshman Democrat from Colorado, had spent much of his week on the House floor. Even when there was nothing doing, no votes scheduled and few members on the floor, he sat and just watched. One of his goals for the first 100 hours is simply to learn the names of his new colleagues. "I could probably identify about 100 right now," Mr. Perlmutter said, leaving 334 to go.

THURSDAY, NOON For all the talk of the Democrats' "flurry of legislation" in the first 100 hours, the war in Iraq clearly dominated the day. President Bush addressed the nation the night before. Top administration figures appeared at Congressional hearings.

Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York, was eating lunch in his office, lingering in a conversation about Buffalo sports teams. Not too long ago, he was a member of the leadership team of the majority party, head of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee and in a tough re-election campaign. "I just finished up '06 with two full-time jobs," he said, referring to his posts as congressman and head of the campaign committee. Now he was sprawled out in his office eating a ham sandwich. "Washington loves survivors," he said.

FRIDAY, 4 P.M. Representative Joe Courtney, a freshman Democrat from Connecticut, was walking briskly and hoping to catch a flight to Hartford. Earlier, he gave his first floor speech as a member of Congress, a five-minute talk about Medicare. He was nervous at first, but was fine once he got going.

"I meant to say 'Mr. Speaker' and 'thank you, Mr. Stark,' " Mr. Courtney said. "But I wound up saying 'Thank you, Mr. Spark.' Oh well."

He shrugged and headed out for the weekend, promising to do better next time.

DOJ_NMG_0117178

By the end of the day Friday, the Democratic clock read 23 hours and 34 minutes, while the Republican clock, which was counting down from 100, read 75 hours.

Lawmaker's Wife Out As Fundraiser (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) said yesterday that he will no longer employ his wife as his campaign fundraiser, an arrangement that allowed her to collect a 15 percent cut of donations to his campaign and political action committees -- more than $100,000 since 2003.

Doolittle, who has drawn criticism for links to disgraced lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff, said he will hire an outside fundraiser. He made the announcement in a commentary article he distributed to newspapers in his Northern California district, noting his tough battle for reelection.

"After winning my election with less than 50 percent of the vote, I recognize that change is needed for me to rebuild the trust and support of my constituents," Doolittle wrote.

The change was one of 10 steps that Doolittle pledged to take after a campaign clouded by questions about Julie Doolittle's fundraising and his ties to Abramoff.

Doolittle accepted campaign donations from Abramoff and interceded with the Bush administration on behalf of the lobbyist's tribal clients. His former chief of staff, Kevin A. Ring, went to work with Abramoff and, sources told The Washington Post, later played a role in the hiring of Julie Doolittle's consulting firm by Abramoff and his firm, Greenberg Traurig.

Doolittle also promised to spend more time in his district and make himself more available to the media.

Doolittle beat Democrat Charlie Brown in November, 49 percent to 46 percent.

Cheney Enters The Twilight Of His Career (AP)

By Tom Raum,

AP, January 13, 2007

One by one, the hardline conservatives like Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Bolton who stood shoulder to shoulder with Vice President Dick Cheney in pushing President Bush's decision to invade Iraq have left the administration.

Yet while Cheney himself is in the twilight days of his political career, he's still there, with little evidence that his influence with Bush has waned.

Bush's decision to boost troops in Iraq and to continue to challenge Iran and Syria runs counter to recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, the new Democratic majority in Congress and many Republicans — yet reflects Cheney's long-held hawkish views.

The vice president, who generally has kept a low public profile since the midterm elections, is about to get some unwanted exposure in another area. He's expected to be a witness in the perjury and obstruction trial of his former top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, in the CIA leak case.

Jury selection starts Tuesday. Cheney did not resist being called as a defense witness.

Once viewed as adding an air of gravitas to an inexperienced president, Cheney, 64, is now seen by many Americans as a driving force behind Bush's most divisive initiatives: the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program, harsh detention and interrogation policies and an aggressive push for expanded executive authority.

Bad as Bush's poll numbers are, Cheney's are worse. And while he's still beloved by conservatives, it seems unlikely he will be a big draw on the 2008 campaign circuit.

None of that seems to matter to Bush.

"Cheney and Bush have a quite personal relationship. Cheney has been loyal from the beginning and is loyal to this day. And the Bush family, if they have any family trait, is to return loyalty," said GOP consultant Rich Galen.

Cheney is expected to be an active salesman for Bush's new Iraq policy, which includes sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq. The plan, which Bush announced this week in a speech to the nation, has drawn wide condemnation from Democrats and many Republicans. Polls show a majority of Americans oppose increasing U.S. troops in Iraq.

Cheney appears ready for the fight, his health holding up despite a long history of heart disease.

In the meantime, his fellow hard-liners in the administration are, for the most part, gone.

Rumsfeld resigned as defense secretary under pressure. Bolton, unable to win Senate confirmation, had to give up his temporary assignment as U.N. ambassador. Former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz left some time ago to head the World Bank.

Douglas Feith, a former deputy defense secretary, and Richard Perle, a former Pentagon adviser, have gone on to other things.

DOJ_NMG_0117179

Cheney is the only member of Bush's original national security team still holding the same job.

"The neo-cons are gone. Cheney is the last one, and you can't get rid of him," said Paul C. Light, a New York University professor of public service.

Still, "his influence has never been more at the mercy of the president than today," said Light.

"For his first four years perhaps, maybe even a little bit longer, when he spoke the president listened. Now the president speaks and Cheney must listen. And it's the president who is setting the vice president's agenda and not vice versa."

Both parties have been freshly reminded of Cheney's constitutional duties as president of the Senate as control of that chamber has continued to ride on the health of Sen. Tim Johnson. The South Dakota Democrat remains hospitalized four weeks after surgery for a brain hemorrhage.

If Johnson cannot complete his term, the Republican governor of South Dakota would be likely to appoint a Republican, effectively creating a 50-50 Senate and allowing Republicans to regain control by virtue of Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Cheney played a lightning-rod role as a leading advocate for invading Iraq and has continued to call for an aggressive stance there, even after last November's midterm elections stripped Republicans of control of both House and Senate.

"Some in our country may believe in good faith that retreating from Iraq would make America safer. Recent experience teaches the opposite lesson," Cheney said in a speech to a conservative group several weeks after the election.

When Bush decided to replace the controversial Rumsfeld with Robert Gates at the Pentagon, Cheney said at a farewell ceremony last month for his old friend, "Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of defense this nation has ever had."

"I think Cheney remains a powerful force within the administration and there's no indication he's changed his views," said Michele Flournoy, a former Pentagon defense strategist now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"That said, the president is still the president," she said.

"But there's not a lot of indication the president's changed his views, either," Flournoy said. She said the net effect is that "the two leaders at the top are still driving the train in the same direction despite calls for them to change course."

Bush still clearly values Cheney's counsel.

The vice president traveled to Saudi Arabia in late November to sound out the Saudis on the conflict in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis. And he was at Bush's side as the president met with various groups to help reshape his Iraq policy.

"Cheney's role is back to what it was at the beginning, which is the behind-the-scenes organizer, the guy who gets things done," said GOP pollster Frank Luntz. "And Cheney is so much a man of principle and so not a man of polls. So for him, it's not that he's going the other way (from more moderate voices on Iraq). He is sticking to principle."

Luntz said it doesn't really matter that Cheney may be losing political influence among other Republicans and may be a liability with the new Democratic Congress. "Now that the last campaign is done, there's not much for him to do politically."

Libby Trial May Show Cheney's Role In Run-Up To War (BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly, Holly Rosenkrantz

Bloomberg, January 12, 2007

Jan. 12 (Bloomberg) -- The perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, may provide ammunition for Democrats looking to attack the White House for its conduct in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Libby, 56, is charged with perjury and obstruction for lying to a grand jury probing the leak of a CIA agent's name. He faces as many as 30 years in prison if convicted. The trial starts on Jan. 16 in Washington.

Defense lawyers say they'll call Cheney as a witness to bolster claims Libby was too busy with security matters to accurately remember events. His testifying is risky for both men. What Cheney recalls may undermine Libby's too-busy defense while exposing the vice president to probes by Congress of how the Bush administration promoted the war, legal experts said.

``Litigation begets litigation," said Stanley Brand, a former U.S. House counsel who specializes in representing public officials accused of wrongdoing. ``Every time you haul someone to court, it makes it more likely someone else is going to haul him to court. It's the Martha Stewart problem. Once you're under oath, people can take pot shots at you about what you said."

Ted Wells, a Paul Weiss Rifkind attorney representing Libby, told U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton during a hearing last month that he plans to call Cheney to the stand. He and co- counsel William Jeffress of Baker Botts did not return telephone calls this week seeking comment.

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Ann McBride declined to say whether a subpoena has been received. ``We have cooperated fully with the investigation and will continue to do so," McBride said.

Rare Testimony

If Cheney takes the stand, he would be the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal case in at least 100 years, according to Joel Goldstein, a vice presidential scholar at St. Louis University. Rulings by Walton may limit the scope of Cheney's testimony, though he is likely to discuss events in the months leading up to the invasion of Iraq in 2003, the period in which prosecutors say Libby committed perjury and obstruction.

``The suggestion has been that Vice President Cheney's office has really almost created an alternative national security council," Goldstein said. ``To that extent, the trial may be indicative in showing how the vice president's office has been involved in the planning and selling of the war."

Libby was Cheney's closest adviser, having served as the vice president's national security adviser as well as his chief of staff. He worked with Cheney at the Pentagon during the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

Not First on Trial

Libby is one of the highest-ranking White House officials ever to be tried, though not the only member of the Bush administration. David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget, was sentenced to 18 months in prison in October for lying and obstructing justice during the corruption investigation of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now in prison for fraud.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Peter Zeidenberg, who won a conviction of Safavian, is a working with U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor in the Libby case.

Fitzgerald, normally based in Chicago, would probably handle any cross-examination of Cheney. He ``is the special prosecutor in the Libby case, and he is personally responsible and more involved in that case, than in any of his Chicago cases," said Robert Kent, a former federal prosecutor in Fitzgerald's office who left two months ago to join the Baker McKenzie law firm.

Fitzgerald's cases include the prosecution of Conrad Black, the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman charged with looting the company.

Plame's Name

Libby was indicted in October 2005 on charges of lying to investigators and a grand jury probing whether Bush administration officials intentionally revealed the identity of Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame to reporters, a violation of federal law.

Plame's name was published by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, after her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly accused President George W. Bush of twisting intelligence to justify the Iraq war.

Libby is accused of lying and obstructing the probe. No one has been charged with the leak of Plame's name. In September, ex- U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage said he was the person who first told Novak that Plame was a CIA officer.

Court papers filed in the Libby case portray Cheney as having a central role in events during the period in 2003 that the administration was defending itself against critics of Bush's decision to invade Iraq. Cheney told Libby on June 12, 2003, that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA, according to the indictment. Libby told investigators that he believed Cheney learned it from the agency.

`No Control'

Cheney's testimony may undermine Libby's argument that he was too focused on national security matters by showing, for example, how often he discussed Wilson and Plame with his boss, according to Elizabeth de la Vega, a former federal prosecutor.

``This is Libby's trial," she said. ``He's on trial for perjury and false statements, so Cheney is not going to be able to control anything. It's not completely wide open, but there's quite a bit of leeway in questioning him on matters leading up to the disclosure" of Plame's name.

News organizations including Bloomberg News asked Walton Jan. 4 to ensure media access to the jury selection process, and to release audio recordings of the proceedings. Walton denied the latter request in a Jan. 9 order and will allow only two journalists in the courtroom. He said the court has taken extraordinary steps to ensure public access.

Other reporters and members of the public can observe the proceedings in a second courtroom that will have live audio and video of the proceedings, he said.

``At no time in the history of this courthouse have such accommodations been provided to the public and the press in a criminal case," Walton said in the order.

The case is U.S. vs. Libby, 05-394, U.S. District Court, the District of Columbia.

Cheney Is Forced To Testify In Case Of The Crime That Never Was (LONT)

By Tim Reid

Times of London, January 13, 2007

A politically charged courtroom drama centred on the Iraq war, a blonde bombshell spy and a vice-president in the witness box begins next week when Dick Cheney's former chief of staff goes on trial for his alleged role in the CIA leak scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0117181

The prosecution of Lewis “Scooter” Libby is set to become a political show trial to be relished by opponents of the Iraq war. The roots of the scandal that led to his being charged with perjury lie in how the White House justified the invasion, and the subsequent spin operation that it mounted after the failure to find weapons of mass destruction.

In one key respect the six- week trial, which begins on Tuesday, is unprecedented: the relentlessly secretive Mr Cheney will enter the witness box as part of Mr Libby’s defence. It makes him the first sitting vice-president to testify in a criminal prosecution. He is expected to be cross-examined on his efforts to rebut critics of the war aggressively as it began to turn sour in 2003, an experience he will find detestable.

Mr Libby denies lying to the FBI and a grand jury about who gave the press the name of Valerie Plame, a former covert CIA agent with stunning good looks. He faces up to 30 years in jail if convicted.

No Bush Administration official, including Mr Libby, was charged with leaking Ms Plame’s identity. It became clear last year that the accusation that triggered the special prosecutor’s investigation — that the White House knew that Ms Plame was an undercover operative and leaked her identity deliberately to discredit her husband, a war critic — was unfounded. Mr Libby is now accused of a covering up a non-existent crime that did not need to be hidden.

The genesis of the Plame scandal lies in a CIA-sponsored trip that Joseph Wilson, Ms Plame’s husband and a former ambassador, made to Niger in 2002 to investigate reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium there. In July 2003 he accused the Bush Administration of ignoring his report that there was no Iraq-Niger link, and of twisting prewar intelligence.

A week later Robert Novak, a conservative columnist, wrote that Mr Wilson had been sent to Niger by Ms Plame, the first time that her name had been made public. The report caused a political storm after Mr Wilson claimed that his wife was a covert agent and that her name had been leaked as retribution for his criticism of the war. It is a crime knowingly to reveal the identity of a covert official.

Soon after Mr Novak’s column, several other journalists wrote about Ms Plame. They told Patrick Fitzgerald, the investigating prosecutor, that they learnt about her from Mr Libby and Karl Rove, Mr Bush’s chief adviser. Mr Libby is charged with lying to investigators because he claimed that he first learnt about Ms Plame from the reporters. One journalist, Judith Miller, was jailed for 85 days after refusing to reveal that her source was Mr Libby.

Claims of a White House operation to destroy the Wilsons were all but demolished after it emerged recently that Mr Novak’s source was Richard Armitage, Colin Powell’s former deputy at the State Department. He was a war critic and mentioned the Plame-Wilson connection as “idle gossip”.

Mr Fitzgerald will try to show that Mr Cheney was obsessed with pushing back against Mr Wilson and that it was a “high priority” for his chief of staff — and that Mr Libby tried to obscure that fact.

SMU Faculty Members Oppose Bush Library (AP)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 13, 2007

Negotiations to build George W. Bush's presidential library at Southern Methodist University have divided the campus, pitting the administration and some alumni against liberal-leaning faculty members who say the project would be an embarrassment to the school.

Some professors have complained that the combined library, museum and think tank would celebrate a presidency that unnecessarily took the country into a war.

The fear is that the library "will continue to espouse the philosophy and practice of the Bush administration, which has seriously divided our nation and has brought the ire of other countries," said William McElvaney, a retired professor at SMU's theology school and co-author a November opinion piece in the campus newspaper titled "The George W. Bush Library: Asset or Albatross?"

SMU emerged as the front-runner in the competition last month when the library site selection committee said it was entering further discussions with the 11,000-student, private university in one of Dallas's wealthiest neighborhoods. The project will be financed with a private fund drive aimed at raising at least $200 million.

Bush connections to SMU run deep. First lady Laura Bush is a graduate and is on the board of trustees. Vice President Dick Cheney previously served on the board. Presidential adviser Karen Hughes and former White House counsel Harriet Miers are both graduates.

SMU officials said the project is unlikely to be derailed by the faculty opposition, and said the professors opposed to it are in the minority.

Brad Cheves, vice president for external affairs and development, said the library could help recruit students, attract visitors and increase giving. "It raises the profile of SMU no matter how people feel about President Bush," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0117182

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino declined to comment. And a spokesman for former Bush administration Commerce Secretary Don Evans, chairman of the library search committee, would not comment on whether the objections from some of the 600 faculty members would affect the panel's final decision, expected in a few months.

Other faculty say they would welcome the library.

"This takes us to a whole new level," said Rita Kirk, a politics professor who has done research at other presidential libraries.

As for the students, Luis Arango, a 21-year-old junior and political science major, said on campus Friday: "This school has a very conservative vibe, and most of the students like Bush. The only people who don't seem to be the faculty. I know for a fact that some are real liberal and I don't think should be teaching here."

As for the alumni, many of them are wealthy and conservative. And Mike Boone, who is on SMU's board of trustees and earned undergraduate and law school degrees from SMU, said an overwhelming majority of alumni support the Bush library project.

"It's prestigious and brings a lot of value to a university," said Boone, a Dallas lawyer who has known Bush since he was Texas governor.

The other finalists are Baylor University in Waco, near the Bushes' Crawford ranch, and the University of Dallas.

McElvaney warned that not only could the library hurt SMU's reputation, it could also become a target for terrorists or others who want to strike back at Bush, McElvaney said.

"Dallas is already known as the city in which President Kennedy was assassinated, so does Dallas want a Bush library that could become a prime terrorist target?" McElvaney asked.

The library of the president's father is on the Texas A&M University campus in College Station.

Universities often compete to host presidential libraries. But this is not the first time that the political passions of the day have stirred resistance to such a project.

In 1981, Duke University faculty members, by one vote, voted against continuing discussions to build Richard Nixon's library there. Nixon graduated from Duke Law School in North Carolina. Duke's trustees voted to build the library anyway, but negotiations with Nixon officials eventually broke down. The Nixon library was eventually built in Yorba Linda, in his native California.

"It was obvious this was going to be a memorial to glorify the career of Richard Nixon rather than be a repository of his papers," said Lawrence Evans, a retired Duke physics professor.

Native Texan Lyndon B. Johnson's library was built on the University of Texas campus in Austin during the Vietnam area. During the 1971 opening ceremony, hundreds of protesters chanted anti-war slogans and released black balloons. Demonstrators also marched around campus, throwing bottles, cans and rocks at police, and dozens were arrested.

For Teachers, Being "Highly Qualified" Is A Subjective Matter (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

To overhaul public education, the No Child Left Behind law required a massive expansion of student testing. But it also called for states to ensure that all teachers in core academic subjects are "highly qualified" to help students succeed -- an unprecedented mandate that has delivered less than promised.

The law, which turned five years old this week, has held schools to increasingly higher standards for student achievement. For teachers, however, standards meant to guarantee that they know their subjects are often vague and open to broad interpretation.

Legal loopholes and uneven implementation by states and the U.S. Department of Education have diluted the law's impact on the teaching workforce, some education experts say. They say that meeting the standards of quality is more about shuffling paper than achieving two vital goals: ensuring that teachers are prepared to help students succeed and reducing the teacher talent gap between rich and poor schools.

"Meeting the qualifications has become an exercise in bureaucratic compliance," said Andrew J. Rotherham, a member of the Virginia Board of Education and a former education adviser in the Clinton administration. "It's not a process that gets at the fundamental issues of quality or effectiveness." Congress may soon tackle those issues as it considers renewing the law.

The career path of Maria Lewis Ramadane shows what the mandate was meant to accomplish and its confusing results. The meaning of highly qualified, it turns out, varies sharply from place to place.

When Ramadane started teaching at Graham Park Middle School near Dumfries in 2003, the special education teacher didn't meet the law's standard because she had a provisional license. But after earning a master's degree and completing a 30-hour literacy class, she obtained full certification, and Virginia now deems her highly qualified to teach language arts.

DOJ_NMG_0117183

In Maryland and the District, however, Ramadane would be asked for more: another standardized test, more professional coursework. Tougher rules are probably one reason Maryland and the District report lower rates of classrooms with highly qualified teachers: 79 percent in Maryland and 51 percent in the District, compared with 95 percent in Virginia. D.C. public schools -- and some in Maryland -- also face major recruiting obstacles.

This week, senior Democratic lawmakers discussed an extension of No Child Left Behind with President Bush. In the coming congressional debate over the law, teacher quality is likely to be a key issue. Some experts favor shifting the emphasis from "highly qualified" to "highly effective" teachers, requiring states to look not just at credentials but how well individual teachers help students learn and perform on tests.

U.S. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor, said in an interview that teacher quality is one of his highest priorities. He has proposed spending more money to recruit and retain qualified teachers, particularly in low-income districts.

Miller said the current standards for subject matter competence and certification are the "bare minimum" and said that the government should establish systems to increase teacher effectiveness. "The law itself does not make you highly qualified," he said.

Some leaders of teacher unions say that raising salaries and improving working conditions are better ways to raise the caliber of the workforce. Princess Moss, president of the Virginia Education Association, questioned what she called "paperwork and needless requirements," particularly in areas with persistent teacher shortages, such as special education.

Ramadane said she has not found Virginia's requirements difficult, and she has taken extra classes in reading and writing instruction so she can keep challenging her Prince William County students. "Most teachers that I know go above and beyond," she said.

The Bush administration has pushed aggressively to hold schools accountable for raising student test scores and narrowing achievement gaps, but it has been more flexible on teacher quality.

In late 2005, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings pushed back a June 2006 deadline for states to reach full compliance with the highly qualified teacher requirement, giving them a one-year pass if they could demonstrate progress. Spellings said states would not lose federal funding if they submitted a plan with an acceptable definition of highly qualified teachers, accurate data and steps to ensure that experienced and qualified teachers are spread equitably among rich and poor schools.

By August, only Maryland and eight other states had plans that met all requirements. The rest, including Virginia, had to make revisions to address the equity issue, as did the District.

U.S. education officials and independent analysts cite some advances. Data show that about nine out of 10 classrooms nationwide in 2005 were headed by a highly qualified teacher; in 2003, the rate was closer to eight out of 10. Experts note that states have created incentives and opportunities for teachers to obtain additional training and have reversed a long-standing reliance on emergency credentials to fill classrooms. In some cities, including the District, school systems have fired teachers who are not fully licensed.

Spellings said the drive for content expertise has improved the workforce.

"The whole notion that you have to have grounding in the subject area that you're teaching makes a lot of sense to policymakers and to moms and dads," she said. "You know, the old you-can't-teach-what-you-don't-know philosophy."

According to the federal law, to become highly qualified, a first-year teacher must have a college degree, a full state license and some mastery of content -- provable by coursework or a standardized test.

The first two requirements are straightforward. The third has been interpreted in many ways, particularly for veteran teachers -- defined in Virginia and Maryland as those with at least one year of experience -- for whom the law is more lenient.

To prove expertise, teachers can choose from a menu of options that often have little to do with subject matter.

In Maryland, teachers can show they know their subjects in part by taking education courses or earning teaching awards. Virginia offers credit for developing curricula, mentoring other teachers or attending a 30-hour "content knowledge institute."

Last year, the Bush administration objected to a Virginia policy allowing new high school special education teachers to take a less-rigorous middle school content test. It also faulted a policy letting veteran teachers assert that they are sufficiently knowledgeable if they hold an advanced degree in any subject, not just in the subject they teach. Virginia tightened the rules, but state officials said the policies in question affected only about 155 of the state's 99,000 teachers.

Virginia officials report only a small teacher-quality gap, with 6 percent of classrooms in the state's poorest schools lacking highly qualified teachers, compared with 3 percent in the richest schools.

In Maryland, the disparity is greater: Nearly 40 percent of classes in the poorest schools lack highly qualified teachers, compared with about 10 percent in the richest schools. Especially in Baltimore and Prince George's County, administrators often must resort to hiring inexperienced teachers who move on after a few years.

DOJ_NMG_0117184

But Maryland has made progress -- the portion of classrooms with highly qualified teachers rose from 67 percent in 2004 to more than 79 percent in 2006.

At Benjamin Tasker Middle School in Bowie, the compliance rate rose from 52 percent in 2004 to 76 percent in 2006. But the hunt for highly qualified teachers remains intense.

As this school year approached, Principal Karen Coley said she found herself waiting for a seventh-grade science teacher to "drop from the sky."

The school system's recruiter, known as the "rainmaker," found a candidate who was promising but not rated highly qualified. One recent morning, that teacher quizzed students about the difference between chemical and physical properties. "A natural," Coley called her.

But in the future, Coley is hoping to find a more reliable stream of highly qualified teachers.

High Court Adds Death-Penalty And Tobacco Cases To Docket (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Supreme Court added four cases to its docket for the current term yesterday, including a review of a judge's decision to dismiss a potential juror from a death-penalty case because of the man's equivocal statements about capital punishment.

A federal appeals court overturned the trial judge's ruling in a rape and murder trial in the state of Washington. One of the issues in the case is whether federal courts should defer to a trial judge who is in a position to actually talk to and observe a potential juror in making the decision about his ability to carry out the law.

The court has added 11 cases to its slimmer-than-usual caseload in the past eight days, all of which are scheduled to be argued and decided before the term's usual close at the end of June. Among the cases justices said yesterday that they will decide is a question of whether a cigarette manufacturer can move a lawsuit against it to federal jurisdiction and out of the state courts, where judgments against tobacco companies have been mounting.

The death-penalty case , Uttecht v. Brown (06-413), stems from the 1991 conviction of Cal Coburn Brown. One of the prospective jurors in the case indicated on a questionnaire that he could support a death sentence if convinced beyond a shadow of a doubt that the accused had killed and would kill again, and that he would have severe doubts without that. Because the only other alternative sentence for Brown would be life in prison without parole, he was told it would be unlikely such evidence would be presented.

After additional questioning, the prosecution asked that the juror be dismissed, and the defense did not object. The Washington state Supreme Court and a federal district judge upheld the state judge's decision to dismiss.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, with which the Supreme Court has already disagreed on a death-penalty case this year, reversed the sentence. The potential juror's statement that he "would impose the death penalty when the defendant would be likely to kill again did not exclude the possibility that he would vote to impose the death penalty in other circumstances as well," the court ruled.

And it said that automatically deferring to the trial judge's judgment because "unknown facial expression or body language" might contradict the actual words of the potential juror would make appellate review "obsolete."

The cigarette case, Watson v. Philip Morris (05-1284), comes from Arkansas, where consumers alleged that the company had violated the state's deceptive-advertising law with claims about its "light" cigarettes. Similar class-action lawsuits have been filed around the country.

But Phillip Morris, whose parent company is now known as Altria Group Inc., was successful in having the case transferred to federal courts, saying that its advertising is regulated by the Federal Trade Commission, and that made it a "person acting under" a federal officer.

The Bush administration said it disagreed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit ruling upholding the lower court's decision. Nevertheless, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement had recommended the Supreme Court not take the case, saying it did not warrant the court's review.

Those who sued said the move to federal court denies the right of states to be the primary forum for adjudicating state laws.

The court also took Struhs, et al., v. Wyner (06-531), about who should pay lawyer fees in a case involving nude protesters in a Florida park, and Hinck v. U.S. (06-376), a jurisdictional question about the U.S. Tax Court.

Justices To Review Death Penalty Case (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117185

Once again, the 9th Circuit Appeals Court's sentence overturning will be reconsidered.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to reconsider another death penalty decision from the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, this one overturning the death sentence for a man who abducted a young Seattle woman then raped and tortured her for two days before killing her.

It will be the fourth case before the justices this term in which the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit had reversed a murder conviction or a death sentence.

In all four, state prosecutors appealed to the high court, arguing the judges of the appeals court had overstepped their authority and wrongly second-guessed a state court's decision.

In November, the high court reversed the 9th Circuit and restored a death sentence for a Central Valley man who robbed and fatally clubbed a young woman in 1982. In December, the justices unanimously restored the murder conviction for a man who shot and killed the fiancé of his estranged wife in San Jose. The 9th Circuit had overturned the conviction because the parents and a brother of the murder victim were seen wearing a small photo of him in the courtroom.

The third case, heard Tuesday, concerned an Arizona murderer whose death sentence was overturned by the 9th Circuit on the grounds that his lawyer failed to present "mitigating evidence" on his behalf, even though the defendant, Jeffrey Landrigan, told the judge during the sentencing hearing that he did not want mitigating evidence presented on his behalf.

The new case, from Seattle, focuses on a potential juror who was excluded because of his views on the death penalty.

The facts of the case were described as "sickening" by the dissenting judges on the 9th Circuit.

On May 23, 1991, Holly Washa, 21, was leaving her job at a hotel near the Seattle-Tacoma Airport when Cal Brown stopped her to say her tire was flat. He jumped in her car and put a knife to her throat. He forced her to take money from her bank account.

Brown took her to a motel where he kept her in handcuffs and raped her. On the third day, he slit her throat and left her to die in the trunk of her car.

From there, Brown flew to Palm Springs, where he abducted, tortured and stabbed a second woman. Despite a slit throat, she was able to call the hotel desk when Brown left the room. Police arrested Brown when he returned.

Brown gave a detailed confession to both crimes. In Seattle, he was tried, convicted and sentenced to die in 1993 for Washa's murder. State courts and a federal judge in Seattle upheld the conviction and sentence.

"This was not a case where there was any doubt about who committed the murder," John J. Samson, an assistant attorney general from Washington, said Friday.

In December 2005, however, Brown's appeal came before a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit, which reversed the death sentence on the grounds that one of the potential jurors was improperly excluded from the trial.

During voir dire, the process in which prosecutors and defense attorneys question prospective jurors, either side may move to exclude someone they think may have a strong bias.

When questioned, the potential juror, referred to as "Juror Z," said he favored the death penalty only "in severe situations" and when it was "very obvious the person would re-offend."

Under Washington law, a defendant convicted of aggravated first-degree murder would be sentenced to death or life in prison without the possibility of parole. That meant that Brown would have no chance to "re-offend" outside prison.

A death sentence may be imposed in Washington only if all 12 jurors agree. Because this potential juror would presumably reject a death sentence for Brown, the prosecutor sought to remove him from the jury pool. "We have no objection," the defense lawyer replied, and the trial judge dismissed "Juror Z" from the case's jury pool.

Writing for the appeals court, Judge Alex Kozinski of Pasadena said "Juror Z" was not flatly opposed to the death penalty. "Most importantly, he promised he would 'follow the law' without reservation," he wrote.

Because "Juror Z was erroneously excluded," Brown was denied his right to a fair trial, Kozinski concluded. His opinion was joined by Judges Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marcia Berzon of San Francisco.

In June, 2006, when a petition to rehear the case was denied by the appeals court, five of its judges joined in a dissent, saying the decision ignored a 1996 law which says U.S. judges should defer to reasonable decisions made by state courts.

In September, Washington Atty. Gen. Rob McKenna appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the trial judge had handled the jury selection reasonably and in line with the law.

The justices voted Friday to hear the case of Uttecht vs. Brown in April and to issue a ruling by late June.

Early Loss Overcome, Dow Sets A Record (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Wall Street rebounded from an early loss yesterday to send the Dow Jones industrial average to its second consecutive record close as investors embraced robust economic data and shrugged off several profit warnings.

Stocks held their gains despite a warning from the chip maker Advanced Micro Devices, considered one of the bellwether stocks in the technology sector, that its revenue would fall short of forecasts.

The market was helped by the recent decline in oil prices and by a Commerce Department report that retail sales rose in December at their strongest pace in five months, an indication that holiday sales might have been better than expected.

The retail sales report was another sign that the economy remains healthy, and that central bankers might be inclined to keep interest rates where they are. Investors have been hoping the Federal Reserve might lower rates in the near future.

Some of yesterday's fluctuations were probably a result of adjustments in the positions of investors ahead of a three-day weekend. The markets are closed on Monday for Martin Luther King's Birthday.

"You've had a pretty good week, and people always tend to even up positions on a Friday, especially before a holiday," said Alexander Paris, an economist for Barrington Research in Chicago.

The Dow Jones industrials jumped 41.10 points, or 0.33 percent, to 12,556.08. It was the index's 24th record close since the start of October.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 6.91 points, or 0.49 percent, to 1,430.73, and the Nasdaq composite index increased 17.97 points, or 0.72 percent, to 2,502.82.

The Dow Jones industrials rose 1.27 percent this week, while the S.& P. 500 advanced 1.49 percent and the Nasdaq picked up 2.82 percent.

"The mood isn't negative," said Brian Williamson, an equity trader at the Boston Company Asset Management, a subsidiary of the Mellon Financial Corporation. "You take the economic news as it comes. Things are changing so rapidly, and there's so much information right now, but you react and then look ahead. That's what the market is doing."

Oil prices, which touched 19-month lows in the session, were erratic as traders weighed speculation that the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries might consider an emergency meeting to cut production. The February crude oil contract settled up $1.11 at $52.99 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange; despite the advance, oil is still down 13 percent since the start of the year.

Investors pushed oil stocks higher on the belief a production cut could help anchor profits. ConocoPhillips, also helped by plans for a share buyback, rose $2.01, or 3.3 percent, to $63.83.

Exxon Mobil gained $1.68, rising to $72.66.

Murphy Oil, an oil and gas refiner, rose 36 cents, to $46.61, as investors shrugged off a fourth-quarter profit warning.

Technology stocks, which have been among the market's biggest gainers so far this year, extended their advance despite a warning late Thursday from Advanced Micro that fourth-quarter results would be lower than expected because of a price battle with Intel. Advanced Micro fell $1.92, or 9.5 percent, to $18.26.

A warning from the business software maker SAP that quarterly profit and revenue would fall short of expectations caused a round of downgrades by analysts. The stock was able to stay in positive territory, however, rising $1.52, or 3.1 percent, to $50.02.

Apple backed off a record high reached this week after it unveiled plans to roll out its iPhone later this year. A trademark lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems challenged Apple's right to the name and helped push its shares lower by $1.18, to $94.62. Shares of Cisco rose 23 cents, to $28.92.

Cablevision Systems fell after the Dolan family, which founded the company, raised its buyout bid in what the family called the "best and final offer." Investors sent the stock down $1.21, or 4.1 percent, to $28.39, apparently concluding that a more lucrative offer is unlikely.

The bond market, which has been pricing in the potential of a cut in interest rates sometime in the first half of the year, was disturbed by the economic reports yesterday. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note declined 11/32, to a price of 9826/32. The note's yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.77 percent from 4.73 percent Thursday.

Dollar Ends Three-Day Advance But Could Be Poised For Gains (WSJ)

By Isabelle Lindenmayer

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117187

Is that the end of the dollar rally, or just a pause?

The dollar ended its three-day advance Friday, largely shrugging off a series of positive data releases. But analysts say they expect the currency to post further gains this coming week as the market focuses on renewed optimism about the state of the U.S. economy.

After starting the session little changed, the dollar climbed on the back of a better-than-expected retail-sales report. Yet the dollar reversed course shortly thereafter, retracing all its gains and slipping notably lower against the euro.

In late-afternoon trading in New York, the euro stood at $1.2919 from $1.2894 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 120.37 yen from 120.50 yen late Thursday. The euro was at 155.50 yen from 155.37 yen.

The dollar stood at 1.2481 Swiss francs from 1.2491 francs, while sterling was at $1.9587 from $1.9455 late Thursday.

"The dollar saw an after-the-fact selloff following better-than-expected retail-sales numbers for December," Naomi Fink, currency strategist at BNP Paribas, said.

"More likely than not, investors felt as though the dollar's three-day rally preceding the release had compensated adequately for the upside surprise," she said.

Other analysts pointed to the retail report itself as a potential reason for the dollar's slip, as the report included a 0.4% downward revision in November's retail-sales data.

The dollar rose initially on the news but then reversed, "perhaps on the view that some of the details in the December sales data and the revisions were not as strong as seen at first glance," Michael Carey, chief economist for North America at Calyon Corporate & Investment Bank, said.

Investors can look forward to a slew of fresh U.S. data in the coming week, with December producer-price-index and consumer-price-index reports due, plus December housing starts.

December Retail Sales Jump 0.9% Amid Robust Holiday Shopping Season (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales, Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

As it turned out, shoppers spent more freely during the just-ended holiday season than had been thought, helping some retailers end the year on strong footing and suggesting that economic growth could be rebounding faster than expected.

Retail sales jumped 0.9% in December from the month before, to a seasonally adjusted $369.9 billion, the Commerce Department said Friday. December's growth was up from a gain of 0.6% in November and was the strongest rate of growth in retail sales since July. When compared to December a year ago, retail sales were up 5.4% compared with December-to-December growth of 5.7% in 2005.

Although full-year growth in 2006 was lower than in 2005, economists noted that sales in the final three months of last year were regaining momentum.

"The consumer was pretty lively" last month, said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc. "We ended the year on a strong note -- there's no doubt about that."

Economists said consumer spending last month benefited from a host of factors that offset the effect of a slowing housing market: Energy prices fell and stronger-than-expected job creation bolstered wage and income gains. Moreover, unseasonably warm weather and heavy discounting drew shoppers to the mall in greater numbers than usual.

The retail-sales figures, coming on the heels of last week's employment report that showed strong job creation, prompted some economists to raise their estimates of economic growth.

In an email sent to clients Friday, economists at Morgan Stanley said they believe consumer spending rose about 4.3% in the fourth quarter, a performance they said "has been exceeded on only a handful of occasions" over the course of the current expansion. They also said that "signs are pointing" to a much stronger pace of economic growth for the first quarter of 2007. The firm expects inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, the value of the nation's output, would be up "at least" 3.5% in the current quarter. Earlier, Morgan Stanley economists estimated first-quarter GDP growth would be between 2.3% and 2.5%.

The retail-sales report also bolsters the view that the Federal Reserve is unlikely to reduce interest rates soon and is likely to keep short-term interest rates at the current level. "There's no way the Fed will lower rates while" economic activity accelerates and inflation remains elevated, said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, of Princeton Junction, N.J. "It's just not in the cards. The economy is stronger than we thought earlier."

Not everyone agrees. Mr. Shapiro said that retail sales were "exaggerated" by warm weather. He expects consumer spending will ease to an annualized growth rate of 2.5% to 3% in the first quarter and slow even further for the rest of the year. "There's still a tug of war going on" between the slumping housing market and the healthy labor market, he said.

The holiday season's big winners included electronics and appliance stores, where sales rose 3% in December from a month earlier and 15% from a year earlier. A host of products fed that surge, including new videogame consoles, such as

Nintendo Co.'s Wii, digital music players, and flat-panel television sets. Prices on flat-panel, high-definition TV sets have plummeted in recent months -- in some cases to below $500 -- as mass-market retailers charged into the category.

Heavy discounting has lifted revenues at some of the nation's largest electronics retailers, including Best Buy Co., Richfield, Minn. Best Buy recently reported that sales at stores open at least a year rose 7% in December. "In flat-panel televisions, we did a tremendous amount of business, but that wasn't a surprise," the company's chief financial officer, Darren Jackson, said Friday. "What was a surprise is" that sales also remained robust for a range of other products, including notebook computers, digital music players and digital photography goods, he said.

Sales at nonstore retailers, essentially online and catalogue merchants, were up 0.3% last month and were up 7.9% from a year earlier. Sales at bars and restaurants rose 2.3% in December from a month earlier and 9.3% from a year earlier, the Commerce Department reported. Sales at general merchandise stores rose 0.9% in December from a month earlier, and 5.4% from a year earlier. Sales also rose at stores that sell cars and parts, furniture, clothing and health- and personal-care goods. However, sales at building-material and garden-equipment stores fell 1.1% in December from a month earlier and were down 0.8% from a year earlier, which economists said was due to the housing slowdown.

Separately, the Labor Department said Friday that import prices in December climbed 1.1% from November, and 2.5% from a year earlier. Excluding petroleum, import prices in December rose 0.4% from November and 1.7% from a year earlier.

US Retail Sales Better Than Expected (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

US retail sales rose more than expected last month as consumers spent heavily over the holiday period on electronics, government figures showed.

Total sales rose 0.9 per cent in December while the closely-watched measure of purchases excluding autos rose by 1 per cent, according to the data.

The steady rise suggests consumer spending helped support economic growth in the last quarter of the year, offsetting a sharp correction in the housing sector and weakness in manufacturing.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said the gain was “very strong”, adding: “clearly the trajectory for consumer spending into the first quarter is decent and the consumer sector overall looks very healthy.”

The sales rise underlines the Federal Reserve’s forecast that the economy will grow at a modest rate next year, as consumers continue to spend despite the ongoing housing slowdown.

The report from the Commerce Department showed sales at electricals stores rose 15 per cent compared to the last holiday season.

Figures for the full year also showed a strong rise in consumers’ use of the web to make purchases as online and catalogue sales also rose 11.3

Overall retail sales for the full year rose by 6 per cent, a slower pace than the 6.9 per cent gain achieved in 2005 - reflecting a weaker economy last year.

The Results Are In And Retailers Can Exhale (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

The Commerce Department released the final results on the holiday shopping season yesterday as the retail industry seemed to breathe a collective sigh of relief.

December sales grew nearly 5 percent from a year ago, to $332.44 billion, excluding motor vehicles, auto parts and food services, according to the report. For the past two months, sales increased 4.6 percent, to $662.5 billion, compared with the same period in 2005.

Retail groups had mixed reactions to the numbers, depending largely on how closely their forecasts matched the Commerce Department's figures. But even groups that had predicted stronger growth still considered the all-important holiday season to be a solid one.

The Commerce figures are based on monthly sales results from about 5,000 companies. The numbers released yesterday could be revised after additional data from 12,000 businesses are reviewed over the coming weeks. November's sales growth, for example, was downgraded to 0.6 percent from 1.1 percent the previous month. December retail sales increased 0.7 percent from the month before.

The undisputed leader of the season was consumer electronics. Sales last month skyrocketed 15 percent over December 2005, to $9.67 billion, the largest percentage jump of any category. Health and personal-care stores' sales grew 10.2 percent, to $19.64 billion. Apparel fared better than many industry experts expected, considering the unseasonably warm winter in some parts of the country. Shoppers spent 5.5 percent more -- $18.11 billion -- for clothing and accessories in December than they did a year earlier.

"It was a very good season," said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group. "It really is again on the heels of this huge electronic bonanza."

He said the Commerce Department results suggested that the season was stronger than he expected. The council tracks sales at national chain stores open at least a year typically found in malls and other shopping centers. They include such retailers as Wal-Mart, Kohl's and American Eagle but not home supply stores such as Home Depot and Lowe's. The group measured sales growth at its stores at 2.8 percent for November and December, in line with their projections, but slower than last year.

"You [can] say it's just been chugging along," Niemira said.

Meanwhile, ShopperTrak RCT put the sales increase for the past two months of 2006 at 5.1 percent over the same period in 2005, narrowly besting its 5 percent forecast. The research firm based its analysis on the Commerce Department's results for sales of general merchandise, apparel, furniture, sporting goods, electronics, books and related categories.

"I think that a lot of retailers met their expectations," said Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak. "But I think it really indicated more of the consumers' behavior in their willingness to continue to spend."

Martin also noted that while retailers rang up more sales, foot traffic fell 1.7 percent, compared with the same period last year. He said consumers likely had consolidated their shopping trips to save time and gasoline. The drop also could be because shoppers made fewer purchases, choosing to spend big bucks on one must-have item, such as a flat-screen TV set, Martin said.

For the National Retail Federation, an industry trade group, the Commerce Department's numbers were a bit of a disappointment. The group had predicted retail sales growth would hit 5 percent. Instead, its analysis showed they rose only 4.4 percent in November and December, not including automobile, gas station and restaurant sales.

Retail federation spokesman Scott Krugman attributed the difference largely to lackluster results from a soft housing market affecting home-improvement stores. And though apparel sales held up, he said warm winter still took a toll.

"The question is, how much stronger could that category have been if the weather would have cooperated?" he said.

Still, the group called the season's gains as "average," if "subdued."

"We'll try again next year," Krugman said.

Retail Sales Rise In December At Fastest Rate In 5 Months (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Retail sales rose in December at the strongest pace in five months, indicating that the all-important holiday shopping season turned out better than original reports indicated.

The Commerce Department said Friday that retail sales increased 0.9% last month, strongest showing since a 1.4% increase in July.

The increase was better than the 0.7% gain economists had forecast and provided evidence that consumer spending was ending the year on firmer footing than initially thought.

The government report presented a better picture of spending than initial reports from the nation's big chain retail stores. They complained that holiday sales had fallen below expectations as mild weather depressed sales of winter clothing.

The National Retail Federation said sales grew 4.4% in 2006, falling short of expectations. The group had forecast a 5% increase in sales for November and December. That figure is derived from Commerce Department data, stripping out sales of automobiles and at gas stations and restaurants.

"Unseasonably warmer weather and the slower housing market had a clear impact on consumer spending," said NRF Chief Economist Rosalind Wells . "NRF expects these subdued gains to continue into the first half of 2007."

In other news, business inventories held on shelves and backlots rose 0.4% in November, biggest gain in three months. That reflected a 0.2% rise in stockpiles being held by manufacturers and a 1.3% rise in wholesale inventories, which was offset somewhat by a 0.3% drop in inventories held by retailers.

With the November increase, inventory accumulation may not be as much of a drag on overall economic growth in the final three months of the year as had been previously feared.

For all 2006, retail sales rose 6%, a solid showing but down from a 6.9% increase in 2005.

That slowdown reflects the fact that consumer spending, after a sizzling start to the year, slowed in the spring and remained at lower levels the rest of the year as Americans were battered by soaring gasoline prices, rising interest rates and a cooling housing market.

DOJ_NMG_0117190

Consumer spending is closely watched because it accounts for two-thirds of economic activity. The 0.9% December advance should bolster the belief that the Federal Reserve is on track to achieve a so-called soft landing for the economy in which growth slows enough to keep inflation under control without pushing the country into a recession.

December gains in retail sales included a 3% jump in sales at electronics and appliance stores, following an even bigger 5.8% surge in November. Those increases reflected the introduction of sought-after video game consoles such as Sony's Playstation 3 and Nintendo's Wii.

Sales were up 3.8% at gasoline stations, reflecting in part higher pump prices. But pump prices were still below the $3-plus records set last summer.

Auto sales rose 0.3% after being flat in November.

Excluding the volatile gasoline and auto sectors, retail sales would have risen 0.7% in December, best showing since January 2006.

The 0.9% overall gain pushed retail sales to a seasonally adjusted total of $369.9 billion in December after a 0.6% November increase, which had originally been reported as a stronger 1% gain.

Sales at department stores and other general merchandise stores rose 0.9% while sales at specialty clothing stores were up 0.6%. However, sales at hardware stores fell 1.1%, reflecting the continued troubles in the once-booming housing industry.

CNN/WMUR/Union Leader To Host First Presidential Debates (CNN)

By Mark Preston

CNN.com, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- New Hampshire's two leading news organizations will partner with CNN to host two presidential debates in April, executives with the three media companies announced Friday.

CNN, WMUR and The New Hampshire Union Leader will hold the back-to-back debates on April 4 and 5, the first such events to be held of the 2008 presidential campaign. CNN's Wolf Blitzer will moderate the debates with questions coming from WMUR's Scott Spradling and Union Leader's John DiStaso. WMUR's Jennifer Vaughn will be moderating questions from the audience. The debate will be televised live nationally on CNN and throughout New Hampshire on WMUR.

"We are thrilled to provide our viewers with the information to make the most informed decision possible when they are voting in their presidential primaries or caucusing," said CNN/U.S. president Jon Klein.

New Hampshire, a crucial proving ground for 2008 candidates, will be the first state to cast votes in the Republican and Democratic presidential primaries. Republican and Democratic candidates have been visiting the Granite State since the conclusion of the 2004 presidential election in an effort to woo these influential voters in 2008.

"We think it only makes sense that the state with the first-in-the-nation primary also has the first-in-the-nation presidential debate," said Jeff Bartlett, WMUR general manager. "Many candidates and potential candidates have already made numerous trips to New Hampshire, and we felt that April would be a good time for the voters here to get their first impression about how the candidates stack up against one another."

Joseph W. McQuaid, president and publisher of the Union Leader, said, "The issues facing the next administration are as crucial as they have ever been for this country. It is not too early for the first primary state to present a forum to explore the views and the competence of serious candidates."

West Is Going In Democrats' Direction (WP)

By T.R. Reid

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

When the major political parties gathered for their national conventions in 2004, Colorado had a Republican governor, a Republican-controlled legislature and a Republican edge of 5 to 2 in the state's congressional delegation. Today, Colorado's governor is a Democrat. The Democrats control both houses of the legislature. Four of the seven congressional seats are held by Democrats.

That transformation, mirrored in varying degrees across the Rocky Mountain West, is a key reason the Democratic Party decided this week to hold its 2008 nomination convention in Denver, the financial, governmental and transit hub of the mountain states. As party leaders ponder how they can regain the White House in the next election, the region looks more and more essential to an electoral-vote victory.

"I have long believed that the essence of a Democratic victory goes through the West," Democratic National Chairman Howard Dean said Thursday, when he announced that Denver had edged out New York to be the convention city.

"If we are going to have a national party, we are going to have to have Westerners vote Democratic again on a reliable basis."

DOJ_NMG_0117191

In fact, the Mountain West has been reliably Republican in recent presidential elections. George W. Bush dominated the region in both of his campaigns; he won seven of eight mountain states (all but New Mexico) in 2000, and all eight in 2004.

Below the presidential level, however, the Bush years have been good years for Western Democrats.

In 2000, all eight mountain states had Republican governors; now five governors are Democrats.

Republicans still win most Senate and House races in the West. But Democrats have gained five new House seats in the region in the past six years. Democrat Ken Salazar won a previously Republican U.S. Senate seat in Colorado in 2004, and Democrat Jon Tester unseated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana in 2006.

Although the West is famous for offering "land, lots of land, 'neath the starry skies above," the population is heavily urbanized. Most people -- and, thus, most of the congressional seats -- are clustered in and around cities, such as Denver, Phoenix, Albuquerque, Salt Lake City and Boise. Those urban centers, their populations swelling with Hispanics, have become deep wells of Democratic votes.

This change has not been lost on national political planners. In the 2004 presidential campaign, Democrats devoted considerable sums and significant amounts of Sen. John F. Kerry's time to the West, focusing on Nevada, Colorado and New Mexico.

"There was nothing wrong with that strategy," said Denver-based Democratic consultant Terry Snyder. "The votes could be there, for the right candidate. But a liberal senator from Massachusetts turned out to be the wrong guy to make the sale in the West."

Some Democratic strategists, and such party-loyalist Internet sites as the Emerging Democratic Majority WebLog, have been urging party leaders to look west in 2008. In his book "Whistling Past Dixie," Thomas F. Schaller, a political scientist at the University of Maryland Baltimore County, argues that Democrats should effectively concede the "Solid South" to Republicans and focus on electoral votes in the Midwest and Mountain West.

Candidates are paying attention. Indeed, a win-the-West strategy is a key element in the thinking of a likely Democratic presidential contender in 2008, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

The Democrats' choice of Denver for the convention, to be held Aug. 25-28, 2008, in a downtown basketball and hockey arena, had become almost a foregone conclusion in recent months.

In the initial jostling to be host city, New Orleans seemed to be the front-runner, because a convention there would remind voters of the Bush administration's much-criticized response to Hurricane Katrina. When New Orleans officials dropped out of the competition last summer -- the city said it couldn't afford to host a convention in the midst of rebuilding -- New York and Denver became the finalists.

But New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) showed considerable reluctance about hosting the event. He told Democrats his city would not come up with the money required to put on the convention. By the time Dean announced his choice Thursday, Denver was the only candidate still standing.

The War Within Sen. McCain (WP)

By Dan Balz, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

There is no mistaking the anguish of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Sitting in his Senate office, he is uncharacteristically subdued, his voice at times almost inaudible.

Although the Bush administration this week finally embraced his long-standing call to send more troops to Iraq, McCain believes the way it has handled the war "will go down as one of the worst" mistakes in the history of the American military.

"One of the most frustrating things that's ever happened in my political life," he said, "is watching this train wreck."

McCain, an all but announced presidential candidate, offered those assessments toward the end of a lengthy interview Thursday night. No politician in the United States is more clearly identified with President Bush's new policy, and no politician has more to lose if it fails. Democratic opponents have already coined a name for the troop "surge": the McCain Doctrine.

McCain made it clear that he supports Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq as the only way to prevent that country from slipping further into chaos. "I cannot guarantee success, but I can guarantee failure if we don't adopt this new strategy," he said.

But he also voiced deep frustration over what the war has done, both to this country and to Iraq. "I think many things that have happened in the world that are unfavorable to the United States are the result of our weakness in the Iraqi conflict," he said.

Asked how the war may affect his candidacy, McCain shrugged off the question. "I can't think about it or worry about it," he said. "I have to do what I think is right."

On the night of Bush's speech, he told CNN's Larry King: "I would much rather lose an election than lose a war."

The risk now is that both could be lost.

DOJ_NMG_0117192

As a forceful advocate for a policy that appears to fly in the face of the message voters sent in November, the politician who has long played for the center of the electorate now finds himself isolated on the right.

"The war is going badly, and he is now the leading public advocate of more of the same or even much more of the same," said Ron Klain, a Democratic strategist and chief of staff to then-Vice President Al Gore. "That's an odd place to be."

At a time when many Republicans are voicing opposition to Bush's plan, McCain is not budging. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), one of McCain's closest friends in the Senate, explained the political stakes in the simplest terms. "If we're successful, he'll get the benefit," Graham said, referring to Iraq. "If we fail, he'll get the blame."

Two Democratic presidential candidates, former senator John Edwards of North Carolina and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, have cast McCain as the architect of the troop increase. MoveOn.org's political action committee plans television ads in Iowa and New Hampshire next week attacking McCain on the issue.

Would the Arizona senator describe the new policy as the embodiment of a McCain Doctrine for Iraq? "No, but I am willing to accept it as a McCain principle," he said Thursday night. "And that is, when I sign up, when I raise my hand and vote to go to war, that I want to see the completion of the mission."

McCain said the policy's defenders must work harder to change public opinion. "I admit that this is a challenge to us," he said. "But I can make the counterargument that withdrawal means defeat and chaos." Advocates for withdrawal, he said, must explain why that would not result in even greater chaos.

"What happens when Americans are no longer there?" he asked. "I think you could see some pretty horrific scenes on television sets in America."

It is a considerable irony, given their histories, that McCain's political future is now so closely tied to the president's ability to bring the Iraq war to a successful conclusion.

The two battled bitterly over the 2000 GOP presidential nomination. In 2004, they brokered a rapprochement that appeared politically beneficial to both: Bush gained the high-profile support of the Republican with the broadest appeal to independent voters, and McCain gained respect and admiration from conservative Republicans who had opposed his candidacy in 2000 and who are critical to his hopes for the nomination in 2008.

At the 2004 Republican National Convention, McCain offered lavish praise for Bush as a wartime president. Bush, he said, "has been tested and has risen to the most important challenge of our time. . . . He has not wavered. He has not flinched from the hard choices. He will not yield. And neither will we."

McCain said he has no regrets over the role he played in helping Bush win reelection, given his belief that the administration has so badly mismanaged the war. "Did I support the strategy? No, I didn't," he said. "But I certainly didn't see his opponent, who was advocating withdrawal, as advocating any kind of viable proposal," he added, referring to Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

His differences with the administration, he said, were well known as far back as 2004 -- his lack of confidence in then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his belief even then that the administration needed to send more troops to Iraq. "Every hearing, every opportunity that I had -- my staff has compiled it already a hundred times where I said, 'This is not going right. You've got to get more people on the ground here,' " he said.

McCain has long tried to balance his advocacy for the mission in Iraq with his criticism of the administration, always putting some distance between himself and the White House. He did the same in the days before Bush's prime-time speech Wednesday night. "There are two keys to any surge of U.S. troops," he said at a forum at the American Enterprise Institute. "To be of value, the surge must be substantial and it must be sustained."

Does the new policy meet those tests? McCain offers an equivocal answer. He said he has been assured by Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the president's choice to take over command in Iraq, that 20,000 additional troops should be enough, but that if they are not, Petraeus can ask Bush for more.

"He tells me, 'I think I can do it with this number,' " McCain said. "So I'm supposed to be a Monday-morning quarterback? I'm not going over there and command. I'm only sitting here trying to figure out the best way we can win this conflict."

His advisers dismiss suggestions that McCain has shrewdly left himself room to argue that Bush's plan for more troops was not substantial or sustained enough to ensure success. They, like the possible candidate, see the perils of his position -- but potential benefits as well.

"At the core of the issue is who he is, and that's what generates his popularity," said Rick Davis, one of McCain's top political advisers. "It's that he puts principle ahead of politics, that he tells it like he sees it regardless of the political ramifications."

McCain's character was shaped by the previous great conflict that divided America -- the Vietnam War -- and is being tested by the current conflict, which has done the same. A prisoner of war in Vietnam, McCain is now a hostage of a different sort -- his political future tied in part to the president, the Pentagon and an Iraqi government in which he has limited confidence.

McCain, who has helped broker many deals between Republicans and Democrats over the years, sees no opportunity to do so on Iraq. He opposed the only bipartisan plan on the table -- the report of the Iraq Study Group, which called for the withdrawal of most combat forces by early next year -- and finds himself at odds with most Democratic friends (one exception being Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, reelected as an independent) and longtime Republican allies such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

"We've either got to do what's necessary, in my considered view, that can lead to success in Iraq, or withdrawal, which in my view is going to lead to catastrophic consequences," he said. "I don't know where you find a middle ground there."

Tancredo For President? (COX)

By Eunice Moscoso

Cox Newspapers, January 13, 2007

The list of presidential wannabes could get a little longer soon. Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who has gained a national following — and the ire of some Latino groups — as a staunch opponent of illegal immigration, hinted Friday that he is ready to pursue the Oval Office.

When asked whether he plans to take action to start an official bid for the GOP nomination he said, “That is a distinct possibility.”

Tancredo wouldn’t be the only candidate with a “tough on border security” platform. Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, a major force behind constructing fences along the U.S.-Mexico border, formed an exploratory committee last year.

Allard Keeps '08 Plans Under Wraps (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 13, 2007

Washington - Sen. Wayne Allard has made up his mind about whether he will seek a third term in 2008, but he's keeping his decision secret a bit longer.

Only Allard and his wife know his plans, press secretary Steve Wymer said Friday, confirming a report posted Thursday on Congressional Quarterly's website, CQPolitics.com.

Allard has not said when he will announce his choice.

His decision has major implications for Colorado, the Senate and the Republican Party.

"It's a big deal for the Republican Party because they're facing another tough election cycle and they want all their incumbents running," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics. "And it's Colorado, which has been rapidly moving from the Republican column into the Democratic column."

Allard's seat has been called one of the nation's most competitive for 2008, regardless of whether he runs again. Jennifer Duffy, an analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, puts it in the three most closely contested Senate races nationwide.

Allard, 63, pledged in 1996 to serve just two Senate terms, but late last year he told The Denver Post that he believes voters now view term limits differently.

Potential Republican candidates for Allard's seat have been waiting for his decision before announcing their intentions.

Among them is former U.S. Rep. Scott McInnis, who said Friday that there is "no question I will run" if Allard opts not to.

McInnis said that if Allard bows out, he will file campaign finance paperwork and start pulling together supporters. He said he has nearly $1million in his war chest already, "and I'm confident we could raise the necessary funds."

But if Allard chooses to run again, McInnis said, "I'd be 100 percent fine with that."

Republicn U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo has also expressed some interest in the race if Allard decides not to run.

As for Democrats, U.S. Rep. Mark Udall has already announced his candidacy.

"Mark has always said that when you run for office you don't get to pick your opponent," Udall spokesman Lawrence Pacheco said Friday when asked about Allard's plans. "You don't run against somebody; you run for a vision."

Udall has raised $1.4 million in campaign funds.

Allard has just $148,000 in his war chest, but he is known to raise most of his campaign money closer to an election.

Fed Chairman May Face Heat At Hearings (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

When Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies on monetary policy next month, he is likely to get far more scrutiny than usual.

DOJ_NMG_0117194

By law, the Fed chairman must testify twice a year to Congress: in February and July. Ordinarily, each installment lasts two days, one before the Senate Banking Committee, the other before the House Financial Services Committee. There are no other witnesses.

In a break with that tradition, Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who took over the House panel this month, said he plans to hold an additional day of hearings in which witnesses, such as economists and labor experts, will give their views on what Mr. Bernanke said.

Mr. Frank's plans, which he described in an interview Friday with The Wall Street Journal, suggest Mr. Bernanke, who has held the job for just under a year and is to testify on monetary policy on Feb. 14 and 15, could face added political heat for unpopular steps such as raising interest rates. It also raises the importance of his cultivating lawmakers to pursue potentially contentious initiatives, such as a numerical inflation target.

Mr. Frank said that while he opposes an inflation target, the Fed has the authority to implement one without Congress's approval.

Mr. Frank said the Fed shouldn't allow a target to result in employment being subordinated to inflation, and he wouldn't allow the Federal Reserve Act to be amended to allow that to happen.

However, Mr. Bernanke has argued an inflation target doesn't require the act to be amended, and in fact enhances the Fed's ability to boost employment. The FOMC is now in the midst of a lengthy internal discussion over how it communicates, including whether it should adopt a target.

Mr. Frank appeared open to that argument. He also said he was "impressed" by Mr. Bernanke's performance as Fed chairman. While Wall Street often interprets rising wages as inflationary and bad, he noted Mr. Bernanke has said it isn't bad as long as the rise in wages is matched by productivity and doesn't result in businesses trying to raise prices.

Political opposition is one of the greatest stumbling blocks to Fed adoption of an inflation target, and assuaging Mr. Frank's concerns would go a long way toward removing that obstacle. Senate Banking Committee Chairman Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) said in a statement Friday that he is "open to examining ways to help further the Fed's efforts to achieve [its] dual mandate" of maximum employment and stable prices and "will view any proposals under the broader lens of their effect on keeping our economy strong and improving opportunity for all."

States' New Health-Care Prescription (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

Under the plan, California would require all individuals to purchase health insurance or face tax penalties. California has more uninsured residents than any other state, and the plan could prompt others to follow suit. Efforts to reduce the number of uninsured, now at 46.6 million in the U.S., come after more than a decade of federal inaction, since Congress killed President Bill Clinton's proposal for universal health coverage in 1994.

State budgets have borne the brunt of the swelling ranks of uninsured. That's because states pay 43% of all costs for Medicaid, the program that covers health care for the poor without insurance. Medicaid spending has doubled from 11.5% of state budgets in 1988 to 22.9% in the 2005 fiscal year. If the plan is enacted, California would follow Massachusetts in requiring health insurance for all. Maine and Vermont have enacted more modest plans.

Here's a closer look at different state plans:

California: The Golden State's intended plan is the most ambitious. Nearly 19% of Californians are uninsured, almost twice Massachusetts's rate of 10.7% and more than the national average of 15.7%, according to the Census Bureau.

Under the plan, employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer health insurance or pay at least 4% of their payroll into a government program. Doctors would contribute 2% and hospitals 4% of their gross earnings to the program. Insurers, who would see millions of new customers, would have to offer coverage to everyone regardless of health and could spend no more than 15% of patients' premiums on administrative costs.

The downsides: The state is bound to face challenges from the powerful lobbies -- doctors, hospitals, insurers and employers -- that would share the plan costs. Moreover, some fear that businesses that already spend more than 4% of their payroll on insurance might reduce coverage or drop their plans altogether and just pay the 4% fee. Labor groups worry about a middle-class squeeze: A family of four that makes $50,000 a year, for example, would not receive a subsidy but would be required to buy health insurance. Some members of the governor's own Republican Party oppose his proposal because it would extend Medicaid coverage to the children of illegal immigrants.

Massachusetts: The state will be the first to require all residents to purchase health insurance when a new law takes effect in July. Low-income individuals receive subsidies to buy their own insurance. Residents can purchase plans through a private insurance market created by the state that connects buyers and sellers.

The $1.3 billion plan includes only $125 million in new state money and $50 million from penalties on businesses that don't provide insurance. The rest comes from reallocating an existing $1 billion in government money.

The downsides: A vague exception says that if an "affordable" plan isn't available, residents don't have to buy health insurance. The state hasn't yet defined what constitutes an "affordable" plan.

Maine: The state-subsidized DirigoChoice insurance plan is optional and offered by private companies. Enrollment is limited to small businesses, the self-employed and the uninsured. Subsidies to low-income uninsured are funded by federal money; participating employers, who pay 60% of the health costs for their employees; and insurance firms, which pay an annual fee calculated as the amount saved in bad debt and charity care.

The downsides: The program covers only 13,000 so far, despite a target of 30,000 in its first year and all 130,000 uninsured by 2009.

Vermont: Private insurance companies will offer the state-subsidized Catamount Health plan this October. The state has raised tobacco taxes and charged employers $365 a year for each uninsured employee to cover these subsidies for low-income uninsured. Individuals are not required to buy insurance, and the plan is open only to the uninsured. The state hopes to cover 96% of its 60,000 uninsured by 2010.

FACTS

Hawaii has required employers to provide medical insurance for employees since 1974.

Young adults are the most likely group to be uninsured. Those between ages 18 and 34 account for 25% of the population but 41% of those without insurance.

It costs $91 to treat a patient for strep throat in a doctor's office, compared with $310 in a hospital emergency room, according to a Health Partners study.

Health-care costs now account for one-sixth of the economy, compared with one-tenth in the early 1980s.

The U.S. spent $2 trillion on health care, or $6,697 a person, in 2005.

Last year, 61% of businesses offered health benefits to at least some employees, down from 69% in 2000.

POINTS OF VIEW

"California's medical care, its medical knowledge, its medical technology is as strong as a bodybuilder. Yet our health-care system is a sick old man."

-- California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger

"Reform has to come from Washington, but it's possible that a handful of case-study states can show the way."

---- Drew E. Altman, Kaiser Family Foundation president, CEO

Schwarzenkennedy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger once extolled "the power of the market" in Milton Friedman's "Free to Choose" PBS series. So it's probably just as well that the late, great economist won't see the regulated mess that his admirer is proposing to make of California's health insurance market. As speaker of the state assembly Fabian Nunes remarked, "This is a plan assembly Democrats could have written."

In fact, they already have -- in 2003, when Democrat Gray Davis was Governor. Candidate Schwarzenegger campaigned against that measure, which was less onerous than his own new proposal mandating that business provide health insurance to all employees. Arnold even helped to gather signatures for a 2004 state referendum in which voters overturned that bill. But now he's taking on a new political acting challenge, this time playing Gray Davis as apparently channeled through his chief of staff Susan Kennedy (who used to work for Mr. Davis).

Or perhaps the GOP Governor is trying to replicate the media hosannas that former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney garnered last year with his "universal" coverage law. As with the Romney plan, Governor Schwarzenegger builds his proposal around an "individual mandate" that would require people to buy health insurance or face penalties such as garnishment of wages. This compulsion is supposedly justified on grounds that treating "free riders" in emergency rooms is a significant driver of overall health costs. But studies have shown that the cost of this problem is less than 3% of overall health-care spending.

Far worse are Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposals for California's employment and insurance markets. The Governor is proposing that businesses with 10 or more employees be required to provide insurance, or else pay 4% of their taxable Social Security wages into a fund to subsidize insurance for the working uninsured. The likely reaction of many California businesses to this new and costly mandate: outsourcing to Nevada, or India.

Mr. Schwarzenegger goes far beyond the Romney plan in proposing to help pay for his scheme by taxing hospitals 4% and doctors 2% of their gross revenues. That's right, institutions operating at or near a loss would have to pay the tax. So California doctors could soon be spending more time with their accountants than with patients -- assuming they can afford to keep their practices running at all.

Yes, we know, the Governor calls it a "fee" or "dividend," rather than a tax. This is no doubt because the California constitution requires that any new "tax" pass both houses of the legislature with two-thirds majorities. So call the elephant in the room a hippo and hope the public buys it. We trust this Hollywood action stunt will be tested in court, if not in another referendum.

Like all such political schemes, Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan also works at cross-purposes. It includes new subsidies to help the uninsured obtain coverage, but at the same time it would impose new coverage mandates that would make insurance a lot more expensive. Two rules in particular have all but ruined the market for individually owned coverage in every other state where they've been tried.

The first is called "guaranteed issue," which means insurers are required to write you a policy even if you wait until you're sick to ask for it. It is precisely this "guarantee" that many people use as an excuse to remain "uninsured." Why not buy a new car rather than health insurance when you're healthy if you know you can always buy insurance if you get cancer?

The second rule is "community rating," which means insurance premiums cannot vary based on age or health status. This is akin to telling auto insurers that they can't charge higher premiums to 18-year-old males with a history of speeding tickets than they do 45-year-old mothers. Both rules raise the cost of insurance for everyone.

This is all especially regrettable because California has had more market-friendly insurance regulations than most other large states. And this has meant lower insurance premiums. According to eHealthinsurance.com, a single 35-year-old man in Beverly Hills can buy decent coverage for as little as $69 a month. But Arnold's plan would move those rates in the direction of community-rated New York, where that same man would pay $416 for any coverage at all.

Like Mr. Romney before him, Mr. Schwarzenegger is playing on the political appeal of allegedly "universal" coverage. Mr. Romney hopes to ride it to the GOP Presidential nomination, and Arnold is basking in new media admiration. About the best we can say for their plans is that these state policy experiments will show other states what not to do. But they are also providing cover for the proponents of greater government control of health care. Right on cue, Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed "universal" coverage this week too. * * *

The better alternative, as Milton Friedman understood, is to expand tax-advantaged health savings accounts and to improve access and affordability by creating a national market for private health insurance. Consumers in California and Massachusetts, especially, are going to need that safety valve when the bill comes due for their Governors' attention-seeking but poorly considered plans.

A Taste Of Family Life In U.S., But Adoption Is In Limbo (NYT)

By Jane Gross

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

TERRYVILLE, Conn. — During the two weeks that Marino and Debbie Prozzo welcomed a Ukrainian orphan in their home, they fell head over heels for a 7-year-old child they may never be able to adopt.

While the Prozzos were giving Alona Malyovana her first bubble bath, teaching her to use the remote control, and buying her a pink velvet dress trimmed in bunny fur, the chaotic system of adoption in Ukraine was growing more chaotic.

The director of Ukraine's new Department for Adoptions resigned, leaving the fate of the nation's 90,000 orphans in limbo. A new application process required foreign families to quickly update security clearances and other time-sensitive information. Prospective parents anxiously scanned the State Department's Web site and bulletins from the embassy in Kiev for clarification of rules and rumors.

Hosting programs, like the one that brought Alona to an American family this Christmas, showcase older children, generally from orphanages in former Soviet bloc nations. The programs have long been hailed as an effective marketing tool by adoption experts, who say 8 of 10 families would not adopt these children without a trial run.

In the largely unregulated world of international adoptions, these programs often lead to happily-ever-after, but sometimes end painfully. Ukraine and Russia place formidable obstacles in the path of parents, among them inaccurate information about children's availability and health status. Multiple families can wind up competing for the same child. And children themselves know they are auditioning for what the industry calls their "forever families." Then there is an entrenched system of favors — requests for cash or gifts from facilitators, translators, judges and others who handle the mechanics of adoption overseas.

Conditions in both countries have grown so unsettled, some agencies have suspended hosting programs, and the debate is growing about the ratio of risk to reward. Do the many success stories for older orphans make up for the heartbreak when adoption is thwarted?

DOJ_NMG_0117197

The Prozzos had been deceived before by an intermediary who showed them a photograph of an adorable child they later learned was not available. So their guard was up before Alona's visit in December.

"We won't let this child call us 'mama' or 'papa' because we aren't," Mr. Prozzo said. But Alona's visit had barely begun when she jumped into his outstretched arms and called him "papa."

"Now what?" Mr. Prozzo said, melting. "Now what?"

The quandary for agencies in the United States these days is how to balance optimism and pessimism when the prospect of a successful adoption is anyone's guess. "In an ideal world we wouldn't be doing it this way," said Adam Pertman, executive director of the Evan B. Donaldson Adoption Institute, a research organization. "But we haven't come up with a better solution."

The fee for the two-week hosting visits, organized by adoption agencies and humanitarian organizations, is $2,500 per child, which includes travel, bilingual escorts and a sizable donation back to the orphanages (subsequent adoption costs average $25,000).

Often, the formal disclaimers and informal predictions by program directors seem at odds. Frontier Horizon, the humanitarian agency that last month brought over 50 orphans, Alona among them, states unambiguously in its printed materials that it is "a travel program not an adoption program."

But Vincent Rosini, president of the organization, says that his group has been host to 300 Ukrainian orphans since 2000 and that only five families have been unable to adopt the children they wanted. One hundred of Frontier Horizon's children have been successfully adopted, Mr. Rosini said.

"Is there a good chance?" Mr. Rosini asked. "Yes. Is it 100 percent? No."

Adoption experts on both sides of the hosting debate agree that the children know they are auditioning for adoption, and that the families quickly grow attached.

"The child has raised expectations, regardless of what they're told," said Judy Stigger, director of international adoption for the Cradle, an agency in Evanston, Ill. "And the parents become more emotionally invested than they appreciated because when you hold a specific child in your arms, your whole body feels it, responds and remembers. That child quickly becomes yours."

In countries like Ukraine, it is all but impossible to manage expectations. Adoption authorities insist that families cannot request children who spent time in their homes, but rather must come to Kiev, by invitation, look at pictures and go to orphanages to meet the children offered to them.

Both the Cradle and Maine Adoption Placement Services, an agency that suspended its Russian hosting program in 2004, are known for their excellent connections in former Soviet bloc nations and are sometimes hired as "fixers" by families who went through other agencies when the children visited only to find they could not adopt them.

At MAPS, Betsy Bewsey, the director of international adoption, said that "right now things are as volatile as I've ever seen them." She cited stringent regulations in China, announced last month, which will complicate adoption in the country, long considered the "fail-safe" because of an efficient bureaucracy and healthy infants. The volatility in these countries, and especially the suspension of several hosting programs from Ukraine and Russia, has contributed to a dip in overall international adoptions by Americans, according to Thomas DiFilipo, the president of the Joint Council on International Children's Services.

The high-water mark came in 2004, when 22,884 immigrant visas were issued to orphans in the process of formal adoption — more than triple the number in 1990. In 2006, visas fell to 20,679. In that two-year span, visas to children from Ukraine fell to 460, from 723. Russia's visas dropped to 3,706, from 5,865.

Families like the Prozzos can be easy marks for scoundrels. Agencies that do international adoptions need not be accredited, although that will change if the United States ratifies a treaty to regulate intercountry adoption, expected sometime this year. More than 300 agencies have applied. By all accounts, only one international adoption facilitator in America has been shut down, Yunona USA of Napa, Calif., in 2005. Yunona allegedly defrauded at least 100 would-be adoptive parents of more than $1.1 million by posting photos of Russian and Ukrainian children on its Web site, taking deposits from families and later saying the children were not available. The Prozzos chose a child from the Yunona Web site but had not yet paid a deposit when they learned she was unavailable.

Yunona's president, Ivan Jerdev, faces a $386,000 default civil judgment. He is believed to have fled to his native Russia after the police raided his office in December 2005, law enforcement officials said. The Yunona case, which did not involve hosting programs, led California to pass the nation's strictest law regulating adoption facilitators, which went into effect on Jan. 1.

In a complaint against Adopt-A-Miracle, in Evergreen, Colo., investigated by the Denver Better Business Bureau, Lourdes Blanco of Miami said she had selected a Ukrainian infant off the agency's Web site, learned the baby girl had already been adopted but was assured she would find a comparable child if she traveled to Kiev. Ms. Blanco made two trips, she said, only to be told there were no healthy children. The case was settled when the agency refunded $10,000 of more than $20,000 in fees and travel expenses.

In responding to the bureau, Adopt-A-Miracle's executive director, Charlotte Allen, described the process as "enormously challenging" because simple information about a child's status is often unavailable. "It may seem incredible," Ms. Allen wrote. "But this is the way it is."

Faya Fromm, 13, formerly of Siberia, knows well how expectations can be dashed in an orphanage. Twice, she was told "we're sending you to a family in America who might want to adopt you." The first time she was not chosen for the hosting trip. The second time she wound up with Linda Fromm, 56, of Ridgewood, N.J., who had three grown children from an early marriage.

When a summer hosting program ended, Ms. Fromm "skated around" what to tell Faya, saying she would "fly like the birds and swim like the fish to come visit you." It took her nine months to assemble her dossier and take a second mortgage on her home to pay for the 2003 adoption. During that time, Ms. Fromm could not call the orphanage. But she sent Faya notes and photos albums, with $5 bills tucked between the pages.

It was a long, uncertain wait for the girl, who described another disappointment: She was shown to an Italian family, then told they would be back for her the next day. Faya was kept out of school, dressed in her best clothes and waited in the director's office. The family never returned.

Siberia at that time encouraged families to adopt children after a home visit. Not so Ukraine today. At Faya's urging, Ms. Fromm invited Ira and Olga Chyrkova, 9-year-old twin girls, to spend the holiday as a trial run for adoption.

It was Faya who told the twins her mother's plans "She will try to bring you back next summer," Faya told them. "And she's going to try to adopt you."

Then midway through, Ms. Fromm was crushed to learn that Olga and Ira were not cleared for adoption yet. Their mother had been murdered, but her death certificate was missing and necessary to prove the girls' status as orphans.

Mr. Rosini did not directly reassure Ms. Fromm he could pull strings at the orphanage, but mentioned, in passing, that the director had recently asked for a new coat.

Such requests, Mr. Rosini said, are common. One orphanage director threatened to cancel a hosting trip unless he helped her raise money for a new health clinic. A Frontier Horizon family who donated $25,000 is now scheduled to adopt a child who visited four times. Families might be asked by an orphanage director for $400 for a new meat slicer, Mr. Rosini said, or a facilitator will tell them that two weeks' worth of paperwork could be expedited in two days if he had a fax machine. "We're used to it," Mr. Rosini said.

The children come off the plane with the clothes on their backs and a small knapsack. Some, veterans of hosting programs who had never been chosen, also arrive with their defenses up. Twelve-year-old Lesya Otya was slow to warm to Jeannie Fillatti, 49, of Avon, Conn., until it was nearly time to go.

But, in the car headed to the airport — with newly pierced ears, her first brassiere and a ski tag on her parka from a weekend in Vermont — the girl buried her head in Ms. Fillatti's lap, unconsolable.

A promise from Ms. Fillatti that Lesya could return for next summer's hosting program was unpersuasive. "They don't know what to think, how to hope, whether to hope," said Ms. Fillatti, who had tried before to bring back a child and been rebuffed.

When the time came to pass through the security doors, Lesya wailed her protest, in the English she had recently learned: "No! No! Not yet!"

This was Alona's first visit, and with no history of disappointment, her departure, with her Christmas bounty of designer jeans and cowboy boots, was composed. Mrs. Prozzo, without eye makeup because she was prepared for a tearful parting, sent her off with a kiss and a murmured "I love you." She and her husband had plenty to talk about when they got home.

The couple — he is a 53-year-old engineer and she is a 48-year-old librarian, re-examining in middle age their decision not to have children — knew from the start that Alona might not be available for adoption or that she might be snapped up by another family while they prepared their dossier.

They vowed that they understood the long odds. "But that was two weeks ago," Mr. Prozzo said after Alona returned to rural Zaporozhye. "Now it's a different story. I love this child."

And so he hatched a plan. The Prozzos would ready themselves to travel to Ukraine and consider the children offered. Only then, with great deference, would he beg officials to match them with Alona.

"When I'm sitting in front of the guy, man-to-man," Mr. Prozzo said, "I'll say, 'Sir, can you understand this?' "

Meanwhile, Mr. Prozzo said he had made a donation to a charity in Zaporozhye that was raising money for hospital equipment. Maybe the donation will improve his adoption chances. If not, Mr. Prozzo said, at least it will improve medical care for the orphans left behind.

Ford Once Called Carter A "Disaster" (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117199

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- In 25 years of interviews with his hometown paper that could be released only after his death, former president Gerald R. Ford expressed mixed opinions of Jimmy Carter, once calling him a "disaster," and said that Ronald Reagan received far too much credit for ending the Cold War.

"It makes me very irritated when Reagan's people pound their chests and say that, because we had this big military buildup, the Kremlin collapsed," Ford told the Grand Rapids Press.

Ford contended that his own negotiation of the Helsinki accords on human rights did more to win the Cold War than Reagan's military buildup.

The best president of his lifetime, Ford said, was a more moderate Republican: Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Harry S. Truman "would get very high marks" for his handling of foreign crises, Ford said. He also praised Richard Nixon as a foreign policy master, despite the Watergate scandal that drove him from office.

Ford considered John F. Kennedy overrated and Bill Clinton average. He admired George H.W. Bush's handling of the Persian Gulf War.

In 1981, five years after Carter defeated him, Ford said: "I think Jimmy Carter would be very close to Warren G. Harding. I feel very strongly that Jimmy Carter was a disaster, particularly domestically and economically. I have said more than once that he was certainly the poorest president in my lifetime."

But two years later, he praised Carter's performance on the Panama Canal Treaty, China and the Middle East. And in 1998, he said Carter "will be looked on as a better president than some comments we hear today."

"He was a very decent, fine individual," Ford told the newspaper. "There were no major mistakes. There just weren't a lot of exciting results."

Ford gave the interviews on the condition that his remarks be withheld until after his death.

According to the newspaper, Ford declined to rate President Bush, saying he did not know him well enough.

Ford said that Reagan, who challenged him unsuccessfully for the GOP nomination in 1976, was "a great spokesman for attractive political objectives," such as a balanced budget and defeating communism, "but when it came to implementation, his record never matched his words."

Reagan was "probably the least well informed on the details of running the government of any president I knew," Ford said. In a separate interview, he said Reagan "was just a poor manager, and you can't be president and do a good job unless you manage."

Under the 1975 Helsinki accords signed by Ford, the United States recognized borders in Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe in exchange for the Soviets' pledge to respect basic human rights.

Rice Seeks Arab Backing For Iraq Plan (AFP)

AFP, January 13, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice headed for the Middle East on Friday to rally Arab support for a new US strategy in the Iraq war and to counter Iran's alleged interference in Iraq.

The week-long tour also will seek to bolster efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with Rice scheduled to hold talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories on Saturday and Sunday.

Rice will then travel to Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain before returning to Washington on January 19.

The trip comes two days after President George W. Bush presented his last-ditch strategy to quell violence in Iraq with the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops.

Bush also declared a new initiative against Iranian and Syrian elements which the United States accuses of destabilizing Iraq, while stepping up the US military presence in the Gulf.

Signalling a tougher approach, US forces on Thursday detained six Iranians in a night-time swoop on an office in northern Iraq, prompting protests from Iran.

Before her departure, Rice told lawmakers in Congress her trip "will focus heavily on rallying the support of those responsible Arab states to support the government of Iraq, to support what needs to be done there, to support, of course, also Lebanon and the moderate Palestinians."

In an interview with the BBC's Arabic television released Friday, Rice said it was ultimately up to the Iraqi leadership to restore security.

Bush's plan "very much puts Iraqis at the center of responsibility for dealing with what is their most urgent problem," Rice said.

"Their most urgent problem is that the population has lost confidence that the government of Iraq can and will defend them in an even-handed fashion, whether they are Sunni or Shia," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0117200

Describing the Middle East as divided between moderate and extremist forces, Rice said on Thursday it was vital to counter Iranian influence in Iraq and the region.

"What we are ... looking at is the need to solidify the consensus, the interest of these states that all fear Iran's moves in the region, fear the regional aggression of Iran," Rice said.

"I think you will see that the United States is not going to simply stand idly by and let these activities continue," she said.

Although Iraq threatened to dominate the trip, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Rice viewed her diplomatic tour as a chance to advance tentative peace prospects in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"One of the things that's important to her is that we be able to have talks with Palestinian and Israeli oficials as well as regional officials about how we can move the process forward," Casey said.

"We believe that there are opportunities to move forward with that process," said Casey.

Rice appeared to face an uphill battle on promoting Bush's new war plan in the region nearly four years after the US-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Newspaper commentators across the Middle East cast doubt Friday on the strategy.

The Qatari newspaper Al-Raya said: "This strategy, which does not even convince Americans, is doomed to an unavoidable and appalling failure."

"Iraq does not need reinforcements. It needs to be saved from the situation created by the US presence, which has turned the lives of Iraqi people into a nightmare... The solution is not military, but political."

In Cairo, the Rose Al-Yussuf newspaper said that Bush's strategy would have only a "temporary" effect, and proved that Bush "understands nothing".

"Bush's vision is limited to the capital," it said, referring to Baghdad. "He does not realise that it is all Iraq that is in crisis".

The trip comes as Tehran continues to scorn international efforts to convince it to halt nuclear fuel enrichment work, which major powers believe is aimed at developing nuclear weapons.

Amid rising tension between the United States and Iran, Washington announced Thursday two aircraft carrier battle groups would stay in the Gulf for several months.

It was the first time Washington had moved two carriers to the region since 2003 when the United States invaded Iraq, a US military official said.

Rice's visit to Kuwait will include a meeting with foreign ministers from the Gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Qatar and Bahrain, as well as Egypt and Jordan.

Scepticism Awaits Rice On Tour (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

Facing a barrage of opposition at home over the new Iraq policy, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, takes the White House's case to the Middle East this weekend to try to drum up regional support.

But there too she is likely to find plenty of scepticism that deploying another 20,000 troops mostly in Baghdad can bring an end to the raging sectarian conflict.

President George W. Bush's decision to ignore calls for a withdrawal from Iraq and to take a hard line on Iran in his speech on Wednesday night will find backing in Israel as well as some of the pro-western Arab states that rely on US protection and are increasingly paranoid about Iranian influence.

But Arab officials on Friday questioned Mr Bush's emphasis on a military solution and lamented the only brief mention of peace between Israel and Palestinians – the issue Arab rulers consider the top priority.

"The focus for Iraq was mainly on troops, while we believe the focus should be directed on a political resolution," said one Arab diplomat.

Comments in the Arab media have been more scathing, with Saudi Arabia's English-language Arab News saying the new American initiative "speaks volumes about desperation yet is a sure path to damnation".

Ms Rice's tour includes stops in Israel and the occupied Palestinian territories, and a meeting in Kuwait with foreign ministers from the Gulf plus Egypt and Jordan – the camp the US sees as "moderate" in the struggle against Iran, Syria and militant groups backed by the two states.

The tour is designed to enlist support for the new Iraq policy by pressing Sunni governments to use their influence with Iraq's Sunni Arabs and help stabilise Iraq, and to step up their diplomatic backing for the elected government of Nouri al-Maliki.

Arab officials, including in Saudi Arabia, have been arguing against a short-term US withdrawal, fearing it would worsen Iraq's civil conflict and force them to intervene on the side of the Sunni Arab minority. They want Iraq's Shia-dominated government to crack down on Shia militias and agree to political concessions that would give the Sunni – marginalised since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein – a greater stake in the new state.

"We don't see the Iraqi government as having great determination or the tools for an inclusive political process," said one Arab official.

But the Bush administration is also looking to create an Israeli-Sunni Arab front against Shia Iran. On Wednesday Mr Bush coupled tough warnings to Tehran with a promise of increased intelligence co-operation with Arab allies and the deployment of Patriot missiles in the region.

While most pro-western states are desperate to check Iran's power and its ability to pursue a nuclear programme, senior officials say working more closely with the US on Iran requires first that Washington champions a new drive to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Arab enthusiasm for weakening Iran is also balanced against fears that US-Iranian tensions could drag the region into another military conflict. The stand-off between the US and Iran over Iraq and the nuclear programme is already hardening sectarian tensions across the Middle East.

Few observers believe the Bush administration has the political will to engage seriously in a new peace process, particularly at a time when Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, has been weakened by the war with Lebanon's Hizbollah, and the Palestinians are locked in a violent internal struggle.

Senior Arab officials, however, say quiet moves in recent months – including a reported meeting between senior Israeli and Saudi officials – give them some hope that Washington might be prompted to push for a revival of Palestinian-Israeli negotiations on the basis of a 2002 Arab peace initiative that the US ignored at the time and Israel rejected. ¦Jalal Talabani, Iraq's president, will travel to Syria tomorrow in an effort to normalise relations with a country that is accused of allowing its territory to be used as a supply conduit for Sunni Arab insurgents, writes Steve Negus.

The visit, in the wake of President George W. Bush's new Iraq strategy – which takes a hardline attitude towards Syria – fits what seems to be an emerging good cop/bad cop dynamic in the relationship between the three countries,

Security issues that are a priority for Iraq include "border control, the activities of a number of members of Saddam's regime, control over the flow of foreign fighters", said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign -minister.

Russia, China Veto Resolution On Burma (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 12 -- China and Russia on Friday jointly vetoed a U.S.-sponsored resolution criticizing Burma's human rights record, striking a blow to the Bush administration's year-long campaign to use the U.N. Security Council to spotlight the repressive rule of Burma's military junta.

Friday's vote was part of a broader diplomatic effort by Beijing and Moscow to prevent the United States and its Western allies from using the 15-nation council to censure some of the countries particularly known for rights abuses, including governments in Belarus, Sudan and Zimbabwe.

They were joined by one of the council's most influential Third World countries, South Africa. It also opposed the U.S. resolution on the grounds that the Security Council has no mandate to scold or sanction Burma, also known as Myanmar, for abuses on its own soil.

"We believe that the situation in this country does not pose any threat to international or regional peace; this opinion is shared by a large number of states, including most importantly those neighboring Myanmar," Russia's ambassador, Vitaly I. Churkin, told the council. "We find that attempts aimed at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside its purview are unacceptable."

The United States secured nine votes for the resolution in the 15-nation council. Congo, Qatar and Indonesia abstained, arguing that the U.N. Human Rights Council is the appropriate venue for addressing Burma's human rights record.

Despite the tepid support for the U.S. initiative, virtually all council members -- including China -- expressed concerns about Burma's behavior. Indonesia's envoy, Rezlan Ishar Jenie, urged Burma's government to heed international calls to restore "democracy and human rights" to the country.

Burma's ambassador, Kyaw Tint Swe, praised China, Russia and South Africa for opposing the resolution, which he said was based on "patently false information."

The Bush administration's acting U.N. ambassador, Alejandro Wolff, said the United States was "deeply disappointed" by the council's failure to confront Burma. But he said the United States decided to force a vote to assure the Burmese people that "we won't forget you."

DOJ_NMG_0117202

The vote initially faced resistance from some officials within the State Department and from European envoys, who feared it would damage U.S. and European relations with China while exposing the depth of Third World opposition to Security Council interference in Burma's affairs.

But President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice decided it was worth making the point on a matter of principle, according to U.S. officials.

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, challenged suggestions that the effort had backfired, highlighting a growing rift between the West and the developing world over human rights. "We don't consider this a defeat," Burns said. "We did the right thing. We stood up for universal human values."

Burma's generals have ruled the country since 1962, presiding over one of the world's most repressive governments. U.N. rights monitors have accused the government of conducting a brutal counterinsurgency campaign that has displaced more than 1 million people. The government has also held Nobel Peace Prize laureate Aung San Suu Kyi under house arrest for most of the period since her political party, the National League for Democracy, won a landslide election victory in 1990. The military refused to recognize the election results.

The defeated resolution called on Burma's rulers to release Suu Kyi and more than 1,100 of her political supporters, cease attacks on the country's ethnic minority, and begin a democratic transition. It also called on Burma to halt the widespread use of rape by the armed forces and to back efforts by the International Labor Organization to end forced labor in Burma.

China led opposition to the U.S. initiative, highlighting its emergence as an increasingly assertive diplomatic force at the United Nations. Last year, it played a central role in the selection of South Korean Ban Ki Moon as the United Nations' first Asian secretary general in more than 35 years.

This is only the fifth time that China's Communist government has cast its veto since it joined the United Nations in 1971, a tiny fraction of the 254 vetoes cast by the other four permanent members of the Security Council. The United States, for instance, has cast its veto 82 times and Russia (formerly the Soviet Union) has cast its veto 122 times. The last time China and Russia cast a double veto was in 1972.

"No country is perfect," Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya told the council. "Similar problems exist in other countries as well."

U.S. Rebuke To Myanmar Is Defeated By U.N. Vetoes (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 12 — China and Russia vetoed an American-drafted resolution on Friday calling for the military rulers of Myanmar to release all political prisoners, cease attacks on ethnic minorities and speed a transition to democracy.

The vote was 9 to 3 with South Africa joining China and Russia in opposition, and three other countries, Congo Republic, Indonesia and Qatar, abstaining.

The Security Council's five permanent members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — hold veto power over most resolutions.

China and Russia argued that they shared concerns about conditions in Myanmar but considered them internal matters that did not constitute threats to international peace and security, the category of crisis subject to Security Council action.

"Not a single one of the neighboring countries regards the situation in Myanmar as a threat to them, and on the basis of that, there were no grounds for the Security Council to consider the matter," said Vitaly I. Churkin, Russia's ambassador.

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said, "Of course there are problems in Myanmar, but we believe that these problems do not constitute a threat to international peace and security."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador, said he was "deeply disappointed" at the outcome but noted even countries voting against the measure made clear in explanatory statements that they were not defending Myanmar's government. "This was a jurisdictional issue behind the split vote here," he said. "There was no disagreement about the content and substance behind this resolution."

Mr. Wolff was asked why the United States risked dividing the Council and muddling its message to the repressive rulers of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

"The only mixed message here is whether this issue deserved to be on the Security Council agenda," he said. "There is no mixed message, no mixed signal at all, about how the international community, how this Council feels about the situation in Burma."

The resolution mentioned by name the most prominent political prisoner, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, the Nobel Peace Prize-winning opposition leader, who is under house arrest.

It also accused Myanmar's armed forces of attacking and raping civilians from the country's ethnic minorities and causing a refugee crisis in the region, enabling narcotics traffic and permitting international transmission of communicable diseases like H.I.V./AIDS and avian flu.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, said he had no doubt that the abuses by Myanmar posed a threat beyond its borders. "When a million people flee the country because of the abusive practices of the government, that's a threat to international peace and security," he said in a telephone interview from Washington.

"When you have a political movement jailed," he said, "led by a woman who is one of the greatest people in the world, that's a threat to international peace and security."

He dismissed suggestions that the proper United Nations forum for Myanmar was the Geneva-based Human Rights Council, not the Security Council. "We forced this onto the agenda for one reason," he said. "The Security Council is the only place that can deal with human rights. The Human Rights Council is a discredited institution. All it has done is to bash Israel; it has ignored North Korea, it has ignored Sudan and it has ignored Burma."

After the vote, Kyaw Tint Swe, Myanmar's ambassador, thanked China and Russia for blocking the move and said the charges against his country in the resolution were "patently false."

The double veto was the first multiple veto in the Security Council since 1989, when Britain, France and the United States blocked a resolution on Panama.

China, Russia Veto Myanmar Resolution (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

China and Russia cast a rare double veto Friday of a U.S. resolution calling on Myanmar's military government to release all political prisoners, speed up progress toward democracy, and stop attacks against ethnic minorities.

The vote in the Security Council was 9-3 with three abstentions. South Africa, a new non-permanent member of the council without veto power, joined China and Russia in opposing the resolution.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya and Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin both said the Security Council was not the proper place to discuss Myanmar because the country does not pose a threat to international peace and security.

"We find that attempts aimed at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside its view are unacceptable," Churkin said, noting that problems in Myanmar were being addressed by other U.N. bodies.

While Wang said the council was the wrong place to deal with Myanmar, he urged the country, also known as Burma, to move toward "inclusive democracy" and "speed up the process of dialogue and reform."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff called for the vote knowing in advance the resolution would be vetoed.

"The United States is deeply disappointed by the failure of the council to adopt this resolution," Wolff said. "This resolution would have been a strong and urgently needed statement by the Security Council about the need for change in Burma."

But he added that the people of Myanmar "should not be disheartened" because the vote reflected differences over the Security Council's jurisdiction, not about their plight.

All 15 council members "recognize that there are problems in the areas of human rights, social issues, political freedom," he said.

The country's "military regime arbitrarily arrests, tortures, rapes and executes its own people, wages war on minorities within its own borders, and builds itself new cities while looking the other way as refugee flows increase, narcotics and human trafficking grow, and communicable diseases remain untreated," he said.

The United States softened the resolution late Thursday in an attempt to win greater support for it.

The revised text dropped a statement that would have expressed the Security Council's "gravest concern that the overall situation in Myanmar has deteriorated and poses serious risks to peace and security in the region."

Instead, the new draft underlined "the need for tangible progress in the overall situation in Myanmar in order to minimize the risks to peace and security in the region."

Former Secretary-General Kofi Annan sent Undersecretary-General for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari to Myanmar twice last year to meet with government leaders. He was allowed to meet pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi, who is under house arrest.

Gambari appealed to the government to release all political prisoners, allow all political parties, stop hostilities against ethnic minorities and allow unhindered humanitarian access.

Myanmar's junta took power in 1988 after crushing the democracy movement led by Suu Kyi. In 1990, it refused to hand over power when Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy won a landslide election victory. Since then, Suu Kyi has been in and out of detention, kept in near-solitary confinement at her home.

DOJ_NMG_0117204

Myanmar's U.N. Ambassador Kyaw Tint Swe thanked China and Russia and the countries that abstained, stressing that his country posed no threat. Had the resolution been adopted "it would have created a dangerous precedent," he said.

Wolff said Gambari had wanted the resolution to support the secretary-general's "good offices" mission and expressed regret that the council didn't give him its backing. Wang and Churkin said their governments supported the mission despite their vetoes.

A National Convention in Myanmar has been drafting guidelines for a new constitution, the first of seven steps outlined in a "roadmap to democracy" which the junta says will culminate in free elections. But the convention suspended work in late December, and no timetable has been announced for completion of the process.

The defeated draft expressed "deep concern at the slow pace of tangible progress in the process towards national reconciliation." It called on the government "to begin without delay a substantive political dialogue, which would lead to a genuine democratic transition."

The final draft also called on the government "to cease military attacks against civilians in ethnic minority regions," including widespread sexual violence.

Double Veto For Burma Resolution (BBC)

BBC.com, January 12, 2007

China and Russia have cast a double veto in the UN Security Council, to stop a US draft resolution calling for an end to human rights abuses in Burma.

The two countries' ambassadors said the resolution was outside the remit of the Security Council as Burma posed no threat to international security.

US envoy Alejandro Wolff said he was "deeply disappointed" by Russia and China's first joint veto since 1972.

South Africa, a new non-permanent member, also opposed the document.

Qatar, Indonesia and the Republic of Congo abstained while the nine other members voted for.

Detainees released

The draft resolution urged Burma's military rulers to end persecution of minorities and opposition groups.

It called for the release of all political prisoners, including opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi, who is currently under house arrest, and for all political groups to operate freely.

"The United States is deeply disappointed by the failure of the council to adopt this resolution," acting US ambassador Alejandro Wolff said.

Bu Russia's representative, Vitaly Churkin, said he opposed "attempts at using the Security Council to discuss issues outside the purview".

Burma released 40 political detainees last week to coincide with the 59th anniversary of independence.

Another five activists were freed on Thursday, in what pressure groups say could have been a move designed to scupper the UN resolution.

The UN estimates that there are about 1,100 political prisoners in Burma.

U.S. Official Sees Opening For Revival Of Trade Talks (NYT)

By John Zarocostas

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

GENEVA, Jan. 12 — The United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said Friday that she was optimistic the collapsed Doha trade negotiations could be restarted, but added that there were still obstacles to a revival of the talks.

“I am more optimistic than I have been in many months that we are on a path that could help reach a successful conclusion of the Doha round,” Ms. Schwab said after a three-hour meeting with the head of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy.

But she added that “ultimately it will be substance that dictates when there’s a breakthrough.”

The next few weeks are considered critical to whether the new political impetus could be maintained.

Mr. Lamy, who will meet with Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain in London on Tuesday as part of his step-by-step diplomacy, is also expected to visit India. In the next few weeks, he is scheduled to visit a group of African countries and make stops in Brussels and Washington. The meetings of about 25 trade ministers in late January during the World Economic Forum meeting in Davos, Switzerland, are also considered crucial.

Ms. Schwab distanced herself on Friday from the upbeat assessment of Peter Mandelson, the European trade commissioner, who said the talks were approaching “the endgame.” She reiterated that an agreement on important issues, like agricultural market access, would dictate whether a deal could be hammered out.

DOJ_NMG_0117205

In recent weeks, diplomatic activity and support for a deal at high levels in capitals around the world have lifted hopes that the talks could be revived. The talks, which were started in Doha, Qatar, in November 2001, collapsed in late July because of major differences over agricultural subsidies and tariffs primarily among countries like the United States, the European Union, Japan, India, Australia and Brazil.

President Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, meeting Monday in Washington, instructed their negotiators to push ahead with the talks.

Many developing countries are apprehensive, about the latest push by the United States and Europe.

Blair Urges Britain To Pursue An Aggressive Foreign Policy (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 12 — As he seeks to define his legacy and stamp his imprint on the future, Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday urged his successors to maintain the warlike foreign policy that he promoted, sending troops into battle in Africa and the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq.

To retreat in the face of global terrorism, he said, would be "a catastrophe."

Mr. Blair, who has said he will leave office this year, made his appeal in the sixth of a series of lectures on social, political and defense issues, offering a valedictory résumé of his almost 10 years in power.

He spoke one day after Britain said it would not follow the United States in committing more troops to Iraq, prompting speculation among analysts that the trans-Atlantic allies had begun to follow markedly divergent strategies, after years of close partnership.

Mr. Blair chose to give his speech to an audience of military specialists aboard the Albion, a transport vessel moored near Plymouth. The choreography recalled President Bush's "mission accomplished" address aboard the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln in May 2003. While Mr. Blair avoided any triumphalism, he advocated a muscular commitment by Britain to overseas military deployment alongside what he called softer options.

"There are two types of nations similar to ours today," he said. "Those who do war fighting and peacekeeping and those who have, effectively, except in the most exceptional circumstances, retreated to peacekeeping alone. Britain does both. We should stay that way," he said.

Some left-wing critics dismissed the prime minister's attempt to justify his use of military action as a tool of foreign policy. "He has made the world much more dangerous, much more divided," said Clare Short, a former minister who quit the government as the Iraq campaign unfolded.

John Kampfner, an author and the editor of The New Statesman, said in a radio interview: "I say with regret that this calamity that has been Iraq has diminished not just Britain and its role in the world, but has set back this cause that Tony Blair espouses" of "humanitarian intervention to do things around the world which are for the broader good."

Mr. Blair's remarks, Mr. Kampfner said, also offered a challenge to his probable successor, Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer, "to say: what would you do in my position?" Like Mr. Bush, Mr. Blair is suffering from declining popularity because of the wars, particularly in Iraq, and it is not at all certain that his successors — even in his own party — will adhere to his policies.

To some extent, Mr. Blair's speech reprised an address he gave in Chicago in 1999 that set out a doctrine to justify intervention beyond Britain's borders. He made a similar argument on Friday.

"The frontiers of our security no longer stop at the Channel," he said. "What happens in the Middle East affects us. What happens in Pakistan, or Indonesia, or in the attenuated struggles for territory and supremacy in Africa for example, in Sudan or Somalia — the new frontiers for our security are global."

"Our armed forces will be deployed in the lands of other nations far from home, with no immediate threat to our territory, in environments and in ways unfamiliar to them," he said. "They will usually fight alongside other nations, in alliance with them; notably, but probably not exclusively, with the U.S.A."

The speech offered a response to ever-more-vociferous complaints by serving and former high-ranking officers that the British Army, in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan and deployments elsewhere, is overstretched, badly equipped and poorly housed in its home barracks in this country.

"My choice," Mr. Blair said, "is for armed forces that are prepared to engage in this difficult, tough, challenging campaign, to be war fighters as well as peacekeepers; for a British foreign policy keeps our American alliance strong and is prepared to project hard as well as soft power; and for us as a nation to be as willing to fight terrorism and pay the cost of that fight wherever it may be."

But, he said: “The covenant between armed forces, government and people has to be renewed. For our part, in government, it will mean increased expenditure on equipment, personnel and the conditions of our armed forces, not in the short run but for the long term.”

As he has done in the past, Mr. Blair said he believed that the campaign against jihadist terrorism would be long. “It has taken a generation for the enemy to grow,” he said. “It will, in all probability, take a generation to defeat.”

Blair Says Britain Cannot Isolate Itself (AP)

By Jennifer Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday that Britain's influence on the world stage and ability to right global wrongs depends on active engagement, and the country cannot defend itself from terrorism by retreating into isolationism.

He told Royal Navy personnel aboard a warship that Britain must be willing to commit to military action when necessary to pursue laudable goals.

Diplomacy alone cannot solve the world's problems, Blair said in a policy lecture to British servicemen and women aboard HMS Albion, in Plymouth harbor, southwestern England. It needs the military to complement it.

"The risk ... is that the politicians decide it's all too difficult and default to an unstated, passive disengagement, that doing the right thing slips almost unconsciously into doing the easy thing," Blair said. "Many countries are already in this position, but the consequences for Britain are hugely significant."

The lecture was the sixth in a series of policy speeches he has made since the middle of last year.

The prime minister said terrorism cannot be defeated without military force, despite flagging public opinion. The war in Iraq has been deeply unpopular from the beginning, causing major political trouble for Blair and helping fuel a rebellion in his Labour Party.

He said the public must see operations in places like Iraq and Afghanistan as a "necessary engagement" to protect security and advance British interests globally.

Blair is to leave office later this year, but he has not said when. The speech appeared to lay out his beliefs on what British foreign policy should be once he leaves Downing Street.

He encouraged a continuation of Britain's alliance with the United States, and urged Britain to extend its influence in the world.

"My choice is ... for us as a nation to be as willing to fight terrorism and pay the cost of that fight wherever it may be, as we are to be proud champions of the causes of peace in the Middle East, action against poverty, or the struggle to halt the degradation of our environment," he said.

The End Of The Blair Era (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

ALTHOUGH HE IS yoked to President Bush in their common Iraq policy and lame-duck status, British Prime Minister Tony Blair has more in common with former President Clinton. The litany of likenesses includes a belief in a "third way" between old-style liberalism and the free market, a fluency in public that critics dismiss as glibness, a wife who was a successful lawyer, a willingness to accept the hospitality of show-business celebrities and, finally, a reputation for running an ethically challenged administration.

It's this last, and lowest, common denominator with Clinton that has lately bedeviled Blair. Last month, he was questioned by police about allegations that his Labor Party nominated supporters for seats in the House of Lords and other plum positions in exchange for campaign loans. The Scotsman newspaper put it this way: "As Tony Blair approached his tenth anniversary in office, his ambition was to secure a place in history. And he's certainly done that by being the first serving prime minister to be interviewed in a criminal investigation whilst in office."

Americans cannot expect to be rewarded for their public or political service with ermine-lined capes or the right to call yourself "Sir." In fact, the Constitution says that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States." So Clinton couldn't dispense knighthoods to friends and political allies, but he gave some of them something better: their freedom. As the clock was ticking on his presidency in 2001, Clinton announced several ill-advised pardons, including one of fugitive financier Marc Rich, whose ex-wife gave an estimated $450,000 to the Clinton Presidential Library Fund.

Blair's current troubles, like Clinton's in 2001, may be intensified by his past indiscretions. The "honors" scandal isn't exactly the first time Blair's government has been accused of wallowing in sleaze. As early as 1997, the government came under fire for providing an exemption from a ban on tobacco advertising for a race-car organization that had donated $1.7 million to the Labor Party. In the years since, leading figures in the Blair Cabinet have found themselves in financial or sexual scrapes. Just last month, Blair, citing national security, ordered his attorney general to drop an investigation into whether a British defense firm had paid bribes to Saudi officials in the 1980s.

Political psychologists can argue about why two farsighted politicians allowed their substantial legacies to be sullied by sleaze. Maybe the answer is as simple as power inevitably corrupting. Whatever the explanation, like his friend Bill, Tony may leave office with people talking not about his vision but about his blind spots.

Russians To Take Poisoning Inquiry To London (WP)

By Peter Finn, Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 12 -- Russian officials who have launched their own investigation into the death of former Russian domestic security officer Alexander Litvinenko want to interview more than 100 people in London and conduct dozens of searches across the city, a senior Russian prosecutor said in a newspaper interview.

Prosecutors declined to name any of the people they wish to question. "I cannot fully satisfy your healthy curiosity due to the interests of the inquiry," said Deputy Prosecutor General Alexander Zvyagintsev, in an interview with the official newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta that appeared Friday. "Moreover, our request is a voluminous document, which consists of 110 pages. It is hard to retell it."

Litvinenko, who became a British citizen, died Nov. 23 after being poisoned in London with polonium-210, a radioactive substance.

The Russian plan far exceeds the scope of British inquiries in Moscow, which amounted to a few interviews with Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the suspected date of the poisoning. Those interviews were conducted by Russian investigators. Detectives from Scotland Yard were allowed to attend but could not question the witnesses.

The prospective inquiry is likely to unsettle some Russians who live in London and are fiercely opposed to the rule of President Vladimir Putin. Litvinenko's friends in the city included Boris Berezovsky, the exiled tycoon, and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist, both of whom the Russians would like to extradite. Previous efforts to have them returned to Moscow failed.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's who has acted as a family spokesman, described any Russian inquiry in London as a "stunt." Goldfarb said Russian officials "obstructed justice when the British went to Moscow" and now they are trying to "create an impression of reciprocity" by traveling to London and carrying out their own investigation.

Berezovsky's office said he had not received any request to talk to Russian officials. Previously, Berezovsky and Litvinenko's wife, Marina, said they would meet with Russian officials only if they were first checked to ensure they were not carrying polonium-210.

A spokeswoman for the Home Office said British authorities had not received an official request to investigate in London. "We would consider any request for assistance in consultation with the police," said the spokeswoman, who following British government policy spoke on condition of anonymity.

Among those interviewed in Moscow by Russian detectives with the British police present were Andrei Lugovoy and Dmitry Kovtun, two Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1.

Lugovoy and Kovtun have denied any involvement in the poisoning. Both men were hospitalized in Moscow for radiation exposure, but Lugovoy checked out last week. Kovtun's whereabouts and condition remain unknown.

Russian officials have said that Kovtun was a victim, and they are also investigating his exposure. "We have a lot of questions about this case," Zvyagintsev said. "We are asking to question more than 100 witnesses and carry out dozens of searches."

Zvyagintsev added: "We hope that our U.K. colleagues will respond to our request as promptly as we did recently."

Spy Case Comes To U.S. As Agency Urges Testing (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

Health officials in the United States have begun to tell some people who traveled to London last year that they may want to be tested for exposure to the radioactive poison that killed a former Russian spy.

Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said yesterday that the notification process began this week after health authorities in London gave them a list of people who may have been exposed to polonium 210, a radioactive substance that killed Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former spy. He died on Nov. 23.

As the criminal investigation into his death has progressed, British health authorities have slowly widened the circles of people known to have been exposed and those suspected of having been exposed to the substance. On Thursday, in a news conference, the British authorities said they were working with officials from 48 countries to evaluate the health of about 450 people who were in London around Nov. 1, when the authorities suspect Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned.

In Atlanta, C.D.C. officials said that they were notifying particular states and that state health authorities were in turn notifying people who might have been exposed to or poisoned by polonium 210. The officials refused to disclose the number of states or people involved.

Bernadette Burden, a spokeswoman for the centers, said that agency officials had decided to keep the figures confidential "to keep down hysteria," but that they might eventually release the overall numbers.

"We're going through a very careful process to make the notifications," Ms. Burden said. "People are being made aware that the possibility of exposure is significant."

Urine testing is the standard way of detecting polonium 210 in the body. Ms. Burden said that the people were being advised to talk to their doctors and that the physicians could in turn have the analysis done by two companies, Eberline Services in Richmond, Calif., and General Engineering Laboratories in Charleston, S.C.

Ex-bank Chief Heads Bangladesh Government (FT)

By Jo Johnson And Tom Felix Joehnk

Financial Times, January 13, 2007

A fresh attempt to break the deadlock between Bangladesh's two feuding political families had a shaky start on Friday night as a new head of a caretaker government took office under the cover of an army-backed state of emergency.

Fakhruddin Ahmed, a former governor of the Bangladeshi central bank, replaced President Iajuddin Ahmed as head of the caretaker government, whose principal function had been to oversee free and fair elections later this month. But there is now no indication of when they may take place.

Accused of bias by the main opposition Awami League, which had threatened to boycott the poll, the president resigned the post on Thursday, declaring a state of emergency and postponing the fraught January 22 parliamentary election.

Analysts on Friday night likened the situation in the fourth most populous Muslim nation to a "hidden coup", saying they expected that a team of technocrats would govern Bangladesh for a lengthy period before it would hold fresh polls.

Under Bangladesh's constitution, many fundamental rights are suspended in a state of emergency. Political activities on the streets have been curtailed and media restrictions put in place.

The army, seen as one of the few functioning political institutions in the country, was in little evidence on the streets yesterday, leaving analysts to speculate as to its exact role in this latest twist in the nation's political drama.

The Awami League, which had objected to what it said was a fraudulent voters' register and bias in the caretaker government, called the president's move to resign a late, but "necessary" step towards credible elections.

But it is uncertain whether the president's capitulation will lower tensions in this coup-prone nation as the Bangladeshi National party of outgoing prime minister Khaleda Zia had vigorously fought the suspension of elections.

The BNP-led four-party governing alliance on Friday boycotted Mr Ahmed's swearing-in ceremony, an event that foreign diplomats from all major countries made a point of attending.

The US State Department called on all parties "to refrain from violence and provocation and to work together to find solutions that would return democratic stability and represent the best interests of the Bangladeshi people."

As calm returned to the capital, Dhaka metropolitan police on Friday night said that the government had lifted a night-time curfew imposed a day earlier in more than 60 cities and towns in one of the most densely populated countries in the world.

In a country that suffers from endemic corruption, changes of power are associated with legal purges.

Local media reported that airports had been given a list of people who were to be prevented from leaving the country.

The army made several arrests of activists and politicians from both parties.

Hossain Zillur Rahman, a Dhaka-based political commentator, predicted that from now on "action would go against the BNP".

In a signifiant move, the house and offices of Ghiasuddin al-Mamun, a business partner of Tarique Rahman, Mrs Zia's son, were raided, but it was not clear whether he had been arrested.

In the popular mind, the young clique of leaders surrounding Mrs Zia's son is seen as having been the real power in the land in recent years, and one reason why Bangladesh scores so badly in global corruption rankings.

The appointment of Mr Ahmed put a temporary end to renewed speculation that Muhammad Yunus, recent winner of the Nobel Peace Prize and a potential unifying force in the sharply polarised, would take on the position.

Earning A Bad Reputation (NYT)

Bangladesh is lurching in a dangerous direction. After weeks of violent protests that left at least 40 people dead, the government has declared martial law. Only strong pressure from the United States and international help will keep this huge country from slipping further off a democratic path.

For weeks, a broad coalition of parties has protested what it charges is a clear attempt by the government to rig parliamentary elections, originally scheduled for later this month. It claimed that the voter rolls were padded; the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, an American monitoring group working in Bangladesh, surveyed the voter lists and found 13 million fake names. The coalition also charged that President Iajuddin Ahmed, who had the job of overseeing the elections, was biased in favor of a rival party.

The United Nations agreed that the run-up to the elections had been so flawed that the results could not be "considered credible or legitimate." International election monitors pulled out of Bangladesh, saying the existing conditions did not allow for a meaningful vote.

On Thursday, Mr. Ahmed yielded to international pressure, resigning as the election caretaker and postponing the vote. Mr. Ahmed, who will stay on as president, a largely ceremonial position, said a clean voter roll was needed for "free, fair and credible" elections.

Unfortunately, at the same time he declared a state of emergency, which revokes many basic rights and allows the army to enforce order. This is a particularly disturbing development in a country that has been subjected to long periods of military rule since gaining its independence in 1971.

The United States should use its substantial political influence to urge the government to restore suspended rights immediately. The United Nations should quickly send an envoy to mediate among Bangladesh's parties to ensure that this time the elections move forward in a clean and transparent manner. Both the U.N. and the Bush administration should encourage the protest's leaders to avoid further violence, assuring them that their demands are being heard. And they should redeploy their monitors once a new election date is set.

Bangladesh is one of the poorest and most politically polarized countries in the world. The international community needs to help it build a stable democracy — the best underpinning for development — starting with swift, internationally guaranteed elections.

China Given Credit For Darfur Role (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 13, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 12 -- The U.S. special envoy to Sudan said Friday that China has pushed the Sudanese government recently to help resolve the bloody Darfur conflict and ease the plight of the region's nearly 3 million refugees.

The Chinese intervention marked a shift from past policy under which Beijing seemed reluctant to use its influence in Sudan, according to the envoy, Andrew S. Natsios. "I think they're engaging much more aggressively," Natsios said at a news briefing after four days of talks here with Chinese officials.

President Hu Jintao announced during a Chinese-African summit conference last November that he had urged the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, to work with U.N. and other envoys to end the fighting, Natsios recalled. In addition, he said, China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, was critical to securing Sudan's participation in a recent international accord aimed at replacing a flagging African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur with a larger U.N. contingent.

The Bush administration has long urged China to put more pressure on the Sudanese government, citing large-scale Chinese oil purchases, investment and weapons sales as tools that could be used to persuade Bashir to cooperate more fully with U.N. attempts to broker a peace accord.

China, however, has viewed Sudan mainly as an important source of petroleum, a key element in Chinese foreign policy as the booming economy here creates a growing thirst for energy imports. In contrast, the United States in recent years has regarded Sudan mainly in the context of its Islamic-oriented government and the humanitarian tragedy caused by the fighting in western Sudan's Darfur region.

As many as 450,000 people have been killed or have died from disease in Darfur since largely black African rebel groups rose up in 2003 against the Arab-run government. Human rights groups and the United Nations say the government responded by unleashing a militia, called the Janjaweed, which has been accused of atrocities. Natsios said 2.8 million people fleeing raids by government troops and militiamen have been driven into refugee camps supported by U.N. and other nongovernmental aid agencies.

Bashir announced Wednesday that he would abide by a 60-day cease-fire and expand access for international aid workers. His government followed up Thursday by saying it would also be willing to enter a new round of peace talks with the rebels.

Bashir's agreement to the cease-fire came after talks with Gov. Bill Richardson (D) of New Mexico, who traveled to Khartoum on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition, a Washington-based humanitarian group. Richardson said several of the eight rebel movements had also agreed to hold their fire. Thursday's embrace of peace talks followed Bashir's meeting with Jan Eliasson, the new U.N. special envoy to Darfur, who was seeking cooperation with the U.N. plan to send more peacekeepers.

Bashir's government had opposed plans to replace the 7,000 African Union troops with a U.N. force that Natsios said could include as many as 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers. But Bashir recently agreed to allow in as many as 2,500, Natsios added.

US Envoy Says Talks With China On Sudan A Success (AFP)

AFP, January 13, 2007

The US special envoy on Sudan said he had held surprisingly positive talks in Beijing this week and that he expected China to play a greater role in helping to end the conflict in Darfur.

Wrapping up a four-day visit, envoy Andrew Natsios said Chinese engagement was critical in getting Sudan's military government to agree last month to an expanded UN presence in Darfur and he expected China's role to grow.

"Our policy and the Chinese policy are closer than I realized they were and I think the Chinese are going to play an increasingly important role in helping us to resolve this," Natsios told a press briefing before departing Beijing.

Natsios, who was appointed by President George W. Bush in September, came to Beijing to seek further cooperation on the issue from China, which has close commercial ties with Sudan's government.

The government-backed Janjaweed militia is blamed for killing thousands of civilians in the southern Darfur region, where Khartoum is battling rebels.

The conflict has left around 200,000 dead and displaced two million others in nearly four years, according to UN figures disputed by the Sudanese authorities.

Natsios declined to offer further details of his talks in Beijing, which he said included a meeting with State Councillor Tang Jiaxuan -- one of China's top diplomats -- and officials with the foreign ministry.

But he said the United States and China agreed in principle to cooperate on securing a negotiated peace to the conflict.

"I think the visit was a very successful one because we found many more areas of common agreement, both about our objectives and our strategies for achieving those objectives," he said.

"We agreed to continue to cooperate on this issue."

China's ties with Sudan have been criticized in the west as motivated by the need for Sudan's oil. Groups such as the US-based Council on Foreign Relations accuse Beijing of selling arms to the Sudanese government.

Natsios was asked whether he had requested China to alter its Sudan policies.

"We made a whole series of requests but I'm not going to tell you what they all were," he said.

"I could end up making a very successful trip not so successful."

China's foreign ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Argentine Ex-President Charged With Rights Abuses (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 13, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO, Jan. 12 — Acting at the request of Argentine officials, the Spanish police on Friday detained María Estela de Perón, the former president of Argentina and the widow of the founder of the ruling party, as part of a broadening investigation by the Peronist government of Argentina into past human rights abuses there.

A judge in the provincial city of Mendoza had issued an order on Thursday that Ms. Perón, known as Isabel, who lives in exile in Spain and gives her age as 75, be detained there for questioning regarding the disappearance of a student during her time in power. Almost simultaneously, a judge in Buenos Aires authorized the arrest of two other officials with ties to the late José López Rega, who was Gen. Juan Perón's private secretary and later Ms. Perón's closest adviser.

Those moves were made less than two weeks after Argentina requested that Spain extradite another notorious figure from that era. In each case, the proceedings focus on the Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance, or "Triple A," a shadowy right-wing paramilitary death squad controlled by Mr. López Rega that first emerged when General Juan Perón was in power and accelerated its activities during his widow's tenure.

Ms. Perón governed Argentina for less than two years, from her husband's death in July 1974 until she was overthrown by a military coup on March 24, 1976. Human rights groups have blamed the Triple A for the killings of at least 1,500 political opponents, most of which occurred when Ms. Perón, a former cabaret dancer who was the general's third wife, was in power.

Ms. Perón's defense has always been that as "a poor ignorant woman" with no political experience or skills, as she put it in testimony in Spain in 1997, she had no idea what was being done in her name. But the Mendoza judge rejected that argument, saying in an interview with a local radio station that "she was the chief executive of the nation" and the abductions of people later killed "were made on the basis of decrees" she had signed.

Civilian democratic rule in Argentina was restored nearly 25 years ago. At that time, human rights and political leaders said, political parties negotiated an agreement that, at the insistence of the Peronists, effectively made human rights abuses that occurred before the military coup off limits to official investigations.

But President Néstor Kirchner, himself a Peronist, has taken a different attitude, which the judges have apparently heeded. "When the president said he hadn't left his convictions at the entrance of the seat of government and that there weren't going to be deals on impunity with anybody, that included everyone, Ms. Perón too," Interior Minister Aníbal Fernández said in an interview on Friday with a Buenos Aires radio station.

The Peronist movement is a broad one containing some factions that are regarded as right-wing and others that lean left, with Mr. Kirchner belonging to the latter group. At the time Ms. Perón was in power he and his wife, Cristina, now a powerful senator, were college students with friends who belonged to the leftist Montonero group and were later abducted and killed.

A presidential election is scheduled for this year in Argentina, and while Mr. Kirchner has not declared himself as a candidate for re-election, he has been trying to build an alliance that would include left-wing groups outside his own movement. The move against Ms. Perón, which enhances his credentials as a crusader and nonconformist who fears nothing and no one, helps cement his ties with the left.

"No federal judge would make rulings like that of requesting the capture of former president Isabel Perón or to investigate the crimes of the Triple A if he perceived that such acts would perturb the national government," Fernando Laborda wrote Friday in the conservative Buenos Aires daily La Nación. The timing "is not coincidental," he added, but stems from what "is clearly a political decision."

Spain Arrests Former Argentine President (AP)

By Harold Heckle, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 13, 2007

Former Argentine President Isabel Peron was detained Friday at her home in Madrid as part of investigations into the South American country's past human rights abuses, police said.

Later in the day, Spain's National Court ordered her conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina. The court said Argentina has 40 days to file an extradition request and Peron has to appear at a police station every 15 days.

Police acted on an arrest warrant from an Argentine judge who said he had questions about Peron's chaotic 20-month rule, a time when shadowy right-wing violence destabilized Argentina. The third wife of three-time president Juan Domingo Peron was ousted in the March 1976 coup that ushered in a seven-year dictatorship that waged a "dirty war" against its opponents.

Her arrest marked the expansion of Argentina's human rights investigations beyond dictatorship-era crimes to the death squads that terrorized the nation prior to the 1976 coup.

Peron, 75, who has lived in exile in Spain since 1981, was taken into custody at her villa in the wealthy northern Madrid neighborhood of Villanueva de la Canada. She was seen being driven to the National Court in Madrid.

Peron was wanted for questioning about three decrees she approved in her brief presidential tenure, calling on armed forces to crack down on "subversive elements." She was also wanted for questioning in connection with the disappearance of leftist Hector Aldo Fagetti Gallego one month before the coup.

Maria Estela Martinez de Peron — known as Isabel — was sworn in as president in 1974 after the death of her husband, the former strongman and father of Argentina's ruling political party. She struggled to hold on to power as Argentina was convulsed by violence from leftist guerrillas and reprisals by death squads.

Her detention followed the recent arrests in Argentina and Spain of two suspected leaders of the "Triple A" death squad that human rights groups call a precursor to state-sponsored terror waged by the country's military rulers from 1976-83.

Political analyst Felipe Noguera noted that dozens of former police and military officers have been summoned for questioning since Argentina's Supreme Court in 2005 annulled a pair of 1980s amnesty laws blocking prosecution of human rights cases.

"What might be different is that her surname is Peron," Noguera said. "So this seems to drive home the point that a lot of violence against the left wing started during the Peronist time, before and not during the junta."

Previously, efforts to bring alleged human rights abusers to justice focused on crimes committed during the dictatorship when at least 13,000 suspected leftists and other opponents of the regime were killed or disappeared.

DOJ_NMG_0117212

Peron testified in 1997 in Madrid as a witness in a Spanish case probing crimes during the military dictatorship. She said then she recalled signing a law authorizing the "annihilation" of leftist guerrillas, but did not remember details. She also said that she was unaware of human rights abuses that began during her tenure and expanded after the military overthrew her.

Adolfo Perez Esquivel, the 1980 Nobel Peace laureate for his human rights work, told The Associated Press he believed the Triple A, short for the Argentina Anticommunist Alliance, was effectively part of a state structure and thus the beginnings of state-backed terror.

"Once and for all, we have to get to the bottom of this problem and find out how this terrorism was generated by the state," Perez Esquivel said. "The search for the truth must go in every direction."

In Argentina, families of the victims of the repression celebrated Peron's arrest.

"I believe state terror began before the coup," said Maria Adela Antokoletz, whose brother, a lawyer who defended leftists, was kidnapped shortly before the 1976 coup. "Those who signed these decrees knew perfectly well the nature of the campaign and what this repression would involve."

Human rights groups blame Triple A for at least 1,500 killings of government opponents from 1973 to 1976. The dead included leftists, trade activists, opposition lawmakers and intellectuals.

Some victims were abducted off streets and never seen again while others were found dead of bullet wounds, some with their hands hacked off or burned.

The violence set the stage for the dictatorship's crackdown on dissent, a campaign known as the "dirty war." Nearly 13,000 people are officially listed as dead or missing from that era, but human rights groups say the total is closer to 30,000. Civilian rule was restored in 1983.

Isabel Peron's Arrest Signals Shift In Argentina (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, January 13, 2007

BUENOS AIRES — The arrest Friday of former Argentine President Isabel Peron in Spain signaled an expansion of human rights cases here beyond the former military junta to the epoch of ex-strongman Juan Domingo Peron, father of Argentina's ruling party.

The 75-year-old former president, whose full name is Maria Estela Martinez de Peron, was arrested at her home near Madrid after a federal judge in Argentina issued a warrant for her detention, officials said. A Spanish tribunal ordered her conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina.

She is wanted for questioning in connection with the disappearance of a student activist in February 1976, during the final weeks of her presidency.

Isabel Peron is the widow and successor in office of Juan Peron, three times elected president and still an iconic and controversial figure in his homeland. As the sitting vice president, the ex-dancer assumed the presidency when her husband died in July 1974.

Argentina's only woman president never enjoyed the popularity of Peron's previous wife, the charismatic Eva "Evita" Peron, who is still idolized here more than half a century after her death. Economic and political turmoil marked the reign of Isabel Peron, who was toppled in a military coup in March 1976.

The strongman's admirers have largely ignored his dark side, such as his regime's welcoming of Nazi war criminals after World War II and the right-wing death squads that sprung up during his final term. Critics call him a demagogue who stifled freedoms and crushed dissent while admiring European fascists such as Benito Mussolini of Italy.

The current Peronist administration has aggressively targeted hundreds of abusers from the junta that succeeded Peron and his wife. The former military leaders are widely despised here, and Argentines have generally applauded their prosecutions.

But Juan Peron, with his exaltation of the working classes and strong ties to labor unions, remains a beloved figure for many. His political movement, which embraced elements of the left and right, continues to dominate Argentine politics.

Investigators are now zeroing in on government-linked death squads that, human rights groups say, operated with impunity during the tumultuous 1970s rule of Peron and his widow. The sanctioned killers, these groups say, set the stage for the subsequent "dirty war" under military rule that cost as many as 30,000 lives during a dictatorship that lasted from 1976 to 1983.

Isabel Peron is being sought in connection with decrees she signed in office that called on security forces to "annihilate … subversive elements throughout the country." By then, the Peronists had turned violently against their former left-wing allies and forced them underground.

DOJ_NMG_0117213

A separate judicial inquiry is examining a right-wing death squad called the Argentine Anticommunist Alliance, known as Triple A, that operated during the administrations of both Perons. Rights groups say Triple A was responsible for about 1,500 extrajudicial assassinations.

A judge in the capital has ordered the arrest of several former Triple A leaders. Whether the various inquiries will lead to the late Peron himself and sully his image remains unclear. Many believe it is unlikely Peron will ever be despised as much as the former military rulers who "disappeared" thousands of opponents and led Argentina to the ruinous Falklands War in 1982.

Argentines have shifted much of the blame for abuses during the Peron governments to a now-deceased former aide, Jose Lopez Rega, a thuggish figure often described as the founder of Triple A.

But critics say it is inconceivable that the strong-willed Peron himself didn't approve of the government-backed death squads created during his reign.

"Eventually people must ask themselves if it's plausible that the president and person in charge when the Triple A was set up knew nothing about it," said James Neilson, a columnist for the newsmagazine Noticias.

Argentine President Nestor Kirchner is a lifelong Peronist and leftist who has made bringing military abusers to justice a centerpiece of his administration. He seldom publicly invokes the memory of Peron, and has signaled no opposition to the aggressive prosecution of Peron-era figures linked to death squads — even if it leads to the founder of the movement he represents.

"We want reconciliation, but without impunity," Kirchner told the daily Clarin after the judge's order for Isabel Peron's arrest in Spain. "The truth has to be known, whatever it is."

Reach Out To Cuba's People (WSJ)

By Mario Loyola

The Wall Street Journal, January 13, 2007

With Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visiting Venezuela today, it might be a good time to consider another "change in course" for U.S. policy. The isolation of Cuba, a legacy of the Cold War, is pushing that country closer to America's most dangerous enemies.

In a recent open letter to President Bush, several major Cuban dissident groups called for an end to U.S. restrictions on travel and remittances to Cuba. Now joining their call is the Miami-based Cuban Consensus, a coalition of 20 pro-democracy groups including the "hard-line" Cuban-American National Foundation. The advocates for the current policy -- chiefly three intransigent Cuban-American representatives in Congress -- are increasingly alone.

If we don't lift the travel and remittance restrictions now, it is not just the Cuban people who stand to suffer. Allowing Cuba to slip further under the influence of Venezuela's newly reelected Hugo Chávez, the proud new ally of Iran, would be terrible for the U.S.

These restrictions are regulatory, which means that the president could eliminate them tomorrow. But the Helms-Burton law freezes the larger economic embargo in place until the communist regime dismantles its security apparatus and calls for free elections -- and until both Raúl and Fidel Castro are gone. With the changing of the guard in Havana, there will be opportunities for incremental reform. The new Congress must amend Helms-Burton to give the president the flexibility he will need to seize them.

Any major opening -- such as diplomatic talks or relaxation of the embargo -- should be conditioned on Cuba's release of political prisoners, economic reforms, freedom of speech and a dismantling of the neighborhood spy system that has driven Cuban society into such a heartbreaking state of paranoia. But Helms-Burton's rigid, all-or-nothing approach creates no incentive for Cuba's communists to undertake even the most minor reform.

For many supporters of the current policy, isolating Cuba has become almost an end in itself. Nothing could be more perverse. If Cuban culture is exposed to globalization, it will fuel yearning for the freedoms of modernity. If we expand diplomatic contact, we will begin to discover allies within the regime. Allowing Cuba to join the international trade and finance system (which U.S. law largely prevents) will multiply the incentives to liberalize. By isolating Cuba and driving it into the arms of Hugo Chávez, the only real beneficiaries are communist hard-liners -- and their patrons.

Cuba's communist regime has two conflicting needs -- isolation and money. Ending isolation will rebuild the bridges between Cubans and their most natural allies -- the American people. It would also likely expose Cubans to the political and commercial culture of one of the most spectacularly successful immigrant communities in the U.S. -- that of their exiled family members in Miami.

Relaxing the flow of funds from the U.S. would also turn a communist need to our advantage. The more Cuba depends financially on the U.S., the more leverage we will gain in pushing for economic and political reform. Cutting the regime off from sources of financing may have made sense after the fall of the Soviet Union, when Cuba had nowhere else to turn. But now it has Venezuela.

With Fidel Castro's removal from power and imminent demise, the key obstacle to reform within the regime has disappeared. A new generation of bureaucrats now has a chance to gain influence. Many of today's younger "communists" are less interested in the Revolution than in maintaining stability -- and much less interested in Venezuela's patronage than in normalizing relations with the U.S. For Cuba's proud armed forces, the prospect of becoming servants to Mr. Chávez is not attractive. Unfortunately, U.S. stubbornness leaves them little choice.

Cuba's increasing dependence on Mr. Chávez is dangerous for the U.S. Venezuela uses oil money to fuel a global campaign against America. Venezuelan intelligence services set up shop wherever they can in Latin America to eradicate government officials educated in the U.S. or suspected of pro-American sympathies. Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua are falling firmly into Venezuela's orbit. And throughout the Non-Aligned Movement, Mr. Chávez trades oil money for diplomatic support against the U.S. in a new kind of Cold War. Worse, after his recent election victory, Mr. Chávez seems to be claiming a mandate for an even more stridently Castroist and anti-American position -- all of which will influence the direction of the Cuban regime.

Looming on the horizon is an even greater threat. Iran's intelligence services -- perhaps the most prolific and sophisticated terrorist organization in the world -- use diplomatic channels to build their network. And there are clear indications of a renewed Hezbollah effort in South America. Thus Venezuela's new alliance with Iran represents a grave danger to the whole hemisphere. Venezuela is already putting enormous pressure on Cuba to expand its ties with Iran; an Iranian foothold just 90 miles from our own shores would be a catastrophic setback in the war on terror.

Relaxing Cuba's isolation would help diminish a gathering threat to national security, and bring hope to Cubans everywhere that the long tragedy of communism and exile may finally be coming to an end.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Plans For Hostile Reception From Senate Democrats. The New York Times (1/13, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, "who has faced controversy throughout his two-year tenure, is likely to enter an even stormier phase next Thursday when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for the first time since control fell to the Democrats. But he shows little anxiety about more vehement criticism of his stewardship at the Justice Department. 'They have an institutional interest to gather up information about what the executive branch is doing,' Mr. Gonzales said Friday, in an interview in which he adopted the mildly juridical tone of a law professor. Referring to the Justice Department, he said: 'We likewise have an institutional interest in maintaining the confidentially of certain kinds of information. From my perspective, there are two competing institutional interests. This is not a partisan issue. It's an institutional issue of interests that have to be accommodated.'" The Times adds that Gonzales's "chief antagonist" will likely be Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy.

Stimson Comments On Detainees' Lawyers Spark Furor. The New York Times (1/13, A1, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Cully Stimson "said in an interview this week that he was dismayed that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms were representing prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and that the firms' corporate clients should consider ending their business ties. The comments…produced an instant torrent of anger from lawyers, legal ethics specialists and bar association officials, who said Friday that his comments were repellent and displayed an ignorance of the duties of lawyers to represent people in legal trouble." Stimson "made his remarks in an interview on Thursday with Federal News Radio, a local Washington-based station that is aimed at an audience of government employees." In an interview Friday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said he had no problem with the current system of representation. 'Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases,' he said. Neither the White House nor the Pentagon had any official comment, but officials sought to distance themselves from Mr. Stimson's view." McClatchy (1/13, Rosenberg) says Stimson "stirred up a maelstrom" with his comments.

NYTimes Calls Stimson's "Attack" On Detainees' Lawyers "Contemptible." The New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) editorializes, "No one who has followed President Bush's policies on detainees should be surprised when a member of his team scorns American notions of justice. But even by that low standard, the administration's new attack on lawyers who dare to give those prisoners the meager representation permitted them is contemptible." Stimson "tried to rally American corporations to stop doing business with law firms that represent inmates" at Guantanamo. The Times says it "does not seem to matter to Mr. Stimson, who is a lawyer, that a great many of those detainees did not deserve imprisonment, let alone the indefinite detention to which they are subjected as 'illegal enemy combatants.' And forget about the fundamental American right that everyone should have legal counsel, even the most heinous villain."

Murtha Calls For Closing Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo Facilities. The Boston Globe (1/13, Klein, 413K) reports House Democratic leaders "outlined plans to try to force the Bush administration to close the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the Guantanamo Bay detention facility in Cuba, taking aim at two sites that have sparked an international furor over the Bush administration's war policy." Rep. John Murtha said he "wants to close both prisons by cutting their funding, 'to restore our credibility worldwide.' If he succeeds, it would force the administration to find a new location for high-value terrorism suspects. … Democratic leaders will try to include the measure to close the prisons in a spending bill designed to pay for war operations, Murtha said. He acknowledged that closing Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo would be more symbolic than substantive."

Padilla Trial Delayed Until April. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports, "A federal judge ordered a three-month delay for the trial of Jose Padilla, accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, in part to allow time for a full evaluation of Mr. Padilla's mental competency. The judge, Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami, set a new trial date of April 16 for Mr. Padilla and two others. It was the third time the case had been postponed."

US Embassy In Athens Sustains Grenade Attack. ABC World News (1/12, story 5, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There was an attack on the American embassy in Athens Greece today. It caused some damage but no injuries. A shadowy group of radical, Greek leftists claimed responsibility. No other American embassies have been put on notice for high alert." The Washington Times (1/13, Gatopoulos, 88K) reports the attack caused "limited damage and no injuries but reviving fears of a resurgence of far-left Greek militant groups that carried out deadly attacks over three decades." US Ambassador Charles Ries "called the attack 'very serious.' He said no warning had been given." The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 8, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) had brief reports as well.

The New York Times (1/13, Fisher, Carassava, 1.16M) reports, "An antitank grenade was fired into the heavily fortified American Embassy here on Friday just before dawn. The building was empty, but the attack nonetheless underscored deep anti-American sentiment here and revived fears of a new round of homegrown terror. Greek officials said they doubted that the attack was the work of foreign or Islamic terrorists, but rather that of regrouped extreme leftists aiming at a specific, symbolic target: the huge American seal, with an eagle against a blue background, affixed to the front of the boxy, modern embassy near downtown. The grenade narrowly missed the seal, punching through a window a few feet above and landing in a bathroom on the embassy's third story, where the ambassador has his office."

WPost Says White House Stance On Opening Mail "Disturbingly Unclear." The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K) asks in an editorial, "Is the federal government opening citizens' mail without obtaining warrants? Was a statement that was quietly issued when the president signed an obscure Postal Service reform bill last month a new assertion of power by the administration to engage in such warrantless searches? The answer to both these questions is disturbingly unclear. No reasonable person doubts that in emergency circumstances -- a ticking bomb inside a package -- government agents shouldn't have to wait for court approval to open private mail. That authority has been clear for years." But "given the president's signing statement, given his demonstrated willingness to stretch the boundaries of his authority and dispense with inconvenient legal niceties, it seems necessary to ask again" whether the White House feels it is authorized to open mail without a warrant.

Stricter US Asylum Laws Said To Punish "Freedom Fighters." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/13, 850K) Anna Husarska, senior policy advisor at the International Rescue Committee, writes, "I have met many refugees around the world -- Burmese Karen in Thailand, Burmese Chin in Malaysia, Lao Hmong in Thailand, Eritreans in Ethiopia -- whose cases were put 'on hold' by U.S. authorities because the organizations to which the refugees had belonged were later designated as terrorist. … What's particularly upsetting is that those 'on hold' are, in many cases, heroic freedom fighters who struggled for democracy against brutal dictatorships (like the Burmese junta or the Laotian communists) or even, sometimes, people who had been recruited to fight by the Unites States (like the Lao Hmong or the Vietnamese Montagnards). The reason for this bizarre treatment is that in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. adopted a very broad definition of 'terrorist activity' in American law. This overzealous legislative approach means that thousands of genuine refugees who participated in armed insurgencies — even those friendly to (and in some cases supported by) the United States — are now treated as a threat to American security."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mueller Suggested FBI Watching 8,000 Terror Suspects In US. In his US News & World Report (1/12) online column, David E. Kaplan wrote, "He wouldn't say it directly, but this week FBI Director Robert Mueller in effect told Congress the bureau has 8,000 people under investigation for terrorism. The FBI is reluctant to release an official figure, as many of those under investigation play only minor roles or turn out to be innocent. Instead, Mueller did it by inference, comparing America's record with that of Great Britain. … FBI officials confirm that's a ballpark figure, but decline to put the figure on the record." Kaplan added, "One reason for the caution is that FBI officials see few operational cells in America and don't want the public thinking there are 8,000 terrorists running around. ... But then what are all those U.S. terrorism suspects up to? Lots of support activity, officials say. One FBI agent ticked off the list: raising money, recruiting, logistics, surveillance, communications. Still, a handful of operational cells are out there, investigators believe, and that's what they lose sleep over."

New Rule Increases Demand For US, Canadian Passports. The Washington Post (1/13, A16, Struck, 690K) reports, "Canadian and U.S. citizens are lining up for passports to meet tougher U.S. border rules that take effect this month, and Canadian authorities fear the rules will keep more Americans at home. Starting Jan. 23, all airline passengers landing in the United States will have to carry a passport, not just the driver's license and birth certificate that can now be used by Canadians crossing the border and by U.S. citizens returning from Canada, Mexico, the Bahamas and the Caribbean. … U.S authorities say the rush proves that the tighter border controls being instituted five years after Sept. 11, 2001, are working to improve security. The rules will be extended to the busy land borders with Canada and Mexico by June 1, 2009."

Canada Announces Border Security Initiative. The AP (1/12, Duff-Brown) reports Canada "unveiled a major border security and prosperity initiative Friday, saying it would spend $431.6 million over the next five years to protect its border from terrorist, economic and environmental threats, according to the Canada Border Services Agency's website. Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day made the announcement at the Canada-U.S. border crossing between Windsor and Detroit, where one-third of the $1.6 billion in daily trade between the North American neighbors passes."

Judge Throws Out Hatfill's Suit Against NYTimes. The Washington Post (1/13, A8, Markon, 690K) reports, "A federal judge said yesterday that he will throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation lawsuit a former Army scientist filed against the New York Times Co. over columns that he contends blamed him for the 2001 anthrax attacks. Saying that the Times's motion to dismiss the case 'should be granted,' U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria canceled a trial set for Jan. 29, according to the court's docket. Hilton indicated that he would explain his reasoning in a subsequent order throwing out the case. The development is a victory for Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit filed by Steven J. Hatfill in 2004. Hatfill said the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a 'likely culprit' in the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17."

The New York Times (1/13, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "It was the latest and, perhaps, final chapter in a suit that has gone to the Supreme Court. … The Times argued in its dismissal motion that Dr. Hatfill was a public figure, at least for the purposes of the suit, in that he had thrust himself into the public debate about preparedness for a biological attack." The AP (1/12) reports, "The judge did not explain his ruling in the order issued Friday."

Kaine, O'Malley, Fenty Vow Cooperation On Security Issues. The Washington Post (1/13, B3, Aratani, 690K) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine, Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, and District of Columbia Mayor Adrian Fenty, "in their first joint meeting as the Washington region's top elected officials," vowed to "cooperate on homeland security issues." Fenty said "one of the leaders' goals is to prioritize homeland security issues as the region begins to apply for federal grants. He said that they plan to meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next month." The Washington Times (1/13, McLaughlin, 88K) quotes O'Malley saying, "It is critically important that we cooperate across borders and pursue our common goals."

Box Addressed To Ex-President Clinton Led To Post Office Scare. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports a post office in New Castle, New York, "was evacuated as the police, the Westchester County Bomb Squad and Secret Service agents responded to a report of a suspicious package addressed to former President Bill Clinton. The cause of all the fuss? A box of cookies." Postal officials "discovered a suspicious package addressed to Mr. Clinton on Thursday, said Kim Bruce, a Secret Service spokeswoman. An incorrect address for the Chappaqua home" of the Clintons "raised the authorities' suspicions, Ms. Bruce said."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says "We're Going Forward" With Iraq Strategy Despite Congressional Doubts. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 4, 1:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush says his new Iraq strategy will go ahead in spite of heavy opposition in Congress." Bush "faced more skeptical, even hostile reaction to his plan to send more than 21,000 additional troops to Iraq. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said today he hopes the Senate can vote next week on a resolution opposing the new strategy. But in an exclusivr interview, the President told 60 Minutes correspondent Scott Pelley, opponents in Congress won't change his mind." Pelley: "Do you believe as Commander in Chief, you have the authority to put the troops in there, no matter what the Congress wants to do?" President Bush: "I think I've got -- in this situation, I do, yeah. And I fully understand they will -- they could try to stop me from doing it, but I've made my decision, and we're going forward."

NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Bush "is at Camp David for the weekend ending a week in which as our own Tim Russert put it on the air, he doubled his own bet on his own presidency" with "this almost solitary fight." NBC (Gregory): "The President finds himself more isolated over what to do next in Iraq. The way forward in Iraq appears to be a lonely path for George W. Bush, who has now staked a war policy and the presidency on a final stand in Baghdad."

Bush Administration Spokesmen Challenged On Capitol Hill. NBC Nightly News (1/12, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) led with the pessimistic words, "Two days now since the President gave his speech and gave the order to send over 20,000 Americans to what might be the worst place on earth. And now it and now it gets debated, the Democrats are threatening to linger with the funding of the war in Iraq as a way to send a message. Today the President's Pentagon chief told lawmakers there could be a bright side here if this so-called surge reduces the violence there American troops could start coming home later this year." NBC (Reid): "The Secretary of Defense said today he is confident that the President's plan for Iraq can succeed but he also said he understands why so many people are so skeptical. Meanwhile here on Capitol Hill a showdown is looming. Most Democrats and some Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee said today they don't understand how the President's plan can work when it depends so heavily on Iraq's leaders keeping promises they failed to keep before."

ABC World News (1/12, story 2, 0:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace "answered more questions about the President's new strategy in Iraq. Gates said mistakes in the past made the situation what it is today. But he warned it could still get much worse." Gates: "Mistakes certainly have been made by the United States in Iraq. But however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable." The Financial Times (1/13, Sevastopulo) reports Gates and Pace "faced a less hostile reception than Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state," on Thursday, but "most Democrats, and some Republicans, on the armed services committee strongly questioned whether Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his commitments to send more Iraqi troops into Baghdad."

The Washington Post (1/13, A1, White, Tyson on, 690K) reports Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin "sharply criticized sending more U.S. troops into Iraq and said the move reinforces a 'flawed strategy' that has failed thus far. ... Some Republicans questioned the immediate need for thousands of U.S. troops," with Sen. John Warner saying he "would rather send in a small complement of troops to see if the Iraqis become full partners." Sen. John McCain called a small troop increase "the worst of all worlds" but said critics had presented no "viable alternatives." The New York Times (1/13, Cloud, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Armed Services Committee Republicans "ame to the defense of President Bush on Friday, lending support to his decision to send more troops to Iraq and hoping to head off a Senate resolution criticizing the plan." But Republicans "were keeping a close watch on public opinion polls, particularly a survey by CNN and the Opinion Research Corporation on Friday showing that 66 percent of Americans oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq."

Democrats Eye Alternative To Surge Plan. The Chicago Tribune (1/13, Madhani, 617K) reports that Democrats "seem to have won the moment by effectively pillorying President Bush's plan," but "now face the dilemma of coming up with a better alternative to stem the sectarian bloodletting." Sen. Levin "said he hoped to garner bipartisan support for a non-binding resolution voicing dissatisfaction with Bush's Iraq policy." However, Democratic criticism came "at a lower volume than on Thursday" and was "far more civil than the previous day."

Rice Says Bush's Plan Is "Only Real Alternative On The Table." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on BBC Arabic Television (1/12), "The only real alternative on the table is the President's alternative. And so I understand skepticism. I certainly understand that people wonder why it hasn't worked till now, but the President's given us a way forward and I hope it'll get support. … The President's plan, first of all, very much puts Iraqis at the center of responsibility for dealing with what is their most urgent problem. Their most urgent problem is that the population has lost confidence that the government of Iraq can and will defend them in an evenhanded fashion, whether they are Sunni or

Shia. … So the President's plan very much relies on Iraqis' responsibility for the kind of country that they're going to be."

State Department's Burns Says "We Are Going Forward." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said on MSNBC (1/12, O'Donnell), "We certainly heard the message from Capitol Hill yesterday, but we are going forward with this effort to deploy more American military forces into Baghdad especially and also into Anbar province and other areas. The strategy that President Bush talked about is meant to maximize our ability to help the Iraqis provide for real security, daily security in the streets of the major cities of the country. Without that, it's hard to see how many of the other objectives we have, of course leading to the eventual withdrawal of American forces, can succeed. So we think it's a necessary step."

Members Of Congress Weigh In. Sen. Ben Nelson, appearing on Fox News (1/12), said, "I am willing to give it a hearing, but I have to say that I'm very dubious, because I am very concerned about what the chiefs of the various services have said, what Gen. Abizaid has said, that it doesn't require more US troops, it requires more Iraqi troops stood up, capable of fighting and engaging the enemy."

Sen. John Cornyn said on MSNBC (1/12, Robach), "It strikes me that there are two options. One is to fail and the other one is to succeed. And the guaranteed way to fail is not to even try. So I favor trying this new plan that the President has come up with after several months of consultation with bipartisan groups and experts throughout the spectrum, because the costs of failure are simply too great to even contemplate."

Rep. Joe Sestak said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "I'm not sure exactly what the Democratic caucus is going to do. But as an individual, I think the President's plan violates exactly what we shouldn't be doing. And because of that, I do think that the Congress should vote and it should be a vote not to increase the troops that are in Iraq. … I believe we're on the road to nowhere. And putting more troops on that road in order to protect those men and women on the road to nowhere I'd do in a heartbeat. The President didn't make that case."

Rep. Dan Lungren said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "We have to understand that defeat in Iraq would be devastating for us. I'm not just talking about the millions of people put at risk in Iraq itself, I'm talking about further an increased and more acute instability in the Middle East, number one. And number two, whether we like it or not, this is a major front in the war on terror. We can argue about how we got where we are, but we need to do something so that we have a chance to win."

White House Says Funding For Surge Already Exists. The Washington Times (1/13, Dinan, 88K) reports on its front page, "The White House yesterday said there already is enough money in the budget to pay for President Bush's proposed troop surge in Iraq, leaving Congress almost no viable way to stop him before he commits the troops." The existence of funding "leaves Congress with few other options." But the Washington Times (1/13, Ward, 88K) also reports Rep. John Murtha "said he is exploring ways to block funding for additional troops."

Bush Reportedly Reading History Of Algerian Insurgency. CNN.com (1/12, Blitzer, McConnell) reports, "As President Bush wrestles with the continuing war in Iraq, he's currently reading a book about another difficult war: 'A Savage War of Peace,' by Alistair Horne, a senior White House source tells CNN. It is a dense and detailed history of the battle between France and revolutionaries in its colony of Algeria, describing an unsuccessful war against a bloody terrorist insurgency. A resistance movement rose in 1954 to resist French occupation. It quickly turned into a civil war between factions that became a costly, unpopular conflict for the French."

World Community Reacts Skeptically To Surge Plan. The New York Times (1/13, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that the Bush war plan "has won few converts across a worried world, where dismay and hostility toward the American expedition have grown while support trickles away. ... Even Britain, the onetime cheerleader for the White House, offered only an ambiguous response to the president's announcement, saying London remained on track to withdraw its forces, not increase them." Other countries reacted with "haughty indifference." Among Arab countries, "there is a deeper pessimism, reflecting a widely held Arab view that the American presence is the source of Iraq's woes." On the other hand, "there was some sympathy — if not always explicit — for the American quandary: this was, many analysts sensed, a defining event, a last throw of the dice that would measure American prestige and credibility against the clamor of its adversaries."

Hamilton Discusses Iraq Recommendations. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 7, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Just over a month ago, the Iraq Study Group issued its list of recommendations for a way out of Iraq. Rep. Lee

Hamilton was the co-chair of that bipartisan group. ... In your mind, what should the timetable be on this? If the President's plan is not working by -- give me a date, it should be scrapped and go to Plan B?" Hamilton: "Oh, I think time is very tight here. This government in Iraq does not have much time to perform. ... Their rhetoric has been pretty good, but they just haven't done it. I personally think the timeframe is a matter of weeks, certainly not a year. Maybe a couple of months. But it should be a tight timeframe."

US Soldiers In Iraq Have Mixed Views Of Plan. ABC World News (1/12, story 3, 1:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, US troops are already starting to implement the President's new plan. And they have various opinions of it." ABC (Karl): "Ask them if it will work, and most will tell you that depends on their Iraqi counterparts." Sgt. First Class Brian Field: They really need to step it up." Spc. Charles Rogers: "More manpower is always good. Strength in numbers. But I don't know if that is going to be the answer." Karl: "Look around and you get a sense that these Iraqi forces may need more than better weapons to get the job done."

Schwarzenegger, Huckabee Back Bush Plan. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Rau, 850K) reports, "Bucking the disenchanted views of most Americans about the war, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday that he supports President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq." In an interview to air on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, Schwarzenegger "said he does not want the U.S. to 'pull out of this war as losers.' ... Schwarzenegger did break with the president by reiterating his support for a timeline for American troops to withdraw."

Ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee said on MSNBC's Tucker (1/12, O'Donnell), "I think we have got to give" the President "a chance to let it work. Whether it's the right decision, I honestly don't know, because I don't have access to the kind of military and intelligence information that he does. But he's the commander-in-chief, and we have got to give him an opportunity. I think that the strategy that he has laid out is one that is risky in the sense that it has to work for him, because if it doesn't, I don't think he's going to get another chance to come up with yet another plan. But if the Democrats don't like that plan, they've got to put something on the table."

Richardson Says Bush "Is Not Listening." Gov. Bill Richardson said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "The President is not listening. It's not a partisan issue. This is national. … The American people want a different course in Iraq. And what does a President do? He has a surge. The only surge that should happen is a surge in diplomacy, a surge in a political solution, a withdrawal that I believe is necessary this year that is tied to a political solution, a reconciliation conference. And you deploy those troops where we need them, in Afghanistan, to fight international terrorism. Nuclear proliferation, loose nuclear weapons, those are our interests. And instead of saying that we're now going to look at Iran, we should be talking to Syria, we should be talking to Iran."

More Commentary. Wall Street Journal (1/13, 2.04M) columnist Peggy Noonan writes in a highly pessimistic column, "Right now, in the deepest levels of the American government, intelligence and military planners should be ordered to draw up serious plans for an American withdrawal, and serious strategies for dealing with the realities withdrawal will bring. It would not be the worst thing if the Maliki government knew those plans were being drawn up. It might concentrate the mind. ... I'm not sure [US interests have] been given sufficient attention the past few years. In fact, I am sorry to say I believe they have not."

Washington Post (1/13, A19, 690K) Style writer Henry Allen writes, "The problem, if we lose in Iraq, is that America is apt to keep on doing what it's been doing for decades when it loses, which is to say learn nothing and have years of hissy fits about who's to blame. And set itself up for another fiasco someplace else. ... our failed ground combat interventions and nation building continue like a sort of neurosis, the kind that has been defined as doing the same thing over and over in expectation of a different result, in the manner of France fighting and losing one colonial war after another after World War II."

Washington Post (1/13, A19, King, 690K) columnist Colbert King recalls that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke on April 4, 1967, about the Vietnam War: "Vietnam, King said, was consuming American troops and money like 'some demonic, destructive suction tube' even as that war was laying waste to the Vietnamese people and to America's standing in the world. ... Now enter George W. Bush -- the president who got America into this debacle [Iraq] through a series of misjudgments that would make Alfred E. Neuman look brilliant." Bush "stubbornly and in the face of legitimate opposition, proposes to make matters worse. Remember King and the words: 'A time comes when silence is betrayal.'"

Rice Says Bush Approved Raids On Iranians. The New York Times (1/13, Sanger, Gordon,

1.16M) reports, "A recent series of American raids against Iranians in Iraq was authorized under an order that President Bush decided to issue several months ago to undertake a broad military offensive against Iranian operatives in the country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday." Rice's "willingness to discuss the issue seemed to reflect a new hostility to Iran that was first evident in Mr. Bush's speech to the nation on Wednesday night, in which he accused Tehran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond." The "decision to authorize the aggressive steps against Iranians in Iraq appears to formalize the American effort to contain Iran's ambitions as a new front in the Iraq war," although some "critics regard the talk about Iran as a diversion, one intended to shift attention away from the spiraling chaos in Iraq." BBC.com (1/12) reports Rice "has denied that the US intends to escalate the war in Iraq by confronting Iranian groups operating there" but "insisted that the United States was not going to let either Iran or Syria continue activities that endangered US soldiers in Iraq."

ABC World News (1/12, lead story, 2:25, Martha Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The State Department said, for the first time today, that the Iraqi government believes five men, detained in a US raid in northern Iraq, were members of the Iranian revolutionary guard corps." The Iranians were "part of an…effort to funnel ammunition and weapons to insurgents." The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 3, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The wreckage of this Iranian office raided by American troops in northern Iraq marks a new front in the war. US officials tell CBS News, American forces have begun an aggressive and mostly secret ground campaign against networks of Iranians who had been operating with virtual impunity inside Iraq. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs told Congress today Iranians are now on the target list." Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace: "Twice in the last two or three weeks, in pursuit of those networks, when we have gone and captured those cells, we've captured Iranians."

White House Softens Tone On Iran. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Barnes, Moore, 850K) reports, "The Bush administration sought to assure lawmakers and the public Friday that despite harsh new rhetoric, it did not intend to go to war with Iran, even as U.S. sources charged that Iranians captured in Irbil, Iraq, were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards. ... The administration moved Friday to defuse concerns that it was planning or inviting a confrontation with Tehran. At a news conference, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed as an 'urban legend' suggestions that the United States was preparing for another war."

Iraqi Foreign Minister Defends Detained Iranians. The AP (1/12, Gamel) reports, "Five Iranians detained by U.S.-led forces were working in a decade-old government liaison office that was in the process of being upgraded to a consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said Friday. ... Tehran condemned the raid in the Kurdish-controlled northern city of Irbil and urged Iraq to push for the Iranians' release."

Rockefeller Says Bush Would Need A New Congressional Resolution To Take On Iran. Sen. Jay Rockefeller said on MSNBC (1/12, Mitchell) that if President Bush "takes on Iran, it's going to have to be a new authorization, and it won't pass. … Yes, it's intermingled with the Shias in Iraq. But anybody who hasn't read a great deal about Iran, who doesn't know its history, who doesn't know the history of its relationships with the United States, which have mostly been rather bad and unsustainable, there has to be very, very careful consideration before we were ever to do something like that. And the answer is that we can't do it. You cannot take on Iran."

Dean Says US Must Confront Iran. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "The great shame among many shames of going into Iraq was we picked the wrong enemy. Iran is a danger. We've got our troops pinned down in the wrong place. Saddam Hussein was a terrible person, but not a danger to the United States. Iran is a danger. Obviously, I don't think there's much stomach among the American people for a war with Iran, given what's going on for the last three and a half years in Iraq, but we are clearly going to have to stand up to Iran."

Dowd Blasts Idea Of Fighting Iran. New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes sarcastically, "How can you not have confidence in the crackerjack team that brought you Operation Iraqi Freedom, which foundered and led to Operation Together Forward? ... We're trying to stanch a self-inflicted wound: our failed occupation gave Iran the opening in Iraq we're now trying to shut down." President Bush has been "deserted by more and more Republicans, generals and Americans, risking it all on a weak reed like Prime Minister Maliki."

Maliki Fills Baghdad Military Post With His Own Man. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Roug, Spiegel, 850K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "has filled the top military job in Baghdad with a virtually unknown officer chosen over the objections of U.S. and Iraqi military commanders, officials from both governments said." Maliki reportedly "failed to consult the leaders of other political factions before announcing the appointment of Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar. The appointment is highly significant because it is Maliki's first public move after President Bush's announcement that he was sending more troops to Iraq. ... As the Iraqi commander for the capital, Qanbar would play a central role in that campaign, and any ties he might have to sectarian groups could undermine the new U.S. effort."

US Contends With Sadr For Iraqi Troops' Loyalties. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Trejos, 690K) reports from a "shared" US-Iraqi base "in eastern Baghdad," "At best, said several U.S. soldiers interviewed at the base this month, some of the Iraqi troops they advise are sympathetic to [Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr] and his army. At worst, they said, some are members of the militia, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi. ... U.S. military officers say that the Iraqi police force is deeply infiltrated by militiamen and predict that the army will be quicker to operate independently. But a four-day visit to the base known as Old MOD, for the former Ministry of Defense complex, showed that the army is not immune to the militias' influence. According to the Americans, most of the Iraqi soldiers are Shiites, and some come from Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum that is a Mahdi Army stronghold. Some carry pictures of Sadr."

Coalition Forces Have "Dismantled" Insurgent Base In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Zavis, 850K) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces have denied Sunni Arab insurgents an important power base in a lawless region east of Baghdad, the commander of a joint offensive said Friday. The challenge now, U.S. Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said in an interview, is to ensure that the militants do not return to the region in the eastern province of Diyala. When U.S. forces conducted previous large operations, insurgents often returned as soon as the military withdrew. Poppas plans to open a patrol station in the area, which until recently had been a virtual no-go zone for Iraqi security forces."

Violence Mars Baghdad's Haifa Street. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 5, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Most of the additional troops earmarked for Iraq will be put to use on a security clamp in Baghdad, where fighting has been raging all week long along the key thoroughfare." CBS (Logan): "This shaky video, smuggled out of Haifa Street, shows the death and destruction caused by six days of intense fighting in what is today Baghdad's most violent neighborhood. US and Iraqi forces are battling gunmen dug into the houses along this main road that runs from the center of the capital down to the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Terrorists Using Google Earth To Locate British Troops. The London Telegraph (1/13, Harding) reports, "Terrorists attacking British bases in Basra are using aerial footage displayed by the Google Earth internet tool to pinpoint their attacks, say Army intelligence sources. Documents seized during raids on the homes of insurgents last week uncovered print-outs from photographs taken from Google." The photographs depict "buildings inside the bases and vulnerable areas such as tented accommodation, lavatory blocks and where lightly armoured Land Rovers are parked." Insurgent salvos "are fired from up to four miles away and are increasingly accurate. ... Intelligence sources also believe that the insurgents are receiving more training and weaponry from Iran to improve their fighting skills. But the British are gathering more intelligence on mortar crews and launching several 'strike operations' to detain the operators."

Rice Responds To Boxer Assertion On War's "Personal Price." The Washington Post/AP (1/13, A15) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday criticized Sen. Barbara Boxer's suggestion that, because she does not have family in harm's way, she will pay no 'personal price' in the Iraq war." Rice said, "I thought single women had come further than that." The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Hurt, 88K) reports the White House and Rice "accused Democrats of suggesting that the secretary's childlessness, race and sex are to blame for mistakes in Iraq. ... But Mrs. Boxer and Democrats are making no apologies."

The New York Times (1/13, Cooper, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Some Democratic Senate staffers said Senator Boxer's exchange with Ms. Rice allowed the Bush administration to turn the tables on Iraq critics and sidestep the larger issue of the almost uniform opposition to the president's plan to send 20,000 more American soldiers to Iraq." ABC World News (1/12, story 4, Vargas, 8.78M) said the "personal exchange…touched off an emotional debate about the war in Iraq." The Washington Times (1/13, Ward, 88K) called the Boxer remark "the low point of" Thursday's hearing.

NATO Struggles To Build In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/13, Gall, 1.16M) reports in a negative article, "The road that cuts through the heart of Panjwai district here tells all that is going wrong with NATO's war in Afghanistan. To fight their way into this area and clear it of Taliban insurgents, NATO troops bulldozed through orchards, smashed down walls and even houses, and churned vineyards and melon fields to dust. Reconstruction projects were planned, but never materialized. Now NATO countries are championing the thoroughfare as a $5 million gift to local people." Locals, however, "are homeless, fearful and far from being won over. They say the road was built for the troops' benefit and forced on them, at the cost of their land and livelihoods. ... Already on everyone's mind — in the government, the military, the police and among villagers — is how to stop the Taliban from infiltrating back for a new offensive in the spring, which in this southern region will come in February."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Convoy South Of Kabul. The AP (1/12) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed his explosives-filled car into a two-vehicle convoy carrying foreigners south of Kabul on Friday, wounding at least one Afghan civilian, police said. ... The attack comes a day after NATO said its forces killed scores of insurgents who crossed from Pakistan in the biggest battle of the Afghan winter, while Pakistan's army fired artillery at trucks supplying militants on the other side of the border." The AP says of the artillery firing, "It was the Pakistani army's first reported offensive in the North Waziristan tribal region since a September peace deal between the government and pro-Taliban militants that critics say has provided a sanctuary for insurgents."

Gates Expresses Concern Over Afghan Stability. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Barnes, Spiegel, 850K) reports, Defense Secretary Robert Gates "expressed deep concern Friday over the stability of Afghanistan, and a top U.S. military official said additional troops might be needed to strengthen the government in Kabul, which is under growing pressure from Taliban forces." The secretary "plans to travel soon" to the country and "appeared worried by the rising violence in Afghanistan" in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Italians Wage "Peaceful War" In Mushai Valley. The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Constable, 690K) reports from Surjai, Afghanistan, "Like most of the 26 foreign military contingents that comprise the 20,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, the Italians have been banned by their government from conducting combat missions, except for 72-hour emergency sorties to aid other NATO forces. ... But officials say the work of troops from Italy, Turkey, France and other nations, which are bringing security, training, aid and development to impoverished and potentially hostile areas of central and northern Afghanistan, can be more effective than military raids, which can invade homes, create casualties and alienate communities."

Pakistan Denies It Is Terrorist Haven, Asks US For Intelligence On Al Qaeda. The AP (1/12) reports, "Pakistan on Friday rejected allegations by America's spy chief that it is a refuge for terrorist leaders and demanded that his intelligence networks share information on the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda figures." A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman said, "In breaking the back of al-Qaeda, Pakistan has done more than any other country in the world." She urged the US to "share the intelligence with us."

Taliban Fighters' Bodies Reportedly Sent Back To Pakistan. The AP (1/12) reports, "Despite Pakistani assertions, "in a sign that insurgents are crossing from Pakistan to fight in Afghanistan, the bodies of 25 militants killed in a fierce battle with NATO were repatriated Friday to their tribal villages in Pakistan, where Taliban activists urged mass attendance at their funerals, residents said." The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Constable, 690K) also reports, "The bodies of two dozen Islamic insurgents killed in a clash with NATO and Afghan army forces near the border with Pakistan were sent back Friday to Pakistan, where Taliban leaders asked that they be given funerals as 'martyrs,' according to news reports here." The corpses reportedly "included both Pakistanis and Afghans."

Pentagon Sees Somalia As Blueprint For Counterterrorism Missions. The New York Times (1/13, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "Military operations in Somalia by American commandos, and the use of the Ethiopian Army as a surrogate force to root out operatives for Al Qaeda in the country, are a blueprint that Pentagon strategists say they hope to use more frequently in counterterrorism missions around the globe. Military officials said the strike by an American gunship on terrorism suspects in southern Somalia on Sunday showed that even with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld from the Pentagon, Special Operations troops intended to take advantage of the directive given to them by Mr. Rumsfeld in the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks." Special Forces had been slowed by "a shortage of valuable intelligence on the whereabouts of top terrorism suspects," but "the State Department and Pentagon took control of Somalia policy in the summer, after a failed effort by the Central Intelligence Agency to use Somali warlords as proxies to hunt down the Qaeda suspects."

Eight Somali Gunmen Die In Shootout At Gates Of Palace. The New York Times (1/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports from Mogadishu, "According to witnesses, presidential guards killed at least eight men of a rival militia at the gates of the presidential palace as top leaders were sitting inside discussing a new disarmament program. The bloodshed seemed to be more evidence of a steady breakdown of law and order in Mogadishu, and plunged the disarmament plans into uncertainty." The shooting "apparently started over where to park a technical, the term coined in Somalia for a heavily armed pickup truck."

Ethiopian-Backed Forces Capture Last Islamist Stronghold. The Washington Times/AP (1/13, Hassan) reports, "Ethiopian-backed government forces have captured the last stronghold of the Islamist movement in southern Somalia, the Somali defense minister said yesterday just hours after warlords met with the president and promised to enlist their militiamen in the army." Ras Kamboni "fell after five days of heavy fighting, Defense Minister Col. Barre Aden Shire said. ... It is not far from the site of a U.S. air strike Monday on suspected al Qaeda terrorists." The AP also reports the shootout near the presidential palace.

Soldiers, Spouses Struggle To Preserve Marriages. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 6, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It is a hidden danger faced by every soldier who has been to Iraq or Afghanistan -- the stress they suffer on the battlefield. It can put stress on their marriages when they return home. Army divorces have increased nearly 30 percent since the start of the Iraq war. The solution might be retreat."

Networks Praise Military Mother, USO Volunteer. ABC World News (1/12, story 10, 3:00, Vargas, 8.78M) named Mary Moreno its "Person of the Week." Moreno is "a military mother who suffered her own personal defeat when their son shipped off to war. But she turned that hardship into help for other families who thought they had nowhere else to turn." Moreno: "I needed help. Medication wasn't going to help me. ... I put an ad -- I put an article in the newspaper. 'Mom seeks other moms with sons in Iraq.' I had five moms call me." Vargas: "Four years later, Mary's group is 100 strong." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 10, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) profiled USO volunteer Mary Adams, who is "often the last person that US soldiers see before they set off as volunteers to fight this nation's wars."

California US Attorney's Departure Is Met With Surprise. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/13, Thornton, Soto) reports, "Amid news reports that she has been asked to step down, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam declined repeated interview requests yesterday and did not address the matter with her staff." The Union-Tribune continues, "At a weekly managers meeting, Lam was stoic, conducting business as usual and discussing next week's caseload, according to people who attended. She made no mention of a resignation request by the Bush administration, nor did anyone ask about it. … However, she did discuss the matter with at least one law enforcement colleague. Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego, said he spoke to Lam several times yesterday and he feels the criticism and the way the situation was handled are unfair. … 'I don't think it's the right way to treat anybody. What's the decision based on?' Dzwilewski said. 'I don't share the view of whoever's making the decision back there in Washington that they'd like her to resign. I feel Carol has an excellent reputation and has done an excellent job given her limited resources.'" The Union-Tribune adds, "Dzwilewski said he sympathized with Lam on issues of stretching budgets to meet priorities and felt that criticism that she wasn't giving proper attention to smuggling, drugs and gun crimes was off-base. 'What do you expect her to do? Let corruption exist?' he said. … Lam's continued employment as U.S. attorney is crucial to the success of multiple ongoing investigations, the FBI chief said. … Dzwilewski declined to discuss Lam's demeanor during their conversations, her state of mind, when or if she will resign or her future plans. … Sources have told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam was asked to step down because she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a priority, choosing instead to focus on fewer cases that she considered more significant, such as public corruption and white-collar crime."

The North County (CA) Times (1/13, Figueroa, Bennett) reports, "Speculation that the Bush administration allegedly has asked San Diego-based U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the region's chief federal prosecutor, to step down was met with disbelief and dropped jaws by legal community members with ties to federal court. … 'I was in a state of shock,' said Peter Nunez, who served as the U.S. attorney in charge of the San Diego offices from 1982 to 1988. 'It's just like nothing I've ever seen before in 35-plus years. To be asked to resign and to be publicly humiliated by leaking this to the press is beyond any bounds of decency and behavior. It shocks me. It really is outrageous.'" The Times continues, "Nunez and others said they had not even heard rumblings that Lam was in the cross hairs for possible removal. … Lam may not be the only U.S. attorney politely being asked to pack her bags. … In a Thursday news release, U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein announced that she and two other senators were introducing legislation that would prevent the executive branch from trying to do an end run on the Senate's prerogative of confirming U.S. attorneys."

Arkansas US Attorney Was Asked To Resign. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (1/13, Satter) reports, "A day after three U. S. senators, including Arkansas ' Mark Pryor, proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U. S. attorneys, Bud Cummins acknowledged that the U. S. Justice Department asked him in June to leave his post to make room for a successor. Cummins, 47, the U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas from Dec. 21, 2001 until Dec. 20, 2006, had previously avoided directly answering whether he was 'forced out,' as rumor had it. He instead said in late August that he had always known his political appointment was temporary and that he had informally "let it be known" over the previous year that he expected to leave before President Bush's second term ended in late 2008." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "When contacted on Friday, Cummins said that while all that was true, he wanted to clarify the situation because the proposed legislation had focused a new wave of attention on his and other U. S. attorneys' recent departures, reportedly at the administration's request. … In a news release issued jointly Thursday by Pryor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., Feinstein said, 'It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U. S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation.... We don't know how many U. S. Attorneys have been asked to resign — it could be two, it could be ten, it could be more. No one knows.'" The Democrat-Gazette notes, "Pryor had publicly complained in late December, when the department announced that attorney Tim Griffin would take over Cummins ' job in a matter of days, that the administration was trying to circumvent the normal nomination process to reward a political insider, without the normal checks and balances. … Griffin, who had a reputation as an aggressive Republican campaign researcher, had previously worked under Karl Rove, Bush's main political adviser and deputy chief of staff."

More Commentary. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/13) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is a tough-minded prosecutor who has won a string of high-profile convictions against corrupt public officials, including Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet. She is widely respected for her personal integrity and her commitment to curbing white-collar crime. Her aggressive prosecutions have sent a needed message that political corruption will not be tolerated in San Diego. … Why, then, is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pressuring Lam behind the scenes to step down?" The Union-Tribune continues, "The answer to this question is far from clear, but it appears to be rooted in questionable political machinations in Washington and has nothing to do with Lam's impressive record on the job. … The Bush administration's actions appear to be motivated by cronyism, a desire to reward the president's supporters with Justice Department posts. In Lam's case, certainly, there are no legitimate performance issues to justify stripping her of her position. Gonzales is set to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits. We urge the senator to seize this opportunity to pull back the 'cloak of secrecy' and reveal the truth about the attorney general's bid to remove Lam."

New DC US Attorney Faces Money, Time Constraints. The Washington Post (1/13, B3, Leonnig) reports, "The new U.S. attorney for Washington has a very plum title. But in the current circumstances, Jeffrey A. Taylor may find it hard to leave a major mark, and he's taking some fire before he truly gets moving." The Post continues, "Taylor, who was selected by the Justice Department in the fall to run the largest office of local federal prosecutors in the country, faces the dual challenges of worsening budget constraints and a likely two-year time limit on his tenure. … Then there are the external pressures. A former national security adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Taylor is facing criticism that he lacks local know-how, having spent most of his career in San Diego, where he was an assistant U.S. attorney. And with Democrats now in control of Congress, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) is pushing again for a bill to create the post of a locally elected prosecutor to pursue local crimes in the District." The Post adds, "Gonzales appointed Taylor to be interim U.S. attorney in September, replacing Kenneth L. Wainstein, who became assistant attorney general for national security . The president usually nominates U.S. attorneys for Senate confirmation but has often chosen to let the Justice Department make appointments for interim or short-term posts. … Personable and practical, Taylor acknowledged that it would be unwise for him to launch a series of new initiatives with less money, fewer people and such a short window to act. Still, he declared, 'I wouldn't be interested in this job to just be a caretaker.' … He took over an office with 30 vacancies among its 360 authorized slots for lawyers -- jobs that will not be filled in the budget crunch. Thirty of 350 support staff jobs are also unfilled and will remain vacant. … Taylor, 41, disputes water-cooler gossip that he's a place-holder until President Bush's term ends in two years. He said he'll focus on three top priorities of cases: violent crime, public corruption and national security."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Loans By Allied Unit Under Federal Scrutiny. The New York Times (1/13, Creswell) reports, "Federal investigations into small-business loans issued by a unit of the Allied Capital Corporation are growing, as a former executive of the unit faces fraud charges in Michigan." The Times continues, "The former executive, Patrick J. Harrington, is accused of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years, according to an indictment that was handed up on Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Michigan. Mr. Harrington has not entered a plea to the charges." The Times adds, "Federal investigators are now looking at loans issued by the unit, Business Loan Express, in other parts of the country, according to several people briefed on the investigation. … And the federal Small Business Administration — which typically guarantees 75 percent of the value of these small-business loans — is considering suspending the preferred lending status of Business Loan Express, pending the outcome of an investigation. That would mean that every loan Business Loan Express issues would have to be vetted by the agency, those people said. … The S.B.A. this week also suspended the unit's ability to sell the loans it issues to large institutional investors in the secondary market, which could affect the ability of Business Loan Express to make loans, those people said. The unit can still originate loans, but only if it intends to hold those loans on its own books, which is not something the firm has historically done."

HP Prober Pleads Guilty To ID Theft, Conspiracy. The AP (1/13) reports, "Federal prosecutors scored their first victory in the investigation of boardroom spying at Hewlett-Packard on Friday, when a private investigator pleaded guilty to identity theft and conspiracy charges." The AP continues, "The investigator, Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to the two felony counts during his initial appearance in United States District Court in San Jose. … As part of the plea deal, Mr. Wagner admitted to illegally obtaining Social Security numbers and other personal information to snoop on the private telephone records of journalists, former Hewlett-Packard directors, and their family members as part of the company's effort to ferret out the source of boardroom leaks to the media." The AP adds, "Mr. Wagner acknowledged using a form of subterfuge known as 'pretexting,' or pretending to be someone else, to fool telephone companies into releasing records on former two former H.P. directors — Thomas J. Perkins and George A. Keyworth II — and two reporters, Pui-Wing Tam of The Wall Street Journal and Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks. … Mr. Wagner admitted using personal information to set up online accounts in the names of the four people from April 2005 to September 2006 to access their call logs and billing records. … His lawyer, Stephen Naratil, said his client would testify for prosecutors as they pursue other figures in the case. He declined to say whom Mr. Wagner would testify against or what he had told prosecutors. … Mr. Wagner's sentencing was set for June 20 in San Jose federal court."

Firms Trim Executive Perks To Avoid Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A1, White, Lublin) reports, "Personal air travel on the company dime is among an array of executive perks some companies have begun trimming as new compensation-disclosure rules take effect." The Journal continues, "On Jan. 1, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Lockheed Martin Corp. stopped paying executives' country-club dues. In December, directors of General Mills Inc.

capped free personal rides on company aircraft for its chief executive officer. And E*Trade Financial Corp. said it no longer would help top executives pay taxes on their severance benefits if the company is sold. … The changes come amid sweeping new Securities and Exchange Commission requirements for additional disclosure about executive pay and perks. The rules, which took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 14, require companies to reveal perks for top executives that add up to $10,000 or more apiece; the old rules required disclosure of perks valued above $50,000." The Journal adds, "The number of companies dropping or curbing perks is unclear. Most won't file their annual proxy statements, detailing executive compensation, until March or April. Of 110 large companies surveyed by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in November, 14 said they had eliminated perks or were considering doing so because of the new regulations. … But some compensation consultants and directors expect the number to grow as more boards consider the hazards of publicizing perks amid a burgeoning national outcry over executive compensation. In recent weeks, investor anger has been stoked by exit packages in the neighborhood of $200 million for the CEOs of Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., both of whom left under fire for poor shareholder returns."

Suits By Former NYSE Seat-Holders Allowed To Proceed. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B3, Bray) reports, "Lawsuits by three former New York Stock Exchange membership-seat holders over disclosures by the Big Board and its chief executive, John Thain, before details of its merger with Archipelago Holdings Inc. became public can proceed, a state judge has ruled." The Journal continues, "In an order filed Wednesday, New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos said some of the allegations in cases brought by onetime seat holders Janet Hyman, Sylvia Lief and D. Paul Rittmaster can go forward. … The three cases have been consolidated for pretrial proceedings." The Journal adds, "Without ruling on the merits of the claim, Justice Ramos allowed to proceed allegations that representations made at a Feb. 3, 2005, town hall meeting with seat holders and a Feb. 15, 2005, announcement were incomplete and/or misleading. The meeting and announcement concerned the formation of an advisory committee to explore the possibility of converting the NYSE from a nonprofit to a for-profit company, which is now called NYSE Group Inc. … The judge dismissed claims that the NYSE and Mr. Thain breached their fiduciary duty or were negligent for failing to keep the merger negotiations confidential in order to prevent speculative or premature market fluctuations."

Accounting Giants Still Paying For Scandals. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B5, Reilly) reports, "Corporate scandals that erupted earlier this decade are still causing pain at accounting firms, which continue to pay big bucks to atone for their failure to spot, or stop, fraud." The Journal continues, "The latest example: Deloitte & Touche's Italian arm on Friday agreed to pay $149 million to settle lawsuits brought by former audit client Parmalat SpA, which collapsed in December 2003 after the discovery of Europe's biggest corporate fraud. … Under the terms of the agreement between Deloitte's Italian arm, Deloitte & Touche SpA, and Parmalat, the Italian company will drop all claims against various Deloitte arms it is suing in federal court in New York. In turn, Deloitte will drop counterclaims against the company, whose former managers allegedly engaged in a fraud that left Parmalat with an $18 billion hole on its books." The Journal adds, "Specific terms of the agreement, beyond the settlement amount, weren't disclosed. A spokeswoman for Deloitte in the U.S. declined to comment on whether the $149 million would be covered in part or whole by insurance. … A joint statement from Parmalat and Deloitte didn't say whether the accounting firm acknowledged any wrongdoing. Deloitte, which signed off on Parmalat's books from 1999 to 2003, has previously said it acted in accordance with laws in place in Italy at the time. … The settlement follows a deal announced last month by Deloitte's U.S. arm, Deloitte & Touche LLP, to pay $210 million to resolve claims related to Adelphia Communications Corp., the cable company once run by the Rigas family that filed for bankruptcy in 2002. While the Adelphia and Parmalat settlements don't eclipse a record $335 million payout in 1999 by Ernst & Young LLP in a case related to Cendant Corp., they are within the top-10 settlement awards paid by auditors over the past 10 years for work for a single client."

Former Siemens Officials Is Suspect In Bribery Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "An international corruption investigation at Siemens AG is climbing the corporate ladder after a former No. 2 executive was named a suspect amid allegations a complex bribery scheme spanned several units at the far-flung German conglomerate." The Journal continues, "Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, the chief financial officer of Siemens from 1998 until he resigned in April, was questioned by German prosecutors Tuesday and released in a widening probe into nearly half a billion dollars in suspicious payments. … A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich confirmed that Mr. Neubürger is being treated as a suspect, not a witness, in the cross-border investigation. At least one other suspect has alleged to prosecutors that Mr. Neubürger was aware of illegal payments and didn't do enough to stop them, according to lawyers familiar with the investigation." The Journal adds, "More than 200 German police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several current and former employees; they were released just before Christmas after agreeing to cooperate. Investigators suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe customers abroad. … Munich-based Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Last month, it flagged €420 million ($542 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years -- double the amount uncovered by German prosecutors in November. Until now, the investigation had been confined to the company's telecommunications network division. Siemens, Europe's largest engineering firm by sales, has blamed the alleged fraud on 'individual acts.'"

DOJ Seeks To Keep Report On Convertino Probe Confidential. The AP (1/13, Jordan, Apuzzo) reports, "The Justice Department is fighting in court to keep secret a government report concluding that it leaked confidential and damaging information against a former prosecutor accused of bungling a high- profile terror trial." The AP continues, "Justice attorneys say they can't disclose all the contents of the December 2004 report by the department's inspector general without violating employees' privacy. … However, ex-Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino of Detroit said the Justice Department violated his own privacy rights by revealing to the media that he was the subject of an internal ethics inquiry after he criticized the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy." The AP adds, "Two people who have seen the full report confirmed it rules out Convertino as a suspect in the leak case. Those people described the report's findings to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because it is sealed under a Justice Department protective order. … A heavily edited version of the report is included in court documents filed in Washington. It concludes that investigators 'did not find sufficient evidence to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, who leaked this information.' … It narrowed the source to about 30 prosecutors and other Justice Department officials, in Washington and Detroit, all of whom denied leaking the information. The full report also concluded that Convertino was not the source, according to related court documents filed by his attorneys."

Nifong Seeks Recusal From Duke Lacrosse Case. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Whoriskey, Adcock) reports, "After months of stinging criticism about his handling of the Duke University sexual assault investigation, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong sought to bow out of the case yesterday, requesting that the North Carolina Attorney General's Office handle the prosecution." The Post continues, "His decision to recuse himself was welcomed by the defense team representing the three Duke lacrosse players initially accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party. … 'We feel very good about this. It's a fresh set of eyes looking at the case,' said William Cotter of Raleigh, one of three attorneys for Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y. 'We think it's more likely that they will listen to us and we will certainly be cooperative with him or her.'" The Post adds, "The defense believes that another prosecutor would, after reviewing the contradictions of the alleged victim's accounts and the paucity of physical evidence, drop the case. … Attorney General Roy Cooper's office deferred questions about Nifong's action until a news conference scheduled for Saturday."

The Washington Times (1/13, Seper) reports, "Mr. Nifong has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the investigation and was named Dec. 28 in an ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. The complaint accuses him of breaking four rules of professional conduct while speaking to reporters about the investigation. … The complaint said Mr. Nifong made 'extrajudicial statements' to reporters that 'he knew or reasonably should have known would be disseminated ... and would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing' the case. … The veteran prosecutor faces a preliminary state bar hearing on Jan. 24. A trial date has tentatively been scheduled for May 11."

The New York Times (1/13, Wilson, Barstow) reports, "Friday's action marked a stinging professional defeat for Mr. Nifong, who has faced accusations of incompetence, prosecutorial misconduct and ethical violations for his handling of the case. In his letter to Mr. Cooper, Mr. Nifong said the accusations of ethical wrongdoing, which were brought last month by the state bar, presented him with a conflict of interest between defending his own conduct and prosecuting this case. … According to friends, Mr. Nifong's resolve had begun to falter even before the ethics charges were brought against him. … At a court hearing on Dec. 15, a DNA laboratory director admitted that he and Mr. Nifong had deliberately withheld exculpatory information from a report. Mr. Nifong prided himself on integrity, having been a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, yet the laboratory director's testimony and his acknowledgment of the error undercut his reputation. … Things only worsened from there."

The AP (1/13) reports, "What comes next in the troubled prosecution of Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans will likely be determined by the lawyer appointed by State Attorney General Roy Cooper. His office declined to comment Friday night, but a spokeswoman said officials would speak with reporters Saturday. … Under North Carolina law, only a district attorney can formally request a special prosecutor. The request can be made when there are potential conflicts of interest, when a case is particularly complex or when there are other unusual circumstances. … Nifong led the investigation into allegations a 28-year-old student at North Carolina Central University — hired to perform as a stripper — was gang-raped and beaten at a March 13 party thrown by Duke's highly ranked lacrosse team. His frequent interviews with news agencies in the early days of the case generated much scrutiny; at one point, he called the lacrosse team 'a bunch of hooligans.' … But as he started to hand over his evidence to the defense, the case appeared to unravel. Legal experts and observers have said it appears to be based only on the testimony of an accuser who has told wildly different versions of the alleged assault — a shifting story that led Nifong to drop rape charges on Dec. 22. The three players remain charged with sexual offense and kidnapping."

Missing Missouri Boys Found Alive. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/13, Leonard) reported, "A 13-year-old boy who vanished from the gravel road near his home five days ago was found alive Friday about 60 miles away in a suburban St. Louis home, along with a 15-year-old boy missing since 2002, authorities said. Sharp-eyed police and suspicions about a white truck led police to the Kirkwood apartment of Michael Devlin, 41, who has been charged with one count of first-degree kidnapping, Sheriff Gary Toelke said. … Kirkwood city police officers were serving a warrant on an apartment complex when they noticed a white truck matching the description of a vehicle authorities had been searching" for Ben Ownby." The AP noted the Devlin neighbor Rick Butler "said the FBI came to his door Thursday night and showed a picture of Ben, asking if he had seen him." In a story distributed by McClatchy, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/14, Bell) reported, "After police arrested Devlin Friday morning, authorities went to the apartment. The first FBI agent to enter saw a familiar face." Corvington "said Ben Ownby had one question: 'Young Ben was sitting there and looked up … and said, "Are you going to take me home?"' The agent turned to the other youth, who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck."

NBC Nightly News (1/13, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) reported that "the boys' parents expressed joy that the children had been found and said it should give hope to the parents of other missing children." NBC (Kevin Tibbles): "Friday investigators went in and found Ben frightened but unharmed. Also inside a startling discover, another boy. One who had been missing for more than four years." FBI St. Louis SAC Roland Corvington: "The agent looked over at Shawn Hornbeck and asked Shawn to identify himself to which Shawn said yes, I'm Shawn Hornbeck." Tibbles: "Tonight two boys are back where they should be, with their families," although "many are asking how could one of the boys be essentially held captive in plain view less than an hour's drive from where he was kidnapped. Prosecutors say federal charges are likely to be made next week."

The Kansas City Star (1/14, Murphy) reported, "Devlin is scheduled to make his first court appearance this week in Franklin County on a charge of kidnapping Ben Ownby, but other charges are possible, Prosecutor Bob Parks said. Washington County, where Shawn Hornbeck's family lives, has not filed charges. The FBI also may file charges, based on evidence recovered from Devlin's apartment, agent Roland Corvington said at a Saturday news conference." The New York Times (1/14, Gay) also noted Corvington "told reporters that when officers entered the apartment, Ben asked: 'Are you going to take me home?' The boys had no visible injuries." The AP (1/14) reported, "A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said that FBI agents went to Imo's Pizza, where Devlin was a manager, and that the suspect revealed details giving agents probable cause to arrest him and search his apartment. They then found the boys, said the source, who refused to be identified because he was unauthorized to speak publicly about the case."

The New York Times (1/13, McGeehan), ABC World News (1/12, story 7, 0:15, Vargas), the CBS Evening News (1/12, story 2, 2:05, Mitchell also reported on the boys' recovery – and ABC World News (1/13, lead story, 3:30, Burman) reported on Saturday's press conference – but the stories did not mention Corvington or the FBI. Additionally, the story has dominated news coverage on CNN, MSNBC and Fox News since it broke on Friday. However, with the exception of Friday's and Saturday's press conferences – which were carried live by the cable news stations – the reports only mentioned the FBI in passing or not at all.

Hornbeck Apparently Had Access To Computer. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/16, Salter) reports, "While his alleged kidnapper was at work, teenager Shawn Hornbeck apparently had access to a computer, and he -- or someone pretending to be him -- may have put photos of Shawn online and posted a chilling message on a site created by his desperate parents: 'How long are you planning to look for your son?' … Investigators would not comment on the postings, and it was not immediately known if they were, in fact, created by Shawn or by someone trying to taunt his parents. Either way, they add to the long list of clues that no one seemed to pick up on during the 4 1/2 years that the boy was missing. They also deepen the mystery of why Shawn apparently made no attempt to escape or notify authorities." The AP notes, "Lloyd Bailie, Ben's uncle, said on CBS that Ben was talking about the ordeal only with his FBI counselors. 'No one's pushing him at this point to answer these questions,' Bailie said." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/15, Kohler, Sultan) also noted Ownby "was talking only with FBI counselors."

Coworkers Surprised By Allegations Against Devlin. The New York Times (1/16, Saulny) reports that when employees of Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, Mo., "realized that a kidnapping suspect in the area had a vehicle that matched the description of the manager's white pickup truck, they had a few rounds of fun with it," although owner Mike Prosperi noted yesterday, "No one thought it could possibly be him. He was just too nice a guy." The Times notes Devlin "had been at work on Thursday and Friday, not watching over either boy. He even mentioned to Mr. Prosperi that the authorities were bothering him, snooping around his apartment building. Mr. Prosperi said he told Mr. Devlin on Friday morning that he should cooperate, as there must have been some sort of mix-up. But things changed as soon as the Federal Bureau of Investigation showed up to take Mr. Devlin away. … In minutes, Mr. Devlin went from unassuming and good-natured pizza cook to accused mastermind child abductor — and the people who were most surprised were among those who knew him best."

California Man Charged With Acting As Unregistered Yemeni Agent. The Bakersfield Californian (1/13, Logan) reported, "A Bakersfield business owner gave military secrets and equipment to Yemen as an agent of that country, a new indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office alleges." Amen Ahmed Ali "was previously charged with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but he was not previously charged with doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller. Under the new indictment, Ali is charged with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, attempted unlawful export of defense articles, conspiracy to gather, possess and transmit defense information and gathering defense information." The AP (1/14) also reported on the new charges against Ali.

Author Grisham In Real-Life Dispute Over Sleuthing. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Jackman) reports, "He's a lawyer. He's a best-selling author. Now he's The Client. … The Virginia Supreme Court ruled yesterday that John Grisham must face a jury for his actions in a real-life whodunit." The Post continues, "Grisham…lives outside Charlottesville. His son attended the private St. Anne's-Belfield School, where he played baseball for Alan Swanson, the head coach. Grisham and Swanson became friends, according to court papers, and Grisham is on the school's board of trustees. … In 1996, Swanson's wife, Donna Swanson, began receiving harassing anonymous letters, which included allegations that her husband was cheating on her, according to the ruling. Grisham also received an anonymous letter." The Post adds, "In 1998, according to a lawsuit, 'Grisham was intrigued by the idea of trying to "get to the bottom" of who was writing them, and he decided to play amateur detective.' … Grisham and the Swansons targeted another St. Anne's parent, Katharine Almy of Charlottesville, who has three children. … Grisham and the Swansons took the letters to a handwriting expert, who told them that he needed more samples." The Post notes, "Both sides agree that Grisham and Alan Swanson then obtained enrollment and medical release forms from the school filled out by Almy and stamped 'strictly confidential.' They provided the forms to the handwriting expert, who issued a report saying the letters 'possibly' were written by Almy, the lawsuit states. … Grisham provided the expert's report and the letters to the Albemarle County police, and a detective visited Almy. The lawsuit states that she was horrified that she was being investigated and repeatedly denied writing the letters. The detective reportedly told her to stop writing the letters. The lawsuit says that Almy provided handwriting samples to another examiner, who cleared her, and that she passed a polygraph test. … But Almy alleges that she was devastated by the accusations and the investigation. And when she later found out that forms had been taken from school for use in the investigation, she was further humiliated."

Man Sentenced To 65 Years For Killing DC Journalist. The Washington Post (1/13, B5, Cauvin) reports, "The man convicted of delivering the blow last year that killed New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum was sentenced yesterday to spend what will almost certainly be the rest of his life behind bars." The Post continues, "Convicted last fall in D.C. Superior Court of first-degree murder, Percey Jordan, 43, was sentenced to 65 years in prison. … The punishment was handed down yesterday morning in an emotion-filled courtroom, with a prosecutor telling the judge that he should take away Jordan's 'hope,' a defense attorney asking for a measure of mercy and a grieving family grasping for justice. … 'I can't imagine a punishment that would fit this crime,' said a shaken Daniel Rosenbaum, the victim's son." The Post adds, "He was speaking to Judge Erik P. Christian but staring at Jordan, a few feet away. Rosenbaum's hands were trembling, and as he started to walk back to his seat, he paused for a moment and looked at Jordan, whose face betrayed little. … Christian, who presided over Jordan's trial in October, said he hoped that during his imprisonment Jordan would eventually acknowledge what he had done. … Last week, Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to his part in the robbery and was sentenced to 26 years. As part of his plea agreement, Hamlin testified against Jordan. … Despite the prospect of such testimony, Jordan had chosen to go to trial. On Oct. 24, he was convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit robbery and robbery of a senior citizen."

The New York Times (1/13, Abruzzese) reports, "Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, who was sentenced to 26 years for his role in the death, testified that Mr. Jordan had struck the former reporter over the head with a pipe while he took his wallet. Last week, Mr. Hamlin was sentenced after pleading guilty late last year to second-degree murder."

Recording Industry Granted Default Judgment In Piracy Case. The AP (1/13, Press) reports, "Less than a month after the recording industry dropped a music piracy case against a well-known opponent, it has won a default judgment against her 20-year-old daughter." The AP continues, "Judge Stephen C. Robinson of United States District Court ordered the daughter, Michelle Santangelo, to pay $750 for each of the 41 songs she is accused of downloading illegally — a total of $30,750 — because she failed to respond to the record companies' claims. … It was not clear whether the default judgment would end the case. Under federal rules, such judgments are often later set aside so lawsuits can be decided on their merits." The AP adds, "Ms. Santangelo's lawyer, Jordan Glass, said he was not permitted to comment on the judgment, which was returned on Wednesday. He would not elaborate. … Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the Recording Industry Association of America, which is coordinating the thousands of piracy suits filed by the record companies, also declined to comment. … Michelle Santangelo is the oldest of five children of Patricia Santangelo, who became a defendant in the battle against illegal downloading. When the elder Ms. Santangelo, 42, of Wappingers Falls, N.Y., was sued in 2005 by five record companies, she said she had never downloaded music. If her children did, she said, the file-sharing programs, not the parents, should be blamed. … Ms. Santangelo refused to settle with the record companies and took her case to newspapers and national television. She became a heroine to defenders of Internet freedom, who helped raise money for her defense."

FBI Raid Of Chicago Official's Home, Office Turned Up "Suspect" Drugs, Gun. The

Chicago Tribune (1/13, Coen) reports, "Federal documents made public Friday show the scope of the investigation into Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman and indicate the FBI may not be done looking into her connections to street gangs." The Tribune continues, "Evidence logs from searches of Troutman's home and office on Monday also show that agents allegedly found suspected drugs, drug paraphernalia and a handgun. … Earlier this week, authorities charged Troutman with accepting a bribe to smooth the way for a mixed-use development on the South Side. Troutman has denied the accusations." The Tribune adds, "The documents show some of the suspected drugs were recovered in Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue, where the revolver also was found. A 'white powdery substance in Ziploc plastic bag' was found in her office at 5958 S. State St., the documents state, noting it was found in a desk drawer. … FBI spokesman Ross Rice said laboratory testing of the substances was not complete. … Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said he believes that testing will show the powder was a vitamin supplement." The Tribune notes, "Troutman, the 20th Ward alderman, has been under law enforcement scrutiny in the past for her association with Donnell 'Scandalous' Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who has fled to avoid drug conspiracy charges."

WSJournal Reviews Report On Berger Document Theft. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The more we learn about Sandy Berger's brilliant career as a document thief, the clearer it becomes that there is plenty we still don't know and may never learn. … Thanks to Justice's and the Archives' leniency, or laxity, or both, Mr. Berger's plea deal expires in 2008 -- just in time, perhaps, for the next Clinton Administration.

California Challenges US Abortion Amendment. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/13, B-2, Egelko) reports, "A state lawyer urged a judge Friday to head off a collision between California health laws and a federal anti-abortion amendment that could cost the state a ruinous $37 billion in funding if it penalized doctors or hospitals for refusing to perform emergency abortions." The Chronicle continues, "Deputy Attorney General Timothy Muscat argued that the conflict could be avoided if federal laws that require doctors to provide emergency medical care were interpreted to include performing an abortion when necessary to save a woman's life or prevent serious health damage. But a Bush administration lawyer said such an interpretation would be improper. … 'We cannot rewrite a statute,' Justice Department attorney James Gilligan told U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White at a hearing in San Francisco. Gilligan said the legislation that the state is challenging does not require doctors or hospitals to perform abortions, even in emergencies, if they would find the procedures morally offensive." The Chronicle notes, "White heard arguments from opposing lawyers, including those from Christian medical organizations that support the federal amendment, and did not indicate how or when he would rule. … The amendment, part of a spending bill that President Bush signed in December 2004, denies a wide range of federal funding to states that discriminate against any health provider, health maintenance organization or insurer that does not offer abortions or abortion referrals. … California was the only state to challenge the amendment."

Federal Currency Policies Challenged By Advocates For The Blind. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (1/13, Farmer) reports, "Judith Vido has signed an online petition protesting the Bush administration's decision to oppose a court-ordered redesign of the nation's currency to help the blind. … A blogger and author, Vido was the 640th person to do so this week. As of yesterday, more than 3,600 names appeared on the petition, which can be found at www.petitiononline.com/mfaacp/petition.html." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Blinded as a teen because of complications from diabetes, she uses her computer with the aid of screen-reading technology for her writing, which includes books of several genres, including romance. … 'The judge has said this is violation of our civil rights. I happen to agree.' Vido, of Richmond, said. 'I have problems when my partner isn't here and I grab money from my savings. I can't always identify it. Yes, I keep certain amounts in my wallet that I fold. But I don't always know what I have.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "The administration's appeal seeks to overturn a ruling in November by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who ordered the Department of the Treasury to find ways for the blind to recognize the different denominations of currency. Robertson noted that of 180 nations printing paper currency, only the United States makes no effort to make it discernable without vision. … Justice Department lawyers filed the appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on behalf of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson last month. … Robertson had ruled in a lawsuit brought by the American Council of the Blind. The council proposed several options for changes, including printing different size bills or changing the texture by adding embossed dots or foil."

Navy Halts Lockheed Contract. The Washington Post (1/13, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "The Navy yesterday ordered Lockheed Martin to stop work on a $260 million ship after the company warned of a significant cost increase that has also spurred the service to reconsider the way it purchases the vessels. The unusual order, which lasts 90 days, is a blow to Lockheed and is among a series of cost overruns in Navy shipbuilding programs."

Alabama Commissioner To Keep Seat Pending Appeal Of DOJ Ruling. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/13, Amy) reports, "A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery agreed to give the state time to appeal a U.S. Justice Department ruling that says Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Chastang was invalid. … 'The state of Alabama is allowed additional time to seek timely reconsideration of the decision,' wrote Judges Stanley Marcus, Myron Thompson and Harold Albritton in an order filed Thursday." The Press-Register continues, "Plaintiffs in the court case, which ultimately led to the Justice Department ruling, had asked the court this week to set an election within 90 days. Chastang, a black Republican, has said he would run in the election, though the majority-black district has historically elected Democrats. … But campaigning will be on hold. The court told Riley to file his request for reconsideration with the Justice Department, and to check in on the first day of every month, starting in February, with a status update. … Keith Miller, Alabama's chief deputy attorney general, said he expected the request to be filed in 'days, not weeks.'" The Press-Register adds, "Cecil Gardner, the lawyer for Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark, three Democrats who filed the case to force an election, said he had no objection to the order. He did say he planned to file a motion next week asking the court to order the state to file within 10 days, to prevent any delays meant to extend Chastang's time in office. … The Justice Department ruling, issued Monday, would essentially void an earlier 1988 state Supreme Court decision that said governors should appoint replacement commissioners when a vacancy occurs between elections."

Delta Pilots Oppose Takeover By US Airways. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/13, Grantham) reports, "Delta Air Lines' pilots union is devoting $15 million to the fight against US Airways' hostile buyout bid and temporarily moving leaders to Washington so they can lobby politicians and investors." The AJC continues, "Union leaders were already in Washington this week plotting strategy and buttonholing politicians when US Airways upped its offer for Delta by $1.7 billion, to about $10.3 billion. … Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association unit, said in a letter to pilots that the merger poses a 'clear and present danger to the careers of all Delta employees.' … He said the fattened offer would add more debt to the merged airline and that it raises questions about US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker's credibility. … 'Two weeks ago, Parker definitively stated that he had no intention of increasing his offer. [Wednesday], he increased his offer, while at the same time reaffirming his "plan" for no "frontline" employee furloughs,' Moak wrote. … 'But on the same day, Parker's No. 2 man was openly discussing additional divestitures beyond those originally disclosed to quell antitrust concerns that US Airways claims don't exist in the first place. With divestitures come job losses. Make no mistake — Parker's plan will result in thousands of job losses regardless of Parker's empty promises,' Moak wrote." The AJC notes, "Industry experts say the battle for Delta is likely to escalate in the wake of US Airways' sweetened bid. US Airways has given Delta's bankruptcy court creditors a Feb. 1 deadline to indicate support. … Delta management opposes the US Airways bid, but the creditors, who will hold substantial equity in Delta when it emerges from Chapter 11, could force it to pursue the deal."

Bid Deadline For Tribune Nears With Few Apparent Suitors. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Ellison) reports, "Wednesday night, as the final deadline for bids for Tribune Co. arrives, the company could be throwing the first large-cap media party that nobody shows up for." The Journal continues, "While a few private-equity firms are likely to band together in a half-hearted bid for the media group, compared with the spirited competitions for such properties as Clear Channel Communications Inc. and Univision, Tribune's sale process has generated mostly shrugs from the private-equity world. And there isn't a McClatchy-like suitor either, as there was with the sale of Knight Ridder last year. … Instead, most of the attention lavished on Tribune has come from so-called vanity buyers, such as David Geffen and Ron Burkle, who are interested in the Los Angeles Times. … But Tribune, like many other newspaper firms, is saddled with tax issues that make selling itself in pieces prohibitively expensive for would-be buyers. Tribune's last and best hopes may lie with its own major shareholders: either a bid from the Chandler family, the company's largest shareholder and the one that, ironically, triggered the whole public auction process; or a management-led buyout aided by its own McCormick Tribune foundation, the management-controlled charity that is the company's second-largest shareholder." The Journal adds, "If Tribune ends up without a good bid for the entire company, it will be back where it started more than seven months ago: with a lagging stock price, disgruntled investors and no certain path for how to solve its overarching strategic problems. Oddly, that could be a partial vindication of Tribune management."

Dolans Sweeten Bid For Cablevision. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Grant, Berman) reports, "A potential showdown over the fate of Cablevision Systems Corp. stands to test the limits of how well board directors and shareholders can organize to fight a 'take private' plan offered by controlling shareholders of a public company." The Journal continues, "On Friday, Cablevision's controlling Dolan family increased by about $1 billion to $8.9 billion its privatization offer first made in October. Such increases are usually part of a friendly back-and-forth negotiation between big shareholders and independent board members representing public owners. … But judging from the combative tone of the Dolans' news release, fissures have developed between the two sides, which left in doubt whether the Dolans would prevail." The Journal adds, "The family declared its most recent offer 'best and final' and noted that the length of negotiations was creating potentially harmful uncertainty to the company. The family also imposed a deadline on the process, saying that its offer would expire by close of business Wednesday, according to a letter sent to a special committee of directors by Cablevision founder Charles Dolan and his son, James Dolan, the company's chief executive. … The Dolans noted their increased offer of $30 a share represents an 11.1% increase over their $27 offer in October and a 23.7% premium to what the cable operator's 52-week high was at that time. The Dolans also added a few sweeteners that indicate the committee, consisting of two independent directors, may be balking on the price. The family has agreed to put the deal to a majority vote of public shareholders, which would exclude the Dolans who own 20% of the company but control 70.4% of the voting shares."

Mexico Worried About Tortilla Price-Fixing. The AP (1/13, Orsi) reports, "Soaring international demand for corn has caused a spike in prices for Mexico's humble tortilla, hitting the poor and forcing President Felipe Calderon's business-friendly government into an uncomfortable confrontation with powerful monopolies." The AP continues, "Tortilla prices jumped nearly 14 percent during the past year, a move Mexico's Central Bank Gov. Guillermo Ortiz called 'unjustifiable' in a country where inflation ran about 4 percent. Ortiz pinned the blame on companies' monopolizing the market and blocking competition. … 'We clearly have a problem of speculation,' he said." The AP adds, "Economists also blame increased U.S. production of ethanol from corn as an alternative to oil. The battle over the tortilla, the most basic staple of the Mexican diet especially among the poor, demonstrates how increasing economic integration is felt on the street level. … 'This is direct evidence of the way globalization is affecting all walks of life in Mexico and all over the world,' said David Barkin, an economics professor at the Xochimilco campus of the Autonomous Metropolitan University in Mexico City. … The federal government's antitrust watchdog announced this week it was investigating allegations companies were manipulating corn prices and making deals to limit the supply of corn to boost prices of tortillas."

New Forest Service Chief Chosen. The New York Times/AP (1/13, Press) reports Montana forester Gail Kimbell "was named the new chief of the United States Forest Service." Kimbell "has been a top official at the Forest Service, helping President Bush develop the 'healthy forests' program that lets companies log large, commercially valuable trees in national forests in exchange for clearing smaller trees and brush. Environmentalists called it a giveaway to logging companies that supported Mr. Bush."

WPost Welcomes EPA Admission On Chesapeake Bay Pollution. The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K) editorializes, "A recent admission by an Environmental Protection Agency official that the Chesapeake Bay is not getting cleaner fast enough is as obvious as it is late. 'If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two,' EPA administrator Rich Batiuk told a meeting of an advisory group on the bay's health last week. To that, Roy Hoagland of the nonprofit Chesapeake Bay Foundation responded with a resounding 'duh.' … As 2007 begins, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the federal government must resolve to more aggressively pursue pollution reduction targets. … If Democrats in Congress are serious about proposals to retool farm legislation to subsidize rural conservation, they must remember the Chesapeake watershed when drafting their farm bill.

Former Crow Tribal Official Acquitted Of Lying About Finances. The AP (1/13) reports, "A former Crow tribal official has been acquitted of charges that he lied to the U.S. Department of Justice about his finances, to avoid paying restitution owed the tribe for criminal activity in the 1990s." The AP continues, "A federal jury Friday acquitted Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., indicted on three counts of false statements. The indictment alleged that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution. … 'I'm absolutely relieved,' Hogan said after the acquittal. 'There is justice in Montana.'" The AP adds, "Hogan was the Crow Indian Tribe's secretary in the 1970s and 1980s. … In the 1990s he was convicted in a corruption scandal while executive director of the Crow Tribal Housing Authority, and received a prison sentence of two years. U.S. District Judge Jack Shanstrom also ordered $35,100 in restitution to the tribe, which Hogan finished paying last February. The indictment alleging false statements was filed two months later. … In the case decided Friday, prosecutors charged Hogan claimed he had few or no assets, yet received money from investors and gave money to relatives and tribal officials. Prosecutors said Hogan's offenses included failing to report his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Deal Would Allow Army To Keep DEA Supplied With Helicopters In Bahamas. The AP (1/13, Anderson) reports, "Army air support would continue for U.S.-Bahamas drug interdiction efforts even after the Pentagon withdraws its Blackhawk helicopters later this year under an agreement announced Friday by U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson." The AP continues, "Nelson, D-Fla., said the Army has offered to give the Drug Enforcement Administration three Sikorsky S-76 helicopters by 2008 to replace the Blackhawks and spend $3.4 million a year for the next five years to maintain the "Hawk's Nest" helicopter base in the Bahamas. … 'This will keep cocaine and marijuana smugglers from operating off Florida's coast,' said Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. 'With the Army's continued support, the U.S.-Bahamas antidrug effort will remain fully operational.'" The AP adds, "The announcement came as Nelson departed Friday on a two-day trip that includes stops in Haiti and a flight with the DEA over the Bahamas. … Nelson was among several members of Congress and the Bush administration who raised objections to a proposal last year by then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld to redeploy the seven Bahamas Blackhawks because of war needs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who oversees the DEA, was among those questioning the move."

Columnist Contrasts War On Drugs With War In Iraq. New York Times guest columnist Orlando Patterson (1/13) writes, "America's unwillingness to recognize the socioeconomic context of the drug crisis at home and abroad, to see that being surrounded by failing states threatens its security, to provide aid where it is most effective, and to acknowledge that the root cause of this hemispheric disaster is not supply but its own citizens' insatiable demand for illicit drugs, is as incomprehensible as the quagmire in Iraq."

IMMIGRATION:

Snow Defends White House Stance On Border Guard Shooting Case. The Washington Times (1/13, Dinan, 88K) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "said the case of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are seeking a pardon for having shot a fleeing suspected drug dealer has been mischaracterized and the agents violated regulations." Snow "said there has been 'a characterization that somehow the government is turning a blind eye toward the law in enforcing the law,' but said the facts of the case show the two agents broke the law. Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation. Border Patrol advocates say the punishment is too harsh."

Federal Judge Probes Colorado ICE Raid. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports John L. Kane of Federal District Court in Denver "demanded that immigration officials disclose the whereabouts of 265 people arrested in a meatpacking-plant raid last month. The judge…gave Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials until Jan. 22 to submit a list accounting for all the detainees, including those who have been deported. Union lawyers are contesting the arrests at the Swift & Company meat processing plant in Greeley, one of six Swift plants in six states that were raided on Dec. 13." The Denver Post (1/13, 256K) reports Kane "said any workers who signed agreements to voluntarily return to their home countries now must be allowed to withdraw that agreement if they wish. … United Food and Commercial Workers union attorneys had filed a petition contending that arrests in the raids violated workers' constitutional due process rights. Immigration officials deny that."

TAX:

Pence Alleges Administration Planning To Raise Payroll Taxes. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M) Rep. Mike Pence writes, "The administration hasn't learned from last year. Despite electoral defeats, it is still advancing Social Security reform as an argument over solvency. The centerpiece of George Bush's plan was to have been personal retirement accounts for workers who wanted to establish their own nest egg -- a much better deal for them and a down payment on the huge liabilities owed by the entire system. Unfortunately, his plan faltered. … While Mr. Bush has reiterated his opposition to tax increases, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has repeatedly said that everything is on the table for negotiations with the Democratic Congress. When Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the White House was ruling out a tax increase in Social Security reform, he replied, 'No, I'm not.' … Raising payroll taxes would prove devastating to working Americans, small business and the economy as a whole. Worse, it would only serve as a short-term band-aid to Social Security's financial woes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Drug Benefit Change Opposed By Bush. The Washington Post (1/13, A2, Lee, 690K) reports the House voted 255-170 "to require the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." However, "the measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate, a veto threat from President Bush, and considerable doubts from experts about whether it would save elderly and disabled Americans much money." The bill would overturn "a provision of the 2003 law pushed through by a Republican-controlled Congress that left drug-price negotiations under the new Medicare drug benefit to the private insurers that offer government-subsidized drug plans for seniors in each state. Backers of the current system, mainly Republicans, say it pits insurers against one another in a healthy competition to negotiate the lowest prices from drugmakers and offer seniors the most attractive monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies. But critics, mainly Democrats, say the system is a boon to drug companies because it prohibits the government …from using its bargaining muscle on behalf of seniors."

The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 9, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) said, "It was the latest item on the Democrats' first 100 hour agenda of legislation. Prospects for Senate approval, however, are not healthy." The New York Times (1/13, Pear, 1.16M) reports "the measure is unlikely to become law in its current form," though "some version, focusing on certain types of very expensive drugs, has bipartisan support in the Senate." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it." According to the Times, Democrats, "who like to portray Republicans as a tool of special interests, said a veto would hand them an issue that could be used to good effect in the 2008 elections."

The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Neuman, 850K) reports, "Although the bill is unlikely to become law, it is likely to help shape the debate that could result in a more limited measure that allows some dickering between the government and the pharmaceutical industry over drug costs. … At the least, the House bill signals a shift in Washington from President Bush's view that private enterprise and individual citizens should play the most prominent role in the decisions that determine healthcare costs."

Drug Industry Plans Response. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "Following a lobbying and advertising blitz by drug companies to block the Democratic attacks, health insurers are preparing their own counterattack. America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry's Washington-based trade group, is telling lawmakers that cuts in insurer subsidies would be tantamount to cuts in benefits for constituents, and it has readied maps to show the growth of Medicare Advantage plans throughout the country, compared to relatively sparse numbers before government payments increased. It will tap the Coalition for Medicare Choices, a group for Medicare Advantage beneficiaries that AHIP started and funds, to bring satisfied customers to Congress. And AHIP will highlight research showing that a large portion of Medicare Advantage beneficiaries are minorities or have low incomes -- populations shown to suffer disproportionately from chronic health problems that plans say they can manage better than the government."

WPost Calls' Democrats' Measure "Misguided." The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes that the measure "is misguided. … The Congressional Budget Office estimated this week that savings from direct negotiation would be 'negligible.' Not only are the Democrats too optimistic about government negotiation; they are also too pessimistic about the current system in which private insurers administering Medicare drug benefits do the price bargaining."

In Reversal, Reid Backs Earmark Disclosure Bill. The New York Times (1/13, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "Senate Democratic leaders on Friday embraced a proposal to shed light on the murky practice of Congressional earmarks, reversing themselves after trying to block an almost identical measure the day before. The Democrats' switch makes it likely that the Senate will follow the new House rules requiring the disclosure of the sponsor as well as the cost and the purpose of any earmark. … The reversal follows a White House statement of support for the measure and a day of news coverage noting that Senate Democrats were opposing a rule that their House counterparts had just adopted a week ago." Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he had come around to the measure after some adjustments that he said had strengthened it."

Senate Bars Convicted Former Members From Receiving Pensions. The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "voted unanimously to bar congressional lawmakers convicted of corruption from collecting federal pensions. … The pension measure, an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill…applies to current and future lawmakers convicted of bribery, conspiracy and perjury charges. It passed 87-0." Democrats "lauded yesterday's vote as a victory over the 'culture of corruption' they say permeated Congress under Republican rule. They regularly cited former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, California Republican, who was convicted of bribery in 2005. The measure, however, is not retroactive, so Cunningham will receive his $64,000 pension annually as will at least 16 other convicted lawmakers, 12 Democrats and four Republicans."

The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Simon, 850K) reports, "Federal employees in all branches of government forfeit their pensions if convicted of 'crimes against the United States,' such as treason. 'The best way to restore and rebuild the trust of the American people is to ensure that we stand firmly against members of Congress who betray the public trust,' said Sen. John F. Kerry." CNN.com (1/12) notes House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer "said Friday that the House will take up a similar bill next Friday."

Senate To Vote On Eliminating Some Oil Industry Subsidies. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "Big Oil is set to take a beating from House Democrats on Thursday when they are prepared to vote on a bill they say will 'roll back' about $13 billion worth of subsidies the executive branch and Congress have given oil companies. … The House Democrats' package includes three major items. One will impose a 'conservation fee' on about 40 companies producing oil in the Gulf of Mexico that have leases from 1998 and 1999 and which failed to include a clause requiring royalty payments if oil prices rose, which they have. The omission was caused by an Interior Department error, but if the companies don't pay the fee, the proposal would bar them from getting new leases. Democrats will also reduce accelerated tax write-offs for oil- and gas-exploration expenses, and shrink a tax-depreciation measure, contained in a 2004 jobs bill, that gives companies producing oil and gas in the U.S. the equivalent of a 1% corporate-tax reduction. The Washington Post (1/13, D5, Mufson, 690K) reports Natural Resources Committee Chairman Nick Rahall and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel "introduced the bill, which trims breaks for geological work and excludes oil and gas from a 2004 measure that would effectively reduce their tax rate to 32 percent, from 35 percent."

The New York Times (1/13, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the oil industry "angrily denounced an effort by House Democratic leaders Friday that would repeal billions of dollars worth of incentives and plow the money into renewable energy projects. … The giant integrated oil companies, like Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have been more resigned about losing some of their tax breaks but are quietly resisting pressure to renegotiate leases that allow them to pump billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from publicly owned waters without paying royalties to the government. … A few oil giants, including BP and Shell, agreed to give up the loopholes. But industry executives said one big player in the gulf, Exxon Mobil, has refused to renegotiate, arguing that it signed the leases in good faith. Chevron, which with several partners recently announced the discovery of a giant oil field that may include two of the flawed leases, said it had submitted a 'reasonable' proposal but had not reached an accord."

GOP Pushes Pelosi To Include American Samoa In Minimum Wage Bill. The Washington Post (1/13, A2, Weisman, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, "dogged by Republican charges of a double standard, said yesterday that American Samoa may join the Northern Mariana Islands as U.S. territories that would have to comply with a higher federal minimum wage. … The bill would leave American Samoa as the only territory not covered by the $7.25 rate, and because Samoa is represented by a Democrat, Del. Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, Republicans cried foul. Faleomavaega's campaign coffers have been well stocked by the tuna industry that dominates his island economy, but Republicans picked up on another issue: StarKist owns one of the largest canneries on the island, and Del Monte Foods, StarKist's parent company, is based in San Francisco, which Pelosi represents." The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Hurt, 88K) reports the decision "follows criticism over the exemption, reported earlier this week by The Washington Times, to allow tuna canneries in American Samoa to continue paying $3.26 an hour."

House Democrats Unveil College Loan Rate Cut Proposal. The New York Times (1/13, Schemo, 1.16M) reports that yesterday House Democrats "unveiled a bill that would cut interest rates on federally subsidized loans to college students by half over the next five years. They said they would finance the $6 billion measure by increasing costs that lenders pay to the government and reducing the largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits." According to the Times, the bill "underscores the Democrats' all-out effort to consolidate gains made in November among middle-class voters. … The measure is expected to pass in the House, where it is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday. Its future in the Senate is less certain."

Pelosi Using "100-Hour-Clock" Selectively. The AP (1/12, Hunt) reports, " The clock is ticking for House Democrats, but it's hard to tell what time it is. On Friday, for example, the House was in session for a little more than eight hours. Only five of them, however, ticked off on new Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for quickly passing a six-bill agenda that Democrats promised voters last fall." With passage of the Medicare prescription drug bill, Pelosi "is two-thirds of the way done -- in under a quarter of the allotted hours, according to her count. That's because just as the official clock for a basketball or football game stops for time-outs and commercial breaks, Democrats aren't counting the minutes spent on business unrelated to those six designated bills." The New York Times (1/13, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Republicans "retaliated with their own online clock on Wednesday. They are counting down the hours passed by 'a Democrat caucus fresh out of ideas.' … By the end of the day Friday, the Democratic clock read 23 hours and 34 minutes, while the Republican clock, which was counting down from 100, read 75 hours."

Doolittle Will No Longer Employ Wife As Fundraiser. The Washington Post (1/13, A5, 690K) is one of several major newspapers to run an AP report on Rep. John Doolittle's announcement that he "will no longer employ his wife as his campaign fundraiser, an arrangement that allowed her to collect a 15 percent cut of donations to his campaign and political action committees -- more than $100,000 since 2003." Doolittle," who has drawn criticism for links to disgraced lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff, said he will hire an outside fundraiser."

Cheney In "Twilight" Of Career, But Still Influential With Bush. The AP (1/13, Raum) writes that while "the hardline conservatives like Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Bolton who stood shoulder to shoulder with Vice President Dick Cheney in pushing President Bush's decision to invade Iraq have left the administration," Cheney himself, though "in the twilight days of his political career," is "still there, with little evidence that his influence with Bush has waned." Cheney, who was "once viewed as adding an air of gravitas to an inexperienced president," is now "seen by many Americans as a driving force behind Bush's most divisive initiatives: the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program, harsh detention and interrogation policies and an aggressive push for expanded executive authority. Bad as Bush's poll numbers are, Cheney's are worse. And while he's still beloved by conservatives, it seems unlikely he will be a big draw on the 2008 campaign circuit."

Libby Trial Could Provide "Ammunition For Democrats." Bloomberg (1/12, O'Reilly, Rosenkrantz) reports that the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby "may provide ammunition for Democrats looking to attack the White House for its conduct in the run-up to the Iraq war." Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff "faces as many as 30 years in prison" if convicted of perjury and obstruction "for lying to a grand jury probing the leak of a CIA agent's name." His trial starts Tuesday, and defense lawyers "say they'll call Cheney as a witness to bolster claims Libby was too busy with security matters to accurately remember events. His testifying is risky for both men. What Cheney recalls may undermine Libby's too-busy defense while exposing the vice president to probes by Congress of how the Bush administration promoted the war." The Times of London (1/13, Reid) headlines a report, "Cheney Is Forced To Testify In Case Of The Crime That Never Was."

Some SMU Professors Oppose Hosting Of Bush Library. The AP (1/13, Brown) reports, "Negotiations to build George W. Bush's presidential library at Southern Methodist University have divided the campus, pitting the administration and some alumni against liberal-leaning faculty members who say the project would be an embarrassment to the school." Some professors say the "combined library, museum and think tank would celebrate a presidency that unnecessarily took the country into a war." But SMU officials "said the project is unlikely to be derailed by the faculty opposition, and said the professors opposed to it are in the minority."

NCLB Teacher Training Provisions Said To Be Subjective. The Washington Post (1/13, Chandler, 690K), in a front-page article titled "For Teachers, Being 'Highly Qualified' Is A Subjective Matter," reports the No Child Left Behind law "called for states to ensure that all teachers in core academic subjects are 'highly qualified' to help students succeed -- an unprecedented mandate that has delivered less than promised. The law, which turned five years old this week, has held schools to increasingly higher standards for student achievement. For teachers, however, standards meant to guarantee that they know their subjects are often vague and open to broad interpretation. Legal loopholes and uneven implementation by states and the U.S. Department of Education have diluted the law's impact on the teaching workforce, some education experts say. They say that meeting the standards of quality is more about shuffling paper than achieving two vital goals: ensuring that teachers are prepared to help students succeed and reducing the teacher talent gap between rich and poor schools. … This week, senior Democratic lawmakers discussed an extension of No Child Left Behind with President Bush. In the coming congressional debate over the law, teacher quality is likely to be a key issue. Some experts favor shifting the emphasis from 'highly qualified' to 'highly effective' teachers, requiring states to look not just at credentials but how well individual teachers help students learn and perform on tests."

SCOTUS Adds Death Penalty, Tobacco Cases. The Washington Post (1/13, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports the Supreme Court "added four cases to its docket for the current term yesterday, including a review of a judge's decision to dismiss a potential juror from a death-penalty case because of the man's equivocal statements about capital punishment. A federal appeals court overturned the trial judge's ruling in a rape and murder trial in the state of Washington. One of the issues in the case is whether federal courts should defer to a trial judge who is in a position to actually talk to and observe a potential juror in making the decision about his ability to carry out the law. … Among the cases justices said yesterday that they will decide is a question of whether a cigarette manufacturer can move a lawsuit against it to federal jurisdiction and out of the state courts, where judgments against tobacco companies have been mounting." The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Savage, 850K) reports the capital punishment case "will be the fourth case before the justices this term in which the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit had reversed a murder conviction or a death sentence. In all four, state prosecutors appealed to the high court, arguing the judges of the appeals court had overstepped their authority and wrongly second-guessed a state court's decision."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Hits Another Record-High Close. The New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) reports, "Wall Street rebounded from an early loss yesterday to send the Dow Jones industrial average to its second consecutive record close as investors embraced robust economic data and shrugged off several profit warnings." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "jumped 41.10 points, or 0.33 percent, to 12,556.08. It was the index's 24th record close since the start of October." The S&P 500 "climbed 6.91 points, or 0.49 percent, to 1,430.73," while the Nasdaq "increased 17.97 points, or 0.72 percent, to 2,502.82." NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) also had the numbers.

Dollar Ends Advance, But Analysts Expect Gains To Resume. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B5, Lindenmayer, 2.04M) says the dollar "ended its three-day advance Friday, largely shrugging off a series of positive data releases. But analysts say they expect the currency to post further gains this coming week as the market focuses on renewed optimism about the state of the U.S. economy. … In late-afternoon trading in New York, the euro stood at $1.2919 from $1.2894 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 120.37 yen from 120.50 yen late Thursday."

Holiday Shopping Season Was Stronger Than Expected. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A3, Gerena-Morales, Hudson, 2.04M) reports, "As it turned out, shoppers spent more freely during the just-ended holiday season than had been thought, helping some retailers end the year on strong footing and suggesting that economic growth could be rebounding faster than expected. Retail sales jumped 0.9% in December from the month before, to a seasonally adjusted $369.9 billion, the Commerce Department said Friday. December's growth was up from a gain of 0.6% in November and was the strongest rate of growth in retail sales since July. When compared to December a year ago, retail sales were up 5.4% compared with December-to-December growth of 5.7% in 2005." The Financial Times (1/13, Callan) says the "steady rise suggests consumer spending helped support economic growth in the last quarter of the year, offsetting a sharp correction in the housing sector and weakness in manufacturing." The Washington Post (1/13, D1, Mui, 690K) and the AP (1/12, Crutsinger) also report on the strong numbers.

CNN To Host First Two Presidential Debates In Early April. CNN.com (1/12, Preston) reports the New Hampshire Union Leader and WMUR-TV of Manchester "will partner with CNN to host two presidential debates in April, executives with the three media companies announced Friday." CNN's Wolf Blitzer will moderate the April 4 and 5 debates, which "will be televised live nationally on CNN." On CNN's The Situation Room (1/12), Blitzer called it "an unprecedented early kick-off to a wide open race for the White House." On the same show, Blitzer asked Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, "How important is it for presidential hopefuls to show up at these early debates?" Dean replied, "I think it's important. I think you'll see people doing it, too. We went through about 27 of them four years, ago and the reason is, if four or five people say yes, then you really have to not miss the opportunity."

Democrats Look To West As They Assemble Electoral Vote Strategy For 2008. Under the headline "West Is Going In Democrats' Direction," the Washington Post (1/13, A4, Reid, 690K) recalls that "when the major political parties gathered for their national conventions in 2004, Colorado had a Republican governor, a Republican-controlled legislature and a Republican edge of 5 to 2 in the state's congressional delegation. Today, Colorado's governor is a Democrat. The Democrats control both houses of the legislature. Four of the seven congressional seats are held by Democrats. That transformation, mirrored in varying degrees across the Rocky Mountain West, is a key reason the Democratic Party decided this week to hold its 2008 nomination convention in Denver." As Democratic leaders "ponder how they can regain the White House in the next election, the region looks more and more essential to an electoral-vote victory."

McCain's Presidential Hopes Could Hinge On Success Of Bush Iraq Strategy. In a front page story, the Washington Post (1/13, Balz, Murray, 690K) looks at how Sen. John McCain's support of President Bush on Iraq is impacting McCain's likely presidential campaign. The piece begins by saying, "There is no mistaking the anguish" of McCain. "Sitting in his Senate office, he is uncharacteristically subdued, his voice at times almost inaudible." While the White House "finally embraced his long-standing call to send more troops to Iraq, McCain believes the way it has handled the war 'will go down as one of the worst' mistakes in the history of the American military. 'One of the most frustrating things that's ever happened in my political life,' he said, 'is watching this train wreck.'" The Post says "no politician in the United States is more clearly identified" with Bush's surge strategy than the "all but announced presidential candidate," and "no politician has more to lose if it fails. Democratic opponents have already coined a name for the troop 'surge': the McCain Doctrine. … On the night of Bush's speech, he told CNN's Larry King: 'I would much rather lose an election than lose a war.' The risk now is that both could be lost."

Dean Says McCain "Sounds Very Much Like Richard Nixon" On Iraq. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/12), Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said of McCain, "He sounds very much like Richard Nixon, you know, 'just stay a little longer, stay a little longer.' We'll stay long enough to lose another 5,000 or 10,000 people. It still won't change anything. We never should have gone there in the first place."

Tancredo Says There Is A "Distinct Possibility" He Will Run For President. Cox Newspapers (1/13, Moscoso) reports Rep. Tom Tancredo "hinted Friday that he is ready to pursue the Oval Office. When asked whether he plans to take action to start an official bid for the GOP nomination he said, 'That is a distinct possibility.'"

GOP Hopefuls Hunter, Paul Create Presidential Exploratory Committees. CNN's The Situation Room (1/12, Blitzer) reported, "Rep. Duncan Hunter today formally filed papers to form his presidential exploratory committee. The California Republican took the first step toward a White House bid more than two months ago, after he originally announced he was making preparations to run. Now he is exploring. A Republican congressman from Texas took his first step today toward a longshot bid for the White House. A spokesman says Rep. Ron Paul formed a presidential exploratory committee today as well. Paul was the Libertarian Party nominee for president back in 1988."

Richardson Plans Announcement On 2008 By End Of Month. Asked on Fox News' Your World (1/12, Cavuto) if he is running for president, Gov. Bill Richardson said, "I will let you know this month." Pressed for a date, Richardson said, "Well, it will be in January."

Edwards To Speak At Harlem Church Sunday. CNN's The Situation Room (1/12, Blitzer) reported, "Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards is preparing to step on to the turf of a potential rival, Sen. Hillary Clinton." Edwards "will deliver a sermon at a Harlem church on Sunday pegged to the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday."

Allard To Stay Silent On Reelection Plans For Now. The Denver Post (1/13, Mulkern, 256K) reports Sen. Wayne Allard "has made up his mind about whether he will seek a third term in 2008, but he's keeping his decision secret a bit longer." Spokesman Steve Wymer said only Allard and his wife know his plans, and Allard "has not said when he will announce his choice."

Frank To Subject Bernanke To Additional Hearing. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, lp, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "is likely to get far more scrutiny than usual" next month when he testifies before Congress." The Journal notes, "Ordinarily, each installment lasts two days, one before the Senate Banking Committee, the other before the House Financial Services Committee. There are no other witnesses. In a break with that tradition, Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who took over the House panel this month, said he plans to hold an additional day of hearings in which witnesses, such as economists and labor experts, will give their views on what Mr. Bernanke said."

Interest Group Coalition To Challenge Schwarzenegger Over Healthcare Proposal. The Wall Street Journal's "Hot Topic" feature (1/13, A11, Timiraos) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "proposed a far-reaching $12 billion plan mandating health insurance for all 36 million residents of the nation's most-populous state. Under the plan, California would require all individuals to purchase health insurance or face tax penalties. California has more uninsured residents than any other state, and the plan could prompt others to follow suit." The Journal notes, "The state is bound to face challenges from the powerful lobbies -- doctors, hospitals, insurers and employers -- that would share the plan costs."

WSJournal Alleges Schwarzenegger Has Flip-Flopped On Healthcare. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M) editorializes, "Schwarzenegger once extolled 'the power of the market' in Milton Friedman's 'Free to Choose' PBS series. So it's probably just as well that the late, great economist won't see the regulated mess that his admirer is proposing to make of California's health insurance market. As speaker of the state assembly Fabian Nunes remarked, 'This is a plan assembly Democrats could have written.' In fact, they already have -- in 2003, when Democrat Gray Davis was Governor. Candidate Schwarzenegger campaigned against that measure, which was less onerous than his own new proposal mandating that business provide health insurance to all employees."

Programs Allowing Americans To "Host" Eastern Bloc Orphans Prove Controversial. The New York Times (1/13, A1, Gross, 1.16M) reports, "Hosting programs...showcase older children, generally from orphanages in former Soviet bloc nations. The programs have long been hailed as an effective marketing tool by adoption experts. … In the largely unregulated world of international adoptions, these programs often lead to happily-ever-after, but sometimes end painfully. Ukraine and Russia place formidable obstacles in the path of parents."

Ford's Views Of Presidential Peers Revealed. The Washington Post (1/13, A8, 690K) is one of several major newspapers running an AP report on "25 years of interviews with his hometown paper that could be released only after his death" in which late President Gerald Ford "expressed mixed opinions of Jimmy Carter, once calling him a 'disaster,' and said that Ronald Reagan received far too much credit for ending the Cold War." Ford "contended that his own negotiation of the Helsinki accords on human rights did more to win the Cold War than Reagan's military buildup. The best president of his lifetime, Ford said, was a more moderate Republican: Dwight D. Eisenhower." Ford "considered John F. Kennedy overrated and Bill Clinton average. He admired George H.W. Bush's handling of the Persian Gulf War."

Rice Said To Face "Skepticism" During Middle East Trip. AFP (1/13) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "headed for the Middle East on Friday to rally Arab support for a new US strategy in the Iraq war and to counter Iran's alleged interference in Iraq. The week-long tour also will seek to bolster efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with Rice scheduled to hold talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories" today and tomorrow. She "will then travel to Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain before returning to Washington on January 19." Rice "told lawmakers in Congress her trip 'will focus heavily on rallying the support of those responsible Arab states to support the government of Iraq, to support what needs to be done there, to support, of course, also Lebanon and the moderate Palestinians.'"

Under the headline, "Scepticism Awaits Rice On Tour," the Financial Times (1/13, Khalaf) notes, "Facing a barrage of opposition at home over the new Iraq policy, [Rice] takes the White House's case to the Middle East this weekend to try to drum up regional support. But there too she is likely to find plenty of scepticism that deploying another 20,000 troops mostly in Baghdad can bring an end to the raging sectarian conflict."

Russian, Chinese Vetoes Kill UN Security Council Burma Resolution. The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Lynch, 690K) notes Moscow and Beijing "jointly vetoed a U.S.-sponsored resolution criticizing Burma's human rights record, striking a blow to the Bush administration's year-long campaign to use the [UNSC][to spotlight the repressive rule of Burma's military junta." The Post says the vetoes are "part of a broader diplomatic effort by Beijing and Moscow to prevent the United States and its Western allies from using the 15-nation council to censure some of the countries particularly known for rights abuses, including governments in Belarus, Sudan and Zimbabwe." The Post adds, "Despite the tepid support for the U.S. initiative, virtually all council members -- including China -- expressed concerns about Burma's behavior." Acting Ambassador Wolff "said the United States was 'deeply disappointed' by the council's failure to confront Burma. But he said the United States decided to force a vote to assure the Burmese people that 'we won't forget you.'"

The New York Times (1/13, Hoge, 1.16M) notes China and Russia "argued that they shared concerns about conditions in Myanmar but considered them internal matters that did not constitute threats to international peace and security, the category of crisis subject to Security Council action." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "said he had no doubt that the abuses by Myanmar posed a threat beyond its borders," and he "dismissed suggestions that the proper United Nations forum for Myanmar was the Geneva-based Human Rights Council, not the Security Council."

The AP (1/13, Lederer) adds Moscow and Beijing "cast a rare double veto Friday of a U.S. resolution calling on Myanmar's military government to release all political prisoners, speed up progress toward democracy, and stop attacks against ethnic minorities." The two nations' ambassadors "said the Security Council was not the proper place to discuss Myanmar because the country does not pose a threat to international peace and security." BBC.com (1/12) says the Chinese and Russian ambassadors "said the resolution was outside the remit of the Security Council as Burma posed no threat to international security."

Schwab "Optimistic" About Restart Of Doha Trade Talks. The New York Times (1/13, Zarocostas, 1.16M) reports US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said Friday that she was optimistic the collapsed Doha trade negotiations could be restarted, but added that there were still obstacles to a revival of the talks." She is quoted saying, "I am more optimistic than I have been in many months that we are on a path that could help reach a successful conclusion of the Doha round." Schwab later added that, "ultimately it will be substance that dictates when there's a breakthrough." The Times says "the next few weeks are considered critical to whether the new political impetus could be maintained," and notes Schwab "distanced herself on Friday from the upbeat assessment of" EU trade chief Peter Mandelson. Schwab "reiterated that an agreement on important issues, like agricultural market access, would dictate whether a deal could be hammered out."

Blair Says UK Must Maintain "Muscular Commitment" Overseas. The New York Times (1/13, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "As he seeks to define his legacy and stamp his imprint on the future," British Prime Minister Tony Blair "urged his successors to maintain the warlike foreign policy that he promoted, sending troops into battle in Africa and the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq. To retreat in the face of global terrorism, he said, would be 'a catastrophe.'" While "Blair avoided any triumphalism, he advocated a muscular commitment by Britain to overseas military deployment alongside what he called softer options." The Times adds British "left-wing critics dismissed the prime minister's attempt to justify his use of military action as a tool of foreign policy." The AP (1/13, Quinn) reports Blair said "that Britain's influence on the world stage and ability to right global wrongs depends on active engagement, and the country cannot defend itself from terrorism by retreating into isolationism." Blair added "that Britain must be willing to commit to military action when necessary to pursue laudable goals," and that "diplomacy alone cannot solve the world's problems."

LATimes Says Blair Shares Clinton's "Ethical Challenges." In an editorial entitled, "The End Of The Blair Era," the Los Angeles Times (1/13, 850K) says Blair "has more in common with former President Clinton" than with President Bush. "The litany of likenesses includes a belief in a 'third way' between old-style liberalism and the free market, a fluency in public that critics dismiss as glibness, a wife who was a successful lawyer, a willingness to accept the hospitality of show-business celebrities and, finally, a reputation for running an ethically challenged administration." Likening Blair's honors controversy with Clinton's January 2001 pardonings, the Times concludes, "Political psychologists can argue about why two farsighted politicians allowed their substantial legacies to be sullied by sleaze. Maybe the answer is as simple as power inevitably corrupting. Whatever the explanation, like his friend Bill, Tony may leave office with people talking not about his vision but about his blind spots."

Moscow Wants To Lead London Investigation Into Litvinenko Case. The Washington Post (1/13, A16, Finn, Jordan, 690K) reports Russian investigators "want to interview more than 100 people in London and conduct dozens of searches across the city" as part of their inquiry into the death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. "Prosecutors declined to name any of the people they wish to question," and the Post says the proposal "far exceeds the scope of British inquiries in Moscow, which amounted to a few interviews with Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the suspected date of the poisoning." The probe "is likely to unsettle some Russians who live in London and are fiercely opposed to the rule of President Vladimir Putin."

The New York Times (1/13, Broad, 1.16M) focuses on the emerging US angle to the story, noting, "Health officials in the United States have begun to tell some people who traveled to London last year that they may want to be tested for exposure to" polonium-210. The CDC "said yesterday that the notification process began this week after health authorities in London gave them a list of people who may have been exposed to" the poison that killed Litvinenko.

Bangladeshi Former Central Banker Takes Over Caretaker Government. The Financial Times (1/13, Johnson, Joehnk) details Fakhruddin Ahmed's assumption of temporary power in Dhaka. "A fresh attempt to break the deadlock between Bangladesh's two feuding political families had a shaky start on Friday night as a new head of a caretaker government took office under the cover of an army-backed state of emergency." A former governer of the central bank, Fakhruddin Ahmed "replaced President Iajuddin Ahmed as head of the caretaker government, whose principal function had been to oversee free and fair elections later this month. But there is now no indication of when they may take place." Iajuddin Ahmed resigned Thursday, and "analysts on Friday night likened the situation in the fourth most populous Muslim nation to a 'hidden coup,' saying they expected that a team of technocrats would govern Bangladesh for a lengthy period before it" will hold elections.

NYTimes Implores US, UN To Move Quickly To Back New Elections. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) says Bangladesh "is lurching in a dangerous direction," and "only strong pressure from the United States and international help will keep [the] country from slipping further off a democratic path." Calling Iajuddin Ahmed's state of emergency declaration "a particularly disturbing development," the Times says Washington "should use its substantial political influence to urge the government to restore suspended rights immediately." Calling Bangladesh "one of the poorest and most politically polarized countries in the world," the Times adds that the "international community needs to help it build a stable democracy -- the best underpinning for development -- starting with swift, internationally guaranteed elections."

Envoy Touts Enhanced Chinese "Engagement" With Sudan. The Washington Post (1/13, A13, Cody, 690K) reports Darfur special envoy Andrew Natsios "said Friday that China has pushed the Sudanese government recently to help resolve the bloody Darfur conflict and ease the plight of the region's nearly 3 million refugees." That "intervention marked a shift from past policy under which Beijing seemed reluctant to use its influence in Sudan, according to" Natsios, who is quoted saying, "I think they're engaging much more aggressively." AFP (1/13) notes Natsios "said he had held surprisingly positive talks in Beijing this week and that he expected China to play a greater role in helping to end the conflict in Darfur."

Isabel Peron Arrested In Spain For Human Rights Abuses. The New York Times (1/13, Rohter, 1.16M) reports, "Acting at the request of Argentine officials, the Spanish police on Friday detained María Estela de Perón, the former president of Argentina and the widow of the founder of the ruling party, as part of a broadening investigation by the Peronist government of Argentina into past human rights abuses there." A provincial judge ordered Isabel Peron detained "for questioning regarding the disappearance of a student during her time in power. Almost simultaneously, a judge in Buenos Aires authorized the arrest of two other officials with ties to the late José López Rega, who was Gen. Juan Perón's private secretary and later Ms. Perón's closest adviser." The Times says Peron is "blamed" for directing the killing of over 1,500 political opponents during her 20 months in power.

The AP (1/13, Heckle) notes Spain's National Court "ordered [Peron's] conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina. The court said Argentina has 40 days to file an extradition request and Peron has to appear at a police station every 15 days." The AP calls her "chaotic" 1974-76 rule "a time when shadowy right-wing violence destabilized Argentina," and says Peron's "arrest marked the expansion of Argentina's human rights investigations beyond dictatorship-era crimes to the death squads that terrorized the nation prior to the 1976 coup."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (1/13, McDonnell, 850K) says Peron's detention "signaled an expansion of human rights cases here beyond the former military junta to the epoch of ex-strongman" Juan Peron.

Writer Backs US Embrace Of Cuba As Hedge Against Iran, Venezuela. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (1/13, A13, Loyola, 2.04M), the Foundation for the Freedom of Democracies' Mario Loyola writes, "With Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visiting Venezuela today, it might be a good time to consider another 'change in course' for U.S. policy. The isolation of Cuba, a legacy of the Cold War, is pushing that country closer to America's most dangerous enemies." Saying the "advocates for the current policy -- chiefly three intransigent Cuban-American representatives in Congress -- are increasingly alone," Loyola says continued Cuban closeness to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "would be terrible for the U.S."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Plans For Hostile Reception From Senate Democrats. The New York Times (1/13, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, "who has faced controversy throughout his two-year tenure, is likely to enter an even stormier phase next Thursday when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for the first time since control fell to the Democrats. But he shows little anxiety about more vehement criticism of his stewardship at the Justice Department. 'They have an institutional interest to gather up information about what the executive branch is doing,' Mr. Gonzales said Friday, in an interview in which he adopted the mildly juridical tone of a law professor. Referring to the Justice Department, he said: 'We likewise have an institutional interest in maintaining the confidentially of certain kinds of information. From my perspective, there are two competing institutional interests. This is not a partisan issue. It's an institutional issue of interests that have to be accommodated.'" The Times adds that Gonzales's "chief antagonist" will likely be Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy.

Stimson Comments On Detainees' Lawyers Spark Furor. The New York Times (1/13, A1, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Cully Stimson "said in an interview this week that he was dismayed that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms were representing prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and that the firms' corporate clients should consider ending their business ties. The comments…produced an instant torrent of anger from lawyers, legal ethics specialists and bar association officials, who said Friday that his comments were repellent and displayed an ignorance of the duties of lawyers to represent people in legal trouble." Stimson "made his remarks in an interview on Thursday with Federal News Radio, a local Washington-based station that is aimed at an audience of government employees." In an interview Friday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said he had no problem with the current system of representation. 'Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases,' he said. Neither the White House nor the Pentagon had any official comment, but officials sought to distance themselves from Mr. Stimson's view." McClatchy (1/13, Rosenberg) says Stimson "stirred up a maelstrom" with his comments.

NYTimes Calls Stimson's "Attack" On Detainees' Lawyers "Contemptible." The New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) editorializes, "No one who has followed President Bush's policies on detainees should be surprised when a member of his team scorns American notions of justice. But even by that low standard, the administration's new attack on lawyers who dare to give those prisoners the meager representation permitted them is contemptible." Stimson "tried to rally American corporations to stop doing business with law firms that represent inmates" at Guantanamo. The Times says it "does not seem to matter to Mr. Stimson, who is a lawyer, that a great many of those detainees did not deserve imprisonment, let alone the indefinite detention to which they are subjected as 'illegal enemy combatants.' And forget about the fundamental American right that everyone should have legal counsel, even the most heinous villain."

Murtha Calls For Closing Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo Facilities. The Boston Globe (1/13, Klein, 413K) reports House Democratic leaders "outlined plans to try to force the Bush administration to close the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the Guantanamo Bay detention facility in Cuba, taking aim at two sites that have sparked an international furor over the Bush administration's war policy." Rep. John Murtha said he "wants to close both prisons by cutting their funding, 'to restore our credibility worldwide.' If he succeeds, it would force the administration to find a new location for high-value terrorism suspects. … Democratic leaders will try to include the measure to close the prisons in a spending bill designed to pay for war operations, Murtha said. He acknowledged that closing Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo would be more symbolic than substantive."

Padilla Trial Delayed Until April. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports, "A federal judge ordered a three-month delay for the trial of Jose Padilla, accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, in part to allow time for a full evaluation of Mr. Padilla's mental competency. The judge, Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami, set a new trial date of April 16 for Mr. Padilla and two others. It was the third time the case had been postponed."

US Embassy In Athens Sustains Grenade Attack. ABC World News (1/12, story 5, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There was an attack on the American embassy in Athens Greece today. It caused some damage but no injuries. A shadowy group of radical, Greek leftists claimed responsibility. No other American embassies have been put on notice for high alert." The Washington Times (1/13, Gatopoulos, 88K) reports the attack caused "limited damage and no injuries but reviving fears of a resurgence of far-left Greek militant groups that carried out deadly attacks over three decades." US Ambassador Charles Ries "called the attack 'very serious.' He said no warning had been given." The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 8, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) had brief reports as well.

The New York Times (1/13, Fisher, Carassava, 1.16M) reports, "An antitank grenade was fired into the heavily fortified American Embassy here on Friday just before dawn. The building was empty, but the attack nonetheless underscored deep anti-American sentiment here and revived fears of a new round of homegrown terror. Greek officials said they doubted that the attack was the work of foreign or Islamic terrorists, but rather that of regrouped extreme leftists aiming at a specific, symbolic target: the huge American seal, with an eagle against a blue background, affixed to the front of the boxy, modern embassy near downtown. The grenade narrowly missed the seal, punching through a window a few feet above and landing in a bathroom on the embassy's third story, where the ambassador has his office."

WPost Says White House Stance On Opening Mail "Disturbingly Unclear." The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K) asks in an editorial, "Is the federal government opening citizens' mail without obtaining warrants? Was a statement that was quietly issued when the president signed an obscure Postal Service reform bill last month a new assertion of power by the administration to engage in such warrantless searches? The answer to both these questions is disturbingly unclear. No reasonable person doubts that in emergency circumstances -- a ticking bomb inside a package -- government agents shouldn't have to wait for court approval to open private mail. That authority has been clear for years." But "given the president's signing statement, given his demonstrated willingness to stretch the boundaries of his authority and dispense with inconvenient legal niceties, it seems necessary to ask again" whether the White House feels it is authorized to open mail without a warrant.

Stricter US Asylum Laws Said To Punish "Freedom Fighters." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/13, 850K) Anna Husarska, senior policy advisor at the International Rescue Committee, writes, "I have met many refugees around the world -- Burmese Karen in Thailand, Burmese Chin in Malaysia, Lao Hmong in Thailand, Eritreans in Ethiopia -- whose cases were put 'on hold' by U.S. authorities because the organizations to which the refugees had belonged were later designated as terrorist. … What's particularly upsetting is that those 'on hold' are, in many cases, heroic freedom fighters who struggled for democracy against brutal dictatorships (like the Burmese junta or the Laotian communists) or even, sometimes, people who had been recruited to fight by the Unites States (like the Lao Hmong or the Vietnamese Montagnards). The reason for this bizarre treatment is that in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. adopted a very broad definition of 'terrorist activity' in American law. This overzealous legislative approach means that thousands of genuine refugees who participated in armed insurgencies — even those friendly to (and in some cases supported by) the United States — are now treated as a threat to American security."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mueller Suggested FBI Watching 8,000 Terror Suspects In US. In his US News & World Report (1/12) online column, David E. Kaplan wrote, "He wouldn't say it directly, but this week FBI Director Robert Mueller in effect told Congress the bureau has 8,000 people under investigation for terrorism. The FBI is reluctant to release an official figure, as many of those under investigation play only minor roles or turn out to be innocent. Instead, Mueller did it by inference, comparing America's record with that of Great Britain. … FBI officials confirm that's a ballpark figure, but decline to put the figure on the record." Kaplan added, "One reason for the caution is that FBI officials see few operational cells in America and don't want the public thinking there are 8,000 terrorists running around. ... But then what are all those U.S. terrorism suspects up to? Lots of support activity, officials say. One FBI agent ticked off the list: raising money, recruiting, logistics, surveillance, communications. Still, a handful of operational cells are out there, investigators believe, and that's what they lose sleep over."

New Rule Increases Demand For US, Canadian Passports. The Washington Post (1/13, A16, Struck, 690K) reports, "Canadian and U.S. citizens are lining up for passports to meet tougher U.S. border rules that take effect this month, and Canadian authorities fear the rules will keep more Americans at home. Starting Jan. 23, all airline passengers landing in the United States will have to carry a passport, not just the driver's license and birth certificate that can now be used by Canadians crossing the border and by U.S. citizens returning from Canada, Mexico, the Bahamas and the Caribbean. … U.S authorities say the rush proves that the tighter border controls being instituted five years after Sept. 11, 2001, are working to improve security. The rules will be extended to the busy land borders with Canada and Mexico by June 1, 2009."

Canada Announces Border Security Initiative. The AP (1/12, Duff-Brown) reports Canada "unveiled a major border security and prosperity initiative Friday, saying it would spend $431.6 million over the next five years to protect its border from terrorist, economic and environmental threats, according to the Canada Border Services Agency's website. Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day made the announcement at the Canada-U.S. border crossing between Windsor and Detroit, where one-third of the $1.6 billion in daily trade between the North American neighbors passes."

Judge Throws Out Hatfill's Suit Against NYTimes. The Washington Post (1/13, A8, Markon, 690K) reports, "A federal judge said yesterday that he will throw out -- for the second time -- the defamation lawsuit a former Army scientist filed against the New York Times Co. over columns that he contends blamed him for the 2001 anthrax attacks. Saying that the Times's motion to dismiss the case 'should be granted,' U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria canceled a trial set for Jan. 29, according to the court's docket. Hilton indicated that he would explain his reasoning in a subsequent order throwing out the case. The development is a victory for Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof, who has been fighting the lawsuit filed by Steven J. Hatfill in 2004. Hatfill said the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a 'likely culprit' in the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17."

The New York Times (1/13, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "It was the latest and, perhaps, final chapter in a suit that has gone to the Supreme Court. … The Times argued in its dismissal motion that Dr. Hatfill was a public figure, at least for the purposes of the suit, in that he had thrust himself into the public debate about preparedness for a biological attack." The AP (1/12) reports, "The judge did not explain his ruling in the order issued Friday."

Kaine, O'Malley, Fenty Vow Cooperation On Security Issues. The Washington Post (1/13, B3, Aratani, 690K) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine, Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, and District of Columbia Mayor Adrian Fenty, "in their first joint meeting as the Washington region's top elected officials," vowed to "cooperate on homeland security issues." Fenty said "one of the leaders' goals is to prioritize homeland security issues as the region begins to apply for federal grants. He said that they plan to meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next month." The Washington Times (1/13, McLaughlin, 88K) quotes O'Malley saying, "It is critically important that we cooperate across borders and pursue our common goals."

Box Addressed To Ex-President Clinton Led To Post Office Scare. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports a post office in New Castle, New York, "was evacuated as the police, the Westchester County Bomb Squad and Secret Service agents responded to a report of a suspicious package addressed to former President Bill Clinton. The cause of all the fuss? A box of cookies." Postal officials "discovered a suspicious package addressed to Mr. Clinton on Thursday, said Kim Bruce, a Secret Service spokeswoman. An incorrect address for the Chappaqua home" of the Clintons "raised the authorities' suspicions, Ms. Bruce said."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says "We're Going Forward" With Iraq Strategy Despite Congressional Doubts. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 4, 1:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush says his new Iraq strategy will go ahead in spite of heavy opposition in Congress." Bush "faced more skeptical, even hostile reaction to his plan to send more than 21,000 additional troops to Iraq. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said today he hopes the Senate can vote next week on a resolution opposing the new strategy. But in an exclusivr interview, the President told 60 Minutes correspondent Scott Pelley, opponents in Congress won't change his mind." Pelley: "Do you believe as Commander in Chief, you have the authority to put the troops in there, no matter what the Congress wants to do?" President Bush: "I think I've got -- in this situation, I do, yeah. And I fully understand they will -- they could try to stop me from doing it, but I've made my decision, and we're going forward."

NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Bush "is at Camp David for the weekend ending a week in which as our own Tim Russert put it on the air, he doubled his own bet on his own presidency" with "this almost solitary fight." NBC (Gregory): "The President finds himself more isolated over what to do next in Iraq. The way forward in Iraq appears to be a lonely path for George W. Bush, who has now staked a war policy and the presidency on a final stand in Baghdad."

Bush Administration Spokesmen Challenged On Capitol Hill. NBC Nightly News (1/12, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) led with the pessimistic words, "Two days now since the President gave his speech and gave the order to send over 20,000 Americans to what might be the worst place on earth. And now it and now it gets debated, the Democrats are threatening to linger with the funding of the war in Iraq as a way to send a message. Today the President's Pentagon chief told lawmakers there could be a bright side here if this so-called surge reduces the violence there American troops could start coming home later this year." NBC (Reid): "The Secretary of Defense said today he is confident that the President's plan for Iraq can succeed but he also said he understands why so many people are so skeptical. Meanwhile here on Capitol Hill a showdown is looming. Most Democrats and some Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee said today they don't understand how the President's plan can work when it depends so heavily on Iraq's leaders keeping promises they failed to keep before."

ABC World News (1/12, story 2, 0:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace "answered more questions about the President's new strategy in Iraq. Gates said mistakes in the past made the situation what it is today. But he warned it could still get much worse." Gates: "Mistakes certainly have been made by the United States in Iraq. But however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable." The Financial Times (1/13, Sevastopulo) reports Gates and Pace "faced a less hostile reception than Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state," on Thursday, but "most Democrats, and some Republicans, on the armed services committee strongly questioned whether Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his commitments to send more Iraqi troops into Baghdad."

The Washington Post (1/13, A1, White, Tyson on, 690K) reports Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin "sharply criticized sending more U.S. troops into Iraq and said the move reinforces a 'flawed strategy' that has failed thus far. ... Some Republicans questioned the immediate need for thousands of U.S. troops," with Sen. John Warner saying he "would rather send in a small complement of troops to see if the Iraqis become full partners." Sen. John McCain called a small troop increase "the worst of all worlds" but said critics had presented no "viable alternatives." The New York Times (1/13, Cloud, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Armed Services Committee Republicans "ame to the defense of President Bush on Friday, lending support to his decision to send more troops to Iraq and hoping to head off a Senate resolution criticizing the plan." But Republicans "were keeping a close watch on public opinion polls, particularly a survey by CNN and the Opinion Research Corporation on Friday showing that 66 percent of Americans oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq."

Democrats Eye Alternative To Surge Plan. The Chicago Tribune (1/13, Madhani, 617K) reports that Democrats "seem to have won the moment by effectively pillorying President Bush's plan," but "now face the dilemma of coming up with a better alternative to stem the sectarian bloodletting." Sen. Levin "said he hoped to garner bipartisan support for a non-binding resolution voicing dissatisfaction with Bush's Iraq policy." However, Democratic criticism came "at a lower volume than on Thursday" and was "far more civil than the previous day."

Rice Says Bush's Plan Is "Only Real Alternative On The Table." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on BBC Arabic Television (1/12), "The only real alternative on the table is the President's alternative. And so I understand skepticism. I certainly understand that people wonder why it hasn't worked till now, but the President's given us a way forward and I hope it'll get support. … The President's plan, first of all, very much puts Iraqis at the center of responsibility for dealing with what is their most urgent problem. Their most urgent problem is that the population has lost confidence that the government of Iraq can and will defend them in an evenhanded fashion, whether they are Sunni or Shia. … So the President's plan very much relies on Iraqis' responsibility for the kind of country that they're going to be."

State Department's Burns Says "We Are Going Forward." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said on MSNBC (1/12, O'Donnell), "We certainly heard the message from Capitol Hill yesterday, but we are going forward with this effort to deploy more American military forces into Baghdad especially and also into Anbar province and other areas. The strategy that President Bush talked about is meant to maximize our ability to help the Iraqis provide for real security, daily security in the streets of the major cities of the country. Without that, it's hard to see how many of the other objectives we have, of course leading to the eventual withdrawal of American forces, can succeed. So we think it's a necessary step."

Members Of Congress Weigh In. Sen. Ben Nelson, appearing on Fox News (1/12), said, "I am willing to give it a hearing, but I have to say that I'm very dubious, because I am very concerned about what the chiefs of the various services have said, what Gen. Abizaid has said, that it doesn't require more US troops, it requires more Iraqi troops stood up, capable of fighting and engaging the enemy."

Sen. John Cornyn said on MSNBC (1/12, Robach), "It strikes me that there are two options. One is to fail and the other one is to succeed. And the guaranteed way to fail is not to even try. So I favor trying this new plan that the President has come up with after several months of consultation with bipartisan groups and experts throughout the spectrum, because the costs of failure are simply too great to even contemplate."

Rep. Joe Sestak said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "I'm not sure exactly what the Democratic caucus is going to do. But as an individual, I think the President's plan violates exactly what we shouldn't be doing. And because of that, I do think that the Congress should vote and it should be a vote not to increase the troops that are in Iraq. … I believe we're on the road to nowhere. And putting more troops on that road in order to protect those men and women on the road to nowhere I'd do in a heartbeat. The President didn't make that case."

Rep. Dan Lungren said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "We have to understand that defeat in Iraq would be devastating for us. I'm not just talking about the millions of people put at risk in Iraq itself, I'm talking about further an increased and more acute instability in the Middle East, number one. And number two, whether we like it or not, this is a major front in the war on terror. We can argue about how we got where we are, but we need to do something so that we have a chance to win."

White House Says Funding For Surge Already Exists. The Washington Times (1/13, Dinan, 88K) reports on its front page, "The White House yesterday said there already is enough money in the budget to pay for President Bush's proposed troop surge in Iraq, leaving Congress almost no viable way to stop him before he commits the troops." The existence of funding "leaves Congress with few other options." But the Washington Times (1/13, Ward, 88K) also reports Rep. John Murtha "said he is exploring ways to block funding for additional troops."

Bush Reportedly Reading History Of Algerian Insurgency. CNN.com (1/12, Blitzer, McConnell) reports, "As President Bush wrestles with the continuing war in Iraq, he's currently reading a book about another difficult war: 'A Savage War of Peace,' by Alistair Horne, a senior White House source tells CNN. It is a dense and detailed history of the battle between France and revolutionaries in its colony of Algeria, describing an unsuccessful war against a bloody terrorist insurgency. A resistance movement rose in 1954 to resist French occupation. It quickly turned into a civil war between factions that became a costly, unpopular conflict for the French."

World Community Reacts Skeptically To Surge Plan. The New York Times (1/13, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that the Bush war plan "has won few converts across a worried world, where dismay and hostility toward the American expedition have grown while support trickles away. ... Even Britain, the onetime cheerleader for the White House, offered only an ambiguous response to the president's announcement, saying London remained on track to withdraw its forces, not increase them." Other countries reacted with "haughty indifference." Among Arab countries, "there is a deeper pessimism, reflecting a widely held Arab view that the American presence is the source of Iraq's woes." On the other hand, "there was some sympathy — if not always explicit — for the American quandary: this was, many analysts sensed, a defining event, a last throw of the dice that would measure American prestige and credibility against the clamor of its adversaries."

Hamilton Discusses Iraq Recommendations. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 7, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Just over a month ago, the Iraq Study Group issued its list of recommendations for a way out of Iraq. Rep. Lee Hamilton was the co-chair of that bipartisan group. ... In your mind, what should the timetable be on this? If the President's plan is not working by -- give me a date, it should be scrapped and go to Plan B?" Hamilton: "Oh, I think time is very tight here. This government in Iraq does not have much time to perform. ... Their rhetoric has been pretty good, but they just haven't done it. I personally think the timeframe is a matter of weeks, certainly not a year. Maybe a couple of months. But it should be a tight timeframe."

US Soldiers In Iraq Have Mixed Views Of Plan. ABC World News (1/12, story 3, 1:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, US troops are already starting to implement the President's new plan. And they have various opinions of it." ABC (Karl): "Ask them if it will work, and most will tell you that depends on their Iraqi counterparts." Sgt. First Class Brian Field: They really need to step it up." Spc. Charles Rogers: "More manpower is always good. Strength in numbers. But I don't know if that is going to be the answer." Karl: "Look around and you get a sense that these Iraqi forces may need more than better weapons to get the job done."

Schwarzenegger, Huckabee Back Bush Plan. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Rau, 850K) reports, "Bucking the disenchanted views of most Americans about the war, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday that he supports President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq." In an interview to air on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, Schwarzenegger "said he does not want the U.S. to 'pull out of this war as losers.' ... Schwarzenegger did break with the president by reiterating his support for a timeline for American troops to withdraw."

Ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee said on MSNBC's Tucker (1/12, O'Donnell), "I think we have got to give" the President "a chance to let it work. Whether it's the right decision, I honestly don't know, because I don't have access to the kind of military and intelligence information that he does. But he's the commander-in-chief, and we have got to give him an opportunity. I think that the strategy that he has laid out is one that is risky in the sense that it has to work for him, because if it doesn't, I don't think he's going to get another chance to come up with yet another plan. But if the Democrats don't like that plan, they've got to put something on the table."

Richardson Says Bush "Is Not Listening." Gov. Bill Richardson said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "The President is not listening. It's not a partisan issue. This is national. … The American people want a different course in Iraq. And what does a President do? He has a surge. The only surge that should happen is a surge in diplomacy, a surge in a political solution, a withdrawal that I believe is necessary this year that is tied to a political solution, a reconciliation conference. And you deploy those troops where we need them, in Afghanistan, to fight international terrorism. Nuclear proliferation, loose nuclear weapons, those are our interests. And instead of saying that we're now going to look at Iran, we should be talking to Syria, we should be talking to Iran."

More Commentary. Wall Street Journal (1/13, 2.04M) columnist Peggy Noonan writes in a highly pessimistic column, "Right now, in the deepest levels of the American government, intelligence and military planners should be ordered to draw up serious plans for an American withdrawal, and serious strategies for dealing with the realities withdrawal will bring. It would not be the worst thing if the Maliki government knew those plans were being drawn up. It might concentrate the mind. ... I'm not sure [US interests have] been given sufficient attention the past few years. In fact, I am sorry to say I believe they have not."

Washington Post (1/13, A19, 690K) Style writer Henry Allen writes, "The problem, if we lose in Iraq, is that America is apt to keep on doing what it's been doing for decades when it loses, which is to say learn nothing and have years of hissy fits about who's to blame. And set itself up for another fiasco someplace else. ... our failed ground combat interventions and nation building continue like a sort of neurosis, the kind that has been defined as doing the same thing over and over in expectation of a different result, in the manner of France fighting and losing one colonial war after another after World War II."

Washington Post (1/13, A19, King, 690K) columnist Colbert King recalls that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke on April 4, 1967, about the Vietnam War: "Vietnam, King said, was consuming American troops and money like 'some demonic, destructive suction tube' even as that war was laying waste to the Vietnamese people and to America's standing in the world. ... Now enter George W. Bush -- the president who got America into this debacle [Iraq] through a series of misjudgments that would make Alfred E. Neuman look brilliant." Bush "stubbornly and in the face of legitimate opposition, proposes to make matters worse. Remember King and the words: 'A time comes when silence is betrayal.'"

Rice Says Bush Approved Raids On Iranians.

The New York Times (1/13, Sanger, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "A recent series of American raids against Iranians in Iraq was authorized under an order that President Bush decided to issue several months ago to undertake a broad military offensive against Iranian operatives in the country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday." Rice's "willingness to discuss the issue seemed to reflect a new hostility to Iran that was first evident in Mr. Bush's speech to the nation on Wednesday night, in which he accused Tehran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond." The "decision to authorize the aggressive steps against Iranians in Iraq appears to formalize the American effort to contain Iran's ambitions as a new front in the Iraq war," although some "critics regard the talk about Iran as a diversion, one intended to shift attention away from the spiraling chaos in Iraq." BBC.com (1/12) reports Rice "has denied that the US intends to escalate the war in Iraq by confronting Iranian groups operating there" but "insisted that the United States was not going to let either Iran or Syria continue activities that endangered US soldiers in Iraq."

ABC World News (1/12, lead story, 2:25, Martha Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The State Department said, for the first time today, that the Iraqi government believes five men, detained in a US raid in northern Iraq, were members of the Iranian revolutionary guard corps." The Iranians were "part of an…effort to funnel ammunition and weapons to insurgents." The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 3, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The wreckage of this Iranian office raided by American troops in northern Iraq marks a new front in the war. US officials tell CBS News, American forces have begun an aggressive and mostly secret ground campaign against networks of Iranians who had been operating with virtual impunity inside Iraq. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs told Congress today Iranians are now on the target list." Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace: "Twice in the last two or three weeks, in pursuit of those networks, when we have gone and captured those cells, we've captured Iranians."

White House Softens Tone On Iran. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Barnes, Moore, 850K) reports, "The Bush administration sought to assure lawmakers and the public Friday that despite harsh new rhetoric, it did not intend to go to war with Iran, even as U.S. sources charged that Iranians captured in Irbil, Iraq, were suspected members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards. ... The administration moved Friday to defuse concerns that it was planning or inviting a confrontation with Tehran. At a news conference, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed as an 'urban legend' suggestions that the United States was preparing for another war."

Iraqi Foreign Minister Defends Detained Iranians. The AP (1/12, Gamel) reports, "Five Iranians detained by U.S.-led forces were working in a decade-old government liaison office that was in the process of being upgraded to a consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said Friday. ... Tehran condemned the raid in the Kurdish-controlled northern city of Irbil and urged Iraq to push for the Iranians' release."

Rockefeller Says Bush Would Need A New Congressional Resolution To Take On Iran. Sen. Jay Rockefeller said on MSNBC (1/12, Mitchell) that if President Bush "takes on Iran, it's going to have to be a new authorization, and it won't pass. … Yes, it's intermingled with the Shias in Iraq. But anybody who hasn't read a great deal about Iran, who doesn't know its history, who doesn't know the history of its relationships with the United States, which have mostly been rather bad and unsustainable, there has to be very, very careful consideration before we were ever to do something like that. And the answer is that we can't do it. You cannot take on Iran."

Dean Says US Must Confront Iran. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/12, Matthews), "The great shame among many shames of going into Iraq was we picked the wrong enemy. Iran is a danger. We've got our troops pinned down in the wrong place. Saddam Hussein was a terrible person, but not a danger to the United States. Iran is a danger. Obviously, I don't think there's much stomach among the American people for a war with Iran, given what's going on for the last three and a half years in Iraq, but we are clearly going to have to stand up to Iran."

Dowd Blasts Idea Of Fighting Iran. New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes sarcastically, "How can you not have confidence in the crackerjack team that brought you Operation Iraqi Freedom, which foundered and led to Operation Together Forward? ... We're trying to stanch a self-inflicted wound: our failed occupation gave Iran the opening in Iraq we're now trying to shut down." President Bush has been "deserted by more and more Republicans, generals and Americans, risking it all on a weak reed like Prime Minister Maliki."

Maliki Fills Baghdad Military Post With His Own Man. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Roug, Spiegel, 850K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "has filled the top military job in Baghdad with a virtually unknown officer chosen over the objections of U.S. and Iraqi military commanders, officials from both governments said." Maliki reportedly "failed to consult the leaders of other political factions before announcing the appointment of Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar. The appointment is highly significant because it is Maliki's first public move after President Bush's announcement that he was sending more troops to Iraq. ... As the Iraqi commander for the capital, Qanbar would play a central role in that campaign, and any ties he might have to sectarian groups could undermine the new U.S. effort."

US Contends With Sadr For Iraqi Troops' Loyalties. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Trejos, 690K) reports from a "shared" US-Iraqi base "in eastern Baghdad," "At best, said several U.S. soldiers interviewed at the base this month, some of the Iraqi troops they advise are sympathetic to [Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr] and his army. At worst, they said, some are members of the militia, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi. ... U.S. military officers say that the Iraqi police force is deeply infiltrated by militiamen and predict that the army will be quicker to operate independently. But a four-day visit to the base known as Old MOD, for the former Ministry of Defense complex, showed that the army is not immune to the militias' influence. According to the Americans, most of the Iraqi soldiers are Shiites, and some come from Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum that is a Mahdi Army stronghold. Some carry pictures of Sadr."

Coalition Forces Have "Dismantled" Insurgent Base In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Zavis, 850K) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces have denied Sunni Arab insurgents an important power base in a lawless region east of Baghdad, the commander of a joint offensive said Friday. The challenge now, U.S. Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said in an interview, is to ensure that the militants do not return to the region in the eastern province of Diyala. When U.S. forces conducted previous large operations, insurgents often returned as soon as the military withdrew. Poppas plans to open a patrol station in the area, which until recently had been a virtual no-go zone for Iraqi security forces."

Violence Mars Baghdad's Haifa Street. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 5, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Most of the additional troops earmarked for Iraq will be put to use on a security clamp in Baghdad, where fighting has been raging all week long along the key thoroughfare." CBS (Logan): "This shaky video, smuggled out of Haifa Street, shows the death and destruction caused by six days of intense fighting in what is today Baghdad's most violent neighborhood. US and Iraqi forces are battling gunmen dug into the houses along this main road that runs from the center of the capital down to the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Terrorists Using Google Earth To Locate British Troops. The London Telegraph (1/13, Harding) reports, "Terrorists attacking British bases in Basra are using aerial footage displayed by the Google Earth internet tool to pinpoint their attacks, say Army intelligence sources. Documents seized during raids on the homes of insurgents last week uncovered print-outs from photographs taken from Google." The photographs depict "buildings inside the bases and vulnerable areas such as tented accommodation, lavatory blocks and where lightly armoured Land Rovers are parked." Insurgent salvos "are fired from up to four miles away and are increasingly accurate. ... Intelligence sources also believe that the insurgents are receiving more training and weaponry from Iran to improve their fighting skills. But the British are gathering more intelligence on mortar crews and launching several 'strike operations' to detain the operators."

Rice Responds To Boxer Assertion On War's "Personal Price." The Washington Post/AP (1/13, A15) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday criticized Sen. Barbara Boxer's suggestion that, because she does not have family in harm's way, she will pay no 'personal price' in the Iraq war." Rice said, "I thought single women had come further than that." The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Hurt, 88K) reports the White House and Rice "accused Democrats of suggesting that the secretary's childlessness, race and sex are to blame for mistakes in Iraq. ... But Mrs. Boxer and Democrats are making no apologies."

The New York Times (1/13, Cooper, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Some Democratic Senate staffers said Senator Boxer's exchange with Ms. Rice allowed the Bush administration to turn the tables on Iraq critics and sidestep the larger issue of the almost uniform opposition to the president's plan to send 20,000 more American soldiers to Iraq." ABC World News (1/12, story 4, Vargas, 8.78M) said the "personal exchange…touched off an emotional debate about the war in Iraq." The Washington Times (1/13, Ward, 88K) called the Boxer remark "the low point of" Thursday's hearing.

NATO Struggles To Build In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/13, Gall, 1.16M) reports in a negative article, "The road that cuts through the heart of Panjwai district here tells all that is going wrong with NATO's war in Afghanistan. To fight their way into this area and clear it of Taliban insurgents, NATO troops bulldozed through orchards, smashed down walls and even houses, and churned vineyards and melon fields to dust. Reconstruction projects were planned, but never materialized. Now NATO countries are championing the thoroughfare as a $5 million gift to local people." Locals, however, "are homeless, fearful and far from being won over. They say the road was built for the troops' benefit and forced on them, at the cost of their land and livelihoods. ... Already on everyone's mind — in the government, the military, the police and among villagers — is how to stop the Taliban from infiltrating back for a new offensive in the spring, which in this southern region will come in February."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Convoy South Of Kabul. The AP (1/12) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed his explosives-filled car into a two-vehicle convoy carrying foreigners south of Kabul on Friday, wounding at least one Afghan civilian, police said. ... The attack comes a day after NATO said its forces killed scores of insurgents who crossed from Pakistan in the biggest battle of the Afghan winter, while Pakistan's army fired artillery at trucks supplying militants on the other side of the border." The AP says of the artillery firing, "It was the Pakistani army's first reported offensive in the North Waziristan tribal region since a September peace deal between the government and pro-Taliban militants that critics say has provided a sanctuary for insurgents."

Gates Expresses Concern Over Afghan Stability. The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Barnes, Spiegel, 850K) reports, Defense Secretary Robert Gates "expressed deep concern Friday over the stability of Afghanistan, and a top U.S. military official said additional troops might be needed to strengthen the government in Kabul, which is under growing pressure from Taliban forces." The secretary "plans to travel soon" to the country and "appeared worried by the rising violence in Afghanistan" in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Italians Wage "Peaceful War" In Mushai Valley. The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Constable, 690K) reports from Surjai, Afghanistan, "Like most of the 26 foreign military contingents that comprise the 20,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, the Italians have been banned by their government from conducting combat missions, except for 72-hour emergency sorties to aid other NATO forces. ... But officials say the work of troops from Italy, Turkey, France and other nations, which are bringing security, training, aid and development to impoverished and potentially hostile areas of central and northern Afghanistan, can be more effective than military raids, which can invade homes, create casualties and alienate communities."

Pakistan Denies It Is Terrorist Haven, Asks US For Intelligence On Al Qaeda. The AP (1/12) reports, "Pakistan on Friday rejected allegations by America's spy chief that it is a refuge for terrorist leaders and demanded that his intelligence networks share information on the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda figures." A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman said, "In breaking the back of al-Qaeda, Pakistan has done more than any other country in the world." She urged the US to "share the intelligence with us."

Taliban Fighters' Bodies Reportedly Sent Back To Pakistan. The AP (1/12) reports, "Despite Pakistani assertions, "in a sign that insurgents are crossing from Pakistan to fight in Afghanistan, the bodies of 25 militants killed in a fierce battle with NATO were repatriated Friday to their tribal villages in Pakistan, where Taliban activists urged mass attendance at their funerals, residents said." The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Constable, 690K) also reports, "The bodies of two dozen Islamic insurgents killed in a clash with NATO and Afghan army forces near the border with Pakistan were sent back Friday to Pakistan, where Taliban leaders asked that they be given funerals as 'martyrs,' according to news reports here." The corpses reportedly "included both Pakistanis and Afghans."

Pentagon Sees Somalia As Blueprint For Counterterrorism Missions. The New York Times (1/13, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "Military operations in Somalia by American commandos, and the use of the Ethiopian Army as a surrogate force to root out operatives for Al Qaeda in the country, are a blueprint that Pentagon strategists say they hope to use more frequently in counterterrorism missions around the globe. Military officials said the strike by an American gunship on terrorism suspects in southern Somalia on Sunday showed that even with the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld from the Pentagon, Special Operations troops intended to take advantage of the directive given to them by Mr. Rumsfeld in the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks." Special Forces had been slowed by "a shortage of valuable intelligence on the whereabouts of top terrorism suspects," but "the State Department and Pentagon took control of Somalia policy in the summer, after a failed effort by the Central Intelligence Agency to use Somali warlords as proxies to hunt down the Qaeda suspects."

Eight Somali Gunmen Die In Shootout At Gates Of Palace. The New York Times (1/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports from Mogadishu, "According to witnesses, presidential guards killed at least eight men of a rival militia at the gates of the presidential palace as top leaders were sitting inside discussing a new disarmament program. The bloodshed seemed to be more evidence of a steady breakdown of law and order in Mogadishu, and plunged the disarmament plans into uncertainty." The shooting "apparently started over where to park a technical, the term coined in Somalia for a heavily armed pickup truck."

Ethiopian-Backed Forces Capture Last Islamist Stronghold. The Washington Times/AP (1/13, Hassan) reports, "Ethiopian-backed government forces have captured the last stronghold of the Islamist movement in southern Somalia, the Somali defense minister said yesterday just hours after warlords met with the president and promised to enlist their militiamen in the army." Ras Kamboni "fell after five days of heavy fighting, Defense Minister Col. Barre Aden Shire said. ... It is not far from the site of a U.S. air strike Monday on suspected al Qaeda terrorists." The AP also reports the shootout near the presidential palace.

Soldiers, Spouses Struggle To Preserve Marriages. The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 6, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It is a hidden danger faced by every soldier who has been to Iraq or Afghanistan -- the stress they suffer on the battlefield. It can put stress on their marriages when they return home. Army divorces have increased nearly 30 percent since the start of the Iraq war. The solution might be retreat."

Networks Praise Military Mother, USO Volunteer. ABC World News (1/12, story 10, 3:00, Vargas, 8.78M) named Mary Moreno its "Person of the Week." Moreno is "a military mother who suffered her own personal defeat when their son shipped off to war. But she turned that hardship into help for other families who thought they had nowhere else to turn." Moreno: "I needed help. Medication wasn't going to help me. ... I put an ad -- I put an article in the newspaper. 'Mom seeks other moms with sons in Iraq.' I had five moms call me." Vargas: "Four years later, Mary's group is 100 strong." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 10, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) profiled USO volunteer Mary Adams, who is "often the last person that US soldiers see before they set off as volunteers to fight this nation's wars."

California US Attorney's Departure Is Met With Surprise. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/13, Thornton, Soto) reports, "Amid news reports that she has been asked to step down, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam declined repeated interview requests yesterday and did not address the matter with her staff." The Union-Tribune continues, "At a weekly managers meeting, Lam was stoic, conducting business as usual and discussing next week's caseload, according to people who attended. She made no mention of a resignation request by the Bush administration, nor did anyone ask about it. … However, she did discuss the matter with at least one law enforcement colleague. Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego, said he spoke to Lam several times yesterday and he feels the criticism and the way the situation was handled are unfair. … 'I don't think it's the right way to treat anybody. What's the decision based on?' Dzwilewski said. 'I don't share the view of whoever's making the decision back there in Washington that they'd like her to resign. I feel Carol has an excellent reputation and has done an excellent job given her limited resources.'" The Union-Tribune adds, "Dzwilewski said he sympathized with Lam on issues of stretching budgets to meet priorities and felt that criticism that she wasn't giving proper attention to smuggling, drugs and gun crimes was off-base. 'What do you expect her to do? Let corruption exist?' he said. … Lam's continued employment as U.S. attorney is crucial to the success of multiple ongoing investigations, the FBI chief said. … Dzwilewski declined to discuss Lam's demeanor during their conversations, her state of mind, when or if she will resign or her future plans. … Sources have told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam was asked to step down because she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a priority, choosing instead to focus on fewer cases that she considered more significant, such as public corruption and white-collar crime."

The North County (CA) Times (1/13, Figueroa, Bennett) reports, "Speculation that the Bush administration allegedly has asked San Diego-based U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the region's chief federal prosecutor, to step down was met with disbelief and dropped jaws by legal community members with ties to federal court. … 'I was in a state of shock,' said Peter Nunez, who served as the U.S. attorney in charge of the San Diego offices from 1982 to 1988. 'It's just like nothing I've ever seen before in 35-plus years. To be asked to resign and to be publicly humiliated by leaking this to the press is beyond any bounds of decency and behavior. It shocks me. It really is outrageous.'" The Times continues, "Nunez and others said they had not even heard rumblings that Lam was in the cross hairs for possible removal. … Lam may not be the only U.S. attorney politely being asked to pack her bags. … In a Thursday news release, U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein announced that she and two other senators were introducing legislation that would prevent the executive branch from trying to do an end run on the Senate's prerogative of confirming U.S. attorneys."

Arkansas US Attorney Was Asked To Resign. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (1/13, Satter) reports, "A day after three U. S. senators, including Arkansas ' Mark Pryor, proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U. S. attorneys, Bud Cummins acknowledged that the U. S. Justice Department asked him in June to leave his post to make room for a successor. Cummins, 47, the U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas from Dec. 21, 2001 until Dec. 20, 2006, had previously avoided directly answering whether he was 'forced out,' as rumor had it. He instead said in late August that he had always known his political appointment was temporary and that he had informally "let it be known" over the previous year that he expected to leave before President Bush's second term ended in late 2008." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "When contacted on Friday, Cummins said that while all that was true, he wanted to clarify the situation because the proposed legislation had focused a new wave of attention on his and other U. S. attorneys' recent departures, reportedly at the administration's request. … In a news release issued jointly Thursday by Pryor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., Feinstein said, 'It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U. S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation.... We don't know how many U. S. Attorneys have been asked to resign — it could be two, it could be ten, it could be more. No one knows.'" The Democrat-Gazette notes, "Pryor had publicly complained in late December, when the department announced that attorney Tim Griffin would take over Cummins ' job in a matter of days, that the administration was trying to circumvent the normal nomination process to reward a political insider, without the normal checks and balances. … Griffin, who had a reputation as an aggressive Republican campaign researcher, had previously worked under Karl Rove, Bush's main political adviser and deputy chief of staff."

More Commentary. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/13) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is a tough-minded prosecutor who has won a string of high-profile convictions against corrupt public officials, including Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Councilmen Ralph Inzunza and Michael Zucchet. She is widely respected for her personal integrity and her commitment to curbing white-collar crime. Her aggressive prosecutions have sent a needed message that political corruption will not be tolerated in San Diego. … Why, then, is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pressuring Lam behind the scenes to step down?" The Union-Tribune continues, "The answer to this question is far from clear, but it appears to be rooted in questionable political machinations in Washington and has nothing to do with Lam's impressive record on the job. … The Bush administration's actions appear to be motivated by cronyism, a desire to reward the president's supporters with Justice Department posts. In Lam's case, certainly, there are no legitimate performance issues to justify stripping her of her position. Gonzales is set to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits. We urge the senator to seize this opportunity to pull back the 'cloak of secrecy' and reveal the truth about the attorney general's bid to remove Lam."

New DC US Attorney Faces Money, Time Constraints. The Washington Post (1/13, B3, Leonnig) reports, "The new U.S. attorney for Washington has a very plum title. But in the current circumstances, Jeffrey A. Taylor may find it hard to leave a major mark, and he's taking some fire before he truly gets moving." The Post continues, "Taylor, who was selected by the Justice Department in the fall to run the largest office of local federal prosecutors in the country, faces the dual challenges of worsening budget constraints and a likely two-year time limit on his tenure. … Then there are the external pressures. A former national security adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Taylor is facing criticism that he lacks local know-how, having spent most of his career in San Diego, where he was an assistant U.S. attorney. And with Democrats now in control of Congress, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) is pushing again for a bill to create the post of a locally elected prosecutor to pursue local crimes in the District." The Post adds, "Gonzales appointed Taylor to be interim U.S. attorney in September, replacing Kenneth L. Wainstein, who became assistant attorney general for national security . The president usually nominates U.S. attorneys for Senate confirmation but has often chosen to let the Justice Department make appointments for interim or short-term posts. … Personable and practical, Taylor acknowledged that it would be unwise for him to launch a series of new initiatives with less money, fewer people and such a short window to act. Still, he declared, 'I wouldn't be interested in this job to just be a caretaker.' … He took over an office with 30 vacancies among its 360 authorized slots for lawyers -- jobs that will not be filled in the budget crunch. Thirty of 350 support staff jobs are also unfilled and will remain vacant. … Taylor, 41, disputes water-cooler gossip that he's a place-holder until President Bush's term ends in two years. He said he'll focus on three top priorities of cases: violent crime, public corruption and national security."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Loans By Allied Unit Under Federal Scrutiny. The New York Times (1/13, Creswell) reports, "Federal investigations into small-business loans issued by a unit of the Allied Capital Corporation are growing, as a former executive of the unit faces fraud charges in Michigan." The Times continues, "The former executive, Patrick J. Harrington, is accused of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years, according to an indictment that was handed up on Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Michigan. Mr. Harrington has not entered a plea to the charges." The Times adds, "Federal investigators are now looking at loans issued by the unit, Business Loan Express, in other parts of the country, according to several people briefed on the investigation. … And the federal Small Business Administration — which typically guarantees 75 percent of the value of these small-business loans — is considering suspending the preferred lending status of Business Loan Express, pending the outcome of an investigation. That would mean that every loan Business Loan Express issues would have to be vetted by the agency, those people said. … The S.B.A. this week also suspended the unit's ability to sell the loans it issues to large institutional investors in the secondary market, which could affect the ability of Business Loan Express to make loans, those people said. The unit can still originate loans, but only if it intends to hold those loans on its own books, which is not something the firm has historically done."

HP Prober Pleads Guilty To ID Theft, Conspiracy. The AP (1/13) reports, "Federal prosecutors scored their first victory in the investigation of boardroom spying at Hewlett-Packard on Friday, when a private investigator pleaded guilty to identity theft and conspiracy charges." The AP continues, "The investigator, Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to the two felony counts during his initial appearance in United States District Court in San Jose. … As part of the plea deal, Mr. Wagner admitted to illegally obtaining Social Security numbers and other personal information to snoop on the private telephone records of journalists, former Hewlett-Packard directors, and their family members as part of the company's effort to ferret out the source of boardroom leaks to the media." The AP adds, "Mr. Wagner acknowledged using a form of subterfuge known as 'pretexting,' or pretending to be someone else, to fool telephone companies into releasing records on former two former H.P. directors — Thomas J. Perkins and George A. Keyworth II — and two reporters, Pui-Wing Tam of The Wall Street Journal and Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks. … Mr. Wagner admitted using personal information to set up online accounts in the names of the four people from April 2005 to September 2006 to access their call logs and billing records. … His lawyer, Stephen Naratil, said his client would testify for prosecutors as they pursue other figures in the case. He declined to say whom Mr. Wagner would testify against or what he had told prosecutors. … Mr. Wagner's sentencing was set for June 20 in San Jose federal court."

Firms Trim Executive Perks To Avoid Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A1, White, Lublin) reports, "Personal air travel on the company dime is among an array of executive perks some companies have begun trimming as new compensation-disclosure rules take effect." The Journal continues, "On Jan. 1, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Lockheed Martin Corp. stopped paying executives' country-club dues. In December, directors of General Mills Inc. capped free personal rides on company aircraft for its chief executive officer. And E*Trade Financial Corp. said it no longer would help top executives pay taxes on their severance benefits if the company is sold. … The changes come amid sweeping new Securities and Exchange Commission requirements for additional disclosure about executive pay and perks. The rules, which took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 14, require companies to reveal perks for top executives that add up to $10,000 or more apiece; the old rules required disclosure of perks valued above $50,000." The Journal adds, "The number of companies dropping or curbing perks is unclear. Most won't file their annual proxy statements, detailing executive compensation, until March or April. Of 110 large companies surveyed by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in November, 14 said they had eliminated perks or were considering doing so because of the new regulations. … But some compensation consultants and directors expect the number to grow as more boards consider the hazards of publicizing perks amid a burgeoning national outcry over executive compensation. In recent weeks, investor anger has been stoked by exit packages in the neighborhood of $200 million for the CEOs of Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., both of whom left under fire for poor shareholder returns."

Suits By Former NYSE Seat-Holders Allowed To Proceed. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B3, Bray) reports, "Lawsuits by three former New York Stock Exchange membership-seat holders over disclosures by the Big Board and its chief executive, John Thain, before details of its merger with Archipelago Holdings Inc. became public can proceed, a state judge has ruled." The Journal continues, "In an order filed Wednesday, New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos said some of the allegations in cases brought by onetime seat holders Janet Hyman, Sylvia Lief and D. Paul Rittmaster can go forward. … The three cases have been consolidated for pretrial proceedings." The

Journal adds, "Without ruling on the merits of the claim, Justice Ramos allowed to proceed allegations that representations made at a Feb. 3, 2005, town hall meeting with seat holders and a Feb. 15, 2005, announcement were incomplete and/or misleading. The meeting and announcement concerned the formation of an advisory committee to explore the possibility of converting the NYSE from a nonprofit to a for-profit company, which is now called NYSE Group Inc. … The judge dismissed claims that the NYSE and Mr. Thain breached their fiduciary duty or were negligent for failing to keep the merger negotiations confidential in order to prevent speculative or premature market fluctuations."

Accounting Giants Still Paying For Scandals. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B5, Reilly) reports, "Corporate scandals that erupted earlier this decade are still causing pain at accounting firms, which continue to pay big bucks to atone for their failure to spot, or stop, fraud." The Journal continues, "The latest example: Deloitte & Touche's Italian arm on Friday agreed to pay $149 million to settle lawsuits brought by former audit client Parmalat SpA, which collapsed in December 2003 after the discovery of Europe's biggest corporate fraud. … Under the terms of the agreement between Deloitte's Italian arm, Deloitte & Touche SpA, and Parmalat, the Italian company will drop all claims against various Deloitte arms it is suing in federal court in New York. In turn, Deloitte will drop counterclaims against the company, whose former managers allegedly engaged in a fraud that left Parmalat with an $18 billion hole on its books." The Journal adds, "Specific terms of the agreement, beyond the settlement amount, weren't disclosed. A spokeswoman for Deloitte in the U.S. declined to comment on whether the $149 million would be covered in part or whole by insurance. … A joint statement from Parmalat and Deloitte didn't say whether the accounting firm acknowledged any wrongdoing. Deloitte, which signed off on Parmalat's books from 1999 to 2003, has previously said it acted in accordance with laws in place in Italy at the time. … The settlement follows a deal announced last month by Deloitte's U.S. arm, Deloitte & Touche LLP, to pay $210 million to resolve claims related to Adelphia Communications Corp., the cable company once run by the Rigas family that filed for bankruptcy in 2002. While the Adelphia and Parmalat settlements don't eclipse a record $335 million payout in 1999 by Ernst & Young LLP in a case related to Cendant Corp., they are within the top-10 settlement awards paid by auditors over the past 10 years for work for a single client."

Former Siemens Officials Is Suspect In Bribery Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "An international corruption investigation at Siemens AG is climbing the corporate ladder after a former No. 2 executive was named a suspect amid allegations a complex bribery scheme spanned several units at the far-flung German conglomerate." The Journal continues, "Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, the chief financial officer of Siemens from 1998 until he resigned in April, was questioned by German prosecutors Tuesday and released in a widening probe into nearly half a billion dollars in suspicious payments. … A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich confirmed that Mr. Neubürger is being treated as a suspect, not a witness, in the cross-border investigation. At least one other suspect has alleged to prosecutors that Mr. Neubürger was aware of illegal payments and didn't do enough to stop them, according to lawyers familiar with the investigation." The Journal adds, "More than 200 German police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several current and former employees; they were released just before Christmas after agreeing to cooperate. Investigators suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe customers abroad. … Munich-based Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Last month, it flagged €420 million ($542 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years -- double the amount uncovered by German prosecutors in November. Until now, the investigation had been confined to the company's telecommunications network division. Siemens, Europe's largest engineering firm by sales, has blamed the alleged fraud on 'individual acts.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Seeks To Keep Report On Convertino Probe Confidential. The AP (1/13, Jordan, Apuzzo) reports, "The Justice Department is fighting in court to keep secret a government report concluding that it leaked confidential and damaging information against a former prosecutor accused of bungling a high- profile terror trial." The AP continues, "Justice attorneys say they can't disclose all the contents of the December 2004 report by the department's inspector general without violating employees' privacy. … However, ex-Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino of Detroit said the Justice Department violated his own privacy rights by revealing to the media that he was the subject of an internal ethics inquiry after he criticized the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy." The AP adds, "Two people who have seen the full report confirmed it rules out Convertino as a suspect in the leak case. Those people described the report's findings to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because it is sealed under a Justice Department protective order. … A heavily edited version of the report is included in court documents filed in Washington. It concludes that investigators 'did not find sufficient evidence to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, who leaked this information.' … It narrowed the source to about 30 prosecutors and other Justice Department officials, in Washington and Detroit, all of whom denied leaking the information. The full report also concluded that Convertino was not the source, according to related court documents filed by his attorneys."

Nifong Seeks Recusal From Duke Lacrosse Case. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Whoriskey, Adcock) reports, "After months of stinging criticism about his handling of the Duke University sexual assault investigation, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong sought to bow out of the case yesterday, requesting that the North Carolina Attorney General's Office handle the prosecution." The Post continues, "His decision to recuse himself was welcomed by the defense team representing the three Duke lacrosse players initially accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party. … 'We feel very good about this. It's a fresh set of eyes looking at the case,' said William Cotter of Raleigh, one of three attorneys for Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y. 'We think it's more likely that they will listen to us and we will certainly be cooperative with him or her.'" The Post adds, "The defense believes that another prosecutor would, after reviewing the contradictions of the alleged victim's accounts and the paucity of physical evidence, drop the case. … Attorney General Roy Cooper's office deferred questions about Nifong's action until a news conference scheduled for Saturday."

The Washington Times (1/13, Seper) reports, "Mr. Nifong has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the investigation and was named Dec. 28 in an ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. The complaint accuses him of breaking four rules of professional conduct while speaking to reporters about the investigation. … The complaint said Mr. Nifong made 'extrajudicial statements' to reporters that 'he knew or reasonably should have known would be disseminated ... and would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing' the case. … The veteran prosecutor faces a preliminary state bar hearing on Jan. 24. A trial date has tentatively been scheduled for May 11."

The New York Times (1/13, Wilson, Barstow) reports, "Friday's action marked a stinging professional defeat for Mr. Nifong, who has faced accusations of incompetence, prosecutorial misconduct and ethical violations for his handling of the case. In his letter to Mr. Cooper, Mr. Nifong said the accusations of ethical wrongdoing, which were brought last month by the state bar, presented him with a conflict of interest between defending his own conduct and prosecuting this case. … According to friends, Mr. Nifong's resolve had begun to falter even before the ethics charges were brought against him. … At a court hearing on Dec. 15, a DNA laboratory director admitted that he and Mr. Nifong had deliberately withheld exculpatory information from a report. Mr. Nifong prided himself on integrity, having been a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, yet the laboratory director's testimony and his acknowledgment of the error undercut his reputation. … Things only worsened from there."

The AP (1/13) reports, "What comes next in the troubled prosecution of Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans will likely be determined by the lawyer appointed by State Attorney General Roy Cooper. His office declined to comment Friday night, but a spokeswoman said officials would speak with reporters Saturday. … Under North Carolina law, only a district attorney can formally request a special prosecutor. The request can be made when there are potential conflicts of interest, when a case is particularly complex or when there are other unusual circumstances. … Nifong led the investigation into allegations a 28-year-old student at North Carolina Central University — hired to perform as a stripper — was gang-raped and beaten at a March 13 party thrown by Duke's highly ranked lacrosse team. His frequent interviews with news agencies in the early days of the case generated much scrutiny; at one point, he called the lacrosse team 'a bunch of hooligans.' … But as he started to hand over his evidence to the defense, the case appeared to unravel. Legal experts and observers have said it appears to be based only on the testimony of an accuser who has told wildly different versions of the alleged assault — a shifting story that led Nifong to drop rape charges on Dec. 22. The three players remain charged with sexual offense and kidnapping."

Missing Missouri Boys Found Alive. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/13, Leonard) reported, "A 13-year-old boy who vanished from the gravel road near his home five days ago was found alive Friday about 60 miles away in a suburban St. Louis home, along with a 15-year-old boy missing since 2002, authorities said. Sharp-eyed police and suspicions about a white truck led police to the Kirkwood apartment of Michael Devlin, 41, who has been charged with one count of first-degree kidnapping, Sheriff Gary Toelke said. … Kirkwood city police officers were serving a warrant on an apartment complex when they noticed a white truck matching the description of a vehicle authorities had been searching" for Ben Ownby." The AP noted the Devlin neighbor Rick Butler "said the FBI came to his door Thursday night and showed a picture of Ben, asking if he had seen him." In a story distributed by McClatchy, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/14, Bell) reported, "After police arrested Devlin Friday morning, authorities went to the apartment. The first FBI agent to enter saw a familiar face." Corvington "said Ben Ownby had one question: 'Young Ben was sitting there and looked up … and said, "Are you going to take me home?"'

The agent turned to the other youth, who identified himself as Shawn Hornbeck."

NBC Nightly News (1/13, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) reported that "the boys' parents expressed joy that the children had been found and said it should give hope to the parents of other missing children." NBC (Kevin Tibbles): "Friday investigators went in and found Ben frightened but unharmed. Also inside a startling discover, another boy. One who had been missing for more than four years." FBI St. Louis SAC Roland Corvington: "The agent looked over at Shawn Hornbeck and asked Shawn to identify himself to which Shawn said yes, I'm Shawn Hornbeck." Tibbles: "Tonight two boys are back where they should be, with their families," although "many are asking how could one of the boys be essentially held captive in plain view less than an hour's drive from where he was kidnapped. Prosecutors say federal charges are likely to be made next week."

The Kansas City Star (1/14, Murphy) reported, "Devlin is scheduled to make his first court appearance this week in Franklin County on a charge of kidnapping Ben Ownby, but other charges are possible, Prosecutor Bob Parks said. Washington County, where Shawn Hornbeck's family lives, has not filed charges. The FBI also may file charges, based on evidence recovered from Devlin's apartment, agent Roland Corvington said at a Saturday news conference." The New York Times (1/14, Gay) also noted Corvington "told reporters that when officers entered the apartment, Ben asked: 'Are you going to take me home?' The boys had no visible injuries." The AP (1/14) reported, "A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said that FBI agents went to Imo's Pizza, where Devlin was a manager, and that the suspect revealed details giving agents probable cause to arrest him and search his apartment. They then found the boys, said the source, who refused to be identified because he was unauthorized to speak publicly about the case."

The New York Times (1/13, McGeehan), ABC World News (1/12, story 7, 0:15, Vargas), the CBS Evening News (1/12, story 2, 2:05, Mitchell also reported on the boys' recovery – and ABC World News (1/13, lead story, 3:30, Burman) reported on Saturday's press conference – but the stories did not mention Corvington or the FBI. Additionally, the story has dominated news coverage on CNN, MSNBC and Fox News since it broke on Friday. However, with the exception of Friday's and Saturday's press conferences – which were carried live by the cable news stations – the reports only mentioned the FBI in passing or not at all.

Hornbeck Apparently Had Access To Computer. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/16, Salter) reports, "While his alleged kidnapper was at work, teenager Shawn Hornbeck apparently had access to a computer, and he -- or someone pretending to be him -- may have put photos of Shawn online and posted a chilling message on a site created by his desperate parents: 'How long are you planning to look for your son?' … Investigators would not comment on the postings, and it was not immediately known if they were, in fact, created by Shawn or by someone trying to taunt his parents. Either way, they add to the long list of clues that no one seemed to pick up on during the 4 1/2 years that the boy was missing. They also deepen the mystery of why Shawn apparently made no attempt to escape or notify authorities." The AP notes, "Lloyd Bailie, Ben's uncle, said on CBS that Ben was talking about the ordeal only with his FBI counselors. 'No one's pushing him at this point to answer these questions,' Bailie said." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/15, Kohler, Sultan) also noted Ownby "was talking only with FBI counselors."

Coworkers Surprised By Allegations Against Devlin. The New York Times (1/16, Saulny) reports that when employees of Imo's Pizza in Kirkwood, Mo., "realized that a kidnapping suspect in the area had a vehicle that matched the description of the manager's white pickup truck, they had a few rounds of fun with it," although owner Mike Prosperi noted yesterday, "No one thought it could possibly be him. He was just too nice a guy." The Times notes Devlin "had been at work on Thursday and Friday, not watching over either boy. He even mentioned to Mr. Prosperi that the authorities were bothering him, snooping around his apartment building. Mr. Prosperi said he told Mr. Devlin on Friday morning that he should cooperate, as there must have been some sort of mix-up. But things changed as soon as the Federal Bureau of Investigation showed up to take Mr. Devlin away. … In minutes, Mr. Devlin went from unassuming and good-natured pizza cook to accused mastermind child abductor — and the people who were most surprised were among those who knew him best."

California Man Charged With Acting As Unregistered Yemeni Agent. The Bakersfield Californian (1/13, Logan) reported, "A Bakersfield business owner gave military secrets and equipment to Yemen as an agent of that country, a new indictment filed by the United States Attorney's Office alleges." Amen Ahmed Ali "was previously charged with buying and transporting military secrets and documents to Yemen, but he was not previously charged with doing so on behalf of the Yemeni government, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller. Under the new indictment, Ali is charged with conspiracy to act as an agent of a foreign government, unlawful export of defense articles and possession of stolen government property, attempted unlawful export of defense articles, conspiracy to gather, possess and transmit defense information and gathering defense information." The AP (1/14) also reported on the new charges against Ali.

Author Grisham In Real-Life Dispute Over Sleuthing. The Washington Post (1/13, A1, Jackman) reports, "He's a lawyer. He's a best-selling author. Now he's The Client. … The Virginia Supreme Court ruled yesterday that John Grisham must face a jury for his actions in a real-life whodunit." The Post continues, "Grisham…lives outside Charlottesville. His son attended the private St. Anne's-Belfield School, where he played baseball for Alan Swanson, the head coach. Grisham and Swanson became friends, according to court papers, and Grisham is on the school's board of trustees. … In 1996, Swanson's wife, Donna Swanson, began receiving harassing anonymous letters, which included allegations that her husband was cheating on her, according to the ruling. Grisham also received an anonymous letter." The Post adds, "In 1998, according to a lawsuit, 'Grisham was intrigued by the idea of trying to "get to the bottom" of who was writing them, and he decided to play amateur detective.' … Grisham and the Swansons targeted another St. Anne's parent, Katharine Almy of Charlottesville, who has three children. … Grisham and the Swansons took the letters to a handwriting expert, who told them that he needed more samples." The Post notes, "Both sides agree that Grisham and Alan Swanson then obtained enrollment and medical release forms from the school filled out by Almy and stamped 'strictly confidential.' They provided the forms to the handwriting expert, who issued a report saying the letters 'possibly' were written by Almy, the lawsuit states. … Grisham provided the expert's report and the letters to the Albemarle County police, and a detective visited Almy. The lawsuit states that she was horrified that she was being investigated and repeatedly denied writing the letters. The detective reportedly told her to stop writing the letters. The lawsuit says that Almy provided handwriting samples to another examiner, who cleared her, and that she passed a polygraph test. … But Almy alleges that she was devastated by the accusations and the investigation. And when she later found out that forms had been taken from school for use in the investigation, she was further humiliated."

Man Sentenced To 65 Years For Killing DC Journalist. The Washington Post (1/13, B5, Cauvin) reports, "The man convicted of delivering the blow last year that killed New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum was sentenced yesterday to spend what will almost certainly be the rest of his life behind bars." The Post continues, "Convicted last fall in D.C. Superior Court of first-degree murder, Percey Jordan, 43, was sentenced to 65 years in prison. … The punishment was handed down yesterday morning in an emotion-filled courtroom, with a prosecutor telling the judge that he should take away Jordan's 'hope,' a defense attorney asking for a measure of mercy and a grieving family grasping for justice. … 'I can't imagine a punishment that would fit this crime,' said a shaken Daniel Rosenbaum, the victim's son." The Post adds, "He was speaking to Judge Erik P. Christian but staring at Jordan, a few feet away. Rosenbaum's hands were trembling, and as he started to walk back to his seat, he paused for a moment and looked at Jordan, whose face betrayed little. … Christian, who presided over Jordan's trial in October, said he hoped that during his imprisonment Jordan would eventually acknowledge what he had done. … Last week, Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to his part in the robbery and was sentenced to 26 years. As part of his plea agreement, Hamlin testified against Jordan. … Despite the prospect of such testimony, Jordan had chosen to go to trial. On Oct. 24, he was convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit robbery and robbery of a senior citizen."

The New York Times (1/13, Abruzzese) reports, "Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, who was sentenced to 26 years for his role in the death, testified that Mr. Jordan had struck the former reporter over the head with a pipe while he took his wallet. Last week, Mr. Hamlin was sentenced after pleading guilty late last year to second-degree murder."

Recording Industry Granted Default Judgment In Piracy Case. The AP (1/13, Press) reports, "Less than a month after the recording industry dropped a music piracy case against a well-known opponent, it has won a default judgment against her 20-year-old daughter." The AP continues, "Judge Stephen C. Robinson of United States District Court ordered the daughter, Michelle Santangelo, to pay $750 for each of the 41 songs she is accused of downloading illegally — a total of $30,750 — because she failed to respond to the record companies' claims. … It was not clear whether the default judgment would end the case. Under federal rules, such judgments are often later set aside so lawsuits can be decided on their merits." The AP adds, "Ms. Santangelo's lawyer, Jordan Glass, said he was not permitted to comment on the judgment, which was returned on Wednesday. He would not elaborate. … Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the Recording Industry Association of America, which is coordinating the thousands of piracy suits filed by the record companies, also declined to comment. … Michelle Santangelo is the oldest of five children of Patricia Santangelo, who became a defendant in the battle against illegal downloading. When the elder Ms. Santangelo, 42, of Wappingers Falls, N.Y., was sued in 2005 by five record companies, she said she had never downloaded music. If her children did, she said, the file-sharing programs, not the parents, should be blamed. … Ms. Santangelo refused to settle with the record companies and took her case to newspapers and national television. She became a heroine to defenders of Internet freedom, who helped raise money for her defense."

FBI Raid Of Chicago Official's Home, Office Turned Up "Suspect" Drugs, Gun. The Chicago Tribune (1/13, Coen) reports, "Federal documents made public Friday show the scope of the investigation into Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman and indicate the FBI may not be done looking into her connections to street gangs." The Tribune continues, "Evidence logs from searches of Troutman's home and office on Monday also show that agents allegedly found suspected drugs, drug paraphernalia and a handgun. … Earlier this week, authorities charged Troutman with accepting a bribe to smooth the way for a mixed-use development on the South Side. Troutman has denied the accusations." The Tribune adds, "The documents show some of the suspected drugs were recovered in Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue, where the revolver also was found. A 'white powdery substance in Ziploc plastic bag' was found in her office at 5958 S. State St., the documents state, noting it was found in a desk drawer. … FBI spokesman Ross Rice said laboratory testing of the substances was not complete. … Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said he believes that testing will show the powder was a vitamin supplement." The Tribune notes, "Troutman, the 20th Ward alderman, has been under law enforcement scrutiny in the past for her association with Donnell 'Scandalous' Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who has fled to avoid drug conspiracy charges."

WSJournal Reviews Report On Berger Document Theft. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The more we learn about Sandy Berger's brilliant career as a document thief, the clearer it becomes that there is plenty we still don't know and may never learn. … Thanks to Justice's and the Archives' leniency, or laxity, or both, Mr. Berger's plea deal expires in 2008 -- just in time, perhaps, for the next Clinton Administration.

CIVIL LAW:

California Challenges US Abortion Amendment. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/13, B-2, Egelko) reports, "A state lawyer urged a judge Friday to head off a collision between California health laws and a federal anti-abortion amendment that could cost the state a ruinous $37 billion in funding if it penalized doctors or hospitals for refusing to perform emergency abortions." The Chronicle continues, "Deputy Attorney General Timothy Muscat argued that the conflict could be avoided if federal laws that require doctors to provide emergency medical care were interpreted to include performing an abortion when necessary to save a woman's life or prevent serious health damage. But a Bush administration lawyer said such an interpretation would be improper. … 'We cannot rewrite a statute,' Justice Department attorney James Gilligan told U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White at a hearing in San Francisco. Gilligan said the legislation that the state is challenging does not require doctors or hospitals to perform abortions, even in emergencies, if they would find the procedures morally offensive." The Chronicle notes, "White heard arguments from opposing lawyers, including those from Christian medical organizations that support the federal amendment, and did not indicate how or when he would rule. … The amendment, part of a spending bill that President Bush signed in December 2004, denies a wide range of federal funding to states that discriminate against any health provider, health maintenance organization or insurer that does not offer abortions or abortion referrals. … California was the only state to challenge the amendment."

Federal Currency Policies Challenged By Advocates For The Blind. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (1/13, Farmer) reports, "Judith Vido has signed an online petition protesting the Bush administration's decision to oppose a court-ordered redesign of the nation's currency to help the blind. … A blogger and author, Vido was the 640th person to do so this week. As of yesterday, more than 3,600 names appeared on the petition, which can be found at www.petitiononline.com/mfaacp/petition.html." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Blinded as a teen because of complications from diabetes, she uses her computer with the aid of screen-reading technology for her writing, which includes books of several genres, including romance. … 'The judge has said this is violation of our civil rights. I happen to agree.' Vido, of Richmond, said. 'I have problems when my partner isn't here and I grab money from my savings. I can't always identify it. Yes, I keep certain amounts in my wallet that I fold. But I don't always know what I have.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "The administration's appeal seeks to overturn a ruling in November by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who ordered the Department of the Treasury to find ways for the blind to recognize the different denominations of currency. Robertson noted that of 180 nations printing paper currency, only the United States makes no effort to make it discernable without vision. … Justice Department lawyers filed the appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on behalf of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson last month. … Robertson had ruled in a lawsuit brought by the American Council of the Blind. The council proposed several options for changes, including printing different size bills or changing the texture by adding embossed dots or foil."

Navy Halts Lockheed Contract. The Washington Post (1/13, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "The Navy yesterday ordered Lockheed Martin to stop work on a $260 million ship after the company warned of a significant cost increase that has also spurred the service to reconsider the way it purchases the vessels. The unusual order, which lasts 90 days, is a blow to Lockheed and is among a series of cost overruns in Navy shipbuilding programs."

Alabama Commissioner To Keep Seat Pending Appeal Of DOJ Ruling. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/13, Amy) reports, "A three-judge federal panel in Montgomery agreed to give the state time to appeal a U.S. Justice Department ruling that says Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Chastang was invalid. … 'The state of Alabama is allowed additional time to seek timely reconsideration of the decision,' wrote Judges Stanley Marcus, Myron Thompson and Harold Albritton in an order filed Thursday." The Press-Register continues, "Plaintiffs in the court case, which ultimately led to the Justice Department ruling, had asked the court this week to set an election within 90 days. Chastang, a black Republican, has said he would run in the election, though the majority-black district has historically elected Democrats. … But campaigning will be on hold. The court told Riley to file his request for reconsideration with the Justice Department, and to check in on the first day of every month, starting in February, with a status update. … Keith Miller, Alabama's chief deputy attorney general, said he expected the request to be filed in 'days, not weeks.'" The Press-Register adds, "Cecil Gardner, the lawyer for Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark, three Democrats who filed the case to force an election, said he had no objection to the order. He did say he planned to file a motion next week asking the court to order the state to file within 10 days, to prevent any delays meant to extend Chastang's time in office. … The Justice Department ruling, issued Monday, would essentially void an earlier 1988 state Supreme Court decision that said governors should appoint replacement commissioners when a vacancy occurs between elections."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Pilots Oppose Takeover By US Airways. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/13, Grantham) reports, "Delta Air Lines' pilots union is devoting $15 million to the fight against US Airways' hostile buyout bid and temporarily moving leaders to Washington so they can lobby politicians and investors." The AJC continues, "Union leaders were already in Washington this week plotting strategy and buttonholing politicians when US Airways upped its offer for Delta by $1.7 billion, to about $10.3 billion. … Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association unit, said in a letter to pilots that the merger poses a 'clear and present danger to the careers of all Delta employees.' … He said the fattened offer would add more debt to the merged airline and that it raises questions about US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker's credibility. … 'Two weeks ago, Parker definitively stated that he had no intention of increasing his offer. [Wednesday], he increased his offer, while at the same time reaffirming his "plan" for no "frontline" employee furloughs,' Moak wrote. … 'But on the same day, Parker's No. 2 man was openly discussing additional divestitures beyond those originally disclosed to quell antitrust concerns that US Airways claims don't exist in the first place. With divestitures come job losses. Make no mistake — Parker's plan will result in thousands of job losses regardless of Parker's empty promises,' Moak wrote." The AJC notes, "Industry experts say the battle for Delta is likely to escalate in the wake of US Airways' sweetened bid. US Airways has given Delta's bankruptcy court creditors a Feb. 1 deadline to indicate support. … Delta management opposes the US Airways bid, but the creditors, who will hold substantial equity in Delta when it emerges from Chapter 11, could force it to pursue the deal."

Bid Deadline For Tribune Nears With Few Apparent Suitors. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Ellison) reports, "Wednesday night, as the final deadline for bids for Tribune Co. arrives, the company could be throwing the first large-cap media party that nobody shows up for." The Journal continues, "While a few private-equity firms are likely to band together in a half-hearted bid for the media group, compared with the spirited competitions for such properties as Clear Channel Communications Inc. and Univision, Tribune's sale process has generated mostly shrugs from the private-equity world. And there isn't a McClatchy-like suitor either, as there was with the sale of Knight Ridder last year. … Instead, most of the attention lavished on Tribune has come from so-called vanity buyers, such as David Geffen and Ron Burkle, who are interested in the Los Angeles Times. … But Tribune, like many other newspaper firms, is saddled with tax issues that make selling itself in pieces prohibitively expensive for would-be buyers. Tribune's last and best hopes may lie with its own major shareholders: either a bid from the Chandler family, the company's largest shareholder and the one that, ironically, triggered the whole public auction process; or a management-led buyout aided by its own McCormick Tribune foundation, the management-controlled charity that is the company's second-largest shareholder." The Journal adds, "If Tribune ends up without a good bid for the entire company, it will be back where it started more than seven months ago: with a lagging stock price, disgruntled investors and no certain path for how to solve its overarching strategic problems. Oddly, that could be a partial vindication of Tribune management."

Dolans Sweeten Bid For Cablevision. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Grant, Berman) reports, "A potential showdown over the fate of Cablevision Systems Corp. stands to test the limits of how well board directors and shareholders can organize to fight a 'take private' plan offered by controlling shareholders of a public company." The Journal continues, "On Friday, Cablevision's controlling Dolan family increased by about $1 billion to $8.9 billion its privatization offer first made in October. Such increases are usually part of a friendly back-and-forth negotiation between big shareholders and independent board members representing public owners. … But judging from the combative tone of the Dolans' news release, fissures have developed between the two sides, which left in doubt whether the Dolans would prevail." The Journal adds, "The family declared its most recent offer 'best and final' and noted that the length of negotiations was creating potentially harmful uncertainty to the company. The family also imposed a deadline on the process, saying that its offer would expire by close of business Wednesday, according to a letter sent to a special committee of directors by Cablevision founder Charles Dolan and his son, James Dolan, the company's chief executive. … The Dolans noted their increased offer of $30 a share represents an 11.1% increase over their $27 offer in October and a 23.7% premium to what the cable operator's 52-week high was at that time. The Dolans also added a few sweeteners that indicate the committee, consisting of two independent directors, may be balking on the price. The family has agreed to put the deal to a majority vote of public shareholders, which would exclude the Dolans who own 20% of the company but control 70.4% of the voting shares."

Mexico Worried About Tortilla Price-Fixing. The AP (1/13, Orsi) reports, "Soaring international demand for corn has caused a spike in prices for Mexico's humble tortilla, hitting the poor and forcing President Felipe Calderon's business-friendly government into an uncomfortable confrontation with powerful monopolies." The AP continues, "Tortilla prices jumped nearly 14 percent during the past year, a move Mexico's Central Bank Gov. Guillermo Ortiz called 'unjustifiable' in a country where inflation ran about 4 percent. Ortiz pinned the blame on companies' monopolizing the market and blocking competition. … 'We clearly have a problem of speculation,' he said." The AP adds, "Economists also blame increased U.S. production of ethanol from corn as an alternative to oil. The battle over the tortilla, the most basic staple of the Mexican diet especially among the poor, demonstrates how increasing economic integration is felt on the street level. … 'This is direct evidence of the way globalization is affecting all walks of life in Mexico and all over the world,' said David Barkin, an economics professor at the Xochimilco campus of the Autonomous Metropolitan University in Mexico City. … The federal government's antitrust watchdog announced this week it was investigating allegations companies were manipulating corn prices and making deals to limit the supply of corn to boost prices of tortillas."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

New Forest Service Chief Chosen. The New York Times/AP (1/13, Press) reports Montana forester Gail Kimbell "was named the new chief of the United States Forest Service." Kimbell "has been a top official at the Forest Service, helping President Bush develop the 'healthy forests' program that lets companies log large, commercially valuable trees in national forests in exchange for clearing smaller trees and brush. Environmentalists called it a giveaway to logging companies that supported Mr. Bush."

WPost Welcomes EPA Admission On Chesapeake Bay Pollution. The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K) editorializes, "A recent admission by an Environmental Protection Agency official that the Chesapeake Bay is not getting cleaner fast enough is as obvious as it is late. 'If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two,' EPA administrator Rich Batiuk told a meeting of an advisory group on the bay's health last week. To that, Roy Hoagland of the nonprofit Chesapeake Bay Foundation responded with a resounding 'duh.' … As 2007 begins, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the federal government must resolve to more aggressively pursue pollution reduction targets. … If Democrats in Congress are serious about proposals to retool farm legislation to subsidize rural conservation, they must remember the Chesapeake watershed when drafting their farm bill.

Former Crow Tribal Official Acquitted Of Lying About Finances. The AP (1/13) reports, "A former Crow tribal official has been acquitted of charges that he lied to the U.S. Department of Justice about his finances, to avoid paying restitution owed the tribe for criminal activity in the 1990s." The AP continues, "A federal jury Friday acquitted Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., indicted on three counts of false statements. The indictment alleged that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution. … 'I'm absolutely relieved,' Hogan said after the acquittal. 'There is justice in Montana.'" The AP adds, "Hogan was the Crow Indian Tribe's secretary in the 1970s and 1980s. … In the 1990s he was convicted in a corruption scandal while executive director of the Crow Tribal Housing Authority, and received a prison sentence of two years. U.S. District Judge Jack Shanstrom also ordered $35,100 in restitution to the tribe, which Hogan finished paying last February. The indictment alleging false statements was filed two months later. … In the case decided Friday, prosecutors charged Hogan claimed he had few or no assets, yet received money from investors and gave money to relatives and tribal officials. Prosecutors said Hogan's offenses included failing to report his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Deal Would Allow Army To Keep DEA Supplied With Helicopters In Bahamas. The AP (1/13, Anderson) reports, "Army air support would continue for U.S.-Bahamas drug interdiction efforts even after the Pentagon withdraws its Blackhawk helicopters later this year under an agreement announced Friday by U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson." The AP continues, "Nelson, D-Fla., said the Army has offered to give the Drug Enforcement Administration three Sikorsky S-76 helicopters by 2008 to replace the Blackhawks and spend $3.4 million a year for the next five years to maintain the "Hawk's Nest" helicopter base in the Bahamas. … 'This will keep cocaine and marijuana smugglers from operating off Florida's coast,' said Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. 'With the Army's continued support, the U.S.-Bahamas antidrug effort will remain fully operational.'" The AP adds, "The announcement came as Nelson departed Friday on a two-day trip that includes stops in Haiti and a flight with the DEA over the Bahamas. … Nelson was among several members of Congress and the Bush administration who raised objections to a proposal last year by then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld to redeploy the seven Bahamas Blackhawks because of war needs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who oversees the DEA, was among those questioning the move."

Columnist Contrasts War On Drugs With War In Iraq. New York Times guest columnist Orlando Patterson (1/13) writes, "America's unwillingness to recognize the socioeconomic context of the drug crisis at home and abroad, to see that being surrounded by failing states threatens its security, to provide aid where it is most effective, and to acknowledge that the root cause of this hemispheric disaster is not supply but its own citizens' insatiable demand for illicit drugs, is as incomprehensible as the quagmire in Iraq."

IMMIGRATION:

Snow Defends White House Stance On Border Guard Shooting Case. The Washington Times (1/13, Dinan, 88K) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "said the case of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are seeking a pardon for having shot a fleeing suspected drug dealer has been mischaracterized and the agents violated regulations." Snow "said there has been 'a characterization that somehow the government is turning a blind eye toward the law in enforcing the law,' but said the facts of the case show the two agents broke the law. Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation. Border Patrol advocates say the punishment is too harsh."

Federal Judge Probes Colorado ICE Raid. The New York Times/AP (1/13) reports John L. Kane of Federal District Court in Denver "demanded that immigration officials disclose the whereabouts of 265 people arrested in a meatpacking-plant raid last month. The judge…gave Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials until Jan. 22 to submit a list accounting for all the detainees, including those who have been deported. Union lawyers are contesting the arrests at the Swift & Company meat processing plant in Greeley, one of six Swift plants in six states that were raided on Dec. 13." The Denver Post (1/13, 256K) reports Kane "said any workers who signed agreements to voluntarily return to their home countries now must be allowed to withdraw that agreement if they wish. … United Food and Commercial Workers union attorneys had filed a petition contending that arrests in the raids violated workers' constitutional due process rights. Immigration officials deny that."

TAX:

Pence Alleges Administration Planning To Raise Payroll Taxes. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M) Rep. Mike Pence writes, "The administration hasn't learned from last year. Despite electoral defeats, it is still advancing Social Security reform as an argument over solvency. The centerpiece of George Bush's plan was to have been personal retirement accounts for workers who wanted to establish their own nest egg -- a much better deal for them and a down payment on the huge liabilities owed by the entire system. Unfortunately, his plan faltered. … While Mr. Bush has reiterated his opposition to tax increases, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has repeatedly said that everything is on the table for negotiations with the Democratic Congress. When Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the White House was ruling out a tax increase in Social Security reform, he replied, 'No, I'm not.' … Raising payroll taxes would prove devastating to working Americans, small business and the economy as a whole. Worse, it would only serve as a short-term band-aid to Social Security's financial woes."

DOJ_NMG_0117271

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Drug Benefit Change Opposed By Bush. The Washington Post (1/13, A2, Lee, 690K) reports the House voted 255-170 "to require the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." However, "the measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate, a veto threat from President Bush, and considerable doubts from experts about whether it would save elderly and disabled Americans much money." The bill would overturn "a provision of the 2003 law pushed through by a Republican-controlled Congress that left drug-price negotiations under the new Medicare drug benefit to the private insurers that offer government-subsidized drug plans for seniors in each state. Backers of the current system, mainly Republicans, say it pits insurers against one another in a healthy competition to negotiate the lowest prices from drugmakers and offer seniors the most attractive monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies. But critics, mainly Democrats, say the system is a boon to drug companies because it prohibits the government …from using its bargaining muscle on behalf of seniors."

The CBS Evening News (1/12, story 9, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) said, "It was the latest item on the Democrats' first 100 hour agenda of legislation. Prospects for Senate approval, however, are not healthy." The New York Times (1/13, Pear, 1.16M) reports "the measure is unlikely to become law in its current form," though "some version, focusing on certain types of very expensive drugs, has bipartisan support in the Senate." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "If this bill is presented to the president, he will veto it." According to the Times, Democrats, "who like to portray Republicans as a tool of special interests, said a veto would hand them an issue that could be used to good effect in the 2008 elections."

The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Neuman, 850K) reports, "Although the bill is unlikely to become law, it is likely to help shape the debate that could result in a more limited measure that allows some dickering between the government and the pharmaceutical industry over drug costs. … At the least, the House bill signals a shift in Washington from President Bush's view that private enterprise and individual citizens should play the most prominent role in the decisions that determine healthcare costs."

Drug Industry Plans Response. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "Following a lobbying and advertising blitz by drug companies to block the Democratic attacks, health insurers are preparing their own counterattack. America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry's Washington-based trade group, is telling lawmakers that cuts in insurer subsidies would be tantamount to cuts in benefits for constituents, and it has readied maps to show the growth of Medicare Advantage plans throughout the country, compared to relatively sparse numbers before government payments increased. It will tap the Coalition for Medicare Choices, a group for Medicare Advantage beneficiaries that AHIP started and funds, to bring satisfied customers to Congress. And AHIP will highlight research showing that a large portion of Medicare Advantage beneficiaries are minorities or have low incomes -- populations shown to suffer disproportionately from chronic health problems that plans say they can manage better than the government."

WPost Calls' Democrats' Measure "Misguided." The Washington Post (1/13, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes that the measure "is misguided. … The Congressional Budget Office estimated this week that savings from direct negotiation would be 'negligible.' Not only are the Democrats too optimistic about government negotiation; they are also too pessimistic about the current system in which private insurers administering Medicare drug benefits do the price bargaining."

In Reversal, Reid Backs Earmark Disclosure Bill. The New York Times (1/13, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "Senate Democratic leaders on Friday embraced a proposal to shed light on the murky practice of Congressional earmarks, reversing themselves after trying to block an almost identical measure the day before. The Democrats' switch makes it likely that the Senate will follow the new House rules requiring the disclosure of the sponsor as well as the cost and the purpose of any earmark. … The reversal follows a White House statement of support for the measure and a day of news coverage noting that Senate Democrats were opposing a rule that their House counterparts had just adopted a week ago." Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he had come around to the measure after some adjustments that he said had strengthened it."

Senate Bars Convicted Former Members From Receiving Pensions. The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "voted unanimously to bar congressional lawmakers convicted of corruption from collecting federal pensions. … The pension measure, an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill…applies to current and future lawmakers convicted of bribery, conspiracy and perjury charges. It passed 87-0." Democrats "lauded yesterday's vote as a victory over the 'culture of corruption' they say permeated Congress under Republican rule. They regularly cited former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, California Republican, who was convicted of bribery in 2005. The measure, however, is not retroactive, so Cunningham will receive his $64,000 pension annually as will at least 16 other convicted lawmakers, 12 Democrats and four Republicans."

The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Simon, 850K) reports, "Federal employees in all branches of government forfeit their pensions if convicted of 'crimes against the United States,' such as treason. 'The best way to restore and rebuild the trust of the American people is to ensure that we stand firmly against members of Congress who betray the public trust,' said Sen. John F. Kerry." CNN.com (1/12) notes House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer "said Friday that the House will take up a similar bill next Friday."

Senate To Vote On Eliminating Some Oil Industry Subsidies. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A2, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "Big Oil is set to take a beating from House Democrats on Thursday when they are prepared to vote on a bill they say will 'roll back' about $13 billion worth of subsidies the executive branch and Congress have given oil companies. … The House Democrats' package includes three major items. One will impose a 'conservation fee' on about 40 companies producing oil in the Gulf of Mexico that have leases from 1998 and 1999 and which failed to include a clause requiring royalty payments if oil prices rose, which they have. The omission was caused by an Interior Department error, but if the companies don't pay the fee, the proposal would bar them from getting new leases. Democrats will also reduce accelerated tax write-offs for oil- and gas-exploration expenses, and shrink a tax-depreciation measure, contained in a 2004 jobs bill, that gives companies producing oil and gas in the U.S. the equivalent of a 1% corporate-tax reduction. The Washington Post (1/13, D5, Mufson, 690K) reports Natural Resources Committee Chairman Nick Rahall and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel "introduced the bill, which trims breaks for geological work and excludes oil and gas from a 2004 measure that would effectively reduce their tax rate to 32 percent, from 35 percent."

The New York Times (1/13, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the oil industry "angrily denounced an effort by House Democratic leaders Friday that would repeal billions of dollars worth of incentives and plow the money into renewable energy projects. … The giant integrated oil companies, like Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have been more resigned about losing some of their tax breaks but are quietly resisting pressure to renegotiate leases that allow them to pump billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from publicly owned waters without paying royalties to the government. … A few oil giants, including BP and Shell, agreed to give up the loopholes. But industry executives said one big player in the gulf, Exxon Mobil, has refused to renegotiate, arguing that it signed the leases in good faith. Chevron, which with several partners recently announced the discovery of a giant oil field that may include two of the flawed leases, said it had submitted a 'reasonable' proposal but had not reached an accord."

GOP Pushes Pelosi To Include American Samoa In Minimum Wage Bill. The Washington Post (1/13, A2, Weisman, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, "dogged by Republican charges of a double standard, said yesterday that American Samoa may join the Northern Mariana Islands as U.S. territories that would have to comply with a higher federal minimum wage. … The bill would leave American Samoa as the only territory not covered by the $7.25 rate, and because Samoa is represented by a Democrat, Del. Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, Republicans cried foul. Faleomavaega's campaign coffers have been well stocked by the tuna industry that dominates his island economy, but Republicans picked up on another issue: StarKist owns one of the largest canneries on the island, and Del Monte Foods, StarKist's parent company, is based in San Francisco, which Pelosi represents." The Washington Times (1/13, A1, Hurt, 88K) reports the decision "follows criticism over the exemption, reported earlier this week by The Washington Times, to allow tuna canneries in American Samoa to continue paying $3.26 an hour."

House Democrats Unveil College Loan Rate Cut Proposal. The New York Times (1/13, Schemo, 1.16M) reports that yesterday House Democrats "unveiled a bill that would cut interest rates on federally subsidized loans to college students by half over the next five years. They said they would finance the $6 billion measure by increasing costs that lenders pay to the government and reducing the largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits." According to the Times, the bill "underscores the Democrats' all-out effort to consolidate gains made in November among middle-class voters. … The measure is expected to pass in the House, where it is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday. Its future in the Senate is less certain."

Pelosi Using "100-Hour-Clock" Selectively. The AP (1/12, Hunt) reports, " The clock is ticking for House Democrats, but it's hard to tell what time it is. On Friday, for example, the House was in session for a little more than eight hours. Only five of them, however, ticked off on new Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for quickly passing a six-bill agenda that Democrats promised voters last fall." With passage of the Medicare prescription drug bill, Pelosi "is two-thirds of the way done -- in under a quarter of the allotted hours, according to her count. That's because just as the official clock for a basketball or football game stops for time-outs and commercial breaks, Democrats aren't counting the minutes spent on business unrelated to those six designated bills." The New York Times (1/13, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Republicans "retaliated with their own online clock on Wednesday. They are counting down the hours passed by 'a Democrat caucus fresh out of ideas.' … By the end of the day Friday, the Democratic clock read 23 hours and 34 minutes, while the Republican clock, which was counting down from 100, read 75 hours."

Doolittle Will No Longer Employ Wife As Fundraiser. The Washington Post (1/13, A5, 690K) is one of several major newspapers to run an AP report on Rep. John Doolittle's announcement that he "will no longer employ his wife as his campaign fundraiser, an arrangement that allowed her to collect a 15 percent cut of donations to his campaign and political action committees -- more than $100,000 since 2003." Doolittle," who has drawn criticism for links to disgraced lobbyist Jack A. Abramoff, said he will hire an outside fundraiser."

Cheney In "Twilight" Of Career, But Still Influential With Bush. The AP (1/13, Raum) writes that while "the hardline conservatives like Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Bolton who stood shoulder to shoulder with Vice President Dick Cheney in pushing President Bush's decision to invade Iraq have left the administration," Cheney himself, though "in the twilight days of his political career," is "still there, with little evidence that his influence with Bush has waned." Cheney, who was "once viewed as adding an air of gravitas to an inexperienced president," is now "seen by many Americans as a driving force behind Bush's most divisive initiatives: the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program, harsh detention and interrogation policies and an aggressive push for expanded executive authority. Bad as Bush's poll numbers are, Cheney's are worse. And while he's still beloved by conservatives, it seems unlikely he will be a big draw on the 2008 campaign circuit."

Libby Trial Could Provide "Ammunition For Democrats." Bloomberg (1/12, O'Reilly, Rosenkrantz) reports that the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby "may provide ammunition for Democrats looking to attack the White House for its conduct in the run-up to the Iraq war." Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff "faces as many as 30 years in prison" if convicted of perjury and obstruction "for lying to a grand jury probing the leak of a CIA agent's name." His trial starts Tuesday, and defense lawyers "say they'll call Cheney as a witness to bolster claims Libby was too busy with security matters to accurately remember events. His testifying is risky for both men. What Cheney recalls may undermine Libby's too-busy defense while exposing the vice president to probes by Congress of how the Bush administration promoted the war." The Times of London (1/13, Reid) headlines a report, "Cheney Is Forced To Testify In Case Of The Crime That Never Was."

Some SMU Professors Oppose Hosting Of Bush Library. The AP (1/13, Brown) reports, "Negotiations to build George W. Bush's presidential library at Southern Methodist University have divided the campus, pitting the administration and some alumni against liberal-leaning faculty members who say the project would be an embarrassment to the school." Some professors say the "combined library, museum and think tank would celebrate a presidency that unnecessarily took the country into a war." But SMU officials "said the project is unlikely to be derailed by the faculty opposition, and said the professors opposed to it are in the minority."

NCLB Teacher Training Provisions Said To Be Subjective. The Washington Post (1/13, Chandler, 690K), in a front-page article titled "For Teachers, Being 'Highly Qualified' Is A Subjective Matter," reports the No Child Left Behind law "called for states to ensure that all teachers in core academic subjects are 'highly qualified' to help students succeed -- an unprecedented mandate that has delivered less than promised. The law, which turned five years old this week, has held schools to increasingly higher standards for student achievement. For teachers, however, standards meant to guarantee that they know their subjects are often vague and open to broad interpretation. Legal loopholes and uneven implementation by states and the U.S. Department of Education have diluted the law's impact on the teaching workforce, some education experts say. They say that meeting the standards of quality is more about shuffling paper than achieving two vital goals: ensuring that teachers are prepared to help students succeed and reducing the teacher talent gap between rich and poor schools. … This week, senior Democratic lawmakers discussed an extension of No Child Left Behind with President Bush. In the coming congressional debate over the law, teacher quality is likely to be a key issue. Some experts favor shifting the emphasis from 'highly qualified' to 'highly effective' teachers, requiring states to look not just at credentials but how well individual teachers help students learn and perform on tests."

SCOTUS Adds Death Penalty, Tobacco Cases. The Washington Post (1/13, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports the Supreme Court "added four cases to its docket for the current term yesterday, including a review of a judge's decision to dismiss a potential juror from a death-penalty case because of the man's equivocal statements about capital punishment. A federal appeals court overturned the trial judge's ruling in a rape and murder trial in the state of Washington. One of the issues in the case is whether federal courts should defer to a trial judge who is in a position to actually talk to and observe a potential juror in making the decision about his ability to carry out the law. … Among the cases justices said yesterday that they will decide is a question of whether a cigarette manufacturer can move a lawsuit against it to federal jurisdiction and out of the state courts, where judgments against tobacco companies have been mounting." The Los Angeles Times (1/13, Savage, 850K) reports the capital punishment case "will be the fourth case before the justices this term in which the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit had reversed a murder conviction or a death sentence. In all four, state prosecutors appealed to the high court, arguing the judges of the appeals court had overstepped their authority and wrongly second-guessed a state court's decision."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Hits Another Record-High Close. The New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) reports, "Wall Street rebounded from an early loss yesterday to send the Dow Jones industrial average to its second consecutive record close as investors embraced robust economic data and shrugged off several profit warnings." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "jumped 41.10 points, or 0.33 percent, to 12,556.08. It was the index's 24th record close since the start of October." The S&P 500 "climbed 6.91 points, or 0.49 percent, to 1,430.73," while the Nasdaq "increased 17.97 points, or 0.72 percent, to 2,502.82." NBC Nightly News (1/12, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) also had the numbers.

Dollar Ends Advance, But Analysts Expect Gains To Resume. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, B5, Lindenmayer, 2.04M) says the dollar "ended its three-day advance Friday, largely shrugging off a series of positive data releases. But analysts say they expect the currency to post further gains this coming week as the market focuses on renewed optimism about the state of the U.S. economy. … In late-afternoon trading in New York, the euro stood at $1.2919 from $1.2894 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 120.37 yen from 120.50 yen late Thursday."

Holiday Shopping Season Was Stronger Than Expected. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A3, Gerena-Morales, Hudson, 2.04M) reports, "As it turned out, shoppers spent more freely during the just-ended holiday season than had been thought, helping some retailers end the year on strong footing and suggesting that economic growth could be rebounding faster than expected. Retail sales jumped 0.9% in December from the month before, to a seasonally adjusted $369.9 billion, the Commerce Department said Friday. December's growth was up from a gain of 0.6% in November and was the strongest rate of growth in retail sales since July. When compared to December a year ago, retail sales were up 5.4% compared with December-to-December growth of 5.7% in 2005." The Financial Times (1/13, Callan) says the "steady rise suggests consumer spending helped support economic growth in the last quarter of the year, offsetting a sharp correction in the housing sector and weakness in manufacturing." The Washington Post (1/13, D1, Mui, 690K) and the AP (1/12, Crutsinger) also report on the strong numbers.

CNN To Host First Two Presidential Debates In Early April. CNN.com (1/12, Preston) reports the New Hampshire Union Leader and WMUR-TV of Manchester "will partner with CNN to host two presidential debates in April, executives with the three media companies announced Friday." CNN's Wolf Blitzer will moderate the April 4 and 5 debates, which "will be televised live nationally on CNN." On CNN's The Situation Room (1/12), Blitzer called it "an unprecedented early kick-off to a wide open race for the White House." On the same show, Blitzer asked Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, "How important is it for presidential hopefuls to show up at these early debates?" Dean replied, "I think it's important. I think you'll see people doing it, too. We went through about 27 of them four years, ago and the reason is, if four or five people say yes, then you really have to not miss the opportunity."

Democrats Look To West As They Assemble Electoral Vote Strategy For 2008. Under the headline "West Is Going In Democrats' Direction," the Washington Post (1/13, A4, Reid, 690K) recalls that "when the major political parties gathered for their national conventions in 2004, Colorado had a Republican governor, a Republican-controlled legislature and a Republican edge of 5 to 2 in the state's congressional delegation. Today, Colorado's governor is a Democrat. The Democrats control both houses of the legislature. Four of the seven congressional seats are held by Democrats. That transformation, mirrored in varying degrees across the Rocky Mountain West, is a key reason the Democratic Party decided this week to hold its 2008 nomination convention in Denver." As Democratic leaders "ponder how they can regain the White House in the next election, the region looks more and more essential to an electoral-vote victory."

McCain's Presidential Hopes Could Hinge On Success Of Bush Iraq Strategy. In a front page story, the Washington Post (1/13, Balz, Murray, 690K) looks at how Sen. John McCain's support of President Bush on Iraq is impacting McCain's likely presidential campaign. The piece begins by saying, "There is no mistaking the anguish" of McCain. "Sitting in his Senate office, he is uncharacteristically subdued, his voice at times almost inaudible." While the White House "finally embraced his long-standing call to send more troops to Iraq, McCain believes the way it has handled the war 'will go down as one of the worst' mistakes in the history of the American military. 'One of the most frustrating things that's ever happened in my political life,' he said, 'is watching this train wreck.'" The Post says "no politician in the United States is more clearly identified" with Bush's surge strategy than the "all but announced presidential candidate," and "no politician has more to lose if it fails. Democratic opponents have already coined a name for the troop 'surge': the McCain Doctrine. … On the night of Bush's speech, he told CNN's Larry King: 'I would much rather lose an election than lose a war.' The risk now is that both could be lost."

Dean Says McCain "Sounds Very Much Like Richard Nixon" On Iraq. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/12), Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said of McCain, "He sounds very much like Richard Nixon, you know, 'just stay a little longer, stay a little longer.' We'll stay long enough to lose another 5,000 or 10,000 people. It still won't change anything. We never should have gone there in the first place."

Tancredo Says There Is A "Distinct Possibility" He Will Run For President. Cox Newspapers (1/13, Moscoso) reports Rep. Tom Tancredo "hinted Friday that he is ready to pursue the Oval Office. When asked whether he plans to take action to start an official bid for the GOP nomination he said, 'That is a distinct possibility.'"

GOP Hopefuls Hunter, Paul Create Presidential Exploratory Committees. CNN's The Situation Room (1/12, Blitzer) reported, "Rep. Duncan Hunter today formally filed papers to form his presidential exploratory committee. The California Republican took the first step toward a White House bid more than two months ago, after he originally announced he was making preparations to run. Now he is exploring. A Republican congressman from Texas took his first step today toward a longshot bid for the White House. A spokesman says Rep. Ron Paul formed a presidential exploratory committee today as well. Paul was the Libertarian Party nominee for president back in 1988."

Richardson Plans Announcement On 2008 By End Of Month. Asked on Fox News' Your World (1/12, Cavuto) if he is running for president, Gov. Bill Richardson said, "I will let you know this month." Pressed for a date, Richardson said, "Well, it will be in January."

Edwards To Speak At Harlem Church Sunday. CNN's The Situation Room (1/12, Blitzer) reported, "Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards is preparing to step on to the turf of a potential rival, Sen. Hillary Clinton." Edwards "will deliver a sermon at a Harlem church on Sunday pegged to the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday."

Allard To Stay Silent On Reelection Plans For Now. The Denver Post (1/13, Mulkern, 256K) reports Sen. Wayne Allard "has made up his mind about whether he will seek a third term in 2008, but he's keeping his decision secret a bit longer." Spokesman Steve Wymer said only Allard and his wife know his plans, and Allard "has not said when he will announce his choice."

Frank To Subject Bernanke To Additional Hearing. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A5, Ip, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "is likely to get far more scrutiny than usual" next month when he testifies before Congress." The Journal notes, "Ordinarily, each installment lasts two days, one before the Senate Banking Committee, the other before the House Financial Services Committee. There are no other witnesses. In a break with that tradition, Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who took over the House panel this month, said he plans to hold an additional day of hearings in which witnesses, such as economists and labor experts, will give their views on what Mr. Bernanke said."

Interest Group Coalition To Challenge Schwarzenegger Over Healthcare Proposal. The Wall Street Journal's "Hot Topic" feature (1/13, A11, Timiraos) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "proposed a far-reaching $12 billion plan mandating health insurance for all 36 million residents of the nation's most-populous state. Under the plan, California would require all individuals to purchase health insurance or face tax penalties. California has more uninsured residents than any other state, and the plan could prompt others to follow suit." The Journal notes, "The state is bound to face challenges from the powerful lobbies -- doctors, hospitals, insurers and employers -- that would share the plan costs."

WSJournal Alleges Schwarzenegger Has Flip-Flopped On Healthcare. The Wall Street Journal (1/13, A12, 2.04M) editorializes, "Schwarzenegger once extolled 'the power of the market' in Milton Friedman's 'Free to Choose' PBS series. So it's probably just as well that the late, great economist won't see the regulated mess that his admirer is proposing to make of California's health insurance market. As speaker of the state assembly Fabian Nunes remarked, 'This is a plan assembly Democrats could have written.' In fact, they already have -- in 2003, when Democrat Gray Davis was Governor. Candidate Schwarzenegger campaigned against that measure, which was less onerous than his own new proposal mandating that business provide health insurance to all employees."

Programs Allowing Americans To "Host" Eastern Bloc Orphans Prove Controversial. The New York Times (1/13, A1, Gross, 1.16M) reports, "Hosting programs...showcase older children, generally from orphanages in former Soviet bloc nations. The programs have long been hailed as an effective marketing tool by adoption experts. … In the largely unregulated world of international adoptions, these programs often lead to happily-ever-after, but sometimes end painfully. Ukraine and Russia place formidable obstacles in the path of parents."

Ford's Views Of Presidential Peers Revealed. The Washington Post (1/13, A8, 690K) is one of several major newspapers running an AP report on "25 years of interviews with his hometown paper that could be released only after his death" in which late President Gerald Ford "expressed mixed opinions of Jimmy Carter, once calling him a 'disaster,' and said that Ronald Reagan received far too much credit for ending the Cold War." Ford "contended that his own negotiation of the Helsinki accords on human rights did more to win the Cold War than Reagan's military buildup. The best president of his lifetime, Ford said, was a more moderate Republican: Dwight D. Eisenhower." Ford "considered John F. Kennedy overrated and Bill Clinton average. He admired George H.W. Bush's handling of the Persian Gulf War."

Rice Said To Face "Skepticism" During Middle East Trip. AFP (1/13) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "headed for the Middle East on Friday to rally Arab support for a new US strategy in the Iraq war and to counter Iran's alleged interference in Iraq. The week-long tour also will seek to bolster efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with Rice scheduled to hold talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories" today and tomorrow. She "will then travel to Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain before returning to Washington on January 19." Rice "told lawmakers in Congress her trip 'will focus heavily on rallying the support of those responsible Arab states to support the government of Iraq, to support what needs to be done there, to support, of course, also Lebanon and the moderate Palestinians.'"

Under the headline, "Scepticism Awaits Rice On Tour," the Financial Times (1/13, Khalaf) notes, "Facing a barrage of opposition at home over the new Iraq policy, [Rice] takes the White House's case to the Middle East this weekend to try to drum up regional support. But there too she is likely to find plenty of scepticism that deploying another 20,000 troops mostly in Baghdad can bring an end to the raging sectarian conflict."

Russian, Chinese Vetoes Kill UN Security Council Burma Resolution. The Washington Post (1/13, A12, Lynch, 690K) notes Moscow and Beijing "jointly vetoed a U.S.-sponsored resolution criticizing Burma's human rights record, striking a blow to the Bush administration's year-long campaign to use the [UNSC][to spotlight the repressive rule of Burma's military junta." The Post says the vetoes are "part of a broader diplomatic effort by Beijing and Moscow to prevent the United States and its Western allies from using the 15-nation council to censure some of the countries particularly known for rights abuses, including governments in Belarus, Sudan and Zimbabwe." The Post adds, "Despite the tepid support for the U.S. initiative, virtually all council members -- including China -- expressed concerns about Burma's behavior." Acting Ambassador Wolff "said the United States was 'deeply disappointed' by the council's failure to confront Burma. But he said the United States decided to force a vote to assure the Burmese people that 'we won't forget you.'"

The New York Times (1/13, Hoge, 1.16M) notes China and Russia "argued that they shared concerns about conditions in Myanmar but considered them internal matters that did not constitute threats to international peace and security, the category of crisis subject to Security Council action." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "said he had no doubt that the abuses by Myanmar posed a threat beyond its borders," and he "dismissed suggestions that the proper United Nations forum for Myanmar was the Geneva-based Human Rights Council, not the Security Council."

The AP (1/13, Lederer) adds Moscow and Beijing "cast a rare double veto Friday of a U.S. resolution calling on Myanmar's military government to release all political prisoners, speed up progress toward democracy, and stop attacks against ethnic minorities." The two nations' ambassadors "said the Security Council was not the proper place to discuss Myanmar because the country does not pose a threat to international peace and security." BBC.com (1/12) says the Chinese and Russian ambassadors "said the resolution was outside the remit of the Security Council as Burma posed no threat to international security."

Schwab "Optimistic" About Restart Of Doha Trade Talks. The New York Times (1/13, Zarocostas, 1.16M) reports US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said Friday that she was optimistic the collapsed Doha trade negotiations could be restarted, but added that there were still obstacles to a revival of the talks." She is quoted saying, "I am more optimistic than I have been in many months that we are on a path that could help reach a successful conclusion of the Doha round." Schwab later added that, "ultimately it will be substance that dictates when there's a breakthrough." The Times says "the next few weeks are considered critical to whether the new political impetus could be maintained," and notes Schwab "distanced herself on Friday from the upbeat assessment of" EU trade chief Peter Mandelson. Schwab "reiterated that an agreement on important issues, like agricultural market access, would dictate whether a deal could be hammered out."

Blair Says UK Must Maintain "Muscular Commitment" Overseas. The New York Times (1/13, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "As he seeks to define his legacy and stamp his imprint on the future," British Prime Minister Tony Blair "urged his successors to maintain the warlike foreign policy that he promoted, sending troops into battle in Africa and the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq. To retreat in the face of global terrorism, he said, would be 'a catastrophe.'" While "Blair avoided any triumphalism, he advocated a muscular commitment by Britain to overseas military deployment alongside what he called softer options." The Times adds British "left-wing critics dismissed the prime minister's attempt to justify his use of military action as a tool of foreign policy." The AP (1/13, Quinn) reports Blair said "that Britain's influence on the world stage and ability to right global wrongs depends on active engagement, and the country cannot defend itself from terrorism by retreating into isolationism." Blair added "that Britain must be willing to commit to military action when necessary to pursue laudable goals," and that "diplomacy alone cannot solve the world's problems."

LATimes Says Blair Shares Clinton's "Ethical Challenges." In an editorial entitled, "The End Of The Blair Era," the Los Angeles Times (1/13, 850K) says Blair "has more in common with former President Clinton" than with President Bush. "The litany of likenesses includes a belief in a 'third way' between old-style liberalism and the free market, a fluency in public that critics dismiss as glibness, a wife who was a successful lawyer, a willingness to accept the hospitality of show-business celebrities and, finally, a reputation for running an ethically challenged administration." Likening Blair's honors controversy with Clinton's January 2001 pardonings, the Times concludes, "Political psychologists can argue about why two farsighted politicians allowed their substantial legacies to be sullied by sleaze. Maybe the answer is as simple as power inevitably corrupting. Whatever the explanation, like his friend Bill, Tony may leave office with people talking not about his vision but about his blind spots."
