She said Shirlington got the two contracts through normal procedures - including one last October for up to $21 million over five years to transport department employees around the Washington, D.C. area.

No background check was performed on Baker because the department doesn't perform such checks on company owners, and contracting officers did not learn of Shirlington's problems with other contracts, including one terminated by Howard University over poor service, Duke said.

"I have no evidence that there was any type of outside influence," Duke said.

"If there's a reference to a letter, (Cunningham) is involved and DHS has not been truthful," King said.

Outside the hearing, King questioned the department's failure to find Cunningham's letter. "Did somebody clean out the file?" he asked.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said that never happened.

Rep. Mike Rogers, R-Ala., also questioned the timing of Shirlington's first Homeland Security Department contract, in April 2004. He said Shirlington had a proposal drafted months before the contract was even bid and ended up being the only qualified bidder.

"That strikes me as very odd," Rogers said. "It really raises concerns that maybe there was some manipulation of the process."

Knocke said there wasn't.

An attorney for Baker, Michael York, said his client could not find a copy of Cunningham's letter but that it was a "brief, plain vanilla recommendation" that Cunningham wrote based on his familiarity with Shirlington.

Baker acknowledges providing transportation services for Cunningham and defense contractor Brent Wilkes but denies any knowledge of or involvement in illegal or illicit activities, York said. He said Baker is cooperating with the investigation and has testified to the grand jury.

An attorney for Cunningham did not immediately return a call for comment.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, wrote King on Thursday requesting that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy Michael Jackson be called - and subpoenaed if necessary - to answer questions on "the overwhelming evidence of waste, fraud, abuse, and incompetence" at the department, including the failure to find Cunningham's letter.

House Panel Probes Limo Firm's Deal (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Homeland Security's awarding of contracts to a company whose selection was backed by convicted congressman prompts an inquiry.

WASHINGTON — The Department of Homeland Security came under renewed scrutiny Thursday as a House panel sought to determine how it awarded $25 million in contracts to a transportation company whose selection was recommended by Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the former San Diego-area congressman convicted of accepting millions of dollars in bribes from defense contractors.

After receiving bids from three companies, agency officials said, they chose Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc. of Washington, based on both price and the company's ability to perform the needed services.

But Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, noted that the company's president, Christopher Baker, had done business with Brent R. Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor identified as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Cunningham case.

"Then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company," he said. "If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is."

Cunningham was the only member of Congress to support Shirlington's selection, King said.

The government is investigating allegations that Wilkes provided Cunningham, and perhaps other officials, with prostitutes and limousines. Citing an ongoing grand jury investigation, Baker did not testify Thursday.

Baker has a criminal record, including attempted robbery, auto theft and drug possession, and Shirlington has a history of bankruptcy and other financial problems. In 2002, the company lost a shuttle-bus contract with Howard University, which accused the company of low-quality service.

Homeland Security's chief procurement officer, Elaine Duke, said that her agency made a distinction between company owners and drivers, and that the drivers had undergone background checks. No such checks on the company or its owner were required by law.

"The drivers have a clean slate," she said.

But King called the situation a "disgrace."

"Almost everything that could have gone wrong did go wrong," he said. "It casts doubt over the whole department."

But Homeland Security was not the only agency feeling the heat at Thursday's hearing before the House Homeland Security subcommittee on management, integration and oversight.

Because the department was specifically seeking a small business for the contracted services, it sought a company that was "HUBZone approved" — a program that falls under the jurisdiction of the Small Business Administration.

HUBZone is an SBA program that supports small businesses in poor communities by preventing large companies or those in more advantaged areas from competing with them.

Calvin Jenkins, the SBA's deputy to the associate deputy administrator, told the panel that his agency ensures that the company in question is a small business, is located in a historically underutilized region and has more than a third of its employees living in HUBZone areas.

Shirlington's office is in a luxury apartment building in Washington. It told the SBA that it had had an office in a hangar at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and that service in the building was suspended after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Jenkins said SBA staff visited the office on April 7, 2004, ensured that the company met the criteria and approved it the next day.

Later that month, Homeland Security awarded Shirlington the first of two contracts.

The company began providing shuttle services and executive sedans for the department in spring 2004. Its first one-year contract was for $4 million. The second, a one-year contract with the option to extend for four additional years, totals $21.2 million for the full five years.

Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the total went up because the need for services increased. The 2005 contract, he said, had to cover the cost for 10 limousine drivers and 12 mini-buses with a 16-person staff.

"That doesn't necessarily mean we're going to spend $21.2 million," Orluskie said. "They're not guaranteed that until the job is done.

"That selection was made based on their performance, not this controversy," he added.

In fact, Homeland Security recognized Shirlington Limo with a small-business achievement award last year for providing outstanding customer service.

Many in attendance at the hearing tried to stifle laughter after that statement. But in an interview, Orluskie said the service has been top-notch.

"I ride them all the time. The drivers are courteous, respectful, on time, and the vehicles are clean," he said.

Congress Probes Limousine Deal (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congressional investigators have uncovered evidence that a former congressman convicted on bribery charges helped steer a $20-million contract to a limousine company with ties to the ex-lawmaker, Capitol Hill sources say.

The House Homeland Security Committee is probing how Shirlington Limousine and Transportation won a lucrative bid to chauffeur high-ranking Homeland Security Department officials, despite a shoddy performance record and its owner having a lengthy criminal record.

Sources familiar with the inquiry say former Rep. Randy Cunningham (R-Calif.), who pleaded guilty to accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes from a defense contractor, potentially swayed the Shirlington case.

In a sworn affidavit, Shirlington's owner, Christopher Baker, said "the only letter of reference sent on Shirlington's behalf" to Homeland Security came from Cunningham, according to sources.

Additionally, investigators are looking into allegations that a lawyer working in Homeland Security's General Counsel's Office threatened to deny future contracts to a rival who questioned why Shirlington won the bid.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King said the information might warrant a Justice Department examination. "It all adds up to a pretty strong case of DHS incompetence or a special deal was made," said King (R-Seaford).

Among many concerns about the contract, King said, is the fact that Homeland Security officials never ran a background check on Shirlington's owner. "Bin Laden could have owned the company and they never would have checked him out," King said.

"No congressman influenced that process," Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said of the Shirlington contract.

Shirlington has also been linked to defense contractor Brent Wilkes, a central figure in the bribery scandal that ensnared Cunningham.

9/11 Pentagon Memorial To Reflect Pangs Of Loss, Recollections Of Joy (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A few hundred feet from the spot where American Airlines Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and victims of the attack held a short and solemn groundbreaking ceremony yesterday for the Pentagon memorial.

Nearly five years after a private group began raising money for the memorial, about 450 people attended the invitation-only ceremony, including members of the Cabinet and Congress and 300 family members of victims and survivors of the attack.

They sat on plastic folding chairs in brilliant sunlight at the memorial site and listened to brief remarks from Rumsfeld and James J. Laychak, the president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund.

Rumsfeld thanked architects Keith Kaseman and Julie Beckman for their design and then said he wanted to speak directly to the family members and survivors.

"At some point in the future, most of you will return to this sacred ground," Rumsfeld said. " . . . As you reflect, you will be flooded with memories of your loss, to be sure, but also split-second images of love and laughter and joyous times. This memorial was meant for you, to offer some comfort."

About $10.8 million has been raised for construction of the memorial. The money has come from neighborhood lemonade sales and corporate and personal donations. The goal is to raise $22 million for construction, which is expected to be complete by September 2008, as well as an additional $10 million to maintain the memorial.

Before the ceremony, Laychak was invited by Rumsfeld to talk with Cabinet members about the fundraising. Laychak, whose brother David was killed in the attack, said he didn't want to be "crass" and ask Cabinet members for donations, so he asked them to use their influence instead.

"I said that if they wanted to ask for money, that would be great, but I asked them to ask people to take a meeting, to meet with me and members of the memorial fund and ask them to hear our story," Laychak said.

Shortly after the 2001 attacks, Congress authorized the defense secretary to create a memorial to be paid for with private donations. Although yesterday's ceremony was about the official beginning of construction, Laychak said he hopes the event will help generate donations to finance the project.

The memorial will have 184 cantilevered benches, one each in memory of the victims on the plane and in the building. Each bench will have a reflecting pool beneath it, and the 1.93-acre site will be shaded with about 80 paperbark maple trees, which were chosen because they keep their leaves late into the autumn.

Kaseman and Beckman, two New York architects whose design won a competition that had more than 1,000 entries from all over the world, sat next to D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and the congressional delegation.

"This is a big milestone, no doubt," Kaseman said. "One thing we are happy about is that a lot of the partners we have been working with are here. . . . This might be the first time that everyone is together."

The ceremony lasted less than 30 minutes. Rumsfeld and Laychak made brief remarks, and retired Navy Adm. Barry C. Black, a chaplain, offered a prayer in memory of those who died. At the conclusion, everyone stood and sang "God Bless America."

Each family member was given a red-white-and-blue ribbon and a button with the image of a flag draped over the Pentagon to wear on their shirts and blouses.

When the ceremony ended, Rumsfeld stayed behind. For about an hour, he stood in the bright sunlight, shaking hand after hand, autographing programs and taking pictures with family members. He stayed until every person who wanted a word with him got the opportunity.

"If there is anything these families felt," he said in a brief interview, "it's that we must not forget what took place. This is visible progress, and the memorial, when it is completed, is going to be a very special place. It is going to be about memories and reflections, to be sure. But it is going to be a place to think about today and tomorrow and the next day and the world."

The ceremony concluded with Rumsfeld and Rosemary Dillard, the vice president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, unveiling an engraved piece of marble salvaged from the building after the attack. It will be placed at the entrance of the memorial when it is completed.

Dillard said she was thinking about her husband, Eddie, when she helped Rumsfeld remove the blue covering from the stone. He died on board Flight 77. Wednesday was their 20th wedding anniversary.

Pentagon Breaks Ground On 9/11 Memorial (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

Friends and relatives of Sept. 11 victims joined Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Thursday for the groundbreaking on a memorial to the 184 people killed in the terrorist attack on the Pentagon.

The two-acre memorial, to be built near the site of the attack at the Pentagon's west wall, will feature benches set over small reflecting pools for each of the victims. It is expected to be completed by the fall of 2008.

The memorial "will remind visitors that every one of these lives was special ... with lives cut short and families left behind," Rumsfeld said during a brief ceremony that drew more than 500 invited guests.

Lisa Dolan, whose husband, Robert, was a Navy officer killed in the attack, said "it was important to have a place with some peace and tranquility."

The designs for the memorial will make it "a place where you can really sit and reflect. At night, with all the lights, it's going to be beautiful. It's going to be very peaceful."

The design was selected in 2003 from more than 1,000 entries. Architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman said they incorporated family members' suggestions into their final blueprint. For instance, the pair initially planned to plant a maple tree at each of the 184 benches.

But family members were concerned that when a tree died, its death would be associated with that particular victim. So they reduced the number of trees and will plant them so that no individual tree will be associated with any victim.

Beckman said she wanted the design to emphasize life and resemble a park more than a monument.

Rumsfeld said he wanted the memorial to convey to future Americans "that their countrymen's grief was turned toward the cause of their nation's defense.

Organizers hope to raise a total of $22 million for construction, plus another $10 million for maintenance. About $11 million has been raised so far.

Remembering 9/11 (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday led a solemn gathering outside the Pentagon marking the ceremonial groundbreaking for a memorial to the 184 persons killed there September 11, 2001.

"At some time in the future, most of you will return to this sacred ground," Mr. Rumsfeld told the many friends and family members of those killed in the attack who attended the ceremony on the west side of the Pentagon. "This memorial was meant for you, to offer some comfort ... now you can know that we will never forget."

The Pentagon Memorial, designed by architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman, will honor those killed inside the building and on American Airlines Flight 77, which hijackers crashed into the building.

It will include 184 illuminated benches arranged according to the victims' ages, from 3-year-old Dana Falkenberg to John D. Yamnicky, 71. Reflecting pools also will be built beneath each bench.

Nearly $11 million of the $22 million needed to construct the memorial has been raised, said memorial officials, who also are hoping to raise $10 million for maintenance costs. Construction is expected to be completed in 2008.

More than 500 people attended the ceremony, including White House Cabinet members such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, local dignitaries such as D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, and Virginia Republican Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner.

Mr. Rumsfeld and the Pentagon Memorial Fund's president, James J. Laychak -- whose brother David was killed in the attack -- spoke to the crowd before unveiling a limestone marker that will be part of the memorial.

"Today marks a positive outcome from a tragic day," Mr. Laychak said, recalling in his speech his brother's laugh and bear hugs. "Let's remember what was special about those we lost."

The ceremony was an emotional affair for the victims' friends and family members, as the celebration of the memorial's beginning still was clouded by what was being remembered.

"It's a bittersweet day, but there's a huge amount of accomplishment and pride," said Lisa Dolan, a member of the board of directors of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, whose husband, U.S. Navy Capt. Robert E. Dolan Jr. was killed in the attack. "The memorial being built shows the world that we've come back ... We're not going to forget."

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and one of the ceremony's participants, said the ceremony served as a reminder of where the United States has been and where the country is going after the attacks.

"It's a chance for those of us who have the privilege of wearing the uniform of the United States to rededicate ourselves to this country," Gen. Pace said. "These deaths mean something."

Joey Ricketts, a Boy Scout from Lynchburg, Va., who is creating a memorial in his hometown to "all the innocent lives lost" on September 11 as part of an Eagle Scout project, also attended the ceremony. He said he was motivated "in every single way" by attending.

"I've raised $10,000," said Joey, 15, who was to receive after the ceremony a piece of the Pentagon that was damaged in the attacks to use in his memorial. "For a 15-year-old, that's pretty good."

New Plan Calls For Scaling Back WTC Memorial (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

The World Trade Center Memorial faces simplification of its design, including moving carved-in-stone names of Sept. 11 victims to ground level, possibly eliminating or scaling back waterfalls and reducing the size of a museum.

Those were among the recommendations made yesterday to New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg in a closed-door meeting, according to people close to the situation. A formal report on the redesign will be released next week. Real-estate developer Frank Sciame presented the plans after Gov. Pataki asked him last month to create a budget that would bring the bulk of the project's cost to $500 million. A construction estimate in May put the total cost of the memorial, including infrastructure and other elements, at $1 billion.

Mr. Sciame also recommended -- and Gov. Pataki agreed -- that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, build the memorial. That task lies with the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, a publicly chartered, privately run group that also is in charge of fund raising.

The original memorial design by architect Michael Arad called for two square openings that covered the footprints of the Twin Towers. Waterfalls would fall from the edge of the openings into underground chambers, where victims' names would be etched in granite. Mr. Arad couldn't be reached for comment.

People who have been briefed on Mr. Sciame's report say it simplifies the project by doing away with separate entrances for the memorial, an adjacent museum and a visitor center. The museum would be reduced in size, but still would be underground. There would be a much smaller amount of space underground dedicated to the memorial. The waterfalls could be eliminated or greatly reduced. Scale mock-ups of the waterfalls showed they would be difficult to operate in the wind and cold.

People familiar with the project said Gov. Pataki favored Mr. Sciame's recommendation to bring the etched victims' names to ground level -- an idea preferred by several groups representing family members of victims killed in the 2001 attacks. Placing the names underground -- and providing space where visitors could reflect on the attacks -- was a centerpiece of Mr. Arad's vision.

Moving the names would eliminate the need for large underground chambers and would fundamentally change the visitors' experience. Instead of descending into the underground chambers, visitors would look at the names amid an open-air, tree-lined park. Nine million people are expected to visit the memorial the year after its planned opening, which, despite the redesign, is scheduled for Sept. 11, 2009.

Visitor access to the underground slurry wall, which protects the site from the nearby Hudson River and survived the collapse of the Twin Towers, would be limited to a smaller area than before.

Before the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey could take responsibility for building the memorial, the transportation agency -- controlled by the two states' governors -- would have to agree to take on the cost of underground infrastructure shared by the memorial and a neighboring rail station, shopping mall and office buildings. The May report estimated the cost of infrastructure -- including ramps, air-conditioning plants and sidewalks -- at $300 million. Mr. Sciame's analysis put the cost between $150 million and $200 million, according to those familiar with his report.

Senate Rejects US Troop Pullout In Iraq (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 16, 2006

Congress plunged into divisive election-year debate on the Iraq war Thursday as the U.S. military death toll reached 2,500. The Senate soundly rejected a call to withdraw combat troops by year's end, and House Republicans laid the groundwork for their own vote.

In a move Democrats criticized as gamesmanship, Senate Republicans brought up the withdrawal measure and quickly dispatched it — for now — on a 93-6 vote.

The proposal would have allowed "only forces that are critical to completing the mission of standing up Iraqi security forces" to remain in Iraq in 2007.

Across Capitol Hill in a daylong House debate, Republicans defended the Iraq war as a key part of the global fight against terrorism while Democrats assailed President Bush's war policies and called for a new direction in the conflict.

"When our freedom is challenged, Americans do not run," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said in remarks laden with references to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"This is a war that is a grotesque mistake," countered House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. She called for a fresh strategy — "one that will make us safer, strengthen our military, and restore our reputation in the world."

House Republicans moved toward a vote on a nonbinding resolution Friday morning to reject any timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces.

Democrats, for their part, seized on reports that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki wants, as part of a national reconciliation plan, to pardon insurgents who had attacked U.S. troops. In both the House and Senate, Democrats urged Republicans and the president to denounce the plan.

Congress roared into debate on the three-year conflict four months before midterm elections that will decide the control of both the House and Senate — and as Bush was trying to rebuild waning public support for the conflict.

The administration was so determined to get its message out that the Pentagon distributed a highly unusual 74-page "debate prep book" filled with ready-made answers for criticism of the war.

"We cannot cut and run," the Pentagon battle plan says at one point, anticipating Democratic calls for a troop withdrawal on a fixed timetable.

As the debates got under way, the Senate sent the president an additional $66 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan — legislation Bush promptly signed — and the same day, the Pentagon announced the U.S. death toll for the war had reached 2,500.

"It's a number," White House press secretary Tony Snow said of the grim milestone. He said that Bush "feels very deeply the pain that the families feel."

The president has tried to rally support for the Iraq war in the days since the death of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the recent completion of a new Iraqi government.

But as the death toll and price tag of the conflict continue to rise, opinion polls show voters increasingly frustrated with the war and favoring Democrats to control Congress instead of the Republicans who now run the show.

Sensitive to those political realities, Republicans in both the Senate and House sought to put lawmakers of both parties on record on an issue certain to be central in this fall's congressional elections.

The Senate vote unfolded unexpectedly as the second-ranking leader, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., introduced legislation he said was taken from a proposal by Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and war critic. It called for Bush to agree with the Iraqi government on a schedule for withdrawal of combat troops by Dec. 31, 2006.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said if the United States withdrew prematurely, "I am absolutely convinced the terrorists would see this as vindication." He predicted terrorism would spread around the world, and eventually reach the United States if the United States were to "cut and run" before Iraq can defend itself.

Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada shot back: "Two things that don't exist in Iraq and have not, weapons of mass destruction, and cutting and running."

He accused Republicans of political gamesmanship and sought to curtail floor debate on the proposal. The vote occurred quickly.

Kerry called the vote "fictitious" and promised further debate next week on the issue. He and five other Democrats were in the minority on the vote — Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, Barbara Boxer of California, Robert Byrd of West Virginia, Tom Harkin of Iowa and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Senate Republicans claimed victory with the lopsided tally. "This sent a good message that the United States Senate overwhelmingly opposes a cut-and-run strategy," said John Cornyn of Texas.

In the House, partisan politics took center stage from the day's outset.

Rep. Charles Norwood (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga., attacked war critics as defeatists who do not deserve re-election. "Is it al-Qaida or is it America? Let the voters take note of this debate," he said.

In turn, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (news, bio, voting record), D-Ill., said: "Democrats will never put American service members in harm's way without a plan, and without support. For that, you need the sit-and-watch complacency of a Republican Congress."

"In this fight for the future of peace, freedom and democracy in the Middle East and around the globe, winning should be our only option," Rep. Phil Gingrey (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga., said, sticking to the GOP script.

"Stay and we'll pay," countered Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record), D-Pa., who criticized "the failed policy of this administration" and lamented the lives lost, billions of dollars spent and the bruised U.S. image since the war started. "It's time to redeploy," he said.

Republicans arranged for the debate to culminate in a vote on a resolution that praises U.S. troops, labels the Iraq war part of the larger global fight against terrorism and says an "arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops is not in the national interest.

Democrats decried the debate as a sham, saying Republicans promised an open discussion but, instead, stacked the deck in their favor by limiting debate to 10 hours and barring any amendments. They also complained that Republicans refused to allow them to present an alternative resolution — though Democrats weren't able to agree on just what to offer.

US Troop Pullout From Iraq Rejected By Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Members of Congress yesterday engaged in a bitter and sometimes raucous debate over Iraq war policy, with the Senate overwhelmingly rejecting a measure to bring troops home by year's end, a move several Democrats have called for but did not back with their votes yesterday.

Meanwhile, House lawmakers traded barbs on whether the Iraq war is linked to terrorism during debate over a Republican-written resolution that rejects a timetable for withdrawal of troops and affirms a commitment to staying in Iraq until the nation is "sovereign, free, secure and united."

The events came during an election year in which Democrats see a chance to regain control of each chamber, and as the United States marked a grim milestone of 2,500 troops killed since the war began in March 2003.

"We've done everything we can do militarily," said Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the most vocal Democratic war opponent. "Only Iraqis can solve the problem in Iraq. I say it's time to redeploy and be ready."

"President Bush told us from the beginning that this road would not be easy," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert in a rare floor speech that opened the debate.

"The battle is not over," the Illinois Republican said. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to group and regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

"Three and a half years is hardly cutting and running," countered Rep. Diane Watson, California Democrat.

The House will vote today on the resolution, which also praises the troops and applauds the elimination of terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0034670

In the Senate, Republicans attempted to embarrass Sen. John Kerry by forcing a vote on a measure identical to one he had drafted calling for troop withdrawal by the end of 2006. Senators opposed the measure on a 93-6 vote, which was forced to the Senate floor by Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who ran for president in 2004, said he is crafting the withdrawal proposal with other Democrats, and said he was frustrated at what he called political games by the Republicans. Mr. Kerry added he plans a "serious debate" on a measure "that bears my name."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said withdrawal would vindicate terrorists.

"This sent a good message that the United States Senate overwhelmingly opposes a cut-and-run strategy," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

Besides Mr. Kerry, the resolution was backed by five Democrats -- Barbara Boxer of California, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, Tom Harkin of Iowa and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

In the House, Republicans, armed with talking points from the leadership and the Pentagon, invoked September 11 and the bombing of the USS Cole.

"If some people continue to preach cut and run for this war then they will continue to kill Americans and kill Americans and kill Americans," said Rep. Terry Everett, Alabama Republican. "I prefer doing it over in Iraq rather than in New York or Washington, D.C., or San Francisco."

Mr. Murtha, a decorated Vietnam veteran, angrily responded: "I know what rhetoric is and I know what fighting in the front lines are. ... You're not talking about Iraq. I'm talking about Iraq."

Republicans noted progress they have seen in Iraq, including establishment of the government, advancement of women's rights and democratic voting.

"Iraq is a catalyst for hope, a vivid example that the future of the broader Middle East belongs to freedom and democracy," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican.

Democrats said President Bush misled the country and lashed the administration for gaffes such as the torture of detainees in the Abu Ghraib prison. Several called for the firing of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"Our postwar mission as presently defined cannot succeed," said Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence panel, who called for a "dramatic change of course."

Mr. Murtha rattled off some grisly statistics, including the increase in the number of attacks in Iraq daily, the rise in the number of insurgents and the conflict's $8 billion per month price tag.

Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, called the war "a blunder of historic proportions by this president."

But Rep. Henry J. Hyde, chairman of the House International Relations Committee and the resolution's sponsor, said lawmakers owe Mr. Bush "thanks, not condemnation."

"To insist that decisions must await perfect intelligence ... is to guarantee our defeat," the Illinois Republican said, adding, "Defeat in this new and more dangerous world means annihilation."

Democrats pointedly thanked and praised the troops before making their remarks.

But statements of support for the troops "ring hollow if we don't also say we support their mission," Mr. Hastert said.

Congress Boosts Iraq War Funds But Debates How Long To Stay (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress sent President Bush billions of dollars more for the war in Iraq even as lawmakers debated into the night over how long the U.S. can afford to keep troops there.

Republicans seized the offensive, taking advantage of divisions among Democrats to force quick votes against withdrawal. But on the day that U.S. troop deaths in Iraq reached 2,500, the partisan tone distressed members in both parties and could create a backlash against the majority.

"The signs are evident that we are close today to a calamity if we don't recalibrate our policies," said Rep. Jim Leach (R., Iowa) in an implicit warning to fellow Republicans. "The issue is no longer the need to stay the course. It is to avoid overstaying the present."

The wartime-spending measure, including an additional $65.8 billion for military operations overseas, brings the total U.S. financial commitment in Iraq to almost $320 billion. Thus far, Congress has shown no willingness to withhold funds as it has in past wars, like Vietnam. While Senate Democrats are beginning to coalesce around an amendment calling for a phased withdrawal through 2007, the proposal is nonbinding on Mr. Bush.

In a pre-emptive skirmish yesterday, Senate Republicans engineered a 93-6 vote rejecting a more severe plan calling for withdrawal by the end of the year. The House will vote this morning on a Republican resolution opposing any "arbitrary date" for a pullout and committing the U.S. to complete the "mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq."

Debate ran late last night as House leaders promised time for all members to air their ideas. But what was once billed by Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) as a "conversation" on Iraq evolved into more of a Republican political offensive that Democrats called a "charade."

"It's already uglier than I thought it would be," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest (R., Md.), a Marine veteran of Vietnam, on his way to the floor. A debate prep book, compiled by the National Security Council and including Pentagon documents, was distributed by the White House. Rep. Charles Norwood (R., Ga.) urged voters to throw out the "defeatists" in November: "Is it al Qaeda or is it America?" he said.

A central question is whether Republicans can convince voters that Iraq is "the central battlefield of this moment" in the larger war against terrorism as described by Rep. Tom Cole (R., Okla.) In opening debate, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) devoted much of his remarks to the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"It is a battle we must endure," he said. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

Responding for the Democrats, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania said Iraq has proved a costly distraction from the larger war against al Qaeda, whose presence in Iraq has grown since the U.S. invasion but is outweighed by the threat to U.S. troops from insurgents and sectarian violence.

"We think we're caught in a civil war. The military cannot win this war. It's the way we're doing it is what I disagree with," said Mr. Murtha, who argued the U.S. can either "stay and pay" or "redeploy and be ready."

A Marine veteran of Vietnam, Mr. Murtha has become his party's lead spokesman for withdrawal and was confident the House debate hadn't helped Republicans. But Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) hasn't been able to express a strategy for her party, given the continued divisions. At a Democratic whip meeting, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) joked that perhaps the House should vote first on the Republican resolution and then debate later.

By nightfall, both sides seemed to admit there had been too much focus on the past. "Let's look ahead...How are you going to achieve this pep talk that's going to be voted on?" Rep. Vic Snyder (D., Ark,) asked Republicans.

In turn, Republicans were more willing to admit errors if Democrats would also stop talking about the past and help shape a consensus on what to do next.

"We are in Iraq. Today it is a training ground, a recruiting ground for terrorists," said Rep. John McHugh (R., N.Y.). "We should talk about how that happened so we don't repeat it in the future, but it is the reality for the moment. What do we do to end it? Where do we draw the line? Where do we say this is where we have to win?"

Congress Erupts In Partisan Fight Over War In Iraq (NYT)

By Robin Toner And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — The House and the Senate engaged in angry, intensely partisan debate on Thursday over the war in Iraq, as Republicans sought to rally support for the Bush administration's policies and exploit Democratic divisions in an election year shadowed by unease over the war.

It was one of the sharpest legislative clashes yet over the three-year-old conflict, and it came after three days in which President Bush and his aides had sought to portray Iraq as moving gradually toward a stable, functioning democracy, and to portray Democrats as lacking the will to see the conflict through to victory.

In the House, lawmakers moved toward a vote on a Republican resolution promising to "complete the mission" in Iraq, prevail in the global fight against terrorism and oppose any "arbitrary date for withdrawal." In the Senate, lawmakers voted overwhelmingly to shelve an amendment calling on the United States to withdraw most troops by the end of this year, although Democrats vowed to revisit the debate next week.

Both actions were carefully engineered by the Republicans in charge, and for the moment put both chambers on a path to rejecting Congressional timetables for withdrawal .

House Republicans asserted that their resolution was essential to assure American troops and the world that the United States was behind the war in Iraq and the broader struggle against terrorism.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois opened the formal debate on a war that, the government announced Thursday, had claimed the lives of 2,500 American troops. "It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious," he said of the fight in Iraq and beyond. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

He said the American troops in Iraq knew their cause was noble. "It is time for this House of Representatives to tell the world that we know it, too, that we know our cause is right and that we are proud of it." Democrats, divided over the wisdom of the war but more or less united in condemning Mr. Bush's management of it, countered that the Republican resolution was a political ploy, "a press release for staying the course in Iraq," as Representative Jane Harman, Democrat of California, put it.

At the start of the debate, Representative Ike Skelton, Democrat of Missouri, asked for a moment of silence to recognize the 2,500 American military deaths in Iraq. Many lawmakers talked about visiting the troops, in Iraq and in hospitals, and about the toll in death and suffering.

Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat and Vietnam War veteran whose call for a speedy withdrawal of troops transformed the debate last year, rose repeatedly to tell Republicans, "Rhetoric does not solve the problem." He added: "We need a plan. It's not enough to say stay the course."

Referring to the sectarian violence cleaving Iraq, Mr. Murtha said, "They're fighting each other, and our troops are caught in between." The House, which debated the resolution for more than 11 hours on Thursday, is scheduled to vote on it on Friday. The Senate debate will continue into next week.

Five months before the November elections, partisan passions ran high. Republicans argued repeatedly that their Democratic opponents lacked the toughness to confront terrorism, returning to themes that they used successfully in 2004. "Many, but not all, on the other side of the aisle lack the will to win," said Representative Charlie Norwood, Republican of Georgia. "The American people need to know precisely who they are." He said: "It is time to stand up and vote. Is it Al Qaeda, or is it America?"

Democrats countered, at times with barely controlled fury. Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, described the war "as a grotesque mistake." She and others said Congressional Republicans were simply trying to "trap" Democrats, not engage them in a true debate. The resolution Republicans offered could not be amended, but only voted up or down.

Democrats in the Senate cried foul when Republicans forced a vote on a withdrawal amendment originally developed by Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts. Mr. Kerry had held off from seeking a vote on it, while working with other Democrats to seek a broader consensus. But Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, simply scratched out Mr. Kerry's name, replaced it with his own and offered it for debate. Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, characterized the amendment as "cutting and running."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, one of many Senate Democrats who oppose Mr. Kerry's amendment, rose to declare, "There are two things that don't exist in Iraq: cutting and running, and weapons of mass destruction." Mr. Reid moved to remove the amendment from consideration, and his motion was approved by a vote of 93 to 6. Senate Democrats promised to return next week with additional amendments on an exit strategy for American troops.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, portrayed the vote to table the amendment as a declaration of support for the fledgling Iraqi government. "This sends a good message that the United States government opposes, overwhelmingly, a cut-and-run strategy."

But Democrats said the vote was just a political game. "It's just kind of a jump-ball, stick-it-to-them kind of thing," said Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat.

Democrats have been divided over a deadline for the withdrawal of American troops. Last November, they rallied around legislation, which passed in an overwhelming bipartisan vote, that declared 2006 should be a "year of significant transition" in Iraq. In both chambers, Democrats have been trying to arrive at language that goes beyond that, but stops short of a firm deadline.

In a highly unusual attempt to influence the debate, the Pentagon sent a 74-page "prep book" to several members of Congress, outlining what it called "rapid response" talking points to rebut criticism of Mr. Bush's handling of the war and prewar intelligence. The Pentagon sent the book to Democratic leaders on Wednesday night, apparently in error, then sent an e-mail message two hours later asking to recall it.

The resolution under debate in the House declares that the United States and its allies are "engaged in a global war on terror, a long and demanding struggle against an adversary that is driven by hatred of American values and that is committed to imposing, by the use of terror, its repressive ideology throughout the world." It also declares that "the terrorists have declared Iraq to be the central front in their war against all who oppose their ideology."

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, asserted that "the war in Afghanistan was the response to the terrorist attacks" — not the war in Iraq.

The combination of the popular and unpopular in this resolution — support for the troops, combined with an endorsement of the administration's policy and a rejection of any withdrawal deadline — left many Democrats in a bind as they headed toward Friday's vote. But some Democrats argued that it left Republicans in a bind, too, committed to an open-ended presence in Iraq.

House Debate On Iraq War Gets Under Way (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The House erupted in impassioned, election year debate over Iraq war on Thursday, Republicans defending the conflict as key to winning the global struggle against terrorism while Democrats excoriated President Bush and his policies.

"Is it al Qaida or is it America? Let the voters take note of this debate," said Republican Rep. Charles Norwood (news, bio, voting record) of Georgia, attacking war critics as defeatists who do not deserve re-election.

The war was "a grotesque mistake," countered the Democratic leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record) of California. "The administration continues to dig a hole. They refuse to come up and see the light," she said.

The debate unfolded four months before midterm elections that will decide the control of Congress.

The United States has absorbed the deaths of 2,500 troops in the three-year conflict, which began when a U.S.-led invasion toppled Saddam Hussein, but quickly turned sour in the face of a brutal insurgency.

Polls show the war has become unpopular. But Bush has tried to rally support in the days since the death of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and the recent completion of an new Iraqi government.

The Pentagon prepared a battle plan for the debate, distributing a highly unusual 74-page "debate prep book" filled with ready-made answers for criticism of the war.

"Iraq will become a haven for terrorists, murderers and thugs," if the United States leaves "before the job is done," the booklet says.

"We cannot cut and run," it says at another point, anticipating Democratic calls for a troop withdrawal on a fixed timetable.

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the 74-page document. It was sent to both Republicans and Democrats and it laid out the administration's positions in strong terms and offered page after page of counterpoints to criticisms that Democrats typically level against Bush's war policies.

"In this fight for the future of peace, freedom and democracy in the Middle East and around the globe, winning should be our only option," said Rep. Phil Gingrey (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga.

Countered Rep. Carolyn Kilpatrick (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich.: "Retired generals have spoken. We need a new direction. The troops should be redeployed. They should be brought home at the most practicable time with a plan that we don't now have under this administration."

Republicans arranged for the debate to culminate in a vote either later Thursday or Friday on legislation — a resolution — that labels the Iraq war part of the larger global fight against terrorism and says an "arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops is not in the national interest.

Across the Capitol, partisan tensions on the Iraq war were clear as the Senate debated annual military legislation. Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic Party presidential candidate in 2004 and a potential 2008 standard-bearer, expected to introduce an amendment that calls for the administration to redeploy combat forces from that war zone by year's end.

In the House, Republicans sought to put lawmakers of both parties on record on an issue certain to be central in this fall's congressional elections.

"The fundamental question in this debate is: Are we going to confront the threat of terrorism and defeat it, or will we relent and retreat and hope the problem goes away?" House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said, providing a preview of the possible GOP line of attack should Democrats balk.

As the death toll and price tag of Iraq rise, opinion polls show voters are frustrated with the war and favor Democrats to control Congress instead of the Republicans who now run the show.

Sensitive to those political realities, House Republican leaders want to make Democrats defend their positions on Iraq — and highlight deep differences on the matter within the Democratic Party — while trying to present their own unified position calling for staying the course in both Iraq and the larger war on terrorism.

But differences also exist within the GOP and those are sure to be discussed as well.

Republican leaders portray the debate as the first of its kind since the Iraq war started in 2003. But they staged a similar vote on a resolution rejecting the immediate withdrawal of troops last year after Democratic Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, in a reversal, called for a quick exit from Iraq.

Democrats dismiss the House GOP resolution as nothing more than political theatrics, and they were expected to use the debate to rail against Bush's wartime policies. Yet they also are mindful that voting against such a resolution could leave them vulnerable to attacks by Republicans who could claim that Democrats who opposed the resolution don't support U.S. troops and advocate a "cut-and-run" strategy.

To that end, a memo this week by Boehner urged his fellow Republicans to frame the debate as "a portrait of contrasts between Republicans and Democrats."

In both the House and Senate, Democrats appear to be divided into three camps. Some want troops to leave Iraq this year. Others object to setting any kind of timetable. A number of them want the United States to start redeploying forces by year's end but don't want to set a date when all troops should be out.

Congress Becomes A Battleground In Iraq War (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For the first time since the United States invaded Iraq three years ago, Republican leaders on Thursday officially convened a full-scale debate over the war -- an effort that they hoped would showcase the increasingly divergent positions of the two parties and that wound up unleashing fierce passions and acrimony on both sides.

Democrats denounced the debate in the House of Representatives as a "sham," objecting to Republicans' characterization of debate on a nonbinding resolution on the war as a choice between "staying the course" and "cutting and running."

Republicans accused Democrats of indecision and division, repeatedly equating talk of withdrawal with "retreat."

"Members, this is not the time to go wobbly. Let's give victory a chance," proclaimed Rep. Gil Gutknecht, R-Minn.

"This side is not trying to go wobbly," countered Rep. Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. "We're trying to articulate what we think would be a better strategy for success in Iraq."

The rancor spilled over to the Senate, where Republican leaders forced a test vote on the idea of withdrawal in an effort to fan divisions among Democrats. The measure failed 93-6.

"This sends a good message that the U.S. Senate overwhelming opposes a cut-and-run strategy in Iraq," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), whose ideas on withdrawal formed the basis for the Republican-offered measure, denounced the maneuver as a "fibbing and fictitious vote." He said he was still working on his version of a withdrawal plan and would introduce it next week.

"I look forward to having a debate, but I look forward to having a debate on the amendment that I bring as a senator," Kerry said.

The long-postponed debate on Iraq comes four months before the midterm congressional elections, in which some strategists believe that sentiment for and against the war could determine which party emerges with a majority in Congress.

And it coincided with an announcement by the Pentagon that the number of U.S. personnel who have died in Iraq has reached 2,500. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., took advantage of that milestone to call for a moment of silence on the House floor in honor of the fallen.

"This nation is at a strategic crossroads," Skelton said. "We are spending $9 billion a month and have spent over $300 billion total on this war. More strikingly, we are losing a battalion's worth of casualties a month, killed and injured ....

"We have been there some three years," he added. "I think it's time for us to seriously look at where we are, where we're going."

Until Thursday, the House of Representatives had not formally debated military operations in Iraq since October 2002, when the chamber voted to authorize the use of force if Iraq failed to comply with United Nations demands. The United States invaded and occupied Iraq six months later.

An upsurge in violence and a perceived lack of progress in rebuilding the country politically and economically has sapped public support for the war.

All the same, many Republicans believe that discussing the war works to their party's favor politically, allowing them to press the assertion that Democrats are weak and indecisive on national security issues.

"Frankly, I believe their real challenge is that they have no common unified position on Iraq as a party," said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla. "Whether we are right or wrong on our side of the aisle, we do have a common position and it's expressed in this resolution."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., outlined the GOP position in opening the debate. He spoke at length about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and asserted that Iraq was an integral part of the campaign against terrorism that began that day.

"It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious. The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores," Hastert said.

In an effort to force Democrats into an uncomfortable vote, Republican leaders -- including Hastert -- crafted a resolution that combined expressions of support for the troops and resolve in combating terrorism with a commitment to the engagement in Iraq. They also adopted rules that did not permit Democrats to offer amendments.

"It's really unfortunate, as the president contends that we are fighting for democracy in Iraq, that we can't have democracy on the House floor," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

"We expected a resolution confined to the country of Iraq and the conflict there," Skelton said. "That is not what this resolution is. This resolution covers the entire Middle East waterfront, trying to blend together the Iraqi war and the war against terrorism, which has its genesis in Afghanistan. These are two separate and distinct wars."

A vote on the House resolution is expected Friday.

In the Senate, Democrats and Republicans engaged in parliamentary hardball throughout the day as they debated a defense spending authorization bill.

Seizing on news reports that Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, supported amnesty for some insurgents who had killed Americans, Democrats sought to embarrass the administration by quickly offering an amendment to the bill condemning the idea.

Republicans, seeking to encourage the divisions between Democrats over whether and when to withdraw from Iraq, countered by introducing an amendment calling for withdrawal by the end of the year.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the chamber's second-ranking Republican, introduced under his own name a withdrawal proposal that Kerry had outlined earlier in the week.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., seeking to scuttle the Republican move, quickly called for a test vote on the measure. In Iraq, he said, there are "two things that don't exist: weapons of mass destruction and 'cutting and running.' "

Just six Democrats -- Sens. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., Russell Feingold, D-Wis., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Kerry -- voted for the withdrawal measure.

Reid is working on a withdrawal proposal that he hopes will attract the support of a large number of Senate Democrats. Debate continues on the defense bill next week.

Iraq Debate Pits Uncertainty Against Anxiety (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The new Republican drive to focus attention on the Iraq war represents a high-stakes gamble: that doubts about the direction Democrats might set on national security exceed anxieties about the course charted by President Bush.

Through a series of high-profile efforts culminating Thursday with sustained House and Senate debates on the war, the White House and congressional Republicans are aiming to portray Democrats as too soft and too divided to steer the Iraq conflict to a successful conclusion.

But in the process, Republicans risk deepening their identification with a war that, surveys show, still sparks skepticism and concern among most Americans — even after the spike in public support that followed the killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

In Thursday's debates on Capitol Hill, Republicans argued that Democrats would withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq too quickly. But they also provided the opportunity for a succession of Democrats to argue that Bush would stay too long.

The political fallout from this escalating confrontation in November's midterm election may pivot on which three words voters find more troubling: "cut and run" or "stay the course."

Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, said that although the debate illuminated divisions among Democrats, it also posed a clear political danger to Republicans.

"The Republicans have the potential of being seen as overreaching, of trying to stay in Iraq until we have it exactly the way we want it," Kull said.

The coordinated Republican push on Iraq, which included Bush's surprise visit to the country this week and a lengthy news conference after his return, highlights a core element of the GOP strategy for the fall's vote. Among Republican strategists, it is an article of faith that the party will fare better if it can shift the focus of voters from a backward-looking referendum on Bush's record to a forward-looking choice over the path America should follow.

Democratic candidates have been encouraging voters to use the election as a means of expressing discontent with the Bush administration's Iraq policy since the U.S. invasion more than three years ago. But Republicans want voters to ask which party they believe would be more likely to produce progress in Iraq in the months and years ahead.

"We think we can win that debate," said one senior GOP strategist familiar with White House thinking, who requested anonymity when discussing internal party deliberations. "We won it in 2004, and the Iraq war was not particularly popular then. It is better when we debate other people instead of debating events."

As part of this strategy, House GOP leaders offered a resolution Thursday asserting that U.S. interests would not be served by setting "an arbitrary date" for withdrawing troops from Iraq. The measure, due for a vote today, also expresses support for the Iraq war "as part of the global war on terror."

Senate Republican leaders, seeking to embarrass their Democratic colleagues, forced a vote on a resolution supporting the withdrawal of almost all U.S. troops by year's end — a plan Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) has said he expects to propose next week. The resolution failed, 93-6.

In pressing their case on Iraq, Republicans have argued that most Democrats want to precipitously withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq before the country is secured — a policy Republicans deride as "cutting and running."

Bush, at his news conference Wednesday, and GOP lawmakers, during Thursday's debates, argued that the key to success in Iraq was perseverance and determination.

"We know this: Our enemies are persistent and will stay the course," said Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.). "So that is the choice we face as a nation … a choice between resolve and retreat."

Such pronouncements, GOP strategists say, taps into a traditional, if diluted, Bush strength — the sense among most voters that he provides strong leadership — as well as a traditional Democratic weakness — doubts about the party's toughness on national security.

Yet the Republican stress on "staying the course" allowed Democrats to maintain that Bush and his congressional supporters were promising Americans only an open-ended commitment in Iraq.

The core Democratic strategy in the House debate was to catalog the costs and disappointments of the war — Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) noted that the death toll for U.S. troops had reached 2,500 — and to charge that the Republican position guaranteed more of the same.

"Instead of staying the course, we need to chart a smarter course," Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas) said. "It's not weakness or retreat to realize the administration offers us only an endless spend-and-bleed policy."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, declared: "Stand pat, stay put, status quo: That is the Republican policy."

The political danger for Republicans is that although public opinion has moved in Bush's direction since Zarqawi's death, polls show that most Americans remain disillusioned with the war. For instance, in an NBC News/Wall Street Journal survey released Thursday, 52% said the war had not been worth the cost, whereas 40% said it had.

Kull, of the University of Maryland, noted that past gains in public support for the war "have had a short half-life," receding as the violence in Iraq continued.

For Democrats, the polls show political danger if Republicans can succeed in portraying them as backing a policy of "retreat" that would leave Iraq in chaos. In recent surveys, Americans have divided almost evenly on whether the U.S. should withdraw its troops before Iraq is stabilized.

Carl Forti, communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee, predicted that the principal political value for his party from this week's congressional debate would come from identifying Democrats with an antiwar position that he argued most Americans would reject.

Americans "understand we can't walk away," Forti said. "To have Democrats so far out to the left on this is almost more effective than anything we can say ourselves."

Some critics of the war raised the opposite charge against congressional Democrats, complaining that they had not identified the party with a clear alternative to Bush's Iraq policy.

House Democrats failed to offer a partywide alternative to the GOP resolution. And the Senate's vote suggested that the amendment Kerry is planning on U.S. troop withdrawal will attract scant support. Despite intensive internal negotiations, other Senate Democrats have not reached agreement on a more moderate alternative.

"As long as no one is going to have a clear stand on the war … [Democrats] are not going to maximize the political benefits from the troubles the president finds himself in," said Ivo H. Daalder, a war critic and senior fellow at the Brookings Institution think tank.

GOP Bill Would Reject Deadline For Withdrawal (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

DOJ_NMG_0034678

WASHINGTON — Republicans in Congress sought on Thursday to capitalize on recent good news from Iraq by opening an election-year debate on a resolution to back President Bush's wartime policy, a bid they hope will neutralize Democrats' advantage on the issue.

The House of Representatives is expected to vote today on a resolution declaring "that it is not in the national security interest … to set an arbitrary date" for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

In the Senate, Republicans pulled a switch on the Democrats by offering an amendment to withdraw combat troops by the end of the year, saying it was based on a plan by Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. It was shelved on a vote of 93-6.

Earlier, the Senate approved and Bush later signed a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as to aid hurricane victims.

Recent polls indicate the public believes Democrats would do a better job on Iraq than Republicans. GOP leaders hoped to shift momentum after the death of terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the formation of an Iraqi government.

Bush made a surprise visit to Iraq on Tuesday. He chided Democrats on Wednesday that while bringing troops home "may sound good politically, it will endanger our country to pull out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission."

House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the floor debate would "help educate Americans about where their members are" on Iraq. In a memo to other Republicans, he said he wanted the debate to create a "portrait of contrast" between Republicans who "believe victory in Iraq will be an important blow to terrorism" and Democrats who "are prone to waver endlessly about the use of force to protect American ideals."

On a day when both chambers of Congress paused in silence to mark the 2,500th U.S. death in Iraq, House Democrats accused Republican leaders of playing politics.

Republicans are "trying to create a trap" to force Democrats to appear opposed to supporting the troops, said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California. While Democrats have differed over whether to set timetables for withdrawal, Pelosi said, they agree the war was "a grotesque mistake."

Some Republicans also questioned their leaders' decision to give Democrats a platform to remind voters of missteps in Iraq.

"This is dragging everyone down in the polls," said Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill. "Now is not the right time to be highlighting the war."

The House resolution is "a continuation of our rhetoric from the past," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, R-Md. "We need a sense of urgency to end the war successfully."

It's not clear which party will get a boost that will help in November.

John Pitney, a political scientist at California's Claremont McKenna College, said that while the strategy "diminishes the Democratic advantage on the issue," speeches aren't enough. "The situation in Iraq would have to improve dramatically before it became a net plus for the GOP," he said.

Parties Face Off Over Iraq War In 11-Hour Debate (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

Congress plunged into a wide-ranging debate over the origins and conduct of the war in Iraq yesterday, with each party excoriating the other for alleged weakness and complacency about the stakes involved.

As the Pentagon announced the 2,500th death of a U.S. service member in the conflict, the House embarked on its first extended discussion of the war since Congress authorized force nearly four years ago. More than 140 lawmakers took the floor to applaud or attack President Bush's prosecution of the war in an 11-hour debate scheduled to last until nearly midnight.

The debate will culminate today with a vote on a Republican-drafted resolution declaring that the United States must complete "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq" without setting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of U.S. troops.

In the Senate, Republicans tried to put Democrats on the record as supporting or opposing an amendment -- drafted by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) but submitted for a vote by Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) -- to demand a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Senate Democrats, meanwhile, pushed Republicans to condemn a proposal by the newly formed Iraqi government to offer limited amnesty to insurgents who had killed U.S. troops.

Though the day's rhetoric was often partisan in tone, the discontent over the status quo in Iraq was evident on both sides. Dozens of lawmakers spoke emotionally -- recriminations mixed with appeals to patriotism -- on how the nation should proceed in the three-year-old conflict that has become more protracted, deadly and complex than most of them had expected at its outset.

The votes will not bind the administration, but the debates had the effect of putting scores of elected officials on the record concerning the nation's most pressing issue at a moment when the approaching midterm elections are putting control of both the House and the Senate in play.

House Republicans took the offensive, repeatedly asserting that Democrats have adopted a "defeatist" policy of retreat that would embolden international terrorists and imperil national security. Their position was bolstered by a 74-page document drafted by the White House and distributed by the Pentagon, replete with talking points, quotations and timelines to back administration policy. Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) called the document "an affront to the American people."

"We're not making progress," said Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Marine Corps veteran who has emerged as his party's leading opponent of the war. He said Iraqis are fighting a low-grade civil war in which U.S. soldiers should not be involved. "They're fighting each other, and our troops are caught in between," he said.

"We make progress every day," countered Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), who contended that the only people who want the U.S. military to leave Iraq are terrorists and "some politicians." Looking at Murtha, he added: "Don't get confused about every little problem that happens."

In the Senate, Republicans were also spoiling for a chance to depict Democrats as soft on the war, but Democrats largely thwarted the effort. GOP senators wanted a vote on language recently drafted by Kerry calling for nearly all U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the year's end. But Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, surprised the Republicans by declining to offer the language as an amendment to a defense authorization bill, after colleagues had urged him to consider possible revisions.

To force a debate and a vote, McConnell, the GOP whip, introduced Kerry's language as his own, knowing that all Senate Republicans and most Democrats would vote against it. Democrats objected when Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called the measure "Kerry's amendment." Kerry said the maneuver led to "a fibbing, fictitious vote."

The Senate voted 93 to 6 to reject the amendment. The six Democrats who voted against killing it were Kerry, Barbara Boxer (Calif.), Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), Russell Feingold (Wis.), Tom Harkin (Iowa) and Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.).

Vice President Cheney weighed in, taking note of Kerry's statement earlier this week urging fellow Democrats who joined him in authorizing force in 2002 to acknowledge that the war is a mistake. "I'm not surprised at John Kerry switching his position yet again," Cheney said on Sean Hannity's radio talk show. Kerry is charging "that somehow he was misled," the vice president said. "He wasn't misled. He saw the same intelligence all the rest of us saw. He knew what an evil actor Saddam Hussein was."

Frist used the brief Senate debate to say that a substantial troop withdrawal by Dec. 31 would amount to "cutting and running" and would prompt Iraq to renew its pursuit of "weapons of mass destruction." Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) replied that "two things don't exist in Iraq: weapons of mass destruction, and cutting and running."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Democrats will propose language next week calling on Bush to "begin the phased redeployment of U.S. troops this year."

Senate Democrats tried to gain the upper hand in yesterday's debate by seizing on a Washington Post article reporting that Iraq's new prime minister is considering limited amnesty for guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops. Two Democrats who are running in competitive states this fall -- Sens. Bill Nelson (Fla.) and Robert Menendez (N.J.) -- introduced a "sense of the Senate resolution" calling on Bush to strongly oppose the amnesty idea.

Republicans called the effort a pointless diversion, with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office having accepted the resignation of the aide who had described the possible amnesty plan.

Central to the House Republicans' argument was the much-disputed link between the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the war in Iraq. "We in this Congress must show the same steely resolve as those men and women on United Flight 93; the same sense of duty as the first responders who headed up the stairs of the twin towers," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We must stand firm in our commitment to fight terrorism and the evil it inflicts throughout the world."

"It is a choice between resolve and retreat," said Rep. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.), one of the most vulnerable Republicans in a swing district that has turned against the war.

Democrats criticized what they called nearly four years of congressional refusal to exercise oversight powers and to challenge the administration's Iraq policies. "Congress cannot be infinitely passive," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.).

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said: "This Republican Congress sat and watched the president make mistake after mistake after mistake. . . . You have adopted an approach of 'see no evil, speak no evil, hear no evil' with abandon."

Party lines stiffened during the debate. Even Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), one of five Republicans who signed a Democratic resolution demanding that the president develop an exit strategy, was content to simply implore his colleagues to "have a powerful sense of urgency to end the war and end the war successfully."

The debates played out less than five months before elections that will be colored by what recent polls have shown to be an unpopular war that has dragged down voter confidence in Bush and the GOP-led Congress.

But Republican strategists say their party can still take a page from Bush's 2004 reelection campaign and use the debate to portray Democrats as weak on national defense. GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said Democrats "have been badly outmaneuvered" by the White House and GOP leaders in capitalizing on Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death. "A couple of weeks ago, all the focus was on divisions in the GOP over immigration. Now it's Democratic division over the war and national security."

Congress Debates War As Death Toll Rises (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After more than three years and 2,500 deaths, the House embarked Thursday on its most extensive and impassioned debate about the war in Iraq, with Republicans demanding support for President Bush's course and Democrats calling for a change in direction to allow U.S. troops to come home.

Lawmakers were expected to talk late into the night, resuming their debate Friday and then voting on a resolution crafted by Republican leaders. The highly partisan resolution would shun specific timetables for redeploying troops out of Iraq and casts the war as a central front in the war on terrorism.

The spectacle of Congress plunging into a substantive, heartfelt and relatively civil debate on the merits of the war reflects the urgency that lawmakers feel about addressing what has become a volatile political situation with midterm congressional elections looming in November. Democrats are trying to capitalize on voters' disenchantment, while Republicans are trying to portray themselves as resolute and strong.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was first to speak, casting the debate in sweeping, historic terms as a means to protect Americans from terrorists at home and to nurture a way of life.

"This resolution is about more than the war in Iraq and Afghanistan," said Hastert, who rarely speaks on the floor and votes on only the most important occasions. "It is about a global war to protect American ideals, and the democracy and values on which this great nation was founded. This resolution, like this war itself, is about freedom."

Democrats, however, called the proceedings undemocratic because Republicans would not allow them to offer amendments. And they accused the president of politicizing intelligence, barreling into the war without a plan and making repeated mistakes along the way.

"Democrats are united in saying we need a new direction in Iraq," said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California. "This is a war that is a grotesque mistake."

As the elections draw closer, Republicans are hoping to tout achievements in Iraq and to turn public opinion in their favor. But polls show Americans believe the war in Iraq is the most important issue facing the nation, and they have been disappointed in the way Bush and Congress have handled it.

Still, the timing of this week's debate could not have been better for Republicans. The recent killing of terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the formation of an Iraqi Cabinet and the emergence of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki may help the GOP make the case that the picture in Iraq is improving.

In the Senate, Republicans scored a quick political victory Thursday when Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) offered an amendment written by Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) that called for the withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of the year. The amendment was defeated 93-6.

But Democrats employed their own bit of symbolism when Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, asked for a moment of silence on the House floor to mark the 2,500th U.S. combat death, which occurred Thursday.

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow called the number a "sad benchmark."

"Any president who goes through a time of war feels very deeply the responsibility for sending men and women into harm's way, and feels very deeply the pain that the families feel," Snow said. "And this president is no different."

From one speaker to the next throughout the long day of House speeches, the strategy on both sides of the aisle was clear. Republicans stressed the evils of terrorism and the need to supporting the troops, while Democrats questioned the administration's competence and credibility.

"The truth has been a major casualty of the war in Iraq," said Rep. Jan Schakowksy (D-Ill.), a founder of the "Out of Iraq" caucus. "It is worth reviewing just a few of the statements presented as truth that were told over the last four years, some remarkably being said again today, that have been proven not true, never true and still not true."

Schakowsky noted that Vice President Dick Cheney said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction; Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said the war would cost $50 billion, and Bush himself declared that major combat operations in Iraq had ended on May 1, 2003.

Other Democrats said that Congress has abandoned its oversight responsibilities, allowing the administration to say or do anything without consequence.

"This Congress has adopted an approach of 'see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil' with abandon," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). "Democrats will never put American service members in harm's way without a plan and without support. For that, you need to sit and watch complacency of a Republican Congress."

In preparation for the debate, the Pentagon put together an unusual briefing book, laying out the case for war and providing responses to potential criticism that might arise. The book was sent to lawmakers, including anti-war congressmen, and the Pentagon later tried to recall it.

In their remarks, Republicans ticked off all the terrorist attacks that have occurred in recent years, beginning with the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut when Ronald Reagan was president and including the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States. Linking those attacks and the war in Iraq, lawmakers said the United States must not waver.

"We must stand firm in our commitment to fight terrorism and the evil it inflicts throughout the world," Hastert said. "We must renew our resolve that the actions of evildoers will not dictate American policy."

But Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), the Democrats' leading war critic, said it is time to leave the war-torn nation.

"Only the Iraqis can solve the problem in Iraq," said Murtha, a decorated Marine. "They're fighting with each other, and our troops are caught in between, and I say it's time to redeploy."

Congressional Debate On Iraq War More About Politics Than Policy (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn And William Douglas

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans firmly defended President Bush's policies in Iraq and Democrats accused his administration of waging a botched and mistaken war as the House of Representatives engaged Thursday in its first extended debate on the war since U.S. troops removed Saddam Hussein from power more than three years ago.

The election-year debate was freighted with politics, as Republicans seized on recent upbeat news from Iraq to portray Democratic calls for troop withdrawals as a policy of "cut and run." Yet for all the political overtones, the tone of the House debate was strikingly civil, sober and morally serious.

"We are making progress toward our goal, but the battle is not over," Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said. "It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious. The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

Democrats largely avoided discussion of a withdrawal deadline, focusing their attention on the continuing bloodshed in Iraq, as the U.S. military death toll reached 2,500 there on Thursday. They described conditions in Iraq as worse than when the war began in 2003 and said the war has damaged America's image abroad.

"It's not getting better. . . . Things are getting worse. . . . More Americans are being killed every day," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa. "We're caught in a civil war between 100,000 Shias and 20,000 Sunnis fighting each other."

The Democrats' stance against Bush belied deep divisions within their party on whether to withdraw from Iraq, and if so, how fast. In the Senate, an expected debate on a Democratic measure calling for gradual withdrawal wallowed on hold all day amid disputes among Democrats over the precise language of their proposal.

In one parliamentary ploy, Republicans forced Democrats to vote against an amendment similar to one pending from Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. It called for the United States to withdraw the bulk of its troops from Iraq by the end of this year. The Senate voted 93-6 to kill the measure. Kerry was among the six voting no, but he accused Republicans of forcing a "fictitious vote" and pledged to bring up his own version of the measure next week.

Kerry urged the Senate to eschew parliamentary gamesmanship and give "seriousness of purpose" to a "debate of this kind of consequence."

That vote, however, illustrated the squeamishness among Democratic lawmakers over supporting a hard and fast deadline for withdrawal, especially such an immediate one, despite pressure from the party's liberal base. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, consulting with his party's top foreign policy leaders, was inclined to seek a gradual withdrawal that would begin this year, aides said. The Senate is expected to debate that proposal next week.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has proposed that troops withdraw from Iraq by the end of 2007. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, would like redeployment to begin by the end of this year and conclude by the end of 2007.

In the House, lawmakers held a 10-hour debate on a resolution that equated the war in Iraq with the broader war against terrorism and specifically rejected setting a deadline for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. Under Republican rules, Democrats weren't able to offer any amendments. A vote on the resolution was expected Friday.

Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, offered a rare voice of Republican dissent, arguing that the Bush administration should reconsider its policy.

"The longer we stay, the greater the prospect that anarchistic acts will multiply and spread perhaps to our shores," he said. "The issue is no longer, as is so frequently asserted, the need to stay the course. It is to avoid overstaying the present."

In an unusual move, the Pentagon distributed a 72-page defense of the war to lawmakers. The document says that the Bush administration has a "three pillared strategy for victory" - establishing a liberal constitution with increased political participation, training Iraqi security forces and helping build the Iraqi economy.

Political strategists have said that the debate poses political dangers and opportunities for both sides. After steadily declining public support for the war and for his handling of it, President Bush appears for the moment to be benefiting from a spate of positive news from Iraq, including the death of al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the completion of the Iraqi Cabinet.

But Iraq has proved to be unpredictable.

"Unless you are sure that things are going to get better there, you're putting an awful lot of chips on that number on the table," said Republican pollster and strategist Tony Fabrizio.

"The danger for Republicans is that it looks like (Democrats) have a better plan to extricate ourselves and maintain Iraqi security than we do," Fabrizio said. "So it all is going to come down to salesmanship. If (Democrats) get painted as cut and run, then they've lost that argument."

Democrats paint it as Bush's responsibility.

"This is the president's war," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California told reporters. "He has to answer for it."

They Don't Know Why They Did The Things They Did (WP)

By Dana Milbank

Cher, on Capitol Hill yesterday to promote better combat helmets for the troops, has long been a friend of the military. Seventeen years ago, she danced on the deck of the USS Missouri and, cladding her tattooed bottom in fishnet, straddled one of its 16-inch guns as she recorded her "If I Could Turn Back Time" video.

Cher had weightier thoughts on her mind, and more fabric on her body, when she took her seat yesterday for a hearing of a House Armed Services subcommittee, attended by a pack of solicitous congressmen and the other former Mrs. Sonny Bono, Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.). But even in full attire and a sedate setting, the presence of the ageless entertainer had a magical effect: Everybody was performing his own version of "If I Could Turn Back Time."

On the day the Pentagon announced that 2,500 troops had died in Iraq, the House spent 10 hours re-debating the decision to invade Iraq in 2003 -- at least until several of them left for a picnic at the White House.

Six years after his candidacy helped to deprive Al Gore of the presidency, Ralph Nader stopped by a Gore book-signing event to patch things up with his former foe.

Meanwhile, the House Government Reform Committee was meeting to find out why the Bush administration cut counterterrorism funding for the Washington area for this year by 40 percent -- even as lawmakers conceded it was too late to do anything about it.

The beat goes on.

The daylong retrospective began at the House Government Reform Committee, where Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) and other lawmakers were scolding Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman for his agency's decision to stiff Washington.

"One of the greatest displays of incompetence," said Carolyn Maloney (D-N.Y.) "It does boggle the mind," agreed Jim Moran (D-Va.). Florida's John Mica (R) added: "I've never seen a goofier list of priorities."

"You really think," Davis demanded, that "Montana is at a higher risk than D.C.?"

Foresman, his hands trembling slightly, advised Davis: "Congressman, there are all kinds of intricacies." Behind him, his aides were chewing gum, shaking their heads and passing notes.

But all Davis and his colleagues could do was complain. Foresman said he has no plan to revisit the decision, and lawmakers said the best they could do would be to fix things next year so it doesn't happen again.

La de da de de. La de da de da.

Next stop on the Turn-Back-Time tour: Olsson's book shop on 7th Street Northwest, where Gore was signing books at noon. "I'm not supposed to say anything, just sign books," he announced when he started. But when he got to number 214 in the line, he noticed the lanky figure and stood up. "Nice to see you! How you doing? . . . I'm really so grateful to you for coming by."

After more pleasantries, Gore scribbled a line in the book: "For my friend, Ralph Nader. With respect, Al Gore."

Nader was smitten. "He's liberated!" Nader said. "He's defining what progressive Democrats should be about."

Had they reached such a rapport six years ago, Gore might have won the election in 2000, as two men in line reminded Nader. "Thanks to you, we had Bush all these years," said one. "How many are dead in Iraq because of that?"

La de da de de. La de da de da.

Back on the Hill, both houses of Congress were in a raucous, backward-looking debate about the war in Iraq. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) tried to Turn Back Time to 2003. "This is a blunder of historic proportions," he said of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0034684

Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.) went back even further back in time: "The historic blunder is that we didn't confront the problem in the 1990s."

Disgusted with the proceedings, Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) advised any Iraqi parliamentarians watching on television: "Don't try this at home."

The Senate attempted a more forward-looking debate: a resolution calling for most troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the end of the year. But it was difficult to take the senators seriously: A third of them wore blue-and-white striped suits in honor of "Seersucker Thursday," making the floor of the Senate resemble a Good Humor convention.

"If we were to cut and run," said Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), wearing a seersucker suit and white shoes, "bloody civil war would result." Frist returned to his office, where free ice cream was being served to all.

The Senate dispensed with the Iraq debate quickly, freeing the lawmakers to attend the annual congressional picnic at the White House.

La de da de de. La de da de da.

With everybody else living in the past, Cher herself seemed to be enjoying the present yesterday, as lawmakers fussed over her.

At the hearing room, signs on chairs dictated the seating: "Reserved Army;" "Reserved Navy;" "Reserved Cher."

"I'm waiting for Cher!" a star-struck Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) boasted to a colleague as he stood near the elevator. "Do you know who I'm waiting for?" he asked another.

Lawmakers besieged the singer when she emerged, in blue sunglasses and a black suit. Mike Conaway (R-Tex.) invited her to take a trip with him to Germany and Iraq, "whenever you want."

"I'd love to," Cher said politely.

Afterward, the giddy Conaway told an aide: "She said she'd do it!"

But will she wear fishnet?

On Keeping Current (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A colleague, strolling through the Bush Diplomatic Hall of Glory at the State Department -- that series of snappy large photographs begun by this administration to tout our leader's world leadership -- says the photos include a large, beautiful one of President Bush and the Iraqi prime minister.

"The prime minister is a great Iraqi patriot, he's a friend of liberty, he's a strong partner for peace and freedom," Bush said at their meeting, praising him for "brave leadership" and being a "bold man" and a "frank, open fella." Bush told him he did a "good job" at their news conference.

But wait a minute! That was last June in the White House with former prime minister Ibrahim al-Jafari , a complete loser, as it turns out. Almost as bad as the first guy, Ayad Allawi . Jafari was hanging on to office like Al Gore, hoping for a miracle, until Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice went to Baghdad and told him to take a hike.

Where's the photograph in Baghdad with the new guy, Nouri al-Maliki ? Bush said on his quick visit he "saw firsthand the strength of his character and his deep determination to succeed." Better still, Maliki's "got a plan to succeed," which is always a good thing, and Bush said he was "impressed" by him.

How many times, oh, Lord, must we warn people to check once, twice, even thrice, before clicking the "send" button?

Seems Traci Scott , who works in the Pentagon's legislative affairs office, sent an e-mail Wednesday to a group of Hill folks with an attachment titled "Iraq Floor Debate Prep Book." The 74-page attachment, just in time for the House floor debate yesterday, is full of great facts and fine political arguments.

Section 3, for example, "Victory in Iraq," summarizes Saddam Hussein 's "support for terrorist groups" and "his defiance of the world community" and how he "wanted WMD." Section 4 is the "Rapid Response" part.

Though coming from the Pentagon, the prep book reads like a White House playbook -- which, a Pentagon spokesman said, it is. "It's an NSC [National Security Council] document which we passed along," he said. It rebuts all those arguments from the "cut and run" crowd about prewar intelligence manipulation, or how the war in Iraq has made the world more dangerous for Americans.

Problem is that the e-mail was sent to some of those cutters and runners.

Next thing you know, there's a second e-mail from Scott.

"The sender would like to recall the message, 'Prep Book.' "

Too late. "Once again the Bush administration is spending time and taxpayer money on public relations, rather than developing a real plan for success in Iraq," said Brendan Daly , a recipient who is a spokesman for House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). "Americans know the war is going in the wrong direction, and the Pentagon PR machine won't change that fact."

Turns out the e-mail list was an old one, used to distribute general info from the Defense Department.

So, please, please, be careful hitting "send."Parallel Universe, the Best Defense

What with all their legal troubles, we thought folks such as Enron's Ken Lay , former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Rep. William J. "Frozen Dollar Bill" Jefferson (D-La.) might come up with more creative defense lines.

So here, from the Montomery Advertiser in Alabama, is an example of how the best handle such inquiries:

" Ronald Wayne Blankenship , who is in the Democratic runoff for Jefferson County sheriff, says it's a coincidence that a man with a criminal history shares his name. And birth date. And has a wife with the same name -- Judy Ruth Green Stonecipher Blankenship .

"And does the same kind of work. And looks like him.

"Blankenship, 63, says he isn't the same Ronald Wayne Blankenship who was suspected of faking his own death in 1990 and did time in jail for assault that same year.

" 'Do you know how many Ronald Blankenships there are?' " he told the Birmingham News. Blankenship, who got 26 percent of the vote in a three-way primary last week, acknowledged that he looked like a newspaper photo of the man who faked his death.

"It looks like me in a way," he said, "but all Blankenships get to looking alike."

Talk about creating reasonable doubt.Honest Abe and Honest Bill

Rudderless Democrats had best not count on Bill Clinton returning to the political fray anytime soon.

The former president, at a book party for New Republic editor Peter Beinart 's "The Good Fight: Why Liberals -- and Only Liberals -- Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again," approached Jay Winik , author of "April 1865: The Month That Saved America," and asked Winik what he thought of "Lincoln's Melancholy" by Joshua Wolf Shenk .

"Fascinating," Winik said. "And intriguing."

"I wanted to write that book, but he beat me to the punch," Clinton said. "I was going to write it next year. I love Lincoln -- for all of his problems, he grows larger with history."

Clinton can only hope . . .

"Enough Is Enough" (USAT)

By John Murtha

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Iraq is not the center of the global war on terrorism, and nor is it overwhelmed by foreign terrorist groups, as this administration would like Americans to believe.

Iraqis are fighting Iraqis in sectarian violence, and U.S. troops have become the target.

On Thursday, we heard House Republicans argue that the United States cannot change the policy in Iraq. But a change in direction is in the best interest of the United States and Iraq. Saying we must "stay the course" amounts to an open-ended commitment, one that we can not afford in terms of human and financial sacrifice.

Our view: Setting deadline for troops' withdrawal will backfire

The president continues to say we must stay in Iraq. Iraq has formed a government, trained 265,600 Iraq security forces and the Iraqis want to govern themselves. We have more than 20,000 deaths from this war, and yet terrorist attacks rose sharply last year to more than 10,000. By the end of this year, we will have spent $450 billion U.S. taxpayer dollars on this war. Enough is enough. Our nation deserves better.

Instead of sticking with a failed policy, I propose a new policy. Instead of "stay and pay," which is what this administration continues to argue, I propose that we "redeploy and be ready." We must redeploy American troops out of the cities to the periphery and create a quick reaction force ready to attack only when the national security of the United States or its allies in the region is at risk.

The American people are not naive. They know a failed policy when they see one. Iraq is a failed policy. It's time to redeploy.

Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania is the top Democrat on the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

Setting Deadline For Troops' Withdrawal Will Backfire (USAT)

USA Today, June 16, 2006

When the public turned against the Vietnam War, many returning soldiers found themselves ignored, disdained and shunned. Iraq is different. Though most Americans now believe the war was a mistake, they still honor the troops.

That support became particularly poignant Thursday when the number of dead in Iraq reached yet another milestone: 2,500.

The grim announcement coincided with the start of a two-day debate in the House of Representatives on Iraq, which has been discussed far too little there in the three years since the United States invaded, the original plan went horribly awry, and the costs in lives and money soared.

Republican leaders capitalized on the rare good news of the past week in Iraq — the killing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the filling of key posts in the new Iraqi government — to put forth a resolution labeling the Iraq war part of the global fight against terrorism and saying an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment of U.S. forces is not in the national interest.

At one level, the debate is a cynical display of election-year politics that turns the troops fighting in Iraq into political pawns. Because Republicans wrote the resolution to express support for the troops as well as for President Bush's policy, a "no" vote can easily be twisted into a campaign attack ad claiming that anyone opposing the war is hostile to the troops fighting it, which is absurd.

But cheap political stunts aside, the thrust of the resolution, it seems to us, has merit. Iraq has become an important part of the war on terror, even if it wasn't when the war began. It's hard to argue otherwise when the organization led by Zarqawi and his successor calls itself "al-Qaeda in Iraq" and pledges allegiance to Osama bin Laden.

And while the war itself was a mistake based on faulty intelligence and delusional optimism, pulling out now, as advocated by Rep. John Murtha and other Democrats, risks making a bad situation worse.

U.S. troops should not stay in Iraq, as in Vietnam, purely for pride in a hopeless battle. They should remain, however, as long as there is a reasonable chance that they can bring some stability, reinforce the fledgling democratic government and prevent Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists. Announcing a timetable for withdrawal, as Sen. John Kerry proposes (Kerry's resolution in the Senate was rejected 93-6 on Thursday), would just invite the insurgents to wait out the American presence.

Thursday's fireworks on the House floor did serve to illuminate how Congress has been egregiously missing in action on sustained discussion and oversight of the Iraq war. A two-day debate hardly begins to address the many critical issues: What would success look like? Is the $320 billion allocated to the war effort being well spent? Can more be done to protect the troops from lethal roadside bombings? What is being done to engage surrounding countries? What about the training of Iraqi forces?

Careful, extended examinations of those questions would do more to honor the 2,500 U.S. military dead and 18,490 wounded than would the sensible yet politically loaded resolution poised for passage today.

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'Hanlon, And Amy Unikewicz

DOJ_NMG_0034687

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

AFTER his surprise trip to Baghdad this week, President Bush struck a hopeful tone. "I do think we'll be able to measure progress," he declared at a news conference on Wednesday. "You can measure progress in capacity of Iraqi units ... in megawatts of electricity delivered ... in oil sold on the market .... There's ways to determine whether or not this government's plans are succeeding."

We agree. Unfortunately, according to our latest tally of metrics (compiled from a variety of government and news media sources), Iraq has a long way to go. To be successful, the new Iraqi government will have to do things that its predecessors and the United States have generally failed to accomplish.

Violence on the whole is as bad as ever. Sectarian strife is worse than ever. The economy has slowly come back to prewar levels for the most part, but is now treading water. As a result, optimism has waned. According to an International Republican Institute poll conducted in late March, more than 75 percent of Iraqis consider the security environment to be poor and the economy poor or mediocre.

Those looking for signs of promise in Iraq can still find footholds beyond the killing of the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The security forces, particularly the Iraqi Army, continue to improve in technical proficiency — even if their interethnic cohesiveness remains suspect. Reductions in consumer subsidies have strengthened the financial standing of the government, and high oil prices compensate for Iraq's anemic production levels. But overall, it is increasingly hard to describe Iraq as a glass half-full.

Stay The Course? What Course? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

Fresh from his triumphal visit to Baghdad -- a place so dangerous he had to sneak in without even telling the Iraqi prime minister -- George W. Bush is full of new resolve to stay the course in his open-ended "global war on terror." That leaves the rest of us to wonder, in sadness and frustration, just what that course might be and where on earth it can possibly lead.

This is a "war" in which three men held for years without due process at the Guantanamo Bay prison kill themselves by hanging, and their jailers are so unnerved and self-absorbed that they see the suicides as an attack. Rear Adm. Harry Harris's all-about-me lament -- "I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us" -- was worthy of delivery from Oprah's couch.

Bush claimed at his news conference the other day that he'd "like to close Guantanamo" if only the people being held there weren't so "darn dangerous." These bad people, in other words, are forcing him to hold them indefinitely under conditions that mock international norms. But if the inmates are indeed beyond redemption, why order them to be hog-tied and force-fed when they go on hunger strikes? Why not just let them starve? Why freak out when three of the evildoers hang themselves? Why not pass out rope and tell the rest to bring it on?

This is a "war" in which the United States drops two 500-pound bombs with the express intent of assassinating Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, a group that wouldn't have existed if Bush hadn't decided to invade. But when the world learns that Zarqawi briefly survived the bombing, and rumors circulate that U.S. forces shot him dead, officials rush to release an autopsy report showing that the butcher with a $25 million bounty on his head died from blast injuries. An American medic, we are told, was about to administer first aid when Zarqawi mumbled something unintelligible and expired.

Why do your best to kill an enemy leader -- a bad, bad man, the worst of the worst -- and then try to revive him? Didn't you want him dead?

In this amorphous, open-ended "war" that we're spending precious lives and billions of dollars to wage, the rules of engagement seem to be shoot first and apologize later.

We're sorry if U.S. Marines massacred 24

civilians in Haditha. We're even more sorry than we were after U.S. military personnel tortured and humiliated those prisoners at Abu Ghraib. Bush's stalwart ally, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, is sorry if London police, conducting an anti-terrorist raid this month, shot and wounded an innocent man whose only "crime" was to come downstairs in his underwear to see who was breaking into his house. But not as sorry as Blair was after the London subway bombings, when commandos shot dead an innocent Brazilian electrician whom they mistook for a possible, potential, just-might-be terrorist.

Nobody's sorry, though, about secret CIA prisons or extralegal detention or interrogation by brutal "waterboarding" or an Orwellian blanket of domestic surveillance. After all, we're at "war."

The military announced yesterday that the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq has reached 2,500, another of those awful, round-number milestones. It is widely expected that the new Iraqi government will consider an amnesty for some of the insurgents who killed some of those American servicemen and women -- drawing a distinction between roadside bombs placed by Sunni Muslims in "resistance" to the U.S. occupation and those placed by foreign al-Qaeda jihadists. If this happens, we'll have taught the Iraqis well. They'll be saying "pardon me" just like their American tutors.

Today's generation of jihadists was forged in Afghanistan fighting the Soviet occupation. How long will the next generation, being forged in Iraq fighting the American occupation, be with us?

Iraq is just one theater in Bush's "war." Elsewhere, Afghanistan is once again ablaze as the resurgent Taliban counterattacks. Somalia is coming under the sway of an Islamic militia that may harbor al-Qaeda militants. America's popularity in the world continues to fall.

But George W. Bush forges ahead, trying vainly to kill a poisonous, retrograde ideology with bullets and bombs. His "war" is self-perpetuating, and no one even knows what victory would look like. Long after he's gone, we'll still be looking for a way to end the mess he began.

Captured Papers Show Weakening Insurgency (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Associated Press, June 15, 2006

A document purportedly captured in an al-Qaida hideout portrays the insurgency in Iraq as being in "bleak" shape, saying that it is losing strength and proposing ways to stir up trouble between the U.S. and Iran to divert American attention.

American and Iraqi forces have killed 104 insurgents in 452 raids nationwide since al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed last week, the U.S. military said.

Arrests, weapons seizures and money shortages are taking a heavy toll on al-Qaida's insurgency in Iraq, according to the three-page transcript released Thursday by the Iraqi government, which said it reflects al-Qaida policy and the terror organization's cooperation with groups loyal to Saddam Hussein.

There was no way to confirm the authenticity of the information attributed to al-Qaida, and U.S. and Iraqi officials offered conflicting accounts of when and where it was seized.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office said Iraqi forces found the document in al-Zarqawi's hideout after the June 7 U.S. airstrike that killed him.

However, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said the document had been taken from a computer in a raid during the three-week operation to track down al-Zarqawi.

Caldwell said sweeps across Iraq since al-Zarqawi's death led to 28 significant arms caches. He said the raids included 255 joint operations and 143 by Iraqi forces alone.

The al-Qaida document said its insurgency was being hurt by an increase in U.S.-trained Iraqi forces, by widespread arrests and seizures of weapons, and by a crackdown on financial outlets.

According to a translation provided by National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, the document said the best way to overcome the "current bleak situation" would be to involve U.S. forces in a "war against another country" or hostile group.

The way to do this, the document said, "is to try and inflame the situation between America and Iran" or between the U.S. and followers of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric.

It suggests carrying out a range of terrorist acts for which it will falsely implicate Iran, including bombings in the West and kidnappings. It also recommends declaring the existence of a relationship between Iran and terrorist groups, and disseminating bogus confessions showing that Iran has weapons of mass destruction.

Vice President Dick Cheney said the document, if authenticated, shows the terrorists know they are losing the war.

The words "are fascinating because they do reveal — obviously whoever wrote them, assuming they are authentic — somebody who believes they are on the losing end of the engagement," Cheney said on the Sean Hannity radio show.

"I think the psychological business here is really enormously important as well, too. Somebody said the other day that ... the way we win is when ... the terrorists finally become convinced that we won't quit."

Al-Rubaie called it "the beginning of the end of al-Qaida in Iraq."

"Now we have the upper hand," he told reporters. "We feel that we know their locations, the names of their leaders, their whereabouts, their movements, through the documents we found during the last few days."

Mustafa Alani, a terror expert at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said he did not believe the document was authentic.

"I wonder why they would put their strategy down in writing, even on a computer. These people learned a good lesson a long time ago," he said, recalling that one of al-Zarqawi's computers was seized earlier.

Terror consultant Evan Kohlmann called Alani's criticism "simplistic."

"They do have to write these ideas down somewhere. At a certain point, you have to have written records," said Kohlmann, the New York-based founder of globalterroralert.com.

But, Kohlmann said, "it's impossible to say" whether the document is authentic. "Without knowing the author, it's really impossible to know the document's credibility, its relevance and its significance."

The U.S. military has in the past released documents it said were seized from Al-Qaida in Iraq, including one in February 2004 reportedly written by al-Zarqawi complaining that if the insurgency fails to prevent the handover of sovereignty, "then there will be no choice to pack our bags and move to another land..."

In May, documents were released that showed the group was concerned about disorganization within its cells in the capital area, with one extremist describing them as simply "a daily annoyance" to the Iraqi government.

Despite the document's pessimistic assessment and a fresh security crackdown in Baghdad, new violence erupted in the capital Thursday and at least 24 killings were reported throughout the country.

A bomb in a parked car detonated in a southwest Baghdad neighborhood, killing at least three civilians and wounding 14. In an even deadlier attack, gunmen shot and killed 10 men riding a bus in the industrial area of Baqouba, close to where al-Zarqawi was killed.

The U.S. military said Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian with ties to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida network, has taken over from al-Zarqawi as head of al-Qaida in Iraq. Al-Masri apparently is the man that the terrorist group identified in a Web posting last week as its new leader — Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, a nom de guerre, said Caldwell.

The military showed a picture of al-Masri — who was named in a most-wanted list issued in February 2005 by the U.S. command and who now has a $200,000 bounty on his head — wearing a traditional white Arab headdress.

Al-Qaida has been responsible for numerous attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq, where the American death toll has now hit 2,500, according to the military.

Meanwhile, the Iraqi prime minister pressed forward with a plan to begin reconciling Iraq's ethnic and sectarian groups. But he canceled a planned announcement of the program, apparently after disagreements with Sunni Arab and Kurdish members of his coalition government.

Al-Maliki has opened the door for talks with insurgents opposed to the country's political process as part of his national reconciliation initiative, but said any negotiations would exclude terrorist groups. The plan could include a pardon for some prisoners.

Yassin Majeed, an aide to al-Maliki, denied reports that talks were on with armed groups of any kind. "There is absolutely no dialogue with any armed group at the present time."

Iraqi Leaders: Memo Details Al-Qaeda Plans (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

DOJ_NMG_0034690

BAGHDAD — A captured al-Qaeda in Iraq document says the terrorist group considered drawing the United States into a war with Iran in order to undermine the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in weakening the organization.

Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie said the document, released Thursday, proves al-Qaeda in Iraq is in "pretty bad shape."

"We believe that this is the beginning of the end of al-Qaeda in Iraq," al-Rubaie said.

The author of the document complained that the terrorist group was weak and suggested that opening another front in the war would divert U.S. efforts in Iraq.

A copy of the original document, handwritten in Arabic, was provided to USA TODAY by al-Rubaie. He also released an English translation.

Although the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the document was found in Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's hide-out after a June 7 airstrike that killed him, a U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, said the document was found in a previous raid as part of a three-week operation to track Zarqawi. "We can verify that this information did come off some kind of computer asset that was at a safe location," Caldwell said. "This was prior to the al-Zarqawi safe house."

It is not clear who wrote the document. The U.S. military says it appears to be from someone influential in al-Qaeda's Iraq operation. "It seems to be from an author who has insight from within al-Qaeda because a number of strategies and tactics are noted," said Navy Lt. Christina Skacan, a military spokeswoman.

The document takes a sweeping view of the insurgency, expressing worries that the tide was turning against the insurgency and laying out a plan for reversing that trend.

The memo says the insurgency is being hurt by the increasing capabilities of Iraqi security forces, a shortage of weapons and fighters, a lack of funds and internal divisions. The document says time is now on the side of the United States and not the insurgents.

The document says to reverse this trend, insurgents must:

•Use the media to improve their image.

•Infiltrate Iraq's security forces.

•Lessen internal dissent and bolster respect for the insurgency's leadership.

The document says the best plan for improving the "current bleak situation" is "to entangle the American forces into another war against another country" or to create friction between the United States and its Shiite allies in Iraq.

The document recommends "first to exaggerate the Iranian danger and to convince America, and the West in general, of the real danger coming from Iran," it says.

The insurgents proposed fabricating "bogus messages" that Iran has chemical or nuclear weapons or that its agents planned to hit targets in the West.

Some experts questioned the authenticity of the document.

"I wonder why they would put their strategy down in writing, even on a computer," said Mustafa Alani, a terrorism expert at the Gulf Research Center, a think tank in Dubai. Alani said he doesn't believe the document is authentic. The Iraqi government has trumpeted the memo in an effort to show al-Qaeda in Iraq is reeling from recent U.S. and Iraqi successes.

Al-Rubaie also said that the hunt for Zarqawi and the search of his bombed hide-out and subsequent raids have produced additional intelligence that will lead to victory over al-Qaeda's Iraq operation.

"These documents give us the edge," he said. "They reveal their locations, the names of their leaders, their whereabouts and their movements." He did not elaborate or release other documents.

Caldwell said U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched 452 raids, captured 759 suspects and killed 104 terrorists since Zarqawi's death.

In other Iraq news:

•The U.S. military said Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian with ties to al-Qaeda and Osama bin Laden, had taken over as the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, which had been led by Zarqawi.

DOJ_NMG_0034691

•Iraq's government is considering an amnesty program that would pardon some insurgents. “This program will distinguish between those who want to destroy Iraq and kill Iraqis, and those who simply disagree with the presence of multinational troops or the political process,” al-Rubaie said. He did not address whether the plan would include insurgents who have attacked U.S. troops.

•Gunmen shot and killed 10 men — nine workers and a driver — riding a bus in the industrial area of Baqouba, near the location where Zarqawi was killed.

Picture Of A Weakened Iraqi Insurgency (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD

An Al Qaeda document linked to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purports to show that Iraq's insurgents believe they face a "current bleak situation" that may require fomenting a war between the US and Iran to "get out of this crisis."

The document, released Thursday, could not be independently authenticated. But senior Iraqi officials were ebullient about its message, as well as the magnitude of intelligence "treasure" that has emerged surrounding Mr. Zarqawi's death.

This is "the beginning of the end of Al Qaeda in Iraq," Mowafaq al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, declared Thursday, adding that the data include network names and locations gleaned from Al Qaeda computers captured before Zarqawi's death. "The government is on the attack now ... to destroy Al Qaeda and to finish this terrorist organization in Iraq."

"The documents and all the arrests mean there has been a depletion of talent" among Zarqawi's group, says Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism expert at the Swedish National Defense College in Stockholm.

"They will have to lick their wounds and reconfigure their security, to protect whatever assets they have left," says Mr. Ranstorp, who heads the Center for Asymmetric Threat Studies. The document indicates that Al Qaeda needs to recalibrate "not just psychological warfare, but must shape its actions to get some traction in the population."

"If I were the US, I would continue to drill a hole, and continue to undermine [Qaeda's] legitimacy," adds Ranstorp. "With the killing of Zarqawi, the Americans momentarily have the upper hand."

Since American jets struck Zarqawi's hideout last Wednesday, the US military and Iraqi forces have conducted 452 raids, killing 104 insurgents and capturing 759 "anti-Iraqi elements," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said in Baghdad Thursday.

The news came as the Pentagon confirmed that US military deaths in Iraq have now reached 2,500.

The release of the document coincides with a security clampdown in Baghdad, meant to prevent Zarqawi followers from fulfilling promises to launch revenge attacks.

Spearheading that campaign is the new leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, who the US military Thursday identified as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who met Zarqawi in Afghanistan in 1999. Al Qaeda websites claimed the new leader to be Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, apparently a nom de guerre for Mr. Masri.

"Al-Masri's intimate knowledge of Al Qaeda in Iraq and his close relationship with [Zarqawi's] operations will undoubtedly help facilitate and enable them to regain some momentum if in fact he is the one that assumes the leadership role," said General Caldwell.

Masri is an Afghan-trained explosives expert who began his militant career in 1982, when Al Qaeda No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, led Egyptian Islamic Jihad, Caldwell said. In Iraq, he said, intelligence gleaned from raids in April and May show that Masri has been the key link for foreign fighters traveling from Syria to Iraq.

But the organization Masri takes over may be weakening under pressure from US and Iraqi forces, if the assessment from the Al Qaeda document reflects the view of this extreme faction of Iraq's insurgency.

The document appears undated and does not mention Al Qaeda by name, but was found on "some kind of computer asset that was at a safe location" prior to Zarqawi's death, said Caldwell.

"Here in Iraq, time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," reads the document, according to an English translation from Mr. Rubaie's office. "Massive arrest operations" have caused the resistance to "lose many of its elements," it notes. Insurgents are at a further disadvantage by the growing number of trained Iraqi forces, are losing a media campaign "presenting its work as harmful to the population," and suffering from tighter financial restrictions.

The result is that US and Iraqi tactics are "creating a big division among the ranks of the resistance and jeopardizing its attack operations," which have "weakened [insurgent] influence," the document reads.

It makes no mention of specific tactics, such as beheadings, targeting civilians and any Shiite Iraqis - elements pioneered in Iraq by Zarqawi - which have alienated many Iraqis sympathetic to the broader, antioccupation aim of the insurgency.

It says only that US and Iraqi forces are "taking advantage of the resistance's mistakes and magnifying them to misinform."

Among the solutions is to "use the media for spreading an effective and creative image of the resistance," the document states. That may prove difficult, says Ranstorp in Sweden, because a top Al Qaeda in Iraq media chief, Abu Maysara al-Iraqi, was believed killed in the week before Zarqawi.

"This means their ability to put on a brave face has been damaged," says Ranstorp. "There have been some substantive man losses - qualitative losses" of Al Qaeda operatives.

The Al Qaeda document gives a broad assessment, from apparent ordnance shortages to stoking a clash between the US and Iran. It also includes a lengthy list of potential "delegated wars" that would ease pressure on the resistance.

"The best of these wars to be ignited is the one between the Americans and Iran, because it will have many benefits in favor of the Sunni and the resistance," the document reads. Among those benefits are the "possibility of acquiring new weapons from the Iranian side, either after the fall of Iran or during the battles."

It even asks the rhetorical question of how to draw the US into open conflict with Iran. "It is necessary first to exaggerate the Iranian danger and convince America ... of the real danger coming from Iran."

Its six suggested methods that read like a how-to guide for creating friction. They include sending out "threatening messages against American interests" and blaming Iran; "executing operations of kidnapping hostages" and blaming Iran; "advertising" that Iran has chemical and nuclear weapons "and is threatening the West."

Bomb attacks against the West would be blamed on Iran "by planting Iranian Shiite fingerprints and evidence"; declaring ties between Iran and "terrorist groups (as termed by the Americans)"; and "disseminating bogus messages" that Iran has weapons of mass destruction and "there are attempts by the Iranian intelligence to undertake terrorist operations in America."

Violence continued, despite the Baghdad crackdown. Ten Shiites were pulled off a bus and executed by gunmen in Baquba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and just a few miles east of the village of Hibhib, where Zarqawi was killed.

Papers Reveal Weakening Terror Group (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The U.S. military in recent weeks has seized a "huge treasure" of intelligence materials on al Qaeda in Iraq, including a revealing document in which the terror group acknowledges its own "bleak situation" caused by losses on both the public relations and war fronts.

The documents seized in the weeks leading up to the June 7 killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi also have provided intelligence that has helped direct nearly 500 allied combat operations and resulted in the killings of 104 insurgents, the U.S. command in Baghdad said yesterday.

Al Qaeda's acknowledged failures and the military offensive have been so successful that Iraq's national security adviser flatly predicted that Zarqawi's group, al Qaeda in Iraq, is at "the beginning of the end." He said all U.S. troops could be out of Iraq by 2008.

However, al Qaeda in Iraq has promised renewed attacks in retaliation for the U.S. air strike that killed Zarqawi.

Egyptian-born Abu Ayyub al-Masri -- an explosives specialist also known by the alias Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer -- has become the leader of Zarqawi's terror network, Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said yesterday. Al Qaeda in Iraq is thought to number in the thousands and includes suicide bombers from Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Jordan and some North African countries.

"Our initial assessment is we think he will probably continue with the same tactics and techniques that Zarqawi did," Gen. Caldwell told reporters. "There is nothing to indicate to us that he would do differently, because he has already been here in this country for almost three, four years now, and has been a part of and associated with the ... killing of Iraqi civilians."

The Baghdad command continued to give an optimistic message on Iraq, boosted by President Bush's surprise visit this week, even as the war's death toll for the U.S. military topped 2,500.

"We believe al Qaeda in Iraq was taken by surprise," said Mowaffak Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. "They did not anticipate how powerful the Iraqi security forces are and how the government is on the attack now." He referred to the intelligence take as a "huge treasure."

The government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. commanders this week ordered a major clampdown on violence in the capital, sending more than 50,000 troops into the streets to conduct raids and patrols.

The seized al Qaeda in Iraq document released yesterday reflects discouragement by the terror group's leadership.

"Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," the documents state.

It lists a number of allied successes against the terrorist "resistance":

•"Undertaking massive arrest operations, invading regions that have an impact on the resistance, and hence causing the resistance to lose many of its elements."

•"Undertaking a media campaign against the resistance resulting in weakening its influence inside the country and presenting its work as harmful to the population rather than being beneficial to the population."

•"By tightening the resistance's financial outlets, restricting its moral options and by confiscating its ammunition and weapons."

•"By taking advantage of the resistance's mistakes and magnifying them in order to misinform."

Zarqawi's strategy, as disclosed in previously seized letters, was to spark a civil war between Sunni Muslims, who supported Saddam Hussein, and the majority Shi'ites, who now hold political power. Zarqawi did this by recruiting foreign Sunni suicide bombers to attack Shi'ite markets, schools, mosques and other public places.

The al Qaeda document said if it is to rebound from setbacks it needs to "improve the image of the resistance in society, increase the number of supporters who are refusing occupation and show the class of interest between society and the occupation and its collaborators."

The document also said al Qaeda in Iraq needs to build its own arms industry and to "avoid mistakes that will blemish the image of the resistance."

The group's major goal is to get the U.S. involved in a new war, this one against the Shi'ites in Iraq and Iran, and to provoke another war between Iraqi Shi'ites and Sunni countries in the Middle East.

One option, the paper says, is to blow up targets in the West and plant evidence that the bombing was done by Iranians.

The document concludes: "Let us hope for success and for God's help."

US Deaths In Iraq Reach 2,500 As The Country Is Torn By Violence (KRT)

By Drew Brown And Nancy A. Youssef

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. death toll in Iraq reached 2,500 on Thursday as American forces remained locked in a bitter fight against insurgents and foreign terrorists.

The Pentagon also reported that 18,940 U.S. service members have been wounded in the war to topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, which began more than three years ago and has left tens of thousands of Iraqis dead.

Meanwhile, an American general said coalition forces had killed 104 insurgents in 452 raids since terrorist chief Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed June 7 in a U.S. bombing raid.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a coalition spokesman, said the name of the man whom the American military had identified as Zarqawi's successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, probably is another name for Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the man whom a Web posting Monday by the group al-Qaida in Iraq named as the successor.

Both names probably are aliases. Abu means "father of" in Arabic, and al-Masri means "the Egyptian." The other name, al-Muhajer means "the emigrant."

Al-Masri is an Egyptian who joined Islamic Jihad in 1982, a terrorist group formed by al-Qaida No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri. Masri went to Afghanistan in 1999, where he became an expert in making car bombs, Caldwell said.

Though it's unclear when they met, al-Masri and al-Zarqawi trained together at al Farouq in Afghanistan, Caldwell said, a terrorist training camp operated by Osama bin Laden.

Al-Masri made his way to Iraq after the fall of the Taliban in 2001 and is thought to have fought U.S. forces during the siege of Fallujah in 2004. He later operated an al-Qaida cell in Baghdad and was known as the "emir of southern Iraq," Caldwell said.

He said al-Masri probably would continue the tactics his predecessor had used. American military forces blamed the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi for suicide bombings, beheadings and sectarian killings meant to provoke civil war between Iraq's majority Shiite Muslims and minority Sunni Muslims, from whom the insurgency draws most of its support.

"Nothing indicates to us that he will do differently, because he has been in this country for over three to four years now," Caldwell said. "For him to make a change, there is nothing that shows or reflects that he would do that."

Caldwell said coalition forces would continue to try to eliminate al-Qaida in Iraq by going after its midlevel leaders.

With a nightly curfew in effect and tens of thousands of Iraqi and U.S. troops on the streets of Baghdad, a new security crackdown announced by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki appeared to have curbed violence. No car bombs were reported in Baghdad on Thursday, a rare occurrence in the Iraqi capital, but it remained unclear what long-term effect the tighter measures would have.

Similar crackdowns in Baghdad, including Operation Thunder, launched in May 2005, haven't ended insurgent attacks and suicide bombings.

Iraqi police reported that unidentified gunmen had shot and killed 10 Shiites after pulling them off a bus Thursday near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

The mixed Sunni-Shiite area, which has been the scene of numerous sectarian killings and fierce fighting between American troops and insurgents, isn't far from where the U.S. airstrike killed Zarqawi.

Asked earlier this week to comment on the significance of the 2,500 American deaths in Iraq, Army Brig. Gen. Carter Ham, the deputy director of regional operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said it was important to remember that behind each of those deaths was an individual.

"And those individuals are those to whom we should be very, very grateful, and to their families," Ham said Wednesday, during a Pentagon briefing.

Newsview: Iraq War Has Mournful Milestones (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The story of the Iraq war can be told in stark numbers and mournful milestones as the death toll for U.S. troops reached 2,500 on Thursday and the price tag rose to $320 billion.

"It's a number ... a sad benchmark," White House spokesman Tony Snow said of the new death count. It was reached two days after President Bush's secretive trip to Baghdad to meet with Iraq's new leaders and to rally American troops.

"The president would like the war to be over now," Snow added.

Numbers abound. Some are marshaled by war defenders. Others are used by critics to condemn the war. And there are some few can dispute:

_The war that began March 19, 2003, with a U.S.-led invasion to oust Saddam Hussein has lasted almost three years and three months, longer than U.S. involvement in World War I (one year, seven months) and the Korean conflict (three years, one month). It is closing in on World War II (three years, eight months).

_According to Pentagon figures, 18,490 U.S. troops have been wounded in action, including 8,501 who did not return to duty.

_About 4,800 Iraqi police and security forces have died and at least 30,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed, according to some estimates.

"The numbers are sobering for what was designed to be sort of a quick action," said Thomas Mann, a senior fellow in governance studies at the Brookings Institution. "The broader point is, we made a commitment to depose Saddam with our eyes closed, not our eyes open. Now all of this is coming back to haunt the entire operation."

The Bush administration and its defenders in Congress argue that the tide is turning.

They cite the completion of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's unity Cabinet and his efforts to restore order in Baghdad, and the killing of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week and subsequent raids on dozens of terrorist targets.

Some of the statistics trumpeted by the administration:

_American and Iraqi forces have carried out 452 raids since al-Zarqawi's death on June 7. This has led to the deaths of 104 insurgents, the capture of 255 and the discovery of 28 significant arms caches, according to Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad.

_The 127,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq is a drop from more than 130,000 in recent days.

_The Army surpassed its recruiting goal for May. It was the 12th consecutive month of meeting or exceeding its target, even though the Army fell short of its 2005 full-year goals, as did the Army National Guard and Army Reserve.

"I sense something different happening in Iraq. The progress will be steady toward a goal that has clearly been defined," Bush told reporters in the Rose Garden after his quick trip to Baghdad.

But Democrats cite different statistics from the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service: 54 percent of Iraqi households lack access to clean water; 85 percent lack reliable electricity; one in four Iraqi children suffers from chronic malnutrition; oil production still lags behind prewar levels.

The Senate on Thursday sent Bush an emergency spending bill for America's wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and aid to hurricane victims. Bush was expected to sign the measure, already approved by the House.

Of the bill's $94.5 billion, $66 billion goes to the Pentagon for military operations overseas. That brings to almost $320 billion the tally for the war in Iraq and $89 billion for Afghanistan.

When Lawrence Lindsey, then chairman of Bush's National Economic Council, predicted in September 2002 that war with Iraq could cost $100 billion to $200 billion, the White House openly scoffed. Lindsey was eased out of his job.

Stephen Daggett, a budget analyst for the Congressional Research Service, said the 1991 Gulf War waged by the first President Bush cost $61 billion, or $87 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars.

The Korean conflict cost $434 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars. The Vietnam War - which lasted 8 1/2 years - cost $614 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars. World War II cost the equivalent of $5.1 trillion.

One set of numbers Bush will not give - and which Democrats and some Republicans are pressing for the hardest - is the timing and size of a U.S. troop withdrawal. Telegraphing such a timetable would be "bad policy," Bush says.

Democrat Party chief Howard Dean, however, says, "The reality is that our troops and their families still have no strategy from this president to get the job done in Iraq and get them home."

One number from the Iraq war still stands at zero by all accounts: The number of weapons of mass destruction found by Iraqi and coalition forces. Bush had cited such weapons as the main reason for invading.

Maliki Aide Who Discussed Amnesty Leaves Job (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office on Thursday accepted the resignation of an aide who had told a reporter that Maliki was considering a limited amnesty that would likely include guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops, the aide said.

Also, on a day when the U.S. military announced that the death toll for American personnel had reached 2,500, U.S. military and counterterrorism officials said they believed they had identified the new head of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq: Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian about 40 years old and a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri. A

Web site tied to al-Qaeda in Iraq on Monday identified the same man as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, a pseudonym meaning "the immigrant."

A veteran of the Zawahiri-led Egyptian Islamic Jihad and of al-Qaeda's organization in Afghanistan, Masri -- also a pseudonym, meaning "the Egyptian" -- has been in Iraq at least since 2003, officials said. Since the 2004 battle of Fallujah, he had been a trusted lieutenant of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the insurgent leader killed in a U.S. attack north of Baghdad last week.

Since Fallujah, Masri had been in charge of Zarqawi's operations in southern Iraq. Officials say they believe he also has been instrumental in enlisting and managing foreign fighters allied with the Sunni Arab insurgency.

The Maliki aide who resigned, Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, stood by his account of amnesty considerations, reported Thursday by The Washington Post. Kadhimi said Maliki had indicated the same position less directly in public. "The prime minister himself has said that he is ready to give amnesty to the so-called resistance, provided they have not been involved in killing Iraqis," Kadhimi said Thursday.

Maliki's office issued a statement earlier Thursday saying, "Mr. Adnan Kadhimi doesn't represent the Iraqi government in this issue, and Mr. Kadhimi is not an advisor or spokesman for the prime minister."

Kadhimi, who also worked as an aide to the previous prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafari, said he had submitted his resignation earlier in the week. He was informed Thursday that it had been accepted, he said.

Another Maliki aide, asked if the amnesty being considered by the government was likely to apply to those who had attacked U.S. forces, said Maliki had been "clear, saying those whose hands weren't stained with Iraqi blood" may be eligible for any amnesty.

That aide spoke on condition of anonymity, saying Maliki had not authorized anyone to speak for him. Another aide declined to comment, on the same grounds.

On the issue of clemency for those who had attacked U.S. troops, Kadhimi was quoted in Thursday's Post as saying: "That's an area where we can see a green line. There's some sort of preliminary understanding between us and the MNF-I," the U.S.-led Multi-National Force-Iraq, "that there is a patriotic feeling among the Iraqi youth and the belief that those attacks are legitimate acts of resistance and defending their homeland. These people will be pardoned definitely, I believe."

In Washington, Senate Democrats offered a resolution Thursday demanding that President Bush repudiate the amnesty proposal regarding those who attacked American forces.

"It is shocking that the Iraqi prime minister is reportedly considering granting amnesty to insurgents who have killed U.S. troops," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "On the day we lost the 2,500th soldier in Iraq, the mere idea that this proposal may go forward is an insult to the brave men and women who have died in the name of Iraqi freedom. I call on President Bush to denounce this proposal immediately."

Maliki's broad statements about amnesty, at a news conference Wednesday in Baghdad, marked the first time a leader from Iraq's dominant Shiite religious parties had indicated openness to pardoning members of the Sunni insurgency.

The statement from Maliki's office Thursday also said: "It is not true what some of the media outlets including The Washington Post have said about the willingness of the Iraqi government to talk with armed groups."

At Wednesday's news conference, Maliki said reconciliation could include an amnesty for those "who weren't involved in the shedding of Iraqi blood. Also, it includes talks with the armed men who opposed the political process and now want to turn back to political activity." Maliki's comments were in Arabic and televised. Other Western media outlets rendered the same translation, although saying "gunmen" instead of "armed men."

Meanwhile Thursday, bombings in Baghdad and northern Iraq killed eight Iraqi policemen and soldiers as the capital remained under heavy security during daylight hours.

In the southern city of Karbala, U.S. and Iraqi forces detained the leader of the provincial council, Aqeel al-Zubaidy, leading the council to suspend operations and sparking small-scale street protests, Iraqi officials said. The U.S. military, in a statement later, announced the arrest of a "terrorist leader" it referred to as Sheik Aqeel.

"Aqeel commands a Karbala terrorist network and is wanted for assassinating Iraqi citizens and planning and ordering attacks against Iraqi and Coalition forces," said the statement, which said Aqeel was responsible for the deaths of six soldiers from the U.S.-led military force last year and a soldier and interpreter earlier this month.

Shiite militias are considered the main threat to security in southern Iraq, but it was not immediately clear if the detained official belonged to one.

Shiite officials in Baghdad and Karbala, a city holy to Shiites, rushed to his defense. Karbala's governor called the arrest "a dangerous precedent."

Also Thursday, the Iraqi government released a document it said was found before Zarqawi's death during a raid on an insurgent safe house. The document, which described the insurgency as "gloomy" because of gains by Iraq's security forces, called on insurgents to foment strife among Shiites and between the United States and Iran.

The authenticity of the document, which closely echoes accounts of insurgent strategy offered by Iraq's Shiite political leaders, could not be independently verified. It was written in a style different from typical statements issued by al-Qaeda in Iraq, which refer to Shiites as "rejectionists" or "dogs" and to U.S. forces as "crusaders."

The U.S. military death toll in Iraq of 2,500 announced Thursday includes nearly 2,000 killed in action. These deaths have been caused mainly by roadside bombs, which continue to inflict a stream of American casualties despite gains in armor and the growth of Iraqi security forces.

In addition, 18,490 U.S. service members have been wounded since the March 2003 invasion, more than 8,500 of them seriously enough that they were not returned to duty within three days, according to Pentagon figures.

Roadside bombs -- known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs -- accounted for more than half of the deaths this year. Hostile fire from small arms and other weapons were the second-biggest cause of death. To date, 528 of the deaths have been non-hostile, resulting from accidents, illness, suicides and other causes.

"What is significant and troublesome is that the casualty rate per month hasn't really declined," said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution here. "Unfortunately, any hopes we had that we have come to the end of this rate of taking casualties have been dashed."

At this rate, if the war extends until 2008, "it's very likely that victory will mean 4,000 killed," said Anthony Cordesman, a military historian at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The number of Iraqi civilians and military personnel killed since the start of the war ranges from 43,000 to 49,000, according to estimates from news agencies, research groups and other sources.

The issue of Zarqawi's successor has been a major question for Iraqi and U.S. officials. In the days following Zarqawi's death, several presumed candidates surfaced in statements appearing on Web sites used by militant groups. One statement, in the name of al-Qaeda in Iraq, was signed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer and vowed to avenge Zarqawi's death.

At a news conference Thursday in Baghdad, a U.S. military spokesman said Muhajer had been identified as Masri. "We think they are one and the same at this point," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV. "We'll continue to do further analysis."

"Al-Masri's intimate knowledge of al-Qaeda in Iraq and his close relationship with [Zarqawi's] operations will undoubtedly help facilitate and enable them to regain some momentum if, in fact, he is the one that assumes the leadership role," Caldwell said.

Beyond some bare facts, little is certain about the person whose photograph -- showing a youthful man with neatly trimmed facial hair, in traditional white Gulf Arab dress -- was released in Baghdad by the U.S. Central Command. Officials in Washington said Masri is also known -- and equally unknown -- by the name Yusif al-Dardiri.

The question of who takes over Zarqawi's leadership role is important, one counterterrorism official said, because of perceived past divisions between al-Qaeda and Zarqawi's operations in Iraq. Last October, the U.S. government released a letter it said had been intercepted en route from Zawahiri to Zarqawi expressing concerns about public beheadings of hostages in Iraq and attempts to foment divisions between Sunnis and the majority Shiites.

"Zawahiri's big issue was the negative publicity that those attacks were generating," said the official, who said he was not authorized to discuss the subject on the record. The question now, he said, was whether Masri's primary allegiance is to his Egyptian mentor, Zawahiri, or to Zarqawi.

U.S. analysts have also been watching carefully for signs of a split between domestic-led Sunni groups with nationalistic aims in Iraq and those elements of the insurgency whose goals are more in keeping with bin Laden's overall objective of expanding violent jihad across the Arab word.

US Military Releases Image Of Zarqawi's Successor (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military today released new information about Abu Musab Zarqawi's successor, quickly elevating the stature of the Egyptian militant who is said in Internet postings to be the new head of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

The U.S. military also announced today that the number of American military deaths in Iraq has reached 2,500, though the 24 killed so far this month has been relatively low.

Calm prevailed throughout much of Baghdad, which is under a new security plan and a 9 p.m. curfew. But violence exploded throughout much of the country, including the murder of 10 relatives of a Sunni Arab politician who uncovered prisoner abuse in Baqubah, the assassination of a Basra city official, and a roadside bombing that killed three civilians near Hilla.

At a press briefing in the Iraqi capital, the U.S. military showed reporters a previously classified picture of the Egyptian-born militant man who goes by the name Abu Ayyub Masri or Sheik Abu Hamza Muhajer, wearing traditional Arab headdress.

"It's important for the people of Iraq to know who this is," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

Caldwell said U.S. officials debated for days before deciding to release the photo and a brief biographical sketch of the alleged insurgent leader. They worried that bolstering his media profile would play into his hands. "Our intention is not to glorify him," Caldwell said.

But by making Masri or Muhajer, whose two names mean "Egyptian" and "immigrant" in Arabic, the U.S. continues painting Iraq's Sunni Arab rebellion as driven by outsiders, even though foreign fighters make up a small portion of guerrillas fighting Americans and the Iraqi government.

"He has absolutely no ties to this country," Caldwell said.

U.S. military officials today also provided details of the June 7 bombing of Zarqawi's safe house near Baqubah. According to a timeline provided by the military, two men in a motor vehicle — possibly informants deep inside Zarqawi's network — departed the house just minutes before U.S. forces began verifying there were no friendly forces in the area and ordering the airstrike.

Caldwell said Zarqawi, who lived for nearly an hour after the bombing, spit up a pint-and-a-half of blood while being treated, a sign that he had suffered massive internal injuries by the force of the bombing.

Caldwell said the bombing badly damaged Zarqawi's network, throwing its leadership into disarray and forcing them to abandon trusted safe houses, but that the organization was expected to "reset" under new leadership. "They've been very resilient," he said.

Masri began his journey in Islamist circles in 1982 as a disciple of Ayman Zawahiri, the Egyptian physician now a deputy to Osama bin Laden, said Caldwell, citing information held by the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's spy agency.

Masri went to Taliban-ruled Afghanistan in 1999, where he trained at Bin Laden's Farouk camp, and met Zarqawi. After the 2001 U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, Masri made his way to Iraq, where he reunited with Zarqawi and became his trusted deputy.

During the first year of the insurgency, Masri helped draw other insurgent groups into Al Qaeda's fold and worked with Zarqawi's deputies in Fallouja, providing suicide bombers and car bombs to other parts of the country, the military said.

After U.S. Marines overran Fallouja in November 2004, Masri became Al Qaeda emir, or prince, of southern Iraq.

In addition to depicting the insurgents in a negative light, U.S. and Iraqi officials have tried to get Iraqis to lay down their weapons by periodically touting reconciliation plans with some insurgents.

But the scheduled announcement of a new reconciliation plan was scuttled today under unusual circumstances.

Prime Minister Jawad Maliki, after inviting reporters to his office in the Green Zone, failed to show up. At first, aides distributed two-page communiqués titled "National Reconciliation," then insisted on taking the documents back and canceled the press conference without explanation.

In other violence today, Interior Ministry officials in Baqubah said 10 tribal relatives of lawmaker Mohammad Daini were pulled off a bus, and shot dead near Baqubah. Daini had videotaped prisoners alleging torture and corruption in a local jail and sent the footage to Arab television stations.

Police also discovered seven unidentified bodies, with bullet wounds and signs of torture, in various parts of Baghdad. Local police in Khalidiya, west of Baghdad, reported clashes between insurgents and U.S. troops after a roadside bomb targeted a passing convoy.

US Military Shows Al-Zarqawi's Successor (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Willa Thayer

AP, June 15, 2006

The U.S. military presented the new face of al-Qaida in Iraq on Thursday, displaying a photograph of a bearded man in a traditional white Arab headdress and saying he was taking over after the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The new leader is Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Afghanistan-trained explosives expert with links to Osama bin Laden's top deputy, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell.

He also is the man behind the nom de guerre made public by al-Qaida in Iraq after al-Zarqawi was killed last week in an U.S. airstrike on his safe house outside of Baghdad, the military spokesman said.

However, U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said it's not certain that al-Masri is al-Zarqawi's successor.

"That's clearly one of the leading names, but we're going to need a little bit of time to sort out — and they're clearly needing a little time — to sort out where they go after what is clearly a big blow to al-Qaida," Hadley said at the White House.

Caldwell said al-Masri was the man identified in an Internet posting by al-Qaida that said Abu Hamza al-Muhajer was al-Zarqawi's successor. The name means "immigrant" in Arabic and suggested he was not an Iraqi.

According to the U.S. military, Al-Masri was a founding member of al-Qaida in Iraq. After meeting the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi in Afghanistan, he followed him to Iraq to help set up the terror cell in 2003.

Even before terror leader's death, the Bush administration posted a $200,000 bounty on al-Masri because of his level of leadership within al-Qaida, Caldwell said.

Citing recently declassified documents, he said al-Masri has been a terrorist since 1982, "beginning with his involvement in the Egyptian Islamic Jihad," which was led by Ayman al-Zawahri, bin Laden's top deputy.

Going by that chronology, the photograph the military presented — showing a young man with a sparse mustache and a trimmed goatee — appeared to be at least several years old.

Caldwell said the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency provided the picture, adding: "Everything we had was classified just 24 hours ago associated with this gentleman — this terrorist."

Yet Islamist watchers in Egypt and abroad said they had never heard of al-Masri — whose name means "the Egyptian" — and expressed skepticism about U.S. claims that he was poised to become Iraq's new terror leader.

"His codename doesn't ring a bell for me; he's not one of the wanted Jihadis in Egypt," said Egyptian lawyer Montasser el-Zayat, who was imprisoned with al-Qaida No. 2 al-Zawahri from 1981-84.

In an indication of the confusion surrounding the identity of the group's new leader, the U.S. first announced al-Masri's name shortly after the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi was killed June 7. But al-Qaida in Iraq later identified its new leader as al-Muhajer.

The new leader issued a Web statement Tuesday vowing to avenge al-Zarqawi's death and threatening horrific attacks "in the coming days."

"Don't be overcome with joy about killing our sheik Abu Musab (al-Zarqawi), God bless his soul, because he has left lions behind him," the statement said.

Citing recently declassified information, Caldwell said the military believes al-Masri first went to Afghanistan in 1999 to receive training and lecture on Islam to other militants. There he became an expert in building roadside bombs, skills he used in Fallujah and Baghdad.

He trained with al-Zarqawi at the al-Farouq camp in Afghanistan and they began to collaborate in Iraq. Raids in April and May in southern Baghdad recovered material confirming his high-level involvement in moving foreign fighters from Syria to Iraq, Caldwell said.

However, Yasser al-Sirri, an Egyptian who runs the Islamic Observation Center in London, said information supplied by al-Qaida in announcing the new leader pointed to another man: Abdullah bin Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahedeen Shura Council — five allied groups in the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency.

"I'm 95 percent sure that this al-Masri doesn't exist," al-Sirri said, adding that the group could be trying to cover up the nationality of its new leader to promote a broader Islamic identity.

"Al-Qaida does not want to show that he is an Iraqi because they work under the Islamic banner ... and they seek international jihad," al-Sirri said.

Caldwell acknowledged that al-Masri's ability to exert leadership over al-Qaida cells remained unclear and said other "al-Qaida senior leadership members and Sunni terrorists" could try to take over the operations.

He pointed to al-Baghdadi along with Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi, whom al-Qaida in Iraq statements have identified as the group's deputy. Al-Iraqi was believed to have been killed in the airstrike along with al-Zarqawi.

Mustafa Alani, a terror expert at the Gulf Research Center, said the ultimate call for the new leader would be made by bin Laden or al-Zawahri, believed to be hiding in the rugged border area between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

U.S. Portrayal Helps Flesh Out Zarqawi's Heir (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 15 — American military officers on Thursday put a face on the new chief of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, releasing a photograph and details of the man they say succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi after he was killed in an airstrike last week.

In a news briefing, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman here, identified Mr. Zarqawi's successor as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who he said had trained in one of the terrorist camps in Afghanistan run by Al Qaeda in 1999.

Mr. Masri, he said, was a "founding member" of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and had become one of Mr. Zarqawi's "closest remaining associates." The group is believed to be responsible for dozens of suicide attacks and car bombings across Iraq that have killed thousands of Iraqi civilians.

General Caldwell said Mr. Masri — the name means "the Egyptian" in Arabic — was the same person as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, whom Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia declared as its new leader in an Internet posting this week. Both names are thought to be pseudonyms. Shortly after Mr. Zarqawi was killed, American officials predicted that Mr. Masri was the likely successor.

In the photograph released Thursday, the man the Americans claim to be Mr. Masri is wearing a kaffiyeh, the traditional Arabic headwear, and sporting a wispy mustache and goatee. He seems a young man, perhaps in his late 20's, and he is not smiling. He is staring directly into the camera, as if sitting for a passport photograph. American officials said they believed Mr. Masri to be in his late 30's, suggesting that the photograph is old.

The Americans said Mr. Masri joined the Egyptian militant group Islamic Jihad in 1982 and went to Afghanistan in 1999 to train in the Farouq militant camp, where he learned about explosives.

Islamic Jihad was headed by Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian doctor who later became Osama bin Laden's deputy in Al Qaeda. The Farouq camp, set up by Mr. Zawahiri and Mr. bin Laden, was one of the main Qaeda training camps before it was bombed by the United States in October 2001.

General Caldwell said he was not sure whether Mr. Masri had developed a relationship with either Mr. Zawahiri or Mr. bin Laden.

But, the general said, it was in Afghanistan that Mr. Masri developed a relationship with Mr. Zarqawi.

Mr. Masri, he said, came to Iraq in early 2003 and helped to set up the original cell in Baghdad of what later became Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. More recently, Mr. Masri was a senior operational commander for the group, supplying suicide bombers and car bombs. He was responsible for all operations in southern Iraq, General Caldwell said.

Mr. Masri is believed to be operating in Baghdad, he said.

The link between Mr. Masri and Mr. Zawahiri is intriguing, in part because of a letter that American officials captured last year that they said they believed was written by Mr. Zawahiri to Mr. Zarqawi. In that letter, Mr. Zawahiri, believed to be hiding along the mountainous border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, questioned Mr. Zarqawi's emphasis on killing Shiite civilians, suggesting that such killings alienated Iraqis and detracted from the larger goal of driving out the Americans.

That raises the possibility that the leadership of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia could be contemplating a change in tactics.

Earlier this week, a man identifying himself as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer — who the Americans believe is Mr. Masri — issued a statement through a jihadi Internet site pledging to continue attacks against "crusaders and Shiites."

Still, American officials said they believed that Mr. Zarqawi's death had disrupted the leadership of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, and that a struggle for control of the organization might be under way.

General Caldwell suggested that others in the organization might be challenging Mr. Masri, including Abdullah al-Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahedeen Shura, or Council of Holy Warriors, an organization that claims to oversee Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and several other militant groups.

"As we continue looking at the Al Qaeda network, there is no question that it is in some kind of disarray and disorganization at this point," General Caldwell said.

The Iraqi government released what it said was a document drawn up by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia that showed the difficulties being endured by insurgents in Iraq. The document called for efforts to sabotage America's relationship with Iraq's Shiites — and to start a war between America and Iran — to salvage the prospects of the insurgency.

The document said the insurgency was being weakened by the American program to train Iraqi security forces, as well as "massive attacks and arrests," the disruption of insurgents' financial networks and the launching of a propaganda campaign that was prompting Iraqis to believe that the insurgents were acting against the public interest.

"Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," the document said.

"We mean specifically attempting to escalate the tension between America and Iran, and America and the Shiites in Iraq," the document said.

There was no way to verify the authenticity of the document. General Caldwell said it came from a "mass storage device" discovered in a raid carried out before the airstrike on Mr. Zarqawi.

In Washington, White House officials played down reports out of Iraq that as a way to promote unity, the new government would consider granting amnesty to those who had attacked American troops.

During a news briefing with reporters on Thursday, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, urged patience, noting that the Iraqis were still working through their unification plan.

"They have talked of steps to try and get people into the — to lay down their arms and come into the political process," he said.

"They've talked about dealing with the issue of militia," he added. "They've talked about a kind of truth and reconciliation commission on the approach of South Africa, and they've talked about amnesty. But that's kind of the level of discussion."

For the first time, American officers offered a detailed timeline of the airstrike that killed Mr. Zarqawi. Though the Americans declined to discuss the details, the sequence of events suggested the presence of a mole inside Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who tipped off the Americans about Mr. Zarqawi's location inside the house where he was killed.

According to the timeline, a critical moment leading up the attack came at 4:18 p.m., about two hours before the airstrike. That was when a vehicle containing two people pulled up to an unidentified Iraqi house near the one in Hibhib where Mr. Zarqawi was waiting. One of the people in the vehicle was Sheik Abd al-Rahman, Mr. Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, whom the Americans had been tracking. Mr. Rahman went inside.

Five minutes later, another vehicle arrived at the same house. The identities of those in the second car were not disclosed. But, according to the timeline, Mr. Rahman drove away 23 minutes later to meet Mr. Zarqawi.

The first meeting at the undisclosed location, General Caldwell said, was the main tip-off that Mr. Rahman would soon be going to see Mr. Zarqawi, the Americans' ultimate target.

The purpose of this first meeting, it appears, was for Mr. Rahman to be told of Mr. Zarqawi's exact location, and whether it would be safe to go there. Until that time, it is unlikely that Mr. Rahman even knew where Mr. Zarqawi was.

"This is the first time where we saw Rahman move to a meeting location, moving from his vehicle inside another place," General Caldwell said. "That was a movement along a path that eventually took him to the safe house."

Fourteen minutes after leaving the first house, Mr. Rahman arrived at the house in Hibhib, where Mr. Zarqawi was waiting for him. He got out of his vehicle and walked inside.

The meeting went on for about 45 minutes, officials said, when an unidentified vehicle left the safe house with two passengers. Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman were still inside.

Shortly thereafter, the Americans ordered an F-16 pilot to drop two 500-pound bombs on the house, killing Mr. Zarqawi, Mr. Rahman and four others, including a young girl.

Asked whether the vehicle that left the house before the airstrike contained the mole, General Caldwell offered an intriguing answer.

"We have been asked not to talk about any of the individuals who left the place, or where they may have ended up or where they are today," he said.

Al-Masri Identified As Apparent Zarqawi Successor (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Debbi Wilgoren

Correction to This Article

Earlier versions of this story incorrectly reported from Washington that the 2,500 death toll included civilian contractors. It does not. The figure includes military troops and 7 Department of Defense civilian casualties. The story also said that nearly 17,500 U.S. troops had been wounded. That figure should be 18,500. It also included an incorrect translation for the pseudonym al-Muhajer. That means "the immigrant." This version has been corrected.

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- U.S. military leaders Thursday unveiled a photograph of the Egyptian-born explosives expert they believe has been tapped as the apparent successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the insurgent leader killed in an airstrike June 7.

The announcement came as the death toll for U.S. troops and Defense Department civilians in Iraq reached 2,500, Pentagon officials said. A total of 1,972 personnel have been killed in action since the March 2003 invasion, officials said, while 528 died from accidents, illness and other causes. Nearly 18,500 U.S. soldiers have been wounded in the conflict, with about 10,000 of them returning to duty within three days, the Pentagon said. Of the fatalities, seven were civilian employees of the Pentagon.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told reporters Thursday morning that Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the man identified on Web postings as the new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, is known to U.S. officials as Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

Masri was trained as an explosives expert in Afghanistan, Caldwell told reporters at a briefing. Masri is believed to have ties to fellow Egyptian Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy to Osama bin Laden in the al-Qaeda terrorist network.

Caldwell said Masri has been involved in terrorist activity since 1982, initially working with the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, which was led by Zawahiri. He was pictured in a large photograph on display at the media briefing wearing a traditional white Arab headdress secured with a black cord.

Masri's high-level involvement in al-Qaeda in Iraq was confirmed by material seized in military raids in southern Iraq in April and May, Caldwell said. The loose-knit insurgent group has been responsible for hundreds of bombings, kidnappings and killings of Iraqi civilians and U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

Caldwell said the United States cannot determine whether Masri has assumed full control of the group.

"Al-Masri's ability to effectively assert his leadership over al-Qaeda cells remains unclear," he said, adding that there are other "al-Qaeda senior leadership members and Sunni terrorists" who could compete with him for power.

Among them, Caldwell cited Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi, who in the past has been identified as deputy leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, and Abdullah bin Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujaheddin Shura Council.

In the Internet posting last week, the man identifying himself as Muhajer claimed to have succeeded Zarqawi, and vowed to avenge his death.

Both "al-Muhajer" and "al-Masri" are pseudonyms -- al-Muhajer means "the immigrant," and al-Masri means "the Egyptian." Abu Hamza and Abu Ayyub mean "father of Hamza" and "father of Ayyub," respectively. Arab men who have children commonly are known by their eldest son's name.

The men calling themselves al-Iraqi and al-Baghdadi also appear to be using aliases.

In a separate news briefing in Baghdad, Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie on Thursday unveiled a document he said was written by al-Qaeda leaders and suggested the insurgency was weakening.

Wire service reports quoted Rubaie as saying that al-Qaeda leaders wanted to encourage a war between the United States and Iran, to distract the United States from its campaign against the insurgent group. He said the document described the current situation as a "crisis" for the insurgency, and outlined the need to lessen cooperation between Iraqi Shiites and the United States.

But U.S. officials cautioned that there was no way to verify whether that was in fact the insurgents' position.

Although the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the document was found in Zarqawi's hideout following the June 7 airstrike that killed him, Caldwell said the document actually was taken off a computer drive in the days before military forces pinpointed Zarqawi's location.

Shiite Militias Control Prisons, Official Says (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's prison system is overrun with Shiite Muslim militiamen who have freed fellow militia members convicted of major crimes and executed Sunni Arab inmates, the country's deputy justice minister said in an interview this week.

"We cannot control the prisons. It's as simple as that," said the deputy minister, Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, an ethnic Kurd. "Our jails are infiltrated by the militias from top to bottom, from Basra to Baghdad."

As a result, Yei has asked U.S. authorities to suspend plans to transfer prisons and detainees from American to Iraqi control. "Our ministry is unprepared at this time to take over the facilities, especially those in areas where Shiite militias exist," he said in a letter to U.S. Army Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, the official in charge of American detention facilities.

U.S. officials said months ago that they planned to turn over Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison and three other American-run facilities to the Iraqi government, but the handoff has been repeatedly pushed back. Gardner has said he will not authorize the transfers until he is convinced that standards of inmate treatment and security match those maintained in U.S.-run facilities.

"We will not transfer the facilities and legal custody of the detainees until each respective facility and the Iraqi Corrections system have demonstrated the ability to maintain the required standards, especially in the areas of care and custody," Gardner said in a written response to questions. "We fully recognize that there are significant challenges that must be overcome but believe that we will be able to address these as we move through 2006 into 2007."

He said Abu Ghraib would be transferred to Iraqi control "in the next few months."

Gardner said the eventual transfer of prisons to Iraqi control would proceed gradually, preceded by several weeks of training for Iraqi guards, conducted by U.S. corrections officers and military police. The Iraqis would then work under the supervision of American guards for at least six months. A U.S. transition team would then be left in place for an additional period before the prison was handed over.

While allegations of abuse at U.S.-run prisons have waned since the 2004 Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal, Iraqi facilities have drawn increased scrutiny since a U.S. Army raid exposed torture of dozens of detainees -- most of them Sunnis -- at a secret Interior Ministry facility in the Baghdad neighborhood of Jadriyah.

The prison was widely alleged to have been operated by a special police unit staffed largely by members of the Badr Organization, a Shiite militia with ties to Iraq's largest Shiite political party. The government investigated the facility but never announced the results.

Yei said that because of mounting concern over detention centers run by Iraq's Interior and Defense ministries, where militias retain heavy influence, the police and army have agreed to turn over all their prisoners to the Justice Ministry by the end of the month.

As of early June, there were 7,426 inmates housed in Justice Ministry facilities, Yei said. The Interior Ministry had an additional 1,797 prisoners and the Defense Ministry a smaller number. More than 15,000 inmates were being held in five U.S. prisons in Iraq.

But while a U.N. human rights report issued last month stressed that the Defense and Interior ministries have legal authority to hold inmates only a brief time, Sunni Arabs charge that Sunnis are regularly imprisoned in the centers for months or even more than a year.

"The police are not supposed to be holding them beyond the time it takes to conduct an investigation," Yei said. "As long as the Interior Ministry doesn't hide anything, they will all be handed to us this month."

Already, the transfer plan is meeting resistance. The provincial council in Wasit province, south of Baghdad, ordered police there not to transfer detainees to a Justice Ministry facility, according to Muhammed Hasan al-Attabi, a provincial government spokesman.

A major general with Iraq's Interior Ministry, speaking on condition he not be named, said the transfer was already underway and would be completed on schedule. He denied that militias ran roughshod over the prisons. "All the detention centers in Baghdad and southern Iraq are under our control, except for some centers in Basra, maybe two or three there, which are run by militia officers," he said.

In an interview this week, Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie, the top Sunni Arab in Iraq's new government, showed photographs taken from one recent inspection of an Interior Ministry detention center. An inmate in one of the photos held out his misshapen, limp hands for the camera. The man's hands had been broken in a beating, Zobaie said. Other inmates showed massive, dark bruises on their skin; one bore a large, open infected sore.

Inmates in another photo clustered around chains hung from the middle of one of the crowded cells. The chains were used to hoist prisoners by their bound hands, Zobaie said. The practice, noted frequently in inspection reports of Interior Ministry detention centers, often results in the dislocation of prisoners' shoulders.

Ninety percent of the men crowded into Interior Ministry detention centers are Sunni Arabs, Zobaie said. He called treatment in the Interior Ministry prisons "inhumane" and indicated it still was less than certain whether the Defense and Interior ministries would follow through on their agreement to turn over the inmates to the Justice Ministry. "Hopefully, they will," he said.

Yei gave several detailed accounts of abuses by militias, the names of which he declined to provide, saying only that "there are two, everyone knows them." U.S. officials recently said they consider the militias to be as grave a threat to Iraq's security as the Sunni-led insurgency.

On Aug. 13, 2004, he said, militia members freed 552 prisoners in the southern city of Hilla during a militia-led attack. A week later, 122 inmates escaped from the main prison in Amarah, also in the south, with the help of guards who were also militia members.

On Jan. 13, 2005, he said, 38 prisoners escaped during an attack on a convoy carrying them to Baghdad's Abu Ghraib. Eight were eventually rearrested. A month later, seven prisoners escaped while being transferred to the Badoush prison in the northern city of Mosul.

On June 14, 2005, seven prisoners escaped from Abu Ghraib in an incident still under investigation.

Last December, militia members entered the maximum-security prison in the Kadhimiyah section of Baghdad, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, freeing one militia member on death row and four others serving life sentences. At the same prison, on Feb. 28, guards and militia members freed two men who were to be executed that week.

And in the once-tranquil southern city of Basra, where militia violence has surged in recent months to the point that the Iraqi government declared a state of emergency in late May, militia members in early March took 12 foreign-born prisoners -- Egyptian, Saudi and Sudanese -- from their cells and shot them dead them by the facilities' main gate.

Yei's account adds to a growing list of alleged abuses in Iraq's overburdened prison system, long criticized by Sunni leaders who say Sunni prisoners are commonly mistreated.

Visits to detention centers in southern Iraq in recent months indicated they are often badly overcrowded and unsanitary. At the Tesfirat prison in Najaf last October, 122 prisoners were packed into cells designed for a maximum of 60, according to Lt.

Jassim Juwad, the prison officer in charge. A prison maintained by police commandos in Hilla and designed for 150 inmates housed 400 as recently as April. Inmates at both locations had been incarcerated for up to 18 months without trial.

On Saturday, a group of parliament members paid a surprise visit to a detention facility run by the Interior Ministry in Baqubah, north of Baghdad. "We have found terrible violations of the law," said Muhammed al-Dayni, a Sunni parliament member who said as many as 120 detainees were packed into a 35-by-20-foot cell. "They told us that they've been raped," Dayni said. "Their families were called in and tortured to force the detainees to testify against other people."

"The detention facilities of the ministries of Defense and Interior are places for the most brutal human rights abuse," he added.

Despite broad U.S. efforts to encourage the Iraqi government to improve conditions in prisons, the problem of militia control could prove particularly intractable. Shiite militias such as the Badr Organization and the Mahdi Army, loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are backed by dozens of members of parliament whose political parties run the armed groups.

"You can't even talk to the militias, because they are the government," Yei said. "They have ministers on their side."

After A Dark Time, A Walk Into The Sun (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- The desert hut that became his home for more than a year, the place he lived in captivity with some 30 other men at Abu Ghraib prison, was No. 6 -- known, he said, as the "freedom tent."

At the prison, Omar Taha, 24, pined for his girlfriend and his favorite nightclubs, passed time playing soccer and listening to the radio and never got over his bewilderment at being arrested for what he says was simply being too close to an explosion in Baghdad.

"I was just driving my car," he said. "Two soldiers came up to me and said, 'Why are you stopped?' I said, 'I am scared.' Then they took me here."

On Thursday, Taha was one of 489 detainees who walked under a harsh sun out of the chain-link pen at Iraq's most infamous prison. The mass release, part of a larger plan to free 2,500 prisoners this month, is intended to bolster Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's efforts to defuse the Sunni Arab insurgency.

This week Maliki, a member of the Shiite Muslim majority, expressed a willingness to talk with insurgents and proposed pardoning people involved in the resistance that has destabilized Iraq. A fuller description of his reconciliation plan is expected soon.

The prisoner release on Thursday was the third this month. Before walking out in single file, the men stood quietly behind the fence as Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie addressed them from atop a wooden platform.

"We want to see people who are innocent released, and go back to their homes, and go back to their normal lives," Zobaie said, adding: "Anyone who is innocent must be released. Anyone whose hands are drenched in blood must not be let go."

Some of the men were barefoot; others wore sandals. They were each given a copy of the Koran, a new set of clothes, $25 and a bus ticket. Some held up their Korans to reporters, who were kept outside the fence, and others put towels over their heads to block the sun. One elderly man, missing his left leg, hobbled out of the prison on crutches.

Mizher Jasim, 20, said he had fallen behind his economics classmates at the University of Tikrit after 6 1/2 months in prison for a "random arrest."

"There was some shootout, and they brought a lot of people in," he said, calling his treatment "not so bad."

"But I was still in detention," he said.

As of early June, more than 15,000 inmates were being held in five U.S. prisons in Iraq, according to the Iraqi Justice Ministry. Abu Ghraib currently holds 3,600 prisoners, but the number fluctuates because the prison serves as a transfer point for detainees moving to and from other detention centers, said Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for the American military command.

To gain their freedom, the detainees -- most of whom have not been formally charged -- had to renounce violence and pledge to be good citizens, Curry said. Their cases were reviewed, and those who were found to be "relatively low risk" were released, he said.

"In the spirit of unity and reconciliation, we need to reintegrate the detainees who were found not guilty of the serious violent crimes -- bombing, torture, kidnapping, murder," Curry said.

Iraq's deputy justice minister, Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, sharply criticized the U.S.-led forces for imprisoning so many people.

"If there is an incident in this neighborhood or that neighborhood, they will arrest the whole neighborhood, 400 or 500 people, and there are only four or five criminals. This is why they don't send them to court," he said in an interview this week. "I say, why keep them here? They are chickens? They say, if we send them to the court, the court will release them. I say this is the law, but it's in one ear and out the other."

S. Korean Charged In Oil - For - Food Scandal (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

Filed at 1:08 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food scandal has been charged with lying to the FBI.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned an indictment accusing Tongsun Park of falsely telling investigators in 2004 that he played no role more than a decade ago in the adoption of the U.N. resolution that set up the oil-for-food program.

The one-count, single-sentence indictment also says Park made false statements when he said he had no business dealings with an unidentified U.N. official, and when he told the FBI that he did not exchange money with an unidentified Iraqi-American, and that he had never been to that person's office.

In New York, Park already is facing charges of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, acting as an unregistered agent of a foreign government and money laundering. He has pleaded not guilty.

Park's lawyer, Michael Kim, said the government is concerned it will lose the case in New York and is seeking "a second bite of the apple" with the Washington case, which was assigned to U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan. The New York case is scheduled to go to trial June 26.

The oil-for-food program ran from 1996 to 2003 to help Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Baghdad's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Park was charged in New York in April 2005 with accepting millions of dollars from the Iraqi government while he operated in the United States as an unregistered agent for Iraq's oil-for-food program. He became a fugitive when he failed to respond to a U.S. warrant, and he was arrested in Houston in January after being expelled from Mexico.

In the 1970s, Park was at the center of what became known as the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of trying to buy influence in Congress.

Park was indicted in the scandal, but the charges were dropped.

Tongsun Park, the South Korean businessman accused of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq, was charged in a new case with making false statements to the FBI.

Park "knowingly and willfully" lied about the United Nations Oil-for-Food program, according to an indictment issued this week in Washington.

"Park falsely told FBI agents that he played no role in the adoption of United Nations Security Council Resolution 986," which established the U.N. program, according to the indictment. He also falsely said he didn't exchange money with an unnamed Iraqi-American and that he had no business dealings with an unnamed U.N. official, the indictment said.

The businessman already faces trial in Manhattan later this month for alleged work on behalf of Saddam Hussein's regime. Park was accused in a January indictment of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Park lobbied the U.S. and the U.N. to repeal sanctions and set up the Oil-for-food program, the government says.

Michael Kim, a lawyer representing Park, said the government is "piling on" before the June 26 Manhattan trial.

The U.S. investigation into the Oil-for-Food program has resulted in charges against 11 people, including Houston oilman Oscar Wyatt.

Most defendants are accused of paying illegal kickbacks to Saddam's regime in exchange for oil.

Military Investigates U.S. Killings Of Iraqis At Checkpoint (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military is investigating the killing of three Iraqi civilians by American forces in northern Iraq, Pentagon officials said Thursday.

The inquiry into the May 9 deaths in Salahuddin province was requested by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq, officials in Baghdad announced today.

Pentagon officials said they could provide few details about the deaths of the Iraqis, who were killed at a checkpoint in province's southern region. The military is investigating whether they were threatening American troops or whether the troops acted improperly and had no cause to use force against the civilians, an official said.

Chiarelli requested that the Army's Criminal Investigation Command undertake the inquiry as a result of soldiers' reported suspicions about the deaths. At the time of the deaths, the Iraqis were in the custody of U.S.-led forces, according to the statement released in Baghdad.

Salahuddin, which includes former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, begins about 40 miles north of Baghdad and is part of an area overseen by the Army's 101st Airborne Division. Pentagon officials said they were unable to say whether the forces involved in the killings were Army personnel or members of another service.

Checkpoints have become a contentious issue in Iraq. Vehicles laden with explosives are one of the most deadly threats to American troops, and service members are most vulnerable at roadblocks. But Iraqi officials have said the Americans are too quick to fire on vehicles as they approach the roadblocks.

Under Chiarelli, troops have been looking for methods other than firing warning shots to caution civilians as they approach checkpoints.

Dozens of people have been killed at checkpoints, including an Italian intelligence agent who had just helped rescue a kidnapped journalist in March 2005.

The investigation into the Salahuddin deaths comes at a time of increased attention to such incidents because of recent allegations that U.S. Marines killed two dozen innocent Iraqi civilians in Haditha in November.

Haditha stories

As more reporters travel to Haditha, some of them Iraqi stringers hired by Western newspapers, the stories about what U.S. Marines did in the town Nov. 19 get more and more gruesome.

Defense attorneys deny assertions by some residents that Marines lined up unarmed civilians and executed them. They say the Marines of Kilo Company, after being fired upon, did three house-clearing operations in which civilians, and suspected insurgents, some armed, some not, were killed. Some of the 24 were women and children.

More troubling to defense attorneys is an account from one resident that the Marines killed an elderly man in a wheelchair. Marines have told lawyers they saw no man in a wheelchair during the operations in what is one of the most dangerous towns in Anbar province.

Marine Corps defenders also are questioning the authenticity of a video, purportedly of the victims and made by a Sunni man. They question why the images did not surface until months afterward.

Still, sources close to the case expect Marines to face criminal charges once an investigation is complete.

Fat terrorist

For a man constantly on the run planning new ways to murder innocents, Abu Musab Zarqawi didn't miss many meals.

Among the findings of an autopsy, which found he died June 7 of bomb-damaged lungs, was that the al Qaeda in Iraq leader was a bit hefty.

"He was fit, but I think he was on the heavyweight side," an unidentified forensic pathologist, who conducted the postmortem, told reporters in Baghdad.

The U.S. military previously had captured and shown a homemade video of a plump Zarqawi unable to operate a machine gun and calling for help from fellow terrorists.

Shrinkage

The Air Force has sent a memo to airmen explaining why the service is cutting the force by 40,000 in the coming years. The bottom line: The Air Force wants to free up money to pay for expensive weapons systems, such as the F-22 Raptor.

"We are reducing end strength and becoming more efficient," the memo states. "It is important to maintain our technological edge to fight the wars of today and tomorrow."

Warning that pink slips are coming, the memo adds, "We understand this could be a difficult time for some airmen and their families. We will use every authority available to minimize the impact for those transitioning to civilian life."

The active-duty Air Force is slated to shrink from 351,800 this year to 334,200 in 2007.

Prison break

Not much was known about one of Delta Forces' biggest successes, that is until Kurt Muse decided to tell his story of survival, which is closely linked to the secretive special operations unit.

In 1989, as U.S. forces prepared to invade Panama from within (from American bases protecting the canal) and from without, Delta commandos first used Little Bird helicopters to scale the walls of Panama's main prison and free Mr. Muse.

Years later, Mr. Muse writes about the rescue in his book, "Six Minutes to Freedom: How a Band of Heroes Defied a Dictator and Helped Free a Nation."

Mr. Muse, now a Northern Virginia resident, lived and worked in Panama, seeing the brutality of Manuel Noriega up close. He decided to work against the dictator by building an underground radio station, the Voice of Liberty, to broadcast the truth. Noriega imported Cuban agents to hunt down the station's location. They did, capturing Mr. Muse and imprisoning him for nine months, with orders to execute him if he tried to escape.

Mr. Muse, whose research included interviewing former President George Bush in his Houston office, tells us he thinks he is the only American civilian ever rescued by Delta Force. He plans a reunion with some of his rescuers at a book launch party this month.

An excerpt: "Total elapsed time from touch-down to dust-off was six minutes. But the night was about to get a lot longer. ... Three feet past the edge of the roof, the chopper pilot dropped the bird into a nose-down dive that first nearly had them smashing into the prison yard dirt and then again into the prison yard wall. ... On the far side of the wall, the chopper landed in the middle of the street. ... This was about to get ugly."

Army ammo

The Army recently concluded a $3 million, three-year study to find out what it was told by a group of specialists years ago: The killing power of the M-16/M-4 carbine is good for close combat.

The Army study started after some soldiers in Afghanistan claimed that the 62-grain, 5.56 mm round did not have enough stopping power to kill terrorists in close combat. The complaints appeared aimed at trying to get the Army to adopt bigger caliber guns and ammo, something the service opposes.

According to defense officials close to the study, a group of assembled specialists on the matter, including both ballistics specialists and medical doctors familiar with bullet wounds, told the Army before it started the study that the problem is not the size of the bullet but the person pulling the trigger.

The specialists concluded that disabling an enemy combatant with an M-16 is more dependent on where a shot is placed, the number of hits that are placed on target, and the level of marksmanship training of the solider. The size of the bullet and its design are less important and the standard M855 ammunition, known as "green tip" ammo is fine.

The Army study concluded almost the same thing but failed to identify one fault of its own soldiers: They need more training to be better shots.

The study proved that the complaints from some units in Afghanistan were unwarranted. "There are some special operations units that never complained because they could shoot," one official told us. For those lacking marksmanship training, "they could shoot at someone 10 times but only hit him once or twice."

"The Army is very willing to spend a lot of money on guns and ammunition, but very little on marksmanship training," the official said.

China-Hamas links

A Chinese intelligence officer is engaged in covertly aiding the ruling Palestinian Hamas terrorist group, according to a Paris-based intelligence newsletter.

Gong Xiaosheng was identified as a Ministry of State Security (MSS) official who has worked out of Ramallah since November 2002, Intelligence Online reported in its June 9 edition.

The report said Mr. Gong is a "strategic agent" who was trained in Division 8 of the ministry and also at the China Institute of Contemporary International Relations (CICIR), an MSS think tank whose Middle East section is headed by Jin Ruikun, a specialist on Palestine and Jordan, and Chen Shuanqing, a specialist on Israeli-Palestinian relations and Israel's Likud Party.

The institute produces in-house studies for Chinese communist and military leaders and predicted in January that Hamas would win the Palestinian elections.

According to the report, Mr. Gong in the past was constantly seen in the company of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat but has since begun helping Hamas.

Mr. Gong arranged an invitation to China for Mahmud al-Zahar, the Hamas foreign minister to take part in a China-Arab Cooperation Forum in Beijing last month.

Unlike the United States and other Western governments who rightly view Hamas as a terrorist organization, China was quick to recognize the new Palestinian government ruled by Hamas.

Americans Fear Haditha Fallout (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

AMERICANS FEAR Haditha fallout but oppose prosecuting Marines.

In Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 62% say reported massacre of Iraqi civilians will harm U.S. relationship with Muslim world. But by 49%-33%, they want reprimands rather than criminal charges.

Americans say troops "shouldn't be the fall guys," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts survey with Republican Bill McInturff. Only 32% believe such incidents are "common."

Optimism rises after Zarqawi's death, but 57% still want U.S. forces cut.

ECONOMIC GLOOM gives Democrats a political opening.

By 39%-16%, Americans expect economy to get worse in next year; 43% say it'll stay the same. Democrats lead on handling the economy by the largest margin, 16 percentage points, since 1993. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Among independents, 25% worry Democrats will too quickly raise taxes and spending. But 37% say Bush's party isn't sufficiently curbing spending and shrinking the deficit. As House and Senate near minimum-wage clashes next week, 55% of independents are more likely to support a candidate who backs an increase.

INCONVENIENT TRUTH: Gore's ratings remain negative.

Americans view former vice president unfavorably by 42%-30%, though 53% of Democrats give a thumbs-up. But his cause draws adherents: 59% say climate change warrants "some action" or "immediate" steps, up from 51% in 1999.

After appearing with Falwell, 2008 hopeful McCain sees favorable ratings among conservatives tick up to 40% from 36% in April. McCain's standing among Republicans, 47% positive and 16% negative, exceeds the 36%-13% showing for potential rival Gingrich.

Among 2004 Bush backers, 8% say their 2006 vote will signal opposition to the president.

STAR QUALITY? Senate Democratic Leader Reid launches "Your Congress" on PoliticsTV.com, a Webcast network for the left. "When it comes to a regular political analyst, we think we have Fox News, CNN and MSNBC beat," says PoliticsTV Chairman Mike Lux. Some 15% of Americans under 35 call themselves "strong Republicans," matching the proportion of "strong Democrats."

WANING WEDGE? Among Republicans most interested in 2006 elections, gay marriage trails Iraq and immigration as issue; 22% cite it as a top factor in November choice. Just 5% say flag-burning.

DANGER ZONE? An environmental group says National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's new Tsunami Warning Center in Hawaii is vulnerable to storms. An NOAA spokeswoman says tsunamis in the past century have never reached the third-floor level where offices will be. By 28%-27%, Republicans say Democratic Party would better protect the environment.

SCANDAL FAILS to emerge as pivotal midterm-election issue.

Prosecutor Fitzgerald's decision not to charge Rove in CIA leak case makes it harder for Democrats to tie "culture of corruption" to Bush. Attention to Abramoff and DeLay sagas, partly offset by woes of Democrat Jefferson, have left minority party with modest seven percentage-point edge on ethics.

Pluralities of voters in all regions except the Northeast say both parties are "equally" influenced by special interests and lobbyists. But if Democrats recapture Congress, 69% want Congress to investigate Bush administration's energy task force.

Americans back Congressional probes of Iraq intelligence by 57%-40%, and of warrantless wiretaps by 53%-44%.

MINOR MEMOS: Census says 147,000 of 66.3 million American fathers are married and home with kids under 15. ... Among men, 42% are more likely to back a congressional candidate who'd make most abortions illegal, compared with 38% of women.

General Leading Haditha Probe Known For Integrity, Toughness (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The two-star Army general leading the main inquiry into the killings of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is a decorated Delta Force operative known among his peers for integrity and uncanny judgment in combat.

Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell rose from a Special Forces staff sergeant in Vietnam to commander of the secretive Delta Force, earning a reputation as an unusually skilled fighter who bluntly confronted superiors to get what he needed for his men. He is one of the Army's most highly decorated soldiers on active duty.

Bargewell's intimate familiarity with combat -- he was wounded seven times -- gives him credibility as the chief investigator into allegations of some of the worst war crimes committed by the U.S. military in Iraq, according to active-duty and retired Special Forces officers who know him.

"Key to the investigation will be to ask the right questions, and he knows exactly what to ask," said one officer who has served overseas with Bargewell. He, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the record.

His investigation is one of two probes into what happened in Haditha and how commanders reacted. On Nov. 19, 2005, a Marine convoy was hit by a roadside bomb, and in the aftermath, the Marines killed unarmed civilians, including women and children, in their homes. A criminal inquiry by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service is underway. Bargewell's report, submitted to senior commanders in Iraq this month, examines whether Marines tried to cover up the shootings and whether commanders were negligent in failing to investigate the deaths.

The 59-year-old general is seen as unlikely to bend to pressure to sway his conclusions, both by virtue of his character and because he plans to retire this year after nearly four decades in the Army. "He has unimpeachable integrity," said retired Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Lambert, a Special Forces officer who has known Bargewell for decades. "He has no constituency that could influence findings. Bargewell is his own man."

Bargewell is considered so unflinchingly candid that another officer suggested that military leaders "may be sorry they chose him" to lead the probe.

Bargewell grew up in Hoquiam, Wash., where his father was an elementary-school principal, and graduated from Hoquiam High School in 1965. He attended a local college on a football scholarship before suffering a knee injury, according to a newspaper profile that Bargewell provided to The Washington Post.

In 1967, he enlisted in the Army and volunteered for the Special Forces, or Green Berets, an elite force that specializes in working with indigenous fighters.

During two tours in Vietnam, he led a team of three American and six Vietnamese Montagnard soldiers as part of a secret unit conducting strike and surveillance missions in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam and in the demilitarized zone between North and South Vietnam. The unit, MACV Special Operations and Augmentation OP-35, "was considered a highly classified and hidden unit based on our mission area," according to Bargewell, who speaks French and Spanish.

Bargewell saw heavy combat in Vietnam, where he was awarded four Purple Hearts for battle wounds and won the Distinguished Service Cross, which is second among military decorations only to the Medal of Honor.

According to the citation, on Sept. 27, 1971, Bargewell and his team were on a long-range reconnaissance mission deep in enemy territory when they came under attack from 75 to 100 fighters. Bargewell was seriously wounded by a B-40 rocket but managed to fire back a torrent of machine-gun rounds, inflicting enough casualties to twice break enemy assaults that threatened to overrun his small group. His "extraordinary heroism" under fire allowed the team to be extracted, the citation said.

"His judgment in combat was almost supernatural," Lambert said. "He was not only absolutely fearless, he could do everything. He had 20/10 vision. His sniping was off the scale. He had perfect eye-hand coordination."

Bargewell also was known for his toughness, a trait he continued to exhibit after he left the enlisted ranks and was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the 75th Ranger Regiment in 1973. Bargewell stayed primarily with the Rangers until 1981, when as a major he began a 17-year stint with the Special Forces Operational Detachment -- Delta, also known as Delta Force, based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

During training for the U.S. invasion of Panama in 1989, Bargewell badly injured his back in a Black Hawk helicopter crash. But doctors patched him up, and he led a Delta squadron in Operation Just Cause in Panama, conducting dozens of missions, including the rescue of U.S. citizen Kurt Muse from a prison, according to Bargewell and officers who know him. In 1991, he led a Delta task force in northern Iraq during the Persian Gulf War.

In 1998, he took command of Special Operations Forces in Europe, overseeing activities in Kosovo and Bosnia as a brigadier general. At the time of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, he was operations chief for the U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa and later served with NATO. Bargewell took his current post, as operations chief for the U.S. military in Iraq, in April 2005.

Inside the small -- and in the eyes of some, incestuous -- world of Delta Force, Bargewell has enjoyed support from another veteran commander, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, the officers said. Both men are pragmatic, with Schoomaker grasping the big picture and Bargewell excelling at the nuts and bolts of military operations. If Bargewell has a weakness, some said, it is that he can become too tactically focused.

Bargewell, known as fiercely loyal and "so down to earth it hurts," as one officer said, has two sons in the military and plans to retire to Alabama.

Bargewell's fondness for sleek cars -- he owns a Corvette -- contrasts with his introverted personality. "In a roomful of officers at a social, he'd be the one over in the corner with a beer -- even as a two-star general," said one Army acquaintance. "But the rewards of drawing him out are great."

Baghdad On The Bayou (WT)

By David Axe

FORT POLK, La. -- A combat readiness training center at this remote base in Louisiana once prepared U.S. soldiers for infantry gunbattle with Soviet forces. These days, the focus of the training is fighting insurgents in crowded Iraqi villages with cultural sensitivity and limiting civilian casualties.

A cluster of fabricated neighborhoods represents Iraq's chaotic urban battlefield. Combat brigades numbering as many as 5,000 soldiers spend three weeks living and fighting there.

Aggressive paratroopers trained in insurgent tactics prowl the swamps. Actors and local residents wearing Middle Eastern-style clothing stand in for Iraqi civilians. Iraqi expatriates play the roles of tribal leaders and town mayors. Combatants and civilians alike wear vests that detect lasers beamed by modified weapons that fire noisy blanks. Pyrotechnics specialists add smoke and explosions to simulate improvised explosive devices. Combat veteran "observer-controllers" referee clashes among trainees, "insurgents" and restive civilians.

Soldiers have complained that training at Fort Polk's Joint Readiness Training Center is harder than combat in Iraq. Center commander Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero says that is the point.

"We want their worst day to be at Fort Polk and not in Baghdad."

With the spread of small wars and insurgencies like those in Iraq and Afghanistan, Fort Polk has shifted gears from the Cold War-era battle readiness. Now winning hearts and minds is as important as winning firefights.

"We could go over there in theater and kill every bad guy, but that doesn't mean we will be successful," said Maj. Eric Baus, center spokesman. Like in Iraq, he added, success for trainees at Fort Polk means convincing the populace to point out insurgents and make them unwelcome in their villages.

But winning over civilians is hard when insurgents blend in, strike on crowded streets and draw U.S. fire that kills innocents.

During a June 5 exercise, soldiers from the Texas-based 1st Cavalry Division, slated to deploy to Iraq in a few weeks, patrolled a street in a simulated village. Actors portraying Iraqi vendors gathered around the Humvees and trucks. Then a bomb exploded, rockets streaked in from the countryside and insurgents attacked with small arms. Civilians screamed and scattered; some fell to the ground writhing from imaginary wounds. One actor, an amputee, was wearing gory makeup to replicate massive trauma.

U.S. troops returned fire, gathered up some of the wounded and raced away, leaving some casualties untreated.

Observer-controllers at the exercise said that despite the civilian casualties and their failure to evacuate all the wounded, the unit's effort was stellar. It was enough that the Capt. Robert Nevins, the unit commander, maintained control of his troops in a chaotic situation.

However, leaving injured civilians behind makes Capt. Nevins and his troops unpopular with the locals. To head off an uprising, the next day Capt. Nevins meets with a Kurdish-born American portraying a tribal sheik.

These meetings are hosted at Fort Polk's new "Engagement University," a series of rooms decorated to look like Iraqi homes and monitored by closed-circuit TV cameras. Specialists in Iraqi culture take notes as Capt. Nevins and other commanders work out problems caused by failures in past exercises.

Capt. Nevins' Iraqi counterpart is skeptical despite the commander's apologies. The sheik brings up the purported massacre in Haditha -- where Marines are accused of killing two dozen innocent Iraqis in November -- and puts Capt. Nevins on the defensive.

"We try to make our scenarios as relevant as possible," explains Lt. Col. Dennis Smith, director of Engagement University.

Eight Afghans Killed On Way To Work At U.S. Air Base (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

DOJ_NMG_0034713

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 15 — A bomb exploded on a bus taking workers to the United States military air base at Kandahar in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing 8 people and wounding at least 16 others, among them 4 children, officials said.

Kandahar, the spiritual home of the Taliban, has been the scene of frequent suicide bomb attacks and roadside explosions in recent months, but this bomb was the first specifically directed at civilians working at the base.

The explosion occurred as the bus was leaving the city at 7.30 a.m. The men on the bus were mostly laborers and wore their identity badges, a duty officer at the hospital said. The driver was also killed, said Daoud Ahmadi, a spokesman for the provincial governor.

Children and other civilians standing outside shops lining the road were also caught in the blast.

"These innocent workers were the breadwinners of the poorest families and they were on their way to work," President Hamid Karzai said in a statement from China, where he is attending a meeting of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a regional security group of Russia, China and Central Asian nations. "The enemies of Afghanistan deliberately targeted innocent civilians," he said.

"We don't know if it was a remote-controlled bomb or a time bomb, but it was placed inside the minibus," Mr. Ahmadi said. Two cars were also caught in the blast, he said.

He said he believed that none of the passengers had known about the bomb. "This is the action of the Taliban and terrorists," he said. "The terrorists are usually targeting civilian people, and they get rewarded for killing innocent people."

The final toll was 8 dead and 16 wounded, several of them seriously, said Azizullah, the registrar at the Kandahar city hospital. Among the wounded were four children, aged 8, 9, 15 and 16, he said.

NATO troops are taking over military command of southern Afghanistan from American forces and Taliban insurgents appear intent on disrupting the transfer.

With increased insurgent activity, the American-led coalition has started a major effort, involving 11,000 troops, intended to drive insurgents from their sanctuaries. It also seeks to extend reconstruction and government services into remote areas of southern Afghanistan largely left to bandits, drug lords and Taliban supporters for the last four years.

Why The Taliban Appeal To Pakistani Youth (CSM)

By David Montero

Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

PESHAWAR, PAKISTAN

Imran Gul would like to see a better future for the tribal youth of his corner of Pakistan, but most days he only sees military helicopters returning from Waziristan, ferrying wounded and dead. Casualties in the conflicts along the Afghan border serve as a reminder that the tribal system, once strong and proud, is now falling apart.

History and war have slowly eaten away its edifice, and Mr. Gul worries that what the tribal system can no longer provide young people - peace, income, a sense of purpose, a social network - a new and rising force can: the Taliban.

"Due to poverty, young people have no activities," says Gul, program director of the Sustainable Participation Development Program, a nongovernmental organization in Banu, just outside North Waziristan. "They do not want to join the Taliban. But their sympathies are with the Taliban to bring peace to our area."

The field for such sympathies is wide and growing, many say. The Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) have always been the least advanced lands in Pakistan. Illiteracy and joblessness are rampant. There are no universities in FATA, and political parties are absent due to colonial-era tribal laws, robbing youth of an outlet for talent and expression.

The tribal system itself is partly to blame. Many elders have traditionally resisted modern education, roads, and electricity, fearing their power would be threatened the more FATA opened up. But the government is also at fault, observers say, by failing to integrate FATA into Pakistan. Voting rights were extended to the full tribal populace only in 2000.

"Young people ... oppose the current tribal system because they know that this is not ... harnessing their potential," says Naveed Ahmad Shinwari, chief executive of the Community Appraisal & Motivation Program, which works on development in the tribal zone. "If you ask any young man, he's frustrated because the government of Pakistan is clearly not doing much to create employment for young people." Military incursion further eroded old system

These problems were exacerbated when the Pakistani military entered the tribal areas for the first time in 2003. Their operations, which many tribes believe is the dirty work of Washington, have further weakened the system while sowing sympathies for extremism. In such situations, analysts say, people look to the standard-bearers of Islam for guidance and solace.

Tariq Aziz, a 17-year-old from Mir Ali in North Waziristan, sees the Taliban as a viable solution for future generations. "There are no opportunities for young people," he says by telephone from Banu. "The people of Mir Ali have sympathies for the Taliban. They fight for Islam."

Mr. Aziz says he might like to join the Taliban himself, but that his parents prefer him to continue his studies.

Like many his age, Aziz is trapped between the present danger of conflict and the elusive dream of a better life. Only hours after he hung up the phone, two suicide bombers struck a military convoy just outside Banu, killing four soldiers and wounding seven. It is to the Taliban that he looks for peace. "Under the Taliban government, there was peace in Afghanistan and no crimes occurred in the government."

In such strife, pragmatism draws young people to the Taliban. They are building a new form of social capital, a network that offers the opportunities and prestige that the tribal system once did.

"Where do they go for problem solutions? Their [members of the National Assembly] are marginalized pieces of the political system. The [tribal elders] are not recognized. The cost of living has gone up," says Khalid Aziz, chair of the Regional Institute of Policy Research & Training, a think tank in Peshawar. "[The Taliban] make life livable. They have a bureaucracy, soldiers." Slim opportunities, but education a way out

Such prospects are an oasis in a desert of grim statistics, Mr. Aziz says. "Twenty five percent of an ordinary man's income [in FATA] is spent on medical expenses, aggravated by bad delivery of basic services. Sixty percent of the incomes come from migrant workers. Eighty-five percent are working on land. Seventy percent are working on rented land. The only asset left for a frontiersman is to get a job. If I were in that area, I would definitely go Taliban."

Alternatives seem in short supply, but a few find another way of life in education. One of them is now a student at Peshawar University. He is afraid to be named because his family in Miran Shah, North Waziristan, was recently the victim of violence. Like others his age, he feels the tribal system cannot adequately prepare his generation to interact with the modern world, and hopes that education can repair the cracks left by the tribal system.

"Today people in Waziristan are interested in coming to university. Our young generation is interested in business," he says, adding that the best solution is to integrate the tribal areas with the rest of Pakistan.

It's a dream shared by many, and perhaps the best way to dampen the appeal of groups like the Taliban, analysts say. Optimists hope the way will be paved by education programs and development projects in the short term, and the introduction of political parties in the longer term. The latter, they say, are one of the few immediate prospects for confronting the growing power of the mullahs and the Taliban they support.

Perhaps the greatest question for youth to ponder is how modern they want to be.

Akmal Sayal, the 16-year-old son of a tribal elder from Mohmand Agency, intends someday to lead his tribe of 200,000, but for now he's concentrating on learning computer science. "I hope to go back to the tribal area and teach computers," he says. "The solution must be education."

But he is careful to underscore the delicate business of embracing modernity. "I've got my [studies], but I don't want that this cap can't be used," he says, pointing to the traditional skullcap worn by Muslims.

Weapons Permit In Military-Spending Boom, Expensive Pet Projects Prevail (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Last year, in an effort to save money, the Navy secretary proposed building a new $3 billion destroyer in just one shipyard rather than at facilities in both Mississippi and Maine. He estimated the move could cut $300 million from the cost of each ship.

Congressional reaction was swift. Senators from the two states stalled the official's promotion to deputy defense secretary. One Maine senator used her seat on the Armed Services Committee to help push through legislation that blocked the idea.

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks changed American military priorities, the U.S. defense machine is still churning out weapons made for old-style, conventional conflicts, even as it needs new tools to battle terrorists and insurgents. One big reason is the sclerotic nature of the procurement process, in which the military, the White House, the defense industry and Congress fight for pet projects that aren't always in synch with strategic priorities. In the case of the destroyers, the senators maintained a weapon whose origins dated to the last decade for the sake of jobs.

Overall, the Pentagon's recent spending has largely reinforced the status quo. Weapons spending has swelled faster than the overall Pentagon budget, soaring 43% since in the past five years to $147 billion, with the vast majority of funding going to programs conceived before 9/11. The estimated lifetime cost of the Pentagon's five biggest weapons systems is $550 billion, 89% more than the top-five programs were projected to cost in 2001.

That has been a blessing for Lockheed Martin Corp. and its fighter planes; Northrop Grumman Corp. and General Dynamics Corp., which make big warships; and Boeing Co., the lead contractor for a missile-defense shield that dates back to Ronald Reagan. Major defense stocks hit historic highs this year and the industry has outperformed the market since 2001.

But it has done little to change the military. The spike in Pentagon spending doesn't reflect a move to develop "a whole bunch of new systems because the world is changing," says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington, D.C. Instead, the military is "buying pretty much the same things as before... They just cost more."

Military budgets have long been shaped by pork and pet projects. The Clinton administration faced similar issues as it tried to adapt a Cold War military to a new era. The problem is particularly acute right now because of the huge increase in defense spending and the Pentagon's new strategic shift to fight terrorism.

The defense industry was on pins and needles when George W. Bush became president. Declining spending in the 1990s had hurt its profits, and the incoming administration seemed intent on cutting big weapons programs geared toward Cold War threats. In particular, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld vowed to transform the military into a smaller, nimbler force.

Since then, Mr. Rumsfeld has managed to scrap just three big military weapons programs out of dozens. Even as Pentagon strategists make a case for training soldiers to fight counterinsurgencies and terrorism, an expensive proposition, funding priorities haven't shifted substantially. Thanks to the entrenched nature of the military procurement process, big weapons systems survive despite skepticism of their relevance and cost.

At the pinnacle of the system is the White House, which has long been able to advance favored projects, such as the missile-defense shield. The decades-old concept involves an array of weapons designed to destroy incoming enemy warheads. In his first federal budget, Mr. Bush accelerated the shield project, which is seen these days as a deterrent to countries such as North Korea, proposing to nearly double annual spending to some $8.3 billion.

Days before the Sept. 11 attacks, senators challenged the increase at a hearing dominated by concern over government finances. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California asked Mr. Rumsfeld why missile defense should be a higher priority than guarding against terrorist attacks. He agreed they were "the more likely threats in the period ahead," but said such dangers ranged from terrorism to missiles fired by rogue states. The Senate slashed the funding increase.

The attacks of 9/11, rather than reinforcing a shift in priorities, obliterated opposition to the president. Congress ended up approving $7.8 billion for missile defense, almost as much as Mr. Bush sought. The next year, as war against Iraq loomed, Congress gave Mr. Bush more missile-defense money than he had requested.

"Missile defense has maintained momentum because of the president's political commitment to it and conservative ideological support, rather than its relevance to our current defense needs," says Loren Thompson, a critic of the current defense secretary, who runs the Lexington Institute think tank in Arlington, Va., and consults for defense companies.

With funding between $7.4 billion and $9 billion a year since fiscal 2002, missile defense has been a boon to industry. Boeing oversees the main ground-based missile system in Alaska and California and the development of a laser gun to be carried aboard a modified 747 airliner. Lockheed, Northrop and Raytheon are prime contractors for other related programs.

Despite Mr. Bush's goal of making the system operational by 2004, the shield still isn't permanently up and running. And despite consuming a hefty chunk of the Pentagon's total R&D budget, it isn't equipped, however, to deal with a rising post-9/11 concern: cruise missiles.

Since last September, the program has notched some successful flight tests, the Pentagon says. Congress is poised to give Mr. Bush most, if not all, of his latest budget request: $9.3 billion for fiscal 2007.

The military's muscle in protecting programs has also been evident in recent years. All the services want to replenish aged or depleted arsenals, a need that even the Pentagon's civilian leadership concedes. "Clearly there is a recapitalization problem," says Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's top acquisition official. "If I look at what keeps me awake at night, obviously [it is] the average age of the fleet."

That argument has helped the Air Force, the biggest recipient of procurement dollars, maneuver aggressively to protect some of its glamorous fighter jets against attacks on their relevance. In 2001, the average age of the F-15, the nation's top air-superiority warplane, was 17 years, three shy of its expected service life.

The Air Force's priority is now the F-22, made by Lockheed, which was designed to replace the F-15 as the service's top combat plane. The service said it needed 381 of the super-fast, radar-evading fighters, despite their high costs and development snags, to deal with the growing military sophistication of countries such as China and India. Critics questioned their usefulness, arguing that even these incipient world powers don't pose a credible threat to U.S. air power. In 1999, the Air Force beat back California Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis's attempt to kill the program by organizing support from all three service branches.

Under Scrutiny

In Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon, fighter jets came under scrutiny as the military lobbied for spending on more immediate priorities, such as ground vehicles and helicopters in Iraq and Afghanistan. Army generals who craved a bigger share of the weapons pie, also questioned the value of short-range fighters, even in a potential conventional conflict with China.

"I'm not really sure how the F-22 fits into either scenario," adds Ivan Eland, a military analyst at the Independent Institute, a research group based in Oakland, Calif.

In response, the Air Force joined forces with Lockheed to make the F-22s more versatile, which also made it more costly. It explored a bomber version and added ground-scanning radar to give the plane a reconnaissance role. By making them adaptable, "we can multiply their value," says Robert Stevens, Lockheed's chairman and chief executive, in an interview last year.

The Air Force even began horse-trading with its own programs to save the F-22, which currently cost $133 million apiece, excluding development costs. For example, Air Force officers offered to forgo hundreds of Joint Strike Fighters -- a $276 billion program to replace Air Force, Navy and Marine plane models with a common airframe.

Although it appeared to lose the fight when the Pentagon, in late 2004, slashed the proposed F-22 fleet to 179 planes, and ordered production to end in 2008, the Air Force didn't surrender. It argued that closing the F-22 line before starting full production of the Joint Strike Fighter would harm national security. Now, the Pentagon's plan is to buy 183 F-22s and extend production to 2010. Those extra two years leave the F-22's fate to the next administration.

As a result of this increased spending, defense contractors are booming. Sales at the top five contractors -- Lockheed, Boeing, Northrop, General Dynamics and Raytheon Co. -- have grown 10% a year since 2001, excluding acquisitions, according to Joseph Nadol, an industry analyst at J.P. Morgan. Last year, the big five's operating profits rose 25% compared with 2004, to $12.94 billion. The companies generated so much cash they spent $4.26 billion buying back their appreciating stock.

Battle Over Planes

Their clout in the procurement process can be seen through a battle over cargo planes that the Pentagon wants to stop building. The fight shows the defense companies at their most muscular: spending heavily on lobbyists and sprinkling political donations strategically across the congressional map.

In early 2005, Lockheed moved with lightning speed in to reverse a Pentagon proposal to accelerate the demise of the C-130 aircraft, which has been made in Marietta, Ga., since 1954. As word of the move leaked, Lockheed officials coordinated with Georgia's two Republican senators, who enlisted 22 colleagues from both parties to sign a letter of complaint to President Bush. Lockheed spokesmen steered reporters to Sen. Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, a blunt-talking member of the Armed Services Committee who was publicly leading efforts to save the program.

Days after the Pentagon announced the move, Mr. Rumsfeld began backtracking. His stated reason: "new information" that the cost of terminating the contract could exceed the related savings. Three months later, he reinstated the C-130 program. In a written statement, Lockheed pronounced itself "pleased" with the result.

Boeing is in the midst of a similar scramble to stretch the life of its C-17, a mammoth jet that has proven valuable in hauling everything from armored vehicles to relief supplies. Faced with budget pressures, the Pentagon recently moved to begin shutting down the C-17 production line in Long Beach, Calif.

Boeing flooded Capitol Hill with lobbyists and subcontractors. In May, Congress authorized fresh C-17 purchases and the Air Force said it needed eight additional planes. Boeing is shooting for even more.

"We're working that very, very hard," Boeing defense chief Jim Albaugh said at a recent investor conference, referring to extending the programs like the C-17.

On Capitol Hill, new strategic imperatives are often trumped by the realities of daily politics. Congress rarely makes tough weapons choices when jobs are at stake, as the battle over the DDG-1000, a next-generation Navy destroyer, attests.

Formerly known as the DD(X), the destroyer was conceived in the 1990s as a relatively inexpensive, largely automated warship, costing $750 million. The price has since ballooned to $3 billion a ship, three times the cost of current destroyers. In a move to make the destroyer more relevant to post-9/11 threats, the Navy stuffed it with additional features such as more-powerful guns, quieter technology; and advanced radar. The warship is so expensive it threatens the Navy's plan to upgrade its fleet.

"Usually when you are building a new ship class, you put two or three new technologies into the ship class, and we have put nine or 10" in the DDG-1000, says Rear Adm. Barry McCullough, the Navy's director of surface warfare.

When then-Navy Secretary Gordon England made his move to trim costs by building the ship in just one shipyard -- either Northrop's facility in Mississippi or the General Dynamics yard in Maine -- he ran into the buzz saw set up by senators from the two states, including Trent Lott, the powerful Mississippi senator.

After preserving the two-shipyard approach, Maine's Sen. Olympia Snowe toured her state's Bath Iron Works with Mr. England's successor as Navy secretary and declared, "We're all in synch."

Not quite. Due to cost increases, the Navy now foresees building just seven DDG-1000s, compared with the original plan for 32. The House, concerned about cost and the destroyer's complex technology, wants to build just two of the ships.

The House recently approved $2.6 billion in fiscal 2007 to begin building the first one -- in Mississippi. Maine's other senator, Susan Collins, said the House bill would "be devastating to the skilled work force" at Bath Iron Works. Next, the Senate authorized $3.4 billion to build the first two destroyers -- including one in Maine. Lawmakers will have to negotiate to resolve the clash.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senators Grill Fannie Mae Chief (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath And Annys Shin

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud.

Mudd was chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses.

"I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Mudd at a hearing of the Senate Banking Committee. "Have you thought about resigning?"

Mudd, who was promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like "the old Fannie Mae" any more than Hagel did and was "as shocked as anyone" when Fannie's accounting problems came to light.

Mudd said he thought about leaving but is "not a quitter" and stayed to fix Fannie's problems.

Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision.

Yesterday's hearing was held to review a report by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which detailed widespread accounting violations and described an executive culture fixated on hitting bonus targets.

OFHEO Director James B. Lockhart III, who also was confirmed in his job by the Senate yesterday, said during a break in the hearing that as far as his agency was concerned, whether Mudd should keep his job remained an open question.

In a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission and OFHEO, Fannie recently agreed to pay penalties of $400 million. The SEC and the Justice Department still are investigating the conduct of individual executives.

Raines and outgoing audit committee Chairman Thomas P. Gerrity declined invitations to testify yesterday.

Board Chairman Stephen B. Ashley, a director of the company since 1995, also faced sharp questioning.

"I think you failed, the entire board failed. . . . Now, can you sit there and tell this committee that you knew nothing about what was going on?" Hagel asked.

Ashley replied that he felt "deep disappointment and anger" that the trust the board placed in Fannie Mae's management was "not just broken but shattered."

Some committee members said the regulators' findings showed why the full Senate should take up long-stalled legislation to strengthen oversight of Fannie and its competitor Freddie Mac, which were chartered by the government to provide a steady flow of funds for home mortgages. But other committee members said the Senate should avoid overreacting and possibly harming the companies.

In prepared testimony yesterday, Mudd said the days "of arrogant, defiant, 'my way' Fannie Mae had to end." He said the company supported creation of a strong new regulator and would work with lawmakers.

Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.), chairman of the Banking Committee, said he saw no sign of that.

"When are you going to start?" Shelby asked. "We haven't seen any evidence of any changes in tone that you talked about."

Legislation to strengthen oversight of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac has been stalled on Capitol Hill since last summer. Lawmakers are at loggerheads over a provision that would empower regulators to reduce the companies' investment holdings. Those mortgage-related investments have grown enormously over the past decade, becoming a major source of profit while making the companies more vulnerable to interest-rate fluctuations.

Executives for Fannie and Freddie have defended the investment portfolios, calling them essential to fulfilling the companies' mission to keep money flowing into the housing market.

The new OFHEO director yesterday provided fodder for the companies' critics, agreeing that the investments do not affect mortgage interest rates or the availability of conventional mortgages.

Republicans Push Fannie To Accept Operating Limits (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Senate Republicans prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit.

Pressuring the company to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges.

But Democrats on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing.

Fannie and Freddie are shareholder-owned companies chartered by Congress to provide funding for home mortgages. In the wake of accounting scandals at both companies, Congress is debating legislation to tighten regulation of them. The biggest issue is whether to go along with White House-backed provisions that would essentially remove Fannie and Freddie from the lucrative business of investing in mortgage securities. That would force them to focus almost entirely on their smaller business of providing guarantees on such securities held by others.

The Bush administration says the companies' mortgage portfolios are so large that stumbles by either Fannie or Freddie could set off a financial crisis. But Democrats and many Republicans in Congress support the position of Fannie and Freddie that the mortgage holdings make more money available for mortgages.

"We should never advocate destroying critical U.S. enterprises because of management failures," Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) said at the hearing.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), grilled Fannie's chief executive officer, Daniel Mudd, who testified at the hearing about the company's efforts to clean up its books and culture. Sen. Shelby noted that Mr. Mudd had promised to help Congress craft legislation. "When are you going to start," Sen. Shelby said, "because I've seen no evidence of that."

Republicans have long accused Fannie and Freddie of lobbying heavily to block legislation they dislike. Mr. Mudd promised to address any lapses in the company's dealings with Congress.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) asked how Mr. Mudd, who was Fannie's chief operating officer during the first half of this decade, could have been unaware of pervasive accounting violations. Mr. Mudd said he was aware of problems with the company's culture, but wasn't responsible for accounting at that time and didn't know rules were being broken.

Sen. Hagel said in an interview after the hearing that Mr. Mudd "should seriously consider resigning," and added: "I'm not sure the whole board shouldn't go." During the hearing, Mr. Mudd said he had thought about resigning but decided to stay and fix the company's problems. "I'm not a quitter," he said.

Both Sen. Shelby and Sen. Hagel said after the hearing that current and former executives such as Mr. Mudd, who received bonuses inflated by earnings manipulation, should return them. "That's the decent thing to do," Sen. Hagel said. Fannie has said its board is determining what to do about those bonuses.

After The Enron Trial, Defense Firm Is Stuck With The Tab (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

To the list of employees, investors and businesses who suffered financial misfortune in Enron Corp.'s demise, add this one: the law firm defending former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Los Angeles-based O'Melveny & Myers LLP, which has represented Skilling on both civil and criminal charges since 2001, collected what in a typical case would be a fat payday: $23 million from its client and $17 million more from his insurance policies.

But, true to form, Enron is still destroying financial expectations. Even before the trial began in January, Skilling's team of more than 20 lawyers, paralegals and support staff burned through those funds, leaving the law firm holding the bag for "multiple tens of millions" of dollars in unpaid fees and expenses racked up during the four-month trial, Skilling's lead defense lawyer said. While Daniel M. Petrocelli declined to provide an exact tally, one source put the price tag at more than $25 million on top of the $40 million O'Melveny already collected.

The trial, which culminated in the convictions of Skilling and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay last month, featured 56 witnesses and some of the most sophisticated business deals ever to make their way into a courtroom. The Skilling defense, which experts say may be one of the most expensive in history, is a case study in how high the stakes can rise in white-collar criminal representation.

"This is almost a carte blanche to the lawyers: Do everything you can to keep me out of jail," said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control Inc., a New Jersey firm that monitors legal fees in bankruptcies and for Fortune 500 clients. "Very little thought is given to cost. It is not a concern."

In the beginning, O'Melveny did not have to worry about how its high-profile client would pay his bills. Skilling exited the Houston energy trader in August 2001, with enough time to sell more than half of his remaining Enron stock before the company hit bottom and filed for bankruptcy protection that December. But, on the heels of his 2004 indictment, prosecutors put a hold on nearly $60 million in cash, brokerage accounts and other assets, including a $5 million Mediterranean-style Houston mansion and a $350,000 condominium in Dallas that Skilling bought to use when he visited his daughter, then a student at Southern Methodist University. Meanwhile, a settlement by board members depleted the company's insurance policies, closing off that avenue of recovery for lawyers hired by Skilling and Lay.

Within weeks, the government is expected to start legal proceedings to transfer Skilling's assets to its coffers, from which proceeds might be distributed to shareholders and other victims of Enron's collapse -- setting up a fight over the money.

Lay and Skilling's "accumulated money was gained at our expense," said Rod Jordan, chairman of a group of former Enron employees. The assets "should first be used to return money lost by the employees and only then be used for their defense," he said.

Defense lawyers said they will urge U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III to release most of it to Skilling because jurors acquitted him on nine of 10 insider-trading charges. The defense argued in court papers filed this week that "only a very small portion" of the frozen assets is subject to forfeiture under the government's initial analysis.

"Jeff's not trying to get rich off anything," his lawyer Petrocelli said in an interview. "He's got child-support obligations, legal obligations from the sentencing and the appeal, and hundreds of civil lawsuits to defend. . . . He wants to take care of his family and his lawyers."

Justice Department prosecutors on Wednesday reiterated their desire to seek Skilling's assets and said they would file a motion for a money judgment against Skilling by the end of June. Despite his acquittal on most of the insider-trading counts, prosecutors said, the jury convicted Skilling of 19 other charges, including engaging in a conspiracy to prop up Enron's stock price and enrich himself. To win a forfeiture action, prosecutors must prove by a preponderance of evidence that assets are proceeds of the conspiracy.

The single biggest expense in any trial, according to legal experts, is personnel.

"The biggest trial team is a bit like an iceberg," said John Toothman, president of the Devil's Advocate, a Great Falls legal fee review firm. "You have some people at the table, and you have some people in the pews."

Toothman said he asks clients a central question: "Do we really need all this?"

To O'Melveny, faced with millions of documents and other evidence amassed by the government during its five-year investigation and a potential decades-long prison sentence for client Skilling should he be convicted, the answer was a resounding yes.

O'Melveny enlisted five partners, led by Petrocelli, who now bills at $850 per hour but who said that for the Skilling defense, as an "accommodation," he and others capped their rates at the 2004 level -- in his case, closer to $800 an hour. M. Randall Oppenheimer, who leads the firm's entertainment division and who has won major cases for Exxon Mobil Corp., and Mark Holscher, a onetime federal prosecutor who has a bustling white-collar defense practice with such clients as former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, also logged hundreds of hours at similar rates.

On top of that, the team included more than a dozen associates and other counsel: junior lawyers who reviewed documents, scoured databases and investigated witnesses, uncovering e-mails Petrocelli used to impeach government cooperators in aggressive cross-examination. Those younger lawyers billed $200 to $500 per hour, depending upon their level of experience. Some worked "around the clock," Petrocelli said, noting that the partners at times had to order them to sleep. For five months, several partners, none of whom came from Houston, stayed at the Four Seasons Hotel, where they got a special rate on accommodations. Many junior lawyers resided at the Post Rice Lofts, a historic downtown apartment building close to the courthouse and their makeshift trial offices.

To sift through documents from Enron's Internet and retail energy units, the firm hired an outside supplier and purchased 20 computer servers. The firm also employed graphics and projection specialists, as well as a jury consultant and a team of expert witnesses to handle insider-trading and stock-market issues, and accounting and other matters.

Former Securities and Exchange Commission accountant Walter K. Rush testified that he spent 954 hours on the case as an expert witness, at a rate of $600 per hour. University of Chicago law professor Daniel R. Fischel, a specialist in corporations and stock markets, charges $1,000 per hour. The defense decided not to call him to the witness stand as the case dragged on, but he was paid for the hours he logged learning the case, Petrocelli said.

A.B. Culvahouse Jr., a former counsel to President Ronald Reagan and chairman of O'Melveny, said the Skilling case was "an investment we made and were prepared to make."

"There wasn't a lot of second-guessing" among the firm's policy committee, of which Petrocelli is a member, Culvahouse said. "We felt an obligation to our client. . . . .It was the right thing to do for our client and the smart thing to do for our firm."

Culvahouse said any negative financial impact has been spread across the firm, which he said reported profit per partner of $1.65 million last year, $340,000 more than a year before. He said lawyers in other parts of the firm, made up of more than 1,000 lawyers and 240 partners, did not rise up in anger over the mounting costs of the Enron trial, though there were some piercing questions. Most painful was probably the missed opportunities to make money on other clients while some of the firm's best trial lawyers were tied up for months on Enron.

It is not unusual for law firms to discount fees from well-known clients, experts said.

Many law firms build uncollectible debts into their financial projections. Ward Bower, a principal at the Newtown Square, Pa., consulting firm Altman Weil Inc., said law firms typically shave their bills by 10 percent before they send them to clients. Most firms recognize that they will not collect all of their fees, and they pay taxes on the money they actually receive from clients, not on what they bill. That means unpaid legal fees are probably not tax-deductible, but expenses are, Bower said.

The difference in the Skilling case appears to be one of scale. The most recent Altman Weil survey suggests that law firms often eat about 22 percent of their costs -- far less than what O'Melveny may have to absorb.

Other law firms have made similar decisions in recent months, according to Joel F. Henning, head of the Chicago office of legal consulting firm Hildebrandt International.

The Chicago law firm Winston & Strawn LLP recently comped former Illinois governor George H. Ryan for his defense on corruption charges, estimated by the Chicago Sun-Times at more than $10 million. The defense effort, led by Dan K. Webb, a former U.S. attorney who has represented Philip Morris, the New York Stock Exchange and Microsoft Corp., ended in conviction on all 18 counts against Ryan after an intense six-month trial. Ryan's supporters contributed to a legal defense fund that topped $475,000, the paper said.

For O'Melveny, the work is not yet done. Several members of the trial team, with help from Washington-based former acting solicitor general and O'Melveny partner Walter Dellinger, now are gearing up for an appeal.

"We've just got to keep fighting a good fight," said Petrocelli.

Former HealthSouth Official Receives Eight-Year Sentence (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. -- The only HealthSouth Corp. executive convicted by jurors in a $2.7 billion fraud was sentenced to eight years in federal prison Thursday, the longest term given to anyone in the huge accounting scam at the rehabilitation chain.

Hannibal "Sonny" Crumpler, a former vice president and division controller, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Virginia Emerson Hopkins after the defense urged her to impose probation or a combination of house arrest and parole. Mr. Crumpler's attorneys said they may appeal.

Prosecutors sought a far tougher penalty, asking the judge to send Mr. Crumpler to prison for 15 years on his conviction on charges of conspiracy and making false statements to auditors. They described the sentence as too lenient.

Fifteen former HealthSouth executives avoided trial by pleading guilty in plea deals, and fired Chief Executive Richard Scrushy was acquitted on all charges a year ago after a six-month trial. Mr. Crumpler also opted for a trial but was convicted in November.

Prosecutors argued that Mr. Crumpler was in on the fraud while at HealthSouth and maintained a role even after he became finance chief at a related company, Source Medical Solutions. While at Source Medical, Mr. Crumpler sent HealthSouth auditors a letter overstating Source Medical's debt to HealthSouth by $20 million, prosecutors said.

During a sentencing hearing, defense lawyer Jim Henry argued that Mr. Crumpler had a limited role in the fraud and wasn't responsible for anything close to the $7 billion loss the government claimed stockholders and bondholders suffered when the scam was exposed. Mr. Crumpler couldn't foresee that the fraud would push HealthSouth to the edge of bankruptcy, Mr. Henry said.

But Judge Hopkins challenged Mr. Henry's arguments, citing testimony from former finance chief Weston Smith that Mr. Crumpler attended meetings where the fraud was planned and carried out. "Why should I accept your argument?" she asked Mr. Henry.

The stiffest sentence yet for the HealthSouth fraud was the five-year prison term for former finance chief Bill Owens, who pleaded guilty to a leading role in the scheme and spent days testifying against Mr. Scrushy. Others who pleaded guilty have received shorter prison terms or a combination of house arrest, probation, fines and financial forfeitures.

Separately, a federal jury began deliberations in the government corruption trial of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, accused of bribery in a wide-ranging case that alleges illegal donations from Mr. Scrushy.

"Here's what you ought to remember about this case. It's that if you don't donate, you don't participate," chief prosecutor Louis Franklin said in closing arguments yesterday. "You've got to be Richard Scrushy to get to see the governor."

But defense attorneys said the government's case was based on testimony from witnesses who shouldn't be trusted by jurors.

Fred D. Gray, a lawyer for Mr. Scrushy, also quoted Martin Luther King Jr. and the Bible, asking jurors to "render a verdict you will be able to live with -- not guilty on all charges. When you do that, justice will run down like water and righteousness."

Mr. Scrushy is accused of arranging for $500,000 in donations to be made -- and not publicly reported as required -- to Mr. Siegelman's campaign for a state lottery, with Mr. Siegelman promising Mr. Scrushy a seat on a state hospital regulatory board.

Medarex Receives Subpoena Over Stock Options Grants; Shareholders File Suit

PRINCETON, N.J. (AP) -- Biotech company Medarex Inc. said Thursday it recently received a a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey over the timing of its stock options grants.

The company has already received a letter of informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over the matter. Medarex said it is cooperating fully with both investigations.

In addition, Medarex said two shareholder derivative lawsuits have been filed in New Jersey, naming the company and certain current and former directors and officers as defendants. Medarex said the lawsuits allege breach of fiduciary duty associated with its stock options grants practices, as well as federal securities laws violations. The lawsuits seek unspecified damages.

More than 40 companies are under SEC or Justice Department investigations looking into whether executives backdated stock options grants. This increases the value of the stock options by timing them at low points, boosting the payout.

Shares slipped 21 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $9.60 in after-hours trading, having earlier closed up 52 cents, or 5.6 percent, at $9.81 on the Nasdaq. The stock has ranged between $7.14 and $16.07 over the past year.

EMI Settles Pay-for-play Probe For $3.75 Million (AP)

By Michael Gormley, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, New York-EMI Music North America, the third largest recording label in the world, has settled for $3.75 million (â‚¬2.97 million) a pay-for-play investigation into radio air time sold or traded to benefit artists including the Rolling Stones, Coldplay and Norah Jones.

The settlement was the latest during more than two years of a "payola" investigation by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"When a record label engages in an elaborate scheme to purchase air time for its artists, it violates state and federal law and presents consumers with a skewed picture of the country's proclaimed `best' and `most popular' music," Spitzer said.

He said payola - a term coined during a 1950s scandal combining the words pay and Victrola, an early record player - also hurts struggling artists who are not judged on the merits of their music.

Spitzer said the compensation for radio airplay was paid by EMI, which includes Virgin Records America, Capitol Records, EMI Christian Music Group and S Curve Records. One deal included tickets to a Rolling Stones concert in Toronto that were given to a radio program director for his personal use.

The radio executive in Watertown, New York, was willing to offer "what it takes for us to get them," according to Spitzer's investigation. In exchange for the tickets, Virgin Records received airplay for the Rolling Stones and The Exies.

EMI is agreeing to reform its practices and to pay the settlement money to nonprofit music education groups in New York, to be distributed through the Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors.

"EMI is pleased to have resolved these radio promotion matters with the New York State Attorney General with this agreement," the company said in a statement. "In addition to voluntarily adopting strict policies last year, we have been working cooperatively with the attorney general to reinforce these policies."

In May, Universal Music Group Recordings Inc., the world's largest record company, agreed to pay $12 million (â,¬9.52 million) to settle a payola case that claimed the company provided vacations, electronics and other bribes to increase radio play for their artists. Those bribes and gifts were used to gain airplay for songs by Nick Lachey, Ashlee Simpson, Brian McKnight, Big Tymers, and Lindsay Lohan, Spitzer said.

Spitzer launched a U.S.-wide investigation into alleged wrongdoing by music and radio companies in 2004 . Earlier this year, Spitzer sued Entercom Communications Corp., accusing its executives of running scams to trade cash for airplay.

Entercom has denied the allegations.

Sony's music arm has agreed to pay $10 million (â,¬7.93 million) to settle with Spitzer, and Warner Music agreed to a $5 million (â,¬3.97 million) settlement.

Sarbanes-Oxley Gives Accountants Fees Bonanza (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Accountancy firms have emerged as surprise long-lasting beneficiaries of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, as US-listed companies have been forced to pay their auditors larger fees to comply with the tough corporate governance rules, according to a new study.

The findings, in a report by law firm Foley & Lardner, confound predictions that US companies would only face a one-off increase in audit fees and other costs as a result of the legislation, introduced after the Enron and WorldCom scandals.

They also dispel accountancy firms' fears that Sarbanes-Oxley's strict requirement for auditor independence, which contributed to the demise of Andersen, would hurt their business by depriving them of fees for non-audit work.

US-listed companies paid auditors $4.9m (€3.9m) on average in 2005, 3 per cent more than in 2004 and 11 per cent more than in 2001, the year before the passage of the Act, according to the study which analysed public findings from more than 850 US-listed companies.

The rise in total fees came despite a dramatic fall in non-audit fees as companies hired third-party consultants to avoid conflicts of interest.

Non-audit fees paid by US companies fell 42 per cent in 2005, contributing to a 97 per cent collapse in these type of payments to accountancy firms since 2001.

"This decline in other fees has been more than made up by a rise in audit fees," said Thomas Hartman at Foley & Lardner. "Companies are paying the same amount, or more, to their auditors as they were before Sarbanes-Oxley."

The rise in auditors fees will fuel the concerns of European companies about a backdoor implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley if the New York Stock Exchange takes over Euronext.

Among US groups, small companies were the hardest hit, with total fees paid to auditors nearly doubling between 2001 and 2005, to an average of $1.4m.

Last year, fees paid by small companies, which often say they lack staff and resources to meet Sarbanes-Oxley's requirements, rose 16 per cent, mainly due to a 22 per cent rise in audit fees.

By comparison the biggest 500 companies in the US witnessed a modest 1 per cent rise in total fees to an average of $9.6m.

DOJ_NMG_0034724

The finding will reinforce criticism of a recent decision by the Securities and Exchange Commission not to exempt companies with a market value of less than $128m from some onerous Sarbanes-Oxley demands.

Milberg Mores (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

We don't often find ourselves on the same side of the political fence as House Democrat Charlie Rangel, so imagine our thrill to hear that the New Yorker and several of his liberal colleagues had recently discovered the perils of an overzealous Justice Department. Corporate America couldn't ask for a more eloquent spokesman.

Mr. Rangel was in full voice this week -- along with fellow New York Democrats Carolyn McCarthy and Gary Ackerman, as well as Florida's Robert Wexler -- about the injustice federal prosecutors had visited on plaintiffs' firm Milberg Weiss. The four released a statement lambasting Justice for going after the "entire" firm rather than just the partners accused of wrongdoing, claiming this could rob "average" citizens of Milberg's services. As Mr. Ackerman said: "I thought it was a bum deal to indict the entire firm. If you think someone did something wrong, go get him."

We couldn't have said it better, though we've been saying exactly that for years -- ever since the Justice Department in 2003 issued new guidelines, via the "Thompson memo," on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations. Federal prosecutors have since threatened to destroy any company that doesn't "cooperate" by waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off accused employees from legal support. Milberg Weiss stood by its due-process rights, and duly received a potential corporate death sentence.

Til now, Democrats have been largely mum on this prosecutorial fervor, choosing to use the indictments as opportunities to blame Republicans for corporate scandals. It isn't as if these four congressional Milberg defenders were popping blood vessels when Justice slapped Arthur Andersen with an indictment or forced a deferred prosecution agreement on KPMG -- actions that lost thousands of "average" accounting employees their jobs. Better late than never. With any luck, Mr. Rangel might take time out from his next trial-lawyer fund-raiser to read the Thompson memo in its entirety.

Still, the Milberg indictment has had one benefit; it has directed a bright, overdue light on the great tort-lawyer money-laundering machine. It's no secret that the tort bar has long been the Democratic Party's financial engine; the news is how many cylinders were being fired by Milberg Weiss alone. According to the watchdog Center for Responsive Politics, the firm and individuals there made nearly $2.8 million in donations to Democrats since 1999. (Republicans: $23,000.)

Democrats are now rushing to return the tainted money; at this pace Milberg won't have much trouble footing its legal bills. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer was one of the first off the payback block, with his office saying it would return nearly $125,000 in contributions. Wisconsin Governor Jim Doyle is bouncing back $10,000 after the state GOP threatened to make it an issue in Mr. Doyle's re-election race.

The Democratic National Party is having a bit more difficulty outing the damned spot, given that of the $1.28 million it raked in from the firm and its partners, $500,000 went to the DNC's new headquarters. Its solution: Return the grand sum of $5,000, or that which had been given by two individual Milberg lawyers indicted last month. Apparently it has also adopted a principled position against corporate indictments. No action so far from 2008 presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, who saw some $24,000 in Milberg-related donations flow to herself and to her political action committee. Then again, Ms. Clinton understands how complicated law-firm finances can get.

The Democrats returning money are doing so in the hope of avoiding reminders that only a few months ago they were accusing Republicans of a "culture of corruption." If anything the Abramoff scandal seems minor in comparison, isolated to a few instances of influence peddling. The plaintiffs' bar, by contrast, has been paying off Democrats for decades to protect its judicial abuses. This has proved a virtuous circle: Well-funded Democrats refuse to pass tort reform, allowing tort lawyers to cash in on more cases and then make greater contributions to Democrats.

Milberg Weiss is a perfect example, having built up its destructive business of shareholder "strike suits" on the assurances that Democrats would stifle real reform. The good news is that federal prosecutors are starting to plumb the depths of this Democratic donor base. Democrats may be right to question Justice's decision to indict the Milberg firm, but Americans are right to demand a full airing of that entity's behavior, and to know who was benefiting.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Dems Strip Jefferson Of Panel Seat (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Add political banishment to the list of problems confronting Rep. William Jefferson, ensnared in a bribery scandal that fellow Democrats hope to turn to their election-year advantage.

"Democrats are determined to hold a high ethical standard," the party's leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, said Thursday night after engineering a 99-58 vote of the rank and file that stripped Jefferson of his seat on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

"This isn't about proof in the court of law. This is about an ethical standard," Pelosi said. "I wish that the White House would do the same."

Democrats long have accused Republicans of nourishing a "culture of corruption" in Congress, and signaled their desire to make ethics a key issue in their drive to win control of the House in the November elections.

The vote came despite a final plea from Jefferson and persistent complaints from members of the Congressional Black Caucus, which said the Louisianan was being sanctioned without a rule or a precedent to justify it.

For his part, Jefferson conceded to reporters he faced "serious allegations" in connection with an investigation that has netted two convictions. The congressman maintains his innocence and has not been indicted, although the FBI says it found $90,000 in bribe money several months ago stashed in a food freezer in his home.

With the action of the Democratic caucus subject to ratification by the full House, Jefferson publicly left open for the first time that he might be willing to give up his committee seat voluntarily.

"I don't want to speculate," he said.

Within an hour of the vote, Jefferson disclosed he had offered on Wednesday to step aside on two conditions. They were that the caucus establish a rule covering cases like his and that his seat on Ways and Means go temporarily to a fellow Louisiana Democrat, Rep. Charles Melancon.

Pelosi, who controlled the votes to prevail in a showdown, declined the offer.

"So it was her decision to expose the rift in this caucus and to move forward with this unjust action," Jefferson said in a statement.

The vote in a closed-door meeting of Democrats marked the culmination of Pelosi's effort to stake out the high election-year ground on ethics.

The issue was a difficult one for many Democrats, and some members of the black caucus have privately appealed to Jefferson in recent weeks to step aside voluntarily.

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a member of the Democratic leadership as well as the black caucus, said the rank and file had confronted "two competing interests - the legal interest and the political interest."

While the vote was not close, it also underscored the concern among Democrats that Jefferson was being sanctioned arbitrarily.

The chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. Melvin Watt of North Carolina, said after the vote that by taking the action they did, fellow Democrats chose "political expediency" or some other unacceptable factor over precedent. "Even at the end of the meeting, we don't know what the standard has been," he said.

Watt said that constituents of some lawmakers will adopt the view that race was a factor in the decision. "I think there are people who will say that's the basis," he said. Blacks are among the Democrats' most loyal voters.

Democrats earlier in the evening rejected a call to sidetrack the proceedings until a rule had been adopted to cover situations like Jefferson's. Rep. Steven Rothman, D-N.J., said he sought the step because without rules, the action was "extraordinarily arbitrary."

Fellow Dems Vote To Take Jefferson Off Panel (USAT)

USA Today, June 16, 2006

House Democrats voted 99-58 Thursday night to strip Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana of his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee while a federal bribery investigation runs its course. For weeks, the Louisiana Democrat has rebuffed requests from party leaders that he step aside on his own.

The FBI says that it videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in bribe money and that agents found $90,000 of it in a freezer at his home. Jefferson maintains his innocence. He has not been indicted.

Within an hour of the vote, Jefferson disclosed he had offered on Wednesday to step aside on the condition that the caucus establish a rule covering cases like his and that his seat go temporarily to Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La. "Ms. Pelosi politely declined my offer," he said in a written statement, referring to Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader. Pelosi's office confirmed the exchange.

As the only survivor of the Sago Mine disaster looked on, President Bush signed into law Thursday the first major overhaul of mine-safety laws in three decades. "Only one man came out, and he's with us today," Bush said of Randy McCloy, who is recovering from carbon monoxide poisoning from the accident in January that killed a dozen miners in West Virginia.

Congress passed the bill following accidents that have left 33 miners dead since Jan. 1, up from 22 in 2005. The new law requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen rather than one. Also, mine operators must store additional oxygen underground and put new communications equipment and devices to track lost miners in mines within three years.

President Bush created the world's largest marine sanctuary by extending stronger federal protections to the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and nearby waters. The area covers a Pacific archipelago 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide. Endangered monk seals and nesting green sea turtles are among the more than 7,000 species that inhabit the area. At least one-fourth of the species are found nowhere else.

"This national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined." Federal and state agencies will oversee the 140,000 square miles of mostly uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reefs and underwater peaks.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved a proposed constitutional amendment that would allow Congress to make desecrating the American flag a crime. The vote was 11-7. Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., plans a floor vote this month.

Jefferson Voted Off House Panel (BRADV)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — In an unprecedented move, House Democrats voted 99-58 Thursday to forcibly suspend one of their own, U.S. Rep. William Jefferson of New Orleans, from his seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

The action followed an almost month-long campaign by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who had asked Jefferson — who is under investigation for bribery — to voluntarily step down.

Jefferson refused, arguing he has not been charged with a crime and denying any wrongdoing.

Pelosi had called on Jefferson to observe the "high ethical standard of the House Democratic caucus." But after the vote, which concluded a three-hour party meeting, Pelosi did not gloat.

"It's not about victory," Pelosi said. "It's very sad. Our Democratic caucus said it would hold a high ethical standard, and now we're doing it."

Unless Jefferson steps down, the matter will go to the House floor for a resolution vote by the full chamber. That vote could come as soon as today.

Jefferson, a 16-year congressman, entered the caucus meeting shortly after 5 p.m. and met with reporters, saying he made a 10-minute pitch to his fellow Democrats.

"I simply asked the members of the caucus to put themselves in my shoes," Jefferson said.

Jefferson argued that he shouldn't be demoted because he hasn't been charged. Caucus rules contain four provisions to remove members, but only after they are indicted, he said.

Rep. Steven Rothman of New Jersey tried to table the motion to suspend Jefferson, at least until a rule can be established.

DOJ_NMG_0034727

Louisiana's only other House Democrat, Rep. Charles "Charlie" Melancon of Napoleonville, spoke on behalf of Rothman's amendment, said Rep. Albert Wynn of Maryland.

"In the absence of any rule, this was extremely arbitrary and invited substantial abuse," Rothman said of the motion to suspend Jefferson.

The Rothman motion failed 91-61. Melancon declined to comment after the meeting.

Pelosi has said that she would not appoint a person to replace Jefferson on the committee and that he could return with full seniority when his legal troubles are resolved.

Pelosi, who hopes to be House speaker if the Democrats win control of the chamber in November, experienced a political pushback from an organization considered to be a pillar of the Democratic party, the Congressional Black Caucus.

With 42 members, the group accounts for one in five of the 201 party votes in the House. Caucus members have supported Jefferson, writing a letter to Pelosi on his behalf.

Black Caucus members leaving the meeting Thursday called the vote a matter of fairness.

"It's not fair," said Rep. Major Owens of New York. "It sets a precedent."

Most members exiting the meeting declined to talk about their vote.

"It's a secret ballot," House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who has called for Jefferson to step down, shouted to reporters.

Rep. Danny Davis of Illinois had no qualms revealing his vote.

"I personally believe a person is innocent until proven guilty," said Davis, a Black Caucus member. "There have been no charges brought and no indictment made."

Jefferson returned to the meeting to vote, but did not stay around for the tally. He joked with reporters while leaving that he could not reveal which way he voted.

Jefferson said in a statement after the vote that he offered to step down if the caucus instituted an across-the-board rule that members under investigation can be removed from an "exclusive" committee.

Jefferson also wanted Melancon to be his committee replacement until his return. Pelosi balked on the request.

"Ms. Pelosi politely declined my offer," Jefferson said. "So it was her decision to expose the rift in this caucus and move forward with this unjust action."

Jefferson is accused of demanding hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash for himself and his family in return for brokering telecommunications deals in Africa between 2001 and 2005. Two men have pleaded guilty in the investigation.

Jefferson has not been charged with any crime and has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

Democrats Vote To Force Jefferson Aside (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — House Democrats voted on Thursday night to strip a Louisiana congressman of a key committee position as they tried to avoid any taint of scandal in a year when they want to ride accusations of Republican corruption to election victories.

The congressman, William J. Jefferson, is the subject of a federal bribery investigation and has insisted he has done nothing wrong. He has rebuffed efforts to get him to step aside voluntarily.

After a meeting stretching more than three hours, the Democrats voted to remove him from the House Ways and Means Committee until his case is resolved. The action, on a 99-to-58 vote, is subject to the approval by the full House.

Mr. Jefferson, who is accused of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes and stowing $90,000 of it in his freezer, spoke to the party caucus briefly as it convened. Caucus members, who talked to reporters outside the meeting, said Mr. Jefferson had asked them "to put themselves in my shoes."

He acknowledged that he was facing serious accusations but called the punishment "unauthorized and unnecessary."

Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus have supported Mr. Jefferson, who is black, arguing it was premature to remove him before he was found guilty of any crime.

But the minority leader, Nancy Pelosi, of California, said Mr. Jefferson had been afforded due process. "This is not a court of law," Ms. Pelosi said. "This is about a higher ethical standard, and you know it when it isn't being met."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has said in court documents that Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, took the bribes to help a small technology company win federal contracts and secure business in Nigeria.

The F.B.I. statements focused unfavorable attention on the Democrats just as they were trying to capitalize on the accusations of corruption among Republicans that led to the resignation of the former House majority leader, Tom DeLay.

Ms. Pelosi sought to draw a line between Republican scandals and what she called "individual mistakes."

"If we have any of that in our caucus, we will deal with them," she said. "That is quite different from the Republican caucus. The entire Republican caucus condoned, enabled and benefited from the culture of corruption, and that is what I will continue to rail against."

Agents raided Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office on a Saturday night last month, setting off a fight between the Justice Department and Congress, with Republican leaders joining the Democrats in arguing that the search violated convention and the Constitution.

To smooth things over, President Bush sealed the papers taken from Mr. Jefferson's office for 45 days to allow lawyers to agree on rules for searching Congressional offices.

Ms. Pelosi noted that she had supported Mr. Jefferson's efforts to get his records back, and had opposed the raid on his office.

Party Urges Jefferson To Leave Committee (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Democrats voted last night to strip Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.) of a plum committee assignment while he is embroiled in a federal bribery investigation.

The 99 to 58 vote followed weeks of public and private wrangling, as Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) sought to take a strong election-year stance on ethics, while Jefferson's allies -- mainly fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus -- protested that he was being singled out for unfair treatment.

Jefferson left immediately after voting and said he would spend the evening considering his next move.

"I'm just going to go to my office," Jefferson said. "I'm just going to wait and see."

If he refuses to step aside from the Ways and Means Committee, as urged by the Democratic Caucus, the next step would be a vote on the House floor to remove him from the prestigious committee. Even his allies want to avoid that.

Black Caucus members said their concern was the lack of any rule pertaining to lawmakers in Jefferson's situation. He has not been indicted in the case but could face serious charges. Jefferson says he is innocent of wrongdoing.

Before the Democratic Caucus met, Jefferson offered to resign under two conditions: that a rule be written establishing that any member under investigation may be asked to step aside, regardless of whether charges are filed; and that Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.), whose district adjoins Jefferson's, be named his temporary replacement on Ways and Means.

Pelosi declined the offer.

"Our concern is that the rule is really political expediency," said Rep. Melvin Watt (N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. Rep. Danny K. Davis (Ill.) said the legal question was foremost. "I don't think this has to do with race," Davis said. "Members of the Democratic Caucus are above and beyond that."

Not all of the resolution's opponents were black caucus members. Some sought a new rule that would apply to Jefferson's situation, so members could debate language on the books. Rep. Steven R. Rothman (N.J.) moved to table the resolution to remove Jefferson until the issue had been addressed, but that failed 91 to 61.

The investigation involves Jefferson's alleged role in African business dealings. The pressure from Pelosi and others was stepped up when the FBI revealed it videotaped Jefferson accepting $100,000 in $100 bills from a government witness, explaining that he would pass it on to the vice president of Nigeria to assist in a telecommunications deal. All but $10,000 of the cash was later found in Jefferson's freezer in his Washington home.

Jefferson has refused repeated behind-the-scenes entreaties, including those by several prominent Black Caucus members, to voluntarily step aside. Venting his frustration in an op-ed column Saturday in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, he accused Pelosi of playing politics with his career and reputation.

"Her behavior is rooted in a political strategy she believes will enable the Democrats to gain the majority in the House and realize her dream of becoming Speaker of the House, which disregards the interests of the people of Louisiana, ignores firmly established House precedent, and fails to observe the rules of fairness and nondiscrimination," Jefferson wrote.

He noted that he has not been charged with a crime, and that "historically, even when a member of Congress has been so charged, he or she steps aside from a committee or subcommittee chairmanship, but not from the committee itself."

Pelosi denied that she is being unfairly harsh. "I told all my colleagues, anybody with $90,000 in their freezer, you have a problem at that point."

Jefferson and some of his Black Caucus allies have noted Pelosi's relative silence on the legal troubles facing Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.), whose commercial investments are being scrutinized by federal investigators for potential connections to his duties as a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mollohan acknowledged this week that he misstated more than a dozen transactions on his financial disclosure forms and said he had amended them "to correct any inaccurate impressions about my finances." He resigned earlier this year as the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee but retains his Appropriations Committee seat.

One of Jefferson's former business partners, Vernon L. Jackson, and a former top aide, Brett M. Pfeffer, have pleaded guilty in the investigation, confessing to conspiring to bribe Jefferson.

Democrats Vote Jefferson Off Panel (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

House Democrats voted by a nearly 2-to-1 margin yesterday to oust Rep. William J. Jefferson from his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee, a little-precedented move that angered the party's black lawmakers.

The 99-58 vote, taken last night in a Cannon Caucus Room gathering of the party's representatives and delegates, sends the measure to the House floor.

Several members of the Congressional Black Caucus denounced House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's campaign against Mr. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. The caucus members were reluctant to oust Mr. Jefferson from his tax-committee seat based on press and broadcast reports and leaked information related to an ongoing bribery investigation before he has been charged with any crime.

"I asked the caucus to put themselves in my shoes and if this was fair, where there are only allegations from third parties and some in the press, whether we would be ruled or make up our rules based on that," Mr. Jefferson said.

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, said criminal trials and past caucus procedures were not the issue and that Mr. Jefferson has had his opportunity to plead his case, defend himself before the caucus and work with the leadership by voluntarily stepping down, which he refused to do.

"We have a higher ethical standard. This is not a court of law; this is about a higher ethical standard, and you know when it isn't being met," she said, adding that she had "been more than fair" to Mr. Jefferson by noting her opposition to the FBI raid of his office and her support of his amicus brief to have his records returned.

Mrs. Pelosi denied any racial bias in her effort to oust Mr. Jefferson but not Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who is white and is suspected of using his House Appropriations Committee seat to funnel money and contracts to numerous nonprofit groups and a business-partner relative. Mr. Mollohan did step down from the ethics panel.

"Mr. Jefferson has had two people plead guilty to bribing him," she said. "We don't know if Mr. Mollohan is even being investigated."

Many in the black caucus have said other members under investigation remained in committee seats before charges were filed. Caucus members and staff could come up with only one case of a Democrat being ousted from a House panel without any charges being filed. Rep. Adam Clayton Powell of New York, who was black, was ousted in 1967 over corruption accusations that were not crimes under pre-Watergate ethics laws.

"Our experience has been throughout history is that you have to have a set of rules to adhere to and abide by, and if you don't, it leaves you with a process that can be abused and one that you can't count on," said Rep. Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat and caucus chairman.

Black caucus sources also dismissed Mrs. Pelosi's claim that the situations are not analogous because of the lack of confirmation of any Mollohan probe. The sources point out that Mr. Mollohan also sits on the subcommittee that oversees the FBI and Justice Department.

The Democratic caucus met for an hour as Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Jefferson made their cases. Reps. G.K. Butterfield of North Carolina and Steven R. Rothman of New Jersey managed the debate. Mr. Rothman told reporters that his motion to table the matter was rejected by a 91-61 vote, and added, "I felt that in the absence of any rule this was extremely arbitrary and provides potential for abuse."

Black Caucus Opposes Democrats' Move To Take Jefferson Off Key Committee (LAT)

By Janet Hook

WASHINGTON — In a clash highlighting tensions between Democratic leaders and one of their party's most important constituencies, House Democrats on Thursday backed a move to oust scandal-scarred Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) from a powerful committee post, despite opposition from the Congressional Black Caucus.

On a 99-58 vote, the House Democratic Caucus endorsed a proposal by their leader, Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, that would remove Jefferson temporarily from the Ways and Means Committee because of an FBI investigation of bribery allegations against him.

Jefferson, who is African American, has resisted pressure from colleagues to step aside voluntarily. But after making his case to the closed-door meeting of House Democrats, he left open the possibility that he may give up his committee seat rather than fight the matter on the House floor, where it would have to be ratified to take effect. The timing of that floor debate is uncertain.

Members of the black caucus who have supported Jefferson argued it would be unprecedented to force him off the committee before any criminal charges had been filed against him.

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), head of the black caucus, warned that Pelosi's push for Jefferson's removal might cause black voters to conclude that "a different standard … based on race" was being applied.

The controversy pits Pelosi and other House Democratic leaders against the black caucus at a time when the clout its members exert within their districts is especially important.

Turnout by black voters is considered crucial to Democratic hopes of winning control of the House in November's elections. The black lawmakers will be counted on to help spur that turnout, as well as to stymie efforts by Republicans to make political inroads among African Americans.

If Democrats do take charge of the House, African Americans stand to gain a large share of power: Five black lawmakers are in line to become chairmen of some of the House's most important committees.

Still, Pelosi took the risk of alienating the black caucus in service of another political goal: her party's efforts to promote the election-year argument that Republicans have fostered a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

"Our House Democratic Caucus is determined to uphold a high ethical standard," she said after Thursday's vote. "We said it, and now we are doing it."

Some Democrats have expressed concern that the dispute will undercut Pelosi's efforts to forge party cohesiveness in the House ahead of the 2006 elections. But she dismissed such worries.

"I'm very proud of the unity of my caucus," she told reporters Thursday. "We can withstand debate; it isn't stifled."

Jefferson has maintained his innocence, but a business associate recently pleaded guilty to bribing him in hopes of winning a telecommunications contract with Nigeria. A former Jefferson aide also has pleaded guilty in the case.

The investigation gained widespread national attention when a recent court filing revealed that last year, the FBI videotaped a transaction that showed Jefferson accepting $100,000 in bribe money, according to federal agents. The filing said $90,000 of that money was found a few days later wrapped in aluminum foil in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington home.

Following news stories about the cash, Pelosi called for Jefferson to leave the Ways and Means Committee until the case was resolved.

Some of the 43 members of the black caucus — all of whom are Democrats — supported Pelosi. But as a group, the caucus decided to oppose her.

In its official stance, the caucus argued that lawmakers under investigation deserved the "presumption of innocence."

It also noted that Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) had not been asked to step down from the powerful Appropriations Committee, despite reports that he was under scrutiny for allegedly steering millions of dollars in federal funds to nonprofit organizations that he helped control.

Pelosi countered that so far, the case against Mollohan was not as serious or clear-cut as the one against Jefferson.

In an effort to reach out to black voters, Pelosi in recent days conducted interviews with several black news organizations to explain her position.

In Thursday's vote, some white Democrats joined in opposing the move against Jefferson. One of them, Rep. Steven R. Rothman of New Jersey, said he objected to applying an "arbitrary" standard in the absence of clear guidelines for determining when a lawmaker should lose a committee assignment.

Most Democrats on Capitol Hill are hoping the dispute over Jefferson fades quickly and does not pack a broader political punch.

"There needs to be an effort to reiterate to the black community that the Democratic Party values their support and is with them on their issues," said an aide to House Democratic leaders who requested anonymity because of the politically sensitive nature of the flap.

As part of an effort by President Bush to improve the standing of the GOP among black voters, Republicans are running African American candidates in three major statewide races this year — for governor in Ohio and Pennsylvania and for senator in Maryland.

Although none of them is considered a front-runner, Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said Democrats had reason to be concerned.

She cited a report on black voters in Maryland commissioned by the state's Democratic Party that concluded that Michael S. Steele, the GOP's Senate candidate, had "a clear ability to break through … among African American voters."

Still, Republicans have a lot of ground to make up in the battle for black voters: An April poll by NBC and the Wall Street Journal found that Bush's approval rating among blacks was just 16%.

Little Office Becomes Big Player After Raid By The F.B.I. (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

There was a time — four weeks ago, for instance — when the Office of the General Counsel for the House of Representatives was just another nearly invisible government agency, working about as far from public notice as is possible on Capitol Hill.

But the F.B.I.'s raid last month on the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat at the center of a bribery investigation, has drawn the general counsel's office and the woman who leads it, Geraldine R. Gennet, into a rare public fight with the executive branch. The May 20 raid, the first executed on a Congressional office at least since the United States Constitution was adopted, has angered a bipartisan group in Congress that views it as an unjustified intrusion into the legislative branch's autonomy and a violation of the government's fundamental separation of powers.

The Justice Department, which prevented lawyers from Ms. Gennet's office to be present during the search, has defended it as a perfectly legal act.

On Friday, lawyers for Mr. Jefferson and the Justice Department are scheduled to argue before Judge Thomas F. Hogan of Federal District Court in Washington. Ms. Gennet, asked to weigh in by the House Republican leadership, filed a 90-page memorandum criticizing the raid as a "grave threat" to the immunity that Congress has enjoyed from intrusions into its official business.

"Weaken the legislative branch, and the likelihood of abuses of authority by the other branches necessarily increases," the memorandum said. In its reply to the court, the Justice Department said Ms. Gennet's arguments ventured "well beyond anything the law can support."

Though she will be at Friday's hearing, Ms. Gennet, a Democrat whose first government job, in 1986, was as legal counsel to the Washington Metro Police Department, will leave oral arguments to a deputy.

The limelight is unusual for an office that is so low in profile that it has no public Web site, no spokesperson and only five lawyers, including Ms. Gennet, who declined to comment for this article.

"It's generally an obscure office that you don't hear much about," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and a former assistant United States attorney. "Their role has become more prominent because of all the subpoenas being issued over there."

The Office of the General Counsel is appointed by the House speaker and represents the House and its elected members in their official capacities, regardless of political affiliation. The nonpartisanship can be relative, however. House rules require the counsel's office to "function pursuant to the direction of the speaker," who must consult with a bipartisan advisory group that is, nonetheless, controlled by the majority party.

"The House counsel is like a hybrid car," said Charles Tiefer, a former House counsel who is a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law. "Sometimes it runs on bipartisanship, sometimes it runs on just the majority party."

In 2001, for example, after a group of Democratic congressmen sued the Commerce Department for Census data that they believed would show more accurate counts of minorities, Ms. Gennet filed a brief opposing the lawsuit, on orders from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

Working as the House of Representatives' chief lawyer was not always considered all that important. The job began in the early 1970's as a low-level administrative post within the House clerk's office. In 1976, Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., a Democrat, appointed a young lawyer, Stanley M. Brand, as the first counsel with authority to take on constitutional challenges from the executive branch.

"There were guys before me," Mr. Brand recalled in an interview last week, "but they basically wrote the contracts for curtains."

In 1978, the office nearly vanished after a Senate bill proposed creating one general counsel for the House and Senate. But House leaders, led by Mr. O'Neill, declined to go along, fearing "that the office would be paying more attention to senators," said Steven R. Ross, the House general counsel from 1983 to 1993.

When Republicans took control of the House in the mid-1990's, they considered the counsel's office, located directly below the speaker's offices, as a Democratic creation that had outgrown its usefulness, Mr. Brand said. The new Republican speaker, Newt Gingrich, had the office moved into a Congressional office building across the street, and returned it to the purview of the House clerk.

In 1997, when Ms. Gennet was named House counsel, Republicans made the office independent of the clerk.

Mr. Brand and Mr. Ross, now in private practice in Washington, said they relished their years as House counsel, which placed them at the center of constitutional battles with the executive branch. In 1979, Mr. Brand argued and won United States v. Helstoski, in which the Supreme Court held that the Constitution prevented the government from prosecuting members of Congress for the performance of official acts.

Mr. Ross fought on behalf of a Democrat-controlled Congress against the Reagan administration's attempt to expand its executive powers.

"I thought it was the single best legal job in Washington," Mr. Ross said.

Mr. Tiefer, who was appointed acting House counsel in 1993, said the current battle over the F.B.I.'s search of Representative Jefferson's office last month was, in a sense, a welcome reawakening.

"It represents a return to the larger role that counsel's office played during separation of powers struggles 10 to 20 years ago," he said.

Separation Of Powers Showdown Friday (MSNBC)

By Joel Seidman

MSNBC.com, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The federal judge who signed the search warrant allowing the FBI to enter Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office last month, will preside at a potentially contentious hearing Friday – a hearing pitting the executive and legislative branches of government in a showdown over the United States Constitution.

The ornate ceremonial courtroom at U.S. District Court in Washingotn, D.C. will be the backdrop for Judge Thomas Hogan to hear arguments from the Department of Justice and the House of Representatives, as well as Jefferson's lawyer, on the search which Hogan condoned.

The raid, say both Congressional and executive branch officials, was the first ever on a congressman's office in the sprawling Capitol complex. House leaders have called the search unconstitutional. DOJ said any special treatment for lawmakers would essentially allow Congress to block criminal investigations.

A clause in the constitution known as the "Speech and Debate Clause" lies at the crux of the looming separation of powers battle. It protects members of Congress from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit concerning their legislative work.

It is still not known exactly what was seized from Jefferson's office, but, whatever it was, the congressman wants it back. The materials that have been confiscated have been kept on ice, so-to-speak. In a move designed to allow the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Justice Department enough time to try to resolve the issue, President George W. Bush ordered the seized material sealed and kept in the Solicitor General's office until mid-July

Federal disagreements

The courtroom arguments are likely to go something like this: The government, in their filing this week, acknowledges that under the clause, members "shall not be questioned for any speech or debate." But, the government argues, "This prohibition has nothing to say about a search warrant that, as in this case, was not directed at -- and thus did not question Representative Jefferson about - legislative activity."

The House counsel's argument maintains that the search of Jefferson's office "violated the Constitution because it took place without Congressman Jefferson having had a prior opportunity to screen out and remove records and files (or determine not to assert the privilege)." The House counsel also argues that, absent extraordinary measures, searching a congressional office violates the Speech or Debate Clause, because it "threatens to impair the legislative branch's conduct of its constitutionally-mandated functions."

Jefferson is under investigation for allegedly taking bribes in order to influence high-ranking government officials in Africa to do business with a Kentucky-based Internet company.

Jefferson has not been charged and repeatedly has denied any wrongdoing in the alleged scheme. But, a Kentucky business owner and a former congressional aide have both pleaded guilty to bribing the congressman.

Jefferson's former aide, Brett Pfeffer, who is cooperating with the Justice Department's investigation, received an eight-year prison sentence recently for his role in the scandal. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate - the Kentucky company - pleaded to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to Jefferson. He has yet to be sentenced.

Safavian Jury Yet To Reach Verdict (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 15, 2006

A jury deliberated for a second day Thursday without reaching a verdict in the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

They are to resume on Friday trying to decide whether former Bush administration official David Safavian covered up his assistance to Republican influence-peddler Jack Abramoff.

The General Services Administration's chief of staff in 2002, Safavian allegedly concealed from GSA ethics officials, the GSA inspector general and Senate investigators his assistance to the now-convicted lobbyist. Abramoff wanted to buy, lease or redevelop two government properties including the Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

The jury of 10 women and two men is considering whether Safavian is guilty on two counts of engaging in obstruction and three counts of making false statements.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman dismissed a juror Wednesday morning, seated the only remaining alternate juror, a woman, and told the revised jury to begin deliberations anew. The jury originally started deliberating Tuesday.

The juror had done independent research and had talked to people she should not have about the case, according to the judge.

Safavian, a former chief federal procurement officer in the Bush White House, acknowledged on the witness stand that Abramoff e-mailed him that he was working on trying to buy or lease 40 acres of the GSA's White Oak property in Maryland for a school Abramoff set up. Safavian also acknowledged he knew Abramoff "was putting together a team in order to bid" on the redevelopment of the Old Post Office a few blocks from the White House.

But he said he didn't tell GSA officials and the Senate about his advice to Abramoff because the GSA had not decided in 2002 what to do with the properties so he didn't consider that Abramoff's inquiries amounted to doing or seeking business with the agency.

Corruption Trial Witness Feared For His Life (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 16, 2006

The former son-in-law of a prominent ex-alderman told federal investigators that he copied and saved city computer files "because he was scared that he may be killed," according to portions of an FBI interview cited Thursday in the City Hall corruption trial.

Robert Koch, a former manager of city computer servers, said later that he may have exaggerated those fears.

Koch, who is divorced from former 11th Ward Ald. Patrick Huels' daughter Allison, testified that he had files deleted at the behest of Mayor Richard Daley aide Robert Sorich in 1997.

But under cross-examination by Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin, Koch acknowledged that he secretly saved a copy of the files from the mayor's office in his locker at a gym.

"You told the FBI you were afraid because you had been at family events with the Huelses and the Daleys where other people had talked about getting people knocked off?" Durkin asked.

"I'm not going to admit that," Koch replied.

Durkin pressed him on the subject again, asking if Koch denied making the statement to the FBI on July 28. After Durkin showed Koch the FBI report of that meeting, Koch finally acknowledged that he did express fear to authorities.

"So I'm a 23-year-old kid in a world I really didn't understand that well, and I was leaving a life behind that I was nervous to do," said Koch, now 34. "Did I ever think anyone would kill me? The thought may have crossed my mind, but that's a little extreme."

Sorich and three other ex-city officials are charged with rigging city hiring and promotions to favor politically connected applicants. Federal prosecutors say Sorich, Daley's longtime patronage chief, took steps to cover up the hiring fraud.

The trial has brought unwanted attention to the Daley administration and the mayor's political organization. Koch's testimony took jurors into the tight-knit world of power brokers in the Daley family's Bridgeport power base.

Durkin questioned Koch's credibility, suggesting Koch concealed from the FBI that he secretly kept copies of the files Sorich allegedly wanted him to erase.

Koch said a colleague told him in early September 1997 that FBI agents were examining files in the mainframe computer. Koch testified that he called for advice from Huels, who was then his father-in-law and Daley's City Council floor leader.

An hour after his conversation with Huels, Koch said, Sorich called and asked him to delete files from the computer's mainframe.

A few months later, an FBI agent came to the South Side home where Koch was living with a friend. In the Dec. 10, 1997, meeting, the agent asked Koch about Huels and about a tip they had received of computer file deletions at the city, according to testimony.

"When you were talking to the FBI, you knew you were sitting on a copy of [the computer files] in your gym locker?" Durkin asked.

Koch said he kept the computer files at a time when Huels was mired in a City Hall scandal that led to his resignation. Koch did not tell authorities that he had preserved them until they contacted him a year ago.

Durkin suggested that Koch thought the files contained information about Huels and Michael Tadin, a city trucking contractor and boyhood friend of the mayor. Huels resigned in October 1997 after accepting a $1.25 million loan from Tadin.

But Koch flatly rejected the notion that he had acted to protect Huels, noting that aldermanic files were not backed up on the city's mainframe.

"These files came from the mayor's office," where Sorich worked, Koch replied.

Durkin asked whether Koch felt regret because at the time he was divorcing Huels' daughter and leaving the tight-knit circle of the 11th Ward.

"It was very difficult," Koch said.

He said he still respects Huels and didn't want anyone to get hurt by what he said on the witness stand.

"I'm sick to my stomach that I'm here testifying," said Koch, whose cross-examination by Durkin lasted most of Thursday.

After Koch left the stand, outside the presence of the jury, prosecutor Patrick Collins told U.S. District Judge David Coar that "we've passed the point of relevance" regarding the 1997 computer files. Collins said the destruction of the computer records wasn't connected to Huels, because the FBI did not open an investigation into Huels until late October 1997.

A veteran FBI agent testified later Thursday that he questioned Sorich about hiring records in preparation for the 1997 corruption trial of former Water Department Commissioner John Bolden.

FBI Agent Reges Fay said that while investigating Bolden for taking kickbacks from Water Department job applicants, he learned Sorich might have had a role in the applicants' hiring.

Sorich told Fay in a telephone conversation in 1997 that he referred 10 applicants to Bolden, Fay said.

Sorich said the names came from local community leaders, and that his office kept no records of the applicants, Fay testified.

Fay said Sorich provided him no other information about his alleged role in hiring applicants in Water or any other department.

Prosecutors plan to rest their case Monday, after the testimony of Sorich's former assistant, Patty Molloy.

Durkin told reporters he did not know whether he would call any witnesses on Sorich's behalf.

"We're still not sure we're going to put a case on," he said.

Did Witness Fear For Life? It 'may Have Crossed My Mind' (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 16, 2006

A prosecution witness said "the thought may have crossed my mind" when asked Thursday if he feared he'd be killed after getting caught between an FBI investigation and a powerful 11th Ward family.

Witness Robert Koch, a former City Hall computer technician and onetime son-in-law to former Ald. Patrick Huels, testified that the mayor's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, told him in 1997 to delete city computer files.

Prosecutors contend Sorich, a top official with the Intergovernmental Affairs Office, ordered the files destroyed to hide his office's role in hirings and promotions.

Defense lawyer Tom Durkin contended that Koch really destroyed the files to protect Huels. Durkin suggested Koch once told the FBI he was scared for his life because while at family events with the Huels and Daleys, he sometimes heard about people getting "knocked off."

"Did I ever think anyone would kill me? The thought may have crossed my mind but that's a little extreme," Koch said of his state of mind in 1997.

Koch explained he was young and going through a divorce at the time with Huels' daughter, breaking his once-powerful connections.

"I'm a 23-year-old kid in a world I really didn't understand that well. I was leaving a world behind," Koch said.

Agent: Probe was after deletion

Durkin suggested Koch was trying to protect his father-in-law by saying he destroyed the files for Sorich. Huels was under FBI investigation after the Chicago Sun-Times exposed a questionable loan he received. Huels, who was also Daley's City Council floor leader, was never charged but later resigned.

But FBI Special Agent Reges Fay testified Thursday that the FBI didn't even open its investigation into Huels until October of 1997 -- about a month after Koch had the computer files destroyed.

Prosecutors could rest their case Monday. Defense lawyers say they're still determining whether they will put on a case.

Also Thursday, a female juror was excused after she told the judge her employer would no longer pay her salary during jury duty. That brings the number of jurors to 16, down from 18. Another was excused weeks ago. Twelve jurors are needed for deliberations.

FBI Subpoenas Records From Library's Policy (NILESHS)

By Jennifer Johnson, STAFF WRITER

Niles Herald-Spectator, June 16, 2006

The Niles Public Library was subpoenaed Monday by the U.S. Attorney's Office and told to supply all financial information regarding the library's dealings with the insurance agency of Ralph Weiner & Associates.

Library Administrator Cary Czarnecki said staff is cooperating with authorities and in the process of gathering the required information.

During an FBI investigation into possible fraudulent dealings involving Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase and the Weiner agency, agents raided the insurance company's Wheeling office June 6 and uncovered check vouchers for payments to S.M.P. Insurance Service, Inc., noting the Niles Public Library in the description line.

The FBI has identified S.M.P. as a "shell company" in Blase's law office, and the funds paid to S.M.P by the Weiner Agency as kickbacks paid to Blase for getting Niles businesses to sign up for insurance coverage with Weiner, the FBI alleges.

According to the FBI's criminal complaint against Blase and Steven Weiner of the Weiner agency, the check vouchers are for amounts of $1,050, dated Aug. 8, 2003; $550, dated Aug. 17, 2004; and $550, dated Aug. 5, 2005. Each of the vouchers states, "Pay SMP %% For Niles Public Library," in various abbreviations, according to the complaint.

The complaint also alleges that commission statements and a recovered memorandum from the Weiner agency indicate the library was coded under "4 Doves Restaurant."

Czarnecki said the library never received money from S.M.P and has had no dealings with a company of that name. He did say that the library has its insurance coverage through the Weiner agency, including property, casualty and liability insurance. Weiner is also the broker for health insurance provided to employees, he said.

Czarnecki said the library board sent out bid requests for each insurance contract, and the last time the library sought insurance bids, Weiner was the only company to provide one.

Czarnecki denied the library board was ever pressured by the mayor to purchase insurance through Weiner. It is believed the library has purchased its insurance through the Weiner agency since at least the late 1980s.

Morgan Dubiel, vice president of the Niles Library Board, said he knew nothing about the alleged payments to the library from S.M.P.

"We are an innocent bystander," he said.

Both Dubiel and Czarnecki said they were surprised by the news of Blase's arrest on June 8 and the allegations made against him by the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office.

Man Sought In Nev. Wants 'Truth' To Emerge (AP)

By Tom Gardner, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

A man sought by police Thursday in the slaying of his estranged wife and the attack on a family court judge left a phone message saying he wanted "the true story" to get out to the public, his cousin said.

Authorities have searched for Darren Mack since Monday when the judge was shot and wounded in his office by a sniper. Mack was charged the next day with murder in the stabbing death of Charla Mack, 39.

His cousin, Jeffrey Donner, said he received a phone message from Mack shortly after the shooting, saying, "'If anything happens to me, please make sure that the true story about the injustices that are going on in that courtroom get out to the media and the public.'"

Donner said his cousin had complained about Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling Mack's divorce case, for the past year and got the impression the judge was biased and made decisions before he heard all the facts.

"He was just obsessed with bringing this judge down. Not physically. I never heard anything like that, but by reputation," Donner said of Mack.

Still, Donner said he was shocked by reports of the shooting because Mack is "just not a violent person."

"If he is in fact responsible for this, it is totally out of character and it is simply an example of somebody that has snapped," he said, choking back tears.

Police said Weller, 53, who was shot once in the chest, was released from the hospital on Tuesday to an undisclosed, secure location.

A custody hearing in the Macks' divorce case was scheduled before Weller in September. Charla Mack filed for divorce in 2005, and a mutual restraining order was signed the same year, according to court records.

Mack, who owned a pawn shop, earned more than $500,000 a year and had a net worth of $9.4 million, according to court documents.

Shawn Meador, Charla Mack's lawyer, said in a court filing that Mack ignored Weller's order in May 2005 to pay $10,000 a month in temporary alimony payments. Weller found him in contempt of court, but Mack filed for bankruptcy in August to avoid paying, according to the filing.

Investigators said Mack may have headed west because of the contact with Donner, who lives in Moraga, Calif., and because a credit card used by the company he owns was used at the Sacramento airport Monday afternoon.

The Justice Department also charged Mack Thursday with unlawful flight to avoid prosecution.

Online Threats Outpacing Law Crackdowns (CNET)

By Joris Evers, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 16, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz.--Authorities are cracking down on phishing and botnets, but the threats are advancing instead of diminishing, two law enforcement officials said.

Cybercrooks are organizing better and moving to more sophisticated tactics to get their hands on confidential data and turn PCs of unwitting users into bots, representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Air Force Office of Special Investigations said in separate presentations here at the Computer Security Institute's NetSec event this week.

Law enforcement has had increased successes in catching, prosecuting and convicting phishers and bot herders over the past couple of years. However, catching the bad guys is getting tougher as the criminals become more professional, the representatives said.

"We're seeing increasingly sophisticated groups online that are more indicative of crime groups," Jonathan Rusch, special counsel for fraud prevention at the Justice Department, said in a presentation. The criminals who have been caught range from teenagers to retirees, he said.

Rusch spoke about phishing, a prevalent type of online attack that combines e-mail spam and fraudulent Web sites made to look like trusted sites, which are aimed at tricking a user into giving up sensitive information such as a credit card or Social Security number. Almost 17,500 phishing Web sites were reported to the Anti-Phishing Working Group in April.

A top phishing concern is the increased use of malicious software, Rusch said. Increasingly, phishers use Trojan horses that pack backdoors, screen grabbers or keystroke loggers to capture log-in names, passwords and other information, he said. In April, there were 180 unique examples of such malicious code, he said.

Backdoor software gives attackers remote access to an infected PC, which could let them piggyback onto a user's Internet connection and conduct online transactions from the victim's PC while masquerading as the person, Rusch said.

Screen grabbers and keystroke loggers can be programmed to capture very specific information and are even designed to wait until a user logs on to a certain banking Web site and send that information to the attacker.

Malicious software is where phishers intersect with bot herders, those who run networks of compromised machines, called a bot net. Computers typically become compromised and turned into a bot, also popularly called a zombie, after visiting a malicious Web site or opening an infected e-mail message or attachment. The bot software often nestles itself on a PC unbeknownst to the user by exploiting an unpatched security flaw on the system.

Law enforcement has been catching up to bot herders, and there have been some high-profile convictions. But here, too, the battle is getting harder, Wendi Whitmore, a special agent with the Air Force Office of Special Investigations, said in a presentation on botnets.

"Botnets are one of the greatest facilitators of cybercrime these days. Really the cybercrime arena is wrapped around botnets," she said.

With ubiquitous broadband connections and exploits for security flaws in software out before patches, the Internet environment is ideal for bots or zombies to proliferate, she said. That assertion is backed by a recent analysis by Microsoft. The software maker found that bots were the most common Windows threat, with more than 60 percent of compromised computers running bot code.

A zombie PC can be used by miscreants to store illegal content, such as child pornography, or in a botnet to relay spam and launch cyberattacks. Additionally, hackers often steal the victim's data and install spyware and adware on PCs, to earn a kickback from the spyware or adware maker.

Practice makes perfect

Meanwhile, bot masters are getting smarter about hiding. Today, most botnets are controlled using Internet Relay Chat, or IRC, servers and channels. Soon that could become instant messaging, peer-to-peer technology or protocols used by Internet phone services such as Skype or Vonage, Whitmore said.

"That is something that we're worried about because those protocols are proprietary," she said. "They don't publish routing protocols; it would be very difficult to catch that kind of crime."

Also, Whitmore expects cybercrooks to maintain smaller botnets with the hope of staying under the radar. People being caught today operate networks of as many as 1 million PCs. "There is a greater chance that you're going to get caught, if you do that much activity and command and control that many computers," she said.

Cybercriminals are often after data they can turn into cash, such as credit card numbers or even trade secrets. "If you have a smaller botnet and you combine that with targeted, really sophisticated social engineering tactics, you're going to be potentially a lot more successful," Whitmore said.

The military has seen a rise in such attacks over the last couple of years, Whitmore said. The attackers know what organizations work together, which generals would be involved and what issues they would talk about, she said. It's "incredibly disturbing, because those are the kinds of things that should be kept somewhat secret," she said.

Law enforcement alone cannot solve the phishing and botnet problems, Rusch and Whitmore said. The technology industry and consumers have key parts to play, they said.

"Part of the problem is the way we design the online environment for users," Rusch said. It should be easier for people to see whether a site can be trusted or not, he said. Some of that is happening today with increased security coming in new Web browsers, for example.

A stronger effort to take down phishing Web sites is also welcome, he said. The average phishing Web site was up for five days in April, and that's too long, Rusch said.

In fighting bots, Whitmore sees benefits in Internet service providers delivering security software to their users. "The long-term benefit of ISPs becoming more involved would be an overall reduction of malicious code on the Internet, and most of us believe that's a good thing," she said.

Court Rules Warrant Is Enough (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A closely divided Supreme Court ruled today that drug evidence found in the search of a home may be used against a suspect even if police officers violated the law by not giving the homeowner fair warning before they rushed inside.

In a 5-4 decision, the court said it would be rash to reject evidence simply because of a technical violation of the so-called knock-and-announce rule.

Criminals should not be handed a "get out of jail free card" in cases where the police have a valid search warrant, said Justice Antonin Scalia.

In the past, the court has insisted that evidence must be thrown out if the police violated the Constitution's ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures." This so-called exclusionary rule was among the most controversial legal developments of the 1960s, and it continues to irritate many law and order conservatives.

Scalia, who is among them, said that suppressing evidence should be "our last resort, not our first impulse." His opinion was joined in full by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Justice Clarence Thomas and new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, casting the decisive fifth vote, said the exclusionary rule itself was "settled" and "not in doubt." At issue, he said, was only whether to extend it to cases in which police had a valid warrant to enter a home but failed to give the proper warning.

In 1995, the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually required officers to knock on the door and call out "Police!" before they burst into a home. This rule helped protect the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then.

Until now, however, it was not clear whether the police would be penalized if they ignored this rule. Officers were told they should usually wait about 20 seconds after announcing their presence before they tried to enter a house. They may move faster if they suspect the residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet, the court said.

In the case decided today, Detroit police admitted they did not wait long before entering the home of Booker T. Hudson. They had obtained a search warrant to look for drugs and guns.

On a summer afternoon in 1998, seven officers approached the house and saw nothing unusual. Several called out "Police! Search warrant." Less than 5 seconds later, the lead officer turned the doorknob and walked into the living room.

There sat Hudson, along with 23 plastic bags that contained crack cocaine. Under a chair cushion, police also found a loaded revolver and five rocks of cocaine. Elsewhere in the house, they found more bags of drugs.

Charged with the drug and gun crimes, Hudson urged the judge to suppress the evidence because police had violated his rights under the knock-and-announce rule.

A prosecutor agreed the police had violated the rule, and a trial judge ruled that the evidence should be suppressed. But the Michigan Supreme Court disagreed and said suppressing the evidence was "not an appropriate remedy" for such a violation.

Hudson appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed last year to hear his case.

Scalia said this was not an instance where police obtained evidence by breaking the law. They had a valid warrant to search for and seize the drugs. "Since the interests were violated in this case have nothing to do with the seizure of the evidence, the exclusionary rule is inapplicable," he said in Hudson vs. Michigan.

The four dissenters said the requirement to "knock and announce" would be meaningless with no penalty for violating it.

The decision "represents a significant departure from the court's precedents. And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," wrote Justice Stephen G. Breyer for the dissenters.

Scalia responded that victims of such an unlawful entry could sue the city and the police for violating their rights. He also pointed to the "increasing professionalism of police forces, including a new emphasis on internal police discipline."

Breyer scoffed at these suggestions, insisting that the exclusionary rule was adopted because it was the only effective deterrent for police misconduct.

Justices Allow No-knock Searches (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drugs or other evidence seized at a home can be used in a trial even if police failed to knock and announce their presence, the Supreme Court ruled Thursday in a major shift in its rulings on illegal searches by police.

The 5-4 decision in a Detroit drug case undercuts a nearly century-old rule that says evidence found during an unlawful search cannot be used. The decision also offers a sign that the court might be more apt to strengthen the hand of police with Justice Samuel Alito in the place of retired justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, who was on the court when the case was first argued, had worried about "the sanctity of the home."

Alito sided fully with Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion, which emphasized that tossing out evidence acquired in violation of the knock-and-announce rule — but with a valid warrant — could mean "releasing dangerous criminals."

In a dissent, Justice Stephen Breyer called the decision "doubly troubling."

"It represents a significant departure from the court's precedents," he wrote, joined by John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. "It weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection."

The rule is based on a centuries-old idea of home privacy and the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches. It requires police to knock, announce themselves and wait a "reasonable" time, which justices noted can be about 20 seconds, before entering. The practice shields occupants from surprise and property damage.

In the Detroit case, officers had a warrant to search for drugs and firearms in the home of Booker Hudson. They called out their presence and, after three to five seconds, entered through an unlocked front door.

Hudson tried unsuccessfully to suppress the evidence — rocks of cocaine — that police found and was convicted of drug possession. In an appeal, he argued that unless tainted evidence is suppressed, police will not be deterred from barging into homes. O'Connor was sympathetic to the view at January arguments.

After she retired, the eight remaining justices apparently were deadlocked. The case was re-argued in May with Alito on the court. His vote gave Scalia the majority. Joining them were Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Clarence Thomas and Anthony Kennedy.

Kennedy noted that he didn't agree with a section of Scalia's decision that would have more broadly weakened the rule requiring evidence from an improper search to be kept out, depriving Scalia of the necessary fifth vote to further curtail the Fourth Amendment.

Regarding the no-knock rule, Kennedy agreed with Scalia that police are sufficiently deterred from improper searches by the right of occupants to sue under civil rights law. Breyer countered that such lawsuits are rare and often do not bring much relief for victims.

Critics said the decision could lead to an increase in no-knock police raids. Jack King, a spokesman for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said, "The only sanction that police really care about is if the evidence is thrown out."

Tim Richardson, a senior legislative liaison for the Fraternal Order of Police, rejected the idea that police would change their practices. "There's a new professionalism among law enforcement officers. They want to have clean, successful, swift prosecutions."

Court Limits Protection Against Improper Entry (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0034741

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Evidence found by police officers who enter a home to execute a search warrant without first following the requirement to "knock and announce" can be used at trial despite that constitutional violation, the Supreme Court ruled on Thursday.

The 5-to-4 decision left uncertain the value of the "knock-and-announce" rule, which dates to 13th-century England as protection against illegal entry by the police into private homes.

Justice Antonin Scalia, in the majority opinion, said that people subject to an improper police entry remained free to go to court and bring a civil rights suit against the police.

But Justice Stephen G. Breyer, writing for the dissenters, said the ruling "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." He said the majority's reasoning boiled down to: "The requirement is fine, indeed, a serious matter, just don't enforce it."

The decision followed a reargument less than a month ago, with the newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr., evidently casting the decisive vote. Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion was clearly drafted to speak for a majority that was lost when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor left the court shortly after the first argument in January.

The justices' lineup in this case, which upheld a Detroit man's conviction for drug possession, may become a familiar one as the court proceeds through its criminal-law docket. In addition to Justice Alito, those who joined the majority opinion by Justice Scalia were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Clarence Thomas and Anthony M. Kennedy. Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

The decision answered a question that the court had left open in 1995, when it held in a unanimous opinion by Justice Thomas that the traditional expectation that the police should knock and announce their presence was part of what made a search "reasonable" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The amendment bars unreasonable searches.

In that case, Wilson v. Arkansas, the court declined to say what the remedy should be for a violation of the knock-and-announce rule. Ordinarily, evidence that is seized illegally — in the absence of a warrant, for example — may not be used at trial, under what is known as the exclusionary rule.

By a strong majority, most state and federal courts that have considered the issue have applied the exclusionary rule to violations of the knock-and-announce requirement. In its decision on Thursday in Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360, the Supreme Court upheld a ruling by the Michigan Court of Appeals, one of the few courts to have rejected the exclusionary rule in this context.

In the case, the Detroit police had a warrant to search for drugs in the home of Booker T. Hudson Jr. At his unlocked door, they announced their presence, but did not knock and waited only three to five seconds before entering, not the 15 to 20 seconds suggested by the Supreme Court's precedents.

Had the police observed a longer wait, they would have executed the search warrant and found the evidence anyway, Justice Scalia said. That made the connection between the improper entry and the discovery of the evidence "too attenuated" to justify the "massive remedy of suppressing evidence of guilt."

Justice Scalia said the knock-and-announce rule was designed to protect life, property and dignity by giving the homeowner time to respond to the knock and eliminating the need for the police to break down the door. But he said the rule has never protected "one's interest in preventing the government from seeing or taking evidence described in a warrant."

Throughout his opinion, Justice Scalia made clear his view that the right at issue was a minimal, even trivial, one — "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes," he said at one point — that could not hold its own when balanced against the "grave adverse consequences that exclusion of relevant incriminating evidence always entails."

The majority opinion was sufficiently dismissive of the exclusionary rule as to serve as an invitation to bring a direct challenge to the rule in a future case.

Justice Scalia surveyed changes in the legal landscape since 1961, when the court in the landmark case Mapp v. Ohio made the exclusionary rule binding on the states. Noting that the purpose of the exclusionary rule was to deter constitutional violations by making them costly for the prosecution, Justice Scalia said there was less need for deterrence today, when the police are better trained and when the ability to bring civil rights suits against the government has greatly expanded. Under current federal law, he noted, successful civil rights plaintiffs are reimbursed for their attorney fees.

The conditions that made deterrence necessary "in different contexts and long ago" no longer exist, Justice Scalia said, adding that a strict application of the exclusionary rule as envisioned by the court in 1961 "would be forcing the public today to pay for the sins and inadequacies of a legal regime that existed almost half a century ago."

It is rare to find Justice Scalia, a self-described "originalist," incorporating evolving conditions into his constitutional analysis. Almost always, when the court in a constitutional case takes account of changing conditions, the result is an expansion of constitutional rights, rather than, as Justice Scalia advocated in this case, a contraction.

One puzzling aspect of the decision was a concurring opinion by Justice Kennedy, who said that he wished to underscore the point that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule, as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt." Nonetheless, he signed the part of Justice Scalia's opinion that suggested that the exclusionary rule rested on an increasingly weak foundation.

Justice Breyer argued that "the court destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement. And the court does so without significant support in precedent."

He called the majority's argument "an argument against the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary principle itself," adding, "And it is an argument that this court until now has consistently rejected."

Court Eases 'No Knock' Search Ban (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The Constitution does not require the government to forfeit evidence gathered through illegal "no knock" searches, the Supreme Court ruled yesterday, in a far-reaching ruling that could encourage police with search warrants to conduct more aggressive raids.

The 5 to 4 decision broke with the court's modern tradition of enforcing constitutional limitations on police investigations by keeping improperly obtained evidence out of court. The "exclusionary rule" has been imposed to protect a series of rights, such as the right to remain silent in police custody and the right against warrantless searches.

But the broadly worded majority opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., suggested that the nation has moved into a new era of improved policing in which such strong medicine may no longer be justified.

The ruling underscored the court's rightward shift since Alito replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who seemed to disagree with Scalia about the case while she was on the court. And it once again focused attention on the pivotal role of Kennedy, a moderate conservative, who supplied a fifth vote to the majority while issuing a separate concurring opinion that disavowed a portion of Scalia's opinion and asserted that it did not portend any broader erosion of the exclusionary rule.

At issue in yesterday's case, Hudson v. Michigan , No. 04-1360, was the "knock and announce" rule, which has deep roots in Anglo American law. In 1995, the court made it part of what defines a "reasonable search" under the Fourth Amendment, without saying how it should be enforced.

But most federal and state lower courts to consider the matter have ruled that it should be enforced through an "exclusionary rule," along with the rest of the Fourth Amendment.

Before yesterday's decision, police executing a search warrant in most jurisdictions had to worry that they might lose a case if they did not first knock on the door, announce themselves and wait a reasonable time for a response before forcing their way in.

Now, unless state law says otherwise, the most they would face is administrative discipline or a lawsuit for damages.

Civil liberties groups and defense lawyers had argued to the court that those deterrents are far too weak to enforce the "knock and announce" rule, which, they argued, is often all that stands between an innocent citizen and an errant SWAT team.

That position was urged on the Supreme Court by attorneys for Booker T. Hudson Jr., a Michigan man convicted of drug possession after police found crack cocaine in his pockets during a 1998 no-knock raid that the state admitted was unlawful.

But Michigan's Supreme Court was one of the few lower courts to reject an exclusionary rule for "knock and announce" violations. Hudson's conviction was upheld, and he appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Scalia's opinion focused on the guilty defendants who go free when otherwise valid evidence is thrown out of court. He concluded that that "social cost" is too high in relation to whatever additional privacy protection residents get from the "knock and announce" rule.

"Resort to the massive remedy of suppression of evidence of guilt is unjustified," Scalia wrote.

Scalia argued that the law enforcement landscape has changed dramatically since 1961, when the Supreme Court first imposed an exclusionary rule on the states to protect against warrantless searches. Today's police are more professional than those of 45 years ago, he observed, and there is "increasing evidence that police forces across the United States take the constitutional rights of citizens seriously."

In this environment, Scalia argued, lawsuits and administrative proceedings are enough to ensure that police comply with the "knock and announce" rule.

That line of reasoning prompted a 30-page dissenting opinion from Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who disputed Scalia's upbeat view of modern policing and argued that lawsuits and police discipline have already proved inadequate to punish and deter "knock and announce" violations.

"Today's opinion," Breyer wrote in dissent, "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Breyer.

Scalia's cost-benefit analysis could be invoked not only to deny a new exclusionary rule in this case, Breyer argued, but also to roll back the use of the exclusionary rule to enforce the Fourth Amendment in areas where it has long been recognized.

"The majority's 'substantial social costs' argument is an argument against the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary principle itself," Breyer wrote. "And it is an argument that this Court, until now, has consistently rejected."

Kennedy tried to diminish the apparent sweep of Scalia's opinion, indicating that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt."

There was strong circumstantial evidence that, if O'Connor had not been replaced by Alito, Breyer would have been speaking for the court.

In January, when the justices heard the case and cast tentative votes, Connor was still on the court. Her comments at argument suggested she favored Breyer's view.

But after she left the court Jan. 31, the court announced the case would be reargued -- a sign that it had reverted to a 4 to 4 tie without her vote.

High Court Eases 'Knock And Announce' Rule For Police (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court on Thursday weakened the longstanding "knock and announce" rule under which police must in most circumstances knock on the door, announce their presence, and wait briefly before forcibly entering a house with a search warrant.

Although not repealing the rule itself, Justice Antonin Scalia's 5-4 majority opinion said the traditional remedy for police violation of the rule -- namely, barring the use at trial of the evidence found -- is no longer required.

Citing the increasing professionalism of today's police and the availability of other remedies, such as civil rights suits under §1983 of Title 42 of the U.S. Code, Scalia said the "massive remedy" of exclusion of evidence was unwarranted and would invite a flood of allegations of police violation of the rule.

"The cost of entering this lottery," Scalia wrote, "would be small, but the jackpot enormous: suppression of all evidence, amounting in many cases to a get-out-of-jail-free card."

Scalia's ruling was confined to the context of the knock-and-announce rule, but some elements of it could apply more broadly, possibly setting the stage for a future attack on the exclusionary rule, which excludes from use at trial any evidence that is illegally obtained by police. That rule, first established by the Supreme Court for federal courts in 1914 and applied to states in 1961, has been a hardy but controversial tool for discouraging police misconduct.

Law enforcement advocates applauded the ruling. "Today's decision not to expand the exclusionary rule is very important to law enforcement," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. "Justice is best served when juries are allowed to consider all relevant evidence."

The ruling in Hudson v. Michigan, one of four handed down Thursday, was one sign that the much-heralded era of unanimity under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. may have been short-lived. And it also highlighted the impact of the Court's new lineup. When the Court first heard arguments in the Hudson case in January, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the Court and appeared sympathetic to defendant Booker Hudson Jr. The case was reheard in May after Justice Samuel Alito Jr. replaced O'Connor, and on Thursday he joined the Scalia majority against Hudson. Also in the majority were Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

In dissent, Justice Stephen Breyer said the ruling "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the dissent.

The decision also drew criticism from groups that have pointed to a sharp increase in recent years in no-knock, SWAT-type police raids on private homes, usually in pursuit of drugs. "Because of today's decision, we can expect to see an even more pronounced increase in the use of illegal, military-style no-knock raids," said Radley Balko of the Cato Institute, which filed a brief in the Hudson case. "We can expect to see more innocent civilians wrongly targeted."

Balko also discounted Scalia's reference to the alternative remedy of suing police officers under §1983, asserting that the courts had already "set the bar extremely high" against such suits.

In the case before the Court, lawyers for Detroit police acknowledged that they violated the traditional knock-and-announce rule when they entered Hudson's home in a drug bust. They shouted "Police, search warrant," but did not knock and waited less than five seconds before opening the unlocked door.

A state court judge suppressed the cocaine evidence that was obtained in the raid, but the Michigan Court of Appeals said the evidence should have been allowed because it would have been discovered even if the police had obeyed the rule.

Scalia said the "ancient" knock-and-announce rule protected valid interests that benefit police and homeowners. Police benefit because if they force their way into homes without announcement, those inside might shoot them as intruders. It also "protects those elements of privacy and dignity that can be destroyed by a sudden entrance," Scalia said, by allowing inhabitants to pull on clothes or get out of bed.

But the Court has already allowed police to ignore the rule if the circumstances "present a threat of physical violence" or if there is reason to believe that waiting would lead to the destruction of evidence inside.

The Court also ruled Thursday in Howard Delivery Service v. Zurich American Insurance Co. that insurance company claims for unpaid workers' compensation premiums are not entitled to priority in bankruptcy proceedings. And in Kircher v. Putnam Funds Trust, the Court ruled that federal appeals courts have no jurisdiction to second-guess lower court decisions to remand to state court lawsuits filed under the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998. The ruling is a defeat for investment companies that seek to keep investor class actions out of state courts.

Supreme Court Gives Police More Power (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

Police who burst into a private building without first knocking and announcing their presence can use evidence they discover in a criminal case.

In a boost to aggressive police tactics and a setback to the privacy rights of business and home owners, the US Supreme Court has rejected the legal principle that evidence obtained in violation of the so-called knock-and-announce rule must be excluded from use at a trial.

Instead, the high court said in a 5-to-4 decision announced Thursday that such evidence can be used at trial. The social costs of excluding evidence because of a violation of the knock-and-announce rule are considerable, the high court said.

"Resort to the massive remedy of suppressing evidence of guilt is unjustified," writes Justice Antonin Scalia for the majority. He was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, and Justices Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, and Samuel Alito.

The decision marks a rejection - in the context of knock-and-announce - of a basic safeguard in the criminal justice system established in the 1960s by the high court under then Chief Justice Earl Warren. That court adopted the approach that violations of certain procedural requirements by law enforcement officials could carry the heavy penalty of exclusion of evidence from use at a trial.

The process created an incentive for police officers to not only know the law, but to scrupulously follow it while carrying out their criminal investigations.

"The court destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement," Justice Stephen Breyer writes in a dissent, joined by three other justices.

He says he could find no legal precedent supporting the high court's ruling in any of the Fourth Amendment privacy cases decided since 1914. "It represents a significant departure from the court's precedents," Justice Breyer writes. "And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection."

The decision is "very disturbing," says David Moran, a law professor at Wayne State University Law School who argued the case at the Supreme Court. "It seems to rethink the entire exclusionary rule, which is the only thing that has caused the police for the past 50 years to generally comply with the Fourth Amendment."

The decision comes in a case called Hudson v. Michigan. It stems from an August 1998 search by seven Detroit police officers of the home of Booker Hudson. The police obtained a warrant to search for weapons and drugs at Mr. Hudson's home. When they arrived at the front door, an officer shouted: "Police, search warrant." They paused for three to five seconds before one of the officers turned the doorknob and entered the home through the unlocked front door. They did not knock, nor did they wait to see if anyone would answer the door in response to their shout, according to briefs filed in the case.

Police rushed into the house and saw Hudson seated in a chair in the living room. Five other men and women were running throughout the house, the briefs say. In the search that followed, police discovered in the chair in which Hudson had been sitting crack cocaine in plastic bags and a loaded revolver. In Hudson's pockets, police found five rocks of cocaine and $225 in cash.

Hudson was charged with possession with intent to deliver cocaine and possession of a firearm while committing a crime. He was convicted and sentenced to 18 months probation.

On appeal, his lawyer argued that the gun and drugs should have been suppressed because of the improper tactics used by police during the search. The state appeals court upheld the conviction and the Michigan Supreme Court declined to hear the case.

In affirming the conviction, the US Supreme Court said that applying the exclusionary rule to knock-and-announce violations is not "worth a lot" as a deterrent. Instead, it creates an incentive for criminal defendants to attack police conduct, Scalia writes.

"The cost of entering this lottery would be small, but the jackpot enormous; suppression of all evidence, amounting in many cases to a get-out-of-jail-free card," Scalia writes.

Top Court Upholds No-knock Police Search (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland

AP2, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court made it easier Thursday for police to barge into homes and seize evidence without knocking or waiting, a sign of the court's new conservatism with Samuel Alito on board.

The court, on a 5-4 vote, said judges cannot throw out evidence collected by police who have search warrants but do not properly announce their arrival.

It was a significant rollback of earlier rulings protective of homeowners, even unsympathetic homeowners like Booker Hudson, who had a loaded gun next to him and cocaine rocks in his pocket when Detroit police entered his unlocked home in 1998 without knocking.

The court's five-member conservative majority, anchored by new Chief Justice John Roberts and Alito, said that police blunders should not result in "a get-out-of-jail-free card" for defendants.

Dissenting justices predicted that police will now feel free to ignore previous court rulings requiring officers with search warrants to knock and announce themselves to avoid running afoul of the Constitution's Fourth Amendment ban on unreasonable searches.

"The knock-and-announce rule is dead in the United States," said David Moran, a Wayne State University professor who represented Hudson. "There are going to be a lot more doors knocked down. There are going to be a lot more people terrified and humiliated."

Supporters said the ruling will help police do their jobs.

"People who are caught red-handed with evidence of guilt have one less weapon to get off," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation.

The case provides the clearest sign yet of the court without Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Hudson had lost his case in a Michigan appeals court. Justices agreed to hear his appeal last June, four days before O'Connor's surprise announcement that she was retiring.

O'Connor was still on the bench in January when his case was first argued, and she seemed ready to vote with Hudson. "Is there no policy of protecting the home owner a little bit and the sanctity of the home from this immediate entry?" she asked.

She retired before the case was decided, and a new argument was held this spring so that Alito could participate, apparently to break a 4-4 tie.

Four justices, including Alito and Roberts, would have given prosecutors a more sweeping victory but did not have the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative.

Ronald Allen, a Northwestern University Law professor, said the ruling "suggests those four would be happy to consider overturning" a 1961 Supreme Court opinion that said evidence collected in violation of the Fourth Amendment cannot be used in trials. "It would be a significant change," he said.

Kennedy joined in most of the ruling but wrote to explain that he did not support ending the knock requirement. "It bears repeating that it is a serious matter if law enforcement officers violate the sanctity of the home by ignoring the requisites of lawful entry," he said.

Kennedy said that legislatures can intervene if police officers do not "act competently and lawfully." He also said that people whose homes are wrongly searched can file a civil rights lawsuit.

Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, said that there are public-interest law firms and attorneys who specialize in civil rights grievances.

Detroit police acknowledge violating the knock-and-announce rule when they called out their presence at Hudson's door, failed to knock, then went inside three seconds to five seconds later. The court has endorsed longer waits, of 15 seconds to 20 seconds. Hudson was convicted of drug possession.

"Whether that preliminary misstep had occurred or not, the police would have executed the warrant they had obtained, and would have discovered the gun and drugs inside the house," Scalia wrote.

Four justices complained in the dissent that the decision erases more than 90 years of Supreme Court precedent.

"It weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," Justice Stephen Breyer wrote for himself and Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Breyer said that while police departments can be sued, there is no evidence of anyone collecting much money in such cases.

The case is Hudson v. Michigan, 04-1360.

Supreme Court Weakens Police 'Knock And Announce' Rule (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0034747

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court ruled Thursday that police armed with a search warrant may rush into a house without giving a required warning to the occupants and may use the evidence they find there.

In a 5-4 decision, the court said it would be rash to bar evidence in a criminal trial simply because police did not wait long enough before entering, a technical violation of the "knock and announce" rule.

Criminals should not be handed a "get out of jail free card" in cases where the police have a valid search warrant, said Justice Antonin Scalia, who wrote the opinion for the majority.

The dissenters said the court's ruling all but repealed a decision that had protected the privacy and dignity of homeowners.

New Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. cast the decisive vote. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor heard the case when it was argued in January but retired in February before the case was decided. At that point, the court was evenly split. The case was reargued when Alito replaced her, and he became the tie-breaker.

Until Thursday, the court had usually insisted that evidence be thrown out in cases where the police violate the Constitution's ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures." This so-called exclusionary rule was among the most controversial legal developments of the 1960s, and many law-and-order conservatives continue to chafe at it.

Scalia is among them. Suppressing evidence should be "our last resort, not our first impulse," he said, and his opinion was joined in full by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Clarence Thomas and Alito.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy voted with the majority but wrote separately to emphasize that the exclusionary rule is "settled" and "not in doubt." The issue in this case, Kennedy wrote, was whether the police's failure to give a proper warning even when they had a valid warrant to enter a home, merited an extension of the exclusionary rule.

In 1995, the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually requires officers to knock on the door and call out "Police!" before they burst into a home. This rule helps ensure the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then.

Officers have been advised in other cases that they should usually wait about 20 seconds after knocking and announcing their presence before trying to enter a house, but the court has said in past rulings that officers may move faster if they suspect residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet.

In the current case, Detroit police admitted they did not wait long before entering the home of Booker T. Hudson Jr.

They had obtained a search warrant to look for drugs and guns at his residence. On a summer afternoon in 1998, seven officers approached Hudson's house and saw nothing unusual. Several called out "Police! Search warrant!" but less than five seconds later, the lead officer turned the doorknob and walked into the living room.

There sat Hudson with 23 bags that contained crack cocaine. Under the cushion of his chair, they also found a loaded revolver and five rocks of cocaine. Elsewhere in the house, police found more bags of drugs.

Hudson was charged with drug and gun crimes, but his lawyers urged the judge to suppress the evidence because police had violated the "knock and announce" rule.

A prosecutor agreed the police had violated the rule, and a trial judge suppressed the evidence. But the Michigan Supreme Court disagreed and said disallowing the evidence was "not an appropriate remedy" for such a violation.

Hudson appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which agreed last year to hear his case.

Scalia said this was not an instance where police obtained evidence by breaking the law. They had a valid warrant to search for and seize the drugs. Since the homeowner's privacy rights were not violated, "the exclusionary rule is inapplicable," he said in Hudson vs. Michigan.

The four dissenters said the requirement to "knock and announce" will be meaningless if it can be ignored and the evidence used in court.

Thursday's decision "represents a significant departure from the court's precedents. And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," wrote Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

Scalia responded that people like Hudson still have recourse against the city and the police by suing them for violating their constitutional rights. He also pointed to the "increasing professionalism of police forces, including a new emphasis on internal police discipline."

These checks, he suggested, will deter the police from being overly aggressive and reckless.

Breyer scoffed at this notion and insisted that the exclusionary rule was adopted because it was the only effective deterrent for misconduct by the police.

In 1914, the Supreme Court first announced the exclusionary rule but applied it only to federal agents who violated the Constitution. Even then, it was a disputed notion. Benjamin Cardozo, then a New York state judge, said in 1926 that "the criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered."

The Supreme Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren gave this rule a national reach in 1961 when it said evidence must be suppressed when state and local police violate the 4th Amendment. Critics charged the Warren Court was too friendly to the rights of criminal defendants at the expense of law enforcement.

The high court has issued a mixed bag of rulings on the exclusionary rule in recent cases. The justices have given police more leeway to search cars and their passengers, but they have usually held the line against searches of homes without a warrant.

In March, the court ruled the police had violated the rights of a Georgia homeowner who disagreed with his wife and refused to consent to their entering his residence. In that 5-3 decision, Kennedy sided with the court's liberal faction.

Last month, the justices in a 9-0 decision said police may enter a home without a warrant to break up a fight in progress.

Evidence Allowed In No-knock Raid (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Evidence seized by police officers who have a warrant but fail to follow the "knock and announce" rule before entering a suspect's home is still admissible in court, a divided 5-4 Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, said a long-established knock-and-announce rule never was intended to protect a person's right to prevent the government "from seeing or taking evidence described in a warrant."

Justice Scalia, noting that Detroit police admitted that they violated the rule in a drug raid, said that regardless of the "misstep," the officers would have seized the drugs and gun inside the house when executing the warrant.

The majority opinion said allowing judges to throw out such incriminating evidence "always entails ... the risk of releasing dangerous criminals ..." and would "generate a constant flood of alleged failures to observe the rule."

"Another consequence ... would be police officers' refraining from timely entry after knocking and announcing ... producing preventable violence against officers in some cases, and the destruction of evidence in many others," Justice Scalia wrote.

Joining in the majority opinion were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The minority opinion, written by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, called the ruling "doubly troubling." It "destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce" and did so "without significant support in precedent."

"I can find nothing persuasive in the majority's opinion that could justify its refusal to apply the rule," Justice Breyer said. "Without that unlawful entry they would not have been inside the house; so there would have been no discovery.

"Of course, had the police entered the house lawfully, they would have found the gun and drugs. But that fact is beside the point," he said.

Justice Breyer was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

The Cato Institute called the ruling "regrettable."

"Because of today's decision, we can expect to see an even more pronounced increase in the use of illegal, military-style no-knock raids. And we can expect to see more innocent civilians wrongly targeted," the Cato Institute said in a statement.

But Kent Scheidegger, legal director for the California-based Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, applauded the ruling, saying the court's refusal to expand the exclusionary rule for evidence was "very important to law enforcement."

"The knock-and-announce rule regulates how to conduct a search rather than whether a search can take place," he said.

The case involved an Aug. 27, 1998, arrest by Detroit police who had obtained a search warrant for drugs and guns at the home of Booker Hudson. After entering the home, police found large quantities of drugs, including rock cocaine in Hudson's pocket, and a loaded gun lodged between the cushion and armrest of the chair in which he was sitting.

Hudson was charged with unlawful drug and firearm possession. Later, he was convicted on drug charges, acquitted on the firearm charge and sentenced to 18 months' probation. He challenged the arrest, saying the unannounced entry by police violated his Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures.

In 1995, the Supreme Court ruled in an Arkansas case that the Fourth Amendment required police officers executing search warrants to knock and announce their presence before entering. The decision also recognized that in some circumstances a search still would be legal without a knock-and-announce by police.

Former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Justice Alito replaced, appeared to oppose the Detroit search when the case was argued in January and was expected to have voted against it.

Supreme Court Backs Wide Police Search Powers (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - A divided Supreme Court said Thursday that police with search warrants who barged into homes without knocking didn't risk having evidence they uncovered tossed out at trial, a ruling that civil liberties advocates called a major blow to privacy protections.

The 5-4 decision turns on a distinction drawn between how police enter a home and what they find once they're inside.

Yes, the so-called knock-and-announce rule is violated when police fail to announce their presence and wait a reasonable amount of time before entering someone's home. But no, that violation isn't sufficiently related to what they find during a search to justify banning drugs, guns or any other evidence that's uncovered from later criminal proceedings.

Justice Antonin Scalia said the increasing professionalism of police and the threat of civil suits was enough of a deterrent to keep officers from abusing their authority.

To exclude evidence from a trial merely because of an entry violation, the court said, would unnecessarily increase the risk of "grave, adverse" consequences, including the technical exoneration of guilty - and often dangerous - criminals.

The "jackpot" for criminals would be enormous, wrote Scalia, who was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito. He said the court essentially would be issuing "get-out-of-jail-free" cards if it indulged suppression of evidence based on an entry violation.

Scalia, Roberts, Thomas and Alito went further, and seemed to question decades of precedents on the exclusionary rule, which calls for booting evidence when police break the law during a search. Kennedy didn't join that part of the opinion, however, and wrote a concurrence that said the exclusionary rule wasn't in jeopardy.

Justice Stephen Breyer penned a sharp dissent that accused the court of misreading its own precedents and defying "elementary logic." Compliance with knock-and-announce procedure is one way that the court judges the reasonableness of a search under the Constitution's Fourth Amendment, he wrote. And the threat of losing valuable evidence for defying the rules is the "driving purpose" behind provisions such as the knock-and-announce requirement.

The court's ruling means that a Detroit man's conviction for drug possession stands, despite the fact that police rushed into his home without knocking. Once inside, they found crack cocaine in Booker Hudson's pockets.

Hudson's attorneys, relying on a line of court decisions over the last decade, said the officers' failure to knock and announce themselves before entering made the evidence they obtained the "fruit" of a "poisonous tree."

That idea is bedrock in Fourth Amendment law, which governs when and how government may search a citizen's home or person. It presumes, most of the time, that any illegal action during a search taints all the evidence that's turned up. It's the reason that confessions that come after a beating aren't any good and that an unreasonable search performed without a warrant can't help convict someone.

Scalia wrote, though, that "the interests protected by the knock-and-announce requirement are quite different." He said the rule was intended to protect police whose unannounced entry might trigger a self-defense instinct by a homeowner, to give citizens the chance to comply with requests for police access and to give homeowners time to "collect" themselves before answering the door.

Those interests don't extend to shielding relevant evidence from government eyes, he wrote.

Breyer said the court's opinion "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." He said separating the manner of entry from the ensuing search "slices the violation too finely." He said the failure to knock and announce wasn't an independent event, but a "factor that renders the search constitutionally defective."

High Court Allows Use Of Evidence Taken In Violation Of Knock Rule (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Prosecutors can use evidence taken in violation of the Fourth Amendment requirement that police knock and announce themselves before entering a home, the Supreme Court ruled.

The 5-4 opinion, by Justice Antonin Scalia, acknowledged that such entries are unconstitutional, but not serious enough to invoke the traditional sanction for unlawful searches: exclusion of the evidence they yield.

Plus, read the Supreme Court opinions in Hudson v. Michigan3, Empire Healthchoice v. McVeigh4, Howard Delivery Service v. Zurich American Insurance5 and Kircher v. Putnam Funds6, by arrangement with FindLaw.

The price of applying the so-called exclusionary rule sometimes includes "setting the guilty free and the dangerous at large," Justice Scalia wrote. Other remedies, such as civil damages or internal discipline by a police department, were adequate for violations of "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes."

In a dissent by Justice Stephen Breyer, the court's four liberal-leaning members argued that such remedies largely were illusory, and thus the majority "destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement."

Justice Clarence Thomas and President George W. Bush's two appointees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, joined the majority. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the dissent.

The case was argued in January when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was on the court, and reargued after she retired. Justice Anthony Kennedy -- seen as inheriting the court's ideological midpoint from Justice O'Connor -- concurred in the result, but he wrote separately, suggesting stronger remedies might be needed for a "demonstrated pattern of knock-and-announce violations."

The case came from Detroit, where police bearing a warrant to search for drugs and guns waited several seconds after shouting, "Police, search warrant," to enter a suspect's house. Inside, they found what they were looking for. Prosecutors conceded police violated the rule, and the trial judge threw out the evidence. A Michigan appeals court reversed, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court.

Police officers generally are required to give a suspect a chance to voluntarily admit them inside their home before entering and searching it. Justice Scalia explained three purposes behind the knock-and-announce rule: keeping surprised occupants from reflexively attacking intruding police; sparing residents the cost of repairing broken doors; and safeguarding "elements of privacy and dignity."

But the rule "has never protected ... one's interest in preventing the government" from obtaining evidence listed in a warrant, Justice Scalia wrote. Had police obeyed the rule, it might have delayed their entry by several more seconds, but they would have found the evidence anyway.

Zealous enforcement of the knock-and-announce rule would tie courts in knots, he wrote, forcing them to spend hours deciding "how many seconds' wait are too few."

Justice Breyer's dissent accused the majority of abandoning doctrines that had developed since 1914, when the court first imposed the exclusionary rule on federal officers.

DOJ_NMG_0034751

The dissent noted many exceptions to the knock-and-announce rule already exist, including when police reasonably suspect that obeying it would expose them to danger or allow suspects to destroy evidence.

(Hudson v. Michigan)

Separately, the justices found a federal appeals court erroneously dismissed a suit by mutual-fund holders who claimed managers facilitated market timing, or the practice in which investors find ways to buy into a mutual fund before the fund's price fully reflects underlying movements of the stocks in that fund, profiting from the discrepancy.

The decision sent the suit back to the state court where it originally was filed -- but under another high-court ruling from March, it likely will be dismissed again.

The Don't-Bother-to-Knock Rule (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday substantially diminished Americans' right to privacy in their own homes. The rule that police officers must "knock and announce" themselves before entering a private home is a venerable one, and a well-established part of Fourth Amendment law. But President Bush's two recent Supreme Court appointments have now provided the votes for a 5-4 decision eviscerating this rule.

This decision should offend anyone, liberal or conservative, who worries about the privacy rights of ordinary Americans.

The case arose out of the search of Booker T. Hudson's home in Detroit in 1998. The police announced themselves but did not knock, and after waiting a few seconds, entered his home and seized drugs and a gun. There is no dispute that the search violated the knock-and-announce rule.

The question in the case was what to do about it. Mr. Hudson wanted the evidence excluded at his trial. That is precisely what should have happened. Since 1914, the Supreme Court has held that, except in rare circumstances, evidence seized in violation of the Constitution cannot be used. The exclusionary rule has sometimes been criticized for allowing criminals to go free just because of police error. But as the court itself recognized in that 1914 case, if this type of evidence were admissible, the Fourth Amendment "might as well be stricken."

The court ruled yesterday that the evidence could be used against Mr. Hudson. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, argued that even if police officers did not have to fear losing a case if they disobeyed the knock-and-announce rule, the subjects of improper searches could still bring civil lawsuits to challenge them. But as the dissenters rightly pointed out, there is little chance that such suits would keep the police in line. Justice Scalia was also far too dismissive of the important privacy rights at stake, which he essentially reduced to "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes." Justice Stephen Breyer noted in dissent that even a century ago the court recognized that when the police barge into a house unannounced, it is an assault on "the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life."

If Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had stayed on the court, this case might well have come out the other way. For those who worry that Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito will take the court in a radically conservative direction, it is sobering how easily the majority tossed aside a principle that traces back to 13th-century Britain, and a legal doctrine that dates to 1914, to let the government invade people's homes.

Court To Cops: Knock The Door Down (LAT)

IN A DECISION THAT MIGHT HAVE gone the other way if Justice Sandra Day O'Connor hadn't retired, the U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday needlessly gutted a venerable protection for personal privacy. By a 5-4 vote — with Samuel A. Alito Jr., O'Connor's replacement, in the majority — the justices ruled that Detroit police who entered a suspect's home unlawfully would not suffer the usual penalty for an illegal search: exclusion of the evidence at trial.

The court upheld the conviction of Booker T. Hudson, who was arrested after police, armed with a warrant, found drugs and firearms in his apartment. So what was the problem with the search? As the state of Michigan conceded, the police violated a 4th Amendment rule requiring that they make their presence known to the target of the search before rushing in.

This "knock and announce" rule is not a newfangled creation of softheaded liberal judges. Even Justice Antonin Scalia, the author of the majority opinion in this case, conceded that "the common-law principle that law enforcement officers must announce their presence and provide residents an opportunity to open the door is an ancient one." But having identified that principle, Scalia went on to trash it by holding that the evidence the police found could be used against Hudson at trial.

Reaching that conclusion required some heavy-duty legal hair-splitting. The seizure of the evidence, Scalia wrote, did not result from the officers' refusal to announce themselves and wait more than a few seconds for the door to be opened. "Whether that preliminary misstep had occurred or not," Scalia argued, "the police would have executed the warrant they had obtained and would have discovered the gun and drugs inside the house."

Dissenting Justice Stephen Breyer countered persuasively that the question was what the officers actually did. "Although the police might have entered Hudson's home lawfully," Breyer wrote for himself and three colleagues, "they did not in fact do so. Their unlawful behavior inseparably characterizes their actual entry; that entry was a necessary condition of their presence in Hudson's home; and their presence in Hudson's home was a necessary condition of their finding and seizing the evidence."

The dispute between Scalia and Breyer is more than an abstract law school debate. It has ominous real-world consequences. If police feel they needn't announce their presence before executing a warrant, some of them won't — sometimes endangering themselves, sometimes endangering the occupants of the residence they have arrived to search. Scalia's opinion gives the police exactly that sort of blank check by removing the best deterrent to police misconduct: the exclusion of evidence at trial.

Many Americans may shake their heads at the idea that, as the late Justice Benjamin Cardozo once complained, the "criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." Yet holding police accountable protects not only criminals but anyone who might be the target of overreaching or reckless police conduct. One of the officers who served the warrant on Hudson said that, after announcing themselves, police waited about as long as "it took me to go in the door." Is that the way you'd want to be served with a warrant?

A TR 'Nut' Savors His Big Find (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 16, 2006

For 17 years, Robert Goldman policed the art world as a federal prosecutor based in Philadelphia. He helped recover $150 million worth of stolen artifacts - works by Rembrandt and Norman Rockwell, gold Peruvian body armor, an original copy of the Bill of Rights.

But it wasn't until this week that Goldman snagged his white whale, an artifact that disappeared in 1990, shortly after he began working the art-crime beat.

It was Teddy Roosevelt's priceless Colt revolver, the one the future president carried as he led his famous charge up San Juan Heights during the Spanish-American War. Someone had stolen it from a display case on the grounds of Sagamore Hill National Historic Site in Long Island, N.Y., Roosevelt's home from 1885 until his death in 1919.

"I felt like a kid returning it," said Goldman, now a lawyer in private practice with Fox Rothschild L.L.P. in Philadelphia. "I'm a Roosevelt nut."

To say that Goldman is a TR aficionado is like saying Gov. Rendell likes to snack now and then. The lawyer owns 150 books on Roosevelt and credits the colorful president with "shaping modern America." He also sports a drooping, bushy TR mustache.

"Bob's got what one would call a period look going," said Amy Verone, the curator at the historic site.

Goldman and his former partner, FBI agent Robert Wittman, returned the gun to Cove Neck during a brief ceremony Wednesday. As he posed for pictures with the weapon, the 53-year-old lawyer grinned like a star-struck groupie.

"I felt like a kid; my wits weren't with me while I was there," he said. "I felt a good connection with TR. For me, just the fact that I can help recover something for someone who is my hero or mentor or whatever, it's fabulous. It's history."

The .38-caliber revolver was given to Roosevelt in 1898 by his brother-in-law, a diver who recovered it from the USS Maine, the ship whose sinking sparked the Spanish-American War. Roosevelt carried it up the hill to honor the soldiers who died.

"This revolver is one of the icons one associates with Theodore Roosevelt, along with his Rough Rider uniform and hat," said Greg Marshall, the superintendent at Sagamore Hill.

After the gun was stolen from Sagamore Hill in 1990, Goldman and Wittman tried for years to track it.

"Whenever we'd go to gun shows, we'd ask dealers about it," Goldman said. "We got nothing."

Goldman vowed to find it before he retired this year as a prosecutor. He left the government in April, a few months after the gun was discovered, and two months before its formal return. Goldman said the couple who had the gun won't be prosecuted - or identified - because there's not enough evidence to determine who stole it.

"As investigations go, it turned out that this one wasn't very juicy," he said.

Late last year, out of nowhere, a man from Daytona Beach, Fla., called employees at Sagamore Hill to say he knew how to find the gun.

"We'd had false starts before," said Verone, who recalled speaking with the man. "We weren't sure initially."

The man explained that he was having an affair with a woman whose husband had the Roosevelt weapon. He offered to try to fetch it.

"He had been shown the gun," Verone said. "And he kept saying, 'It doesn't belong to the person who has it. It belongs to Theodore Roosevelt. It belongs to the American people. It belongs at home.' "

Park Service employees called Wittman, and within two hours, he had agents at from the bureau's Daytona Beach office meet the man to recover the gun.

"It was not exactly a rugged investigation," Verone said. "A guy calls you on the phone and gives you a gift. Hey, I'm happy to have the gift."

It was a bit more than a gift, the FBI agent said. "Luck is the result of a lot of preparation that allows you take advantage of situations when they happen," Wittman said.

Goldman agreed. No matter how the case was solved, it seemed perfect that it became his last as a prosecutor.

Ky. Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brett Barrouquere, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

(AP) - LOUISVILLE, Ky.-The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the mental age of a death row inmate does not prevent the state from executing him.

An attorney for Thomas Clyde Bowling had argued that the inmate had the mental capacity of an 11-year-old when he killed two people in Lexington in 1990, citing testimony from psychologists.

The state high court in Frankfort noted the U.S. Supreme Court's decision last year barring executions for killers who were not at least 18 years old at the time of the crime, but said the ruling did not specifically prohibit putting to death someone with a mental age below that.

"There is simply no language to support such a conclusion," Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in a 5-0 opinion.

Johnstone wrote that there is some validity to the idea put forth by Bowling's attorneys, but that the federal high court intentionally established chronological age, not mental age, as the deciding factor.

Defense attorneys have 20 days to ask for a rehearing from the high court and they said Thursday they would seek one.

Bowling's attorney, David Barron, said he was heartened that the court said the mental age argument had merit.

"This court recognized this as a valid legal concept that all courts should be concerned about," Barron said.

Vicki Glass, a spokeswoman for Kentucky Attorney General Greg Stumbo, called the ruling "an important step toward carrying out the jury's verdict."

Bowling, 53, also has asked a federal judge to stop his execution on the grounds that he is mentally retarded.

The state supreme court rejected the claim last year, saying they found no conclusive evidence that Bowling was mentally retarded. His IQ has ranged from the mid-60s to mid-70s in different tests.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2002 bars execution of the mentally retarded as unconstitutionally cruel, but left states to decided how to ensure that mentally retarded people are not executed.

DOJ_NMG_0034754

In a case still under review by the Kentucky Supreme Court, Bowling also has challenged the legality of lethal injection.

Bowling originally was scheduled to be executed in November 2004 for shooting Lexington residents Eddie and Tina Earley outside their dry cleaning business. Their 2-year-old son also was shot in the assault but survived.

The End Of Innocence (NYT)

By David R. Dow

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Houston

EARLIER this week, the Supreme Court decided, in a 5-to-3 opinion, that a Tennessee prison inmate named Paul G. House was entitled to prove he did not commit the crime for which he was sent to death row. On the same day, I received a letter from Centurion Ministries, which argued for more than a decade that a Virginia man named Roger K. Coleman had not committed the crime for which he was executed in 1992. The letter admitted that Centurion had been wrong.

These cases have something in common: they pivot on the question of innocence. For too many years now, though, death penalty opponents have seized on the nightmare of executing an innocent man as a tactic to erode support for capital punishment in America.

Innocence is a distraction. Most people on death row are like Roger Coleman, not Paul House, which is to say that most people on death row did what the state said they did. But that does not mean they should be executed.

Focusing on innocence forces abolitionists into silence when a cause célèbre turns out to be guilty. When the DNA testing ordered by Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia proved that Mr. Coleman was a murderer, and a good liar besides, abolitionists wrung their hands about how to respond. They seemed sorry that he had been guilty after all.

I, too, am a death penalty opponent, but I was happy to learn that Mr. Coleman was a murderer. I was happy that the prosecutors would not have to live with the guilt of knowing that they sent an innocent man to death row.

The day before the DNA results were reported in the Coleman case last January, the Supreme Court heard oral arguments in the Paul House case. In Mr. House's case, the DNA testing has already been done, and it tends to suggest that he is indeed innocent. During oral arguments, however, Justice Antonin Scalia (who was one of the three dissenters when the court decided the case this week) argued that disputes over factual findings in a case can't be endlessly rehashed.

He is certainly right about that. As Justice Scalia has said elsewhere, of course we are going to execute innocent people if we have the death penalty. The criminal justice system is made up of human beings, and fallible beings make mistakes.

But perhaps that is a price society is willing to pay. If the death penalty is worth having, it might still be worth having, despite the occasional loss of innocent life. Paul House might be innocent, but how long will we keep death row inmates alive, waiting to find out?

In Mr. Coleman's case, the Virginia Supreme Court did not address the arguments that he had raised in his appeal, because his lawyer had filed the papers one day late. When the case got to the United States Supreme Court, the court, in an opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, began its analysis by saying, "This is a case about federalism."

The case did have something to do with the relationship between the Supreme Court and Virginia's highest court. But is that what the case was really about? Mr. Coleman was saying that his trial lawyer had been incompetent, and that the Virginia courts were refusing to address the question of whether his trial lawyer had been incompetent because his appellate lawyer had filed the appeal a day late.

Federalism might be a plot line in this story, but it hardly seems to be the major issue. When the Supreme Court brushed aside Mr. Coleman's appeal 15 years ago, the justices said that a death row inmate cannot complain when his lawyer misses a filing deadline, because the lawyer is the agent of the client, and clients are responsible for the failings of their agents.

As a result of this syllogism, my client Johnny Joe Martinez was executed in 2002, because his court-appointed appellate lawyer neglected to file a proper appeal — a mistake he freely admitted to, attributing it to inexperience. When the Martinez case reached the federal courts, those courts, invoking the Coleman decision, said too bad for Mr. Martinez; the mistake of his lawyer was attributable to him. I could go on with other examples.

Of the 50 or so death row inmates I have represented, I have serious doubts about the guilt of three or four — that is, 6 to 8 percent, about what scholars estimate to be the percentage of innocent people on death row.

In 98 percent of the cases, however, in 49 out of 50, there were appalling violations of legal principles: prosecutors struck jurors based on their race; the police hid or manufactured evidence; prosecutors reached secret deals with jailhouse snitches; lab analysts misrepresented forensic results. Most of the cases do not involve bogus claims of innocence, like the one that swirled for 15 years around Roger Coleman, but the government corruption that the federal courts overlook so that the states can go about their business of executing.

The House case will make it hard for abolitionists to shift their focus from the question of innocence, but that is what they ought to do. They ought to focus on the far more pervasive problem: that the machinery of death in America is lawless, and in carrying out death sentences, we violate our legal principles nearly all of the time.

VA Data Theft Not Linked To Other Crimes (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, June 15, 2006

Police investigating the theft of private data on 26.5 million veterans and military troops said Thursday they have no evidence the crime is related to other burglaries in which computers were resold after the hard drives were erased.

Police said they still believe the May 3 burglary was random and that thieves were not aware of the data when they stole a personal laptop and external hard drive from a Veterans Affairs employee's Aspen Hill, Md., home.

Last week, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress that the VA remained hopeful that the May 3 burglary was a random theft, noting there had been no evidence any of the information had been used for identity theft.

Explaining police's theory in the case, Nicholson said: "They believe that these were young burglars whose goal was to get computers and computer peripheral equipment. And from other houses, like they did this house, they took a laptop and hard drive, and overlooked other valuable or semi-valuable things."

"They further think that their M.O. is to take these things, clean them up — actually erase them — and then fence them into a market for college campuses and high schools," he said.

But on Thursday, police in Montgomery County, Md., investigating the theft said that was not necessarily the case.

"It would be wrong to think that this is the only theory being considered," said spokeswoman Lucille Bauer. "We still believe there is more of a chance this was a random burglary, but we have no evidence to link this to other cases at this time."

Veterans groups have criticized the VA for a three-week delay in publicizing the May 3 burglary. The VA disclosed the burglary May 22, saying it involved the names, birth dates and Social Security numbers — and in some cases, disability codes — of veterans discharged since 1975.

Since then, it has also acknowledged that phone numbers and addresses of many of those veterans, as well as personal data for 2.2 million active-duty military, Guard and Reserve personnel, also may have been included.

On Thursday, Maryland police began distributing flyers in Aspen Hill offering a $50,000 reward for information related to the stolen Hewlett-Packard laptop and external drive. The FBI, which is also investigating, has noted that "unless the equipment is recovered, veterans will never be certain their personal information is safe."

People are asked to call 1-800-CALL-FBI or 1-866-411-TIPS if anyone purchased after May 3 a secondhand HP Pavilion Notebook Laptop, which it said could be identified as either model number zv5360us or 5300 series, or a HP External Personal Media Drive.

Investigators said it is possible the two items were sold separately. Those who turn in the equipment anonymously also may become eligible for the reward.

Malvo Claims 4 Other Shootings, Source Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Eric Rich

Lee Boyd Malvo told law enforcement officials this spring that he and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad are responsible for four shootings across the country that have not been publicly attributed to them, a source familiar with the case said.

A second source confirmed that investigators have received information implicating the snipers in those shootings, which claimed the lives of two men and wounded two others in the months before the October 2002 slayings that terrorized the Washington region. The sources declined to speak for attribution because of the sensitivity of the information.

Malvo was interviewed extensively by law enforcement officials in preparation for his testimony at Muhammad's trial last month in Maryland.

It is unclear to what degree, if any, authorities have corroborated Malvo's new claims. He has provided conflicting accounts of shootings in the past and testified last month that he lied to investigators after he and Muhammad were arrested.

The claims bring the list of confirmed and suspected sniper shootings to 27, including 17 homicides, and add two states to the list of jurisdictions that could file charges against Muhammad and Malvo.

The first previously undisclosed homicide victim was a man shot in California in February or March 2002. The second was a 37-year-old Texas man shot in the head from a distance May 27 in a sparsely populated area of Denton, about 40 miles northwest of Dallas.

The two survivors are a 76-year-old Tucson man shot May 18, 2002, at a golf course in west-central Florida and a 54-year-old Louisiana man robbed and shot Aug. 1, 2002, after leaving a shopping mall in Hammond, about 45 miles east of Baton Rouge.

Malvo also said recently that the pair was involved in five homicides and two nonfatal shootings outside the Washington area to which they had previously been linked by varying amounts of physical and circumstantial evidence.

These are the slayings of Keenya Cook, 21, of Tacoma, Wash.; Jerry Ray Taylor, 60, of Tucson; Million A. Woldemariam, 41, of Atlanta; Claudine Lee Parker, 52, of Montgomery, Ala.; and Hong Im Ballenger, 45, of Baton Rouge. The survivors are Kellie Adams, 27, of Montgomery; and Wright Williams Jr., 55, of Baton Rouge.

Unlike most of the Washington area slayings, which targeted random victims shot from afar with a powerful rifle, some of the earlier shootings were conducted at close range with a .22-caliber handgun.

In September and October 2002, the snipers committed 10 homicides and wounded six people in the Washington area. Muhammad has been convicted of murder in Virginia and Maryland for his role in the sniper shootings and is awaiting execution in Virginia. Malvo was convicted of murder in Virginia, where he was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole, and has agreed to plead guilty to six counts of first-degree murder in the Maryland slayings. He took the stand against Muhammad in Maryland and testified that the snipers sought to kill more people than they did. He also testified that he expected nothing in exchange for his cooperation.

Malvo's attorneys, William Brennan and Timothy J. Sullivan, declined to comment on the information Malvo shared with law enforcement in recent months. "We are fully aware of the universe of Mr. Malvo's potential criminal problems," they said in a statement yesterday. "We have received several inquiries from other jurisdictions concerning possible investigations."

Muhammad has consistently claimed his innocence. When he defended himself at his recent trial in Montgomery County, he argued that he was framed by authorities.

Malvo told investigators that the California victim was shot at close range in Los Angeles during a robbery, the first source said. The victim's identity, the date of the shooting and other details could not be determined.

Malvo also provided general information about the victims, locations and dates in the other cases, the source said.

In one case that matches Malvo's claim, Albert Michalczyk, a retired contractor from Tucson, was shot while playing golf at Glen Oaks Golf Course in Clearwater, Fla., on May 18 while visiting his daughter.

Standing at the course's seventh hole, he heard a loud bang that the dozens of golfers in the area initially mistook for a firecracker. In fact, it was a bullet that had struck him on the upper-right side of the chest.

"I was really fortunate that it went right through my right breast," Michalczyk said in an interview. "If I hadn't been standing that way, I wouldn't be here today."

Michalczyk said the shooting still mystifies him.

"The one who was devastated was my poor grandson," he said. "He's 9 years old."

DOJ_NMG_0034757

Michalczyk said he's no longer haunted by the shooting but remains intrigued.

"I've been thinking about it," he said. "I'd like to know who did it."

Clearwater police could not be reached for comment late yesterday. Michalczyk said he considers Malvo and Muhammad suspects because Malvo's mother lived at the time in Fort Myers, Fla., which is a two-hour drive from Clearwater.

Michalczyk didn't stay long at the hospital. When he was discharged, a doctor told him he was a "lucky guy."

"You should go buy yourself a lottery ticket," the doctor told him.

Malvo also provided information that matches the killing of landscaper Billy Gene Dillon in Texas. According to police reports and interviews, Dillon was working on a yard on a quiet street in unincorporated Denton County the morning of May 27, which was Memorial Day in 2002. It was a warm day, and a storm was brewing nearby.

He was wearing blue jeans and brown boots and had 50 cents in his pocket.

About 10:15 a.m., a bullet pierced the left side of his head, blasted through his brain and exited through the right side of the skull. The high-velocity gunshot wound killed him instantly.

At 10:27 a.m., Don Lovelace, the owner of the house where Dillon was working, saw the body and dialed 911.

"Caller just pulled up and found a male in front of his [residence] with severe injuries to the head and can not confirm if he is [conscious] or [breathing]," wrote the Denton 911 dispatcher who answered the call.

The homicide was perplexing to investigators at the Denton County Sheriff's Office, which generally tackles no more than a dozen homicides a year.

"The investigation didn't uncover anyone who was mad at him," said Tom Reedy, a spokesman for the sheriff's office.

Reedy said Dillon's mother, with whom he lived, still periodically calls investigators to ask whether they have any leads.

"We were very surprised," Lovelace said in an interview. "We're kind of out in the country. We walk up and down the road. We were just shocked."

After months of chasing leads, Denton investigators in November sent ballistics evidence recovered at the scene to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Washington, which was analyzing ballistics evidence from the sniper scenes. Authorities in Texas later said they had been unable to link the homicide to the snipers.

Informed by a reporter of Malvo's new claim, Reedy said he would notify the sheriff of the information.

The fourth claim made by Malvo matches the shooting of John C. Gaeta, 54, in Hammond, La.

On Aug. 1, 2002, Gaeta walked out of a Sears store at a mall in Hammond. He arrived roughly 20 minutes before 9 p.m. -- closing time -- and walked back to his 2001 Chevrolet pickup truck only to find that one of his tires had been slashed. As he began to change the tire, two black men approached him, Gaeta said in a recent interview.

"One of them said, 'What time does the mall close?' or something to that effect," Gaeta said. "Then he said, 'Looks like you have a flat tire,' and he kind of laughed about it."

The men offered to help him, but Gaeta, suspicious of their demeanor, declined. Minutes later, the younger and shorter of the two returned. Their eyes locked for an instant. Then Gaeta saw the man, standing a few feet away, point a handgun to his head.

"I just figured I was going to be dead," Gaeta said. "You see a gun pointed to your head, and you say this is it. You think about family, religion, a whole bunch of things. You can't believe this is happening to you. When you see a gun pointed to your head, you think you're never going to wake up again."

The shot sliced into the right side of his neck, tore through layers of muscle and exited about 1 1/2 inches from his spinal cord. Gaeta said he jumped to the ground and pretended to be dead. The shooter took his wallet out of his pants. He had $40 on him.

Months after being shot, Gaeta got an unexpected visit from detectives from Fairfax County. He was shown a photograph of Malvo. He said he told them that Malvo resembled the shooter but that he couldn't say so conclusively.

"It was dark, and it happened so fast," Gaeta said.

Hammond police could not be reached late yesterday.

Malvo did not describe these shootings during his testimony, but there were indications that his testimony was being strictly limited. Montgomery Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan noted at one point that Malvo did not "intend to voluntarily testify about any other potential charges" beyond the shootings in October 2002. And attorney Brennan said Malvo would assert his right to remain silent "on all questions" outside of the shootings in Maryland and Virginia.

As she questioned Malvo in court May 24, Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree alluded to "other matters" that he had discussed with authorities during meetings in recent weeks, matters she said he did not testify about.

"And in fact, that was a lot of the time we spent, wasn't it?" she said.

"Yes."

Muhammad mentioned Denton during his closing argument, saying investigators in the sniper case reviewed ballistics evidence from that shooting. Muhammad twice misstated the date of the shooting in a confused effort to suggest that the sniper attacks continued after he and Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002.

"Denton Texas -- that particular shooting was May 27, '03. Why would people in Texas -- people they got some smart people in Texas -- why would people in Texas send around to this area pertaining to a shooting that happened . . ?"

"Your honor, he's misstating the evidence," Winfree interrupted.

The objection was sustained, but Muhammad continued on the same topic moments later. "Denton, Texas -- that was November 18, that was after Muhammad was arrested," he said.

"Your honor, he's mixing dates of reports with dates of incidents," Winfree said, leading the judge to tell Muhammad to move on.

Offender Bill To Get Nod From Governor (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said that he would sign legislation passed in the predawn hours yesterday that would enhance the monitoring of convicted sex offenders and impose mandatory minimum sentences for those who prey on minors.

The Maryland House of Delegates gave final approval to the bill at 4:36 a.m. yesterday on a vote of 126 to 0. The Senate had voted 39 to 5 for the bill just minutes earlier.

In addition to Ehrlich (R), Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D) and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) made the legislation a priority during the regular session of the General Assembly, which ended in April. But disagreement over mandatory jail terms prevented the bill from reaching a final vote.

Discontent over skyrocketing electricity costs forced lawmakers back to Annapolis for a rare special session Wednesday, when the offender issue was revived.

Lengthy negotiations produced 36 pages of amendments and changes, but when the bill was finally passed, backers said it was a strong new law aimed largely at better identifying and tracking convicted child sex offenders after their release from jail.

"The sexual predator package is plenty good enough to sign," Ehrlich said. "It will be signed."

Curran, who has announced plans to retire after two decades, said the decision to revive the measure was an unexpected relief, because he believes that the system in place has been inadequate.

"We've tried for six years to get this done," Curran said. "A lot of people have had deep concerns about this issue."

The legislation passed yesterday provides for more stringent monitoring of released offenders and gives police the authority to notify a broader list of community leaders when an offender moves into a neighborhood.

Offenders would be required to check in with police more frequently and regularly update their photographs for an online database.

It also calls for a team, which includes a mental health professional, to evaluate sex offenders before they are released and to determine appropriate monitoring methods, including the option of a Global Positioning System chip in an ankle bracelet.

"That will be critical," said Lisae C. Jordan, legislative counsel for the Maryland Coalition Against Sexual Assault Inc.

The second component, which prompted the most strenuous debate, dealt with sentencing rules. Republican lawmakers led the charge for "nonsuspendable, nonparolable, mandatory 25-year sentences" for those who commit violent sex crimes against children 13 or younger.

Some Democrats, however, raised concerns about the proposal, known as "Jessica's Law" because it is modeled on a Florida law passed after a 9-year-old girl was killed by a convicted sex offender.

"I think mandatory minimum sentences are a mistake," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery). "There is no one-size-fits-all justice." Frosh noted that certain crimes punishable by the stiff sentences could inadvertently apply in circumstances where both offenders are teenagers and are engaged in consensual acts. The eventual compromise excluded those cases.

Del. Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), one of the most strident advocates for mandatory minimums, said early yesterday that the compromise was a victory. "It's a big, big step forward for our kids," he said.

Developments Bar Sex Offenders (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Private housing developers are joining a surging number of communities that are telling convicted sex offenders who need a place to live: "Not in my backyard."

A Texas-based company, I&S Investment Group, is breaking ground this summer on a 154-lot development in Lenexa, Kan., that will bar registered sex offenders. If someone is convicted of a sex crime while living there, the subdivision will fine the person $1,500 daily until he or she moves. The group has sold out all 150 lots in its first such development in Lubbock, Texas, begun 10 months ago, and plans to offer 250 more lots there this fall.

"The sex offender deal has improved demand. It's probably increased our sales three to four times," says I&S partner Clayton Isom, 24. "We're fighting sex offenders head on."

Another Texan, Taylor Goodman, today launched a website, Blockwatcher.com, listing homes for sale that have no registered sex offenders living within a half-mile radius. He says only 20% of available homes will qualify.

"These guys are just everywhere," Goodman says of roughly 567,000 sex offenders registered nationwide. The site carries disclaimers, however, noting that thousands of offenders haven't registered and thousands more have listed phony addresses.

The new private efforts complement an accelerating push by states and cities to bar sex offenders from living near schools or playgrounds. Hundreds of cities, including more than a dozen this year alone, have approved such ordinances, some of which block out entire downtowns.

At least 15 states have enacted such laws, including three (Nebraska, Mississippi and South Dakota) that did so for the first time this year and two (Georgia and Indiana) that expanded prior restrictions. Others, including California and Pennsylvania, restrict offenders on parole or probation. The restrictions have increased despite U.S. data showing sex crimes against children have decreased in the last decade.

"It's grown out of public demand" fueled by media coverage of high-profile cases, says Blake Harrison, analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "Nobody wants them (sex offenders) in their backyard."

Several restrictions on where sex offenders can live, including Iowa's statewide law, have been upheld in court.

Banning sex offenders from private property does not violate the Fair Housing Act, but restrictions by states and cities are worrisome, says Brett Shirk of the American Civil Liberties Union of Kansas & Western Missouri.

"Everybody wants a sex-offender-free neighborhood, but it is an unfortunate fact, they are going to live somewhere," he says. "What's going to happen is they're going to go underground and create a nightmare for law enforcement."

The restrictions may give a false sense of security, because they do not bar offenders from traveling into a prohibited area, says Carolyn Atwell-Davis of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children. The private group prefers better tracking of offenders, workplace restrictions and increased penalties for non-registration.

The bans focus on strangers, but parents need to understand that 80% of offenders know their victims, says John La Fond, author of Preventing Sexual Violence: How Society Should Cope With Sex Offenders.

He says as more communities impose restrictions, neighboring ones will pass copycat laws for their own protection.

Honeywell Agrees To Pay U.S. $2.6M To Settle False Claims Charges (AP)

By Jeffrey Gold

NEWARK, N.J. - Honeywell International Inc. has paid the federal government $2.625 million to settle charges it failed to properly test packaging for sensitive parts used by the Defense Department and NASA, authorities said Thursday.

Fifteen percent of the settlement, or $393,750, went to a California company and one of its executives, who brought a whistleblower lawsuit several years ago against Morris Township-based Honeywell.

Honeywell was accused of violating the False Claims Act over testing of electrostatic protective metallic sheets that were to package more than 186,000 sensitive parts, the Justice Department said.

A Justice spokesman, Charles Miller, said he could not comment on the nature of the parts but said none were damaged because of the packaging.

The lawsuit charged that Honeywell knowingly made and sold sheets that did not meet military specifications. Honeywell disputed the allegations, said court papers unsealed with the settlement.

Messages seeking comment from Honeywell were not immediately returned Thursday after the U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement.

The deal was approved May 22 by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise in Newark.

Caltex Plastics, of Vernon, Calif., was a purchaser of Honeywell sheets, which it would make into bags and other products, said its lawyer, Robert G. Klein.

During the course of a prior lawsuit between the two companies, Caltex and its vice president, Jim Higgs, determined that Honeywell was selling goods to the military that had not gone through proper testing, Klein said.

That prompted the whistleblower lawsuit, which was joined by the federal government.

Shares of Honeywell, which have been trading in a 52-week range of $32.68 to $44.48 per share, rose 91 cents, or 2.4 percent, to close at $38.93 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Feds: NJ Hospital Co. To Pay $265M In Medicare Billing Settlement (SDUT/AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 16, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. – New Jersey's largest health care provider will pay $265 million to settle federal charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars by inflating charges for seriously ill patients, prosecutors said Thursday.

The agreement between prosecutors and Saint Barnabas Health Care System, which operates nine hospitals and a behavioral treatment center in New Jersey, concerns a program Medicare provides to supplement its normal payments.

Prosecutors allege that between October 1995 and August 2003, Saint Barnabas hospitals deliberately inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care under the Medicare program, the federal health care insurance program for people aged 65 and over, and for the disabled. It is designed to increase reimbursements to hospitals that care for people with medical complications.

As part of the settlement, under which Saint Barnabas did not admit wrongdoing, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

In a statement, Michael Slusarz, vice president for public relations and marketing at Saint Barnabas, said the company cooperated with the government during the inquiry.

"This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients," he said. "We are pleased this matter is now behind us and look forward to continuing to serve the citizens of New Jersey."

DOJ_NMG_0034761

Authorities said it is the first settlement involving Medicare's supplemental reimbursement program, but added that others are pending around the country.

“Saint Barnabas was a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling,” said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the Newark FBI office. “If he were alive today, he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name.”

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ralph Marra Jr. said the hospital system “overreached” by padding bills submitted to the government.

The problem occurred when the hospitals started tacking on extra charges, such as the cost of nursing, housecleaning and other routine expenses, making a patient's treatment appear more costly than it actually was, authorities said.

“Saint Barnabas, in a very systematic way, gamed the system and exploited loopholes in the reimbursement system to obtain more money than they were entitled to,” Marra said.

He added no hospital employee derived a personal financial benefit from the overpayments.

Government prosecutors said they became aware of the allegations in 2002 when three whistleblowers filed sealed lawsuits alleging that Saint Barnabas was overcharging Medicare. Prosecutors would not say how the whistleblowers knew about what was going on, and said the amount of the settlement they would be entitled to under federal law has not yet been determined. But payments usually range from between 15 to 25 percent of the settlement, authorities said.

Although Marra said the amount of wrongful payments exceeded $500 million, the government took into account the corporation's ability to pay in calculating a settlement amount.

“As the largest health care organization in the state, we did not want to put them out of business,” he said.

Marra said such activity is “not unique” to Saint Barnabas, but he would not say whether other hospitals in New Jersey are under investigation for similar overcharging.

The corporation operates Saint Barnabas Behavioral Health Center in Toms River and nine hospitals in the state: St. Barnabas in Livingston; Clara Maass, with campuses in Belleville and Kearny; Newark Beth Israel Medical Center; Children's Hospital in Newark; Union Hospital; Monmouth Medical Center in Long Branch; Kimball Medical Center in Lakewood; Community Medical Center in Toms River.

Saint Barnabas To Settle Fraud Charges (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, June 16, 2006

Hospital network to pay feds $265 million for 8 years of alleged Medicare bilk

Saint Barnabas Health Care System, New Jersey's largest medical network, will pay a record $265 million to settle charges that it bilked the government by inflating costs on tens of thousands of Medicare claims.

The settlement, announced yesterday by federal prosecutors in Newark, represented a first-of-its-kind agreement for a form of health care fraud that has been largely invisible to patients but has cost taxpayers billions of dollars in the past decade.

The agreement spares Saint Barnabas or its officers from criminal charges but requires the West Orange-based hospital system to enter into a corporate integrity agreement, appoint a compliance officer and permit regular monitoring of its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Between 1995 and 2003, prosecutors said, the network's nine hospitals filed tens of thousands of inflated claims for reimbursement of the costliest treatments. Patients under such care are called "outliers" because their needs stretch beyond typical parameters of Medicare definitions.

The government more than a decade ago agreed to outlier payments to prevent hospitals from turning away the neediest patients. But rampant abuse has led to a wave of new investigations.

Saint Barnabas, for instance, collected more than $500 million in Medicare outlier payments that it didn't deserve, investigators said.

"Saint Barnabas, in a very systematic way, gamed the system and exploited loopholes in this reimbursement procedure," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ralph Marra said. "They were caught -- we are getting them to pay the money back."

NATIONAL MODEL

Seven government agencies and departments participated in the negotiations, and the result could be used as a national model for settlements with hospital networks, Marra said. He declined to say if other investigations or deals are looming.

A four-paragraph statement released by Saint Barnabas' public relations office said the chain was "pleased to have resolved an outstanding inquiry" into its billing practices. In the agreement, the hospital system denied any wrongdoing or liability.

The statement from spokesman Michael Slusarz also said the arrangement protected Saint Barnabas' financial standing, but one investor service warned yesterday that the news could prompt a downgrade on its debt rating.

The payments will be spread over six years. The first $45 million check is due July 1.

With 5,000 doctors and more than 22,000 employees, Saint Barnabas is the state's second-largest private employer. It treats more than 2 million people each year at facilities in Livingston, Belleville, Toms River, Newark, Lakewood, Long Branch, Wayne, West Orange and Union.

The investigation stemmed from two whistleblower lawsuits filed under seal in Pennsylvania and New Jersey since 2002 and only partially unsealed yesterday. The three plaintiffs in those cases are expected to share as much as 25 percent of the payout, or up to $66 million.

One is James T. Monahan, a Little Silver resident and former chief executive at the now-defunct Memorial Medical Center in South Amboy. His attorney, Marc Raspanti, said Monahan hoped his efforts "will lead to real change in the hospitals' outlier system."

GAMING THE SYSTEM

Outlier payments are easy to manipulate because they tend to be complicated and subjective, prosecutors said.

Under typical Medicare rules, procedures such as an appendectomy generate a flat-fee reimbursement. But if the patient is elderly and has chronic conditions or other diseases, his or her hospitalization could last weeks. By claiming that patient as an outlier and inflating the costs of that treatment, hospitals ensured themselves a higher Medicare payment that often went unchecked.

Outlier costs are supposed to hover between 5 and 6 percent of total Medicare payouts to hospitals nationally, but have crept into the double digits. Congress moved to tighten loopholes in the regulations three years ago, but the scope of the fraud is just becoming apparent.

"This was big-time looting," said Patrick Burns, a spokesman for Taxpayers Against Fraud in Washington, D.C., a consumer advocacy group. "This was fraud calculated by MBAs."

Burns predicted that more hospitals in New Jersey and across the country will become entangled in criminal or civil cases over outlier payments. "This is the edge of the wedge," he said.

Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare, the nation's second-largest hospital system, has agreed to repay $215 million to investors who sued over its mishandling of outlier payments.

In New Jersey, Saint Barnabas was the state's largest Medicare biller. Between 1995 and 2003, the company collected $4.l billion in Medicare receipts, although it is unclear what portion of the money stemmed from outliers.

Only parts of Monahan's lawsuit were unsealed. It describes him as a financial management consultant to the hospital industry, but doesn't explain how he learned of the fraud at Saint Barnabas. It recounted a 1999 or 2000 meeting of Saint Barnabas officials where at least one executive stated that the network's "corporate goals" included maximizing outlier payments.

DIFFERENT RATES

Between 1998 and 2001, he alleged, the hospitals' outlier costs were more than 15 percent of its total Medicare claims, or at least three times the preferred level. Among the ways it achieved that, he alleged, was by charging higher rates for Medicare patients than for non-Medicare patients.

"Indeed, the sole reason the defendant hospitals inflated charges to Medicare and other federal government agencies was to obtain outlier payments to which they were not legally entitled," the lawsuit claimed.

His lawsuit appears to name many other hospitals as defendants, but those names remain under seal and prosecutors would not discuss them.

DOJ_NMG_0034763

The lawsuit, and a related one filed in Philadelphia, triggered a criminal investigation by the FBI, the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services, and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. Yesterday's settlement ends those lawsuits.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stuart Minkowitz, one of the prosecutors on the case, said Monahan and the Pennsylvania plaintiffs, Peter Salvatori and Sara Iverson, are likely to share between 15 and 25 percent of the settlement, but that the government has yet to decide how large the payout will be.

The agreement was unrelated to a separate $3.8 million Medicare overbilling settlement that Saint Barnabas reached last December with prosecutors, or to other similar cases involving the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey or Cathedral Healthcare Systems.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie recused himself from the case because his family foundation has donated to Saint Barnabas, his office said.

Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark division, noted that Saint Barnabas was "a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling."

"If he was alive today," Wiser said, "he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name."

Hospital Chain To Pay $265M To Settle Whistleblower Suits (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, June 16, 2006

A New Jersey hospital chain will pay $265 million to settle a pair of whistleblower lawsuits that claimed it had systematically inflated charges to Medicare patients in order to obtain enhanced reimbursements, Justice Department lawyers said Thursday.

According to court papers, the massive settlement by Saint Barnabas Corp. -- the largest health care system in New Jersey and second largest employer in the state -- could be just the first in a wave because numerous other unidentified hospitals are apparently facing similar accusations.

The settlement could also lead to huge rewards for the three whistleblowers, who are represented by Philadelphia attorneys Peter F. Vaira and John E. Riley of Vaira & Riley, and Marc S. Raspanti of Miller Alfano & Raspanti.

In the suits, the whistleblowers claimed Saint Barnabas was abusing a Medicare provision that provides for supplemental payments for unusually expensive cases, referred to as "outliers."

Justice Department lawyers said yesterday that between October 1995 and August 2003, the nine hospitals operated by West Orange, N.J.-based Saint Barnabas "purposefully inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care to make these cases appear more costly than they actually were."

Whistleblower lawsuits, also known as qui tam actions, allege claims under the False Claims Act. Initially, such cases are filed under seal and immediately referred to the local U.S. Attorney in order to give the Justice Department the option of pursuing the case. The two suits that led to Thursday's settlement were only partially unsealed, suggesting that other hospitals may also have been named as defendants.

A redacted copy of one of the lawsuits, unsealed by U.S. District Judge Juan R. Sanchez, shows that the identities of numerous additional defendants have been blacked out. Sanchez ordered that the original version of the suit must remain under seal.

In a press release, Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler, head of the Justice Department's Civil Division, said, "Today's settlement demonstrates the United States' determination to make sure health care providers do not overcharge the Medicare program."

In the settlement, Saint Barnabas did not admit to any wrongdoing, but it entered into a "corporate integrity agreement" in which it promised to take a series of steps to ensure compliance with Medicare regulations and policies in the future.

Vaira and Riley filed suit in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia on behalf of two whistleblowers, Peter Salvatori and Sara C. Iverson.

Raspanti filed a similar suit in U.S. District Court in New Jersey on behalf of James T. Monahan.

Both suits were filed in November 2002 and apparently sparked a massive federal investigation involving both the Philadelphia and New Jersey U.S. Attorney's offices; the Justice Department's Civil Division in Washington, D.C.; the FBI; the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Inspector General; the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; and the U.S. Postal inspectors.

Riley declined to comment on the settlement, saying he was unsure whether or not court documents had yet been unsealed. Raspanti was out of town and could not be reached for comment.

Justice Department lawyers also had no comment on the size of the reward that will be paid to the whistleblowers.

The settlement agreement filed in court yesterday specifically leaves the issue of the rewards for another day.

"Nothing in this agreement is intended to address any [whistleblower's] entitlement to a share of the settlement amount or the validity of either of the civil actions," the settlement says.

Sometimes the issue of a whistleblower's reward can lead to protracted litigation. In the late 1990s, when SmithKline Beecham paid $325 million to settle a trio of whistleblower suits, Justice Department lawyers argued that no rewards should be paid since all of the information provided by the whistleblowers was already public.

But Senior U.S. District Judge Donald W. VanArtsdalen rejected the government's argument and awarded $42 million to the three whistleblowers.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later overturned the awards and ordered VanArtsdalen to take another look at whether any of the three was truly an "original source."

VanArtsdalen later ruled that only one of the three should get any money, saying that two of the three were "original sources," but that only one, Robert Merena, had the right to a reward since his lawsuit was the first filed.

The suits involved allegations that SmithKline Beecham Clinical Laboratories and several other medical laboratories had adopted a scheme that allowed them to bill the federal government for unauthorized and unnecessary laboratory tests.

In his September 2000 decision, VanArtsdalen awarded Merena more than $24 million -- a 10 percent cut of the portion of the settlement to which his information led.

Merena, who was represented by Raspanti, ultimately garnered nearly $37 million for his whistle blowing efforts because on six other claims for which the government agreed Merena deserved an award, he was paid $11 million and VanArtsdalen added another $1.9 million.

But VanArtsdalen ruled that another former SmithKline employee, Charles Robinson Jr., and his lawyer, Glenn Grossenbacher, who had assisted him in blowing the whistle, were not entitled to any reward due to the strict "first to file" rule in the False Claims Act.

Health Care Group To Repay $265 Million To Medicare (NYT)

By Ronald L. Smothers

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

NEWARK, June 15 — St. Barnabas Health Care System, the state's largest private hospital network, has agreed to reimburse Medicare $265 million to settle charges that it overbilled the federal program over an eight-year period.

The out-of-court settlement — which grew out of whistle-blower lawsuits filed by a hospital consultant in Little Silver, N.J., a Pennsylvania hospital administrator and a third person — also stipulated that St. Barnabas must accept an outside monitor to supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Federal prosecutors had charged that from October 1995 to August 2003, St. Barnabas deliberately inflated charges under a Medicare program intended to increase reimbursements to hospitals that care for patients with medical complications. The prosecutors speculated that, had their investigation continued, the overcharges could have come to half a billion dollars.

St. Barnabas officials said they welcomed a resolution to the federal inquiry, and the United States attorney's office here emphasized that the settlement was not an admission of guilt to any criminal charges.

But federal investigators accused the hospital network of "gaming the system and exploiting loopholes" to increase its revenues. "St. Barnabas was a man who gave up his worldly wealth to help others," said Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office here. "If he were alive today he would be ashamed."

In a statement Michael Slusarz, a vice president and spokesman for the hospital operator, said in part: "This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients."

Ralph J. Marra Jr., the first assistant United States attorney for New Jersey, said the terms of the settlement — repaying the federal government in six yearly installments and agreeing to the monitor — were designed to keep the hospital, the state's second largest private employer, from going out of business.

"The government investigators in our office believed that the overbilling could have been quite a bit higher," Mr. Marra said in a news conference at the United States attorney's office here on Thursday. "But at some point we made a decision to go the route of civil settlement rather than criminal charges. We do not want to put them out of business, and so their ability to pay was a consideration in the settlement."

The inflated charges involved the complex rules under the Medicare system for reimbursement to hospitals providing treatment that lies outside of federally set standard payments for various procedures and normal hospital costs.

Gary Heuer, a lawyer with the inspector general's office of the federal Department of Health and Human Services, which administers Medicare, said that the payment mechanism recognizes that in some cases complications require longer hospital stays and additional procedures, but that the program St. Barnabas was accused of exploiting was devised to give hospitals "the incentive to treat inpatients whose care requires unusually high costs."

Federal investigators said that although St. Barnabas had been "on our radar screen" for possible excessive claims, two whistle-blower lawsuits filed in 2002 more sharply focused their investigation on the reimbursement process. Under federal law, the whistle-blowers are entitled to 15 percent to 25 percent of the value of the settlement, said Mr. Marra.

Court papers identified the whistle-blowers as John T. Monahan of Little Silver, who was described as the head of a firm that provides financial management consulting services to the hospital industry; Sara C. Iveson, the executive director of Barnes-Kasson Hospital in Susquehanna, Pa.; and Peter Salvatori, a Pennsylvania resident. Mr. Monahan and Ms. Iveson did not respond to telephone messages seeking comment, and further information was not available on Mr. Salvatori.

The health care network operates St. Barnabas Behavioral Health Center in Toms River and nine hospitals in New Jersey: St. Barnabas in Livingston; Clara Maass, with facilities in Belleville and Kearny; Newark Beth Israel Medical Center; Children's Hospital in Newark; Union Hospital; Monmouth Medical Center in Long Branch; Kimball Medical Center in Lakewood and Community Medical Center in Toms River.

Saint Barnabas Settles Medicare Case (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Saint Barnabas Health Care System will pay $265 million to settle charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars, federal prosecutors said.

The agreement between prosecutors and the New Jersey hospital system concerns payments by Medicare that supplement its normal payments.

Prosecutors allege that between October 1995 and August 2003, Saint Barnabas hospitals deliberately inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care under the supplemental-reimbursement program.

Hospitals caring for Medicare patients receive fixed payments from the government that are related to the patient's diagnosis. However, hospitals can collect supplemental payments related to the care of the sickest patients.

These "outlier" payments are for patients who are so ill that their care costs much more than for normal patients with a particular diagnosis. The settlement involves outlier payments.

Authorities said the Saint Barnabas settlement is the first involving Medicare's supplemental-reimbursement program but added that others are pending around the country. Saint Barnabas didn't admit wrongdoing in the settlement.

Tenet Healthcare Corp., one of the largest U.S. hospital companies, has been negotiating with the government to settle its own outlier dispute. Tenet has said it regrets its policy, which it has since changed, but the company hasn't admitted wrongdoing.

In response to yesterday's settlement, Moody's Investors Service put the credit rating of Saint Barnabas under review for a possible downgrade. Currently, the health system's debt is rated Baa1. The not-for-profit health system has about $900 million in debt affected by the ratings review.

The $265 million settlement "sounds like a lot of money," said Pamela Federbusch, senior vice president at Moody's, "although they do have a healthy balance sheet." Moody's said the settlement will be paid over six years.

Michael Slusarz, vice president for public relations and marketing at Saint Barnabas, said the company cooperated with the government during the inquiry. "This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients," he said.

As part of the Saint Barnabas settlement, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Some municipal-bond investors say they have been shying away from buying the debt issues of hospitals out of concern over allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud, says Carolyn Dolan, principal at Samson Capital Advisors LLC.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-federal Attorney Enters Guilty Plea (FREMARG)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Fremont (CA) Argus, June 16, 2006

Investigator of state's youth prisons admits conflict of interest

A former U.S. Justice Department civil rights attorney admits he was angling for a state job to monitor and reform California's youth prisons even as he led a federal probe of one of those facilities in Stockton.

Ryan Rainey, 48, has pleaded guilty to one count of violating the federal conflict-of-interest law and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 15 by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Facciola of Washington, D.C.

A civil lawsuit challenging the living conditions in youth prisons had required the appointment of a "special master" to monitor and oversee reforms.

Rainey admits that while leading the federal probe he was negotiating with state Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office for the special master's job, even though he knew the state had a financial interest in the findings and recommendations of the probe he was conducting.

The maximum sentence for the crime is a year in prison and a $100,000 fine.

but Rainey's May 26 plea agreement indicates the government will seek a zero-to-six-month term and won't oppose a sentence carrying no time behind bars.

Rainey was a senior trial attorney in the Special Litigation Section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from January 2002 through April 2005. Earlier he'd been a federal prosecutor in Washington, D.C., for seven years.

In April 2003 his division launched a probe — with Rainey as lead counsel — of alleged civil rights abuses at the California Youth Authority's N.A. Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility in Stockton.

In fact, the state recommended him for the job. An attorney representing the civil lawsuit's plaintiffs objected. San Francisco civil rights attorney Donna Brorby, who had spent much of her career forcing Texas to clean up its prisons, eventually was appointed as the special master.

The federal investigation of the Chad facility continues.

What used to be called the California Youth Authority is now called the Division of Juvenile Justice within the Youth and Adult Correction Agency, renamed as part of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's overhaul of the state's prisons. The state is still revising its remediation plans for reforming its youth prisons.

Outsiders Recommend New Chief In Ridgefield (OREG)

DOJ_NMG_0034767

By Holley Gilbert

The Oregonian, June 16, 2006

Police case - City officials say the FBI has conducted several interviews this week

Ridgefield, Wash., Police Chief Bruce Hall should be replaced, according to two Kirkland, Wash., police lieutenants who investigated allegations of racism in the firing of Ridgefield's only African American officer.

Hall's hiring decisions have put the city at risk of a civil lawsuit and his lack of leadership "has resulted in an environment of low accountability, distrust and poor morale," said the lieutenants' report, which was released this week.

The report found no racist motivation in the Sept. 28, 2005, dismissal of Carl Mealing. Two months later, Mealing filed a federal lawsuit charging discrimination against Ridgefield, its police department, City Manager George A. Fox and Hall. Fox was put on administrative leave Dec. 1; Hall, who earlier was Mealing's chief in Forks, Wash., and the Nisqually Tribal Police, was put on leave May 18.

Now, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has begun its own investigation in Ridgefield. Council member Scott Hanson said Thursday that he talked with the FBI earlier this week but declined to say what about.

Interim Ridgefield City Manager Justin L. Clary said an FBI agent attended meetings with him, interim Ridgefield Police Chief Erin Nolan and Clark County Sheriff Garry Lucas, but he declined to say what was discussed. An FBI probe "was not something requested by the city," Clary said.

An FBI spokeswoman in Seattle declined to confirm or deny an investigation was under way.

The Kirkland lieutenants' report was done at the request of Eileen M. Lawrence, a Seattle attorney hired to represent Ridgefield in Mealing's federal lawsuit. Initially, the report was to be used only in the federal court case, Lawrence said. "Beyond that, the report is tied into other issues that the city needed to be addressed and be part of the ongoing investigation," she said Thursday.

Also, at the request of Nolan, the interim chief, Vancouver police have been looking into the backgrounds of two officers who were being considered for full-time employment in the Ridgefield department, according to Mitch Barker, Vancouver's assistant police chief.

One of the two, Glen Kilmer, was "released from his probation" Wednesday, Clary said. Kilmer, who previously worked at Forks, was hired last year as a school resource officer and dismissed during a standard probationary period, Barker said.

The temporary appointment of the second officer, David Bone, ended May 31, before the background check could be completed. He is still on the candidate list to be hired permanently.

Hall's decision to hire Mealing in Ridgefield and his failure to act when allegations surfaced that Mealing was harassing women while on duty were "negligent," Kirkland Lt. Bill Hamilton and Lt. Rick Krebs concluded in their report.

"Mealing has a long history of allegations regarding his conduct, which clearly demonstrate a pattern of harassment," the 34-page report said. "Chief Hall had personal knowledge of the investigations and complaints regarding Mealing's unprofessional behavior at two prior agencies. Hall fired Mealing for his conduct at Forks yet rehired him at Ridgefield."

That Hall fired for cause other Ridgefield officers, then hired them in Kalama, where he also heads the police department, "is beyond comprehension," the report states. The report is accompanied by interviews, affidavits, memorandums, correspondence and other records.

Hall "cannot afford to give officers a second chance while it is at the expense of the City, the community. . . and the general morale of the police department," the report said.

"This state of affairs at the Ridgefield Police Department is similar to that of a dysfunctional family," the lieutenants wrote.

L.A. Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Barrage (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Deputies fired 70 times at the suspect in Walnut Park. It was the third department shooting in the last year involving scores of gunshots.

DOJ_NMG_0034768

Faced with the third case in a year of deputies firing scores of shots at a suspect, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca on Thursday said he had ordered an investigation into whether six deputies used too much force earlier this week when they unleashed 70 rounds at a suspect.

Scrutiny of the shooting intensified as officials Thursday revealed that at least one deputy had fired so many shots that he reloaded his weapon during the Walnut Park incident, which left 27-year-old Carl Williams dead.

"Obviously, we have to look at this very closely. We will get to the bottom of this fast," Baca said. "We will know the motivation of each of the shooters. They know what the policy is here. Because it is the heat of battle, it doesn't dismiss your objectivity."

The shooting comes a year after deputies in Compton had fired 120 rounds at a suspect they were chasing on a residential street. Some of the bullets flew into nearby homes and embedded in walls.

After that incident, the Sheriff's Department imposed rules that made it more difficult for deputies to fire at moving cars and to fire multiple times. Baca said he was concerned that the shooting could have been a case of "contagious fire," in which deputies fire their weapons because they hear a gunshot. He said he hoped that the new rules would reduce such problems.

But in January, deputies fired more than 50 shots into a Compton house where a suspect was holed up. That case is being investigated by the department's Internal Affairs detectives.

Michael Gennaco, head of the Office of Independent Review, a sheriff's watchdog agency, said the department's internal review of the Walnut Park shooting would include an examination of whether deputies needed to discharge so many rounds, whether they were influenced by contagious fire and whether they endangered residents. The shooting occurred at the end of an alley near apartment buildings.

Baca and Gennaco stressed that it was too early to judge the deputies and that the circumstances of the chase could have meant that the 70 shots were justified.

Sheriff's officials have not said how many shots the officer who reloaded his weapon fired. Each clip in the deputy's 9-millimeter handgun holds 15 rounds, with an additional bullet in the chamber. So the deputy probably fired at least 16 rounds plus whatever shots he discharged from the second clip.

"It adds a complexity to issues in this shooting when a deputy reloads," Gennaco said. "It gives a deputy another opportunity to reassess. That means there has to be numerous threats in the mind of the deputy" for the shooting to be within department policy.

The pursuit of Williams began shortly after 11 p.m. Tuesday, when deputies in a patrol car said they saw Williams driving erratically near 113th Street and Mona Boulevard and tried to pull him over, sheriff's homicide unit Capt. Ray Peavy said.

Williams allegedly drove 60 mph through an alley before plowing into a patrol car. He then drove into a light pole, Peavy said, prompting two deputies to leave their cars and move toward him. Williams allegedly put his car in reverse and drove toward the deputies, hitting a patrol car. He pulled forward, then backed into a second cruiser. The six deputies on the scene opened fire.

Though it was unclear how many times Williams was hit, the deputies fired from relatively close range, hitting the vehicle multiple times and shooting out its back window.

A resident in a nearby apartment, Alvaro Ramirez, 18, said he heard gunfire for about 30 seconds, during which he dove for cover.

Investigators found a handgun in Williams' car and drugs in his possession. But they said the deputies were unaware of the gun when they opened fire and cited the car as the deadly weapon in their reports.

Peavy, who is handling the criminal investigation of the shooting, said the unusual nature of the pursuit might have required an unusual amount of force.

"There was a lot of activity going on. It was continuous action," he said. "When a deputy shoots at someone they continue to assess the threat. Here the suspect kept going, hitting the radio cars … there was a pretty good reason for continuing to shoot."

The Sheriff's Department has been trying to reduce the number of shootings in which many rounds are fired for some time. Some of those shootings have been attributed to contagious fire, which Gennaco has likened to a chain reaction in which deputies who hear gunshots fire almost as a reflex.

In 2004, deputies fired 111 rounds at a man with an assault rifle in Carson. Businesses were sprayed with bullets, and a roofer working a block away was wounded.

The rules imposed last year allow deputies to fire at moving cars only if their lives or those of bystanders are at risk. In addition, the department requires deputies to make an independent decision about firing, rather than fire simply because another deputy is shooting.

Gennaco said no data has been analyzed to determine whether the rules have changed deputies' behavior.

The Walnut Park shooting came as the Sheriff's Department and Baca were struggling with several major issues, including violence in the jails and the early release of inmates because of jail overcrowding.

Baca said the internal investigation was ongoing but investigators would consider "contagious fire" as playing a role in the Walnut Park shooting.

But he also said the deputies could have been in danger because the suspect allegedly tried to run them down.

"You can never dismiss a vehicle in the hands of a desperate person as a weapon that could harm and kill someone else," he said. "How deputies tactically were exposed to this suspect who tragically has died has to be looked at very closely."

Panel Advances Old Glory Protection (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee gave a nod yesterday to a constitutional amendment to protect the American flag from desecration, moving it to the Senate floor, where vote counters on both sides say it could be within one vote of passing.

The 11-7 vote sent the amendment to the floor. Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, has said the measure will get a Senate vote this month.

To Senate is considering the amendment during the patriotic season between Flag Day this week and the Fourth of July. The substance and timing are designed to appeal to veterans during this year of midterm elections.

"The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States," the amendment reads. To become the Constitution's 28th Amendment, the measure must be approved by two-thirds of those present in each chamber, then ratified within seven years by at least 38 state legislatures.

The House a year ago passed the bill by a vote of 286-130, more than the required two-thirds of those present to pass. Vote counters on both sides of the issue say the amendment has commitments of support from 66 senators, one fewer than the required 67 votes if all 100 members of the chamber are present.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California was the lone committee Democrat to vote for the measure, saying its language was designed to protect both the flag and the First Amendment right to free speech.

The committee rejected an amendment by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, to replace "desecration" with specific types of defilement. Using the word desecration, he said, would leave the government too much power to define the term.

Senate Panel Advances U.S. Flag-Burning Ban Proposal (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, June 16, 2006

June 15 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee approved a constitutional amendment that would empower Congress to outlaw flag burning, setting the stage for an election-year debate about ``desecration" of the national symbol.

The measure, passed by a vote of 11-7, has already been approved by a two-thirds majority in the House of Representatives. To become part of the Constitution, the amendment must be passed by the same margin in the Senate and ratified by 38 state legislatures.

The measure would overturn a 1989 Supreme Court ruling. The justices, voting 5-4, struck down a Texas law that barred flag burning, ruling it restricted freedom of expression guaranteed by the Constitution. Supporters argued today the proposed amendment would restore the power of Congress to decide the flag-burning issue, not unelected judges.

``If we can protect the bald eagle, another symbol of our nation, from killing, I think we ought to be able to protect our flag," said Texas Republican Senator John Cornyn.

Utah Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican, said he believed more than 67 senators, or two-thirds, would support the measure if they were ``allowed to vote their consciences."

Both sides predict a close Senate vote. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada supports the proposed amendment. The Senate's No. 2 Republican, Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, opposes it.

Grant of Authority

The proposal would give state legislatures seven years to ratify the proposed amendment. If it became part of the Constitution, the House and Senate would have to pass separate legislation to ban flag burning, mutilation or other forms of desecration.

Before the high court's 1989 decision, 48 states outlawed flag burning.

All 10 Republicans on the Judiciary Committee voted in favor of the amendment. Seven of the panel's eight Democrats opposed it. Democrats accused Republicans of using the debate to score political points in an election year.

Delaware Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., who has supported legislation to ban flag burning, argued that the amendment was too vague because it doesn't define desecration.

The amendment would ``leave to the authority of the government to make a subjective judgment as to whether or not the action taken relative to the flag is a violation of the law," Biden said.

`Very Skimpy Bathing Suit'

That could permit the prosecution of women on beaches ``wearing a very skimpy bathing suit" decorated with the flag's stars and stripes, he said. ``Is that desecration of the flag?"

``When you get to a bikini or a bathing suit, it's not a flag, it's a bikini," said California Senator Dianne Feinstein, the only Democrat to support the measure.

Biden argued that the measure amounts to a ``de facto amendment" of the First Amendment, which guarantees freedom of speech, by allowing the government to decide what was desecration.

``Protecting the flag is not going to prevent people from expressing their point of view," Feinstein said.

Biden said he would support an amendment that allowed Congress to ban ``burning, mutilation and trampling" of the flag.

``If it's not some political stunt, let's do it," he said. The panel rejected Biden's proposed change on a voice vote. Hatch said lawmakers would ``be able to refine and define" what was illegal flag desecration when the legislation is debated by Congress.

The House approved a proposed flag-burning amendment five times, most recently in June 2005 on a 286-130 vote. The Senate last voted on a flag-burning amendment in 2000, falling four votes short of the 67 required to pass.

Senate Alters Bill To Transform La. Congressional Elections (AP)

BATON ROUGE, La. - If Louisiana is going to shed its unique "open primary" system, then the state must make sure independent voters are allowed to cast ballots in the new party primary elections, the House voted on Thursday.

Sen. Cleo Fields introduced a bill that would replace the state's open primaries with Republican and Democratic primaries in congressional races, leaving it up to the parties to decide whether independents and third-party voters are allowed to cast ballots.

The House decided to change the measure slightly, adding a provision that would allow an independent voter to pick one or the other party's primaries to vote in. They then passed the measure 58-35, sending it back to the Senate for approval of the change.

Despite the change, Rep. Joel Robideaux of Lafayette, who has no party affiliation, said it was unfair to independent candidates. Robideaux said the measure would make it increasingly difficult for independents to run for Congress because they would wait on the sidelines until the general election.

"We're basically saying we're going to have a Democrat or a Republican for a congressman and nobody else is really going to have a chance," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0034771

Fields, D-Baton Rouge, a former congressman, has tried for years to get rid of open primaries, arguing that the current system often results in Louisiana's newly elected members of Congress getting a late start - and less desirable committee assignments - on Capitol Hill because the state holds its runoff elections in December, a month later than other states.

His bill would have no effect on statewide and local elections.

If it becomes law, voters could cast ballots in two party primaries, then a November runoff, to select their congressmen and U.S. senators.

Under the current system, Louisiana holds a general primary in November, with candidates from all parties running on the same ballot. A December runoff follows if no candidate wins more than 50 percent of the vote.

The measure would also need approval from the U.S. Justice Department, because any change to Louisiana election law needs federal approval, a restriction stemming from the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Baltimore Sued For Arrests Without Charges (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz And Chris Yakaitis, Sun Reporters

The Baltimore Sun, June 16, 2006

ACLU, NAACP allege pattern; city solicitor denies actions illegal

The NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union sued the Baltimore Police Department and the state-run city jail Thursday, using the experiences of five men to allege a broad pattern of abuse in which they say thousands of people are routinely arrested and held for hours without being charged with a crime.

The lawsuit, filed in Baltimore Circuit Court by the Maryland ACLU, condemns the practice of jailing citizens for so-called quality-of-life crimes such as loitering -- one of the central strategies employed by police here and in other cities in their efforts to drive down crime.

The issue emerged just over a year ago with reports in The Sun of overcrowding at the Central Booking and Intake Facility.

The plaintiffs, including a 19-year-old Morgan State engineering student and two Pennsylvania residents visiting Baltimore for a bachelor party, allege that city police officers routinely make arrests without probable cause and do so "under a pattern and practice set and enforced by city officials."

City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler said the plaintiffs "will not be able to prove their truly wild allegations."

"The illegal arrests claim rests largely on a false equation," he said. "The fact that the state's attorney declines to charge in many cases does not suggest that the arrest was illegal."

Tyler said many factors play into a prosecutor's decision not to pursue charges. For example, a prosecutor might determine that the hours a person spent in Central Booking was an appropriate punishment for a minor crime -- a situation called "abatement by arrest."

Unaudited figures provided by the city State's Attorney's Office for the first three months of this year show that about one-third of the 3,110 arrests that did not result in charges were because of abatement by arrest.

The other two-thirds were because prosecutors believed they could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a crime occurred.

The number of declined cases is about half what it was last year -- a sign that police have become more selective in their arrests, perhaps responding to criticism voiced during a raucous community meeting in January.

David R. Rocah, an ACLU attorney, said an aim of the lawsuit, which he said has been in the works for almost a year, is to change police policy. Other defendants include the City Council, the mayor, state prison officials and individual police and correctional officers.

The lawsuit alleges "perverse incentives" for officers to arrest a large number of people, even if they have not committed crimes that will be prosecuted.

"Each patrol officer is required to tally his enforcement statistics, including citations and arrests," the lawsuit alleges.

"These numbers are then compared to averages from that officer's squad and shift. The three officers in each district with the lowest scores are subject to reassignment to other districts."

Paul M. Blair Jr., president of Baltimore's Fraternal Order of Police, said that in the past, "low-performers" were moved to other districts, but he said the command staff never made it clear whether performance was tied to arrest numbers.

He said that practice was abandoned more than a year ago, after a City Council meeting in which Police Commissioner Leonard D. Hamm assured the council there is no quota system.

But Blair said that during crime spikes, such as one last month, officers are told to flood neighborhoods and aggressively enforce quality-of-life crimes.

The suit also delves into three situations in which five named plaintiffs were arrested, detained for hours at Central Booking and then released without being charged with any crime.

Evan Howard, the Morgan State student, and his friend Tyrone Braxton, 19,were arrested April 15 of last year outside Howard's home on Poplar Grove Street in West Baltimore.

The men were told they were being arrested for loitering. They were taken to Central Booking, strip-searched and held there, Braxton for 36 hours and Howard for 54, the lawsuit states.

Donald Wilson, 21, was arrested April 10 on the front steps of a the Barclay home of his girlfriend and toddler. A crowd gathered when an unmarked police car raced past chasing a dirt bike, the lawsuit states.

Officers turned their attention toward the crowd when they did not catch the cyclist. One officer "threatened" Wilson after Wilson "firmly" responded to a question, the lawsuit states.

Wilson was arrested and held at Central Booking for about five hours before being released without charges.

A soon-to-be groom and six friends were celebrating his coming wedding near the Inner Harbor in May 2005. As they walked from the Power Plant Live entertainment area back to their hotel, a marked police car approached.

Officers told the group to keep walking.

"All of a sudden I see the cop hit my one buddy in the chest with a nightstick and he grabbed my other buddy and threw him up against the wall," said Robert Lowery, 27.

He and the groom, Aaron Stoner, 27, of Chambersburg, Pa., were arrested and taken to Central Booking for "failure to obey" an order to stop loitering, the officers told them.

They were strip-searched and held for about 17 hours. Neither was prosecuted.

Lowery, of Greencastle, Pa., said he had never had any trouble with the law and the experience soured his view of the city.

"Before, I enjoyed coming down to the Inner Harbor and hanging out for the day and walking around," he said. "Now I don't want to come back down."

The lawsuit also levels criticism at Central Booking, citing "filthy" conditions and "humiliating" strip-searches.

Mark A. Vernarelli, a spokesman for the state Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, declined to comment on the suit because he had not seen it. But he said numerous improvements were announced last summer to speed the booking process.

Rocah said the named plaintiffs are "among the many" who have contacted the ACLU reporting similar incidents. He said the lawsuit seeks monetary damages -- the amount is not specified -- for the five named plaintiffs.

Baltimore attorney James Rhodes, who said he represents hundreds of people who have complained about "frivolous arrests," said he doubted any change would result from the ACLU's lawsuit.

"They seem to want to get police to agree to stop making arrests when a citation could be issued," he said. "There is no way you will get an outright agreement like that because it takes away police power."

The ACLU and NAACP also released Thursday an action plan that proposes ways the police can resolve these issues.

Suggestions include creating incentives for officers for arrests that are successfully prosecuted, forcing officers to stop arresting people whom prosecutors won't charge, expunging arrest records when charges are not pursued and delaying strip and cavity searches of suspects until it can be determined whether charges will be filed.

Rocah said the lawsuit is long overdue on an issue that has undermined police relationships with city residents for years.

Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Joel Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Police officers assigned to protect Compton schools against vandalism and other campus crimes have been asleep at the wheel, quite literally, according to photographs and sworn testimony in a racial discrimination lawsuit.

The photographs appear to show several uniformed school officers in the driver's seats of parked squad cars with eyes shut and, in some cases, heads leaning back.

The pictures emerged in a suit against the Compton Unified School District, which operates the 34-member police department. The case was filed by a white ex-officer and two Latino officers who contend that they were treated differently from black colleagues within the predominantly African American department.

Former Officer Mark Shiva, who at one time served as president of the police officers union, and current Officers Victor Ayala and Sergio Reynoso allege that they were hit with racial slurs, ridiculed and retaliated against after lodging complaints against black colleagues.

Shiva, who was fired after the suit was filed in 2005, took the photographs within the last two years, according to testimony in the case. Shiva shot the pictures to prove that colleagues were sleeping on duty.

According to testimony, all of the officers accused of sleeping in patrol cars are black. But in the background of one photo, a white officer also appears to be sleeping. When the conduct was brought to the attention of supervisors, none of the officers were disciplined, authorities said.

During Sgt. James Bradford's deposition in March, he recalled being shown one of the pictures and thinking it was of such poor quality that he could not be sure it was even him in the photograph.

When pressed by an attorney as to whether he had ever slept on the job, Bradford responded by saying, "Let me clarify sleeping." He said that any officer on the night shift who denied sleeping "is lying."

"Sleeping, you can pull your car up to the site and ... you know, lay back with your eyes open for a few minutes, that's sleeping. All of us does."

Asked if it was permitted to take a nap on the job, Bradford said, "Your lunch break is your time."

Other police employees, however, testified that Bradford and other officers sometimes slept when not on breaks.

Police dispatcher Gwendolyn Holmes testified that she had seen Bradford sleeping on duty and estimated that it occurred at least 10 times over an unspecified two-month period. Occasionally, she said, she had heard him snoring.

Another sergeant testified that Bradford's sleeping on the job was a weekly occurrence.

Bradford declined to comment when contacted by The Times.

At least five other officers have also been accused of sleeping on duty, according to testimony, police records and photographs obtained by The Times.

The school district officers are armed and trained to face the same potential dangers as the Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies who serve the rest of Compton. In fact, in 1987 a Compton school officer was shot to death by a sniper while on foot patrol at an adult campus.

Sleeping on duty is against department policy and was identified as a problem in 2002 under the district's then-Police Chief Anthony Alba.

"Obviously this activity is considered dereliction of duty and will be dealt with administratively," Alba wrote in a Jan. 9, 2002, memo to officers. "I must also remind everyone that depending on the location, sleeping on duty may result in deadly officer safety consequences."

The district's current police chief, Hourie Taylor, testified in March that he had been made aware of the sleeping allegations but had not seen the photographs. He said he directed subordinates, one of whom was Sgt. Bradford, to conduct an investigation and that at some point they returned saying they were satisfied that the allegations had no substance.

In an interview this week, Taylor said the allegations were "unsubstantiated," but he declined further comment citing the pending litigation. He declined a request from The Times to review the photographs and identify the officers.

However, one sergeant, who was shown several photographs during his deposition, identified two others as Sgt. Bradford and Officer Douglas Mushett, who has since retired, and said he believed that a third picture showed an Officer Steve Scott, who resigned late last year, officials said.

In an interview Thursday, Mushett denied that he slept in his squad car when he was supposed to be on patrol but acknowledged that he would occasionally sleep during his lunch and twice daily 15-minute breaks.

"Let's face it, guys working late shifts would get tired and on their breaks would go back to the [station] and snooze," Mushett said. "We all did it. I did it."

He said he found it hard to believe that officers would sleep in their cars on the streets or on campuses. "That's just asking to get popped," he said.

Scott could not be reached for comment.

In an interview last week, Compton school board member Joel Estrada reacted angrily when told of the photographs.

"If those officers are not on a permitted break, then that is completely, utterly unacceptable," Estrada said. "I would definitely want an investigation launched to see what's going on — how common is this? We're paying these individuals to patrol."

Estrada said district lawyers had told board members about the claims of police sleeping on duty but that police officials had concluded the claims were unfounded.

School district attorney J. Michael Declues said the district denies the allegations contained in the lawsuit but declined to comment on the photographs.

Shiva also declined to comment to The Times, but in a deposition in April he elaborated on his allegations. He said he saw a female officer take a pillow to her patrol car so she could sleep while working overtime.

"It's been an ongoing problem since I've worked there," said Shiva, who served for five years.

Shiva also alleged that officers would drive their squad cars home and sleep there when they should have been patrolling.

Internal police documents show that Shiva was terminated for allegedly orchestrating an unlawful job action, or "blue flu," among other reasons. Ayala and Reynoso, who remain on the job, were disciplined for allegedly participating in the job action.

Attorney Yael Trock, who represents Ayala and Reynoso, said police administrators unjustly punished her clients while allowing other officers to "get away with failing to do their jobs." Co-counsel Etan Z. Lorant said the lawsuit is expected to go to trial this summer.

Metro Board Member Fired For Comment On Gays (WP)

By Lena H. Sun And Matthew Mosk

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday fired Robert J. Smith, his appointee on the Metro transit authority board, for referring to gay people as sexual deviants on a cable television show.

"Robert Smith's comments were highly inappropriate, insensitive and unacceptable," Ehrlich (R) said in a statement less than five hours after the controversy erupted during a Metro board meeting. "They are in direct conflict to my administration's commitment to inclusiveness, tolerance and opportunity."

At the Metro meeting, board member Jim Graham, who represents the District, had called for Smith to disavow his remarks or apologize or for Ehrlich to remove him. "As someone who cares deeply about human rights, and as an openly gay elected official . . . I cannot remain silent in the face of these comments," Graham said, reading from a prepared statement.

Smith acknowledged after the meeting that he had referred to homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy" during a political round-table discussion on a Montgomery County cable show that was shown on Sunday.

"Homosexual behavior, in my view, is deviant," he said. "I'm a Roman Catholic." Smith said his comments had been part of a discussion about a proposed ban on same-sex marriage. "The comments I make in public outside of my [Metro board job] I'm entitled to make," he said. His personal beliefs, he said, have "absolutely nothing to do with running trains and buses and have not affected my actions or decisions on this board."

Ehrlich appointed Raymond J. Briscuso Jr., who heads a biotech consulting company, to take Smith's place. Briscuso, 46, will serve the remainder of Smith's three-year term, which began June 1, 2004.

Briscuso, who used to ride Metro's Red Line regularly between his Bethesda home and his downtown Washington office, said he is "very excited" to serve on the board. Briscuso managed George H.W. Bush's presidential campaign in Maryland in 1988.

For several months, Ehrlich, who is likely to announce his reelection bid this month, has been working to position himself as a centrist. One recent report about a political advertisement the governor is recording suggested that he is considering the line: "Bob Ehrlich governs not from the right or the left, but the center, where we are."

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, who with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is seeking the Democratic nomination to oppose Ehrlich, said that "Smith's hateful and mean-spirited comments suggest that he is unfit to serve the public, and his immediate removal is wholly justified."

Smith, 47, a Gaithersburg architect, could not be reached by phone last night. Earlier in the day, he said he served at the pleasure of the governor.

Almost immediately after he was appointed, Smith drew attention by questioning expenses at the agency, criticizing spending on promotional materials and other items he considered luxuries. He read lengthy budget documents that other board members tend to skim and asked sharp questions of finance managers.

The Metro directors oversee a $1 billion operating budget and nearly 10,000 employees. They set policy for the nation's second-busiest subway and fifth-busiest bus system. Metro carries more than 1.1 million riders a day.

The board is made up of six voting members and six alternates. Maryland, the District and Virginia each appoint two voting and two alternate members. The board has a vacancy for an alternate D.C. member to fill the spot of Dan Tangherlini, who became the agency's interim general manager this year.

After Smith's removal from the board, Graham complimented Ehrlich for his swift action. "The governor appreciated the seriousness of this problem," he said.

After the meeting, Smith accused Graham, a D.C. Council member, of using "high theater" to seek the media spotlight. He called his actions "highly out of order and inappropriate for this forum."

Smith said he has always supported the transit agency's policy against all forms of discrimination.

Asked whether he planned to apologize to Graham after Graham said the remarks were offensive, Smith replied: "I didn't make the comments to Mr. Graham. . . . I'm sorry he feels that way. I don't agree that his lifestyle is an appropriate way to lead one's life."

Smith's comments drew an immediate negative reaction from Dennis Jaffe, chairman of the Riders Advisory Council, who has been working with Smith the past several months on a committee to improve MetroAccess, the transit service for the disabled.

"I know how dedicated Bob Smith is, but his comments that homosexuals are sexual deviants are most unfortunate and reflect poorly on Metro as an agency," Jaffe said.

In an e-mail sent to all Metro employees yesterday, Tangherlini said he wanted to take the opportunity "to re-affirm to all . . . employees that discrimination of any kind will not be tolerated."

Smith said he has been a regular panelist on the weekly political round-table show, "21 This Week," telecast on Access Montgomery cable Channel 21, for the past 12 years. He appears as a "Republican activist," according to Rodney Bryant, the show's producer.

On last weekend's show, Smith interrupted another speaker who was talking about federalism and Vice President Cheney's daughter. The speaker said Cheney's daughter, who is a lesbian, would not want the government interfering in her life, according to a recording of that portion of the show.

"That's fine, that's fine," Smith interrupted. "But that doesn't mean that government should proffer a special place of entitlement within the laws of the United States for persons of sexual deviancy."

Prayers In The Military (WP)

THE MILITARY has been making a good-faith effort in recent months to write rules on religious activities that preserve both the rights of free expression among service members and the separation of church and state. It's unfortunate, therefore, that the House of Representatives, responding to pressure from evangelical Christian groups, has unnecessarily inserted itself into this debate, with a provision in the recent defense authorization bill aimed at ensuring that evangelical chaplains can pray in Jesus's name at public ceremonies. The Senate is debating a version that wisely leaves out the House provision and lets the military services continue to work out this complex issue the right way -- without congressional interference.

No one questions that military chaplains of all denominations may pray as they wish in voluntary, private services. The issue is what they can say in public prayers. This is especially complicated because, in the view of some evangelical ministers, it would contravene their faith not to invoke Jesus; at the same time, having such sectarian prayers is problematic, particularly at mandatory events attended by service members of all faiths.

Recent guidelines adopted by the Air Force and Navy suggest that nondenominational prayer is strongly preferred in such circumstances. For example, the Navy policy says that "absent extraordinary circumstances," prayers at such functions "should be nonsectarian in nature."

Similarly, the Air Force policy says that chaplains "will not be required to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, inconsistent with their faiths" -- a provision designed to protect evangelical chaplains who believe sharing their faith in Jesus is an essential part of their ministry. However, the Air Force guideline adds, "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence may be appropriate for military ceremonies when its primary purpose is not the advancement of religious beliefs."

Though the Air Force regulations were watered down from their initial stance, they were still too restrictive for some evangelical groups. So the House stepped in with a provision, championed by Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), heavy on the rights of chaplains and light on concerns about how their public prayer could affect service members who are nonbelievers or who adhere to a different religion.

The provision guarantees chaplains "the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of the chaplain's own conscience, except as must be limited by military necessity, with any such limitation being imposed in the least restrictive manner feasible." In other words, almost anything goes.

This tilts too far in the direction of chaplains' freedom to pray, without due respect for those whose beliefs differ. As Rear Adm. Louis V. Iasiello, the chief of Navy chaplains, wrote in opposing the provision, "it is essential that the chaplain possess the trust and respect of all the crew, not simply the members of his or her own faith group."

Maybe the solution isn't to drain prayer at public ceremonies of specific religious content, but to discourage prayer at such events as inherently and unnecessarily divisive. Chaplains shouldn't be required to mute their faith, but neither should service members who aren't believers be compelled to be present for such prayers.

ANTITRUST:

Executive Pleads Guilty In Military Bid-rigging Case Over Foam Sales (VP)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, June 16, 2006

NORFOLK - An executive with a marine products company has agreed to plead guilty to conspiring to rig bids in the sale of foam buoys and fenders to the Navy and the Coast Guard, the Justice Department announced Thursday.

Gerald Thermos, president of Marine Fenders International, based in Wilmington, Calif., was charged in Norfolk federal court this week with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The Justice Department said Thermos has agreed to plead guilty to the felony, serve four months in jail and four months of home detention, and pay a $50,000 fine. No court date has been set.

The department said that from June 2000 to August 2005, Thermos and other unidentified co-conspirators schemed to fix prices for marine fenders and buoys that were sold to the Navy, the Coast Guard and other government and private entities.

Foam-filled fenders are used as a cushion between ships and docks, piers, other ships, and fixed structures. The buoys are used for channel markers and navigational aids.

Thermos and the others agreed which company would get contract bids, some at inflated prices. The other companies were not identified.

"Price fixing and bid rigging are serious concerns when it relates to products and services procured by the Department of Defense," Rick Gwin, special agent in charge of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, western field office, said in a news release.

The executives involved maintained log books and agreed not to compete with one another's customers either by not submitting bids or by submitting intentionally high prices, according to court records.

Department officials could not estimate how much taxpayers were overcharged.

According to charge papers filed Wednesday, the conspiracy occurred while Thermos was president of Marine Fenders International and while he was president of another company, Urethane Products Corp., from June 2000 to April 2004. Both companies are based in the Los Angeles area.

Urethane Products Corp. has received millions of dollars in Defense Department contracts in the past 10 years, mostly with the Navy, according to federal records. Marine Fenders, which is about two years old, received nearly $500,000 in government contracts.

Thermos could not be reached Thursday, and his attorney could not immediately comment.

Violations of the antitrust act carry penalties against individuals of as much as 10 years in prison and fines as great as $1 million.

Microsoft's Gates To Step Back (USAT)

By Byron Acohido And Michelle Kessler

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Microsoft chairman Bill Gates announced Thursday that he will let loose the reins of the company he co-founded in college and shaped into a behemoth, to focus on philanthropy.

Gates, 50, who was also Microsoft's chief software architect, will give up day-to-day duties in July 2008, retaining the title of chairman.

That will leave Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer and Chief Technical Officers Ray Ozzie and Craig Mundie to carry out a transition the software giant is struggling to make from lumbering supplier of desktop computer software to nimble competitor in a rapidly changing tech market.

Gates insisted that the change announced Thursday "is not a retirement." He plans to spend most of his time working for his charity, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

Gates says he plans to have a relationship with Microsoft for many years. "I don't see a time in the foreseeable future in which I won't be the chairman of this company," he said.

"This was a hard decision for me," said Gates, who founded the world's largest software company with childhood friend Paul Allen. "I'm very lucky to have two passions that I feel are so important and so challenging. As I prepare for this change, I firmly believe the road ahead for Microsoft is as bright as ever."

Ozzie will immediately assume Gates' title as chief software architect and begin working with Gates on overseeing all software technical design.

Mundie will immediately take the new title of chief research and strategy officer and will work with Gates in those areas. Mundie also will partner with general counsel Brad Smith to guide intellectual property and technology policy efforts.

"Bill and I are confident we've got a great team that can step up to fill his shoes and drive Microsoft innovation forward without missing a beat," Ballmer said. The news, released after the market closed, sent Microsoft shares down less than 1% in after-hours trading. It wasn't a complete surprise to analysts and investors who follow the company closely.

Gates gave up the CEO role to Harvard classmate and longtime confidant Ballmer in January 2000. Last year, he signaled a desire to further reduce his role by recruiting Ozzie, a renowned right-brain thinker, to infuse a fresh perspective. "The stage has been set for an orderly transition, and a two-year timeline assures there won't be a radical departure," says analyst Michael Gartenberg, of JupiterResearch. "And as my grandfather was fond of saying, 'Cemeteries are full of people who couldn't be replaced.' "

In its last fiscal year, ended June 30, Microsoft's revenue had doubled and profit grown nearly 60% from fiscal 1999, six months before Ballmer became CEO.

Ushering in Vista

Gates' primary job has been to usher in Windows Vista, the latest upgrade to the operating system used on nine of 10 desktop PCs. Vista, due early next year, has been beset by delays and feature downgrades just as the company is struggling to drum up reasons for corporations to ante up for upgrades of Windows and its signature Microsoft Office software suite.

"This might be the last generation of classic Microsoft products," says Charles King, principal analyst at Pund-IT Research. "Microsoft in five years is going to be a very different company than the one today."

The leadership will come from a different mold.

Gates, 50, and Allen started Microsoft in 1975, soon dropping out of college to devote full time to it. Gates took Microsoft public in 1986 and was chairman and CEO until 2000, the year he and his wife formed the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, whose assets now total $29.1 billion.

Vista and Office 12 may be the last classic Windows upgrades, feature-laden software that requires a lot of computer memory and processing power. But technology has shifted to harnessing the power of corporate networks and leveraging the Internet. Software and digital entertainment delivered over the Web signal the future course of technology.

Microsoft has hustled to catch up and is branching into those arenas, but its profits continue to revolve around Windows and Office. Meanwhile, it has faced ugly antitrust lawsuits in the USA and Europe.

Additionally, Microsoft's expansion into new markets has forced the company "to engage in a four-front war," says software analyst Stuart Williams at Technology Business Research. It must fight off Sony in video games, Google and Yahoo on the Internet, Oracle and SAP in business software and the free Linux operating system in servers.

Still, Gates said, Microsoft is on the right track - and that the leadership change will have little impact on the company's success.

"The world has had a tendency to focus a disproportionate amount of attention on me," he said. But in reality, Microsoft's success is based on hundreds of people, he said. "We are ready for members of our current team to step into an expanded role," he said.

When Gates steps down in 2008, Vista and Office 12 will have been on the market for a year.

The new team

Ozzie, 50, worked on the first electronic spreadsheet, VisiCalc, in the early 1980s. In 1983, he joined Lotus Development - Microsoft's archrival then - to develop Lotus Notes and other business software.

He later founded Groove Networks, where he developed Groove Virtual Office. Microsoft acquired Groove in April 2005 and named Ozzie chief technical officer. Gates once called Ozzie one of the five best software programmers alive.

"Ozzie gets the power of networks and the power of the Internet," says RedMonk analyst Stephen O'Grady.

Mundie, 56, joined Microsoft in 1992 to create and run its Consumer Platforms Division, responsible for non-personal computer software. Mundie also started Microsoft's digital TV efforts. His current responsibilities include global technology policy and a variety of technical and business incubation efforts.

Ozzie and Mundie will continue to report to Gates. At an unspecified time during the two-year transition, they will shift to reporting to Ballmer.

"Losing a person of (Gates') talent is a big deal, of course," Ballmer said. "But it's a chance for other people to assume even more responsibility."

Gates is legendary for his "ability to motivate employees at the lowest level of the company," says software analyst Al Gillen with researcher IDC. "Clearly, it's going to be a loss for the company not to have him filling that role."

But Ballmer, Ozzie and Mundie are "fantastically strong executives," Gillen says.

Gates said he's been mulling the role change for several weeks, and talking about it with his wife, Melinda. But he avoided bringing up the subject with Ballmer, his long-time business partner. Gates, laughing, said he repeatedly told his wife the subject "wasn't easy to bring up today. Maybe it will be easy to bring up tomorrow." Gates said he didn't make a final decision until Tuesday. Wednesday night, he told key executives at a dinner at Ballmer's house. Thursday morning, about 100 key Microsoft employees were notified.

Gates said he's not sure how he will handle the transition. "I don't know what it's going to feel like, not coming in every day and working 10 hours," he said.

Ballmer said Gates "is now headed, in my opinion, to become the greatest philanthropist of all time."

Two of Gates' contemporaries have made similar moves. Long-time Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy stepped down from the post earlier this year, though he remains chairman. And Ted Waitt, co-founder of PC-maker Gateway, retired in 2005. Both said they wanted more time for other projects.

It's not surprising that Gates does too, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. The role change "was a long time coming," he says. "At 50, (Gates) is still young, but not that young. It's time

After US Regulators, Came The Europeans . . . And It's Not Over Yet (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Microsoft's battles with antitrust regulators on both sides of the Atlantic have been a consistent feature of Bill Gates' tenure.

While the software group managed to broker a deal with the US authorities in 2002 that ended its regulatory troubles in the country, Microsoft's fight with the European Commission in Brussels is still very much alive.

In a landmark ruling in March 2004, the Commission found Microsoft guilty of violating European Union competition rules by abusing its dominant position in the market for personal computer operating systems. Microsoft was fined a record €497m ($628m) and told to change its business practices.

The group was told to share more information about its flagship Windows programme with rival companies and to stop bundling its Windows Media Player software with the operating system.

The ruling, which is under appeal, has since sparked a new case against Microsoft, because the Commission alleges that the group has not implemented the ruling properly. It has threatened to impose fresh fines of up to €2m a day unless Microsoft complies with the Brussels ruling speedily.

Adding to Microsoft's regulatory worries in Europe is the fact that Brussels is also taking aim at Vista, the operating system set to replace Windows next year.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, wrote to Microsoft this year warning that Vista could fall foul of competition rules - again by bundling new functionalities into the operating system and so shutting out rival software that is sold on a standalone basis.

Mr Gates, who took a highly active and very visible role in Microsoft's battle with US regulators, has largely taken a backseat role in Europe.

In fact, his first contact with Mario Monti, the former EU competition commissioner who presided over the Microsoft ruling, came only days before the Commission decided to rule against the group. The two men spoke briefly on the telephone, but did not discuss the substance of the case.

As with so many of the other challenges faced by the group today, the task of dealing with regulators around the globe has over recent years fallen largely to Steve Ballmer, who took over as Microsoft CEO in 2000.

Microsoft Wins Patent Case With 'EBay' Argument (LAW)

By Xenia P. Kobylarz, The Recorder

California Recorder, June 16, 2006

Microsoft Corp. appears to be the first company to benefit from the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision to end the long-standing presumption in patent cases that an injunction should be issued almost automatically when infringement is found.

Applying the Supreme Court's May ruling in MercExchange v. eBay, a Texas federal judge denied the request of Z4 Technologies Inc., a tiny Michigan software firm, to bar Microsoft from selling, making and using its infringing Windows and Office products.

The ruling, issued on Thursday by Judge Leonard Davis in the Eastern District of Texas, signals a major shift in patent litigation practice and is the first indication of how the eBay ruling has quickly become important to the way companies fight patent infringement claims.

"This will be the classic first example of how the eBay case is going to limit the number of injunctions in patent cases," said Michael Barclay, a patent litigation partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

"This is also big news, given the reputation of the Eastern District of Texas as being pro plaintiff," he added.

Harold McElhinny, co-chairman of Morrison & Foerster's patent litigation group, said the ruling is likely to break "wide open" the question of whether an injunction applies in every patent case.

"Z4 does not fit the traditional definition of a patent troll. It is a company that is in the market and making a product and trying to compete with Microsoft, so now it looks like every defendant can use the eBay logic against all companies, regardless of whether they're trolls or not," McElhinny said.

In April, a Texas jury found Microsoft and Autodesk willfully infringed two of Z4's patents covering methods for limiting unauthorized use of computer software. Both Microsoft and Autodesk use the anti-piracy program in some of their products. The jury ordered the two companies to pay Z4 a combined $133 million in damages, the biggest award ever in a patent case to come out of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas.

In refusing Z4's request for a permanent injunction against Microsoft, Davis used the traditional four-factor test recommended by the high court to determine whether to issue an injunction. He concluded that Z4 will not suffer irreparable harm in the absence of a permanent injunction.

The judge ruled that because Microsoft only uses the infringing technology as a small component of its own software, Z4 will not lose profits, brand-name recognition or market share.

"[I]t is not likely that any consumer of Microsoft's Windows or Office software purchases these products for their product activation functionality," Davis wrote.

Davis also cited Justice Anthony Kennedy's concurring opinion from the eBay case in justifying the denial of an injunction. He said Kennedy's comment that if a patented invention is but a small component of the infringing product, monetary damages should be sufficient compensation.

The court also found that the balance of hardships tilts in favor of Microsoft because it would require the company to redesign and re-release all its Office software products, which currently are distributed in 450 variations in 37 languages. Its Windows product currently has 600 variations in more than 40 languages.

Neither Microsoft nor Z4 returned calls for comment on Thursday.

Davis' ruling cited possible harm in public interest if the court enjoins Microsoft.

"Microsoft's Windows and Office software products are likely the most popular software products in the world," Davis wrote. "Accordingly, the public interest is likely to be disserved if a permanent injunction were entered against Microsoft."

Barclay said that reasoning surprised him.

"It's ironic that Microsoft was able to use its enormous market position to stop the court from issuing an injunction," Barclay said.

But McElhinny said it is a positive development that courts may now weigh the public's interest in cases where the public could be greatly inconvenienced and the plaintiff can be served by a royalty fee.

"It seems right to deny an injunction in a case like that," McElhinny said.

Prior to the eBay ruling, however, Blackberry maker Research In Motion failed to persuade a court to stop an injunction based on the inconvenience its millions of users would have faced had the company been enjoined from offering its wireless e-mail service. The Canadian company ended up paying more than $600 million to settle the patent suit against it.

France's Vinci Snubs Merger Proposal From Utility Veolia DOW JONES NEWSWIRES (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

PARIS -- Vinci SA rejected a merger approach from French water utility Veolia Environnement SA, calling it unsolicited and hostile.

In rejecting the proposal, Vinci, a French construction company, said a merger of the two entities "would have no strategic interest, would not create synergies and would not create value for its shareholders."

Veolia's board had asked Veolia's chairman Wednesday to study a friendly merger with Vinci, a move that would create a utility and services company valued at about €34 billion, or $43 billion.

After Vinci rejected the proposal, Veolia said it "regrets Vinci's opposition to review the interest of a potential friendly alliance."

Veolia, the world's largest water utility by revenue, has been looking to expand its concessions business and is eager to increase its €16.9 billion market capitalization to compete with larger, more financially powerful conglomerates such as water and energy utility Suez SA. Vinci's market capitalization is €19 billion.

Many analysts have criticized the idea of a Veolia-Vinci combination, agreeing with Vinci management on the merger's lack of industrial or financial merit.

"We see little strategic and financial interest in this merger for Vinci shareholders, and there is in our view very little chance that it could succeed," said Cheuvreux analyst Arnaud Lehmann.

Bush Creates Marine Sanctuary (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush created a vast marine sanctuary yesterday, extending stronger federal protections to the northwestern Hawaiian Islands and the surrounding waters with their endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

The nation's newest national monument covers an archipelago stretching 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide in the Pacific Ocean. It is home to more than 7,000 species, at least a fourth of them found nowhere else.

"To put this area in context, this national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Mr. Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined. This is a big deal."

Mr. Bush announced his creation of the nation's 75th national monument at a White House ceremony. The decision immediately sets aside 140,000 square miles of largely uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reef colonies and underwater peaks known as seamounts to be managed by federal and state agencies.

In introducing the president, first lady Laura Bush quoted Mark Twain, who once described Hawaii as "the loveliest fleet of islands that lies anchored in any ocean."

Conrad C. Lautenbacher, head of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which will manage nearly all of it, said the new protected area would dwarf all others.

"It's the single-largest act of ocean conservation in history. It's a large milestone," Mr. Lautenbacher said. "It is a place to maintain biodiversity and to maintain basically the nurseries of the Pacific. It spawns a lot of the life that permeates the middle of the Pacific Ocean."

It is the second time that Mr. Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features. The law turned 100 this month.

The president had planned as late as Wednesday to use instead the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others to the decision, said a senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity so as not to upstage Mr. Bush.

"This means the area will get immediate protection rather than having to wait another year," the official said, adding that Mr. Bush opted at the last minute to create a national monument after realizing the process had been ongoing for five years and elicited thousands of comments.

With the national monument designation, the federal government can begin an immediate five-year phaseout of the eight commercial fishing permits in the area and impose strict prohibitions on any other extractive uses, the official said.

In February, Mr. Bush used the antiquities law for the first time when he declared part of the African Burial Ground in the Lower Manhattan section of New York City a national monument. The site, covering less than half an acre, marks where an estimated 20,000 slaves and free blacks were buried in the 18th century.

President Clinton used the act to create 19 national monuments and expand three others to set aside 5.9 million acres of land.

Pacific Sanctuary Gets Bush's Signature (LAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush created a vast new marine sanctuary Thursday, extending stronger federal protections to the northwest Hawaiian Islands and the surrounding waters with their endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument covers an archipelago 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide in the Pacific Ocean. It is home to more than 7,000 species, at least one-fourth of them found nowhere else.

"To put this area in context, this national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined. This is a big deal."

Creation of the nation's 75th national monument was announced at a White House ceremony. The decision immediately sets aside 140,000 square miles of largely uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reef colonies and underwater peaks known as seamounts to be managed by federal and state agencies.

Bush said he drew inspiration from a documentary on the island chain's biological resources shown at the White House in April by Jean-Michel Cousteau, the marine explorer and filmmaker. Over dinner that night, Bush said he also got "a pretty good lecture about life" from marine biologist Sylvia Earle, an explorer-in-residence at the National Geographic Society.

In introducing the president, First Lady Laura Bush quoted Mark Twain, who once described Hawaii as "the loveliest fleet of islands that lies anchored in any ocean."

Conrad C. Lautenbacher, head of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which will manage nearly all of the protected area, said: "It's the single largest act of ocean conservation in history. It's a large milestone."

He added: "It is a place to maintain biodiversity and to maintain basically the nurseries of the Pacific. It spawns a lot of the life that permeates the middle of the Pacific Ocean."

It is only the second time that Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features.

Bush had planned as late as Wednesday to use the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others.

"As we drew closer and closer to our target to propose a marine sanctuary, and coupled with his great experience with Jean-Michel Cousteau and Sylvia Earle, he realized that we had the consensus, that we had run the process, and the time was right to just get the job done," said James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

Designating the area as a national monument takes immediate effect, Connaughton said, and the government doesn't have to wait to begin a five-year phaseout of the eight or nine commercial fishing permits in the area and to impose strict prohibitions on any other extractive uses.

In February, Bush used the antiquities law for the first time when he declared part of the African Burial Ground in Lower Manhattan a national monument. The site, covering less than half an acre, marks where an estimated 20,000 slaves and free blacks were buried in the 18th century.

Bush Signs Legislation On Broadcast Decency (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Complaining that television and radio shows in recent years have "too often pushed the bounds of decency," President Bush signed legislation yesterday to escalate dramatically the penalties against broadcasters who violate federal standards.

"The language is becoming coarser during the times when it's more likely children will be watching television," Bush said, citing a study of nighttime programming. "It's a bad trend, a bad sign." He noted that complaints to regulators have exploded since he took office. "People are saying, 'We're tired of it, and we expect the government to do something about it.' "

The ceremony came on a busy day for Bush as he tended to various matters in between his surprise visit to Baghdad this week and a domestic fundraising trip starting today followed by a European summit next week. In back-to-back events, Bush also gave a speech calling for action on stalled global trade talks, signed a bill to improve coal mine safety and authorized creation of the world's largest protected marine reserve.

The White House decided to showcase the signing of the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act at a time when Bush and Republican congressional allies are trying to reassure disaffected conservative supporters that they remain committed to conservative causes. With midterm elections approaching, Bush recently gave two speeches promoting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and the Senate plans to vote on another amendment that outlaws flag burning.

The decency act, coming two years after one of singer Janet Jackson's breasts was exposed in a "wardrobe malfunction" during a Super Bowl halftime show, increases the maximum penalty for broadcasting indecent material on radio or television between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m. from $32,500 to $325,000. The new law does not change the standards of indecency, which is defined as "patently offensive" sexual or excretory content.

Broadcasters and free-speech advocates argue that the legislation attacks expression and unfairly targets broadcast networks while cable and satellite programming remains beyond the reach of federal regulation. The main television networks and affiliates recently sued to challenge the government's power to regulate on-air content.

The National Association of Broadcasters yesterday released the same statement it issued when the legislation passed, calling "responsible self-regulation" the preferred path and asserting that any rules "should be applied equally" to cable and satellite outlets.

Bush also signed legislation to bolster safety in coal mines after a spate of deadly accidents, including the January explosion in West Virginia that trapped a dozen men who ultimately died. The lone survivor of that accident, Randal McCloy Jr., attended yesterday's ceremony. The new law requires more emergency supplies of breathable air, more accessible rescue teams and higher fines for violations.

At a separate event, the president signed a proclamation designating 140,000 square miles of sea and uninhabited islands northwest of Hawaii a national monument, an area larger than all but four states. The designation affords federal protection for the home of 7,000 marine species, including virtually the entire population of endangered Hawaiian monk seals.

The president also devoted part of his day to international trade and development, addressing a group formed by former secretaries of state Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright aimed at reducing global poverty. Bush used the occasion to urge

Congress to pass his proposed increases in foreign aid and to press foreign leaders to work harder to reach a global trade deal with a June 30 deadline for basic agreements looming.

Accompanied by newly sworn-in U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab, Bush acknowledged that the so-called Doha trade talks have encountered "tough sledding" but said he would push for breakthroughs to lower trade barriers when he travels to Austria and Hungary next week.

"In my view, countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming and the G-20 countries have to make a tough decision on manufacturing," he said, referring to a group of 20 developing nations. "And the United States is prepared to make a tough decision along with them. That's my message to the world."

Bush Plan: World's Largest Ocean Reserve (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

With the stroke of a pen, President Bush has established the largest ocean wildlife reserve in the world, centered along a string of islands, reefs, and atolls that stretch 1,400 miles northwest of the main Hawaiian Islands.

Other reef systems, such as Australia's Great Barrier Reef, are larger. But only a third of that UN-designated World Heritage reef is protected, analysts say, leaving far more of it open to exploitation.

The move comes from an administration not known as the darling of the environmental and conservation crowd. But it's drawing kudos from a variety of marine-conservation groups. The region's relative isolation has allowed it to retain some of the most pristine coral reefs in the world. The president's proclamation Thursday, which designated the area as a national monument, immediately created a reserve that covers some 140,000 square miles, more territory than all of America's national parks combined.

"This is just amazing," says Ellen Athas, ecosystems-protection director for the Ocean Conservancy in Washington, who served on the president's Council on Environmental Quality under Bill Clinton. "This is an important first step in protecting some of the world's healthiest reefs for future generations."

The key provisions include:

• Restricting tourism activities, such as fishing and diving, to Midway Island, at the far northwest end of the chain.

• Phasing out commercial fishing over the next five years and banning it thereafter.

• Banning all resource extraction and waste-dumping.

• Banning "boats for hire," only allowing access to the area for research benefiting the reserve and for educational purposes.

• Preserving access for native Hawaiians - whose ancestors hopscotched down the chain to settle the Hawaiian Islands - for religious and cultural uses.

"This represents the first big symbol of - and inspiration for - a new generation of ocean conservation," says a senior White House official, who notes that the administration has been working on the issue for five years. "These are the Galápagos Islands in our own backyard."

Several analysts add that, in some respects, the move is a political no-brainer for the White House. Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, has imposed similar restrictions in the region out to the state's three-mile limit, which built local support for expanding the restrictions. Except for a handful of commercial fishermen, the proposal has drawn virtually no opposition from other commercial interests because the region lacks oil deposits and other easily exploitable resources.

Still, "this is an extraordinary act for any sitting president," enthuses Joshua Reichert, director of policy initiatives and the environment program for the Pew Charitable Trust.

For all their biological diversity, the Northwest Hawaiian Islands are a chain of geophysical leftovers - about 10 islands and 100 coral atolls - that have emerged over geological time. They point to the eventual future for today's main islands as the crust continues to move and generate new undersea volcanoes to the southeast of the chain.

The first efforts to conserve the area came under Teddy Roosevelt, who designated the islands as national wildlife sanctuaries to protect seabird populations.

The next major move came under President Clinton, who signed an executive order in 2000 setting portions of the region aside as a national marine sanctuary. But executive orders can be rescinded by subsequent presidents.

President Bush's proclamation makes this permanent.

A key reason for the excitement among scientist and conservation groups is the reefs' relatively untrammeled condition. As a result, they represent the best example of what coral reef ecosystems should look like at a time many reefs around the world are under increasing stress from human and natural causes. Thus, it can provide a blueprint for restoration efforts elsewhere.

And their isolation has led to the evolution there of a large number of rare species of marine life found nowhere else in the world, notes Aulani Wilhelm, acting manager of the existing reserve. "This really is a living laboratory," she says.

To accelerate the phase-out of commercial fishing, one conservation group has expressed interest in negotiating a buyout of their permits, in effect retiring them immediately. Researchers point out that even the small amount of commercial fishing that has taken place in the Northwest Hawaiian Islands has virtually wiped out the chain's lobster population. The chain's bottom-dwelling fish are under increased pressure as well, researchers say.

And it's unclear what sort of stimulus this move will provide for setting other areas aside along US coasts because of the remote location, lack of deep commercial controversies, and a congressional moratorium on additional reserves. Still, a new reserve would represent a significant addition to those being established by other Pacific nations, such as Fiji and Kiribati.

Says one administration official: "By setting aside something on this scale, this is telling the rest of the world that the US is willing to walk the walk" on marine conservation.

Islands Apart (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

An unfamiliar but highly appealing side of President Bush showed itself at the White House yesterday. It was Mr. Bush the compassionate conservationist, friend of green sea turtles, seabirds and Hawaiian monk seals, savior of coral reefs and spiny lobsters, creator of the largest ocean sanctuary on the planet.

Mr. Bush has made the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument, putting them under some of the strictest environmental protections the law provides. It was an act of wilderness preservation that, acre for acre, instantly put him into the same league as the conservation-minded presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton.

If the state of Hawaii is a garland of flowers, the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands are a spray of petals, an arc of tiny reefs and atolls extending 1,200 miles beyond the last bits of Hawaii any tourists see. They are strewn across an area bigger than 100 Yosemites. They are among the remotest islands in the world, and in many ways pristine. Some in Hawaii call them the "kupuna islands," using the Hawaiian word for elders, since they teach people what the Pacific was like before plundering and pollution. Sharks, not fishing boats, are still at the top of the food chain. Ancient colonies of living coral reach heights of 80 feet. A quarter of the 7,000 marine species there exist nowhere else.

These islands are distant, but not undisturbed. The monk seals are endangered. Black-lipped pearl oysters were wiped out 75 years ago. The lobster fishery crashed in the 1990's. The islands' bottom-dwelling fish, snappers known on Hawaiian menus as opakapaka and onaga, are in serious decline.

Mr. Bush created the sanctuary by fiat, but his decision reflects a long-held consensus that the islands need protecting. Theodore Roosevelt created the first refuge there in 1909. Governor Linda Lingle had already imposed strict protections on her state's portion of the islands' waters. Mr. Bush, who overturned many of Bill Clinton's executive orders soon after taking office, spared two that had enabled the creation of a sanctuary there. His action yesterday, which ends sportfishing immediately and commercial fishing in five years, brought that process to a satisfying and necessary close.

In some ways, Mr. Bush's decision was supremely easy — the end of commercial fishing will affect only eight fishermen. But even so, the mind reels a little at what Mr. Bush has done. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands are a vast place few Americans have ever visited or ever will. But they are being protected anyway — not for divers, fishermen or cruise ships, but for their own sake, for science and forever. Mr. Bush made exemplary use of presidential power yesterday. We hope he does more of it.

Saving The Islands (WP)

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

ENVIRONMENTAL protection is not an area in which the Bush administration has cloaked itself in glory. But yesterday the president took a major step in ecosystem protection, designating as a national monument 140,000 square miles of some of the nation's most precious but vulnerable waters and islands.

The territory -- about the size of Montana -- is a remote, unpopulated string of islands extending 1,400 miles northwest from Hawaii's populated regions. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands, despite human impact, remain one of the most pristine natural regions left in the country. The waters there contain America's largest coral reef system. The islands are the nesting grounds of millions of seabirds, sea turtles and the endangered Hawaiian monk seal. The chain is home to at least 7,000 species, a quarter of which live nowhere else in the world -- along with relatively healthy stocks of large predatory fish whose populations elsewhere have been decimated by commercial fishing. The designation turns the waters around the island chain into the largest protected marine area in the world and sets an important marker for aggressive conservation of sensitive ocean regions under threat from human activity.

What's impressive is not just the designation itself but the fine print of President Bush's order. Despite tenacious pressure from regional fisheries managers, Mr. Bush decided not to permit any commercial fishing in the area. The small amount that goes on now will be phased out; a coalition of private donors will buy out the fishing permits of the eight fishermen who currently work those waters. What's more, in a happy surprise, Mr. Bush used his power under the National Antiquities Act to designate national monuments, not the more cumbersome federal marine sanctuaries law. As a result the plan goes into effect immediately, bypassing months of additional bureaucratic wrangling.

This administration and future ones should follow up with similar actions to protect other ecologically sensitive marine systems. America began protecting its land-based national parks and monuments a century ago, but the country has lagged in shielding its underwater treasures. Mr. Bush's action offers an exciting example of assertive action to put essential areas beyond further human destruction.

Senate Democrats Cry Foul Over Toxic Waste Sites (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Washington — Senate Democrats on Thursday accused the Bush administration of withholding key details about toxic waste sites that present risks of exposure to nearby residents.

At a congressional hearing, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said the Environmental Protection Agency had designated as confidential the details of about 140 Superfund sites where toxic exposure remains uncontrolled.

Boxer and other Democrats said the secret data included information about how much money and time it would take to clean up the dangerous sites, including one where the EPA predicted it would take 26 years to close off access to toxics.

"This isn't a question of left or right," Boxer said, waving a document marked "Privileged" by EPA officials to prevent its release to the public. "This is a question of right and wrong."

The EPA said that it had only blocked information related to law enforcement and that the public had access to all relevant health risk data for the sites, seven of which are in California.

"There is far more information available for each (high priority) site than has ever been available before," said Susan Parker Bodine, the assistant administrator responsible for the Superfund program, which was designed to clean up toxic waste sites, such as chemical dumping grounds and contaminated factories.

Republicans said Democrats were trying to manufacture a political issue, noting that Senate tradition has long prevented the release of sensitive information.

They also said they feared Democrats were seeking to reinstate a controversial tax in which chemical manufacturers and other companies are forced to pay a fee to contribute to cleaning up waste sites, even if the companies played no role in creating the mess.

"This tax would fall on businesses already paying for their own cleanup or that had never created any kind of a Superfund site," said Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., the chairman of the Senate Environment Committee. "It would put a burden on those companies."

Democrats have routinely accused the Bush administration of restricting access to information designed to protect the public. One Republican-sponsored bill moving through Congress would limit data available on toxic substances released into local communities, while the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has blocked information on flooding dangers in Florida.

Thursday's hearing of the Superfund and Waste Management Subcommittee was the first in four years. The Superfund program was created almost three decades ago in response to environmental disasters such as Love Canal, a neighborhood in Niagara Falls, N.Y., where chemical contamination forced the removal of 800 families and $200 million in remediation costs.

The cleanup effort has drawn criticism ever since, from environmentalists who claim it is under-funded and too slow, and from industry officials who say it is costly and punitive.

Bodine said that the agency had made significant progress, but that larger, more costly projects take more time to remediate, including many of the 140 sites at issue at Thursday's hearing.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said he was "disturbed" by some of the answers from Bodine, who at times appeared flustered and at a loss for words under the Democrats' withering questions. New Jersey, with 20, has the highest number of sites with uncontrolled exposure.

The EPA's decision to withhold information is "nonsense and everybody knows it's nonsense," Lautenberg said. "It's deceptive."

Of the roughly 140 Superfund sites said by Senate Democrats to cause "uncontrolled human exposure" to toxic waste, seven are in California:

Bush Signs Bill Overhauling Mine Safety (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP2, June 15, 2006

With the sole survivor of the Sago mine disaster looking on, President Bush signed into law the first major overhaul of mine safety laws in three decades.

"Only one man came out, and he's with us today," Bush said Thursday of Randal McCloy Jr., who is still recovering from carbon monoxide poisoning from the January accident that killed a dozen miners in West Virginia. McCloy received a standing ovation from those attending the White House ceremony.

The new law, the first of its kind since 1977, requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen on hand while they work, rather than one.

Mine operators also must store additional oxygen supplies underground and must put new communications equipment and devices to track lost miners in mines within three years.

Congress passed the mine safety bill following a string of fatal accidents this year. Thirty-three miners have been killed on the job in the United States since the beginning of January, up from 22 throughout 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0034788

"We make this promise to American miners and their families: We'll do everything possible to prevent mine accidents and make sure you're able to return safely to your loved ones," Bush said.

The president exchanged hugs and words with miners' families after he signed the bill.

In an emotional exchange with Pam Campbell, whose brother-in-law Marty Bennett died at Sago, Bush said, "I saw your eyes," referring to the tears Campbell shed when Bush was making his remarks.

"They've been that way a while," Campbell replied.

Deborah Hamner, whose husband, George Hamner, was killed at Sago, told the president that she was honored to attend the ceremony but opposed his choice to head the Mine Safety and Health Administration.

Bush's nominee, Richard Stickler, faces staunch opposition from Senate Democrats and miners' advocates. They say he has spent too many years as a coal industry executive.

Bush defended his pick during the speech before the bill signing. "He was a miner, mine shift foreman, a superintendent, and a manager, and the Senate needs to confirm Richard Stickler to this key position," Bush said.

The new safety law includes a requirement that rescue teams be located within an hour of each mine, rather than two hours away.

The law also calls for the government to study whether mine rescue chambers ought to be built into underground coal mines. Such refuges are credited with saving the lives of 72 potash miners in Canada earlier this year.

Pennsylvania Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell, who attended the signing, said the bill should have required the rescue chambers to be put in place in coal mines.

West Virginia Democratic Gov. Joe Manchin and Kentucky Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher also turned out for the ceremony, and both praised the new law.

"We've kept the promise to the families that their brave loved ones have not died in vain," Manchin said.

Peggy Cohen, who lost her father, Fred Ware, at Sago, said she hoped lawmakers would continue to strengthen mine safety laws. "It's a start," she said of the new law. "Let's hope it's not the end."

Clinton Praises Evangelical Christians (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton praised evangelical Christians on Thursday for their recent efforts on global warming and debt relief for poor nations and said he sees growing understanding between people of different faiths.

Clinton made the remarks while accepting an award from the Tanenbaum Center for Interreligious Understanding. He said that as president he had "a consuming interest in the intersection of religion and politics."

He said evangelicals, few of whom voted for him, "were instrumental in the biggest debt relief initiative in history in my last year as president because they believed in the admonition of the Scripture to alleviate the burdens of the poor."

Clinton also noted the publication earlier this year of "Climate Change: An Evangelical Call to Action," which was signed by many leading conservative Christians and which frames environmental protection as a Christian imperative.

The mission of the New York-based Tanenbaum Center is to defuse physical violence perpetrated in the name of religion worldwide.

Clinton, speaking at the group's awards luncheon, said religion is a problem for both liberals and conservatives in the United States.

"For people in America who are a part of my political tradition, our great sin has often been ignoring religion or denying its power or refusing to engage it because it seemed hostile to us," he said. "For ... the so-called Christian right and its allies, their great sin has been believing they were in full possession of the truth."

Clinton, a Southern Baptist, noted that there was once a resolution at his denomination's convention to expel his church because of his positions in favor of abortion rights and gay rights. It failed.

A Shift Among The Evangelicals (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

Sometimes very important elections receive very little attention.

When the Southern Baptist Convention elected the Rev. Frank Page as the group's president at its meeting this week in Greensboro, N.C., the news appeared on the back pages of most secular newspapers -- or it didn't appear at all.

But Page's upset victory could be very significant, both to the nation's religious life and to politics. He defeated candidates supported by the convention's staunchly conservative establishment, which has dominated the organization since the mid-1980s. His triumph is one of many signs that new breezes are blowing through the broader evangelical Christian world.

No, this is not some liberal victory. Indeed, the Baptist Press reported that Page went out of his way to tell reporters that he was not elected "to somehow undo the conservative resurgence" in the convention. But he also signaled that the spirit he hopes to embody is quite different from that of the angry, right-wing, politicized preacher who has been a stock figure in American life for more than two decades.

"I believe in the word of God," Page said. "I'm just not mad about it."

The mellowing of evangelical Christianity may well be the big American religious story of this decade. The evolution of the evangelical movement should not be confused with the rise of a religious left. Although the margin of the Republican Party's advantage among white evangelicals is likely to decline from its exceptionally high level in the 2004 election, a substantial majority of white evangelicals will probably remain conservative and continue to vote Republican.

But the evangelical political agenda is broadening as new voices insist on the urgency of issues such as Third World poverty and the fights against AIDS and human trafficking. Among the most prominent advocates for a wider view of Christian obligation is Rick Warren, pastor of Saddleback Church in Lake Forest, Calif., and author of "The Purpose Driven Life."

In the meantime, Rich Cizik, vice president for governmental affairs at the National Association of Evangelicals (and a self-described "Ronald Reagan movement conservative"), has been a leader in urging evangelicals to make environmental stewardship a central element of their political mission. This has earned him attacks from such prominent leaders on the Christian right as James Dobson.

In the Southern Baptist election, Page, pastor of First Baptist Church in Taylors, S.C., defeated two candidates more closely associated with the convention's conservative leadership, the Rev. Ronnie Floyd of Springdale, Ark., and the Rev. Jerry Sutton of Nashville. The election was important because the Southern Baptist Convention has been the locus of fierce struggles between moderates and conservatives in which the right emerged triumphant.

In response to the resulting purges and acrimony, moderate and progressive Baptists formed new organizations such as the Nashville-based Baptist Center for Ethics. Robert Parham, the center's executive director, argues that it would be a mistake to read too much into Page's triumph. "This was a race between the right and the far right," Parham said. "One election neither makes a positive trend nor unmakes the essence of fundamentalism."

Bill Leonard, the dean of the Wake Forest University Divinity School, largely agrees with Parham's analysis but argues that many Baptists are sensitive to "static or declining" membership numbers and the rising popularity of nondenominational churches such as Warren's.

The election, he said, indicates that "the leadership of the denomination that pushed it hard to the right on theological and social issues is aging or passing from the scene and is unable to rally the troops as they once did."

"Some people," Leonard added, "are tired of just fighting liberals. You need a reason to be a Southern Baptist other than just fighting liberals in the culture or in the church."

One other force was at work in this year's Baptist voting: the rise of the blogosphere.

Over the past several years, an active network of Baptist bloggers has opened up discussion in the convention and given reformers and moderates avenues around what Parham called "the Baptist establishment papers" and other means of communication controlled by the convention's leadership. Thus may some of our oldest and most traditional institutions be transformed by new technologies.

Religious movements stay vibrant thanks to the complicated interaction of fidelity, reflection and reform. The evangelical world is going through a quiet evolution as believers reflect on the perils of partisanship and ideology and their reasons for being Christian. This will probably affect the nation's political life, but it will certainly affect the country's spiritual direction. My hunch is that not only moderates and liberals but also many solid conservatives welcome the departure.

Alaska Is Front Line Vs. Avian Virus (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

BARROW, Alaska — Within sight of an Arctic radar station built for Cold War warnings of air attacks from Soviet Siberia, government scientists are stalking birds that could be carrying a new menace from Asia: the H5N1 avian influenza virus.

Tundra swans, lesser snow geese, spectacled eiders, long-billed dowitchers, bar-tailed godwits, northern pintails, ruddy turnstones: They all come to America. Wildlife biologists don't know which of these birds, if any, will be the first to carry the killer virus from the Eastern Hemisphere over the North Pole and down the flyways to the Lower 48.

Barrow, on the icy shore of the Arctic Ocean, is the USA's northernmost settlement. Two flyways for wild birds on their spring migration from Asia cross above the predominantly Inupiat Eskimo city of 4,800 people. As the birds nest on the marshy tundra under the midnight sun, 25 biologists are checking them for the first signs that H5N1 has reached the Americas.

"So far, no positives," says Hon Ip, a virologist at the National Wildlife Health Center in Madison, Wis., which has analyzed 1,000 bird samples shipped by scientists in Alaska since April.

"I hope we don't find it," says Corey Rossi, a U.S. Agriculture Department wildlife biologist based in Alaska. "But we're going to look as hard as we can. The public can take some reassurance in that."

The Alaskan early-warning project is on the front line of a $29 million federal program to test thousands of birds in 50 states this year to guard against a possible pandemic. "It's a good thing they're here, hopefully protecting the rest of the North American continent," says Bekah Barr, 20, a hotel employee in Barrow.

Biologists here find that in addition to anal swabs for sampling bird feces, they'll need plenty of patience to get the job done.

In snow flurries at Barrow's municipal landfill one afternoon, Rossi sets out bait for sea gulls. It's chunks of the pink whale blubber Eskimos call muktuk, a local delicacy. If the seabirds roost on the bait, Rossi's team will fire cannons to deploy a net that traps them for testing. But the birds aren't gulled; they don't nibble until the scientists have left for the day.

There's another disappointment later that day at a nearby pond. Sandpipers, phalaropes and dunlins, small shorebirds that winter near Chinese and Vietnamese chicken farms devastated by the flu, walk toward Rossi's gossamer-thin "mist" net. A wind ripples the net, making it visible to the birds. They flutter away.

"Some days you spend a lot of energy, and you get an empty sack," Rossi says. "But you just gotta keep pressing on."

Undeterred, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service biologists go off by helicopter the next day to search for nests on the Alaskan North Slope tundra south of here. They tote shotguns in case bears attack.

"Swabbing butts is not my usual thing, but it's a national emergency," biologist Rick Lanctot says.

Public health officials have been bird-watchers since an outbreak of the H5N1 strain in poultry in Hong Kong in 1997 was blamed for 18 influenza cases in people. Six people died. An outbreak in Southeast Asia in 2003 has spread to more than 50 countries in Asia, Europe and Africa. It has caused the deaths of 200 million birds and at least 129 people, says Juan Lubroth, a veterinary scientist with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) in Rome.

If the virus turns up in the USA, the first threat would be to the $43 billion-a-year poultry industry. A greater fear is that a pandemic could break out if the virus were to mutate into a form that is easier to transmit from person to person. In 1918, a bird flu that jumped into humans caused the "Spanish flu" pandemic. It killed 20 million to 50 million people worldwide, including more than 500,000 in the USA.

Until last year, Lubroth says, scientists doubted that wild birds could carry or transmit lethal avian flu viruses such as H5N1. The only precedent was in 1961, when H5N1 killed terns in South Africa.

Then in the spring of 2005, 6,200 birds — bar-headed geese, cormorants, gulls and shelducks — were found dead at Qinghai Lake in west-central China. The HN51 viruses that killed them spread from the lake through swans and other migratory waterfowl across Asia and into Europe, according to a study by Hualan Chen of China's Harbin Veterinary Research Institute.

Chen called it "worrisome" that the viruses were in "a form associated with … adaptation to humans."

At an FAO conference in Rome last month, researchers concluded that migrating birds are one way the virus could spread and called for further investigation. Another way is through the export of poultry and poultry products.

"Wild birds can introduce the virus, but it's through the human activities of commerce, production and marketing of poultry that the disease spreads," Lubroth says.

The World Health Organization (WHO) says most human fatalities have resulted from handling sick birds on poultry farms or in backyard flocks. The Alaska Department of Fish and Game says that "if it arrives in North America, Asian H5N1 is more likely to be transported through virus-contaminated articles or illegally imported birds or bird products" than through migratory birds.

The WHO cites a half-dozen "very likely" cases of limited human-to-human transmission of bird flu that resulted in death. A single case of suspected human-to-human transmission began with wild birds, Caroline Brown, a WHO communicable-diseases researcher, told the Rome conference.

In Azerbaijan last February, she reported, there was a die-off of 1,952 swans from Siberia. Members of a family that depended on hunting for its income plucked feathers from dying swans. Seven people caught bird flu from viruses "closely related" to the Qinghai Lake strain, Brown said. Four died. A study by the WHO and U.S. Navy scientists said it was unlikely that all seven people contracted the virus directly from the swans.

The Alaska virus search is literally a wild goose chase. And it could turn out to be, well, a wild goose chase.

The government gathered 12,000 bird samples in Alaska between 1998 and 2005. No trace of H5N1 virus was found. Canada tested nearly 5,000 birds last year and found no H5N1.

Though the die-offs in Europe and Asia show that wild birds can carry the killer virus long distances, scientists don't know which species are infectious carriers of the virus, Lubroth says.

Henry Niman, a Pittsburgh biochemist who is researching bird-flu vaccines, says Russian scientists last year found H5N1 in the carcasses of 25 wild bird species. "This indicated that the virus isn't going to have a major barrier between waterfowl," Niman says. "But which species is bringing a lot of it over, by which flyway, is not totally nailed down yet. That's a key question."

Terry McElwain, director of the Washington Animal Disease Diagnostic Laboratory in Pullman, Wash., says he's not convinced that the virus will spread "through the mixing of the populations of birds in the Pacific Flyway." If this can happen, flocks now in Alaska are "a likely population to be targeting."

Bird testing by the U.S. and Canadian governments will be more extensive this year. U.S. scientists plan to sample 75,000 to 100,000 birds, including 19,000 in Alaska. Also, some poultry flocks will be monitored, and scientists will watch for suspicious die-offs of wild birds, the Agriculture Department says.

Rossi and other biologists in Alaska are reporting success in capturing 29 targeted species of live waterfowl, shorebirds and land birds that are swabbed and released.

Biologists are also taking samples from the intestinal tracts of dead game birds that hunters bring in. And the biologists are collecting bird droppings in wetlands.

Samples go to labs in the Lower 48. If a swab tests positive for exposure to H5N1, the finding will be announced by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns or Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, says Gail Keirn, a spokeswoman for the Agriculture Department.

Next, a second lab will seek to confirm the result. Scientists will converge on the site where the affected bird was found. Poultry breeders will be warned to keep flocks from wild birds, Keirn says.

"Should the H5N1 virus appear in the U.S., it does not mean the start of a pandemic," the Department of Health and Human Services says.

A WHO study says wild birds pose a lower risk of spreading a pandemic than poultry. The virus carried by wild birds "will have less opportunity" to mutate into a human-to-human threat because relatively few people — hunters and ornithologists, mostly — are exposed to wild birds, the organization says.

Many Eskimos on Alaska's North Slope hunt wildfowl — as well as whales, walruses, seals and polar bears — as staples of their diet and traditional subsistence culture. The reception they give the scientists who are advising them of a potential threat isn't always warm.

"Right now, bird flu doesn't scare me at all," says James Nukapigak, an Inupiat tribal elder. "We eat what God has provided us for thousands of years, and we're still living on it."

Tommy Olemaun, executive director of the Native Village of Barrow, tribal government for the 51% of the city's population that is Eskimo, says just a handful of residents have taken government advice to wear rubber gloves when handling game birds.

"We hunt these birds since time immemorial, and we know when one is sick," says Olemaun, who says he kills 40 geese a year to feed his family and make soup for community feasts.

Olemaun criticizes the visiting biologists for failing to "communicate with our tradition, our own knowledge." Rather than ask natives about the best places to find birds, he says, "government men drop off the plane" and go to inappropriate testing places.

Charles Brower, 55, retired wildlife director for the tribal government, agrees. He says the biologists erred by stalking shorebirds in a pond abutting the city's sewage-outfall lagoon.

"It just makes me laugh to see them get all these birds from the most unsanitary area here," he says.

Brian Person, a wildlife biologist for North Slope Borough — the Alaska equivalent of a county government — says Brower was right in saying the pond was potentially contaminated. "But that wouldn't affect tests for the bird flu virus," Person says. Besides, he says, "that's where the birds were."

Another Death In Indonesia Deepens Fears Of Bird Flu's Spread (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The death of a 38th person from avian flu in Indonesia was confirmed yesterday by the World Health Organization and the situation in that country continued to worsen.

Indonesia is now in second place, after Vietnam, which has had 42 deaths, but none this year, while Indonesia's caseload is climbing rapidly and striking many family clusters.

The World Bank said Monday that Indonesia's response to the flu was disorganized and underfinanced. On Tuesday, the World Animal Health Organization said Indonesia was no longer even counting most poultry outbreaks. In the last year, it has officially reported the deaths of only 800 chickens, while there have been news reports of the deaths of thousands of birds from 29 of the country's 33 provinces.

Indonesia, the world's fourth-most-populous nation, has 242 million inhabitants and an estimated 1.3 billion chickens spread across 18,000 islands.

On Monday The Jakarta Post quoted several local health experts as saying that the government was not disclosing how widespread the disease was or how many times human-to-human transmission might have occurred. And last week Indonesia's health minister, Siti Fadilah Supari, said she was "running out of ideas for how to make the public aware" of the threat and get them to kill sick chickens instead of eating them.

Yesterday the Indonesian Health Ministry said the death of a 7-year-old girl in Banten Province on June 1 was the country's 38th from avian flu. The girl's 10-year-old brother died May 29, but he was buried before specimens were taken, so he was not included in the count. Chickens in the family's household had died earlier.

According to news agency reports quoting health officials, the 7-year-old had tested negative for avian flu in nose and throat swabs taken when she was alive, but then tested positive when lung tissue was taken after her death.

Nose and throat swabs — the routine way of diagnosing regular flu — may give false negatives because the bird flu virus attaches to cells deep in the lungs, not to the upper respiratory tract. In January, according to the World Health Organization, the same error caused the first human cases in Turkey's outbreak to be misdiagnosed.

Dr. Henry L. Niman, a biochemist who has questioned many of the health organization's official counts, argued that flu cases were underestimated because of that error and because blood tests could also produce false negatives if the blood was drawn before detectable antibodies had built up. Victims can die before that happens, and the outbreak in Indonesia has a very high death rate: of the 50 known cases, 38 have died.

An Indonesian newspaper, The Tempo, reported yesterday that one of its reporters who covered the extermination of infected poultry and the funeral of a flu victim near Jakarta had been hospitalized with flu symptoms; the newspaper did not report any test results.

Dick Thompson, a World Health Organization spokesman, said he knew nothing about the reporter who fell ill, but he said the agency was drafting safety guidelines for journalists. "Some of them are getting pretty close to cases," he said.

There have been several reports of Indonesian nurses' falling sick after tending avian flu victims, which could indicate that the virus was spreading more easily between humans. On June 6, the World Health Organization reported that tests on four such nurses had convincingly ruled out A(H5N1), the avian flu, and indicated that one had a seasonal flu, A(H1N1), instead.

Dr. Niman said convincing evidence could be obtained only from blood tests.

Mr. Thompson, who recently returned from Indonesia, said that he did not know how the nurses had been tested, but that he thought that Indonesian health authorities "are really on top of the human cases, investigating them aggressively," even though animal cases were spiraling out of control.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Sentenced (CO)

By Jim Morrill

The Charlotte Observer, June 16, 2006

A federal judge Thursday sentenced former Charlotte FBI agent Erik Blowers, who was the ethics adviser to agents across North Carolina, to two years probation for failing to disclose gifts and favors from a one-time informant.

The sentencing by U.S. District Judge Carlton Tilley in Greensboro came six months after Blowers pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor offense that could have brought him up to a year in prison. He was the first FBI agent ever charged in the state.

That plea followed Blowers' indictment on a felony charge for the same conduct. Documents filed by U.S. Justice Department prosecutors claimed Blowers misled supervisors, lied to investigators and had extensive business dealings with a convicted drug trafficker.

Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, June 16, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C. - A former FBI agent accused of lying about two trips to Las Vegas that were paid for by an informant was sentenced Thursday to two years probation, his attorney said.

Erik Blowers, once the chief legal counsel and ethics adviser for the FBI office in Charlotte, pleaded guilty in November to making a false report. He also resigned from the agency.

Blowers was also ordered Thursday to perform 400 hours of community service.

"We are pleased that the judge found that Erik did not adversely effect the integrity of any FBI investigation," said his lawyer, Chris Fialko.

The case against Blowers stemmed from two trips he took to Las Vegas in 2000 with David Simonini, and for his failure to report thousands of dollars in travel expenses and gifts from the homebuilder.

Blowers headed an FBI investigation of Simonini, a former informant who later pleaded guilty to money laundering and bank fraud.

22 Suspects Arrested As U.S. Targets Global Drug Network (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0034794

Federal drug agents have disrupted an international heroin smuggling ring responsible for shipping more than $14 million worth of the drug into the United States since 2004, arresting 22 suspected gang members and seizing more than 60 pounds of heroin.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Rusty Payne said agents also confiscated more than $220,000 in cash during raids with authorities in Trinidad and Ecuador, as well as heroin abandoned by drug couriers in a Guayaquil, Ecuador, hotel, at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston, at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York and at Piarco International Airport in Trinidad.

"Heroin-laden clothes or heroin hidden in soles of shoes -- it makes no difference how it is smuggled into the United States, law enforcement will find it," said John P. Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office. "This investigation shows that through collaborative efforts with our local and international partners, the DEA is committed to identifying, investigating and dismantling drug trafficking organizations so we can stop the flow of poison onto the streets of our communities."

The arrests culminated a 10-month undercover investigation led by Justice Department's Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and, Mr. Payne said, involved multiple confidential witnesses and sources, court-authorized wiretaps, surveillance and a controlled heroin delivery.

On Wednesday and yesterday, he said, nine suspects were arrested in Las Vegas, one in Palm Springs, Calif., one in Caguas, Puerto Rico, and one in New York. Other suspects were taken into custody earlier this month.

A criminal complaint in the case, unsealed yesterday in New York, identified the organization's leaders as Javier Alexander Alvarez Monroy, 26, a former police officer in Bogota, Colombia, and Marc Klindt, 29, both of whom are accused of using couriers to smuggle the organization's heroin from several countries, including Ecuador, Venezuela, Trinidad and Tobago, Colombia, Brazil and Mexico, to New York for distribution.

One of the couriers is identified in the complaint as Jeanette Vidal, 47, a Las Vegas-area school teacher.

Mr. Payne said the organization employed more than a dozen drug couriers and recruiters, many of whom made multiple drug trips and were based in the Las Vegas area. He said the couriers smuggled 6 to 10 pounds of heroin per trip within the lining of clothes.

He also said investigators discovered that Mr. Monroy and Mr. Klindt used the Internet to communicate with their foreign suppliers and their drug couriers.

Others charged were Wendy Holiday, 35, Chantelle Davila, 31, and Paola Lujan, age unknown, accused of recruiting couriers for the organization. Hector Navarro was accused of assisting in the gang's money-laundering activities.

Officials Gather To Fight Deadly Fentanyl Outbreak (DFP)

By Kim Norris

Detroit Free Press, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO - Just one hundred and twenty-five micrograms - the equivalent of six grains of salt - is enough fentanyl to kill.

Mix it with heroin or cocaine, and you have a high to die for - literally.

In Pittsburgh, heroin mixed with fentanyl is being marketed on the street under the name "get high or die tryin.'"

In metro Detroit, so far this year, 83 people have died trying.

The seriousness of the spreading threat drew more than 125 law enforcement officials, scientists, public health officials and emergency first responders from seven cities and Mexico to Chicago on Wednesday and Thursday to learn about the potentially lethal painkiller and where it's coming from. Even Scott Burns, deputy drug czar, in the Bush administration was on hand.

"This is a serious drug," said Timothy Ogden, Drug Enforcement Administration associate special agent,

He held up a little plastic bag in which tiny particles of powder were barely visible.

"This is enough fentanyl to kill you, " he said.

"In my 30 years of drug enforcement work, I haven't seen a threat that bothers me as much," Ogden said.

He likened the use of illegal drugs to playing Russian roulette with a single bullet, but with fentanyl, he said, "It's like playing Russian roulette with six bullets in the gun."

DOJ_NMG_0034795

The fentanyl being mixed with street drugs most likely was manufactured in multiple clandestine labs, possibly in Mexico, Ogden said Thursday.

This outbreak is more widespread than previous ones, he said. "It appears there may be independent distributors operating in different cities," he added.

Chicago has had an explosion of drug overdose cases in the last two months, many in people taking heroin laced with fentanyl. The city has had 60 deaths in about a year.

Detroit experienced a similar increase, but in a much more concentrated period of time. And, unlike in Chicago, where people are surviving the overdoses, most of the known fentanyl cases in Detroit have been dead on arrival.

Fentanyl is a synthetically manufactured pain medication that is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine. In its legally prescribed form, it typically is administered through a patch, an oral lozenge or through injections. It often is prescribed to cancer patients.

Although the number of suspected drug deaths has fallen back to more normal levels in the past two weeks in metro Detroit, fentanyl-laced heroin has been popping up in more and more cities, with similar deadly results. And a lull does not indicate the problem is past, authorities said.

"There's always a concern when the drug is being manufactured that it can come back at any time, especially if it's being manufactured in the states," said James Tolbert, commander of the organized crime division for the Detroit Police Department, who attended the conference.

"That's why we're cooperating with all our local folks and the people here, to try to determine where the source is."

John Arvanitis, assistant special agent in charge of the Detroit field division of the DEA, said the most important thing that came out of the conference, was "the realization of the magnitude of the situation.

"That will facilitate coordination among state, local and federal authorities in a national effort to disrupt and dismantle the organizations involved in this, " he said.

130 Dead From New U.S. Super-heroin (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, June 15, 2006

Federal and local officials in the U.S. Midwest are trying to determine the source of a new enhanced form of heroin that has killed at least 130 people.

The bulk of the deaths have been in and around Chicago and Detroit but victims have also shown up from St. Louis to Philadelphia, The New York Times reported Thursday.

The additive to the heroin is the commercial painkiller fentanyl, which is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine. Fentanyl enhances the effect of the heroin, but can also cause the user's respiratory system to shut down, health officials told the Times.

Chicago Police Superintendent Philip Cline, said in an interview his officers are working with the Drug Enforcement Administration looking for common contacts among overdose cases.

The city published fliers warning drug users of the consequences of using the drug, but Cline said drug dealers were seen waving the fliers, advertising they were selling the very thing the fliers warned about.

Amid Fentanyl Deaths, Investigation, Addicts Keep Using (AP)

By Michael Tarm

AP, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO - A self-described drug addict stood by a vacant lot on the city's South Side Thursday and pointed down the block where he says more than a dozen of his friends and acquaintances died after using fentanyl-laced heroin.

"Joe died down there, and then there was Rita, Cherlyn, Marvin died somewhere over there - and Chico there," said Don Howard, 59, flanked by rows of derelict buildings and a sign atop a lamppost that read, "Chicago Blues District."

Several miles away, police and drug enforcement officials from around the country ended two days of discussions Thursday on the possible source of the bad heroin that killed Don's friends and at least 100 others from Chicago to Philadelphia.

"In my almost 30 years of law enforcement experience, I haven't seen a threat that concerns me this much," said Tim Ogden, an agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago office. "Fentanyl is a very, very potent substance."

The summit provided officials from 12 states and Washington D.C. the chance to coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the beginning of this year, Ogden said at a news conference.

There were outbreaks of fentanyl-laced heroin in the '80s and early '90s, said Arlington, Va.-based DEA spokeswoman Mary Irene Cooper, who was in Chicago for the meeting. The difference is that the outbreaks aren't isolated this time to one city.

"We're trying to figure out why it's spreading so widely," she said.

Fentanyl is a legally produced prescription pain killer. But the type of fentanyl currently being mixed with heroin is most likely manufactured in illicit labs, Ogden said.

Ogden said that just 125 micrograms of the illegal fentanyl - the equivalent of a few grains of salt - are more than enough to kill.

"I view fentanyl use as taking a six (chamber) revolver, putting five bullets in it, putting it to your temple and pulling the trigger," he said.

Yet, its deadliness doesn't appear to have dissuaded hardened drug addicts.

After Chicago police publicized one street corner where samples of fentanyl-laced heroin had been handed out - thinking addicts would steer clear of the area - drug users flocked there hoping to score free heroin, Police Supt. Philip Cline said.

"We have willing victims here," he said. "That's part of the problem."

In Chicago, there have been more than 60 confirmed fentanyl overdoses since April, 2005, with the vast majority of them coming this year, the DEA said. Detroit, Philadelphia, New Jersey and Delaware have also reported an uptick in fentanyl deaths.

Howard, who also goes by the nickname "Moon," agreed there is less fear among many addicts than non-addicts might presume.

"Some addicts are frightened, but others aren't," he said. "They just feel that if it's their time it's their time."

"Suicidal behavior comes from being an addict," agreed Francois Seets, a 58-year-old recovering addict from Chicago. "They think they're immortal. ... And they think it (the fentanyl contamination) will pass."

So infinitesimal are the amounts of fentanyl, said Seets, that there is virtually no way of determining whether a bag of heroin is laced with it. The fentanyl, he said, wouldn't affect the taste or look of the narcotic.

"You wouldn't know it's bad until you collapse," he said.

Howard, who said he struggles to scrape together the $10 it costs for a small bag of heroin, said he doesn't turn down free samples of heroin - even though such samples have been linked to the recent fentanyl deaths.

But he does take precautions.

Before settling down to shoot up a sample with friends, "I let somebody else go first to be sure," Howard said.

Seets said the fentanyl outbreak does serve as an inspiration to him, driving home the potentially deadly consequences of a relapse.

"It makes me understand I am mortal," he said.

Some Facts About Fentanyl (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

WHAT IS IT?: Fentanyl, which is considered 80 times stronger than morphine, is used legally to treat chronic pain and as anesthesia for open-heart surgery. Some drug dealers mix it into heroin to make the narcotic more potent.

WHERE: There have been deaths from fentanyl-laced heroin in at least half a dozen U.S. cities - from Chicago to Detroit to Philadelphia. Medical experts say fentanyl can cause breathing problems and make users feel as if they are suffocating.

WHERE'S IT COMING FROM?: It's not clear. Drug enforcement officials say the fentanyl was probably made at one or more illicit labs. They're also considering the possibility that at least some of it came from sources in Mexico.

Death Ignites New Discussion On Drug Use In Park Ridge (PRHA)

By Jennifer Johnson

Park Ridge Herald Advocate, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034797

The death of Park Ridge resident Joseph Krecker, 17, in what Chicago police identified as an apparent drug overdose, has ignited more discussion about drug use among Park Ridge youth.

Members of the city's Health Commission, which has set a goal of tackling addiction in the community, say parents need to know that heroin use exists among teens.

According to commission member Dr. John Bello, Krecker's death "illustrates the need to make sure we educate the parents out there that [heroin use] is still a major issue and a problem that everyone needs to be aware of."

At the Health Commission's next meeting, on June 22 at City Hall, Bello said the group will discuss how to alert the community to what is taking place, particularly regarding the distribution of fentanyl-laced heroin and its deadly consequences.

"We want to know what would be the best way to reach people," Bello said. "I think it will be trial and error, to see what is most effective."

During a Town Hall Meeting held in Park Ridge in March to address drug and alcohol use among teens, Park Ridge Deputy Police Chief Tom Swoboda said heroin and Ecstasy are the most prevalent "hard drugs" found in Park Ridge.

Park Ridge police have said that while open dealing of heroin does not occur on Park Ridge street corners, users are known to drive to certain Chicago neighborhoods to purchase drugs.

A survey of Maine Township High School District 207 students in December found that 2 percent of seniors, 1 percent of juniors, 2 percent of sophomores and 1 percent of freshmen admitted to trying heroin. Fewer than 1 percent of the students in each grade admitted they had used heroin in the last month before taking the survey.

Dr. Martin Doot, medical director of Advocate Lutheran General Hospital's Addiction Treatment Program and a member of the Park Ridge Health Commission, said the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration recently sent out a warning to physicians about the presence of fentanyl in many overdose victims.

"There's been a rash of fatalities or overdoses that have been seen in the Chicago area and they have tragically affected Park Ridge residents," Doot said.

Doot advises parents to get their children professional help "as soon as possible" if they have been experimenting with drugs, or if they already have an addiction.

Some local resources parents can turn to include the Maine Center at 832 Busse Highway, in Park Ridge, or addiction treatment programs at Advocate Lutheran General Hospital or Northwest Community Hospital in Arlington Heights.

"Good help is available," Doot said.

New treatments for heroin addiction, including medication that is an alternative to methadone maintenance traditionally used to treat heroin withdrawal, are available and "very promising," Doot added.

"The problem is, often people wait too long to get the help they need," he said.

Park Ridge Police Chief Jeff Caudill said feedback from the police department's social worker, school resource officers and surveys taken by students indicates that teens "want their school to be drug free." The support from parents for drug sniffing dogs in the District 207's three high schools is also positive, Caudill said.

D.C.'s 'Teflon Defendant' Acquitted In Latest Trial (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Half Brother Testified for Prosecution

Corey A. Moore, the D.C. street legend who has slipped through the hands of prosecutors again and again, has survived another trial -- one that featured his half brother as the key government witness.

Moore, 30, was acquitted yesterday by a federal jury of drug, firearms and conspiracy charges -- clearing the way for his release after nearly two years of denying wrongdoing and awaiting trial.

"Thank you," a visibly relieved Moore said to jurors after the verdict was read. The decision came after a trial that stretched for more than two months. Family members embraced in the courtroom.

Moore famously stood trial four times for a 1994 slaying -- and four times the jury came back deadlocked, leading prosecutors to finally drop the murder charge. The string of prosecutorial failures led some authorities to dub Moore the "Teflon defendant." Over the years, Moore has been charged with three murders, assault with intent to kill, assault with a deadly weapon and armed robbery. Each charge was dismissed before trial or resulted in an acquittal.

Moore was convicted once, in 1996, of a weapons charge that netted him a 51-month prison term.

He had said that he was living a law-abiding life when authorities arrested him in August 2004, holding jobs as a youth counselor and car salesman. Prosecutors saw it differently: Moore, they said, had participated in a drug conspiracy with others for at least two years and helped supply crack cocaine and heroin.

Besides the drug charges, a grand jury indicted Moore for weapons violations after federal agents said they found a bag they described as an "assassin's tool kit" when searching his Northeast Washington home. The items included a .357 magnum, a ski mask and a glove.

Moore's attorney, Jonathan Zucker, said prosecutors had little evidence against his client and accused them of an effort to punish Moore for his alleged past sins.

Zucker said the only witness to testify that Moore was seen with drugs was his half brother, Andre Richardson. In closing arguments, Zucker told jurors that Richardson was lying to shave years off his sentence for carjacking and other crimes. Zucker also raised questions about whether the "assassin's kit" was Moore's.

The jury was not told about Moore's previous trials.

One of Moore's co-defendants, Timothy Thomas, was found guilty of drug and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth instructed jurors to continue deliberating on the fate of a third defendant, Frederick A. Miller.

Sitting in a courtroom wearing wire-rimmed glasses and a suit several sizes too big, Moore looked bookish, not like the person who prosecutors have said was once a teenage enforcer for the Condon Terrace Crew, a violent band of young men who lorded over a stretch of turf east of the Anacostia River. He did not testify.

After the verdict, Moore's wife, Holly Williams, said she hoped prosecutors would stop targeting her husband but added, "I think that may be naive."

Throughout the trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Julius Rothstein sought to portray Moore as a thug who tried to intimidate his brother into silence through emotional appeals and veiled threats.

Allegations of witness tampering and intimidation almost threw the trial in disarray, with Richardson at one point refusing to continue testifying because he said he feared for his safety. At issue was a number of telephone calls from family members in which they appeared to pressure Richardson to stop testifying against his brother.

Moore also sent his half brother a letter, introduced as evidence, that said by relying on informers, the "prison-industrial complex is a disguise for modern-day slavery." By participating, the letter added, "You will be an outcast, and may the curse of the ancestors be upon you if you take the poison to be exploited by the United States."

At the bottom of the letter was a quote: "Death B4 Dishonor."

Richardson testified that he understood the letter to be a threat. But faced with a 30-years-to-life sentence and hoping for a break by assisting the prosecution, he continued to testify.

Holly Williams said Richardson's testimony was hurtful. "It was just sad," she said. "But we pray for him."

Selig Admits Baseball's 'Problems' (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Nine days after federal agents reported that pitcher Jason Grimsley had admitted using performance-enhancing substances, Commissioner Bud Selig issued an open letter to fans about the development. Selig acknowledged that "there are problems" in Major League Baseball and said he was "committed to protecting our game."

In a letter that Selig gave to mlb.com and placed in a number of newspapers today, he said that he was "disappointed and angered by revelations that a major league player had acknowledged using human growth hormone" and "had said that others were using HGH as well." Grimsley, who was pitching for the Diamondbacks but was released after reports of his drug use, was not cited by name in Selig's letter.

The Grimsley matter has created new questions about how many players might be using performance-enhancing substances. Selig's letter was an attempt to assure the fans, and perhaps some politicians as well, that Major League Baseball officials are serious about solving the problem.

Selig has been frustrated that baseball has been criticized for not having a test for human growth hormone. But no professional sports leagues test for it, and the letter, in a way, allowed Selig to vent.

He noted that baseball tests for steroids and amphetamines, and that human growth hormone is banned. But Selig also explained that there is no effective blood test to detect human growth hormone and said it "represents a threat to all sports everywhere."

Selig said that the overwhelming majority of the 750 major leaguers are honorable, but added that there are players who will cheat to try to gain an unfair advantage. Selig said those players damage themselves, raise doubts about the players who follow the rules and violate the trust fans place in them.

"These players who use performance-enhancing substances offend all of us who care for the game, and I will not tolerate their actions," Selig said.

MLB To Fund HGH Detection Study (USAT)

By Hal Bodley, Usa Today

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Commissioner Bud Selig, in an open letter to baseball fans that appears Friday in five major publications, including USA TODAY, blasts players who use performance-enhancing substances and says he is committed to protecting the integrity of the sport.

"These players who use performing-enhancing substances offend all of us who care for the game and I will not tolerate their actions," Selig wrote. "I won't be deterred and will do everything I can to try to keep up with or even stay ahead of those who break the law and break our rules."

Selig said he was prompted to write the letter after former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley told an Internal Revenue Service investigator in a search warrant affidavit unsealed last week that he used steroids, human growth hormone (HGH) and amphetamines throughout his career.

The next day he was released by the Diamondbacks. He was also suspended for 50 games by Selig should he attempt to return to the major leagues.

In the letter, Selig said "we are committed to funding a study of HGH and how to detect it.... Also, we are willing to make additional contributions to fund other studies to determine how to detect HGH and are currently reaching out to experts in the field to ascertain what other studies can immediately begin."

Garbage Held Clues In Steroid Import Case (ALBANYTU)

By Dan Higgins, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, June 15, 2006

Court papers detail how agents sought evidence of alleged dealing

A two-year federal investigation of a North Greenbush man included intercepting his mail and, on one occasion, rifling through his trash before authorities charged him with attempting to receive anabolic steroids from China, according to documents filed in federal court.

Christopher Magnano, 33, faces charges connected to what officials described as an Internet-based sales operation of the illegal substances, which were seized from his North Greenbush home following his May 19 arrest. Police said the seizure of anabolic steroids and human growth hormone was the largest ever in the Capital Region.

The documents filed in U.S. District Court in Albany shed more light on the investigation that led agents to suspect Magnano. Magnano is charged with illegal possession of anabolic steroids with the intent to distribute. Federal officials said more charges could follow as the investigation continues.

Authorities allege that when they confronted him, Magnano explained how he received anabolic steroids from China for several years and resold them over the Internet. But his attorney, Bryan Rounds, challenged that claim Tuesday.

"The words attributed to my client were not spoken by him," Rounds said. He said whatever Magnano told investigators has been "pulled, twisted, and taken out of context," and that the paraphrasing in the court documents shows that it was a "second- or third-hand account."

Rounds said no evidence shows that Magnano had any intention to sell the substances and that he questions whether the materials seized have been correctly tested and identified as illegal steroids.

Magnano had been under suspicion by at least three federal agencies, according to an affidavit from a U.S. postal inspector. Postal inspectors had intercepted his mail, and agents from the Food and Drug Administration's criminal enforcement unit even searched the garbage outside his Sequoia Drive home, where they said they found empty bottles of anabolic steroids and used syringes. That information was used to obtain the search warrant that led to the seizure.

In a statement, a postal inspector assigned to Troy said agents were alerted after Magnano set up several post office boxes around the Capital Region and received mail at his home address. He frequently received packages from other countries and was evasive on one occasion when postal employees asked him about a parcel's contents, according to the inspector's deposition.

Adding to their suspicions, inspectors learned Magnano had a history of drug convictions. He served time in state prison for selling LSD and hallucinogenic mushrooms in the 1990s.

Last year, the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigations told a Troy-based postal inspector that their agency also was investigating Magnano. They suspected he had been receiving anabolic steroids and human growth hormone. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents at Kennedy Airport in New York City intercepted mail addressed to Magnano from China that they said contained the illegal substances.

The week Magnano was arrested in May, FDA agents learned Magnano was going to receive another suspicious shipment from China. The authorities set up a bust in which police asked a DHL employee in Latham to call Magnano and tell him his package had arrived. When Magnano turned up to retrieve the package, an undercover agent handed it to him. That's when Colonie police took him into custody.

According to court records, Magnano had packages in his car containing more illegal steroids that agents contend he was preparing to mail to his buyers.

Magnano has pleaded not guilty to the charges and remains free on bail.

Deputies Find Remote Pot Garden (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, June 15, 2006

AUBURN -- An anonymous tip led Placer County sheriff's investigators on Wednesday to more than 17,000 marijuana plants being grown on U.S. Forest Service land between Auburn and Foresthill, authorities said.

The pot plot, in Gas Canyon, had plants between 6 inches and 2 feet tall, according to the Sheriff's Department.

As investigators were removing the plants, a person carrying a rifle was seen fleeing on foot, but was not caught. One rifle was recovered at the scene.

Authorities warned people to be careful when hiking off-trail in the wilderness, since marijuana growers often are armed.

KING OF BLING BUSTED (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell And Dan Mangan

The New York Post, June 16, 2006

The feds want to ice Jacob the Jeweler.

The famed Manhattan purveyor of diamond-encrusted "bling" to Madonna, Diddy, hoop star Allen Iverson and other celebs was busted yesterday on charges he helped two coke kingpins launder some of their $270 million in dirty drug profits by selling them jewelry.

Jacob "The Jeweler" Arabo received "large sums of currency" for various pieces of jewelry from the leaders of the so-called Black Mafia Family drug ring and their flunkies, according to a Detroit federal-court indictment unsealed yesterday that also charges 15 others with drug and laundering crimes.

The 41-year-old Uzbeki immigrant, born Jakov Arabov, then either failed to file tax forms required for business transactions totaling more than $10,000, or submitted false tax forms that declared the purchasers were people other than the actual buyers, the indictment claims.

The scheme allegedly was designed to conceal that the jewelry purchases were made with proceeds from the Black Mafia Family's sales of thousands of kilos of cocaine in Detroit, California, Kentucky, Georgia, Texas and elsewhere, and to hide the true ownership of those funds.

The gang's alleged leaders operate BMF Entertainment, a rap-music label, and have extensive connections in the hip-hop world, as does Arabo.

He was arrested at 8:30 a.m. yesterday at his Jacob & Company boutique at 48 E. 57th Street by federal agents, and led away in handcuffs.

Authorities also seized documents from the exclusive boutique - a converted brownstone designed to resemble the interior of a diamond mine - where the "King of Bling" has welcomed some of the world's most famous singers and athletes.

The boutique was shuttered for the rest of the day, with a sign hung on the doorway saying, "Closed for inventory," on Jacob & Company stationery.

"Holy s---, I have a necklace in there!" yelped one female customer after a reporter told her the actual reason she would not be able to collect her purchase.

Arabo later appeared in the afternoon at Manhattan federal court for a hearing, where he was released on a $100,000 personal-recognizance bond.

Wearing charcoal-gray pinstripe pants and a blue dress shirt, his wavy black hair slicked back on his head, the jeweler paid rapt attention during the proceeding.

Federal Magistrate Frank Maas noted Arabo allegedly "conspired with others to laun der monetary instruments . . . in connection with your jewelry business."

Arabo, who left court with wife Angela, next is due to appear in Detroit federal court on July 10.

His defense lawyer, Benjamin Brafman, said, "The arrest of Mr. Arabo is the result of an unfortunate misunderstanding that we believe will be straightened out in the next several weeks.

"We are confident that once the government is advised of all the facts surrounding these issues that all of the charges against Mr. Arabo will be completely dismissed."

Arabo's arrest is a rare wrong note in his Horatio Alger-like rise in New York, where he arrived at age 16 to work in the Diamond District, and later began developing clientele from the world of rap music.

Yesterday's indictment is related to a prior set of federal charges filed in October in Detroit against a slew of members and associates of the Black Mafia Family, allegedly headed by Demetrius "Meech" Flenory, 45, and his 35-year-old brother, Terry Lee Flenory.

Demetrius is charged in an unrelated case with murdering two close friends of rap impresario Sean "Diddy" Combs in Atlanta in 2003.

One of the victims, Anthony "Wolf" Jones, was a former bodyguard for Combs and was with him, singer Jennifer Lopez, and rapper Jamal "Shyne" Barrow in Club New York in Manhattan in 1999 when Barrow shot and wounded two men.

Jones and Combs were acquitted of criminal charges in a subsequent trial, but Barrow was convicted and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

The Flenory brothers, originally from Detroit, allegedly grew the Black Mafia Family over two decades from a drug organization that dealt smaller quantities of cocaine in that city into a much bigger operation with tentacles throughout the country.

The profits of those sales allegedly were laundered in a variety of ways to make the money appear legitimate, including purchases from Jacob.

Authorities said the Black Mafia Family would purchase winning Michigan lottery tickets worth more than $1 million from their true winners so that the ducats could be redeemed, with the money used to purchase homes and cars, and make mortgage payments.

Clarksdale Man Arrested In Slaying Of Federal Witness (JACKCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 16, 2006

A 24-year-old Clarksdale man has been arrested in connection with the slaying of a federal witness found dead earlier this month on a Coahoma County road.

Kenneth C. Walker was arrested by an ATF violent crime federal task force for his alleged involvement in the retaliation against a federal witness and on a charge of discharge/possession of a firearm during a federal violent crime.

William Christopher Haro, 27, a witness in a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives case, was found shot multiple times June 9.

Walker was arrested without incident Tuesday and made an initial appearance before a federal judge.

Lawyer Jailed On Gun Charges (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, June 16, 2006

Indictment stems from April raid on residence

Federal authorities want to keep Charleston attorney Dante di Trapano in jail until a trial on gun charges related to drug addiction, contending he could be a danger to the community.

Di Trapano was indicted on two counts Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Charleston and arrested Thursday morning. Federal authorities argued he could be a danger to the community and pointed out his former law firm has hired an off-duty Charleston police officer for protection against him.

Di Trapano was indicted based on eight guns found in an April raid federal agents conducted on his South Hills residence.

Already charged in March with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine in Florida, di Trapano had said then he was checking himself into a drug rehabilitation program. Wednesday's indictment charged him with being "an unlawful user of and addicted to a controlled substance" while in possession of the guns and for allegedly lying on a federal form when he purchased a gun Feb. 4, stating he was not addicted to or using drugs.

While his attorney, Michael Del Giudice, requested an immediate bond hearing, U.S. attorneys said di Trapano needed to be locked up for at least three days while the probation office prepares a report. U.S. Magistrate Judge Mary Stanley agreed and set a hearing for Tuesday at 2 p.m. on the government's motion to detain him without bond until trial.

As part of their argument to keep di Trapano in jail, the government noted that on May 31 diTrapano's former law firm, Di Trapano Barrett & DiPiero, hired the off-duty officer "based on the concern that [Dante di Trapano] would damage the building or equipment and out of concern for the safety of the employees of the firm."

No one from the firm, established by Dante di Trapano's father, former state Democratic Party chairman Rudolph Di Trapano, would comment.

Del Giudice said he had no knowledge of his client's relationship with his former firm. "There's obviously been a divorce between he and his partners," he said.

Prosecutors also noted di Trapano's Sunday arrest for driving with a suspended license. When he was arrested Thursday, prosecutors noted he was again driving with a suspended license. Magistrate Judge Stanley also said she had seen di Trapano driving on Wednesday.

He was being held in South Central Regional Jail in Charleston.

House Panel Backs ATF Fee, At A Discount (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The House Appropriations Committee approved a new fee for manufacturing and importing explosives this week, prompting objections from industry groups but at least a tentative sigh of relief from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The debate over the fee comes at a time of mounting budget difficulties for ATF, which is already facing rising costs on a new headquarters building in Washington. Cost overruns on that project attributed to decisions by the agency's director, Carl J. Truscott, and other expenditures are the subject of an investigation by the Justice Department inspector general.

The Bush administration proposed a 2-cent-per-pound fee on explosives to generate $120 million of ATF's proposed $980 million budget in 2007. The Appropriations committee cut the fee back to half a cent -- or $30 million -- and funded the rest of ATF's requested budget from other sources.

But committee staffers concede that even the smaller fee may not be approved by the full House, where many lawmakers believe such charges should be formally authorized by Congress before they are implemented. Lawmakers rejected a similar attempt by the administration last year, and the explosives and mining industries oppose the idea as a de facto tax increase.

"To force ATF to create a tax-collections division or whatever it would be to fund their inspection regime just doesn't make sense," said Chris Ronay, president of the Institute of Makers of Explosives, a Washington lobbying group. "It's unnecessary and problematic."

Truscott told lawmakers in late April that losing the explosives fee would have a "significant effect" on the agency, but he declined to say whether that would include layoffs or other cutbacks. About a week later, however, Truscott told ATF managers meeting in Denver that there could be some layoffs if the fee is not approved, according to senior ATF officials who were present or familiar with the remarks.

The comments sent shock waves through the small Justice Department agency, which includes about 2,400 special agents and 2,500 other employees.

Several senior ATF officials, who requested anonymity for fear of retaliation, said ATF's budget could be crippled without the explosives fee at a time when terrorists are seeking materials for bombs. The officials also criticized Truscott's handling of the budget dispute, saying he should have been more aggressive with Congress in explaining the agency's funding needs.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree L. Mixell -- speaking before the House committee acted Wednesday -- said Truscott made it clear to lawmakers that loss of the funding would have a significant impact but that it was too early to address specifics. She declined to comment on Truscott's remarks about layoffs.

Truscott and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales have come under sharp questioning in recent months from key members of the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the ATF. Chairman Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) faulted Truscott and other officials for not seeking to work the issue out with the panel.

"To say that you're going to offset something by $120 million and put it in a budget and get it printed and not come up and work for, it would be like somebody saying that I'm really for something but I do nothing about it," Wolf told Truscott in April.

Senior subcommittee Democrat Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.), whose home state would be hard hit by an explosives fee, questioned whether the program would actually raise as much money as predicted.

Gonzales defended the explosives fee, testifying earlier this year that "it is appropriate to have the industry pay for the costs of implementing" new rules for the sale and importation of explosives.

ATF has been buffeted by allegations that Truscott approved or proposed hundreds of thousands of dollars in unnecessary upgrades to the new ATF headquarters. The building, due to open later this year, is at least $19 million over budget.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine has opened an investigation into complaints over that project and other spending, questioning dozens of ATF officials earlier this year, according to several officials who have been interviewed. In addition to the construction project, investigators have questioned ATF employees about a costly trip that Truscott and others took to London last year and about allegations that ATF staff members helped assemble a school video report for a relative of Truscott's, according to the officials.

Mixell said she could not comment on the inspector general's inquiry. Truscott has declined to talk about the allegations.

IMMIGRATION:

14 Million Aliens Forecast To Get Amnesty (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

More than 9.9 million illegal aliens now in the United States will receive amnesty under an immigration-reform bill passed by the Senate, though about a quarter will do so fraudulently, and the bill allows for 4.5 million family members to join them in the United States, according to a report.

"Of the 14.4 million illegals and their family members who will receive amnesty, we estimate that 13.5 million will eventually become permanent residents, which means they can stay as long as they wish and apply for citizenship," according to the report released yesterday by the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies (CIS).

The report, written by CIS Research Director Steven A. Camarota, said the projected 14.4 million figure does not include other expected increases in legal immigration allowed by the bill. The Heritage Foundation predicted in a report last month that the number could total 193 million in the next 20 years.

The Senate bill still faces conference hearings with House members, who passed immigration-reform legislation in December focusing on border security.

The CIS report, which based its findings on the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) that granted amnesty to about 3 million illegal aliens and their relatives, said that about 7.4 million illegals eligible for amnesty under the Senate bill will come forward and receive amnesty legitimately.

The report said there will be one fraudulent amnesty awarded for every three legitimate ones -- meaning that more than 2.5 million illegals will become legal fraudulently. In addition to the amnesty beneficiaries, the bill will allow an estimated 4.5 million family members currently living abroad to join their newly legalized relatives, the report said.

"Our assumption that the share of illegals who come forward will be similar to the share in 1986 may be too low because, unlike the last legalization, illegals now know that amnesties are real and not a ruse by the government to deport them," Mr. Camarota said. "Moreover, because the border is now more difficult to cross illegally, legalization is a more attractive option."

The report cautioned that its estimate of more than 2.5 million fraudulent amnesties, based on IRCA, may be too low, as well, because the false-document industry "is now more developed." It said the "overworked immigration bureaucracy already" has a severe fraud problem, according to a report by the Government Accountability Office.

"As its workload mushrooms with amnesty, fraud will become even more difficult to detect," Mr. Camarota said.

The CIS report also predicted that if the Senate bill were to become law, nearly 8 million more illegal aliens still would enter the country by 2016.

The report does not describe the illegal aliens affected by the bill as "guest workers," noting that amnesty applies to people who are given some kind of legal status, are not subject to deportation and can work in the United States.

"In our view, any policy or legislation that does not require those who break the law to abide by it, but instead suspends the normal penalty and in some way changes the law to accommodate violators is an amnesty," Mr. Camarota said. "An amnesty in the immigration system is any change that allows people who would otherwise be subject to deportation to stay in the country."

States Struggle To Cut Costs Of Immigration (CSM)

By Jeff Oliver

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

DENVER

With no resolution of immigration-reform legislation at the federal level, states have been pressing ahead with their own measures intended to discourage illegal immigration and curtail costs of providing services to that population.

Lawmakers in Kansas, Iowa, and Arizona have voted this year to restrict certain social services to illegal immigrants, following similar action last year in Virginia. Other states have passed legislation cracking down on employers of illegal immigrants and those who sell forged documents to illegals.

In all, state legislatures have seen some 500 immigration-reform bills introduced in 2006, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL).

But even as lawmakers try to make it harder for illegals to live in their states, they are bumping into one roadblock after another, rendering their efforts toothless and mostly symbolic. For one, states cannot sidestep federal law by simply denying certain services, such as public education and emergency healthcare, to undocumented people. For another, the courts often ruled against their immigration-control proposals.

"Mostly, [the measures] are just unsuccessful," says Josh Bernstein, director of federal policy at the National Immigration Law Center, an advocate for low-income immigrants. Mr. Bernstein, along with colleagues, has tracked many of the measures.

The latest setback came this week in Colorado, where the state's Supreme Court disallowed a ballot initiative that asked voters if they wanted to bar illegal immigrants in the state from receiving "nonemergency" social services. The judges on Monday ruled, 4 to 2, that the measure could not appear on the November ballot because it improperly mixed two subjects: services to immigrants and decreases in taxation.

The ruling touched off a firestorm of criticism from those who had hoped Colo- rado would be next to undertake a state-level immigration crackdown.

"This was an unprincipled, unjustified, and unfair decision. [The judges] took the matter away from the voters," says a disappointed Richard Lamm, a former Colorado governor, who spearheaded the three-year effort to qualify the measure for the ballot. "No one was as close as we were."

US Rep. Tom Tancredo (R) of Colorado, one of the country's most outspoken advocates of immigration reform, echoed Mr. Lamm, claiming that the decision was the product of "naked" partisan politics. "I would certainly impeach them," he said, referring to the judges.

Gov. Bill Owens (R) threatened to call a special session in the legislature to get the measure on the ballot unless the state Supreme Court reconsiders its ruling.

Others were pleased. Federico Peña, a former Denver mayor and head of Keep Colorado Safe, a group that opposed the initiative, hailed the decision as a victory for Colorado, calling the measure "mean-spirited." The judges, he said, simply beat Coloradoans to the punch, knocking down a measure that never should have been introduced in the first place.

In Colorado, in 2005, 70 percent of illegal immigrants did not have health insurance, according to the Center for Immigration Studies, a nonprofit research organization which advocates controlling immigration. In addition, 18 percent of households headed by illegal immigrants had someone in the household who used a major welfare program, including food assistance or Medicaid, the CIS reported.

State-level immigration reforms have had trouble from the beginning. In 1994, Californians passed Proposition 187, the first state ballot initiative to deny social services to illegal immigrants. The measure languished in the courts, costing the state a bundle in legal fees before a US District Court declared it unconstitutional in 1997 because it was considered too broad and trampled on federal jurisdiction.

The measures are typically motivated by frustration over inaction in Washington, but those who support them often expect no real results. "Many people who voted for 187 would agree with the statement that they just wanted to send a message to Congress," says Hans Johnson, a researcher with the Public Policy Institute of California in San Francisco.

Not everyone agrees that such legislation is a waste of time. Representative Tancredo says denying social services to illegals is an effective way to save taxpayer dollars and remove a possible incentive for illegal entry into the US. "It's one of the few things states can actually do to make a difference," he says.

Protect Washington Now is currently pushing a ballot initiative there similar to Colorado's. Bob Baker, who leads the group, calls the Colorado court decision "heart-breaking," but he continues to push forward. "I would love to let the feds take care of it. I would have a lot more free time on my hands," he says.

Still, there is little confidence by immigration experts that state activists can achieve the reforms they want to curb illegal immigration. The most they can do is "convey a real sense of public outrage and frustration," says Steven Camarota, director of research for the Center for Immigration Studies.

Mr. Baker says he believes a ballot initiative restricting social services in Washington State will help advance the group's agenda. "If nothing else, we've got people talking about the issue."

Immigration Enforcement (WT)

By Michael Chertoff

DOJ_NMG_0034806

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush has put forward a comprehensive vision for immigration reform that will secure our borders, strengthen interior enforcement and create a temporary worker program that is not amnesty but will provide a legal, regulated path for those seeking work in the United States.

A key part of this strategy is effective worksite enforcement. Simply put, we need to give employers better tools to verify the legal status of their employees. Under the president's plan, we will provide new tools — including a tamper-proof identification card for legal foreign workers and an expanded electronic verification system that will allow employers to quickly and accurately confirm work eligibility.

At the same time, we need to enforce stronger penalties against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, including employers who have made illegal labor part of their business model. Congress is hard at work on a bill that will make the president's vision a reality, but two additional reforms will help us hold employers accountable for breaking the law and help the Department of Homeland Security identify and prosecute employers who are blatantly abusing our immigration system.

First, employers have an obligation under existing law to take action when the federal government notifies them that they may have hired an illegal alien. In certain instances, when a worker's Social Security number does not match that worker's name on tax or employment eligibility documents, the federal government sends out a "no-match" letter asking them to resolve the discrepancy. In fact, out of 250 million wage reports the Social Security Administration receives each year, as many as 10 percent belong to employees whose names don't match their Social Security numbers. SSA attempts to clear up these mismatches, sorting out reports where the worker's name or Social Security number was mistyped but still ends up with almost 9 million unmatched reports.

SSA then frequently mails out no-match notices that explain to workers how to clear up the mismatch. SSA does this because workers whose wages cannot be matched to correct Social Security numbers may lose a portion of their retirement and disability benefits.

But despite this threat of lost benefits, less than 1 percent of workers actually clear up the mismatch. Why? Experience tells us that as many as 90 percent of these workers do not clear up the mismatch for the simple reason that they are illegal aliens not authorized to be working or to even be in this country and who procured their jobs through immigration fraud.

As it stands, although some employers are charged with constructive knowledge of ignoring no-match letters, some employers simply disregard "no-match" notices with little consequence. But that is going to change. Last week, the Department of Homeland Security issued a proposed regulation that will establish a specific process for employers to take corrective action when they receive a "no-match" notice. Under the proposed regulation, it will be clear that employers must check employment records, determine the cause of the mismatch and notify the appropriate federal agencies if they cannot resolve the problem. If employers fail to do so in a reasonable period of time, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement can, in appropriate circumstances, hold them legally accountable for knowingly continuing to employ an illegal worker.

But clarifying mismatches is only part of the solution. We also need to give our Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents a better way to determine which employers are habitually using or providing fraudulent Social Security information. One way to do that is by giving our agents sufficient access to no-match data. Under current law, the Social Security Administration does not provide sufficient access in sharing this information. This is simply wrong, and Congress needs to change the law.

If we had sufficient access to no-match data, we could better target our enforcement efforts to the companies that are most likely to be deliberately exploiting illegal labor: the companies that have the largest percentage of no-match employees. In fact, in a study conducted last year, the Government Accountability Office discovered dozens of employers who provided the very same Social Security number for more than a hundred employees. In one instance, an employer used the same Social Security number for more than 2,500 employees in a single tax year. Certainly there will be occasions where employers will be able to offer legitimate explanations for their behavior, but Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents need sufficient access to scrutinize the no-match data.

Even more important, the Department of Homeland Security could use the additional data to find potential immigration fraud at critical infrastructure facilities, such as dams, chemical plants or airports. These are places where sabotage or an accident could kill hundreds or thousands of Americans. They are not places where we should tolerate workers who have lied to get their jobs and who may pose a danger to this country.

Congress needs to break down the wall that separates our Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents from data that would help them find illegal workers and the employers who exploit them. Changing the law will not mean an invasion of workers' privacy. Indeed, it can help protect privacy by preventing identity theft and misuse of an individual's Social Security number.

We cannot stop illegal migration if we do not stop illegal employment, strengthen our border defenses and offer illegal workers a chance to come out of the shadows and take legal, temporary jobs. But we will not succeed in bringing these workers out of the shadows if we ourselves do not have the information we need to enforce our immigration laws.

Michael Chertoff is secretary of the Department of Homeland Security.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Spending Bill For Wars And Hurricanes (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — President Bush signed an emergency spending bill on Thursday to finance the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and to help hurricane victims in Gulf Coast states.

Mr. Bush acted hours after the Senate approved the $94.5 billion bill by a 98-to-1 vote. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, voted against the measure, saying it did not provide enough for domestic health and education programs.

The measure provides $65.8 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, $3.9 billion for foreign aid, $19.8 billion for hurricane relief and $2.3 billion for pandemic flu preparations. Most of the remainder is for border security.

"I am pleased that Congress has addressed these urgent national priorities within the spending limits I set," Mr. Bush said. To stay within the limits, House and Senate negotiators scrapped many items that had been added by the Senate.

Final approval of the bill was accompanied by growing frustration on Capitol Hill over the use of emergency spending measures to pay for overseas military operations.

The Senate voted 98 to 0 to force President Bush to submit a budget for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, instead of using emergency bills, outside the regular budget and appropriations process.

"We are blowing the budget process," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who proposed the new requirement. "We are carving gigantic holes in the system. Since 2001, the administration has sought to fund the war operations almost entirely through emergency supplemental appropriations measures."

Congress has passed nine supplemental appropriations bills providing $420 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Mr. McCain said. By contrast, he said, "during the 11-year Vietnam War, there were four supplemental appropriations bills."

Mr. McCain's proposal was approved as an amendment to a separate bill setting forth military policies for the coming year. It stipulates that Mr. Bush, as part of his annual budget, must request money for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and provide an estimate of the full amount needed, together with "a detailed justification."

The administration has argued that it cannot predict the exact amounts that will be required.

But Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, "It is now time for the administration to present these costs as part of the regular budgeting process."

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the committee, said, "It is essential that our budget begin to reflect reality and recognize the enormous cost of these ongoing military operations."

Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, said: "The administration has chosen to hide those costs. Where? In emergency spending bills."

The president's requests came to Congress "with little or no detailed justification," Mr. Byrd said.

The bill includes money for a wide range of hurricane recovery efforts: $3.7 billion for flood control projects and levee repairs in Louisiana, more than $4 billion in housing assistance, $550 million for a new veterans hospital in New Orleans, $50 million for higher education and $235 million to help elementary and secondary school students displaced by the hurricanes.

Senate Sends Bush $94.5B For Iraq, Katrina (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, June 15, 2006

The Senate Thursday sent President Bush an emergency spending bill meeting his funding requests for America's wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and aid to Gulf Coast hurricane victims.

The 98-1 vote on the $94.5 billion House-Senate compromise legislation gave much-needed funds to support U.S. troops overseas. Most of the money — $66 billion — goes to the Pentagon for military operations overseas.

Bush praised Congress for providing funds to "fight terrorism, defend our homeland, enforce our borders, and fulfill our moral obligation to help our fellow Americans in need."

The bill would bring to almost $320 billion the tally for the campaign in Iraq and $89 billion for the one in Afghanistan.

Only Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., voted against the bill. He is opposed to a provision endorsing Bush's $873 billion "cap" on the annual appropriations bills that Congress passes each year. Specter is pushing for $7 billion in additional money for education and health programs.

Still, there is increasing concern in Congress about the cost of the war in Iraq and the fact that the spending is kept on a set of loosely policed books that are kept separate from the rest of government operations.

Final action on the bill was welcomed by Gulf Coast lawmakers, especially relatively junior Louisiana delegation members who felt their Katrina-devastated state was shortchanged in a similar measure last December.

The bill contains $3.7 billion for Louisiana flood control projects, and Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu (news, bio, voting record) and GOP colleague David Vitter are confident their state will receive $4.2 billion of $5.2 billion contained in the bill for direct grants to states. Louisiana plans to use its share to repair and rebuild housing stocks.

"Many people didn't have insurance because they weren't in a flood plain," Landrieu said. "And then the levees broke and people, middle-income families, wealthy families and poor families lost the largest asset they had."

An earlier veto threat by Bush forced senators to strip some things out:

_More than $14 billion for such things as aid to farmers outside the hurricane zone and for the Gulf Coast seafood industry.

_Democratic initiatives to beef up port security and veterans medical services.

_A controversial plan backed by Mississippi GOP Gov. Haley Barbour and the state's powerful Senate delegation to pay CSX Transportation $700 million for a recently rebuilt freight rail line along the coast so the state could use its path for a new highway.

Notwithstanding approval of the emergency spending measure, lawmakers are getting restless over the practice of funding wars through ad hoc supplemental bills outside the annual budget and thus not subject to budget limits that curb the growth of other government programs.

On an unrelated defense policy bill, senators Wednesday voted 98-0 for an amendment by John McCain, R-Ariz., to require future funding for the wars to be considered in the same way as other government spending measures.

"This bill continues the charade that this war should be funded off budget instead on including the money our troops need in the regular budget that's requested by the president and sent to us," said Patty Murray, D-Wash., as debate closed Thursday.

The bill adheres to Bush's demand of a bill capped at $94.5 billion — including $2.3 billion to combat avian flu — though lawmakers found extra money for grants for Mississippi, Texas and Alabama by cutting back on the Federal Emergency Management Agency's chief disaster fund.

That move raises the likelihood that more FEMA funds will have to be passed before the end of the year if not before Election Day.

The compromise bill includes Bush's plan to provide 1,000 more Border Patrol agents along the Mexican border, send about 6,000 National Guard troops there and build detention space for 4,000 illegal immigrants.

Efforts by Gregg to add funding for capital needs for border security such as helicopters and other aircraft and new vehicles to patrol the border were rebuffed by the White House.

The overall emergency bill's long path into law began in February as a $92.2 billion request by Bush. He later agreed to additions for Louisiana levee projects, border security and avian flu.

Bush's determination that the measure not exceed his request set the terms for endgame talks, and when the agreement was unveiled, the White House and House Republicans trumpeted their success in sticking with the target.

But while many Senate extras were tossed overboard, others were financed by simply putting off spending that will be required to be included in the next emergency bill, expected early next year.

Senate Approves $94.5B For War, Hurricane Funds (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

An emergency spending bill to pay for war and storm-recovery costs is headed to President Bush after easily passing the Senate yesterday.

The 98 to 1 vote was a rare moment of consensus on a day of anguished debate in both chambers over the Iraq war.

The $94.5 billion emergency bill includes nearly $66 billion for continued operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and nearly $20 billion in disaster assistance for the Gulf Coast. Lawmakers added the $2.3 billion that Bush had sought to combat avian flu and nearly $2 billion to beef up security along the U.S.-Mexico border, including $708 million to deploy National Guard troops.

Faced with a White House veto threat, House and Senate negotiators stripped out $14 billion in unrelated funding that the Senate had added to its version of the legislation. But the final bill did include a few unrelated items.

"We've made considerable progress toward limiting unnecessary and wasteful spending," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in a statement after the vote. "But more can be done."

Though Congress has not resisted Iraq-related costs, which now total nearly $320 billion, lawmakers are increasingly irritated by the White House's reliance on the emergency spending process. The Senate voted unanimously Wednesday night to require that future war funding be factored into the annual federal budgets. The bill approved yesterday was the ninth emergency measure since Sept. 11, 2001 -- all off the books, "as if it were free money," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Emergency bills invite abuse, McCain said, because they are not scrutinized by authorizing committees, and become magnets for special perks. "We are blowing the budget process. We are carving gigantic holes in the system," McCain said.

Reduced Spending Bill Approved In Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

The Senate yesterday overwhelmingly passed a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill to fund the war on terror and hurricane recovery, but only after House leaders forced the Senate to cut about $14 billion from its version.

The bill, which the House passed Tuesday, was approved by the Senate on a 98-1 vote and was signed yesterday evening by President Bush, who had threatened a veto if the final version exceeded $94.5 billion. The Senate bill had reached $109 billion.

In his signing statement, Mr. Bush praised the bill for providing "additional resources needed to fight the war on terror, help citizens of the Gulf States recover from devastating hurricanes, and protect Americans from a potential influenza pandemic."

Senate leaders immediately credited Republicans in both chambers for saving the legislation.

"Republican-led efforts ensured the bill didn't exceed the president's emergency request while focusing our resources on the critical priorities," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

Others said the spending bill would have ballooned out of control without the hard line drawn by House leaders, especially Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"It would have been much higher without the insistence of the House," said Rep. C.W. Bill Young, Florida Republican.

The measure provides $65.8 billion for the war efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, including money for Humvees and tanks; and $19.8 billion for Gulf Coast hurricane recovery, including $500 million in agricultural assistance. The agricultural package was reduced from about $4 billion in the Senate version.

The bill also funds two specific extra requests from Mr. Bush: $2.3 billion for avian flu preparedness efforts and $1.9 billion for border security.

DOJ_NMG_0034810

Before he signed the bill, Mr. Bush credited congressional leadership and the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees -- Rep. Jerry Lewis, California Republican and Sen. Thad Cochran, Mississippi Republican -- for reducing the bill to an acceptable level.

"I am pleased that Congress has addressed these urgent national priorities within the spending limits I set," Mr. Bush said.

Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, and other House conservatives voted against the bill and recommended that Mr. Bush veto it because about $5 billion of the allocation is unrelated to either the war or hurricane recovery. The bill passed the House by a 351-67 vote.

Conservatives said items that don't belong in the bill include $35.6 million for mine safety, $27.6 million to repair utility steam tunnels in the Capitol Power Plant and $38 million for oyster activities.

Negotiators from both chambers killed a contentious Senate project that would have provided $700 million to reroute a railroad in Mississippi, as well as language that critics said would have forced the Navy to reimburse Northrop Grumman Corp. for hurricane damage, lifting the burden from insurance companies.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, cast the only opposing vote yesterday, saying it didn't include an extra $7 billion in the annual budget for labor, health and education. Mr. Specter is chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees that bill.

"This vote should not be misconstrued as voting against our troops or hurricane recovery efforts," he said.

Senate Approves Bush Nominee To Head FDIC (AP-Y2)

Sheila Bair, President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., was approved by the Senate on Thursday along with nominees for three other government positions.

The four were confirmed without dissent. In addition to Bair, they are: James B. Lockhart as director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight; Kathleen Casey as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission; and Robert Couch as president of the Government National Mortgage Association, known as Ginnie Mae.

Bair, a former assistant Treasury secretary, is a professor at the University of Massachusetts. She will become chairman of the agency created during the Depression that insures up to $100,000 in deposits in individual accounts and, in line with legislation enacted in February, up to $250,000 for individual retirement accounts held in banks.

Lockhart, now the acting director of OFHEO, is a longtime Bush friend. He was the executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal agency that backs private pensions, from 1989 to 1993.

At his confirmation hearing last week, Lockhart assured senators he would maintain his independence as the chief regulator of embattled mortgage company Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac.

At a hearing Thursday, Lockhart said it will take years for Fannie Mae to completely reform and recover from its $11 billion accounting scandal.

Casey is the staff director and counsel for the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee. Couch is president and chief executive of New South Federal Savings Bank in Birmingham, Ala.

Bush Hosts Annual Congressional Picnic (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, June 16, 2006

President Bush was the host of the annual congressional picnic Thursday at the White House, but it was his chief of staff's band that came close to stealing the show.

DOJ_NMG_0034811

"We got some interesting entertainment for you tonight," Bush told lawmakers and their families to the picnic, called "Rodeo on the South Lawn."

"We got some people who can play music and some people who think they can play music," the president said.

The Compassionates, Joshua Bolten's band, and the Second Amendments, a bipartisan congressional band, were the opening acts. The featured entertainment came from Riders in the Sky, professional musicians who played in fancy chaps and Western attire.

Rain clouds scuttled the picnic Wednesday night. No such problem for the makeup.

Bush was upbeat, although still weary from his trip this week to Baghdad.

The Compassionates, appearing like the Blues Brothers in their dark shades, white shirts and ties, ended their set with "Born To Be Wild." Then the congressmen took the stage.

Rep. Collin Peterson (news, bio, voting record), D-Minn., said the band had played all over the world, including Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan.

"No politics, just rock 'n roll," he said.

The other members of the group are Reps. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., Jon Porter, R-Nev., Dave Weldon, R-Fla., and Thaddeus McCotter of Michigan, a Republican whom Bush called "that rock 'n roll dude."

Spotted in the crowd were Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, CIA chief Michael Hayden and Bush's top political adviser Karl Rove. The national intelligence director, John Negroponte, showed up in jeans and a cowboy hat.

A Little Needling From Bush, And Then A Call Of Regret (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Every once in awhile, at a news briefing, President Bush will poke fun at the reporters who cover him. And, every once in awhile, he will cause a little heartburn for his staff, and the White House press corps, in the process.

So it was during a Rose Garden press briefing Wednesday when Mr. Bush called upon a reporter for The Los Angeles Times, Peter Wallsten, and promptly commented on his inquisitor's sunglasses: "Are you going to ask that question with shades on?"

Mr. Wallsten offered to take them off, but the president said, "I'm interested in the shade look, seriously," and Mr. Wallsten did not.

Undaunted, he went on to ask Mr. Bush whether he had "any work to do to rebuild credibility that might have been lost" in the C.I.A. leak investigation. (Mr. Bush said a prosecutor's decision this week not to indict the president's deputy chief of staff, Karl Rove, "speaks for itself.")

Afterward, staff members told Mr. Bush that Mr. Wallsten was not wearing the sunglasses to look hip, but for health reasons. Mr. Wallsten has Stargardt's disease, a degenerative condition that causes blindness and can be painfully exacerbated by sunlight.

By late afternoon Mr. Bush called Mr. Wallsten to apologize. Mr. Wallsten said the call came without warning, on his cellphone, which listed the presidential phone number as "unknown."

"He said, 'I needle you guys out of affection,' and I said, 'Now that you know about this, don't treat me any different than you would ordinarily,' " Mr. Wallsten said. "He said, 'I won't.' "

Mr. Wallsten said he invited the president to "needle away," to which Mr. Bush replied, "I will, but next time I'll just use a different needle."

Spellings Goes Overseas To Tout Education (AP-Y2)

By Ben Feller

AP2, June 16, 2006

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has put a passport stamp on her job, taking more overseas trips since 2005 than her predecessor did in four years.

DOJ_NMG_0034812

In less than a year and a half, Spellings has taken seven overseas trips, traveling to Afghanistan, England, Egypt, France, India, Italy, Japan, Jordan and Russia. She plans to visit Greece and Spain later this month.

Transportation, food and lodging for her overseas travel cost $36,981, according to Education Department records. The total cost of her travel was thousands of dollars higher because other agencies picked up the tab for a few trips.

It's not a matter of wanderlust, Spellings says. In her view, the top school official ought to see the nations that the United States is helping and competing against.

"We believe that education is a universally shared value," Spellings said in an interview with The Associated Press on Thursday. "We are looked to and admired around the world as people who know how to do education for the masses."

Spellings has served as a natural spokeswoman for the White House campaign for greater U.S. competitiveness. Better education is at the heart of that effort. She is also close to Bush, as his former top domestic policy adviser and as a longtime friend from Texas.

Spellings took office in January 2005. Rod Paige, Bush's first education secretary, took six overseas trip during his four years in the Cabinet. Three of Spellings' trips came at the request of the White House.

She accompanied first lady Laura Bush to launch a training institute for women teachers in Kabul, Afghanistan. She also led U.S. delegations to the 2005 World Expo in Nagoya, Japan, and to the 2006 Paralympics in Turin, Italy.

Her other trips focused mainly on meetings with international peers. Some examples:

• Spellings traveled with congressional members in April 2006 to Bangalore, New Delhi, and Agra in India. The purpose of the trip was to help the U.S. learn how to compete better.

• Spellings attended two meetings of the Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative, an effort launched in 2004 by Bush and leaders of other major nations. Her travel took her along the Dead Sea in Jordan in May 2005 and to Sharm El-Sheikh, Egypt, in May 2006.

• Spellings went to Moscow in May 2006 for a meeting of education ministers from G8 nations. She also met with Russian teachers and students about math, science and foreign language study and signed a deal with Russian leaders about student and scholar exchanges.

The trips have had different purposes, she said. But all reflect a greater international focus for the Education Department since Bush's first term.

"The landscape has changed, and is changing, since the earliest days of the administration," Spellings said. "The things that we're doing in the Middle East have evolved over these several years. ... It's a smaller world, and we are invested in key parts of the world."

Keith Ashdown, spokesman for the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, questioned how much benefit taxpayers would get out of the trips. The Education Department would be better served, he said, to send midlevel employees who handle day-to-day activities.

"These trips by executives at agencies, there's not a lot of bang for the buck," Ashdown said. "They're mainly expensive public relations events to make the agencies look good."

In speeches, Spellings loves to reference "The World is Flat." The Thomas Friedman best-seller explores how technology is exploding the global economy and forcing the U.S. to adapt.

"It's very significant that she's traveling abroad as much as she can, and more so than her predecessor did," said Victor Johnson, associate executive director of NAFSA, a prominent association of international educators.

"It's certainly important that she gets out there and understands what some of our key competitors in the international education market are doing," Johnson said. "We need to compete for the students and the scholars and the talent of the world."

Paige had a more domestically focused mission: starting No Child Left Behind. The sweeping education law was Bush's first priority in office. Bush signed it in January 2002.

"Secretary Paige traveled a lot domestically — that's just where the need was," said William Hansen, who was Paige's deputy secretary.

The Sept. 11 attacks, the ensuing wars and the fresh attention on economic competitiveness have all put more focus on international travel for Spellings.

Credit-rating Agencies Closer To Tough Regulations (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, June 16, 2006

A move to more closely regulate the major Wall Street credit-rating agencies at the tail end of an era of corporate scandals gained momentum this week, when the House Financial Services Committee approved reform legislation that moves to the full House for review.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick, R-Pa., is dubbed the Credit Rating Agency Duopoly Relief Act, a dig at the two biggest U.S. credit-rating firms, Moody's and Standard and Poor's.

The legislation would require the firms to file confidential financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, publish regular reports on how well their ratings perform, and make mandatory the practice of employing compliance officers to ensure the firms comply with securities laws.

The Senate Banking Committee plans to introduce similar legislation this summer. Those efforts compete with a bid by Moody's and S&P to head off lawmakers by enacting voluntary reforms.

The two firms dominate the roughly $3 billion-a-year business of grading debt securities issued by companies and municipalities that pay them for those investor report cards. But their independence and reliability came into criticism after they failed to anticipate the defaults of such clients as Enron, Global Crossing and WorldCom, which enjoyed investment-grade ratings only months — and, in the case of Enron, days — before the companies' bankruptcy filings.

The credit raters deny misleading investors, contending that their analysts were duped. But, Moody's Vice President Fran Laserson says the firms are now working with the Securities and Exchange Commission to develop a voluntary program of internal controls and disclosures modeled after a European standard. "We think we are close on achieving this self-regulatory framework that we think will satisfy the calls for greater transparency and accountability, which we support," she says.

That is unlikely to satisfy the big firms' smaller competitors, which argue they are locked out of 90% of the credit-rating business through allegedly anti-competitive tactics that stifle competition and fail to serve investors.

"We would be delighted if the SEC took action, but I think it's only going to happen if Congress puts pressure on them through legislation," says Jim Kaitz, CEO of the Association for Financial Professionals, a trade group that represents 14,000 finance professionals.

Glenn Reynolds, chief executive of CreditSights, a small research firm, says the House legislation "marks the first real progress on the issue since it was taken up in early 2002, after the Enron fiasco that the agencies have still failed to take any responsibility for."

Sean Egan, managing director of Egan-Jones Ratings, says, "I think there's been a shift. As of four years ago, we were screaming in the wind. Now, I think there's widespread realization that something has to be done to correct the fundamental problems in this industry."

Drug-plan Shuffle Disrupts Coverage (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

WASHINGTON — The problems that plagued low-income seniors and people with disabilities during the rollout of Medicare's prescription-drug program in January have continued on a smaller scale, causing some new beneficiaries to lose coverage or spend their own money at pharmacy counters.

The problems occur when people turn 65 or become eligible for Medicare disability benefits and are involuntarily switched from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare plan. Thousands lose Medicaid drug coverage, typically for two to six weeks, before Medicare kicks in. Health counselors say the trouble dominates their caseloads.

"It is a national problem," says Barbara Murock, a state health policy specialist in Allegheny County, Pa. "It's happening all the time."

Since January, most of the early problems have been rectified. But each month, 10,000 to 70,000 new people fall into the gap between Medicaid and Medicare.

DOJ_NMG_0034814

Darin Byrd, a 40-year-old cancer patient in North Versailles, Pa., who lives on about $700 a month in disability payments, had to charge $270 to his mother's credit card and pay $100 in cash when he lost Medicaid drug coverage May 15. His new coverage began June 1. “They dropped me before Medicare picked me up,” Byrd says.

Medicare's prescription program got off to a rocky start in January, when roughly 6 million low-income beneficiaries who had Medicaid drug coverage had to change to the new Medicare plan. Tens of thousands were turned away or overcharged at pharmacies because the private insurance plans that run the Medicare program didn't honor their coverage. More than half the states stepped in with their own money to rectify the situation; some, such as California and Maine, are still paying.

The requirement to move from Medicaid to Medicare was made by Congress when it created the drug program in 2003. Gale Arden, of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, told state officials last month the agency “is working on a means” to more quickly find and enroll people forced to make the switch. Meanwhile, says the agency's Peter Ashkenaz, “there are protections.” Among them:

•People can enroll in a Medicare drug plan at pharmacy counters to avoid any gap in coverage.

•Several states fill the gap with emergency funds.

•If beneficiaries pay out of pocket, insurance plans eventually will provide retroactive coverage.

State officials say that's not enough. “This is no way to run a drug benefit,” says Jude Walsh, an aide to Maine Gov. John Baldacci. “We're always a month behind.”

They also say it's up to Medicare to fix the gap. “It's an inherent problem in the design of the program,” says George Oestreich, a Missouri Medicaid official.

Counting On COLAs To Bring Relief (WP)

By Stephen Barr

With consumer prices on the rise, federal retirees are paying more attention to inflation trends and what they mean for their pensions.

Several callers this week pointed to a notice posted by the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association that showed that most government retirees have banked 2.9 percent toward their next cost-of-living adjustment. The calculation, based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in May, suggests that federal retirees could be in line for a jumbo COLA in January.

Of course, it's too early to tell if the run-up in inflation -- a reflection of $3-a-gallon gasoline and other, higher consumer prices -- will continue into the fall, when officials will crunch the numbers for the 2007 COLA.

But, regardless of whether the inflation trend line goes up or down, the federal COLAs have proved to be an important benefit, helping lower-income retirees cope with increased costs for fuel, housing and health care.

As Patrick Purcell , a social policy specialist at the Congressional Research Service, wrote in a recent report, COLAs typically do not make retirees better off financially but merely protect them from becoming financially worse off over time.

At the start of this year, federal retirees covered by the Civil Service Retirement System received a 4.1 percent COLA, and retirees in the newer Federal Employees Retirement System who were at least 62 received a 3.1 percent increase. That COLA was the biggest in 15 years.

Nationwide, there were nearly 1.8 million civil service retirees on the government's annuity roll as of Oct. 1, according to the Office of Personnel Management. Of those, 1.57 million retired under the CSRS and about 220,000 under FERS.

(The tallies by the OPM are partial snapshots of the government retirement community: They do not include retirees from the military, the U.S. Postal Service, and the congressional and judicial branches of government.) Last year, the OPM counted 265,277 civil service retirees in the District, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. An additional 77,574 people in the region received survivor benefits.

The average annuity for a CSRS retiree is $2,396 per month. The average pension for a FERS retiree, who receives a Social Security benefit, is $868 monthly.2.7 Percent for Whom?

As expected, the House this week approved a fiscal 2007 spending bill that includes a 2.7 percent pay raise for civil service employees next year. The bill requires that the raise also go to employees in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, which are replacing the government-wide pay system with performance-oriented systems.

The Bush administration, which had recommended a 2.2 percent raise, objected to the House action and urged deletion of the provision covering Defense and Homeland Security employees. "The provision is ambiguous as to how the increase would be applied to employees covered under these departments' modernized pay systems and will unnecessarily complicate their implementation," the White House budget office said.

But Darryl Perkinson , president of the Federal Managers Association, welcomed the House action, saying employees in the two departments are concerned about "what will happen to their pay." He added, "It's positive to see that for 2007, at least, we are assured that they will be recognized for their dedication and commitment to serving America."

The Senate plans to address federal pay issues later this year, aides said.Talk Shows

Bernanke Speech Soothes Nerves On Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman, eased nerves on Thursday with a measured assessment of the threat posed by higher energy prices to inflation and growth, as stocks advanced worldwide.

The S&P 500 index rebounded before his speech – reflecting positive reports on jobless claims and manufacturing orders – and ended the day up more than 2 per cent at 1,256.16. But bond prices fell, with the yield on 10-year US Treasury bills rising 3 basis points as investors digested the implications for interest rates.

Mr Bernanke zeroed in on the sustained increase in energy prices as one of the root causes of the recent inflation scare, and pledged to keep a careful watch on inflation expectations. But he did so in a calm tone, without the aggressively hawkish language that rocked markets on June 5.

“In the short run, sharply higher energy prices create a rather different, and in some ways, a more difficult set of economic challenges,” Mr Bernanke told an audience of business-people in Chicago. “A significant increase in energy prices can simultaneously slow economic growth while raising inflation.”

He said the rise in energy costs had imposed the equivalent of a tax of $185bn – almost 1.5 per cent of gross domestic product – on US residents since the end of 2003, while putting upward pressure on prices.

Mr Bernanke also cautioned that “in the long run, higher energy prices are likely to reduce somewhat the productive capacity of the US economy” by making some energy-intensive capital equipment obsolete. High energy prices also resulted in a deterioration in the US terms of trade – the relative price of its exports and imports – and a larger current account deficit, he said.

But Mr Bernanke said that provided energy prices did not move sharply higher from their existing elevated levels, “these long-run effects, though clearly negative, appear to be manageable”.

He reiterated his message of June 5 that the Fed was alert to changes in inflation expectations, ahead of the publication today of survey data from the University of Michigan. However, he noted, “inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month”.

Mr Bernanke said: “These developments bear watching.” This was a relatively gentle phrase, compared with the description of inflation expectations in the last Fed minutes as “worrisome”.

Mr Bernanke implicitly dismissed suggestions that speculators were responsible for the run-up in prices, saying “for the most part, high oil prices reflect high and growing demand for oil and limited and uncertain supplies”.

DOJ_NMG_0034816

Significantly, he declined to blame the increase in core inflation, which was up 0.3 per cent in May, on technical adjustments to the estimate of the cost of living in owner-occupied homes, as many private sector analysts did.

Bernanke Highlights Inflation Risks, But Sounds Somewhat Dovish Note (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After edging up in recent months, market-based inflation expectations implied by nominal and inflation-indexed Treasurys' yields have "fallen back somewhat" in the past month, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Thursday.

Still, inflation expectations "bear watching" given their importance in keeping high energy prices, which are likely to persist, from feeding into the broader economy, Mr. Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the Economic Club of Chicago. (Read the full text.1)

"Unlike in earlier episodes, the significantly higher relative price of energy that we are now experiencing is expected to be relatively long lasting and thus will likely prompt more-significant adjustments by households and businesses over time," Mr. Bernanke said.

Mr. Bernanke said keeping inflation expectations contained is key in preventing "second round" effects of higher energy prices.

"To the extent that households and business owners expect that the Fed will keep inflation low, firms have both less incentive and less ability to pass on increased energy costs in the form of higher prices," he said.

"And likewise, workers have less incentive to demand compensating increases in their nominal wages," Mr. Bernanke said.

The Fed chairman noted that survey-based inflation expectations and market-based gauges such as nominal and inflation-indexed government-bond yields "have edged up, on net, in recent months."

"As yet, these expectations measures have remained within the ranges in which they have fluctuated in recent years and inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month," Mr. Bernanke said.

"Nevertheless, these developments bear watching," he added.

Recent government inflation data have suggested that higher energy prices are feeding into underlying prices. The core consumer price index that excludes food and energy prices has increased 0.3% on-month for each of the past three months through May. Each gain came in above market expectations.

Mr. Bernanke noted that while the pass-through of energy and commodity prices has been "relatively low" thus far, "the cumulative increases in energy and commodity prices have been large enough that they could account for some of the recent pickup in core inflation."

Economists expect that, in light of the recent rise in core inflation and some hawkish inflation remarks by Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials in recent days, the central bank will most likely raise official interest rates a 17th consecutive time at its June 28-29 meeting, to 5.25%.

Besides the inflationary effect of higher oil and other energy prices, Mr. Bernanke also noted that the long-run economic effects, "though clearly negative, appear to be manageable."

"The U.S. economy is remarkably flexible, and it seems to have absorbed the cost shocks of the past few years with only a few dislocations," he said.

However, he did note that higher energy prices "are likely to reduce somewhat the productive capacity of the U.S. economy" over the long run, and may restrain productivity growth by causing businesses to trim new investment.

A higher oil import bill also "will increase the U.S. current account deficit, implying a greater need for foreign financing" over the medium term, Mr. Bernanke added.

And with imported energy costs up $185 billion since late 2003, "all else being equal, this constitutes a noticeable drag on real household incomes and spending," Mr. Bernanke said.

Stocks Post Sharp Gains In Rebound From Sell-Off (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

DOJ_NMG_0034817

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

After five tumultuous weeks, investors finally breathed a collective sigh of relief today.

Stock prices turned up sharply in most world markets. In the United States, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2 percent and the Nasdaq composite index jumped more than 2.8 percent, their second straight day in the black after almost 10 straight days of declines. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 1.8 percent, pushing it back above the 11,000 mark.

Elsewhere in the world, the frenetic selling of the last few weeks gave way to buying from Tokyo, up 1.1 percent, to London, up 2 percent.

Stocks staged an even bigger comeback in emerging markets, which had been hammered on concerns that they were beginning to resemble the American technology bubble of the late 1990's and 2000. India's Sensex index, which had fallen more than 27 percent in the five-week period that ended Tuesday, was up almost 7 percent today.

Cautioning that the rally could prove to be a brief interlude in a more sustained slide, experts said the snapback appears to reflect the fundamental strength of the American and world economies. Inflation remains low by historical standards and economic growth, while slowing, is not expected to stall.

"To me, this is a lack of sell orders combined with a little bit of a sigh of relief that maybe this isn't a hard landing" for the economy, said Chris M. Hyzy, an investment strategist at U.S. Trust, an investment firm in New York.

A report showing that American industrial activity pulled back slightly in May appeared to have helped propel stocks higher because investors believe a slowdown in economic activity will help rein in inflation, a development that could allow the Federal Reserve to stop raising interest rates later this summer.

And breaking from a recent pattern, in which comments by Federal Reserve officials have driven the markets down, a speech by Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed's chairman, on energy and the economy this afternoon did not break the rally. He said policymakers should be on guard to make sure that high oil prices do not drive up the costs of other goods and services, but he noted that the impact of high prices thus far appears to be minimal.

"As yet, these expectations measures have remained within the ranges in which they have fluctuated in recent years and inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month," Mr. Bernanke said at the Economic Club of Chicago. "Nevertheless, these developments bear watching."

Stocks may also be rising for technical reasons.

Investors who believe that the price of a stock will fall often borrow shares and sell them short. If prices do indeed fall, the short seller will buy back them at a lower price to complete his bet and turn a profit. Those purchases, in turn, can help briefly bolster price of the fallen stocks.

It is hard to determine exactly how much short selling is contributing to the current market movements, but analysts say it appears to have played some part in bolstering the price of metals and other commodities, which have staged a small return in the last two days. The price of gold rose $4.20, to 0.8 percent, to $566.50 an ounce.

"Short positions have been closed out significantly in commodities," Mr. Hyzy of U.S. Trust said.

As for stocks today, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 26.12 points, or 2.1 percent, to close at 1,256.16; the Nasdaq composite index climbed 58.15 points, or 2.8 percent, to 2,144.15; and the Dow Jones industrial average climbed 198.27 points, or 1.8 percent, to 11,015.19.

Technology, energy and financial stocks, which had taken an intense drubbing in recent weeks were among the leading gainers today.

Meanwhile, bond prices fell. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction of its price, rose to 5.09 percent this afternoon from 5.06 percent late Wednesday.

REASSURING COMMENTS on inflation from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke helped propel the Dow Jones Industrial Average ahead almost 200 points, marking its biggest two-day gain in three years and pushing it past the 11000 milestone again.

Although many on Wall Street remained nervous about the market's outlook, few were standing in its way yesterday as surging markets abroad and good news at home spurred the buying.

The Dow industrials finished with a gain of 198.27 points, or 1.83%, at 11015.19. The Dow is ahead 2.8% for 2006, although still down 5.4% since its six-year high set May 10.

It was the biggest one-day gain in point or percentage terms since April 2005. Together with Wednesday's 111-point surge, the 2.89% two-session gain was the biggest since April 2003. All 30 Dow-industrials components rose, the second time that has happened since early 2004. (The other was in April 2006.)

After all the losses, "this market was kind of like a rubber band. It got stretched too much on the downside and snapped back," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. "Bernanke's comments about the inflation bugaboo also reassured people. But the proof is going to be next week. What I don't want to see is another ungluing."

The day's big news was Mr. Bernanke's speech to the Economics Club of Chicago, in which he said inflation expectations indicated by yields on Treasury bonds have "fallen back somewhat." He said energy prices so far have had a "relatively low" impact on other prices.

Mr. Bernanke, who took over Fed leadership in February, gave no direct hints about his plans for interest-rate increases this summer. Investors expect the Fed to push short-term rates up another quarter percentage point at its policy meeting June 28 and 29. The comments suggested that Mr. Bernanke has a balanced view on inflation risks, which renewed hopes for a pause in rate increases.

"Investors still are learning how to dance with Mr. Bernanke," said Jon Brorson, head of growth-stock investing at money-management group Neuberger Berman. "But it sounds like he assuaged people's fears a little bit in Chicago." Mr. Brorson said he is confident that Mr. Bernanke "isn't going to drive the economy into the ground."

Like Mr. Clark, Mr. Brorson said the rally was in part a technical reaction to the heavy selling of the past month. He said he expects stocks to remain volatile, as investors try to understand the likely outlook for interest rates. Some short-term investors could use the current rebound as an opportunity to sell some stocks they had trouble unloading during the downdraft.

Even before Mr. Bernanke spoke, stocks began the day with gains, partly in reaction to sharp rallies abroad. India's benchmark index jumped almost 7%, Tokyo's 1%, Russia's 5% and those of Britain and Germany 2%. Colombia's soared almost 16%.

Some of the market swings could be due to the "quadruple-witching" expiration of options and futures contracts at week's end. When stocks and indexes move sharply, they can make options and futures contracts pay off, causing traders to buy or sell stocks to cover their exposure. When trading is distorted by short-term buying and selling, market moves can be partly unwound in later days.

Some of the buying also could be by short sellers, who borrow stock and sell it in a bet that it will decline. To take profits, they must buy stocks back and return them, which can temporarily contribute to market rallies after big declines.

Investors welcomed a series of mixed economic reports, which together suggested that inflation isn't getting out of control and that the economy is continuing to expand. Industrial production unexpectedly fell in May, as did the pace of expansion of Philadelphia-area factory activity. May manufacturing activity in New York state was strong and last week's new jobless claims declined. Brokerage firm Bear Stearns posted record quarterly profits.

Treasury prices, which had risen during the stock downdraft as money flowed to Treasurys' relative safety, declined for a second day, pushing yields slightly higher. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.104%. The 30-year bond was down 18/32 to yield 5.138%.

Oil futures rose 36 cents, but finished below $70 at $69.50 a barrel. Gold futures rebounded after seven consecutive declines, rising $4.20 to $566.50 a troy ounce. Gold futures are down 21% since hitting a 26-year high in May.

Investors are looking ahead to quarterly profit reports, due next month. Early forecasts of problems and triumphs are starting to trickle out.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2.12%, or 26.12 points, to 1256.16, the biggest percentage gain since 2003. It is 5.2% off the five-year high it hit May 5, but back in the black for 2006, up 0.6%.

The Nasdaq Composite Index posted its biggest percentage gain since 2004, up 2.79%, or 58.15 points, at 2144.15. Although the Nasdaq has returned to its level of one week ago, it remains down 9.6% from its April 19 five-year high and off 2.8% since the year began.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index jumped 3.54% to 701.05, its biggest one-day gain since 2002. It is down more than 10% from the record it hit in May.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.94%, or 3.84 points, to 201.71.

Stocks Extend Rally; Dow Over 11,000 (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

NEW YORK, June 15 -- Wall Street rallied for a second session Thursday as strong earnings from Bear Stearns and mild economic data helped stocks regain their footing after several weeks of hefty losses.

The Dow Jones industrial average jumped 198.27, or 1.8 percent, to 11,015.19, finishing above the 11,000 mark for the first time since June 6. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 26.12, or 2.1 percent, to 1256.16, and the Nasdaq composite index surged 58.15, or 2.8 percent, to 2144.15.

Although the day's data gave mixed signals on economic growth, investors again brushed aside worries about inflation and interest rates following a month of selling that pulled the Dow down more than 8 percent. The market turned sharply higher Thursday afternoon after Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said that record energy and commodity prices could account for some of the recent uptick in core prices but that inflation expectations have remained within historical ranges.

Crude futures had another day of gains after the government reported a larger-than-expected drop in U.S. oil reserves, as refineries stepped up output to meet summer gasoline demand.

Despite two days of sturdy gains, some analysts were skeptical about whether Wall Street has finally reversed course. Stocks are expected to remain volatile until the Fed issues its opinion on the economy's health at the June 28-29 policy meeting.Movers

Microsoft closed up 19 cents, at $22.07, prior to the announcement that co-founder Bill Gates plans to step away from day-to-day duties by July 2008. Microsoft shares slipped in after-hours trading.

Dow's Rally 'does Not Mean That Much' (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034820

NEW YORK — Pinpointing the precise end of scary stock market downturns is, at best, an inexact science. So it's no surprise Wall Street is unwilling to concede that the struggling Dow's surge back above 11,000 after its biggest two-day gain in three years is definitive proof the corrective phase is over.

While professional investors welcomed the Dow Jones industrial average's 309-point gain to 11,015 on Wednesday and Thursday, they said it did not repair all the damage caused by the 8% swoon it suffered over the past five weeks and advised investors to tread cautiously.

"One or two days of a rally does not mean that much," cautions Price Headley, chief analyst at BigTrends.com. Headley, citing historical patterns, notes that the beaten-down market was due for "a bounce." But for the bounce to stick, stocks will likely have to drop again and prove that they can stay above the lowest levels hit in the current downdraft.

The two-day surge — which gained steam Thursday after Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke didn't say anything to alarm investors — provided welcome relief from a free fall that began in early May. That sell-off was sparked by fears that the era of cheap money fostered by historically low interest rates was nearing an end as central banks in the USA, Europe and Asia moved to raise interest rates to contain inflation.

The biggest losses have been suffered by riskier asset classes, such as emerging-markets stocks, commodities and shares of small companies.

Back-to-back up days, however, while a sure "sign of life" for stocks, "is not convincing evidence of a new uptrend," says Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. He says it's unclear whether the rally was fueled by bargain hunters, or a wave of buying by short sellers who had been betting against the market.

Short sellers hope to make money on falling shares by selling borrowed shares and buying them back later at a lower price. When stocks rebounded, these investors opted to buy stocks back before they went even higher, to avoid risking bigger losses.

Tower says it will likely take about a month for the market to work through the bottoming process. Signs that stocks are done falling would be either a massive decline on huge trading volume followed by a sharp rebound, or a successful test of the recent lows and a slow, steady march upward.

Wall Street is debating whether the downturn is over or whether this is a rally in a bear market. Ironically, the Dow's top five daily point gains all came in bear markets. Still, Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's, says this is no bear market. "This is a correction," he says. "Corrections are like a slap in the face, like what we've seen in the past month. Bears can be equated with grinding downward movements that you equate with water torture."

Factory Output Fell Slightly In May (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Factory output fell slightly last month as manufacturers adjusted to milder consumer demand, and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sounded a guardedly optimistic note on inflation.

In another sign the economy has entered a period of slower growth, the Fed said industrial production declined 0.1% in May after three consecutive monthly gains, but output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities is still running 4.3% higher than a year earlier. Lower auto production last month spurred a 0.1% decline in the manufacturing sector and mining output dropped as well. Halting a recent upswing, capacity utilization fell to 81.7% in May from 81.9% in April.

The May decline in manufacturing activity was a response to slackening consumer spending after a robust first quarter. "For the first time in more than three years, production of consumer goods, business equipment, construction supplies and business supplies all fell in May," said David Huether, the National Association of Manufacturers' chief economist. "This shows that a broad-based slowdown in the economy is taking place."

After surging at an inflation-adjusted 5.3% annual rate in the first quarter, many analysts say the economy is advancing at a slower pace -- around 3% -- in the current quarter. Rising interest rates, a gradually cooling real-estate market and elevated gasoline prices are restraining consumer spending, but businesses are picking up some of the slack. Recent trends in exports, investment and productivity all point to further gains in business spending, and economists expect industrial production to resume growth in the months ahead.

"So what if industrial production slid back a shade in May?" said Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp. "All major market and industry groups have seen their industrial production rise over the past year...Growth is a go."

Bison Gear & Engineering Corp., based in St. Charles, Ill., is seeing strong demand for the industrial motors it makes for restaurant and health-care equipment. Chief Executive Ron Bullock said a recent investment of "a couple million dollars" in manufacturing gear will enable growth of 15% next year, and exports are accounting for an increasing share of sales. The company's work force, Mr. Bullock added, is up 11% from a year earlier.

Mr. Bernanke, in his speech to the Economic Club of Chicago yesterday, noted that expected inflation, as measured by inflation-protected bonds, had "fallen back somewhat in the past month." He acknowledged that the public's expectations of inflation in surveys and in the bond market had "edged up," developments that "bear watching."

He didn't repeat his stronger warning from a speech last week in which he called recent developments on inflation "unwelcome" and said the Fed would remain "vigilant" to ensure recent increases weren't sustained. That language helped boost expectations for another rise in interest rates later this month and roiled stock markets. But it also appears to have convinced bond investors of his anti-inflation resolve, leading to the recent retreat in their expectations of inflation.

Mr. Bernanke said that while the rise in energy and commodity prices since 2003 hasn't led to the spiral of rising prices and wages of the 1970s, they "have been large enough that they could account for some of the recent pickup in core inflation."

He also said he expects productivity growth -- output per worker-hour -- to continue at 2.5% to 3% a year "for some years ahead." Such a high rate of productivity growth would enable the U.S. economy to grow at roughly 3% to 4% a year without generating inflation.

Separately, the Labor Department said 295,000 people filed initial unemployment claims last week, 8,000 fewer than the week before. The drop pushed the closely watched four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 315,750, which suggests a robust level of job creation this month.

With the unemployment rate at 4.6%, economists have been searching for signs of wage gains that could add to inflationary pressures. The labor market has been sending mixed signals recently, however, and pay increases are lagging behind the prevailing inflation rate.

Mr. Huether of NAM and other manufacturing groups have called on the Fed to stop raising short-term interest rates, but several Fed officials have recently indicated that the recent rise in prices and inflation expectations are greater concerns than slower growth. Futures markets are all but certain the Fed will opt to raise the federal-funds rate to 5.25% later this month.

The Phantom Menace (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Over the last few weeks monetary officials have sounded increasingly worried about rising prices. On Wednesday, Richard Fisher, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, declared that inflation "is running at a rate that is just too corrosive to be accepted by a virtuous central banker."

I'm worried too — but not about recent price increases. What worries me, instead, is the Fed's overreaction to those increases. When it comes to inflation, the main thing we have to fear is fear itself.

Discussions of inflation can be numbingly arcane — are you a core C.P.I. type or a trimmed-mean P.C.E. person? But the real issue is whether there's a serious risk that inflation will become embedded in the economy.

The classic example of embedded inflation is the wage-price spiral — better described as wage-price leapfrogging — of the 1970's. Back then, whenever wage contracts came up for renewal, workers demanded big raises, both to catch up with past inflation and to offset expected future inflation. And whenever companies changed their prices, they raised them by a lot, both to catch up with past wage increases and to offset expected future increases.

The result of this leapfrogging process was that inflation became a self-sustaining process, feeding on itself. And ending that self-sustaining process proved very difficult. The Fed eventually brought the inflation of the 1970's under control, but only by raising interest rates so high that in the early 1980's the U.S. economy suffered its worst slump since the Great Depression.

Fed officials now seem worried that we may be seeing the start of another round of self-sustaining inflation. But is that a realistic fear? Only if you think we can have a wage-price spiral without, you know, the wages part.

The point is that wage increases can be a major driver of inflation only if workers consistently receive raises that substantially exceed productivity growth. And that just hasn't been happening.

In fact, the distinctive feature of the current economic expansion — the reason most Americans are unhappy with the state of the economy, in spite of good numbers for the gross domestic product and explosive growth in corporate profits — is the disconnect between rising worker productivity and stagnant wages. Over the past five years productivity, as measured by real G.D.P. per hour worked, has risen by about 14 percent, but the real wages of nonmanagerial workers have risen less than 2 percent.

Nor is there much sign that things are changing on that front. The official unemployment rate is low by historical standards, but workers still don't seem to have much bargaining power. (Does this mean that the official unemployment rate makes the job situation look better than it really is? Yes.) The Federal Reserve's Beige Book, an informal survey of economic conditions across the country, reports that over the last couple of months "wage pressures remained moderate over all, with the exception being workers with hotly demanded skills."

But if wage pressures are so moderate, where's the inflation coming from? The answer is soaring oil and commodity prices.

It's true that some widely used inflation measures, like so-called core inflation, strip out the direct "first-round" effects of rising energy prices. But there are still indirect effects, which usually take some time to show up in the data. Much of the recent rise in core inflation probably represents the delayed effect of the big run-up in fuel prices a few months ago. And unless something else happens to drive up oil prices — like, to give a wild example, a military strike on Iran — inflation will probably subside in the months ahead.

And bear in mind that many economists, including Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, have said that a little bit of inflation — say, 2 percent a year on average — is actually good for the economy.

It would be an exaggeration to say that there's no inflation threat at all. I can think of ways in which inflation could become a problem. But it's much easier to think of ways in which the Federal Reserve, wrongly focused on the phantom menace of a new wage-price spiral, could be slow to respond to bigger threats, like a rapidly deflating housing bubble.

So I don't fear inflation nearly as much as I fear the fear of inflation. And I wish the Fed would lighten up on the subject.

As Natural Gas Glut Looms, Producers Eye The Weather (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The whole world is talking about energy shortages, but for the moment, the U.S. natural gas business is looking at a potential glut.

Thanks in part to a warm winter, inventories of natural gas have built up to levels far greater than normal for this time of year. And terminals built to handle imports of liquefied natural gas from other countries are operating at about half of their capacity.

It is, unfortunately for consumers, a situation that may not last. Energy traders are still pricing futures contracts at high levels, and natural gas producers are planning for big increases in U.S. demand over the coming years. Yesterday, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission approved proposals to build three new terminals and expand two others that together would triple the nation's capacity to import liquefied natural gas (LNG). One of those projects is an expansion of the LNG terminal at Cove Point in Calvert County, Md.

But for now, as anxiety grips oil markets, natural gas markets have calmed down in the past five months. At the end of last week, natural gas in storage amounted to 2.4 trillion cubic feet, up 23 percent from a year earlier and 38 percent higher than the five-year average, according to the Energy Information Administration. As a result, natural gas prices, which spiked as high as $15 a thousand cubic feet last winter, finished yesterday at $6.32 at Henry Hub, La., an industry benchmark.

The only things that can rescue natural gas producers from having to slash prices later this year: another big hurricane or a hot summer.

"What people are counting on is that there will be a hurricane that will disrupt [natural gas] production in the Gulf of Mexico the way Katrina and Rita did and that all that gas in storage is needed to make things work," said Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank.

A report last week by Cambridge Energy Research Associates says that without another major disruption of natural gas production in the Gulf of Mexico or a particularly hot summer to drive up air-conditioning needs, the nation's storage capacity for natural gas will fill to the brim by autumn, producing a "real potential for an abrupt decrease in gas prices" as some storage fields become unable to accommodate additional injections.

This doesn't mean that consumers can expect any immediate relief. Most utilities sign contracts for anywhere from one to three years, and the benefits of lower prices will hinge on when contracts expire, as well as the weather between now and the fall. And current prices are still substantially higher than they were three or four years ago.

The most immediate effect of falling natural gas prices will come at utilities or power-generating firms with the capability to burn either coal or natural gas. "We're beginning to get substitutions," Sieminski said. "At this price level, it actually makes sense to stop burning coal and start burning natural gas."

Most energy analysts, however, see the bulge in natural gas supplies as temporary. "We have a little bit of a reprieve, but I don't think it's a sustainable reprieve," said John Dearborn, vice president for global energy at Dow Chemical Co., a major natural gas user. "We have been able to build up inventories faster than in years prior, but that's no indication of where gas inventories are going to end up. If we have a warm summer and a normal-to-cold winter, we will find ourselves back in the position we were in last winter."

Most players in futures markets agree. Prices for natural gas to be delivered in January stand at $11.10 a thousand cubic feet, what Dearborn calls "the danger area" for consumers like Dow Chemical.

Most oil and gas companies and natural-gas-producing countries are going ahead with plans to meet demand that they expect to rise quickly over the next five to 15 years. In the United States, Sieminski noted, consumption of natural gas is expected to rise by about 30 percent by 2020. Since domestic natural gas production is essentially flat, most of the supply needed to meet that demand is expected to come from abroad in the form of LNG.

That has set off a scramble over LNG terminals and permits to build them. Many states and cities are reluctant to have such terminals. Last week, ConocoPhillips withdrew an application to build an LNG terminal 11 miles off the coast of Alabama, citing uncertainty about local environmental concerns. But it said it might file a new application "after consideration of all the economic factors."

Lord John Browne, chief executive of BP PLC, said in a speech in Washington yesterday that his company plans to invest $700 million in LNG terminals in the United States.

Yesterday's FERC approvals would have impact on both the Gulf and Atlantic coasts. Dominion will be able to increase its LNG import capacity to 1.8 billion cubic feet a day, up from 1 billion currently. In addition to Dominion's project, other projects approved by FERC yesterday were in Louisiana, Texas and New Jersey.

"This supply increase will have a significant impact on domestic natural gas prices in the future," said FERC Chairman Joseph T. Kelliher.

"If you need the gas, you have to build the terminals," Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, said yesterday in a briefing in Washington.

Qatar is gearing up to meet the demand on its end. It is in the midst of a massive expansion program to triple its capacity to export LNG. After meeting with representatives of U.S. natural gas consuming companies yesterday, Attiyah said, "I told them: 'I am a seller. I am here. But you have to provide the facilities.' "

The Beltway's Energy (WSJ)

By Roger C. Altman

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

We first saw America's energy vulnerability in 1973, when the OPEC embargo raised prices dramatically. Then the 1979 Iranian hostage crisis caused gasoline rationing. The message from these two events could not have been louder: The U.S. was too dependent on oil, and especially imports. For over 30 years, however, we have done nothing to reduce this vulnerability. Now we are again facing near-record energy prices, an angry public and the new threat of climate change. Yet Washington is still focused on the wrong issues.

Recent talk of price gouging, windfall profits and CEO pay is a distraction. Yes, there may be abuses, but no actions in those areas will have any impact whatsoever on energy prices or supply. Incessant pledges of energy independence within 15 or 20 years, i.e., national self-sufficiency, are completely unattainable and thus misleading. The sweeping embrace of wind, solar and hydrogen power is similarly misplaced, as these are not among the most promising alternatives.

Instead, what's needed from Washington are three big steps. First, to confess to the public that America is in deep trouble from its oil dependence and its carbon emissions. Second, to impel oil conservation through deep new incentives and mandates. Third, to finance an acceleration of those technologies which could truly replace oil and gas.

Let's start with the bad facts. For the public to support tough steps, it must know the real picture on our oil dependence and our carbon emissions. Our oil problem is about imports. A majority of the oil we use -- primarily for gasoline -- is imported. But over 60% of the world's proved oil reserves lie in Saudi Arabia, Russia, Iran, Iraq, Venezuela and the United Arab Emirates. And the governments in these nations own the reserves, not private parties. These are increasingly unstable places and increasingly unfriendly to America. Does anyone really believe that every single one of these governments, or their successors, will continue to supply oil to the West on reasonable terms?

Moreover, while they are not running out of oil, these nations also have very little spare production capacity right now -- perhaps only two million barrels in an 80-million-barrel daily market. That is why, with China and India now becoming big importers, world oil prices have risen into the mid-$70 range per barrel.

The U.S. will steadily consume more oil, not less; indeed, our daily consumption is projected to nearly double by 2030. Therefore, there is no scenario, absent a breakthrough technology, for our becoming independent of imported oil or natural gas. Our political leaders are obliged to make this clear to the American people.

The second set of bad facts concerns carbon dioxide emissions and climate change. I am not a climatologist, but the evidence of global warming, and the role of human-caused emissions in it, seems close to irrefutable. The National Academy of Sciences sees it that way. Both U.S. and global CO2 emissions are projected to grow indefinitely. Continued warming of the earth may irreversibly reduce its suitability for human life. This catastrophic risk is like that of a large asteroid which might strike this planet over the next 20 to 30 years. This also must be explained in stark terms to the public.

There are only two serious approaches to reducing energy vulnerability and carbon emissions. One is oil conservation and the other is investment in new technology.

The only real strategy on oil is to use less of it. But, every year, the size of the U.S. auto fleet grows and, with fuel economy flat for 20 years, the result is more oil imports. Our leadership must accept that oil conservation is not just a "personal virtue," to quote Vice President Cheney, but a national requirement.

For starters, vehicles must be made more efficient. Corporate average fuel efficiency standards (CAFE) must be raised sharply, perhaps together with a stretch-out of legacy costs for the U.S. auto producers. Owners of the oldest, least efficient vehicles should be paid to turn them in. And we need much deeper tax incentives for production of hybrid and clean diesel engines and for consumer purchases of them. The expected growth in our oil consumption could be cut by 25% to 50% with these steps.

The permanent solution to oil vulnerability and climate change, however, lies in technology. My generation has seen breathtaking technologies emerge, but they will pale before the next ones. Thus, we should aim for technologies to truly end our use of oil and gas. The front-end risks must be financed at the federal level; after all, this is how NASA achieved key computing breakthroughs and the Defense Department developed the Internet.

Right now, however, federal R&D efforts are so small and unfocused as to be embarrassing -- for example, only $300 million for all renewable energy. To change this, some have proposed that the format, intensity and scale of the Defense Advanced Research Progress Agency be replicated in the Department of Energy. This is a good idea that is overdue.

Emission-free coal technology and next-generation nuclear power technology are areas that would benefit from that type of focus. In each case, the technology conceivably could replace oil and gas, unlike wind and solar. And, in each case, the technology works but not at commercial scale and competitive costs. The latest forecasts for reaching beginning competitiveness extend to 20 years. That must be shortened, and only Washington can provide the bridge financing to do so. Such financing is always risky, but far less so than the oil insecurity and climate risks we are running right now.

Since the first energy crisis 33 years ago, our nation has been unable to develop effective solutions. When you think about it, this is a stunning failure of leadership. Now, with America facing even greater danger, we deserve much better. Let's hope we finally get it.

Mr. Altman, chairman of Evercore Partners, was deputy Treasury secretary in the first Clinton administration.

'06 Race Focuses On The Suburbs, Inner And Outer (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash., June 15 — In searching for any advantage in this year's Congressional elections, the two parties are focusing with increased intensity on those cul de sac jungles of tenuous political loyalties, the suburbs and exurbs.

After years in which Republicans capitalized on rapid growth in outlying areas, Democrats now see an opportunity to make gains in close-in suburbs where changes in the composition of the population are working in their favor. In a dozen or so Congressional districts that are leading battlegrounds in the midterm elections, older, more densely packed suburbs are trending Democratic, helping to offset Republican dominance on the sprawling exurban frontier.

Democratic hopes of retaking the House, party strategists say, could hinge on places like Bellevue, a city of 107,000 just across Lake Washington from Seattle. Here, a fast-growing Asian population and an influx of empty-nesters and singles living in new residential complexes have helped to make this the kind of district that, while continuing to send a Republican to Congress, has turned increasingly Democratic.

Both sides are taking steps to tailor their messages to, and train their firepower on, those swing suburbs. On Friday, President Bush will fly into this prosperous district as the draw of a fund-raiser intended to help Representative Dave Reichert hold on to his seat. The president's arrival will follow hard on the heels of a visit by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is in charge of the Democrats' efforts to win back the House.

"The future of both parties is in the suburbs," said Mr. Emanuel, who was here on behalf of Mr. Reichert's Democratic challenger, Darcy Burner, a 35-year-old former Microsoft employee new to politics.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, who represents the North Shore district outside Chicago, said suburban voters were focused less on culture-war issues like same-sex marriage and abortion than on safety, education and environmental protection. As the population changes, he said, those voters no longer fit neatly into partisan types.

"I see this new reality in my district," said Mr. Kirk, a third-term Republican whose district voted Democratic in the 2004 presidential race. "In the old days, when you looked at a detached house with a big yard, that was usually a Republican home."

At the core of the political calculation is a demographic reality: older, more thickly populated inner suburbs, far from being static and homogeneous, are attracting residents of a type that never lived there in large numbers before.

"Something happens as these suburbs age," said Robert E. Lang, director of the Metropolitan Institute at Virginia Tech, a research body focusing on the factors that shape metropolitan growth. "It's not, 'Honey, we've got an attached dwelling unit, it's time to vote Democratic.' It's a difference in the type of people who move there. With density, you get more racial diversity, singles and retired people."

In older suburbs, where growth peaked from the 1970's to the 1990's, and which are home to nearly 60 percent of people who live in the nation's 50 biggest metropolitan areas, Democrats have built a slight advantage, Dr. Lang said in an interview.

While most Congressional districts have been drawn by the state legislature to give a clear advantage to one party or the other, many of the most competitive House races this year are in districts encompassing both older and newer suburbs. That makes them less politically predictable.

In "The New Metro Politics," a study he conducted with Thomas W. Sanchez, Dr. Lang found that in the last several presidential elections, a clear pattern had emerged: the more crowded the suburb, the greater the Democratic vote; the more open space or newer the suburb, the greater the Republican vote.

In the inner suburbs, the rings just around big cities, Democrats won 58 percent of the presidential vote in 2004, Dr. Lang found. In the mature suburbs, the next tier out, the Democratic share was less, 51.9 percent.

But the fastest-growing areas are at the far edge, sometimes 80 miles or more from the urban center, and that is where Republicans built up huge majorities. In the outer two tiers of the study, President Bush won 56.6 percent of the 2004 vote in what Dr. Lang called "the emerging suburbs," and 62.3 percent in the exurbs.

"At each greater increment of urban density, Democrat John Kerry received a higher proportion of the vote," Dr. Lang wrote. The pattern was the same in red states as in blue.

Democrats, who need a change of 15 seats to win control of the House, are studying Dr. Lang's research in an effort to get there.

"His thesis is very much at the center of this race," said Zack Silk, the campaign manager for Ms. Burner, the Democratic challenger to Mr. Reichert here.

There are clear limits to the demography-as-destiny calculation. Mr. Reichert, like many other Republicans in potentially close races, enjoys the considerable power of incumbency. Further, traditional voting patterns can be broken if national political conditions are right, as Democrats discovered in 1994, when, after four decades in power, they lost control of the House in a nationwide Republican sweep. Big issues like the war in Iraq can overwhelm partisan loyalty.

And so can the smaller ones. Mr. Reichert said the No. 1 concern of his constituents was traffic congestion. At a time when Democrats say their polls give Mr. Bush an approval rating of just 26 percent in this district, Mr. Reichert has been campaigning on that issue within a portfolio also touching on matters like gang crime and school safety.

"Yes, the war is important," he said, "but everywhere I go people want to do something about traffic, something to improve their daily lives."

Whatever the issues, though, the mix of demography and politics has been playing out in many districts. In the cluster of counties outside Philadelphia — Bucks, Delaware and Montgomery among them — John Kerry in 2004 improved on the vote of Al Gore four years earlier. Similarly, in Fairfax County, Va., Democrats carried the presidential race easily in 2004 after losing to Mr. Bush in 2000. In Colorado, Democrats made big gains in the populous Denver suburbs of Arapahoe and Jefferson Counties, though Mr. Bush won both, by small margins.

And in the aging suburbs outside Chicago, Democrats have gradually made enough gains that they think they can now win the seat being vacated by Representative Henry J. Hyde, a 16-term Republican. The district includes much of DuPage County, still reliably Republican but becoming more Democratic as it grows.

For every Democratic opportunity in older, more dense and more diverse suburbs, there is a Republican opening in the fast-growing exurbs. For example, in Douglas County, Colo., the nation's fastest-growing county in the late 1990's, Mr. Bush defeated Mr. Kerry by two to one. In the epicenter of California growth, Riverside County, the president won by 57 percent to 41 percent, a big gain over his showing in 2000.

In fact, Mr. Bush won 97 of the nation's 100 fastest-growing counties in 2004. Republicans had homed in on these outer suburbs — often places that were little more than farmland or meadows just a generation ago — with campaigns built around family values.

But Dr. Lang and other experts note that the exurbs in the fastest-growing counties provide a very small share of the nation's vote, and say bigger gains can be had by either party in focusing on places of transition, where older and newer suburbs meet. In looking at the 50 biggest metropolitan areas, which have about 150 million people, Dr. Lang found that 90 million lived in a somewhat older suburb and that only 5.6 million lived in the exurbs, where Mr. Bush's vote was strongest.

Republicans won the last two presidential elections, Dr. Lang said, by running up huge majorities in rural and exurban areas, then winning a bare majority of the suburbs closer to the urban core.

Cheney Sees GOP Winning Midterm Elections (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 15, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday that the Republicans will prevail in the midterm elections because of a strong economy and the ability of the Bush administration to prevent another terrorist attack.

DOJ_NMG_0034827

Polls show voters favor Democrats taking charge in November, but Cheney said the GOP will maintain its majority control in the Senate and House. He cited an economy that's "kicking along in very good shape" and President Bush's record in the war on terror.

"And we protected the United States against further attack from the terrorists," Cheney said in an interview on Sean Hannity's radio show. "You can't guarantee there won't be further attacks, but I think the track record is remarkable."

At his news conference Wednesday, Bush also predicted Republican victories in November, saying the GOP "philosophy is one that is forward-looking and optimistic and has worked."

Last week, the Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that only 24 percent of those surveyed approve of the way the Republican-controlled Congress is doing its job. Fifty-two percent said they want Democrats to capture control of Congress in November, about the same as in last month's survey.

Bipartisan Query: Will 2006 Reprise 1994? (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For the Capital's political junkies, it is the question of the year: Could 2006 be another 1994?

Twelve years ago, voters turned on Democrats and gave Republicans control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 40 years. The House speaker was among the Democrats' casualties; not a single Republican incumbent lost.

Now, both parties wonder whether another wave is building, this time to wash out Republican majorities. Parallels between then and now are stoking Democrats' hopes and Republicans' fears. But there are key differences as well.

The party in power: In 1994, Democrats controlled the White House and Congress, just as Republicans do now. President Bill Clinton and his party were low in the polls and divided. The midterm elections that November became a referendum on the president. He wasn't on the ballot, so voters punished his party in Congress.

Today's polls are even worse for President Bush and the Republican-led Congress. In October 1994, a pre-election Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll showed 48% of Americans approved of Mr. Clinton's performance. That compares with Mr. Bush's 37% in a new Journal/NBC poll1, conducted June 9-12. Congress's approval rating is 23% -- four percentage points lower than in October 1994. And by an 11-point margin, Americans now prefer a Democratic-run Congress; in October 1994, Republicans had a six-point edge.

"Do I wish the numbers were better? I wish they were a lot better," says lobbyist and former New York Rep. Bill Paxon, who headed the House Republicans' campaign committee in 1994. But he and other Republicans draw a contrast between Republicans now and Democrats then: Republicans know they are in danger and are acting accordingly.

"Every Republican I've talked to, from entrenched incumbents down to the newest members, they are all working overtime," Mr. Paxon says. "We caught the Democrats napping in '94."

His 1994 Democratic counterpart, former California Rep. Vic Fazio, concedes as much. Only by late summer in 1994 did Democrats realize a storm loomed, he recalls, yet party elders remained complacent or feared that signaling trouble would cause contributions to dry up. "We did save a lot of people," Mr. Fazio says, "but the tide was rising so high, and so fast."

Smaller battleground: The number of competitive seats is lower than in 1994, due largely to partisan gerrymandering of the House's 435 districts and to the particular lineup of Senate seats up for election this year.

Before the 1994 elections, the nonpartisan Cook Political Report counted 10 Democratic Senate seats as tossups, or too close to call; Republicans needed to gain at least seven for a majority. (They went on to win eight and then pick up a ninth when Alabama Sen. Richard Shelby switched parties.) Today, the Cook Report has six Republican seats as tossups; Democrats need every one for a bare majority.

For the House, the 1994 Cook Report listed 82 Democratic seats as competitive -- more than double the 35 vulnerable Republican seats it sees today. Many of those 1994 districts were in the conservative South and had been redrawn to Republicans' advantage after the 1990 census -- "low-lying fruit," in Mr. Fazio's words, and "the biggest single reason" in Mr. Paxon's view that Republicans were able to seize Congress.

Yet Democrats don't need as many House seats. In 1994, Republicans needed at least 40. The Democrats' magic number is 15.

The issues: After winning in 1992 promising universal health care, Mr. Clinton and the Democratic Congress couldn't even bring a bill to a committee vote in 1994, depressing party loyalists and signaling dysfunction. "We pointed our finger like Babe Ruth, out into the stands, and we missed," Mr. Fazio recalls.

House Democrats' chaotic passage of a crime bill further suggested incompetence and angered liberals and conservatives alike with its gun-control and death-penalty provisions. Republicans attacked Mr. Clinton's 1993 deficit-reduction law for its tax increases, while proposing in late September their "Contract with America," with promises from a balanced budget to term limits. When Democratic leaders had to schedule a lame-duck session so panicked members could rush home to campaign, political scientist Thomas Mann presciently predicted the "disastrous ending ... makes even more likely the electoral earthquake that many of us sense is occurring."

Mr. Bush's top domestic promise of 2004 -- creating private accounts from Social Security -- likewise crashed without a vote. But that failure was last year -- not pre-election like the Clinton health bill. More worrisome to Republicans now is the issue of illegal immigration, which has divided the party and enflamed constituents. Republican leaders already are assuming they will need a lame-duck session to finish the year's work -- just as Democrats did in 1994.

But the issue dragging down Mr. Bush's standing and Congress's is an unpopular war. "There was nothing like Iraq in 1994," Mr. Paxon says.

A backdrop of corruption: As in 1994, scandals have tarred both parties. But the one in power appears most blackened.

By late 1994, four members of Congress, two from each party, were under indictment on charges including fraud and sexual misconduct. Voters recalled a 1992 check-kiting scandal at legislators' House bank. Democrats, bearing the brunt of blame as Congress's majority, proposed reforms, but the legislation languished. Republicans pledged to do better.

Now the roles are reversed. Two House Democrats are under federal investigations. But two Republicans have left Congress -- California's Randy "Duke" Cunningham for prison, and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay to face a corruption trial in Texas -- and several others face questions about their ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of California has hired a legal team amid an investigation of spending earmarks benefiting lobbyist friends.

An emboldened opposition: In 1994 Republican voters were energized against Clinton Democrats, as were a critical mass of antitax, term-limit, pro-gun and private-property groups. Disillusioned Democratic voters stayed home.

Now the political energy is on Democrats' side, among antiwar, environmental, abortion-rights and pro-immigration Hispanic groups, while Republicans worry that demoralized conservatives won't vote. And where conservative talk-radio hosts emerged in 1994 to spread Republicans' message, today liberal bloggers seek to do the same for Democrats.

However, Democrats lack a unifying figure like former Rep. Newt Gingrich, who led the "Republican Revolution." Also, congressional Republicans worked in tandem with then-party chairman Haley Barbour, now Mississippi governor, whereas Democratic leaders have assailed party chairman Howard Dean for not providing enough financial support.

The tea leaves: Special elections for vacated seats are read as harbingers of November. On this score, today's Republicans find reassurance.

In May 1994, Republicans won special elections in Oklahoma and Kentucky for seats that Democrats long held. Last week, with the Republican-tilted seat Mr. Cunningham held up for grabs in California, the narrow winner was another Republican, Brian Bilbray.

Vietnam, Watergate And Rove (WSJ)

By Michael Barone

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

It has been a tough 10 days for those who see current events through the prisms of Vietnam and Watergate. First, the Democrats failed to win a breakthrough victory in the California 50th special election -- a breakthrough that would have summoned up memories of Democrats winning Gerald Ford's old congressional district in a special election in 1974. Instead the Democratic nominee got 45% of the vote, just 1% more than John Kerry did in the district in 2004. Second, U.S. forces with a precision air strike killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on the same day that Iraqis finished forming a government. Zarqawi will not be available to gloat over American setbacks or our allies' defeat, as the leaders of the Viet Cong and North Vietnam did.

Third, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald announced that he would not seek an indictment of Karl Rove. The leftward blogosphere had Mr. Rove pegged for the role of Bob Haldeman and John Ehrlichman. Theories were spun about plea bargains that would implicate Vice President Dick Cheney. Talk of impeachment was in the air. But it turns out that history doesn't repeat itself. George W. Bush, whether you like it or not, is not a second Richard Nixon.

It is hard in retrospect to understand why the left put so much psychic energy into the notion that Mr. Rove would be indicted. He certainly was an important target. No one in American history has been as powerful an aide to a president, both on politics and on public policy, as Karl Rove. Only Robert Kennedy in his brother's administration and Hamilton Jordan in Jimmy Carter's come close, and neither was as involved in electoral politics as Mr. Rove has been.

Still, it was clear early on that the likelihood that Mr. Rove violated the Intelligence Identities Protection Act was near zero. Under the law, the agent whose name was disclosed would have had to have served overseas within the preceding five years (Valerie Plame, according to her husband's book, had been stationed in the U.S. since 1997) and Mr. Rove would have had to know that she was undercover (not very likely). The left enjoyed raising an issue on which, for once, it could charge that a Republican administration had undermined national security. But that rang hollow when the left gleefully seized on the New York Times's disclosure of NSA surveillance of phone calls from suspected al Qaeda operatives abroad to persons in the U.S.

In all this a key role was played by the press. Cries went up early for the appointment of a special prosecutor: Patrick Fitzgerald would be another Archibald Cox or Leon Jaworski. Eager to bring down another Republican administration, the editorialists of the New York Times evidently failed to realize that the case could not be pursued without asking reporters to reveal the names of sources who had been promised confidentiality. America's newsrooms are populated largely by liberals who regard the Vietnam and Watergate stories as the great achievements of their profession. The peak of their ambition is to achieve the fame and wealth of great reporters like David Halberstam and Bob Woodward. But this time it was not Republican administration officials who went to prison. It was Judith Miller, then of the New York Times itself.

Interestingly, Bob Woodward himself contradicted Mr. Fitzgerald's statement, made the day that he announced the one indictment he has obtained, of former vice presidential chief of staff Scooter Libby, that Mr. Libby was the first to disclose Ms. Plame's name to a reporter. The press reaction was to turn on Mr. Woodward, who has been covering this administration as a new story rather than as a reprise of Vietnam and Watergate.

Historians may regard it as a curious thing that the left and the press have been so determined to fit current events into templates based on events that occurred 30 to 40 years ago. The people who effectively framed the issues raised by Vietnam and Watergate did something like the opposite; they insisted that Vietnam was not a reprise of World War II or Korea and that Watergate was something different from the operations J. Edgar Hoover conducted for Franklin Roosevelt or John Kennedy. Journalists in the 1940s, '50s and early '60s tended to believe they had a duty to buttress Americans' faith in their leaders and their government. Journalists since Vietnam and Watergate have tended to believe that they have a duty to undermine such faith, especially when the wrong party is in office.

That belief has its perils for journalism, as the Fitzgerald investigation has shown. The peril that the press may find itself in the hot seat, but even more the peril that it will get the story wrong. The visible slavering over the prospect of a Rove indictment is just another item in the list of reasons why the credibility of the "mainstream media" has been plunging. There's also a peril for the political left. Vietnam and Watergate were arguably triumphs for honest reporting. But they were also defeats for America -- and for millions of freedom-loving people in the world. They ushered in an era when the political opposition and much of the press have sought not just to defeat administrations but to delegitimize them. The pursuit of Karl Rove by the left and the press has been just the latest episode in the attempted criminalization of political differences. Is there any hope that it might turn out to be the last?

Officials Prepare For Midterm Elections (AP-Y2)

By Will Lester

AP2, June 15, 2006

Memo to election supervisors: Make sure the voting machines are set at zero before sending them to polling places.

That's the kind of simple but critical advice federal officials are offering local election supervisors as they prepare for the midterm elections in November.

With memories of the disputed 2000 presidential election still fresh, the Election Assistance Commission is encouraging careful preparation by election supervisors, aggressive recruitment of new poll workers and thorough education of voters.

Another tip: "If election officials just proofread all ballots, it'll save them a lot of headaches, because they'll find mistakes and they'll fix them," commission chairman Paul DeGregorio said Thursday.

The Election Assistance Commission is sending out a "Quick Start Management Guide for New Voting Systems" to 6,700 local election officials around the country. The guide is necessary as about a third of voters will be using new machines this year and many longtime poll workers have retired because the punch-card and lever voting machines have been replaced.

"Chicago experienced significant problems during the elections in March because of new equipment, new Illinois laws and new federal requirements," said DeGregorio, who added the city should be ready for November.

The 2002 law required improvements to voting systems and voter access after the problems in 2000. States were required to improve their voter information, replace outdated voting equipment and allow provisional voting, which means questionable votes can be verified later.

The commission heard Thursday from several experienced local election officials, who offered suggestions on how the nation could be prepared to run smooth elections.

Connie Schmidt, a retired election commissioner from Kansas, said the election system is undergoing dramatic changes and — "there's no dry run, no practice, no dress rehearsal."

Judge Dismisses Most Of Phone-jamming Suit (AP-Y2)

By Beverley Wang

AP2, June 15, 2006

A judge has dismissed most of a Democratic lawsuit against Republicans stemming from the jamming of Democratic phone lines in the November 2002 elections, a crime that led to criminal convictions against three former GOP officials.

State Democratic Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said Thursday that a judge in Manchester dismissed five of eight claims Democrats had made in the civil lawsuit. The ruling was dated Tuesday.

Both parties called the decision a victory.

The dismissed counts alleged Republicans commited civil harassment and conspiracy, including conspiring against Democrats' constitutional rights to vote and associate. The remaining claims deal with interference with phone systems and seek compensation.

"What the court has basically done is reduced this claim, this lawsuit, to a small claims complaint," said Ovide Lamontagne, a lawyer for the Republicans. "A thousand dollars of damage is what we think they could probably show for the interruption of phones for an hour and a half."

"This is not a good day for the Republican Party," Sullivan said. "Basically what this case is about is their interference with our phone lines, and what the court has said is, 'You can continue to go forward.'"

The civil trial is scheduled to begin in November. Sullivan said she had not yet settled on a dollar figure for damages.

The get-out-the-vote and ride-to-the-polls phone banks run by Democrats and the nonpartisan Manchester firefighters union were jammed for more than an hour on Election Day 2002, during a hotly contested U.S. Senate race between then-Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen and Republican John Sununu. Sununu won by about 20,000 votes.

James Tobin, of Bangor, Maine, a former regional chairman of President Bush's re-election campaign, was convicted in December of two felony telephone harassment charges but acquitted of a third, more serious charge of conspiring against voters' rights. He was sentenced to 10 months in prison.

Former GOP Marketplace president Allen Raymond and former state Republican Committee Executive Director Charles McGee pleaded guilty in the case and testified against Tobin. McGee served seven months, and Raymond received a three-month sentence.

Dan Rather Will Leave CBS After 44 Years (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Dan Rather, who stepped down as anchor of The CBS Evening News 15 months ago in the wake of the Memogate scandal, said Thursday that he'll soon leave the network after 44 years — at the request of network executives.

"They wanted this resolution, and I'm willing to accept that and move on," said Rather, 74, whose contract expires in November.

Rather had been a correspondent for 60 Minutes since leaving his anchor chair on the Evening News in March 2005. Eight of his stories aired last season — far fewer than many of his colleagues' stories.

Former Today star Katie Couric is set to anchor the Evening News in September and contribute to 60 Minutes along with CNN's Anderson Cooper. And with younger CBS correspondents such as Lara Logan and Scott Pelley also vying for time on 60 Minutes, executives have said that CBS wants to usher in a new look and feel for the top-rated newsmagazine.

In an interview Thursday, Rather said he had planned to stay at CBS for the rest of his career.

"But life takes its twists and turns, and I'm a pro," he said. "I've been a reporter since I was in my teens. I'm blessed with good health and high energy, and I want to be fully occupied, doing meaningful work. I had hoped that would be possible at 60 Minutes."

Rather's star at the network rose dramatically after his coverage of President Kennedy's assassination in 1963 and lasted throughout the ensuing four decades. He succeeded Walter Cronkite as anchor in 1981.

Rather's star virtually vanished at CBS after the 2004 discredited 60 Minutes story regarding President Bush's military record. That story, which cited documents that could later not be verified, resulted in the firing of three CBS News executives.

Asked whether Memogate had been his undoing, Rather said, "That's history. I'm not interested in going there. I'm focused on the future."

He said he is now talking about what to do next and hopes to make an announcement soon.

CBS confirmed that an exit deal for Rather was in the works, but executives declined to comment further.

Head Examined Scientist's Study Of Brain Genes Sparks A Backlash (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

CHICAGO -- Last September, Bruce Lahn, a professor of human genetics at the University of Chicago, stood before a packed lecture hall and reported the results of a new DNA analysis: He had found signs of recent evolution in the brains of some people, but not of others.

It was a triumphant moment for the young scientist. He was up for tenure and his research was being featured in back-to-back articles in the country's most prestigious science journal. Yet today, Dr. Lahn says he is moving away from the research. "It's getting too controversial," he says.

Dr. Lahn had touched a raw nerve in science: race and intelligence.

What Dr. Lahn told his audience was that genetic changes over the past several thousand years might be linked to brain size and intelligence. He flashed maps that showed the changes had taken hold and spread widely in Europe, Asia and the Americas, but weren't common in sub-Saharan Africa.

Web sites and magazines promoting white "racialism" quickly seized on Dr. Lahn's suggestive scientific snapshot. One magazine that blames black and Hispanic people for social ills hailed his discovery as "the moment the antiracists and egalitarians have dreaded."

Dr. Lahn has drawn sharp fire from other leading genetics researchers. They say the genetic differences he found may not signify any recent evolution -- and even if they do, it is too big a leap to suggest any link to intelligence. "This is not the place you want to report a weak association that might or might not stand up," says Francis Collins, director of the genome program at the National Institutes of Health.

Several scientific groups have set out to disprove or challenge Dr. Lahn's discoveries. His own university now says it is abandoning a patent application it filed to cover a DNA-based intelligence test that drew on his work.

As scientific tools for probing genes become increasingly powerful, research into human differences has exploded. Most of the time, scientists are looking for clues about the causes of disease. But some research is raising tensions as scientists such as Dr. Lahn venture into studies of genetic differences in behavior or intelligence.

Pilar Ossorio, a professor of law and medical ethics at the University of Wisconsin, criticizes Dr. Lahn for implying a conclusion similar to "The Bell Curve," a controversial 1994 bestseller by Richard J. Herrnstein and Charles Murray. The book argued that the lower average performance by African-Americans on IQ tests had a genetic component and wasn't solely the result of social factors. Referring to Dr. Lahn and his co-authors, Prof. Ossorio says: "It's exactly what they were getting at. There was a lot of hallway talk. People said he's doing damage to the whole field of genetics."

The 37-year-old Dr. Lahn says his research papers, published in Science last September, offered no view on race and intelligence. He personally believes it is possible that some populations will have more advantageous intelligence genes than others. And he thinks that "society will have to grapple with some very difficult facts" as scientific data accumulate. Yet Dr. Lahn, who left China after participating in prodemocracy protests, says intellectual "police" in the U.S. make such questions difficult to pursue.

Scientists believe that a small group of anatomically modern humans struck out from Africa probably less than 100,000 years ago. After arriving on the Eurasian land mass, they continued to split up and eventually humans populated nearly every corner of the globe. One use of genetic research is to probe how each group evolved differently after becoming isolated from the others. Recently created genetic maps of people of African, Asian and European ancestry make that research easier.

For instance, researchers have found that most Europeans have a genetic variant that lets them fully digest milk as adults. The variant is much less common in Africa and Asia, where lactose intolerance is widespread. Scientists theorize that it spread quickly among Europeans because drinking milk from domesticated dairy animals conferred a nutritional advantage. Similar evolutionary reasoning may explain why many people in malaria-prone parts of Africa carry gene variants linked to malaria resistance.

Other research is starting to explain variations in human skin color and hair texture. But scientists tense up when it comes to doing the same sort of research on the brain. Sociologist Troy Duster, who studies the use of racial categories by geneticists, worries that scientists will interpret data in ways that fit their prejudices. He cites the sorry history of phrenology, a study of skull shapes popular in the 19th century, and other pseudoscientific techniques used to categorize people as inferior. "Science doesn't transcend the social milieu," says Dr. Duster, of New York University.

Dr. Lahn traces his interest in human differences back to his youth in China. Foreigners there used to have a special currency that they could use at stores closed to ordinary Chinese. "I wondered why people were different, and why Chinese were at the bottom," he says.

By the time violence struck Tiananmen Square in 1989, Dr. Lahn, the son of two physicists, was an undergraduate at Harvard University. He channeled his curiosity into genetics and built his reputation with a groundbreaking study of the Y chromosome. After taking a post at the University of Chicago in 2000, Dr. Lahn won a prestigious fellowship from the Howard Hughes Medical Institute.

The fellowship pays most of his research bills and has allowed him to pursue creative projects, often on attention-grabbing subjects. One study looked at how promiscuity among female chimpanzees, gorillas and humans affected the evolution of a gene that makes sperm sticky. "Bruce is in a hurry to be famous," says Martin Kreitman, a Chicago colleague who is friendly with him.

Henry Harpending, a University of Utah anthropology professor who recently published a theory for why Ashkenazi Jews tend to have high IQ's, says Dr. Lahn once suggested they co-author an article for Scientific American about the genetics of behavior, in which they could explain why "Chinese are boring."

"I think that Bruce doesn't understand political correctness," Dr. Harpending says. Dr. Lahn says he only vaguely recalls the conversation but confirms that he wonders whether during China's imperial times there was "some selection" against rebellious individuals.

In recent years, Dr. Lahn has become interested in why the human brain is so large and complex. Although humans and chimpanzees share about 96% of their DNA, human brains are about four times larger. Even today, researchers can find a correlation, on average, between people's brain size and their IQ.

Dr. Lahn's group zeroed in on the role of two genes, called ASPM and microcephalin, that are known to have a role in brain size. Humans with defective copies of either gene are born with brains only about one-third the normal size.

Studying DNA from several species, the Chicago team found that, over millions of years, the genes had undergone more rapid change in monkeys, apes and humans than in other animals. Their next step was to determine if evolution had continued in modern humans. Dr. Lahn's graduate students began decoding DNA from 1,184 people belonging to 59 groups from around the world, including Bedouins, Pima Indians and French-speaking Basques.

The data showed that evolution had continued in recent millennia. A statistical analysis of DNA patterns suggested that new mutations in each of the two brain-related genes had spread quickly through some human populations. Evidently, these mutations were advantageous among those populations -- just as the genetic variant promoting milk digestion was advantageous to early Europeans. Dr. Lahn and his team further observed that the new mutations are found most frequently outside of Africa.

What the data didn't say was how the mutations were advantageous. Perhaps the genes play a role outside of the brain or affect a brain function that has nothing to do with intelligence.

While acknowledging that the evidence doesn't permit a firm conclusion, Dr. Lahn favors the idea that the advantage conferred by the mutations was a bigger and smarter brain. He found ways to suggest that in his papers. One mutation, which according to his estimates arose some 40,000 years ago, coincided with the first art found in caves, the paper observed. The other mutation, present mostly in people from the Middle East and Europe, and estimated to be 5,800 years old, coincided with the "development of cities and written language."

That suggested brain evolution might have occurred in tandem with important cultural changes. Yet because neither variant is common in sub-Saharan Africa, there was another potential implication: Some groups had been left out.

The dean of the University of Chicago's medical school, James L. Madara, says he approached Dr. Lahn before the papers were published. They discussed whether the report could be taken out of context. "Let the chips lie where they may," Dr. Madara says he told Dr. Lahn. As long as the ideas and data are clear, "don't worry about the implications," the dean said.

John Easton, head of media relations at the medical school, says his office was worried the work could be misinterpreted and abused by racist groups. Mr. Easton borrowed a copy of "The Mismeasure of Man," the famous attack on IQ tests and brain-volume measurements by the late paleontologist Stephen Jay Gould. Mr. Easton helped Dr. Lahn with talking points about his research. "We said, 'Don't be shy about telling people what it doesn't mean,' " Mr. Easton recalls.

Mr. Easton says Dr. Lahn "makes us nervous" but "with Bruce we know it's not driven by personal bias." That is because Asians "don't score at the top" in the frequency of the brain-gene mutations, Mr. Easton says.

Dr. Lahn's paper and talk at his university -- in which he also claimed the gene variants were probably linked to higher IQ -- provoked a strong reaction both on and off campus. Dr. Collins, head of the federal genome program, obtained advance copies of the papers and circulated them to top population geneticists. He wasn't persuaded by the statistical evidence for evolution and criticized Dr. Lahn's work in media interviews.

The papers won wide attention among researchers, and several responded by setting out to test Dr. Lahn's findings. Scientists at the Broad Institute, a top genetics center in Cambridge, Mass., have been reanalyzing some of the data and say they may challenge Dr. Lahn's finding that evolution acted on ASPM, one of the genes. Broad's influential chief, Eric Lander, says scientists probing recent evolution run the risk of "seeing a difference, and saying there is a story to fit it."

A team at the University of California, Los Angeles, recently tested whether the gene variants actually affect brain size. They studied DNA from 120 people whose brain volumes they had already measured using magnetic-resonance imaging. They didn't find any difference. "It certainly makes you want to look at other explanations" of what the variations mean, says Roger P. Woods, a UCLA brain-mapping expert who reported the results in May.

Some of Dr. Lahn's co-authors are also uncomfortable with the work. Sarah Tishkoff, a geneticist at the University of Maryland who provided DNA from remote African groups, says she is bothered how one paper drew a link between the genetic changes and the rise of civilization. She thinks it is too early to reach any conclusions about why the changes spread and says it is "very simplistic" to imagine that a single gene could have a major effect on complex cultural traits.

Several groups of scientists have sent letters to Science criticizing the papers. Dr. Lahn prepared responses, sending one earlier this month, but Dr. Tishkoff wasn't willing to add her name to them.

"You have to follow the data wherever it leads, but speculating in this field is dangerous," says Spencer Wells, head of the National Geographic Society's Genographic Project, a five-year, $40 million effort to collect DNA samples from 100,000 indigenous people. Dr. Wells says the project team might try to find evolutionary reasons for physical differences such as why Danes are taller than pygmies. But Dr. Wells says National Geographic won't study the brain. "I think there is very little evidence of IQ differences between races," he says.

The accuracy of Dr. Lahn's work and his views on race came up in his tenure review last fall, says a person familiar with it. After debate, his department voted unanimously in his favor, according to another faculty member. A more senior committee agreed and awarded Dr. Lahn the post of full professor, although it wasn't unanimous, this person says.

Dr. Lahn stands by his work but says that because of the controversy he is moving into other projects. Earlier this year, Mr. Easton of the university's media department forwarded Dr. Lahn a paper by two economists looking at the IQ of infants of different races. Dr. Lahn wasn't interested. "I'm surprised anyone studies this," he replied in an email.

Dr. Lahn says he isn't as eager as he once was to continue studying brain differences. P. Thomas Schoenemann, a professor of anthropology at the University of Michigan-Dearborn, says that at Dr. Lahn's request he collected DNA from 25 people whose brain sizes he had studied previously. But the two scientists haven't been in touch recently.

The university's patent office is also having second thoughts. Its director, Alan Thomas, says his office is dropping a patent application filed last year that would cover using Dr. Lahn's work as a DNA-based intelligence test. "We really don't want to end up on the front page...for doing eugenics," Mr. Thomas says.

More recently, Dr. Lahn says he was moved when a student asked him whether some knowledge might not be worth having. It is a notion to which he has been warming. Dr. Lahn says he once tried testing himself for which version of the brain genes he has. The experiment's outcome was blurry "but it wasn't looking good," he says. He hasn't tried testing himself again.

Pioneer Urges 'Responsible Fatherhood' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

In his 70 years, Charles Augustus Ballard has overcome the loss of his coal-miner father, functional illiteracy, a stint in prison and unwed fatherhood.

His experiences led him to found in 1982 a national organization that was one of the first -- if not the first -- to promote "responsible fatherhood" as a social policy, the Institute for Responsible Fatherhood and Family Revitalization (IRFFR).

Last month, one of his dreams came true: The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) announced the availability of its first funding stream dedicated to "responsible fatherhood" programs.

But for Mr. Ballard, the $32 million announcement comes amid a difficult personal struggle: He came home Wednesday from a Bowie rehabilitation center, where he has been recovering from a devastating stroke suffered in January.

His new goals are to walk without a cane and resume jogging; write a book about restoring broken relationships; and help his wife, Frances, rebuild their organization.

DOJ_NMG_0034835

The couple is already in discussions with several organizations about partnering with the IRFFR. Applications for the new grants are due in two weeks.

For the moment, Mr. Ballard is grateful to be home again, having relearned how to talk, walk and eat.

"I am going to really hit the road running," he said in his Glenn Dale home.

"My husband is a man of tremendous faith and I am, too," Mrs. Ballard said. "The mission and purpose and drive goes forward."

The problem of "fatherlessness" first gained widespread national attention more than a decade ago.

Milestones include Ken Canfield's 1990 founding of the National Center for Fathering; the 1994 debut of the National Fatherhood Initiative (NFI), founded by Don E. Eberly; and the 1995 publication of "Fatherless America: Confronting Our Most Urgent Social Problem," by David Blankenhorn.

"Fathers are not superfluous. They are indispensable and irreplaceable," Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families, said in 1995 when he was NFI director.

When NFI started, there were about 100 fatherhood programs. Today, there are "too many to count" because so many programs now include fatherhood programming, said NFI spokesman Vincent DiCaro.

But all this interest came years after Mr. Ballard started the IRFFR in Cleveland.

Galvanized by his personal experiences with fatherlessness -- his father died when he was 3 and he became an unwed father as a teen -- plus his conversion to Christianity while in prison, Mr. Ballard decided to work to connect men to their children. He chose his motto from the Bible's Book of Malachi -- "turning the hearts of fathers to their children and the hearts of children to their fathers."

Mr. Ballard's novel approach was to use married "mentor couples" as his outreach workers. The couples scoured neighborhoods for single fathers and served them and their families around the clock, teaching the men why they should establish paternity, strengthen their fathering skills, finish school, get jobs and support their children. The vast majority of IRFFR fathers achieved these goals, and more than a few got married.

"The most powerful job-creation program is one that instills in a father a desire to fulfill his first job -- that is, to love his children and respect their mother," Mr. Ballard said in 1998 in one of his many appeals to Congress to fund programs that show fathers how to be financially, emotionally, physically and spiritually responsible for their children.

Thanks to federal and private grants, Mr. Ballard's IRFFR spread to a dozen cities -- including Washington -- and generated national confidence in the idea of responsible fatherhood programs.

Each of the new HHS grants for fatherhood programs "will be a testament to the leadership Charles has shown through the years on this most important issue," said Rep. Wally Herger, California Republican and chairman of the House subcommittee that wrote the legislation.

In recent years, however, the IRFFR lost ground: Funding complications meant that many sites had to be closed and staff let go. Mr. Ballard's Jan. 19 stroke was another blow.

But the Ballards see his swift recovery as "miraculous" and the way to new and even greater opportunities to strengthen families.

"There is a God. There really is a God," Mr. Ballard said.

Seeds For A Geo-Green Party (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The recent focus of the Republican-led Congress on divisive diversions, like gay marriage and flag burning, coupled with the unveiling of Unity '08, an Internet-based third party that plans to select its presidential candidate through online voting, has intensified the chatter that a third party, and maybe even a fourth, will emerge in the 2008 election.

Up to now, though, most of that talk has been about how a third party might galvanize voters, using the Web, rather than what it would actually galvanize them to do. I'd like to toss out an idea in the hopes that some enterprising politician or group of citizens — or Unity '08 — will develop it. It's the concept I call "Geo-Green."

What might a Geo-Green third party platform look like?

Its centerpiece would be a $1 a gallon gasoline tax, called "The Patriot Tax," which would be phased in over a year. People earning less than $50,000 a year, and those with unusual driving needs, would get a reduction on their payroll taxes as an offset.

The billions of dollars raised by the Patriot Tax would go first to shore up Social Security, second to subsidize clean mass transit in and between every major American city, third to reduce the deficit, and fourth to massively increase energy research by the National Science Foundation and the Energy and Defense Departments' research arms.

Most important, though, the Patriot Tax would increase the price of gasoline to a level that would ensure that many of the most promising alternatives — ethanol, biodiesel, coal gasification, solar energy, nuclear energy and wind — would all be economically competitive with oil and thereby reduce both our dependence on crude and our emissions of greenhouse gases.

In short: the Geo-Green party could claim that it has a plan for shoring up America's energy security, environmental security, economic security and Social Security with one move.

It could also claim that — however the Iraq war ends — the Geo-Green party has a strategy for advancing political and economic reform in the Arab-Muslim world, without another war. By stimulating all these alternatives to oil, we would gradually bring down the price, possibly as low as $25 to $30 a barrel. That, better than anything else, would force regimes like those in Iran, Sudan, Egypt, Angola, Venezuela and Saudi Arabia to open up. Countries don't reform when you tell them they should. They reform when they tell themselves they must — and only when the price of oil goes down will they tell themselves they must.

Moreover, by making America the leader in promoting clean power, the Geo-Greens would be offering a credible plan for recouping a lot of America's lost prestige in the world — prestige it lost when the Bush team trashed Kyoto. This would put America in a much better position to galvanize allies to combat jihadism.

Last, Geo-Greenism could be the foundation of a new American patriotism and educational renaissance. Under the banner "Green is the New Red, White and Blue," the Geo-Green party would seek to inspire young Americans to study math, science and engineering to help make America not only energy independent but also the dominant player in what will be the dominant industry of the 21st century: clean power and green technology.

Frankly, I wish we did not need a third party. I wish the Democrats would adopt a Geo-Green agenda as their own. (Republicans never would.) But if not, I hope it will become the soul of a third party.

"Historically, third parties arise in America when they seize a neglected issue and demonstrate that there is a real constituency for it," said Micah Sifry, author of "Spoiling for a Fight: Third-Party Politics in America." "They win by forcing that issue into the mainstream — even if the party itself is later forgotten. Conditions certainly seem ripe for such a third-party bid today."

But rather than artificially splitting the difference between the Democrats and the Republicans, Mr. Sifry added, "a successful third party has to get in front of both — with an agenda that inspires hope and with leadership that inspires trust. Fear of a dark future isn't the best motivator; hope for a better one is."

That's Geo-Greenism. To be sure, Geo-Greenism is not a complete philosophy on par with liberalism or conservatism. But it can be paired with either of them to make them more relevant to the biggest challenges of our time. Even if Geo-Greenism couldn't attract enough voters to win an election, it might attract a big enough following to frighten both Democrats and Republicans into finally doing the right things.

New Gravity For The Political Center (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post (opinion), June 16, 2006

My grandfather used to amaze us kids with a home movie he called "Gravity Remover." It showed balls rolling up steep hills, and spilled water flowing back into cups. It took us years to realize he was just running the normal film backward.

I've had that same pleasant suspension of disbelief the past few weeks watching the political scene. It's as if somebody has poured gravity remover all over Washington, dissolving the normal laws of political behavior. For a change, the extreme wings of the two parties aren't calling the shots; bad ideas pitched by one-issue zealots are falling flat; the news out of Iraq is upbeat; the Bush administration is appointing Rockefeller Republicans to top positions. What the heck is going on, Grandpa?

A week ago Senate conservatives tried to whip up a divisive dither about gay marriage. This wedge issue had worked brilliantly for the GOP in 2004, but this time the campaign fizzled after a few days. Perhaps credit is due to the vice president's gutsy lesbian daughter, Mary Cheney, who is on a tour promoting her book celebrating diversity, tolerance and her gay-rights-supporting dad.

Gravity remover has been dusted over the National Rifle Association, too. The fearsome NRA launched a nationwide campaign last month demanding that every mayor and police chief in America sign a pledge that they won't disarm "law-abiding citizens" in the event of a terrorist attack or natural disaster. The NRA is also proposing federal legislation that would make it a crime for cops to disarm lawfully gun-toting citizens during emergencies.

Even by NRA standards, this is a bad idea -- not just divisive but downright dangerous. Does the gun lobby really want to remake America in the image of Iraq? The proposal was apparently motivated by the lawlessness in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, but if there aren't enough cops to patrol the streets, then hire more cops. When individual citizens, even "law-abiding" ones, decide to go it alone, the result is anarchy.

Given the gun lobby's usual success in muscling special-interest provisions into law, you might expect to see politicians rushing to sign the America-as-Baghdad pledge. But no. The NRA's proposal is getting the cool reception it deserves, and mayors actually seem to be moving in the opposite direction. Michael Bloomberg, the Republican mayor of New York, has organized a coalition to fight for tougher gun laws, and it now includes 50 other mayors. Meanwhile, on Capitol Hill, the bill that would throw cops in jail if they tried to disarm NRA members after a terrorist attack is mercifully going nowhere.

Gaithersburg Police Chief Mary Ann Viverette, president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, dismisses the pledge as "a thing to get attention for NRA issues." She explains: "It's really absurd. It asks us to sign a pledge to do something we do anyway -- uphold the Constitution."

David Brooks of the New York Times has argued that we're seeing a reanimation of the political center, and I think he's right. The middle is getting tired of the tyranny of the extremes. One sign is the launch this month of Unity08, a bipartisan group that plans to hold an online convention to nominate a split Democratic-Republican 2008 presidential ticket. Unity08's pitch to the big, unhappy middle is expressed succinctly in one of its slogans: "Depressed about the Democrats? Revolted by the Republicans? You're not alone."

One big factor that has locked in the status quo is political money, which gives inordinate power to special interests. But here, too, there seem to be sprinkles of gravity remover. Unity08's co-founders, Hamilton Jordan and Doug Bailey, say they are convinced they can fund an independent ticket from fed-up small donors. And there may be big money, too: Louis Bacon, who runs the giant hedge fund Moore Capital Management, has been discussing the creation of a "center for the center" that would help build a congressional third party. His argument is that if a third party could capture even a handful of House and Senate seats, it would hold the balance of power -- and would force the Democrats and Republicans to bargain toward the middle rather than the extremes.

Why do I think these traces of gravity remover are any more real than my grandfather Richard Weiser's home movie? Well, maybe the film of American politics has actually been running in reverse in recent years -- producing the illusion that you can govern America from the wings of each party. Maybe the movie is finally beginning to run forward again.

Politics Begins At Home (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The nation is fortunate that a sudden attempt to kill one of the hallowed anticorruption reforms from the Watergate scandal — the option of public financing in presidential elections — was smoked out in the House this week. The sponsor, Representative John Doolittle, a powerful California Republican, may try another day with his plan to block the flow of taxpayers' voluntary contributions from the government treasury. Mr. Doolittle has such faith in private money-raising that he boosted his family income by setting up his wife, Julie, as a consultant being paid a 15 percent commission on every dollar his campaign raises.

Call it family values. Call it brazen. But the missus has received $180,000 since late 2001, operating this private business out of the couple's suburban Virginia home, including among her clients the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The pathetic state of Congressional ethics is that such nepotic profiteering is deemed legal so long as the compensation is "consistent with the market rate." Questions have gone unanswered about whether Julie Doolittle has any real experience in the field. Professional fund-raising associations have condemned payment by commission as unethical, but Mr. Doolittle's office defends it as legal and based on "tireless and effective work."

Mr. Doolittle sits on the Appropriations Committee, to which lobbyists and special interests have an attraction that borders on Pavlovian. No great drumbeating is needed to fill those campaign kitties. Like other lawmakers, Mr. Doolittle indulges "earmarking" — the odious practice of delivering government contracts to favored pleaders who often requite with campaign contributions.

Such quid pro quo politicking predates Watergate. But the insult to taxpayers by Doolittle Inc. is compounded by the move to kill the public financing alternative to big-money political pandering. The presidential check-off system has worked well for three decades, but is being strained by the rocketing private donations that politicians eagerly welcome. Congress needs to update the system's matching fund and spending limits, not obliterate them.

Power Struggles In Maryland (WP)

IN MARYLAND'S efforts to cushion the blow of soaring electricity bills for consumers, there is the distinctive whiff of post-Soviet economic adjustment. Much like the disoriented subjects of former communist regimes a decade ago, Marylanders -- coddled for years by artificially low energy prices -- are suddenly confronted by the trauma of having to pay market rates. Unsurprisingly, they don't like it a bit. And the politicians in Annapolis, just like those hapless old apparatchiks in Moscow, are scrambling for cover.

They seem to have found it this week. In a special session of the state legislature, a number of Republican lawmakers broke ranks with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and joined Democrats in providing some rate relief to Baltimore Gas and Electric's 1.2 million residential customers. Instead of bearing the full brunt of a 72 percent increase in their electricity bills next month, BGE ratepayers, mostly around Baltimore but also in some Washington suburbs, will initially be hit with jumps of just 15 percent starting July 1. The balance of the increase will kick in next June (read: after this year's elections), though customers will have the option of deferring that for another seven months, until Jan. 1, 2008. BGE, which will have to borrow money to make up the difference, will recover the borrowing costs by charging ratepayers a monthly fee, about $2.19 for the average household for 10 years.

Constellation Energy Group, BGE's parent company, seems reasonably content with the deal, which is significant, as it had brandished the threat of its own financial instability and rolling blackouts if things turned out badly. Lawmakers, too, are asserting a victory for average Marylanders, as you'd expect in an election year. True to form, Mr. Ehrlich is threatening a veto -- one that would be strictly symbolic because it would be easily overridden. The threat is reminiscent of his role in the December 2004 debate over medical malpractice, when the governor convened a special session, then vetoed the compromise bill that emerged.

In the current set-to, Mr. Ehrlich is not happy that the legislature's bill on several counts. He thinks his own plan -- thrown out by a judge who thought it ignored consumers' interests -- drove a better bargain for the state. He also dislikes the current bill's plan to disband Maryland's utility regulating body, the Public Service Commission, four of whose five members were named by the governor. They would be replaced by regulators chosen by the governor -- but from a list supplied by the legislature. But Mr. Ehrlich has partly himself to blame for naming PSC members clearly tilted toward the utilities, even to the point of plotting strategy and planning hunting trips with senior executives.

Obviously, rates must rise to reflect the world energy market. The General Assembly was foolish in the first place, back in 1999, to craft deregulatory legislation that locked in prices at 1993 levels -- minus 6.5 percent. At the time, lawmakers were interested mostly in covering their political hides and evading responsibility for the consequences of deregulation, but as world energy prices soared, the prices charged to BGE customers became increasingly disconnected from reality. The new legislation will correct that original sin, gradually and sensibly. As repair work goes, it is serviceable and sensible.

Iran Lobbies China, Russia To Help Curb U.S. (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad urged China, Russia and Central Asian nations to increase cooperation and blunt the interference of "domineering powers" in global affairs -- an apparent reference to the U.S. -- while dangling Iran's energy supplies as an inducement to work together.

The Iranian leader, under mounting pressure from Washington to curb his country's nuclear ambitions, was speaking yesterday at the annual summit of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a regional economic-and-security bloc fashioned by Beijing. Besides China and Russia, the group includes Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan.

Countries of the region should work together to "prevent the threats of domineering powers and their aggressive interference in global affairs," Mr. Ahmadinejad said. He emphasized that Iran's large reserves of crude oil provide "conducive grounds" for these countries to cooperate with Tehran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad appeared alongside the leaders of Russia and China, both permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, in a move that Iran apparently hopes will strengthen its hand and undercut that of its rivals before it enters into potential negotiations with the U.S. and other countries over the future of Tehran's nuclear programs.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad was enjoying a warm public welcome in Shanghai, U.S. and European diplomats at the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna tried to press Iran to halt sensitive nuclear activities that could produce material for atomic bombs.

Gregory L. Schulte, the chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA, blasted Tehran for "withholding cooperation" from international inspectors and warned that further intransigence risks the "weight of the Security Council." He called on Iran to accept a proposal for multilateral talks.

The U.S., China, Russia and three other European nations have said that if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment, they would start negotiations on incentives for Iran to limit its nuclear programs.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, who met with Mr. Ahmadinejad, told reporters "Iran is ready to enter negotiations." But it remained unclear whether Tehran would agree first to stop uranium-enrichment efforts. That process can produce fuel for power plants or nuclear weapons.

Both Beijing and Moscow have opposed U.S. efforts to pressure Iran with economic or diplomatic sanctions. Russia wants to sell nuclear-reactor technology to Tehran. China, preoccupied with securing enough energy for its industrial expansion, also is looking to cultivate ties with Iran.

Iran is China's third-largest supplier of crude oil, according to Chinese government figures. The country accounted for 13% of China's oil imports in the first four months of the year. Beijing also is negotiating a multibillion-dollar deal with Iran for the development and supply of further oil and natural gas to China.

For China, oil has increasingly become the focus of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, which was initially formed to deal with terrorism and separatist threats. Now, Chinese analysts increasingly talk about turning the old Silk Road across Central Asia into an "energy road."

China's oil imports from Kazakhstan more than doubled in the first four months of the year, compared with the same period in 2005. Crude imports from Russia climbed 36% during the same period, making the country China's fourth-biggest oil supplier.

Mr. Putin talked of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization's role as an "energy club." India, an observer at the meeting, was represented by its oil minister. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in campaigning for full membership in the group said his country could serve as a "trade and energy corridor" connecting China and others to oil and gas supplies.

The U.S. and other major oil importers are becoming increasingly concerned about energy security. To some officials in Washington, the Shanghai Cooperation Organization is looking more threatening and anti-Western.

Mr. Ahmadinejad wasn't the only one to complain about outside influence in the region. Uzbekistan President Islam Karimov railed against the stationing of foreign military forces in the region. He said their presence marks an effort to "drive a wedge" between neighbors and "rope" host countries "into [the] sphere of influence" of countries posting the troops.

Other leaders defended the presence of international troops. Afghan President Hamid Karzai said foreign soldiers are essential to fighting terrorism and strengthening government institutions in his country.

Iran "ready To Negotiate" Over Nuclear Stance (FT)

By Gareth Smyth, Geoff Dyer, And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin on Thursday struck an optimistic note on Iran's nuclear crisis, saying Tehran had responded positively to the six-nation package of incentives designed to persuade it to curb its nuclear programme.

After meeting Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, his Iranian counterpart, in Shanghai, Mr Putin said Iran was "ready to negotiate" with world powers over the proposal.

However, it was far from clear that Tehran had in fact accepted the conditions for talks – the suspension of uranium enrichment.

Mr Putin, who was attending a summit of the Shanghai Co-operation Organisation, a central Asian security group of which Iran is an observer, said Tehran would soon set a date for the start of talks. "The Iranian side responded positively to the six-nation proposal for a way out of the crisis," Mr Putin said.

The international proposal, which includes a package of incentives, was made at the beginning of June by the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus Germany.

"It is not what the Russians say that is going to be decisive," said an EU diplomat. "The response that really matters is the Iranian one."

European officials also caution that the Iranian response is likely to be a "fudge" that will require clarification in further talks.

Tehran says it is closely studying the package and preparing a counter-proposal. One official considered a regime insider told the FT that Iran would reply in one or two weeks but this response would be "general rather than specific". It would say it was ready for talks but not with preconditions, he added. "There is no chance whatsoever of Iran stopping enrichment."

Saudi Arabia this week joined the diplomatic effort to persuade Iran to accept the suspension of uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on the incentives package.

Saud al-Faisal, the foreign minister, met Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader and the ultimate decision-maker. Saudi sources indicated the mood in Tehran was in favour of negotiations and that a formula to resolve the uranium enrichment condition might be found.

Nuclear experts say Iran could justify a short suspension as a necessary technical break and allow negotiations to start.

Iran's leaders are also still assessing Washington's decision to reverse earlier policy and agree to talk to Tehran about the package, albeit under conditions.

According to an official in Tehran, the leadership was puzzled as to whether the US was ready for a "dignified solution" to its stand-off with Tehran.

Alternatively, he said, the US could merely be manoeuvring to persuade Russia and China to back UN sanctions.

Still, he said, Iran did not feel under the kind of pressure that would force it to back down over its enrichment policy.

Some western banks had reduced their operations with Iran, but the high price of oil was boosting Iran's foreign exchange earnings, he said.

Nevertheless, it did not compare with the pressures Tehran was under in the 1980-1988 Gulf war, when western and Arab governments were supporting Saddam Hussein's regime.

Iran's largely conservative media, meanwhile, has in recent days argued that the US has acted from weakness rather than strength, particularly because of its problems in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0034841

The Kayhan newspaper said that the west “had no more cards to play”, that Russia and China had “maintained their opposition to a military attack or sanctions” and that Monday’s statement from the Non-Aligned Movement supporting Iran’s right to peaceful atomic energy had “inserted a large spanner in the US works”.

Iran Seeks Aid In Asia In Resisting The West (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI, June 15 -- Overshadowing a regional summit, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested Thursday that China, Russia and neighboring Central Asian nations should help Iran resist growing pressure from the United States and Europe to limit its nuclear development program.

The appeal, in a speech to leaders of the six-nation Shanghai Cooperation Organization, seemed aimed in particular at China and Russia. The two nations, permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, have been reluctant to endorse the threat of U.N. sanctions and other steps being pushed by the Bush administration to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium and submit its nuclear program to international controls.

Ahmadinejad's remarks were also framed to portray the Shanghai Cooperation Organization as a bloc opposed to the threats that have accompanied the U.S. and European campaign against Tehran's nuclear program. In addition to China and Russia, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan make up the group, which was founded five years ago under Chinese leadership to foster regional security and economic cooperation.

"We want this organization to develop into a powerful body, influential in regional and international politics, economics and trade, and also serve to block threats and unlawful strong-arm interference from various countries," Ahmadinejad declared.

The five permanent Security Council members -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- along with Germany recently proposed a new package of incentives designed to persuade Iran to halt uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on its nuclear ambitions. Although Russia and China signed on, they have signaled reluctance to approve sanctions or other punitive action that Washington has warned could follow unless Iran buys into the proposals.

Iran has insisted that its program is aimed exclusively at producing energy and that it is within its rights to develop nuclear technology like other nations. But U.S. and European officials have suggested that the ultimate goal is nuclear weapons.

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, urged Iran to accept the incentives package. In keeping with the Chinese position, he said diplomacy, not force or threats of sanctions, was the way to deal with the standoff. Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing met with his Iranian counterpart to foster a favorable reply from Tehran, Liu said. But he added, "They still need a little time."

Presidents Vladimir Putin of Russia and Hu Jintao of China did not respond publicly to Ahmadinejad's appeal, but Putin told reporters that Iran was favorably disposed to the U.S.-European offer.

Appearing uncomfortable with the focus on the nuclear standoff, Liu suggested that reporters here were paying too much attention to Iran and not enough to festivities marking the Shanghai Cooperation Organization's fifth anniversary. Iran was invited as an observer nation, along with leaders from Pakistan, Mongolia and India. President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan was also on hand, at the invitation of China, because joint action against drug smuggling was high on the agenda.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld suggested recently that Ahmadinejad should not have been allowed to attend because one of the organization's main goals is to fight terrorism -- and according to the Bush administration, Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. Rumsfeld's comments also highlighted a more general U.S. uneasiness over the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a group with growing influence revolving around Chinese and Russian leadership and excluding the United States.

In a communique, the participating heads of state said they intended to work out a mechanism "to adopt measures in response to developments that threaten regional peace, stability and security." While vague, the agreement suggested more formal military cooperation among Russia, China and their Central Asian partners. Hu also proposed that the body's six members begin negotiations toward a friendship and security treaty.

Recognizing U.S. concerns, Hu and other leaders emphasized in speeches that the organization was not aimed against any other countries.

But the background music of independence from U.S. influence seemed clearly audible as the six nations celebrated their cooperation. President Islam Karimov of Uzbekistan, for instance, complained that "foreign forces stationed in the region" had failed to dampen drug smuggling from Afghanistan and had sought to "rope in" Central Asian nations to advance their own interests.

Uzbekistan, along with Kyrgyzstan, accepted U.S. military forces on its soil to support the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But Uzbekistan has since expelled the U.S. military from its base in the country, and Karimov's relations with Washington have soured. At a summit last year, Shanghai Cooperation Organization leaders called on the United States to set a deadline for the withdrawal of military installations from all member states.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said his country was keen to upgrade its status in the organization from observer to full member. Musharraf portrayed Pakistan as an "energy corridor" for the movement of Persian Gulf oil into the giant Chinese economy, reflecting the organization's strong appeal to the nations surrounding China that are eager to share in its growing prosperity.

China has helped finance a port at Gwadar, in southwestern Pakistan, and planning is underway for a road link between Gwadar and western China. Similarly, China has given low-interest loans for several projects in the Central Asian nations belonging to the organization.

Ahmadinejad suggested that Iran, with its large oil reserves, was also eager to play a part. He called for a regional energy conference to be held in Tehran, an idea that Liu said appealed to China.

Iran Sends Mixed Signals On Response (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

Iran sent mixed signals Thursday on how it will respond to the world's incentives to give up uranium enrichment, with its supreme leader vowing his country would never back down, while the president and chief envoy to the U.N. nuclear watchdog said Tehran was prepared to negotiate.

The Iranians spoke as American and European officials in Vienna urged Tehran to freeze enrichment and stop withholding information about its nuclear program. The chief U.S. delegate to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Gregory L. Schulte, warned that if Iran rejected the incentives, it could face "the weight of the Security Council."

But supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei dismissed such talk.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran will not succumb to these pressures," state television quoted Khamenei as saying.

Speaking to Iranian nuclear experts, Khamenei said the development of nuclear technology was more important than oil extraction — the source of about 80 percent of Iran's foreign exchange.

"Let me tell you, the importance of achieving and using nuclear energy is higher than oil exploration for our country," Khamenei said.

The five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, have offered Iran a package of incentives in return for a long-term moratorium on enrichment — a process that can produce fuel for nuclear power plants or material for atomic weapons. The package calls on Iran to suspend enrichment for the duration of any negotiations.

Iran has not responded formally so far, but its officials have insisted that enrichment is an inalienable right and that talks must be unconditional.

The country denies accusations by the U.S. and others that it is seeking to develop nuclear weapons, saying its program would only generate energy.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said he fully expected Iran to try any number of ways to shape the debate over its nuclear program.

"I think it is safe to say they will try to test the unity" of the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany, Snow said.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said Iran was prepared to negotiate on the basis of the incentives.

DOJ_NMG_0034843

Speaking after talks with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Shanghai for a regional summit, Putin said: "The Iranian side responded positively to the six-nation proposal for a way out of the crisis."

He added he hoped Iran would soon set a date for the start of talks.

Ehsan Jahandideh, a member of Ahmadinejad's delegation in Shanghai, confirmed the president had offered to negotiate "to ease tensions."

In Vienna, the chief Iranian delegate to the IAEA, Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, warned the West against threatening Tehran, saying "the carrot and stick has always been counterproductive."

But Soltanieh told reporters Iran was "determined to ... find a negotiated solution."

He spoke after the Europeans and the U.S. had criticized Iran before the 35-nation IAEA board.

"Cooperation with the agency has been reduced to almost nothing these last few months and ... numerous important questions remain to be resolved," said chief French delegate Francois-Xavier Deniau, who was speaking on behalf of France, Britain and Germany.

Schulte agreed, saying, "Iran continues to withhold cooperation with the IAEA on almost every outstanding issue."

When Iran received the incentives last week, it said they contained "positive steps" but also ambiguities, which had to be clarified in further talks.

The package included some significant concessions by the U.S., aimed at enticing Tehran to freeze enrichment. The U.S. would provide Iran with peaceful nuclear technology, lift some sanctions and join direct negotiations with Tehran.

The package also pulls back from demands that Iran outright scrap its enrichment program as an initial condition for negotiations, seeking instead a suspension. However, it also contains the implicit threat of U.N. sanctions if Iran remains defiant.

Senate Backs President's Iran Policies (AP)

AP, June 16, 2006

The Senate on Thursday endorsed President Bush's diplomatic approach to the problem of Iran's nuclear program after rejecting a proposal that would have increased sanctions against the Tehran government and those helping it.

The Senate voted 99-0 to support the decision, announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on May 31, that the United States would join other Western states in engaging Iran in negotiations and offering a package of incentives if Tehran suspends its uranium enrichment activities.

That vote came minutes after a 54-45 vote to defeat a proposal by Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., that would have imposed mandatory sanctions on entities that help Iran acquire or develop weapons of mass destruction.

Both the Santorum measure, and the vote of support for the administration, introduced by Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., were amendments to a defense spending bill the Senate is debating.

Santorum's proposal was in line with a bill passed by the House last April, over the objections of the administration, that also would impose sanctions on those contributing to Iran's WMD programs and cut off aid to countries investing in Iran's energy sector. It also authorized $100 million to promote pro-democracy efforts in Iran.

The administration said the House bill would limit the flexibility it needed to reach a diplomatic solution to the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program.

Hamas Offers To Revive Cease-fire (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- The Hamas-led Palestinian government offered yesterday to restore a cease-fire with Israel, nearly a week after calling off the truce to protest a deadly explosion on a Gaza beach.

Israel responded favorably, signaling that both sides are prepared to step back from fighting that threatened to escalate into a broader conflict.

A Hamas official said the group was in touch with other Gaza militants to try to halt daily rocket barrages against Israel, which set off Israeli air and artillery retaliation.

DOJ_NMG_0034844

The truce, declared in February 2005, greatly reduced Palestinian-Israeli violence, which had claimed more than 3,000 lives in the four years before.

But Hamas called it off after an explosion last Friday on a Gaza beach that killed eight Palestinian civilians. Israel was shelling Gaza around that time but insisted it was not responsible for the explosion.

Hamas sent its own rocket squads to fire at Israel alongside Islamic Jihad and other militants.

The barrages have tapered off somewhat in the past day, an indication that Hamas was sidelining its militants. Islamic Jihad fired five rockets yesterday.

"We are interested to keep the ... quiet, especially in the Gaza Strip," government spokesman Ghazi Hamad of Hamas said yesterday. "We have contacts with the Palestinian factions. We are ready to do it, but [only] if the Israeli side has a strong intention to respond positively to the call ... to stop their aggression."

Israel welcomed the gesture. "If it is quiet, we will answer that with quiet," said Mark Regev, spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry.

The initiative received backing from the powerful exiled Hamas leadership.

In Damascus, Syria, the deputy head of Hamas' political bureau, Moussa Abu Marzouk, said: "If Israel agrees to stop targeting civilians, then [Hamas] will take a positive stance."

The Hamas announcement came shortly after the Palestinian information minister arrived in Gaza with $2 million in his luggage, the second straight day a senior Hamas official has hand-delivered money to the cash-strapped government.

Youssef Rizka's suitcase delivery signaled that Hamas has opened a new front in its battle against international sanctions by taking matters into its own hands -- literally.

On Wednesday, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar returned to Gaza from a trip to Muslim countries with $20 million in his luggage. Hamas said all the money came from private donations and charities, not governments.

The fighting with Israel has complicated an already difficult situation for Hamas, which is under intense international pressure to adopt a more moderate stance and is grappling with bloody infighting against the rival Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

How Clumsy, Inaccurate Gaza Rockets Could Start A War (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel, June 15 — The Qassam rocket is not much to look at: a 70-pound tube of rough steel and hand-mixed explosive, like the one that pounded through the roof of Universe Packaging here on Thursday. Tons of falling concrete just missed Lior Levi, 28, a worker there.

"My ears were ringing, so it took me a few seconds to realize what really happened," said Mr. Levi, who counts himself a lucky man. "I didn't realize it was a direct hit."

However crude, the Qassam rocket, fired by Palestinian militants from Gaza into Israel, has nonetheless won its spot as symbol of the moment in the long conflict here. At a delicate time, the rocket is not only raising tensions between Palestinians and Israelis, as usual, but is also dividing Palestinian from Palestinian, Israeli from Israeli.

Most immediately, the number of rockets fired by Palestinians from Gaza, and whether they happen to hit anyone, will be crucial in determining whether the Israeli-Palestinian conflict explodes again into high-intensity warfare.

On Thursday, after a week in which at least 16 Palestinian civilians were killed and several Israelis wounded, there were signs that Israel and the Palestinian government, now led by the militant group Hamas, did not want that to happen.

After several Qassams landed here and elsewhere in the Negev, a Hamas spokesman said the group was willing to reinstate a 16-month cease-fire that it had proclaimed invalid last week after seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on a beach during an Israeli retaliatory bombardment.

"I spoke today with the prime minister and he said we definitely want quiet everywhere," the spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said Thursday on Israeli radio, referring to Ismail Haniya, the top Hamas leader. "We are interested in a cease-fire everywhere."

He later qualified that, saying Israel would have to stop all attacks against Palestinians in both Gaza and the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0034845

But he also said that in that case, Hamas would attempt the difficult task of restraining other Palestinian militants from firing Qassams on their own. In Gaza the launchings are generally regarded as legitimate resistance in the wider war against Israel.

Israel responded with its own condition — that the rocket attacks end — but did not dismiss the offer.

"If this terrorist activity ceases, of course we will be more than happy to cease our defensive measures," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Foreign Ministry.

For such a simple rocket, with low accuracy and a range of less than five miles, the Qassam has raised complicated issues.

On the Palestinian side, Hamas is being forced to evaluate the transition it has made from a resistance group that carried out deadly attacks against Israeli civilians, to leader of the Palestinian government. Already, a lack of money is weakening Hamas's grip on power, and more rockets and wider fighting are unlikely to persuade Western governments to resume financial aid.

Israel is divided by the question of its military response, whether it has been disproportionate to the threat of the Qassams, and whether the lives of innocent Palestinians could have been spared.

As with many issues here, the Qassam problem began in earnest with the Israeli pullout of settlers from Gaza, completed last September.

For many Israelis, full disengagement should have begun the moment Gaza, finally free from Israeli soldiers, ceased to be a threat. But according to the Israeli military, more than 600 rockets have fallen since then. They have killed one person inside Israel and injured many more, including a friend of the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, who lives here in Sderot.

But even with relatively few casualties, the barrage has infuriated residents, many of them working poor Israelis with roots in Morocco and Ethiopia.

"Disengagement blew up in our faces, in the faces of our children," said Alon David, 32, a leader of a group of Sderot residents who have been camped out in front of Mr. Peretz's house here.

Mr. David and five other people have been on a liquids-only protest diet for the past five days. Since a barrage of Qassams that peaked at 30 or 40 last week, children have stopped going to school, and residents have complained that the government has abandoned them in the name of its international image.

"The children are sleeping in bed with us," said Sima Hadad, 33, one of the hunger strikers. "Every boom — even things that are not Qassams — scares them."

Another hunger striker, Sharon Ben Abu, 33, added, "Even if the watermelon salesman screams 'Watermelon!' on the street, they get scared."

The mayor and others have called for a huge military assault on Gaza. But human rights groups, and some Israelis, contend that has already happened: Israel has fired nearly 6,000 artillery shells into Gaza over roughly the past year in retaliation for the Qassams, and the United Nations says that more than 80 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli attacks since the beginning of the year. Since 2004, eight people have died in Israel from Qassam fire, the military says.

The issue came into tragic focus last week when seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on the beach as Israel attacked Gaza. (An eighth person was also killed.)

On Tuesday the military said its internal investigation showed the blast that killed them was not an Israeli explosive. But Israel has been plunged into introspection, highlighted in dueling commentaries on Thursday in the newspaper Maariv.

One writer said that when such tragedies occurred, "we regret it, but we must not condemn and vilify those who do it." Another sarcastically bemoaned avoidable death: "When they kill us, it is a massacre. When we kill them, it is a pinpointed killing."

Peter Bouckaert, a Human Rights Watch official who investigated both the Qassam firing and the Israeli response, said neither side was adequately safeguarding civilians.

"The Qassams are ineffective from a military perspective, but it doesn't matter how many people they kill because they indiscriminately target civilians," he said. "On the other hand, the Israeli response has been a lot more deadly in terms of the civilians killed in Gaza.

US Warns On Readiness Of North Korean Missile (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopul Ans Anna Fifield

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

North Korean preparations for a possible long-range missile test have advanced to where Pyongyang could launch a Taepodong-2 missile on "very short notice," a Bush administration official told the Financial Times on Thursday.

The US has been monitoring activity at a launch site in North Korea for weeks following indications that Pyongyang was preparing to test an intercontinental ballistic missile for the first time. A senior Bush administration official last week said the US was not yet "on the edge of our seat". But another official on Thursday said more recent intelligence suggested Pyongyang was now much closer to being ready to conduct a test.

"They appear to be moving closer to the ability to actually conduct a launch on very short notice," said the administration official.

In 1998, Pyongyang stunned the US and Japan by firing an intermediate range Taepodong-1 missile over Japan into the Pacific Ocean. While US intelligence now shows that test preparations are very advanced, Washington does not know whether Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, will go ahead with a test.

Taking the threat of a possible test very seriously, the Pentagon has positioned military assets to deal with any launch. Washington believes increasingly strident and frequent North Korean protests over US spy plane reconnaissance flights may signal its intention to test the Taepodong-2. US and South Korean officials have also urged North Korea to abandon any test.

"We are currently trying to get all of the parties in the six-party talks process to send a strong message to North Korea to discourage them from launching," said a senior US official.

The Taepodong-2 is an untested two-, or three-, stage "integrated" missile. The three-stage version consists of a solid-fuel booster rocket strapped atop a Scud missile, which is in turn attached to a short-range Nodong missile. North Korea appears close to the position where it only needs to fuel the missile. Once it does, it would significantly increase the likelihood of a test since the move is dangerous and difficult to reverse.

Vice-admiral Lowell Jacoby, then head of the Defence Intelligence Agency, last year told Congress that a three-stage version of the Taepodong-2 had the "theoretical capability [to] reach most of the continental US". But some experts doubt whether the missile has the range to hit the US and whether it can carry a significant payload. The US believes North Korea is trying to develop the technology to put a nuclear warhead on an ICBM that could reach the US, but has not yet succeeded.

South Korea is "bracing" for a possible missile launch, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, said on Thursday.

"We are very concerned that international opinion turns increasingly negative towards North Korea, especially the six party talks [which] are still in a deadlock," Mr Ban said. "North Korea should stop its plan, if [there is] any, to fire a missile and come back to the negotiating table."

Tensions over the missile test preparations come as delegates from the two Koreas are meeting in the Southern city of Kwangju to celebrate the sixth anniversary of a historic summit between Kim Jong-il and Kim Dae-jung, then president of South Korea.

Inter-Korean relations have warmed significantly since the summit, but there has been no follow-up meeting, as pledged at the time. Kim Dae-jung is preparing to return to Pyongyang at the end of this month, a visit that the current South Korean government hopes will pave the way for a second summit.

"We are in a state of truce, not having resolved the issue of war and peace. The threat of war is constantly around us," said Ahn Kyong-ho, the chief Northern delegate. "As we look to the future of the nation, we must think big and implement it."

Earlier this week, Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, said it would be a "bad idea" for North Korea to conduct a test, and urged Pyongyang to return to the six-party talks which have been stalled since last September. North Korea has refused to return to the talks because of US financial sanctions that are crippling its economy.

Another US administration official said: “Our concerns about North Korea’s missile programme are pretty well known. North Korea should abide by the long-range missile test moratorium it has observed since 1999.”

U.S. Sanctions Cost North Korea Millions (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

U.S. economic "defensive measures" aimed at curbing illegal activities by North Korea have cost the Pyongyang regime millions of dollars in lost cash over the past several months through banking restrictions and other actions, U.S. officials estimate.

One sign that the economic measures are hurting the communist regime in North Korea is Pyongyang's continued refusal to rejoin six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the United States lifts what it regards as sanctions, said Bush administration officials involved in Asia matters.

"We think the defensive measures are hurting them," said one official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

North Korean officials have told Chinese officials that they will not come back to the six-party talks until the United States lifts economic restrictions imposed on the Macau-based Banco Delta Asia, something the Bush administration is refusing to do, saying the measures are not nuclear-related, but simply efforts to protect the U.S. financial system and to pressure Pyongyang into halting activities such as counterfeiting U.S. currency.

The Bush administration official pointed out that U.S. financial actions against North Korea were never part of the agenda of talks aimed at halting covert North Korean nuclear programs. Those talks also include representatives of China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

Officials said there are intelligence reports that North Korea is continuing work on its nuclear programs, including plutonium-fueled efforts and a uranium-enrichment program that remains couched in mystery. The impoverished communist-ruled state has earned hard cash through counterfeiting U.S. currency, specifically a high-quality forged $100 bill. Its other activities include selling illegal drugs, such as heroin and cocaine.

The latest U.S. action was a May 8 ban that blocked any U.S.-based company from flying the North Korean flag on its merchant ships. The ban was imposed after the government learned that North Korea was selling its flag to companies at two to three times the usual international price as a way to raise cash. The Clinton administration permitted the flaggings in 2000.

Weeks after the Bush-era ban went into effect, U.S. intelligence agencies detected launch-preparation activities at a North Korean missile facility that indicate the regime may be preparing to conduct a missile test. Officials said the North Koreans are unpredictable and could be engaging in brinksmanship, but they do not expect Pyongyang to break its self-imposed moratorium on missile tests.

The most effective restrictions were Treasury Department penalties imposed on Banco Delta Asia in September. The bank was sanctioned as a "primary money-laundering concern" for its 20-year role in helping the North Korean government.

The bank was involved in major North Korean foreign purchases including precious metals used in manufacturing and was the main outlet for more than $45 million in North Korean-made counterfeit $100 bills since 1989, the officials said.

The Treasury Department said a North Korean government front company used Banco Delta Asia for more than a decade to carry out illegal activities, including smuggling counterfeit-brand tobacco products. The company also took part in international drug trafficking on behalf of North Korean government agents.

Officials said the penalties against Banco Delta Asia, which have been supported by China's government, have had a ripple effect among international financial institutions that now are taking steps to avoid working with North Korean government agents and front companies linked in the past to illegal activities.

Bush Pushes For Trade Deal As A Deadline Looms (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With time running short on stalled global trade talks, President Bush hopes to kick-start negotiations on a visit to Europe next week. But major issues remain, particularly over cuts in farm subsidies.

DOJ_NMG_0034848

"It's tough sledding right now," Mr. Bush said of the multilateral talks launched four years ago in Doha, Qatar, under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. In a speech yesterday, Mr. Bush, who will visit Vienna next week for a U.S.-European Union summit, pressed major players in negotiations to look past their differences. He suggested a global trade deal could accomplish the twin goals of lifting the world economy and reducing poverty.

"The Doha negotiations are at a critical moment," he said. "Now is the time for the world to come together."

With increasing intensity, the Bush administration is raising pressure to break the deadlock. In recent weeks, U.S. negotiators have been shuttling back and forth between Washington and Geneva, where the WTO is based, in an effort to move the round forward.

WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy has set an end-of-June deadline to reach consensus on the outlines of a deal to lower trade barriers in farm and manufacturing goods, the two most contentious components of the talks so far. The White House needs a framework deal soon if it is to have time to guide a global trade package through Congress before the president's trade-promotion authority expires in July 2007. Without the authority, Mr. Bush will lose his leverage to force Congress to deal with the issue.

Mr. Bush's remarks on Doha represent a rare direct foray into the global trade debate. But they come as the Bush administration is making a more concerted effort to raise the U.S. profile overseas. Among other things, Mr. Bush, who made a surprise visit to Baghdad this week, is stepping up efforts to bolster Iraq's fragile new government. And the administration is pursuing a sharpened diplomatic effort aimed at blunting Iran's nuclear ambitions.

In Geneva, the Doha talks are hung up on a cross-cutting set of issues. The U.S. and Europe are at odds over a Bush-backed proposal to make deep cuts in trade-distorting farm subsidies. The cuts would expose American farmers to greater foreign competition, but also open new markets, a crucial White House goal. European negotiators say the proposed cuts go too far. At the same time, the Europe and the U.S. are at loggerheads with major developing nations, chief among them India and Brazil, over proposals to deeply cut tariffs on manufactured goods. India and Brazil fear increased competition from U.S. and European manufacturers.

Mr. Bush conceded that "national interests" seem to be overriding efforts to find compromises. "Local politics has a lot to do with whether or not this Doha Round is going to get completed," he said.

Mr. Bush stressed that the U.S. is ready to make concessions, but needs corresponding compromises from Europe and the major developing nations that will ensure American farmers and manufacturers have increased access to markets abroad.

Bush Pledges To Push EU To Cut Agriculture Subsidies (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush, facing a June deadline to restart the embattled Doha round of world trade talks, said he will tell European leaders next week that they must relent on agriculture subsidies.

Although admitting that "it's tough sledding right now" to complete the next round of World Trade Organization talks, Mr. Bush said dropping subsidies on agriculture, services and manufacturing would benefit poorer nations and help reduce global poverty.

"We're ready to make the move -- on agriculture and services and manufacturing -- but we expect other nations to do the same thing," Mr. Bush said at the Initiative for Global Development's 2006 summit, promising to take that message when he visits Austria and Hungary next week.

Also yesterday, Mr. Bush signed several measures, including the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act, the Miner Act and a proclamation establishing the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument.

In signing the broadcast legislation, Mr. Bush said parents must take the lead in controlling what their children watch, but he said broadcast companies also must play a role -- and have been failing in recent years.

"Broadcast programming has too often pushed the bounds of decency," Mr. Bush said, citing a study that said TV's use of profanity during the 8-9 p.m. hour increased 95 percent from 1988 to 2002. "In other words, the language is becoming coarser during the times when it's more likely children will be watching television. It's a bad trend, a bad sign."

He also said complaints to the Federal Communications Commission have increased from hundreds in 2000 to hundreds of thousands today.

"In other words, people are saying, 'We're tired of it, and we expect the government to do something about it,' " he said.

The bill he signed increased the penalties the FCC can levy per violation of decency standards from $32,500 to $325,000.

"By allowing the FCC to levy stiffer and more meaningful fines on broadcasters who violate decency standards, this law will ensure that broadcasters take seriously their duty to keep the public airwaves free of obscene, profane and indecent material."

On the trade agenda, Mr. Bush goes to Vienna, Austria, next week for the U.S.-EU summit. He said he will push his subsidies message to the European nations, which are balking at a broad agreement. The WTO has set a deadline to reach a preliminary deal, but European officials have said they do not think the end-of-the-month deadline is final.

The Bush administration under U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, and her predecessor, Rob Portman, have been pushing for the broader agreement. But the president's speech yesterday elevates the stakes and the pressure to complete an agreement.

Talks have been stalled since October, when the United States made its ambitious proposal to cut subsidies and tariffs. The European Union proposed smaller cuts, and the middle proposal, from the so-called Group of 20 countries, proposes major cuts in developed countries' tariffs but shallower cuts for developing nations.

"Countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming. And the G-20 countries have to make a tough decision on manufacturing," Mr. Bush said.

Bush: 'Tough Sledding' For Poverty Talks (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, June 15, 2006

President Bush, trying to jump start global trade negotiations, urged European and developing nations Thursday to make tough decisions to finish a trade deal that he claims will curb poverty.

The United States is among 149 nations trying to finish the international round of trade talks known as the Doha Round. Negotiators have missed several deadlines.

"It's tough sledding right now," Bush said at the Initiative for Global Development's national summit focused on getting the public and private sectors to work together to end poverty across the world.

There are disagreements over cutting farm barriers in Europe, the United States and other rich nations. Major developing countries, such as India and Brazil, also are refusing to significantly reduce trade barriers that protect their manufacturing and service industries.

"We're ready to eliminate all tariffs and subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services, and we expect other nations to do the same," Bush said.

He said countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming, and the G20 group of developing countries that is pushing for increased access to industrialized markets for their farmers have to make difficult decisions on manufacturing.

Bush said he planned to carry that message to next week's European Union summit.

"Now is the time for the world to come together and make this world a free trading world, not only for the benefit of our own economies, but as an important part of the strategy to reduce poverty around the world," the president said.

Bush spoke after attending a ceremonial swearing-in at the White House of the new U.S. trade representative, Susan Schwab, who is working to wrap up key elements of a deal by the end of July.

Former Secretary of States Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright co-chaired the summit, which was attended by some of the nation's top business leaders, philanthropists, policy experts, government officials and civic leaders.

"Americans have got to understand that when we talk about trade, we're not only talking about enhancing economic growth and vitality, we're helping people get out of poverty," Bush said, adding that impoverished states are attractive safe havens for terrorists and tyrants and international criminals.

The Initiative for Global Development was founded in 2003 by former Sen. Daniel Evans of Washington; Bill Gates Sr., father of Microsoft founder Bill Gates; Bill Ruckelshaus, former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency; Bill Clapp, chief executive officer of Global Partnerships; and Gen. John Shalikashvili, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

A New Trade Envoy, With A Battle On Her Hands (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Not many new Cabinet members take office with a deadline of six weeks or so to succeed or fail in their jobs. But that was what Susan C. Schwab faced Thursday when she was sworn in as the new United States trade representative.

President Bush praised his new envoy on Thursday as "a good, hard negotiator." Still, she faces long odds as trade diplomats struggle to salvage a global accord that the Bush administration hopes will be one of its signal economic achievements.

But if trade officials are unable to resolve their fundamental differences by the time of a critical meeting in late July, the failure to achieve a deal could prove a huge disappointment for the White House.

The tight time limit derives from the Congressional authority for the United States to negotiate a trade-expanding agreement under the so-called Doha round, named after the city in Qatar where talks began, and then get an up-or-down legislative vote. The authority expires in mid-2007, and it is doubtful that Congress can approve any deal unless the basic framework is established by mid-2006.

"We are at a critical juncture in a once-in-generation multilateral negotiation," Ms. Schwab said in an interview. "We're getting to the point in the Doha negotiations where some very tough decisions have to be made."

Ms. Schwab is certainly prepared to step into the role. She was a deputy trade representative under Rob Portman, the former Ohio representative who was named director of the Office of Management and Budget in April. At the age of 51, she has been involved in trade issues in government, business and the academic community all of her career, but is not a well-known figure outside that world.

But some critics say the appointment of Ms. Schwab — succeeding a recognized power hitter with close ties on Capitol Hill — was a sign that the Bush administration was scaling back its hopes for a successful Doha negotiation.

"In my judgment, she's first class," said Bill Frenzel, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota and now a guest scholar at the Brookings Institution. "But she succeeds a very popular and active trade representative whisked out of his job. I think everyone agrees that the chances of a successful Doha round seem quite limited."

Ms. Schwab, not surprisingly, says she sees it differently and appears undaunted by the suggestions that she is not up to the job.

"The only way you can respond to those questions is by exceeding expectations," she said. "The joy comes in proving the critics wrong."

Moreover, she points out, when the time comes to lobby Congress on trade, she will have the help of Mr. Portman and Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff, who also has a trade background.

Another heavy hitter, Robert B. Zoellick, the former trade representative who is now deputy secretary of state, is also prepared to step up to bat.

To be sure, the Bush administration has not invested all its trade policy in a successful Doha round, which involves trying to get a multilateral agreement among 147 countries. Its trade record also rests on more than a dozen bilateral agreements so far, and more in the offing, with countries in Latin America, the Caribbean and the Middle East.

In addition, the administration has tried to win over Congressional critics of freer trade by using the World Trade Organization and other legal avenues to press countries to drop what Washington has charged are illegal or unfair practices keeping out American goods and services.

It has achieved some gains on that front. Ms. Schwab's nomination for the trade representative job was held up in the Senate until she satisfied Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, that the United States would be tougher toward

China. "She has convinced me that she will be a very strong voice on opening markets," Mr. Schumer said when she was confirmed. From the American point of view, the main roadblock to progress in the Doha trade talks is not the so-called emerging markets like China, India or Brazil, whose barriers are a problem in Congress, but a few wealthy European countries opposed to lowering their barriers on farm imports.

European barriers are a particular anathema to American farmers, and their reservations about any trade deal would doom it on Capitol Hill. Yet there is no sign of bridging the impasse between the Europeans and the United States on the agriculture issue.

Ms. Schwab said that without a deal on agriculture, the progress that has been made on opening doors to American services, particularly financial, would go for naught, as would what little progress had been achieved in manufactured goods.

If the United States has a strategy to change European thinking, she said, it is to enlist India, Brazil, China and other fast-developing countries to pressure the Europeans. In addition, she has been meeting with European business associations that would gain from a trade deal.

Finally, Ms. Schwab said, Mr. Bush has lobbied Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany to press President Jacques Chirac of France to ease his opposition to lower farm barriers.

But Peter Mandelson, the chief European Union trade negotiator and a friend of Mr. Blair, has charged that it is the United States that is intransigent.

Rebutting the American argument that the poor and developing countries of the world will side with the United States, European negotiators say that the cuts sought by Washington in European farm products would actually hurt the poorest countries of Asia, Africa and the Caribbean by wiping out the advantages of their trade preferences in Europe.

Mr. Mandelson has called the American demands "unrealistic" and insists that at the next round of talks in Geneva at the end of this month, they must be scaled back if the Doha round is to succeed.

"We all have our work cut out for us, including Sue," Mr. Mandelson said through a spokesman on Thursday. "None of our domestic constituencies give us an easy ride. And it really is a question of doing the heavy lifting together."

Ms. Schwab is the kind of person, in any case, who finds all these political difficulties "fun."

Growing up in poor countries in Africa and Asia as the daughter of parents in the foreign service, Ms. Schwab said she realized early on that trade was far more potent than foreign aid in combating poverty and opening up opportunity, a conviction that deepened in graduate school. In that, she says, she has found a kindred spirit in Mr. Bush.

Ms. Schwab has worked at the Commerce Department, the United States embassy in Japan, on Capitol Hill as a Senate aide and at Motorola, an export powerhouse. She wrote a book about the trade battles of the 1980's and served as dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy before joining the Bush administration.

But now that she is in charge of trade policy, Ms. Schwab argues that she can prove the skeptics wrong about a possible breakthrough.

"How can you not be excited and thrilled by this opportunity?" Ms. Schwab said. "If you have watched development of U.S. trade policy and global negotiations over the years, you'd be hard pressed to find a more exciting time than the present to be stepping in to this kind of role."

US Drops Opposition To Asian Currency Unit (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Victor Mallet

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

The US on Thursday signalled it would not fight efforts to create an Asian currency unit, turning the page on over a decade of largely consistent opposition to Asian monetary integration.

US officials said the move is intended to show that the US does not fear greater monetary co-operation between Asia's rising economic powers and wants to play a constructive role in helping to shape it.

The green light from the US is a big boost for Japan, which has been pushing the idea of an Asian currency unit loosely modelled on the European currency unit, the precursor to the euro, in face of considerable regional scepticism. It comes at a time of growing diplomatic closeness between Washington and Tokyo.

DOJ_NMG_0034852

While formidable obstacles remain to the creation of an Asian currency unit, with Asian countries unable to agree on weightings or on the inclusion of Taiwan, the US decision and the broader evolution of US Asia policy it represents may in time be seen as highly significant.

The signal was given by Tim Adams, the under-secretary for international affairs at the US Treasury, in a closed session of the World Economic Forum in Tokyo.

While Mr Adams spoke in general terms, a copy of his prepared remarks, which has been obtained by the Financial Times, spells out clearly the US position on the Asian currency unit. The remarks say the US believes there has been "some confusion" about its attitude on the ACU. They say "we do not see the ACU as a competitor to the dollar."

They say the US is "open minded" and adds "we view proposals for Asian currency co-operation with interest." Mr Adams presented his remarks as a clarification rather than a shift in US policy. US officials admit the US is seen in Asia as being hostile to regional monetary and financial integration in principle, and wants to change that view.

Sri Lankan Military Attacks Rebels In Response To Fatal Bus Blast (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, June 15 — The Sri Lankan military pounded rebel posts in the northern and eastern parts of the country by land, sea and air on Thursday, independent monitors and guerrilla officials said, after a land mine explosion ripped through a crowded passenger bus on Thursday morning in northern Sri Lanka.

The death toll rose to 64 by the end of the day, with 86 wounded, in the most serious attack on civilians since the government and rebels signed a cease-fire four years ago in the country's ethnic insurgency.

The military said only that its forces had taken "deterrent" measures. The government was swift to blame the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the attack on the civilian bus, which the rebels promptly denied, pointing at the government.

The Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission, which was created by the cease-fire and which documents truce violations, said it had not determined who was responsible.

The greater uncertainty was whether the deadly events on Thursday were the beginning of full-scale war. Despite mounting violence, neither side has been willing to explicitly renounce the February 2002 cease-fire. "The substance of the peace process has been completely eroded," was how Jehan Perera of the Colombo-based National Peace Council, an independent research and advocacy group, put it. "Only the outer trappings remain."

Talks in Oslo between the warring parties collapsed last week. The topic of the Norwegian-brokered negotiations was supposed to be the role of European-led truce monitors. The Tamil Tigers pulled out before the talks began, objecting to the composition of the government delegation.

The latest violence follows several months of carnage among Sri Lankan soldiers, Tamil Tiger guerrillas and a breakaway faction in the east known as the Karuna group.

Over the last few months, fighting has emptied villages in the northeast. In April, a bomb exploded in a market in Trincomalee, a port town. The same month, the rebels, known as the L.T.T.E., were accused of trying to assassinate the leader of the Sri Lankan Army in the military headquarters here in the capital. That suicide bombing, which killed nine people and wounded the army commander, Lt. Gen. Sarath Fonseca, and more than 20 others, was followed by airstrikes on rebel posts near Sampur. Since April, 500 people have been killed in the conflict, mostly civilians, the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission said. The toll on Thursday was by far the largest number of civilian deaths since the 2002 truce.

The Tamil Tigers accused the government on Thursday of having bombed rebel-held Kilinochchi, the northern town that is the guerrilla headquarters, as well as Sampur and Mullaittivu, strategic eastern installations for the Tamil naval fleet. The Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission reported seeing artillery fire from the Sri Lankan Army and Navy.

"Known L.T.T.E. targets are being taken as a deterrent," the Sri Lankan military spokesman, Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, said Thursday afternoon, without elaborating.

Brigadier Samarasinghe said the explosion of the crowded state-owned bus at rush hour involved two so-called Claymore mines, placed side by side and detonated by remote control. The bus was traveling to a market town in the historic Anuradhapura district, about 100 miles north of here. Anuradhapura's border villages were favorite targets in the war, because the district is at the crossroads between government and rebel-held territories.

Police officers said 15 children were among the 64 dead. Most of the injured, who also included children, were being treated at two hospitals in the town of Anuradhapura. Nine with serious head injuries were moved to Colombo General Hospital.

Calling the attack "a barbaric terrorist act," a government minister accused the Tigers of deliberately selecting the bus. "This was not a mistake," said Keheliya Rabukwella, the policy planning minister.

On the Web site of its peace secretariat, the rebels accused the government of attacking the bus, saying attacks on civilians "cannot be justified under any circumstances."

The European Union put the Tigers on its list of banned terrorist groups last month, following the United States, Britain and India. The Tamil diaspora in Europe is a major fund-raising source for the Tigers.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, blamed the rebels for the bus attack.

Sri Lanka Retaliates After 64 Civilians Killed (FT)

By Khozem Merchant

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Sri Lanka yesterday unleashed military attacks against Tamil targets after rebels blew up a bus killing at least 64 civilians in the worst terrorist atrocity since a ceasefire four years ago.

Government air and naval forces launched reprisal rocket attacks and artillery fire against two Tamil towns near the government-controlled city of Trincomalee in the north-east at 30-minute intervals for nearly five hours, according to peace monitors in Colombo.

The Sri Lankan government pinned the atrocity on the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the separatist movement, which has denied complicity but which in the past several months has accelerated its military campaign against government security targets.

“This is an escalation of a strategy by both sides to retaliate and cause terror among civilians. Unless there is a change of heart by both sides this situation will get worse,” said Jehan Perera, director of the National Peace Council in the capital Colombo.

At least 18 children were among the dead after the bus taking them and many adults to a medical clinic was struck by a claymore mine – a plastic device that scatters a fusillade of ball-bearings on impact – near Kebitigollawa town in the northern-central province.

All the fatalities and dozens more injured were poor Sinhalese, the majority community in the south Asian island state, where the LTTE has been fighting for a homeland in the north-east for the minority Tamils.

Analysts fear a backlash by the Sinhalese. The government appealed for calm and urged the people to “defeat the aim of the terrorists to instigate a backlash in other parts of the country”.

The attack follows intense diplomatic activity designed to forestall what many neutral observers say is a slow slide into a civil war that had officially ended with a ceasefire in 2002.

Explosion Kills 64, Shakes Cease-fire (WT/AP)

By Dilip Ganguly, The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

KABITHIGOLLEWA, Sri Lanka -- A powerful land mine ripped through a packed bus in northern Sri Lanka yesterday, killing at least 64 persons in the worst act of violence since a 2002 cease-fire.

Sri Lanka's air force responded by bombing rebel-held areas in the northeast.

The government blamed the Tamil Tiger rebels for the violence. The bus was crowded with commuters and schoolchildren, many of whom were on their way to attend a funeral for a slain police officer.

The cease-fire was shaken last summer with the assassination of Sri Lanka's foreign minister, and the explosion brought the fractured country even closer to full-scale war.

DOJ_NMG_0034854

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States condemned what it termed a terrorist attack and called for resumed negotiations.

"This vicious attack bears all the hallmarks of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam" and violates the cease-fire agreement, Mr. McCormack said. "The Tamil Tigers must renounce terror and enter into direct negotiations with the Sri Lankan government."

The explosion tore through the bus in a crowded part of the northern town of Kabithigollewa, about 130 miles northeast of the capital, Colombo, at about 8 a.m. It was thought to have been caused by two land mines hanging from a tree and detonated from a remote position, military spokesman Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe said. Rigging mines to trees or bicycles is a common Tiger tactic because it prevents the ground from absorbing much of the force of the blast.

A doctor at the hospital where the bus victims were taken, S.B. Bothota, said 15 schoolchildren were among the 64 dead. Another 78 persons were wounded, he said.

Hours later, the pro-rebel TamilNet Web site said two jets bombed areas in the north of the country. Brig. Samarasinghe confirmed the bombings, saying the air force was taking limited deterrent action.

The Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam fought for 20 years to carve out a separate homeland in Sri Lanka's north and east for the country's 3.2 million minority Tamils, who are largely Hindu. The majority of Sri Lankans are Sinhalese Buddhists.

The Tigers now control large parts of the island's north and east, where they have their own de-facto state.

The cease-fire four years ago ended large-scale fighting, but violence has persisted, intensifying after the assassination in August of Foreign Minister Lakshman Kadirgamar. The government blamed the killing on the Tigers.

Diplomatic efforts to quell the violence and get the peace process back on track have shown little progress. The Tigers pulled out of peace talks in April, and last week scuttled negotiations by refusing to meet with representatives of the government side after arriving in Oslo, the venue for the talks.

Sri Lankans Seek Escape Across The Sea (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

TALAIMANNAR, Sri Lanka — The thin wisps of land here where Sri Lanka and India nearly meet look like outstretched arms straining to touch: one reaching for sanctuary, the other pulling to safety.

Pirabakaran Kumari and her three children almost connected. They set out from the Sri Lankan side on a peaceful day, the skies blue, the seas calm. Soon, as their motorboat hopscotched the waves, they caught sight of refuge in the form of a telecom tower standing tall on Indian soil.

"I was very happy when I saw the tower," Kumari said. "I thought, 'I'm just about there.' "

But fate intervened — or, rather, the Sri Lankan navy, which quickly surrounded the boat and forced Kumari and her fellow passengers back to the country they were trying to flee. For two weeks, they've been staying in a makeshift refugee camp at a church here on Sri Lanka's northwest coast, only about 18 miles from India.

The people here are desperate to escape the conflict convulsing their hometowns, a spasm of violence that threatens to plunge this island nation back into all-out civil war after a few years of fragile peace. Since December, the Sri Lankan military and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam have turned their official cease-fire into a fiction with near-daily attacks and counterattacks.

On Thursday, 64 people were killed when two mines blew apart a bus in the deadliest attack since the truce.

Diplomats are scrambling to get the parties back to the negotiating table and away from a war of attrition that has killed more than 64,000 people in the last 23 years. But no one is betting on a quick return to calm, certainly not the 2,000 Sri Lankans who have crossed over to India since April or the 500 others who have flocked to this area hoping to follow suit. A dozen people have drowned making the attempt.

"If the government says we have to go back … they can shoot us and take our bodies," said one elderly woman who declined to give her name for fear of reprisals against family members who stayed behind. "Or we'll pour gasoline on ourselves and burn ourselves to death. We won't go back."

Nearly all the would-be refugees come from around the eastern port city of Trincomalee, where clashes have been heaviest, including bomb attacks, shootings and slashings. They are ethnic Tamils, the minority group in whose name the rebels claim to be fighting to establish a homeland in the island's north and east, separate from the Sinhalese-dominated south and west.

The rebels, known as the Tamil Tigers, are a fierce and disciplined force, notorious for pioneering suicide bombings, recruiting children and wearing cyanide capsules around their necks for use in the event of capture. The U.S., Britain and Canada classify the Tamil Tigers as terrorists; the European Union just added the group to its list of terrorist organizations, a move the rebels warn will exacerbate tensions.

But those who have fled Trincomalee also fear the Sri Lankan army, with its history of harassment of Tamils and alleged summary killings. When the bodies of five Tamil youths were found on a beach this year, suspicion immediately fell on government security forces, most of whose members are Sinhalese.

"Our kids can't go to school, and if our menfolk walk along the road, they get fired on by the army," said Nisha Dharshan, 24. Her father and brother have now made it over to India.

Dharshan and many of the others housed here at St. Lawrence's Church are from the village of Uppuveli, an area of stunning white-sand beaches lapped by turquoise waters, a paradise for the tourists who started coming back after peace descended in 2002.

That blissful calm was punctured last year when a statue of the Buddha was suddenly erected near Trincomalee's main square, a step local Tamils, who are mostly Hindu, saw as aggression by the Buddhist Sinhalese.

The town's delicate ethnic and religious mix then turned into a volatile brew, with tit-for-tat violence culminating in a bomb that exploded in the marketplace April 12, killing at least five people. The Tamil Tigers were blamed, and a vengeful Sinhalese mob went on a rampage, setting Tamil shops ablaze and hacking some people to death — half a dozen people died in the retaliatory violence — while soldiers and police officers looked on, witnesses say.

The elderly woman who refuses to go back to Trincomalee said she was shopping at the time but was lucky enough to be inside a store that swiftly locked its doors. Her niece was caught outside.

"I saw her being killed when I was peeking through the door. She was trying to get into a three-wheel taxi when these guys pulled her out and killed her," the woman said. "I couldn't do anything. If I'd gone out there, I would've met the same fate."

Two weeks later, a female suicide bomber blew herself up in the capital, Colombo, in an assassination attempt against the Sri Lankan army chief, who survived. The government retaliated by pounding rebel positions around Trincomalee.

Since then, attacks and brutal reprisals have been almost daily occurrences. In particular, the rebels have used claymore mines against the military with lethal effect.

Yet both sides insist that the cease-fire remains in place. That is because the agreement is the only blueprint for peace out there, and neither the government nor the guerrillas can politically afford to walk away from it and resume a full-scale war, even if the peace process remains in effect stalled.

"Neither side wants to be seen as the aggressor," said Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, executive director of the Center for Policy Alternatives in Colombo. "But constituting a real cease-fire, and providing a bridge to real political negotiations — that is not happening."

Although critics condemn the Tamil Tigers for pushing the conflict into a "low-intensity war," they also accuse President Mahinda Rajapakse of failing to show leadership in addressing Tamil demands and of appeasing the hard-line Sinhalese nationalists who helped him win election last November.

Newly complicating the picture is a third party: a breakaway Tamil rebel leader known as "Colonel" Karuna, whose followers have engaged in murderous fighting with the main group. The Tamil Tigers say that Sri Lankan forces, in violation of their agreement, have provided havens for Karuna loyalists in government-held areas and allowed — if not actually connived in — the renegade rebels' assaults on their former comrades in arms.

Late last month, a diplomatic coalition including the U.S. issued a statement declaring that "the government has failed to prevent attacks of armed groups, including Karuna."

Sri Lankan officials deny any collusion with the breakaway faction. But observers note that in February, when the two sides agreed to meet for another round of peace talks in Geneva, the tally of dead that month dropped to nine, a dramatic decrease from 101 in January.

In all, about 700 people have been killed in the conflict since December.

Determined not to be among them, Dharshan and members of her extended family in Uppuveli gathered up what they could stuff into a few suitcases and made their way here to Mannar Island, a tiny trigger of land connected to the rest of Sri Lanka by a causeway.

Local fishermen offered to transport them to India's southern state of Tamil Nadu, home of many ethnic Tamils, for $100 a head. On May 24, they took the gamble — and got caught.

Now Dharshan and her two children live with other would-be refugees in a classroom marked "Grade 8" on the St. Lawrence's Church school campus in Talaimannar, on Mannar Island's westernmost tip.

Aid groups are providing regular meals and helpful villagers are letting the refugees use their toilets, but many of those housed here don't intend to stay. As soon as they can scrounge up enough cash, they'll make another attempt to get to India, perilous as the crossing may be.

"If we die," said one matriarch, "we die as a family."

As U.N. Inquiry Drags On, Syrians Ask If They Should Relax (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, June 15 — Even as the United Nations Security Council voted Thursday to extend the investigation into the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, there was a sense here that the pressure was off, that Syria was no longer in imminent danger of being charged with the crime or punished by the international community.

"After 14 months, there is no concrete evidence that incriminates Syria," said Georges Jabbour, a Baathist member of Parliament. "Since the world rushed to blame Syria, I think that the damage to Syria's image is something that must be rectified by those who are responsible."

But that view was only half the picture. There was also a feeling here that Syria might simply be sitting in the eye of the storm. Officials at the highest levels fear that the new low-key investigator, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, may in the long run prove more dangerous than his high-profile predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, according to political analysts and people who work with the government.

Mr. Mehlis named names and leveled charges against the leadership's inner circle, providing a target for the government to try to undermine, which it did aggressively. By comparison Mr. Brammertz has disclosed little about what he may or may not have come up with, leaving those in power to guess where he is going.

"They are worried inside, but they are not showing it," said Marwan Kabalan, a professor of international relations at Damascus University, speaking about the Syrian leadership. "Under Mehlis, everything was clear to everybody. There were no secrets. This is why Brammertz is more dangerous."

Faced with such uncertainty, but also empowered by the release of immediate pressure, the leadership here has tried to shore up its position, bracing for the day when, or if, a damning report is produced.

The government has strengthened ties with Iran, arrested opposition leaders and sought to pacify Islamists. Perhaps most striking, it has worked to appease Washington by trying to seal the borders with Iraq and by planning to send the foreign minister to Baghdad this week, an overture being portrayed as an effort to help stabilize Iraq.

The assassination of Mr. Hariri in February 2005 was a critical moment in Syria's modern history. Even while the government insisted it did not play any role in the killing, the murder generated so much pressure that Damascus was forced to pull its troops out of Lebanon. The humiliating withdrawal fueled rumors that the government was in trouble.

The pressure intensified when the first prosecutor reported that witnesses implicated the president's brother and brother-in-law in planning the assassination, while telling the Security Council that the Syrians were defiant about not cooperating.

But the murder of Mr. Hariri can no longer be viewed as a singular act — if it ever could. It is one strand among many that have come to define the contemporary Middle East, from the election of Hamas to run the Palestinian Authority, to the bloodshed in Iraq. Those events have strengthened the Syrian government's position, even if only for the short run.

Syria's own problems with Islamic militants have also proved to be a short-term plus for the government. Earlier this month, Syria reported that its security forces killed four armed terrorists in Umayyad Square during a shootout. Diplomats and analysts in Syria have been saying for months that Islamist radicals have been debating whether to bring the fight here, and the recent shootout demonstrated that some have decided to try.

But for the government, the Islamist threat offers the government a chance to press back against efforts to undermine or oust President Bashar al-Assad and his secular Baathist government.

"Practically, for Syria, America won't be able to occupy Damascus anytime soon," said Dr. Samir al-Taqi, who serves as a health adviser to the government and is helping to build a new research organization focusing on international relations. "They won't embark tomorrow on attacking Iran. Subsequently, the major players are the regional players."

But as is the case with most of the good news for Syria these days, this is conditional.

The United Nations investigator, Mr. Brammertz, issued his most recent report to the Security Council this week, and it was immediately viewed as positive for Damascus.

But a more subtle look at the investigation also suggested that Mr. Brammertz had settled on the notion that the crime had political motivations. More ominously to Syrian officials, he appeared to be linking Mr. Hariri's killing to 14 other bombings in Lebanon, political analysts here said.

"The pressure is off but not finished," said Ibrahim Hamidi, the Damascus bureau chief for a pan-Arab newspaper, Al Hayat. "The sword is still at the Syrian neck."

Somalia Contact Group Meets For First Time (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, June 15, 2006

A U.S.-organized group of nations concerned about the growing power of Islamic militants in Somalia lent its support Thursday to the country's weak interim government and demanded unfettered access so aid groups can help its impoverished people.

In its first meeting, the International Somalia Contact Group also called for dialogue between the government and the Islamic militants who have taken over the capital Mogadishu and other areas of the lawless country after months of fighting that have killed more than 330.

"We look forward to further progress in the ongoing political process, including with respect to Mogadishu and the need for improved security," the group said in a statement released after its meeting.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier, who co-chaired the meeting, said the group "will help to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support."

The statement agreed to at the end of the meeting reaffirmed that the transitional government and the charter it abides by were a "legitimate and viable framework" for resurrecting Somalia.

The contact group was part of U.S. efforts to put renewed focus on Somalia after the militants took over, though officials acknowledged there was little they could do now for the East African nation. It has been without a government for 15 years.

The United Nations helped set up the interim government two years ago. But based in the town of Baidoa, it has been unable to enter the capital and has little control.

The interim government was formed at the insistence of the United States, which backed the warlords defeated by the Islamic fighters. U.S. officials fear the Islamic groups are harboring al-Qaida members and other terrorists.

"The reality is that unless you have some form of peace agreement and some form of peace, there's nothing to stabilize, there's nothing to get a grip on," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones-Parry said.

Several diplomats described the meeting as a bid to come up with a new strategy for dealing with Somalia after years of neglect. For now, that would most likely mean deferring to the African Union and the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development, a group of seven Horn of Africa nations that includes Somalia.

They said Thursday's meeting reflects a change in tone after 10 years in which Somalia has barely surfaced on the international community's agenda even though it is a failed state.

The international community turned away from the country after a 1993 battle that killed 18 U.S. troops — the basis for the "Black Hawk Down" book and movie — and a U.N. peacekeeping mission ended in failure in 1995.

Osama bin Laden considered the subsequent withdrawal of U.S. troops from Somalia his first victory against America.

"What we need to do first is get a better understanding of the situation in the country," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "It's premature to frame this in terms of decisions or potential decisions at this point."

The new group consists of the United States, Britain, Sweden, Norway, Tanzania, Italy and the European Union, with the U.N. and the African Union as observers.

It will also study the Somalian government's decision Wednesday to approve Ugandan and Sudanese peacekeepers for the country. The prospects for an actual mission are unclear because the Islamic militants are opposed to foreign troops.

Some European officials have said an arms embargo on Somalia should also be eased so its government can develop a police force and army.

Six Nations Urge Talks In Somalia For Exiled Rulers And Islamists (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The United States joined five other countries yesterday in calling for negotiations between Somalia's largely powerless government in exile and the Islamists who have seized control in Mogadishu and swaths of southern Somalia.

The diplomats also pledged economic and political support to Somalia's long-neglected interim government, which was formed with United Nations support but has been unable to enter Mogadishu, the previous capital, and has been stuck in Baidoa, about 150 miles away.

A communiqué issued after the hurriedly convened meeting is filled with diplomatic but nonspecific references to the need for "enhanced multilateral engagement" and "overall co-ordination of the international community's support."

The countries in the group are the United States, Britain, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Tanzania.

The document represents a resurgence for the State Department, where officials have been critical of the Bush administration's policy on Somalia, which consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords to help them defeat the Islamists.

With the warlords now on the run, critics inside and outside the administration are saying that strategy was counterproductive, leaving Washington with no allies in an area that has been fertile breeding ground for terrorists.

Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations publicly took on the old policy yesterday. "I would not have supported the warlords," he told a news conference when asked about American involvement. "I don't think I would have recommended the United Nations or the Security Council supporting the warlords."

In any event, Washington is adopting a more conciliatory approach to the Islamists. Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's top Africa official, had kind words yesterday about a second letter from Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group.

"Before our meeting, we received a letter from the Islamic Courts Union," Ms. Frazer said. "They said they won't allow Somalia and Mogadishu to become a haven for terrorists, and that's encouraging."

Mr. Ahmed and the Islamic Courts Union seized control of Mogadishu last week. The first letter to the international community was also conciliatory, saying that the Islamists wanted a "friendly relationship."

But Ms. Frazer questioned why the Islamic militias were continuing to push north into other Somali towns.

...

"What is the purpose, what is the intent?" Ms. Frazer asked.

DOJ_NMG_0034859

Somalia has not had an effective central government since early 1991, when largely clan-based warlords overthrew its dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. Last week, American-backed warlords fighting against Islamists were run out of Mogadishu. Washington fears the Somali Islamists may be harboring operatives of Al Qaeda.

The United States began informally reaching out to Somali clans in late 2002, shortly after an attack on a hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, and a failed attempt to shoot down a plane bound for Israel from Mombasa. Washington was seeking intelligence about people suspected of being members of Al Qaeda, said a recent report by the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization with extensive experience in Somalia.

But while that approach brought a few successes, it may also be part of the reason for the Islamic resurgence in Somalia, which is far better known for clan loyalty than for adherence to strict Islamic codes.

Yesterday's communiqué also called on the international community to increase relief assistance to Somalia. There are some 250,000 displaced people in Mogadishu, and Jan Egeland, the United Nations emergency relief coordinator, said he told the diplomats, "Somalia today is one of the worst human crises on earth."

"It's a place where people do not go to school but become child soldiers and terrorists," Mr. Egeland said after the meeting.

Norway and the United States were co-chairmen of the meeting. Norwegian diplomats initially proposed talks on Somalia in April, approaching the Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council. Last Friday, four days after the Islamists announced they had taken control of Mogadishu, American officials announced that they would convene a meeting.

Diplomats say the next step is to figure out how to channel money — perhaps through the World Bank and other institutions — to Somalia's interim government and, through relief agencies, to the Somali people.

Somalia Demonstrators Reject Peacekeepers (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, June 15, 2006

Hundreds of supporters of the Islamic group that holds Somalia's capital and much of the south demonstrated Thursday against a proposal to deploy foreign peacekeepers.

A day earlier, the country's weak transitional parliament approved the deployment of Ugandan and Sudanese peacekeepers to help it establish stability and its authority. That could set the government up for a confrontation with the Islamic fighters, who have repeatedly rejected the idea of foreign troops.

While the Islamic fighters are consolidating their hold over southern Somalia, the government is relegated to Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu. A demonstration in favor of peacekeepers was held in Baidoa Thursday.

In Mogadishu, the demonstrators gathered at the main stadium carrying placards that read, "We don't need foreign peacekeepers," and "We can restore peace and stability ourselves."

The transitional government, whose military consists of little more than the president's personal militia, has watched from the sidelines as the Islamic forces overcame a coalition of secular warlords to take control of southern Somalia. The Islamic forces took Mogadishu on June 6.

U.S. officials have acknowledged backing the warlords against the Islamic group. In response to the Islamic militia's growing power, the United States convened a meeting on Somalia in New York on Thursday.

The Islamic group, accused by the United States of harboring al-Qaida, portrays itself as free of links to Somalia's past turmoil and capable of bringing order and unity.

The Islamic group's control over southern Somalia is a feat unmatched since the fall of dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The country has had no effective central government since then.

Somalis Welcome The Quiet Brought By Islamist Takeover (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia - When he was 10, Abdullahi Nur began peddling machine guns and grenade launchers from a rickety stall on the edge of the Bakara Market, where the largest arms bazaar in Africa is flush with dollars from warring militias in this outlaw city.

DOJ_NMG_0034860

Over the years, Nur watched anxiously as Islamist factions tried to bring order to the dangerous capital, cracking down on drug traffickers, alcohol sellers, prostitutes and cinema owners. Nur worried that his lucrative trade would be next.

But now, at 25, even Nur is weary of the mayhem. He said he'd close shop if ordered to by the Islamic Courts Union, whose militia has brought a tenuous calm to Mogadishu after its surprise defeat of U.S.-backed warlords June 5.

"If the Islamists ban the sale of guns, we'll do it if it means 100 percent security here," Nur said with an air of resignation. "I can find other work."

To many Somalis, the Islamist takeover was the natural culmination of a religious movement that took root with the withdrawal of international forces in 1995 and blossomed as residents turned to faith in the absence of any government.

It's also a backlash against the United States, which everyone in Mogadishu believes bankrolled the warlords to carry out an American proxy war against terrorists that resulted in kidnappings of religious figures and false accusations that innocents were affiliated with al-Qaida.

"I used to close for five or 10 minutes every day because of the fighting, but now it is quiet," said Ali Sheikh Mahmoud, 45, who sells household goods in another section of the Bakara Market. "We are all Muslims. We agree with the Islamist movement for now, but we don't know what the future will bring."

The Bush administration, which has never confirmed that it's funded the warlords, also is worried about Mogadishu's future, suspecting that its new rulers are harboring some of the world's most-wanted fugitives, including at least three known al-Qaida terrorists.

On Thursday, a U.S.-organized "Contact Group" of American, European and African diplomats met in New York to coordinate policy toward Somalia. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Bush administration still needed more information. "We want to have a better assessment of this group and the situation on the ground," he said.

For now, Mogadishu residents said, the Islamic Courts is a vast improvement over the chaos of the last 15 years.

"Deep down, we're not sure 100 percent what's behind the Islamic Courts. But this is a new revolution for the people of Mogadishu, and for now they have full support," said Abdelkadir Mohamed Nur, a Somali-American businessman and the chairman of the city's main port, which employs 10,000 people.

He and other community leaders said the rise of conservative Islam in Mogadishu began when international groups fled the city but didn't truly flourish until about three years ago. By that time, this coastal city - which once boasted fine Italian architecture and bustling country clubs - had degenerated into a crumbling, barren battleground for gunmen from competing clans.

With no government, little foreign aid and neither law nor order, life in Mogadishu became a harrowing test of survival. Famine and fighting created Africa's largest group of internally displaced people - 250,000 of them in Mogadishu alone, the U.N. estimates, packed into squalid camps that are breeding grounds for disease and crime.

With the city too perilous for Western aid workers - the nearest U.N. presence is more than 30 miles away - Islamic charities from Saudi Arabia and Persian Gulf nations filled the void. Today, most schools in the capital teach in Arabic rather than Somali, using imported curricula that include mandatory religious instruction. The charities also established clinics and sponsored street cleanings.

The habits of their wealthy gulf benefactors seeped into the daily lives of traditionally secular Somalis. Men grew their beards and shortened their robes, considered signs of piety by some Muslims. A growing number of women adopted Saudi Arabia's full veil, which reveals only the eyes, but tweaked it to local tastes by using vivid turquoise and purples rather than the customary black.

"I wear this because of my own feelings, not out of imitation," said Kawthar Ali, 17, who wore a black veil, polka-dotted scarf and violet cloak to go shopping last week.

Somalis also became increasingly anti-American, community leaders said. A Somali entrepreneur opened the Ayman al-Zawahri cultural center, named after al-Qaida's Egyptian second in command, though in recent months it was shuttered and Zawahri's last name disappeared from the colorful facade. And workaday Somalis were incensed at their depiction in the film "Black Hawk Down."

DOJ_NMG_0034861

Clans set up courts governed by Islamic law to bring some semblance of order to the city. Last year, with just $4,000 in donations, the clans formed the Islamic Courts Union to deal better with the abductions and slayings that intensified in the vicious war between the U.S.-backed warlords and their Islamist opponents, according to several Somalis involved in the project.

They installed Sheik Sherif Ahmed - a geography teacher from a prominent clan and a long line of respected clerics - as chairman. Immediately, his heavily armed militia set out to control the streets, taking particular aim at the moorayaan, the freelance gunmen sometimes hired for the warlords' counterterrorism operations.

"I saw so many problems some people were bringing to the Muslims, especially our religious figures being captured and sold to the Americans, and that's what inspired me to join," said Abdel Fatah Ali, 25, a gunman in the Islamic Courts militia whose older brother died in the battle for Mogadishu. "The day the warlords were ejected, so many people were celebrating. I felt proud."

The courts also have imposed restrictions on the personal lives of ordinary Somalis.

Several Mogadishu residents, who asked that their names not be published for fear of retaliation, recalled a hand-grenade attack that closed a brothel, written threats to blow up cinemas that screened "Bollywood" films from India, and smuggling rings that brought the wayward children of Somali families abroad back home for religious and cultural indoctrination.

It's become hard to find expensive gin from Ethiopia and "calaq," cheaper Somali moonshine, they said. The Islamists also frown on cigarettes and the pervasive chewing of khat, an addictive plant with stimulant properties.

One hotel owner said Islamists warned him not to hold his annual New Year's party this year. When he persisted, a rocket-propelled grenade interrupted the festivities. Next year, he said, there'll be no party.

To many Somalis struggling to raise families in their anarchic city, a pious lifestyle is a small price to pay for security.

At Madina Hospital, the number of patients admitted with gunshot wounds has dropped steadily since the Islamist ascension, hospital administrator Ali Mualem Mohamed said. At the height of the fighting earlier this month, he said, the 65-bed hospital was flooded with 170 patients, and all but a handful were civilians caught in the crossfire.

As of last week, 54 patients remained, including a 10-year-old girl whose shoulder bone was shattered by a stray bullet, a 40-year-old mother whose chest was filled with shrapnel from a mortar round and an 18-year-old man whose brother accidentally shot him with the rifle the family keeps at home for protection. Mohamed said he welcomed the quiet.

Classes have resumed at the Alpha School, where Omar Mahmoud, 42, struggles to teach civics to teenagers who've never known a government. Students might even take their finals on time now that the violence has subsided.

But there are changes. More girls are turning up in all-encompassing veils and a group of boys dropped out, explaining that they were off to fight for Islam.

Mahmoud said he had serious doubts about the Islamic Courts, but that he was desperate for any group that could prevent his two young children from growing up with the question his students put forth every year.

"Always they ask me, `What is a government?' It is only a theory for them," Mahmoud said. "I tell them, `One day you'll have one, and you'll play an important role.' We're just pacifying them, trying to encourage them."

US Can't Afford To Ignore Young Militant, Somali Leaders Say (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia - Even in the violent, anarchic landscape of Mogadishu, Adan Hashi Ayro stands out.

Some describe him as a ruthless holy warrior, a student of the Taliban and a relentless fighter who can scale walls and jump from moving trucks without dropping his weapon. Others offer a more sympathetic portrait of a misguided young militant who is at odds with his own clan, bitter over foreign meddling in Somalia and the scapegoat of U.S. agents who needed to put a face on their enemy.

Somali community leaders agree, however, that the United States can't afford to ignore Ayro, who they say was crucial to the recent victory of the militant Islamic Courts Union over U.S.-backed warlords. If Ayro splits with the Islamic Courts' relatively moderate leadership, he could form an army of extremists prepared to attack American interests in the Horn of Africa, they fear.

"The Courts have a very extremist wing, and maybe Adan is leading this wing. He is said to be the real commander of the fighting, the mastermind," said Abdullahi M. Shirwa, a secular peace activist who supported the Islamic Courts as an antidote to Mogadishu's violence and disorder. "This is a critical time. The United States should not threaten the Islamic Courts with bombings or military action. They should show a deep and committed plan for Somali reconstruction."

U.S. officials met with Somali counterparts in New York on Thursday to help craft a new policy toward the impoverished, battle-scarred country, which has had no real government for 15 years. Many here urge the Bush administration to try to begin a dialogue.

"Go straight to the Islamists and see what they have achieved," said Osman Hassan Ali, a member of Somalia's figurehead transitional government whom American forces detained during fighting in the 1990s. "If the U.S. pushes too much, then they will go against everything. But at least open the dialogue, create some trust."

An International Crisis Group report last year named Ayro as the "main protagonist on the jihadi side" and implicated him in the assassinations of four foreign-aid workers and at least 10 Somali former military and police officers.

"The group is also believed to have helped al-Qaida operatives in Somalia with logistics, jobs, identities and protection, and to operate training sites," the report said.

Ayro, said to be in his late 20s or early 30s, is a relative and protege of a commander of a now-disbanded militia. The Crisis Group report says Ayro was sent to Afghanistan for training and, by at least one account, arrived on the eve of the American offensive against the Taliban after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He didn't return to Somalia for several months.

Sheik Sherif Ahmed, the chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, confirmed in an interview with Knight Ridder that Ayro had been in Afghanistan, but he declined to offer details. Ahmed said his group didn't shelter al-Qaida or other terrorism suspects and that U.S. claims to the contrary were false.

"Adan is a normal citizen, a Somali individual trying to contribute," Ahmed said. "Anyone can go to Afghanistan, and people like Adan should not be blamed for it."

In Mogadishu, several Somalis who've met Ayro or know him through his clan said they doubted he was the terrorist chief portrayed by international intelligence agencies.

"He looks like a starving kid," said Ali Iman Sharmarke, a managing partner of HornAfric, a media group in Mogadishu whose radio station last year broadcast the only known interview with Ayro. "I think they are blowing him out of proportion, but that is the culture of the Americans. They have to create a monster so they can take action. Unfortunately, the monster they `create' then becomes a monster."

Sharmarke, who's met Ayro twice, said most Somalis had never heard of the militant until January 2005, when Ayro's forces dug up a colonial-era Italian cemetery in Mogadishu, removing the remains from about 300 Italian graves. Part of what's now Somalia was an Italian colony until World War II.

Sharmarke said the desecration was in part to embarrass Ayro's clan because it had failed to defend him when the forces of a U.S.-backed warlord, seeking a senior al-Qaida suspect, raided Ayro's house. The suspect wasn't there, according to the Crisis Group report, but raiders found a bomb-making manual and Ayro's brother-in-law, a fugitive who was wanted in connection with assassinations in the Somaliland region.

Ayro's role in the recent battle for Mogadishu is in dispute, though all Somali officials said he was crucial to victory. Some said he was valued for the insurgent tactics he allegedly picked up from the Taliban. Others said his battlewagons, equipped with antiaircraft artillery used as ground weapons, were able to penetrate even the best-defended warlord positions.

Somalis here said Ayro represented a faction of Islamic Courts supporters who came of age in vicious, modern-day Mogadishu and were less educated and more dogmatic than the older clerics who form a moderate majority. Many think the moderates can stay in power only if the United States and other interested countries engage in negotiations without recriminations.

"If they come with the mentality that the Taliban is there, let's get them out, we will see a very harsh Courts that's probably capable of driving out 20,000 peacekeepers, like what happened in the past," Sharmarke said.

Somali Militias Decry Terrorists (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0034863

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

NAIROBI, June 15 -- The leader of Somalia's increasingly powerful Islamic militias sent a letter to the United States this week asserting that they would assist international efforts to prevent the fractured, chaotic country from becoming "a transit route or hiding ground" for terrorists.

The letter, dated Wednesday and sent to the State Department and the embassies of several other countries, gives a direct though conciliatory response to concerns by U.S. officials that the Islamic militias harbor terrorists linked to attacks across East Africa, including the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania.

In the three-page letter, Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the loosely organized confederation of Islamic militias that took control of Mogadishu, the Somali capital, last week, compared international terrorists such as al-Qaeda to the brutal warlords who had ruled the city since 1991.

"Our communities have been subjected to terrorism longer than any community anywhere else in the world," he said in the letter. "Some of our leaders' families had the unfortunate experiences of loved ones being kidnapped, tortured and murdered at the hands of the warlords and criminal gangs during the last decade. We feel the pain of all people who had to face tyranny of terrorists and organized criminals. Our commitment in this regard is steadfast."

Meanwhile in New York, the United States met with key African and European governments to forge a new international strategy on Somalia. The meeting of the so-called International Contact Group on Somalia marked a renewed effort by the State Department to engage on Somalia.

The group, which included representatives from the United States, Italy, Norway, Sweden and the European Union, issued a communique after the meeting that urged all Somali parties to begin negotiations with the country's U.N.-backed but largely powerless transitional government. It also vowed to step up support for the government and press for greater access for aid workers.

Diplomats said Sweden would host another meeting next month.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier said after the meeting that the group would strive "to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support."

Frazier sounded upbeat about the willingness of Somalia's Islamic militias to accommodate the international community. "They have clearly signaled to us that they are someone that we can work with," she said.

Frazier defended U.S. dealings with the secular warlords, who portrayed themselves as part of an anti-terrorism alliance and enjoyed U.S. support.

"We've never supported anyone to fight anyone else," Frazier said. "We have supported trying to get information from whoever we can get information, about particular terrorists like Harun Fazul, who was indicted for attacking our embassies. And we will continue to seek informtion from any and every party to try to get these guys turned over."

The issue of terrorism in Somalia has loomed over the political and military developments there in recent weeks. As residents of Mogadishu have signaled support for their new rulers, Western countries have expressed fears that the militias are a reincarnation of the Taliban, the former leaders of Afghanistan who practiced a severe form of Islam and allowed Osama bin Laden to set up a base.

The Islamic militias, which Thursday continued extending their control throughout southern Somalia, grew out of a decade-long effort to bring order to Mogadishu in the absence of a federal government. The courts relied on Islamic law, or sharia , and banned pornography, cut off the hands of thieves and ordered public execution of murderers.

But in the past week, the militias have mounted what amounts to a public relations campaign, portraying themselves as moderates interested in bringing peace and security to their country.

The letter, the Islamic militias' most detailed statement yet about their intentions, included promises that a civilian police force would soon be installed and that former militia members would be demobilized to work on such public works projects as street cleaning and tree planting. A letter sent last week to foreign governments said the militias wanted "a friendly relationship with the international community."

DOJ_NMG_0034864

The mayor of Mogadishu, Mahamud Hassan Ali, warned in an interview Thursday that only a rapid, massive infusion of cash and other outside help could prevent the Islamic forces from tilting toward extremism and turning Somalia into a haven for terrorists.

Ali, who was born in Somalia but moved to Minneapolis in 2000, was appointed mayor of Mogadishu by Somalia's transitional government. He said last week's victory by the Islamic militias had delivered the best chance for peace and stability in 15 years.

Ali disputed suggestions by U.S. officials that Mogadishu harbors terrorists but said extremist forms of Islam could appeal to the city's disaffected, largely uneducated youth. Preventing that, he said, would require that significant rebuilding efforts, financed mainly by the West, begin in the next two months.

"Somalia could become the biggest place for al-Qaeda or anybody else," he said in an interview in Nairobi, a regional political and economic hub where he has spent the week seeking help from diplomats.

The courts that brought Islamic law to Mogadishu also could become more severe in their punishments, he said.

If Somalia is neglected and left as it is, he said, "sharia may get strong."

US, Russia Reach Deal On Securing Soviet WMD (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Russian officials have agreed on terms for a seven-year extension of programs that provide U.S. money and expertise to secure and destroy Soviet-era caches of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

The agreement resolves legal disputes that threatened to derail the programs, which send hundreds of millions of dollars a year to Russia for “cooperative threat reduction” efforts. It will be signed by week's end, according to Frederick Jones, a spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council.

“The agreement ensures that critical cooperation with Russia continues to combat the proliferation threat posed by large quantities of Soviet legacy weapons of mass destruction and missile(s),” Jones says.

The cooperation programs, initiated in 1992, comprise a broad range of initiatives meant to reduce the risk that old Soviet weapons of mass destruction will fall into the hands of rogue states or terrorists. Projects include constructing facilities to lock down nuclear material and warheads; strengthening security at labs storing dangerous biological pathogens; developing special facilities to destroy chemical weapons; and dismantling long-range missiles and bombers.

Bush has hailed the programs as an important part of the administration's efforts to keep terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction. But the programs' future has been in flux since 2004 due to a U.S.-Russian dispute over liability protections for U.S. companies, workers and government personnel working at Russian weapons sites.

The original agreement governing the projects gave U.S. workers blanket protection from liability for damages in case of an on-site accident. That might include, for example, the accidental release of nerve gas at a chemical weapons disposal facility. But Russia was reluctant to continue that arrangement based on concerns that it would indemnify U.S. workers even for intentional acts of sabotage.

The new pact essentially retains the same blanket protections for U.S. workers involved in projects already underway. For new projects, the countries will develop liability protections that are not as sweeping as the current agreement.

William Hoehn, a non-proliferation expert at the Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council, said the new agreement would ensure that old Soviet weapons stocks are properly secured and disposed of.

Britain May Take Liberian Ex-Ruler (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

LONDON, June 15 — Britain said on Thursday that the former Liberian president, Charles Taylor, might serve his sentence in a British prison if he is convicted at his forthcoming war crimes trial.

The announcement paves the way for Mr. Taylor, who is being held in Sierra Leone on charges related to his role in that country's bloody civil war, to face trial in The Hague. The Netherlands has agreed to be host to the trial, but only on the condition that Mr. Taylor would not serve his sentence there if convicted. Other European countries have refused to allow Mr. Taylor to serve any sentence within their borders, but Britain, the former colonial power in Sierra Leone and a country that sent troops there in 2000 to help end the war, said it had started the process, "and we want to finish it," in the words of Lord Triesman, the minister for Africa.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign minister, said the decision to take in Mr. Taylor, who has been charged with 11 counts of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other violations, was evidence of Britain's "commitment to international justice."

"I am delighted to be able to respond positively to the request of the United Nations secretary general that, should he be convicted, Charles Taylor serve his sentence in the U.K.," Mrs. Beckett said.

Mr. Taylor stands accused of financing the rebel force in Sierra Leone, the Revolutionary United Front, by selling diamonds on its behalf and then supplying it with arms. In a decade-long war that left 50,000 people dead and countless others maimed and displaced, the rebels were notorious for raping civilians and for using machetes to kill people and to hack off limbs and other body parts.

The trial is to be held in the International Criminal Court complex in The Hague under the auspices of the United Nations-backed court established in Sierra Leone to try people suspected of atrocities in the war, which lasted from 1991 to 2002.

Mr. Taylor, who was arrested in March 2006, is to be tried in The Hague because of fears that trying him in West Africa, where he still has allies, would further destabilize a region trying to recover from its wounds.

Britain To Imprison Liberia's Taylor If He's Convicted (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 15 -- Britain agreed Thursday to jail former Liberian president Charles Taylor if he is found guilty of responsibility for atrocities in Sierra Leone, ending an impasse that for months had delayed his transfer to The Hague to stand trial before a war crimes tribunal.

"I was delighted to be able to respond positively to the request of the United Nations secretary general that, should he be convicted, Charles Taylor serve his sentence in the U.K.," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in London. "My decision was driven by two compelling arguments. Firstly, that Taylor's presence in Sierra Leone remains a threat to peace in that region. Secondly, that we are demonstrating through concrete action the U.K.'s commitment to international justice."

Taylor faces 11 counts of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other violations of international humanitarian law. The United Nations-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone was set up in 2002 to prosecute those bearing greatest responsibility for atrocities committed by rebels under Taylor's sway in the Sierra Leone civil war, which lasted from 1991 to 2002. Taylor has said he is not guilty of the charges.

Beckett's announcement ends a protracted U.N.-led effort to locate a country that would be prepared to detain Taylor.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the decision. "I am very grateful to Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett for this statesmanlike decision, which marks another step forward in our battle against impunity for the most heinous crimes," Annan said at a news conference at U.N. headquarters.

Taylor was arrested March 29 in Nigeria, where he lived in exile since being forced to give up the Liberian presidency in 2003. Taylor sought to flee Nigeria after Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, requested this year that he be surrendered to the Sierra Leone court to face trial. He was captured as he tried to slip across the border and flown to Monrovia, Liberia, where he was detained by U.N. peacekeepers and transferred to a prison in Sierra Leone.

The court's president asked to try him in another country because of concerns that Taylor supporters could threaten members of the court and possibly help him escape. The Netherlands agreed to allow the Sierra Leone court to carry out its trial at the headquarters of the International Criminal Court, on the condition that another country agree to take Taylor. Several countries, including Austria, Sweden and Denmark, had refused to take him.

Beckett said the decision still requires approval by the British Parliament. But Britain's U.N. ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said he would seek passage of a Security Council resolution on Friday to authorize Taylor's transfer from Sierra Leone to a prison cell at the headquarters of International Criminal Court.

Taylor launched a bloody insurgency in Liberia in 1989, where he ruled as a warlord before being elected president in 1997. While in power, he supported rebel movements in neighboring countries, including Sierra Leone, and contributed to instability across West Africa.

He faces charges of backing Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front, which killed, raped, enslaved and mutilated thousands of civilians during the civil war.

In Oil-Rich Angola, Cholera Preys Upon Poorest (NYT)

By Sharon LaFraniere

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

LUANDA, Angola, June 10 — In a nation whose multibillion-dollar oil boom should arguably make its people rich enough to drink Evian, the water that many in this capital depend on goes by a less fancy name: Bengo.

The Bengo River passes north of here, its waters dark with grit, its banks strewn with garbage.

Two dozen roaring pumping stations suck in 1.3 million gallons from the river each day, filling 450 tanker trucks that in turn supply 10,000 vendors across Luanda's endless slums. The vendors then fill the jerry cans and washtubs of the city's slum dwellers, who buy the water to drink and bathe in.

This is one reason, health experts here say, that Luanda's slums are now the center of one of the worst cholera epidemics to strike Africa in nearly a decade, an outbreak that has sickened 43,000 Angolans and killed more than 1,600 since it began in February.

But it is only one reason. Cholera typically spreads through contact with contaminated water or sewage, and in Luanda's slums, both are everywhere. Neighborhoods here are ringed by mountains of garbage, often soaked by rivulets of human waste. Only about half of slum dwellers have even an outdoor latrine.

Children stripped to their underwear dance through sewage-clogged creeks and slide down garbage dumps on sleds made of sheet metal into excrement-fouled puddles.

Much of the city has no drainage system; in heavy rains, the filthy water rises hip-high in some of the poorest dwellings.

One development group estimated that it would take 22,000 dump trucks to clear away the trash. That was in 1994, when Luanda had half the population of 4.5 million it has now.

"I have never seen anything like it," said David Weatherill, a water and sanitation expert for Doctors Without Borders, which is leading the response to the epidemic. "You see conditions like this on a smaller scale. But I have never seen it on such a huge scale. It is quite shocking."

Angola is in the midst of a gusher in oil revenue, its hotels crammed with oil executives and its harbor filled with tankers carrying away the 1.4 million barrels of crude pumped here each day. The economy grew by 18 percent last year. The government racked up a budget surplus of more than $2 billion.

This year it is expected to take in $16.8 billion in revenue, well over twice the $7.5 billion it received in 2004. Next year, revenue is expected to rise by a third again, almost all because of oil.

Economists say the government simply has more money than it can spend.

Yet it seems powerless to address even the basic issues of clean water and sewers that would make such epidemics entirely preventable — a paradox that critics attribute to corruption, incompetence or the hangover of a 27-year civil war that flooded the capital with refugees, or all three.

"We are talking about a government that has the means," said Stephan Goetghebuer, East Africa coordinator for Doctors Without Borders. "There are a lot of things they could be doing. The living conditions are really terrible, and they are terrible even if you compare them to other places in Africa."

Sebastião Veloso, Angola's health minister, said the scope of the problem defied a quick fix. "We just do our best," he said. "The lack of infrastructure is a very complicated administrative problem. We are doing our part at the Ministry of Health, and the rest of government must do its part. We are pressuring the government, because otherwise these epidemics will continue."

Only one in six Luandan households is lucky enough to have running water, and for many of them, it comes from a community standpipe, according to Development Workshop, a nonprofit group in Angola. The often-contaminated river water from trucks that roam the slums costs up to 12 cents a gallon — a hefty sum in a nation where two-thirds of the people live on less than $2 a day, and up to 160 times the price paid in better-off neighborhoods with piped water.

So the poor ration their water use, limiting themselves to about two gallons a day per person for drinking, bathing, washing clothes and cleaning. That is far below the five-gallon daily minimum recommended by the United Nations — and one twenty-sixth the average use in Western countries, according to Doctors Without Borders.

In an attempt to beat back the epidemic, the government, with the help of the United Nations, is distributing a limited amount of free clean water. The few distribution points are easy to spot. Hundreds of people rise before dawn to set their plastic buckets in lines that stretch for blocks. The crowds remain long after the water is gone.

One afternoon last week, dozens of people crowded around one empty plastic water tank about eight miles from downtown. "They are waiting for the last drop," said José Mateus, a neighborhood coordinator.

No one knows precisely why cholera arose out of the slums this year after a cholera-free decade in Angola. Epidemiologists say the long absence of the disease worsened the outbreak because the population had no built-up immunity.

Once it began, not even the tidiest slum household could halt it.

It first hit Boa Vista, a shantytown minutes from downtown. Ombrina Cabanga, a 20-year-old mother of a 2-year-old girl, did everything to protect herself, said her sister-in-law, Oriana Gabriel. She washed vegetables, rinsed plates and cleaned the latrine the family shares with three others. As the Health Ministry recommended, she used bleach to disinfect the drinking water she bought from the neighborhood vendor.

But her house is a few feet from a giant trash-filled gulley. Her latrine, like everyone else's, drains directly into it. And she sold soap every day in the city's famously squalid outdoor market, a job she hoped to escape by taking adult literacy classes.

One Tuesday in late March, she came home and vomited into a bucket. Two nights later, she was dead.

"I am just a working man, I don't know why the government doesn't help us," said her husband, Vieira Muieba, 27, a construction worker. "I don't know where the money goes. We become angry but we don't know what to do."

From Boa Vista, the epidemic moved along the major highways to all but 4 of the nation's 18 provinces. Maria André lost her 15-year-old daughter, 13-year-old niece and 4-year-old nephew in the span of two days. Five other children in the household were also taken ill but recovered.

Ms. André is racked with guilt nearly three weeks after the deaths. "I don't know what happened," she said. "I heard about the disease on the radio, and all of a sudden, it was here. They were all healthy and now, they are dead.

"It is not easy to lose three children all at once."

Angolan government officials say there is no overnight solution to the lack of basic water and sanitation. In late May, President José Eduardo dos Santos promised new measures to improve conditions, including moving Luandans out of the most appalling slums.

But the government's plans are in their infancy and, despite the gusher of oil revenues, short on financing.

Consider the government's plan to take over some of the provision of water to Luanda's slums. Four months into Angola's cholera epidemic, 20 trucks have been ordered — minuscule compared to the fleet of more than 300 private trucks now supplying the poor. As of early June, Mr. Veloso, the health minister, was still waiting for the first delivery.

The government's harshest critics blame corruption for the abysmal living conditions. Transparency International, which promotes good governance worldwide, ranks Angola as the world's seventh most corrupt nation. The State Department said in a 2002 report that Angola's wealth was concentrated in the hands of a tiny elite, in part made up of government officials who had enriched themselves on an enormous scale.

Other diplomats and analysts say Angola's ruling party is still trying to get on its feet after a civil war that raged almost nonstop from 1975, when Angola gained independence from Portugal, until mid-2002.

Dauda Wurie, a project officer for the United Nations Children's Fund, said the war had eviscerated the government's corps of competent managers, leaving disarray.

"I am not defending them," he said of the government officials. "They buy big cars. They live in big houses. But it would be wrong to expect that everything will turn around just because war stopped."

DOJ_NMG_0034868

Doctors Without Borders officials say the government response to the outbreak has been woefully slow and underfinanced. A crisis committee began work only two and a half months after the epidemic began, and the government has set aside a mere $5 million in emergency money to fight the disease.

Assessing the water taken by private truckers from the Bengo fell to Doctors Without Borders. Last month it issued its report: laboratory tests in April showed the raw river water was unsafe to drink.

But only one in 10 truckers chlorinated water tanks; the others simply delivered untreated water to the city.

Presented with those findings, the government did nothing, the report states. So Doctors Without Borders organized the distribution of free chlorine. It now plans to insist that the truckers pour chlorine crystals into their tanks while inspectors watch, lest they sell them instead.

How much those truckers — and the neighborhood vendors they supply — earn in profits is unclear. But Janetta Jamela's bedroom in eastern Luanda is one hint. Fifteen bags of concrete are stacked against the wall — to add three new bedrooms and a new kitchen and bathroom.

Since she and her husband scraped up $200 to build an underground water tank three years ago, she estimated, she has earned about $235 a month selling water — $75 a month more than her husband earns as a government security officer.

"But you have to have the $200 to start with," she said.

The cholera epidemic is now waning, having run what epidemiologists call its natural, devastating course. But without an improvement in slum conditions, said Mr. Weatherill, the group's water and sanitation expert, the respite may last only until the next rainy season.

"Unless things change, we probably will be back the next year," he said in a telephone interview, "and the year after that."

Uganda Shaken By Fund Scandal (WT)

By Willis Witter

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

KAMPALA, Uganda -- Uganda, which continues to win praise from President Bush and others as a model of success battling AIDS, is reeling from the disclosure that top officials, their relatives and colleagues siphoned off tens of millions of dollars in grants from the Geneva-based Global Fund.

Money went to charities that did not exist, into the personal bank accounts of government employees and even to fund a nationwide campaign to scrap term limits so that President Yoweri Museveni could run for a third term in office.

The most prominent official named was Jim Muhwezi, who served as health minister until being sacked last month. Two other senior ministry officials, Alex Kamugisha and Mike Mukula, also were named, with a recommendation that they be further investigated.

"This is the big leagues," said Justice James Ogoola, when asked to compare this week's American scandal over hurricane relief to the findings of a 10-month investigation that he just completed.

"This was assistance for people who were dying, who had absolutely no hope. This is exactly what the Global Fund was created for. The money came, and people were diving in for the kill," said Justice Ogoola, the top judge in Uganda's High Court.

Since its creation in 2002, the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria has committed $5.1 billion in grants to more than 130 countries to fight the three diseases that kill more than 6 million people each year. As of last year, the United States had given the fund $1.49 billion, according to the fund's Web site.

In addition to contributions from governments, rock star Bono and other celebrities have helped raise hundreds of millions of dollars from corporations and private charities such as the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

The disappearance of a large amount of money first became public in August, when the fund abruptly suspended a $200 million grant. Mr. Museveni responded by appointing Justice Ogoola to investigate, and the fund lifted the suspension three months later.

"We didn't hold a single in-camera session. It was all public hearings, and we did that quite deliberately, so the people of Uganda could see with their own eyes what was going on," the judge said.

Immaculately dressed in a dark suit, he sat ramrod straight behind a huge mahogany desk, his hands folded as he answered a reporter's questions with a soft, deep voice.

Between September and April, he and a panel of investigators interviewed 150 witnesses and reviewed more than 500 exhibits, mostly documents.

"The government did everything they could to facilitate the inquiry. They set it up and never interfered," Justice Ogoola said.

The probe yielded a barrage of banner headlines, unprecedented live radio and television coverage and constant chatter on talk shows.

A preliminary report given to Mr. Museveni in a public ceremony May 31 and published in the Daily Monitor newspaper three days later recommends criminal investigation of "three personal assistants" for forgery and other crimes.

A final copy of the report is being bound and prepared for public release shortly, one official said.

The investigation uncovered typical tokens of corruption, including brand-new luxury cars and junkets to exotic cities, such as Paris and Oslo.

The scandal centered on a newly created organization within the Health Ministry, known as the Project Management Unit (PMU), which funneled $47 million from the fund to about 400 private organizations, known as nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

Many of the NGOs existed only on paper.

PMU paid grossly inflated salaries to its 15 professionals and 20 support staff, who often doubled their take-home pay with generous and largely undocumented expense allowances.

Much of the money disappeared into personal bank accounts of PMU employees and final grant recipients, who sometimes wrote large personal checks to their supervisors.

A bank that received nearly $20 million wired from Geneva in U.S. dollars skimmed about $245,000, by using an artificially low exchange rate.

In all, about $37 million of the money remains unaccounted for.

"You could count the number of honest recipients with two hands, and even they were not without sin," Justice Ogoola said, his face cringing ever so slightly as he spoke.

Problems have surfaced with other recipients of Global Fund money, including Burma, which has been cut off completely. Local newspaper reports tell of similar problems accounting for money in Kenya.

The Global Fund disbursement was poorly conceived in the first place, said Onapito Ekomoloit, the press secretary for Mr. Museveni.

"The message was vague. It was for workshops, and people were cooking up all kinds of numbers and books to justify the money. It was just talk. Talk, talk, talk, and anybody could claim the capacity to do it," Mr. Ekomoloit said.

It could have been worse, as less than 25 percent of a $200 million grant had been disbursed.

Future money from the Global Fund is earmarked for HIV, malaria and tuberculosis drugs, Mr. Ekomoloit said.

"It will be much easier to keep track of," said Justice Ogoola.

Annan Sees No Standoff Over Budget At The U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Thursday that he thought the United Nations would avoid a threatened budget showdown at the end of this month over management changes, but he warned against threats to "pull the plug" on the organization if it did not meet some countries' expectations.

"The cap on the budget will be lifted, there will be no crisis, as far as I can see, this month," Mr. Annan said at a news conference.

Led by the United States, the major contributors to the United Nations in December obtained agreement on a six-month cap on the current budget that links disbursement of money after June 30 for the two-year, $3.8-billion budget to progress in management improvements.

DOJ_NMG_0034870

In addition, John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador, has periodically hinted that if sufficient changes are not made, the United States Congress will move to withhold its United Nations dues.

Mr. Annan predicted that the progress being made now would be sufficient to forestall a crisis, but he added that the tactic pressed by the United States had provoked a strong reaction from many nations.

"For someone to say that because you have not reformed to my satisfaction, I am going to pull the plug and stop all the activities is going to be a very hard sell for other member states to swallow — and rightly so," he said.

Mr. Bolton said Thursday that the United States and its allies were in extensive consultations with the so-called Group of 77, which represents 132 developing nations.

"We hope we can agree on a consensus decision with respect to the expenditure cap which the United States, the European Union and Japan all said should be based on substantial movement on the reform question by June 30 and a road map through the end of the year," he said.

Mr. Bolton said the group was adopting a "flexible, accommodating position" but needed to make progress to increase accountability, toughen oversight and start eliminating committees with expired mandates. "What we'd like to see is substantial progress in some combination in all three of those areas, but we have not said, 'This is a prerequisite or that is an absolute prerequisite,' " he said.

Relations between Mr. Annan and Mr. Bolton remained strained in the aftermath of a speech last week by Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, asserting that the United States had failed to stand up for the United Nations or to acknowledge its value to American policymakers, letting its harshest American detractors dominate debate.

Mr. Bolton unsuccessfully sought a repudiation of the remarks from Mr. Annan, and he said they represented a patronizing attack on American public opinion. He added that they would set back the cause of reform.

Mr. Annan disagreed with that position on Thursday, saying that a "poisonous" atmosphere that had arisen between wealthy and developing nations was subsiding and that he trusted Americans to understand Mr. Malloch Brown's speech. "I do not think they will read the Mark Malloch Brown statement as insulting, condescending or rude," he said.

But Mr. Bolton was unrelenting on Thursday. "I can tell you that criticism of the intelligence of the American people is never a smart thing to do politically," he said.

"And I do believe that the comments have had a negative impact politically and that impact continues," he added. "I'm not trying to dwell on it, I just think it's a fact of life, and if you don't realize it, you're blinking reality in Washington."

U.N. Given Reprieve On Spending Cap By U.S., EU (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United Nations appears to have postponed a financial crisis that threatened to dim the lights at the end of June, as the United States and other key governments have agreed to extend its spending authority.

Washington had imposed a spending cap, set to expire at the end of the month, in an effort to ensure that difficult management reforms were not delayed until the end of the usual two-year budget cycle.

But U.N. officials and diplomats say that the United States, Japan and other nations are not willing to see the lights go out -- yet.

"The cap on the budget will be lifted. There will be no crisis, as far as I can see, this month," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday during a press conference that touched on crises in Somalia and East Timor, and the field to succeed him as secretary-general.

He noted that "the tensions and poisonous atmosphere" that marked earlier discussions had dissipated.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who negotiated the six-month spending authority with other countries in late December, said yesterday that the Bush administration, European Union and Japan have been meeting with the powerful bloc of 132 developing nations and were working toward a consensus on how to streamline the organization to mutual satisfaction.

"Our positions were quite in accord with one another," said Mr. Bolton, stressing Washington's flexibility. "We have tried not to draw lines in the sand."

Specifically, the big donors want to make the organization more efficient and responsive by streamlining administrative matters and consolidating more power in the hands of the next secretary-general.

But a bloc of 132 poorer nations fear that the Secretariat will be beholden to large donors, and are reluctant to give up their own negotiating power in the General Assembly.

They have two weeks before the cap expires, but Mr. Annan said he has not yet felt the need to raise the issue during regular phone calls with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"I believe that perhaps the sense of crisis has been exaggerated," said Pakistani Ambassador Munir Akram, whose country has been a vocal member of the developing nations. "The budget cap, one way or another, will be lifted. I hope it's unanimous, so that no one feels they will have a reason to withhold their money in the future."

Mr. Akram, who with Canadian Ambassador Alan Rock has been serving as a liaison in the negotiating process, indicated that key sticking points remain.

Tensions between the international organization and its host country are still raw.

Asked by reporters yesterday about his relationship with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Annan firmly replied, "I work with him as I work with 190 others." And Mr. Bolton who spoke harshly of Mr. Annan's deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, for telling a left-leaning gathering that the American heartland does not understand the United Nations' positive aspects repeated criticisms yesterday.

"I can tell you the criticism of the intelligence of the American people is never a smart thing to do, politically," he said in response to reporters' questions. "The comments have had a negative impact, politically, and that impact continues. I'm not trying to dwell on it but it's a reality in Washington."

Mr. Annan yesterday repeated that he supported his deputy's remarks, and noted that the comments about Middle America had been misconstrued.

The UN Serves US Interests (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

You could touch John Bolton's pain. Last week, the occasionally irascible US ambassador to the United Nations assailed that organisation's deputy secretary-general. Some saw a crude attempt at bullying. More interesting, I thought, was the anguish behind the rage. For all Mr Bolton's bluster, George W. Bush's administration has acknowledged that acting effectively in the world requires legitimacy as well as power. No one hates the idea of admitting this more than its ambassador in New York.

During the past 18 months or so, American foreign policy has been stranded in an uncomfortable no-man's land between hubris and reality. Mr Bush has abandoned the assumption of unbridled hegemony that underpinned the decision to go to war in Iraq. In its place is the reluctant pragmatism that now sees Washington ready to open negotiations with Iran. But the administration has not changed its ideological spots. It still shuns the institutional internationalism that secured US leadership during the second half of the last century.

The proximate cause of Mr Bolton's invective was a speech given by Mark Malloch Brown. The deputy secretary-general had the temerity to suggest that the US should face up to the deliberate ambiguities of its attitude to the UN. When it suited it, he said, Washington saw the organisation as a useful instrument to promote its interests. In between, it played to a raucous gallery of anti-UN prejudice among segments of the media and Middle America.

Mr Bolton is accustomed to plain language – as long, that is, as he is the one delivering it. The ambassador, I have heard a US official observe, is one of those people who calls a spade a spade. The downside, this official lamented, was that to Mr Bolton's eye almost everything looks like a spade.

So a UN bureaucrat telling America how to behave was never going to elicit a friendly response. Mr Bolton's temper has not been improved by the knowledge that the clock is ticking fast on his own career. He was sidelined by Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, in the recent decision to offer talks to Iran. A refusal by the US congress to ratify his appointment means that his term in New York expires early next year.

Given his role as an international civil servant, Mr Malloch Brown's observations were brave. In objective terms they were essentially unremarkable. The admonition, as he explained, was aimed at successive US administrations rather than simply

Mr Bush. Though the US had created the present global architecture, its politicians rarely felt comfortable with selling the advantages to their voters.

My guess is that there are no more than a handful of officials at the US state department who would balk at this broad analysis. Fitful engagement has rarely, if ever, served US interests. But, for Mr Bolton, Mr Malloch Brown's remarks exposed a deeper sore. The ambassador is right to say that the UN's largest paymaster has the capacity to wreck the organisation. The threat, though, is empty. The important question is whether the US needs an effective UN. The answer the Bush administration has given, pace Mr Bolton, is yes.

Iraq has shown the limits of military might in general and of American intervention in particular. As Mr Malloch Brown suggested, it has thrown up new international coalitions intent on balancing US power. Many of the sensible and necessary reforms of the UN advocated or supported by the US are opposed by some non-aligned nations simply because they bear Washington's stamp. Suspicion of his motives, in other words, has shackled a ball and chain to Mr Bush's ankle.

Mr Malloch Brown might have gone further. Anti-Americanism has become the principal countervailing force to US power. That was confirmed again this week when a 15-nation opinion poll by the Pew Research Center reported a further weakening of international respect for the US. In most nations, the US presence in Iraq is seen as a greater threat to world peace than Iran's nuclear ambitions.

All this is anathema to Mr Bolton. As an official in the state department, he epitomised the assertive nationalism that drove US foreign policy during Mr Bush's first term. Scornful of international institutions and law, he openly celebrated America's muscular unilateralism.

The administration has travelled halfway back from this position. It has accepted, albeit grudgingly, the value of legitimacy in the exercise of power. It still instinctively favours coalitions of the willing over rules-based multilateralism but has at least begun to make the effort.

The big test now is Iran. The suspicion of US motives to which Mr Malloch Brown alluded has weakened the impact of Washington's offer to join negotiations with Tehran. Many non-aligned nations are asking themselves whether the démarche is a genuine effort to secure a negotiated end to the stand-off over Iran's nuclear ambitions or simply a tactical manoeuvre to bind the UN into supporting punitive sanctions.

My guess is that it is a bit of both. Circumstance – a vast army pinned down in Iraq, the threat of violent confrontation between Israel and the Palestinians and evidence that the UN security council was close to fracture – forced a volte-face in Washington. But the success or otherwise of the new diplomatic effort will rest to a significant degree on the judgment of others on Mr Bush's motives.

Iran, of course, also provides a challenge for others. China insists on the exclusive legitimacy of the UN in the ordering of international relations. Its willingness or otherwise to allow the security council to act if Iran persists in the quest for a nuclear weapons capability will say much about whether China intends to become a responsible global actor.

For Russia's Vladimir Putin, the choice will be between the vanity of wielding a veto and real authority in the security council. The European troika of France, Britain and Germany must show that, when the going is tough, they are ready to give multilateralism a hard edge.

The big choice, though, is for the US. If the wilder ambitions of Mr Bolton have been decisively checked by Iraq, America remains the indispensable power. How it exercises that power determines the shape and stability of the global system. We can probably expect no more of this administration than its reluctant conversion to pragmatism. But one of these days an American president needs to explain that Roosevelt and Truman were not altruists. They built the UN because, for all its inevitable flaws, it serves American interests.

Move Over, Che: Chávez Is New Icon Of Radical Chic (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034873

BOSTON -- Hugo Chávez, the fiery president of Venezuela, has called President Bush a "donkey," a "coward," a "drunkard," and, most famously, "Mr. Danger." Such statements win him few friends in Washington, but they recently brought together a dozen ardent supporters here.

Over a cramped conference table in a Chinatown loft, the group, including several engineers, a student, a nurse and couple of full-time activists, met to plot their next move. They'd helped lead a pro-Chávez demonstration in Washington just a few weeks earlier. And a pro-Chávez movie night seemed old hat.

Jorge Marin, a Boston engineer, had a different idea: a birthday party for Mr. Chávez's idol, Simón Bolívar, who helped liberate South America from Spanish rule. They quickly started planning a "Boogie for Bolívar" party, complete with a birthday cake, on July 24, when "the Liberator" would have turned 223. Two young women also pushed for a dance band.

To a slice of the American left, Mr. Chávez has become a revolutionary hero nearly on a par with Che Guevara and Fidel Castro. The 51-year-old Venezuelan president has used his nation's oil riches to prop up Mr. Castro's regime and improve the education and health care of Venezuela's poor. His dream is to spread the Venezuelan brand of socialism across Latin America.

Human-rights groups and the Bush administration warn that he is also dangerously centralizing power, emasculating Venezuela's judiciary and threatening press freedoms. Chavistas wave off those complaints as the ravings of the anti-Chávez U.S. media.

"My political belief is that the U.S. is a horrendous empire that needs to end," says Jake Irwin, a Chávez supporter at Evergreen State College in Olympia, Wash., which is pretty much what Mr. Chávez argues. Every time Mr. Chávez clashes with Mr. Bush -- most recently over the Venezuelan's torpedoing of a U.S. effort to create a hemispheric free-trade agreement -- his stock rises with the amalgam of college students, antiglobalization protesters and graying allies of Central American rebels.

For 54-year-old Chuck Kaufman, national co-coordinator of the Nicaragua Network, Mr. Chávez is also a business opportunity. The network, run out of a converted grocery store near a housing project in Washington, was formed in 1979 to support the leftist Sandinista rebels, who toppled a U.S.-allied strongman. But after voters ousted the Sandinistas, the Nicaraguan network eventually slashed its staff to three from 13. Now, Mr. Kaufman sees a new market in Mr. Chávez. The bearded former advertising rep for a model-airplane magazine recently helped create the Venezuela Support Network, which he figures will energize backers, and may help him land a big-time donor: Venezuela's government-owned U.S. refiner, Citgo Petroleum Corp. "No luck so far," he says. Citgo says it only backs requests "in line with corporate programs."

Other Chávez supporters have formed support groups known as Bolivarian Circles. (Mr. Chávez is so taken with Bolívar's efforts to create a united South America that he renamed his country "The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.") In Venezuela, the circles are neighborhood associations that run local health clinics and literacy classes. They have a darker side, too: helping the government identify opponents, who are then denied remedial education and other government services, according to a study by Brigham Young University scholars Kirk Hawkins and David Hansen.

The 20 or so U.S. Bolivarian Circles, which each have one or two dozen members, view themselves as advocates for the Chávez regime. New York, San Diego and Boston have Bolivarian Circles; South Florida has three -- one each in Miami and Fort Lauderdale and a third at Florida International University in Miami-Dade County. So do places far from a Latin beat, including Cincinnati and Salem, Ore. The insignia of the Oregon Bolivarian circle is a bust of Bolívar in front of Mount Hood.

There is a long history of Americans embracing Latin American revolutionaries, dating at least to Nicaraguan rebel Augusto Sandino, who battled U.S. Marines in the 1920s. Others include Mr. Castro and his comrade Che, and the man known as Subcomandante Marcos, who led a short-lived rebellion in the Mexican state of Chiapas in 1994. All were symbols of defiance romanticized by intellectuals of the day.

Fifty-three-year-old Gunnar Gundersen says he formed the Oregon Bolivarian Circle in 2002, after becoming outraged at a failed coup attempt against Mr. Chávez. On annual trips to Venezuela with his Venezuela-born wife, Xiomara, Mr. Gundersen was impressed by Mr. Chávez's efforts to improve health care and education for the poor. He couldn't understand why the U.S. press didn't see it his way, so he and a dozen like-minded Oregonians began to sponsor pro-Chávez movies, college lectures and rallies.

His activities landed him an appearance on Mr. Chávez's Sunday television show, "Aló Presidente," in 2004. Mr. Gundersen, who often wears red knit shirts -- red being the color of the Chávez revolution -- read an English translation of a stanza of one of Mr. Chávez's favorite songs. Then he handed the Venezuelan leader a copy of the Oregon circle's nonprofit registration, which Mr. Gundersen claimed meant the Oregon circle was "recognized by the state of Oregon." Clearly touched, Mr. Chávez called him a "brother" and said to the audience, "Look how far this is going in the world."

Now, Mr. Gundersen, whose day job is managing a study-abroad program for Japanese college students in Oregon, figures he spends several thousand dollars a year crisscrossing the U.S. for pro-Chávez events. These included a March "National Solidarity Conference" in Washington, where the several hundred delegates chanted the Chávez rally cry, "Oh, ah. Chávez no se va!" (Roughly: "Oh, no. Chávez won't go!")

The Philadelphia circle has produced three pro-Chávez videos, including one about oil workers who helped keep the state-owned oil company operating despite an anti-Chávez strike. The Fort Lauderdale circle bought 35 wheelchairs for Venezuelan hospitals and, in return, the Venezuelan government sent 200 Spanish-language versions of "Don Quixote" for Broward County libraries. A Fort Lauderdale circle member, Ali Gutiérrez, broke into a Spanish love song as the books were handed over.

The circles aren't funded by the Venezuelan government, but they help the country's lobbying efforts by presenting a sympathetic face of the Chávez regime and helping organize tours of the country. Moisés Naím, a pre-Chávez Venezuelan trade minister who is now editor of Foreign Policy magazine, believes the circle members "are shamelessly exploited by the regime." But Bernardo Alvarez, Venezuela's ambassador to the U.S., says the groups operate on their own and "help us counteract the campaign that there isn't freedom of expression in Venezuela."

The circles applauded this past winter when Citgo says it provided about 40 million gallons of low-cost home heating oil to 181,000 households in the Northeast. So did True Majority, an Internet-based advocacy group founded by Ben Cohen of Ben and Jerry's fame, which sent emails to its 500,000 members urging them to purchase Citgo gasoline -- a "buy-cott," as activists call it.

Financing Controls Ordered In China (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI, June 15 -- China's premier, Wen Jiabao, has ordered banks and local governments to tighten financing for construction projects, the state media reported Thursday, signaling growing unease among top leaders that an ongoing surge of investment is imperiling the world's fastest-growing major economy.

China's leaders are again grappling with the prospect that excessive economic growth -- erecting more factories and office towers than even this giant country can use -- could give way to a disastrous bust and cause prices to plunge. That could leave China's banks, stocked with about $500 billion in bad loans, facing an even larger toll.

"The main problem in the operation of the economy is the high growth rate of fixed asset investment and too much currency lending," declared China's State Council, the functional equivalent of a cabinet, in a statement published in the state media Thursday, the day after a meeting chaired by Wen. "Structural problems are obvious."

The latest cause for concern came as the government released figures showing that growth in fixed asset investments in urban areas -- essentially, large public works projects, factory construction and commercial real estate development -- reached $318 billion for the first five months of the year, up more than 30 percent over the previous period.

That data came a day after the release of numbers showing an alarming expansion of bank lending, with total loans for the first five months of the year reaching $224 billion -- about 85 percent of the central bank's target for the full year. In May alone, new loans exceeded $26 billion, almost double the same month in 2005. In China, where stock and bond markets remain in early stages of development, the banks are the primary source of capital.

"Banks must take notice of the trend of accelerating loan growth and the risks that this brings," the People's Bank of China declared on its Web site. "Banks must abide by the spirit of the macroeconomic controls that the central government is currently implementing."

Economists parsing the high-level rhetoric saw signals that new, more stringent measures are in the offing aimed at reining in the economy. China has already raised the minimum down payment for purchases of apartments to cool real estate speculation. On April 28, the central bank raised interest rates by 0.27 percentage points, to 5.85 percent, and it might now do so again. The bank's governor, Zhou Xiaochuan, recently disavowed that option, but he told reporters on the sidelines of a conference in Beijing on Thursday that he would now take some unspecified steps to limit the money supply, according to Dow Jones.

China might also allow a rise in the value of its currency, the renminbi, or yuan, an act long sought by manufacturing groups in the United States, who argue that Chinese factories are racking up huge export sales with unfair help from artificially cheap money.

"The message sent by the State Council meeting is strong, and it illustrates their recognition of a possibly overheated economy," said Ha Jiming, chief economist at China International Capital Corporation Ltd., the country's largest investment bank. "Policymakers are determined to step in to control the situation."

Much of the cash now sloshing through the banks is the result of speculators bringing currency into China to bet on an eventual increase in the value of the renminbi, Ha said. "Policymakers could remove the heat from the economy by speeding up the process" of allowing the Chinese currency to climb, he said.

Of particular concern to China's leaders is the prospect that greater waves of investment will worsen a glut of production capacity in key sectors of the economy, particularly in automobile and steel manufacturing, which could diminish prices and erode profits.

That is prompting some companies to unload excess goods on world markets, a trend that partially explains why China's global trade surplus is growing faster than ever. China's trade surplus reached $13 billion in May, the government announced this week, a record for a single month. Exports grew by 25 percent compared with the previous year. That brought China's surplus for the year to $47 billion, a jump of 57 percent compared with the same period last year.

Those figures are sure to intensify trade frictions with the United States, while amplifying demands that China raise the value of its money.

For more than two years, China has been grappling with how to gradually restrain its economy without dampening things so much as to jeopardize the creation of jobs for millions of farmers now streaming into the cities. Two years ago, amid worries of overheating and spiking prices for commodities such as coal and iron ore, Beijing ordered a halt in lending to the fastest-growing areas of the economy. China also forced developers to put down larger slices of their own capital for new projects rather than rely entirely on bank loans.

Late last year, those measures appeared to have put China in reach of a soft landing, the gradual slowdown its leaders desired. But the recent data have has rekindled worries, along with the expectation of stronger measures ahead.

"There have to be measures to contain the desire of local governments to invest more in infrastructure while preventing banks from over-lending," said Zuo Xiaolei, chief economist at China Galaxy Securities Co. in Beijing. "Otherwise, medium- and long-term bad debts will pile up. and overcapacity in sectors like steel and cement will be exacerbated."

Who Is To Blame For Grief On A Beach? (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

It was another one of those pictures that goes instantly around the world. A young Palestinian, wailing in wretched sorrow, grieving over her dead father, stepmother and five siblings who had been killed by an explosion on a Gaza beach. Then came the blame. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas (he's the moderate) immediately called the killings an act of Israeli "genocide" and, to dramatize the crime, legally adopted the bereaved girl.

The sensational coverage and sensational charges raise the obvious question: Why would Israel deliberately shell a peaceful family on a beach?

The Israeli government, clumsy as ever, seemed to semi-apologize by expressing regret about the deaths, implying that perhaps they had been caused by an errant Israeli shell targeting a Palestinian rocket base. But then, a few days later, an army investigation concluded that it was not Israel's doing at all.

First, because the shrapnel taken from the victims (treated at Israeli hospitals -- some "genocide") were not the ordnance used in Israeli artillery. Second, because aerial photography revealed no crater that could have been caused by Israeli artillery.

And, third, because Israel could account for five of the six shells it launched at the rocket base nearby, and the missing one had been launched at least five minutes before the one that killed the family.

An expert at a local chapter of a human rights group disputes the Israeli claims. Okay. Let's concede for the sake of argument that the question of whether it was an errant Israeli shell remains unresolved. But the obvious question not being asked is this: Who is to blame if Palestinians are setting up rocket launchers to attack Israel -- and placing them 400 yards from a beach crowded with Palestinian families on the Muslim Sabbath?

Answer: This is another example of the Palestinians' classic and cowardly human-shield tactic -- attacking innocent Israeli civilians while hiding behind innocent Palestinian civilians. For Palestinian terrorists -- and the Palestinian governments (both Fatah and Hamas) that allow them to operate unmolested -- it's a win-win: If their rockets aimed into Israeli towns kill innocent Jews, no one abroad notices and it's another success in the terrorist war against Israel. And if Israel's preventive and deterrent attacks on those rocket bases inadvertently kill Palestinian civilians, the iconic "Israeli massacre" picture makes the front page of the New York Times, and the Palestinians win the propaganda war.

But there is an even larger question not asked. Whether the rocket bases are near civilian beaches or in remote areas, why are the Gazans launching any rockets at Israel in the first place -- about 1,000 in the past year?

To get Israel to remove its settlers, end the occupation and let the Palestinians achieve dignity and independence? But Israel did exactly that in Gaza last year. It completely evacuated Gaza, dismantled all its military installations, removed its soldiers, destroyed all Israeli settlements and expelled all 7,000 Israeli settlers. Israel then declared the line that separates Israel from Gaza to be an international frontier. Gaza became the first independent Palestinian territory ever.

And what have the Palestinians done with this independence, this judenrein territory under the Palestinians' control? They have used their freedom to launch rockets at civilians in nearby Israeli towns.

Why? Because the Palestinians prefer victimhood to statehood. They have demonstrated that for 60 years, beginning with their rejection of the United Nations decision to establish a Palestinian state in 1947 because it would have also created a small Jewish state next door. They declared war instead.

Half a century later, at the Camp David summit with President Bill Clinton, Israel renewed the offer of a Palestinian state -- with its capital in Jerusalem, with not a single Jewish settler remaining in Palestine, and on a contiguous territory encompassing 95 percent of the West Bank (Israel making up the other 5 percent with pieces of Israel proper).

The Palestinian answer? War again -- Yasser Arafat's terror war, aka the second intifada, which killed a thousand Jews.

This embrace of victimhood, of martyrdom, of blood and suffering, is the Palestinian disease. They are offered an independent state. They are given all of Gaza. And they respond with rocket attacks into peaceful Israeli towns -- in pre-1967 Israel proper, mind you.

What can Israel do but try to take out those rocket bases and their crews? What would the United States do if rockets were raining into San Diego from across the border with Mexico?

Now look again at that terrible photograph and ask yourself: Who is responsible for the heart-rending grief of that poor Palestinian girl?

A Tale Of Two Oil Patches (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Canada's province of Alberta and the country of Mexico are both renowned oil economies and in both places, the government owns the oil reserves. But that's where the similarities between the two end.

Alberta has an annual per-capita gross domestic product just shy of $55,000; Mexico's is roughly $6,000. To put it another way, Albertans are swimming in their black gold while Mexicans are swimming the Rio Grande for the right to wash dishes for Tom Tancredo's constituents, while the congressman hurls insults at them on cable TV.

Why, in the midst of this energy boom, is Mexico so poor, while Alberta lives large? My guess is that it has to do with the fact that the Canadian province welcomes private-sector investment (otherwise known as money) in its energy sector while Mexico has a government-owned oil monopoly (Pemex) and forbids private-sector risk capital.

Money in an economy has a way of making people wealthier. Alberta estimates the long-term capital investment value of its inventory of privately funded energy projects at almost $80 billion. Mexico has made such investment illegal, creating a lack of funds. We call this poverty.

The idea of a virtual wall to stop risk capital from entering Mexico is so dumb that only a political class actively pursuing poverty could be perpetuating it in today's global economy. With oil at $70 a barrel, the opportunity costs of Mexico's monopoly energy policy are skyrocketing. That's not the only problem. Pemex's union pensions are unfunded and Mexico's proven reserves are shrinking. If nothing is done to change the model, Mexico's oil sector and Pemex retirees are both in real jeopardy.

Yet for some reason this abject failure -- against the reality of Alberta's success -- has yet to become a winning issue in Mexican politics. In the July 2 presidential race, the hard-left candidate of the Democratic Revolutionary Party, Andres Manuel López Obrador, is running on a pledge to protect Pemex as is.

This champion of old, authoritarian Mexico from the desperately poor, oil-rich state of Tabasco is now in a statistical dead heat with the more free-market National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon. Mr. Calderon has timidly suggested that, yes, perhaps Mexico might open the energy market to some private investment but he has not made it a major issue in the campaign.

Voters are rational but not necessarily informed. That's what political debate is for. Unfortunately, Mexican politicians seem to have concluded that Pemex -- the Mexican symbol of sovereignty against the mighty North -- is the third rail of politics and it's best not to go near it. If that's the case, the past is prologue.

But if some enterprising politician decides to communicate the magnitude of the problems looming at Pemex and the opportunity cost of failing to reform, Mexico could become something besides the international symbol for human-capital exports. The union might even sign onto reform in return for guaranteeing its pension. The Alberta experience is instructive.

Mexicans may be surprised to learn that despite the rush of private-sector investment in the province, both oil and gas reserves in Alberta belong to the provincial government, much as they belong to the national government in Mexico. This simple fact is bound to reassure a nation that has been brainwashed for nearly a century to believe that private investment means giving away its "oil patrimony."

In Alberta, provincial ownership has not stopped private exploration. Instead, Albertans are having their cake and eating it too. By utilizing land leases and oil-well licensing permits, the province welcomes billions of dollars of risk capital. This in turn employs people, creates secondary and tertiary wealth effects, pays for exploration, increases provincial revenues through royalties and covers the cost of land reclamation after resources are extracted. In other words, there has been no selling out to Yankee exploiters, only a common-sense policy of putting foreign capital to use for the betterment of the locals.

The results are impressive. Last year alone, the province attracted almost $50 billion in investment, going mostly to oil and gas and oil-sands development projects and to the service and manufacturing sectors that support them.

These two starkly different attitudes toward capital flows have also made for polar opposites in migratory and employment patterns. According to the Conference Board of Canada, Alberta's population is growing "by leaps and bounds." The board says that "net inter-provincial migration surged to 42,000 in 2005, and almost as many people are expected to relocate in the province in 2006." The board further states that despite the migration, "labor shortages are looming in key areas such as construction, drilling and engineering services, and even in lower paying service-oriented occupations." The unemployment rate in Alberta is 3.3%. Meanwhile Mexican culture is still too often defined by poverty, joblessness and emigration.

If all this is not enough to persuade Mexicans that their government is taking them for a ride, perhaps the demise of Pemex as a revenue generator will be. Pemex estimates that Mexico's reserves-to-production ratio dropped to 10 years in 2005 from 20 years in 2002. The company blames the central government for this, on the grounds that oil income has been going to other national purposes at the expense of reinvestment and exploration in the oil sector.

That may be true. But since when does a country have to choose between a robust economy and funding health care, education and infrastructure? And even when Pemex wins out over other demands on the central government and gets a relatively generous budgetary allotment like it did this year -- $13 billion in government and government-guaranteed funding -- the company is far short of what is needed to revive the energy sector. Corruption, low productivity and failure to maximize well development have all eaten away at returns. Did I mention that Pemex is notorious for environmental degradation?

Mexico's President Vicente Fox likes to talk about his concerns for the dignity of Mexican migrants in the U.S. But as long as the country clings to the Pemex monopoly, it will be hard to take Mr. Fox or any Mexican president seriously when he feigns concern for jobless Mexicans.

Icarus Inc. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

With the Concorde now mothballed or in museums, Airbus is fast becoming the current airborne testament to the hubris of state-led industrial policy in Europe. Driven as much by political ego as business sense, the aircraft maker flew for the sun only, like Icarus, to see its wings start to melt away.

The meltdown in the stock price of its parent company this week was dramatic, but no surprise. Markets don't like bad news, and Airbus has produced bushels of late. Wednesday's 26% drop, which shaved $6.3 billion from the market value of European Aeronautic Defense & Space Co. before rebounding some yesterday, came a day after Airbus announced that its superjumbo A380 won't be produced on schedule through 2010. Delays have plagued this marquee project.

Airlines are unhappy with Airbus's proposed A350, the competitor to Boeing's surprisingly popular 787 "Dreamliner," forcing the Europeans back to the drawing board, at significant cost. The EU taxpayer may, once again, pick up a big part of the bill through launch aid and other handouts, all for the glory of this "pan-European flagship." Any more state aid is likely to lead to another complaint against Airbus before the World Trade Organization in Geneva.

The troubles on the factory floor may not be as serious a problem down the road as the company's unwieldy -- and, on current evidence, unworkable -- management structure. Airbus was born of a French, German, British and Spanish government initiative. Its political patrons have kept their noses in the business since. No prize for guessing who does so more than any other. Last year President Jacques Chirac tried to install Airbus boss Noël Forgeard, who happens to be French, into the top job at EADS. The messy fight ended when a German executive was named to share the CEO job with him. Then this year EADS was pulled into France's scandal du jour, the murky "Clearstream affair," when Mr. Forgeard's former close aide admitted to supplying evidence (later declared a forgery) that linked leading politicians to corruption. Close ties to government can be a source of trouble, EADS learned, not just interest-free loans.

A fair conclusion, reached by the markets this week, is that an executive suite preoccupied with political mumbo-jumbo took its eyes off the superjumbo. With so much riding on the A380, the production glitches are a stunning indictment of management. The delays in delivering the plane will cost EADS $2.5 billion in 2007-2010. EADS yesterday launched a probe into the A380 program. The cost in terms of fines, canceled orders and lost future orders adds to the bill. The blow to prestige is far bigger.

It is instructive to note that Boeing itself was, only a few years ago, in a similar pickle. Two CEOs lost their jobs and a senior executive landed in jail, but Boeing got through painful restructuring, including deep job cuts, and made hard decisions (like refusing to fight Airbus for the A380 market) knowing that money was finite. Its updated product line is led by the "Dreamliner." Suddenly, Boeing is poised to dominate its market for years to come.

In its present guise Airbus, or EADS, looks ill-disposed to take this road. The dual management structure -- in fact an improvement on the previous consortium model -- makes the company, by nature, less flexible. So do its political links. State treasuries have been eager to build toys that boost national egos, to the tune of $15 billion in taxpayer handouts over the past three decades. The leaders of France, Britain, Spain and Germany were all on hand last year at the maiden flight of the A380. Financial realism was never a big part of the equation at Airbus. In return, the politicians expect the company to shun Anglo-Saxon-style restructuring.

No wonder that the big industrial shareholders are running for the doors. British Aerospace was right in the middle of negotiating to sell its 20% stake in Airbus back to EADS when the share price nosedived. France's Lagardere cut its stake in EADS in half, to 15%, in April. Germany's DaimlerChrylser, another big owner, is moving to do the same.

Tellingly, Airbus's fall from grace is portrayed as a blow to European pride rather than to the company's shareholders and millions of air travelers, who will suffer directly. This is the real trans-Atlantic gap. Americans tend to judge corporations by the bottom line, not the national flag. Europeans relate to big companies as to their World Cup teams. In this they get plenty of encouragement from politicians, in particular the Gallic variety, who think business is their business.

With a duopoly in aircraft manufacturing, we all benefit from having two healthy, competitive producers. Cut free from subsidies and politics, Airbus would be free to behave like a normal company. It is not that today.

Young? Bored? Win A Parliament Seat (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

If the young will line up to sing badly for national attention or eat worms for money, why not get them to compete for political office? That notion seems more suitable for a Hollywood treatment than an actual country, but it has apparently taken hold in parts of Russia, where political leaders have begun to worry that their Parliament is a little too heavy on middle-aged men.

Perhaps fearing that the under-30 set could take their political concerns to the streets — as in neighboring Ukraine and Georgia — President Putin's United Russia party decided it needed to reroute the young into the political system. So it decided earlier this year that at least 20 percent of its candidates should be under 28 years old.

Scaring up young people to enter the political party apparently turned out to be easier decreed than done. Russia's youth may have soured on a political system increasingly controlled from Mr. Putin's office. Or, perhaps like the young in too many other places, they just think politics is boring.

So, leaders of the Young Guard, the more youthful branch of United Russia party, decided on a kind of political version of "American Idol" or the Russian "Star Factory" talent contest. As detailed in The Washington Post, the competition began with questionnaires, and a first round of winners was announced by a D.J. at a beach party south of Moscow.

Some of the views of these competitors were surprising, like the young man who said Mikhail Khodorkovsky was jailed for his political views. That opinion certainly puts him at odds with Mr. Putin's administration, but the young man is apparently still in the running. In the end, after the 60 contestants are whittled down, at least three are expected to be awarded party seats in the Duma, the lower house of Parliament.

Russian politics is not exactly a model of democracy, of course, but maybe, for those trying to interest young American voters, a political reality show might not be such a bad idea. Let's face it, looking at the demographics, it could hardly hurt.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Threatens To Subpoena White House Documents On Surveillance Program (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0034883

AP, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter cranked up his dispute with the Bush administration over executive power on Thursday, threatening to subpoena documents on the White House's warrantless surveillance program.

Specter said he had not received a response to his request that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appear before the panel this month to answer questions about the surveillance program and other touchy subjects – such as the FBI raid on a lawmaker's office last month.

"I will ask for authorization for a subpoena if we do not get an adequate response," Specter told the committee.

Such prodding may not be necessary, according to the Bush administration.

"We are currently working with Chairman Specter to set a date for the attorney general to appear," Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said.

The Pennsylvania Republican, who won the administration's goodwill by ushering two of its nominees onto the Supreme Court in the last year, has engaged in an increasingly tense standoff with the White House over matters he believes could amount to abuses of executive power.

Under that umbrella fall several administration policies that Specter wants to examine and the White House has resisted explaining. The administration argues that the details are matters of national security and subject to executive privilege.

The policies include a probe into Bush's domestic surveillance program that has been dropped by Gonzales' Office of Professional Responsibility; revelations that the government, aided by telephone companies, is keeping records of calls made by Americans; the government's attempts to investigate and prosecute journalists who refuse to reveal their sources; and the FBI's raid last month on Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill offices as part of a bribery probe.

Specter also wants to examine the statements Bush issues when he signs bills into law, in which the president enumerates how he will interpret them.

"There's a whole litany of questions that the attorney general is going to have to answer," Specter said this week. "We're going to press him as hard as we can."

Congress Struggles To Ramp Up Oversight (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

Forty-four months after authorizing the use of force in Iraq, the House Thursday opened the floor to its first day-long debate about the war. A key theme: Keeping the White House accountable.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the Capitol, the Senate voted Wednesday to pay for future war costs through the regular budget process, rather than through "emergency" spending bills. It's a move lawmakers say will increase congressional oversight of the war.

At the same time, a Senate panel will grapple next week with how to oversee the National Security Agency's (NSA) warrantless surveillance of communication between Americans and suspected terrorists abroad.

The moves signal that Congress is trying - again - to revive its flagging oversight role of an executive branch that is claiming broad wartime powers. It's doing so, analysts say, because control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections could turn on the issue.

"The broader motivation in Congress by the majority party is clearly the sinking political fortunes of the president and the party and the fear of retribution in November," says Thomas Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a center-left think tank in Washington.

So far, however, both chambers of Congress have struggled to make headway. Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, for example, has repeatedly been stymied in his bid to bring the government's secret eavesdropping program in line with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. On Thursday, the Judiciary Committee he chairs postponed the consideration of four versions of legislation to require more oversight. The Senate Intelligence Committee is developing its own plan to strengthen supervision of the NSA program. "Congress's ability to conduct effective oversight depends on what political price the president has to pay for resisting congressional scrutiny," wrote Senator Specter, in an opinion piece Thursday.

So far, that price has not been high. And this week, one of the few congressional committees that had been cruising on a bipartisan basis stalled out on party lines over the issue of congressional oversight.

Last week, Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee called on Chairman Duncan Hunter (R) of California to reestablish the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which traditionally led probes of the Pentagon. Republicans did away with that panel when they took back the House in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0034884

"At the end of [Thursday's] debate, we are still going to be left with a House Armed Services Committee that is not doing the kind of oversight ... as has been done in past wars and past Congresses, regardless of what administration is in power," said Rep. Marty Meehan (D) of Massachusetts at a press conference on Wednesday.

Inertia has been strongest on the highest- profile investigations. Nearly two years after promising a report on whether the prewar intelligence on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq was politically manipulated, the Senate intelligence panel is still gridlocked over the terms of completing the investigation.

"[Democrats] keep moving the goal posts and asking for more information," says Sen. Pat Roberts (R) of Kansas, who chairs the Select Committee on Intelligence. In comments off the floor of the Senate, he said he expected the report to be completed by mid-July.

Senate Democrats, who can't offer any detail on the panel's secret work, say the Republicans are dragging their feet. "It's like the marquee on an old movie house that always reads: 'Coming soon'," says Sen. Ron Wyden (D) of Oregon, a member of the Intelligence committee. "It's critically important that this be wrapped up quickly."

Some observers see the low level of supervision as a function of partisan deference. Republicans are "afraid if you do look at anything out there, it could prove embarrassing," says Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank in Washington.

But history suggests that one party's dominance need not preclude meaningful oversight. Nine months after German tanks rolled into Paris, the junior senator from Missouri called for a probe of the US buildup in World War II to "head off scandals before they started."

The Truman Committee, created at a time when Democrats controlled the presidency and both houses of Congress, set the gold standard for congressional investigations - and gave Harry Truman a leg up to the presidency. Between 1941 and 1948, this panel held 432 public hearings and 300 executive sessions, and is credited with saving the government billions of dollars.

"Presidents are well served by a Congress that aggressively but responsibly pursues its oversight responsibilities. It helps keep them from making mistakes and helps administrations make corrections in a more timely fashion," says Mr. Mann.

Is Bush Signaling An About-Face On Detainees? (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 16, 2006

It is rare for a president to comment on a pending Supreme Court case. But President George W. Bush has been doing just that in recent weeks, making several mentions of the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case that will decide the fate of the military commissions he ordered to handle detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"We're waiting on our Supreme Court to act," Bush said at a press conference Wednesday, one of several comments that indicate he is eager to follow the Court's lead, even if it rules against his claim of broad power to deal with the detainees outside the established military and civilian court system.

Bush's remarks and tone have confounded opponents of the military commissions, leaving some wondering if Bush is trying to soften the blow of an expected defeat -- or already preparing the public for civilian alternatives to military commissions.

Covington & Burling partner David Remes, one of the coordinators of the legal effort against the administration position, says Bush's comments have led him to ask "why Bush made Hamdan a test of presidential power in the first place. If Bush could accomplish his goals within the existing legal framework, why did he confront the judicial branch with such breathtaking claims of presidential power?"

The presidential commentary on the case was so frequent in recent days that expectations were high that the Court might hand down the decision on Thursday. The two lawyers who argued against each other in the case -- Solicitor General Paul Clement and Georgetown University Law Center's Neal Katyal -- were in the courtroom, but the justices instead handed down four criminal and business law cases. The Court will convene again next Monday and Thursday to issue more decisions in its push toward adjournment by month's end.

The Hamdan case asks whether the president has constitutional or statutory authority to establish the commissions -- and whether federal courts have jurisdiction over the issue. Lawyers challenging the commissions say the limited rules of evidence and trial procedures violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions on prisoners of war. The administration has argued that Bush has ample authority to decide that military necessity requires a special process for handling the detainees outside the court system.

But during a joint press conference June 9 with the prime minister of Denmark, Bush said he thought Guantanamo detainees "ought to be tried in courts here in the United States. We will file such court claims once the Supreme Court makes its decision as to whether or not -- as to the proper venue for these trials." That comment seemed to some to contradict his legal position, which was that the detainees should be tried by military commissions at Guantanamo, not courts in the United States.

"This is a dramatic about-face from the Administration's position in the high court, and an admission that the detainees have been right all along," said Katyal, who argued on behalf of detainee Salim Ahmed Hamdan before the justices on March 28. "These cases belong in our courts, not in a makeshift military system that lacks credibility. President Bush's statement reaffirms that national security doesn't require this makeshift system, which is precisely what Mr. Hamdan has been saying for three years."

On Wednesday, at a press conference after his surprise visit to Iraq, Bush seemed to amend his comments, emphasizing that he had military, not civilian courts in mind. "I'd like to close Guantanamo," Bush said, "but I also recognize that we're holding some people that are darn dangerous, and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts. And the best way to handle ... these types of people is through our military courts. And that's why we're waiting on the Supreme Court to make a decision."

But on May 7, in comments during an interview on a German television network, Bush seemed indifferent about which courts the detainees ultimately face. "I very much would like to get people to a court," Bush said, according to the transcript. "And we're waiting for our Supreme Court to give us a decision as to whether the people need to have a fair trial in a civilian court or in a military court. But in either case, they will get a trial which they, themselves, were unwilling to give to the people that they're willing to kill."

Richard Samp of the Washington Legal Foundation, which filed a brief in support of the Bush Administration's position on military commissions, said not much should be made of these remarks.

"He has been talking to a lot of foreign leaders lately about Guantanamo, and I am sure he wants to not appear insensitive to their concerns," said Samp. Samp adds that it is prudent for the administration to be planning now for the ramifications of a high court ruling -- no matter which way it comes down.

Deborah Pearlstein of Human Rights First, a leading critic of the commissions, agrees that Bush's comments about the case reflect "national and international pressure on the administration to finally come up with some definitive -- and lawful -- resolution to a global detention system that long ago stopped serving U.S. policy interests in promoting freedom, or in protecting its own security."

But she too was astonished at Bush's seeming acceptance of trials for the detainees, no matter where they take place. "The suggestion that the Guantanamo detainees should be tried at all, much less tried in U.S. courts, contradicts the administration's position all along that the President can just detain, without trial if he wants, the 'worst of the worst' at Guantanamo forever."

New Jersey Demands Data On Phone Call Surveillance And Is Sued By U.S. (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

TRENTON, June 15 — The New Jersey attorney general has issued subpoenas to five telephone companies to determine whether any of them violated the state's consumer protection laws by providing records to the National Security Agency. Experts say it is the first legal move by a state to question the agency's program to compile calling records to track terrorist activities.

On Wednesday, the United States filed a lawsuit to block the subpoenas, setting up a legal showdown pitting the state's authority to protect consumers' rights against the federal government's national security powers.

"People in New Jersey and people everywhere have privacy rights," the state's attorney general, Zulima V. Farber, said on Thursday. "What we were trying to determine was whether the phone companies in New Jersey had violated any law or any contractual obligations with their consumers by supplying information to some government entity, simply by request, and not by any court order or search warrant."

This latest confrontation over the invocation of national security began last month, when Ms. Farber issued the subpoenas to the companies — AT&T, Verizon, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Cingular Wireless — to determine whether they had turned over the phone records to the federal government without a court order, in possible violation of state laws.

But when the Justice Department filed suit in United States District Court here to block those subpoenas — a suit that Ms. Farber received on Thursday — it asserted that the state was straying into a federal matter, and that compliance with the subpoenas would imperil national security.

As a matter of national security policy, the dispute represents the latest twist in the controversy over the boundaries of domestic spying and personal privacy. But as a matter of government practice and legal precedent, the dispute is significant because it transforms what had primarily been a fight between the federal government and civil liberties groups into a far knottier one pitting federal authorities against state ones.

Clifford Fishman, a professor at Catholic University Law School who is an expert on electronic-surveillance law, also said the actions by both state and federal government were laden with political overtones.

Professor Fishman said New Jersey's subpoenas — issued by a Democratic administration — appeared to be "a political move to try to embarrass the Bush administration as well as the phone companies." But he added that "the Bush administration is responding with a howitzer instead of a sniper."

The professor, who noted that he had not seen the government's suit, said each party had alternatives to what he saw as a significant development over the disputed reach of the National Security Agency. He said the federal government need not have sued New Jersey to make its argument against the subpoenas, and he said the state could have allowed numerous private parties to pursue litigation against the phone companies, rather than getting involved.

In the lawsuit, the federal government invokes the state-secrets privilege, in which the government asserts that any discussion of a given lawsuit's claims would threaten national security.

"Compliance with the subpoenas issued by those officers would first place the carriers in a position of having to confirm or deny the existence of information that cannot be confirmed or denied without causing exceptionally grave harm to national security," Assistant United States Attorney Irene Dowdy claimed in the government's complaint. "And if particular carriers are indeed supplying foreign intelligence information to the federal government, compliance with the subpoenas would require disclosure of the details of that activity."

But in an interview on Thursday, Ms. Farber said that it was incumbent upon her to insure that the phone companies were not violating state law if they had turned in any phone records to the N.S.A. The New York Times first reported in December that President Bush had authorized the security agency to conduct eavesdropping without warrants. Last month, USA Today reported that the N.S.A. had created a large database of phone calls made by customers of several phone companies.

A few days after the USA Today article was published, Ms. Farber issued subpoenas to phone companies that operate in New Jersey. Yet few people outside of state government and the phone companies knew about them.

Ms. Farber had originally demanded responses by May 30. She said that telephone company representatives, unable to persuade her to withdraw the subpoenas, had asked for an extension until Thursday. One day before that extended deadline, the federal government filed its lawsuit.

The question of whether phone companies have turned over customer records to the spy agency already has spawned a handful of lawsuits. Some companies have denied surrendering the records; others denied wrongdoing or declined to comment. For instance, a federal judge in San Francisco has scheduled a hearing for next Friday in a lawsuit filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a privacy-rights advocacy group that seeks to enjoin phone companies from turning over records and seeks damages for affected customers.

Selim Bingol, a spokesman for AT&T, said that the lawsuit filed by the federal government to block New Jersey's subpoenas showed that the phone companies should not be the ones that have to address these policy issues.

The American Civil Liberties Union has filed complaints in 22 states demanding that attorneys general and utility regulators officials investigate whether consumer protection laws have been violated. Officials in a few states in addition to New Jersey. including Vermont, Maine and Washington, have promised to investigate.

"All we're really trying to do is to make sure that the phone companies have followed the law," said David J. O'Brien, Vermont's commissioner of the Department of Public Service.

But none had gone as far as New Jersey, according to Barry Steinhardt, director of the A.C.L.U.'s Technology and Liberty Project.

According to some critics, one potential weakness of the government's state-secrets claim is that Ms. Farber — as well as Gov. Jon S. Corzine and Richard L. Cañas, the state director of homeland security — has top federal security clearance, and might well not divulge any sensitive national security information she received as a result of the subpoenas.

"Our state officials are cleared for security purposes all the time," said Bruce Afran, a lawyer in Princeton, N.J., who, with his partner, Carl Mayer, filed a federal suit in Manhattan last month against Verizon.

Lawyer Says Investigators Tricked Ga. Terror Suspect (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

AP, June 16, 2006

ATLANTA - Investigators preyed on a Georgia Tech student's devotion to Islam to get him to help their terrorism probe and then reneged on their promise not to arrest him if he told the truth, the suspect's lawyer said in court papers Thursday.

The allegations by Jack Martin, a lawyer for 21-year-old Syed Ahmed, were contained in a motion in which Martin seeks to suppress Ahmed's statements to the FBI or make the government abide by the alleged agreement not to prosecute him.

In a subsequent motion, Martin insisted that the government be forced to say whether the National Security Agency used its power to obtain phone records for Ahmed or conduct other electronic surveillance of him without a warrant.

"All the defendant asks for now is notice and access to the relevant information and documents, " Martin said.

Since the arrest, the FBI has said that Ahmed and another man from the Atlanta area, Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, may have had contact with some of the 17 people arrested in Canada earlier this month on terrorism-related charges.

Martin said an FBI agent and a task force investigator who questioned Ahmed on March 10 at his Atlanta apartment told him that as long as he told the truth he would not be arrested. He said one of the investigators told Ahmed that he, too, was a Muslim and used that to get a statement from Ahmed.

"Allah does not want you to go to jail, "the investigator told Ahmed, according to the motion. "I want you to help us. Obviously, that is why we are talking to you.'"

As a result, Ahmed spoke to investigators for more than 12 hours over several days, identified videos and photographs, and assisted the agents in investigating Internet sites, Martin said. The motion does not say what Ahmed told investigators. Martin said in a telephone interview that no lawyer was present for the questioning. He refused to comment further.

On March 23, Ahmed was indicted on a single charge of providing material support to terrorists and has been held in custody since then, the motion says.

FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett said the agency would have no comment. A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta, Patrick Crosby, said, "The motions filed today were expected, and we will respond to them in court at the appropriate time.'"

According to previously released court papers, Ahmed and Sadequee are accused of traveling to Canada to meet with Islamic extremists to discuss "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike.'"

Both men, who are U.S. citizens who grew up in the Atlanta area, met with at least three other targets of ongoing FBI terrorism investigations during a trip to Canada in March 2005, the documents say.

The documents say the men discussed attacks against military bases and oil refineries and planned to travel to Pakistan to get military training at a terrorist camp, which authorities said Ahmed attempted.

Attorney Says FBI Lied To Terror Suspect Agents Promised Not To Arrest Ga. Tech Student (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 16, 2006

Six statements by a Georgia Tech student arrested on terrorism-related charges should be thrown out because of false promises and implied threats from investigators, the man's attorney said in court filings Thursday.

Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, talked to FBI agents after being told he would not be arrested if he cooperated. Ahmed did talk — six interviews over a week's time — and then was arrested, his court-appointed attorney Jack Martin said.

The agents also "prey[ed] on the defendant's devotion to Islam" to gain his trust and cooperation, he said.

"Office [Khalid] Sediqui, who revealed that he was a devout Muslim himself, stated 'Allah does not want you to go to jail. I want you to help us,' " the motion states.

Sediqui told Ahmed if he answered the investigators' questions, "then we are going to leave you alone," the motion states.

Ahmed gave more than 12 hours of statements, totaling 400 pages of transcripts, and identified photographs and videos. On March 23, he was indicted on a charge of providing material support to terrorists.

Another Georgia man, Ehsanul Sadequee, 19, of Roswell, a friend of Ahmed's, was arrested in April while traveling in Bangladesh. The two men allegedly took a Greyhound bus to Toronto in March 2005 to meet with "like-minded extremists" and plot "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike."

The men allegedly made contact with two of the 17 suspects arrested this month in Toronto on terrorism charges, according to documents filed in Canadian court.

The two men also allegedly discussed traveling to Pakistan to receive military-style training. Prosecutors say Ahmed tried to do that last summer.

In April 2005, a month after the Canada visit, the two allegedly shot some "casing videos" of sites in Washington. Those videos were found on the computer of a man arrested in London on terrorism charges.

In the motion filed Thursday, Martin argued that the U.S. Supreme Court and other courts have determined that a statement is involuntary if induced "by significant and powerful promises or threats, such as the promise of nonprosecution here and the threat of arrest if the defendant did not 'cooperate.' "

The motion quotes an agent telling Ahmed, "You have the rest of your life in front of you. ... You know eventually you are going to have to get a job some day. Do you want any type of criminal record?"

Ahmed answered, "No."

In a separate filing, Martin asks the court to force prosecutors to divulge any wiretaps or electronic surveillance the government used to keep track of his client.

The FBI declined to comment on the case. Patrick Crosby, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said, "The motions filed today were expected, and we will respond to them at the appropriate time."

Canadian Muslims Urged To Keep Eye On Extremism (USAT)

By Rebecca Cook Dube

USA Today, June 16, 2006

TORONTO — Some Canadian Muslim leaders are urging a crackdown on extremists within their community two weeks after 17 males, including five teenagers, were arrested in suburban Toronto on terrorism-related charges.

"We knew of these children. We'd see them coming to our mosque wearing military fatigues, and we didn't think much of it," says Asad Dean, chairman of Meadowvale Islamic Center in a western suburb of Toronto. Several of the suspects occasionally attended services there, he says. "We need to be more vigilant."

The response to the arrests has exposed a rift between Muslim leaders. Some reject the notion that a violent ideology may have taken root in their community; others argue that Muslims must acknowledge radicalism in their midst and work harder to extinguish it.

The allegations that 17 Muslim men and boys, most of whom were born and raised in Canada, plotted to blow up buildings and behead the prime minister caused ripples as far away as Iraq.

Iraq's most senior Shiite Muslim cleric issued a religious decree Wednesday addressing the charges against the men in Canada. "Muslims have undertaken to obey the laws of a country of their residence, and thus they must be faithful to that undertaking," read the fatwa, or legal opinion, issued by the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

The suspects, all but two of whom are younger than 26, were arrested in raids across the Toronto area June 2 and 3. Gary Batasar, a lawyer for one of the accused men, said the government alleges the group planned to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper and possibly blow up the headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

The suspects, who are being held in solitary confinement at a prison southwest of Toronto, await bail hearings and trials.

The young men are part of a Muslim community that has more than doubled, according to the government's Statistics Canada agency, from about 250,000 in 1991 to nearly 580,000 in 2001 — about 2% of Canada's population. The Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington-based research group, estimates the Muslim population in the USA at 2 million, or almost 1% of the total population.

Some Canadian Muslim leaders say they're offended by the suggestion they should be responsible for combating radical influences.

At a news conference the day after the arrests were announced, several Muslim leaders denounced the idea that their mosques might include extremists, even on the fringes.

"That is a scandalous allegation," said Zafar Bangash of the Institute of Contemporary Islamic Thought in Toronto.

Others say radicals are spreading extremism and the danger can no longer be ignored. "They were young kids, and they were taken down this road by someone," says Sheik Husain Patel, cleric at the Toronto Islamic Center, where one suspect occasionally worshiped.

"It's about time Muslims owned up to the fact it's a Muslim problem," Farzana Hassan-Shahid of the Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) said after a meeting last weekend between Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Muslim community leaders.

The CIC issued a flier in October that warns the Muslim community of attempts by extremists to influence children and advises parents on how to watch for and counter radicalism.

Yasmin Ratansi, a Liberal member of Parliament from Toronto, is among those who agree with Patel and the CIC that parents and Muslim leaders need to pay closer attention to what children learn at mosques and on the Internet.

"Canadian youths of Muslim faith have been unduly influenced by radical thought," Ratansi says.

Dean blames Saudi-funded organizations for spreading fundamentalist Islam in North America and Europe.

Saudi Arabia's puritanical Wahhabist strain of Islam urges a literal interpretation of the Quran, Islam's holy book, that puts its followers at odds with many other Muslims. "We should not have Saudi Wahhabi literature in North America and Europe," Dean says. "We have to address the root of this problem."

He says several suspects in the terror case approached him about hosting a religious program.

When he turned them down, Dean says, they urged other Muslims to boycott his suburban mosque.

"They view the traditional Muslims as compromisers, as collaborators, as wimps," he says. "It's a serious crisis. These kids were born and raised in Canada, and there could be more of these kids out there. That's what concerns me."

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

'WHAT WILL they do to us if there is another attack? Will they intern us like they interned the Japanese?"

That is the single most common question I get when speaking about counter-terrorism policies and civil liberties to Arab and Muslim audiences. Until Wednesday, I assured them that such a response was unthinkable. The Japanese internment during World War II is now so widely recognized as morally, legally and ethically wrong, I told them, that it could not possibly be repeated.

But after a decision by a federal judge in New York, I'm no longer confident that I can be so reassuring. Dismissing a case challenging the detention of Arab and Muslim foreign nationals in the weeks after 9/11, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled that it is constitutionally permissible to round up foreign nationals on immigration charges based solely on their race, religion or country of origin. What's more, he said that they can be detained indefinitely, even after they have agreed to be removed to their home countries.

In essence, he authorized a repeat of the Japanese internment — as long as the internment is limited to foreign nationals charged with visa violations (a group that at last count numbered about 11 million people).

The case, Turkmen vs. Ashcroft, was filed on behalf of Arab and Muslim foreign nationals swept up on the pretext of immigration charges in the weeks after 9/11. Many were initially arrested on no charges at all — only to be served with immigration papers days, weeks or sometimes months later. All were arrested in secret — in many cases without being allowed to contact anyone — and hundreds were tried in closed hearings that even their family members were not allowed to attend.

They were picked up on the slightest of suspicions. In one representative case, according to the Justice Department's inspector general, the FBI arrested several men on a tip that "too many" Middle Eastern men worked at a convenience store down the street.

Many of those arrested admitted that they had violated their visas and agreed to leave the country, but they were kept locked up for months so that the FBI could investigate them. They were not allowed to go until they were "cleared" of any connection to terrorism. In a complete reversal of the American system of justice, they were treated as guilty until proved innocent.

In all, the government detained more than 1,000 foreign nationals in the first seven weeks after 9/11, and more than 5,000 in the first two years after the attack. Yet as of today, not one of these persons stands convicted of a terrorist crime. From a security standpoint, the roundups were an utter failure.

In Turkmen vs. Ashcroft, the detainees argued that the government denied them equal protection of the law when it rounded them up on the basis of their race and religion, and violated their due-process rights when it kept them after their immigration cases were resolved. The district court rejected both claims, concluding that the government is free to detain deportable foreigners for as long as it wants as long as their ultimate removal is "reasonably foreseeable." And the judge concluded that using race or religion to select the foreign nationals subject to such detention was neither "irrational" nor "outrageous" because the 9/11 hijackers, after all, were Arab foreign nationals belonging to an Islamic fundamentalist group, Al Qaeda.

In other words, the next time we are attacked, the government is free to round up all foreign nationals with alleged visa violations who share the race or religion of the attacker and to keep them behind bars as long as it wishes. If the attack is perpetrated by an Arab Muslim, all Arab and Muslim immigrants are vulnerable. If the attacker is a Latino Christian, the government could round up all Latino Christians with alleged visa problems.

It's true that the World War II internment included citizens as well as foreign nationals, and in many cases, it rounded up people who had done nothing wrong. But what was most offensive about it was the fact that people were selected based on their race. And just as racial profiling of drivers is not acceptable merely because black and Latino drivers stopped are allegedly speeding, so racial profiling of immigrants is not acceptable even if the immigrants are alleged to have violated their immigration status.

WHEN THE Supreme Court in Korematsu vs. United States upheld the legality of the Japanese internment, Justice Robert Jackson warned in his dissent that the precedent would "lie about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need."

Until Wednesday, I thought history had proved Jackson wrong. Virtually every living Supreme Court justice has condemned Korematsu as wrongly decided — Justice Antonin Scalia has compared it to the Dred Scott decision of 1857, in which the court refused to recognize that slaves were "persons." Congress has formally apologized to the survivors of the internment and paid reparations for their injuries.

Yet the Turkmen decision has taken the loaded weapon out of the closet, dusted it off and handed it to federal authorities, giving them explicit permission to let prejudice and fear run roughshod over the most basic of human rights — the rights to equal treatment and liberty.

David Cole, a law professor at Georgetown University and volunteer attorney with the Center for Constitutional Rights, was co-counsel to the plaintiffs in Turkmen vs. Ashcroft.

The Name Is Kafka . . . Franz Kafka (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

"So put aside your Captain Crunch decoder ring," recommends the Central Intelligence Agency, "for the moment." This is on the Internet site of the CIA's legal department. It's part of a pitch for recruits so startlingly moronic -- even as an attempt at adorable self-mockery -- that you think it must be some subtle comment on the double meaning of the word "intelligence." In good hall-of-mirrors fashion, it's lifted from some book, but the book quotes supposedly real CIA employees. Whatever, this is the agency's self-presentation on its own Web site.

"If the theme music from Mission Impossible runs through your head," it says, "or you get the urge to order a martini 'shaken, not stirred,' at the mention of the letters 'CIA,' " -- why, then, you're just the kind of lawyer we want!

"We've been a major player in developing the law of national security vs. the First Amendment," the agency deadpans. "Or the Fourth Amendment. . . ." When "Americans [abroad] come across on our screen, they've got constitutional rights we've got to think about . . . . Or electronic surveillance . . . . In areas like that, we're helping to create the law, and that's a real rush."

And it's all true. The CIA is in the forefront of efforts to make sure that democracy, individual rights and stuff like that don't get in the way of our crusade for the spread of democracy, individual rights and stuff like that.

For years, all the intelligence agencies have been tussling with the American Civil Liberties Union over documents about the innovative Bush administration policy of locking people up in foreign countries where they can be tortured without the inconvenience of anyone knowing about it or bringing up, you know, like, the Constitution. It is not yet clear -- though there is little reason for optimism -- whether the courts will let them get away with it, but the official position of the executive branch under President Bush is that the U.S. government can lock you up anywhere in the world, torture you and tell no one about it. And if someone does find out and starts talking trash like "habeas corpus" or "Fourth Amendment," too bad: It's all okay under the president's inherent powers as commander in chief. Congress -- unbeknownst to Congress -- approved it all in its resolution shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, urging the president to fight terrorism. And the president deputized the CIA and other agencies to go forth and use this authority, in documents that you can't have and that may or may not exist.

In a twist fully worthy of Kafka, or at least Joseph Heller ("Catch-22"), the very suspicion that bad things are going on is a reason you can't find out. As a CIA legal document explains: "CIA confirmation of the existence of [evidence] would confirm a CIA interest in or use of specific intelligence methods and activities." After all, the agency gaily reasons, the "CIA would not request . . . authorization from the president for intelligence activities in which it had no interest."

Meanwhile, in another federal court, the ACLU has been arguing with the National Security Agency about the wiretapping of international phone calls to and from the United States. The 1978 intelligence reform law made clear as cellophane that these agencies had no authority to wiretap citizens of this country and in this country without permission from a judge. So clear, in fact, that the president doesn't deny that his wiretapping program violates the 1978 law. Instead, he says that Congress overruled that law in its 2001 resolution to oppose terrorism. That, plus the usual inherent powers of the presidency.

What's more, government lawyers say, they can prove all this. Or at least they could, but they can't, because the evidence must remain secret for national security reasons. And what are those reasons? Well, the reasons why the reasons why the program is okay are also secret. And without this evidence, there cannot be a trial. Sorry.

It's true that you and I are not being grabbed on the streets and sent to a former secret police torture-training camp in Godforsakistan. Nor is the government eavesdropping on your international phone calls or mine. Probably. Because I like you, I'll forgo the usual ominous warning about how they came after him and then they came after her and then they came after you. I'll even skip the liberal sermonette about how even bad guys have rights.

But your rights and mine are not supposed to be at the whim of the government, let alone the president. They are based in the Constitution and the willingness of those we put in power to obey it -- even as interpreted by judges they may disagree with. The most distressing aspect of this story is the apparent attitude of our current rulers that the Constitution is an obstacle to be overcome -- by conducting dirty business abroad or by wildly disingenuous interpretations of laws and the Constitution.

Just look at what these supposed worshipers at the shrine of "strict constructionism" and "original meaning" have done to the 2001 anti-terrorism resolution. Did any senator who voted for this resolution have any idea that he or she was, in essence, voting to repeal all the protections for individuals against government agency abuse that Congress enacted in 1978?

The fact that there are countries in this world where the government can torture people in secret and without fear of courts is supposed to be a tragedy -- not a convenience.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Stands By Anti-Terror Cuts (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A top official at the Department of Homeland Security said the agency will not reconsider its decision to cut anti-terror grants for Washington and New York by 40 percent, despite criticism and pointed questioning yesterday by congressional representatives from those regions.

George W. Foresman, DHS undersecretary for preparedness, stood by the complicated formulas used by a secret panel of reviewers to divide $711 million in 2006 funds for urban areas across the country. The result was that Washington and New York, the two areas targeted on Sept. 11, 2001, will get less than last year, while Omaha, Charlotte, Louisville and other cities will receive more.

"I feel confident in the risk analysis process and the peer review process," Foresman said at a congressional hearing, calling his agency's risk analysis "incredible." "What we need to do is a better job in communicating with the communities."

But Foresman appeared to have a difficult time communicating with the congressional panel. Lawmakers from both parties lambasted DHS and called its decision-making process "mind-boggling," "a mystery" and "goofy" and said it doesn't appear to meet its stated goal -- distributing federal dollars to regions that face the greatest risk of attack.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) called it "one of the greatest displays of incompetence."

More than two hours into the hearing, a top Maryland official attending the session said he still did not understand why his state is receiving only $24 million in a separate grant program when it expected as much as $40 million. "To be honest with you, I'm mystified still," said Dennis Schrader, Maryland's director of homeland security.

The Washington region, which received $77 million in the urban anti-terrorism program last year, is slated to get $46 million. It had requested $160 million.

Foresman, the former homeland security chief for Virginia, said it wasn't that the risk has dropped in New York or the Washington region but that federal officials have a better understanding of the national picture. The number of urban areas that federal officials consider under threat has grown from seven to more than 100, he said.

He tried to correct earlier statements by DHS officials that the District and New York got less money because of weak applications. "They were not deficient in their applications," he said. "Effectiveness measures were reviewed in relation to others around the country and ranked."

And Foresman dismissed recent statements from some area elected leaders that politics may have played a part. "It's an incorrect allegation that this was driven by politics," he said.

This marked the first time that DHS used risk as a key factor in evaluating competing requests for money from cities and states. The lawmakers and heads of homeland security in Virginia, Maryland and the District applauded that goal but not its execution.

Edward D. Reiskin, the District's deputy mayor for public safety, said the outcomes "don't seem to square with professional and common sense."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who called the hearing as chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, got into a back-and-forth with Foresman, pressing him to explain why the District will get less money than Montana in one grant program.

"Do you think Montana is at greater risk than D.C.?" Davis asked.

"We don't rate one community against another," Foresman said.

"Doesn't it seem on risk alone, D.C. would have a higher risk than Montana?" Davis said.

"On just risk, D.C. would have scored higher," Foresman said, adding that other factors were involved, including an analysis of the way each community intended to spend its grant, whether that plan would be effective and whether it advanced national homeland security goals.

Davis wasn't swayed. "How in the world is a risk or threat or anything in Montana or North Dakota or South Dakota higher than in the District?" he asked. "I don't think it passes the laugh test."

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) calculated that his state was receiving $4.50 per resident while Wyoming was getting $16 per resident.

DOJ_NMG_0034892

"We're protecting the grizzly bears in Wyoming, as opposed to the people who work around Fort Meade and NSA," Ruppersberger said.

Agency: States Unprepared For Disasters (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, June 16, 2006

Most American cities and states remain unprepared for catastrophes, a government analysis concludes, calling the shortcomings in emergency planning a cause "for significant national concern."

Nearly five years after the 9/11 attacks and 10 months after Hurricane Katrina, the Homeland Security Department concluded that local response plans for major disasters are often antiquated and uncoordinated.

Although emergency plans appear to be stronger in 18 states along the nation's "Hurricane Belt," the analysis cited preparedness gaps in 131 state and city emergency response plans. Planning for evacuations, too, remain "an area of profound concern," the review found.

"We rely to a troubling extent on plans that are created in isolation, are insufficiently detailed and are not subject to adequate review," concluded the department's 160-page review of findings and annexes that was delivered to Congress on Thursday evening. A copy of the review was obtained by The Associated Press.

"Time and again, these factors extract a severe penalty in the midst of a crisis: precious time is consumed in the race to correct the misperceptions of federal, state and local responders about roles, responsibilities and actions," the review found. "The result is uneven performance and repeated and costly operational miscues."

President Bush ordered the review of state and city emergency plans in a speech in New Orleans last Sept. 15, weeks after Katrina ravaged the city. It analyzes response and evacuation procedures for all 50 states, the nation's 75 largest cities and six U.S. territories.

Documents made available to the AP did not cite individual cities or states, and a Homeland Security official suggested that portion of the report will be released later.

It criticized the states and cities in several key areas, including:

· Failing to address emergency needs for sick, elderly or poor people unable to help themselves.

· Being too slow to issue disaster warnings and other alerts to the public.

· Failing to designate a clear chain of command during major disasters.

"Most review participants have demonstrated that they are able to successfully manage commonly experienced incidents, yet are not fully prepared for a catastrophic event," the review concluded. It called the gaps cause "for significant national concern."

But it found that 18 hurricane-prone states, from Maine to Texas, appeared to be better prepared for disasters than the rest of the country.

Those states hugging the Atlantic and Gulf coasts were judged by peers to have emergency plans "that were more likely to be rated sufficient ... than other states," the review noted. Plans by Hurricane Belt states to manage resources, health and medical issues and communications were "noticeably stronger" in comparison, it found.

Similarly, cities in Hurricane Belt states also were rated more likely to be prepared in issuing warnings, managing resources, distributing emergency public information and mass care. But in a glaring exception, the cities were judged as comparatively not sufficient in planning for evacuations.

The review is the latest in a series of government and expert analyses since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast last Aug. 29. Nearly all have found lacking preparedness levels for large-scale disasters. The Sept. 11 commission and other panels have also found shortcomings in preparedness for another terrorist attack.

The latest report was released as the Senate sent President Bush a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill that included funds for new aid for Gulf Coast hurricane victims.

The review noted several failings on the federal government's part, citing a need for clearer guidance and up-to-date preparedness data to state and local officials. It also urged better collaboration with private businesses to help evacuate disabled people and with charities and other non-governmental services to stockpile aid for disaster victims.

Limo Company Offered To Aid DHS Prior To Bid (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034893

A limousine company linked to a congressional bribery investigation offered its services to the Department of Homeland Security more than three months before the agency sought bids for a transportation contract, and eventually won contracts worth $25 million over six years, congressional investigators disclosed yesterday.

The local firm, Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc., also told DHS that it held special status under a federal program designed to help small businesses in economically distressed areas before it applied for and won such a designation, lawmakers said yesterday. That designation turned out to be a condition for obtaining the contracts.

Recently convicted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) recommended Shirlington Limousine to the DHS in an April 2004 letter to the department, according to a written affidavit provided to House investigators by Shirlington Limousine President Christopher D. Baker.

The unusual circumstances laid out at a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing yesterday created more controversy for the company, whose executives have been questioned in an investigation of whether it helped provide prostitutes to Cunningham and other lawmakers on behalf of a California defense contractor. The company has denied wrongdoing.

"It just doesn't seem to be a reasonable sequence of events if there was not some political manipulation of the bid process. . . . This doesn't look right," said Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), chairman of the management, integration and oversight subcommittee, which held the hearing.

Rogers added, "I can't understand why [Baker has] a letter from a California congressman as to his character or competence and quality, instead of his own congressman or some congressman of the district where the business will be conducted."

DHS procurement director Elaine Duke said the department routinely receives all sorts of offers from vendors, and DHS officials spoke with Baker around January 2004. But such a conversation is not a formal proposal, and all rules were followed, department spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

"I don't think it's fishy," Orluskie said. "They wanted to turn it [the contract] really fast, but I know they did it in accordance with federal acquisition regulations."

Duke said the department has no copy of Cunningham's letter. However, the department provided investigators with an April 20 e-mail from Shirlington Limousine in which the company said it had faxed a letter of recommendation from Cunningham, as well as a request for an advance -- seven days before DHS publicly awarded the contract and six days after DHS sought bids.

Rogers said lawmakers invited Baker and Shirlington Limousine's vice president to testify, but they declined because of a federal grand jury investigation. But both are cooperating by answering written questions, he said.

Agents are examining the relationship between Shirlington Limousine and Brent R. Wilkes, a San Diego businessman who is under investigation for bribing Cunningham in return for millions of dollars in federal contracts. Cunningham is serving more than eight years in prison for his part in the scheme.

The FBI is also investigating whether former CIA executive director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo steered contracts to Wilkes.

Michael York, one of Baker's attorneys, said yesterday that his client has been to San Diego and talked to the FBI, prosecutors and a grand jury. But he disputed any suggestion that Cunningham's letter improperly influenced the department's decision to award the firm contracts to provide limousine and shuttle services.

Homeland Security officials previously denied the existence of a Cunningham letter.

In comments released by his press secretary, House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter T. King (R-N.Y.) said: "If there's a reference to a letter, [Cunningham] is involved and DHS has not been truthful. . . . Did somebody clean out the file?"

The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), called for DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson to appear before Congress to discuss "major missteps."

"It is unconscionable to think that the agency charged with tracking down terrorists cannot even track down letters of recommendation," Thompson wrote.

Cunningham Said To Have Helped Limo Firm (AP)

By Erica Werner

The AP, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - A limousine company involved in congressional prostitution and bribery allegations got a Homeland Security contract after then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham interceded on the company's behalf, the company's president has told lawmakers.

The statement by the president of Shirlington Limousine was made in an affidavit discussed at a House Homeland Security subcommittee hearing Thursday.

It prompted renewed protests from lawmakers about the Homeland Security Department's awarding of two contracts to Shirlington despite the company's history of problems.

Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., noted that Shirlington president Christopher Baker had a criminal record and business dealings with a defense contractor named as an unindicted coconspirator in the prosecution of Cunningham.

"And then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company. If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is," King lectured government witnesses.

Cunningham is serving more than eight years in prison after admitting accepting $2.4 million in bribes from the defense contractor and others. Federal officials are investigating whether the contractor also supplied the California Republican lawmaker with prostitutes and limousines from Baker's company. Baker did not testify Thursday because a federal grand jury investigation is under way.

DHS Chief Procurement Officer Elaine Duke said department officials turned up no evidence they actually received a letter from Cunningham except for a reference to it in an e-mail from the limousine company.

She said Shirlington got the two contracts through normal procedures - including one last October for up to $21 million over five years to transport department employees around the Washington, D.C. area.

No background check was performed on Baker because the department doesn't perform such checks on company owners, and contracting officers did not learn of Shirlington's problems with other contracts, including one terminated by Howard University over poor service, Duke said.

"I have no evidence that there was any type of outside influence," Duke said.

"If there's a reference to a letter, (Cunningham) is involved and DHS has not been truthful," King said.

Outside the hearing, King questioned the department's failure to find Cunningham's letter. "Did somebody clean out the file?" he asked.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said that never happened.

Rep. Mike Rogers, R-Ala., also questioned the timing of Shirlington's first Homeland Security Department contract, in April 2004. He said Shirlington had a proposal drafted months before the contract was even bid and ended up being the only qualified bidder.

"That strikes me as very odd," Rogers said. "It really raises concerns that maybe there was some manipulation of the process."

Knocke said there wasn't.

An attorney for Baker, Michael York, said his client could not find a copy of Cunningham's letter but that it was a "brief, plain vanilla recommendation" that Cunningham wrote based on his familiarity with Shirlington.

Baker acknowledges providing transportation services for Cunningham and defense contractor Brent Wilkes but denies any knowledge of or involvement in illegal or illicit activities, York said. He said Baker is cooperating with the investigation and has testified to the grand jury.

An attorney for Cunningham did not immediately return a call for comment.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, wrote King on Thursday requesting that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy Michael Jackson be called - and subpoenaed if necessary - to answer questions on "the overwhelming evidence of waste, fraud, abuse, and incompetence" at the department, including the failure to find Cunningham's letter.

House Panel Probes Limo Firm's Deal (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Homeland Security's awarding of contracts to a company whose selection was backed by convicted congressman prompts an inquiry.

WASHINGTON — The Department of Homeland Security came under renewed scrutiny Thursday as a House panel sought to determine how it awarded $25 million in contracts to a transportation company whose selection was recommended by Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the former San Diego-area congressman convicted of accepting millions of dollars in bribes from defense contractors.

After receiving bids from three companies, agency officials said, they chose Shirlington Limousine and Transportation Inc. of Washington, based on both price and the company's ability to perform the needed services.

But Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, noted that the company's president, Christopher Baker, had done business with Brent R. Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor identified as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Cunningham case.

DOJ_NMG_0034895

"Then we find out that the congressman at the center of all of this sends a letter on behalf of this limousine company," he said. "If that doesn't raise issues, if that isn't more than a series of coincidences, I don't know what is."

Cunningham was the only member of Congress to support Shirlington's selection, King said.

The government is investigating allegations that Wilkes provided Cunningham, and perhaps other officials, with prostitutes and limousines. Citing an ongoing grand jury investigation, Baker did not testify Thursday.

Baker has a criminal record, including attempted robbery, auto theft and drug possession, and Shirlington has a history of bankruptcy and other financial problems. In 2002, the company lost a shuttle-bus contract with Howard University, which accused the company of low-quality service.

Homeland Security's chief procurement officer, Elaine Duke, said that her agency made a distinction between company owners and drivers, and that the drivers had undergone background checks. No such checks on the company or its owner were required by law.

"The drivers have a clean slate," she said.

But King called the situation a "disgrace."

"Almost everything that could have gone wrong did go wrong," he said. "It casts doubt over the whole department."

But Homeland Security was not the only agency feeling the heat at Thursday's hearing before the House Homeland Security subcommittee on management, integration and oversight.

Because the department was specifically seeking a small business for the contracted services, it sought a company that was "HUBZone approved" — a program that falls under the jurisdiction of the Small Business Administration.

HUBZone is an SBA program that supports small businesses in poor communities by preventing large companies or those in more advantaged areas from competing with them.

Calvin Jenkins, the SBA's deputy to the associate deputy administrator, told the panel that his agency ensures that the company in question is a small business, is located in a historically underutilized region and has more than a third of its employees living in HUBZone areas.

Shirlington's office is in a luxury apartment building in Washington. It told the SBA that it had had an office in a hangar at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and that service in the building was suspended after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Jenkins said SBA staff visited the office on April 7, 2004, ensured that the company met the criteria and approved it the next day.

Later that month, Homeland Security awarded Shirlington the first of two contracts.

The company began providing shuttle services and executive sedans for the department in spring 2004. Its first one-year contract was for $4 million. The second, a one-year contract with the option to extend for four additional years, totals $21.2 million for the full five years.

Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the total went up because the need for services increased. The 2005 contract, he said, had to cover the cost for 10 limousine drivers and 12 mini-buses with a 16-person staff.

"That doesn't necessarily mean we're going to spend $21.2 million," Orluskie said. "They're not guaranteed that until the job is done.

"That selection was made based on their performance, not this controversy," he added.

In fact, Homeland Security recognized Shirlington Limo with a small-business achievement award last year for providing outstanding customer service.

Many in attendance at the hearing tried to stifle laughter after that statement. But in an interview, Orluskie said the service has been top-notch.

"I ride them all the time. The drivers are courteous, respectful, on time, and the vehicles are clean," he said.

Congress Probes Limousine Deal (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congressional investigators have uncovered evidence that a former congressman convicted on bribery charges helped steer a $20-million contract to a limousine company with ties to the ex-lawmaker, Capitol Hill sources say.

The House Homeland Security Committee is probing how Shirlington Limousine and Transportation won a lucrative bid to chauffeur high-ranking Homeland Security Department officials, despite a shoddy performance record and its owner having a lengthy criminal record.

Sources familiar with the inquiry say former Rep. Randy Cunningham (R-Calif.), who pleaded guilty to accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes from a defense contractor, potentially swayed the Shirlington case.

DOJ_NMG_0034896

In a sworn affidavit, Shirlington's owner, Christopher Baker, said "the only letter of reference sent on Shirlington's behalf" to Homeland Security came from Cunningham, according to sources.

Additionally, investigators are looking into allegations that a lawyer working in Homeland Security's General Counsel's Office threatened to deny future contracts to a rival who questioned why Shirlington won the bid.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King said the information might warrant a Justice Department examination. "It all adds up to a pretty strong case of DHS incompetence or a special deal was made," said King (R-Seaford).

Among many concerns about the contract, King said, is the fact that Homeland Security officials never ran a background check on Shirlington's owner. "Bin Laden could have owned the company and they never would have checked him out," King said.

"No congressman influenced that process," Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said of the Shirlington contract.

Shirlington has also been linked to defense contractor Brent Wilkes, a central figure in the bribery scandal that ensnared Cunningham.

9/11 Pentagon Memorial To Reflect Pangs Of Loss, Recollections Of Joy (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A few hundred feet from the spot where American Airlines Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and victims of the attack held a short and solemn groundbreaking ceremony yesterday for the Pentagon memorial.

Nearly five years after a private group began raising money for the memorial, about 450 people attended the invitation-only ceremony, including members of the Cabinet and Congress and 300 family members of victims and survivors of the attack.

They sat on plastic folding chairs in brilliant sunlight at the memorial site and listened to brief remarks from Rumsfeld and James J. Laychak, the president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund.

Rumsfeld thanked architects Keith Kaseman and Julie Beckman for their design and then said he wanted to speak directly to the family members and survivors.

"At some point in the future, most of you will return to this sacred ground," Rumsfeld said. " . . . As you reflect, you will be flooded with memories of your loss, to be sure, but also split-second images of love and laughter and joyous times. This memorial was meant for you, to offer some comfort."

About $10.8 million has been raised for construction of the memorial. The money has come from neighborhood lemonade sales and corporate and personal donations. The goal is to raise $22 million for construction, which is expected to be complete by September 2008, as well as an additional $10 million to maintain the memorial.

Before the ceremony, Laychak was invited by Rumsfeld to talk with Cabinet members about the fundraising. Laychak, whose brother David was killed in the attack, said he didn't want to be "crass" and ask Cabinet members for donations, so he asked them to use their influence instead.

"I said that if they wanted to ask for money, that would be great, but I asked them to ask people to take a meeting, to meet with me and members of the memorial fund and ask them to hear our story," Laychak said.

Shortly after the 2001 attacks, Congress authorized the defense secretary to create a memorial to be paid for with private donations. Although yesterday's ceremony was about the official beginning of construction, Laychak said he hopes the event will help generate donations to finance the project.

The memorial will have 184 cantilevered benches, one each in memory of the victims on the plane and in the building. Each bench will have a reflecting pool beneath it, and the 1.93-acre site will be shaded with about 80 paperbark maple trees, which were chosen because they keep their leaves late into the autumn.

Kaseman and Beckman, two New York architects whose design won a competition that had more than 1,000 entries from all over the world, sat next to D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and the congressional delegation.

"This is a big milestone, no doubt," Kaseman said. "One thing we are happy about is that a lot of the partners we have been working with are here. . . . This might be the first time that everyone is together."

The ceremony lasted less than 30 minutes. Rumsfeld and Laychak made brief remarks, and retired Navy Adm. Barry C. Black, a chaplain, offered a prayer in memory of those who died. At the conclusion, everyone stood and sang "God Bless America."

Each family member was given a red-white-and-blue ribbon and a button with the image of a flag draped over the Pentagon to wear on their shirts and blouses.

When the ceremony ended, Rumsfeld stayed behind. For about an hour, he stood in the bright sunlight, shaking hand after hand, autographing programs and taking pictures with family members. He stayed until every person who wanted a word with him got the opportunity.

"If there is anything these families felt," he said in a brief interview, "it's that we must not forget what took place. This is visible progress, and the memorial, when it is completed, is going to be a very special place. It is going to be about memories and reflections, to be sure. But it is going to be a place to think about today and tomorrow and the next day and the world."

The ceremony concluded with Rumsfeld and Rosemary Dillard, the vice president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, unveiling an engraved piece of marble salvaged from the building after the attack. It will be placed at the entrance of the memorial when it is completed.

Dillard said she was thinking about her husband, Eddie, when she helped Rumsfeld remove the blue covering from the stone. He died on board Flight 77. Wednesday was their 20th wedding anniversary.

Pentagon Breaks Ground On 9/11 Memorial (AP)

By Matthew Barakat

AP, June 15, 2006

Friends and relatives of Sept. 11 victims joined Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Thursday for the groundbreaking on a memorial to the 184 people killed in the terrorist attack on the Pentagon.

The two-acre memorial, to be built near the site of the attack at the Pentagon's west wall, will feature benches set over small reflecting pools for each of the victims. It is expected to be completed by the fall of 2008.

The memorial "will remind visitors that every one of these lives was special ... with lives cut short and families left behind," Rumsfeld said during a brief ceremony that drew more than 500 invited guests.

Lisa Dolan, whose husband, Robert, was a Navy officer killed in the attack, said "it was important to have a place with some peace and tranquility."

The designs for the memorial will make it "a place where you can really sit and reflect. At night, with all the lights, it's going to be beautiful. It's going to be very peaceful."

The design was selected in 2003 from more than 1,000 entries. Architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman said they incorporated family members' suggestions into their final blueprint. For instance, the pair initially planned to plant a maple tree at each of the 184 benches.

But family members were concerned that when a tree died, its death would be associated with that particular victim. So they reduced the number of trees and will plant them so that no individual tree will be associated with any victim.

Beckman said she wanted the design to emphasize life and resemble a park more than a monument.

Rumsfeld said he wanted the memorial to convey to future Americans "that their countrymen's grief was turned toward the cause of their nation's defense.

Organizers hope to raise a total of $22 million for construction, plus another $10 million for maintenance. About $11 million has been raised so far.

Remembering 9/11 (WT)

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday led a solemn gathering outside the Pentagon marking the ceremonial groundbreaking for a memorial to the 184 persons killed there September 11, 2001.

"At some time in the future, most of you will return to this sacred ground," Mr. Rumsfeld told the many friends and family members of those killed in the attack who attended the ceremony on the west side of the Pentagon. "This memorial was meant for you, to offer some comfort ... now you can know that we will never forget."

The Pentagon Memorial, designed by architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman, will honor those killed inside the building and on American Airlines Flight 77, which hijackers crashed into the building.

It will include 184 illuminated benches arranged according to the victims' ages, from 3-year-old Dana Falkenberg to John D. Yamnicky, 71. Reflecting pools also will be built beneath each bench.

Nearly $11 million of the $22 million needed to construct the memorial has been raised, said memorial officials, who also are hoping to raise $10 million for maintenance costs. Construction is expected to be completed in 2008.

More than 500 people attended the ceremony, including White House Cabinet members such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, local dignitaries such as D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, and Virginia Republican Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner.

DOJ_NMG_0034898

Mr. Rumsfeld and the Pentagon Memorial Fund's president, James J. Laychak -- whose brother David was killed in the attack -- spoke to the crowd before unveiling a limestone marker that will be part of the memorial.

"Today marks a positive outcome from a tragic day," Mr. Laychak said, recalling in his speech his brother's laugh and bear hugs. "Let's remember what was special about those we lost."

The ceremony was an emotional affair for the victims' friends and family members, as the celebration of the memorial's beginning still was clouded by what was being remembered.

"It's a bittersweet day, but there's a huge amount of accomplishment and pride," said Lisa Dolan, a member of the board of directors of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, whose husband, U.S. Navy Capt. Robert E. Dolan Jr. was killed in the attack. "The memorial being built shows the world that we've come back ... We're not going to forget."

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and one of the ceremony's participants, said the ceremony served as a reminder of where the United States has been and where the country is going after the attacks.

"It's a chance for those of us who have the privilege of wearing the uniform of the United States to rededicate ourselves to this country," Gen. Pace said. "These deaths mean something."

Joey Ricketts, a Boy Scout from Lynchburg, Va., who is creating a memorial in his hometown to "all the innocent lives lost" on September 11 as part of an Eagle Scout project, also attended the ceremony. He said he was motivated "in every single way" by attending.

"I've raised $10,000," said Joey, 15, who was to receive after the ceremony a piece of the Pentagon that was damaged in the attacks to use in his memorial. "For a 15-year-old, that's pretty good."

New Plan Calls For Scaling Back WTC Memorial (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

The World Trade Center Memorial faces simplification of its design, including moving carved-in-stone names of Sept. 11 victims to ground level, possibly eliminating or scaling back waterfalls and reducing the size of a museum.

Those were among the recommendations made yesterday to New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg in a closed-door meeting, according to people close to the situation. A formal report on the redesign will be released next week. Real-estate developer Frank Sciame presented the plans after Gov. Pataki asked him last month to create a budget that would bring the bulk of the project's cost to $500 million. A construction estimate in May put the total cost of the memorial, including infrastructure and other elements, at $1 billion.

Mr. Sciame also recommended -- and Gov. Pataki agreed -- that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, build the memorial. That task lies with the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, a publicly chartered, privately run group that also is in charge of fund raising.

The original memorial design by architect Michael Arad called for two square openings that covered the footprints of the Twin Towers. Waterfalls would fall from the edge of the openings into underground chambers, where victims' names would be etched in granite. Mr. Arad couldn't be reached for comment.

People who have been briefed on Mr. Sciame's report say it simplifies the project by doing away with separate entrances for the memorial, an adjacent museum and a visitor center. The museum would be reduced in size, but still would be underground. There would be a much smaller amount of space underground dedicated to the memorial. The waterfalls could be eliminated or greatly reduced. Scale mock-ups of the waterfalls showed they would be difficult to operate in the wind and cold.

People familiar with the project said Gov. Pataki favored Mr. Sciame's recommendation to bring the etched victims' names to ground level -- an idea preferred by several groups representing family members of victims killed in the 2001 attacks. Placing the names underground -- and providing space where visitors could reflect on the attacks -- was a centerpiece of Mr. Arad's vision.

Moving the names would eliminate the need for large underground chambers and would fundamentally change the visitors' experience. Instead of descending into the underground chambers, visitors would look at the names amid an open-air, tree-lined park. Nine million people are expected to visit the memorial the year after its planned opening, which, despite the redesign, is scheduled for Sept. 11, 2009.

Visitor access to the underground slurry wall, which protects the site from the nearby Hudson River and survived the collapse of the Twin Towers, would be limited to a smaller area than before.

Before the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey could take responsibility for building the memorial, the transportation agency -- controlled by the two states' governors -- would have to agree to take on the cost of underground infrastructure shared by the memorial and a neighboring rail station, shopping mall and office buildings. The May report estimated the cost of infrastructure -- including ramps, air-conditioning plants and sidewalks -- at $300 million. Mr. Sciame's analysis put the cost between $150 million and $200 million, according to those familiar with his report.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Rejects US Troop Pullout In Iraq (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 16, 2006

Congress plunged into divisive election-year debate on the Iraq war Thursday as the U.S. military death toll reached 2,500. The Senate soundly rejected a call to withdraw combat troops by year's end, and House Republicans laid the groundwork for their own vote.

In a move Democrats criticized as gamesmanship, Senate Republicans brought up the withdrawal measure and quickly dispatched it — for now — on a 93-6 vote.

The proposal would have allowed "only forces that are critical to completing the mission of standing up Iraqi security forces" to remain in Iraq in 2007.

Across Capitol Hill in a daylong House debate, Republicans defended the Iraq war as a key part of the global fight against terrorism while Democrats assailed President Bush's war policies and called for a new direction in the conflict.

"When our freedom is challenged, Americans do not run," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said in remarks laden with references to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"This is a war that is a grotesque mistake," countered House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. She called for a fresh strategy — "one that will make us safer, strengthen our military, and restore our reputation in the world."

House Republicans moved toward a vote on a nonbinding resolution Friday morning to reject any timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces.

Democrats, for their part, seized on reports that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki wants, as part of a national reconciliation plan, to pardon insurgents who had attacked U.S. troops. In both the House and Senate, Democrats urged Republicans and the president to denounce the plan.

Congress roared into debate on the three-year conflict four months before midterm elections that will decide the control of both the House and Senate — and as Bush was trying to rebuild waning public support for the conflict.

The administration was so determined to get its message out that the Pentagon distributed a highly unusual 74-page "debate prep book" filled with ready-made answers for criticism of the war.

"We cannot cut and run," the Pentagon battle plan says at one point, anticipating Democratic calls for a troop withdrawal on a fixed timetable.

As the debates got under way, the Senate sent the president an additional $66 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan — legislation Bush promptly signed — and the same day, the Pentagon announced the U.S. death toll for the war had reached 2,500.

"It's a number," White House press secretary Tony Snow said of the grim milestone. He said that Bush "feels very deeply the pain that the families feel."

The president has tried to rally support for the Iraq war in the days since the death of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the recent completion of a new Iraqi government.

But as the death toll and price tag of the conflict continue to rise, opinion polls show voters increasingly frustrated with the war and favoring Democrats to control Congress instead of the Republicans who now run the show.

Sensitive to those political realities, Republicans in both the Senate and House sought to put lawmakers of both parties on record on an issue certain to be central in this fall's congressional elections.

The Senate vote unfolded unexpectedly as the second-ranking leader, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., introduced legislation he said was taken from a proposal by Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and war critic. It called for Bush to agree with the Iraqi government on a schedule for withdrawal of combat troops by Dec. 31, 2006.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said if the United States withdrew prematurely, "I am absolutely convinced the terrorists would see this as vindication." He predicted terrorism would spread around the world, and eventually reach the United States if the United States were to "cut and run" before Iraq can defend itself.

Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada shot back: "Two things that don't exist in Iraq and have not, weapons of mass destruction, and cutting and running."

He accused Republicans of political gamesmanship and sought to curtail floor debate on the proposal. The vote occurred quickly.

Kerry called the vote "fictitious" and promised further debate next week on the issue. He and five other Democrats were in the minority on the vote — Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, Barbara Boxer of California, Robert Byrd of West Virginia, Tom Harkin of Iowa and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Senate Republicans claimed victory with the lopsided tally. "This sent a good message that the United States Senate overwhelmingly opposes a cut-and-run strategy," said John Cornyn of Texas.

In the House, partisan politics took center stage from the day's outset.

Rep. Charles Norwood (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga., attacked war critics as defeatists who do not deserve re-election. "Is it al-Qaida or is it America? Let the voters take note of this debate," he said.

In turn, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (news, bio, voting record), D-Ill., said: "Democrats will never put American service members in harm's way without a plan, and without support. For that, you need the sit-and-watch complacency of a Republican Congress."

"In this fight for the future of peace, freedom and democracy in the Middle East and around the globe, winning should be our only option," Rep. Phil Gingrey (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga., said, sticking to the GOP script.

"Stay and we'll pay," countered Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record), D-Pa., who criticized "the failed policy of this administration" and lamented the lives lost, billions of dollars spent and the bruised U.S. image since the war started. "It's time to redeploy," he said.

Republicans arranged for the debate to culminate in a vote on a resolution that praises U.S. troops, labels the Iraq war part of the larger global fight against terrorism and says an "arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops is not in the national interest.

Democrats decried the debate as a sham, saying Republicans promised an open discussion but, instead, stacked the deck in their favor by limiting debate to 10 hours and barring any amendments. They also complained that Republicans refused to allow them to present an alternative resolution — though Democrats weren't able to agree on just what to offer.

US Troop Pullout From Iraq Rejected By Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Members of Congress yesterday engaged in a bitter and sometimes raucous debate over Iraq war policy, with the Senate overwhelmingly rejecting a measure to bring troops home by year's end, a move several Democrats have called for but did not back with their votes yesterday.

Meanwhile, House lawmakers traded barbs on whether the Iraq war is linked to terrorism during debate over a Republican-written resolution that rejects a timetable for withdrawal of troops and affirms a commitment to staying in Iraq until the nation is "sovereign, free, secure and united."

The events came during an election year in which Democrats see a chance to regain control of each chamber, and as the United States marked a grim milestone of 2,500 troops killed since the war began in March 2003.

"We've done everything we can do militarily," said Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the most vocal Democratic war opponent. "Only Iraqis can solve the problem in Iraq. I say it's time to redeploy and be ready."

"President Bush told us from the beginning that this road would not be easy," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert in a rare floor speech that opened the debate.

"The battle is not over," the Illinois Republican said. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to group and regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

"Three and a half years is hardly cutting and running," countered Rep. Diane Watson, California Democrat.

The House will vote today on the resolution, which also praises the troops and applauds the elimination of terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi in Iraq.

In the Senate, Republicans attempted to embarrass Sen. John Kerry by forcing a vote on a measure identical to one he had drafted calling for troop withdrawal by the end of 2006. Senators opposed the measure on a 93-6 vote, which was forced to the Senate floor by Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who ran for president in 2004, said he is crafting the withdrawal proposal with other Democrats, and said he was frustrated at what he called political games by the Republicans. Mr. Kerry added he plans a "serious debate" on a measure "that bears my name."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said withdrawal would vindicate terrorists.

"This sent a good message that the United States Senate overwhelmingly opposes a cut-and-run strategy," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0034901

Besides Mr. Kerry, the resolution was backed by five Democrats -- Barbara Boxer of California, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, Tom Harkin of Iowa and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

In the House, Republicans, armed with talking points from the leadership and the Pentagon, invoked September 11 and the bombing of the USS Cole.

"If some people continue to preach cut and run for this war then they will continue to kill Americans and kill Americans and kill Americans," said Rep. Terry Everett, Alabama Republican. "I prefer doing it over in Iraq rather than in New York or Washington, D.C., or San Francisco."

Mr. Murtha, a decorated Vietnam veteran, angrily responded: "I know what rhetoric is and I know what fighting in the front lines are. ... You're not talking about Iraq. I'm talking about Iraq."

Republicans noted progress they have seen in Iraq, including establishment of the government, advancement of women's rights and democratic voting.

"Iraq is a catalyst for hope, a vivid example that the future of the broader Middle East belongs to freedom and democracy," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican.

Democrats said President Bush misled the country and lashed the administration for gaffes such as the torture of detainees in the Abu Ghraib prison. Several called for the firing of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"Our postwar mission as presently defined cannot succeed," said Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence panel, who called for a "dramatic change of course."

Mr. Murtha rattled off some grisly statistics, including the increase in the number of attacks in Iraq daily, the rise in the number of insurgents and the conflict's $8 billion per month price tag.

Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, called the war "a blunder of historic proportions by this president."

But Rep. Henry J. Hyde, chairman of the House International Relations Committee and the resolution's sponsor, said lawmakers owe Mr. Bush "thanks, not condemnation."

"To insist that decisions must await perfect intelligence ... is to guarantee our defeat," the Illinois Republican said, adding, "Defeat in this new and more dangerous world means annihilation."

Democrats pointedly thanked and praised the troops before making their remarks.

But statements of support for the troops "ring hollow if we don't also say we support their mission," Mr. Hastert said.

Congress Boosts Iraq War Funds But Debates How Long To Stay (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress sent President Bush billions of dollars more for the war in Iraq even as lawmakers debated into the night over how long the U.S. can afford to keep troops there.

Republicans seized the offensive, taking advantage of divisions among Democrats to force quick votes against withdrawal. But on the day that U.S. troop deaths in Iraq reached 2,500, the partisan tone distressed members in both parties and could create a backlash against the majority.

"The signs are evident that we are close today to a calamity if we don't recalibrate our policies," said Rep. Jim Leach (R., Iowa) in an implicit warning to fellow Republicans. "The issue is no longer the need to stay the course. It is to avoid overstaying the present."

The wartime-spending measure, including an additional $65.8 billion for military operations overseas, brings the total U.S. financial commitment in Iraq to almost $320 billion. Thus far, Congress has shown no willingness to withhold funds as it has in past wars, like Vietnam. While Senate Democrats are beginning to coalesce around an amendment calling for a phased withdrawal through 2007, the proposal is nonbinding on Mr. Bush.

In a pre-emptive skirmish yesterday, Senate Republicans engineered a 93-6 vote rejecting a more severe plan calling for withdrawal by the end of the year. The House will vote this morning on a Republican resolution opposing any "arbitrary date" for a pullout and committing the U.S. to complete the "mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq."

Debate ran late last night as House leaders promised time for all members to air their ideas. But what was once billed by Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) as a "conversation" on Iraq evolved into more of a Republican political offensive that Democrats called a "charade."

"It's already uglier than I thought it would be," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest (R., Md.), a Marine veteran of Vietnam, on his way to the floor. A debate prep book, compiled by the National Security Council and including Pentagon documents, was distributed by the White House. Rep. Charles Norwood (R., Ga.) urged voters to throw out the "defeatists" in November: "Is it al Qaeda or is it America?" he said.

A central question is whether Republicans can convince voters that Iraq is "the central battlefield of this moment" in the larger war against terrorism as described by Rep. Tom Cole (R., Okla.) In opening debate, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) devoted much of his remarks to the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"It is a battle we must endure," he said. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

Responding for the Democrats, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania said Iraq has proved a costly distraction from the larger war against al Qaeda, whose presence in Iraq has grown since the U.S. invasion but is outweighed by the threat to U.S. troops from insurgents and sectarian violence.

"We think we're caught in a civil war. The military cannot win this war. It's the way we're doing it is what I disagree with," said Mr. Murtha, who argued the U.S. can either "stay and pay" or "redeploy and be ready."

A Marine veteran of Vietnam, Mr. Murtha has become his party's lead spokesman for withdrawal and was confident the House debate hadn't helped Republicans. But Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) hasn't been able to express a strategy for her party, given the continued divisions. At a Democratic whip meeting, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) joked that perhaps the House should vote first on the Republican resolution and then debate later.

By nightfall, both sides seemed to admit there had been too much focus on the past. "Let's look ahead...How are you going to achieve this pep talk that's going to be voted on?" Rep. Vic Snyder (D., Ark,) asked Republicans.

In turn, Republicans were more willing to admit errors if Democrats would also stop talking about the past and help shape a consensus on what to do next.

"We are in Iraq. Today it is a training ground, a recruiting ground for terrorists," said Rep. John McHugh (R., N.Y.). "We should talk about how that happened so we don't repeat it in the future, but it is the reality for the moment. What do we do to end it? Where do we draw the line? Where do we say this is where we have to win?"

Congress Erupts In Partisan Fight Over War In Iraq (NYT)

By Robin Toner And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — The House and the Senate engaged in angry, intensely partisan debate on Thursday over the war in Iraq, as Republicans sought to rally support for the Bush administration's policies and exploit Democratic divisions in an election year shadowed by unease over the war.

It was one of the sharpest legislative clashes yet over the three-year-old conflict, and it came after three days in which President Bush and his aides had sought to portray Iraq as moving gradually toward a stable, functioning democracy, and to portray Democrats as lacking the will to see the conflict through to victory.

In the House, lawmakers moved toward a vote on a Republican resolution promising to "complete the mission" in Iraq, prevail in the global fight against terrorism and oppose any "arbitrary date for withdrawal." In the Senate, lawmakers voted overwhelmingly to shelve an amendment calling on the United States to withdraw most troops by the end of this year, although Democrats vowed to revisit the debate next week.

Both actions were carefully engineered by the Republicans in charge, and for the moment put both chambers on a path to rejecting Congressional timetables for withdrawal .

House Republicans asserted that their resolution was essential to assure American troops and the world that the United States was behind the war in Iraq and the broader struggle against terrorism.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois opened the formal debate on a war that, the government announced Thursday, had claimed the lives of 2,500 American troops. "It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious," he said of the fight in Iraq and beyond. "The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

He said the American troops in Iraq knew their cause was noble. "It is time for this House of Representatives to tell the world that we know it, too, that we know our cause is right and that we are proud of it." Democrats, divided over the wisdom of the war but more or less united in condemning Mr. Bush's management of it, countered that the Republican resolution was a political ploy, "a press release for staying the course in Iraq," as Representative Jane Harman, Democrat of California, put it.

At the start of the debate, Representative Ike Skelton, Democrat of Missouri, asked for a moment of silence to recognize the 2,500 American military deaths in Iraq. Many lawmakers talked about visiting the troops, in Iraq and in hospitals, and about the toll in death and suffering.

Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat and Vietnam War veteran whose call for a speedy withdrawal of troops transformed the debate last year, rose repeatedly to tell Republicans, "Rhetoric does not solve the problem." He added: "We need a plan. It's not enough to say stay the course."

Referring to the sectarian violence cleaving Iraq, Mr. Murtha said, "They're fighting each other, and our troops are caught in between." The House, which debated the resolution for more than 11 hours on Thursday, is scheduled to vote on it on Friday. The Senate debate will continue into next week.

Five months before the November elections, partisan passions ran high. Republicans argued repeatedly that their Democratic opponents lacked the toughness to confront terrorism, returning to themes that they used successfully in 2004. "Many, but not all, on the other side of the aisle lack the will to win," said Representative Charlie Norwood, Republican of Georgia. "The American people need to know precisely who they are." He said: "It is time to stand up and vote. Is it Al Qaeda, or is it America?"

Democrats countered, at times with barely controlled fury. Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, described the war "as a grotesque mistake." She and others said Congressional Republicans were simply trying to "trap" Democrats, not engage them in a true debate. The resolution Republicans offered could not be amended, but only voted up or down.

Democrats in the Senate cried foul when Republicans forced a vote on a withdrawal amendment originally developed by Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts. Mr. Kerry had held off from seeking a vote on it, while working with other Democrats to seek a broader consensus. But Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, simply scratched out Mr. Kerry's name, replaced it with his own and offered it for debate. Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, characterized the amendment as "cutting and running."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, one of many Senate Democrats who oppose Mr. Kerry's amendment, rose to declare, "There are two things that don't exist in Iraq: cutting and running, and weapons of mass destruction." Mr. Reid moved to remove the amendment from consideration, and his motion was approved by a vote of 93 to 6. Senate Democrats promised to return next week with additional amendments on an exit strategy for American troops.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, portrayed the vote to table the amendment as a declaration of support for the fledgling Iraqi government. "This sends a good message that the United States government opposes, overwhelmingly, a cut-and-run strategy."

But Democrats said the vote was just a political game. "It's just kind of a jump-ball, stick-it-to-them kind of thing," said Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat.

Democrats have been divided over a deadline for the withdrawal of American troops. Last November, they rallied around legislation, which passed in an overwhelming bipartisan vote, that declared 2006 should be a "year of significant transition" in Iraq. In both chambers, Democrats have been trying to arrive at language that goes beyond that, but stops short of a firm deadline.

In a highly unusual attempt to influence the debate, the Pentagon sent a 74-page "prep book" to several members of Congress, outlining what it called "rapid response" talking points to rebut criticism of Mr. Bush's handling of the war and prewar intelligence. The Pentagon sent the book to Democratic leaders on Wednesday night, apparently in error, then sent an e-mail message two hours later asking to recall it.

The resolution under debate in the House declares that the United States and its allies are "engaged in a global war on terror, a long and demanding struggle against an adversary that is driven by hatred of American values and that is committed to imposing, by the use of terror, its repressive ideology throughout the world." It also declares that "the terrorists have declared Iraq to be the central front in their war against all who oppose their ideology."

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, asserted that "the war in Afghanistan was the response to the terrorist attacks" — not the war in Iraq.

The combination of the popular and unpopular in this resolution — support for the troops, combined with an endorsement of the administration's policy and a rejection of any withdrawal deadline — left many Democrats in a bind as they headed toward Friday's vote. But some Democrats argued that it left Republicans in a bind, too, committed to an open-ended presence in Iraq.

House Debate On Iraq War Gets Under Way (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 15, 2006

The House erupted in impassioned, election year debate over Iraq war on Thursday, Republicans defending the conflict as key to winning the global struggle against terrorism while Democrats excoriated President Bush and his policies.

"Is it al Qaida or is it America? Let the voters take note of this debate," said Republican Rep. Charles Norwood (news, bio, voting record) of Georgia, attacking war critics as defeatists who do not deserve re-election.

The war was "a grotesque mistake," countered the Democratic leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record) of California. "The administration continues to dig a hole. They refuse to come up and see the light," she said.

The debate unfolded four months before midterm elections that will decide the control of Congress.

The United States has absorbed the deaths of 2,500 troops in the three-year conflict, which began when a U.S.-led invasion toppled Saddam Hussein, but quickly turned sour in the face of a brutal insurgency.

Polls show the war has become unpopular. But Bush has tried to rally support in the days since the death of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and the recent completion of an new Iraqi government.

The Pentagon prepared a battle plan for the debate, distributing a highly unusual 74-page "debate prep book" filled with ready-made answers for criticism of the war.

"Iraq will become a haven for terrorists, murderers and thugs," if the United States leaves "before the job is done," the booklet says.

"We cannot cut and run," it says at another point, anticipating Democratic calls for a troop withdrawal on a fixed timetable.

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the 74-page document. It was sent to both Republicans and Democrats and it laid out the administration's positions in strong terms and offered page after page of counterpoints to criticisms that Democrats typically level against Bush's war policies.

"In this fight for the future of peace, freedom and democracy in the Middle East and around the globe, winning should be our only option," said Rep. Phil Gingrey (news, bio, voting record), R-Ga.

Countered Rep. Carolyn Kilpatrick (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich.: "Retired generals have spoken. We need a new direction. The troops should be redeployed. They should be brought home at the most practicable time with a plan that we don't now have under this administration."

Republicans arranged for the debate to culminate in a vote either later Thursday or Friday on legislation — a resolution — that labels the Iraq war part of the larger global fight against terrorism and says an "arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops is not in the national interest.

Across the Capitol, partisan tensions on the Iraq war were clear as the Senate debated annual military legislation. Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic Party presidential candidate in 2004 and a potential 2008 standard-bearer, expected to introduce an amendment that calls for the administration to redeploy combat forces from that war zone by year's end.

In the House, Republicans sought to put lawmakers of both parties on record on an issue certain to be central in this fall's congressional elections.

"The fundamental question in this debate is: Are we going to confront the threat of terrorism and defeat it, or will we relent and retreat and hope the problem goes away?" House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said, providing a preview of the possible GOP line of attack should Democrats balk.

As the death toll and price tag of Iraq rise, opinion polls show voters are frustrated with the war and favor Democrats to control Congress instead of the Republicans who now run the show.

Sensitive to those political realities, House Republican leaders want to make Democrats defend their positions on Iraq — and highlight deep differences on the matter within the Democratic Party — while trying to present their own unified position calling for staying the course in both Iraq and the larger war on terrorism.

But differences also exist within the GOP and those are sure to be discussed as well.

Republican leaders portray the debate as the first of its kind since the Iraq war started in 2003. But they staged a similar vote on a resolution rejecting the immediate withdrawal of troops last year after Democratic Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, in a reversal, called for a quick exit from Iraq.

Democrats dismiss the House GOP resolution as nothing more than political theatrics, and they were expected to use the debate to rail against Bush's wartime policies. Yet they also are mindful that voting against such a resolution could leave them vulnerable to attacks by Republicans who could claim that Democrats who opposed the resolution don't support U.S. troops and advocate a "cut-and-run" strategy.

To that end, a memo this week by Boehner urged his fellow Republicans to frame the debate as "a portrait of contrasts between Republicans and Democrats."

In both the House and Senate, Democrats appear to be divided into three camps. Some want troops to leave Iraq this year. Others object to setting any kind of timetable. A number of them want the United States to start redeploying forces by year's end but don't want to set a date when all troops should be out.

Congress Becomes A Battleground In Iraq War (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034905

WASHINGTON -- For the first time since the United States invaded Iraq three years ago, Republican leaders on Thursday officially convened a full-scale debate over the war -- an effort that they hoped would showcase the increasingly divergent positions of the two parties and that wound up unleashing fierce passions and acrimony on both sides.

Democrats denounced the debate in the House of Representatives as a "sham," objecting to Republicans' characterization of debate on a nonbinding resolution on the war as a choice between "staying the course" and "cutting and running."

Republicans accused Democrats of indecision and division, repeatedly equating talk of withdrawal with "retreat."

"Members, this is not the time to go wobbly. Let's give victory a chance," proclaimed Rep. Gil Gutknecht, R-Minn.

"This side is not trying to go wobbly," countered Rep. Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. "We're trying to articulate what we think would be a better strategy for success in Iraq."

The rancor spilled over to the Senate, where Republican leaders forced a test vote on the idea of withdrawal in an effort to fan divisions among Democrats. The measure failed 93-6.

"This sends a good message that the U.S. Senate overwhelming opposes a cut-and-run strategy in Iraq," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), whose ideas on withdrawal formed the basis for the Republican-offered measure, denounced the maneuver as a "fibbing and fictitious vote." He said he was still working on his version of a withdrawal plan and would introduce it next week.

"I look forward to having a debate, but I look forward to having a debate on the amendment that I bring as a senator," Kerry said.

The long-postponed debate on Iraq comes four months before the midterm congressional elections, in which some strategists believe that sentiment for and against the war could determine which party emerges with a majority in Congress.

And it coincided with an announcement by the Pentagon that the number of U.S. personnel who have died in Iraq has reached 2,500. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., took advantage of that milestone to call for a moment of silence on the House floor in honor of the fallen.

"This nation is at a strategic crossroads," Skelton said. "We are spending $9 billion a month and have spent over $300 billion total on this war. More strikingly, we are losing a battalion's worth of casualties a month, killed and injured ....

"We have been there some three years," he added. "I think it's time for us to seriously look at where we are, where we're going."

Until Thursday, the House of Representatives had not formally debated military operations in Iraq since October 2002, when the chamber voted to authorize the use of force if Iraq failed to comply with United Nations demands. The United States invaded and occupied Iraq six months later.

An upsurge in violence and a perceived lack of progress in rebuilding the country politically and economically has sapped public support for the war.

All the same, many Republicans believe that discussing the war works to their party's favor politically, allowing them to press the assertion that Democrats are weak and indecisive on national security issues.

"Frankly, I believe their real challenge is that they have no common unified position on Iraq as a party," said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla. "Whether we are right or wrong on our side of the aisle, we do have a common position and it's expressed in this resolution."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., outlined the GOP position in opening the debate. He spoke at length about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and asserted that Iraq was an integral part of the campaign against terrorism that began that day.

"It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious. The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores," Hastert said.

In an effort to force Democrats into an uncomfortable vote, Republican leaders -- including Hastert -- crafted a resolution that combined expressions of support for the troops and resolve in combating terrorism with a commitment to the engagement in Iraq. They also adopted rules that did not permit Democrats to offer amendments.

"It's really unfortunate, as the president contends that we are fighting for democracy in Iraq, that we can't have democracy on the House floor," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

"We expected a resolution confined to the country of Iraq and the conflict there," Skelton said. "That is not what this resolution is. This resolution covers the entire Middle East waterfront, trying to blend together the Iraqi war and the war against terrorism, which has its genesis in Afghanistan. These are two separate and distinct wars."

A vote on the House resolution is expected Friday.

In the Senate, Democrats and Republicans engaged in parliamentary hardball throughout the day as they debated a defense spending authorization bill.

DOJ_NMG_0034906

Seizing on news reports that Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, supported amnesty for some insurgents who had killed Americans, Democrats sought to embarrass the administration by quickly offering an amendment to the bill condemning the idea.

Republicans, seeking to encourage the divisions between Democrats over whether and when to withdraw from Iraq, countered by introducing an amendment calling for withdrawal by the end of the year.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the chamber's second-ranking Republican, introduced under his own name a withdrawal proposal that Kerry had outlined earlier in the week.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., seeking to scuttle the Republican move, quickly called for a test vote on the measure. In Iraq, he said, there are "two things that don't exist: weapons of mass destruction and 'cutting and running.' "

Just six Democrats -- Sens. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., Russell Feingold, D-Wis., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Kerry -- voted for the withdrawal measure.

Reid is working on a withdrawal proposal that he hopes will attract the support of a large number of Senate Democrats. Debate continues on the defense bill next week.

Iraq Debate Pits Uncertainty Against Anxiety (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The new Republican drive to focus attention on the Iraq war represents a high-stakes gamble: that doubts about the direction Democrats might set on national security exceed anxieties about the course charted by President Bush.

Through a series of high-profile efforts culminating Thursday with sustained House and Senate debates on the war, the White House and congressional Republicans are aiming to portray Democrats as too soft and too divided to steer the Iraq conflict to a successful conclusion.

But in the process, Republicans risk deepening their identification with a war that, surveys show, still sparks skepticism and concern among most Americans — even after the spike in public support that followed the killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

In Thursday's debates on Capitol Hill, Republicans argued that Democrats would withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq too quickly. But they also provided the opportunity for a succession of Democrats to argue that Bush would stay too long.

The political fallout from this escalating confrontation in November's midterm election may pivot on which three words voters find more troubling: "cut and run" or "stay the course."

Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, said that although the debate illuminated divisions among Democrats, it also posed a clear political danger to Republicans.

"The Republicans have the potential of being seen as overreaching, of trying to stay in Iraq until we have it exactly the way we want it," Kull said.

The coordinated Republican push on Iraq, which included Bush's surprise visit to the country this week and a lengthy news conference after his return, highlights a core element of the GOP strategy for the fall's vote. Among Republican strategists, it is an article of faith that the party will fare better if it can shift the focus of voters from a backward-looking referendum on Bush's record to a forward-looking choice over the path America should follow.

Democratic candidates have been encouraging voters to use the election as a means of expressing discontent with the Bush administration's Iraq policy since the U.S. invasion more than three years ago. But Republicans want voters to ask which party they believe would be more likely to produce progress in Iraq in the months and years ahead.

"We think we can win that debate," said one senior GOP strategist familiar with White House thinking, who requested anonymity when discussing internal party deliberations. "We won it in 2004, and the Iraq war was not particularly popular then. It is better when we debate other people instead of debating events."

As part of this strategy, House GOP leaders offered a resolution Thursday asserting that U.S. interests would not be served by setting "an arbitrary date" for withdrawing troops from Iraq. The measure, due for a vote today, also expresses support for the Iraq war "as part of the global war on terror."

Senate Republican leaders, seeking to embarrass their Democratic colleagues, forced a vote on a resolution supporting the withdrawal of almost all U.S. troops by year's end — a plan Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) has said he expects to propose next week. The resolution failed, 93-6.

In pressing their case on Iraq, Republicans have argued that most Democrats want to precipitously withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq before the country is secured — a policy Republicans deride as "cutting and running."

DOJ_NMG_0034907

Bush, at his news conference Wednesday, and GOP lawmakers, during Thursday's debates, argued that the key to success in Iraq was perseverance and determination.

"We know this: Our enemies are persistent and will stay the course," said Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.). "So that is the choice we face as a nation … a choice between resolve and retreat."

Such pronouncements, GOP strategists say, taps into a traditional, if diluted, Bush strength — the sense among most voters that he provides strong leadership — as well as a traditional Democratic weakness — doubts about the party's toughness on national security.

Yet the Republican stress on "staying the course" allowed Democrats to maintain that Bush and his congressional supporters were promising Americans only an open-ended commitment in Iraq.

The core Democratic strategy in the House debate was to catalog the costs and disappointments of the war — Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) noted that the death toll for U.S. troops had reached 2,500 — and to charge that the Republican position guaranteed more of the same.

"Instead of staying the course, we need to chart a smarter course," Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Texas) said. "It's not weakness or retreat to realize the administration offers us only an endless spend-and-bleed policy."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, declared: "Stand pat, stay put, status quo: That is the Republican policy."

The political danger for Republicans is that although public opinion has moved in Bush's direction since Zarqawi's death, polls show that most Americans remain disillusioned with the war. For instance, in an NBC News/Wall Street Journal survey released Thursday, 52% said the war had not been worth the cost, whereas 40% said it had.

Kull, of the University of Maryland, noted that past gains in public support for the war "have had a short half-life," receding as the violence in Iraq continued.

For Democrats, the polls show political danger if Republicans can succeed in portraying them as backing a policy of "retreat" that would leave Iraq in chaos. In recent surveys, Americans have divided almost evenly on whether the U.S. should withdraw its troops before Iraq is stabilized.

Carl Forti, communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee, predicted that the principal political value for his party from this week's congressional debate would come from identifying Democrats with an antiwar position that he argued most Americans would reject.

Americans "understand we can't walk away," Forti said. "To have Democrats so far out to the left on this is almost more effective than anything we can say ourselves."

Some critics of the war raised the opposite charge against congressional Democrats, complaining that they had not identified the party with a clear alternative to Bush's Iraq policy.

House Democrats failed to offer a partywide alternative to the GOP resolution. And the Senate's vote suggested that the amendment Kerry is planning on U.S. troop withdrawal will attract scant support. Despite intensive internal negotiations, other Senate Democrats have not reached agreement on a more moderate alternative.

"As long as no one is going to have a clear stand on the war … [Democrats] are not going to maximize the political benefits from the troubles the president finds himself in," said Ivo H. Daalder, a war critic and senior fellow at the Brookings Institution think tank.

GOP Bill Would Reject Deadline For Withdrawal (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans in Congress sought on Thursday to capitalize on recent good news from Iraq by opening an election-year debate on a resolution to back President Bush's wartime policy, a bid they hope will neutralize Democrats' advantage on the issue.

The House of Representatives is expected to vote today on a resolution declaring “that it is not in the national security interest … to set an arbitrary date” for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

In the Senate, Republicans pulled a switch on the Democrats by offering an amendment to withdraw combat troops by the end of the year, saying it was based on a plan by Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. It was shelved on a vote of 93-6.

Earlier, the Senate approved and Bush later signed a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as to aid hurricane victims.

Recent polls indicate the public believes Democrats would do a better job on Iraq than Republicans. GOP leaders hoped to shift momentum after the death of terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the formation of an Iraqi government.

Bush made a surprise visit to Iraq on Tuesday. He chided Democrats on Wednesday that while bringing troops home “may sound good politically, it will endanger our country to pull out of Iraq before we accomplish the mission.”

House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the floor debate would “help educate Americans about where their members are” on Iraq. In a memo to other Republicans, he said he wanted the debate to create a “portrait of contrast” between Republicans who “believe victory in Iraq will be an important blow to terrorism” and Democrats who “are prone to waver endlessly about the use of force to protect American ideals.”

On a day when both chambers of Congress paused in silence to mark the 2,500th U.S. death in Iraq, House Democrats accused Republican leaders of playing politics.

Republicans are “trying to create a trap” to force Democrats to appear opposed to supporting the troops, said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California. While Democrats have differed over whether to set timetables for withdrawal, Pelosi said, they agree the war was “a grotesque mistake.”

Some Republicans also questioned their leaders' decision to give Democrats a platform to remind voters of missteps in Iraq.

“This is dragging everyone down in the polls,” said Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill. “Now is not the right time to be highlighting the war.”

The House resolution is “a continuation of our rhetoric from the past,” said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, R-Md. “We need a sense of urgency to end the war successfully.”

It's not clear which party will get a boost that will help in November.

John Pitney, a political scientist at California's Claremont McKenna College, said that while the strategy “diminishes the Democratic advantage on the issue,” speeches aren't enough. “The situation in Iraq would have to improve dramatically before it became a net plus for the GOP,” he said.

Parties Face Off Over Iraq War In 11-Hour Debate (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Congress plunged into a wide-ranging debate over the origins and conduct of the war in Iraq yesterday, with each party excoriating the other for alleged weakness and complacency about the stakes involved.

As the Pentagon announced the 2,500th death of a U.S. service member in the conflict, the House embarked on its first extended discussion of the war since Congress authorized force nearly four years ago. More than 140 lawmakers took the floor to applaud or attack President Bush's prosecution of the war in an 11-hour debate scheduled to last until nearly midnight.

The debate will culminate today with a vote on a Republican-drafted resolution declaring that the United States must complete "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq" without setting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of U.S. troops.

In the Senate, Republicans tried to put Democrats on the record as supporting or opposing an amendment -- drafted by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) but submitted for a vote by Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) -- to demand a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Senate Democrats, meanwhile, pushed Republicans to condemn a proposal by the newly formed Iraqi government to offer limited amnesty to insurgents who had killed U.S. troops.

Though the day's rhetoric was often partisan in tone, the discontent over the status quo in Iraq was evident on both sides. Dozens of lawmakers spoke emotionally -- recriminations mixed with appeals to patriotism -- on how the nation should proceed in the three-year-old conflict that has become more protracted, deadly and complex than most of them had expected at its outset.

The votes will not bind the administration, but the debates had the effect of putting scores of elected officials on the record concerning the nation's most pressing issue at a moment when the approaching midterm elections are putting control of both the House and the Senate in play.

House Republicans took the offensive, repeatedly asserting that Democrats have adopted a "defeatist" policy of retreat that would embolden international terrorists and imperil national security. Their position was bolstered by a 74-page document drafted by the White House and distributed by the Pentagon, replete with talking points, quotations and timelines to back administration policy. Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) called the document "an affront to the American people."

"We're not making progress," said Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Marine Corps veteran who has emerged as his party's leading opponent of the war. He said Iraqis are fighting a low-grade civil war in which U.S. soldiers should not be involved. "They're fighting each other, and our troops are caught in between," he said.

"We make progress every day," countered Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), who contended that the only people who want the U.S. military to leave Iraq are terrorists and "some politicians." Looking at Murtha, he added: "Don't get confused about every little problem that happens."

In the Senate, Republicans were also spoiling for a chance to depict Democrats as soft on the war, but Democrats largely thwarted the effort. GOP senators wanted a vote on language recently drafted by Kerry calling for nearly all U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the year's end. But Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, surprised the Republicans by declining to offer the language as an amendment to a defense authorization bill, after colleagues had urged him to consider possible revisions.

To force a debate and a vote, McConnell, the GOP whip, introduced Kerry's language as his own, knowing that all Senate Republicans and most Democrats would vote against it. Democrats objected when Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called the measure "Kerry's amendment." Kerry said the maneuver led to "a fibbing, fictitious vote."

The Senate voted 93 to 6 to reject the amendment. The six Democrats who voted against killing it were Kerry, Barbara Boxer (Calif.), Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), Russell Feingold (Wis.), Tom Harkin (Iowa) and Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.).

Vice President Cheney weighed in, taking note of Kerry's statement earlier this week urging fellow Democrats who joined him in authorizing force in 2002 to acknowledge that the war is a mistake. "I'm not surprised at John Kerry switching his position yet again," Cheney said on Sean Hannity's radio talk show. Kerry is charging "that somehow he was misled," the vice president said. "He wasn't misled. He saw the same intelligence all the rest of us saw. He knew what an evil actor Saddam Hussein was."

Frist used the brief Senate debate to say that a substantial troop withdrawal by Dec. 31 would amount to "cutting and running" and would prompt Iraq to renew its pursuit of "weapons of mass destruction." Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) replied that "two things don't exist in Iraq: weapons of mass destruction, and cutting and running."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Democrats will propose language next week calling on Bush to "begin the phased redeployment of U.S. troops this year."

Senate Democrats tried to gain the upper hand in yesterday's debate by seizing on a Washington Post article reporting that Iraq's new prime minister is considering limited amnesty for guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops. Two Democrats who are running in competitive states this fall -- Sens. Bill Nelson (Fla.) and Robert Menendez (N.J.) -- introduced a "sense of the Senate resolution" calling on Bush to strongly oppose the amnesty idea.

Republicans called the effort a pointless diversion, with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office having accepted the resignation of the aide who had described the possible amnesty plan.

Central to the House Republicans' argument was the much-disputed link between the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the war in Iraq. "We in this Congress must show the same steely resolve as those men and women on United Flight 93; the same sense of duty as the first responders who headed up the stairs of the twin towers," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We must stand firm in our commitment to fight terrorism and the evil it inflicts throughout the world."

"It is a choice between resolve and retreat," said Rep. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.), one of the most vulnerable Republicans in a swing district that has turned against the war.

Democrats criticized what they called nearly four years of congressional refusal to exercise oversight powers and to challenge the administration's Iraq policies. "Congress cannot be infinitely passive," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.).

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said: "This Republican Congress sat and watched the president make mistake after mistake after mistake. . . . You have adopted an approach of 'see no evil, speak no evil, hear no evil' with abandon."

Party lines stiffened during the debate. Even Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), one of five Republicans who signed a Democratic resolution demanding that the president develop an exit strategy, was content to simply implore his colleagues to "have a powerful sense of urgency to end the war and end the war successfully."

The debates played out less than five months before elections that will be colored by what recent polls have shown to be an unpopular war that has dragged down voter confidence in Bush and the GOP-led Congress.

But Republican strategists say their party can still take a page from Bush's 2004 reelection campaign and use the debate to portray Democrats as weak on national defense. GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said Democrats "have been badly outmaneuvered" by the White House and GOP leaders in capitalizing on Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death. "A couple of weeks ago, all the focus was on divisions in the GOP over immigration. Now it's Democratic division over the war and national security."

Congress Debates War As Death Toll Rises (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After more than three years and 2,500 deaths, the House embarked Thursday on its most extensive and impassioned debate about the war in Iraq, with Republicans demanding support for President Bush's course and Democrats calling for a change in direction to allow U.S. troops to come home.

DOJ_NMG_0034910

Lawmakers were expected to talk late into the night, resuming their debate Friday and then voting on a resolution crafted by Republican leaders. The highly partisan resolution would shun specific timetables for redeploying troops out of Iraq and casts the war as a central front in the war on terrorism.

The spectacle of Congress plunging into a substantive, heartfelt and relatively civil debate on the merits of the war reflects the urgency that lawmakers feel about addressing what has become a volatile political situation with midterm congressional elections looming in November. Democrats are trying to capitalize on voters' disenchantment, while Republicans are trying to portray themselves as resolute and strong.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was first to speak, casting the debate in sweeping, historic terms as a means to protect Americans from terrorists at home and to nurture a way of life.

"This resolution is about more than the war in Iraq and Afghanistan," said Hastert, who rarely speaks on the floor and votes on only the most important occasions. "It is about a global war to protect American ideals, and the democracy and values on which this great nation was founded. This resolution, like this war itself, is about freedom."

Democrats, however, called the proceedings undemocratic because Republicans would not allow them to offer amendments. And they accused the president of politicizing intelligence, barreling into the war without a plan and making repeated mistakes along the way.

"Democrats are united in saying we need a new direction in Iraq," said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California. "This is a war that is a grotesque mistake."

As the elections draw closer, Republicans are hoping to tout achievements in Iraq and to turn public opinion in their favor. But polls show Americans believe the war in Iraq is the most important issue facing the nation, and they have been disappointed in the way Bush and Congress have handled it.

Still, the timing of this week's debate could not have been better for Republicans. The recent killing of terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the formation of an Iraqi Cabinet and the emergence of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki may help the GOP make the case that the picture in Iraq is improving.

In the Senate, Republicans scored a quick political victory Thursday when Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) offered an amendment written by Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) that called for the withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of the year. The amendment was defeated 93-6.

But Democrats employed their own bit of symbolism when Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, asked for a moment of silence on the House floor to mark the 2,500th U.S. combat death, which occurred Thursday.

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow called the number a "sad benchmark."

"Any president who goes through a time of war feels very deeply the responsibility for sending men and women into harm's way, and feels very deeply the pain that the families feel," Snow said. "And this president is no different."

From one speaker to the next throughout the long day of House speeches, the strategy on both sides of the aisle was clear. Republicans stressed the evils of terrorism and the need to supporting the troops, while Democrats questioned the administration's competence and credibility.

"The truth has been a major casualty of the war in Iraq," said Rep. Jan Schakowksy (D-Ill.), a founder of the "Out of Iraq" caucus. "It is worth reviewing just a few of the statements presented as truth that were told over the last four years, some remarkably being said again today, that have been proven not true, never true and still not true."

Schakowsky noted that Vice President Dick Cheney said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction; Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said the war would cost $50 billion, and Bush himself declared that major combat operations in Iraq had ended on May 1, 2003.

Other Democrats said that Congress has abandoned its oversight responsibilities, allowing the administration to say or do anything without consequence.

"This Congress has adopted an approach of 'see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil' with abandon," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). "Democrats will never put American service members in harm's way without a plan and without support. For that, you need to sit and watch complacency of a Republican Congress."

In preparation for the debate, the Pentagon put together an unusual briefing book, laying out the case for war and providing responses to potential criticism that might arise. The book was sent to lawmakers, including anti-war congressmen, and the Pentagon later tried to recall it.

In their remarks, Republicans ticked off all the terrorist attacks that have occurred in recent years, beginning with the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut when Ronald Reagan was president and including the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States. Linking those attacks and the war in Iraq, lawmakers said the United States must not waver.

"We must stand firm in our commitment to fight terrorism and the evil it inflicts throughout the world," Hastert said. "We must renew our resolve that the actions of evildoers will not dictate American policy."

But Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), the Democrats' leading war critic, said it is time to leave the war-torn nation.

"Only the Iraqis can solve the problem in Iraq," said Murtha, a decorated Marine. "They're fighting with each other, and our troops are caught in between, and I say it's time to redeploy."

Congressional Debate On Iraq War More About Politics Than Policy (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn And William Douglas

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans firmly defended President Bush's policies in Iraq and Democrats accused his administration of waging a botched and mistaken war as the House of Representatives engaged Thursday in its first extended debate on the war since U.S. troops removed Saddam Hussein from power more than three years ago.

The election-year debate was freighted with politics, as Republicans seized on recent upbeat news from Iraq to portray Democratic calls for troop withdrawals as a policy of "cut and run." Yet for all the political overtones, the tone of the House debate was strikingly civil, sober and morally serious.

"We are making progress toward our goal, but the battle is not over," Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said. "It is a battle we must endure and one in which we can and will be victorious. The alternative would be to cut and run and wait for them to regroup and bring the terror back to our shores."

Democrats largely avoided discussion of a withdrawal deadline, focusing their attention on the continuing bloodshed in Iraq, as the U.S. military death toll reached 2,500 there on Thursday. They described conditions in Iraq as worse than when the war began in 2003 and said the war has damaged America's image abroad.

"It's not getting better. . . . Things are getting worse. . . . More Americans are being killed every day," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa. "We're caught in a civil war between 100,000 Shias and 20,000 Sunnis fighting each other."

The Democrats' stance against Bush belied deep divisions within their party on whether to withdraw from Iraq, and if so, how fast. In the Senate, an expected debate on a Democratic measure calling for gradual withdrawal wallowed on hold all day amid disputes among Democrats over the precise language of their proposal.

In one parliamentary ploy, Republicans forced Democrats to vote against an amendment similar to one pending from Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. It called for the United States to withdraw the bulk of its troops from Iraq by the end of this year. The Senate voted 93-6 to kill the measure. Kerry was among the six voting no, but he accused Republicans of forcing a "fictitious vote" and pledged to bring up his own version of the measure next week.

Kerry urged the Senate to eschew parliamentary gamesmanship and give "seriousness of purpose" to a "debate of this kind of consequence."

That vote, however, illustrated the squeamishness among Democratic lawmakers over supporting a hard and fast deadline for withdrawal, especially such an immediate one, despite pressure from the party's liberal base. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, consulting with his party's top foreign policy leaders, was inclined to seek a gradual withdrawal that would begin this year, aides said. The Senate is expected to debate that proposal next week.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has proposed that troops withdraw from Iraq by the end of 2007. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, would like redeployment to begin by the end of this year and conclude by the end of 2007.

In the House, lawmakers held a 10-hour debate on a resolution that equated the war in Iraq with the broader war against terrorism and specifically rejected setting a deadline for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. Under Republican rules, Democrats weren't able to offer any amendments. A vote on the resolution was expected Friday.

Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, offered a rare voice of Republican dissent, arguing that the Bush administration should reconsider its policy.

"The longer we stay, the greater the prospect that anarchistic acts will multiply and spread perhaps to our shores," he said. "The issue is no longer, as is so frequently asserted, the need to stay the course. It is to avoid overstaying the present."

In an unusual move, the Pentagon distributed a 72-page defense of the war to lawmakers. The document says that the Bush administration has a "three pillared strategy for victory" - establishing a liberal constitution with increased political participation, training Iraqi security forces and helping build the Iraqi economy.

Political strategists have said that the debate poses political dangers and opportunities for both sides. After steadily declining public support for the war and for his handling of it, President Bush appears for the moment to be benefiting from a spate of positive news from Iraq, including the death of al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the completion of the Iraqi Cabinet.

DOJ_NMG_0034912

But Iraq has proved to be unpredictable.

"Unless you are sure that things are going to get better there, you're putting an awful lot of chips on that number on the table," said Republican pollster and strategist Tony Fabrizio.

"The danger for Republicans is that it looks like (Democrats) have a better plan to extricate ourselves and maintain Iraqi security than we do," Fabrizio said. "So it all is going to come down to salesmanship. If (Democrats) get painted as cut and run, then they've lost that argument."

Democrats paint it as Bush's responsibility.

"This is the president's war," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California told reporters. "He has to answer for it."

They Don't Know Why They Did The Things They Did (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Cher, on Capitol Hill yesterday to promote better combat helmets for the troops, has long been a friend of the military. Seventeen years ago, she danced on the deck of the USS Missouri and, cladding her tattooed bottom in fishnet, straddled one of its 16-inch guns as she recorded her "If I Could Turn Back Time" video.

Cher had weightier thoughts on her mind, and more fabric on her body, when she took her seat yesterday for a hearing of a House Armed Services subcommittee, attended by a pack of solicitous congressmen and the other former Mrs. Sonny Bono, Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.). But even in full attire and a sedate setting, the presence of the ageless entertainer had a magical effect: Everybody was performing his own version of "If I Could Turn Back Time."

On the day the Pentagon announced that 2,500 troops had died in Iraq, the House spent 10 hours re-debating the decision to invade Iraq in 2003 -- at least until several of them left for a picnic at the White House.

Six years after his candidacy helped to deprive Al Gore of the presidency, Ralph Nader stopped by a Gore book-signing event to patch things up with his former foe.

Meanwhile, the House Government Reform Committee was meeting to find out why the Bush administration cut counterterrorism funding for the Washington area for this year by 40 percent -- even as lawmakers conceded it was too late to do anything about it.

The beat goes on.

The daylong retrospective began at the House Government Reform Committee, where Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) and other lawmakers were scolding Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman for his agency's decision to stiff Washington.

"One of the greatest displays of incompetence," said Carolyn Maloney (D-N.Y.) "It does boggle the mind," agreed Jim Moran (D-Va.). Florida's John Mica (R) added: "I've never seen a goofier list of priorities."

"You really think," Davis demanded, that "Montana is at a higher risk than D.C.?"

Foresman, his hands trembling slightly, advised Davis: "Congressman, there are all kinds of intricacies." Behind him, his aides were chewing gum, shaking their heads and passing notes.

But all Davis and his colleagues could do was complain. Foresman said he has no plan to revisit the decision, and lawmakers said the best they could do would be to fix things next year so it doesn't happen again.

La de da de de. La de da de da.

Next stop on the Turn-Back-Time tour: Olsson's book shop on 7th Street Northwest, where Gore was signing books at noon. "I'm not supposed to say anything, just sign books," he announced when he started. But when he got to number 214 in the line, he noticed the lanky figure and stood up. "Nice to see you! How you doing? . . . I'm really so grateful to you for coming by."

After more pleasantries, Gore scribbled a line in the book: "For my friend, Ralph Nader. With respect, Al Gore."

Nader was smitten. "He's liberated!" Nader said. "He's defining what progressive Democrats should be about."

Had they reached such a rapport six years ago, Gore might have won the election in 2000, as two men in line reminded Nader. "Thanks to you, we had Bush all these years," said one. "How many are dead in Iraq because of that?"

La de da de de. La de da de da.

Back on the Hill, both houses of Congress were in a raucous, backward-looking debate about the war in Iraq. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) tried to Turn Back Time to 2003. "This is a blunder of historic proportions," he said of the war.

Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.) went back even further back in time: "The historic blunder is that we didn't confront the problem in the 1990s."

Disgusted with the proceedings, Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) advised any Iraqi parliamentarians watching on television: "Don't try this at home."

DOJ_NMG_0034913

The Senate attempted a more forward-looking debate: a resolution calling for most troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the end of the year. But it was difficult to take the senators seriously: A third of them wore blue-and-white striped suits in honor of "Seersucker Thursday," making the floor of the Senate resemble a Good Humor convention.

"If we were to cut and run," said Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), wearing a seersucker suit and white shoes, "bloody civil war would result." Frist returned to his office, where free ice cream was being served to all.

The Senate dispensed with the Iraq debate quickly, freeing the lawmakers to attend the annual congressional picnic at the White House.

La de da de de. La de da de da.

With everybody else living in the past, Cher herself seemed to be enjoying the present yesterday, as lawmakers fussed over her.

At the hearing room, signs on chairs dictated the seating: "Reserved Army;" "Reserved Navy;" "Reserved Cher."

"I'm waiting for Cher!" a star-struck Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) boasted to a colleague as he stood near the elevator. "Do you know who I'm waiting for?" he asked another.

Lawmakers besieged the singer when she emerged, in blue sunglasses and a black suit. Mike Conaway (R-Tex.) invited her to take a trip with him to Germany and Iraq, "whenever you want."

"I'd love to," Cher said politely.

Afterward, the giddy Conaway told an aide: "She said she'd do it!"

But will she wear fishnet?

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

A colleague, strolling through the Bush Diplomatic Hall of Glory at the State Department -- that series of snappy large photographs begun by this administration to tout our leader's world leadership -- says the photos include a large, beautiful one of President Bush and the Iraqi prime minister.

"The prime minister is a great Iraqi patriot, he's a friend of liberty, he's a strong partner for peace and freedom," Bush said at their meeting, praising him for "brave leadership" and being a "bold man" and a "frank, open fella." Bush told him he did a "good job" at their news conference.

But wait a minute! That was last June in the White House with former prime minister Ibrahim al-Jafari , a complete loser, as it turns out. Almost as bad as the first guy, Ayad Allawi . Jafari was hanging on to office like Al Gore, hoping for a miracle, until Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice went to Baghdad and told him to take a hike.

Where's the photograph in Baghdad with the new guy, Nouri al-Maliki ? Bush said on his quick visit he "saw firsthand the strength of his character and his deep determination to succeed." Better still, Maliki's "got a plan to succeed," which is always a good thing, and Bush said he was "impressed" by him.

How many times, oh, Lord, must we warn people to check once, twice, even thrice, before clicking the "send" button?

Seems Traci Scott , who works in the Pentagon's legislative affairs office, sent an e-mail Wednesday to a group of Hill folks with an attachment titled "Iraq Floor Debate Prep Book." The 74-page attachment, just in time for the House floor debate yesterday, is full of great facts and fine political arguments.

Section 3, for example, "Victory in Iraq," summarizes Saddam Hussein 's "support for terrorist groups" and "his defiance of the world community" and how he "wanted WMD." Section 4 is the "Rapid Response" part.

Though coming from the Pentagon, the prep book reads like a White House playbook -- which, a Pentagon spokesman said, it is. "It's an NSC [National Security Council] document which we passed along," he said. It rebuts all those arguments from the "cut and run" crowd about prewar intelligence manipulation, or how the war in Iraq has made the world more dangerous for Americans.

Problem is that the e-mail was sent to some of those cutters and runners.

Next thing you know, there's a second e-mail from Scott.

"The sender would like to recall the message, 'Prep Book.' "

Too late. "Once again the Bush administration is spending time and taxpayer money on public relations, rather than developing a real plan for success in Iraq," said Brendan Daly , a recipient who is a spokesman for House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). "Americans know the war is going in the wrong direction, and the Pentagon PR machine won't change that fact."

Turns out the e-mail list was an old one, used to distribute general info from the Defense Department.

What with all their legal troubles, we thought folks such as Enron's Ken Lay , former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Rep. William J. "Frozen Dollar Bill" Jefferson (D-La.) might come up with more creative defense lines.

So here, from the Montomery Advertiser in Alabama, is an example of how the best handle such inquiries:

" Ronald Wayne Blankenship , who is in the Democratic runoff for Jefferson County sheriff, says it's a coincidence that a man with a criminal history shares his name. And birth date. And has a wife with the same name -- Judy Ruth Green Stonecipher Blankenship .

"And does the same kind of work. And looks like him.

"Blankenship, 63, says he isn't the same Ronald Wayne Blankenship who was suspected of faking his own death in 1990 and did time in jail for assault that same year.

" 'Do you know how many Ronald Blankenships there are?' " he told the Birmingham News. Blankenship, who got 26 percent of the vote in a three-way primary last week, acknowledged that he looked like a newspaper photo of the man who faked his death.

"It looks like me in a way," he said, "but all Blankenships get to looking alike."

Talk about creating reasonable doubt.Honest Abe and Honest Bill

Rudderless Democrats had best not count on Bill Clinton returning to the political fray anytime soon.

The former president, at a book party for New Republic editor Peter Beinart 's "The Good Fight: Why Liberals -- and Only Liberals -- Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again," approached Jay Winik , author of "April 1865: The Month That Saved America," and asked Winik what he thought of "Lincoln's Melancholy" by Joshua Wolf Shenk .

"Fascinating," Winik said. "And intriguing."

"I wanted to write that book, but he beat me to the punch," Clinton said. "I was going to write it next year. I love Lincoln -- for all of his problems, he grows larger with history."

"Enough Is Enough" (USAT)

By John Murtha

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Iraq is not the center of the global war on terrorism, and nor is it overwhelmed by foreign terrorist groups, as this administration would like Americans to believe.

Iraqis are fighting Iraqis in sectarian violence, and U.S. troops have become the target.

On Thursday, we heard House Republicans argue that the United States cannot change the policy in Iraq. But a change in direction is in the best interest of the United States and Iraq. Saying we must "stay the course" amounts to an open-ended commitment, one that we can not afford in terms of human and financial sacrifice.

Our view: Setting deadline for troops' withdrawal will backfire

The president continues to say we must stay in Iraq. Iraq has formed a government, trained 265,600 Iraq security forces and the Iraqis want to govern themselves. We have more than 20,000 deaths from this war, and yet terrorist attacks rose sharply last year to more than 10,000. By the end of this year, we will have spent $450 billion U.S. taxpayer dollars on this war. Enough is enough. Our nation deserves better.

Instead of sticking with a failed policy, I propose a new policy. Instead of "stay and pay," which is what this administration continues to argue, I propose that we "redeploy and be ready." We must redeploy American troops out of the cities to the periphery and create a quick reaction force ready to attack only when the national security of the United States or its allies in the region is at risk.

The American people are not naive. They know a failed policy when they see one. Iraq is a failed policy. It's time to redeploy.

Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania is the top Democrat on the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

Setting Deadline For Troops' Withdrawal Will Backfire (USAT)

USA Today, June 16, 2006

When the public turned against the Vietnam War, many returning soldiers found themselves ignored, disdained and shunned. Iraq is different. Though most Americans now believe the war was a mistake, they still honor the troops.

That support became particularly poignant Thursday when the number of dead in Iraq reached yet another milestone: 2,500.

DOJ_NMG_0034915

The grim announcement coincided with the start of a two-day debate in the House of Representatives on Iraq, which has been discussed far too little there in the three years since the United States invaded, the original plan went horribly awry, and the costs in lives and money soared.

Republican leaders capitalized on the rare good news of the past week in Iraq — the killing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the filling of key posts in the new Iraqi government — to put forth a resolution labeling the Iraq war part of the global fight against terrorism and saying an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment of U.S. forces is not in the national interest.

At one level, the debate is a cynical display of election-year politics that turns the troops fighting in Iraq into political pawns. Because Republicans wrote the resolution to express support for the troops as well as for President Bush's policy, a "no" vote can easily be twisted into a campaign attack ad claiming that anyone opposing the war is hostile to the troops fighting it, which is absurd.

But cheap political stunts aside, the thrust of the resolution, it seems to us, has merit. Iraq has become an important part of the war on terror, even if it wasn't when the war began. It's hard to argue otherwise when the organization led by Zarqawi and his successor calls itself "al-Qaeda in Iraq" and pledges allegiance to Osama bin Laden.

And while the war itself was a mistake based on faulty intelligence and delusional optimism, pulling out now, as advocated by Rep. John Murtha and other Democrats, risks making a bad situation worse.

U.S. troops should not stay in Iraq, as in Vietnam, purely for pride in a hopeless battle. They should remain, however, as long as there is a reasonable chance that they can bring some stability, reinforce the fledgling democratic government and prevent Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists. Announcing a timetable for withdrawal, as Sen. John Kerry proposes (Kerry's resolution in the Senate was rejected 93-6 on Thursday), would just invite the insurgents to wait out the American presence.

Thursday's fireworks on the House floor did serve to illuminate how Congress has been egregiously missing in action on sustained discussion and oversight of the Iraq war. A two-day debate hardly begins to address the many critical issues: What would success look like? Is the $320 billion allocated to the war effort being well spent? Can more be done to protect the troops from lethal roadside bombings? What is being done to engage surrounding countries? What about the training of Iraqi forces?

Careful, extended examinations of those questions would do more to honor the 2,500 U.S. military dead and 18,490 wounded than would the sensible yet politically loaded resolution poised for passage today.

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'Hanlon, And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

AFTER his surprise trip to Baghdad this week, President Bush struck a hopeful tone. "I do think we'll be able to measure progress," he declared at a news conference on Wednesday. "You can measure progress in capacity of Iraqi units ... in megawatts of electricity delivered ... in oil sold on the market .... There's ways to determine whether or not this government's plans are succeeding."

We agree. Unfortunately, according to our latest tally of metrics (compiled from a variety of government and news media sources), Iraq has a long way to go. To be successful, the new Iraqi government will have to do things that its predecessors and the United States have generally failed to accomplish.

Violence on the whole is as bad as ever. Sectarian strife is worse than ever. The economy has slowly come back to prewar levels for the most part, but is now treading water. As a result, optimism has waned. According to an International Republican Institute poll conducted in late March, more than 75 percent of Iraqis consider the security environment to be poor and the economy poor or mediocre.

Those looking for signs of promise in Iraq can still find footholds beyond the killing of the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The security forces, particularly the Iraqi Army, continue to improve in technical proficiency — even if their interethnic cohesiveness remains suspect. Reductions in consumer subsidies have strengthened the financial standing of the government, and high oil prices compensate for Iraq's anemic production levels. But overall, it is increasingly hard to describe Iraq as a glass half-full.

Stay The Course? What Course? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Fresh from his triumphal visit to Baghdad -- a place so dangerous he had to sneak in without even telling the Iraqi prime minister -- George W. Bush is full of new resolve to stay the course in his open-ended "global war on terror." That leaves the rest of us to wonder, in sadness and frustration, just what that course might be and where on earth it can possibly lead.

This is a "war" in which three men held for years without due process at the Guantanamo Bay prison kill themselves by hanging, and their jailers are so unnerved and self-absorbed that they see the suicides as an attack. Rear Adm. Harry Harris's all-about-me lament -- "I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us" -- was worthy of delivery from Oprah's couch.

Bush claimed at his news conference the other day that he'd "like to close Guantanamo" if only the people being held there weren't so "darn dangerous." These bad people, in other words, are forcing him to hold them indefinitely under conditions that mock international norms. But if the inmates are indeed beyond redemption, why order them to be hog-tied and force-fed when they go on hunger strikes? Why not just let them starve? Why freak out when three of the evildoers hang themselves? Why not pass out rope and tell the rest to bring it on?

This is a "war" in which the United States drops two 500-pound bombs with the express intent of assassinating Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, a group that wouldn't have existed if Bush hadn't decided to invade. But when the world learns that Zarqawi briefly survived the bombing, and rumors circulate that U.S. forces shot him dead, officials rush to release an autopsy report showing that the butcher with a $25 million bounty on his head died from blast injuries. An American medic, we are told, was about to administer first aid when Zarqawi mumbled something unintelligible and expired.

Why do your best to kill an enemy leader -- a bad, bad man, the worst of the worst -- and then try to revive him? Didn't you want him dead?

In this amorphous, open-ended "war" that we're spending precious lives and billions of dollars to wage, the rules of engagement seem to be shoot first and apologize later.

We're sorry if U.S. Marines massacred 24

civilians in Haditha. We're even more sorry than we were after U.S. military personnel tortured and humiliated those prisoners at Abu Ghraib. Bush's stalwart ally, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, is sorry if London police, conducting an anti-terrorist raid this month, shot and wounded an innocent man whose only "crime" was to come downstairs in his underwear to see who was breaking into his house. But not as sorry as Blair was after the London subway bombings, when commandos shot dead an innocent Brazilian electrician whom they mistook for a possible, potential, just-might-be terrorist.

Nobody's sorry, though, about secret CIA prisons or extralegal detention or interrogation by brutal "waterboarding" or an Orwellian blanket of domestic surveillance. After all, we're at "war."

The military announced yesterday that the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq has reached 2,500, another of those awful, round-number milestones. It is widely expected that the new Iraqi government will consider an amnesty for some of the insurgents who killed some of those American servicemen and women -- drawing a distinction between roadside bombs placed by Sunni Muslims in "resistance" to the U.S. occupation and those placed by foreign al-Qaeda jihadists. If this happens, we'll have taught the Iraqis well. They'll be saying "pardon me" just like their American tutors.

Today's generation of jihadists was forged in Afghanistan fighting the Soviet occupation. How long will the next generation, being forged in Iraq fighting the American occupation, be with us?

Iraq is just one theater in Bush's "war." Elsewhere, Afghanistan is once again ablaze as the resurgent Taliban counterattacks. Somalia is coming under the sway of an Islamic militia that may harbor al-Qaeda militants. America's popularity in the world continues to fall.

But George W. Bush forges ahead, trying vainly to kill a poisonous, retrograde ideology with bullets and bombs. His "war" is self-perpetuating, and no one even knows what victory would look like. Long after he's gone, we'll still be looking for a way to end the mess he began.

Captured Papers Show Weakening Insurgency (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Associated Press, June 15, 2006

A document purportedly captured in an al-Qaida hideout portrays the insurgency in Iraq as being in "bleak" shape, saying that it is losing strength and proposing ways to stir up trouble between the U.S. and Iran to divert American attention.

American and Iraqi forces have killed 104 insurgents in 452 raids nationwide since al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed last week, the U.S. military said.

Arrests, weapons seizures and money shortages are taking a heavy toll on al-Qaida's insurgency in Iraq, according to the three-page transcript released Thursday by the Iraqi government, which said it reflects al-Qaida policy and the terror organization's cooperation with groups loyal to Saddam Hussein.

There was no way to confirm the authenticity of the information attributed to al-Qaida, and U.S. and Iraqi officials offered conflicting accounts of when and where it was seized.

DOJ_NMG_0034917

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office said Iraqi forces found the document in al-Zarqawi's hideout after the June 7 U.S. airstrike that killed him.

However, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said the document had been taken from a computer in a raid during the three-week operation to track down al-Zarqawi.

Caldwell said sweeps across Iraq since al-Zarqawi's death led to 28 significant arms caches. He said the raids included 255 joint operations and 143 by Iraqi forces alone.

The al-Qaida document said its insurgency was being hurt by an increase in U.S.-trained Iraqi forces, by widespread arrests and seizures of weapons, and by a crackdown on financial outlets.

According to a translation provided by National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, the document said the best way to overcome the "current bleak situation" would be to involve U.S. forces in a "war against another country" or hostile group.

The way to do this, the document said, "is to try and inflame the situation between America and Iran" or between the U.S. and followers of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric.

It suggests carrying out a range of terrorist acts for which it will falsely implicate Iran, including bombings in the West and kidnappings. It also recommends declaring the existence of a relationship between Iran and terrorist groups, and disseminating bogus confessions showing that Iran has weapons of mass destruction.

Vice President Dick Cheney said the document, if authenticated, shows the terrorists know they are losing the war.

The words "are fascinating because they do reveal — obviously whoever wrote them, assuming they are authentic — somebody who believes they are on the losing end of the engagement," Cheney said on the Sean Hannity radio show.

"I think the psychological business here is really enormously important as well, too. Somebody said the other day that ... the way we win is when ... the terrorists finally become convinced that we won't quit."

Al-Rubaie called it "the beginning of the end of al-Qaida in Iraq."

"Now we have the upper hand," he told reporters. "We feel that we know their locations, the names of their leaders, their whereabouts, their movements, through the documents we found during the last few days."

Mustafa Alani, a terror expert at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said he did not believe the document was authentic.

"I wonder why they would put their strategy down in writing, even on a computer. These people learned a good lesson a long time ago," he said, recalling that one of al-Zarqawi's computers was seized earlier.

Terror consultant Evan Kohlmann called Alani's criticism "simplistic."

"They do have to write these ideas down somewhere. At a certain point, you have to have written records," said Kohlmann, the New York-based founder of globalterroralert.com.

But, Kohlmann said, "it's impossible to say" whether the document is authentic. "Without knowing the author, it's really impossible to know the document's credibility, its relevance and its significance."

The U.S. military has in the past released documents it said were seized from Al-Qaida in Iraq, including one in February 2004 reportedly written by al-Zarqawi complaining that if the insurgency fails to prevent the handover of sovereignty, "then there will be no choice to pack our bags and move to another land..."

In May, documents were released that showed the group was concerned about disorganization within its cells in the capital area, with one extremist describing them as simply "a daily annoyance" to the Iraqi government.

Despite the document's pessimistic assessment and a fresh security crackdown in Baghdad, new violence erupted in the capital Thursday and at least 24 killings were reported throughout the country.

A bomb in a parked car detonated in a southwest Baghdad neighborhood, killing at least three civilians and wounding 14. In an even deadlier attack, gunmen shot and killed 10 men riding a bus in the industrial area of Baqouba, close to where al-Zarqawi was killed.

The U.S. military said Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian with ties to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida network, has taken over from al-Zarqawi as head of al-Qaida in Iraq. Al-Masri apparently is the man that the terrorist group identified in a Web posting last week as its new leader — Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, a nom de guerre, said Caldwell.

The military showed a picture of al-Masri — who was named in a most-wanted list issued in February 2005 by the U.S. command and who now has a $200,000 bounty on his head — wearing a traditional white Arab headdress.

Al-Qaida has been responsible for numerous attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq, where the American death toll has now hit 2,500, according to the military.

Meanwhile, the Iraqi prime minister pressed forward with a plan to begin reconciling Iraq's ethnic and sectarian groups. But he canceled a planned announcement of the program, apparently after disagreements with Sunni Arab and Kurdish members of his coalition government.

Al-Maliki has opened the door for talks with insurgents opposed to the country's political process as part of his national reconciliation initiative, but said any negotiations would exclude terrorist groups. The plan could include a pardon for some prisoners.

Yassin Majeed, an aide to al-Maliki, denied reports that talks were on with armed groups of any kind. "There is absolutely no dialogue with any armed group at the present time."

Iraqi Leaders: Memo Details Al-Qaeda Plans (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD — A captured al-Qaeda in Iraq document says the terrorist group considered drawing the United States into a war with Iran in order to undermine the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in weakening the organization.

Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie said the document, released Thursday, proves al-Qaeda in Iraq is in "pretty bad shape."

"We believe that this is the beginning of the end of al-Qaeda in Iraq," al-Rubaie said.

The author of the document complained that the terrorist group was weak and suggested that opening another front in the war would divert U.S. efforts in Iraq.

A copy of the original document, handwritten in Arabic, was provided to USA TODAY by al-Rubaie. He also released an English translation.

Although the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the document was found in Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's hide-out after a June 7 airstrike that killed him, a U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, said the document was found in a previous raid as part of a three-week operation to track Zarqawi. "We can verify that this information did come off some kind of computer asset that was at a safe location," Caldwell said. "This was prior to the al-Zarqawi safe house."

It is not clear who wrote the document. The U.S. military says it appears to be from someone influential in al-Qaeda's Iraq operation. "It seems to be from an author who has insight from within al-Qaeda because a number of strategies and tactics are noted," said Navy Lt. Christina Skacan, a military spokeswoman.

The document takes a sweeping view of the insurgency, expressing worries that the tide was turning against the insurgency and laying out a plan for reversing that trend.

The memo says the insurgency is being hurt by the increasing capabilities of Iraqi security forces, a shortage of weapons and fighters, a lack of funds and internal divisions. The document says time is now on the side of the United States and not the insurgents.

The document says to reverse this trend, insurgents must:

·Use the media to improve their image.

·Infiltrate Iraq's security forces.

·Reorganize recruiting efforts.

·Lessen internal dissent and bolster respect for the insurgency's leadership.

The document says the best plan for improving the "current bleak situation" is "to entangle the American forces into another war against another country" or to create friction between the United States and its Shiite allies in Iraq.

The document recommends "first to exaggerate the Iranian danger and to convince America, and the West in general, of the real danger coming from Iran," it says.

The insurgents proposed fabricating "bogus messages" that Iran has chemical or nuclear weapons or that its agents planned to hit targets in the West.

Some experts questioned the authenticity of the document.

"I wonder why they would put their strategy down in writing, even on a computer," said Mustafa Alani, a terrorism expert at the Gulf Research Center, a think tank in Dubai. Alani said he doesn't believe the document is authentic. The Iraqi government has trumpeted the memo in an effort to show al-Qaeda in Iraq is reeling from recent U.S. and Iraqi successes.

Al-Rubaie also said that the hunt for Zarqawi and the search of his bombed hide-out and subsequent raids have produced additional intelligence that will lead to victory over al-Qaeda's Iraq operation.

"These documents give us the edge," he said. "They reveal their locations, the names of their leaders, their whereabouts and their movements." He did not elaborate or release other documents.

Caldwell said U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched 452 raids, captured 759 suspects and killed 104 terrorists since Zarqawi's death.

In other Iraq news:

DOJ_NMG_0034919

·The U.S. military said Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian with ties to al-Qaeda and Osama bin Laden, had taken over as the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, which had been led by Zarqawi.

·Iraq's government is considering an amnesty program that would pardon some insurgents. “This program will distinguish between those who want to destroy Iraq and kill Iraqis, and those who simply disagree with the presence of multinational troops or the political process,” al-Rubaie said. He did not address whether the plan would include insurgents who have attacked U.S. troops.

·Gunmen shot and killed 10 men — nine workers and a driver — riding a bus in the industrial area of Baqouba, near the location where Zarqawi was killed.

Picture Of A Weakened Iraqi Insurgency (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD

An Al Qaeda document linked to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purports to show that Iraq's insurgents believe they face a "current bleak situation" that may require fomenting a war between the US and Iran to "get out of this crisis."

The document, released Thursday, could not be independently authenticated. But senior Iraqi officials were ebullient about its message, as well as the magnitude of intelligence "treasure" that has emerged surrounding Mr. Zarqawi's death.

This is "the beginning of the end of Al Qaeda in Iraq," Mowafaq al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, declared Thursday, adding that the data include network names and locations gleaned from Al Qaeda computers captured before Zarqawi's death. "The government is on the attack now ... to destroy Al Qaeda and to finish this terrorist organization in Iraq."

"The documents and all the arrests mean there has been a depletion of talent" among Zarqawi's group, says Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism expert at the Swedish National Defense College in Stockholm.

"They will have to lick their wounds and reconfigure their security, to protect whatever assets they have left," says Mr. Ranstorp, who heads the Center for Asymmetric Threat Studies. The document indicates that Al Qaeda needs to recalibrate "not just psychological warfare, but must shape its actions to get some traction in the population."

"If I were the US, I would continue to drill a hole, and continue to undermine [Qaeda's] legitimacy," adds Ranstorp. "With the killing of Zarqawi, the Americans momentarily have the upper hand."

Since American jets struck Zarqawi's hideout last Wednesday, the US military and Iraqi forces have conducted 452 raids, killing 104 insurgents and capturing 759 "anti-Iraqi elements," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said in Baghdad Thursday.

The news came as the Pentagon confirmed that US military deaths in Iraq have now reached 2,500.

The release of the document coincides with a security clampdown in Baghdad, meant to prevent Zarqawi followers from fulfilling promises to launch revenge attacks.

Spearheading that campaign is the new leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, who the US military Thursday identified as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who met Zarqawi in Afghanistan in 1999. Al Qaeda websites claimed the new leader to be Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, apparently a nom de guerre for Mr. Masri.

"Al-Masri's intimate knowledge of Al Qaeda in Iraq and his close relationship with [Zarqawi's] operations will undoubtedly help facilitate and enable them to regain some momentum if in fact he is the one that assumes the leadership role," said General Caldwell.

Masri is an Afghan-trained explosives expert who began his militant career in 1982, when Al Qaeda No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, led Egyptian Islamic Jihad, Caldwell said. In Iraq, he said, intelligence gleaned from raids in April and May show that Masri has been the key link for foreign fighters traveling from Syria to Iraq.

But the organization Masri takes over may be weakening under pressure from US and Iraqi forces, if the assessment from the Al Qaeda document reflects the view of this extreme faction of Iraq's insurgency.

The document appears undated and does not mention Al Qaeda by name, but was found on "some kind of computer asset that was at a safe location" prior to Zarqawi's death, said Caldwell.

"Here in Iraq, time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," reads the document, according to an English translation from Mr. Rubaie's office. "Massive arrest operations" have caused the resistance to "lose many of its elements," it notes. Insurgents are at a further disadvantage by the growing number of trained Iraqi forces, are losing a media campaign "presenting its work as harmful to the population," and suffering from tighter financial restrictions.

The result is that US and Iraqi tactics are "creating a big division among the ranks of the resistance and jeopardizing its attack operations," which have "weakened [insurgent] influence," the document reads.

It makes no mention of specific tactics, such as beheadings, targeting civilians and any Shiite Iraqis - elements pioneered in Iraq by Zarqawi - which have alienated many Iraqis sympathetic to the broader, antioccupation aim of the insurgency.

It says only that US and Iraqi forces are "taking advantage of the resistance's mistakes and magnifying them to misinform."

Among the solutions is to "use the media for spreading an effective and creative image of the resistance," the document states. That may prove difficult, says Ranstorp in Sweden, because a top Al Qaeda in Iraq media chief, Abu Maysara al-Iraqi, was believed killed in the week before Zarqawi.

"This means their ability to put on a brave face has been damaged," says Ranstorp. "There have been some substantive man losses - qualitative losses" of Al Qaeda operatives.

The Al Qaeda document gives a broad assessment, from apparent ordnance shortages to stoking a clash between the US and Iran. It also includes a lengthy list of potential "delegated wars" that would ease pressure on the resistance.

"The best of these wars to be ignited is the one between the Americans and Iran, because it will have many benefits in favor of the Sunni and the resistance," the document reads. Among those benefits are the "possibility of acquiring new weapons from the Iranian side, either after the fall of Iran or during the battles."

It even asks the rhetorical question of how to draw the US into open conflict with Iran. "It is necessary first to exaggerate the Iranian danger and convince America ... of the real danger coming from Iran."

Its six suggested methods that read like a how-to guide for creating friction. They include sending out "threatening messages against American interests" and blaming Iran; "executing operations of kidnapping hostages" and blaming Iran; "advertising" that Iran has chemical and nuclear weapons "and is threatening the West."

Bomb attacks against the West would be blamed on Iran "by planting Iranian Shiite fingerprints and evidence"; declaring ties between Iran and "terrorist groups (as termed by the Americans)"; and "disseminating bogus messages" that Iran has weapons of mass destruction and "there are attempts by the Iranian intelligence to undertake terrorist operations in America."

Violence continued, despite the Baghdad crackdown. Ten Shiites were pulled off a bus and executed by gunmen in Baquba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and just a few miles east of the village of Hibhib, where Zarqawi was killed.

Papers Reveal Weakening Terror Group (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

The U.S. military in recent weeks has seized a "huge treasure" of intelligence materials on al Qaeda in Iraq, including a revealing document in which the terror group acknowledges its own "bleak situation" caused by losses on both the public relations and war fronts.

The documents seized in the weeks leading up to the June 7 killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi also have provided intelligence that has helped direct nearly 500 allied combat operations and resulted in the killings of 104 insurgents, the U.S. command in Baghdad said yesterday.

Al Qaeda's acknowledged failures and the military offensive have been so successful that Iraq's national security adviser flatly predicted that Zarqawi's group, al Qaeda in Iraq, is at "the beginning of the end." He said all U.S. troops could be out of Iraq by 2008.

However, al Qaeda in Iraq has promised renewed attacks in retaliation for the U.S. air strike that killed Zarqawi.

Egyptian-born Abu Ayyub al-Masri -- an explosives specialist also known by the alias Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer -- has become the leader of Zarqawi's terror network, Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said yesterday. Al Qaeda in Iraq is thought to number in the thousands and includes suicide bombers from Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Jordan and some North African countries.

"Our initial assessment is we think he will probably continue with the same tactics and techniques that Zarqawi did," Gen. Caldwell told reporters. "There is nothing to indicate to us that he would do differently, because he has already been here in this country for almost three, four years now, and has been a part of and associated with the ... killing of Iraqi civilians."

The Baghdad command continued to give an optimistic message on Iraq, boosted by President Bush's surprise visit this week, even as the war's death toll for the U.S. military topped 2,500.

"We believe al Qaeda in Iraq was taken by surprise," said Mowaffak Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. "They did not anticipate how powerful the Iraqi security forces are and how the government is on the attack now." He referred to the intelligence take as a "huge treasure."

The government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. commanders this week ordered a major clampdown on violence in the capital, sending more than 50,000 troops into the streets to conduct raids and patrols.

The seized al Qaeda in Iraq document released yesterday reflects discouragement by the terror group's leadership.

"Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," the documents state.

It lists a number of allied successes against the terrorist "resistance":

·"Undertaking massive arrest operations, invading regions that have an impact on the resistance, and hence causing the resistance to lose many of its elements."

·"Undertaking a media campaign against the resistance resulting in weakening its influence inside the country and presenting its work as harmful to the population rather than being beneficial to the population."

·"By tightening the resistance's financial outlets, restricting its moral options and by confiscating its ammunition and weapons."

·"By taking advantage of the resistance's mistakes and magnifying them in order to misinform."

Zarqawi's strategy, as disclosed in previously seized letters, was to spark a civil war between Sunni Muslims, who supported Saddam Hussein, and the majority Shi'ites, who now hold political power. Zarqawi did this by recruiting foreign Sunni suicide bombers to attack Shi'ite markets, schools, mosques and other public places.

The al Qaeda document said if it is to rebound from setbacks it needs to "improve the image of the resistance in society, increase the number of supporters who are refusing occupation and show the class of interest between society and the occupation and its collaborators."

The document also said al Qaeda in Iraq needs to build its own arms industry and to "avoid mistakes that will blemish the image of the resistance."

The group's major goal is to get the U.S. involved in a new war, this one against the Shi'ites in Iraq and Iran, and to provoke another war between Iraqi Shi'ites and Sunni countries in the Middle East.

One option, the paper says, is to blow up targets in the West and plant evidence that the bombing was done by Iranians.

The document concludes: "Let us hope for success and for God's help."

US Deaths In Iraq Reach 2,500 As The Country Is Torn By Violence (KRT)

By Drew Brown And Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. death toll in Iraq reached 2,500 on Thursday as American forces remained locked in a bitter fight against insurgents and foreign terrorists.

The Pentagon also reported that 18,940 U.S. service members have been wounded in the war to topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, which began more than three years ago and has left tens of thousands of Iraqis dead.

Meanwhile, an American general said coalition forces had killed 104 insurgents in 452 raids since terrorist chief Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed June 7 in a U.S. bombing raid.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a coalition spokesman, said the name of the man whom the American military had identified as Zarqawi's successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, probably is another name for Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the man whom a Web posting Monday by the group al-Qaida in Iraq named as the successor.

Both names probably are aliases. Abu means "father of" in Arabic, and al-Masri means "the Egyptian." The other name, al-Muhajer means "the emigrant."

Al-Masri is an Egyptian who joined Islamic Jihad in 1982, a terrorist group formed by al-Qaida No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri. Masri went to Afghanistan in 1999, where he became an expert in making car bombs, Caldwell said.

Though it's unclear when they met, al-Masri and al-Zarqawi trained together at al Farouq in Afghanistan, Caldwell said, a terrorist training camp operated by Osama bin Laden.

Al-Masri made his way to Iraq after the fall of the Taliban in 2001 and is thought to have fought U.S. forces during the siege of Fallujah in 2004. He later operated an al-Qaida cell in Baghdad and was known as the "emir of southern Iraq," Caldwell said.

He said al-Masri probably would continue the tactics his predecessor had used. American military forces blamed the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi for suicide bombings, beheadings and sectarian killings meant to provoke civil war between Iraq's majority Shiite Muslims and minority Sunni Muslims, from whom the insurgency draws most of its support.

"Nothing indicates to us that he will do differently, because he has been in this country for over three to four years now," Caldwell said. "For him to make a change, there is nothing that shows or reflects that he would do that."

Caldwell said coalition forces would continue to try to eliminate al-Qaida in Iraq by going after its midlevel leaders.

With a nightly curfew in effect and tens of thousands of Iraqi and U.S. troops on the streets of Baghdad, a new security crackdown announced by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki appeared to have curbed violence. No car bombs were reported in Baghdad on Thursday, a rare occurrence in the Iraqi capital, but it remained unclear what long-term effect the tighter measures would have.

Similar crackdowns in Baghdad, including Operation Thunder, launched in May 2005, haven't ended insurgent attacks and suicide bombings.

Iraqi police reported that unidentified gunmen had shot and killed 10 Shiites after pulling them off a bus Thursday near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0034922

The mixed Sunni-Shiite area, which has been the scene of numerous sectarian killings and fierce fighting between American troops and insurgents, isn't far from where the U.S. airstrike killed Zarqawi.

Asked earlier this week to comment on the significance of the 2,500 American deaths in Iraq, Army Brig. Gen. Carter Ham, the deputy director of regional operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said it was important to remember that behind each of those deaths was an individual.

"And those individuals are those to whom we should be very, very grateful, and to their families," Ham said Wednesday, during a Pentagon briefing.

Newsview: Iraq War Has Mournful Milestones (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The story of the Iraq war can be told in stark numbers and mournful milestones as the death toll for U.S. troops reached 2,500 on Thursday and the price tag rose to $320 billion.

"It's a number ... a sad benchmark," White House spokesman Tony Snow said of the new death count. It was reached two days after President Bush's secretive trip to Baghdad to meet with Iraq's new leaders and to rally American troops.

"The president would like the war to be over now," Snow added.

Numbers abound. Some are marshaled by war defenders. Others are used by critics to condemn the war. And there are some few can dispute:

_The war that began March 19, 2003, with a U.S.-led invasion to oust Saddam Hussein has lasted almost three years and three months, longer than U.S. involvement in World War I (one year, seven months) and the Korean conflict (three years, one month). It is closing in on World War II (three years, eight months).

_According to Pentagon figures, 18,490 U.S. troops have been wounded in action, including 8,501 who did not return to duty.

_About 4,800 Iraqi police and security forces have died and at least 30,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed, according to some estimates.

"The numbers are sobering for what was designed to be sort of a quick action," said Thomas Mann, a senior fellow in governance studies at the Brookings Institution. "The broader point is, we made a commitment to depose Saddam with our eyes closed, not our eyes open. Now all of this is coming back to haunt the entire operation."

The Bush administration and its defenders in Congress argue that the tide is turning.

They cite the completion of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's unity Cabinet and his efforts to restore order in Baghdad, and the killing of terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week and subsequent raids on dozens of terrorist targets.

Some of the statistics trumpeted by the administration:

_American and Iraqi forces have carried out 452 raids since al-Zarqawi's death on June 7. This has led to the deaths of 104 insurgents, the capture of 255 and the discovery of 28 significant arms caches, according to Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad.

_The 127,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq is a drop from more than 130,000 in recent days.

_The Army surpassed its recruiting goal for May. It was the 12th consecutive month of meeting or exceeding its target, even though the Army fell short of its 2005 full-year goals, as did the Army National Guard and Army Reserve.

"I sense something different happening in Iraq. The progress will be steady toward a goal that has clearly been defined," Bush told reporters in the Rose Garden after his quick trip to Baghdad.

But Democrats cite different statistics from the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service: 54 percent of Iraqi households lack access to clean water; 85 percent lack reliable electricity; one in four Iraqi children suffers from chronic malnutrition; oil production still lags behind prewar levels.

The Senate on Thursday sent Bush an emergency spending bill for America's wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and aid to hurricane victims. Bush was expected to sign the measure, already approved by the House.

Of the bill's $94.5 billion, $66 billion goes to the Pentagon for military operations overseas. That brings to almost $320 billion the tally for the war in Iraq and $89 billion for Afghanistan.

When Lawrence Lindsey, then chairman of Bush's National Economic Council, predicted in September 2002 that war with Iraq could cost $100 billion to $200 billion, the White House openly scoffed. Lindsey was eased out of his job.

Stephen Daggett, a budget analyst for the Congressional Research Service, said the 1991 Gulf War waged by the first President Bush cost $61 billion, or $87 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars.

The Korean conflict cost $434 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars. The Vietnam War - which lasted 8 1/2 years - cost $614 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars. World War II cost the equivalent of $5.1 trillion.

DOJ_NMG_0034923

One set of numbers Bush will not give - and which Democrats and some Republicans are pressing for the hardest - is the timing and size of a U.S. troop withdrawal. Telegraphing such a timetable would be "bad policy," Bush says.

Democrat Party chief Howard Dean, however, says, "The reality is that our troops and their families still have no strategy from this president to get the job done in Iraq and get them home."

One number from the Iraq war still stands at zero by all accounts: The number of weapons of mass destruction found by Iraqi and coalition forces. Bush had cited such weapons as the main reason for invading.

Maliki Aide Who Discussed Amnesty Leaves Job (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office on Thursday accepted the resignation of an aide who had told a reporter that Maliki was considering a limited amnesty that would likely include guerrillas who had attacked U.S. troops, the aide said.

Also, on a day when the U.S. military announced that the death toll for American personnel had reached 2,500, U.S. military and counterterrorism officials said they believed they had identified the new head of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq: Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian about 40 years old and a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri. A Web site tied to al-Qaeda in Iraq on Monday identified the same man as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, a pseudonym meaning "the immigrant."

A veteran of the Zawahiri-led Egyptian Islamic Jihad and of al-Qaeda's organization in Afghanistan, Masri -- also a pseudonym, meaning "the Egyptian" -- has been in Iraq at least since 2003, officials said. Since the 2004 battle of Fallujah, he had been a trusted lieutenant of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the insurgent leader killed in a U.S. attack north of Baghdad last week.

Since Fallujah, Masri had been in charge of Zarqawi's operations in southern Iraq. Officials say they believe he also has been instrumental in enlisting and managing foreign fighters allied with the Sunni Arab insurgency.

The Maliki aide who resigned, Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, stood by his account of amnesty considerations, reported Thursday by The Washington Post. Kadhimi said Maliki had indicated the same position less directly in public. "The prime minister himself has said that he is ready to give amnesty to the so-called resistance, provided they have not been involved in killing Iraqis," Kadhimi said Thursday.

Maliki's office issued a statement earlier Thursday saying, "Mr. Adnan Kadhimi doesn't represent the Iraqi government in this issue, and Mr. Kadhimi is not an advisor or spokesman for the prime minister."

Kadhimi, who also worked as an aide to the previous prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafari, said he had submitted his resignation earlier in the week. He was informed Thursday that it had been accepted, he said.

Another Maliki aide, asked if the amnesty being considered by the government was likely to apply to those who had attacked U.S. forces, said Maliki had been "clear, saying those whose hands weren't stained with Iraqi blood" may be eligible for any amnesty.

That aide spoke on condition of anonymity, saying Maliki had not authorized anyone to speak for him. Another aide declined to comment, on the same grounds.

On the issue of clemency for those who had attacked U.S. troops, Kadhimi was quoted in Thursday's Post as saying: "That's an area where we can see a green line. There's some sort of preliminary understanding between us and the MNF-I," the U.S.-led Multi-National Force-Iraq, "that there is a patriotic feeling among the Iraqi youth and the belief that those attacks are legitimate acts of resistance and defending their homeland. These people will be pardoned definitely, I believe."

In Washington, Senate Democrats offered a resolution Thursday demanding that President Bush repudiate the amnesty proposal regarding those who attacked American forces.

"It is shocking that the Iraqi prime minister is reportedly considering granting amnesty to insurgents who have killed U.S. troops," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "On the day we lost the 2,500th soldier in Iraq, the mere idea that this proposal may go forward is an insult to the brave men and women who have died in the name of Iraqi freedom. I call on President Bush to denounce this proposal immediately."

Maliki's broad statements about amnesty, at a news conference Wednesday in Baghdad, marked the first time a leader from Iraq's dominant Shiite religious parties had indicated openness to pardoning members of the Sunni insurgency.

The statement from Maliki's office Thursday also said: "It is not true what some of the media outlets including The Washington Post have said about the willingness of the Iraqi government to talk with armed groups."

At Wednesday's news conference, Maliki said reconciliation could include an amnesty for those "who weren't involved in the shedding of Iraqi blood. Also, it includes talks with the armed men who opposed the political process and now want to turn back to political activity." Maliki's comments were in Arabic and televised. Other Western media outlets rendered the same translation, although saying "gunmen" instead of "armed men."

Meanwhile Thursday, bombings in Baghdad and northern Iraq killed eight Iraqi policemen and soldiers as the capital remained under heavy security during daylight hours.

In the southern city of Karbala, U.S. and Iraqi forces detained the leader of the provincial council, Aqeel al-Zubaidy, leading the council to suspend operations and sparking small-scale street protests, Iraqi officials said. The U.S. military, in a statement later, announced the arrest of a "terrorist leader" it referred to as Sheik Aqeel.

"Aqeel commands a Karbala terrorist network and is wanted for assassinating Iraqi citizens and planning and ordering attacks against Iraqi and Coalition forces," said the statement, which said Aqeel was responsible for the deaths of six soldiers from the U.S.-led military force last year and a soldier and interpreter earlier this month.

Shiite militias are considered the main threat to security in southern Iraq, but it was not immediately clear if the detained official belonged to one.

Shiite officials in Baghdad and Karbala, a city holy to Shiites, rushed to his defense. Karbala's governor called the arrest "a dangerous precedent."

Also Thursday, the Iraqi government released a document it said was found before Zarqawi's death during a raid on an insurgent safe house. The document, which described the insurgency as "gloomy" because of gains by Iraq's security forces, called on insurgents to foment strife among Shiites and between the United States and Iran.

The authenticity of the document, which closely echoes accounts of insurgent strategy offered by Iraq's Shiite political leaders, could not be independently verified. It was written in a style different from typical statements issued by al-Qaeda in Iraq, which refer to Shiites as "rejectionists" or "dogs" and to U.S. forces as "crusaders."

The U.S. military death toll in Iraq of 2,500 announced Thursday includes nearly 2,000 killed in action. These deaths have been caused mainly by roadside bombs, which continue to inflict a stream of American casualties despite gains in armor and the growth of Iraqi security forces.

In addition, 18,490 U.S. service members have been wounded since the March 2003 invasion, more than 8,500 of them seriously enough that they were not returned to duty within three days, according to Pentagon figures.

Roadside bombs -- known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs -- accounted for more than half of the deaths this year. Hostile fire from small arms and other weapons were the second-biggest cause of death. To date, 528 of the deaths have been non-hostile, resulting from accidents, illness, suicides and other causes.

"What is significant and troublesome is that the casualty rate per month hasn't really declined," said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution here. "Unfortunately, any hopes we had that we have come to the end of this rate of taking casualties have been dashed."

At this rate, if the war extends until 2008, "it's very likely that victory will mean 4,000 killed," said Anthony Cordesman, a military historian at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The number of Iraqi civilians and military personnel killed since the start of the war ranges from 43,000 to 49,000, according to estimates from news agencies, research groups and other sources.

The issue of Zarqawi's successor has been a major question for Iraqi and U.S. officials. In the days following Zarqawi's death, several presumed candidates surfaced in statements appearing on Web sites used by militant groups. One statement, in the name of al-Qaeda in Iraq, was signed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer and vowed to avenge Zarqawi's death.

At a news conference Thursday in Baghdad, a U.S. military spokesman said Muhajer had been identified as Masri. "We think they are one and the same at this point," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV. "We'll continue to do further analysis."

"Al-Masri's intimate knowledge of al-Qaeda in Iraq and his close relationship with [Zarqawi's] operations will undoubtedly help facilitate and enable them to regain some momentum if, in fact, he is the one that assumes the leadership role," Caldwell said.

Beyond some bare facts, little is certain about the person whose photograph -- showing a youthful man with neatly trimmed facial hair, in traditional white Gulf Arab dress -- was released in Baghdad by the U.S. Central Command. Officials in Washington said Masri is also known -- and equally unknown -- by the name Yusif al-Dardiri.

The question of who takes over Zarqawi's leadership role is important, one counterterrorism official said, because of perceived past divisions between al-Qaeda and Zarqawi's operations in Iraq. Last October, the U.S. government released a letter it said had been intercepted en route from Zawahiri to Zarqawi expressing concerns about public beheadings of hostages in Iraq and attempts to foment divisions between Sunnis and the majority Shiites.

"Zawahiri's big issue was the negative publicity that those attacks were generating," said the official, who said he was not authorized to discuss the subject on the record. The question now, he said, was whether Masri's primary allegiance is to his Egyptian mentor, Zawahiri, or to Zarqawi.

U.S. analysts have also been watching carefully for signs of a split between domestic-led Sunni groups with nationalistic aims in Iraq and those elements of the insurgency whose goals are more in keeping with bin Laden's overall objective of expanding violent jihad across the Arab word.

US Military Releases Image Of Zarqawi's Successor (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military today released new information about Abu Musab Zarqawi's successor, quickly elevating the stature of the Egyptian militant who is said in Internet postings to be the new head of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

The U.S. military also announced today that the number of American military deaths in Iraq has reached 2,500, though the 24 killed so far this month has been relatively low.

Calm prevailed throughout much of Baghdad, which is under a new security plan and a 9 p.m. curfew. But violence exploded throughout much of the country, including the murder of 10 relatives of a Sunni Arab politician who uncovered prisoner abuse in Baqubah, the assassination of a Basra city official, and a roadside bombing that killed three civilians near Hilla.

At a press briefing in the Iraqi capital, the U.S. military showed reporters a previously classified picture of the Egyptian-born militant man who goes by the name Abu Ayyub Masri or Sheik Abu Hamza Muhajer, wearing traditional Arab headdress.

"It's important for the people of Iraq to know who this is," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

Caldwell said U.S. officials debated for days before deciding to release the photo and a brief biographical sketch of the alleged insurgent leader. They worried that bolstering his media profile would play into his hands. "Our intention is not to glorify him," Caldwell said.

But by making Masri or Muhajer, whose two names mean "Egyptian" and "immigrant" in Arabic, the U.S. continues painting Iraq's Sunni Arab rebellion as driven by outsiders, even though foreign fighters make up a small portion of guerrillas fighting Americans and the Iraqi government.

"He has absolutely no ties to this country," Caldwell said.

U.S. military officials today also provided details of the June 7 bombing of Zarqawi's safe house near Baqubah. According to a timeline provided by the military, two men in a motor vehicle — possibly informants deep inside Zarqawi's network — departed the house just minutes before U.S. forces began verifying there were no friendly forces in the area and ordering the airstrike.

Caldwell said Zarqawi, who lived for nearly an hour after the bombing, spit up a pint-and-a-half of blood while being treated, a sign that he had suffered massive internal injuries by the force of the bombing.

Caldwell said the bombing badly damaged Zarqawi's network, throwing its leadership into disarray and forcing them to abandon trusted safe houses, but that the organization was expected to "reset" under new leadership. "They've been very resilient," he said.

Masri began his journey in Islamist circles in 1982 as a disciple of Ayman Zawahiri, the Egyptian physician now a deputy to Osama bin Laden, said Caldwell, citing information held by the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's spy agency.

Masri went to Taliban-ruled Afghanistan in 1999, where he trained at Bin Laden's Farouk camp, and met Zarqawi. After the 2001 U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, Masri made his way to Iraq, where he reunited with Zarqawi and became his trusted deputy.

During the first year of the insurgency, Masri helped draw other insurgent groups into Al Qaeda's fold and worked with Zarqawi's deputies in Fallouja, providing suicide bombers and car bombs to other parts of the country, the military said.

After U.S. Marines overran Fallouja in November 2004, Masri became Al Qaeda emir, or prince, of southern Iraq.

In addition to depicting the insurgents in a negative light, U.S. and Iraqi officials have tried to get Iraqis to lay down their weapons by periodically touting reconciliation plans with some insurgents.

But the scheduled announcement of a new reconciliation plan was scuttled today under unusual circumstances.

Prime Minister Jawad Maliki, after inviting reporters to his office in the Green Zone, failed to show up. At first, aides distributed two-page communiqués titled "National Reconciliation," then insisted on taking the documents back and canceled the press conference without explanation.

In other violence today, Interior Ministry officials in Baqubah said 10 tribal relatives of lawmaker Mohammad Daini were pulled off a bus, and shot dead near Baqubah. Daini had videotaped prisoners alleging torture and corruption in a local jail and sent the footage to Arab television stations.

Police also discovered seven unidentified bodies, with bullet wounds and signs of torture, in various parts of Baghdad. Local police in Khalidiya, west of Baghdad, reported clashes between insurgents and U.S. troops after a roadside bomb targeted a passing convoy.

US Military Shows Al-Zarqawi's Successor (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Willa Thayer

AP, June 15, 2006

The U.S. military presented the new face of al-Qaida in Iraq on Thursday, displaying a photograph of a bearded man in a traditional white Arab headdress and saying he was taking over after the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The new leader is Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Afghanistan-trained explosives expert with links to Osama bin Laden's top deputy, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell.

He also is the man behind the nom de guerre made public by al-Qaida in Iraq after al-Zarqawi was killed last week in an U.S. airstrike on his safe house outside of Baghdad, the military spokesman said.

However, U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said it's not certain that al-Masri is al-Zarqawi's successor.

"That's clearly one of the leading names, but we're going to need a little bit of time to sort out — and they're clearly needing a little time — to sort out where they go after what is clearly a big blow to al-Qaida," Hadley said at the White House.

Caldwell said al-Masri was the man identified in an Internet posting by al-Qaida that said Abu Hamza al-Muhajer was al-Zarqawi's successor. The name means "immigrant" in Arabic and suggested he was not an Iraqi.

According to the U.S. military, Al-Masri was a founding member of al-Qaida in Iraq. After meeting the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi in Afghanistan, he followed him to Iraq to help set up the terror cell in 2003.

Even before terror leader's death, the Bush administration posted a $200,000 bounty on al-Masri because of his level of leadership within al-Qaida, Caldwell said.

Citing recently declassified documents, he said al-Masri has been a terrorist since 1982, "beginning with his involvement in the Egyptian Islamic Jihad," which was led by Ayman al-Zawahri, bin Laden's top deputy.

Going by that chronology, the photograph the military presented — showing a young man with a sparse mustache and a trimmed goatee — appeared to be at least several years old.

Caldwell said the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency provided the picture, adding: "Everything we had was classified just 24 hours ago associated with this gentleman — this terrorist."

Yet Islamist watchers in Egypt and abroad said they had never heard of al-Masri — whose name means "the Egyptian" — and expressed skepticism about U.S. claims that he was poised to become Iraq's new terror leader.

"His codename doesn't ring a bell for me; he's not one of the wanted Jihadis in Egypt," said Egyptian lawyer Montasser el-Zayat, who was imprisoned with al-Qaida No. 2 al-Zawahri from 1981-84.

In an indication of the confusion surrounding the identity of the group's new leader, the U.S. first announced al-Masri's name shortly after the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi was killed June 7. But al-Qaida in Iraq later identified its new leader as al-Muhajer.

The new leader issued a Web statement Tuesday vowing to avenge al-Zarqawi's death and threatening horrific attacks "in the coming days."

"Don't be overcome with joy about killing our sheik Abu Musab (al-Zarqawi), God bless his soul, because he has left lions behind him," the statement said.

Citing recently declassified information, Caldwell said the military believes al-Masri first went to Afghanistan in 1999 to receive training and lecture on Islam to other militants. There he became an expert in building roadside bombs, skills he used in Fallujah and Baghdad.

He trained with al-Zarqawi at the al-Farouq camp in Afghanistan and they began to collaborate in Iraq. Raids in April and May in southern Baghdad recovered material confirming his high-level involvement in moving foreign fighters from Syria to Iraq, Caldwell said.

However, Yasser al-Sirri, an Egyptian who runs the Islamic Observation Center in London, said information supplied by al-Qaida in announcing the new leader pointed to another man: Abdullah bin Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahedeen Shura Council — five allied groups in the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency.

"I'm 95 percent sure that this al-Masri doesn't exist," al-Sirri said, adding that the group could be trying to cover up the nationality of its new leader to promote a broader Islamic identity.

"Al-Qaida does not want to show that he is an Iraqi because they work under the Islamic banner ... and they seek international jihad," al-Sirri said.

Caldwell acknowledged that al-Masri's ability to exert leadership over al-Qaida cells remained unclear and said other "al-Qaida senior leadership members and Sunni terrorists" could try to take over the operations.

He pointed to al-Baghdadi along with Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi, whom al-Qaida in Iraq statements have identified as the group's deputy. Al-Iraqi was believed to have been killed in the airstrike along with al-Zarqawi.

Mustafa Alani, a terror expert at the Gulf Research Center, said the ultimate call for the new leader would be made by bin Laden or al-Zawahri, believed to be hiding in the rugged border area between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

U.S. Portrayal Helps Flesh Out Zarqawi's Heir (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 15 — American military officers on Thursday put a face on the new chief of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, releasing a photograph and details of the man they say succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi after he was killed in an airstrike last week.

In a news briefing, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman here, identified Mr. Zarqawi's successor as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who he said had trained in one of the terrorist camps in Afghanistan run by Al Qaeda in 1999.

Mr. Masri, he said, was a "founding member" of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and had become one of Mr. Zarqawi's "closest remaining associates." The group is believed to be responsible for dozens of suicide attacks and car bombings across Iraq that have killed thousands of Iraqi civilians.

General Caldwell said Mr. Masri — the name means "the Egyptian" in Arabic — was the same person as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, whom Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia declared as its new leader in an Internet posting this week. Both names are thought to be pseudonyms. Shortly after Mr. Zarqawi was killed, American officials predicted that Mr. Masri was the likely successor.

In the photograph released Thursday, the man the Americans claim to be Mr. Masri is wearing a kaffiyeh, the traditional Arabic headwear, and sporting a wispy mustache and goatee. He seems a young man, perhaps in his late 20's, and he is not smiling. He is staring directly into the camera, as if sitting for a passport photograph. American officials said they believed Mr. Masri to be in his late 30's, suggesting that the photograph is old.

The Americans said Mr. Masri joined the Egyptian militant group Islamic Jihad in 1982 and went to Afghanistan in 1999 to train in the Farouq militant camp, where he learned about explosives.

Islamic Jihad was headed by Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian doctor who later became Osama bin Laden's deputy in Al Qaeda. The Farouq camp, set up by Mr. Zawahiri and Mr. bin Laden, was one of the main Qaeda training camps before it was bombed by the United States in October 2001.

General Caldwell said he was not sure whether Mr. Masri had developed a relationship with either Mr. Zawahiri or Mr. bin Laden.

But, the general said, it was in Afghanistan that Mr. Masri developed a relationship with Mr. Zarqawi.

Mr. Masri, he said, came to Iraq in early 2003 and helped to set up the original cell in Baghdad of what later became Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. More recently, Mr. Masri was a senior operational commander for the group, supplying suicide bombers and car bombs. He was responsible for all operations in southern Iraq, General Caldwell said.

Mr. Masri is believed to be operating in Baghdad, he said.

The link between Mr. Masri and Mr. Zawahiri is intriguing, in part because of a letter that American officials captured last year that they said they believed was written by Mr. Zawahiri to Mr. Zarqawi. In that letter, Mr. Zawahiri, believed to be hiding along the mountainous border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, questioned Mr. Zarqawi's emphasis on killing Shiite civilians, suggesting that such killings alienated Iraqis and detracted from the larger goal of driving out the Americans.

That raises the possibility that the leadership of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia could be contemplating a change in tactics.

Earlier this week, a man identifying himself as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer — who the Americans believe is Mr. Masri — issued a statement through a jihadi Internet site pledging to continue attacks against "crusaders and Shiites."

Still, American officials said they believed that Mr. Zarqawi's death had disrupted the leadership of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, and that a struggle for control of the organization might be under way.

General Caldwell suggested that others in the organization might be challenging Mr. Masri, including Abdullah al-Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahedeen Shura, or Council of Holy Warriors, an organization that claims to oversee Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and several other militant groups.

"As we continue looking at the Al Qaeda network, there is no question that it is in some kind of disarray and disorganization at this point," General Caldwell said.

The Iraqi government released what it said was a document drawn up by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia that showed the difficulties being endured by insurgents in Iraq. The document called for efforts to sabotage America's relationship with Iraq's Shiites — and to start a war between America and Iran — to salvage the prospects of the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0034928

The document said the insurgency was being weakened by the American program to train Iraqi security forces, as well as "massive attacks and arrests," the disruption of insurgents' financial networks and the launching of a propaganda campaign that was prompting Iraqis to believe that the insurgents were acting against the public interest.

"Time is now beginning to be of service to the American forces and harmful to the resistance," the document said.

"We mean specifically attempting to escalate the tension between America and Iran, and America and the Shiites in Iraq," the document said.

There was no way to verify the authenticity of the document. General Caldwell said it came from a "mass storage device" discovered in a raid carried out before the airstrike on Mr. Zarqawi.

In Washington, White House officials played down reports out of Iraq that as a way to promote unity, the new government would consider granting amnesty to those who had attacked American troops.

During a news briefing with reporters on Thursday, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, urged patience, noting that the Iraqis were still working through their unification plan.

"They have talked of steps to try and get people into the — to lay down their arms and come into the political process," he said.

"They've talked about dealing with the issue of militia," he added. "They've talked about a kind of truth and reconciliation commission on the approach of South Africa, and they've talked about amnesty. But that's kind of the level of discussion."

For the first time, American officers offered a detailed timeline of the airstrike that killed Mr. Zarqawi. Though the Americans declined to discuss the details, the sequence of events suggested the presence of a mole inside Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who tipped off the Americans about Mr. Zarqawi's location inside the house where he was killed.

According to the timeline, a critical moment leading up the attack came at 4:18 p.m., about two hours before the airstrike. That was when a vehicle containing two people pulled up to an unidentified Iraqi house near the one in Hibhib where Mr. Zarqawi was waiting. One of the people in the vehicle was Sheik Abd al-Rahman, Mr. Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, whom the Americans had been tracking. Mr. Rahman went inside.

Five minutes later, another vehicle arrived at the same house. The identities of those in the second car were not disclosed. But, according to the timeline, Mr. Rahman drove away 23 minutes later to meet Mr. Zarqawi.

The first meeting at the undisclosed location, General Caldwell said, was the main tip-off that Mr. Rahman would soon be going to see Mr. Zarqawi, the Americans' ultimate target.

The purpose of this first meeting, it appears, was for Mr. Rahman to be told of Mr. Zarqawi's exact location, and whether it would be safe to go there. Until that time, it is unlikely that Mr. Rahman even knew where Mr. Zarqawi was.

"This is the first time where we saw Rahman move to a meeting location, moving from his vehicle inside another place," General Caldwell said. "That was a movement along a path that eventually took him to the safe house."

Fourteen minutes after leaving the first house, Mr. Rahman arrived at the house in Hibhib, where Mr. Zarqawi was waiting for him. He got out of his vehicle and walked inside.

The meeting went on for about 45 minutes, officials said, when an unidentified vehicle left the safe house with two passengers. Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman were still inside.

Shortly thereafter, the Americans ordered an F-16 pilot to drop two 500-pound bombs on the house, killing Mr. Zarqawi, Mr. Rahman and four others, including a young girl.

Asked whether the vehicle that left the house before the airstrike contained the mole, General Caldwell offered an intriguing answer.

"We have been asked not to talk about any of the individuals who left the place, or where they may have ended up or where they are today," he said.

Al-Masri Identified As Apparent Zarqawi Successor (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Debbi Wilgoren

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Correction to This Article

Earlier versions of this story incorrectly reported from Washington that the 2,500 death toll included civilian contractors. It does not. The figure includes military troops and 7 Department of Defense civilian casualties. The story also said that nearly 17,500 U.S. troops had been wounded. That figure should be 18,500. It also included an incorrect translation for the pseudonym al-Muhajer. That means "the immigrant." This version has been corrected.

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- U.S. military leaders Thursday unveiled a photograph of the Egyptian-born explosives expert they believe has been tapped as the apparent successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the insurgent leader killed in an airstrike June 7.

DOJ_NMG_0034929

The announcement came as the death toll for U.S. troops and Defense Department civilians in Iraq reached 2,500, Pentagon officials said. A total of 1,972 personnel have been killed in action since the March 2003 invasion, officials said, while 528 died from accidents, illness and other causes. Nearly 18,500 U.S. soldiers have been wounded in the conflict, with about 10,000 of them returning to duty within three days, the Pentagon said. Of the fatalities, seven were civilian employees of the Pentagon.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told reporters Thursday morning that Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the man identified on Web postings as the new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, is known to U.S. officials as Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

Masri was trained as an explosives expert in Afghanistan, Caldwell told reporters at a briefing. Masri is believed to have ties to fellow Egyptian Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy to Osama bin Laden in the al-Qaeda terrorist network.

Caldwell said Masri has been involved in terrorist activity since 1982, initially working with the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, which was led by Zawahiri. He was pictured in a large photograph on display at the media briefing wearing a traditional white Arab headdress secured with a black cord.

Masri's high-level involvement in al-Qaeda in Iraq was confirmed by material seized in military raids in southern Iraq in April and May, Caldwell said. The loose-knit insurgent group has been responsible for hundreds of bombings, kidnappings and killings of Iraqi civilians and U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

Caldwell said the United States cannot determine whether Masri has assumed full control of the group.

"Al-Masri's ability to effectively assert his leadership over al-Qaeda cells remains unclear," he said, adding that there are other "al-Qaeda senior leadership members and Sunni terrorists" who could compete with him for power.

Among them, Caldwell cited Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi, who in the past has been identified as deputy leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, and Abdullah bin Rashid al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujaheddin Shura Council.

In the Internet posting last week, the man identifying himself as Muhajer claimed to have succeeded Zarqawi, and vowed to avenge his death.

Both "al-Muhajer" and "al-Masri" are pseudonyms -- al-Muhajer means "the immigrant," and al-Masri means "the Egyptian." Abu Hamza and Abu Ayyub mean "father of Hamza" and "father of Ayyub," respectively. Arab men who have children commonly are known by their eldest son's name.

The men calling themselves al-Iraqi and al-Baghdadi also appear to be using aliases.

In a separate news briefing in Baghdad, Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie on Thursday unveiled a document he said was written by al-Qaeda leaders and suggested the insurgency was weakening.

Wire service reports quoted Rubaie as saying that al-Qaeda leaders wanted to encourage a war between the United States and Iran, to distract the United States from its campaign against the insurgent group. He said the document described the current situation as a "crisis" for the insurgency, and outlined the need to lessen cooperation between Iraqi Shiites and the United States.

But U.S. officials cautioned that there was no way to verify whether that was in fact the insurgents' position.

Although the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the document was found in Zarqawi's hideout following the June 7 airstrike that killed him, Caldwell said the document actually was taken off a computer drive in the days before military forces pinpointed Zarqawi's location.

Shiite Militias Control Prisons, Official Says (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's prison system is overrun with Shiite Muslim militiamen who have freed fellow militia members convicted of major crimes and executed Sunni Arab inmates, the country's deputy justice minister said in an interview this week.

"We cannot control the prisons. It's as simple as that," said the deputy minister, Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, an ethnic Kurd. "Our jails are infiltrated by the militias from top to bottom, from Basra to Baghdad."

As a result, Yei has asked U.S. authorities to suspend plans to transfer prisons and detainees from American to Iraqi control. "Our ministry is unprepared at this time to take over the facilities, especially those in areas where Shiite militias exist," he said in a letter to U.S. Army Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, the official in charge of American detention facilities.

U.S. officials said months ago that they planned to turn over Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison and three other American-run facilities to the Iraqi government, but the handoff has been repeatedly pushed back. Gardner has said he will not authorize the transfers until he is convinced that standards of inmate treatment and security match those maintained in U.S.-run facilities.

"We will not transfer the facilities and legal custody of the detainees until each respective facility and the Iraqi Corrections system have demonstrated the ability to maintain the required standards, especially in the areas of care and custody," Gardner said in a written response to questions. "We fully recognize that there are significant challenges that must be overcome but believe that we will be able to address these as we move through 2006 into 2007."

He said Abu Ghraib would be transferred to Iraqi control "in the next few months."

Gardner said the eventual transfer of prisons to Iraqi control would proceed gradually, preceded by several weeks of training for Iraqi guards, conducted by U.S. corrections officers and military police. The Iraqis would then work under the supervision of American guards for at least six months. A U.S. transition team would then be left in place for an additional period before the prison was handed over.

While allegations of abuse at U.S.-run prisons have waned since the 2004 Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal, Iraqi facilities have drawn increased scrutiny since a U.S. Army raid exposed torture of dozens of detainees -- most of them Sunnis -- at a secret Interior Ministry facility in the Baghdad neighborhood of Jadriyah.

The prison was widely alleged to have been operated by a special police unit staffed largely by members of the Badr Organization, a Shiite militia with ties to Iraq's largest Shiite political party. The government investigated the facility but never announced the results.

Yei said that because of mounting concern over detention centers run by Iraq's Interior and Defense ministries, where militias retain heavy influence, the police and army have agreed to turn over all their prisoners to the Justice Ministry by the end of the month.

As of early June, there were 7,426 inmates housed in Justice Ministry facilities, Yei said. The Interior Ministry had an additional 1,797 prisoners and the Defense Ministry a smaller number. More than 15,000 inmates were being held in five U.S. prisons in Iraq.

But while a U.N. human rights report issued last month stressed that the Defense and Interior ministries have legal authority to hold inmates only a brief time, Sunni Arabs charge that Sunnis are regularly imprisoned in the centers for months or even more than a year.

"The police are not supposed to be holding them beyond the time it takes to conduct an investigation," Yei said. "As long as the Interior Ministry doesn't hide anything, they will all be handed to us this month."

Already, the transfer plan is meeting resistance. The provincial council in Wasit province, south of Baghdad, ordered police there not to transfer detainees to a Justice Ministry facility, according to Muhammed Hasan al-Attabi, a provincial government spokesman.

A major general with Iraq's Interior Ministry, speaking on condition he not be named, said the transfer was already underway and would be completed on schedule. He denied that militias ran roughshod over the prisons. "All the detention centers in Baghdad and southern Iraq are under our control, except for some centers in Basra, maybe two or three there, which are run by militia officers," he said.

In an interview this week, Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie, the top Sunni Arab in Iraq's new government, showed photographs taken from one recent inspection of an Interior Ministry detention center. An inmate in one of the photos held out his misshapen, limp hands for the camera. The man's hands had been broken in a beating, Zobaie said. Other inmates showed massive, dark bruises on their skin; one bore a large, open infected sore.

Inmates in another photo clustered around chains hung from the middle of one of the crowded cells. The chains were used to hoist prisoners by their bound hands, Zobaie said. The practice, noted frequently in inspection reports of Interior Ministry detention centers, often results in the dislocation of prisoners' shoulders.

Ninety percent of the men crowded into Interior Ministry detention centers are Sunni Arabs, Zobaie said. He called treatment in the Interior Ministry prisons "inhumane" and indicated it still was less than certain whether the Defense and Interior ministries would follow through on their agreement to turn over the inmates to the Justice Ministry. "Hopefully, they will," he said.

Yei gave several detailed accounts of abuses by militias, the names of which he declined to provide, saying only that "there are two, everyone knows them." U.S. officials recently said they consider the militias to be as grave a threat to Iraq's security as the Sunni-led insurgency.

On Aug. 13, 2004, he said, militia members freed 552 prisoners in the southern city of Hilla during a militia-led attack. A week later, 122 inmates escaped from the main prison in Amarah, also in the south, with the help of guards who were also militia members.

On Jan. 13, 2005, he said, 38 prisoners escaped during an attack on a convoy carrying them to Baghdad's Abu Ghraib. Eight were eventually rearrested. A month later, seven prisoners escaped while being transferred to the Badoush prison in the northern city of Mosul.

On June 14, 2005, seven prisoners escaped from Abu Ghraib in an incident still under investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0034931

Last December, militia members entered the maximum-security prison in the Kadhimiyah section of Baghdad, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, freeing one militia member on death row and four others serving life sentences. At the same prison, on Feb. 28, guards and militia members freed two men who were to be executed that week.

And in the once-tranquil southern city of Basra, where militia violence has surged in recent months to the point that the Iraqi government declared a state of emergency in late May, militia members in early March took 12 foreign-born prisoners -- Egyptian, Saudi and Sudanese -- from their cells and shot them dead them by the facilities' main gate.

Yei's account adds to a growing list of alleged abuses in Iraq's overburdened prison system, long criticized by Sunni leaders who say Sunni prisoners are commonly mistreated.

Visits to detention centers in southern Iraq in recent months indicated they are often badly overcrowded and unsanitary. At the Tesfirat prison in Najaf last October, 122 prisoners were packed into cells designed for a maximum of 60, according to Lt. Jassim Juwad, the prison officer in charge. A prison maintained by police commandos in Hilla and designed for 150 inmates housed 400 as recently as April. Inmates at both locations had been incarcerated for up to 18 months without trial.

On Saturday, a group of parliament members paid a surprise visit to a detention facility run by the Interior Ministry in Baqubah, north of Baghdad. "We have found terrible violations of the law," said Muhammed al-Dayni, a Sunni parliament member who said as many as 120 detainees were packed into a 35-by-20-foot cell. "They told us that they've been raped," Dayni said. "Their families were called in and tortured to force the detainees to testify against other people."

"The detention facilities of the ministries of Defense and Interior are places for the most brutal human rights abuse," he added.

Despite broad U.S. efforts to encourage the Iraqi government to improve conditions in prisons, the problem of militia control could prove particularly intractable. Shiite militias such as the Badr Organization and the Mahdi Army, loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are backed by dozens of members of parliament whose political parties run the armed groups.

"You can't even talk to the militias, because they are the government," Yei said. "They have ministers on their side."

After A Dark Time, A Walk Into The Sun (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 15 -- The desert hut that became his home for more than a year, the place he lived in captivity with some 30 other men at Abu Ghraib prison, was No. 6 -- known, he said, as the "freedom tent."

At the prison, Omar Taha, 24, pined for his girlfriend and his favorite nightclubs, passed time playing soccer and listening to the radio and never got over his bewilderment at being arrested for what he says was simply being too close to an explosion in Baghdad.

"I was just driving my car," he said. "Two soldiers came up to me and said, 'Why are you stopped?' I said, 'I am scared.' Then they took me here."

On Thursday, Taha was one of 489 detainees who walked under a harsh sun out of the chain-link pen at Iraq's most infamous prison. The mass release, part of a larger plan to free 2,500 prisoners this month, is intended to bolster Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's efforts to defuse the Sunni Arab insurgency.

This week Maliki, a member of the Shiite Muslim majority, expressed a willingness to talk with insurgents and proposed pardoning people involved in the resistance that has destabilized Iraq. A fuller description of his reconciliation plan is expected soon.

The prisoner release on Thursday was the third this month. Before walking out in single file, the men stood quietly behind the fence as Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie addressed them from atop a wooden platform.

"We want to see people who are innocent released, and go back to their homes, and go back to their normal lives," Zobaie said, adding: "Anyone who is innocent must be released. Anyone whose hands are drenched in blood must not be let go."

Some of the men were barefoot; others wore sandals. They were each given a copy of the Koran, a new set of clothes, $25 and a bus ticket. Some held up their Korans to reporters, who were kept outside the fence, and others put towels over their heads to block the sun. One elderly man, missing his left leg, hobbled out of the prison on crutches.

Mizher Jasim, 20, said he had fallen behind his economics classmates at the University of Tikrit after 6 1/2 months in prison for a "random arrest."

"There was some shootout, and they brought a lot of people in," he said, calling his treatment "not so bad."

"But I was still in detention," he said.

As of early June, more than 15,000 inmates were being held in five U.S. prisons in Iraq, according to the Iraqi Justice Ministry. Abu Ghraib currently holds 3,600 prisoners, but the number fluctuates because the prison serves as a transfer point for detainees moving to and from other detention centers, said Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for the American military command.

To gain their freedom, the detainees -- most of whom have not been formally charged -- had to renounce violence and pledge to be good citizens, Curry said. Their cases were reviewed, and those who were found to be "relatively low risk" were released, he said.

"In the spirit of unity and reconciliation, we need to reintegrate the detainees who were found not guilty of the serious violent crimes -- bombing, torture, kidnapping, murder," Curry said.

Iraq's deputy justice minister, Pusho Ibrahim Ali Daza Yei, sharply criticized the U.S.-led forces for imprisoning so many people.

"If there is an incident in this neighborhood or that neighborhood, they will arrest the whole neighborhood, 400 or 500 people, and there are only four or five criminals. This is why they don't send them to court," he said in an interview this week. "I say, why keep them here? They are chickens? They say, if we send them to the court, the court will release them. I say this is the law, but it's in one ear and out the other."

S. Korean Charged In Oil - For - Food Scandal (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Filed at 1:08 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food scandal has been charged with lying to the FBI.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned an indictment accusing Tongsun Park of falsely telling investigators in 2004 that he played no role more than a decade ago in the adoption of the U.N. resolution that set up the oil-for-food program.

The one-count, single-sentence indictment also says Park made false statements when he said he had no business dealings with an unidentified U.N. official, and when he told the FBI that he did not exchange money with an unidentified Iraqi-American, and that he had never been to that person's office.

In New York, Park already is facing charges of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, acting as an unregistered agent of a foreign government and money laundering. He has pleaded not guilty.

Park's lawyer, Michael Kim, said the government is concerned it will lose the case in New York and is seeking "a second bite of the apple" with the Washington case, which was assigned to U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan. The New York case is scheduled to go to trial June 26.

The oil-for-food program ran from 1996 to 2003 to help Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Baghdad's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Park was charged in New York in April 2005 with accepting millions of dollars from the Iraqi government while he operated in the United States as an unregistered agent for Iraq's oil-for-food program. He became a fugitive when he failed to respond to a U.S. warrant, and he was arrested in Houston in January after being expelled from Mexico.

In the 1970s, Park was at the center of what became known as the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of trying to buy influence in Congress.

Park was indicted in the scandal, but the charges were dropped.

South Korean Businessman Hit With Another Indictment (HC/BLOOM)

Tongsun Park, the South Korean businessman accused of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq, was charged in a new case with making false statements to the FBI.

Park "knowingly and willfully" lied about the United Nations Oil-for-Food program, according to an indictment issued this week in Washington.

"Park falsely told FBI agents that he played no role in the adoption of United Nations Security Council Resolution 986," which established the U.N. program, according to the indictment. He also falsely said he didn't exchange money with an unnamed Iraqi-American and that he had no business dealings with an unnamed U.N. official, the indictment said.

The businessman already faces trial in Manhattan later this month for alleged work on behalf of Saddam Hussein's regime. Park was accused in a January indictment of working as an unregistered agent for Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Park lobbied the U.S. and the U.N. to repeal sanctions and set up the Oil-for-food program, the government says.

Michael Kim, a lawyer representing Park, said the government is "piling on" before the June 26 Manhattan trial.

The U.S. investigation into the Oil-for-Food program has resulted in charges against 11 people, including Houston oilman Oscar Wyatt.

Most defendants are accused of paying illegal kickbacks to Saddam's regime in exchange for oil.

Military Investigates U.S. Killings Of Iraqis At Checkpoint (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military is investigating the killing of three Iraqi civilians by American forces in northern Iraq, Pentagon officials said Thursday.

The inquiry into the May 9 deaths in Salahuddin province was requested by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq, officials in Baghdad announced today.

Pentagon officials said they could provide few details about the deaths of the Iraqis, who were killed at a checkpoint in province's southern region. The military is investigating whether they were threatening American troops or whether the troops acted improperly and had no cause to use force against the civilians, an official said.

Chiarelli requested that the Army's Criminal Investigation Command undertake the inquiry as a result of soldiers' reported suspicions about the deaths. At the time of the deaths, the Iraqis were in the custody of U.S.-led forces, according to the statement released in Baghdad.

Salahuddin, which includes former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, begins about 40 miles north of Baghdad and is part of an area overseen by the Army's 101st Airborne Division. Pentagon officials said they were unable to say whether the forces involved in the killings were Army personnel or members of another service.

Checkpoints have become a contentious issue in Iraq. Vehicles laden with explosives are one of the most deadly threats to American troops, and service members are most vulnerable at roadblocks. But Iraqi officials have said the Americans are too quick to fire on vehicles as they approach the roadblocks.

Under Chiarelli, troops have been looking for methods other than firing warning shots to caution civilians as they approach checkpoints.

Dozens of people have been killed at checkpoints, including an Italian intelligence agent who had just helped rescue a kidnapped journalist in March 2005.

The investigation into the Salahuddin deaths comes at a time of increased attention to such incidents because of recent allegations that U.S. Marines killed two dozen innocent Iraqi civilians in Haditha in November.

Haditha stories

As more reporters travel to Haditha, some of them Iraqi stringers hired by Western newspapers, the stories about what U.S. Marines did in the town Nov. 19 get more and more gruesome.

Defense attorneys deny assertions by some residents that Marines lined up unarmed civilians and executed them. They say the Marines of Kilo Company, after being fired upon, did three house-clearing operations in which civilians, and suspected insurgents, some armed, some not, were killed. Some of the 24 were women and children.

More troubling to defense attorneys is an account from one resident that the Marines killed an elderly man in a wheelchair. Marines have told lawyers they saw no man in a wheelchair during the operations in what is one of the most dangerous towns in Anbar province.

Marine Corps defenders also are questioning the authenticity of a video, purportedly of the victims and made by a Sunni man. They question why the images did not surface until months afterward.

Still, sources close to the case expect Marines to face criminal charges once an investigation is complete.

Fat terrorist

For a man constantly on the run planning new ways to murder innocents, Abu Musab Zarqawi didn't miss many meals.

Among the findings of an autopsy, which found he died June 7 of bomb-damaged lungs, was that the al Qaeda in Iraq leader was a bit hefty.

"He was fit, but I think he was on the heavyweight side," an unidentified forensic pathologist, who conducted the postmortem, told reporters in Baghdad.

The U.S. military previously had captured and shown a homemade video of a plump Zarqawi unable to operate a machine gun and calling for help from fellow terrorists.

Shrinkage

The Air Force has sent a memo to airmen explaining why the service is cutting the force by 40,000 in the coming years. The bottom line: The Air Force wants to free up money to pay for expensive weapons systems, such as the F-22 Raptor.

"We are reducing end strength and becoming more efficient," the memo states. "It is important to maintain our technological edge to fight the wars of today and tomorrow."

Warning that pink slips are coming, the memo adds, "We understand this could be a difficult time for some airmen and their families. We will use every authority available to minimize the impact for those transitioning to civilian life."

The active-duty Air Force is slated to shrink from 351,800 this year to 334,200 in 2007.

Prison break

Not much was known about one of Delta Forces' biggest successes, that is until Kurt Muse decided to tell his story of survival, which is closely linked to the secretive special operations unit.

In 1989, as U.S. forces prepared to invade Panama from within (from American bases protecting the canal) and from without, Delta commandos first used Little Bird helicopters to scale the walls of Panama's main prison and free Mr. Muse.

Years later, Mr. Muse writes about the rescue in his book, "Six Minutes to Freedom: How a Band of Heroes Defied a Dictator and Helped Free a Nation."

Mr. Muse, now a Northern Virginia resident, lived and worked in Panama, seeing the brutality of Manuel Noriega up close. He decided to work against the dictator by building an underground radio station, the Voice of Liberty, to broadcast the truth. Noriega imported Cuban agents to hunt down the station's location. They did, capturing Mr. Muse and imprisoning him for nine months, with orders to execute him if he tried to escape.

Mr. Muse, whose research included interviewing former President George Bush in his Houston office, tells us he thinks he is the only American civilian ever rescued by Delta Force. He plans a reunion with some of his rescuers at a book launch party this month.

An excerpt: "Total elapsed time from touch-down to dust-off was six minutes. But the night was about to get a lot longer. ... Three feet past the edge of the roof, the chopper pilot dropped the bird into a nose-down dive that first nearly had them smashing into the prison yard dirt and then again into the prison yard wall. ... On the far side of the wall, the chopper landed in the middle of the street. ... This was about to get ugly."

Army ammo

The Army recently concluded a $3 million, three-year study to find out what it was told by a group of specialists years ago: The killing power of the M-16/M-4 carbine is good for close combat.

The Army study started after some soldiers in Afghanistan claimed that the 62-grain, 5.56 mm round did not have enough stopping power to kill terrorists in close combat. The complaints appeared aimed at trying to get the Army to adopt bigger caliber guns and ammo, something the service opposes.

According to defense officials close to the study, a group of assembled specialists on the matter, including both ballistics specialists and medical doctors familiar with bullet wounds, told the Army before it started the study that the problem is not the size of the bullet but the person pulling the trigger.

The specialists concluded that disabling an enemy combatant with an M-16 is more dependent on where a shot is placed, the number of hits that are placed on target, and the level of marksmanship training of the solider. The size of the bullet and its design are less important and the standard M855 ammunition, known as "green tip" ammo is fine.

The Army study concluded almost the same thing but failed to identify one fault of its own soldiers: They need more training to be better shots.

The study proved that the complaints from some units in Afghanistan were unwarranted. "There are some special operations units that never complained because they could shoot," one official told us. For those lacking marksmanship training, "they could shoot at someone 10 times but only hit him once or twice."

"The Army is very willing to spend a lot of money on guns and ammunition, but very little on marksmanship training," the official said.

China-Hamas links

A Chinese intelligence officer is engaged in covertly aiding the ruling Palestinian Hamas terrorist group, according to a Paris-based intelligence newsletter.

Gong Xiaosheng was identified as a Ministry of State Security (MSS) official who has worked out of Ramallah since November 2002, Intelligence Online reported in its June 9 edition.

The report said Mr. Gong is a "strategic agent" who was trained in Division 8 of the ministry and also at the China Institute of Contemporary International Relations (CICIR), an MSS think tank whose Middle East section is headed by Jin Ruikun, a specialist on Palestine and Jordan, and Chen Shuanqing, a specialist on Israeli-Palestinian relations and Israel's Likud Party.

DOJ_NMG_0034935

The institute produces in-house studies for Chinese communist and military leaders and predicted in January that Hamas would win the Palestinian elections.

According to the report, Mr. Gong in the past was constantly seen in the company of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat but has since begun helping Hamas.

Mr. Gong arranged an invitation to China for Mahmud al-Zahar, the Hamas foreign minister to take part in a China-Arab Cooperation Forum in Beijing last month.

Unlike the United States and other Western governments who rightly view Hamas as a terrorist organization, China was quick to recognize the new Palestinian government ruled by Hamas.

Americans Fear Haditha Fallout (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

AMERICANS FEAR Haditha fallout but oppose prosecuting Marines.

In Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 62% say reported massacre of Iraqi civilians will harm U.S. relationship with Muslim world. But by 49%-33%, they want reprimands rather than criminal charges.

Americans say troops "shouldn't be the fall guys," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts survey with Republican Bill McInturff. Only 32% believe such incidents are "common."

Optimism rises after Zarqawi's death, but 57% still want U.S. forces cut.

ECONOMIC GLOOM gives Democrats a political opening.

By 39%-16%, Americans expect economy to get worse in next year; 43% say it'll stay the same. Democrats lead on handling the economy by the largest margin, 16 percentage points, since 1993. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Among independents, 25% worry Democrats will too quickly raise taxes and spending. But 37% say Bush's party isn't sufficiently curbing spending and shrinking the deficit. As House and Senate near minimum-wage clashes next week, 55% of independents are more likely to support a candidate who backs an increase.

INCONVENIENT TRUTH: Gore's ratings remain negative.

Americans view former vice president unfavorably by 42%-30%, though 53% of Democrats give a thumbs-up. But his cause draws adherents: 59% say climate change warrants "some action" or "immediate" steps, up from 51% in 1999.

After appearing with Falwell, 2008 hopeful McCain sees favorable ratings among conservatives tick up to 40% from 36% in April. McCain's standing among Republicans, 47% positive and 16% negative, exceeds the 36%-13% showing for potential rival Gingrich.

Among 2004 Bush backers, 8% say their 2006 vote will signal opposition to the president.

STAR QUALITY? Senate Democratic Leader Reid launches "Your Congress" on PoliticsTV.com, a Webcast network for the left. "When it comes to a regular political analyst, we think we have Fox News, CNN and MSNBC beat," says PoliticsTV Chairman Mike Lux. Some 15% of Americans under 35 call themselves "strong Republicans," matching the proportion of "strong Democrats."

WANING WEDGE? Among Republicans most interested in 2006 elections, gay marriage trails Iraq and immigration as issue; 22% cite it as a top factor in November choice. Just 5% say flag-burning.

DANGER ZONE? An environmental group says National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's new Tsunami Warning Center in Hawaii is vulnerable to storms. An NOAA spokeswoman says tsunamis in the past century have never reached the third-floor level where offices will be. By 28%-27%, Republicans say Democratic Party would better protect the environment.

IRAN-CONTRA VETERANS North, Secord, Hall and Clarridge gather to salute 1980s-era anti-Sandinista rebels before Nicaragua's November elections. U.S. attitudes on CIA are 31% positive; FBI draws a 42% positive mark.

SCANDAL FAILS to emerge as pivotal midterm-election issue.

Prosecutor Fitzgerald's decision not to charge Rove in CIA leak case makes it harder for Democrats to tie "culture of corruption" to Bush. Attention to Abramoff and DeLay sagas, partly offset by woes of Democrat Jefferson, have left minority party with modest seven percentage-point edge on ethics.

Pluralities of voters in all regions except the Northeast say both parties are "equally" influenced by special interests and lobbyists. But if Democrats recapture Congress, 69% want Congress to investigate Bush administration's energy task force.

Americans back Congressional probes of Iraq intelligence by 57%-40%, and of warrantless wiretaps by 53%-44%.

DOJ_NMG_0034936

MINOR MEMOS: Census says 147,000 of 66.3 million American fathers are married and home with kids under 15. ... Among men, 42% are more likely to back a congressional candidate who'd make most abortions illegal, compared with 38% of women.

General Leading Haditha Probe Known For Integrity, Toughness (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The two-star Army general leading the main inquiry into the killings of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is a decorated Delta Force operative known among his peers for integrity and uncanny judgment in combat.

Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell rose from a Special Forces staff sergeant in Vietnam to commander of the secretive Delta Force, earning a reputation as an unusually skilled fighter who bluntly confronted superiors to get what he needed for his men. He is one of the Army's most highly decorated soldiers on active duty.

Bargewell's intimate familiarity with combat -- he was wounded seven times -- gives him credibility as the chief investigator into allegations of some of the worst war crimes committed by the U.S. military in Iraq, according to active-duty and retired Special Forces officers who know him.

"Key to the investigation will be to ask the right questions, and he knows exactly what to ask," said one officer who has served overseas with Bargewell. He, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the record.

His investigation is one of two probes into what happened in Haditha and how commanders reacted. On Nov. 19, 2005, a Marine convoy was hit by a roadside bomb, and in the aftermath, the Marines killed unarmed civilians, including women and children, in their homes. A criminal inquiry by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service is underway. Bargewell's report, submitted to senior commanders in Iraq this month, examines whether Marines tried to cover up the shootings and whether commanders were negligent in failing to investigate the deaths.

The 59-year-old general is seen as unlikely to bend to pressure to sway his conclusions, both by virtue of his character and because he plans to retire this year after nearly four decades in the Army. "He has unimpeachable integrity," said retired Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Lambert, a Special Forces officer who has known Bargewell for decades. "He has no constituency that could influence findings. Bargewell is his own man."

Bargewell is considered so unflinchingly candid that another officer suggested that military leaders "may be sorry they chose him" to lead the probe.

Bargewell grew up in Hoquiam, Wash., where his father was an elementary-school principal, and graduated from Hoquiam High School in 1965. He attended a local college on a football scholarship before suffering a knee injury, according to a newspaper profile that Bargewell provided to The Washington Post.

In 1967, he enlisted in the Army and volunteered for the Special Forces, or Green Berets, an elite force that specializes in working with indigenous fighters.

During two tours in Vietnam, he led a team of three American and six Vietnamese Montagnard soldiers as part of a secret unit conducting strike and surveillance missions in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam and in the demilitarized zone between North and South Vietnam. The unit, MACV Special Operations and Augmentation OP-35, "was considered a highly classified and hidden unit based on our mission area," according to Bargewell, who speaks French and Spanish.

Bargewell saw heavy combat in Vietnam, where he was awarded four Purple Hearts for battle wounds and won the Distinguished Service Cross, which is second among military decorations only to the Medal of Honor.

According to the citation, on Sept. 27, 1971, Bargewell and his team were on a long-range reconnaissance mission deep in enemy territory when they came under attack from 75 to 100 fighters. Bargewell was seriously wounded by a B-40 rocket but managed to fire back a torrent of machine-gun rounds, inflicting enough casualties to twice break enemy assaults that threatened to overrun his small group. His "extraordinary heroism" under fire allowed the team to be extracted, the citation said.

"His judgment in combat was almost supernatural," Lambert said. "He was not only absolutely fearless, he could do everything. He had 20/10 vision. His sniping was off the scale. He had perfect eye-hand coordination."

Bargewell also was known for his toughness, a trait he continued to exhibit after he left the enlisted ranks and was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the 75th Ranger Regiment in 1973. Bargewell stayed primarily with the Rangers until 1981, when as a major he began a 17-year stint with the Special Forces Operational Detachment -- Delta, also known as Delta Force, based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

During training for the U.S. invasion of Panama in 1989, Bargewell badly injured his back in a Black Hawk helicopter crash. But doctors patched him up, and he led a Delta squadron in Operation Just Cause in Panama, conducting dozens of missions, including the rescue of U.S. citizen Kurt Muse from a prison, according to Bargewell and officers who know him. In 1991, he led a Delta task force in northern Iraq during the Persian Gulf War.

In 1998, he took command of Special Operations Forces in Europe, overseeing activities in Kosovo and Bosnia as a brigadier general. At the time of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, he was operations chief for the U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa and later served with NATO. Bargewell took his current post, as operations chief for the U.S. military in Iraq, in April 2005.

Inside the small -- and in the eyes of some, incestuous -- world of Delta Force, Bargewell has enjoyed support from another veteran commander, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, the officers said. Both men are pragmatic, with Schoomaker grasping the big picture and Bargewell excelling at the nuts and bolts of military operations. If Bargewell has a weakness, some said, it is that he can become too tactically focused.

Bargewell, known as fiercely loyal and "so down to earth it hurts," as one officer said, has two sons in the military and plans to retire to Alabama.

Bargewell's fondness for sleek cars -- he owns a Corvette -- contrasts with his introverted personality. "In a roomful of officers at a social, he'd be the one over in the corner with a beer -- even as a two-star general," said one Army acquaintance. "But the rewards of drawing him out are great."

Baghdad On The Bayou (WT)

By David Axe

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

FORT POLK, La. -- A combat readiness training center at this remote base in Louisiana once prepared U.S. soldiers for infantry gunbattle with Soviet forces. These days, the focus of the training is fighting insurgents in crowded Iraqi villages with cultural sensitivity and limiting civilian casualties.

A cluster of fabricated neighborhoods represents Iraq's chaotic urban battlefield. Combat brigades numbering as many as 5,000 soldiers spend three weeks living and fighting there.

Aggressive paratroopers trained in insurgent tactics prowl the swamps. Actors and local residents wearing Middle Eastern-style clothing stand in for Iraqi civilians. Iraqi expatriates play the roles of tribal leaders and town mayors. Combatants and civilians alike wear vests that detect lasers beamed by modified weapons that fire noisy blanks. Pyrotechnics specialists add smoke and explosions to simulate improvised explosive devices. Combat veteran "observer-controllers" referee clashes among trainees, "insurgents" and restive civilians.

Soldiers have complained that training at Fort Polk's Joint Readiness Training Center is harder than combat in Iraq. Center commander Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero says that is the point.

"We want their worst day to be at Fort Polk and not in Baghdad."

With the spread of small wars and insurgencies like those in Iraq and Afghanistan, Fort Polk has shifted gears from the Cold War-era battle readiness. Now winning hearts and minds is as important as winning firefights.

"We could go over there in theater and kill every bad guy, but that doesn't mean we will be successful," said Maj. Eric Baus, center spokesman. Like in Iraq, he added, success for trainees at Fort Polk means convincing the populace to point out insurgents and make them unwelcome in their villages.

But winning over civilians is hard when insurgents blend in, strike on crowded streets and draw U.S. fire that kills innocents.

During a June 5 exercise, soldiers from the Texas-based 1st Cavalry Division, slated to deploy to Iraq in a few weeks, patrolled a street in a simulated village. Actors portraying Iraqi vendors gathered around the Humvees and trucks. Then a bomb exploded, rockets streaked in from the countryside and insurgents attacked with small arms. Civilians screamed and scattered; some fell to the ground writhing from imaginary wounds. One actor, an amputee, was wearing gory makeup to replicate massive trauma.

U.S. troops returned fire, gathered up some of the wounded and raced away, leaving some casualties untreated.

Observer-controllers at the exercise said that despite the civilian casualties and their failure to evacuate all the wounded, the unit's effort was stellar. It was enough that the Capt. Robert Nevins, the unit commander, maintained control of his troops in a chaotic situation.

However, leaving injured civilians behind makes Capt. Nevins and his troops unpopular with the locals. To head off an uprising, the next day Capt. Nevins meets with a Kurdish-born American portraying a tribal sheik.

These meetings are hosted at Fort Polk's new "Engagement University," a series of rooms decorated to look like Iraqi homes and monitored by closed-circuit TV cameras. Specialists in Iraqi culture take notes as Capt. Nevins and other commanders work out problems caused by failures in past exercises.

DOJ_NMG_0034938

Capt. Nevins' Iraqi counterpart is skeptical despite the commander's apologies. The sheik brings up the purported massacre in Haditha -- where Marines are accused of killing two dozen innocent Iraqis in November -- and puts Capt. Nevins on the defensive.

"We try to make our scenarios as relevant as possible," explains Lt. Col. Dennis Smith, director of Engagement University.

Eight Afghans Killed On Way To Work At U.S. Air Base (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 15 — A bomb exploded on a bus taking workers to the United States military air base at Kandahar in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing 8 people and wounding at least 16 others, among them 4 children, officials said.

Kandahar, the spiritual home of the Taliban, has been the scene of frequent suicide bomb attacks and roadside explosions in recent months, but this bomb was the first specifically directed at civilians working at the base.

The explosion occurred as the bus was leaving the city at 7.30 a.m. The men on the bus were mostly laborers and wore their identity badges, a duty officer at the hospital said. The driver was also killed, said Daoud Ahmadi, a spokesman for the provincial governor.

Children and other civilians standing outside shops lining the road were also caught in the blast.

"These innocent workers were the breadwinners of the poorest families and they were on their way to work," President Hamid Karzai said in a statement from China, where he is attending a meeting of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a regional security group of Russia, China and Central Asian nations. "The enemies of Afghanistan deliberately targeted innocent civilians," he said.

"We don't know if it was a remote-controlled bomb or a time bomb, but it was placed inside the minibus," Mr. Ahmadi said. Two cars were also caught in the blast, he said.

He said he believed that none of the passengers had known about the bomb. "This is the action of the Taliban and terrorists," he said. "The terrorists are usually targeting civilian people, and they get rewarded for killing innocent people."

The final toll was 8 dead and 16 wounded, several of them seriously, said Azizullah, the registrar at the Kandahar city hospital. Among the wounded were four children, aged 8, 9, 15 and 16, he said.

NATO troops are taking over military command of southern Afghanistan from American forces and Taliban insurgents appear intent on disrupting the transfer.

With increased insurgent activity, the American-led coalition has started a major effort, involving 11,000 troops, intended to drive insurgents from their sanctuaries. It also seeks to extend reconstruction and government services into remote areas of southern Afghanistan largely left to bandits, drug lords and Taliban supporters for the last four years.

Why The Taliban Appeal To Pakistani Youth (CSM)

By David Montero

Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

PESHAWAR, PAKISTAN

Imran Gul would like to see a better future for the tribal youth of his corner of Pakistan, but most days he only sees military helicopters returning from Waziristan, ferrying wounded and dead. Casualties in the conflicts along the Afghan border serve as a reminder that the tribal system, once strong and proud, is now falling apart.

History and war have slowly eaten away its edifice, and Mr. Gul worries that what the tribal system can no longer provide young people - peace, income, a sense of purpose, a social network - a new and rising force can: the Taliban.

"Due to poverty, young people have no activities," says Gul, program director of the Sustainable Participation Development Program, a nongovernmental organization in Banu, just outside North Waziristan. "They do not want to join the Taliban. But their sympathies are with the Taliban to bring peace to our area."

The field for such sympathies is wide and growing, many say. The Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) have always been the least advanced lands in Pakistan. Illiteracy and joblessness are rampant. There are no universities in FATA, and political parties are absent due to colonial-era tribal laws, robbing youth of an outlet for talent and expression.

The tribal system itself is partly to blame. Many elders have traditionally resisted modern education, roads, and electricity, fearing their power would be threatened the more FATA opened up. But the government is also at fault, observers say, by failing to integrate FATA into Pakistan. Voting rights were extended to the full tribal populace only in 2000.

"Young people ... oppose the current tribal system because they know that this is not ... harnessing their potential," says Naveed Ahmad Shinwari, chief executive of the Community Appraisal & Motivation Program, which works on development in the tribal zone. "If you ask any young man, he's frustrated because the government of Pakistan is clearly not doing much to create employment for young people." Military incursion further eroded old system

These problems were exacerbated when the Pakistani military entered the tribal areas for the first time in 2003. Their operations, which many tribes believe is the dirty work of Washington, have further weakened the system while sowing sympathies for extremism. In such situations, analysts say, people look to the standard-bearers of Islam for guidance and solace.

Tariq Aziz, a 17-year-old from Mir Ali in North Waziristan, sees the Taliban as a viable solution for future generations. "There are no opportunities for young people," he says by telephone from Banu. "The people of Mir Ali have sympathies for the Taliban. They fight for Islam."

Mr. Aziz says he might like to join the Taliban himself, but that his parents prefer him to continue his studies.

Like many his age, Aziz is trapped between the present danger of conflict and the elusive dream of a better life. Only hours after he hung up the phone, two suicide bombers struck a military convoy just outside Banu, killing four soldiers and wounding seven. It is to the Taliban that he looks for peace. "Under the Taliban government, there was peace in Afghanistan and no crimes occurred in the government."

In such strife, pragmatism draws young people to the Taliban. They are building a new form of social capital, a network that offers the opportunities and prestige that the tribal system once did.

"Where do they go for problem solutions? Their [members of the National Assembly] are marginalized pieces of the political system. The [tribal elders] are not recognized. The cost of living has gone up," says Khalid Aziz, chair of the Regional Institute of Policy Research & Training, a think tank in Peshawar. "[The Taliban] make life livable. They have a bureaucracy, soldiers." Slim opportunities, but education a way out

Such prospects are an oasis in a desert of grim statistics, Mr. Aziz says. "Twenty five percent of an ordinary man's income [in FATA] is spent on medical expenses, aggravated by bad delivery of basic services. Sixty percent of the incomes come from migrant workers. Eighty-five percent are working on land. Seventy percent are working on rented land. The only asset left for a frontiersman is to get a job. If I were in that area, I would definitely go Taliban."

Alternatives seem in short supply, but a few find another way of life in education. One of them is now a student at Peshawar University. He is afraid to be named because his family in Miran Shah, North Waziristan, was recently the victim of violence. Like others his age, he feels the tribal system cannot adequately prepare his generation to interact with the modern world, and hopes that education can repair the cracks left by the tribal system.

"Today people in Waziristan are interested in coming to university. Our young generation is interested in business," he says, adding that the best solution is to integrate the tribal areas with the rest of Pakistan.

It's a dream shared by many, and perhaps the best way to dampen the appeal of groups like the Taliban, analysts say. Optimists hope the way will be paved by education programs and development projects in the short term, and the introduction of political parties in the longer term. The latter, they say, are one of the few immediate prospects for confronting the growing power of the mullahs and the Taliban they support.

Perhaps the greatest question for youth to ponder is how modern they want to be.

Akmal Sayal, the 16-year-old son of a tribal elder from Mohmand Agency, intends someday to lead his tribe of 200,000, but for now he's concentrating on learning computer science. "I hope to go back to the tribal area and teach computers," he says. "The solution must be education."

But he is careful to underscore the delicate business of embracing modernity. "I've got my [studies], but I don't want that this cap can't be used," he says, pointing to the traditional skullcap worn by Muslims.

Weapons Permit In Military-Spending Boom, Expensive Pet Projects Prevail (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Last year, in an effort to save money, the Navy secretary proposed building a new $3 billion destroyer in just one shipyard rather than at facilities in both Mississippi and Maine. He estimated the move could cut $300 million from the cost of each ship.

Congressional reaction was swift. Senators from the two states stalled the official's promotion to deputy defense secretary. One Maine senator used her seat on the Armed Services Committee to help push through legislation that blocked the idea.

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks changed American military priorities, the U.S. defense machine is still churning out weapons made for old-style, conventional conflicts, even as it needs new tools to battle terrorists and insurgents. One big reason is the sclerotic nature of the procurement process, in which the military, the White House, the defense industry and Congress fight for pet projects that aren't always in synch with strategic priorities. In the case of the destroyers, the senators maintained a weapon whose origins dated to the last decade for the sake of jobs.

Overall, the Pentagon's recent spending has largely reinforced the status quo. Weapons spending has swelled faster than the overall Pentagon budget, soaring 43% since in the past five years to $147 billion, with the vast majority of funding going to programs conceived before 9/11. The estimated lifetime cost of the Pentagon's five biggest weapons systems is $550 billion, 89% more than the top-five programs were projected to cost in 2001.

That has been a blessing for Lockheed Martin Corp. and its fighter planes; Northrop Grumman Corp. and General Dynamics Corp., which make big warships; and Boeing Co., the lead contractor for a missile-defense shield that dates back to Ronald Reagan. Major defense stocks hit historic highs this year and the industry has outperformed the market since 2001.

But it has done little to change the military. The spike in Pentagon spending doesn't reflect a move to develop "a whole bunch of new systems because the world is changing," says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington, D.C. Instead, the military is "buying pretty much the same things as before... They just cost more."

Military budgets have long been shaped by pork and pet projects. The Clinton administration faced similar issues as it tried to adapt a Cold War military to a new era. The problem is particularly acute right now because of the huge increase in defense spending and the Pentagon's new strategic shift to fight terrorism.

The defense industry was on pins and needles when George W. Bush became president. Declining spending in the 1990s had hurt its profits, and the incoming administration seemed intent on cutting big weapons programs geared toward Cold War threats. In particular, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld vowed to transform the military into a smaller, nimbler force.

Since then, Mr. Rumsfeld has managed to scrap just three big military weapons programs out of dozens. Even as Pentagon strategists make a case for training soldiers to fight counterinsurgencies and terrorism, an expensive proposition, funding priorities haven't shifted substantially. Thanks to the entrenched nature of the military procurement process, big weapons systems survive despite skepticism of their relevance and cost.

At the pinnacle of the system is the White House, which has long been able to advance favored projects, such as the missile-defense shield. The decades-old concept involves an array of weapons designed to destroy incoming enemy warheads. In his first federal budget, Mr. Bush accelerated the shield project, which is seen these days as a deterrent to countries such as North Korea, proposing to nearly double annual spending to some $8.3 billion.

Days before the Sept. 11 attacks, senators challenged the increase at a hearing dominated by concern over government finances. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California asked Mr. Rumsfeld why missile defense should be a higher priority than guarding against terrorist attacks. He agreed they were "the more likely threats in the period ahead," but said such dangers ranged from terrorism to missiles fired by rogue states. The Senate slashed the funding increase.

The attacks of 9/11, rather than reinforcing a shift in priorities, obliterated opposition to the president. Congress ended up approving $7.8 billion for missile defense, almost as much as Mr. Bush sought. The next year, as war against Iraq loomed, Congress gave Mr. Bush more missile-defense money than he had requested.

"Missile defense has maintained momentum because of the president's political commitment to it and conservative ideological support, rather than its relevance to our current defense needs," says Loren Thompson, a critic of the current defense secretary, who runs the Lexington Institute think tank in Arlington, Va., and consults for defense companies.

With funding between $7.4 billion and $9 billion a year since fiscal 2002, missile defense has been a boon to industry. Boeing oversees the main ground-based missile system in Alaska and California and the development of a laser gun to be carried aboard a modified 747 airliner. Lockheed, Northrop and Raytheon are prime contractors for other related programs.

Despite Mr. Bush's goal of making the system operational by 2004, the shield still isn't permanently up and running. And despite consuming a hefty chunk of the Pentagon's total R&D budget, it isn't equipped, however, to deal with a rising post-9/11 concern: cruise missiles.

Since last September, the program has notched some successful flight tests, the Pentagon says. Congress is poised to give Mr. Bush most, if not all, of his latest budget request: $9.3 billion for fiscal 2007.

The military's muscle in protecting programs has also been evident in recent years. All the services want to replenish aged or depleted arsenals, a need that even the Pentagon's civilian leadership concedes. "Clearly there is a recapitalization problem," says Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's top acquisition official. "If I look at what keeps me awake at night, obviously [it is] the average age of the fleet."

That argument has helped the Air Force, the biggest recipient of procurement dollars, maneuver aggressively to protect some of its glamorous fighter jets against attacks on their relevance. In 2001, the average age of the F-15, the nation's top air-superiority warplane, was 17 years, three shy of its expected service life.

The Air Force's priority is now the F-22, made by Lockheed, which was designed to replace the F-15 as the service's top combat plane. The service said it needed 381 of the super-fast, radar-evading fighters, despite their high costs and development snags, to deal with the growing military sophistication of countries such as China and India. Critics questioned their usefulness, arguing that even these incipient world powers don't pose a credible threat to U.S. air power. In 1999, the Air Force beat back California Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis's attempt to kill the program by organizing support from all three service branches.

Under Scrutiny

In Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon, fighter jets came under scrutiny as the military lobbied for spending on more immediate priorities, such as ground vehicles and helicopters in Iraq and Afghanistan. Army generals who craved a bigger share of the weapons pie, also questioned the value of short-range fighters, even in a potential conventional conflict with China.

"I'm not really sure how the F-22 fits into either scenario," adds Ivan Eland, a military analyst at the Independent Institute, a research group based in Oakland, Calif.

In response, the Air Force joined forces with Lockheed to make the F-22s more versatile, which also made it more costly. It explored a bomber version and added ground-scanning radar to give the plane a reconnaissance role. By making them adaptable, "we can multiply their value," says Robert Stevens, Lockheed's chairman and chief executive, in an interview last year.

The Air Force even began horse-trading with its own programs to save the F-22, which currently cost $133 million apiece, excluding development costs. For example, Air Force officers offered to forgo hundreds of Joint Strike Fighters -- a $276 billion program to replace Air Force, Navy and Marine plane models with a common airframe.

Although it appeared to lose the fight when the Pentagon, in late 2004, slashed the proposed F-22 fleet to 179 planes, and ordered production to end in 2008, the Air Force didn't surrender. It argued that closing the F-22 line before starting full production of the Joint Strike Fighter would harm national security. Now, the Pentagon's plan is to buy 183 F-22s and extend production to 2010. Those extra two years leave the F-22's fate to the next administration.

As a result of this increased spending, defense contractors are booming. Sales at the top five contractors -- Lockheed, Boeing, Northrop, General Dynamics and Raytheon Co. -- have grown 10% a year since 2001, excluding acquisitions, according to Joseph Nadol, an industry analyst at J.P. Morgan. Last year, the big five's operating profits rose 25% compared with 2004, to $12.94 billion. The companies generated so much cash they spent $4.26 billion buying back their appreciating stock.

Battle Over Planes

Their clout in the procurement process can be seen through a battle over cargo planes that the Pentagon wants to stop building. The fight shows the defense companies at their most muscular: spending heavily on lobbyists and sprinkling political donations strategically across the congressional map.

In early 2005, Lockheed moved with lightning speed in to reverse a Pentagon proposal to accelerate the demise of the C-130 aircraft, which has been made in Marietta, Ga., since 1954. As word of the move leaked, Lockheed officials coordinated with Georgia's two Republican senators, who enlisted 22 colleagues from both parties to sign a letter of complaint to President Bush. Lockheed spokesmen steered reporters to Sen. Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, a blunt-talking member of the Armed Services Committee who was publicly leading efforts to save the program.

Days after the Pentagon announced the move, Mr. Rumsfeld began backtracking. His stated reason: "new information" that the cost of terminating the contract could exceed the related savings. Three months later, he reinstated the C-130 program. In a written statement, Lockheed pronounced itself "pleased" with the result.

Boeing is in the midst of a similar scramble to stretch the life of its C-17, a mammoth jet that has proven valuable in hauling everything from armored vehicles to relief supplies. Faced with budget pressures, the Pentagon recently moved to begin shutting down the C-17 production line in Long Beach, Calif.

Boeing flooded Capitol Hill with lobbyists and subcontractors. In May, Congress authorized fresh C-17 purchases and the Air Force said it needed eight additional planes. Boeing is shooting for even more.

"We're working that very, very hard," Boeing defense chief Jim Albaugh said at a recent investor conference, referring to extending the programs like the C-17.

On Capitol Hill, new strategic imperatives are often trumped by the realities of daily politics. Congress rarely makes tough weapons choices when jobs are at stake, as the battle over the DDG-1000, a next-generation Navy destroyer, attests.

Formerly known as the DD(X), the destroyer was conceived in the 1990s as a relatively inexpensive, largely automated warship, costing $750 million. The price has since ballooned to $3 billion a ship, three times the cost of current destroyers. In a move to make the destroyer more relevant to post-9/11 threats, the Navy stuffed it with additional features such as more-powerful guns, quieter technology; and advanced radar. The warship is so expensive it threatens the Navy's plan to upgrade its fleet.

"Usually when you are building a new ship class, you put two or three new technologies into the ship class, and we have put nine or 10" in the DDG-1000, says Rear Adm. Barry McCullough, the Navy's director of surface warfare.

DOJ_NMG_0034942

When then-Navy Secretary Gordon England made his move to trim costs by building the ship in just one shipyard -- either Northrop's facility in Mississippi or the General Dynamics yard in Maine -- he ran into the buzz saw set up by senators from the two states, including Trent Lott, the powerful Mississippi senator.

After preserving the two-shipyard approach, Maine's Sen. Olympia Snowe toured her state's Bath Iron Works with Mr. England's successor as Navy secretary and declared, "We're all in synch."

Not quite. Due to cost increases, the Navy now foresees building just seven DDG-1000s, compared with the original plan for 32. The House, concerned about cost and the destroyer's complex technology, wants to build just two of the ships.

The House recently approved $2.6 billion in fiscal 2007 to begin building the first one -- in Mississippi. Maine's other senator, Susan Collins, said the House bill would "be devastating to the skilled work force" at Bath Iron Works. Next, the Senate authorized $3.4 billion to build the first two destroyers -- including one in Maine. Lawmakers will have to negotiate to resolve the clash.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senators Grill Fannie Mae Chief (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath And Annys Shin

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd came under fire yesterday from members of a Senate committee who questioned how he could have been unaware of the company's alleged accounting fraud.

Mudd was chief operating officer during the years in which regulators have concluded that the housing finance company manipulated its accounting to maximize executive bonuses.

"I'm astounded you would even stay with this institution," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Mudd at a hearing of the Senate Banking Committee. "Have you thought about resigning?"

Mudd, who was promoted after the accounting scandal cost Franklin D. Raines the combined job of chairman and chief executive, said he did not like "the old Fannie Mae" any more than Hagel did and was "as shocked as anyone" when Fannie's accounting problems came to light.

Mudd said he thought about leaving but is "not a quitter" and stayed to fix Fannie's problems.

Hagel countered that Mudd's $8 million compensation package last year might have had something to do with the decision.

Yesterday's hearing was held to review a report by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which detailed widespread accounting violations and described an executive culture fixated on hitting bonus targets.

OFHEO Director James B. Lockhart III, who also was confirmed in his job by the Senate yesterday, said during a break in the hearing that as far as his agency was concerned, whether Mudd should keep his job remained an open question.

In a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission and OFHEO, Fannie recently agreed to pay penalties of $400 million. The SEC and the Justice Department still are investigating the conduct of individual executives.

Raines and outgoing audit committee Chairman Thomas P. Gerrity declined invitations to testify yesterday.

Board Chairman Stephen B. Ashley, a director of the company since 1995, also faced sharp questioning.

"I think you failed, the entire board failed. . . . Now, can you sit there and tell this committee that you knew nothing about what was going on?" Hagel asked.

Ashley replied that he felt "deep disappointment and anger" that the trust the board placed in Fannie Mae's management was "not just broken but shattered."

Some committee members said the regulators' findings showed why the full Senate should take up long-stalled legislation to strengthen oversight of Fannie and its competitor Freddie Mac, which were chartered by the government to provide a steady flow of funds for home mortgages. But other committee members said the Senate should avoid overreacting and possibly harming the companies.

In prepared testimony yesterday, Mudd said the days "of arrogant, defiant, 'my way' Fannie Mae had to end." He said the company supported creation of a strong new regulator and would work with lawmakers.

Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.), chairman of the Banking Committee, said he saw no sign of that.

"When are you going to start?" Shelby asked. "We haven't seen any evidence of any changes in tone that you talked about."

Legislation to strengthen oversight of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac has been stalled on Capitol Hill since last summer. Lawmakers are at loggerheads over a provision that would empower regulators to reduce the companies' investment holdings.

DOJ_NMG_0034943

Those mortgage-related investments have grown enormously over the past decade, becoming a major source of profit while making the companies more vulnerable to interest-rate fluctuations.

Executives for Fannie and Freddie have defended the investment portfolios, calling them essential to fulfilling the companies' mission to keep money flowing into the housing market.

The new OFHEO director yesterday provided fodder for the companies' critics, agreeing that the investments do not affect mortgage interest rates or the availability of conventional mortgages.

Republicans Push Fannie To Accept Operating Limits (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Senate Republicans prodded Fannie Mae executives to support legislative provisions that might force the company to shed most of its holdings of mortgages and related securities. Those holdings, about $730 billion, are the company's main source of profit.

Pressuring the company to back legislation sought by the White House, the Republicans used a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday to berate Fannie executives and directors for greed and failure to blow the whistle years ago on wrongdoing that resulted in last month's $400 million settlement of accounting-fraud charges.

But Democrats on the committee cautioned against crippling Fannie and its rival, Freddie Mac, with restraints that might reduce their support for affordable housing.

Fannie and Freddie are shareholder-owned companies chartered by Congress to provide funding for home mortgages. In the wake of accounting scandals at both companies, Congress is debating legislation to tighten regulation of them. The biggest issue is whether to go along with White House-backed provisions that would essentially remove Fannie and Freddie from the lucrative business of investing in mortgage securities. That would force them to focus almost entirely on their smaller business of providing guarantees on such securities held by others.

The Bush administration says the companies' mortgage portfolios are so large that stumbles by either Fannie or Freddie could set off a financial crisis. But Democrats and many Republicans in Congress support the position of Fannie and Freddie that the mortgage holdings make more money available for mortgages.

"We should never advocate destroying critical U.S. enterprises because of management failures," Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) said at the hearing.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), grilled Fannie's chief executive officer, Daniel Mudd, who testified at the hearing about the company's efforts to clean up its books and culture. Sen. Shelby noted that Mr. Mudd had promised to help Congress craft legislation. "When are you going to start," Sen. Shelby said, "because I've seen no evidence of that."

Republicans have long accused Fannie and Freddie of lobbying heavily to block legislation they dislike. Mr. Mudd promised to address any lapses in the company's dealings with Congress.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) asked how Mr. Mudd, who was Fannie's chief operating officer during the first half of this decade, could have been unaware of pervasive accounting violations. Mr. Mudd said he was aware of problems with the company's culture, but wasn't responsible for accounting at that time and didn't know rules were being broken.

Sen. Hagel said in an interview after the hearing that Mr. Mudd "should seriously consider resigning," and added: "I'm not sure the whole board shouldn't go." During the hearing, Mr. Mudd said he had thought about resigning but decided to stay and fix the company's problems. "I'm not a quitter," he said.

Both Sen. Shelby and Sen. Hagel said after the hearing that current and former executives such as Mr. Mudd, who received bonuses inflated by earnings manipulation, should return them. "That's the decent thing to do," Sen. Hagel said. Fannie has said its board is determining what to do about those bonuses.

After The Enron Trial, Defense Firm Is Stuck With The Tab (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

To the list of employees, investors and businesses who suffered financial misfortune in Enron Corp.'s demise, add this one: the law firm defending former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Los Angeles-based O'Melveny & Myers LLP, which has represented Skilling on both civil and criminal charges since 2001, collected what in a typical case would be a fat payday: $23 million from its client and $17 million more from his insurance policies.

DOJ_NMG_0034944

But, true to form, Enron is still destroying financial expectations. Even before the trial began in January, Skilling's team of more than 20 lawyers, paralegals and support staff burned through those funds, leaving the law firm holding the bag for "multiple tens of millions" of dollars in unpaid fees and expenses racked up during the four-month trial, Skilling's lead defense lawyer said. While Daniel M. Petrocelli declined to provide an exact tally, one source put the price tag at more than $25 million on top of the $40 million O'Melveny already collected.

The trial, which culminated in the convictions of Skilling and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay last month, featured 56 witnesses and some of the most sophisticated business deals ever to make their way into a courtroom. The Skilling defense, which experts say may be one of the most expensive in history, is a case study in how high the stakes can rise in white-collar criminal representation.

"This is almost a carte blanche to the lawyers: Do everything you can to keep me out of jail," said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control Inc., a New Jersey firm that monitors legal fees in bankruptcies and for Fortune 500 clients. "Very little thought is given to cost. It is not a concern."

In the beginning, O'Melveny did not have to worry about how its high-profile client would pay his bills. Skilling exited the Houston energy trader in August 2001, with enough time to sell more than half of his remaining Enron stock before the company hit bottom and filed for bankruptcy protection that December. But, on the heels of his 2004 indictment, prosecutors put a hold on nearly $60 million in cash, brokerage accounts and other assets, including a $5 million Mediterranean-style Houston mansion and a $350,000 condominium in Dallas that Skilling bought to use when he visited his daughter, then a student at Southern Methodist University. Meanwhile, a settlement by board members depleted the company's insurance policies, closing off that avenue of recovery for lawyers hired by Skilling and Lay.

Within weeks, the government is expected to start legal proceedings to transfer Skilling's assets to its coffers, from which proceeds might be distributed to shareholders and other victims of Enron's collapse -- setting up a fight over the money.

Lay and Skilling's "accumulated money was gained at our expense," said Rod Jordan, chairman of a group of former Enron employees. The assets "should first be used to return money lost by the employees and only then be used for their defense," he said.

Defense lawyers said they will urge U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III to release most of it to Skilling because jurors acquitted him on nine of 10 insider-trading charges. The defense argued in court papers filed this week that "only a very small portion" of the frozen assets is subject to forfeiture under the government's initial analysis.

"Jeff's not trying to get rich off anything," his lawyer Petrocelli said in an interview. "He's got child-support obligations, legal obligations from the sentencing and the appeal, and hundreds of civil lawsuits to defend. . . . He wants to take care of his family and his lawyers."

Justice Department prosecutors on Wednesday reiterated their desire to seek Skilling's assets and said they would file a motion for a money judgment against Skilling by the end of June. Despite his acquittal on most of the insider-trading counts, prosecutors said, the jury convicted Skilling of 19 other charges, including engaging in a conspiracy to prop up Enron's stock price and enrich himself. To win a forfeiture action, prosecutors must prove by a preponderance of evidence that assets are proceeds of the conspiracy.

The single biggest expense in any trial, according to legal experts, is personnel.

"The biggest trial team is a bit like an iceberg," said John Toothman, president of the Devil's Advocate, a Great Falls legal fee review firm. "You have some people at the table, and you have some people in the pews."

Toothman said he asks clients a central question: "Do we really need all this?"

To O'Melveny, faced with millions of documents and other evidence amassed by the government during its five-year investigation and a potential decades-long prison sentence for client Skilling should he be convicted, the answer was a resounding yes.

O'Melveny enlisted five partners, led by Petrocelli, who now bills at $850 per hour but who said that for the Skilling defense, as an "accommodation," he and others capped their rates at the 2004 level -- in his case, closer to $800 an hour. M. Randall Oppenheimer, who leads the firm's entertainment division and who has won major cases for Exxon Mobil Corp., and Mark Holscher, a onetime federal prosecutor who has a bustling white-collar defense practice with such clients as former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, also logged hundreds of hours at similar rates.

On top of that, the team included more than a dozen associates and other counsel: junior lawyers who reviewed documents, scoured databases and investigated witnesses, uncovering e-mails Petrocelli used to impeach government cooperators in aggressive cross-examination. Those younger lawyers billed $200 to $500 per hour, depending upon their level of experience. Some worked "around the clock," Petrocelli said, noting that the partners at times had to order them to sleep. For five months, several partners, none of whom came from Houston, stayed at the Four Seasons Hotel, where they got a special rate on accommodations. Many junior lawyers resided at the Post Rice Lofts, a historic downtown apartment building close to the courthouse and their makeshift trial offices.

To sift through documents from Enron's Internet and retail energy units, the firm hired an outside supplier and purchased 20 computer servers. The firm also employed graphics and projection specialists, as well as a jury consultant and a team of expert witnesses to handle insider-trading and stock-market issues, and accounting and other matters.

Former Securities and Exchange Commission accountant Walter K. Rush testified that he spent 954 hours on the case as an expert witness, at a rate of $600 per hour. University of Chicago law professor Daniel R. Fischel, a specialist in corporations and stock markets, charges $1,000 per hour. The defense decided not to call him to the witness stand as the case dragged on, but he was paid for the hours he logged learning the case, Petrocelli said.

A.B. Culvahouse Jr., a former counsel to President Ronald Reagan and chairman of O'Melveny, said the Skilling case was "an investment we made and were prepared to make."

"There wasn't a lot of second-guessing" among the firm's policy committee, of which Petrocelli is a member, Culvahouse said. "We felt an obligation to our client. . . . .It was the right thing to do for our client and the smart thing to do for our firm."

Culvahouse said any negative financial impact has been spread across the firm, which he said reported profit per partner of $1.65 million last year, $340,000 more than a year before. He said lawyers in other parts of the firm, made up of more than 1,000 lawyers and 240 partners, did not rise up in anger over the mounting costs of the Enron trial, though there were some piercing questions. Most painful was probably the missed opportunities to make money on other clients while some of the firm's best trial lawyers were tied up for months on Enron.

It is not unusual for law firms to discount fees from well-known clients, experts said.

Many law firms build uncollectible debts into their financial projections. Ward Bower, a principal at the Newtown Square, Pa., consulting firm Altman Weil Inc., said law firms typically shave their bills by 10 percent before they send them to clients. Most firms recognize that they will not collect all of their fees, and they pay taxes on the money they actually receive from clients, not on what they bill. That means unpaid legal fees are probably not tax-deductible, but expenses are, Bower said.

The difference in the Skilling case appears to be one of scale. The most recent Altman Weil survey suggests that law firms often eat about 22 percent of their costs -- far less than what O'Melveny may have to absorb.

Other law firms have made similar decisions in recent months, according to Joel F. Henning, head of the Chicago office of legal consulting firm Hildebrandt International.

The Chicago law firm Winston & Strawn LLP recently comped former Illinois governor George H. Ryan for his defense on corruption charges, estimated by the Chicago Sun-Times at more than $10 million. The defense effort, led by Dan K. Webb, a former U.S. attorney who has represented Philip Morris, the New York Stock Exchange and Microsoft Corp., ended in conviction on all 18 counts against Ryan after an intense six-month trial. Ryan's supporters contributed to a legal defense fund that topped $475,000, the paper said.

For O'Melveny, the work is not yet done. Several members of the trial team, with help from Washington-based former acting solicitor general and O'Melveny partner Walter Dellinger, now are gearing up for an appeal.

"We've just got to keep fighting a good fight," said Petrocelli.

Former HealthSouth Official Receives Eight-Year Sentence (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. -- The only HealthSouth Corp. executive convicted by jurors in a $2.7 billion fraud was sentenced to eight years in federal prison Thursday, the longest term given to anyone in the huge accounting scam at the rehabilitation chain.

Hannibal "Sonny" Crumpler, a former vice president and division controller, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Virginia Emerson Hopkins after the defense urged her to impose probation or a combination of house arrest and parole. Mr. Crumpler's attorneys said they may appeal.

Prosecutors sought a far tougher penalty, asking the judge to send Mr. Crumpler to prison for 15 years on his conviction on charges of conspiracy and making false statements to auditors. They described the sentence as too lenient.

Fifteen former HealthSouth executives avoided trial by pleading guilty in plea deals, and fired Chief Executive Richard Scrushy was acquitted on all charges a year ago after a six-month trial. Mr. Crumpler also opted for a trial but was convicted in November.

Prosecutors argued that Mr. Crumpler was in on the fraud while at HealthSouth and maintained a role even after he became finance chief at a related company, Source Medical Solutions. While at Source Medical, Mr. Crumpler sent HealthSouth auditors a letter overstating Source Medical's debt to HealthSouth by $20 million, prosecutors said.

During a sentencing hearing, defense lawyer Jim Henry argued that Mr. Crumpler had a limited role in the fraud and wasn't responsible for anything close to the $7 billion loss the government claimed stockholders and bondholders suffered when the scam was exposed. Mr. Crumpler couldn't foresee that the fraud would push HealthSouth to the edge of bankruptcy, Mr. Henry said.

But Judge Hopkins challenged Mr. Henry's arguments, citing testimony from former finance chief Weston Smith that Mr. Crumpler attended meetings where the fraud was planned and carried out. "Why should I accept your argument?" she asked Mr. Henry.

The stiffest sentence yet for the HealthSouth fraud was the five-year prison term for former finance chief Bill Owens, who pleaded guilty to a leading role in the scheme and spent days testifying against Mr. Scrushy. Others who pleaded guilty have received shorter prison terms or a combination of house arrest, probation, fines and financial forfeitures.

Separately, a federal jury began deliberations in the government corruption trial of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, accused of bribery in a wide-ranging case that alleges illegal donations from Mr. Scrushy.

"Here's what you ought to remember about this case. It's that if you don't donate, you don't participate," chief prosecutor Louis Franklin said in closing arguments yesterday. "You've got to be Richard Scrushy to get to see the governor."

But defense attorneys said the government's case was based on testimony from witnesses who shouldn't be trusted by jurors.

Fred D. Gray, a lawyer for Mr. Scrushy, also quoted Martin Luther King Jr. and the Bible, asking jurors to "render a verdict you will be able to live with -- not guilty on all charges. When you do that, justice will run down like water and righteousness."

Mr. Scrushy is accused of arranging for $500,000 in donations to be made -- and not publicly reported as required -- to Mr. Siegelman's campaign for a state lottery, with Mr. Siegelman promising Mr. Scrushy a seat on a state hospital regulatory board.

Medarex Receives Subpoena Over Stock Options Grants; Shareholders File Suit

PRINCETON, N.J. (AP) -- Biotech company Medarex Inc. said Thursday it recently received a a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey over the timing of its stock options grants.

The company has already received a letter of informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission over the matter. Medarex said it is cooperating fully with both investigations.

In addition, Medarex said two shareholder derivative lawsuits have been filed in New Jersey, naming the company and certain current and former directors and officers as defendants. Medarex said the lawsuits allege breach of fiduciary duty associated with its stock options grants practices, as well as federal securities laws violations. The lawsuits seek unspecified damages.

More than 40 companies are under SEC or Justice Department investigations looking into whether executives backdated stock options grants. This increases the value of the stock options by timing them at low points, boosting the payout.

Shares slipped 21 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $9.60 in after-hours trading, having earlier closed up 52 cents, or 5.6 percent, at $9.81 on the Nasdaq. The stock has ranged between $7.14 and $16.07 over the past year.

EMI Settles Pay-for-play Probe For $3.75 Million (AP)

By Michael Gormley, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, New York-EMI Music North America, the third largest recording label in the world, has settled for $3.75 million (â‚¬2.97 million) a pay-for-play investigation into radio air time sold or traded to benefit artists including the Rolling Stones, Coldplay and Norah Jones.

The settlement was the latest during more than two years of a "payola" investigation by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"When a record label engages in an elaborate scheme to purchase air time for its artists, it violates state and federal law and presents consumers with a skewed picture of the country's proclaimed `best' and `most popular' music," Spitzer said.

He said payola - a term coined during a 1950s scandal combining the words pay and Victrola, an early record player - also hurts struggling artists who are not judged on the merits of their music.

Spitzer said the compensation for radio airplay was paid by EMI, which includes Virgin Records America, Capitol Records, EMI Christian Music Group and S Curve Records. One deal included tickets to a Rolling Stones concert in Toronto that were given to a radio program director for his personal use.

DOJ_NMG_0034947

The radio executive in Watertown, New York, was willing to offer "what it takes for us to get them," according to Spitzer's investigation. In exchange for the tickets, Virgin Records received airplay for the Rolling Stones and The Exies.

EMI is agreeing to reform its practices and to pay the settlement money to nonprofit music education groups in New York, to be distributed through the Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors.

"EMI is pleased to have resolved these radio promotion matters with the New York State Attorney General with this agreement," the company said in a statement. "In addition to voluntarily adopting strict policies last year, we have been working cooperatively with the attorney general to reinforce these policies."

In May, Universal Music Group Recordings Inc., the world's largest record company, agreed to pay $12 million (â‚¬9.52 million) to settle a payola case that claimed the company provided vacations, electronics and other bribes to increase radio play for their artists. Those bribes and gifts were used to gain airplay for songs by Nick Lachey, Ashlee Simpson, Brian McKnight, Big Tymers, and Lindsay Lohan, Spitzer said.

Spitzer launched a U.S.-wide investigation into alleged wrongdoing by music and radio companies in 2004 . Earlier this year, Spitzer sued Entercom Communications Corp., accusing its executives of running scams to trade cash for airplay.

Entercom has denied the allegations.

Sony's music arm has agreed to pay $10 million (â‚¬7.93 million) to settle with Spitzer, and Warner Music agreed to a $5 million (â‚¬3.97 million) settlement.

Sarbanes-Oxley Gives Accountants Fees Bonanza (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Accountancy firms have emerged as surprise long-lasting beneficiaries of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, as US-listed companies have been forced to pay their auditors larger fees to comply with the tough corporate governance rules, according to a new study.

The findings, in a report by law firm Foley & Lardner, confound predictions that US companies would only face a one-off increase in audit fees and other costs as a result of the legislation, introduced after the Enron and WorldCom scandals.

They also dispel accountancy firms' fears that Sarbanes-Oxley's strict requirement for auditor independence, which contributed to the demise of Andersen, would hurt their business by depriving them of fees for non-audit work.

US-listed companies paid auditors $4.9m (€3.9m) on average in 2005, 3 per cent more than in 2004 and 11 per cent more than in 2001, the year before the passage of the Act, according to the study which analysed public findings from more than 850 US-listed companies.

The rise in total fees came despite a dramatic fall in non-audit fees as companies hired third-party consultants to avoid conflicts of interest.

Non-audit fees paid by US companies fell 42 per cent in 2005, contributing to a 97 per cent collapse in these type of payments to accountancy firms since 2001.

"This decline in other fees has been more than made up by a rise in audit fees," said Thomas Hartman at Foley & Lardner. "Companies are paying the same amount, or more, to their auditors as they were before Sarbanes-Oxley."

The rise in auditors fees will fuel the concerns of European companies about a backdoor implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley if the New York Stock Exchange takes over Euronext.

Among US groups, small companies were the hardest hit, with total fees paid to auditors nearly doubling between 2001 and 2005, to an average of $1.4m.

Last year, fees paid by small companies, which often say they lack staff and resources to meet Sarbanes-Oxley's requirements, rose 16 per cent, mainly due to a 22 per cent rise in audit fees.

By comparison the biggest 500 companies in the US witnessed a modest 1 per cent rise in total fees to an average of $9.6m.

The finding will reinforce criticism of a recent decision by the Securities and Exchange Commission not to exempt companies with a market value of less than $128m from some onerous Sarbanes-Oxley demands.

Milberg Mores (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

We don't often find ourselves on the same side of the political fence as House Democrat Charlie Rangel, so imagine our thrill to hear that the New Yorker and several of his liberal colleagues had recently discovered the perils of an overzealous Justice Department. Corporate America couldn't ask for a more eloquent spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0034948

Mr. Rangel was in full voice this week -- along with fellow New York Democrats Carolyn McCarthy and Gary Ackerman, as well as Florida's Robert Wexler -- about the injustice federal prosecutors had visited on plaintiffs' firm Milberg Weiss. The four released a statement lambasting Justice for going after the "entire" firm rather than just the partners accused of wrongdoing, claiming this could rob "average" citizens of Milberg's services. As Mr. Ackerman said: "I thought it was a bum deal to indict the entire firm. If you think someone did something wrong, go get him."

We couldn't have said it better, though we've been saying exactly that for years -- ever since the Justice Department in 2003 issued new guidelines, via the "Thompson memo," on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations. Federal prosecutors have since threatened to destroy any company that doesn't "cooperate" by waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off accused employees from legal support. Milberg Weiss stood by its due-process rights, and duly received a potential corporate death sentence.

Til now, Democrats have been largely mum on this prosecutorial fervor, choosing to use the indictments as opportunities to blame Republicans for corporate scandals. It isn't as if these four congressional Milberg defenders were popping blood vessels when Justice slapped Arthur Andersen with an indictment or forced a deferred prosecution agreement on KPMG -- actions that lost thousands of "average" accounting employees their jobs. Better late than never. With any luck, Mr. Rangel might take time out from his next trial-lawyer fund-raiser to read the Thompson memo in its entirety.

Still, the Milberg indictment has had one benefit; it has directed a bright, overdue light on the great tort-lawyer money-laundering machine. It's no secret that the tort bar has long been the Democratic Party's financial engine; the news is how many cylinders were being fired by Milberg Weiss alone. According to the watchdog Center for Responsive Politics, the firm and individuals there made nearly $2.8 million in donations to Democrats since 1999. (Republicans: $23,000.)

Democrats are now rushing to return the tainted money; at this pace Milberg won't have much trouble footing its legal bills. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer was one of the first off the payback block, with his office saying it would return nearly $125,000 in contributions. Wisconsin Governor Jim Doyle is bouncing back $10,000 after the state GOP threatened to make it an issue in Mr. Doyle's re-election race.

The Democratic National Party is having a bit more difficulty outing the damned spot, given that of the $1.28 million it raked in from the firm and its partners, $500,000 went to the DNC's new headquarters. Its solution: Return the grand sum of $5,000, or that which had been given by two individual Milberg lawyers indicted last month. Apparently it has also adopted a principled position against corporate indictments. No action so far from 2008 presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, who saw some $24,000 in Milberg-related donations flow to herself and to her political action committee. Then again, Ms. Clinton understands how complicated law-firm finances can get.

The Democrats returning money are doing so in the hope of avoiding reminders that only a few months ago they were accusing Republicans of a "culture of corruption." If anything the Abramoff scandal seems minor in comparison, isolated to a few instances of influence peddling. The plaintiffs' bar, by contrast, has been paying off Democrats for decades to protect its judicial abuses. This has proved a virtuous circle: Well-funded Democrats refuse to pass tort reform, allowing tort lawyers to cash in on more cases and then make greater contributions to Democrats.

Milberg Weiss is a perfect example, having built up its destructive business of shareholder "strike suits" on the assurances that Democrats would stifle real reform. The good news is that federal prosecutors are starting to plumb the depths of this Democratic donor base. Democrats may be right to question Justice's decision to indict the Milberg firm, but Americans are right to demand a full airing of that entity's behavior, and to know who was benefiting.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Dems Strip Jefferson Of Panel Seat (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Add political banishment to the list of problems confronting Rep. William Jefferson, ensnared in a bribery scandal that fellow Democrats hope to turn to their election-year advantage.

"Democrats are determined to hold a high ethical standard," the party's leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, said Thursday night after engineering a 99-58 vote of the rank and file that stripped Jefferson of his seat on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

"This isn't about proof in the court of law. This is about an ethical standard," Pelosi said. "I wish that the White House would do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0034949

Democrats long have accused Republicans of nourishing a "culture of corruption" in Congress, and signaled their desire to make ethics a key issue in their drive to win control of the House in the November elections.

The vote came despite a final plea from Jefferson and persistent complaints from members of the Congressional Black Caucus, which said the Louisianan was being sanctioned without a rule or a precedent to justify it.

For his part, Jefferson conceded to reporters he faced "serious allegations" in connection with an investigation that has netted two convictions. The congressman maintains his innocence and has not been indicted, although the FBI says it found $90,000 in bribe money several months ago stashed in a food freezer in his home.

With the action of the Democratic caucus subject to ratification by the full House, Jefferson publicly left open for the first time that he might be willing to give up his committee seat voluntarily.

"I don't want to speculate," he said.

Within an hour of the vote, Jefferson disclosed he had offered on Wednesday to step aside on two conditions. They were that the caucus establish a rule covering cases like his and that his seat on Ways and Means go temporarily to a fellow Louisiana Democrat, Rep. Charles Melancon.

Pelosi, who controlled the votes to prevail in a showdown, declined the offer.

"So it was her decision to expose the rift in this caucus and to move forward with this unjust action," Jefferson said in a statement.

The vote in a closed-door meeting of Democrats marked the culmination of Pelosi's effort to stake out the high election-year ground on ethics.

The issue was a difficult one for many Democrats, and some members of the black caucus have privately appealed to Jefferson in recent weeks to step aside voluntarily.

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a member of the Democratic leadership as well as the black caucus, said the rank and file had confronted "two competing interests - the legal interest and the political interest."

While the vote was not close, it also underscored the concern among Democrats that Jefferson was being sanctioned arbitrarily.

The chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. Melvin Watt of North Carolina, said after the vote that by taking the action they did, fellow Democrats chose "political expediency" or some other unacceptable factor over precedent. "Even at the end of the meeting, we don't know what the standard has been," he said.

Watt said that constituents of some lawmakers will adopt the view that race was a factor in the decision. "I think there are people who will say that's the basis," he said. Blacks are among the Democrats' most loyal voters.

Democrats earlier in the evening rejected a call to sidetrack the proceedings until a rule had been adopted to cover situations like Jefferson's. Rep. Steven Rothman, D-N.J., said he sought the step because without rules, the action was "extraordinarily arbitrary."

Fellow Dems Vote To Take Jefferson Off Panel (USAT)

USA Today, June 16, 2006

House Democrats voted 99-58 Thursday night to strip Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana of his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee while a federal bribery investigation runs its course. For weeks, the Louisiana Democrat has rebuffed requests from party leaders that he step aside on his own.

The FBI says that it videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in bribe money and that agents found $90,000 of it in a freezer at his home. Jefferson maintains his innocence. He has not been indicted.

Within an hour of the vote, Jefferson disclosed he had offered on Wednesday to step aside on the condition that the caucus establish a rule covering cases like his and that his seat go temporarily to Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La. “Ms. Pelosi politely declined my offer,” he said in a written statement, referring to Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader. Pelosi's office confirmed the exchange.

As the only survivor of the Sago Mine disaster looked on, President Bush signed into law Thursday the first major overhaul of mine-safety laws in three decades. “Only one man came out, and he's with us today,” Bush said of Randy McCloy, who is recovering from carbon monoxide poisoning from the accident in January that killed a dozen miners in West Virginia.

Congress passed the bill following accidents that have left 33 miners dead since Jan. 1, up from 22 in 2005. The new law requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen rather than one. Also, mine operators must store additional oxygen underground and put new communications equipment and devices to track lost miners in mines within three years.

President Bush created the world's largest marine sanctuary by extending stronger federal protections to the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and nearby waters. The area covers a Pacific archipelago 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide. Endangered monk seals and nesting green sea turtles are among the more than 7,000 species that inhabit the area. At least one-fourth of the species are found nowhere else.

"This national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined." Federal and state agencies will oversee the 140,000 square miles of mostly uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reefs and underwater peaks.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved a proposed constitutional amendment that would allow Congress to make desecrating the American flag a crime. The vote was 11-7. Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., plans a floor vote this month.

Jefferson Voted Off House Panel (BRADV)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — In an unprecedented move, House Democrats voted 99-58 Thursday to forcibly suspend one of their own, U.S. Rep. William Jefferson of New Orleans, from his seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

The action followed an almost month-long campaign by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who had asked Jefferson — who is under investigation for bribery — to voluntarily step down.

Jefferson refused, arguing he has not been charged with a crime and denying any wrongdoing.

Pelosi had called on Jefferson to observe the "high ethical standard of the House Democratic caucus." But after the vote, which concluded a three-hour party meeting, Pelosi did not gloat.

"It's not about victory," Pelosi said. "It's very sad. Our Democratic caucus said it would hold a high ethical standard, and now we're doing it."

Unless Jefferson steps down, the matter will go to the House floor for a resolution vote by the full chamber. That vote could come as soon as today.

Jefferson, a 16-year congressman, entered the caucus meeting shortly after 5 p.m. and met with reporters, saying he made a 10-minute pitch to his fellow Democrats.

"I simply asked the members of the caucus to put themselves in my shoes," Jefferson said.

Jefferson argued that he shouldn't be demoted because he hasn't been charged. Caucus rules contain four provisions to remove members, but only after they are indicted, he said.

Rep. Steven Rothman of New Jersey tried to table the motion to suspend Jefferson, at least until a rule can be established.

Louisiana's only other House Democrat, Rep. Charles "Charlie" Melancon of Napoleonville, spoke on behalf of Rothman's amendment, said Rep. Albert Wynn of Maryland.

"In the absence of any rule, this was extremely arbitrary and invited substantial abuse," Rothman said of the motion to suspend Jefferson.

The Rothman motion failed 91-61. Melancon declined to comment after the meeting.

Pelosi has said that she would not appoint a person to replace Jefferson on the committee and that he could return with full seniority when his legal troubles are resolved.

Pelosi, who hopes to be House speaker if the Democrats win control of the chamber in November, experienced a political pushback from an organization considered to be a pillar of the Democratic party, the Congressional Black Caucus.

With 42 members, the group accounts for one in five of the 201 party votes in the House. Caucus members have supported Jefferson, writing a letter to Pelosi on his behalf.

Black Caucus members leaving the meeting Thursday called the vote a matter of fairness.

"It's not fair," said Rep. Major Owens of New York. "It sets a precedent."

Most members exiting the meeting declined to talk about their vote.

"It's a secret ballot," House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who has called for Jefferson to step down, shouted to reporters.

Rep. Danny Davis of Illinois had no qualms revealing his vote.

"I personally believe a person is innocent until proven guilty," said Davis, a Black Caucus member. "There have been no charges brought and no indictment made."

Jefferson returned to the meeting to vote, but did not stay around for the tally. He joked with reporters while leaving that he could not reveal which way he voted.

Jefferson said in a statement after the vote that he offered to step down if the caucus instituted an across-the-board rule that members under investigation can be removed from an "exclusive" committee.

Jefferson also wanted Melancon to be his committee replacement until his return. Pelosi balked on the request.

DOJ_NMG_0034951

"Ms. Pelosi politely declined my offer," Jefferson said. "So it was her decision to expose the rift in this caucus and move forward with this unjust action."

Jefferson is accused of demanding hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash for himself and his family in return for brokering telecommunications deals in Africa between 2001 and 2005. Two men have pleaded guilty in the investigation.

Jefferson has not been charged with any crime and has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

Democrats Vote To Force Jefferson Aside (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — House Democrats voted on Thursday night to strip a Louisiana congressman of a key committee position as they tried to avoid any taint of scandal in a year when they want to ride accusations of Republican corruption to election victories.

The congressman, William J. Jefferson, is the subject of a federal bribery investigation and has insisted he has done nothing wrong. He has rebuffed efforts to get him to step aside voluntarily.

After a meeting stretching more than three hours, the Democrats voted to remove him from the House Ways and Means Committee until his case is resolved. The action, on a 99-to-58 vote, is subject to the approval by the full House.

Mr. Jefferson, who is accused of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes and stowing $90,000 of it in his freezer, spoke to the party caucus briefly as it convened. Caucus members, who talked to reporters outside the meeting, said Mr. Jefferson had asked them "to put themselves in my shoes."

He acknowledged that he was facing serious accusations but called the punishment "unauthorized and unnecessary."

Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus have supported Mr. Jefferson, who is black, arguing it was premature to remove him before he was found guilty of any crime.

But the minority leader, Nancy Pelosi, of California, said Mr. Jefferson had been afforded due process. "This is not a court of law," Ms. Pelosi said. "This is about a higher ethical standard, and you know it when it isn't being met."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has said in court documents that Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, took the bribes to help a small technology company win federal contracts and secure business in Nigeria.

The F.B.I. statements focused unfavorable attention on the Democrats just as they were trying to capitalize on the accusations of corruption among Republicans that led to the resignation of the former House majority leader, Tom DeLay.

Ms. Pelosi sought to draw a line between Republican scandals and what she called "individual mistakes."

"If we have any of that in our caucus, we will deal with them," she said. "That is quite different from the Republican caucus. The entire Republican caucus condoned, enabled and benefited from the culture of corruption, and that is what I will continue to rail against."

Agents raided Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office on a Saturday night last month, setting off a fight between the Justice Department and Congress, with Republican leaders joining the Democrats in arguing that the search violated convention and the Constitution.

To smooth things over, President Bush sealed the papers taken from Mr. Jefferson's office for 45 days to allow lawyers to agree on rules for searching Congressional offices.

Ms. Pelosi noted that she had supported Mr. Jefferson's efforts to get his records back, and had opposed the raid on his office.

Party Urges Jefferson To Leave Committee (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Democrats voted last night to strip Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.) of a plum committee assignment while he is embroiled in a federal bribery investigation.

The 99 to 58 vote followed weeks of public and private wrangling, as Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) sought to take a strong election-year stance on ethics, while Jefferson's allies -- mainly fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus -- protested that he was being singled out for unfair treatment.

Jefferson left immediately after voting and said he would spend the evening considering his next move.

"I'm just going to go to my office," Jefferson said. "I'm just going to wait and see."

If he refuses to step aside from the Ways and Means Committee, as urged by the Democratic Caucus, the next step would be a vote on the House floor to remove him from the prestigious committee. Even his allies want to avoid that.

DOJ_NMG_0034952

Black Caucus members said their concern was the lack of any rule pertaining to lawmakers in Jefferson's situation. He has not been indicted in the case but could face serious charges. Jefferson says he is innocent of wrongdoing.

Before the Democratic Caucus met, Jefferson offered to resign under two conditions: that a rule be written establishing that any member under investigation may be asked to step aside, regardless of whether charges are filed; and that Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.), whose district adjoins Jefferson's, be named his temporary replacement on Ways and Means.

Pelosi declined the offer.

"Our concern is that the rule is really political expediency," said Rep. Melvin Watt (N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. Rep. Danny K. Davis (Ill.) said the legal question was foremost. "I don't think this has to do with race," Davis said. "Members of the Democratic Caucus are above and beyond that."

Not all of the resolution's opponents were black caucus members. Some sought a new rule that would apply to Jefferson's situation, so members could debate language on the books. Rep. Steven R. Rothman (N.J.) moved to table the resolution to remove Jefferson until the issue had been addressed, but that failed 91 to 61.

The investigation involves Jefferson's alleged role in African business dealings. The pressure from Pelosi and others was stepped up when the FBI revealed it videotaped Jefferson accepting $100,000 in $100 bills from a government witness, explaining that he would pass it on to the vice president of Nigeria to assist in a telecommunications deal. All but $10,000 of the cash was later found in Jefferson's freezer in his Washington home.

Jefferson has refused repeated behind-the-scenes entreaties, including those by several prominent Black Caucus members, to voluntarily step aside. Venting his frustration in an op-ed column Saturday in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, he accused Pelosi of playing politics with his career and reputation.

"Her behavior is rooted in a political strategy she believes will enable the Democrats to gain the majority in the House and realize her dream of becoming Speaker of the House, which disregards the interests of the people of Louisiana, ignores firmly established House precedent, and fails to observe the rules of fairness and nondiscrimination," Jefferson wrote.

He noted that he has not been charged with a crime, and that "historically, even when a member of Congress has been so charged, he or she steps aside from a committee or subcommittee chairmanship, but not from the committee itself."

Pelosi denied that she is being unfairly harsh. "I told all my colleagues, anybody with $90,000 in their freezer, you have a problem at that point."

Jefferson and some of his Black Caucus allies have noted Pelosi's relative silence on the legal troubles facing Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.), whose commercial investments are being scrutinized by federal investigators for potential connections to his duties as a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mollohan acknowledged this week that he misstated more than a dozen transactions on his financial disclosure forms and said he had amended them "to correct any inaccurate impressions about my finances." He resigned earlier this year as the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee but retains his Appropriations Committee seat.

One of Jefferson's former business partners, Vernon L. Jackson, and a former top aide, Brett M. Pfeffer, have pleaded guilty in the investigation, confessing to conspiring to bribe Jefferson.

Democrats Vote Jefferson Off Panel (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

House Democrats voted by a nearly 2-to-1 margin yesterday to oust Rep. William J. Jefferson from his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee, a little-precedented move that angered the party's black lawmakers.

The 99-58 vote, taken last night in a Cannon Caucus Room gathering of the party's representatives and delegates, sends the measure to the House floor.

Several members of the Congressional Black Caucus denounced House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's campaign against Mr. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. The caucus members were reluctant to oust Mr. Jefferson from his tax-committee seat based on press and broadcast reports and leaked information related to an ongoing bribery investigation before he has been charged with any crime.

"I asked the caucus to put themselves in my shoes and if this was fair, where there are only allegations from third parties and some in the press, whether we would be ruled or make up our rules based on that," Mr. Jefferson said.

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, said criminal trials and past caucus procedures were not the issue and that Mr. Jefferson has had his opportunity to plead his case, defend himself before the caucus and work with the leadership by voluntarily stepping down, which he refused to do.

"We have a higher ethical standard. This is not a court of law; this is about a higher ethical standard, and you know when it isn't being met," she said, adding that she had "been more than fair" to Mr. Jefferson by noting her opposition to the FBI raid of his office and her support of his amicus brief to have his records returned.

Mrs. Pelosi denied any racial bias in her effort to oust Mr. Jefferson but not Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who is white and is suspected of using his House Appropriations Committee seat to funnel money and contracts to numerous nonprofit groups and a business-partner relative. Mr. Mollohan did step down from the ethics panel.

"Mr. Jefferson has had two people plead guilty to bribing him," she said. "We don't know if Mr. Mollohan is even being investigated."

Many in the black caucus have said other members under investigation remained in committee seats before charges were filed. Caucus members and staff could come up with only one case of a Democrat being ousted from a House panel without any charges being filed. Rep. Adam Clayton Powell of New York, who was black, was ousted in 1967 over corruption accusations that were not crimes under pre-Watergate ethics laws.

"Our experience has been throughout history is that you have to have a set of rules to adhere to and abide by, and if you don't, it leaves you with a process that can be abused and one that you can't count on," said Rep. Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat and caucus chairman.

Black caucus sources also dismissed Mrs. Pelosi's claim that the situations are not analogous because of the lack of confirmation of any Mollohan probe. The sources point out that Mr. Mollohan also sits on the subcommittee that oversees the FBI and Justice Department.

The Democratic caucus met for an hour as Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Jefferson made their cases. Reps. G.K. Butterfield of North Carolina and Steven R. Rothman of New Jersey managed the debate. Mr. Rothman told reporters that his motion to table the matter was rejected by a 91-61 vote, and added, "I felt that in the absence of any rule this was extremely arbitrary and provides potential for abuse."

Black Caucus Opposes Democrats' Move To Take Jefferson Off Key Committee (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a clash highlighting tensions between Democratic leaders and one of their party's most important constituencies, House Democrats on Thursday backed a move to oust scandal-scarred Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) from a powerful committee post, despite opposition from the Congressional Black Caucus.

On a 99-58 vote, the House Democratic Caucus endorsed a proposal by their leader, Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, that would remove Jefferson temporarily from the Ways and Means Committee because of an FBI investigation of bribery allegations against him.

Jefferson, who is African American, has resisted pressure from colleagues to step aside voluntarily. But after making his case to the closed-door meeting of House Democrats, he left open the possibility that he may give up his committee seat rather than fight the matter on the House floor, where it would have to be ratified to take effect. The timing of that floor debate is uncertain.

Members of the black caucus who have supported Jefferson argued it would be unprecedented to force him off the committee before any criminal charges had been filed against him.

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), head of the black caucus, warned that Pelosi's push for Jefferson's removal might cause black voters to conclude that "a different standard … based on race" was being applied.

The controversy pits Pelosi and other House Democratic leaders against the black caucus at a time when the clout its members exert within their districts is especially important.

Turnout by black voters is considered crucial to Democratic hopes of winning control of the House in November's elections. The black lawmakers will be counted on to help spur that turnout, as well as to stymie efforts by Republicans to make political inroads among African Americans.

If Democrats do take charge of the House, African Americans stand to gain a large share of power: Five black lawmakers are in line to become chairmen of some of the House's most important committees.

Still, Pelosi took the risk of alienating the black caucus in service of another political goal: her party's efforts to promote the election-year argument that Republicans have fostered a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

"Our House Democratic Caucus is determined to uphold a high ethical standard," she said after Thursday's vote. "We said it, and now we are doing it."

Some Democrats have expressed concern that the dispute will undercut Pelosi's efforts to forge party cohesiveness in the House ahead of the 2006 elections. But she dismissed such worries.

"I'm very proud of the unity of my caucus," she told reporters Thursday. "We can withstand debate; it isn't stifled."

Jefferson has maintained his innocence, but a business associate recently pleaded guilty to bribing him in hopes of winning a telecommunications contract with Nigeria. A former Jefferson aide also has pleaded guilty in the case.

The investigation gained widespread national attention when a recent court filing revealed that last year, the FBI videotaped a transaction that showed Jefferson accepting $100,000 in bribe money, according to federal agents. The filing said $90,000 of that money was found a few days later wrapped in aluminum foil in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington home.

Following news stories about the cash, Pelosi called for Jefferson to leave the Ways and Means Committee until the case was resolved.

Some of the 43 members of the black caucus — all of whom are Democrats — supported Pelosi. But as a group, the caucus decided to oppose her.

In its official stance, the caucus argued that lawmakers under investigation deserved the "presumption of innocence."

It also noted that Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) had not been asked to step down from the powerful Appropriations Committee, despite reports that he was under scrutiny for allegedly steering millions of dollars in federal funds to nonprofit organizations that he helped control.

Pelosi countered that so far, the case against Mollohan was not as serious or clear-cut as the one against Jefferson.

In an effort to reach out to black voters, Pelosi in recent days conducted interviews with several black news organizations to explain her position.

In Thursday's vote, some white Democrats joined in opposing the move against Jefferson. One of them, Rep. Steven R. Rothman of New Jersey, said he objected to applying an "arbitrary" standard in the absence of clear guidelines for determining when a lawmaker should lose a committee assignment.

Most Democrats on Capitol Hill are hoping the dispute over Jefferson fades quickly and does not pack a broader political punch.

"There needs to be an effort to reiterate to the black community that the Democratic Party values their support and is with them on their issues," said an aide to House Democratic leaders who requested anonymity because of the politically sensitive nature of the flap.

As part of an effort by President Bush to improve the standing of the GOP among black voters, Republicans are running African American candidates in three major statewide races this year — for governor in Ohio and Pennsylvania and for senator in Maryland.

Although none of them is considered a front-runner, Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said Democrats had reason to be concerned.

She cited a report on black voters in Maryland commissioned by the state's Democratic Party that concluded that Michael S. Steele, the GOP's Senate candidate, had "a clear ability to break through … among African American voters."

Still, Republicans have a lot of ground to make up in the battle for black voters: An April poll by NBC and the Wall Street Journal found that Bush's approval rating among blacks was just 16%.

Little Office Becomes Big Player After Raid By The F.B.I. (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

There was a time — four weeks ago, for instance — when the Office of the General Counsel for the House of Representatives was just another nearly invisible government agency, working about as far from public notice as is possible on Capitol Hill.

But the F.B.I.'s raid last month on the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat at the center of a bribery investigation, has drawn the general counsel's office and the woman who leads it, Geraldine R. Gennet, into a rare public fight with the executive branch. The May 20 raid, the first executed on a Congressional office at least since the United States Constitution was adopted, has angered a bipartisan group in Congress that views it as an unjustified intrusion into the legislative branch's autonomy and a violation of the government's fundamental separation of powers.

The Justice Department, which prevented lawyers from Ms. Gennet's office to be present during the search, has defended it as a perfectly legal act.

On Friday, lawyers for Mr. Jefferson and the Justice Department are scheduled to argue before Judge Thomas F. Hogan of Federal District Court in Washington. Ms. Gennet, asked to weigh in by the House Republican leadership, filed a 90-page memorandum criticizing the raid as a "grave threat" to the immunity that Congress has enjoyed from intrusions into its official business.

DOJ_NMG_0034955

"Weaken the legislative branch, and the likelihood of abuses of authority by the other branches necessarily increases," the memorandum said. In its reply to the court, the Justice Department said Ms. Gennet's arguments ventured "well beyond anything the law can support."

Though she will be at Friday's hearing, Ms. Gennet, a Democrat whose first government job, in 1986, was as legal counsel to the Washington Metro Police Department, will leave oral arguments to a deputy.

The limelight is unusual for an office that is so low in profile that it has no public Web site, no spokesperson and only five lawyers, including Ms. Gennet, who declined to comment for this article.

"It's generally an obscure office that you don't hear much about," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and a former assistant United States attorney. "Their role has become more prominent because of all the subpoenas being issued over there."

The Office of the General Counsel is appointed by the House speaker and represents the House and its elected members in their official capacities, regardless of political affiliation. The nonpartisanship can be relative, however. House rules require the counsel's office to "function pursuant to the direction of the speaker," who must consult with a bipartisan advisory group that is, nonetheless, controlled by the majority party.

"The House counsel is like a hybrid car," said Charles Tiefer, a former House counsel who is a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law. "Sometimes it runs on bipartisanship, sometimes it runs on just the majority party."

In 2001, for example, after a group of Democratic congressmen sued the Commerce Department for Census data that they believed would show more accurate counts of minorities, Ms. Gennet filed a brief opposing the lawsuit, on orders from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

Working as the House of Representatives' chief lawyer was not always considered all that important. The job began in the early 1970's as a low-level administrative post within the House clerk's office. In 1976, Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., a Democrat, appointed a young lawyer, Stanley M. Brand, as the first counsel with authority to take on constitutional challenges from the executive branch.

"There were guys before me," Mr. Brand recalled in an interview last week, "but they basically wrote the contracts for curtains."

In 1978, the office nearly vanished after a Senate bill proposed creating one general counsel for the House and Senate. But House leaders, led by Mr. O'Neill, declined to go along, fearing "that the office would be paying more attention to senators," said Steven R. Ross, the House general counsel from 1983 to 1993.

When Republicans took control of the House in the mid-1990's, they considered the counsel's office, located directly below the speaker's offices, as a Democratic creation that had outgrown its usefulness, Mr. Brand said. The new Republican speaker, Newt Gingrich, had the office moved into a Congressional office building across the street, and returned it to the purview of the House clerk.

In 1997, when Ms. Gennet was named House counsel, Republicans made the office independent of the clerk.

Mr. Brand and Mr. Ross, now in private practice in Washington, said they relished their years as House counsel, which placed them at the center of constitutional battles with the executive branch. In 1979, Mr. Brand argued and won United States v. Helstoski, in which the Supreme Court held that the Constitution prevented the government from prosecuting members of Congress for the performance of official acts.

Mr. Ross fought on behalf of a Democrat-controlled Congress against the Reagan administration's attempt to expand its executive powers.

"I thought it was the single best legal job in Washington," Mr. Ross said.

Mr. Tiefer, who was appointed acting House counsel in 1993, said the current battle over the F.B.I.'s search of Representative Jefferson's office last month was, in a sense, a welcome reawakening.

"It represents a return to the larger role that counsel's office played during separation of powers struggles 10 to 20 years ago," he said.

Separation Of Powers Showdown Friday (MSNBC)

By Joel Seidman

MSNBC.com, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The federal judge who signed the search warrant allowing the FBI to enter Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office last month, will preside at a potentially contentious hearing Friday – a hearing pitting the executive and legislative branches of government in a showdown over the United States Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0034956

The ornate ceremonial courtroom at U.S. District Court in Washingotn, D.C. will be the backdrop for Judge Thomas Hogan to hear arguments from the Department of Justice and the House of Representatives, as well as Jefferson's lawyer, on the search which Hogan condoned.

The raid, say both Congressional and executive branch officials, was the first ever on a congressman's office in the sprawling Capitol complex. House leaders have called the search unconstitutional. DOJ said any special treatment for lawmakers would essentially allow Congress to block criminal investigations.

A clause in the constitution known as the “Speech and Debate Clause” lies at the crux of the looming separation of powers battle. It protects members of Congress from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit concerning their legislative work.

It is still not known exactly what was seized from Jefferson's office, but, whatever it was, the congressman wants it back. The materials that have been confiscated have been kept on ice, so-to-speak. In a move designed to allow the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Justice Department enough time to try to resolve the issue, President George W. Bush ordered the seized material sealed and kept in the Solicitor General's office until mid-July

Federal disagreements

The courtroom arguments are likely to go something like this: The government, in their filing this week, acknowledges that under the clause, members "shall not be questioned for any speech or debate." But, the government argues, "This prohibition has nothing to say about a search warrant that, as in this case, was not directed at -- and thus did not question Representative Jefferson about - legislative activity."

The House counsel's argument maintains that the search of Jefferson's office "violated the Constitution because it took place without Congressman Jefferson having had a prior opportunity to screen out and remove records and files (or determine not to assert the privilege)." The House counsel also argues that, absent extraordinary measures, searching a congressional office violates the Speech or Debate Clause, because it "threatens to impair the legislative branch's conduct of its constitutionally-mandated functions."

Jefferson is under investigation for allegedly taking bribes in order to influence high-ranking government officials in Africa to do business with a Kentucky-based Internet company.

Jefferson has not been charged and repeatedly has denied any wrongdoing in the alleged scheme. But, a Kentucky business owner and a former congressional aide have both pleaded guilty to bribing the congressman.

Jefferson's former aide, Brett Pfeffer, who is cooperating with the Justice Department's investigation, received an eight-year prison sentence recently for his role in the scandal. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate - the Kentucky company - pleaded to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to Jefferson. He has yet to be sentenced.

Safavian Jury Yet To Reach Verdict (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 15, 2006

A jury deliberated for a second day Thursday without reaching a verdict in the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

They are to resume on Friday trying to decide whether former Bush administration official David Safavian covered up his assistance to Republican influence-peddler Jack Abramoff.

The General Services Administration's chief of staff in 2002, Safavian allegedly concealed from GSA ethics officials, the GSA inspector general and Senate investigators his assistance to the now-convicted lobbyist. Abramoff wanted to buy, lease or redevelop two government properties including the Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

The jury of 10 women and two men is considering whether Safavian is guilty on two counts of engaging in obstruction and three counts of making false statements.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman dismissed a juror Wednesday morning, seated the only remaining alternate juror, a woman, and told the revised jury to begin deliberations anew. The jury originally started deliberating Tuesday.

The juror had done independent research and had talked to people she should not have about the case, according to the judge.

Safavian, a former chief federal procurement officer in the Bush White House, acknowledged on the witness stand that Abramoff e-mailed him that he was working on trying to buy or lease 40 acres of the GSA's White Oak property in Maryland for a school Abramoff set up. Safavian also acknowledged he knew Abramoff "was putting together a team in order to bid" on the redevelopment of the Old Post Office a few blocks from the White House.

But he said he didn't tell GSA officials and the Senate about his advice to Abramoff because the GSA had not decided in 2002 what to do with the properties so he didn't consider that Abramoff's inquiries amounted to doing or seeking business with the agency.

Corruption Trial Witness Feared For His Life (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 16, 2006

The former son-in-law of a prominent ex-alderman told federal investigators that he copied and saved city computer files "because he was scared that he may be killed," according to portions of an FBI interview cited Thursday in the City Hall corruption trial.

Robert Koch, a former manager of city computer servers, said later that he may have exaggerated those fears.

Koch, who is divorced from former 11th Ward Ald. Patrick Huels' daughter Allison, testified that he had files deleted at the behest of Mayor Richard Daley aide Robert Sorich in 1997.

But under cross-examination by Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin, Koch acknowledged that he secretly saved a copy of the files from the mayor's office in his locker at a gym.

"You told the FBI you were afraid because you had been at family events with the Huelses and the Daleys where other people had talked about getting people knocked off?" Durkin asked.

"I'm not going to admit that," Koch replied.

Durkin pressed him on the subject again, asking if Koch denied making the statement to the FBI on July 28. After Durkin showed Koch the FBI report of that meeting, Koch finally acknowledged that he did express fear to authorities.

"So I'm a 23-year-old kid in a world I really didn't understand that well, and I was leaving a life behind that I was nervous to do," said Koch, now 34. "Did I ever think anyone would kill me? The thought may have crossed my mind, but that's a little extreme."

Sorich and three other ex-city officials are charged with rigging city hiring and promotions to favor politically connected applicants. Federal prosecutors say Sorich, Daley's longtime patronage chief, took steps to cover up the hiring fraud.

The trial has brought unwanted attention to the Daley administration and the mayor's political organization. Koch's testimony took jurors into the tight-knit world of power brokers in the Daley family's Bridgeport power base.

Durkin questioned Koch's credibility, suggesting Koch concealed from the FBI that he secretly kept copies of the files Sorich allegedly wanted him to erase.

Koch said a colleague told him in early September 1997 that FBI agents were examining files in the mainframe computer. Koch testified that he called for advice from Huels, who was then his father-in-law and Daley's City Council floor leader.

An hour after his conversation with Huels, Koch said, Sorich called and asked him to delete files from the computer's mainframe.

A few months later, an FBI agent came to the South Side home where Koch was living with a friend. In the Dec. 10, 1997, meeting, the agent asked Koch about Huels and about a tip they had received of computer file deletions at the city, according to testimony.

"When you were talking to the FBI, you knew you were sitting on a copy of [the computer files] in your gym locker?" Durkin asked.

Koch said he kept the computer files at a time when Huels was mired in a City Hall scandal that led to his resignation. Koch did not tell authorities that he had preserved them until they contacted him a year ago.

Durkin suggested that Koch thought the files contained information about Huels and Michael Tadin, a city trucking contractor and boyhood friend of the mayor. Huels resigned in October 1997 after accepting a $1.25 million loan from Tadin.

But Koch flatly rejected the notion that he had acted to protect Huels, noting that aldermanic files were not backed up on the city's mainframe.

"These files came from the mayor's office," where Sorich worked, Koch replied.

Durkin asked whether Koch felt regret because at the time he was divorcing Huels' daughter and leaving the tight-knit circle of the 11th Ward.

"It was very difficult," Koch said.

He said he still respects Huels and didn't want anyone to get hurt by what he said on the witness stand.

"I'm sick to my stomach that I'm here testifying," said Koch, whose cross-examination by Durkin lasted most of Thursday.

After Koch left the stand, outside the presence of the jury, prosecutor Patrick Collins told U.S. District Judge David Coar that "we've passed the point of relevance" regarding the 1997 computer files. Collins said the destruction of the computer records wasn't connected to Huels, because the FBI did not open an investigation into Huels until late October 1997.

A veteran FBI agent testified later Thursday that he questioned Sorich about hiring records in preparation for the 1997 corruption trial of former Water Department Commissioner John Bolden.

FBI Agent Reges Fay said that while investigating Bolden for taking kickbacks from Water Department job applicants, he learned Sorich might have had a role in the applicants' hiring.

Sorich told Fay in a telephone conversation in 1997 that he referred 10 applicants to Bolden, Fay said.

Sorich said the names came from local community leaders, and that his office kept no records of the applicants, Fay testified.

Fay said Sorich provided him no other information about his alleged role in hiring applicants in Water or any other department.

Prosecutors plan to rest their case Monday, after the testimony of Sorich's former assistant, Patty Molloy.

Durkin told reporters he did not know whether he would call any witnesses on Sorich's behalf.

"We're still not sure we're going to put a case on," he said.

Did Witness Fear For Life? It 'may Have Crossed My Mind' (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 16, 2006

A prosecution witness said "the thought may have crossed my mind" when asked Thursday if he feared he'd be killed after getting caught between an FBI investigation and a powerful 11th Ward family.

Witness Robert Koch, a former City Hall computer technician and onetime son-in-law to former Ald. Patrick Huels, testified that the mayor's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, told him in 1997 to delete city computer files.

Prosecutors contend Sorich, a top official with the Intergovernmental Affairs Office, ordered the files destroyed to hide his office's role in hirings and promotions.

Defense lawyer Tom Durkin contended that Koch really destroyed the files to protect Huels. Durkin suggested Koch once told the FBI he was scared for his life because while at family events with the Huels and Daleys, he sometimes heard about people getting "knocked off."

"Did I ever think anyone would kill me? The thought may have crossed my mind but that's a little extreme," Koch said of his state of mind in 1997.

Koch explained he was young and going through a divorce at the time with Huels' daughter, breaking his once-powerful connections.

"I'm a 23-year-old kid in a world I really didn't understand that well. I was leaving a world behind," Koch said.

Agent: Probe was after deletion

Durkin suggested Koch was trying to protect his father-in-law by saying he destroyed the files for Sorich. Huels was under FBI investigation after the Chicago Sun-Times exposed a questionable loan he received. Huels, who was also Daley's City Council floor leader, was never charged but later resigned.

But FBI Special Agent Reges Fay testified Thursday that the FBI didn't even open its investigation into Huels until October of 1997 -- about a month after Koch had the computer files destroyed.

Prosecutors could rest their case Monday. Defense lawyers say they're still determining whether they will put on a case.

Also Thursday, a female juror was excused after she told the judge her employer would no longer pay her salary during jury duty. That brings the number of jurors to 16, down from 18. Another was excused weeks ago. Twelve jurors are needed for deliberations.

FBI Subpoenas Records From Library's Policy (NILESHS)

By Jennifer Johnson, STAFF WRITER

Niles Herald-Spectator, June 16, 2006

The Niles Public Library was subpoenaed Monday by the U.S. Attorney's Office and told to supply all financial information regarding the library's dealings with the insurance agency of Ralph Weiner & Associates.

Library Administrator Cary Czarnecki said staff is cooperating with authorities and in the process of gathering the required information.

During an FBI investigation into possible fraudulent dealings involving Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase and the Weiner agency, agents raided the insurance company's Wheeling office June 6 and uncovered check vouchers for payments to S.M.P. Insurance Service, Inc., noting the Niles Public Library in the description line.

DOJ_NMG_0034959

The FBI has identified S.M.P. as a "shell company" in Blase's law office, and the funds paid to S.M.P by the Weiner Agency as kickbacks paid to Blase for getting Niles businesses to sign up for insurance coverage with Weiner, the FBI alleges.

According to the FBI's criminal complaint against Blase and Steven Weiner of the Weiner agency, the check vouchers are for amounts of $1,050, dated Aug. 8, 2003; $550, dated Aug. 17, 2004; and $550, dated Aug. 5, 2005. Each of the vouchers states, "Pay SMP %% For Niles Public Library," in various abbreviations, according to the complaint.

The complaint also alleges that commission statements and a recovered memorandum from the Weiner agency indicate the library was coded under "4 Doves Restaurant."

Czarnecki said the library never received money from S.M.P and has had no dealings with a company of that name. He did say that the library has its insurance coverage through the Weiner agency, including property, casualty and liability insurance. Weiner is also the broker for health insurance provided to employees, he said.

Czarnecki said the library board sent out bid requests for each insurance contract, and the last time the library sought insurance bids, Weiner was the only company to provide one.

Czarnecki denied the library board was ever pressured by the mayor to purchase insurance through Weiner. It is believed the library has purchased its insurance through the Weiner agency since at least the late 1980s.

Morgan Dubiel, vice president of the Niles Library Board, said he knew nothing about the alleged payments to the library from S.M.P.

"We are an innocent bystander," he said.

Both Dubiel and Czarnecki said they were surprised by the news of Blase's arrest on June 8 and the allegations made against him by the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office.

Man Sought In Nev. Wants 'Truth' To Emerge (AP)

By Tom Gardner, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

A man sought by police Thursday in the slaying of his estranged wife and the attack on a family court judge left a phone message saying he wanted "the true story" to get out to the public, his cousin said.

Authorities have searched for Darren Mack since Monday when the judge was shot and wounded in his office by a sniper. Mack was charged the next day with murder in the stabbing death of Charla Mack, 39.

His cousin, Jeffrey Donner, said he received a phone message from Mack shortly after the shooting, saying, "'If anything happens to me, please make sure that the true story about the injustices that are going on in that courtroom get out to the media and the public.'"

Donner said his cousin had complained about Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling Mack's divorce case, for the past year and got the impression the judge was biased and made decisions before he heard all the facts.

"He was just obsessed with bringing this judge down. Not physically. I never heard anything like that, but by reputation," Donner said of Mack.

Still, Donner said he was shocked by reports of the shooting because Mack is "just not a violent person."

"If he is in fact responsible for this, it is totally out of character and it is simply an example of somebody that has snapped," he said, choking back tears.

Police said Weller, 53, who was shot once in the chest, was released from the hospital on Tuesday to an undisclosed, secure location.

A custody hearing in the Macks' divorce case was scheduled before Weller in September. Charla Mack filed for divorce in 2005, and a mutual restraining order was signed the same year, according to court records.

Mack, who owned a pawn shop, earned more than $500,000 a year and had a net worth of $9.4 million, according to court documents.

Shawn Meador, Charla Mack's lawyer, said in a court filing that Mack ignored Weller's order in May 2005 to pay $10,000 a month in temporary alimony payments. Weller found him in contempt of court, but Mack filed for bankruptcy in August to avoid paying, according to the filing.

Investigators said Mack may have headed west because of the contact with Donner, who lives in Moraga, Calif., and because a credit card used by the company he owns was used at the Sacramento airport Monday afternoon.

The Justice Department also charged Mack Thursday with unlawful flight to avoid prosecution.

Online Threats Outpacing Law Crackdowns (CNET)

By Joris Evers, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0034960

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz.--Authorities are cracking down on phishing and botnets, but the threats are advancing instead of diminishing, two law enforcement officials said.

Cybercrooks are organizing better and moving to more sophisticated tactics to get their hands on confidential data and turn PCs of unwitting users into bots, representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Air Force Office of Special Investigations said in separate presentations here at the Computer Security Institute's NetSec event this week.

Law enforcement has had increased successes in catching, prosecuting and convicting phishers and bot herders over the past couple of years. However, catching the bad guys is getting tougher as the criminals become more professional, the representatives said.

"We're seeing increasingly sophisticated groups online that are more indicative of crime groups," Jonathan Rusch, special counsel for fraud prevention at the Justice Department, said in a presentation. The criminals who have been caught range from teenagers to retirees, he said.

Rusch spoke about phishing, a prevalent type of online attack that combines e-mail spam and fraudulent Web sites made to look like trusted sites, which are aimed at tricking a user into giving up sensitive information such as a credit card or Social Security number. Almost 17,500 phishing Web sites were reported to the Anti-Phishing Working Group in April.

A top phishing concern is the increased use of malicious software, Rusch said. Increasingly, phishers use Trojan horses that pack backdoors, screen grabbers or keystroke loggers to capture log-in names, passwords and other information, he said. In April, there were 180 unique examples of such malicious code, he said.

Backdoor software gives attackers remote access to an infected PC, which could let them piggyback onto a user's Internet connection and conduct online transactions from the victim's PC while masquerading as the person, Rusch said.

Screen grabbers and keystroke loggers can be programmed to capture very specific information and are even designed to wait until a user logs on to a certain banking Web site and send that information to the attacker.

Malicious software is where phishers intersect with bot herders, those who run networks of compromised machines, called a bot net. Computers typically become compromised and turned into a bot, also popularly called a zombie, after visiting a malicious Web site or opening an infected e-mail message or attachment. The bot software often nestles itself on a PC unbeknownst to the user by exploiting an unpatched security flaw on the system.

Law enforcement has been catching up to bot herders, and there have been some high-profile convictions. But here, too, the battle is getting harder, Wendi Whitmore, a special agent with the Air Force Office of Special Investigations, said in a presentation on botnets.

"Botnets are one of the greatest facilitators of cybercrime these days. Really the cybercrime arena is wrapped around botnets," she said.

With ubiquitous broadband connections and exploits for security flaws in software out before patches, the Internet environment is ideal for bots or zombies to proliferate, she said. That assertion is backed by a recent analysis by Microsoft. The software maker found that bots were the most common Windows threat, with more than 60 percent of compromised computers running bot code.

A zombie PC can be used by miscreants to store illegal content, such as child pornography, or in a botnet to relay spam and launch cyberattacks. Additionally, hackers often steal the victim's data and install spyware and adware on PCs, to earn a kickback from the spyware or adware maker.

Practice makes perfect

Meanwhile, bot masters are getting smarter about hiding. Today, most botnets are controlled using Internet Relay Chat, or IRC, servers and channels. Soon that could become instant messaging, peer-to-peer technology or protocols used by Internet phone services such as Skype or Vonage, Whitmore said.

"That is something that we're worried about because those protocols are proprietary," she said. "They don't publish routing protocols; it would be very difficult to catch that kind of crime."

Also, Whitmore expects cybercrooks to maintain smaller botnets with the hope of staying under the radar. People being caught today operate networks of as many as 1 million PCs. "There is a greater chance that you're going to get caught, if you do that much activity and command and control that many computers," she said.

Cybercriminals are often after data they can turn into cash, such as credit card numbers or even trade secrets. "If you have a smaller botnet and you combine that with targeted, really sophisticated social engineering tactics, you're going to be potentially a lot more successful," Whitmore said.

The military has seen a rise in such attacks over the last couple of years, Whitmore said. The attackers know what organizations work together, which generals would be involved and what issues they would talk about, she said. It's "incredibly disturbing, because those are the kinds of things that should be kept somewhat secret," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0034961

Law enforcement alone cannot solve the phishing and botnet problems, Rusch and Whitmore said. The technology industry and consumers have key parts to play, they said.

"Part of the problem is the way we design the online environment for users," Rusch said. It should be easier for people to see whether a site can be trusted or not, he said. Some of that is happening today with increased security coming in new Web browsers, for example.

A stronger effort to take down phishing Web sites is also welcome, he said. The average phishing Web site was up for five days in April, and that's too long, Rusch said.

In fighting bots, Whitmore sees benefits in Internet service providers delivering security software to their users. "The long-term benefit of ISPs becoming more involved would be an overall reduction of malicious code on the Internet, and most of us believe that's a good thing," she said.

Court Rules Warrant Is Enough (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A closely divided Supreme Court ruled today that drug evidence found in the search of a home may be used against a suspect even if police officers violated the law by not giving the homeowner fair warning before they rushed inside.

In a 5-4 decision, the court said it would be rash to reject evidence simply because of a technical violation of the so-called knock-and-announce rule.

Criminals should not be handed a "get out of jail free card" in cases where the police have a valid search warrant, said Justice Antonin Scalia.

In the past, the court has insisted that evidence must be thrown out if the police violated the Constitution's ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures." This so-called exclusionary rule was among the most controversial legal developments of the 1960s, and it continues to irritate many law and order conservatives.

Scalia, who is among them, said that suppressing evidence should be "our last resort, not our first impulse." His opinion was joined in full by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Justice Clarence Thomas and new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, casting the decisive fifth vote, said the exclusionary rule itself was "settled" and "not in doubt." At issue, he said, was only whether to extend it to cases in which police had a valid warrant to enter a home but failed to give the proper warning.

In 1995, the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually required officers to knock on the door and call out "Police!" before they burst into a home. This rule helped protect the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then.

Until now, however, it was not clear whether the police would be penalized if they ignored this rule. Officers were told they should usually wait about 20 seconds after announcing their presence before they tried to enter a house. They may move faster if they suspect the residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet, the court said.

In the case decided today, Detroit police admitted they did not wait long before entering the home of Booker T. Hudson. They had obtained a search warrant to look for drugs and guns.

On a summer afternoon in 1998, seven officers approached the house and saw nothing unusual. Several called out "Police! Search warrant." Less than 5 seconds later, the lead officer turned the doorknob and walked into the living room.

There sat Hudson, along with 23 plastic bags that contained crack cocaine. Under a chair cushion, police also found a loaded revolver and five rocks of cocaine. Elsewhere in the house, they found more bags of drugs.

Charged with the drug and gun crimes, Hudson urged the judge to suppress the evidence because police had violated his rights under the knock-and-announce rule.

A prosecutor agreed the police had violated the rule, and a trial judge ruled that the evidence should be suppressed. But the Michigan Supreme Court disagreed and said suppressing the evidence was "not an appropriate remedy" for such a violation.

Hudson appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed last year to hear his case.

Scalia said this was not an instance where police obtained evidence by breaking the law. They had a valid warrant to search for and seize the drugs. "Since the interests were violated in this case have nothing to do with the seizure of the evidence, the exclusionary rule is inapplicable," he said in Hudson vs. Michigan.

The four dissenters said the requirement to "knock and announce" would be meaningless with no penalty for violating it.

The decision "represents a significant departure from the court's precedents. And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," wrote Justice Stephen G. Breyer for the dissenters.

DOJ_NMG_0034962

Scalia responded that victims of such an unlawful entry could sue the city and the police for violating their rights. He also pointed to the "increasing professionalism of police forces, including a new emphasis on internal police discipline."

Breyer scoffed at these suggestions, insisting that the exclusionary rule was adopted because it was the only effective deterrent for police misconduct.

Justices Allow No-knock Searches (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drugs or other evidence seized at a home can be used in a trial even if police failed to knock and announce their presence, the Supreme Court ruled Thursday in a major shift in its rulings on illegal searches by police.

The 5-4 decision in a Detroit drug case undercuts a nearly century-old rule that says evidence found during an unlawful search cannot be used. The decision also offers a sign that the court might be more apt to strengthen the hand of police with Justice Samuel Alito in the place of retired justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, who was on the court when the case was first argued, had worried about "the sanctity of the home."

Alito sided fully with Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion, which emphasized that tossing out evidence acquired in violation of the knock-and-announce rule — but with a valid warrant — could mean "releasing dangerous criminals."

In a dissent, Justice Stephen Breyer called the decision "doubly troubling."

"It represents a significant departure from the court's precedents," he wrote, joined by John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. "It weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection."

The rule is based on a centuries-old idea of home privacy and the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches. It requires police to knock, announce themselves and wait a "reasonable" time, which justices noted can be about 20 seconds, before entering. The practice shields occupants from surprise and property damage.

In the Detroit case, officers had a warrant to search for drugs and firearms in the home of Booker Hudson. They called out their presence and, after three to five seconds, entered through an unlocked front door.

Hudson tried unsuccessfully to suppress the evidence — rocks of cocaine — that police found and was convicted of drug possession. In an appeal, he argued that unless tainted evidence is suppressed, police will not be deterred from barging into homes. O'Connor was sympathetic to the view at January arguments.

After she retired, the eight remaining justices apparently were deadlocked. The case was re-argued in May with Alito on the court. His vote gave Scalia the majority. Joining them were Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Clarence Thomas and Anthony Kennedy.

Kennedy noted that he didn't agree with a section of Scalia's decision that would have more broadly weakened the rule requiring evidence from an improper search to be kept out, depriving Scalia of the necessary fifth vote to further curtail the Fourth Amendment.

Regarding the no-knock rule, Kennedy agreed with Scalia that police are sufficiently deterred from improper searches by the right of occupants to sue under civil rights law. Breyer countered that such lawsuits are rare and often do not bring much relief for victims.

Critics said the decision could lead to an increase in no-knock police raids. Jack King, a spokesman for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said, "The only sanction that police really care about is if the evidence is thrown out."

Tim Richardson, a senior legislative liaison for the Fraternal Order of Police, rejected the idea that police would change their practices. "There's a new professionalism among law enforcement officers. They want to have clean, successful, swift prosecutions."

Court Limits Protection Against Improper Entry (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Evidence found by police officers who enter a home to execute a search warrant without first following the requirement to "knock and announce" can be used at trial despite that constitutional violation, the Supreme Court ruled on Thursday.

The 5-to-4 decision left uncertain the value of the "knock-and-announce" rule, which dates to 13th-century England as protection against illegal entry by the police into private homes.

Justice Antonin Scalia, in the majority opinion, said that people subject to an improper police entry remained free to go to court and bring a civil rights suit against the police.

DOJ_NMG_0034963

But Justice Stephen G. Breyer, writing for the dissenters, said the ruling "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." He said the majority's reasoning boiled down to: "The requirement is fine, indeed, a serious matter, just don't enforce it."

The decision followed a reargument less than a month ago, with the newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr., evidently casting the decisive vote. Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion was clearly drafted to speak for a majority that was lost when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor left the court shortly after the first argument in January.

The justices' lineup in this case, which upheld a Detroit man's conviction for drug possession, may become a familiar one as the court proceeds through its criminal-law docket. In addition to Justice Alito, those who joined the majority opinion by Justice Scalia were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Clarence Thomas and Anthony M. Kennedy. Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

The decision answered a question that the court had left open in 1995, when it held in a unanimous opinion by Justice Thomas that the traditional expectation that the police should knock and announce their presence was part of what made a search "reasonable" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The amendment bars unreasonable searches.

In that case, Wilson v. Arkansas, the court declined to say what the remedy should be for a violation of the knock-and-announce rule. Ordinarily, evidence that is seized illegally — in the absence of a warrant, for example — may not be used at trial, under what is known as the exclusionary rule.

By a strong majority, most state and federal courts that have considered the issue have applied the exclusionary rule to violations of the knock-and-announce requirement. In its decision on Thursday in Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360, the Supreme Court upheld a ruling by the Michigan Court of Appeals, one of the few courts to have rejected the exclusionary rule in this context.

In the case, the Detroit police had a warrant to search for drugs in the home of Booker T. Hudson Jr. At his unlocked door, they announced their presence, but did not knock and waited only three to five seconds before entering, not the 15 to 20 seconds suggested by the Supreme Court's precedents.

Had the police observed a longer wait, they would have executed the search warrant and found the evidence anyway, Justice Scalia said. That made the connection between the improper entry and the discovery of the evidence "too attenuated" to justify the "massive remedy of suppressing evidence of guilt."

Justice Scalia said the knock-and-announce rule was designed to protect life, property and dignity by giving the homeowner time to respond to the knock and eliminating the need for the police to break down the door. But he said the rule has never protected "one's interest in preventing the government from seeing or taking evidence described in a warrant."

Throughout his opinion, Justice Scalia made clear his view that the right at issue was a minimal, even trivial, one — "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes," he said at one point — that could not hold its own when balanced against the "grave adverse consequences that exclusion of relevant incriminating evidence always entails."

The majority opinion was sufficiently dismissive of the exclusionary rule as to serve as an invitation to bring a direct challenge to the rule in a future case.

Justice Scalia surveyed changes in the legal landscape since 1961, when the court in the landmark case Mapp v. Ohio made the exclusionary rule binding on the states. Noting that the purpose of the exclusionary rule was to deter constitutional violations by making them costly for the prosecution, Justice Scalia said there was less need for deterrence today, when the police are better trained and when the ability to bring civil rights suits against the government has greatly expanded. Under current federal law, he noted, successful civil rights plaintiffs are reimbursed for their attorney fees.

The conditions that made deterrence necessary "in different contexts and long ago" no longer exist, Justice Scalia said, adding that a strict application of the exclusionary rule as envisioned by the court in 1961 "would be forcing the public today to pay for the sins and inadequacies of a legal regime that existed almost half a century ago."

It is rare to find Justice Scalia, a self-described "originalist," incorporating evolving conditions into his constitutional analysis. Almost always, when the court in a constitutional case takes account of changing conditions, the result is an expansion of constitutional rights, rather than, as Justice Scalia advocated in this case, a contraction.

One puzzling aspect of the decision was a concurring opinion by Justice Kennedy, who said that he wished to underscore the point that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule, as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt." Nonetheless, he signed the part of Justice Scalia's opinion that suggested that the exclusionary rule rested on an increasingly weak foundation.

Justice Breyer argued that "the court destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement. And the court does so without significant support in precedent."

He called the majority's argument "an argument against the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary principle itself," adding, "And it is an argument that this court until now has consistently rejected."

Court Eases 'No Knock' Search Ban (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The Constitution does not require the government to forfeit evidence gathered through illegal "no knock" searches, the Supreme Court ruled yesterday, in a far-reaching ruling that could encourage police with search warrants to conduct more aggressive raids.

The 5 to 4 decision broke with the court's modern tradition of enforcing constitutional limitations on police investigations by keeping improperly obtained evidence out of court. The "exclusionary rule" has been imposed to protect a series of rights, such as the right to remain silent in police custody and the right against warrantless searches.

But the broadly worded majority opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., suggested that the nation has moved into a new era of improved policing in which such strong medicine may no longer be justified.

The ruling underscored the court's rightward shift since Alito replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who seemed to disagree with Scalia about the case while she was on the court. And it once again focused attention on the pivotal role of Kennedy, a moderate conservative, who supplied a fifth vote to the majority while issuing a separate concurring opinion that disavowed a portion of Scalia's opinion and asserted that it did not portend any broader erosion of the exclusionary rule.

At issue in yesterday's case, Hudson v. Michigan , No. 04-1360, was the "knock and announce" rule, which has deep roots in Anglo American law. In 1995, the court made it part of what defines a "reasonable search" under the Fourth Amendment, without saying how it should be enforced.

But most federal and state lower courts to consider the matter have ruled that it should be enforced through an "exclusionary rule," along with the rest of the Fourth Amendment.

Before yesterday's decision, police executing a search warrant in most jurisdictions had to worry that they might lose a case if they did not first knock on the door, announce themselves and wait a reasonable time for a response before forcing their way in.

Now, unless state law says otherwise, the most they would face is administrative discipline or a lawsuit for damages.

Civil liberties groups and defense lawyers had argued to the court that those deterrents are far too weak to enforce the "knock and announce" rule, which, they argued, is often all that stands between an innocent citizen and an errant SWAT team.

That position was urged on the Supreme Court by attorneys for Booker T. Hudson Jr., a Michigan man convicted of drug possession after police found crack cocaine in his pockets during a 1998 no-knock raid that the state admitted was unlawful.

But Michigan's Supreme Court was one of the few lower courts to reject an exclusionary rule for "knock and announce" violations. Hudson's conviction was upheld, and he appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Scalia's opinion focused on the guilty defendants who go free when otherwise valid evidence is thrown out of court. He concluded that that "social cost" is too high in relation to whatever additional privacy protection residents get from the "knock and announce" rule.

"Resort to the massive remedy of suppression of evidence of guilt is unjustified," Scalia wrote.

Scalia argued that the law enforcement landscape has changed dramatically since 1961, when the Supreme Court first imposed an exclusionary rule on the states to protect against warrantless searches. Today's police are more professional than those of 45 years ago, he observed, and there is "increasing evidence that police forces across the United States take the constitutional rights of citizens seriously."

In this environment, Scalia argued, lawsuits and administrative proceedings are enough to ensure that police comply with the "knock and announce" rule.

That line of reasoning prompted a 30-page dissenting opinion from Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who disputed Scalia's upbeat view of modern policing and argued that lawsuits and police discipline have already proved inadequate to punish and deter "knock and announce" violations.

"Today's opinion," Breyer wrote in dissent, "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Breyer.

Scalia's cost-benefit analysis could be invoked not only to deny a new exclusionary rule in this case, Breyer argued, but also to roll back the use of the exclusionary rule to enforce the Fourth Amendment in areas where it has long been recognized.

"The majority's 'substantial social costs' argument is an argument against the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary principle itself," Breyer wrote. "And it is an argument that this Court, until now, has consistently rejected."

Kennedy tried to diminish the apparent sweep of Scalia's opinion, indicating that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt."

DOJ_NMG_0034965

There was strong circumstantial evidence that, if O'Connor had not been replaced by Alito, Breyer would have been speaking for the court.

In January, when the justices heard the case and cast tentative votes, Connor was still on the court. Her comments at argument suggested she favored Breyer's view.

But after she left the court Jan. 31, the court announced the case would be reargued -- a sign that it had reverted to a 4 to 4 tie without her vote.

High Court Eases 'Knock And Announce' Rule For Police (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court on Thursday weakened the longstanding "knock and announce" rule under which police must in most circumstances knock on the door, announce their presence, and wait briefly before forcibly entering a house with a search warrant.

Although not repealing the rule itself, Justice Antonin Scalia's 5-4 majority opinion said the traditional remedy for police violation of the rule -- namely, barring the use at trial of the evidence found -- is no longer required.

Citing the increasing professionalism of today's police and the availability of other remedies, such as civil rights suits under §1983 of Title 42 of the U.S. Code, Scalia said the "massive remedy" of exclusion of evidence was unwarranted and would invite a flood of allegations of police violation of the rule.

"The cost of entering this lottery," Scalia wrote, "would be small, but the jackpot enormous: suppression of all evidence, amounting in many cases to a get-out-of-jail-free card."

Scalia's ruling was confined to the context of the knock-and-announce rule, but some elements of it could apply more broadly, possibly setting the stage for a future attack on the exclusionary rule, which excludes from use at trial any evidence that is illegally obtained by police. That rule, first established by the Supreme Court for federal courts in 1914 and applied to states in 1961, has been a hardy but controversial tool for discouraging police misconduct.

Law enforcement advocates applauded the ruling. "Today's decision not to expand the exclusionary rule is very important to law enforcement," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. "Justice is best served when juries are allowed to consider all relevant evidence."

The ruling in Hudson v. Michigan, one of four handed down Thursday, was one sign that the much-heralded era of unanimity under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. may have been short-lived. And it also highlighted the impact of the Court's new lineup. When the Court first heard arguments in the Hudson case in January, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the Court and appeared sympathetic to defendant Booker Hudson Jr. The case was reheard in May after Justice Samuel Alito Jr. replaced O'Connor, and on Thursday he joined the Scalia majority against Hudson. Also in the majority were Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

In dissent, Justice Stephen Breyer said the ruling "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the dissent.

The decision also drew criticism from groups that have pointed to a sharp increase in recent years in no-knock, SWAT-type police raids on private homes, usually in pursuit of drugs. "Because of today's decision, we can expect to see an even more pronounced increase in the use of illegal, military-style no-knock raids," said Radley Balko of the Cato Institute, which filed a brief in the Hudson case. "We can expect to see more innocent civilians wrongly targeted."

Balko also discounted Scalia's reference to the alternative remedy of suing police officers under §1983, asserting that the courts had already "set the bar extremely high" against such suits.

In the case before the Court, lawyers for Detroit police acknowledged that they violated the traditional knock-and-announce rule when they entered Hudson's home in a drug bust. They shouted "Police, search warrant," but did not knock and waited less than five seconds before opening the unlocked door.

A state court judge suppressed the cocaine evidence that was obtained in the raid, but the Michigan Court of Appeals said the evidence should have been allowed because it would have been discovered even if the police had obeyed the rule.

Scalia said the "ancient" knock-and-announce rule protected valid interests that benefit police and homeowners. Police benefit because if they force their way into homes without announcement, those inside might shoot them as intruders. It also "protects those elements of privacy and dignity that can be destroyed by a sudden entrance," Scalia said, by allowing inhabitants to pull on clothes or get out of bed.

But the Court has already allowed police to ignore the rule if the circumstances "present a threat of physical violence" or if there is reason to believe that waiting would lead to the destruction of evidence inside.

DOJ_NMG_0034966

The Court also ruled Thursday in Howard Delivery Service v. Zurich American Insurance Co. that insurance company claims for unpaid workers' compensation premiums are not entitled to priority in bankruptcy proceedings. And in Kircher v. Putnam Funds Trust, the Court ruled that federal appeals courts have no jurisdiction to second-guess lower court decisions to remand to state court lawsuits filed under the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998. The ruling is a defeat for investment companies that seek to keep investor class actions out of state courts.

Supreme Court Gives Police More Power (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

Police who burst into a private building without first knocking and announcing their presence can use evidence they discover in a criminal case.

In a boost to aggressive police tactics and a setback to the privacy rights of business and home owners, the US Supreme Court has rejected the legal principle that evidence obtained in violation of the so-called knock-and-announce rule must be excluded from use at a trial.

Instead, the high court said in a 5-to-4 decision announced Thursday that such evidence can be used at trial. The social costs of excluding evidence because of a violation of the knock-and-announce rule are considerable, the high court said.

"Resort to the massive remedy of suppressing evidence of guilt is unjustified," writes Justice Antonin Scalia for the majority. He was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, and Justices Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, and Samuel Alito.

The decision marks a rejection - in the context of knock-and-announce - of a basic safeguard in the criminal justice system established in the 1960s by the high court under then Chief Justice Earl Warren. That court adopted the approach that violations of certain procedural requirements by law enforcement officials could carry the heavy penalty of exclusion of evidence from use at a trial.

The process created an incentive for police officers to not only know the law, but to scrupulously follow it while carrying out their criminal investigations.

"The court destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement," Justice Stephen Breyer writes in a dissent, joined by three other justices.

He says he could find no legal precedent supporting the high court's ruling in any of the Fourth Amendment privacy cases decided since 1914. "It represents a significant departure from the court's precedents," Justice Breyer writes. "And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection."

The decision is "very disturbing," says David Moran, a law professor at Wayne State University Law School who argued the case at the Supreme Court. "It seems to rethink the entire exclusionary rule, which is the only thing that has caused the police for the past 50 years to generally comply with the Fourth Amendment."

The decision comes in a case called Hudson v. Michigan. It stems from an August 1998 search by seven Detroit police officers of the home of Booker Hudson. The police obtained a warrant to search for weapons and drugs at Mr. Hudson's home. When they arrived at the front door, an officer shouted: "Police, search warrant." They paused for three to five seconds before one of the officers turned the doorknob and entered the home through the unlocked front door. They did not knock, nor did they wait to see if anyone would answer the door in response to their shout, according to briefs filed in the case.

Police rushed into the house and saw Hudson seated in a chair in the living room. Five other men and women were running throughout the house, the briefs say. In the search that followed, police discovered in the chair in which Hudson had been sitting crack cocaine in plastic bags and a loaded revolver. In Hudson's pockets, police found five rocks of cocaine and $225 in cash.

Hudson was charged with possession with intent to deliver cocaine and possession of a firearm while committing a crime. He was convicted and sentenced to 18 months probation.

On appeal, his lawyer argued that the gun and drugs should have been suppressed because of the improper tactics used by police during the search. The state appeals court upheld the conviction and the Michigan Supreme Court declined to hear the case.

In affirming the conviction, the US Supreme Court said that applying the exclusionary rule to knock-and-announce violations is not "worth a lot" as a deterrent. Instead, it creates an incentive for criminal defendants to attack police conduct, Scalia writes.

"The cost of entering this lottery would be small, but the jackpot enormous; suppression of all evidence, amounting in many cases to a get-out-of-jail-free card," Scalia writes.

Top Court Upholds No-knock Police Search (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland

AP2, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court made it easier Thursday for police to barge into homes and seize evidence without knocking or waiting, a sign of the court's new conservatism with Samuel Alito on board.

The court, on a 5-4 vote, said judges cannot throw out evidence collected by police who have search warrants but do not properly announce their arrival.

It was a significant rollback of earlier rulings protective of homeowners, even unsympathetic homeowners like Booker Hudson, who had a loaded gun next to him and cocaine rocks in his pocket when Detroit police entered his unlocked home in 1998 without knocking.

The court's five-member conservative majority, anchored by new Chief Justice John Roberts and Alito, said that police blunders should not result in "a get-out-of-jail-free card" for defendants.

Dissenting justices predicted that police will now feel free to ignore previous court rulings requiring officers with search warrants to knock and announce themselves to avoid running afoul of the Constitution's Fourth Amendment ban on unreasonable searches.

"The knock-and-announce rule is dead in the United States," said David Moran, a Wayne State University professor who represented Hudson. "There are going to be a lot more doors knocked down. There are going to be a lot more people terrified and humiliated."

Supporters said the ruling will help police do their jobs.

"People who are caught red-handed with evidence of guilt have one less weapon to get off," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation.

The case provides the clearest sign yet of the court without Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Hudson had lost his case in a Michigan appeals court. Justices agreed to hear his appeal last June, four days before O'Connor's surprise announcement that she was retiring.

O'Connor was still on the bench in January when his case was first argued, and she seemed ready to vote with Hudson. "Is there no policy of protecting the home owner a little bit and the sanctity of the home from this immediate entry?" she asked.

She retired before the case was decided, and a new argument was held this spring so that Alito could participate, apparently to break a 4-4 tie.

Four justices, including Alito and Roberts, would have given prosecutors a more sweeping victory but did not have the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative.

Ronald Allen, a Northwestern University Law professor, said the ruling "suggests those four would be happy to consider overturning" a 1961 Supreme Court opinion that said evidence collected in violation of the Fourth Amendment cannot be used in trials. "It would be a significant change," he said.

Kennedy joined in most of the ruling but wrote to explain that he did not support ending the knock requirement. "It bears repeating that it is a serious matter if law enforcement officers violate the sanctity of the home by ignoring the requisites of lawful entry," he said.

Kennedy said that legislatures can intervene if police officers do not "act competently and lawfully." He also said that people whose homes are wrongly searched can file a civil rights lawsuit.

Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, said that there are public-interest law firms and attorneys who specialize in civil rights grievances.

Detroit police acknowledge violating the knock-and-announce rule when they called out their presence at Hudson's door, failed to knock, then went inside three seconds to five seconds later. The court has endorsed longer waits, of 15 seconds to 20 seconds. Hudson was convicted of drug possession.

"Whether that preliminary misstep had occurred or not, the police would have executed the warrant they had obtained, and would have discovered the gun and drugs inside the house," Scalia wrote.

Four justices complained in the dissent that the decision erases more than 90 years of Supreme Court precedent.

"It weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," Justice Stephen Breyer wrote for himself and Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Breyer said that while police departments can be sued, there is no evidence of anyone collecting much money in such cases.

The case is Hudson v. Michigan, 04-1360.

Supreme Court Weakens Police 'Knock And Announce' Rule (LAT)

By David G. Savage
The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court ruled Thursday that police armed with a search warrant may rush into a house without giving a required warning to the occupants and may use the evidence they find there.

In a 5-4 decision, the court said it would be rash to bar evidence in a criminal trial simply because police did not wait long enough before entering, a technical violation of the "knock and announce" rule.

Criminals should not be handed a "get out of jail free card" in cases where the police have a valid search warrant, said Justice Antonin Scalia, who wrote the opinion for the majority.

The dissenters said the court's ruling all but repealed a decision that had protected the privacy and dignity of homeowners.

New Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. cast the decisive vote. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor heard the case when it was argued in January but retired in February before the case was decided. At that point, the court was evenly split. The case was reargued when Alito replaced her, and he became the tie-breaker.

Until Thursday, the court had usually insisted that evidence be thrown out in cases where the police violate the Constitution's ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures." This so-called exclusionary rule was among the most controversial legal developments of the 1960s, and many law-and-order conservatives continue to chafe at it.

Scalia is among them. Suppressing evidence should be "our last resort, not our first impulse," he said, and his opinion was joined in full by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Clarence Thomas and Alito.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy voted with the majority but wrote separately to emphasize that the exclusionary rule is "settled" and "not in doubt." The issue in this case, Kennedy wrote, was whether the police's failure to give a proper warning even when they had a valid warrant to enter a home, merited an extension of the exclusionary rule.

In 1995, the justices agreed unanimously that the 4th Amendment usually requires officers to knock on the door and call out "Police!" before they burst into a home. This rule helps ensure the safety of the police and the privacy of the residents, the court said then.

Officers have been advised in other cases that they should usually wait about 20 seconds after knocking and announcing their presence before trying to enter a house, but the court has said in past rulings that officers may move faster if they suspect residents are going to flush drugs down a toilet.

In the current case, Detroit police admitted they did not wait long before entering the home of Booker T. Hudson Jr.

They had obtained a search warrant to look for drugs and guns at his residence. On a summer afternoon in 1998, seven officers approached Hudson's house and saw nothing unusual. Several called out "Police! Search warrant!" but less than five seconds later, the lead officer turned the doorknob and walked into the living room.

There sat Hudson with 23 bags that contained crack cocaine. Under the cushion of his chair, they also found a loaded revolver and five rocks of cocaine. Elsewhere in the house, police found more bags of drugs.

Hudson was charged with drug and gun crimes, but his lawyers urged the judge to suppress the evidence because police had violated the "knock and announce" rule.

A prosecutor agreed the police had violated the rule, and a trial judge suppressed the evidence. But the Michigan Supreme Court disagreed and said disallowing the evidence was "not an appropriate remedy" for such a violation.

Hudson appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which agreed last year to hear his case.

Scalia said this was not an instance where police obtained evidence by breaking the law. They had a valid warrant to search for and seize the drugs. Since the homeowner's privacy rights were not violated, "the exclusionary rule is inapplicable," he said in Hudson vs. Michigan.

The four dissenters said the requirement to "knock and announce" will be meaningless if it can be ignored and the evidence used in court.

Thursday's decision "represents a significant departure from the court's precedents. And it weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection," wrote Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

Scalia responded that people like Hudson still have recourse against the city and the police by suing them for violating their constitutional rights. He also pointed to the "increasing professionalism of police forces, including a new emphasis on internal police discipline."

These checks, he suggested, will deter the police from being overly aggressive and reckless.

Breyer scoffed at this notion and insisted that the exclusionary rule was adopted because it was the only effective deterrent for misconduct by the police.

In 1914, the Supreme Court first announced the exclusionary rule but applied it only to federal agents who violated the Constitution. Even then, it was a disputed notion. Benjamin Cardozo, then a New York state judge, said in 1926 that "the criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered."

The Supreme Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren gave this rule a national reach in 1961 when it said evidence must be suppressed when state and local police violate the 4th Amendment. Critics charged the Warren Court was too friendly to the rights of criminal defendants at the expense of law enforcement.

The high court has issued a mixed bag of rulings on the exclusionary rule in recent cases. The justices have given police more leeway to search cars and their passengers, but they have usually held the line against searches of homes without a warrant.

In March, the court ruled the police had violated the rights of a Georgia homeowner who disagreed with his wife and refused to consent to their entering his residence. In that 5-3 decision, Kennedy sided with the court's liberal faction.

Last month, the justices in a 9-0 decision said police may enter a home without a warrant to break up a fight in progress.

Evidence Allowed In No-knock Raid (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

Evidence seized by police officers who have a warrant but fail to follow the "knock and announce" rule before entering a suspect's home is still admissible in court, a divided 5-4 Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, said a long-established knock-and-announce rule never was intended to protect a person's right to prevent the government "from seeing or taking evidence described in a warrant."

Justice Scalia, noting that Detroit police admitted that they violated the rule in a drug raid, said that regardless of the "misstep," the officers would have seized the drugs and gun inside the house when executing the warrant.

The majority opinion said allowing judges to throw out such incriminating evidence "always entails ... the risk of releasing dangerous criminals ..." and would "generate a constant flood of alleged failures to observe the rule."

"Another consequence ... would be police officers' refraining from timely entry after knocking and announcing ... producing preventable violence against officers in some cases, and the destruction of evidence in many others," Justice Scalia wrote.

Joining in the majority opinion were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The minority opinion, written by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, called the ruling "doubly troubling." It "destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce" and did so "without significant support in precedent."

"I can find nothing persuasive in the majority's opinion that could justify its refusal to apply the rule," Justice Breyer said. "Without that unlawful entry they would not have been inside the house; so there would have been no discovery.

"Of course, had the police entered the house lawfully, they would have found the gun and drugs. But that fact is beside the point," he said.

Justice Breyer was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

The Cato Institute called the ruling "regrettable."

"Because of today's decision, we can expect to see an even more pronounced increase in the use of illegal, military-style no-knock raids. And we can expect to see more innocent civilians wrongly targeted," the Cato Institute said in a statement.

But Kent Scheidegger, legal director for the California-based Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, applauded the ruling, saying the court's refusal to expand the exclusionary rule for evidence was "very important to law enforcement."

"The knock-and-announce rule regulates how to conduct a search rather than whether a search can take place," he said.

The case involved an Aug. 27, 1998, arrest by Detroit police who had obtained a search warrant for drugs and guns at the home of Booker Hudson. After entering the home, police found large quantities of drugs, including rock cocaine in Hudson's pocket, and a loaded gun lodged between the cushion and armrest of the chair in which he was sitting.

Hudson was charged with unlawful drug and firearm possession. Later, he was convicted on drug charges, acquitted on the firearm charge and sentenced to 18 months' probation. He challenged the arrest, saying the unannounced entry by police violated his Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures.

In 1995, the Supreme Court ruled in an Arkansas case that the Fourth Amendment required police officers executing search warrants to knock and announce their presence before entering. The decision also recognized that in some circumstances a search still would be legal without a knock-and-announce by police.

Former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Justice Alito replaced, appeared to oppose the Detroit search when the case was argued in January and was expected to have voted against it.

Supreme Court Backs Wide Police Search Powers (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - A divided Supreme Court said Thursday that police with search warrants who barged into homes without knocking didn't risk having evidence they uncovered tossed out at trial, a ruling that civil liberties advocates called a major blow to privacy protections.

The 5-4 decision turns on a distinction drawn between how police enter a home and what they find once they're inside.

Yes, the so-called knock-and-announce rule is violated when police fail to announce their presence and wait a reasonable amount of time before entering someone's home. But no, that violation isn't sufficiently related to what they find during a search to justify banning drugs, guns or any other evidence that's uncovered from later criminal proceedings.

Justice Antonin Scalia said the increasing professionalism of police and the threat of civil suits was enough of a deterrent to keep officers from abusing their authority.

To exclude evidence from a trial merely because of an entry violation, the court said, would unnecessarily increase the risk of "grave, adverse" consequences, including the technical exoneration of guilty - and often dangerous - criminals.

The "jackpot" for criminals would be enormous, wrote Scalia, who was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito. He said the court essentially would be issuing "get-out-of-jail-free" cards if it indulged suppression of evidence based on an entry violation.

Scalia, Roberts, Thomas and Alito went further, and seemed to question decades of precedents on the exclusionary rule, which calls for booting evidence when police break the law during a search. Kennedy didn't join that part of the opinion, however, and wrote a concurrence that said the exclusionary rule wasn't in jeopardy.

Justice Stephen Breyer penned a sharp dissent that accused the court of misreading its own precedents and defying "elementary logic." Compliance with knock-and-announce procedure is one way that the court judges the reasonableness of a search under the Constitution's Fourth Amendment, he wrote. And the threat of losing valuable evidence for defying the rules is the "driving purpose" behind provisions such as the knock-and-announce requirement.

The court's ruling means that a Detroit man's conviction for drug possession stands, despite the fact that police rushed into his home without knocking. Once inside, they found crack cocaine in Booker Hudson's pockets.

Hudson's attorneys, relying on a line of court decisions over the last decade, said the officers' failure to knock and announce themselves before entering made the evidence they obtained the "fruit" of a "poisonous tree."

That idea is bedrock in Fourth Amendment law, which governs when and how government may search a citizen's home or person. It presumes, most of the time, that any illegal action during a search taints all the evidence that's turned up. It's the reason that confessions that come after a beating aren't any good and that an unreasonable search performed without a warrant can't help convict someone.

Scalia wrote, though, that "the interests protected by the knock-and-announce requirement are quite different." He said the rule was intended to protect police whose unannounced entry might trigger a self-defense instinct by a homeowner, to give citizens the chance to comply with requests for police access and to give homeowners time to "collect" themselves before answering the door.

Those interests don't extend to shielding relevant evidence from government eyes, he wrote.

Breyer said the court's opinion "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." He said separating the manner of entry from the ensuing search "slices the violation too finely." He said the failure to knock and announce wasn't an independent event, but a "factor that renders the search constitutionally defective."

High Court Allows Use Of Evidence Taken In Violation Of Knock Rule (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Prosecutors can use evidence taken in violation of the Fourth Amendment requirement that police knock and announce themselves before entering a home, the Supreme Court ruled.

The 5-4 opinion, by Justice Antonin Scalia, acknowledged that such entries are unconstitutional, but not serious enough to invoke the traditional sanction for unlawful searches: exclusion of the evidence they yield.

The price of applying the so-called exclusionary rule sometimes includes "setting the guilty free and the dangerous at large," Justice Scalia wrote. Other remedies, such as civil damages or internal discipline by a police department, were adequate for violations of "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes."

In a dissent by Justice Stephen Breyer, the court's four liberal-leaning members argued that such remedies largely were illusory, and thus the majority "destroys the strongest legal incentive to comply with the Constitution's knock-and-announce requirement."

Justice Clarence Thomas and President George W. Bush's two appointees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, joined the majority. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the dissent.

The case was argued in January when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was on the court, and reargued after she retired. Justice Anthony Kennedy -- seen as inheriting the court's ideological midpoint from Justice O'Connor -- concurred in the result, but he wrote separately, suggesting stronger remedies might be needed for a "demonstrated pattern of knock-and-announce violations."

The case came from Detroit, where police bearing a warrant to search for drugs and guns waited several seconds after shouting, "Police, search warrant," to enter a suspect's house. Inside, they found what they were looking for. Prosecutors conceded police violated the rule, and the trial judge threw out the evidence. A Michigan appeals court reversed, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court.

Police officers generally are required to give a suspect a chance to voluntarily admit them inside their home before entering and searching it. Justice Scalia explained three purposes behind the knock-and-announce rule: keeping surprised occupants from reflexively attacking intruding police; sparing residents the cost of repairing broken doors; and safeguarding "elements of privacy and dignity."

But the rule "has never protected ... one's interest in preventing the government" from obtaining evidence listed in a warrant, Justice Scalia wrote. Had police obeyed the rule, it might have delayed their entry by several more seconds, but they would have found the evidence anyway.

Zealous enforcement of the knock-and-announce rule would tie courts in knots, he wrote, forcing them to spend hours deciding "how many seconds' wait are too few."

Justice Breyer's dissent accused the majority of abandoning doctrines that had developed since 1914, when the court first imposed the exclusionary rule on federal officers.

The dissent noted many exceptions to the knock-and-announce rule already exist, including when police reasonably suspect that obeying it would expose them to danger or allow suspects to destroy evidence.

(Hudson v. Michigan)

Separately, the justices found a federal appeals court erroneously dismissed a suit by mutual-fund holders who claimed managers facilitated market timing, or the practice in which investors find ways to buy into a mutual fund before the fund's price fully reflects underlying movements of the stocks in that fund, profiting from the discrepancy.

The decision sent the suit back to the state court where it originally was filed -- but under another high-court ruling from March, it likely will be dismissed again.

The Don't-Bother-to-Knock Rule (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday substantially diminished Americans' right to privacy in their own homes. The rule that police officers must "knock and announce" themselves before entering a private home is a venerable one, and a well-established part of Fourth Amendment law. But President Bush's two recent Supreme Court appointments have now provided the votes for a 5-4 decision eviscerating this rule.

This decision should offend anyone, liberal or conservative, who worries about the privacy rights of ordinary Americans.

The case arose out of the search of Booker T. Hudson's home in Detroit in 1998. The police announced themselves but did not knock, and after waiting a few seconds, entered his home and seized drugs and a gun. There is no dispute that the search violated the knock-and-announce rule.

The question in the case was what to do about it. Mr. Hudson wanted the evidence excluded at his trial. That is precisely what should have happened. Since 1914, the Supreme Court has held that, except in rare circumstances, evidence seized in violation of the Constitution cannot be used. The exclusionary rule has sometimes been criticized for allowing criminals to go free just because of police error. But as the court itself recognized in that 1914 case, if this type of evidence were admissible, the Fourth Amendment "might as well be stricken."

The court ruled yesterday that the evidence could be used against Mr. Hudson. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, argued that even if police officers did not have to fear losing a case if they disobeyed the knock-and-announce rule, the subjects of improper searches could still bring civil lawsuits to challenge them. But as the dissenters rightly pointed out, there is little chance that such suits would keep the police in line. Justice Scalia was also far too dismissive of the important privacy rights at stake, which he essentially reduced to "the right not to be intruded upon in one's nightclothes." Justice Stephen Breyer noted in dissent that even a century ago the court recognized that when the police barge into a house unannounced, it is an assault on "the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life."

If Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had stayed on the court, this case might well have come out the other way. For those who worry that Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito will take the court in a radically conservative direction, it is sobering how easily the majority tossed aside a principle that traces back to 13th-century Britain, and a legal doctrine that dates to 1914, to let the government invade people's homes.

Court To Cops: Knock The Door Down (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

IN A DECISION THAT MIGHT HAVE gone the other way if Justice Sandra Day O'Connor hadn't retired, the U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday needlessly gutted a venerable protection for personal privacy. By a 5-4 vote — with Samuel A. Alito Jr., O'Connor's replacement, in the majority — the justices ruled that Detroit police who entered a suspect's home unlawfully would not suffer the usual penalty for an illegal search: exclusion of the evidence at trial.

The court upheld the conviction of Booker T. Hudson, who was arrested after police, armed with a warrant, found drugs and firearms in his apartment. So what was the problem with the search? As the state of Michigan conceded, the police violated a 4th Amendment rule requiring that they make their presence known to the target of the search before rushing in.

This "knock and announce" rule is not a newfangled creation of softheaded liberal judges. Even Justice Antonin Scalia, the author of the majority opinion in this case, conceded that "the common-law principle that law enforcement officers must announce their presence and provide residents an opportunity to open the door is an ancient one." But having identified that principle, Scalia went on to trash it by holding that the evidence the police found could be used against Hudson at trial.

Reaching that conclusion required some heavy-duty legal hair-splitting. The seizure of the evidence, Scalia wrote, did not result from the officers' refusal to announce themselves and wait more than a few seconds for the door to be opened. "Whether that preliminary misstep had occurred or not," Scalia argued, "the police would have executed the warrant they had obtained and would have discovered the gun and drugs inside the house."

Dissenting Justice Stephen Breyer countered persuasively that the question was what the officers actually did. "Although the police might have entered Hudson's home lawfully," Breyer wrote for himself and three colleagues, "they did not in fact do so. Their unlawful behavior inseparably characterizes their actual entry; that entry was a necessary condition of their presence in Hudson's home; and their presence in Hudson's home was a necessary condition of their finding and seizing the evidence."

The dispute between Scalia and Breyer is more than an abstract law school debate. It has ominous real-world consequences. If police feel they needn't announce their presence before executing a warrant, some of them won't — sometimes endangering themselves, sometimes endangering the occupants of the residence they have arrived to search. Scalia's opinion gives the police exactly that sort of blank check by removing the best deterrent to police misconduct: the exclusion of evidence at trial.

Many Americans may shake their heads at the idea that, as the late Justice Benjamin Cardozo once complained, the "criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." Yet holding police accountable protects not only criminals but anyone who might be the target of overreaching or reckless police conduct. One of the officers who served the warrant on Hudson said that, after announcing themselves, police waited about as long as "it took me to go in the door." Is that the way you'd want to be served with a warrant?

A TR 'Nut' Savors His Big Find (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 16, 2006

For 17 years, Robert Goldman policed the art world as a federal prosecutor based in Philadelphia. He helped recover $150 million worth of stolen artifacts - works by Rembrandt and Norman Rockwell, gold Peruvian body armor, an original copy of the Bill of Rights.

But it wasn't until this week that Goldman snagged his white whale, an artifact that disappeared in 1990, shortly after he began working the art-crime beat.

DOJ_NMG_0034973

It was Teddy Roosevelt's priceless Colt revolver, the one the future president carried as he led his famous charge up San Juan Heights during the Spanish-American War. Someone had stolen it from a display case on the grounds of Sagamore Hill National Historic Site in Long Island, N.Y., Roosevelt's home from 1885 until his death in 1919.

"I felt like a kid returning it," said Goldman, now a lawyer in private practice with Fox Rothschild L.L.P. in Philadelphia. "I'm a Roosevelt nut."

To say that Goldman is a TR aficionado is like saying Gov. Rendell likes to snack now and then. The lawyer owns 150 books on Roosevelt and credits the colorful president with "shaping modern America." He also sports a drooping, bushy TR mustache.

"Bob's got what one would call a period look going," said Amy Verone, the curator at the historic site.

Goldman and his former partner, FBI agent Robert Wittman, returned the gun to Cove Neck during a brief ceremony Wednesday. As he posed for pictures with the weapon, the 53-year-old lawyer grinned like a star-struck groupie.

"I felt like a kid; my wits weren't with me while I was there," he said. "I felt a good connection with TR. For me, just the fact that I can help recover something for someone who is my hero or mentor or whatever, it's fabulous. It's history."

The .38-caliber revolver was given to Roosevelt in 1898 by his brother-in-law, a diver who recovered it from the USS Maine, the ship whose sinking sparked the Spanish-American War. Roosevelt carried it up the hill to honor the soldiers who died.

"This revolver is one of the icons one associates with Theodore Roosevelt, along with his Rough Rider uniform and hat," said Greg Marshall, the superintendent at Sagamore Hill.

After the gun was stolen from Sagamore Hill in 1990, Goldman and Wittman tried for years to track it.

"Whenever we'd go to gun shows, we'd ask dealers about it," Goldman said. "We got nothing."

Goldman vowed to find it before he retired this year as a prosecutor. He left the government in April, a few months after the gun was discovered, and two months before its formal return. Goldman said the couple who had the gun won't be prosecuted - or identified - because there's not enough evidence to determine who stole it.

"As investigations go, it turned out that this one wasn't very juicy," he said.

Late last year, out of nowhere, a man from Daytona Beach, Fla., called employees at Sagamore Hill to say he knew how to find the gun.

"We'd had false starts before," said Verone, who recalled speaking with the man. "We weren't sure initially."

The man explained that he was having an affair with a woman whose husband had the Roosevelt weapon. He offered to try to fetch it.

"He had been shown the gun," Verone said. "And he kept saying, 'It doesn't belong to the person who has it. It belongs to Theodore Roosevelt. It belongs to the American people. It belongs at home.' "

Park Service employees called Wittman, and within two hours, he had agents at from the bureau's Daytona Beach office meet the man to recover the gun.

"It was not exactly a rugged investigation," Verone said. "A guy calls you on the phone and gives you a gift. Hey, I'm happy to have the gift."

It was a bit more than a gift, the FBI agent said. "Luck is the result of a lot of preparation that allows you take advantage of situations when they happen," Wittman said.

Goldman agreed. No matter how the case was solved, it seemed perfect that it became his last as a prosecutor.

Ky. Court Rules Inmate Can Be Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brett Barrouquere, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

(AP) - LOUISVILLE, Ky.-The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the mental age of a death row inmate does not prevent the state from executing him.

An attorney for Thomas Clyde Bowling had argued that the inmate had the mental capacity of an 11-year-old when he killed two people in Lexington in 1990, citing testimony from psychologists.

The state high court in Frankfort noted the U.S. Supreme Court's decision last year barring executions for killers who were not at least 18 years old at the time of the crime, but said the ruling did not specifically prohibit putting to death someone with a mental age below that.

"There is simply no language to support such a conclusion," Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in a 5-0 opinion.

Johnstone wrote that there is some validity to the idea put forth by Bowling's attorneys, but that the federal high court intentionally established chronological age, not mental age, as the deciding factor.

Defense attorneys have 20 days to ask for a rehearing from the high court and they said Thursday they would seek one.

Bowling's attorney, David Barron, said he was heartened that the court said the mental age argument had merit.

DOJ_NMG_0034974

"This court recognized this as a valid legal concept that all courts should be concerned about," Barron said.

Vicki Glass, a spokeswoman for Kentucky Attorney General Greg Stumbo, called the ruling "an important step toward carrying out the jury's verdict."

Bowling, 53, also has asked a federal judge to stop his execution on the grounds that he is mentally retarded.

The state supreme court rejected the claim last year, saying they found no conclusive evidence that Bowling was mentally retarded. His IQ has ranged from the mid-60s to mid-70s in different tests.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2002 bars execution of the mentally retarded as unconstitutionally cruel, but left states to decided how to ensure that mentally retarded people are not executed.

In a case still under review by the Kentucky Supreme Court, Bowling also has challenged the legality of lethal injection.

Bowling originally was scheduled to be executed in November 2004 for shooting Lexington residents Eddie and Tina Earley outside their dry cleaning business. Their 2-year-old son also was shot in the assault but survived.

The End Of Innocence (NYT)

By David R. Dow

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Houston

EARLIER this week, the Supreme Court decided, in a 5-to-3 opinion, that a Tennessee prison inmate named Paul G. House was entitled to prove he did not commit the crime for which he was sent to death row. On the same day, I received a letter from Centurion Ministries, which argued for more than a decade that a Virginia man named Roger K. Coleman had not committed the crime for which he was executed in 1992. The letter admitted that Centurion had been wrong.

These cases have something in common: they pivot on the question of innocence. For too many years now, though, death penalty opponents have seized on the nightmare of executing an innocent man as a tactic to erode support for capital punishment in America.

Innocence is a distraction. Most people on death row are like Roger Coleman, not Paul House, which is to say that most people on death row did what the state said they did. But that does not mean they should be executed.

Focusing on innocence forces abolitionists into silence when a cause célèbre turns out to be guilty. When the DNA testing ordered by Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia proved that Mr. Coleman was a murderer, and a good liar besides, abolitionists wrung their hands about how to respond. They seemed sorry that he had been guilty after all.

I, too, am a death penalty opponent, but I was happy to learn that Mr. Coleman was a murderer. I was happy that the prosecutors would not have to live with the guilt of knowing that they sent an innocent man to death row.

The day before the DNA results were reported in the Coleman case last January, the Supreme Court heard oral arguments in the Paul House case. In Mr. House's case, the DNA testing has already been done, and it tends to suggest that he is indeed innocent. During oral arguments, however, Justice Antonin Scalia (who was one of the three dissenters when the court decided the case this week) argued that disputes over factual findings in a case can't be endlessly rehashed.

He is certainly right about that. As Justice Scalia has said elsewhere, of course we are going to execute innocent people if we have the death penalty. The criminal justice system is made up of human beings, and fallible beings make mistakes.

But perhaps that is a price society is willing to pay. If the death penalty is worth having, it might still be worth having, despite the occasional loss of innocent life. Paul House might be innocent, but how long will we keep death row inmates alive, waiting to find out?

In Mr. Coleman's case, the Virginia Supreme Court did not address the arguments that he had raised in his appeal, because his lawyer had filed the papers one day late. When the case got to the United States Supreme Court, the court, in an opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, began its analysis by saying, "This is a case about federalism."

The case did have something to do with the relationship between the Supreme Court and Virginia's highest court. But is that what the case was really about? Mr. Coleman was saying that his trial lawyer had been incompetent, and that the Virginia courts were refusing to address the question of whether his trial lawyer had been incompetent because his appellate lawyer had filed the appeal a day late.

Federalism might be a plot line in this story, but it hardly seems to be the major issue. When the Supreme Court brushed aside Mr. Coleman's appeal 15 years ago, the justices said that a death row inmate cannot complain when his lawyer misses a filing deadline, because the lawyer is the agent of the client, and clients are responsible for the failings of their agents.

As a result of this syllogism, my client Johnny Joe Martinez was executed in 2002, because his court-appointed appellate lawyer neglected to file a proper appeal — a mistake he freely admitted to, attributing it to inexperience. When the Martinez case reached the federal courts, those courts, invoking the Coleman decision, said too bad for Mr. Martinez; the mistake of his lawyer was attributable to him. I could go on with other examples.

Of the 50 or so death row inmates I have represented, I have serious doubts about the guilt of three or four — that is, 6 to 8 percent, about what scholars estimate to be the percentage of innocent people on death row.

In 98 percent of the cases, however, in 49 out of 50, there were appalling violations of legal principles: prosecutors struck jurors based on their race; the police hid or manufactured evidence; prosecutors reached secret deals with jailhouse snitches; lab analysts misrepresented forensic results. Most of the cases do not involve bogus claims of innocence, like the one that swirled for 15 years around Roger Coleman, but the government corruption that the federal courts overlook so that the states can go about their business of executing.

The House case will make it hard for abolitionists to shift their focus from the question of innocence, but that is what they ought to do. They ought to focus on the far more pervasive problem: that the machinery of death in America is lawless, and in carrying out death sentences, we violate our legal principles nearly all of the time.

VA Data Theft Not Linked To Other Crimes (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, June 15, 2006

Police investigating the theft of private data on 26.5 million veterans and military troops said Thursday they have no evidence the crime is related to other burglaries in which computers were resold after the hard drives were erased.

Police said they still believe the May 3 burglary was random and that thieves were not aware of the data when they stole a personal laptop and external hard drive from a Veterans Affairs employee's Aspen Hill, Md., home.

Last week, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress that the VA remained hopeful that the May 3 burglary was a random theft, noting there had been no evidence any of the information had been used for identity theft.

Explaining police's theory in the case, Nicholson said: "They believe that these were young burglars whose goal was to get computers and computer peripheral equipment. And from other houses, like they did this house, they took a laptop and hard drive, and overlooked other valuable or semi-valuable things."

"They further think that their M.O. is to take these things, clean them up — actually erase them — and then fence them into a market for college campuses and high schools," he said.

But on Thursday, police in Montgomery County, Md., investigating the theft said that was not necessarily the case.

"It would be wrong to think that this is the only theory being considered," said spokeswoman Lucille Bauer. "We still believe there is more of a chance this was a random burglary, but we have no evidence to link this to other cases at this time."

Veterans groups have criticized the VA for a three-week delay in publicizing the May 3 burglary. The VA disclosed the burglary May 22, saying it involved the names, birth dates and Social Security numbers — and in some cases, disability codes — of veterans discharged since 1975.

Since then, it has also acknowledged that phone numbers and addresses of many of those veterans, as well as personal data for 2.2 million active-duty military, Guard and Reserve personnel, also may have been included.

On Thursday, Maryland police began distributing flyers in Aspen Hill offering a $50,000 reward for information related to the stolen Hewlett-Packard laptop and external drive. The FBI, which is also investigating, has noted that "unless the equipment is recovered, veterans will never be certain their personal information is safe."

People are asked to call 1-800-CALL-FBI or 1-866-411-TIPS if anyone purchased after May 3 a secondhand HP Pavilion Notebook Laptop, which it said could be identified as either model number zv5360us or 5300 series, or a HP External Personal Media Drive.

Investigators said it is possible the two items were sold separately. Those who turn in the equipment anonymously also may become eligible for the reward.

Malvo Claims 4 Other Shootings, Source Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Lee Boyd Malvo told law enforcement officials this spring that he and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad are responsible for four shootings across the country that have not been publicly attributed to them, a source familiar with the case said.

A second source confirmed that investigators have received information implicating the snipers in those shootings, which claimed the lives of two men and wounded two others in the months before the October 2002 slayings that terrorized the Washington region. The sources declined to speak for attribution because of the sensitivity of the information.

Malvo was interviewed extensively by law enforcement officials in preparation for his testimony at Muhammad's trial last month in Maryland.

It is unclear to what degree, if any, authorities have corroborated Malvo's new claims. He has provided conflicting accounts of shootings in the past and testified last month that he lied to investigators after he and Muhammad were arrested.

The claims bring the list of confirmed and suspected sniper shootings to 27, including 17 homicides, and add two states to the list of jurisdictions that could file charges against Muhammad and Malvo.

The first previously undisclosed homicide victim was a man shot in California in February or March 2002. The second was a 37-year-old Texas man shot in the head from a distance May 27 in a sparsely populated area of Denton, about 40 miles northwest of Dallas.

The two survivors are a 76-year-old Tucson man shot May 18, 2002, at a golf course in west-central Florida and a 54-year-old Louisiana man robbed and shot Aug. 1, 2002, after leaving a shopping mall in Hammond, about 45 miles east of Baton Rouge.

Malvo also said recently that the pair was involved in five homicides and two nonfatal shootings outside the Washington area to which they had previously been linked by varying amounts of physical and circumstantial evidence.

These are the slayings of Keenya Cook, 21, of Tacoma, Wash.; Jerry Ray Taylor, 60, of Tucson; Million A. Woldemariam, 41, of Atlanta; Claudine Lee Parker, 52, of Montgomery, Ala.; and Hong Im Ballenger, 45, of Baton Rouge. The survivors are Kellie Adams, 27, of Montgomery; and Wright Williams Jr., 55, of Baton Rouge.

Unlike most of the Washington area slayings, which targeted random victims shot from afar with a powerful rifle, some of the earlier shootings were conducted at close range with a .22-caliber handgun.

In September and October 2002, the snipers committed 10 homicides and wounded six people in the Washington area. Muhammad has been convicted of murder in Virginia and Maryland for his role in the sniper shootings and is awaiting execution in Virginia. Malvo was convicted of murder in Virginia, where he was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole, and has agreed to plead guilty to six counts of first-degree murder in the Maryland slayings. He took the stand against Muhammad in Maryland and testified that the snipers sought to kill more people than they did. He also testified that he expected nothing in exchange for his cooperation.

Malvo's attorneys, William Brennan and Timothy J. Sullivan, declined to comment on the information Malvo shared with law enforcement in recent months. "We are fully aware of the universe of Mr. Malvo's potential criminal problems," they said in a statement yesterday. "We have received several inquiries from other jurisdictions concerning possible investigations."

Muhammad has consistently claimed his innocence. When he defended himself at his recent trial in Montgomery County, he argued that he was framed by authorities.

Malvo told investigators that the California victim was shot at close range in Los Angeles during a robbery, the first source said. The victim's identity, the date of the shooting and other details could not be determined.

Malvo also provided general information about the victims, locations and dates in the other cases, the source said.

In one case that matches Malvo's claim, Albert Michalczyk, a retired contractor from Tucson, was shot while playing golf at Glen Oaks Golf Course in Clearwater, Fla., on May 18 while visiting his daughter.

Standing at the course's seventh hole, he heard a loud bang that the dozens of golfers in the area initially mistook for a firecracker. In fact, it was a bullet that had struck him on the upper-right side of the chest.

"I was really fortunate that it went right through my right breast," Michalczyk said in an interview. "If I hadn't been standing that way, I wouldn't be here today."

Michalczyk said the shooting still mystifies him.

"The one who was devastated was my poor grandson," he said. "He's 9 years old."

Michalczyk said he's no longer haunted by the shooting but remains intrigued.

"I've been thinking about it," he said. "I'd like to know who did it."

Clearwater police could not be reached for comment late yesterday. Michalczyk said he considers Malvo and Muhammad suspects because Malvo's mother lived at the time in Fort Myers, Fla., which is a two-hour drive from Clearwater.

Michalczyk didn't stay long at the hospital. When he was discharged, a doctor told him he was a "lucky guy."

"You should go buy yourself a lottery ticket," the doctor told him.

Malvo also provided information that matches the killing of landscaper Billy Gene Dillon in Texas. According to police reports and interviews, Dillon was working on a yard on a quiet street in unincorporated Denton County the morning of May 27, which was Memorial Day in 2002. It was a warm day, and a storm was brewing nearby.

He was wearing blue jeans and brown boots and had 50 cents in his pocket.

About 10:15 a.m., a bullet pierced the left side of his head, blasted through his brain and exited through the right side of the skull. The high-velocity gunshot wound killed him instantly.

At 10:27 a.m., Don Lovelace, the owner of the house where Dillon was working, saw the body and dialed 911.

"Caller just pulled up and found a male in front of his [residence] with severe injuries to the head and can not confirm if he is [conscious] or [breathing]," wrote the Denton 911 dispatcher who answered the call.

The homicide was perplexing to investigators at the Denton County Sheriff's Office, which generally tackles no more than a dozen homicides a year.

"The investigation didn't uncover anyone who was mad at him," said Tom Reedy, a spokesman for the sheriff's office.

Reedy said Dillon's mother, with whom he lived, still periodically calls investigators to ask whether they have any leads.

"We were very surprised," Lovelace said in an interview. "We're kind of out in the country. We walk up and down the road. We were just shocked."

After months of chasing leads, Denton investigators in November sent ballistics evidence recovered at the scene to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Washington, which was analyzing ballistics evidence from the sniper scenes. Authorities in Texas later said they had been unable to link the homicide to the snipers.

Informed by a reporter of Malvo's new claim, Reedy said he would notify the sheriff of the information.

The fourth claim made by Malvo matches the shooting of John C. Gaeta, 54, in Hammond, La.

On Aug. 1, 2002, Gaeta walked out of a Sears store at a mall in Hammond. He arrived roughly 20 minutes before 9 p.m. -- closing time -- and walked back to his 2001 Chevrolet pickup truck only to find that one of his tires had been slashed. As he began to change the tire, two black men approached him, Gaeta said in a recent interview.

"One of them said, 'What time does the mall close?' or something to that effect," Gaeta said. "Then he said, 'Looks like you have a flat tire,' and he kind of laughed about it."

The men offered to help him, but Gaeta, suspicious of their demeanor, declined. Minutes later, the younger and shorter of the two returned. Their eyes locked for an instant. Then Gaeta saw the man, standing a few feet away, point a handgun to his head.

"I just figured I was going to be dead," Gaeta said. "You see a gun pointed to your head, and you say this is it. You think about family, religion, a whole bunch of things. You can't believe this is happening to you. When you see a gun pointed to your head, you think you're never going to wake up again."

The shot sliced into the right side of his neck, tore through layers of muscle and exited about 1 1/2 inches from his spinal cord. Gaeta said he jumped to the ground and pretended to be dead. The shooter took his wallet out of his pants. He had $40 on him.

Months after being shot, Gaeta got an unexpected visit from detectives from Fairfax County. He was shown a photograph of Malvo. He said he told them that Malvo resembled the shooter but that he couldn't say so conclusively.

"It was dark, and it happened so fast," Gaeta said.

Hammond police could not be reached late yesterday.

Malvo did not describe these shootings during his testimony, but there were indications that his testimony was being strictly limited. Montgomery Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan noted at one point that Malvo did not "intend to voluntarily testify about any other potential charges" beyond the shootings in October 2002. And attorney Brennan said Malvo would assert his right to remain silent "on all questions" outside of the shootings in Maryland and Virginia.

As she questioned Malvo in court May 24, Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree alluded to "other matters" that he had discussed with authorities during meetings in recent weeks, matters she said he did not testify about.

"And in fact, that was a lot of the time we spent, wasn't it?" she said.

"Yes."

Muhammad mentioned Denton during his closing argument, saying investigators in the sniper case reviewed ballistics evidence from that shooting. Muhammad twice misstated the date of the shooting in a confused effort to suggest that the sniper attacks continued after he and Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002.

"Denton Texas -- that particular shooting was May 27, '03. Why would people in Texas -- people they got some smart people in Texas -- why would people in Texas send around to this area pertaining to a shooting that happened . . ?"

"Your honor, he's misstating the evidence," Winfree interrupted.

The objection was sustained, but Muhammad continued on the same topic moments later. "Denton, Texas -- that was November 18, that was after Muhammad was arrested," he said.

"Your honor, he's mixing dates of reports with dates of incidents," Winfree said, leading the judge to tell Muhammad to move on.

Offender Bill To Get Nod From Governor (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

DOJ_NMG_0034978

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said that he would sign legislation passed in the predawn hours yesterday that would enhance the monitoring of convicted sex offenders and impose mandatory minimum sentences for those who prey on minors.

The Maryland House of Delegates gave final approval to the bill at 4:36 a.m. yesterday on a vote of 126 to 0. The Senate had voted 39 to 5 for the bill just minutes earlier.

In addition to Ehrlich (R), Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D) and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) made the legislation a priority during the regular session of the General Assembly, which ended in April. But disagreement over mandatory jail terms prevented the bill from reaching a final vote.

Discontent over skyrocketing electricity costs forced lawmakers back to Annapolis for a rare special session Wednesday, when the offender issue was revived.

Lengthy negotiations produced 36 pages of amendments and changes, but when the bill was finally passed, backers said it was a strong new law aimed largely at better identifying and tracking convicted child sex offenders after their release from jail.

"The sexual predator package is plenty good enough to sign," Ehrlich said. "It will be signed."

Curran, who has announced plans to retire after two decades, said the decision to revive the measure was an unexpected relief, because he believes that the system in place has been inadequate.

"We've tried for six years to get this done," Curran said. "A lot of people have had deep concerns about this issue."

The legislation passed yesterday provides for more stringent monitoring of released offenders and gives police the authority to notify a broader list of community leaders when an offender moves into a neighborhood.

Offenders would be required to check in with police more frequently and regularly update their photographs for an online database.

It also calls for a team, which includes a mental health professional, to evaluate sex offenders before they are released and to determine appropriate monitoring methods, including the option of a Global Positioning System chip in an ankle bracelet.

"That will be critical," said Lisae C. Jordan, legislative counsel for the Maryland Coalition Against Sexual Assault Inc.

The second component, which prompted the most strenuous debate, dealt with sentencing rules. Republican lawmakers led the charge for "nonsuspendable, nonparolable, mandatory 25-year sentences" for those who commit violent sex crimes against children 13 or younger.

Some Democrats, however, raised concerns about the proposal, known as "Jessica's Law" because it is modeled on a Florida law passed after a 9-year-old girl was killed by a convicted sex offender.

"I think mandatory minimum sentences are a mistake," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery). "There is no one-size-fits-all justice." Frosh noted that certain crimes punishable by the stiff sentences could inadvertently apply in circumstances where both offenders are teenagers and are engaged in consensual acts. The eventual compromise excluded those cases.

Del. Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), one of the most strident advocates for mandatory minimums, said early yesterday that the compromise was a victory. "It's a big, big step forward for our kids," he said.

Developments Bar Sex Offenders (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Private housing developers are joining a surging number of communities that are telling convicted sex offenders who need a place to live: “Not in my backyard.”

A Texas-based company, I&S Investment Group, is breaking ground this summer on a 154-lot development in Lenexa, Kan., that will bar registered sex offenders. If someone is convicted of a sex crime while living there, the subdivision will fine the person $1,500 daily until he or she moves. The group has sold out all 150 lots in its first such development in Lubbock, Texas, begun 10 months ago, and plans to offer 250 more lots there this fall.

“The sex offender deal has improved demand. It's probably increased our sales three to four times,” says I&S partner Clayton Isom, 24. “We're fighting sex offenders head on.”

Another Texan, Taylor Goodman, today launched a website, Blockwatcher.com, listing homes for sale that have no registered sex offenders living within a half-mile radius. He says only 20% of available homes will qualify.

“These guys are just everywhere,” Goodman says of roughly 567,000 sex offenders registered nationwide. The site carries disclaimers, however, noting that thousands of offenders haven't registered and thousands more have listed phony addresses.

The new private efforts complement an accelerating push by states and cities to bar sex offenders from living near schools or playgrounds. Hundreds of cities, including more than a dozen this year alone, have approved such ordinances, some of which block out entire downtowns.

DOJ_NMG_0034979

At least 15 states have enacted such laws, including three (Nebraska, Mississippi and South Dakota) that did so for the first time this year and two (Georgia and Indiana) that expanded prior restrictions. Others, including California and Pennsylvania, restrict offenders on parole or probation. The restrictions have increased despite U.S. data showing sex crimes against children have decreased in the last decade.

"It's grown out of public demand" fueled by media coverage of high-profile cases, says Blake Harrison, analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "Nobody wants them (sex offenders) in their backyard."

Several restrictions on where sex offenders can live, including Iowa's statewide law, have been upheld in court.

Banning sex offenders from private property does not violate the Fair Housing Act, but restrictions by states and cities are worrisome, says Brett Shirk of the American Civil Liberties Union of Kansas & Western Missouri.

"Everybody wants a sex-offender-free neighborhood, but it is an unfortunate fact, they are going to live somewhere," he says. "What's going to happen is they're going to go underground and create a nightmare for law enforcement."

The restrictions may give a false sense of security, because they do not bar offenders from traveling into a prohibited area, says Carolyn Atwell-Davis of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children. The private group prefers better tracking of offenders, workplace restrictions and increased penalties for non-registration.

The bans focus on strangers, but parents need to understand that 80% of offenders know their victims, says John La Fond, author of Preventing Sexual Violence: How Society Should Cope With Sex Offenders.

He says as more communities impose restrictions, neighboring ones will pass copycat laws for their own protection.

Honeywell Agrees To Pay U.S. $2.6M To Settle False Claims Charges (AP)

By Jeffrey Gold

AP, June 16, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. - Honeywell International Inc. has paid the federal government $2.625 million to settle charges it failed to properly test packaging for sensitive parts used by the Defense Department and NASA, authorities said Thursday.

Fifteen percent of the settlement, or $393,750, went to a California company and one of its executives, who brought a whistleblower lawsuit several years ago against Morris Township-based Honeywell.

Honeywell was accused of violating the False Claims Act over testing of electrostatic protective metallic sheets that were to package more than 186,000 sensitive parts, the Justice Department said.

A Justice spokesman, Charles Miller, said he could not comment on the nature of the parts but said none were damaged because of the packaging.

The lawsuit charged that Honeywell knowingly made and sold sheets that did not meet military specifications. Honeywell disputed the allegations, said court papers unsealed with the settlement.

Messages seeking comment from Honeywell were not immediately returned Thursday after the U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement.

The deal was approved May 22 by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise in Newark.

Caltex Plastics, of Vernon, Calif., was a purchaser of Honeywell sheets, which it would make into bags and other products, said its lawyer, Robert G. Klein.

During the course of a prior lawsuit between the two companies, Caltex and its vice president, Jim Higgs, determined that Honeywell was selling goods to the military that had not gone through proper testing, Klein said.

That prompted the whistleblower lawsuit, which was joined by the federal government.

Shares of Honeywell, which have been trading in a 52-week range of $32.68 to $44.48 per share, rose 91 cents, or 2.4 percent, to close at $38.93 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Feds: NJ Hospital Co. To Pay $265M In Medicare Billing Settlement (SDUT/AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 16, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. – New Jersey's largest health care provider will pay $265 million to settle federal charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars by inflating charges for seriously ill patients, prosecutors said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0034980

The agreement between prosecutors and Saint Barnabas Health Care System, which operates nine hospitals and a behavioral treatment center in New Jersey, concerns a program Medicare provides to supplement its normal payments.

Prosecutors allege that between October 1995 and August 2003, Saint Barnabas hospitals deliberately inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care under the Medicare program, the federal health care insurance program for people aged 65 and over, and for the disabled. It is designed to increase reimbursements to hospitals that care for people with medical complications.

As part of the settlement, under which Saint Barnabas did not admit wrongdoing, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

In a statement, Michael Slusarz, vice president for public relations and marketing at Saint Barnabas, said the company cooperated with the government during the inquiry.

"This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients," he said. "We are pleased this matter is now behind us and look forward to continuing to serve the citizens of New Jersey."

Authorities said it is the first settlement involving Medicare's supplemental reimbursement program, but added that others are pending around the country.

"Saint Barnabas was a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling," said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the Newark FBI office. "If he were alive today, he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name."

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ralph Marra Jr. said the hospital system "overreached" by padding bills submitted to the government.

The problem occurred when the hospitals started tacking on extra charges, such as the cost of nursing, housecleaning and other routine expenses, making a patient's treatment appear more costly than it actually was, authorities said.

"Saint Barnabas, in a very systematic way, gamed the system and exploited loopholes in the reimbursement system to obtain more money than they were entitled to," Marra said.

He added no hospital employee derived a personal financial benefit from the overpayments.

Government prosecutors said they became aware of the allegations in 2002 when three whistleblowers filed sealed lawsuits alleging that Saint Barnabas was overcharging Medicare. Prosecutors would not say how the whistleblowers knew about what was going on, and said the amount of the settlement they would be entitled to under federal law has not yet been determined. But payments usually range from between 15 to 25 percent of the settlement, authorities said.

Although Marra said the amount of wrongful payments exceeded $500 million, the government took into account the corporation's ability to pay in calculating a settlement amount.

"As the largest health care organization in the state, we did not want to put them out of business," he said.

Marra said such activity is "not unique" to Saint Barnabas, but he would not say whether other hospitals in New Jersey are under investigation for similar overcharging.

The corporation operates Saint Barnabas Behavioral Health Center in Toms River and nine hospitals in the state: St. Barnabas in Livingston; Clara Maass, with campuses in Belleville and Kearny; Newark Beth Israel Medical Center; Children's Hospital in Newark; Union Hospital; Monmouth Medical Center in Long Branch; Kimball Medical Center in Lakewood; Community Medical Center in Toms River.

Saint Barnabas To Settle Fraud Charges (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, June 16, 2006

Hospital network to pay feds $265 million for 8 years of alleged Medicare bilk

Saint Barnabas Health Care System, New Jersey's largest medical network, will pay a record $265 million to settle charges that it bilked the government by inflating costs on tens of thousands of Medicare claims.

The settlement, announced yesterday by federal prosecutors in Newark, represented a first-of-its-kind agreement for a form of health care fraud that has been largely invisible to patients but has cost taxpayers billions of dollars in the past decade.

The agreement spares Saint Barnabas or its officers from criminal charges but requires the West Orange-based hospital system to enter into a corporate integrity agreement, appoint a compliance officer and permit regular monitoring of its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Between 1995 and 2003, prosecutors said, the network's nine hospitals filed tens of thousands of inflated claims for reimbursement of the costliest treatments. Patients under such care are called "outliers" because their needs stretch beyond typical parameters of Medicare definitions.

DOJ_NMG_0034981

The government more than a decade ago agreed to outlier payments to prevent hospitals from turning away the neediest patients. But rampant abuse has led to a wave of new investigations.

Saint Barnabas, for instance, collected more than $500 million in Medicare outlier payments that it didn't deserve, investigators said.

"Saint Barnabas, in a very systematic way, gamed the system and exploited loopholes in this reimbursement procedure," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ralph Marra said. "They were caught -- we are getting them to pay the money back."

NATIONAL MODEL

Seven government agencies and departments participated in the negotiations, and the result could be used as a national model for settlements with hospital networks, Marra said. He declined to say if other investigations or deals are looming.

A four-paragraph statement released by Saint Barnabas' public relations office said the chain was "pleased to have resolved an outstanding inquiry" into its billing practices. In the agreement, the hospital system denied any wrongdoing or liability.

The statement from spokesman Michael Slusarz also said the arrangement protected Saint Barnabas' financial standing, but one investor service warned yesterday that the news could prompt a downgrade on its debt rating.

The payments will be spread over six years. The first $45 million check is due July 1.

With 5,000 doctors and more than 22,000 employees, Saint Barnabas is the state's second-largest private employer. It treats more than 2 million people each year at facilities in Livingston, Belleville, Toms River, Newark, Lakewood, Long Branch, Wayne, West Orange and Union.

The investigation stemmed from two whistleblower lawsuits filed under seal in Pennsylvania and New Jersey since 2002 and only partially unsealed yesterday. The three plaintiffs in those cases are expected to share as much as 25 percent of the payout, or up to $66 million.

One is James T. Monahan, a Little Silver resident and former chief executive at the now-defunct Memorial Medical Center in South Amboy. His attorney, Marc Raspanti, said Monahan hoped his efforts "will lead to real change in the hospitals' outlier system."

GAMING THE SYSTEM

Outlier payments are easy to manipulate because they tend to be complicated and subjective, prosecutors said.

Under typical Medicare rules, procedures such as an appendectomy generate a flat-fee reimbursement. But if the patient is elderly and has chronic conditions or other diseases, his or her hospitalization could last weeks. By claiming that patient as an outlier and inflating the costs of that treatment, hospitals ensured themselves a higher Medicare payment that often went unchecked.

Outlier costs are supposed to hover between 5 and 6 percent of total Medicare payouts to hospitals nationally, but have crept into the double digits. Congress moved to tighten loopholes in the regulations three years ago, but the scope of the fraud is just becoming apparent.

"This was big-time looting," said Patrick Burns, a spokesman for Taxpayers Against Fraud in Washington, D.C., a consumer advocacy group. "This was fraud calculated by MBAs."

Burns predicted that more hospitals in New Jersey and across the country will become entangled in criminal or civil cases over outlier payments. "This is the edge of the wedge," he said.

Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare, the nation's second-largest hospital system, has agreed to repay $215 million to investors who sued over its mishandling of outlier payments.

In New Jersey, Saint Barnabas was the state's largest Medicare biller. Between 1995 and 2003, the company collected $4.l billion in Medicare receipts, although it is unclear what portion of the money stemmed from outliers.

Only parts of Monahan's lawsuit were unsealed. It describes him as a financial management consultant to the hospital industry, but doesn't explain how he learned of the fraud at Saint Barnabas. It recounted a 1999 or 2000 meeting of Saint Barnabas officials where at least one executive stated that the network's "corporate goals" included maximizing outlier payments.

DIFFERENT RATES

Between 1998 and 2001, he alleged, the hospitals' outlier costs were more than 15 percent of its total Medicare claims, or at least three times the preferred level. Among the ways it achieved that, he alleged, was by charging higher rates for Medicare patients than for non-Medicare patients.

"Indeed, the sole reason the defendant hospitals inflated charges to Medicare and other federal government agencies was to obtain outlier payments to which they were not legally entitled," the lawsuit claimed.

His lawsuit appears to name many other hospitals as defendants, but those names remain under seal and prosecutors would not discuss them.

DOJ_NMG_0034982

The lawsuit, and a related one filed in Philadelphia, triggered a criminal investigation by the FBI, the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services, and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. Yesterday's settlement ends those lawsuits.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stuart Minkowitz, one of the prosecutors on the case, said Monahan and the Pennsylvania plaintiffs, Peter Salvatori and Sara Iverson, are likely to share between 15 and 25 percent of the settlement, but that the government has yet to decide how large the payout will be.

The agreement was unrelated to a separate $3.8 million Medicare overbilling settlement that Saint Barnabas reached last December with prosecutors, or to other similar cases involving the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey or Cathedral Healthcare Systems.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie recused himself from the case because his family foundation has donated to Saint Barnabas, his office said.

Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark division, noted that Saint Barnabas was "a man who gave away all his worldly goods to follow a higher calling."

"If he was alive today," Wiser said, "he would surely be ashamed at what has been done in his name."

Hospital Chain To Pay $265M To Settle Whistleblower Suits (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, June 16, 2006

A New Jersey hospital chain will pay $265 million to settle a pair of whistleblower lawsuits that claimed it had systematically inflated charges to Medicare patients in order to obtain enhanced reimbursements, Justice Department lawyers said Thursday.

According to court papers, the massive settlement by Saint Barnabas Corp. -- the largest health care system in New Jersey and second largest employer in the state -- could be just the first in a wave because numerous other unidentified hospitals are apparently facing similar accusations.

The settlement could also lead to huge rewards for the three whistleblowers, who are represented by Philadelphia attorneys Peter F. Vaira and John E. Riley of Vaira & Riley, and Marc S. Raspanti of Miller Alfano & Raspanti.

In the suits, the whistleblowers claimed Saint Barnabas was abusing a Medicare provision that provides for supplemental payments for unusually expensive cases, referred to as "outliers."

Justice Department lawyers said yesterday that between October 1995 and August 2003, the nine hospitals operated by West Orange, N.J.-based Saint Barnabas "purposefully inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care to make these cases appear more costly than they actually were."

Whistleblower lawsuits, also known as qui tam actions, allege claims under the False Claims Act. Initially, such cases are filed under seal and immediately referred to the local U.S. Attorney in order to give the Justice Department the option of pursuing the case. The two suits that led to Thursday's settlement were only partially unsealed, suggesting that other hospitals may also have been named as defendants.

A redacted copy of one of the lawsuits, unsealed by U.S. District Judge Juan R. Sanchez, shows that the identities of numerous additional defendants have been blacked out. Sanchez ordered that the original version of the suit must remain under seal.

In a press release, Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler, head of the Justice Department's Civil Division, said, "Today's settlement demonstrates the United States' determination to make sure health care providers do not overcharge the Medicare program."

In the settlement, Saint Barnabas did not admit to any wrongdoing, but it entered into a "corporate integrity agreement" in which it promised to take a series of steps to ensure compliance with Medicare regulations and policies in the future.

Vaira and Riley filed suit in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia on behalf of two whistleblowers, Peter Salvatori and Sara C. Iverson.

Raspanti filed a similar suit in U.S. District Court in New Jersey on behalf of James T. Monahan.

Both suits were filed in November 2002 and apparently sparked a massive federal investigation involving both the Philadelphia and New Jersey U.S. Attorney's offices; the Justice Department's Civil Division in Washington, D.C.; the FBI; the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Inspector General; the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; and the U.S. Postal inspectors.

Riley declined to comment on the settlement, saying he was unsure whether or not court documents had yet been unsealed. Raspanti was out of town and could not be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0034983

Justice Department lawyers also had no comment on the size of the reward that will be paid to the whistleblowers.

The settlement agreement filed in court yesterday specifically leaves the issue of the rewards for another day.

"Nothing in this agreement is intended to address any [whistleblower's] entitlement to a share of the settlement amount or the validity of either of the civil actions," the settlement says.

Sometimes the issue of a whistleblower's reward can lead to protracted litigation. In the late 1990s, when SmithKline Beecham paid $325 million to settle a trio of whistleblower suits, Justice Department lawyers argued that no rewards should be paid since all of the information provided by the whistleblowers was already public.

But Senior U.S. District Judge Donald W. VanArtsdalen rejected the government's argument and awarded $42 million to the three whistleblowers.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later overturned the awards and ordered VanArtsdalen to take another look at whether any of the three was truly an "original source."

VanArtsdalen later ruled that only one of the three should get any money, saying that two of the three were "original sources," but that only one, Robert Merena, had the right to a reward since his lawsuit was the first filed.

The suits involved allegations that SmithKline Beecham Clinical Laboratories and several other medical laboratories had adopted a scheme that allowed them to bill the federal government for unauthorized and unnecessary laboratory tests.

In his September 2000 decision, VanArtsdalen awarded Merena more than $24 million -- a 10 percent cut of the portion of the settlement to which his information led.

Merena, who was represented by Raspanti, ultimately garnered nearly $37 million for his whistleblowing efforts because on six other claims for which the government agreed Merena deserved an award, he was paid $11 million and VanArtsdalen added another $1.9 million.

But VanArtsdalen ruled that another former SmithKline employee, Charles Robinson Jr., and his lawyer, Glenn Grossenbacher, who had assisted him in blowing the whistle, were not entitled to any reward due to the strict "first to file" rule in the False Claims Act.

Health Care Group To Repay $265 Million To Medicare (NYT)

By Ronald L. Smothers

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

NEWARK, June 15 — St. Barnabas Health Care System, the state's largest private hospital network, has agreed to reimburse Medicare $265 million to settle charges that it overbilled the federal program over an eight-year period.

The out-of-court settlement — which grew out of whistle-blower lawsuits filed by a hospital consultant in Little Silver, N.J., a Pennsylvania hospital administrator and a third person — also stipulated that St. Barnabas must accept an outside monitor to supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Federal prosecutors had charged that from October 1995 to August 2003, St. Barnabas deliberately inflated charges under a Medicare program intended to increase reimbursements to hospitals that care for patients with medical complications. The prosecutors speculated that, had their investigation continued, the overcharges could have come to half a billion dollars.

St. Barnabas officials said they welcomed a resolution to the federal inquiry, and the United States attorney's office here emphasized that the settlement was not an admission of guilt to any criminal charges.

But federal investigators accused the hospital network of "gaming the system and exploiting loopholes" to increase its revenues. "St. Barnabas was a man who gave up his worldly wealth to help others," said Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office here. "If he were alive today he would be ashamed."

In a statement Michael Slusarz, a vice president and spokesman for the hospital operator, said in part: "This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients."

Ralph J. Marra Jr., the first assistant United States attorney for New Jersey, said the terms of the settlement — repaying the federal government in six yearly installments and agreeing to the monitor — were designed to keep the hospital, the state's second largest private employer, from going out of business.

"The government investigators in our office believed that the overbilling could have been quite a bit higher," Mr. Marra said in a news conference at the United States attorney's office here on Thursday. "But at some point we made a decision to go the route of civil settlement rather than criminal charges. We do not want to put them out of business, and so their ability to pay was a consideration in the settlement."

The inflated charges involved the complex rules under the Medicare system for reimbursement to hospitals providing treatment that lies outside of federally set standard payments for various procedures and normal hospital costs.

Gary Heuer, a lawyer with the inspector general's office of the federal Department of Health and Human Services, which administers Medicare, said that the payment mechanism recognizes that in some cases complications require longer hospital stays and additional procedures, but that the program St. Barnabas was accused of exploiting was devised to give hospitals "the incentive to treat inpatients whose care requires unusually high costs."

Federal investigators said that although St. Barnabas had been "on our radar screen" for possible excessive claims, two whistle-blower lawsuits filed in 2002 more sharply focused their investigation on the reimbursement process. Under federal law, the whistle-blowers are entitled to 15 percent to 25 percent of the value of the settlement, said Mr. Marra.

Court papers identified the whistle-blowers as John T. Monahan of Little Silver, who was described as the head of a firm that provides financial management consulting services to the hospital industry; Sara C. Iveson, the executive director of Barnes-Kasson Hospital in Susquehanna, Pa.; and Peter Salvatori, a Pennsylvania resident. Mr. Monahan and Ms. Iveson did not respond to telephone messages seeking comment, and further information was not available on Mr. Salvatori.

The health care network operates St. Barnabas Behavioral Health Center in Toms River and nine hospitals in New Jersey: St. Barnabas in Livingston; Clara Maass, with facilities in Belleville and Kearny; Newark Beth Israel Medical Center; Children's Hospital in Newark; Union Hospital; Monmouth Medical Center in Long Branch; Kimball Medical Center in Lakewood and Community Medical Center in Toms River.

Saint Barnabas Settles Medicare Case (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Saint Barnabas Health Care System will pay $265 million to settle charges that it cheated Medicare out of more than half a billion dollars, federal prosecutors said.

The agreement between prosecutors and the New Jersey hospital system concerns payments by Medicare that supplement its normal payments.

Prosecutors allege that between October 1995 and August 2003, Saint Barnabas hospitals deliberately inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care under the supplemental-reimbursement program.

Hospitals caring for Medicare patients receive fixed payments from the government that are related to the patient's diagnosis. However, hospitals can collect supplemental payments related to the care of the sickest patients.

These "outlier" payments are for patients who are so ill that their care costs much more than for normal patients with a particular diagnosis. The settlement involves outlier payments.

Authorities said the Saint Barnabas settlement is the first involving Medicare's supplemental-reimbursement program but added that others are pending around the country. Saint Barnabas didn't admit wrongdoing in the settlement.

Tenet Healthcare Corp., one of the largest U.S. hospital companies, has been negotiating with the government to settle its own outlier dispute. Tenet has said it regrets its policy, which it has since changed, but the company hasn't admitted wrongdoing.

In response to yesterday's settlement, Moody's Investors Service put the credit rating of Saint Barnabas under review for a possible downgrade. Currently, the health system's debt is rated Baa1. The not-for-profit health system has about $900 million in debt affected by the ratings review.

The $265 million settlement "sounds like a lot of money," said Pamela Federbusch, senior vice president at Moody's, "although they do have a healthy balance sheet." Moody's said the settlement will be paid over six years.

Michael Slusarz, vice president for public relations and marketing at Saint Barnabas, said the company cooperated with the government during the inquiry. "This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients," he said.

As part of the Saint Barnabas settlement, authorities said the hospital system must accept an outside monitor who will supervise its Medicare billings for the next six years.

Some municipal-bond investors say they have been shying away from buying the debt issues of hospitals out of concern over allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud, says Carolyn Dolan, principal at Samson Capital Advisors LLC.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-federal Attorney Enters Guilty Plea (FREMARG)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Fremont (CA) Argus, June 16, 2006

Investigator of state's youth prisons admits conflict of interest

A former U.S. Justice Department civil rights attorney admits he was angling for a state job to monitor and reform California's youth prisons even as he led a federal probe of one of those facilities in Stockton.

DOJ_NMG_0034985

Ryan Rainey, 48, has pleaded guilty to one count of violating the federal conflict-of-interest law and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 15 by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Facciola of Washington, D.C.

A civil lawsuit challenging the living conditions in youth prisons had required the appointment of a "special master" to monitor and oversee reforms.

Rainey admits that while leading the federal probe he was negotiating with state Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office for the special master's job, even though he knew the state had a financial interest in the findings and recommendations of the probe he was conducting.

The maximum sentence for the crime is a year in prison and a $100,000 fine.

but Rainey's May 26 plea agreement indicates the government will seek a zero-to-six-month term and won't oppose a sentence carrying no time behind bars.

Rainey was a senior trial attorney in the Special Litigation Section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from January 2002 through April 2005. Earlier he'd been a federal prosecutor in Washington, D.C., for seven years.

In April 2003 his division launched a probe — with Rainey as lead counsel — of alleged civil rights abuses at the California Youth Authority's N.A. Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility in Stockton.

In fact, the state recommended him for the job. An attorney representing the civil lawsuit's plaintiffs objected. San Francisco civil rights attorney Donna Brorby, who had spent much of her career forcing Texas to clean up its prisons, eventually was appointed as the special master.

The federal investigation of the Chad facility continues.

What used to be called the California Youth Authority is now called the Division of Juvenile Justice within the Youth and Adult Correction Agency, renamed as part of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's overhaul of the state's prisons. The state is still revising its remediation plans for reforming its youth prisons.

Outsiders Recommend New Chief In Ridgefield (OREG)

By Holley Gilbert

The Oregonian, June 16, 2006

Police case - City officials say the FBI has conducted several interviews this week

Ridgefield, Wash., Police Chief Bruce Hall should be replaced, according to two Kirkland, Wash., police lieutenants who investigated allegations of racism in the firing of Ridgefield's only African American officer.

Hall's hiring decisions have put the city at risk of a civil lawsuit and his lack of leadership "has resulted in an environment of low accountability, distrust and poor morale," said the lieutenants' report, which was released this week.

The report found no racist motivation in the Sept. 28, 2005, dismissal of Carl Mealing. Two months later, Mealing filed a federal lawsuit charging discrimination against Ridgefield, its police department, City Manager George A. Fox and Hall. Fox was put on administrative leave Dec. 1; Hall, who earlier was Mealing's chief in Forks, Wash., and the Nisqually Tribal Police, was put on leave May 18.

Now, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has begun its own investigation in Ridgefield. Council member Scott Hanson said Thursday that he talked with the FBI earlier this week but declined to say what about.

Interim Ridgefield City Manager Justin L. Clary said an FBI agent attended meetings with him, interim Ridgefield Police Chief Erin Nolan and Clark County Sheriff Garry Lucas, but he declined to say what was discussed. An FBI probe "was not something requested by the city," Clary said.

An FBI spokeswoman in Seattle declined to confirm or deny an investigation was under way.

The Kirkland lieutenants' report was done at the request of Eileen M. Lawrence, a Seattle attorney hired to represent Ridgefield in Mealing's federal lawsuit. Initially, the report was to be used only in the federal court case, Lawrence said. "Beyond that, the report is tied into other issues that the city needed to be addressed and be part of the ongoing investigation," she said Thursday.

Also, at the request of Nolan, the interim chief, Vancouver police have been looking into the backgrounds of two officers who were being considered for full-time employment in the Ridgefield department, according to Mitch Barker, Vancouver's assistant police chief.

One of the two, Glen Kilmer, was "released from his probation" Wednesday, Clary said. Kilmer, who previously worked at Forks, was hired last year as a school resource officer and dismissed during a standard probationary period, Barker said.

The temporary appointment of the second officer, David Bone, ended May 31, before the background check could be completed. He is still on the candidate list to be hired permanently.

Hall's decision to hire Mealing in Ridgefield and his failure to act when allegations surfaced that Mealing was harassing women while on duty were "negligent," Kirkland Lt. Bill Hamilton and Lt. Rick Krebs concluded in their report.

"Mealing has a long history of allegations regarding his conduct, which clearly demonstrate a pattern of harassment," the 34-page report said. "Chief Hall had personal knowledge of the investigations and complaints regarding Mealing's unprofessional behavior at two prior agencies. Hall fired Mealing for his conduct at Forks yet rehired him at Ridgefield."

That Hall fired for cause other Ridgefield officers, then hired them in Kalama, where he also heads the police department, "is beyond comprehension," the report states. The report is accompanied by interviews, affidavits, memorandums, correspondence and other records.

Hall "cannot afford to give officers a second chance while it is at the expense of the City, the community. . . and the general morale of the police department," the report said.

"This state of affairs at the Ridgefield Police Department is similar to that of a dysfunctional family," the lieutenants wrote.

L.A. Sheriff Orders Probe Of Fatal Barrage (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Deputies fired 70 times at the suspect in Walnut Park. It was the third department shooting in the last year involving scores of gunshots.

Faced with the third case in a year of deputies firing scores of shots at a suspect, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca on Thursday said he had ordered an investigation into whether six deputies used too much force earlier this week when they unleashed 70 rounds at a suspect.

Scrutiny of the shooting intensified as officials Thursday revealed that at least one deputy had fired so many shots that he reloaded his weapon during the Walnut Park incident, which left 27-year-old Carl Williams dead.

"Obviously, we have to look at this very closely. We will get to the bottom of this fast," Baca said. "We will know the motivation of each of the shooters. They know what the policy is here. Because it is the heat of battle, it doesn't dismiss your objectivity."

The shooting comes a year after deputies in Compton had fired 120 rounds at a suspect they were chasing on a residential street. Some of the bullets flew into nearby homes and embedded in walls.

After that incident, the Sheriff's Department imposed rules that made it more difficult for deputies to fire at moving cars and to fire multiple times. Baca said he was concerned that the shooting could have been a case of "contagious fire," in which deputies fire their weapons because they hear a gunshot. He said he hoped that the new rules would reduce such problems.

But in January, deputies fired more than 50 shots into a Compton house where a suspect was holed up. That case is being investigated by the department's Internal Affairs detectives.

Michael Gennaco, head of the Office of Independent Review, a sheriff's watchdog agency, said the department's internal review of the Walnut Park shooting would include an examination of whether deputies needed to discharge so many rounds, whether they were influenced by contagious fire and whether they endangered residents. The shooting occurred at the end of an alley near apartment buildings.

Baca and Gennaco stressed that it was too early to judge the deputies and that the circumstances of the chase could have meant that the 70 shots were justified.

Sheriff's officials have not said how many shots the officer who reloaded his weapon fired. Each clip in the deputy's 9-millimeter handgun holds 15 rounds, with an additional bullet in the chamber. So the deputy probably fired at least 16 rounds plus whatever shots he discharged from the second clip.

"It adds a complexity to issues in this shooting when a deputy reloads," Gennaco said. "It gives a deputy another opportunity to reassess. That means there has to be numerous threats in the mind of the deputy" for the shooting to be within department policy.

The pursuit of Williams began shortly after 11 p.m. Tuesday, when deputies in a patrol car said they saw Williams driving erratically near 113th Street and Mona Boulevard and tried to pull him over, sheriff's homicide unit Capt. Ray Peavy said.

Williams allegedly drove 60 mph through an alley before plowing into a patrol car. He then drove into a light pole, Peavy said, prompting two deputies to leave their cars and move toward him. Williams allegedly put his car in reverse and drove toward the deputies, hitting a patrol car. He pulled forward, then backed into a second cruiser. The six deputies on the scene opened fire.

Though it was unclear how many times Williams was hit, the deputies fired from relatively close range, hitting the vehicle multiple times and shooting out its back window.

A resident in a nearby apartment, Alvaro Ramirez, 18, said he heard gunfire for about 30 seconds, during which he dove for cover.

DOJ_NMG_0034987

Investigators found a handgun in Williams' car and drugs in his possession. But they said the deputies were unaware of the gun when they opened fire and cited the car as the deadly weapon in their reports.

Peavy, who is handling the criminal investigation of the shooting, said the unusual nature of the pursuit might have required an unusual amount of force.

"There was a lot of activity going on. It was continuous action," he said. "When a deputy shoots at someone they continue to assess the threat. Here the suspect kept going, hitting the radio cars … there was a pretty good reason for continuing to shoot."

The Sheriff's Department has been trying to reduce the number of shootings in which many rounds are fired for some time. Some of those shootings have been attributed to contagious fire, which Gennaco has likened to a chain reaction in which deputies who hear gunshots fire almost as a reflex.

In 2004, deputies fired 111 rounds at a man with an assault rifle in Carson. Businesses were sprayed with bullets, and a roofer working a block away was wounded.

The rules imposed last year allow deputies to fire at moving cars only if their lives or those of bystanders are at risk. In addition, the department requires deputies to make an independent decision about firing, rather than fire simply because another deputy is shooting.

Gennaco said no data has been analyzed to determine whether the rules have changed deputies' behavior.

The Walnut Park shooting came as the Sheriff's Department and Baca were struggling with several major issues, including violence in the jails and the early release of inmates because of jail overcrowding.

Baca said the internal investigation was ongoing but investigators would consider "contagious fire" as playing a role in the Walnut Park shooting.

But he also said the deputies could have been in danger because the suspect allegedly tried to run them down.

"You can never dismiss a vehicle in the hands of a desperate person as a weapon that could harm and kill someone else," he said. "How deputies tactically were exposed to this suspect who tragically has died has to be looked at very closely."

Panel Advances Old Glory Protection (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee gave a nod yesterday to a constitutional amendment to protect the American flag from desecration, moving it to the Senate floor, where vote counters on both sides say it could be within one vote of passing.

The 11-7 vote sent the amendment to the floor. Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, has said the measure will get a Senate vote this month.

To Senate is considering the amendment during the patriotic season between Flag Day this week and the Fourth of July. The substance and timing are designed to appeal to veterans during this year of midterm elections.

"The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States," the amendment reads. To become the Constitution's 28th Amendment, the measure must be approved by two-thirds of those present in each chamber, then ratified within seven years by at least 38 state legislatures.

The House a year ago passed the bill by a vote of 286-130, more than the required two-thirds of those present to pass. Vote counters on both sides of the issue say the amendment has commitments of support from 66 senators, one fewer than the required 67 votes if all 100 members of the chamber are present.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California was the lone committee Democrat to vote for the measure, saying its language was designed to protect both the flag and the First Amendment right to free speech.

The committee rejected an amendment by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, to replace "desecration" with specific types of defilement. Using the word desecration, he said, would leave the government too much power to define the term.

Senate Panel Advances U.S. Flag-Burning Ban Proposal (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, June 16, 2006

June 15 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee approved a constitutional amendment that would empower Congress to outlaw flag burning, setting the stage for an election-year debate about ``desecration'' of the national symbol.

The measure, passed by a vote of 11-7, has already been approved by a two-thirds majority in the House of Representatives. To become part of the Constitution, the amendment must be passed by the same margin in the Senate and ratified by 38 state legislatures.

DOJ_NMG_0034988

The measure would overturn a 1989 Supreme Court ruling. The justices, voting 5-4, struck down a Texas law that barred flag burning, ruling it restricted freedom of expression guaranteed by the Constitution. Supporters argued today the proposed amendment would restore the power of Congress to decide the flag-burning issue, not unelected judges.

``If we can protect the bald eagle, another symbol of our nation, from killing, I think we ought to be able to protect our flag,'' said Texas Republican Senator John Cornyn.

Utah Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican, said he believed more than 67 senators, or two-thirds, would support the measure if they were ``allowed to vote their consciences.''

Both sides predict a close Senate vote. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada supports the proposed amendment. The Senate's No. 2 Republican, Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, opposes it.

Grant of Authority

The proposal would give state legislatures seven years to ratify the proposed amendment. If it became part of the Constitution, the House and Senate would have to pass separate legislation to ban flag burning, mutilation or other forms of desecration.

``The point is to have a general grant of authority to Congress to legislate in this area,'' said Arizona Republican Jon Kyl.

Before the high court's 1989 decision, 48 states outlawed flag burning.

All 10 Republicans on the Judiciary Committee voted in favor of the amendment. Seven of the panel's eight Democrats opposed it. Democrats accused Republicans of using the debate to score political points in an election year.

Delaware Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., who has supported legislation to ban flag burning, argued that the amendment was too vague because it doesn't define desecration.

The amendment would ``leave to the authority of the government to make a subjective judgment as to whether or not the action taken relative to the flag is a violation of the law,'' Biden said.

`Very Skimpy Bathing Suit'

That could permit the prosecution of women on beaches ``wearing a very skimpy bathing suit'' decorated with the flag's stars and stripes, he said. ``Is that desecration of the flag?''

``When you get to a bikini or a bathing suit, it's not a flag, it's a bikini,'' said California Senator Dianne Feinstein, the only Democrat to support the measure.

Biden argued that the measure amounts to a ``de facto amendment'' of the First Amendment, which guarantees freedom of speech, by allowing the government to decide what was desecration.

``Protecting the flag is not going to prevent people from expressing their point of view,'' Feinstein said.

Biden said he would support an amendment that allowed Congress to ban ``burning, mutilation and trampling'' of the flag.

``If it's not some political stunt, let's do it,'' he said. The panel rejected Biden's proposed change on a voice vote. Hatch said lawmakers would ``be able to refine and define'' what was illegal flag desecration when the legislation is debated by Congress.

The House approved a proposed flag-burning amendment five times, most recently in June 2005 on a 286-130 vote. The Senate last voted on a flag-burning amendment in 2000, falling four votes short of the 67 required to pass.

Senate Alters Bill To Transform La. Congressional Elections (AP)

AP, June 16, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. - If Louisiana is going to shed its unique "open primary" system, then the state must make sure independent voters are allowed to cast ballots in the new party primary elections, the House voted on Thursday.

Sen. Cleo Fields introduced a bill that would replace the state's open primaries with Republican and Democratic primaries in congressional races, leaving it up to the parties to decide whether independents and third-party voters are allowed to cast ballots.

The House decided to change the measure slightly, adding a provision that would allow an independent voter to pick one or the other party's primaries to vote in. They then passed the measure 58-35, sending it back to the Senate for approval of the change.

Despite the change, Rep. Joel Robideaux of Lafayette, who has no party affiliation, said it was unfair to independent candidates. Robideaux said the measure would make it increasingly difficult for independents to run for Congress because they would wait on the sidelines until the general election.

"We're basically saying we're going to have a Democrat or a Republican for a congressman and nobody else is really going to have a chance," he said.

Fields, D-Baton Rouge, a former congressman, has tried for years to get rid of open primaries, arguing that the current system often results in Louisiana's newly elected members of Congress getting a late start - and less desirable committee assignments - on Capitol Hill because the state holds its runoff elections in December, a month later than other states.

DOJ_NMG_0034989

His bill would have no effect on statewide and local elections.

If it becomes law, voters could cast ballots in two party primaries, then a November runoff, to select their congressmen and U.S. senators.

Under the current system, Louisiana holds a general primary in November, with candidates from all parties running on the same ballot. A December runoff follows if no candidate wins more than 50 percent of the vote.

The measure would also need approval from the U.S. Justice Department, because any change to Louisiana election law needs federal approval, a restriction stemming from the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Baltimore Sued For Arrests Without Charges (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz And Chris Yakaitis, Sun Reporters

The Baltimore Sun, June 16, 2006

ACLU, NAACP allege pattern; city solicitor denies actions illegal

The NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union sued the Baltimore Police Department and the state-run city jail Thursday, using the experiences of five men to allege a broad pattern of abuse in which they say thousands of people are routinely arrested and held for hours without being charged with a crime.

The lawsuit, filed in Baltimore Circuit Court by the Maryland ACLU, condemns the practice of jailing citizens for so-called quality-of-life crimes such as loitering -- one of the central strategies employed by police here and in other cities in their efforts to drive down crime.

The issue emerged just over a year ago with reports in The Sun of overcrowding at the Central Booking and Intake Facility.

The plaintiffs, including a 19-year-old Morgan State engineering student and two Pennsylvania residents visiting Baltimore for a bachelor party, allege that city police officers routinely make arrests without probable cause and do so "under a pattern and practice set and enforced by city officials."

City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler said the plaintiffs "will not be able to prove their truly wild allegations."

"The illegal arrests claim rests largely on a false equation," he said. "The fact that the state's attorney declines to charge in many cases does not suggest that the arrest was illegal."

Tyler said many factors play into a prosecutor's decision not to pursue charges. For example, a prosecutor might determine that the hours a person spent in Central Booking was an appropriate punishment for a minor crime -- a situation called "abatement by arrest."

Unaudited figures provided by the city State's Attorney's Office for the first three months of this year show that about one-third of the 3,110 arrests that did not result in charges were because of abatement by arrest.

The other two-thirds were because prosecutors believed they could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a crime occurred.

The number of declined cases is about half what it was last year -- a sign that police have become more selective in their arrests, perhaps responding to criticism voiced during a raucous community meeting in January.

David R. Rocah, an ACLU attorney, said an aim of the lawsuit, which he said has been in the works for almost a year, is to change police policy. Other defendants include the City Council, the mayor, state prison officials and individual police and correctional officers.

The lawsuit alleges "perverse incentives" for officers to arrest a large number of people, even if they have not committed crimes that will be prosecuted.

"Each patrol officer is required to tally his enforcement statistics, including citations and arrests," the lawsuit alleges.

"These numbers are then compared to averages from that officer's squad and shift. The three officers in each district with the lowest scores are subject to reassignment to other districts."

Paul M. Blair Jr., president of Baltimore's Fraternal Order of Police, said that in the past, "low-performers" were moved to other districts, but he said the command staff never made it clear whether performance was tied to arrest numbers.

He said that practice was abandoned more than a year ago, after a City Council meeting in which Police Commissioner Leonard D. Hamm assured the council there is no quota system.

But Blair said that during crime spikes, such as one last month, officers are told to flood neighborhoods and aggressively enforce quality-of-life crimes.

The suit also delves into three situations in which five named plaintiffs were arrested, detained for hours at Central Booking and then released without being charged with any crime.

DOJ_NMG_0034990

Evan Howard, the Morgan State student, and his friend Tyrone Braxton, 19,were arrested April 15 of last year outside Howard's home on Poplar Grove Street in West Baltimore.

The men were told they were being arrested for loitering. They were taken to Central Booking, strip-searched and held there, Braxton for 36 hours and Howard for 54, the lawsuit states.

Donald Wilson, 21, was arrested April 10 on the front steps of a the Barclay home of his girlfriend and toddler. A crowd gathered when an unmarked police car raced past chasing a dirt bike, the lawsuit states.

Officers turned their attention toward the crowd when they did not catch the cyclist. One officer "threatened" Wilson after Wilson "firmly" responded to a question, the lawsuit states.

Wilson was arrested and held at Central Booking for about five hours before being released without charges.

A soon-to-be groom and six friends were celebrating his coming wedding near the Inner Harbor in May 2005. As they walked from the Power Plant Live entertainment area back to their hotel, a marked police car approached.

Officers told the group to keep walking.

"All of a sudden I see the cop hit my one buddy in the chest with a nightstick and he grabbed my other buddy and threw him up against the wall," said Robert Lowery, 27.

He and the groom, Aaron Stoner, 27, of Chambersburg, Pa., were arrested and taken to Central Booking for "failure to obey" an order to stop loitering, the officers told them.

They were strip-searched and held for about 17 hours. Neither was prosecuted.

Lowery, of Greencastle, Pa., said he had never had any trouble with the law and the experience soured his view of the city.

"Before, I enjoyed coming down to the Inner Harbor and hanging out for the day and walking around," he said. "Now I don't want to come back down."

The lawsuit also levels criticism at Central Booking, citing "filthy" conditions and "humiliating" strip-searches.

Mark A. Vernarelli, a spokesman for the state Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, declined to comment on the suit because he had not seen it. But he said numerous improvements were announced last summer to speed the booking process.

Rocah said the named plaintiffs are "among the many" who have contacted the ACLU reporting similar incidents. He said the lawsuit seeks monetary damages -- the amount is not specified -- for the five named plaintiffs.

Baltimore attorney James Rhodes, who said he represents hundreds of people who have complained about "frivolous arrests," said he doubted any change would result from the ACLU's lawsuit.

"They seem to want to get police to agree to stop making arrests when a citation could be issued," he said. "There is no way you will get an outright agreement like that because it takes away police power."

The ACLU and NAACP also released Thursday an action plan that proposes ways the police can resolve these issues.

Suggestions include creating incentives for officers for arrests that are successfully prosecuted, forcing officers to stop arresting people whom prosecutors won't charge, expunging arrest records when charges are not pursued and delaying strip and cavity searches of suspects until it can be determined whether charges will be filed.

Rocah said the lawsuit is long overdue on an issue that has undermined police relationships with city residents for years.

Police Accused Of Sleeping On The Job (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Joel Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Police officers assigned to protect Compton schools against vandalism and other campus crimes have been asleep at the wheel, quite literally, according to photographs and sworn testimony in a racial discrimination lawsuit.

The photographs appear to show several uniformed school officers in the driver's seats of parked squad cars with eyes shut and, in some cases, heads leaning back.

The pictures emerged in a suit against the Compton Unified School District, which operates the 34-member police department. The case was filed by a white ex-officer and two Latino officers who contend that they were treated differently from black colleagues within the predominantly African American department.

Former Officer Mark Shiva, who at one time served as president of the police officers union, and current Officers Victor Ayala and Sergio Reynoso allege that they were hit with racial slurs, ridiculed and retaliated against after lodging complaints against black colleagues.

Shiva, who was fired after the suit was filed in 2005, took the photographs within the last two years, according to testimony in the case. Shiva shot the pictures to prove that colleagues were sleeping on duty.

DOJ_NMG_0034991

According to testimony, all of the officers accused of sleeping in patrol cars are black. But in the background of one photo, a white officer also appears to be sleeping. When the conduct was brought to the attention of supervisors, none of the officers were disciplined, authorities said.

During Sgt. James Bradford's deposition in March, he recalled being shown one of the pictures and thinking it was of such poor quality that he could not be sure it was even him in the photograph.

When pressed by an attorney as to whether he had ever slept on the job, Bradford responded by saying, "Let me clarify sleeping." He said that any officer on the night shift who denied sleeping "is lying."

"Sleeping, you can pull your car up to the site and ... you know, lay back with your eyes open for a few minutes, that's sleeping. All of us does."

Asked if it was permitted to take a nap on the job, Bradford said, "Your lunch break is your time."

Other police employees, however, testified that Bradford and other officers sometimes slept when not on breaks.

Police dispatcher Gwendolyn Holmes testified that she had seen Bradford sleeping on duty and estimated that it occurred at least 10 times over an unspecified two-month period. Occasionally, she said, she had heard him snoring.

Another sergeant testified that Bradford's sleeping on the job was a weekly occurrence.

Bradford declined to comment when contacted by The Times.

At least five other officers have also been accused of sleeping on duty, according to testimony, police records and photographs obtained by The Times.

The school district officers are armed and trained to face the same potential dangers as the Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies who serve the rest of Compton. In fact, in 1987 a Compton school officer was shot to death by a sniper while on foot patrol at an adult campus.

Sleeping on duty is against department policy and was identified as a problem in 2002 under the district's then-Police Chief Anthony Alba.

"Obviously this activity is considered dereliction of duty and will be dealt with administratively," Alba wrote in a Jan. 9, 2002, memo to officers. "I must also remind everyone that depending on the location, sleeping on duty may result in deadly officer safety consequences."

The district's current police chief, Hourie Taylor, testified in March that he had been made aware of the sleeping allegations but had not seen the photographs. He said he directed subordinates, one of whom was Sgt. Bradford, to conduct an investigation and that at some point they returned saying they were satisfied that the allegations had no substance.

In an interview this week, Taylor said the allegations were "unsubstantiated," but he declined further comment citing the pending litigation. He declined a request from The Times to review the photographs and identify the officers.

However, one sergeant, who was shown several photographs during his deposition, identified two others as Sgt. Bradford and Officer Douglas Mushett, who has since retired, and said he believed that a third picture showed an Officer Steve Scott, who resigned late last year, officials said.

In an interview Thursday, Mushett denied that he slept in his squad car when he was supposed to be on patrol but acknowledged that he would occasionally sleep during his lunch and twice daily 15-minute breaks.

"Let's face it, guys working late shifts would get tired and on their breaks would go back to the [station] and snooze," Mushett said. "We all did it. I did it."

He said he found it hard to believe that officers would sleep in their cars on the streets or on campuses. "That's just asking to get popped," he said.

Scott could not be reached for comment.

In an interview last week, Compton school board member Joel Estrada reacted angrily when told of the photographs.

"If those officers are not on a permitted break, then that is completely, utterly unacceptable," Estrada said. "I would definitely want an investigation launched to see what's going on — how common is this? We're paying these individuals to patrol."

Estrada said district lawyers had told board members about the claims of police sleeping on duty but that police officials had concluded the claims were unfounded.

School district attorney J. Michael Declues said the district denies the allegations contained in the lawsuit but declined to comment on the photographs.

Shiva also declined to comment to The Times, but in a deposition in April he elaborated on his allegations. He said he saw a female officer take a pillow to her patrol car so she could sleep while working overtime.

"It's been an ongoing problem since I've worked there," said Shiva, who served for five years.

Shiva also alleged that officers would drive their squad cars home and sleep there when they should have been patrolling.

DOJ_NMG_0034992

Internal police documents show that Shiva was terminated for allegedly orchestrating an unlawful job action, or "blue flu," among other reasons. Ayala and Reynoso, who remain on the job, were disciplined for allegedly participating in the job action.

Attorney Yael Trock, who represents Ayala and Reynoso, said police administrators unjustly punished her clients while allowing other officers to "get away with failing to do their jobs." Co-counsel Etan Z. Lorant said the lawsuit is expected to go to trial this summer.

Metro Board Member Fired For Comment On Gays (WP)

By Lena H. Sun And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday fired Robert J. Smith, his appointee on the Metro transit authority board, for referring to gay people as sexual deviants on a cable television show.

"Robert Smith's comments were highly inappropriate, insensitive and unacceptable," Ehrlich (R) said in a statement less than five hours after the controversy erupted during a Metro board meeting. "They are in direct conflict to my administration's commitment to inclusiveness, tolerance and opportunity."

At the Metro meeting, board member Jim Graham, who represents the District, had called for Smith to disavow his remarks or apologize or for Ehrlich to remove him. "As someone who cares deeply about human rights, and as an openly gay elected official . . . I cannot remain silent in the face of these comments," Graham said, reading from a prepared statement.

Smith acknowledged after the meeting that he had referred to homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy" during a political round-table discussion on a Montgomery County cable show that was shown on Sunday.

"Homosexual behavior, in my view, is deviant," he said. "I'm a Roman Catholic." Smith said his comments had been part of a discussion about a proposed ban on same-sex marriage. "The comments I make in public outside of my [Metro board job] I'm entitled to make," he said. His personal beliefs, he said, have "absolutely nothing to do with running trains and buses and have not affected my actions or decisions on this board."

Ehrlich appointed Raymond J. Briscuso Jr., who heads a biotech consulting company, to take Smith's place. Briscuso, 46, will serve the remainder of Smith's three-year term, which began June 1, 2004.

Briscuso, who used to ride Metro's Red Line regularly between his Bethesda home and his downtown Washington office, said he is "very excited" to serve on the board. Briscuso managed George H.W. Bush's presidential campaign in Maryland in 1988.

For several months, Ehrlich, who is likely to announce his reelection bid this month, has been working to position himself as a centrist. One recent report about a political advertisement the governor is recording suggested that he is considering the line: "Bob Ehrlich governs not from the right or the left, but the center, where we are."

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, who with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is seeking the Democratic nomination to oppose Ehrlich, said that "Smith's hateful and mean-spirited comments suggest that he is unfit to serve the public, and his immediate removal is wholly justified."

Smith, 47, a Gaithersburg architect, could not be reached by phone last night. Earlier in the day, he said he served at the pleasure of the governor.

Almost immediately after he was appointed, Smith drew attention by questioning expenses at the agency, criticizing spending on promotional materials and other items he considered luxuries. He read lengthy budget documents that other board members tend to skim and asked sharp questions of finance managers.

The Metro directors oversee a $1 billion operating budget and nearly 10,000 employees. They set policy for the nation's second-busiest subway and fifth-busiest bus system. Metro carries more than 1.1 million riders a day.

The board is made up of six voting members and six alternates. Maryland, the District and Virginia each appoint two voting and two alternate members. The board has a vacancy for an alternate D.C. member to fill the spot of Dan Tangherlini, who became the agency's interim general manager this year.

After Smith's removal from the board, Graham complimented Ehrlich for his swift action. "The governor appreciated the seriousness of this problem," he said.

After the meeting, Smith accused Graham, a D.C. Council member, of using "high theater" to seek the media spotlight. He called his actions "highly out of order and inappropriate for this forum."

Smith said he has always supported the transit agency's policy against all forms of discrimination.

Asked whether he planned to apologize to Graham after Graham said the remarks were offensive, Smith replied: "I didn't make the comments to Mr. Graham. . . . I'm sorry he feels that way. I don't agree that his lifestyle is an appropriate way to lead one's life."

DOJ_NMG_0034993

Smith's comments drew an immediate negative reaction from Dennis Jaffe, chairman of the Riders Advisory Council, who has been working with Smith the past several months on a committee to improve MetroAccess, the transit service for the disabled.

"I know how dedicated Bob Smith is, but his comments that homosexuals are sexual deviants are most unfortunate and reflect poorly on Metro as an agency," Jaffe said.

In an e-mail sent to all Metro employees yesterday, Tangherlini said he wanted to take the opportunity "to re-affirm to all . . . employees that discrimination of any kind will not be tolerated."

Smith said he has been a regular panelist on the weekly political round-table show, "21 This Week," telecast on Access Montgomery cable Channel 21, for the past 12 years. He appears as a "Republican activist," according to Rodney Bryant, the show's producer.

On last weekend's show, Smith interrupted another speaker who was talking about federalism and Vice President Cheney's daughter. The speaker said Cheney's daughter, who is a lesbian, would not want the government interfering in her life, according to a recording of that portion of the show.

"That's fine, that's fine," Smith interrupted. "But that doesn't mean that government should proffer a special place of entitlement within the laws of the United States for persons of sexual deviancy."

Prayers In The Military (WP)

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

THE MILITARY has been making a good-faith effort in recent months to write rules on religious activities that preserve both the rights of free expression among service members and the separation of church and state. It's unfortunate, therefore, that the House of Representatives, responding to pressure from evangelical Christian groups, has unnecessarily inserted itself into this debate, with a provision in the recent defense authorization bill aimed at ensuring that evangelical chaplains can pray in Jesus's name at public ceremonies. The Senate is debating a version that wisely leaves out the House provision and lets the military services continue to work out this complex issue the right way -- without congressional interference.

No one questions that military chaplains of all denominations may pray as they wish in voluntary, private services. The issue is what they can say in public prayers. This is especially complicated because, in the view of some evangelical ministers, it would contravene their faith not to invoke Jesus; at the same time, having such sectarian prayers is problematic, particularly at mandatory events attended by service members of all faiths.

Recent guidelines adopted by the Air Force and Navy suggest that nondenominational prayer is strongly preferred in such circumstances. For example, the Navy policy says that "absent extraordinary circumstances," prayers at such functions "should be nonsectarian in nature."

Similarly, the Air Force policy says that chaplains "will not be required to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, inconsistent with their faiths" -- a provision designed to protect evangelical chaplains who believe sharing their faith in Jesus is an essential part of their ministry. However, the Air Force guideline adds, "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence may be appropriate for military ceremonies when its primary purpose is not the advancement of religious beliefs."

Though the Air Force regulations were watered down from their initial stance, they were still too restrictive for some evangelical groups. So the House stepped in with a provision, championed by Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), heavy on the rights of chaplains and light on concerns about how their public prayer could affect service members who are nonbelievers or who adhere to a different religion.

The provision guarantees chaplains "the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of the chaplain's own conscience, except as must be limited by military necessity, with any such limitation being imposed in the least restrictive manner feasible." In other words, almost anything goes.

This tilts too far in the direction of chaplains' freedom to pray, without due respect for those whose beliefs differ. As Rear Adm. Louis V. Iasiello, the chief of Navy chaplains, wrote in opposing the provision, "it is essential that the chaplain possess the trust and respect of all the crew, not simply the members of his or her own faith group."

Maybe the solution isn't to drain prayer at public ceremonies of specific religious content, but to discourage prayer at such events as inherently and unnecessarily divisive. Chaplains shouldn't be required to mute their faith, but neither should service members who aren't believers be compelled to be present for such prayers.

ANTITRUST:

Executive Pleads Guilty In Military Bid-rigging Case Over Foam Sales (VP)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, June 16, 2006

NORFOLK - An executive with a marine products company has agreed to plead guilty to conspiring to rig bids in the sale of foam buoys and fenders to the Navy and the Coast Guard, the Justice Department announced Thursday .

Gerald Thermos, president of Marine Fenders International, based in Wilmington, Calif., was charged in Norfolk federal court this week with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The Justice Department said Thermos has agreed to plead guilty to the felony, serve four months in jail and four months of home detention, and pay a $50,000 fine. No court date has been set.

The department said that from June 2000 to August 2005, Thermos and other unidentified co-conspirators schemed to fix prices for marine fenders and buoys that were sold to the Navy, the Coast Guard and other government and private entities.

Foam-filled fenders are used as a cushion between ships and docks, piers, other ships, and fixed structures. The buoys are used for channel markers and navigational aids.

Thermos and the others agreed which company would get contract bids, some at inflated prices. The other companies were not identified.

"Price fixing and bid rigging are serious concerns when it relates to products and services procured by the Department of Defense," Rick Gwin, special agent in charge of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, western field office, said in a news release.

The executives involved maintained log books and agreed not to compete with one another's customers either by not submitting bids or by submitting intentionally high prices, according to court records.

Department officials could not estimate how much taxpayers were overcharged.

According to charge papers filed Wednesday, the conspiracy occurred while Thermos was president of Marine Fenders International and while he was president of another company, Urethane Products Corp., from June 2000 to April 2004. Both companies are based in the Los Angeles area.

Urethane Products Corp. has received millions of dollars in Defense Department contracts in the past 10 years, mostly with the Navy, according to federal records. Marine Fenders, which is about two years old, received nearly $500,000 in government contracts.

Thermos could not be reached Thursday, and his attorney could not immediately comment.

Violations of the antitrust act carry penalties against individuals of as much as 10 years in prison and fines as great as $1 million.

Microsoft's Gates To Step Back (USAT)

By Byron Acohido And Michelle Kessler

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Microsoft chairman Bill Gates announced Thursday that he will let loose the reins of the company he co-founded in college and shaped into a behemoth, to focus on philanthropy.

Gates, 50, who was also Microsoft's chief software architect, will give up day-to-day duties in July 2008, retaining the title of chairman.

That will leave Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer and Chief Technical Officers Ray Ozzie and Craig Mundie to carry out a transition the software giant is struggling to make from lumbering supplier of desktop computer software to nimble competitor in a rapidly changing tech market.

Gates insisted that the change announced Thursday "is not a retirement." He plans to spend most of his time working for his charity, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

Gates says he plans to have a relationship with Microsoft for many years. "I don't see a time in the foreseeable future in which I won't be the chairman of this company," he said.

"This was a hard decision for me," said Gates, who founded the world's largest software company with childhood friend Paul Allen. "I'm very lucky to have two passions that I feel are so important and so challenging. As I prepare for this change, I firmly believe the road ahead for Microsoft is as bright as ever."

DOJ_NMG_0034995

Ozzie will immediately assume Gates' title as chief software architect and begin working with Gates on overseeing all software technical design.

Mundie will immediately take the new title of chief research and strategy officer and will work with Gates in those areas. Mundie also will partner with general counsel Brad Smith to guide intellectual property and technology policy efforts.

"Bill and I are confident we've got a great team that can step up to fill his shoes and drive Microsoft innovation forward without missing a beat," Ballmer said. The news, released after the market closed, sent Microsoft shares down less than 1% in after-hours trading. It wasn't a complete surprise to analysts and investors who follow the company closely.

Gates gave up the CEO role to Harvard classmate and longtime confidant Ballmer in January 2000. Last year, he signaled a desire to further reduce his role by recruiting Ozzie, a renowned right-brain thinker, to infuse a fresh perspective. "The stage has been set for an orderly transition, and a two-year timeline assures there won't be a radical departure," says analyst Michael Gartenberg, of JupiterResearch. "And as my grandfather was fond of saying, 'Cemeteries are full of people who couldn't be replaced.' "

In its last fiscal year, ended June 30, Microsoft's revenue had doubled and profit grown nearly 60% from fiscal 1999, six months before Ballmer became CEO.

Ushering in Vista

Gates' primary job has been to usher in Windows Vista, the latest upgrade to the operating system used on nine of 10 desktop PCs. Vista, due early next year, has been beset by delays and feature downgrades just as the company is struggling to drum up reasons for corporations to ante up for upgrades of Windows and its signature Microsoft Office software suite.

"This might be the last generation of classic Microsoft products," says Charles King, principal analyst at Pund-IT Research. "Microsoft in five years is going to be a very different company than the one today."

The leadership will come from a different mold.

Gates, 50, and Allen started Microsoft in 1975, soon dropping out of college to devote full time to it. Gates took Microsoft public in 1986 and was chairman and CEO until 2000, the year he and his wife formed the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, whose assets now total $29.1 billion.

Vista and Office 12 may be the last classic Windows upgrades, feature-laden software that requires a lot of computer memory and processing power. But technology has shifted to harnessing the power of corporate networks and leveraging the Internet. Software and digital entertainment delivered over the Web signal the future course of technology.

Microsoft has hustled to catch up and is branching into those arenas, but its profits continue to revolve around Windows and Office. Meanwhile, it has faced ugly antitrust lawsuits in the USA and Europe.

Additionally, Microsoft's expansion into new markets has forced the company "to engage in a four-front war," says software analyst Stuart Williams at Technology Business Research. It must fight off Sony in video games, Google and Yahoo on the Internet, Oracle and SAP in business software and the free Linux operating system in servers.

Still, Gates said, Microsoft is on the right track - and that the leadership change will have little impact on the company's success.

"The world has had a tendency to focus a disproportionate amount of attention on me," he said. But in reality, Microsoft's success is based on hundreds of people, he said. "We are ready for members of our current team to step into an expanded role," he said.

When Gates steps down in 2008, Vista and Office 12 will have been on the market for a year.

The new team

Ozzie, 50, worked on the first electronic spreadsheet, VisiCalc, in the early 1980s. In 1983, he joined Lotus Development - Microsoft's archrival then - to develop Lotus Notes and other business software.

He later founded Groove Networks, where he developed Groove Virtual Office. Microsoft acquired Groove in April 2005 and named Ozzie chief technical officer. Gates once called Ozzie one of the five best software programmers alive.

"Ozzie gets the power of networks and the power of the Internet," says RedMonk analyst Stephen O'Grady.

Mundie, 56, joined Microsoft in 1992 to create and run its Consumer Platforms Division, responsible for non-personal computer software. Mundie also started Microsoft's digital TV efforts. His current responsibilities include global technology policy and a variety of technical and business incubation efforts.

Ozzie and Mundie will continue to report to Gates. At an unspecified time during the two-year transition, they will shift to reporting to Ballmer.

"Losing a person of (Gates') talent is a big deal, of course," Ballmer said. "But it's a chance for other people to assume even more responsibility."

Gates is legendary for his "ability to motivate employees at the lowest level of the company," says software analyst Al Gillen with researcher IDC. "Clearly, it's going to be a loss for the company not to have him filling that role."

DOJ_NMG_0034996

But Ballmer, Ozzie and Mundie are "fantastically strong executives," Gillen says.

Gates said he's been mulling the role change for several weeks, and talking about it with his wife, Melinda. But he avoided bringing up the subject with Ballmer, his long-time business partner. Gates, laughing, said he repeatedly told his wife the subject "wasn't easy to bring up today. Maybe it will be easy to bring up tomorrow." Gates said he didn't make a final decision until Tuesday. Wednesday night, he told key executives at a dinner at Ballmer's house. Thursday morning, about 100 key Microsoft employees were notified.

Gates said he's not sure how he will handle the transition. "I don't know what it's going to feel like, not coming in every day and working 10 hours," he said.

Ballmer said Gates "is now headed, in my opinion, to become the greatest philanthropist of all time."

Two of Gates' contemporaries have made similar moves. Long-time Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy stepped down from the post earlier this year, though he remains chairman. And Ted Waitt, co-founder of PC-maker Gateway, retired in 2005. Both said they wanted more time for other projects.

It's not surprising that Gates does too, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. The role change "was a long time coming," he says. "At 50, (Gates) is still young, but not that young. It's time

After US Regulators, Came The Europeans . . . And It's Not Over Yet (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Microsoft's battles with antitrust regulators on both sides of the Atlantic have been a consistent feature of Bill Gates' tenure.

While the software group managed to broker a deal with the US authorities in 2002 that ended its regulatory troubles in the country, Microsoft's fight with the European Commission in Brussels is still very much alive.

In a landmark ruling in March 2004, the Commission found Microsoft guilty of violating European Union competition rules by abusing its dominant position in the market for personal computer operating systems. Microsoft was fined a record €497m ($628m) and told to change its business practices.

The group was told to share more information about its flagship Windows programme with rival companies and to stop bundling its Windows Media Player software with the operating system.

The ruling, which is under appeal, has since sparked a new case against Microsoft, because the Commission alleges that the group has not implemented the ruling properly. It has threatened to impose fresh fines of up to €2m a day unless Microsoft complies with the Brussels ruling speedily.

Adding to Microsoft's regulatory worries in Europe is the fact that Brussels is also taking aim at Vista, the operating system set to replace Windows next year.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, wrote to Microsoft this year warning that Vista could fall foul of competition rules - again by bundling new functionalities into the operating system and so shutting out rival software that is sold on a standalone basis.

Mr Gates, who took a highly active and very visible role in Microsoft's battle with US regulators, has largely taken a backseat role in Europe.

In fact, his first contact with Mario Monti, the former EU competition commissioner who presided over the Microsoft ruling, came only days before the Commission decided to rule against the group. The two men spoke briefly on the telephone, but did not discuss the substance of the case.

As with so many of the other challenges faced by the group today, the task of dealing with regulators around the globe has over recent years fallen largely to Steve Ballmer, who took over as Microsoft CEO in 2000.

Microsoft Wins Patent Case With 'EBay' Argument (LAW)

By Xenia P. Kobylarz, The Recorder

California Recorder, June 16, 2006

Microsoft Corp. appears to be the first company to benefit from the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision to end the long-standing presumption in patent cases that an injunction should be issued almost automatically when infringement is found.

Applying the Supreme Court's May ruling in MercExchange v. eBay, a Texas federal judge denied the request of Z4 Technologies Inc., a tiny Michigan software firm, to bar Microsoft from selling, making and using its infringing Windows and Office products.

The ruling, issued on Thursday by Judge Leonard Davis in the Eastern District of Texas, signals a major shift in patent litigation practice and is the first indication of how the eBay ruling has quickly become important to the way companies fight patent infringement claims.

DOJ_NMG_0034997

"This will be the classic first example of how the eBay case is going to limit the number of injunctions in patent cases," said Michael Barclay, a patent litigation partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

"This is also big news, given the reputation of the Eastern District of Texas as being pro plaintiff," he added.

Harold McElhinny, co-chairman of Morrison & Foerster's patent litigation group, said the ruling is likely to break "wide open" the question of whether an injunction applies in every patent case.

"Z4 does not fit the traditional definition of a patent troll. It is a company that is in the market and making a product and trying to compete with Microsoft, so now it looks like every defendant can use the eBay logic against all companies, regardless of whether they're trolls or not," McElhinny said.

In April, a Texas jury found Microsoft and Autodesk willfully infringed two of Z4's patents covering methods for limiting unauthorized use of computer software. Both Microsoft and Autodesk use the anti-piracy program in some of their products. The jury ordered the two companies to pay Z4 a combined $133 million in damages, the biggest award ever in a patent case to come out of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas.

In refusing Z4's request for a permanent injunction against Microsoft, Davis used the traditional four-factor test recommended by the high court to determine whether to issue an injunction. He concluded that Z4 will not suffer irreparable harm in the absence of a permanent injunction.

The judge ruled that because Microsoft only uses the infringing technology as a small component of its own software, Z4 will not lose profits, brand-name recognition or market share.

"[I]t is not likely that any consumer of Microsoft's Windows or Office software purchases these products for their product activation functionality," Davis wrote.

Davis also cited Justice Anthony Kennedy's concurring opinion from the eBay case in justifying the denial of an injunction. He said Kennedy's comment that if a patented invention is but a small component of the infringing product, monetary damages should be sufficient compensation.

The court also found that the balance of hardships tilts in favor of Microsoft because it would require the company to redesign and re-release all its Office software products, which currently are distributed in 450 variations in 37 languages. Its Windows product currently has 600 variations in more than 40 languages.

Neither Microsoft nor Z4 returned calls for comment on Thursday.

Davis' ruling cited possible harm in public interest if the court enjoins Microsoft.

"Microsoft's Windows and Office software products are likely the most popular software products in the world," Davis wrote. "Accordingly, the public interest is likely to be disserved if a permanent injunction were entered against Microsoft."

Barclay said that reasoning surprised him.

"It's ironic that Microsoft was able to use its enormous market position to stop the court from issuing an injunction," Barclay said.

But McElhinny said it is a positive development that courts may now weigh the public's interest in cases where the public could be greatly inconvenienced and the plaintiff can be served by a royalty fee.

"It seems right to deny an injunction in a case like that," McElhinny said.

Prior to the eBay ruling, however, Blackberry maker Research In Motion failed to persuade a court to stop an injunction based on the inconvenience its millions of users would have faced had the company been enjoined from offering its wireless e-mail service. The Canadian company ended up paying more than $600 million to settle the patent suit against it.

France's Vinci Snubs Merger Proposal From Utility Veolia DOW JONES NEWSWIRES (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

PARIS -- Vinci SA rejected a merger approach from French water utility Veolia Environnement SA, calling it unsolicited and hostile.

In rejecting the proposal, Vinci, a French construction company, said a merger of the two entities "would have no strategic interest, would not create synergies and would not create value for its shareholders."

Veolia's board had asked Veolia's chairman Wednesday to study a friendly merger with Vinci, a move that would create a utility and services company valued at about €34 billion, or $43 billion.

After Vinci rejected the proposal, Veolia said it "regrets Vinci's opposition to review the interest of a potential friendly alliance."

Veolia, the world's largest water utility by revenue, has been looking to expand its concessions business and is eager to increase its €16.9 billion market capitalization to compete with larger, more financially powerful conglomerates such as water and energy utility Suez SA. Vinci's market capitalization is €19 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0034998

Many analysts have criticized the idea of a Veolia-Vinci combination, agreeing with Vinci management on the merger's lack of industrial or financial merit.

"We see little strategic and financial interest in this merger for Vinci shareholders, and there is in our view very little chance that it could succeed," said Cheuvreux analyst Arnaud Lehmann.

Bush Creates Marine Sanctuary (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush created a vast marine sanctuary yesterday, extending stronger federal protections to the northwestern Hawaiian Islands and the surrounding waters with their endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

The nation's newest national monument covers an archipelago stretching 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide in the Pacific Ocean. It is home to more than 7,000 species, at least a fourth of them found nowhere else.

"To put this area in context, this national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Mr. Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined. This is a big deal."

Mr. Bush announced his creation of the nation's 75th national monument at a White House ceremony. The decision immediately sets aside 140,000 square miles of largely uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reef colonies and underwater peaks known as seamounts to be managed by federal and state agencies.

In introducing the president, first lady Laura Bush quoted Mark Twain, who once described Hawaii as "the loveliest fleet of islands that lies anchored in any ocean."

Conrad C. Lautenbacher, head of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which will manage nearly all of it, said the new protected area would dwarf all others.

"It's the single-largest act of ocean conservation in history. It's a large milestone," Mr. Lautenbacher said. "It is a place to maintain biodiversity and to maintain basically the nurseries of the Pacific. It spawns a lot of the life that permeates the middle of the Pacific Ocean."

It is the second time that Mr. Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features. The law turned 100 this month.

The president had planned as late as Wednesday to use instead the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others to the decision, said a senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity so as not to upstage Mr. Bush.

"This means the area will get immediate protection rather than having to wait another year," the official said, adding that Mr. Bush opted at the last minute to create a national monument after realizing the process had been ongoing for five years and elicited thousands of comments.

With the national monument designation, the federal government can begin an immediate five-year phaseout of the eight commercial fishing permits in the area and impose strict prohibitions on any other extractive uses, the official said.

In February, Mr. Bush used the antiquities law for the first time when he declared part of the African Burial Ground in the Lower Manhattan section of New York City a national monument. The site, covering less than half an acre, marks where an estimated 20,000 slaves and free blacks were buried in the 18th century.

President Clinton used the act to create 19 national monuments and expand three others to set aside 5.9 million acres of land.

Pacific Sanctuary Gets Bush's Signature (LAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush created a vast new marine sanctuary Thursday, extending stronger federal protections to the northwest Hawaiian Islands and the surrounding waters with their endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

DOJ_NMG_0034999

The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument covers an archipelago 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide in the Pacific Ocean. It is home to more than 7,000 species, at least one-fourth of them found nowhere else.

"To put this area in context, this national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park," Bush said. "It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined. This is a big deal."

Creation of the nation's 75th national monument was announced at a White House ceremony. The decision immediately sets aside 140,000 square miles of largely uninhabited islands, atolls, coral reef colonies and underwater peaks known as seamounts to be managed by federal and state agencies.

Bush said he drew inspiration from a documentary on the island chain's biological resources shown at the White House in April by Jean-Michel Cousteau, the marine explorer and filmmaker. Over dinner that night, Bush said he also got "a pretty good lecture about life" from marine biologist Sylvia Earle, an explorer-in-residence at the National Geographic Society.

In introducing the president, First Lady Laura Bush quoted Mark Twain, who once described Hawaii as "the loveliest fleet of islands that lies anchored in any ocean."

Conrad C. Lautenbacher, head of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which will manage nearly all of the protected area, said: "It's the single largest act of ocean conservation in history. It's a large milestone."

He added: "It is a place to maintain biodiversity and to maintain basically the nurseries of the Pacific. It spawns a lot of the life that permeates the middle of the Pacific Ocean."

It is only the second time that Bush has invoked the 1906 National Antiquities Act, which gives the president authority to create national monuments to preserve the nation's ancient cultural sites and unusual geological features.

Bush had planned as late as Wednesday to use the National Marine Sanctuary Act, a law that would allow challenges from Congress and others.

"As we drew closer and closer to our target to propose a marine sanctuary, and coupled with his great experience with Jean-Michel Cousteau and Sylvia Earle, he realized that we had the consensus, that we had run the process, and the time was right to just get the job done," said James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

Designating the area as a national monument takes immediate effect, Connaughton said, and the government doesn't have to wait to begin a five-year phaseout of the eight or nine commercial fishing permits in the area and to impose strict prohibitions on any other extractive uses.

In February, Bush used the antiquities law for the first time when he declared part of the African Burial Ground in Lower Manhattan a national monument. The site, covering less than half an acre, marks where an estimated 20,000 slaves and free blacks were buried in the 18th century.

Bush Signs Legislation On Broadcast Decency (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Complaining that television and radio shows in recent years have "too often pushed the bounds of decency," President Bush signed legislation yesterday to escalate dramatically the penalties against broadcasters who violate federal standards.

"The language is becoming coarser during the times when it's more likely children will be watching television," Bush said, citing a study of nighttime programming. "It's a bad trend, a bad sign." He noted that complaints to regulators have exploded since he took office. "People are saying, 'We're tired of it, and we expect the government to do something about it.' "

The ceremony came on a busy day for Bush as he tended to various matters in between his surprise visit to Baghdad this week and a domestic fundraising trip starting today followed by a European summit next week. In back-to-back events, Bush also gave a speech calling for action on stalled global trade talks, signed a bill to improve coal mine safety and authorized creation of the world's largest protected marine reserve.

The White House decided to showcase the signing of the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act at a time when Bush and Republican congressional allies are trying to reassure disaffected conservative supporters that they remain committed to conservative causes. With midterm elections approaching, Bush recently gave two speeches promoting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and the Senate plans to vote on another amendment that outlaws flag burning.

The decency act, coming two years after one of singer Janet Jackson's breasts was exposed in a "wardrobe malfunction" during a Super Bowl halftime show, increases the maximum penalty for broadcasting indecent material on radio or television between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m. from $32,500 to $325,000. The new law does not change the standards of indecency, which is defined as "patently offensive" sexual or excretory content.

Broadcasters and free-speech advocates argue that the legislation attacks expression and unfairly targets broadcast networks while cable and satellite programming remains beyond the reach of federal regulation. The main television networks and affiliates recently sued to challenge the government's power to regulate on-air content.

The National Association of Broadcasters yesterday released the same statement it issued when the legislation passed, calling "responsible self-regulation" the preferred path and asserting that any rules "should be applied equally" to cable and satellite outlets.

Bush also signed legislation to bolster safety in coal mines after a spate of deadly accidents, including the January explosion in West Virginia that trapped a dozen men who ultimately died. The lone survivor of that accident, Randal McCloy Jr., attended yesterday's ceremony. The new law requires more emergency supplies of breathable air, more accessible rescue teams and higher fines for violations.

At a separate event, the president signed a proclamation designating 140,000 square miles of sea and uninhabited islands northwest of Hawaii a national monument, an area larger than all but four states. The designation affords federal protection for the home of 7,000 marine species, including virtually the entire population of endangered Hawaiian monk seals.

The president also devoted part of his day to international trade and development, addressing a group formed by former secretaries of state Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright aimed at reducing global poverty. Bush used the occasion to urge Congress to pass his proposed increases in foreign aid and to press foreign leaders to work harder to reach a global trade deal with a June 30 deadline for basic agreements looming.

Accompanied by newly sworn-in U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab, Bush acknowledged that the so-called Doha trade talks have encountered "tough sledding" but said he would push for breakthroughs to lower trade barriers when he travels to Austria and Hungary next week.

"In my view, countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming and the G-20 countries have to make a tough decision on manufacturing," he said, referring to a group of 20 developing nations. "And the United States is prepared to make a tough decision along with them. That's my message to the world."

Bush Plan: World's Largest Ocean Reserve (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

With the stroke of a pen, President Bush has established the largest ocean wildlife reserve in the world, centered along a string of islands, reefs, and atolls that stretch 1,400 miles northwest of the main Hawaiian Islands.

Other reef systems, such as Australia's Great Barrier Reef, are larger. But only a third of that UN-designated World Heritage reef is protected, analysts say, leaving far more of it open to exploitation.

The move comes from an administration not known as the darling of the environmental and conservation crowd. But it's drawing kudos from a variety of marine-conservation groups. The region's relative isolation has allowed it to retain some of the most pristine coral reefs in the world. The president's proclamation Thursday, which designated the area as a national monument, immediately created a reserve that covers some 140,000 square miles, more territory than all of America's national parks combined.

"This is just amazing," says Ellen Athas, ecosystems-protection director for the Ocean Conservancy in Washington, who served on the president's Council on Environmental Quality under Bill Clinton. "This is an important first step in protecting some of the world's healthiest reefs for future generations."

The key provisions include:

· Restricting tourism activities, such as fishing and diving, to Midway Island, at the far northwest end of the chain.

· Phasing out commercial fishing over the next five years and banning it thereafter.

· Banning all resource extraction and waste-dumping.

· Banning "boats for hire," only allowing access to the area for research benefiting the reserve and for educational purposes.

· Preserving access for native Hawaiians - whose ancestors hopscotched down the chain to settle the Hawaiian Islands - for religious and cultural uses.

"This represents the first big symbol of - and inspiration for - a new generation of ocean conservation," says a senior White House official, who notes that the administration has been working on the issue for five years. "These are the Galápagos Islands in our own backyard."

Several analysts add that, in some respects, the move is a political no-brainer for the White House. Hawaii's Republican governor, Linda Lingle, has imposed similar restrictions in the region out to the state's three-mile limit, which built local support for expanding the restrictions. Except for a handful of commercial fishermen, the proposal has drawn virtually no opposition from other commercial interests because the region lacks oil deposits and other easily exploitable resources.

Still, "this is an extraordinary act for any sitting president," enthuses Joshua Reichert, director of policy initiatives and the environment program for the Pew Charitable Trust.

For all their biological diversity, the Northwest Hawaiian Islands are a chain of geophysical leftovers - about 10 islands and 100 coral atolls - that have emerged over geological time. They point to the eventual future for today's main islands as the crust continues to move and generate new undersea volcanoes to the southeast of the chain.

The first efforts to conserve the area came under Teddy Roosevelt, who designated the islands as national wildlife sanctuaries to protect seabird populations.

The next major move came under President Clinton, who signed an executive order in 2000 setting portions of the region aside as a national marine sanctuary. But executive orders can be rescinded by subsequent presidents.

President Bush's proclamation makes this permanent.

A key reason for the excitement among scientist and conservation groups is the reefs' relatively untrammeled condition. As a result, they represent the best example of what coral reef ecosystems should look like at a time many reefs around the world are under increasing stress from human and natural causes. Thus, it can provide a blueprint for restoration efforts elsewhere.

And their isolation has led to the evolution there of a large number of rare species of marine life found nowhere else in the world, notes Aulani Wilhelm, acting manager of the existing reserve. "This really is a living laboratory," she says.

To accelerate the phase-out of commercial fishing, one conservation group has expressed interest in negotiating a buyout of their permits, in effect retiring them immediately. Researchers point out that even the small amount of commercial fishing that has taken place in the Northwest Hawaiian Islands has virtually wiped out the chain's lobster population. The chain's bottom-dwelling fish are under increased pressure as well, researchers say.

And it's unclear what sort of stimulus this move will provide for setting other areas aside along US coasts because of the remote location, lack of deep commercial controversies, and a congressional moratorium on additional reserves. Still, a new reserve would represent a significant addition to those being established by other Pacific nations, such as Fiji and Kiribati.

Says one administration official: "By setting aside something on this scale, this is telling the rest of the world that the US is willing to walk the walk" on marine conservation.

Islands Apart (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

An unfamiliar but highly appealing side of President Bush showed itself at the White House yesterday. It was Mr. Bush the compassionate conservationist, friend of green sea turtles, seabirds and Hawaiian monk seals, savior of coral reefs and spiny lobsters, creator of the largest ocean sanctuary on the planet.

Mr. Bush has made the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument, putting them under some of the strictest environmental protections the law provides. It was an act of wilderness preservation that, acre for acre, instantly put him into the same league as the conservation-minded presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton.

If the state of Hawaii is a garland of flowers, the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands are a spray of petals, an arc of tiny reefs and atolls extending 1,200 miles beyond the last bits of Hawaii any tourists see. They are strewn across an area bigger than 100 Yosemites. They are among the remotest islands in the world, and in many ways pristine. Some in Hawaii call them the "kupuna islands," using the Hawaiian word for elders, since they teach people what the Pacific was like before plundering and pollution. Sharks, not fishing boats, are still at the top of the food chain. Ancient colonies of living coral reach heights of 80 feet. A quarter of the 7,000 marine species there exist nowhere else.

These islands are distant, but not undisturbed. The monk seals are endangered. Black-lipped pearl oysters were wiped out 75 years ago. The lobster fishery crashed in the 1990's. The islands' bottom-dwelling fish, snappers known on Hawaiian menus as opakapaka and onaga, are in serious decline.

Mr. Bush created the sanctuary by fiat, but his decision reflects a long-held consensus that the islands need protecting. Theodore Roosevelt created the first refuge there in 1909. Governor Linda Lingle had already imposed strict protections on her state's portion of the islands' waters. Mr. Bush, who overturned many of Bill Clinton's executive orders soon after taking office, spared two that had enabled the creation of a sanctuary there. His action yesterday, which ends sportfishing immediately and commercial fishing in five years, brought that process to a satisfying and necessary close.

In some ways, Mr. Bush's decision was supremely easy — the end of commercial fishing will affect only eight fishermen. But even so, the mind reels a little at what Mr. Bush has done. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands are a vast place few Americans have ever visited or ever will. But they are being protected anyway — not for divers, fishermen or cruise ships, but for their own sake, for science and forever. Mr. Bush made exemplary use of presidential power yesterday. We hope he does more of it.

Saving The Islands (WP)

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

ENVIRONMENTAL protection is not an area in which the Bush administration has cloaked itself in glory. But yesterday the president took a major step in ecosystem protection, designating as a national monument 140,000 square miles of some of the nation's most precious but vulnerable waters and islands.

The territory -- about the size of Montana -- is a remote, unpopulated string of islands extending 1,400 miles northwest from Hawaii's populated regions. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands, despite human impact, remain one of the most pristine natural regions left in the country. The waters there contain America's largest coral reef system. The islands are the nesting grounds of millions of seabirds, sea turtles and the endangered Hawaiian monk seal. The chain is home to at least 7,000 species, a quarter of which live nowhere else in the world -- along with relatively healthy stocks of large predatory fish whose populations elsewhere have been decimated by commercial fishing. The designation turns the waters around the island chain into the largest protected marine area in the world and sets an important marker for aggressive conservation of sensitive ocean regions under threat from human activity.

What's impressive is not just the designation itself but the fine print of President Bush's order. Despite tenacious pressure from regional fisheries managers, Mr. Bush decided not to permit any commercial fishing in the area. The small amount that goes on now will be phased out; a coalition of private donors will buy out the fishing permits of the eight fishermen who currently work those waters. What's more, in a happy surprise, Mr. Bush used his power under the National Antiquities Act to designate national monuments, not the more cumbersome federal marine sanctuaries law. As a result the plan goes into effect immediately, bypassing months of additional bureaucratic wrangling.

This administration and future ones should follow up with similar actions to protect other ecologically sensitive marine systems. America began protecting its land-based national parks and monuments a century ago, but the country has lagged in shielding its underwater treasures. Mr. Bush's action offers an exciting example of assertive action to put essential areas beyond further human destruction.

Senate Democrats Cry Foul Over Toxic Waste Sites (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

Washington — Senate Democrats on Thursday accused the Bush administration of withholding key details about toxic waste sites that present risks of exposure to nearby residents.

At a congressional hearing, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said the Environmental Protection Agency had designated as confidential the details of about 140 Superfund sites where toxic exposure remains uncontrolled.

Boxer and other Democrats said the secret data included information about how much money and time it would take to clean up the dangerous sites, including one where the EPA predicted it would take 26 years to close off access to toxics.

"This isn't a question of left or right," Boxer said, waving a document marked "Privileged" by EPA officials to prevent its release to the public. "This is a question of right and wrong."

The EPA said that it had only blocked information related to law enforcement and that the public had access to all relevant health risk data for the sites, seven of which are in California.

"There is far more information available for each (high priority) site than has ever been available before," said Susan Parker Bodine, the assistant administrator responsible for the Superfund program, which was designed to clean up toxic waste sites, such as chemical dumping grounds and contaminated factories.

Republicans said Democrats were trying to manufacture a political issue, noting that Senate tradition has long prevented the release of sensitive information.

They also said they feared Democrats were seeking to reinstate a controversial tax in which chemical manufacturers and other companies are forced to pay a fee to contribute to cleaning up waste sites, even if the companies played no role in creating the mess.

"This tax would fall on businesses already paying for their own cleanup or that had never created any kind of a Superfund site," said Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., the chairman of the Senate Environment Committee. "It would put a burden on those companies."

DOJ_NMG_0035003

Democrats have routinely accused the Bush administration of restricting access to information designed to protect the public. One Republican-sponsored bill moving through Congress would limit data available on toxic substances released into local communities, while the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has blocked information on flooding dangers in Florida.

Thursday's hearing of the Superfund and Waste Management Subcommittee was the first in four years. The Superfund program was created almost three decades ago in response to environmental disasters such as Love Canal, a neighborhood in Niagara Falls, N.Y., where chemical contamination forced the removal of 800 families and $200 million in remediation costs.

The cleanup effort has drawn criticism ever since, from environmentalists who claim it is under-funded and too slow, and from industry officials who say it is costly and punitive.

Bodine said that the agency had made significant progress, but that larger, more costly projects take more time to remediate, including many of the 140 sites at issue at Thursday's hearing.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said he was "disturbed" by some of the answers from Bodine, who at times appeared flustered and at a loss for words under the Democrats' withering questions. New Jersey, with 20, has the highest number of sites with uncontrolled exposure.

The EPA's decision to withhold information is "nonsense and everybody knows it's nonsense," Lautenberg said. "It's deceptive."

Of the roughly 140 Superfund sites said by Senate Democrats to cause "uncontrolled human exposure" to toxic waste, seven are in California:

Bush Signs Bill Overhauling Mine Safety (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod
AP2, June 15, 2006

With the sole survivor of the Sago mine disaster looking on, President Bush signed into law the first major overhaul of mine safety laws in three decades.

"Only one man came out, and he's with us today," Bush said Thursday of Randal McCloy Jr., who is still recovering from carbon monoxide poisoning from the January accident that killed a dozen miners in West Virginia. McCloy received a standing ovation from those attending the White House ceremony.

The new law, the first of its kind since 1977, requires miners to have two hours' worth of oxygen on hand while they work, rather than one.

Mine operators also must store additional oxygen supplies underground and must put new communications equipment and devices to track lost miners in mines within three years.

Congress passed the mine safety bill following a string of fatal accidents this year. Thirty-three miners have been killed on the job in the United States since the beginning of January, up from 22 throughout 2005.

"We make this promise to American miners and their families: We'll do everything possible to prevent mine accidents and make sure you're able to return safely to your loved ones," Bush said.

The president exchanged hugs and words with miners' families after he signed the bill.

In an emotional exchange with Pam Campbell, whose brother-in-law Marty Bennett died at Sago, Bush said, "I saw your eyes," referring to the tears Campbell shed when Bush was making his remarks.

"They've been that way a while," Campbell replied.

Deborah Hamner, whose husband, George Hamner, was killed at Sago, told the president that she was honored to attend the ceremony but opposed his choice to head the Mine Safety and Health Administration.

Bush's nominee, Richard Stickler, faces staunch opposition from Senate Democrats and miners' advocates. They say he has spent too many years as a coal industry executive.

DOJ_NMG_0035004

Bush defended his pick during the speech before the bill signing. "He was a miner, mine shift foreman, a superintendent, and a manager, and the Senate needs to confirm Richard Stickler to this key position," Bush said.

The new safety law includes a requirement that rescue teams be located within an hour of each mine, rather than two hours away.

The law also calls for the government to study whether mine rescue chambers ought to be built into underground coal mines. Such refuges are credited with saving the lives of 72 potash miners in Canada earlier this year.

Pennsylvania Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell, who attended the signing, said the bill should have required the rescue chambers to be put in place in coal mines.

West Virginia Democratic Gov. Joe Manchin and Kentucky Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher also turned out for the ceremony, and both praised the new law.

"We've kept the promise to the families that their brave loved ones have not died in vain," Manchin said.

Peggy Cohen, who lost her father, Fred Ware, at Sago, said she hoped lawmakers would continue to strengthen mine safety laws. "It's a start," she said of the new law. "Let's hope it's not the end."

Clinton Praises Evangelical Christians (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton praised evangelical Christians on Thursday for their recent efforts on global warming and debt relief for poor nations and said he sees growing understanding between people of different faiths.

Clinton made the remarks while accepting an award from the Tanenbaum Center for Interreligious Understanding. He said that as president he had "a consuming interest in the intersection of religion and politics."

He said evangelicals, few of whom voted for him, "were instrumental in the biggest debt relief initiative in history in my last year as president because they believed in the admonition of the Scripture to alleviate the burdens of the poor."

Clinton also noted the publication earlier this year of "Climate Change: An Evangelical Call to Action," which was signed by many leading conservative Christians and which frames environmental protection as a Christian imperative.

The mission of the New York-based Tanenbaum Center is to defuse physical violence perpetrated in the name of religion worldwide.

Clinton, speaking at the group's awards luncheon, said religion is a problem for both liberals and conservatives in the United States.

"For people in America who are a part of my political tradition, our great sin has often been ignoring religion or denying its power or refusing to engage it because it seemed hostile to us," he said. "For ... the so-called Christian right and its allies, their great sin has been believing they were in full possession of the truth."

Clinton, a Southern Baptist, noted that there was once a resolution at his denomination's convention to expel his church because of his positions in favor of abortion rights and gay rights. It failed.

A Shift Among The Evangelicals (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Sometimes very important elections receive very little attention.

When the Southern Baptist Convention elected the Rev. Frank Page as the group's president at its meeting this week in Greensboro, N.C., the news appeared on the back pages of most secular newspapers -- or it didn't appear at all.

But Page's upset victory could be very significant, both to the nation's religious life and to politics. He defeated candidates supported by the convention's staunchly conservative establishment, which has dominated the organization since the mid-1980s. His triumph is one of many signs that new breezes are blowing through the broader evangelical Christian world.

No, this is not some liberal victory. Indeed, the Baptist Press reported that Page went out of his way to tell reporters that he was not elected "to somehow undo the conservative resurgence" in the convention. But he also signaled that the spirit he hopes to embody is quite different from that of the angry, right-wing, politicized preacher who has been a stock figure in American life for more than two decades.

"I believe in the word of God," Page said. "I'm just not mad about it."

The mellowing of evangelical Christianity may well be the big American religious story of this decade. The evolution of the evangelical movement should not be confused with the rise of a religious left. Although the margin of the Republican Party's advantage among white evangelicals is likely to decline from its exceptionally high level in the 2004 election, a substantial majority of white evangelicals will probably remain conservative and continue to vote Republican.

But the evangelical political agenda is broadening as new voices insist on the urgency of issues such as Third World poverty and the fights against AIDS and human trafficking. Among the most prominent advocates for a wider view of Christian obligation is Rick Warren, pastor of Saddleback Church in Lake Forest, Calif., and author of "The Purpose Driven Life."

In the meantime, Rich Cizik, vice president for governmental affairs at the National Association of Evangelicals (and a self-described "Ronald Reagan movement conservative"), has been a leader in urging evangelicals to make environmental stewardship a central element of their political mission. This has earned him attacks from such prominent leaders on the Christian right as James Dobson.

In the Southern Baptist election, Page, pastor of First Baptist Church in Taylors, S.C., defeated two candidates more closely associated with the convention's conservative leadership, the Rev. Ronnie Floyd of Springdale, Ark., and the Rev. Jerry Sutton of Nashville. The election was important because the Southern Baptist Convention has been the locus of fierce struggles between moderates and conservatives in which the right emerged triumphant.

In response to the resulting purges and acrimony, moderate and progressive Baptists formed new organizations such as the Nashville-based Baptist Center for Ethics. Robert Parham, the center's executive director, argues that it would be a mistake to read too much into Page's triumph. "This was a race between the right and the far right," Parham said. "One election neither makes a positive trend nor unmakes the essence of fundamentalism."

Bill Leonard, the dean of the Wake Forest University Divinity School, largely agrees with Parham's analysis but argues that many Baptists are sensitive to "static or declining" membership numbers and the rising popularity of nondenominational churches such as Warren's.

The election, he said, indicates that "the leadership of the denomination that pushed it hard to the right on theological and social issues is aging or passing from the scene and is unable to rally the troops as they once did."

"Some people," Leonard added, "are tired of just fighting liberals. You need a reason to be a Southern Baptist other than just fighting liberals in the culture or in the church."

One other force was at work in this year's Baptist voting: the rise of the blogosphere.

Over the past several years, an active network of Baptist bloggers has opened up discussion in the convention and given reformers and moderates avenues around what Parham called "the Baptist establishment papers" and other means of communication controlled by the convention's leadership. Thus may some of our oldest and most traditional institutions be transformed by new technologies.

Religious movements stay vibrant thanks to the complicated interaction of fidelity, reflection and reform. The evangelical world is going through a quiet evolution as believers reflect on the perils of partisanship and ideology and their reasons for being Christian. This will probably affect the nation's political life, but it will certainly affect the country's spiritual direction. My hunch is that not only moderates and liberals but also many solid conservatives welcome the departure.

Alaska Is Front Line Vs. Avian Virus (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, June 16, 2006

BARROW, Alaska — Within sight of an Arctic radar station built for Cold War warnings of air attacks from Soviet Siberia, government scientists are stalking birds that could be carrying a new menace from Asia: the H5N1 avian influenza virus.

Tundra swans, lesser snow geese, spectacled eiders, long-billed dowitchers, bar-tailed godwits, northern pintails, ruddy turnstones: They all come to America. Wildlife biologists don't know which of these birds, if any, will be the first to carry the killer virus from the Eastern Hemisphere over the North Pole and down the flyways to the Lower 48.

Barrow, on the icy shore of the Arctic Ocean, is the USA's northernmost settlement. Two flyways for wild birds on their spring migration from Asia cross above the predominantly Inupiat Eskimo city of 4,800 people. As the birds nest on the marshy tundra under the midnight sun, 25 biologists are checking them for the first signs that H5N1 has reached the Americas.

“So far, no positives,” says Hon Ip, a virologist at the National Wildlife Health Center in Madison, Wis., which has analyzed 1,000 bird samples shipped by scientists in Alaska since April.

“I hope we don't find it,” says Corey Rossi, a U.S. Agriculture Department wildlife biologist based in Alaska. “But we're going to look as hard as we can. The public can take some reassurance in that.”

The Alaskan early-warning project is on the front line of a $29 million federal program to test thousands of birds in 50 states this year to guard against a possible pandemic. “It's a good thing they're here, hopefully protecting the rest of the North American continent,” says Bekah Barr, 20, a hotel employee in Barrow.

Biologists here find that in addition to anal swabs for sampling bird feces, they'll need plenty of patience to get the job done.

DOJ_NMG_0035006

In snow flurries at Barrow's municipal landfill one afternoon, Rossi sets out bait for sea gulls. It's chunks of the pink whale blubber Eskimos call muktuk, a local delicacy. If the seabirds roost on the bait, Rossi's team will fire cannons to deploy a net that traps them for testing. But the birds aren't gulled; they don't nibble until the scientists have left for the day.

There's another disappointment later that day at a nearby pond. Sandpipers, phalaropes and dunlins, small shorebirds that winter near Chinese and Vietnamese chicken farms devastated by the flu, walk toward Rossi's gossamer-thin "mist" net. A wind ripples the net, making it visible to the birds. They flutter away.

"Some days you spend a lot of energy, and you get an empty sack," Rossi says. "But you just gotta keep pressing on."

Undeterred, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service biologists go off by helicopter the next day to search for nests on the Alaskan North Slope tundra south of here. They tote shotguns in case bears attack.

"Swabbing butts is not my usual thing, but it's a national emergency," biologist Rick Lanctot says.

Public health officials have been bird-watchers since an outbreak of the H5N1 strain in poultry in Hong Kong in 1997 was blamed for 18 influenza cases in people. Six people died. An outbreak in Southeast Asia in 2003 has spread to more than 50 countries in Asia, Europe and Africa. It has caused the deaths of 200 million birds and at least 129 people, says Juan Lubroth, a veterinary scientist with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) in Rome.

If the virus turns up in the USA, the first threat would be to the $43 billion-a-year poultry industry. A greater fear is that a pandemic could break out if the virus were to mutate into a form that is easier to transmit from person to person. In 1918, a bird flu that jumped into humans caused the "Spanish flu" pandemic. It killed 20 million to 50 million people worldwide, including more than 500,000 in the USA.

Until last year, Lubroth says, scientists doubted that wild birds could carry or transmit lethal avian flu viruses such as H5N1. The only precedent was in 1961, when H5N1 killed terns in South Africa.

Then in the spring of 2005, 6,200 birds — bar-headed geese, cormorants, gulls and shelducks — were found dead at Qinghai Lake in west-central China. The HN51 viruses that killed them spread from the lake through swans and other migratory waterfowl across Asia and into Europe, according to a study by Hualan Chen of China's Harbin Veterinary Research Institute.

Chen called it "worrisome" that the viruses were in "a form associated with … adaptation to humans."

At an FAO conference in Rome last month, researchers concluded that migrating birds are one way the virus could spread and called for further investigation. Another way is through the export of poultry and poultry products.

"Wild birds can introduce the virus, but it's through the human activities of commerce, production and marketing of poultry that the disease spreads," Lubroth says.

The World Health Organization (WHO) says most human fatalities have resulted from handling sick birds on poultry farms or in backyard flocks. The Alaska Department of Fish and Game says that "if it arrives in North America, Asian H5N1 is more likely to be transported through virus-contaminated articles or illegally imported birds or bird products" than through migratory birds.

The WHO cites a half-dozen "very likely" cases of limited human-to-human transmission of bird flu that resulted in death. A single case of suspected human-to-human transmission began with wild birds, Caroline Brown, a WHO communicable-diseases researcher, told the Rome conference.

In Azerbaijan last February, she reported, there was a die-off of 1,952 swans from Siberia. Members of a family that depended on hunting for its income plucked feathers from dying swans. Seven people caught bird flu from viruses "closely related" to the Qinghai Lake strain, Brown said. Four died. A study by the WHO and U.S. Navy scientists said it was unlikely that all seven people contracted the virus directly from the swans.

The Alaska virus search is literally a wild goose chase. And it could turn out to be, well, a wild goose chase.

The government gathered 12,000 bird samples in Alaska between 1998 and 2005. No trace of H5N1 virus was found. Canada tested nearly 5,000 birds last year and found no H5N1.

Though the die-offs in Europe and Asia show that wild birds can carry the killer virus long distances, scientists don't know which species are infectious carriers of the virus, Lubroth says.

Henry Niman, a Pittsburgh biochemist who is researching bird-flu vaccines, says Russian scientists last year found H5N1 in the carcasses of 25 wild bird species. "This indicated that the virus isn't going to have a major barrier between waterfowl," Niman says. "But which species is bringing a lot of it over, by which flyway, is not totally nailed down yet. That's a key question."

Terry McElwain, director of the Washington Animal Disease Diagnostic Laboratory in Pullman, Wash., says he's not convinced that the virus will spread "through the mixing of the populations of birds in the Pacific Flyway." If this can happen, flocks now in Alaska are "a likely population to be targeting."

Bird testing by the U.S. and Canadian governments will be more extensive this year. U.S. scientists plan to sample 75,000 to 100,000 birds, including 19,000 in Alaska. Also, some poultry flocks will be monitored, and scientists will watch for suspicious die-offs of wild birds, the Agriculture Department says.

DOJ_NMG_0035007

Rossi and other biologists in Alaska are reporting success in capturing 29 targeted species of live waterfowl, shorebirds and land birds that are swabbed and released.

Biologists are also taking samples from the intestinal tracts of dead game birds that hunters bring in. And the biologists are collecting bird droppings in wetlands.

Samples go to labs in the Lower 48. If a swab tests positive for exposure to H5N1, the finding will be announced by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns or Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, says Gail Keirn, a spokeswoman for the Agriculture Department.

Next, a second lab will seek to confirm the result. Scientists will converge on the site where the affected bird was found. Poultry breeders will be warned to keep flocks from wild birds, Keirn says.

"Should the H5N1 virus appear in the U.S., it does not mean the start of a pandemic," the Department of Health and Human Services says.

A WHO study says wild birds pose a lower risk of spreading a pandemic than poultry. The virus carried by wild birds "will have less opportunity" to mutate into a human-to-human threat because relatively few people — hunters and ornithologists, mostly — are exposed to wild birds, the organization says.

Many Eskimos on Alaska's North Slope hunt wildfowl — as well as whales, walruses, seals and polar bears — as staples of their diet and traditional subsistence culture. The reception they give the scientists who are advising them of a potential threat isn't always warm.

"Right now, bird flu doesn't scare me at all," says James Nukapigak, an Inupiat tribal elder. "We eat what God has provided us for thousands of years, and we're still living on it."

Tommy Olemaun, executive director of the Native Village of Barrow, tribal government for the 51% of the city's population that is Eskimo, says just a handful of residents have taken government advice to wear rubber gloves when handling game birds.

"We hunt these birds since time immemorial, and we know when one is sick," says Olemaun, who says he kills 40 geese a year to feed his family and make soup for community feasts.

Olemaun criticizes the visiting biologists for failing to "communicate with our tradition, our own knowledge." Rather than ask natives about the best places to find birds, he says, "government men drop off the plane" and go to inappropriate testing places.

Charles Brower, 55, retired wildlife director for the tribal government, agrees. He says the biologists erred by stalking shorebirds in a pond abutting the city's sewage-outfall lagoon.

"It just makes me laugh to see them get all these birds from the most unsanitary area here," he says.

Brian Person, a wildlife biologist for North Slope Borough — the Alaska equivalent of a county government — says Brower was right in saying the pond was potentially contaminated. "But that wouldn't affect tests for the bird flu virus," Person says. Besides, he says, "that's where the birds were."

Another Death In Indonesia Deepens Fears Of Bird Flu's Spread (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The death of a 38th person from avian flu in Indonesia was confirmed yesterday by the World Health Organization and the situation in that country continued to worsen.

Indonesia is now in second place, after Vietnam, which has had 42 deaths, but none this year, while Indonesia's caseload is climbing rapidly and striking many family clusters.

The World Bank said Monday that Indonesia's response to the flu was disorganized and underfinanced. On Tuesday, the World Animal Health Organization said Indonesia was no longer even counting most poultry outbreaks. In the last year, it has officially reported the deaths of only 800 chickens, while there have been news reports of the deaths of thousands of birds from 29 of the country's 33 provinces.

Indonesia, the world's fourth-most-populous nation, has 242 million inhabitants and an estimated 1.3 billion chickens spread across 18,000 islands.

On Monday The Jakarta Post quoted several local health experts as saying that the government was not disclosing how widespread the disease was or how many times human-to-human transmission might have occurred. And last week Indonesia's health minister, Siti Fadilah Supari, said she was "running out of ideas for how to make the public aware" of the threat and get them to kill sick chickens instead of eating them.

Yesterday the Indonesian Health Ministry said the death of a 7-year-old girl in Banten Province on June 1 was the country's 38th from avian flu. The girl's 10-year-old brother died May 29, but he was buried before specimens were taken, so he was not included in the count. Chickens in the family's household had died earlier.

According to news agency reports quoting health officials, the 7-year-old had tested negative for avian flu in nose and throat swabs taken when she was alive, but then tested positive when lung tissue was taken after her death.

Nose and throat swabs — the routine way of diagnosing regular flu — may give false negatives because the bird flu virus attaches to cells deep in the lungs, not to the upper respiratory tract. In January, according to the World Health Organization, the same error caused the first human cases in Turkey's outbreak to be misdiagnosed.

Dr. Henry L. Niman, a biochemist who has questioned many of the health organization's official counts, argued that flu cases were underestimated because of that error and because blood tests could also produce false negatives if the blood was drawn before detectable antibodies had built up. Victims can die before that happens, and the outbreak in Indonesia has a very high death rate: of the 50 known cases, 38 have died.

An Indonesian newspaper, The Tempo, reported yesterday that one of its reporters who covered the extermination of infected poultry and the funeral of a flu victim near Jakarta had been hospitalized with flu symptoms; the newspaper did not report any test results.

Dick Thompson, a World Health Organization spokesman, said he knew nothing about the reporter who fell ill, but he said the agency was drafting safety guidelines for journalists. "Some of them are getting pretty close to cases," he said.

There have been several reports of Indonesian nurses' falling sick after tending avian flu victims, which could indicate that the virus was spreading more easily between humans. On June 6, the World Health Organization reported that tests on four such nurses had convincingly ruled out A(H5N1), the avian flu, and indicated that one had a seasonal flu, A(H1N1), instead.

Dr. Niman said convincing evidence could be obtained only from blood tests.

Mr. Thompson, who recently returned from Indonesia, said that he did not know how the nurses had been tested, but that he thought that Indonesian health authorities "are really on top of the human cases, investigating them aggressively," even though animal cases were spiraling out of control.

FBI Agent Sentenced (CO)

By Jim Morrill

The Charlotte Observer, June 16, 2006

A federal judge Thursday sentenced former Charlotte FBI agent Erik Blowers, who was the ethics adviser to agents across North Carolina, to two years probation for failing to disclose gifts and favors from a one-time informant.

The sentencing by U.S. District Judge Carlton Tilley in Greensboro came six months after Blowers pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor offense that could have brought him up to a year in prison. He was the first FBI agent ever charged in the state.

That plea followed Blowers' indictment on a felony charge for the same conduct. Documents filed by U.S. Justice Department prosecutors claimed Blowers misled supervisors, lied to investigators and had extensive business dealings with a convicted drug trafficker.

Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Probation (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, June 16, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C. - A former FBI agent accused of lying about two trips to Las Vegas that were paid for by an informant was sentenced Thursday to two years probation, his attorney said.

Erik Blowers, once the chief legal counsel and ethics adviser for the FBI office in Charlotte, pleaded guilty in November to making a false report. He also resigned from the agency.

Blowers was also ordered Thursday to perform 400 hours of community service.

"We are pleased that the judge found that Erik did not adversely effect the integrity of any FBI investigation," said his lawyer, Chris Fialko.

The case against Blowers stemmed from two trips he took to Las Vegas in 2000 with David Simonini, and for his failure to report thousands of dollars in travel expenses and gifts from the homebuilder.

Blowers headed an FBI investigation of Simonini, a former informant who later pleaded guilty to money laundering and bank fraud.

22 Suspects Arrested As U.S. Targets Global Drug Network (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035009

Federal drug agents have disrupted an international heroin smuggling ring responsible for shipping more than $14 million worth of the drug into the United States since 2004, arresting 22 suspected gang members and seizing more than 60 pounds of heroin.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Rusty Payne said agents also confiscated more than $220,000 in cash during raids with authorities in Trinidad and Ecuador, as well as heroin abandoned by drug couriers in a Guayaquil, Ecuador, hotel, at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston, at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York and at Piarco International Airport in Trinidad.

"Heroin-laden clothes or heroin hidden in soles of shoes -- it makes no difference how it is smuggled into the United States, law enforcement will find it," said John P. Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office. "This investigation shows that through collaborative efforts with our local and international partners, the DEA is committed to identifying, investigating and dismantling drug trafficking organizations so we can stop the flow of poison onto the streets of our communities."

The arrests culminated a 10-month undercover investigation led by Justice Department's Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and, Mr. Payne said, involved multiple confidential witnesses and sources, court-authorized wiretaps, surveillance and a controlled heroin delivery.

On Wednesday and yesterday, he said, nine suspects were arrested in Las Vegas, one in Palm Springs, Calif., one in Caguas, Puerto Rico, and one in New York. Other suspects were taken into custody earlier this month.

A criminal complaint in the case, unsealed yesterday in New York, identified the organization's leaders as Javier Alexander Alvarez Monroy, 26, a former police officer in Bogota, Colombia, and Marc Klindt, 29, both of whom are accused of using couriers to smuggle the organization's heroin from several countries, including Ecuador, Venezuela, Trinidad and Tobago, Colombia, Brazil and Mexico, to New York for distribution.

One of the couriers is identified in the complaint as Jeanette Vidal, 47, a Las Vegas-area school teacher.

Mr. Payne said the organization employed more than a dozen drug couriers and recruiters, many of whom made multiple drug trips and were based in the Las Vegas area. He said the couriers smuggled 6 to 10 pounds of heroin per trip within the lining of clothes.

He also said investigators discovered that Mr. Monroy and Mr. Klindt used the Internet to communicate with their foreign suppliers and their drug couriers.

Others charged were Wendy Holiday, 35, Chantelle Davila, 31, and Paola Lujan, age unknown, accused of recruiting couriers for the organization. Hector Navarro was accused of assisting in the gang's money-laundering activities.

Officials Gather To Fight Deadly Fentanyl Outbreak (DFP)

By Kim Norris

Detroit Free Press, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO - Just one hundred and twenty-five micrograms - the equivalent of six grains of salt - is enough fentanyl to kill.

Mix it with heroin or cocaine, and you have a high to die for - literally.

In Pittsburgh, heroin mixed with fentanyl is being marketed on the street under the name "get high or die tryin.'"

In metro Detroit, so far this year, 83 people have died trying.

The seriousness of the spreading threat drew more than 125 law enforcement officials, scientists, public health officials and emergency first responders from seven cities and Mexico to Chicago on Wednesday and Thursday to learn about the potentially lethal painkiller and where it's coming from. Even Scott Burns, deputy drug czar, in the Bush administration was on hand.

"This is a serious drug," said Timothy Ogden, Drug Enforcement Administration associate special agent,

He held up a little plastic bag in which tiny particles of powder were barely visible.

"This is enough fentanyl to kill you, " he said.

"In my 30 years of drug enforcement work, I haven't seen a threat that bothers me as much," Ogden said.

He likened the use of illegal drugs to playing Russian roulette with a single bullet, but with fentanyl, he said, "It's like playing Russian roulette with six bullets in the gun."

The fentanyl being mixed with street drugs most likely was manufactured in multiple clandestine labs, possibly in Mexico, Ogden said Thursday.

This outbreak is more widespread than previous ones, he said. "It appears there may be independent distributors operating in different cities," he added.

Chicago has had an explosion of drug overdose cases in the last two months, many in people taking heroin laced with fentanyl. The city has had 60 deaths in about a year.

DOJ_NMG_0035010

Detroit experienced a similar increase, but in a much more concentrated period of time. And, unlike in Chicago, where people are surviving the overdoses, most of the known fentanyl cases in Detroit have been dead on arrival.

Fentanyl is a synthetically manufactured pain medication that is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine. In its legally prescribed form, it typically is administered through a patch, an oral lozenge or through injections. It often is prescribed to cancer patients.

Although the number of suspected drug deaths has fallen back to more normal levels in the past two weeks in metro Detroit, fentanyl-laced heroin has been popping up in more and more cities, with similar deadly results. And a lull does not indicate the problem is past, authorities said.

"There's always a concern when the drug is being manufactured that it can come back at any time, especially if it's being manufactured in the states," said James Tolbert, commander of the organized crime division for the Detroit Police Department, who attended the conference.

"That's why we're cooperating with all our local folks and the people here, to try to determine where the source is."

John Arvanitis, assistant special agent in charge of the Detroit field division of the DEA, said the most important thing that came out of the conference, was "the realization of the magnitude of the situation.

"That will facilitate coordination among state, local and federal authorities in a national effort to disrupt and dismantle the organization s involved in this, " he said.

130 Dead From New U.S. Super-heroin (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, June 15, 2006

Federal and local officials in the U.S. Midwest are trying to determine the source of a new enhanced form of heroin that has killed at least 130 people.

The bulk of the deaths have been in and around Chicago and Detroit but victims have also shown up from St. Louis to Philadelphia, The New York Times reported Thursday.

The additive to the heroin is the commercial painkiller fentanyl, which is 50 to 100 times more powerful than morphine. Fentanyl enhances the effect of the heroin, but can also cause the user's respiratory system to shut down, health officials told the Times.

Chicago Police Superintendent Philip Cline, said in an interview his officers are working with the Drug Enforcement Administration looking for common contacts among overdose cases.

The city published fliers warning drug users of the consequences of using the drug, but Cline said drug dealers were seen waving the fliers, advertising they were selling the very thing the fliers warned about.

Amid Fentanyl Deaths, Investigation, Addicts Keep Using (AP)

By Michael Tarm

AP, June 15, 2006

CHICAGO - A self-described drug addict stood by a vacant lot on the city's South Side Thursday and pointed down the block where he says more than a dozen of his friends and acquaintances died after using fentanyl-laced heroin.

"Joe died down there, and then there was Rita, Cherlyn, Marvin died somewhere over there - and Chico there," said Don Howard, 59, flanked by rows of derelict buildings and a sign atop a lamppost that read, "Chicago Blues District."

Several miles away, police and drug enforcement officials from around the country ended two days of discussions Thursday on the possible source of the bad heroin that killed Don's friends and at least 100 others from Chicago to Philadelphia.

"In my almost 30 years of law enforcement experience, I haven't seen a threat that concerns me this much," said Tim Ogden, an agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago office. "Fentanyl is a very, very potent substance."

The summit provided officials from 12 states and Washington D.C. the chance to coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the beginning of this year, Ogden said at a news conference.

There were outbreaks of fentanyl-laced heroin in the '80s and early '90s, said Arlington, Va.-based DEA spokeswoman Mary Irene Cooper, who was in Chicago for the meeting. The difference is that the outbreaks aren't isolated this time to one city.

"We're trying to figure out why it's spreading so widely," she said.

Fentanyl is a legally produced prescription pain killer. But the type of fentanyl currently being mixed with heroin is most likely manufactured in illicit labs, Ogden said.

Ogden said that just 125 micrograms of the illegal fentanyl - the equivalent of a few grains of salt - are more than enough to kill.

"I view fentanyl use as taking a six (chamber) revolver, putting five bullets in it, putting it to your temple and pulling the trigger," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0035011

Yet, its deadliness doesn't appear to have dissuaded hardened drug addicts.

After Chicago police publicized one street corner where samples of fentanyl-laced heroin had been handed out - thinking addicts would steer clear of the area - drug users flocked there hoping to score free heroin, Police Supt. Philip Cline said.

"We have willing victims here," he said. "That's part of the problem."

In Chicago, there have been more than 60 confirmed fentanyl overdoses since April, 2005, with the vast majority of them coming this year, the DEA said. Detroit, Philadelphia, New Jersey and Delaware have also reported an uptick in fentanyl deaths.

Howard, who also goes by the nickname "Moon," agreed there is less fear among many addicts than non-addicts might presume.

"Some addicts are frightened, but others aren't," he said. "They just feel that if it's their time it's their time."

"Suicidal behavior comes from being an addict," agreed Francois Seets, a 58-year-old recovering addict from Chicago. "They think they're immortal. ... And they think it (the fentanyl contamination) will pass."

So infinitesimal are the amounts of fentanyl, said Seets, that there is virtually no way of determining whether a bag of heroin is laced with it. The fentanyl, he said, wouldn't affect the taste or look of the narcotic.

"You wouldn't know it's bad until you collapse," he said.

Howard, who said he struggles to scrape together the $10 it costs for a small bag of heroin, said he doesn't turn down free samples of heroin - even though such samples have been linked to the recent fentanyl deaths.

But he does take precautions.

Before settling down to shoot up a sample with friends, "I let somebody else go first to be sure," Howard said.

Seets said the fentanyl outbreak does serve as an inspiration to him, driving home the potentially deadly consequences of a relapse.

"It makes me understand I am mortal," he said.

Some Facts About Fentanyl (AP)

AP, June 15, 2006

WHAT IS IT?: Fentanyl, which is considered 80 times stronger than morphine, is used legally to treat chronic pain and as anesthesia for open-heart surgery. Some drug dealers mix it into heroin to make the narcotic more potent.

WHERE: There have been deaths from fentanyl-laced heroin in at least half a dozen U.S. cities - from Chicago to Detroit to Philadelphia. Medical experts say fentanyl can cause breathing problems and make users feel as if they are suffocating.

WHERE'S IT COMING FROM?: It's not clear. Drug enforcement officials say the fentanyl was probably made at one or more illicit labs. They're also considering the possibility that at least some of it came from sources in Mexico.

Death Ignites New Discussion On Drug Use In Park Ridge (PRHA)

By Jennifer Johnson

Park Ridge Herald Advocate, June 16, 2006

The death of Park Ridge resident Joseph Krecker, 17, in what Chicago police identified as an apparent drug overdose, has ignited more discussion about drug use among Park Ridge youth.

Members of the city's Health Commission, which has set a goal of tackling addiction in the community, say parents need to know that heroin use exists among teens.

According to commission member Dr. John Bello, Krecker's death "illustrates the need to make sure we educate the parents out there that [heroin use] is still a major issue and a problem that everyone needs to be aware of."

At the Health Commission's next meeting, on June 22 at City Hall, Bello said the group will discuss how to alert the community to what is taking place, particularly regarding the distribution of fentanyl-laced heroin and its deadly consequences.

"We want to know what would be the best way to reach people," Bello said. "I think it will be trial and error, to see what is most effective."

During a Town Hall Meeting held in Park Ridge in March to address drug and alcohol use among teens, Park Ridge Deputy Police Chief Tom Swoboda said heroin and Ecstasy are the most prevalent "hard drugs" found in Park Ridge.

Park Ridge police have said that while open dealing of heroin does not occur on Park Ridge street corners, users are known to drive to certain Chicago neighborhoods to purchase drugs.

A survey of Maine Township High School District 207 students in December found that 2 percent of seniors, 1 percent of juniors, 2 percent of sophomores and 1 percent of freshmen admitted to trying heroin. Fewer than 1 percent of the students in each grade admitted they had used heroin in the last month before taking the survey.

DOJ_NMG_0035012

Dr. Martin Doot, medical director of Advocate Lutheran General Hospital's Addiction Treatment Program and a member of the Park Ridge Health Commission, said the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration recently sent out a warning to physicians about the presence of fentanyl in many overdose victims.

"There's been a rash of fatalities or overdoses that have been seen in the Chicago area and they have tragically affected Park Ridge residents," Doot said.

Doot advises parents to get their children professional help "as soon as possible" if they have been experimenting with drugs, or if they already have an addiction.

Some local resources parents can turn to include the Maine Center at 832 Busse Highway, in Park Ridge, or addiction treatment programs at Advocate Lutheran General Hospital or Northwest Community Hospital in Arlington Heights.

"Good help is available," Doot said.

New treatments for heroin addiction, including medication that is an alternative to methadone maintenance traditionally used to treat heroin withdrawal, are available and "very promising," Doot added.

"The problem is, often people wait too long to get the help they need," he said.

Park Ridge Police Chief Jeff Caudill said feedback from the police department's social worker, school resource officers and surveys taken by students indicates that teens "want their school to be drug free." The support from parents for drug sniffing dogs in the District 207's three high schools is also positive, Caudill said.

D.C.'s 'Teflon Defendant' Acquitted In Latest Trial (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

Half Brother Testified for Prosecution

Corey A. Moore, the D.C. street legend who has slipped through the hands of prosecutors again and again, has survived another trial -- one that featured his half brother as the key government witness.

Moore, 30, was acquitted yesterday by a federal jury of drug, firearms and conspiracy charges -- clearing the way for his release after nearly two years of denying wrongdoing and awaiting trial.

"Thank you," a visibly relieved Moore said to jurors after the verdict was read. The decision came after a trial that stretched for more than two months. Family members embraced in the courtroom.

Moore famously stood trial four times for a 1994 slaying -- and four times the jury came back deadlocked, leading prosecutors to finally drop the murder charge. The string of prosecutorial failures led some authorities to dub Moore the "Teflon defendant." Over the years, Moore has been charged with three murders, assault with intent to kill, assault with a deadly weapon and armed robbery. Each charge was dismissed before trial or resulted in an acquittal.

Moore was convicted once, in 1996, of a weapons charge that netted him a 51-month prison term.

He had said that he was living a law-abiding life when authorities arrested him in August 2004, holding jobs as a youth counselor and car salesman. Prosecutors saw it differently: Moore, they said, had participated in a drug conspiracy with others for at least two years and helped supply crack cocaine and heroin.

Besides the drug charges, a grand jury indicted Moore for weapons violations after federal agents said they found a bag they described as an "assassin's tool kit" when searching his Northeast Washington home. The items included a .357 magnum, a ski mask and a glove.

Moore's attorney, Jonathan Zucker, said prosecutors had little evidence against his client and accused them of an effort to punish Moore for his alleged past sins.

Zucker said the only witness to testify that Moore was seen with drugs was his half brother, Andre Richardson. In closing arguments, Zucker told jurors that Richardson was lying to shave years off his sentence for carjacking and other crimes. Zucker also raised questions about whether the "assassin's kit" was Moore's.

The jury was not told about Moore's previous trials.

One of Moore's co-defendants, Timothy Thomas, was found guilty of drug and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth instructed jurors to continue deliberating on the fate of a third defendant, Frederick A. Miller.

Sitting in a courtroom wearing wire-rimmed glasses and a suit several sizes too big, Moore looked bookish, not like the person who prosecutors have said was once a teenage enforcer for the Condon Terrace Crew, a violent band of young men who lorded over a stretch of turf east of the Anacostia River. He did not testify.

After the verdict, Moore's wife, Holly Williams, said she hoped prosecutors would stop targeting her husband but added, "I think that may be naive."

Throughout the trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Julius Rothstein sought to portray Moore as a thug who tried to intimidate his brother into silence through emotional appeals and veiled threats.

DOJ_NMG_0035013

Allegations of witness tampering and intimidation almost threw the trial in disarray, with Richardson at one point refusing to continue testifying because he said he feared for his safety. At issue was a number of telephone calls from family members in which they appeared to pressure Richardson to stop testifying against his brother.

Moore also sent his half brother a letter, introduced as evidence, that said by relying on informers, the "prison-industrial complex is a disguise for modern-day slavery." By participating, the letter added, "You will be an outcast, and may the curse of the ancestors be upon you if you take the poison to be exploited by the United States."

At the bottom of the letter was a quote: "Death B4 Dishonor."

Richardson testified that he understood the letter to be a threat. But faced with a 30-years-to-life sentence and hoping for a break by assisting the prosecution, he continued to testify.

Holly Williams said Richardson's testimony was hurtful. "It was just sad," she said. "But we pray for him."

Selig Admits Baseball's 'Problems' (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Nine days after federal agents reported that pitcher Jason Grimsley had admitted using performance-enhancing substances, Commissioner Bud Selig issued an open letter to fans about the development. Selig acknowledged that "there are problems" in Major League Baseball and said he was "committed to protecting our game."

In a letter that Selig gave to mlb.com and placed in a number of newspapers today, he said that he was "disappointed and angered by revelations that a major league player had acknowledged using human growth hormone" and "had said that others were using HGH as well." Grimsley, who was pitching for the Diamondbacks but was released after reports of his drug use, was not cited by name in Selig's letter.

The Grimsley matter has created new questions about how many players might be using performance-enhancing substances. Selig's letter was an attempt to assure the fans, and perhaps some politicians as well, that Major League Baseball officials are serious about solving the problem.

Selig has been frustrated that baseball has been criticized for not having a test for human growth hormone. But no professional sports leagues test for it, and the letter, in a way, allowed Selig to vent.

He noted that baseball tests for steroids and amphetamines, and that human growth hormone is banned. But Selig also explained that there is no effective blood test to detect human growth hormone and said it "represents a threat to all sports everywhere."

Selig said that the overwhelming majority of the 750 major leaguers are honorable, but added that there are players who will cheat to try to gain an unfair advantage. Selig said those players damage themselves, raise doubts about the players who follow the rules and violate the trust fans place in them.

"These players who use performance-enhancing substances offend all of us who care for the game, and I will not tolerate their actions," Selig said.

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Commissioner Bud Selig, in an open letter to baseball fans that appears Friday in five major publications, including USA TODAY, blasts players who use performance-enhancing substances and says he is committed to protecting the integrity of the sport.

"These players who use performing-enhancing substances offend all of us who care for the game and I will not tolerate their actions," Selig wrote. "I won't be deterred and will do everything I can to try to keep up with or even stay ahead of those who break the law and break our rules."

Selig said he was prompted to write the letter after former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley told an Internal Revenue Service investigator in a search warrant affidavit unsealed last week that he used steroids, human growth hormone (HGH) and amphetamines throughout his career.

The next day he was released by the Diamondbacks. He was also suspended for 50 games by Selig should he attempt to return to the major leagues.

In the letter, Selig said "we are committed to funding a study of HGH and how to detect it.... Also, we are willing to make additional contributions to fund other studies to determine how to detect HGH and are currently reaching out to experts in the field to ascertain what other studies can immediately begin."

Garbage Held Clues In Steroid Import Case (ALBANYTU)

By Dan Higgins, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, June 15, 2006

Court papers detail how agents sought evidence of alleged dealing

A two-year federal investigation of a North Greenbush man included intercepting his mail and, on one occasion, rifling through his trash before authorities charged him with attempting to receive anabolic steroids from China, according to documents filed in federal court.

Christopher Magnano, 33, faces charges connected to what officials described as an Internet-based sales operation of the illegal substances, which were seized from his North Greenbush home following his May 19 arrest. Police said the seizure of anabolic steroids and human growth hormone was the largest ever in the Capital Region.

The documents filed in U.S. District Court in Albany shed more light on the investigation that led agents to suspect Magnano. Magnano is charged with illegal possession of anabolic steroids with the intent to distribute. Federal officials said more charges could follow as the investigation continues.

Authorities allege that when they confronted him, Magnano explained how he received anabolic steroids from China for several years and resold them over the Internet. But his attorney, Bryan Rounds, challenged that claim Tuesday.

"The words attributed to my client were not spoken by him," Rounds said. He said whatever Magnano told investigators has been "pulled, twisted, and taken out of context," and that the paraphrasing in the court documents shows that it was a "second- or third-hand account."

Rounds said no evidence shows that Magnano had any intention to sell the substances and that he questions whether the materials seized have been correctly tested and identified as illegal steroids.

Magnano had been under suspicion by at least three federal agencies, according to an affidavit from a U.S. postal inspector. Postal inspectors had intercepted his mail, and agents from the Food and Drug Administration's criminal enforcement unit even searched the garbage outside his Sequoia Drive home, where they said they found empty bottles of anabolic steroids and used syringes. That information was used to obtain the search warrant that led to the seizure.

In a statement, a postal inspector assigned to Troy said agents were alerted after Magnano set up several post office boxes around the Capital Region and received mail at his home address. He frequently received packages from other countries and was evasive on one occasion when postal employees asked him about a parcel's contents, according to the inspector's deposition.

Adding to their suspicions, inspectors learned Magnano had a history of drug convictions. He served time in state prison for selling LSD and hallucinogenic mushrooms in the 1990s.

Last year, the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigations told a Troy-based postal inspector that their agency also was investigating Magnano. They suspected he had been receiving anabolic steroids and human growth hormone. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents at Kennedy Airport in New York City intercepted mail addressed to Magnano from China that they said contained the illegal substances.

The week Magnano was arrested in May, FDA agents learned Magnano was going to receive another suspicious shipment from China. The authorities set up a bust in which police asked a DHL employee in Latham to call Magnano and tell him his package had arrived. When Magnano turned up to retrieve the package, an undercover agent handed it to him. That's when Colonie police took him into custody.

According to court records, Magnano had packages in his car containing more illegal steroids that agents contend he was preparing to mail to his buyers.

Magnano has pleaded not guilty to the charges and remains free on bail.

Deputies Find Remote Pot Garden (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, June 15, 2006

AUBURN -- An anonymous tip led Placer County sheriff's investigators on Wednesday to more than 17,000 marijuana plants being grown on U.S. Forest Service land between Auburn and Foresthill, authorities said.

The pot plot, in Gas Canyon, had plants between 6 inches and 2 feet tall, according to the Sheriff's Department.

As investigators were removing the plants, a person carrying a rifle was seen fleeing on foot, but was not caught. One rifle was recovered at the scene.

Authorities warned people to be careful when hiking off-trail in the wilderness, since marijuana growers often are armed.

KING OF BLING BUSTED (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell And Dan Mangan

DOJ_NMG_0035015

The New York Post, June 16, 2006

The feds want to ice Jacob the Jeweler.

The famed Manhattan purveyor of diamond-encrusted "bling" to Madonna, Diddy, hoop star Allen Iverson and other celebs was busted yesterday on charges he helped two coke kingpins launder some of their $270 million in dirty drug profits by selling them jewelry.

Jacob "The Jeweler" Arabo received "large sums of currency" for various pieces of jewelry from the leaders of the so-called Black Mafia Family drug ring and their flunkies, according to a Detroit federal-court indictment unsealed yesterday that also charges 15 others with drug and laundering crimes.

The 41-year-old Uzbeki immigrant, born Jakov Arabov, then either failed to file tax forms required for business transactions totaling more than $10,000, or submitted false tax forms that declared the purchasers were people other than the actual buyers, the indictment claims.

The scheme allegedly was designed to conceal that the jewelry purchases were made with proceeds from the Black Mafia Family's sales of thousands of kilos of cocaine in Detroit, California, Kentucky, Georgia, Texas and elsewhere, and to hide the true ownership of those funds.

The gang's alleged leaders operate BMF Entertainment, a rap-music label, and have extensive connections in the hip-hop world, as does Arabo.

He was arrested at 8:30 a.m. yesterday at his Jacob & Company boutique at 48 E. 57th Street by federal agents, and led away in handcuffs.

Authorities also seized documents from the exclusive boutique - a converted brownstone designed to resemble the interior of a diamond mine - where the "King of Bling" has welcomed some of the world's most famous singers and athletes.

The boutique was shuttered for the rest of the day, with a sign hung on the doorway saying, "Closed for inventory," on Jacob & Company stationery.

"Holy s---, I have a necklace in there!" yelped one female customer after a reporter told her the actual reason she would not be able to collect her purchase.

Arabo later appeared in the afternoon at Manhattan federal court for a hearing, where he was released on a $100,000 personal-recognizance bond.

Wearing charcoal-gray pinstripe pants and a blue dress shirt, his wavy black hair slicked back on his head, the jeweler paid rapt attention during the proceeding.

Federal Magistrate Frank Maas noted Arabo allegedly "conspired with others to laun der monetary instruments . . . in connection with your jewelry business."

Arabo, who left court with wife Angela, next is due to appear in Detroit federal court on July 10.

His defense lawyer, Benjamin Brafman, said, "The arrest of Mr. Arabo is the result of an unfortunate misunderstanding that we believe will be straightened out in the next several weeks.

"We are confident that once the government is advised of all the facts surrounding these issues that all of the charges against Mr. Arabo will be completely dismissed."

Arabo's arrest is a rare wrong note in his Horatio Alger-like rise in New York, where he arrived at age 16 to work in the Diamond District, and later began developing clientele from the world of rap music.

Yesterday's indictment is related to a prior set of federal charges filed in October in Detroit against a slew of members and associates of the Black Mafia Family, allegedly headed by Demetrius "Meech" Flenory, 45, and his 35-year-old brother, Terry Lee Flenory.

Demetrius is charged in an unrelated case with murdering two close friends of rap impresario Sean "Diddy" Combs in Atlanta in 2003.

One of the victims, Anthony "Wolf" Jones, was a former bodyguard for Combs and was with him, singer Jennifer Lopez, and rapper Jamal "Shyne" Barrow in Club New York in Manhattan in 1999 when Barrow shot and wounded two men.

Jones and Combs were acquitted of criminal charges in a subsequent trial, but Barrow was convicted and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

The Flenory brothers, originally from Detroit, allegedly grew the Black Mafia Family over two decades from a drug organization that dealt smaller quantities of cocaine in that city into a much bigger operation with tentacles throughout the country.

The profits of those sales allegedly were laundered in a variety of ways to make the money appear legitimate, including purchases from Jacob.

Authorities said the Black Mafia Family would purchase winning Michigan lottery tickets worth more than $1 million from their true winners so that the ducats could be redeemed, with the money used to purchase homes and cars, and make mortgage payments.

Clarksdale Man Arrested In Slaying Of Federal Witness (JACKCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 16, 2006

A 24-year-old Clarksdale man has been arrested in connection with the slaying of a federal witness found dead earlier this month on a Coahoma County road.

Kenneth C. Walker was arrested by an ATF violent crime federal task force for his alleged involvement in the retaliation against a federal witness and on a charge of discharge/possession of a firearm during a federal violent crime.

William Christopher Haro, 27, a witness in a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives case, was found shot multiple times June 9.

Walker was arrested without incident Tuesday and made an initial appearance before a federal judge.

Lawyer Jailed On Gun Charges (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, June 16, 2006

Indictment stems from April raid on residence

Federal authorities want to keep Charleston attorney Dante di Trapano in jail until a trial on gun charges related to drug addiction, contending he could be a danger to the community.

Di Trapano was indicted on two counts Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Charleston and arrested Thursday morning. Federal authorities argued he could be a danger to the community and pointed out his former law firm has hired an off-duty Charleston police officer for protection against him.

Di Trapano was indicted based on eight guns found in an April raid federal agents conducted on his South Hills residence.

Already charged in March with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine in Florida, di Trapano had said then he was checking himself into a drug rehabilitation program. Wednesday's indictment charged him with being "an unlawful user of and addicted to a controlled substance" while in possession of the guns and for allegedly lying on a federal form when he purchased a gun Feb. 4, stating he was not addicted to or using drugs.

While his attorney, Michael Del Giudice, requested an immediate bond hearing, U.S. attorneys said di Trapano needed to be locked up for at least three days while the probation office prepares a report. U.S. Magistrate Judge Mary Stanley agreed and set a hearing for Tuesday at 2 p.m. on the government's motion to detain him without bond until trial.

As part of their argument to keep di Trapano in jail, the government noted that on May 31 diTrapano's former law firm, Di Trapano Barrett & DiPiero, hired the off-duty officer "based on the concern that [Dante di Trapano] would damage the building or equipment and out of concern for the safety of the employees of the firm."

No one from the firm, established by Dante di Trapano's father, former state Democratic Party chairman Rudolph Di Trapano, would comment.

Del Giudice said he had no knowledge of his client's relationship with his former firm. "There's obviously been a divorce between he and his partners," he said.

Prosecutors also noted di Trapano's Sunday arrest for driving with a suspended license. When he was arrested Thursday, prosecutors noted he was again driving with a suspended license. Magistrate Judge Stanley also said she had seen di Trapano driving on Wednesday.

He was being held in South Central Regional Jail in Charleston.

House Panel Backs ATF Fee, At A Discount (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The House Appropriations Committee approved a new fee for manufacturing and importing explosives this week, prompting objections from industry groups but at least a tentative sigh of relief from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The debate over the fee comes at a time of mounting budget difficulties for ATF, which is already facing rising costs on a new headquarters building in Washington. Cost overruns on that project attributed to decisions by the agency's director, Carl J. Truscott, and other expenditures are the subject of an investigation by the Justice Department inspector general.

The Bush administration proposed a 2-cent-per-pound fee on explosives to generate $120 million of ATF's proposed $980 million budget in 2007. The Appropriations committee cut the fee back to half a cent -- or $30 million -- and funded the rest of ATF's requested budget from other sources.

But committee staffers concede that even the smaller fee may not be approved by the full House, where many lawmakers believe such charges should be formally authorized by Congress before they are implemented. Lawmakers rejected a similar attempt by the administration last year, and the explosives and mining industries oppose the idea as a de facto tax increase.

"To force ATF to create a tax-collections division or whatever it would be to fund their inspection regime just doesn't make sense," said Chris Ronay, president of the Institute of Makers of Explosives, a Washington lobbying group. "It's unnecessary and problematic."

Truscott told lawmakers in late April that losing the explosives fee would have a "significant effect" on the agency, but he declined to say whether that would include layoffs or other cutbacks. About a week later, however, Truscott told ATF managers meeting in Denver that there could be some layoffs if the fee is not approved, according to senior ATF officials who were present or familiar with the remarks.

The comments sent shock waves through the small Justice Department agency, which includes about 2,400 special agents and 2,500 other employees.

Several senior ATF officials, who requested anonymity for fear of retaliation, said ATF's budget could be crippled without the explosives fee at a time when terrorists are seeking materials for bombs. The officials also criticized Truscott's handling of the budget dispute, saying he should have been more aggressive with Congress in explaining the agency's funding needs.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree L. Mixell -- speaking before the House committee acted Wednesday -- said Truscott made it clear to lawmakers that loss of the funding would have a significant impact but that it was too early to address specifics. She declined to comment on Truscott's remarks about layoffs.

Truscott and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales have come under sharp questioning in recent months from key members of the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the ATF. Chairman Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) faulted Truscott and other officials for not seeking to work the issue out with the panel.

"To say that you're going to offset something by $120 million and put it in a budget and get it printed and not come up and work for, it would be like somebody saying that I'm really for something but I do nothing about it," Wolf told Truscott in April.

Senior subcommittee Democrat Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.), whose home state would be hard hit by an explosives fee, questioned whether the program would actually raise as much money as predicted.

Gonzales defended the explosives fee, testifying earlier this year that "it is appropriate to have the industry pay for the costs of implementing" new rules for the sale and importation of explosives.

ATF has been buffeted by allegations that Truscott approved or proposed hundreds of thousands of dollars in unnecessary upgrades to the new ATF headquarters. The building, due to open later this year, is at least $19 million over budget.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine has opened an investigation into complaints over that project and other spending, questioning dozens of ATF officials earlier this year, according to several officials who have been interviewed. In addition to the construction project, investigators have questioned ATF employees about a costly trip that Truscott and others took to London last year and about allegations that ATF staff members helped assemble a school video report for a relative of Truscott's, according to the officials.

Mixell said she could not comment on the inspector general's inquiry. Truscott has declined to talk about the allegations.

IMMIGRATION:

14 Million Aliens Forecast To Get Amnesty (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

More than 9.9 million illegal aliens now in the United States will receive amnesty under an immigration-reform bill passed by the Senate, though about a quarter will do so fraudulently, and the bill allows for 4.5 million family members to join them in the United States, according to a report.

"Of the 14.4 million illegals and their family members who will receive amnesty, we estimate that 13.5 million will eventually become permanent residents, which means they can stay as long as they wish and apply for citizenship," according to the report released yesterday by the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies (CIS).

DOJ_NMG_0035018

The report, written by CIS Research Director Steven A. Camarota, said the projected 14.4 million figure does not include other expected increases in legal immigration allowed by the bill. The Heritage Foundation predicted in a report last month that the number could total 193 million in the next 20 years.

The Senate bill still faces conference hearings with House members, who passed immigration-reform legislation in December focusing on border security.

The CIS report, which based its findings on the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) that granted amnesty to about 3 million illegal aliens and their relatives, said that about 7.4 million illegals eligible for amnesty under the Senate bill will come forward and receive amnesty legitimately.

The report said there will be one fraudulent amnesty awarded for every three legitimate ones -- meaning that more than 2.5 million illegals will become legal fraudulently. In addition to the amnesty beneficiaries, the bill will allow an estimated 4.5 million family members currently living abroad to join their newly legalized relatives, the report said.

"Our assumption that the share of illegals who come forward will be similar to the share in 1986 may be too low because, unlike the last legalization, illegals now know that amnesties are real and not a ruse by the government to deport them," Mr. Camarota said. "Moreover, because the border is now more difficult to cross illegally, legalization is a more attractive option."

The report cautioned that its estimate of more than 2.5 million fraudulent amnesties, based on IRCA, may be too low, as well, because the false-document industry "is now more developed." It said the "overworked immigration bureaucracy already" has a severe fraud problem, according to a report by the Government Accountability Office.

"As its workload mushrooms with amnesty, fraud will become even more difficult to detect," Mr. Camarota said.

The CIS report also predicted that if the Senate bill were to become law, nearly 8 million more illegal aliens still would enter the country by 2016.

The report does not describe the illegal aliens affected by the bill as "guest workers," noting that amnesty applies to people who are given some kind of legal status, are not subject to deportation and can work in the United States.

"In our view, any policy or legislation that does not require those who break the law to abide by it, but instead suspends the normal penalty and in some way changes the law to accommodate violators is an amnesty," Mr. Camarota said. "An amnesty in the immigration system is any change that allows people who would otherwise be subject to deportation to stay in the country."

States Struggle To Cut Costs Of Immigration (CSM)

By Jeff Oliver

The Christian Science Monitor, June 16, 2006

DENVER

With no resolution of immigration-reform legislation at the federal level, states have been pressing ahead with their own measures intended to discourage illegal immigration and curtail costs of providing services to that population.

Lawmakers in Kansas, Iowa, and Arizona have voted this year to restrict certain social services to illegal immigrants, following similar action last year in Virginia. Other states have passed legislation cracking down on employers of illegal immigrants and those who sell forged documents to illegals.

In all, state legislatures have seen some 500 immigration-reform bills introduced in 2006, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL).

But even as lawmakers try to make it harder for illegals to live in their states, they are bumping into one roadblock after another, rendering their efforts toothless and mostly symbolic. For one, states cannot sidestep federal law by simply denying certain services, such as public education and emergency healthcare, to undocumented people. For another, the courts often ruled against their immigration-control proposals.

"Mostly, [the measures] are just unsuccessful," says Josh Bernstein, director of federal policy at the National Immigration Law Center, an advocate for low-income immigrants. Mr. Bernstein, along with colleagues, has tracked many of the measures.

The latest setback came this week in Colorado, where the state's Supreme Court disallowed a ballot initiative that asked voters if they wanted to bar illegal immigrants in the state from receiving "nonemergency" social services. The judges on Monday ruled, 4 to 2, that the measure could not appear on the November ballot because it improperly mixed two subjects: services to immigrants and decreases in taxation.

The ruling touched off a firestorm of criticism from those who had hoped Colo- rado would be next to undertake a state-level immigration crackdown.

"This was an unprincipled, unjustified, and unfair decision. [The judges] took the matter away from the voters," says a disappointed Richard Lamm, a former Colorado governor, who spearheaded the three-year effort to qualify the measure for the ballot. "No one was as close as we were."

DOJ_NMG_0035019

US Rep. Tom Tancredo (R) of Colorado, one of the country's most outspoken advocates of immigration reform, echoed Mr. Lamm, claiming that the decision was the product of "naked" partisan politics. "I would certainly impeach them," he said, referring to the judges.

Gov. Bill Owens (R) threatened to call a special session in the legislature to get the measure on the ballot unless the state Supreme Court reconsiders its ruling.

Others were pleased. Federico Peña, a former Denver mayor and head of Keep Colorado Safe, a group that opposed the initiative, hailed the decision as a victory for Colorado, calling the measure "mean-spirited." The judges, he said, simply beat Coloradoans to the punch, knocking down a measure that never should have been introduced in the first place.

In Colorado, in 2005, 70 percent of illegal immigrants did not have health insurance, according to the Center for Immigration Studies, a nonprofit research organization which advocates controlling immigration. In addition, 18 percent of households headed by illegal immigrants had someone in the household who used a major welfare program, including food assistance or Medicaid, the CIS reported.

State-level immigration reforms have had trouble from the beginning. In 1994, Californians passed Proposition 187, the first state ballot initiative to deny social services to illegal immigrants. The measure languished in the courts, costing the state a bundle in legal fees before a US District Court declared it unconstitutional in 1997 because it was considered too broad and trampled on federal jurisdiction.

The measures are typically motivated by frustration over inaction in Washington, but those who support them often expect no real results. "Many people who voted for 187 would agree with the statement that they just wanted to send a message to Congress," says Hans Johnson, a researcher with the Public Policy Institute of California in San Francisco.

Not everyone agrees that such legislation is a waste of time. Representative Tancredo says denying social services to illegals is an effective way to save taxpayer dollars and remove a possible incentive for illegal entry into the US. "It's one of the few things states can actually do to make a difference," he says.

Protect Washington Now is currently pushing a ballot initiative there similar to Colorado's. Bob Baker, who leads the group, calls the Colorado court decision "heart-breaking," but he continues to push forward. "I would love to let the feds take care of it. I would have a lot more free time on my hands," he says.

Still, there is little confidence by immigration experts that state activists can achieve the reforms they want to curb illegal immigration. The most they can do is "convey a real sense of public outrage and frustration," says Steven Camarota, director of research for the Center for Immigration Studies.

Mr. Baker says he believes a ballot initiative restricting social services in Washington State will help advance the group's agenda. "If nothing else, we've got people talking about the issue."

Immigration Enforcement (WT)

By Michael Chertoff

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush has put forward a comprehensive vision for immigration reform that will secure our borders, strengthen interior enforcement and create a temporary worker program that is not amnesty but will provide a legal, regulated path for those seeking work in the United States.

A key part of this strategy is effective worksite enforcement. Simply put, we need to give employers better tools to verify the legal status of their employees. Under the president's plan, we will provide new tools — including a tamper-proof identification card for legal foreign workers and an expanded electronic verification system that will allow employers to quickly and accurately confirm work eligibility.

At the same time, we need to enforce stronger penalties against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, including employers who have made illegal labor part of their business model. Congress is hard at work on a bill that will make the president's vision a reality, but two additional reforms will help us hold employers accountable for breaking the law and help the Department of Homeland Security identify and prosecute employers who are blatantly abusing our immigration system.

First, employers have an obligation under existing law to take action when the federal government notifies them that they may have hired an illegal alien. In certain instances, when a worker's Social Security number does not match that worker's name on tax or employment eligibility documents, the federal government sends out a "no-match" letter asking them to resolve the discrepancy. In fact, out of 250 million wage reports the Social Security Administration receives each year, as many as 10 percent belong to employees whose names don't match their Social Security numbers. SSA attempts to clear up these mismatches, sorting out reports where the worker's name or Social Security number was mistyped but still ends up with almost 9 million unmatched reports.

SSA then frequently mails out no-match notices that explain to workers how to clear up the mismatch. SSA does this because workers whose wages cannot be matched to correct Social Security numbers may lose a portion of their retirement and disability benefits.

But despite this threat of lost benefits, less than 1 percent of workers actually clear up the mismatch. Why? Experience tells us that as many as 90 percent of these workers do not clear up the mismatch for the simple reason that they are illegal aliens not authorized to be working or to even be in this country and who procured their jobs through immigration fraud.

As it stands, although some employers are charged with constructive knowledge of ignoring no-match letters, some employers simply disregard "no-match" notices with little consequence. But that is going to change. Last week, the Department of Homeland Security issued a proposed regulation that will establish a specific process for employers to take corrective action when they receive a "no-match" notice. Under the proposed regulation, it will be clear that employers must check employment records, determine the cause of the mismatch and notify the appropriate federal agencies if they cannot resolve the problem. If employers fail to do so in a reasonable period of time, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement can, in appropriate circumstances, hold them legally accountable for knowingly continuing to employ an illegal worker.

But clarifying mismatches is only part of the solution. We also need to give our Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents a better way to determine which employers are habitually using or providing fraudulent Social Security information. One way to do that is by giving our agents sufficient access to no-match data. Under current law, the Social Security Administration does not provide sufficient access in sharing this information. This is simply wrong, and Congress needs to change the law.

If we had sufficient access to no-match data, we could better target our enforcement efforts to the companies that are most likely to be deliberately exploiting illegal labor: the companies that have the largest percentage of no-match employees. In fact, in a study conducted last year, the Government Accountability Office discovered dozens of employers who provided the very same Social Security number for more than a hundred employees. In one instance, an employer used the same Social Security number for more than 2,500 employees in a single tax year. Certainly there will be occasions where employers will be able to offer legitimate explanations for their behavior, but Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents need sufficient access to scrutinize the no-match data.

Even more important, the Department of Homeland Security could use the additional data to find potential immigration fraud at critical infrastructure facilities, such as dams, chemical plants or airports. These are places where sabotage or an accident could kill hundreds or thousands of Americans. They are not places where we should tolerate workers who have lied to get their jobs and who may pose a danger to this country.

Congress needs to break down the wall that separates our Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents from data that would help them find illegal workers and the employers who exploit them. Changing the law will not mean an invasion of workers' privacy. Indeed, it can help protect privacy by preventing identity theft and misuse of an individual's Social Security number.

We cannot stop illegal migration if we do not stop illegal employment, strengthen our border defenses and offer illegal workers a chance to come out of the shadows and take legal, temporary jobs. But we will not succeed in bringing these workers out of the shadows if we ourselves do not have the information we need to enforce our immigration laws.

Michael Chertoff is secretary of the Department of Homeland Security.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Spending Bill For Wars And Hurricanes (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — President Bush signed an emergency spending bill on Thursday to finance the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and to help hurricane victims in Gulf Coast states.

Mr. Bush acted hours after the Senate approved the $94.5 billion bill by a 98-to-1 vote. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, voted against the measure, saying it did not provide enough for domestic health and education programs.

The measure provides $65.8 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, $3.9 billion for foreign aid, $19.8 billion for hurricane relief and $2.3 billion for pandemic flu preparations. Most of the remainder is for border security.

"I am pleased that Congress has addressed these urgent national priorities within the spending limits I set," Mr. Bush said. To stay within the limits, House and Senate negotiators scrapped many items that had been added by the Senate.

Final approval of the bill was accompanied by growing frustration on Capitol Hill over the use of emergency spending measures to pay for overseas military operations.

DOJ_NMG_0035021

The Senate voted 98 to 0 to force President Bush to submit a budget for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, instead of using emergency bills, outside the regular budget and appropriations process.

"We are blowing the budget process," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who proposed the new requirement. "We are carving gigantic holes in the system. Since 2001, the administration has sought to fund the war operations almost entirely through emergency supplemental appropriations measures."

Congress has passed nine supplemental appropriations bills providing $420 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Mr. McCain said. By contrast, he said, "during the 11-year Vietnam War, there were four supplemental appropriations bills."

Mr. McCain's proposal was approved as an amendment to a separate bill setting forth military policies for the coming year. It stipulates that Mr. Bush, as part of his annual budget, must request money for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and provide an estimate of the full amount needed, together with "a detailed justification."

The administration has argued that it cannot predict the exact amounts that will be required.

But Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, "It is now time for the administration to present these costs as part of the regular budgeting process."

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the committee, said, "It is essential that our budget begin to reflect reality and recognize the enormous cost of these ongoing military operations."

Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, said: "The administration has chosen to hide those costs. Where? In emergency spending bills."

The president's requests came to Congress "with little or no detailed justification," Mr. Byrd said.

The bill includes money for a wide range of hurricane recovery efforts: $3.7 billion for flood control projects and levee repairs in Louisiana, more than $4 billion in housing assistance, $550 million for a new veterans hospital in New Orleans, $50 million for higher education and $235 million to help elementary and secondary school students displaced by the hurricanes.

Senate Sends Bush $94.5B For Iraq, Katrina (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, June 15, 2006

The Senate Thursday sent President Bush an emergency spending bill meeting his funding requests for America's wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and aid to Gulf Coast hurricane victims.

The 98-1 vote on the $94.5 billion House-Senate compromise legislation gave much-needed funds to support U.S. troops overseas. Most of the money — $66 billion — goes to the Pentagon for military operations overseas.

Bush praised Congress for providing funds to "fight terrorism, defend our homeland, enforce our borders, and fulfill our moral obligation to help our fellow Americans in need."

The bill would bring to almost $320 billion the tally for the campaign in Iraq and $89 billion for the one in Afghanistan.

Only Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., voted against the bill. He is opposed to a provision endorsing Bush's $873 billion "cap" on the annual appropriations bills that Congress passes each year. Specter is pushing for $7 billion in additional money for education and health programs.

Still, there is increasing concern in Congress about the cost of the war in Iraq and the fact that the spending is kept on a set of loosely policed books that are kept separate from the rest of government operations.

Final action on the bill was welcomed by Gulf Coast lawmakers, especially relatively junior Louisiana delegation members who felt their Katrina-devastated state was shortchanged in a similar measure last December.

The bill contains $3.7 billion for Louisiana flood control projects, and Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu (news, bio, voting record) and GOP colleague David Vitter are confident their state will receive $4.2 billion of $5.2 billion contained in the bill for direct grants to states. Louisiana plans to use its share to repair and rebuild housing stocks.

"Many people didn't have insurance because they weren't in a flood plain," Landrieu said. "And then the levees broke and people, middle-income families, wealthy families and poor families lost the largest asset they had."

An earlier veto threat by Bush forced senators to strip some things out:

_More than $14 billion for such things as aid to farmers outside the hurricane zone and for the Gulf Coast seafood industry.

_Democratic initiatives to beef up port security and veterans medical services.

_A controversial plan backed by Mississippi GOP Gov. Haley Barbour and the state's powerful Senate delegation to pay CSX Transportation $700 million for a recently rebuilt freight rail line along the coast so the state could use its path for a new highway.

Notwithstanding approval of the emergency spending measure, lawmakers are getting restless over the practice of funding wars through ad hoc supplemental bills outside the annual budget and thus not subject to budget limits that curb the growth of other government programs.

DOJ_NMG_0035022

On an unrelated defense policy bill, senators Wednesday voted 98-0 for an amendment by John McCain, R-Ariz., to require future funding for the wars to be considered in the same way as other government spending measures.

"This bill continues the charade that this war should be funded off budget instead on including the money our troops need in the regular budget that's requested by the president and sent to us," said Patty Murray, D-Wash., as debate closed Thursday.

The bill adheres to Bush's demand of a bill capped at $94.5 billion — including $2.3 billion to combat avian flu — though lawmakers found extra money for grants for Mississippi, Texas and Alabama by cutting back on the Federal Emergency Management Agency's chief disaster fund.

That move raises the likelihood that more FEMA funds will have to be passed before the end of the year if not before Election Day.

The compromise bill includes Bush's plan to provide 1,000 more Border Patrol agents along the Mexican border, send about 6,000 National Guard troops there and build detention space for 4,000 illegal immigrants.

Efforts by Gregg to add funding for capital needs for border security such as helicopters and other aircraft and new vehicles to patrol the border were rebuffed by the White House.

The overall emergency bill's long path into law began in February as a $92.2 billion request by Bush. He later agreed to additions for Louisiana levee projects, border security and avian flu.

Bush's determination that the measure not exceed his request set the terms for endgame talks, and when the agreement was unveiled, the White House and House Republicans trumpeted their success in sticking with the target.

But while many Senate extras were tossed overboard, others were financed by simply putting off spending that will be required to be included in the next emergency bill, expected early next year.

Senate Approves $94.5B For War, Hurricane Funds (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

An emergency spending bill to pay for war and storm-recovery costs is headed to President Bush after easily passing the Senate yesterday.

The 98 to 1 vote was a rare moment of consensus on a day of anguished debate in both chambers over the Iraq war.

The $94.5 billion emergency bill includes nearly $66 billion for continued operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and nearly $20 billion in disaster assistance for the Gulf Coast. Lawmakers added the $2.3 billion that Bush had sought to combat avian flu and nearly $2 billion to beef up security along the U.S.-Mexico border, including $708 million to deploy National Guard troops.

Faced with a White House veto threat, House and Senate negotiators stripped out $14 billion in unrelated funding that the Senate had added to its version of the legislation. But the final bill did include a few unrelated items.

"We've made considerable progress toward limiting unnecessary and wasteful spending," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in a statement after the vote. "But more can be done."

Though Congress has not resisted Iraq-related costs, which now total nearly $320 billion, lawmakers are increasingly irritated by the White House's reliance on the emergency spending process. The Senate voted unanimously Wednesday night to require that future war funding be factored into the annual federal budgets. The bill approved yesterday was the ninth emergency measure since Sept. 11, 2001 -- all off the books, "as if it were free money," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Emergency bills invite abuse, McCain said, because they are not scrutinized by authorizing committees, and become magnets for special perks. "We are blowing the budget process. We are carving gigantic holes in the system," McCain said.

Reduced Spending Bill Approved In Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

The Senate yesterday overwhelmingly passed a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill to fund the war on terror and hurricane recovery, but only after House leaders forced the Senate to cut about $14 billion from its version.

The bill, which the House passed Tuesday, was approved by the Senate on a 98-1 vote and was signed yesterday evening by President Bush, who had threatened a veto if the final version exceeded $94.5 billion. The Senate bill had reached $109 billion.

In his signing statement, Mr. Bush praised the bill for providing "additional resources needed to fight the war on terror, help citizens of the Gulf States recover from devastating hurricanes, and protect Americans from a potential influenza pandemic."

Senate leaders immediately credited Republicans in both chambers for saving the legislation.

"Republican-led efforts ensured the bill didn't exceed the president's emergency request while focusing our resources on the critical priorities," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0035023

Others said the spending bill would have ballooned out of control without the hard line drawn by House leaders, especially Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"It would have been much higher without the insistence of the House," said Rep. C.W. Bill Young, Florida Republican.

The measure provides $65.8 billion for the war efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, including money for Humvees and tanks; and $19.8 billion for Gulf Coast hurricane recovery, including $500 million in agricultural assistance. The agricultural package was reduced from about $4 billion in the Senate version.

The bill also funds two specific extra requests from Mr. Bush: $2.3 billion for avian flu preparedness efforts and $1.9 billion for border security.

Before he signed the bill, Mr. Bush credited congressional leadership and the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees -- Rep. Jerry Lewis, California Republican and Sen. Thad Cochran, Mississippi Republican -- for reducing the bill to an acceptable level.

"I am pleased that Congress has addressed these urgent national priorities within the spending limits I set," Mr. Bush said.

Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, and other House conservatives voted against the bill and recommended that Mr. Bush veto it because about $5 billion of the allocation is unrelated to either the war or hurricane recovery. The bill passed the House by a 351-67 vote.

Conservatives said items that don't belong in the bill include $35.6 million for mine safety, $27.6 million to repair utility steam tunnels in the Capitol Power Plant and $38 million for oyster activities.

Negotiators from both chambers killed a contentious Senate project that would have provided $700 million to reroute a railroad in Mississippi, as well as language that critics said would have forced the Navy to reimburse Northrop Grumman Corp. for hurricane damage, lifting the burden from insurance companies.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, cast the only opposing vote yesterday, saying it didn't include an extra $7 billion in the annual budget for labor, health and education. Mr. Specter is chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees that bill.

"This vote should not be misconstrued as voting against our troops or hurricane recovery efforts," he said.

Senate Approves Bush Nominee To Head FDIC (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 15, 2006

Sheila Bair, President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., was approved by the Senate on Thursday along with nominees for three other government positions.

The four were confirmed without dissent. In addition to Bair, they are: James B. Lockhart as director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight; Kathleen Casey as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission; and Robert Couch as president of the Government National Mortgage Association, known as Ginnie Mae.

Bair, a former assistant Treasury secretary, is a professor at the University of Massachusetts. She will become chairman of the agency created during the Depression that insures up to $100,000 in deposits in individual accounts and, in line with legislation enacted in February, up to $250,000 for individual retirement accounts held in banks.

Lockhart, now the acting director of OFHEO, is a longtime Bush friend. He was the executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal agency that backs private pensions, from 1989 to 1993.

At his confirmation hearing last week, Lockhart assured senators he would maintain his independence as the chief regulator of embattled mortgage company Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac.

At a hearing Thursday, Lockhart said it will take years for Fannie Mae to completely reform and recover from its $11 billion accounting scandal.

Casey is the staff director and counsel for the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee. Couch is president and chief executive of New South Federal Savings Bank in Birmingham, Ala.

Bush Hosts Annual Congressional Picnic (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035024

President Bush was the host of the annual congressional picnic Thursday at the White House, but it was his chief of staff's band that came close to stealing the show.

"We got some interesting entertainment for you tonight," Bush told lawmakers and their families to the picnic, called "Rodeo on the South Lawn."

"We got some people who can play music and some people who think they can play music," the president said.

The Compassionates, Joshua Bolten's band, and the Second Amendments, a bipartisan congressional band, were the opening acts. The featured entertainment came from Riders in the Sky, professional musicians who played in fancy chaps and Western attire.

Rain clouds scuttled the picnic Wednesday night. No such problem for the makeup.

Bush was upbeat, although still weary from his trip this week to Baghdad.

The Compassionates, appearing like the Blues Brothers in their dark shades, white shirts and ties, ended their set with "Born To Be Wild." Then the congressmen took the stage.

Rep. Collin Peterson (news, bio, voting record), D-Minn., said the band had played all over the world, including Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan.

"No politics, just rock 'n roll," he said.

The other members of the group are Reps. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., Jon Porter, R-Nev., Dave Weldon, R-Fla., and Thaddeus McCotter of Michigan, a Republican whom Bush called "that rock 'n roll dude."

Spotted in the crowd were Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, CIA chief Michael Hayden and Bush's top political adviser Karl Rove. The national intelligence director, John Negroponte, showed up in jeans and a cowboy hat.

A Little Needling From Bush, And Then A Call Of Regret (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Every once in awhile, at a news briefing, President Bush will poke fun at the reporters who cover him. And, every once in awhile, he will cause a little heartburn for his staff, and the White House press corps, in the process.

So it was during a Rose Garden press briefing Wednesday when Mr. Bush called upon a reporter for The Los Angeles Times, Peter Wallsten, and promptly commented on his inquisitor's sunglasses: "Are you going to ask that question with shades on?"

Mr. Wallsten offered to take them off, but the president said, "I'm interested in the shade look, seriously," and Mr. Wallsten did not.

Undaunted, he went on to ask Mr. Bush whether he had "any work to do to rebuild credibility that might have been lost" in the C.I.A. leak investigation. (Mr. Bush said a prosecutor's decision this week not to indict the president's deputy chief of staff, Karl Rove, "speaks for itself.")

Afterward, staff members told Mr. Bush that Mr. Wallsten was not wearing the sunglasses to look hip, but for health reasons. Mr. Wallsten has Stargardt's disease, a degenerative condition that causes blindness and can be painfully exacerbated by sunlight.

By late afternoon Mr. Bush called Mr. Wallsten to apologize. Mr. Wallsten said the call came without warning, on his cellphone, which listed the presidential phone number as "unknown."

"He said, 'I needle you guys out of affection,' and I said, 'Now that you know about this, don't treat me any different than you would ordinarily,' " Mr. Wallsten said. "He said, 'I won't.' "

Mr. Wallsten said he invited the president to "needle away," to which Mr. Bush replied, "I will, but next time I'll just use a different needle."

Spellings Goes Overseas To Tout Education (AP-Y2)

By Ben Feller

AP2, June 16, 2006

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has put a passport stamp on her job, taking more overseas trips since 2005 than her predecessor did in four years.

In less than a year and a half, Spellings has taken seven overseas trips, traveling to Afghanistan, England, Egypt, France, India, Italy, Japan, Jordan and Russia. She plans to visit Greece and Spain later this month.

Transportation, food and lodging for her overseas travel cost $36,981, according to Education Department records. The total cost of her travel was thousands of dollars higher because other agencies picked up the tab for a few trips.

DOJ_NMG_0035025

It's not a matter of wanderlust, Spellings says. In her view, the top school official ought to see the nations that the United States is helping and competing against.

"We believe that education is a universally shared value," Spellings said in an interview with The Associated Press on Thursday. "We are looked to and admired around the world as people who know how to do education for the masses."

Spellings has served as a natural spokeswoman for the White House campaign for greater U.S. competitiveness. Better education is at the heart of that effort. She is also close to Bush, as his former top domestic policy adviser and as a longtime friend from Texas.

Spellings took office in January 2005. Rod Paige, Bush's first education secretary, took six overseas trip during his four years in the Cabinet. Three of Spellings' trips came at the request of the White House.

She accompanied first lady Laura Bush to launch a training institute for women teachers in Kabul, Afghanistan. She also led U.S. delegations to the 2005 World Expo in Nagoya, Japan, and to the 2006 Paralympics in Turin, Italy.

Her other trips focused mainly on meetings with international peers. Some examples:

· Spellings traveled with congressional members in April 2006 to Bangalore, New Delhi, and Agra in India. The purpose of the trip was to help the U.S. learn how to compete better.

· Spellings attended two meetings of the Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative, an effort launched in 2004 by Bush and leaders of other major nations. Her travel took her along the Dead Sea in Jordan in May 2005 and to Sharm El-Sheikh, Egypt, in May 2006.

· Spellings went to Moscow in May 2006 for a meeting of education ministers from G8 nations. She also met with Russian teachers and students about math, science and foreign language study and signed a deal with Russian leaders about student and scholar exchanges.

The trips have had different purposes, she said. But all reflect a greater international focus for the Education Department since Bush's first term.

"The landscape has changed, and is changing, since the earliest days of the administration," Spellings said. "The things that we're doing in the Middle East have evolved over these several years. ... It's a smaller world, and we are invested in key parts of the world."

Keith Ashdown, spokesman for the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, questioned how much benefit taxpayers would get out of the trips. The Education Department would be better served, he said, to send midlevel employees who handle day-to-day activities.

"These trips by executives at agencies, there's not a lot of bang for the buck," Ashdown said. "They're mainly expensive public relations events to make the agencies look good."

In speeches, Spellings loves to reference "The World is Flat." The Thomas Friedman best-seller explores how technology is exploding the global economy and forcing the U.S. to adapt.

"It's very significant that she's traveling abroad as much as she can, and more so than her predecessor did," said Victor Johnson, associate executive director of NAFSA, a prominent association of international educators.

"It's certainly important that she gets out there and understands what some of our key competitors in the international education market are doing," Johnson said. "We need to compete for the students and the scholars and the talent of the world."

Paige had a more domestically focused mission: starting No Child Left Behind. The sweeping education law was Bush's first priority in office. Bush signed it in January 2002.

"Secretary Paige traveled a lot domestically — that's just where the need was," said William Hansen, who was Paige's deputy secretary.

The Sept. 11 attacks, the ensuing wars and the fresh attention on economic competitiveness have all put more focus on international travel for Spellings.

Credit-rating Agencies Closer To Tough Regulations (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, June 16, 2006

A move to more closely regulate the major Wall Street credit-rating agencies at the tail end of an era of corporate scandals gained momentum this week, when the House Financial Services Committee approved reform legislation that moves to the full House for review.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick, R-Pa., is dubbed the Credit Rating Agency Duopoly Relief Act, a dig at the two biggest U.S. credit-rating firms, Moody's and Standard and Poor's.

DOJ_NMG_0035026

The legislation would require the firms to file confidential financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, publish regular reports on how well their ratings perform, and make mandatory the practice of employing compliance officers to ensure the firms comply with securities laws.

The Senate Banking Committee plans to introduce similar legislation this summer. Those efforts compete with a bid by Moody's and S&P to head off lawmakers by enacting voluntary reforms.

The two firms dominate the roughly $3 billion-a-year business of grading debt securities issued by companies and municipalities that pay them for those investor report cards. But their independence and reliability came into criticism after they failed to anticipate the defaults of such clients as Enron, Global Crossing and WorldCom, which enjoyed investment-grade ratings only months — and, in the case of Enron, days — before the companies' bankruptcy filings.

The credit raters deny misleading investors, contending that their analysts were duped. But, Moody's Vice President Fran Laserson says the firms are now working with the Securities and Exchange Commission to develop a voluntary program of internal controls and disclosures modeled after a European standard. "We think we are close on achieving this self-regulatory framework that we think will satisfy the calls for greater transparency and accountability, which we support," she says.

That is unlikely to satisfy the big firms' smaller competitors, which argue they are locked out of 90% of the credit-rating business through allegedly anti-competitive tactics that stifle competition and fail to serve investors.

"We would be delighted if the SEC took action, but I think it's only going to happen if Congress puts pressure on them through legislation," says Jim Kaitz, CEO of the Association for Financial Professionals, a trade group that represents 14,000 finance professionals.

Glenn Reynolds, chief executive of CreditSights, a small research firm, says the House legislation "marks the first real progress on the issue since it was taken up in early 2002, after the Enron fiasco that the agencies have still failed to take any responsibility for."

Sean Egan, managing director of Egan-Jones Ratings, says, "I think there's been a shift. As of four years ago, we were screaming in the wind. Now, I think there's widespread realization that something has to be done to correct the fundamental problems in this industry."

Drug-plan Shuffle Disrupts Coverage (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The problems that plagued low-income seniors and people with disabilities during the rollout of Medicare's prescription-drug program in January have continued on a smaller scale, causing some new beneficiaries to lose coverage or spend their own money at pharmacy counters.

The problems occur when people turn 65 or become eligible for Medicare disability benefits and are involuntarily switched from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare plan. Thousands lose Medicaid drug coverage, typically for two to six weeks, before Medicare kicks in. Health counselors say the trouble dominates their caseloads.

"It is a national problem," says Barbara Murock, a state health policy specialist in Allegheny County, Pa. "It's happening all the time."

Since January, most of the early problems have been rectified. But each month, 10,000 to 70,000 new people fall into the gap between Medicaid and Medicare.

Darin Byrd, a 40-year-old cancer patient in North Versailles, Pa., who lives on about $700 a month in disability payments, had to charge $270 to his mother's credit card and pay $100 in cash when he lost Medicaid drug coverage May 15. His new coverage began June 1. "They dropped me before Medicare picked me up," Byrd says.

Medicare's prescription program got off to a rocky start in January, when roughly 6 million low-income beneficiaries who had Medicaid drug coverage had to change to the new Medicare plan. Tens of thousands were turned away or overcharged at pharmacies because the private insurance plans that run the Medicare program didn't honor their coverage. More than half the states stepped in with their own money to rectify the situation; some, such as California and Maine, are still paying.

The requirement to move from Medicaid to Medicare was made by Congress when it created the drug program in 2003. Gale Arden, of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, told state officials last month the agency "is working on a means" to more quickly find and enroll people forced to make the switch. Meanwhile, says the agency's Peter Ashkenaz, "there are protections." Among them:

·People can enroll in a Medicare drug plan at pharmacy counters to avoid any gap in coverage.

·Several states fill the gap with emergency funds.

·If beneficiaries pay out of pocket, insurance plans eventually will provide retroactive coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0035027

State officials say that's not enough. “This is no way to run a drug benefit,” says Jude Walsh, an aide to Maine Gov. John Baldacci. “We're always a month behind.”

They also say it's up to Medicare to fix the gap. “It's an inherent problem in the design of the program,” says George Oestreich, a Missouri Medicaid official.

Counting On COLAs To Bring Relief (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

With consumer prices on the rise, federal retirees are paying more attention to inflation trends and what they mean for their pensions.

Several callers this week pointed to a notice posted by the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association that showed that most government retirees have banked 2.9 percent toward their next cost-of-living adjustment. The calculation, based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in May, suggests that federal retirees could be in line for a jumbo COLA in January.

Of course, it's too early to tell if the run-up in inflation -- a reflection of $3-a-gallon gasoline and other, higher consumer prices -- will continue into the fall, when officials will crunch the numbers for the 2007 COLA.

But, regardless of whether the inflation trend line goes up or down, the federal COLAs have proved to be an important benefit, helping lower-income retirees cope with increased costs for fuel, housing and health care.

As Patrick Purcell , a social policy specialist at the Congressional Research Service, wrote in a recent report, COLAs typically do not make retirees better off financially but merely protect them from becoming financially worse off over time.

At the start of this year, federal retirees covered by the Civil Service Retirement System received a 4.1 percent COLA, and retirees in the newer Federal Employees Retirement System who were at least 62 received a 3.1 percent increase. That COLA was the biggest in 15 years.

Nationwide, there were nearly 1.8 million civil service retirees on the government's annuity roll as of Oct. 1, according to the Office of Personnel Management. Of those, 1.57 million retired under the CSRS and about 220,000 under FERS.

(The tallies by the OPM are partial snapshots of the government retirement community: They do not include retirees from the military, the U.S. Postal Service, and the congressional and judicial branches of government.) Last year, the OPM counted 265,277 civil service retirees in the District, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. An additional 77,574 people in the region received survivor benefits.

The average annuity for a CSRS retiree is $2,396 per month. The average pension for a FERS retiree, who receives a Social Security benefit, is $868 monthly.2.7 Percent for Whom?

As expected, the House this week approved a fiscal 2007 spending bill that includes a 2.7 percent pay raise for civil service employees next year. The bill requires that the raise also go to employees in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, which are replacing the government-wide pay system with performance-oriented systems.

The Bush administration, which had recommended a 2.2 percent raise, objected to the House action and urged deletion of the provision covering Defense and Homeland Security employees. "The provision is ambiguous as to how the increase would be applied to employees covered under these departments' modernized pay systems and will unnecessarily complicate their implementation," the White House budget office said.

But Darryl Perkinson , president of the Federal Managers Association, welcomed the House action, saying employees in the two departments are concerned about "what will happen to their pay." He added, "It's positive to see that for 2007, at least, we are assured that they will be recognized for their dedication and commitment to serving America."

The Senate plans to address federal pay issues later this year, aides said.Talk Shows

Bernanke Speech Soothes Nerves On Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035028

Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman, eased nerves on Thursday with a measured assessment of the threat posed by higher energy prices to inflation and growth, as stocks advanced worldwide.

The S&P 500 index rebounded before his speech – reflecting positive reports on jobless claims and manufacturing orders – and ended the day up more than 2 per cent at 1,256.16. But bond prices fell, with the yield on 10-year US Treasury bills rising 3 basis points as investors digested the implications for interest rates.

Mr Bernanke zeroed in on the sustained increase in energy prices as one of the root causes of the recent inflation scare, and pledged to keep a careful watch on inflation expectations. But he did so in a calm tone, without the aggressively hawkish language that rocked markets on June 5.

"In the short run, sharply higher energy prices create a rather different, and in some ways, a more difficult set of economic challenges," Mr Bernanke told an audience of business-people in Chicago. "A significant increase in energy prices can simultaneously slow economic growth while raising inflation."

He said the rise in energy costs had imposed the equivalent of a tax of $185bn – almost 1.5 per cent of gross domestic product – on US residents since the end of 2003, while putting upward pressure on prices.

Mr Bernanke also cautioned that "in the long run, higher energy prices are likely to reduce somewhat the productive capacity of the US economy" by making some energy-intensive capital equipment obsolete. High energy prices also resulted in a deterioration in the US terms of trade – the relative price of its exports and imports – and a larger current account deficit, he said.

But Mr Bernanke said that provided energy prices did not move sharply higher from their existing elevated levels, "these long-run effects, though clearly negative, appear to be manageable".

He reiterated his message of June 5 that the Fed was alert to changes in inflation expectations, ahead of the publication today of survey data from the University of Michigan. However, he noted, "inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month".

Mr Bernanke said: "These developments bear watching." This was a relatively gentle phrase, compared with the description of inflation expectations in the last Fed minutes as "worrisome".

Mr Bernanke implicitly dismissed suggestions that speculators were responsible for the run-up in prices, saying "for the most part, high oil prices reflect high and growing demand for oil and limited and uncertain supplies".

Significantly, he declined to blame the increase in core inflation, which was up 0.3 per cent in May, on technical adjustments to the estimate of the cost of living in owner-occupied homes, as many private sector analysts did.

Bernanke Highlights Inflation Risks, But Sounds Somewhat Dovish Note (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After edging up in recent months, market-based inflation expectations implied by nominal and inflation-indexed Treasurys' yields have "fallen back somewhat" in the past month, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Thursday.

Still, inflation expectations "bear watching" given their importance in keeping high energy prices, which are likely to persist, from feeding into the broader economy, Mr. Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the Economic Club of Chicago. (Read the full text.1)

"Unlike in earlier episodes, the significantly higher relative price of energy that we are now experiencing is expected to be relatively long lasting and thus will likely prompt more-significant adjustments by households and businesses over time," Mr. Bernanke said.

Mr. Bernanke said keeping inflation expectations contained is key in preventing "second round" effects of higher energy prices.

"To the extent that households and business owners expect that the Fed will keep inflation low, firms have both less incentive and less ability to pass on increased energy costs in the form of higher prices," he said.

"And likewise, workers have less incentive to demand compensating increases in their nominal wages," Mr. Bernanke said.

The Fed chairman noted that survey-based inflation expectations and market-based gauges such as nominal and inflation-indexed government-bond yields "have edged up, on net, in recent months."

"As yet, these expectations measures have remained within the ranges in which they have fluctuated in recent years and inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month," Mr. Bernanke said.

"Nevertheless, these developments bear watching," he added.

Recent government inflation data have suggested that higher energy prices are feeding into underlying prices. The core consumer price index that excludes food and energy prices has increased 0.3% on-month for each of the past three months through May. Each gain came in above market expectations.

DOJ_NMG_0035029

Mr. Bernanke noted that while the pass-through of energy and commodity prices has been "relatively low" thus far, "the cumulative increases in energy and commodity prices have been large enough that they could account for some of the recent pickup in core inflation."

Economists expect that, in light of the recent rise in core inflation and some hawkish inflation remarks by Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials in recent days, the central bank will most likely raise official interest rates a 17th consecutive time at its June 28-29 meeting, to 5.25%.

Besides the inflationary effect of higher oil and other energy prices, Mr. Bernanke also noted that the long-run economic effects, "though clearly negative, appear to be manageable."

"The U.S. economy is remarkably flexible, and it seems to have absorbed the cost shocks of the past few years with only a few dislocations," he said.

However, he did note that higher energy prices "are likely to reduce somewhat the productive capacity of the U.S. economy" over the long run, and may restrain productivity growth by causing businesses to trim new investment.

A higher oil import bill also "will increase the U.S. current account deficit, implying a greater need for foreign financing" over the medium term, Mr. Bernanke added.

And with imported energy costs up $185 billion since late 2003, "all else being equal, this constitutes a noticeable drag on real household incomes and spending," Mr. Bernanke said.

Stocks Post Sharp Gains In Rebound From Sell-Off (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

After five tumultuous weeks, investors finally breathed a collective sigh of relief today.

Stock prices turned up sharply in most world markets. In the United States, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2 percent and the Nasdaq composite index jumped more than 2.8 percent, their second straight day in the black after almost 10 straight days of declines. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 1.8 percent, pushing it back above the 11,000 mark.

Elsewhere in the world, the frenetic selling of the last few weeks gave way to buying from Tokyo, up 1.1 percent, to London, up 2 percent.

Stocks staged an even bigger comeback in emerging markets, which had been hammered on concerns that they were beginning to resemble the American technology bubble of the late 1990's and 2000. India's Sensex index, which had fallen more than 27 percent in the five-week period that ended Tuesday, was up almost 7 percent today.

Cautioning that the rally could prove to be a brief interlude in a more sustained slide, experts said the snapback appears to reflect the fundamental strength of the American and world economies. Inflation remains low by historical standards and economic growth, while slowing, is not expected to stall.

"To me, this is a lack of sell orders combined with a little bit of a sigh of relief that maybe this isn't a hard landing" for the economy, said Chris M. Hyzy, an investment strategist at U.S. Trust, an investment firm in New York.

A report showing that American industrial activity pulled back slightly in May appeared to have helped propel stocks higher because investors believe a slowdown in economic activity will help rein in inflation, a development that could allow the Federal Reserve to stop raising interest rates later this summer.

And breaking from a recent pattern, in which comments by Federal Reserve officials have driven the markets down, a speech by Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed's chairman, on energy and the economy this afternoon did not break the rally. He said policymakers should be on guard to make sure that high oil prices do not drive up the costs of other goods and services, but he noted that the impact of high prices thus far appears to be minimal.

"As yet, these expectations measures have remained within the ranges in which they have fluctuated in recent years and inflation compensation implied by yields on government debt has fallen back somewhat in the past month," Mr. Bernanke said at the Economic Club of Chicago. "Nevertheless, these developments bear watching."

Stocks may also be rising for technical reasons.

Investors who believe that the price of a stock will fall often borrow shares and sell them short. If prices do indeed fall, the short seller will buy back them at a lower price to complete his bet and turn a profit. Those purchases, in turn, can help briefly bolster price of the fallen stocks.

It is hard to determine exactly how much short selling is contributing to the current market movements, but analysts say it appears to have played some part in bolstering the price of metals and other commodities, which have staged a small return in the last two days. The price of gold rose $4.20, to 0.8 percent, to $566.50 an ounce.

"Short positions have been closed out significantly in commodities," Mr. Hyzy of U.S. Trust said.

As for stocks today, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 26.12 points, or 2.1 percent, to close at 1,256.16; the Nasdaq composite index climbed 58.15 points, or 2.8 percent, to 2,144.15; and the Dow Jones industrial average climbed 198.27 points, or 1.8 percent, to 11,015.19.

Technology, energy and financial stocks, which had taken an intense drubbing in recent weeks were among the leading gainers today.

Meanwhile, bond prices fell. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction of its price, rose to 5.09 percent this afternoon from 5.06 percent late Wednesday.

Blue Chips (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

REASSURING COMMENTS on inflation from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke helped propel the Dow Jones Industrial Average ahead almost 200 points, marking its biggest two-day gain in three years and pushing it past the 11000 milestone again.

Although many on Wall Street remained nervous about the market's outlook, few were standing in its way yesterday as surging markets abroad and good news at home spurred the buying.

The Dow industrials finished with a gain of 198.27 points, or 1.83%, at 11015.19. The Dow is ahead 2.8% for 2006, although still down 5.4% since its six-year high set May 10.

It was the biggest one-day gain in point or percentage terms since April 2005. Together with Wednesday's 111-point surge, the 2.89% two-session gain was the biggest since April 2003. All 30 Dow-industrials components rose, the second time that has happened since early 2004. (The other was in April 2006.)

After all the losses, "this market was kind of like a rubber band. It got stretched too much on the downside and snapped back," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. "Bernanke's comments about the inflation bugaboo also reassured people. But the proof is going to be next week. What I don't want to see is another ungluing."

The day's big news was Mr. Bernanke's speech to the Economics Club of Chicago, in which he said inflation expectations indicated by yields on Treasury bonds have "fallen back somewhat." He said energy prices so far have had a "relatively low" impact on other prices.

Mr. Bernanke, who took over Fed leadership in February, gave no direct hints about his plans for interest-rate increases this summer. Investors expect the Fed to push short-term rates up another quarter percentage point at its policy meeting June 28 and 29. The comments suggested that Mr. Bernanke has a balanced view on inflation risks, which renewed hopes for a pause in rate increases.

"Investors still are learning how to dance with Mr. Bernanke," said Jon Brorson, head of growth-stock investing at money-management group Neuberger Berman. "But it sounds like he assuaged people's fears a little bit in Chicago." Mr. Brorson said he is confident that Mr. Bernanke "isn't going to drive the economy into the ground."

Like Mr. Clark, Mr. Brorson said the rally was in part a technical reaction to the heavy selling of the past month. He said he expects stocks to remain volatile, as investors try to understand the likely outlook for interest rates. Some short-term investors could use the current rebound as an opportunity to sell some stocks they had trouble unloading during the downdraft.

Even before Mr. Bernanke spoke, stocks began the day with gains, partly in reaction to sharp rallies abroad. India's benchmark index jumped almost 7%, Tokyo's 1%, Russia's 5% and those of Britain and Germany 2%. Colombia's soared almost 16%.

Some of the market swings could be due to the "quadruple-witching" expiration of options and futures contracts at week's end. When stocks and indexes move sharply, they can make options and futures contracts pay off, causing traders to buy or sell stocks to cover their exposure. When trading is distorted by short-term buying and selling, market moves can be partly unwound in later days.

Some of the buying also could be by short sellers, who borrow stock and sell it in a bet that it will decline. To take profits, they must buy stocks back and return them, which can temporarily contribute to market rallies after big declines.

Investors welcomed a series of mixed economic reports, which together suggested that inflation isn't getting out of control and that the economy is continuing to expand. Industrial production unexpectedly fell in May, as did the pace of expansion of Philadelphia-area factory activity. May manufacturing activity in New York state was strong and last week's new jobless claims declined. Brokerage firm Bear Stearns posted record quarterly profits.

Treasury prices, which had risen during the stock downdraft as money flowed to Treasurys' relative safety, declined for a second day, pushing yields slightly higher. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.104%. The 30-year bond was down 18/32 to yield 5.138%.

Oil futures rose 36 cents, but finished below $70 at $69.50 a barrel. Gold futures rebounded after seven consecutive declines, rising $4.20 to $566.50 a troy ounce. Gold futures are down 21% since hitting a 26-year high in May.

Investors are looking ahead to quarterly profit reports, due next month. Early forecasts of problems and triumphs are starting to trickle out.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2.12%, or 26.12 points, to 1256.16, the biggest percentage gain since 2003. It is 5.2% off the five-year high it hit May 5, but back in the black for 2006, up 0.6%.

The Nasdaq Composite Index posted its biggest percentage gain since 2004, up 2.79%, or 58.15 points, at 2144.15. Although the Nasdaq has returned to its level of one week ago, it remains down 9.6% from its April 19 five-year high and off 2.8% since the year began.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index jumped 3.54% to 701.05, its biggest one-day gain since 2002. It is down more than 10% from the record it hit in May.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.94%, or 3.84 points, to 201.71.

Stocks Extend Rally; Dow Over 11,000 (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

NEW YORK, June 15 -- Wall Street rallied for a second session Thursday as strong earnings from Bear Stearns and mild economic data helped stocks regain their footing after several weeks of hefty losses.

The Dow Jones industrial average jumped 198.27, or 1.8 percent, to 11,015.19, finishing above the 11,000 mark for the first time since June 6. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 26.12, or 2.1 percent, to 1256.16, and the Nasdaq composite index surged 58.15, or 2.8 percent, to 2144.15.

Although the day's data gave mixed signals on economic growth, investors again brushed aside worries about inflation and interest rates following a month of selling that pulled the Dow down more than 8 percent. The market turned sharply higher Thursday afternoon after Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said that record energy and commodity prices could account for some of the recent uptick in core prices but that inflation expectations have remained within historical ranges.

Crude futures had another day of gains after the government reported a larger-than-expected drop in U.S. oil reserves, as refineries stepped up output to meet summer gasoline demand.

Despite two days of sturdy gains, some analysts were skeptical about whether Wall Street has finally reversed course. Stocks are expected to remain volatile until the Fed issues its opinion on the economy's health at the June 28-29 policy meeting.Movers

Microsoft closed up 19 cents, at $22.07, prior to the announcement that co-founder Bill Gates plans to step away from day-to-day duties by July 2008. Microsoft shares slipped in after-hours trading.

Dow's Rally 'does Not Mean That Much' (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035032

NEW YORK — Pinpointing the precise end of scary stock market downturns is, at best, an inexact science. So it's no surprise Wall Street is unwilling to concede that the struggling Dow's surge back above 11,000 after its biggest two-day gain in three years is definitive proof the corrective phase is over.

While professional investors welcomed the Dow Jones industrial average's 309-point gain to 11,015 on Wednesday and Thursday, they said it did not repair all the damage caused by the 8% swoon it suffered over the past five weeks and advised investors to tread cautiously.

“One or two days of a rally does not mean that much,” cautions Price Headley, chief analyst at BigTrends.com. Headley, citing historical patterns, notes that the beaten-down market was due for “a bounce.” But for the bounce to stick, stocks will likely have to drop again and prove that they can stay above the lowest levels hit in the current downdraft.

The two-day surge — which gained steam Thursday after Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke didn't say anything to alarm investors — provided welcome relief from a free fall that began in early May. That sell-off was sparked by fears that the era of cheap money fostered by historically low interest rates was nearing an end as central banks in the USA, Europe and Asia moved to raise interest rates to contain inflation.

The biggest losses have been suffered by riskier asset classes, such as emerging-markets stocks, commodities and shares of small companies.

Back-to-back up days, however, while a sure “sign of life” for stocks, “is not convincing evidence of a new uptrend,” says Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. He says it's unclear whether the rally was fueled by bargain hunters, or a wave of buying by short sellers who had been betting against the market.

Short sellers hope to make money on falling shares by selling borrowed shares and buying them back later at a lower price. When stocks rebounded, these investors opted to buy stocks back before they went even higher, to avoid risking bigger losses.

Tower says it will likely take about a month for the market to work through the bottoming process. Signs that stocks are done falling would be either a massive decline on huge trading volume followed by a sharp rebound, or a successful test of the recent lows and a slow, steady march upward.

Wall Street is debating whether the downturn is over or whether this is a rally in a bear market. Ironically, the Dow's top five daily point gains all came in bear markets. Still, Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's, says this is no bear market. “This is a correction,” he says. “Corrections are like a slap in the face, like what we've seen in the past month. Bears can be equated with grinding downward movements that you equate with water torture.”

Factory Output Fell Slightly In May (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Factory output fell slightly last month as manufacturers adjusted to milder consumer demand, and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sounded a guardedly optimistic note on inflation.

In another sign the economy has entered a period of slower growth, the Fed said industrial production declined 0.1% in May after three consecutive monthly gains, but output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities is still running 4.3% higher than a year earlier. Lower auto production last month spurred a 0.1% decline in the manufacturing sector and mining output dropped as well. Halting a recent upswing, capacity utilization fell to 81.7% in May from 81.9% in April.

The May decline in manufacturing activity was a response to slackening consumer spending after a robust first quarter. "For the first time in more than three years, production of consumer goods, business equipment, construction supplies and business supplies all fell in May," said David Huether, the National Association of Manufacturers' chief economist. "This shows that a broad-based slowdown in the economy is taking place."

After surging at an inflation-adjusted 5.3% annual rate in the first quarter, many analysts say the economy is advancing at a slower pace -- around 3% -- in the current quarter. Rising interest rates, a gradually cooling real-estate market and elevated gasoline prices are restraining consumer spending, but businesses are picking up some of the slack. Recent trends in exports, investment and productivity all point to further gains in business spending, and economists expect industrial production to resume growth in the months ahead.

"So what if industrial production slid back a shade in May?" said Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp. "All major market and industry groups have seen their industrial production rise over the past year...Growth is a go."

Bison Gear & Engineering Corp., based in St. Charles, Ill., is seeing strong demand for the industrial motors it makes for restaurant and health-care equipment. Chief Executive Ron Bullock said a recent investment of "a couple million dollars" in manufacturing gear will enable growth of 15% next year, and exports are accounting for an increasing share of sales. The company's work force, Mr. Bullock added, is up 11% from a year earlier.

Mr. Bernanke, in his speech to the Economic Club of Chicago yesterday, noted that expected inflation, as measured by inflation-protected bonds, had "fallen back somewhat in the past month." He acknowledged that the public's expectations of inflation in surveys and in the bond market had "edged up," developments that "bear watching."

He didn't repeat his stronger warning from a speech last week in which he called recent developments on inflation "unwelcome" and said the Fed would remain "vigilant" to ensure recent increases weren't sustained. That language helped boost expectations for another rise in interest rates later this month and roiled stock markets. But it also appears to have convinced bond investors of his anti-inflation resolve, leading to the recent retreat in their expectations of inflation.

Mr. Bernanke said that while the rise in energy and commodity prices since 2003 hasn't led to the spiral of rising prices and wages of the 1970s, they "have been large enough that they could account for some of the recent pickup in core inflation."

He also said he expects productivity growth -- output per worker-hour -- to continue at 2.5% to 3% a year "for some years ahead." Such a high rate of productivity growth would enable the U.S. economy to grow at roughly 3% to 4% a year without generating inflation.

Separately, the Labor Department said 295,000 people filed initial unemployment claims last week, 8,000 fewer than the week before. The drop pushed the closely watched four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 315,750, which suggests a robust level of job creation this month.

With the unemployment rate at 4.6%, economists have been searching for signs of wage gains that could add to inflationary pressures. The labor market has been sending mixed signals recently, however, and pay increases are lagging behind the prevailing inflation rate.

Mr. Huether of NAM and other manufacturing groups have called on the Fed to stop raising short-term interest rates, but several Fed officials have recently indicated that the recent rise in prices and inflation expectations are greater concerns than slower growth. Futures markets are all but certain the Fed will opt to raise the federal-funds rate to 5.25% later this month.

The Phantom Menace (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

Over the last few weeks monetary officials have sounded increasingly worried about rising prices. On Wednesday, Richard Fisher, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, declared that inflation "is running at a rate that is just too corrosive to be accepted by a virtuous central banker."

I'm worried too — but not about recent price increases. What worries me, instead, is the Fed's overreaction to those increases. When it comes to inflation, the main thing we have to fear is fear itself.

Discussions of inflation can be numbingly arcane — are you a core C.P.I. type or a trimmed-mean P.C.E. person? But the real issue is whether there's a serious risk that inflation will become embedded in the economy.

The classic example of embedded inflation is the wage-price spiral — better described as wage-price leapfrogging — of the 1970's. Back then, whenever wage contracts came up for renewal, workers demanded big raises, both to catch up with past inflation and to offset expected future inflation. And whenever companies changed their prices, they raised them by a lot, both to catch up with past wage increases and to offset expected future increases.

The result of this leapfrogging process was that inflation became a self-sustaining process, feeding on itself. And ending that self-sustaining process proved very difficult. The Fed eventually brought the inflation of the 1970's under control, but only by raising interest rates so high that in the early 1980's the U.S. economy suffered its worst slump since the Great Depression.

Fed officials now seem worried that we may be seeing the start of another round of self-sustaining inflation. But is that a realistic fear? Only if you think we can have a wage-price spiral without, you know, the wages part.

The point is that wage increases can be a major driver of inflation only if workers consistently receive raises that substantially exceed productivity growth. And that just hasn't been happening.

In fact, the distinctive feature of the current economic expansion — the reason most Americans are unhappy with the state of the economy, in spite of good numbers for the gross domestic product and explosive growth in corporate profits — is the disconnect between rising worker productivity and stagnant wages. Over the past five years productivity, as measured by real G.D.P. per hour worked, has risen by about 14 percent, but the real wages of nonmanagerial workers have risen less than 2 percent.

Nor is there much sign that things are changing on that front. The official unemployment rate is low by historical standards, but workers still don't seem to have much bargaining power. (Does this mean that the official unemployment rate makes the job situation look better than it really is? Yes.) The Federal Reserve's Beige Book, an informal survey of economic conditions across the country, reports that over the last couple of months "wage pressures remained moderate over all, with the exception being workers with hotly demanded skills."

But if wage pressures are so moderate, where's the inflation coming from? The answer is soaring oil and commodity prices.

It's true that some widely used inflation measures, like so-called core inflation, strip out the direct "first-round" effects of rising energy prices. But there are still indirect effects, which usually take some time to show up in the data. Much of the recent rise in core inflation probably represents the delayed effect of the big run-up in fuel prices a few months ago. And unless something else happens to drive up oil prices — like, to give a wild example, a military strike on Iran — inflation will probably subside in the months ahead.

And bear in mind that many economists, including Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, have said that a little bit of inflation — say, 2 percent a year on average — is actually good for the economy.

It would be an exaggeration to say that there's no inflation threat at all. I can think of ways in which inflation could become a problem. But it's much easier to think of ways in which the Federal Reserve, wrongly focused on the phantom menace of a new wage-price spiral, could be slow to respond to bigger threats, like a rapidly deflating housing bubble.

So I don't fear inflation nearly as much as I fear the fear of inflation. And I wish the Fed would lighten up on the subject.

As Natural Gas Glut Looms, Producers Eye The Weather (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

The whole world is talking about energy shortages, but for the moment, the U.S. natural gas business is looking at a potential glut.

Thanks in part to a warm winter, inventories of natural gas have built up to levels far greater than normal for this time of year. And terminals built to handle imports of liquefied natural gas from other countries are operating at about half of their capacity.

It is, unfortunately for consumers, a situation that may not last. Energy traders are still pricing futures contracts at high levels, and natural gas producers are planning for big increases in U.S. demand over the coming years. Yesterday, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission approved proposals to build three new terminals and expand two others that together would triple the nation's capacity to import liquefied natural gas (LNG). One of those projects is an expansion of the LNG terminal at Cove Point in Calvert County, Md.

But for now, as anxiety grips oil markets, natural gas markets have calmed down in the past five months. At the end of last week, natural gas in storage amounted to 2.4 trillion cubic feet, up 23 percent from a year earlier and 38 percent higher than the five-year average, according to the Energy Information Administration. As a result, natural gas prices, which spiked as high as $15 a thousand cubic feet last winter, finished yesterday at $6.32 at Henry Hub, La., an industry benchmark.

The only things that can rescue natural gas producers from having to slash prices later this year: another big hurricane or a hot summer.

"What people are counting on is that there will be a hurricane that will disrupt [natural gas] production in the Gulf of Mexico the way Katrina and Rita did and that all that gas in storage is needed to make things work," said Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank.

A report last week by Cambridge Energy Research Associates says that without another major disruption of natural gas production in the Gulf of Mexico or a particularly hot summer to drive up air-conditioning needs, the nation's storage capacity for natural gas will fill to the brim by autumn, producing a "real potential for an abrupt decrease in gas prices" as some storage fields become unable to accommodate additional injections.

This doesn't mean that consumers can expect any immediate relief. Most utilities sign contracts for anywhere from one to three years, and the benefits of lower prices will hinge on when contracts expire, as well as the weather between now and the fall. And current prices are still substantially higher than they were three or four years ago.

The most immediate effect of falling natural gas prices will come at utilities or power-generating firms with the capability to burn either coal or natural gas. "We're beginning to get substitutions," Sieminski said. "At this price level, it actually makes sense to stop burning coal and start burning natural gas."

Most energy analysts, however, see the bulge in natural gas supplies as temporary. "We have a little bit of a reprieve, but I don't think it's a sustainable reprieve," said John Dearborn, vice president for global energy at Dow Chemical Co., a major natural gas user. "We have been able to build up inventories faster than in years prior, but that's no indication of where gas inventories are going to end up. If we have a warm summer and a normal-to-cold winter, we will find ourselves back in the position we were in last winter."

Most players in futures markets agree. Prices for natural gas to be delivered in January stand at $11.10 a thousand cubic feet, what Dearborn calls "the danger area" for consumers like Dow Chemical.

Most oil and gas companies and natural-gas-producing countries are going ahead with plans to meet demand that they expect to rise quickly over the next five to 15 years. In the United States, Sieminski noted, consumption of natural gas is expected to rise by about 30 percent by 2020. Since domestic natural gas production is essentially flat, most of the supply needed to meet that demand is expected to come from abroad in the form of LNG.

That has set off a scramble over LNG terminals and permits to build them. Many states and cities are reluctant to have such terminals. Last week, ConocoPhillips withdrew an application to build an LNG terminal 11 miles off the coast of Alabama, citing uncertainty about local environmental concerns. But it said it might file a new application "after consideration of all the economic factors."

Lord John Browne, chief executive of BP PLC, said in a speech in Washington yesterday that his company plans to invest $700 million in LNG terminals in the United States.

Yesterday's FERC approvals would have impact on both the Gulf and Atlantic coasts. Dominion will be able to increase its LNG import capacity to 1.8 billion cubic feet a day, up from 1 billion currently. In addition to Dominion's project, other projects approved by FERC yesterday were in Louisiana, Texas and New Jersey.

"This supply increase will have a significant impact on domestic natural gas prices in the future," said FERC Chairman Joseph T. Kelliher.

"If you need the gas, you have to build the terminals," Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, said yesterday in a briefing in Washington.

Qatar is gearing up to meet the demand on its end. It is in the midst of a massive expansion program to triple its capacity to export LNG. After meeting with representatives of U.S. natural gas consuming companies yesterday, Attiyah said, "I told them: 'I am a seller. I am here. But you have to provide the facilities.' "

The Beltway's Energy (WSJ)

By Roger C. Altman

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

We first saw America's energy vulnerability in 1973, when the OPEC embargo raised prices dramatically. Then the 1979 Iranian hostage crisis caused gasoline rationing. The message from these two events could not have been louder: The U.S. was too dependent on oil, and especially imports. For over 30 years, however, we have done nothing to reduce this vulnerability. Now we are again facing near-record energy prices, an angry public and the new threat of climate change. Yet Washington is still focused on the wrong issues.

Recent talk of price gouging, windfall profits and CEO pay is a distraction. Yes, there may be abuses, but no actions in those areas will have any impact whatsoever on energy prices or supply. Incessant pledges of energy independence within 15 or 20 years, i.e., national self-sufficiency, are completely unattainable and thus misleading. The sweeping embrace of wind, solar and hydrogen power is similarly misplaced, as these are not among the most promising alternatives.

Instead, what's needed from Washington are three big steps. First, to confess to the public that America is in deep trouble from its oil dependence and its carbon emissions. Second, to impel oil conservation through deep new incentives and mandates. Third, to finance an acceleration of those technologies which could truly replace oil and gas.

Let's start with the bad facts. For the public to support tough steps, it must know the real picture on our oil dependence and our carbon emissions. Our oil problem is about imports. A majority of the oil we use -- primarily for gasoline -- is imported. But over 60% of the world's proved oil reserves lie in Saudi Arabia, Russia, Iran, Iraq, Venezuela and the United Arab Emirates. And the governments in these nations own the reserves, not private parties. These are increasingly unstable places and increasingly unfriendly to America. Does anyone really believe that every single one of these governments, or their successors, will continue to supply oil to the West on reasonable terms?

Moreover, while they are not running out of oil, these nations also have very little spare production capacity right now -- perhaps only two million barrels in an 80-million-barrel daily market. That is why, with China and India now becoming big importers, world oil prices have risen into the mid-$70 range per barrel.

The U.S. will steadily consume more oil, not less; indeed, our daily consumption is projected to nearly double by 2030. Therefore, there is no scenario, absent a breakthrough technology, for our becoming independent of imported oil or natural gas. Our political leaders are obliged to make this clear to the American people.

The second set of bad facts concerns carbon dioxide emissions and climate change. I am not a climatologist, but the evidence of global warming, and the role of human-caused emissions in it, seems close to irrefutable. The National Academy of Sciences sees it that way. Both U.S. and global CO2 emissions are projected to grow indefinitely. Continued warming of the earth may irreversibly reduce its suitability for human life. This catastrophic risk is like that of a large asteroid which might strike this planet over the next 20 to 30 years. This also must be explained in stark terms to the public.

There are only two serious approaches to reducing energy vulnerability and carbon emissions. One is oil conservation and the other is investment in new technology.

The only real strategy on oil is to use less of it. But, every year, the size of the U.S. auto fleet grows and, with fuel economy flat for 20 years, the result is more oil imports. Our leadership must accept that oil conservation is not just a "personal virtue," to quote Vice President Cheney, but a national requirement.

For starters, vehicles must be made more efficient. Corporate average fuel efficiency standards (CAFE) must be raised sharply, perhaps together with a stretch-out of legacy costs for the U.S. auto producers. Owners of the oldest, least efficient vehicles should be paid to turn them in. And we need much deeper tax incentives for production of hybrid and clean diesel engines and for consumer purchases of them. The expected growth in our oil consumption could be cut by 25% to 50% with these steps.

The permanent solution to oil vulnerability and climate change, however, lies in technology. My generation has seen breathtaking technologies emerge, but they will pale before the next ones. Thus, we should aim for technologies to truly end our use of oil and gas. The front-end risks must be financed at the federal level; after all, this is how NASA achieved key computing breakthroughs and the Defense Department developed the Internet.

Right now, however, federal R&D efforts are so small and unfocused as to be embarrassing -- for example, only $300 million for all renewable energy. To change this, some have proposed that the format, intensity and scale of the Defense Advanced Research Progress Agency be replicated in the Department of Energy. This is a good idea that is overdue.

Emission-free coal technology and next-generation nuclear power technology are areas that would benefit from that type of focus. In each case, the technology conceivably could replace oil and gas, unlike wind and solar. And, in each case, the technology works but not at commercial scale and competitive costs. The latest forecasts for reaching beginning competitiveness extend to 20 years. That must be shortened, and only Washington can provide the bridge financing to do so. Such financing is always risky, but far less so than the oil insecurity and climate risks we are running right now.

Since the first energy crisis 33 years ago, our nation has been unable to develop effective solutions. When you think about it, this is a stunning failure of leadership. Now, with America facing even greater danger, we deserve much better. Let's hope we finally get it.

Mr. Altman, chairman of Evercore Partners, was deputy Treasury secretary in the first Clinton administration.

'06 Race Focuses On The Suburbs, Inner And Outer (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash., June 15 — In searching for any advantage in this year's Congressional elections, the two parties are focusing with increased intensity on those cul de sac jungles of tenuous political loyalties, the suburbs and exurbs.

After years in which Republicans capitalized on rapid growth in outlying areas, Democrats now see an opportunity to make gains in close-in suburbs where changes in the composition of the population are working in their favor. In a dozen or so Congressional districts that are leading battlegrounds in the midterm elections, older, more densely packed suburbs are trending Democratic, helping to offset Republican dominance on the sprawling exurban frontier.

Democratic hopes of retaking the House, party strategists say, could hinge on places like Bellevue, a city of 107,000 just across Lake Washington from Seattle. Here, a fast-growing Asian population and an influx of empty-nesters and singles living in new residential complexes have helped to make this the kind of district that, while continuing to send a Republican to Congress, has turned increasingly Democratic.

Both sides are taking steps to tailor their messages to, and train their firepower on, those swing suburbs. On Friday, President Bush will fly into this prosperous district as the draw of a fund-raiser intended to help Representative Dave Reichert hold on to his seat. The president's arrival will follow hard on the heels of a visit by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is in charge of the Democrats' efforts to win back the House.

"The future of both parties is in the suburbs," said Mr. Emanuel, who was here on behalf of Mr. Reichert's Democratic challenger, Darcy Burner, a 35-year-old former Microsoft employee new to politics.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, who represents the North Shore district outside Chicago, said suburban voters were focused less on culture-war issues like same-sex marriage and abortion than on safety, education and environmental protection. As the population changes, he said, those voters no longer fit neatly into partisan types.

"I see this new reality in my district," said Mr. Kirk, a third-term Republican whose district voted Democratic in the 2004 presidential race. "In the old days, when you looked at a detached house with a big yard, that was usually a Republican home."

At the core of the political calculation is a demographic reality: older, more thickly populated inner suburbs, far from being static and homogeneous, are attracting residents of a type that never lived there in large numbers before.

"Something happens as these suburbs age," said Robert E. Lang, director of the Metropolitan Institute at Virginia Tech, a research body focusing on the factors that shape metropolitan growth. "It's not, 'Honey, we've got an attached dwelling unit, it's time to vote Democratic.' It's a difference in the type of people who move there. With density, you get more racial diversity, singles and retired people."

In older suburbs, where growth peaked from the 1970's to the 1990's, and which are home to nearly 60 percent of people who live in the nation's 50 biggest metropolitan areas, Democrats have built a slight advantage, Dr. Lang said in an interview.

While most Congressional districts have been drawn by the state legislature to give a clear advantage to one party or the other, many of the most competitive House races this year are in districts encompassing both older and newer suburbs. That makes them less politically predictable.

In "The New Metro Politics," a study he conducted with Thomas W. Sanchez, Dr. Lang found that in the last several presidential elections, a clear pattern had emerged: the more crowded the suburb, the greater the Democratic vote; the more open space or newer the suburb, the greater the Republican vote.

In the inner suburbs, the rings just around big cities, Democrats won 58 percent of the presidential vote in 2004, Dr. Lang found. In the mature suburbs, the next tier out, the Democratic share was less, 51.9 percent.

But the fastest-growing areas are at the far edge, sometimes 80 miles or more from the urban center, and that is where Republicans built up huge majorities. In the outer two tiers of the study, President Bush won 56.6 percent of the 2004 vote in what Dr. Lang called "the emerging suburbs," and 62.3 percent in the exurbs.

"At each greater increment of urban density, Democrat John Kerry received a higher proportion of the vote," Dr. Lang wrote. The pattern was the same in red states as in blue.

Democrats, who need a change of 15 seats to win control of the House, are studying Dr. Lang's research in an effort to get there.

"His thesis is very much at the center of this race," said Zack Silk, the campaign manager for Ms. Burner, the Democratic challenger to Mr. Reichert here.

There are clear limits to the demography-as-destiny calculation. Mr. Reichert, like many other Republicans in potentially close races, enjoys the considerable power of incumbency. Further, traditional voting patterns can be broken if national political conditions are right, as Democrats discovered in 1994, when, after four decades in power, they lost control of the House in a nationwide Republican sweep. Big issues like the war in Iraq can overwhelm partisan loyalty.

And so can the smaller ones. Mr. Reichert said the No. 1 concern of his constituents was traffic congestion. At a time when Democrats say their polls give Mr. Bush an approval rating of just 26 percent in this district, Mr. Reichert has been campaigning on that issue within a portfolio also touching on matters like gang crime and school safety.

"Yes, the war is important," he said, "but everywhere I go people want to do something about traffic, something to improve their daily lives."

Whatever the issues, though, the mix of demography and politics has been playing out in many districts. In the cluster of counties outside Philadelphia — Bucks, Delaware and Montgomery among them — John Kerry in 2004 improved on the vote of Al Gore four years earlier. Similarly, in Fairfax County, Va., Democrats carried the presidential race easily in 2004 after losing to Mr. Bush in 2000. In Colorado, Democrats made big gains in the populous Denver suburbs of Arapahoe and Jefferson Counties, though Mr. Bush won both, by small margins.

And in the aging suburbs outside Chicago, Democrats have gradually made enough gains that they think they can now win the seat being vacated by Representative Henry J. Hyde, a 16-term Republican. The district includes much of DuPage County, still reliably Republican but becoming more Democratic as it grows.

For every Democratic opportunity in older, more dense and more diverse suburbs, there is a Republican opening in the fast-growing exurbs. For example, in Douglas County, Colo., the nation's fastest-growing county in the late 1990's, Mr. Bush defeated Mr. Kerry by two to one. In the epicenter of California growth, Riverside County, the president won by 57 percent to 41 percent, a big gain over his showing in 2000.

In fact, Mr. Bush won 97 of the nation's 100 fastest-growing counties in 2004. Republicans had homed in on these outer suburbs — often places that were little more than farmland or meadows just a generation ago — with campaigns built around family values.

But Dr. Lang and other experts note that the exurbs in the fastest-growing counties provide a very small share of the nation's vote, and say bigger gains can be had by either party in focusing on places of transition, where older and newer suburbs meet. In looking at the 50 biggest metropolitan areas, which have about 150 million people, Dr. Lang found that 90 million lived in a somewhat older suburb and that only 5.6 million lived in the exurbs, where Mr. Bush's vote was strongest.

Republicans won the last two presidential elections, Dr. Lang said, by running up huge majorities in rural and exurban areas, then winning a bare majority of the suburbs closer to the urban core.

Cheney Sees GOP Winning Midterm Elections (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 15, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday that the Republicans will prevail in the midterm elections because of a strong economy and the ability of the Bush administration to prevent another terrorist attack.

Polls show voters favor Democrats taking charge in November, but Cheney said the GOP will maintain its majority control in the Senate and House. He cited an economy that's "kicking along in very good shape" and President Bush's record in the war on terror.

"And we protected the United States against further attack from the terrorists," Cheney said in an interview on Sean Hannity's radio show. "You can't guarantee there won't be further attacks, but I think the track record is remarkable."

At his news conference Wednesday, Bush also predicted Republican victories in November, saying the GOP "philosophy is one that is forward-looking and optimistic and has worked."

Last week, the Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that only 24 percent of those surveyed approve of the way the Republican-controlled Congress is doing its job. Fifty-two percent said they want Democrats to capture control of Congress in November, about the same as in last month's survey.

Bipartisan Query: Will 2006 Reprise 1994? (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For the Capital's political junkies, it is the question of the year: Could 2006 be another 1994?

Twelve years ago, voters turned on Democrats and gave Republicans control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 40 years. The House speaker was among the Democrats' casualties; not a single Republican incumbent lost.

Now, both parties wonder whether another wave is building, this time to wash out Republican majorities. Parallels between then and now are stoking Democrats' hopes and Republicans' fears. But there are key differences as well.

The party in power: In 1994, Democrats controlled the White House and Congress, just as Republicans do now. President Bill Clinton and his party were low in the polls and divided. The midterm elections that November became a referendum on the president. He wasn't on the ballot, so voters punished his party in Congress.

Today's polls are even worse for President Bush and the Republican-led Congress. In October 1994, a pre-election Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll showed 48% of Americans approved of Mr. Clinton's performance. That compares with Mr. Bush's 37% in a new Journal/NBC poll1, conducted June 9-12. Congress's approval rating is 23% -- four percentage points lower than in October 1994. And by an 11-point margin, Americans now prefer a Democratic-run Congress; in October 1994, Republicans had a six-point edge.

"Do I wish the numbers were better? I wish they were a lot better," says lobbyist and former New York Rep. Bill Paxon, who headed the House Republicans' campaign committee in 1994. But he and other Republicans draw a contrast between Republicans now and Democrats then: Republicans know they are in danger and are acting accordingly.

"Every Republican I've talked to, from entrenched incumbents down to the newest members, they are all working overtime," Mr. Paxon says. "We caught the Democrats napping in '94."

His 1994 Democratic counterpart, former California Rep. Vic Fazio, concedes as much. Only by late summer in 1994 did Democrats realize a storm loomed, he recalls, yet party elders remained complacent or feared that signaling trouble would cause contributions to dry up. "We did save a lot of people," Mr. Fazio says, "but the tide was rising so high, and so fast."

Smaller battleground: The number of competitive seats is lower than in 1994, due largely to partisan gerrymandering of the House's 435 districts and to the particular lineup of Senate seats up for election this year.

Before the 1994 elections, the nonpartisan Cook Political Report counted 10 Democratic Senate seats as tossups, or too close to call; Republicans needed to gain at least seven for a majority. (They went on to win eight and then pick up a ninth when Alabama Sen. Richard Shelby switched parties.) Today, the Cook Report has six Republican seats as tossups; Democrats need every one for a bare majority.

For the House, the 1994 Cook Report listed 82 Democratic seats as competitive -- more than double the 35 vulnerable Republican seats it sees today. Many of those 1994 districts were in the conservative South and had been redrawn to Republicans' advantage after the 1990 census -- "low-lying fruit," in Mr. Fazio's words, and "the biggest single reason" in Mr. Paxon's view that Republicans were able to seize Congress.

Yet Democrats don't need as many House seats. In 1994, Republicans needed at least 40. The Democrats' magic number is 15.

DOJ_NMG_0035039

The issues: After winning in 1992 promising universal health care, Mr. Clinton and the Democratic Congress couldn't even bring a bill to a committee vote in 1994, depressing party loyalists and signaling dysfunction. "We pointed our finger like Babe Ruth, out into the stands, and we missed," Mr. Fazio recalls.

House Democrats' chaotic passage of a crime bill further suggested incompetence and angered liberals and conservatives alike with its gun-control and death-penalty provisions. Republicans attacked Mr. Clinton's 1993 deficit-reduction law for its tax increases, while proposing in late September their "Contract with America," with promises from a balanced budget to term limits. When Democratic leaders had to schedule a lame-duck session so panicked members could rush home to campaign, political scientist Thomas Mann presciently predicted the "disastrous ending ... makes even more likely the electoral earthquake that many of us sense is occurring."

Mr. Bush's top domestic promise of 2004 -- creating private accounts from Social Security -- likewise crashed without a vote. But that failure was last year -- not pre-election like the Clinton health bill. More worrisome to Republicans now is the issue of illegal immigration, which has divided the party and enflamed constituents. Republican leaders already are assuming they will need a lame-duck session to finish the year's work -- just as Democrats did in 1994.

But the issue dragging down Mr. Bush's standing and Congress's is an unpopular war. "There was nothing like Iraq in 1994," Mr. Paxon says.

A backdrop of corruption: As in 1994, scandals have tarred both parties. But the one in power appears most blackened.

By late 1994, four members of Congress, two from each party, were under indictment on charges including fraud and sexual misconduct. Voters recalled a 1992 check-kiting scandal at legislators' House bank. Democrats, bearing the brunt of blame as Congress's majority, proposed reforms, but the legislation languished. Republicans pledged to do better.

Now the roles are reversed. Two House Democrats are under federal investigations. But two Republicans have left Congress -- California's Randy "Duke" Cunningham for prison, and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay to face a corruption trial in Texas -- and several others face questions about their ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of California has hired a legal team amid an investigation of spending earmarks benefiting lobbyist friends.

An emboldened opposition: In 1994 Republican voters were energized against Clinton Democrats, as were a critical mass of antitax, term-limit, pro-gun and private-property groups. Disillusioned Democratic voters stayed home.

Now the political energy is on Democrats' side, among antiwar, environmental, abortion-rights and pro-immigration Hispanic groups, while Republicans worry that demoralized conservatives won't vote. And where conservative talk-radio hosts emerged in 1994 to spread Republicans' message, today liberal bloggers seek to do the same for Democrats.

However, Democrats lack a unifying figure like former Rep. Newt Gingrich, who led the "Republican Revolution." Also, congressional Republicans worked in tandem with then-party chairman Haley Barbour, now Mississippi governor, whereas Democratic leaders have assailed party chairman Howard Dean for not providing enough financial support.

The tea leaves: Special elections for vacated seats are read as harbingers of November. On this score, today's Republicans find reassurance.

In May 1994, Republicans won special elections in Oklahoma and Kentucky for seats that Democrats long held. Last week, with the Republican-tilted seat Mr. Cunningham held up for grabs in California, the narrow winner was another Republican, Brian Bilbray.

Vietnam, Watergate And Rove (WSJ)

By Michael Barone

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

It has been a tough 10 days for those who see current events through the prisms of Vietnam and Watergate. First, the Democrats failed to win a breakthrough victory in the California 50th special election -- a breakthrough that would have summoned up memories of Democrats winning Gerald Ford's old congressional district in a special election in 1974. Instead the Democratic nominee got 45% of the vote, just 1% more than John Kerry did in the district in 2004. Second, U.S. forces with a precision air strike killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on the same day that Iraqis finished forming a government. Zarqawi will not be available to gloat over American setbacks or our allies' defeat, as the leaders of the Viet Cong and North Vietnam did.

Third, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald announced that he would not seek an indictment of Karl Rove. The leftward blogosphere had Mr. Rove pegged for the role of Bob Haldeman and John Ehrlichman. Theories were spun about plea bargains that would implicate Vice President Dick Cheney. Talk of impeachment was in the air. But it turns out that history doesn't repeat itself. George W. Bush, whether you like it or not, is not a second Richard Nixon.

It is hard in retrospect to understand why the left put so much psychic energy into the notion that Mr. Rove would be indicted. He certainly was an important target. No one in American history has been as powerful an aide to a president, both on politics and on public policy, as Karl Rove. Only Robert Kennedy in his brother's administration and Hamilton Jordan in Jimmy Carter's come close, and neither was as involved in electoral politics as Mr. Rove has been.

Still, it was clear early on that the likelihood that Mr. Rove violated the Intelligence Identities Protection Act was near zero. Under the law, the agent whose name was disclosed would have had to have served overseas within the preceding five years (Valerie Plame, according to her husband's book, had been stationed in the U.S. since 1997) and Mr. Rove would have had to know that she was undercover (not very likely). The left enjoyed raising an issue on which, for once, it could charge that a Republican administration had undermined national security. But that rang hollow when the left gleefully seized on the New York Times's disclosure of NSA surveillance of phone calls from suspected al Qaeda operatives abroad to persons in the U.S.

In all this a key role was played by the press. Cries went up early for the appointment of a special prosecutor: Patrick Fitzgerald would be another Archibald Cox or Leon Jaworski. Eager to bring down another Republican administration, the editorialists of the New York Times evidently failed to realize that the case could not be pursued without asking reporters to reveal the names of sources who had been promised confidentiality. America's newsrooms are populated largely by liberals who regard the Vietnam and Watergate stories as the great achievements of their profession. The peak of their ambition is to achieve the fame and wealth of great reporters like David Halberstam and Bob Woodward. But this time it was not Republican administration officials who went to prison. It was Judith Miller, then of the New York Times itself.

Interestingly, Bob Woodward himself contradicted Mr. Fitzgerald's statement, made the day that he announced the one indictment he has obtained, of former vice presidential chief of staff Scooter Libby, that Mr. Libby was the first to disclose Ms. Plame's name to a reporter. The press reaction was to turn on Mr. Woodward, who has been covering this administration as a new story rather than as a reprise of Vietnam and Watergate.

Historians may regard it as a curious thing that the left and the press have been so determined to fit current events into templates based on events that occurred 30 to 40 years ago. The people who effectively framed the issues raised by Vietnam and Watergate did something like the opposite; they insisted that Vietnam was not a reprise of World War II or Korea and that Watergate was something different from the operations J. Edgar Hoover conducted for Franklin Roosevelt or John Kennedy. Journalists in the 1940s, '50s and early '60s tended to believe they had a duty to buttress Americans' faith in their leaders and their government. Journalists since Vietnam and Watergate have tended to believe that they have a duty to undermine such faith, especially when the wrong party is in office.

That belief has its perils for journalism, as the Fitzgerald investigation has shown. The peril that the press may find itself in the hot seat, but even more the peril that it will get the story wrong. The visible slavering over the prospect of a Rove indictment is just another item in the list of reasons why the credibility of the "mainstream media" has been plunging. There's also a peril for the political left. Vietnam and Watergate were arguably triumphs for honest reporting. But they were also defeats for America -- and for millions of freedom-loving people in the world. They ushered in an era when the political opposition and much of the press have sought not just to defeat administrations but to delegitimize them. The pursuit of Karl Rove by the left and the press has been just the latest episode in the attempted criminalization of political differences. Is there any hope that it might turn out to be the last?

Officials Prepare For Midterm Elections (AP-Y2)

By Will Lester

AP2, June 15, 2006

Memo to election supervisors: Make sure the voting machines are set at zero before sending them to polling places.

That's the kind of simple but critical advice federal officials are offering local election supervisors as they prepare for the midterm elections in November.

With memories of the disputed 2000 presidential election still fresh, the Election Assistance Commission is encouraging careful preparation by election supervisors, aggressive recruitment of new poll workers and thorough education of voters.

Another tip: "If election officials just proofread all ballots, it'll save them a lot of headaches, because they'll find mistakes and they'll fix them," commission chairman Paul DeGregorio said Thursday.

The Election Assistance Commission is sending out a "Quick Start Management Guide for New Voting Systems" to 6,700 local election officials around the country. The guide is necessary as about a third of voters will be using new machines this year and many longtime poll workers have retired because the punch-card and lever voting machines have been replaced.

"Chicago experienced significant problems during the elections in March because of new equipment, new Illinois laws and new federal requirements," said DeGregorio, who added the city should be ready for November.

DOJ_NMG_0035041

The 2002 law required improvements to voting systems and voter access after the problems in 2000. States were required to improve their voter information, replace outdated voting equipment and allow provisional voting, which means questionable votes can be verified later.

The commission heard Thursday from several experienced local election officials, who offered suggestions on how the nation could be prepared to run smooth elections.

Connie Schmidt, a retired election commissioner from Kansas, said the election system is undergoing dramatic changes and — "there's no dry run, no practice, no dress rehearsal."

Judge Dismisses Most Of Phone-jamming Suit (AP-Y2)

By Beverley Wang

AP2, June 15, 2006

A judge has dismissed most of a Democratic lawsuit against Republicans stemming from the jamming of Democratic phone lines in the November 2002 elections, a crime that led to criminal convictions against three former GOP officials.

State Democratic Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said Thursday that a judge in Manchester dismissed five of eight claims Democrats had made in the civil lawsuit. The ruling was dated Tuesday.

Both parties called the decision a victory.

The dismissed counts alleged Republicans commited civil harassment and conspiracy, including conspiring against Democrats' constitutional rights to vote and associate. The remaining claims deal with interference with phone systems and seek compensation.

"What the court has basically done is reduced this claim, this lawsuit, to a small claims complaint," said Ovide Lamontagne, a lawyer for the Republicans. "A thousand dollars of damage is what we think they could probably show for the interruption of phones for an hour and a half."

"This is not a good day for the Republican Party," Sullivan said. "Basically what this case is about is their interference with our phone lines, and what the court has said is, 'You can continue to go forward.'"

The civil trial is scheduled to begin in November. Sullivan said she had not yet settled on a dollar figure for damages.

The get-out-the-vote and ride-to-the-polls phone banks run by Democrats and the nonpartisan Manchester firefighters union were jammed for more than an hour on Election Day 2002, during a hotly contested U.S. Senate race between then-Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen and Republican John Sununu. Sununu won by about 20,000 votes.

James Tobin, of Bangor, Maine, a former regional chairman of President Bush's re-election campaign, was convicted in December of two felony telephone harassment charges but acquitted of a third, more serious charge of conspiring against voters' rights. He was sentenced to 10 months in prison.

Former GOP Marketplace president Allen Raymond and former state Republican Committee Executive Director Charles McGee pleaded guilty in the case and testified against Tobin. McGee served seven months, and Raymond received a three-month sentence.

Dan Rather Will Leave CBS After 44 Years (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, June 16, 2006

Dan Rather, who stepped down as anchor of The CBS Evening News 15 months ago in the wake of the Memogate scandal, said Thursday that he'll soon leave the network after 44 years — at the request of network executives.

“They wanted this resolution, and I'm willing to accept that and move on,” said Rather, 74, whose contract expires in November.

Rather had been a correspondent for 60 Minutes since leaving his anchor chair on the Evening News in March 2005. Eight of his stories aired last season — far fewer than many of his colleagues' stories.

Former Today star Katie Couric is set to anchor the Evening News in September and contribute to 60 Minutes along with CNN's Anderson Cooper. And with younger CBS correspondents such as Lara Logan and Scott Pelley also vying for time on 60 Minutes, executives have said that CBS wants to usher in a new look and feel for the top-rated newsmagazine.

In an interview Thursday, Rather said he had planned to stay at CBS for the rest of his career.

DOJ_NMG_0035042

"But life takes its twists and turns, and I'm a pro," he said. "I've been a reporter since I was in my teens. I'm blessed with good health and high energy, and I want to be fully occupied, doing meaningful work. I had hoped that would be possible at 60 Minutes."

Rather's star at the network rose dramatically after his coverage of President Kennedy's assassination in 1963 and lasted throughout the ensuing four decades. He succeeded Walter Cronkite as anchor in 1981.

Rather's star virtually vanished at CBS after the 2004 discredited 60 Minutes story regarding President Bush's military record. That story, which cited documents that could later not be verified, resulted in the firing of three CBS News executives.

Asked whether Memogate had been his undoing, Rather said, "That's history. I'm not interested in going there. I'm focused on the future."

He said he is now talking about what to do next and hopes to make an announcement soon.

CBS confirmed that an exit deal for Rather was in the works, but executives declined to comment further.

Head Examined Scientist's Study Of Brain Genes Sparks A Backlash (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

CHICAGO -- Last September, Bruce Lahn, a professor of human genetics at the University of Chicago, stood before a packed lecture hall and reported the results of a new DNA analysis: He had found signs of recent evolution in the brains of some people, but not of others.

It was a triumphant moment for the young scientist. He was up for tenure and his research was being featured in back-to-back articles in the country's most prestigious science journal. Yet today, Dr. Lahn says he is moving away from the research. "It's getting too controversial," he says.

Dr. Lahn had touched a raw nerve in science: race and intelligence.

What Dr. Lahn told his audience was that genetic changes over the past several thousand years might be linked to brain size and intelligence. He flashed maps that showed the changes had taken hold and spread widely in Europe, Asia and the Americas, but weren't common in sub-Saharan Africa.

Web sites and magazines promoting white "racialism" quickly seized on Dr. Lahn's suggestive scientific snapshot. One magazine that blames black and Hispanic people for social ills hailed his discovery as "the moment the antiracists and egalitarians have dreaded."

Dr. Lahn has drawn sharp fire from other leading genetics researchers. They say the genetic differences he found may not signify any recent evolution -- and even if they do, it is too big a leap to suggest any link to intelligence. "This is not the place you want to report a weak association that might or might not stand up," says Francis Collins, director of the genome program at the National Institutes of Health.

Several scientific groups have set out to disprove or challenge Dr. Lahn's discoveries. His own university now says it is abandoning a patent application it filed to cover a DNA-based intelligence test that drew on his work.

As scientific tools for probing genes become increasingly powerful, research into human differences has exploded. Most of the time, scientists are looking for clues about the causes of disease. But some research is raising tensions as scientists such as Dr. Lahn venture into studies of genetic differences in behavior or intelligence.

Pilar Ossorio, a professor of law and medical ethics at the University of Wisconsin, criticizes Dr. Lahn for implying a conclusion similar to "The Bell Curve," a controversial 1994 bestseller by Richard J. Herrnstein and Charles Murray. The book argued that the lower average performance by African-Americans on IQ tests had a genetic component and wasn't solely the result of social factors. Referring to Dr. Lahn and his co-authors, Prof. Ossorio says: "It's exactly what they were getting at. There was a lot of hallway talk. People said he's doing damage to the whole field of genetics."

The 37-year-old Dr. Lahn says his research papers, published in Science last September, offered no view on race and intelligence. He personally believes it is possible that some populations will have more advantageous intelligence genes than others. And he thinks that "society will have to grapple with some very difficult facts" as scientific data accumulate. Yet Dr. Lahn, who left China after participating in prodemocracy protests, says intellectual "police" in the U.S. make such questions difficult to pursue.

Scientists believe that a small group of anatomically modern humans struck out from Africa probably less than 100,000 years ago. After arriving on the Eurasian land mass, they continued to split up and eventually humans populated nearly every corner of the globe. One use of genetic research is to probe how each group evolved differently after becoming isolated from the others. Recently created genetic maps of people of African, Asian and European ancestry make that research easier.

For instance, researchers have found that most Europeans have a genetic variant that lets them fully digest milk as adults. The variant is much less common in Africa and Asia, where lactose intolerance is widespread. Scientists theorize that it spread quickly among Europeans because drinking milk from domesticated dairy animals conferred a nutritional advantage. Similar evolutionary reasoning may explain why many people in malaria-prone parts of Africa carry gene variants linked to malaria resistance.

Other research is starting to explain variations in human skin color and hair texture. But scientists tense up when it comes to doing the same sort of research on the brain. Sociologist Troy Duster, who studies the use of racial categories by geneticists, worries that scientists will interpret data in ways that fit their prejudices. He cites the sorry history of phrenology, a study of skull shapes popular in the 19th century, and other pseudoscientific techniques used to categorize people as inferior. "Science doesn't transcend the social milieu," says Dr. Duster, of New York University.

Dr. Lahn traces his interest in human differences back to his youth in China. Foreigners there used to have a special currency that they could use at stores closed to ordinary Chinese. "I wondered why people were different, and why Chinese were at the bottom," he says.

By the time violence struck Tiananmen Square in 1989, Dr. Lahn, the son of two physicists, was an undergraduate at Harvard University. He channeled his curiosity into genetics and built his reputation with a groundbreaking study of the Y chromosome. After taking a post at the University of Chicago in 2000, Dr. Lahn won a prestigious fellowship from the Howard Hughes Medical Institute.

The fellowship pays most of his research bills and has allowed him to pursue creative projects, often on attention-grabbing subjects. One study looked at how promiscuity among female chimpanzees, gorillas and humans affected the evolution of a gene that makes sperm sticky. "Bruce is in a hurry to be famous," says Martin Kreitman, a Chicago colleague who is friendly with him.

Henry Harpending, a University of Utah anthropology professor who recently published a theory for why Ashkenazi Jews tend to have high IQ's, says Dr. Lahn once suggested they co-author an article for Scientific American about the genetics of behavior, in which they could explain why "Chinese are boring."

"I think that Bruce doesn't understand political correctness," Dr. Harpending says. Dr. Lahn says he only vaguely recalls the conversation but confirms that he wonders whether during China's imperial times there was "some selection" against rebellious individuals.

In recent years, Dr. Lahn has become interested in why the human brain is so large and complex. Although humans and chimpanzees share about 96% of their DNA, human brains are about four times larger. Even today, researchers can find a correlation, on average, between people's brain size and their IQ.

Dr. Lahn's group zeroed in on the role of two genes, called ASPM and microcephalin, that are known to have a role in brain size. Humans with defective copies of either gene are born with brains only about one-third the normal size.

Studying DNA from several species, the Chicago team found that, over millions of years, the genes had undergone more rapid change in monkeys, apes and humans than in other animals. Their next step was to determine if evolution had continued in modern humans. Dr. Lahn's graduate students began decoding DNA from 1,184 people belonging to 59 groups from around the world, including Bedouins, Pima Indians and French-speaking Basques.

The data showed that evolution had continued in recent millennia. A statistical analysis of DNA patterns suggested that new mutations in each of the two brain-related genes had spread quickly through some human populations. Evidently, these mutations were advantageous among those populations -- just as the genetic variant promoting milk digestion was advantageous to early Europeans. Dr. Lahn and his team further observed that the new mutations are found most frequently outside of Africa.

What the data didn't say was how the mutations were advantageous. Perhaps the genes play a role outside of the brain or affect a brain function that has nothing to do with intelligence.

While acknowledging that the evidence doesn't permit a firm conclusion, Dr. Lahn favors the idea that the advantage conferred by the mutations was a bigger and smarter brain. He found ways to suggest that in his papers. One mutation, which according to his estimates arose some 40,000 years ago, coincided with the first art found in caves, the paper observed. The other mutation, present mostly in people from the Middle East and Europe, and estimated to be 5,800 years old, coincided with the "development of cities and written language."

That suggested brain evolution might have occurred in tandem with important cultural changes. Yet because neither variant is common in sub-Saharan Africa, there was another potential implication: Some groups had been left out.

The dean of the University of Chicago's medical school, James L. Madara, says he approached Dr. Lahn before the papers were published. They discussed whether the report could be taken out of context. "Let the chips lie where they may," Dr. Madara says he told Dr. Lahn. As long as the ideas and data are clear, "don't worry about the implications," the dean said.

John Easton, head of media relations at the medical school, says his office was worried the work could be misinterpreted and abused by racist groups. Mr. Easton borrowed a copy of "The Mismeasure of Man," the famous attack on IQ tests and brain-volume measurements by the late paleontologist Stephen Jay Gould. Mr. Easton helped Dr. Lahn with talking points about his research. "We said, 'Don't be shy about telling people what it doesn't mean,' " Mr. Easton recalls.

Mr. Easton says Dr. Lahn "makes us nervous" but "with Bruce we know it's not driven by personal bias." That is because Asians "don't score at the top" in the frequency of the brain-gene mutations, Mr. Easton says.

Dr. Lahn's paper and talk at his university -- in which he also claimed the gene variants were probably linked to higher IQ -- provoked a strong reaction both on and off campus. Dr. Collins, head of the federal genome program, obtained advance copies of the papers and circulated them to top population geneticists. He wasn't persuaded by the statistical evidence for evolution and criticized Dr. Lahn's work in media interviews.

The papers won wide attention among researchers, and several responded by setting out to test Dr. Lahn's findings. Scientists at the Broad Institute, a top genetics center in Cambridge, Mass., have been reanalyzing some of the data and say they may challenge Dr. Lahn's finding that evolution acted on ASPM, one of the genes. Broad's influential chief, Eric Lander, says scientists probing recent evolution run the risk of "seeing a difference, and saying there is a story to fit it."

A team at the University of California, Los Angeles, recently tested whether the gene variants actually affect brain size. They studied DNA from 120 people whose brain volumes they had already measured using magnetic-resonance imaging. They didn't find any difference. "It certainly makes you want to look at other explanations" of what the variations mean, says Roger P. Woods, a UCLA brain-mapping expert who reported the results in May.

Some of Dr. Lahn's co-authors are also uncomfortable with the work. Sarah Tishkoff, a geneticist at the University of Maryland who provided DNA from remote African groups, says she is bothered how one paper drew a link between the genetic changes and the rise of civilization. She thinks it is too early to reach any conclusions about why the changes spread and says it is "very simplistic" to imagine that a single gene could have a major effect on complex cultural traits.

Several groups of scientists have sent letters to Science criticizing the papers. Dr. Lahn prepared responses, sending one earlier this month, but Dr. Tishkoff wasn't willing to add her name to them.

"You have to follow the data wherever it leads, but speculating in this field is dangerous," says Spencer Wells, head of the National Geographic Society's Genographic Project, a five-year, $40 million effort to collect DNA samples from 100,000 indigenous people. Dr. Wells says the project team might try to find evolutionary reasons for physical differences such as why Danes are taller than pygmies. But Dr. Wells says National Geographic won't study the brain. "I think there is very little evidence of IQ differences between races," he says.

The accuracy of Dr. Lahn's work and his views on race came up in his tenure review last fall, says a person familiar with it. After debate, his department voted unanimously in his favor, according to another faculty member. A more senior committee agreed and awarded Dr. Lahn the post of full professor, although it wasn't unanimous, this person says.

Dr. Lahn stands by his work but says that because of the controversy he is moving into other projects. Earlier this year, Mr. Easton of the university's media department forwarded Dr. Lahn a paper by two economists looking at the IQ of infants of different races. Dr. Lahn wasn't interested. "I'm surprised anyone studies this," he replied in an email.

Dr. Lahn says he isn't as eager as he once was to continue studying brain differences. P. Thomas Schoenemann, a professor of anthropology at the University of Michigan-Dearborn, says that at Dr. Lahn's request he collected DNA from 25 people whose brain sizes he had studied previously. But the two scientists haven't been in touch recently.

The university's patent office is also having second thoughts. Its director, Alan Thomas, says his office is dropping a patent application filed last year that would cover using Dr. Lahn's work as a DNA-based intelligence test. "We really don't want to end up on the front page...for doing eugenics," Mr. Thomas says.

More recently, Dr. Lahn says he was moved when a student asked him whether some knowledge might not be worth having. It is a notion to which he has been warming. Dr. Lahn says he once tried testing himself for which version of the brain genes he has. The experiment's outcome was blurry "but it wasn't looking good," he says. He hasn't tried testing himself again.

Pioneer Urges 'Responsible Fatherhood' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

In his 70 years, Charles Augustus Ballard has overcome the loss of his coal-miner father, functional illiteracy, a stint in prison and unwed fatherhood.

His experiences led him to found in 1982 a national organization that was one of the first -- if not the first -- to promote "responsible fatherhood" as a social policy, the Institute for Responsible Fatherhood and Family Revitalization (IRFFR).

Last month, one of his dreams came true: The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) announced the availability of its first funding stream dedicated to "responsible fatherhood" programs.

DOJ_NMG_0035045

But for Mr. Ballard, the $32 million announcement comes amid a difficult personal struggle: He came home Wednesday from a Bowie rehabilitation center, where he has been recovering from a devastating stroke suffered in January.

His new goals are to walk without a cane and resume jogging; write a book about restoring broken relationships; and help his wife, Frances, rebuild their organization.

The couple is already in discussions with several organizations about partnering with the IRFFR. Applications for the new grants are due in two weeks.

For the moment, Mr. Ballard is grateful to be home again, having relearned how to talk, walk and eat.

"I am going to really hit the road running," he said in his Glenn Dale home.

"My husband is a man of tremendous faith and I am, too," Mrs. Ballard said. "The mission and purpose and drive goes forward."

The problem of "fatherlessness" first gained widespread national attention more than a decade ago.

Milestones include Ken Canfield's 1990 founding of the National Center for Fathering; the 1994 debut of the National Fatherhood Initiative (NFI), founded by Don E. Eberly; and the 1995 publication of "Fatherless America: Confronting Our Most Urgent Social Problem," by David Blankenhorn.

"Fathers are not superfluous. They are indispensable and irreplaceable," Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families, said in 1995 when he was NFI director.

When NFI started, there were about 100 fatherhood programs. Today, there are "too many to count" because so many programs now include fatherhood programming, said NFI spokesman Vincent DiCaro.

But all this interest came years after Mr. Ballard started the IRFFR in Cleveland.

Galvanized by his personal experiences with fatherlessness -- his father died when he was 3 and he became an unwed father as a teen -- plus his conversion to Christianity while in prison, Mr. Ballard decided to work to connect men to their children. He chose his motto from the Bible's Book of Malachi -- "turning the hearts of fathers to their children and the hearts of children to their fathers."

Mr. Ballard's novel approach was to use married "mentor couples" as his outreach workers. The couples scoured neighborhoods for single fathers and served them and their families around the clock, teaching the men why they should establish paternity, strengthen their fathering skills, finish school, get jobs and support their children. The vast majority of IRFFR fathers achieved these goals, and more than a few got married.

"The most powerful job-creation program is one that instills in a father a desire to fulfill his first job -- that is, to love his children and respect their mother," Mr. Ballard said in 1998 in one of his many appeals to Congress to fund programs that show fathers how to be financially, emotionally, physically and spiritually responsible for their children.

Thanks to federal and private grants, Mr. Ballard's IRFFR spread to a dozen cities -- including Washington -- and generated national confidence in the idea of responsible fatherhood programs.

Each of the new HHS grants for fatherhood programs "will be a testament to the leadership Charles has shown through the years on this most important issue," said Rep. Wally Herger, California Republican and chairman of the House subcommittee that wrote the legislation.

In recent years, however, the IRFFR lost ground: Funding complications meant that many sites had to be closed and staff let go. Mr. Ballard's Jan. 19 stroke was another blow.

But the Ballards see his swift recovery as "miraculous" and the way to new and even greater opportunities to strengthen families.

"There is a God. There really is a God," Mr. Ballard said.

Seeds For A Geo-Green Party (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The recent focus of the Republican-led Congress on divisive diversions, like gay marriage and flag burning, coupled with the unveiling of Unity '08, an Internet-based third party that plans to select its presidential candidate through online voting, has intensified the chatter that a third party, and maybe even a fourth, will emerge in the 2008 election.

Up to now, though, most of that talk has been about how a third party might galvanize voters, using the Web, rather than what it would actually galvanize them to do. I'd like to toss out an idea in the hopes that some enterprising politician or group of citizens — or Unity '08 — will develop it. It's the concept I call "Geo-Green."

What might a Geo-Green third party platform look like?

Its centerpiece would be a $1 a gallon gasoline tax, called "The Patriot Tax," which would be phased in over a year. People earning less than $50,000 a year, and those with unusual driving needs, would get a reduction on their payroll taxes as an offset.

DOJ_NMG_0035046

The billions of dollars raised by the Patriot Tax would go first to shore up Social Security, second to subsidize clean mass transit in and between every major American city, third to reduce the deficit, and fourth to massively increase energy research by the National Science Foundation and the Energy and Defense Departments' research arms.

Most important, though, the Patriot Tax would increase the price of gasoline to a level that would ensure that many of the most promising alternatives — ethanol, biodiesel, coal gasification, solar energy, nuclear energy and wind — would all be economically competitive with oil and thereby reduce both our dependence on crude and our emissions of greenhouse gases.

In short: the Geo-Green party could claim that it has a plan for shoring up America's energy security, environmental security, economic security and Social Security with one move.

It could also claim that — however the Iraq war ends — the Geo-Green party has a strategy for advancing political and economic reform in the Arab-Muslim world, without another war. By stimulating all these alternatives to oil, we would gradually bring down the price, possibly as low as $25 to $30 a barrel. That, better than anything else, would force regimes like those in Iran, Sudan, Egypt, Angola, Venezuela and Saudi Arabia to open up. Countries don't reform when you tell them they should. They reform when they tell themselves they must — and only when the price of oil goes down will they tell themselves they must.

Moreover, by making America the leader in promoting clean power, the Geo-Greens would be offering a credible plan for recouping a lot of America's lost prestige in the world — prestige it lost when the Bush team trashed Kyoto. This would put America in a much better position to galvanize allies to combat jihadism.

Last, Geo-Greenism could be the foundation of a new American patriotism and educational renaissance. Under the banner "Green is the New Red, White and Blue," the Geo-Green party would seek to inspire young Americans to study math, science and engineering to help make America not only energy independent but also the dominant player in what will be the dominant industry of the 21st century: clean power and green technology.

Frankly, I wish we did not need a third party. I wish the Democrats would adopt a Geo-Green agenda as their own. (Republicans never would.) But if not, I hope it will become the soul of a third party.

"Historically, third parties arise in America when they seize a neglected issue and demonstrate that there is a real constituency for it," said Micah Sifry, author of "Spoiling for a Fight: Third-Party Politics in America." "They win by forcing that issue into the mainstream — even if the party itself is later forgotten. Conditions certainly seem ripe for such a third-party bid today."

But rather than artificially splitting the difference between the Democrats and the Republicans, Mr. Sifry added, "a successful third party has to get in front of both — with an agenda that inspires hope and with leadership that inspires trust. Fear of a dark future isn't the best motivator; hope for a better one is."

That's Geo-Greenism. To be sure, Geo-Greenism is not a complete philosophy on par with liberalism or conservatism. But it can be paired with either of them to make them more relevant to the biggest challenges of our time. Even if Geo-Greenism couldn't attract enough voters to win an election, it might attract a big enough following to frighten both Democrats and Republicans into finally doing the right things.

New Gravity For The Political Center (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post (opinion), June 16, 2006

My grandfather used to amaze us kids with a home movie he called "Gravity Remover." It showed balls rolling up steep hills, and spilled water flowing back into cups. It took us years to realize he was just running the normal film backward.

I've had that same pleasant suspension of disbelief the past few weeks watching the political scene. It's as if somebody has poured gravity remover all over Washington, dissolving the normal laws of political behavior. For a change, the extreme wings of the two parties aren't calling the shots; bad ideas pitched by one-issue zealots are falling flat; the news out of Iraq is upbeat; the Bush administration is appointing Rockefeller Republicans to top positions. What the heck is going on, Grandpa?

A week ago Senate conservatives tried to whip up a divisive dither about gay marriage. This wedge issue had worked brilliantly for the GOP in 2004, but this time the campaign fizzled after a few days. Perhaps credit is due to the vice president's gutsy lesbian daughter, Mary Cheney, who is on a tour promoting her book celebrating diversity, tolerance and her gay-rights-supporting dad.

Gravity remover has been dusted over the National Rifle Association, too. The fearsome NRA launched a nationwide campaign last month demanding that every mayor and police chief in America sign a pledge that they won't disarm "law-abiding citizens" in the event of a terrorist attack or natural disaster. The NRA is also proposing federal legislation that would make it a crime for cops to disarm lawfully gun-toting citizens during emergencies.

DOJ_NMG_0035047

Even by NRA standards, this is a bad idea -- not just divisive but downright dangerous. Does the gun lobby really want to remake America in the image of Iraq? The proposal was apparently motivated by the lawlessness in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, but if there aren't enough cops to patrol the streets, then hire more cops. When individual citizens, even "law-abiding" ones, decide to go it alone, the result is anarchy.

Given the gun lobby's usual success in muscling special-interest provisions into law, you might expect to see politicians rushing to sign the America-as-Baghdad pledge. But no. The NRA's proposal is getting the cool reception it deserves, and mayors actually seem to be moving in the opposite direction. Michael Bloomberg, the Republican mayor of New York, has organized a coalition to fight for tougher gun laws, and it now includes 50 other mayors. Meanwhile, on Capitol Hill, the bill that would throw cops in jail if they tried to disarm NRA members after a terrorist attack is mercifully going nowhere.

Gaithersburg Police Chief Mary Ann Viverette, president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, dismisses the pledge as "a thing to get attention for NRA issues." She explains: "It's really absurd. It asks us to sign a pledge to do something we do anyway -- uphold the Constitution."

David Brooks of the New York Times has argued that we're seeing a reanimation of the political center, and I think he's right. The middle is getting tired of the tyranny of the extremes. One sign is the launch this month of Unity08, a bipartisan group that plans to hold an online convention to nominate a split Democratic-Republican 2008 presidential ticket. Unity08's pitch to the big, unhappy middle is expressed succinctly in one of its slogans: "Depressed about the Democrats? Revolted by the Republicans? You're not alone."

One big factor that has locked in the status quo is political money, which gives inordinate power to special interests. But here, too, there seem to be sprinkles of gravity remover. Unity08's co-founders, Hamilton Jordan and Doug Bailey, say they are convinced they can fund an independent ticket from fed-up small donors. And there may be big money, too: Louis Bacon, who runs the giant hedge fund Moore Capital Management, has been discussing the creation of a "center for the center" that would help build a congressional third party. His argument is that if a third party could capture even a handful of House and Senate seats, it would hold the balance of power -- and would force the Democrats and Republicans to bargain toward the middle rather than the extremes.

Why do I think these traces of gravity remover are any more real than my grandfather Richard Weiser's home movie? Well, maybe the film of American politics has actually been running in reverse in recent years -- producing the illusion that you can govern America from the wings of each party. Maybe the movie is finally beginning to run forward again.

Politics Begins At Home (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The nation is fortunate that a sudden attempt to kill one of the hallowed anticorruption reforms from the Watergate scandal — the option of public financing in presidential elections — was smoked out in the House this week. The sponsor, Representative John Doolittle, a powerful California Republican, may try another day with his plan to block the flow of taxpayers' voluntary contributions from the government treasury. Mr. Doolittle has such faith in private money-raising that he boosted his family income by setting up his wife, Julie, as a consultant being paid a 15 percent commission on every dollar his campaign raises.

Call it family values. Call it brazen. But the missus has received $180,000 since late 2001, operating this private business out of the couple's suburban Virginia home, including among her clients the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The pathetic state of Congressional ethics is that such nepotic profiteering is deemed legal so long as the compensation is "consistent with the market rate." Questions have gone unanswered about whether Julie Doolittle has any real experience in the field. Professional fund-raising associations have condemned payment by commission as unethical, but Mr. Doolittle's office defends it as legal and based on "tireless and effective work."

Mr. Doolittle sits on the Appropriations Committee, to which lobbyists and special interests have an attraction that borders on Pavlovian. No great drumbeating is needed to fill those campaign kitties. Like other lawmakers, Mr. Doolittle indulges "earmarking" — the odious practice of delivering government contracts to favored pleaders who often requite with campaign contributions.

Such quid pro quo politicking predates Watergate. But the insult to taxpayers by Doolittle Inc. is compounded by the move to kill the public financing alternative to big-money political pandering. The presidential check-off system has worked well for three decades, but is being strained by the rocketing private donations that politicians eagerly welcome. Congress needs to update the system's matching fund and spending limits, not obliterate them.

Power Struggles In Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035048

IN MARYLAND'S efforts to cushion the blow of soaring electricity bills for consumers, there is the distinctive whiff of post-Soviet economic adjustment. Much like the disoriented subjects of former communist regimes a decade ago, Marylanders -- coddled for years by artificially low energy prices -- are suddenly confronted by the trauma of having to pay market rates. Unsurprisingly, they don't like it a bit. And the politicians in Annapolis, just like those hapless old apparatchiks in Moscow, are scrambling for cover.

They seem to have found it this week. In a special session of the state legislature, a number of Republican lawmakers broke ranks with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and joined Democrats in providing some rate relief to Baltimore Gas and Electric's 1.2 million residential customers. Instead of bearing the full brunt of a 72 percent increase in their electricity bills next month, BGE ratepayers, mostly around Baltimore but also in some Washington suburbs, will initially be hit with jumps of just 15 percent starting July 1. The balance of the increase will kick in next June (read: after this year's elections), though customers will have the option of deferring that for another seven months, until Jan. 1, 2008. BGE, which will have to borrow money to make up the difference, will recover the borrowing costs by charging ratepayers a monthly fee, about $2.19 for the average household for 10 years.

Constellation Energy Group, BGE's parent company, seems reasonably content with the deal, which is significant, as it had brandished the threat of its own financial instability and rolling blackouts if things turned out badly. Lawmakers, too, are asserting a victory for average Marylanders, as you'd expect in an election year. True to form, Mr. Ehrlich is threatening a veto -- one that would be strictly symbolic because it would be easily overridden. The threat is reminiscent of his role in the December 2004 debate over medical malpractice, when the governor convened a special session, then vetoed the compromise bill that emerged.

In the current set-to, Mr. Ehrlich is not happy that the legislature's bill on several counts. He thinks his own plan -- thrown out by a judge who thought it ignored consumers' interests -- drove a better bargain for the state. He also dislikes the current bill's plan to disband Maryland's utility regulating body, the Public Service Commission, four of whose five members were named by the governor. They would be replaced by regulators chosen by the governor -- but from a list supplied by the legislature. But Mr. Ehrlich has partly himself to blame for naming PSC members clearly tilted toward the utilities, even to the point of plotting strategy and planning hunting trips with senior executives.

Obviously, rates must rise to reflect the world energy market. The General Assembly was foolish in the first place, back in 1999, to craft deregulatory legislation that locked in prices at 1993 levels -- minus 6.5 percent. At the time, lawmakers were interested mostly in covering their political hides and evading responsibility for the consequences of deregulation, but as world energy prices soared, the prices charged to BGE customers became increasingly disconnected from reality. The new legislation will correct that original sin, gradually and sensibly. As repair work goes, it is serviceable and sensible.

Iran Lobbies China, Russia To Help Curb U.S. (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad urged China, Russia and Central Asian nations to increase cooperation and blunt the interference of "domineering powers" in global affairs -- an apparent reference to the U.S. -- while dangling Iran's energy supplies as an inducement to work together.

The Iranian leader, under mounting pressure from Washington to curb his country's nuclear ambitions, was speaking yesterday at the annual summit of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a regional economic-and-security bloc fashioned by Beijing. Besides China and Russia, the group includes Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan.

Countries of the region should work together to "prevent the threats of domineering powers and their aggressive interference in global affairs," Mr. Ahmadinejad said. He emphasized that Iran's large reserves of crude oil provide "conducive grounds" for these countries to cooperate with Tehran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad appeared alongside the leaders of Russia and China, both permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, in a move that Iran apparently hopes will strengthen its hand and undercut that of its rivals before it enters into potential negotiations with the U.S. and other countries over the future of Tehran's nuclear programs.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad was enjoying a warm public welcome in Shanghai, U.S. and European diplomats at the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna tried to press Iran to halt sensitive nuclear activities that could produce material for atomic bombs.

Gregory L. Schulte, the chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA, blasted Tehran for "withholding cooperation" from international inspectors and warned that further intransigence risks the "weight of the Security Council." He called on Iran to accept a proposal for multilateral talks.

The U.S., China, Russia and three other European nations have said that if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment, they would start negotiations on incentives for Iran to limit its nuclear programs.

DOJ_NMG_0035049

Russian President Vladimir Putin, who met with Mr. Ahmadinejad, told reporters "Iran is ready to enter negotiations." But it remained unclear whether Tehran would agree first to stop uranium-enrichment efforts. That process can produce fuel for power plants or nuclear weapons.

Both Beijing and Moscow have opposed U.S. efforts to pressure Iran with economic or diplomatic sanctions. Russia wants to sell nuclear-reactor technology to Tehran. China, preoccupied with securing enough energy for its industrial expansion, also is looking to cultivate ties with Iran.

Iran is China's third-largest supplier of crude oil, according to Chinese government figures. The country accounted for 13% of China's oil imports in the first four months of the year. Beijing also is negotiating a multibillion-dollar deal with Iran for the development and supply of further oil and natural gas to China.

For China, oil has increasingly become the focus of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, which was initially formed to deal with terrorism and separatist threats. Now, Chinese analysts increasingly talk about turning the old Silk Road across Central Asia into an "energy road."

China's oil imports from Kazakhstan more than doubled in the first four months of the year, compared with the same period in 2005. Crude imports from Russia climbed 36% during the same period, making the country China's fourth-biggest oil supplier.

Mr. Putin talked of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization's role as an "energy club." India, an observer at the meeting, was represented by its oil minister. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in campaigning for full membership in the group said his country could serve as a "trade and energy corridor" connecting China and others to oil and gas supplies.

The U.S. and other major oil importers are becoming increasingly concerned about energy security. To some officials in Washington, the Shanghai Cooperation Organization is looking more threatening and anti-Western.

Mr. Ahmadinejad wasn't the only one to complain about outside influence in the region. Uzbekistan President Islam Karimov railed against the stationing of foreign military forces in the region. He said their presence marks an effort to "drive a wedge" between neighbors and "rope" host countries "into [the] sphere of influence" of countries posting the troops.

Other leaders defended the presence of international troops. Afghan President Hamid Karzai said foreign soldiers are essential to fighting terrorism and strengthening government institutions in his country.

Iran "ready To Negotiate" Over Nuclear Stance (FT)

By Gareth Smyth, Geoff Dyer, And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin on Thursday struck an optimistic note on Iran's nuclear crisis, saying Tehran had responded positively to the six-nation package of incentives designed to persuade it to curb its nuclear programme.

After meeting Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, his Iranian counterpart, in Shanghai, Mr Putin said Iran was "ready to negotiate" with world powers over the proposal.

However, it was far from clear that Tehran had in fact accepted the conditions for talks – the suspension of uranium enrichment.

Mr Putin, who was attending a summit of the Shanghai Co-operation Organisation, a central Asian security group of which Iran is an observer, said Tehran would soon set a date for the start of talks. "The Iranian side responded positively to the six-nation proposal for a way out of the crisis," Mr Putin said.

The international proposal, which includes a package of incentives, was made at the beginning of June by the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus Germany.

"It is not what the Russians say that is going to be decisive," said an EU diplomat. "The response that really matters is the Iranian one."

European officials also caution that the Iranian response is likely to be a "fudge" that will require clarification in further talks.

Tehran says it is closely studying the package and preparing a counter-proposal. One official considered a regime insider told the FT that Iran would reply in one or two weeks but this response would be "general rather than specific". It would say it was ready for talks but not with preconditions, he added. "There is no chance whatsoever of Iran stopping enrichment."

Saudi Arabia this week joined the diplomatic effort to persuade Iran to accept the suspension of uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on the incentives package.

Saud al-Faisal, the foreign minister, met Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader and the ultimate decision-maker. Saudi sources indicated the mood in Tehran was in favour of negotiations and that a formula to resolve the uranium enrichment condition might be found.

Nuclear experts say Iran could justify a short suspension as a necessary technical break and allow negotiations to start.

Iran's leaders are also still assessing Washington's decision to reverse earlier policy and agree to talk to Tehran about the package, albeit under conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0035050

According to an official in Tehran, the leadership was puzzled as to whether the US was ready for a “dignified solution” to its stand-off with Tehran.

Alternatively, he said, the US could merely be manoeuvring to persuade Russia and China to back UN sanctions.

Still, he said, Iran did not feel under the kind of pressure that would force it to back down over its enrichment policy.

Some western banks had reduced their operations with Iran, but the high price of oil was boosting Iran’s foreign exchange earnings, he said.

Nevertheless, it did not compare with the pressures Tehran was under in the 1980-1988 Gulf war, when western and Arab governments were supporting Saddam Hussein’s regime.

Iran’s largely conservative media, meanwhile, has in recent days argued that the US has acted from weakness rather than strength, particularly because of its problems in Iraq.

The Kayhan newspaper said that the west “had no more cards to play”, that Russia and China had “maintained their opposition to a military attack or sanctions” and that Monday’s statement from the Non-Aligned Movement supporting Iran’s right to peaceful atomic energy had “inserted a large spanner in the US works”.

Iran Seeks Aid In Asia In Resisting The West (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI, June 15 -- Overshadowing a regional summit, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested Thursday that China, Russia and neighboring Central Asian nations should help Iran resist growing pressure from the United States and Europe to limit its nuclear development program.

The appeal, in a speech to leaders of the six-nation Shanghai Cooperation Organization, seemed aimed in particular at China and Russia. The two nations, permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, have been reluctant to endorse the threat of U.N. sanctions and other steps being pushed by the Bush administration to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium and submit its nuclear program to international controls.

Ahmadinejad's remarks were also framed to portray the Shanghai Cooperation Organization as a bloc opposed to the threats that have accompanied the U.S. and European campaign against Tehran's nuclear program. In addition to China and Russia, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan make up the group, which was founded five years ago under Chinese leadership to foster regional security and economic cooperation.

"We want this organization to develop into a powerful body, influential in regional and international politics, economics and trade, and also serve to block threats and unlawful strong-arm interference from various countries," Ahmadinejad declared.

The five permanent Security Council members -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- along with Germany recently proposed a new package of incentives designed to persuade Iran to halt uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on its nuclear ambitions. Although Russia and China signed on, they have signaled reluctance to approve sanctions or other punitive action that Washington has warned could follow unless Iran buys into the proposals.

Iran has insisted that its program is aimed exclusively at producing energy and that it is within its rights to develop nuclear technology like other nations. But U.S. and European officials have suggested that the ultimate goal is nuclear weapons.

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, urged Iran to accept the incentives package. In keeping with the Chinese position, he said diplomacy, not force or threats of sanctions, was the way to deal with the standoff. Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing met with his Iranian counterpart to foster a favorable reply from Tehran, Liu said. But he added, "They still need a little time."

Presidents Vladimir Putin of Russia and Hu Jintao of China did not respond publicly to Ahmadinejad's appeal, but Putin told reporters that Iran was favorably disposed to the U.S.-European offer.

Appearing uncomfortable with the focus on the nuclear standoff, Liu suggested that reporters here were paying too much attention to Iran and not enough to festivities marking the Shanghai Cooperation Organization's fifth anniversary. Iran was invited as an observer nation, along with leaders from Pakistan, Mongolia and India. President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan was also on hand, at the invitation of China, because joint action against drug smuggling was high on the agenda.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld suggested recently that Ahmadinejad should not have been allowed to attend because one of the organization's main goals is to fight terrorism -- and according to the Bush administration, Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. Rumsfeld's comments also highlighted a more general U.S. uneasiness over the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, a group with growing influence revolving around Chinese and Russian leadership and excluding the United States.

In a communique, the participating heads of state said they intended to work out a mechanism "to adopt measures in response to developments that threaten regional peace, stability and security." While vague, the agreement suggested more formal military cooperation among Russia, China and their Central Asian partners. Hu also proposed that the body's six members begin negotiations toward a friendship and security treaty.

Recognizing U.S. concerns, Hu and other leaders emphasized in speeches that the organization was not aimed against any other countries.

But the background music of independence from U.S. influence seemed clearly audible as the six nations celebrated their cooperation. President Islam Karimov of Uzbekistan, for instance, complained that "foreign forces stationed in the region" had failed to dampen drug smuggling from Afghanistan and had sought to "rope in" Central Asian nations to advance their own interests.

Uzbekistan, along with Kyrgyzstan, accepted U.S. military forces on its soil to support the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But Uzbekistan has since expelled the U.S. military from its base in the country, and Karimov's relations with Washington have soured. At a summit last year, Shanghai Cooperation Organization leaders called on the United States to set a deadline for the withdrawal of military installations from all member states.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said his country was keen to upgrade its status in the organization from observer to full member. Musharraf portrayed Pakistan as an "energy corridor" for the movement of Persian Gulf oil into the giant Chinese economy, reflecting the organization's strong appeal to the nations surrounding China that are eager to share in its growing prosperity.

China has helped finance a port at Gwadar, in southwestern Pakistan, and planning is underway for a road link between Gwadar and western China. Similarly, China has given low-interest loans for several projects in the Central Asian nations belonging to the organization.

Ahmadinejad suggested that Iran, with its large oil reserves, was also eager to play a part. He called for a regional energy conference to be held in Tehran, an idea that Liu said appealed to China.

Iran Sends Mixed Signals On Response (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 16, 2006

Iran sent mixed signals Thursday on how it will respond to the world's incentives to give up uranium enrichment, with its supreme leader vowing his country would never back down, while the president and chief envoy to the U.N. nuclear watchdog said Tehran was prepared to negotiate.

The Iranians spoke as American and European officials in Vienna urged Tehran to freeze enrichment and stop withholding information about its nuclear program. The chief U.S. delegate to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Gregory L. Schulte, warned that if Iran rejected the incentives, it could face "the weight of the Security Council."

But supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei dismissed such talk.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran will not succumb to these pressures," state television quoted Khamenei as saying.

Speaking to Iranian nuclear experts, Khamenei said the development of nuclear technology was more important than oil extraction — the source of about 80 percent of Iran's foreign exchange.

"Let me tell you, the importance of achieving and using nuclear energy is higher than oil exploration for our country," Khamenei said.

The five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, have offered Iran a package of incentives in return for a long-term moratorium on enrichment — a process that can produce fuel for nuclear power plants or material for atomic weapons. The package calls on Iran to suspend enrichment for the duration of any negotiations.

Iran has not responded formally so far, but its officials have insisted that enrichment is an inalienable right and that talks must be unconditional.

The country denies accusations by the U.S. and others that it is seeking to develop nuclear weapons, saying its program would only generate energy.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said he fully expected Iran to try any number of ways to shape the debate over its nuclear program.

"I think it is safe to say they will try to test the unity" of the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany, Snow said.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said Iran was prepared to negotiate on the basis of the incentives.

Speaking after talks with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Shanghai for a regional summit, Putin said: "The Iranian side responded positively to the six-nation proposal for a way out of the crisis."

He added he hoped Iran would soon set a date for the start of talks.

DOJ_NMG_0035052

Ehsan Jahandideh, a member of Ahmadinejad's delegation in Shanghai, confirmed the president had offered to negotiate "to ease tensions."

In Vienna, the chief Iranian delegate to the IAEA, Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, warned the West against threatening Tehran, saying "the carrot and stick has always been counterproductive."

But Soltanieh told reporters Iran was "determined to ... find a negotiated solution."

He spoke after the Europeans and the U.S. had criticized Iran before the 35-nation IAEA board.

"Cooperation with the agency has been reduced to almost nothing these last few months and ... numerous important questions remain to be resolved," said chief French delegate Francois-Xavier Deniau, who was speaking on behalf of France, Britain and Germany.

Schulte agreed, saying, "Iran continues to withhold cooperation with the IAEA on almost every outstanding issue."

When Iran received the incentives last week, it said they contained "positive steps" but also ambiguities, which had to be clarified in further talks.

The package included some significant concessions by the U.S., aimed at enticing Tehran to freeze enrichment. The U.S. would provide Iran with peaceful nuclear technology, lift some sanctions and join direct negotiations with Tehran.

The package also pulls back from demands that Iran outright scrap its enrichment program as an initial condition for negotiations, seeking instead a suspension. However, it also contains the implicit threat of U.N. sanctions if Iran remains defiant.

Senate Backs President's Iran Policies (AP)

AP, June 16, 2006

The Senate on Thursday endorsed President Bush's diplomatic approach to the problem of Iran's nuclear program after rejecting a proposal that would have increased sanctions against the Tehran government and those helping it.

The Senate voted 99-0 to support the decision, announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on May 31, that the United States would join other Western states in engaging Iran in negotiations and offering a package of incentives if Tehran suspends its uranium enrichment activities.

That vote came minutes after a 54-45 vote to defeat a proposal by Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., that would have imposed mandatory sanctions on entities that help Iran acquire or develop weapons of mass destruction.

Both the Santorum measure, and the vote of support for the administration, introduced by Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., were amendments to a defense spending bill the Senate is debating.

Santorum's proposal was in line with a bill passed by the House last April, over the objections of the administration, that also would impose sanctions on those contributing to Iran's WMD programs and cut off aid to countries investing in Iran's energy sector. It also authorized $100 million to promote pro-democracy efforts in Iran.

The administration said the House bill would limit the flexibility it needed to reach a diplomatic solution to the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program.

Hamas Offers To Revive Cease-fire (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- The Hamas-led Palestinian government offered yesterday to restore a cease-fire with Israel, nearly a week after calling off the truce to protest a deadly explosion on a Gaza beach.

Israel responded favorably, signaling that both sides are prepared to step back from fighting that threatened to escalate into a broader conflict.

A Hamas official said the group was in touch with other Gaza militants to try to halt daily rocket barrages against Israel, which set off Israeli air and artillery retaliation.

The truce, declared in February 2005, greatly reduced Palestinian-Israeli violence, which had claimed more than 3,000 lives in the four years before.

But Hamas called it off after an explosion last Friday on a Gaza beach that killed eight Palestinian civilians. Israel was shelling Gaza around that time but insisted it was not responsible for the explosion.

Hamas sent its own rocket squads to fire at Israel alongside Islamic Jihad and other militants.

The barrages have tapered off somewhat in the past day, an indication that Hamas was sidelining its militants. Islamic Jihad fired five rockets yesterday.

"We are interested to keep the ... quiet, especially in the Gaza Strip," government spokesman Ghazi Hamad of Hamas said yesterday. "We have contacts with the Palestinian factions. We are ready to do it, but [only] if the Israeli side has a strong intention to respond positively to the call ... to stop their aggression."

DOJ_NMG_0035053

Israel welcomed the gesture. "If it is quiet, we will answer that with quiet," said Mark Regev, spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry.

The initiative received backing from the powerful exiled Hamas leadership.

In Damascus, Syria, the deputy head of Hamas' political bureau, Moussa Abu Marzouk, said: "If Israel agrees to stop targeting civilians, then [Hamas] will take a positive stance."

The Hamas announcement came shortly after the Palestinian information minister arrived in Gaza with $2 million in his luggage, the second straight day a senior Hamas official has hand-delivered money to the cash-strapped government.

Youssef Rizka's suitcase delivery signaled that Hamas has opened a new front in its battle against international sanctions by taking matters into its own hands -- literally.

On Wednesday, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar returned to Gaza from a trip to Muslim countries with $20 million in his luggage. Hamas said all the money came from private donations and charities, not governments.

The fighting with Israel has complicated an already difficult situation for Hamas, which is under intense international pressure to adopt a more moderate stance and is grappling with bloody infighting against the rival Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

How Clumsy, Inaccurate Gaza Rockets Could Start A War (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel, June 15 — The Qassam rocket is not much to look at: a 70-pound tube of rough steel and hand-mixed explosive, like the one that pounded through the roof of Universe Packaging here on Thursday. Tons of falling concrete just missed Lior Levi, 28, a worker there.

"My ears were ringing, so it took me a few seconds to realize what really happened," said Mr. Levi, who counts himself a lucky man. "I didn't realize it was a direct hit."

However crude, the Qassam rocket, fired by Palestinian militants from Gaza into Israel, has nonetheless won its spot as symbol of the moment in the long conflict here. At a delicate time, the rocket is not only raising tensions between Palestinians and Israelis, as usual, but is also dividing Palestinian from Palestinian, Israeli from Israeli.

Most immediately, the number of rockets fired by Palestinians from Gaza, and whether they happen to hit anyone, will be crucial in determining whether the Israeli-Palestinian conflict explodes again into high-intensity warfare.

On Thursday, after a week in which at least 16 Palestinian civilians were killed and several Israelis wounded, there were signs that Israel and the Palestinian government, now led by the militant group Hamas, did not want that to happen.

After several Qassams landed here and elsewhere in the Negev, a Hamas spokesman said the group was willing to reinstate a 16-month cease-fire that it had proclaimed invalid last week after seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on a beach during an Israeli retaliatory bombardment.

"I spoke today with the prime minister and he said we definitely want quiet everywhere," the spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said Thursday on Israeli radio, referring to Ismail Haniya, the top Hamas leader. "We are interested in a cease-fire everywhere."

He later qualified that, saying Israel would have to stop all attacks against Palestinians in both Gaza and the West Bank.

But he also said that in that case, Hamas would attempt the difficult task of restraining other Palestinian militants from firing Qassams on their own. In Gaza the launchings are generally regarded as legitimate resistance in the wider war against Israel.

Israel responded with its own condition — that the rocket attacks end — but did not dismiss the offer.

"If this terrorist activity ceases, of course we will be more than happy to cease our defensive measures," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Foreign Ministry.

For such a simple rocket, with low accuracy and a range of less than five miles, the Qassam has raised complicated issues.

On the Palestinian side, Hamas is being forced to evaluate the transition it has made from a resistance group that carried out deadly attacks against Israeli civilians, to leader of the Palestinian government. Already, a lack of money is weakening Hamas's grip on power, and more rockets and wider fighting are unlikely to persuade Western governments to resume financial aid.

Israel is divided by the question of its military response, whether it has been disproportionate to the threat of the Qassams, and whether the lives of innocent Palestinians could have been spared.

As with many issues here, the Qassam problem began in earnest with the Israeli pullout of settlers from Gaza, completed last September.

DOJ_NMG_0035054

For many Israelis, full disengagement should have begun the moment Gaza, finally free from Israeli soldiers, ceased to be a threat. But according to the Israeli military, more than 600 rockets have fallen since then. They have killed one person inside Israel and injured many more, including a friend of the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, who lives here in Sderot.

But even with relatively few casualties, the barrage has infuriated residents, many of them working poor Israelis with roots in Morocco and Ethiopia.

"Disengagement blew up in our faces, in the faces of our children," said Alon David, 32, a leader of a group of Sderot residents who have been camped out in front of Mr. Peretz's house here.

Mr. David and five other people have been on a liquids-only protest diet for the past five days. Since a barrage of Qassams that peaked at 30 or 40 last week, children have stopped going to school, and residents have complained that the government has abandoned them in the name of its international image.

"The children are sleeping in bed with us," said Sima Hadad, 33, one of the hunger strikers. "Every boom — even things that are not Qassams — scares them."

Another hunger striker, Sharon Ben Abu, 33, added, "Even if the watermelon salesman screams 'Watermelon!' on the street, they get scared."

The mayor and others have called for a huge military assault on Gaza. But human rights groups, and some Israelis, contend that has already happened: Israel has fired nearly 6,000 artillery shells into Gaza over roughly the past year in retaliation for the Qassams, and the United Nations says that more than 80 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli attacks since the beginning of the year. Since 2004, eight people have died in Israel from Qassam fire, the military says.

The issue came into tragic focus last week when seven members of a Palestinian family were killed on the beach as Israel attacked Gaza. (An eighth person was also killed.)

On Tuesday the military said its internal investigation showed the blast that killed them was not an Israeli explosive. But Israel has been plunged into introspection, highlighted in dueling commentaries on Thursday in the newspaper Maariv.

One writer said that when such tragedies occurred, "we regret it, but we must not condemn and vilify those who do it." Another sarcastically bemoaned avoidable death: "When they kill us, it is a massacre. When we kill them, it is a pinpointed killing."

Peter Bouckaert, a Human Rights Watch official who investigated both the Qassam firing and the Israeli response, said neither side was adequately safeguarding civilians.

"The Qassams are ineffective from a military perspective, but it doesn't matter how many people they kill because they indiscriminately target civilians," he said. "On the other hand, the Israeli response has been a lot more deadly in terms of the civilians killed in Gaza.

"Both sides justify their methods by the abuses committed by the other side, but I think we need to get out of this cycle of violence."

US Warns On Readiness Of North Korean Missile (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopul Ans Anna Fifield

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

North Korean preparations for a possible long-range missile test have advanced to where Pyongyang could launch a Taepodong-2 missile on “very short notice,” a Bush administration official told the Financial Times on Thursday.

The US has been monitoring activity at a launch site in North Korea for weeks following indications that Pyongyang was preparing to test an intercontinental ballistic missile for the first time. A senior Bush administration official last week said the US was not yet “on the edge of our seat”. But another official on Thursday said more recent intelligence suggested Pyongyang was now much closer to being ready to conduct a test.

“They appear to be moving closer to the ability to actually conduct a launch on very short notice,” said the administration official.

In 1998, Pyongyang stunned the US and Japan by firing an intermediate range Taepodong-1 missile over Japan into the Pacific Ocean. While US intelligence now shows that test preparations are very advanced, Washington does not know whether Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, will go ahead with a test.

Taking the threat of a possible test very seriously, the Pentagon has positioned military assets to deal with any launch. Washington believes increasingly strident and frequent North Korean protests over US spy plane reconnaissance flights may signal its intention to test the Taepodong-2. US and South Korean officials have also urged North Korea to abandon any test.

“We are currently trying to get all of the parties in the six-party talks process to send a strong message to North Korea to discourage them from launching,” said a senior US official.

The Taepodong-2 is an untested two-, or three-, stage "integrated" missile. The three-stage version consists of a solid-fuel booster rocket strapped atop a Scud missile, which is in turn attached to a short-range Nodong missile. North Korea appears close to the position where it only needs to fuel the missile. Once it does, it would significantly increase the likelihood of a test since the move is dangerous and difficult to reverse.

Vice-admiral Lowell Jacoby, then head of the Defence Intelligence Agency, last year told Congress that a three-stage version of the Taepodong-2 had the "theoretical capability [to] reach most of the continental US". But some experts doubt whether the missile has the range to hit the US and whether it can carry a significant payload. The US believes North Korea is trying to develop the technology to put a nuclear warhead on an ICBM that could reach the US, but has not yet succeeded.

South Korea is "bracing" for a possible missile launch, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, said on Thursday.

"We are very concerned that international opinion turns increasingly negative towards North Korea, especially the six party talks [which] are still in a deadlock," Mr Ban said. "North Korea should stop its plan, if [there is] any, to fire a missile and come back to the negotiating table."

Tensions over the missile test preparations come as delegates from the two Koreas are meeting in the Southern city of Kwangju to celebrate the sixth anniversary of a historic summit between Kim Jong-il and Kim Dae-jung, then president of South Korea.

Inter-Korean relations have warmed significantly since the summit, but there has been no follow-up meeting, as pledged at the time. Kim Dae-jung is preparing to return to Pyongyang at the end of this month, a visit that the current South Korean government hopes will pave the way for a second summit.

"We are in a state of truce, not having resolved the issue of war and peace. The threat of war is constantly around us," said Ahn Kyong-ho, the chief Northern delegate. "As we look to the future of the nation, we must think big and implement it."

Earlier this week, Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, said it would be a "bad idea" for North Korea to conduct a test, and urged Pyongyang to return to the six-party talks which have been stalled since last September. North Korea has refused to return to the talks because of US financial sanctions that are crippling its economy.

Another US administration official said: "Our concerns about North Korea's missile programme are pretty well known. North Korea should abide by the long-range missile test moratorium it has observed since 1999."

U.S. Sanctions Cost North Korea Millions (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

U.S. economic "defensive measures" aimed at curbing illegal activities by North Korea have cost the Pyongyang regime millions of dollars in lost cash over the past several months through banking restrictions and other actions, U.S. officials estimate.

One sign that the economic measures are hurting the communist regime in North Korea is Pyongyang's continued refusal to rejoin six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the United States lifts what it regards as sanctions, said Bush administration officials involved in Asia matters.

"We think the defensive measures are hurting them," said one official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

North Korean officials have told Chinese officials that they will not come back to the six-party talks until the United States lifts economic restrictions imposed on the Macau-based Banco Delta Asia, something the Bush administration is refusing to do, saying the measures are not nuclear-related, but simply efforts to protect the U.S. financial system and to pressure Pyongyang into halting activities such as counterfeiting U.S. currency.

The Bush administration official pointed out that U.S. financial actions against North Korea were never part of the agenda of talks aimed at halting covert North Korean nuclear programs. Those talks also include representatives of China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

Officials said there are intelligence reports that North Korea is continuing work on its nuclear programs, including plutonium-fueled efforts and a uranium-enrichment program that remains couched in mystery. The impoverished communist-ruled state has earned hard cash through counterfeiting U.S. currency, specifically a high-quality forged $100 bill. Its other activities include selling illegal drugs, such as heroin and cocaine.

The latest U.S. action was a May 8 ban that blocked any U.S.-based company from flying the North Korean flag on its merchant ships. The ban was imposed after the government learned that North Korea was selling its flag to companies at two to three times the usual international price as a way to raise cash. The Clinton administration permitted the flaggings in 2000.

Weeks after the Bush-era ban went into effect, U.S. intelligence agencies detected launch-preparation activities at a North Korean missile facility that indicate the regime may be preparing to conduct a missile test. Officials said the North Koreans are unpredictable and could be engaging in brinksmanship, but they do not expect Pyongyang to break its self-imposed moratorium on missile tests.

DOJ_NMG_0035056

The most effective restrictions were Treasury Department penalties imposed on Banco Delta Asia in September. The bank was sanctioned as a "primary money-laundering concern" for its 20-year role in helping the North Korean government.

The bank was involved in major North Korean foreign purchases including precious metals used in manufacturing and was the main outlet for more than $45 million in North Korean-made counterfeit $100 bills since 1989, the officials said.

The Treasury Department said a North Korean government front company used Banco Delta Asia for more than a decade to carry out illegal activities, including smuggling counterfeit-brand tobacco products. The company also took part in international drug trafficking on behalf of North Korean government agents.

Officials said the penalties against Banco Delta Asia, which have been supported by China's government, have had a ripple effect among international financial institutions that now are taking steps to avoid working with North Korean government agents and front companies linked in the past to illegal activities.

Bush Pushes For Trade Deal As A Deadline Looms (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With time running short on stalled global trade talks, President Bush hopes to kick-start negotiations on a visit to Europe next week. But major issues remain, particularly over cuts in farm subsidies.

"It's tough sledding right now," Mr. Bush said of the multilateral talks launched four years ago in Doha, Qatar, under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. In a speech yesterday, Mr. Bush, who will visit Vienna next week for a U.S.-European Union summit, pressed major players in negotiations to look past their differences. He suggested a global trade deal could accomplish the twin goals of lifting the world economy and reducing poverty.

"The Doha negotiations are at a critical moment," he said. "Now is the time for the world to come together."

With increasing intensity, the Bush administration is raising pressure to break the deadlock. In recent weeks, U.S. negotiators have been shuttling back and forth between Washington and Geneva, where the WTO is based, in an effort to move the round forward.

WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy has set an end-of-June deadline to reach consensus on the outlines of a deal to lower trade barriers in farm and manufacturing goods, the two most contentious components of the talks so far. The White House needs a framework deal soon if it is to have time to guide a global trade package through Congress before the president's trade-promotion authority expires in July 2007. Without the authority, Mr. Bush will lose his leverage to force Congress to deal with the issue.

Mr. Bush's remarks on Doha represent a rare direct foray into the global trade debate. But they come as the Bush administration is making a more concerted effort to raise the U.S. profile overseas. Among other things, Mr. Bush, who made a surprise visit to Baghdad this week, is stepping up efforts to bolster Iraq's fragile new government. And the administration is pursuing a sharpened diplomatic effort aimed at blunting Iran's nuclear ambitions.

In Geneva, the Doha talks are hung up on a cross-cutting set of issues. The U.S. and Europe are at odds over a Bush-backed proposal to make deep cuts in trade-distorting farm subsidies. The cuts would expose American farmers to greater foreign competition, but also open new markets, a crucial White House goal. European negotiators say the proposed cuts go too far. At the same time, the Europe and the U.S. are at loggerheads with major developing nations, chief among them India and Brazil, over proposals to deeply cut tariffs on manufactured goods. India and Brazil fear increased competition from U.S. and European manufacturers.

Mr. Bush conceded that "national interests" seem to be overriding efforts to find compromises. "Local politics has a lot to do with whether or not this Doha Round is going to get completed," he said.

Mr. Bush stressed that the U.S. is ready to make concessions, but needs corresponding compromises from Europe and the major developing nations that will ensure American farmers and manufacturers have increased access to markets abroad.

Bush Pledges To Push EU To Cut Agriculture Subsidies (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

President Bush, facing a June deadline to restart the embattled Doha round of world trade talks, said he will tell European leaders next week that they must relent on agriculture subsidies.

Although admitting that "it's tough sledding right now" to complete the next round of World Trade Organization talks, Mr. Bush said dropping subsidies on agriculture, services and manufacturing would benefit poorer nations and help reduce global poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0035057

"We're ready to make the move -- on agriculture and services and manufacturing -- but we expect other nations to do the same thing," Mr. Bush said at the Initiative for Global Development's 2006 summit, promising to take that message when he visits Austria and Hungary next week.

Also yesterday, Mr. Bush signed several measures, including the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act, the Miner Act and a proclamation establishing the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument.

In signing the broadcast legislation, Mr. Bush said parents must take the lead in controlling what their children watch, but he said broadcast companies also must play a role -- and have been failing in recent years.

"Broadcast programming has too often pushed the bounds of decency," Mr. Bush said, citing a study that said TV's use of profanity during the 8-9 p.m. hour increased 95 percent from 1988 to 2002. "In other words, the language is becoming coarser during the times when it's more likely children will be watching television. It's a bad trend, a bad sign."

He also said complaints to the Federal Communications Commission have increased from hundreds in 2000 to hundreds of thousands today.

"In other words, people are saying, 'We're tired of it, and we expect the government to do something about it,' " he said.

The bill he signed increased the penalties the FCC can levy per violation of decency standards from $32,500 to $325,000.

"By allowing the FCC to levy stiffer and more meaningful fines on broadcasters who violate decency standards, this law will ensure that broadcasters take seriously their duty to keep the public airwaves free of obscene, profane and indecent material."

On the trade agenda, Mr. Bush goes to Vienna, Austria, next week for the U.S.-EU summit. He said he will push his subsidies message to the European nations, which are balking at a broad agreement. The WTO has set a deadline to reach a preliminary deal, but European officials have said they do not think the end-of-the-month deadline is final.

The Bush administration under U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, and her predecessor, Rob Portman, have been pushing for the broader agreement. But the president's speech yesterday elevates the stakes and the pressure to complete an agreement.

Talks have been stalled since October, when the United States made its ambitious proposal to cut subsidies and tariffs. The European Union proposed smaller cuts, and the middle proposal, from the so-called Group of 20 countries, proposes major cuts in developed countries' tariffs but shallower cuts for developing nations.

"Countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming. And the G-20 countries have to make a tough decision on manufacturing," Mr. Bush said.

Bush: 'Tough Sledding' For Poverty Talks (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, June 15, 2006

President Bush, trying to jump start global trade negotiations, urged European and developing nations Thursday to make tough decisions to finish a trade deal that he claims will curb poverty.

The United States is among 149 nations trying to finish the international round of trade talks known as the Doha Round. Negotiators have missed several deadlines.

"It's tough sledding right now," Bush said at the Initiative for Global Development's national summit focused on getting the public and private sectors to work together to end poverty across the world.

There are disagreements over cutting farm barriers in Europe, the United States and other rich nations. Major developing countries, such as India and Brazil, also are refusing to significantly reduce trade barriers that protect their manufacturing and service industries.

"We're ready to eliminate all tariffs and subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services, and we expect other nations to do the same," Bush said.

He said countries in Europe have to make a tough decision on farming, and the G20 group of developing countries that is pushing for increased access to industrialized markets for their farmers have to make difficult decisions on manufacturing.

Bush said he planned to carry that message to next week's European Union summit.

"Now is the time for the world to come together and make this world a free trading world, not only for the benefit of our own economies, but as an important part of the strategy to reduce poverty around the world," the president said.

Bush spoke after attending a ceremonial swearing-in at the White House of the new U.S. trade representative, Susan Schwab, who is working to wrap up key elements of a deal by the end of July.

Former Secretary of States Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright co-chaired the summit, which was attended by some of the nation's top business leaders, philanthropists, policy experts, government officials and civic leaders.

"Americans have got to understand that when we talk about trade, we're not only talking about enhancing economic growth and vitality, we're helping people get out of poverty," Bush said, adding that impoverished states are attractive safe havens for terrorists and tyrants and international criminals.

The Initiative for Global Development was founded in 2003 by former Sen. Daniel Evans of Washington; Bill Gates Sr., father of Microsoft founder Bill Gates; Bill Ruckelshaus, former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency; Bill Clapp, chief executive officer of Global Partnerships; and Gen. John Shalikashvili, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

A New Trade Envoy, With A Battle On Her Hands (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 15 — Not many new Cabinet members take office with a deadline of six weeks or so to succeed or fail in their jobs. But that was what Susan C. Schwab faced Thursday when she was sworn in as the new United States trade representative.

President Bush praised his new envoy on Thursday as "a good, hard negotiator." Still, she faces long odds as trade diplomats struggle to salvage a global accord that the Bush administration hopes will be one of its signal economic achievements.

But if trade officials are unable to resolve their fundamental differences by the time of a critical meeting in late July, the failure to achieve a deal could prove a huge disappointment for the White House.

The tight time limit derives from the Congressional authority for the United States to negotiate a trade-expanding agreement under the so-called Doha round, named after the city in Qatar where talks began, and then get an up-or-down legislative vote. The authority expires in mid-2007, and it is doubtful that Congress can approve any deal unless the basic framework is established by mid-2006.

"We are at a critical juncture in a once-in-generation multilateral negotiation," Ms. Schwab said in an interview. "We're getting to the point in the Doha negotiations where some very tough decisions have to be made."

Ms. Schwab is certainly prepared to step into the role. She was a deputy trade representative under Rob Portman, the former Ohio representative who was named director of the Office of Management and Budget in April. At the age of 51, she has been involved in trade issues in government, business and the academic community all of her career, but is not a well-known figure outside that world.

But some critics say the appointment of Ms. Schwab — succeeding a recognized power hitter with close ties on Capitol Hill — was a sign that the Bush administration was scaling back its hopes for a successful Doha negotiation.

"In my judgment, she's first class," said Bill Frenzel, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota and now a guest scholar at the Brookings Institution. "But she succeeds a very popular and active trade representative whisked out of his job. I think everyone agrees that the chances of a successful Doha round seem quite limited."

Ms. Schwab, not surprisingly, says she sees it differently and appears undaunted by the suggestions that she is not up to the job.

"The only way you can respond to those questions is by exceeding expectations," she said. "The joy comes in proving the critics wrong."

Moreover, she points out, when the time comes to lobby Congress on trade, she will have the help of Mr. Portman and Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff, who also has a trade background.

Another heavy hitter, Robert B. Zoellick, the former trade representative who is now deputy secretary of state, is also prepared to step up to bat.

To be sure, the Bush administration has not invested all its trade policy in a successful Doha round, which involves trying to get a multilateral agreement among 147 countries. Its trade record also rests on more than a dozen bilateral agreements so far, and more in the offing, with countries in Latin America, the Caribbean and the Middle East.

In addition, the administration has tried to win over Congressional critics of freer trade by using the World Trade Organization and other legal avenues to press countries to drop what Washington has charged are illegal or unfair practices keeping out American goods and services.

It has achieved some gains on that front. Ms. Schwab's nomination for the trade representative job was held up in the Senate until she satisfied Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, that the United States would be tougher toward China. "She has convinced me that she will be a very strong voice on opening markets," Mr. Schumer said when she was confirmed. From the American point of view, the main roadblock to progress in the Doha trade talks is not the so-called emerging markets like China, India or Brazil, whose barriers are a problem in Congress, but a few wealthy European countries opposed to lowering their barriers on farm imports.

DOJ_NMG_0035059

European barriers are a particular anathema to American farmers, and their reservations about any trade deal would doom it on Capitol Hill. Yet there is no sign of bridging the impasse between the Europeans and the United States on the agriculture issue.

Ms. Schwab said that without a deal on agriculture, the progress that has been made on opening doors to American services, particularly financial, would go for naught, as would what little progress had been achieved in manufactured goods.

If the United States has a strategy to change European thinking, she said, it is to enlist India, Brazil, China and other fast-developing countries to pressure the Europeans. In addition, she has been meeting with European business associations that would gain from a trade deal.

Finally, Ms. Schwab said, Mr. Bush has lobbied Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany to press President Jacques Chirac of France to ease his opposition to lower farm barriers.

But Peter Mandelson, the chief European Union trade negotiator and a friend of Mr. Blair, has charged that it is the United States that is intransigent.

Rebutting the American argument that the poor and developing countries of the world will side with the United States, European negotiators say that the cuts sought by Washington in European farm products would actually hurt the poorest countries of Asia, Africa and the Caribbean by wiping out the advantages of their trade preferences in Europe.

Mr. Mandelson has called the American demands "unrealistic" and insists that at the next round of talks in Geneva at the end of this month, they must be scaled back if the Doha round is to succeed.

"We all have our work cut out for us, including Sue," Mr. Mandelson said through a spokesman on Thursday. "None of our domestic constituencies give us an easy ride. And it really is a question of doing the heavy lifting together."

Ms. Schwab is the kind of person, in any case, who finds all these political difficulties "fun."

Growing up in poor countries in Africa and Asia as the daughter of parents in the foreign service, Ms. Schwab said she realized early on that trade was far more potent than foreign aid in combating poverty and opening up opportunity, a conviction that deepened in graduate school. In that, she says, she has found a kindred spirit in Mr. Bush.

Ms. Schwab has worked at the Commerce Department, the United States embassy in Japan, on Capitol Hill as a Senate aide and at Motorola, an export powerhouse. She wrote a book about the trade battles of the 1980's and served as dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy before joining the Bush administration.

But now that she is in charge of trade policy, Ms. Schwab argues that she can prove the skeptics wrong about a possible breakthrough.

"How can you not be excited and thrilled by this opportunity?" Ms. Schwab said. "If you have watched development of U.S. trade policy and global negotiations over the years, you'd be hard pressed to find a more exciting time than the present to be stepping in to this kind of role."

US Drops Opposition To Asian Currency Unit (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Victor Mallet

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

The US on Thursday signalled it would not fight efforts to create an Asian currency unit, turning the page on over a decade of largely consistent opposition to Asian monetary integration.

US officials said the move is intended to show that the US does not fear greater monetary co-operation between Asia's rising economic powers and wants to play a constructive role in helping to shape it.

The green light from the US is a big boost for Japan, which has been pushing the idea of an Asian currency unit loosely modelled on the European currency unit, the precursor to the euro, in face of considerable regional scepticism. It comes at a time of growing diplomatic closeness between Washington and Tokyo.

While formidable obstacles remain to the creation of an Asian currency unit, with Asian countries unable to agree on weightings or on the inclusion of Taiwan, the US decision and the broader evolution of US Asia policy it represents may in time be seen as highly significant.

The signal was given by Tim Adams, the under-secretary for international affairs at the US Treasury, in a closed session of the World Economic Forum in Tokyo.

While Mr Adams spoke in general terms, a copy of his prepared remarks, which has been obtained by the Financial Times, spells out clearly the US position on the Asian currency unit. The remarks say the US believes there has been "some confusion" about its attitude on the ACU. They say "we do not see the ACU as a competitor to the dollar."

They say the US is "open minded" and adds "we view proposals for Asian currency co-operation with interest." Mr Adams presented his remarks as a clarification rather than a shift in US policy. US officials admit the US is seen in Asia as being hostile to regional monetary and financial integration in principle, and wants to change that view.

Sri Lankan Military Attacks Rebels In Response To Fatal Bus Blast (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, June 15 — The Sri Lankan military pounded rebel posts in the northern and eastern parts of the country by land, sea and air on Thursday, independent monitors and guerrilla officials said, after a land mine explosion ripped through a crowded passenger bus on Thursday morning in northern Sri Lanka.

The death toll rose to 64 by the end of the day, with 86 wounded, in the most serious attack on civilians since the government and rebels signed a cease-fire four years ago in the country's ethnic insurgency.

The military said only that its forces had taken "deterrent" measures. The government was swift to blame the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the attack on the civilian bus, which the rebels promptly denied, pointing at the government.

The Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission, which was created by the cease-fire and which documents truce violations, said it had not determined who was responsible.

The greater uncertainty was whether the deadly events on Thursday were the beginning of full-scale war. Despite mounting violence, neither side has been willing to explicitly renounce the February 2002 cease-fire. "The substance of the peace process has been completely eroded," was how Jehan Perera of the Colombo-based National Peace Council, an independent research and advocacy group, put it. "Only the outer trappings remain."

Talks in Oslo between the warring parties collapsed last week. The topic of the Norwegian-brokered negotiations was supposed to be the role of European-led truce monitors. The Tamil Tigers pulled out before the talks began, objecting to the composition of the government delegation.

The latest violence follows several months of carnage among Sri Lankan soldiers, Tamil Tiger guerrillas and a breakaway faction in the east known as the Karuna group.

Over the last few months, fighting has emptied villages in the northeast. In April, a bomb exploded in a market in Trincomalee, a port town. The same month, the rebels, known as the L.T.T.E., were accused of trying to assassinate the leader of the Sri Lankan Army in the military headquarters here in the capital. That suicide bombing, which killed nine people and wounded the army commander, Lt. Gen. Sarath Fonseca, and more than 20 others, was followed by airstrikes on rebel posts near Sampur. Since April, 500 people have been killed in the conflict, mostly civilians, the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission said. The toll on Thursday was by far the largest number of civilian deaths since the 2002 truce.

The Tamil Tigers accused the government on Thursday of having bombed rebel-held Kilinochchi, the northern town that is the guerrilla headquarters, as well as Sampur and Mullaittivu, strategic eastern installations for the Tamil naval fleet. The Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission reported seeing artillery fire from the Sri Lankan Army and Navy.

"Known L.T.T.E. targets are being taken as a deterrent," the Sri Lankan military spokesman, Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, said Thursday afternoon, without elaborating.

Brigadier Samarasinghe said the explosion of the crowded state-owned bus at rush hour involved two so-called Claymore mines, placed side by side and detonated by remote control. The bus was traveling to a market town in the historic Anuradhapura district, about 100 miles north of here. Anuradhapura's border villages were favorite targets in the war, because the district is at the crossroads between government and rebel-held territories.

Police officers said 15 children were among the 64 dead. Most of the injured, who also included children, were being treated at two hospitals in the town of Anuradhapura. Nine with serious head injuries were moved to Colombo General Hospital.

Calling the attack "a barbaric terrorist act," a government minister accused the Tigers of deliberately selecting the bus. "This was not a mistake," said Keheliya Rabukwella, the policy planning minister.

On the Web site of its peace secretariat, the rebels accused the government of attacking the bus, saying attacks on civilians "cannot be justified under any circumstances."

The European Union put the Tigers on its list of banned terrorist groups last month, following the United States, Britain and India. The Tamil diaspora in Europe is a major fund-raising source for the Tigers.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, blamed the rebels for the bus attack.

Sri Lanka Retaliates After 64 Civilians Killed (FT)

By Khozem Merchant

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

Sri Lanka yesterday unleashed military attacks against Tamil targets after rebels blew up a bus killing at least 64 civilians in the worst terrorist atrocity since a ceasefire four years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0035061

Government air and naval forces launched reprisal rocket attacks and artillery fire against two Tamil towns near the government-controlled city of Trincomalee in the north-east at 30-minute intervals for nearly five hours, according to peace monitors in Colombo.

The Sri Lankan government pinned the atrocity on the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the separatist movement, which has denied complicity but which in the past several months has accelerated its military campaign against government security targets.

"This is an escalation of a strategy by both sides to retaliate and cause terror among civilians. Unless there is a change of heart by both sides this situation will get worse," said Jehan Perera, director of the National Peace Council in the capital Colombo.

At least 18 children were among the dead after the bus taking them and many adults to a medical clinic was struck by a claymore mine – a plastic device that scatters a fusillade of ball-bearings on impact – near Kebitigollawa town in the northern-central province.

All the fatalities and dozens more injured were poor Sinhalese, the majority community in the south Asian island state, where the LTTE has been fighting for a homeland in the north-east for the minority Tamils.

Analysts fear a backlash by the Sinhalese. The government appealed for calm and urged the people to "defeat the aim of the terrorists to instigate a backlash in other parts of the country".

The attack follows intense diplomatic activity designed to forestall what many neutral observers say is a slow slide into a civil war that had officially ended with a ceasefire in 2002.

Explosion Kills 64, Shakes Cease-fire (WT/AP)

By Dilip Ganguly, The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

KABITHIGOLLEWA, Sri Lanka -- A powerful land mine ripped through a packed bus in northern Sri Lanka yesterday, killing at least 64 persons in the worst act of violence since a 2002 cease-fire.

Sri Lanka's air force responded by bombing rebel-held areas in the northeast.

The government blamed the Tamil Tiger rebels for the violence. The bus was crowded with commuters and schoolchildren, many of whom were on their way to attend a funeral for a slain police officer.

The cease-fire was shaken last summer with the assassination of Sri Lanka's foreign minister, and the explosion brought the fractured country even closer to full-scale war.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States condemned what it termed a terrorist attack and called for resumed negotiations.

"This vicious attack bears all the hallmarks of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam" and violates the cease-fire agreement, Mr. McCormack said. "The Tamil Tigers must renounce terror and enter into direct negotiations with the Sri Lankan government."

The explosion tore through the bus in a crowded part of the northern town of Kabithigollewa, about 130 miles northeast of the capital, Colombo, at about 8 a.m. It was thought to have been caused by two land mines hanging from a tree and detonated from a remote position, military spokesman Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe said. Rigging mines to trees or bicycles is a common Tiger tactic because it prevents the ground from absorbing much of the force of the blast.

A doctor at the hospital where the bus victims were taken, S.B. Bothota, said 15 schoolchildren were among the 64 dead. Another 78 persons were wounded, he said.

Hours later, the pro-rebel TamilNet Web site said two jets bombed areas in the north of the country. Brig. Samarasinghe confirmed the bombings, saying the air force was taking limited deterrent action.

The Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam fought for 20 years to carve out a separate homeland in Sri Lanka's north and east for the country's 3.2 million minority Tamils, who are largely Hindu. The majority of Sri Lankans are Sinhalese Buddhists.

The Tigers now control large parts of the island's north and east, where they have their own de-facto state.

The cease-fire four years ago ended large-scale fighting, but violence has persisted, intensifying after the assassination in August of Foreign Minister Lakshman Kadirgamar. The government blamed the killing on the Tigers.

Diplomatic efforts to quell the violence and get the peace process back on track have shown little progress. The Tigers pulled out of peace talks in April, and last week scuttled negotiations by refusing to meet with representatives of the government side after arriving in Oslo, the venue for the talks.

Sri Lankans Seek Escape Across The Sea (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, June 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035062

TALAIMANNAR, Sri Lanka — The thin wisps of land here where Sri Lanka and India nearly meet look like outstretched arms straining to touch: one reaching for sanctuary, the other pulling to safety.

Pirabakaran Kumari and her three children almost connected. They set out from the Sri Lankan side on a peaceful day, the skies blue, the seas calm. Soon, as their motorboat hopscotched the waves, they caught sight of refuge in the form of a telecom tower standing tall on Indian soil.

"I was very happy when I saw the tower," Kumari said. "I thought, 'I'm just about there.' "

But fate intervened — or, rather, the Sri Lankan navy, which quickly surrounded the boat and forced Kumari and her fellow passengers back to the country they were trying to flee. For two weeks, they've been staying in a makeshift refugee camp at a church here on Sri Lanka's northwest coast, only about 18 miles from India.

The people here are desperate to escape the conflict convulsing their hometowns, a spasm of violence that threatens to plunge this island nation back into all-out civil war after a few years of fragile peace. Since December, the Sri Lankan military and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam have turned their official cease-fire into a fiction with near-daily attacks and counterattacks.

On Thursday, 64 people were killed when two mines blew apart a bus in the deadliest attack since the truce.

Diplomats are scrambling to get the parties back to the negotiating table and away from a war of attrition that has killed more than 64,000 people in the last 23 years. But no one is betting on a quick return to calm, certainly not the 2,000 Sri Lankans who have crossed over to India since April or the 500 others who have flocked to this area hoping to follow suit. A dozen people have drowned making the attempt.

"If the government says we have to go back … they can shoot us and take our bodies," said one elderly woman who declined to give her name for fear of reprisals against family members who stayed behind. "Or we'll pour gasoline on ourselves and burn ourselves to death. We won't go back."

Nearly all the would-be refugees come from around the eastern port city of Trincomalee, where clashes have been heaviest, including bomb attacks, shootings and slashings. They are ethnic Tamils, the minority group in whose name the rebels claim to be fighting to establish a homeland in the island's north and east, separate from the Sinhalese-dominated south and west.

The rebels, known as the Tamil Tigers, are a fierce and disciplined force, notorious for pioneering suicide bombings, recruiting children and wearing cyanide capsules around their necks for use in the event of capture. The U.S., Britain and Canada classify the Tamil Tigers as terrorists; the European Union just added the group to its list of terrorist organizations, a move the rebels warn will exacerbate tensions.

But those who have fled Trincomalee also fear the Sri Lankan army, with its history of harassment of Tamils and alleged summary killings. When the bodies of five Tamil youths were found on a beach this year, suspicion immediately fell on government security forces, most of whose members are Sinhalese.

"Our kids can't go to school, and if our menfolk walk along the road, they get fired on by the army," said Nisha Dharshan, 24. Her father and brother have now made it over to India.

Dharshan and many of the others housed here at St. Lawrence's Church are from the village of Uppuveli, an area of stunning white-sand beaches lapped by turquoise waters, a paradise for the tourists who started coming back after peace descended in 2002.

That blissful calm was punctured last year when a statue of the Buddha was suddenly erected near Trincomalee's main square, a step local Tamils, who are mostly Hindu, saw as aggression by the Buddhist Sinhalese.

The town's delicate ethnic and religious mix then turned into a volatile brew, with tit-for-tat violence culminating in a bomb that exploded in the marketplace April 12, killing at least five people. The Tamil Tigers were blamed, and a vengeful Sinhalese mob went on a rampage, setting Tamil shops ablaze and hacking some people to death — half a dozen people died in the retaliatory violence — while soldiers and police officers looked on, witnesses say.

The elderly woman who refuses to go back to Trincomalee said she was shopping at the time but was lucky enough to be inside a store that swiftly locked its doors. Her niece was caught outside.

"I saw her being killed when I was peeking through the door. She was trying to get into a three-wheel taxi when these guys pulled her out and killed her," the woman said. "I couldn't do anything. If I'd gone out there, I would've met the same fate."

Two weeks later, a female suicide bomber blew herself up in the capital, Colombo, in an assassination attempt against the Sri Lankan army chief, who survived. The government retaliated by pounding rebel positions around Trincomalee.

Since then, attacks and brutal reprisals have been almost daily occurrences. In particular, the rebels have used claymore mines against the military with lethal effect.

DOJ_NMG_0035063

Yet both sides insist that the cease-fire remains in place. That is because the agreement is the only blueprint for peace out there, and neither the government nor the guerrillas can politically afford to walk away from it and resume a full-scale war, even if the peace process remains in effect stalled.

"Neither side wants to be seen as the aggressor," said Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, executive director of the Center for Policy Alternatives in Colombo. "But constituting a real cease-fire, and providing a bridge to real political negotiations — that is not happening."

Although critics condemn the Tamil Tigers for pushing the conflict into a "low-intensity war," they also accuse President Mahinda Rajapakse of failing to show leadership in addressing Tamil demands and of appeasing the hard-line Sinhalese nationalists who helped him win election last November.

Newly complicating the picture is a third party: a breakaway Tamil rebel leader known as "Colonel" Karuna, whose followers have engaged in murderous fighting with the main group. The Tamil Tigers say that Sri Lankan forces, in violation of their agreement, have provided havens for Karuna loyalists in government-held areas and allowed — if not actually connived in — the renegade rebels' assaults on their former comrades in arms.

Late last month, a diplomatic coalition including the U.S. issued a statement declaring that "the government has failed to prevent attacks of armed groups, including Karuna."

Sri Lankan officials deny any collusion with the breakaway faction. But observers note that in February, when the two sides agreed to meet for another round of peace talks in Geneva, the tally of dead that month dropped to nine, a dramatic decrease from 101 in January.

In all, about 700 people have been killed in the conflict since December.

Determined not to be among them, Dharshan and members of her extended family in Uppuveli gathered up what they could stuff into a few suitcases and made their way here to Mannar Island, a tiny trigger of land connected to the rest of Sri Lanka by a causeway.

Local fishermen offered to transport them to India's southern state of Tamil Nadu, home of many ethnic Tamils, for $100 a head. On May 24, they took the gamble — and got caught.

Now Dharshan and her two children live with other would-be refugees in a classroom marked "Grade 8" on the St. Lawrence's Church school campus in Talaimannar, on Mannar Island's westernmost tip.

Aid groups are providing regular meals and helpful villagers are letting the refugees use their toilets, but many of those housed here don't intend to stay. As soon as they can scrounge up enough cash, they'll make another attempt to get to India, perilous as the crossing may be.

"If we die," said one matriarch, "we die as a family."

As U.N. Inquiry Drags On, Syrians Ask If They Should Relax (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, June 15 — Even as the United Nations Security Council voted Thursday to extend the investigation into the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, there was a sense here that the pressure was off, that Syria was no longer in imminent danger of being charged with the crime or punished by the international community.

"After 14 months, there is no concrete evidence that incriminates Syria," said Georges Jabbour, a Baathist member of Parliament. "Since the world rushed to blame Syria, I think that the damage to Syria's image is something that must be rectified by those who are responsible."

But that view was only half the picture. There was also a feeling here that Syria might simply be sitting in the eye of the storm. Officials at the highest levels fear that the new low-key investigator, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, may in the long run prove more dangerous than his high-profile predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany, according to political analysts and people who work with the government.

Mr. Mehlis named names and leveled charges against the leadership's inner circle, providing a target for the government to try to undermine, which it did aggressively. By comparison Mr. Brammertz has disclosed little about what he may or may not have come up with, leaving those in power to guess where he is going.

"They are worried inside, but they are not showing it," said Marwan Kabalan, a professor of international relations at Damascus University, speaking about the Syrian leadership. "Under Mehlis, everything was clear to everybody. There were no secrets. This is why Brammertz is more dangerous."

Faced with such uncertainty, but also empowered by the release of immediate pressure, the leadership here has tried to shore up its position, bracing for the day when, or if, a damning report is produced.

The government has strengthened ties with Iran, arrested opposition leaders and sought to pacify Islamists. Perhaps most striking, it has worked to appease Washington by trying to seal the borders with Iraq and by planning to send the foreign minister to Baghdad this week, an overture being portrayed as an effort to help stabilize Iraq.

The assassination of Mr. Hariri in February 2005 was a critical moment in Syria's modern history. Even while the government insisted it did not play any role in the killing, the murder generated so much pressure that Damascus was forced to pull its troops out of Lebanon. The humiliating withdrawal fueled rumors that the government was in trouble.

The pressure intensified when the first prosecutor reported that witnesses implicated the president's brother and brother-in-law in planning the assassination, while telling the Security Council that the Syrians were defiant about not cooperating.

But the murder of Mr. Hariri can no longer be viewed as a singular act — if it ever could. It is one strand among many that have come to define the contemporary Middle East, from the election of Hamas to run the Palestinian Authority, to the bloodshed in Iraq. Those events have strengthened the Syrian government's position, even if only for the short run.

Syria's own problems with Islamic militants have also proved to be a short-term plus for the government. Earlier this month, Syria reported that its security forces killed four armed terrorists in Umayyad Square during a shootout. Diplomats and analysts in Syria have been saying for months that Islamist radicals have been debating whether to bring the fight here, and the recent shootout demonstrated that some have decided to try.

But for the government, the Islamist threat offers the government a chance to press back against efforts to undermine or oust President Bashar al-Assad and his secular Baathist government.

"Practically, for Syria, America won't be able to occupy Damascus anytime soon," said Dr. Samir al-Taqi, who serves as a health adviser to the government and is helping to build a new research organization focusing on international relations. "They won't embark tomorrow on attacking Iran. Subsequently, the major players are the regional players."

But as is the case with most of the good news for Syria these days, this is conditional.

The United Nations investigator, Mr. Brammertz, issued his most recent report to the Security Council this week, and it was immediately viewed as positive for Damascus.

But a more subtle look at the investigation also suggested that Mr. Brammertz had settled on the notion that the crime had political motivations. More ominously to Syrian officials, he appeared to be linking Mr. Hariri's killing to 14 other bombings in Lebanon, political analysts here said.

"The pressure is off but not finished," said Ibrahim Hamidi, the Damascus bureau chief for a pan-Arab newspaper, Al Hayat. "The sword is still at the Syrian neck."

Somalia Contact Group Meets For First Time (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, June 15, 2006

A U.S.-organized group of nations concerned about the growing power of Islamic militants in Somalia lent its support Thursday to the country's weak interim government and demanded unfettered access so aid groups can help its impoverished people.

In its first meeting, the International Somalia Contact Group also called for dialogue between the government and the Islamic militants who have taken over the capital Mogadishu and other areas of the lawless country after months of fighting that have killed more than 330.

"We look forward to further progress in the ongoing political process, including with respect to Mogadishu and the need for improved security," the group said in a statement released after its meeting.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier, who co-chaired the meeting, said the group "will help to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support."

The statement agreed to at the end of the meeting reaffirmed that the transitional government and the charter it abides by were a "legitimate and viable framework" for resurrecting Somalia.

The contact group was part of U.S. efforts to put renewed focus on Somalia after the militants took over, though officials acknowledged there was little they could do now for the East African nation. It has been without a government for 15 years.

The United Nations helped set up the interim government two years ago. But based in the town of Baidoa, it has been unable to enter the capital and has little control.

The interim government was formed at the insistence of the United States, which backed the warlords defeated by the Islamic fighters. U.S. officials fear the Islamic groups are harboring al-Qaida members and other terrorists.

"The reality is that unless you have some form of peace agreement and some form of peace, there's nothing to stabilize, there's nothing to get a grip on," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones-Parry said.

DOJ_NMG_0035065

Several diplomats described the meeting as a bid to come up with a new strategy for dealing with Somalia after years of neglect. For now, that would most likely mean deferring to the African Union and the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development, a group of seven Horn of Africa nations that includes Somalia.

They said Thursday's meeting reflects a change in tone after 10 years in which Somalia has barely surfaced on the international community's agenda even though it is a failed state.

The international community turned away from the country after a 1993 battle that killed 18 U.S. troops — the basis for the "Black Hawk Down" book and movie — and a U.N. peacekeeping mission ended in failure in 1995.

Osama bin Laden considered the subsequent withdrawal of U.S. troops from Somalia his first victory against America.

"What we need to do first is get a better understanding of the situation in the country," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "It's premature to frame this in terms of decisions or potential decisions at this point."

The new group consists of the United States, Britain, Sweden, Norway, Tanzania, Italy and the European Union, with the U.N. and the African Union as observers.

It will also study the Somalian government's decision Wednesday to approve Ugandan and Sudanese peacekeepers for the country. The prospects for an actual mission are unclear because the Islamic militants are opposed to foreign troops.

Some European officials have said an arms embargo on Somalia should also be eased so its government can develop a police force and army.

Six Nations Urge Talks In Somalia For Exiled Rulers And Islamists (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

The United States joined five other countries yesterday in calling for negotiations between Somalia's largely powerless government in exile and the Islamists who have seized control in Mogadishu and swaths of southern Somalia.

The diplomats also pledged economic and political support to Somalia's long-neglected interim government, which was formed with United Nations support but has been unable to enter Mogadishu, the previous capital, and has been stuck in Baidoa, about 150 miles away.

A communiqué issued after the hurriedly convened meeting is filled with diplomatic but nonspecific references to the need for "enhanced multilateral engagement" and "overall co-ordination of the international community's support."

The countries in the group are the United States, Britain, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Tanzania.

The document represents a resurgence for the State Department, where officials have been critical of the Bush administration's policy on Somalia, which consisted largely of C.I.A. payments to Somali warlords to help them defeat the Islamists.

With the warlords now on the run, critics inside and outside the administration are saying that strategy was counterproductive, leaving Washington with no allies in an area that has been fertile breeding ground for terrorists.

Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations publicly took on the old policy yesterday. "I would not have supported the warlords," he told a news conference when asked about American involvement. "I don't think I would have recommended the United Nations or the Security Council supporting the warlords."

In any event, Washington is adopting a more conciliatory approach to the Islamists. Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's top Africa official, had kind words yesterday about a second letter from Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamist militia group.

"Before our meeting, we received a letter from the Islamic Courts Union," Ms. Frazer said. "They said they won't allow Somalia and Mogadishu to become a haven for terrorists, and that's encouraging."

Mr. Ahmed and the Islamic Courts Union seized control of Mogadishu last week. The first letter to the international community was also conciliatory, saying that the Islamists wanted a "friendly relationship."

But Ms. Frazer questioned why the Islamic militias were continuing to push north into other Somali towns.

...

"What is the purpose, what is the intent?" Ms. Frazer asked.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since early 1991, when largely clan-based warlords overthrew its dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. Last week, American-backed warlords fighting against Islamists were run out of Mogadishu. Washington fears the Somali Islamists may be harboring operatives of Al Qaeda.

The United States began informally reaching out to Somali clans in late 2002, shortly after an attack on a hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, and a failed attempt to shoot down a plane bound for Israel from Mombasa. Washington was seeking intelligence about people suspected of being members of Al Qaeda, said a recent report by the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization with extensive experience in Somalia.

But while that approach brought a few successes, it may also be part of the reason for the Islamic resurgence in Somalia, which is far better known for clan loyalty than for adherence to strict Islamic codes.

Yesterday's communiqué also called on the international community to increase relief assistance to Somalia. There are some 250,000 displaced people in Mogadishu, and Jan Egeland, the United Nations emergency relief coordinator, said he told the diplomats, "Somalia today is one of the worst human crises on earth."

"It's a place where people do not go to school but become child soldiers and terrorists," Mr. Egeland said after the meeting.

Norway and the United States were co-chairmen of the meeting. Norwegian diplomats initially proposed talks on Somalia in April, approaching the Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council. Last Friday, four days after the Islamists announced they had taken control of Mogadishu, American officials announced that they would convene a meeting.

Diplomats say the next step is to figure out how to channel money — perhaps through the World Bank and other institutions — to Somalia's interim government and, through relief agencies, to the Somali people.

Somalia Demonstrators Reject Peacekeepers (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, June 15, 2006

Hundreds of supporters of the Islamic group that holds Somalia's capital and much of the south demonstrated Thursday against a proposal to deploy foreign peacekeepers.

A day earlier, the country's weak transitional parliament approved the deployment of Ugandan and Sudanese peacekeepers to help it establish stability and its authority. That could set the government up for a confrontation with the Islamic fighters, who have repeatedly rejected the idea of foreign troops.

While the Islamic fighters are consolidating their hold over southern Somalia, the government is relegated to Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu. A demonstration in favor of peacekeepers was held in Baidoa Thursday.

In Mogadishu, the demonstrators gathered at the main stadium carrying placards that read, "We don't need foreign peacekeepers," and "We can restore peace and stability ourselves."

The transitional government, whose military consists of little more than the president's personal militia, has watched from the sidelines as the Islamic forces overcame a coalition of secular warlords to take control of southern Somalia. The Islamic forces took Mogadishu on June 6.

U.S. officials have acknowledged backing the warlords against the Islamic group. In response to the Islamic militia's growing power, the United States convened a meeting on Somalia in New York on Thursday.

The Islamic group, accused by the United States of harboring al-Qaida, portrays itself as free of links to Somalia's past turmoil and capable of bringing order and unity.

The Islamic group's control over southern Somalia is a feat unmatched since the fall of dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The country has had no effective central government since then.

Somalis Welcome The Quiet Brought By Islamist Takeover (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia - When he was 10, Abdullahi Nur began peddling machine guns and grenade launchers from a rickety stall on the edge of the Bakara Market, where the largest arms bazaar in Africa is flush with dollars from warring militias in this outlaw city.

Over the years, Nur watched anxiously as Islamist factions tried to bring order to the dangerous capital, cracking down on drug traffickers, alcohol sellers, prostitutes and cinema owners. Nur worried that his lucrative trade would be next.

But now, at 25, even Nur is weary of the mayhem. He said he'd close shop if ordered to by the Islamic Courts Union, whose militia has brought a tenuous calm to Mogadishu after its surprise defeat of U.S.-backed warlords June 5.

"If the Islamists ban the sale of guns, we'll do it if it means 100 percent security here," Nur said with an air of resignation. "I can find other work."

To many Somalis, the Islamist takeover was the natural culmination of a religious movement that took root with the withdrawal of international forces in 1995 and blossomed as residents turned to faith in the absence of any government.

It's also a backlash against the United States, which everyone in Mogadishu believes bankrolled the warlords to carry out an American proxy war against terrorists that resulted in kidnappings of religious figures and false accusations that innocents were affiliated with al-Qaida.

DOJ_NMG_0035067

"I used to close for five or 10 minutes every day because of the fighting, but now it is quiet," said Ali Sheikh Mahmoud, 45, who sells household goods in another section of the Bakara Market. "We are all Muslims. We agree with the Islamist movement for now, but we don't know what the future will bring."

The Bush administration, which has never confirmed that it's funded the warlords, also is worried about Mogadishu's future, suspecting that its new rulers are harboring some of the world's most-wanted fugitives, including at least three known al-Qaida terrorists.

On Thursday, a U.S.-organized "Contact Group" of American, European and African diplomats met in New York to coordinate policy toward Somalia. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Bush administration still needed more information. "We want to have a better assessment of this group and the situation on the ground," he said.

For now, Mogadishu residents said, the Islamic Courts is a vast improvement over the chaos of the last 15 years.

"Deep down, we're not sure 100 percent what's behind the Islamic Courts. But this is a new revolution for the people of Mogadishu, and for now they have full support," said Abdelkadir Mohamed Nur, a Somali-American businessman and the chairman of the city's main port, which employs 10,000 people.

He and other community leaders said the rise of conservative Islam in Mogadishu began when international groups fled the city but didn't truly flourish until about three years ago. By that time, this coastal city - which once boasted fine Italian architecture and bustling country clubs - had degenerated into a crumbling, barren battleground for gunmen from competing clans.

With no government, little foreign aid and neither law nor order, life in Mogadishu became a harrowing test of survival. Famine and fighting created Africa's largest group of internally displaced people - 250,000 of them in Mogadishu alone, the U.N. estimates, packed into squalid camps that are breeding grounds for disease and crime.

With the city too perilous for Western aid workers - the nearest U.N. presence is more than 30 miles away - Islamic charities from Saudi Arabia and Persian Gulf nations filled the void. Today, most schools in the capital teach in Arabic rather than Somali, using imported curricula that include mandatory religious instruction. The charities also established clinics and sponsored street cleanings.

The habits of their wealthy gulf benefactors seeped into the daily lives of traditionally secular Somalis. Men grew their beards and shortened their robes, considered signs of piety by some Muslims. A growing number of women adopted Saudi Arabia's full veil, which reveals only the eyes, but tweaked it to local tastes by using vivid turquoise and purples rather than the customary black.

"I wear this because of my own feelings, not out of imitation," said Kawthar Ali, 17, who wore a black veil, polka-dotted scarf and violet cloak to go shopping last week.

Somalis also became increasingly anti-American, community leaders said. A Somali entrepreneur opened the Ayman al-Zawahri cultural center, named after al-Qaida's Egyptian second in command, though in recent months it was shuttered and Zawahri's last name disappeared from the colorful facade. And workaday Somalis were incensed at their depiction in the film "Black Hawk Down."

Clans set up courts governed by Islamic law to bring some semblance of order to the city. Last year, with just $4,000 in donations, the clans formed the Islamic Courts Union to deal better with the abductions and slayings that intensified in the vicious war between the U.S.-backed warlords and their Islamist opponents, according to several Somalis involved in the project.

They installed Sheik Sherif Ahmed - a geography teacher from a prominent clan and a long line of respected clerics - as chairman. Immediately, his heavily armed militia set out to control the streets, taking particular aim at the moorayaan, the freelance gunmen sometimes hired for the warlords' counterterrorism operations.

"I saw so many problems some people were bringing to the Muslims, especially our religious figures being captured and sold to the Americans, and that's what inspired me to join," said Abdel Fatah Ali, 25, a gunman in the Islamic Courts militia whose older brother died in the battle for Mogadishu. "The day the warlords were ejected, so many people were celebrating. I felt proud."

The courts also have imposed restrictions on the personal lives of ordinary Somalis.

Several Mogadishu residents, who asked that their names not be published for fear of retaliation, recalled a hand-grenade attack that closed a brothel, written threats to blow up cinemas that screened "Bollywood" films from India, and smuggling rings that brought the wayward children of Somali families abroad back home for religious and cultural indoctrination.

It's become hard to find expensive gin from Ethiopia and "calaq," cheaper Somali moonshine, they said. The Islamists also frown on cigarettes and the pervasive chewing of khat, an addictive plant with stimulant properties.

One hotel owner said Islamists warned him not to hold his annual New Year's party this year. When he persisted, a rocket-propelled grenade interrupted the festivities. Next year, he said, there'll be no party.

To many Somalis struggling to raise families in their anarchic city, a pious lifestyle is a small price to pay for security.

DOJ_NMG_0035068

At Madina Hospital, the number of patients admitted with gunshot wounds has dropped steadily since the Islamist ascension, hospital administrator Ali Mualem Mohamed said. At the height of the fighting earlier this month, he said, the 65-bed hospital was flooded with 170 patients, and all but a handful were civilians caught in the crossfire.

As of last week, 54 patients remained, including a 10-year-old girl whose shoulder bone was shattered by a stray bullet, a 40-year-old mother whose chest was filled with shrapnel from a mortar round and an 18-year-old man whose brother accidentally shot him with the rifle the family keeps at home for protection. Mohamed said he welcomed the quiet.

Classes have resumed at the Alpha School, where Omar Mahmoud, 42, struggles to teach civics to teenagers who've never known a government. Students might even take their finals on time now that the violence has subsided.

But there are changes. More girls are turning up in all-encompassing veils and a group of boys dropped out, explaining that they were off to fight for Islam.

Mahmoud said he had serious doubts about the Islamic Courts, but that he was desperate for any group that could prevent his two young children from growing up with the question his students put forth every year.

"Always they ask me, `What is a government?' It is only a theory for them," Mahmoud said. "I tell them, `One day you'll have one, and you'll play an important role.' We're just pacifying them, trying to encourage them."

US Can't Afford To Ignore Young Militant, Somali Leaders Say (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 15, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia - Even in the violent, anarchic landscape of Mogadishu, Adan Hashi Ayro stands out.

Some describe him as a ruthless holy warrior, a student of the Taliban and a relentless fighter who can scale walls and jump from moving trucks without dropping his weapon. Others offer a more sympathetic portrait of a misguided young militant who is at odds with his own clan, bitter over foreign meddling in Somalia and the scapegoat of U.S. agents who needed to put a face on their enemy.

Somali community leaders agree, however, that the United States can't afford to ignore Ayro, who they say was crucial to the recent victory of the militant Islamic Courts Union over U.S.-backed warlords. If Ayro splits with the Islamic Courts' relatively moderate leadership, he could form an army of extremists prepared to attack American interests in the Horn of Africa, they fear.

"The Courts have a very extremist wing, and maybe Adan is leading this wing. He is said to be the real commander of the fighting, the mastermind," said Abdullahi M. Shirwa, a secular peace activist who supported the Islamic Courts as an antidote to Mogadishu's violence and disorder. "This is a critical time. The United States should not threaten the Islamic Courts with bombings or military action. They should show a deep and committed plan for Somali reconstruction."

U.S. officials met with Somali counterparts in New York on Thursday to help craft a new policy toward the impoverished, battle-scarred country, which has had no real government for 15 years. Many here urge the Bush administration to try to begin a dialogue.

"Go straight to the Islamists and see what they have achieved," said Osman Hassan Ali, a member of Somalia's figurehead transitional government whom American forces detained during fighting in the 1990s. "If the U.S. pushes too much, then they will go against everything. But at least open the dialogue, create some trust."

An International Crisis Group report last year named Ayro as the "main protagonist on the jihadi side" and implicated him in the assassinations of four foreign-aid workers and at least 10 Somali former military and police officers.

"The group is also believed to have helped al-Qaida operatives in Somalia with logistics, jobs, identities and protection, and to operate training sites," the report said.

Ayro, said to be in his late 20s or early 30s, is a relative and protege of a commander of a now-disbanded militia. The Crisis Group report says Ayro was sent to Afghanistan for training and, by at least one account, arrived on the eve of the American offensive against the Taliban after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He didn't return to Somalia for several months.

Sheik Sherif Ahmed, the chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, confirmed in an interview with Knight Ridder that Ayro had been in Afghanistan, but he declined to offer details. Ahmed said his group didn't shelter al-Qaida or other terrorism suspects and that U.S. claims to the contrary were false.

"Adan is a normal citizen, a Somali individual trying to contribute," Ahmed said. "Anyone can go to Afghanistan, and people like Adan should not be blamed for it."

In Mogadishu, several Somalis who've met Ayro or know him through his clan said they doubted he was the terrorist chief portrayed by international intelligence agencies.

"He looks like a starving kid," said Ali Iman Sharmarke, a managing partner of HornAfric, a media group in Mogadishu whose radio station last year broadcast the only known interview with Ayro. "I think they are blowing him out of proportion, but that is the culture of the Americans. They have to create a monster so they can take action. Unfortunately, the monster they `create' then becomes a monster."

Sharmarke, who's met Ayro twice, said most Somalis had never heard of the militant until January 2005, when Ayro's forces dug up a colonial-era Italian cemetery in Mogadishu, removing the remains from about 300 Italian graves. Part of what's now Somalia was an Italian colony until World War II.

Sharmarke said the desecration was in part to embarrass Ayro's clan because it had failed to defend him when the forces of a U.S.-backed warlord, seeking a senior al-Qaida suspect, raided Ayro's house. The suspect wasn't there, according to the Crisis Group report, but raiders found a bomb-making manual and Ayro's brother-in-law, a fugitive who was wanted in connection with assassinations in the Somaliland region.

Ayro's role in the recent battle for Mogadishu is in dispute, though all Somali officials said he was crucial to victory. Some said he was valued for the insurgent tactics he allegedly picked up from the Taliban. Others said his battlewagons, equipped with antiaircraft artillery used as ground weapons, were able to penetrate even the best-defended warlord positions.

Somalis here said Ayro represented a faction of Islamic Courts supporters who came of age in vicious, modern-day Mogadishu and were less educated and more dogmatic than the older clerics who form a moderate majority. Many think the moderates can stay in power only if the United States and other interested countries engage in negotiations without recriminations.

"If they come with the mentality that the Taliban is there, let's get them out, we will see a very harsh Courts that's probably capable of driving out 20,000 peacekeepers, like what happened in the past," Sharmarke said.

Somali Militias Decry Terrorists (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

NAIROBI, June 15 -- The leader of Somalia's increasingly powerful Islamic militias sent a letter to the United States this week asserting that they would assist international efforts to prevent the fractured, chaotic country from becoming "a transit route or hiding ground" for terrorists.

The letter, dated Wednesday and sent to the State Department and the embassies of several other countries, gives a direct though conciliatory response to concerns by U.S. officials that the Islamic militias harbor terrorists linked to attacks across East Africa, including the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania.

In the three-page letter, Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the loosely organized confederation of Islamic militias that took control of Mogadishu, the Somali capital, last week, compared international terrorists such as al-Qaeda to the brutal warlords who had ruled the city since 1991.

"Our communities have been subjected to terrorism longer than any community anywhere else in the world," he said in the letter. "Some of our leaders' families had the unfortunate experiences of loved ones being kidnapped, tortured and murdered at the hands of the warlords and criminal gangs during the last decade. We feel the pain of all people who had to face tyranny of terrorists and organized criminals. Our commitment in this regard is steadfast."

Meanwhile in New York, the United States met with key African and European governments to forge a new international strategy on Somalia. The meeting of the so-called International Contact Group on Somalia marked a renewed effort by the State Department to engage on Somalia.

The group, which included representatives from the United States, Italy, Norway, Sweden and the European Union, issued a communique after the meeting that urged all Somali parties to begin negotiations with the country's U.N.-backed but largely powerless transitional government. It also vowed to step up support for the government and press for greater access for aid workers.

Diplomats said Sweden would host another meeting next month.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazier said after the meeting that the group would strive "to increase the profile of Somalia as a destination for more assistance, more support."

Frazier sounded upbeat about the willingness of Somalia's Islamic militias to accommodate the international community. "They have clearly signaled to us that they are someone that we can work with," she said.

Frazier defended U.S. dealings with the secular warlords, who portrayed themselves as part of an anti-terrorism alliance and enjoyed U.S. support.

"We've never supported anyone to fight anyone else," Frazier said. "We have supported trying to get information from whoever we can get information, about particular terrorists like Harun Fazul, who was indicted for attacking our embassies. And we will continue to seek informtion from any and every party to try to get these guys turned over."

DOJ_NMG_0035070

The issue of terrorism in Somalia has loomed over the political and military developments there in recent weeks. As residents of Mogadishu have signaled support for their new rulers, Western countries have expressed fears that the militias are a reincarnation of the Taliban, the former leaders of Afghanistan who practiced a severe form of Islam and allowed Osama bin Laden to set up a base.

The Islamic militias, which Thursday continued extending their control throughout southern Somalia, grew out of a decade-long effort to bring order to Mogadishu in the absence of a federal government. The courts relied on Islamic law, or sharia , and banned pornography, cut off the hands of thieves and ordered public execution of murderers.

But in the past week, the militias have mounted what amounts to a public relations campaign, portraying themselves as moderates interested in bringing peace and security to their country.

The letter, the Islamic militias' most detailed statement yet about their intentions, included promises that a civilian police force would soon be installed and that former militia members would be demobilized to work on such public works projects as street cleaning and tree planting. A letter sent last week to foreign governments said the militias wanted "a friendly relationship with the international community."

The mayor of Mogadishu, Mahamud Hassan Ali, warned in an interview Thursday that only a rapid, massive infusion of cash and other outside help could prevent the Islamic forces from tilting toward extremism and turning Somalia into a haven for terrorists.

Ali, who was born in Somalia but moved to Minneapolis in 2000, was appointed mayor of Mogadishu by Somalia's transitional government. He said last week's victory by the Islamic militias had delivered the best chance for peace and stability in 15 years.

Ali disputed suggestions by U.S. officials that Mogadishu harbors terrorists but said extremist forms of Islam could appeal to the city's disaffected, largely uneducated youth. Preventing that, he said, would require that significant rebuilding efforts, financed mainly by the West, begin in the next two months.

"Somalia could become the biggest place for al-Qaeda or anybody else," he said in an interview in Nairobi, a regional political and economic hub where he has spent the week seeking help from diplomats.

The courts that brought Islamic law to Mogadishu also could become more severe in their punishments, he said.

If Somalia is neglected and left as it is, he said, "sharia may get strong."

US, Russia Reach Deal On Securing Soviet WMD (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, June 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Russian officials have agreed on terms for a seven-year extension of programs that provide U.S. money and expertise to secure and destroy Soviet-era caches of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

The agreement resolves legal disputes that threatened to derail the programs, which send hundreds of millions of dollars a year to Russia for “cooperative threat reduction” efforts. It will be signed by week's end, according to Frederick Jones, a spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council.

“The agreement ensures that critical cooperation with Russia continues to combat the proliferation threat posed by large quantities of Soviet legacy weapons of mass destruction and missile(s),” Jones says.

The cooperation programs, initiated in 1992, comprise a broad range of initiatives meant to reduce the risk that old Soviet weapons of mass destruction will fall into the hands of rogue states or terrorists. Projects include constructing facilities to lock down nuclear material and warheads; strengthening security at labs storing dangerous biological pathogens; developing special facilities to destroy chemical weapons; and dismantling long-range missiles and bombers.

Bush has hailed the programs as an important part of the administration's efforts to keep terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction. But the programs' future has been in flux since 2004 due to a U.S.-Russian dispute over liability protections for U.S. companies, workers and government personnel working at Russian weapons sites.

The original agreement governing the projects gave U.S. workers blanket protection from liability for damages in case of an on-site accident. That might include, for example, the accidental release of nerve gas at a chemical weapons disposal facility. But Russia was reluctant to continue that arrangement based on concerns that it would indemnify U.S. workers even for intentional acts of sabotage.

The new pact essentially retains the same blanket protections for U.S. workers involved in projects already underway. For new projects, the countries will develop liability protections that are not as sweeping as the current agreement.

William Hoehn, a non-proliferation expert at the Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council, said the new agreement would ensure that old Soviet weapons stocks are properly secured and disposed of.

Britain May Take Liberian Ex-Ruler (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

LONDON, June 15 — Britain said on Thursday that the former Liberian president, Charles Taylor, might serve his sentence in a British prison if he is convicted at his forthcoming war crimes trial.

The announcement paves the way for Mr. Taylor, who is being held in Sierra Leone on charges related to his role in that country's bloody civil war, to face trial in The Hague. The Netherlands has agreed to be host to the trial, but only on the condition that Mr. Taylor would not serve his sentence there if convicted. Other European countries have refused to allow Mr. Taylor to serve any sentence within their borders, but Britain, the former colonial power in Sierra Leone and a country that sent troops there in 2000 to help end the war, said it had started the process, "and we want to finish it," in the words of Lord Triesman, the minister for Africa.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign minister, said the decision to take in Mr. Taylor, who has been charged with 11 counts of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other violations, was evidence of Britain's "commitment to international justice."

"I am delighted to be able to respond positively to the request of the United Nations secretary general that, should he be convicted, Charles Taylor serve his sentence in the U.K.," Mrs. Beckett said.

Mr. Taylor stands accused of financing the rebel force in Sierra Leone, the Revolutionary United Front, by selling diamonds on its behalf and then supplying it with arms. In a decade-long war that left 50,000 people dead and countless others maimed and displaced, the rebels were notorious for raping civilians and for using machetes to kill people and to hack off limbs and other body parts.

The trial is to be held in the International Criminal Court complex in The Hague under the auspices of the United Nations-backed court established in Sierra Leone to try people suspected of atrocities in the war, which lasted from 1991 to 2002.

Mr. Taylor, who was arrested in March 2006, is to be tried in The Hague because of fears that trying him in West Africa, where he still has allies, would further destabilize a region trying to recover from its wounds.

Britain To Imprison Liberia's Taylor If He's Convicted (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 15 -- Britain agreed Thursday to jail former Liberian president Charles Taylor if he is found guilty of responsibility for atrocities in Sierra Leone, ending an impasse that for months had delayed his transfer to The Hague to stand trial before a war crimes tribunal.

"I was delighted to be able to respond positively to the request of the United Nations secretary general that, should he be convicted, Charles Taylor serve his sentence in the U.K.," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in London. "My decision was driven by two compelling arguments. Firstly, that Taylor's presence in Sierra Leone remains a threat to peace in that region. Secondly, that we are demonstrating through concrete action the U.K.'s commitment to international justice."

Taylor faces 11 counts of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other violations of international humanitarian law. The United Nations-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone was set up in 2002 to prosecute those bearing greatest responsibility for atrocities committed by rebels under Taylor's sway in the Sierra Leone civil war, which lasted from 1991 to 2002. Taylor has said he is not guilty of the charges.

Beckett's announcement ends a protracted U.N.-led effort to locate a country that would be prepared to detain Taylor.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the decision. "I am very grateful to Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett for this statesmanlike decision, which marks another step forward in our battle against impunity for the most heinous crimes," Annan said at a news conference at U.N. headquarters.

Taylor was arrested March 29 in Nigeria, where he lived in exile since being forced to give up the Liberian presidency in 2003. Taylor sought to flee Nigeria after Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, requested this year that he be surrendered to the Sierra Leone court to face trial. He was captured as he tried to slip across the border and flown to Monrovia, Liberia, where he was detained by U.N. peacekeepers and transferred to a prison in Sierra Leone.

The court's president asked to try him in another country because of concerns that Taylor supporters could threaten members of the court and possibly help him escape. The Netherlands agreed to allow the Sierra Leone court to carry out its trial at the headquarters of the International Criminal Court, on the condition that another country agree to take Taylor. Several countries, including Austria, Sweden and Denmark, had refused to take him.

Beckett said the decision still requires approval by the British Parliament. But Britain's U.N. ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said he would seek passage of a Security Council resolution on Friday to authorize Taylor's transfer from Sierra Leone to a prison cell at the headquarters of International Criminal Court.

Taylor launched a bloody insurgency in Liberia in 1989, where he ruled as a warlord before being elected president in 1997. While in power, he supported rebel movements in neighboring countries, including Sierra Leone, and contributed to instability across West Africa.

He faces charges of backing Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front, which killed, raped, enslaved and mutilated thousands of civilians during the civil war.

In Oil-Rich Angola, Cholera Preys Upon Poorest (NYT)

By Sharon LaFraniere

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

LUANDA, Angola, June 10 — In a nation whose multibillion-dollar oil boom should arguably make its people rich enough to drink Evian, the water that many in this capital depend on goes by a less fancy name: Bengo.

The Bengo River passes north of here, its waters dark with grit, its banks strewn with garbage.

Two dozen roaring pumping stations suck in 1.3 million gallons from the river each day, filling 450 tanker trucks that in turn supply 10,000 vendors across Luanda's endless slums. The vendors then fill the jerry cans and washtubs of the city's slum dwellers, who buy the water to drink and bathe in.

This is one reason, health experts here say, that Luanda's slums are now the center of one of the worst cholera epidemics to strike Africa in nearly a decade, an outbreak that has sickened 43,000 Angolans and killed more than 1,600 since it began in February.

But it is only one reason. Cholera typically spreads through contact with contaminated water or sewage, and in Luanda's slums, both are everywhere. Neighborhoods here are ringed by mountains of garbage, often soaked by rivulets of human waste. Only about half of slum dwellers have even an outdoor latrine.

Children stripped to their underwear dance through sewage-clogged creeks and slide down garbage dumps on sleds made of sheet metal into excrement-fouled puddles.

Much of the city has no drainage system; in heavy rains, the filthy water rises hip-high in some of the poorest dwellings.

One development group estimated that it would take 22,000 dump trucks to clear away the trash. That was in 1994, when Luanda had half the population of 4.5 million it has now.

"I have never seen anything like it," said David Weatherill, a water and sanitation expert for Doctors Without Borders, which is leading the response to the epidemic. "You see conditions like this on a smaller scale. But I have never seen it on such a huge scale. It is quite shocking."

Angola is in the midst of a gusher in oil revenue, its hotels crammed with oil executives and its harbor filled with tankers carrying away the 1.4 million barrels of crude pumped here each day. The economy grew by 18 percent last year. The government racked up a budget surplus of more than $2 billion.

This year it is expected to take in $16.8 billion in revenue, well over twice the $7.5 billion it received in 2004. Next year, revenue is expected to rise by a third again, almost all because of oil.

Economists say the government simply has more money than it can spend.

Yet it seems powerless to address even the basic issues of clean water and sewers that would make such epidemics entirely preventable — a paradox that critics attribute to corruption, incompetence or the hangover of a 27-year civil war that flooded the capital with refugees, or all three.

"We are talking about a government that has the means," said Stephan Goetghebuer, East Africa coordinator for Doctors Without Borders. "There are a lot of things they could be doing. The living conditions are really terrible, and they are terrible even if you compare them to other places in Africa."

Sebastião Veloso, Angola's health minister, said the scope of the problem defied a quick fix. "We just do our best," he said. "The lack of infrastructure is a very complicated administrative problem. We are doing our part at the Ministry of Health, and the rest of government must do its part. We are pressuring the government, because otherwise these epidemics will continue."

Only one in six Luandan households is lucky enough to have running water, and for many of them, it comes from a community standpipe, according to Development Workshop, a nonprofit group in Angola. The often-contaminated river water from trucks that roam the slums costs up to 12 cents a gallon — a hefty sum in a nation where two-thirds of the people live on less than $2 a day, and up to 160 times the price paid in better-off neighborhoods with piped water.

So the poor ration their water use, limiting themselves to about two gallons a day per person for drinking, bathing, washing clothes and cleaning. That is far below the five-gallon daily minimum recommended by the United Nations — and one twenty-sixth the average use in Western countries, according to Doctors Without Borders.

In an attempt to beat back the epidemic, the government, with the help of the United Nations, is distributing a limited amount of free clean water. The few distribution points are easy to spot. Hundreds of people rise before dawn to set their plastic buckets in lines that stretch for blocks. The crowds remain long after the water is gone.

One afternoon last week, dozens of people crowded around one empty plastic water tank about eight miles from downtown. "They are waiting for the last drop," said José Mateus, a neighborhood coordinator.

No one knows precisely why cholera arose out of the slums this year after a cholera-free decade in Angola. Epidemiologists say the long absence of the disease worsened the outbreak because the population had no built-up immunity.

Once it began, not even the tidiest slum household could halt it.

It first hit Boa Vista, a shantytown minutes from downtown. Ombrina Cabanga, a 20-year-old mother of a 2-year-old girl, did everything to protect herself, said her sister-in-law, Oriana Gabriel. She washed vegetables, rinsed plates and cleaned the latrine the family shares with three others. As the Health Ministry recommended, she used bleach to disinfect the drinking water she bought from the neighborhood vendor.

But her house is a few feet from a giant trash-filled gulley. Her latrine, like everyone else's, drains directly into it. And she sold soap every day in the city's famously squalid outdoor market, a job she hoped to escape by taking adult literacy classes.

One Tuesday in late March, she came home and vomited into a bucket. Two nights later, she was dead.

"I am just a working man, I don't know why the government doesn't help us," said her husband, Vieira Muieba, 27, a construction worker. "I don't know where the money goes. We become angry but we don't know what to do."

From Boa Vista, the epidemic moved along the major highways to all but 4 of the nation's 18 provinces. Maria André lost her 15-year-old daughter, 13-year-old niece and 4-year-old nephew in the span of two days. Five other children in the household were also taken ill but recovered.

Ms. André is racked with guilt nearly three weeks after the deaths. "I don't know what happened," she said. "I heard about the disease on the radio, and all of a sudden, it was here. They were all healthy and now, they are dead.

"It is not easy to lose three children all at once."

Angolan government officials say there is no overnight solution to the lack of basic water and sanitation. In late May, President José Eduardo dos Santos promised new measures to improve conditions, including moving Luandans out of the most appalling slums.

But the government's plans are in their infancy and, despite the gusher of oil revenues, short on financing.

Consider the government's plan to take over some of the provision of water to Luanda's slums. Four months into Angola's cholera epidemic, 20 trucks have been ordered — minuscule compared to the fleet of more than 300 private trucks now supplying the poor. As of early June, Mr. Veloso, the health minister, was still waiting for the first delivery.

The government's harshest critics blame corruption for the abysmal living conditions. Transparency International, which promotes good governance worldwide, ranks Angola as the world's seventh most corrupt nation. The State Department said in a 2002 report that Angola's wealth was concentrated in the hands of a tiny elite, in part made up of government officials who had enriched themselves on an enormous scale.

Other diplomats and analysts say Angola's ruling party is still trying to get on its feet after a civil war that raged almost nonstop from 1975, when Angola gained independence from Portugal, until mid-2002.

Dauda Wurie, a project officer for the United Nations Children's Fund, said the war had eviscerated the government's corps of competent managers, leaving disarray.

"I am not defending them," he said of the government officials. "They buy big cars. They live in big houses. But it would be wrong to expect that everything will turn around just because war stopped."

Doctors Without Borders officials say the government response to the outbreak has been woefully slow and underfinanced. A crisis committee began work only two and a half months after the epidemic began, and the government has set aside a mere $5 million in emergency money to fight the disease.

Assessing the water taken by private truckers from the Bengo fell to Doctors Without Borders. Last month it issued its report: laboratory tests in April showed the raw river water was unsafe to drink.

But only one in 10 truckers chlorinated water tanks; the others simply delivered untreated water to the city.

Presented with those findings, the government did nothing, the report states. So Doctors Without Borders organized the distribution of free chlorine. It now plans to insist that the truckers pour chlorine crystals into their tanks while inspectors watch, lest they sell them instead.

DOJ_NMG_0035074

How much those truckers — and the neighborhood vendors they supply — earn in profits is unclear. But Janetta Jamela's bedroom in eastern Luanda is one hint. Fifteen bags of concrete are stacked against the wall — to add three new bedrooms and a new kitchen and bathroom.

Since she and her husband scraped up $200 to build an underground water tank three years ago, she estimated, she has earned about $235 a month selling water — $75 a month more than her husband earns as a government security officer.

"But you have to have the $200 to start with," she said.

The cholera epidemic is now waning, having run what epidemiologists call its natural, devastating course. But without an improvement in slum conditions, said Mr. Weatherill, the group's water and sanitation expert, the respite may last only until the next rainy season.

"Unless things change, we probably will be back the next year," he said in a telephone interview, "and the year after that."

Uganda Shaken By Fund Scandal (WT)

By Willis Witter

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

KAMPALA, Uganda -- Uganda, which continues to win praise from President Bush and others as a model of success battling AIDS, is reeling from the disclosure that top officials, their relatives and colleagues siphoned off tens of millions of dollars in grants from the Geneva-based Global Fund.

Money went to charities that did not exist, into the personal bank accounts of government employees and even to fund a nationwide campaign to scrap term limits so that President Yoweri Museveni could run for a third term in office.

The most prominent official named was Jim Muhwezi, who served as health minister until being sacked last month. Two other senior ministry officials, Alex Kamugisha and Mike Mukula, also were named, with a recommendation that they be further investigated.

"This is the big leagues," said Justice James Ogoola, when asked to compare this week's American scandal over hurricane relief to the findings of a 10-month investigation that he just completed.

"This was assistance for people who were dying, who had absolutely no hope. This is exactly what the Global Fund was created for. The money came, and people were diving in for the kill," said Justice Ogoola, the top judge in Uganda's High Court.

Since its creation in 2002, the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria has committed $5.1 billion in grants to more than 130 countries to fight the three diseases that kill more than 6 million people each year. As of last year, the United States had given the fund $1.49 billion, according to the fund's Web site.

In addition to contributions from governments, rock star Bono and other celebrities have helped raise hundreds of millions of dollars from corporations and private charities such as the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

The disappearance of a large amount of money first became public in August, when the fund abruptly suspended a $200 million grant. Mr. Museveni responded by appointing Justice Ogoola to investigate, and the fund lifted the suspension three months later.

"We didn't hold a single in-camera session. It was all public hearings, and we did that quite deliberately, so the people of Uganda could see with their own eyes what was going on," the judge said.

Immaculately dressed in a dark suit, he sat ramrod straight behind a huge mahogany desk, his hands folded as he answered a reporter's questions with a soft, deep voice.

Between September and April, he and a panel of investigators interviewed 150 witnesses and reviewed more than 500 exhibits, mostly documents.

"The government did everything they could to facilitate the inquiry. They set it up and never interfered," Justice Ogoola said.

The probe yielded a barrage of banner headlines, unprecedented live radio and television coverage and constant chatter on talk shows.

A preliminary report given to Mr. Museveni in a public ceremony May 31 and published in the Daily Monitor newspaper three days later recommends criminal investigation of "three personal assistants" for forgery and other crimes.

A final copy of the report is being bound and prepared for public release shortly, one official said.

The investigation uncovered typical tokens of corruption, including brand-new luxury cars and junkets to exotic cities, such as Paris and Oslo.

The scandal centered on a newly created organization within the Health Ministry, known as the Project Management Unit (PMU), which funneled $47 million from the fund to about 400 private organizations, known as nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

Many of the NGOs existed only on paper.

PMU paid grossly inflated salaries to its 15 professionals and 20 support staff, who often doubled their take-home pay with generous and largely undocumented expense allowances.

Much of the money disappeared into personal bank accounts of PMU employees and final grant recipients, who sometimes wrote large personal checks to their supervisors.

A bank that received nearly $20 million wired from Geneva in U.S. dollars skimmed about $245,000, by using an artificially low exchange rate.

In all, about $37 million of the money remains unaccounted for.

"You could count the number of honest recipients with two hands, and even they were not without sin," Justice Ogoola said, his face cringing ever so slightly as he spoke.

Problems have surfaced with other recipients of Global Fund money, including Burma, which has been cut off completely. Local newspaper reports tell of similar problems accounting for money in Kenya.

The Global Fund disbursement was poorly conceived in the first place, said Onapito Ekomoloit, the press secretary for Mr. Museveni.

"The message was vague. It was for workshops, and people were cooking up all kinds of numbers and books to justify the money. It was just talk. Talk, talk, talk, and anybody could claim the capacity to do it," Mr. Ekomoloit said.

It could have been worse, as less than 25 percent of a $200 million grant had been disbursed.

Future money from the Global Fund is earmarked for HIV, malaria and tuberculosis drugs, Mr. Ekomoloit said.

"It will be much easier to keep track of," said Justice Ogoola.

Annan Sees No Standoff Over Budget At The U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Thursday that he thought the United Nations would avoid a threatened budget showdown at the end of this month over management changes, but he warned against threats to "pull the plug" on the organization if it did not meet some countries' expectations.

"The cap on the budget will be lifted, there will be no crisis, as far as I can see, this month," Mr. Annan said at a news conference.

Led by the United States, the major contributors to the United Nations in December obtained agreement on a six-month cap on the current budget that links disbursement of money after June 30 for the two-year, $3.8-billion budget to progress in management improvements.

In addition, John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador, has periodically hinted that if sufficient changes are not made, the United States Congress will move to withhold its United Nations dues.

Mr. Annan predicted that the progress being made now would be sufficient to forestall a crisis, but he added that the tactic pressed by the United States had provoked a strong reaction from many nations.

"For someone to say that because you have not reformed to my satisfaction, I am going to pull the plug and stop all the activities is going to be a very hard sell for other member states to swallow — and rightly so," he said.

Mr. Bolton said Thursday that the United States and its allies were in extensive consultations with the so-called Group of 77, which represents 132 developing nations.

"We hope we can agree on a consensus decision with respect to the expenditure cap which the United States, the European Union and Japan all said should be based on substantial movement on the reform question by June 30 and a road map through the end of the year," he said.

Mr. Bolton said the group was adopting a "flexible, accommodating position" but needed to make progress to increase accountability, toughen oversight and start eliminating committees with expired mandates. "What we'd like to see is substantial progress in some combination in all three of those areas, but we have not said, 'This is a prerequisite or that is an absolute prerequisite,' " he said.

Relations between Mr. Annan and Mr. Bolton remained strained in the aftermath of a speech last week by Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, asserting that the United States had failed to stand up for the United Nations or to acknowledge its value to American policymakers, letting its harshest American detractors dominate debate.

Mr. Bolton unsuccessfully sought a repudiation of the remarks from Mr. Annan, and he said they represented a patronizing attack on American public opinion. He added that they would set back the cause of reform.

Mr. Annan disagreed with that position on Thursday, saying that a "poisonous" atmosphere that had arisen between wealthy and developing nations was subsiding and that he trusted Americans to understand Mr. Malloch Brown's speech. "I do not think they will read the Mark Malloch Brown statement as insulting, condescending or rude," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0035076

But Mr. Bolton was unrelenting on Thursday. "I can tell you that criticism of the intelligence of the American people is never a smart thing to do politically," he said.

"And I do believe that the comments have had a negative impact politically and that impact continues," he added. "I'm not trying to dwell on it, I just think it's a fact of life, and if you don't realize it, you're blinking reality in Washington."

U.N. Given Reprieve On Spending Cap By U.S., EU (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 16, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United Nations appears to have postponed a financial crisis that threatened to dim the lights at the end of June, as the United States and other key governments have agreed to extend its spending authority.

Washington had imposed a spending cap, set to expire at the end of the month, in an effort to ensure that difficult management reforms were not delayed until the end of the usual two-year budget cycle.

But U.N. officials and diplomats say that the United States, Japan and other nations are not willing to see the lights go out -- yet.

"The cap on the budget will be lifted. There will be no crisis, as far as I can see, this month," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday during a press conference that touched on crises in Somalia and East Timor, and the field to succeed him as secretary-general.

He noted that "the tensions and poisonous atmosphere" that marked earlier discussions had dissipated.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who negotiated the six-month spending authority with other countries in late December, said yesterday that the Bush administration, European Union and Japan have been meeting with the powerful bloc of 132 developing nations and were working toward a consensus on how to streamline the organization to mutual satisfaction.

"Our positions were quite in accord with one another," said Mr. Bolton, stressing Washington's flexibility. "We have tried not to draw lines in the sand."

Specifically, the big donors want to make the organization more efficient and responsive by streamlining administrative matters and consolidating more power in the hands of the next secretary-general.

But a bloc of 132 poorer nations fear that the Secretariat will be beholden to large donors, and are reluctant to give up their own negotiating power in the General Assembly.

They have two weeks before the cap expires, but Mr. Annan said he has not yet felt the need to raise the issue during regular phone calls with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"I believe that perhaps the sense of crisis has been exaggerated," said Pakistani Ambassador Munir Akram, whose country has been a vocal member of the developing nations. "The budget cap, one way or another, will be lifted. I hope it's unanimous, so that no one feels they will have a reason to withhold their money in the future."

Mr. Akram, who with Canadian Ambassador Alan Rock has been serving as a liaison in the negotiating process, indicated that key sticking points remain.

Tensions between the international organization and its host country are still raw.

Asked by reporters yesterday about his relationship with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Annan firmly replied, "I work with him as I work with 190 others." And Mr. Bolton who spoke harshly of Mr. Annan's deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, for telling a left-leaning gathering that the American heartland does not understand the United Nations' positive aspects repeated criticisms yesterday.

"I can tell you the criticism of the intelligence of the American people is never a smart thing to do, politically," he said in response to reporters' questions. "The comments have had a negative impact, politically, and that impact continues. I'm not trying to dwell on it but it's a reality in Washington."

Mr. Annan yesterday repeated that he supported his deputy's remarks, and noted that the comments about Middle America had been misconstrued.

The UN Serves US Interests (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, June 16, 2006

You could touch John Bolton's pain. Last week, the occasionally irascible US ambassador to the United Nations assailed that organisation's deputy secretary-general. Some saw a crude attempt at bullying. More interesting, I thought, was the anguish behind the rage. For all Mr Bolton's bluster, George W. Bush's administration has acknowledged that acting effectively in the world requires legitimacy as well as power. No one hates the idea of admitting this more than its ambassador in New York.

During the past 18 months or so, American foreign policy has been stranded in an uncomfortable no-man's land between hubris and reality. Mr Bush has abandoned the assumption of unbridled hegemony that underpinned the decision to go to war in Iraq. In its place is the reluctant pragmatism that now sees Washington ready to open negotiations with Iran. But the administration has not changed its ideological spots. It still shuns the institutional internationalism that secured US leadership during the second half of the last century.

The proximate cause of Mr Bolton's invective was a speech given by Mark Malloch Brown. The deputy secretary-general had the temerity to suggest that the US should face up to the deliberate ambiguities of its attitude to the UN. When it suited it, he said, Washington saw the organisation as a useful instrument to promote its interests. In between, it played to a raucous gallery of anti-UN prejudice among segments of the media and Middle America.

Mr Bolton is accustomed to plain language – as long, that is, as he is the one delivering it. The ambassador, I have heard a US official observe, is one of those people who calls a spade a spade. The downside, this official lamented, was that to Mr Bolton's eye almost everything looks like a spade.

So a UN bureaucrat telling America how to behave was never going to elicit a friendly response. Mr Bolton's temper has not been improved by the knowledge that the clock is ticking fast on his own career. He was sidelined by Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, in the recent decision to offer talks to Iran. A refusal by the US congress to ratify his appointment means that his term in New York expires early next year.

Given his role as an international civil servant, Mr Malloch Brown's observations were brave. In objective terms they were essentially unremarkable. The admonition, as he explained, was aimed at successive US administrations rather than simply

Mr Bush. Though the US had created the present global architecture, its politicians rarely felt comfortable with selling the advantages to their voters.

My guess is that there are no more than a handful of officials at the US state department who would balk at this broad analysis. Fitful engagement has rarely, if ever, served US interests. But, for Mr Bolton, Mr Malloch Brown's remarks exposed a deeper sore. The ambassador is right to say that the UN's largest paymaster has the capacity to wreck the organisation. The threat, though, is empty. The important question is whether the US needs an effective UN. The answer the Bush administration has given, pace Mr Bolton, is yes.

Iraq has shown the limits of military might in general and of American intervention in particular. As Mr Malloch Brown suggested, it has thrown up new international coalitions intent on balancing US power. Many of the sensible and necessary reforms of the UN advocated or supported by the US are opposed by some non-aligned nations simply because they bear Washington's stamp. Suspicion of his motives, in other words, has shackled a ball and chain to Mr Bush's ankle.

Mr Malloch Brown might have gone further. Anti-Americanism has become the principal countervailing force to US power. That was confirmed again this week when a 15-nation opinion poll by the Pew Research Center reported a further weakening of international respect for the US. In most nations, the US presence in Iraq is seen as a greater threat to world peace than Iran's nuclear ambitions.

All this is anathema to Mr Bolton. As an official in the state department, he epitomised the assertive nationalism that drove US foreign policy during Mr Bush's first term. Scornful of international institutions and law, he openly celebrated America's muscular unilateralism.

The administration has travelled halfway back from this position. It has accepted, albeit grudgingly, the value of legitimacy in the exercise of power. It still instinctively favours coalitions of the willing over rules-based multilateralism but has at least begun to make the effort.

The big test now is Iran. The suspicion of US motives to which Mr Malloch Brown alluded has weakened the impact of Washington's offer to join negotiations with Tehran. Many non-aligned nations are asking themselves whether the démarche is a genuine effort to secure a negotiated end to the stand-off over Iran's nuclear ambitions or simply a tactical manoeuvre to bind the UN into supporting punitive sanctions.

My guess is that it is a bit of both. Circumstance – a vast army pinned down in Iraq, the threat of violent confrontation between Israel and the Palestinians and evidence that the UN security council was close to fracture – forced a volte-face in Washington. But the success or otherwise of the new diplomatic effort will rest to a significant degree on the judgment of others on Mr Bush's motives.

Iran, of course, also provides a challenge for others. China insists on the exclusive legitimacy of the UN in the ordering of international relations. Its willingness or otherwise to allow the security council to act if Iran persists in the quest for a nuclear weapons capability will say much about whether China intends to become a responsible global actor.

For Russia's Vladimir Putin, the choice will be between the vanity of wielding a veto and real authority in the security council. The European troika of France, Britain and Germany must show that, when the going is tough, they are ready to give multilateralism a hard edge.

The big choice, though, is for the US. If the wilder ambitions of Mr Bolton have been decisively checked by Iraq, America remains the indispensable power. How it exercises that power determines the shape and stability of the global system. We can probably expect no more of this administration than its reluctant conversion to pragmatism. But one of these days an American president needs to explain that Roosevelt and Truman were not altruists. They built the UN because, for all its inevitable flaws, it serves American interests.

Move Over, Che: Chávez Is New Icon Of Radical Chic (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

BOSTON -- Hugo Chávez, the fiery president of Venezuela, has called President Bush a "donkey," a "coward," a "drunkard," and, most famously, "Mr. Danger." Such statements win him few friends in Washington, but they recently brought together a dozen ardent supporters here.

Over a cramped conference table in a Chinatown loft, the group, including several engineers, a student, a nurse and couple of full-time activists, met to plot their next move. They'd helped lead a pro-Chávez demonstration in Washington just a few weeks earlier. And a pro-Chávez movie night seemed old hat.

Jorge Marin, a Boston engineer, had a different idea: a birthday party for Mr. Chávez's idol, Simón Bolívar, who helped liberate South America from Spanish rule. They quickly started planning a "Boogie for Bolívar" party, complete with a birthday cake, on July 24, when "the Liberator" would have turned 223. Two young women also pushed for a dance band.

To a slice of the American left, Mr. Chávez has become a revolutionary hero nearly on a par with Che Guevara and Fidel Castro. The 51-year-old Venezuelan president has used his nation's oil riches to prop up Mr. Castro's regime and improve the education and health care of Venezuela's poor. His dream is to spread the Venezuelan brand of socialism across Latin America.

Human-rights groups and the Bush administration warn that he is also dangerously centralizing power, emasculating Venezuela's judiciary and threatening press freedoms. Chavistas wave off those complaints as the ravings of the anti-Chávez U.S. media.

"My political belief is that the U.S. is a horrendous empire that needs to end," says Jake Irwin, a Chávez supporter at Evergreen State College in Olympia, Wash., which is pretty much what Mr. Chávez argues. Every time Mr. Chávez clashes with Mr. Bush -- most recently over the Venezuelan's torpedoing of a U.S. effort to create a hemispheric free-trade agreement -- his stock rises with the amalgam of college students, antiglobalization protesters and graying allies of Central American rebels.

For 54-year-old Chuck Kaufman, national co-coordinator of the Nicaragua Network, Mr. Chávez is also a business opportunity. The network, run out of a converted grocery store near a housing project in Washington, was formed in 1979 to support the leftist Sandinista rebels, who toppled a U.S.-allied strongman. But after voters ousted the Sandinistas, the Nicaraguan network eventually slashed its staff to three from 13. Now, Mr. Kaufman sees a new market in Mr. Chávez. The bearded former advertising rep for a model-airplane magazine recently helped create the Venezuela Support Network, which he figures will energize backers, and may help him land a big-time donor: Venezuela's government-owned U.S. refiner, Citgo Petroleum Corp. "No luck so far," he says. Citgo says it only backs requests "in line with corporate programs."

Other Chávez supporters have formed support groups known as Bolivarian Circles. (Mr. Chávez is so taken with Bolívar's efforts to create a united South America that he renamed his country "The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.") In Venezuela, the circles are neighborhood associations that run local health clinics and literacy classes. They have a darker side, too: helping the government identify opponents, who are then denied remedial education and other government services, according to a study by Brigham Young University scholars Kirk Hawkins and David Hansen.

The 20 or so U.S. Bolivarian Circles, which each have one or two dozen members, view themselves as advocates for the Chávez regime. New York, San Diego and Boston have Bolivarian Circles; South Florida has three -- one each in Miami and Fort Lauderdale and a third at Florida International University in Miami-Dade County. So do places far from a Latin beat, including Cincinnati and Salem, Ore. The insignia of the Oregon Bolivarian circle is a bust of Bolívar in front of Mount Hood.

There is a long history of Americans embracing Latin American revolutionaries, dating at least to Nicaraguan rebel Augusto Sandino, who battled U.S. Marines in the 1920s. Others include Mr. Castro and his comrade Che, and the man known as Subcomandante Marcos, who led a short-lived rebellion in the Mexican state of Chiapas in 1994. All were symbols of defiance romanticized by intellectuals of the day.

Fifty-three-year-old Gunnar Gundersen says he formed the Oregon Bolivarian Circle in 2002, after becoming outraged at a failed coup attempt against Mr. Chávez. On annual trips to Venezuela with his Venezuela-born wife, Xiomara, Mr. Gundersen was impressed by Mr. Chávez's efforts to improve health care and education for the poor. He couldn't understand why the U.S. press didn't see it his way, so he and a dozen like-minded Oregonians began to sponsor pro-Chávez movies, college lectures and rallies.

His activities landed him an appearance on Mr. Chávez's Sunday television show, "Aló Presidente," in 2004. Mr. Gundersen, who often wears red knit shirts -- red being the color of the Chávez revolution -- read an English translation of a stanza of one of Mr. Chávez's favorite songs. Then he handed the Venezuelan leader a copy of the Oregon circle's nonprofit registration, which Mr. Gundersen claimed meant the Oregon circle was "recognized by the state of Oregon." Clearly touched, Mr. Chávez called him a "brother" and said to the audience, "Look how far this is going in the world."

Now, Mr. Gundersen, whose day job is managing a study-abroad program for Japanese college students in Oregon, figures he spends several thousand dollars a year crisscrossing the U.S. for pro-Chávez events. These included a March "National Solidarity Conference" in Washington, where the several hundred delegates chanted the Chávez rally cry, "Oh, ah. Chávez no se va!" (Roughly: "Oh, no. Chávez won't go!")

The Philadelphia circle has produced three pro-Chávez videos, including one about oil workers who helped keep the state-owned oil company operating despite an anti-Chávez strike. The Fort Lauderdale circle bought 35 wheelchairs for Venezuelan hospitals and, in return, the Venezuelan government sent 200 Spanish-language versions of "Don Quixote" for Broward County libraries. A Fort Lauderdale circle member, Ali Gutiérrez, broke into a Spanish love song as the books were handed over.

The circles aren't funded by the Venezuelan government, but they help the country's lobbying efforts by presenting a sympathetic face of the Chávez regime and helping organize tours of the country. Moisés Naím, a pre-Chávez Venezuelan trade minister who is now editor of Foreign Policy magazine, believes the circle members "are shamelessly exploited by the regime." But Bernardo Alvarez, Venezuela's ambassador to the U.S., says the groups operate on their own and "help us counteract the campaign that there isn't freedom of expression in Venezuela."

The circles applauded this past winter when Citgo says it provided about 40 million gallons of low-cost home heating oil to 181,000 households in the Northeast. So did True Majority, an Internet-based advocacy group founded by Ben Cohen of Ben and Jerry's fame, which sent emails to its 500,000 members urging them to purchase Citgo gasoline -- a "buy-cott," as activists call it.

Financing Controls Ordered In China (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

SHANGHAI, June 15 -- China's premier, Wen Jiabao, has ordered banks and local governments to tighten financing for construction projects, the state media reported Thursday, signaling growing unease among top leaders that an ongoing surge of investment is imperiling the world's fastest-growing major economy.

China's leaders are again grappling with the prospect that excessive economic growth -- erecting more factories and office towers than even this giant country can use -- could give way to a disastrous bust and cause prices to plunge. That could leave China's banks, stocked with about $500 billion in bad loans, facing an even larger toll.

"The main problem in the operation of the economy is the high growth rate of fixed asset investment and too much currency lending," declared China's State Council, the functional equivalent of a cabinet, in a statement published in the state media Thursday, the day after a meeting chaired by Wen. "Structural problems are obvious."

The latest cause for concern came as the government released figures showing that growth in fixed asset investments in urban areas -- essentially, large public works projects, factory construction and commercial real estate development -- reached $318 billion for the first five months of the year, up more than 30 percent over the previous period.

That data came a day after the release of numbers showing an alarming expansion of bank lending, with total loans for the first five months of the year reaching $224 billion -- about 85 percent of the central bank's target for the full year. In May alone, new loans exceeded $26 billion, almost double the same month in 2005. In China, where stock and bond markets remain in early stages of development, the banks are the primary source of capital.

"Banks must take notice of the trend of accelerating loan growth and the risks that this brings," the People's Bank of China declared on its Web site. "Banks must abide by the spirit of the macroeconomic controls that the central government is currently implementing."

Economists parsing the high-level rhetoric saw signals that new, more stringent measures are in the offing aimed at reining in the economy. China has already raised the minimum down payment for purchases of apartments to cool real estate speculation. On April 28, the central bank raised interest rates by 0.27 percentage points, to 5.85 percent, and it might now do so again. The bank's governor, Zhou Xiaochuan, recently disavowed that option, but he told reporters on the sidelines of a conference in Beijing on Thursday that he would now take some unspecified steps to limit the money supply, according to Dow Jones.

China might also allow a rise in the value of its currency, the renminbi, or yuan, an act long sought by manufacturing groups in the United States, who argue that Chinese factories are racking up huge export sales with unfair help from artificially cheap money.

DOJ_NMG_0035080

"The message sent by the State Council meeting is strong, and it illustrates their recognition of a possibly overheated economy," said Ha Jiming, chief economist at China International Capital Corporation Ltd., the country's largest investment bank. "Policymakers are determined to step in to control the situation."

Much of the cash now sloshing through the banks is the result of speculators bringing currency into China to bet on an eventual increase in the value of the renminbi, Ha said. "Policymakers could remove the heat from the economy by speeding up the process" of allowing the Chinese currency to climb, he said.

Of particular concern to China's leaders is the prospect that greater waves of investment will worsen a glut of production capacity in key sectors of the economy, particularly in automobile and steel manufacturing, which could diminish prices and erode profits.

That is prompting some companies to unload excess goods on world markets, a trend that partially explains why China's global trade surplus is growing faster than ever. China's trade surplus reached $13 billion in May, the government announced this week, a record for a single month. Exports grew by 25 percent compared with the previous year. That brought China's surplus for the year to $47 billion, a jump of 57 percent compared with the same period last year.

Those figures are sure to intensify trade frictions with the United States, while amplifying demands that China raise the value of its money.

For more than two years, China has been grappling with how to gradually restrain its economy without dampening things so much as to jeopardize the creation of jobs for millions of farmers now streaming into the cities. Two years ago, amid worries of overheating and spiking prices for commodities such as coal and iron ore, Beijing ordered a halt in lending to the fastest-growing areas of the economy. China also forced developers to put down larger slices of their own capital for new projects rather than rely entirely on bank loans.

Late last year, those measures appeared to have put China in reach of a soft landing, the gradual slowdown its leaders desired. But the recent data have has rekindled worries, along with the expectation of stronger measures ahead.

"There have to be measures to contain the desire of local governments to invest more in infrastructure while preventing banks from over-lending," said Zuo Xiaolei, chief economist at China Galaxy Securities Co. in Beijing. "Otherwise, medium- and long-term bad debts will pile up. and overcapacity in sectors like steel and cement will be exacerbated."

Who Is To Blame For Grief On A Beach? (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, June 16, 2006

It was another one of those pictures that goes instantly around the world. A young Palestinian, wailing in wretched sorrow, grieving over her dead father, stepmother and five siblings who had been killed by an explosion on a Gaza beach. Then came the blame. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas (he's the moderate) immediately called the killings an act of Israeli "genocide" and, to dramatize the crime, legally adopted the bereaved girl.

The sensational coverage and sensational charges raise the obvious question: Why would Israel deliberately shell a peaceful family on a beach?

The Israeli government, clumsy as ever, seemed to semi-apologize by expressing regret about the deaths, implying that perhaps they had been caused by an errant Israeli shell targeting a Palestinian rocket base. But then, a few days later, an army investigation concluded that it was not Israel's doing at all.

First, because the shrapnel taken from the victims (treated at Israeli hospitals -- some "genocide") were not the ordnance used in Israeli artillery. Second, because aerial photography revealed no crater that could have been caused by Israeli artillery. And, third, because Israel could account for five of the six shells it launched at the rocket base nearby, and the missing one had been launched at least five minutes before the one that killed the family.

An expert at a local chapter of a human rights group disputes the Israeli claims. Okay. Let's concede for the sake of argument that the question of whether it was an errant Israeli shell remains unresolved. But the obvious question not being asked is this: Who is to blame if Palestinians are setting up rocket launchers to attack Israel -- and placing them 400 yards from a beach crowded with Palestinian families on the Muslim Sabbath?

Answer: This is another example of the Palestinians' classic and cowardly human-shield tactic -- attacking innocent Israeli civilians while hiding behind innocent Palestinian civilians. For Palestinian terrorists -- and the Palestinian governments (both Fatah and Hamas) that allow them to operate unmolested -- it's a win-win: If their rockets aimed into Israeli towns kill innocent Jews, no one abroad notices and it's another success in the terrorist war against Israel. And if Israel's preventive and deterrent attacks on those rocket bases inadvertently kill Palestinian civilians, the iconic "Israeli massacre" picture makes the front page of the New York Times, and the Palestinians win the propaganda war.

But there is an even larger question not asked. Whether the rocket bases are near civilian beaches or in remote areas, why are the Gazans launching any rockets at Israel in the first place -- about 1,000 in the past year?

To get Israel to remove its settlers, end the occupation and let the Palestinians achieve dignity and independence? But Israel did exactly that in Gaza last year. It completely evacuated Gaza, dismantled all its military installations, removed its soldiers, destroyed all Israeli settlements and expelled all 7,000 Israeli settlers. Israel then declared the line that separates Israel from Gaza to be an international frontier. Gaza became the first independent Palestinian territory ever.

And what have the Palestinians done with this independence, this judenrein territory under the Palestinians' control? They have used their freedom to launch rockets at civilians in nearby Israeli towns.

Why? Because the Palestinians prefer victimhood to statehood. They have demonstrated that for 60 years, beginning with their rejection of the United Nations decision to establish a Palestinian state in 1947 because it would have also created a small Jewish state next door. They declared war instead.

Half a century later, at the Camp David summit with President Bill Clinton, Israel renewed the offer of a Palestinian state -- with its capital in Jerusalem, with not a single Jewish settler remaining in Palestine, and on a contiguous territory encompassing 95 percent of the West Bank (Israel making up the other 5 percent with pieces of Israel proper).

The Palestinian answer? War again -- Yasser Arafat's terror war, aka the second intifada, which killed a thousand Jews.

This embrace of victimhood, of martyrdom, of blood and suffering, is the Palestinian disease. They are offered an independent state. They are given all of Gaza. And they respond with rocket attacks into peaceful Israeli towns -- in pre-1967 Israel proper, mind you.

What can Israel do but try to take out those rocket bases and their crews? What would the United States do if rockets were raining into San Diego from across the border with Mexico?

Now look again at that terrible photograph and ask yourself: Who is responsible for the heart-rending grief of that poor Palestinian girl?

A Tale Of Two Oil Patches (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

Canada's province of Alberta and the country of Mexico are both renowned oil economies and in both places, the government owns the oil reserves. But that's where the similarities between the two end.

Alberta has an annual per-capita gross domestic product just shy of $55,000; Mexico's is roughly $6,000. To put it another way, Albertans are swimming in their black gold while Mexicans are swimming the Rio Grande for the right to wash dishes for Tom Tancredo's constituents, while the congressman hurls insults at them on cable TV.

Why, in the midst of this energy boom, is Mexico so poor, while Alberta lives large? My guess is that it has to do with the fact that the Canadian province welcomes private-sector investment (otherwise known as money) in its energy sector while Mexico has a government-owned oil monopoly (Pemex) and forbids private-sector risk capital.

Money in an economy has a way of making people wealthier. Alberta estimates the long-term capital investment value of its inventory of privately funded energy projects at almost $80 billion. Mexico has made such investment illegal, creating a lack of funds. We call this poverty.

The idea of a virtual wall to stop risk capital from entering Mexico is so dumb that only a political class actively pursuing poverty could be perpetuating it in today's global economy. With oil at $70 a barrel, the opportunity costs of Mexico's monopoly energy policy are skyrocketing. That's not the only problem. Pemex's union pensions are unfunded and Mexico's proven reserves are shrinking. If nothing is done to change the model, Mexico's oil sector and Pemex retirees are both in real jeopardy.

Yet for some reason this abject failure -- against the reality of Alberta's success -- has yet to become a winning issue in Mexican politics. In the July 2 presidential race, the hard-left candidate of the Democratic Revolutionary Party, Andres Manuel López Obrador, is running on a pledge to protect Pemex as is.

This champion of old, authoritarian Mexico from the desperately poor, oil-rich state of Tabasco is now in a statistical dead heat with the more free-market National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon. Mr. Calderon has timidly suggested that, yes, perhaps Mexico might open the energy market to some private investment but he has not made it a major issue in the campaign.

Voters are rational but not necessarily informed. That's what political debate is for. Unfortunately, Mexican politicians seem to have concluded that Pemex -- the Mexican symbol of sovereignty against the mighty North -- is the third rail of politics and it's best not to go near it. If that's the case, the past is prologue.

But if some enterprising politician decides to communicate the magnitude of the problems looming at Pemex and the opportunity cost of failing to reform, Mexico could become something besides the international symbol for human-capital exports. The union might even sign onto reform in return for guaranteeing its pension. The Alberta experience is instructive.

Mexicans may be surprised to learn that despite the rush of private-sector investment in the province, both oil and gas reserves in Alberta belong to the provincial government, much as they belong to the national government in Mexico. This simple fact is bound to reassure a nation that has been brainwashed for nearly a century to believe that private investment means giving away its "oil patrimony."

In Alberta, provincial ownership has not stopped private exploration. Instead, Albertans are having their cake and eating it too. By utilizing land leases and oil-well licensing permits, the province welcomes billions of dollars of risk capital. This in turn employs people, creates secondary and tertiary wealth effects, pays for exploration, increases provincial revenues through royalties and covers the cost of land reclamation after resources are extracted. In other words, there has been no selling out to Yankee exploiters, only a common-sense policy of putting foreign capital to use for the betterment of the locals.

The results are impressive. Last year alone, the province attracted almost $50 billion in investment, going mostly to oil and gas and oil-sands development projects and to the service and manufacturing sectors that support them.

These two starkly different attitudes toward capital flows have also made for polar opposites in migratory and employment patterns. According to the Conference Board of Canada, Alberta's population is growing "by leaps and bounds." The board says that "net inter-provincial migration surged to 42,000 in 2005, and almost as many people are expected to relocate in the province in 2006." The board further states that despite the migration, "labor shortages are looming in key areas such as construction, drilling and engineering services, and even in lower paying service-oriented occupations." The unemployment rate in Alberta is 3.3%. Meanwhile Mexican culture is still too often defined by poverty, joblessness and emigration.

If all this is not enough to persuade Mexicans that their government is taking them for a ride, perhaps the demise of Pemex as a revenue generator will be. Pemex estimates that Mexico's reserves-to-production ratio dropped to 10 years in 2005 from 20 years in 2002. The company blames the central government for this, on the grounds that oil income has been going to other national purposes at the expense of reinvestment and exploration in the oil sector.

That may be true. But since when does a country have to choose between a robust economy and funding health care, education and infrastructure? And even when Pemex wins out over other demands on the central government and gets a relatively generous budgetary allotment like it did this year -- $13 billion in government and government-guaranteed funding -- the company is far short of what is needed to revive the energy sector. Corruption, low productivity and failure to maximize well development have all eaten away at returns. Did I mention that Pemex is notorious for environmental degradation?

Mexico's President Vicente Fox likes to talk about his concerns for the dignity of Mexican migrants in the U.S. But as long as the country clings to the Pemex monopoly, it will be hard to take Mr. Fox or any Mexican president seriously when he feigns concern for jobless Mexicans.

Icarus Inc. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 16, 2006

With the Concorde now mothballed or in museums, Airbus is fast becoming the current airborne testament to the hubris of state-led industrial policy in Europe. Driven as much by political ego as business sense, the aircraft maker flew for the sun only, like Icarus, to see its wings start to melt away.

The meltdown in the stock price of its parent company this week was dramatic, but no surprise. Markets don't like bad news, and Airbus has produced bushels of late. Wednesday's 26% drop, which shaved $6.3 billion from the market value of European Aeronautic Defense & Space Co. before rebounding some yesterday, came a day after Airbus announced that its superjumbo A380 won't be produced on schedule through 2010. Delays have plagued this marquee project.

Airlines are unhappy with Airbus's proposed A350, the competitor to Boeing's surprisingly popular 787 "Dreamliner," forcing the Europeans back to the drawing board, at significant cost. The EU taxpayer may, once again, pick up a big part of the bill through launch aid and other handouts, all for the glory of this "pan-European flagship." Any more state aid is likely to lead to another complaint against Airbus before the World Trade Organization in Geneva.

The troubles on the factory floor may not be as serious a problem down the road as the company's unwieldy -- and, on current evidence, unworkable -- management structure. Airbus was born of a French, German, British and Spanish government initiative. Its political patrons have kept their noses in the business since. No prize for guessing who does so more than any other. Last year President Jacques Chirac tried to install Airbus boss Noël Forgeard, who happens to be French, into the top job at EADS. The messy fight ended when a German executive was named to share the CEO job with him. Then this year EADS was pulled into France's scandal du jour, the murky "Clearstream affair," when Mr. Forgeard's former close aide admitted to supplying evidence (later declared a forgery) that linked leading politicians to corruption. Close ties to government can be a source of trouble, EADS learned, not just interest-free loans.

A fair conclusion, reached by the markets this week, is that an executive suite preoccupied with political mumbo-jumbo took its eyes off the superjumbo. With so much riding on the A380, the production glitches are a stunning indictment of management. The delays in delivering the plane will cost EADS $2.5 billion in 2007-2010. EADS yesterday launched a probe into the A380 program. The cost in terms of fines, canceled orders and lost future orders adds to the bill. The blow to prestige is far bigger.

It is instructive to note that Boeing itself was, only a few years ago, in a similar pickle. Two CEOs lost their jobs and a senior executive landed in jail, but Boeing got through painful restructuring, including deep job cuts, and made hard decisions (like refusing to fight Airbus for the A380 market) knowing that money was finite. Its updated product line is led by the "Dreamliner." Suddenly, Boeing is poised to dominate its market for years to come.

In its present guise Airbus, or EADS, looks ill-disposed to take this road. The dual management structure -- in fact an improvement on the previous consortium model -- makes the company, by nature, less flexible. So do its political links. State treasuries have been eager to build toys that boost national egos, to the tune of $15 billion in taxpayer handouts over the past three decades. The leaders of France, Britain, Spain and Germany were all on hand last year at the maiden flight of the A380. Financial realism was never a big part of the equation at Airbus. In return, the politicians expect the company to shun Anglo-Saxon-style restructuring.

No wonder that the big industrial shareholders are running for the doors. British Aerospace was right in the middle of negotiating to sell its 20% stake in Airbus back to EADS when the share price nosedived. France's Lagardere cut its stake in EADS in half, to 15%, in April. Germany's DaimlerChrylser, another big owner, is moving to do the same.

Tellingly, Airbus's fall from grace is portrayed as a blow to European pride rather than to the company's shareholders and millions of air travelers, who will suffer directly. This is the real trans-Atlantic gap. Americans tend to judge corporations by the bottom line, not the national flag. Europeans relate to big companies as to their World Cup teams. In this they get plenty of encouragement from politicians, in particular the Gallic variety, who think business is their business.

With a duopoly in aircraft manufacturing, we all benefit from having two healthy, competitive producers. Cut free from subsidies and politics, Airbus would be free to behave like a normal company. It is not that today.

Young? Bored? Win A Parliament Seat (NYT)

The New York Times, June 16, 2006

If the young will line up to sing badly for national attention or eat worms for money, why not get them to compete for political office? That notion seems more suitable for a Hollywood treatment than an actual country, but it has apparently taken hold in parts of Russia, where political leaders have begun to worry that their Parliament is a little too heavy on middle-aged men.

Perhaps fearing that the under-30 set could take their political concerns to the streets — as in neighboring Ukraine and Georgia — President Putin's United Russia party decided it needed to reroute the young into the political system. So it decided earlier this year that at least 20 percent of its candidates should be under 28 years old.

Scaring up young people to enter the political party apparently turned out to be easier decreed than done. Russia's youth may have soured on a political system increasingly controlled from Mr. Putin's office. Or, perhaps like the young in too many other places, they just think politics is boring.

So, leaders of the Young Guard, the more youthful branch of United Russia party, decided on a kind of political version of "American Idol" or the Russian "Star Factory" talent contest. As detailed in The Washington Post, the competition began with questionnaires, and a first round of winners was announced by a D.J. at a beach party south of Moscow.

Some of the views of these competitors were surprising, like the young man who said Mikhail Khodorkovsky was jailed for his political views. That opinion certainly puts him at odds with Mr. Putin's administration, but the young man is apparently still in the running. In the end, after the 60 contestants are whittled down, at least three are expected to be awarded party seats in the Duma, the lower house of Parliament.

Russian politics is not exactly a model of democracy, of course, but maybe, for those trying to interest young American voters, a political reality show might not be such a bad idea. Let's face it, looking at the demographics, it could hardly hurt.

Good morning. Did you know that on Friday evenings in the summer you can enjoy free jazz concerts in the National Gallery of Art's Sculpture Garden? This summer, the National Gallery will host an eclectic mix of top Washington-area jazz artists every Friday from 5 - 8:30 p.m. Concerts take place in front of the Pavilion Café next to the reflecting pool and fountain. The Café offers a light menu and an assortment of beverages for those who are interested. Feel free to stop by -- you're sure to see some fellow DOJers. For more information, see: http://www.nga.gov/programs/jazz.htm. Have a great day.

President Bush Establishes Northwestern Hawaii Islands Marine National Monument. "President Bush created a vast new marine sanctuary Thursday, extending stronger federal protections to the northwest Hawaiian Islands and the surrounding waters with their endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument covers an archipelago 1,400 miles long and 100 miles wide in the Pacific Ocean. It is home to more than 7,000 species, at least one-fourth of them found nowhere else. 'To put this area in context, this national monument is more than 100 times larger than Yosemite National Park,' Bush said. 'It's larger than 46 of our 50 states, and more than seven times larger than all our national marine sanctuaries combined. This is a big deal.'

The New York Times Praises President Bush's Declaration Establishing Marine National Monument. "Mr. Bush has made the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands a national monument, putting them under some of the strictest environmental protections the law provides. It was an act of wilderness preservation that, acre for acre, instantly put him into the same league as the conservation-minded presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/06/16/opinion/16fri2.html?_r=1&oref=slogin> . ... But even so, the mind reels a little at what Mr. Bush has done. The Northwestern Hawaiian Islands are a vast place few Americans have ever visited or ever will. But they are being protected anyway - not for divers, fishermen or cruise ships, but for their own sake, for science and forever." (Editorial, "Islands Apart," The New York Times, 6/16/06)

The Washington Post Calls Establishment Of Marine National Monument "Exciting Example Of Assertive Action." "What's impressive is not just the designation itself but the fine print of President Bush's order. Despite tenacious pressure from regional fisheries managers, Mr. Bush decided not to permit any commercial fishing in the area. The small amount that goes on now will be phased out; a coalition of private donors will buy out the fishing permits of the eight fishermen who currently work those waters. ... Hospital Chain to Pay $265M to Settle Whistleblower Suits

Shannon P. Duffy

A New Jersey hospital chain will pay $265 million to settle a pair of whistleblower lawsuits that claimed it had systematically inflated charges to Medicare patients in order to obtain enhanced reimbursements,

Justice Department lawyers said Thursday.

According to court papers, the massive settlement by Saint Barnabas Corp. -- the largest health care system in New Jersey and second largest employer in the state -- could be just the first in a wave because numerous other unidentified hospitals are apparently facing similar accusations.

The settlement could also lead to huge rewards for the three whistleblowers, who are represented by Philadelphia attorneys Peter F. Vaira and John E. Riley of Vaira & Riley, and Marc S. Raspanti of Miller Alfano & Raspanti.

In the suits, the whistleblowers claimed Saint Barnabas was abusing a Medicare provision that provides for supplemental payments for unusually expensive cases, referred to as "outliers."

Justice Department lawyers said yesterday that between October 1995 and August 2003, the nine hospitals operated by West Orange, N.J.-based Saint Barnabas "purposefully inflated charges for inpatient and outpatient care to make these cases appear more costly than they actually were."

Whistleblower lawsuits, also known as qui tam actions, allege claims under the False Claims Act. Initially, such cases are filed under seal and immediately referred to the local U.S. Attorney in order to give the Justice Department the option of pursuing the case. The two suits that led to Thursday's settlement were only partially unsealed, suggesting that other hospitals may also have been named as defendants.

A redacted copy of one of the lawsuits, unsealed by U.S. District Judge Juan R. Sanchez, shows that the identities of numerous additional defendants have been blacked out. Sanchez ordered that the original version of the suit must remain under seal.

In a press release, Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler, head of the Justice Department's Civil Division, said, "Today's settlement demonstrates the United States' determination to make sure health care providers do not overcharge the Medicare program."

In the settlement, Saint Barnabas did not admit to any wrongdoing, but it entered into a "corporate integrity agreement" in which it promised to take a series of steps to ensure compliance with Medicare regulations and policies in the future.

Vaira and Riley filed suit in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia on behalf of two whistleblowers, Peter Salvatori and Sara C. Iverson.

Raspanti filed a similar suit in U.S. District Court in New Jersey on behalf of James T. Monahan.

Both suits were filed in November 2002 and apparently sparked a massive federal investigation involving both the Philadelphia and New Jersey U.S. Attorney's offices; the Justice Department's Civil Division in Washington, D.C.; the FBI; the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Inspector General; the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; and the U.S. Postal inspectors.

Riley declined to comment on the settlement, saying he was unsure whether or not court documents had yet been unsealed. Raspanti was out of town and could not be reached for comment.

Justice Department lawyers also had no comment on the size of the reward that will be paid to the whistleblowers.

The settlement agreement filed in court yesterday specifically leaves the issue of the rewards for another day.

"Nothing in this agreement is intended to address any [whistleblower's] entitlement to a share of the settlement amount or the validity of either of the civil actions," the settlement says.

Sometimes the issue of a whistleblower's reward can lead to protracted litigation. In the late 1990s, when SmithKline Beecham paid $325 million to settle a trio of whistleblower suits, Justice Department lawyers argued that no rewards should be paid since all of the information provided by the whistleblowers was already public.

But Senior U.S. District Judge Donald W. VanArtsdalen rejected the government's argument and awarded $42 million to the three whistleblowers.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later overturned the awards and ordered VanArtsdalen to take another look at whether any of the three was truly an "original source."

VanArtsdalen later ruled that only one of the three should get any money, saying that two of the three were "original sources," but that only one, Robert Merena, had the right to a reward since his lawsuit was the first filed.

The suits involved allegations that SmithKline Beecham Clinical Laboratories and several other medical laboratories had adopted a scheme that allowed them to bill the federal government for unauthorized and unnecessary laboratory tests.

In his September 2000 decision, VanArtsdalen awarded Merena more than $24 million -- a 10 percent cut of the portion of the settlement to which his information led.

Merena, who was represented by Raspanti, ultimately garnered nearly $37 million for his whistleblowing efforts because on six other claims for which the government agreed Merena deserved an award, he was paid $11 million and VanArtsdalen added another $1.9 million.

But VanArtsdalen ruled that another former SmithKline employee, Charles Robinson Jr., and his lawyer, Glenn Grossenbacher, who had assisted him in blowing the whistle, were not entitled to any reward due to the strict "first to file" rule in the False Claims Act.

Scheme costs hospitals $265M

Saint Barnabas Corp., operator of the state's largest health-care network, has agreed to pay the U.S. government $265 million in an unprecedented Medicare fraud settlement.

The Saint Barnabas Health Care System, New Jersey's largest, was accused of overbilling Medicare half a billion dollars by exploiting a loophole in the system that provides additional reimbursement in cases -- known as "outliers" -- when the cost of care is unusually high.

The scheme drew from a fixed pool of money that Congress had set aside for outliers, shortchanging other hospitals in New Jersey and elsewhere. Besides bilking Medicare, the overbilling affected tens of thousands of patients, many of them uninsured and least able to pay inflated bills.

The first settlement of its kind in the country, the Saint Barnabas case may serve as a direct model for a Justice Department crackdown on similar practices at other hospitals, said First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ralph J. Marra Jr.

Federal officials say the hospital network inflated the charges for tens of thousands of outlier cases -- padding the bills for room and board costs and other overhead expenses -- from October 1995 to August 2003.

"They did not view it as breaking the law. They viewed it as flexibility in the system," Marra said. The government isn't pursuing criminal charges against Saint Barnabas, he said.

Instead, Saint Barnabas will hire an outside firm to monitor its billing practices for six years as part of a corporate integrity agreement with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. During that time, the hospital network will pay off the $265 million -- an amount the Justice Department determined the network could afford.

"We don't want to put them out of business," said Marra, noting that the fraud had no impact on patient care. "That wouldn't be good for the people of the state."

During the eight years Saint Barnabas allegedly was overbilling, the hospital network received $4.145 billion in total Medicare reimbursements, authorities said.

Congress introduced outlier money to ensure that hospitals had an incentive not to turn away the sickest patients, who might require longer-term care. The reimbursements go to hospitals to cover the cost of care and overhead, such as room and board, authorities said.

Several hospitals throughout the country nonetheless found ways to pad their outlier bills, prompting Congress to tighten the regulations in 2003 and ending many overbillings.

The state's second-largest employer, Saint Barnabas, based in Livingston, operates nine hospitals. Several of them are among the largest Medicare providers in the country.

"This agreement will allow us to focus our energy and resources on our mission of providing the highest quality of care to our patients," Saint Barnabas spokesman Michael Slusarz said in a written statement. "We are pleased this matter is now behind us and look forward to continuing to serve the citizens of New Jersey."

The higher charges clearly produced an enormous windfall for the hospital network.

Medicare, the federal health plan for the aged and disabled, typically generates 40 percent to 50 percent of a hospital's revenue stream, so any opportunity to enhance that cash flow would greatly influence a hospital's bottom line.

As Saint Barnabas collected more than its share of Medicare outlier reimbursements, it effectively lowered what other hospitals in New Jersey and elsewhere could have received, hospital executives said. "The hospitals that doubled and tripled their charges got more than their fair share, and that means the rest of us got less," said one North Jersey hospital executive who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We saw our outlier reimbursements reduced."

The overbilling also affected thousands of patients treated in the Barnabas system, especially those who were uninsured and were charged the same inflated rates as Medicare was billed. Such additional costs could be financially devastating for a small percentage of insured patients who rely on traditional indemnity policies and don't enjoy the steep discounts negotiated by managed-care plans.

"If [St. Barnabas] was alive today, he would surely be ashamed of what has been done in his name," said Leslie Wiser, special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark office.

The Saint Barnabas case came to the attention of the U.S. Attorney's Office in 2002, when three whistle-blowers filed two federal lawsuits under seal against the hospital network. U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie removed himself from the case because his family's charitable foundation donated money to Saint Barnabas.

Although the civil settlement resolves the whistle-blower cases against Saint Barnabas, portions of the case against other defendants remain active and under seal.

The whistle-blowers -- one of whom is identified as the owner of a financial management consulting company -- are entitled to between 15 percent and 25 percent of the government's settlement under the False Claims Act. The exact amount hadn't yet been determined.

In another New Jersey case that made headlines recently, the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey overbilled Medicare and Medicaid as much as $75 million, federal authorities said. The institution has repaid $4.9 million to Medicaid while an investigation continues.

How it worked

- From October 1995 to August 2003, Saint Barnabas hospitals filed tens of thousands of claims under Medicare's outlier program.
- Exploiting a loophole, the hospital network allegedly padded overhead expenses to bilk half a billion dollars from Medicare.
- The alleged overbilling cheated uninsured patients, who then had to pay the inflated Medicare rates. Also cheated were hospitals that lost their share of outlier money.
- In 2002, three whistle-blowers filed two federal lawsuits under seal against Saint Barnabas.

Payout set on RMC suits; $494 million deal ends wrangling over questioned heart treatments

By David Benda, Record Searchlight

Attorneys have signed off on a global settlement that brings the total payout in the Redding Medical Center case to nearly a half-billion dollars.

The settlement had been stalled for seven months. It officially ends the multiyear federal criminal investigation of the defunct hospital and allegations that some of the surgeons and cardiologists performed unnecessary cardiac procedures there.

The deal was finalized Wednesday after attorneys for the hospital and several doctors, including Chae Hyun Moon, 58, and Fidel Realyvasquez Jr., 57, finalized an agreement announced Nov. 15 after federal prosecutors decided that no criminal charges would be lodged.

"We're done. Signed, sealed and delivered," said assistant U.S. Attorney Catherine Cerna after she filed the final dismissal documents Thursday.

A federal court had given the parties 60 days to finalize the November agreement, and Cerna had been forced to file for a number of deadline extensions. Despite the many delays, Cerna said, the final documents contained "no major changes" from those agreed upon in November.

The sheer number of parties and cases involved slowed completion of the case, she said.

The final settlement adds to the millions of dollars already paid in civil settlements by RMC, its parent company, Tenet Healthcare Corp., and insurance companies for the doctors.

Earlier, Tenet and RMC had paid $54 million to settle state and federal civil investigations and $395 million to settle lawsuits lodged by 769 patients who alleged that they had undergone unnecessary cardiac procedures, including multiple coronary bypasses.

Insurance companies for three cardiovascular surgeons and four cardiologists, including Moon and Realyvasquez, agreed to pay $42 million to settle the civil lawsuits.

Although they agreed to pay $1.4 million each to the federal government in the global settlement, Moon and Realyvasquez admitted no wrongdoing. Nor did any of the other participants in the agreement.

"Dr. Moon is happy to have it all behind him," Moon attorney Matthew Jacobs said Thursday. "Hopefully, it closes a sad chapter for the greater Redding area, which lost an excellent hospital and two fine and dedicated physicians, not to mention a wonderful support staff. It's not a happy day for the community."

Realyvasquez's attorney could not be reached for comment.

Redding Medical Center was sold in July 2004 to North Carolina-based Hospital Partners of America, which renamed the hospital Shasta Regional Medical Center and revived the cardiovascular services that had been dropped after the investigation began.

FBI agents raided the offices of Moon and Realyvasquez on Oct. 30, 2002. What followed was three years of criminal investigation and hundreds of civil lawsuits.

This week's signed agreement also awards millions of dollars to whistleblowers, including $4,457,938 to former Redding internist Patrick Campbell, who provided much of the information that prompted the October 2002 FBI raid that opened the investigation.

Another $4,924,562 will be awarded to whistleblowers Joseph Zerga of Las Vegas and the Rev. John Corapi, a Roman Catholic priest who now lives in Montana.

Campbell, whose federal whistleblower suit was filed three days after Corapi and Zerga's, once had been ruled out of the running, but the settlement resolved legal action he had taken for reinstatement.

"Dr. Campbell risked his reputation and medical career by doing the right thing and ended up paying the ultimate whistleblower price," David Rude, Campbell's attorney, said. "Four years later, the Justice Department is finally paying him the whistleblower reward he has so long deserved."

Both Moon and Realyvasquez remain under investigation by the state medical board.

Moon voluntarily agreed to stop practicing medicine in July 2003.

Last month, the Medical Board of California moved to revoke or suspend the license of Realyvasquez, charging him with gross negligence stemming from bypass surgeries he performed on three patients in 2001 and 2002.

And there are still a few civil cases outstanding against cardiovascular surgeon Kevin Miller, who was not involved in the federal case, but was sued by some of his former patients.

Trials are scheduled to begin in January in Shasta County Superior Court.

Honeywell agrees to pay U.S. $2.6 Million

By JEFFREY GOLD, AP Business Writer

NEWARK, N.J. - Honeywell International Inc. has paid the federal government $2.625 million to settle charges it failed to properly test packaging for sensitive parts used by the Defense Department and NASA , authorities said Thursday.

Honeywell was accused of violating the False Claims Act over testing of electrostatic protective metallic sheets that were to package more than 186,000 sensitive parts, the Justice Department said.

The lawsuit charged that Honeywell knowingly made and sold sheets that did not meet military specifications. Honeywell disputed the allegations, said court papers unsealed with the settlement.

The deal was approved May 22 by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise in Newark.

During the course of a prior lawsuit between the two companies, Caltex and its vice president, Jim Higgs, determined that Honeywell was selling goods to the military that had not gone through proper testing, Klein said.

Shares of Honeywell, which have been trading in a 52-week range of $32.68 to $44.48 per share, rose 62 cents, or 1.6 percent, to $38.64 in afternoon trading Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

New Jersey Demands Data on Phone Call Surveillance and Is Sued by U.S.

DAVID W. CHEN and MATT RICHTEL; David W. Chen, in Trenton, and Matt Richtel, in San Francisco, contributed reporting for this article.

TRENTON, June 15 The New Jersey attorney general has issued subpoenas to five telephone companies to determine whether any of them violated the state's consumer protection laws by providing records to the National Security Agency. Experts say it is the first legal move by a state to question the agency's program to compile calling records to track terrorist activities.

On Wednesday, the United States filed a lawsuit to block the subpoenas, setting up a legal showdown pitting the state's authority to protect consumers' rights against the federal government's national security powers.

"People in New Jersey and people everywhere have privacy rights," the state's attorney general, Zulima V. Farber, said on Thursday. "What we were trying to determine was whether the phone companies in New Jersey had violated any law or any contractual obligations with their consumers by supplying information to some government entity, simply by request, and not by any court order or search warrant."

This latest confrontation over the invocation of national security began last month, when Ms. Farber issued the subpoenas to the companies -- AT&T, Verizon, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Cingular Wireless -- to determine whether they had turned over the phone records to the federal government without a court order, in possible violation of state laws.

But when the Justice Department filed suit in United States District Court here to block those subpoenas -- a suit that Ms. Farber received on Thursday -- it asserted that the state was straying into a federal matter, and that compliance with the subpoenas would imperil national security.

As a matter of national security policy, the dispute represents the latest twist in the controversy over the boundaries of domestic spying and personal privacy. But as a matter of government practice and legal precedent, the dispute is significant because it transforms what had primarily been a fight between the federal government and civil liberties groups into a far knottier one pitting federal authorities against state ones.

Clifford Fishman, a professor at Catholic University Law School who is an expert on electronic-surveillance law, also said the actions by both state and federal government were laden with political overtones.

Professor Fishman said New Jersey's subpoenas -- issued by a Democratic administration -- appeared to be "a political move to try to embarrass the Bush administration as well as the phone companies." But he added that "the Bush administration is responding with a howitzer instead of a sniper."

The professor, who noted that he had not seen the government's suit, said each party had alternatives to what he saw as a significant development over the disputed reach of the National Security Agency. He said the federal government need not have sued New Jersey to make its argument against the subpoenas, and he said the state could have allowed numerous private parties to pursue litigation against the phone companies, rather than getting involved.

In the lawsuit, the federal government invokes the state-secrets privilege, in which the government asserts that any discussion of a given lawsuit's claims would threaten national security.

"Compliance with the subpoenas issued by those officers would first place the carriers in a position of having to confirm or deny the existence of information that cannot be confirmed or denied without causing exceptionally grave harm to national security," Assistant United States Attorney Irene Dowdy claimed in the government's complaint. "And if particular carriers are indeed supplying foreign intelligence information to the federal government, compliance with the subpoenas would require disclosure of the details of that activity."

But in an interview on Thursday, Ms. Farber said that it was incumbent upon her to insure that the phone companies were not violating state law if they had turned in any phone records to the N.S.A. The New York Times first reported in December that President Bush had authorized the security agency to conduct eavesdropping without warrants. Last month, USA Today reported that the N.S.A. had created a large database of phone calls made by customers of several phone companies.

A few days after the USA Today article was published, Ms. Farber issued subpoenas to phone companies that operate in New Jersey. Yet few people outside of state government and the phone companies knew about them.

Ms. Farber had originally demanded responses by May 30. She said that telephone company representatives, unable to persuade her to withdraw the subpoenas, had asked for an extension until Thursday. One day before that extended deadline, the federal government filed its lawsuit.

The question of whether phone companies have turned over customer records to the spy agency already has spawned a handful of lawsuits. Some companies have denied surrendering the records; others denied wrongdoing or declined to comment. For instance, a federal judge in San Francisco has scheduled a hearing for next Friday in a lawsuit filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a privacy-rights advocacy group that seeks to enjoin phone companies from turning over records and seeks damages for affected customers.

Selim Bingol, a spokesman for AT&T, said that the lawsuit filed by the federal government to block New Jersey's subpoenas showed that the phone companies should not be the ones that have to address these policy issues.

The American Civil Liberties Union has filed complaints in 22 states demanding that attorneys general and utility regulators officials investigate whether consumer protection laws have been violated. Officials in a few states in addition to New Jersey. including Vermont, Maine and Washington, have promised to investigate.

"All we're really trying to do is to make sure that the phone companies have followed the law," said David J. O'Brien, Vermont's commissioner of the Department of Public Service.

But none had gone as far as New Jersey, according to Barry Steinhardt, director of the A.C.L.U.'s Technology and Liberty Project.

According to some critics, one potential weakness of the government's state-secrets claim is that Ms. Farber -- as well as Gov. Jon S. Corzine and Richard L. Canas, the state director of homeland security -- has top federal security clearance, and might well not divulge any sensitive national security information she received as a result of the subpoenas.

"Our state officials are cleared for security purposes all the time," said Bruce Afran, a lawyer in Princeton, N.J., who, with his partner, Carl Mayer, filed a federal suit in Manhattan last month against Verizon.

Hicks UK bid boosted

THE British Government has accepted a court ruling that Australian David Hicks, detained in the US military prison in Guantanamo Bay, is entitled to British citizenship, lawyers said, but that may change when a new law comes into force today.

The High Court dismissed a complaint by lawyers for David Hicks, who said the government was deliberately dragging its heels on granting Hicks citizenship, as the court has ordered it to do.

Justice Andrew Collins has said that since Hicks's mother was born in London, officials cannot deny him citizenship. He accepted government lawyers assurances that officials were taking the necessary steps to comply with the order.

Hicks hopes that if he gets citizenship, London would lobby for his release from Guantanamo Bay, the US camp for terrorism suspects in Cuba, as it has for other Britons. A Muslim convert accused by the US of fighting with the Taliban in Afghanistan, Hicks has accused the Australian Government of failing to intervene in his case.

The British Government said it would consider today ``whether, and if so what, representations should be made to the US Government in relation to Mr Hicks''.

However, a new immigration law that comes into force today will ease the criteria on which the government can reject citizenship claims.

Opinion: ACLU v. National Security Agency: Why the "State Secrets Privilege" Shouldn't Stop the Lawsuit Challenging Warrantless Telephone Surveillance of Americans

By JOHN W. DEAN

The American Civil Liberties Union is the lead plaintiff in a federal lawsuit requesting that the National Security Agency (NSA) be enjoined from its ongoing violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) via its program of telephone surveillance of Americans. Joining the ACLU as plaintiffs are a number of attorneys, scholars, journalists and others who have been adversely affected by the program. The plaintiffs argue that the NSA program violates not only FISA, but also the Constitution's First and Fourth Amendments.

The U.S. Government, through its Department of Justice attorneys, has been desperately trying to get this case - currently pending in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan -- dismissed. To this end, DOJ attorneys have invoked the "state secrets privilege" - claiming, in essence, that the government cannot explain its actions because they involve national security.

DOJ attorneys have used this strategy successfully with FBI translator Sibel Edmonds twice, to prevent her from testifying about misconduct in the FBI. They used it again with Maher Arar, a Canadian who was arrested when passing through JFK airport, returning from his vacation, only to find himself "renditioned" to Syria, where he was tortured before being released because he was innocent. And they used it once again with Khalid El-Masri, the German citizen mistakenly arrested and flow to Afghanistan where he was detained, beaten, and tortured by the CIA.

But this time, the outcome may be very different. Because this is a case where the "state secrets" privilege plainly should not apply, and a case with a judge brave enough to rule that, in fact, it does not.

Indeed, if she so chooses, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor can do for America what the GOP-controlled Congress, and Republican-beholden federal judges, have thus far refused to do: She can require the Administration to comply with the law -- and in the process, she can actually examine the validity of the government's claim of "state secrets," rather than merely buying into assertions that national security is involved. Since such claims have been persistently abused by prior presidents, this kind of examination is long overdue.

The ACLU v. NSA Lawsuit, and The Judge Who Will Hear It

The ACLU's lawsuit simply calls for the NSA to follow FISA, which Congress made the exclusive means by which the Executive Branch can undertake electronic surveillance of Americans.

Unlike those judges who easily disposed of Edmonds, Arar and El-Masri, Judge Taylor plainly understands civil rights and liberties, as her biography well illustrates. She is a no-nonsense judge with a quarter century of experience on the federal bench. She has tossed lawyers out of her courtroom when they played delaying games in discovery (and she has been upheld by the Court of Appeals when doing so). She writes well-reasoned opinions that reveal deep sympathy for victims of civil liberties violations. And she certainly has no fear of being reversed by an increasingly conservative U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, which has jurisdiction over her court.

In short, if ever there was a federal judge to stand up to the President of the United States to tell him he must obey the law, and to cut through the nonsense that typically surrounds the invocation of the "state secrets" privilege, it is Judge Anna Diggs Taylor.

Column continues below ↓

The ACLU argues that "Administration officials have publicly conceded all of the facts necessary" for the judge to rule on the plaintiffs' statutory and constitutional claims. Accordingly, it has moved for partial summary judgment in the case.

The Administration sought a stay with respect to the motion, but in an order of May 31, Judge Taylor refused the stay, and on June 10, she heard oral argument. Still upcoming in the case is another hearing, to be held on July 12, on the Administration's motion to dismiss the case because it involves state secrets. It seems likely that Judge Taylor will not rule on either the ACLU's motion, or the Administration's, until some time after that second hearing - so readers can likely expect a ruling in late July, August, or September.

The Government's Arguments for Dismissal: Exceptionally Weak

The government has made two arguments in support of dismissing the case:

First, it claims that the plaintiffs do not have standing to bring their lawsuit, because their harm is speculative - after all, they do not know whether they are actually being surveilled or not. And looking at FISA and its legal standards won't help them figure out whether they might be - since the government has admitted it is flagrantly violating FISA.

The NSA should not be able to profit from the situation of fear and uncertainty it has created, by getting this suit dismissed on this ground - especially since this kind of fear and uncertainty is exactly why First Amendment doctrine allows standing based on the "chilling effect." A reporter's or scholar's phone call may be very different when it is made under fear of surveillance, and in the knowledge that standards set out in wiretapping laws are being utterly ignored.

Relatedly, the DOJ attorneys argue that they cannot show the plaintiffs' lack of standing without jeopardizing national security. But what, exactly, do they mean? Is the DOJ unwilling even to admit that it is not surveilling the plaintiffs? And why would it bother to make such an admission, in the first place - since as noted above, the plaintiffs' prior fear and uncertainty is a separate basis for standing here?

Second, the government claims that the "state secrets" privilege renders it unable to fully explain why, in fact, the NSA surveillance program is legal, because to do so would involve matters relating to national security. But this argument, too, is bunk. There was at least some scant basis for making the argument in the cases of wrongly detained and tortured individuals; the government could claim there, at least, that its ways of figuring out who to detain were a matter of national security. Here -- notwithstanding a 42-page document the Administration issued proclaiming the legality of the NSA program -- as the ACLU has argued, the Administration's own public admissions make it difficult to imagine what "secret national security" argument might be added to make blatantly illegal actions legal.

State Secrets: A Privilege Born on the Lips of a Lie

The ugly history of the "state secrets" privilege should also cause Judge Taylor to pause before considering allowing DOJ to get away with once again invoking it.

The state secrets privilege was first recognized by the Supreme Court in its 1953 ruling in United States v. Reynolds. Following the death of three civilian engineers involved in a B-29 crash while working for the military, their widows sought the accident reports and damages for their wrongful deaths. But the government refused to turn over the reports, claiming the mission was national-security-related, and to do so would reveal secrets that could harm the nation. The Reynolds Court, which took the government at its word, agreed, and dismissed the claim. The Justices explained the impossible position in which the reviewing court had been put: "The court itself must determine whether the circumstances are appropriate for the claim of privilege, and yet do so without forcing a disclosure of the very thing the privilege is designed to protect."

Fifty years after the Reynolds ruling, a daughter of one of the men killed in the B-29 crash, Judy Loether, discovered while surfing the Internet that the government had declassified the accident report, without deigning to let her know this fact. For $63, she purchased a copy from a private company. To her utter amazement, the accident report revealed that no state secrets whatsoever had been involved; rather, the only secret was the gross negligence by the military. It was an accident that should never have happened.

Following up on Loether's discovery, the lawyers involved in the Reynolds case filed a motion to underline the point that the government had perpetrated a fraud on the federal courts. Yet neither the Department of Justice nor the Supreme Court wanted to know anything about it. The motion was all but summarily dismissed.

Because of the increasing use of the "state secrets" privilege, it has been more closely studied in recent years. For example, University of Texas political scientists William Weaver and Robert Pallitto, after reviewing all the reported cases, have concluded that "the state secrets privilege … [is] now [being] judicially mishandled to the detriment of our constitutional system." This mishandling, they contend, is occurring because "the courts have unwisely acquiesced to executive power on this matter."

As one commentator nicely states it, the state secrets privilege was "born with a lie on its lips." When the government says "national security," the federal courts seem to cower. Yet anyone who has worked in this area knows that seldom is nation security truly at stake when the government claims it to be. Typically, the invocation of national security borders on being a hoax.

The Great "National Security" Ruse - Illustrated by the Pentagon Papers Case

No government can operate in a fishbowl. And there is some information that is appropriately kept secret to prevent harm to the nation's security. But such secrets are rare. Very, very rare.

Tom Blanton, the executive director of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, recently wrote in the Los Angeles Times about how the government overuses national security classifications. He noted that the current deputy undersecretary for counterintelligence grudgingly conceded to Congress that at least half of all classified information was overclassified; 9/11 commission chairman Tom Kean has said that "three-quarters of what I read [when studying the government's preparation for terror attacks] that was classified shouldn't have been"; and President Reagan's executive secretary for his National Security Council, Navy Captain Rodney McDaniel, has testified that only ten percent of the document stamped secret were for "legitimate protection of secrets."

Captain McDaniel is being generous.

Probably the most egregious case, within my personal knowledge, of the government's employing the national security ruse was the landmark Pentagon Papers case, United States v. New York Times.

Serving, at the time, as counsel to the President, I watched as the government sought injunctions against the New York Times and The Washington Post to prevent further publication of the leaked study of the origins of the Vietnam War -- knowing full well that none of the government's lawyers involved actually knew what was in these documents.

The U.S. Attorney in the Southern District of New York had thought it unseemly to argue for a prior restraint upon the press - the ultimate First Amendment violation -- without knowing why. I agreed, and tried to find out what the justification for seeking this extraordinary remedy might be. But the Defense Department refused to explain to what was in the papers to anyone.

The Solicitor General is the government's most esteemed advocate -- often referred to as the tenth member of the Supreme Court because of the trust given his office. Yet the Solicitor General at the time, Irwin Griswold -- a former dean of Harvard Law School -- did not insist on knowing what was actually contained in the Pentagon Papers, and he never found out, even as he insisted on the importance of their continued secrecy.

Remarkably, Griswold told the High Court in June 1971, "I haven't the slightest doubt myself that the material which has already been published and the publication of the other materials affects American lives and is a thoroughly serious matter. I think to say that it can only be enjoined if there will be a war tomorrow morning, when there is a war now going on, is much too narrow."

Three justices were convinced, but six were not. The Pentagon Papers thus were published - and America could read for itself, to see that no national security peril was posed.

No doubt Griswold was haunted by his less-than-candid advocacy in the Pentagon Papers case, for twenty-eight years later, he publicly recanted. In a 1989 Washington Post OpEd he wrote, "I have never seen any trace of a threat to the national security from the publication [of the Pentagon Papers]. Indeed, I have never seen it even suggested that there was such an actual threat…. It quickly becomes apparent to any person who has considerable experience with classified material that there is massive overclassification and that the principal concern of the classifiers is not with national security, but rather with governmental embarrassment of one sort or another."

In sum, the government has a well-documented and persistent history of abusing its claims of national security. Given this history, federal judges should not give the Executive Branch the benefit of any doubts.

It's true that the head of the Executive department or agency involved in claiming a state secret must personally attest to the national security issue. But if anyone believes that the Secretary of Defense, or the Director of National Intelligence, has the time or disposition to examine all the papers, and consider the problems involved, they simply do not understand how government works. These decisions, in fact, are made by bureaucrats (often with their own agendas).

Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's Dilemma

When Judge Taylor conducts the July 12 hearing on the Administration's invocation of the "state secrets" privilege as a basis for dismissing the suit, she will face a classic dilemma facing all federal judges who must rule on the "state secrets" privilege: How is the judge able to know whether the government is making a legitimate claim?

The ACLU seems correct that the government's factual admissions here make the case for FISA violation, in particular, rather cut-and-dried, as a legal matter. Accordingly, the invocation of the state secrets privilege appears more a sword than a shield: A method to dispose of the case without litigating the legality of the government's actions.

But the paradox of the state secrets privilege is that the government can invoke it without saying exactly why, and many federal judges - and, as noted, government attorneys - have met this invocation with deference, mindful of the constitutional separation of powers.

Such deference, however, has not been earned by the Executive Branch. Solicitor General Griswold was snookered by Defense Department bureaucrats. Government officials admit that not less than half -- if not as much as ninety percent -- of classified information is incorrectly classified. Yet many federal judges follow the line of state secrets cases that are obsequious to the Executive Branch's claims when they relate to national security. They should not. By doing so, they are not truly fulfilling their role as constitutional co-equals of the Executive Branch. They are not checking, nor are they balancing. They are merely abdicating.

Many judges seem to believe that they must abdicate, for they are not competent to make determinations regarding national security matters. The truth is that, in fact, they are probably more competent than the agenda-driven officials within the Executive branch who make such determinations. Judges are experienced at weighing facts and their implications, and they certainly have the power to gather the information necessary. And life-tenured federal judges - beholden to no one, and in no fear of job repercussions - are able to be far more impartial than Executive Branch officials can ever be. It is no surprise that Executive Branch officials are grossly overprotective of secrecy; for them, that is the safest course.

Tom Blanton noted in his essay that "judges have many tools at their disposal for inquiring into and testing the government's claims" when invoking the state secrets privilege, including appointing "special masters with expertise and security clearances." (Special Masters may be appointed by federal courts to report back to the court when complex factual matters arise.)

For example, Judge Taylor could appoint a team of special masters like the former co-chairs of the 9/11 commission, Tom Kean and Lee Hamilton, to assess the government's claims that it would have to expose "state secrets" in order to explain why plaintiffs do not have standing, and why the government is not really violating FISA -- despite its own public admissions that, in fact, it is.

Such a ruling could halt the growing abuse of the "state secrets" privilege by President Bush and Vice-President Cheney -- who have already used this privilege more aggressively than any presidency in history, and recently have only been increasing its use. While precise numbers - because not all cases are reported - are hard to come by, a recent study reports that the "Bush administration has invoked the state secrets privilege in 23 cases since 2001." By way of comparison, "between 1953 and 1976, the government invoked the privilege in only four cases."

An Overwhelmingly Important Case - and Hearing

The eyes of the nation should turn to Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's courtroom on July 12. It is not an exaggeration to say that Judge Taylor, in many ways, will be ruling on the fate of the nation. We are sliding down the slippery slope.

I am reminded of the words of Martin Niemoeller, the German U-Boat captain and later Lutheran pastor and philosopher, who was asked by a student "How could the Holocaust happen?" Niemoeller famously explained how easy it was to tolerate injustice when people do not believe they are involved: "First they came for the Communists, but I was not a Communist so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Socialists and the trade unionists, but I was neither, so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Jews, but I was not a Jew so I did not speak out. And when they came for me, there was no one left to speak out for me."

Are these words properly invoked in the "state secrets" context? Ask Maher Arar and Khalid El-Masri - tortured by mistake, despite their innocence, then prevented from holding the government responsible in court, on the ground that the very mistake that caused their terrible suffering was a "state secret."

Judge Anna Diggs Taylor will hopefully speak out - for all of us.

Analysis: Is Bush Signaling an About-Face on Detainees?

Tony Mauro

It is rare for a president to comment on a pending Supreme Court case. But President George W. Bush has been doing just that in recent weeks, making several mentions of the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case that will decide the fate of the military commissions he ordered to handle detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"We're waiting on our Supreme Court to act," Bush said at a press conference Wednesday, one of several comments that indicate he is eager to follow the Court's lead, even if it rules against his claim of broad power to deal with the detainees outside the established military and civilian court system.

Bush's remarks and tone have confounded opponents of the military commissions, leaving some wondering if Bush is trying to soften the blow of an expected defeat -- or already preparing the public for civilian alternatives to military commissions.

Covington & Burling partner David Remes, one of the coordinators of the legal effort against the administration position, says Bush's comments have led him to ask "why Bush made Hamdan a test of presidential power in the first place. If Bush could accomplish his goals within the existing legal framework, why did he confront the judicial branch with such breathtaking claims of presidential power?"

The presidential commentary on the case was so frequent in recent days that expectations were high that the Court might hand down the decision on Thursday. The two lawyers who argued against each other in the case -- Solicitor General Paul Clement and Georgetown University Law Center's Neal Katyal -- were in the courtroom, but the justices instead handed down four criminal and business law cases. The Court will convene again next Monday and Thursday to issue more decisions in its push toward adjournment by month's end.

The Hamdan case asks whether the president has constitutional or statutory authority to establish the commissions -- and whether federal courts have jurisdiction over the issue. Lawyers challenging the commissions say the limited rules of evidence and trial procedures violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions on prisoners of war. The administration has argued that Bush has ample authority to decide that military necessity requires a special process for handling the detainees outside the court system.

But during a joint press conference June 9 with the prime minister of Denmark, Bush said he thought Guantanamo detainees "ought to be tried in courts here in the United States. We will file such court claims once the Supreme Court makes its decision as to whether or not -- as to the proper venue for these trials." That comment seemed to some to contradict his legal position, which was that the detainees should be tried by military commissions at Guantanamo, not courts in the United States.

"This is a dramatic about-face from the Administration's position in the high court, and an admission that the detainees have been right all along," said Katyal, who argued on behalf of detainee Salim Ahmed Hamdan before the justices on March 28. "These cases belong in our courts, not in a makeshift military system that lacks credibility. President Bush's statement reaffirms that national security doesn't require this makeshift system, which is precisely what Mr. Hamdan has been saying for three years."

On Wednesday, at a press conference after his surprise visit to Iraq, Bush seemed to amend his comments, emphasizing that he had military, not civilian courts in mind. "I'd like to close Guantanamo," Bush said, "but I also recognize that we're holding some people that are darn dangerous, and that we better have a plan to deal with them in our courts. And the best way to handle ... these types of people is through our military courts. And that's why we're waiting on the Supreme Court to make a decision."

But on May 7, in comments during an interview on a German television network, Bush seemed indifferent about which courts the detainees ultimately face. "I very much would like to get people to a court," Bush said, according to the transcript. "And we're waiting for our Supreme Court to give us a decision as to whether the people need to have a fair trial in a civilian court or in a military court. But in either case, they will get a trial which they, themselves, were unwilling to give to the people that they're willing to kill."

Richard Samp of the Washington Legal Foundation, which filed a brief in support of the Bush Administration's position on military commissions, said not much should be made of these remarks.

"He has been talking to a lot of foreign leaders lately about Guantanamo, and I am sure he wants to not appear insensitive to their concerns," said Samp. Samp adds that it is prudent for the administration to be planning now for the ramifications of a high court ruling -- no matter which way it comes down.

Deborah Pearlstein of Human Rights First, a leading critic of the commissions, agrees that Bush's comments about the case reflect "national and international pressure on the administration to finally come up with some definitive -- and lawful -- resolution to a global detention system that long ago stopped serving U.S. policy interests in promoting freedom, or in protecting its own security."

But she too was astonished at Bush's seeming acceptance of trials for the detainees, no matter where they take place. "The suggestion that the Guantanamo detainees should be tried at all, much less tried in U.S. courts, contradicts the administration's position all along that the President can just detain, without trial if he wants, the 'worst of the worst' at Guantanamo forever."

Commentary:'Downwinders' deserve their due

Pat Murphy

The news out of Washington is a baffling set of contradictions.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency freely and hurriedly ladled out $1.4 billion in aid to hundreds of ineligible Katrina hurricane claimants—call it fraud—and just as quickly peeled off $60,000 in compensation to families of 24 Iraqis shot and killed in Haditha by U.S. Marines who're being investigated for murder.

But several hundred Idahoans have been denied compensation from the same government for illnesses they and experts contend were the result of radioactive fallout from Nevada nuclear tests in the 1950s and 1960s.

Mind you, the government doesn't reject claims of all "downwinder" families living where radioactive fallout rained down. Washington has paid claims to families in Utah, Nevada and Arizona—a handsome total of $440 million, in fact.

But nothing for Idahoans.

That despite data showing that four Idaho counties—Blaine, Custer, Gem and Lemhi—ranked among the nation's top five in per capita thyroid dosage of radiation.

Idahoans claiming illnesses from nuclear dust were just as unwitting and unknowing victims of secret nuclear tests that showered them as were residents in the other states, and surely deserve better of their government than cold indifference.

If the U.S. Treasury can shell out $1.4 billion to pay fraudulent Katrina claims, it certainly can find just and relatively modest compensation for ill survivors of nuclear tests about which they were not warned and therefore could not escape.
