Lawsuit confronts a barrier of secrecy; AT&T WIRETAP CASE A TEST OF POWERS

Congress and Judges Gagged; Arlen Specter and a CIA torture victim know: Only the Oval Office decides what the law is

NextWave Redux

Cobell calls for support of Indian issues

Klimt painting looted by Nazis sold to NY museum

U.S. suit seeks return of pension funds  Government wants owner of defunct Wescosville business to repay $118,376.

Federal agencies mining private firms for data

EDITORIAL: Federal courts, rather than Congress, should resolve executive privilege debate

AP
Mon, Jun. 19, 2006

Top court won't block part of drug program

GINA HOLLAND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court refused Monday to block part of the six-month-old Medicare prescription drug program, a defeat for states that claim they may get stuck with the bill.

Justices declined without comment to temporarily stop part of the law that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare, the federal health insurance program for the elderly and disabled. States were contesting a requirement that they pay the federal government for the drug expenses.

The court also said that the fight belonged in a lower court, not the Supreme Court.

The 2003 law went into effect Jan. 1. About 43 million people are eligible for the benefit, although some missed a May deadline to sign up and may face a penalty.

Texas, Kentucky, Maine, Missouri and New Jersey called on justices to step in, while the court decides whether to hear their challenge to a funding part of the law.

END

San Jose Mercury News
Sun, Jun. 18, 2006

Lawsuit confronts a barrier of secrecy; AT&T WIRETAP CASE A TEST OF POWERS

By Pete Carey
Mercury News

When a federal judge in San Francisco considers a government request Friday to dismiss a wiretapping lawsuit against AT&T, he will step into an acrimonious national debate over the power of courts to check the alleged excesses of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism programs.

While the class-action lawsuit is against AT&T, the government has intervened to invoke a military and state secrets privilege, in which it contends that the matters involved are too sensitive and vital to national security to be made public.

The state secrets privilege has been in place for more than 50 years, but recently has risen to prominence in a series of cases that have provoked harsh criticism of the administration for overstepping its bounds.

Under the privilege, evidence that the government claims would compromise national security cannot be introduced in court -- a restriction that can kill a lawsuit or criminal indictment when the evidence is central to the case.

The government's assertion of the privilege in a flurry of lawsuits over the past six months aimed at the National Security Agency's wiretapping program comes at a time of increasing criticism of the administration for alleged overzealousness in its war on terrorism.

Critics accuse it of breaking laws and violating civil rights through extraordinary renditions -- transferring suspects from one country to another -- interrogations of prisoners and, now, eavesdropping on ordinary citizens.

Several rights groups also have filed anti-wiretap lawsuits recently against the government and telecommunications companies in New York, Michigan and Oregon. The Justice Department has either filed motions, or announced plans to, in those cases, invoking the secrets privilege. It also has asserted the privilege in a pending case in which New Jersey's attorney general subpoenaed records of four phone companies.

No remedy

Judges have seldom ruled against the privilege, even when the case appears to shock their consciences.

Last month, for example, a federal judge in Virginia ruled against a German man who said he was kidnapped from Macedonia by a CIA ``black renditions team,'' held captive in Kabul, Afghanistan, for four months, interrogated and beaten and finally dumped on a road in Albania to find his way home. If the man's claims are true, ``all fair-minded people'' would agree he deserves a remedy, said U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III. But with state secrets at risk, the remedy does not lie with the court, Judge Ellis ruled.

What makes these recent, post-Sept. 11 state secrets cases more politically volatile than some past cases is that they allege wrongdoing by the administration and are seen by critics as a use of national security by the Bush administration to cover its tracks.

``The administration has been using the state secrets privilege more broadly than any administration in history,'' said Jonathan Turley, George Washington University Law School expert on national security law. ``The administration tends to reach for the privilege in any case that has even tangential connections to national security.

``It's pretty clear they do not want the legality of these programs reviewed,'' Turley said.

No lawful authority

In the San Francisco class-action lawsuit, the Electronic Frontier Foundation accuses AT&T of allowing the National Security Agency to monitor millions of e-mails and phone calls without lawful authority, such as a warrant.

The Justice Department said Friday that it couldn't comment on the specific case before the federal court in San Francisco, but in January, it published a 42-page defense of the NSA surveillance program. It said the president has the power under the U.S. Constitution to conduct warrantless surveillance, and also under a Sept. 18, 2001, congressional authorization for the use of military force.

The foundation says the wiretapping violates the First and Fourth Amendments, federal communications statutes and the requirements of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Lawsuits over the snooping against AT&T by the American Civil Liberties Union and by two citizens have also been filed with the San Francisco federal court.

Friday's hearing will be the first on a government motion to dismiss one of the NSA wiretapping cases on national security grounds.

AT&T says it can't defend itself because of national security issues, and the government says that to even acknowledge that there is or isn't a legal basis for the wiretapping would disclose a state secret. Others disagree.

``Essentially, the government is asserting it can unilaterally disregard the laws written by Congress, and there is nothing the judiciary can do about it because it is too secret for the judiciary to consider,'' said Kurt Opsahl, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

When classified declarations were submitted by the heads of the Central Intelligence Agency and the NSA, U.S. District Judge Vaughn R. Walker, who is hearing the AT&T case, asked the government's lawyer how the plaintiff's lawyers would be able to argue against them.

``They won't be, frankly, your honor,'' said Deputy Assistant Attorney General Carl J. Nichols at a May 17 hearing. ``They won't be in the sense that they will not be able to see nor rebut our showing. . . . Unfortunately, or fortunately, that is the way it is done, and that is the way it has to be done. Because to do otherwise would be to disclose facts to a number of people, the result of which would be to harm national security.''

Invoking state of war

In arguments filed late Friday, the government said that even if Judge Walker were to find ``unlawfulness'' upon reading the classified material, he couldn't award damages because that would confirm the lawsuit's allegations.

``The state secrets privilege is not an excuse to violate the law,'' countered Barry Himmelstein, a San Francisco lawyer representing two men who are suing AT&T. ``We're in a critical moment in our nation's history -- is the administration above the law or do they have to obey it?''

The government believes it has a trump card in that debate. It contends that because the nation is at war against terrorism, the president has the constitutional authority as commander in chief to override a citizen's right to have his or her day in court.

``It's very simple,'' observed University of California-Berkeley law Professor Jesse Choper. ``Whether you are convinced or not convinced is another matter. Article II [of the Constitution] defines executive power, makes the president the commander in chief of the armed forces. That includes the power to wage war. That power includes all necessary and proper for waging of that war. He considers this [Sept. 11] to be an attack on the United States.''

Others say the government's argument in the AT&T case is a stretch.

``It's the claimed authority the government has advanced to engage in warrantless surveillance of citizens of the United States, much more than the invocation of the state secrets privilege, that is much more expansive and, to my mind, extremely alarming,'' said Allen S. Weiner, Stanford University law professor and former attorney in the U.S. State Department.

``One can't simply say `Article II,' therefore there's nothing for courts to do,'' said Weiner. ``That's ultimately a legal question the courts are competent to decide.''

Also before the court in San Francisco are a motion by AT&T to dismiss the case and motions to intervene by several news organizations, including the Mercury News.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation has indicated that it will appeal if Judge Walker dismisses the case.

END

The Village Voice
June 19, 2006

Congress and Judges Gagged; Arlen Specter and a CIA torture victim know: Only the Oval Office decides what the law is

by Nat Hentoff

Khaled el-Masri: Tortured abroad by the CIA, abandoned in the U.S.

Arlen Specter, a Republican and an unusually independent chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has been publicly and insistently charging that the president violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by authorizing the National Security Agency's secret, warrantless eavesdropping on our phone calls and e-mails. The administration's answer, however, was underlined on May 8 by John Negroponte, chief of all the intelligence agencies:

This government, he said, is "absolutely not" engaging in warrantless monitoring of domestic calls. Negroponte ignored, as does the president, the further revelation that AT&T and Verizon are collaborating with the NSA to collect millions, actually, trillions, of our phone records (the numbers we call and those who call us)—which are then also linked to FBI, CIA, and other agencies' databases.

Despite the concerted opposition of Dick Cheney (who is in charge of the administration's "dark arts," as he calls them), Chairman Specter wants to subpoena AT&T and Verizon to find out who in the administration told them that their complicity—absent any judicial supervision—with the lawless NSA is legal.

Even if Specter issues those subpoenas, he appears resigned to the blank wall he'll find, since he says the telephone companies will refer to the "state secrets" privilege and refuse to answer any of his questions that have to do with the NSA. And Dick Cheney has ordered them not to testify.

So, once again, as USA Today noted in a May 18 editorial, "Congress may as well be deaf and blind." Arlen Specter has been the only congressional chairman who keeps trying to investigate these felonies committed by the president and NSA. Now he has been blocked by the administration's escape from accountability through "state secrets." (In most of these dismissals, the lawyers for the plaintiffs are not even told what "the secrets" are.)

But what of the independent judiciary in our constitutional separation of powers? On May 12, Federal District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Virginia killed a suit by Khaled el-Masri—Khaled el-Masri v. George Tenet, et. al—whose kidnapping and "rendition" by the CIA to be tortured has been repeatedly reported—in detail—in this country and around the world, including the Voice.

A broken man because of his ordeal, el-Masri seeks a mere $75,000 in compensation from our government for five months of torture, beginning in December 2003. Moreover, this German citizen was kidnapped by mistake. The agent in charge of the Al Qaeda division of the Counterterrorist Center screwed up because el-Masri has the same name as a person suspected of links to terrorism.

"The government is moving to dismiss this case at the outset on the basis of a fiction that discussion in this courtroom of the very same facts being discussed throughout the world will harm [this] nation." If the ruling is upheld on appeal—and it very likely will be, given the two justices Bush has placed on the Supreme Court—the total disappearance of Khaled el-Masri v. Tenet will, as the ACLU's Ben Wizner says, "give a broad immunity to the government to shield even the most egregious activities."

Judge Ellis's 17-page ruling is dramatically unusual in showing his discomfort at being shackled by the precedent of previous judges allowing the government to whisper to them, "state secrets" and usurp their roles as judges of the facts and the law.

As if to expiate his surrendering of his independence to the administration, Ellis gives a lot of space to el-Masri's claims. He calls them allegations, but they strike me as weighing on his conscience.

For example, says Judge Ellis, a "blindfolded" El-Masri—after first having been snatched to Macedonia—"was led to a building where he was beaten, stripped of his clothing, and sodomized with a foreign object [and] dragged naked to a corner of the room [where] he claims he saw seven or eight men dressed in black and wearing black ski masks.

"[El-Masri] contends that these men were members of a CIA 'black renditions' team, operating pursuant to unlawful CIA policies at the direction of defendant [then CIA director George] Tenet."

The judge continues: "After being dressed in a diaper . . . shackled and dragged to an airplane . . . his captors injected him with a sedative," and he wound up in the notorious CIA interrogation facility, the "Salt Pit," an abandoned brick factory in Afghanistan. For the next four months, "in a small, cold cell," he was repeatedly (and forcibly) interrogated. His hunger strike was broken—like those of the prisoners in Guantánamo—by force-feeding. (This brutal practice, as I have written in previous columns, locks the prisoner in a metal chair where, while being "fed" through a tube, he urinates and defecates on himself.)

At last, the CIA, knowing it had the wrong man, flew el-Masri, blindfolded, to Albania where he was dumped on the side of an abandoned road. Albanian authorities got him back to Germany where he found his wife and four children had gone to Lebanon because his wife thought he had abandoned them.

Says Judge Ellis: "El-Masri asserts he remains deeply traumatized." He hasn't been able to work. One of his children is frightened if his father goes out alone.

At the end of his decision, Judge Ellis, somewhat traumatized himself, writes: "Putting aside all the legal issues, if el-Masri's allegations are true or essentially true, then all fair-minded people, including those who believe . . . that this lawsuit cannot proceed [because it involves "state secrets"] must also agree that El-Masri has suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy." (Emphasis added.)

The judge continued: "Yet . . . the only sources of that remedy must be the Executive Branch or the Legislative Branch, not the Judicial Branch."

But the executive branch, brandishing "state secrets," has forced this judge to dismiss the case! And the legislative branch has repeatedly refused to conduct an investigation into these "renditions" that kidnap suspects to be tortured—as has been verified in meticulously documented reports by Human Rights Watch, Human Rights First, Amnesty International, and NYU's Center on Law and Security.

So there is no remedy for Khaled el-Masri in this country which holds its "values" and rule of law as a model to the world.

END

Mondaq

June 19, 2006

NextWave Redux

Mr Mark Douglas

By Mr Mark Douglas

In a landmark 2003 ruling, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Bankruptcy Code's anti-discrimination provisions prohibited the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") from revoking broadband spectrum licenses valued at nearly $5 billion awarded at a pre-bankruptcy auction to chapter 11 debtor NextWave Personal Communications, Inc. based upon its failure to make timely payments to the FCC for the purchase of the licenses. The decision put an end to protracted litigation that had for many years limited access to the disputed broadband capacity, and was widely perceived as having given the green light to technology developers eager to exploit the public airways by removing the shroud of controversy from licenses covering a significant percentage of the available electromagnetic spectrum.

NextWave's bankruptcy spawned considerable debate concerning the power of the FCC to regulate access to the airwaves in ostensible derogation of various provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. While it did not prevail in the Supreme Court on the anti-discrimination issue, the FCC won a significant victory on another front when the Second Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in 1999 that the bankruptcy court presiding over NextWave's chapter 11 case lacked jurisdiction to abrogate the FCC's licensing authority by allowing NextWave to avoid a portion of its auction payment obligation as a fraudulent transfer. Unfortunately, this issue never made its way to the Supreme Court.

Based in part on the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling, NextWave, in April of 2004, successfully negotiated a global settlement of its auction debt to the FCC. Under the agreement, NextWave satisfied all of its debt obligations to the FCC by returning 90% of its licenses and making substantial additional cash payments. NextWave was permitted to keep the remaining licenses free and clear of any debt or claims or liens of the FCC. The settlement resulted in a total recovery of more than $4 billion for the government and allowed NextWave to confirm a chapter 11 plan of reorganization in March of 2005.

It appeared that the cauldron of controversy surrounding NextWave's bankruptcy filing and its efforts to hold onto its hard won spectrum licenses had finally stopped boiling after over seven years of contentious litigation -- but not quite. Less than a month after confirmation of NextWave's chapter 11 plan, a qui tam action was commenced under the False Claims Act ("FCA") against NextWave and its attorneys, alleging that the defendants violated the FCA by failing to advise the federal government of the possible application of the Credit Reform Act ("CRA") to spectrum auction debt and NextWave's related bankruptcy proceedings.

The complaint asserted seven FCA claims against the defendants, each of which stemmed, directly or indirectly, from their alleged knowing failure to inform the courts, the FCC, and Congress of the existence of the CRA and its alleged applicability to spectrum auction debts and, in particular, to NextWave's rights in bankruptcy. In substance, the plaintiff argued that, under the CRA, any disposition of a federal loan that decreases the government's recovery constitutes a "modification," and is thus barred in the absence of advance Congressional approval. Because no Congressional approval was sought or obtained by NextWave, the plaintiff contended, NextWave was precluded from satisfying its debt obligations to the FCC in the manner provided under the global settlement.

A New York district court recently granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that the cause of action stated against NextWave's attorneys was untimely under the FCA's six-year statute of limitations, and that the remaining causes of action both failed to state a claim under the FCA and were barred by the doctrine of res judicata. According to the district court, the complaint's causes of action against the non-attorney defendants rested, at least in part, on their alleged use of false statements to obtain payment from the government or to avoid payment obligations to the government, yet it failed to identify a single false statement made by the defendants at any time. Moreover, the court characterized the basic premise of the complaint -- that the defendants violated the FCA by failing to bring a federal statute to the attention of the federal government in the course of a litigation to which the federal government was a party -- as "patently absurd." In light of its conclusions, the district court never reached the issue of whether the CRA actually superseded NextWave's bankruptcy rights in the absence of Congressional approval.

FCC v. NextWave Personal Communications, Inc., 537 U.S. 293 (2003).

In re NextWave Personal Communications, Inc., 200 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 924 (2000).

U.S. ex rel. Finney v. NextWave Telecom, Inc., 337 B.R. 479 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

END

Great Falls Tribune

Jun 17, 2006

Cobell calls for support of Indian issues

By ALEX STRICKLAND
Tribune Staff Writer

Continuing hard work is the only way government can be changed, and the Democratic women of Montana are a good group to lead the charge, said Elouise Cobell Friday evening.

Cobell, an enrolled Blackfeet tribal member, spoke to a crowd of about 50 at the Holiday Inn in Great Falls as part of the three-day Montana Democratic Women's Convention.

Well known both in Montana and Washington, D.C., for being the lead plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit against the government for mismanagement of Indian money, Cobell spoke about the need for change in Washington and the progress of the lawsuit.

"I am so tired of all the lies that continue to go on," she said about the case, now called Cobell v. Kempthorne after Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne.

Cobell just passed the 10-year anniversary of her lawsuit, which was filed June 10, 1996.

"It has been a long, long battle," she said.

Roxanne Brothers of Kalispell knew Cobell's story and said she came to the speech because Cobell was "a good spokesman for Native American causes.

"We need to promote more Native American voice in Montana," Brothers said.

It is the voiceless that Cobell said she believes she is speaking for in the largest class action lawsuit ever brought against the U.S. government, representing some 300,000 Native Americans.

"I did it because the people who own this money can't defend themselves," she said.

Cobell encouraged the crowd of women and a few men "to be energized." She said it shouldn't be just Indians on board with the lawsuit, but "all the Democrats in this country."

Cobell countered applause for her efforts with, "there is no hero until we get the first individual Indian money account paid."

The latest shift in the lawsuit was an April 11 hearing where a motion was heard to remove U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth from the case.

Cobell said she gathered Blackfeet drummers in Washington to sing war songs as their attorneys went into court and victory songs as they emerged.

No ruling has been made on the motion.

END

AP

June 19, 2006

Klimt painting looted by Nazis sold to NY museum

By ANDREW GLAZER

Associated Press Writer

LOS ANGELES_An oil and gold-encrusted portrait by Gustav Klimt that was the focus of a battle between the Austrian government and the subject's niece was purchased for a record-setting amount by a New York museum, an attorney said Sunday.

The 1907 portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer _ one of the most recognizable of the 20th century _ was sold by Los Angeles resident and Bloch-Bauer's niece Maria Altmann and her family, said her attorney Steven Thomas.

Thomas refused to disclose the price, but said it eclipsed the prior record of $104.1 million paid at auction for Picasso's 1905 "Boy With a Pipe (The Young Apprentice)." The New York Times, citing experts familiar with the negotiations, reported the portrait sold for $135 million.

The Klimt painting will now be displayed at the Neue Galerie, a New York museum of German and Austrian art co-founded by cosmetics mogul Ronald S. Lauder, who Thomas said was instrumental in the deal.

"It was important for the heirs and for my aunt Adele that her work be displayed in a museum," Altmann said in a statement released by the family.

Altmann, 90, was a newlywed when she watched the Nazis seize power in 1938 and steal the portrait and four other Klimt works from her aunt and uncle's home.

Since then, the portrait has hung mostly in the Austrian Gallery Belvedere in Vienna, near Klimt's famous painting "The Kiss."

Altmann had figured she had no hope of recovering the family collection until a 1998 law in Austria required museums to return art seized by the Nazis.

She spent the past seven years fighting the Austrian government to recover her family's collection.

Lawyers in Austria, however, claimed that Altmann's aunt, who died of meningitis in 1925, had willed the paintings to the government gallery and resisted returning them to the family.

But with the help of attorney E. Randol Schoenberg, Altmann and her family sued\l "l" the Austrian government in the United\l "l" States\l "l" _ a lawsuit that eventually found its way to the U.S\l "l". Supreme Court after the Austrian government repeatedly tried to have it dismissed.

The Supreme Court in 2004 ruled in Altmann's favor and following arbitration, the Austrian government awarded all five paintings to Altmann and her family in January. The collection has been on display at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art since April and will remain there until June 30, Schoenberg said.

Altmann wanted to ensure the art would remain in public view.

"One of the things we always wanted to do was for this to tell the story of what happened to Maria and her family and Jews in the Holocaust," Schoenberg said. "Now by having this painting on the wall, it will allow this story to be told and retold."

END

Morning Call (Allentown, PA)

June 17, 2006

U.S. suit seeks return of pension funds  Government wants owner of defunct Wescosville business to repay $118,376.

Kurt Blumenau Of The Morning Call

The U.S\l "I". Department of Labor has sued\l "I" the former owner of a defunct Wescosville mobile home sales company, trying to ensure she returns more than $118,000 owed to the company's pension plan.

According to the agency, Cathy Milder, formerly of G&M Land Development Inc., is required to repay $118,736 to the company's pension plan under a settlement reached in February. Milder has since filed for personal bankruptcy, according to the agency.

The department said Friday it filed a complaint in U.S. Bankruptcy Court to make sure Milder's debt to G&M is not discharged in her personal bankruptcy case.

A separate judgment was filed in July against Milder's husband and business partner, Charles, who was also a trustee of G&M's pension plan.

A department spokeswoman said she did not know where Cathy Milder lives. Attorney Andrew Shaw of Bethlehem law firm Goodman & Shaw, who represented the Milders in the earlier case, could not be reached for comment.

G&M closed in 1999, two years after it set up its pension plan.

According to the department:

An investigation found G&M in violation of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act. That federal law sets responsibilities for officials who manage retirement plan assets.

The Milders lent money from the plan to third parties, then failed to make sure the loans were repaid. They also used plan money to buy real estate, but did not pay it back when properties were sold.

The couple mixed the plan's assets with those of the company. Also, they transferred money from the plan into an escrow account and used it to make interest-free loans.

Court records do not say how many people were employed at G&M, but one document lists 20 people who are entitled to shares of pension money.

The Milders were required to forfeit their individual balances in the plan.

They have also been replaced as trustees, and were ordered to turn over all records to court-appointed fiduciary David Lipkin.

END

The Washington Post

By Arshad Mohammed and Sara Kehaulani Goo

Federal agencies mining private firms for data

Washington - The Pentagon pays a private company to compile data on teenagers it can recruit to the military. The Homeland Security Department buys consumer information to help screen people at borders and detect immigration fraud.

As federal agencies delve into the vast commercial market for consumer information, such as buying habits and financial records, they are tapping into data that would be difficult for the government to accumulate but that has become a booming business for private companies.

Industry executives, analysts and watchdog groups say the federal government has significantly increased what it spends to buy personal data from the private sector, along with the software to make sense of it, since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. They expect the sums to keep rising far into the future.

Privacy advocates say the practice exposes ordinary people to ever more scrutiny by authorities while skirting legal protections designed to limit the government's collection and use of personal data.

Critics acknowledge that such data can be vital to law enforcement or intelligence investigations of specific targets but question the usefulness of "data-mining" software that combs huge amounts of information in the hopes of finding links and patterns that might pick someone out as suspicious.

Recent reports about the National Security Agency's effort to acquire phone call records highlight the government's growing interest in the technique.

"The only question we would have is at what rate would the demand be increasing," Wayne Johnson, a financial analyst at Raymond James Financial Inc., said of the government's interest in buying commercial data and related software.

It is difficult to pinpoint the number of such contracts because many of them are classified, experts said. At the federal level, 52 government agencies had launched, or planned to begin, at least 199 data-mining projects as far back as 2004, according to a Government Accountability Office study.

Most of the programs are used to improve services, such as detecting Medicare fraud and improving customer relations.

But a growing number of agencies are exploring the technology to analyze intelligence and assist in the hunt for terrorists.

Another GAO report, released in April, found that of $30 million spent by four government agencies last year on services from data-crunching companies, 91 percent was for law enforcement or counterterrorism.

The hope is that the technology can help to discern and thwart threats just as businesses have used it for years to predict consumer behavior on buying cosmetics or repaying mortgages, for example.

Companies keep an increasing amount of data about everyone - tracking their buying, travel, bank transactions and bill-paying habits.

Data mining uses mathematical formulas to look for patterns in those behaviors. The results could enable the grocery store to send out targeted coupons, or, in theory, help the government decide how likely it may be that someone is linked to terrorist groups.

The Education Department's Project Strikeback uses mining methods to compare its databases with the FBI and verify identities. The Defense Department's Verity K2 Enterprise program searches data from the intelligence community and Internet searches to identify foreign terrorists or U.S. citizens connected to terrorists. A Navy program analyzes data to try to predict where it might find small weapons of mass destruction and narcotics smuggling in the shipping industry.

Cogito Inc. sells software to the National Security Agency that the company says can find patterns in massive amounts of data, such as lists of telephone calling records.

The Utah-based company does not know how the super-secret agency is using the software, but it does know that data-mining technology once used primarily by commercial clients is now doing booming business with the federal government.

"What was surprising ... was how aggressive and hot the intelligence and security market is for this," said William Donahoo, vice president of product management and marketing at Cogito.

More than half of Cogito's clients are in the fields of intelligence, security and public safety, he said. Critics argue that catching terrorists is far different from predicting consumer purchases or preventing credit card fraud, saying that data mining is likely to provide so many false leads that its use is a waste of time and money.

"What you don't want is to get into the Kevin Bacon game, which is to say that you show that everybody is six degrees of separation from a terrorist," said James B. Steinberg, dean of the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas.

Steinberg was a deputy national security adviser in the Clinton administration.

END

Allentown Morning Call

EDITORIAL: Federal courts, rather than Congress, should resolve executive privilege debate

June 19, 2006

One of the issues that sharply divides Americans is whether the Bush administration has over-reached the constitutional authority of the executive branch. It's good for the nation to figure this one out, because citizens feel intensely about both Fourth Amendment protections against unwarranted searches of their homes and protecting the nation from terrorists.

The best way to resolve these differences is in court, and a hearing was held in federal court in Detroit last week about the National Security Agency "eavesdropping" program. Meanwhile, members of the U.S. Senate discussed related matters. The better thing, we believe, is for the Senate to stand down while the courts hear this case. It's likely that it will proceed to the U.S. Supreme, it is true, but patience still is called for.

The specific concerns, of course, are the reports from December that the NSA has been eavesdropping on citizens suspected of having telephone contact with members of al-Qaida and other suspect groups. Then, last month, there were other reports about telephone companies handing over phone records for millions of their customers to the federal government.

The flash point with the NSA program is that it apparently was done without first getting proper court warrants, as provided in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978. In fact, the act sets up a secret court in Washington, D.C. just to handle the sensitive nature of these cases. However, President Bush said no warrants were needed because Congress intended to give him new, broad powers after the terrorist attacks of 9/11.

A lot of people don't agree, including members of Congress from both parties and this page. In January, the American Civil Liberties Union filed suit against the NSA program. It took the action on behalf of people who are likely to have contacts in the Middle East and other areas. For instance, college professors, journalists and lawyers might attract NSA's attention because of the nature of their work. The case took on an Alice in Wonderland tone when the U.S. Justice Department declined to formally respond to it, but gave the judge secret information, hoping to persuade her to throw it out. So, its legal argument amounts to "just take our word for it."

A similar suit was filed in another federal court in New York. Meanwhile, Pennsylvania's Sen. Arlen Specter and fellow members of the Senate Judiciary Committee are considering a series of bills dealing with FISA and the NSA program. They are worrisome because they would give congressional sanction to the President's claim of unlimited power or would expand the government's ability to do domestic surveillance under FISA.

There are no guarantees about how judges will strike a balance. It is a safe bet, however, that a review in court, as opposed to new laws from the political chambers of Congress, will be more to people's liking.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, June 20, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, June 20, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060620.pdf; agnb060620.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

IG Report Offers Broad Criticism Of FBI Moussaoui Investigation....3
Judge Rejects Hayat Motion To Dismiss Lying Convictions....4
Stewart Lawyers Ask Judge To Force Release Of Any NSA Surveillance In Case....4
WPost Urges US To Comply With Convention Against Torture....4
Former DOJ Officials Say ACLU Criticism Of Bush Detainee Policy Falls Flat....4

Homeland Response:

Muslim, Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Re-Entry Searches, Detentions....5
Bloomberg Greets Bush At JFK, Lobbies For More DHS Funds....5
Government To Buy Experimental Treatment For Anthrax....6
Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Watch List....6
DHS Official Recommends Book On Privacy In a "Globalized World."....6
NYTimes Criticizes "Golden Revolving Door" At DHS....6
National Guardsmen Will Be Sent To Quell Violence In New Orleans....7
Houston Inundated By Ten Inches Of Rain....7

War News:

Iraqi Official Says Missing US Soldiers In Iraq Found Tortured, "Barbarically" Killed....7
Senate Democrats Offer Plan For Iraq Aimed At Easing Party Divisions....8
Cheney Stands By Claim That Insurgency Is In Its Last Throes....9
Koizumi Pulling Japanese Troops Out Of Iraq....10
Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Unofficial Pullout "Road Map" Exists....10
Three US Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainee Deaths 10
US Cancels Major Iraq Prison Contract....11
Barred Military Contractor Keeps Working In Iraq Under New Name....11
Prosecution Asks For Death Penalty For Saddam....11
USA Today Says Khalilzad Cable Shows Grim Reality Of Iraq 11
Cohen Says US Suffers From Attention Deficit Disorder In Iraq Policy....11
Taliban Produces "Biggest Show Of Strength" In Years....12
Pentagon Seeks To Add Special Ops Troops Without Lowering Standards....12
New PTSD Cases Running More Than Six Times VA Expectation....12

Corporate Scandals:

US Asks For Higher Bond For Conrad Black....12
Denver Attorney Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Investigation....13
Father, Son Plead Guilty To Fraud In SureWest Probe....13
Olson Tapped To Head Accounting Board....13
South Korean Officials Clear Lone Star In Probe Of KEB Deal....14
Insurers Concerned About Options Timing Probe....14

Criminal Law:

DOJ Extends Abramoff's Freedom For Three Months As Cooperation Continues....14
Daley Secretary Testifies About Political Hiring List....15
Former Boston FBI Official Testifies Leaks Torpedoed Bulger Probe....15
Jordan Assigning More FBI Agents, Analysts To Wales Murder Case....15
Former Virginia Police Officers Plead Guilty To Lying To FBI About Bribes....15
Justices Sets Limits On Admissibility Of Evidence....16

Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Chicago Mobster 16
Former Stock Trader Sentenced To 11 Years In Prison 16
Boiler-Room Operator Sentenced To 17 Years In Prison 16
California's Searches Of Parolees Upheld 16
Pennsylvania School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Child Porn..... 17
Baggy Jeans Pose Problem For Fleeing Thieves 17

Civil Law:

Supreme Court To Hear Administration Effort To Revive Late-Term Abortion Ban 17
Judge Approves Extension Of Delphi Reorganization Filing .. 18
Debate Over Regulation Of 527s Stymies Lobbying Reform Bill's Progress 18

Civil Rights:

9th Circuit To Hear Arguments On Hawaiian School Admission Policies..... 18
Federal Judge Overturns Jury Verdict In Age Bias Suit..... 19
Abortion Ban To Be Placed On South Dakota Ballot..... 19
Pentagon Document Lists Homosexuality As Mental Disorder 19
Feinstein Makes Case For Flag Protection Amendment..... 19
WSJournal Blasts Gerrymandering In The Name Of "Voting Rights." 19

Antitrust:

DOJ Task Force Report To Tout Progress In Protecting Intellectual Property..... 20
Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices In Real Estate..... 20
DOJ Will Not Challenge Collaborative Labor Database..... 20
FTC Endorses Online Legal Referral Services 21
Net Neutrality Debate Pits Diverse Coalition Against Entrenched Lobbyists..... 21
Attorneys Allege DOJ Over-Reaction In Qualcomm Gun-Jumping Case..... 21
Morgan Stanley Hikes Bid For Denver Energy Firm..... 22
Judge Dismisses Antitrust Suit Against Oil Companies..... 22
Supreme Court Seeks US Comment On IPO Underwriter Appeal..... 22
Senate Committee Proposes Internet User "Bill Of Rights." ... 23
Mittal Claims Growing Support For Arcelor Bid 23
On Heels Of Nokia Venture, Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate Service Unit..... 23
LATimes Says Internet Phone Companies Shouldn't Pay Service Fees 23

Environment:

High Court Rules Federal Regulators Overstepped Authority Under Clean Water Act..... 24
Pombo Says Deal Has Been Reached On Offshore Oil Drilling..... 25
Kempthorne Restores Preservation As Park Service's Primary Goal..... 25
Authors Lament Extinction Of Tasmanian Tiger 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Weapons, Drug Charges..... 26
Political Opponents Call For Connecticut Mayor To Resign Over Cocaine Allegation 26
Illegal Drug Use Declines Among US Workers 26
Two Men Accused Of Supplying Michigan Teen With Fentanyl-Laced Heroin..... 27
Louisiana Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Providing Pain Medication 27
Ohio Lab Said To Be Under Scrutiny By Regulators..... 27

Immigration:

Conservative Leaders Challenge Bush On Immigration 27

Tax:

California Businessman Arrested In Alleged Tax Deduction Scheme..... 29
Thomas Unveils Estate Tax Repeal Plan 29

Congress-Administration:

Rumsfeld Said To Give Little Attention To Weapons Procurement..... 29
Zoellick Announces Resignation From State Department Post..... 29
Energetic PR Effort Underway To Depict Bush As Fully Engaged..... 30
Snow Deliberately Kept In Dark About Baghdad Trip..... 30
Federal Agencies' Varying Standards For Polygraph Tests Create Frustration..... 30
Cheney Presents Gerald Ford Prize To New York Daily News Reporter..... 31
GOP Lawmakers Have Extensive Agenda For The Next Five Weeks 31
Democrats Pledge To Keep Pressure On GOP Regarding Minimum Wage Hike 31
Police Union Wants Ethics Probe Of McKinney..... 31
Fundraiser Boosts McCrery's Bid For Ways And Means Chairmanship..... 32

DOJ_NMG_0035121

USDA Official Cancels Some Alternative Work Schedules 32
Secret Service Agents Perform CPR On Former Treasury Official 32
Justices' Comments On Court's Independence Applauded .. 32

Other News:

Stocks Fall Amid Inflation Fears 33
Cooper Tire Efforts To Avoid Accident Lawsuits Examined ... 33
Bush Helps GOP Campaign Committees Raise $27 Million For 2006 33
Santorum Courts Jewish Vote 33
Dean's Brother Urges Democrats To Support Lamont If Lieberman Runs As Independent 34
McCain Seen As Candidate With Crossover Appeal 34
Lack Of Clear Frontrunner Opens Field For Number Of Candidates For 2008 34
Zogby Sees Wal-Mart Shoppers As Latest Key Voting Block .. 34
Patronage Charges Continue To Dog Kentucky Governor 34
Consultant Says Airbus's Superjumbo Project Should Not Have Been Born 35
NYTimes Says Congress Should Save The SIPP 35
WPost Says Virginia Lawmakers Failed To Address Transportation 35
Bush Urges Iran To Accept Limits On Enrichment 35
Rice Again Cautions Pyongyang Against Missile Test 37
McCain Receptive To India Nuclear Deal, Doubts Approval This Year 38
US, Russia Reach Deal On Weapons Of Mass Destruction Program 39
Hamas Government Pays Cash To Palestinian Workers 39
Bolton Questions Need For UN Peacekeepers In East Timor 39
Morocco Cracks Down On Islamist Activists Amid Coup Fears 39
Bush, Brazil's Da Silva Discuss Trade 40
Chavez Lines Up Regional Support For UNSC Seat 40
US Opposition Said To Have Weakened New UN Human Rights Council 40
US, EU To Launch Joint Effort To Protect Intellectual Property Rights 40
Morales Land Reform Proposals Already Stirring Class Conflict 40
Much Of Europe Continues To Rely On Pollution-Producing Coal Plants 41
Internet Said To Have Transformative Role In China 41
Independent Media Seen As Advancing Islam's "Reformation." 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 42

TERRORISM NEWS:

IG Report Offers Broad Criticism Of FBI Moussaoui Investigation. The previously-redacted Zacarias Moussaoui section of Justice Department IG Glenn Fine's report on pre-9/11 intelligence failures was released yesterday. Fine criticized the actions taken by FBI personnel at all levels in the investigation of Moussaoui after his arrest in August 2001, including those by "whistleblower" Colleen Rowley.

Under the headline, "FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says," the Washington Post (6/20, A6, Markon, Eggen, 744K) reports, "unlike previous public criticisms of the FBI's bungling of the case…Fine's analysis said there was plenty of blame to go around." But "ultimately, Fine concluded, no FBI policies or procedures were violated in the Moussaoui investigation." Responding to the report in a statement yesterday, "the FBI emphasized that Fine had 'dismissed any instances of intentional wrongdoing by FBI employees or any violation of FBI policies or practices' and found there was no attempt by FBI headquarters 'to intentionally thwart the efforts' of Minneapolis agents. Intelligence and other reforms since Sept. 11, the bureau added, have left the FBI 'much better positioned today to detect and prevent terrorism.'"

The AP (6/20, Barakat) focuses on Rowley and reports that Fine "credits Rowley overall for blowing the whistle on mistakes at FBI headquarters in its failure to aggressively investigate Moussaoui," but he "faults Rowley for failing to pursue other investigative avenues, such as a traditional criminal search warrant." In a Monday interview with AP, Rowley said that she "disagrees with the report…when it concludes that FBI headquarters had a reasonable basis to question a search warrant on Moussaoui. Rowley maintains that Minneapolis had laid out probable cause and said officials at headquarters were simply unwilling to stick their necks out." UPI (6/20) also briefly reports on Fine's analysis, under the headline "Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent."

DOJ_NMG_0035122

Judge Rejects Hayat Motion To Dismiss Lying Convictions. The AP (6/20, Thompson) reports US District Court Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. yesterday rejected Hamid Hayat's motion to dismiss the three counts of lying to the FBI on which he was convicted along with a charge of providing material support to terrorists. Hayat attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi "argued that federal prosecutors were piling on potential prison time by charging three versions of the same lying offense." But Burrell ruled that "the circumstances of the two interviews were significantly different" because "the FBI needed to learn whether Hayat planned to attack the U.S. … 'He impaired the ability of the FBI to specifically identify a potential terrorist threat,' Burrell said in his 11-page ruling." The Stockton (CA) Record (6/20) also notes Burrell "ruled that Hayat's three lying convictions are not redundant, because each lie hindered the FBI's investigation of an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in Lodi."

Stewart Lawyers Ask Judge To Force Release Of Any NSA Surveillance In Case. The New York Post (6/20, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Convicted terror lawyer Lynne Stewart wants to force the feds to reveal whether they used the National Security Agency's secret surveillance program to gain access to her personal phone records. In papers filed in Manhattan federal court yesterday, Stewart's lawyers asked Judge John Koeltl for access to any phone and Internet records related to her case that the feds might have reviewed without a warrant." The Post notes, "Lawyers for Stewart claim her case may have been compromised if the feds had access to confidential communications under the controversial surveillance program, which they claim is illegal."

WPost Urges US To Comply With Convention Against Torture. The Washington Post (6/20, A16, 744K) editorializes, "The Convention Against Torture has been ratified by the Senate and should also bind the United States. In a report last month, the UN Committee Against Torture, which oversees the convention, spelled out what that would mean. Secret detention of prisoners in CIA facilities, it said, 'constitutes, per se, a violation of the Convention'; so does the 'rendition' of suspects to other countries where they might be tortured 'without any judicial procedure.' To come into compliance, the United States must disclose to the International Committee of the Red Cross the identities of all detainees it is holding and allow monitoring of their treatment. It must also give them access to a judicial process or release them as soon as possible." The Post adds, "All of this the United States should in any case want to do, in its own interest. It should establish one set of rules for questioning all prisoners. Those rules should conform with international treaties and the U.S. Constitution, so that inhumane treatment is at all times forbidden. And the rules should be public, so that the world can see that the United States has returned to its fundamental values."

Former DOJ Officials Say ACLU Criticism Of Bush Detainee Policy Falls Flat. In a Los Angeles Times column (6/20), former Justice Department officials David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey say, "In an effort to show that on the Bush administration's evil watch the U.S. military has been systematically mistreating prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan with tacit approval or even outright encouragement from its civilian superiors, the American Civil Liberties Union has been demanding the release of dozens of internal military investigative reports. But the two reports on U.S. detainee policy just released in response to an ACLU lawsuit paint a picture quite the opposite of what the ACLU expected." Though "heavily redacted to remove operational details, the reports (by Brig. Gens. Richard Formica and Charles Jacoby) show a Pentagon open to criticism and change, and determined to guarantee detainees the humane treatment promised by President Bush when the war on terror began." Although "genuine instances of abuse are noted," these "are very much the exception and not the rule. The reports indicate that many allegations of abuse simply are unsubstantiated — or that the 'victim's' story changes once carefully examined." Predictably, the ACLU "has cried 'whitewash.' But what we are seeing is the refusal by administration critics to see anything other than the 'torture narrative' they have constructed."

Robinson Urges US To Close Guantanamo Prison. Columnist Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K), "We'd better not turn away just yet from the suicides of those three detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The rest of the world clearly isn't ready to move on. And with good reason. In many newspapers around the globe 'Guantanamo' is much more than the name of a beautiful harbor on Cuba's southern coast." It has become "shorthand for a whole litany of American excesses in George W. Bush's 'global war on terror,' the most visible example of how the United States blithely ignores the values of due process and rule of law that it so aggressively preaches, if necessary at the point of a gun." Robinson adds "we're long past the point where the government needs to show the world what's happening at Guantanamo. Instead of hurrying to expel reporters, the Pentagon should invite one and all to witness the orderly, legal process of emptying and shutting down a prison that is doing this nation much more harm than good."

DOJ_NMG_0035123

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim, Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Re-Entry Searches, Detentions. The New York Times (6/20, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports, "A group of Muslim and Arab-Americans, frustrated by what they say is the climate of suspicion and fear that dogs their re-entry into the United States from trips abroad, sued the Department of Homeland Security and the F.B.I. yesterday, demanding that the courts protect their civil rights." The class-action lawsuit, filed by the ACLU in Chicago, "contends that the courts alone can ensure that antiterrorism policies do not repeatedly subject ordinary Americans to detention, questioning, fingerprinting and the like." Illinois ACLU legal director Harvey Grossman "noted that Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, testifying May 2 before the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not guarantee that inaccuracies on the terrorist watch list would be corrected within the next five years." In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, the Chicago Tribune (6/20, Coen, 643K) adds that the plaintiffs "are calling for changes in policy at the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center and at U.S. Customs and Border Protection. 'We've taken a lot of time to bring together a broad array of plaintiffs from all over the country who have been stopped at every major airport and border crossing,' Grossman said. 'They are doctors, a pharmacist, businessmen.' The plaintiffs allege their civil rights have been violated through what they call 'highly punitive detentions' and harassment." The Tribune notes, "Bill Carter, a spokesman for the FBI in Washington, said there would be no comment because of the pending litigation."

WXYZ-TV Detroit (6/19, Agar, Morgan) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Dr. Elie Khoury has been delivering babies in Detroit for 43 years. He was born in Palestine and said he's treated like a terrorist even though he's an American citizen. Seven times in the past three years when returning from vacations in Mexico and Australia, he and his wife have been detained and separated from each other and their children. … He and the others bringing the lawsuit against Homeland Security, the FBI, Immigration and Customs said they are detained and questioned for hours."

Bloomberg Greets Bush At JFK, Lobbies For More DHS Funds. The New York Times (6/20, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports on "an unusually close encounter" that took the form of Mayor Bloomberg, who is "safely ensconced" in his final term, purposely flying to JFK Airport to meet President Bush before for his commencement address at the Merchant Marine Academy. While Bloomberg "studiously avoided" appearing with Bush in 2004, the mayor and president "shook hands beside Air Force One, with Mr. Bush slapping Mr. Bloomberg on the back and then later putting both hands on Mr. Bloomberg's shoulders to whisper in his ear." During the "seemingly amiable meeting," Bloomberg pointed to the abandoned 2003 cyanide plot to lobby for more Homeland Security funds. Bush expressed "disappointment" that the total amount for Homeland Security was cut.

WNBC-TV.com (6/19) calls the Bloomberg gesture "a surprise move" from the recent Bush critic, and goes into previous "attacks" on national issues levied against the administration.

Details Of Al Qaeda Plot Against New York Subway Examined. More details about the al Qaeda plot to attack the New York subway using homemade cyanide explosive devices, first revealed in author Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," were revealed yesterday. NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 6, 2:25, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported a "CIA source inside al Qaeda" says "the plan was to attack the subway with a lethal mix of hydrogen and cyanide, setting off a small explosion, releasing a deadly gas. New York went on alert." Mayor Michael Bloomberg, New York City: "We were completely posted by Washington and we took appropriate precautions and I guess history shows, since nothing happened, that we did what was correct." Mitchell: "Bloomberg, who rides the subways, says they're safe." But Suskind "says an al Qaeda cell came within 45 days of striking the subway and could still be in the US." Ron Suskind, author: "They don't have specifics as to exactly who they are, name, rank and serial number, but they're searching and have been searching fiercely for a cell like this if in fact they remained in the country." Mitchell: Bin Laden deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri called off the plot, but "why is still a mystery." Michael Sheehan, former NY counter-terrorism official: "I think if al Qaeda had an operation cell in New York City ready to go, it would have launched it. So I think there might have been other problems with this operation." Mitchell: "Other revelations confirmed by NBC News, the FBI penetrated Osama bin Laden's bank, the CIA kidnapped the banker and his tellers, replacing them with CIA agents of Pakistani descent." Dennis Lormel, former FBI official: "It was an important money laundering mechanism to al Qaeda that basically was dismantled." Mitchell: "And the book reveals that after capturing 9/11 organizer Ramzi bin al-Shibh in Karachi, the CIA found a treasure trove, including brand new Sudanese passports for bin Laden's wife and sons. Vice President Cheney said today that it is not just luck that has prevented another attack on the US since 9/11, but some experts fear that could be because al Qaeda is biding its time for an even more spectacular attack."

DOJ_NMG_0035124

Government To Buy Experimental Treatment For Anthrax. The Washington Post (6/20, D1, Rosenwald, 744K) reports, "Human Genome Sciences Inc. is scheduled to announce today that the federal government has agreed to buy $165 million worth of an experimental treatment for anthrax infection in what will become the 14-year-old Rockville firm's first product sale." The purchase of "20,000 doses of Abthrax under the government's $5.6 billion Project BioShield program" is intended" to help the government stockpile a variety of anthrax therapies, including vaccines and drugs such as Abthrax, which would typically be given after exposure to the lethal substance." The government, which "could have purchased 100,000 doses under the BioShield contract," has also been considering "another anthrax treatment from Cangene Corp., a Canadian biotech company. For now, federal health officials appear to have settled on Abthrax. Cangene is not expected to be awarded a contract today, according to people briefed on the deal."

Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Watch List. The New York Times (6/20, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports the ACLU filed a lawsuit against the Department of Homeland Security and the FBI yesterday in which Muslim and Arab-Americans claim that they face a "climate of suspicion and fear" upon "re-entry into the United States from trips abroad. … The seven main plaintiffs in the class action suit assert that both the United States Congress and the federal government are ignoring the plight of innocent Americans harassed repeatedly because of problems with the terrorist watch list." Donna A. Bucella, director of the Terrorist Screening Center of the F.B.I., where the watch list is maintained, said it is "an important tool for local law enforcement agencies," but that "there must be ways the U.S. government could refine it and make it better."

DHS Official Recommends Book On Privacy In a "Globalized World." John W. Kropf, of the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/20, 90K) writes, "Even if you've never physically set foot outside the United States, your personal information has traveled the globe." Kropf adds that the "average citizen" should care about this "in a globalized world, where personal information has become a major form of currency for both private industry and government." Kropf adds that "The Governance of Privacy," a book by Colin J. Bennett and Charles D. Raab examining "the world of global privacy" should be "a must read" for those in the privacy field. It is noted that Kropf's vies "are his and not those of the Department of Homeland Security or the government."

NYTimes Criticizes "Golden Revolving Door" At DHS. Under the headline "The Golden Revolving Door," the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes that since its creation, DHS "has hardly covered itself with glory." However, "there's one area in which Homeland Security has excelled beyond anyone's wildest expectations: creating a giant, expensive crop of government-trained consultants and lobbyists." Referring to a Times report that "at least 90 top Homeland Security officials have gone through that famous revolving door between the government and the lobbying industry," the Times questions how "the people running an agency that performs so badly could be so much in demand." The Times states that those left at the agency are likely to "temper their own judgments about what systems to buy and what consultants to use with an eye on their own private-sector prospects." The Time says a "loophole" allowing former DHS officials to lobby former colleagues without waiting a year "should be revisited immediately."

DOJ_NMG_0035125

National Guardsmen Will Be Sent To Quell Violence In New Orleans. USA Today (6/20, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports that following a "a surge of violence" in New Orleans that left six dead over the weekend, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco "plans to send hundreds of state police and National Guardsmen into the city's hurricane-ravaged areas" to aid local police. Mayor Ray Nagin, who requested the extra help Monday, said the troops and state police "would free up city police officers to cover the more densely populated areas."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "a new emergency to deal with, a crime wave." Today, "an angry Mayor of New Orleans asked for and got several hundred National Guard soldiers and additional state police officers to try and stem the rising tide of violence."

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Blanco is sending troops "to help patrol the streets, where residents say crime has been rising. Last weekend, five teenagers were shot to death. There have been more than 50 murders in New Orleans so far this year."

The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Fausset, 958K) reports, "Federal troops were a common sight in New Orleans after Katrina." After the storm, some locals hoped that the "stub of a city -- less populous, but also less poor -- would be reborn with less of the crime and violence that have long marred New Orleans' reputation." However, "A criminal element has returned, bringing back turf wars, drugs and deaths."

The New York Times (6/20, Saulny, 1.19M) calls Nagin's request for troops "a blunt admission that the city could no longer control its growing crime problem." The Times adds that the city's Police Department "has not bounced back from the storm," having "suffered sharp budget cuts" and a "tarnished reputation."

Houston Inundated By Ten Inches Of Rain. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that as storms moved across Houston Monday, parts of the city "got more than ten inches of rain." ABC (von Fremd) added, "From the air, it looked like a replay of Katrina. People staying inside this YMCA were trapped and forced to the rooftop, waving for help." Houston Mayor Bill White: "We have gotten 500 calls in through the center on the 911 line for rescues. Most of those, the vast majority of those have been rescues from automobiles."

USA Today (6/20, Welch, 2.31M) reports "residents were bracing for another round of torrential rain and flooding after a slow-moving storm dumped more than 10 inches Monday and sent rising waters into homes, business and vehicles." Rusty Cornelius, Harris County Emergency Management coordinator, said 300 people had been rescued "by midday Monday when waters began to recede. … As many as 200 Guard troops were made available to the city, Cornelius said. US Coast Guard aircraft were also standing by, he said. When waters began receding Monday afternoon, crews were ordered to rest and prepare to resume rescue efforts if the additional rains arrive as forecast."

The CBS Evening News (6/19, story 6, :20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The floodwaters forced motorists out of their cars and people out of their homes. Governor Rick Perry ordered Texas National Guard trucks and helicopters to help."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 4, 2:35, Teague, 9.87M) reported, "The Governor of Texas has ordered the National Guard to Houston to help with relief efforts. Tonight, most of the floodwaters have receded, but residents here wonder how the water could have risen so fast." Floodwaters "rose so fast, fire crews were forced to improvise, using dump trucks to rescue at least 500 residents and motorists trapped by high water." Amazingly, "no lives were lost, but the raging waters are an unwelcome reminder for the tens of thousands of Katrina evacuees still living in Houston that weather can change lives in an instant."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Official Says Missing US Soldiers In Iraq Found Tortured, "Barbarically" Killed. The Washington Post (6/20, 6:20 a.m., Finer, 744K) reports on its Web site, "The two U.S. soldiers missing since an attack on a checkpoint last week were found dead near a power plant in Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, according to an Iraqi defense official. General Abdul Aziz Muhammed, head of operations at Iraqi Ministry of Defense said in a news conference in Baghdad this afternoon that the soldiers had been 'barbarically' killed and that there were traces of torture on their bodies. … The Army yesterday identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore."

The Washington Post (6/20, A12, Partlow, Finer, 744K) reports, "More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured villages south of Baghdad on Monday for two soldiers missing since an attack four days ago, as an insurgent group linked to al-Qaeda in Iraq" named the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council "claimed that it had abducted the Army privates." The AFP (6/20) adds Secretary Rice "said that the US government is very worried about" the kidnapped soldiers. She is quoted saying, "This is obviously a matter of great concern to all of us. And the American military has made very clear that they are going to do everything possible -- I think they've said air, land and sea -- to try and find them. And obviously their safe return is something that everyone will work for, and their safe return is something that everyone will pray for."

DOJ_NMG_0035126

The story was the lead on CBS and NBC, while ABC ran it second in its newscast. The CBS Evening News (6/19, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "Search teams are under almost daily attacks. At least seven US soldiers have been wounded since the manhunt began. A sweeping operation of more than 8,000 US and Iraqi troops the military describes as the largest of its kind." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell: "We are using all available assets, coalition and Iraqi to find our soldiers, and will not stop looking until we find them." An "Islamic militant group linked to al Qaeda Interact posted a brief message on a Website boasting they had kidnapped the two Americans but offered no proof, only saying they would release more information later."

In a separate story, the CBS Evening News (6/19, story 2, 1:55, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Only the insurgents know if this was a clever trap or they just got lucky. But the US troops appear to have made a critical mistake by dividing their force in the face of the enemy. Troops are trained in tactics designed to thwart hostage taking. No patrols with fewer than three humvees, no soldier left alone even in camp. But in the end it comes down to a young American faced with a choice of fighting to the death or being captured. And there is no training for that."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, lead story, 4:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The group al Qaeda in Iraq said it is holding them, and American commanders are worried that there is now a new threat facing American forces there -- the threat of abduction -- becoming hostages in this conflict that has taken over 2,500 American lives." NBC (Boettcher) added, "A US military spokesman says a massive search is underway to find them." Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman: "Approximately 12 villages have been cleared in the area and we continue to engage local citizens for help and information leading to the whereabouts of our soldiers." Boettcher: "But as NBC News learned while covering a recent American mission in the area, this is hostile territory for US forces." US military sources "tell NBC News they believe this was an expert operation by the insurgents to try to gain back control of the momentum after the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi."

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 2, 2:25, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "Knowing that thousands of soldiers are looking for these men is a comfort. But there is a kind of powerlessness that grips the nation at such moments. While the country absorbs the death of a soldier, a kidnapping can crack the national composure." USA Today (6/20, Soriano, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (6/20, Roug, 958K) and Washington Times/AP (6/20, Yacoub) run similar stories. The Washington Post (6/20, A12, Moreno, 744K) also reports on the soldiers' families.

Senate Democrats Offer Plan For Iraq Aimed At Easing Party Divisions. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) reported that some Senate Democrats "unveiled a plan aimed at easing election year divisions within the party" over when to begin withdrawing US troops form Iraq. CNN (Bash) added that "what a core group of Democrats did do today was try to make the case in this election year that they're sort of in touch with the desire among the growing number of Americans that they want to see not only change in Iraq but specifically, some kind of time table for the end date, so to speak, some kind of specific plan for how to get out of Iraq eventually." The Democrats' plan "would begin the phased redeployment of US troops from Iraq in 2006 and also require the administration to submit a plan by the end of 2006 for continued phase redeployment beyond 2006." Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Hume) said that Senate Democrats are "groping for party unity on Iraq."

The AP (6/20, Sidoti) says "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada backs the resolution and his aides say they expect 38 to 40 Democrats and a few Republicans to vote for the symbolic statement." They "don't expect to get the 51 votes needed to attach the resolution to an annual military bill."

The New York Times (6/20, Zernike, Hulse, 1.19M) reports the "non binding resolution" was "carefully worded to deflect any accusations that the Democrats were 'cutting and running,' as their position has been depicted by Republicans. The Democrats behind the measure did not even use the term 'withdrawal,'" and "talked about how to guarantee

DOJ_NMG_0035127

'success' for Iraq, not about any failures of the war." The resolution "was cobbled together by moderate Democrats trying to smooth over differences within the party. The minority leadership has tried to distance itself from a proposal by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a mandatory deadline for American combat troops to be out of Iraq by the end of this year, a limit that Mr. Kerry modified only marginally on Monday. Some Republican lawmakers and the White House pointed to that proposal last week in attacking Democrats as inconsistent and weak on national security."

The Washington Times (6/20, Bellantoni, 90K) reports the sponsors of the resolution are Sens. Carl Levin, Jack Reed, Dianne Feinstein and Ken Salazar. A White House "official last night dismissed the amendment, saying it calls for an arbitrary timeline that will encourage terrorists to wait for the United States to leave. 'The choice is to stay and win or to allow Iraq to come become a safe haven for terrorists to plot against the United States,' the official said."

Under the headline "For Democrats, a Delicate Balance on Iraq," the Washington Post (6/20, A15, Babington, Weisman, 744K) says Democrats are "scrambling to find a Goldilocks solution: not too hot on withdrawing US troops quickly, but not so cold as to alienate large numbers of Democratic voters furious about the war and eager to bring the Americans home."

Kerry To Offer His Own Amendment Calling For Withdrawal By July 2007. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Bash) reported that not all Senate Democrats are supporting the plan. CNN "has learned…that Senator [John] Kerry will unveil and propose his own amendment tomorrow on the Senate floor. And he's changed his amendment just a bit. And he is going to say, according to a source, in Senator Kerry's office, that he wants troops to be fully withdrawn, all combat troops to come home from Iraq, by July 1st, 2007."

The Los Angeles Times (620, Reynolds, 958K) the Kerry proposal, also authored by Sen. Russ Feingold, "appears to have the support of half a dozen senators, including Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has signed on as a sponsor.'" The Times adds, "Many of the senators who support the Kerry proposal are expected to back the Levin amendment too, aides said."

Dean Says Bush Has No Plan To Get Us Troops Out Of Iraq. DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19), "I think the Democrats have been pretty clear about what they want. They want a transition, and now there's going to be a vote on asking the President for a timetable. We need to be out of Iraq. We know we can't leave immediately, but we need to be out, and we need to hear from the President something other than, 'I started this, but we're going to leave this to the next president.'" Asked if US troops should be out of Iraq by the end of the year, Dean said, "The bottom line here is not what the specifics of the plan are. The bottom line is the president doesn't have a plan and the Democrats believe that we should be heading in another direction, which is what the American people believe."

Dean Says Republicans Can't Be Trusted To Defend America. Dean said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19), "You simply can't trust the Republicans to defend America anymore. It's not that they're not willing to be tough, it's just that they're not smart." Dean added, "You can't trust those people to defend America. I submit to you that it is the Republicans that are weak on defense, because they don't know what they're doing."

Cheney Stands By Claim That Insurgency Is In Its Last Throes. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) reported that Vice President Dick Cheney "was asked today about his remark more than a year ago that the insurgency in Iraq was in its last throes. He told the National Press Club that he still believes that, but he also acknowledged that he underestimated the strength of the insurgency."

In a similar report, Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Hume) noted Cheney "said something on Iraq today that most people probably already knew or thought, but that no one at his level had ever acknowledged." Fox (Emanuel) added that Cheney, speaking at a Press club luncheon, said, "he underestimated the strength of the insurgency in Iraq. … The Vice President also defended his comment last year that the Iraqi insurgency was, quote, in its final throes."

The Washington Post (6/20, A13, Ricks, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark," and says Cheney "has repeatedly stood by his May 2005 declaration that the insurgency was waning, even as Democratic politicians and comedians have mocked it." It "has joined a litany of administration statements about Iraq cited as examples of wishful thinking, including that reconstruction would be inexpensive for US taxpayers and that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators."

Cheney Says Government's Actions Have Prevented Terror Attacks Since 9/11. USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) reports, "The United States' biggest terrorism threat is

DOJ_NMG_0035128

'an al-Qaeda cell armed with a nuclear weapon or a biological agent in the middle of one of our own cities,' Vice President Cheney said Monday." Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney "credited aggressive US action for preventing terrorist attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. 'The fact of the matter is we have been safe and secure here at home,' he said. 'That's not an accident. It didn't happen just because we got lucky.'" Cheney "said improved intelligence-gathering and preventive steps have thwarted attacks on US soil. He singled out the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program as important in the war on terrorism and said it 'clearly is legal' and is 'consistent with the Constitution.'"

Dean Says Cheney Has No Credibility. DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19), "Vice President Cheney has no credibility in this matter." Dean was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19) about Cheney's claim that the capture of Saddam Hussein "was, in part, the reason we've not been attacked" since 9/11. Dean said, "That's complete hooey. Saddam Hussein had nothing to do with 9/11. That's just part of the Republican nonsense that got us in to Iraq in the first place and the Americans now know that's complete hooey and the President and Vice President were not telling the truth when they said that."

Koizumi Pulling Japanese Troops Out Of Iraq. The Washington Post (6/20, A13, Faiola, 744K) notes Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi announced a plan Tuesday to withdraw Japan's 550 troops from Iraq, ending a landmark mission that became Tokyo's largest military operation since World War II." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced that Iraqi troops would take over security next month around the southern city of Samawah, where the Japanese and other forces are stationed. Officials [in Tokyo] have repeatedly said that the Japanese -- whose withdrawal has been anticipated for months -- had been awaiting that decision before finalizing withdrawal plans." The Post notes, "The Japanese withdrawal is not expected to dramatically affect the effort to rebuild Iraq. Analysts have said the Japanese mission there is more symbolic than strategic."

The Financial Times (6/20, Dinmore, Pilling) says "the shrinking US 'coalition of the willing' in Iraq has come to resemble more a coalition of the reluctant, as allies weigh up the costs of continued involvement in an unpopular war against the benefits of backing President George W. Bush for the rest of his second term." According to the Times, "Analysts say only the UK provided a sizeable military force that actually made a difference in operational capability. Contributions from most other countries had more meaning in terms of political support for the US when the Bush administration failed to win enough backing for a second resolution at the UN." The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Wallace, 958K), among other sources, also reports the story.

Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Unofficial Pullout "Road Map" Exists. In a Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) op-ed, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie says that while there is "no defined timeline" for a coalition withdrawal from Iraq, there is "an unofficial 'road map' to foreign troop reductions that will eventually lead to total withdrawal." It is based "not just on a series of dates but, more important, on the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq." Rubaie decries "influential foreign figures" who are "trying to spoon-feed our government," saying Iraq "has to grow out of the shadow of the United States and the coalition, take responsibility for its own decisions, learn from its own mistakes, and find Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems."

Three US Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainee Deaths. Three soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division were charged with murder in connection with the May 9 deaths of three detainees in Iraq. There are considerable differences in the attention given to the story by television and print sources. ABC and NBC both led their evening newscasts with the charges, but newspaper coverage is less prominent.

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, lead story, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported that investigators believe Army Pfc. Cory Clagett, Spc. William Hunsaker, and Staff Sgt. William Girouard "intentionally murdered three Iraqi males, and then tried to cover it up." The three took the Iraqis into custody during an operation north of Baghdad. The "accused soldiers initially said that the detainees were trying to escape. But a lower ranking soldier e-mailed his superiors saying he had witnessed what he thought was murder." The identity and even the nationality of the victims remains unclear. NBC Nightly News (6/19, lead story, 4:15, Boettcher, 9.87M) says they "are not identified as Iraqis but as foreign nationals. We are still trying to determine exactly who they were."

In contrast to the lengthy coverage on the other two networks, the CBS Evening News (6/19, story 3, :15, Schieffer,

DOJ_NMG_0035129

7.66M) ran only a brief item that also said the three soldiers "are also charged with threatening to kill another American soldier who witnessed the killings." CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) said the soldiers are "in pretrial confinement now. … They will go to an Article 32 hearing, which is the military equivalent of a civilian grand jury. And from there, they will decide whether they will proceed to court-martial."

The New York Times (6/20, Shanker, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports a "Defense Department official said investigators had evidence that the soldiers had released the detainees deliberately before they were shot, apparently to have a pretext for killing them as they fled." The Washington Times (6/20, Scarborough, 90K) says the case "could be the first in a series of murder charges against soldiers and Marines in the deaths of Iraqi civilians. … Two major cases remain under investigation" -- the Haditha incident and the death of an Iraqi man in Hamandiyah.

US Cancels Major Iraq Prison Contract. In what it calls a "harsh rebuke" for the company, the New York Times (6/20, Glanz, 1.19M) reports the Army Corps of Engineers has cancelled a $99.1 million contract with Parsons, "one of the largest companies working in Iraq, to build a prison north of Baghdad after the firm fell more than two years behind schedule, threatened to go millions of dollars over budget and essentially abandoned the construction site." The prison, which was originally supposed to be completed this month, "appears to be the largest single rebuilding project canceled for failing to achieve its goals under the $45 billion American rebuilding program."

Barred Military Contractor Keeps Working In Iraq Under New Name. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (6/20, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports on how Custer Battles LLC, "which the U.S. military had accused of fraud and barred from receiving any new Iraq contracts," has been revived under another name. Custer Battles was sold to Danubia Global, a Romanian firm, for one dollar, and though "the U.S. sanctions technically put Custer Battles out of business, it never actually shut down. After paying its dollar, Danubia took on most of Custer Battles's employees," and work continued. The Custer Battles-Danubia link is now "the focus of a federal criminal investigation."

Prosecution Asks For Death Penalty For Saddam. NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 2, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in Baghdad, "the prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial argued strongly for the death penalty as the only fair punishment for the torture and killings of dozens of people in a Shiite village in the 1980s. The prosecutor called the executions barbaric and cruel and savage. Saddam Hussein claims the villagers were part of an assassination attempt against him." ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) noted "the chief prosecutor demanded Saddam's execution for barbaric, cruel and savage acts that showed no mercy for the old, women or children. Saddam answered the summation with sarcasm. 'Well done,' he muttered."

USA Today (6/20, Soriano, 2.31M) reports the prosecutor also "recommended the death penalty for Barzan Ibrahim -- Saddam's half-brother and head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency -- and former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan." He "asked for leniency for three other defendants and for dismissal of charges against Mohammed Azawi Ali, a former Baath Party official from Dujail, because of a lack of evidence. He left it up to the courts to decide a punishment for Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of Saddam's Revolutionary Court." The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Peterson, 61K), Los Angeles Times (6/20, Stack, 958K), Washington Post (6/20, A13, Partlow, 744K), New York Times (6/20, Burns, 1.19M) and Washington Times/AP (6/20, Juhi) run similar stories.

USA Today Says Khalilzad Cable Shows Grim Reality Of Iraq. Commenting on a recent diplomatic cable from US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad to Secretary of State Rice, USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) editorializes that the lives of nine Iraqi employees of the US embassy "when they are outside the fortified safety of the Green Zone" described therein suggest "fundamentalists and militias are fast obtaining the kind of power that destroys governments. … Nine lives do not tell the story of an entire country, nor is the cable reason to bring troops home. Other measures paint a brighter picture. Nevertheless, for those who wonder whom to believe in Iraq, the U.S. ambassador reporting privately about the lives of the Iraqis closest to him is a source that can hardly be ignored."

Cohen Says US Suffers From Attention Deficit Disorder In Iraq Policy. In his Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) column, Richard Cohen facetiously suggests that attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder is responsible for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. ADHD "explains why few seem to challenge the call to continue the mission in Iraq, apparently forgetting that the mission has changed and no one is quite sure what it is now," and "why we are still fighting in Afghanistan almost five years" after 9/11 – "because our attention got diverted from the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda, which had attacked us, to Iraq, which had not. … Pass the Ritalin, please."

DOJ_NMG_0035130

Taliban Produces "Biggest Show Of Strength" In Years. A starkly pessimistic story on the front page of USA Today (6/20, Wiseman, 2.31M) says pro-Taliban fighters "are terrorizing southern Afghanistan" in their "biggest show of strength in nearly five years." The fighters are "ambushing military patrols, assassinating opponents and even enforcing the law in remote villages where they operate with near impunity." The article portrays allied forces on the defensive, saying US-led forces have been "forced to ramp up the battle."

Guerillas Kill 32 People In Southern Afghan Province. In a more straightforward New York Times (6/20, Gall, 1.19M) report says suspected Taliban guerrillas in Helmand province "ambushed and killed 32 people on Sunday, all of them relatives and tribesmen of an influential member of Parliament." The Times says the "attack, in broad daylight, was the latest sign of the strength of the suspected Taliban insurgents" in the southern "poppy-growing province."

Taliban's Influence Spreads Into Northwest Pakistan. The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Constable, 744K) reports on how the influence of the Taliban is leaking into "the semiautonomous tribal areas of northwest Pakistan that hug the Afghan border," with thieves beheaded, television sets burned in public, and barbers ordered not to shave off beards. While Pakistani military officials say they are "making steady progress in pacifying the restive tribal belt," other observers say their "aggressive efforts since 2004 have backfired, alienating the populace with heavy-handed tactics and undermining the traditional authority of tribal elders and officials."

Pentagon Seeks To Add Special Ops Troops Without Lowering Standards. The Washington Post (6/20, A3, Tyson, 744K) reports on the Pentagon's efforts to recruit more Special Operations troops without lessening the elite forces' tough training. The article, which describes Special Operations Command forces in very positive terms, says the forces, "facing their biggest deployments in history," are "committed in Iraq, Afghanistan and surrounding countries. That leaves too few for other vital missions, many of them clandestine, such as intelligence gathering and partnering with forces in nations" where the US is not at war. The Post says that while the Pentagon has "announced a plan to add 13,000 more Special Operations troops to meet demands," producing "such highly skilled troops is not easy."

New PTSD Cases Running More Than Six Times VA Expectation. Knight Ridder (6/20, Goldstein) reports the VA "is on a pace to see nearly 20,000 new cases of post-combat stress this year among service members who've served in Iraq or Afghanistan, more than six times the number of cases that officials had expected." The VA had expected 2,900 new cases of post-traumatic stress disorder during the current fiscal year.

Current War Sparking PTSD In Some Vietnam Veterans. The Washington Post (6/20, George, 744K) runs an 1,100-word front page feature on how the current war is leading "thousands of Vietnam veterans" to seek PTSD help. The VA says PTSD disability-compensation cases "have nearly doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of more than 260,000. The biggest bulge has come since 2003, when war started in Iraq." Experts say many veterans "reexperience their own trauma" through media coverage of the present war.

Laser Eye Surgery Brings Military Unexpected Assignment Problems. The New York Times (6/20, Cloud, 1.19M) reports on the "unexpected difficulties" the military is facing due to the "booming trend" of laser eye surgery. At the Naval Academy, for example, "nearly a third" of each 1,000-member class undergoes the procedure. But by "shrinking the pool of people who used to be routinely available for jobs that do not require perfect eyesight, it has made it harder to fill some of those assignments with top-notch personnel."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Asks For Higher Bond For Conrad Black. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Cherney) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Chicago are demanding that former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, who was released on a $20 million bond last year, provide additional security to remain out on bail until his trial on fraud and racketeering charges next year." The Journal continues, "In documents filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, U.S. Attorney

DOJ_NMG_0035131

Patrick J. Fitzgerald says he is asking for more security on the bond because Mr. Black has failed to pay the mortgage on his Palm Beach, Fla., home -- which is part of his bail bond -- and 'has provided false statements to the government about his financial assets.' … Edward Greenspan, a lawyer for Mr. Black, said 'there are numerous misstatements' and 'numerous half-truths' in the documents. 'The prosecution filed its material this morning with practically no notice about what allegations were going to be included,' Mr. Greenspan said. Mr. Black has pleaded not guilty to the fraud and racketeering charges."

Bloomberg (6/20, Harris) reports, "Black overstated the value of a Palm Beach, Florida, home he pledged for bail, the U.S. said in a court filing and hearing. He understated a Canadian tax lien on the property and didn't disclose his wife was part owner, prosecutors said. … U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve delayed (Monday's) hearing until June 26. The government said Black, once among the world's largest publishers of English-language newspapers, should put up additional collateral or have his bail revoked. A former U.S. prosecutor said Black must take the possibility seriously. … 'Judges tend to get angry when they feel a defendant is possibly playing games with the court,' said Andrew Genser, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a partner at Kirkland & Ellis. 'Mr. Black's lawyers on June 26 would want to come in with an answer to these allegations that's convincing or have substitute assets ready to post.'"

Denver Attorney Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Investigation. The National Law Journal (6/20, Bronstad) reports, "Federal prosecutors who indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman last month are in talks with a Denver lawyer whose testimony could sharpen the investigation's focus toward Melvyn Weiss, founding partner of the New York-based law firm, according to sources familiar with the government's probe." The Journal continues, "Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles returned an indictment against Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, alleging that they obtained $216.1 million in attorney fees by paying $11.3 million in secret and illegal kickbacks to three individuals who served as lead plaintiffs in their cases. … Bershad and Schulman have taken leaves of absence from the firm." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors have said that the investigation is ongoing, leaving open the possibility of additional indictments against Weiss and William Lerach, a senior partner who left the firm in 2004 to found San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins. … According to the indictment, a senior partner at Milberg Weiss met in 2003 with the Denver lawyer and agreed that a percentage of attorney fees in two cases would go to Howard Vogel, a retired real estate mortgage broker whose retirement fund or family members were serving as plaintiffs for Milberg Weiss. In April, Vogel admitted to charges in a plea deal that he provided false information in federal court and has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors."

Father, Son Plead Guilty To Fraud In SureWest Probe. The Sacramento Business Journal (6/20) reports, "A former treasury analyst for SureWest Communications and his father pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to charges that they had taken $2 million from the Roseville-based telecom company." The Journal continues, "Arrested in early 2004 were former SureWest treasury analyst Jeffrey Wells, 31, of Roseville; his father, Larry Wells, 60, of Pebble Beach; and a business associate, Henry M. Kaiser, 59, of Piedmont. … The trio had been charged with illegally diverting several million dollars in SureWest cash and investment funds controlled by Jeffrey Wells to outside accounts to secure financing for Quivira Ventures, owned or controlled by the elder Wells and Kaiser." The Journal adds, "The U.S. Justice Department said that the money transfers were made 'so that Quivira could demonstrate to potential investors that it had sufficient funds on deposit to be a venture capital firm and thereby attract new investors.' … Kaiser, grandson of industrialist Henry J. Kaiser, stepped down from the Kaiser Permanente board after he was charged. In April 2004, Kaiser admitted guilt to 'interstate transportation of money obtained by fraud and conducting a monetary transaction in criminally derived property.'"

Olson Tapped To Head Accounting Board. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Reilly) reports, "Ending months of regulatory uncertainty for the accounting industry, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday named Mark W. Olson, a Federal Reserve Board governor, to head the agency that regulates accounting firms." The Journal continues, "Mr. Olson's appointment to chair the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board is one of the most significant to be made by Mr. Cox since he took the helm of the nation's markets watchdog last year. The PCAOB oversees accounting firms that audit public companies and was formed in the wake of corporate scandals such as those at Enron Corp. Its creation ended decades of self-regulation by the accounting industry." The Journal adds, "Mr. Olson, 63 years old, will become the PCAOB's second full-time chairman, a position that pays $615,000 annually. He fills the spot left vacant last fall by the resignation of the board's first chairman, William McDonough, also a former Federal Reserve governor. Mr. Olson will take over from acting PCAOB Chairman Willis Gradison, 77, a former Republican Congressman who will remain on the board. … Mr. Olson said in an interview yesterday that he wasn't going into the position with a preset agenda, although he expected that debate over how to implement rules related to companies' internal controls would continue as a big issue for the board. He said he expects to take up his new position in early July. … Mr. Cox also filled yesterday a second opening at the PCAOB, announcing that founding board member Kayla Gillan will remain in her seat. Ms. Gillan, a former general counsel to the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or Calpers, had continued to serve on the board since her term expired last fall. Board members earn $500,000 a year."

DOJ_NMG_0035132

South Korean Officials Clear Lone Star In Probe Of KEB Deal. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Santini) reports, "South Korean regulators cleared Lone Star Funds of any wrongdoing in its purchase of Korea Exchange Bank. Instead, they accused KEB's former management and several government agencies of mishandling the bank's sale in 2003, when many of the country's financial institutions were reeling from mounds of bad credit-card debt." The Journal continues, "While exonerating Lone Star and allaying concerns that regulators would seek to nullify the deal, the report of the Board of Audit and Inspection does little to relieve the Dallas private-equity fund's other major worry: that it might have to pay full taxes on its profit from the sale of its KEB stake, to Korea's Kookmin Bank, once the sale is finalized. … That deal now awaits the conclusion of Korean prosecutors, who are conducting their own probe of the KEB transaction, including Lone Star's role." The Journal adds, "The audit board's report, released yesterday, says KEB executives exaggerated the bank's losses at the time of the sale, understating its capital-adequacy ratio and deeming the bank 'troubled,' a designation that allowed a foreign buyer -- in this case, Lone Star -- to step in, speeding the sale. The audit board singled out KEB's chief executive at the time, Lee Kang Won, saying he undervalued the bank by making unrealistic assumptions."

Insurers Concerned About Options Timing Probe. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Pleven) reports, "The controversy over executive stock options has the insurance industry casting a wary eye at the liability protection it provides to corporate officers and directors, a development that could in some cases push premiums higher or reduce coverage for directors and executives." The Journal continues, "At least three dozen companies are facing federal probes over whether they backdated or manipulated stock options, timing them to boost the payoff for executives. Shareholders in some cases have responded by filing lawsuits, and insurers are bracing for a slew of claims." The Journal adds, "At this point, premiums haven't started to rise. But insurers have begun asking their own questions about the options practices of clients. Some, for example, are asking customers whether they have ever backdated options or received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission on the timing of grants. … The scrutiny has the potential to shake up the market for D&O insurance, which is intended to protect top corporate officials from facing personal losses for decisions they make in their posts running companies. The insurance, usually paid for by the company, typically reimburses the company or its officials for expenses such as legal fees. No hard figures exist for the size of the D&O insurance market, but insurance-industry executives estimate it generates several billion dollars in premiums annually."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Extends Abramoff's Freedom For Three Months As Cooperation Continues. Roll Call (6/20, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department and attorneys for disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff have agreed to postpone for at least three months the day he has to report to federal prison — the latest sign that Abramoff's continued cooperation with an ongoing corruption probe in Washington, D.C., is proving helpful to prosecutors. Abramoff had been scheduled to surrender himself to the Bureau of Prisons on June 29 to begin the 70-month prison sentence handed down by Judge Paul Huck of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. … Justice officials and Abramoff's lawyers filed a joint motion with Huck on Friday night asking for a three-month reprieve for Abramoff, who is cooperating with federal prosecutors in an ongoing probe that has roiled official Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0035133

Daley Secretary Testifies About Political Hiring List. The Chicago Tribune (6/20, Mihalopoulos, Bush, Lighty, 643K) reports, "A who's who of Chicago political power brokers and the job seekers they sponsored was unveiled Monday by federal prosecutors in the City Hall corruption trial. The list of more than 5,700 politically connected job applicants became public as a longtime secretary in Mayor Richard Daley's office testified for federal prosecutors against former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich. Although city officials insisted for years that they did not engage in patronage hiring, secretary Patricia Molloy said aides in the mayor's office kept track of job seekers and their political sponsors, beginning shortly after Daley's election in 1989 and during much of his 17-year tenure." Daley's three brothers and Gov. Rod Blagojevich "were entered into the database as sponsors of people seeking jobs or promotions," and "at least two applicants were described as friends of the mayor." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/20, Warmbir, Spielman, Konkol, Novak) notes, "The 60-page list gives the most detailed snapshot yet of politicians, powerbrokers and mayoral friends vying for city jobs or promotions for their families, friends and supporters. … Prosecutors call the scheme illegal. Defense attorneys…contend their clients were following orders as part of a long city tradition and never intended to commit crimes."

Former Boston FBI Official Testifies Leaks Torpedoed Bulger Probe. The Boston Globe (6/20, Murphy, 484K) reports, testifying yesterday in the $50 million wrongful death suit against the FBI, former Boston Assistant SAC Robert Fitzpatrick said that "then-Massachusetts Senate president William M. Bulger was the target of a 1983 FBI investigation that was compromised by leaks while his gangster brother, James 'Whitey' Bulger, was an FBI informant." Fitzpatrick "said the investigation was among nine in the FBI's Boston office during his tenure that he believed were compromised by leaks to Whitey Bulger, other informants, or others outside the office." Fitzpatrick also testified yesterday that he "wrote a letter to the FBI's third in command at headquarters in 1983, complaining about 'malfeasance' in the bureau's Boston office. He said he never received a response to his letter." The Boston Herald (6/20, Sweet, 220K) adds that US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay ordered the bureau's lawyers to turn over Fitzpatrick's letter to FBI headquarters. The Herald notes, "Because Fitzpatrick 'wasn't getting anywhere' with formal complaints of malfeasance and obstruction of justice, he said, 'I outlined my grievances' to Lee Caldwell about FBI agents destroying investigations with 'severe leaks' to mob informants like Bulger. Caldwell was a man he thought he could trust, but Fitzpatrick said, 'I never heard back.'"

Jordan Assigning More FBI Agents, Analysts To Wales Murder Case. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/20, Shukovsky) reports, "The FBI is sending in the cavalry in an attempt to solve the 5 1/2-year-old killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Tom Wales. A week after the FBI's top brass removed the Seattle office from management of the investigation, its new manager -- Portland Special Agent in Charge Robert Jordan -- announced he's boosting the number of agents and analysts assigned to find the killer." After a Monday meeting in Seattle about the investigation, Jordan said, "This is an extremely important case to us. We are not going to walk away from this. And we are going to commit as many resources as possible." The Post-Intelligencer notes, "There had been four agents assigned to the case before Seattle FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin cut that to two agents in May. Jordan wouldn't reveal the numbers of agents who will ultimately be assigned to the investigation, but said it would be more than four. … Quick to assert 'this is not a cold case,' Jordan said there are several promising leads that could pave the way to the murderer."

Former Virginia Police Officers Plead Guilty To Lying To FBI About Bribes. The Charlottesville (VA) Daily Progress (6/20, Nowak) reports former Charlottesville police officers Roy Fitzgerald and Charles Saunders "pleaded guilty Monday to lying to federal agents, admitting they lied about covering up a traffic offense and having sex with an underage girl. … In a brief hearing, Judge Norman K. Moon accepted the officers' guilty pleas and set a sentencing date for Sept. 22." The AP (6/20) notes, "The officers were accused of ignoring illegal activities involving Charles Phillips, the manager of the now-defunct Max nightclub, starting as far back as 1996. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. said in exchange, the officers protected Phillips from prosecution for traffic offenses and warned him about a prostitution investigation, exposing an undercover officer in the process. During an FBI and Virginia State Police investigation, Bondurant said Saunders lied about intervening with another officer concerning the traffic offense." The Richmond Times Dispatch (6/20, Santos) also reports on the guilty pleas.

DOJ_NMG_0035134

Justices Sets Limits On Admissibility Of Evidence. USA Today (6/20, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "An alleged crime victim's emergency 911 call can be used at trial even if he or she does not testify and undergo cross-examination, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled Monday." However, by an 8-1 vote, the justices also "ruled that if an alleged victim recounts an incident to police at the scene after it occurs, the account cannot be used at trial unless the defendant is able to cross-examine the accuser." The pair of rulings "in cases from Washington and Indiana addressed the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, which ensures that a defendant may closely question witnesses against him or her."

The Washington Post (6/20, A4, Lane, 744K) reports, "In both cases -- Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705 -- all the justices except Clarence Thomas concurred." He "dissented in the Hammon case, saying that Amy Hammon's statement should also have been admissible, and that the court's proposed distinction based on the 'primary purpose' of police questioning would be 'difficult for courts to apply.'"

Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Chicago Mobster. The Chicago Tribune (6/20, Coen, 643K) reports, "Suggesting that Frank Calabrese Sr. is a danger to anyone who might testify against the Outfit, a federal judge on Monday refused to grant bail to the reputed mob lieutenant." Calabrese, "linked by authorities to 13 slayings, will remain incarcerated before he and others named in the Operation Family Secrets case are tried next spring, U.S. District Judge James Zagel ruled. … Calabrese's brother Nicholas is cooperating and has tied Calabrese to some of the killings, Zagel noted. His son, Frank Calabrese Jr., secretly recorded him discussing his past."

Former Stock Trader Sentenced To 11 Years In Prison. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/20) reports, "A former stock picker who teamed up with a rogue FBI agent in a scheme to manipulate stocks was sentenced Monday to more than 11 years in federal prison. Anthony Elgindy also was ordered by U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie to forfeit $1.5 million." The AP notes, "He and four others were charged in May 2002…with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice. Federal prosecutors accused FBI special agent Jeffrey Royer of New Mexico of leaking details of investigations and executives' criminal histories to Elgindy. … Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice." The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) also reported on Elgindy's sentence, noting Royer's role in the scheme.

Boiler-Room Operator Sentenced To 17 Years In Prison. The Miami Herald (6/20, Santiago, 323K) reports, "Con artist Charles Paul Hoffecker, who with a partner fleeced more than 1,000 investors out of $14 million in a huge boiler-room operation, was sentenced Monday to 17 years in prison. … His partner in crime, Charles Edward Meyers...will be sentenced June 26." The Florida men "were found guilty last March of ripping off people who believed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver." The Herald notes, "Hoffecker and Meyers were caught as part of a 10-year investigation by the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service."

California's Searches Of Parolees Upheld. The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Richey, 61K) reports, "Parolees in California do not enjoy a constitutional right to be free from suspicionless searches by law-enforcement officials." Instead, "they can be searched at any time, even when officials have no reason to believe that they may be involved in wrongdoing." In "an important privacy ruling with major implications for individuals on parole, the US Supreme Court voted 6 to 3 Monday to uphold a California law that requires all state prisoners to agree as a condition of release that they consent to warrantless searches by law enforcement."

The AP (6/20, Locy) reports, "California parolees can routinely be searched by police as a condition of their release from prison, the Supreme Court ruled Monday. … By a 6-3 vote, justices said the 1996 law is a legitimate attempt by state officials to deal with a large population of repeat offenders who pose a danger to public safety." The AP continues, "Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the majority, said California has a "special governmental interest" to control its parolees, an interest that outweighs a parolee's privacy. … In California, most prisoners eventually receive parole. But before release, each parolee is required to consent in writing to searches by police during the term of their supervision. If they refuse, they are not allowed out of prison. … Under the law, police can conduct such a search as long as it is not arbitrary, capricious or conducted to harass the parolee." The AP adds, "Thomas said parolees do not have any 'expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate' because of the danger posed by California's large recidivist population. … 'The state's interests, by contrast, are substantial,' Thomas wrote, citing a 68-to-70 percent recidivism rate among California's parolees. … But Justice John Paul Stevens, writing in dissent, said the majority had 'run roughshod' over previous court rulings on unreasonable searches and improperly allowed California to create another form of punishment for its prisoners. … 'What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty,' Stevens wrote on behalf of himself and Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer."

DOJ_NMG_0035135

CNN.com (6/20, Mears) reports, "The case involves Donald Samson, paroled in 2003 after a firearms felony conviction. A San Bruno police officer knew Samson was on parole when he observed him walking down a street. … The officer, after determining there were no outstanding warrants on Samson, began a search of him. … Methamphetamine was found in a pocket and Samson went back to prison for seven years." CNN adds, "The Samson case was one of two search-and-seizure appeals from California argued this term. The justices in March unanimously allowed to stand the conviction of a man who bought video showing minors engaged in sex acts. … The Bush administration Justice Department and law enforcement agencies around the country have asked the courts for greater powers to conduct searches of homes and cars, along the borders, and at sobriety and neighborhood crime checkpoints."

Pennsylvania School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Child Porn. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/20, Ove, 261K) reports, "Nobody knew what janitor Phillip Winkle was up to until the day in early February when two other janitors at Center Area Middle School wondered what he was doing by himself in a dark storage room. It turned out he was making his own child pornography collection using a peephole camera he installed to record 600 video images of girls and women using the toilet. … Yesterday in U.S. District Court, he waived indictment and pleaded guilty to child porn charges," and is expected to receive a 10-year prison sentence. The Post-Gazette notes, "He apparently maintained the collection for his own use, as there was no evidence he distributed any of the videos. … After the two suspicious janitors caught him, Mr. Winkle confessed to Center police, who charged him with invasion of privacy and called the FBI."

Baggy Jeans Pose Problem For Fleeing Thieves. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Ng) reports, "One sunny afternoon in January, Vicki Chandler, a 55-year-old underwriting associate at Cigna HealthCare in Chattanooga, Tenn., was walking to her car when a teenager in loose khaki pants approached her, pointed to her pocketbook and said, 'I need that.' As she recounts the incident, he snatched the purse and took off. … But then he ran into trouble. As he ran, his loose trousers slipped down below his hips. As he reached down to hold them up, the teen was forced to throw the purse aside." The Journal continues, "It's a problem for perpetrators. Young men and teens wearing low-slung, baggy pants fairly regularly get tripped up in their getaways, a development that has given amused police officers and law-abiding citizens a welcome edge in the fight against crime. … Low-hanging baggy pants have been a fashion statement for young men for more than a decade, inspired by the advent of beltless prison jeans, says Andy Gilchrist, a California fashion consultant who has written a book on men's clothes. Over time, the tough-guy image associated with oversized trousers helped make the look standard for hip-hop performers, alternative music bands, skateboarders and snowboarders as it migrated from mostly black city streets to affluent white suburbs. … Just about every other week, Jim Matheny, a 41-year-old police lieutenant in Stamford, Conn., says he gets into foot chases with youths. He says it's getting easier to capture them because they can't run fast or far in those loose jeans."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court To Hear Administration Effort To Revive Late-Term Abortion Ban. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 10, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Supreme Court "took up the issue of abortion. The justices agreed to hear a new attempt by the Bush Administration to have a law banning certain late-term abortions declared constitutional."

DOJ_NMG_0035136

The Washington Post (6/20, A4, Goldstein, 744K) reports, "In accepting the California case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America , the court essentially agreed to evaluate a wider range of legal issues that the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit cited last winter when it, too, found the law unconstitutional." The 9th Circuit "found the law posed an undue burden on women because the statute is so vague it could be interpreted to forbid other abortion methods beyond one that is used rarely late in pregnancy. In addition, the 9th Circuit dealt with whether a court could 'remedy' the law to permit the procedure when women's health is imperiled, ruling that it could not because lawmakers had deliberately omitted such an exception."

The AP (6/20) reports, "Congress had voted in 2003 to prohibit the type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester of a nine-month pregnancy, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb and its skull punctured or crushed. The law was challenged on behalf of physicians who could be sentenced to up to two years in prison for violating the law. … Justice Samuel Alito is expected to be a key vote in the case, because the court had split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law barring the same procedure because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired in January was replaced by Alito."

Judge Approves Extension Of Delphi Reorganization Filing. The AP (6/20, Tong) reports, "A bankruptcy judge on Monday approved a motion by Delphi Corp. to extend the auto supplier's deadline to exclusively file its reorganization plan, before creditors can weigh in with alternate proposals." The AP continues, "The new deadline for the company is Feb. 1, 2007, and the deadline for responses to the plan is April 2. Judge Robert Drain approved the extension, which is the company's second and moves the filing deadline from Aug. 5. … The company reserved the right to file other extensions if needed." The AP adds, "An attorney for Delphi, John W. Butler, also said the company planned to file a motion later Monday to seek the court's approval of a new concessions deal with Delphi's second-largest union, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America. … The auto parts supplier announced over the weekend that it had reached an agreement with the IUE-CWA and General Motors to offer buyouts to hourly workers. The deal was similar to the one reached earlier with the United Auto Workers, the largest union representing Delphi employees. … The judge said the matter would be considered in a June 29 meeting."

Debate Over Regulation Of 527s Stymies Lobbying Reform Bill's Progress. Roll Call (6/20, Newmyer) reports, "Clear progress on a lobbying reform bill continues to elude House and Senate Republican leaders, with the two chambers stalemated over the fate of a controversial provision targeting the independent political groups known as 527s." Roll Call notes that "cracking down on" 527s "is a top election-year priority for national Republicans. When the House took up legislation to overhaul lobbying, GOP leaders made a point of inserting a provision to sideline 527s. But that plan is running into growing resistance in the Senate, initially from Democrats, but now from some conservative Republicans as well." The House GOP leadership has "been predicting quick action on the measure since that chamber approved its version of the bill in early May. But those projections have consistently slid, as agreements on differences between the two bills have proved hard to come by. The latest deadline…has both chambers wrapping work on a conference agreement by the July Fourth recess. Now, even that goal appears imperiled, with GOP aides predicting little action in the two weeks left of this work period."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

9th Circuit To Hear Arguments On Hawaiian School Admission Policies. The AP (6/20, Niesse) reports, "A wealthy private school created exclusively for Hawaii's indigenous people may be forced to admit non-Hawaiians if it loses a legal challenge." The AP continues, "Fifteen judges on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments Tuesday in San Francisco over whether the Kamehameha Schools can continue to limit enrollment to Native Hawaiians." The AP adds, "The case is an important test of racial preference programs in school admissions. … While the courts have generally ruled against favoritism in education based on race, the Kamehameha case is different in that the school was founded based on the will of a Hawaiian princess and doesn't receive federal funding. … A three-judge panel of the circuit court in California initially ruled against Kamehameha's admissions policy with a 2-1 vote in August. But the court announced in February it would reconsider the school's 118-year-old policy. … The lawsuit was filed on behalf of an anonymous white student who was denied admission to the school in 2003 and claimed he was discriminated against because he didn't have Hawaiian blood."

DOJ_NMG_0035137

Federal Judge Overturns Jury Verdict In Age Bias Suit. The Legal Intelligencer (6/20, Duffy) reports, "Overturning a jury's verdict of more than $240,000 in an age discrimination suit, a federal magistrate judge has ruled that a plaintiff who was fired at the age of 50 failed to prove an essential element of his case because the four workers who assumed his duties had an average age of less than seven years younger than he was." The LI continues, "In his 60-page opinion in Steward v. Sears Roebuck & Co., U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas J. Rueter concluded that plaintiff Gunnar Steward failed to make out a prima facie case of age discrimination. … The decision is a stunning setback for Steward and his lawyers, Carmen R. Matos of Doylestown, Pa., and George P. Wood of Stewart & Wood in Norristown, Pa., and overturns a jury's award of nearly $93,000 in back pay and $148,000 in front pay." The LI adds, "Matos and Wood argued that after Steward was fired, his duties were taken over by two men in their 30s and one in his mid-40s, with an average age of less than 38, or more than 12 years younger than Steward. … But Rueter sided with Sears and its lawyers -- Sidney R. Steinberg and Robert J. Toy of Post & Schell -- who said the evidence showed that a 60-year-old woman also took over some of his duties. … As a result, Rueter concluded that the average age of the workers who assumed Steward's duties was just 6.75 years -- a difference the judge found to be not enough for a prima facie case. … Rueter's ruling could force the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to revisit a vexing question that often arises in age discrimination suits -- just how much younger must the more favorably treated employee be in order to be deemed 'sufficiently younger' than the plaintiff? The answer for courts in the 3rd Circuit, Rueter found, is that a difference of less than seven years is not enough."

Abortion Ban To Be Placed On South Dakota Ballot. The AP (6/20, Brokaw) reports, "Voters will have the final say on South Dakota's tough new law that bans almost all abortions. Secretary of State Chris Nelson said Monday that the law's opponents had collected enough signatures to put a question on the Nov. 7 ballot asking voters if the law should go into effect as planned or be dumped."

Pentagon Document Lists Homosexuality As Mental Disorder. A neutral AP (6/20, Baldor) story reports a Pentagon document "classifies homosexuality as a mental disorder, decades after mental health experts abandoned that position. The document outlines retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities, and in a section on defects lists homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders." Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Jeremy M. Martin "said the policy document is under review."

Feinstein Makes Case For Flag Protection Amendment. Sen. Dianne Feinstein writes in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) that the American flag is "a vibrant symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, and our eternal memory of those who have sacrificed to defend these principles. It is because of all that our flag embodies that I have co-sponsored the Flag Protection Amendment. … The Flag Protection Amendment would not prohibit flag burning. Rather, the Amendment would simply return to Congress the ability to protect the flag as it has been protected throughout most of this nation's history." Feinstein concludes, "There is no idea or thought expressed by the burning of the American flag that cannot be expressed equally well in another manner."

USA Today Says Flag Protection Amendment Is Unnecessary. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) takes the opposite view, saying instances of flag desecration "are rare and easily addressed by local laws. They hardly require the extraordinary act of amending the Constitution. But in a Congress unwilling to address important matters…symbolism is the politically convenient substitute for substance. … The main threat to the flag comes not from the occasional burning of Old Glory. It comes from those who would sacrifice the principles the flag represents."

WSJournal Blasts Gerrymandering In The Name Of "Voting Rights." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) says, "With Congress poised to extend, for another quarter-century, certain 'temporary' provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, it's worth pondering some of the political mischief taking place these days in the name of 'voting rights.'" Gerrymandering "has all but eviscerated inter-party competition for seats in Congress, creating so many 'safe' Republican and Democratic strongholds that the outcome of most races is a foregone conclusion. But another pernicious byproduct of gerrymandering is the racial polarization and hyper-partisanship that we see in places like New York's 11th District. … Congress has never let balkanization of the electorate get in the way of protecting its own political hide, especially when it can claim to be siding with the 'voting rights' angels."

DOJ_NMG_0035138

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Task Force Report To Tout Progress In Protecting Intellectual Property. InformationWeek (6/20, Greenemeier) reports, "The technology world has long agonized over the government's shortcomings in protecting intellectual property. Theft of source code or even finished products costs tech firms money and potential revenue and dampens the incentive to invest in original research and development. The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday plans to issue a report signaling a positive change." IW continues, "The Justice Department's Intellectual Property Task Force has made progress in protecting the content created by companies in a number of disciplines, including software development, music recording, and motion pictures, the report says. Essentially, Justice wants to convince businesses that it has followed up on promises made in 2004 to bring the hammer down on those caught lifting other people's work for their own purposes." IW adds, "The Justice Department, as promised, has increased the number of prosecutors in the field by creating five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units in the District of Columbia, Nashville, Orlando, Fla., Pittsburgh, and Sacramento. Justice also opened another seven in Austin, Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, Newark, N.J., New Haven, Conn., and Philadelphia--all cities where cybercrime and intellectual property offenses are significant problems, the new report states. … Justice has also broadened its focus internationally by placing a federal prosecutor in Southeast Asia as an intellectual property law-enforcement coordinator and got funding to place a similar official in Eastern Europe. The department has trained and provided technical help to more than 2,000 foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges in the area of intellectual property investigations and prosecutions, the report states."

Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices In Real Estate. The Washington Post (6/20, D3, Downey) reports, "A national consumer advocacy group yesterday condemned real estate trade groups as a 'cartel' that sets prices and blocks competition to maintain its traditional commission structure and to keep discount firms from gaining market share." The Post continues, "The commission system is 'cockamamie,' said Stephen Brobeck, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America. Even some inexperienced real estate agents are charging a 7 percent sales commission, he said -- an amount he likened to the cost of a new car. And he questioned why the brokerage fee on an $800,000 houses is four times higher than that for a $200,000 house, saying the work involved is basically equal." The Post adds, "The District-based federation applauded efforts by government antitrust regulators to put pressure on the trade groups to change the way they do business, but Brobeck said no one had yet found the 'magic bullet' to reduce costs. He said consumers have been left on their own and urged home buyers and sellers to negotiate over the sales commissions they are charged and make sure it is clear who is representing whom, what each agent will be paid and for what services. … Thomas M. Stevens, a local real estate broker who is president of the National Association of Realtors, fired back within hours, saying the Consumer Federation is ill-informed and incorrect. … 'It's clear and evident that they don't understand the real estate business,' Stevens said. 'Real estate is probably one of the most competitive industries out there.'" The Post notes, "The Justice Department has sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging its Internet multiple listing service policy prevents nontraditional brokers from gaining equal access to sales listing information. The trade group said it has changed its policies and is seeking to have a judge dismiss the lawsuit."

DOJ Will Not Challenge Collaborative Labor Database. Dow Jones (6/20) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department on Monday said it won't take antitrust action against a collaborative initiative by retailers and manufacturers to develop a shared database on international factory and labor conditions." Dow Jones continues, "The initiative, Fair Factories Clearinghouse, asked the Justice Department to decide whether it was concerned about potential antitrust problems with the initiative. … 'The Department of Justice has no current intention to institute antitrust enforcement action against the Fair Factories Clearinghouse initiative,' Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said in a letter sent to the organization." Dow Jones adds, "The group's request to Justice officials described safeguards it will require member companies to take to avoid antitrust conflicts through the database sharing. … The Fair Factories Clearinghouse is designed to improve available audit information on the standards and conditions at factories around the world, according to the group's Web site."

DOJ_NMG_0035139

FTC Endorses Online Legal Referral Services. The National Law Journal (6/20, Maclean) reports, "Although it may not be a match made in heaven, Internet legal referral services that promise to match lawyers with potential clients have found a powerful new admirer -- the Federal Trade Commission." The Journal continues, "In a recent letter to the State Bar of Texas, the FTC planning and policy chief, Maureen Ohlhausen, said that the Internet-based client/attorney matching services 'have the potential to lower consumer costs of obtaining information about the price and quality of legal services, which is likely to lead to more intense competition among attorneys, ultimately benefiting Texas consumers.'" The Journal adds, "There has been a long simmering debate in state bars around the country since the advent of these services in 1999 about whether they violate ethical rules on advertising and the bans on nonlawyer referrals for legal help. … The Arizona and Washington state bars issued ethics opinions last year foreclosing use of the services, saying that lawyers may not pay to participate in for-profit Internet matching services. Meanwhile, Rhode Island approved the online matching in 2004 as a boon to consumers, quickly joined by North Carolina, South Carolina and Utah. … The FTC letter 'is a powerful endorsement of the industry,' said Anna Ostrovsky, general counsel for San Francisco-based LegalMatch."

Net Neutrality Debate Pits Diverse Coalition Against Entrenched Lobbyists. The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "As the Senate takes up the first overhaul of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, this week's debate" over net neutrality "will pitch one of the most unlikely lineups in recent political history against an entrenched industry lobby. On one side: the big phone companies and cable providers, who want Congress to help them speed up the move into the video market and keep government regulation at a minimum. It's one of the most well-funded and experienced industry groups on Capitol Hill. On the other side: those who use their services, who want Congress to make sure that the Internet does not become a fast lane for those who can pay - and a dirt road for those who can not. The Save the Internet Coalition includes Google Inc., Amazon.com, Microsoft, and eBay, thousands of bloggers, and more than 700 groups. It's one of the most diverse coalitions ever to lobby a bill."

Attorneys Allege DOJ Over-Reaction In Qualcomm Gun-Jumping Case. In an op-ed in the Legal Times (6/20), Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed, who are counsel in the D.C. office of O'Melveny & Myers, where they specialize in antitrust law and represented Gemstar in the case referenced below, write, "In almost any merger or acquisition, the acquiring company insists on 'conduct of business' covenants to ensure that the target company maintains the value of its assets before closing. Imagine that in the middle of negotiating an important acquisition agreement, your antitrust counsel suddenly opines that certain routine conduct-of-business covenants are no longer permissible. … This is precisely what is happening as some counsel overreact to the Department of Justice's recent gun-jumping lawsuit against Qualcomm Inc. In-house counsel need to be skeptical of such overly cautious gun-jumping advice, which can jeopardize the success of corporate transactions." Tucker and Sayyed continue, "The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires that transactions of a certain size be reported to the two federal antitrust authorities (the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission) and that merging parties observe a pre-closing waiting period. This waiting period gives the antitrust agencies a chance to review a transaction for potential anti-competitive effects before the parties can close the transaction. … Gun jumping occurs when a buyer exercises control over the to-be-acquired firm before the expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period. When parties are competitors, certain joint activity or information sharing before closing can also violate the Sherman Act. Whether a gun-jumping violation exists is a separate question from whether the underlying business combination violates the antitrust laws. … Unfortunately, neither of the antitrust agencies has provided specific guidelines governing what is and what is not allowable during the period between signing and closing. Although guidelines were promised by then-Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Charles James in September 2002, his successors appear to have concluded that the fact-intensive nature of this area may make such guidelines too vague to be of any use." Tucker and Sayyed conclude, "Although merging parties certainly can go too far in interacting with one another before closing a transaction, there is more flexibility than some antitrust lawyers advise, and the Qualcomm case in no way limits merging parties' ability to achieve their business objectives."

DOJ_NMG_0035140

Morgan Stanley Hikes Bid For Denver Energy Firm. The AP (6/20, Shore) reports, "Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc. boosted its offer for TransMontaigne Inc. by 3 percent a share, escalating a bidding war that appeared to be over last month when the fuel distribution company accepted a lower bid from SemGroup LP." The AP continues, "The Transmontaigne board was scheduled to meet Monday to determine whether the new Morgan Stanley offer of $11.35 a share in cash -- delivered Sunday -- would be considered superior to the SemGroup offer of $11.25 a share. The company said it would be prepared to terminate its agreement with SemGroup if the Morgan Stanley offer were better." The AP adds, "In a letter delivered to TransMontaigne on Sunday, John Shapiro, president of Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc., said the offer would expire on Friday morning if no action were taken. … Shapiro also noted that SemGroup has received a request for more information from the Federal Trade Commission which could delay any deal between SemGroup and TransMontaigne."

Judge Dismisses Antitrust Suit Against Oil Companies. The Fairbanks (AK) News-Miner (6/20, Eshleman) reports, "A federal judge on Monday dismissed an antitrust lawsuit filed last year by the Alaska Gasline Port Authority against two North Slope oil companies. Judge Ralph Beistline found fault with a number of arguments raised by the port authority, finding among them that it lacked the standing needed to pursue the lawsuit in federal court." The News-Miner continues, "The port authority filed the suit in federal District Court in Fairbanks, alleging BP and Exxon Mobil had conspired to keep North Slope natural gas out of the marketplace. … Beistline agreed with lawyers for the oil companies who said the state's Stranded Gas Development Act, which lays out a negotiating process for finding a way to transport natural gas to market, pre-empts the authority's lawsuit. … The judge said the port authority's project 'appears well-intentioned, has accomplished a great deal to date, and may well have a valid plan. … Decisions, however, regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska state Legislature and the people of Alaska,' Beistline wrote."

The AP (6/20, Sutton) reports, "The Alaska Gas Port Authority claims Exxon Mobil Corp. and BP PLC have conspired to crush competition and restrict the nation's supply of natural gas, and that has stymied the port authority's efforts to develop a gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope to Valdez. … . But (Judge Beistline) sided with the oil companies and said the port authority's case could upend a competing effort by the state to forge a contract with Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips to build a North Slope gas pipeline to Canada and markets in the Midwest."

Supreme Court Seeks US Comment On IPO Underwriter Appeal. MarketWatch (6/20, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday requested comments from the federal government on an appeal from 16 major Wall Street underwriters and investment firms trying to stop a class-action lawsuit that alleges firm commitment initial public offering practices on Wall Street violate federal antitrust laws." MarketWatch continues, "The high court's request for a brief from the U.S. Solicitor General's office gives the Wall Street firms additional time to try and stop a class-action lawsuit alleging underwriter tie-in agreements - such as requiring the purchase of additional securities in the aftermarket - violate antitrust laws. A number of other claims in the lawsuit were thrown out by a U.S. District Court, but litigation over tie-in agreements was revived by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York." MarketWatch adds, "The appeal, led by Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., a unit of Credit Suisse Group (CSR), also includes a number of prominent Wall Street firms. … The class-action lawsuit represents purchasers of stock issued by about 900 Internet and technology companies before the stock market bubble burst in the late 1990s. The lawsuit targets a number of IPO underwriting practices, arguing they are anticompetitive, and seeks financial damages. Additional related lawsuits are pending separately."

DOJ_NMG_0035141

Senate Committee Proposes Internet User "Bill Of Rights." CNET News (6/20, Broache) reports, "The latest Net neutrality provisions in a mammoth Senate communications bill stopped short of giving Internet companies and consumer advocacy groups all the assurances they've requested." CNET continues, "Unveiled formally at a briefing here for reporters on Monday, new provisions in the latest draft of the sweeping Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act would allow the Federal Communications Commission to police subscribers' complaints of 'interference' in their Internet activities and to levy fines on violators." CNET adds, "Specifically, the bill would require all Internet service providers to adhere to what the proposal calls an 'Internet consumer bill of rights.' The nine principles outlined under that heading include: allowing consumers to access and post any lawful content they please; to access and run any Web page, search engine or application that they choose (including voice and video programs); and to connect any legal devices they please to the network. … Carve-outs would exist for network management purposes, such as parental control technologies and security software. … All Internet service providers, if they're not already doing so, would also be obligated to offer broadband access on a standalone, or 'naked,' basis--without also requiring, for example, purchase of telephone or cable subscriptions. … But critics say the latest draft, scheduled for an initial committee vote on Thursday afternoon, refrained from addressing a major complaint of advocates of network neutrality--that is, the idea that network operators should give equal treatment to all content that travels across their pipes."

Mittal Claims Growing Support For Arcelor Bid. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Glader) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. is becoming increasingly confident its €23.19 billion ($29.31 billion) hostile offer for Arcelor SA is gaining momentum, pointing to pressure from Arcelor shareholders in favor of the Mittal bid." The Journal continues, "Mittal, the world's largest steel company by output, launched its cash-and-stock bid for Arcelor in January, but Arcelor has thrown up several roadblocks to the transaction, including plans to merge with Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal, led by billionaire Alexey Mordashov, in a move to fend off Mittal's bid." The Journal adds, "Arcelor had planned a company buyback of €5 billion that shareholders were scheduled to vote on tomorrow. But Arcelor said yesterday that it was canceling the meeting because of current talks between its management and Mittal Steel. The company said its board may decide later to reconvene the meeting 'in case the unsolicited offer by Mittal Steel was not successful.'"

On Heels Of Nokia Venture, Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate Service Unit. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Bryan-low, Esterl) reports, "On the heels of an agreement to combine its telecommunications-equipment business with that of Nokia Corp., Siemens AG said it is in talks to sell a majority stake in its enterprise unit, which supplies packages of telecom gear and services to corporate customers." The Journal continues, "Siemens didn't identify the potential buyers for the unit, which has about €3.5 billion, or about $4.4 billion, in annual sales. But with the potential sale and its planned joint venture with Finland's Nokia, the German electronics-and-engineering giant is dismantling its telecom unit known as Com, which posted €13.14 billion in sales for fiscal 2005." The Journal adds, "As expected, the European technology giants confirmed Monday they will combine their businesses that supply telecom carriers into a 50-50 joint venture. The combination provides increased bulk at a time when more equipment makers are joining forces. … The new company, to be known as Nokia Siemens Networks, will be No. 3 in the industry by sales, just behind the combination of Alcatel SA of France and Lucent Technologies Inc. of the U.S., which recently agreed to merge, and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden."

LATimes Says Internet Phone Companies Shouldn't Pay Service Fees. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/20, 958K) says local phone monopolies "are trying to saddle high-tech competitors with fees designed to subsidize the traditional phone network. At issue is how federal and state regulators will treat voice over Internet protocol, or VOIP." The Times adds, "Rather than dragging VOIP services into the morass of subsidies for phone circuits, lawmakers and regulators should focus on pushing high-speed Internet connections to every US home and business. If that means people using VOIP save a few bucks at the expense of those who use other phone services, so be it. With luck, VOIP will drive up the demand for broadband and hasten its spread, diminishing the need to subsidize plain old telephone lines."

DOJ_NMG_0035142

ENVIRONMENT:

High Court Rules Federal Regulators Overstepped Authority Under Clean Water Act. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 9, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Supreme Court "ruled that Federal regulators may have gone too far when they stopped Michigan landowners from developing some wetlands. But the justices stopped short of overturning the Clean Water Act." The AP (6/20, Holland) reports Chief Justice John Roberts, "in his first major environmental case, came up one vote short of dramatically limiting the scope of the landmark Clean Water Act. At the same time, property rights advocates won a new test for when wetlands can be regulated. Moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said there must be a 'significant nexus' between the wetland and a navigable waterway." The court's "four liberal members said the conservatives would have opened up sensitive wetlands to polluters." It was "a dramatic conclusion to a pair of property rights cases the justices agreed to review last fall, just days after Roberts joined the court. The Bush administration defended the law and had urged the court to stay out of the case."

The New York Times (6/20, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday came close to rolling back one of the country's fundamental environmental laws, issuing a fractured decision that, while likely to preserve vigorous federal enforcement of the law, the Clean Water Act, is also likely to lead to new regulatory battles, increased litigation by property owners and a push for new legislation."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Richey, 61K) reports, "At dead center of the court sits Justice Anthony Kennedy, who provided the critical fifth vote on the restrictive side of the case." That action "sends the two consolidated cases back to the lower courts where judges must divine a coherent approach to federal jurisdiction from the high court's splintered decision." The decision "is a setback for environmentalists seeking to push tough federal regulations to the broadest possible swath of threatened wetlands."

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Bravin, Winograd, 2.11M) headlines its story "Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act," while the Washington Post (6/20, A1, Lane, 744K) titles its story "Justices Rein In Clean Water Act," but the Los Angeles Times (6/20, Savage, 958K) reports the decision "by five justices dashed the hopes of private property advocates who believed that the more conservative court was ready to sharply cut back the reach of the Clean Water Act."

The Legal Times (6/20, Mauro) reports, "On a day that foreshadowed politically charged battles ahead, the Supreme Court on Monday divided sharply on the scope of the Clean Water Act while also agreeing to widen its review of the federal partial-birth abortion ban next fall." The Times continues, "In the long-awaited Clean Water Act cases Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States, Justice Antonin Scalia won three other votes for a narrow interpretation of the act's scope, while Justice Anthony Kennedy concurred in the judgment but offered his own more sweeping interpretation -- guaranteeing continued litigation. … In Scalia's view, the law requiring permits to fill 'navigable waters' covers only 'relatively permanent' streams, rivers, and lakes -- not intermittent or merely 'hydrologically connected' waters. However, Kennedy's concurrence sketched out a much broader standard, one that would apply the law's permit requirement to those seeking to fill any waters and wetlands with a 'significant nexus' to navigable waters." The Times adds, "Environmental groups seized on Kennedy's concurrence as the controlling opinion and expressed relief that their fears of a substantial loss of Clean Water Act jurisdiction had not come to pass. … 'The ultimate effect of the Supreme Court's decision on the Clean Water Act is to leave the Act's protection of wetlands and other water bodies in place, but subject to proof that they do in fact have a 'substantial nexus' to downstream water quality,' said Tim Searchinger, lawyer with the group Environmental Defense, in a statement. 'The decision kicks the ball down the road and will create some major administrative headaches, but in the end, the protection of this country's water bodies should change little.'"

Bloomberg (6/20, Stohr) reports, "Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the four dissenters, said Kennedy's test will create new uncertainty and additional work for regulators and landowners. He also said the new test 'will probably not do much to diminish the number of wetlands covered by the act in the long run.' … Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter also dissented." Bloomberg notes, "The ruling is a partial setback for environmentalists and the Bush administration, which argued in favor of broad federal power to restrict development."

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "For all the talk of liberal judicial activists, it was Justice Antonin Scalia and his fellow conservatives who voted to substitute their own preferences for a decision made by the executive branch, in the form of the Army Corps, interpreting a statute passed by Congress. It was the liberals who were "judicially modest," to use a favorite phrase of Chief Justice Roberts, deferring to the elected branches." Justice Kennedy's role "is especially notable. He wrote a careful opinion, much in the tradition of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, that refused to go along with any large-scale assault on ecologically fragile lands. His opinion suggests that in this sharply divided court, at least in environmental law, the precarious center can hold."

DOJ_NMG_0035143

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) writes in an editorial, "The vote in the case left little room for doubt about the reason for the Court's indecision -- his name is Justice Anthony Kennedy. The Court split, in effect, 4-1-4." The Journal adds, "Some court-watchers predicted that Justices Roberts and Alito would help draw Anthony Kennedy to the right, lest he feel isolated by the high-powered intellects of the Court's four conservatives. The good news from yesterday's ruling is that the Court's two newest members came down solidly on the side of property rights in their first big environmentalism case. The bad news is that Justice Kennedy lacked the courage of their convictions."

Pombo Says Deal Has Been Reached On Offshore Oil Drilling. The New York Times (6/20, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports Rep. Richard Pombo, chairman of the House resources committee, said the panel "had reached bipartisan agreement on a measure that would open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas exploration." Pombo "said the agreement was a compromise that would give states the option to drill in waters that the federal government had kept off limits to energy exploration for decades. At the same time, lawmakers also tried to satisfy lawmakers from Florida and other states who have opposed any drilling within 100 miles of their coastlines." According to the Times, the deal, which will be voted on Wednesday, "would replace a longstanding executive order barring most drilling on the shelf with legislation that would bar drilling in the first 50 miles of coastal waters unless states chose to opt out by vote of their Legislature and the approval of their governor."

Spate Of New Energy Legislation Attributed To Election-Year Politics. The New York Times (6/20, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports, "Any notion that energy policy was set for a while after President Bush signed the first major energy bill in a decade last August would be wrong. Not only are gasoline prices higher now than they were then…but elections are approaching." Sen. Larry Craig "has introduced a bill that would allow American oil companies to work in partnership with Cuba, drilling for energy supplies off its coastline." Rep. Maurice Hinchey "would eliminate a slew of tax breaks for oil and gas companies." Rep. Dan Lungren "has proposed legislation that would award $1 billion to the first automaker in the United States to sell 60,000 mid-size sedans that can travel 100 miles on a gallon of gas." According to the Times, "Of all the energy measures…three have a modest chance to pass both houses this year. One would open a new section of the Gulf of Mexico to drilling. One would define and outlaw gasoline price gouging. A third would give the president authority to set fuel efficiency standards for cars."

Higher Oil Prices Could Contribute To The Deterioration Of US Roads. USA Today (6/20, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Asphalt prices are skyrocketing as costs for oil, a key component of the paving material, are near records. In some parts of the country, there are asphalt shortages. Both price and availability problems are forcing local governments across the USA to scale back or cancel road projects this summer, the main paving season in much of the country. … Nationwide, asphalt prices are up 42% in the second quarter from the same time a year ago, according to the Engineering News-Record." USA Today adds, "Making matters worse, U.S. asphalt production was down more than 5% from January through March compared with a year ago, the Energy Department says."

Kempthorne Restores Preservation As Park Service's Primary Goal. The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Cart, 958K) reports that Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne has thrown out a draft of the National Park Service Management Policies that would have "opened some of America's national parks to snowmobiles and other motorized recreation and permitted increased commercialization." The policy rejected by Kempthorne "would have weakened protections for wildlife and natural resources, instead restoring the longtime standard that national parks must emphasize preservation over any other activity. … The new policy, which is to become final in three weeks, explicitly instructs park managers to maintain clean air, water and natural sounds, and not allow any activities that might damage park resources."

DOJ_NMG_0035144

LATimes Praises Administrations "New Attitude" Toward National Parks. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/20, 958K) calls Kempthorne's decision "gratifying," noting that the parks "were never intended for the mixed industrial and recreational uses commonly allowed on property under the Bureau of Land Management." Kempthorne "has shown that he at least understands what [former Secretary Gale] Norton never seemed to get: The public wholeheartedly embraces the conservation of its national parks and monuments. The government should respect this position." The Bush administration "appears to have a welcome new attitude toward the nation's natural treasures."

Authors Lament Extinction Of Tasmanian Tiger. Authors Margaret Mittelbach and Michael Crewdson write in the Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) that "one of the most spectacularly tragic losses in nature was Thylacinus cynocephalus, commonly called the thylacine, or Tasmanian tiger."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Weapons, Drug Charges. The AP (6/20) reports former Houston County, Ala., sheriff's deputy Michael Shawn Campbell "pleaded guilty to selling a gun to a convicted felon and supplying him with cocaine to sell, authorities said Monday. … Campbell, who was a deputy with Houston County's narcotic unit at the time, admitted to selling the gun and supplying crack cocaine to Joshua Whigan, an Ashford man Campbell knew to be a convicted felon, authorities said. Whigan reported Campbell to authorities and worked with the FBI and Ashford Police Department on the case."

Political Opponents Call For Connecticut Mayor To Resign Over Cocaine Allegation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/20, Christoffersen) reports, "Adversaries called on the mayor of Connecticut's largest city to resign Monday, while supporters urged him to specifically address allegations he used cocaine. Bridgeport Mayor John Fabrizi, a Democrat, was named in an FBI report that surfaced last week in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. … Fabrizi planned to make a public statement Tuesday, said his spokeswoman, Caryn Kaufman." The AP notes Fabrizi's 2003 opponent, Republican Rick Torres yesterday called for his resignation and US Rep Christopher Shays "urged Fabrizi to disclose more."

Illegal Drug Use Declines Among US Workers. USA Today (6/20, Armour, Jones) reports illegal drug use among workers in the United States "fell to its lowest level in nearly two decades in a trend driven in part by tougher drug-testing practices, putting cold medicines behind the counter and closing down methamphetamine labs in America. … The White House said on Monday that seizures of meth labs dropped more than 30% last year. It said the reason was that more states and retail drugstores limited access to cold medications that are used to make meth. 'The workplace data has been very powerful in that it's based on many, many tests,' says John Walters."

The AP (6/20) writes that even as such statistics were released, "Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company, said that in the first five months of this year, the rate of job applicants and workers testing positive for meth was 31 percent lower than last year. The top White House drug control official, John P. Walters, said the two reports were evidence that the 'one-two punch' of restricting chemicals and educating the public about the effects of methamphetamine addiction was having an effect." The New York Times published this AP story.

In a separate story, the AP (6/20) reports, "Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace. … The number of meth lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states put in place laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center. … White House drug policy director John Walters called the data an encouraging sign of progress. 'The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand,' said Walters." This AP story was published by MSNBC, FOX News, the Seattle Times, Georgia's Athens Banner-Herald West Virginia's Charleston Gazette and the Austin, Texas American-Statesman.

In a sidebar, the AP (6/19) has listed the number of meth labs shut down in each state over the last two years.

DOJ_NMG_0035145

UPI (6/19) reports, "Quest Diagnostics said of tests for all drugs performed by the company for the combined U.S. workforce, 4.1 percent had positive results in 2005 compared to 13.6 percent in 1988."

The San Antonio (TX) Express News (6/20) writes that according to the Quest report, "Those testing positive for marijuana represented 52.5 percent of the positive results, down from 60.6 percent in 2001. At 15.7 percent, cocaine was No. 2 on the list of drugs found in workers." The Express News adds, "In San Antonio, results are mixed, with one testing company observing a possible decrease in overall drug use and another noticing an upward trend, especially in methamphetamine use."

The Kansas City Star (6/20) writes, "Kansas City, Kan., police turned to the DEA for help last year when the Mexican meth trade sparked a wave of violence. The resulting law enforcement operation led to 23 arrests and the dismantling of four trafficking organizations."

The Los Angeles Daily News (6/20) reports, "The federal government hopes a sweeping law that would require drugs containing pseudoephedrine - the main ingredient in meth - to be sold from behind the pharmacy counter will further reduce the meth supply in the United States. Though California already has such laws in place, the nationwide mandate will begin Sept. 30."

Two Men Accused Of Supplying Michigan Teen With Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. Southfield, Michigan's WXYZ-TV (6/19) reports on its Web site that on Monday police "arrested two men accused of supplying a Bloomfield Hills teenager with a deadly combination of heroin and fentanyl. The suspects could become the first two in Michigan to be charged with a fentanyl-related death. Saturday night, on Keating Street in Detroit, officers with the major crimes division and DEA agents raided the home of two suspected drug dealers who are brothers. Sources said the brothers supplied 17-year-old Lauren Jolly with the heroin laced with Fentanyl and then let her die."

The Detroit News (6/20) reports, "Two men arrested in a federal raid of a drug house Sunday morning may be linked to the distribution of drugs laced with fentanyl, a painkiller suspected in the deaths of at least 79 people in Metro Detroit in the last four weeks, law enforcement sources said. … Brothers Donald and James Edgar Coleman were among those arrested in the raid…sources familiar with the investigation said. Some were charged with ordinance-type violations, police said." The News adds, "In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with 'potentially lethal' levels of fentanyl. The Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, officials said."

Six Die Of Suspected Drug Overdoses. The Chicago Tribune (6/19) reports, "Five Chicago men and one Elk Grove Village man died Saturday and early Sunday of suspected drug overdoses, officials said. Three of the six may have been heroin users, said a spokesman for the Cook County medical examiner."

Louisiana Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Providing Pain Medication. The AP (6/20) reports, "A Lake Charles doctor pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to illegally dispensing pain medication in exchange for sexual favors. Dr. Kevin E. Gorin, 46, was charged with four counts of distribution of a controlled dangerous substance and one count of possession of a controlled dangerous substance with intent to distribute. … Gorin's arrest culminated an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Beauregard Parish Sheriff's Office, and the DeRidder Police Department."

Ohio Lab Said To Be Under Scrutiny By Regulators. The Athens (OH) News (6/19) reports the Columbus laboratory that "reported finding an extremely high amount of GHB in Ohio University head football coach Frank Solich's hair has come under repeated scrutiny by regulators. A review of public documents by The Athens News has uncovered numerous run-ins in recent years between Toxicology Associates, Inc. and government agencies charged with ensuring lab accuracy and fair advertising." However, group supervisor for the Columbus diversion group office of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency "said Friday that she knows of no problems encountered by the DEA in its oversight of the lab's handling of controlled substances. The DEA license held by Toxicology Associates, Inc. is current, she reported." The News notes that Solich is trying to overturn his November drunken driving conviction.

IMMIGRATION:

Conservative Leaders Challenge Bush On Immigration. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/19, 6:15PM, Sylvester) reported that "today on the issue of illegal immigration, the President has lost his loyal base. 41 prominent conservatives have written a letter to the White House urging what's called sequencing. Secure the borders first, before implementing a guest worker amnesty program. The list includes prominent names like Bill Bennett, President Reagan's Education Secretary, judge Robert Bork, William F. Buckley and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich."

DOJ_NMG_0035146

GOP Senators Say Work-Site Immigration Enforcement Has Been Ignored. The Washington Times (6/20, Hurt, 90K) reports Senate Republicans "warned yesterday that the immigration bill approved by the Senate last month won't stop companies from hiring illegal aliens -- the very magnet that has drawn some 12 million illegals to the United States." Sen. John Cornyn "called a subcommittee hearing on the topic yesterday," and is quoted as saying, "Not only do I see work-site enforcement as the critical means, or linchpin, really, of successful immigration reform, but also because the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security has told me that several provisions in the Senate bill would make the system unworkable." Sen. Jon Kyl "said there was little hope for improvement with current proposals." However, Julie L. Myers, DHS assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said her agency ""is reinvigorating our work-site enforcement efforts."

Almost Half Of Illegals Entered US With Valid Visas. The Washington Times (6/20, Seper, 90K) reports, "Nearly half of the 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens now in the United States entered the country legally, but never left. Carrying visas and U.S.-approved border crossing cards, they were inspected by immigration officers at 300 sea, air and land ports of entry and many -- according to a year-old U.S. Customs and Border Protection policy -- were told to 'Have a nice day.' A little-noticed study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center says 45 percent of America's illegal alien population -- 4.5 million to 6 million -- carried legally issued border crossing cards for short-term visits or business and tourist visas for longer but temporary stays."

Illegals Increasingly Face Deportation For Relatively Minor Crimes. The New York Times (6/20, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "Across the country, local law enforcement officials and irritated taxpayers are turning up the pressure on federal immigration authorities to identify illegal immigrants who are behind bars and deport them after they are freed. Although that has generally been the practice with violent felons, illegal immigrants who commit lesser crimes are often overlooked by federal authorities, who say their resources are scarce. Now, however, immigration agents say they are beginning to take the first steps to change that. The agents say they are rethinking the triage that led them to pass over the estimated hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants with lesser offenses, even if they were imprisoned." According to the Times, "Up to 25 percent of the 22,000 inmates in the Los Angeles County jails on any day are illegal immigrants. … In California state prisons, at least 20,000 inmates have been listed for deportation by immigration authorities, officials said."

To Protect Cattle Fences, Some Texas Ranchers Provide Fences For Illegal Immigrants. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Johnson, Rutkoff, 2.11M) reports in its "Border Lines" column, "Some Texas ranchers tired of repairing cattle fences damaged by illegal U.S.-Mexico border crossers have installed an easier route -- ladders. 'It's an attempt to get them to use the ladders instead of tearing the fences,' said ranch owner Scott Pattinson. But the ladders may look too good to be true. 'They ignore it a lot,' says Paul Johnson, who owns an exotic game ranch along the Texas border. 'They're afraid that they're monitored by the Border Patrol.'"

Police Refuse To Assist Immigration Enforcement Efforts. USA Today (6/20, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Despite a federal effort to enlist help from local police to catch illegal immigrants, some of the USA's biggest cities are declining to enforce immigration laws. Police chiefs, mayors and city councils are ordering local cops not to get involved as federal agents crack down on people in the country illegally." U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement "has been visiting police conventions in an effort to have departments join a voluntary program. … Participants include state police in Alabama and Florida, the Arizona corrections department and sheriff's departments in San Bernardino, Los Angeles and Riverside counties in California and Mecklenburg County, N.C." However, "Several jurisdictions have refused to help. Chicago police and city workers are prohibited from asking immigrants about their legal status. … In the broadest signal of opposition, a national group representing 57 big-city police chiefs warned this month that local enforcement of federal immigration laws would 'undermine trust and cooperation' among immigrants."

WSJournal Notes Prominent Economists' Support For Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M), in an editorial, writes, "In an open letter to President Bush and Congress last week, more than 500 prominent economists, including five Nobel laureates, proclaim that 'immigration has been a net gain for American citizens.' … What is striking about this immigration letter is that it is signed by economists from different fields of research, political affiliations and ideologies. It is possible that no other issue in the economic field, with the exception of the benefits of free trade, inspires such unanimity of professional opinion as immigration does."

DOJ_NMG_0035147

TAX:

California Businessman Arrested In Alleged Tax Deduction Scheme. The New York Times (6/20, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The owner of the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker was arrested yesterday morning at his California home and charged with orchestrating a tax fraud that cost the government nearly $20 million as well as intimidating witnesses and a federal agent investigating the case." Gene F. Haas, "the owner of Haas Automation and other companies, was accused in a 52-page indictment of running a bogus invoicing scheme to create fake tax deductions. Mr. Haas was held without bail after his arraignment in Federal District Court in Los Angeles." The Times notes former Haas Automation CFO John Phillips "went to the F.B.I. in April 2001 and told them that he had been ordered by Mr. Haas eight months earlier to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said. Mr. Phillips is an unindicted co-conspirator."

Thomas Unveils Estate Tax Repeal Plan. The AP (6/20, Dalrymple) reports, "The House's top tax writer revealed a proposal Monday to reduce taxes on inherited estates and rewrite a quirky law that repeals the tax for only one year." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas " introduced the bill after Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked House GOP leaders for help reducing the estate tax before this fall's midterm elections." Frist "lost a bid this month to push forward legislation repealing the tax, unable to overcome opposition from most Democrats and a pair of Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Mullins, 2.11M) says Thomas' bill "could be a big step toward lowering estate taxes." House Republicans "will vote this week" on the "compromise legislation." Thomas' proposal "would reduce the number of Americans subject to the estate tax by raising the per-person threshold for the tax to estates valued at more than $5 million beginning in 2010." Thomas "would set the tax rate for estates valued at less than $25 million to the capital-gains rate, currently 15%. The value of estates above $25 million would be taxed at a rate equal to twice the capital-gains rate. The new legislation would retain the 'step up' in basis and would unify the estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes." The Journal adds, "To appeal to a few key Senate Democrats, Mr. Thomas included incentives for the timber industry. The legislation includes a new 60% deduction for qualified timber capital gains. House Republicans would like to approve the legislation this week, so the Senate would have time for a vote this summer."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rumsfeld Said To Give Little Attention To Weapons Procurement. A Washington Post (6/20, A15, Smith, 744K) article headlined "Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere" is extremely critical of Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, saying that a transcript of Rumsfeld's April 2005 interview with Pentagon IG investigators in "the largest defense procurement scandal in recent decades," obtained by the newspaper "under the Freedom of Information Act after a year-long wait, says a lot about how little of Rumsfeld's attention has been focused on weapons-buying -- a function that consumes nearly a fifth of the $410 billion defense budget, exclusive of expenditures in Iraq and Afghanistan." The Post says the "issue is relevant because a series of reports, including others by the inspector general and by the Government Accountability Office, indicate that five years into the Bush administration, the department's system of buying new weapons is broken and dysfunctional."

Zoellick Announces Resignation From State Department Post. The Washington Post (6/20, A2, Kessler, 744K) reports, Deputy Secretary Robert Zoellick, "one of the administration's most prominent figures in foreign and economic policy, said yesterday that he is resigning to join the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. Zoellick's interest in leaving his high-profile post had long been rumored, but it leaves a large hole in" Secretary Rice's "foreign policy team. Zoellick spearheaded efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and was the administration's main interlocutor in the delicate relationship between the United States and China." During a Monday ceremony, Rice is quoted saying she was "deeply honored" that Zoellick had agreed to come aboard and was announcing his resignation "not without considerable sadness." Later, in an interview, Zoellick "said he was leaving 16 months after he started because he had accomplished his objective of helping Rice set up her management team and get her tenure as secretary of state off to a fast start. 'The secretary is clearly up and running quite well,' Zoellick said. 'We now have a very good team, a team considered -- false modesty here -- one of the best, if not the best, Cabinet teams around.'"

DOJ_NMG_0035148

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, King, Craig, 2.11M) adds, "Mr. Zoellick's departure will leave a vacuum in the Bush administration's China team, which Mr. Zoellick has led since early last year. ... In his resignation letter, Mr. Zoellick said he was particularly proud of having 'reframed' the administration's approach toward China. In a speech last summer, Mr. Zoellick called on China to become a 'responsible stakeholder' in the international system. He also led a series of high-level dialogues between Washington and Beijing." The New York Times (6/20, Cooper, 1.19M) notes, "As Ms. Rice's deputy, Mr. Zoellick was the primary architect of the administration's policy toward Sudan and particularly the response to the crisis in Darfur. … He is widely considered to be one of the administration's most experienced foreign policy hands." The Times notes the search for Zoellick's successor, reporting, "Bush administration officials said the search was now on to find a replacement." Undersecretary Burns "would be the logical front-runner for the job. Administration officials say Robert M. Kimmitt, the deputy Treasury secretary, is also in the running." The Financial Times (6/20) also notes Burns and Kimmitt as "frontrunners" for the job. The Washington Times (6/20, Sands, 90K) and Los Angeles Times (6/20, McManus, 958K) run similar reports.

Energetic PR Effort Underway To Depict Bush As Fully Engaged. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/19) reports, "More signs are emerging that new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten is pumping up the energy level in the West Wing -- especially when it comes to promoting President Bush and his policies in the news media. Bolten is now granting interviews to talk up the Administration's agenda and, most particularly, to portray Bush as fully engaged in formulating and debating policy." Bolten is "said to be concerned that Bush is too often depicted as an isolated figure and an intellectual lightweight, and he wants other senior officials to do more to counteract those perceptions. This level of media engagement was rare for Andy Card, Bolten's predecessor." Bolten is "also encouraging other aides to be more visible in engaging the Bush's critics. New White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has taken these marching orders to heart, not only jousting with reporters with more deftness than his predecessor, Scott McClellan, but appearing on two talk shows yesterday alone -- to talk up Bush's agenda and his leadership skills. Appearing on the Sunday shows and other high-profile TV venues is something McClellan almost never did. Snow appeared yesterday on CBS' Face the Nation and Fox News Sunday."

Snow Deliberately Kept In Dark About Baghdad Trip. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/19) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "didn't mind being kept in the dark about President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad last week. Snow didn't find out about the visit until almost the last minute -- after he had briefed reporters about the supposedly full schedule of meetings that Bush was planning at Camp David. That schedule, however, was a subterfuge designed by more senior officials at the White House to throw the media, and presumably evil doers in Iraq, off the trail of what Bush was really up to." Snow "now tells associates that if he had known about the secret trip, he might have been placed in the position of potentially deceiving reporters -- something he never wants to do. So, he says, it was actually a good idea to keep the press secretary out of the loop on at least this occasion." But former advisers to past presidents, "however, have a different take. They don't think it's a good sign that the President's chief spokesman wasn't informed about the Baghdad visit, and they believe it shows that counselor Dan Bartlett, a Bush loyalist for many years, is still the Number One strategist for communications and PR at the White House."

Federal Agencies' Varying Standards For Polygraph Tests Create Frustration. The Washington Post (6/20, A1, Vedantam, 744K), in a front-page story, reports on employees of federal agencies including the CIA and the FBI who have failed polygraph tests administered by other agencies. According to the Post, "In a region where a security clearance is a necessary ticket to countless jobs with the federal government and its thousands of contractors, it is not hard to find people caught in turf wars over clearance. Polygraph tests are often at the root of the problem. … The government recognizes the problem and plans to harmonize the process across the intelligence community, but Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte cannot say when that will happen, said spokesman John Callahan." The post goes on to report, "The FBI recently ran a background check on Wayne Johnson, which led to a five-year extension of his top-secret White House clearance. But when Johnson applied for a job at the FBI itself, the agency made him an offer -- then rescinded it after a polygraph exam." Johnson "said the polygraph made him nervous, even though he had nothing to hide. When asked about drug use, Johnson, who is black, found himself worrying about stereotypes that link blacks to drug use. Johnson said he had never touched an illegal narcotic but believed his examiner, who is white, did not believe him."

DOJ_NMG_0035149

Cheney Presents Gerald Ford Prize To New York Daily News Reporter. Roll Call (6/20, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that while Vice President Cheney was on hand to present Tom DeFrank, the Washington, DC, bureau chief for the New York Daily News, with the Gerald R. Ford Prize for Distinguished Reporting on the Presidency, he "didn't physically present the award to DeFrank, in a departure from previous years." Roll Call notes that one of DeFrank's stories submitted in his award wining package discussed Cheney's "waning influence at the White House after the indictment of his former chief of staff, Scooter Libby." Attendees, say Cheney "was gracious and said nice things about DeFrank. But although Cheney presented the award to last year's winner, Jackie Calmes of The Wall Street Journal, President Ford's son Jack presented this year's award, the 19th annual."

GOP Lawmakers Have Extensive Agenda For The Next Five Weeks. Roll Call (6/20, Billings) reports in its "Roadmap" column, "Majority Republicans know they will need unity in their own party and the support of at least a few Democrats to make significant headway on their priorities in the next five weeks of legislating, a schedule that includes a raft of appropriations measures, the estate tax, line-item veto, executive nominations and outstanding conference reports on pensions, lobby reform and immigration. And the GOP knows that hopes of advancing those bills diminish as the clock ticks toward August and the November election creeps closer." Republicans "hope to put Democrats on the defensive on the war, trying to bolster their own anti-terrorism credentials while branding the minority as a 'cut and run party.'" Democrats "will ramp up their own efforts to bolster their agenda and a message that Republicans have forwarded the wrong priorities that have hurt the middle class and favored special interests."

Democrats Pledge To Keep Pressure On GOP Regarding Minimum Wage Hike. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Rogers, Conkey, 2.11M) reports Democrats in Congress "aim to make the minimum wage a maximum political problem for Republicans this election year. The minority party fired the first shot last week, when the House Appropriations Committee broke with its Republican leadership and approved a $2.10-an-hour increase as part of a spending bill for labor, health and education programs. Speaker Dennis Hastert responded by putting the measure on hold -- possibly until after the election. But Democrats are poised to come back this morning and offer the same wage amendment as part of a second appropriations bill funding science and law-enforcement agencies." The committee's ranking Democrat Rep. David Obey is quoted as saying, "I gave the Republicans fair notice that we will attach it to anything we can." House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer adds, "We think it's both the right thing and good politics." According to the Journal, "Discomfort is growing among rank-and-file Republicans, especially as organized labor has mounted ballot issues in various states." Rep. Jo Ann Emerson "said her polling on the issue in Missouri -- one of the states with a ballot initiative in the works -- testified to the issue's popularity."

Police Union Wants Ethics Probe Of McKinney. In the wake of a federal grand jury's refusal to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney for assaulting a Capitol Police officer, police labor officials are calling on the House ethics committee to review her conduct. The AP (6/20, Kellman) reports that the officials "said the grand jury's decision last week sent the message that 'it's okay to hit a police officer.'" Andrew Maybo, chairman of the US Capitol Police Labor Committee, told reporters the Fraternal Order of Police "would send a letter later this week to the ethics committee suggesting that McKinney's behavior violated an item in the chamber's ethics manual that calls for members to 'conduct (themselves) at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives.' McKinney's spokesman and her lawyer did not immediately return calls for comment."

DOJ_NMG_0035150

The Hill (6/20, Kucinich) reports, "Lou Cannon, the president of the DC Fraternal Order of Police, echoed Maybo's remarks, adding that regardless of any animosity felt among the officers toward the lawmaker she will still be protected as a member of Congress."

CQ (6/19, Ferrechio) reported, "There was no immediate word from McKinney's office on the FOP ethics challenge, but the congresswoman said June 16 that the grand jury decision was 'right and just, and the proper resolution of this case.'"

Fundraiser Boosts McCrery's Bid For Ways And Means Chairmanship. The Hill (6/20 O'Connor, Snyder) reports Rep. Jim McCrery's "chairmanship of last night's President's Dinner should boost his bid for the Ways and Means Committee gavel, if the past is any indication. The dinner raised $15 million for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), exceeding its target by $1 million. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, helmed by Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), raised an additional $12 million." McCrery, "already a fundraising powerhouse this election cycle, raised $1.2 million for last night's dinner. … Always a factor, fundraising prowess could be doubly important to McCrery's ambitions because he is not the most senior member in line to run Ways and Means. His principal opponent, Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.), has been there longer and is raising considerable funds in his own bid."

USDA Official Cancels Some Alternative Work Schedules. The Washington Post (6/20, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "An Agriculture Department undersecretary has canceled certain alternative work schedules for management officials in St. Louis and Washington and told the affected employees to plan on working a traditional eight-hour, five-day-per-week schedule." The decision by Thomas C. Dorr , Agriculture's undersecretary for rural development, "underscores the tension inside numerous agencies over flexible work schedules. Many agencies provide such arrangements to help employees balance their work and home lives, but political appointees and senior managers often prefer to have workers in the office and available."

Secret Service Agents Perform CPR On Former Treasury Official. The Washington Post (6/20, B1, Montes, 744K) reports that former assistant treasury secretary Curtis Hessler collapsed in Dupont Circle on Saturday morning and was given life-saving treatment by two Secret Service agents, who happened to be driving by. The uniformed agents, "were on routine patrol. Trained to assist presidents and embassy officials, they performed CPR and then followed the ambulance to George Washington University Hospital. A D.C. police officer took Christine Hessler and a friend there."

Justices' Comments On Court's Independence Applauded. Tony Mauro, Supreme Court correspondent for American Lawyer Media and Legal Times, writes in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) that in this supreme Court term, justices have been "making headlines off the bench, offering comments that, taken together, have made a powerful case for the independence of the court and the judiciary. After years of being passive punching bags for critics, mainly on the right, justices of all stripes are pushing back, making welcome additions to the public debate." Justices' comments "have a consistent theme: This Supreme Court takes a back seat to no other branch, and it is willing to fight for its independence and that of the judiciary as a whole." Mauro concludes, "In the same way that journalists must shed their vaunted neutrality when freedom of the press is under fire, so too should judges get involved when their authority is threatened. To stay independent, judges should act, and speak, independently."

Dionne Says Roberts' Views Could Put Him In Conflict With Scalia. In his Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) column, E. J. Dionne writes that in a speech at Georgetown University law school last week, Chief Justice John Roberts "laid out an approach to deciding cases that could disappoint those who like their court decisions bold and ideological. … The chief justice's speech defended the virtues of judicial humility: Justices should try to make the narrowest possible rulings and strive for unanimity, or something close to it." Dionne notes that Roberts's view "could bring him into conflict with Justice Antonin Scalia, a fellow conservative who is absolutely certain what the Constitution means and is never afraid to say so." Dionne adds that "if Roberts lives up to his Georgetown principles, he will justify all the votes cast for his confirmation by moderates and liberals. More important, he will win a place in history as the chief justice who ended the judicial wars."

DOJ_NMG_0035151

Tierney Criticizes SCOTUS Decision In Fourth Amendment Case. John Tierney writes in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M), "Of all the excuses for weakening the Fourth Amendment, the weirdest was the one offered by Justice Antonin Scalia last week in a Michigan drug case. He wrote the majority opinion allowing police officers to use evidence found in a home even if they entered without following the venerable rule to knock first and announce themselves." Tierney adds, "The number of paramilitary raids has soared in the past two decades as cities, suburbs and small towns have rushed to assemble their very own SWAT teams." Tierney concludes that "thanks to the Supreme Court, they now have less reason to knock first and shoot later."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Fall Amid Inflation Fears. Stocks posted declines yesterday amid fears that persistent inflation would force the Fed to push interest rates too high. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Browning, 2.11M) reports that the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 72.44 points, to 10942.11, "its ninth decline in 12 sessions." The S&P 500 "fell back into the red for the year. It declined 0.91%, or 11.40 points, to 1240.14." The Nasdaq Composite Index "decreased 0.92%, or 19.53 points."

Cooper Tire Efforts To Avoid Accident Lawsuits Examined. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 7, 3:00, Gibson) reported, "There are at least 31,000 tire-related accidents each year, causing 5,500 serious or fatal injuries. We're going to focus on how investigators for the fourth-largest tire company, Cooper Tire, respond to some of them. Our Phoenix affiliate, KNXV, first broke this story." ABC (L. Stark) added, "In a video deposition, Frank Ruggier testified he trolled the Internet every day for reports of accidents involving tires." Ruggier "did work for several tire companies but primarily for Cooper Tires. Under oath, Frank Ruggier testified that Cooper Tire paid him $75 an hour to go to accident sites, take pictures, collect evidence. If he found tread like this, he took it and gave it to Cooper Tires." Cooper Tires "says its aim is to 'gather and preserve evidence so that the truth can be told.' But a Cooper executive was asked in a deposition involving another accident who, other than company officials, is told about the evidence." Stephen Schroeder, Vice President, Cooper Tires: "I don't know that anybody else is notified." Attorneys "allege Cooper keeps quite about the treads to stymie lawsuits."

Bush Helps GOP Campaign Committees Raise $27 Million For 2006. The debate over the Iraq War continues to be a top issue as the 2006 elections approach. The Washington Post (6/20, A10, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "President Bush suggested last night that Republicans must remain in control of Congress for the country to effectively combat terrorism and keep the economy healthy, speaking at a $27 million fundraiser meant to provide a needed boost to the campaign war chest of congressional Republicans." He "generally avoided the harsh language he used to describe the Democrats at last year's dinner, when he urged support for his Social Security plan." The Post notes, "The infusion of cash could not come at a better time for Republicans, who are defending 35 competitive seats in the November elections, compared with 10 such seats for the Democrats, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. In addition, Democrats this year have been erasing the fundraising advantage the GOP has traditionally held."

The AP (6/20, Raum) quotes Bush saying, ""It is important to have members of the United States Congress who will not raise the white flag of surrender in the war on terror." Bush "criticized proposals, such as are being advocated by some leading Democrats in Congress, for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. 'An early withdrawal would be a defeat for the United States.'"

Santorum Courts Jewish Vote. The Hill (6/20, Allen) reports, "Sen. Rick Santorum is aggressively pursuing support from the Jewish community as his tough November match-up with Democratic state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr. draws closer." In addition to holding an event with former Soviet political dissident Natan Sharansky and leading neoconservative Daniel Pipes, Santorum "surprised colleagues last week when he unsuccessfully tried to amend a defense authorization bill with a measure designed to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. The amendment was rejected after the White House and many senators opposed it on the grounds that it could disrupt U.S.-Iranian negotiations." And in July "he plans to host a 'Jewish Leadership Summit' on Capitol Hill to discuss 'foreign policy and religious-freedom issues.' Invitees include White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), Specter, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Virginia Rep. Eric Cantor, the lone Jewish Republican in the House."

DOJ_NMG_0035152

Dean's Brother Urges Democrats To Support Lamont If Lieberman Runs As Independent. Jim Dean, the head of Democracy for America and DNC Chairman Howard Dean's brother, called on DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer to support the winner of the Connecticut Democratic senate primary if Sen. Joe Lieberman runs as an Independent. Roll Call (6/20, Duran) reports, "Should Lieberman lose -- the latest polls show him comfortably leading" Democratic challenger Ned Lamont – "and should he continue on as an Independent with the DSCC's backing, the DSCC would lose credibility with many Democratic activists, Dean said." Jim Dean "said that a number of big Democratic donors are unhappy with the DSCC's role, whether overt or behind-the-scenes -- in some Senate primaries." For example, "women's groups openly chided the DSCC for pursuing Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.) as Senate candidates, despite their opposition to abortion rights." And activists "were furious when national Democrats first courted, then pushed aside, Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett as the chosen Democrat to take on Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio)."

McCain Seen As Candidate With Crossover Appeal. The Financial Times (6/20, Sevastopulo) reports, "In a political landscape marked by intense partisan battles," Sen. John McCain "is an anomaly, a man so widely trusted that a recent poll found most Democrats would vote for a candidate he endorsed in the November congressional elections." McCain's "ease in discussing his candidacy is equalled by Hillary Clinton's reluctance even to acknowledge her status as the 'perceived' Democrat contender-in-chief. The man who turned down an invitation to be John Kerry's running-mate two years ago is seen as the prospective Republican candidate with the strongest 'crossover' appeal to Democrat voters. It is perhaps no coincidence that he seems anxious to go head-to-head with Mrs Clinton, a polarising figure whom some Democrats would be reluctant to support. She 'would be very interesting to run against', says Mr McCain. 'First woman nominee, very smart, very tough, very principled.'"

Lack Of Clear Frontrunner Opens Field For Number Of Candidates For 2008. CNN (6/20) on its web site reports a CNN/Harris Interactive poll of 1,001 adult Americans conducted June 1-6 (+/-3%) shows that 47% of respondents "would 'definitely vote against'" both Sen. Hillary Clinton and Sen. John Kerry. But "Clinton had the highest positive number; of those polled, 22 percent said they would 'definitely vote for' her."

Political analyst Bill Schneider on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19) said, "Of the best known possible democratic contenders, only Hillary Clinton has a strong base. 41% of Democrats say they would definitely vote for her. Not even one in four Republicans say they would vote for Rudy Giuliani or John McCain. Nearly half the country says they would definitely not vote for Clinton, John Kerry or Al Gore. More than 60% would never vote for Jeb Bush. His name, Bush. Only a third of voters say they would not vote for Giuliani and McCain. McCain has breadth of support but not a solid base."

Zogby Sees Wal-Mart Shoppers As Latest Key Voting Block. The Hill (6/20, Blake) reports, "In 2004, it was NASCAR dads. Before that, soccer moms. In the upcoming elections, pollster John Zogby says, the parties need look no further than the biggest retail phenomenon in the world -- Wal-Mart -- for this year's elusive group of swing voters." He "said he has found a direct correlation between how often Wal-Mart customers shop there and how reliably conservative they are. While this group voted overwhelmingly Republican in 2004, it is less entrenched than other conservative groups, and Zogby's numbers indicate it is wavering." And the more frequently they shop at Wal-Mart, "the more conservative they've tended to be."

Patronage Charges Continue To Dog Kentucky Governor. The New York Times (6/20, Urbina, 1.19M) reports, "A year ago, after being accused of illegally forcing Democrats out of state Civil Service jobs and giving the jobs to political loyalists," Kentucky Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R), dismissed the charges." Yet "15 indictments later, Mr. Fletcher's administration -- including his self-titled Disciples, accused of being the ringleaders of the patronage scheme -- is still feeling the sting as his approval ratings drop below 30 percent." Supporters have distanced themselves from him and it has "threatened to reverse a tide that Republicans in the state have worked for more than a decade to turn in their favor."

DOJ_NMG_0035153

Consultant Says Airbus's Superjumbo Project Should Not Have Been Born. Richard Aboulafia, vice president of analysis for Teal Group Corp., a Washington-based aerospace and defense consultancy, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) that the market isn't taking Airbus's problems in stride, "wiping away much of Airbus parent company European Aeronautic Defense and Space Co.'s gains since it was created six years ago." Aboulafia adds, "The biggest problem for Airbus today, to put it gently, is that its superjumbo should never have been born." Airbus "is racing to deliver something that's a mere sideshow. The delays are simply bitter icing on an unpalatable cake."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Save The SIPP. An editorial in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) says, "The House Appropriations Committee today will take up a recommendation by President Bush to eliminate" the Survey of Income and Program Participation, which is "arguably the best source of information on the real-world effect of public programs that help the poor." The SIPP "is used extensively by analysts inside and outside the government," and "costs all of about $32 million a year." Congress should "make it a priority to come up with the full amount needed to save this font of invaluable public information."

WPost Says Virginia Lawmakers Failed To Address Transportation. The Washington Post (6/20, A16, 744K) editorializes, "What was supposed to happen by March 11 in Virginia finally occurred just this past weekend: Exhausted lawmakers in Richmond reached a budget deal, averting the risk of a shutdown in state government operations at the end of this month. … We hope they'll excuse the rest of us for issuing a loud Bronx cheer, for in fact they have failed." Lawmakers failed "to agree on any long-term, reliable funding to improve the transportation network, they also have failed to ensure the sustainability of Virginia's economic boom." Republicans are planning another special session for the summer or early fall, and "there's modest reason at best to think another session will come out better. If it does not, Virginians should use the next election to find more responsible leadership."

Bush Urges Iran To Accept Limits On Enrichment. As President Bush prepares to travel to Vienna for meetings with European leaders, the Washington Post (6/20, A10, Fletcher, 744K) reports the President "said Monday that the package of incentives being offered to Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions is a 'historic opportunity,' and he warned starkly that the alternative for the Islamic nation is increased isolation and crippling economic sanctions." Speaking at the 70th commencement ceremony of the US Merchant Marine Academy, Bush "said Iran's stated desire for a peaceful nuclear power program is 'legitimate,' and one supported by the incentive package from the United States and its allies." Bush is quoted as saying, "We believe the Iranian people should enjoy the benefits of a truly peaceful program to use nuclear reactors to generate electric power," while noting that a nuclear-armed Iran would be a "grave threat to people everywhere."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Henry) referred to "a blunt threat from…Bush on the eve of his trip to Vienna for the European Union summit, where Iran's thirst for nuclear weapons will, of course, be at the top of the agenda." Bush "basically threatened very tough sanctions for Iran if it does not basically take the US historic offer, he called it, to enter into multilateral talks." Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Baier) reported that Bush "had strong words for Iran."

The story got no network TV coverage last night, though approximately three hundred local television newscasts across the nation made some mention of the President's speech. The overwhelming majority of stations briefly mentioned the occasion for Bush's speech and added that he addressed the "threat" from Iran's nuclear technology program. Many of those stations that included more extensive coverage of the speech featured a clip of the president advising the government of Iran to accept the US demand for suspension of uranium enrichment. Very few stations made any mention of the content of the President's speech apart from the portion concerning Iran. Typical of the coverage was WAGA TV Atlanta (6/19, 5 PM) reported, "President Bush urged Iran to accept what he calls a reasonable offer for talks on its nuclear program today. The president also warned that America won't waver in demanding that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment first. The president made the statements at a graduation at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in New York today." With applause audible in the background President Bush was shown saying, "Iran's leaders have a clear choice, we hope they will accept our offer and voluntarily suspend these activities so we can work out an agreement that will bring Iran real benefits." WAGA added, "President Bush went on to say that Iran rejecting the offer for talks would result in U.N. action and sanctions."

DOJ_NMG_0035154

WITI TV Milwaukee (6/19, 5 PM) reported, "Bush is…making his voice heard regarding nuclear weapons. During a commencement speech today at the Merchant Marine Academy, the President told graduates 'the world is united' and will make sure Iran doesn't get its hands on nuclear weapons."

WKRN TV Nashville (6/19, 4 PM) reported, "Bush spoke about establishing peace in the Middle East and the accomplishments that have already been made in the region."

USA Today (6/20, Benedetto, 2.31M) says that "to the staff, faculty, midshipmen and friends of the .. Merchant Marine Academy, it was a huge deal, a dream come true — the first time in the service academy's 63-year history that a president accepted an invitation to address the graduates." Bush "underscored the point in his address: 'I hope it's worth the wait,' he quipped when he took the podium Monday, buoyed by cheers that rang out from the 202 graduates and about 5,000 guests who jammed the football bleachers under sunny skies." Long Island Newsday (6/20, Winslow) runs a similar story under the headline "Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory," and says Bush "noted in his address the Merchant Marine Academy's service to the nation over the years, saying it is the only one of the five service academies where even before graduation students are sent into the theater of war -- during their year at sea. That fact means the Kings Point campus is alone among the academies authorized to fly the country's battle standard." Bush's presence, "valedictorian Peter James Radzicki of Mint Hill, N.C., said in his speech, 'brings hope and legitimacy to an academy that at times has felt forgotten.'"

The New York Times (6/20, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports "White House aides said the address was in part meant to serve as a table-setter for discussions about the nuclear standoff with Iran that are expected as part of a broader agenda this week at the United States-European Union summit meeting." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "It's in some way teeing up what is going to be a topic of conversation, one of many, at the European Union consultations this week."

USA Today (6/20, Jackson, 2.31M) runs a similar report titled "Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting," in which it says "any specific decisions about Iran are in a holding pattern until Iran decides what to do about a U.S. offer that could lead to U.S.-Iranian talks, White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley says." Hadley "says the annual EU summit covers many topics and is a chance to discuss 'the way forward' with Iran."

Knight Ridder (6/20, Hutcheson) also reports "Iran tops the agenda for Bush's meeting with European Union leaders," adding "government officials and outside experts agree that Bush and his European counterparts now recognize that, despite their differences, they need each other. Sort of like the Rolling Stones, according to John Hulsman, a foreign-policy specialist at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research center. 'Think of Keith Richards when he says to (Mick) Jagger, "This thing is bigger than both of us." That's where we are,' Hulsman said. 'The kids want to save the marriage even though the love is gone.'"

Bush Also Discussed Iran With Putin. The AP (6/20, Riechmann) reports Bush also "discussed Iran with Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday during an 18-minute phone call Putin placed to Bush. 'The presidents agreed on the importance of remaining united in their efforts to press Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and begin negotiations on the incentives package,' said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council."

Bush Urged To Pursue "Grand Bargain" With Iran. Flynt Leverett, a former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council, writes in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) that "by refusing to consider a 'grand bargain' with Iran -- that is, resolution of Washington's concerns about Tehran's weapons of mass destruction and support for terrorism in return for American security guarantees, an end to sanctions and normalization of diplomatic relations -- the Bush administration is courting failure in its nuclear diplomacy and paving the way for Russia and China to win the larger strategic contest." Iran "has the world's second-largest proven reserves of conventional crude oil, after Saudi Arabia, and the second-largest reserves of natural gas, after Russia. … Although Russian energy companies could not offer quite the same level of expertise as Western firms in the complexities of managing Iran's older oil reservoirs, they could in the next several years help the Islamic Republic develop its newer oil finds and, more significantly, realize its huge potential as a gas exporter.

DOJ_NMG_0035155

Wiesel Sounds Alarm About Iran, "Religious Fanaticism." In his Wall Street Journal column (6/20), Frederick Kempe writes, "Nobel peace laureate Elie Wiesel has a simple motive behind the stepped-up pace of his already furious work: foreboding. The world's best-known Holocaust survivor senses, at age 77, a pivotal historic moment, one that poses some of the greatest dangers since Nazi Germany. The shift began 'with the ultimate new weapon,' he says, suicide terrorists deployed globally on behalf of religious fanaticism and without qualms about mass casualties. In his view, it has taken state form with an Iranian president who supports terrorism and is bent on developing nuclear weapons and exterminating Israel." Wiesel "has set in motion a series of Mideast initiatives that will be announced this week in Petra, Jordan, at a gathering of fellow Nobel laureates brought together by him and King Abdullah II. … Though the official program doesn't mention Iran (in deference to its Jordanian hosts), the laureates also will consider a mission to Iran in conjunction with the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency to explore ways to pull Tehran from the nuclear brink. Though Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may not heed the Nobel winners' advice, Mr. Wiesel says, he is unlikely to refuse a meeting."

Rice Again Cautions Pyongyang Against Missile Test. The AP (6/20, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "warned North Korea on Monday it will face consequences if it test-fires a missile thought to be powerful enough to reach the West Coast of the United States. 'It would be a very serious matter and, indeed, a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile,' Rice said amid indications that the North Koreans could launch an intercontinental ballistic missile at any moment." The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Kessler, 744K) adds, "Rice's remarks, made at a news conference with the Spanish foreign minister, are the latest in a series of warnings to Pyongyang not to end a 1999 self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile testing" and that the US is working in concert with allies on the issue. "Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, a close US ally, said in Tokyo yesterday that Japan 'would have to respond harshly' if there was a missile test." Although "US officials have searched for ways to lure North Korea back to the [six-party] talks...Rice suggested that a test would result in a push to bring new sanctions against Pyongyang. UN Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that he has begun preliminary consultations with other Security Council members about a possible resolution. A test 'would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle,' Rice said," adding that any launch would be an "abrogation of obligations."

The Financial Times (6/20) adds, "In a sign of heightened concern in Washington, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that administration officials, including President George W. Bush, 'have contacted more than a dozen heads of state.'" Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/20, Cooper, Onishi, 1.19M) notes, "Australia, which has diplomatic relations with North Korea, called on the North Korean ambassador to cancel any test and to return immediately to the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. 'North Korea would be gravely mistaken if it thinks that a missile test would improve its bargaining position in the six-party talks,' the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said in a statement. ... 'Such action would be highly provocative.'"

The story was reported by each of the networks in full segments last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 4, 2:20, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Senior US officials tell ABC News that North Korea appears to have put rocket launchers in place and fueled a missile, final preparations that would be difficult to reverse. Senior US military officials tell ABC News, that if North Korea goes ahead with a missile launch, they don't rule out an attempt to shoot the missile down. The US has a limited missile defense system with interceptors in Alaska and California, designed specifically to deal with the North Korean threat." The US is "urging China to put pressure on North Korea and the US has warned North Korea not to launch the missile." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "It would be taken with utmost seriousness. I think it's taken with utmost seriousness by regional states and by the world."

The CBS Evening News (6/19, story 4, 1:50, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The Pentagon is now moving planes and ships like these configured with special equipment closer to North Korea to track the test firing of a missile with another range to hit the US West Coast. Now fully fueled, the missile could be launched as soon as Wednesday. A potential delivery system for nuclear weapons North Korea has already developed." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "And so it would be a very serious matter, and indeed a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile." Axelrod: "The US is consulting members of the UN Security Council for help dealing with a country that clearly wants attention at a time when Iran seems to be treated as nuclear threat number one." Gov. Richardson: "They're jumpy. And it's a way to send a message that they are a major problem to us, and they want us to deal with their problem. So they are acting like kids."

DOJ_NMG_0035156

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 3, 3:30, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Experts say the Taepo-Dong 2, sitting on a remote launch pad today, is bigger and potentially a direct threat to the United States. … Alarmed, the White House revealed today President Bush has personally called international allies to consult on possible diplomatic steps against North Korea, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned the missile test would amount to dangerous saber-rattling." Secretary Rice: "It would be a very serious matter and indeed a provocative act should North Korea decide to – to launch that missile." Miklaszewski: "Japan's prime minister threatened North Korea with harsh consequences, which could include bilateral economic sanctions. But why would North Korea launch a missile test now? US officials tell NBC News it appears President Kim Jong Il is under increasing pressure from his own generals to stand up to the US and dramatically demonstrate North Korea's military capability. Experts also believe North Korea may be angling to get the same concessions the US is prepared to offer to Iran in exchange for giving up its nuclear weapons program."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/129, Henry) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice today basically issued a stark warning for North Korea, reminding them that they first agreed back in 1999 and reiterated that pledge early in the Bush administration that they would not go through with a test like this."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Ensor) also noted Rice and President Bush "have been talking to Japan, China, South Korea and others about what to do if North Korea, as expected, goes ahead."

USA Today (6/20, Nichols, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told," while the Los Angeles Times (6/20, Spiegel, Demick, 958K) titles its story "US Warns North Korea On Missile Launch."

DOD Activates Missile Defense System. Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/20, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon activated its new US ground-based interceptor missile defense system, and officials announced yesterday that any long-range missile launch by North Korea would be considered a 'provocative act.' Poor weather conditions above where the missile site was located by US intelligence satellites indicates that an immediate launch is unlikely, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity." However, "intelligence officials said preparations have advanced to the point where a launch could take place within several days to a month."

Allen Says President Does Not Have Authority To Attack North Korea Over Test. Sen. George Allen was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19) if the President has authority to take military action if need be in North Korea. Allen said, "I think that we're going to have all our guard up in the event that this missile is launched, I think our guard is going to be up to see where it goes and who knows, it may fairly be erratic. As far as military action, you mean, if they'd launch this missile, does the president have the right to attack North Korea on it? No, I don't think the president has that authority to do so. Unless it hit our country, then it's -- you're going to have a chance to respond there, but I don't think it's intended to hit our country. I think it's intended to show that we could hit the United States."

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "Why North Korea would want to increase its isolation and antagonize its few friends like China and South Korea is hard to comprehend. But North Korea-watching is full of such mysteries." The US, "for its part, has reacted sensibly, not wasting a lot of time on diplomatic rigmarole and delivering instead a clear and direct message to North Korea not to proceed with a missile test. We hope that North Korea's next surprise is to respond equally sensibly and cancel whatever plans it has for such a self-destructive move."

McCain Receptive To India Nuclear Deal, Doubts Approval This Year. The Financial Times (6/20, Sevastopulo) interviewed Sen. John McCain, who said Congress "is unlikely to give final approval this year to the Bush administration's civilian nuclear energy deal with India." McCain said Congress "needed to scrutinise the deal rigorously because of the precedent it would set." McCain said, "I am not saying I will oppose it, but I still would like to hear more argument in its favour. I understand our unique relationship with India ... but when you carve out an exemption, then of course you run the risk of others wanting the same exemption." FT adds McCain said approval this year was "unlikely" due to time constraints.

DOJ_NMG_0035157

US, Russia Reach Deal On Weapons Of Mass Destruction Program. The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Baker, 744K) reports the United States and Russia "reached a last-minute agreement saving a program to secure or destroy Soviet nuclear warheads, chemical weapons and killer germs, U.S. officials said yesterday, breaking a long logjam and averting a rupture weeks before President Bush travels to St. Petersburg." The program, "a multibillion-dollar effort designed to keep weapons of mass destruction out of the hands of terrorists or rogue states, was set to expire Friday amid a stubborn disagreement over legal provisions. But U.S. and Russian officials cut a deadline deal in Moscow on Friday that will extend the program for seven years and effectively take the issue off the table for Bush's trip." The Cooperative Threat Reduction program "with Russia represents the most expansive disarmament effort in the world and the prospect that it could be halted deeply worried arms-control specialists." Sen. Richard Lugar "hailed the extension but called on Congress to remove other conditions that threaten the program: 'If the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is the number one national security threat facing our country, we cannot permit any delays in our response.'"

Hamas Government Pays Cash To Palestinian Workers. USA Today/AP (6/20, Barzak) reports that in Gaza City, "thousands of Palestinian workers left postal banks carrying three crisp $100 bills Monday, their first pay since March." The payment "was made by the Hamas-led government, which dipped into cash officials carried into Gaza last week to circumvent a freeze on Western aid." Finance Minister Omar Abdel Razek "said there was no way to transport the money to the West Bank, or even convert it to a local currency. He said officials were forced to make cash payments to avoid commercial banks that fear anti-terrorism sanctions." Razek said, "We are paying through the post office because we have some problems with banks because of the direct or indirect threats by the U.S. and Israel." USA adds that last week, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar "hauled $20 million in cash across the Egyptian border into Gaza in suitcases. Another Hamas official followed with $2 million. Hamas said the money came from private donations and Islamic charities."

The New York Times (6/20, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that as Palestinian leaders "began paying overdue salaries with smuggled cash, a top European Union official arrived here on Monday to push forward a new plan aimed at easing the increasingly serious financial crunch among Palestinians." The plan "seeks to sidestep the Palestinian government, led by Hamas, classified by the European Union and the United States as a terrorist organization, while providing $125 million in subsidies for health and utilities, and in payments to poor Palestinians." Benita Ferrero-Waldner, "the European Union's commissioner for external relations, met with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas. While the Israeli and Palestinian leaders have expressed reservations about parts of the temporary plan, both sides said after their meetings with Ms. Ferrero-Waldner that they hoped the plan would go forward."

Bolton Questions Need For UN Peacekeepers In East Timor. The New York Times (6/20, Hoge, 1.19M) reports US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton "questioned the need cited by Secretary General Kofi Annan last week to return peacekeepers to East Timor, where an Australian-led multinational force has ended violence that killed more than 30 people." Bolton said "the current conflict was internal and unrelated to the tiny nation's struggle for independence from Indonesia that had been the basis of an earlier United Nations presence."

Morocco Cracks Down On Islamist Activists Amid Coup Fears. The Washington Times (6/20, Brandon, 90K) reports police have "arrested more than 500 Islamist activists since late May on accusations that they were planning a coup to replace Morocco's pro-U.S. monarchy with an Islamic state." The arrests "revived fears that the country's largest Islamic movement, Al Adl wa al Ihsane, or Justice and Charity, is preparing to take up arms to fulfill predictions from the group's own Sufi mystics that Morocco's monarchy will fall this year." The group, "which already has Islamized higher education in Morocco, wants to replace the monarchy with an Islamic state and cut all political, cultural and economic relations with the West -- moves that it argues will end poverty and corruption in Morocco."

DOJ_NMG_0035158

Bush, Brazil's Da Silva Discuss Trade. The AFP (6/20) reports President Bush "and his Brazilian counterpart Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by telephone about this week's" WTO talks "and mutual trade concerns." The NSC said in a statement, "The two presidents expressed the importance of a successful Doha Round, and noted that their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all. President Lula acknowledged and thanked the president for the leadership he has shown at the WTO. The two presidents also briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy."

The AP (6/20) reports White House spokesman Frederick Jones said, "The two presidents briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy."

Chavez Lines Up Regional Support For UNSC Seat. The Financial Times (6/20, Webb-Vidal, Turner) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "is fighting to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council, in the face of US efforts to derail Venezuela's campaign by lobbying on behalf of Guatemala." The Times says Chavez "has long viewed a seat on the council as a vital part of winning representation for Venezuela – and by extension, he argues, for poorer nations – in international organisations." Latin American "diplomatic heavyweights" including Argentina, whose seat Venezuela seeks to fill, and Brazil "have indicated that they would back Caracas, as have countries farther afield, such as Syria." The Times opines, "Washington's lobbying efforts may be on shaky ground. César Mayoral, Argentina's ambassador to the UN, said on Monday it looked 'very bad for Guatemala,' adding that US support for Guatemala was undermining the Central American country's chances."

US Opposition Said To Have Weakened New UN Human Rights Council. The New York Times (6/20, Wright, 1.19M) reports United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan "spoke Monday at the first meeting of the organization's new Human Rights Council, urging member nations not to engage in the political bickering that paralyzed its predecessor, the Human Rights Commission. … But from the start the council has been weakened by the opposition of the United States, among only four countries that voted against the creation of the body at a General Assembly session in March. The United States, which wanted a smaller body with fewer members, also declined to seek a seat on the council. While many countries have sent foreign ministers to Geneva for the opening sessions of the new body, the American delegation will be led by Warren W. Tichenor, the new United States representative to the United Nations in Geneva."

US, EU To Launch Joint Effort To Protect Intellectual Property Rights. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, Gunter Verheugen vice president of the European Commission for enterprise and industry, Peter Mandelson EU trade commissioner, and US Trade Representative Susan Schwab write in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M), "The number of counterfeit items seized at European Union borders has increased by more than 1,000%, rising to over 103 million in 2004 from 10 million in 1998. … Today the EU and the US will launch a joint action strategy on the global enforcement of intellectual-property rights." They add, "The competitiveness of European and American industry depends on respect for intellectual property, and so do the health, safety and security of our citizens. … The EU-U.S. joint action is a clear signal that we will work with our trading partners to ensure that their legal commitments on intellectual property are accompanied by a genuine willingness to tackle the problem at their borders, in their courts and on their streets."

Morales Land Reform Proposals Already Stirring Class Conflict. The Washington Post (6/20, A1, Reel, 744K), in a front-page story, reports, "Property in Latin America is more unevenly distributed than anywhere on the planet, and Bolivia is no exception. But this month the country began a project to shuffle ownership rights affecting 20 percent of its land area, giving most of it to the poor. And tensions are starting to boil. Those with land are starting to dig in to protect their turf. Those without it, emboldened by the recent government announcements, are taking over more properties on their own, without government approval." The post goes on to report, "The conflict in Bolivia is firmly rooted in the stark inequities that President Evo Morales says his 'agrarian revolution' is designed to correct. About 90 percent of Bolivian land is owned by the wealthiest 7 percent of the population." Morales "has said much of his nation's land is not being used productively, and he complains that large swaths were given to wealthy elites during the dictatorships of the 1970s. Under his plan, if the government deems land unproductive or obtained illegally, it is subject to confiscation and redistribution."

DOJ_NMG_0035159

Much Of Europe Continues To Rely On Pollution-Producing Coal Plants. The New York Times (6/20, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "Europe likes to think of itself as a place that has moved beyond its sooty industrial past. … But with oil prices soaring and worries rising about the reliability of gas piped from Russia, Europe must depend heavily on that great industrial-age relic, coal: a cheap, plentiful fuel, but one that emits twice the carbon dioxide of natural gas. Coal-fired plants generated half the power in Germany and Britain during the chilly winter just past. While Europeans stand out for their commitment to controlling global warming gases, some of their largest energy companies are reluctant to invest in technologies that could further protect the environment, like equipment in the demonstration plant here that will trap carbon dioxide and pump it into underground storage areas. Only a handful of carbon-free plants are planned in the European Union."

Internet Said To Have Transformative Role In China. In his column for the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "China is not the police state that its leaders sometimes would like it to be; the Communist Party's monopoly on information is crumbling, and its monopoly on power will follow. The Internet is chipping away relentlessly at the Party, for even 30,000 censors can't keep up with 120 million Chinese Netizens. With the Internet, China is developing for the first time in 4,000 years of history a powerful independent institution that offers checks and balances on the emperors. It's not that President Hu Jintao grants these freedoms, for he has arrested dozens of cyberdissidents as well as journalists. But the Internet is just too big and complex for State Security to control, and so the Web is beginning to assume the watchdog role filled by the news media in freer countries."

Independent Media Seen As Advancing Islam's "Reformation." The Wall Street Journal's Bret Stephens (6/20) writes, "There is a perception in the West -- general in Europe but strong also in the U.S. -- that the Reformation of Islam awaits the resolution of a centuries-long Hegelian dialectic. The world moves faster than that. Through wireless connections and satellite dishes, the outside world is filtering into the Middle East, mostly uncensored by regimes or imams. Not everyone likes it, but many do, and the difference between them not only bloodies the Middle East, but also, increasingly, offers it hope."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"A Hollywood Player Who Owns The Game."
"U.S. Pressures North Korea Over Missile."
"Getty Is Prepared To Return 21 Disputed Antiquities To Italy."
"West Hollywood Wants To Legalize Pot Use."
"No Lines At LAX? It's News To These Passengers."
"Troops To Return To New Orleans."

USA Today:

"Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants."
"Revived Taliban Waging 'Full-Blown Insurgency.'"
"Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs."
"More Companies Tell Workers To Silence Cellphones."

New York Times:

"Justices Divided On Protections Over Wetlands."
"Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy."
"Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq."
"For Europe, A Green Self-Image Clashes With A Reliance On Coal."
"A Governor's Troubles Threaten Republicans' Hold On Kentucky."
"In The Hometown Of Wal-Mart, Synagogue Is A Sign Of Growth."

Washington Post:

"Justices Rein In Clean Water Act."
"Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets."
"Pr. George's Takes A Bite Of The Good Life."
"Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle."
"Polygraph Readings Vary Among Agencies."
"Checks And Balance Sheets Of A City's History."

Washington Times:

"U.S. Initiates New Missile Shield."
"Church Regrets, Won't Repent For Gay Bishop."
"Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas."
"Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam."
"More Pandas May Be In Wild Than Estimated."

DOJ_NMG_0035160

"Grace Under Pressure."

Detroit Free Press:

"Called To Serve."
"Murder Charges For 3 Soldiers."
"High Court Muddies Wetlands Rules."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"3 U.S. Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainees' Deaths."
"Faulty Gauge Drains Lanier."
"'Apprentice' In China Fires Up Equality Debate."
"Tech, IBM Develop Fastest Microchip Yet."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Army-Detainee Murder Charges; Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Saddam Trial; North Korea Missile; TX-Severe Weather; New Orleans Crime; Tire Lawsuits; AZ Wildfire; Supreme Court-Clean Water Act; Supreme Court-Abortion; Episcopalians-Woman Bishop; Doomsday Seed Vault; Mickelson Meltdown.

CBS: Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Military-Kidnapping Training; Army-Detainee Murder Charges; North Korea Missile; NASA-Space Shuttle Launch; TX-Severe Weather; Government-Pension Liabilities; Steelworkers-Uranium Exposure; Seniors-Video Games.

NBC: Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Saddam Trial; North Korea Missile; TX-Severe Weather; New Orleans Crime; Aborted Al Qaeda Plot; Heatstroke-Athletes; Mickelson Meltdown.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: US Soldiers-Murder Charges; Iraq-Missing Soldiers; New Orleans-National Guard Patrols; AZ-Wildfire.

CBS: Rather-Retirement; Iraq-Japan Troop Withdrawal; Houston-Heavy Rain; Stanley Cup Finals.

NPR: Iraq-Japan Troop Withdrawal; Bush-Iran Nuclear Program; Houston-Heavy Rain; Foreign Stock Markets; North Korea-Missile Test; Stanley Cup Finals; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Departs for Vienna.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LYNNE CHENEY – Speaks about American history and reads to students, Birmingham Civil Rights institute, Birmingham, Ala.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the McCarran-Ferguson Act's insurers' antitrust exemption. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Senate Agriculture Appropriations bill. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank. Acting President James Lambright; Assistant Treasury Secretary Clay Lowrey; James D. McClaskey, president and CEO, Midrex Technologies Inc.; Harry Hayman, Commerce Bank; David Ickert, Air Tractor Inc.; Robert E. Scott, Economic Policy Institute. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Markiup of S.3521, Stop Over Spending Act of 2006. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full committee. Hearing to examine the Rural Development Programs of the USDA. Undersecretary Thomas Dorr; Glenn English, Chief Executive Officer, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association; Jane Halliburton Supervisor, Story County, Iowa; Mary McBride, Executive Vice President Communications and Energy Banking Group, CoBank, Denver. Location: Room 328 Russell.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the Federal Housing Administration. Assistant HUD Secretary Brian Montgomery; William Shear, GAO; Regina Lowrie, Mortgage Bankers Association; Tom Stevens, National Association of Realtors; A.W. Pickel, LeaderOne Financial Corp.; Ira Goldstein, The Reinvestment Fund. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ National Parks Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Park Service's revised draft management policies. Deputy NPS Director Steve Martin; Tom Kiernan, National Parks Conservation Association. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information, and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on UN headquarters renovations. UN Amb. John Bolton; Claudia Rolsett, Foundation for the Defense of Democracies; Anne Bayefsky, Hudson Institute; Thomas Melito, GAO. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0035161

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at 11 a.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (7 bills): 1) H.Res. 731 - Commending the Patriot Guard Riders for shielding mourning military families from protesters and preserving the memory of fallen service members at funerals; 2) H.R. 5060 - To amend the Federal Financial Assistance Management Improvement Act of 1999 to require data with respect to Federal financial assistance to be available for public access in a searchable and user friendly form; 3) H.Res. 867 - Honoring the life and accomplishments of James Cameron; 4) H.R. 4356 - Emergency and Disaster Assistance Fraud Penalty Enhancement Act of 2005; 5) H.Con.Res. 367 - Honoring and praising the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution on the 100th anniversary of being granted its Congressional Charter; 6) H.R. 5228 - To require representatives of governments designated s State Sponsors of Terrorism to disclose to the Attorney General lobbying contacts with legislative branch officials, and for other purposes; 7) H.R. 1285 - To amend the Nursing Relief for Disadvantaged Areas Act of 1999 to remove the limitation for nonimmigrant classification for nurses in health professional shortage areas. H.R. 5631 - Department of Defense Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on DoD force realignments. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federalism and the Census Subcommittee. Hearing on the Community Reinvestment Act. Jon Gutzmann, St. Paul Public Housing Agency; James Riccio, Low-Wage Workers and Working Communities Policy Area; George Moses, National Low Income Housing Coalition; Benson F. ``Buzz'' Roberts, Local Initiatives Support Corporation; Judy Kennedy, National Association of Affordable Housing Lenders. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Disability Assistance and Memorial Affairs Subcommittee and Economic Opportunity Subcommittee. Joint hearing on data security issues in the VA. Ronald Aument, Deputy Under Secretary for Benefits; Jack McCoy, Associate Deputy Under Secretary for Policy and Program Management; Michael Walcoff, Associate Deputy Under Secretary for Field Operations; Thomas Lloyd, Deputy Chief Information Officer; Michael Staley, Assistant Inspector General for Audit, OIG; Stephen Gaskell, Director, OIG; Gregory Wilshusen, GAO; Linda Koontz, GAO. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on S.1003 - Navajo-Hopi Land Settlement Amendments of 2005. BIA Director William Pat Ragsdale; Christopher J. Bavasi, Office of Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation; Ivan Sidney, chairman, Hopi Tribe; Joe Shirley, president, Navajo Nation; Roman Bitsuie, executive director, Navajo-Hopi Land Commission Office. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on consumer privacy in the commercial sector. Meg Whitman, President and CEO, eBay Inc.; Thomas M. Lenard, Senior Vice President for Research, The Progress and Freedom Foundation; Peter Swire, Professor, Moritz College of Law, Ohio State University; Scott Taylor, Chief Privacy Officer, Hewlett-Packard Company; Evan Hendricks, Editor and Publisher, Privacy Times, Cabin John, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASATRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Coast Guard. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

3 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Hearing on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

4 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Middle East and Central Asia Subcommittee. Closed members only briefing on the situation in the Gaza Strip. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: HOMECARE _ The American Association for Homecare holds its annual Washington Legislative Conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. Rep. John Schwarz speaks on H.r. 5513 - Home Oxygen Patient Protection Act. 8:30 a.m. Association Chairman Tom Ryan. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

SMALL BUSINESS _ The National Federation of Independent Business holds its 2006 Small Business

DOJ_NMG_0035162

Summit. Highlights: 9 a.m. Sen. Michael Enzi. 9:15 a.m. Karl Rove. 9:30 a.m. Sen. Ben Nelson. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

ENERGY EXPO _ 9 a.m. - 6:30 p.m. 9th annual Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency Expo and Forum, co-hosted by the Sustainable Energy Coalition and the House and Senate Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency caucuses. Highlights: 9 a.m. News conference and opening session, with Reps. Mark Udall and Zach Wamp; Sens. Wayne Allard and Byron Dorgan; Alexander Karsner, DOE; Philip Grone, DOD; Thomas Dorr, USDA; Dan Arvizu, National Renewable Energy Laboratory, others. 5 p.m. Reception, with remarks by John Krenicki, CEO GE Energy; and presentation of Lifetime Achievement Award to Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R-NY). Location: Room 345, Cannon.

ENERGY FORECASTS _ 9 a.m. Energy Information Administration head Guy Caruso releases the International Energy Outlook 2006 with forecasts of world energy supply and demand through 2030. Location: CSIS, B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 9 a.m. Panel discussion on the status of religious freedom worldwide as part of Religious Freedom Day on Capitol Hill, hosted by Sen. Rick Santorum, with Sens. Norm Coleman and Sam Brownback, and Reps. Roy Blunt, Todd Akin, Trent Franks, UN Amb. John Bolton, others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

TRADE SANCTIONS _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Washington International Trade Association holds panel discussion on the effectiveness of current U.S. sanctions, as well as the prospect of unilateral sanctions on Iran and Burma. Participants include Human Rights Watch; National Foreign Trade Council; House Interational Relations Committee; others. Location: International Gateway Suite, Reagan Bldg., 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

NUCLEAR POWER-CLIMATE _ 9:30 a.m. The Institute for Energy and Environmental Research holds a briefing to release a report on risks associated with reviving the nuclear power industry as part of efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOGRAPHICS-CIVIL UNREST _ 10 a.m. The Global Health Council holds a discussion about a recent study that finds that demographics affect the risk of civil conflict in nations. Location: Suite 1120, 1111 19th St. NW.

INJURED VETS-SCHOLARSHIP _ 10 a.m. News conference to announce a new scholarship for injured veterans attending the University of Idaho, with Sen. Larry Craig, University President Timothy White, others. Location: Room 418, Russell.

REFUGEE YOUTH-POWELL _ 10 a.m. Retired Gen. Colin Powell, Olympic medalist Joey Cheek, others attend major announcement focusing on the needs of nine million refugee youths. They will also unveil winners of the World Refugee Day poster contest, sponsored by the UN Refugee Agency Goodwill Ambassador Angelina Jolie. Location: National Geographic Society, 1145 17th St. NW.

EMINENT DOMAIN _ 10:30 a.m. The Institute for Justice holds a briefing to release a study showing how the threat of eminent domain abuse has skyrocketed in the U.S. since the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling one year ago this week. Location: Suite 900, 901 N. Glebe Rd., Arlington.

HEALTH SAVINGS ACCOUNTS _ 11 a.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing on health savings accounts with Rep. Eric Cantor, Dan Perrin of the HSA Coalition, others. Location: Room 2237, Rayburn.

ISRAEL-RED CROSS _ 11 a.m. Senator Hillary Clinton, Reps. Steve Israel, Eliot Engel, others join American Friends of Magen David Adom Executive VP Daniel Allen. They're urging that Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's first aid and disaster relief organization, be admitted to the International Red Cross. Location: Senate Swamp.

JUDGES-POLITICS _ 11 a.m. Brookings Institution holds a forum on the politics of the judiciary. Panelists include the co-authors of the Brookings book ``Are Judges Political?" Location: 1775 Massachusetts Ave., NW.

US-CANADA _ 11 a.m. Canadian Ambassador to the US Michael Wilson discusses cooperation between the two ``neighbor nations." Location: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 6th Floor Auditorium; Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center; 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

SECURITY PREPAREDNESS _ 11:30 a.m. The National Council on Readiness and Preparedness holds a news conference with former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore to launch a tour to engage community and private sectors in homeland security preparedness. Location: National Press Club.

FAITH BASED _ 11:45 a.m. The Hudson Institute holds a discussion on the future of government policy on faith-based initiatives and community service, with Audrey Alvarado of the National Council of Nonprofit Associations, former Director Donald Eberly of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Joseph Loconte of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, others. Location: Hudson Institute, 6th floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0035163

BODMAN _ 3:45 a.m. Energy Secretary Bodman speaks at the Edison Electric institute's annual convention. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

FUEL ECONOMY _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Dianne Feinstein, Olympia Snowe, Richard Durbin and lincoln Chafee hold a news conference to announce a bill to close the SUV loophold and raise the average fuel economy for all vehicles. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

REFUGEE PROTECTION _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion with Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey on the US commitment to refugee protection and assistance. Contacts: n/a, 202-675-1761.

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Minority Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

DEMOCRATS-STUDENT AID _ 1 p.m. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, others, join college students to call on Republicans to reverse student aid cuts. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

GONZALES SPEECH _ 1 p.m. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales speaks at U.S. Chamber forum on intellectual property. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

NEW MAGAZINE _ 1 p.m. Announcement of a new progressive publication, with a panel discussion with Kenbnedyt Baer of Democracy, Andrei Cherny of Democracy, Francis Fukuyama of American Interest, Bill Kristol of Weekly Standard and Michael Tomasky of American Prospect. Location: National Press Club.

STEM CELLS _ 1:30 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback, stem cell recipient patients, others, hold a news conference to discuss research progress. Location: Russell Senate Park.

CHAO _ 3 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao participates in a discussion on ``Private, Public and Nongovernmental Organization Leadership" at a Harvard Business School Global Leadership Forum. Location: Reagan Trade Center.

IRAN _ 3 p.m. The Congressional Progressive Caucus holds a forum on whether an Iran war would help or hurt the US national security. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 3:30 p.m. Congressional Democrats hold a news conference to express support for an increase in the minimum wage. Sens. Edward Kennedy-D-MA, Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-NY, Richard Durbin, D-IL, and Reps. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., David Obey, D-WI, and others participate. Location: Senate Radio and Television Gallery.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

IG Report Offers Broad Criticism Of FBI Moussaoui Investigation 3
Judge Rejects Hayat Motion To Dismiss Lying Convictions..... 3
Stewart Lawyers Ask Judge To Force Release Of Any NSA Surveillance In Case 3
WPost Urges US To Comply With Convention Against Torture.... 3
Former DOJ Officials Say ACLU Criticism Of Bush Detainee Policy Falls Flat 4

Homeland Response:

Muslim, Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Re-Entry Searches, Detentions 4
Bloomberg Greets Bush At JFK, Lobbies For More DHS Funds .. 4
Government To Buy Experimental Treatment For Anthrax 5
Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Watch List..... 5
DHS Official Recommends Book On Privacy In a "Globalized World."..... 5
NYTimes Criticizes "Golden Revolving Door" At DHS..... 5
National Guardsmen Will Be Sent To Quell Violence In New Orleans 6
Houston Inundated By Ten Inches Of Rain 6

War News:

Iraqi Official Says Missing US Soldiers In Iraq Found Tortured, "Barbarically" Killed 6
Senate Democrats Offer Plan For Iraq Aimed At Easing Party Divisions..... 7
Cheney Stands By Claim That Insurgency Is In Its Last Throes ... 8
Koizumi Pulling Japanese Troops Out Of Iraq..... 8
Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Unofficial Pullout "Road Map" Exists 9
Three US Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainee Deaths..... 9
US Cancels Major Iraq Prison Contract..... 9
Barred Military Contractor Keeps Working In Iraq Under New Name 9
Prosecution Asks For Death Penalty For Saddam 10
USA Today Says Khalilzad Cable Shows Grim Reality Of Iraq .. 10
Cohen Says US Suffers From Attention Deficit Disorder In Iraq Policy..... 10
Taliban Produces "Biggest Show Of Strength" In Years 10
Pentagon Seeks To Add Special Ops Troops Without Lowering Standards..... 10
New PTSD Cases Running More Than Six Times VA Expectation 11

Corporate Scandals:

US Asks For Higher Bond For Conrad Black 11
Denver Attorney Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Investigation 11
Father, Son Plead Guilty To Fraud In SureWest Probe 11
Olson Tapped To Head Accounting Board..... 12
South Korean Officials Clear Lone Star In Probe Of KEB Deal .. 12
Insurers Concerned About Options Timing Probe..... 12

Criminal Law:

DOJ Extends Abramoff's Freedom For Three Months As Cooperation Continues 13
Daley Secretary Testifies About Political Hiring List 13
Former Boston FBI Official Testifies Leaks Torpedoed Bulger Probe 13
Jordan Assigning More FBI Agents, Analysts To Wales Murder Case..... 13
Former Virginia Police Officers Plead Guilty To Lying To FBI About Bribes 13
Justices Sets Limits On Admissibility Of Evidence..... 14
Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Chicago Mobster 14
Former Stock Trader Sentenced To 11 Years In Prison 14
Boiler-Room Operator Sentenced To 17 Years In Prison 14
California's Searches Of Parolees Upheld 14
Pennsylvania School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Child Porn15
Baggy Jeans Pose Problem For Fleeing Thieves 15

Civil Law:

Supreme Court To Hear Administration Effort To Revive Late-Term Abortion Ban..... 15
Judge Approves Extension Of Delphi Reorganization Filing..... 16
Debate Over Regulation Of 527s Stymies Lobbying Reform Bill's Progress..... 16

Civil Rights:

9th Circuit To Hear Arguments On Hawaiian School Admission Policies..... 16
Federal Judge Overturns Jury Verdict In Age Bias Suit 16
Abortion Ban To Be Placed On South Dakota Ballot..... 17
Pentagon Document Lists Homosexuality As Mental Disorder ... 17

Feinstein Makes Case For Flag Protection Amendment 17
WSJournal Blasts Gerrymandering In The Name Of "Voting Rights." 17

Antitrust:

DOJ Task Force Report To Tout Progress In Protecting Intellectual Property 17
Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices In Real Estate 18
DOJ Will Not Challenge Collaborative Labor Database 18
FTC Endorses Online Legal Referral Services 18
Net Neutrality Debate Pits Diverse Coalition Against Entrenched Lobbyists 18
Attorneys Allege DOJ Over-Reaction In Qualcomm Gun-Jumping Case 19
Morgan Stanley Hikes Bid For Denver Energy Firm 19
Judge Dismisses Antitrust Suit Against Oil Companies 19
Supreme Court Seeks US Comment On IPO Underwriter Appeal 20
Senate Committee Proposes Internet User "Bill Of Rights." 20
Mittal Claims Growing Support For Arcelor Bid 20
On Heels Of Nokia Venture, Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate Service Unit 20
LATimes Says Internet Phone Companies Shouldn't Pay Service Fees 21

Environment:

High Court Rules Federal Regulators Overstepped Authority Under Clean Water Act 21
Pombo Says Deal Has Been Reached On Offshore Oil Drilling . 22
Kempthorne Restores Preservation As Park Service's Primary Goal 22
Authors Lament Extinction Of Tasmanian Tiger 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Weapons, Drug Charges 23
Political Opponents Call For Connecticut Mayor To Resign Over Cocaine Allegation 23
Illegal Drug Use Declines Among US Workers 23
Two Men Accused Of Supplying Michigan Teen With Fentanyl-Laced Heroin 24
Louisiana Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Providing Pain Medication 24
Ohio Lab Said To Be Under Scrutiny By Regulators 24

Immigration:

Conservative Leaders Challenge Bush On Immigration 24

Tax:

California Businessman Arrested In Alleged Tax Deduction Scheme 25
Thomas Unveils Estate Tax Repeal Plan 25

Congress-Administration:

Rumsfeld Said To Give Little Attention To Weapons Procurement 26
Zoellick Announces Resignation From State Department Post .. 26
Energetic PR Effort Underway To Depict Bush As Fully Engaged26
Snow Deliberately Kept In Dark About Baghdad Trip 27
Federal Agencies' Varying Standards For Polygraph Tests Create Frustration 27
Cheney Presents Gerald Ford Prize To New York Daily News Reporter 27
GOP Lawmakers Have Extensive Agenda For The Next Five Weeks 27
Democrats Pledge To Keep Pressure On GOP Regarding Minimum Wage Hike 27
Police Union Wants Ethics Probe Of McKinney 28
Fundraiser Boosts McCrery's Bid For Ways And Means Chairmanship 28
USDA Official Cancels Some Alternative Work Schedules 28
Secret Service Agents Perform CPR On Former Treasury Official 28
Justices' Comments On Court's Independence Applauded 28

Other News:

Stocks Fall Amid Inflation Fears 29
Cooper Tire Efforts To Avoid Accident Lawsuits Examined 29
Bush Helps GOP Campaign Committees Raise $27 Million For 2006 29
Santorum Courts Jewish Vote 29
Dean's Brother Urges Democrats To Support Lamont If Lieberman Runs As Independent 29
McCain Seen As Candidate With Crossover Appeal 30
Lack Of Clear Frontrunner Opens Field For Number Of Candidates For 2008 30
Zogby Sees Wal-Mart Shoppers As Latest Key Voting Block 30
Patronage Charges Continue To Dog Kentucky Governor 30
Consultant Says Airbus's Superjumbo Project Should Not Have Been Born 30
NYTimes Says Congress Should Save The SIPP 30
WPost Says Virginia Lawmakers Failed To Address Transportation 31
Bush Urges Iran To Accept Limits On Enrichment 31
Rice Again Cautions Pyongyang Against Missile Test 32
McCain Receptive To India Nuclear Deal, Doubts Approval This Year 34
US, Russia Reach Deal On Weapons Of Mass Destruction Program 34
Hamas Government Pays Cash To Palestinian Workers 34
Bolton Questions Need For UN Peacekeepers In East Timor 34
Morocco Cracks Down On Islamist Activists Amid Coup Fears .. 35
Bush, Brazil's Da Silva Discuss Trade 35
Chavez Lines Up Regional Support For UNSC Seat 35
US Opposition Said To Have Weakened New UN Human Rights Council 35
US, EU To Launch Joint Effort To Protect Intellectual Property Rights 35
Morales Land Reform Proposals Already Stirring Class Conflict 35
Much Of Europe Continues To Rely On Pollution-Producing Coal Plants 36

DOJ_NMG_0035166

Internet Said To Have Transformative Role In China 36
Independent Media Seen As Advancing Islam's "Reformation." . 36

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 36

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 37

TERRORISM NEWS:

IG Report Offers Broad Criticism Of FBI Moussaoui Investigation. The previously-redacted Zacarias Moussaoui section of Justice Department IG Glenn Fine's report on pre-9/11 intelligence failures was released yesterday. Fine criticized the actions taken by FBI personnel at all levels in the investigation of Moussaoui after his arrest in August 2001, including those by "whistleblower" Colleen Rowley.

Under the headline, "FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says," the Washington Post (6/20, A6, Markon, Eggen, 744K) reports, "unlike previous public criticisms of the FBI's bungling of the case…Fine's analysis said there was plenty of blame to go around." But "ultimately, Fine concluded, no FBI policies or procedures were violated in the Moussaoui investigation." Responding to the report in a statement yesterday, "the FBI emphasized that Fine had 'dismissed any instances of intentional wrongdoing by FBI employees or any violation of FBI policies or practices' and found there was no attempt by FBI headquarters 'to intentionally thwart the efforts' of Minneapolis agents. Intelligence and other reforms since Sept. 11, the bureau added, have left the FBI 'much better positioned today to detect and prevent terrorism.'"

The AP (6/20, Barakat) focuses on Rowley and reports that Fine "credits Rowley overall for blowing the whistle on mistakes at FBI headquarters in its failure to aggressively investigate Moussaoui," but he "faults Rowley for failing to pursue other investigative avenues, such as a traditional criminal search warrant." In a Monday interview with AP, Rowley said that she "disagrees with the report…when it concludes that FBI headquarters had a reasonable basis to question a search warrant on Moussaoui. Rowley maintains that Minneapolis had laid out probable cause and said officials at headquarters were simply unwilling to stick their necks out." UPI (6/20) also briefly reports on Fine's analysis, under the headline "Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent."

Judge Rejects Hayat Motion To Dismiss Lying Convictions. The AP (6/20, Thompson) reports US District Court Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. yesterday rejected Hamid Hayat's motion to dismiss the three counts of lying to the FBI on which he was convicted along with a charge of providing material support to terrorists. Hayat attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi "argued that federal prosecutors were piling on potential prison time by charging three versions of the same lying offense." But Burrell ruled that "the circumstances of the two interviews were significantly different" because "the FBI needed to learn whether Hayat planned to attack the U.S. … 'He impaired the ability of the FBI to specifically identify a potential terrorist threat,' Burrell said in his 11-page ruling." The Stockton (CA) Record (6/20) also notes Burrell "ruled that Hayat's three lying convictions are not redundant, because each lie hindered the FBI's investigation of an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in Lodi."

Stewart Lawyers Ask Judge To Force Release Of Any NSA Surveillance In Case. The New York Post (6/20, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Convicted terror lawyer Lynne Stewart wants to force the feds to reveal whether they used the National Security Agency's secret surveillance program to gain access to her personal phone records. In papers filed in Manhattan federal court yesterday, Stewart's lawyers asked Judge John Koeltl for access to any phone and Internet records related to her case that the feds might have reviewed without a warrant." The Post notes, "Lawyers for Stewart claim her case may have been compromised if the feds had access to confidential communications under the controversial surveillance program, which they claim is illegal."

WPost Urges US To Comply With Convention Against Torture. The Washington Post (6/20, A16, 744K) editorializes, "The Convention Against Torture has been ratified by the Senate and should also bind the United States. In a report last month, the UN Committee Against Torture, which oversees the convention, spelled out what that would mean. Secret detention of prisoners in CIA facilities, it said, 'constitutes, per se, a violation of the Convention'; so does the 'rendition' of suspects to other countries where they might be tortured 'without any judicial procedure.' To come into compliance, the United States must disclose to the International Committee of the Red Cross the identities of all detainees it is holding and allow monitoring of their treatment. It must also give them access to a judicial process or release them as soon as possible." The Post adds, "All of this the United States should in any case want to do, in its own interest. It should establish one set of rules for questioning all prisoners. Those rules should conform with international treaties and the U.S. Constitution, so that inhumane treatment is at all times forbidden. And the rules should be public, so that the world can see that the United States has returned to its fundamental values."

DOJ_NMG_0035167

Former DOJ Officials Say ACLU Criticism Of Bush Detainee Policy Falls Flat. In a Los Angeles Times column (6/20), former Justice Department officials David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey say, "In an effort to show that on the Bush administration's evil watch the U.S. military has been systematically mistreating prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan with tacit approval or even outright encouragement from its civilian superiors, the American Civil Liberties Union has been demanding the release of dozens of internal military investigative reports. But the two reports on U.S. detainee policy just released in response to an ACLU lawsuit paint a picture quite the opposite of what the ACLU expected." Though "heavily redacted to remove operational details, the reports (by Brig. Gens. Richard Formica and Charles Jacoby) show a Pentagon open to criticism and change, and determined to guarantee detainees the humane treatment promised by President Bush when the war on terror began." Although "genuine instances of abuse are noted," these "are very much the exception and not the rule. The reports indicate that many allegations of abuse simply are unsubstantiated — or that the 'victim's' story changes once carefully examined." Predictably, the ACLU "has cried 'whitewash.' But what we are seeing is the refusal by administration critics to see anything other than the 'torture narrative' they have constructed."

Robinson Urges US To Close Guantanamo Prison. Columnist Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K), "We'd better not turn away just yet from the suicides of those three detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The rest of the world clearly isn't ready to move on. And with good reason. In many newspapers around the globe 'Guantanamo' is much more than the name of a beautiful harbor on Cuba's southern coast." It has become "shorthand for a whole litany of American excesses in George W. Bush's 'global war on terror,' the most visible example of how the United States blithely ignores the values of due process and rule of law that it so aggressively preaches, if necessary at the point of a gun." Robinson adds "we're long past the point where the government needs to show the world what's happening at Guantanamo. Instead of hurrying to expel reporters, the Pentagon should invite one and all to witness the orderly, legal process of emptying and shutting down a prison that is doing this nation much more harm than good."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim, Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Re-Entry Searches, Detentions. The New York Times (6/20, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports, "A group of Muslim and Arab-Americans, frustrated by what they say is the climate of suspicion and fear that dogs their re-entry into the United States from trips abroad, sued the Department of Homeland Security and the F.B.I. yesterday, demanding that the courts protect their civil rights." The class-action lawsuit, filed by the ACLU in Chicago, "contends that the courts alone can ensure that antiterrorism policies do not repeatedly subject ordinary Americans to detention, questioning, fingerprinting and the like." Illinois ACLU legal director Harvey Grossman "noted that Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, testifying May 2 before the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not guarantee that inaccuracies on the terrorist watch list would be corrected within the next five years." In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, the Chicago Tribune (6/20, Coen, 643K) adds that the plaintiffs "are calling for changes in policy at the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center and at U.S. Customs and Border Protection. 'We've taken a lot of time to bring together a broad array of plaintiffs from all over the country who have been stopped at every major airport and border crossing,' Grossman said. 'They are doctors, a pharmacist, businessmen.' The plaintiffs allege their civil rights have been violated through what they call 'highly punitive detentions' and harassment." The Tribune notes, "Bill Carter, a spokesman for the FBI in Washington, said there would be no comment because of the pending litigation."

WXYZ-TV Detroit (6/19, Agar, Morgan) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Dr. Elie Khoury has been delivering babies in Detroit for 43 years. He was born in Palestine and said he's treated like a terrorist even though he's an American citizen. Seven times in the past three years when returning from vacations in Mexico and Australia, he and his wife have been detained and separated from each other and their children. … He and the others bringing the lawsuit against Homeland Security, the FBI, Immigration and Customs said they are detained and questioned for hours."

Bloomberg Greets Bush At JFK, Lobbies For More DHS Funds. The New York Times (6/20, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports on "an unusually close encounter" that took the form of Mayor Bloomberg, who is "safely ensconced" in his final term, purposely flying to JFK Airport to meet President Bush before for his commencement address at the Merchant Marine Academy. While Bloomberg "studiously avoided" appearing with Bush in 2004, the mayor and president "shook hands beside Air Force One, with Mr. Bush slapping Mr. Bloomberg on the back and then later putting both hands on Mr. Bloomberg's shoulders to whisper in his ear." During the "seemingly amiable meeting," Bloomberg pointed to the abandoned 2003 cyanide plot to lobby for more

DOJ_NMG_0035168

Homeland Security funds. Bush expressed "disappointment" that the total amount for Homeland Security was cut.

WNBC-TV.com (6/19) calls the Bloomberg gesture "a surprise move" from the recent Bush critic, and goes into previous "attacks" on national issues levied against the administration.

Details Of Al Qaeda Plot Against New York Subway Examined. More details about the al Qaeda plot to attack the New York subway using homemade cyanide explosive devices, first revealed in author Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," were revealed yesterday. NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 6, 2:25, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported a "CIA source inside al Qaeda" says "the plan was to attack the subway with a lethal mix of hydrogen and cyanide, setting off a small explosion, releasing a deadly gas. New York went on alert." Mayor Michael Bloomberg, New York City: "We were completely posted by Washington and we took appropriate precautions and I guess history shows, since nothing happened, that we did what was correct." Mitchell: "Bloomberg, who rides the subways, says they're safe." But Suskind "says an al Qaeda cell came within 45 days of striking the subway and could still be in the US." Ron Suskind, author: "They don't have specifics as to exactly who they are, name, rank and serial number, but they're searching and have been searching fiercely for a cell like this if in fact they remained in the country." Mitchell: Bin Laden deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri called off the plot, but "why is still a mystery." Michael Sheehan, former NY counter-terrorism official: "I think if al Qaeda had an operation cell in New York City ready to go, it would have launched it. So I think there might have been other problems with this operation." Mitchell: "Other revelations confirmed by NBC News, the FBI penetrated Osama bin Laden's bank, the CIA kidnapped the banker and his tellers, replacing them with CIA agents of Pakistani descent." Dennis Lormel, former FBI official: "It was an important money laundering mechanism to al Qaeda that basically was dismantled." Mitchell: "And the book reveals that after capturing 9/11 organizer Ramzi bin al-Shibh in Karachi, the CIA found a treasure trove, including brand new Sudanese passports for bin Laden's wife and sons. Vice President Cheney said today that it is not just luck that has prevented another attack on the US since 9/11, but some experts fear that could be because al Qaeda is biding its time for an even more spectacular attack."

Government To Buy Experimental Treatment For Anthrax. The Washington Post (6/20, D1, Rosenwald, 744K) reports, "Human Genome Sciences Inc. is scheduled to announce today that the federal government has agreed to buy $165 million worth of an experimental treatment for anthrax infection in what will become the 14-year-old Rockville firm's first product sale." The purchase of "20,000 doses of Abthrax under the government's $5.6 billion Project BioShield program" is intended" to help the government stockpile a variety of anthrax therapies, including vaccines and drugs such as Abthrax, which would typically be given after exposure to the lethal substance." The government, which "could have purchased 100,000 doses under the BioShield contract," has also been considering "another anthrax treatment from Cangene Corp., a Canadian biotech company. For now, federal health officials appear to have settled on Abthrax. Cangene is not expected to be awarded a contract today, according to people briefed on the deal."

Arab-Americans Sue DHS, FBI Over Watch List. The New York Times (6/20, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports the ACLU filed a lawsuit against the Department of Homeland Security and the FBI yesterday in which Muslim and Arab-Americans claim that they face a "climate of suspicion and fear" upon "re-entry into the United States from trips abroad. … The seven main plaintiffs in the class action suit assert that both the United States Congress and the federal government are ignoring the plight of innocent Americans harassed repeatedly because of problems with the terrorist watch list." Donna A. Bucella, director of the Terrorist Screening Center of the F.B.I., where the watch list is maintained, said it is "an important tool for local law enforcement agencies," but that "there must be ways the U.S. government could refine it and make it better."

DHS Official Recommends Book On Privacy In a "Globalized World." John W. Kropf, of the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/20, 90K) writes, "Even if you've never physically set foot outside the United States, your personal information has traveled the globe." Kropf adds that the "average citizen" should care about this "in a globalized world, where personal information has become a major form of currency for both private industry and government." Kropf adds that "The Governance of Privacy," a book by Colin J. Bennett and Charles D. Raab examining "the world of global privacy" should be "a must read" for those in the privacy field. It is noted that Kropf's vies "are his and not those of the Department of Homeland Security or the government."

NYTimes Criticizes "Golden Revolving Door" At DHS. Under the headline "The Golden Revolving Door," the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes that since its creation, DHS "has hardly covered itself with glory." However, "there's one area in which Homeland Security has excelled beyond anyone's wildest expectations: creating a giant, expensive crop of government-trained consultants and lobbyists." Referring to a Times report that "at least 90 top Homeland Security officials have gone through that famous revolving door between the government and the lobbying industry," the Times questions how "the people running an agency that performs so badly could be so much in demand." The Times states that those left at the agency are likely to "temper their own judgments about what systems to buy and what consultants to use with an eye on their own private-sector prospects." The Time says a "loophole" allowing former DHS officials to lobby former colleagues without waiting a year "should be revisited immediately."

DOJ_NMG_0035169

National Guardsmen Will Be Sent To Quell Violence In New Orleans. USA Today (6/20, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports that following a "a surge of violence" in New Orleans that left six dead over the weekend, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco "plans to send hundreds of state police and National Guardsmen into the city's hurricane-ravaged areas" to aid local police. Mayor Ray Nagin, who requested the extra help Monday, said the troops and state police "would free up city police officers to cover the more densely populated areas."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "a new emergency to deal with, a crime wave." Today, "an angry Mayor of New Orleans asked for and got several hundred National Guard soldiers and additional state police officers to try and stem the rising tide of violence."

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Blanco is sending troops "to help patrol the streets, where residents say crime has been rising. Last weekend, five teenagers were shot to death. There have been more than 50 murders in New Orleans so far this year."

The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Fausset, 958K) reports, "Federal troops were a common sight in New Orleans after Katrina." After the storm, some locals hoped that the "stub of a city -- less populous, but also less poor -- would be reborn with less of the crime and violence that have long marred New Orleans' reputation." However, "A criminal element has returned, bringing back turf wars, drugs and deaths."

The New York Times (6/20, Saulny, 1.19M) calls Nagin's request for troops "a blunt admission that the city could no longer control its growing crime problem." The Times adds that the city's Police Department "has not bounced back from the storm," having "suffered sharp budget cuts" and a "tarnished reputation."

Houston Inundated By Ten Inches Of Rain. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that as storms moved across Houston Monday, parts of the city "got more than ten inches of rain." ABC (von Fremd) added, "From the air, it looked like a replay of Katrina. People staying inside this YMCA were trapped and forced to the rooftop, waving for help." Houston Mayor Bill White: "We have gotten 500 calls in through the center on the 911 line for rescues. Most of those, the vast majority of those have been rescues from automobiles."

USA Today (6/20, Welch, 2.31M) reports "residents were bracing for another round of torrential rain and flooding after a slow-moving storm dumped more than 10 inches Monday and sent rising waters into homes, business and vehicles." Rusty Cornelius, Harris County Emergency Management coordinator, said 300 people had been rescued "by midday Monday when waters began to recede. … As many as 200 Guard troops were made available to the city, Cornelius said. US Coast Guard aircraft were also standing by, he said. When waters began receding Monday afternoon, crews were ordered to rest and prepare to resume rescue efforts if the additional rains arrive as forecast."

The CBS Evening News (6/19, story 6, :20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The floodwaters forced motorists out of their cars and people out of their homes. Governor Rick Perry ordered Texas National Guard trucks and helicopters to help."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 4, 2:35, Teague, 9.87M) reported, "The Governor of Texas has ordered the National Guard to Houston to help with relief efforts. Tonight, most of the floodwaters have receded, but residents here wonder how the water could have risen so fast." Floodwaters "rose so fast, fire crews were forced to improvise, using dump trucks to rescue at least 500 residents and motorists trapped by high water." Amazingly, "no lives were lost, but the raging waters are an unwelcome reminder for the tens of thousands of Katrina evacuees still living in Houston that weather can change lives in an instant."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Official Says Missing US Soldiers In Iraq Found Tortured, "Barbarically" Killed. The Washington Post (6/20, 6:20 a.m., Finer, 744K) reports on its Web site, "The two U.S. soldiers missing since an attack on a checkpoint last week were found dead near a power plant in Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, according to an Iraqi defense official. General Abdul Aziz Muhammed, head of operations at Iraqi Ministry of Defense said in a news conference in Baghdad this afternoon that the soldiers had been 'barbarically' killed and that there were traces of torture on their bodies. … The Army yesterday identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore."

The Washington Post (6/20, A12, Partlow, Finer, 744K) reports, "More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured villages south of Baghdad on Monday for two soldiers missing since an attack four days ago, as an insurgent group linked to al-Qaeda in Iraq" named the Mujaheddin al-Shura

DOJ_NMG_0035170

Council "claimed that it had abducted the Army privates." The AFP (6/20) adds Secretary Rice "said that the US government is very worried about" the kidnapped soldiers. She is quoted saying, "This is obviously a matter of great concern to all of us. And the American military has made very clear that they are going to do everything possible -- I think they've said air, land and sea -- to try and find them. And obviously their safe return is something that everyone will work for, and their safe return is something that everyone will pray for."

The story was the lead on CBS and NBC, while ABC ran it second in its newscast. The CBS Evening News (6/19, lead story, 3:10, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "Search teams are under almost daily attacks. At least seven US soldiers have been wounded since the manhunt began. A sweeping operation of more than 8,000 US and Iraqi troops the military describes as the largest of its kind." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell: "We are using all available assets, coalition and Iraqi to find our soldiers, and will not stop looking until we find them." An "Islamic militant group linked to al Qaeda Interact posted a brief message on a Website boasting they had kidnapped the two Americans but offered no proof, only saying they would release more information later."

In a separate story, the CBS Evening News (6/19, story 2, 1:55, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Only the insurgents know if this was a clever trap or they just got lucky. But the US troops appear to have made a critical mistake by dividing their force in the face of the enemy. Troops are trained in tactics designed to thwart hostage taking. No patrols with fewer than three humvees, no soldier left alone even in camp. But in the end it comes down to a young American faced with a choice of fighting to the death or being captured. And there is no training for that."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, lead story, 4:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The group al Qaeda in Iraq said it is holding them, and American commanders are worried that there is now a new threat facing American forces there -- the threat of abduction -- becoming hostages in this conflict that has taken over 2,500 American lives." NBC (Boettcher) added, "A US military spokesman says a massive search is underway to find them." Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman: "Approximately 12 villages have been cleared in the area and we continue to engage local citizens for help and information leading to the whereabouts of our soldiers." Boettcher: "But as NBC News learned while covering a recent American mission in the area, this is hostile territory for US forces." US military sources "tell NBC News they believe this was an expert operation by the insurgents to try to gain back control of the momentum after the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi."

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 2, 2:25, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "Knowing that thousands of soldiers are looking for these men is a comfort. But there is a kind of powerlessness that grips the nation at such moments. While the country absorbs the death of a soldier, a kidnapping can crack the national composure." USA Today (6/20, Soriano, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (6/20, Roug, 958K) and Washington Times/AP (6/20, Yacoub) run similar stories. The Washington Post (6/20, A12, Moreno, 744K) also reports on the soldiers' families.

Senate Democrats Offer Plan For Iraq Aimed At Easing Party Divisions. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) reported that some Senate Democrats "unveiled a plan aimed at easing election year divisions within the party" over when to begin withdrawing US troops form Iraq. CNN (Bash) added that "what a core group of Democrats did do today was try to make the case in this election year that they're sort of in touch with the desire among the growing number of Americans that they want to see not only change in Iraq but specifically, some kind of time table for the end date, so to speak, some kind of specific plan for how to get out of Iraq eventually." The Democrats' plan "would begin the phased redeployment of US troops from Iraq in 2006 and also require the administration to submit a plan by the end of 2006 for continued phase redeployment beyond 2006." Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Hume) said that Senate Democrats are "groping for party unity on Iraq."

The AP (6/20, Sidoti) says "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada backs the resolution and his aides say they expect 38 to 40 Democrats and a few Republicans to vote for the symbolic statement." They "don't expect to get the 51 votes needed to attach the resolution to an annual military bill."

The New York Times (6/20, Zernike, Hulse, 1.19M) reports the "non binding resolution" was "carefully worded to deflect any accusations that the Democrats were 'cutting and running,' as their position has been depicted by Republicans. The Democrats behind the measure did not even use the term 'withdrawal,'" and "talked about how to guarantee 'success' for Iraq, not about any failures of the war." The resolution "was cobbled together by moderate Democrats trying to smooth over differences within the party. The minority leadership has tried to distance itself from a proposal by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a mandatory deadline for American combat troops to be out of Iraq by the end of this year, a limit that Mr. Kerry modified only marginally on Monday. Some Republican lawmakers and the White House pointed to that proposal last week in attacking Democrats as inconsistent and weak on national security."

The Washington Times (6/20, Bellantoni, 90K) reports the sponsors of the resolution are Sens. Carl Levin, Jack Reed, Dianne Feinstein and Ken Salazar. A White House "official last night dismissed the amendment, saying it calls for an arbitrary timeline that will encourage terrorists to wait for the United States to leave. 'The choice is to stay and win or to allow Iraq to come become a safe haven for terrorists to plot against the United States,' the official said."

DOJ_NMG_0035171

Under the headline "For Democrats, a Delicate Balance on Iraq," the Washington Post (6/20, A15, Babington, Weisman, 744K) says Democrats are "scrambling to find a Goldilocks solution: not too hot on withdrawing US troops quickly, but not so cold as to alienate large numbers of Democratic voters furious about the war and eager to bring the Americans home."

Kerry To Offer His Own Amendment Calling For Withdrawal By July 2007. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Bash) reported that not all Senate Democrats are supporting the plan. CNN "has learned…that Senator [John] Kerry will unveil and propose his own amendment tomorrow on the Senate floor. And he's changed his amendment just a bit. And he is going to say, according to a source, in Senator Kerry's office, that he wants troops to be fully withdrawn, all combat troops to come home from Iraq, by July 1st, 2007."

The Los Angeles Times (620, Reynolds, 958K) the Kerry proposal, also authored by Sen. Russ Feingold, "appears to have the support of half a dozen senators, including Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has signed on as a sponsor.'" The Times adds, "Many of the senators who support the Kerry proposal are expected to back the Levin amendment too, aides said."

Dean Says Bush Has No Plan To Get Us Troops Out Of Iraq. DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19), "I think the Democrats have been pretty clear about what they want. They want a transition, and now there's going to be a vote on asking the President for a timetable. We need to be out of Iraq. We know we can't leave immediately, but we need to be out, and we need to hear from the President something other than, 'I started this, but we're going to leave this to the next president.'" Asked if US troops should be out of Iraq by the end of the year, Dean said, "The bottom line here is not what the specifics of the plan are. The bottom line is the president doesn't have a plan and the Democrats believe that we should be heading in another direction, which is what the American people believe."

Dean Says Republicans Can't Be Trusted To Defend America. Dean said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19), "You simply can't trust the Republicans to defend America anymore. It's not that they're not willing to be tough, it's just that they're not smart." Dean added, "You can't trust those people to defend America. I submit to you that it is the Republicans that are weak on defense, because they don't know what they're doing."

Cheney Stands By Claim That Insurgency Is In Its Last Throes. CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) reported that Vice President Dick Cheney "was asked today about his remark more than a year ago that the insurgency in Iraq was in its last throes. He told the National Press Club that he still believes that, but he also acknowledged that he underestimated the strength of the insurgency."

In a similar report, Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Hume) noted Cheney "said something on Iraq today that most people probably already knew or thought, but that no one at his level had ever acknowledged." Fox (Emanuel) added that Cheney, speaking at a Press club luncheon, said, "he underestimated the strength of the insurgency in Iraq. … The Vice President also defended his comment last year that the Iraqi insurgency was, quote, in its final throes."

The Washington Post (6/20, A13, Ricks, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark," and says Cheney "has repeatedly stood by his May 2005 declaration that the insurgency was waning, even as Democratic politicians and comedians have mocked it." It "has joined a litany of administration statements about Iraq cited as examples of wishful thinking, including that reconstruction would be inexpensive for US taxpayers and that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators."

Cheney Says Government's Actions Have Prevented Terror Attacks Since 9/11. USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) reports, "The United States' biggest terrorism threat is 'an al-Qaeda cell armed with a nuclear weapon or a biological agent in the middle of one of our own cities,' Vice President Cheney said Monday." Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney "credited aggressive US action for preventing terrorist attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. 'The fact of the matter is we have been safe and secure here at home,' he said. 'That's not an accident. It didn't happen just because we got lucky.'" Cheney "said improved intelligence-gathering and preventive steps have thwarted attacks on US soil. He singled out the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program as important in the war on terrorism and said it 'clearly is legal' and is 'consistent with the Constitution.'"

Dean Says Cheney Has No Credibility. DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19), "Vice President Cheney has no credibility in this matter." Dean was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19) about Cheney's claim that the capture of Saddam Hussein "was, in part, the reason we've not been attacked" since 9/11. Dean said, "That's complete hooey. Saddam Hussein had nothing to do with 9/11. That's just part of the Republican nonsense that got us in to Iraq in the first place and the Americans now know that's complete hooey and the President and Vice President were not telling the truth when they said that."

Koizumi Pulling Japanese Troops Out Of Iraq. The Washington Post (6/20, A13, Faiola, 744K) notes Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi announced a plan Tuesday to withdraw Japan's 550 troops from Iraq, ending a landmark mission that became Tokyo's largest military operation since World War II." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced that Iraqi troops would take over security next month around the southern city of Samawah, where the Japanese and other forces are stationed. Officials [in Tokyo] have repeatedly said that the Japanese -- whose withdrawal has been anticipated for months -- had been awaiting that decision before finalizing withdrawal plans." The Post notes, "The Japanese withdrawal is not expected to dramatically affect the effort to rebuild Iraq. Analysts have said the Japanese mission there is more symbolic than strategic."

DOJ_NMG_0035172

The Financial Times (6/20, Dinmore, Pilling) says "the shrinking US 'coalition of the willing' in Iraq has come to resemble more a coalition of the reluctant, as allies weigh up the costs of continued involvement in an unpopular war against the benefits of backing President George W. Bush for the rest of his second term." According to the Times, "Analysts say only the UK provided a sizeable military force that actually made a difference in operational capability. Contributions from most other countries had more meaning in terms of political support for the US when the Bush administration failed to win enough backing for a second resolution at the UN." The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Wallace, 958K), among other sources, also reports the story.

Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Unofficial Pullout "Road Map" Exists. In a Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) op-ed, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie says that while there is "no defined timeline" for a coalition withdrawal from Iraq, there is "an unofficial 'road map' to foreign troop reductions that will eventually lead to total withdrawal." It is based "not just on a series of dates but, more important, on the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq." Rubaie decries "influential foreign figures" who are "trying to spoon-feed our government," saying Iraq "has to grow out of the shadow of the United States and the coalition, take responsibility for its own decisions, learn from its own mistakes, and find Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems."

Three US Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainee Deaths. Three soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division were charged with murder in connection with the May 9 deaths of three detainees in Iraq. There are considerable differences in the attention given to the story by television and print sources. ABC and NBC both led their evening newscasts with the charges, but newspaper coverage is less prominent.

ABC World News Tonight (6/19, lead story, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported that investigators believe Army Pfc. Cory Clagett, Spc. William Hunsaker, and Staff Sgt. William Girouard "intentionally murdered three Iraqi males, and then tried to cover it up." The three took the Iraqis into custody during an operation north of Baghdad. The "accused soldiers initially said that the detainees were trying to escape. But a lower ranking soldier e-mailed his superiors saying he had witnessed what he thought was murder." The identity and even the nationality of the victims remains unclear. NBC Nightly News (6/19, lead story, 4:15, Boettcher, 9.87M) says they "are not identified as Iraqis but as foreign nationals. We are still trying to determine exactly who they were."

In contrast to the lengthy coverage on the other two networks, the CBS Evening News (6/19, story 3, :15, Schieffer, 7.66M) ran only a brief item that also said the three soldiers "are also charged with threatening to kill another American soldier who witnessed the killings." CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Blitzer) said the soldiers are "in pretrial confinement now. … They will go to an Article 32 hearing, which is the military equivalent of a civilian grand jury. And from there, they will decide whether they will proceed to court-martial."

The New York Times (6/20, Shanker, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports a "Defense Department official said investigators had evidence that the soldiers had released the detainees deliberately before they were shot, apparently to have a pretext for killing them as they fled." The Washington Times (6/20, Scarborough, 90K) says the case "could be the first in a series of murder charges against soldiers and Marines in the deaths of Iraqi civilians. … Two major cases remain under investigation" -- the Haditha incident and the death of an Iraqi man in Hamandiyah.

US Cancels Major Iraq Prison Contract. In what it calls a "harsh rebuke" for the company, the New York Times (6/20, Glanz, 1.19M) reports the Army Corps of Engineers has cancelled a $99.1 million contract with Parsons, "one of the largest companies working in Iraq, to build a prison north of Baghdad after the firm fell more than two years behind schedule, threatened to go millions of dollars over budget and essentially abandoned the construction site." The prison, which was originally supposed to be completed this month, "appears to be the largest single rebuilding project canceled for failing to achieve its goals under the $45 billion American rebuilding program."

Barred Military Contractor Keeps Working In Iraq Under New Name. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (6/20, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports on how Custer Battles LLC, "which the U.S. military had accused of fraud and barred from receiving any new Iraq contracts," has been revived under another name. Custer Battles was sold to Danubia Global, a Romanian firm, for one dollar, and though "the U.S. sanctions technically put Custer Battles out of business, it never actually shut down. After paying its dollar, Danubia took on most of Custer Battles's employees," and work continued. The Custer Battles-Danubia link is now "the focus of a federal criminal investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0035173

Prosecution Asks For Death Penalty For Saddam. NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 2, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in Baghdad, "the prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial argued strongly for the death penalty as the only fair punishment for the torture and killings of dozens of people in a Shiite village in the 1980s. The prosecutor called the executions barbaric and cruel and savage. Saddam Hussein claims the villagers were part of an assassination attempt against him." ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) noted "the chief prosecutor demanded Saddam's execution for barbaric, cruel and savage acts that showed no mercy for the old, women or children. Saddam answered the summation with sarcasm. 'Well done,' he muttered."

USA Today (6/20, Soriano, 2.31M) reports the prosecutor also "recommended the death penalty for Barzan Ibrahim -- Saddam's half-brother and head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency -- and former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan." He "asked for leniency for three other defendants and for dismissal of charges against Mohammed Azawi Ali, a former Baath Party official from Dujail, because of a lack of evidence. He left it up to the courts to decide a punishment for Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of Saddam's Revolutionary Court." The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Peterson, 61K), Los Angeles Times (6/20, Stack, 958K), Washington Post (6/20, A13, Partlow, 744K), New York Times (6/20, Burns, 1.19M) and Washington Times/AP (6/20, Juhi) run similar stories.

USA Today Says Khalilzad Cable Shows Grim Reality Of Iraq. Commenting on a recent diplomatic cable from US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad to Secretary of State Rice, USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) editorializes that the lives of nine Iraqi employees of the US embassy "when they are outside the fortified safety of the Green Zone" described therein suggest "fundamentalists and militias are fast obtaining the kind of power that destroys governments. … Nine lives do not tell the story of an entire country, nor is the cable reason to bring troops home. Other measures paint a brighter picture. Nevertheless, for those who wonder whom to believe in Iraq, the U.S. ambassador reporting privately about the lives of the Iraqis closest to him is a source that can hardly be ignored."

Cohen Says US Suffers From Attention Deficit Disorder In Iraq Policy. In his Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) column, Richard Cohen facetiously suggests that attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder is responsible for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. ADHD "explains why few seem to challenge the call to continue the mission in Iraq, apparently forgetting that the mission has changed and no one is quite sure what it is now," and "why we are still fighting in Afghanistan almost five years" after 9/11 – "because our attention got diverted from the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda, which had attacked us, to Iraq, which had not. … Pass the Ritalin, please."

Taliban Produces "Biggest Show Of Strength" In Years. A starkly pessimistic story on the front page of USA Today (6/20, Wiseman, 2.31M) says pro-Taliban fighters "are terrorizing southern Afghanistan" in their "biggest show of strength in nearly five years." The fighters are "ambushing military patrols, assassinating opponents and even enforcing the law in remote villages where they operate with near impunity." The article portrays allied forces on the defensive, saying US-led forces have been "forced to ramp up the battle."

Guerillas Kill 32 People In Southern Afghan Province. In a more straightforward New York Times (6/20, Gall, 1.19M) report says suspected Taliban guerrillas in Helmand province "ambushed and killed 32 people on Sunday, all of them relatives and tribesmen of an influential member of Parliament." The Times says the "attack, in broad daylight, was the latest sign of the strength of the suspected Taliban insurgents" in the southern "poppy-growing province."

Taliban's Influence Spreads Into Northwest Pakistan. The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Constable, 744K) reports on how the influence of the Taliban is leaking into "the semiautonomous tribal areas of northwest Pakistan that hug the Afghan border," with thieves beheaded, television sets burned in public, and barbers ordered not to shave off beards. While Pakistani military officials say they are "making steady progress in pacifying the restive tribal belt," other observers say their "aggressive efforts since 2004 have backfired, alienating the populace with heavy-handed tactics and undermining the traditional authority of tribal elders and officials."

Pentagon Seeks To Add Special Ops Troops Without Lowering Standards. The Washington Post (6/20, A3, Tyson, 744K) reports on the Pentagon's efforts to recruit more Special Operations troops without lessening the elite forces' tough training. The article, which describes Special Operations Command forces in very positive terms, says the forces, "facing their biggest deployments in history," are "committed in Iraq, Afghanistan and surrounding countries. That leaves too few for other vital missions, many of them clandestine, such as intelligence gathering and partnering with forces in nations" where the US is not at war.

DOJ_NMG_0035174

The Post says that while the Pentagon has "announced a plan to add 13,000 more Special Operations troops to meet demands," producing "such highly skilled troops is not easy."

New PTSD Cases Running More Than Six Times VA Expectation. Knight Ridder (6/20, Goldstein) reports the VA "is on a pace to see nearly 20,000 new cases of post-combat stress this year among service members who've served in Iraq or Afghanistan, more than six times the number of cases that officials had expected." The VA had expected 2,900 new cases of post-traumatic stress disorder during the current fiscal year.

Current War Sparking PTSD In Some Vietnam Veterans. The Washington Post (6/20, George, 744K) runs an 1,100-word front page feature on how the current war is leading "thousands of Vietnam veterans" to seek PTSD help. The VA says PTSD disability-compensation cases "have nearly doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of more than 260,000. The biggest bulge has come since 2003, when war started in Iraq." Experts say many veterans "reexperience their own trauma" through media coverage of the present war.

Laser Eye Surgery Brings Military Unexpected Assignment Problems. The New York Times (6/20, Cloud, 1.19M) reports on the "unexpected difficulties" the military is facing due to the "booming trend" of laser eye surgery. At the Naval Academy, for example, "nearly a third" of each 1,000-member class undergoes the procedure. But by "shrinking the pool of people who used to be routinely available for jobs that do not require perfect eyesight, it has made it harder to fill some of those assignments with top-notch personnel."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Asks For Higher Bond For Conrad Black. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Cherney) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Chicago are demanding that former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, who was released on a $20 million bond last year, provide additional security to remain out on bail until his trial on fraud and racketeering charges next year." The Journal continues, "In documents filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald says he is asking for more security on the bond because Mr. Black has failed to pay the mortgage on his Palm Beach, Fla., home -- which is part of his bail bond -- and 'has provided false statements to the government about his financial assets.' … Edward Greenspan, a lawyer for Mr. Black, said 'there are numerous misstatements' and 'numerous half-truths' in the documents. 'The prosecution filed its material this morning with practically no notice about what allegations were going to be included,' Mr. Greenspan said. Mr. Black has pleaded not guilty to the fraud and racketeering charges."

Bloomberg (6/20, Harris) reports, "Black overstated the value of a Palm Beach, Florida, home he pledged for bail, the U.S. said in a court filing and hearing. He understated a Canadian tax lien on the property and didn't disclose his wife was part owner, prosecutors said. … U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve delayed (Monday's) hearing until June 26. The government said Black, once among the world's largest publishers of English-language newspapers, should put up additional collateral or have his bail revoked. A former U.S. prosecutor said Black must take the possibility seriously. … 'Judges tend to get angry when they feel a defendant is possibly playing games with the court,' said Andrew Genser, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a partner at Kirkland & Ellis. 'Mr. Black's lawyers on June 26 would want to come in with an answer to these allegations that's convincing or have substitute assets ready to post.'"

Denver Attorney Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Investigation. The National Law Journal (6/20, Bronstad) reports, "Federal prosecutors who indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman last month are in talks with a Denver lawyer whose testimony could sharpen the investigation's focus toward Melvyn Weiss, founding partner of the New York-based law firm, according to sources familiar with the government's probe." The Journal continues, "Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles returned an indictment against Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, alleging that they obtained $216.1 million in attorney fees by paying $11.3 million in secret and illegal kickbacks to three individuals who served as lead plaintiffs in their cases. … Bershad and Schulman have taken leaves of absence from the firm." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors have said that the investigation is ongoing, leaving open the possibility of additional indictments against Weiss and William Lerach, a senior partner who left the firm in 2004 to found San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins. … According to the indictment, a senior partner at Milberg Weiss met in 2003 with the Denver lawyer and agreed that a percentage of attorney fees in two cases would go to Howard Vogel, a retired real estate mortgage broker whose retirement fund or family members were serving as plaintiffs for Milberg Weiss. In April, Vogel admitted to charges in a plea deal that he provided false information in federal court and has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors."

Father, Son Plead Guilty To Fraud In SureWest Probe. The Sacramento Business Journal (6/20) reports, "A former treasury analyst for SureWest Communications and his father pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to charges that they had taken $2 million from the Roseville-based telecom company." The Journal continues, "Arrested in early 2004 were former SureWest treasury analyst Jeffrey Wells, 31, of Roseville; his father, Larry Wells, 60, of Pebble Beach; and a business associate, Henry M. Kaiser, 59, of Piedmont. … The trio had been charged with illegally diverting several million dollars in SureWest cash and investment funds controlled by Jeffrey Wells to outside accounts to secure financing for Quivira Ventures, owned or controlled by the elder Wells and Kaiser." The Journal adds, "The U.S. Justice Department said that the money transfers were made 'so that Quivira could demonstrate to potential investors that it had sufficient funds on deposit to be a venture capital firm and thereby attract new investors.' … Kaiser, grandson of industrialist Henry J. Kaiser, stepped down from the Kaiser Permanente board after he was charged. In April 2004, Kaiser admitted guilt to 'interstate transportation of money obtained by fraud and conducting a monetary transaction in criminally derived property.'"

DOJ_NMG_0035175

Olson Tapped To Head Accounting Board. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Reilly) reports, "Ending months of regulatory uncertainty for the accounting industry, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday named Mark W. Olson, a Federal Reserve Board governor, to head the agency that regulates accounting firms." The Journal continues, "Mr. Olson's appointment to chair the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board is one of the most significant to be made by Mr. Cox since he took the helm of the nation's markets watchdog last year. The PCAOB oversees accounting firms that audit public companies and was formed in the wake of corporate scandals such as those at Enron Corp. Its creation ended decades of self-regulation by the accounting industry." The Journal adds, "Mr. Olson, 63 years old, will become the PCAOB's second full-time chairman, a position that pays $615,000 annually. He fills the spot left vacant last fall by the resignation of the board's first chairman, William McDonough, also a former Federal Reserve governor. Mr. Olson will take over from acting PCAOB Chairman Willis Gradison, 77, a former Republican Congressman who will remain on the board. … Mr. Olson said in an interview yesterday that he wasn't going into the position with a preset agenda, although he expected that debate over how to implement rules related to companies' internal controls would continue as a big issue for the board. He said he expects to take up his new position in early July. … Mr. Cox also filled yesterday a second opening at the PCAOB, announcing that founding board member Kayla Gillan will remain in her seat. Ms. Gillan, a former general counsel to the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or Calpers, had continued to serve on the board since her term expired last fall. Board members earn $500,000 a year."

South Korean Officials Clear Lone Star In Probe Of KEB Deal. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Santini) reports, "South Korean regulators cleared Lone Star Funds of any wrongdoing in its purchase of Korea Exchange Bank. Instead, they accused KEB's former management and several government agencies of mishandling the bank's sale in 2003, when many of the country's financial institutions were reeling from mounds of bad credit-card debt." The Journal continues, "While exonerating Lone Star and allaying concerns that regulators would seek to nullify the deal, the report of the Board of Audit and Inspection does little to relieve the Dallas private-equity fund's other major worry: that it might have to pay full taxes on its profit from the sale of its KEB stake, to Korea's Kookmin Bank, once the sale is finalized. … That deal now awaits the conclusion of Korean prosecutors, who are conducting their own probe of the KEB transaction, including Lone Star's role." The Journal adds, "The audit board's report, released yesterday, says KEB executives exaggerated the bank's losses at the time of the sale, understating its capital-adequacy ratio and deeming the bank 'troubled,' a designation that allowed a foreign buyer -- in this case, Lone Star -- to step in, speeding the sale. The audit board singled out KEB's chief executive at the time, Lee Kang Won, saying he undervalued the bank by making unrealistic assumptions."

Insurers Concerned About Options Timing Probe. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Pleven) reports, "The controversy over executive stock options has the insurance industry casting a wary eye at the liability protection it provides to corporate officers and directors, a development that could in some cases push premiums higher or reduce coverage for directors and executives." The Journal continues, "At least three dozen companies are facing federal probes over whether they backdated or manipulated stock options, timing them to boost the payoff for executives. Shareholders in some cases have responded by filing lawsuits, and insurers are bracing for a slew of claims." The Journal adds, "At this point, premiums haven't started to rise. But insurers have begun asking their own questions about the options practices of clients. Some, for example, are asking customers whether they have ever backdated options or received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission on the timing of grants. … The scrutiny has the potential to shake up the market for D&O insurance, which is intended to protect top corporate officials from facing personal losses for decisions they make in their posts running companies. The insurance, usually paid for by the company, typically reimburses the company or its officials for expenses such as legal fees. No hard figures exist for the size of the D&O insurance market, but insurance-industry executives estimate it generates several billion dollars in premiums annually."

DOJ_NMG_0035176

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Extends Abramoff's Freedom For Three Months As Cooperation Continues. Roll Call (6/20, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department and attorneys for disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff have agreed to postpone for at least three months the day he has to report to federal prison — the latest sign that Abramoff's continued cooperation with an ongoing corruption probe in Washington, D.C., is proving helpful to prosecutors. Abramoff had been scheduled to surrender himself to the Bureau of Prisons on June 29 to begin the 70-month prison sentence handed down by Judge Paul Huck of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. … Justice officials and Abramoff's lawyers filed a joint motion with Huck on Friday night asking for a three-month reprieve for Abramoff, who is cooperating with federal prosecutors in an ongoing probe that has roiled official Washington."

Daley Secretary Testifies About Political Hiring List. The Chicago Tribune (6/20, Mihalopoulos, Bush, Lighty, 643K) reports, "A who's who of Chicago political power brokers and the job seekers they sponsored was unveiled Monday by federal prosecutors in the City Hall corruption trial. The list of more than 5,700 politically connected job applicants became public as a longtime secretary in Mayor Richard Daley's office testified for federal prosecutors against former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich. Although city officials insisted for years that they did not engage in patronage hiring, secretary Patricia Molloy said aides in the mayor's office kept track of job seekers and their political sponsors, beginning shortly after Daley's election in 1989 and during much of his 17-year tenure." Daley's three brothers and Gov. Rod Blagojevich "were entered into the database as sponsors of people seeking jobs or promotions," and "at least two applicants were described as friends of the mayor." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/20, Warmbir, Spielman, Konkol, Novak) notes, "The 60-page list gives the most detailed snapshot yet of politicians, powerbrokers and mayoral friends vying for city jobs or promotions for their families, friends and supporters. … Prosecutors call the scheme illegal. Defense attorneys…contend their clients were following orders as part of a long city tradition and never intended to commit crimes."

Former Boston FBI Official Testifies Leaks Torpedoed Bulger Probe. The Boston Globe (6/20, Murphy, 484K) reports, testifying yesterday in the $50 million wrongful death suit against the FBI, former Boston Assistant SAC Robert Fitzpatrick said that "then-Massachusetts Senate president William M. Bulger was the target of a 1983 FBI investigation that was compromised by leaks while his gangster brother, James 'Whitey' Bulger, was an FBI informant." Fitzpatrick "said the investigation was among nine in the FBI's Boston office during his tenure that he believed were compromised by leaks to Whitey Bulger, other informants, or others outside the office." Fitzpatrick also testified yesterday that he "wrote a letter to the FBI's third in command at headquarters in 1983, complaining about 'malfeasance' in the bureau's Boston office. He said he never received a response to his letter." The Boston Herald (6/20, Sweet, 220K) adds that US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay ordered the bureau's lawyers to turn over Fitzpatrick's letter to FBI headquarters. The Herald notes, "Because Fitzpatrick 'wasn't getting anywhere' with formal complaints of malfeasance and obstruction of justice, he said, 'I outlined my grievances' to Lee Caldwell about FBI agents destroying investigations with 'severe leaks' to mob informants like Bulger. Caldwell was a man he thought he could trust, but Fitzpatrick said, 'I never heard back.'"

Jordan Assigning More FBI Agents, Analysts To Wales Murder Case. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/20, Shukovsky) reports, "The FBI is sending in the cavalry in an attempt to solve the 5 1/2-year-old killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Tom Wales. A week after the FBI's top brass removed the Seattle office from management of the investigation, its new manager -- Portland Special Agent in Charge Robert Jordan -- announced he's boosting the number of agents and analysts assigned to find the killer." After a Monday meeting in Seattle about the investigation, Jordan said, "This is an extremely important case to us. We are not going to walk away from this. And we are going to commit as many resources as possible." The Post-Intelligencer notes, "There had been four agents assigned to the case before Seattle FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin cut that to two agents in May. Jordan wouldn't reveal the numbers of agents who will ultimately be assigned to the investigation, but said it would be more than four. … Quick to assert 'this is not a cold case,' Jordan said there are several promising leads that could pave the way to the murderer."

Former Virginia Police Officers Plead Guilty To Lying To FBI About Bribes. The Charlottesville (VA) Daily Progress (6/20, Nowak) reports former Charlottesville police officers Roy Fitzgerald and Charles Saunders "pleaded guilty Monday to lying to federal agents, admitting they lied about covering up a traffic offense and having sex with an underage girl. … In a brief hearing, Judge Norman K. Moon accepted the officers' guilty pleas and set a sentencing date for Sept. 22." The AP (6/20) notes, "The officers were accused of ignoring illegal activities involving Charles Phillips, the manager of the now-defunct Max nightclub, starting as far back as 1996. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. said in exchange, the officers protected Phillips from prosecution for traffic offenses and warned him about a prostitution investigation, exposing an undercover officer in the process. During an FBI and Virginia State Police investigation, Bondurant said Saunders lied about intervening with another officer concerning the traffic offense." The Richmond Times Dispatch (6/20, Santos) also reports on the guilty pleas.

DOJ_NMG_0035177

Justices Sets Limits On Admissibility Of Evidence. USA Today (6/20, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "An alleged crime victim's emergency 911 call can be used at trial even if he or she does not testify and undergo cross-examination, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled Monday." However, by an 8-1 vote, the justices also "ruled that if an alleged victim recounts an incident to police at the scene after it occurs, the account cannot be used at trial unless the defendant is able to cross-examine the accuser." The pair of rulings "in cases from Washington and Indiana addressed the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, which ensures that a defendant may closely question witnesses against him or her."

The Washington Post (6/20, A4, Lane, 744K) reports, "In both cases -- Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705 -- all the justices except Clarence Thomas concurred." He "dissented in the Hammon case, saying that Amy Hammon's statement should also have been admissible, and that the court's proposed distinction based on the 'primary purpose' of police questioning would be 'difficult for courts to apply.'"

Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Chicago Mobster. The Chicago Tribune (6/20, Coen, 643K) reports, "Suggesting that Frank Calabrese Sr. is a danger to anyone who might testify against the Outfit, a federal judge on Monday refused to grant bail to the reputed mob lieutenant." Calabrese, "linked by authorities to 13 slayings, will remain incarcerated before he and others named in the Operation Family Secrets case are tried next spring, U.S. District Judge James Zagel ruled. … Calabrese's brother Nicholas is cooperating and has tied Calabrese to some of the killings, Zagel noted. His son, Frank Calabrese Jr., secretly recorded him discussing his past."

Former Stock Trader Sentenced To 11 Years In Prison. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/20) reports, "A former stock picker who teamed up with a rogue FBI agent in a scheme to manipulate stocks was sentenced Monday to more than 11 years in federal prison. Anthony Elgindy also was ordered by U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie to forfeit $1.5 million." The AP notes, "He and four others were charged in May 2002…with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice. Federal prosecutors accused FBI special agent Jeffrey Royer of New Mexico of leaking details of investigations and executives' criminal histories to Elgindy. … Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice." The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) also reported on Elgindy's sentence, noting Royer's role in the scheme.

Boiler-Room Operator Sentenced To 17 Years In Prison. The Miami Herald (6/20, Santiago, 323K) reports, "Con artist Charles Paul Hoffecker, who with a partner fleeced more than 1,000 investors out of $14 million in a huge boiler-room operation, was sentenced Monday to 17 years in prison. … His partner in crime, Charles Edward Meyers...will be sentenced June 26." The Florida men "were found guilty last March of ripping off people who believed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver." The Herald notes, "Hoffecker and Meyers were caught as part of a 10-year investigation by the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service."

California's Searches Of Parolees Upheld. The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Richey, 61K) reports, "Parolees in California do not enjoy a constitutional right to be free from suspicionless searches by law-enforcement officials." Instead, "they can be searched at any time, even when officials have no reason to believe that they may be involved in wrongdoing." In "an important privacy ruling with major implications for individuals on parole, the US Supreme Court voted 6 to 3 Monday to uphold a California law that requires all state prisoners to agree as a condition of release that they consent to warrantless searches by law enforcement."

The AP (6/20, Locy) reports, "California parolees can routinely be searched by police as a condition of their release from prison, the Supreme Court ruled Monday. … By a 6-3 vote, justices said the 1996 law is a legitimate attempt by state officials to deal with a large population of repeat offenders who pose a danger to public safety." The AP continues, "Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the majority, said California has a "special governmental interest" to control its parolees, an interest that outweighs a parolee's privacy. … In California, most prisoners eventually receive parole. But before release, each parolee is required to consent in writing to searches by police during the term of their supervision. If they refuse, they are not allowed out of prison. … Under the law, police can conduct such a search as long as it is not arbitrary, capricious or conducted to harass the parolee." The AP adds, "Thomas said parolees do not have any 'expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate' because of the danger posed by California's large recidivist population. … 'The state's interests, by contrast, are substantial,' Thomas wrote, citing a 68-to-70 percent recidivism rate among California's parolees. … But Justice John Paul Stevens, writing in dissent, said the majority had 'run roughshod' over previous court rulings on unreasonable searches and improperly allowed California to create another form of punishment for its prisoners. … 'What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty,' Stevens wrote on behalf of himself and Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer."

DOJ_NMG_0035178

CNN.com (6/20, Mears) reports, "The case involves Donald Samson, paroled in 2003 after a firearms felony conviction. A San Bruno police officer knew Samson was on parole when he observed him walking down a street. … The officer, after determining there were no outstanding warrants on Samson, began a search of him. … Methamphetamine was found in a pocket and Samson went back to prison for seven years." CNN adds, "The Samson case was one of two search-and-seizure appeals from California argued this term. The justices in March unanimously allowed to stand the conviction of a man who bought video showing minors engaged in sex acts. … The Bush administration Justice Department and law enforcement agencies around the country have asked the courts for greater powers to conduct searches of homes and cars, along the borders, and at sobriety and neighborhood crime checkpoints."

Pennsylvania School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Child Porn. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/20, Ove, 261K) reports, "Nobody knew what janitor Phillip Winkle was up to until the day in early February when two other janitors at Center Area Middle School wondered what he was doing by himself in a dark storage room. It turned out he was making his own child pornography collection using a peephole camera he installed to record 600 video images of girls and women using the toilet. … Yesterday in U.S. District Court, he waived indictment and pleaded guilty to child porn charges," and is expected to receive a 10-year prison sentence. The Post-Gazette notes, "He apparently maintained the collection for his own use, as there was no evidence he distributed any of the videos. … After the two suspicious janitors caught him, Mr. Winkle confessed to Center police, who charged him with invasion of privacy and called the FBI."

Baggy Jeans Pose Problem For Fleeing Thieves. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Ng) reports, "One sunny afternoon in January, Vicki Chandler, a 55-year-old underwriting associate at Cigna HealthCare in Chattanooga, Tenn., was walking to her car when a teenager in loose khaki pants approached her, pointed to her pocketbook and said, 'I need that.' As she recounts the incident, he snatched the purse and took off. … But then he ran into trouble. As he ran, his loose trousers slipped down below his hips. As he reached down to hold them up, the teen was forced to throw the purse aside." The Journal continues, "It's a problem for perpetrators. Young men and teens wearing low-slung, baggy pants fairly regularly get tripped up in their getaways, a development that has given amused police officers and law-abiding citizens a welcome edge in the fight against crime. … Low-hanging baggy pants have been a fashion statement for young men for more than a decade, inspired by the advent of beltless prison jeans, says Andy Gilchrist, a California fashion consultant who has written a book on men's clothes. Over time, the tough-guy image associated with oversized trousers helped make the look standard for hip-hop performers, alternative music bands, skateboarders and snowboarders as it migrated from mostly black city streets to affluent white suburbs. … Just about every other week, Jim Matheny, a 41-year-old police lieutenant in Stamford, Conn., says he gets into foot chases with youths. He says it's getting easier to capture them because they can't run fast or far in those loose jeans."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court To Hear Administration Effort To Revive Late-Term Abortion Ban. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 10, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Supreme Court "took up the issue of abortion. The justices agreed to hear a new attempt by the Bush Administration to have a law banning certain late-term abortions declared constitutional."

The Washington Post (6/20, A4, Goldstein, 744K) reports, "In accepting the California case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America , the court essentially agreed to evaluate a wider range of legal issues that the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit cited last winter when it, too, found the law unconstitutional." The 9th Circuit "found the law posed an undue burden on women because the statute is so vague it could be interpreted to forbid other abortion methods beyond one that is used rarely late in pregnancy. In addition, the 9th Circuit dealt with whether a court could 'remedy' the law to permit the procedure when women's health is imperiled, ruling that it could not because lawmakers had deliberately omitted such an exception."

DOJ_NMG_0035179

The AP (6/20) reports, "Congress had voted in 2003 to prohibit the type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester of a nine-month pregnancy, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb and its skull punctured or crushed. The law was challenged on behalf of physicians who could be sentenced to up to two years in prison for violating the law. … Justice Samuel Alito is expected to be a key vote in the case, because the court had split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law barring the same procedure because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired in January was replaced by Alito."

Judge Approves Extension Of Delphi Reorganization Filing. The AP (6/20, Tong) reports, "A bankruptcy judge on Monday approved a motion by Delphi Corp. to extend the auto supplier's deadline to exclusively file its reorganization plan, before creditors can weigh in with alternate proposals." The AP continues, "The new deadline for the company is Feb. 1, 2007, and the deadline for responses to the plan is April 2. Judge Robert Drain approved the extension, which is the company's second and moves the filing deadline from Aug. 5. … The company reserved the right to file other extensions if needed." The AP adds, "An attorney for Delphi, John W. Butler, also said the company planned to file a motion later Monday to seek the court's approval of a new concessions deal with Delphi's second-largest union, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America. … The auto parts supplier announced over the weekend that it had reached an agreement with the IUE-CWA and General Motors to offer buyouts to hourly workers. The deal was similar to the one reached earlier with the United Auto Workers, the largest union representing Delphi employees. … The judge said the matter would be considered in a June 29 meeting."

Debate Over Regulation Of 527s Stymies Lobbying Reform Bill's Progress. Roll Call (6/20, Newmyer) reports, "Clear progress on a lobbying reform bill continues to elude House and Senate Republican leaders, with the two chambers stalemated over the fate of a controversial provision targeting the independent political groups known as 527s." Roll Call notes that "cracking down on" 527s "is a top election-year priority for national Republicans. When the House took up legislation to overhaul lobbying, GOP leaders made a point of inserting a provision to sideline 527s. But that plan is running into growing resistance in the Senate, initially from Democrats, but now from some conservative Republicans as well." The House GOP leadership has "been predicting quick action on the measure since that chamber approved its version of the bill in early May. But those projections have consistently slid, as agreements on differences between the two bills have proved hard to come by. The latest deadline…has both chambers wrapping work on a conference agreement by the July Fourth recess. Now, even that goal appears imperiled, with GOP aides predicting little action in the two weeks left of this work period."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

9th Circuit To Hear Arguments On Hawaiian School Admission Policies. The AP (6/20, Niesse) reports, "A wealthy private school created exclusively for Hawaii's indigenous people may be forced to admit non-Hawaiians if it loses a legal challenge." The AP continues, "Fifteen judges on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments Tuesday in San Francisco over whether the Kamehameha Schools can continue to limit enrollment to Native Hawaiians." The AP adds, "The case is an important test of racial preference programs in school admissions. … While the courts have generally ruled against favoritism in education based on race, the Kamehameha case is different in that the school was founded based on the will of a Hawaiian princess and doesn't receive federal funding. … A three-judge panel of the circuit court in California initially ruled against Kamehameha's admissions policy with a 2-1 vote in August. But the court announced in February it would reconsider the school's 118-year-old policy. … The lawsuit was filed on behalf of an anonymous white student who was denied admission to the school in 2003 and claimed he was discriminated against because he didn't have Hawaiian blood."

Federal Judge Overturns Jury Verdict In Age Bias Suit. The Legal Intelligencer (6/20, Duffy) reports, "Overturning a jury's verdict of more than $240,000 in an age discrimination suit, a federal magistrate judge has ruled that a plaintiff who was fired at the age of 50 failed to prove an essential element of his case because the four workers who assumed his duties had an average age of less than seven years younger than he was." The LI continues, "In his 60-page opinion in Steward v. Sears Roebuck & Co., U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas J. Rueter concluded that plaintiff Gunnar Steward failed to make out a prima facie case of age discrimination. … The decision is a stunning setback for Steward and his lawyers, Carmen R. Matos of Doylestown, Pa., and George P. Wood of Stewart & Wood in Norristown, Pa., and overturns a jury's award of nearly $93,000 in back pay and $148,000 in front pay." The LI adds, "Matos and Wood argued that after Steward was fired, his duties were taken over by two men in their 30s and one in his mid-40s, with an average age of less than 38, or more than 12 years younger than Steward. … But Rueter sided with Sears and its lawyers -- Sidney R. Steinberg and Robert J. Toy of Post & Schell -- who said the evidence showed that a 60-year-old woman also took over some of his duties. … As a result, Rueter concluded that the average age of the workers who assumed Steward's duties was just 6.75 years -- a difference the judge found to be not enough for a prima facie case. … Rueter's ruling could force the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to revisit a vexing question that often arises in age discrimination suits -- just how much younger must the more favorably treated employee be in order to be deemed 'sufficiently younger' than the plaintiff? The answer for courts in the 3rd Circuit, Rueter found, is that a difference of less than seven years is not enough."

DOJ_NMG_0035180

Abortion Ban To Be Placed On South Dakota Ballot. The AP (6/20, Brokaw) reports, "Voters will have the final say on South Dakota's tough new law that bans almost all abortions. Secretary of State Chris Nelson said Monday that the law's opponents had collected enough signatures to put a question on the Nov. 7 ballot asking voters if the law should go into effect as planned or be dumped."

Pentagon Document Lists Homosexuality As Mental Disorder. A neutral AP (6/20, Baldor) story reports a Pentagon document "classifies homosexuality as a mental disorder, decades after mental health experts abandoned that position. The document outlines retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities, and in a section on defects lists homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders." Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Jeremy M. Martin "said the policy document is under review."

Feinstein Makes Case For Flag Protection Amendment. Sen. Dianne Feinstein writes in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) that the American flag is "a vibrant symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, and our eternal memory of those who have sacrificed to defend these principles. It is because of all that our flag embodies that I have co-sponsored the Flag Protection Amendment. … The Flag Protection Amendment would not prohibit flag burning. Rather, the Amendment would simply return to Congress the ability to protect the flag as it has been protected throughout most of this nation's history." Feinstein concludes, "There is no idea or thought expressed by the burning of the American flag that cannot be expressed equally well in another manner."

USA Today Says Flag Protection Amendment Is Unnecessary. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) takes the opposite view, saying instances of flag desecration "are rare and easily addressed by local laws. They hardly require the extraordinary act of amending the Constitution. But in a Congress unwilling to address important matters…symbolism is the politically convenient substitute for substance. … The main threat to the flag comes not from the occasional burning of Old Glory. It comes from those who would sacrifice the principles the flag represents."

WSJournal Blasts Gerrymandering In The Name Of "Voting Rights." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) says, "With Congress poised to extend, for another quarter-century, certain 'temporary' provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, it's worth pondering some of the political mischief taking place these days in the name of 'voting rights.'" Gerrymandering "has all but eviscerated inter-party competition for seats in Congress, creating so many 'safe' Republican and Democratic strongholds that the outcome of most races is a foregone conclusion. But another pernicious byproduct of gerrymandering is the racial polarization and hyper-partisanship that we see in places like New York's 11th District. … Congress has never let balkanization of the electorate get in the way of protecting its own political hide, especially when it can claim to be siding with the 'voting rights' angels."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Task Force Report To Tout Progress In Protecting Intellectual Property. InformationWeek (6/20, Greenemeier) reports, "The technology world has long agonized over the government's shortcomings in protecting intellectual property. Theft of source code or even finished products costs tech firms money and potential revenue and dampens the incentive to invest in original research and development. The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday plans to issue a report signaling a positive change." IW continues, "The Justice Department's Intellectual Property Task Force has made progress in protecting the content created by companies in a number of disciplines, including software development, music recording, and motion pictures, the report says. Essentially, Justice wants to convince businesses that it has followed up on promises made in 2004 to bring the hammer down on those caught lifting other people's work for their own purposes." IW adds, "The Justice Department, as promised, has increased the number of prosecutors in the field by creating five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units in the District of Columbia, Nashville, Orlando, Fla., Pittsburgh, and Sacramento. Justice also opened another seven in Austin,

DOJ_NMG_0035181

Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, Newark, N.J., New Haven, Conn., and Philadelphia--all cities where cybercrime and intellectual property offenses are significant problems, the new report states. … Justice has also broadened its focus internationally by placing a federal prosecutor in Southeast Asia as an intellectual property law-enforcement coordinator and got funding to place a similar official in Eastern Europe. The department has trained and provided technical help to more than 2,000 foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges in the area of intellectual property investigations and prosecutions, the report states."

Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices In Real Estate. The Washington Post (6/20, D3, Downey) reports, "A national consumer advocacy group yesterday condemned real estate trade groups as a 'cartel' that sets prices and blocks competition to maintain its traditional commission structure and to keep discount firms from gaining market share." The Post continues, "The commission system is 'cockamamie,' said Stephen Brobeck, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America. Even some inexperienced real estate agents are charging a 7 percent sales commission, he said -- an amount he likened to the cost of a new car. And he questioned why the brokerage fee on an $800,000 houses is four times higher than that for a $200,000 house, saying the work involved is basically equal." The Post adds, "The District-based federation applauded efforts by government antitrust regulators to put pressure on the trade groups to change the way they do business, but Brobeck said no one had yet found the 'magic bullet' to reduce costs. He said consumers have been left on their own and urged home buyers and sellers to negotiate over the sales commissions they are charged and make sure it is clear who is representing whom, what each agent will be paid and for what services. … Thomas M. Stevens, a local real estate broker who is president of the National Association of Realtors, fired back within hours, saying the Consumer Federation is ill-informed and incorrect. … 'It's clear and evident that they don't understand the real estate business,' Stevens said. 'Real estate is probably one of the most competitive industries out there.'" The Post notes, "The Justice Department has sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging its Internet multiple listing service policy prevents nontraditional brokers from gaining equal access to sales listing information. The trade group said it has changed its policies and is seeking to have a judge dismiss the lawsuit."

DOJ Will Not Challenge Collaborative Labor Database. Dow Jones (6/20) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department on Monday said it won't take antitrust action against a collaborative initiative by retailers and manufacturers to develop a shared database on international factory and labor conditions." Dow Jones continues, "The initiative, Fair Factories Clearinghouse, asked the Justice Department to decide whether it was concerned about potential antitrust problems with the initiative. … 'The Department of Justice has no current intention to institute antitrust enforcement action against the Fair Factories Clearinghouse initiative,' Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said in a letter sent to the organization." Dow Jones adds, "The group's request to Justice officials described safeguards it will require member companies to take to avoid antitrust conflicts through the database sharing. … The Fair Factories Clearinghouse is designed to improve available audit information on the standards and conditions at factories around the world, according to the group's Web site."

FTC Endorses Online Legal Referral Services. The National Law Journal (6/20, Maclean) reports, "Although it may not be a match made in heaven, Internet legal referral services that promise to match lawyers with potential clients have found a powerful new admirer -- the Federal Trade Commission." The Journal continues, "In a recent letter to the State Bar of Texas, the FTC planning and policy chief, Maureen Ohlhausen, said that the Internet-based client/attorney matching services 'have the potential to lower consumer costs of obtaining information about the price and quality of legal services, which is likely to lead to more intense competition among attorneys, ultimately benefiting Texas consumers.'" The Journal adds, "There has been a long simmering debate in state bars around the country since the advent of these services in 1999 about whether they violate ethical rules on advertising and the bans on nonlawyer referrals for legal help. … The Arizona and Washington state bars issued ethics opinions last year foreclosing use of the services, saying that lawyers may not pay to participate in for-profit Internet matching services. Meanwhile, Rhode Island approved the online matching in 2004 as a boon to consumers, quickly joined by North Carolina, South Carolina and Utah. … The FTC letter 'is a powerful endorsement of the industry,' said Anna Ostrovsky, general counsel for San Francisco-based LegalMatch."

Net Neutrality Debate Pits Diverse Coalition Against Entrenched Lobbyists. The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "As the Senate takes up the first overhaul of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, this week's debate" over net neutrality "will pitch one of the most unlikely lineups in recent political history against an entrenched industry lobby. On one side: the big phone companies and cable providers, who want Congress to help them speed up the move into the video market and keep government regulation at a minimum. It's one of the most well-funded and experienced industry groups on Capitol Hill. On the other side: those who use their services, who want Congress to make sure that the Internet does not become a fast lane for those who can pay - and a dirt road for those who can not. The Save the Internet Coalition includes Google Inc., Amazon.com, Microsoft, and eBay, thousands of bloggers, and more than 700 groups. It's one of the most diverse coalitions ever to lobby a bill."

DOJ_NMG_0035182

Attorneys Allege DOJ Over-Reaction In Qualcomm Gun-Jumping Case. In an op-ed in the Legal Times (6/20), Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed, who are counsel in the D.C. office of O'Melveny & Myers, where they specialize in antitrust law and represented Gemstar in the case referenced below, write, "In almost any merger or acquisition, the acquiring company insists on 'conduct of business' covenants to ensure that the target company maintains the value of its assets before closing. Imagine that in the middle of negotiating an important acquisition agreement, your antitrust counsel suddenly opines that certain routine conduct-of-business covenants are no longer permissible. … This is precisely what is happening as some counsel overreact to the Department of Justice's recent gun-jumping lawsuit against Qualcomm Inc. In-house counsel need to be skeptical of such overly cautious gun-jumping advice, which can jeopardize the success of corporate transactions." Tucker and Sayyed continue, "The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires that transactions of a certain size be reported to the two federal antitrust authorities (the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission) and that merging parties observe a pre-closing waiting period. This waiting period gives the antitrust agencies a chance to review a transaction for potential anti-competitive effects before the parties can close the transaction. … Gun jumping occurs when a buyer exercises control over the to-be-acquired firm before the expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period. When parties are competitors, certain joint activity or information sharing before closing can also violate the Sherman Act. Whether a gun-jumping violation exists is a separate question from whether the underlying business combination violates the antitrust laws. … Unfortunately, neither of the antitrust agencies has provided specific guidelines governing what is and what is not allowable during the period between signing and closing. Although guidelines were promised by then-Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Charles James in September 2002, his successors appear to have concluded that the fact-intensive nature of this area may make such guidelines too vague to be of any use." Tucker and Sayyed conclude, "Although merging parties certainly can go too far in interacting with one another before closing a transaction, there is more flexibility than some antitrust lawyers advise, and the Qualcomm case in no way limits merging parties' ability to achieve their business objectives."

Morgan Stanley Hikes Bid For Denver Energy Firm. The AP (6/20, Shore) reports, "Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc. boosted its offer for TransMontaigne Inc. by 3 percent a share, escalating a bidding war that appeared to be over last month when the fuel distribution company accepted a lower bid from SemGroup LP." The AP continues, "The Transmontaigne board was scheduled to meet Monday to determine whether the new Morgan Stanley offer of $11.35 a share in cash -- delivered Sunday -- would be considered superior to the SemGroup offer of $11.25 a share. The company said it would be prepared to terminate its agreement with SemGroup if the Morgan Stanley offer were better." The AP adds, "In a letter delivered to TransMontaigne on Sunday, John Shapiro, president of Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc., said the offer would expire on Friday morning if no action were taken. … Shapiro also noted that SemGroup has received a request for more information from the Federal Trade Commission which could delay any deal between SemGroup and TransMontaigne."

Judge Dismisses Antitrust Suit Against Oil Companies. The Fairbanks (AK) News-Miner (6/20, Eshleman) reports, "A federal judge on Monday dismissed an antitrust lawsuit filed last year by the Alaska Gasline Port Authority against two North Slope oil companies. Judge Ralph Beistline found fault with a number of arguments raised by the port authority, finding among them that it lacked the standing needed to pursue the lawsuit in federal court." The News-Miner continues, "The port authority filed the suit in federal District Court in Fairbanks, alleging BP and Exxon Mobil had conspired to keep North Slope natural gas out of the marketplace. … Beistline agreed with lawyers for the oil companies who said the state's Stranded Gas Development Act, which lays out a negotiating process for finding a way to transport natural gas to market, pre-empts the authority's lawsuit. … The judge said the port authority's project 'appears well-intentioned, has accomplished a great deal to date, and may well have a valid plan. … Decisions, however, regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska state Legislature and the people of Alaska,' Beistline wrote."

The AP (6/20, Sutton) reports, "The Alaska Gas Port Authority claims Exxon Mobil Corp. and BP PLC have conspired to crush competition and restrict the nation's supply of natural gas, and that has stymied the port authority's efforts to develop a gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope to Valdez. … . But (Judge Beistline) sided with the oil companies and said the port authority's case could upend a competing effort by the state to forge a contract with Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips to build a North Slope gas pipeline to Canada and markets in the Midwest."

DOJ_NMG_0035183

Supreme Court Seeks US Comment On IPO Underwriter Appeal. MarketWatch (6/20, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday requested comments from the federal government on an appeal from 16 major Wall Street underwriters and investment firms trying to stop a class-action lawsuit that alleges firm commitment initial public offering practices on Wall Street violate federal antitrust laws." MarketWatch continues, "The high court's request for a brief from the U.S. Solicitor General's office gives the Wall Street firms additional time to try and stop a class-action lawsuit alleging underwriter tie-in agreements - such as requiring the purchase of additional securities in the aftermarket - violate antitrust laws. A number of other claims in the lawsuit were thrown out by a U.S. District Court, but litigation over tie-in agreements was revived by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York." MarketWatch adds, "The appeal, led by Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., a unit of Credit Suisse Group (CSR), also includes a number of prominent Wall Street firms. … The class-action lawsuit represents purchasers of stock issued by about 900 Internet and technology companies before the stock market bubble burst in the late 1990s. The lawsuit targets a number of IPO underwriting practices, arguing they are anticompetitive, and seeks financial damages. Additional related lawsuits are pending separately."

Senate Committee Proposes Internet User "Bill Of Rights." CNET News (6/20, Broache) reports, "The latest Net neutrality provisions in a mammoth Senate communications bill stopped short of giving Internet companies and consumer advocacy groups all the assurances they've requested." CNET continues, "Unveiled formally at a briefing here for reporters on Monday, new provisions in the latest draft of the sweeping Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act would allow the Federal Communications Commission to police subscribers' complaints of 'interference' in their Internet activities and to levy fines on violators." CNET adds, "Specifically, the bill would require all Internet service providers to adhere to what the proposal calls an 'Internet consumer bill of rights.' The nine principles outlined under that heading include: allowing consumers to access and post any lawful content they please; to access and run any Web page, search engine or application that they choose (including voice and video programs); and to connect any legal devices they please to the network. … Carve-outs would exist for network management purposes, such as parental control technologies and security software. … All Internet service providers, if they're not already doing so, would also be obligated to offer broadband access on a standalone, or 'naked,' basis--without also requiring, for example, purchase of telephone or cable subscriptions. … But critics say the latest draft, scheduled for an initial committee vote on Thursday afternoon, refrained from addressing a major complaint of advocates of network neutrality--that is, the idea that network operators should give equal treatment to all content that travels across their pipes."

Mittal Claims Growing Support For Arcelor Bid. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Glader) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. is becoming increasingly confident its €23.19 billion ($29.31 billion) hostile offer for Arcelor SA is gaining momentum, pointing to pressure from Arcelor shareholders in favor of the Mittal bid." The Journal continues, "Mittal, the world's largest steel company by output, launched its cash-and-stock bid for Arcelor in January, but Arcelor has thrown up several roadblocks to the transaction, including plans to merge with Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal, led by billionaire Alexey Mordashov, in a move to fend off Mittal's bid." The Journal adds, "Arcelor had planned a company buyback of €5 billion that shareholders were scheduled to vote on tomorrow. But Arcelor said yesterday that it was canceling the meeting because of current talks between its management and Mittal Steel. The company said its board may decide later to reconvene the meeting 'in case the unsolicited offer by Mittal Steel was not successful.'"

On Heels Of Nokia Venture, Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate Service Unit. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Bryan-low, Esterl) reports, "On the heels of an agreement to combine its telecommunications-equipment business with that of Nokia Corp., Siemens AG said it is in talks to sell a majority stake in its enterprise unit, which supplies packages of telecom gear and services to corporate customers." The Journal continues, "Siemens didn't identify the potential buyers for the unit, which has about €3.5 billion, or about $4.4 billion, in annual sales. But with the potential sale and its planned joint venture with Finland's Nokia, the German electronics-and-engineering giant is dismantling its telecom unit known as Com, which posted €13.14 billion in sales for fiscal 2005." The Journal adds, "As expected, the European technology giants confirmed Monday they will combine their businesses that supply telecom carriers into a 50-50 joint venture. The combination provides increased bulk at a time when more equipment makers are joining forces. … The new company, to be known as Nokia Siemens Networks, will be No. 3 in the industry by sales, just behind the combination of Alcatel SA of France and Lucent Technologies Inc. of the U.S., which recently agreed to merge, and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden."

DOJ_NMG_0035184

LATimes Says Internet Phone Companies Shouldn't Pay Service Fees. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/20, 958K) says local phone monopolies "are trying to saddle high-tech competitors with fees designed to subsidize the traditional phone network. At issue is how federal and state regulators will treat voice over Internet protocol, or VOIP." The Times adds, "Rather than dragging VOIP services into the morass of subsidies for phone circuits, lawmakers and regulators should focus on pushing high-speed Internet connections to every US home and business. If that means people using VOIP save a few bucks at the expense of those who use other phone services, so be it. With luck, VOIP will drive up the demand for broadband and hasten its spread, diminishing the need to subsidize plain old telephone lines."

ENVIRONMENT:

High Court Rules Federal Regulators Overstepped Authority Under Clean Water Act. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 9, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Supreme Court "ruled that Federal regulators may have gone too far when they stopped Michigan landowners from developing some wetlands. But the justices stopped short of overturning the Clean Water Act." The AP (6/20, Holland) reports Chief Justice John Roberts, "in his first major environmental case, came up one vote short of dramatically limiting the scope of the landmark Clean Water Act. At the same time, property rights advocates won a new test for when wetlands can be regulated. Moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said there must be a 'significant nexus' between the wetland and a navigable waterway." The court's "four liberal members said the conservatives would have opened up sensitive wetlands to polluters." It was "a dramatic conclusion to a pair of property rights cases the justices agreed to review last fall, just days after Roberts joined the court. The Bush administration defended the law and had urged the court to stay out of the case."

The New York Times (6/20, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday came close to rolling back one of the country's fundamental environmental laws, issuing a fractured decision that, while likely to preserve vigorous federal enforcement of the law, the Clean Water Act, is also likely to lead to new regulatory battles, increased litigation by property owners and a push for new legislation."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/20, Richey, 61K) reports, "At dead center of the court sits Justice Anthony Kennedy, who provided the critical fifth vote on the restrictive side of the case." That action "sends the two consolidated cases back to the lower courts where judges must divine a coherent approach to federal jurisdiction from the high court's splintered decision." The decision "is a setback for environmentalists seeking to push tough federal regulations to the broadest possible swath of threatened wetlands."

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Bravin, Winograd, 2.11M) headlines its story "Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act," while the Washington Post (6/20, A1, Lane, 744K) titles its story "Justices Rein In Clean Water Act," but the Los Angeles Times (6/20, Savage, 958K) reports the decision "by five justices dashed the hopes of private property advocates who believed that the more conservative court was ready to sharply cut back the reach of the Clean Water Act."

The Legal Times (6/20, Mauro) reports, "On a day that foreshadowed politically charged battles ahead, the Supreme Court on Monday divided sharply on the scope of the Clean Water Act while also agreeing to widen its review of the federal partial-birth abortion ban next fall." The Times continues, "In the long-awaited Clean Water Act cases Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States, Justice Antonin Scalia won three other votes for a narrow interpretation of the act's scope, while Justice Anthony Kennedy concurred in the judgment but offered his own more sweeping interpretation -- guaranteeing continued litigation. … In Scalia's view, the law requiring permits to fill 'navigable waters' covers only 'relatively permanent' streams, rivers, and lakes -- not intermittent or merely 'hydrologically connected' waters. However, Kennedy's concurrence sketched out a much broader standard, one that would apply the law's permit requirement to those seeking to fill any waters and wetlands with a 'significant nexus' to navigable waters." The Times adds, "Environmental groups seized on Kennedy's concurrence as the controlling opinion and expressed relief that their fears of a substantial loss of Clean Water Act jurisdiction had not come to pass. … 'The ultimate effect of the Supreme Court's decision on the Clean Water Act is to leave the Act's protection of wetlands and other water bodies in place, but subject to proof that they do in fact have a 'substantial nexus' to downstream water quality,' said Tim Searchinger, lawyer with the group Environmental Defense, in a statement. 'The decision kicks the ball down the road and will create some major administrative headaches, but in the end, the protection of this country's water bodies should change little.'"

Bloomberg (6/20, Stohr) reports, "Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the four dissenters, said Kennedy's test will create new uncertainty and additional work for regulators and landowners. He also said the new test 'will probably not do much to diminish the number of wetlands covered by the act in the long run.' … Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter also dissented." Bloomberg notes, "The ruling is a partial setback for environmentalists and the Bush administration, which argued in favor of broad federal power to restrict development."

DOJ_NMG_0035185

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "For all the talk of liberal judicial activists, it was Justice Antonin Scalia and his fellow conservatives who voted to substitute their own preferences for a decision made by the executive branch, in the form of the Army Corps, interpreting a statute passed by Congress. It was the liberals who were "judicially modest," to use a favorite phrase of Chief Justice Roberts, deferring to the elected branches." Justice Kennedy's role "is especially notable. He wrote a careful opinion, much in the tradition of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, that refused to go along with any large-scale assault on ecologically fragile lands. His opinion suggests that in this sharply divided court, at least in environmental law, the precarious center can hold."

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) writes in an editorial, "The vote in the case left little room for doubt about the reason for the Court's indecision -- his name is Justice Anthony Kennedy. The Court split, in effect, 4-1-4." The Journal adds, "Some court-watchers predicted that Justices Roberts and Alito would help draw Anthony Kennedy to the right, lest he feel isolated by the high-powered intellects of the Court's four conservatives. The good news from yesterday's ruling is that the Court's two newest members came down solidly on the side of property rights in their first big environmentalism case. The bad news is that Justice Kennedy lacked the courage of their convictions."

Pombo Says Deal Has Been Reached On Offshore Oil Drilling. The New York Times (6/20, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports Rep. Richard Pombo, chairman of the House resources committee, said the panel "had reached bipartisan agreement on a measure that would open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas exploration." Pombo "said the agreement was a compromise that would give states the option to drill in waters that the federal government had kept off limits to energy exploration for decades. At the same time, lawmakers also tried to satisfy lawmakers from Florida and other states who have opposed any drilling within 100 miles of their coastlines." According to the Times, the deal, which will be voted on Wednesday, "would replace a longstanding executive order barring most drilling on the shelf with legislation that would bar drilling in the first 50 miles of coastal waters unless states chose to opt out by vote of their Legislature and the approval of their governor."

Spate Of New Energy Legislation Attributed To Election-Year Politics. The New York Times (6/20, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports, "Any notion that energy policy was set for a while after President Bush signed the first major energy bill in a decade last August would be wrong. Not only are gasoline prices higher now than they were then…but elections are approaching." Sen. Larry Craig "has introduced a bill that would allow American oil companies to work in partnership with Cuba, drilling for energy supplies off its coastline." Rep. Maurice Hinchey "would eliminate a slew of tax breaks for oil and gas companies." Rep. Dan Lungren "has proposed legislation that would award $1 billion to the first automaker in the United States to sell 60,000 mid-size sedans that can travel 100 miles on a gallon of gas." According to the Times, "Of all the energy measures…three have a modest chance to pass both houses this year. One would open a new section of the Gulf of Mexico to drilling. One would define and outlaw gasoline price gouging. A third would give the president authority to set fuel efficiency standards for cars."

Higher Oil Prices Could Contribute To The Deterioration Of US Roads. USA Today (6/20, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Asphalt prices are skyrocketing as costs for oil, a key component of the paving material, are near records. In some parts of the country, there are asphalt shortages. Both price and availability problems are forcing local governments across the USA to scale back or cancel road projects this summer, the main paving season in much of the country. … Nationwide, asphalt prices are up 42% in the second quarter from the same time a year ago, according to the Engineering News-Record." USA Today adds, "Making matters worse, U.S. asphalt production was down more than 5% from January through March compared with a year ago, the Energy Department says."

Kempthorne Restores Preservation As Park Service's Primary Goal. The Los Angeles Times (6/20, Cart, 958K) reports that Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne has thrown out a draft of the National Park Service Management Policies that would have "opened some of America's national parks to snowmobiles and other motorized recreation and permitted increased commercialization." The policy rejected by Kempthorne "would have weakened protections for wildlife and natural resources, instead restoring the longtime standard that national parks must emphasize preservation over any other activity. … The new policy, which is to become final in three weeks, explicitly instructs park managers to maintain clean air, water and natural sounds, and not allow any activities that might damage park resources."

LATimes Praises Administrations "New Attitude" Toward National Parks. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/20, 958K) calls Kempthorne's decision "gratifying," noting that the parks "were never intended for the mixed industrial and recreational uses commonly allowed on property under the Bureau of Land Management." Kempthorne "has shown that he at least understands what [former Secretary Gale] Norton never seemed to get: The public wholeheartedly embraces the conservation of its national parks and monuments. The government should respect this position." The Bush administration "appears to have a welcome new attitude toward the nation's natural treasures."

DOJ_NMG_0035186

Authors Lament Extinction Of Tasmanian Tiger. Authors Margaret Mittelbach and Michael Crewdson write in the Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) that "one of the most spectacularly tragic losses in nature was Thylacinus cynocephalus, commonly called the thylacine, or Tasmanian tiger."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Weapons, Drug Charges. The AP (6/20) reports former Houston County, Ala., sheriff's deputy Michael Shawn Campbell "pleaded guilty to selling a gun to a convicted felon and supplying him with cocaine to sell, authorities said Monday. … Campbell, who was a deputy with Houston County's narcotic unit at the time, admitted to selling the gun and supplying crack cocaine to Joshua Whigan, an Ashford man Campbell knew to be a convicted felon, authorities said. Whigan reported Campbell to authorities and worked with the FBI and Ashford Police Department on the case."

Political Opponents Call For Connecticut Mayor To Resign Over Cocaine Allegation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/20, Christoffersen) reports, "Adversaries called on the mayor of Connecticut's largest city to resign Monday, while supporters urged him to specifically address allegations he used cocaine. Bridgeport Mayor John Fabrizi, a Democrat, was named in an FBI report that surfaced last week in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. … Fabrizi planned to make a public statement Tuesday, said his spokeswoman, Caryn Kaufman." The AP notes Fabrizi's 2003 opponent, Republican Rick Torres yesterday called for his resignation and US Rep Christopher Shays "urged Fabrizi to disclose more."

Illegal Drug Use Declines Among US Workers. USA Today (6/20, Armour, Jones) reports illegal drug use among workers in the United States "fell to its lowest level in nearly two decades in a trend driven in part by tougher drug-testing practices, putting cold medicines behind the counter and closing down methamphetamine labs in America. … The White House said on Monday that seizures of meth labs dropped more than 30% last year. It said the reason was that more states and retail drugstores limited access to cold medications that are used to make meth. 'The workplace data has been very powerful in that it's based on many, many tests,' says John Walters."

The AP (6/20) writes that even as such statistics were released, "Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company, said that in the first five months of this year, the rate of job applicants and workers testing positive for meth was 31 percent lower than last year. The top White House drug control official, John P. Walters, said the two reports were evidence that the 'one-two punch' of restricting chemicals and educating the public about the effects of methamphetamine addiction was having an effect." The New York Times published this AP story.

In a separate story, the AP (6/20) reports, "Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace. … The number of meth lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states put in place laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center. … White House drug policy director John Walters called the data an encouraging sign of progress. 'The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand,' said Walters." This AP story was published by MSNBC, FOX News, the Seattle Times, Georgia's Athens Banner-Herald West Virginia's Charleston Gazette and the Austin, Texas American-Statesman.

In a sidebar, the AP (6/19) has listed the number of meth labs shut down in each state over the last two years.

UPI (6/19) reports, "Quest Diagnostics said of tests for all drugs performed by the company for the combined U.S. workforce, 4.1 percent had positive results in 2005 compared to 13.6 percent in 1988."

The San Antonio (TX) Express News (6/20) writes that according to the Quest report, "Those testing positive for marijuana represented 52.5 percent of the positive results, down from 60.6 percent in 2001. At 15.7 percent, cocaine was No. 2 on the list of drugs found in workers." The Express News adds, "In San Antonio, results are mixed, with one testing company observing a possible decrease in overall drug use and another noticing an upward trend, especially in methamphetamine use."

The Kansas City Star (6/20) writes, "Kansas City, Kan., police turned to the DEA for help last year when the Mexican meth trade sparked a wave of violence. The resulting law enforcement operation led to 23 arrests and the dismantling of four trafficking organizations."

The Los Angeles Daily News (6/20) reports, "The federal government hopes a sweeping law that would require drugs containing pseudoephedrine - the main ingredient in meth - to be sold from behind the pharmacy counter will further reduce the meth supply in the United States. Though

DOJ_NMG_0035187

California already has such laws in place, the nationwide mandate will begin Sept. 30."

Two Men Accused Of Supplying Michigan Teen With Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. Southfield, Michigan's WXYZ-TV (6/19) reports on its Web site that on Monday police "arrested two men accused of supplying a Bloomfield Hills teenager with a deadly combination of heroin and fentanyl. The suspects could become the first two in Michigan to be charged with a fentanyl-related death. Saturday night, on Keating Street in Detroit, officers with the major crimes division and DEA agents raided the home of two suspected drug dealers who are brothers. Sources said the brothers supplied 17-year-old Lauren Jolly with the heroin laced with Fentanyl and then let her die."

The Detroit News (6/20) reports, "Two men arrested in a federal raid of a drug house Sunday morning may be linked to the distribution of drugs laced with fentanyl, a painkiller suspected in the deaths of at least 79 people in Metro Detroit in the last four weeks, law enforcement sources said. … Brothers Donald and James Edgar Coleman were among those arrested in the raid…sources familiar with the investigation said. Some were charged with ordinance-type violations, police said." The News adds, "In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with 'potentially lethal' levels of fentanyl. The Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, officials said."

Six Die Of Suspected Drug Overdoses. The Chicago Tribune (6/19) reports, "Five Chicago men and one Elk Grove Village man died Saturday and early Sunday of suspected drug overdoses, officials said. Three of the six may have been heroin users, said a spokesman for the Cook County medical examiner."

Louisiana Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Providing Pain Medication. The AP (6/20) reports, "A Lake Charles doctor pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to illegally dispensing pain medication in exchange for sexual favors. Dr. Kevin E. Gorin, 46, was charged with four counts of distribution of a controlled dangerous substance and one count of possession of a controlled dangerous substance with intent to distribute. … Gorin's arrest culminated an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Beauregard Parish Sheriff's Office, and the DeRidder Police Department."

Ohio Lab Said To Be Under Scrutiny By Regulators. The Athens (OH) News (6/19) reports the Columbus laboratory that "reported finding an extremely high amount of GHB in Ohio University head football coach Frank Solich's hair has come under repeated scrutiny by regulators. A review of public documents by The Athens News has uncovered numerous run-ins in recent years between Toxicology Associates, Inc. and government agencies charged with ensuring lab accuracy and fair advertising." However, group supervisor for the Columbus diversion group office of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency "said Friday that she knows of no problems encountered by the DEA in its oversight of the lab's handling of controlled substances. The DEA license held by Toxicology Associates, Inc. is current, she reported." The News notes that Solich is trying to overturn his November drunken driving conviction.

IMMIGRATION:

Conservative Leaders Challenge Bush On Immigration. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/19, 6:15PM, Sylvester) reported that "today on the issue of illegal immigration, the President has lost his loyal base. 41 prominent conservatives have written a letter to the White House urging what's called sequencing. Secure the borders first, before implementing a guest worker amnesty program. The list includes prominent names like Bill Bennett, President Reagan's Education Secretary, judge Robert Bork, William F. Buckley and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich."

GOP Senators Say Work-Site Immigration Enforcement Has Been Ignored. The Washington Times (6/20, Hurt, 90K) reports Senate Republicans "warned yesterday that the immigration bill approved by the Senate last month won't stop companies from hiring illegal aliens -- the very magnet that has drawn some 12 million illegals to the United States." Sen. John Cornyn "called a subcommittee hearing on the topic yesterday," and is quoted as saying, "Not only do I see work-site enforcement as the critical means, or linchpin, really, of successful immigration reform, but also because the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security has told me that several provisions in the Senate bill would make the system unworkable." Sen. Jon Kyl "said there was little hope for improvement with current proposals." However, Julie L. Myers, DHS assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said her agency ""is reinvigorating our work-site enforcement efforts."

Almost Half Of Illegals Entered US With Valid Visas. The Washington Times (6/20, Seper, 90K) reports, "Nearly half of the 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens now in the United States entered the country legally, but never left. Carrying visas and U.S.-approved border crossing cards, they were inspected by immigration officers at 300 sea, air and land ports of entry and many -- according to a year-old U.S. Customs and Border Protection policy -- were told to 'Have a nice day.' A little-noticed study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center says 45 percent of America's illegal alien population -- 4.5 million to 6 million -- carried legally issued border crossing cards for short-term visits or business and tourist visas for longer but temporary stays."

DOJ_NMG_0035188

Illegals Increasingly Face Deportation For Relatively Minor Crimes. The New York Times (6/20, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "Across the country, local law enforcement officials and irritated taxpayers are turning up the pressure on federal immigration authorities to identify illegal immigrants who are behind bars and deport them after they are freed. Although that has generally been the practice with violent felons, illegal immigrants who commit lesser crimes are often overlooked by federal authorities, who say their resources are scarce. Now, however, immigration agents say they are beginning to take the first steps to change that. The agents say they are rethinking the triage that led them to pass over the estimated hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants with lesser offenses, even if they were imprisoned." According to the Times, "Up to 25 percent of the 22,000 inmates in the Los Angeles County jails on any day are illegal immigrants. … In California state prisons, at least 20,000 inmates have been listed for deportation by immigration authorities, officials said."

To Protect Cattle Fences, Some Texas Ranchers Provide Fences For Illegal Immigrants. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Johnson, Rutkoff, 2.11M) reports in its "Border Lines" column, "Some Texas ranchers tired of repairing cattle fences damaged by illegal U.S.-Mexico border crossers have installed an easier route -- ladders. 'It's an attempt to get them to use the ladders instead of tearing the fences,' said ranch owner Scott Pattinson. But the ladders may look too good to be true. 'They ignore it a lot,' says Paul Johnson, who owns an exotic game ranch along the Texas border. 'They're afraid that they're monitored by the Border Patrol.'"

Police Refuse To Assist Immigration Enforcement Efforts. USA Today (6/20, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Despite a federal effort to enlist help from local police to catch illegal immigrants, some of the USA's biggest cities are declining to enforce immigration laws. Police chiefs, mayors and city councils are ordering local cops not to get involved as federal agents crack down on people in the country illegally." U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement "has been visiting police conventions in an effort to have departments join a voluntary program. … Participants include state police in Alabama and Florida, the Arizona corrections department and sheriff's departments in San Bernardino, Los Angeles and Riverside counties in California and Mecklenburg County, N.C." However, "Several jurisdictions have refused to help. Chicago police and city workers are prohibited from asking immigrants about their legal status. … In the broadest signal of opposition, a national group representing 57 big-city police chiefs warned this month that local enforcement of federal immigration laws would 'undermine trust and cooperation' among immigrants."

WSJournal Notes Prominent Economists' Support For Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M), in an editorial, writes, "In an open letter to President Bush and Congress last week, more than 500 prominent economists, including five Nobel laureates, proclaim that 'immigration has been a net gain for American citizens.' … What is striking about this immigration letter is that it is signed by economists from different fields of research, political affiliations and ideologies. It is possible that no other issue in the economic field, with the exception of the benefits of free trade, inspires such unanimity of professional opinion as immigration does."

TAX:

California Businessman Arrested In Alleged Tax Deduction Scheme. The New York Times (6/20, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The owner of the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker was arrested yesterday morning at his California home and charged with orchestrating a tax fraud that cost the government nearly $20 million as well as intimidating witnesses and a federal agent investigating the case." Gene F. Haas, "the owner of Haas Automation and other companies, was accused in a 52-page indictment of running a bogus invoicing scheme to create fake tax deductions. Mr. Haas was held without bail after his arraignment in Federal District Court in Los Angeles." The Times notes former Haas Automation CFO John Phillips "went to the F.B.I. in April 2001 and told them that he had been ordered by Mr. Haas eight months earlier to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said. Mr. Phillips is an unindicted co-conspirator."

Thomas Unveils Estate Tax Repeal Plan. The AP (6/20, Dalrymple) reports, "The House's top tax writer revealed a proposal Monday to reduce taxes on inherited estates and rewrite a quirky law that repeals the tax for only one year." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas " introduced the bill after Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked House GOP leaders for help reducing the estate tax before this fall's midterm elections." Frist "lost a bid this month to push forward legislation repealing the tax, unable to overcome opposition from most Democrats and a pair of Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Mullins, 2.11M) says Thomas' bill "could be a big step toward lowering estate taxes." House Republicans "will vote this week" on the "compromise legislation." Thomas' proposal "would reduce the number of Americans subject to the estate tax by raising the per-person threshold for the tax to estates valued at more than $5 million beginning in 2010." Thomas "would set the tax rate for estates valued at less than $25 million to the capital-gains rate, currently 15%. The value of estates above $25 million would be taxed at a rate equal to twice the capital-gains rate. The new legislation would retain the 'step up' in basis and would unify the estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes." The Journal adds, "To appeal to a few key Senate Democrats, Mr. Thomas included incentives for the timber industry. The legislation includes a new 60% deduction for qualified timber capital gains. House Republicans would like to approve the legislation this week, so the Senate would have time for a vote this summer."

DOJ_NMG_0035189

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rumsfeld Said To Give Little Attention To Weapons Procurement. A Washington Post (6/20, A15, Smith, 744K) article headlined "Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere" is extremely critical of Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, saying that a transcript of Rumsfeld's April 2005 interview with Pentagon IG investigators in "the largest defense procurement scandal in recent decades," obtained by the newspaper "under the Freedom of Information Act after a year-long wait, says a lot about how little of Rumsfeld's attention has been focused on weapons-buying -- a function that consumes nearly a fifth of the $410 billion defense budget, exclusive of expenditures in Iraq and Afghanistan." The Post says the "issue is relevant because a series of reports, including others by the inspector general and by the Government Accountability Office, indicate that five years into the Bush administration, the department's system of buying new weapons is broken and dysfunctional."

Zoellick Announces Resignation From State Department Post. The Washington Post (6/20, A2, Kessler, 744K) reports, Deputy Secretary Robert Zoellick, "one of the administration's most prominent figures in foreign and economic policy, said yesterday that he is resigning to join the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. Zoellick's interest in leaving his high-profile post had long been rumored, but it leaves a large hole in" Secretary Rice's "foreign policy team. Zoellick spearheaded efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and was the administration's main interlocutor in the delicate relationship between the United States and China." During a Monday ceremony, Rice is quoted saying she was "deeply honored" that Zoellick had agreed to come aboard and was announcing his resignation "not without considerable sadness." Later, in an interview, Zoellick "said he was leaving 16 months after he started because he had accomplished his objective of helping Rice set up her management team and get her tenure as secretary of state off to a fast start. 'The secretary is clearly up and running quite well,' Zoellick said. 'We now have a very good team, a team considered -- false modesty here -- one of the best, if not the best, Cabinet teams around.'"

The Wall Street Journal (6/20, King, Craig, 2.11M) adds, "Mr. Zoellick's departure will leave a vacuum in the Bush administration's China team, which Mr. Zoellick has led since early last year. ... In his resignation letter, Mr. Zoellick said he was particularly proud of having 'reframed' the administration's approach toward China. In a speech last summer, Mr. Zoellick called on China to become a 'responsible stakeholder' in the international system. He also led a series of high-level dialogues between Washington and Beijing." The New York Times (6/20, Cooper, 1.19M) notes, "As Ms. Rice's deputy, Mr. Zoellick was the primary architect of the administration's policy toward Sudan and particularly the response to the crisis in Darfur. … He is widely considered to be one of the administration's most experienced foreign policy hands." The Times notes the search for Zoellick's successor, reporting, "Bush administration officials said the search was now on to find a replacement." Undersecretary Burns "would be the logical front-runner for the job. Administration officials say Robert M. Kimmitt, the deputy Treasury secretary, is also in the running." The Financial Times (6/20) also notes Burns and Kimmitt as "frontrunners" for the job. The Washington Times (6/20, Sands, 90K) and Los Angeles Times (6/20, McManus, 958K) run similar reports.

Energetic PR Effort Underway To Depict Bush As Fully Engaged. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/19) reports, "More signs are emerging that new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten is pumping up the energy level in the West Wing -- especially when it comes to promoting President Bush and his policies in the news media. Bolten is now granting interviews to talk up the Administration's agenda and, most particularly, to portray Bush as fully engaged in formulating and debating policy." Bolten is "said to be concerned that Bush is too often depicted as an isolated figure and an intellectual lightweight, and he wants other senior officials to do more to counteract those perceptions. This level of media engagement was rare for Andy Card, Bolten's predecessor." Bolten is "also encouraging other aides to be more visible in engaging the Bush's critics. New White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has taken these marching orders to heart, not only jousting with reporters with more deftness than his predecessor, Scott McClellan, but appearing on two talk shows yesterday alone -- to talk up Bush's agenda and his leadership skills. Appearing on the Sunday shows and other high-profile TV venues is something McClellan almost never did. Snow appeared yesterday on CBS' Face the Nation and Fox News Sunday."

DOJ_NMG_0035190

Snow Deliberately Kept In Dark About Baghdad Trip. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/19) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "didn't mind being kept in the dark about President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad last week. Snow didn't find out about the visit until almost the last minute -- after he had briefed reporters about the supposedly full schedule of meetings that Bush was planning at Camp David. That schedule, however, was a subterfuge designed by more senior officials at the White House to throw the media, and presumably evil doers in Iraq, off the trail of what Bush was really up to." Snow "now tells associates that if he had known about the secret trip, he might have been placed in the position of potentially deceiving reporters -- something he never wants to do. So, he says, it was actually a good idea to keep the press secretary out of the loop on at least this occasion." But former advisers to past presidents, "however, have a different take. They don't think it's a good sign that the President's chief spokesman wasn't informed about the Baghdad visit, and they believe it shows that counselor Dan Bartlett, a Bush loyalist for many years, is still the Number One strategist for communications and PR at the White House."

Federal Agencies' Varying Standards For Polygraph Tests Create Frustration. The Washington Post (6/20, A1, Vedantam, 744K), in a front-page story, reports on employees of federal agencies including the CIA and the FBI who have failed polygraph tests administered by other agencies. According to the Post, "In a region where a security clearance is a necessary ticket to countless jobs with the federal government and its thousands of contractors, it is not hard to find people caught in turf wars over clearance. Polygraph tests are often at the root of the problem. … The government recognizes the problem and plans to harmonize the process across the intelligence community, but Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte cannot say when that will happen, said spokesman John Callahan." The post goes on to report, "The FBI recently ran a background check on Wayne Johnson, which led to a five-year extension of his top-secret White House clearance. But when Johnson applied for a job at the FBI itself, the agency made him an offer -- then rescinded it after a polygraph exam." Johnson "said the polygraph made him nervous, even though he had nothing to hide. When asked about drug use, Johnson, who is black, found himself worrying about stereotypes that link blacks to drug use. Johnson said he had never touched an illegal narcotic but believed his examiner, who is white, did not believe him."

Cheney Presents Gerald Ford Prize To New York Daily News Reporter. Roll Call (6/20, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that while Vice President Cheney was on hand to present Tom DeFrank, the Washington, DC, bureau chief for the New York Daily News, with the Gerald R. Ford Prize for Distinguished Reporting on the Presidency, he "didn't physically present the award to DeFrank, in a departure from previous years." Roll Call notes that one of DeFrank's stories submitted in his award wining package discussed Cheney's "waning influence at the White House after the indictment of his former chief of staff, Scooter Libby." Attendees, say Cheney "was gracious and said nice things about DeFrank. But although Cheney presented the award to last year's winner, Jackie Calmes of The Wall Street Journal, President Ford's son Jack presented this year's award, the 19th annual."

GOP Lawmakers Have Extensive Agenda For The Next Five Weeks. Roll Call (6/20, Billings) reports in its "Roadmap" column, "Majority Republicans know they will need unity in their own party and the support of at least a few Democrats to make significant headway on their priorities in the next five weeks of legislating, a schedule that includes a raft of appropriations measures, the estate tax, line-item veto, executive nominations and outstanding conference reports on pensions, lobby reform and immigration. And the GOP knows that hopes of advancing those bills diminish as the clock ticks toward August and the November election creeps closer." Republicans "hope to put Democrats on the defensive on the war, trying to bolster their own anti-terrorism credentials while branding the minority as a 'cut and run party.'" Democrats "will ramp up their own efforts to bolster their agenda and a message that Republicans have forwarded the wrong priorities that have hurt the middle class and favored special interests."

Democrats Pledge To Keep Pressure On GOP Regarding Minimum Wage Hike. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Rogers, Conkey, 2.11M) reports Democrats in Congress "aim to make the minimum wage a maximum political problem for Republicans this election year. The minority party fired the first shot last week, when the House Appropriations Committee broke with its Republican leadership and approved a $2.10-an-hour increase as part of a spending bill for labor, health and education programs. Speaker Dennis Hastert responded by putting the measure on hold -- possibly until after the election. But Democrats are poised to come back this morning and offer the same wage amendment as part of a second appropriations bill funding science and law-enforcement agencies." The committee's ranking Democrat Rep. David Obey is quoted as saying, "I gave the Republicans fair notice that we will attach it to anything we can." House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer adds, "We think it's both the right thing and good politics." According to the Journal, "Discomfort is growing among rank-and-file Republicans, especially as organized labor has mounted ballot issues in various states." Rep. Jo Ann Emerson "said her polling on the issue in Missouri -- one of the states with a ballot initiative in the works -- testified to the issue's popularity."

DOJ_NMG_0035191

Police Union Wants Ethics Probe Of McKinney. In the wake of a federal grand jury's refusal to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney for assaulting a Capitol Police officer, police labor officials are calling on the House ethics committee to review her conduct. The AP (6/20, Kellman) reports that the officials "said the grand jury's decision last week sent the message that 'it's okay to hit a police officer.'" Andrew Maybo, chairman of the US Capitol Police Labor Committee, told reporters the Fraternal Order of Police "would send a letter later this week to the ethics committee suggesting that McKinney's behavior violated an item in the chamber's ethics manual that calls for members to 'conduct (themselves) at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives.' McKinney's spokesman and her lawyer did not immediately return calls for comment."

The Hill (6/20, Kucinich) reports, "Lou Cannon, the president of the DC Fraternal Order of Police, echoed Maybo's remarks, adding that regardless of any animosity felt among the officers toward the lawmaker she will still be protected as a member of Congress."

CQ (6/19, Ferrechio) reported, "There was no immediate word from McKinney's office on the FOP ethics challenge, but the congresswoman said June 16 that the grand jury decision was 'right and just, and the proper resolution of this case.'"

Fundraiser Boosts McCrery's Bid For Ways And Means Chairmanship. The Hill (6/20 O'Connor, Snyder) reports Rep. Jim McCrery's "chairmanship of last night's President's Dinner should boost his bid for the Ways and Means Committee gavel, if the past is any indication. The dinner raised $15 million for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), exceeding its target by $1 million. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, helmed by Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), raised an additional $12 million." McCrery, "already a fundraising powerhouse this election cycle, raised $1.2 million for last night's dinner. … Always a factor, fundraising prowess could be doubly important to McCrery's ambitions because he is not the most senior member in line to run Ways and Means. His principal opponent, Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.), has been there longer and is raising considerable funds in his own bid."

USDA Official Cancels Some Alternative Work Schedules. The Washington Post (6/20, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "An Agriculture Department undersecretary has canceled certain alternative work schedules for management officials in St. Louis and Washington and told the affected employees to plan on working a traditional eight-hour, five-day-per-week schedule." The decision by Thomas C. Dorr , Agriculture's undersecretary for rural development, "underscores the tension inside numerous agencies over flexible work schedules. Many agencies provide such arrangements to help employees balance their work and home lives, but political appointees and senior managers often prefer to have workers in the office and available."

Secret Service Agents Perform CPR On Former Treasury Official. The Washington Post (6/20, B1, Montes, 744K) reports that former assistant treasury secretary Curtis Hessler collapsed in Dupont Circle on Saturday morning and was given life-saving treatment by two Secret Service agents, who happened to be driving by. The uniformed agents, "were on routine patrol. Trained to assist presidents and embassy officials, they performed CPR and then followed the ambulance to George Washington University Hospital. A D.C. police officer took Christine Hessler and a friend there."

Justices' Comments On Court's Independence Applauded. Tony Mauro, Supreme Court correspondent for American Lawyer Media and Legal Times, writes in USA Today (6/20, 2.31M) that in this supreme Court term, justices have been "making headlines off the bench, offering comments that, taken together, have made a powerful case for the independence of the court and the judiciary. After years of being passive punching bags for critics, mainly on the right, justices of all stripes are pushing back, making welcome additions to the public debate." Justices' comments "have a consistent theme: This Supreme Court takes a back seat to no other branch, and it is willing to fight for its independence and that of the judiciary as a whole." Mauro concludes, "In the same way that journalists must shed their vaunted neutrality when freedom of the press is under fire, so too should judges get involved when their authority is threatened. To stay independent, judges should act, and speak, independently."

Dionne Says Roberts' Views Could Put Him In Conflict With Scalia. In his Washington Post (6/20, A17, 744K) column, E. J. Dionne writes that in a speech at Georgetown University law school last week, Chief Justice John Roberts "laid out an approach to deciding cases that could disappoint those who like their court decisions bold and ideological. … The chief justice's speech defended the virtues of judicial humility: Justices should try to make the narrowest possible rulings and strive for unanimity, or something close to it." Dionne notes that Roberts's view

DOJ_NMG_0035192

"could bring him into conflict with Justice Antonin Scalia, a fellow conservative who is absolutely certain what the Constitution means and is never afraid to say so." Dionne adds that "if Roberts lives up to his Georgetown principles, he will justify all the votes cast for his confirmation by moderates and liberals. More important, he will win a place in history as the chief justice who ended the judicial wars."

Tierney Criticizes SCOTUS Decision In Fourth Amendment Case. John Tierney writes in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M), "Of all the excuses for weakening the Fourth Amendment, the weirdest was the one offered by Justice Antonin Scalia last week in a Michigan drug case. He wrote the majority opinion allowing police officers to use evidence found in a home even if they entered without following the venerable rule to knock first and announce themselves." Tierney adds, "The number of paramilitary raids has soared in the past two decades as cities, suburbs and small towns have rushed to assemble their very own SWAT teams." Tierney concludes that "thanks to the Supreme Court, they now have less reason to knock first and shoot later."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Fall Amid Inflation Fears. Stocks posted declines yesterday amid fears that persistent inflation would force the Fed to push interest rates too high. The Wall Street Journal (6/20, Browning, 2.11M) reports that the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 72.44 points, to 10942.11, "its ninth decline in 12 sessions." The S&P 500 "fell back into the red for the year. It declined 0.91%, or 11.40 points, to 1240.14." The Nasdaq Composite Index "decreased 0.92%, or 19.53 points."

Cooper Tire Efforts To Avoid Accident Lawsuits Examined. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 7, 3:00, Gibson) reported, "There are at least 31,000 tire-related accidents each year, causing 5,500 serious or fatal injuries. We're going to focus on how investigators for the fourth-largest tire company, Cooper Tire, respond to some of them. Our Phoenix affiliate, KNXV, first broke this story." ABC (L. Stark) added, "In a video deposition, Frank Ruggier testified he trolled the Internet every day for reports of accidents involving tires." Ruggier "did work for several tire companies but primarily for Cooper Tires. Under oath, Frank Ruggier testified that Cooper Tire paid him $75 an hour to go to accident sites, take pictures, collect evidence. If he found tread like this, he took it and gave it to Cooper Tires." Cooper Tires "says its aim is to 'gather and preserve evidence so that the truth can be told.' But a Cooper executive was asked in a deposition involving another accident who, other than company officials, is told about the evidence." Stephen Schroeder, Vice President, Cooper Tires: "I don't know that anybody else is notified." Attorneys "allege Cooper keeps quite about the treads to stymie lawsuits."

Bush Helps GOP Campaign Committees Raise $27 Million For 2006. The debate over the Iraq War continues to be a top issue as the 2006 elections approach. The Washington Post (6/20, A10, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "President Bush suggested last night that Republicans must remain in control of Congress for the country to effectively combat terrorism and keep the economy healthy, speaking at a $27 million fundraiser meant to provide a needed boost to the campaign war chest of congressional Republicans." He "generally avoided the harsh language he used to describe the Democrats at last year's dinner, when he urged support for his Social Security plan." The Post notes, "The infusion of cash could not come at a better time for Republicans, who are defending 35 competitive seats in the November elections, compared with 10 such seats for the Democrats, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. In addition, Democrats this year have been erasing the fundraising advantage the GOP has traditionally held."

The AP (6/20, Raum) quotes Bush saying, ""It is important to have members of the United States Congress who will not raise the white flag of surrender in the war on terror." Bush "criticized proposals, such as are being advocated by some leading Democrats in Congress, for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. 'An early withdrawal would be a defeat for the United States.'"

Santorum Courts Jewish Vote. The Hill (6/20, Allen) reports, "Sen. Rick Santorum is aggressively pursuing support from the Jewish community as his tough November match-up with Democratic state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr. draws closer." In addition to holding an event with former Soviet political dissident Natan Sharansky and leading neoconservative Daniel Pipes, Santorum "surprised colleagues last week when he unsuccessfully tried to amend a defense authorization bill with a measure designed to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. The amendment was rejected after the White House and many senators opposed it on the grounds that it could disrupt U.S.-Iranian negotiations." And in July "he plans to host a 'Jewish Leadership Summit' on Capitol Hill to discuss 'foreign policy and religious-freedom issues.' Invitees include White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), Specter, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Virginia Rep. Eric Cantor, the lone Jewish Republican in the House."

Dean's Brother Urges Democrats To Support Lamont If Lieberman Runs As Independent. Jim Dean, the head of Democracy for America and DNC

DOJ_NMG_0035193

Chairman Howard Dean's brother, called on DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer to support the winner of the Connecticut Democratic senate primary if Sen. Joe Lieberman runs as an Independent. Roll Call (6/20, Duran) reports, "Should Lieberman lose -- the latest polls show him comfortably leading" Democratic challenger Ned Lamont – "and should he continue on as an Independent with the DSCC's backing, the DSCC would lose credibility with many Democratic activists, Dean said." Jim Dean "said that a number of big Democratic donors are unhappy with the DSCC's role, whether overt or behind-the-scenes -- in some Senate primaries." For example, "women's groups openly chided the DSCC for pursuing Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.) as Senate candidates, despite their opposition to abortion rights." And activists "were furious when national Democrats first courted, then pushed aside, Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett as the chosen Democrat to take on Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio)."

McCain Seen As Candidate With Crossover Appeal. The Financial Times (6/20, Sevastopulo) reports, "In a political landscape marked by intense partisan battles," Sen. John McCain "is an anomaly, a man so widely trusted that a recent poll found most Democrats would vote for a candidate he endorsed in the November congressional elections." McCain's "ease in discussing his candidacy is equalled by Hillary Clinton's reluctance even to acknowledge her status as the 'perceived' Democrat contender-in-chief. The man who turned down an invitation to be John Kerry's running-mate two years ago is seen as the prospective Republican candidate with the strongest 'crossover' appeal to Democrat voters. It is perhaps no coincidence that he seems anxious to go head-to-head with Mrs Clinton, a polarising figure whom some Democrats would be reluctant to support. She 'would be very interesting to run against', says Mr McCain. 'First woman nominee, very smart, very tough, very principled.'"

Lack Of Clear Frontrunner Opens Field For Number Of Candidates For 2008. CNN (6/20) on its web site reports a CNN/Harris Interactive poll of 1,001 adult Americans conducted June 1-6 (+/-3%) shows that 47% of respondents "would 'definitely vote against'" both Sen. Hillary Clinton and Sen. John Kerry. But "Clinton had the highest positive number; of those polled, 22 percent said they would 'definitely vote for' her."

Political analyst Bill Schneider on CNN's The Situation Room (6/19) said, "Of the best known possible democratic contenders, only Hillary Clinton has a strong base. 41% of Democrats say they would definitely vote for her. Not even one in four Republicans say they would vote for Rudy Giuliani or John McCain. Nearly half the country says they would definitely not vote for Clinton, John Kerry or Al Gore. More than 60% would never vote for Jeb Bush. His name, Bush. Only a third of voters say they would not vote for Giuliani and McCain. McCain has breadth of support but not a solid base."

Zogby Sees Wal-Mart Shoppers As Latest Key Voting Block. The Hill (6/20, Blake) reports, "In 2004, it was NASCAR dads. Before that, soccer moms. In the upcoming elections, pollster John Zogby says, the parties need look no further than the biggest retail phenomenon in the world -- Wal-Mart -- for this year's elusive group of swing voters." He "said he has found a direct correlation between how often Wal-Mart customers shop there and how reliably conservative they are. While this group voted overwhelmingly Republican in 2004, it is less entrenched than other conservative groups, and Zogby's numbers indicate it is wavering." And the more frequently they shop at Wal-Mart, "the more conservative they've tended to be."

Patronage Charges Continue To Dog Kentucky Governor. The New York Times (6/20, Urbina, 1.19M) reports, "A year ago, after being accused of illegally forcing Democrats out of state Civil Service jobs and giving the jobs to political loyalists," Kentucky Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R), dismissed the charges." Yet "15 indictments later, Mr. Fletcher's administration -- including his self-titled Disciples, accused of being the ringleaders of the patronage scheme -- is still feeling the sting as his approval ratings drop below 30 percent." Supporters have distanced themselves from him and it has "threatened to reverse a tide that Republicans in the state have worked for more than a decade to turn in their favor."

Consultant Says Airbus's Superjumbo Project Should Not Have Been Born. Richard Aboulafia, vice president of analysis for Teal Group Corp., a Washington-based aerospace and defense consultancy, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) that the market isn't taking Airbus's problems in stride, "wiping away much of Airbus parent company European Aeronautic Defense and Space Co.'s gains since it was created six years ago." Aboulafia adds, "The biggest problem for Airbus today, to put it gently, is that its superjumbo should never have been born." Airbus "is racing to deliver something that's a mere sideshow. The delays are simply bitter icing on an unpalatable cake."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Save The SIPP. An editorial in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) says, "The House Appropriations Committee today will take up a recommendation by President Bush to eliminate" the Survey of Income and Program Participation, which is

DOJ_NMG_0035194

"arguably the best source of information on the real-world effect of public programs that help the poor." The SIPP "is used extensively by analysts inside and outside the government," and "costs all of about $32 million a year." Congress should "make it a priority to come up with the full amount needed to save this font of invaluable public information."

WPost Says Virginia Lawmakers Failed To Address Transportation. The Washington Post (6/20, A16, 744K) editorializes, "What was supposed to happen by March 11 in Virginia finally occurred just this past weekend: Exhausted lawmakers in Richmond reached a budget deal, averting the risk of a shutdown in state government operations at the end of this month. … We hope they'll excuse the rest of us for issuing a loud Bronx cheer, for in fact they have failed." Lawmakers failed "to agree on any long-term, reliable funding to improve the transportation network, they also have failed to ensure the sustainability of Virginia's economic boom." Republicans are planning another special session for the summer or early fall, and "there's modest reason at best to think another session will come out better. If it does not, Virginians should use the next election to find more responsible leadership."

Bush Urges Iran To Accept Limits On Enrichment. As President Bush prepares to travel to Vienna for meetings with European leaders, the Washington Post (6/20, A10, Fletcher, 744K) reports the President "said Monday that the package of incentives being offered to Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions is a 'historic opportunity,' and he warned starkly that the alternative for the Islamic nation is increased isolation and crippling economic sanctions." Speaking at the 70th commencement ceremony of the US Merchant Marine Academy, Bush "said Iran's stated desire for a peaceful nuclear power program is 'legitimate,' and one supported by the incentive package from the United States and its allies." Bush is quoted as saying, "We believe the Iranian people should enjoy the benefits of a truly peaceful program to use nuclear reactors to generate electric power," while noting that a nuclear-armed Iran would be a "grave threat to people everywhere."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Henry) referred to "a blunt threat from…Bush on the eve of his trip to Vienna for the European Union summit, where Iran's thirst for nuclear weapons will, of course, be at the top of the agenda." Bush "basically threatened very tough sanctions for Iran if it does not basically take the US historic offer, he called it, to enter into multilateral talks." Fox News' Special Report (6/19, Baier) reported that Bush "had strong words for Iran."

The story got no network TV coverage last night, though approximately three hundred local television newscasts across the nation made some mention of the President's speech. The overwhelming majority of stations briefly mentioned the occasion for Bush's speech and added that he addressed the "threat" from Iran's nuclear technology program. Many of those stations that included more extensive coverage of the speech featured a clip of the president advising the government of Iran to accept the US demand for suspension of uranium enrichment. Very few stations made any mention of the content of the President's speech apart from the portion concerning Iran. Typical of the coverage was WAGA TV Atlanta (6/19, 5 PM) reported, "President Bush urged Iran to accept what he calls a reasonable offer for talks on its nuclear program today. The president also warned that America won't waver in demanding that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment first. The president made the statements at a graduation at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in New York today." With applause audible in the background President Bush was shown saying, "Iran's leaders have a clear choice, we hope they will accept our offer and voluntarily suspend these activities so we can work out an agreement that will bring Iran real benefits." WAGA added, "President Bush went on to say that Iran rejecting the offer for talks would result in U.N. action and sanctions."

WITI TV Milwaukee (6/19, 5 PM) reported, "Bush is…making his voice heard regarding nuclear weapons. During a commencement speech today at the Merchant Marine Academy, the President told graduates 'the world is united' and will make sure Iran doesn't get its hands on nuclear weapons."

WKRN TV Nashville (6/19, 4 PM) reported, "Bush spoke about establishing peace in the Middle East and the accomplishments that have already been made in the region."

USA Today (6/20, Benedetto, 2.31M) says that "to the staff, faculty, midshipmen and friends of the .. Merchant Marine Academy, it was a huge deal, a dream come true — the first time in the service academy's 63-year history that a president accepted an invitation to address the graduates." Bush "underscored the point in his address: 'I hope it's worth the wait,' he quipped when he took the podium Monday, buoyed by cheers that rang out from the 202 graduates and about 5,000 guests who jammed the football bleachers under sunny skies." Long Island Newsday (6/20, Winslow) runs a similar story under the headline "Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory," and says Bush "noted in his address the Merchant Marine Academy's service to the nation over the years, saying it is the only one of the five service academies where even before graduation students are sent into the theater of war -- during their year at sea. That fact means the Kings Point campus is alone among the academies authorized to fly the country's battle standard." Bush's presence, "valedictorian Peter James Radzicki of Mint

DOJ_NMG_0035195

Hill, N.C., said in his speech, 'brings hope and legitimacy to an academy that at times has felt forgotten.'"

The New York Times (6/20, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports "White House aides said the address was in part meant to serve as a table-setter for discussions about the nuclear standoff with Iran that are expected as part of a broader agenda this week at the United States-European Union summit meeting." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "It's in some way teeing up what is going to be a topic of conversation, one of many, at the European Union consultations this week."

USA Today (6/20, Jackson, 2.31M) runs a similar report titled "Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting," in which it says "any specific decisions about Iran are in a holding pattern until Iran decides what to do about a U.S. offer that could lead to U.S.-Iranian talks, White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley says." Hadley "says the annual EU summit covers many topics and is a chance to discuss 'the way forward' with Iran."

Knight Ridder (6/20, Hutcheson) also reports "Iran tops the agenda for Bush's meeting with European Union leaders," adding "government officials and outside experts agree that Bush and his European counterparts now recognize that, despite their differences, they need each other. Sort of like the Rolling Stones, according to John Hulsman, a foreign-policy specialist at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research center. 'Think of Keith Richards when he says to (Mick) Jagger, "This thing is bigger than both of us." That's where we are,' Hulsman said. 'The kids want to save the marriage even though the love is gone.'"

Bush Also Discussed Iran With Putin. The AP (6/20, Riechmann) reports Bush also "discussed Iran with Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday during an 18-minute phone call Putin placed to Bush. 'The presidents agreed on the importance of remaining united in their efforts to press Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and begin negotiations on the incentives package,' said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council."

Bush Urged To Pursue "Grand Bargain" With Iran. Flynt Leverett, a former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council, writes in the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) that "by refusing to consider a 'grand bargain' with Iran -- that is, resolution of Washington's concerns about Tehran's weapons of mass destruction and support for terrorism in return for American security guarantees, an end to sanctions and normalization of diplomatic relations -- the Bush administration is courting failure in its nuclear diplomacy and paving the way for Russia and China to win the larger strategic contest." Iran "has the world's second-largest proven reserves of conventional crude oil, after Saudi Arabia, and the second-largest reserves of natural gas, after Russia. … Although Russian energy companies could not offer quite the same level of expertise as Western firms in the complexities of managing Iran's older oil reservoirs, they could in the next several years help the Islamic Republic develop its newer oil finds and, more significantly, realize its huge potential as a gas exporter.

Wiesel Sounds Alarm About Iran, "Religious Fanaticism." In his Wall Street Journal column (6/20), Frederick Kempe writes, "Nobel peace laureate Elie Wiesel has a simple motive behind the stepped-up pace of his already furious work: foreboding. The world's best-known Holocaust survivor senses, at age 77, a pivotal historic moment, one that poses some of the greatest dangers since Nazi Germany. The shift began 'with the ultimate new weapon,' he says, suicide terrorists deployed globally on behalf of religious fanaticism and without qualms about mass casualties. In his view, it has taken state form with an Iranian president who supports terrorism and is bent on developing nuclear weapons and exterminating Israel." Wiesel "has set in motion a series of Mideast initiatives that will be announced this week in Petra, Jordan, at a gathering of fellow Nobel laureates brought together by him and King Abdullah II. … Though the official program doesn't mention Iran (in deference to its Jordanian hosts), the laureates also will consider a mission to Iran in conjunction with the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency to explore ways to pull Tehran from the nuclear brink. Though Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may not heed the Nobel winners' advice, Mr. Wiesel says, he is unlikely to refuse a meeting."

Rice Again Cautions Pyongyang Against Missile Test. The AP (6/20, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "warned North Korea on Monday it will face consequences if it test-fires a missile thought to be powerful enough to reach the West Coast of the United States. 'It would be a very serious matter and, indeed, a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile,' Rice said amid indications that the North Koreans could launch an intercontinental ballistic missile at any moment." The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Kessler, 744K) adds, "Rice's remarks, made at a news conference with the Spanish foreign minister, are the latest in a series of warnings to Pyongyang not to end a 1999 self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile testing" and that the US is working in concert with allies on the issue. "Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, a close US ally, said in Tokyo yesterday that Japan 'would have to respond harshly' if there was a missile test." Although "US officials have searched for ways to lure North Korea back to the [six-party] talks...Rice suggested that a test would result in a push to bring new sanctions against Pyongyang. UN Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that he has begun preliminary consultations with other Security Council members about a possible resolution. A test 'would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle,' Rice said," adding that any launch would be an "abrogation of obligations."

DOJ_NMG_0035196

The Financial Times (6/20) adds, "In a sign of heightened concern in Washington, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that administration officials, including President George W. Bush, 'have contacted more than a dozen heads of state.'" Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/20, Cooper, Onishi, 1.19M) notes, "Australia, which has diplomatic relations with North Korea, called on the North Korean ambassador to cancel any test and to return immediately to the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. 'North Korea would be gravely mistaken if it thinks that a missile test would improve its bargaining position in the six-party talks,' the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said in a statement. ... 'Such action would be highly provocative.'"

The story was reported by each of the networks in full segments last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/19, story 4, 2:20, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Senior US officials tell ABC News that North Korea appears to have put rocket launchers in place and fueled a missile, final preparations that would be difficult to reverse. Senior US military officials tell ABC News, that if North Korea goes ahead with a missile launch, they don't rule out an attempt to shoot the missile down. The US has a limited missile defense system with interceptors in Alaska and California, designed specifically to deal with the North Korean threat." The US is "urging China to put pressure on North Korea and the US has warned North Korea not to launch the missile." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "It would be taken with utmost seriousness. I think it's taken with utmost seriousness by regional states and by the world."

The CBS Evening News (6/19, story 4, 1:50, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The Pentagon is now moving planes and ships like these configured with special equipment closer to North Korea to track the test firing of a missile with another range to hit the US West Coast. Now fully fueled, the missile could be launched as soon as Wednesday. A potential delivery system for nuclear weapons North Korea has already developed." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "And so it would be a very serious matter, and indeed a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile." Axelrod: "The US is consulting members of the UN Security Council for help dealing with a country that clearly wants attention at a time when Iran seems to be treated as nuclear threat number one." Gov. Richardson: "They're jumpy. And it's a way to send a message that they are a major problem to us, and they want us to deal with their problem. So they are acting like kids."

NBC Nightly News (6/19, story 3, 3:30, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Experts say the Taepo-Dong 2, sitting on a remote launch pad today, is bigger and potentially a direct threat to the United States. … Alarmed, the White House revealed today President Bush has personally called international allies to consult on possible diplomatic steps against North Korea, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned the missile test would amount to dangerous saber-rattling." Secretary Rice: "It would be a very serious matter and indeed a provocative act should North Korea decide to – to launch that missile." Miklaszewski: "Japan's prime minister threatened North Korea with harsh consequences, which could include bilateral economic sanctions. But why would North Korea launch a missile test now? US officials tell NBC News it appears President Kim Jong Il is under increasing pressure from his own generals to stand up to the US and dramatically demonstrate North Korea's military capability. Experts also believe North Korea may be angling to get the same concessions the US is prepared to offer to Iran in exchange for giving up its nuclear weapons program."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/129, Henry) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice today basically issued a stark warning for North Korea, reminding them that they first agreed back in 1999 and reiterated that pledge early in the Bush administration that they would not go through with a test like this."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/19, Ensor) also noted Rice and President Bush "have been talking to Japan, China, South Korea and others about what to do if North Korea, as expected, goes ahead."

USA Today (6/20, Nichols, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told," while the Los Angeles Times (6/20, Spiegel, Demick, 958K) titles its story "US Warns North Korea On Missile Launch."

DOD Activates Missile Defense System. Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/20, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon activated its new US ground-based interceptor missile defense system, and officials announced yesterday that any long-range missile launch by North Korea would be considered a 'provocative act.' Poor weather conditions above where the missile site was located by US intelligence satellites indicates that an immediate launch is unlikely, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity." However, "intelligence officials said preparations have advanced to the point where a launch could take place within several days to a month."

Allen Says President Does Not Have Authority To Attack North Korea Over Test. Sen. George Allen was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/19) if the President has authority to take military action if need be in North Korea. Allen said, "I think that we're going to have all our guard up in the event that this missile is launched, I think our guard is going to be up to see where it goes and who knows, it may fairly be erratic. As far as military action, you mean, if they'd launch this missile, does the president have the right to attack North Korea on it? No, I don't think the president has that authority to do so. Unless it hit our country, then it's -- you're going to have a chance to respond there, but I don't think it's intended to hit our country. I think it's intended to show that we could hit the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0035197

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "Why North Korea would want to increase its isolation and antagonize its few friends like China and South Korea is hard to comprehend. But North Korea-watching is full of such mysteries." The US, "for its part, has reacted sensibly, not wasting a lot of time on diplomatic rigmarole and delivering instead a clear and direct message to North Korea not to proceed with a missile test. We hope that North Korea's next surprise is to respond equally sensibly and cancel whatever plans it has for such a self-destructive move."

McCain Receptive To India Nuclear Deal, Doubts Approval This Year. The Financial Times (6/20, Sevastopulo) interviewed Sen. John McCain, who said Congress "is unlikely to give final approval this year to the Bush administration's civilian nuclear energy deal with India." McCain said Congress "needed to scrutinise the deal rigorously because of the precedent it would set." McCain said, "I am not saying I will oppose it, but I still would like to hear more argument in its favour. I understand our unique relationship with India ... but when you carve out an exemption, then of course you run the risk of others wanting the same exemption." FT adds McCain said approval this year was "unlikely" due to time constraints.

US, Russia Reach Deal On Weapons Of Mass Destruction Program. The Washington Post (6/20, A11, Baker, 744K) reports the United States and Russia "reached a last-minute agreement saving a program to secure or destroy Soviet nuclear warheads, chemical weapons and killer germs, U.S. officials said yesterday, breaking a long logjam and averting a rupture weeks before President Bush travels to St. Petersburg." The program, "a multibillion-dollar effort designed to keep weapons of mass destruction out of the hands of terrorists or rogue states, was set to expire Friday amid a stubborn disagreement over legal provisions. But U.S. and Russian officials cut a deadline deal in Moscow on Friday that will extend the program for seven years and effectively take the issue off the table for Bush's trip." The Cooperative Threat Reduction program "with Russia represents the most expansive disarmament effort in the world and the prospect that it could be halted deeply worried arms-control specialists." Sen. Richard Lugar "hailed the extension but called on Congress to remove other conditions that threaten the program: 'If the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is the number one national security threat facing our country, we cannot permit any delays in our response.'"

Hamas Government Pays Cash To Palestinian Workers. USA Today/AP (6/20, Barzak) reports that in Gaza City, "thousands of Palestinian workers left postal banks carrying three crisp $100 bills Monday, their first pay since March." The payment "was made by the Hamas-led government, which dipped into cash officials carried into Gaza last week to circumvent a freeze on Western aid." Finance Minister Omar Abdel Razek "said there was no way to transport the money to the West Bank, or even convert it to a local currency. He said officials were forced to make cash payments to avoid commercial banks that fear anti-terrorism sanctions." Razek said, "We are paying through the post office because we have some problems with banks because of the direct or indirect threats by the U.S. and Israel." USA adds that last week, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar "hauled $20 million in cash across the Egyptian border into Gaza in suitcases. Another Hamas official followed with $2 million. Hamas said the money came from private donations and Islamic charities."

The New York Times (6/20, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that as Palestinian leaders "began paying overdue salaries with smuggled cash, a top European Union official arrived here on Monday to push forward a new plan aimed at easing the increasingly serious financial crunch among Palestinians." The plan "seeks to sidestep the Palestinian government, led by Hamas, classified by the European Union and the United States as a terrorist organization, while providing $125 million in subsidies for health and utilities, and in payments to poor Palestinians." Benita Ferrero-Waldner, "the European Union's commissioner for external relations, met with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas. While the Israeli and Palestinian leaders have expressed reservations about parts of the temporary plan, both sides said after their meetings with Ms. Ferrero-Waldner that they hoped the plan would go forward."

Bolton Questions Need For UN Peacekeepers In East Timor. The New York Times (6/20, Hoge, 1.19M) reports US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton "questioned the need cited by Secretary General Kofi Annan last week to return peacekeepers to East Timor, where an Australian-led multinational force has ended violence that killed more than 30 people." Bolton said "the current conflict was internal and unrelated to the tiny nation's struggle for independence from Indonesia that had been the basis of an earlier United Nations presence."

DOJ_NMG_0035198

Morocco Cracks Down On Islamist Activists Amid Coup Fears. The Washington Times (6/20, Brandon, 90K) reports police have "arrested more than 500 Islamist activists since late May on accusations that they were planning a coup to replace Morocco's pro-U.S. monarchy with an Islamic state." The arrests "revived fears that the country's largest Islamic movement, Al Adl wa al Ihsane, or Justice and Charity, is preparing to take up arms to fulfill predictions from the group's own Sufi mystics that Morocco's monarchy will fall this year." The group, "which already has Islamized higher education in Morocco, wants to replace the monarchy with an Islamic state and cut all political, cultural and economic relations with the West -- moves that it argues will end poverty and corruption in Morocco."

Bush, Brazil's Da Silva Discuss Trade. The AFP (6/20) reports President Bush "and his Brazilian counterpart Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by telephone about this week's" WTO talks "and mutual trade concerns." The NSC said in a statement, "The two presidents expressed the importance of a successful Doha Round, and noted that their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all. President Lula acknowledged and thanked the president for the leadership he has shown at the WTO. The two presidents also briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy."

The AP (6/20) reports White House spokesman Frederick Jones said, "The two presidents briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy."

Chavez Lines Up Regional Support For UNSC Seat. The Financial Times (6/20, Webb-Vidal, Turner) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "is fighting to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council, in the face of US efforts to derail Venezuela's campaign by lobbying on behalf of Guatemala." The Times says Chavez "has long viewed a seat on the council as a vital part of winning representation for Venezuela – and by extension, he argues, for poorer nations – in international organisations." Latin American "diplomatic heavyweights" including Argentina, whose seat Venezuela seeks to fill, and Brazil "have indicated that they would back Caracas, as have countries farther afield, such as Syria." The Times opines, "Washington's lobbying efforts may be on shaky ground. César Mayoral, Argentina's ambassador to the UN, said on Monday it looked 'very bad for Guatemala,' adding that US support for Guatemala was undermining the Central American country's chances."

US Opposition Said To Have Weakened New UN Human Rights Council. The New York Times (6/20, Wright, 1.19M) reports United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan "spoke Monday at the first meeting of the organization's new Human Rights Council, urging member nations not to engage in the political bickering that paralyzed its predecessor, the Human Rights Commission. … But from the start the council has been weakened by the opposition of the United States, among only four countries that voted against the creation of the body at a General Assembly session in March. The United States, which wanted a smaller body with fewer members, also declined to seek a seat on the council. While many countries have sent foreign ministers to Geneva for the opening sessions of the new body, the American delegation will be led by Warren W. Tichenor, the new United States representative to the United Nations in Geneva."

US, EU To Launch Joint Effort To Protect Intellectual Property Rights. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, Gunter Verheugen vice president of the European Commission for enterprise and industry, Peter Mandelson EU trade commissioner, and US Trade Representative Susan Schwab write in the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M), "The number of counterfeit items seized at European Union borders has increased by more than 1,000%, rising to over 103 million in 2004 from 10 million in 1998. … Today the EU and the US will launch a joint action strategy on the global enforcement of intellectual-property rights." They add, "The competitiveness of European and American industry depends on respect for intellectual property, and so do the health, safety and security of our citizens. … The EU-U.S. joint action is a clear signal that we will work with our trading partners to ensure that their legal commitments on intellectual property are accompanied by a genuine willingness to tackle the problem at their borders, in their courts and on their streets."

Morales Land Reform Proposals Already Stirring Class Conflict. The Washington Post (6/20, A1, Reel, 744K), in a front-page story, reports, "Property in Latin America is more unevenly distributed than anywhere on the planet, and Bolivia is no exception. But this month the country began a project to shuffle ownership rights affecting 20 percent of its land area, giving most of it to the poor. And tensions are starting to boil. Those with land are starting to dig in to protect their turf. Those without it, emboldened by the recent government announcements, are taking over more properties on their own, without government approval." The post goes on to report, "The conflict in Bolivia is firmly rooted in the stark inequities that President Evo Morales says his 'agrarian revolution' is designed to correct. About 90 percent of Bolivian land is owned by the wealthiest 7 percent of the population." Morales "has said much of his nation's land is not being used productively, and he complains that large swaths were given to wealthy elites during the dictatorships of the 1970s. Under his plan, if the government deems land unproductive or obtained illegally, it is subject to confiscation and redistribution."

DOJ_NMG_0035199

Much Of Europe Continues To Rely On Pollution-Producing Coal Plants. The New York Times (6/20, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "Europe likes to think of itself as a place that has moved beyond its sooty industrial past. … But with oil prices soaring and worries rising about the reliability of gas piped from Russia, Europe must depend heavily on that great industrial-age relic, coal: a cheap, plentiful fuel, but one that emits twice the carbon dioxide of natural gas. Coal-fired plants generated half the power in Germany and Britain during the chilly winter just past. While Europeans stand out for their commitment to controlling global warming gases, some of their largest energy companies are reluctant to invest in technologies that could further protect the environment, like equipment in the demonstration plant here that will trap carbon dioxide and pump it into underground storage areas. Only a handful of carbon-free plants are planned in the European Union."

Internet Said To Have Transformative Role In China. In his column for the New York Times (6/20, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "China is not the police state that its leaders sometimes would like it to be; the Communist Party's monopoly on information is crumbling, and its monopoly on power will follow. The Internet is chipping away relentlessly at the Party, for even 30,000 censors can't keep up with 120 million Chinese Netizens. With the Internet, China is developing for the first time in 4,000 years of history a powerful independent institution that offers checks and balances on the emperors. It's not that President Hu Jintao grants these freedoms, for he has arrested dozens of cyberdissidents as well as journalists. But the Internet is just too big and complex for State Security to control, and so the Web is beginning to assume the watchdog role filled by the news media in freer countries."

Independent Media Seen As Advancing Islam's "Reformation." The Wall Street Journal's Bret Stephens (6/20) writes, "There is a perception in the West -- general in Europe but strong also in the U.S. -- that the Reformation of Islam awaits the resolution of a centuries-long Hegelian dialectic. The world moves faster than that. Through wireless connections and satellite dishes, the outside world is filtering into the Middle East, mostly uncensored by regimes or imams. Not everyone likes it, but many do, and the difference between them not only bloodies the Middle East, but also, increasingly, offers it hope."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"A Hollywood Player Who Owns The Game."
"U.S. Pressures North Korea Over Missile."
"Getty Is Prepared To Return 21 Disputed Antiquities To Italy."
"West Hollywood Wants To Legalize Pot Use."
"No Lines At LAX? It's News To These Passengers."
"Troops To Return To New Orleans."

USA Today:
"Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants."
"Revived Taliban Waging 'Full-Blown Insurgency.'"
"Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs."
"More Companies Tell Workers To Silence Cellphones."

New York Times:
"Justices Divided On Protections Over Wetlands."
"Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy."
"Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq."
"For Europe, A Green Self-Image Clashes With A Reliance On Coal."
"A Governor's Troubles Threaten Republicans' Hold On Kentucky."
"In The Hometown Of Wal-Mart, Synagogue Is A Sign Of Growth."

Washington Post:
"Justices Rein In Clean Water Act."
"Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets."
"Pr. George's Takes A Bite Of The Good Life."
"Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle."
"Polygraph Readings Vary Among Agencies."
"Checks And Balance Sheets Of A City's History."

Washington Times:
"U.S. Initiates New Missile Shield."
"Church Regrets, Won't Repent For Gay Bishop."
"Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas."
"Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam."
"More Pandas May Be In Wild Than Estimated."
"Grace Under Pressure."

Detroit Free Press:
"Called To Serve."
"Murder Charges For 3 Soldiers."

DOJ_NMG_0035200

"High Court Muddies Wetlands Rules."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"3 U.S. Soldiers Charged With Murder In Detainees' Deaths."
"Faulty Gauge Drains Lanier."
"'Apprentice' In China Fires Up Equality Debate."
"Tech, IBM Develop Fastest Microchip Yet."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Army-Detainee Murder Charges; Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Saddam Trial; North Korea Missile; TX-Severe Weather; New Orleans Crime; Tire Lawsuits; AZ Wildfire; Supreme Court-Clean Water Act; Supreme Court-Abortion; Episcopalians-Woman Bishop; Doomsday Seed Vault; Mickelson Meltdown.
CBS: Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Military-Kidnapping Training; Army-Detainee Murder Charges; North Korea Missile; NASA-Space Shuttle Launch; TX-Severe Weather; Government-Pension Liabilities; Steelworkers-Uranium Exposure; Seniors-Video Games.
NBC: Iraq-Missing US Soldiers; Saddam Trial; North Korea Missile; TX-Severe Weather; New Orleans Crime; Aborted Al Qaeda Plot; Heatstroke-Athletes; Mickelson Meltdown.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: US Soldiers-Murder Charges; Iraq-Missing Soldiers; New Orleans-National Guard Patrols; AZ-Wildfire.
CBS: Rather-Retirement; Iraq-Japan Troop Withdrawal; Houston-Heavy Rain; Stanley Cup Finals.
NPR: Iraq-Japan Troop Withdrawal; Bush-Iran Nuclear Program; Houston-Heavy Rain; Foreign Stock Markets; North Korea-Missile Test; Stanley Cup Finals; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Departs for Vienna.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LYNNE CHENEY – Speaks about American history and reads to students, Birmingham Civil Rights institute, Birmingham, Ala.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the McCarran-Ferguson Act's insurers' antitrust exemption. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Senate Agriculture Appropriations bill. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank. Acting President James Lambright; Assistant Treasury Secretary Clay Lowrey; James D. McClaskey, president and CEO, Midrex Technologies Inc.; Harry Hayman, Commerce Bank; David Ickert, Air Tractor Inc.; Robert E. Scott, Economic Policy Institute. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Markiup of S.3521, Stop Over Spending Act of 2006. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full committee. Hearing to examine the Rural Development Programs of the USDA. Undersecretary Thomas Dorr; Glenn English, Chief Executive Officer, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association; Jane Halliburton Supervisor, Story County, Iowa; Mary McBride, Executive Vice President Communications and Energy Banking Group, CoBank, Denver. Location: Room 328 Russell.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the Federal Housing Administration. Assistant HUD Secretary Brian Montgomery; William Shear, GAO; Regina Lowrie, Mortgage Bankers Association; Tom Stevens, National Association of Realtors; A.W. Pickel, LeaderOne Financial Corp.; Ira Goldstein, The Reinvestment Fund. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ National Parks Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Park Service's revised draft management policies. Deputy NPS Director Steve Martin; Tom Kiernan, National Parks Conservation Association. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information, and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on UN headquarters renovations. UN Amb. John Bolton; Claudia Rolsett, Foundation for the Defense of Democracies; Anne Bayefsky, Hudson Institute; Thomas Melito, GAO. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at 11 a.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (7 bills): 1) H.Res. 731 - Commending the Patriot Guard Riders for shielding mourning military families from protesters and preserving the memory of fallen service members at funerals; 2) H.R. 5060 - To amend the Federal Financial Assistance Management

DOJ_NMG_0035201

Improvement Act of 1999 to require data with respect to Federal financial assistance to be available for public access in a searchable and user friendly form; 3) H.Res. 867 - Honoring the life and accomplishments of James Cameron; 4) H.R. 4356 - Emergency and Disaster Assistance Fraud Penalty Enhancement Act of 2005; 5) H.Con.Res. 367 - Honoring and praising the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution on the 100th anniversary of being granted its Congressional Charter; 6) H.R. 5228 - To require representatives of governments designated s State Sponsors of Terrorism to disclose to the Attorney General lobbying contacts with legislative branch officials, and for other purposes; 7) H.R. 1285 - To amend the Nursing Relief for Disadvantaged Areas Act of 1999 to remove the limitation for nonimmigrant classification for nurses in health professional shortage areas. H.R. 5631 - Department of Defense Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on DoD force realignments. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federalism and the Census Subcommittee. Hearing on the Community Reinvestment Act. Jon Gutzmann, St. Paul Public Housing Agency; James Riccio, Low-Wage Workers and Working Communities Policy Area; George Moses, National Low Income Housing Coalition; Benson F. ``Buzz'' Roberts, Local Initiatives Support Corporation; Judy Kennedy, National Association of Affordable Housing Lenders. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Disability Assistance and Memorial Affairs Subcommittee and Economic Opportunity Subcommittee. Joint hearing on data security issues in the VA. Ronald Aument, Deputy Under Secretary for Benefits; Jack McCoy, Associate Deputy Under Secretary for Policy and Program Management; Michael Walcoff, Associate Deputy Under Secretary for Field Operations; Thomas Lloyd, Deputy Chief Information Officer; Michael Staley, Assistant Inspector General for Audit, OIG; Stephen Gaskell, Director, OIG; Gregory Wilshusen, GAO; Linda Koontz, GAO. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on S.1003 - Navajo-Hopi Land Settlement Amendments of 2005. BIA Director William Pat Ragsdale; Christopher J. Bavasi, Office of Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation; Ivan Sidney, chairman, Hopi Tribe; Joe Shirley, president, Navajo Nation; Roman Bitsuie, executive director, Navajo-Hopi Land Commission Office. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on consumer privacy in the commercial sector. Meg Whitman, President and CEO, eBay Inc.; Thomas M. Lenard, Senior Vice President for Research, The Progress and Freedom Foundation; Peter Swire, Professor, Moritz College of Law, Ohio State University; Scott Taylor, Chief Privacy Officer, Hewlett-Packard Company; Evan Hendricks, Editor and Publisher, Privacy Times, Cabin John, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASATRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Coast Guard. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

3 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Hearing on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

4 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Middle East and Central Asia Subcommittee. Closed members only briefing on the situation in the Gaza Strip. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: HOMECARE _ The American Association for Homecare holds its annual Washington Legislative Conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. Rep. John Schwarz speaks on H.r. 5513 - Home Oxygen Patient Protection Act. 8:30 a.m. Association Chairman Tom Ryan. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

SMALL BUSINESS _ The National Federation of Independent Business holds its 2006 Small Business Summit. Highlights: 9 a.m. Sen. Michael Enzi. 9:15 a.m. Karl Rove. 9:30 a.m. Sen. Ben Nelson. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

ENERGY EXPO _ 9 a.m. - 6:30 p.m. 9th annual Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency Expo and Forum, co-hosted by the Sustainable Energy Coalition and the House and Senate Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency caucuses. Highlights: 9 a.m. News conference and opening session, with Reps. Mark Udall and Zach Wamp; Sens. Wayne Allard and Byron Dorgan; Alexander Karsner, DOE; Philip Grone, DOD; Thomas Dorr, USDA; Dan Arvizu, National Renewable Energy Laboratory, others. 5 p.m. Reception, with remarks by John Krenicki, CEO GE Energy; and presentation of Lifetime Achievement Award to Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R-NY). Location: Room 345, Cannon.

ENERGY FORECASTS _ 9 a.m. Energy Information Administration head Guy Caruso releases the International Energy Outlook 2006 with forecasts of world energy supply and demand through 2030. Location: CSIS, B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 9 a.m. Panel discussion on the status of religious freedom worldwide as part of Religious Freedom Day on Capitol Hill, hosted by Sen. Rick Santorum, with Sens. Norm Coleman and Sam Brownback, and Reps. Roy Blunt, Todd Akin, Trent Franks, UN Amb. John Bolton, others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

TRADE SANCTIONS _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Washington International Trade Association holds panel discussion on the effectiveness of current U.S. sanctions, as well as the prospect of unilateral sanctions on Iran and Burma. Participants include Human Rights Watch; National Foreign Trade Council; House Interational Relations Committee; others. Location: International Gateway Suite, Reagan Bldg., 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0035202

NUCLEAR POWER-CLIMATE _ 9:30 a.m. The Institute for Energy and Environmental Research holds a briefing to release a report on risks associated with reviving the nuclear power industry as part of efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOGRAPHICS-CIVIL UNREST _ 10 a.m. The Global Health Council holds a discussion about a recent study that finds that demographics affect the risk of civil conflict in nations. Location: Suite 1120, 1111 19th St. NW.

INJURED VETS-SCHOLARSHIP _ 10 a.m. News conference to announce a new scholarship for injured veterans attending the University of Idaho, with Sen. Larry Craig, University President Timothy White, others. Location: Room 418, Russell.

REFUGEE YOUTH-POWELL _ 10 a.m. Retired Gen. Colin Powell, Olympic medalist Joey Cheek, others attend major announcement focusing on the needs of nine million refugee youths. They will also unveil winners of the World Refugee Day poster contest, sponsored by the UN Refugee Agency Goodwill Ambassador Angelina Jolie. Location: National Geographic Society, 1145 17th St. NW.

EMINENT DOMAIN _ 10:30 a.m. The Institute for Justice holds a briefing to release a study showing how the threat of eminent domain abuse has skyrocketed in the U.S. since the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling one year ago this week. Location: Suite 900, 901 N. Glebe Rd., Arlington.

HEALTH SAVINGS ACCOUNTS _ 11 a.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing on health savings accounts with Rep. Eric Cantor, Dan Perrin of the HSA Coalition, others. Location: Room 2237, Rayburn.

ISRAEL-RED CROSS _ 11 a.m. Senator Hillary Clinton, Reps. Steve Israel, Eliot Engel, others join American Friends of Magen David Adom Executive VP Daniel Allen. They're urging that Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's first aid and disaster relief organization, be admitted to the International Red Cross. Location: Senate Swamp.

JUDGES-POLITICS _ 11 a.m. Brookings Institution holds a forum on the politics of the judiciary. Panelists include the co-authors of the Brookings book ``Are Judges Political?" Location: 1775 Massachusetts Ave., NW.

US-CANADA _ 11 a.m. Canadian Ambassador to the US Michael Wilson discusses cooperation between the two ``neighbor nations." Location: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 6th Floor Auditorium; Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center; 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

SECURITY PREPAREDNESS _ 11:30 a.m. The National Council on Readiness and Preparedness holds a news conference with former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore to launch a tour to engage community and private sectors in homeland security preparedness. Location: National Press Club.

FAITH BASED _ 11:45 a.m. The Hudson Institute holds a discussion on the future of government policy on faith-based initiatives and community service, with Audrey Alvarado of the National Council of Nonprofit Associations, former Director Donald Eberly of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Joseph Loconte of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, others. Location: Hudson Institute, 6th floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

BODMAN _ 3:45 a.m. Energy Secretary Bodman speaks at the Edison Electric institute's annual convention. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

FUEL ECONOMY _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Dianne Feinstein, Olympia Snowe, Richard Durbin and lincoln Chafee hold a news conference to announce a bill to close the SUV loophold and raise the average fuel economy for all vehicles. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

REFUGEE PROTECTION _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion with Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey on the US commitment to refugee protection and assistance. Contacts: n/a, 202-675-1761.

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Minority Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

DEMOCRATS-STUDENT AID _ 1 p.m. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, others, join college students to call on Republicans to reverse student aid cuts. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

GONZALES SPEECH _ 1 p.m. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales speaks at U.S. Chamber forum on intellectual property. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

NEW MAGAZINE _ 1 p.m. Announcement of a new progressive publication, with a panel discussion with Kenbnedyt Baer of Democracy, Andrei Cherny of Democracy, Francis Fukuyama of American Interest, Bill Kristol of Weekly Standard and Michael Tomasky of American Prospect. Location: National Press Club.

STEM CELLS _ 1:30 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback, stem cell recipient patients, others, hold a news conference to discuss research progress. Location: Russell Senate Park.

CHAO _ 3 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao participates in a discussion on ``Private, Public and Nongovernmental Organization Leadership" at a Harvard Business School Global Leadership Forum. Location: Reagan Trade Center.

DOJ_NMG_0035203

IRAN _ 3 p.m. The Congressional Progressive Caucus holds a forum on whether an Iran war would help or hurt the US national security. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 3:30 p.m. Congressional Democrats hold a news conference to express support for an increase in the minimum wage. Sens. Edward Kennedy-D-MA, Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-NY, Richard Durbin, D-IL, and Reps. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., David Obey, D-WI, and others participate. Location: Senate Radio and Television Gallery.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0035204

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, June 20, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, June 20, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060620.pdf; dojclips060620.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says (WP)..... 4
Rowley Criticized Over Moussaoui Probe (WP/AP)..... 5
Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent (WT/UPI)..... 6
Judge Upholds Convictions Against Lodi Man In Federal Terror Case (AP) 6
Hayat's Charges Remain The Same (STOCKREC)..... 6
TERROR LAWYER DEMANDS FEDS' 'EAVESDROP' FILES (NYPOST)..... 7
A Standard For Interrogation (WP)..... 7
The ACLU's Tortured Logic On Gitmo (LAT) 8
Closing Time At Guantanamo (WP)..... 9

Homeland Response:

Arab-Americans Sue U.S. Over Re-entry Procedures (NYT)..... 10
Lawsuit Filed Over Screening Of Airline Passengers (AP)..... 11
Terrorist Screening Database Lawsuit (WXYZ-TV) 12
For A Change, A Back Slap At The Airport For The Mayor (NYT) 12
Bloomberg, Often Critical Of Bush, Goes Out Of Way To Greet Him (WNBC-TV.com) 13
U.S. To Buy Anthrax Treatment From HGS (WP) 14
Privacy Matters (WT) 14
The Golden Revolving Door (NYT) 15
Help En Route For New Orleans Police (USAT)..... 16
Troops To Return To New Orleans (LAT) 16
Crime Rising, New Orleans Asks For National Guard (NYT) 18
After Day Of Flooding, Houston Braces For One More (USAT) . 19

War News:

Two Missing U.S. Soldiers Found Dead,Â Iraq Official Says (AP)..... 20
Group Says It Abducted Missing GIs; 3 Americans Charged In Iraqi Deaths (WP) 20
US Very Worried About Missing Soldiers In Iraq: Rice (AFP) 21
Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs (USAT) 21
Group Linked To Al Qaeda In Iraq Says It Kidnapped 2 U.S. Soldiers (LAT)..... 22
Al Qaeda Ally Says It Holds Soldiers (WT/AP) 23
Families Anxiously Await Confirmation Of Missing Soldiers' Status (WP) 24
Senate Democrats Coalesce Around Iraq Plan (AP)..... 25
Senate Democrats Urge Beginning Of An Iraq Pullout This Year, But Avoid A Firm Schedule (NYT)..... 26
Senate Democrats Push Phased Iraq Redeployment (WT)..... 27
For Democrats, A Delicate Balance On Iraq (WP)..... 28
Democrats Shape Plans On Iraq (LAT) 29
Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark (WP)..... 30
Cheney: U.S. Action Averts New Attacks (USAT)..... 30
Japan Plans To Bring Troops Home As Iraqis Take Over (WP) 31
'Coalition Of The Willing' Shrinks In Iraq (FT) 32
Japan To Withdraw Its Troops From Iraq (LAT)..... 32
The Way Out Of Iraq: A Road Map (WP)..... 33
Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq (NYT)..... 34
U.S. To Charge Soldiers In Iraq Detainee Deaths (WT)..... 35
Army Cancels Contract For New Iraqi Prison (NYT)..... 36
Battlefield Conversion Employees Of Contractor Barred From Iraq Resurrect Its Business (WSJ) 37
Prosecution Urges Death For Saddam (USAT)..... 40
Arduous Hussein Trial Winding Up (CSM)..... 40
Iraqi Prosecutor Formally Seeks Death Penalty For Hussein (LAT) 42
Prosecutor Seeks Death For Hussein (WP)..... 43
Prosecutor In Hussein Trial Calls For The Death Penalty (NYT) 43
Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam (WT/AP)..... 45
Iraq, As Seen Through 9 Lives (USAT)..... 45
Culpability Deficit Disorder (WP) 46
Revived Taliban Waging 'full-blown Insurgency' (USAT)..... 47
Afghan Guerrillas Kill 32 With Ties To Legislator (NYT)..... 48
In Tribal Pakistan, A Tide Of Militancy (WP) 49
Pulling No Punches In Push For Navy SEALs (WP)..... 50
Stress Disorder Seen Soaring Among Returning Troops (KRT) 53
Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets (WP) 53
Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy (NYT)55

Corporate Scandals:

U.S. Attorney Asks Black For More Bond Security (WSJ)..... 56
Black Broke Agreement On Bail Bond, U.S. Tells Court (Update4) (BLOOM) 57
Denver Lawyer Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Probe (LAW) 58
Father, Son Plead Guilty To SureWest Fraud (SACBIZ)..... 59

Fed Governor Olson To Head Accounting Board (WSJ) 59
Lone Star Is Cleared In Probe Of KEB Deal (WSJ) 60
Options Timing Raises Concerns Among Insurers (WSJ)..... 61

Criminal Law:

Abramoff May See Delayed Sentence (RC) 62
Hiring Trial Shown Alleged Clout List (CHIT) 63
-page Clout List Is 5,000 Strong (CHIST)..... 64
Ex-agent Testifies To Probe Of Bulger (BOS) 66
Judge Orders FBI To Turn Over Agent's Desperate Letter (BOSH) 66
FBI To Add Agents To Wales Case (SEAPI) 67
Two Officers In Bribery Scheme Plead Guilty (AP)..... 68
Two Ex-officers Plead Guilty (RTD)..... 68
Justices Draw A Line On What Evidence Is Admissible (USAT) 68
Absent Accusers' 911 Calls Ruled Admissible (WP) 69
No Bond For Alleged Mob Figure (CHIT) 70
Ex-Stock Picker Gets Prison Sentence (LAT/AP)..... 71
Judge Sentences Trader Elgindy To More Than 11 Years In Jail (WSJ) 71
Man Gets 17 Years For Investing Scam (MH) 71
Supreme Court Upholds California's Searches Of Parolees (CSM)..... 72
Supreme Court Rules That Parolees Can Be Searched Without Cause (LAW/AP) 73
Court OKs Random Searches Of Parolees (CNN) 73
School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Peephole Films In Women's Rest Room (PPG) 74
Perpetrator Problem: It's Hard To Run Away In Falling Trousers (WSJ) 75

Civil Law:

Court To Address Abortion Restrictions (WP)..... 76
Supreme Court Adds Second Abortion Case To Docket (FINDLAW/AP) 77
Judge Approves Extension For Auto Supplier Delphi To File Reorganization Plan (FINDLAW/AP) 77
Lobbying Bill Stuck In Limbo (RC)..... 78

Civil Rights:

Preferential Hawaiian School Admissions Questioned In Court (FINDLAW/AP) 79
Federal Judge Tosses $240,000 Verdict In Age Bias Lawsuit (LAW)..... 80
S.D. Voters To Decide Fate Of Abortion Ban (AP-Y2)..... 81
Pentagon Lists Homosexuality As Disorder (AP)..... 81
Flag Needs Protection (USAT) 82
Congress Nears Choice: Protect Freedom Or Stoke Anger? (USAT) 83
'A White Individual' (WSJ)..... 83

Antitrust:

Justice Report Highlights Progress In Intellectual Property Protection (INFOWEEK)..... 84
Real Estate System Criticized (WP)..... 85
Justice Dept Won't Challenge Collaborative Labor Database (DOW)..... 86
FTC Signs Off On Internet Legal Referrals (LAW)..... 86
Congress Weighs Rules Of Net Access (CSM) 87
Op-Ed: Don't Be Gun Shy Due To 'Jumping The Gun' Antitrust Fears (LAW) 88
Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid For Denver Firm (AP) 90
Judge Tosses Port Authority Suit (FAIRNM)..... 91
Judge Dismisses Port Authority's Lawsuit Against Oil Companies (AP) 92
High Court Seeks Government View In IPO Underwriter Appeal (MRKTWTCH) 93
Senate Panel Proposes Net User 'bill Of Rights' (CNET) 93
Mittal Says Bid Is Gaining Support (WSJ)..... 94
Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate-Service Unit (WSJ)..... 95
Subsidizing Yesterday's Telephones (LAT) 96

Environment:

Supreme Court Affirms Wetlands Protections (AP-Y2)..... 97
Court Divided Over Wetlands Protections (NYT)..... 98
Supreme Court Splits Over Protecting Wetlands (CSM) 99
Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act (WSJ)..... 101
Justices Rein In Clean Water Act (WP)..... 102
Supreme Court Justices Show Support For Wetlands Protection (LAT) 103
Supreme Court Splits Sharply On Wetlands Protections (LAW)104
Clean Water Act Reach Limited: U.S. Supreme Court Overview (BLOOM) 106
Clean Water At Risk (NYT)..... 107
Parsing The Waters (WSJ)..... 108
Panel Reaches Deal On Drilling Off U.S. Coasts (NYT)..... 109
Scent Of Ballots Is In Air, And Energy Bills Are Blooming (NYT)109
Blame Oil Prices For Those Potholes (USAT) 110
Snowmobile-Friendly Plan For National Parks Rejected (LAT) 111
Restoring Sanity To The Interior (LAT) 112
Tiger, Tiger . . . Lost Forever (WP)..... 112

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Houston County Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Gun Charges (AP) 113
Bridgeport Mayor Admits To Cocaine Use (AP) 113
Workers' Positive Drug Tests Decrease (USAT) 114
Reports Suggest Gain In Fight On Meth Labs (NYT/AP) 115
Meth Activity Down, Two New Reports Show (AP)..... 115
Number Of Meth Labs Closed In Past 2 Years (AP)..... 116
Workplace Drug Use Declines In 2005 (UPI)..... 117
Fewer Failing Drug Tests; Dope Still Most Common (SAEN)... 117
War On Meth Yields Results (KCS) 118
Meth Lab Busts Are Down By 40% In State (LADN) 119
Two Brothers Could Be Charged With Fentanyl Related Death (WXYZ) 120
Siblings May Be Linked To Fentanyl (DN) 120
6 Drug Deaths Reported; Heroin Suspected In 3 (CHIT)..... 121

DOJ_NMG_0035207

Lake Charles Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Supplying Medicine (AP) ... 121
Lab That Tested OU Coach's Hair Has Had Its Share Of Run-ins With Regulators (ANE) ... 121

Immigration:

Immigration Bill Hit Over Work-site Enforcement (WT) ... 124
Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas (WT) ... 125
New Scrutiny Of Illegal Immigrants In Minor Crimes (NYT) ... 126
Seeking A Safer Border Crossing; In D.C., Protest Bricks Put To Work (WSJ) ... 128
Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants (USAT) ... 130
Immigration Consensus (WSJ) ... 130

Tax:

Executive Accused Of Tax Fraud And Witness Intimidation (NYT) ... 131
Key House Lawmaker Reveals Estate Tax Plan (AP-Y2) ... 132
House Republicans May Settle For A Muted Estate-Tax Reduction (WSJ) ... 132

Congress-Administration:

Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere (WP) 133
Rice's Top Deputy To Leave State Department (WP) ... 135
Zoellick To Quit State Department For Goldman (WSJ) ... 136
No. 2 State Department Official Resigns To Join Wall Street Firm (NYT) ... 136
Zoellick Takes Senior Post At Goldman (FT) ... 137
State's Zoellick Resigns (WT) ... 138
Zoellick, State Dept.'s Strategist On Darfur And China, To Resign (LAT) ... 138
Polygraph Test Results Vary Among Agencies (WP) ... 139
Cheney Hearts Reporters (Not Really) (RC) ... 141
Crowded Agenda, But Few Easy Wins For GOP (RC) ... 142
Democrats Look To Keep Minimum Wage On Table (WSJ) ... 143
Police Group Wants McKinney Scuffle Probed (AP-Y2) ... 145
Union Seeks Ethics Probe Of McKinney (HILL) ... 145
Milestone For McCrery (HILL) ... 146
Agriculture Official Has Little Time For Flexible Scheduling (WP) 147
Agents End Up As Drive-By Rescuers To Ex-Federal Official (WP) ... 148
Justices Fight Back (USAT) ... 149
The Chief Justice Sets A Standard (WP) ... 150
The SWAT Syndrome (NYT) ... 151

Other News:

Inflation Fears Hit Wall Street Again As S&P 500 Veers Back Into The Red (WSJ) ... 152
Bush Raises $27 Million For GOP (WP) ... 153
Bush Helps Republicans Raise Cash (WP/AP) ... 153
Santorum Seeks Jewish Vote In His Tough Nov. Match-up (HILL) ... 154
Dean's Brother Raps DSCC Over Stance On Lieberman (RC) 155
McCain Weighs The Chance To Run Again (FT) ... 156
Poll: Clinton Gets High 'no' Vote For 2008 (CNN) ... 158
Weekly Wal-Mart Shoppers Are Midterms' NASCAR Dads (HILL) ... 159
Governor's Troubles Threaten G.O.P. In Kentucky (NYT) ... 160
The Airbus Debacle (WSJ) ... 162
Save Our SIPP (NYT) ... 163
Failure In Richmond (WP) ... 164
Iran Urged To Accept Limits (WP) ... 164
Bush's Visit, Speech Thrill Midshipmen (USAT) ... 165
Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory (NSDY) ... 166
Bush, At Merchant Academy, Warns Iran On Nuclear Program (NYT) ... 167
Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting (USAT) ... 168
Iran Tops Agenda For Bush, European Leaders (KRT) ... 169
Bush Gives Iran An Ultimatum On Uranium (AP) ... 170
The Race For Iran (NYT) ... 171
Elie Wiesel Sounds The Alarm Regarding Iran Nobel Laureate Embarks On A Mission To Combat 'Religious Fanaticism' (WSJ) ... 172
Rice Warns North Korea On Missile Test (AP) ... 173
N. Korea Warned On Testing Missile (WP) ... 174
N Korea Missile Threat A 'provocative Act' (FT) ... 175
Rice Says North Korean Missile Test Would Be 'Provocative Act' (NYT) ... 176
Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told (USAT) ... 177
U.S. Warns North Korea On Missile Launch (LAT) ... 177
N. Korean Threat Activates Shield (WT) ... 179
North Korea's Incredibly Bad Idea (NYT) ... 180
US Congress Cautious On Indian Nuclear Energy (FT) ... 180
U.S., Russia Break Impasse On Plan To Keep Arms From Rogue Users (WP) ... 181
Palestinian Workers Receive Partial Pay (USAT/AP) ... 182
East Timor: U.S. Opposes U.N. Force (NYT) ... 183
Arrests Spark Fears Of Armed Islamist Takeover (WT) ... 183
Bush, Brazil's Lula, Discuss Trade (AFP) ... 184
Bush, Brazil Leader Talk Trade Expansion (AP) ... 184
Venezuela Fights US Bid To Keep It Off UN Panel (FT) ... 184
Annan Cautions Rights Council To Avoid Rifts (NYT) ... 185
Countering Counterfeits (WSJ) ... 185
Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle (WP) ... 186
Europe's Green Image Clashes With Coal Reliance (NYT) ... 188
In China It's * Vs. Netizens (NYT) ... 191
The Bleeding Heart Of Islam (WSJ) ... 192

DOJ_NMG_0035208

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The FBI's mistakes in the investigation of Zacarias Moussaoui extended from headquarters officials who dismissed the threat posed by the al-Qaeda operative down to field agents and even a prominent FBI whistle-blower, according to a government report made public yesterday.

The report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said "numerous systemic problems" within the bureau prevented the FBI from unraveling Moussaoui's role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terror plot when he was arrested a month before the attacks. Moussaoui later became the only person charged in a U.S. courtroom in connection with the attacks. He was sentenced to life in prison last month.

Fine concluded that senior FBI managers failed to move aggressively to gain a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11. But unlike previous public criticisms of the FBI's bungling of the case -- which have focused on senior FBI managers in Washington -- Fine's analysis said there was plenty of blame to go around.

The inspector general said former FBI lawyer Colleen Rowley, who gained fame as a whistle-blower when she pointed out the errors by headquarters, had failed to properly guide agents on what type of search warrant to seek.

He said agents in Minneapolis, who have been hailed for warning supervisors about Moussaoui, rushed to open an intelligence investigation before realizing that they would need a criminal search warrant. The so-called "wall" that existed at the time between intelligence and criminal investigators has been blamed for the failure to examine Moussaoui's belongings until after Sept. 11.

Ultimately, Fine concluded, no FBI policies or procedures were violated in the Moussaoui investigation. "It is important to state that we did not conclude that any FBI employee committed intentional misconduct, or that anyone attempted to deliberately 'sabotage' " the investigation, Fine wrote.

His probe was triggered by a 2002 letter from Rowley to FBI director Robert S. Mueller III, which accused FBI headquarters of deliberately undercutting the Minneapolis agents. Most of the report was released last year; the Moussaoui portion was withheld until the conclusion of his death penalty trial.

In a statement, the FBI emphasized that Fine had "dismissed any instances of intentional wrongdoing by FBI employees or any violation of FBI policies or practices" and found there was no attempt by FBI headquarters "to intentionally thwart the efforts" of Minneapolis agents.

Intelligence and other reforms since Sept. 11, the bureau added, have left the FBI "much better positioned today to detect and prevent terrorism."

Rowley, in an interview yesterday, accepted blame for failing to push FBI headquarters to authorize a search warrant. "When the agents met some roadblocks," she said, "I should have picked up the phone and argued."

But Rowley, who retired from the FBI in 2004 and is now running for a congressional seat in Minnesota, said she was "proud that I had the guts to bring up" the mistakes. "I think it accomplished something," she said.

Moussaoui was arrested in August 2001 on immigration charges in Minnesota, and agents there soon concluded that he was a potential hijacker. But they could not persuade supervisors to seek either a criminal or Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings.

The independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks singled out the FBI's handling of Moussaoui as a key missed opportunity to stop the hijackings. Fine's report, however, concluded that under FBI procedures at the time, persuading a judge to issue a warrant was not a "slam dunk."

The previously released version of Fine's report called the FBI's inability to detect the Sept. 11 plot a "significant failure," finding that a warning about possible flight training by terrorists was mishandled and that the FBI missed five distinct opportunities to identify two of the suicide hijackers.

The FBI's pre-Sept. 11 failures were also a major focus at Moussaoui's recent trial in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

DOJ_NMG_0035209

Prosecutors said that Moussaoui deserved to die because he lied to the FBI and that the plot could have been stopped if he had told agents what he knew. Defense attorneys argued that the FBI ignored numerous warning signs before Sept. 11 and would have failed to act on Moussaoui's information as well.

Jurors would up voting 11 to 1 for death on one of the three counts against Moussaoui. The one holdout juror told The Washington Post that he dismissed the defense argument about the bureau because "the FBI wasn't on trial. Moussaoui was."

Rowley Criticized Over Moussaoui Probe (WP/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The former FBI agent who blew the whistle on the bureau's failings in its pre-Sept. 11 probe of al-Qaida terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui was criticized Monday in a government report for her own role in the case.

Coleen Rowley, a former lawyer in the FBI's Minneapolis field office who is now running for Congress as a Democrat, received both praise and criticism in the report prepared by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The report credits Rowley overall for blowing the whistle on mistakes at FBI headquarters in its failure to aggressively investigate Moussaoui. "Her complaints resulted in an important reassessment of how the FBI handled this matter," it said.

But the report faults Rowley for failing to pursue other investigative avenues, such as a traditional criminal search warrant. Her focus instead was on obtaining a search warrant from a special intelligence court that operates in secret.

"At the outset, she assumed that (the U.S. Attorney's Office) would not support a criminal warrant," the report states. "Contrary to the implication in her letter, which placed the blame for failing to seek a warrant solely on FBI headquarters, she advised the field agents not to seek a criminal warrant."

Rowley, in an interview with The Associated Press, said Monday that she simply advised that seeking a warrant through the intelligence court was a better option. She said agents eventually came up with another idea: deporting Moussaoui, which would have allowed immigration agents to search his belongings.

Moussaoui was already scheduled for deportation when the attacks occurred.

Rowley maintained that, in a pre 9/11 environment, prosecutors demanded an exceedingly high standard before they would ask a judge for a warrant.

"I will stand by that to the day I die," Rowley said.

Moussaoui was arrested in Minnesota on Aug. 15, 2001, on immigration violations after his efforts to obtain flight training drew suspicion. A search warrant of his belongings was not obtained until Sept. 11, after the suicide attacks that claimed nearly 3,000 lives.

At Moussaoui's trial earlier this year, prosecutors convinced a jury that a full investigation of Moussaoui prior to Sept. 11 could have yielded the investigative clues necessary for federal agents to thwart or at least minimize the attacks.

Rowley said she is proud that her memo resulted in the 450-page inspector general report, which provides in many places a stinging assessment of the FBI's handling of terror investigations prior to 9/11.

She disagrees with the report, though, when it concludes that FBI headquarters had a reasonable basis to question a search warrant on Moussaoui. Rowley maintains that Minneapolis had laid out probable cause and said officials at headquarters were simply unwilling to stick their necks out.

Most of the inspector general's report was publicly released last year, but the chapter about Moussaoui was redacted in an effort to protect Moussaoui's right to a fair trial.

Moussaoui was convicted earlier this year of aiding the Sept. 11 plot and sentenced to life in prison. He told jurors on the witness stand that he was to have piloted a fifth plane on Sept. 11 and fly it into the White House.

After the jury decided to spare his life, Moussaoui recanted his testimony and denied any role in 9/11, saying he lied on the stand only because he assumed he had no chance of getting a fair trial. Osama bin Laden also issued an audiotape after the trial in which he denied that Moussaoui was involved in the plot.

The report singles out other individuals at FBI headquarters for sharper criticism than Rowley, including David Frasca, then head of the FBI's radical fundamentalist unit, and his subordinate, Michael Maltbie. The failure of Frasca and Maltbie to heed the Minneapolis bureau's concerns about Moussaoui were a major issue at Moussaoui's trial.

Frasca and Maltbie have since been promoted.

—

On the Net:

Inspector general's report: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/new.htm

Rowley for Congress: http://www.coleenrowley.com

DOJ_NMG_0035210

Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent (WT/UPI)

By United Press International

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

A Justice Department report Monday faulted former FBI agent Coleen Rowley for her handling of a warrant against Zacarias Moussaoui.

Rowley, who is running for Congress in Minnesota, was the FBI agent criticized for her agency's handling of the Moussaoui investigation prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York's World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Moussaoui has been sentenced to life in prison for failing to tell investigators about the plot.

The Minneapolis Star Tribune said the report found no intentional misconduct in the Moussaoui inquiry but faulted Rowley for failing to press for a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings.

Rowley told the Star Tribune she regrets having not gone to FBI lawyers in Washington for the warrant, circumventing the Minneapolis U.S. attorney's office.

Judge Upholds Convictions Against Lodi Man In Federal Terror Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, June 20, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A federal judge on Monday rejected a request to dismiss some of the counts against a Lodi man convicted of supporting terrorists, leaving in place the possible maximum prison sentence of 39 years.

Hamid Hayat, 23, was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

His attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, argued that federal prosecutors were piling on potential prison time by charging three versions of the same lying offense. Each count brings up to eight years in federal prison, while the material support charge carries a potential 15-year sentence.

U.S. District Court Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ruled the three lying charges are different enough to merit the separate convictions.

The first says Hayat lied during a June 3, 2005, conversation with an FBI agent at his home when he claimed that "he never attended a jihadist training camp."

The second and third counts were for statements made the next day during an interrogation at FBI headquarters in Sacramento. Hayat told agents he "never received weapons or other types of jihadist training" and that he "never received training to fight against the United States."

The circumstances of the two interviews were significantly different, Burrell ruled. He said the second and third counts were different because the FBI needed to learn whether Hayat planned to attack the U.S.

Prosecutors said Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan in May 2005 intent on attacking targets that may have included hospitals, banks and grocery stores. His videotaped confession was the heart of the government's case.

"He impaired the ability of the FBI to specifically identify a potential terrorist threat," Burrell said in his 11-page ruling.

Mojaddidi said she and her client were "obviously disappointed. It's just going to be another issue to add on to our motion for a new trial."

A hearing on that motion is scheduled for Nov. 17. No sentencing date has been set.

Hayat's Charges Remain The Same (STOCKREC)

Stockton (CA) Record, June 20, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Convicted terrorist-in-waiting Hamid Hayat of Lodi lost his bid Monday to have at least one of his three counts of lying to the FBI dismissed.

U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ruled that Hayat's three lying convictions are not redundant, because each lie hindered the FBI's investigation of an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in Lodi.

Hayat, who was convicted April 25 of attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004 and lying about it after returning to the United States in 2005, faces up to 39 years in federal prison. His sentencing has been delayed while his attorneys, Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan, prepare to file motions seeking a new trial for the 23-year-old Hayat.

When interviewed by the FBI last June, Hayat denied attending a training camp, receiving weapons training or training to fight a religious war against the United States. A jury found him guilty on all four counts. He faces up to eight years in prison on each of the three lying counts.

DOJ_NMG_0035211

Hayat's father pleaded guilty last month to a single count of lying to federal authorities about money he was smuggling out of the United States on a visit to Pakistan. Umer Hayat, 48, is under house arrest as he waits to be sentenced Aug. 18. As part of his plea deal, prosecutors are not seeking additional prison time.

TERROR LAWYER DEMANDS FEDS' 'EAVESDROP' FILES (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, June 20, 2006

Convicted terror lawyer Lynne Stewart wants to force the feds to reveal whether they used the National Security Agency's secret surveillance program to gain access to her personal phone records.

In papers filed in Manhattan federal court yesterday, Stewart's lawyers asked Judge John Koeltl for access to any phone and Internet records related to her case that the feds might have reviewed without a warrant.

Stewart made her demand in the wake of revelations that President Bush authorized the NSA to collect and maintain a databank of Americans' phone calls since the 9/11 attacks.

Three of the country's largest phone companies - Verizon, AT&T and BellSouth - have reportedly given the NSA access to records of calls made on more than 200 million phones in their systems.

Lawyers for Stewart claim her case may have been compromised if the feds had access to confidential communications under the controversial surveillance program, which they claim is illegal.

Stewart, 66, was convicted in February 2005 of providing material support to terrorists by releasing the statement of a notorious jailed client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman.

Her sentencing was recently postponed to Sept. 15 after she learned that she has breast cancer.

A Standard For Interrogation (WP)

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

IN THE DAYS and weeks after Sept. 11, 2001, senior Bush administration officials decided that harsh interrogation methods were necessary to prevent devastating attacks on the country -- and that such methods could be carefully administered and limited to the most urgent cases. This thinking proved disastrously flawed. Once the administration lifted the strict regulations that long had governed interrogations of foreign detainees, abusive practices spread quickly across the government. Confusion over rules led to the torture not just of senior al-Qaeda leaders but also of common detainees in Afghanistan and Iraq. The damage done to U.S. honor and prestige around the world, and to America's ability to mobilize support for the fight against Islamic extremism, far outweighed any intelligence gathered.

Many Americans may believe that this lesson has been learned and that U.S.-sanctioned abuse is a thing of the past. Far from it. Yes, Congress last year passed the McCain amendment, which prohibits "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of all prisoners in U.S. custody. But it has become increasingly clear that the administration has not accepted that ban as the last word. It still has not renounced the right to subject some detainees to practices such as "waterboarding," or simulated drowning, even though they violate the law. It has yet to adopt clear standards governing the interrogation and treatment of foreign prisoners, or return to full compliance with such treaties as the Geneva Conventions and the Convention Against Torture. Until this situation changes, there will be more of the lawlessness and simple confusion that have led to hundreds of cases of abuse, and dozens of homicides, in Afghanistan, Iraq, Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere.

The administration is seeking to evade the McCain ban in more than one way. The law required that the Army's standard interrogation manual, overridden in 2002, once again govern all questioning of prisoners held in Defense Department facilities. But the Pentagon has prepared a new manual; Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have pushed for it to include a classified annex in which some harsh techniques are again authorized for use against prisoners deemed "enemy combatants."

The administration is also preparing a new directive on detention that would exclude compliance with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which prohibits torture and other cruelty, including "humiliating and degrading treatment." Finally, through a presidential signing statement and questionable legal opinions, the administration is reserving the right to continue using waterboarding and other harsh techniques on prisoners held by the CIA. It argues that the president's power to make war allows him to override congressional restrictions and that waterboarding in some circumstances does not violate the U.S. constitutional prohibition of cruel treatment.

For now, objections from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other sponsors of the amendment have caused the administration to delay issuing the new doctrine and manual. The senators are rightly demanding that there be one set of rules for interrogations, and that they be made public. Congress could build on this foundation if it stipulated by law that the Geneva Conventions' Common Article 3 be applied to all U.S. detention operations -- of both the military and the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0035212

Once abuse is entirely banned, there is no reason for the United States not to return to full observance of the Geneva Conventions, and there are many benefits in doing so. Following the Geneva Conventions does not necessarily mean granting prisoner-of-war status, and the many privileges that come with it, to all detainees; al-Qaeda fighters and other terrorists might legally be excluded from POW status following a tribunal hearing. But returning to Geneva could improve the chances that its provisions against inhumane treatment will be respected by other countries, including those that capture American servicemen.

The Convention Against Torture has been ratified by the Senate and should also bind the United States. In a report last month, the U.N. Committee Against Torture, which oversees the convention, spelled out what that would mean. Secret detention of prisoners in CIA facilities, it said, "constitutes, per se, a violation of the Convention"; so does the "rendition" of suspects to other countries where they might be tortured "without any judicial procedure." To come into compliance, the United States must disclose to the International Committee of the Red Cross the identities of all detainees it is holding and allow monitoring of their treatment. It must also give them access to a judicial process or release them as soon as possible.

All of this the United States should in any case want to do, in its own interest. It should establish one set of rules for questioning all prisoners. Those rules should conform with international treaties and the U.S. Constitution, so that inhumane treatment is at all times forbidden. And the rules should be public, so that the world can see that the United States has returned to its fundamental values.

This is the third in a series of editorials about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. The full series will be available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

The ACLU's Tortured Logic On Gitmo (LAT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

THE "GOTCHA" crowd has fallen on its face again.

In an effort to show that on the Bush administration's evil watch the U.S. military has been systematically mistreating prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan with tacit approval or even outright encouragement from its civilian superiors, the American Civil Liberties Union has been demanding the release of dozens of internal military investigative reports. But the two reports on U.S. detainee policy just released in response to an ACLU lawsuit paint a picture quite the opposite of what the ACLU expected.

Though heavily redacted to remove operational details, the reports (by Brig. Gens. Richard Formica and Charles Jacoby) show a Pentagon open to criticism and change, and determined to guarantee detainees the humane treatment promised by President Bush when the war on terror began.

Genuine instances of abuse are noted, but these are very much the exception and not the rule. The reports indicate that many allegations of abuse simply are unsubstantiated — or that the "victim's" story changes once carefully examined. The most serious criticism is that the administration's detainee policies were not adequately communicated down the chain of command, resulting in confusion on the ground about what treatment was permissible. In addition, there was a lack of training on detainee handling. These points have been corrected.

Predictably, the ACLU has cried "whitewash." But what we are seeing is the refusal by administration critics to see anything other than the "torture narrative" they have constructed.

That "narrative" goes like this: Bush and his war Cabinet opened the door to detainee abuse, first by refusing to accord captured Al Qaeda and Taliban members Geneva Convention rights, and second, by permitting the use of aggressive interrogation techniques. Therefore, says the human rights crowd, Bush and other senior officials are morally — and some say legally — responsible for all of the abuses that have taken place since Sept. 11, 2001. Although this story has become holy writ in liberal circles, it is legally preposterous and logically flawed.

As a matter of law, guilt for war crimes can be imposed up the chain of command only when superiors have ordered the offending conduct or have failed to take appropriate disciplinary measures once they become aware that abusive conduct is taking place. But as these reports demonstrate, allegations of wrongdoing by U.S. forces have been thoroughly investigated and punished when called for. There simply is no rule of "strict liability" that would support the punishment of either military or civilian superior officers or officials without evidence that they ordered or condoned abuses.

The narrative is also flawed because Bush has from the beginning made clear that all individuals captured in the war on terror must be treated humanely. This is the case regardless of their legal status or where they were captured. To the extent that abuses have taken place, there is no reason to believe that granting the detainees prisoner-of-war status would have made a difference. The abuse of inmates at Abu Ghraib occurred because the prison was dysfunctional, not because the inmates were denied classification as POWs.

DOJ_NMG_0035213

The same is true with respect to interrogation methods — clearly the most controversial aspect of the administration's detainee policy. None of the methods authorized by administration officials over time — including standing for long periods, dietary manipulation and sleep interruption — are inherently torture or inhumane treatment. All could, if taken to a sufficient extreme, cross the line. The only way to guarantee that the line is never crossed would be to eschew any method of interrogation that could, in the wrong hands, be taken too far.

However, the only way to protect civilians against a terrorist attack is to obtain intelligence about the enemy's capabilities and plans, so that U.S. forces can act first. Although many experts believe that noncoercive interrogation methods do work (and that harsher methods do not), these experts tend to be vague when it comes to timelines — and it's the timing that matters. This is why U.S. officials turned to stressful interrogation methods in the first place.

To avoid future excesses, the Pentagon has considered scores of recommendations, and most of them have been implemented. All of this compares favorably with actions taken in past conflicts. Americans can justly take pride in their fighting men and women and in the Pentagon's civilian leadership. If the ACLU was hoping to prove otherwise, it failed.

David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey are partners in a Washington law firm and served in the Justice Department under presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Closing Time At Guantanamo (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

We'd better not turn away just yet from the suicides of those three detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The rest of the world clearly isn't ready to move on. And with good reason.

In many newspapers around the globe "Guantanamo" is much more than the name of a beautiful harbor on Cuba's southern coast. It has become shorthand for a whole litany of American excesses in George W. Bush's "global war on terror," the most visible example of how the United States blithely ignores the values of due process and rule of law that it so aggressively preaches, if necessary at the point of a gun.

U.S. officials have portrayed the three men -- Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen, and Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi al-Utaybi and Yasser Talal al-Zahrani of Saudi Arabia -- as irredeemable jihadists whose deaths were an act of war. Ahmed was allegedly a "mid- to high-level al-Qaeda operative," Utaybi a "militant" recruiter for jihad, Zahrani a "front-line" warrior for the Taliban. One State Department official called their deaths by hanging "a good P.R. move," and while those words were quickly disavowed by higher-ups, the general reaction from the U.S. government has been something pretty close to "good riddance."

For all we know, these men might have been the evil miscreants our government says they were. Since our government wouldn't describe whatever evidence it claimed to have against them, it's impossible to tell. I think any reasonable observer would conclude it's also quite possible that these men were clinically depressed after being held for years in steel-mesh cells without legal recourse, without even formal charges, and that they simply sought the only kind of release they could possibly achieve. At least one of them, Ahmed, had been on a hunger strike for most of this year, which would have meant that guards regularly force-fed him through tubes stuck down his nose. What would that do to your state of mind?

The point here isn't to go all bleeding-heart over three men who may well have been the type who gleefully slaughter innocents in the name of a warped religiousness. The point is that when our government mocks transparency and tries to conduct this war of ideas in the shadows, away from prying eyes, we defeat ourselves.

Four journalists -- from the Charlotte Observer, the Miami Herald and the Los Angeles Times -- who happened to be at Guantanamo on other business and whose reporting could have independently confirmed the Pentagon's version of the suicides were unceremoniously put on a plane home last Wednesday. The Pentagon's rationale -- that it was unfair to allow the reporters to stay, because others who wanted to come and cover the story were being turned away -- is one of those masterpieces of faux logic for which Donald Rumsfeld is justly famous. Wouldn't the solution be to let other journalists in, rather than kick those four out?

How silly of me. The White House and the Pentagon have fought tooth and nail to keep the prison camp at Guantanamo cloaked in deepest obscurity. They didn't want to tell us who was being held there. They still give us only the sketchiest information about why individuals are being detained. They just say, basically, "these are bad people," and don't give us the information that would back up that judgment.

DOJ_NMG_0035214

The administration doesn't want to call the detainees prisoners of war, because that would accord them some rights under international law, and it doesn't want to treat them as criminal suspects since that would give them rights under U.S. law. So they remain "enemy combatants" for whom the rules seem to be whatever we decide at any given time.

The president's lament that he can't find countries that will take some of the Guantanamo detainees is, frankly, lame. It may well be true that some of these people are hard to get rid of. But any way you look at it, arbitrary, indefinite detention without formal legal charges is an abandonment of the very ideals this country is supposedly fighting to spread throughout the world. We're long past the point where the U.S. government's clear obligation is to give the detainees a proper day in court, with effective legal representation and access to the evidence against them.

And we're long past the point where the government needs to show the world what's happening at Guantanamo. Instead of hurrying to expel reporters, the Pentagon should invite one and all to witness the orderly, legal process of emptying and shutting down a prison that is doing this nation much more harm than good.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Arab-Americans Sue U.S. Over Re-entry Procedures (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

A group of Muslim and Arab-Americans, frustrated by what they say is the climate of suspicion and fear that dogs their re-entry into the United States from trips abroad, sued the Department of Homeland Security and the F.B.I. yesterday, demanding that the courts protect their civil rights.

The seven main plaintiffs in the class action suit assert that both the United States Congress and the federal government are ignoring the plight of innocent Americans harassed repeatedly because of problems with the terrorist watch list.

The lawsuit, filed in Federal District Court in Chicago by the American Civil Liberties Union, contends that the courts alone can ensure that antiterrorism policies do not repeatedly subject ordinary Americans to detention, questioning, fingerprinting and the like.

"These are law-abiding citizens, and it is too extreme, too offensive," said Harvey Grossman, the legal director for the A.C.L.U.'s Illinois branch, saying that repeated complaints to Homeland Security as well as senators or congressmen barely get a response. "The court is the only forum where these people have a chance to get a hearing."

The lawsuit asserts that repeated border detentions and improper actions of border guards violate the plaintiffs' constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure and their right to travel.

Civil rights lawyers and government officials note that the courts have often struck down efforts to limit the scope of searches or questioning by border agents. But at least one other suit, a New York case involving five Muslim Americans who were detained without explanation after returning from a religious conference in Toronto, is proceeding.

"We will not let anybody into the country until we are sure they are not going to do harm to our citizens and violate our laws; it is that simple," said Bill Anthony, the senior public affairs spokesman for United States Customs and Border Protection. He said Congress had given the agency broad authority to conduct border searches. Mr. Grossman said most case law on border searches hinged on criminal suspects, with extended detention and searches deemed reasonable to catch drug smugglers. His plaintiffs are not outlaws and are always re-admitted eventually — the government could question them at home if needed, he said.

He noted that Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, testifying May 2 before the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not guarantee that inaccuracies on the terrorist watch list would be corrected within the next five years.

The watch list, maintained since 2003 by the Terrorist Screening Center of the F.B.I., had more than 237,000 names in 2005, according to a Homeland Security report. Some 12 agencies can add names, and only the originating agency can remove a name.

Donna A. Bucella, the center's director, said that matches were made every day from the list and that it was an important tool for local law enforcement agencies. "Obviously there have been a lot of people complaining about it, so there must be ways the U.S. government could refine it and make it better," Ms. Bucella said.

The Illinois lawsuit, expanding on one first filed a year ago, focuses on two main issues. First, those whose names resemble ones on the watch list and who find it virtually impossible to get off the list.

DOJ_NMG_0035215

A June 2005 government review found that 42 percent of the calls to the screening center from December 2003 to January 2005 showed that the wrong person was being detained. Second, some people on the list are wrongly categorized as dangerous, resulting in agitated, armed border agents swarming them, the suit claims.

The customs agency says the number of passengers detained for additional checks is relatively small — roughly 2 percent.

The men suing compare their brusque treatment to that in a totalitarian state.

Niaz Anwar, 55, who fled Afghanistan 11 days after the Soviets occupied the country in 1978 and eventually settled near Boston, said he has been detained nine times since April 2004. In April at the Peace Bridge in Buffalo, he said, a border agent asked him his opinion about the Iraqi war and his party affiliation.

"I was thinking that I was in Moscow during Brezhnev's time," Mr. Anwar said.

Mr. Anthony denied that any such questions could have been asked, saying any officer who did risked termination.

Dr. Elie Ramzy Khoury, a 68-year-old Christian who immigrated from Jerusalem in 1963 and has been an American since 1974, said he had been stopped seven times since May 2002 and now avoided even family funerals abroad because he so dreaded the return. When he complained to Homeland Security, he received a letter back two years later explaining how he could board domestic flights, which is not the issue.

"They never tell me what they are looking for nor what they want," Dr. Khoury said. "I've never done anything unlawful or irregular. I'm a practicing physician and I've been criminalized."

Critics believe the government has not recovered from the shock that the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks were moving about freely and has constructed a big, ineffective sieve to try to avoid a repeat.

But the erroneous detentions show intelligence gathering remains poor, Mr. Grossman said. "It is this endless collection of information without any kind of focus, and they allow it to go on and on and on."

Lawsuit Filed Over Screening Of Airline Passengers (AP)

By Jeff Coen

AP, June 20, 2006

CHICAGO - The American Civil Liberties Union has taken legal action on behalf of nine citizens who contend they have been unfairly detained, searched and harassed as they return to the country from trips abroad.

Travelers - mostly those of Middle Eastern and South Asian descent - can often find themselves unnecessarily caught up in security, the ACLU argues.

"We've been receiving complaints from all over the country," said Harvey Grossman of the ACLU of Illinois. "It's apparent that the judiciary needs to review what's going on."

The plaintiffs contend that since the terrorist attacks of 2001, innocent civilians have been routinely harassed by federal officials during security questioning. They are calling for changes in policy at the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center and at U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

"We've taken a lot of time to bring together a broad array of plaintiffs from all over the country who have been stopped at every major airport and border crossing," Grossman said. "They are doctors, a pharmacist, businessmen."

The plaintiffs allege their civil rights have been violated through what they call "highly punitive detentions" and harassment.

"These recurring, unconscionable, and unconstitutional border detentions include unjustified body searches, handcuffing, seizure of personal and business records, the use of handguns as a display of force" and other measures, the suit says. Sometimes, the treatment is embarrassing, and sometimes it's terrifying, according to the document.

The treatment stems from the inclusion of some U.S. citizens in the Terrorist Screening Database, according to the document. Bill Carter, a spokesman for the FBI in Washington, said there would be no comment because of the pending litigation.

According to the ACLU complaint, many citizens are put on the terror-watch database without any explanation, with some inexplicably being listed as armed and dangerous. Others are misidentified because their names are similar to those on the list.

The filing amends a complaint filed last year in Chicago by the ACLU on behalf of Akif Rahman, 34, of Wheaton, Ill. Rahman contended he was stopped by border guards in Detroit after a trip to Canada in May 2005, handcuffed to a chair and questioned for hours while his family waited.

Joining the complaint Monday were Niaz Anwar of the Boston area; Khalid Bhatti, a New York physician; Shimrote Ishaque, a Seattle pharmacist; Elie Khoury, a Detroit physician; Sammy Rehman, a Chicago-area radiologist; and Oussama Jammal, a video producer also from the Chicago suburbs.

Jammal and Anwar each have been detained nine or more times in recent years, the complaint says, causing them to miss flights and meetings during lengthy screenings.

DOJ_NMG_0035216

The ACLU contends the alleged conduct not only violates the civil rights of the defendants, it keeps agents from spending time on actual threats.

"We're not only causing harm in mistreating citizens because of flaws in the system, we're wasting resources," Grossman said.

Terrorist Screening Database Lawsuit (WXYZ-TV)

By Peggy Agar

WXYZ-TV, June 20, 2006

A local doctor, along with 9 others, is suing the government claiming he can't leave town without a huge hassle because his name keeps showing up on a terrorist screening list.

Dr. Elie Khoury has been delivering babies in Detroit for 43 years. He was born in Palestine and said he's treated like a terrorist even though he's an American citizen.

Seven times in the past three years when returning from vacations in Mexico and Australia, he and his wife have been detained and separated from each other and their children.

"They come and take us away, causing lots of embarrassment for us and the children start to cry. They search our bags, once, twice, x-ray it. Between two to three hours every time," said Dr. Khoury.

He and the others bringing the lawsuit against Homeland Security, the FBI, Immigration and Customs said they are detained and questioned for hours. Agents take their books and even watch them go to the bathroom.

"Somebody my age, I have been here 40-some years, I never had any violation of anything except a couple traffic tickets," said Dr. Khoury.

The ACLU said the government's terrorist screening database of 200,000 mistakenly singles out good, law abiding families for unfair searches.

Michael Steinberg, ACLU, said, "It could be a matter of misidentification. They have a name that is similar to someone who, in fact, may be dangerous."

The ACLU said this is also occurring at border crossings like the Ambassador Bridge. They are suing the government in hopes they'll take a closer look at their list and change their policy.

For A Change, A Back Slap At The Airport For The Mayor (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

What a difference a victory makes.

For the last few years, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg has studiously avoided public appearances with President Bush, even managing to stay out of the same picture frame for most of the 2004 Republican National Convention. As a result, Mr. Bloomberg, a Republican, made it harder for his would-be Democratic rivals to link him to an administration unpopular with many New Yorkers.

But yesterday Mr. Bloomberg, now safely ensconced in his second and final term, went to Kennedy International Airport to greet Mr. Bush when he flew in to deliver the commencement address at the Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, on Long Island. In an unusually close encounter, the two men shook hands beside Air Force One, with Mr. Bush slapping Mr. Bloomberg on the back and then later putting both hands on Mr. Bloomberg's shoulders to whisper in his ear.

The trip took no small effort and meant adding a helicopter trip to the schedule so Mr. Bloomberg could be back at City Hall, albeit late, for a bill signing scheduled for 9 a.m. Speaking to reporters later, Mr. Bloomberg, who countered Mr. Bush's Republican red tie with one in Democrat blue, said he went to give a boost to the president, whose approval ratings have been sagging.

"You know, he's going through a rough period," Mr. Bloomberg said, and then added, not quite finishing his sentence, that it was "a nice time" to make such a gesture. In addition, Mr. Bloomberg said, it gave him another opportunity to lobby for more federal Homeland Security financing, since the city's share was cut by 40 percent.

Their two brief chitchats — as the mayor characterized them — lasted just under a minute for the first and less than half that for the second. During the encounter, Mr. Bloomberg gestured forcefully and at one point reached up to clasp the president's hand as it rested on his shoulder. He told reporters that he had welcomed Mr. Bush to New York, took credit for the weather and said "how nice it was of him to come."

He added: "I did thank him for his efforts to make all Homeland Security moneys be distributed based on risk." At the same time, though, he said he expressed disappointment that the total for Homeland Security programs had shrunk.

DOJ_NMG_0035217

He said he told Mr. Bush that the recent reports that in 2003 the authorities were concerned that Al Qaeda planned a chemical attack on the subways showed that New York's share should be larger.

"This goes to show why we deserve to get a larger amount of the Homeland Security budget," he continued in describing his conversation. "If those moneys were distributed totally based on risk, I think that would happen."

Whether the seemingly amiable meeting is the start of a new chapter in their relationship remains to be seen. Mr. Bloomberg, who has been listing to the political left in recent months, made sure to say that he does not agree with everything the president does.

"There's no question that I disagree with this administration on a lot of things," he said. "I've never been reticent to say that, but I still respect the government and I think all New Yorkers do."

Bloomberg, Often Critical Of Bush, Goes Out Of Way To Greet Him (WNBC-TV.com)

WNBC-TV.com, June 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- The handshake and chat between President Bush and Mayor Michael Bloomberg on an airport tarmac Monday might have looked like any other chummy moment between two elected officials, but it was far from ordinary.

It was a surprise move for the Republican mayor, who has been delivering an unrelenting series of attacks on the federal government -- often aimed at the Bush administration and national Republicans. Bloomberg also spent much of his first term skipping public appearances with the president.

Now six months into his second term, Bloomberg has grown increasingly confident to do as he pleases, and say when he disagrees with anyone. The billionaire former Democrat -- sometimes described as fiscally conservative and socially liberal -- has issue-hopped from abortion rights to gun control to scientific research, taking shots at the Bush administration and national Republicans, and occasionally Democrats for good measure.

He has accused the federal government of being "asleep at the wheel" on dealing with illegal gun trafficking, and said some conservatives "simply disregard facts that don't happen to agree with their agenda" on evolution and global warming.

But in the shadow of Air Force One on Monday, the mayor looked downright affectionate with the president as they greeted each other, gripping hands one or two beats longer than a typical handshake. Bloomberg then began yakking away, gesturing animatedly before Bush grabbed his shoulder like an old fraternity buddy.

Bush moved on to speak with someone else, but returned to Bloomberg to pose for more photos. As the president turned to leave, he stopped and leaned in from the side, squeezing Bloomberg's shoulders with both hands. Bush was on his way to speak at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy on Long Island.

Bloomberg later said he went to welcome Bush at Kennedy Airport for several reasons -- including that the president is "going through a rough period" and might appreciate the gesture.

"It's a nice thing to do," Bloomberg said. "There's no question that I disagree with this administration on a lot of things -- I've never been reticent to say that -- but I still respect the government and I think all New Yorkers do and we will always be civil."

Bloomberg said they exchanged pleasantries and that he also thanked Bush for supporting the idea of distributing Homeland Security funds based on threat.

Long Island Republican Rep. Peter King flew to New York with the president aboard Air Force One and said they also discussed homeland security, particularly the city's hard feelings over a recent 40 percent cut in grants.

King said the president told him Bloomberg has "done a great job as mayor," and that he understood lawmakers' concerns about the slashed funding.

Bush and Bloomberg's time together lasted less than two minutes, but was also significant because the mayor mostly avoided such public opportunities throughout his first term.

The two Republicans have met several times but were rarely photographed together -- perhaps because the mayor's advisers had an eye on his upcoming re-election race in 2005. Bush has never been popular in this overwhelmingly Democratic town, and Bloomberg's opponents were salivating over every chance to link him to the national GOP.

When Republicans held their presidential convention here in 2004, Bloomberg steered clear of public events with the president and spent time playing host at parties for gay Republicans and abortion rights supporters.

Weeks later, he did not attend a Bush fundraiser in Manhattan because of what he said were scheduling conflicts. Explaining his dodges that fall, Bloomberg told reporters that he was busy being mayor.

"I can't be at every place the president goes," he said.

But now, with re-election safely behind him, Bloomberg was happy to make time for Bush, in full view of the cameras. Aides said Bloomberg's staff rescheduled a ribbon-cutting event at a cheesecake restaurant in Times Square for later in the day to accommodate the event, and that he flew back to City Hall in a helicopter to make it to a bill-signing ceremony.

DOJ_NMG_0035218

"You can't go every time the president comes to the city, and then rush out there," the mayor said. "I have a job to do as well."

U.S. To Buy Anthrax Treatment From HGS (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Human Genome Sciences Inc. is scheduled to announce today that the federal government has agreed to buy $165 million worth of an experimental treatment for anthrax infection in what will become the 14-year-old Rockville firm's first product sale.

The purchase of 20,000 doses of Abthrax under the government's $5.6 billion Project BioShield program is intended to help the government stockpile a variety of anthrax therapies, including vaccines and drugs such as Abthrax, which would typically be given after exposure to the lethal substance.

The government, which could have purchased 100,000 doses under the BioShield contract, has also been considering another anthrax treatment from Cangene Corp., a Canadian biotech company. For now, federal health officials appear to have settled on Abthrax. Cangene is not expected to be awarded a contract today, according to people briefed on the deal.

HGS must still win approval from the Food and Drug Administration, but Abthrax could be used before that in case of an emergency. The drug was shown to be safe in testing of 105 people, but testing of several hundred more will be required. How much that testing will eat into revenue from the contract is unclear.

Biodefense is a tricky business strategy for biotech firms, particularly because there is no guarantee that such products will be used. While other smaller, early-stage companies are trying to build a business around biodefense, HGS is banking on a series of drugs for lupus, arthritis, hepatitis and cancer, with Abthrax as a bonus.

"The other drugs HGS has in development are more important to the company's story," than Abthrax, said Edward Tenthoff, an analyst with Piper Jaffray. He called the product a "wild card" in the company's pipeline and had not factored it in to his future revenue projections.

HGS executives say the Abthrax deal is important to the firm, as it attempts to transform itself from drug developer to drug seller. Toward that end, the additional revenue, to be paid after the product is delivered and approved in 2008, represents a source of cash to spend on the other products.

"This is another in a series of steps in moving HGS from primarily a discovery company into a commercial company," H. Thomas Watkins, the company's chief executive, said in an interview.

HGS recently signed a partnership deal with Swiss drug giant Novartis AG to finish developing and eventually co-market a new HGS treatment for hepatitis C. The deal could net HGS more than $500 million.

The company also recently completed spinning off its early-stage development operation to narrow its focus and spending on late-stage products. On Thursday, HGS plans to disclose data from key human tests on Lymphostat-B, its potential breakthrough treatment for lupus.

Though the government agreed to purchase 10 grams of Abthrax last year for testing, HGS had largely shelved development activity for the product as it awaited an answer from the government. Watkins said that because the company had no idea whether it would win the contract, HGS scientists worked on Abthrax -- testing it for safety in 105 people -- just enough to provide the government with preliminary data to make a decision.

Products such as Abthrax are part of a three-pronged defense against anthrax attacks. Vaccines can prevent infection, but they typically take several weeks and doses to build up immunity. Antibiotics can kill the anthrax bacteria but aren't effective against toxins released in the body by an anthrax infection. Abthrax prevents those toxins from entering and killing cells.

The government has said it has stockpiled enough antibiotics to treat 40 million people. It has awarded nearly $1 billion to VaxGen Inc., a California company, to deliver 75 million anthrax vaccine doses to protect 25 million people, but the company appears to be least two to three years behind schedule.

Privacy Matters (WT)

By John W. Kropf

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Even if you've never physically set foot outside the United States, your personal information has traveled the globe. Credit card transactions, calls to customer service centers, credit checks and the transcription of medical records are frequently out-sourced to far-flung locations. Personal information knows no national boundary and is no longer attached to any single physical location. Your personal information is now a global business.

DOJ_NMG_0035219

Why should the average citizen care? There are at least a few reasons. What are the rules in other countries on how personal information is used, shared and protected? Is it shared with other commercial or government entities such as the police or the intelligence communities?

There is also the fallibility factor: Humans and machines are not perfect. In the last several years there has been a steady stream of headlines reporting lost or stolen personal information on millions of Americans that was maintained by companies such as ChoicePoint and Bank of America as well as U.S. government agencies.

So how can individuals expect their governments to protect their personal information in a globalized world, where personal information has become a major form of currency for both private industry and government? This is the starting point of Colin J. Bennett and Charles D. Raab's book, "The Governance of Privacy."

Mr. Bennett, a professor at the University of Victoria in Canada, and Mr. Raab, a professor at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland, are both highly regarded authorities in the specialized world of international privacy. The authors' extensive knowledge is evident throughout the book, which offers a useful and wide range of legal, policy and scholarly references.

"The Governance of Privacy" is a well-organized and comprehensive three-part look at the world of global privacy. The first section defines the goals of privacy protection, the second examines the global frameworks that exist to protect it and the third analyzes the effectiveness of those instruments.

Section one broadly identifies the goals of privacy as equity, reduction of risk and trust. Equity may be the most abstract and elusive of the three.

Section two is particularly important because it provides an extensive and complex inventory and analysis of existing global privacy instruments. Privacy laws based on traditional notions of sovereignty and jurisdiction have become obsolete because of the global acceleration of complex technology.

Unlike the law, policy instruments can be quickly developed and implemented to fill the void, and are often better suited to the international arena. Consequently, international privacy frameworks are now composed more of policy than of law.

Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab start at the top of the global hierarchy by examining the transnational privacy policies of international bodies such as the OECD and APEC, as well as the law of the European Union's 1995 Data Directive. Following this examination is a treatment of the national laws, regulations, principles, and data protection authorities who oversee the enforcement of the privacy systems in many countries.

The authors also devote a chapter to an analysis of self-regulatory instruments -- a favored option in the United States -- composed of commitments, codes, standards and seals. Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab incisively recognize that technology itself acts as a policy instrument that can be used to enhance or erode privacy depending on how systems are designed and built.

Section three culminates with an analysis of whether the collection of global frameworks introduced in section two are effectively protecting and promoting privacy. While Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab note the difficulty in measuring the impact of any one framework, they suggest several broad scenarios for the future. In the world of competing privacy frameworks, are we in a race to the top of improved privacy standards, to the bottom of reduced privacy standards, or somewhere else?

The authors' conclusion holds that privacy standards are not monolithic, singularly regressing or progressing. Privacy is too multi-faceted for any simplistic conclusion. Because privacy concerns touch upon many fronts, the authors predict many races to the top and many races to the bottom.

This book is not a basic introduction to privacy for those interested in learning about the area. Rather, "The Governance of Privacy" may be better suited to those with an existing foundation in privacy. For those policy makers, practitioners and academics in the privacy sector, however, this is a must read.

John W. Kropf works for the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office. The views expressed here are his and not those of the Department of Homeland Security or the government.

The Golden Revolving Door (NYT)

The New York Times (opinion), June 20, 2006

It has been just over four years since the Department of Homeland Security was created, and it has hardly covered itself with glory. Katrina was a disaster of a disaster; ports are still far from secure, and chemical plants remain a huge target of opportunity for evildoers. But there's one area in which Homeland Security has excelled beyond anyone's wildest expectations: creating a giant, expensive crop of government-trained consultants and lobbyists.

As Eric Lipton reported in The Times this week, at least 90 top Homeland Security officials have gone through that famous revolving door between the government and the lobbying industry. That's more than two-thirds of the most senior executives from the department's infancy. It is hard to believe that the people running an agency that performs so badly could be so much in demand.

DOJ_NMG_0035220

What they have, of course, are contacts on the inside. The domestic security industry has become an enormous money pot, and the ability to set up a meeting with a former Homeland Security colleague is invaluable. Former Secretary Tom Ridge, whose best-known contributions to homeland security were the color-coded alerts that always seemed to be most alarming just around election time, benefited from a quick appointment to the board of a company that worked with the department while he was boss. The move came complete with stock options that should become very valuable, now that the company is being bought by Lockheed Martin. Three of his five under secretaries have also joined the commercial domestic security game. Even Michael Brown of FEMA fame has started a consulting firm.

If homeland security is the central concern of the Bush administration, one wonders how it managed to create a department in which so many of the top brass were so eager to quit the crusade so soon and cash in so efficiently. But the worst effect of this kind of take-the-money-and-run mentality is on the people left behind. How many of them, having watched others land lucrative jobs as lobbyists, will temper their own judgments about what systems to buy and what consultants to use with an eye on their own private-sector prospects?

To stop this kind of destructive back-scratching, Congress passed a law in 1962 that required former officials to wait a year before lobbying former colleagues. But officials in Homeland Security managed to get a loophole through the Office of Government Ethics in 2004. It divided the department into seven areas, and allowed former employees to lobby all but the one where they worked.

That ruling should be revisited immediately. In the meantime, let's hope Homeland Security hasn't left the airport screening process as ridden with holes as its own ethics rules are.

Help En Route For New Orleans Police (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, June 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The governor of Louisiana plans to send hundreds of state police and National Guardsmen into the city's hurricane-ravaged areas to help local police halt a surge of violence that killed six people over the weekend.

“Things like this should never happen, and I am going to do all I can to stop it,” Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said.

Blanco's spokeswoman, Denise Bottcher, told the Associated Press on Monday night that 100 National Guard members with law enforcement experience and 60 state police officers were to be sent to the city today. Up to 200 more troops will be sent later, Bottcher said.

Mayor Ray Nagin requested the extra help Monday. “We are basically saying we've had enough,” Nagin said. “We've seen too many of our young people go down to violence.”

The state police and troops would patrol the near-vacant neighborhoods badly flooded after Hurricane Katrina hit on Aug. 29, overwhelming the levees and inundating 80% of the city. That would free up city police officers to cover the more densely populated areas, said Nagin, who vowed that residents soon will see “police on almost every corner.”

The weekend death toll included five teens, ages 16 to 19, shot to death in a sport-utility vehicle Saturday. That was followed by the Sunday murder of a 66-year-old man who was stabbed in an argument over beer, police said. Both incidents occurred in areas that saw little or no flooding. The teens died in a neighborhood long plagued with drug-related crime. There have been no arrests.

Police said 53 people have been killed this year in New Orleans. The population of the city is about 200,000, down from more than 450,000 before Katrina. The city's per-capita murder rate has ranked among the nation's highest; in 2004, the city's rate of 56 murders per 100,000 residents ranked it No. 2 in the USA, after Camden, N.J. New Orleans is on roughly the same pace this year.

Last fall, to control the chaos after Katrina, federal troops and officers from police departments nationwide converged on New Orleans. Humvees patrolled city streets and extra teams of law enforcement officers kept New Orleans murder-free for months.

In January, as residents began returning in greater numbers and outside law enforcement left town, violence escalated, and it seems to be worsening. There have been 36 murders since April.

“We're not going to allow hurricane crime to replace Hurricane Katrina,” City Council President Oliver Thomas said Monday. “If we don't have wind knocking us down, we have … murderers shooting us down, and that is unacceptable.”

Troops To Return To New Orleans (LAT)

By Richard Fausset And Ann Simmons, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035221

After a weekend of killings, Louisiana's governor agrees to send the National Guard to help cope with rising crime in an uneasy city.

NEW ORLEANS — Nearly 10 months after Hurricane Katrina, National Guard troops are returning to New Orleans to keep the peace in a city growing increasingly uneasy over its rising tide of crime.

After six deaths over the weekend — including those of five teenagers in one shooting incident — Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco at a news conference Monday to send a contingent of National Guard troops and state troopers.

Blanco agreed to send the reinforcements, with the first 100 of 300 promised troops arriving in the city today. Sixty state troopers also will be deployed.

"The senseless slaying of five teenagers this weekend is shocking," Blanco said in a prepared statement. "I will not tolerate criminal behavior. We must protect our citizens."

The five young men were shot Saturday in an SUV in the historically tough Central City area. Police have speculated that the killings may have been drug-related. No suspects have been arrested.

The next night, a man was stabbed to death during an argument over beer. Nagin called the bloody weekend "our line in the sand."

Federal troops were a common sight in New Orleans after Katrina. At one point, as many as 15,000 patrolled the city to curb its descent into chaos and looting. The last of the troops left in February as the city — and the New Orleans Police Department — got back on its feet.

For some locals, there was a hope that this strange, post-Katrina stub of a city — less populous but also less poor — would be reborn with less of the crime and violence that have marred New Orleans' reputation.

That hope emerged despite the performance of the New Orleans Police Department during Katrina, when some officers were accused of desertion and looting. The department was also criticized for failing to maintain order after the storm.

More recently, police have been struggling with some complicated new problems — and a few that are all too familiar. A criminal element has returned, bringing back turf wars, drugs and deaths. Police have recorded 53 homicides since January. That is half as many as during the same time last year — but the city's population is less than half its pre-Katrina level of 450,000.

The Police Department is down from a pre-Katrina strength of 1,700 officers to an effective force of about 1,370, said Lt. Michael Glasser, the police union president. They are working within a severely compromised justice system saddled with thousands of backlogged criminal trials, a dearth of jurors, and flood-damaged jails.

In addition, officers must deal with issues like house break-ins and squatting in vast and largely depopulated swaths of the city.

City officials said the Guard troops and state police will patrol the depopulated areas until September, freeing up local police to fight crime in more populous areas. The Guard troops will be armed and given police powers, said Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher, who noted that Louisiana remains under a state of emergency.

Majeeda Snead, a clinical professor at Loyola Law School who defends indigent clients in criminal cases, said she thought that residents would welcome the Guard presence even though it might give the impression that the city was under martial law.

"I think that people are really afraid," said Snead, who moved near Loyola University after her home in the New Orleans East neighborhood was flooded.

"They are arming themselves. They feel threatened in their homes. They feel threatened in their cars," said Snead. "Based on that fear, they would not be opposed to a show of force, whether federal, state or local."

New Orleans City Councilwoman Shelley Midura, one of four new City Council members sworn in this month, said that all seven council members supported the call for Guard troops. Police Chief Warren Riley had been proposing a similar plan to state officials long before the weekend's slayings, according to a spokeswoman.

"We have unified leadership at all levels, and we're saying enough is enough," Midura said. The functioning parts of the city, she added, would not feel the military presence.

"I just would not be supporting this if we had the military on the streets of the French Quarter," she said.

It remains to be seen how the plan will play in the hardest-hit neighborhoods, where some residents are trying to rebuild.

Dent Hunter, 27, president of the Oak Island Neighborhood Assn. in devastated New Orleans East, suspected that the Guard would not provide the same level of service as the police.

He said residents were not being treated equally. "We want to be equal," he said. Hunter also said the troops' presence could dissuade other residents from returning.

DOJ_NMG_0035222

Glasser, of the police union, said the move was a temporary fix at best, and many city officials agreed. City Council President Oliver M. Thomas Jr. said the city needed to tackle issues like its blighted public housing complexes, the public school system and police efficacy. Councilwoman Stacy S. Head said officials agreed a curfew for juveniles should be reinstated.

Crime Rising, New Orleans Asks For National Guard (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In a blunt admission that the city could no longer control its growing crime problem, Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked the state on Monday to send National Guard troops to help patrol the streets of New Orleans.

Hours later, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said 100 troops, joined by 60 state police, would be in place as early as Tuesday morning. More are likely to arrive later in the week.

The mayor's plea for help came after five teenagers were shot to death with semiautomatic weapons in the Central City neighborhood while sitting in a sport-utility vehicle Saturday morning. It was the deadliest single shooting attack in the city in 11 years, raising to 53 the number of homicides this year.

In recent weeks, as crime increased and the Police Department struggled to return to its strength from before Hurricane Katrina, many politicians, editorialists and citizens have asked for outside help, a move Mayor Nagin appeared to acknowledge Monday was necessary as he asked for 300 Guard troops.

"We vow to do whatever it takes in the short and long term to make this a safer city," he said, adding at another point during the day, "This is our line in the sand."

The city's Police Department has seemed ineffective at curbing a rise in drug-related violence and looting — which is isolated, for the most part, to poor neighborhoods and sparsely populated areas — even though there are almost as many officers on the force now as there were before Hurricane Katrina, and the city's population of 220,000 is less than half its former size.

Still, the department has not bounced back from the storm. It has suffered sharp budget cuts, is low on supplies like ammunition and continues to wrestle with its tarnished reputation. The police lost control of the city when the levees broke after Hurricane Katrina, and while many officers managed to perform their duties under extraordinary circumstances, more than 200 simply walked away. Others were accused of participating in the mayhem.

Warren J. Riley, the police chief, said he requested additional law enforcement help months ago in anticipation of a summertime population increase, and said the announcement after a weekend of high crime was simply a coincidence.

Chief Riley insisted during a news conference that his force was capable of controlling crime, and that the request did not undermine him or the Police Department. But his inconsistent remarks during the day reflected the difficulty his department has had in recent months.

"With the appropriate resources we will have this city under control," he said, just moments after stating, "This is not a situation where anything is out of control."

The Guard will focus on patrolling the neighborhoods that were most damaged in the flood and that are still largely uninhabited, Chief Riley said. That move would free as many as 300 police officers, who had been patrolling for looters, to concentrate on crime in the heavily populated areas of the city.

He said there would be no National Guard presence in downtown New Orleans, the French Quarter or any other heavily populated area.

Residents in parts of the city with the heaviest damage, like Lakeview and New Orleans East, where the looting of flooded homes has been especially acute, have been asking city officials for more protection for months.

That desire has also been reflected by talk radio hosts and columnists in the local papers.

"Madame Governor, Mr. Mayor, esteemed Legislature and City Council: Get us some protection and get it now," wrote one of the city's most popular columnists, Chris Rose of The Times-Picayune, in a recent column. "Get us some security. Get us the National Guard."

Residents say they have found it difficult to rebuild because supplies and new appliances are stolen as quickly as they are delivered to unoccupied houses in largely vacant neighborhoods.

"It's past time for the Guard to be here," said Larry Dupont, an electrician who lived in Gentilly before the flood destroyed his neighborhood. "I'm fed up with all that New Orleans is not doing to help its people."

Still, others said they resented the militarization of the city, and did not have fond memories of the National Guard's time here immediately after the hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0035223

"When they were here before, it didn't exactly give me a sense of safety," said Kalli Forster, the manager of a boutique in the Uptown section. "It made me feel like I was in a war zone."

Others said the move had sent a frightening message.

"It's basically saying that the people in charge here aren't in control," said Dawn Larsen, a waitress in Uptown.

The five young men who were killed before dawn on Saturday were ages 16 to 19, and, said Chief Riley, three of the five had criminal backgrounds. The three were involved in a drive-by shooting in another part of the city on May 1, the chief said. They were charged with aggravated assault and the possession of a weapon, but the victim and witnesses refused to cooperate and press charges, so they were freed.

The teenagers were gunned down just outside the Central Business District, in an area well known locally as a haven for drug-related activity.

The police were looking for suspects Monday evening.

After Day Of Flooding, Houston Braces For One More (USAT)

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, June 20, 2006

Emergency crews told to rest as rains take brief respite

Houston residents were bracing for another round of torrential rain and flooding after a slow-moving storm dumped more than 10 inches Monday and sent rising waters into homes, business and vehicles.

“The ground is saturated and the bayous are full,” Rusty Cornelius, Harris County Emergency Management coordinator, said as he lamented the forecast for still more rain early today.

“If we get 5 inches of rain, it's going to be a flood. Ten inches and it'll be a major flood.”

Emergency crews had rescued about 300 people by midday Monday when waters began to recede, he said. Most were people trapped in automobiles that had been swept off highways by floodwaters.

The heavy rains fell along a 7- to 8-mile-wide path across the flat, low-lying city. Thunderstorms were moving slowly westward but had not yet left the Houston area.

At Rosie's Club, a bar on Telephone Road in the hard-hit southeastern part of the city, about 2½ feet of water sloshed through the front door, Charlie Esbamiloa said. Esbamiloa was helping to clean up and keep the bar open Monday evening as an occasional drizzle fell.

“Even when the hurricanes came through, we've never had it this bad before,” he said. “It was just the amount of rain that fell so quickly.”

National Guard troops, including some operating heavy equipment, were standing by to help with additional rescue and air search efforts if needed, Cornelius said.

He said the state had provided 25 large-wheeled vehicles capable of traversing high waters, along with two Blackhawk search-and-rescue helicopters and two more helicopters capable of lifting heavy equipment. As many as 200 Guard troops were made available to the city, Cornelius said. U.S. Coast Guard aircraft were also standing by, he said.

When waters began receding Monday afternoon, crews were ordered to rest and prepare to resume rescue efforts if the additional rains arrive as forecast.

Houston Mayor Bill White viewed the city by helicopter and described “block after block after block flooded.”

The University of Houston canceled classes. City officials pleaded with residents not to drive in roadways covered with water.

The Port of Houston was continuing to operate. Hobby Airport in the city's southeast section was shut down for more than two hours. About 50 flights were canceled and others diverted to the city's other airport, Bush Intercontinental. Interstate 10 and other major arteries were flooded during the morning rush hour.

“The good news is we've had no deaths, no major injuries,” Cornelius said.

The city's emergency management agency warned residents to prepare for more rain. The National Weather Service Weather said as much as 5 to 10 inches of additional rain could fall by this morning.

Heavy rains fell elsewhere in the Gulf Coast region. In Sulphur, La., 120 patients were evacuated from a nursing home that was flooded.

WAR NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0035224

Two Missing U.S. Soldiers Found Dead,Â Iraq Official Says (AP)

By Jonathan Finer

AP, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 20--The two U.S. soldiers missing since an attack on a checkpoint last week were found dead near a power plant in Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, according to an Iraqi defense official.

General Abdul Aziz Muhammed, head of operations at Iraqi Ministry of Defense said in a news conference in Baghdad this afternoon that the soldiers had been "barbarically" killed and that there were traces of torture on their bodies.

He offered no further details. U.S. officials could not immediately be reached for comment or confirmation.

The Army yesterday identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. They were attacked at a checkpoint near Yusufiyah. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed in the incident.

More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces had launched a massive search for the army privates. In a statement posted to the Internet yesterday, the insurgent group Al Qaeda in Iraq had claimed to have abducted the soldiers.

Group Says It Abducted Missing GIs; 3 Americans Charged In Iraqi Deaths (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 19 -- More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured villages south of Baghdad on Monday for two soldiers missing since an attack four days ago, as an insurgent group linked to al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed that it had abducted the Army privates.

The claim was made in an Internet posting by the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council and could not be verified. Maj. Todd Breasseale, a Marine spokesman in Baghdad, said that the soldiers' whereabouts remained unknown and that "there is no indication that any reports of a kidnapping are authentic."

The military identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. They were attacked at a checkpoint near Yusufiyah, south of Baghdad. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed in the incident.

Also Monday, the U.S. military said it had charged three American soldiers in the deaths of three detainees May 9 near the Tharthar Canal north of Baghdad. Defense officials said the soldiers allegedly shot three unidentified men of "apparent Middle Eastern descent" shortly after they were taken into U.S. custody.

Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Spec. William B. Hunsaker and Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard -- all of the Army's C Company, 3rd Battalion, 187th Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 101st Airborne Division -- were charged Sunday with numerous offenses, including premeditated murder, attempted murder, conspiracy, communicating a threat and obstructing justice, according to charge sheets released Monday.

The two soldiers and one noncommissioned officer allegedly shot the men at or near the Muthana Chemical Complex, and a senior defense official said the soldiers claimed the men were attempting to flee their custody. The unit commander ordered an inquiry on the day of the deaths, military officials said in a statement released in Iraq. The soldiers are now confined pending a pre-trial hearing.

The soldiers allegedly threatened another soldier while the investigation was underway, each telling Pfc. Bradley L. Mason not to testify against them as a witness, according to the charge sheets. Each said they would kill Mason if he told anyone what happened, according to the charges.

The investigation into the incident is the latest probe involving claims of excessive force by U.S. troops in recent months, most notably the alleged killing of 24 civilians by Marines in Haditha last November.

In a separate case, Italian prosecutors on Monday requested the indictment of a U.S. soldier in the fatal shooting of an Italian intelligence agent in Baghdad in March 2005.

Meanwhile, the claim that two soldiers in Yusufiyah were abducted comes less than two weeks after the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, in a U.S. airstrike north of Baghdad. The organization has issued a series of Internet statements vowing revenge on U.S.-led forces.

Among the questions raised by the attack in Yusufiyah is how three U.S. soldiers became isolated from a larger force. U.S. soldiers generally travel in convoys of at least two Humvees carrying several soldiers, particularly in areas with a known insurgent presence.

DOJ_NMG_0035225

While some news reports have suggested other vehicles and personnel were present during the attack, Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said there were no other U.S. troops present. "Our reporting indicates it was a three-man security team that was attacked," he said.

Troops involved in the hunt for Menchaca and Tucker have searched and cleared 12 villages, killing three insurgents and detaining 34 others, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, said in a statement. Special Operations forces are participating in the hunt, which is being led by the Army's 4th Infantry Division, based in Baghdad. Seven U.S. military personnel have been injured in the search effort.

Fighter jets, dive teams, unmanned drones and soldiers on the ground are involved in the search, Caldwell said. Pilots have flown 280 hours and launched eight air assaults to try to find the missing men, who are members of the 1st Battalion of the 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, Ky.

An Internet message purportedly posted under the name of the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council -- an umbrella organization of insurgent groups including al-Qaeda in Iraq -- claimed the group had apprehended the soldiers and mocked U.S. efforts to find them. It did not name the soldiers or provide any evidence it held them.

"The American army conducted raids campaign with various vehicles and armored vehicle near site of the incident," the statement said, promising more details in the coming days. "But the Army of 'the mightiest state in the world' went back defeated, dragging the robes of shame and disgrace behind it."

In a second statement released Monday, the group claimed to be holding four Russian diplomats abducted in Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood in early June. Another Russian Embassy employee died in the attack. As conditions of the diplomats' release, the group demanded the withdrawal of Russian forces from Chechnya and the release of "our brothers and sisters in Russian prisons."

Witnesses at the scene of the attack in Yusufiyah told the Associated Press they saw two soldiers being directed into vehicles by several masked gunmen, and Iraq's foreign minister said in an interview on CNN that it appeared the soldiers had been kidnapped.

A source in the intelligence wing of Iraq's Interior Ministry, who spoke on the condition that he not be named, also said there was evidence the two men had been abducted, though he said that it was unclear who was responsible.

While cautious in their public remarks following Zarqawi's death, U.S. commanders expressed hope it would undermine the cohesion of the insurgency. Sunni Arab tribal leaders in the restive northern city of Kirkuk held a meeting late Sunday to declare their opposition to al-Qaeda in Iraq, whose attacks have killed at least 75 people there in recent weeks.

In Baghdad Monday, as a comprehensive security crackdown continued, police and soldiers conducting a raid on a suspected insurgent safe house in the southern neighborhood of Saydiyah killed 10 armed men and wounded three others, according to Maj. Gen. Mahmood Abdul Karim of Iraq's Interior Ministry.

A car bomb detonated near police patrolling an intersection north of downtown, killing five police officers and wounding two others. Five civilians were also wounded in the attack, Karim said.

Also Monday, insurgents shot dead four passengers driving in a vehicle in the southern neighborhood of Madain, police said.

US Very Worried About Missing Soldiers In Iraq: Rice (AFP)

AFP, June 20, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that the US government is very worried about two missing soldiers, whose kidnapping in Iraq has been claimed by an Al-Qaeda led group.

"This is obviously a matter of great concern to all of us," Rice said.

"And the American military has made very clear that they are going to do everything possible -- I think they've said air, land and sea -- to try and find them.

"And obviously their safe return is something that everyone will work for, and their safe return is something that everyone will pray for," Rice told reporters following a meeting with Spain's Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos.

The soldiers went missing after they came under attack at a traffic control point near the predominantly Sunni Arab town of Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, on Friday. Another soldier died in the attack.

The US military named the missing soldiers as Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Thomas L. Tucker, 25.

A coalition of armed Sunni Arab factions led by Al-Qaeda's Iraq branch claimed responsibility for the abduction of the two soldiers in a statement posted on the Internet Monday.

Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0035226

By César G. Soriano
USA Today, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — An Internet posting Monday claimed that an Iraqi insurgent group had captured two U.S. soldiers who are listed as missing after an attack on their checkpoint last week.

More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are involved in a search for the soldiers, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a military spokesman, said in a statement. “We are using every means at our disposal,” he said.

An Internet statement attributed to the Mujahedin Shura Council said the soldiers had been captured. The message could not be authenticated. The council is an umbrella group of several Sunni insurgency groups, including al-Qaeda in Iraq.

The soldiers are officially listed as “duty status and whereabouts unknown.”

The missing soldiers are Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Spc. David Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., died in the checkpoint attack, Caldwell said.

All three were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment of 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault), based at Fort Campbell in Kentucky.

The soldiers were manning a checkpoint Friday near Youssifiyah, south of Baghdad, when their position came under attack.

Belinda Alcala, Menchaca's mother-in-law, described him as “a wonderful kid, a wonderful man.”

In a statement, Tucker's parents described their son as a dedicated soldier who enjoyed playing the piano.

He enlisted because “he wanted to do something positive,” they said.

They also released a copy of a phone message that Tucker left for them in February and that is still on their answering machine. In it, he told his family that he loves them. “I'll be back before you know it,” he said.

He also asked his family to be proud of him. “Everything's going to be OK,” he said. “I love you guys, and I know you love me.”

The operation to find the soldiers involves helicopters, fighter jets, boats and unmanned Predator aircraft, Caldwell said.

Since launching the search, coalition forces have killed three suspected insurgents and detained 34, the military said. Seven coalition soldiers have been wounded.

Group Linked To Al Qaeda In Iraq Says It Kidnapped 2 U.S. Soldiers (LAT)

By Louise Roug
The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — A group affiliated with Al Qaeda in Iraq on Monday claimed without offering proof that it had kidnapped two American soldiers, as thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops looked for the missing men in an area known as "the triangle of death."

Seven U.S. troops were wounded during the massive search, according to the top military spokesman in Baghdad, though the cause of the injuries was not immediately announced.

The two soldiers disappeared Friday after gunmen attacked a checkpoint near Yousifiya, southwest of the capital. They were identified as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore.

A third soldier, identified as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed during the fight at the checkpoint. All three soldiers were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade of the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division.

"Words cannot express the sadness we feel at the loss of Spc. Babineau and the uncertainty the families of Pfc. Menchaca and Pfc. Tucker must be experiencing," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said in a statement. "Our deepest sympathy goes out to their families."

More than 8,000 American and Iraqi security personnel were looking for the missing soldiers. Three teams of divers searched the nearby Euphrates River. The military used planes, boats, helicopters and unmanned drones "to ensure the most thorough search possible on the ground, in the air and in the water," Caldwell said. "We are using every means at our disposal."

Security forces killed three suspected rebels and detained 34 others during the operation, in which troops surrounded and searched a dozen villages southwest of Baghdad.

The area around Yousifiya, which is dotted by farms, date palms and orange trees, is a rebel stronghold widely known as the "triangle of death." U.S. soldiers often come under attack in the town, and there is no functioning police force after insurgents twice bombed the police department. Residents say that slayings are commonplace and that many families have fled the area because of the violence.

Mayor Muayed Fadil, 50, said Iraqi soldiers provided some protection for government offices downtown but that rebels ran rampant on the outskirts of Yousifiya.

DOJ_NMG_0035227

Checkpoints and American patrols do little to counter the violence, he said. Fearful residents have stopped talking to their neighbors and are instead hiding inside their houses.

"Life is limited in Yousifiya because of terrorism," Fadil said. "People are living in horror at night because of the terrorist cells."

Mujahedin Shura Council in Iraq, a group linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq, posted a statement on the Internet claiming responsibility for what it said was a kidnapping but offered no proof, such as pictures of the soldiers or their identification cards.

"The American Army, using different kinds of machines and armor, raided the area where the incident took place but the army of 'the world's strongest country' returned without success, humiliated," the statement said.

Another U.S. soldier has been long missing in Iraq. Sgt. Keith M. Maupin of Batavia, Ohio, was captured during an ambush in April 9, 2004. About three months later, a videotape was released of a man being shot in the back of the head and falling into a shallow grave, with a narrator saying the man was Maupin. But the victim's face was not shown.

While troops searched the rural area southwest of Baghdad on Monday, violence continued elsewhere despite a recent security crackdown.

A car bomb targeted an Iraqi army checkpoint in Baghdad, killing five and injuring nine others, according to authorities. Another car bomb targeted special police commandos in the southwestern part of the city, killing two officers and three civilians and injuring five other people. A third car bomb exploded minutes later in a market in a southern neighborhood, killing six civilians and injuring 20.

A roadside bomb southwest of the city of Hillah killed a civilian and injured as many as eight others, local police said.

At a news conference, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani said the government was trying to improve safety measures in the capital. Thousands of security troops have flooded Baghdad and set up ubiquitous checkpoints, which many Iraqis say do little to improve security while trapping drivers in snarling traffic.

"We feel the suffering of the people, but I hope they will forgive us for the delay the plan is causing for them," Bolani said.

He added that the government had sent a delegation to solve troubles in the southern city of Basra, where rivalry among various Shiite Muslim groups had recently led to increased violence.

President Jalal Talabani and British Defense Secretary Des Browne also held a news conference, during which Browne talked of heightened security measures in the southern city. Britain has about 7,200 troops in Iraq based in and around Basra.

"We do not underestimate the challenge that we face together here," Browne said. "We'll stay here as long as there is a job to be done, and as long as the Iraqi government wants us to support them."

In the disputed northern city of Kirkuk, security forces flooded roads and set up a number of new checkpoints, local officials said. Iraqi police also distributed pictures of suspected insurgents believed to have ties to Al Qaeda in Iraq, promising a $2,500 reward for information leading to the arrest of any of five top rebels.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military continued a sweep in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, where hundreds of American and Iraqi troops moved into the eastern section of the violent city in search of guerrillas, the Associated Press reported from the scene. The operation is intended to install U.S. and Iraqi troops in an area where insurgents have frequently launched attacks.

Al Qaeda Ally Says It Holds Soldiers (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- An al Qaeda-linked group said yesterday that it had kidnapped two American soldiers who were reported missing south of Baghdad, where 8,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops were conducting a massive search.

Seven U.S. servicemen have been wounded during the search, said U.S. spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell. He said the military had killed three suspected insurgents and detained 34 others during the operation.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella group that includes al Qaeda in Iraq, said it was holding the two privates -- one from Texas and the other from Oregon -- as well as four Russian diplomats kidnapped June 3 in Baghdad. It also claimed to have killed a fifth Russian.

The message appeared on an Islamic Web site known for publishing messages from insurgent groups in Iraq. U.S. officials have said they could not confirm what had happened to the two soldiers, who disappeared Friday evening after an attack that killed a third U.S. soldier.

The Web posting said: "Your brothers in the military wing of the Mujahedeen Shura Council kidnapped the two American soldiers near Youssifiya."

It did not identify the soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0035228

The Defense Department identified the missing men as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore., and the dead soldier as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass. They were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault), Fort Campbell, Ky.

Gunmen kidnapped the four Russian diplomats near their embassy in Baghdad's Mansour district after firing on their car and killing an embassy employee.

"God has enabled the lions of monotheism to arrest four Russian diplomats in Iraq and kill the fifth," said a statement from the group on the same Web site.

It condemned Russian actions in Chechnya and criticized its presence in Baghdad.

"The Russian government sends its diplomats to Iraq to support the crusaders' project, led by America, and to provide international backing and legitimacy to the exhausted Iraqi government."

The Mujahedeen Shura Council is a grouping of several insurgent forces, including al Qaeda in Iraq. Abu Musab Zarqawi, who was killed this month, helped create the council in January, apparently to give an Iraqi face to his movement, made up mainly of foreign fighters.

Fighter jets, helicopters, unmanned drones, boats and dive teams are being used to search for the two men, Gen. Caldwell said. He did not comment on whether they had been seized by terrorists, saying only that they were listed as "duty status and whereabouts unknown."

Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said the soldiers appeared to have been taken prisoner.

Ahmed Khalaf Falah, a farmer who said he witnessed the abduction, told the Associated Press that the two soldiers had been captured by seven masked, heavily armed gunmen during the attack near Youssifiya, about 12 miles south of Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi troops, meanwhile, pushed into an eastern section of the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi in a campaign to gradually bolster their presence in city neighborhoods that for months largely have been under insurgent control.

A U.S. gunship fired on suspected insurgents early in the operation, U.S. commanders said. Six men were thought to have been killed, and sporadic exchanges of gunfire echoed throughout the neighborhood in the morning. No U.S. casualties were initially reported.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, meanwhile, said Iraqi forces will take over security next month in a southern province where Japanese troops are based. The decision, announced after Mr. al-Maliki met with Japan's ambassador, does not necessarily mean that any coalition forces will be withdrawn from Muthanna province.

Families Anxiously Await Confirmation Of Missing Soldiers' Status (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

AUSTIN, June 19 -- About a week ago, Army Pfc. Kristian Menchaca called his mother in South Texas and said he was exhausted, having just finished an overnight shift working a vehicle checkpoint in Iraq. It was tough, tense and dangerous work, he said.

Working that same duty on Friday, Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, were apparently kidnapped following an attack by Iraqi insurgents outside the town of Yusufiyah, south of Baghdad. The Pentagon said a third soldier working with Menchaca and Tucker, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed.

Menchaca's mother, Maria Guadalupe Vasquez, said in a telephone interview from her home in Brownsville: "The sergeants came and told us he was missing and that they were searching land and sea for him. They told us to pray. They said we just needed to pray for him."

As Vasquez and Tucker's family in Madras, Ore., awaited word Monday on the whereabouts of their sons, a message was posted on the Internet saying the soldiers were abducted by an Islamic group. A Marine spokesman in Baghdad had not been able to verify the authenticity of the statement, which was purportedly posted by al-Qaeda in Iraq under the name of the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups.

A representative of the Tucker family referred calls to the public affairs office of the Oregon National Guard. Phone calls to a spokeswoman there were not returned.

Menchaca's wife, Christina, 18, was in Big Spring, Tex., with her family but was not taking phone calls, a family representative said.

The couple married last September and had met through Christina's brother, who is also in the Army, Vasquez said. Menchaca was deployed to Iraq a month after he was married.

"I'd like to know her, but she hasn't come down here yet. I've only seen her picture," Vasquez said of her daughter-in-law. "But we spoke by phone and she's very worried."

DOJ_NMG_0035229

Vasquez said her son attended schools in Brownsville and nearby San Benito but dropped out of high school. He moved to Houston, where his older brother lives, and worked as a cashier at a fast-food restaurant. He also took adult education classes and completed his GED, she said. Vasquez said her son joined the Army because he wanted to further his studies and eventually become a U.S. Customs and Border Protection agent.

Vasquez said she last saw her son in April, when he was in Brownsville on a 10-day leave following his first tour in Iraq. "He was very changed," she said.

"He talked about killing people. He couldn't sleep. He came traumatized," she said. "I was scared."

Two weeks ago, he called his mother asking her to send him Cheetos, insect repellent and cleaning wipes. She was about to ship the items when the sergeants came to her home Friday afternoon. "I have it all here," Vasquez said. "Then this happened."

Senate Democrats Coalesce Around Iraq Plan (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 20, 2006

Senate Democrats coalesced Monday around a proposal urging the Bush administration to start pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq by year's end, brushing aside calls by some in the party for a firm withdrawal timetable.

"Three-and-a-half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent," said Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich., who helped write the nonbinding resolution that quickly drew criticism from Republican leaders.

"Let me be clear: Retreat is not a solution," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said, chastising Democrats for espousing a "cut-and-run" strategy that "threatens our national security and poses unacceptable risks to Americans."

The Senate is to take up the resolution Tuesday and vote on it before Friday as debate on Iraq spills over into a second week on Capitol Hill, less than five months before midterm elections that will decide whether Democrats or Republicans control Congress.

Last week, the GOP-controlled Senate and House soundly rejected timetables for pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq, back-to-back votes that forced lawmakers in both parties to go on record on a major issue in re-election campaigns nationwide.

As the U.S. death toll and war spending continue to climb, polls show the public increasingly uncomfortable with the direction of the conflict, which began in spring 2003 when the United States invaded Iraq to topple dictator Saddam Hussein.

Democrats in Congress have long been divided over the way ahead in Iraq.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., failed to get her caucus to rally around one position last week. Senate Democrats also spent the week trying to come up with a "consensus" position, and it appeared they had largely succeeded.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada backs the resolution and his aides say they expect 38 to 40 Democrats and a few Republicans to vote for the symbolic statement. However, they don't expect to get the 51 votes needed to attach the resolution to an annual military bill.

The resolution would urge — but not require — the administration to begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces" in 2006 and, by year's end, give Congress its plan for "continued redeployment" thereafter.

Additionally, the resolution calls for American troops, which have been focused on combat operations in Iraq, to more quickly switch to "a limited mission of training and logistic support of Iraqi security forces, protection of U.S. personnel and facilities, and targeting counterterrorism activities."

It also maps out steps Senate Democrats say the fledgling Iraqi government must take to lay the foundation for a successful democracy and calls for an international conference to help Iraq overcome problems it faces.

Even as the GOP leadership criticized the resolution, Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, called it "a very serious-minded approach." He declined to endorse it but nonetheless promised to give it careful consideration.

Three Democrats distanced themselves from the resolution.

Seeking a stronger position on Iraq, John Kerry of Massachusetts, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Barbara Boxer of California intend to push for a vote on their own proposal.

It would require the administration to withdraw all combat troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007, leaving in place only U.S. troops essential to training Iraqi security forces, conducting counterterrorism operations and protecting U.S. personnel and facilities.

"A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country," Kerry and Feingold, two Democrats eying potential presidential candidacies in 2008, said in a joint statement.

DOJ_NMG_0035230

Their proposal is expected to be rejected overwhelmingly.

Aside from Iraq, other fights are brewing as the Senate works on the annual military bill.

Rankling Republicans, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., on Monday proposed attaching long-sought legislation to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour in three steps.

Frist objected and then countered by seeking to attach to the bill legislation that would make it illegal in most cases to transport minors seeking abortions across state lines to circumvent laws in some states requiring parental notification.

Votes on those proposals could occur this week.

Senate Democrats Urge Beginning Of An Iraq Pullout This Year, But Avoid A Firm Schedule (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Trying to bridge party divisions on the eve of a Senate debate, leading Democrats called Monday for American troops to begin pulling out of Iraq this year. They avoided setting a firm timetable for withdrawal but argued that the Bush administration's open-ended commitment to the war would only prevent Iraqis from moving forward on their own.

Coming the week after partisan and often angry House debate over the war, the Senate proposal, a nonbinding resolution, was carefully worded to deflect any accusations that the Democrats were "cutting and running," as their position has been depicted by Republicans. The Democrats behind the measure did not even use the term "withdrawal," and talked about how to guarantee "success" for Iraq, not about any failures of the war.

"The administration's policy to date — that we'll be there for as long as Iraq needs us — will result in Iraq's depending upon us longer," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, who has been designated by the Democratic leadership to present the party's strategy on Iraq. "Three and a half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent."

The resolution was cobbled together by moderate Democrats trying to smooth over differences within the party. The minority leadership has tried to distance itself from a proposal by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a mandatory deadline for American combat troops to be out of Iraq by the end of this year, a limit that Mr. Kerry modified only marginally on Monday. Some Republican lawmakers and the White House pointed to that proposal last week in attacking Democrats as inconsistent and weak on national security.

Mr. Levin's resolution did nothing to stop the Republicans' ridicule, with Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky dismissing it in a Fox News interview as "cut and jog."

"The last thing you want to do when you have the terrorists on the run is give them notice that you're going to leave," said Mr. McConnell, the Senate's No. 2 Republican.

President Bush spoke similarly at a Republican fund-raiser here Monday night, asserting: "An early withdrawal would embolden the terrorists. An early withdrawal would embolden Al Qaeda and bin Laden. There will be no early withdrawal so long as we run the Congress and occupy the White House."

The Democrats said their measure, which will be debated this week as an amendment to a military policy bill, built on a resolution that passed the Senate last year with wide support from Republicans. Democrats said they hoped this earlier resolution, which pledged that 2006 would be a year of "significant transition" toward an independent Iraq, would be followed by some Republican backing for the latest one.

But Senator John W. Warner, who as chairman of the Armed Services Committee was crucial to the adoption of last year's resolution, did not stand with the new proposal Monday.

"In this form, I could not support it," said Mr. Warner, Republican of Virginia.

Republicans said they were still exploring how to respond to the Democrats' latest approach. They are sensitive to the needs of senators in tough races, and therefore may bring an amendment of their own to express support for the troops in Iraq, giving those senators a chance to cast a vote backing a resolution instead of simply fighting one.

Such an amendment was the essence of the measure that House Republicans proposed last week, on which they prevailed.

But Senate Republicans also said they were inclined to debate the Democratic resolution head on. So, in contrast to the more predictable House debate, the Senate showdown could bring a more serious exchange of views on how best to deal with the war.

In any event, the resolution failed to satisfy Mr. Kerry. Late last week he said he was withholding his amendment in hopes that Democrats could find a "broad consensus." But on Monday he altered his proposal only slightly, to set the deadline for July 2007 instead of Dec. 31, 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0035231

The Levin amendment would leave some American troops, focused on counterterrorism and training Iraqi security forces, in place. But it calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq by the end of this year, and for the president to submit a plan to Congress by then outlining preparations for further redeployment. Mindful of accusations that they are trying to micromanage a war from half a world away, the Democrats said they wanted to leave the "speed and pace" of the withdrawal to military commanders.

"This amendment is not cut and run," said Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, who joined Mr. Levin in proposing it. "This is not about a date certain. This is about getting the president to do the job correctly, something he has failed to do for the last three years and three months."

The resolution calls for an international conference to determine ways to secure Iraq and the region, and offers steps the Democrats said the Iraqis needed to make to take charge of their own country: sharing political power and economic resources among different groups, disarming the militias and rooting out disloyal members of security forces.

"As long as we're there to do this heavy lifting," Mr. Reed said, "even though they want to do it themselves, they won't do it."

Senate Democrats Push Phased Iraq Redeployment (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Top Senate Democrats, who last week voted against a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq, yesterday introduced a measure to start a phased troop redeployment by the end of the year.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan said Iraqis must stop looking at the United States as a "security blanket" with an open-ended commitment of support.

"The administration's policy that we'll be there as long as Iraq needs us will result in Iraq depending upon us longer," Mr. Levin said before introducing the amendment to the defense authorization bill being considered this week. "Three and a half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent."

Mr. Levin said phased redeployment -- not a timetable -- would encourage the Iraqi leaders to make "hard compromises" and secure their country.

Under the amendment, a phased redeployment of U.S. troops would begin by Dec. 31, when the Bush administration would be required to submit a plan for continued redeployment beyond 2006.

The co-sponsors are Democratic Sens. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, Dianne Feinstein of California and Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Republicans seized on the proposal as "cutting and running."

"Retreat is not an option," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "Those calling for an early withdrawal of American troops from Iraq utterly fail to understand the potentially catastrophic implications of their proposal."

A White House official last night dismissed the amendment, saying it calls for an arbitrary timeline that will encourage terrorists to wait for the United States to leave. "The choice is to stay and win or to allow Iraq to come become a safe haven for terrorists to plot against the United States," the official said.

Mr. Reed accused Republicans of using Iraq as a political football.

"Instead of offering a blueprint for success, the Bush administration has used the Iraq debate to attack Democrats for wanting to cut and run," he said.

Mr. Reed said redeployment should begin "as quickly as possible" to ease the strain on the troops, but added that the measure does not establish a pace.

The measure has Democratic support from Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sens. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Mrs. Clinton said the amendment would send the Iraqi government a message that the U.S. commitment is not indefinite and that Iraq must be responsible for its own security, a Clinton staffer said.

None of the amendment's announced sponsors or supporters backed a withdrawal measure Thursday that failed on a 93-6 vote.

Three Democrats who did vote for withdrawal, Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Barbara Boxer of California and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, today will submit a competing amendment to redeploy troops by July 1, 2007.

"We must redeploy to succeed," Mr. Kerry and Mr. Feingold said in a joint statement, calling a prolonged U.S. stay a "crutch" for Iraqis.

"A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country," they said.

DOJ_NMG_0035232

Both amendments would leave in place military units with a limited mission of training and logistical support of Iraqi security forces, counterterrorist work and personnel protection.

The Levin amendment expresses a "sense of the Senate," but the Kerry measure would be binding.

The House on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution rejecting an "arbitrary" date for troop withdrawal by a 256-153 vote.

For Democrats, A Delicate Balance On Iraq (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Debate over Iraq will dominate the Senate this week, with Democrats scrambling to find a Goldilocks solution: not too hot on withdrawing U.S. troops quickly, but not so cold as to alienate large numbers of Democratic voters furious about the war and eager to bring the Americans home.

Four Democratic senators yesterday introduced a resolution intended to strike a just-right balance and to serve as an alternative to Sen. John F. Kerry's push for a hard deadline for a troop withdrawal. Their nonbinding "sense of the Senate" resolution would call on President Bush to begin a "phased redeployment" of U.S. troops by the end of this year. But it does not specify how quickly the drawdown should proceed or when it should be completed.

"This amendment is not cut-and-run," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), who co-sponsored the measure with Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). "This is not about a date certain" for a withdrawal, he said, but it is intended to spur the Iraqi government to prepare its army and police for self-sufficiency. Also endorsing the measure, to be offered as an amendment to the 2007 defense authorization bill, were Democrats Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.).

Democrats said they hope that most of their party's senators -- and perhaps some Republicans -- will back the Levin-Reed amendment. Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will support it, his office said.

But liberals and antiwar activists will lean toward an alternative amendment offered by Democrats Kerry (Mass.), Barbara Boxer (Calif.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.). It would direct the administration to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007. The only personnel allowed to remain beyond that date would be those "essential to completing the mission of standing up Iraqi security forces, conducting targeted counter-terrorist operations and protecting U.S. personnel and facilities."

Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, previously proposed bringing the troops home by the end of this year. Several colleagues urged him to reconsider, saying Republicans would portray Democrats during campaigning for the November elections as soft on terrorism and national security. Kerry agreed to extend the deadline by seven months, but he still calls for a firm date for most troops to be out.

"With the administration's failure to offer a coherent or effective strategy in Iraq, it is long past time for Congress to offer a plan to redeploy our troops so we can give Iraq its best chance at stability, and refocus on al Qaeda and the terrorist networks that threaten the security of all Americans," Kerry and Feingold said in a joint statement.

Levin told reporters yesterday: "We do not feel comfortable with a specific timetable for the redeployment of all of our forces or the pace of that."

Senate GOP aides said they were unsure whether the party's leaders would offer their own Iraq language or be content trying to defeat the Levin-Reed and Kerry-Feingold amendments.

The Senate jockeying follows last week's House vote, in which 42 Democrats joined 214 Republicans in backing a nonbinding measure rejecting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Between debates on matters military, the Senate may also get a chance to vote to raise the minimum wage for the first time since 1997. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced an amendment yesterday that would lift the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25, calling congressional action "a moral issue."

The House was to act on the minimum wage as well this week, after Democrats attached a wage increase last week to the annual spending bill that funds labor, health and education programs. But Republican leaders put off consideration of the bill on the House floor, believing the measure could be defeated in an embarrassing procedural debate over the minimum-wage hike and ongoing disputes with House GOP moderates over its funding levels.

"With the minimum wage on there, coupled with level of expenditures in the bill, it was just too heavy a lift," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

The Senate's passage of a minimum-wage increase in 1997 created so much pressure on House Republicans in industrial districts in the Northeast and Midwest that GOP leaders were forced to bring the issue to the floor. Democrats are hoping to re-create that political dynamic.

But first they have to clear the Senate. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) used a procedural move yesterday to ensure that before any vote on the minimum wage, the Senate must vote on a Republican measure criminalizing the transport of a minor across state lines to get an abortion. That vote could give some swing-state Democrats so much of a headache that the two parties will agree to drop both amendments and go back to defense.

DOJ_NMG_0035233

Also on tap is a House vote on Thursday on Bush's line-item-veto proposal. Lawmakers have been unable to stop themselves from approving narrowly tailored "earmarks" that fund home-district pet projects, but Republicans appear eager to let the president stop them.

Democrats Shape Plans On Iraq (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Leading Senate Democrats called Monday for a "phased withdrawal" of U.S. forces from Iraq, outlining what they hope will become a consensus position on the war that will help their party speak with a more unified voice.

Some Democratic lawmakers have called for an immediate withdrawal, others for a continued presence of U.S. troops to foster security. Democratic leaders have been working to develop a consensus to rebut Republican accusations that they are divided and indecisive.

The new Democratic proposal sets a starting point for withdrawing troops but does not set an end date or demand a particular pace for the redeployment, said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. He said he planned to offer the measure as an amendment to a defense spending bill being debated this week in the Senate.

"Our amendment does not establish a timetable for redeployment," Levin said. "It does urge that a phased redeployment begin this year, partly as a way of moving away from an open-ended commitment and a way of avoiding Iraqi dependency on a U.S. security blanket."

It also calls on the administration to develop a plan for the continued withdrawal of troops beyond 2006, and to change the definition of the mission from occupation to training, logistical support and counter-terrorism.

The measure is co-sponsored by Sens. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.). It has gained the support of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and other party leaders.

"This amendment was crafted to get the support of a majority of Democrats as well as some Republicans," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

A second proposal, from Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), calls for complete withdrawal by July 2007. It appears to have the support of half a dozen senators, including Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has signed on as a sponsor.

Many of the senators who support the Kerry proposal are expected to back the Levin amendment too, aides said.

"We need a deadline for the redeployment of U.S. forces in Iraq," Kerry and Feingold said in a statement. "A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country."

Progress in Iraq is expected to be a central issue in the fall congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential election. Kerry and Feingold are both expected to seek the Democratic nomination for president.

"After three years and three months of American presence, and after all the casualties that we have taken and the treasure which we have spent, the Iraqis are going to need to step up now and take over the security responsibility and deal with the militias," Levin said. "It's not a criticism of the Iraqis. It's a way forward in order to improve the chances of success."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, denounced the Levin proposal as "cutting and running."

"Let me be clear: Retreat is not a solution. Our national security requires us to follow through on our commitments," Frist said in a statement. "Artificial deadlines are not the solution…. Cutting and running is bad policy that threatens our national security and poses unacceptable risks to Americans."

The Senate is expected to spend much of the week debating Iraq. Last week, the House passed a resolution expressing support for the administration's policies and rejecting an "artificial timeline" for withdrawal.

Vice President Dick Cheney, speaking to reporters at a journalism awards ceremony, said Monday that he stood by his assertion a year ago that the Iraqi insurgency was in its "last throes." But he acknowledged the intensity of the insurgency surprised the administration.

"I don't think anybody anticipated the level of violence that we've encountered," Cheney said. "I guess the other area that I look at, in terms of an area where I think we were faced with difficulties we didn't anticipate, was the devastation that 30 years of Saddam's rule had wrought, if you will, on the psychology of the Iraqi people. Very, very hard to go from the way they were forced to live for a long period of time to a situation in which they have the opportunity for self-government."

DOJ_NMG_0035234

Last week, both of California's senators intended to offer their own withdrawal proposals, but they agreed over the weekend to coalesce around the two approaches announced Monday.

"I believe an open-ended commitment is no longer sustainable in Iraq," Feinstein said in a statement. "It seems to me the president should have come forward with something more specific than 'Stay the course' and 'We will stand down as they stand up.' "

Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Vice President Cheney yesterday defended his much-criticized claim a year ago that the Iraq insurgency was in its "last throes" and said he believes that Iraq "turned a corner" last year when its people held elections creating a constitution and a government.

Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney predicted that 10 years from now people will look back at 2005 and say, "That's when we began to get a handle on the long-term future of Iraq."

But he also acknowledged that the administration underestimated the strength of the insurgency. "I don't think anybody anticipated the level of violence that we've encountered," he said. He added: "We didn't anticipate . . . the devastation that 30 years of Saddam's rule had wrought, if you will, on the psychology of the Iraqi people."

Cheney has repeatedly stood by his May 2005 declaration that the insurgency was waning, even as Democratic politicians and comedians have mocked it. It has joined a litany of administration statements about Iraq cited as examples of wishful thinking, including that reconstruction would be inexpensive for U.S. taxpayers and that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators.

The most famous optimistic assessment came nearly three years ago, when President Bush stood on an aircraft carrier off California under a banner that read "Mission Accomplished." "We have seen the turning of the tide," he said then. Since that statement, more than 2,300 Americans have died in Iraq.

Despite Cheney's assertion that no one foresaw how difficult the post-invasion phase would be, defense and Middle East experts have said that administration officials during the run-up to the war ignored their warnings about potential obstacles ahead.

For example, a group of specialists who met at the Army War College in December 2002, three months before the U.S. invaded Iraq, warned: "The possibility of the United States winning the war and losing the peace is real and serious." Iraq had been strained by decades of misrule, wars and sanctions, they observed, noting that "if the United States assumes control of Iraq, it will therefore assume control of a badly battered economy." The writers of the Army report emphasized that Iraq was going to be tougher than the administration was acknowledging publicly. "Successful occupation will not occur unless the special circumstances of this unusual country" are heeded, they warned.

Likewise, 70 national security experts and Middle East scholars met about the same time for two days at the National Defense University and then issued a report concluding that occupying Iraq "will be the most daunting and complex task the U.S. and the international community will have undertaken since the end of World War II." One participant, Army Col. Paul Hughes, sent a copy of the conference report to the office of Douglas J. Feith, then the undersecretary of defense for policy, but "never heard back from him or anyone else" over there, he said.

Cheney: U.S. Action Averts New Attacks (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

The United States' biggest terrorism threat is “an al-Qaeda cell armed with a nuclear weapon or a biological agent in the middle of one of our own cities,” Vice President Cheney said Monday.

Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney credited aggressive U.S. action for preventing terrorist attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. “The fact of the matter is we have been safe and secure here at home,” he said. “That's not an accident. It didn't happen just because we got lucky.”

Cheney said improved intelligence-gathering and preventive steps have thwarted attacks on U.S. soil. He singled out the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program as important in the war on terrorism and said it “clearly is legal” and is “consistent with the Constitution.”

The NSA program involves monitoring international communications of people in the USA without a court warrant when one party may have ties to terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0035235

Critics, including Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., say a 1978 law requires the spy agency to get court warrants before eavesdropping on U.S. targets.

The Interior Department reversed a controversial proposal that would have allowed more snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles in national parks at the expense of conservation.

New guidelines emphasize preserving natural resources over developing more recreation opportunities at national parks. The management policy says parks should aim for the highest clean air standard, preserve solitude and keep wilderness lands free from snowmobiles, ATVs and other intrusions.

"That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment," Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said.

The plan, which becomes final in three weeks, is one of the first moves for Kempthorne. He replaced Gale Norton last month.

Coleen Rowley, a former lawyer in the FBI's Minneapolis field office who is running for Congress as a Democrat in Minnesota, received both praise and criticism in a Justice Department inspector general's report on the investigation of al-Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui.

The report credits Rowley for blowing the whistle on FBI headquarters for not aggressively investigating Moussaoui before the 9/11 attacks in 2001. It faults her for not pursuing other avenues, such as a traditional search warrant. She focused on obtaining a search warrant from a special intelligence court that operates in secret.

The report was released last year, but the Moussaoui part was withheld pending his trial. He was sentenced last month to life in prison.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said he is leaving to join investment house Goldman Sachs and concentrate on trying to develop investment markets around the world. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Zoellick, 52, as her "alter ego." She did not say who will replace Zoellick when he leaves next month.

Japan Plans To Bring Troops Home As Iraqis Take Over (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

TOKYO, June 20 -- Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi announced a plan Tuesday to withdraw Japan's 550 troops from Iraq, ending a landmark mission that became Tokyo's largest military operation since World War II, according to a Japanese official.

On Monday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced that Iraqi troops would take over security next month around the southern city of Samawah, where the Japanese and other forces are stationed. Officials here have repeatedly said that the Japanese -- whose withdrawal has been anticipated for months -- had been awaiting that decision before finalizing withdrawal plans.

Koizumi revealed his plan at a meeting of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, saying he would make a public announcement of the pullout later in the day, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

At a news conference Monday, Koizumi declined to give a specific timeline on the withdrawal but said Japan will continue to provide reconstruction and humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people even after the troops are pulled out.

"When the time comes," Koizumi said, "I will decide when will be the appropriate timing to have the SDF troops return home safely after getting the understanding of other countries and the Iraqi government."

Koizumi's decision to pull out, officials say, is likely to be contingent on an announcement by the British and Australians to withdraw the forces around Samawah that had been protecting the Japanese. In Canberra, Australia, Defense Minister Brendan Nelson said Tuesday that Australia would reassign its 460 troops now protecting Japanese forces to help the Iraqi military secure the border with Syria. Nelson said the troops would be redeployed when Japan withdrew.

The Japanese withdrawal is not expected to dramatically affect the effort to rebuild Iraq. Analysts have said the Japanese mission there is more symbolic than strategic. The troops have provided engineering guidance and humanitarian services but are limited in their role by Japan's pacifist constitution and have had to count on other foreign forces for protection.

The contentious move to dispatch Japanese troops to Iraq was seen as a dramatic step for Japan, which after decades of engaging in what came to be known as "checkbook diplomacy" has shown more willingness to deploy its forces.

Despite public opposition, Koizumi pushed through the plan to dispatch Japanese ground troops in December 2003, largely in an effort to demonstrate support for the U.S.-Japan alliance. Japanese troops began arriving in Iraq in February 2004.

U.S. officials have requested that Japan continue to provide air transport assistance in Kuwait and surrounding areas. The Japanese said they would consider the request, and analysts have said Koizumi is likely to agree to the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0035236

'Coalition Of The Willing' Shrinks In Iraq (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And David Pilling

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

The shrinking US "coalition of the willing" in Iraq has come to resemble more a coalition of the reluctant, as allies weigh up the costs of continued involvement in an unpopular war against the benefits of backing President George W. Bush for the rest of his second term.

Japan is expected to become the latest coalition member to announce a schedule for its withdrawal in a public statement on Tuesday. Italy's new foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, met Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, last week to discuss the Italian pullout by the end of the year, meaning in effect an end to operations by September.

Spain withdrew its 1,300 soldiers from Iraq in 2004 after a change of government. The Netherlands, Ukraine, Nicaragua, the Philippines and Honduras have also pulled out. Only several thousand foreign troops remain along side some 130,000 US soldiers.

The UK on Monday confirmed that Iraqi security forces would take over responsibility for security in the southern Muthana province, where Japanese forces were based. British and Australian troops – who provided security for the Japanese as they carried out reconstruction projects – will be redeployed.

Analysts say only the UK provided a sizeable military force that actually made a difference in operational capability. Contributions from most other countries had more meaning in terms of political support for the US when the Bush administration failed to win enough backing for a second resolution at the UN.

Senior Japanese cabinet ministers met on Monday to discuss a timetable for the withdrawal, increasing the possibility that the pull-out could take place to coincide with a planned visit by Junichiro Koizumi, prime minister, to Washington at the end of this month.

Last year, at the start of Mr Bush's second term, Ms Rice launched a drive to rebuild alliances, particularly in Europe, for the Iraq effort. Ultimately she failed as Mr Bush took on the appearance of a lame duck president, commented Lawrence Korb, senior analyst at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think-tank.

But he said countries like Japan could not be accused of "cutting and running" as they never thought over three years ago that they would have to stay that long.

Anthony Cordesman, senior analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the changes in the coalition were much more important for the political symbolism than operational reality. The war, he said, had led to serious political problems at home for contributing states as public support steadily deteriorated.

"A steady pace of withdrawal and cuts from the coalition of the willing sends a message that the war does not have the support when it started, and nor does the US," he said.

The US said it expected to issue a statement on the status of the coalition last night.

The original coalition of the willing, as announced when the invasion began, brought together a disparate group of 44 declared members. But these included many that had virtually no military resources to offer, such as Afghanistan, and others that later broke ties with the US, including Uzbekistan.

Diplomats are also concerned that reconstruction efforts will be hindered by the withdrawals as it is not clear how planned joint military-civilian Provincial Reconstruction Teams will be made secure.

Japanese ministers have hinted that Japan will offer the US other logistical support, including more transport flights to Baghdad and elsewhere, by the air self-defence force (ASDF), Japan's version of an air force.

The ASDF has three C-130 transportation aircraft based in Kuwait from where it transports goods and personnel to Basra and a base near Samawah, where Japanese ground forces are based. The ASDF does not currently operate regular flights to Baghdad.

Australia's prime minister, John Howard, said on Monday that some of Australia's 460-member taskforce could remain in Iraq, possibly supporting Iraqi forces stationed at Tallil, a major coalition base near the city of Nasririyah.

"We would continue to see a role, albeit a somewhat different role, for our forces in southern Iraq. The operations will be likely to be based in and around Tallil. The primary purpose would be to provide a security reinforcement or back-up for the Iraqi security forces and also an ongoing training role," he said.

Japan To Withdraw Its Troops From Iraq (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035237

TOKYO — Japan's government will withdraw its troops from Iraq, ending a mission that broke postwar taboos by sending its troops into foreign combat zones for the first time since 1945.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi told executives of his ruling party that the roughly 600 Japanese soldiers stationed in the southern Iraqi city of Samawah would come home over the next two months, according to Japanese media reports.

"We've finished this chapter," Koizumi reportedly told the officials.

The mission has been controversial in Japan, where polls show a majority of the public opposes the war.

Koizumi had to ensure that the deployment conformed to Japan's pacifist constitution, which prohibits the country from using force to resolve international disputes.

Tokyo had portrayed the mission as strictly humanitarian, with troops focused on improving water supplies and rebuilding hospitals and schools. Security was provided by allies to avoid situations in which Japanese soldiers might have to fire their weapons or risk injury or death.

The Iraqi government, noting the relative calm in the Samawah region, announced this week that it would be the first place where Iraqi forces would assume security duties from foreign troops.

The Japanese mission was more important politically than militarily. The small deployment gave Washington the comfort of having another ally present in Iraq, while allowing Tokyo to establish the precedent of sending troops into a hostile environment.

Japanese critics say their government used the deployment as a means of stretching its constitutional limits on sending soldiers abroad.

The Way Out Of Iraq: A Road Map (WP)

By Mowaffak Al-Rubaie

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

There has been much talk about a withdrawal of U.S. and coalition troops from Iraq, but no defined timeline has yet been set. There is, however, an unofficial "road map" to foreign troop reductions that will eventually lead to total withdrawal of U.S. troops. This road map is based not just on a series of dates but, more important, on the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq.

Iraq has a total of 18 governorates, which are at differing stages in terms of security. Each will eventually take control of its own security situation, barring a major crisis. But before this happens, each governorate will have to meet stringent minimum requirements as a condition of being granted control. For example, the threat assessment of terrorist activities must be low or on a downward trend. Local police and the Iraqi army must be deemed capable of dealing with criminal gangs, armed groups and militias, and border control. There must be a clear and functioning command-and-control center overseen by the governor, with direct communication to the prime minister's situation room.

Despite the seemingly endless spiral of violence in Iraq today, such a plan is already in place. All the governors have been notified and briefed on the end objective. The current prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has approved the plan, as have the coalition forces, and assessments of each province have already been done. Nobody believes this is going to be an easy task, but there is Iraqi and coalition resolve to start taking the final steps to have a fully responsible Iraqi government accountable to its people for their governance and security. Thus far four of the 18 provinces are ready for the transfer of power -- two in the north (Irbil and Sulaymaniyah) and two in the south (Maysan and Muthanna). Nine more provinces are nearly ready.

With the governors of each province meeting these strict objectives, Iraq's ambition is to have full control of the country by the end of 2008. In practice this will mean a significant foreign troop reduction. We envisage the U.S. troop presence by year's end to be under 100,000, with most of the remaining troops to return home by the end of 2007.

The eventual removal of coalition troops from Iraqi streets will help the Iraqis, who now see foreign troops as occupiers rather than the liberators they were meant to be. It will remove psychological barriers and the reason that many Iraqis joined the so-called resistance in the first place. The removal of troops will also allow the Iraqi government to engage with some of our neighbors that have to date been at the very least sympathetic to the resistance because of what they call the "coalition occupation." If the sectarian issue continues to cause conflict with Iraq's neighbors, this matter needs to be addressed urgently and openly -- not in the guise of aversion to the presence of foreign troops.

Moreover, the removal of foreign troops will legitimize Iraq's government in the eyes of its people. It has taken what some feel is an eternity to form a government of national unity. This has not been an easy or enviable task, but it represents a significant achievement, considering that many new ministers are working in partisan situations, often with people with whom they share a history of enmity and distrust. By its nature, the government of national unity, because it is working through consensus, could be perceived to be weak. But, again, the drawdown of foreign troops will strengthen our fledgling government to last the full four years it is supposed to.

DOJ_NMG_0035238

While Iraq is trying to gain its independence from the United States and the coalition, in terms of taking greater responsibility for its actions, particularly in terms of security, there are still some influential foreign figures trying to spoon-feed our government and take a very proactive role in many key decisions. Though this may provide some benefits in the short term, in the long run it will only serve to make the Iraqi government a weaker one and eventually lead to a culture of dependency. Iraq has to grow out of the shadow of the United States and the coalition, take responsibility for its own decisions, learn from its own mistakes, and find Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems, with the knowledge that our friends and allies are standing by with support and help should we need it.

The writer is Iraq's national security adviser.

Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Three American soldiers suspected of killing three detainees in Iraq and then threatening a soldier with death if he reported the shootings have been charged with premeditated murder and obstructing justice, Army officials said Monday.

The accused soldiers, two enlisted men and a noncommissioned officer, also face charges of attempted murder, conspiracy and threatening in connection with the deaths of the three detainees on May 9, the Army's documents showed.

One Defense Department official said investigators had evidence that the soldiers had released the detainees deliberately before they were shot, apparently to have a pretext for killing them as they fled.

In Iraq on Monday, an Islamic militant group linked to Al Qaeda said it had captured two American soldiers listed as missing, but it offered no proof, and American military officials remained skeptical. The two soldiers disappeared Friday night in an ambush southwest of Baghdad, and the military has organized a force of 8,000 American and Iraqi troops to find them.

The three soldiers charged by the Army were identified as Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard, Specialist William B. Hunsaker and Pfc. Corey R. Clagett. A conviction of murder under the Uniform Code of Military Justice can carry the death penalty. A conviction of attempted murder carries a maximum punishment of life in prison, as does a conviction of conspiracy. A conviction for wrongfully communicating a threat carries a maximum term of five years.

The victims remained unidentified and were listed on the charge sheets only as male detainees apparently of Middle Eastern descent.

The three soldiers, assigned to the Third Brigade Combat Team of the 101st Airborne Division, were jailed in Kuwait last Thursday to await hearings to determine whether they would face courts-martial, officials said.

The charge sheets list a number of instances in which the suspects are said to have threatened another soldier with death if he assisted investigators. The charge sheets quote the suspects as saying to the soldier, a private first class, " 'I will kill you if you tell anyone,' or words to that effect," and " 'You better not talk or I will kill you,' or words to that effect."

Military officials said over the weekend that the allegation of wrongdoing was raised by an enlisted soldier. Military officials said the soldiers suspected in the killings initially asserted that the three detainees had died as they were trying to escape.

The shootings occurred near the Muthanna Chemical Complex along the Tharthar Canal, in southern Salahuddin Province, a restive Sunni Arab region in north-central Iraq, according to the military statements.

Military officials said the shootings came during a joint American-Iraqi raid of suspected insurgent positions inside the chemical complex.

Few other details were available.

"On the day the alleged murders occurred, the unit commander ordered an inquiry to determine the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the three detainees," the military said in a statement.

Regarding the search for the two soldiers who have been missing since Friday, a message posted Monday on a Web site of the Council of Holy Warriors, which says it oversees Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and seven other militant groups, said, "Our brothers in the military wing" had seized the soldiers near Yusufiya, the town where the military began its search.

"We will provide you with more details on this incident in the next few days," the group said.

It was not clear whether the assertion was true: the group's posting was unusually brief and did not say precisely where the soldiers had been seized. It offered no pictures of the soldiers.

In a separate posting, the same group said it had kidnapped four Russian Embassy employees in the upscale neighborhood of Mansour in early June. The group gave the Russian government 48 hours to withdraw from Chechnya, a rebellious Muslim republic within Russia, and to release Muslim detainees from Russian prisons.

The Russian Foreign Ministry, in a statement on Monday, called for the release of the embassy employees.

DOJ_NMG_0035239

An American military spokeswoman said the military was investigating the claim about the soldiers, but an American official in Baghdad cautioned that the military viewed the Web statement with some skepticism. It contained only information that could have been easily gleaned from news articles on the Internet.

Also, the official said, the council is an umbrella group and does not itself have the fighters needed to carry out an attack like the one it says led to the soldiers' capture.

The sweeping search continued for the soldiers, identified by the military on Monday as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed when insurgents attacked the three at a traffic checkpoint.

Since Friday, troops had searched 12 villages, detained 34 Iraqis and conducted 12 cordon-and-search operations, the military said. Troops were supported by fighter jets and pilotless Predator drones.

A resident in Karagol, the village that appeared to be closest to where the soldiers were taken, said the Americans had shut off all water and electricity in the town.

The troops appear to have met some resistance. Since Friday, three Iraqis identified as insurgents have been killed, the military said, and seven American soldiers have been wounded.

Another Internet posting surfaced Monday in which Ansar al-Sunna, a militant group operating in northern Iraq, said it had captured an Iraqi woman serving as a translator, Salma Gasem Hamadi, a Shiite who the group said was working for the American military in Tikrit.

The posting included a chilling warning for translators in the area to "leave your work immediately before we get you," according to a translation provided by the SITE Institute, a group that tracks militant Web sites.

In Rome on Monday, three Italian prosecutors requested the indictment of an American soldier for the shooting of an Italian intelligence agent, Nicola Calipari, who was killed by gunfire at a checkpoint in Iraq last year, the Italian news agency ANSA reported.

According to the report, the Italian prosecutors have asked that the soldier, identified as Specialist Mario Lozano, a member of the New York National Guard, stand trial on charges of murder and attempted murder.

On March 4, 2005, just after securing the release of an Italian journalist who had been kidnapped in Baghdad, Mr. Calipari was killed when the car carrying him and the journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, came under fire at a checkpoint.

A spokesman for the United States Embassy in Rome said the embassy had not been contacted about the indictments and declined further comment.

Also on Monday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Iraqi troops would assume full responsibility in July for security in Muthanna Province, where British forces oversee a multinational force of Australians and Japanese troops. Muthanna would be the first of Iraq's provinces outside of the Kurdish north to be under full Iraqi control.

In all, 13 Iraqis were killed and 36 wounded Monday in violence in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, Iraqi authorities said.

U.S. To Charge Soldiers In Iraq Detainee Deaths (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

The Army announced murder charges yesterday against three American soldiers in the May 9 deaths of Iraqi detainees.

A brief statement in Baghdad did not identify the three soldiers or their ranks. It said they are members of the 101st Airborne Division, based in Tikrit, and were being held in pretrial confinement in anticipation of an Article 32 hearing that could lead to courts-martial. The military said three Iraqi detainees were killed May 9 near the Thar Thar Canal in northern Salahuddin province.

The case could be the first in a series of murder charges against soldiers and Marines in the deaths of Iraqi civilians. The command is conducting a forcewide retraining program on the importance of ethics and protecting noncombatants. The murder counts send a message to the troops that the military is prepared to lodge the ultimate charge against its own in the confusing environment of counterinsurgency warfare.

Two major cases remain under investigation. The Marine Corps is holding seven Marines and one Navy hospital corpsman at Camp Pendleton, Calif., while the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) probes the death of an Iraqi man in April in the town of Hamandiyah.

The NCIS also has been investigating the killing of 24 civilians by Marines Nov. 19 in the Anbar province town of Haditha. Criminal defense attorneys have said they expect one or more Marines to be charged with murder in that case. The Marines' attorneys say they did nothing wrong. They say the deaths came after their convoy was attacked by an improvised explosive device, and they cleared three houses in which civilians and suspected insurgents were interspersed.

DOJ_NMG_0035240

In the 101st Airborne case, the military did not release the official charge sheets that typically identify the accused and provide more details. The statement said the three enlisted soldiers face charges of murder, attempted murder, conspiracy, communicating a threat and obstruction of justice.

"On the day the alleged murders occurred, the unit commander ordered an inquiry to determine the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the three detainees," the statement said.

This is not the first time the military has filed charges in the case of a detainee death in Iraq. But no soldier has been convicted of murder. The most serious sentence in a detainee-abuse case was a 10-year sentence handed to former Army Spc. Charles A. Graner Jr., who supervised the abuse and humiliation of prisoners at Abu Ghraib.

In the global war on terror, the Army has processed more than 56,000 detainees and is holding about 15,000 in Afghanistan, Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Army has conducted more than 600 criminal investigations resulting in charges against 251 soldiers who went before courts-martial or faced administrative punishment.

Army Cancels Contract For New Iraqi Prison (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 19 — The Army Corps of Engineers said Monday that it had canceled a $99.1 million contract with Parsons, one of the largest companies working in Iraq, to build a prison north of Baghdad after the firm fell more than two years behind schedule, threatened to go millions of dollars over budget and essentially abandoned the construction site.

The move is another harsh rebuke for Parsons, only weeks after the corps canceled more than $300 million of the company's contracts to build and refurbish hospitals and clinics across Iraq. A federal oversight office had found that some of the clinics were little more than empty shells and that only 20 of 150 called for in the contract would be completed without new financing.

But the prison, originally scheduled to be completed this month, appears to be the largest single rebuilding project canceled for failing to achieve its goals under the $45 billion American rebuilding program for Iraq. The corps said Parsons officials had recently estimated that it could not be completed before September 2008, and would cost an additional $13.5 million.

"I have other contractors that hold to their schedules," said Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy Jr., commander of the corps' Gulf Region Division. "And when they hold to their schedules, there's no problem."

In the case of the prison contract, General McCoy said, "I've got to stop the bleeding."

The corps says it intends to complete 3,700 rebuilding projects. But that number is much smaller than once planned and there is no independent overall assessment of their success. For example, among the water and sanitation projects, only 49 of the 136 projects originally envisioned are expected to be completed, according to Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who leads the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, an independent federal oversight office.

The move over the prison contract pushes further into the open a series of bitter disagreements between Parsons and the corps over who is ultimately responsible for the failure of its rebuilding projects. When a senior Parsons official was informed by telephone that General McCoy had released word of the cancellation, the official replied, "He would, wouldn't he?"

The official referred a reporter to Parsons corporate headquarters in the United States for permission to conduct an interview for attribution about the development. But the request was turned down, and the company released a brief statement through a spokeswoman instead.

"Parsons performed our work in Iraq in conformance with the contract terms and the direction given to us by the U.S. government," said the spokeswoman, Erin Kuhlman, by e-mail. "We're extremely proud of our dedicated employees who have performed very well under extremely difficult and dangerous circumstances."

Another corps official, Col. Andrew Q. Knapp, said that even the new September 2008 completion date cited by Parsons was not realistic because the company had stopped working on the site two months ago. "So the date's kind of meaningless," Colonel Knapp said.

The company declined to clarify why it had stopped the work.

The largest single project previously canceled in Iraq appears to have been a $75.7 million dollar contract that called for KBR, formerly Kellogg Brown & Root, to restore a set of oil pipelines across the Tigris River.

DOJ_NMG_0035241

The loss of business for Parsons in Iraq may not be over. General McCoy said a broad review of Parsons' work in Iraq had turned up problems in sector after sector. According to news releases on the Parsons Web site, the company has received contracts worth as much as $4 billion in Iraq.

Parsons' contracts with the corps called for building and refurbishing scores of police stations, border forts, fire stations, courthouses, prisons and Iraqi government buildings. "We found overruns in almost every case," General McCoy said.

Corps officials also said that they had asked the company to explain delays and overruns on another prison project, south of Nasiriya, for which it has an $82.7 million contract.

Mr. Bowen, the inspector general, said after he issued a pair of scathing reports on the clinics that he intended to review all of the Parsons work in Iraq. Mr. Bowen's reports said the $243 million program to build 150 clinics would complete only 20 unless new financing were found.

In some cases, the reports found, the clinics were little more than empty shells of uneven bricks and concrete that were already crumbling into dust. But those reports focused much of their criticism on what they called the failure of the corps to exercise proper oversight of the work.

Shortly after those reports were issued, General McCoy canceled the clinics contract, and shortly thereafter voided a $70 million Parsons project to refurbish 20 hospitals in Iraq. General McCoy said Sunday that he had found $62 million in his budget to finish the remaining clinics by letting construction contracts directly to Iraqi companies.

The general said he would also contract directly with Iraqi companies to finish the 1,800-inmate prison, the Khan Bani Saad Correctional Facility. Colonel Knapp said that about 40 percent of the project had been completed and that what was in place appeared to be sound.

"It's just primarily cost and schedule," Colonel Knapp said of the reasons for canceling the Parsons prison contract. "There's an urgent need for prisons right now for the country of Iraq, and it's simply not getting there fast enough."

An inspection team led by Mr. Bowen visited the Nasiriya prison project in May and found that the workmanship was good but that the construction schedule had slipped by nearly a year for reasons no one there could explain. General McCoy said he was aware of Mr. Bowen's findings and asked the company for an explanation.

"We've given them about 10 days to come back to us," General McCoy said.

Battlefield Conversion Employees Of Contractor Barred From Iraq Resurrect Its Business (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

On Jan. 3, 2005, Jerry Cullen signed an unusual document at the Baghdad headquarters of his employer, Custer Battles LLC, which the U.S. military had accused of fraud and barred from receiving any new Iraq contracts.

The document was a single-page "bill of sale." Attached were several pages detailing assets such as cars, trucks, prefabricated housing and communications gear that Custer Battles was selling. The buyer was a little-known company in Bucharest, Romania, called Danubia Global Inc. The document said Danubia would pay Custer Battles "U.S. One Dollar" upfront, and an unspecified amount of money in the future. The company never gave Custer Battles any additional money, Danubia executives say.

While the U.S. sanctions technically put Custer Battles out of business, it never actually shut down. After paying its dollar, Danubia took on most of Custer Battles's employees, who continued to work out of Custer Battles trailers on the grounds of Baghdad's airport. They were paid, for a time, from Custer Battles bank accounts. Danubia's owner, Richard Levinson, was a former Custer Battles senior executive. After signing the sale document, Mr. Cullen left Custer Battles to work for Danubia as a consultant.

Now, the Custer Battles-Danubia link is the focus of a federal criminal investigation. Law-enforcement authorities are exploring whether Danubia was an artificial entity created to evade the government ban on Custer Battles, according to investigators involved in the probe. They're examining whether Danubia executives defrauded the federal government by obtaining millions of dollars of contracts they weren't entitled to receive.

Mr. Levinson says in a phone interview that Danubia has no continuing ties to Custer Battles or that company's two founders. He stresses that neither he nor any of the employees who went with him were linked to the wrongdoing at their former firm. "I can say simply, honestly, and without reservation that Danubia is not a shell company," he says.

Meanwhile Danubia is wrestling with another controversy. This one stems from an April clash near the Baghdad airport, in which Iraqi police personnel said Danubia security guards fired on them without provocation, killing several officers including a colonel. Danubia denies wrongdoing and says its guards were fired on first. The U.S. military is pursuing a formal investigation -- separate from the one about ties to Custer Battles -- and has barred Danubia from operating in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0035242

The Bush administration's effort to rebuild Iraq has been marred by mismanagement and instances of corruption. U.S. audits have found evidence that hundreds of millions of dollars was spent without proper authorization, given to contractors who performed shoddy work, or paid to firms charging unreasonably high prices. The audits have also found cases where corrupt contractors and U.S. and Iraqi government officials stole money.

The U.S. has budgeted $20.9 billion specifically for Iraq reconstruction, not counting money for smaller projects that comes from the military's budget. Mindful of the problems, the White House didn't include any further money for the reconstruction program in its latest budget request, meaning the program is likely to end later this year when its funds run out.

Custer Battles was one of the first American contractors suspended by the government, and it is often held up as a leading example of wrongdoing. In a civil trial earlier this year, a federal jury in Alexandria, Va., found that Custer Battles defrauded the government of $3 million by filing faked invoices. The company has asked U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, who presided over the trial, to set aside the verdict.

Custer Battles was founded in late 2002 by two former Army Rangers, Scott Custer and Michael Battles. After the U.S.-led invasion ousted Saddam Hussein, the two men won contracts to guard Baghdad's airport and provide logistical support for the introduction of Iraq's new currency. Soon Custer Battles had hundreds of employees in Iraq.

The American-run Coalition Provisional Authority grew suspicious of bills the firm was submitting and summoned Messrs. Custer and Battles to an October 2003 meeting. The session deteriorated into a shouting match, according to participants. After the meeting, CPA officials discovered the Custer Battles executives had left behind a spreadsheet. It showed the company had spent $4 million fulfilling the currency contract but charged the CPA $10 million.

The government opened a formal probe the following day. It concluded the company had reaped outsized profits by exaggerating costs. In September 2004, the Air Force, which signed contracts on behalf of the CPA, suspended the firm from bidding for new contracts or renewing existing ones. The move effectively put Custer Battles out of business.

Danubia came into existence a short time later.

Financial registration documents from the British Virgin Islands show that the company was incorporated in the city of Tortola on Dec. 7, 2004, with $50,000 in authorized capital. Danubia said it operated out of Bucharest, which lies on a tributary of the Danube River. It listed its corporate parent as a second British Virgin Islands firm called Security Ventures International Ltd. Mr. Levinson, the Danubia owner, says he also owns Security Ventures International. He explains that he created the companies to avoid paying U.S. taxes in the event the firms were later sold and to minimize his liability in American courts if employees were killed or wounded in Iraq.

Series of Setbacks

Mr. Levinson, a 53-year-old lawyer, joined Custer Battles as a contract manager in December 2003 after a series of personal and professional setbacks.

He had worked for a time in the State Department, where he served as a political officer at the American Embassy in Rome. He was also an aide to senior officials including then-Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke. He left the State Department in 1998 for the private sector.

Mr. Levinson says his marriage ended in the early 1990s in a divorce that took more than 12 years and $1 million in legal fees to resolve. Toward the end of the battle with his ex-wife, Mr. Levinson was laid off and spent 18 months looking for work. In July 2003, Mr. Levinson and his second wife filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection, citing liabilities of nearly $400,000.

After the demise of Custer Battles, Mr. Levinson says he saw Danubia as a way to ensure a steady income for himself and former colleagues. He says Messrs. Custer and Battles agreed to effectively give him the company's Iraq assets as a reward for past work. "It was a kind of severance package," he says.

The new company quickly got off the ground. Custer Battles's remaining security contractors and support staff were summoned to the small office housing the firm's Baghdad operations center. They were told their positions were being eliminated but they could apply for identical positions with Danubia, Mr. Levinson says. Virtually all of them went to work for the new company, he says.

Several Danubia employees had their salaries paid from Custer Battles bank accounts until at least the end of May, according to bank-account statements.

Mr. Levinson says Danubia was actually paying the salaries but the money was funneled through Custer Battles's accounts to take advantage of the established firm's payroll system. Mr. Cullen, whose responsibilities as a consultant to Danubia are similar to those he had at Custer Battles, didn't reply to emails seeking comment.

David Douglass, a lawyer representing Custer Battles in its bid to get the jury verdict against the company overturned, says Custer Battles and Danubia are separate entities. "Custer Battles sold Danubia some equipment and some of its people went to work for Danubia in Iraq, but you're talking about two completely different companies," he says. Messrs. Douglass and Levinson say Messrs. Custer and Battles have no link to Danubia.

DOJ_NMG_0035243

Danubia decided to focus its operations on volatile western Iraq, the scene of near-daily violence, marking a shift from Custer Battles's work around Baghdad. Marines stationed in western Iraq employ logistics companies to deliver supplies, and the logistics firms hire security firms to guard their convoys.

Danubia's business strategy called for undercutting rival security companies. Danubia general manager Amy Clark -- who held a similar position with Custer Battles -- says other companies charged $15,000 per convoy, while Danubia charged just $7,500. "We told people that we were the Target of security, not the Nordstrom's," she says.

The firm won a series of government-related contracts worth $1.28 million per month, according to internal Danubia emails.

Just two months after taking over Custer Battles's assets, Danubia itself sought a buyer, hoping an infusion of cash would help it meet payroll and other obligations. The suitor was Windmill International, a Virginia-based financial-services firm run by Douglas Combs, who had served as a special assistant to acting Secretary of the Navy Hansford Johnson in 2003. On May 26 of last year, Windmill International put out a press release announcing that it had "acquired a major shareholding in Danubia."

The announcement was premature. As Windmill International executives carried out their final due diligence, they grew alarmed about the murky nature of Danubia's ties to Custer Battles. "It began to feel like a shell game," says Christopher Johnson, Windmill International's attorney.

Hoping to salvage the deal, Mr. Levinson met in July with Windmill International's chief operating officer, Peter Majeranowski, in downtown Bucharest. Mr. Majeranowski says in an interview that Mr. Levinson had the demeanor of a "beaten man laying all of his cards out on the table" during the three-hour session, which ended close to midnight.

Mr. Levinson says he told Mr. Majeranowski that Danubia was unable to make its payroll in Iraq or raise money to expand the business because of its perceived ties to Custer Battles. He says he cited the example of a Kurdish security company that claimed Custer Battles owed it several hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Levinson says the Kurdish company was withholding payments it owed Danubia as a way of recovering the disputed funds. He added that Danubia's then-general manager in Iraq resigned after continually being presented with bills that belonged to Custer Battles.

Mr. Majeranowski says he felt sympathetic to Mr. Levinson personally. "He kept saying that he wasn't a wealthy guy and that he needed the job, and I never felt like he was being dishonest," Mr. Majeranowski says.

Still, after the meeting, Mr. Majeranowski told colleagues in an email that Windmill International should "pull out and pull out hard" of the deal, because of potential legal and operational problems posed by Danubia's association with Custer Battles. The company ended the negotiations with Danubia in late August.

A Crisis Hits

Danubia managed to generate enough revenue to keep operating in Iraq. Two months ago, crisis hit. On the morning of April 10, a long convoy of supply trucks guarded by Danubia personnel left the Camp Victory compound near Baghdad's international airport. The convoy was bound for an American military outpost outside Fallujah.

When the convoy approached a bridge in Fallujah, a roadside bomb tore into one of the security vehicles, puncturing its tires, destroying its bulletproof windshield and wounding the head of the Danubia security force and another Danubia guard, according to Danubia reports of the encounter. The vehicles limped into a military compound outside the city to regroup, then made their way to their original destination, a American military outpost on the other side of Fallujah called Taqqadam.

Later that afternoon, as the convoy attempted to return to Baghdad, the vehicles were hit by a trio of roadside bombs. They pushed forward to a small Marine checkpoint, where they took sniper fire from a nearby mosque and machine-gun fire from a passing vehicle full of Iraqi police officers, Danubia said later. The Danubia team suffered four more casualties. A wounded Pakistani truck driver was dragged away by insurgents and several of the gravel trucks were destroyed.

The Danubia team made its way through Fallujah, and linked up with a second Danubia convoy to make the return trip to Baghdad. What happened next is subject to dispute. In an account submitted to the U.S. military, a Danubia security guard said uniformed Iraqi National Guard personnel and men on nearby roofs wearing ski masks fired at the convoy as it tried to enter the Baghdad airport complex. The Danubia personnel returned fire and finally made it back to the Danubia base in Baghdad that evening, thinking the incident over.

It wasn't. The following day, a convoy belonging to a second Western security company was stopped by Iraqi National Guardsmen who said they were looking for a group of security contractors who had killed one of their officers the day before, according to an internal military investigative report compiled in the aftermath of the clashes. The Iraqi personnel later told military investigators Danubia had fired on them without provocation because it mistook them for insurgents, according to U.S. military officials familiar with the investigation. The Iraqis said that Danubia personnel killed three Iraqi officers, including a high-ranking colonel, according to the military investigative documents.

DOJ_NMG_0035244

With Iraqi officers killed, possibly by Americans, the U.S. military told Danubia that it was opening a formal probe into Danubia's conduct in Fallujah and suspending the company from operating in western Iraq. Danubia was warned that personnel trying to evade the ban would be arrested by the U.S. military and detained for up to two weeks.

Ms. Clark, the Danubia general manager, says the military has yet to tell her the details of its investigation. Danubia's formal suspension was lifted after about a month, but when Danubia has sought routine clearance to operate convoys in western Iraq the military has refused, she says. Ms. Clark left for the U.S. and is unsure if she will return to Iraq. The company has reduced the number of employees in Iraq to 12 from 70.

But Danubia remains active in the country, providing teams of Western bodyguards to protect American and British engineers charged with repairing and modernizing Iraq's electricity infrastructure in and around Baghdad. Ms. Clark says the company is looking for new work and hoping the military will soon allow it to resume its security work in western Iraq.

Prosecution Urges Death For Saddam (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Prosecutors in the war crimes trial of Saddam Hussein recommended Monday that the former Iraqi dictator be sentenced to death for his role in a "revenge" attack on a mostly Shiite village in the 1980s.

"The prosecution asks for the maximum punishment against these defendants," chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi said during closing arguments.

"They showed no mercy for women, children, and even the trees were not safe from their oppression. The law calls for the death penalty and this is what we ask be implemented," al-Moussawi said.

"Well done," Saddam said sarcastically, a grin spreading across his face.

The attack followed a failed attempt on Saddam's life when his convoy passed through Dujail in 1982. Forty-six people from the village died from torture or the harsh conditions of imprisonment, al-Moussawi said. Saddam's Revolutionary Court also sentenced 148 people to death after a "show trial in which the defendants did not appear and had no chance for defense," he said. Farms and homes in Dujail were razed.

Al-Moussawi also recommended the death penalty for Barzan Ibrahim — Saddam's half-brother and head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency — and former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan.

Al-Moussawi asked for leniency for three other defendants and for dismissal of charges against Mohammed Azawi Ali, a former Baath Party official from Dujail, because of a lack of evidence. He left it up to the courts to decide a punishment for Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of Saddam's Revolutionary Court.

The 8-month-old trial is adjourned until July 10, when the defense will present its closing arguments. A panel of five judges will then determine the defendants' fate by majority vote. The defendants can appeal.

The defense has argued that the crackdown on Dujail was justified, even while denying the scope of the sweep that the prosecution portrayed.

Arduous Hussein Trial Winding Up (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD

As they began the closing phase of an often-troubled trial, Iraqi prosecutors Monday called for death sentences against Saddam Hussein and three former aides for crimes against humanity that "spread corruption on earth and where not even the trees escape their oppression."

Chief Judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman held firm control of a court that has sunk into disarray and farce at times during the eight months it has heard the case of Dujail, where 148 people were killed after a 1982 assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein.

The trial was designed to bring justice to a nation starved of it during a generation of Hussein's authoritarian rule. But ending that era, and instilling new faith in the rule of law among Iraqis, is proving difficult in the face of insurgency, chronic insecurity, and sectarian bloodshed - not to mention courtroom antics that have often been more comical than judicial.

Hussein, with a graying beard and hair apparently dyed black, sat poker-faced Monday, occasionally cracking a bemused smile. When the prosecutor finished his arguments, Hussein muttered sarcastically: "Well done."

The Dujail case is the first of a string of cases against Hussein and the former regime, most of greater magnitude. They include the gassing of Halabja that killed 5,000 Kurds in 1988, and the Anfal campaign against the Kurds in northern Iraq that same year, which left some 100,000 dead and 4,000 villages destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0035245

Investigators are continuing to unearth mass graves as they collect evidence for subsequent proceedings. Already they say they have documented evidence of more than 100,000 victims from an anti-Shiite crackdown after the 1991 Gulf War.

"I think in the future, the cases will get better ... the evidence will be better," says Zuhair al-Maliky, former head of the Central Criminal Court of Iraq. "In my opinion, Dujail is the weakest case. I would not use that as a starting point for the tribunal."

If Hussein is found guilty, the verdict will be appealed, but the sentence could be carried out before other cases are heard.

Experts say this trial has not been conducted according to international standards, a concern raised when the decision was first made to hold it in Iraq. The global import of similar cases has led to international tribunals, beginning with the Nuremburg trials of Nazis to more recently ones for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in The Hague and in Tanzania.

But some observers argue that this process has been uniquely Iraqi, and has enabled Iraqis to own and be closer to the outcome. Omar, a mechanic in Baghdad, is glued to the proceedings. "It's a show" he never misses on TV, he says.

Monday, chief prosecutor Jafar al-Musawi told the court that, "The suffering of the Dujail people turned their days into night.... It peaked when Saddam Hussein visited them on July 8, 1982. What followed were barbaric and cruel and savage acts."

Those included an execution order for 148 villagers, though a document from Hussein's intelligence service noted that "of those who were sentenced to death, 46 ... had been eliminated or died during the investigation." Beyond that "harsh torture," prosecutor said, nearly 400 people were held in the desert for four years, and the aerial bombing of Dujail orchards "led to murder."

The prosecutor said the attack was "motivated by revenge," and cast doubt on whether an assassination attempt took place at all. "This was not a criminal investigation, but a military operation ... that led to the death of women, children, and elderly men," Mr. Musawi said. "Even the trees did not escape."

The prosecutor called for the "maximum punishment" for the former Iraqi leader, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan, and the former head of the Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamid al-Bandar.

The prosecution also called for charges to be dropped against farmer Mohammad Azzawi Ali, and "minimum" sentences for the three other low-ranking defendants. The defense team will make its closing arguments on July 10, after which the five judges will consider their verdict.

The air of relative civility that prevailed in the courtroom Monday masked a messy trial that has seen the murder of two defense lawyers, defense boycotts, the resignation of a chief judge, and long political speeches by the defendants that have only been reined in since Judge Abdel-Rahman took control last January.

The quiet image of the men in the dock stood in stark contrast to scenes after the regime was toppled in 2003: scores of mass graves; more than 900 individual graves near Abu Ghraib, crippled survivors of Halabja, and a nation damaged by more than two decades of war and sanctions.

In court Monday, the name "Saddam" rang out again and again, as the prosecutor and lawyers sought to punch holes in the defense team's case that all acts were legally carried out.

One lawyer, who could not be named or shown on the time-delayed TV, said the "so-called assassination attempt ... was imaginary," and that the regime had violated UN conventions on human rights and genocide.

Another lawyer said some testimony was faked, referring to confessions from four defense witnesses that they lied under oath.

Indeed, defense witnesses have often made contradictory or strikingly consistent statements. That was the case last Tuesday, when three former Hussein bodyguards, testifying from behind a curtain, each said the target car had been marked by a woman who had just slaughtered a sheep, using her bloody handprints. Each said the presidential convoy halted 50 yards after coming under gunfire from an orchard on the left. Each said that they heard Hussein issue orders to halt return fire.

"My understanding is that he did not want a single animal to be injured," the witness said. When asked by a defense attorney if such a man could ever order revenge, he replied: "I know the president has such high moral standards; his conscience would not allow him...."

At that, the judge dropped his head into his hands, clearly disgusted.

Such exchanges have kept Iraqis tuned into the 35 sessions so far. Several members of one family laughed about an exchange last week, when defendant Ibrahim complained that two guards were afraid to testify. "Afraid of whom? Ghosts?" asked Abdel-Rahman. "Afraid of this terrifying court," replied Ibrahim. "They're afraid to talk to you anymore." "You're terrifying," the judge shot back.

Within minutes, Ibrahim was removed from the court as defense lawyers cried: "They're assaulting him ... beating him!"

"Defense lawyers ... made a stupid strategy ... of challenging the legitimacy of the court," says Judge Maliky. "Instead of discussing evidence, they say: 'This court is illegal. This judge is illegal.' "

"They've done it for publicity," he charges, "to say: 'I was the lawyer of Saddam.'"

DOJ_NMG_0035246

Iraqi Prosecutor Formally Seeks Death Penalty For Hussein (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — The chief prosecutor asked an Iraqi judge Monday to put deposed dictator Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, capping months of grim testimony over the alleged 1982 massacre of Shiite Muslim villagers.

Lead prosecutor Jaafar Mousawi also urged the death penalty for two co-defendants: Barzan Ibrahim Hasan, a half brother to Hussein and Iraq's onetime intelligence chief, and former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan.

"The prosecutor general requests from the court to issue the most severe punishment against them," Mousawi told the judge in his closing arguments. "They did not have mercy on either the elderly or the children."

The prosecutor also urged that Awad Hamed Bandar, the former head of Hussein's Revolutionary Court who doled out death sentences against the villagers, be punished for the killings. But he did not specifically call for the death penalty.

Hussein and seven co-defendants were charged with carrying out a campaign of arbitrary arrest, torture, forced deportation and killing against the people of Dujayl, a predominantly Shiite village north of Baghdad where the former president survived an attempt on his life in 1982. Prosecutors describe a witch hunt that culminated with 148 people, including elderly residents and scores of children, being put to death without fair trials.

The prosecutor asked the judge to dismiss charges or "minimize the punishment" in the cases of four defendants. All were local officials at the time of the assassination attempt, and were described in testimony as relatively powerless figures with little choice but to follow orders from Baghdad.

Hussein broke into a broad grin and chuckled to himself as Mousawi urged Chief Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel Rahman to impose the death penalty on him. The former president has frequently been an avid participant in his own trial. Watching the testimony unfold from the witness box, Hussein has interrupted regularly to offer his guidance to the judge or pontificate on the nature of justice.

The case is the first in a series of trials planned against the former dictator and his deputies. The Dujayl trial, which opened last fall, is scheduled to reconvene July 10 with closing arguments by the defense.

In keeping with the often sweeping historical tone of the arguments, Mousawi opened his statement Monday by invoking the hardships suffered by Iraqis under Hussein. He painted the Dujayl victims as icons of an entire nation, symbols of uncounted oppression.

"The people in the old times passed through dark times and calamities," he said. "The people of Dujayl lived through the darkest nights, they suffered injustice and oppression. Their troubles began with the visit of Saddam Hussein to their town."

Prosecutors have described years of retribution and collective punishment suffered by the people of Dujayl. Even the town's farmlands and orchards were destroyed by government forces, they say. Women and children were banished into the desert.

Both prosecutors and defense lawyers have sought to justify their position by painting opposing versions of Iraq's past.

The defense team has tried to downplay the punishment of the people of Dujayl by portraying the brutality as self-protection carried out by a threatened government. The lawyers have pointed out that Iran and Iraq were at war at the time of the assassination attempt and have accused the Shiite-led government in Tehran of collaborating with Iraqi Shiites to kill Hussein.

By invoking Iranian involvement and directing sharp accusations at Iraq's Islamic Dawa Party, a onetime opposition group that is at the center of Baghdad politics in the new, Shiite-dominated Iraq, defense lawyers have tried to portray the violence as a justified act of war.

Defense lawyers also have disputed the number of dead, contending that some of the 148 victims named are still alive.

Each side has accused the other of paying cash to witnesses in exchange for conveniently twisted narratives.

The prosecution has dismissed the assassination attempt as a few bullets fired by renegade gunmen. At times, prosecutors and their witnesses have even contended that there was no attempt on Hussein's life, that the shots came from villagers firing their guns in the air to celebrate the president's visit.

"The alleged assassination attempt against Saddam involved only eight to 15 bullets fired from behind a wall," Mousawi told the judge Monday. "It was proved there were no heavy weapons. If it had been an assassination attempt, it would have been a suicide mission."

The people were caught under a brutal and relentless regime, prosecutors said. Some of the people didn't live long enough to be formally executed, Mousawi said, because they were tortured to death in prison.

The prosecutor reviewed documents alleging that intelligence officers met to discuss the punishments of the villagers. He traced signatures and telephone conversations into the highest reaches of Iraq's government at the time, listing documents that appeared to indicate Hussein knew what had happened to the people of Dujayl.

DOJ_NMG_0035247

"The court procedures at the time that followed, were they applied legally?" Mousawi asked. "The procedures pursued were cruel and harsh."

Prosecutor Seeks Death For Hussein (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 19 -- The chief prosecutor in the trial of Saddam Hussein rested his case Monday with a dispassionate recounting of the deaths of 148 people from an Iraqi village, then a call for the ultimate penalty against the former Iraqi president and two subordinates.

"They showed no mercy for women, children, and even the trees were not safe from their oppression," said prosecutor Jafar al-Mousawi in a Baghdad courtroom, a hint of bitterness entering his voice. "The law calls for the death penalty, and this is what we ask be implemented."

"Well done," Hussein muttered sarcastically from his seat a few feet away.

The trial on charges of crimes against humanity -- the killing of residents of the Shiite Muslim village of Dujail after a failed assassination attempt on Hussein there -- entered its final phase with the prosecution recommending sentences for the eight co-defendants. The prosecutor also called for the deaths of Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half-brother and the former Iraqi intelligence chief, and Taha Yassin Ramadan, the country's former vice president.

The prosecutor said a fourth defendant, Awad Haman Bander, a judge who presided over a court that issued death warrants for the people in Dujail, should also be sentenced for murder, but he did not explicitly say what that sentence should be. The prosecutor asked Judge Raouf Abdel Rahman to abandon the charges against three of the remaining four defendants and reduce the sentence of the fourth.

Since it began in October, the Hussein trial has endured frequent disruptions. Defendants walked out and mocked the trial as illegitimate. Judges resigned and two defense attorneys were assassinated. The court adjourned after Monday's session until July 10, when the defense will offer its closing statements.

In previous sessions of the trial, Hussein's side has variously maintained that the executions were a legal, and legitimate, response to an attempt on the life of a head of state and that many people said to have been killed are in fact still alive.

The Dujail killings are the first acts for which the deposed president is being prosecuted. He is separately accused of leading a chemical attack that killed an estimated 5,000 ethnic Kurds in the town of Halabja in 1988 and of ordering a brutal crackdown on a Shiite rebellion after the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Monday's session began with attorneys for the families of the dead villagers reviewing their evidence against Hussein. They said that in July 1982, a convoy carrying Hussein came under fire from an orchard in the village, but they played down the incident's significance. One attorney denied it entirely: "The assassination attempt was merely an imaginary, Machiavellian invention by Saddam Hussein," the attorney said.

In response to the gunfire, the prosecutor said, Hussein launched a "widespread, systematic attack against civilians" that included firing on the village from helicopters, draining and bulldozing orchards, and arresting hundreds of people.

Those who survived the initial attack and alleged torture in prison, the prosecutor said, were referred to a revolutionary court in an order signed by Hussein. After a two-week trial in 1984, at which none of the defendants was present, the court ordered 148 people to be put to death by hanging -- an order that was confirmed by a presidential decree two days later, according to the prosecutor. In all, 48 people ages 12 to 19 were killed, he said.

"The court was a fake, imaginary court," the prosecutor said.

He said Ibrahim, as the head of Iraq's intelligence service at the time, led the brutal investigation. According to the prosecution, Bander issued the death sentences for the 148 people and Ramadan received direct orders from Hussein to use his militia to lead the operations in Dujail.

Ramadan "ordered the officials in Dujail to destroy the houses and loot the property and destroy the orchards, which left the people of Dujail living in poverty," the prosecutor said. "Ramadan watched the operation from a hill."

In the courtroom, the prosecution described the Dujail killings as genocide and violations of U.N. human rights conventions and Iraqi law. The prosecution said that at least a dozen other people still in hiding are wanted in connection with the killings.

Prosecutor In Hussein Trial Calls For The Death Penalty (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035248

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 19 — Saddam Hussein uttered only two laconic words — "Well done!" — on Monday as the chief prosecutor at his trial demanded that Mr. Hussein and three top associates be given the death penalty for their role in the persecution of a mainly Shiite town after an assassination attempt Mr. Hussein said was made against him there in 1982.

Mr. Hussein's riposte echoed his attitude throughout the eight-month trial, at which he has frequently said that the outcome has been predetermined by American and Iraqi officials. During the trial, the 69-year-old former Iraqi ruler has said several times that he expected the death penalty, that the prospect held no fears for him and that, in any case, he has "escaped death" so often that he expected to do so again.

The prosecutor also demanded death sentences for Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half-brother and former chief of the Mukhabarat, the secret police; Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former vice president and leader of a militia known as the Popular Army associated with Mr. Hussein's Baath Party; and Awad al-Bandar, former chief judge of the Revolutionary Court, which handed down death sentences for 148 residents of Dujail, a town 35 miles north of Baghdad that was at the center of the brutalities described at the trial.

Jaafar al-Moussawi, the prosecutor, urged the acquittal of Mohammed Azawi, one of four low-ranking Baath Party members from Dujail who were charged as accomplices. He said the judges should "minimize the punishment" of three other defendants, Abdullah Ruwayid, his son Mizhar Ruwayid, and Ali Dayeh Ali. They were accused by the prosecution, along with Mr. Azawi, of helping Mr. Hussein's secret police round up townspeople after the shooting during Mr. Hussein's visit to Dujail.

With his mitigating arguments on behalf of the four Dujail men, Mr. Moussawi narrowed the court's focus to Mr. Hussein and his three associates. They are charged with crimes against humanity for offenses that included the executions; the deaths under torture of 46 men and youths who had already been killed when Mr. Bandar's court sentenced them to death; the deportation of 399 other townspeople, including women and children, to a remote desert detention camp; and the razing of a vast acreage of orchards and date palm groves around Dujail.

Mr. Moussawi said the trial had shown that falsification was central to everything Mr. Hussein and his associates did. He said evidence had shown that even the assassination attempt had been faked, with a weak volley of gunfire aimed at Mr. Hussein's motorcade from a nearby orchard as it passed through Dujail set up in advance to justify cracking down on Shiites at a time when Mr. Hussein had begun a war with Shiite-ruled Iran. "The assassination attempt was a Machiavellian invention by Saddam Hussein," he said.

Similarly, he said, the trial presided over by Mr. Bandar had been "a trial only on paper." He said it had been a proceeding with no defense lawyers, no presentation of evidence, few written records, no appeals and 20 youths among the 148 sent to the gallows who were under the legal age of 18 for execution. On top of this, he said, were the death sentences passed on 46 people who had already been killed, which he described as "a sort of second death sentence."

At the session on Monday, Mr. Hussein was mostly, and uncharacteristically, subdued. With the Dujail trial now in its closing stages, and less than a month remaining before the judges are expected to adjourn to consider their verdicts, he listened intently, in his shapeless gray suit and tieless white shirt, to the prosecutor's summary of the evidence against him and his associates, occasionally stroking his bearded chin or taking notes on a yellow legal pad. Even his ritual insistence that the court recognize him as Iraq's lawful president was stilled.

The prosecutor said Mr. Hussein's actions, and those of his associates, fit the international standard for crimes against humanity, a "widespread and systematic" persecution of a civilian population. He said Mr. Hussein ordered the roundup of civilians in Dujail, and, directly or through bodies he controlled — including the presidential office and the Revolutionary Command Council of the Baath Party — approved the executions, the promotion of intelligence officers involved in the crackdown, and the destruction of the Dujail orchards and groves.

Citing the Nuremberg trials of Nazi leaders that followed World War II, Mr. Moussawi said Mr. Hussein and his associates had no right to claim immunity, as they have before the court, for actions taken in their official capacity. He said Mr. Hussein — "this criminal," as he referred to him more than once — met the standard of "command responsibility" set down at Nuremberg. "He was responsible for these crimes, either because he knew about them, or because they were carried out under orders he had personally approved," Mr. Moussawi said.

The prosecutor cited several provisions in Iraqi criminal law as it stood under Mr. Hussein — including Section 406a, still valid — that provided the death penalty for premeditated murder. "The prosecution asks for the maximum punishment for these defendants," he said. "They showed no mercy, even for women or children, and even the trees in the orchards were not safe from their repression. The law provides the death penalty for these offenses, and we demand it be applied in the cases of these men."

Officials of the special court, known as the Iraqi High Tribunal, have said that any death sentences upheld on appeal will be carried out by hanging. But that eventuality, at least for Mr. Hussein, could still be many months, or even years, away.

DOJ_NMG_0035249

He has already been identified as a defendant in a second case, involving the killing of 50,000 Iraqi Kurds in the so-called Anfal military campaign that began in 1988 and involved chemical weapons attacks and wholesale purges that sent entire village populations to execution in mass graves. That trial is expected to begin while the Dujail case is in recess later in the summer.

The Shiite leaders who now dominate the government have said they want Mr. Hussein and his associates to go to trial in a third case under preparation, involving the killing of at least 100,000 Shiites when Mr. Hussein put down an uprising in southern Iraq that followed the Persian Gulf war in 1991.

Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam (WT/AP)

By Bushra Juhi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The prosecution demanded the death penalty for former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein in its closing arguments yesterday, saying he had shown "no mercy" in the killings of women and children during a crackdown on Shi'ite Muslims in the 1980s.

After a three-week recess, the defense gets to sum up its case, then a panel of judges will begin weighing the fate of the ousted leader and his seven co-defendants.

A U.S. official close to the court said the judges could take about 60 days in their deliberation, meaning verdicts likely would be announced in late September or early October. The official spoke on the condition on anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the court.

If Saddam is convicted and sentenced to death by hanging, it could be months before the sentence is carried out. The defendants have the right to appeal, and Saddam faces a second trial for a military campaign against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s that killed about 100,000 people.

No date for that trial has been set, and Iraqi officials have not said what will happen if the appeals from the first case run out while the second is going on.

The courtroom largely was silent throughout the three-hour session yesterday as chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi delivered his final arguments concerning the 1980s crackdown on the Shi'ite town of Dujail. Saddam, dressed in a black suit, sat calmly alongside his fellow defendants and occasionally took notes.

Mr. al-Moussawi reviewed the evidence against each man, then concluded by asking for the death penalty against Saddam, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim, who was the head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency at the time, and Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former senior regime member.

"The prosecution asks for the harshest penalty against them, because they spread corruption on earth. They showed no mercy even for the old, for women or for children; and even the trees were not safe from their oppression," he said. "The law calls for the death penalty, and this is what we ask be implemented."

"Well done," Saddam muttered sarcastically.

Mr. al-Moussawi also sought a death sentence for Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of Saddam's Revolutionary Court, which sentenced 148 Shi'ites to death. The prosecutor said Mr. al-Bandar's actions "supported the crimes" committed by the others and asked that he be sentenced under articles of the Iraqi criminal code for premeditated murder, which calls for the death penalty.

The prosecutor asked for lenient sentences for three defendants -- Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid; his son, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid; and Ali Dayim Ali -- saying they committed their "acts to carry out orders issued by their superiors."

He urged the release of the final defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, saying the evidence against him was not sufficient.

Many of Iraq's Shi'ite majority and Kurdish minority are eager to see Saddam and his cohorts executed in revenge for the oppression of their communities by his Sunni-dominated regime.

But the perceived fairness of the trial will be a key question. Many Sunni Arabs see the court as a case of "victors' justice" carried out by the Shi'ites and Kurds, who have dominated Iraq's government since Saddam's fall in 2003.

Iraq, As Seen Through 9 Lives (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

With all the spin surrounding Iraq, figuring out just what is going on there can be difficult. But one of the most valuable measures, as any war correspondent can attest, is the quality of life for the people caught up in conflicts.

That is why a recent diplomatic cable from Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is so telling. Marked "sensitive" and obtained by The Washington Post, it paints a compelling picture of how nine Iraqi employees of the U.S. Embassy live when they are outside the fortified safety of the Green Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0035250

Quite apart from their bravery — just disclosing that they work for the Americans can be a death sentence, and most don't even tell relatives — their descriptions of life at neighborhood level suggest fundamentalists and militias are fast obtaining the kind of power that destroys governments. To whit: "The central government, our staff says, is not relevant; even local mukhtars (leaders) have been displaced or coopted by militias."

The reported details — filed just hours before President Bush's upbeat surprise trip to Iraq — underscore the uphill battle faced by the fledgling Iraqi government and U.S. forces, the limited time they have to assert control, and even whether that is still possible. For example:

• Women are increasingly warned to wear head-to-toe coverings.

• To better survive, employees "adopt the clothing, language, and traits" of other neighborhoods when they visit them.

• Electricity is still maddeningly intermittent — often as little as one hour in six.

• Increasing ethnic and other tensions among staff, as well as despair, mirror the broad social fragmentation. Many Iraqis, one said, even accuse the United States of punishing some populations as Saddam Hussein once did.

Nine lives do not tell the story of an entire country, nor is the cable reason to bring troops home. Other measures paint a brighter picture. Nevertheless, for those who wonder whom to believe in Iraq, the U.S. ambassador reporting privately about the lives of the Iraqis closest to him is a source that can hardly be ignored.

Culpability Deficit Disorder (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Ever since Thomas Riley Marshall, Woodrow Wilson's vice president, uttered the immortal phrase "What this country needs is a really good five-cent cigar," people have felt challenged to better it. So if you Google the phrase "what this country needs," you will find that it needs many things, including a national architect, better infrastructure or this peach of an idea from Will Rogers: "dirtier fingernails and cleaner minds." Allow me, though, a suggestion that applies to the war in Iraq: Ritalin.

This drug for attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) is sorely needed. ADHD explains why few seem to challenge the call to continue the mission in Iraq, apparently forgetting that the mission has changed and no one is quite sure what it is now. It explains why after just 100 hours the first President Bush concluded the Persian Gulf War with Saddam Hussein still in power and his helicopters slaughtering rebellious Shiites and Kurds. And it explains why the Carter, Reagan and first Bush administrations so ardently supported Hussein and then -- an administration later -- made it U.S. policy to topple him. We were always forgetting the kind of guy he was.

ADHD also explains why we are still fighting in Afghanistan almost five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that launched the war against the Taliban. It's because our attention got diverted from the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda, which had attacked us, to Iraq, which had not. Take two pills for this one.

Finally, ADHD explains -- if anything possibly can -- why the United States went into Iraq with virtually no idea of what to do the day after the war was essentially won. Not only did the United States lack the patience to do nation-building -- what to do with the army, the police, the Baath Party? -- but it would not even supply the troops to secure government offices and ministries. Widespread looting broke out; public property was not protected. "It is not exaggerating to say that the United States may have lost the war on the very day it took Baghdad, April 9, 2003," writes Peter W. Galbraith in his forthcoming book, "The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End."

This is just the latest book to detail the virtually inexplicable: how Washington screwed up so badly in Iraq. But since Galbraith starts his book by reviewing previous administrations and their dealings with Iraq, it also serves as a useful antidote to the current infatuation with so-called foreign policy realists. These are the supposedly hard-bitten, pragmatic, realpolitik guys who eschew dreamy moralism and ask, always: What's in it for us? They include, prominently, President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state, James A. Baker, and his national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft. Neither of them, it is often said, would have taken us to war again in Iraq.

Yes indeed. But they did give Hussein every reason to believe he could get away with anything he wanted. The first Bush administration, as with the Reagan administration before it, was ever solicitous of the Kurd-gassing Hussein, and it later reacted with torpor as Iraq mobilized for its invasion of Kuwait. Even after the United States had gone to war, Bush ended hostilities prematurely, preferring to leave Hussein in power rather than deal with an unruly Iraq. The "realists" unrealistically set the stage for the next gulf war. I agree with Galbraith: Had the first Bush and the blustery Norman Schwarzkopf ("You fly, you die," he said of Iraqi helicopters. They did and they didn't.) applied a bit more pressure, the Iraqi military would have taken care of Saddam Hussein. This appalling "realism" resulted in the murder of thousands of Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0035251

The first rule of warfare is kill your enemy -- or make sure, in some way, that he can no longer do you any damage. The first Bush administration ignored that rule with Saddam Hussein and now the second one has ignored it with Osama bin Laden. It allowed this mass murderer to escape, and he will come back to haunt us; it is what he lives for. Bin Laden does not suffer from ADHD.

As any ADHDer can tell you, it is the moment that counts. What comes next or before is over the horizon. This is particularly true in a sound-bite, bitterly partisan era in which it is possible to say "cut and run" and think (or pretend) you have actually said something. It's easy enough to say that America's leaders suffer from ADHD, but on the basis of all this, it's apparent that so do we all. We always forget to hold them accountable.

Pass the Ritalin, please.

Revived Taliban Waging 'full-blown Insurgency' (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, June 20, 2006

PANJWAI DISTRICT, Afghanistan — In their biggest show of strength in nearly five years, pro-Taliban fighters are terrorizing southern Afghanistan — ambushing military patrols, assassinating opponents and even enforcing the law in remote villages where they operate with near impunity.

"We are faced with a full-blown insurgency," says Pakistani journalist Ahmed Rashid, author of Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil & Fundamentalism in Central Asia.

Four and a half years after they overthrew the Islamic militia that had controlled much of Afghanistan, U.S.-led forces have been forced to ramp up the battle to stabilize this impoverished, shattered country. More than 10,000 U.S., Canadian, British and Afghan government troops are scouring southern and eastern Afghanistan in a campaign called Operation Mountain Thrust.

Even before fighting heated up this spring, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, warned Congress that the insurgents "represent a greater threat" to the pro-U.S. government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai "than at any point since late 2001."

More than 500 people — mostly insurgents — have died since mid-May in the fiercest fighting since the fall of the Taliban regime. Since Operation Enduring Freedom began in October 2001, more than 300 U.S. troops have died, 165 of them killed in action. NATO's 36-country International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) has lost 60.

Despite the damage they can do, the insurgents do not have enough support to topple Karzai, who was elected two years ago and enjoys international support. "We are not in a situation yet where the Karzai government is threatened," says Joanna Nathan, Afghan analyst for the International Crisis Group, a non-profit research organization. But in places where they are strong, the insurgents have been able to harass government operations and relief efforts — so much so that reconstruction has come to a virtual standstill in the south and east.

"It is hurting us," says Afghan Finance Minister Anwar ul-Haq Ahady. "We build a school, and they come and they burn it. We build a clinic, and they come and burn it. We build a bridge, and they knock it down. Security is the No. 1 issue."

The fear is that an ungovernable Afghanistan will revert to what it was before the overthrow of the Taliban: a failed state that can spread instability across Central Asia and be used as a launchpad for international terrorism. "If the Taliban get their way, Afghanistan will again become a training camp for terrorists," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told CBC, Canada's public broadcaster, this month.

The influence of the fundamentalist Islamic militia is obvious in Panjwai district, in the heart of Taliban country. Villagers on this dry, dusty plain 15 miles west of Kandahar say they are trapped between the Taliban and the U.S. and Afghan troops hunting them. If they cooperate with the coalition or with the Afghan government, they risk Taliban reprisals.

Just outside Makuan village here, Noor Mohammed, deputized as a security guard at a radio tower, goes to work in plainclothes. "If I wear a uniform, they will kill me," he tells Canadian army Capt. Jonathan Snyder, 24, who is patrolling the area two days after a Canadian convoy was ambushed nearby. Snyder is exasperated: "You shouldn't fear for your life," he tells the frightened man. "They should be fearing for their lives because of you."

The insurgency is a loose alliance of Taliban guerrillas, followers of former prime minister and fundamentalist warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, al-Qaeda terrorists recruited from across the Islamic world, opium traffickers and local fighters whose murky motives are rooted in tribal politics.

Taliban commander Mullah Dadallah told al-Jazeera television last month that the insurgents can call on 12,000 fighters. In an interview, Taliban leader Naseeruddin Haqqani says there also are hundreds of suicide bombers. The Taliban's claims probably are exaggerated, Rashid says, but they can draw on hundreds of fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0035252

The insurgency began a few months after U.S.-led forces drove the Taliban out of the Afghan capital, Kabul, in November 2001. It became more effective two years ago, when insurgents switched to new tactics, including breaking up into small groups of 10 fighters or less, attacking "soft" civilian targets and limiting head-on confrontations with coalition and Afghan troops.

Like their counterparts in Iraq, the insurgents use the Internet to pick up tips on making roadside bombs, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, has said. They increasingly rely on suicide bombers. Writing in The New York Review of Books this month, Rashid noted 40 suicide attacks in the past nine months vs. five in the previous five years.

Insurgent leaders — such as Taliban spiritual leader Mullah Mohammed Omar; Jalaluddin Haqqani, father of Naseeruddin Haqqani; and Hekmatyar, who heads the radical Islamic Hizb-i-Islami group — "do not exert power the way a military general does," Seth Jones, an analyst for the California-based think tank RAND Corp., wrote in the spring edition of the journal Survival. Instead, they leave "tactical and operational" control to local cells, "which act as franchises."

Al-Qaeda, which supports the insurgency with training, supplies and occasionally manpower, operates much the same way.

The loose alliance opposed to the Karzai government and the U.S.-led reconstruction of Afghanistan has gained strength because:

•The insurgents have found sanctuary in Pakistan, "fairly brazenly" staying "beyond the reach of Afghan and international security forces," Nathan says. Pakistan's powerful spy agency, the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), supported the Taliban against rival Afghan factions when the fundamentalist movement formed in the mid-1990s. Pakistan's military regime wants to counter the separatist instincts of Pashtun tribesmen who live in both countries. The government's pro-Taliban policy changed under U.S. pressure after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Rashid says Pakistan has done nothing to eliminate Taliban forces operating openly out of Baluchistan, a Pakistani province opposite southern Afghanistan. The reason, he says, is that the Baluchistan insurgents are "pure Taliban" — remnants of the ISI-supported fundamentalist regime that ruled most of Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001. The insurgents based in Waziristan, by contrast, include many foreign jihadi fighters and members of al-Qaeda — fighters the United States has pressured Pakistan to pursue. "That suited the Pakistanis quite well," Rashid says.

•Ordinary Afghans won't risk their lives to support Karzai's government, which many view as weak and corrupt. Afghanistan's problem is "not necessarily the strong enemy," Eikenberry said in Washington last month. "It's the very weak institutions of the state."

The government also is widely seen as corrupt and dominated by warlords linked to the bloody civil war during the 1990s. "Day by day, corruption, bribery and narcotics go up," says Noor ul-Haq Ulumi, a member of the Afghan parliament from Kandahar. "Weak governors we have every place. They think only about their benefit, not their country's benefit."

•The United States and its allies have scrimped on money and manpower, critics say. Rashid says Iraq has distracted the United States from the difficult tasks of subduing the Taliban and rebuilding Afghanistan. "For Afghanistan, the results have been too few Western troops, too little money and a lack of coherent strategy," Rashid wrote in The New York Review of Books.

According to RAND, international aid to Afghanistan equals $57 per person, compared with $679 in Bosnia and $206 in Iraq. RAND also found that Afghanistan has one soldier for every 1,000 people vs. seven in Iraq, 19 in Bosnia and 20 in Kosovo. RAND's Jones reckons Afghanistan needs 200,000 Afghan and foreign troops and police officers to establish order. The country has about 120,000.

Insurgents test the resolve of NATO forces in the process of taking over combat responsibility from U.S. forces in southern Afghanistan. The incoming NATO commander, British Lt. Gen. David Richards, insists NATO forces "will deal most robustly" with insurgents.

Rashid says the rules of engagement are "incredibly unclear."

"They bifurcate NATO into countries that will fight and countries that won't fight, and that's a dangerous thing," Rashid says.

The insurgents are eager to bloody the NATO newcomers, to find out which ones will fight and to target those that won't. "This is a testing time, a transition time, and is likely to be messy," Nathan says.

Insurgents "are betting that the West doesn't have the political will to remain in Afghanistan for the long run," Jones wrote. "Proving them wrong is the key challenge."

Sending troops to back Karzai's government and keeping them there is "a sacrifice worth making," Nathan says. "Sept. 11 demonstrated what happened last time the international community abandoned Afghanistan."

Afghan Guerrillas Kill 32 With Ties To Legislator (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035253

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 19 — Suspected Taliban guerrillas in the southern province of Helmand ambushed and killed 32 people on Sunday, all of them relatives and tribesmen of an influential member of Parliament, among them a former local government official, the legislator said Monday.

The attack, in broad daylight, was the latest sign of the strength of the suspected Taliban insurgents in Helmand, a poppy-growing province where NATO and the Afghan Army have recently increased their troops in an effort to contain the spreading insurgency.

The legislator, Dad Muhammad, who was the intelligence chief of Helmand after the fall of the Taliban and is now an elected member of the upper house of Parliament, said his 15-year-old son and two of his brothers, one a former chief of the Sangin district, were killed in the fighting, which lasted most of Sunday.

Another son of Mr. Muhammad was among five people wounded, he said. Ten more people were missing and thought to have been abducted by the insurgents. All of those killed were relatives or supporters, he said.

Mr. Muhammad and the brother who was the former district chief have worked to rid the area of the suspected Taliban insurgents, who are believed to be in league with drug traffickers in the poppy trade.

"We buried 32 people," he said. "Ten are missing. They are in Taliban hands, we don't know if they are dead or alive." He ruled out a personal vendetta, though, and said the Taliban had about 2,000 fighters in the area.

Mr. Muhammad, speaking in Kabul, said it was too dangerous for him to travel to his home. His surviving relatives were now under siege from the Taliban in their home in the town of Sangin, he said.

The attack took place a mile outside Sangin, a mile or two from a military base where British and Afghan Army troops are stationed, but neither the local police nor the military came to their aid, he said. It was unclear whether the military knew of the attack.

Mr. Muhammad said he had been told that the attackers first ambushed the car of the brother who was the former district chief at 7 a.m. as the brother was returning home with four other family members. When his second brother, Mr. Muhammad's sons and tribesmen came to the brother's aid, he said, they were also attacked and fought a fierce battle until 3 p.m.

In Tribal Pakistan, A Tide Of Militancy (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan -- In North Waziristan, barbers are ordered not to shave off beards, and thieves have been swiftly beheaded. In Swat, television sets and VCRs have been burned in public. In Dir, religious groups openly recruit teenagers to fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan. In the Khyber area, armed squads have burst into rooming houses, forcing people to pledge to obey Islamic law.

A tide of Islamic militancy is spreading across and beyond the semiautonomous tribal areas of northwest Pakistan that hug the Afghan border, despite the deployment of some 70,000 Pakistani army troops there, according to a variety of people with close family, professional or political ties to the tribal regions.

Senior army officers in this provincial capital say they are making steady progress in pacifying the restive tribal belt and reining in religious extremists, who U.S. and Afghan authorities say have fomented much of the violence that has led to more than 500 deaths in Afghanistan in the past two months.

"We have them on the defensive now," Lt. Gen. Mohammed Hamid Khan, commander of the 11th Army Corps, said in an interview. "The miscreants have gone into their shells, and things have cooled down tremendously." Khan said the army had shifted from mass raids to "snap operations" based on intelligence and now controls key towns once in the hands of militants.

But other observers say the army's aggressive efforts since 2004 have backfired, alienating the populace with heavy-handed tactics and undermining the traditional authority of tribal elders and officials. They say the local Taliban movement, which has close ethnic and theological links to the Taliban across the border in Afghanistan, has won new supporters and been able to carve out enclaves of alternative power.

"Things are starting to spin out of control," one Western diplomat in Islamabad said of the tribal areas, which have historically been deeply conservative. "In some areas, it's beginning to look like they are setting up a government within a government."

The tribal areas are off-limits to foreign visitors, including journalists, except for periodic, brief helicopter visits with military authorities. But in recent interviews here, tribal lawyers, educators and politicians with knowledge of events in the areas described growing fundamentalist influence and intimidation that is spilling beyond the sparsely inhabited tribal zones and edging closer to settled, government-run localities.

DOJ_NMG_0035254

In the past six months, they said, dozens of tribal elders and officials have been killed, including an uncle of the current provincial chief minister. Fundamentalist clerics have freely used FM radio stations to preach holy war and set up public recruiting offices in towns such as Dir and Bannu just outside the tribal areas. Music stores have been shut down and thieves executed before crowds.

"North and South Waziristan are in the grip of Talibanization" and all of the seven federally administered tribal agencies "can come under its grip, too," said Afrasiab Khattak, a human rights activist and official of the secular Awami National Party. "The army has put up an honest fight, but it has failed, and the government has failed. The traditional system has been made ineffective, and the Taliban have moved into the vacuum."

One university instructor, who comes from South Waziristan, said that when he visited a year ago the area was blanketed with army troops, but that when he went back several months ago for a funeral, not a uniformed soldier was in sight while armed men in Taliban-style turbans patrolled in trucks. He asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation.

"The situation is not what the government says," he said. "The Taliban are totally in control. The people welcome them and the youths idolize them. There is no government, only the security forces who kill people. The Taliban settle disputes and deliver justice on the spot. The tribal areas are becoming nurseries for the Taliban, and the army can't stop it."

Last week, the discovery that a journalist in North Waziristan had been assassinated generated expressions of alarm and protests in multiple cities. Hayatullah Khan, who had been missing since December after reporting that the United States appeared to have staged a missile attack on Pakistani soil, was found shot in the head and handcuffed. Officials blamed religious extremists, but Khan's relatives and others said they suspected Pakistani intelligence agencies were behind his killing.

Many government critics here accuse the intelligence services of fomenting religious extremism in the tribal areas as a means of keeping Afghanistan unstable and vulnerable to Pakistani control. Senior Afghan officials, including President Hamid Karzai, have also made such claims, which Pakistani officials deny.

"In my view, stability for Afghanistan is the best thing for Pakistan," said Hamid Khan, the army corps commander. "All the turmoil there affects us; we get the refugees, the criminals, the drugs, the weapons. The miscreants have much safer sanctuaries on that side than on ours. If we want strategic depth, better we should have good relations than instability."

The Pakistani army has suffered numerous casualties since it entered the tribal areas two years ago under pressure from Washington to crack down on Islamic radicals. There have been repeated bloody clashes with tribal militiamen and, more recently, a spate of roadside bombings and one suicide bombing that targeted an army convoy. Visitors to the conflict zone describe soldiers as being largely confined to their outposts.

Until recently, most religious violence was limited to North and South Waziristan, the poorest and most isolated of the tribal areas, where Islamic fervor has always been strong. Although a recent truce has calmed South Waziristan, the fundamentalist fervor now seems to be erupting in other parts of the region.

In Swat, a peaceful agricultural valley, Islamic preachers persuaded people to hand over their television sets in May and burned stacks of them in public. In the Khyber Agency, a prosperous commercial area that straddles a major highway into Afghanistan, armed followers of an Islamic preacher burst into shops and lodging houses in early June, demanding at gunpoint that people pledge to follow Islamic law. In the ensuing clashes with another religious militia, several dozen people were killed.

"There are elements that have decided to create Taliban enclaves and to 'Waziristanize' the other tribal agencies," said Khattak, the human rights activist. "The government says it is taking action, but it is not. The source of the problem is here, not in Afghanistan. If such a bloody drama can happen in Khyber, it can happen anywhere."

Even in Peshawar, a huge city with a landscaped military district and a modern university, support for the revived Taliban movement is evident among students and worshipers at numerous mosques. Secular politicians say the militant fervor is being encouraged by the Islamic political parties that dominate the provincial government.

On a recent Friday, men emerging from prayer services said they were upset about army attacks on civilians in tribal areas and worried that U.S. forces in Afghanistan would enter Pakistan as well. One man, an English teacher, said the U.S. forces were "savages and barbarians" while the Taliban were "religious scholars and sincere people."

Another man with a black turban and bushy beard proudly identified himself as a former Taliban member who had fought in the capture of Kabul in 1996. Today, he said, the same conditions of lawlessness and immorality have returned on both sides of the border, demanding new action.

"Under the Taliban there was peace, there was order, there was justice. Now our people are facing cruelty, injustice and crime. It has all come back, and it cannot be allowed to continue," said Wahidullah, 32, who runs a religious academy for boys. "If I didn't have other responsibilities now, I would love to join the fight again."

Pulling No Punches In Push For Navy SEALs (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

CORONADO, Calif. -- As Navy Ensign Brandon lay slapped by wave after black wave of frigid Pacific surf, his arms linked with a row of other would-be Navy SEALs, a cold but comforting thought surfaced from his murky consciousness: "No matter what," he reassured himself, "they're not going to kill me."

Shaking uncontrollably in the cold brine, the slight, 22-year-old from Ohio dreaded the nighttime "surf torture" as one of the toughest ordeals of the SEALs' aptly named Hell Week, designed to break down the bodies and wills of all but the steeliest young men.

Today, one of the Pentagon's main dilemmas is how to get more candidates such as Brandon to outlast the trials of selection -- without lowering standards -- as it tries to expand the ranks of SEALs and other elite U.S. military forces for critical missions in the war on terrorism.

Facing their biggest deployments in history, as much as 80 percent of the combat forces of the 53,000-strong U.S. Special Operations Command -- including Navy SEALs, Army Green Berets and Rangers, and Delta Force operatives -- are committed in Iraq, Afghanistan and surrounding countries. That leaves too few for other vital missions, many of them clandestine, such as intelligence gathering and partnering with forces in nations where the United States is not at war, according to senior military officials.

Stepped-up war-zone rotations are cutting into training time, and shortages in the force mean hundreds of Special Operations jobs are unfilled, leading to more reliance on civilian contractors, they said.

"We as a nation are taking great risk" by having too few maritime commandos, said Rear Adm. Joseph Maguire, commander of Naval Special Warfare Command (NSWC) here. NSWC should have 2,200 SEALs but is undermanned by about 400 men on SEAL teams and scores of officers, he said.

The Pentagon in February announced a plan to add 13,000 more Special Operations troops to meet demands. But producing such highly skilled troops is not easy -- especially as war, low unemployment and negative health trends such as obesity shrink the military's overall pool of candidates.

Of all the elite forces, SEALs pose the biggest recruiting challenge. The Pentagon's goal is to add 500 new SEALs in the next two years. Maguire says 2010 is more realistic. But the number of SEAL applicants has dwindled by hundreds in recent years. This year's goal is to bring in 1,400 to try out, but by late April, only 364 had been sent to boot camp, according to Navy statistics. "We're behind the power curve," said Ed Kearl, a Navy recruiting official.

Ground zero for the push to create more SEALs is the rugged beaches and pounding surf off Coronado, where the young men of Basic Under Water Demolition/SEAL (BUD/S) Class 259 found out who had "the right stuff."The Start of Hell Week

It was a Monday night in May, about 24 hours into Hell Week for Class 259, and Seaman Brian was sitting on the beach next to his rubber dinghy, eating a chili-mac packaged military meal. For security reasons, all SEALs except senior leaders spoke on the condition that only their first names be used.

Similar to the rest of his class, Brian had no sleep, was soaked and shaking. He had muscle cramps from lunging with 15-foot-long sandy logs. His legs were chafed raw. "It's like taking a piece of sandpaper to your skin for a week," said Brian, 23, who is from Ventura, Calif.

As the sky darkened, the entire group knew what was next -- surf torture (officially called "water immersion"), jumping on and off a pier and being hosed down with cold water.

Suddenly, Brian saw a friend stand and walk stiffly toward a bell hung on a wooden frame. Ringing the bell was how candidates dropped out. "Clang!"

"I was like, 'Wow,' " Brian said.

Next, shocking everyone, the Class 259 leader, known as the OIC or "officer in charge," got up. "Clang!" About 12 other recruits followed in a mass exodus. The class that started in March with 193 men was down to 100.

"It was a big psych for a lot of guys because our OIC left. That was hard," said Brian, who dropped out the next morning, his right leg swollen with tendinitis.

The buckling of the class leader underscored how difficult it is to predict who will make it. "They don't want to deal with the discomfort . . . it's kind of frustrating," said Capt. Christopher R. Lindsay, commander of the Naval Special Warfare Center. To help more pass, Maguire said they may eliminate some "water immersion" sessions.

Finding candidates in top physical condition also helps, but until recently, concerns over legal liability prevented potential recruits from being given a swim test. "They would get to boot camp and, 'Oh, by the way they can't swim,' " said Kearl, who said 70 percent of candidates were failing the test. "That's a big problem."

DOJ_NMG_0035256

Now candidates must pass a 500-yard, 12 1/2 -minute swim test at the YMCA -- and do at least 50 sit-ups, six pull-ups, 42 push-ups and a 1 1/2 -mile run -- or lose their SEAL contract. Those who pass with minimum standards will earn a $1,000 bonus, and $2,000 goes to the best performers -- but still only 60 percent succeed.

Maguire is also asking SEAL instructors to be less subjective in disqualifying candidates. But having "given enough flags away" to the families of fallen SEALs, he says he can't compromise the highly competitive standards.

"Everything is a race," said Lindsay, as the seven-man teams hit the surf Tuesday in the red dinghies they carry everywhere.

"If you drop the boat, I will cut your head off!" shouted a veteran SEAL instructor as he ordered laggard boat teams to race around and around a building -- holding their boats on their heads. "Nineteen, 20, 21 . . . get back in line!" he barked to the slowest team.

Garrett, 23, of Hilo, Hawaii, felt his arms start to give way. "We would come in last, and obviously it was because of me," he said. Teammates complained. Instructors put another recruit in his place to show he was the "weak link."

Later Tuesday night, Garrett dropped out, adding another green helmet to the line representing those who failed.Staggering to the Finish Line

At 4:30 a.m. on Wednesday, the 79 remaining candidates staggered out of the mud flats of the 65-degree San Diego Bay, looking like a scene from "Night of the Living Dead."

"They're basically zombies," said Cmdr. Adam Curtis, looking on. Awake for 55 hours, the men could only shuffle. But they were expected to follow directions.

Brandon, a boat team leader, was having trouble.

"You're trying to cheat me, Sir," berated an instructor. Brandon's team had paddled their boat by hand instead of swimming beside it in the last race. Now, they would pay the price.

"Prepare down boat -- down boat! Prepare up boat -- up boat!" the instructor spat commands with a bullhorn. Next the offenders had to roll in the sand.

"We're going to have a little bath," the instructor said, ordering them into the bay. Each time a device beeped they bobbed underwater, green light sticks glowing eerily on their life vests.

Hell Week is designed to simulate the rigors of a combat mission. "They can't say 'I quit' because no one will come get them," explained Command Master Chief Lu, a 25-year Navy veteran and instructor. The end result, Lu said, is impressive. On a recent tour in Baghdad, he fought side by side with former SEAL students and found that "I trusted them as much as guys I was with 20 years," he said.

To qualify, over a six-month period SEAL candidates must swim 150 miles in the ocean and run more than 1,300 miles in sand wearing boots, and later they must learn to dive, parachute, shoot and conduct close-quarters combat.

Born from World War II underwater demolition units, Navy Sea Air Land teams focus on maritime skills, including diving, forced ship boardings, laying undersea charges and reconnaissance. But today, SEALs are occupied mainly on land. Most 16-man SEAL platoons are in Iraq training Iraqi forces, using snipers to watch for insurgents planting bombs and guarding Iraqi leaders.

New missions, many secretive, are creating demands for a more diverse force trained in language and culture. "We are a relatively white, non-Hispanic force. It's nice to have someone who can blend in more," said Capt. Gary Bonelli, NSWC chief of staff. Class 259 has only a handful of minorities.

SEAL recruiters this year are attending dozens of events, such as wrestling matches and "X-games," manning a new call center, and offering a $40,000 bonus to all new SEALs, said recruiting chief Cmdr Duncan A. Smith.

Still, nothing can guarantee that recruits will have the tolerance for stress, flexibility and what Lindsay calls the "fire in the gut" that psychological studies show is critical.

By Friday morning, the class was down to 73, having lost a few more to pneumonia and injuries. In a finale, the exhausted recruits had to low-crawl from the beach to an obstacle course obscured with smoke and rocked by the blast of simulated grenades. Worming their way under concertina wire as instructors fired off blanks from rifles, they slid through a drainpipe into a muddy pool. Barely able to move his legs, Brandon dragged himself forward with his arms, third to last.

"You knew you'd never quit. . . . The courage, the mental toughness is contagious," Lindsay told the bedraggled class on the beach afterward. "You guys are what we want to work with to become Navy SEALs!"

"Hooyah!" Class 259 yelled.

Relaxing later in dry clothes with a pizza and Gatorade, the victorious few reflected on how they made it. "It's just putting one foot in front of the other," said Brandon, rubbing swollen calves.

DOJ_NMG_0035257

Still shivering, Airman Brandon said that after his body broke down, his mind took over. "The main thing I thought about," he said, "was doing things that every guy dreams of doing, but few do."

Stress Disorder Seen Soaring Among Returning Troops (KRT)

By David Goldstein

Knight Ridder, June 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Veterans Affairs is on a pace to see nearly 20,000 new cases of post-combat stress this year among service members who've served in Iraq or Afghanistan, more than six times the number of cases that officials had expected.

The latest report on patient visits to VA medical facilities shows that nearly 5,000 service members were initially diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder during the first three months of this year, on top of nearly 5,000 new diagnoses that the VA had reported for the last three months of 2005.

The VA had predicted that it would see 2,900 new cases in fiscal 2006, which runs from Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 30, 2006.

The VA declined to comment Monday.

"The demand for mental health is not going down," said Cathy Wiblemo, the deputy director for mental health services at the American Legion. "It's definitely going up."

Knight Ridder reported last month that the VA had dramatically underestimated the number of service members who would return from Iraq and Afghanistan with post-traumatic stress disorder.

The new report drew immediate criticism from some in Congress.

"Frankly, I don't think that VA's budget planned for this number of new veterans with mental health concerns," Rep. Michael Michaud, D-Maine, a member of the House Veteran's Affairs Committee, said in a statement.

Post-traumatic stress disorder is an anxiety disorder that can cause serious psychiatric and social problems. Combat, a plane crash or other traumatic experiences can trigger it. Untreated, it can lead to drug addiction, homelessness and other social problems.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have been particularly stressful because they involve urban warfare amid civilians who are hard to distinguish from the enemy. There are no front lines or safe areas, and the enemy uses improvised bombs and ambushes.

A statement from the Democratic members of the House VA Committee said that even as the number of post-traumatic stress disorder cases increased, the VA had cut back the number of PTSD therapy sessions for veterans by 25 percent in the last 10 years.

In a related issue, the Government Accountability Office recently found that the Pentagon didn't seek further mental-health treatment for eight out of 10 soldiers deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan who showed signs of post-combat stress.

William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, responded that the GAO report was "flawed."

Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

More than 30 years after their war ended, thousands of Vietnam veterans are seeking help for post-traumatic stress disorder, and experts say one reason appears to be harrowing images of combat in Iraq.

Figures from the Department of Veterans Affairs show that PTSD disability-compensation cases have nearly doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of more than 260,000. The biggest bulge has come since 2003, when war started in Iraq.

Experts say that, although several factors may be at work in the burgeoning caseload, many veterans of past wars reexperience their own trauma as they watch televised images of U.S. troops in combat and read each new accounting of the dead.

"It so directly parallels what happened to Vietnam veterans," said Raymond M. Scurfield of the University of Southern Mississippi's Gulf Coast campus, who worked with the disorder at VA for more than 20 years and has written two books on the subject. "The war has to be triggering their issues. They're almost the same issues."

At VA, officials said the Iraq war is probably a contributing factor in the rise in cases, although they said they have conducted no formal studies.

PTSD researcher John P. Wilson, who oversaw a small recent survey of 70 veterans -- nearly all from Vietnam -- at Cleveland State University, said 57 percent reported flashbacks after watching reports about the war on television, and almost 46 percent said their sleep was disrupted. Nearly 44 percent said they had fallen into a depression since the war began, and nearly 30 percent said they had sought counseling since combat started in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0035258

"Clearly the current Iraq war, and their exposure to it, created significantly increased distress for them," said Wilson, who has done extensive research on Vietnam veterans since the 1970s. "We found very high levels of intensification of their symptoms. . . . It's like a fever that has gone from 99 to 104."

Vietnam veterans are the vast majority of VA's PTSD disability cases -- more than 73 percent. Veterans of more recent wars -- Iraq, Afghanistan and the 1991 Persian Gulf War -- together made up less than 8 percent in 2005.

VA officials said other reasons for the surge in cases may include a lessening of the stigma associated with PTSD and the aging of the Vietnam generation -- explanations that veterans groups also suggest.

PTSD is better understood than it once was, said Paul Sullivan, director of programs for the group Veterans for America. "The veterans are more willing to accept a diagnosis of PTSD," he said, "and the VA is more willing to make it."

In addition, as Vietnam veterans near retirement age, "they have more time to think, instead of focusing on making a living all the time, and for some this is not necessarily a good thing," said Rick Weidman, executive director for policy and government affairs at Vietnam Veterans of America.

Max Cleland, a former U.S. senator from Georgia and onetime head of the VA who was left a triple amputee by the Vietnam War, said the convergence of age and the Iraq war has created problems for many of his fellow veterans -- as well as for himself.

"As we Vietnam veterans get older, we are more vulnerable," he said. When the war started in 2003, he said, "it was like going back in time -- it was like 1968 again."

Now he goes for therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and is wary of news from Iraq. "I don't read a newspaper," he said. "I don't watch television. It's all a trigger. . . . This war has triggered me, and it has triggered Vietnam veterans all over America."

PTSD has become a volatile topic lately, with some skeptics questioning whether the rise in claims is driven by overdiagnosis or by financial motives. A report last week from the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academies, concluded that "PTSD is a well characterized medical disorder" for which "all veterans deployed to a war zone are at risk."

VA's growing PTSD caseload became an issue last August, when the agency announced a new review of 72,000 PTSD compensation cases, expressing concerns about errors and a lack of evidence. That probe was dropped after a sample of 2,100 cases turned up no instances of fraud.

Still, some experts are not convinced that the Iraq war has driven up the caseload. "I'm skeptical that it accounts for a broad swath of this phenomenon," said psychiatrist Sally Satel, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "These men have had deaths in their families, they had all kinds of tragedies over 30 years that surely affected them emotionally but they coped with."

Although a small percentage of veterans might be deeply affected, she said, she doubts "they have become chronically disabled because of it."

Around the country, many veterans dwell on the similarities between the wars in Vietnam and Iraq: guerrilla tactics, deadly explosives, fallen comrades, divisive politics. The way they see it, "Iraq is Vietnam without water," Weidman said.

"We have people who have symptoms that they haven't had in a long time," said Randy Barnes, 65, who works in the Kansas City offices of Vietnam Veterans of America. For some, "the nightmares and flashbacks have been very hard to deal with," he said. Group therapy sessions are "much more crowded," he said, "with Vietnam veterans particularly, but now also with the Iraq and Afghanistan veterans."

Barnes served as a combat medic in Vietnam from 1968 to 1969 and went into treatment only in the late 1990s. By the time the Iraq war started, he said, he felt steadier -- but then his symptoms ramped up again.

"Depending on what I saw or heard that day or read, I would have night problems -- nightmares, night sweats," he said. Sometimes, he said, he would roll out of bed and wake up crawling on the floor, "seeking safety, I guess."

A study published in February by VA experts showed that veterans under VA care experienced notable mental distress after the war started and as it intensified. While younger veterans, ages 18 to 44, showed the greatest reactions to the war, "Vietnam era VA patients reported particularly high levels" of distress consistently, the study reported.

Powerful images of war have revived combat trauma in the past. "Traumatized people overreact to things that remind them of their original trauma," said Scurfield, the PTSD expert in Mississippi.

When the movie "Saving Private Ryan" was released, World War II veterans sought mental health help in great numbers, said Wilson of Cleveland State. "It rekindled it all," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0035259

Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BETHESDA, Md., June 17 — Almost every Thursday during the academic year, a bus carrying a dozen or so Naval Academy midshipmen leaves Annapolis for the 45-minute drive to Bethesda, where Navy doctors perform laser eye surgery on them, one after another, with assembly-line efficiency.

Nearly a third of every 1,000-member Naval Academy class now undergoes the procedure, part of a booming trend among military personnel with poor vision. Unlike in the civilian world, where eye surgery is still largely done for convenience or vanity, the procedure's popularity in the armed forces is transforming career choices and daily life in subtle but far-reaching ways.

Aging fighter pilots can now remain in the cockpit longer, reducing annual recruiting needs. And recruits whose bad vision once would have disqualified them from the special forces are now eligible, making the competition for these coveted slots even tougher.

But the surgery is also causing the military some unexpected difficulties. By shrinking the pool of people who used to be routinely available for jobs that do not require perfect eyesight, it has made it harder to fill some of those assignments with top-notch personnel, officers say.

When Ensign Michael Shaughnessy had the surgery in his junior year at the Naval Academy, his new 20-20 vision qualified him for flight school. And that is where he decided to go after graduating last month ranked in the top 10 percent of his class, rather than pursuing a career as a submarine officer.

"The cramped environment in submarines is something that turned me off," Ensign Shaughnessy, 22, said.

For generations, Academy graduates with high grades and bad eyes were funneled into the submarine service. But in the five years since the Naval Academy began offering free eye surgery to all midshipmen, it has missed its annual quota for supplying the Navy with submarine officers every year.

Officers involved say the failure to meet the quota is due to many factors, including the perception that submarines no longer play as vital a national security role as they once did. But the availability of eye surgery to any midshipman who wants it is also routinely cited.

"Some of the guys with glasses who would have gone to submarines or become navigators are getting the chance to do something they'd rather do, and the communities that are losing the people are not as happy about it as the aviation community, which is gaining better candidates," said Cmdr. Joseph Pasternak, the ophthalmologist who oversees the program at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda.

In the Naval Academy's class of 2006, 349 of the 993 midshipmen had the surgery, up from 50 five years ago, according to Naval Academy records. Fewer than 30 percent of the academy students whose eyes qualify for the surgery choose not to get it, and the number of holdouts is dropping every year, Commander Pasternak said.

Last week, a little after 10:40 a.m., Colin Carroll, a 21-year-old midshipman from Olney, Md., put anesthetic drops in his eyes and lay down under the laser as Capt. Kerry Hunt, a Navy doctor, and two assistants prepared to begin. "We're locking the laser on now," Captain Hunt told him.

Midshipman Carroll had originally hoped to enter flight school but discovered not only that his eyes were not good enough, but also that he was prone to kidney stones, ruling him out of aviation entirely. He said he was "resigned" to entering the Marine Corps or becoming an officer on a surface ship, neither an assignment requiring perfect vision.

But he decided to get the surgery anyway.

By 10:49, both eyes were done, though extremely bloodshot, and Mr. Carroll walked out wearing sunglasses, declaring he could already see better.

The procedure used by the Navy, photorefractive keratectomy, or PRK, is different from the one used on most civilians. That approach, known as laser-in situ keratomileusis, or Lasik, requires cutting a flap in the surface of the cornea and then using a laser to reshape the cornea. But military doctors worry that the flap could come loose during combat, especially in a supersonic fighter.

So rather than slicing into the cornea covering, Navy doctors grind it away. The approach requires a longer recovery as the covering re-forms but leaves the eye more stable.

The Air Force also limits its pilots to PRK, but nonpilots can get either procedure; because most students admitted to the academy aspire to fly, and have already met strict vision standards, relatively few cadets have the surgery, compared with the number at the Naval Academy. Army personnel, including helicopter pilots and other aviators, are allowed to get either procedure.

DOJ_NMG_0035260

One in every 200 midshipmen who has the surgery suffers initial complications, which can usually be corrected, Commander Pasternak said. A study by the Navy soon after the program began concluded that pilot trainees who had the surgery graduated from flight school at higher rates than other pilots, he added.

Now that most midshipmen meet the vision requirements, getting into pilot training is harder than ever, depending almost entirely on academic class rank, military performance while at the academy and other physical criteria.

Last year, 310 midshipmen competed for 272 flight training slots. Of those, 104 had undergone laser eye surgery.

"If we didn't have PRK, where would those 104 midshipmen have gone?" said Capt. Michael Jacobsen, of the Naval Academy's office of professional development. "Tough to say, but we know they wouldn't have gone into flight training."

Expanding the pool of potential pilots and members in the Navy Seals was the original goal of making the surgery available, Commander Pasternak said, but it has become increasingly popular with marines, who say it eliminates concerns that their glasses will be damaged or clouded in dust storms during combat in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We get at least five times as many requests every year as we can keep up with," said Commander Pasternak, a 1984 Naval Academy graduate who said he nearly left the academy after learning his eyes were not good enough to allow him into flight training.

The growing number of aspiring pilots has also made it harder to find candidates to become "back-seaters," officers who serve as navigators and weapons officers on planes, Navy officials say.

The failure to produce enough submarine officers, though, is the source of greatest worry to academy officials and the Navy as a whole. This year the academy's quota was 120, but only 88 midshipmen chose to go into submarines, according to academy records.

Acknowledging the decline, Capt. John R. Daugherty, the chief of staff in the Commander Naval Submarine Forces, said in a statement, "There are many potential contributing factors."

The shortfall in the submarine quota is made up from officers joining the Navy who do not attend the academy.

While there are no plans to restrict the availability of the surgery, some Navy officials concede that the procedure contributes to the submarine service losing midshipmen at the top of their class, like Ensign Shaughnessy, a native of Rochester, Minn., who formerly could not have gone to flight school.

Going into submarines "requires a lot more school, and after the academy a lot of people aren't looking to go to a high-paced environment for a long period," Ensign Shaughnessy said. "And some people also might see submarines as a less glamorous service assignment."

In recent years, many of the midshipmen to choose submarines have come from lower in the class rankings than they did a decade ago, said a senior Navy official who declined to release specific data and who was granted anonymity so he would discuss internal Navy personnel matters.

And academy graduates have been washing out of nuclear power school, which they must complete before being commissioned as a submarine officer, at an increasing rate over the last five years, according to the Navy official and an outside expert who has studied the issue.

In response, the Navy has begun offering $15,000 bonuses and other incentives to get midshipmen with better grades to join the submarine program.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Attorney Asks Black For More Bond Security (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Federal prosecutors in Chicago are demanding that former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, who was released on a $20 million bond last year, provide additional security to remain out on bail until his trial on fraud and racketeering charges next year.

In documents filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald says he is asking for more security on the bond because Mr. Black has failed to pay the mortgage on his Palm Beach, Fla., home -- which is part of his bail bond -- and "has provided false statements to the government about his financial assets."

Edward Greenspan, a lawyer for Mr. Black, said "there are numerous misstatements" and "numerous half-truths" in the documents. "The prosecution filed its material this morning with practically no notice about what allegations were going to be included," Mr. Greenspan said. Mr. Black has pleaded not guilty to the fraud and racketeering charges.

DOJ_NMG_0035261

The bail dispute offers a glimpse into Mr. Black's finances since his ouster as head of Chicago-based Hollinger International Inc. Mr. Black's dealings at the company were first scrutinized by a board committee after shareholders complained about excessive corporate compensation and executive perquisites, such as a luxuriously outfitted private jet.

The government is seeking a forced sale of his oceanside Palm Beach estate because a payment due June 15 wasn't made on a $10 million promissory note that is secured by the mortgage on the property, the documents say. As a result, the interest rate on the loan was pushed up to 26% from 21%, and the government's ability to eventually recover equity from the property has been jeopardized, according to the documents.

In addition, the government is demanding that Mr. Black put up his stake in Horizon Operations Ltd., a closely held publisher of community newspapers that Mr. Black owns with former Hollinger lieutenant David Radler. According to the prosecutors, Mr. Black has been in discussions to sell his Horizon stake for $16 million.

A financial affidavit provided by Mr. Black at the time of his bail arrangements disclosed four Canadian bank accounts. But Mr. Black may be holding back on disclosing all of his assets, prosecutors argue. He recently paid taxes of about $460,000 on the Palm Beach house and made a donation of 500,000 Canadian dollars (US$446,000) to the Canadian Opera Company in Toronto, according to the documents. Mr. Black's bail conditions allow him to live in Canada, with trips to Chicago for court dates.

Mr. Greenspan is to file his response to the demand for new bail conditions Thursday, and Judge Amy St. Eve is expected to rule on the issue next week.

Black Broke Agreement On Bail Bond, U.S. Tells Court (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris

Bloomberg, June 20, 2006

June 19 (Bloomberg) -- Conrad Black's $20 million bail bond should be modified or revoked, U.S. prosecutors said, claiming the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman hadn't been honest about the value of assets securing his freedom.

Black overstated the value of a Palm Beach, Florida, home he pledged for bail, the U.S. said in a court filing and hearing. He understated a Canadian tax lien on the property and didn't disclose his wife was part owner, prosecutors said.

U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve delayed today's hearing until June 26. The government said Black, once among the world's largest publishers of English-language newspapers, should put up additional collateral or have his bail revoked. A former U.S. prosecutor said Black must take the possibility seriously.

``Judges tend to get angry when they feel a defendant is possibly playing games with the court," said Andrew Genser, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a partner at Kirkland & Ellis. ``Mr. Black's lawyers on June 26 would want to come in with an answer to these allegations that's convincing or have substitute assets ready to post."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Sussman said, ``We're here because Mr. Black is in default" on the property's mortgage, and asked the judge to order the publisher to put up ``untainted" collateral or lose his liberty.

Edward Genson, Black's lawyer, said in court that he received the government filing only this morning.

`Flat Out Wrong'

``A lot of things in there are flat out wrong," Genson told St. Eve. Black wasn't in the courtroom.

Black faces a trial next year on 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. The U.S. accuses him of using a Toronto holding company, Hollinger Inc., to enrich himself and his associates at shareholders' expense.

Prosecutors charged Black and others with pilfering $92 million from Hollinger International by moving the money through other companies they owned.

David Radler, former publisher of Hollinger's Chicago Sun- Times, pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the Justice Department.

Black was freed on bail in December 2005. As a condition of his release, he was required to put up the $20 million bail bond backed by the Palm Beach home and $8.5 million he made from the sale of a Park Avenue apartment in Manhattan.

The government already had targeted those assets in a forfeiture proceeding, arguing they were the fruits of his looting of Hollinger International.

In a separate filing, the Justice Department asked St. Eve to order the Palm Beach property sold so that the proceeds can be escrowed pending the outcome of the forfeiture proceedings.

Entitlement in Doubt

``In essence, the government agreed to allow defendant to post assets for which there was probable cause to believe defendant was never legally entitled to own," Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Siskel wrote in today's court filing.

DOJ_NMG_0035262

Black told prosecutors the Palm Beach property was owned by his Conrad Black Capital Corp., Siskel said. The property was encumbered by a $10 million mortgage and a Canadian tax lien of C$13 million ($8.9 million) to C$14 million.

Black said, and prosecutors accepted as fact, that there was at least $8 million in equity remaining, the government said.

Prosecutors now say that Black owes the Canadian government more than C$16 million in back taxes, that he defaulted on the Palm Beach mortgage and that his wife is a part owner of the property. In court, Sussman questioned what, if any, equity Black still has in the property.

Genson, Black's lawyer, told the judge that Black's wife, Barbara Amiel Black, holds only nonvoting shares in Conrad Black Capital Corp. He offered prosecutors a chance to talk directly with Canadian authorities about the size of the lien.

Hollinger Founder

Black founded Hollinger and led it for eight years as a public company until he was forced out in November 2003.

Black at his height trailed only Rupert Murdoch and Gannett Co. among the biggest owners of English-language newspapers. Hollinger published London's Daily Telegraph, the Jerusalem Post and 60 percent of Canada's dailies.

Shareholders of Hollinger International last week voted to change the company name to Sun-Times Media Group Inc.

Black's trial is set to start on March 5.

The case is U.S. v. Black, 1:05-cr-00727, U.S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois (Chicago).

Denver Lawyer Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Probe (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 20, 2006

Federal prosecutors who indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman last month are in talks with a Denver lawyer whose testimony could sharpen the investigation's focus toward Melvyn Weiss, founding partner of the New York-based law firm, according to sources familiar with the government's probe.

Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles returned an indictment against Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, alleging that they obtained $216.1 million in attorney fees by paying $11.3 million in secret and illegal kickbacks to three individuals who served as lead plaintiffs in their cases. USA v. Lazar, No. 05cr00587 (C.D. Calif.).

Bershad and Schulman have taken leaves of absence from the firm.

Prosecutors have said that the investigation is ongoing, leaving open the possibility of additional indictments against Weiss and William Lerach, a senior partner who left the firm in 2004 to found San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

According to the indictment, a senior partner at Milberg Weiss met in 2003 with the Denver lawyer and agreed that a percentage of attorney fees in two cases would go to Howard Vogel, a retired real estate mortgage broker whose retirement fund or family members were serving as plaintiffs for Milberg Weiss. In April, Vogel admitted to charges in a plea deal that he provided false information in federal court and has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

According to sources familiar with the case, the senior partner at that 2003 meeting was Weiss, and the Denver lawyer was Gary Lozow, a shareholder at Isaacson Rosenbaum.

"Mr. Lozow is working closely with the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, and we expect that will continue," said John Walsh, a partner at Denver's Hill & Robbins who represents Lozow. He declined to comment further.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, declined to comment. Weiss' lawyer, Benjamin Brafman at New York-based Brafman & Associates, said: "There is nothing that Mr. Lozow could truthfully say that in any way implicates Mr. Weiss in any wrongdoing because Mr. Weiss did not ever knowingly violate the law."

LOOKING FOR A LINK

So far, prosecutors have failed to establish a direct link to Weiss and Lerach in their years-long investigation against Milberg Weiss. In February, prosecutors told both lawyers that they would not bring charges against them anytime soon.

Last summer, prosecutors indicted Seymour Lazar, an alleged paid plaintiff for Milberg Weiss, and his lawyer, Paul Selzer. In the past few months, prosecutors have obtained guilty pleas from Los Angeles lawyer Richard Purtich, who admitted taking payments from Milberg Weiss and passing them on to another paid plaintiff, and from Vogel, who along with his family is alleged to have received almost $2.5 million in kickbacks from Milberg Weiss.

In two cases involving Vogel, the indictment makes the most prominent references to "Partner A," who is believed to be Weiss, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

According to court papers, in June 2003, Milberg Weiss received $40 million in attorney fees in a class action securities case against Oxford Health Plans. Howard Vogel v. Oxford Health Plans, No. 97cv02325 (D. Conn.).

DOJ_NMG_0035263

In September 2003, Vogel, whose retirement fund was a plaintiff in that case, sent a memo to Schulman stating that a lawyer, referred to in the indictment as "Vogel Intermediary A," would be calling the secretary for "Partner A" to arrange a phone call about the payments in that case. "Vogel Intermediary A" is believed to be Lozow, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

Vogel also wanted to discuss payments in a separate case in which his stepson was serving as a plaintiff against Baan Co., the indictment says.

In response, Schulman told Vogel that "Partner A" would not discuss the matter by phone, but that "Vogel Intermediary A" should meet with him in person at Milberg Weiss' New York office, the indictment says.

On Nov. 10, 2003, "Partner A" met with "Vogel Intermediary A" at the firm's New York office and "agreed that Milberg Weiss would pay Vogel a percentage of its attorney fees obtained in connection with Oxford Health and Baan," the indictment says. On Dec. 18, 2003, Milberg Weiss, Schulman and "Partner A" sent "Vogel Intermediary A" two checks, one for $1.1 million and one for $120,000. Those checks were wired to a bank account controlled by Vogel.

Schulman's lawyer, Herbert Stern, did not return calls seeking comment.

If Lozow agrees to plead guilty or sign an immunity deal with prosecutors, that would move the case one step closer to Weiss, say sources familiar with the investigation.

"They'd love to turn Lozow," said one lawyer familiar with the case who requested anonymity. "He'd make a great case if he came in and said, 'I conspired with Schulman and Weiss.'"

Father, Son Plead Guilty To SureWest Fraud (SACBIZ)

Sacramento Business Journal, June 20, 2006

A former treasury analyst for SureWest Communications and his father pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to charges that they had taken $2 million from the Roseville-based telecom company.

Arrested in early 2004 were former SureWest treasury analyst Jeffrey Wells, 31, of Roseville; his father, Larry Wells, 60, of Pebble Beach; and a business associate, Henry M. Kaiser, 59, of Piedmont.

The trio had been charged with illegally diverting several million dollars in SureWest cash and investment funds controlled by Jeffrey Wells to outside accounts to secure financing for Quivira Ventures, owned or controlled by the elder Wells and Kaiser.

The U.S. Justice Department said that the money transfers were made "so that Quivira could demonstrate to potential investors that it had sufficient funds on deposit to be a venture capital firm and thereby attract new investors."

Kaiser, grandson of industrialist Henry J. Kaiser, stepped down from the Kaiser Permanente board after he was charged. In April 2004, Kaiser admitted guilt to "interstate transportation of money obtained by fraud and conducting a monetary transaction in criminally derived property."

On Monday, Jeffrey Wells pleaded guilty to 10 counts of wire fraud, while his father pleaded guilty to two counts of wire fraud and two counts of engaging in transactions with criminally derived property.

"We're all happy to have begun to put this long and difficult chapter behind us," said Larry Wells' attorney, William Portanova of Sacramento. Sentencing is scheduled for Aug. 29.

It took less than nine months after the trio's arrest in 2004 for Roseville-based SureWest (Nasdaq: SURW - News) to regain all $25 million that the company said was misappropriated. All but $1.8 million was returned upon the arrests, and SureWest's insurer paid the rest, the company reported.

Fed Governor Olson To Head Accounting Board (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Ending months of regulatory uncertainty for the accounting industry, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday named Mark W. Olson, a Federal Reserve Board governor, to head the agency that regulates accounting firms.

Mr. Olson's appointment to chair the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board is one of the most significant to be made by Mr. Cox since he took the helm of the nation's markets watchdog last year. The PCAOB oversees accounting firms that audit public companies and was formed in the wake of corporate scandals such as those at Enron Corp. Its creation ended decades of self-regulation by the accounting industry.

Mr. Olson, 63 years old, will become the PCAOB's second full-time chairman, a position that pays $615,000 annually. He fills the spot left vacant last fall by the resignation of the board's first chairman, William McDonough, also a former Federal Reserve governor. Mr. Olson will take over from acting PCAOB Chairman Willis Gradison, 77, a former Republican Congressman who will remain on the board.

DOJ_NMG_0035264

Mr. Olson said in an interview yesterday that he wasn't going into the position with a preset agenda, although he expected that debate over how to implement rules related to companies' internal controls would continue as a big issue for the board. He said he expects to take up his new position in early July.

Mr. Cox also filled yesterday a second opening at the PCAOB, announcing that founding board member Kayla Gillan will remain in her seat. Ms. Gillan, a former general counsel to the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or Calpers, had continued to serve on the board since her term expired last fall. Board members earn $500,000 a year.

The selection of Mr. Olson to lead the PCAOB opens another seat on the seven-member Federal Reserve Board for President Bush to fill. All the existing board members are Bush appointees. Mr. Olson has been on the Fed board since December 2001 and has overseen administrative matters as well as chaired the Fed's committee on consumer and community affairs.

Although he has a banking background, Mr. Olson is a former partner with Big Four accounting firm Ernst & Young LLP. In addition, he was staff director of a Senate subcommittee overseeing the SEC, accounting issues and the insurance industry.

Lone Star Is Cleared In Probe Of KEB Deal (WSJ)

By Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

HONG KONG -- South Korean regulators cleared Lone Star Funds of any wrongdoing in its purchase of Korea Exchange Bank. Instead, they accused KEB's former management and several government agencies of mishandling the bank's sale in 2003, when many of the country's financial institutions were reeling from mounds of bad credit-card debt.

While exonerating Lone Star and allaying concerns that regulators would seek to nullify the deal, the report of the Board of Audit and Inspection does little to relieve the Dallas private-equity fund's other major worry: that it might have to pay full taxes on its profit from the sale of its KEB stake, to Korea's Kookmin Bank, once the sale is finalized.

That deal now awaits the conclusion of Korean prosecutors, who are conducting their own probe of the KEB transaction, including Lone Star's role.

Lone Star didn't return calls seeking comment.

The audit board's report, released yesterday, says KEB executives exaggerated the bank's losses at the time of the sale, understating its capital-adequacy ratio and deeming the bank "troubled," a designation that allowed a foreign buyer -- in this case, Lone Star -- to step in, speeding the sale. The audit board singled out KEB's chief executive at the time, Lee Kang Won, saying he undervalued the bank by making unrealistic assumptions.

Mr. Lee currently heads Korea Investment Corp., a state-run investment company set up last year by the Finance Ministry. KIC had no immediate comment.

In addition, the audit board said that regulators, including Korea's Ministry of Finance and Economy, gave approval without checking adequately to ensure that the bank's condition was truly dire. A Finance Ministry spokeswoman declined to comment.

The audit board's report comes as Korean business leaders and bureaucrats are being subjected to increased scrutiny. It was issued about a month after the indictment of Hyundai Motor Co. Chairman Chung Mong Koo, who stands accused of creating a "slush fund" used to pay for influence among government bureaucrats and financial-industry executives.

In carrying out its three-month investigation, the audit board summoned for questioning several current and former government officials, including Mr. Lee; Kim Seok Dong, deputy finance minister and former head of the Financial Supervisory Commission; and Byeon Yang Ho, former head of the Finance Ministry's banking policy bureau. Separately, Mr. Byeon was arrested last week on allegations he accepted bribes from a lobbyist for Hyundai Motor.

For Lone Star, a recommendation by the audit board that the 2003 KEB sale be quashed could have proved disastrous, as the fund's investors might have received little more than their principal sum in return. Under Lone Star's current plan to sell Korea Exchange Bank to Kookmin Bank, the fund and its investors stand to reap $4.5 billion in profit on a $1.2 billion investment.

But the prosecutor's probe remains, as does the tax issue.

Foreign funds operating in South Korea, such as Lone Star, have largely avoided taxes by registering in offshore jurisdictions that have tax treaties with Seoul. The treaties are designed to give tax relief to foreigners, who then are expected to pay capital gains and other taxes in their home jurisdictions. But many of the jurisdictions in which the funds register don't levy capital-gains taxes. The tax issue has inflamed the Korean public, as foreign funds recently have reaped huge profits by cashing out of equity stakes bought on the cheap after the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis and Korea's subsequent widespread credit-card debt defaults.

DOJ_NMG_0035265

Carlyle Group, for instance, initially didn't pay any taxes in South Korea after selling KorAm Bank to Citigroup Inc. in 2004 for $2.73 billion, a deal that more than doubled the fund's investment. The U.S. private-equity firm later paid an undisclosed sum after authorities last year conducted an audit of five funds, including Carlyle and Lone Star, slapping them with a combined assessment of $207 million. Newbridge Capital hasn't paid any taxes on its sale of Korea First Bank to Standard Chartered PLC.

Without tax-treaty protection, foreign investors who sell shares in South Korea pay either an 11% withholding tax on the proceeds, or 27.5% of capital gains, whichever is less. Lone Star has agreed to set aside about $700 million to cover any taxes resulting from the KEB sale.

Lone Star has said it is willing to pay some taxes on the KEB sale, but people close to the fund say it is likely to fight a full tax assessment.

Further weighing on Lone Star's reputation in South Korea, the firm's former head in the country, Steven Lee, has admitted to embezzling from the fund about $12 million over several years in a scheme that involved filing false invoices. Authorities are also looking into Lone Star's dealings in nonperforming loans.

Options Timing Raises Concerns Among Insurers (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The controversy over executive stock options has the insurance industry casting a wary eye at the liability protection it provides to corporate officers and directors, a development that could in some cases push premiums higher or reduce coverage for directors and executives.

At least three dozen companies are facing federal probes over whether they backdated or manipulated stock options, timing them to boost the payoff for executives. Shareholders in some cases have responded by filing lawsuits, and insurers are bracing for a slew of claims.

"The underwriters are obviously concerned that it's going to be a major source of claims," said John Schwonke, a senior vice president at ABD Insurance and Financial Services, an insurance broker based in Redwood City, Calif., that handles directors and officers, or "D&O," insurance for more than 100 publicly traded companies.

At this point, premiums haven't started to rise. But insurers have begun asking their own questions about the options practices of clients. Some, for example, are asking customers whether they have ever backdated options or received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission on the timing of grants.

"If we have any cause for concern, we may exclude the risk," said James Bronner, a senior vice president and chief underwriting officer for Chubb Specialty Insurance, a unit of Chubb Corp., one of the nation's leading D&O insurers. "If a company grants options on a different day each year -- and if that happens to be the 52-week low point for its stock each year -- we're going to be suspicious."

The scrutiny has the potential to shake up the market for D&O insurance, which is intended to protect top corporate officials from facing personal losses for decisions they make in their posts running companies. The insurance, usually paid for by the company, typically reimburses the company or its officials for expenses such as legal fees. No hard figures exist for the size of the D&O insurance market, but insurance-industry executives estimate it generates several billion dollars in premiums annually.

The D&O market saw considerable upheaval and a sharp rise in premiums in 2002 and 2003, in part because of accounting scandals at companies including Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. Cases such as those could be costly for insurers and, in some cases, directors. Eleven former board members of WorldCom, for example, agreed to pay $20.2 million out of their own pockets to settle a suit, and their insurers agreed to shell out another $35 million.

With new insurers recently entering the market and competing for D&O business, premium prices have generally fallen in the past two years after soaring amid the accounting scandals. Last year, U.S. for-profit companies paid about 18% less on average for D&O premiums than in 2003, according to an annual survey by Tillinghast, an insurance-industry consulting firm and a unit of Towers Perrin.

That survey found that a U.S. for-profit company with $5 billion in assets had D&O coverage of as much as $104.8 million on average. The average total premium for U.S. companies was $257,223.

Prices are expected to rise again eventually because claims are becoming gradually more common and more expensive. The recent questions about the dating of stock options could be the precipitating event for a rise, said Elissa Sirovatka, the principal author of the Tillinghast survey. Increases could be focused in industries like technology, where the options practices of numerous companies are under scrutiny.

Shareholders have filed several lawsuits relating to options-granting practices. Two pension funds from Ohio filed suit in May accusing board members at UnitedHealth Group Inc. of allowing the "backdating" of stock options. A spokesman for UnitedHealth said the company will vigorously defend the lawsuit and continue to focus on customers and improving the health-care system. American Tower Corp. said last month that a shareholder had filed suit against some current and former directors related to past options-granting practices; the board has formed a special committee to evaluate the suit. American Tower declined to comment further.

DOJ_NMG_0035266

It isn't clear how severely the D&O market will be hit by the evolving situation. Much depends on how many lawsuits are filed and the outcomes of those suits. That is unlikely to be known for months or years. Moreover, brokers say they would resist any attempts by insurers to limit coverage.

"The question really is: How widespread is the issue?" said John Doyle, a senior vice president at American International Group Inc., another underwriter of D&O insurance.

Companies generally grant options with a "strike" price equivalent to the share price when the grant was approved. In theory, the recipient will earn money if the company does well and the stock rises. Backdating -- moving the grant to a prior date when the share price was lower -- gives the recipient an instant paper profit, regardless of how the company performs.

"Just the sheer cost of defense" could be a significant concern even absent a major settlement, said Mr. Schwonke of ABD.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff May See Delayed Sentence (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

The Justice Department and attorneys for disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff have agreed to postpone for at least three months the day he has to report to federal prison — the latest sign that Abramoff's continued cooperation with an ongoing corruption probe in Washington, D.C., is proving helpful to prosecutors.

Abramoff had been scheduled to surrender himself to the Bureau of Prisons on June 29 to begin the 70-month prison sentence handed down by Judge Paul Huck of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. Abramoff and Adam Kidan, Abramoff's former business partner in a Florida-based gambling cruise ship company, pleaded guilty in January to mail and wire fraud in that case, and each received the same prison sentence from Huck.

Abramoff and Kidan also were ordered to pay a total of $21.7 million in restitution.

Justice officials and Abramoff's lawyers filed a joint motion with Huck on Friday night asking for a three-month reprieve for Abramoff, who is cooperating with federal prosecutors in an ongoing probe that has roiled official Washington.

Abramoff also has pleaded guilty in that case and faces as much as 11 years in prison after admitting to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials, although he has not been sentenced yet. Abramoff next meets with the judge overseeing the Washington case on Sept. 6. Whatever sentence Abramoff receives in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia will be served concurrently with the Florida charges.

It was unclear at press time whether Huck has approved the joint motion, which was filed after the federal court in Miami closed on Friday. Several calls to Huck's office were not returned.

Several sources close to the case believe Abramoff may not be required to begin his prison sentence in the Florida case until next year, depending on how the Washington corruption probe is progressing.

One lawyer who asked not to be identified said Huck "is not the kind of judge that will allow [Abramoff] to walk around" without an incarceration date, meaning that Huck could end up approving several 90-day extensions before the one-time lobbying superstar enters prison. A three-month extension from his current incarceration date would allow Abramoff to remain free until the end of September on the Florida charges.

Another issue for Abramoff's attorneys is where he will serve his prison sentence. Abramoff is an Orthodox Jew, and his lawyers have said they will seek to have him incarcerated at a federal facility where he can attend religious services, a source close to the case said.

Abramoff would like to be sent to a prison that would allow him to have some access to his wife and five children.

Three other individuals close to Abramoff have pleaded guilty in the Washington corruption probe, and a fourth's fate is still being weighed by a federal jury, although none has been sentenced, much less received a date for his incarceration to begin.

Michael Scanlon, a one-time aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), pleaded guilty in November to conspiracy to bribe public officials and commit mail and wire fraud. Scanlon's sentencing has been postponed, and he will next appear before a federal judge in September to review the status of his case.

DOJ_NMG_0035267

Tony Rudy, another DeLay aide, pleaded guilty in March to federal fraud and lobbying violations charges. His next court date is July 11.

Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), admitted in May to conspiracy to commit fraud and violating the one-year ban on lobbying by former top Congressional aides. His next court date is Aug. 10.

David Safavian, a former Bush administration official, is currently on trial in federal court for allegedly lying to federal and Congressional investigators over his relationship with Abramoff. At press time, the jury was deliberating the charges against Safavian. Volz appeared as a prosecution witness during Safavian's trial.

Hiring Trial Shown Alleged Clout List (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos, Rudolph Bush And Todd Lighty, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 20, 2006

A who's who of Chicago political power brokers and the job seekers they sponsored was unveiled Monday by federal prosecutors in the City Hall corruption trial.

The list of more than 5,700 politically connected job applicants became public as a longtime secretary in Mayor Richard Daley's office testified for federal prosecutors against former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich.

Although city officials insisted for years that they did not engage in patronage hiring, secretary Patricia Molloy said aides in the mayor's office kept track of job seekers and their political sponsors, beginning shortly after Daley's election in 1989 and during much of his 17-year tenure.

The names of the mayor's three brothers--Michael, John and William Daley--were entered into the database as sponsors of people seeking jobs or promotions, according to court records. Other sponsors on the list include longtime mayoral political strategist Jeremiah Joyce and former top aides Timothy Degnan, Victor Reyes and John Doerrer.

At least two applicants were described as friends of the mayor, and Gov. Rod Blagojevich also was identified as a sponsor of a successful job seeker on the list, which Molloy compiled between 1990 and 1997.

Sorich and three other former Daley administration officials are charged with rigging city hiring and promotions to favor applicants backed by the mayor's office. Prosecutors say the fraud scheme benefited the mayor's political organization and was intended to get around a federal court decree restricting patronage hiring.

The hiring of political allies fueled the infamous Chicago Democratic machine for decades, but patronage was supposed to have ended when the city agreed to the Shakman decree more than 20 years ago. Daley has said machine politics play no role in his dominance of local politics.

On Monday, a Daley administration spokeswoman said city officials declined to comment on Molloy's testimony.

Molloy, who lives in the Daley family's Bridgeport power base, was secretary to Sorich and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Testifying under a grant of immunity from prosecution, Molloy described how she kept computerized databases and paper files related to hiring at Intergovernmental Affairs.

The names on the lists came from pro-Daley political coordinators who visited Sorich at his City Hall office or called him at work, she said. Molloy said Sorich then relayed that information to her, and she used it to compile a database on a city-issued Compaq laptop.

The 59-page list entered into evidence Monday contained 5,743 names. There were columns for the applicants' names, race, Social Security numbers, the jobs that they wanted, and their political sponsors. Another column on the list, Molloy said, was used to record when the applicants received a city job.

A James Reilly was listed as "Friend-Mayor" and received a job in January 1990, according to the list.

City records show that Reilly joined the payroll on Jan. 22, 1990. In an interview Monday, he scoffed at the suggestion that he owed his job to political influence, saying he worked his way up from the bottom rung of the Cook County state's attorney's office.

"I've worked with the mayor for over 25 years and have a longstanding relationship with him," said Reilly, now the city's director of administrative hearings.

Daley brothers on list

William Daley, the Midwest chairman of JPMorgan Chase & Co., appears on the list as a sponsor four times.

Michael Daley, partner in the Daley & George law firm, pops up three times.

Cook County Commissioner John Daley, who leads the 11th Ward Democratic Organization, was listed as the backer of two applicants, including Paul Ready.

DOJ_NMG_0035268

Ready, a $38.25-an-hour city hoisting engineer, said in an interview that he never went to John Daley or Intergovernmental Affairs for help in getting hired. Asked if he knew how his name ended up on the list from Intergovernmental Affairs, Ready said, "I do, but it's none of your business."

David Axelrod, a top political consultant to the mayor, appears on the list as the sponsor of David Woods. Axelrod acknowledged that he made a job recommendation for Woods after meeting him during pickup basketball games at a YMCA on North Halsted Street more than 10 years ago.

"Over time, we became friendly, and I learned a little about him," Axelrod said. "His goal was to become a bricklayer. It was a better-paying job."

Woods, who was a toll collector on the Chicago Skyway, volunteered to work on campaigns, but Axelrod said he did not care about that.

"I knew he was an African-American and he wanted to get a trades job," Axelrod said. "That's a good thing, since some of the trades traditionally have not been open to African-Americans."

Axelrod said he placed a call to Intergovernmental Affairs for Woods but does not recall whom he spoke to. Woods became a city bricklayer, records show.

Secretary of State Jesse White's name pops up on the list about two dozen times. Spokesman David Druker said White recalled a couple of the names on the list.

Druker said White did not remember whether he wrote letters to the mayor's office or placed calls on behalf of job seekers when White was county recorder of deeds.

"He told people that his recommendation would not guarantee them a job," Druker said. "He would never expect a government agency to do anything unethical or illegal in order to help someone get a job."

Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said applicant James Haskins wanted to return to work for the city after a stint in Blagojevich's congressional office, "so the governor was a reference for him."

Asked who, if anyone, Blagojevich contacted at the city to help Haskins get a city job, Ottenhoff said, "I have no idea."

Judging by the list, those with the most clout in city hiring during the 1990s included the pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization and the Coalition for Better Government, based on the Northwest Side.

Organizations had clout

Many job applicants were listed as enjoying the support of Reyes, the HDO leader who directed Intergovernmental Affairs from 1995 until 2000. Other high-ranking HDO members, including retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez and state Sen. Antonio "Tony" Munoz (D-Chicago), also were listed as sponsors.

Coalition for Better Government leaders Dominic Longo and Ron Calicchio sponsored dozens of applicants for jobs and promotions, according to the list.

Other sponsors named repeatedly include Ald. Isaac Carothers (29th Ward); Tom Dart, the Democratic nominee for Cook County sheriff; and former laborers union leader Bruno Caruso.

Several religious leaders appeared on the list as sponsors. Among them was Rev. Jack Wall of Old St. Patrick's Church, where the mayor attends services.

Molloy began working in the mayor's office shortly after Daley's election in 1989. She testified that she also kept paper records of hiring requests in Intergovernmental Affairs.

Molloy said she destroyed two cabinet drawers of those documents in 2002 at Sorich's request.

Under cross-examination by Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, Molloy said the process that she described began before Sorich joined Intergovernmental Affairs in 1993.

Molloy said she never told anyone outside Intergovernmental Affairs about the job lists. She said Sorich's predecessor, Michael Broderick, told her, "It was something that was not supposed to be done in the office."

Tribune staff reporters Robert Becker and Gary Washburn contributed to this report.

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

rrbush@tribune.com

tlighty@tribune.com

-page Clout List Is 5,000 Strong (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, FRAN SPIELMAN, MARK J. KONKOL AND TIM NOVAK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 20, 2006

Call it a Who's Who of city clout.

Excerpts of a list of more than 5,000 names that was never supposed to see the light of day were projected on a large overhead screen in federal court Monday as part of the criminal trial of Mayor Daley's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich.

The 60-page list gives the most detailed snapshot yet of politicians, powerbrokers and mayoral friends vying for city jobs or promotions for their families, friends and supporters.

The list was kept on the laptop computer of an employee at the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. Prosecutors contend it was part of a corrupt scheme to rig the city-hiring process to award city jobs and promotions to people doing political work for Daley.

Patricia Molloy, a former secretary of Sorich, testified Monday that the computerized list she kept ran from 1989 to 1997 and that Sorich later told her to shred paper copies of similar lists.

Prosecutors call the scheme illegal. Defense attorneys for Sorich and three other former city employees on trial contend their clients were following orders as part of a long city tradition and never intended to commit crimes.

The list released Monday shows the names of candidates for jobs or promotions. It notes in some instances what ward the person is coming from and often notes the person's political sponsor. The list is not clear on whether the candidates got their jobs or promotions, although in many instances they did.

Not all candidates fared well.

"Arrogant," read one note on a man seeking a city job. "Shot his own foot again."

11th Ward appears over 450 times

Three Daley brothers, Cook County Commissioner John Daley, former U.S. Commerce Secretary William Daley and Michael Daley are on the list as making a few recommendations for job seekers. Other job candidates are referred to on the list as friends of the mayor.

A secretary of Mayor Daley's offered names for job candidates, and one of his bodyguards, Sam Roti, tried to get his wife a city post too.

Current or former mayoral friends, including trucking magnate Michael Tadin and businessman Oscar D'Angelo, grace the list as sponsors.

The Rev. Jack Wall, pastor of Old St. Patrick's Church downtown, which Mayor Daley attends, recommended two people.

Daley's political base, the 11th Ward, came up more than 450 times as the sponsoring ward for job candidates.

Gov. Blagojevich, whose administration is accused of having its own clout list, is on the city list one time -- for referring his own employee for a city post back when Blagojevich was a congressman, his spokeswoman explained.

Cook County Sheriff Michael Sheahan is on the list for referring people. So is the man likely to replace him, the Democratic nominee for sheriff, Tom Dart.

Many times, the list is a family affair, with the clout-heavy trying to help family. Mayor Daley's former deputy aviation commissioner, Robert Repel, for instance, asked the city to hire his son, Michael, in July 1996. Seven months later, Michael Repel was arrested for breaking into a car. He pleaded guilty to burglary and was sentenced to three years in prison.

While on parole, Michael Repel, 33, was hired in November 1999 as a city laborer. He has a lengthy arrest record and once admitted to being a gang member.

Bruno Caruso, who was forced out as boss of Laborers' Union Local 1001 because of his alleged ties to organized crime, repeatedly asked city officials to give jobs and promotions to his union members as well as his family.

Caruso and the union sought jobs or promotions for several cousins as well as his cousin's wife. Caruso declined to comment on the list -- as did most people contacted.

"I don't have any comment on anything related to the trial," said Ald. Isaac Carothers (29th), whose name appeared on the list more than any other aldermen.

Carothers made his requests before becoming alderman. He was working as a high-ranking Streets and Sanitation official and was a key lieutenant in Daley's political army.

"I'm getting ready to leave on vacation. A man just pulled up to get me. I have to leave right now," Carothers said.

'All my guys were qualified'

A spokesman for Illinois Secretary of State Jesse White acknowledged White made some recommendations but always believed the candidates were qualified and never thought anything improper would be done to get them jobs.

Political operative Dominic Longo, of the controversial Coalition for Better Government group, made no apologies for going to bat for his people. "All my guys were qualified," Longo said.

Charles Bowen, who retired two years ago as Daley's liaison to black ministers, appears frequently as a sponsor.

"It wasn't for any benefit for me. It was because I thought somebody deserved a position," Bowen said.

"Why would I apologize for doing something I think is right? I wouldn't apologize for that. Absolutely not."

DOJ_NMG_0035270

Contributing: Abdon M. Pallasch, Natasha Korecki

Ex-agent Testifies To Probe Of Bulger (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 20, 2006

Says Senate chief targeted in '83 case

A retired FBI official testified yesterday that then-Massachusetts Senate president William M. Bulger was the target of a 1983 FBI investigation that was compromised by leaks while his gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, was an FBI informant.

Robert Fitzpatrick, who was an assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI wanted to ``get" three of the state's top politicians at the time: House majority whip Vincent J. Piro , House Speaker Thomas W. McGee , and Bulger.

``He was the target, I believe," said Fitzpatrick, referring to William Bulger. But there was ``a leak situation, and it got tanked," he said. ``It just went down the tubes."

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, accepted a $5,000 bribe in 1983 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a mall developer trying to get liquor licenses, then returned it three weeks later. The bribe was to ensure Legislative approval of the licenses. Piro was recorded on tape saying some of the money would be used to ``grease a few guys." Piro argued government entrapment at trial and was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness at Piro's 1985 trial testified that Piro had demanded upfront money because ``I need to consider some people, like the speaker." McGee denied any involvement. He was never charged. No evidence surfaced against Bulger. Yesterday, Fitzpatrick didn't elaborate on why the FBI targeted him.

Boston lawyer R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and represented William Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's testimony ridiculous and said William Bulger's name has never previously been linked to the Piro case.

``It's absolutely ridiculous to suggest that Bill Bulger would have been involved in anything that would have amounted to impropriety, let alone a matter that would have been the subject of an investigation of this type," Popeo said.

Prosecutors contended that Piro returned the bribe because he was tipped off to the true identity of the FBI undercover agent. On the stand, Fitzpatrick said the investigation was among nine in the FBI's Boston office during his tenure that he believed were compromised by leaks to Whitey Bulger, other informants, or others outside the office.

Popeo said, ``Nothing came to our attention prior to trial, during the trial, or after the trial that gives any validity to any suggestion that [Piro] was the beneficiary of any leak."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's fifth day on the stand in US District Court in Boston, where he is testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the government by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The family says the government negligently caused McIntyre's death by mishandling Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi and Whitey Bulger, both longtime FBI informants.

Flemmi testified earlier that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, after their handler, FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. , warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had implicated the gangsters in an unsuccessful effort to ship weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, including that of McIntyre.

Bulger, who is wanted for 19 killings, has been a fugitive since 1995. Connolly, who was convicted of racketeering in 2002, is serving a 10-year prison term.

Fitzpatrick, who had urged his superiors to drop Bulger as an informant in the 1980s, testified yesterday that he also wrote a letter to the FBI's third in command at headquarters in 1983, complaining about ``malfeasance" in the bureau's Boston office. He said he never received a response to his letter.

Fitzpatrick said he was concerned that Whitey Bulger, who was being eyed by the FBI as a suspect in at least three murders by 1983, was getting leaks from Connolly about ongoing investigations.

Earlier yesterday, Emily McIntyre, 77, of Quincy, spent an hour on the stand, sobbing uncontrollably at times as she clung to a photograph of her son, John McIntyre.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb grilled Emily McIntyre about her son's character, asking her if she knew he had allegedly abused his wife and had been charged with drunk driving and assault in the years before his slaying.

``No, I don't know that," Emily McIntyre said repeatedly, defending her son's reputation. ``He was such a beautiful person."

Judge Orders FBI To Turn Over Agent's Desperate Letter (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet
Boston Herald, June 20, 2006

Federal Judge Reginald C. Lindsay has ordered attorneys for the FBI to turn over a tell-all letter penned to the agency's second-in-command 23 years ago by a desperate manager in Boston.

After only two years as assistant special agent in charge of Boston, Robert Fitzpatrick testified yesterday at a Quincy family's $50 million wrongful death suit, he was at his wit's end in 1983 when he decided to confide in a friend at headquarters.

The family of John McIntyre, 32, a government witness murdered by James "Whitey" Bulger in 1984, has accused the FBI of being complicit in his death.

Because Fitzpatrick "wasn't getting anywhere" with formal complaints of malfeasance and obstruction of justice, he said, "I outlined my grievances" to Lee Caldwell about FBI agents destroying investigations with "severe leaks" to mob informants like Bulger. Caldwell was a man he thought he could trust, but Fitzpatrick said, "I never heard back."

FBI To Add Agents To Wales Case (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER
Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 20, 2006

New supervisor holds meeting on 2001 killing

The FBI is sending in the cavalry in an attempt to solve the 5 1/2-year-old killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Tom Wales.

A week after the FBI's top brass removed the Seattle office from management of the investigation, its new manager -- Portland Special Agent in Charge Robert Jordan -- announced he's boosting the number of agents and analysts assigned to find the killer.

"This is an extremely important case to us (the FBI)," said Jordan, after emerging from a Monday meeting in Seattle to discuss the case. "We are not going to walk away from this. And we are going to commit as many resources as possible."

FBI officials in Seattle recently cut in half the number of agents assigned to the investigation. A federal criminal justice source said the move reflected a lack of progress in the Wales investigation, and the FBI balanced the resources dedicated to it against other investigative priorities.

A bullet killed Wales on Oct. 11, 2001, as he sat in front of a computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home. The killing shocked his colleagues at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle as well as the nation's federal criminal justice establishment.

"We can find no precedent for a federal prosecutor being murdered, perhaps because of his job," Jordan said. "To anyone who carries a gun and a badge, it's a visceral case."

There had been four agents assigned to the case before Seattle FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin cut that to two agents in May.

Jordan wouldn't reveal the numbers of agents who will ultimately be assigned to the investigation, but said it would be more than four. One of Jordan's agents in Portland with extensive cold-case, homicide experience will be assigned to help find the killer.

Quick to assert "this is not a cold case," Jordan said there are several promising leads that could pave the way to the murderer.

Jordan said he was grateful for the continued commitment of the Seattle Police Department in trying to track down the killer.

"Chief (Gil) Kerlikowske offered up as many resources as we need," Jordan said. "We're going to be taking him up on that."

There has been a Seattle police detective assigned to work in partnership with the four FBI agents. That number will likely increase, he said.

"In this ongoing investigation, we'll assist them in any way we can to bring this killer to justice," Kerlikowske said Monday.

Day-to-day management of the agents will be provided by one of Jordan's Portland supervisors who will be moving to Seattle.

Present at the meeting Monday were Kerlikowske, King County Deputy Prosecutor Roger Davidheiser, special federal prosecutor Steven Clymer, and some of the investigators working the case.

Jordan would not name the agents who will be assigned to the case, but said at least one of the agents previously assigned to the investigation will continue with it in order to provide continuity. Federal criminal justice sources said two agents currently assigned will remain on the job.

Jordan said discussion at the meeting included "what are the leads we should let go of and what are the leads we should pursue."

DOJ_NMG_0035272

"It's an exciting opportunity to take another look at this case -- a very important case." Jordan said. "You need a fresh set of eyes -- a fresh focus is always a good thing."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

Two Officers In Bribery Scheme Plead Guilty (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. -- Two former Charlottesville police officers accused of taking bribes of sexual favors and cash to ignore illegal activities at a strip club pleaded guilty Monday to lying to federal agents about having sex with a teenager and covering up a traffic offense.

Roy Fitzgerald, 46, and Charles Saunders, 47, will be sentenced on Sept. 22.

The officers declined comment Monday.

The pleas were part of a deal announced last week; Fitzgerald, a 15-year veteran and Saunders, with the department since 1999, will no longer face bribery, conspiracy and witness tampering charges.

The officers were accused of ignoring illegal activities involving to Charles Phillips, the manager of the now-defunct Max nightclub, starting as far back as 1996.

In one incident, authorities said Saunders had sex with a blindfolded 16-year-old girl at the home of Phillips' associate, Jason Madison. Other times, authorities said the officers would watch nude dancers at the club after hours while in uniform and on duty.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. said in exchange, the officers protected Phillips from prosecution for traffic offenses and warned him about a prostitution investigation, exposing an undercover officer in the process.

During an FBI and Virginia State Police investigation, Bondurant said Saunders lied about intervening with another officer concerning the traffic offense.

The men have resigned from the department.

Two Ex-officers Plead Guilty (RTD)

By Carlos Santos, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times Dispatch, June 20, 2006

They lied to FBI in Charlottesville probe into police corruption

CHARLOTTESVILLE -- Two former Charlottesville police officers pleaded guilty yesterday in a federal court to felony charges after an investigation into corruption at the police department.

As part of a plea bargain, Charles Saunders and Roy Fitzgerald each entered guilty pleas to one felony count of making a false statement to a federal agent.

Saunders, 47, and Fitzgerald, 46, have resigned from the police department, city spokesman Ric Barrick said yesterday.

U.S. District Court Judge Norman K. Moon accepted the guilty pleas from Saunders and Fitzgerald after a brief summation of the evidence against them from Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant.

Bondurant said the two men accepted sexual favors and sexually explicit entertainment from women provided by the manager of a now-defunct nightclub in exchange for overlooking illegal activities at the club.

Bondurant said the men, who worked the night shift, attended after-hour events at the nightclub in uniform. Bondurant said the men even tipped off the club's manager to a city undercover operation looking into prostitution.

At one point, the two former officers gave false statements to FBI agents investigating the corruption, Bondurant said.

Indictments on charges of bribery, conspiracy and witness tampering were dropped as part of the plea bargain.

The two men, veteran police officers with more than 10 years on the force, will be sentenced next month by Moon. They could receive up to five years in prison.

Justices Draw A Line On What Evidence Is Admissible (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — An alleged crime victim's emergency 911 call can be used at trial even if he or she does not testify and undergo cross-examination, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled Monday.

However, by an 8-1 vote, the justices also ruled that if an alleged victim recounts an incident to police at the scene after it occurs, the account cannot be used at trial unless the defendant is able to cross-examine the accuser.

The pair of rulings in cases from Washington and Indiana addressed the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, which ensures that a defendant may closely question witnesses against him or her. In 2004, the court had barred the use of "testimonial" statements at trial unless the witness was unavailable or had been cross-examined earlier.

In Monday's cases, the justices defined "testimonial" by drawing a line between statements made in emergency situations — which the court said could be permitted as evidence at trial without cross-examination — and statements gathered later by police "to establish or prove past events," which the court barred without cross-examination.

In the Washington dispute, Michelle McCottry had told a 911 operator that her former boyfriend was attacking her: "He's here jumpin' on me again. …. He's usin' his fists." McCottry told the operator that the assailant's name was Adrian Martell Davis. When Davis was tried for felony violation of a domestic no-contact order, prosecutors offered McCottry's statement as evidence. She did not testify. Lower courts rejected Davis' claim that the admission of the 911 recording violated his constitutional rights.

Writing for the court, Justice Antonin Scalia said statements made to authorities responding to an "ongoing emergency" should be allowed as evidence.

In the Indiana case, Amy Hammon was questioned by police officers who had responded to a report of domestic disturbance at her home. She signed a report that said her husband, Hershel Hammon, had hit her in the chest and shoved her to the floor.

Scalia said a trial judge erred in allowing the wife's report to be used as evidence at her husband's domestic battery trial. Scalia said the report, given when there was no immediate threat, was "testimonial." Justice Clarence Thomas dissented.

Also Monday, the justices offered a series of opinions that, for now, will let U.S. regulators continue to block development on wetlands even when the lands are far from rivers and other navigable waters.

For the court, the issue in two cases from Michigan was the extent to which the Clean Water Act protects wetlands adjacent to non-navigable tributaries that eventually drain into rivers and lakes. No clear rule emerged in the court's opinions, and lower-court judges will be left to decide whether long-standing federal protections for hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands should be curtailed.

Four conservative justices — Scalia, Thomas, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito — sought to narrowly define wetlands and reduce the power of the Army Corps of Engineers to regulate development and the discharge of pollutants. The justices would limit protected wetlands to those adjacent to permanent standing or continuously flowing bodies of water. They said a lower court should reconsider its decision allowing the corps to deny permits to property owners for a shopping mall and condominiums.

The court's four most liberal justices — David Souter, Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and John Paul Stevens — signed a dissenting opinion that stressed the importance of deferring to the corps and its goal of preserving wetlands. They said they would have affirmed the lower-court ruling that sided with regulators against developers.

The ninth justice, Anthony Kennedy, agreed with Scalia that there should be a new hearing in the cases, but he offered a legal standard more favorable to environmentalists. Kennedy said the corps should be able to protect wetlands whose ecological health is linked to that of rivers and lakes. Kennedy also said evidence in the Michigan cases suggested the corps was right in denying the building permits.

Georgetown University professor Richard Lazarus, an environmental law specialist, said the decisions inject "tremendous uncertainty into wetlands regulations. It will present great challenges for regulators and for landowners."

Absent Accusers' 911 Calls Ruled Admissible (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court issued new guidelines on the use of evidence from witnesses who cannot or will not testify in person yesterday, ruling that information conveyed to 911 emergency operators may be admitted in criminal cases while statements to police officers in calmer settings may not.

Yesterday's opinion was a much-anticipated follow-up to a 2004 case in which the court, invoking the constitutional right of a defendant to confront his accusers, put new limits on the admissibility of testimony by witnesses who had not been cross-examined and could not or would not repeat their stories in front of a jury.

At issue was the meaning of the "confrontation clause" of the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees defendants' right "to be confronted" with the witnesses against them. The 2004 ruling was considered one of the court's most important on criminal law in recent years, because it overturned precedent that had said an unavailable witness's out-of-court statement could be admissible if a judge found it clearly trustworthy.

DOJ_NMG_0035274

Yet the 2004 decision, Crawford v. Washington , did not define "testimony," and yesterday's decision was intended to fill that gap.

In an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, the court analyzed two situations, both involving charges of domestic violence.

Michelle McCottry and Amy Hammon were both alleged victims of domestic violence. McCottry called 911 to report a beating that her boyfriend had just administered; Hammon gave an account of a fresh attack by her husband to police who came to her home.

McCottry and Hammon did not testify at the men's trials; the state won convictions anyway, based in part on the women's statements.

Scalia wrote that the 911 call containing McCottry's accusations against her boyfriend, Adrian Davis, could be used to convict him even though she did not come to court, because the "primary purpose" of the call was "to meet an ongoing emergency."

By contrast, Scalia wrote, answers Hammon gave to a police officer after an alleged incident of abuse by her husband, Hershel, were not admissible without her coming to court, because the emergency was over, and the primary purpose of the police officer's questioning of Amy was to "establish or prove past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution."

In both cases -- Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705 -- all the justices except Clarence Thomas concurred.

He dissented in the Hammon case, saying that Amy Hammon's statement should also have been admissible, and that the court's proposed distinction based on the "primary purpose" of police questioning would be "difficult for courts to apply."

The cases had attracted attention because of their implications not only for domestic-violence cases but all criminal cases in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court.

Adrian Davis and Hershel Hammon, who said the Sixth Amendment requires the state to bring its witnesses to court, put them under oath and allow them to be cross-examined, were supported by the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the D.C. Public Defender Service.

On the other side, voicing concerns about witness intimidation, particularly in domestic-abuse cases, were the states of Indiana and Washington, supported by the Bush administration; 27 other states, including Maryland; the National Network to End Domestic Violence; and the National District Attorneys Association.

The court's resolution of the issue drew positive comments from both sides yesterday.

"This puts real teeth into the notion that fair trials require live testimony in front of jurors," said Timothy P. O'Toole, chief of the Special Litigation Division of the District's Public Defender Service.

Fernando R. LaGuarda, who co-wrote a friend-of-the-court brief on behalf of several domestic-violence advocacy organizations, praised the decision for its "tremendous clarity on 911 calls."

At oral argument, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg had voiced specific concerns about the potential impact of the case on domestic violence victims, and the court's opinion included a section noting that "this particular type of crime is notoriously susceptible to intimidation or coercion of the victim to ensure she does not testify at trial."

Thus, the court noted, courts should be empowered to admit out-of-court statements from victims when there is evidence that the alleged perpetrator is guilty of witness intimidation.

No Bond For Alleged Mob Figure (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 20, 2006

Suggesting that Frank Calabrese Sr. is a danger to anyone who might testify against the Outfit, a federal judge on Monday refused to grant bail to the reputed mob lieutenant.

Calabrese, 69, linked by authorities to 13 slayings, will remain incarcerated before he and others named in the Operation Family Secrets case are tried next spring, U.S. District Judge James Zagel ruled.

"Defendant perceives himself, as he made clear in several statements, to be a loyal member of an organization that engages in criminal acts and whose members obey the orders of their superiors under pain of death," the judge wrote. "If released, there is a distinct possibility that he will attempt to deprive the prosecution of as many living witnesses as he can to comply with such orders."

Calabrese's brother Nicholas is cooperating and has tied Calabrese to some of the killings, Zagel noted. His son, Frank Calabrese Jr., secretly recorded him discussing his past.

DOJ_NMG_0035275

In a hearing last week, prosecutors played tapes of Calabrese talking about a ceremony where he became a made member of the mob, as well as the murders of Michael Albergo in 1970, William and Charlotte Dauber in 1980, and Richard Ortiz and Arthur Morawski in 1983.

"While in theory defendant could offer innocent explanations for these conversations, it is difficult to imagine what they might be," the judge wrote. The evidence against him is strong, increasing the likelihood of flight, he wrote.

Calabrese's lawyer, Joseph Lopez, said Calabrese is eager to face his accusers in court. On Monday Lopez said he was not surprised by the judge's ruling.

He had joked to the court last week that arguing for Calabrese's bail was like trying to get Ray Charles a driver's license.

"Ray Charles ain't driving," he said Monday.

jcoen@tribune.com

Ex-Stock Picker Gets Prison Sentence (LAT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

NEW YORK — A former stock picker who teamed up with a rogue FBI agent in a scheme to manipulate stocks was sentenced Monday to more than 11 years in federal prison.

Anthony Elgindy also was ordered by U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie to forfeit $1.5 million

Elgindy, of San Diego, was convicted in January 2005 of racketeering, conspiracy and securities fraud.

He and four others were charged in May 2002 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice.

Federal prosecutors accused FBI special agent Jeffrey Royer of New Mexico of leaking details of investigations and executives' criminal histories to Elgindy.

Elgindy shorted penny stocks, then drove down their prices by publicizing damaging information he received from Royer. He also extorted companies by offering to withhold the information in exchange for cash.

Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

Judge Sentences Trader Elgindy To More Than 11 Years In Jail (WSJ)

A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- A federal judge sentenced short-seller Anthony Elgindy to more than 11 years in prison for his role in a scheme to manipulate the stocks of small-cap companies.

In addition to the prison term of 135 months, U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie ordered Mr. Elgindy to forfeit $1.5 million.

Mr. Elgindy was convicted in January 2005 of racketeering, conspiracy and securities fraud. He and four others were charged in May 2002 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice.

Federal prosecutors accused Mr. Elgindy of using confidential government information obtained from Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer to manipulate stock. Mr. Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

Mr. Elgindy rose to prominence in the late 1990s as a frequent message poster on Internet stock chat sites, such as Silicon Investor. He subsequently started a private chat site where members paid a fee to obtain his stock insights, which mostly focused on shorting securities. Short selling is a trading technique that produces profits when a company's stock price falls. Shorting a stock can be perfectly legal -- depending on how it is done.

Man Gets 17 Years For Investing Scam (MH)

By Roberto Santiago

The Miami Herald, June 20, 2006

Con artist Charles Paul Hoffecker, who with a partner fleeced more than 1,000 investors out of $14 million in a huge boiler-room operation, was sentenced Monday to 17 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark sentenced Hoffecker, 53, of Pompano Beach.

His partner in crime, Charles Edward Meyers, 66, of Fort Lauderdale, will be sentenced June 26.

They will also have to pay $2.6 million in restitution to their victims.

DOJ_NMG_0035276

Robert Kirsch, an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey who helped prosecute the case, said Monday's sentencing was long and emotional, with Hoffecker and his family pleading for mercy.

The two were found guilty last March of ripping off people who believed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver.

Amitex was actually a one-room office in the Bahamas. The money-generating sales pitches were done in boiler rooms they ran in New York, Nevada, California, Georgia and Florida, Kirsch said.

He said the largest Amitex boiler room was in an office on Commercial Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale.

A boiler room is a base of operations -- often a rented office or a home basement -- from which con artists run phony telemarketing schemes.

Hoffecker and Meyers were caught as part of a 10-year investigation by the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

To nab them, authorities set up their own boiler room, called Commodities Investors Corp., in East Brunswick, N.J.

A press release from the New Jersey state attorney's office said that Hoffecker tried to ``recruit the operators of CIC to sell the Amitex investment."

Supreme Court Upholds California's Searches Of Parolees (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

Parolees in California do not enjoy a constitutional right to be free from suspicionless searches by law-enforcement officials.

Instead, they can be searched at any time, even when officials have no reason to believe that they may be involved in wrongdoing.

In an important privacy ruling with major implications for individuals on parole, the US Supreme Court voted 6 to 3 Monday to uphold a California law that requires all state prisoners to agree as a condition of release that they consent to warrantless searches by law enforcement.

"Examining the totality of the circumstances pertaining to petitioner's status as a parolee ... we conclude that petitioner did not have an expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate," writes Justice Clarence Thomas in the majority opinion.

The state, Justice Thomas writes, has substantial interests in supervising parolees because they are "more likely to commit future criminal offenses."

He adds: "That some states and the federal government require a level of individualized suspicion is of little relevance to our determination whether California's supervisory system is drawn to meet its needs and is reasonable, taking into account a parolee's substantially diminished expectation of privacy."

In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens writes that suspicionless searches are the kind of improper government action the Fourth Amendment was intended to prevent.

"What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty," Justice Stevens writes in a dissent joined by Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer. "Combining faulty syllogism with circular reasoning, the court concludes that parolees have no more legitimate an expectation of privacy in their persons than do prisoners."

The decision stems from an incident on Sept. 6, 2002, in which a San Bruno, Calif., police officer happened upon Donald Samson. Mr. Samson was walking in a residential area with a friend and her 3-year-old son.

The officer, Alex Rohleder, knew Samson was on parole. He thought a warrant may have been issued for Samson's arrest. He conducted a pat-down search of Samson for weapons.

Officer Rohleder found no weapons and discovered from his dispatch officer that Samson was not wanted on any outstanding warrant. Nonetheless, the officer conducted a second, more thorough search. He found a plastic baggie containing methamphetamine inside a cigarette box in Samson's pocket. Rohleder then placed him under arrest for drug possession.

Samson's lawyer asked a judge to suppress the prosecutor's use of the drugs as evidence because they were the product of an illegal search. The judge disagreed. Samson was convicted and sentenced to seven years in prison. The state appeals court upheld the conviction, and the California Supreme Court declined to take up the case.

In affirming the conviction, Thomas said that people released from prison on parole are subject to a long list of terms and conditions that restrict their freedom, including mandatory drug testing and rules that prohibit them from associating with felons or gang members. Parolees must also report to parole officers and request permission to travel more than 50 miles from home.

"The extent and reach of these conditions clearly demonstrate that parolees like petitioner have severely diminished expectations of privacy by virtue of their status alone," Thomas writes.

DOJ_NMG_0035277

Stevens says in his dissent that the high court's precedents had recognized a higher level of privacy protection for parolees than prison inmates. He says Monday's decision "runs roughshod" over those prior holdings.

"Once one acknowledges that parolees do have legitimate expectations of privacy beyond those of prisoners, our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence does not permit the conclusion, reached by the court here for the first time, that a search supported by neither individualized suspicion nor 'special needs' is nonetheless 'reasonable,' " Stevens writes.

Supreme Court Rules That Parolees Can Be Searched Without Cause (LAW/AP)

By Toni Locy, The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

California parolees can routinely be searched by police as a condition of their release from prison, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

By a 6-3 vote, justices said the 1996 law is a legitimate attempt by state officials to deal with a large population of repeat offenders who pose a danger to public safety.

Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the majority, said California has a "special governmental interest" to control its parolees, an interest that outweighs a parolee's privacy.

In California, most prisoners eventually receive parole. But before release, each parolee is required to consent in writing to searches by police during the term of their supervision. If they refuse, they are not allowed out of prison.

Under the law, police can conduct such a search as long as it is not arbitrary, capricious or conducted to harass the parolee.

Thomas said parolees do not have any "expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate" because of the danger posed by California's large recidivist population.

"The state's interests, by contrast, are substantial," Thomas wrote, citing a 68-to-70 percent recidivism rate among California's parolees.

But Justice John Paul Stevens, writing in dissent, said the majority had "run roughshod" over previous court rulings on unreasonable searches and improperly allowed California to create another form of punishment for its prisoners.

"What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty," Stevens wrote on behalf of himself and Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer.

Stevens wrote that California has given its police "a blanket grant of discretion untethered by any procedural safeguards."

Only California allows parolees to be searched for no specific reason. Thirty other states and the federal government require parolees to submit to searches, but there must be reasonable grounds for the search to occur.

In September 2002, a San Bruno, Calif., police officer spotted Donald Samson walking down a street with a woman and her 3-year-old son. The officer knew Samson was a parolee and suspected there was a warrant out for his arrest on a parole violation.

The officer searched Samson, who then told him that the warrant had been "taken care of." After confirming Samson's assertion, the officer searched him again. Inside a cigarette box Samson was carrying, the officer found a plastic baggie containing methamphetamine.

Samson was not charged with a parole violation. Instead, he was charged with drug possession, convicted and sentenced to seven years in state prison.

California's Court of Appeal upheld Samson's conviction, rejecting his argument that a suspicionless search of a parolee violated the Fourth Amendment.

The case is Samson v. California, 04-9728.

Court OKs Random Searches Of Parolees (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Supreme Court ruled Monday that police may randomly search criminal parolees, continuing the deference it has shown law enforcement since the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

The 6-3 ruling keeps in place a California law allowing such searches even when there is no clear evidence or suspicion of wrongdoing.

Writing for the majority, Justice Clarence Thomas noted, "As the recidivism rates demonstrate, most parolees are ill prepared to handle the pressures of reintegration. Thus most parolees require intense supervision."

DOJ_NMG_0035278

He added, "A requirement that searches be based on individualized suspicion would undermine the state's ability to effectively supervise parolees and protect the public from criminal acts by reoffenders."

Upon their release, California parolees must sign a requirement allowing police searches during their supervision. Failure or refusal to sign means they must stay behind bars.

Thomas rejected complaints that parolees are being singled out and suffer an unconstitutional diminished right of privacy.

The ruling was supported by Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Clarence Thomas, Anthony Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Samuel Alito.

The case involves Donald Samson, paroled in 2003 after a firearms felony conviction. A San Bruno police officer knew Samson was on parole when he observed him walking down a street.

The officer, after determining there were no outstanding warrants on Samson, began a search of him.

Methamphetamine was found in a pocket and Samson went back to prison for seven years.

Dissenting was Justice John Paul Stevens, who acknowledged parolees do not have protection "as robust as that afforded ordinary citizens."

But, he wrote, the court's past decisions do not support "a regime of suspicionless searches."

The Samson case was one of two search-and-seizure appeals from California argued this term. The justices in March unanimously allowed to stand the conviction of a man who bought video showing minors engaged in sex acts.

The Bush administration Justice Department and law enforcement agencies around the country have asked the courts for greater powers to conduct searches of homes and cars, along the borders, and at sobriety and neighborhood crime checkpoints.

The federal government in some cases has raised the increased threat of domestic terrorism since 9/11 as a reason for more crime-fighting discretion.

The majority-conservative Supreme Court has generally been supportive of such efforts, but has not been shy about limiting such powers when the justices felt they overstep constitutional boundaries.

School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Peephole Films In Women's Rest Room (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 20, 2006

Nobody knew what janitor Phillip Winkle was up to until the day in early February when two other janitors at Center Area Middle School wondered what he was doing by himself in a dark storage room.

It turned out he was making his own child pornography collection using a peephole camera he installed to record 600 video images of girls and women using the toilet.

That's going to cost him 10 years in federal prison.

Yesterday in U.S. District Court, he waived indictment and pleaded guilty to child porn charges and agreed to be sentenced to that likely term in September.

State charges of invasion of privacy, filed in Beaver County Common Pleas Court in February, will be dropped.

Mr. Winkle drilled a hole through the wall that separated the storage room from a girls' bathroom in an isolated part of the school's lower level.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Kaufman said Mr. Winkle installed a camera that looked into one stall, sometimes operating it manually and other times setting it to record automatically.

The bathroom served a small number of classrooms and tended to be used by both staff and students.

From July 2005 until February, he made 131 recordings of female faculty and another 40 of girls using the toilet. Most of the girls were about 12, Mr. Kaufman said, but "one girl was so young she had to lift herself up onto the toilet seat."

Most of the recordings included sound, and in some cases Mr. Winkle made slow-motion images. In all, he downloaded 600 images onto two computers at his house.

He apparently maintained the collection for his own use, as there was no evidence he distributed any of the videos. None of the images show sex acts, but they qualify as child pornography under federal law.

After the two suspicious janitors caught him, Mr. Winkle confessed to Center police, who charged him with invasion of privacy and called the FBI.

Since federal child-porn laws are harsher than state charges, prosecutors decided to bring the case in federal court.

Mr. Winkle's lawyer, Gerald Benyo, and the U.S. attorney's office stipulated to the statutory maximum of 10 years.

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab doesn't have to abide by that stipulation but almost certainly will.

Mr. Winkle is free on $10,000 bond until his sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0035279

Perpetrator Problem: It's Hard To Run Away In Falling Trousers (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

One sunny afternoon in January, Vicki Chandler, a 55-year-old underwriting associate at Cigna HealthCare in Chattanooga, Tenn., was walking to her car when a teenager in loose khaki pants approached her, pointed to her pocketbook and said, "I need that." As she recounts the incident, he snatched the purse and took off.

But then he ran into trouble. As he ran, his loose trousers slipped down below his hips. As he reached down to hold them up, the teen was forced to throw the purse aside.

"That boy, he could run fast but he got caught up by his pants, which were real big and baggy," says Ms. Chandler, whose purse was retrieved by a parking attendant who had heard her cries for help.

It's a problem for perpetrators. Young men and teens wearing low-slung, baggy pants fairly regularly get tripped up in their getaways, a development that has given amused police officers and law-abiding citizens a welcome edge in the fight against crime.

James Green might have made a clean getaway when he stole seven DVDs from a Blockbuster store in Ferndale, Mich., last October. But he, too, was undone by his baggy pants.

Mr. Green, 30, rode away on a bicycle, with copies of "Donnie Brasco," "The Bourne Identity" and "Sin City." When a patrol car knocked over the bike, he fled on foot. As he ran, his trousers slipped down past his hips, and he tripped. He hitched up his pants and ran a few more yards before falling again.

Things got worse and worse for Mr. Green. He finally kicked off his pants and shoes and "ran into the yard of 1720 Beaufield," police officer Kenneth Jaklic said in a report of the incident. "I ran after [Mr. Green], yelling at him to stop." Instead, Mr. Green jumped over a fence behind a garage, and Mr. Jaklic immobilized him with two Taser darts in the back.

Mr. Green pleaded guilty to charges of resisting arrest and retail fraud and spent 30 days in jail. He could not be located for comment.

Denny Fuhrman, a 58-year-old police officer in Lynnwood, Wash., was escorting a handcuffed suspect to his patrol car one afternoon in 2004 when the youngster twisted free and took off running.

As he bolted, the baggy blue jeans he was wearing fell down around his ankles, sending him tumbling onto the pavement of a busy street. "He was rolling around in traffic, looking like a fish out of water," recalls Mr. Fuhrman.

Mr. Fuhrman's suspect wiggled out of his trousers before getting up from the street and running toward a nearby mall, as the police officer radioed a description to his colleagues: "White male, running, no pants, in handcuffs," Mr. Fuhrman recalls saying. The young man was arrested at the entrance of a J.C. Penney store after Janice Lewis, a 61-year-old passerby, grabbed his shirt collar and held on to him until police arrived.

"He was pretty wild," says Ms. Lewis, a grandmother of 10 who broke a knuckle during the scuffle. "I didn't even realize he was in his underwear till the police flipped him over."

Police declined to release the full name of the youth, identified only as Jason in written reports, because he was not convicted of a crime in connection with the incident. He had been arrested after allegedly trying to access a bank account that wasn't his.

Low-hanging baggy pants have been a fashion statement for young men for more than a decade, inspired by the advent of beltless prison jeans, says Andy Gilchrist, a California fashion consultant who has written a book on men's clothes. Over time, the tough-guy image associated with oversized trousers helped make the look standard for hip-hop performers, alternative music bands, skateboarders and snowboarders as it migrated from mostly black city streets to affluent white suburbs.

Just about every other week, Jim Matheny, a 41-year-old police lieutenant in Stamford, Conn., says he gets into foot chases with youths. He says it's getting easier to capture them because they can't run fast or far in those loose jeans.

"When I catch them, I tell them they'd do much better if they had pants that fit," says Lt. Matheny, who says he has had to help hold up the pants of his suspects while patting them down to search for drugs or weapons. "It's like: 'Hey dude, buy a belt and save yourself some trouble.' "

Ill-fitting pants aren't suited for jumping, either, as Noah Donell Brown of Hendersonville, N.C., learned. The 24-year-old tried to leap over the counter of a Subway sandwich shop during a robbery attempt, but he stumbled and came crashing down in front of several startled store employees. Mr. Brown, armed with a gun, got up and fled into a nearby residential neighborhood as the police were notified.

Police didn't have to work hard to arrest him. As Mr. Brown tried to scale a picket fence in someone's backyard, he caught his pants, according to the police department. He was found dangling upside down, his pants at his ankles and tangled in the fence.

DOJ_NMG_0035280

"He didn't make a good jump," said Hendersonville Police Chief Donnie Parks, who spotted Mr. Brown on the fence. "The only reason we caught the guy was because his pants fell down," he said, adding: "He was wearing underwear, thank goodness."

Hendersonville police used a knife to cut Mr. Brown free. He is currently serving time in prison after pleading guilty to attempted robbery with a dangerous weapon. His lawyer, Greg Newman, who has since become the mayor of Hendersonville, said he had not spoken to Mr. Brown since 2003. Mr. Brown, serving his sentence at Gaston Correctional Center in Dallas, N.C., could not be contacted for comment.

Dwight Oliver showed up for a court hearing in Seminole County, Fla., wearing loose pants and tennis shoes without laces. While waiting for his case to be called, Mr. Oliver tried to flee. He lost his pants as he ran down the steps of the courthouse.

He was later found in gray boxer shorts in a library three blocks from the courthouse and was arrested after a scuffle with police officers. It turned out the charges he was scheduled to face in court that day were dropped. He was slapped with new charges of resisting arrest and sentenced to two and a half years in jail for the incident. He served 17 months and was released in April.

"Those pants certainly didn't help him escape, and if he had just sat and waited, he would have been fine," said F. Wesley "Buck" Blankner Jr., who was Mr. Oliver's lawyer. Mr. Oliver didn't return calls seeking comment. His mother, Alice Oliver, said: "He wears pants like that, but he usually wears a belt."

Karl Franklin tried to run from police in Tallahassee, Fla., in pants that were on fire. According to a police report, the 30-year-old had stashed a lighted cigarette in his baggy pants and appeared to be preparing to urinate at a traffic intersection.

Seth Stoughton, a police officer at the time, approached Mr. Franklin and noticed the man's pocket was smoldering. Mr. Franklin, who could not be reached, started to run, but his pants dropped and tripped him up.

"I tried to slap the fire out, but he was struggling and kicking me, so I couldn't do much but hold him down," recalls Mr. Stoughton, who now works as a fraud investigator. When other officers arrived, they cut off the burning patch of cloth and arrested Mr. Franklin. He was charged with resisting arrest, but he later pleaded guilty to lesser charges and spent 10 days in jail.

CIVIL LAW:

Court To Address Abortion Restrictions (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday that it will broaden its review of whether a federal law banning a controversial abortion method is constitutional, taking the second case in four months that will reveal whether the court has shifted significantly on abortion rights with two new conservative members.

The court agreed to rule next term on a California case in which a federal appeals court struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, a statute that was a political victory for abortion opponents but that lower courts have been finding unconstitutional.

The court said in February that it would consider a separate case in which a group of Nebraska doctors had challenged the same law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit, based in St. Louis, ruled last year that the federal ban is unconstitutional because the law does not provide an exception that would allow doctors to use the abortion technique if a woman's life is in danger.

In accepting the California case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America , the court essentially agreed to evaluate a wider range of legal issues that the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit cited last winter when it, too, found the law unconstitutional.

The 9th Circuit found the law posed an undue burden on women because the statute is so vague it could be interpreted to forbid other abortion methods beyond one that is used rarely late in pregnancy. In addition, the 9th Circuit dealt with whether a court could "remedy" the law to permit the procedure when women's health is imperiled, ruling that it could not because lawmakers had deliberately omitted such an exception.

The high court did not say whether it intends to consider the two cases together.

The abortion cases will be the first the court has heard since Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined in February and the second since John G. Roberts Jr. became chief justice last fall. Both men have conservative records and were nominated by President Bush, who favors restrictions on abortion rights, including the "partial-birth" law.

DOJ_NMG_0035281

Leading advocates and opponents of such rights said yesterday that the court could use the pair of cases to place significant new limits on women's access to abortion.

"Look, you don't know how anyone is going to rule, but I'm optimistic," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, which supports the ban.

Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said she has "a very, very deep fear" that the court will "eviscerate" Roe v. Wade , the 1973 decision that legalized abortion nationwide. Without striking down Roe , she said, the justices could rule that restrictions on the procedure no longer need to ensure that women can get an abortion if a pregnancy harms their health.

The court last considered the issue of "partial-birth" bans six years ago, when it ruled, 5 to 4, that a Nebraska statute -- similar to laws in many states that had been adopted during the late 1990s -- was unconstitutional, because it lacked a health exception. The deciding vote in that 2000 case was cast by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito has succeeded.

The Bush administration urged the court to consider the 8th Circuit case. It recommended, however, that the court hold the California case without ruling until the first one is decided. Eve Gartner, senior staff attorney for Planned Parenthood, which brought the lawsuit in California on behalf of the group's clinics and physicians nationwide, said it had asked the high court to take the case.

Supreme Court Adds Second Abortion Case To Docket (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court said Monday it would consider a second Bush administration appeal that seeks to reinstate a government ban on what opponents call partial-birth abortion.

Justices had already said they would decide this fall whether the law is unconstitutional.

The court will review a pair of cases from lower courts, which both struck down the law. Those courts are the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis and the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco.

Congress had voted in 2003 to prohibit the type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester of a nine-month pregnancy, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb and its skull punctured or crushed. The law was challenged on behalf of physicians who could be sentenced to up to two years in prison for violating the law.

Justice Samuel Alito is expected to be a key vote in the case, because the court had split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law barring the same procedure because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired in January was replaced by Alito.

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Judge Approves Extension For Auto Supplier Delphi To File Reorganization Plan (FINDLAW/AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A bankruptcy judge on Monday approved a motion by Delphi Corp. to extend the auto supplier's deadline to exclusively file its reorganization plan, before creditors can weigh in with alternate proposals.

The new deadline for the company is Feb. 1, 2007, and the deadline for responses to the plan is April 2. Judge Robert Drain approved the extension, which is the company's second and moves the filing deadline from Aug. 5.

The company reserved the right to file other extensions if needed.

An attorney for Delphi, John W. Butler, also said the company planned to file a motion later Monday to seek the court's approval of a new concessions deal with Delphi's second-largest union, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America.

The auto parts supplier announced over the weekend that it had reached an agreement with the IUE-CWA and General Motors to offer buyouts to hourly workers. The deal was similar to the one reached earlier with the United Auto Workers, the largest union representing Delphi employees.

The judge said the matter would be considered in a June 29 meeting.

Under the plan, about 8,000 hourly workers represented by the IUE-CWA are eligible to participate. Some may be offered a lump sum payment of $35,000 (â‚¬27,798) to retire, Delphi said, while eligible employees may decide to accept buyout packages ranging from $40,000 (â‚¬31,769) to $140,000 (â‚¬111,190).

DOJ_NMG_0035282

The plan also permits the transition of up to 3,200 Delphi workers represented by the IUE-CWA to GM for retirement purposes, Delphi said.

Also on Monday, the court set at $5 million (â‚¬4 million) the maximum value of creditors' claims Delphi can settle without court approval. Delphi's motion had asked the judge to set that at $20 million (â‚¬15.9 million).

Representatives of the ad hoc creditors committee and the equity committee objected, saying the process needed greater transparency. At the bar date, or deadline for creditors to file claims, Delphi may make a new motion to raise that threshold. The company's bar date is scheduled for July 31.

Lobbying Bill Stuck In Limbo (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Clear progress on a lobbying reform bill continues to elude House and Senate Republican leaders, with the two chambers stalemated over the fate of a controversial provision targeting the independent political groups known as 527s.

Cracking down on the groups, which historically have favored Democrats, is a top election-year priority for national Republicans. When the House took up legislation to overhaul lobbying, GOP leaders made a point of inserting a provision to sideline 527s. But that plan is running into growing resistance in the Senate, initially from Democrats, but now from some conservative Republicans as well.

Members of both camps are pledging to oppose the provision — with a filibuster if necessary.

"That's a huge roadblock right now," said a senior House Republican aide. "Obviously, House leaders want it really bad, and many Senators don't." Another House aide confirmed that the issue was first among those confronting House and Senate negotiators.

As long as lawmakers engage in a cross-Capitol staring contest over the issue, the long-stalled reform bill will remain idle. House Republican leaders have been predicting quick action on the measure since that chamber approved its version of the bill in early May. But those projections have consistently slid, as agreements on differences between the two bills have proved hard to come by.

The latest deadline — outlined in a joint statement earlier this month by House and Senate Republican leaders — has both chambers wrapping work on a conference agreement by the July Fourth recess. Now, even that goal appears imperiled, with GOP aides predicting little action in the two weeks left of this work period.

While Senate conferees were announced late last month, House negotiators have not yet been named and several insiders said they expect them to be appointed only after the sticky issues have been ironed out.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), who chair their respective chambers' Rules panels, have been in frequent consultation in recent weeks. Lott last week predicted a draft conference report could be ready within days.

But while GOP aides said that negotiators are close to agreement on several other contentious issues, including new earmark and disclosure requirements, the matter of the 527 groups doesn't appear much closer to a resolution.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) last week complicated what was looking like a partisan showdown in the Senate when he, along with six other conservative Senators, sent a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) expressing objections to new rules for the groups.

The Senators pointed to First Amendment concerns in opposing a crackdown on the groups. The lawmakers have high-powered backing in that effort from the conservative Club for Growth, itself a 527 group, which has been piling pressure on Republicans to back off new rules. The organization has launched a Free Speech Action Center to gin up opposition to the measure and announced it would award points in its annual rankings to lawmakers who stood with them.

"I think it's clear it will be a tough sell in the Senate because it has nothing to do with lobbying," said David Keating, executive director of Club for Growth.

However, a stark political reality is encouraging Republicans to take action: The current laws, which allow 527s to raise and spend money freely, are providing Democrats a much-needed financial boost. For the first quarter of this year, Democratic-leaning 527 groups specializing in federal campaigns have raised almost three times as much as their Republican counterparts, according an analysis by the Campaign Finance Institute. The groups have collected nearly $43 million as of March 31, compared to just $16 million raised by their GOP rivals.

As the process has dragged on, and with the proposed reforms falling so far short of what reformers have sought, outside watchdog groups have all but washed their hands of the process. They have derided the Senate and House measures as "weak tea" and "warm spit," respectively, and hold out little hope for meaningful improvements during conference negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0035283

Instead, the groups are set to rally around a bill expected this week from Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) that will include reform provisions that were dropped or blocked from the leadership-approved overhaul measures.

The bill would create an Office of Public Integrity to oversee compliance with new lobbying rules; require more frequent and fuller disclosures by lobbyists of their activities; ban gifts to lawmakers; and force them to pay fair market value for rides they catch on private planes.

"This will serve as a marker for the reform groups who will be criticizing the conference report," said Public Citizen's Craig Holman.

To try to keep campaign and ethics reform measures front and center in this fall's midterm elections, a coalition of watchdog and issue groups on Wednesday plan to launch a program designed to get Congressional candidates to sign a pledge that they'll support public financing of elections as well as anti-corruption and lobbying reforms, Holman said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Preferential Hawaiian School Admissions Questioned In Court (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Niesse, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - HONOLULU-A wealthy private school created exclusively for Hawaii's indigenous people may be forced to admit non-Hawaiians if it loses a legal challenge.

Fifteen judges on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments Tuesday in San Francisco over whether the Kamehameha Schools can continue to limit enrollment to Native Hawaiians.

The case is an important test of racial preference programs in school admissions.

While the courts have generally ruled against favoritism in education based on race, the Kamehameha case is different in that the school was founded based on the will of a Hawaiian princess and doesn't receive federal funding.

"Her whole intent was to provide a means for educating her people so they could compete in a society that was changing so quickly," said Kekoa Paulsen, a spokesman for Kamehameha Schools. "We are providing a remedy for a ... people in their own homeland who are suffering."

Hawaii was an independent kingdom until a U.S.-backed overthrow of the leaders in 1893. It eventually became a U.S. territory and was made a state in 1959.

A three-judge panel of the circuit court in California initially ruled against Kamehameha's admissions policy with a 2-1 vote in August. But the court announced in February it would reconsider the school's 118-year-old policy.

The lawsuit was filed on behalf of an anonymous white student who was denied admission to the school in 2003 and claimed he was discriminated against because he didn't have Hawaiian blood.

"We've had a lot of conflict, including the Civil War, about treating people differently based on their race. I think we're mostly past that, but unfortunately Kamehameha wants to go back to an era of privilege for citizens depending on what race you are," said Eric Grant, a Sacramento, California, attorney representing the boy, who recently graduated from a public school.

Kamehameha Schools was established under the 1883 will of Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop as part of a trust now worth $6.8 billion (â,¬5.4 billion). Part of the school's mission is to counteract historical disadvantages Hawaiians face in employment, education and society.

Kamehameha is the largest private landowner in Hawaii and is one of the richest trusts in the United States.

Admission to the elite school is first granted to all qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings left available. Only one in eight eligible applicants get in, and tuition costs are 60 percent subsidized.

Out of 5,400 students enrolled at the school's three campuses, only two students do not have Hawaiian ancestry. One of those students initially claimed he was Hawaiian, but his acceptance into the school was rescinded when he couldn't prove his bloodline. He was later admitted to the school as the result of a legal settlement.

Attorneys for Kamehameha plan to argue that their admissions policy should be permitted to comply with the wishes of the princess' will and to help remedy some of the wrongs done during the U.S.-backed overthrow of the Hawaiian kingdom, Paulsen said.

"The lands that support Kamehameha Schools ... are designated for a certain set of beneficiaries, and the beneficiaries in this case are the children of Native Hawaiian ancestry," said Jon Van Dyke, a University of Hawaii law professor who consulted for the school. "The Native Hawaiian people have a great need for education. They are still at the bottom of the socio-economic ladder."

DOJ_NMG_0035284

A lawyer for the boy countered that claim by saying the school's history isn't relevant to the issue of fundamental fairness.

"You have the school saying, 'Yeah, we discriminate by race, we admit that,'" said John Goemans, a Big Island attorney. "What the hell? That isn't America."

On the Net:

Kamehameha Schools: http://www.ksbe.edu/

9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals: http://www.ca9.uscourts.gov/

Federal Judge Tosses $240,000 Verdict In Age Bias Lawsuit (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, June 20, 2006

Overturning a jury's verdict of more than $240,000 in an age discrimination suit, a federal magistrate judge has ruled that a plaintiff who was fired at the age of 50 failed to prove an essential element of his case because the four workers who assumed his duties had an average age of less than seven years younger than he was.

In his 60-page opinion in Steward v. Sears Roebuck & Co., U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas J. Rueter concluded that plaintiff Gunnar Steward failed to make out a prima facie case of age discrimination.

The decision is a stunning setback for Steward and his lawyers, Carmen R. Matos of Doylestown, Pa., and George P. Wood of Stewart & Wood in Norristown, Pa., and overturns a jury's award of nearly $93,000 in back pay and $148,000 in front pay.

Matos and Wood argued that after Steward was fired, his duties were taken over by two men in their 30s and one in his mid-40s, with an average age of less than 38, or more than 12 years younger than Steward.

But Rueter sided with Sears and its lawyers -- Sidney R. Steinberg and Robert J. Toy of Post & Schell -- who said the evidence showed that a 60-year-old woman also took over some of his duties.

As a result, Rueter concluded that the average age of the workers who assumed Steward's duties was just 6.75 years -- a difference the judge found to be not enough for a prima facie case.

Rueter's ruling could force the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to revisit a vexing question that often arises in age discrimination suits -- just how much younger must the more favorably treated employee be in order to be deemed "sufficiently younger" than the plaintiff? The answer for courts in the 3rd Circuit, Rueter found, is that a difference of less than seven years is not enough.

Although the 3rd Circuit has held, in a pair of cases handed down in the mid-90s, that eight- and nine-year age differences were sufficient to establish a prima facie case, Rueter found that the appellate court's 2000 decision in Narin v. Lower Merion School District held that a seven-year age difference was insufficient.

Rueter also cited a 2003 decision from the 6th Circuit in Grosjean v. First Energy Corp. that said "the overwhelming body of cases in most circuits has held that age differences of less than 10 years are not significant enough to make out the fourth part of the age discrimination prima facie case."

On appeal, Matos and Wood face a truly daunting challenge because Rueter also said that, as an alternative to granting judgment in favor of Sears, he would at least order a new trial because the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

And even if they win at the 3rd Circuit on the age difference question, they have a second significant hurdle to clear because Rueter found another fundamental and fatal flaw in Steward's case.

Under the burden-shifting scheme of employment discrimination law, Rueter said, Sears satisfied its burden of offering nondiscriminatory reasons, and the burden then shifted to Steward to prove that the proffered reasons were merely a "pretext" for discrimination.

Rueter concluded that Steward never met that burden, and that failing to do so was a second reason for tossing out the jury's verdict.

"Even if this court were to conclude that plaintiff had established a prima facie case, the court would find that it was a very weak prima facie case established by only the slimmest of margins," Rueter wrote.

"Such a weak prima facie case, coupled with the lack of evidence showing that defendant's proffered reasons for terminating plaintiff were pretextual, would not be sufficient for plaintiff to carry its ultimate burden of proving intentional discrimination."

DOJ_NMG_0035285

Matos, in an interview, suggested that the case is likely to be appealed, and that she believes Rueter intruded on the jury's role by resolving factual disputes.

Rueter's 60-page opinion included several fact-intensive sections.

In the section on the age difference issue, Rueter looked at the evidence of precisely how Steward's duties were taken over by other Sears employees after he was fired.

The plaintiff's lawyers argued that a 33-year-old man took over all or most of Steward's duties, with some duties handled by two others aged 35 and 45.

But Sears insisted that it was the 45-year-old who took over for Steward, and that, casting a wider net, the evidence showed the work was spread among four workers ranging in age from 33 to 60.

Likewise, Rueter delved deep into the facts in his analysis of whether Sears had offered valid reasons for the firing and, since it had, whether Steward had mounted a valid attack on the credibility of those reasons.

Sears had faulted Steward for, among other things, failing to complete assigned tasks; and for not responding to customer complaints.

Rueter found that Steward failed to show the reasons were pretextual.

"It is irrelevant if plaintiff thought he had completed all of these tasks correctly," Rueter wrote.

"Plaintiff's belief that the quality of his work was 'A+' or that the work difficulties were not his fault, does not demonstrate such 'weaknesses, implausibilities, inconsistencies, incoherencies or contradictions' in defendant's proffered legitimate reasons for its action that a reasonable fact-finder could rationally find them 'unworthy of credence' and hence infer 'that the employer did not act for [the asserted] nondiscriminatory reasons,'" Rueter wrote.

Critically lacking in Steward's case, Rueter said, was any evidence that Steward's boss did not believe in the reasons he offered for his decision to fire Steward.

S.D. Voters To Decide Fate Of Abortion Ban (AP-Y2)

By Chet Brokaw

AP2, June 19, 2006

Voters will have the final say on South Dakota's tough new law that bans almost all abortions.

Secretary of State Chris Nelson said Monday that the law's opponents had collected enough signatures to put a question on the Nov. 7 ballot asking voters if the law should go into effect as planned or be dumped.

The state's abortion law, among the strictest in the nation, bans the procedure in all cases except when necessary to save a woman's life, with no exceptions for rape or incest.

Supporters hoped it would prompt a court challenge that would give the U.S. Supreme Court an opportunity to overturn its 1973 Roe. v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

Instead of challenging it in court, opponents, who argue the law is too extreme, gathered enough petition signatures to put the question directly to voters.

A coalition of groups opposed to the law turned in about 38,000 petition signatures on May 30 to put the question on the ballot. The secretary of state's office determined that the petitions contained at least the 16,728 that were required.

The Legislature passed the measure and the governor signed it in March. It was scheduled to take effect July 1 but is now on hold pending the outcome of the public vote.

Both sides pledged Monday to conduct all-out campaigns on the issue.

Leslee Unruh, one of the main promoters of the new law, said the campaign to preserve the ban will seek to convince voters that abortion must be stopped because it harms both unborn babies and the women who have abortions.

"It's probably the loudest cry we've heard," said Unruh, who runs a center that counsels women considering an abortion. "It's because there are so many women who have been harmed by abortion, myself being one of them, who have come together."

Jan Nicolay, a former state lawmaker who led the effort to refer the ban to a statewide vote, said the issue should remain about South Dakota.

"It's no slam dunk. We've got a lot of work ahead of us," Nicolay said. "We'll give it all we've got, I can tell you that."

Pentagon Lists Homosexuality As Disorder (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, June 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035286

A Pentagon document classifies homosexuality as a mental disorder, decades after mental health experts abandoned that position.

The document outlines retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities, and in a section on defects lists homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders.

Critics said the reference underscores the Pentagon's failing policies on gays, and adds to a culture that has created uncertainty and insecurity around the treatment of homosexual service members, leading to anti-gay harassment.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Jeremy M. Martin said the policy document is under review.

The Pentagon has a "don't ask, don't tell" policy that prohibits the military from inquiring about the sex lives of service members but requires discharges of those who openly acknowledge being gay.

The Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military, at the University of California at Santa Barbara, uncovered the document and pointed to it as further proof that the military deserves failing grades for its treatment of gays.

Nathaniel Frank, senior research fellow at the center, said, "The policy reflects the department's continued misunderstanding of homosexuality and makes it more difficult for gays and lesbians to access mental health services."

The document, called a Defense Department Instruction, was condemned by medical professionals, members of Congress and other experts, including the American Psychiatric Association.

"It is disappointing that certain Department of Defense instructions include homosexuality as a 'mental disorder' more than 30 years after the mental health community recognized that such a classification was a mistake," said Rep. Marty Meehan (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass.

Congress members noted that other Pentagon regulations dealing with mental health do not include homosexuality on any lists of psychological disorders. And in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Monday, nine lawmakers asked for a full review of all documents and policies to ensure they reflect that same standard.

"Based on scientific and medical evidence the APA declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder in 1973 — a position shared by all other major health and mental health organizations based on their own review of the science," James H. Scully Jr., head of the psychiatric association, said in a letter to the Defense Department's top doctor earlier this month.

There were 726 military members discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy during the budget year that ended last Sept. 30. That marked the first year since 2001 that the total had increased. The number of discharges had declined each year since it peaked at 1,227 in 2001, and had fallen to 653 in 2004.

Flag Needs Protection (USAT)

By Dianne Feinstein

USA Today, June 20, 2006

On the morning of February 24, 1945 — when I was a 12-year-old girl — I picked up a copy of the San Francisco Chronicle. On its cover, there was a full-page picture of the now iconic Joe Rosenthal photograph of American marines raising the United States flag at Iwo Jima.

For me and for the nation, the photograph was a jolt of electricity boosting our morale during the terrible island-to-island Pacific battles of World War II. The sight of those troops hoisting Old Glory forever cemented my view of our flag.

Today, our flag remains a vibrant symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, and our eternal memory of those who have sacrificed to defend these principles. It is because of all that our flag embodies that I have co-sponsored the Flag Protection Amendment.

Throughout our nation's history, the flag has been protected by law. In 1989, 48 of our 50 states had statutes restricting flag desecration. In 1974, Supreme Court Justice Byron White wrote that: "(T)here would seem to be little question about the power of Congress to forbid the mutilation of the Lincoln Memorial or to prevent overlaying it with words or other objects. The flag is itself a monument, subject to similar protection."

I agree with Justice White — the American flag is our monument in cloth.

But its protection ended in 1989, when the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Texas law prohibiting flag desecration. Congress responded by passing the Flag Protection Act of 1989, but the Supreme Court struck down that law as well. The only way to restore protection to the flag is to amend the Constitution. Otherwise, any legislation passed by Congress would be struck down.

The Flag Protection Amendment would not prohibit flag burning. Rather, the Amendment would simply return to Congress the ability to protect the flag as it has been protected throughout most of this nation's history.

Some opponents of the Flag Protection Amendment argue that we must choose between trampling on the flag and trampling on the First Amendment. I strongly disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0035287

There is no idea or thought expressed by the burning of the American flag that cannot be expressed equally well in another manner. This Amendment would leave both the flag and free speech safe.

Dianne Feinstein is a Democratic senator from California.

Congress Nears Choice: Protect Freedom Or Stoke Anger? (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

In early June an allegedly drunken man in West Haven, Conn., yelled racial epithets and tore up an American flag while arguing with police and passersby. Earlier in the spring, instances of vandalism involving flags were reported in New Hampshire and New York.

Those three episodes of 2006 — as compiled by the Citizens Flag Alliance, a group pushing for a constitutional amendment to protect the flag — constitute the raging menace of flag desecration.

In fact, they show what a non-issue flag desecration is. Instances are rare and easily addressed by local laws. They hardly require the extraordinary act of amending the Constitution.

But in a Congress unwilling to address important matters — its own ruinous spending and flagrant corruption to name just two — symbolism is the politically convenient substitute for substance. The Senate will soon take up an amendment to stop flag burning, and the vote is expected to be razor close. The House of Representatives has passed it, meaning that it could soon be sent to state legislatures, where it would be ratified if three-quarters approve.

While it's tempting to dismiss this as trivial election-year posturing, the precedent is troubling. It would for the first time alter the cornerstone of American freedom, the Constitution's First Amendment.

That is not a small matter. The First Amendment is the reason Americans are free to say what they think. It is also the reason people here can worship as they wish, associate with whomever they please, and get news and information from a free and independent press. It gives citizens a right to have grievances redressed. To limit those rights — especially for so trivial a reason — is to say they are no longer sacrosanct.

They should be. They are what makes America unique.

If Congress banned something as pathetic as flag desecration to score political points, surely it would consider limiting other unpopular speech.

The amendment's wording virtually guarantees that outcome. Would it, for instance, cover depictions of flags as well as actual cloth banners? Would sitting on a flag patch sewn onto the back of a pair of jeans count?

And what about the issue of flying a flag upside down? This has already become the preferred form of protest for people pushing for everything from an immediate withdrawal from Iraq to better psychiatric care for veterans. These protesters often say that they respect the values the flag represents, but that they believe those values are being subverted by people in power. Does this country really want to criminalize such a nuanced form of political dissent?

These issues would be left to legislation drafted by future Congresses and interpreted by courts. All of that, in turn, would weaken individual rights that are at the Constitution's heart.

And for what gain? Proponents of an amendment say the flag is such an important symbol of American democracy that it deserves a special status. But the Connecticut flag burner was charged with seven offenses ranging from public consumption of alcohol to criminal mischief. Surely, that is sufficient.

In fact, what makes the flag so special is this: It stands for a nation that deems individual liberties so important, it tolerates unpopular minority opinion.

The main threat to the flag comes not from the occasional burning of Old Glory. It comes from those who would sacrifice the principles the flag represents.

'A White Individual' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

With Congress poised to extend, for another quarter-century, certain "temporary" provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, it's worth pondering some of the political mischief taking place these days in the name of "voting rights."

Take New York's 11th Congressional District, a safe Democratic seat covering several neighborhoods in Brooklyn. The seat is currently occupied by Major Owens, a black Democrat who has held it since 1983 and is retiring this year. One of the four candidates to replace him is David Yassky, a white Democrat who represents some of the same Brooklyn neighborhoods as a city councilman.

Mr. Owens has one of Congress's most liberal voting records, and there's nothing in the background of Mr. Yassky, a protégé of New York Senator Chuck Schumer, that suggests he would vote much differently. Even so, Mr. Owens and the three other candidates, all of whom are black, are on a mission to force Mr. Yassky out of the race. In the case of Mr. Owens, this has partly to do with the fact that his son is among those running in the September 12 Democratic primary. But Mr. Owens, the other black candidates and local black officials have stressed that their overriding concern is the color of Mr. Yassky's skin. And they're using the Voting Right Act to justify old-fashioned race-baiting.

DOJ_NMG_0035288

New York's 11th District is a product of racial gerrymandering linked to passage of the Voting Rights Act. When Congress passed the law 40 years ago to address black disenfranchisement primarily in the Deep South, some provisions were made permanent and others temporary. Gone forever were poll taxes and grandfather clauses, but Section 5 provisions of the law dealing with "preclearance," or federal oversight of local election practices, were meant to be short-term.

Study after study shows that preclearance is no longer necessary. Black voter registration and participation rates, along with the growth of minority officeholders -- often elected with white "cross-over" votes -- demonstrate that blacks are no longer disenfranchised. Yet Congress continues to reauthorize these Section 5 provisions because they allow both Republicans and Democrats to keep drawing racially gerrymandered districts in the name of protecting voting rights.

"A law passed to protect minority voters -- to ensure free and fair access to the polls -- has become much like every other affirmative action policy," says Edward Blum, a visiting fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and the author of a forthcoming book on the unintended consequences of the Voting Rights Act. "It has become, literally, a racial set-aside. The law is being used to justify actual racial proportionality."

It's bad enough that such gerrymandering has all but eviscerated inter-party competition for seats in Congress, creating so many "safe" Republican and Democratic strongholds that the outcome of most races is a foregone conclusion. But another pernicious byproduct of gerrymandering is the racial polarization and hyper-partisanship that we see in places like New York's 11th District. These so-called "majority-minority" gerrymanders tend to nurture political division and extremism by reducing incentives for candidates to make appeals to anyone other than their racial or ethnic voting base.

Representative Owens has labeled Mr. Yassky a "colonizer." Al Sharpton, ever the statesman, has called the candidate, who is Jewish, "greedy." And the New York Sun reported last week that Albert Vann, a city councilman who opposes Mr. Yassky's candidacy, sent an email to black elected officials nationwide announcing that "we are in peril of losing a 'Voting Rights' district . . . as a result of the well financed candidacy of Council Member David Yassky, a white individual."

Ironically, such rhetoric is one reason so few minorities are able to seek and win higher office. Once you're appealing to people on completely racial grounds in order to win a House seat, you have a hard time making the broader appeals necessary to win statewide.

But don't expect any of this to matter as Congress ramrods through another extension of the provisions that feed these bad outcomes. A House vote is due any day, and the Senate is expected to follow sometime prior to the July 4 recess. Congress has never let balkanization of the electorate get in the way of protecting its own political hide, especially when it can claim to be siding with the "voting rights" angels.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Report Highlights Progress In Intellectual Property Protection (INFOWEEK)

By Larry Greenemeier, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, June 20, 2006

The Justice Department two years ago promised to beef up efforts to protect the intellectual property of software development, music, and movies. Here's the result of its efforts.

The technology world has long agonized over the government's shortcomings in protecting intellectual property. Theft of source code or even finished products costs tech firms money and potential revenue and dampens the incentive to invest in original research and development. The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday plans to issue a report signaling a positive change.

The Justice Department's Intellectual Property Task Force has made progress in protecting the content created by companies in a number of disciplines, including software development, music recording, and motion pictures, the report says. Essentially, Justice wants to convince businesses that it has followed up on promises made in 2004 to bring the hammer down on those caught lifting other people's work for their own purposes.

The Justice Department, as promised, has increased the number of prosecutors in the field by creating five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units in the District of Columbia, Nashville, Orlando, Fla., Pittsburgh, and Sacramento. Justice also opened another seven in Austin, Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, Newark, N.J., New Haven, Conn., and Philadelphia--all cities where cybercrime and intellectual property offenses are significant problems, the new report states.

DOJ_NMG_0035289

Justice has also broadened its focus internationally by placing a federal prosecutor in Southeast Asia as an intellectual property law-enforcement coordinator and got funding to place a similar official in Eastern Europe. The department has trained and provided technical help to more than 2,000 foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges in the area of intellectual property investigations and prosecutions, the report states.

In March 2004, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft established the Intellectual Property Task Force, directing it to examine and suggest improvements to all the department's intellectual property enforcement efforts. By October 2004, the task force returned to Ashcroft with recommendations in the areas of criminal enforcement, international cooperation, civil enforcement, antitrust enforcement, legislation, and prevention. By the following February, Alberto Gonzalez had assumed attorney general responsibilities, appointed new task force members, and directed them to fully implement the 2004 report's recommendations.

The president's Intellectual Property Protection Act of 2005 is part of the plan. In partnership with the U.S. Patent Trademark Office, the Justice Department plans to dedicate $900,000 over three years for piracy prevention efforts with nonprofit educational organizations.

The Justice Department's progress report cites an Office of the U.S. Trade Representative statistic that intellectual property theft costs American corporations $250 billion each year. "Modern technology has increased the innovativeness of companies and the amount of new intellectual property being created, but it has also made intellectual property theft easier and more anonymous," the report states. "Computer technology and the Internet generate inexpensive and far-flung opportunities for piracy and distribution."

The Justice Department is, along with the departments of Commerce, Homeland Security, the Office of the United States Trade Representative, and the Food and Drug Administration, part of the Bush administration's Strategy Targeting Organized Piracy effort, or STOP, and has co-chaired the National Intellectual Property Law Enforcement Coordination Council since its 1999 inception.

The FBI's intellectual property enforcement program has been increasingly busy in recent years. Between fiscal year 2003 and fiscal year 2005, the number of open intellectual property investigations increased 22%, from 304 to 372 investigations annually. The number of undercover investigations increased 87%. During the same time period, the number of indictments filed from intellectual property investigations increased 38%, from 92 to 127. Since 2001, Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Customs and Border Protection divisions have initiated more than 31,000 seizures of counterfeit products with an estimated retail value in excess of $482 million.

Impressive statistics, but as with any crackdown, the program's success will ultimately rely on a healthy dose of prevention. This has partly been addressed through a number of intellectual-property education programs for America's youth. One such program is called "Activate Your Mind: Protect Your Ideas" and consists of a series of educational events nationwide involving students, teachers, government representatives, and victims of intellectual property theft.

Real Estate System Criticized (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices

A national consumer advocacy group yesterday condemned real estate trade groups as a "cartel" that sets prices and blocks competition to maintain its traditional commission structure and to keep discount firms from gaining market share.

The commission system is "cockamamie," said Stephen Brobeck, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America. Even some inexperienced real estate agents are charging a 7 percent sales commission, he said -- an amount he likened to the cost of a new car. And he questioned why the brokerage fee on an $800,000 houses is four times higher than that for a $200,000 house, saying the work involved is basically equal.

The District-based federation applauded efforts by government antitrust regulators to put pressure on the trade groups to change the way they do business, but Brobeck said no one had yet found the "magic bullet" to reduce costs. He said consumers have been left on their own and urged home buyers and sellers to negotiate over the sales commissions they are charged and make sure it is clear who is representing whom, what each agent will be paid and for what services.

Thomas M. Stevens, a local real estate broker who is president of the National Association of Realtors, fired back within hours, saying the Consumer Federation is ill-informed and incorrect.

"It's clear and evident that they don't understand the real estate business," Stevens said. "Real estate is probably one of the most competitive industries out there."

DOJ_NMG_0035290

Stevens said real estate agents put themselves at financial risk showing clients from house to house and advertising homes for sale in hopes a transaction will be completed. He said that more than 2 million people in the United States hold real estate licenses and that the work has grown only more competitive and difficult with the real estate slowdown of recent months.

The federation's report came as the Michigan legislature prepares to enact rules sought by the state real estate industry to define the responsibilities of agents in ways that critics say would favor traditional firms and make it more difficult for discount and Internet-based firms to compete. The Realtor association in Michigan says the rule change is needed because some of the new firms are offering consumers poor service, leaving traditional real estate agents scrambling to keep deals together.

In October, federal antitrust regulators at the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission wrote to Michigan legislators urging them to shelve the proposed rule. The agencies said it "would reduce consumer choice and cause Michigan consumers to pay more for real estate brokerage services," according to a Justice Department statement.

Lawyer Robert Campau, vice president of public policy and legal affairs at the Michigan Association of Realtors, said that the industry welcomes the new business models but that roles need to be more clearly defined.

"What the Michigan legislation attempts to do is to make clear what people are contracting for, against the backdrop of statute already existing in Michigan," Campau said. He said that about 100 Michigan state legislators voted for the industry-backed bill and that fewer than five voted against it. He expects similar, "fairly overwhelming" support when the state Senate considers the measure in the next few days.

Federal regulators have sought to influence the debate in other states, too. In West Virginia last month, the state Real Estate Commission rescinded a rule prohibiting rebates and other discounts to consumers, after receiving a warning letter from the Justice Department. South Dakota and Kentucky also rescinded similar rules last year. But in Alabama and Texas, legislation sought by the traditional real estate firms flew to passage almost unanimously.

The Justice Department has sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging its Internet multiple listing service policy prevents nontraditional brokers from gaining equal access to sales listing information. The trade group said it has changed its policies and is seeking to have a judge dismiss the lawsuit.

"Both sides looked for common grounds to settle, but it didn't get very far," said Stevens of the National Association of Realtors. "If the judge doesn't dismiss the case, it'll go to trial."

Justice Dept Won't Challenge Collaborative Labor Database (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. Justice Department on Monday said it won't take antitrust action against a collaborative initiative by retailers and manufacturers to develop a shared database on international factory and labor conditions.

The initiative, Fair Factories Clearinghouse, asked the Justice Department to decide whether it was concerned about potential antitrust problems with the initiative.

"The Department of Justice has no current intention to institute antitrust enforcement action against the Fair Factories Clearinghouse initiative," Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said in a letter sent to the organization.

The group's request to Justice officials described safeguards it will require member companies to take to avoid antitrust conflicts through the database sharing.

The Fair Factories Clearinghouse is designed to improve available audit information on the standards and conditions at factories around the world, according to the group's Web site.

- By Mark H. Anderson, Dow Jones Newswires, 202 862-9254; mark.anderson@ dowjones.com

FTC Signs Off On Internet Legal Referrals (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 20, 2006

Although it may not be a match made in heaven, Internet legal referral services that promise to match lawyers with potential clients have found a powerful new admirer -- the Federal Trade Commission.

In a recent letter to the State Bar of Texas, the FTC planning and policy chief, Maureen Ohlhausen, said that the Internet-based client/attorney matching services "have the potential to lower consumer costs of obtaining information about the price and quality of legal services, which is likely to lead to more intense competition among attorneys, ultimately benefiting Texas consumers."

There has been a long simmering debate in state bars around the country since the advent of these services in 1999 about whether they violate ethical rules on advertising and the bans on nonlawyer referrals for legal help.

DOJ_NMG_0035291

The Arizona and Washington state bars issued ethics opinions last year foreclosing use of the services, saying that lawyers may not pay to participate in for-profit Internet matching services. Meanwhile, Rhode Island approved the online matching in 2004 as a boon to consumers, quickly joined by North Carolina, South Carolina and Utah.

The FTC letter "is a powerful endorsement of the industry," said Anna Ostrovsky, general counsel for San Francisco-based LegalMatch.

Legal matching services generally charge lawyers to sign up. Consumers seeking legal help with divorces, wills, child custody and trademark issues help describe their needs and locations online. The service sends this to lawyers in the same region and interested attorneys respond -- something like a dating service -- with their qualifications and rates, allowing clients to shop for the right match.

Most states have been sitting on their hands. The nation's largest state bars, California and New York, remain mum on the topic, but have ethics committees pondering it.

Texas may be the key.

LegalMatch asked Texas to clarify whether the service violates Texas Ethical Rule 7.03, which prohibits state lawyers from paying a nonlawyer to solicit or refer prospective clients. In August 2005, the Texas bar's ethical opinion, No. 561, indicated that lawyers may not pay to be listed on a privately sponsored Internet site that gathers information about potential clients. But it was not clear whether it covered all of the online matching services.

In response, the FTC letter states, "online legal matching services are likely to make it less expensive for consumers to evaluate providers of legal services. The information sent to inquiring clients is likely to allow consumers to compare the price and quality among several competing attorneys more cheaply than other methods of comparison."

Ohlhausen concluded: "The burden should rest on the proponents of a restriction on competition to show that it is necessary to prevent significant consumer harm and that it is narrowly drawn to minimize its anticompetitive impact."

Austin attorney W. John Glancy, chairman of the Texas bar's Professional Ethics Committee, said that he could not disclose how the panel is leaning, when it might make a decision or who besides the FTC has submitted comments.

"It has been complete limbo for us for seven years," Ostrovsky said. "That's why we are so excited about [the FTC letter]. We asked the FTC to intervene six months ago to offer third-party guidance," she said.

Ostrovsky said that state bar rules on advertising were written before the Internet and many states have been slow to change. The ethics opinions "only add to the confusion" for lawyers, she said.

"California has not done anything either positive or negative, they simply ignored the issue," Ostrovsky said. "New York is in the same situation."

While some states take no formal position, they create confusion among lawyers who call ethics hotlines and are told they can't participate, she said.

Dennis Maio, a lawyer with the San Francisco office of Reed Smith and a member of the State Bar of California ethics committee, said, "I think the issue has been brooded about a bit." But he said the panel has not taken a position.

He described concerns that arise in considering a potential client who writes a 2,000-word e-mail about needing a divorce only to have the lawyer representing the client's spouse receive the Internet solicitation. "Now there is no confidentiality and the lawyer is obligated to use it against her," he said.

James Cooper, FTC deputy director of policy planning, said the key is whether the services are really a referral. "When you go to the state bar for a referral you get the next person on the Rolodex," he said. "[With the Internet service] you get five or six offers. It is a different model and has the potential to offer benefits to consumers."

LegalMatch, one of at least four providing the services, has found it hard to keep up with the growing consumer demand. Ostrovsky said that there are thousands of lawyers participating in their system and tens of thousands of cases coming in each month from people looking for help.

The New York state bar is reviewing, but has not resolved, the matching-service issue, a spokesman said. Among new restrictions on attorney advertising proposed by New York's appellate courts is updating all manner of attorney advertising online.

Congress Weighs Rules Of Net Access (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

Call it a battle for the future of the Internet.

As the Senate takes up the first overhaul of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, this week's debate will pitch one of the most unlikely lineups in recent political history against an entrenched industry lobby.

On one side: the big phone companies and cable providers, who want Congress to help them speed up the move into the video market and keep government regulation at a minimum. It's one of the most well-funded and experienced industry groups on Capitol Hill.

On the other side: those who use their services, who want Congress to make sure that the Internet does not become a fast lane for those who can pay - and a dirt road for those who can not. The Save the Internet Coalition includes Google Inc., Amazon.com, Microsoft, and eBay, thousands of bloggers, and more than 700 groups. It's one of the most diverse coalitions ever to lobby a bill.

At stake is whether the Baby Bells and cable companies can charge more for fast, reliable service or "discriminate" against online competitors. Groups ranging from the Christian Coalition, Gunowners of America, and Moveon.org - which are bookends on most other issues - want the government to ensure "network neutrality."

This week, the Senate Commerce Committee marks up its version of this bill. A draft released Monday includes a new Internet Consumer Bill of Rights, including a change to the Federal Communications Commission to "preserve the free flow of ideas and information on the Internet" and to "promote public discourse."

Groups lobbying for guarantees of network neutrality say that doesn't go far enough. "Despite that list of protections, there is no protection from discrimination by telephone or cable companies in favor of companies in which they have a financial interest or receive extra payments," says Art Brodsky, spokesman for Public Knowledge, an advocacy group that works in telecommunications and intellectual property issues.

"It doesn't give the egalitarian access we have now. Any time you see the Christian Coalition and Moveon.org agreeing on anything, you know something important is on the line," he adds.

In the run-up to the Commerce Committee markup on Thursday, groups are stepping up their lobbying. Last week, the Christian Coalition and Moveon.org delivered petitions with more than 1 million signatures to Senate offices.

Meanwhile, the Bells and cable companies are filling inside-the-Beltway newspapers with full-page ads, by coalitions such as Hands Off the Internet, that argue against "legislating massive new regulations" that they say will stifle Internet growth and innovation.

It's an issue that cuts across party lines. The House passed its version of telecommunications reform June 8, after rejecting a Democratic proposal to establish network-neutrality requirements for broadband providers. The proposal, which barred blocking, impairing, degrading, or discriminating against lawful content, was rejected by 211 Republicans and 58 Democrats.

Now the focus shifts to the Senate, where a bipartisan coalition led by Sens. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine and Byron Dorgan (D) of North Dakota is calling for stronger language on net neutrality in the bill.

"As we read this bill, broadband operators will still be able to create a two-tiered Internet system, whereby people who pay more get faster and better service. Everyone else has to settle for the slow lane. That's not what made the Internet so revolutionary, and that's what needs to be preserved," says Barry Piatt, a spokesman for Senator Dorgan.

In earlier drafts of the Senate bill, Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska, who chairs the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, called only for an annual FCC study of the issue, with the promise that Congress would address any problems that develop.

"The FCC would conduct an annual study to look into net neutrality and see if any blocking is occurring. Then, Congress would act immediately," says Aaron Saunders, a spokesman for the Senate Commerce Committee.

In fact, there's nothing simple about net neutrality, critics say. The Snowe- Dorgan bill would trigger "lengthy and very cumbersome efforts by the FCC," said Mike McCurry of Hands Off the Internet at a debate at George Washington University on Friday.

For many lawmakers in rural areas, the concern is that, despite the promises, their constituents will find themselves on a slower Internet track.

Op-Ed: Don't Be Gun Shy Due To 'Jumping The Gun' Antitrust Fears (LAW)

Legal Times, June 20, 2006

Overreaction to 'Qualcomm' case should not keep in-house counsel from dealing during merger waiting periods

Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed

In almost any merger or acquisition, the acquiring company insists on "conduct of business" covenants to ensure that the target company maintains the value of its assets before closing. Imagine that in the middle of negotiating an important acquisition agreement, your antitrust counsel suddenly opines that certain routine conduct-of-business covenants are no longer permissible.

DOJ_NMG_0035293

This is precisely what is happening as some counsel overreact to the Department of Justice's recent gun-jumping lawsuit against Qualcomm Inc. In-house counsel need to be skeptical of such overly cautious gun-jumping advice, which can jeopardize the success of corporate transactions.

JUMPING THE GUN

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires that transactions of a certain size be reported to the two federal antitrust authorities (the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission) and that merging parties observe a pre-closing waiting period. This waiting period gives the antitrust agencies a chance to review a transaction for potential anti-competitive effects before the parties can close the transaction.

Gun jumping occurs when a buyer exercises control over the to-be-acquired firm before the expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period. When parties are competitors, certain joint activity or information sharing before closing can also violate the Sherman Act. Whether a gun-jumping violation exists is a separate question from whether the underlying business combination violates the antitrust laws.

Unfortunately, neither of the antitrust agencies has provided specific guidelines governing what is and what is not allowable during the period between signing and closing. Although guidelines were promised by then-Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Charles James in September 2002, his successors appear to have concluded that the fact-intensive nature of this area may make such guidelines too vague to be of any use.

Because of the very limited case law in this area and the lack of agency guidelines, antitrust counsel are left to interpret agency "lore" in the form of speeches, comments, case filings, informal opinions and articles by FTC and Justice Department staff.

These materials can be overly cautionary, contradictory and subject to competing interpretations. A 1999 speech by a former director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, for example, made the incredible claim that "once a purchase contract is signed, the parties may not proceed further with joint activity." Statements such as these fail to recognize merging parties' legitimate needs for integration planning and encourage excessive caution on the part of some counsel.

A November 2005 speech by William Blumenthal, general counsel for the FTC, retracted some of the more extreme agency statements in this area and signaled that some counsel were being overly cautious. He noted that the antitrust "agencies recognize that some information exchanges and pre-consummation collaboration necessarily occur in all mergers." Although he did provide some general guidance on due diligence and integration planning, Blumenthal unfortunately did not address merger covenants in any detail.

Perhaps because of the paucity of precedent, there are few more contentious areas among antitrust lawyers than the scope of allowable coordination and integration planning among merging parties before Hart-Scott-Rodino clearance or closing of the transaction.

As a result, in-house counsel are left to the mercy of their (and opposing) antitrust counsel's tolerance for risk. In-house counsel are frequently given lists of rigid "don'ts" that may conflict with the need to protect their bargain or plan for integration. The worst result is when the target's antitrust counsel takes an overly conservative view, thus driving the pace and scope of integration planning.

THE QUALCOMM COMPLAINT

The Justice Department has repeatedly said bringing gun-jumping cases is a priority. In April of this year, President George W. Bush's administration brought its third gun-jumping case, in which it sued and simultaneously settled with Qualcomm and Flarion Technologies.

In the Qualcomm complaint, the Justice Department alleged that Qualcomm obtained operational control of Flarion's business before Hart-Scott-Rodino clearance, in part through application and enforcement of various covenants in the parties' merger agreement. The merger agreement prohibited Flarion from acquiring, selling or licensing its intellectual property to third parties; entering into material contracts; hiring employees (except in the ordinary course of business); and making business proposals to customers without Qualcomm's prior consent.

The Justice Department also alleged that Qualcomm and Flarion's actual behavior went well beyond the scope of the covenants and permissible conduct. The department alleged that Qualcomm exercised significant, day-to-day control over Flarion's business, including participating in the routine hiring of employees, participating in the marketing of products and services to customers and prospective customers (which entailed approving price quotations and margin targets), discouraging Flarion from serving smaller customers and discouraging Flarion from providing pricing information to potential customers. Through these efforts, Qualcomm appears to have attempted to bring Flarion's policies and operations in accord with Qualcomm's practices and its future plans for Flarion's technology.

DOJ_NMG_0035294

The Qualcomm case has received attention because the gun-jumping violation was based in part on merger covenants, rather than just the parties' conduct. This is not unprecedented, however. Several years ago, the Justice Department challenged considerably more problematic covenants in the Computer Associates case, including covenants that required the purchaser's approval for the prices and terms the target company would offer to its customers.

Although the Qualcomm complaint has been interpreted by some as expanding the range of prohibited conduct by merging parties, the case was in fact entirely consistent with previous gun-jumping cases brought by both the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission.

The Justice Department's complaint should not be read (as some have done) to say the merger covenants, standing alone, were sufficient to violate the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. Except for the prohibition on making proposals to customers, the covenants are fairly common and, by themselves, not problematic. In interviews after the case, enforcement officials indicated that Qualcomm's actual conduct, more than the merger provisions, was the basis for the lawsuit.

Counsel, particularly in-house counsel, should be wary of advice suggesting that standard merger covenants are now illegal or ill-advised. In the prior two gun-jumping cases (Gemstar and Computer Associates), the Justice Department expressly permitted ordinary course covenants, material-adverse-change limitations (a common means of allocating risks between the signing and the closing of an acquisition agreement), and reasonable due diligence. The division's censure in the Computer Associates case, for example, was directed at covenants that established prices or discounts or that gave one party the right to negotiate or approve the other's proposed purchases or sales.

Unlike other gun-jumping cases, Qualcomm and Flarion reported and corrected the alleged violation. Historically, the antitrust agencies have been willing to limit or forgo penalties when the merging parties quickly and fully report and correct gun-jumping activity. Here, the parties eliminated the covenant requiring Qualcomm's approval to make proposals to customers -- the only really problematic merger covenant -- and put a stop to Qualcomm's day-to-day control of Flarion.

In return for voluntarily reporting and correcting the prohibited activity, Qualcomm obtained a favorable settlement with the Justice Department. Although Qualcomm will still pay a $1.8 million fine, this represents only half of the maximum penalty available. In addition, the final judgment does not include the onerous and embarrassing conduct prohibitions and monitoring requirements typically required. For example, the final judgments in the Gemstar and Computer Associates cases require 10 years of compliance reporting and monitoring. In addition, Qualcomm and Flarion were not charged with a Sherman Act violation, which they clearly could have been, as they had been competitors in the sale and licensing of technology for wireless networks.

THE ROLE OF IN-HOUSE COUNSEL

As counsel with the best understanding of their clients' reason for doing a deal, the business opportunities to be captured and the risk of deterioration of the target company's assets, in-house counsel have a significant role to play in securing appropriate merger covenants.

As the lawyers closest to the integration planning and activity, in-house counsel also have a critical role in preventing gun-jumping violations. They have the best opportunity to educate key people on gun-jumping issues, to monitor ongoing activity, to stop and modify conduct that is across the line, and, if appropriate, to report prohibited conduct to the government to avoid a lengthy, disruptive investigation that may delay the closing of the transaction.

Although it is customary to advise deal counsel and deal clients to bring antitrust counsel in early to avoid gun-jumping activity, in-house counsel must be alert to an excessively cautious approach by outside counsel, either from their side of the table or from across the table. Such an approach can have serious implications for the success of the transaction, as the antitrust agencies have recently recognized.

In-house counsel should push their outside counsel to think creatively about how to obtain the business objectives of the proposed transaction without running afoul of gun-jumping prohibitions. Good antitrust counsel should be able to advise in-house counsel how (not whether) an acquiring company can obtain needed due diligence, obtain necessary merger covenants and engage in integration planning with the other company -- even when the two companies are competitors.

Although merging parties certainly can go too far in interacting with one another before closing a transaction, there is more flexibility than some antitrust lawyers advise, and the Qualcomm case in no way limits merging parties' ability to achieve their business objectives.

Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed are counsel in the D.C. office of O'Melveny & Myers, where they specialize in antitrust law. O'Melveny & Myers represented Gemstar in the gun-jumping matter discussed here.

Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid For Denver Firm (AP)

By Sandy Shore, AP Business Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035295

Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid for Denver Energy Firm by 3 Percent a Share

DENVER (AP) -- Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc. boosted its offer for TransMontaigne Inc. by 3 percent a share, escalating a bidding war that appeared to be over last month when the fuel distribution company accepted a lower bid from SemGroup LP.

The Transmontaigne board was scheduled to meet Monday to determine whether the new Morgan Stanley offer of $11.35 a share in cash -- delivered Sunday -- would be considered superior to the SemGroup offer of $11.25 a share. The company said it would be prepared to terminate its agreement with SemGroup if the Morgan Stanley offer were better.

A TransMontaigne spokeswoman declined to comment further.

In a letter delivered to TransMontaigne on Sunday, John Shapiro, president of Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc., said the offer would expire on Friday morning if no action were taken.

"We believe that this offer will deliver better value with greater speed and certainty than your current proposed transaction," he wrote.

Shapiro also noted that SemGroup has received a request for more information from the Federal Trade Commission which could delay any deal between SemGroup and TransMontaigne. "We do not expect to have any such delay," he said.

Mike Brochetti, a SemGroup senior vice president of finance, declined to comment on the development. If the Morgan Stanley offer were deemed superior, SemGroup would have three days to submit a counteroffer.

TransMontaigne's stock closed up 25 cents, or 2.2 percent, to $11.54 a share in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange. In the past year, it has traded between $5.07 a share and $13.20 a share.

With a market value of about $576.5 million, Denver-based TransMontaigne is a refined petroleum products company that has terminals, pipelines, and tug-and-barge operations primarily along the Gulf Coast, and in the Midwest and South.

The bidding war began in March when Morgan Stanley, which owns 10 percent of TransMontaigne, offered $8.50 a share. It has increased the offer twice amid counter proposals from SemGroup, a privately held Tulsa, Okla.-based company that delivers products from the wellhead to the wholesale marketplace.

Late last month, TransMontaigne accepted SemGroup's latest acquisition bid of $11.25 per share in cash. The agreement between the two companies included a $10 million termination fee payable by SemGroup to TransMontaigne, should the deal be terminated by antitrust authority.

Judge Tosses Port Authority Suit (FAIRNM)

By Chris Eshleman, Staff Writer

Fairbanks (AK) News-Miner, June 20, 2006

A federal judge on Monday dismissed an antitrust lawsuit filed last year by the Alaska Gasline Port Authority against two North Slope oil companies. Judge Ralph Beistline found fault with a number of arguments raised by the port authority, finding among them that it lacked the standing needed to pursue the lawsuit in federal court.

The port authority filed the suit in federal District Court in Fairbanks, alleging BP and Exxon Mobil had conspired to keep North Slope natural gas out of the marketplace.

Beistline agreed with lawyers for the oil companies who said the state's Stranded Gas Development Act, which lays out a negotiating process for finding a way to transport natural gas to market, pre-empts the authority's lawsuit.

The judge said the port authority's project "appears well-intentioned, has accomplished a great deal to date, and may well have a valid plan."

"Decisions, however, regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska state Legislature and the people of Alaska," Beistline wrote.

Beistline's order was a response to a motion filed by the two oil companies asking the court to dismiss the case. A trial date had not been set.

Port Authority Chairman Jim Whitaker, who is also mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, declined to comment on whether the group planned to appeal.

"The Alaska Gasline Port Authority respectfully disagrees with the court's decision. We are in the process of reviewing the decision and the appropriate next steps," Whitaker said.

Bob Davis, a spokesman for Exxon Mobil, said the company was pleased with the decision. The company wants to bring North Slope gas, over which Exxon Mobil and other companies hold leases, to market but through a project different from what the port authority proposes.

"Our company has clearly demonstrated its desire to bring Alaska's North Slope gas to market through the funding of more than $125 million in technical and engineering studies related to the project, our good-faith negotiations with the state to develop a proposed fiscal contract and other actions such as discussions with the Canadian government on regulatory issues and ongoing research and technology commitments," Davis said.

DOJ_NMG_0035296

Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips have negotiated an agreement with Gov. Frank Murkowski that calls for setting fiscal terms for a longer pipeline that would run parallel to the Alaska Highway through Canada. That agreement requires legislative approval in order to proceed, and the Legislature has yet to give its consent. ConocoPhillips was not a target of the port authority lawsuit.

"We're pleased that the court agreed with us that the port authority's case has zero basis of credibility and was without merit," BP spokesman Daren Beaudo said. "A gas pipeline can't be built on lawsuits, advertisements and Power Point presentations. It has to be based on good business, and Alaskans now have the opportunity to support a fiscal contract that will move a real gas pipeline project forward."

The port authority, the municipal consortium formed in 1999 by voters in the Fairbanks North Star Borough, the North Slope Borough and the city of Valdez, claimed in its lawsuit to be ready to move forward on its plan to pipe North Slope gas to Valdez, liquefy it and ship it by tanker to West Coast markets.

The consortium even found a potential business partner, Sempra Energy, willing to help it develop and finance the pipeline project and to buy and market the gas. Its lawsuit claimed the two oil companies' refusal to sell natural gas scared Sempra away from the project.

Beistline found several faults with the lawsuit.

In one part of his ruling, he rejects the port authority's claim that mergers and acquisitions performed by BP and Exxon Mobil amounted to an illegal attempt to monopolize control over North Slope natural resources.

The judge said the suit failed to show the mergers, including BP's acquisition of Amoco Corp. and Atlantic Richfield Co., had any effect on the companies' decision not to sell North Slope gas. He also found that the port authority's claims of antitrust activity were made after the federal statute of limitations has passed.

The suit asked the court to force the companies to sell the authority some gas—gas it said it needs to gain financing—and for damages. But Beistline agreed with the oil companies' lawyers, who argued in a Fairbanks courthouse that the port authority's "ability to finance the construction of its proposed pipeline is speculative at best," he wrote.

The two companies can decide not to sell natural gas to the port authority if they choose, Beistline wrote.

State lawmakers recently wrapped up a month-long review of the contract proposed by the state and the oil companies. During that review, talk between legislators over the possible implications of the lawsuit was scant, said Sen. Gene Therriault, R-North Pole.

"I don't think there weren't a lot of people that based their decision-making on the outcome of this particular case," Therriault said.

A proposed all-Alaska pipeline project has received resolutions of support in the past from the Alaska Municipal League and the Alaska Conference of Mayors.

The port authority also filed a different lawsuit earlier last fall in Alaska Superior Court, alleging the state's Department of Natural Resources has mismanaged the North Slope's Point Thomson oil and gas unit, which contains at least 8 trillion cubic feet of gas and millions of barrels of crude oil but that sits undeveloped.

Port authority officials have said Point Thomson's reserves, if developed, would provide a key component for their project.

After the Point Thomson lawsuit was filed, the state's then-oil and gas director Mark Myers denied Exxon's development plan for the site, saying that if Exxon and fellow leaseholders BP and Chevron don't develop the field they should give their leases back to the state.

That ruling, however, has been suspended by Natural Resources Commissioner Mike Menge.

Judge Dismisses Port Authority's Lawsuit Against Oil Companies (AP)

By Anne Sutton, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) -- A federal judge on Monday tossed out an antitrust lawsuit alleging two oil companies that operate the largest gas fields on the North Slope are refusing to sell natural gas to an Alaska pipeline project other than their own.

The Alaska Gas Port Authority claims Exxon Mobil Corp. and BP PLC have conspired to crush competition and restrict the nation's supply of natural gas, and that has stymied the port authority's efforts to develop a gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope to Valdez.

DOJ_NMG_0035297

But U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline on Monday sided with the oil companies and said the port authority's case could upend a competing effort by the state to forge a contract with Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips to build a North Slope gas pipeline to Canada and markets in the Midwest.

Beistline said the port authority, as a "political subdivision" of the state, did not have the legal standing to take action that could frustrate the laws and policies of Alaska.

"Decisions regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska State Legislature and the people of Alaska," wrote Beistline.

He said the port authority failed to prove that any laws were violated. He also said great uncertainty remained concerning the viability of the authority's own gasline proposal.

High Court Seeks Government View In IPO Underwriter Appeal (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

MarketWatch, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday requested comments from the federal government on an appeal from 16 major Wall Street underwriters and investment firms trying to stop a class-action lawsuit that alleges firm commitment initial public offering practices on Wall Street violate federal antitrust laws.

The high court's request for a brief from the U.S. Solicitor General's office gives the Wall Street firms additional time to try and stop a class-action lawsuit alleging underwriter tie-in agreements - such as requiring the purchase of additional securities in the aftermarket - violate antitrust laws. A number of other claims in the lawsuit were thrown out by a U.S. District Court, but litigation over tie-in agreements was revived by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York.

The appeal, led by Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., a unit of Credit Suisse Group (CSR), also includes a number of prominent Wall Street firms. Those firms include Bear Stearns & Co., a unit of Bear Stearns Cos. (BSC); Citigroup Global Markets Inc., a unit of Citigroup Inc. (C); Goldman Sachs & Co., a unit of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. (GS); J.P. Morgan Securities Inc., a unit of JPMorgan Chase & Co. (JPM); Lehman Brothers Inc., a unit of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. (LEH); Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, a unit of Merrill Lynch & Co. (MER); and Morgan Stanley & Co., a unit of Morgan Stanley (MS).

The class-action lawsuit represents purchasers of stock issued by about 900 Internet and technology companies before the stock market bubble burst in the late 1990s. The lawsuit targets a number of IPO underwriting practices, arguing they are anticompetitive, and seeks financial damages. Additional related lawsuits are pending separately.

Securities and Exchange Commissioner Paul Atkins, in a Wall Street Journal op-ed column last week, said the antitrust lawsuit is "a serious threat to our capital markets" that could, if allowed to continue, spark a trend of antitrust-based suits against securities underwriters and "devastate America's process of capital formation."

Initially, a U.S. District Court judge threw out the lawsuit, ruling in 2003 that, among other things, the SEC's regulation of underwriting practices bars challenges under antitrust laws. The Second Circuit revived a portion of it in September 2005, ruling the tie-in agreements aren't covered by this immunity.

"The SEC, the expert agency charged by Congress with regulating the IPO underwriting business, has advocated immunity from these antitrust actions in the most emphatic terms," the Wall Street firms said in a court brief. "The Second Circuit's rejection of the commission's view - in an area so central to the nation's economy and the SEC's expertise - makes this a case of extraordinary public importance."

The securities industry, in several friend-of-the-court briefs, also urged Supreme Court review of the Second Circuit decision, arguing among other things that the decision would open Wall Street up to a new wave of lawsuits.

Russel Beatie, a New York attorney for the class-action investors, said the decision won't encourage frivolous lawsuits. "The decision has not encouraged the filing of antitrust strike suits because it is limited to conduct that violates the antitrust laws," Beatie said. "If defendants wish to avoid future liability, they should not engage in conduct the Second Circuit described as an 'epic Wall Street conspiracy.'"

The case is Credit Suisse First Boston v. Billing, 05-1157. The government's brief is likely to be filed later this year.

Senate Panel Proposes Net User 'bill Of Rights' (CNET)

By Anne Broache, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON--The latest Net neutrality provisions in a mammoth Senate communications bill stopped short of giving Internet companies and consumer advocacy groups all the assurances they've requested.

DOJ_NMG_0035298

Unveiled formally at a briefing here for reporters on Monday, new provisions in the latest draft of the sweeping Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act would allow the Federal Communications Commission to police subscribers' complaints of "interference" in their Internet activities and to levy fines on violators.

Specifically, the bill (click here for PDF) would require all Internet service providers to adhere to what the proposal calls an "Internet consumer bill of rights." The nine principles outlined under that heading include: allowing consumers to access and post any lawful content they please; to access and run any Web page, search engine or application that they choose (including voice and video programs); and to connect any legal devices they please to the network.

Carve-outs would exist for network management purposes, such as parental control technologies and security software.

All Internet service providers, if they're not already doing so, would also be obligated to offer broadband access on a standalone, or "naked," basis--without also requiring, for example, purchase of telephone or cable subscriptions.

But critics say the latest draft, scheduled for an initial committee vote on Thursday afternoon, refrained from addressing a major complaint of advocates of network neutrality--that is, the idea that network operators should give equal treatment to all content that travels across their pipes.

Under the new proposal, "the Internet still ends up split into Lexus lanes and dirt roads, and an FCC rendered powerless to protect American consumers," the It's Our Net Coalition, a group in favor of Net neutrality mandates, said in a statement Monday. Backed primarily by Amazon.com, eBay, Google, Microsoft and Yahoo, the group includes other members such as the Christian Coalition, the Association of Research Libraries and the Consumer Federation of America.

They'd rather see passage of a bill introduced by North Dakota Democrat Byron Dorgan, Maine Republican Olympia Snowe and seven other Democrats that would flatly prohibit network operators from making deals with content providers and charging premium prices for the privilege of speedier delivery or other special treatment--what they disparagingly call a "two-tiered" Internet.

Some form of that proposal will likely be offered as an amendment to the Senate bill at a committee vote scheduled for Thursday afternoon. But its prospects may not be good--a similar, Democratic-backed amendment was soundly defeated in the House, and Senate Republicans have indicated strong opposition to the idea.

Network operators, for their part, have said repeatedly that they have no intention of blocking or degrading their subscribers' Internet activities and have deemed bills like the Snowe-Dorgan one a solution in search of a problem. Supported mostly by conservative groups, they have defended the business model decried by Net neutrality fans as a way to guarantee better quality of service for high-bandwidth applications and to offset what they describe as vast investments in new fiber.

Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican, had emphasized in earlier remarks that he didn't want to get involved in regulating the way that companies do business--a "battle of the titans," he called it. He said instead that he believed it was important to offer protections for consumers, and his bill is designed to reflect those views, committee aides said Monday.

The new language followed ongoing negotiations between Stevens and Co-Chairman Daniel Inouye, a Hawaii Democrat. Inouye and other Democrats had criticized the original version of the sweeping broadband bill, which simply instructed the FCC to scrutinize the state of broadband competition and to report back to Congress on its findings, for not going far enough. The latest draft retains that provision in addition to the others.

Inouye said in a statement Monday that he still wasn't satisfied with the latest draft's provisions, saying they "utterly fail to protect consumers and preserve an open Internet."

The Senate's latest approach is similar to a version approved earlier this month in the House of Representatives' communications bill. Rather than legislating a detailed "consumer bill of rights," the House addresses the Net neutrality issue by giving the FCC the power to fine violators of its broadband access principles from last summer (click here for PDF). Neither bill would allow the FCC to create new rules--an idea that has also come under attack by Net neutrality fans.

The Senate version isn't immune from new complications. The Senate Judiciary Committee recently indicated it might offer a new legislative proposal that would police violations of Net neutrality under antitrust law. A similar approach offered on the House side was approved initially by the House Judiciary Committee but has stalled since then, failing to gain acceptance of an amendment to the larger House communications bill.

Mittal Says Bid Is Gaining Support (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Mittal Steel Co. is becoming increasingly confident its €23.19 billion ($29.31 billion) hostile offer for Arcelor SA is gaining momentum, pointing to pressure from Arcelor shareholders in favor of the Mittal bid.

DOJ_NMG_0035299

Mittal, the world's largest steel company by output, launched its cash-and-stock bid for Arcelor in January, but Arcelor has thrown up several roadblocks to the transaction, including plans to merge with Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal, led by billionaire Alexey Mordashov, in a move to fend off Mittal's bid.

Arcelor had planned a company buyback of €5 billion that shareholders were scheduled to vote on tomorrow. But Arcelor said yesterday that it was canceling the meeting because of current talks between its management and Mittal Steel. The company said its board may decide later to reconvene the meeting "in case the unsolicited offer by Mittal Steel was not successful."

Lakshmi Mittal, chief executive and chairman of the Rotterdam, Netherlands-based company, said during an interview with Wall Street Journal editors in New York that Arcelor postponed the meeting because Arcelor knew shareholders wouldn't approve the buyback. The decision follows news that French-Polish financier and Arcelor shareholder Romain Zaleski -- who has opposed Arcelor's effort to fend off Mittal -- had picked up an additional 2.4% of Arcelor shares Friday, taking his stake in the company to 7.44%.

"The shareholders want choice to be given to them," he said. "They want to see both bids separate and cast their vote." He said the buyback would have allowed Mr. Mordashov to obtain 38% of Arcelor rather than 32%, and a postponing or withdrawing of the buyback proposal improves his company's chances to acquire Arcelor.

He also said he believed Arcelor board members pressured management to enter into talks with Mittal. "There must be a change," said Mr. Mittal. He noted that when Arcelor recently rejected Mittal's increased bid, the Arcelor board required management to enter discussions with Mittal. "Otherwise, they wouldn't have started dialogue with us," he said.

Many funds that track indexes sold their holdings in Arcelor Friday after the company was temporarily thrown out of the CAC 40 French blue-chip index. The French market regulator has said Arcelor was thrown out because of Mittal's offer for the company and would be allowed back in once the offer period is over.

In Paris yesterday, shares of Arcelor rose 20 European cents, or less than 1%, to €34.70. In Amsterdam, Mittal rose 68 European cents, or 2.8%, to €24.88. Mittal's offer currently is valued at €34.93 a share.

Mr. Zaleski's holding company, Carlo Tassara International SA, said last week that it would have voted against Arcelor's planned share buyback because it is "a transfer of cash from Arcelor to its shareholders, without any value creation." It "would destroy shareholder value, since it would protect Arcelor from any takeover bid," and the Arcelor share price would be affected, the company said.

Mr. Mittal, Mr. Mordashov and Arcelor CEO Guy Dollé are all giving speeches at a steel-industry conference in New York today. During the interview yesterday, Mr. Mittal said he believes shareholders are increasingly moving toward his position as Arcelor executives have maneuvered to keep their company out of Mittal's hands and, in the process, have made remarks that "were very insulting" about Mr. Mittal and his company.

Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate-Service Unit (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

On the heels of an agreement to combine its telecommunications-equipment business with that of Nokia Corp., Siemens AG said it is in talks to sell a majority stake in its enterprise unit, which supplies packages of telecom gear and services to corporate customers.

Siemens didn't identify the potential buyers for the unit, which has about €3.5 billion, or about $4.4 billion, in annual sales. But with the potential sale and its planned joint venture with Finland's Nokia, the German electronics-and-engineering giant is dismantling its telecom unit known as Com, which posted €13.14 billion in sales for fiscal 2005.

Siemens shares rose 6.7% to €66.99 ($84.67) in Frankfurt Monday as the company scales back its exposure to a sector it has struggled to master. American depositary shares of Nokia rose 12 cents to $20.09 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Technology shares boosted European markets on the news. (See related article1.)

As expected, the European technology giants confirmed Monday they will combine their businesses that supply telecom carriers into a 50-50 joint venture. The combination provides increased bulk at a time when more equipment makers are joining forces.

"I definitely think that the consolidation in the industry will mean that smaller players will be in a quite difficult position going forward," said Nokia's chief executive, Olli-Pekka Kallasvuo, in an interview.

The new company, to be known as Nokia Siemens Networks, will be No. 3 in the industry by sales, just behind the combination of Alcatel SA of France and Lucent Technologies Inc. of the U.S., which recently agreed to merge, and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden. The Nokia-Siemens agreement "validates the strategies and the market dynamics underlying our own proposed merger with Alcatel," said Bill Price, a spokesman for Lucent, which expects to complete its tie-up between October and March.

DOJ_NMG_0035300

But the planned joint venture faces large challenges. A separate wave of combinations among telecom carriers means there are fewer contracts for equipment suppliers to win and slimmer margins on those due to competition from lower-priced Asian rivals.

Siemens telecom-equipment operations that supply telecom-network owners include both fixed-line and wireless equipment. By sharing its large fixed-line business with Nokia, which has been focused on wireless equipment, Siemens gives its partner a foot in the market for faster-growing broadband Internet access. It also puts Nokia in position to sell equipment that combines fixed and wireless capability at a time when many phone-service companies are moving to combine their networks.

"The boundaries are blurring here," said Simon Beresford-Wylie, the Nokia executive who will head the joint venture, at a news conference.

Still, the fixed-line business is tougher than wireless and "most of the industry has really struggled to make their respective wire-line businesses earn a decent turn," Nomura analyst Richard Windsor said in a research report. "Nokia's management has little experience of this part of the industry and is now tasked with fixing businesses that have long eluded the best efforts of Siemens."

Siemens doesn't separate the performances of its fixed-line and wireless businesses in its financial reports, but management has acknowledged the fixed-line arm has underperformed its wireless-equipment operations. During the quarter ended March 31, the Com unit as a whole posted revenue of €3.83 billion but a profit of only €27 million.

Nokia and Siemens estimate that by joining forces, they can generate cost savings of €1.5 billion a year by 2010. The combined company, which will have its headquarters in Helsinki, will begin with 60,000 workers but plans to reduce staff by 10% to 15% during the next four years.

Nokia and Siemens hope to close their venture agreement by Jan. 1.

Subsidizing Yesterday's Telephones (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WHEN MONOPOLISTS CALL FOR a "level playing field," beware: Most often, what they really want is to hold back the competition. Such is the case in telephone service, as local phone monopolies are trying to saddle high-tech competitors with fees designed to subsidize the traditional phone network.

At issue is how federal and state regulators will treat voice over Internet protocol, or VOIP, services like Vonage that use high-speed Internet connections, not conventional phone circuits, to transmit calls. So far, these services have been able to escape much of the byzantine regulation that permeates the telecommunications business. In particular, they've avoided the access charges that long-distance and wireless companies have to pay local phone companies when connecting to their customers. These charges not only cover the cost of connecting calls but also subsidize phone lines in rural and other high-cost areas. VOIP also has been exempt from federal and state "universal service" fees, another source of subsidies for traditional phone lines.

Those exemptions are in danger, however. The House has passed a bill that would let the Federal Communications Commission and state regulators impose access charges or universal service fees on VOIP. On Thursday, the Senate Commerce Committee is scheduled to take up a similar proposal. Meanwhile, the FCC is expected to rule this week that VOIP firms must pay federal universal service fees.

Backers of the changes argue that VOIP users should pay to maintain and extend the phone network just like everybody else who places calls. In reality, though, firms like Vonage already are paying indirectly, through contracts with the companies that connect their calls to local phone networks. Besides, the current system is already rife with inexplicable inequalities. Local phone companies demand anywhere from a fraction of a penny to more than 30 cents a minute, depending on the source of the call.

More fundamentally, these proposals don't recognize how radically communications have changed over the last decade. Traditional phone lines aren't being displaced by VOIP services; they're being replaced by high-speed Internet connections, which offer a slew of communications alternatives. VOIP, like e-mail and instant messaging, is just an application.

With the distinction between local and long-distance evaporating, the FCC has been struggling to phase out access charges and overhaul universal service. Rather than dragging VOIP services into the morass of subsidies for phone circuits, lawmakers and regulators should focus on pushing high-speed Internet connections to every U.S. home and business. If that means people using VOIP save a few bucks at the expense of those who use other phone services, so be it. With luck, VOIP will drive up the demand for broadband and hasten its spread, diminishing the need to subsidize plain old telephone lines.

DOJ_NMG_0035301

ENVIRONMENT:

Supreme Court Affirms Wetlands Protections (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland

AP2, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled Monday that the government can block development on hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands, even on land miles away from waterways, as long as regulators prove a significant connection to the waterways.

Chief Justice John Roberts, in his first major environmental case, came up one vote short of dramatically limiting the scope of the landmark Clean Water Act.

At the same time, property rights advocates won a new test for when wetlands can be regulated. Moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said there must be a "significant nexus" between the wetland and a navigable waterway.

Virtually any land in America would be covered under the government's interpretation of the law, Roberts and the court's other three conservatives complained in an opinion.

The court's four liberal members said the conservatives would have opened up sensitive wetlands to polluters.

It was a dramatic conclusion to a pair of property rights cases the justices agreed to review last fall, just days after Roberts joined the court. The Bush administration defended the law and had urged the court to stay out of the case.

The justices were so splintered that there were five separate opinions covering 100 pages.

The key decision was by Kennedy, who agreed with the liberal members that federal regulations can apply to land adjacent to tributaries, including tributaries that are not filled with water all year.

Kennedy, however, joined conservatives in ruling that regulators may have misinterpreted the Clean Water Act when they refused to let two Michigan property owners build a shopping mall and condominiums on wetlands they own.

The justices voided rulings against Keith Carabell and John Rapanos. Carabell wanted to build condos on wetlands on property about a mile from Lake St. Clair in Macomb County, Mich. Rapanos filled in wetlands near Midland, Mich., on property that is about 20 miles from a river that empties into Lake Huron. Rapanos was prosecuted by the federal government and faced a separate civil lawsuit.

Justices sent the cases back to a federal appeals court for further review.

"The court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper, a Pacific Legal Foundation attorney who represented Rapanos.

Environmental groups were relieved the ruling was not sweeping.

"Five justices of the Supreme Court wrote or joined opinions that support broad protection for rivers, streams, and wetlands under the Clean Water Act," said Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel.

Jim Murphy, a lawyer with the National Wildlife Federation, said: "Justice Kennedy saves it from being an absolute disaster."

Justices seemed worried about the impact of the ruling.

Roberts said the result was confusing and that "lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

Justice John Paul Stevens, the leader of the court liberals, said Congress or the Army Corps of Engineers — and not appointed judges — should clarify the issue.

He predicted developers will be confused about whether they must get permits to do work, and federal regulators will struggle to apply a test spelled out by Kennedy to determine whether land has a connection to a navigable waterway.

Kennedy said the wetlands must "significantly affect the chemical, physical, and biological integrity" of nearby navigable waters to come under the Clean Water Act.

"There's going to be a lot of administrative headaches," said Timothy Searchinger, an attorney with Environmental Defense. "Ultimately every water body that's protected today should still be protected."

Justice Antonin Scalia led the conservative bloc, including Roberts, Justice Clarence Thomas and new Justice Samuel Alito.

Scalia said federal regulators contend they have jurisdiction over as much as 300 million acres of swampy lands in America, "including half of Alaska and an area the size of California in the lower 48 states."

"The entire land area of the United States lies in some drainage basin," he wrote.

Scalia had said the Corps of Engineers misinterpreted the term "waters of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0035302

"In applying the definition to `ephemeral streams,' `wet meadows,' storm sewers and culverts, ... man-made drainage ditches, and dry arroyos in the middle of the desert, the Corps has stretched the term `waters of the United States' beyond parody," he wrote.

Stevens said Scalia's opinion "needlessly jeopardizes the quality of our waters." He laid out a history of the 1972 Clean Water Act and said "the importance of wetlands for water quality is hard to overstate."

Scalia, Stevens and Kennedy spent nearly a half hour Monday explaining their votes from the bench.

"Important public interests are served by the Clean Water Act in general and by the protection of wetlands in particular," Kennedy said in his decision. Scalia's opinion, Kennedy said, "seems unduly dismissive of the interests asserted by the United States in these cases."

The case follows a line of difficult environmental cases at the court. In 2002, justices deadlocked 4-4 in a case that asked whether farmers should have more freedom to work in wetlands. In 2001, the court split 5-4 in ruling that the Clean Water Act does not cover isolated ponds and mud flats.

The cases are Rapanos v. United States, 04-1034, Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers, 04-1384.

___

On the Net:

Supreme Court rulings: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/opinions/05slipopinion.html

Court Divided Over Wetlands Protections (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — The Supreme Court on Monday came close to rolling back one of the country's fundamental environmental laws, issuing a fractured decision that, while likely to preserve vigorous federal enforcement of the law, the Clean Water Act, is also likely to lead to new regulatory battles, increased litigation by property owners and a push for new legislation.

With four justices on one side arguing for a sharp restriction in the definition of wetlands that are subject to federal jurisdiction, and four justices on the other arguing for retaining the broad definition that the Army Corps of Engineers has used for decades, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy controlled the outcome in a solitary opinion.

Justice Kennedy said that to come within federal protection under a proper interpretation of the Clean Water Act, a wetland needs to have a "significant nexus" to a body of water that is actually navigable.

He then made clear, in his 30-page opinion, that whether such a relationship existed in any specific case was largely a technical and scientific judgment on which courts should defer to the federal regulators. The four parcels of land at issue in the case, all in Michigan, were likely to meet the definition, he said.

Environmental advocacy groups reacted to the decision, which sends the cases back to an appeals court, as if they had dodged a bullet, which in many respects they had. An opinion for four justices, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, would have stripped protection from many areas that federal regulators have treated as wetlands under the 1972 law.

Justice Scalia's opinion, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and by Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., said the Army Corps of Engineers had stretched its authority under the Clean Water Act "beyond parody" by regulating land that contained nothing but storm sewers, drainage ditches and "dry arroyos in the middle of the desert."

He said the agency had trampled on state authority by exercising a "scope of discretion that would befit a local zoning board."

The only wetlands properly subject to federal jurisdiction, Justice Scalia said, are those "with a continuous surface connection" to actual waterways, "so that there is no clear demarcation between 'waters' and wetlands."

The waters to which the wetlands must be adjacent, he continued, are only those that are "relatively permanent, standing or flowing." These are the only bodies of water that come within the statute's reference to "the waters of the United States," he said.

On the other side was Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. Accusing the Scalia group of "antagonism to environmentalism," Justice Stevens said the Scalia opinion "needlessly jeopardizes the quality of our waters."

Further, Justice Stevens said, the Scalia group "disregards the deference it owes the executive" as well as "its own obligation to interpret laws rather than to make them."

This, of course, was a sly reference to the slogan often heard in connection with conservative nominations to the federal courts. In effect, Justice Stevens was accusing the Scalia group of judicial activism.

DOJ_NMG_0035303

The case, which was argued in February and was the oldest undecided case on the court's docket, was clearly the subject of a major internal battle that undercut any image of good fellowship and unanimity on the Roberts court.

The chief justice himself wrote a brief concurring opinion, noting that "it is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the court." He added: "What is unusual in this instance, perhaps, is how readily the situation could have been avoided."

It was not clear whether he was aiming this comment at Justice Kennedy or at the Army Corps of Engineers, which he said had failed to respond properly to a Supreme Court decision five years ago that rejected federal jurisdiction under the Clean Water Act over isolated ponds visited by migratory birds.

The chief justice noted that the Army Corps had embarked after that decision on issuing new, more limited regulations, but had abandoned the effort. "Rather than refining its view of its authority in light of our decision," he said, "the Corps chose to adhere to its essentially boundless view of the scope of its power." He concluded: "The upshot today is another defeat for the agency."

Given Justice Kennedy's refusal to go along, the extent of that defeat was far from certain. At the least, the Army Corps of Engineers may now feel impelled to embark on a new rulemaking process, leading to a regulation that would incorporate Justice Kennedy's "significant nexus" test.

Under that test, regulators need not show that a wetland is adjacent to, or connected with, a navigable body of water. Rather, it is sufficient to show that it is adjacent to a tributary that itself flows into such waters.

Justice Kennedy said the Corps needed to be more specific in defining the tributaries that count for this purpose. He said it needed to identify those "categories of tributaries" that were "significant enough that wetlands adjacent to them are likely, in the majority of cases, to perform important functions for an aquatic system incorporating navigable waters."

The current standard used by the Corps, he said, was too open-ended in permitting regulation of remote drains, ditches and streams that did not affect "the integrity of an aquatic system."

The impact of this approach will become more clear when the appeals court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, revisits the two decisions that the Supreme Court vacated. With Justice Kennedy agreeing that the appeals court needed to take a fresh look at the cases, there were five votes for a judgment to "vacate and remand."

But as Justice Stevens pointed out, one "unusual feature" of the judgment was that there were not five votes for the standard that the appeals court should apply. The judgments should be reinstated as long as the appeals court finds that Justice Kennedy's test is met, disregarding the test proposed by Justice Scalia, Justice Stevens said.

The appeals court, in two separate cases, ruled against Michigan property owners in their battles with federal regulators. In the lead case, Rapanos v. United States, No. 04-1034, John A. Rapanos, after being informed that three parcels he wanted to develop probably contained regulated wetlands, cleared and filled the land without obtaining a Clean Water Act permit.

The government brought criminal charges against Mr. Rapanos. He was convicted, and the Supreme Court denied review of his case in 2004. The case the court decided on Monday grew out of his appeal in a civil case the government brought against him, in which he faces millions of dollars in fines.

His property is as much as 20 miles away from water that is navigable in the traditional sense. But the parcels are within the drainage systems of Lake Huron and two navigable rivers.

In the second case, Carabell v. United States Army Corps of Engineers, No. 04-1034, the Army Corps denied a permit to a couple who wanted to fill part of their property in order to develop condominiums.

In both cases, the property owners challenged the jurisdiction of the Army Corps both under the Clean Water Act and under the Constitution, arguing that if Congress had conferred such broad jurisdiction in the Clean Water Act, it exceeded its authority under the Commerce Clause.

Justice Scalia's opinion, without directly endorsing the constitutional attack, said the agency's interpretation of its authority "stretches the outer limits of Congress's commerce power." Justice Kennedy, however, said that wetlands as defined by his test "raise no serious constitutional or federalism difficulty."

However the case unfolds from here, it was plain that something went awry in the court's handling of its most high-profile environmental case in years.

Given the structure of the principal opinions, including their relative length and tone, it is possible that Justice Stevens had initially controlled the case and, on the assumption that he had five votes on his side, had assigned it to Justice Kennedy, who then strayed somewhat from the more categorical view of the Stevens four. Although he speaks only for himself, his opinion reads like a majority opinion, while Justice Scalia's opinion reads like a dissent.

Supreme Court Splits Over Protecting Wetlands (CSM)

By Warren Richey

DOJ_NMG_0035304

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

The federal government does not have the power to reach far upstream to protect every ditch and wetland in a watershed.

In a ruling restricting federal authority to protect the environment, the US Supreme Court on Monday said the reach of federal regulators under the Clean Water Act is limited. But the high court's nine justices were unable to reach majority agreement about how and where to draw those limits.

The result is a decision best described as 4-1-4. Four justices agreed that the law called for a restrictive view of the scope of federal jurisdiction to reach remote wetlands. Four other justices concluded that the statute permits the government to take upstream actions to prevent downstream degradation of federal water resources.

At dead center of the court sits Justice Anthony Kennedy, who provided the critical fifth vote on the restrictive side of the case. That action sends the two consolidated cases back to the lower courts where judges must divine a coherent approach to federal jurisdiction from the high court's splintered decision.

"It is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act," writes Chief Justice John Roberts in a concurrence on the restrictive side of the case. "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

The decision is a setback for environmentalists seeking to push tough federal regulations to the broadest possible swath of threatened wetlands.

"It is a defeat, absolutely," says Jim Murphy, wetlands counsel at the National Wildlife Federation. "It really places practical burdens on regulation and it also makes it more difficult for holistic watershed approaches to be used to really protect all the small waters that collectively have huge water quality implications." Partial victory for landowners

The decision marks a partial victory for developers and other landowners who believe state and local government - not federal bureaucrats - should decide how local land is developed.

The opinion relates to two cases from Michigan that were consolidated for oral argument on Feb. 21. The cases are Carabell v. US Army Corps of Engineers, and Rapanos v. United States.

In both cases, federal regulators refused to permit the development projects to go forward on lands they said were restricted wetlands. The would-be developers challenged the federal government's assertion of authority over their land.

The government claimed jurisdiction under the Clean Water Act. Lawyers for the developers argued that the wording of the Clean Water Act only extends federal jurisdiction to "navigable waters" used in interstate trade. The Supreme Court has since extended that jurisdiction to adjacent wetlands, but the high court has never identified the outer boundary of federal authority under the Clean Water Act.

It also failed to do so in Monday's decision.

Specifically at issue in the Rapanos case was whether rainwater runoff occasionally flowing off the proposed development site was enough of a connection to federal navigable waters to trigger US government control over the development site.

In the Carabell case, the proposed development site was behind a berm. Thus, there was no runoff from the site.

Writing for the plurality, Justice Antonin Scalia said the Clean Water Act does not extend jurisdiction to channels through which water flows intermittently or channels that provide drainage for rainfall. "The [US Army Corps of Engineers'] expansive interpretation of "the waters of the United States" is ... not based on a permissible construction of the statute," Justice Scalia writes.

Although he concurred in Scalia's opinion, Justice Kennedy said the critical issue to him is whether the land has a "significant nexus" to waters that are or were navigable - thus falling within federal jurisdiction.

Kennedy says Scalia's plurality opinion is "inconsistent with the [Clean Water Act's] text, structure, and purpose."

"Justice Scalia's opinion has language that would radically restrict the act's jurisdiction, but it appears that Justice Kennedy has a more expansive read on the term 'significant nexus,' " says Mr. Murphy of the National Wildlife Federation. Carabells' condo plan ran into opposition

The Carabell case involves an effort to build a condominium project on a 19-acre site classified as a wetland. State officials were reluctant to allow the developers, June and Keith Carabell and Frances and Harvey Gordenker, to build on one of the last remaining pieces of wooded property in the area.

After the developers agreed to reduce the size of the project and set aside nearly four acres as a wetlands-water retention area, state environmental officials approved the plan.

Federal officials disagreed. They moved to block the project, arguing that the land fell within federal jurisdiction and could not be developed without a Clean Water Act permit. They refused to issue a permit. The developers sued and lost at both the trial court and appeals court levels.

DOJ_NMG_0035305

In their appeal to the Supreme Court, lawyers for developers argued that there is no flow of water from their tract. Water is retained on the property in part because of a man-made berm between the tract and a drainage ditch. Since there is no flow to a tributary of a "navigable water," there is no federal jurisdiction, the developers' lawyers say.

The Rapanos case involves efforts by developers John and Judith Rapanos to build on three tracts in Michigan. Like the Carabells, they challenged the assertion of federal authority over their land. The Environmental Protection Agency claims Clean Water Act jurisdiction because rainwater runoff from each of the three properties drains into a tributary that leads to "navigable waters." Lawyers for Rapanos argued there must be a stronger connection than mere runoff from a property to trigger federal authority. Court has confronted the issue twice before

The Supreme Court has addressed similar issues twice in the past 20 years. In 1985, the court ruled 9-0 that the act's jurisdiction extends to wetlands that are adjacent to navigable waters. But the high court added in a footnote that the justices were not expressing an opinion about whether the jurisdiction extends to wetlands that are "not adjacent to bodies of open water."

The second case was decided in 2001.

In that case, the court ruled that the act does not cover an abandoned sand and gravel pit that had filled with water. The Corps of Engineers had claimed authority over the site by saying that migratory birds used the pond as habitat. The justices ruled 5-4 that the Corps was claiming powers not granted by Congress by attempting to extend its jurisdiction to ponds with no connection to navigable waters.

Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A splintered Supreme Court rolled back coverage of the Clean Water Act, ruling federal regulators had gone too far in protecting wetlands lying more than 10 miles from navigable waters.

No majority of justices could agree on how to define the waters protected by the act, muddying the legal landscape for lower courts that will have to apply the ruling. The court's lineup in the case illustrated the rising role of Justice Anthony Kennedy as a swing vote on major issues.

Writing for a plurality of four conservatives, Justice Antonin Scalia castigated federal regulators as "enlightened despots" who over the law's three decades had ranged far afield of their authority. Four liberal-leaning dissenters, meanwhile, accused the majority of elevating its disdain for environmental regulation over long-standing practices accepted by Congress, lower courts and the majority of states.

But the pivotal vote was that of Justice Kennedy, whose solo concurrence provided the fifth vote ordering a lower court to reconsider the case. "While the plurality reads nonexistent requirements into the act, the dissent reads a central requirement out," Justice Kennedy wrote.

Justice Kennedy could also be the deciding vote in a handful of potentially significant cases that remain before the court's adjournment at month's end. Those cases include President Bush's plan to prosecute suspected foreign terrorists in military courts that limit defendants' rights, and a challenge to the partisan remapping of U. S. House districts in Texas orchestrated by Republican former Rep. Tom DeLay.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired this year, often served as a swing vote on issues such as abortion and affirmative action, though not on regulatory matters.

The Clean Water decision also suggests that the early harmony of Chief Justice John Roberts's Court -- which has been noted for unanimous decisions and reluctance to issue multiple concurring opinions -- may be ebbing as the justices wrestle over deeply held views. At the court's session yesterday, not only did Justice Scalia read his plurality opinion, but Justice Kennedy and Justice John Paul Stevens took the unusual step of reading their own concurring and dissenting opinions.

Yesterday's ruling marked the second time in a week that Justice Kennedy cast the deciding vote in an ideologically charged case. Thursday, he joined conservatives in weakening prohibitions against no-knock police searches, but wrote separately to otherwise preserve the general practice of excluding evidence police seize illegally.

Yesterday, Justice Kennedy agreed that lower courts had used the wrong standard by deferring to the Army Corps of Engineers' authority over wetlands. But rather than follow the dictionary definition of waterway proposed by Justice Scalia, Justice Kennedy wrote that lower courts should examine whether the water or wetland possesses a "significant nexus to waters that are or were navigable in fact or that could reasonably be so made."

Still, the plurality and Justice Kennedy agreed that the government had exceeded its power by defining almost any place where water might be found as qualifying for protection as "waters of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0035306

"The corps has stretched the term ... beyond parody," Justice Scalia wrote, encompassing "storm drains, roadside ditches, ripples of sand in the desert that may contain water once a year, and lands that are covered by floodwaters once every 100 years."

While the act covered wetlands adjacent to interstate waterways, it couldn't be seen as protecting those that lie wholly within a single state, far from interstate channels, Justice Scalia wrote. To qualify for regulation, they must contain "a relatively permanent body of water connected to traditional interstate navigable waters" and feature "a continuous surface connection with that water, making it difficult to determine where the 'water' ends and the 'wetland' begins," he wrote, joined by Justice Clarence Thomas and the court's two new Bush appointees, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

In dissent, Justice Stevens said that "the two controlling opinions propose two very different tests for the courts below to follow" and suggested they should uphold federal regulations that pass either one. Participants in the property-rights wars agreed that the court had clarified little. "It leaves the landowner totally perplexed," said Timothy Bishop, an attorney for the American Farm Bureau Federation, which filed a friend of the court brief opposing the government. The "real uncertainty" means that farmers will play it safe and continue to seek federal permits, he said.

Joan Mulhern, an attorney with the environmental advocacy group Earthjustice, said that nearly 60% of the nation's streams could be considered "intermittent" and thus likely to invite court disputes over their coverage by the water act.

The justices ordered a lower court to reconsider decisions barring the backfilling of wetlands on property belonging to two landowners in Michigan. Justice Scalia made clear he had little doubt that the principal property in dispute, a 54-acre parcel belonging to developer John Rapanos, little resembled "waters of the United States." Reluctant to call the disputed area a wetland, Justice Scalia described it as "land with sometimes-saturated soil conditions" lying "11 to 20 miles away" from "the nearest body of navigable water."

Justice Kennedy complained that "the plurality's overall tone and approach ... seems unduly dismissive" of the government's effort to protect the environment. He took issue with the Scalia plurality limiting the act to "relatively permanent, standing or flowing bodies of water" such as oceans, rivers and lakes. "The Los Angeles River, for instance, ordinarily carries a trickle of water and often looks more like a dry roadway than a river," Justice Kennedy, a Californian, wrote. "Yet it periodically releases water-volumes so powerful and destructive that it has been encased in concrete and steel over a length of some 50 miles."

But Justice Kennedy said the dissenters, too, had misread the act, failing to limit it to "navigable" waters, or those wetlands that "significantly affect the chemical, physical and biological integrity of other covered waters more readily understood as 'navigable.'"

Justices Rein In Clean Water Act (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that new limits could be placed on the federal government's power to enforce the 34-year-old Clean Water Act, but a set of opinions handed down by the justices did little to define what those limits might be.

The splintered decision was the clearest sign yet that the court's long-standing ideological divisions have not disappeared with the addition of two conservative justices. It also underscored that, perhaps more than ever, forming a majority in significant cases depends on winning the vote of a single justice -- moderate conservative Anthony M. Kennedy.

In yesterday's ruling, a five-justice majority agreed that the Army Corps of Engineers, the lead federal agency on wetlands regulation, exceeded its authority when it denied two Michigan developers permits to build on wetlands. The court said the Corps had gone beyond the Clean Water Act by making landowners obtain permits to dump rocks and dirt not only in marshes directly next to lakes and rivers but also in areas linked to larger bodies of water only through a network of ditches and drains.

But there was no clear majority as to where the Corps should have drawn the line, with a four-justice plurality made up of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. arguing for an across-the-board reduction in the Corps' regulatory role but Kennedy rejecting that view and calling for a case-by-case approach.

The net effect of the most important Clean Water Act case to reach the court in recent years was thus neither the outright rollback of federal wetlands regulation that property rights advocates have long sought nor the reaffirmation of the Clean Water Act that environmental organizations had desired.

Instead, unless Congress amends the law or federal regulators change their rules, the likely outcome is more litigation in lower courts, with property owners, U.S. agencies and federal judges trying to figure out how to satisfy the standards sketched in Kennedy's solo opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0035307

"The practical effect is that some bright-line rules that have been applied for decades haven't been thrown out . . . but have had a significant cloud set over them by Justice Kennedy," said Richard J. Lazarus, a professor of environmental law at Georgetown University.

The key issue in the twin cases decided yesterday, Rapanos v. U.S. , No. 04-1034, and Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers , No. 04-1384, was the meaning of a single phrase in the Clean Water Act.

The landmark 1972 environmental legislation gave federal regulators the power to control the discharge of pollutants into "navigable waters." On the theory that what gets dumped upstream eventually winds up downstream, the government has interpreted that term to include not only large lakes and rivers but also their smaller tributaries, including some ditches or stream beds that are dry for all or most of the year and wetlands near those tributaries.

The Bush administration, backed by environmental organizations and more than 30 state governments, told the court that any narrower interpretation would cripple the Clean Water Act.

But property owners, backed by home builders, developers, farmers, ranchers and some water districts from the arid West, say that the Army Corps' view has federalized every drop of water in the country, putting Washington in charge of development miles away from any recognizably navigable waters.

The Michigan properties at issue included the Rapanos family's three parcels, of which one is close to the Pine River, a tributary of Lake Huron, and two are wetlands that drain into creeks that drain into two other rivers that flow into navigable waters. June Carabell's 19 acres are about a mile from Lake St. Clair but are connected to it by a network of man-made ditches.

Two recent Supreme Court rulings pointed in different directions. In 1985, the court ruled that the federal government could regulate wetlands "adjacent" to navigable waters. But in 2001 it ruled that the federal government could not control waste dumping in isolated water-filled depressions in Illinois. Though the Corps said it had jurisdiction over the ponds because migratory birds flocked there, the court ruled they lacked a "significant nexus" to navigable waters.

In an opinion for the four-justice plurality yesterday, Scalia wrote of "the immense expansion of federal regulation of land use that has occurred under the Clean Water Act" and argued that the only way to cut back on it was to restore a common-sense definition of navigable waters as "relatively permanent standing or flowing bodies of water."

But Kennedy disagreed. Borrowing from the court's 2001 opinion, he suggested that the proper definition could include temporary channels of water, as long as they had a "significant nexus" to larger bodies. They must "significantly affect the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of other covered waters more readily understood as 'navigable,' " he wrote. Those wetlands with only a "speculative or insubstantial" connection would not qualify, Kennedy noted.

Both sides in the debate rushed to put the most favorable interpretation on Kennedy's opinion.

M. Reed Hopper, principal attorney for the Pacific Legal Foundation, who represented the Michigan property owners in the case, said it was a "great win for the regulated public" because it "specifically rejected the idea that the Army Corps . . . could regulate no matter how insignificant" the connection to navigable waters.

But Timothy Searchinger, a senior attorney with Environmental Defense, said in a prepared statement: "Justice Kennedy agrees that wetlands in the Upper Midwest can protect against vast water quality problems in the Gulf of Mexico. What his opinion seeks is that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers set forth that proof. The proof is there, and when it is presented, I am confident that the reach of the Clean Water Act will change very little."

Lazarus likened the splintered decision to the 1978 Bakke case, in which four justices voted to uphold a minority admissions quota at a California medical school, four voted to strike it down, and a ninth justice, Lewis F. Powell Jr., voted to strike it down but suggested an alternative legal basis, diversity, for other race-conscious admissions policies.

The status of Powell's opinion was debated over the next 25 years, until a majority of the Supreme Court finally embraced it in a 2003 case.

That assessment of yesterday's result seemed to be shared by some members of the court.

In a brief concurring opinion, Roberts alluded to the affirmative-action cases and noted that it was "unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act." He added: "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

And Justice John Paul Stevens, in a dissenting opinion joined by Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, argued that Kennedy's approach will not cut back on the scope of the Clean Water Act "in the long run." But, in the meantime, it "will have the effect of creating additional work for all concerned parties," Stevens wrote.

Stevens argued that the court should have accepted the Army Corps of Engineers' view of its own authority, as both Congress and the executive branch had acquiesced to it for decades.

Supreme Court Justices Show Support For Wetlands Protection (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0035308

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court today upheld the broad power of federal environmental regulators to protect most wetlands from development, even in areas that are dry much of the year.

The decision by five justices dashed the hopes of private property advocates who believed that the more conservative court was ready to sharply cut back the reach of the Clean Water Act.

At issue was an estimated 300 million acres of sometimes swampy ground that includes half of Alaska and an area as large in California. Since the 1970s, the Army Corps of Engineers has said the owners of this land may not fill it or drain it without a permit.

Last year, the court voted to take up a property rights challenge to the broad reach of federal authority. It was brought on behalf of John Rapanos, a Michigan developer who was fined heavily after he had filled in wetlands on three farm fields that were about 20 miles from Lake Huron. After a heavy rain, water from these fields flowed into a drainage ditch, and from there to a tiny stream.

Rapanos acknowledged that federal authorities could prevent the pollution of "navigable" rivers, bays and lakes, but he maintained that they could not exercise control over inland wetlands like those on his fields.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., both new to the court in the past year, agreed with Rapanos and joined an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia. They argued that only wetlands that were connected to steadily flowing streams came under federal protection, an opinion that Justice Clarence Thomas also accepted.

This opinion would have stripped away federal protection from most wetlands that are well inland and nearly all those in the West because their streambeds are dry most of the year.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a native of Sacramento, balked and wrote a separate opinion that essentially upheld the broad reach of the law. He cited the Los Angeles River and other streams in the West that send "torrents thundering" downstream, but only for short periods of the year.

Kennedy said Scalia's opinion was "unduly dismissive" of the importance of wetlands and was "inconsistent with the text, structure and purpose" of the Clean Water Act. This measure was passed a few years after an oil slick on the Cuyahoga River in Cleveland caught fire in 1969, an embarrassment that focused the nation's attention on polluted water.

Afterward, Congress sought to clean up the "waters of the United States" by giving federal regulators broad authority to stop pollution at its source. A few years later, the Army Corps of Engineers said wetlands helped filter pollution from water and lessen the impact of flooding.

Kennedy said federal authority did not extend to isolated wetlands whose filling would have no effect on "downstream water quality." However, if environmental regulators could show that dredging or filling a wetland could "significantly affect" the waters downstream, they could protect it from development.

Until today, federal regulators — including the Bush administration — said wetlands were under federal jurisdiction if a single drop of water could flow from them to the sea. Lower federal courts for Michigan upheld the government's fine of Rapanos based on that theory.

Kennedy voted with his conservative colleagues to overturn the trial court's initial ruling and give the court an opportunity to reconsider the issue. As guidance, he also said there appeared to be evidence that filling the fields on Rapanos' land had an effect on downstream waters.

He described his view of the law as being closer to the interpretation of the court's four liberals — who said they would have upheld without question the broad reach of the Clean Water Act — than that of the four conservatives.

The court's 4-1-4 split left activists on both sides of the issue a bit unsure about the future.

Several environmentalists expressed relief. "Today, five justices of the Supreme Court wrote or joined opinions that support broad protection of rivers, streams and wetlands," said Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel.

The National Resources Defense Council said it was pleased the court "rejected an attempt by the court's conservative wing to dramatically roll back" a key environmental measure. But it also said the outcome "muddies the water" because it will force more legal battles over which wetlands are protected.

The Pacific Legal Foundation, which represented Rapanos, said it was pleased the court had "rejected unlimited federal control" of wetlands.

"It is not the role of the federal government to micromanage every pond, puddle and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper, a lawyer for the foundation.

Supreme Court Splits Sharply On Wetlands Protections (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0035309

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 20, 2006

On a day that foreshadowed politically charged battles ahead, the Supreme Court on Monday divided sharply on the scope of the Clean Water Act while also agreeing to widen its review of the federal partial-birth abortion ban next fall.

In the long-awaited Clean Water Act cases Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States, Justice Antonin Scalia won three other votes for a narrow interpretation of the act's scope, while Justice Anthony Kennedy concurred in the judgment but offered his own more sweeping interpretation -- guaranteeing continued litigation.

In Scalia's view, the law requiring permits to fill "navigable waters" covers only "relatively permanent" streams, rivers, and lakes -- not intermittent or merely "hydrologically connected" waters. However, Kennedy's concurrence sketched out a much broader standard, one that would apply the law's permit requirement to those seeking to fill any waters and wetlands with a "significant nexus" to navigable waters.

Environmental groups seized on Kennedy's concurrence as the controlling opinion and expressed relief that their fears of a substantial loss of Clean Water Act jurisdiction had not come to pass.

"The ultimate effect of the Supreme Court's decision on the Clean Water Act is to leave the Act's protection of wetlands and other water bodies in place, but subject to proof that they do in fact have a 'substantial nexus' to downstream water quality," said Tim Searchinger, lawyer with the group Environmental Defense, in a statement. "The decision kicks the ball down the road and will create some major administrative headaches, but in the end, the protection of this country's water bodies should change little."

In cases where no opinion garners five votes, the opinion that concurs with the judgment on the narrowest grounds is usually regarded as the most important. The most famous example of this rule is the 1978 landmark affirmative action case Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, in which a concurrence by Justice Lewis Powell Jr. for himself alone was viewed as the controlling opinion in the case.

"Environmental law now has its own Bakke," said Georgetown University Law Center professor Richard Lazarus, who said the Kennedy concurrence controls the case because it rejects Scalia's more sweeping reinterpretation of the law.

The Clean Water Act cases were seen as the first test of the environmental views of the Court's new justices, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. Both joined Scalia's plurality opinion.

Spectators in the Court chamber on Monday witnessed the rare sight of Scalia criticizing, from the bench, not only the dissent by Justice John Paul Stevens but also Kennedy's concurrence for "ignoring the text" of the Clean Water Act. Kennedy and Stevens also summarized their writings from the bench. It is rare for a concurring justice to read from his or her opinion.

Also on view was a dispirited liberal wing of the Court. Though Stevens, 86, read from his dissent vigorously, the justices who joined him -- Stephen Breyer, David Souter, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- appeared gloomy and fatigued.

In the Clean Water Act cases, the Court seemed aware that its resolution of the case would satisfy almost no one. Roberts lamented that because no opinion commanded a majority of the justices, "lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

Dissenting Justice Stevens said the Scalia opinion "disregards the fundamental significance of the Clean Water Act" and trivializes its protection of wetlands adjacent to waterways.

The cases before the Court involved two Michigan developers thwarted in their plans by environmental regulations. John Rapanos has been trying for nearly 20 years to build a shopping center near Midland, Mich. His sites were deemed to be wetlands, but Rapanos -- arguing that the nearest navigable water is 20 miles away -- began construction without permits. Similarly, June Carabell sought to build condominiums on forested wetlands in Macomb County, Mich. She applied for a fill permit, but the Army Corps of Engineers turned her down.

The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against both developers and in favor of federal jurisdiction over the projects. The administration argued for the broader view of jurisdiction.

The effect of Monday's ruling is to return both cases to the 6th Circuit for review in light of the high court ruling. Scalia said it would be up to the lower courts to decide if the wetlands involved fit his definition of "possessing a continuous surface connection" with navigable waters. Kennedy said the lower court should use his "significant nexus" standard. And Stevens -- noting that under his four-justice dissent, Army Corps of Engineers jurisdiction was guaranteed no matter which standard is used -- said that the earlier circuit court rulings should be reinstated if either Scalia's or Kennedy's test is met.

Lawyers opposed to the broad interpretation of the law were also heartened by the decision. "The Court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle, and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper of the Pacific Legal Foundation, which represented Rapanos. "We are encouraged by this decision and believe it represents a good first step toward common sense regulation."

DOJ_NMG_0035310

Also Monday, over the objection of the Solicitor General's Office, the Court granted review in a second case that tests the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. The Court has already docketed Gonzales v. Carhart, a Nebraska challenge to the same law based on the law's omission of a "health exception" that allows the controversial procedure if needed to preserve the health of the mother.

The new case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood of America, stemmed from a 9th Circuit ruling that struck down the law on the additional ground that it was unconstitutionally vague.

In briefs filed with the Court, the administration appealed the 9th Circuit ruling but urged it to hold the case in abeyance pending a decision in the Nebraska case. The Court rejected the advice. The two cases are likely to be argued in tandem this fall, but no date has been set.

The Court on Monday also issued two rulings that followed up on its landmark 2004 ruling in Crawford v. Washington, which strengthened the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause. That clause guarantees the right of criminal defendants to be confronted at trial with the witnesses against them. In Crawford, the Court barred the use in criminal trials of testimonial statements made by witnesses who did not appear at trial.

In companion cases Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, the Court said the rule does not exclude use of the tape of a 911 call that was made to seek police help in a domestic-violence emergency. Statements made in such a call are not testimonial, said Scalia for an 8-1 majority, and therefore do not violate the Confrontation Clause. The Court also found, however, that an after-the-fact affidavit given by a woman to police in a separate domestic-violence case was a testimonial statement and therefore could not be introduced as evidence at trial in lieu of the witness.

Clean Water Act Reach Limited: U.S. Supreme Court Overview (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, June 20, 2006

June 19 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court limited the reach of the Clean Water Act, saying it applies only to wetlands with a close connection to a river, lake or some other major waterway.

The justices, voting 5-4, ordered a new round of hearings for two sets of Michigan landowners whose efforts to build on their property have been stymied by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. The majority was divided in its reasoning, with Justice Anthony Kennedy refusing to join four other justices in putting even more restraints on the federal regulators.

Kennedy's separate opinion now becomes the controlling law. He established a new test, saying the Corps can regulate only wetlands that have a ``significant nexus'' to a major waterway. He also said that in both cases before the justices, the Corps had at least some evidence of that type of connection.

Kennedy's reasoning drew criticism from both ends of the court. Justice Antonin Scalia called Kennedy's test ``opaque'' and said it ``tips a wink at the agency, inviting it to try its same expansive reading again.''

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Samuel Alito and Clarence Thomas joined Scalia's opinion. The case marked the first environmental test for the court's newest justices, Roberts and Alito.

Stevens Dissent

Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the four dissenters, said Kennedy's test will create new uncertainty and additional work for regulators and landowners. He also said the new test ``will probably not do much to diminish the number of wetlands covered by the act in the long run.''

Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter also dissented.

The ruling is a partial setback for environmentalists and the Bush administration, which argued in favor of broad federal power to restrict development.

Kennedy's test has ``never been applied or used anywhere,'' said Joan Mulhern, senior legislative counsel at Earthjustice, an environmental group based in Oakland, California. ``I'd hesitate to say I agree with it or to say I don't agree with it because I'm not sure what it means.''

Groups backing the landowners included homebuilders Pulte Homes Inc. and Centex Corp. and trade associations representing the real-estate, oil and farming industries.

``The court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle and ditch in our country,'' said Reed Hopper, a Sacramento, California, lawyer who represented landowner John Rapanos in one of the cases. ``We are encouraged by this decision and believe it represents a good first step toward common sense regulation.''

Commerce Clause

In focusing on the meaning of the Clean Water Act, the court didn't decide a more far-reaching question presented by the case -- whether Congress has power to regulate those wetlands under the Constitution's Commerce Clause.

DOJ_NMG_0035311

Separately, the court today ruled that crime victims' statements to police 911 operators about an ``ongoing emergency'' can later be used as trial evidence when the victim isn't available for cross-examination.

The court also:

-- Asked the Bush administration for advice on a securities- industry bid to block antitrust lawsuits that accuse investment banks of rigging initial public offerings.

-- Agreed to consider a bid by Michigan to regulate Wachovia Corp.'s mortgage-lending business in a case that may open banks to new oversight across the country.

-- Broadened its review of a federal law banning what opponents call ``partial-birth abortion'' by adding a California case to its 2006-07 argument schedule. The justices were already set to hear arguments from a group led by a Nebraska doctor.

Juvenile Murderers

-- Refused to reconsider its year-old decision barring executions of murderers who were under 18 at the time of the crime, turning away an appeal by Alabama's attorney general.

-- Refused to question Swedish Match AB's right to sell cigars in the U.S. under the Cohiba brand name, turning away an appeal by a company owned by the Cuban government.

-- Rejected a challenge by five states to part of the funding mechanism for the new Medicare prescription-drug program.

The two wetlands disputes raised slightly different questions. Rapanos was accused of destroying wetlands, without a permit, on three central Michigan sites he hoped to develop. Regulators are seeking as much as $13 million in fines and restoration of the site.

Nearest Tributary

The Cincinnati-based 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that the Clean Water Act covered Rapanos's property because the land had a hydrological connection to navigable waterways, ultimately draining into either the Tittabawassee River or Lake Huron. Rapanos says his land is far away from the nearest tributary -- 20 miles in the case of one site.

In the second case, a group led by accountant Keith Carabell wants to build a condominium complex on land near Detroit. The 6th Circuit said the property was an ``adjacent wetland,'' covered under the Clean Water Act, because only a man-made barrier separated the land from tributaries of Lake Huron and Lake Erie.

Carabell says no hydrological connection, either on the surface or underground, exists between his land and any tributary. The Bush administration disputes that contention.

The court scaled back the clean-water law in 2001, when it struck down a Corps of Engineers rule designed to protect migratory bird habitats on local ponds. The justices in that case said the rule lacked a ``significant nexus'' to the ``navigable waterways'' that are covered under the Clean Water Act.

Environmental Consequences

Kennedy today said the ``significant nexus'' phrase provides the key to applying the Clean Water Act, even though that language doesn't appear in the statute itself.

In the Rapanos case, Kennedy pointed to expert testimony about the environmental consequences of developing the land and a trial judge's finding of a surface connection to tributaries of navigable waterways. He said that type of evidence would help the Corps make its case, ``particularly if supplemented by further evidence about the significance of the tributaries.''

At the same time, Kennedy said the appeals court went too far in permitting regulation any time a hydrological connection exists. ``Absent some measure of the significance of the connection for downstream water quality, this standard was too uncertain,'' he wrote.

In the Carabell case, Kennedy said the lower courts should assess ``the quality and regularity of flow in the adjacent tributaries.''

Scalia would have required a continuous surface connection to a river, lake or other permanent body of water, saying that was the most plausible reading of the Clean Water Act's language. He said Kennedy ``has devised his new statute all on his own.''

Stevens would have upheld the 6th Circuit's ruling, saying the Corps ``has reasonably interpreted its jurisdiction to cover non-isolated wetlands.''

The cases are Rapanos v. U.S., 04-1034, and Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers, 04-1384.

Clean Water At Risk (NYT)

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The United States Supreme Court issued a decision on wetlands yesterday whose main virtue is that it could have been much worse. It sided with two developers who want to build on endangered wetlands, but the court's conservatives could not muster the fifth vote they needed for a very restricted view of the Clean Water Act. Still, the signs are ominous. Right now, Justice Anthony Kennedy, the swing vote in the case, is all that appears to stand in the way of gutting critical environmental protections.

DOJ_NMG_0035312

The court ruled on a case arising out of Michigan, where developers filled in wetlands without a permit. The issue is whether these particular wetlands — which are not directly adjacent to navigable waters, but are adjacent to tributaries to those waters — are protected by the Clean Water Act. The Army Corps of Engineers, the administrative body charged by Congress with making these decisions, ruled that they are.

Four justices — including Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, the two newest appointees — wanted to apply a dangerously difficult, and largely invented, test for what constitutes a wetland. The court's four most liberal members voted, rightly, to uphold the Army Corps' decision. Justice Kennedy sided with the conservatives on overturning the corps, but set out his own standard for which waters are covered. His test is a moderate one, and there is every reason to believe the corps will meet it when this case continues on remand.

Congress, though, should clear up any confusion by passing the Clean Water Authority Restoration Act. By doing so, it will reiterate that it wants extremely broad protection for the nation's waterways, and that it, not the judiciary, should decide which ones are protected.

For all the talk of liberal judicial activists, it was Justice Antonin Scalia and his fellow conservatives who voted to substitute their own preferences for a decision made by the executive branch, in the form of the Army Corps, interpreting a statute passed by Congress. It was the liberals who were "judicially modest," to use a favorite phrase of Chief Justice Roberts, deferring to the elected branches.

Justice Kennedy's role is especially notable. He wrote a careful opinion, much in the tradition of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, that refused to go along with any large-scale assault on ecologically fragile lands. His opinion suggests that in this sharply divided court, at least in environmental law, the precarious center can hold.

Parsing The Waters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court tiptoed up to the edge of a landmark property-rights ruling yesterday, but in the end it merely dipped a toe in the water without deciding whether to jump in or not.

The vote in the case left little room for doubt about the reason for the Court's indecision -- his name is Justice Anthony Kennedy. The Court split, in effect, 4-1-4 in Rapanos v. U.S., which covered two separate cases concerning federal jurisdiction over "wetlands" under the Clean Water Act. Mr. Rapanos had filled a wetland that was essentially a drainage ditch without a permit back in 1989. Five years later, the government filed suit against him. Mr. Rapanos lost, and that decision was upheld by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Supreme Court vacated that decision Monday and sent it back to the lower courts to try again. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for four of the Justices, clearly would have gone farther in reining in the expansive interpretations of the Clean Water Act that have taken hold over the last three decades. Thanks to the Army Corps of Engineers, the definition of "navigable waters" can now include puddles and drainage ditches and has turned the law-abiding likes of Mr. Rapanos into wetlands desperadoes.

In his own separate opinion, Justice Kennedy agreed to vacate the ruling but refused to go as far as the rest of the majority. The result is that the final outcome in both the Rapanos case and Carabell v. U.S., another drainage ditch fiasco also decided yesterday, remains in doubt. On remand, the lower courts could modify their reasoning but uphold their decisions. As Justice Scalia noted in his opinion, Justice Kennedy seemed to "tip a wink" at the government in his concurrence, "inviting it to try its same expansive reading again" as long as it cites Justice Kennedy's logic.

Chief Justice John Roberts -- who, with Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito, joined with Justice Scalia's opinion -- also wrote a concurrence in which he lamented that it was "unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act." As a result, he warned, "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

In other words, welcome to the Kennedy Court. It didn't take a brilliant legal mind to see that, after the confirmations of Justices Alito and Roberts, the protean Justice Kennedy would seek to become the "swing" vote. The Rapanos case illustrates this in spades, with Justice Kennedy trying to define a middle ground between the liberal and conservative minorities on the court.

The result is an opinion that no one else saw fit to join, and yet could well prove controlling in future wetlands cases -- assuming anyone can determine just what Justice Kennedy was trying to say. His concurrence is a Kennedy classic, with a hifalutin-sounding "significant nexus" test for lower courts to apply and no shortage of ersatz objectivity and even-handedness.

DOJ_NMG_0035313

As Justice Scalia tartly observed, at least the four liberal Justices defer to the Army Corps of Engineers. Justice Kennedy's opinion essentially rewrites the Clean Water Act, substituting his inventive afflatus for the Congress and the Corps and the rest of the bench -- a kind of activist trifecta.

Chief Justice Roberts also needled Justice Kennedy by pointing out that the Court's confused message here "is certainly not unprecedented," citing specifically the 2003 Grutter v. Bollinger decision. That was a racial quotas muddle issued by the Court's previous great muddler, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but in which Mr. Kennedy dissented. The Chief Justice also lamented "how readily the situation could have been avoided" -- i.e., had Justice Kennedy not decided to play philosopher king.

Some court-watchers predicted that Justices Roberts and Alito would help draw Anthony Kennedy to the right, lest he feel isolated by the high-powered intellects of the Court's four conservatives. The good news from yesterday's ruling is that the Court's two newest members came down solidly on the side of property rights in their first big environmentalism case. The bad news is that Justice Kennedy lacked the courage of their convictions.

Panel Reaches Deal On Drilling Off U.S. Coasts (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — The chairman of the House resources committee said Monday that the committee had reached bipartisan agreement on a measure that would open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas exploration.

Representative Richard W. Pombo of California, the chairman, said the agreement was a compromise that would give states the option to drill in waters that the federal government had kept off limits to energy exploration for decades. At the same time, lawmakers also tried to satisfy lawmakers from Florida and other states who have opposed any drilling within 100 miles of their coastlines.

The agreement, scheduled for a committee vote on Wednesday, would replace a longstanding executive order barring most drilling on the shelf with legislation that would bar drilling in the first 50 miles of coastal waters unless states chose to opt out by vote of their Legislature and the approval of their governor.

In areas between 50 and 100 miles offshore, states would have one year after the legislation is enacted to prohibit drilling for natural gas and three years to prohibit drilling for oil.

The bill would also give the secretary of the Interior Department the authority to renegotiate royalty agreements with energy companies.

Calling the measure "comprehensive, balanced and forward-thinking," Mr. Pombo said it addressed the growing need for the country to develop more of the energy resources it controlled.

Mr. Pombo said the House leadership had assured him that the bill would come to the floor for a vote this year, but its prospects beyond that are uncertain.

Scent Of Ballots Is In Air, And Energy Bills Are Blooming (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Senator Larry E. Craig, Republican of Idaho, has introduced a bill that would allow American oil companies to work in partnership with Cuba, drilling for energy supplies off its coastline. A proposed measure from Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, Democrat of New York, would eliminate a slew of tax breaks for oil and gas companies.

Representative Dan Lungren, Republican of California, has proposed legislation that would award $1 billion to the first automaker in the United States to sell 60,000 mid-size sedans that can travel 100 miles on a gallon of gas.

Any notion that energy policy was set for a while after President Bush signed the first major energy bill in a decade last August would be wrong. Not only are gasoline prices higher now than they were then — more than $3 a gallon in many parts of the country — but elections are approaching. Judging from the bulk of new energy-related legislation floating around Congress, woe to the lawmaker with no response to the voter who asks, "So, what have you done about energy costs?"

"Not a legislator in the United States wants to go home over the July 4 holiday and not point to something he or she did," said Jason S. Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, a coalition of experts that works for bipartisan energy policy. "Whether that's a cynical politician or one who's reacting to his constituents is a matter of perspective."

Since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita shut down refineries in the Gulf of Mexico region last summer, speeding the rise of gasoline costs, House members have introduced 267 energy-related bills and senators have introduced 210, according to an analysis by the Senate energy committee.

DOJ_NMG_0035314

Many of the bills are directed at gasoline prices as lawmakers seek to increase domestic oil supplies; other proposals would help expand refinery capacity; and some would overturn offshore-drilling bans. At least one would lower personal income taxes to offset rising gas prices.

John B. Breaux, a former Democratic senator from Louisiana and now a lobbyist who has represented energy companies, called the flurry of bills being introduced "acts of desperation by Congress to address very serious problems."

"The energy bill will do a lot of good," he said. "But this is an election year, the problems are still there and people want immediate solutions."

Whether they get them is another matter. Energy experts agree that the world crude oil price, now about $64 a barrel, has greater influence on gasoline costs than anything Congress does, short of changing the federal per-gallon tax.

Beyond that, energy legislation rarely passes easily, given how lawmakers are divided over the long-term changes needed to wean the country from foreign oil and to lower prices. Republicans and energy producers generally favor expanding domestic fuel supplies through drilling and nuclear development. Democrats and environmental groups generally prefer greater use of renewable fuels and more emphasis on conservation.

A further complication is the limited time available for debate before the mid-October recess that precedes the Nov. 7 elections.

Last year's energy bill was the rare piece of omnibus legislation that drew the parties together, largely because it had something for everybody and satisfied the growing realization across party lines that renewable energy would play a growing role in the nation's energy portfolio. As one example of its even-handed approach, the bill gave energy companies tax breaks for exploration yet offered no path toward opening new energy fields in the Arctic National Wildlife Preserve or the Outer Continental Shelf.

"The energy bill was massive, but it was a compromise," said Representative Joe L. Barton of Texas, chairman of the House energy committee. "A lot of the things the most aggressive environmental groups wanted, they didn't get. A lot of the things proponents of domestic development wanted, they didn't get."

"Now," he added, "they're coming back to get them."

The result is a flow of legislation, which has had a dizzying effect on the committee chairmen who have to decide which measures deserve consideration and which have a chance to win bipartisan support. Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the energy committee, said the 2005 bill had served as "an open invitation for people introducing legislation that purports to solve one or more problems in one or more ways."

"If you can dream up a solution," he said, "we'll have five bills tomorrow."

But none of the measures are likely to pass, he added, without strong support from both parties, especially in the Senate, where Democrats have routinely used the threat of filibuster to block initiatives they oppose, like drilling in the Arctic reserve.

Of all the energy measures that build on the 2005 law, three have a modest chance to pass both houses this year. One would open a new section of the Gulf of Mexico to drilling. One would define and outlaw gasoline price gouging. A third would give the president authority to set fuel efficiency standards for cars. Interest is also growing to increase the use of ethanol in gasoline blends.

Mr. Grumet, whose coalition helped get the 2005 law passed, predicted that any bill of consequence would pass only if it addressed both demand and supply issues. As an example, he said lawmakers were discussing a measure that would combine the Gulf drilling bill with one that reduced demand for oil.

"There's a Goldilocks problem with energy issues," he said. "Bills are usually too hot or too cold. They're almost never just right to legislate."

Blame Oil Prices For Those Potholes (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drivers, be prepared for some bumpy roads.

Asphalt prices are skyrocketing as costs for oil, a key component of the paving material, are near records. In some parts of the country, there are asphalt shortages.

Both price and availability problems are forcing local governments across the USA to scale back or cancel road projects this summer, the main paving season in much of the country.

For drivers, that means some roads likely will be worse than they otherwise would be later this year and beyond.

“Some roads are going to continue to get worse and worse, and eventually some will be converted to gravel whether we like it or not,” says Dirk Rogers, highway superintendent in Brown County, S.D.

DOJ_NMG_0035315

Brown County pavers will hit only about 60% as many roads as last year. Prices have doubled in just two years, while the county budget has barely budged.

Construction companies have been laying off workers in Hawaii because of asphalt shortages caused, in part, by the recent closing of an asphalt plant. The problem was compounded last week after a fire at what is now the only asphalt producer in the state.

In most parts of the country, however, the bigger issue is price.

Nationwide, asphalt prices are up 42% in the second quarter from the same time a year ago, according to the Engineering News-Record.

Asphalt is made from sand, gravel and other substances that are bound together by a goopy substance called liquid asphalt. Liquid asphalt is made from the remnants of oil after it is refined into gasoline and other products.

Making matters worse, U.S. asphalt production was down more than 5% from January through March compared with a year ago, the Energy Department says.

A number of issues are to blame, including refinery outages caused by last year's hurricanes. At the same time, road construction is booming because of a strong economy and the need for post-hurricane rebuilding. The tight supply-demand balance is boosting prices.

"There are a multitude of issues going on," Global Insight economist Michele Halickman says.

Ernie Skretteberg, contracts administrator at McGarvin-Moberly Construction in Worland, Wyo., says higher prices mean the company is losing money on projects that it bid on months ago when prices were lower. But the shortages are causing him the biggest headaches.

"We never thought availability would be an issue," he says.

Skretteberg says he's concerned road projects will get delayed for so long that they won't be completed before the weather changes in October. "We have such a limited window in this part of the country … that we have to get going to get on schedule," Skretteberg says.

The longer the roads go without being maintained, the worse they will get and the harder and more costly they will be to repair, says Donald Wessel, general manager of crude and refined product consulting at Poten & Partners.

"Eventually, you're going to have to fix those roads. But if you're out of money, you're out of money," he says.

Snowmobile-Friendly Plan For National Parks Rejected (LAT)

By Julie Cart

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

The Bush administration on Monday reversed a proposed policy that would have opened some of America's national parks to snowmobiles and other motorized recreation and permitted increased commercialization.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne — who has been on the job less than a month — threw out a draft of the National Park Service Management Policies that would have weakened protections for wildlife and natural resources, instead restoring the longtime standard that national parks must emphasize preservation over any other activity.

"That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment," Kempthorne said during a ceremony in Washington.

The new policy, which is to become final in three weeks, explicitly instructs park managers to maintain clean air, water and natural sounds, and not allow any activities that might damage park resources.

The revised management plan also contains sections that acknowledge the impact of global climate change in the parks and encourage cultural diversity.

The guidelines scrapped most of the changes called for last year by former Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Paul Hoffman, a political appointee who sought to include recreation as a core park mission.

Hoffman's draft — which downplayed the role of science in managing the nation's parks and allowed for religious references to be placed inside their borders — drew 45,000 comments from the public and an angry reaction from congressional critics.

Of particular concern were policy changes that would have allowed snowmobiles to travel over any paved road in any national park in the winter, protected livestock grazing and mining, and weakened air quality standards.

Interior officials at the time said the revisions were intended as a starting point to facilitate discussion.

According to a park service manager who worked on the latest version, the draft that Kempthorne presented came directly from the service, not the Interior Department.

DOJ_NMG_0035316

Traditionally, park service policies have afforded the highest level of natural resource protection of any federally managed land.

National parks do not have a mandate to offer recreational opportunities to the public; rather, they were established to protect wildlife and cultural and historic resources and to provide educational programs to visitors.

The policies — which many park superintendents call "the bible" — instruct officials to balance visitor use with wildlife needs, resource protection and historic preservation, generally holding protection and preservation as their highest goals.

Ron Tipton of the National Parks Conservation Assn. said Monday that recreation groups long had petitioned for more access to national parks — and had pushed for language included in the Hoffman management plan.

"The impetus had come from some elements of the motorized recreation industry," he said. "We welcome a strong, clear statement that says that park resources should be protected."

Restoring Sanity To The Interior (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

IN ONE OF HIS FIRST ACTS as Interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne took the gratifying step of tossing out a proposal that would have ruined our national parks. Gone is language that would have opened them to mining and grazing as well as increased commercial development, snowmobiling and off-road-vehicle use. Restored is the National Parks Service's commitment to conservation.

The parks were never intended for the mixed industrial and recreational uses commonly allowed on property under the Bureau of Land Management. Instead, their purpose is to preserve the nation's natural treasures as close to their original state as possible and to provide for recreation as long as it does not conflict with the main goal of conservation.

On Monday, by announcing that he had rejected a management plan drafted under his predecessor, Gale Norton, Kempthorne returned to that original vision for the parks. It was a welcome and somewhat surprising move from the novice secretary who was no tree-hugger as a senator and governor from Idaho. Not that the public should expect Kempthorne to denounce the idea of drilling for oil in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge (he has long been a supporter) or move for new protections for old-growth trees in national forests (as governor, he favored the building of more roads in federal forests).

But Kempthorne has shown that he at least understands what Norton never seemed to get: The public wholeheartedly embraces the conservation of its national parks and monuments. The government should respect this position.

With the creation of the vast Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument last week and Kempthorne's announcement this week, the Bush administration appears to have a welcome new attitude toward the nation's natural treasures. Here's hoping it lasts.

Tiger, Tiger . . . Lost Forever (WP)

By Margaret Mittelbach And Michael Crewdson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Earth has lost many creatures as a result of human activity: The dodo and the passenger pigeon are among the best known. But in more recent years, one of the most spectacularly tragic losses in nature was Thylacinus cynocephalus, commonly called the thylacine, or Tasmanian tiger.

The Tasmanian tiger was a truly unusual species. Shaped like a wolf or hyena, it had a ginger-colored coat streaked with gorgeous, Dr. Seussian black stripes. A predator, it could open its jaws astonishingly wide, so that its toothy gape resembled that of a crocodile. Most intriguing of all, this striped creature was a marsupial: It carried its young -- as many as four at a time -- in a pouch like a kangaroo.

For thousands of years, Thylacinus cynocephalus lived in Tasmania, an island ark 150 miles south of the Australian mainland, which is still home to some of Earth's most extraordinary animals. And it lived well into the 20th century.

So what happened to this glorious beast?

Tasmania was colonized by the British in 1803, and the settlers soon brought in a large-scale sheep-raising industry. Tasmanian tigers occasionally raided their livestock, and as a result, a government bounty was set up and money paid to anyone who brought in a dead tiger. Shooting and snaring these rare marsupials became a lucrative business.

By the mid-1800s, naturalists were sending up red flags about the creature's imminent extinction. In 1863 the famed British wildlife artist John Gould warned, "When the comparatively small island of Tasmania becomes more densely populated, and its primitive forests are intersected with roads from the eastern to the western coast, the numbers of this singular animal will speedily diminish, extermination will have its full sway." He noted that the demise of the Tasmanian tiger would be a "source of much regret."

DOJ_NMG_0035317

By 1914 Gould's prediction was coming true. In that year biologist T. Thomas Flynn (the father of Tasmanian-born movie star Errol Flynn) proposed the establishment of a wildlife sanctuary to save the tigers from annihilation. But his warnings, like those of other naturalists, were ignored. Tigers continued to be shot and trapped. By the 1930s they were hardly ever seen, and in 1936, the last known Tasmanian tiger died at a Tasmanian zoo.

The extinction of the Tasmanian tiger is a source of much regret. And it's a source of mystification, too. Looking back, it's hard to comprehend how the Tasmanian settlers could have been so cavalier about the tiger's biological uniqueness -- so heedless of the consequences. It would have been easy to save the animal, but the only law ever passed to protect the species was enacted the same year the last captive one died.

Today the tiger remains the island of Tasmania's symbol, pictured on coins, flags and license plates. But it has, sadly, fallen into the realm of myth and mystery. Search parties are still sent out to locate any surviving wild tigers, but in 70 years, no physical evidence has been uncovered. This magnificent animal survives primarily in people's hopes and imaginations.

In 2006 many of us still have trouble foreseeing the consequences of our actions -- and scientists continue to predict a disconcerting future. Last month the World Conservation Union issued its 2006 "Red List," which identified more than 16,000 plants and animals -- a greater number than ever before -- as threatened with extinction, largely due to human activities. These include habitat destruction, the introduction of invasive species, overhunting and overfishing, pollution, and climate change.

On the Red List for the first time this year was Ursus maritimus, the polar bear -- not surprising given that the polar bear has become the emblematic species for global warming. The World Conservation Union's polar bear specialist group estimates that, because of the melting of Arctic pack ice, polar bear populations will decline by "more than 30 percent within the next 35 to 50 years. The principal cause of this decline is climatic warming."

Their language is not as poetic as Gould's, but the message is the same. Will the polar bear cross from the realm of the living into the realm of myth, too? And what will be the fates of the hippo (also appearing on the list for the first time) and thousands of other red-listed species? Will we regret our actions? History tells us that when it comes to preserving natural resources, human beings can be very foolish. But hindsight tells us we can change course and save these animals.

Margaret Mittelbach and Michael Crewdson are the authors of "Carnivorous Nights: On the Trail of the Tasmanian Tiger."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Houston County Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Gun Charges (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — A former Houston County deputy pleaded guilty to selling a gun to a convicted felon and supplying him with cocaine to sell, authorities said Monday.

Michael Shawn Campbell, 27, of Dothan pleaded guilty Monday to possession with intent to distribute cocaine and sale of a firearm to a convicted felon, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

Campbell, who was a deputy with Houston County's narcotic unit at the time, admitted to selling the gun and supplying crack cocaine to Joshua Whigan, an Ashford man Campbell knew to be a convicted felon, authorities said. Whigan reported Campbell to authorities and worked with the FBI and Ashford Police Department on the case.

Whigan has since pleaded guilty to unrelated drug possession charges in federal court, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Both men are awaiting sentencing.

Campbell faces $2 million in fines and five to 40 years in prison for the drug charge. He faces $250,000 in fines and a maximum 10-year sentence for the firearm charge. Other articles:

Bridgeport Mayor Admits To Cocaine Use (AP)

By John Christoffersen, The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn. (AP) — Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi has admitted using cocaine since taking office, telling the Connecticut Post he feels ashamed and humiliated.

Fabrizi was interviewed by the newspaper's editorial board Monday after he had called seeking the meeting. The mayor said he quit using the illegal drug well over a year ago.

"I'm ashamed. I'm humiliated for myself. I never meant to let the world know. I didn't want my family to know," Fabrizi told the newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0035318

Fabrizi, a Democrat, said last week he had made "poor choices in the past" but declined to be more specific after an FBI report surfaced in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine.

Fabrizi would not say how he obtained cocaine, but said he occasionally spent $20 or $40 to purchase it. The mayor offered to take periodic drug tests if anyone doubts he has stopped using cocaine. He said he has sought treatment and has not used the drug since late 2004.

"I used it very intermittently. I don't want to use excuses of recreational or social use. I used it some during the period when I was on the council," said Fabrizi, who was City Council president before he took office after Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003.

Adversaries had been calling on Fabrizi to resign, while supporters urged him to specifically address allegations he used cocaine.

Fabrizi planned to make a public statement Tuesday morning in an address to city employees, said his spokeswoman, Caryn Kaufman.

"He is not resigning tomorrow. This is not what this is about," Kaufman said Monday. She declined to comment further.

Fabrizi participated in a City Council meeting Monday night. He gave a brief statement, but the council did not discuss the allegations during the meeting.

"I take this opportunity to apologize for the recent headlines in the news," Fabrizi said. He invited public officials at the meeting to attend his address Tuesday morning.

Bridgeport, Connecticut's largest city, has struggled with violent drug dealers who gave the city a reputation as the murder capital of the state in the 1990s before the homicide rate plummeted.

"I do believe that he's got to resign," said Rick Torres, a Republican who ran against Fabrizi in 2003. "How do we explain to children drug use is dangerous and can ruin your life if the top guy is a drug user?"

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said Friday that Fabrizi was not a target of the drug investigation. He said FBI reports are typically filed under seal. He apologized to Fabrizi after the document was released.

Workers' Positive Drug Tests Decrease (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour And Del Jones

USA Today, June 20, 2006

Illegal drug use among workers in the USA fell to its lowest level in nearly two decades in a trend driven in part by tougher drug-testing practices, putting cold medicines behind the counter and closing down methamphetamine labs in America.

Overall, workers testing positive for drugs fell to 4.1% in 2005, Quest Diagnostics said Monday, the lowest percentage in the 17 years that the giant workplace drug-testing company has been releasing data. It started at 13.6% in 1988 and had fallen to 4.5% in 2003 and 2004.

The percentage of employees testing positive for methamphetamine also tumbled, indicating a reversal of a trend that had become a concern of employers in 2001 and 2002. Positive tests for amphetamines declined 8% in 2005 and is down 45% since 2004.

Data for the first five months of the year also show amphetamine use continuing to decline. Employees testing positive for amphetamine use fell by 10% from January through May.

Quest performs 7.3 million drug tests a year. Marijuana continues to be by far the drug that appears most often in workplace drug tests, although marijuana positives are down 20% since 2001.

“We were pleasantly surprised,” says Barry Sample, director of science and technology for Quest's employer solutions division. “Methamphetamine is at the lowest (level) since 2002. Simply having a drug-testing program is an effective deterrent. Testing works and is effective.”

It's an issue of importance to employers: More than 70% of substance abusers hold jobs, according to the American Council for Drug Education. Drug use on the job leads to increased accident risks, lower productivity, higher insurance costs and reduced profits.

“Employers have the single-most-effective weapon in the war on drugs: a paycheck,” says Mark de Bernardo, executive director of the Institute for a Drug-Free Workplace.

The White House said on Monday that seizures of meth labs dropped more than 30% last year. It said the reason was that more states and retail drugstores limited access to cold medications that are used to make meth. “The workplace data has been very powerful in that it's based on many, many tests,” says John Walters, director of National Drug Control Policy.

Drug testing often occurs during the pre-employment process, and employers may test hair, urine and saliva. The worrisome trend now, de Bernardo says, is abused prescription drugs including Percocet and Oxycontin.

DOJ_NMG_0035319

"There are more employers (testing). It's great that the positive results are down, but it's a little preliminary," says Nancy Delogu, a Washington, D.C., employment lawyer. "The drugs-in-the-workplace problem has not gone away."

Reports Suggest Gain In Fight On Meth Labs (NYT/AP)

By Associated Press

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 (AP) — Seizures of methamphetamine labs dropped by more than 30 percent last year, the Bush administration said Monday, as more states and drugstore chains began limiting access to ingredients that are used to make the highly addictive drug.

Even as that statistic was released, Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company, said that in the first five months of this year, the rate of job applicants and workers testing positive for meth was 31 percent lower than last year.

The top White House drug control official, John P. Walters, said the two reports were evidence that the "one-two punch" of restricting chemicals and educating the public about the effects of methamphetamine addiction was having an effect.

"What this information shows is, on supply and demand, we are making a dramatic difference," said Mr. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

But some federal lawmakers give most of the credit to state and local governments, saying meth abuse has declined despite an absence of national direction.

Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican who heads the House Government Reform drug policy subcommittee, said the administration had refused to make combating meth a priority. Mr. Souder criticized a White House budget proposal to cut federal spending for state and local law enforcement agencies to fight the drug.

In an interview, Mr. Walters dismissed such criticism. "No one's trying to downplay it," he said. "There's no drug worse than meth." But he said his office could not focus too much on a single drug at the expense of fighting other threats, like heroin, cocaine and marijuana.

Monday's figures on the seizing of methamphetamine labs came from the Drug Enforcement Administration, whose El Paso intelligence center compiles information on clandestine laboratories confiscated within the country. The agency said meth lab seizures declined to 12,185 last year from 17,562 in 2004.

The drop was steepest in the West, particularly in states that were among the first hit by methamphetamine abuse. The drop in Oklahoma, for example, was 68 percent, in Montana 66 percent and in Oregon 60 percent.

Meth Activity Down, Two New Reports Show (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace.

Local law enforcement officials say there is still a strong appetite for the highly addictive drug and warned that meth makers in Mexico and other countries are moving to fill the supply void.

The number of meth lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states put in place laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center.

Meanwhile, the nation's largest drug testing company said Monday that the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Those figures are based on the results of more than 7 million drug tests in 2005 and about 3 million tests from January to May 2006 conducted by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc.

White House drug policy director John Walters called the data an encouraging sign of progress.

"The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand," said Walters, head of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Meth lab seizures fell from 17,562 in 2004 to 12,185 last year, with Western and central western states like Oklahoma, Montana and Washington seeing some of the sharpest declines. Missouri, which leads the nation in the number of lab seizures, saw a 22 percent decline.

In Oregon, where lab busts fell 60 percent, the biggest reason is a state law requiring cold medicines to be placed behind pharmacy counters, said Capt. Craig Durbin, former head of the Oregon State Police's drug enforcement section. The law has helped stop meth makers from buying large quantities of cold pills to extract pseudoephedrine, the ingredient used along with other household chemicals to cook meth.

DOJ_NMG_0035320

Durbin said the demand for meth still remains high and is increasingly fed by supplies from Mexico and Canada. "When we talk to our task forces, they're still able to go out at a moment's notice and purchase meth," Durbin said. "Until we see start seeing that change, I don't think we can say we've got anything close to being under control."

Oregon is among at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications in an effort to starve meth manufacturers of their key ingredient. The federal Combat Meth Act, signed into law in March, will enforce similar restrictions across the country by Sept. 30.

While the drug czar praised the "robust response nationwide" for the good news, some federal lawmakers said much of the credit should go to state and local governments working without much national direction.

Rep. Mark Souder, chairman of the House drug policy subcommittee, said the administration has refused to make the fight against meth abuse a priority. He also criticized a White House budget proposal to slash federal spending for state and local law enforcement to fight meth.

"Efforts to continue to downplay the threat, after working to cut funding for anti-meth efforts, are only making those who fight the meth epidemic daily more angry at this administration," said Souder, R-Ind.

Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., agreed that the administration's budget requests this year were "fundamentally inadequate," but he said it is now "catching up in other respects and doing better."

In Jefferson County, Mo., a rural area on the fringes of suburban St. Louis, Sheriff Glenn Boyer said success in busting meth labs is directly related to federal grant money.

"We live and die by the grants, especially in the rural areas," Boyer said. "They don't have the resources that you would have in a major city where you have a huge tax base."

Earlier this month, the White House drug policy office set a goal to cut meth use by 15 percent by 2009 and increase seizures of meth labs by 25 percent. A priority is stemming the flow of meth from superlabs in Mexico, which supply about 80 percent of the drug to the United States.

On the Net:

White House Office of National Drug Control Policy: www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov/

Quest Diagnostics Inc.: www.questdiagnostics.com/

Drug Enforcement Administration El Paso Intelligence Center: www.dea.gov/programs/epic.htm

Number Of Meth Labs Closed In Past 2 Years (AP)

The New York Times, June 19, 2006

A look at the number of methamphatamine labs shut down by law enforcement officials in each state in 2005 and 2004, and the percentage change.

State 2004 2005 Change

Ala. 419 276 -34.1

Alaska 66 37 -43.9

Ariz. 128 75 -41.4

Ark. 805 426 -47.1

Calif. 766 469 -38.8

Colo. 233 149 -36.1

Conn. 0 3

Del. 3 0

D.C. 1 0

Fla. 280 273 -2.5

Ga. 266 131 -50.8

Hawaii 13 11 -15.4

Idaho 42 21 -50.0

Ill. 1101 931 -15.4

Ind. 1073 954 -11.1

Iowa 1383 753 -45.6

Kan. 589 375 -36.3

Ky. 576 573 -0.5

La. 122 98 -19.7

DOJ_NMG_0035321

Maine 4 5
Md. 1 2
Mass. 1 3
Mich. 293 341 16.4
Minn. 167 88 -47.3
Miss. 277 184 -33.6
Mo. 2798 2170 -22.4
Mont. 73 25 -65.8
Neb. 263 228 -13.3
Nev. 81 52 -35.8
N.H. 2 6
N.J. 0 3
N.M. 120 59 -50.8
N.Y. 48 20 -58.3
N.C. 318 322 1.3
N.D. 232 159 -31.5
Ohio 302 332 9.9
Okla. 667 217 -67.5
Ore. 471 189 -59.9
Pa. 107 79 -26.2
R.I. 0 0
S.C. 170 88 -48.2
S.D. 31 16 -48.4
Tenn. 1430 861 -39.8
Texas 473 269 -43.1
Utah 71 50 -29.6
Vt. 1 1
Va. 75 52 -30.7
Wash. 954 532 -44.2
W.Va. 168 213 26.8
Wis. 77 55 -28.6
Wyo. 21 9 -57.1
Percentage not indicated in states with fewer than nine labs.

Source: Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence
Center Clandestine Lab Seizure System.

Workplace Drug Use Declines In 2005 (UPI)

UPI, June 19, 2006

NEW YORK (UPI) -- Drug use among U.S. workers declined to a 17-year low last year a report released Monday by a New York drug-testing company says.

Quest Diagnostics said of tests for all drugs performed by the company for the combined U.S. workforce, 4.1 percent had positive results in 2005 compared to 13.6 percent in 1988.

In addition to the drop for overall workplace drug use, Quest said a preliminary review of amphetamine test results for the first five months of this year showed a sharp drop of 10 percent in positive results. Among federal safety workers, the rate of decline was 20 percent for the same period.

Since 2004, the incidence of amphetamines drug-test positives has dropped 45 percent, Quest reported.

Fewer Failing Drug Tests; Dope Still Most Common (SAEN)

By Travis E. Poling

San Antonio Express News, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035322

U.S. workers might be cleaning up their act when it comes to drug use if the semiannual Drug Testing Index from Quest Diagnostics Inc. is any indication.

Quest, a New Jersey-based company that has tracked drug test data since 1988, reported Monday that 4.1 percent of 7.3 million workplace drug tests were positive for drugs in 2005. The previous year, about 4.5 percent tested positive.

As pre-screening becomes more prevalent, the percentage of applicants testing positive has declined from 13.6 percent when Quest first started the Drug Testing Index.

"During 2005, we detected a downward trend in amphetamines and methamphetamines positive test results in the general U.S. work force, and in 2006 the trend took hold among all U.S. workers," said Barry Sample, Quest's director of science and technology.

Those testing positive for marijuana represented 52.5 percent of the positive results, down from 60.6 percent in 2001. At 15.7 percent, cocaine was No. 2 on the list of drugs found in workers.

In San Antonio, results are mixed, with one testing company observing a possible decrease in overall drug use and another noticing an upward trend, especially in methamphetamine use.

Texas MedClinic reported 1,387 positive tests among the pre-employment, random and post-accident drug tests it conducted for employers last year. That's 68 more positives than in 2004, but Marketing Director Karen Walker said the company did more tests last year. She did not immediately have access to the number.

Analytical Toxicology Corp., a San Antonio-based company that tests hair, urine and saliva samples for drugs, reports an 8 percent positive rate in its testing throughout South Texas. Marijuana and cocaine use are the most common findings, but Analytical has noticed an increase in the use of methamphetamine and Ecstasy.

What's more, there has been in a rise in the number of adulterated samples, according to a spokeswoman for Analytical Toxicology.

The semiannual report from Quest suggests that state policymakers and stores may be helping to reduce drug use by limiting access to pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient used to make methamphetamine illegally, Sample said.

Preliminary reviews of data from the first five months of this year show that use of amphetamines has dropped to its lowest level among both general employees and workers for whom testing is federally mandated since becoming popular in 2002-03, Sample said.

War On Meth Yields Results (KCS)

By John Shultz

The Kansas City Star, June 20, 2006

The Bush administration said Monday that laws cracking down on the sale of common methamphetamine ingredients are stymieing small-time meth cooks throughout the country.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy credits the laws, which put tighter controls on pseudoephedrine, with helping to spark a steep nationwide reduction in the seizure of meth labs and meth-making equipment — 12,000 such incidents nationwide last year, versus 17,000 in 2004.

And while law enforcement officials believe that Mexican drug traffickers have been quick to replenish any supply deficit caused by the crackdown on small-time cooks, other recent research suggests that dents have been made on the demand side as well.

Quest Diagnostics, the country's largest drug-testing company, said Monday that a smaller percentage of employees and job seekers tested positive for the drug in 2005 and that the number continued to trend downward for the first five months of 2006.

Also, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Youth Behavior Risk Survey in 2005 found fewer high schoolers identifying themselves as serious meth users.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Missouri, which led the nation in seizures, had about a fifth fewer such incidents in 2005 compared with the previous year's 2,788. Kansas saw a drop of more than a third, from 584 to 375.

Both Missouri and Kansas have laws that limit the amount of pseudoephedrine that can be purchased at one time and require buyers to show ID.

John Walters, national drug czar, in a statement called nationwide efforts to reduce both supply and demand "an effective one-two punch against methamphetamine."

But while meth has long been associated in the public consciousness as a modern-day moonshine cooked up in household labs, the lion's share of the drug in the U.S. for years has been provided by traffickers. Megalabs in Mexico are the most common source.

DOJ_NMG_0035323

The Mexican product is now cheaper and more readily available than in years past.

"You have the people out there who are addicted to meth because of the small toxic labs," said Shirley Armstead, a spokeswoman for the DEA in Missouri, "then they turn and get it from the traffickers. … All of the small toxic labs paved the way for the Mexican drug traffickers to exploit."

Armstead said that last year in the St. Louis area, all of the meth interdictions involved imported crystal meth rather than the homemade powdered product that used to make up the majority of seizures.

Kansas City, Kan., police turned to the DEA for help last year when the Mexican meth trade sparked a wave of violence. The resulting law enforcement operation led to 23 arrests and the dismantling of four trafficking organizations.

Many in law enforcement have embraced efforts to crack down on the little labs, even though they haven't necessarily cut supply, because the dangerous mix of volatile chemicals required for meth-making can lead to fiery explosions.

"I would much, much, much prefer it be imported from Mexico, because that way we avoid the explosions," said Kansas Bureau of Investigations spokesman Kyle Smith. "Law enforcement had to divert so many resources toward meth labs that we had to take away from the other drugs."

Fewer than 1 percent of the country's population uses meth, but many counties around the country still list it as their leading drug problem.

In cities with prevalent meth trades, a large percentage of arrestees often test positive for the drug, according to a 2003 federal survey of arrestees in a few dozen target cities — about a third of the men arrested in San Jose, San Diego and Spokane, Wash; about 28 percent in Des Moines, Iowa.

The 2004 federal National Survey on Drug Use and Health, the most recent available, found that meth usage numbers had been largely stagnant in the first half of the decade.

New users numbered about 300,000 in 2002, 2003 and 2004.

The research released by drug testers Quest Diagnostics suggests a potential reduction in meth usage, at least among the employed and job applicants.

In the first five months of 2006, Quest logged 45 percent fewer positive tests for meth than during the same time period in 2005.

Positive tests for other amphetamines have also trended down during that period.

Meth Lab Busts Are Down By 40% In State (LADN)

By Susan Abram

Los Angeles Daily News, June 20, 2006

Restrictions on ingredients are working, authorities say

Seizures of methamphetamine labs across California declined by nearly 40 percent last year, in part due to laws restricting the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make the drug, government officials said Monday.

The continued decline in California mirrored trends nationwide, which saw a 30 percent decline in seizures from 2004 to 2005. Nationally, police seized 12,100 labs in 2005, compared with 17,500 in 2004, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The federal government hopes a sweeping law that would require drugs containing pseudoephedrine - the main ingredient in meth - to be sold from behind the pharmacy counter will further reduce the meth supply in the United States. Though California already has such laws in place, the nationwide mandate will begin Sept. 30.

"Communities once paralyzed by the threat of this dangerous drug are emerging healthier and safer because we have reduced the diversion of precursor chemicals and the number of meth labs," John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a statement.

Local law enforcement agencies attribute the drops to stepped-up enforcement, as well as pharmacies that restrict the sale of medicines such as Sudafed, which contains pseudoephedrine.

Officials at Pfizer Inc., the makers of Sudafed, said the company is in favor of those policies though initially it was not convinced that selling the product from behind the counter was the best solution. Still, the company admits that progress is being made on the war on meth because of the changes.

Pfizer now is focused on Mexico, where superlabs have continued to grow.

"We're restricted in the amount of pseudoephedrine that we can buy from Mexico, and

Advertisement

we support that," said Erica Johnson, spokeswoman Pfizer Consumer Healthcare. "We're trying to work alongside the government to provide solutions."

But various agencies in Los Angeles County still see meth use as a significant problem.

Researchers for Phoenix House, a national group of rehabilitation facilities, found that from 1997 to 2002, the number of teens placed into drug treatment centers in Los Angeles County rose from 1,609 to 5,572. The increase is attributed to meth use.

And the federal Drug Enforcement Administration cautions that while lab seizures have declined, arrests and use have remained steady, said Sarah Pullen, Los Angeles spokeswoman for the DEA.

"The large meth labs, or superlabs, have gone across the border, but Los Angeles is a distribution point for the rest of the country," said Capt. William Ryan, for the Los Angeles County Narcotics Bureau. "The demand is still out there."

The Antelope Valley, once a haven for superlabs, saw less than a dozen lab seizures last year, Ryan said.

Meth, also known as crank or tweak, sells for $5,000 to $6,500 per pound. But ice, a purer form of meth, sells for $8,000 to $11,000 a pound, Ryan said.

"It's still a high priority for us," Ryan said. "We still see a lot of it."

Two Brothers Could Be Charged With Fentanyl Related Death (WXYZ)

By Kimberly Craig

WXYZ-TV, June 19, 2006

Monday, police arrested two men accused of supplying a Bloomfield Hills teenager with a deadly combination of heroin and Fentanyl. The suspects could become the first two in Michigan to be charged with a Fentanyl related death.

Saturday night, on Keating Street in Detroit, officers with the major crimes division and DEA agents raided the home of two suspected drug dealers who are brothers.

Sources said the brothers supplied 17-year-old Lauren Jolly with the heroin laced with Fentanyl and then let her die.

It was reported that Jolly died in her car, but witnesses said she actually died in the drug dealer's home.

When Jolly began having problems, witnesses said, the drug dealers used intimidation to stop them from helping her. They then waited for her to die before moving her to her car. She was later found dead on 8 Mile.

When asked if the suspects would face murder charges, prosecutors said they were not yet commenting on the case.

The suspects were being held on unrelated charges and Detroit Police said they are looking to see if they are connected to any other deadly overdoses.

Siblings May Be Linked To Fentanyl (DN)

By Ronald J. Hansen

Detroit News, June 20, 2006

DETROIT -- Two men arrested in a federal raid of a drug house Sunday morning may be linked to the distribution of drugs laced with fentanyl, a painkiller suspected in the deaths of at least 79 people in Metro Detroit in the last four weeks, law enforcement sources said.

Authorities believe that one of the victims, Lauren Jolly of Bloomfield Township, died in May at the drug house from a lethal mix of heroin and fentanyl, and her body was placed in her car and taken to Eight Mile and Gratiot.

Brothers Donald and James Edgar Coleman were among those arrested in the raid in the 20000 block of Keating Street, sources familiar with the investigation said. Some were charged with ordinance-type violations, police said.

James Coleman appeared Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit on an unspecified drug charge. He remains in custody and is due back in court today.

A toxicology report examining what killed Jolly, 17, will take eight to 12 weeks, authorities said. For now, at least, no one is charged with her death. Jolly was a junior at Birmingham Groves High School.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration had been monitoring the Coleman property for some time, police said.

Authorities first realized a fentanyl emergency after 12 people died from overdoses of the drug in a two-day span last month. Since then, investigators have worked to discover the source of the drug, which has been linked to another 130 deaths since January 2005.

Since April, cities in at least eight other states have similarly reported a sudden surge in overdoses.

The matter is the subject of a nationwide investigation by the DEA and police departments from Philadelphia to Chicago.

But for months, as fentanyl-related deaths accumulated, authorities in Detroit have said some of the clues that could have alerted them earlier to the growing toll were obscured by the regular toll of drug deaths in the county.

Also, testing limitations kept authorities from quickly linking any of the deaths to the lethal mixture.

There were early warnings, however. In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with "potentially lethal" levels of fentanyl.

DOJ_NMG_0035325

The Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, officials said.

Freelance writer David G. Grant contributed to this report.

6 Drug Deaths Reported; Heroin Suspected In 3 (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, June 19, 2006

COOK COUNTY -- Five Chicago men and one Elk Grove Village man died Saturday and early Sunday of suspected drug overdoses, officials said.

Three of the six may have been heroin users, said a spokesman for the Cook County medical examiner. Autopsies were completed Sunday for four of the men, but results were withheld pending toxicology results.

The men's ages ranged from 25 to 48.

Lake Charles Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Supplying Medicine (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

LAKE CHARLES, La. (AP) — A Lake Charles doctor pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to illegally dispensing pain medication in exchange for sexual favors.

Dr. Kevin E. Gorin, 46, was charged with four counts of distribution of a controlled dangerous substance and one count of possession of a controlled dangerous substance with intent to distribute.

After entering his plea before U.S. District Judge Patricia Minaldi, she set sentencing for Sept. 20. Gorin is facing a maximum jail term of up to 20 years and a $1 million fine on each of the four counts of distribution and up to three years and a $250,00 fine on the possession count.

Gorin, who was the medical director for the Institute for Pain Management and Rehabilitation at Lake Charles Memorial Hospital, was allowed to remain out of jail on bond.

Gorin's arrest culminated an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Beauregard Parish Sheriff's Office, and the DeRidder Police Department. Court documents obtained by the (Lake Charles) American Press state the investigation into Gorin's alleged activities began last October and continued up to his arrest on Jan. 12.

"The investigation utilized a cooperating witness, an undercover officer, audio devices and video devices which were monitored and recorded by law enforcement surveillance teams," the documents state.

According to court documents, Gorin gave the cooperating witness prescriptions for Diazepam and Percocet on Nov. 4, 2005 while visiting her in DeRidder. "There was no physical examination to justify these prescriptions," the documents state.

In other meetings, the undercover agent picked up illegal prescriptions from Gorin for the witness to sell the drugs and make money from their sale, documents show.

On Jan. 10, Gorin told the witness in a phone conversation that he had a "business proposition to discuss with her which included the sale of Oxycontin so they could both make money," documents show.

Two days later, Gorin met the witness and undercover agent at a DeRidder motel to discuss the plan "in exchange and in anticipation of sexual favors for the direct or indirect benefit of the doctor," according to the documents.

During his arrest, authorities found six Percocet and six Xanex in Gorin's pocket. A prescription bottle with 142 Percocet and a box of 24 Xanex were also found in his vehicle.

Lab That Tested OU Coach's Hair Has Had Its Share Of Run-ins With Regulators (ANE)

By Jonathan Hunt

Athens News, June 19, 2006

The Columbus laboratory that reported finding an extremely high amount of GHB in Ohio University head football coach Frank Solich's hair has come under repeated scrutiny by regulators, records show.

A review of public documents by The Athens NEWS has uncovered numerous run-ins in recent years between Toxicology Associates, Inc. and government agencies charged with ensuring lab accuracy and fair advertising.

Additionally, the laboratory has had to defend itself against a bevy of lawsuits from creditors seeking payment of bills or taxes.

Despite repeated attempts by The Athens NEWS to contact lab representatives for comment, no one at Toxicology Associates, Inc. would discuss its test methodology, regulatory compliance or the name and qualifications of its current lab director.

In one case, when a NEWS reporter asked to speak to the lab's owner, he was told that the owner could not discuss client information. The paper's request for an interview was still refused even after the reporter explained that he was not seeking any sensitive client information, and described the focus of his story.

Heightened scrutiny of Toxicology Associates, Inc. flows from its involvement in the high-profile case of Solich, because the purported GHB result has been questioned by independent experts, and the test forms the basis of the coach's effort to overturn his November drunken driving conviction.

Columbus defense attorney Samuel Shamansky contends that somebody spiked Solich's drink with GHB on the night of Nov. 26 at Casa Cantina in Athens. Solich pleaded no contest to DUI on Nov. 28.

On June 2, Shamansky filed a plea withdrawal motion in Athens County Municipal Court, arguing that the coach would not have entered the plea had he known GHB was in his system. The hair sample was taken Jan. 5, according to the lab report.

GHB, or gamma hydroxybutyrate, is naturally present in the human body, but was made illegal in 1990 by the federal government. GHB causes drowsiness with sufficient dosage, and has become known as a "date-rape" drug. State-of-the-art methods can detect one-time dosages of GHB, and can even determine approximately when it was ingested by isolating segments of hair, which grows at a rate of about one centimeter per month. The lab report claims Solich ingested the drug around the time when he visited Casa Cantina.

Athens patrol officer Krishea Osborne found the coach passed out at the wheel of his Nissan SUV facing the wrong way on West Union Street shortly after he left the West State Street bar and eatery. Solich refused an Intoxilyzer 5000 alcohol breath test, but witnesses said he consumed margaritas and shots of alcohol at Casa Cantina, and Osborne's police report indicated he had a "very strong" odor of alcohol when arrested.

Earlier this month, two respected toxicologists told The Athens NEWS that the 569.4 nanograms per milligram of GHB allegedly found in a sample of Solich's hair by the Columbus lab is simply implausible. Dr. Pascal Kintz of Laboratoire ChemTox in Illkirch, France and Dr. Bruce Goldberger of the University of Florida College of Medicine were responding to the 569.4 ng/mg result, which is attached as "Exhibit 3" to Solich's plea withdrawal motion.

Kintz authored a 2003 research article in the Journal of Forensic Science entitled "Testing for GHB in Hair by GC/MS/MS after a Single Exposure - Application to Document Sexual Assault." Goldberger, who also holds robust qualifications in his field, explained that a properly conducted test could not find so much GHB in human hair and would employ controls to detect if the substance had been smeared on beforehand. He also asserted that lab reports should be signed and certified by qualified personnel. Solich's wasn't.

Against the backdrop of these questions about the OU coach's case, The Athens NEWS examined the recent history of Toxicology Associates, Inc.

It found that on May 16, 2006, The U.S. Food and Drug Administration sent a warning letter to Benjamin Corpus, who owns the lab. The FDA warned that three home test kits - for influenza viruses, streptococcus bacteria and infectious mononucleosis - were offered on the company's toxassociates.com Web site without "approval from the FDA for (over-the-counter) sale of these products."

"Therefore, you are violating the law," continued the FDA letter, which also maintained that the Web site "contains statements that are misleading ... because such statements create an impression of official approval of a device (that has been cleared for interstate commerce)."

Federal officials received no response from Corpus for three months after initially trying to contact him about the FDA violations in January, according to the letter. When they finally reached Corpus on April 3, the letter said, he stated he would respond within a week, but did not.

In 2002, a Pennsylvania judge ruled that Toxicology Associates, Inc. had violated the state's Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law by selling anthrax test kits over the Internet. Pennsylvania Attorney General Mike Fisher said the Columbus lab apparently capitalized on the post-9/11 anthrax scare, by "using the nation's heightened sense of vulnerability to turn a profit," according to published reports.

The anthrax test kits, which used a nasal swab, were deemed unreliable by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, which also said that Toxicology Associates, Inc. was unqualified to analyze them.

The lab, which never responded to the lawsuit and lost the case via a default judgment, was ordered to refund money to anthrax kit purchasers, pay $5,000 in civil fines, $2,265 in investigative costs and stop selling the kits in Pennsylvania.

The FDA or state attorneys general hold authority over drug product marketing, but an agency of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services is responsible for inspecting and certifying commercial laboratory testing done for clinical purposes.

Tests carried out for hospitals or other health care institutions on a contract basis by labs such as Toxicology Associates, Inc. are regulated by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, under the Clinical Laboratory Improvement Amendments (CLIA), a federal law.

CLIA does not apply to testing done for private individuals such as Solich, but the Columbus lab's track record for tests that are regulated does little to erase doubts about the GHB finding.

DOJ_NMG_0035327

On Nov. 21, 2001, a CLIA inspector conducted a complaint investigation at the Toxicology Associates, Inc. facility on Bethel Road in Columbus. The "statement of deficiencies" prepared by the inspector afterward indicated that the lab had failed to obtain accreditation, and that no inspection had been done between 1996 and 2001.

The inspector found the lab in violation of multiple CLIA provisions - including testing of proficiency samples, general quality control, toxicology quality control, laboratory director qualifications and responsibilities, testing personnel responsibilities and quality assurance.

"Laboratory failed to have documentation to assure that any of the facility personnel from the Laboratory Director to the testing personnel were qualified," the inspector wrote, emphasizing that this and other violations were "repeat deficiencies" from 1996.

"Eight days of patient testing records were randomly selected and reviewed and laboratory failed to have documentation of quality control on all eight days," it continued. "Facility personnel could not explain why the eight days of patient test results reviewed failed go have documentation on any quality controls being performed."

"This is a simple problem of record keeping," wrote lab owner and president Benjamin Corpus on the deficiencies statement. "Dr. Benito Corpus has resigned on 12-1-2001, and Lucilla Casabar, MD will assume the position as a laboratory director."

During the next CLIA inspection, which happened less than three months later, Dr. Casabar quit. The inspector was unconvinced of Casabar's qualifications after reviewing her curriculum vitae, and asked the lab's technical supervisor - possibly Benjamin Corpus - for more documentation.

"The Technical Supervisor left the conference room to 'call' the designated (lab) director, his Aunt. When the Technical Supervisor returned, he said (Casabar) has resigned effective immediately."

Casabar was replaced as lab director by Dr. Alfred E. Staubus, according to notations from Corpus on the Feb. 25, 2002 deficiencies statement.

The 2002 inspection determined that "The Plan of Correction was not followed," found many repeat violations and detected a lack of "instrument function checks" for the lab's gas chromatograph machine.

On Jan. 6, 2003, at about 10 a.m., CLIA inspectors performed a surprise complaint investigation at the lab.

"The owner refused to allow the investigation to be initiated," wrote the inspector. "He was ... guided through accessing the Code of Federal Regulations on his computer ... He was told that failure to allow the investigation would result in enforcement action to terminate his CLIA certificate ... He began stating his health was limited and he needed to postpone the investigation due to his health ... CMS staff (in the Chicago Regional Office) agreed the investigation was to continue ... The owner continued to refuse ... The surveyor left the facility at 10:45 a.m. to return to the office."

The lab's CLIA certificate was suspended on Feb. 8, 2003, and inspectors made another unannounced visit on June 27 of that year to ensure that the lab was no longer conducting clinical testing.

They found no system in place to separate clinical from non-clinical samples, and continued noncompliance for quality assurance and instrument calibration procedures.

"Based on interview with the Laboratory Director, it was determined that he was unaware of the location of any quality control or quality assurance records for the laboratory since May 2002," wrote the inspector.

Staubus and Corpus claimed they were sending any samples from anthrax test kits still sold on the Internet - this had only been banned in Pennsylvania - to another lab.

A Jan. 13, 2004, CLIA inspection found continued noncompliance, including documentation and calibration problems with the lab's spectrophotometer and gas chromatograph machine -

the same technologies used to test coach Solich's hair. Inspectors also determined that a chemical reagent being used by the lab "was dated 1979."

Inspectors reported that the lab "did not have a system in place to ensure test results were reported accurately."

"Acceptable levels of analytic performance are not maintained," the deficiencies statement continued.

At the next lab visit, on April 11, 2005, a CLIA inspector noted that the lab had changed some of its quality control practices, and was "preparing their own controls" for certain procedures, but that lab personnel still were not keeping adequate records or ensuring that "quality assessment activities as defined by the facility were monitored and documented."

It remains unclear whether the lab is now in compliance with CLIA regulations, or what actions, if any, have been taken to restore its CLIA certificate. Lab inspection duties are shared, in some cases, by the Ohio Department of Health and the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS). The Athens NEWS has requested full CLIA compliance documentation for Toxicology Associates, Inc. from the Chicago regional CMS office. Statements of deficiencies cited in this article were obtained from the state health department.

DOJ_NMG_0035328

Toxicology Associates, Inc. has been sued eleven times in Franklin County Municipal Court between 1994 and 2005, and five times in Franklin County Common Pleas Court between 1985 and 2002. In all sixteen cases, the lab was the defendant, and in twelve of them, somebody was trying to collect payment on a debt. Three of the cases were small claims complaints against the business.

Plaintiffs seeking payment from the lab have included the Ohio Department of Taxation, the Columbus city Division of Income Tax, the Franklin County Treasurer, Baxter Healthcare, United Transportation Inc., Huntington National Bank and Abbott Laboratories.

Toxicology Associates, Inc. does testing for steroids and "designer" drugs, and lab personnel have offered expert-witness services in court cases. The toxassociates.com Web site offers "legal consultation" for "$250 per question per case" on "any matter that is legal in nature or has legal implication."

Ohio State Board of Pharmacy Assistant Director Tim Benedict said Friday that the pharmacy board's oversight over labs is primarily limited to monitoring the possession of prescription drugs, but that Toxicology Associates, Inc. has failed to renew a required state license by the deadline three times - in 1989, 1995 and 1999. However, its pharmacy board license is currently valid, said Benedict.

A group supervisor for the Columbus diversion group office of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency said Friday that she knows of no problems encountered by the DEA in its oversight of the lab's handling of controlled substances. The DEA license held by Toxicology Associates, Inc. is current, she reported.

Dr. Staubus, a pharmacology professor at The Ohio State University in Columbus, is listed as the lab director for the business on the most recent available documents. However, Staubus, when reached at his OSU office on Friday, said he is no longer associated with Toxicology Associates, Inc.

"It's been approaching one year (since working there)," he said. Asked about the lab's compliance record, Staubus replied, "That's something that you will need to talk to Ben (Corpus) about."

CLIA deficiency statements and other documents indicate that Benito Corpus, Benjamin Corpus and Lucilla Casabar have held prominent roles at Toxicology Associates, Inc., along with Staubus, but it remains unclear exactly which responsibilities are presently held by whom at the facility.

Other labs or clinics doing business in Texas or other states under the name Toxicology Associates appear to be unconnected to the Columbus lab.

Athens City Prosecutor Lisa Eliason said Friday that an evidentiary hearing on Solich's request for a plea withdrawal would likely not occur until August. If Municipal Court Judge William Grim lets Solich withdraw his plea, the case would go to trial, allowing attorney Shamansky to mount a unique GHB doping defense.

Eliason confirmed that she has been in contact with Dr. Goldberger, the University of Florida toxicologist who questioned the coach's GHB hair test, and with another expert, Dr. Laureen Marinetti, chief forensic toxicologist for the Montgomery County Coroner's Office and the Miami Valley Regional Crime Lab in Dayton.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Bill Hit Over Work-site Enforcement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Senate Republicans warned yesterday that the immigration bill approved by the Senate last month won't stop companies from hiring illegal aliens -- the very magnet that has drawn some 12 million illegals to the United States.

"Less than one hour of floor time was devoted to this subject during the debates on the Senate floor," said Sen. John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who called a subcommittee hearing on the topic yesterday. "Now, this concerns me because not only do I see work-site enforcement as the critical means, or linchpin, really, of successful immigration reform, but also because the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security has told me that several provisions in the Senate bill would make the system unworkable."

They say the promises included in the current bill aren't much better than those included in the immigration bill of 1986, which granted amnesty to 3 million illegals and paved the way for 12 million new ones to come here.

"The American people are now once again being asked to accept the same bargain today, and the cornerstone of this deal is a new electronic employment-verification system," Mr. Cornyn said. "Unfortunately, the Senate has conducted virtually no open debate on this subject."

DOJ_NMG_0035329

Yesterday's hearing was the first of its kind, and government officials acknowledged the general inability of the federal government to prevent the hiring of illegal aliens.

They blamed the plethora of documents illegals can use to prove their eligibility for employment and the burgeoning market for counterfeit documents. Also, they said, the growing problem of identity theft has further stymied their efforts.

The Senate bill grants amnesty to illegals for all forms of document fraud and identity theft and also grants blanket amnesty to all employers who have hired -- even knowingly -- illegals in the past.

Federal officials also blamed the war against terrorism for drawing attention away from immigration. But all that's changed now, they promised.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement "is reinvigorating our work-site enforcement efforts," said Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of ICE. "We are seeking to change the culture of illegal employment across the country by pursuing the most egregious employers engaged in the employment of illegal workers and educating the private sector to institute best hiring practices."

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said there was little hope for improvement with current proposals.

"I am concerned that the worker verification title passed in the current Senate immigration bill only takes us halfway there, and will not eliminate the activity that currently allows millions of illegal immigrants to steal Social Security numbers and obtain work fraudulently," he said. "It's important not only to stop illegal immigration, but to stop identity theft; there must be safeguards to ensure that someone is actually who he claims to be."

Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Nearly half of the 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens now in the United States entered the country legally, but never left.

Carrying visas and U.S.-approved border crossing cards, they were inspected by immigration officers at 300 sea, air and land ports of entry and many -- according to a year-old U.S. Customs and Border Protection policy -- were told to "Have a nice day."

A little-noticed study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center says 45 percent of America's illegal alien population -- 4.5 million to 6 million -- carried legally issued border crossing cards for short-term visits or business and tourist visas for longer but temporary stays.

Ultimately, they became what the government refers to as "overstayers," hiding in plain sight, working, sending their children to school and using health care services.

"Although Congress authorized several initiatives to track foreign visitors following the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and then again after the September 11 attacks, the U.S. government currently has no means of determining whether all the foreign nationals admitted for temporary stays actually leave the country," said the center, a nonpartisan, nonprofit research group.

The influx continues to stream into America unchecked despite efforts by President Bush to send 6,000 National Guard troops to better secure border areas between the ports of entry, where Congress will spend $1.2 billion to hire and station more U.S. Border Patrol agents.

Michael Cutler, a retired U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) senior agent, said the government is spending billions to secure the border but has "failed miserably" at interior enforcement.

"We are not doing enough to make sure these people leave the country when they are supposed to and that impacts significantly on national security," he said. "Remember, all of the 19 al Qaeda hijackers who slammed jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon entered the country legally.

"There is no high-tech solution to the problem. We have to hire personnel to go out and arrest these people," he said, noting that the government has only about 3,000 agents nationwide to enforce immigration laws in the nation's interior. "We are supposed to be dealing with this issue, but five years after the attacks, we're not doing enough."

The Pew report said that 4 million to 5.5 million illegal aliens entered legally through established ports of entry with tourist or business visas and that 250,000 to 500,000 used border crossing cards.

Steven Camarota, director of research at the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies, said the government has failed to enforce existing immigration laws by denying visas to those deemed likely to overstay -- including persons who are unmarried, have no property, are unemployed or have lived outside of their home countries for a while.

"One such person who fits that category and was in this country legally with a visa was Mohamed Atta, leader of the September 11 hijackers," he said. "We have the ability based on past experience to weed out people with a high probability of overstaying, but it's not being done.

DOJ_NMG_0035330

"The government, under tremendous pressure to issue these visas, has never thought about developing any kind of enforcement strategy for those who overstay their temporary visas," he said.

Homeland Security has sought to target overstays through a program called US-VISIT, a biometric verification system that scans the fingers of each foreign national entering the country and matches them against government databases to verify that the visa holder is the person to whom a visa was issued.

The program, begun in 2004, is in place at 115 airports, 15 seaports and in the secondary inspection areas of 154 land ports of entry, although Mexicans and Canadians entering the country with border crossing cards are not required to complete an arrival-departure record, known as Form I-94, unless they are requesting an extended stay.

US-VISIT exit procedures are operating at 12 airports and two seaports.

The program has identified many terrorists, criminals and other undesirable foreign visitors, but U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the Homeland Security agency responsible for interior enforcement, has only a limited number of personnel assigned to that task -- and most of them have been assigned to find criminal aliens, migrants who were ordered deported but disappeared and those who pose national-security threats.

The Pew report said that when fully implemented, US-VISIT is supposed to provide computerized records of arrivals and departures and a means of checking the identity of visitors with biometric data. In the meantime, it said, "only handwritten forms track some foreign visitors."

"In effect, the government has a pretty good idea of how many people come into the country if they fill out one of the forms, but it does not have a full count of how many leave," the report said.

Mr. Cutler, who headed major drug investigations for INS for two decades, said, "Even if the system was working flawlessly at all the U.S. ports -- logging the entry and exit of foreign nationals and generating many investigative leads -- who's going to respond if they don't hire an adequate number of agents? It's like having a sophisticated 911 system but no cars to send if people call for help."

New Scrutiny Of Illegal Immigrants In Minor Crimes (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — It did not sit right with the sheriff in this law-abiding city that illegal immigrants who landed in his jail for minor crimes were later released into the community and never deported.

The immigrants had been arrested for drunken driving or striking a spouse, usual police blotter material in a foothills county on the eastern rim of the Rockies.

Immigration agents, overwhelmed by a decade-old surge in illegal immigration to Colorado, said they had neither the time nor the resources to pick up the illegal immigrants whose violations were not grave.

But to Sheriff Jim Alderden of Larimer County, the facts seemed plain.

"They violated our borders and then they committed other crimes," Sheriff Alderden said. "I think these offenders should be deported."

Across the country, local law enforcement officials and irritated taxpayers are turning up the pressure on federal immigration authorities to identify illegal immigrants who are behind bars and deport them after they are freed.

Although that has generally been the practice with violent felons, illegal immigrants who commit lesser crimes are often overlooked by federal authorities, who say their resources are scarce.

Now, however, immigration agents say they are beginning to take the first steps to change that. The agents say they are rethinking the triage that led them to pass over the estimated hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants with lesser offenses, even if they were imprisoned.

In some cases, the federal agents are allowing local authorities to screen immigrants to help detect those who should be deported.

In 2005, at least 270,000 illegal immigrants spent time in local jails and state prisons, according to the Justice Department. In federal prisons, more than 35,000 inmates, 19 percent of the total, were immigrants.

Although not all the immigrants in federal prisons were illegal when they went in, their felony convictions made it likely that they would lose any legal status and be required to leave the United States when they came out.

In a report in April, the inspector general of the Homeland Security Department estimated that in the coming year 302,000 immigrants who should be deported upon release would be sent to local jails and state prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0035331

But based on recent deportation results, the inspector general predicted that most of those immigrants would be freed here. Shortages of money, agents and detention beds have created an unofficial "mini-amnesty" for criminal immigrants, the inspector general found.

The country is polarized between those who want a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and those who want to deport them. But just about everyone agrees that the doubly illegal, immigrants with no documents and who have committed crimes, are not welcome.

In some states, the numbers have soared. Up to 25 percent of the 22,000 inmates in the Los Angeles County jails on any day are illegal immigrants, Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the sheriff's office there, said. The county's annual costs for housing the illegal are at least $80 million, Mr. Whitmore said.

In California state prisons, at least 20,000 inmates have been listed for deportation by immigration authorities, officials said.

In Colorado, immigrants behind bars have become part of the debate on the costs of illegal immigration. According to federal figures, Colorado paid $46 million in 2005 for the upkeep of illegal immigrant inmates.

On average, Sheriff Alderden said, about 6 percent of the 546 beds in his spotless jail have been filled by Mexicans, a majority illegal. He estimated that illegal Mexican inmates cost Larimer $1 million a year.

The overall crime rate in the county's immigrant communities is not high, officials said. But jail officers remember many illegal immigrants whom they book repeatedly.

It used to be that when an illegal immigrant's offense was a misdemeanor, "it didn't pay to call immigration," Sheriff Alderden said. Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement said they were busy rounding up violent felons, as the law requires, and most of the felons were in state prisons.

Last month, the situation changed. Under a pilot program, every day the sheriff sends the immigration agency a list of the foreigners in his jail. Federal agents visit regularly to interview those inmates and identify those who have to leave the country.

In the first two weeks, 26 inmates were added to the deportation list.

Fernando Guadarrama, 21, a construction worker from Mexico, was one of the 26 caught in the expanded net. Newly outfitted in an orange jail uniform, Mr. Guadarrama said his bad luck began when an officer pulled over his pickup because the rear license plate light was out. He had just a Mexican driver's license and, overconfident after seven years in the United States, he told the officer that he could not obtain an American one because of his illegal status.

Mr. Guadarrama found himself in the Larimer jail and then in an interview with an immigration agent, on the roster for a quick departure from the United States.

Mr. Guadarrama was philosophical as he made hasty plans to move his Mexican wife and two children, both American citizens, back to Mexico and start a small business there.

"I thank God every day for the United States," he said. "It allowed me to make enough money to have a decent life."

Immigration officials say limited resources had forced them to adopt a "pecking order" of immigrant criminals to detain. But John P. Torres, director of detention and deportation operations at the immigration agency, said it had stepped up screening in city and county jails, focusing on the centers with large numbers of immigrants.

Despite the political furor, there have been no moves to curtail prison terms for illegal immigrants or to deport them before they finish serving their sentences, corrections officials said.

In some states, the agency has signed agreements with corrections departments to let prison staff members screen immigrant inmates. Immigration agents then place "holds" on the immigrants to be deported when they are released.

Now the bottleneck is detention space. A center with 340 beds in Aurora, a Denver suburb, is for all the detained immigrants from Colorado, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, all with booming immigrant populations.

The center is run by the Geo Group of Boca Raton, Fla., a large company in the prison industry. Detainees said the center was clean and orderly. But they live in bunk barracks with at least 24 people to a room, and overcrowding often forces them to sleep in plastic cradles on the floor.

Criminal immigrants are held in a separate wing, with mauve walls. One inmate, María del Carmen Ramírez, 29, said immigration agents determined she had no legal documents in a screening in a county jail. Ms. Ramírez said she had worked for 12 years cleaning the houses of wealthy people in Denver.

"I'm here illegally, like every other Mexican," she said.

She had thrown a punch at her husband in a feud, she said, and he had called the police.

"I didn't hurt an American," Ms. Ramírez said. "I hit one of my own people."

Now scheduled for deportation, Ms. Ramírez said she would leave behind three young children.

DOJ_NMG_0035332

In Colorado, sympathy for immigrants like Ms. Ramírez is dwindling. In 2006, the State Legislature adopted six bills that focused on illegal immigration. They include a law that requires the police to report suspected illegal immigrants to immigration authorities if they are arrested for any crime other than minor traffic violations or domestic violence.

Another measure that Gov. Bill Owens signed last week created a State Patrol unit of 24 officers to combat smuggling.

Republican lawmakers joined with former Gov. Richard D. Lamm, a Democrat, in a campaign to place an item on the ballot in November to bar illegal immigrants from using any state public service, except emergency medical care and public schools.

"We've got enough of our own homegrown criminals," Mr. Lamm said. "Why are we importing more?"

Seeking A Safer Border Crossing; In D.C., Protest Bricks Put To Work (WSJ)

By Jennifer Johnson And Aaron Rutkoff

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Border Lines is a regular look at the best writing on the immigration debate from around the Web. (Some links may require registration or subscription.) * * *

A MEATY ISSUE: A cursory look at census data show immigration patterns now affect many rural areas. In Iowa, to take an example used by blogger Brendan Nyhan last week1, the proportion of foreign-born residents surged in the 2000 Census, making the state home to the 10th-fastest growing immigrant population. But what are they doing there in Iowa?

This week Mr. Nyhan revisits the Iowa example and, with the help of two researchers, determines that Hispanic Hawkeyes tend to follow2 the meat-packing industry. Using a graph of Hispanic population growth since 1990, which is rendered as a sleek topographical map of the state, Mr. Nyhan provides visual evidence that Iowa's Hispanics are most prevalent around major meatpacking plants3.

"Given that many of the Latinos taking the dangerous, grueling jobs in meatpacking facilities are likely to be undocumented immigrants," he concludes, "it's not surprising that Iowans are concerned about the issue of illegal immigration."

But just how dangerous are those meatpacking jobs? On the left-leaning academic blog Crooked Timber, political scientist Henry Farrell catches two major publications at odds4 over conditions at the same North Carolina slaughterhouse.

In the Economist this week, Smithfield Foods' massive Tar Heel plant is heralded as American Dream job for illegal immigrant Alberto Queiroz -- a far cry from the sort of 19th century nightmare depicted in Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle." "Wages of more than $10 an hour enabled [Mr. Queiroz] to buy a house back in Mexico," the magazine attests5. "Cutting up pigs was easier than picking blueberries … because he did not have to toil under the sun all day."

In the New York Times, as Mr. Farrell notes, op-ed columnist Bob Herbert takes a much more critical view6 of the exact same meatpacking plant. Smithfield, he writes this week, is "a case study in both the butchering of hogs (some 32,000 are slaughtered there each day) and the systematic exploitation of vulnerable workers." Most of the plant's 5,500 workers are Latino or black, Mr. Herbert writes, and attempts to unionize Smithfield to provide workplace protections have been repeatedly suppressed. * * *

DEADLY JOURNEY: For some immigrants, the long journey from Mexico to the U.S. "will lead either to a more promising life or an ugly death," writes Dudley Althaus in the Houston Chronicle. A record number of migrants died7 trying to enter the U.S. from the Mexican border last year, he reports, with more than 200 fatalities in Arizona's desert borderlands. More than 100 have been found dead so far this year during what some call "the season of death."

"The great majority of people who come don't comprehend the heat," says Francisco Garcia, who runs a Roman Catholic migrant shelter in Altar, Mexico. "They think they are going to be walking in the shade of the trees. But there are no trees here."

Volunteers in Arizona are trying to prevent these deaths8 by placing water tanks in the desert outside of Tucson. The water stations are marked by blue flags and can be found in areas where the most illegal immigrants have died. "We try to save people from dying from dehydration," said Paula Mich, a volunteer with Humane Borders. * * *

A HOME IN HOUSTON: Many homesick Argentines who flocked to U.S. cities like Miami, Los Angeles and New York during their country's economic collapse are heading home again. But Houston appears to have a greater hold9 on this immigrant group, especially those who came here with a job or started their own business, writes Jenalia Moreno in the Houston Chronicle. "We came to establish roots. We didn't come here to return," says home builder Alejandro Prebisch.

In the wake of Argentina's economic turmoil, about 4,000 Argentines landed in Houston, more than doubling that community's population, Ricardo Gauthier, the Argentine consul general in Houston, says in the article.

Unlike other Argentines who left home with little planning, migrants to Houston obtained work permits, finding jobs at the Texas Medical Center, the energy industry or schools, says Mark Jones, a political science professor at Rice University.

"You don't come to Houston for the weather, and not for the scenery," said Lucy Keeper, a local real-estate agent who moved to the city from Argentina four decades ago. "You come here because you know there's an opportunity to work." * * *

DOJ_NMG_0035333

ENTER AT YOUR OWN RISK: Some Texas ranchers tired of repairing cattle fences damaged by illegal U.S.-Mexico border crossers have installed an easier route -- ladders10. "It's an attempt to get them to use the ladders instead of tearing the fences," said ranch owner Scott Pattinson. But the ladders may look too good to be true. "They ignore it a lot," says Paul Johnson, who owns an exotic game ranch along the Texas border. "They're afraid that they're monitored by the Border Patrol."

Rancher Michael Vickers has taken a harsher approach, and says he has 220 volts of electricity coursing through his fence. "I've had a dose of it myself, it's not fun," he said. "That's just my attitude, why make it easier for them to trespass?" * * *

SOCRATIC METHOD: Classicist Victor Davis Hanson, writing in the Washington Times, looks to Socrates for wisdom11 in the immigration debate. The great Athenian philosopher accepted death by hemlock under his city's laws rather than make an easy escape to exile -- arguing, as Plato tells us, that a consensual society cannot afford to have its members pick and choose which laws to obey.

"Yet few have criticized illegal immigration solely because millions have, with impunity, flouted the law," Mr. Hanson writes. "But Socrates would do just that, and also point to our hypocrisy." Employers are just as liable under this Socratic standard as Mexican migrants, on Mr. Hanson's view: "The employer expects trespassing laws to be enforced to keep vagrants off his premises, but then assumes the same vigilant police will ignore the illegal status of his cheap labor force." * * *

PARSING PENCE: Mark Kirkorian, writing in the National Review, examines a little known but potentially influential attempt to stake out the middle ground12 in the political debate over immigration -- this time from conservative Rep. Mike Pence13 (R., Ind.). "It starts out well enough," says Mr. Kirkorian of the four-step plan. "The first step is securing the border, and he included the entire enforcement bill passed by the House in December (with two minor modifications) in his measure."

From there, in Mr. Kirkorian's analysis, things fall apart. The second step, a rejection of amnesty, flies in the face of step three: a guest-worker program "explicitly designed to allow all illegal aliens to keep their jobs and domiciles in the United States without interruption."

"Step four really takes the cake: a promise -- really, truly, cross-my-heart-and-hope-to-die -- to enforce the ban on hiring illegals in the future," Mr. Kirkorian writes. "This is exactly the bait-and-switch Congress perpetrated in 1986 -- legalization first, enforcement later (i.e., never)." * * *

COMES AT A COST: Students in Round Rock, Texas, a suburb near Austin, are still dealing with the consequences14 from the immigration protest of March. "Across the country, educators punished protesters with detention, suspension, and even canceled their extracurricular activities. But some school districts got the police involved," writes Kris Axtman in the Christian Science Monitor. Students, like Jennifer Avilez, were arrested and issued tickets for violating truancy laws, a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of up to $500, the article says. More than 100 students in Round Rock have decided to either pay a fine or do community service. The other 98 have requested trials.

But a city free-speech ordinance makes the issue unique. Violators must show beyond a reasonable doubt that they were actually exercising their right to assemble, "and not just running roughshod through the city," writes Eric Poteet, with the Round Rock Police Department. He says that only a certain percentage of marchers were actually protesting immigration reform. "The rest were just skipping school." * * *

STRANDED AT THE ALTAR: During one of the busiest months for marriages, wedding plans are on hold15 for 10,000 U.S. citizens seeking visas for their foreign brides and grooms, according to an Associated Press article. Spurred by stories of mail-order brides being abused by their American husbands, Congress approved new protections for the women in December. But the new forms weren't available until March 6. The applications in question are being held because they don't address new visa requirements that help determine the criminal history of potential spouses. "We were ready to get married this year, but I can't really make a date until we get the approval," said Bill Hall, 41, a construction foreman from Burlington, Vt., who applied for visas for his Canadian fiancée and her two sons. * * *

BAD FOR THE JEWS? In a freewheeling op-ed published in the Forward, Stephen Steinlight makes the case that illegal immigration is indeed bad for the Jews16 -- and everyone else. Mr. Steinlight, a policy analyst at the pro-enforcement Center for Immigration Studies and a Jew himself, warns that "massive immigration will obliterate Jewish power by shrinking our percentage of the population -- to a fraction of 1% in 20 years." Moreover, he tackles the assumption that Latino newcomers are little different that the waves of Jewish immigrants of the 20th century: "Jews were refugees and asylum seekers escaping religious persecution, tyranny and pogroms," Mr. Steinlight asserts. "Most immigrants, by contrast, are not refugees: They come to make money."

If Jewish Americans want to truly honor their immigrant heritage, they should do so by improving U.S. support for persecuted refugees and legal immigrants, he concludes, "not by pushing for legislation that betrays America's workers, devastates America's poor, exploits Mexicans, threatens America's social cohesion and endangers Jewish interests." * * *

DOJ_NMG_0035334

SPECIAL DELIVERY: Remember Send-A-Brick.com17, the online campaign that hopes to demonstrate support for a wall along the Mexican border by mailing bricks to politicians? (See earlier coverage18.) At least one part of official Washington has taken note of the campaign. Earlier this month, the Architect of the Capital's office hauled some 2,100 bricks away, according to a report in the Christian Science Monitor19. A spokeswoman at the Architect of the Capitol's office told Border Lines that the bricks were donated to a Washington, D.C., nonprofit organization for public projects.

Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, June 20, 2006

CHICAGO — Despite a federal effort to enlist help from local police to catch illegal immigrants, some of the USA's biggest cities are declining to enforce immigration laws.

Police chiefs, mayors and city councils are ordering local cops not to get involved as federal agents crack down on people in the country illegally.

"Vulnerable people have always needed to see the police as being there to protect and serve, and that can't happen when the first words out of a cop's mouth are, 'I need to see your papers,' " Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement has been visiting police conventions in an effort to have departments join a voluntary program. ICE has trained officers in seven jurisdictions to identify, process and detain illegal immigrants, said Robert Hines, who heads the program started in 1996. Participants include state police in Alabama and Florida, the Arizona corrections department and sheriff's departments in San Bernardino, Los Angeles and Riverside counties in California and Mecklenburg County, N.C.

Several jurisdictions have refused to help. Chicago police and city workers are prohibited from asking immigrants about their legal status. Rybak asked ICE agents last month to stop identifying themselves as "police." New York City's public hospitals promised last month that they would keep secret an immigrant's legal status.

In the broadest signal of opposition, a national group representing 57 big-city police chiefs warned this month that local enforcement of federal immigration laws would "undermine trust and cooperation" among immigrants.

The Major Cities Chiefs Association said in recommendations to President Bush and Congress that police have long worked with federal agents to pursue illegal immigrants suspected of crimes. The group said helping identify those suspected only of being in the USA illegally could backfire.

"We have spent many years … getting special communities to talk to us, to report crime, to be witnesses," said Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt. "If we stop individuals (to ask about immigration status), we would lose all of that."

The association — including police chiefs from Los Angeles, Detroit, Seattle and Miami — said most departments can't afford to spend time quizzing immigrants. Members fear that "the call for local enforcement of immigration laws signals the beginning of a trend towards local police agencies being asked to enter other areas of federal regulation or enforcement."

Hines said, "The cooperation we get for the most part is outstanding." Illegal immigration "is all of our problem, because these people are here in violation of law."

Immigration Consensus (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Finally a consensus has been reached on immigration. No, not among politicians, who can't agree on a rational immigration reform. The agreement is among professional economists.

In an open letter to President Bush and Congress last week, more than 500 prominent economists, including five Nobel laureates, proclaim that "immigration has been a net gain for American citizens." The letter adds that "while a small percentage of native-born Americans may be harmed by immigration, vastly more Americans benefit from the contributions that immigrants make to the economy, including lower consumer prices. As with trade in goods and services, gains from immigration outweigh the losses." Alan Greenspan often made this same point about the benefits of immigration while he was Federal Reserve Chairman.

What is striking about this immigration letter is that it is signed by economists from different fields of research, political affiliations and ideologies. It is possible that no other issue in the economic field, with the exception of the benefits of free trade, inspires such unanimity of professional opinion as immigration does.

Several years ago the Cato Institute surveyed the past presidents of the American Economic Association and the past chairmen of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Eighty percent agreed that immigration has had "a very favorable impact on the nation's economic growth," and 70% said that even illegal immigrant workers "have a positive economic impact."

DOJ_NMG_0035335

These experts agree that on balance immigrants don't displace native workers, depress wages or abuse welfare. If only these economic facts could break through an immigration debate that is dominated by emotion and political fear.

TAX:

Executive Accused Of Tax Fraud And Witness Intimidation (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The owner of the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker was arrested yesterday morning at his California home and charged with orchestrating a tax fraud that cost the government nearly $20 million as well as intimidating witnesses and a federal agent investigating the case.

Gene F. Haas, 54, of Camarillo, Calif., the owner of Haas Automation and other companies, was accused in a 52-page indictment of running a bogus invoicing scheme to create fake tax deductions. Mr. Haas was held without bail after his arraignment in Federal District Court in Los Angeles.

In court papers asking that Mr. Haas be held until his trial, the Justice Department said that he could flee the country in his Cessna jet and head for China, where he has business interests. The Justice Department said China did not have a treaty allowing extradition of accused tax cheats. It called him a flight risk, saying he has few ties to the community, is single, has no children and faces about 20 years in prison if convicted.

Haas Automation, in a statement, said that Mr. Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues "revolve around" the company's former chief financial officer, John Phillips. It said the indictment would have no effect on the business.

Last month, Haas Automation won, by default, a lawsuit filed in Ventura County Superior Court accusing Mr. Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million.

The transactions described in that lawsuit are among those listed in the federal indictment, Peter Zierhut, the company spokesman, confirmed.

Mr. Phillips, identified only by his initials in the indictment, went to the F.B.I. in April 2001 and told them that he had been ordered by Mr. Haas eight months earlier to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said. Mr. Phillips is an unindicted co-conspirator.

The indictment identified Charles W. Todd of Minden, Nev., as the owner of a nonexistent company, Supermill, doing business as American Putter, that was paid $12 million for sham purchase orders and then funneled 98 percent of that back to Mr. Haas. Mr. Todd appeared in Federal District Court in Los Angeles yesterday and agreed to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges, the Justice Department said.

Another man, Kenneth Greene of Simi Valley, Calif., also agreed yesterday to plead guilty over his role in aiding the tax fraud.

Denis A. Dupuis, 51, of Newbury Park, Calif., a former general manager of Haas Automation, and Robert G. Cable, 73, of La Crescenta, Calif., a former salesman for the firm, were indicted, accused of helping fabricate the tax deductions. They were paid about 2 percent of the $23 million in face value of the sham invoices, the indictment said.

The other 98 percent of the money was funneled back to Mr. Haas, according to the indictment. It said Mr. Haas cheated the government out of $12.5 million on his personal tax returns and $7.7 million on Haas Automation's returns in 2000 and 2001.

The indictment also described two other invoicing schemes. One involved a Nascar race team sponsored by Haas Automotive and the other a land title company. The indictment gave few details other than stating that all the money paid in those two schemes was funneled back to Mr. Haas, suggesting that he may have operated them without confederates.

"The tax fraud schemes in this case stem from defendant Haas's dislike of the federal judicial system and anger towards a federal judge (Judge Leonie M. Brinkema) who presided over a patent infringement suit" that Mr. Haas lost in August 2000, according to the court papers. The indictment said that the primary purpose of the "tax fraud schemes was to recoup the patent infringement settlement payment by defrauding" the government.

The Justice Department said that when Mr. Haas learned that Mr. Phillips had gone to the F.B.I., he told him, "Don't make me hurt you." The indictment and related papers cite this as the first of a number of efforts by Mr. Haas and an unnamed private investigator to intimidate witnesses and an Internal Revenue Service special agent, with threats of financial and physical harm for themselves or their families.

The indictment said one witness, a partner with Mr. Phillips in a Kansas flower shop, told the authorities about threats by the private investigator, but she recanted them after developing a "personal relationship" with the private investigator.

DOJ_NMG_0035336

Last year, President Bush cited Haas Automation's success in exporting machine tools as a reason to adopt a free trade agreement with Central American countries.

Key House Lawmaker Reveals Estate Tax Plan (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP2, June 20, 2006

The House's top tax writer revealed a proposal Monday to reduce taxes on inherited estates and rewrite a quirky law that repeals the tax for only one year.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., introduced the bill after Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked House GOP leaders for help reducing the estate tax before this fall's midterm elections.

Frist lost a bid this month to push forward legislation repealing the tax, unable to overcome opposition from most Democrats and a pair of Republicans.

Under President Bush's first tax cut, the estate tax decreases through the decade as the size of an estate exempt from taxation increases and the top tax rate decreases. This year, $2 million of an individual's estate and $4 million of a couple's is exempt from taxation. The remainder can be taxed at rates as high as 46 percent.

Bush's law abolishes the tax in 2010. But that temporary law expires a year later, and the estate tax reappears. Without a new law, an individual's exemption falls to $1 million and tax rates increase to 55 percent in 2011.

Thomas would instead increase the exemption to $5 million per person, or $10 million per couple, beginning in 2010. A surviving spouse could use any portion of the $5 million exemption not used by his or her deceased spouse.

Estates worth up to $25 million would be taxed at rates equal to capital gains rates, currently 15 percent. Estates worth $25 million or more would be taxed at rates twice those in place for capital gains, currently 30 percent.

The structure of the proposal matches one advanced in the Senate by Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has worked for a year to try to strike a compromise with Democrats interested in lowering estate tax rates.

Kyl, however, proposed taxing estates worth up to $30 million, instead of $25 million, at capital gains tax rates. Thomas also included a new deduction for capital gains on timber in his bill.

Frist has said he wants to see a bill completed by the end of the month, before lawmakers recess to celebrate Independence Day.

___

On the Net:

Ways and Means Committee: http://waysandmeans.house.gov/

House Republicans May Settle For A Muted Estate-Tax Reduction (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In what could be a big step toward lowering estate taxes, House Republicans will vote this week on compromise legislation that would eliminate the levy for all but the richest Americans.

House approval of the proposal would likely force a vote on similar legislation in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats have been at loggerheads over the tax for years. House leaders in the past had said they would settle for nothing short of full repeal.

House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of California introduced legislation yesterday evening that would reduce the number of Americans subject to the estate tax by raising the per-person threshold for the tax to estates valued at more than $5 million beginning in 2010.

Mr. Thomas would set the tax rate for estates valued at less than $25 million to the capital-gains rate, currently 15%. The value of estates above $25 million would be taxed at a rate equal to twice the capital-gains rate. The new legislation would retain the "step up" in basis and would unify the estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes.

To appeal to a few key Senate Democrats, Mr. Thomas included incentives for the timber industry. The legislation includes a new 60% deduction for qualified timber capital gains. House Republicans would like to approve the legislation this week, so the Senate would have time for a vote this summer.

The House has approved a full repeal of the estate tax several times. But in the Senate, Democrats have prevented Republicans from getting the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster. In a test vote earlier this month, the Senate fell three votes short.

DOJ_NMG_0035337

When compromise talks between Republicans and Democrats in the Senate failed to yield results, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked his House counterpart, Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, to propose a deal that could clear both chambers.

The specifics of the plan are less important than the fact that House leaders have decided to move forward with something less than full repeal. The shift represents the changing dynamic in Washington. Though Republicans have a majority in both houses of Congress, the party is expected to lose seats in the November elections. As a result, many Republican leaders believe now is the best chance to permanently reduce estate taxes.

Congress enacted a temporary phaseout of the estate tax when President Bush took office in 2001, but tax rates will snap back to as high as 55% when the bill expires in 2011. Under current law, $2 million of an estate is exempted from estate taxes for an individual, $4 million for a couple. The tax rate is now as high as 47%.

About 12,600 estates will be subject to estate taxes for the 2006 filing season, according to the Tax Policy Center.

Mr. Thomas's legislation aims to pick up the three Democratic votes in the Senate needed for passage. Republicans hope the plan can win the support of a few Senate Democrats who voted against full repeal earlier this month.

The new House bill tracks a proposal from Arizona Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, which would exempt all but 3,600 estates from the tax, the Tax Policy Center estimates. Mr. Kyl's plan would cost the government $275 billion over the next decade, according to his office.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The topic was the largest defense procurement scandal in recent decades, and the two investigators for the Pentagon's inspector general in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's office on April 1, 2005, asked the secretary to raise his hand and swear to tell the truth.

Rumsfeld agreed but complained. "I find it strange," he said to the investigators, on the grounds that as a government official "the laws apply to me" anyway.

It was a bumpy start to an odd interview, as Rumsfeld cited poor memory, loose office procedures, and a general distraction with "the wars" in Iraq and Afghanistan to explain why he was unsure how his department came to nearly squander $30 billion leasing several hundred new tanker aircraft that its own experts had decided were not needed.

Then-Inspector General Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last year to take a job with a defense contractor, told senators at a June 2005 hearing that the transcript of Rumsfeld's interview was deleted from his 256-page report on the tanker lease scandal because Rumsfeld had not said anything relevant.

But a copy of the transcript, obtained recently by The Washington Post under the Freedom of Information Act after a year-long wait, says a lot about how little of Rumsfeld's attention has been focused on weapons-buying -- a function that consumes nearly a fifth of the $410 billion defense budget, exclusive of expenditures in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The issue is relevant because a series of reports, including others by the inspector general and by the Government Accountability Office, indicate that five years into the Bush administration, the department's system of buying new weapons is broken and dysfunctional.

"DOD is simply not positioned to deliver high-quality products in a timely and cost-effective fashion," the comptroller general of the United States, David M. Walker, said in a little-noticed April 5 critique. The Pentagon, he said, has "a long-standing track record of over-promising and un-delivering with virtual impunity."

Walker based his blistering assessment on a detailed study of 52 different weapons costing a total of $850 billion, including five new multibillion-dollar weapons systems with cost overruns amounting to nearly 30 percent. "The all too-frequent result is that large and expensive programs are continually rebaselined, cut back or even scrapped after years of failing to achieve promised capability," he said. "A lot of it is because in the past, where there have been unacceptable outcomes, there hasn't been any accountability."

Some of the blame, Walker suggested, should be laid at Rumsfeld's office, which "does not seem to be pushing" for the dramatic overhaul of the Pentagon's system needs.

The tanker procurement scandal is the poster child for these problems. The Air Force in 2004 canceled its plan to lease the tankers from the Boeing Co., amid allegations of improper collusion with the company. Former Air Force procurement officer

DOJ_NMG_0035338

Darleen A. Druyun and one of the interlocutors at Boeing were sent to prison; subsequent investigations showed that Druyun manipulated other large Air Force contracts to benefit military contractors.

After a Senate investigation unearthed evidence that the tanker purchase was viewed inside the Pentagon as a politically tinged bailout for Boeing, Air Force Secretary James G. Roche and his top acquisitions deputy resigned from government. Boeing's chief executive was replaced, and last month the firm agreed to pay $615 million to settle all liability for the tanker scandal and an unrelated impropriety. It was the largest penalty paid by a defense contractor.

But the scandal never tarnished Rumsfeld, and in the previously undisclosed interview, conducted with principal Deputy General Counsel Daniel J. Dell'Orto at his side, the defense secretary makes clear that he does wars, not defense procurement. As a result, he could not recollect details of what subordinates told him about the tanker lease or what he said to them.

Rumsfeld is a former business executive and White House official who published a set of "Rumsfeld's Rules" that include the injunction: "Be precise -- a lack of precision is dangerous." But when investigators asked him whether he had approved the Boeing tanker lease in May 2003 -- despite widespread violations of Pentagon and government-wide procurement rules along the way -- Rumsfeld said: "I don't remember approving it. But I certainly don't remember not approving it, if you will."

Asked whether his subordinates, including former undersecretary of defense Edward C. "Pete" Aldridge, had accurately invoked Rumsfeld's approval when they signed documents authorizing the Boeing tanker lease to go forward, Rumsfeld said, "I may very well have said yes. I just don't remember. . . . I am not going to sit here and quibble over it." He did say he remembered approving a gun for a tank in 1976, during his first time as defense secretary.

When pressed about the tanker lease -- the largest such lease in U.S. history -- Rumsfeld offered two explanations for his distance from it. The first was related to his focus on what he called "the global war on terror," including the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and what he termed the "continuing difficulties" with the Taliban and al-Qaeda.

"My time basically in the department was focused on those things and certainly not on acquisitions or -- or what have you," Rumsfeld said. "Basically I spend an overwhelming portion of my time with the combatant commanders and functioning as the link between the president . . . and the combatant commanders conducting the wars."

Asked if he was aware of concerns about the proposed Air Force lease from Capitol Hill and the Pentagon's own analysts, Rumsfeld responded, "I don't know what I knew then, compared to what I know now. . . . I am not able to go back and say . . . what did I know at a certain moment back in that period."

He also indicated that his office procedures are loose. "I work in here, I am going to guess, 12 hours a day. . . . I also know that people come in and out of this office all the time. Send me memos, half of which I -- are appropriate for me to have, some of which aren't, which I don't read. And call or come in and say I am going to do this or what do you think about that."

Rumsfeld said that given "all of those hours and hours in meetings and questions," he couldn't "say of certain knowledge" whether he provided any guidance about the lease to subordinates. He assumed, he said, that they were following "the normal rules that would apply to what it is they do."

This perplexed one of the investigators, who asked how Rumsfeld knew the information he got about the tankers was reliable if established procurement procedures were not followed. "In terms of knowledge that -- that -- from that period, I am without it," Rumsfeld replied.

The investigators tried a different tack. Tell us, one said, about the extent and nature of conversations with the White House about the tanker lease. The question related to the fact that in 2002 President Bush asked then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. to help reach a deal between the Pentagon and Boeing, which had substantial clout on Capitol Hill and was a major contributor to Bush's inaugural celebration.

"I have been told," Rumsfeld said, "that discussions with the president are privileged, and with his immediate staff." Large portions of text on the next five pages of the 38-page interview transcript were blacked out in the copy provided to The Post.

Part of the controversy over the tanker deal involved the department's failure to conduct an "Analysis of Alternatives" -- a routine comparison of options mandated by Pentagon rules before any large-scale weapons acquisition. When one investigator started asking about this, Rumsfeld demurred. "You are way out of my league on all of this," he said.

Rumsfeld went on to express frustration that some lawmakers responded to the scandal by blocking the promotions or new appointments of those involved. "We have practically no one left on the civilian side of the Air Force. . . . And the . . . damage that was done by the way this was handled has been terrible." Fortunately, he added, the lease "did not go through" because of "people in the Senate and others, whistleblowers, or whoever did what they did."

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman responded about two weeks ago that Rumsfeld views his role as setting top-level policy and keeping abreast of acquisition issues, not becoming involved in "day-to-day programmatic decisions." He created a video message stressing the importance of ethics in weapons-buying, Whitman said.

DOJ_NMG_0035339

But in the past six years, while Rumsfeld occasionally mentioned procurement problems in his public appearances, he delivered only one major speech about the need for reform in how the Pentagon buys weapons. He complained in the speech that "our financial systems are decades old" and noted estimates that "we cannot track $2.3 trillion in transactions." He also said that the acquisition process was being improved and that "we now budget based on realistic estimates."

Rumsfeld's speech was delivered on Sept. 10, 2001.

Rice's Top Deputy To Leave State Department (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, one of the administration's most prominent figures in foreign and economic policy, said yesterday that he is resigning to join the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Zoellick's interest in leaving his high-profile post had long been rumored, but it leaves a large hole in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's foreign policy team. Zoellick spearheaded efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and was the administration's main interlocutor in the delicate relationship between the United States and China.

In a ceremony in the Benjamin Franklin Room of the State Department, Rice said she was "deeply honored" that Zoellick had agreed to be her deputy and was making the announcement "not without considerable sadness."

In a one-hour interview Friday, Zoellick, 52, said he was leaving 16 months after he started because he had accomplished his objective of helping Rice set up her management team and get her tenure as secretary of state off to a fast start.

"The secretary is clearly up and running quite well," Zoellick said. "We now have a very good team, a team considered -- false modesty here -- one of the best, if not the best, Cabinet teams around."

Zoellick said he approached Rice early this year and told her that he was ready to move on. He had planned to stay until after Chinese President Hu Jintao visited Washington in April, but his departure was delayed because he became involved in rescuing faltering Darfur peace talks held in Nigeria.

Zoellick also felt that with Rice's key initiatives launched -- and Rice now such a high-profile figure around the globe -- that he would be left with increasingly lower-priority issues.

"We are at a point where with the major initiatives, they really have got to be driven by the secretary, in terms of the conduct of it. It's the way foreign policy works," Zoellick said. "The nature of the deputy job is you get a smorgasbord of what I'll call the second- and third- and fourth-order issues."

Zoellick handled less of the day-to-day management of State than his predecessor, Richard L. Armitage, and instead was given a meaty portfolio of foreign policy issues. Besides China and Sudan, they included Latin America, Southeast Asia, and economic and political reform in the Middle East.

Even the two issues for which he is best known -- Sudan and China -- have reached a certain plateau, Zoellick said. With the signing of the Darfur Peace Agreement by at least one rebel group, the focus will be on the implementation of the pact, he said. On China, Zoellick held a series of high-level talks with Chinese officials and in a major speech last year reframed U.S. policy and put forth the idea that the United States wanted China to be a "responsible stakeholder" in the world.

"This is not activity that will be solved in one year or two years," he said.

During President Bush's first term, Zoellick served as U.S. trade representative, a Cabinet position. After the president's reelection, Zoellick appeared on track to be selected as Bush's nominee as World Bank president when Rice unexpectedly approached him about the deputy secretary's job. (Former deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz instead got the World Bank post.)

Zoellick took the sub-Cabinet post with some misgivings, and there was little expectation he would stay a full four years. He recently has been mentioned for other Cabinet posts such as energy or Treasury secretary. Bush last month nominated Goldman Sachs chief Henry Paulson as Treasury secretary.

Zoellick said he is helping Paulson, an old friend, with the transition to Treasury, including assistance in hiring a staff. Zoellick will be a managing director and vice chairman of Goldman Sachs's international division.

Zoellick had a long association with Rice. He and two other top Rice aides, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns and Counselor Philip Zelikow, worked closely with Rice on the reunification of Germany during the administration of George H.W. Bush. Zoellick at the time was a top aide to Secretary of State James A. Baker III while Rice, Burns and Zelikow worked on the National Security Council staff.

As trade representative, Zoellick forged close connections in Congress and with economic officials around the world, filling in a gap in Rice's background. He also brought State Department experience from his period with Baker, whom Rice viewed as one of her models for running the department, though Zoellick is no fan of the State Department bureaucracy.

DOJ_NMG_0035340

Zoellick said he and Rice had a "very comfortable relationship" and he provided counsel on a range of matters. "I can almost read sometimes where she is a little uncomfortable on something so I can make a push," he said.

Randall L. Tobias, director of U.S. foreign assistance and former chief executive of Eli Lilly & Co., and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt are potential candidates to succeed Zoellick. Kimmitt, however, may have been politically damaged by his involvement in the decision to approve the controversial sale of U.S. port operations to a Dubai-based company.

Burns also is frequently mentioned but appears unlikely to make the final cut because he is a career Foreign Service officer and not a political appointee.

Zoellick To Quit State Department For Goldman (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Susanne Craig

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Robert Zoellick, the State Department's No. 2 diplomat and lead voice on China policy, will leave next month to join Goldman Sachs Group Inc. as vice chairman, international.

Mr. Zoellick's departure will leave a vacuum in the Bush administration's China team, which Mr. Zoellick has led since early last year, while further burnishing Goldman's image as a mixing bowl for past and future top government officials. President Bush recently picked Goldman Sachs Chief Executive Henry Paulson as his next Treasury secretary. Former President Bill Clinton's Treasury chief, Robert Rubin, hailed from the same New York firm.

In his resignation letter, Mr. Zoellick said he was particularly proud of having "reframed" the administration's approach toward China. In a speech last summer, Mr. Zoellick called on China to become a "responsible stakeholder" in the international system. He also led a series of high-level dialogues between Washington and Beijing.

The former U.S. trade representative led a complex effort to stop the war in the western Sudanese region of Darfur. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Mr. Zoellick as her "alter ego" but hasn't immediately named a successor.

U.S. officials say the likeliest candidates to succeed Mr. Zoellick are Nicholas Burns, the State Department's current No. 3 and an important player on Iran and India policy; Robert Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary; and Philip Zelikow, a special adviser to Ms. Rice.

Mr. Burns, a longtime foreign-service officer and former State Department spokesman, has become more active on many fronts than Mr. Zoellick was and is close to Ms. Rice.

Mr. Zoellick will join Goldman in September as a managing director and chairman of the firm's international advisers. In an internal memo sent to employees yesterday, incoming Goldman Sachs Chief Executive and Chairman Lloyd C. Blankfein said Mr. Zoellick will play a central role in advising Goldman on the firm's global strategy.

"Secretary Zoellick brings tremendous experience and judgment to the firm," said Mr. Blankfein, currently Goldman's president and chief operating officer. "His extensive knowledge of international affairs will be of great importance to the firm as we continue to expand our business around the world."

No. 2 State Department Official Resigns To Join Wall Street Firm (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said Monday that he would be leaving his post as the State Department's second in command, as expected, to join the Wall Street investment house Goldman Sachs Group Inc. as a managing director.

Bush administration officials said the search was now on to find a replacement for Mr. Zoellick, a six- year administration veteran who spent his first four years as the United States trade representative.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, who is the department's third-ranking official, would be the logical front-runner for the job. Administration officials say Robert M. Kimmitt, the deputy Treasury secretary, is also in the running.

Mr. Burns, while close to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, is a career Foreign Service officer whose rise accelerated during the Clinton administration, when he served on the staff of the National Security Council, as State Department spokesman and as ambassador to Greece. He was appointed the American representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization during President Bush's first term.

Mr. Kimmitt, a former American ambassador to Germany, served in several posts in the administration of President Bush's father, including under secretary of state for political affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0035341

He is widely respected in Washington, but some administration officials worry that Senate confirmation might be made difficult by his role in a decision this year to allow a company owned by the emirate of Dubai to take over operations at five American ports. The company, Dubai Ports, pulled out of the deal after it was denounced by Congressional Republicans as well as Democrats.

The departure of Mr. Zoellick has been widely anticipated. He was considered for Treasury secretary, but President Bush nominated Henry M. Paulson Jr., chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs.

During an interview on Friday, Mr. Zoellick said he had wanted the Treasury job but added that he understood why Mr. Bush had made the decision he did. "If it were a choice between Hank Paulson and me, I'd choose Hank Paulson," he said.

As Ms. Rice's deputy, Mr. Zoellick was the primary architect of the administration's policy toward Sudan and particularly the response to the crisis in Darfur. In May at talks in Abuja, Nigeria, he pushed Darfur's rebel leaders to sign a peace accord.

He was known in Sudan for understanding the many facets of the country and its people, reciting tribal names, affiliations and political leanings.

He is widely considered to be one of the administration's most experienced foreign policy hands.

But Mr. Zoellick's years as trade representative are regarded as more notable than his time at the State Department. He successfully managed the start of the world trade negotiations, still under way, that are meant to lower tariffs on manufacturing products and, more significantly, to reduce agriculture subsidies.

Mr. Zoellick also successfully managed the deeply divisive fight in Congress to obtain "fast track" authority for Mr. Bush to negotiate trade pacts that Congress can approve or reject but not amend.

As the trade representative, Mr. Zoellick worked closely with officials from developing countries. One of the first things he did in the job was to reaffirm a late policy shift by the Clinton administration that put the need for access to cheaper AIDS drugs in poor countries above the desires of American drug companies seeking to protect their patents.

Mr. Zoellick said he expected to stay on the job at the State Department until the middle of July.

Zoellick Takes Senior Post At Goldman (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

Robert Zoellick, US deputy secretary of state and former US trade representative, announced on Monday he would leave the government to take up a senior post at Goldman Sachs.

His resignation to take the job of vice-chairman, international, for Goldman Sachs is the latest in a string of departures of long-serving officials from the administration of President George W. Bush. These have included Andrew Card, White House chief of staff, and John Snow, Treasury secretary.

Mr Zoellick had been telling friends and colleagues for several months that he was preparing to leave the government after more than six years in the Bush administration but that he might stay if he were offered the Treasury job.

Mr Zoellick told the Financial Times he had hoped to be named Treasury secretary but never expected it. He praised the nomination of Hank Paulson, former chief executive of Goldman Sachs, who is now awaiting Senate confirmation. “If I had a choice between Hank Paulson and me, I’d choose Hank Paulson,” he said.

Mr Zoellick, who served four years as US trade representative before joining the State Department in February 2005, said he was leaving the department with a strong team in place and the issues under his direct responsibility well in hand. “The things I could do at the deputy level I feel I have accomplished,” he said.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, praised him as “one of my closest and most valued advisers on every single international issue”. She made no announcement on a replacement.

During his time at the State Department, Mr Zoellick led US efforts to respond to the crisis in Darfur, helping to negotiate a peace agreement in Sudan last month. He also played a big role in US relations with China, spelling out the administration’s approach in a speech last year in which he called for China to be-come a “responsible stakeholder” in the international system. Mr Zoellick served in the state and Treasury departments under President George H. W. Bush and was executive vice-president at Fannie Mae, the US mortgage group, from 1993 to 1997.

His move to Goldman Sachs continues the revolving door between the US’s most prestigious investment bank and Washington. He will rejoin – though probably only temporarily – John Rogers, his former state and Treasury department colleague who is Mr Paulson’s chief of staff and is likely to accompany Mr Paulson to Treasury.

Goldman said Mr Zoellick would “play a central role in advising the firm on its global strategy in both developing and developed markets”.

DOJ_NMG_0035342

There are no clear indications of who might be named to succeed Mr Zoellick at the State Department. Nicholas Burns, the under-secretary of state for political affairs, is thought to be a frontrunner, as is Bob Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary.

State's Zoellick Resigns (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, who has played a key role in the Bush administration on issues ranging from global trade to Sudan's civil war, announced yesterday that he will leave his post to take a top Wall Street job.

The decision by Mr. Zoellick, the top aide to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was widely expected after President Bush last month named Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry M. Paulson to replace departing Treasury Secretary John W. Snow -- a job for which Mr. Zoellick also had been a candidate.

Ironically, the 52-year-old Mr. Zoellick has been hired by Mr. Paulson's old firm and will chair Goldman Sachs' international operations when he steps down, probably next month.

Miss Rice praised her deputy, saying at a State Department press briefing that she had worked closely with him since the first days of the Bush presidency, when she was national security adviser and he was U.S. trade representative.

"You have helped to guide American diplomacy with principle and prudence at a time when there are few precedents for action," she said.

Mr. Zoellick told reporters he happily would have accepted the Treasury post, but praised the choice of Mr. Paulson and said his decision to leave after more than five years in the administration was "independent of that."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Zoellick "has been wanting to pursue options in the private sector, and now he's doing it."

Neither Miss Rice nor Mr. Zoellick would speculate publicly on who might take over the deputy secretary's post. Among those mentioned in the early handicapping are former pharmaceutical executive Randall Tobias, recently named to a new post as overseer of all U.S. aid programs, and Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, the department's No. 3 official.

Mr. Zoellick's selection by Miss Rice in early 2005 was seen as a victory for foreign-policy "realists" in the administration against the hard-line diplomacy favored by Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who were said to back State Department arms chief John R. Bolton. Mr. Bush used a recess appointment to make Mr. Bolton ambassador to the United Nations after a deadlocked Senate failed to confirm him.

Popular on Capitol Hill, the brainy, demanding Mr. Zoellick took charge of some major portfolios under Miss Rice, notably the strategic dialogue with Beijing and the crisis in Sudan's Darfur region. He also served as an economic aide under the first President Bush.

Darfur activists give him credit with pushing the negotiations that produced a cease-fire last month between the Sudanese government and the main faction of the largest rebel group.

But he was a less colorful figure than his outspoken predecessor, Richard Armitage, who was close politically and personally to former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

It was Mr. Burns who took the lead on several high-profile issues in recent days, notably the drive against Iran's nuclear programs and the talks that produced a major new nuclear accord with India.

Mr. Zoellick received relatively strong marks as U.S. trade representative, signing a number of bilateral free-trade deals and pushing for open global markets by helping to start the current "Doha round" of trade talks.

But Miss Rice teased her strait-laced, Harvard-educated deputy yesterday over a widely reprinted photo of Mr. Zoellick cradling a panda cub during one of his trips to China.

"We needed a deputy who would get up his courage, roll up his sleeves, and occasionally even hug a panda," she said.

Zoellick, State Dept.'s Strategist On Darfur And China, To Resign (LAT)

By Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The No. 2 official in the State Department, Robert B. Zoellick, announced Monday that he is resigning, leaving his role as point man on U.S. efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and on U.S. policy toward China.

Zoellick said he is quitting the job of deputy secretary of State after 16 months to join the New York-based investment firm Goldman Sachs.

DOJ_NMG_0035343

"I've accomplished what I've set out to do and it's time for me to step down," Zoellick told reporters, noting that he worked in the Bush administration — first as U.S. trade representative, a Cabinet position, then as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice — for more than five years.

Zoellick, a hard-driving man with a reputation as a brilliant policy strategist in the administration of President Bush's father, worked on the mission of ending the violence in Darfur, where more than 180,000 civilians have been killed as a byproduct of fighting between rebels and the Sudanese government.

He traveled frequently to Africa and, aides said, delayed his resignation to fly to Nigeria last month to help push one of Darfur's rebel factions to sign a peace accord.

Rice has not decided who will inherit Zoellick's responsibilities for the Darfur issue and has not settled on a nominee for his job as deputy secretary of State, said a senior State Department official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity while discussing internal deliberations. Officials said Rice's director of foreign aid programs, Randall L. Tobias, is a leading candidate.

Zoellick said Monday that the U.S. had done everything it could to stop the violence in Darfur. "That isn't to say that I'm not heartbroken by seeing the things that happen" there, he said in an interview on "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," a Public Broadcasting Service show.

"There's a lot of follow-up work to do," he acknowledged. "This peace accord … is just an opening…. There's no doubt that it's going to take a long time."

In addition to Darfur, Zoellick also oversaw the administration's complex relationship with China, and prided himself on coining a term for the role the United States has urged Beijing to play: a "responsible stakeholder" in world affairs. The American business term "stakeholder" kept Chinese translators busy for months with its ambiguity — just as Zoellick hoped it would, another official said.

Rice, in a public statement accepting Zoellick's resignation, praised him as "a seasoned diplomat [and] a masterful strategist … a deputy who would get up his courage and roll up his sleeves and occasionally even hug a panda."

She was referring to an incident last year when, on a visit to China, the normally stiff Zoellick was suddenly presented by Chinese officials with a live baby panda. (It was a double-edged honor; "panda-hugger" is conservative jargon for a U.S. official who has gone soft on Beijing.)

Friends said Zoellick, who served in the Treasury and State departments in the administration of former President George H.W. Bush, would have stayed in government if the current president had named him Treasury secretary when that job became open earlier this year.

Zoellick acknowledged that he would have been enticed by the job. "If you're someone like me who is interested in public service, those are attractive possibilities," he told reporters.

But he said he had decided to leave the State Department months ago, and was not leaving because he did not get the Cabinet post.

Bush nominated Goldman Sachs chairman Henry M. Paulson Jr. for the Treasury job last month.

"I certainly knew I'd always be a contender [for the job], as the president and others told me, but … if I were the president, and I had a choice in Hank Paulson, I'd pick Hank Paulson," Zoellick said.

Paulson's old firm, Goldman Sachs, said Zoellick would carry the title, "vice chairman, international," and advise the investment bank on global strategy.

Polygraph Test Results Vary Among Agencies (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The National Security Agency denied a top-secret clearance to David Vermette this year after two polygraph tests. But the computer programmer still has access to sensitive, classified information -- from the CIA, which independently cleared him after administering its own "lie detector" test.

The FBI recently ran a background check on Wayne Johnson, which led to a five-year extension of his top-secret White House clearance. But when Johnson applied for a job at the FBI itself, the agency made him an offer -- then rescinded it after a polygraph exam.

The Defense Department has long issued Tara Wilk a top-secret clearance. But when Wilk tried to get similar clearance from the NSA, she failed three tests -- leaving her so frustrated she sought help from a hypnotist and a therapist.

In a region where a security clearance is a necessary ticket to countless jobs with the federal government and its thousands of contractors, it is not hard to find people caught in turf wars over clearance. Polygraph tests are often at the root of the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0035344

"The CIA doesn't respect the NSA's polygraph and the NSA doesn't respect the CIA's polygraph," said Wilk, a computer engineer from Arnold, Md. "Nobody knows who the boss is, and they all think they are the most important."

The government recognizes the problem and plans to harmonize the process across the intelligence community, but Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte cannot say when that will happen, said spokesman John Callahan. "The goal is to streamline and fix things and make things better," he said.

"The legislation which founded the DNI actually requires the DNI have as one of its goals to unify this process," he said.

Even those who believe in the value of polygraphs acknowledge that they are far from objective. Using a polygraph device, which measures changes in heart rate and breathing as well as other cues to detect anxiety, is like searching in a dark room for an object whose shape is unknown. It is the examiner's job not only to figure out if someone is a spy but also to search for character flaws or past actions -- drug use, for instance -- that might make a person unfit to handle sensitive information.

Since polygraph examiners typically do not know what to look for in a candidate, they tend to home in on anything that hints at reticence or nervousness, said John Sullivan, who spent three decades at the CIA administering the tests and still supports them. During his career, he said, he used the tests to unmask seven double agents and spotted numerous criminal and character problems.

But Sullivan said that after the agency's polygraphers failed for years to detect the duplicity of Aldrich H. Ames, who compromised dozens of CIA operations by passing information to the Soviet Union before being sent to prison in 1994, agency examiners ratcheted up the level of intimidation during tests.

Sullivan believes polygraphers can elicit useful information without resorting to threats and harassment. But after Ames's case, he said, CIA examiners were told that if their subjects did not complain about rough handling, the examiners probably were not doing their job correctly: "People in many cases are too aggressive . . . we were so afraid of getting beat."

Asked why examiners disagree with one another, Sullivan said that interpreting polygraphs is more "art than science" and that examiners at different agencies range from "Rembrandts" to "finger-painters."

"I myself and most of my colleagues caught people who passed other people's polygraph examinations," said Sullivan, who is retired. "I don't want to disparage anyone else's program, but I really feel up until Ames, [the CIA] had the best polygraph program in the government."

Paul Gimigliano, a CIA spokesman, declined to discuss individual cases. But he said that "large numbers of highly qualified officers" have been cleared and hired after the agency's polygraph tests.

Don Weber, an NSA spokesman, also would not discuss individual cases but said the agency issues clearances based on approvals by other agencies. Slightly more than one in five contractor clearances last year were issued this way, he said. A number of factors influence why the NSA thinks more security procedures are needed for some people, he said.

Vermette, the computer programmer, said the six exams he has taken for three agencies have left him scared, angry and dubious.

Besides being asked whether he had ever revealed classified information, Vermette was quizzed about whether he had paid for sex or had gotten a woman drunk to seduce her. Examiners asked about his computer use, his contacts with foreign students and his volunteer work with junior high students at church -- down to a high-five he had given one teenager.

Vermette describes himself as naturally nervous and said he grew more flustered with each exam. After the second CIA polygraph test, he was called in to see a higher official, who said he wanted to talk "man to man."

After telling Vermette that "there's no way you are not lying to me," the examiner pressed him on whether he was sexually involved with the teenager at church. The examiner then asked Vermette about her bra size. When Vermette said he did not know, the examiner asked him to guess -- after explaining bra sizes.

"He gave me a list of numbers to choose from, and I gave up and guessed one. Then he went on to ask about hair color, eye color, height and weight, all of which I am sure are absolutely vital to national security," Vermette wrote in an account of the episode. "I felt bad afterwards that I answered any of these questions but was under extreme psychological pressure and humiliation."

After the interview, Vermette filed a complaint. An investigation ensued, and the CIA apologized in writing, acknowledged that the questions were inappropriate and gave him his security clearances.

But it was not over. Late last year, Vermette's employer decided he ought to get clearances from the NSA as well. Although Vermette had been given top-secret and Sensitive Compartmented Information clearances by the CIA and the National Reconnaissance Office, which operates U.S. reconnaissance satellites, the NSA gave him new polygraph tests.

Vermette said the last straw was being asked by NSA examiners to talk about the incident with the CIA. When he refused and explained that the CIA had apologized for the episode, the NSA denied his clearance -- citing his "failure to cooperate with security processing."

DOJ_NMG_0035345

Whereas Vermette found himself caught between agencies, Wayne Johnson said he was snared by seemingly conflicting decisions at the same agency. Johnson was stunned to discover there was a problem with his FBI polygraph test, given that the agency had done a recent background investigation that led to a renewal of his top-secret credentials at the White House.

Like Vermette, Johnson said the polygraph made him nervous, even though he had nothing to hide. When asked about drug use, Johnson, who is black, found himself worrying about stereotypes that link blacks to drug use. Johnson said he had never touched an illegal narcotic but believed his examiner, who is white, did not believe him.

The race question was always at the back of Johnson's mind, he said, and his fears may have shown up on the polygraph -- and perhaps were misinterpreted as a sign of deception.

Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman, said that he could not discuss any individual case but that in general the White House makes its decisions on clearances after the agency forwards the results of its investigations. When someone seeks employment at the FBI, the agency uses investigative results to draw its own conclusions, he said.

Wilk, who flunked three tests at the NSA despite her security clearance from the Pentagon, said examiners do not seem to realize that innocent people can be nervous.

"People say if you don't have anything to hide you should not be worried, but I have nothing to hide and I am worried," she said. "A citizen's entire means of making a living boils down to answering one stupid question on a polygraph."

When examiners kept telling her she was hiding something, the thought that eventually went through her mind was: "Should I just make something up?"

Cheney Hearts Reporters (Not Really) (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

It was another ironic moment in the nation's capital Monday as Vice President Cheney was on hand to present Tom DeFrank, the Washington, D.C., bureau chief for the New York Daily News, with the Gerald R. Ford Prize for Distinguished Reporting on the Presidency. But the irony was muffled since Cheney didn't physically present the award to DeFrank, in a departure from previous years.

Maybe Cheney couldn't bear the thought of handing the award to a journalist whose coverage touched on his waning influence at the White House after the indictment of his former chief of staff, Scooter Libby. One of DeFrank's five stories submitted in the award-winning package began, "The CIA leak scandal has peeled back the veil on the most closely held White House secret of all: the subtle but unmistakable erosion in the bond between President Bush and Vice President Cheney."

The story quoted a longtime Bush associate describing Cheney as "wounded" by the CIA leak scandal and a presidential counselor as saying, "The relationship is not what it was." Cheney aides were "apoplectic" about the story at the time, one source told HOH.

DeFrank didn't mention that story, which was published Nov. 8, 2005, when he accepted the award during a luncheon at the National Press Club. Nor did Cheney, who, according to attendees, was gracious and said nice things about DeFrank.

But although Cheney presented the award to last year's winner, Jackie Calmes of The Wall Street Journal, President Ford's son Jack presented this year's award, the 19th annual.

Adding more intrigue, when the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum recently named DeFrank this year's winner, it sent out a press release announcing that Cheney "is scheduled to present the award" to DeFrank at a June 19 luncheon at the press club.

Later, however, the Ford library released another notice clarifying that Cheney "is scheduled to speak" at the awards luncheon.

Though he had nothing but kind words to say Monday about his buddies in the Fourth Estate, Cheney sure didn't pull any punches at last year's awards luncheon, expressing his disdain for journalists when audience members submitted questions to the vice president on note cards.

As someone at the event recalls, one question had to do with the vice president's "ideal for excellence in journalism." With head bowed, Cheney paused and then, according to the source, answered something like, "I guess I'd know what it is if I'd ever seen it."

Ouch — that hurts like a shot in the face.

Condolences. Our condolences to the family and friends of Tony Nardelli, the longtime owner of The Tune Inn on Capitol Hill, who died Monday of cancer.

DOJ_NMG_0035346

Tim Gerran, a friend of Nardelli's for nearly 30 years, said he got to know the family when Nardelli's father — who founded The Tune Inn — used to serve him breakfast at the bar back when Gerran lived across the street. Nardelli took over ownership in the early 1990s, according to Gerran.

"Tony's biggest thing was providing a real local bar for people on the Hill," the former Congressional aide-turned-lobbyist said. "It had nothing to do with Congress, nothing to do with anything in the area. He just wanted to be a good neighborhood bar."

Gerran described Nardelli as "a curmudgeon, just like his father," but he said that Nardelli would "give you the shirt off his back" if need be.

"He just made [the bar] a nice, cheap eats-and-drink place for a lot of young people, and a lot of young people went on to great things from here," Gerran said.

Gerran said Nardelli's daughter had just beaten her own battle with cancer and had given birth to boy about a month ago. She named her son after his grandfather.

Nardelli was around 64 years old, according to Gerran.

He's So Hot! Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) is the newest hottest Senator, according a new poll conducted by the typically heady Web site Politics1.com. In a sampling of local, state and federal officeholders and candidates, Thune ranked fourth "hottest man in U.S. politics."

Among other House Members and Senators who made the cut, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) finished sixth and Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) came in ninth of the 10 hot men in the poll. Though Thune beat his fellow Congressional hotties, the Senator's spokesman still couldn't believe that his boss didn't fare better overall. (The Senator is totally hot, for crying out loud.)

"Fourth?!?!?" an incredulous (and funny) Kyle Downey, Thune's spokesman, asked via e-mail. "What was the margin of error, sample size? This poll has no credibility, clearly they didn't ask Mrs. Thune."

Meanwhile, Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) finished first in the "hottest woman in U.S. politics" contest, besting Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), who came in second, Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.), who finished sixth, and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who came in 10th out of 10 finalists. The rest were state and local politicians and candidates.

On the Laugh Circuit. Don't forget to catch Washington Post reporter Juliet Eilperin on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" tonight. Eilperin will be talking about her new book — which isn't all that funny unless you get big yuks from partisan gridlock — called "Fight Club Politics: How Partisanship Is Poisoning the U.S. House of Representatives."

Eilperin, a former Roll Caller, has been on a whirlwind publicity tour across the country touting her book about how downright nasty Congress has become, but tonight's scheduled appearance, she thinks, takes the cake.

"While I've had a fabulous time speaking about the book in places everywhere from Corte Madera, Calif., to Lawrence, Kan., it's hard to imagine anything better than sitting across the table from Jon Stewart," Eilperin said. "I just have to remember the cardinal rule of 'The Daily Show': he's the one who gets to crack the jokes."

Crowded Agenda, But Few Easy Wins For GOP (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Even as they wade through two weeks of debate over the Iraq war, Republicans also have been charting an aggressive summer to-do list — one they are gambling will be less wishful thinking and more reality as they seek to bolster their résumé of election-year victories.

Majority Republicans know they will need unity in their own party and the support of at least a few Democrats to make significant headway on their priorities in the next five weeks of legislating, a schedule that includes a raft of appropriations measures, the estate tax, line-item veto, executive nominations and outstanding conference reports on pensions, lobby reform and immigration. And the GOP knows that hopes of advancing those bills diminish as the clock ticks toward August and the November election creeps closer.

"It's do-or-die time," acknowledged one senior Senate GOP aide.

A spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the GOP certainly has a lot on its plate this summer, but Republicans have become accustomed to trying to advance legislation in a divided chamber. Partisanship over policymaking seems to remain on high, said Amy Call.

"The first six months of the year have been characterized by a lot of progress in a tough year ... but there's a lot left that we'd like to get done," she said.

House Republicans wrapped up last week on a high note, securing bipartisan support for a resolution backing President Bush's policy in Iraq. Senate Republicans hope to do some of the same this week as they complete debate on the fiscal 2007 Defense authorization bill and secure party — and individual Senators' — positions on the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0035347

The Senate kicked off discussions on the Defense measure last week, and if the action on the floor was any indicator, debate this week will be equally charged.

Republicans hope to put Democrats on the defensive on the war, trying to bolster their own anti-terrorism credentials while branding the minority as a "cut and run party." A majority of Democrats in the meantime, will rally around an amendment that calls on the Bush administration to mark the end of 2006 with a beginning of troop withdrawal — knowing that public opinion is riding against Bush's handling of the war.

That amendment offered by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) will take a more conservative approach than some other Democrats, including presidential aspirants Sens. John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.), are pressing for. Feingold and Kerry want a set deadline for troop redeployment.

Chest pounding on the war aside, Republicans have other priorities for the coming weeks. GOP Senators and aides alike acknowledge they must push hard now if they want to get bills through and have a success-rich platform to take to voters over the August recess and beyond. That includes wrapping up the Defense bill, passing the flag-burning amendment, approving more judicial nominations and, hopefully, a few House-Senate conference agreements.

House Republicans acknowledge they also face a crowded agenda and will make a fast dash over the next two weeks to clear through the Defense authorization measure, the line-item veto and the Voting Rights Act, as well as energy reforms and spending measures. In July, the House is likely to take up matters including health information technology and federal efficiency measures, as well as a consumer protection bill.

But as in the Senate, House Republicans won't leave their base hanging.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has pledged to hold a vote on the federal marriage amendment, which failed to meet a procedural test to move forward in the Senate earlier this month. House Republicans also will take on a measure to keep the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Senate Republicans already believe they have padded their campaign credentials with a solid lineup of two years' worth of accomplishments, notably confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and passage of a tax reconciliation bill, class-action reform, last year's energy reform package, and reauthorization of the USA PATRIOT Act and Deficit Reduction Act.

"We've kept people's taxes low and security high," said one GOP Senate staffer. "The voter doesn't distinguish between this year and last year in terms of what's been accomplished."

But, this aided added: "We're going to have to do a lot more and communicate better our accomplishments, and where we want to lead. We have to do that over the next five months."

Don't expect that to be easy, as Democrats will ramp up their own efforts to bolster their agenda and a message that Republicans have forwarded the wrong priorities that have hurt the middle class and favored special interests.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), who is running the campaign of his career to secure the seat given to him earlier this year by now-New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine (D), said atop his list of must-dos this year are energy reform, education initiatives and success in Iraq.

"There are things I'd like to see, but they aren't going to happen," he said.

Sen. Byron Dorgan (N.D.), chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee, said that Frist will spend the coming weeks "putting additional check marks on his agenda." Dorgan said he doesn't "hold out hope" that much will get done beyond the fiscal year spending measures that both parties have an interest in advancing.

But Republicans are far more optimistic. They say even though they face hurdles, they believe they can press ahead on a series of outstanding proposals. July and August should be marked by additional approval of circuit court nominations, a compromise on the end of the estate tax, passage of conference reports on lobby and pension reform and at least a couple of the key appropriations measures — homeland and defense.

The one area that Republicans concede they could fail is on immigration reform, which is stalled as it awaits movement to conference committee. The majority remains divided on the controversial matter that some believe may be too hot to handle this cycle.

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), one of the architects of the Senate plan, hasn't lost all hope yet, but he said: "If we don't get the conference committee going in the next month, people recognize it might not get done."

Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) said Republicans are not naive that there is some heavy lifting ahead. Kyl characterized it as "not a fear, but concern" that Republicans will be able to advance everything they'd like in what's an increasingly shorter period of time.

"A lot of it depends on the schedule," Kyl said. "We could work more days than we are."

Stay tuned.

Democrats Look To Keep Minimum Wage On Table (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats aim to make the minimum wage a maximum political problem for Republicans this election year.

The minority party fired the first shot last week, when the House Appropriations Committee broke with its Republican leadership and approved a $2.10-an-hour increase as part of a spending bill for labor, health and education programs. Speaker Dennis Hastert responded by putting the measure on hold -- possibly until after the election.

But Democrats are poised to come back this morning and offer the same wage amendment as part of a second appropriations bill funding science and law-enforcement agencies.

"I gave the Republicans fair notice that we will attach it to anything we can," said Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the committee's ranking Democrat. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) went to the floor of Senate yesterday and proposed to add the same amendment to a pending defense-authorization bill.

"We think it's both the right thing and good politics," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D., Md.).

Efforts to raise the minimum wage since 1997 have failed under Republican control of Congress, as business groups oppose the measure and lobbied against it. A group of more than 20 business organizations are fighting an increase this year, as part of the "Coalition for Job Opportunities." One member -- the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents small companies -- says a quarter of its members would have to cut jobs, at a total loss of 217,000 positions, if the federal minimum wage were raised to $6.65.

Despite business opposition, however, 21 states have enacted minimum wages above the $5.15 federal level, and roughly half the population lives in a state that already mandates higher hourly pay.

The last federal increase, signed into law months before the 1996 presidential elections, followed bargaining over tax- and health-insurance-related issues important to Republican conservatives. The same could happen now because the minimum-wage debate is coming to a head even as Republican leaders, already offering concessions to timber interests, are looking for the final Senate votes needed for a compromise on estate-tax relief. While far too early to predict, the party could solve two problems at once by linking the wage and estate-tax issues in an election-year deal.

Discomfort is growing among rank-and-file Republicans, especially as organized labor has mounted ballot issues in various states. Seven Republicans broke ranks with their leadership in the House Appropriations Committee last week, and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.) said her polling on the issue in Missouri -- one of the states with a ballot initiative in the works -- testified to the issue's popularity. "It is a problem," Mr. Hastert said of the pressure now.

In the Senate, the challenge has been to get above the 60 votes needed to limit debate. In the past, Republicans have foiled Mr. Kennedy by offering a parallel amendment with antiunion provisions attached. What is different this year is that some Republicans are looking at an alternative -- that doesn't include the antilabor language and offers a smaller increase. "I would look that over," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) and a past chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor & Pensions Committee.

Another factor could be Congress's own pay. While the minimum wage has remained frozen, lawmakers' salaries have risen with annual cost-of-living increases keyed to what is given federal employees. And last week's vote in the House Appropriations Committee followed a floor vote days before in which the House cleared the way for members to get another increase valued at thousands of dollars annually.

More Democrats have begun to ask how long the party can go along with such pay adjustments for Congress when Republicans block floor votes on the minimum wage.

"This is a rich man's support club," said Mr. Obey, who voted against this year's increase on the procedural vote. While the details aren't known, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) is thought to have raised the issue with Mr. Hastert in conversations before the House vote on pay.

Polling for the liberal Democracy Corps has added to the pressure among Democrats. Among test planks for a Democratic platform, one of the most popular -- especially among independents -- is that Democrats would block any pay raise for Congress until the incomes of average workers begin to rise.

"It's a powerful statement, and it shows how out of touch Washington is," said Stan Greenberg of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, who did the Democracy Corps survey. Just as Republicans in 1994 advocated term limits to highlight the arrogance of entrenched power in Congress, he said Democrats should make the link between members' pay and the minimum wage.

Business groups oppose any increase, arguing small businesses will be less willing to hire low-skilled workers if they have to pay more to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0035349

Economists generally start from the proposition that increasing the cost of low-skill labor will reduce employer demand, hurting the intended beneficiaries. But they read the evidence on the effect of minimum-wage increases during the booming 1990s differently.

Despite those increases, after years in which inflation had eroded the purchasing power of the minimum wage, hiring was strong across the board and the increases are credited with helping to boost the fortunes of low-paid workers.

That added credibility to an argument made by professors David Card, of the University of California, Berkeley, and Alan B. Krueger, of Princeton University, who have challenged the conventional economic wisdom that higher minimum wages reduce hiring of low-wage workers by comparing the experiences of states that lifted their minimum wages in the early 1990s with those that didn't.

But an economist on the other side of the question, David Neumark of the University of California, Irvine, estimates poverty rates increase between 3% and 4% for every 10% increase in the minimum wage by depressing employment of low-skill workers. "The data are consistent with the idea that the people who are hurt are concentrated in poor families," Mr. Neumark said.

Police Group Wants McKinney Scuffle Probed (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 19, 2006

Police labor officials, angry over a federal grand jury's refusal to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney for assaulting a police officer, said Monday said they want the House ethics committee to review her conduct.

And they said the grand jury's decision last week sent the message that "it's okay to hit a police officer."

"We hope that members of Congress will review her actions in light of their rules within their own ethics committee," Andrew Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Labor Committee, told reporters Monday at a news conference in Washington.

Maybo said the Fraternal Order of Police would send a letter later this week to the ethics committee suggesting that McKinney's behavior violated an item in the chamber's ethics manual that calls for members to "conduct (themselves) at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives."

McKinney's spokesman and her lawyer did not immediately return calls for comment.

Such a letter would not trigger an inquiry unless a member of the House authors it, or the chairman and ranking Democrat move to review the matter.

McKinney has not disputed accounts that she hit Officer Paul McKenna May 29 when he tried to stop her from entering a House office building unrecognized. McKenna did not arrest McKinney at the scene.

"Congresswoman McKinney's assault on Officer McKenna was not only unprofessional for her position as a member of Congress, but we believe it puts out the wrong message across America, that it's okay to strike a police officer," said

"It's not okay to strike a police officer, regardless of who you are," he added.

Union Seeks Ethics Probe Of McKinney (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Members of national and local chapters of the Fraternal Order of Police (FOP) expressed anger and disappointment yesterday with the D.C. Office of the Attorney General for refusing to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) for striking a police officer. The union chapters are calling on the House ethics committee to investigate the incident.

“Although she was not indicted by the grand jury, we hope that members of Congress will review her actions in light of their own rules within the ethics committee,” said Andy Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police chapter.

Maybo said he plans to send a letter later this week to the ethics committee, known formally as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, requesting an investigation into the incident.

A spokesman for the ethics committee did not immediately return a call for comment. While it is unclear what House rule the FOP members believe McKinney violated, the first rule in the ethics manual states: “A Member, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives shall conduct himself at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives.”

“Congresswoman McKinney’s assault on Officer [Paul] McKenna was not only unprofessional for her position as a member of Congress, but we believe it puts out the wrong message across America, that it is OK to strike a police officer,” he said.

Lou Cannon, the president of the D.C. Fraternal Order of Police, echoed Maybo’s remarks, adding that regardless of any animosity felt among the officers toward the lawmaker she will still be protected as a member of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0035350

"The United States Capitol Police is a professional law-enforcement organization and will take this in stride, as all police officers have learned to do with unfavorable decisions," Cannon said. "Rep. McKinney will always be afforded the courtesies of her position by those of us sworn to protect and serve."

Maybo and Cannon also criticized the timing of the announcement that the grand jury had refused to indict McKinney, which occurred Friday after 5 p.m.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein, defended the timing.

"We essentially had no choice," he said, explaining that a chief judge must review decisions before they are made public.

"The chief judge was not scheduled to accept grand jury returns until 4 [p.m.] on Friday, which is not uncommon because it allows the grand jury to complete its work for the day. … Therefore, Friday's timing was routine," he said.

The Capitol Police commended the professionalism of McKenna and the investigative units of the force that looked into the allegations in a release issued Friday night and said they respect the grand jury's decision.

"The United States Capitol Police respect the decision of the grand jury and appreciate the extensive and thorough investigative work of the United States Attorney's Office," the release said.

Capitol Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, who was present at the end of the FOP press conference, declined to comment further on the matter.

On March 30, McKenna stopped McKinney as she entered the Longworth House Office Building. When she failed to respond to a verbal warning, according to reports, McKenna reached out to stop McKinney, who was not wearing congressional identification.

McKinney then struck McKenna with a closed fist holding her cell phone, according to allegations, flashed her congressional identification card and walked away.

A spokesman for McKinney did not return a call for comment by press time.

Milestone For McCrery (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jim Snyder

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Rep. Jim McCrery's (R-La.) chairmanship of last night's President's Dinner should boost his bid for the Ways and Means Committee gavel, if the past is any indication.

The dinner raised $15 million for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), exceeding its target by $1 million. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, helmed by Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), raised an additional $12 million.

As chairman of the House efforts for the dinner, one of only two annual fundraising dinners the NRCC puts on, McCrery is following in the steps of Republican congressional stars. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (Texas), Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman Buck McKeon (Calif.) and current Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.) all served as fundraising chairmen in the past.

Rainmaking is not the sole factor in determining chairmanships, but senior members are expected to do the heavy lifting moneywise. McCrery, already a fundraising powerhouse this election cycle, raised $1.2 million for last night's dinner.

In the weeks before the dinner, McCrery sought out various groups to help him meet his targets.

Red Cavaney, president and CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, signed on as co-host. In doing so, he committed to raising at least $100,000 from the oil industry. An API spokesman said Cavaney would meet his target, although sources with knowledge of the fundraising efforts said executives from the largest oil companies, despite record profits and being on the hot seat politically, didn't buy as many tickets as projected.

Prices are $2,500 per ticket, or $25,000 for a table. Among the majors, only Chevron put up the full ante.

The National Association of Homebuilders was also a key contributor, as was Billy Tauzin, a former Louisiana Republican lawmaker who now heads the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, or PhRMA. About 25 percent of the fundraising totals came from contributors in McCrery's home state.

In addition, McCrery's political action committee, the Committee for the Preservation of Capitalism, had contributed $525,000 to House and Senate candidates by the most recent filing deadline, at the end of April, according to the Center for Responsive Politics website.

Always a factor, fundraising prowess could be doubly important to McCrery's ambitions because he is not the most senior member in line to run Ways and Means.

DOJ_NMG_0035351

His principal opponent, Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.), has been there longer and is raising considerable funds in his own bid. Shaw isn't without obstacles of his own, however, the main one being Democrat Ron Klein, a well-financed state senator who is challenging Shaw's reelection bid.

Klein's campaign has made Shaw's bid for the chairmanship an election issue in the Fort Lauderdale district. That means Klein's campaign circulates copies of almost all the news stories that are reported about the race, which includes anything that mentions McCrery's perceived front-runner status as well as the Louisiana Republican's remarks last week that the House could reconsider an overhaul of Social Security as early as 2007.

McCrery, for his part, remains relatively quiet about his candidacy. He has given the maximum $10,000 to Shaw's reelection campaign, according to the Center for Responsive Politics website.

Shaw had raised almost $2 million through his personal reelection fund as of the last filing deadline, according to the same website, but by contrast, his PAC, the Sunshine PAC, had given only $25,000 in single $1,000 contributions to 25 members of the House. Shaw did make a contribution of $114,000 to the NRCC for last night's dinner, exceeding his expected suggested donation of $100,000.

The Floridian was buoyed by a recent fundraiser headlined by President Bush in Fort Lauderdale. The dinner raised more than $800,000 for Shaw, and the president even mentioned his bid for the Ways and Means chairmanship.

Whatever the outcome of this race, rainmaking has become a necessity for members hoping to rise within the House or committee leadership structure, a trend that former GOP leaders decry.

"I'm sorry it's gotten to that point," said former Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.). "There was never any consideration for what you were raising for the party" when he was in the House.

"Let the caucus decide if the person is capable," he said.

Neither McCrery nor his supporters nor outside observers say that this or any other race will come down solely to money raised.

"If you raise a lot of money and you have no policy ability, you're not going to win," said John Feehery, a lobbyist with the Motion Picture Association of America and a former spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who holds five votes on the 28-member Republican Steering Committee, which chooses chairmen.

"What McCrery has done is shown his ability to step up for the party, and it's going to help him."

Feehery said McCrery's strength as a legislator would be more important in determining the chairmanship than the amount of money he has raised, but his efforts organizing the dinner, which can be a thankless task, are just another bullet point on his résumé.

The dinner "is one of the necessary things you have to do to take the next step. No one wants to chair the President's Dinner," Feehery said.

If McCrery does succeed the outspoken Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), McCrery's understated personality would create a distinctly different dynamic on the committee. Republicans on and off Capitol Hill consider his low-key personality and his work out of the spotlight as a major reason he has been so successful.

"He always has an ability to put his ego to the side," said Dan Mattoon, an influential Republican lobbyist and founder of PodestaMattoon.

But while potential candidates try to position themselves to take over coveted committee slots, they do so quietly or else run the risk of counting chickens before they hatch.

"All three of the top candidates have been mindful that these races should wait until after the election," Mattoon said, including Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) as the third candidate vying for the top job.

"Let's take care of business."

Agriculture Official Has Little Time For Flexible Scheduling (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

An Agriculture Department undersecretary has canceled certain alternative work schedules for management officials in St. Louis and Washington and told the affected employees to plan on working a traditional eight-hour, five-day-per-week schedule.

"With just over two years remaining to accomplish the agenda that I laid out for Rural Development, I feel that it is necessary and critical to our success that all key management officials are available and accessible on-site each day in order to help us accomplish such a large agenda remaining for Rural Development," Thomas C. Dorr , Agriculture's undersecretary for rural development, told his management team in an e-mail last week.

DOJ_NMG_0035352

Dorr's decision underscores the tension inside numerous agencies over flexible work schedules. Many agencies provide such arrangements to help employees balance their work and home lives, but political appointees and senior managers often prefer to have workers in the office and available.

Typically, employees on an alternative work schedule, known as AWS, work longer office hours during certain days of a pay period in exchange for a day off every other week, often a Friday or a Monday.

Dorr gave his management officials 10 days' notice of the schedule change, effective Sunday. That drew a protest from one of his subordinates, who provided the e-mail anonymously, saying he feared retribution.

Dorr "gave no reasonable time for people to adjust their schedules," the employee said in a letter accompanying the e-mail. The employee said Dorr's decision will disrupt carpool schedules, child- and elder-care arrangements, and activities that employees reserve for their days off.

The employee also said Dorr's decision to cancel AWS for Rural Development managers goes against long-standing federal personnel policies, authorized in law, that encourage such schedules.

Ed Loy , press secretary for the Agriculture Department, said: "We need to have the ability to have senior management on a similar and consistent schedule to have the collaboration we need to move forward."

The e-mail by Dorr was prompted by the recent heightened focus on renewable energy sources and biomass research, Loy said. The department's Rural Development offices -- which are helping to promote the president's energy policy -- provide money for loans, grants and technical assistance to rural communities and businesses.

Dorr's action applies to General Schedule 14 and 15 employees and to the Senior Executive Service. Loy said he did not have a count of how many management employees will shift off AWS. Rural Development has about 170 employees who could be affected, out of 1,800 workers in Washington and St. Louis offices.

The Senate confirmed Dorr, an Iowa farmer, in July 2005, ending a four-year battle over his nomination. The Senate vote, 62 to 38, came after he wrote a letter of apology for making what critics called racially insensitive remarks in 1999 and for a controversy that led him to reimburse the government for some federal farm subsidies.Vacation Paperwork Timely paperwork is a key to not losing those precious vacation days, it appears.

Seventeen employees at the Federal Trade Commission recently petitioned to have leave restored, but nine requests were initially denied because their forms for recouping leave took too long to get to the personnel office.

The forms are supposed to be filed at the time staffers are asked to put off their vacations, but that did not happen and many of the employees had more than 100 leave hours at risk of being lost.

The nine affected employees work in the FTC's Bureau of Competition, where vacations go out the window when companies submit merger applications that start a 30-day countdown for a recommendation. Litigation can also eat up staff time and ruin vacation plans, since the agency must respond to court deadlines.

"It is difficult for people to look at their year and plan their leave," said Nancy Ness Judy , the agency's director of public affairs.

FTC managers are holding meetings to resolve the cases of lost leave and get paperwork in order, she said. "These people gave up their vacations to work on litigation, and we want to make sure they are treated fairly," Judy said.

Agents End Up As Drive-By Rescuers To Ex-Federal Official (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

In a story that perhaps could only happen here, a former assistant treasury secretary in town for a Rhodes Scholar reunion collapsed in Dupont Circle on Saturday morning and was given life-saving treatment by two Secret Service agents, who happened to be driving by.

Curtis Hessler, 62, of Pasadena, Calif., had just crossed Massachusetts Avenue NW with his wife, Christine, when he said, "I'm not feeling well," and slumped to the ground, Christine Hessler said yesterday. He was having trouble breathing. A passerby called 911 on her cellphone.

"We bent down and tried to make him a little more comfortable. Things kept getting worse," Christine Hessler said. "Out of nowhere, this police car pulls up . . . and two officers jumped out and said, 'Can we be of help?' "

The uniformed agents, who are assigned to the Foreign Missions Branch of the agency, were on routine patrol. Trained to assist presidents and embassy officials, they performed CPR and then followed the ambulance to George Washington University Hospital. A D.C. police officer took Christine Hessler and a friend there.

DOJ_NMG_0035353

At the hospital, doctors determined that Curtis Hessler had not suffered a full heart attack but rather ventricular tachycardia -- a potentially dangerous rapid heartbeat -- along with a partly blocked artery, and two stents were inserted. The doctors initially were concerned that Hessler had been without oxygen for a period of time.

The two Secret Service agents, who are not identified because of agency policy, stayed with Christine Hessler for a while. The next morning, she arrived at the hospital to find them in the reception area. They jumped up and asked how her husband was, she said, and followed her into his room.

He "smiled and held out his hand," she said. "He realized something had gone on and he was helped. It was one of those very, very special things you don't expect to happen."

Yesterday afternoon, Hessler, chairman and chief executive of 101 Communications, was feeling well enough to sit in a chair and read a book on economics. An assistant treasury secretary during the Carter administration, he said he always admired the Secret Service, which at the time was under the Treasury Department. Now, his feelings are more personal.

"I had a lot of help from a lot of people," Hessler said. "But I do want to thank the two guys from the Secret Service. They went beyond the call of duty."

Justices Fight Back (USAT)

By Tony Mauro

USA Today, June 20, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court justices often say they speak only through their decisions. If so, we will be hearing a lot from them in coming days, as the court issues dozens of decisions in its traditional race toward adjournment by the end of June. The court has already made headlines on police searches and environmental law in recent days, and more news will come by month's end on military tribunals for enemy combatants and campaign-finance reform.

But this term, to an unusual degree, justices have also been making headlines off the bench, offering comments that, taken together, have made a powerful case for the independence of the court and the judiciary. After years of being passive punching bags for critics, mainly on the right, justices of all stripes are pushing back, making welcome additions to the public debate.

Consider these recent statements:

• Justice Antonin Scalia last month said he agreed with critics that high court opinions should not rely on foreign laws or court decisions. Even so, he told an audience that included members of Congress, "I don't think it's any of your business." He also opposed pending bills that would ban judicial citation of foreign law.

• Also last month, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg voiced opposition to proposals to create an inspector general to monitor the ethical behavior of federal judges. "That's a really scary idea," Ginsburg said, comparing it to the dark days of the Soviet Union. "The judiciary is under assault in a way that I haven't seen before."

Death threats

• Speaking in the same vein three months earlier, Ginsburg revealed that she and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had been the targets of death threats from the "irrational fringe" stirred up by critics of the use of foreign law in court rulings.

• In speeches she gave before and after she retired in January, O'Connor responded to critics who were upset with the federal courts for not preventing the death of Terri Schiavo in 2005. "We must be ever vigilant against those who would strong-arm the judiciary into adopting their preferred policies," O'Connor said. Her candid remarks to USA TODAY published earlier this month struck the same theme.

• Justice Anthony Kennedy told Congress to butt out on the question of whether cameras should be allowed in the Supreme Court. "We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts," Kennedy said during a budget hearing in April. Bills have been introduced requiring broadcast access.

Not all the justices' comments are on target. As a red-blooded journalist, I've argued for decades that the court should open its doors to cameras and microphones to give the public a much-needed education about a misunderstood branch of government.

The Supreme Court should take this step on its own, but if it is unwilling, it seems entirely within the power of Congress to require it.

Nonetheless, at least the justices' comments have a consistent theme: This Supreme Court takes a back seat to no other branch, and it is willing to fight for its independence and that of the judiciary as a whole.

Some commentators and editorial writers have harrumphed that the justices should stick to their opinion-writing and limit their public commentary to commencement-speech platitudes. These critics forget what is or should be a cardinal rule of journalism: Never criticize a public official for speaking to the public or the news media. More thoughtfully, some judges have privately expressed concern that by speaking out, the justices might squander the credibility and reputation for impartiality that should be preserved and reserved for their decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0035354

Going too far

Certainly there are occasions when a justice can cross the line. For example, in March, in response to a question about the rights of enemy combatants, Scalia alluded to enemy soldiers "shooting at my son," a reference to his son Matthew's service in Iraq as an Army captain. That remark was understandable coming from a father whose son was in harm's way. But it does not instill confidence in the justice's ability to rule impartially in a pending case on that very subject. The impetuous Scalia might also have been wise to refrain from using a dismissive hand gesture — in front of a photographer, no less — when a Boston reporter asked him a question he did not like.

Apart from these indiscretions, there seems to be no reason why justices should not speak out, especially on issues that relate to the role and operation of the judiciary. Judicial canons of ethics allow it.

Borrowing a boxing term, Scalia used to say that judges must use a "rope-a-dope" strategy when criticized — taking the hits without fighting back, until their adversaries wear themselves out. Scalia and several other justices seem to have changed their minds, coming off the ropes and jabbing back.

Whether their adversaries in Congress swing back remains to be seen. But the judiciary and the nation are better off for having a debate in which both sides participate. We see a lot of the justices when they are up for confirmation — most recently, John Roberts and Samuel Alito — and it makes little sense that once they are confirmed and start doing the public's business, they drop out of sight.

In the same way that journalists must shed their vaunted neutrality when freedom of the press is under fire, so too should judges get involved when their authority is threatened. To stay independent, judges should act, and speak, independently.

Tony Mauro is the Supreme Court correspondent for American Lawyer Media and Legal Times. He also is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

The Chief Justice Sets A Standard (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Is there a fight brewing among conservatives on the Supreme Court?

In a speech at Georgetown University law school last month that didn't get as much attention as it deserved, Chief Justice John Roberts laid out an approach to deciding cases that could disappoint those who like their court decisions bold and ideological.

Roberts's view could bring him into conflict with Justice Antonin Scalia, a fellow conservative who is absolutely certain what the Constitution means and is never afraid to say so.

The chief justice's speech defended the virtues of judicial humility: Justices should try to make the narrowest possible rulings and strive for unanimity, or something close to it.

"If it is not necessary to decide more to dispose of a case, in my view it is necessary not to decide more," Roberts said. Thus the Roberts Rule of Orderly Judging: The less the court decides the better.

And there was this corollary: "The broader the agreement among the justices, the more likely it is that the decision is on the narrowest possible ground."

"The rule of law is strengthened," Roberts insisted, "when there is greater coherence and agreement about what the law is."

But common sense can be controversial. Many on both the right and the left think that the purpose of the Supreme Court is to lay out very broad principles and to decide as much as those principles demand -- or permit.

Scalia's theory of "originalism" holds that the one thing that matters is what the writers of the Constitution "originally" meant. That often seems to correlate with what conservatives want to do, although Scalia will occasionally ditch his devotion to originalism if he needs another way to get to a conservative outcome. That's what happened last week in a 5 to 4 decision expanding police search powers. A more libertarian approach, Scalia said, applied "in different contexts and long ago." So much for originalism.

In his 1996 book "Legal Reasoning and Political Conflict," Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago, described Scalia's approach (and that of the late liberal Justice Hugo Black) as placing "a high premium on the creation and application of general rules." Judges, in this view, should "give guidance to lower courts, future legislators, and ordinary citizens through clear, abstract rules laid down in advance of actual applications."

DOJ_NMG_0035355

The problem with this, Sunstein argues, is that "rules may misfire, precisely because they are too rigid and . . . can go badly wrong when applied to concrete cases not anticipated when the rule was set down." Broad rulings, Sunstein writes, "tend to overreach."

In the past, judicial overreach was associated with liberals. But with conservatives now enjoying a majority on the Supreme Court -- it's likely to get more conservative if President Bush gets another appointment -- the danger of overreach comes from the right.

It's therefore important that Roberts seems to be setting his face against judicial activism. To propose that court decisions should achieve broad majorities is, in the current circumstance, to tell the court's conservatives that they have an obligation to temper their own passions and reach out to the liberal minority. To get 7 to 2, or 8 to 1, or 9 to 0 decisions, the court would have to avoid far-reaching declarations congenial to conservative doctrine.

Consider how Roberts's approach contrasts with what the court did in Bush v. Gore , the 2000 decision that made George W. Bush president. Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer were desperately seeking consensus. They agreed with the pro-Bush judges that the recount in Florida should be conducted under uniform standards. But they insisted that Florida be given a chance to have the recount.

The court's narrow and -- let's call it what it was -- partisan majority told Souter and Breyer to get lost. Five justices wanted to end the thing and make Bush president. Imagine how much bitterness would have been avoided (and how respect for the rule of law would have been enhanced) if the court had instead sought, in Roberts's words, "greater coherence and agreement about what the law is."

No one can know how consistently Roberts will apply the principles he laid out in his Georgetown speech. The straight 5-to-4 ideological split last week on police searches was not encouraging. But if Roberts lives up to his Georgetown principles, he will justify all the votes cast for his confirmation by moderates and liberals. More important, he will win a place in history as the chief justice who ended the judicial wars.

The SWAT Syndrome (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

Of all the excuses for weakening the Fourth Amendment, the weirdest was the one offered by Justice Antonin Scalia last week in a Michigan drug case.

He wrote the majority opinion allowing police officers to use evidence found in a home even if they entered without following the venerable rule to knock first and announce themselves. To reassure traditionalists, Scalia declared that unreasonable searches are less of a problem today because of "the increasing professionalism of police forces."

Well, it's true that when police show up at your home in the middle of the night, they're better armed and trained than ever. They now routinely arrive with assault rifles, flash grenades and battering rams.

So if your definition of a professional is a soldier in a war zone, then Scalia is right. The number of paramilitary raids has soared in the past two decades as cities, suburbs and small towns have rushed to assemble their very own SWAT teams.

Some police veterans complain about "militarizing Mayberry," and can't figure out why towns averaging one homicide a decade need paramilitary units. But younger cops like the glamour — our very own SWAT team, just like on TV! Who wants to patrol a beat when you could be playing commando?

And who can resist free gear from Washington? Congress encouraged the SWAT syndrome by directing the Pentagon to give local police departments old machine guns, armed personnel carriers and helicopters. The federal government has also helped subsidize drug raids and encouraged locals to be aggressive by letting them keep a cut of the drug dealers' assets.

The SWAT teams were originally supposed to deal with extraordinary threats, like hostage situations, snipers and heavily armed drug gangs. Since 9/11, of course, they've been justified for combating terrorists. But such situations are so rare that the teams have had to invent new missions to keep busy — and to pay for their operations by finding assets to seize.

Most of the time they're used simply to carry out searches for drugs, often on the basis of dubious tips from informants, often against small-time dealers and other people with no history of violence. The commandos have a proclivity for going to the wrong address, and they tend to be impatient with anything that gets in their way. In articles about SWAT raids, a motif is the shooting of family pets in front of children.

It's hard to know how many botched and unnecessary raids there have been, because police don't systematically track their errors, and the victims often have little recourse. But in a forthcoming report for the Cato Institute, Radley Balko concludes that mistakes have been made in more than 200 raids over the past decade.

DOJ_NMG_0035356

He finds that overzealous raiders caused the deaths of a dozen nonviolent offenders, like recreational marijuana smokers and gamblers. In a Virginia suburb of Washington earlier this year, an optometrist being investigated for betting on sports was standing unarmed outside his town house, offering no resistance, when a SWAT officer's rifle discharged and killed him.

Balko also finds that two dozen people died in raids who were not guilty of any crime, like a Mexican immigrant killed by Denver police raiding the wrong home. Some died because they understandably assumed the masked invaders were criminals and picked up weapons to defend themselves. Some were innocent bystanders, like an 11-year-old boy shot in Modesto, Calif., and a 57-year-old woman in Harlem who had a heart attack when police set off a flash grenade during a raid based on a faulty tip.

"Prosecutors typically let police officers off the hook when they mistakenly shoot a civilian," Balko says, "on the theory that mistakes are understandable during the confusion of a raid. Fair enough. But civilians don't get the same deference. My research shows that when someone on the other end of a botched raid mistakes a police officer for an intruder and shoots in self-defense, his odds of facing jail time are about one in two."

The best way to avoid these mistakes would be to save SWAT teams for real crises and let police execute search warrants the old-fashioned way. They could find out, for instance, if they're at the wrong address before anyone pulls the trigger.

But thanks to the Supreme Court, they now have less reason to knock first and shoot later. They can be more professional than ever.

OTHER NEWS:

Inflation Fears Hit Wall Street Again As S&P 500 Veers Back Into The Red (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Stagflation fears reared their heads again, knocking stocks down and sending the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index back into negative territory for 2006.

Worries that persistent inflation could make the Federal Reserve push interest rates too high, stifling economic growth, sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average down 72.44 points, or 0.66%, to 10942.11, its ninth decline in 12 sessions. It is up 2.1% this year, but down 6% since hitting a six-year high May 10. Stagflation is the combination of inflation and a slumping economy.

The S&P 500, however, fell back into the red for the year. It declined 0.91%, or 11.40 points, to 1240.14, off 0.7% since the year began.

Stocks began the day with gains, following advances in several European and developing-country markets. But then Jack Guynn, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, repeated that inflation is too high, which reinforced fears that the Fed could raise interest rates more than once this summer. Higher rates are usually bad for stocks and bonds, because they crimp corporate profits and make existing bonds, with their lower rates, less attractive.

Stocks fell further after the National Association of Home Builders reported that its index of business conditions fell to its lowest level in 11 years. That reinforced fears that Fed rate increases could overshoot the mark, slowing the economy too much and squeezing profits.

"The market has the perspective of a slowing economy, including a slowdown in housing, which certainly has been the engine of growth in the last several years," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at brokerage firm Ryan Beck & Co. in Florham Park, N.J. "It is tough to buy the market right now."

Investors were nervously awaiting today's report on May housing starts.

Oil futures continued to decline, falling 90 cents to $68.98 a barrel, but instead of reassuring investors, that news reinforced concerns about economic weakness. Gold fell $9.20 to $568.80 a troy ounce.

The Nasdaq Composite Index decreased 0.92%, or 19.53 points, finishing at 2110.42, down 4.3% this year. Small stocks led the declines.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.53%, or 1.08 points, to 202.37.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.18 billion shares, as 867 stocks rose and 2,461 fell.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 3/32, or 94 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.143%. The 30-year bond was down 4/32 to yield 5.181%.

DOJ_NMG_0035357

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 115.42 yen, up from 115.13, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2577 from $1.2639.

Bush Raises $27 Million For GOP (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

President Bush suggested last night that Republicans must remain in control of Congress for the country to effectively combat terrorism and keep the economy healthy, speaking at a $27 million fundraiser meant to provide a needed boost to the campaign war chest of congressional Republicans.

"The most important responsibility we have in Washington is to defend the people of the United States," he said. "When this country sees a threat, we must deal with it before it fully materializes."

Bush addressed about 5,000 of the GOP's strongest supporters at the "President's Dinner," the largest fundraiser of the year for the Republicans' two congressional campaign committees.

Bush said that the "Democrats are good talkers, we're good doers," but generally avoided the harsh language he used to describe the Democrats at last year's dinner, when he urged support for his Social Security plan.

At the Washington Convention Center last night, he defended the decision to invade Iraq and invoked the events of Sept. 11, 2001, to say that the United States must "stay on the offensive" before its enemies "hurt America." He added: "It's important to have members of the United States Congress who will not wave the white flag of surrender in the war on terror."

The amount raised yesterday eclipses the $23 million the committees took at the event last year. The NRCC will receive $15 million of the $27 million, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee will get $12 million.

The infusion of cash could not come at a better time for Republicans, who are defending 35 competitive seats in the November elections, compared with 10 such seats for the Democrats, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. In addition, Democrats this year have been erasing the fundraising advantage the GOP has traditionally held.

As of April 30, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee was trailing its Republican counterpart by $15,000 in cash on hand, a small figure given the GOP's usual advantage. The Democrats' Senate committee had nearly double the available cash on hand as its Republican counterpart.

But Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), the House chair of the dinner, said in an interview: "I think this dinner is going to reestablish the cash advantage . . . that we've historically had."

McCrery said that "the atmosphere that hung over the political scene was a contributor to members having to make more phone calls to raise money for the dinner." But he added that good news for the president in recent weeks -- successes in Iraq and the clearing of his top adviser, Karl Rove -- encouraged Republicans and led to a spike in ticket-buying.

It cost $2,500 for a ticket to the dinner. Campaign finance regulations allow someone to contribute up to $25,000 per party committee. Last night, for that sum, attendees could be photographed with the president.

Sarah Feinberg, press secretary for the DCCC, said "the reality is" that Republicans are struggling to keep pace with what they have raised in years past while the DCCC "continues to break fundraising records. . . . The American people desperately want change and a new direction in Washington, and they are making that preference abundantly clear by contributing to Democratic campaigns."

But McCrery said the dinner marks a change in that pattern: "Republicans have certainly wrested the momentum from the Democrats."

Bush Helps Republicans Raise Cash (WP/AP)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Monday helped Republicans raise $27 million toward the fall congressional elections, acknowledging that the unfinished war in Iraq remains a top concern in a difficult political season.

"It is important to have members of the United States Congress who will not raise the white flag of surrender in the war on terror," Bush told donors at a fundraiser sponsored by House and Senate GOP campaign committees.

He criticized proposals, such as are being advocated by some leading Democrats in Congress, for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. "An early withdrawal would be a defeat for the United States," Bush told an audience of about 5,000 attendees at the Washington Convention Center.

Organizers said the event raised $27 million _ $15 million for Senate candidates and $12 million for House candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0035358

"We're prepared for an aggressive, effective campaign this year," House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who spoke before Bush, told the gathering.

Bush told his cheering, well-heeled audience, "We're going to keep the House and we're going to keep the Senate thanks to all of you here."

"We're going to win the war on terror _ if we don't lose our nerve," Bush said.

Polls show declining public support for the war in Iraq, which is weighing down Republicans on the ballot.

But while Republican candidates have been eagerly accepting the fundraising help that Bush can offer, his presence on the campaign trail has not been enthusiastically welcomed by all Republicans, particularly those in tough races.

Democrats have sought to tie Republican candidates to Bush administration policy on the war and on other contentious issues.

"At a time when our troops are fighting bravely in Iraq with no clear plan for victory, and the Republican-led Congress has abandoned much needed comprehensive immigration reform, the president has made raising millions from special interests his number one priority," said Karen Finney, communications director of the Democratic National Committee.

Still, Bush's hand has been strengthened by several weeks of good news from Iraq and domestically.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, speaking of Iraq, told the president, "We will stay with you until our job is done."

"We've got five months to remind Americans why they elected us," Frist added.

___

On the Net:

White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

National Republican Senatorial Committee: http://www.nrsc.org

Santorum Seeks Jewish Vote In His Tough Nov. Match-up (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Sen. Rick Santorum is aggressively pursuing support from the Jewish community as his tough November match-up with Democratic state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr. draws closer.

The Republican junior senator from Pennsylvania was scheduled to meet last night at Haverford College with Natan Sharansky, a former Soviet political prisoner who later became deputy prime minister of Israel.

Santorum's forum with the icon of Soviet Jewry was billed as a "conversation" on religious freedom, an issue Santorum has championed as co-chairman of a congressional working group on the subject. It also sent a signal to Israel's most ardent supporters that Santorum is with them.

Sharansky is a powerful symbol of right-wing Israeli politics, and his 2004 book The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror has been influential among neoconservatives in the Bush administration.

The Haverford event, moderated by leading neoconservative Daniel Pipes, was just the latest example of Santorum playing up his long-standing support for Israel during the campaign season. It will not be the last.

The senator surprised colleagues last week when he unsuccessfully tried to amend a defense authorization bill with a measure designed to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. The amendment was rejected after the White House and many senators opposed it on the grounds that it could disrupt U.S.-Iranian negotiations.

"The amendment runs counter to our efforts and those of the international community to present Iran with a clear choice regarding their nuclear ambitions," Jeffrey Bergner, assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs, wrote to Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R-Va.). "This amendment, if enacted, would shift unified international attention away from Iran's nuclear activities and create a rift between the U.S. and our closest international partners."

Some in the pro-Israel camp disagreed with Santorum's strategy or timing, but the substance of his amendment has support among hawks. And the episode allowed him to reiterate his tough stance toward Iran, a nation of great concern to Israel and its friends because of its potential nuclear capability.

Hawkish support for Israel figures to help Santorum not only with donors and any remaining undecided voters in Pennsylvania's Jewish community but with his base among evangelical Christian voters, who have increasingly become fierce advocates for Israel in recent years.

Activists in Pennsylvania's Jewish community say that even if Santorum is placing more emphasis on Israel lately his support is nothing new.

"It's not as if he's a Johnny-come-lately to this issue," said Robin Schatz, director of government affairs for the Jewish Federation of Greater Philadelphia. "Senator Santorum has really been a leader in terms of pro-Israel work in the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0035359

Santorum has a Religious Freedom Day celebration planned for today with several lawmakers and a variety of religious leaders. His working group on the topic meets about once a month when the Senate is in session, according to a Senate Republican leadership aide.

"Religious liberty is a huge passion of his because he thinks it's the first right, the first freedom. Without this freedom all the other ones are in trouble," the aide said.

Santorum's worldview embraces Israel as a model for other democracies in the Middle East, according to Ken Davis chairman of the Montgomery County Republican Party in southeastern Pennsylvania.

Davis, a Jewish activist, said Santorum's positions should make him attractive to voters for whom Israel's security is the top issue.

"Those in our community who think for themselves and recognize the importance of the issue will support the senator, and he deserves the support because he's been there all along," Davis said.

But Jewish voters have traditionally sided with Democrats because of their domestic policies, meaning Santorum gets mixed reviews in the Jewish community.

"He's very good on some of the issues that are important to us and not so good on others," Schatz said.

Even if he cannot win over Jews who side with Democrats on domestic issues, Santorum's support for Israel is helping him raise money. He ranks 10th among lawmakers in donations from pro-Israel groups, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, though it is impossible to track money from individual pro-Israel donors accurately.

"His beliefs here are the driving force, not the money — though they are certainly not mutually inconsistent," said G. Terry Madonna, a political scientist at Franklin & Marshall College. "Only about 2 percent of the voters are Jewish — not huge, but they are important disproportionately as funders and fundraisers."

In late April, Santorum sponsored a Senate resolution recognizing Holocaust Remembrance Day, even though it is Pennsylvania's other Republican senator, Arlen Specter, who is Jewish.

Next month he plans to host a "Jewish Leadership Summit" on Capitol Hill to discuss "foreign policy and religious-freedom issues." Invitees include White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), Specter, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Virginia Rep. Eric Cantor, the lone Jewish Republican in the House.

Dean's Brother Raps DSCC Over Stance On Lieberman (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman's (D-Conn.) refusal to rule out seeking re-election as an Independent should he lose the Aug. 8 Democratic primary has led to a verbal assault by the brother of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean on Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Democracy for America, the group that grew out of Dean's unsuccessful presidential bid and is now led by his brother, Jim Dean, is circulating a petition to Schumer calling on him to stand by the winner of the Democratic primary.

Democracy for America is backing Lieberman's challenger, millionaire cable-executive Ned Lamont.

Schumer "has said that the DSCC will not rule out supporting Lieberman if he runs as an Independent," a Democracy for America e-mail sent to supporters last week reads. "The DSCC's mission is to elect Democrats to the Senate. Yet in this case, they would prefer to back an incumbent who leaves the party instead of a principled progressive who's proud to be a Democrat."

Schumer has not said what the DSCC would do should Lamont best Lieberman and Lieberman decided to press on as an Independent.

"We'll cross that bridge when we come to it," Schumer told reporters last week.

And that is what has Democracy for America — and Howard Dean's brother — pressing Lieberman and Schumer.

"My reaction to all of this is that there's a lot of mumbling going on here," Jim Dean said in an interview. "We would really like Sen. Lieberman just to get clear about this."

Lieberman told The Hartford Courant Monday that he would not drop out of the Democratic primary but he stopped short of promising anything beyond that.

"I will be in the Democratic primary. I've been a Democrat all my life," Lieberman said. "If the unexpected happened, do I want to keep open the option of taking my case as an Independent Democrat to all the voters of Connecticut so that they can have the last word in November?"

Dean said national Democrats should call upon Lieberman to rule out an Independent bid.

"I wish the Democratic leadership of this party would take this seriously," Dean said. "This is the kind of thing that got us in trouble 15 years ago. The question for the DSCC is: 'do you support Democratic candidates or not?"

DOJ_NMG_0035360

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer would not answer the question directly.

"This is much ado about nothing: Joe Lieberman is and will remain a candidate in the Democratic primary," Singer said.

Should Lieberman lose — the latest polls show him comfortably leading Lamont — and should he continue on as an Independent with the DSCC's backing, the DSCC would lose credibility with many Democratic activists, Dean said.

"The battle in this party is not an ideological debate right now it's between the activist community and the culture of supporting incumbents" at all costs, Dean said.

He said that a number of big Democratic donors are unhappy with the DSCC's role, whether overt or behind-the-scenes — in some Senate primaries.

For instance, women's groups openly chided the DSCC for pursuing Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.) as Senate candidates, despite their opposition to abortion rights.

Casey, with the DSCC's help, ultimately became the challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) while Langevin opted not to take on Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

That rift healed but other Democratic activists were furious when national Democrats first courted, then pushed aside, Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett as the chosen Democrat to take on Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio).

"Getting Hackett out was not their best day," Dean said. "It's not a great time for Sen. Schumer to be arbitrarily deciding that it's up to him alone" to decide whom to endorse.

Schumer and other Democratic leaders are undoubtedly in a tough position as they figure out to handle a potential Lieberman Independent candidacy.

It is not unprecedented for the DSCC to support a like-minded Independent. The committee has made no secret that it is backing Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) as he attempts to win the open Senate seat in the Green Mountain State.

In that case, however, Democrats were able to clear the field for Sanders so that no strong Democrat sought the seat.

Sanders caucuses with Democrats in the House and said he would continue to do so if elected to the Senate.

In light of that, Dean said the DSCC should clarify its position on supporting Independents. Dean said he understands that his actions "will ruffle a few feathers" but that it is necessary to ensure that the party has clear policies in such matters.

If Dean's petition drive puts Schumer in a bind, it probably puts the DNC chairman in an even more awkward position.

"I don't really think of that very often because he's kind of on a different mission," Jim Dean said of his brother. "He's not as involved in federal races. He is building the 50-state strategy."

Dean was also careful to reiterate that he and his brother do not discuss business.

DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton would only say: "the DNC doesn't get involved in Democratic primaries."

McCain Weighs The Chance To Run Again (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

With the US presidential election more than two years away, most contemplating a tilt at the White House are cloaking their ambitions in euphemism and obfuscation.

But in this, as so much else, Senator John McCain is an unusual kind of politician. The Arizona Republican seems positively to relish talking about the prospect he may run in 2008 – even discussing how his family feels about the looming decision.

Mr McCain, who lost his party's nomination to George W. Bush in 2000 after staging a strong challenge, says his children, two still in their teens, would support him but grins that it might "cramp their style". His wife Cindy, on the other hand, "probably needs some more convincing". One of the downsides of the campaign trail, he reflects, is having to take "a lot of shots".

In a wide-ranging interview with the Financial Times, he gives the impression of a man weighing whether his chances of victory are worth the gargantuan effort, especially as, at 69, he would be the oldest ever to enter the White House. He muses: "The major question is, 'Do my talents, experience, and capabilities match up with the priorities of the American people, which mean that I would have a fairly good chance to gain the nomination of my party and win a general election?'"

In a political landscape marked by intense partisan battles, Mr McCain is an anomaly, a man so widely trusted that a recent poll found most Democrats would vote for a candidate he endorsed in the November congressional elections. Tortured by the Vietnamese during five and a half years as a prisoner of war, he has further bolstered his moral authority by taking up the cudgels over issues – notably campaign finance reform and anti-torture legislation – that have won him support far beyond his own party.

DOJ_NMG_0035361

Asked to explain his popularity, he says: "I think it is my reputation for independence, for straight talk." Nor is he shy about acknowledging his own charisma. "It sounds very self-serving, but [I have] a little star power. They've seen me on Jon Stewart, Jay Leno, David Letterman, hosting Saturday Night Live . . . "

But of late, the man many Democrats view as the acceptable face of the Republican party appears to have been courting its base, speaking warmly of Mr Bush and making overtures to the religious right, whose support he will need if he is capture the nomination in what promises to be a bitterly fought primary season.

He caught flak for speaking at Liberty University, the conservative institution run by the Reverend Jerry Falwell whom, during the 2000 campaign, he had branded an "agent of intolerance". But he rebuts claims that he is pandering to the religious right, pointing out that he also spoke at New School University, a liberal college.

He says his positions on issues such as torture, climate change and opposition to a proposed constitutional amendment that would abrogate states' rights over permitting gay marriage have not changed. "But I also understand that when you are the 'perceived frontrunner' every phrase is analysed, and every nuance is criticised in some quarters . . . " With a flash of vintage McCain charm he adds: "Still it is nicer to be the 'perceived frontrunner' than the 'perceived loser'."

His ease in discussing his candidacy is equalled by Hillary Clinton's reluctance even to acknowledge her status as the 'perceived' Democrat contender-in-chief. The man who turned down an invitation to be John Kerry's running-mate two years ago is seen as the prospective Republican candidate with the strongest "crossover" appeal to Democrat voters. It is perhaps no coincidence that he seems anxious to go head-to-head with Mrs Clinton, a polarising figure whom some Democrats would be reluctant to support. She "would be very interesting to run against", says Mr McCain. "First woman nominee, very smart, very tough, very principled."

Will the Democrats pick her as their standard-bearer? "Oh yeah. I don't know how she [will not be] the nominee of her party."

In the eyes of many, Mr McCain was a neo-conservative long before the creed became the dominant philosophy of Washington's governing elite. He was one of the small number of Republicans who supported military involvement in Bosnia in 1995 and was urging action to remove Saddam Hussein while Bill Clinton was still in the White House.

But in detailed exchanges about the thorniest foreign policy issues of the day – Iraq, Iran, North Korea – he is prepared to acknowledge that interventionism has its limits, even as he waxes impatient with Mr Bush's willingness to tolerate unpalatable regimes to achieve his foreign policy ends.

On Iraq Mr McCain's views are little different to those of Mrs Clinton. Both supported the war but have been highly critical of the way the Bush administration has managed the peace. On the day the FT spoke to him in his office in the Senate Russell building, Mr McCain had attended a briefing on Iraq by Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, and Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary with whom he has an antagonistic relationship.

Asked whether he is any happier with Mr Rumsfeld these days, his reply is crisp: "No." But he stops short of echoing the views of a group of retired generals who recently called for the defence secretary's resignation. "There is no point in me trying to get into an open confrontation with the secretary of defence," says Mr McCain. "It would harm our effort rather than help it."

The conclave with Mr Rumsfeld and Ms Rice followed a rare spate of good news from Iraq: the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq who was killed in a US air strike, and the completion of the Iraqi cabinet.

"I think that some of their optimism is understandable, but I hope that it doesn't turn into irrational exuberance because . . . it is still very long, very hard, very tough," cautions Mr McCain. But in contrast to the mass of the war's congressional critics, who are anxious to accelerate the timetable for pulling out some of America's 130,000 troops, Mr McCain argues that the US has too few boots on the ground and is "like the little Dutch boy with his thumb in the dyke". He points to a recent decision to divert troops from Falluja, a former insurgent stronghold, to deal with growing violence in Ramadi. He expresses concern about the mounting pressure on the administration to withdraw troops. But he has faith in Mr Bush, confident that he will not "make that announcement unless conditions on the ground justify it" – which he does not expect to be soon.

"When I hear of a major operation in Baghdad, or in the Sunni triangle, where the only support [the Iraqis] need is US air support, and it is successful, then I will believe that we have made progress," says Mr McCain. "When I can land at the airport at Baghdad and get into a vehicle and drive to the Green Zone, I will believe that we have made progress."

Mr McCain says the mistakes the US has made in Iraq have done significant damage, including emboldening Iran, a country for which he reserves his harshest condemnation.

Mr McCain supports the Bush administration's recent decision to back a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to abandon its nuclear programme and chides those who accuse the president of warmongering. "When [Mr Bush] says 'I am not taking the military option off the table', it is because you can't," says Mr McCain. "It doesn't mean you are considering the military option. But suppose we knew that Iran was going to attack Israel, are we saying that we would do nothing? Clearly, we can't do nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0035362

Asked whether he believes negotiations with Iran could produce a better outcome than the US has achieved in years of on-again, off-again talks with North Korea, Mr McCain replies that he is an "eternal optimist". But in a clue to his priorities were he to become president, he says that preventing countries from developing nuclear weapons will be one of the century's biggest challenges.

His sense of urgency is underscored by reports that North Korea is preparing to launch a long-range missile with the potential to hit the US. He fears such moves by Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, will eventually prompt Japan to develop offensive weapons, which he warns could re-ignite hostility between Japan and China.

"The key to all this . . . is China," says Mr McCain. "It is not in China's interest to see this kind of destabilisation. So why they don't put more pressure on the Dear Leader is something I simply do not understand."

He also expresses disappointment in the South Korean government, accusing it of bribing North Korea with its "sunshine policy" of increased economic engagement.

But while Mr McCain would like China to do more, he recognises that the US has little leverage. "Obviously, their exports to our markets are a vital part of their economic engine but, at the same time, [if] you start down this path of retaliation it sometimes lurches out of control," the senator warns.

Another country that receives his opprobrium for its crackdown on democracy is Russia. Relations between Washington and President Vladimir Putin took another turn for the worse last month after US vice-president Dick Cheney rebuked the Kremlin for using energy supplies as "tools of intimidation and blackmail".

Asked whether he was concerned that the US was alienating Russia, whose support is needed in US efforts to press Iran to give up its nuclear programme, he acknowledges that there needs to be a "careful balance". "I would have appreciated the vice-president's speech a lot more if he hadn't gone to Kazakhstan and praised a dictator in that country. His speech lost a little of its impact when he did that," he notes with a touch of irony.

Mr McCain appears to agree with critics of US foreign policy who scent a gap between rhetoric and reality in the Bush administration's approach to undemocratic regimes such as Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan and Saudi Arabia. Nursultan Nazarbayev, the Kazakh president, is expected soon to visit the White House – just months after Ilham Aliyev, the president of Azerbaijan, was hosted by Mr Bush.

In what sounds like his personal foreign policy doctrine, Mr McCain says he understands that there is always a tension between real-politik and a Wilsonian commitment to spreading democracy. But he warns that, "nine times out of 10 when we prop up dictatorial regimes, over time we pay a price for it".

He goes on: "Maybe the message is that we are more selective in our advocacy than perhaps we would like to be. I do think we run a risk. I met with Aliyev before the first election and I said, 'you have to have a free and fair election'. They didn't. In the case of Nazarbayev, these are true cults of personality that we are seeing and those things never last. They end up at some time in the dustbin of history."

Perhaps wary of being seen as embodying the neo-con commitment to removing undemocratic regimes by force, Mr McCain stresses that he does not contemplate military action to overthrow governments.

But he adds: "I believe our advocacy of freedom and democracy should not be defined by either geography or ethnicity." Will he be in a position to implement his philosophy? That may rest on whether an electorate, alarmed by the rising death toll in Iraq, is ready to embrace a man whose belief in spreading the American brand of democracy may exceed even that of George W. Bush.

Poll: Clinton Gets High 'no' Vote For 2008 (CNN)

CNN.com, June 20, 2006

(CNN) -- With the presidential election more than two years away, a CNN poll released Monday suggests that nearly half of Americans would "definitely vote against" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Respondents were asked whether they would "definitely vote for," "consider voting for," or "definitely vote against" three Democrats and three Republicans who might run for president in 2008.

Regarding potential Democratic candidates, 47 percent of respondents said they would "definitely vote against" both Clinton, the junior senator from New York who is running for re-election this year, and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's candidate in 2004. (Poll)

Forty-eight percent said the same of former Vice President Al Gore, who has repeatedly denied he intends to run again for president.

DOJ_NMG_0035363

Among the Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani fared better than the Democrats, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush fared worse.

Only 30 percent said they would "definitely vote against" Giuliani; 34 percent said that of McCain.

As for Bush, brother of the current president, 63 percent said there was no way he would get their vote. The younger Bush has denied interest in running for president in 2008.

Among all choices, Clinton had the highest positive number; of those polled, 22 percent said they would "definitely vote for" her.

Giuliani was next with 19 percent, followed by Gore with 17 percent, Kerry with 14 percent, McCain with 12 percent and Bush at 9 percent.

This telephone poll of 1,001 adult Americans was conducted June 1-6 by Harris Interactive for CNN. The poll had a sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Weekly Wal-Mart Shoppers Are Midterms' NASCAR Dads (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, June 20, 2006

In 2004, it was NASCAR dads. Before that, soccer moms.

In the upcoming elections, pollster John Zogby says, the parties need look no further than the biggest retail phenomenon in the world — Wal-Mart — for this year's elusive group of swing voters.

Zogby said he has found a direct correlation between how often Wal-Mart customers shop there and how reliably conservative they are. While this group voted overwhelmingly Republican in 2004, it is less entrenched than other conservative groups, and Zogby's numbers indicate it is wavering.

"Wal-Mart is so much more than retail," Zogby said. "It's a religion out there."

According to a study by Scarborough Research, Wal-Mart shoppers are, on the whole, evenly divided between Republican and Democrat. Of those who had shopped at Wal-Mart in the past three months — three-fourths of the sample — 32 percent identified themselves as Republicans and 29 percent as Democrats.

But as the shopping trips to Wal-Mart become more frequent, Zogby said, it's a different story. The more they shop there, the more conservative they've tended to be.

Today those weekly Wal-Mart shoppers are giving Bush a 35 percent approval rating and rate Republicans in Congress 27 percent positive, and 20 percentage points more of them prefer a Democratic-led Congress than prefer a Republican one.

They also rate Democrats better on jobs and the economy, healthcare and taxes. But they still give Republicans higher marks for family values and fighting terrorism, two supposed linchpins of Bush's reelection.

Zogby, who is researching the topic for a book he's writing, said that weekly Wal-Mart shoppers represent about one-fifth of the population and that people who never shop there represent about a quarter, making both groups significant parts of the electorate.

He said that he's still surmising what issues sway weekly Wal-Mart shoppers the most but that he believes the war in Iraq and the economy are likely candidates.

The household income of a "regular" Wal-Mart shopper averages about $35,000 and 57 percent of Southerners shop there regularly, according to a Pew Research Center study. Comparatively, only 24 percent of Northeasterners shop regularly at Wal-Mart, though nearly half stop in "once in a while."

In 2004, NASCAR dads were thought to be a crucial swing vote, although many experts came to express doubt about the theory. In previous elections, it was soccer moms. NASCAR dads were blue-collar white men from rural areas of the South; soccer moms were moderate mothers concerned about healthcare, education and taxes.

There is significant overlap between weekly Wal-Mart shoppers and a group Pew has defined as "pro-government conservatives." According to a study issued after the 2004 election, 1 out of 10 voters falls into this group, which gave Bush 15 percent of his base in 2004. Slightly more than half are Republicans, while another 35 percent identify themselves as Republican-leaning independents.

These Wal-Mart shoppers, for the most part, are conservative on social issues such as gay marriage and abortion and tend to be rural and religious. But they also believe in social programs for the poor, are often poor themselves, don't like Bush's tax cuts and are less supportive of preemptive force and the war in Iraq than other conservatives.

While they voted with Republicans on social issues and national security in the past, they are more susceptible to drifting toward the Democratic column than other conservatives, said Pew Director of Survey Research Scott Keeter.

DOJ_NMG_0035364

"We do think that this is a group that potentially is having anxieties economically right now, about healthcare and the like, and while they may be cross-pressured on social issues … right now the economic issues may be more important to them," Keeter said. "And it could be that the war in Iraq is also a source of anxiety because there is at least some evidence that more of the direct impact of people fighting in the war is being felt by people in more rural areas."

According to the Pew study, despite voting 5-1 for Bush in 2004, 38 percent of pro-government conservatives had a positive view of the Democratic Party and more than half like both Bill and Hillary Clinton.

Zogby said the weekly Wal-Mart shoppers and the Pew group are indeed similar.

"'Pro-government conservatives' is very true," Zogby said. "There are all sorts of clusters. But we know where many of them are on a weeknight in America."

Wal-Mart founder Sam Walton was not considered a political man, but the backlash against Wal-Mart's wage levels and benefits, mostly from the left, has made the world's biggest retailer an increasingly hot-button political topic.

Another Zogby poll from late 2005, commissioned by an anti-Wal-Mart website, said more than half of the country thinks Wal-Mart is "bad for America." A Pew poll, released two weeks later, put that number at 24 percent.

Many of Wal-Mart's battles are being fought on the local level, with communities deciding whether to allow the retail giant to build stores in their neighborhoods. But labor, healthcare and other issues have led the company to increase its national political presence considerably over the past decade.

Wal-Mart's contributions to national political candidates have increased steadily in recent years, and Republicans are on the receiving end of most of the giving. In the 2004 election cycle, Wal-Mart's PAC gave more than $1.3 million to Republicans and $370,000 to Democrats. Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.) received the most, with $17,500, and dozens got $10,000 or more.

Its PAC and employees gave more than $2 million overall to federal candidates and parties, making it the second-biggest miscellaneous business benefactor, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. This cycle it ranks fifth, with more than a half-million dollars in contributions.

Lee Culpepper, Wal-Mart's lead lobbyist in Washington, said Republicans' more favorable attitude toward business and the fact that there are simply more of them in Congress have made them more attractive for PAC contributions.

"When you put those two factors together, it's understandable why you'd have more support for Republicans than Democrats," Culpepper said.

But he said that's changing as the PAC grows. The split is now 71-29 percent in favor of Republicans, down from 93-7 during the 1998 cycle, when it gave just $135,000.

"Our PAC … has been increasing support to Democratic candidates who support business," he said.

Governor's Troubles Threaten G.O.P. In Kentucky (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

FRANKFORT, Ky. — The real risk in noodling, which involves sticking your arm into a catfish nesting hole and yanking out whatever swallows your fist, is not in getting caught doing it out of season, but in reaching too far into the hole and getting snagged by spiny fins.

Just consider the case of Gov. Ernie Fletcher of Kentucky.

A year ago, after being accused of illegally forcing Democrats out of state Civil Service jobs and giving the jobs to political loyalists, Mr. Fletcher, a Republican, dismissed the charges as little worse than noodling in March. (Noodling is legal only from June 1 to Aug. 31.)

But 15 indictments later, Mr. Fletcher's administration — including his self-titled Disciples, accused of being the ringleaders of the patronage scheme — is still feeling the sting as his approval ratings drop below 30 percent.

Most of his former backers, including his mentor, Senator Mitch McConnell, have distanced themselves from him, and Democrats point to the case as another example of Republican corruption and overreach. Mr. Fletcher was indicted on three misdemeanor charges; while on vacation in Florida in early June, he had his lawyer enter a plea of not guilty.

The accusations have threatened to reverse a tide that Republicans in the state have worked for more than a decade to turn in their favor. With the party controlling the State Senate and just shy of a majority in the House, many Republicans viewed Mr. Fletcher's easy victory in 2003 as the dawning of a new political era for the Bluegrass State.

"The state is still potentially a swing state, and this will certainly slow its drift toward Republicanism," said Al Cross, a political writer and professor of journalism at the University of Kentucky. "This is definitely being amplified by what is going on in Washington. We can expect a lot more wind to be in the face of Republicans at a time when the state was trending their way."

DOJ_NMG_0035365

To add to his troubles, Mr. Fletcher, the first Republican governor here in more than 30 years, lost a highly public effort to force the chairman of the state Republican Party to step down. In June he fired his fifth press secretary, and in the same week he began warring with his lieutenant governor, Steve Pence, who announced he would not share the ticket with Mr. Fletcher in 2007. Mr. Pence has refused to step down from office despite a request from the governor that he do so.

Mr. Fletcher insists, however, that he is not worried about the fallout.

"I trust that if we keep doing the right thing, our accomplishments will speak for themselves," he said in an interview, citing job growth, tax reform and balancing the budget as his top achievements. "The bottom line is that we're not going to let these folks run us out of town."

Mr. Fletcher contends that the investigation into his office is a partisan witch hunt and that the state's attorney general, Gregory D. Stumbo, a Democrat, has aspirations to run for governor.

The charges against Mr. Fletcher — conspiracy, official misconduct and political discrimination — were brought on May 11. The 14 other members of his administration who have been indicted are charged with a total of 23 felonies and 60 misdemeanors for, among other things, criminal conspiracy and evidence tampering. In August 2005, Mr. Fletcher issued a blanket pardon protecting everyone in his administration but himself from prosecution.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Stumbo, Vicki Glass, dismissed Mr. Fletcher's accusation that there was a political motive for the charges.

"In light of the judge's request that we not talk about the case, we're letting the court proceedings speak for themselves," Ms. Glass said, standing in Mr. Stumbo's office, its walls lined with large bass that the attorney general had caught on fishing trips. While not ruling out a run for governor once his investigation ends, Mr. Stumbo has said he intends to see the case through to conclusion.

Whatever the motivation behind them, the charges have succeeded in tripping up a man with grand political ambitions and the résumé to help him fulfill them.

An ordained minister, a family physician and a former fighter pilot, Mr. Fletcher, who was elected in 2003 by a 10-percentage-point margin, has spent much of his tenure trying to keep his administration in one piece. Of the nine cabinet members who started with him two years ago, only three remain in office. In early June, Mr. Fletcher fired Brett Hall, his fifth press secretary, after Mr. Hall accused leaders of the state Republican Party of scheming to undermine the governor.

Asked what adjectives he would use to describe morale in the administration, Stan Cave, Mr. Fletcher's chief of staff, paused before laughing. "I'm not sure you can print the ones I'd like to choose," Mr. Cave said. "So let's go with angry, frustrated, but still resolved to proceed."

He said that with a grand jury consisting entirely of Democrats and with perceptions of conflict of interest swirling around the case, he did not see how anyone could argue that the investigation was apolitical. The two judges who handled the case early later recused themselves.

But Mark Nickolas, a blogger who runs BluegrassReport.org and is the former campaign manager for Representative Ben Chandler, Mr. Fletcher's opponent in 2003, made just that argument.

"The administration keeps peddling these ludicrous conspiracy theories," Mr. Nickolas said. "Really, what we have here is a microcosm of the Republicans' national problem, which is they play by their own rules even if it's against the law."

The governor is permitted to fill 4,000 political jobs. But the attorney general says Mr. Fletcher sought to fill many of the state's 32,000 merit-based jobs with political allies.

Others say that Mr. Fletcher did what governors have always done, but that his staff made the mistake of leaving an e-mail trail.

"The patronage system was tuned up and well oiled over the last generation and a half," Mr. Hall, the former press secretary, told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution in December.

The Democrats "knew exactly what they were doing," he said. "They were smart enough not to use e-mail. We weren't."

But others say Mr. Fletcher's actions were distinct for their scope and context.

"It's true that the Democrats in the state have greased the machine, but in this case what the Republicans built was a finely tuned hydraulic mechanism," said Professor Cross of the University of Kentucky. "What we are really talking about here is a rare and up-close look at the grease that makes the machinery of politics work."

As a Republican running the executive branch after such a long period of Democratic rule, Mr. Fletcher faced an unusual level of pressure, especially from rural Republicans. Many accusations center on the state's transportation cabinet, partly because in poorer regions of Kentucky, there is no political capital more precious than state positions as road crew supervisors or backhoe operators. The jobs pay well, are relatively secure and require limited qualifications.

DOJ_NMG_0035366

Mr. Cross added that Mr. Fletcher had also had trouble taking the political high ground in the case since his main campaign promise was to end the "good ol' boys network" and "clean up the mess in Frankfort" created by the former governor, who left at the end of his term amid a sex scandal.

The problems for Mr. Fletcher started the morning of May 11, 2005, when a former supporter and transportation cabinet official delivered to the attorney general a box with hundreds of pages of printouts of e-mail messages and other documents from Fletcher administration officials.

Featuring a list of Civil Service workers to be fired or exiled because of party affiliation, the documents revealed the existence of 12 officials who called themselves the Disciples and who pursued with religious zeal a systematic plan to clean house of Democrats.

"No one on earth faced more adversity than the Apostles — we should not think we are any different," said one e-mail message between two coordinators of the plan, known as the Governor's Personnel Initiative. "As 'change agents' and 'missionaries' of the governor, our task will not always be embraced by those around us."

Throughout, the two sides fought every step of the way. In a 48-hour standoff on May 13, 2005, armed guards for the transportation cabinet blocked another set of armed guards from the attorney general's office from entering a transportation building to seize records.

On Aug. 29, after the first nine of his administration officials were indicted, Mr. Fletcher issued a blanket pardon covering these officials and anyone else other than himself who might be indicted. A trial date is tentatively set for Nov. 8, the day after the state's general election.

The drama is not without precedent. The last governor, Paul E. Patton, a Democrat, spent most of his last year in office fending off accusations of campaign irregularities, bad press about a lengthy extramarital affair and revelations that several of his employees had used their work computers to view pornography. Before leaving office, Mr. Patton further outraged Kentuckians when he pardoned his chief of staff and three others charged with breaking election laws.

Despite a recent poll that found that 54 percent of the state's voters wanted Mr. Fletcher to resign, he remains upbeat. "Our folks have made some mistakes, and we have made some corrections," he said. "I think we will come through this."

And as for noodling?

"I like fly-fishing, myself," Mr. Fletcher said with a chuckle. "Noodling is risky if you don't want to get stung by catfish whiskers."

The Airbus Debacle (WSJ)

By Richard Aboulafia

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Production delays. Political infighting. Cost and time overruns. Sounds like a typical day at any large aircraft corporation, and last week's news of another big setback for delivering Airbus's A380 550-seat mega-jetliner fits this pattern. Yet the market isn't taking all these problems at the European plane maker in stride, wiping away much of Airbus parent company European Aeronautic Defense and Space Co.'s gains since it was created six years ago. Investors were far more understanding a few years back when Boeing went through similar crises. A double standard? If only it were so.

The biggest problem for Airbus today, to put it gently, is that its superjumbo should never have been born. The A380 program was launched in 2000 in the face of considerable skepticism. Aircraft were getting smaller, not larger. New technologies allowed long-range travel with great economies. Passengers wanted direct flights offering more choices, more often. Airlines wanted smaller planes to get rid of discount travelers. The A380 was a $13 billion bet on a shrinking niche.

Not surprisingly, the giant plane has proven unpopular. In the six years since its birth, it has won 159 orders, including 45 from Emirates, a carrier pursuing the unusual strategy of ordering scores of each type of plane to meet high growth expectations.

In the same period, the mid-sized long-range widebodies, led by Boeing's new high-tech 787, have racked up more than 700 orders. One notch larger, 300/400-seat planes have garnered another 500 orders led by Boeing's 777. The A380/747 niche is 5%-10% of the market by value of total annual deliveries; the smaller widebodies comprise half.

Worse, after securing the small list of customers that actually need a few planes this big, the A380 order book has grown at only a very modest pace for the last four years. Other than Emirates, no airline has ordered more than a token number. The mid-size 250/300-seat market, meanwhile, is gathering steam, with blue-chip carriers such as British Airways, Lufthansa and even Emirates now shopping for new long-range jets in this class.

Airbus is desperately seeking resources to compete with the 787 and 777 with its own new plane. Customers criticized its initial offering, the A350, so it now needs $10 billion to create an all-new family, the A370 series. But money and engineers are tied up in the A380 program. When the superjumbo delay news broke, Singapore Airlines ordered 20 787 "Dreamliners," casting a no-confidence vote in Airbus's ability to fund the A370. Meanwhile, Boeing might follow the 787 with a new narrowbody, necessitating an Airbus response to compete in that 40%-45% of the market.

DOJ_NMG_0035367

This means that, with the A380, Airbus is racing to deliver something that's a mere sideshow. The delays are simply bitter icing on an unpalatable cake. * * *

How did this disaster happen? When Airbus was born in 1970, it was a defensive creation, a way for Europe to save its legacy jet industries from U.S. dominance. They pooled their resources with government support and created a European widebody, the A300. The first 20 years weren't easy, but Airbus did much better than other European jetliner projects like the notoriously money-losing Concorde.

Starting in the late 1980s, Airbus moved from defense to offense. It launched the A320 narrowbody and A330/340 widebody families. It helped drive Lockheed and McDonnell Douglas out of the market. By 1997, Airbus and Boeing formed a duopoly. That carried political implications for American-European relations.

Airbus still enjoyed government nurturing. It was the only notable success for publicly funded European industrial policy. European politicians were eager to underwrite and take credit for an impressive achievement. When Airbus created plans for the world's biggest jetliner in the mid-1990s, they knew they could count on government support.

Airbus didn't need to be overly careful with the A380's bottom line. Government launch aid was good for one-third of development costs. These loans were legal under the terms of the U.S.-EU 1992 jetliner aid agreement. Private cash was easier and cheaper to get since investors knew Europe's hapless taxpayers would be the last to be repaid.

If the market for large aircraft looked dubious, well, Airbus proposed duty-free shopping courts and restaurants aboard its new jumbo, unrealistic and borderline-absurd ideas designed to stimulate airline demand. From a business standpoint, this "whole new way to fly" was nonsense. Yet bureaucrats saw national pride at stake, hence a slam-dunk reason to invest public cash. They've basked in reflected glory, with European prime ministers and officials attending every major A380 milestone. Jacques Chirac, the French president, responded to last week's news by expressing "total confidence" in the program. That looks to be wishful thinking from a government that enjoys messing around in its nation's industries.

A board of diverse, apolitical and independent shareholders would never have tolerated the risk associated with such a shallow business case. Here the distinction from Boeing's difficulties becomes apparent.

A few years ago, Boeing looked like it was in Airbus-like dire straits, yet the situation was in fact very different. Before launching the 787 in 2004, Boeing spent eight years shortchanging its product line but returning billions to shareholders. Airbus spent a fortune on its product line, but misinvested horribly, jeopardizing return on investment. Thus, it was easy for Boeing to start raising cash for the 787. Meantime, investor patience with Airbus is running thin, just as its parent company seeks buyers for some of the shares that its major French and German industrial shareholders, Lagardère and DaimlerChrysler respectively, are looking to dispose of. EADS also needs money to buy BAE System's 20% Airbus stake. Adding to EADS's woes, market regulators are investigating large share sales in March, before the A380 news went public, by senior company executives, including the French co-CEO, Noël Forgeard.

Boeing has also suffered technical snags with its jets, most recently its ambitious and risky all-composite body for the 787. But Boeing pursued the right market segment. Even if the 787 stumbles, Boeing would recover, since that plane satisfies strong demand and brings in cash. Airbus, by contrast, is merely racing to build a handful of A380s so it can transfer resources to a more important aircraft.

Airbus faces a difficult path. Even if it can fund a new jet family, it doesn't have much credibility with customers right now. Airbus needs to do a brutally honest assessment of the A380 and determine whether it will ever turn cash positive, and whether it is worth the risk of losing ground in the other 90%-95% of the market for civilian aircraft. Canceling the A380 program altogether should be an option on the table.

Resources and customers need to be found for the A370. Unless it happens fast the program won't get going until after Boeing runs off with the up-front demand. And a chastened Airbus will have learned an important lesson from the A380: Easy public money comes with a high price.

Mr. Aboulafia is vice president of analysis for Teal Group Corp., a Washington-based aerospace and defense consultancy.

Save Our SIPP (NYT)

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The House Appropriations Committee today will take up a recommendation by President Bush to eliminate a government survey that is arguably the best source of information on the real-world effect of public programs that help the poor.

Established by the Census Bureau in 1984, the Survey of Income and Program Participation, or SIPP, is used extensively by analysts inside and outside the government. Over the decades, its rich detail has been indispensable in determining how well, or poorly, government has performed in critical areas. These include insuring and educating children, moving people from welfare to work and providing food stamps. Killing the survey would create a devastating void in public information starting in 2007. It would take until 2010, at the earliest, to complete an alternative survey. Losing years of reliable data would make it all too easy to base policy decisions on ideology rather than on evidence. The lack of objective data would also make it very difficult to hold politicians accountable for their decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0035368

The survey costs all of about $32 million a year. Unless appropriators come up with more, the financing for next year will fall to $3.6 million, a sum mainly intended to finish data gathering that has already been started. Another $5.6 million would be allocated to begin developing the alternative survey.

Representative José Serrano, Democrat of New York, plans to offer an amendment raising the appropriation by an additional $10 million — not enough to keep the survey going strong, but enough to keep it alive for now. Congress should then make it a priority to come up with the full amount needed to save this font of invaluable public information.

Failure In Richmond (WP)

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

WHAT WAS supposed to happen by March 11 in Virginia finally occurred just this past weekend: Exhausted lawmakers in Richmond reached a budget deal, averting the risk of a shutdown in state government operations at the end of this month. The conferees heaved a sigh of relief at having achieved this basic function of legislative governance after three months in stealth special session. Good for them. We hope they'll excuse the rest of us for issuing a loud Bronx cheer, for in fact they have failed.

Principally, they have failed to address the single most momentous challenge facing the state at the outset of the 21st century, which is the parlous, sclerotic condition of its highways and transit systems. By failing to agree on any long-term, reliable funding to improve the transportation network, they also have failed to ensure the sustainability of Virginia's economic boom. It's not just asphalt they failed to provide; it's jobs, growth and a future.

Blame the Republicans, for this was a fight within and about the state GOP -- between moderate Republicans in the state Senate and fundamentalist anti-tax ideologues in the House of Delegates. So dysfunctional is the Republican Party of Virginia that GOP senators and delegates couldn't even agree on what they were fighting about. Senators, easily the more sensible of the two, were convinced they were haggling over transportation. For delegates, the fight was about proving their dogmatic purity -- and giving an energetic new Democratic governor a black eye in the bargain.

The result is a travesty. State transportation planners have spoken about a minimum need of $1 billion a year in new transportation funding to make improvements, especially for the heavy traffic in Northern Virginia and Tidewater. In the event, the budget, shorn by the House of new taxes and fees, contains barely half that, and only for the next two years -- and even some of that may also be cut if there is no longer-term strategy agreed on by the two houses by this fall. Sadly, the prospects of fashioning any kind of long-term strategy are not good. That is largely because lawmakers from outside Northern Virginia and Tidewater do not feel the pain of the economically dynamic areas of the state.

Of course, the transportation problem is not going away; Virginia has done nothing to increase long-term funding for roads in 20 years, while population and traffic have multiplied. Even the extremists in the House acknowledge that the budget does too little for transportation (though, perversely, they blame the Senate). And all are acutely aware that without long-range resolution, maintenance will take up all available funds for roads within a few years, leaving nothing for new construction and other improvements.

Faced with such a failure -- and the prospect of punishment at the polls in 2007, when all 140 seats in the General Assembly are up for election -- the Republicans are already planning another special session for the summer or early fall. Given the party split, there's modest reason at best to think another session will come out better. If it does not, Virginians should use the next election to find more responsible leadership.

Iran Urged To Accept Limits (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

KINGS POINT, N.Y., June 19 -- President Bush said Monday that the package of incentives being offered to Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions is a "historic opportunity," and he warned starkly that the alternative for the Islamic nation is increased isolation and crippling economic sanctions.

Speaking at the 70th commencement ceremony of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, Bush said Iran's stated desire for a peaceful nuclear power program is "legitimate," and one supported by the incentive package from the United States and its allies.

DOJ_NMG_0035369

"We believe the Iranian people should enjoy the benefits of a truly peaceful program to use nuclear reactors to generate electric power," said Bush, who in the past has expressed skepticism about the need for oil-rich Iran to pursue nuclear power.

Still, Bush said, the rest of the world has to be sure that Iran's program does not include any covert military goals, as the United States suspects, because a nuclear-armed Iran would be a "grave threat to people everywhere."

The president's remarks came a day before he was to depart for Vienna for meetings with the European Union, which has been involved in long-running negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program. Bush angered many leaders in Europe with the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, but his administration has worked closely with them in trying to present a united front toward Iran.

"I have a message for the Iranian regime: America and our partners are united," Bush said. "We have presented a reasonable offer. Iran's leaders should see our proposal for what it is -- an historic opportunity to set their country on a better course. If Iran's leaders want peace and prosperity and a more hopeful future for their people, they should accept our offer, abandon any ambitions to obtain nuclear weapons, and come into compliance with their international obligations."

The Bush administration has agreed to join negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program. It also has joined with Britain, France, Russia, Germany and China in making an offer to allow Iran to develop a strictly supervised civilian nuclear power program if it abandons its uranium-enrichment efforts. The U.S. offer of joining negotiations marked the first time since the 1979 hostage crisis that the United States has offered to enter substantial negotiations with Iran.

Iran has denied seeking to develop nuclear weapons and argued that it has a right to develop a civilian nuclear program. But its leaders also have made some conciliatory remarks about the offer.

In his remarks, Bush also said that he hoped to use his impending trip to enlist members of the European Union to help build stronger international support for Iraq's fledgling democracy. "The European Union has been the world's most -- among the world's most generous financial donors for reconstruction in Iraq. And Europe and America will encourage greater international support to help," he said.

The 202 Merchant Marine Academy graduates sat on the school's football field in brilliant sunshine as Bush -- the first sitting president to address the academy -- delivered his speech. Former White House chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., who attended the academy, accompanied Bush to the commencement ceremony and sat on the speaker's platform while Bush spoke. Graduates of the academy go to work as mates and engineers in the nation's maritime fleet, while 39 of this year's graduates are entering various branches of the armed forces.

Bush's Visit, Speech Thrill Midshipmen (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 20, 2006

KINGS POINT, N.Y. — To most Americans coming off the final weekend of spring, President Bush's commencement address here Monday was just another graduation speech, one of more than 4,000 this year on campuses across the country.

But to the staff, faculty, midshipmen and friends of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, it was a huge deal, a dream come true — the first time in the service academy's 63-year history that a president accepted an invitation to address the graduates.

Bush underscored the point in his address: “I hope it's worth the wait,” he quipped when he took the podium Monday, buoyed by cheers that rang out from the 202 graduates and about 5,000 guests who jammed the football bleachers under sunny skies. The scenic campus on Long Island Sound, about 10 miles east of Manhattan, was once the summer estate of auto baron Walter Chrysler.

West Point and the Naval, Air Force and Coast Guard Academies have all hosted presidents at their graduations, many times — but never the Merchant Marine, even though it is a full-fledged federal service academy whose graduates have fought in every major conflict since World War II. Most serve as deck officers or engineers on commercial ships or on land as port security officers or engineers with shipbuilding and trading companies. Many immediately go on active duty in the military; 39 plan to do so this year.

Bush used his speech, which came on the eve of his trip to Vienna for a U.S.-European Union summit, to send a message that the United States and Europe are united against Iran's development of nuclear weapons. “If Iran's leaders want peace and prosperity and a more hopeful future for their people, they should … abandon any ambitions to obtain nuclear weapons,” Bush said.

Newsday said on its website Monday that about 300 protesters — forced to assemble off campus — sang and waved signs during Bush's speech, encouraging passing cars to honk for peace. Later, about 60 protesters marched about a mile to an intersection near the gates of the academy. Guarded by more than a dozen police officers, they chanted: “No justice, no peace. U.S. out of the Middle East.”

DOJ_NMG_0035370

Hosting the president was expensive and hectic, as arrangements had to be shifted at the last minute, but academy officials, midshipmen and parents of the graduates said it was worthwhile.

"We're really proud. It's not very often the Merchant Marine Academy is recognized," said graduate Timothy Sallee, 22, of Charleston, S.C.

Indeed, the feeling that the Merchant Marine Academy is a "stepchild" among the better-known service academies is pervasive here. Bush's coming offered a sense of legitimacy.

"We're the fourth-oldest service academy, but clearly the least known," said Capt. Eric Willischeck, who headed the graduation planning committee.

In his speech, Bush played off the academy's motto — "Deeds, not words" — to praise its value and service to the nation. "In times of war, the Merchant Marine is the lifeline of our troops overseas, carrying critical supplies, equipment, and personnel," he said.

The White House wouldn't say what made Bush accept the invitation this year, but former White House chief of staff Andrew Card had a lot to do with it. Card was a student here in 1966-67 before he left to get married, and he has maintained strong ties with the school. Card said he and homeland security adviser Fran Townsend both lobbied Bush to come here to highlight the role the academy plays in critical areas such as port and container security.

"I really admire the work they do," Card said.

Bush, who brought Card to the commencement with him on Air Force One, joked that as a plebe at the academy, Card was stuffed into a duffel bag and run up the flagpole.

"I know he appreciates the much warmer welcome he received here today," Bush said to laughter.

Bush's visit illustrates the price of all the beneficial attention the president brings when he comes to visit.

When word came in March that Bush was coming, the planning began for the logistical and security arrangements necessary to accommodate him. Academy officials drew up budgets, coordinated with the White House and hired a professional production company to oversee the arrangements.

While a normal graduation draws a crowd of 1,500, word of Bush's visit provoked a flood of requests for tickets that more than tripled the usual attendance. The bigger crowd and the demands of media coverage led to the construction of temporary bleachers for 1,000 on the football field, a 35-foot stage with TV-quality lighting and a stadium-quality sound system; the cobbling together of 2,000 feet of bike racks as security fencing; plus tents to accommodate the media and a holding area for the president.

Off-campus satellite parking lots had to be found and 15 buses hired to bring ticket holders onto campus.

The academy estimated the cost at $405,000. Part will be offset by federal appropriations, alumni contributions and reimbursement from the White House media for their accommodations.

"The rest we'll have to eat within our existing budget," Willischeck said, adding that it's worth it. "Now we can say we've had our president."

Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory (NSDY)

By Olivia Winslow

Long Island Newsday, June 20, 2006

It was just before 7 a.m., and Cheryl Coffman of Macon, Ga., was early. But so was everyone else.

Coffman was in a cab that found itself merely inching along Steamboat Road yesterday, part of a long line of cars headed toward the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, where three hours later President George W. Bush would deliver the commencement address.

When it was clear it would be quicker to proceed on foot, Coffman got out of the cab and joined scores of others walking along the tree-lined street to witness not only a joyous graduation ceremony, but also history.

But Coffman wasn't complaining. Not about the heavy security or the need to be at the academy's Tomb Field an hour before the president's arrival.

"I'm not too surprised at all," Coffman said. "We expected a lot of people." Coffman had come to witness the graduation of a cousin, Amy Tribble of Rome, Ga. "I'm just so proud of her I don't know what to do."

About 4,400 people -- nearly three times the number of people who normally attend the academy's graduations -- attended the ceremony, where Bush's appearance marked the first time a sitting president had visited the academy since it was dedicated in 1943.

Many people thought that Bush's visit would give greater recognition to the academy, perhaps the least known of the five federal service academies, along with those training future members of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Coast Guard.

DOJ_NMG_0035371

Bush noted in his address the Merchant Marine Academy's service to the nation over the years, saying it is the only one of the five service academies where even before graduation students are sent into the theater of war -- during their year at sea. That fact means the Kings Point campus is alone among the academies authorized to fly the country's battle standard.

Bush's presence, valedictorian Peter James Radzicki of Mint Hill, N.C., said in his speech, "brings hope and legitimacy to an academy that at times has felt forgotten."

John Arntzen of Staten Island, a 1979 alumnus of the academy and now vice chairman of the academy's Alumni Foundation, said the president's appearance brings much-needed attention to the role the academy and merchant marines play in the nation's commerce generally, and in a time of war. He and others said merchant mariners transport most of the supplies to the nation's armed forces.

"We're very happy with the president's arrival," Arntzen said. It means, he added, "there's more focus on the mission of the school to the country's national defense."

Under a bright sky and intense heat, thousands waited patiently for the president in Tomb Field, under the watchful eyes of the Secret Service and Nassau County police. When shortly before 10 a.m. a dark green helicopter flew overhead with the words United States of America clearly visible, people applauded. "It's him!" someone cried.

The crowd greeted Bush with hearty applause and cheers. During his half-hour speech, he praised the academy midshipmen for their service and sacrifices over the years, and also previewed his trip to Europe beginning today. His words were often interrupted with applause.

Bush shook the hand of all 202 graduates, often waving in the direction of each graduate's family. Others went even further, hugging the president.

Kelsey Newell, 21, of Honolulu, said it was all "unbelievable. I never could have imagined this would come," as her parents, Pamela and Capt. Steve Newell of the Coast Guard gathered near. "I couldn't be any more pleased," her father said beaming.

"It's a really great day," Anthony McDonald, 23, of Weymouth, Mass., said after the ceremony.

"It's surreal to have the president here. Every year they say, we're trying to get the president," McDonald said.

But it wasn't until this year that it finally happened.

Bush, At Merchant Academy, Warns Iran On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

KINGS POINT, N.Y., June 19 — On the day before he was to depart for a meeting with European allies in Vienna, President Bush issued a stiff warning to Iran on Monday, saying it should suspend its uranium enrichment program now or face "progressively stronger" economic sanctions and further political isolation.

Mr. Bush reiterated the United States' offer to join multinational talks with Iran, but only if it immediately ceased uranium production. If Iran rejects that offer, he said, "It will result in action before the Security Council, further isolation from the world and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

Still, he mixed his stern oratory with words of inducement. Speaking at a commencement ceremony at the United States Merchant Marine Academy here, he promised Iran that compliance would result in huge benefits for its economy and its people. He indicated that the United States was open to allowing Iran to develop civilian nuclear capacity, though under the proper "safeguards," keeping the administration's recent agreement on the possibility of future enrichment by Iran if it can provide sufficient proof that its program is peaceful.

White House aides said the address was in part meant to serve as a table-setter for discussions about the nuclear standoff with Iran that are expected as part of a broader agenda this week at the United States-European Union summit meeting.

"It's in some way teeing up what is going to be a topic of conversation, one of many, at the European Union consultations this week," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, told reporters on the way here aboard Air Force One.

The talks about talks with Iran remain in a delicate place. The prospect of a deal hinges on Iran's willingness to drop what it says is its sovereign right to develop nuclear power sources and on how the West will ultimately be willing to define the word "suspend." Some of the negotiating partners have indicated a readiness to allow Iran to keep its centrifuges — which enrich uranium into a form that can fuel reactors or atom bombs — idle but online during talks. The United States has not shown any softening of its stand that the centrifuges must be completely shut down for talks to begin.

Officials signaled that their strategy this week would concentrate more on building a unified front with Europe in pressing Iran to suspend its program than it would on making any breakthrough with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0035372

While stressing unity with Europe, Mr. Bush reprised some of his tougher language about the Iranian political leadership, telling the graduates, "The leaders of Iran sponsor terror, deny liberty and human rights to their people, and threaten the existence of our ally, Israel."

But, tapping into the internal politics of Iran with a message that seemed aimed at its more liberal intellectual classes, Mr. Bush praised its culture and civilization. "Through the centuries, Iranians have achieved distinction in medicine and science and poetry and philosophy, and countless other fields," he said.

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said that unless Iran responded to Mr. Bush's offer while he was in Europe, the negotiations were unlikely to produce any developments. "At this point, the next step is really waiting for the response from the Iranian regime," he said.

Mr. Bush would not be able to make great strides on Iran anyway, because he is meeting only with the core of the European Union leadership this week, not heads of state.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said Monday that Iran would stand for nothing less than "unconditional" talks, though he continued to keep the door open to talks.

"The Islamic Republic has always wanted to negotiate and have dialogue on equal terms and with no preconditions," state television quoted him as saying during a meeting that included Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But he had also said "the new proposal is a step forward."

North Korea's nuclear ambitions will also certainly be on the president's mind this week, but the United States' main negotiating partners in those talks are not Europeans.

Mr. Bush also intends to use the meeting to press European countries to come to terms on a trade-expanding agreement under the so-called Doha round, named for the city in Qatar where the talks began. He also will call for European leaders to help collect billions of dollars in pledges to rebuild Afghanistan and Iraq, as he said after his surprise trip to Baghdad last week that he would do.

"All nations that have pledged money have a responsibility to keep their pledges — and America and Europe will work together to ensure they do so," Mr. Bush said here.

Europeans are pursuing their own agenda, with officials there hinting in the last week that they will probably push Mr. Bush to close the prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. He tacitly acknowledged the divisions during his address here, saying, "Others in Europe have had disagreements with our decisions on Iraq." He added, "We agree that the success of a democratic government in Baghdad is vital for the Iraqis and for the security of the world."

Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, June 20, 2006

VIENNA — U.S. and European Union officials will meet Wednesday to determine how to maintain their united stance against Iran and its budding nuclear program.

Three years after the United States and most European nations differed on the U.S. decision to invade Iraq, they remain close on what to do about Iran, officials and analysts say.

Any specific decisions about Iran are in a holding pattern until Iran decides what to do about a U.S. offer that could lead to U.S.-Iranian talks, White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley says.

Last month, President Bush offered to join negotiations about the future of Iran's nuclear energy program, provided the Iranians suspend a uranium-enrichment program that could produce fuel for a potential nuclear weapon.

The allies face major challenges, says Michael O'Hanlon, senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution. The Bush administration must prove it can handle delicate global negotiations without resorting to force, while the Europeans must demonstrate that their vision of diplomacy can work.

So far, it's working, he says. Europe and the United States are approaching Iran the way many European Union officials wanted to handle Iraq: unified global cooperation to use carrots and sticks, not military force, to change another nation's behavior.

Bush touted global cooperation Monday during a commencement speech at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, saying the United States and Europe are united on Iran. “Nuclear weapons in the hands of this regime would be a grave threat to people everywhere,” he said.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says Iran's nuclear program is for electricity, not bombs, and he has accused the United States of fomenting a crisis.

Bush has said Iran has weeks, not months, to respond to the offer, which was developed in consultation with European allies. Current negotiations with Iran have been led by Great Britain, France and Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0035373

Hadley says the annual EU summit covers many topics and is a chance to discuss “the way forward” with Iran.

If Iran refuses to suspend its enrichment program, the United States plans to seek sanctions through the United Nations Security Council. Russia and China, two council members with veto power, have been less willing to approve sanctions. Ahmadinejad met recently with Russian and Chinese leaders, urging them to oppose sanctions.

It's important for the United States and the EU to work together, says Andrew Moravcsik, director of the European Union Program at Princeton University. He says, however, that “most Europeans believe it would be better to have a nuclear Iran than to strike.”

Iran Tops Agenda For Bush, European Leaders (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, June 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush heads to Europe on Tuesday to shore up a frayed alliance that's nonetheless trying to pull itself together to confront the potential threat of a nuclear-armed Iran.

Iran tops the agenda for Bush's meeting with European Union leaders in Vienna, Austria. While Bush remains unpopular overseas, diplomats from both sides of the Atlantic agree that relations between the United States and Europe have improved dramatically since their bitter divisions over the U.S. decision to invade Iraq in 2003.

Government officials and outside experts agree that Bush and his European counterparts now recognize that, despite their differences, they need each other. Sort of like the Rolling Stones, according to John Hulsman, a foreign-policy specialist at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research center.

"Think of Keith Richards when he says to (Mick) Jagger, `This thing is bigger than both of us.' That's where we are," Hulsman said. "The kids want to save the marriage even though the love is gone."

The president devoted most of his commencement address Monday at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., to extolling the partnership with Europe as essential to securing global peace and prosperity. He noted pointedly that "America and Europe are united on one of the most difficult challenges facing the world today: the behavior of the regime in Iran."

While emphasizing that America and Europe are united in hoping "to solve this problem diplomatically," Bush warned Iran that failure to resolve the budding conflict over its nuclear-research program "will result in action before the (U.N.) Security Council, further isolation from the world and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

For all the president's emphasis on U.S.-European unity however, divisive issues remain.

While there's widespread agreement that Iran shouldn't be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons, some nations remain reluctant to impose tough sanctions on the Islamic republic, and it isn't clear how many of them would support pre-emptive military action against Iran or its nuclear facilities.

Bush will prod Europeans to do more to help in Iraq, because while nations around the world have pledged $13.5 billion in aid, they've delivered less than $4 billion.

"Pledging is great, and makes some headlines in the newspapers, but what we need is those pledges to be turned into real dollars," national security adviser Stephen Hadley said.

The Europeans also will challenge Bush on the treatment of terrorism suspects at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and alleged military atrocities in Iraq. But Hadley said Bush had no intention of complying with European demands to close the Guantanamo detention facility.

"The president has spoken to those issues . ... There's not a whole lot new to be said," Hadley said.

Chilly as that may sound, European officials say Bush has dropped some of the swagger of his first term, when he showed little regard for their views. Over European objections, Bush abandoned the Kyoto treaty on global warming, abrogated the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, declared the right to launch pre-emptive war and invaded Iraq without approval from the United Nations.

Austrian Ambassador Eva Nowotny said in an interview that the "vastly improved" relationship turned a corner at the last U.S.-EU summit, in February 2005, when Bush reached out to Europeans and called for "a new era of transatlantic unity."

Hungarian Ambassador Andras Simonyi agreed.

"Obviously, there's been a change in attitude from the Bush administration," Simonyi said. "Europe and America have to hold hands."

Both sides wanted a fresh start.

"It was a shift born of pragmatism. The United States was up to its eyeballs with trouble in Iraq," said Charles Kupchan, professor of international relations at Georgetown University. "On the other side of the Atlantic, you had the realization that the rift with the United States was very harmful, deeply divisive."

DOJ_NMG_0035374

The leaders also will discuss how to deal with Hamas, the militant Palestinian organization that has vowed to eliminate Israel and that now runs the Palestinian government, and Russia, which has shown a worrisome will to use energy as a foreign-policy weapon.

Russia, which supplies about a fourth of the natural gas that Europe consumes, briefly cut off supplies to Ukraine last winter in a move that Ukrainians viewed as retaliation for their efforts to forge closer ties with Europe and the United States.

Bush initially had planned to stop in Ukraine on his way back from Austria, but opted instead to visit Budapest, Hungary, where he'll mark the 50th anniversary of an unsuccessful revolt against communist rule that Soviet troops brutally crushed.

The Vienna stop will include a roundtable discussion of freedom and democracy with Austrian students and a performance by the Vienna Boys Choir.

U.S. officials had hoped to house the president in one of the city's best hotel rooms - a luxury suite at the five-star Imperial Hotel - but Bush lost it to a rock star. The Sun, a British newspaper, reported that Jagger claimed the $4,500-a-night room days before U.S. officials sought to reserve it for Bush.

Bush Gives Iran An Ultimatum On Uranium (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, June 20, 2006

President Bush told Iran on Monday that nations worldwide won't back down from their demand that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment.

"Iran's leaders have a clear choice. We hope they will accept our offer and voluntarily suspend these activities so we can work out an agreement that will bring Iran real benefits," Bush said a day before leaving for Vienna, Austria, where he will talk with European Union officials who are leading efforts to resolve the nuclear dispute.

If Iran's leaders reject the offer, they will face action before the U.N. Security Council and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions, Bush said during a commencement speech at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy.

Bush discussed Iran with Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday during an 18-minute phone call Putin placed to Bush. "The presidents agreed on the importance of remaining united in their efforts to press Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and begin negotiations on the incentives package," said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council.

On Sunday, Iran accused the United States of trying to sway European nations from a possible compromise. The Iranian foreign ministry said U.S. insistence that negotiations be conditioned on Tehran's suspension of uranium enrichment has narrowed the scope of possible solutions, and made it more difficult for all parties to reach an accord.

Bush made it clear he would not budge. He said allowing Iran to enrich uranium, a process that can make nuclear fuel for a power plant or fissile material for an atomic bomb, would present a grave threat to the world.

"The United States has offered to come to the table with our partners and meet with Iran's representatives as soon as the Iranian regime fully and verifiably suspends its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities," Bush said. "I have a message for the Iranian regime: America and our partners are united. We have presented a reasonable offer. Iran's leaders should see our proposal for what it is — a historic opportunity to set their country on a better course."

On June 6, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana presented a package of rewards and possible penalties to Iran. The package was drawn up by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — and Germany.

The package calls on Iran to suspend, not permanently halt, uranium enrichment as a condition for the start of talks, although the negotiations are aimed at getting Iran to agree to a long-term moratorium on such activity.

Iran says enriching uranium is its country's right. Iranian officials say they are reviewing the package and will propose amendments.

Bush is the first American president to address a graduating class at the academy. He spoke there at the request of former White House chief of staff, Andrew Card, who briefly studied there in the 1960s and hitched a ride on Air Force One to share the stage with the president.

"When he was a plebe, he was stuffed in a duffel bag and run up the flagpole," Bush said about his former chief of staff who left the school when he married.

The U.S. Merchant Marine Academy was created following a 1934 fire in which 134 people died aboard the passenger ship Morro Castle. Congress acknowledged the need for maritime-training standards and passed the Merchant Marine Act that created the academy in 1936. President Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated the school in 1943 in Kings Point.

Kings Point graduates work as deck officers aboard container ships, oil tankers, passenger cruise ships and other vessels. Others remain on land and have become engineers in shipbuilding companies and work in a variety of port operations, including security, while some opt for military careers. Since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the academy has played a leading role in developing international training standards for maritime security.

DOJ_NMG_0035375

"From this campus, every man and woman could see the black smoke rising from the Twin Towers," Bush said. "Within hours, your midshipmen were working side-by-side with the Coast Guard and Marine division of the New York City Fire Department," Bush told the midshipmen seated on a sunny football field at the academy outside New York City.

"Over the next nine days, you moved firefighters and police and emergency response teams into ground zero. You moved tons of food and water supplies. The heroic response to that terrible day showed the spirit of America, and the spirit of this fine academy."

The Race For Iran (NYT)

By Flynt Leverett

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

Washington

AS the world watches the political maneuvering over restarting nuclear talks with Iran — this time with American participation — few are paying attention to a broader strategic competition that has started between the United States, Russia and China. Ultimately, this competition will decide not only the direction of Iran's nuclear activities but also its economic, political and military role in the Middle East and beyond. The outcome hinges on which countries will assume dominance in developing Iran's enormous oil and natural gas reserves.

Unfortunately, by refusing to consider a "grand bargain" with Iran — that is, resolution of Washington's concerns about Tehran's weapons of mass destruction and support for terrorism in return for American security guarantees, an end to sanctions and normalization of diplomatic relations — the Bush administration is courting failure in its nuclear diplomacy and paving the way for Russia and China to win the larger strategic contest.

Iran has the world's second-largest proven reserves of conventional crude oil, after Saudi Arabia, and the second-largest reserves of natural gas, after Russia. Its relatively low production levels make it one of the few states with the potential to greatly increase its exports of both oil and gas over the next two decades.

As the world economy during this period will rely increasingly on the Middle East and the former Soviet Union for its energy needs, Iran's putative status as a hydrocarbon superpower will take on ever greater strategic importance. Add in its location, its population of nearly 70 million (the largest in the Middle East) and its ambitions to regional leadership, and the significance of Iran's future international role is undeniable.

However, to expand its energy exports, Iran needs a great deal of capital and advanced technology from outside — at least $160 billion over the next quarter century according to the International Energy Agency. Washington of course does all it can to block exactly such investment — barring American energy companies from seeking business in Iran and threatening European and Japanese companies with fines and cutoffs of American components.

These measures — along with repressive Iranian policies that scare off foreign investors — have had an impact: since the Islamic Republic opened its oil and gas sectors to foreign energy companies in the early 1990's, it has attracted only $15 billion to $20 billion in European and Japanese investment. And as the nuclear issue has heated up, prospects for substantial increases in Western investment have virtually evaporated.

A senior Iranian diplomat told me this month that Iran can no longer "wait for the West," and Tehran is now looking for alternative investors. In recent years, China has emerged as a potential large-scale partner. But while China can provide capital, its state-owned energy companies are not much more technically capable right now than Iran's. It will be a decade at least before China can fill all Iran's technical gaps.

This is where Russia comes in. Although Russian energy companies could not offer quite the same level of expertise as Western firms in the complexities of managing Iran's older oil reservoirs, they could in the next several years help the Islamic Republic develop its newer oil finds and, more significantly, realize its huge potential as a gas exporter.

In fact, the two countries have already held talks on possible "coordination" of Iranian gas exports with Gazprom, Russia's state-owned gas and oil behemoth. Iranian officials have told me that their government does not think Gazprom would be the ideal partner, compared with Western companies, but it deems such a deal preferable to continued stagnation.

From a Russian perspective, such a deal would have many benefits. Many industry experts feel that within just a few years, the amounts of gas that Gazprom is contracted to provide may exceed what the company on its own can bring to market. It has been trying to close the gap by purchasing additional gas from Central Asian states that rely on Russian pipelines to export their oil and gas. But at the same time, the United States is trying to help those ex-Soviet states build oil and gas pipelines that are outside of Moscow's control — an effort the Kremlin interprets as a deliberate attempt to isolate and weaken Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0035376

Russian officials and commentators have complained to me in recent weeks about a new "double standard" in American policy — one that criticizes the centralization of power in Russia but overlooks authoritarian abuses in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan. The involvement of Russian energy companies in Iran would not only support Moscow's external energy strategy but would push back against perceived American efforts to undermine Russia's influence in Central Asia.

Together, Russia and Iran control almost half of the world's proven reserves of natural gas. If they coordinated their production and marketing decisions, these two countries could be twice as dominant in international gas markets as Saudi Arabia is in the global oil market.

And as China looks to deepen its own involvement in Iran, there would be opportunities for Chinese-Russian cooperation in developing Iranian resources, and collaborating against what both Beijing and Moscow see as excessive United States unilateralism in world affairs. By working together, Russia and China would further establish themselves as rising players in the Persian Gulf, where America has grown used to something like hegemonic status.

Against this backdrop, the Bush administration's approach to nuclear diplomacy with Iran is strategically shallow. The decision to encourage direct talks with Tehran generated many headlines but was really only a limited tactical adjustment to forestall an embarrassing collapse in coordination with America's key international partners.

By continuing to reject a grand bargain with Tehran, the Bush administration has done nothing to increase the chances that Iran will accept meaningful long-term restraints on its nuclear activities. It has also done nothing to ensure that the United States wins the longer-term struggle for Iran. Such a grand bargain is precisely what is required, not only to forestall Iran's effective nuclearization in the next three to five years, but also to position the United States for continued leadership in the Middle East for the next decade and beyond.

Flynt Leverett, a former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council, is director of the Project on the Geopolitics and Geoeconomics of Energy Security at the New America Foundation.

Elie Wiesel Sounds The Alarm Regarding Iran Nobel Laureate Embarks On A Mission To Combat 'Religious Fanaticism' (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Nobel peace laureate Elie Wiesel has a simple motive behind the stepped-up pace of his already furious work: foreboding. The world's best-known Holocaust survivor senses, at age 77, a pivotal historic moment, one that poses some of the greatest dangers since Nazi Germany.

The shift began "with the ultimate new weapon," he says, suicide terrorists deployed globally on behalf of religious fanaticism and without qualms about mass casualties. In his view, it has taken state form with an Iranian president who supports terrorism and is bent on developing nuclear weapons and exterminating Israel.

One result: Mr. Wiesel has set in motion a series of Mideast initiatives that will be announced this week in Petra, Jordan, at a gathering of fellow Nobel laureates brought together by him and King Abdullah II. The initiatives involving Palestinians, Israelis and Jordanians include projects ranging from health and education to women's issues to water development in the Jordan River Valley.

Though the official program doesn't mention Iran (in deference to its Jordanian hosts), the laureates also will consider a mission to Iran in conjunction with the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency to explore ways to pull Tehran from the nuclear brink. Though Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may not heed the Nobel winners' advice, Mr. Wiesel says, he is unlikely to refuse a meeting.

The Petra meeting also will provide the stage for "very high-level exchanges" of Israeli and Palestinian leaders. The hope is to bypass the newly elected Hamas government, whose charter calls for destroying Israel, through tapping grassroots interest in peace. "We are encouraging pragmatic moderation by going after domestic constituents," says David L. Phillips, executive director of the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, which is co-hosting the conference with the King Abdullah II Fund for Development. While Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Ohlmert will attend, it remains to be seen whether the two will hold face-to-face discussions.

Mideast history is littered with well-meaning peacemakers. Yet Mr. Wiesel says with a laugh that although he expects to do no more than "move matters forward by inches," he abandoned defeatism in Auschwitz and cast cynicism aside when he quit his postwar journalism career in France and began life as a novelist, philosopher, teacher and political activist.

Whatever the laureates achieve over time, the Petra meeting is another landmark in Mr. Wiesel's extraordinarily life of drawing purpose from the tragedy of losing his father, mother and sisters in the Holocaust. "Suffering confers no privileges," he says. "It's what you do with it."

DOJ_NMG_0035377

Mr. Wiesel, for example, was perhaps the most important voice in converting former Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to pursue peace with Palestinians. He and the lifelong hawk talked, Mr. Wiesel says, of how history has proven that men of the political right are often best at implementing policies of the left: former U.S. President Richard Nixon reaching out to China; Menachem Begin making peace with Anwar Sadat.

What drives Mr. Wiesel now is less a conviction he can change the world than the survivor's certainty that he must try. In that, he follows the lesson of the character Moishe the Beadle in his best-selling memoir "Night." His family in the Transylvanian town of Sighet might have escaped death had they listened to Moishe, who in 1942 warned of what was coming because he had witnessed and then escaped the Gestapo execution of Jewish prisoners after they had dug their own graves. Mr. Wiesel is sounding a similar alarm about Tehran.

"The regime in Iran is the epitome of what we consider to be evil," he says. "Military intervention must remain the last option, but it cannot be excluded. If all else fails, the president of Iran must be prevented from attaining nuclear weapons. He is sick, mentally ill. He is the No. 1 Holocaust denier."

Beyond considering the mission to Iran, the laureates will discuss how else they can support the International Atomic Energy Agency's package of Multilateral Nuclear Approaches, aimed at enhancing nonproliferation by developing international supply guarantees, with the IAEA acting as supply guarantor. Beyond that, the U.N.'s secretary-general and Mr. Wiesel's foundation are in discussions about creating an Advisory Group of Nobel Laureates to support a new Peacebuilding Commission to assist war-ravaged countries during postconflict phases.

None of this may alter history, but Mr. Wiesel's point is to ensure that leaders don't overlook the pivotal moment. "The 20th century was marked by two totalitarian ideologies: political fanaticism in Moscow and racist fanaticism in Berlin," he says. "Now we face a third fanaticism, religious fanaticism, which dominated the Middle Ages but is back and growing."

Mr. Wiesel, like Moishe the Beadle, only hopes more people listen.

Rice Warns North Korea On Missile Test (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday it will face consequences if it test-fires a missile thought to be powerful enough to reach the West Coast of the United States.

"It would be a very serious matter and, indeed, a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile," Rice said amid indications that the North Koreans could launch an intercontinental ballistic missile at any moment.

The senior U.S. diplomat said the United States would talk to other nations about action should the North go ahead, and "I can assure everyone that it would be taken with utmost seriousness."

President Bush briefly discussed the missile test with Russian President Vladimir Putin during an 18-minute phone call the Russian official placed to the American president on Monday. The leaders plan to remain in touch on the missile issue, said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council.

The United States, Japan, Australia, South Korea and other countries have urged North Korea to abandon any missile firing, but there was no sign of backing down. U.S. officials said Monday the missile was apparently fully assembled and fueled, giving the North a launch window of about a month.

Unlike other preparatory steps the United States has tracked, the fueling process is very difficult to reverse, and most likely means the test will go ahead, one senior administration official said.

The precise timing is unclear, the official said.

At U.N. headquarters in New York, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he was holding preliminary consultations with Security Council members on possible action if North Korea fires the missile, thought to be a three-stage Taepodong-2 with a non-nuclear payload.

"But we don't really know what the North Korean intentions are at this point, so I think we need to wait for the event," Bolton said.

The U.S. ambassador to Japan, Thomas Schieffer, said economic sanctions were an option.

"I think sanctions would have to be considered, but I wouldn't want to describe what actions we might take," Schieffer said through a U.S. Embassy official.

U.S. officials have said the 116-foot-long missile has a firing range of 9,300 miles and could reach as far as the U.S. West Coast. Most analysts, however, say North Korea is still a long way from perfecting technology that would make the missile accurate and capable of carrying a nuclear payload.

DOJ_NMG_0035378

The North's missile program has been a major security concern in the region, adding to worries about a pursuit of nuclear bombs. North Korea shocked its neighbors when it test-fired an earlier missile version over northern Japan in 1998.

In Seoul on Tuesday, Woo Sang-ho, a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party, said, "The government explained to North Korea the serious repercussions a missile launch would bring and strongly demanded that test fire plans be scrapped."

Japan says a new launch would threaten Japanese security and violate an agreement North Korea signed in 2002 and reaffirmed in 2004. Rice said it would also end a self-imposed moratorium on test firings that North Korea has observed since 1999 and a disarmament bargain it struck with the United States and other powers last year.

Rice said a launch now "would once again show North Korea is determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle."

The reports of a potential launch came during a prolonged hiatus in nuclear disarmament talks among North and South Korea, China, Japan, the United States and Russia. The earlier disarmament deal gives the North economic rewards for giving up weapons.

The agreement faltered almost as soon as it was announced in September 2005, and the North later walked away from talks in a dispute over a U.S. crackdown on alleged North Korean counterfeiting and fraud.

There have been no talks since last November.

North Korea says it needs nuclear weapons and a delivery system to counter what it contends are U.S. intentions to invade or topple the government. The United States has repeatedly denied any plans to invade.

U.S. intelligence indicates that the missile was fueled in recent days, said two officials, who requested anonymity because the information comes from sensitive intelligence methods.

The United States assumes North Korea would perform a test, not fire the weapon as an act of war, and could claim afterward that it was launching a space mission, one official said. That would still be considered a violation of the moratorium North Korea has observed since 1999, the official said.

The test would probably take place over water and occur during daylight hours, the official said. The United States would probably know almost instantly.

North Korea is 14 hours ahead of the U.S. East Coast.

Possible reasons for a test now include North Korean anger over a U.S. financial crackdown, which the North calls a form of sanctions, or an attempt to demonstrate that it has more technical prowess than Iran and should get at least as good a deal from the world as Iran has been offered to give up disputed nuclear activities.

North Korea referred to its missile program for the first time Monday, but has not said it intends to perform the test.

A North Korean state television broadcast, monitored in Seoul, South Korea, cited a Russian editorial on the missile and said the North "has the due right to have a missile that can immediately halt the United States' reckless aerial espionage activity."

The North has repeatedly complained in recent weeks about alleged U.S. spy planes watching its activities.

N. Korea Warned On Testing Missile (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea yesterday that the launch of a long-range ballistic missile would be "a very serious matter and indeed a provocative act" that would "deepen its isolation."

Rice's remarks, made at a news conference with the Spanish foreign minister, are the latest in a series of warnings to Pyongyang not to end a 1999 self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile testing. U.S. diplomats have also worked closely with foreign counterparts to send a consistent message to the North Korean government ever since U.S. spy satellites detected signs of launch preparation.

Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, a close U.S. ally, said in Tokyo yesterday that Japan "would have to respond harshly" if there was a missile test.

An actual missile launch, however, may test that unity. Chinese and South Korean officials have privately indicated they are not as inflexible about the meaning of the missile moratorium and may be more willing to accept North Korea's explanations, U.S. officials said. South Korean officials, skeptical about U.S. intelligence, have suggested that because North Korea has been so public about the preparations, it is more likely trying to launch a satellite, not conduct a military test.

Six-nation talks seeking to end North Korea's nuclear programs in exchange for economic and political incentives have been stalled since last fall, with North Korea refusing to return to negotiations because it is angry at a Treasury Department crackdown on its counterfeiting of U.S. dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0035379

U.S. officials have searched for ways to lure North Korea back to the talks, but Rice suggested that a test would result in a push to bring new sanctions against Pyongyang. U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that he has begun preliminary consultations with other Security Council members about a possible resolution.

A test "would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle," Rice said. "It would be a very serious matter indeed."

Rice said a launch would be an "abrogation of obligations" in the missile moratorium, adding that the freeze was also part of the agreement last September that set out the negotiating principles for the disarmament talks.

U.S. allies in the region have pressed the Bush administration to try harder to return North Korea to the talks, including by ending the financial crackdown. During Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Washington in April, President Bush privately reaffirmed that the United States was committed to the six-nation talks but would not end the Treasury Department actions, a senior U.S. official said.

U.S officials have examined intelligence that suggests North Korea may be preparing to test a Taepodong-2 missile from a remote village on North Korea's northeast coast. But three senior U.S. officials said Sunday and Monday that reports that North Korea appeared to have completed fueling the missile are based on incomplete intelligence.

U.S. satellites have observed liquid fuel canisters being placed near the missile, but officials said there was no confirmation that fueling took place. "We can't say anything for sure," said one top official with access to the intelligence.

Loading fuel into the rocket boosters for the Taepodong-2 missile would almost certainly suggest a launch will take place, because it is difficult to siphon out the fuel. But North Korea has a long history of doing things simply for the benefit of American satellites -- and to bring the world's attention back to the Stalinist state.

A year ago, the world was on edge after reports that North Korea might test a nuclear weapon -- and one report even suggested the evidence showed that viewing stands had been built. No test took place.

Three years ago, Pyongyang laid out missiles near a parade route so they could be seen by satellites, resulting in news stories about the potentially provocative act. But North Korea never displayed the missiles publicly during the parade.

Because of cloud cover and high-altitude wind patterns, officials think that, if the missile has been fueled, the earliest a missile launch could occur would be Tuesday evening, Washington time. North Korea is 14 hours ahead of Washington, and officials expect that the North Koreans would launch a missile during daylight hours.

Experts disagree on the likely range of the Taepodong 2, with estimates running as high as 9,000 miles -- far enough to hit the West Coast of the U.S. mainland and U.S. Pacific bases.

Rep. Mark S. Kirk (R-Ill.), who has specialized in North Korean issues and made two trips to that country, said the range is unknown because the current version of the rocket has a large new lower booster. Regardless of whether the rocket has two or three stages, he said, its current state "represents a dramatic increase in range."

If North Korea does launch the rocket on a trajectory that carries it over Japan, Kirk added, "it is expected to have a large impact on the Japanese public," and probably would push Japan to be even more closely aligned with the United States on defense issues.

N Korea Missile Threat A 'provocative Act' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, warned North Korea on Monday that a long-range missile test would be "provocative and serious".

Washington stepped up diplomatic efforts to persuade the Stalinist nation not to launch a Taepodong-2, which could reach the US. John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, said his government was consulting members of the UN Security Council on how to respond to any test.

"The first preference is that the North Koreans not light the missile off. We have made that clear to them," Mr Bolton said.

The US warnings came as officials said North Korea appeared to have fuelled the Taepodong-2, a move that significantly increases the likelihood of an imminent test because it is difficult and dangerous to reverse.

One official said that while the US had not witnessed North Korea actually fuelling the missile – which could have occurred in darkness to avoid detection by US spy satellites – all the indications suggested it was loaded with fuel.

"Everything is there to lead you to the reasonable assumption that they have [fuelled the missile]," said the official. It is clearly a North Korean decision at this point. Whenever they make the decision, off it goes."

DOJ_NMG_0035380

While siphoning out the fuel would be dangerous, North Korea can also not allow the fuel to sit in the Taepodong-2 for too long because it would corrode the missile's casing.

A launch would be North Korea's first test of a longer-range missile since 1998, when Pyongyang generated an international crisis by unexpectedly firing an intermediate-range Taepodong-1 over Japan into the Pacific Ocean.

The yen fell to an all-time low against the euro and an eight-year low against sterling in European morning trade on Monday as fears grew about escalating regional tensions.

In a sign of heightened concern in Washington, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that administration officials, including President George W. Bush, "have contacted more than a dozen heads of state".

"This is something that the President has been working vigorously through diplomatic channels, to encourage the North Koreans to abide by their self-imposed moratorium on missile testing and also return to the talks," Mr Snow said.

Mr Snow would not identify which leaders Mr Bush had contacted. But one official said he was due to speak with Vladimir Putin, the president of Russia, on Monday.

Ms Rice and Steven Hadley, the national security adviser, had also been "working the phones", and that there had been contacts with North Korean representatives in New York, according to Mr Snow.

A senior administration official said: "It's our strong desire to see North Korea abide by the 1998 moratorium."

At the weekend Shinzo Abe, Japan's chief cabinet secretary and a leading candidate to succeed Junichiro Koizumi as prime minister in September, warned that any launch of a missile that directly affected Japan's security would be a violation of the 2002 Pyongyang Declaration which included a pledge to freeze indefinitely tests of missiles capable of reaching Japan.

Rice Says North Korean Missile Test Would Be 'Provocative Act' (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea again on Monday to refrain from testing a long-range ballistic missile, even as reports indicated that the North had taken the penultimate step of fueling the missile.

Continuing diplomatic efforts that have gathered force around the world, Ms. Rice, who had been on the telephone over the weekend with her counterparts in Asia and Europe on the issue, said it would be a "provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile."

"We will obviously consult on next steps, but I can assure everyone that it would be taken with utmost seriousness," Ms. Rice said. "It would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber rattle."

Her comments came after Japan warned earlier in the day that it would take "stern actions" against North Korea if it proceeded with what would be its first important test launching since 1998, when North Korea fired a missile over northern Japan.

"I'm still hoping that North Korea won't do it," said Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi at a news conference. "But if they launch a missile, Japan will consult with the United States and others and will have to take stern actions in response."

Mr. Koizumi did not specify what the actions would be, but other Japanese and American officials mentioned the possibility of economic sanctions.

Australia, which has diplomatic relations with North Korea, called on the North Korean ambassador to cancel any test and to return immediately to the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program.

"North Korea would be gravely mistaken if it thinks that a missile test would improve its bargaining position in the six-party talks," the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said in a statement.

He said, "Such action would be highly provocative," adding that it would further isolate North Korea.

Agence France-Presse reported Monday that France, too, spoke out against North Korea's planned test.

"France expresses its deep worry at the preparations for a possible ballistic missile test by North Korea," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, told journalists.

North Korea has refused to return to the six-party talks unless the United States lifts a crackdown on North Korean businesses, and on financial institutions that do business with them.

The Korean Central News Agency, operated by the North Korean government, said the North's military had vowed to bolster the country's "military deterrent" against the United States. The agency accused the United States of being "hellbent on provocations for war of aggression" against North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0035381

North Korea is believed to be preparing the launching of the Taepodong 2, which, American intelligence officials have said, could reach all of the United States in a three-stage version. The missile at the launching pad was reported to be a two-stage version.

In the 1998 test, it fired a Taepodong 1, which flew over Japan before landing in the Pacific. North Korea agreed to a moratorium on long-range missile testing in 1999.

Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that launching a long-range missile would be a "provocative act," as the Bush administration moved to prevent the test of a missile capable of reaching the continental USA.

The administration action came amid signs that North Korea is preparing to test-launch a long-range missile, called the Taepodong-2. The multistage missile has a range of 9,320 miles, North Korea says.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said it became known only recently that North Korea was fueling a missile, a final step before launch. "I don't know if they will proceed," he said.

In a state television broadcast, North Korea mentioned its missile program for the first time Monday but did not say whether a test would be conducted.

Experts said a launch, if successful, would represent a dramatic increase in North Korea's technological sophistication and could present a new security threat to the United States.

"If they launch it and it works, they could demonstrate the ability to land a payload on the United States," said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear weapons expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank. "That is a strategic turning point. … Draw the comparison you want. The Cuban missile crisis is a good one."

Throughout the government, U.S. officials warned North Korea against taking such a step:

•At the State Department, Rice said a test would violate international commitments made by North Korea. "It would be taken with utmost seriousness," she said.

•At the United Nations, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the Bush administration is talking with other Security Council members about possible steps if North Korea tests a missile. "It obviously would be very serious," Bolton said.

•Aboard Air Force One, White House spokesman Tony Snow said President Bush had made calls to more than a dozen heads of state about the issue in recent days. Snow said U.S. officials have talked directly with North Korean representatives in New York.

North Korea analysts said the administration has little leverage with which to persuade the communist country not to test. Experts said the regime probably wants to use a test — its first since 1998 — to try to force direct talks with the United States about its nuclear program and to warn the Bush administration against using military force.

North Korea may have as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and Security, a Washington think tank. Six-nation talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its arsenal have stalled. The United States has refused one-on-one negotiations.

"The North Koreans would like to establish the fact that they have weapons and that they also have the delivery system to pose a threat to the United States," said Han Shik Park, a North Korea expert at the University of Georgia. Park said North Korean officials may feel neglected, given the lack of movement in nuclear talks and the recent overture that the United States and its allies made to Iran about freezing its nuclear program.

North Korea thinks "that by doing this, the Bush administration will begin paying more attention to them," Park said.

Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a non-proliferation group in Washington, said North Korea's bid for attention and respect would be a grave mistake. It "just invites negative reactions and isolation" and could serve to mortally wound diplomatic efforts, he said.

"If the North Koreans conduct this long-range missile test, it could sink the six-party talks entirely. And they're already on life support," Kimball said.

U.S. Warns North Korea On Missile Launch (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035382

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration moved to ratchet up diplomatic pressure on North Korea on Monday, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warning that a launch of a ballistic missile would be a "provocative act" that would signal Pyongyang's rejection of international efforts to reach a compromise on its weapons program.

The prospect of a long-range missile in the hands of one of the world's most stridently anti-American regimes spread alarm in Washington. A missile test at this time would also be an embarrassing setback to the Bush administration's efforts to prevent nuclear proliferation in Iran and elsewhere.

President Bush participated in overseas phone calls made by administration officials, and U.S. military officials pointed to their missile defense capabilities without indicating whether there were plans to use them. In Tokyo, officials said Japan would respond "severely," and South Korean officials early Tuesday also delivered a stern warning.

The missile is thought to have a range that could reach U.S. territories in the Pacific such as Guam and possibly parts of Alaska or Hawaii. Analysts believe it is considerably more sophisticated than the Taepodong I that North Korea shot into the Pacific Ocean in 1998 before signing a missile-testing moratorium.

As of Monday, satellite intelligence from the launch site in Musudan-ri on North Korea's east coast suggested that the fueling was on the verge of completion. Once fueling is completed, any launch would likely take place within 48 hours, since such missiles can be damaged if left fueled for extended periods. Siphoning off liquid fuel is considered difficult and dangerous.

A South Korean official told reporters in Seoul all that remains is "the click of a button."

With international talks at a standstill and military options considered imprudent, U.S. officials were left to wonder about North Korea's next step.

"We're still waiting. We don't know what their intentions are," said a senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity given the uncertainty involved. "We don't know for sure that they're going to push the button. But the trend lines have all been in one direction."

President Bush personally took part in calls to more than a dozen heads of state to discuss the consequences of a launch, said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. He refused to name world leaders contacted by Bush. Snow also confirmed U.S. diplomats have been in contact with North Korean counterparts in New York, where the two countries have on occasions communicated through their United Nations delegations.

After days of curious silence, South Korea joined Japan and the United States early Tuesday in issuing a pointed warning to the North Koreans.

"The government explained to North Korea the serious repercussions a missile launch would bring and strongly demanded that test fire plans be scrapped," Woo Sang-ho, a spokesman for South Korea's ruling Uri Party, said Tuesday morning in Seoul. The U.S. made similar diplomatic warnings in 1998 when it learned that North Korea had begun fuelling a Taepo-dong 1 missile, a multi-stage launcher that can fly about 1,250 miles, but Pyongyang ignored the admonishments and launched the missile over Japan. The missile, which if developed sufficiently could be a delivery system for a nuclear weapon, dropped harmlessly into the Pacific after its third stage blew up.

The situation today is more dangerous than in 1998 because North Korea has considerably advanced its nuclear program in the ensuing years. North Korea pulled out of a nuclear-freeze agreement in 2002 and restarted it reactor and reprocessing plant in Yongbyon.

North Korean leader Kim Jong-il, with whom Bush has great personal animosity although the two have never met, has made a point of snubbing the administration's nonproliferation efforts.

Since September, Pyongyang has boycotted six-nation talks in Beijing over negotiating a dismantlement of its nuclear program. Measures to punish the North Koreans by shutting down an overseas bank it used for laundering proceeds of drug trafficking and counterfeiting have so far failed to bring Pyongyang into compliance.

The CIA believes that North Korea has enough nuclear material for 10 weapons, although it is not clear that its scientists currently have the ability to make a nuclear warhead that could be mounted on a missile.

Missile experts in South Korea and the United States believe that the current missile is not carrying a warhead, but a satellite. The technology of launching a satellite or a warhead is virtually the same, but the fact could be used by the North Koreans to claim that their launch would be purely a civilian undertaking.

Preparations for a new launch, which analysts said appears to be of a larger Taepo-dong 2 rocket, have been taking place for weeks at the remote Musudan-ri missile base under the scrutiny of U.S., Japanese and South Korean spy satellites.

"I think it is already taken with utmost seriousness by regional states and by the world because it would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle," Rice said. "From our point of view, it would be a very serious matter indeed."

DOJ_NMG_0035383

Pentagon officials would not specify contingency plans or describe the alert status of U.S. forces in response to the North Korean situation. Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, noted that the U.S. "does have a limited missile defense system" in the Pacific, but he would not say whether the U.S. would use the system if a launch occurred.

Although the U.S. military has not been able to shoot down decoy missiles with any regularity, it maintains monitoring and tracking capabilities. Ships with sophisticated Aegis radar systems have been used to track missile launches in the Pacific.

Whitman added that the Pentagon considered any North Korean missile firing a "launch," rather than a "test."

"'Test' would imply we know their intentions," Whitman said.

North Korean missile technology remains shrouded in secrecy. The 1998 launch of the Taepo-dong 1 caught analysts by surprise, since it was not known that Pyongyang had the capability of developing a multi-stage missile.

There has been speculation since the 1999 moratorium, reached after the U.S. agreed to lift a number of economic sanctions, that North Korea was attempting to develop a larger Taepo-dong 2 , which would be able to fly more than twice the distance of Taepo-dong 1 and reach important U.S. military facilities in Guam. Depending if the missile had two or three stages, it theoretically could reach parts of Alaska as well. Missile experts believe the new missile also has advanced decoying capabilities which would make it difficult to track.

U.S. officials stressed Monday that they could not be certain which type of rocket was being readied.

"It's unclear exactly which model this thing is," said the senior State Department official.

N. Korean Threat Activates Shield (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

The Pentagon activated its new U.S. ground-based interceptor missile defense system, and officials announced yesterday that any long-range missile launch by North Korea would be considered a "provocative act."

Poor weather conditions above where the missile site was located by U.S. intelligence satellites indicates that an immediate launch is unlikely, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

However, intelligence officials said preparations have advanced to the point where a launch could take place within several days to a month.

Two Navy Aegis warships are patrolling near North Korea as part of the global missile defense and would be among the first sensors that would trigger the use of interceptors, the officials said yesterday.

The U.S. missile defense system includes 11 long-range interceptor missiles, including nine deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The system was switched from test to operational mode within the past two weeks, the officials said.

One senior Bush administration official told The Washington Times that an option being considered would be to shoot down the Taepodong missile with responding interceptors.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice added that any launch would be a serious matter and "would be taken with utmost seriousness and indeed a provocative act."

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to comment when asked if shooting down a launched missile was being considered as an option.

President Bush had telephoned more than a dozen heads of state regarding North Korea's launch preparations, Mr. Snow said. He did not identify the leaders who were called by Mr. Bush.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the U.S. has made it clear to North Korea that the communist regime should abide by the missile-test ban it imposed in 1999 and reaffirmed in a pact with Japan in 2002.

"The United States has a limited missile defense system," Mr. Whitman said. He declined to say if the system is operational or whether it would be used.

"U.S. Northern Command continues to monitor the situation, and we are prepared to defend the country in any way necessary," said spokesman Michael Kucharek.

Any decision to shoot down a missile would be made at the highest command levels, which includes the president, secretary of defense and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In Tokyo, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said Japan and South Korea are trying to avert a launch.

"Even now, we hope that they will not do this," Mr. Koizumi said. "But if they ignore our views and launch a missile, then the Japanese government, consulting with the United States, would have to respond harshly."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the Bush administration is consulting with other Security Council members on how to respond to a Taepodong launch.

DOJ_NMG_0035384

In Australia, Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said North Korea's ambassador had been summoned and told any missile launch would result in "serious consequences."

U.S. intelligence officials said there are signs that the North Koreans recently began fueling the Taepodong with highly corrosive rocket fuel. Normally, when liquid fuel is loaded into missiles the missile must be fired within five to 10 days, or it must be de-fueled and the motors cleaned, a difficult and hazardous process.

The Taepodong was first tested in August 1998, and North Korea claimed that it was a space launch vehicle that orbited a satellite. U.S. intelligence officials said the last stage of the missile was powered but did not reach orbit. A new test would likely be a more advanced version.

"Our concerns about missile activity in North Korea are long-standing and well-documented," said Mr. Whitman, the Pentagon spokesman.

The test preparations began several weeks after the Bush administration imposed new rules on U.S. companies that prohibit American or foreign firms incorporated in the United States from flying North Korea's flag on merchant ships.

According to the Treasury Department, Korean War-era sanctions were loosened in 2000 in order to entice North Korea into abiding by the missile flight test ban.

One reason for the concerns about a launch is that North Korea has issued threatening statements through its official press and broadcast organs that it is ready to go to war with states such as Japan and the United States that impose economic sanctions.

North Korea's Incredibly Bad Idea (NYT)

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

No one can claim a very good track record for figuring out what North Korea is up to and why, and that plainly applies to the North's reported preparations for testing a long-range missile that one day may be capable of reaching the United States. Maybe North Korea is just jealous of all the attention Iran has been getting as a result of Tehran's recent nuclear bad behavior, and craves a spotlight of its own. Maybe Pyongyang, which hasn't tested such a long-range missile in eight years, wants to see if its new, more advanced model actually works.

Or maybe North Korea is perversely eager to see the United States speed up its missile-defense plans, Japan to become more hawkish on military issues and South Korean politicians who favor talking and trading with the North lose next year's elections.

But if we cannot be sure of North Korea's motives, we can be reasonably sure of the consequences if Pyongyang does go ahead and launch the missile — which Washington says, citing satellite photos, is now fully fueled and ready to go. And those consequences will be thoroughly bad for North Korea, for its region and for just about everyone else. They will immensely complicate negotiating the kind of nuclear deal North Korea is thought to want — a grand bargain that would give it desperately needed economic help and long-sought security guarantees in exchange for abandoning its nuclear weapons program.

The consequences could be exceedingly grim for the rest of Northeast Asia as well. North Korea's previous long-range missile test in 1998 flew over Japanese airspace, shocking Japan out of its long postwar complacency about national defense. The main result has been a rise in military nationalism among Japanese politicians and the public. Another direct consequence has been increased Japanese reluctance to deal with North Korea.

Why North Korea would want to increase its isolation and antagonize its few friends like China and South Korea is hard to comprehend. But North Korea-watching is full of such mysteries.

Washington, for its part, has reacted sensibly, not wasting a lot of time on diplomatic rigmarole and delivering instead a clear and direct message to North Korea not to proceed with a missile test. We hope that North Korea's next surprise is to respond equally sensibly and cancel whatever plans it has for such a self-destructive move.

US Congress Cautious On Indian Nuclear Energy (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

Congress is unlikely to give final approval this year to the Bush administration's civilian nuclear energy deal with India, according to Senator John McCain, the influential Arizona Republican.

In an interview with the FT, Mr McCain said Congress needed to scrutinise the deal rigorously because of the precedent it would set.

Critics say the deal would encourage nuclear proliferation by rewarding India, a country that has developed nuclear weapons while refusing to join the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

DOJ_NMG_0035385

President George W. Bush sealed the landmark deal during a visit to Delhi this year. Under the agreement, the US would supply India with civilian nuclear technology in return for Delhi agreeing to open most of its nuclear facilities to international inspections.

"I am not saying I will oppose it, but I still would like to hear more argument in its favour," said Mr McCain. "I understand our unique relationship with India ... but when you carve out an exemption, then of course you run the risk of others wanting the same exemption."

Although Mr McCain said his tendency was to support the deal, it was "unlikely" that Congress could give final approval this year because of the time needed to examine the agreement properly.

The White House has been pushing Congress to make the required changes in US law as soon as possible.

However, Republicans and Democrats are increasingly reluctant to approve the deal before details such as what safeguards India would negotiate with the International Atomic Energy Agency are hammered out.

Some critics argue that the deal will bolster India's nuclear weapons programme because it will allow India to import uranium fuel, freeing up its domestic supply for use in its military programme.

"For what it's worth, we have received assurances that India will not do that, but . . . this is taking a risk," says Mr McCain.

If the Republicans retain control of the Senate in the November congressional elections, Mr McCain will become chairman of the Senate armed services committee in January.

One of his priorities, he says, will be to reform military procurement.

Mr McCain says: "[Military procurement] has become a national scandal. Nine of the 11 major weapons systems last year were over cost and behind schedule and received incentive bonuses. I don't get it."

U.S., Russia Break Impasse On Plan To Keep Arms From Rogue Users (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The United States and Russia reached a last-minute agreement saving a program to secure or destroy Soviet nuclear warheads, chemical weapons and killer germs, U.S. officials said yesterday, breaking a long logjam and averting a rupture weeks before President Bush travels to St. Petersburg.

The program, a multibillion-dollar effort designed to keep weapons of mass destruction out of the hands of terrorists or rogue states, was set to expire Friday amid a stubborn disagreement over legal provisions. But U.S. and Russian officials cut a deadline deal in Moscow on Friday that will extend the program for seven years and effectively take the issue off the table for Bush's trip.

Although overshadowed by disputes with Iran and North Korea, the Cooperative Threat Reduction program with Russia represents the most expansive disarmament effort in the world and the prospect that it could be halted deeply worried arms-control specialists. The program, which began 14 years ago after the Cold War ended, has deactivated thousands of warheads, missiles and bombers and made progress toward securing biological and chemical weapons.

But the work has gone slower than hoped and Russia still maintains thousands of additional aging nuclear warheads as well as vast stockpiles of other weapons that specialists fear are vulnerable to theft or sale on the international black market. U.S. contractors in Russia would have had to shut down activities if Friday's agreement had not been signed by U.S. Ambassador William J. Burns and Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Kislyak.

"The extension of the umbrella agreement is critical," said Raphael Della Ratta, a weapons specialist at the Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council. Without it, "nuclear weapons delivery systems would not be dismantled, chemical weapons would remain unsecured and undestroyed and biological pathogens would remain unsecured as well."

At the same time, he and other experts have complained that the Bush administration has not shown sufficient urgency about eliminating Russian arms. "We are in a race against time to secure these materials before they're lost, stolen or get into the wrong hands," said Daryl G. Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association. "This is a necessary but insufficient step. The administration needs to push down the accelerator in terms of the pace of work."

A senior administration official said the extension should help propel efforts to eliminate old Soviet weapons. "This reinvigorates and strengthens the ongoing cooperation we've been doing with Russia," said the official, who was not authorized to speak on the record.

The extension had been held up for years mainly by a dispute over liability. Under the original agreement, Russia was responsible for any mishaps, even accidents or negligence by U.S. contractors. Russia has balked at that provision. The renewal keeps the original language for current projects but will address Russian concerns for future projects. It does not affect a separate plutonium-disposal program announced in 1998 but never started because of a similar dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0035386

A collapse of the Cooperative Threat Reduction program would have marred Bush's visit to St. Petersburg next month for the Group of Eight summit. The meeting will be the group's first held by Russia, which is eager to use the occasion to showcase its reemergence on the world stage as a major power.

Critics say Russia has no business hosting an organization of industrial democracies at a time when President Vladimir Putin has constricted political freedoms at home and used energy resources to flex muscles abroad. Bush has maneuvered to avoid the image that he is endorsing Putin's course by attending the summit.

Vice President Cheney recently criticized Russian actions, and the administration will send two assistant secretaries of state, Daniel Fried and Barry Lowenkron, to a pre-summit meeting to discuss human rights in Russia. Bush also announced yesterday that he will host Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili at the White House shortly before the summit as a statement of solidarity with Russian neighbors under pressure from Moscow.

The Cooperative Threat Reduction agreement was reached in 1992 at the instigation of Sens. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) and Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) and was renewed in 1999. Since then, it has deactivated or destroyed 6,828 nuclear warheads, 612 intercontinental ballistic missiles, 885 nuclear air-to-surface missiles, 577 submarine-launched missiles, 155 bombers and 29 nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarines, among others, according to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency.

But it still has much to do. About half of the nuclear warheads, ICBMs, ICBM silos, submarine-launched missiles and nuclear submarines targeted by the program have yet to be eliminated, according to the agency. A chemical-weapons destruction facility is more than 60 percent unfinished and the Government Accountability Office reported that it may not open by 2009.

Lugar hailed the extension but called on Congress to remove other conditions that threaten the program: "If the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is the number one national security threat facing our country, we cannot permit any delays in our response."

Palestinian Workers Receive Partial Pay (USAT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, The Associated Press

USA Today, June 20, 2006

GAZA CITY — Thousands of Palestinian workers left postal banks carrying three crisp $100 bills Monday, their first pay since March.

The payment was made by the Hamas-led government, which dipped into cash officials carried into Gaza last week to circumvent a freeze on Western aid.

Finance Minister Omar Abdel Razek said there was no way to transport the money to the West Bank, or even convert it to a local currency. He said officials were forced to make cash payments to avoid commercial banks that fear anti-terrorism sanctions. “We are paying through the post office because we have some problems with banks because of the direct or indirect threats by the U.S. and Israel,” Razek said.

The United States, Israel and the European Union list Hamas as a terrorist group because it has sent suicide bombers into Israel, killing hundreds.

Hamas has long rejected Israel's right to exist. Now that the militant group leads the Palestinian government — it won legislative elections in January — it must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace accords, the United States, the EU and Israel say.

Hamas has refused. As a result, aid to the Palestinian government has been cut off.

Early today, government spokesman Ghazi Hamad said Hamas is close to agreement with the rival Fatah Party on a document that implies recognition of Israel. After talks in Gaza, Hamad said, “I think in a couple of days we will reach a compromise, because we think that the differences are not significant.”

Last week, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar hauled $20 million in cash across the Egyptian border into Gaza in suitcases. Another Hamas official followed with $2 million. Hamas said the money came from private donations and Islamic charities.

The Palestinian Authority is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza. The salaries of the 165,000 government workers add up to about $130 million a month. The last three paydays have been missed. Another comes in less than two weeks.

Thousands of civil servants lined up at Gaza post offices Monday for payouts. The Finance Ministry said 91,000 workers earning $333 to $555 a month received $300. The government earlier paid 40,000 workers who earn less than $333 a month.

“I'm worried because I don't know where to begin. The grocery wants money. The bakery wants money, and I also need to pay my rent,” said Samir Hassanya, 42, a health worker.

DOJ_NMG_0035387

Concerned about the deteriorating situation, Mideast peacemakers — including the United States and EU — approved a plan over the weekend to transfer $125 million in humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people, bypassing the government.

The EU's top foreign policy official, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, was in the region Monday to discuss the aid plan and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's proposal for a unilateral West Bank withdrawal.

Olmert says he prefers a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians but considers talks impossible as long as Hamas remains committed to Israel's destruction. If peace efforts founder, Olmert plans a unilateral withdrawal, using the separation barrier that Israel is building as the basis for a future border.

East Timor: U.S. Opposes U.N. Force (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, questioned the need cited by Secretary General Kofi Annan last week to return peacekeepers to East Timor, where an Australian-led multinational force has ended violence that killed more than 30 people. Mr. Bolton said the current conflict was internal and unrelated to the tiny nation's struggle for independence from Indonesia that had been the basis of an earlier United Nations presence. "This has the look of disagreements among politicians with rival security forces," he said.

Arrests Spark Fears Of Armed Islamist Takeover (WT)

By James Brandon

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

RABAT, Morocco -- Police have arrested more than 500 Islamist activists since late May on accusations that they were planning a coup to replace Morocco's pro-U.S. monarchy with an Islamic state.

Most were released swiftly, but the arrests revived fears that the country's largest Islamic movement, Al Adl wa al Ihsane, or Justice and Charity, is preparing to take up arms to fulfill predictions from the group's own Sufi mystics that Morocco's monarchy will fall this year.

The group, which already has Islamized higher education in Morocco, wants to replace the monarchy with an Islamic state and cut all political, cultural and economic relations with the West -- moves that it argues will end poverty and corruption in Morocco.

So far, its hundreds of thousands of followers have been content to patiently wait for an Islamic state to emerge. However, as the group's mystics churn out religiously inspired visions at an ever-faster rate, analysts fear the group will have to take action or risk losing credibility.

"There are hundreds of visions that foresee a great change in Morocco in 2006," said Nadia Yassine, the group's public face and daughter of its founder, Sheik Abdessalem Yassine. "These are true visions, and we believe in them completely."

Sheik Yassine added that, for 14 centuries, "politics and spirituality have been kept apart by the Arab elites. And we have been able to reconnect these two aspects of Islam -- and that is why people fear us."

George Joffe, a North Africa specialist at the Center of International Studies at Cambridge University, said Al Adl wa al Ihsane "may not be directly threatening violence, but their subtext is that the government is creating conditions which might cause violence to erupt."

"Through these visions, they are plugging directly into Moroccan traditions and history to directly challenge the monarchy," he said. "The government is already facing increasing tensions over high unemployment, and these arrests are an attempt to deflate the Islamists."

Al Adl wa al Ihsane is illegal and boycotts elections. However, it has taken control of the country's universities and the national student union and uses these institutions to radicalize young Moroccans.

"They have changed the universities into places of intolerance -- against girls, against gays, Jews, alcohol -- against almost everything," said Jamal Berraoui, editor of Voice of the People, a Casablanca newspaper. "They hold the universities hostage. They have created a climate of intellectual terrorism."

The Al Adl wa al Ihsane-run student union has forced the government to remove secular subjects such as philosophy from university curriculums. The group also has campaigned successfully for new university mosques, which it then staffs with radical Islamic preachers.

"When we talk with the Ministry of Education, we insist that our education conform to Islamic standards," said Mohamed Belkasmi, an economics student and head of the student union at Casablanca University. "We insist that our country's laws and teachings consist only of the Koran."

DOJ_NMG_0035388

In addition to banning all "un-Islamic" events from campuses, they organize pro-Hamas exhibitions and force students and teachers to strike in support of jailed members of the movement.

Within the universities, the group operates as a secret police, crushing dissent. When a reporter interviewed students about Al Adl wa al Ihsane, the discussion repeatedly was interrupted by the group's bearded activists who patrol the campus.

"The Islamists are not the majority in Morocco, but they are the strongest and best-organized," Mr. Berraoui said. "If they want to take over, they will not hesitate to use violence and to terrorize everyone else."

The government appears powerless to control the group. In 2000, pressure from international human rights groups forced the government to release Sheik Yassine from house arrest.

"In Morocco, image has become more important than reality," Mr. Berraoui said. "Stopping the Islamists taking over would look like repression and that would make the government look bad.

"Morocco is no longer a dictatorship but not yet a democracy. This moment of transition is the most dangerous part."

Bush, Brazil's Lula, Discuss Trade (AFP)

AFP, June 20, 2006

US President George W. Bush and his Brazilian counterpart Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by telephone about this week's World Trade Organization talks in Geneva and mutual trade concerns.

"President Lula of Brazil called the president to discuss the status of the WTO negotiations currently under way in Geneva," White House National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said in a statement.

"The two presidents expressed the importance of a successful Doha Round, and noted that their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all," the NSC spokesman said, adding that the 20-minute call had been requested by Lula.

"President Lula acknowledged and thanked the president for the leadership he has shown at the WTO. The two presidents also briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy," said Jones.

WTO members are struggling to meet their year-end 2006 deadline to complete the current, so-called Doha Development Agenda of trade talks, which is supposed to help poor countries.

The Doha round, launched in 2001, was meant to have been completed in 2004. Negotiators also missed their last deadline, April 30, for deciding details of the final accord.

Bush is to take part Wednesday in a EU-US summit in Vienna, a gathering which offers the last opportunity for top level talks ahead of a key WTO ministerial meeting at the end of the month.

Bush, Brazil Leader Talk Trade Expansion (AP)

AP, June 19, 2006

President Bush and Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by phone Monday for about 20 minutes, discussing efforts to expand international trade and steps toward energy self-sufficiency, the White House said.

The Brazilian president placed the call Monday morning, said White House spokesman Frederick Jones.

The two leaders talked about world trade talks under way in Geneva, both agreeing that "their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all," Jones said.

"The two presidents briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependance on oil and promote alternative energy," Jones said.

Venezuela Fights US Bid To Keep It Off UN Panel (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal And Mark Turner

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela is fighting to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council, in the face of US efforts to derail Venezuela's campaign by lobbying on behalf of Guatemala.

Mr Chávez has long viewed a seat on the council as a vital part of winning representation for Venezuela – and by extension, he argues, for poorer nations – in international organisations.

A two-year open seat will become available this year, and Venezuela has already begun soliciting support from other governments in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Regional diplomatic heavy-weights such as Argentina – whose seat Venezuela is seeking to fill – and Brazil have indicated that they would back Caracas, as have countries farther afield, such as Syria.

The US has raised concerns about ties between Venezuela and Iran, including fears that Venezuela's presence on the council could undermine efforts by Washington to put pressure on Tehran over its nuclear programme. On Monday a senior US State Department official described Venezuela's international app-roach as "confrontational" rather than "problem-solving".

DOJ_NMG_0035389

In an interview with the FT on Monday, Mr Chávez's recently appointed ambassador to the UN, Francisco Arias, said Venezuela's presence on the council would allow it to represent the interests of developing countries in the "south".

Mr Arias, who took part as an army officer in Mr Chávez's coup attempt in 1992, said US efforts to scupper Venezuela's bid would work against Washington.

"The position stated by officials in the US government – that countries should not vote for us because we represent a danger – shows lack of respect," he said.

"The US already has excessive power: a permanent seat plus the power of veto," he added. "But the campaign by the US will end up being counterproductive."

To reinforce Mr Arias's mission, Mr Chávez has appointed Roy Chaderton-Matos, seen as Venezuela's most experienced career diplomat, as a parallel special envoy to the UN.

"Venezuela is going to do everything possible to win a seat in the Security Council," said Jocelyn Henríquez, the director of the Centre for Diplomatic and Strategic Analysis, a think-tank in Caracas.

Washington's lobbying efforts may be on shaky ground. César Mayoral, Argentina's ambassador to the UN, said on Monday it looked "very bad for Guatemala", adding that US support for Guatemala was undermining the Central American country's chances.

He said Argentina, like most of South America, was backing Venezuela, but one of Venezuela's greatest challenges would be to win Chile's vote.

Alejandro Foxley, Chile's foreign minister, said at the weekend that Santiago would probably back a consensus candidate from a third country.

Annan Cautions Rights Council To Avoid Rifts (NYT)

By Tom Wright

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

GENEVA, June 19 — The United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, spoke Monday at the first meeting of the organization's new Human Rights Council, urging member nations not to engage in the political bickering that paralyzed its predecessor, the Human Rights Commission.

The council, whose 47 members are meeting through June 30 in Geneva, largely to establish operational procedures, was created by the United Nations in an effort to strengthen its mechanism for defending human rights and punishing nations that transgress.

The commission, which had 53 members, drew criticism for allowing countries with poor human rights records like Zimbabwe, Sudan and Libya the right to sit in judgment over other nations and for allowing political considerations to block effective action against abuses.

"This council represents a great new chance for the United Nations, and for humanity, to renew the struggle for human rights," Mr. Annan said in his speech. "I implore you, do not let the opportunity be squandered."

He added, "It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the eyes of the world — especially the eyes of those whose human rights are denied, threatened or infringed — are turned toward this chamber and this council."

But from the start the council has been weakened by the opposition of the United States, among only four countries that voted against the creation of the body at a General Assembly session in March. The United States, which wanted a smaller body with fewer members, also declined to seek a seat on the council. While many countries have sent foreign ministers to Geneva for the opening sessions of the new body, the American delegation will be led by Warren W. Tichenor, the new United States representative to the United Nations in Geneva.

"This sends the wrong signal," said Mariette Grange, the advocacy director in Geneva for Human Rights Watch. "One of our regrets is the United States has not registered any high-level representatives."

The council is widely regarded as an improvement over the commission. Nations seeking election to the council in May had to meet more demanding standards than in the past, and several candidate countries accused of rights abuses, including Iran and Venezuela, were excluded.

The council will meet three times a year for a total of 10 weeks, almost double the time for the commission, and members can convene special sessions to respond quickly to crisis situations. Countries that do not abide by rights standards can be ejected from the council with a two-thirds vote in the General Assembly.

Countering Counterfeits (WSJ)

By Carlos Gutierrez, Gunter Verheugen, Peter Mandelson And Susan Schwab

DOJ_NMG_0035390

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The global economy for illicit goods is massive, but by definition impossible to measure. What we do know is that it is getting bigger. The number of counterfeit items seized at European Union borders has increased by more than 1,000%, rising to over 103 million in 2004 from 10 million in 1998. At U.S. borders, seizures of counterfeit goods have more than doubled since 2001. Even allowing for improved detection rates, there is little doubt that the situation is getting worse.

Today the EU and the U.S. will launch a joint action strategy on the global enforcement of intellectual-property rights. The groundbreaking agreement between the EU and the U.S. envisages closer customs cooperation, including more data sharing. There are plans for joint border enforcement actions, including in third countries, and the creation of joint networks of EU and U.S. diplomats in third countries working on intellectual-property protection.

Twenty years ago, counterfeiting might have been regarded as a problem chiefly for the makers of expensive handbags. In the 1980s, 70% of firms affected by counterfeiting were in the luxury sector. But in 2004, more than 4.4 million items of fake foodstuffs and drinks were seized at EU borders, an increase of 196% over the previous year. In the U.S., seizures of counterfeit computers and hardware tripled from 2004 to 2005. There are also fake electrical appliances, car parts and toys. Even airplane parts are being pirated: The Concorde crash of 2000 appears to have been caused by a counterfeit part that had fallen off another aircraft.

Perhaps most worrying is the booming trade in counterfeit medicines, which were reckoned to account for almost 10% of world trade in medicines in 2004. A recent study in the Lancet concluded that up to 40% of products labeled as containing the antimalarial drug artusenate contain no active ingredients. Most of these fake drugs are headed for the world's poorest countries. The World Health Organization estimates that 60% of counterfeit medicine cases occur in developing countries.

The popular view is that buying a fake is a win-win game, so long as you know what you are paying for. Everyone enjoys a bargain. But it's far too easy -- and wrong -- to write off this kind of crime as not really harmful to anyone. Counterfeiting is big business for criminal organizations that can affect entire sectors of the international economy. And when pirates move into fake medicines and fake car-parts, we move from rip-offs to potential tragedy.

The scale of counterfeiting matters enormously for the EU and the U.S., who compete on their reserves of innovation, invention and high-quality design and production. Piracy strips that comparative advantage away. Our economies are adapting to low-cost competition from the developing world. We have a right to expect that our own comparative advantages be respected.

But it is not just the developed world that has a stake in this fight. Tolerating counterfeiting almost inevitably backfires. Developing countries that tolerate the existence of a parallel illicit economy in their market will quickly lose the confidence of foreign investors and services traders, and the technology transfer that these bring with them. They also undermine the development of innovative and creative businesses in their own economy. Although China is now taking steps to better enforce its intellectual-property laws, it has for too long turned a blind eye to these problems. Ironically, customs authorities are now intercepting increasing numbers of Beijing 2008 Olympic knockoffs.

It is time for a new global strategy and a much tougher global approach. All members of the World Trade Organization have signed agreements to fight counterfeiting. The new focus has to be on enforcing the rules we already have against counterfeiting and piracy in particular. Countries that have signed up to these rules should no longer expect an easy ride if they don't implement them.

Our initial efforts will focus on working more closely together to address challenges in China and Russia. But we also have major concerns in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. We recognize that it is not always easy for developing countries to tackle intellectual-property theft effectively, and we will help these countries reinforce their own efforts.

American and European industries are right alongside us. They have long demanded better international intellectual-property protection. An integral part of the EU-U.S. strategy is the development of public-private partnerships in third countries, working with industry to pool information and intelligence and to jointly address the enforcement problem.

The competitiveness of European and American industry depends on respect for intellectual property, and so do the health, safety and security of our citizens. But everyone in the global economy benefits when intellectual-property rights are secured. The EU-U.S. joint action is a clear signal that we will work with our trading partners to ensure that their legal commitments on intellectual property are accompanied by a genuine willingness to tackle the problem at their borders, in their courts and on their streets.

Mr. Gutierrez is U.S. secretary of commerce, Mr. Verheugen vice president of the European Commission for enterprise and industry, Mr. Mandelson EU trade commissioner, and Ms. Schwab the U.S. trade representative.

Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle (WP)

By Monte Reel

DOJ_NMG_0035391

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

OKINAWA, Bolivia -- Choei Yara sleeps in a boxy room in the back of his roadside dry goods store, and the lump under his thin pillow is a loaded .45-caliber pistol. It is intended for a specific emergency: an attack so sudden that he'd be unable to reach the pump-action shotgun that leans against a bare concrete wall, just five feet away.

He's not afraid of the store being robbed, but he believes that the piece of paper stating that he owns about 1,400 acres of fertile soil is the kind of thing that can drive men to violent extremes. Property in Latin America is more unevenly distributed than anywhere on the planet, and Bolivia is no exception. But this month the country began a project to shuffle ownership rights affecting 20 percent of its land area, giving most of it to the poor. And tensions are starting to boil.

Those with land are starting to dig in to protect their turf. Those without it, emboldened by the recent government announcements, are taking over more properties on their own, without government approval.

"I've worked this land for 30 years, and I have never had a problem until this past year," said Yara, 63, whose family was among the Japanese immigrants who founded this community in eastern Bolivia after World War II. "But now I get death threats from the landless peasants, and they are threatening to kidnap my family. No one respects private property anymore, not even the government."

On June 9, one man was shot dead and more than a dozen were wounded in clashes as local authorities tried to evict peasants from land they had taken over in western Bolivia. Two days before that incident, two men were shot in similar circumstances in the central region. In this eastern province of Santa Cruz, agricultural organizations have threatened to form self-defense groups to protect farm property if the state tries to take it away. And across the border in Brazil, where property-related violence has been a problem for decades, a federation of landless peasants stormed the parliament building in the capital on June 7, breaking open the glass doors and demanding agrarian reforms.

The conflict in Bolivia is firmly rooted in the stark inequities that President Evo Morales says his "agrarian revolution" is designed to correct. About 90 percent of Bolivian land is owned by the wealthiest 7 percent of the population. Imbalances like that have helped make Bolivia South America's poorest nation: About 63 percent of its citizens -- and nearly 80 percent of its rural population -- live in poverty.

Morales has said much of his nation's land is not being used productively, and he complains that large swaths were given to wealthy elites during the dictatorships of the 1970s. Under his plan, if the government deems land unproductive or obtained illegally, it is subject to confiscation and redistribution.

The tension now, however, is concentrated not so much in the places where land is clearly unproductive as in the places where the definitions of productivity are more subjective and open to argument. Like Yara's place.Armed Guards

Standing behind a rusty pan scale, Yara tilts his head slightly and eyes customers warily when they enter his store, where sacks of potatoes and rice sit on worn planks in the middle of the floor. The way he figures it, he's one unjust decision away from losing everything, and these days he sees injustice in a lot of familiar faces he used to trust.

" 'Bolivian land should be for Bolivians' -- that's what they're telling me now," said Yara, watching one of his daughters weigh rice he'd grown on his land. "It's not right. I've always been supportive of Bolivia. I pay all my taxes. My children are Bolivians, and they're married to Bolivians. I sacrificed a lot to get that land."

Yara took out bank loans three decades ago, paying about $80,000 over the years for his deed. But in the past year, landless peasants have moved onto the fringes of his property, bringing in tractors and planting their own crops on it. He said they told him it was their right to take it because it was unproductive; he said it was just between growing cycles. He sued the peasants twice in local courts, he said, and won both times.

But Yara said that two months ago, Bolivia's minister of rural development -- who oversees the land reform plan -- called him and told him he must remove the 10 armed guards who were protecting his property from a takeover by Bolivia's federation of landless peasants. Yara reluctantly sent the guards away, and now about 50 members of the group, the Landless Movement, are occupying about one-fourth of his property. They keep telling him they'll take more soon, he said, and they promise bodily harm if he doesn't let them have it.

"Now I only have four bodyguards, who I pay to look after me and my family," he said, "but not the land."

Farm guards are a touchy subject around here. After a Santa Cruz agricultural group suggested this month that self-defense squadrons might be the best way to resist what they consider unjust reforms, the government responded by saying it would not tolerate private armies roaming the countryside. Masanori Toguchi, a farmer who helps operate a grain mill across the road from Yara's store, said he recently hired a team of armed guards, effectively clearing out a group of landless peasants who had taken over a portion of his property. The guards are "more or less trained," he said. He wasn't sure where his lawyer found them.

"They don't have phones, and they're kind of hidden," Toguchi said. "We don't really know who they are."Promises of Land

DOJ_NMG_0035392

From Yara's store, a dirt road winds for about 10 miles between freshly planted wheat fields before surrendering to weedy overgrowth. After cutting through the middle of a field of nine-foot-high sugarcane, a clearing comes into view: a dirt expanse dotted with dozens of shacks made of sticks and palm fronds. Of the few hundred people living here, about 80 count themselves as members of the landless federation.

Carmelo Ortiz is one. With eight children, his one-room hut is too crowded, so one afternoon last week he searched for fronds for a half-completed addition he hopes to finish in the next couple of months. His daughter wrung a shirt dry over a plastic bucket of cloudy water. One of his sons, stepping out of the dim hut and blinking in the sun, picked a square of mud from his cutoff jeans.

When he can, Ortiz helps local landowners in their fields, earning about $4 for a day's work. But he has dreams of being his own boss, growing his own crops, on his own piece of land. He was part of the group that took over part of Toguchi's land for three months earlier this year, and he was with them when they decided to retreat after hearing about the armed guards. Just last month, he said, he saw guards on another farmer's property shoot at a group of peasants.

Why a farmer who already has a lot of land would get so worked up over sharing part of it, he and others said, is unfathomable to the campesinos in the village.

"God created the resource of land," said Luciano Winchaca, a local campesino advocate who has helped the Landless Movement with its quest for land. "It should be divided equally for everyone, not be given to somebody because they speak better Spanish or come from a certain family. We all have the same rights. These people don't understand the will of God."

That said, most of the landless here say things have never been better. When Morales was elected in December, Ortiz and his neighbors threw a party that lasted all night. With his promises to redistribute the wealth of Bolivia among the poor, Morales is nothing short of a folk hero in the village of Okinawa.

"Everything is changing for the campesino," said Ortiz, 40, who is confident he will get a plot of land in the coming months. "We have hope now -- we haven't had that with any government in the history of this country."

Large-scale land reform has been tried in the past in Bolivia, and it failed miserably because of a lack of resources and political will. The country's first agrarian reform plan was passed in 1953, and another was tried in 1996. After nearly $100 million was spent in an attempt to redistribute 250 million acres during the past 10 years, only 17 percent of the target areas changed hands.

Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez -- an ideological ally of Morales who has promoted smaller-scale land reform in his country -- has pledged financial support. But Bolivia will have to find a lot more money to keep the current effort from joining the long list of failed agrarian reforms in Latin America.

If Ortiz gets a piece of land, for example, he will still need equipment to work it and money for additional supplies and seeds. Ortiz calculates that for each acre of land, he would need about $200. He's not sure where that money would come from, and the government has not yet offered specific details on credit and support programs for the new landowners.

"I have lived like this all my life," Ortiz said, nodding to his hut, where his 8-year-old son was helping his 12-year-old daughter carry water. "But we can't live like this forever."

Europe's Green Image Clashes With Coal Reliance (NYT)

By Mark Landler

New York Times, June 20, 2006

SCHWARZE PUMPE, Germany — In the shadow of two hulking boilers, which spew 10 million tons of carbon dioxide a year into the air, the Swedish owners of this coal-fired power station recently broke ground on what is to be the world's first carbon-free plant fueled by coal. The German chancellor, Angela Merkel, presided over the ceremony.

"We accept the problem of climate change," said Reinhardt Hassa, a senior executive at Vattenfall, which operates the plant. "If we want a future for coal, we have to adopt new technologies. It is not enough just to make incremental improvements."

But the new plant, which will be just a demonstration model, pales next to the eight coal-fired power stations Germany plans to build for commercial use between from now to 2011 — none of them carbon-free.

"That is really a disappointing track record," said Stephan Singer, the director of climate and energy policy at the World Wide Fund for Nature in Brussels. "Just replacing old coal plants with new coal plants won't enable Germany to meet stricter carbon emission targets."

Europe likes to think of itself as a place that has moved beyond its sooty industrial past, with energy that comes from the windmills that dot the Dutch countryside and the Danish coastline or the carbon-free nuclear plants that dominate France's power industry.

DOJ_NMG_0035393

But with oil prices soaring and worries rising about the reliability of gas piped from Russia, Europe must depend heavily on that great industrial-age relic, coal: a cheap, plentiful fuel, but one that emits twice the carbon dioxide of natural gas. Coal-fired plants generated half the power in Germany and Britain during the chilly winter just past.

While Europeans stand out for their commitment to controlling global warming gases, some of their largest energy companies are reluctant to invest in technologies that could further protect the environment, like equipment in the demonstration plant here that will trap carbon dioxide and pump it into underground storage areas. Only a handful of carbon-free plants are planned in the European Union.

There is another downside to coal, evident barely a mile from the plant here. Bulldozers have begun demolishing a 450-year-old mill town, which blocks the path of the open-pit mine that supplies coal to the plant. The last residents are being forced to pack their belongings and abandon their homes for a new settlement nearby.

Such uprooting is an unavoidable cost of Europe's hunger for coal, executives here say. They also say the technology to capture carbon dioxide is too costly, at a time when they are already spending billions of euros to replace Europe's aging power plants. Finding places to store the carbon dioxide is a headache in countries like Germany, which are densely populated and have a history of protesting against the storage of more troublesome pollutants like nuclear waste.

In Europe, where power companies say they have cleaned up the visible pollutants — like sulfur dioxide -- from their coal plants more diligently than their American counterparts, some executives are suspicious of current proposals to convert to "clean coal" technology.

They describe them as mainly public relations ploys championed by the Bush administration and American power companies, even as only a few plants that capture and sequester carbon dioxide are actually planned for the United States. They suspect the Americans are trying to circumvent mandatory cuts in carbon emissions and avoid making steady improvements in the efficiency of their plants.

"There's a lot of media-driven talk," said Alfred Tacke, chief executive of Steag, Germany's fifth-largest power generator, which has eight coal plants scattered in the Rhine, Ruhr and Saar regions.

"In the United States, you defer all investments, because in the future maybe you have the perfect solution," said Mr. Tacke, who was deputy economics minister under the previous German chancellor, Gerhard Schröder. "I would prefer a solution that improves the situation now."

By that, Mr. Tacke means using existing technology like raising the temperature or pressure of the steam that turns the turbine, to make conventional coal plants more efficient. Steag is building such a plant in the Ruhr city of Duisburg — a $1 billion project that, he says, will be more efficient than any rival in the United States.

The debate over coal in the European Union has to be seen within the context of the Kyoto Protocol, a global climate-control agreement that commits Germany and 34 other nations to measurable reductions in emissions of carbon dioxide and several other greenhouse gases.

With a legal imperative to cut emissions by up to a fifth within the next six years, power companies here face a clearer challenge than those in non-Kyoto countries, like the United States or China.

Yet while the Kyoto pact has focused minds, environmental advocates say it has not yet pushed companies far enough. In 2005, without any extraordinary effort, emissions of carbon dioxide in Germany, Britain and other countries actually came in below the caps set by national governments in the first phase of the Kyoto process, which runs from 2005 to 2007.

This, critics said, suggests that the reductions were not tough enough; much of the improvements were simply a natural outgrowth of slow economic growth and the closing of outdated coal operations. Britain and Germany both pledged to impose deeper cuts in the next phase, which starts in 2008 and runs through 2012.

"It's true that the first phase of emissions reductions are not that challenging," said Daniel Lashof, deputy director of the climate center at the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington. "Europe can make its targets with only incremental improvements."

Though Europeans are united in their concern about global warming, they have a patchwork of energy policies. Some countries, like Germany and Poland, remain heavily dependent on coal, while others, like France and Finland, are redoubling their investment in nuclear power. Italy and Spain use a lot of oil and gas, though Italy is converting some oil-fired plants to coal.

The recent spike in the price of oil has thrown the spotlight back on coal, even in places like Britain, where the industry had been in a death spiral for decades. Richard Budge, a longtime British coal executive, has announced plans to reopen a colliery in South Yorkshire. With financing from Russian investors, he also hopes to build a $1.5 billion power plant on the site, equipped with technology to capture and store carbon dioxide.

After years in disrepute, coal is still struggling for public acceptance in Britain. The government is drafting a new energy policy that is expected to stress windmills and other renewable energy sources.

DOJ_NMG_0035394

But economic and geopolitical realities, Mr. Budge said, make a bigger role for coal inevitable. "Wind farms only work one day in three, and nobody knows which day," he said, with only a hint of exaggeration, in a telephone interview.

Coal, he noted, is not a hostage to politics. When Russia abruptly switched off its natural gas pipeline to Ukraine in January over a pricing dispute, gas supplies dwindled all over Western Europe. To Germany and other gas importers, it was a chilling reminder of their vulnerability.

"Fifty-eight percent of the world's gas is owned by Russia, Iran and Qatar," Mr. Budge said. "Coal is on every continent."

Here in eastern Germany, vast deposits of brown coal, also known as lignite, lurk beneath the table-flat countryside. There are similar deposits in the Rhine and Ruhr valleys in the west. Though Germany has been mining in these regions for decades, the supply is far from exhausted.

So great is the demand that the government allows companies to forcibly resettle villages that lie in the path of their excavators. The process is costly and litigious and can take more than a decade.

"This is a very difficult issue for us," Mr. Hassa said, noting that Vattenfall has begun negotiating with 230 residents of a village next to a mine, for a relocation that would not happen until 2018.

Haidemühle, the village being swallowed by the Schwarze Pumpe mine, acquiesced to relocation fairly quietly. Among the few holdouts was Heinz Attula, 84, who said Vattenfall did not pay him enough for his property. But even he was ready to move to a new home provided by the company.

"It's not an easy step," Mr. Attula said, as he walked his dog past deserted houses and a ghostly schoolyard recently. "I've lived my whole life in this town. But I know the mining must go on."

The economic forces are getting harder to resist. Coal is Germany's main generator of electricity, and the government plans to phase out the next largest source, nuclear power, by 2021. Though use of natural gas is growing — Germany and Russia are jointly building a pipeline under the Baltic Sea — last winter's cut-off left a bad taste in Berlin.

"This really changed the thinking of politicians and economists," said Johannes F. Lambertz, a member of the management board of RWE Power, the No. 1 electricity generator in Germany and No. 3 in Britain. "People now talk about competitiveness and security together."

Coal is the bedrock of RWE's business, and its strategy illustrates the tension between environmental progress and the status quo. The company is expanding its huge BoA plant in the Rhine valley, which uses brown coal, and it plans a new black, or hard, coal plant, east of the Ruhr valley. Neither, at least initially, will be equipped to capture and store carbon dioxide.

Long viewed as a holdout, RWE recently surprised competitors by announcing its first carbon-free plant, scheduled to go into service in 2014. The $1.2 billion project would have a capacity of 450 megawatts, more than ten times that of the pilot plant in Schwarze Pumpe.

"We have to be prepared for a scenario in which carbon emission reductions are much greater than today," Mr. Lambertz said in an interview at RWE Power's headquarters in Cologne. "We have to keep all our options open since we face an uncertain future."

With so few details and such a long timetable, critics said the announcement was a public relations maneuver, at a time when the German government is setting the next stage of emissions reduction targets.

"Last year, RWE said it was skeptical about a carbon-free plant before 2015," said Brian Ricketts, a coal industry analyst at the International Energy Agency in Paris. "It's a game between industry and government."

While Europe's longer-term reductions in emissions are still undecided, there is a general agreement that they will have to be radical — if only to compensate for the additional greenhouse gases being generated by China and India, to say nothing of the United States.

The plant at Schwarze Pumpe shows how European industry is adapting to this future. Originally built in 1955 by East German Communists, it was equipped with the best technology then available. But it still contributed to East Germany's reputation for horrendous pollution.

The town's name translates as "black pump," and outsiders regularly assume it refers to its pollution record. Actually it stems from a tale that in the Thirty Years' War of the 1600's, townspeople painted their pump black to trick invaders into thinking the water was infected with the plague.

After German reunification in 1990, the government opted to replace the Schwarze Pumpe plant. The new one, opened in 1998, is equipped with filters and scrubbers that reduced sulfur dioxide emissions by 91 percent, nitrogen oxide by 61 percent, and almost completely eliminated dust. Carbon dioxide emissions were reduced only 31 percent, however.

Vattenfall's carbon-free plant will burn the coal in an atmosphere of pure oxygen and recirculated gas. Three quarters of the carbon dioxide produced by the burning is recycled back into the boiler. What remains is pressurized into a liquid-gas mixture and injected underground. Mr. Hassa said it was no accident that a Swedish company was on the vanguard of this effort. "The Swedish philosophy is different than the German philosophy," he said. "Climate change and environmental protection are more deeply rooted in Swedish society than in German society."

DOJ_NMG_0035395

Vattenfall concedes it will not be able to produce carbon-free electricity on a large scale until at least 2015. Still, it says it has little choice but to start now. "In the long run," said a spokesman, Martin May, "we'll have to reduce emissions by 60 percent to 70 percent."

In China It's * Vs. Netizens (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BEIJING

To test the limits of the Internet in China, I started a couple of Chinese blogs — in which I huff and puff as outrageously as I can.

For a country that employs some 30,000 Internet censors, that turned out to be stunningly easy. In about 10 minutes, I started Ji Sidao's blog — that's my Chinese name — on two Chinese Web hosts, at no cost and without providing any identification.

Writing in Chinese, I began by denouncing the imprisonment of my Times colleague, Zhao Yan, by the Chinese authorities. I waited for it to be censored. Instead, it promptly appeared on my blog.

In frustration, I wrote something even more provocative: a call for President Hu Jintao to set an example in the fight against corruption by publicly disclosing his financial assets. To my astonishment, that wasn't censored either.

Desperate, I mentioned Falun Gong, the religious group that is the Chinese government's greatest enemy: "In Taiwan, the Chinese people have religious freedom. So in the Chinese mainland, why can't we discuss Falun Gong?" That instantly appeared on both my blogs as well, although on one the characters for "Falun" were replaced by asterisks (functioning as pasties, leaving it obvious what was covered up).

Finally, I wrote the most inflammatory comment I could think of, describing how on June 4, 1989, I saw the Chinese Army fire on Tiananmen Square protesters. The two characters for June 4 were replaced by asterisks, but the description of the massacre remained intact.

These various counterrevolutionary comments, all in Chinese, are still sitting there in Chinese cyberspace at http://blog.sina.com.cn/u/1238333873 and http://jisidao.blog.sohu.com. (When State Security reads this, it may finally order my blogs closed.)

All this underscores, I think, that China is not the police state that its leaders sometimes would like it to be; the Communist Party's monopoly on information is crumbling, and its monopoly on power will follow. The Internet is chipping away relentlessly at the Party, for even 30,000 censors can't keep up with 120 million Chinese Netizens. With the Internet, China is developing for the first time in 4,000 years of history a powerful independent institution that offers checks and balances on the emperors.

It's not that President Hu Jintao grants these freedoms, for he has arrested dozens of cyberdissidents as well as journalists. But the Internet is just too big and complex for State Security to control, and so the Web is beginning to assume the watchdog role filled by the news media in freer countries.

A year ago, I wrote about a blogger named Li Xinde who travels around China with his laptop, reporting on corruption and human-rights abuses. I hailed Mr. Li as an example of the emerging civil society in China — and the government promptly closed down his Web site. I wondered if I had overstated the challenge.

But today Mr. Li is as active as ever. His Web sites are constantly closed down, but the moment a site is censored he replaces it with a new one. An overseas master site, www.lixinde.com, tells people the best current address.

"They can keep closing sites, but they never catch up," Mr. Li told me. "You can't stop the Yellow River from flowing, and you can't block the bloggers."

In today's China, young people use proxy software to reach forbidden sites and Skype to make phone calls without being tapped — and the local Web pornography is relentless and explicit, ranging from sex videos to nude online chats.

"We're very relaxed now on pornography, but on politics it's very tight," said Yao Bo, a censor at a major chat-room site in China. He explained how the censorship works for a chat room:

Filtering software automatically screens the several hundred thousand comments typically posted on his Web site every day. Comments with a banned word go into a special queue, but Mr. Yao says he ends up posting all but the most subversive of these — his Web site, after all, wants to be provocative to attract visitors. State Security periodically scolds him for his laxity, but he seems unconcerned: "I just tell them I'm dumb about politics."

DOJ_NMG_0035396

China's leaders decided years ago to accept technologies even if they are capable of subversive uses: photocopiers and fax machines at first, and now laptops and text messaging. The upshot is that China is much freer than its rulers would like.

To me, this trend looks unstoppable. I don't see how the Communist Party dictatorship can long survive the Internet, at a time when a single blog can start a prairie fire.

The Bleeding Heart Of Islam (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

In the early 1990s, Harvard professor Samuel Huntington observed that "Islam has bloody borders." Back then, he was right.

Picture a map of Muslim lands, circa 1993. In the Balkans, Orthodox Serbs were at war with Bosnian Muslims. In Sudan, the Islamist government in Khartoum was waging a campaign of murder and enslavement against the Christian south. Israel was fighting Hezbollah in southern Lebanon even as it signed a peace agreement with the Palestinians -- one that would, in time, literally explode in its face. In the Caucasus, Muslim Azeris and Christian Armenians were battling over the Nagorno-Karabakh enclave, while 200 miles north Muslim Chechnya had declared independence and was about to be invaded by Russia. Further east, India and Pakistan were lobbing artillery shells across the Line of Control in Kashmir.

Picture that map today. The violence at the periphery of Islam has, for various reasons, faded. But the antagonisms at its center have grown.

Look at Palestine, where the ostensibly secular Fatah party of President Mahmoud Abbas and the fundamentalist Hamas of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh may be in the early stages of civil war. Look at Darfur, where Arab Muslims are slaughtering African Muslims. The dynasts of Jordan and Saudi Arabia are being forced to confront the terrorism of al Qaeda. In Egypt, liberals oppose the Muslim Brotherhood, the Brotherhood opposes the government, and the government suppresses them both. In Iran, the youth confront the clerical establishment. Pro-independence factions in Lebanon are struggling to survive a campaign of assassination and terror by Syria. The bloody heart of it all, of course, is Iraq.

Amid routine slaughter in Baghdad and Darfur, nobody would call the present state of affairs good. But it is an improvement over the previous state, not only because a clash within one civilization is better than a clash among several, but because Islamic civilization has long been in need of a reformation. That's what's happening today in one Muslim state after another: The struggle for power has become a contest of ideas (and vice versa), with fateful consequences and, sometimes, good results.

Take Saudi Arabia. Before Sept. 11, says Hawazen Nassief, a Saudi journalist at the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center, "the Saudi government lived in denial and refused to acknowledge that its blind support for strict Wahhabi religious institutions and preachers was breeding extremism, intolerance and violence." The denial persisted even after the disclosure that 15 of the 19 hijackers were Saudis.

What changed? Ms. Nassief points to the succession of al Qaeda attacks, beginning in May 2003, on residential complexes, government offices, oil facilities and foreigners. "It was a slap on the face," she says. "There was no international player to blame for this deviancy except the political, social, economic and religious climate of the kingdom. The shattering of the viable image of the kingdom led the government to allow critical voices that were previously pushed underground. . . . The minute the government loosened its restrictions, people flooded the media with criticism of the status quo."

A similar dynamic took hold elsewhere in the Arab world as the phenomenon of suicide bombing -- widely admired when the victims were Israeli or American -- boomeranged on Muslims. After Sept. 11, Jordanian newspapers were filled with speculation that the deed could not have been the work of Muslims and must have been orchestrated by Zionists, Christian evangelicals, the Bush administration or some combination thereof. But the delusion and the pretense came abruptly to an end after suicide bombers murdered 63 Muslims at three hotels in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 9, 2005. The Amman bombings, Salafist cleric Abu Basir al-Tartusi wrote in a Web posting translated by Memri, "cannot be considered Islamic," adding that "he who approves of a sin is like he who committed it."

At an off-the-record session last month of young Arab leaders at the World Economic Forum in Sharm El-Sheikh, Egypt, the sense of exhaustion with the way things are was palpable. A young Saudi on his social life: "I can't go anywhere. Malls are strictly for families. It's horrible." A Gulf State participant on her upbringing: "Teachers don't encourage disagreement. We are not raised to choose. We don't have a culture of accepting the other." An Egyptian on Arab political life: "'Deviant' ideas are dangerous. Young people are suspect. Leaders are inaccessible."

Not that the participants there -- upper class, fluent in English, many of them educated in the West -- were especially representative of their societies. But what struck an outsider was the extent to which the nature of elite conversation had changed. The Arab intelligentsia's stale litany of complaint against imperial America, perfidious Zion, the legacy of colonialism and so on -- what Bernard Lewis described as the habit of asking, "who did this to us?" -- is giving way to a new mentality. Now the question is: "What did we do wrong?"

DOJ_NMG_0035397

It's in this context that an event such as January's protests over the Danish cartoons is best understood. The (mostly orchestrated) demonstrations were, above all, an attempt by Islamists and autocrats to remind Muslims that their principal grievances were external, not domestic. They sought to impress Western audiences with the intensity of Muslim rage while silencing domestic critics who didn't share that passion. Burning down Scandinavian embassies, however, does not contented Muslims make. Six months after l'affaire Muhammad, the offending cartoons have faded from memory, whereas the reality of domestic misrule remains.

There is a perception in the West -- general in Europe but strong also in the U.S. -- that the Reformation of Islam awaits the resolution of a centuries-long Hegelian dialectic. The world moves faster than that. Through wireless connections and satellite dishes, the outside world is filtering into the Middle East, mostly uncensored by regimes or imams. Not everyone likes it, but many do, and the difference between them not only bloodies the Middle East, but also, increasingly, offers it hope.

DOJ_NMG_0035398

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says (WP) 4
Rowley Criticized Over Moussaoui Probe (WP/AP) 5
Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent (WT/UPI) 6
Judge Upholds Convictions Against Lodi Man In Federal Terror Case (AP) 6
Hayat's Charges Remain The Same (STOCKREC) 6
TERROR LAWYER DEMANDS FEDS' 'EAVESDROP' FILES (NYPOST) 7
A Standard For Interrogation (WP) 7
The ACLU's Tortured Logic On Gitmo (LAT) 8
Closing Time At Guantanamo (WP) 9

Homeland Response:

Arab-Americans Sue U.S. Over Re-entry Procedures (NYT) 10
Lawsuit Filed Over Screening Of Airline Passengers (AP) 11
Terrorist Screening Database Lawsuit (WXYZ-TV) 11
For A Change, A Back Slap At The Airport For The Mayor (NYT) 12
Bloomberg, Often Critical Of Bush, Goes Out Of Way To Greet Him (WNBC-TV.com) 13
U.S. To Buy Anthrax Treatment From HGS (WP) 13
Privacy Matters (WT) 14
The Golden Revolving Door (NYT) 15
Help En Route For New Orleans Police (USAT) 16
Troops To Return To New Orleans (LAT) 16
Crime Rising, New Orleans Asks For National Guard (NYT) 17
After Day Of Flooding, Houston Braces For One More (USAT) .. 18

War News:

Two Missing U.S. Soldiers Found Dead,Â Iraq Official Says (AP) 19
Group Says It Abducted Missing GIs; 3 Americans Charged In Iraqi Deaths (WP) 20
US Very Worried About Missing Soldiers In Iraq: Rice (AFP) 21
Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs (USAT) 21
Group Linked To Al Qaeda In Iraq Says It Kidnapped 2 U.S. Soldiers (LAT) 22
Al Qaeda Ally Says It Holds Soldiers (WT/AP) 23
Families Anxiously Await Confirmation Of Missing Soldiers' Status (WP) 24
Senate Democrats Coalesce Around Iraq Plan (AP) 24
Senate Democrats Urge Beginning Of An Iraq Pullout This Year, But Avoid A Firm Schedule (NYT) 25
Senate Democrats Push Phased Iraq Redeployment (WT) 26
For Democrats, A Delicate Balance On Iraq (WP) 27
Democrats Shape Plans On Iraq (LAT) 28
Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark (WP) 29
Cheney: U.S. Action Averts New Attacks (USAT) 30
Japan Plans To Bring Troops Home As Iraqis Take Over (WP) . 31
'Coalition Of The Willing' Shrinks In Iraq (FT) 31
Japan To Withdraw Its Troops From Iraq (LAT) 32
The Way Out Of Iraq: A Road Map (WP) 32
Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq (NYT) 33
U.S. To Charge Soldiers In Iraq Detainee Deaths (WT) 35
Army Cancels Contract For New Iraqi Prison (NYT) 35
Battlefield Conversion Employees Of Contractor Barred From Iraq Resurrect Its Business (WSJ) 36
Prosecution Urges Death For Saddam (USAT) 39
Arduous Hussein Trial Winding Up (CSM) 40
Iraqi Prosecutor Formally Seeks Death Penalty For Hussein (LAT) 41
Prosecutor Seeks Death For Hussein (WP) 42
Prosecutor In Hussein Trial Calls For The Death Penalty (NYT) 43
Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam (WT/AP) 44
Iraq, As Seen Through 9 Lives (USAT) 45
Culpability Deficit Disorder (WP) 45
Revived Taliban Waging 'full-blown Insurgency' (USAT) 46
Afghan Guerrillas Kill 32 With Ties To Legislator (NYT) 48
In Tribal Pakistan, A Tide Of Militancy (WP) 48
Pulling No Punches In Push For Navy SEALs (WP) 50
Stress Disorder Seen Soaring Among Returning Troops (KRT) . 52
Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets (WP) 52
Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy (NYT) 54

Corporate Scandals:

U.S. Attorney Asks Black For More Bond Security (WSJ) 55
Black Broke Agreement On Bail Bond, U.S. Tells Court (Update4) (BLOOM) 56
Denver Lawyer Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Probe (LAW) 57
Father, Son Plead Guilty To SureWest Fraud (SACBIZ) 58
Fed Governor Olson To Head Accounting Board (WSJ) 58
Lone Star Is Cleared In Probe Of KEB Deal (WSJ) 59
Options Timing Raises Concerns Among Insurers (WSJ) 60

Criminal Law:

Abramoff May See Delayed Sentence (RC) ... 61
Hiring Trial Shown Alleged Clout List (CHIT) ... 62
-page Clout List Is 5,000 Strong (CHIST) ... 63
Ex-agent Testifies To Probe Of Bulger (BOS) ... 65
Judge Orders FBI To Turn Over Agent's Desperate Letter (BOSH) ... 65
FBI To Add Agents To Wales Case (SEAPI) ... 66
Two Officers In Bribery Scheme Plead Guilty (AP) ... 67
Two Ex-officers Plead Guilty (RTD) ... 67
Justices Draw A Line On What Evidence Is Admissible (USAT). 67
Absent Accusers' 911 Calls Ruled Admissible (WP) ... 68
No Bond For Alleged Mob Figure (CHIT) ... 69
Ex-Stock Picker Gets Prison Sentence (LAT/AP) ... 70
Judge Sentences Trader Elgindy To More Than 11 Years In Jail (WSJ) ... 70
Man Gets 17 Years For Investing Scam (MH) ... 70
Supreme Court Upholds California's Searches Of Parolees (CSM) ... 71
Supreme Court Rules That Parolees Can Be Searched Without Cause (LAW/AP) ... 72
Court OKs Random Searches Of Parolees (CNN) ... 72
School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Peephole Films In Women's Rest Room (PPG) ... 73
Perpetrator Problem: It's Hard To Run Away In Falling Trousers (WSJ) ... 73

Civil Law:

Court To Address Abortion Restrictions (WP) ... 75
Supreme Court Adds Second Abortion Case To Docket (FINDLAW/AP) ... 76
Judge Approves Extension For Auto Supplier Delphi To File Reorganization Plan (FINDLAW/AP) ... 76
Lobbying Bill Stuck In Limbo (RC) ... 76

Civil Rights:

Preferential Hawaiian School Admissions Questioned In Court (FINDLAW/AP) ... 78
Federal Judge Tosses $240,000 Verdict In Age Bias Lawsuit (LAW) ... 78
S.D. Voters To Decide Fate Of Abortion Ban (AP-Y2) ... 80
Pentagon Lists Homosexuality As Disorder (AP) ... 80
Flag Needs Protection (USAT) ... 81
Congress Nears Choice: Protect Freedom Or Stoke Anger? (USAT) ... 81
'A White Individual' (WSJ) ... 82

Antitrust:

Justice Report Highlights Progress In Intellectual Property Protection (INFOWEEK) ... 83
Real Estate System Criticized (WP) ... 84
Justice Dept Won't Challenge Collaborative Labor Database (DOW) ... 85
FTC Signs Off On Internet Legal Referrals (LAW) ... 85
Congress Weighs Rules Of Net Access (CSM) ... 86
Op-Ed: Don't Be Gun Shy Due To 'Jumping The Gun' Antitrust Fears (LAW) ... 87
Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid For Denver Firm (AP) ... 89
Judge Tosses Port Authority Suit (FAIRNM) ... 90
Judge Dismisses Port Authority's Lawsuit Against Oil Companies (AP) ... 91
High Court Seeks Government View In IPO Underwriter Appeal (MRKTWTCH) ... 91
Senate Panel Proposes Net User 'bill Of Rights' (CNET) ... 92
Mittal Says Bid Is Gaining Support (WSJ) ... 93
Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate-Service Unit (WSJ) ... 94
Subsidizing Yesterday's Telephones (LAT) ... 94

Environment:

Supreme Court Affirms Wetlands Protections (AP-Y2) ... 95
Court Divided Over Wetlands Protections (NYT) ... 96
Supreme Court Splits Over Protecting Wetlands (CSM) ... 98
Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act (WSJ) ... 99
Justices Rein In Clean Water Act (WP) ... 101
Supreme Court Justices Show Support For Wetlands Protection (LAT) ... 102
Supreme Court Splits Sharply On Wetlands Protections (LAW)103
Clean Water Act Reach Limited: U.S. Supreme Court Overview (BLOOM) ... 104
Clean Water At Risk (NYT) ... 106
Parsing The Waters (WSJ) ... 106
Panel Reaches Deal On Drilling Off U.S. Coasts (NYT) ... 107
Scent Of Ballots Is In Air, And Energy Bills Are Blooming (NYT)108
Blame Oil Prices For Those Potholes (USAT) ... 109
Snowmobile-Friendly Plan For National Parks Rejected (LAT). 109
Restoring Sanity To The Interior (LAT) ... 110
Tiger, Tiger . . . Lost Forever (WP) ... 110

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Houston County Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Gun Charges (AP) ... 111
Bridgeport Mayor Admits To Cocaine Use (AP) ... 112
Workers' Positive Drug Tests Decrease (USAT) ... 112
Reports Suggest Gain In Fight On Meth Labs (NYT/AP) ... 113
Meth Activity Down, Two New Reports Show (AP) ... 113
Number Of Meth Labs Closed In Past 2 Years (AP) ... 114
Workplace Drug Use Declines In 2005 (UPI) ... 116
Fewer Failing Drug Tests; Dope Still Most Common (SAEN) ... 116
War On Meth Yields Results (KCS) ... 116
Meth Lab Busts Are Down By 40% In State (LADN) ... 117
Two Brothers Could Be Charged With Fentanyl Related Death (WXYZ) ... 118
Siblings May Be Linked To Fentanyl (DN) ... 118
6 Drug Deaths Reported; Heroin Suspected In 3 (CHIT) ... 119
Lake Charles Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Supplying Medicine (AP) ... 119
Lab That Tested OU Coach's Hair Has Had Its Share Of Run-ins With Regulators (ANE) ... 119

Immigration:

Immigration Bill Hit Over Work-site Enforcement (WT) ... 122

Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas (WT) 123
New Scrutiny Of Illegal Immigrants In Minor Crimes (NYT) 124
Seeking A Safer Border Crossing; In D.C., Protest Bricks Put To Work (WSJ) 126
Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants (USAT)..... 128
Immigration Consensus (WSJ) 128

Tax:

Executive Accused Of Tax Fraud And Witness Intimidation (NYT) 129
Key House Lawmaker Reveals Estate Tax Plan (AP-Y2)..... 130
House Republicans May Settle For A Muted Estate-Tax Reduction (WSJ)..... 130

Congress-Administration:

Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere (WP)131
Rice's Top Deputy To Leave State Department (WP)..... 133
Zoellick To Quit State Department For Goldman (WSJ) 134
No. 2 State Department Official Resigns To Join Wall Street Firm (NYT) 134
Zoellick Takes Senior Post At Goldman (FT) 135
State's Zoellick Resigns (WT) 136
Zoellick, State Dept.'s Strategist On Darfur And China, To Resign (LAT)..... 136
Polygraph Test Results Vary Among Agencies (WP) 137
Cheney Hearts Reporters (Not Really) (RC) 139
Crowded Agenda, But Few Easy Wins For GOP (RC) 140
Democrats Look To Keep Minimum Wage On Table (WSJ)..... 141
Police Group Wants McKinney Scuffle Probed (AP-Y2) 143
Union Seeks Ethics Probe Of McKinney (HILL) 143
Milestone For McCrery (HILL)..... 144
Agriculture Official Has Little Time For Flexible Scheduling (WP)145
Agents End Up As Drive-By Rescuers To Ex-Federal Official (WP)..... 146
Justices Fight Back (USAT) 147
The Chief Justice Sets A Standard (WP)..... 148
The SWAT Syndrome (NYT) 149

Other News:

Inflation Fears Hit Wall Street Again As S&P 500 Veers Back Into The Red (WSJ) 150
Bush Raises $27 Million For GOP (WP)..... 150
Bush Helps Republicans Raise Cash (WP/AP)..... 151
Santorum Seeks Jewish Vote In His Tough Nov. Match-up (HILL) 152
Dean’s Brother Raps DSCC Over Stance On Lieberman (RC) 153
McCain Weighs The Chance To Run Again (FT)..... 154
Poll: Clinton Gets High 'no' Vote For 2008 (CNN) 156
Weekly Wal-Mart Shoppers Are Midterms’ NASCAR Dads (HILL) 156
Governor's Troubles Threaten G.O.P. In Kentucky (NYT) 158
The Airbus Debacle (WSJ) 160
Save Our SIPP (NYT) 161
Failure In Richmond (WP)..... 161
Iran Urged To Accept Limits (WP) 162
Bush's Visit, Speech Thrill Midshipmen (USAT)..... 162
Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory (NSDY) 164
Bush, At Merchant Academy, Warns Iran On Nuclear Program (NYT) 164
Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting (USAT)... 165
Iran Tops Agenda For Bush, European Leaders (KRT) 166
Bush Gives Iran An Ultimatum On Uranium (AP)..... 167
The Race For Iran (NYT) 168
Elie Wiesel Sounds The Alarm Regarding Iran Nobel Laureate Embarks On A Mission To Combat 'Religious Fanaticism' (WSJ) 169
Rice Warns North Korea On Missile Test (AP)..... 170
N. Korea Warned On Testing Missile (WP) 171
N Korea Missile Threat A ‘provocative Act’ (FT)..... 172
Rice Says North Korean Missile Test Would Be 'Provocative Act' (NYT) 173
Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told (USAT) 174
U.S. Warns North Korea On Missile Launch (LAT) 175
N. Korean Threat Activates Shield (WT)..... 176
North Korea's Incredibly Bad Idea (NYT)..... 177
US Congress Cautious On Indian Nuclear Energy (FT)..... 177
U.S., Russia Break Impasse On Plan To Keep Arms From Rogue Users (WP)..... 178
Palestinian Workers Receive Partial Pay (USAT/AP) 179
East Timor: U.S. Opposes U.N. Force (NYT)..... 180
Arrests Spark Fears Of Armed Islamist Takeover (WT)..... 180
Bush, Brazil's Lula, Discuss Trade (AFP) 181
Bush, Brazil Leader Talk Trade Expansion (AP) 181
Venezuela Fights US Bid To Keep It Off UN Panel (FT)..... 181
Annan Cautions Rights Council To Avoid Rifts (NYT)..... 182
Countering Counterfeits (WSJ) 183
Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle (WP) 184
Europe's Green Image Clashes With Coal Reliance (NYT) 185
In China It's * Vs. Netizens (NYT)..... 188
The Bleeding Heart Of Islam (WSJ) 189

DOJ_NMG_0035401

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Erred Widely In Moussaoui Probe, Report Says (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The FBI's mistakes in the investigation of Zacarias Moussaoui extended from headquarters officials who dismissed the threat posed by the al-Qaeda operative down to field agents and even a prominent FBI whistle-blower, according to a government report made public yesterday.

The report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said "numerous systemic problems" within the bureau prevented the FBI from unraveling Moussaoui's role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terror plot when he was arrested a month before the attacks. Moussaoui later became the only person charged in a U.S. courtroom in connection with the attacks. He was sentenced to life in prison last month.

Fine concluded that senior FBI managers failed to move aggressively to gain a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11. But unlike previous public criticisms of the FBI's bungling of the case -- which have focused on senior FBI managers in Washington -- Fine's analysis said there was plenty of blame to go around.

The inspector general said former FBI lawyer Colleen Rowley, who gained fame as a whistle-blower when she pointed out the errors by headquarters, had failed to properly guide agents on what type of search warrant to seek.

He said agents in Minneapolis, who have been hailed for warning supervisors about Moussaoui, rushed to open an intelligence investigation before realizing that they would need a criminal search warrant. The so-called "wall" that existed at the time between intelligence and criminal investigators has been blamed for the failure to examine Moussaoui's belongings until after Sept. 11.

Ultimately, Fine concluded, no FBI policies or procedures were violated in the Moussaoui investigation. "It is important to state that we did not conclude that any FBI employee committed intentional misconduct, or that anyone attempted to deliberately 'sabotage' " the investigation, Fine wrote.

His probe was triggered by a 2002 letter from Rowley to FBI director Robert S. Mueller III, which accused FBI headquarters of deliberately undercutting the Minneapolis agents. Most of the report was released last year; the Moussaoui portion was withheld until the conclusion of his death penalty trial.

In a statement, the FBI emphasized that Fine had "dismissed any instances of intentional wrongdoing by FBI employees or any violation of FBI policies or practices" and found there was no attempt by FBI headquarters "to intentionally thwart the efforts" of Minneapolis agents.

Intelligence and other reforms since Sept. 11, the bureau added, have left the FBI "much better positioned today to detect and prevent terrorism."

Rowley, in an interview yesterday, accepted blame for failing to push FBI headquarters to authorize a search warrant. "When the agents met some roadblocks," she said, "I should have picked up the phone and argued."

But Rowley, who retired from the FBI in 2004 and is now running for a congressional seat in Minnesota, said she was "proud that I had the guts to bring up" the mistakes. "I think it accomplished something," she said.

Moussaoui was arrested in August 2001 on immigration charges in Minnesota, and agents there soon concluded that he was a potential hijacker. But they could not persuade supervisors to seek either a criminal or Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings.

The independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks singled out the FBI's handling of Moussaoui as a key missed opportunity to stop the hijackings. Fine's report, however, concluded that under FBI procedures at the time, persuading a judge to issue a warrant was not a "slam dunk."

The previously released version of Fine's report called the FBI's inability to detect the Sept. 11 plot a "significant failure," finding that a warning about possible flight training by terrorists was mishandled and that the FBI missed five distinct opportunities to identify two of the suicide hijackers.

The FBI's pre-Sept. 11 failures were also a major focus at Moussaoui's recent trial in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

DOJ_NMG_0035402

Prosecutors said that Moussaoui deserved to die because he lied to the FBI and that the plot could have been stopped if he had told agents what he knew. Defense attorneys argued that the FBI ignored numerous warning signs before Sept. 11 and would have failed to act on Moussaoui's information as well.

Jurors would up voting 11 to 1 for death on one of the three counts against Moussaoui. The one holdout juror told The Washington Post that he dismissed the defense argument about the bureau because "the FBI wasn't on trial. Moussaoui was."

Rowley Criticized Over Moussaoui Probe (WP/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The former FBI agent who blew the whistle on the bureau's failings in its pre-Sept. 11 probe of al-Qaida terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui was criticized Monday in a government report for her own role in the case.

Coleen Rowley, a former lawyer in the FBI's Minneapolis field office who is now running for Congress as a Democrat, received both praise and criticism in the report prepared by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The report credits Rowley overall for blowing the whistle on mistakes at FBI headquarters in its failure to aggressively investigate Moussaoui. "Her complaints resulted in an important reassessment of how the FBI handled this matter," it said.

But the report faults Rowley for failing to pursue other investigative avenues, such as a traditional criminal search warrant. Her focus instead was on obtaining a search warrant from a special intelligence court that operates in secret.

"At the outset, she assumed that (the U.S. Attorney's Office) would not support a criminal warrant," the report states. "Contrary to the implication in her letter, which placed the blame for failing to seek a warrant solely on FBI headquarters, she advised the field agents not to seek a criminal warrant."

Rowley, in an interview with The Associated Press, said Monday that she simply advised that seeking a warrant through the intelligence court was a better option. She said agents eventually came up with another idea: deporting Moussaoui, which would have allowed immigration agents to search his belongings.

Moussaoui was already scheduled for deportation when the attacks occurred.

Rowley maintained that, in a pre 9/11 environment, prosecutors demanded an exceedingly high standard before they would ask a judge for a warrant.

"I will stand by that to the day I die," Rowley said.

Moussaoui was arrested in Minnesota on Aug. 15, 2001, on immigration violations after his efforts to obtain flight training drew suspicion. A search warrant of his belongings was not obtained until Sept. 11, after the suicide attacks that claimed nearly 3,000 lives.

At Moussaoui's trial earlier this year, prosecutors convinced a jury that a full investigation of Moussaoui prior to Sept. 11 could have yielded the investigative clues necessary for federal agents to thwart or at least minimize the attacks.

Rowley said she is proud that her memo resulted in the 450-page inspector general report, which provides in many places a stinging assessment of the FBI's handling of terror investigations prior to 9/11.

She disagrees with the report, though, when it concludes that FBI headquarters had a reasonable basis to question a search warrant on Moussaoui. Rowley maintains that Minneapolis had laid out probable cause and said officials at headquarters were simply unwilling to stick their necks out.

Most of the inspector general's report was publicly released last year, but the chapter about Moussaoui was redacted in an effort to protect Moussaoui's right to a fair trial.

Moussaoui was convicted earlier this year of aiding the Sept. 11 plot and sentenced to life in prison. He told jurors on the witness stand that he was to have piloted a fifth plane on Sept. 11 and fly it into the White House.

After the jury decided to spare his life, Moussaoui recanted his testimony and denied any role in 9/11, saying he lied on the stand only because he assumed he had no chance of getting a fair trial. Osama bin Laden also issued an audiotape after the trial in which he denied that Moussaoui was involved in the plot.

The report singles out other individuals at FBI headquarters for sharper criticism than Rowley, including David Frasca, then head of the FBI's radical fundamentalist unit, and his subordinate, Michael Maltbie. The failure of Frasca and Maltbie to heed the Minneapolis bureau's concerns about Moussaoui were a major issue at Moussaoui's trial.

Frasca and Maltbie have since been promoted.

—

On the Net:

Inspector general's report: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/new.htm

Rowley for Congress: http://www.coleenrowley.com

DOJ_NMG_0035403

Justice Report Faults Former FBI Agent (WT/UPI)

By United Press International

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

A Justice Department report Monday faulted former FBI agent Coleen Rowley for her handling of a warrant against Zacarias Moussaoui.

Rowley, who is running for Congress in Minnesota, was the FBI agent criticized for her agency's handling of the Moussaoui investigation prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York's World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Moussaoui has been sentenced to life in prison for failing to tell investigators about the plot.

The Minneapolis Star Tribune said the report found no intentional misconduct in the Moussaoui inquiry but faulted Rowley for failing to press for a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings.

Rowley told the Star Tribune she regrets having not gone to FBI lawyers in Washington for the warrant, circumventing the Minneapolis U.S. attorney's office.

Judge Upholds Convictions Against Lodi Man In Federal Terror Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, June 20, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A federal judge on Monday rejected a request to dismiss some of the counts against a Lodi man convicted of supporting terrorists, leaving in place the possible maximum prison sentence of 39 years.

Hamid Hayat, 23, was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

His attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, argued that federal prosecutors were piling on potential prison time by charging three versions of the same lying offense. Each count brings up to eight years in federal prison, while the material support charge carries a potential 15-year sentence.

U.S. District Court Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ruled the three lying charges are different enough to merit the separate convictions.

The first says Hayat lied during a June 3, 2005, conversation with an FBI agent at his home when he claimed that "he never attended a jihadist training camp."

The second and third counts were for statements made the next day during an interrogation at FBI headquarters in Sacramento. Hayat told agents he "never received weapons or other types of jihadist training" and that he "never received training to fight against the United States."

The circumstances of the two interviews were significantly different, Burrell ruled. He said the second and third counts were different because the FBI needed to learn whether Hayat planned to attack the U.S.

Prosecutors said Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan in May 2005 intent on attacking targets that may have included hospitals, banks and grocery stores. His videotaped confession was the heart of the government's case.

"He impaired the ability of the FBI to specifically identify a potential terrorist threat," Burrell said in his 11-page ruling.

Mojaddidi said she and her client were "obviously disappointed. It's just going to be another issue to add on to our motion for a new trial."

A hearing on that motion is scheduled for Nov. 17. No sentencing date has been set.

Hayat's Charges Remain The Same (STOCKREC)

Stockton (CA) Record, June 20, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Convicted terrorist-in-waiting Hamid Hayat of Lodi lost his bid Monday to have at least one of his three counts of lying to the FBI dismissed.

U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ruled that Hayat's three lying convictions are not redundant, because each lie hindered the FBI's investigation of an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in Lodi.

Hayat, who was convicted April 25 of attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004 and lying about it after returning to the United States in 2005, faces up to 39 years in federal prison. His sentencing has been delayed while his attorneys, Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan, prepare to file motions seeking a new trial for the 23-year-old Hayat.

When interviewed by the FBI last June, Hayat denied attending a training camp, receiving weapons training or training to fight a religious war against the United States. A jury found him guilty on all four counts. He faces up to eight years in prison on each of the three lying counts.

DOJ_NMG_0035404

Hayat's father pleaded guilty last month to a single count of lying to federal authorities about money he was smuggling out of the United States on a visit to Pakistan. Umer Hayat, 48, is under house arrest as he waits to be sentenced Aug. 18. As part of his plea deal, prosecutors are not seeking additional prison time.

TERROR LAWYER DEMANDS FEDS' 'EAVESDROP' FILES (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, June 20, 2006

Convicted terror lawyer Lynne Stewart wants to force the feds to reveal whether they used the National Security Agency's secret surveillance program to gain access to her personal phone records.

In papers filed in Manhattan federal court yesterday, Stewart's lawyers asked Judge John Koeltl for access to any phone and Internet records related to her case that the feds might have reviewed without a warrant.

Stewart made her demand in the wake of revelations that President Bush authorized the NSA to collect and maintain a databank of Americans' phone calls since the 9/11 attacks.

Three of the country's largest phone companies - Verizon, AT&T and BellSouth - have reportedly given the NSA access to records of calls made on more than 200 million phones in their systems.

Lawyers for Stewart claim her case may have been compromised if the feds had access to confidential communications under the controversial surveillance program, which they claim is illegal.

Stewart, 66, was convicted in February 2005 of providing material support to terrorists by releasing the statement of a notorious jailed client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman.

Her sentencing was recently postponed to Sept. 15 after she learned that she has breast cancer.

A Standard For Interrogation (WP)

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

IN THE DAYS and weeks after Sept. 11, 2001, senior Bush administration officials decided that harsh interrogation methods were necessary to prevent devastating attacks on the country -- and that such methods could be carefully administered and limited to the most urgent cases. This thinking proved disastrously flawed. Once the administration lifted the strict regulations that long had governed interrogations of foreign detainees, abusive practices spread quickly across the government. Confusion over rules led to the torture not just of senior al-Qaeda leaders but also of common detainees in Afghanistan and Iraq. The damage done to U.S. honor and prestige around the world, and to America's ability to mobilize support for the fight against Islamic extremism, far outweighed any intelligence gathered.

Many Americans may believe that this lesson has been learned and that U.S.-sanctioned abuse is a thing of the past. Far from it. Yes, Congress last year passed the McCain amendment, which prohibits "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of all prisoners in U.S. custody. But it has become increasingly clear that the administration has not accepted that ban as the last word. It still has not renounced the right to subject some detainees to practices such as "waterboarding," or simulated drowning, even though they violate the law. It has yet to adopt clear standards governing the interrogation and treatment of foreign prisoners, or return to full compliance with such treaties as the Geneva Conventions and the Convention Against Torture. Until this situation changes, there will be more of the lawlessness and simple confusion that have led to hundreds of cases of abuse, and dozens of homicides, in Afghanistan, Iraq, Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere.

The administration is seeking to evade the McCain ban in more than one way. The law required that the Army's standard interrogation manual, overridden in 2002, once again govern all questioning of prisoners held in Defense Department facilities. But the Pentagon has prepared a new manual; Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have pushed for it to include a classified annex in which some harsh techniques are again authorized for use against prisoners deemed "enemy combatants."

The administration is also preparing a new directive on detention that would exclude compliance with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which prohibits torture and other cruelty, including "humiliating and degrading treatment." Finally, through a presidential signing statement and questionable legal opinions, the administration is reserving the right to continue using waterboarding and other harsh techniques on prisoners held by the CIA. It argues that the president's power to make war allows him to override congressional restrictions and that waterboarding in some circumstances does not violate the U.S. constitutional prohibition of cruel treatment.

For now, objections from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other sponsors of the amendment have caused the administration to delay issuing the new doctrine and manual. The senators are rightly demanding that there be one set of rules for interrogations, and that they be made public. Congress could build on this foundation if it stipulated by law that the Geneva Conventions' Common Article 3 be applied to all U.S. detention operations -- of both the military and the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0035405

Once abuse is entirely banned, there is no reason for the United States not to return to full observance of the Geneva Conventions, and there are many benefits in doing so. Following the Geneva Conventions does not necessarily mean granting prisoner-of-war status, and the many privileges that come with it, to all detainees; al-Qaeda fighters and other terrorists might legally be excluded from POW status following a tribunal hearing. But returning to Geneva could improve the chances that its provisions against inhumane treatment will be respected by other countries, including those that capture American servicemen.

The Convention Against Torture has been ratified by the Senate and should also bind the United States. In a report last month, the U.N. Committee Against Torture, which oversees the convention, spelled out what that would mean. Secret detention of prisoners in CIA facilities, it said, "constitutes, per se, a violation of the Convention"; so does the "rendition" of suspects to other countries where they might be tortured "without any judicial procedure." To come into compliance, the United States must disclose to the International Committee of the Red Cross the identities of all detainees it is holding and allow monitoring of their treatment. It must also give them access to a judicial process or release them as soon as possible.

All of this the United States should in any case want to do, in its own interest. It should establish one set of rules for questioning all prisoners. Those rules should conform with international treaties and the U.S. Constitution, so that inhumane treatment is at all times forbidden. And the rules should be public, so that the world can see that the United States has returned to its fundamental values.

This is the third in a series of editorials about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. The full series will be available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

The ACLU's Tortured Logic On Gitmo (LAT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

THE "GOTCHA" crowd has fallen on its face again.

In an effort to show that on the Bush administration's evil watch the U.S. military has been systematically mistreating prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan with tacit approval or even outright encouragement from its civilian superiors, the American Civil Liberties Union has been demanding the release of dozens of internal military investigative reports. But the two reports on U.S. detainee policy just released in response to an ACLU lawsuit paint a picture quite the opposite of what the ACLU expected.

Though heavily redacted to remove operational details, the reports (by Brig. Gens. Richard Formica and Charles Jacoby) show a Pentagon open to criticism and change, and determined to guarantee detainees the humane treatment promised by President Bush when the war on terror began.

Genuine instances of abuse are noted, but these are very much the exception and not the rule. The reports indicate that many allegations of abuse simply are unsubstantiated — or that the "victim's" story changes once carefully examined. The most serious criticism is that the administration's detainee policies were not adequately communicated down the chain of command, resulting in confusion on the ground about what treatment was permissible. In addition, there was a lack of training on detainee handling. These points have been corrected.

Predictably, the ACLU has cried "whitewash." But what we are seeing is the refusal by administration critics to see anything other than the "torture narrative" they have constructed.

That "narrative" goes like this: Bush and his war Cabinet opened the door to detainee abuse, first by refusing to accord captured Al Qaeda and Taliban members Geneva Convention rights, and second, by permitting the use of aggressive interrogation techniques. Therefore, says the human rights crowd, Bush and other senior officials are morally — and some say legally — responsible for all of the abuses that have taken place since Sept. 11, 2001. Although this story has become holy writ in liberal circles, it is legally preposterous and logically flawed.

As a matter of law, guilt for war crimes can be imposed up the chain of command only when superiors have ordered the offending conduct or have failed to take appropriate disciplinary measures once they become aware that abusive conduct is taking place. But as these reports demonstrate, allegations of wrongdoing by U.S. forces have been thoroughly investigated and punished when called for. There simply is no rule of "strict liability" that would support the punishment of either military or civilian superior officers or officials without evidence that they ordered or condoned abuses.

The narrative is also flawed because Bush has from the beginning made clear that all individuals captured in the war on terror must be treated humanely. This is the case regardless of their legal status or where they were captured. To the extent that abuses have taken place, there is no reason to believe that granting the detainees prisoner-of-war status would have made a difference. The abuse of inmates at Abu Ghraib occurred because the prison was dysfunctional, not because the inmates were denied classification as POWs.

The same is true with respect to interrogation methods — clearly the most controversial aspect of the administration's detainee policy. None of the methods authorized by administration officials over time — including standing for long periods, dietary manipulation and sleep interruption — are inherently torture or inhumane treatment. All could, if taken to a sufficient extreme, cross the line. The only way to guarantee that the line is never crossed would be to eschew any method of interrogation that could, in the wrong hands, be taken too far.

However, the only way to protect civilians against a terrorist attack is to obtain intelligence about the enemy's capabilities and plans, so that U.S. forces can act first. Although many experts believe that noncoercive interrogation methods do work (and that harsher methods do not), these experts tend to be vague when it comes to timelines — and it's the timing that matters. This is why U.S. officials turned to stressful interrogation methods in the first place.

To avoid future excesses, the Pentagon has considered scores of recommendations, and most of them have been implemented. All of this compares favorably with actions taken in past conflicts. Americans can justly take pride in their fighting men and women and in the Pentagon's civilian leadership. If the ACLU was hoping to prove otherwise, it failed.

David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey are partners in a Washington law firm and served in the Justice Department under presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Closing Time At Guantanamo (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

We'd better not turn away just yet from the suicides of those three detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The rest of the world clearly isn't ready to move on. And with good reason.

In many newspapers around the globe "Guantanamo" is much more than the name of a beautiful harbor on Cuba's southern coast. It has become shorthand for a whole litany of American excesses in George W. Bush's "global war on terror," the most visible example of how the United States blithely ignores the values of due process and rule of law that it so aggressively preaches, if necessary at the point of a gun.

U.S. officials have portrayed the three men -- Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen, and Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi al-Utaybi and Yasser Talal al-Zahrani of Saudi Arabia -- as irredeemable jihadists whose deaths were an act of war. Ahmed was allegedly a "mid- to high-level al-Qaeda operative," Utaybi a "militant" recruiter for jihad, Zahrani a "front-line" warrior for the Taliban. One State Department official called their deaths by hanging "a good P.R. move," and while those words were quickly disavowed by higher-ups, the general reaction from the U.S. government has been something pretty close to "good riddance."

For all we know, these men might have been the evil miscreants our government says they were. Since our government wouldn't describe whatever evidence it claimed to have against them, it's impossible to tell. I think any reasonable observer would conclude it's also quite possible that these men were clinically depressed after being held for years in steel-mesh cells without legal recourse, without even formal charges, and that they simply sought the only kind of release they could possibly achieve. At least one of them, Ahmed, had been on a hunger strike for most of this year, which would have meant that guards regularly force-fed him through tubes stuck down his nose. What would that do to your state of mind?

The point here isn't to go all bleeding-heart over three men who may well have been the type who gleefully slaughter innocents in the name of a warped religiousness. The point is that when our government mocks transparency and tries to conduct this war of ideas in the shadows, away from prying eyes, we defeat ourselves.

Four journalists -- from the Charlotte Observer, the Miami Herald and the Los Angeles Times -- who happened to be at Guantanamo on other business and whose reporting could have independently confirmed the Pentagon's version of the suicides were unceremoniously put on a plane home last Wednesday. The Pentagon's rationale -- that it was unfair to allow the reporters to stay, because others who wanted to come and cover the story were being turned away -- is one of those masterpieces of faux logic for which Donald Rumsfeld is justly famous. Wouldn't the solution be to let other journalists in, rather than kick those four out?

How silly of me. The White House and the Pentagon have fought tooth and nail to keep the prison camp at Guantanamo cloaked in deepest obscurity. They didn't want to tell us who was being held there. They still give us only the sketchiest information about why individuals are being detained. They just say, basically, "these are bad people," and don't give us the information that would back up that judgment.

The administration doesn't want to call the detainees prisoners of war, because that would accord them some rights under international law, and it doesn't want to treat them as criminal suspects since that would give them rights under U.S. law. So they remain "enemy combatants" for whom the rules seem to be whatever we decide at any given time.

The president's lament that he can't find countries that will take some of the Guantanamo detainees is, frankly, lame. It may well be true that some of these people are hard to get rid of. But any way you look at it, arbitrary, indefinite detention without formal legal charges is an abandonment of the very ideals this country is supposedly fighting to spread throughout the world.

DOJ_NMG_0035407

We're long past the point where the U.S. government's clear obligation is to give the detainees a proper day in court, with effective legal representation and access to the evidence against them.

And we're long past the point where the government needs to show the world what's happening at Guantanamo. Instead of hurrying to expel reporters, the Pentagon should invite one and all to witness the orderly, legal process of emptying and shutting down a prison that is doing this nation much more harm than good.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Arab-Americans Sue U.S. Over Re-entry Procedures (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

A group of Muslim and Arab-Americans, frustrated by what they say is the climate of suspicion and fear that dogs their re-entry into the United States from trips abroad, sued the Department of Homeland Security and the F.B.I. yesterday, demanding that the courts protect their civil rights.

The seven main plaintiffs in the class action suit assert that both the United States Congress and the federal government are ignoring the plight of innocent Americans harassed repeatedly because of problems with the terrorist watch list.

The lawsuit, filed in Federal District Court in Chicago by the American Civil Liberties Union, contends that the courts alone can ensure that antiterrorism policies do not repeatedly subject ordinary Americans to detention, questioning, fingerprinting and the like.

"These are law-abiding citizens, and it is too extreme, too offensive," said Harvey Grossman, the legal director for the A.C.L.U.'s Illinois branch, saying that repeated complaints to Homeland Security as well as senators or congressmen barely get a response. "The court is the only forum where these people have a chance to get a hearing."

The lawsuit asserts that repeated border detentions and improper actions of border guards violate the plaintiffs' constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure and their right to travel.

Civil rights lawyers and government officials note that the courts have often struck down efforts to limit the scope of searches or questioning by border agents. But at least one other suit, a New York case involving five Muslim Americans who were detained without explanation after returning from a religious conference in Toronto, is proceeding.

"We will not let anybody into the country until we are sure they are not going to do harm to our citizens and violate our laws; it is that simple," said Bill Anthony, the senior public affairs spokesman for United States Customs and Border Protection. He said Congress had given the agency broad authority to conduct border searches. Mr. Grossman said most case law on border searches hinged on criminal suspects, with extended detention and searches deemed reasonable to catch drug smugglers. His plaintiffs are not outlaws and are always re-admitted eventually — the government could question them at home if needed, he said.

He noted that Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, testifying May 2 before the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not guarantee that inaccuracies on the terrorist watch list would be corrected within the next five years.

The watch list, maintained since 2003 by the Terrorist Screening Center of the F.B.I., had more than 237,000 names in 2005, according to a Homeland Security report. Some 12 agencies can add names, and only the originating agency can remove a name.

Donna A. Bucella, the center's director, said that matches were made every day from the list and that it was an important tool for local law enforcement agencies. "Obviously there have been a lot of people complaining about it, so there must be ways the U.S. government could refine it and make it better," Ms. Bucella said.

The Illinois lawsuit, expanding on one first filed a year ago, focuses on two main issues. First, those whose names resemble ones on the watch list and who find it virtually impossible to get off the list.

A June 2005 government review found that 42 percent of the calls to the screening center from December 2003 to January 2005 showed that the wrong person was being detained. Second, some people on the list are wrongly categorized as dangerous, resulting in agitated, armed border agents swarming them, the suit claims.

The customs agency says the number of passengers detained for additional checks is relatively small — roughly 2 percent.

The men suing compare their brusque treatment to that in a totalitarian state.

Niaz Anwar, 55, who fled Afghanistan 11 days after the Soviets occupied the country in 1978 and eventually settled near Boston, said he has been detained nine times since April 2004. In April at the Peace Bridge in Buffalo, he said, a border agent asked him his opinion about the Iraqi war and his party affiliation.

DOJ_NMG_0035408

"I was thinking that I was in Moscow during Brezhnev's time," Mr. Anwar said.

Mr. Anthony denied that any such questions could have been asked, saying any officer who did risked termination.

Dr. Elie Ramzy Khoury, a 68-year-old Christian who immigrated from Jerusalem in 1963 and has been an American since 1974, said he had been stopped seven times since May 2002 and now avoided even family funerals abroad because he so dreaded the return. When he complained to Homeland Security, he received a letter back two years later explaining how he could board domestic flights, which is not the issue.

"They never tell me what they are looking for nor what they want," Dr. Khoury said. "I've never done anything unlawful or irregular. I'm a practicing physician and I've been criminalized."

Critics believe the government has not recovered from the shock that the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks were moving about freely and has constructed a big, ineffective sieve to try to avoid a repeat.

But the erroneous detentions show intelligence gathering remains poor, Mr. Grossman said. "It is this endless collection of information without any kind of focus, and they allow it to go on and on and on."

Lawsuit Filed Over Screening Of Airline Passengers (AP)

By Jeff Coen

AP, June 20, 2006

CHICAGO - The American Civil Liberties Union has taken legal action on behalf of nine citizens who contend they have been unfairly detained, searched and harassed as they return to the country from trips abroad.

Travelers - mostly those of Middle Eastern and South Asian descent - can often find themselves unnecessarily caught up in security, the ACLU argues.

"We've been receiving complaints from all over the country," said Harvey Grossman of the ACLU of Illinois. "It's apparent that the judiciary needs to review what's going on."

The plaintiffs contend that since the terrorist attacks of 2001, innocent civilians have been routinely harassed by federal officials during security questioning. They are calling for changes in policy at the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center and at U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

"We've taken a lot of time to bring together a broad array of plaintiffs from all over the country who have been stopped at every major airport and border crossing," Grossman said. "They are doctors, a pharmacist, businessmen."

The plaintiffs allege their civil rights have been violated through what they call "highly punitive detentions" and harassment.

"These recurring, unconscionable, and unconstitutional border detentions include unjustified body searches, handcuffing, seizure of personal and business records, the use of handguns as a display of force" and other measures, the suit says. Sometimes, the treatment is embarrassing, and sometimes it's terrifying, according to the document.

The treatment stems from the inclusion of some U.S. citizens in the Terrorist Screening Database, according to the document. Bill Carter, a spokesman for the FBI in Washington, said there would be no comment because of the pending litigation.

According to the ACLU complaint, many citizens are put on the terror-watch database without any explanation, with some inexplicably being listed as armed and dangerous. Others are misidentified because their names are similar to those on the list.

The filing amends a complaint filed last year in Chicago by the ACLU on behalf of Akif Rahman, 34, of Wheaton, Ill. Rahman contended he was stopped by border guards in Detroit after a trip to Canada in May 2005, handcuffed to a chair and questioned for hours while his family waited.

Joining the complaint Monday were Niaz Anwar of the Boston area; Khalid Bhatti, a New York physician; Shimrote Ishaque, a Seattle pharmacist; Elie Khoury, a Detroit physician; Sammy Rehman, a Chicago-area radiologist; and Oussama Jammal, a video producer also from the Chicago suburbs.

Jammal and Anwar each have been detained nine or more times in recent years, the complaint says, causing them to miss flights and meetings during lengthy screenings.

The ACLU contends the alleged conduct not only violates the civil rights of the defendants, it keeps agents from spending time on actual threats.

"We're not only causing harm in mistreating citizens because of flaws in the system, we're wasting resources," Grossman said.

Terrorist Screening Database Lawsuit (WXYZ-TV)

By Peggy Agar

WXYZ-TV, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035409

A local doctor, along with 9 others, is suing the government claiming he can't leave town without a huge hassle because his name keeps showing up on a terrorist screening list.

Dr. Elie Khoury has been delivering babies in Detroit for 43 years. He was born in Palestine and said he's treated like a terrorist even though he's an American citizen.

Seven times in the past three years when returning from vacations in Mexico and Australia, he and his wife have been detained and separated from each other and their children.

"They come and take us away, causing lots of embarrassment for us and the children start to cry. They search our bags, once, twice, x-ray it. Between two to three hours every time," said Dr. Khoury.

He and the others bringing the lawsuit against Homeland Security, the FBI, Immigration and Customs said they are detained and questioned for hours. Agents take their books and even watch them go to the bathroom.

"Somebody my age, I have been here 40-some years, I never had any violation of anything except a couple traffic tickets," said Dr. Khoury.

The ACLU said the government's terrorist screening database of 200,000 mistakenly singles out good, law abiding families for unfair searches.

Michael Steinberg, ACLU, said, "It could be a matter of misidentification. They have a name that is similar to someone who, in fact, may be dangerous."

The ACLU said this is also occurring at border crossings like the Ambassador Bridge. They are suing the government in hopes they'll take a closer look at their list and change their policy.

For A Change, A Back Slap At The Airport For The Mayor (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

What a difference a victory makes.

For the last few years, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg has studiously avoided public appearances with President Bush, even managing to stay out of the same picture frame for most of the 2004 Republican National Convention. As a result, Mr. Bloomberg, a Republican, made it harder for his would-be Democratic rivals to link him to an administration unpopular with many New Yorkers.

But yesterday Mr. Bloomberg, now safely ensconced in his second and final term, went to Kennedy International Airport to greet Mr. Bush when he flew in to deliver the commencement address at the Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, on Long Island. In an unusually close encounter, the two men shook hands beside Air Force One, with Mr. Bush slapping Mr. Bloomberg on the back and then later putting both hands on Mr. Bloomberg's shoulders to whisper in his ear.

The trip took no small effort and meant adding a helicopter trip to the schedule so Mr. Bloomberg could be back at City Hall, albeit late, for a bill signing scheduled for 9 a.m. Speaking to reporters later, Mr. Bloomberg, who countered Mr. Bush's Republican red tie with one in Democrat blue, said he went to give a boost to the president, whose approval ratings have been sagging.

"You know, he's going through a rough period," Mr. Bloomberg said, and then added, not quite finishing his sentence, that it was "a nice time" to make such a gesture. In addition, Mr. Bloomberg said, it gave him another opportunity to lobby for more federal Homeland Security financing, since the city's share was cut by 40 percent.

Their two brief chitchats — as the mayor characterized them — lasted just under a minute for the first and less than half that for the second. During the encounter, Mr. Bloomberg gestured forcefully and at one point reached up to clasp the president's hand as it rested on his shoulder. He told reporters that he had welcomed Mr. Bush to New York, took credit for the weather and said "how nice it was of him to come."

He added: "I did thank him for his efforts to make all Homeland Security moneys be distributed based on risk." At the same time, though, he said he expressed disappointment that the total for Homeland Security programs had shrunk.

He said he told Mr. Bush that the recent reports that in 2003 the authorities were concerned that Al Qaeda planned a chemical attack on the subways showed that New York's share should be larger.

"This goes to show why we deserve to get a larger amount of the Homeland Security budget," he continued in describing his conversation. "If those moneys were distributed totally based on risk, I think that would happen."

Whether the seemingly amiable meeting is the start of a new chapter in their relationship remains to be seen. Mr. Bloomberg, who has been listing to the political left in recent months, made sure to say that he does not agree with everything the president does.

"There's no question that I disagree with this administration on a lot of things," he said. "I've never been reticent to say that, but I still respect the government and I think all New Yorkers do."

Bloomberg, Often Critical Of Bush, Goes Out Of Way To Greet Him (WNBC-TV.com)

WNBC-TV.com, June 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- The handshake and chat between President Bush and Mayor Michael Bloomberg on an airport tarmac Monday might have looked like any other chummy moment between two elected officials, but it was far from ordinary.

It was a surprise move for the Republican mayor, who has been delivering an unrelenting series of attacks on the federal government -- often aimed at the Bush administration and national Republicans. Bloomberg also spent much of his first term skipping public appearances with the president.

Now six months into his second term, Bloomberg has grown increasingly confident to do as he pleases, and say when he disagrees with anyone. The billionaire former Democrat -- sometimes described as fiscally conservative and socially liberal -- has issue-hopped from abortion rights to gun control to scientific research, taking shots at the Bush administration and national Republicans, and occasionally Democrats for good measure.

He has accused the federal government of being "asleep at the wheel" on dealing with illegal gun trafficking, and said some conservatives "simply disregard facts that don't happen to agree with their agenda" on evolution and global warming.

But in the shadow of Air Force One on Monday, the mayor looked downright affectionate with the president as they greeted each other, gripping hands one or two beats longer than a typical handshake. Bloomberg then began yakking away, gesturing animatedly before Bush grabbed his shoulder like an old fraternity buddy.

Bush moved on to speak with someone else, but returned to Bloomberg to pose for more photos. As the president turned to leave, he stopped and leaned in from the side, squeezing Bloomberg's shoulders with both hands. Bush was on his way to speak at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy on Long Island.

Bloomberg later said he went to welcome Bush at Kennedy Airport for several reasons -- including that the president is "going through a rough period" and might appreciate the gesture.

"It's a nice thing to do," Bloomberg said. "There's no question that I disagree with this administration on a lot of things -- I've never been reticent to say that -- but I still respect the government and I think all New Yorkers do and we will always be civil."

Bloomberg said they exchanged pleasantries and that he also thanked Bush for supporting the idea of distributing Homeland Security funds based on threat.

Long Island Republican Rep. Peter King flew to New York with the president aboard Air Force One and said they also discussed homeland security, particularly the city's hard feelings over a recent 40 percent cut in grants.

King said the president told him Bloomberg has "done a great job as mayor," and that he understood lawmakers' concerns about the slashed funding.

Bush and Bloomberg's time together lasted less than two minutes, but was also significant because the mayor mostly avoided such public opportunities throughout his first term.

The two Republicans have met several times but were rarely photographed together -- perhaps because the mayor's advisers had an eye on his upcoming re-election race in 2005. Bush has never been popular in this overwhelmingly Democratic town, and Bloomberg's opponents were salivating over every chance to link him to the national GOP.

When Republicans held their presidential convention here in 2004, Bloomberg steered clear of public events with the president and spent time playing host at parties for gay Republicans and abortion rights supporters.

Weeks later, he did not attend a Bush fundraiser in Manhattan because of what he said were scheduling conflicts. Explaining his dodges that fall, Bloomberg told reporters that he was busy being mayor.

"I can't be at every place the president goes," he said.

But now, with re-election safely behind him, Bloomberg was happy to make time for Bush, in full view of the cameras. Aides said Bloomberg's staff rescheduled a ribbon-cutting event at a cheesecake restaurant in Times Square for later in the day to accommodate the event, and that he flew back to City Hall in a helicopter to make it to a bill-signing ceremony.

"You can't go every time the president comes to the city, and then rush out there," the mayor said. "I have a job to do as well."

U.S. To Buy Anthrax Treatment From HGS (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Human Genome Sciences Inc. is scheduled to announce today that the federal government has agreed to buy $165 million worth of an experimental treatment for anthrax infection in what will become the 14-year-old Rockville firm's first product sale.

DOJ_NMG_0035411

The purchase of 20,000 doses of Abthrax under the government's $5.6 billion Project BioShield program is intended to help the government stockpile a variety of anthrax therapies, including vaccines and drugs such as Abthrax, which would typically be given after exposure to the lethal substance.

The government, which could have purchased 100,000 doses under the BioShield contract, has also been considering another anthrax treatment from Cangene Corp., a Canadian biotech company. For now, federal health officials appear to have settled on Abthrax. Cangene is not expected to be awarded a contract today, according to people briefed on the deal.

HGS must still win approval from the Food and Drug Administration, but Abthrax could be used before that in case of an emergency. The drug was shown to be safe in testing of 105 people, but testing of several hundred more will be required. How much that testing will eat into revenue from the contract is unclear.

Biodefense is a tricky business strategy for biotech firms, particularly because there is no guarantee that such products will be used. While other smaller, early-stage companies are trying to build a business around biodefense, HGS is banking on a series of drugs for lupus, arthritis, hepatitis and cancer, with Abthrax as a bonus.

"The other drugs HGS has in development are more important to the company's story," than Abthrax, said Edward Tenthoff, an analyst with Piper Jaffray. He called the product a "wild card" in the company's pipeline and had not factored it in to his future revenue projections.

HGS executives say the Abthrax deal is important to the firm, as it attempts to transform itself from drug developer to drug seller. Toward that end, the additional revenue, to be paid after the product is delivered and approved in 2008, represents a source of cash to spend on the other products.

"This is another in a series of steps in moving HGS from primarily a discovery company into a commercial company," H. Thomas Watkins, the company's chief executive, said in an interview.

HGS recently signed a partnership deal with Swiss drug giant Novartis AG to finish developing and eventually co-market a new HGS treatment for hepatitis C. The deal could net HGS more than $500 million.

The company also recently completed spinning off its early-stage development operation to narrow its focus and spending on late-stage products. On Thursday, HGS plans to disclose data from key human tests on Lymphostat-B, its potential breakthrough treatment for lupus.

Though the government agreed to purchase 10 grams of Abthrax last year for testing, HGS had largely shelved development activity for the product as it awaited an answer from the government. Watkins said that because the company had no idea whether it would win the contract, HGS scientists worked on Abthrax -- testing it for safety in 105 people -- just enough to provide the government with preliminary data to make a decision.

Products such as Abthrax are part of a three-pronged defense against anthrax attacks. Vaccines can prevent infection, but they typically take several weeks and doses to build up immunity. Antibiotics can kill the anthrax bacteria but aren't effective against toxins released in the body by an anthrax infection. Abthrax prevents those toxins from entering and killing cells.

The government has said it has stockpiled enough antibiotics to treat 40 million people. It has awarded nearly $1 billion to VaxGen Inc., a California company, to deliver 75 million anthrax vaccine doses to protect 25 million people, but the company appears to be least two to three years behind schedule.

Privacy Matters (WT)

By John W. Kropf

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Even if you've never physically set foot outside the United States, your personal information has traveled the globe. Credit card transactions, calls to customer service centers, credit checks and the transcription of medical records are frequently out-sourced to far-flung locations. Personal information knows no national boundary and is no longer attached to any single physical location. Your personal information is now a global business.

Why should the average citizen care? There are at least a few reasons. What are the rules in other countries on how personal information is used, shared and protected? Is it shared with other commercial or government entities such as the police or the intelligence communities?

There is also the fallibility factor: Humans and machines are not perfect. In the last several years there has been a steady stream of headlines reporting lost or stolen personal information on millions of Americans that was maintained by companies such as ChoicePoint and Bank of America as well as U.S. government agencies.

So how can individuals expect their governments to protect their personal information in a globalized world, where personal information has become a major form of currency for both private industry and government? This is the starting point of Colin J. Bennett and Charles D. Raab's book, "The Governance of Privacy."

DOJ_NMG_0035412

Mr. Bennett, a professor at the University of Victoria in Canada, and Mr. Raab, a professor at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland, are both highly regarded authorities in the specialized world of international privacy. The authors' extensive knowledge is evident throughout the book, which offers a useful and wide range of legal, policy and scholarly references.

"The Governance of Privacy" is a well-organized and comprehensive three-part look at the world of global privacy. The first section defines the goals of privacy protection, the second examines the global frameworks that exist to protect it and the third analyzes the effectiveness of those instruments.

Section one broadly identifies the goals of privacy as equity, reduction of risk and trust. Equity may be the most abstract and elusive of the three.

Section two is particularly important because it provides an extensive and complex inventory and analysis of existing global privacy instruments. Privacy laws based on traditional notions of sovereignty and jurisdiction have become obsolete because of the global acceleration of complex technology.

Unlike the law, policy instruments can be quickly developed and implemented to fill the void, and are often better suited to the international arena. Consequently, international privacy frameworks are now composed more of policy than of law.

Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab start at the top of the global hierarchy by examining the transnational privacy policies of international bodies such as the OECD and APEC, as well as the law of the European Union's 1995 Data Directive. Following this examination is a treatment of the national laws, regulations, principles, and data protection authorities who oversee the enforcement of the privacy systems in many countries.

The authors also devote a chapter to an analysis of self-regulatory instruments -- a favored option in the United States -- composed of commitments, codes, standards and seals. Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab incisively recognize that technology itself acts as a policy instrument that can be used to enhance or erode privacy depending on how systems are designed and built.

Section three culminates with an analysis of whether the collection of global frameworks introduced in section two are effectively protecting and promoting privacy. While Mr. Bennett and Mr. Raab note the difficulty in measuring the impact of any one framework, they suggest several broad scenarios for the future. In the world of competing privacy frameworks, are we in a race to the top of improved privacy standards, to the bottom of reduced privacy standards, or somewhere else?

The authors' conclusion holds that privacy standards are not monolithic, singularly regressing or progressing. Privacy is too multi-faceted for any simplistic conclusion. Because privacy concerns touch upon many fronts, the authors predict many races to the top and many races to the bottom.

This book is not a basic introduction to privacy for those interested in learning about the area. Rather, "The Governance of Privacy" may be better suited to those with an existing foundation in privacy. For those policy makers, practitioners and academics in the privacy sector, however, this is a must read.

John W. Kropf works for the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office. The views expressed here are his and not those of the Department of Homeland Security or the government.

The Golden Revolving Door (NYT)

The New York Times (opinion), June 20, 2006

It has been just over four years since the Department of Homeland Security was created, and it has hardly covered itself with glory. Katrina was a disaster of a disaster; ports are still far from secure, and chemical plants remain a huge target of opportunity for evildoers. But there's one area in which Homeland Security has excelled beyond anyone's wildest expectations: creating a giant, expensive crop of government-trained consultants and lobbyists.

As Eric Lipton reported in The Times this week, at least 90 top Homeland Security officials have gone through that famous revolving door between the government and the lobbying industry. That's more than two-thirds of the most senior executives from the department's infancy. It is hard to believe that the people running an agency that performs so badly could be so much in demand.

What they have, of course, are contacts on the inside. The domestic security industry has become an enormous money pot, and the ability to set up a meeting with a former Homeland Security colleague is invaluable. Former Secretary Tom Ridge, whose best-known contributions to homeland security were the color-coded alerts that always seemed to be most alarming just around election time, benefited from a quick appointment to the board of a company that worked with the department while he was boss. The move came complete with stock options that should become very valuable, now that the company is being bought by Lockheed Martin. Three of his five under secretaries have also joined the commercial domestic security game. Even Michael Brown of FEMA fame has started a consulting firm.

If homeland security is the central concern of the Bush administration, one wonders how it managed to create a department in which so many of the top brass were so eager to quit the crusade so soon and cash in so efficiently. But the worst effect of this kind of take-the-money-and-run mentality is on the people left behind. How many of them, having watched others land lucrative jobs as lobbyists, will temper their own judgments about what systems to buy and what consultants to use with an eye on their own private-sector prospects?

DOJ_NMG_0035413

To stop this kind of destructive back-scratching, Congress passed a law in 1962 that required former officials to wait a year before lobbying former colleagues. But officials in Homeland Security managed to get a loophole through the Office of Government Ethics in 2004. It divided the department into seven areas, and allowed former employees to lobby all but the one where they worked.

That ruling should be revisited immediately. In the meantime, let's hope Homeland Security hasn't left the airport screening process as ridden with holes as its own ethics rules are.

Help En Route For New Orleans Police (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, June 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The governor of Louisiana plans to send hundreds of state police and National Guardsmen into the city's hurricane-ravaged areas to help local police halt a surge of violence that killed six people over the weekend.

“Things like this should never happen, and I am going to do all I can to stop it,” Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said.

Blanco's spokeswoman, Denise Bottcher, told the Associated Press on Monday night that 100 National Guard members with law enforcement experience and 60 state police officers were to be sent to the city today. Up to 200 more troops will be sent later, Bottcher said.

Mayor Ray Nagin requested the extra help Monday. “We are basically saying we've had enough,” Nagin said. “We've seen too many of our young people go down to violence.”

The state police and troops would patrol the near-vacant neighborhoods badly flooded after Hurricane Katrina hit on Aug. 29, overwhelming the levees and inundating 80% of the city. That would free up city police officers to cover the more densely populated areas, said Nagin, who vowed that residents soon will see “police on almost every corner.”

The weekend death toll included five teens, ages 16 to 19, shot to death in a sport-utility vehicle Saturday. That was followed by the Sunday murder of a 66-year-old man who was stabbed in an argument over beer, police said. Both incidents occurred in areas that saw little or no flooding. The teens died in a neighborhood long plagued with drug-related crime. There have been no arrests.

Police said 53 people have been killed this year in New Orleans. The population of the city is about 200,000, down from more than 450,000 before Katrina. The city's per-capita murder rate has ranked among the nation's highest; in 2004, the city's rate of 56 murders per 100,000 residents ranked it No. 2 in the USA, after Camden, N.J. New Orleans is on roughly the same pace this year.

Last fall, to control the chaos after Katrina, federal troops and officers from police departments nationwide converged on New Orleans. Humvees patrolled city streets and extra teams of law enforcement officers kept New Orleans murder-free for months.

In January, as residents began returning in greater numbers and outside law enforcement left town, violence escalated, and it seems to be worsening. There have been 36 murders since April.

“We're not going to allow hurricane crime to replace Hurricane Katrina,” City Council President Oliver Thomas said Monday. “If we don't have wind knocking us down, we have … murderers shooting us down, and that is unacceptable.”

Troops To Return To New Orleans (LAT)

By Richard Fausset And Ann Simmons, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

After a weekend of killings, Louisiana's governor agrees to send the National Guard to help cope with rising crime in an uneasy city.

NEW ORLEANS — Nearly 10 months after Hurricane Katrina, National Guard troops are returning to New Orleans to keep the peace in a city growing increasingly uneasy over its rising tide of crime.

After six deaths over the weekend — including those of five teenagers in one shooting incident — Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco at a news conference Monday to send a contingent of National Guard troops and state troopers.

Blanco agreed to send the reinforcements, with the first 100 of 300 promised troops arriving in the city today. Sixty state troopers also will be deployed.

"The senseless slaying of five teenagers this weekend is shocking," Blanco said in a prepared statement. "I will not tolerate criminal behavior. We must protect our citizens."

DOJ_NMG_0035414

The five young men were shot Saturday in an SUV in the historically tough Central City area. Police have speculated that the killings may have been drug-related. No suspects have been arrested.

The next night, a man was stabbed to death during an argument over beer. Nagin called the bloody weekend "our line in the sand."

Federal troops were a common sight in New Orleans after Katrina. At one point, as many as 15,000 patrolled the city to curb its descent into chaos and looting. The last of the troops left in February as the city — and the New Orleans Police Department — got back on its feet.

For some locals, there was a hope that this strange, post-Katrina stub of a city — less populous but also less poor — would be reborn with less of the crime and violence that have marred New Orleans' reputation.

That hope emerged despite the performance of the New Orleans Police Department during Katrina, when some officers were accused of desertion and looting. The department was also criticized for failing to maintain order after the storm.

More recently, police have been struggling with some complicated new problems — and a few that are all too familiar. A criminal element has returned, bringing back turf wars, drugs and deaths. Police have recorded 53 homicides since January. That is half as many as during the same time last year — but the city's population is less than half its pre-Katrina level of 450,000.

The Police Department is down from a pre-Katrina strength of 1,700 officers to an effective force of about 1,370, said Lt. Michael Glasser, the police union president. They are working within a severely compromised justice system saddled with thousands of backlogged criminal trials, a dearth of jurors, and flood-damaged jails.

In addition, officers must deal with issues like house break-ins and squatting in vast and largely depopulated swaths of the city.

City officials said the Guard troops and state police will patrol the depopulated areas until September, freeing up local police to fight crime in more populous areas. The Guard troops will be armed and given police powers, said Blanco spokeswoman Denise Bottcher, who noted that Louisiana remains under a state of emergency.

Majeeda Snead, a clinical professor at Loyola Law School who defends indigent clients in criminal cases, said she thought that residents would welcome the Guard presence even though it might give the impression that the city was under martial law.

"I think that people are really afraid," said Snead, who moved near Loyola University after her home in the New Orleans East neighborhood was flooded.

"They are arming themselves. They feel threatened in their homes. They feel threatened in their cars," said Snead. "Based on that fear, they would not be opposed to a show of force, whether federal, state or local."

New Orleans City Councilwoman Shelley Midura, one of four new City Council members sworn in this month, said that all seven council members supported the call for Guard troops. Police Chief Warren Riley had been proposing a similar plan to state officials long before the weekend's slayings, according to a spokeswoman.

"We have unified leadership at all levels, and we're saying enough is enough," Midura said. The functioning parts of the city, she added, would not feel the military presence.

"I just would not be supporting this if we had the military on the streets of the French Quarter," she said.

It remains to be seen how the plan will play in the hardest-hit neighborhoods, where some residents are trying to rebuild.

Dent Hunter, 27, president of the Oak Island Neighborhood Assn. in devastated New Orleans East, suspected that the Guard would not provide the same level of service as the police.

He said residents were not being treated equally. "We want to be equal," he said. Hunter also said the troops' presence could dissuade other residents from returning.

Glasser, of the police union, said the move was a temporary fix at best, and many city officials agreed. City Council President Oliver M. Thomas Jr. said the city needed to tackle issues like its blighted public housing complexes, the public school system and police efficacy. Councilwoman Stacy S. Head said officials agreed a curfew for juveniles should be reinstated.

Crime Rising, New Orleans Asks For National Guard (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In a blunt admission that the city could no longer control its growing crime problem, Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked the state on Monday to send National Guard troops to help patrol the streets of New Orleans.

Hours later, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said 100 troops, joined by 60 state police, would be in place as early as Tuesday morning. More are likely to arrive later in the week.

DOJ_NMG_0035415

The mayor's plea for help came after five teenagers were shot to death with semiautomatic weapons in the Central City neighborhood while sitting in a sport-utility vehicle Saturday morning. It was the deadliest single shooting attack in the city in 11 years, raising to 53 the number of homicides this year.

In recent weeks, as crime increased and the Police Department struggled to return to its strength from before Hurricane Katrina, many politicians, editorialists and citizens have asked for outside help, a move Mayor Nagin appeared to acknowledge Monday was necessary as he asked for 300 Guard troops.

"We vow to do whatever it takes in the short and long term to make this a safer city," he said, adding at another point during the day, "This is our line in the sand."

The city's Police Department has seemed ineffective at curbing a rise in drug-related violence and looting — which is isolated, for the most part, to poor neighborhoods and sparsely populated areas — even though there are almost as many officers on the force now as there were before Hurricane Katrina, and the city's population of 220,000 is less than half its former size.

Still, the department has not bounced back from the storm. It has suffered sharp budget cuts, is low on supplies like ammunition and continues to wrestle with its tarnished reputation. The police lost control of the city when the levees broke after Hurricane Katrina, and while many officers managed to perform their duties under extraordinary circumstances, more than 200 simply walked away. Others were accused of participating in the mayhem.

Warren J. Riley, the police chief, said he requested additional law enforcement help months ago in anticipation of a summertime population increase, and said the announcement after a weekend of high crime was simply a coincidence.

Chief Riley insisted during a news conference that his force was capable of controlling crime, and that the request did not undermine him or the Police Department. But his inconsistent remarks during the day reflected the difficulty his department has had in recent months.

"With the appropriate resources we will have this city under control," he said, just moments after stating, "This is not a situation where anything is out of control."

The Guard will focus on patrolling the neighborhoods that were most damaged in the flood and that are still largely uninhabited, Chief Riley said. That move would free as many as 300 police officers, who had been patrolling for looters, to concentrate on crime in the heavily populated areas of the city.

He said there would be no National Guard presence in downtown New Orleans, the French Quarter or any other heavily populated area.

Residents in parts of the city with the heaviest damage, like Lakeview and New Orleans East, where the looting of flooded homes has been especially acute, have been asking city officials for more protection for months.

That desire has also been reflected by talk radio hosts and columnists in the local papers.

"Madame Governor, Mr. Mayor, esteemed Legislature and City Council: Get us some protection and get it now," wrote one of the city's most popular columnists, Chris Rose of The Times-Picayune, in a recent column. "Get us some security. Get us the National Guard."

Residents say they have found it difficult to rebuild because supplies and new appliances are stolen as quickly as they are delivered to unoccupied houses in largely vacant neighborhoods.

"It's past time for the Guard to be here," said Larry Dupont, an electrician who lived in Gentilly before the flood destroyed his neighborhood. "I'm fed up with all that New Orleans is not doing to help its people."

Still, others said they resented the militarization of the city, and did not have fond memories of the National Guard's time here immediately after the hurricane.

"When they were here before, it didn't exactly give me a sense of safety," said Kalli Forster, the manager of a boutique in the Uptown section. "It made me feel like I was in a war zone."

Others said the move had sent a frightening message.

"It's basically saying that the people in charge here aren't in control," said Dawn Larsen, a waitress in Uptown.

The five young men who were killed before dawn on Saturday were ages 16 to 19, and, said Chief Riley, three of the five had criminal backgrounds. The three were involved in a drive-by shooting in another part of the city on May 1, the chief said. They were charged with aggravated assault and the possession of a weapon, but the victim and witnesses refused to cooperate and press charges, so they were freed.

The teenagers were gunned down just outside the Central Business District, in an area well known locally as a haven for drug-related activity.

The police were looking for suspects Monday evening.

After Day Of Flooding, Houston Braces For One More (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0035416

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, June 20, 2006

Emergency crews told to rest as rains take brief respite

Houston residents were bracing for another round of torrential rain and flooding after a slow-moving storm dumped more than 10 inches Monday and sent rising waters into homes, business and vehicles.

"The ground is saturated and the bayous are full," Rusty Cornelius, Harris County Emergency Management coordinator, said as he lamented the forecast for still more rain early today.

"If we get 5 inches of rain, it's going to be a flood. Ten inches and it'll be a major flood."

Emergency crews had rescued about 300 people by midday Monday when waters began to recede, he said. Most were people trapped in automobiles that had been swept off highways by floodwaters.

The heavy rains fell along a 7- to 8-mile-wide path across the flat, low-lying city. Thunderstorms were moving slowly westward but had not yet left the Houston area.

At Rosie's Club, a bar on Telephone Road in the hard-hit southeastern part of the city, about 2½ feet of water sloshed through the front door, Charlie Esbamiloa said. Esbamiloa was helping to clean up and keep the bar open Monday evening as an occasional drizzle fell.

"Even when the hurricanes came through, we've never had it this bad before," he said. "It was just the amount of rain that fell so quickly."

National Guard troops, including some operating heavy equipment, were standing by to help with additional rescue and air search efforts if needed, Cornelius said.

He said the state had provided 25 large-wheeled vehicles capable of traversing high waters, along with two Blackhawk search-and-rescue helicopters and two more helicopters capable of lifting heavy equipment. As many as 200 Guard troops were made available to the city, Cornelius said. U.S. Coast Guard aircraft were also standing by, he said.

When waters began receding Monday afternoon, crews were ordered to rest and prepare to resume rescue efforts if the additional rains arrive as forecast.

Houston Mayor Bill White viewed the city by helicopter and described "block after block after block flooded."

The University of Houston canceled classes. City officials pleaded with residents not to drive in roadways covered with water.

The Port of Houston was continuing to operate. Hobby Airport in the city's southeast section was shut down for more than two hours. About 50 flights were canceled and others diverted to the city's other airport, Bush Intercontinental. Interstate 10 and other major arteries were flooded during the morning rush hour.

"The good news is we've had no deaths, no major injuries," Cornelius said.

The city's emergency management agency warned residents to prepare for more rain. The National Weather Service Weather said as much as 5 to 10 inches of additional rain could fall by this morning.

Heavy rains fell elsewhere in the Gulf Coast region. In Sulphur, La., 120 patients were evacuated from a nursing home that was flooded.

WAR NEWS:

Two Missing U.S. Soldiers Found Dead,Â Iraq Official Says (AP)

By Jonathan Finer

AP, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 20--The two U.S. soldiers missing since an attack on a checkpoint last week were found dead near a power plant in Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, according to an Iraqi defense official.

General Abdul Aziz Muhammed, head of operations at Iraqi Ministry of Defense said in a news conference in Baghdad this afternoon that the soldiers had been "barbarically" killed and that there were traces of torture on their bodies.

He offered no further details. U.S. officials could not immediately be reached for comment or confirmation.

The Army yesterday identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. They were attacked at a checkpoint near Yusufiyah. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed in the incident.

More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces had launched a massive search for the army privates. In a statement posted to the Internet yesterday, the insurgent group Al Qaeda in Iraq had claimed to have abducted the soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0035417

Group Says It Abducted Missing GIs; 3 Americans Charged In Iraqi Deaths (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 19 -- More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured villages south of Baghdad on Monday for two soldiers missing since an attack four days ago, as an insurgent group linked to al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed that it had abducted the Army privates.

The claim was made in an Internet posting by the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council and could not be verified. Maj. Todd Breasseale, a Marine spokesman in Baghdad, said that the soldiers' whereabouts remained unknown and that "there is no indication that any reports of a kidnapping are authentic."

The military identified the missing soldiers as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. They were attacked at a checkpoint near Yusufiyah, south of Baghdad. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed in the incident.

Also Monday, the U.S. military said it had charged three American soldiers in the deaths of three detainees May 9 near the Tharthar Canal north of Baghdad. Defense officials said the soldiers allegedly shot three unidentified men of "apparent Middle Eastern descent" shortly after they were taken into U.S. custody.

Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Spec. William B. Hunsaker and Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard -- all of the Army's C Company, 3rd Battalion, 187th Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 101st Airborne Division -- were charged Sunday with numerous offenses, including premeditated murder, attempted murder, conspiracy, communicating a threat and obstructing justice, according to charge sheets released Monday.

The two soldiers and one noncommissioned officer allegedly shot the men at or near the Muthana Chemical Complex, and a senior defense official said the soldiers claimed the men were attempting to flee their custody. The unit commander ordered an inquiry on the day of the deaths, military officials said in a statement released in Iraq. The soldiers are now confined pending a pre-trial hearing.

The soldiers allegedly threatened another soldier while the investigation was underway, each telling Pfc. Bradley L. Mason not to testify against them as a witness, according to the charge sheets. Each said they would kill Mason if he told anyone what happened, according to the charges.

The investigation into the incident is the latest probe involving claims of excessive force by U.S. troops in recent months, most notably the alleged killing of 24 civilians by Marines in Haditha last November.

In a separate case, Italian prosecutors on Monday requested the indictment of a U.S. soldier in the fatal shooting of an Italian intelligence agent in Baghdad in March 2005.

Meanwhile, the claim that two soldiers in Yusufiyah were abducted comes less than two weeks after the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, in a U.S. airstrike north of Baghdad. The organization has issued a series of Internet statements vowing revenge on U.S.-led forces.

Among the questions raised by the attack in Yusufiyah is how three U.S. soldiers became isolated from a larger force. U.S. soldiers generally travel in convoys of at least two Humvees carrying several soldiers, particularly in areas with a known insurgent presence.

While some news reports have suggested other vehicles and personnel were present during the attack, Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said there were no other U.S. troops present. "Our reporting indicates it was a three-man security team that was attacked," he said.

Troops involved in the hunt for Menchaca and Tucker have searched and cleared 12 villages, killing three insurgents and detaining 34 others, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, said in a statement. Special Operations forces are participating in the hunt, which is being led by the Army's 4th Infantry Division, based in Baghdad. Seven U.S. military personnel have been injured in the search effort.

Fighter jets, dive teams, unmanned drones and soldiers on the ground are involved in the search, Caldwell said. Pilots have flown 280 hours and launched eight air assaults to try to find the missing men, who are members of the 1st Battalion of the 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, Ky.

An Internet message purportedly posted under the name of the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council -- an umbrella organization of insurgent groups including al-Qaeda in Iraq -- claimed the group had apprehended the soldiers and mocked U.S. efforts to find them. It did not name the soldiers or provide any evidence it held them.

"The American army conducted raids campaign with various vehicles and armored vehicle near site of the incident," the statement said, promising more details in the coming days. "But the Army of 'the mightiest state in the world' went back defeated, dragging the robes of shame and disgrace behind it."

DOJ_NMG_0035418

In a second statement released Monday, the group claimed to be holding four Russian diplomats abducted in Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood in early June. Another Russian Embassy employee died in the attack. As conditions of the diplomats' release, the group demanded the withdrawal of Russian forces from Chechnya and the release of "our brothers and sisters in Russian prisons."

Witnesses at the scene of the attack in Yusufiyah told the Associated Press they saw two soldiers being directed into vehicles by several masked gunmen, and Iraq's foreign minister said in an interview on CNN that it appeared the soldiers had been kidnapped.

A source in the intelligence wing of Iraq's Interior Ministry, who spoke on the condition that he not be named, also said there was evidence the two men had been abducted, though he said that it was unclear who was responsible.

While cautious in their public remarks following Zarqawi's death, U.S. commanders expressed hope it would undermine the cohesion of the insurgency. Sunni Arab tribal leaders in the restive northern city of Kirkuk held a meeting late Sunday to declare their opposition to al-Qaeda in Iraq, whose attacks have killed at least 75 people there in recent weeks.

In Baghdad Monday, as a comprehensive security crackdown continued, police and soldiers conducting a raid on a suspected insurgent safe house in the southern neighborhood of Saydiyah killed 10 armed men and wounded three others, according to Maj. Gen. Mahmood Abdul Karim of Iraq's Interior Ministry.

A car bomb detonated near police patrolling an intersection north of downtown, killing five police officers and wounding two others. Five civilians were also wounded in the attack, Karim said.

Also Monday, insurgents shot dead four passengers driving in a vehicle in the southern neighborhood of Madain, police said.

US Very Worried About Missing Soldiers In Iraq: Rice (AFP)

AFP, June 20, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that the US government is very worried about two missing soldiers, whose kidnapping in Iraq has been claimed by an Al-Qaeda led group.

"This is obviously a matter of great concern to all of us," Rice said.

"And the American military has made very clear that they are going to do everything possible -- I think they've said air, land and sea -- to try and find them.

"And obviously their safe return is something that everyone will work for, and their safe return is something that everyone will pray for," Rice told reporters following a meeting with Spain's Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos.

The soldiers went missing after they came under attack at a traffic control point near the predominantly Sunni Arab town of Yusifiyah, south of Baghdad, on Friday. Another soldier died in the attack.

The US military named the missing soldiers as Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Thomas L. Tucker, 25.

A coalition of armed Sunni Arab factions led by Al-Qaeda's Iraq branch claimed responsibility for the abduction of the two soldiers in a statement posted on the Internet Monday.

Insurgents Claim To Hold GIs (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — An Internet posting Monday claimed that an Iraqi insurgent group had captured two U.S. soldiers who are listed as missing after an attack on their checkpoint last week.

More than 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are involved in a search for the soldiers, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a military spokesman, said in a statement. “We are using every means at our disposal,” he said.

An Internet statement attributed to the Mujahedin Shura Council said the soldiers had been captured. The message could not be authenticated. The council is an umbrella group of several Sunni insurgency groups, including al-Qaeda in Iraq.

The soldiers are officially listed as “duty status and whereabouts unknown.”

The missing soldiers are Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Spc. David Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., died in the checkpoint attack, Caldwell said.

All three were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment of 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault), based at Fort Campbell in Kentucky.

The soldiers were manning a checkpoint Friday near Youssifiyah, south of Baghdad, when their position came under attack.

Belinda Alcala, Menchaca's mother-in-law, described him as “a wonderful kid, a wonderful man.”

In a statement, Tucker's parents described their son as a dedicated soldier who enjoyed playing the piano.

DOJ_NMG_0035419

He enlisted because “he wanted to do something positive,” they said.

They also released a copy of a phone message that Tucker left for them in February and that is still on their answering machine. In it, he told his family that he loves them. “I'll be back before you know it,” he said.

He also asked his family to be proud of him. “Everything's going to be OK,” he said. “I love you guys, and I know you love me.”

The operation to find the soldiers involves helicopters, fighter jets, boats and unmanned Predator aircraft, Caldwell said.

Since launching the search, coalition forces have killed three suspected insurgents and detained 34, the military said. Seven coalition soldiers have been wounded.

Group Linked To Al Qaeda In Iraq Says It Kidnapped 2 U.S. Soldiers (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — A group affiliated with Al Qaeda in Iraq on Monday claimed without offering proof that it had kidnapped two American soldiers, as thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops looked for the missing men in an area known as "the triangle of death."

Seven U.S. troops were wounded during the massive search, according to the top military spokesman in Baghdad, though the cause of the injuries was not immediately announced.

The two soldiers disappeared Friday after gunmen attacked a checkpoint near Yousifiya, southwest of the capital. They were identified as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore.

A third soldier, identified as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed during the fight at the checkpoint. All three soldiers were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade of the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division.

"Words cannot express the sadness we feel at the loss of Spc. Babineau and the uncertainty the families of Pfc. Menchaca and Pfc. Tucker must be experiencing," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said in a statement. "Our deepest sympathy goes out to their families."

More than 8,000 American and Iraqi security personnel were looking for the missing soldiers. Three teams of divers searched the nearby Euphrates River. The military used planes, boats, helicopters and unmanned drones "to ensure the most thorough search possible on the ground, in the air and in the water," Caldwell said. "We are using every means at our disposal."

Security forces killed three suspected rebels and detained 34 others during the operation, in which troops surrounded and searched a dozen villages southwest of Baghdad.

The area around Yousifiya, which is dotted by farms, date palms and orange trees, is a rebel stronghold widely known as the "triangle of death." U.S. soldiers often come under attack in the town, and there is no functioning police force after insurgents twice bombed the police department. Residents say that slayings are commonplace and that many families have fled the area because of the violence.

Mayor Muayed Fadil, 50, said Iraqi soldiers provided some protection for government offices downtown but that rebels ran rampant on the outskirts of Yousifiya.

Checkpoints and American patrols do little to counter the violence, he said. Fearful residents have stopped talking to their neighbors and are instead hiding inside their houses.

"Life is limited in Yousifiya because of terrorism," Fadil said. "People are living in horror at night because of the terrorist cells."

Mujahedin Shura Council in Iraq, a group linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq, posted a statement on the Internet claiming responsibility for what it said was a kidnapping but offered no proof, such as pictures of the soldiers or their identification cards.

"The American Army, using different kinds of machines and armor, raided the area where the incident took place but the army of 'the world's strongest country' returned without success, humiliated," the statement said.

Another U.S. soldier has been long missing in Iraq. Sgt. Keith M. Maupin of Batavia, Ohio, was captured during an ambush in April 9, 2004. About three months later, a videotape was released of a man being shot in the back of the head and falling into a shallow grave, with a narrator saying the man was Maupin. But the victim's face was not shown.

While troops searched the rural area southwest of Baghdad on Monday, violence continued elsewhere despite a recent security crackdown.

A car bomb targeted an Iraqi army checkpoint in Baghdad, killing five and injuring nine others, according to authorities. Another car bomb targeted special police commandos in the southwestern part of the city, killing two officers and three civilians and injuring five other people. A third car bomb exploded minutes later in a market in a southern neighborhood, killing six civilians and injuring 20.

A roadside bomb southwest of the city of Hillah killed a civilian and injured as many as eight others, local police said.

DOJ_NMG_0035420

At a news conference, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani said the government was trying to improve safety measures in the capital. Thousands of security troops have flooded Baghdad and set up ubiquitous checkpoints, which many Iraqis say do little to improve security while trapping drivers in snarling traffic.

"We feel the suffering of the people, but I hope they will forgive us for the delay the plan is causing for them," Bolani said.

He added that the government had sent a delegation to solve troubles in the southern city of Basra, where rivalry among various Shiite Muslim groups had recently led to increased violence.

President Jalal Talabani and British Defense Secretary Des Browne also held a news conference, during which Browne talked of heightened security measures in the southern city. Britain has about 7,200 troops in Iraq based in and around Basra.

"We do not underestimate the challenge that we face together here," Browne said. "We'll stay here as long as there is a job to be done, and as long as the Iraqi government wants us to support them."

In the disputed northern city of Kirkuk, security forces flooded roads and set up a number of new checkpoints, local officials said. Iraqi police also distributed pictures of suspected insurgents believed to have ties to Al Qaeda in Iraq, promising a $2,500 reward for information leading to the arrest of any of five top rebels.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military continued a sweep in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, where hundreds of American and Iraqi troops moved into the eastern section of the violent city in search of guerrillas, the Associated Press reported from the scene. The operation is intended to install U.S. and Iraqi troops in an area where insurgents have frequently launched attacks.

Al Qaeda Ally Says It Holds Soldiers (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- An al Qaeda-linked group said yesterday that it had kidnapped two American soldiers who were reported missing south of Baghdad, where 8,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops were conducting a massive search.

Seven U.S. servicemen have been wounded during the search, said U.S. spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell. He said the military had killed three suspected insurgents and detained 34 others during the operation.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella group that includes al Qaeda in Iraq, said it was holding the two privates -- one from Texas and the other from Oregon -- as well as four Russian diplomats kidnapped June 3 in Baghdad. It also claimed to have killed a fifth Russian.

The message appeared on an Islamic Web site known for publishing messages from insurgent groups in Iraq. U.S. officials have said they could not confirm what had happened to the two soldiers, who disappeared Friday evening after an attack that killed a third U.S. soldier.

The Web posting said: "Your brothers in the military wing of the Mujahedeen Shura Council kidnapped the two American soldiers near Youssifiya."

It did not identify the soldiers.

The Defense Department identified the missing men as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore., and the dead soldier as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass. They were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade, 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault), Fort Campbell, Ky.

Gunmen kidnapped the four Russian diplomats near their embassy in Baghdad's Mansour district after firing on their car and killing an embassy employee.

"God has enabled the lions of monotheism to arrest four Russian diplomats in Iraq and kill the fifth," said a statement from the group on the same Web site.

It condemned Russian actions in Chechnya and criticized its presence in Baghdad.

"The Russian government sends its diplomats to Iraq to support the crusaders' project, led by America, and to provide international backing and legitimacy to the exhausted Iraqi government."

The Mujahedeen Shura Council is a grouping of several insurgent forces, including al Qaeda in Iraq. Abu Musab Zarqawi, who was killed this month, helped create the council in January, apparently to give an Iraqi face to his movement, made up mainly of foreign fighters.

Fighter jets, helicopters, unmanned drones, boats and dive teams are being used to search for the two men, Gen. Caldwell said. He did not comment on whether they had been seized by terrorists, saying only that they were listed as "duty status and whereabouts unknown."

Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said the soldiers appeared to have been taken prisoner.

Ahmed Khalaf Falah, a farmer who said he witnessed the abduction, told the Associated Press that the two soldiers had been captured by seven masked, heavily armed gunmen during the attack near Youssifiya, about 12 miles south of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0035421

U.S. and Iraqi troops, meanwhile, pushed into an eastern section of the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi in a campaign to gradually bolster their presence in city neighborhoods that for months largely have been under insurgent control.

A U.S. gunship fired on suspected insurgents early in the operation, U.S. commanders said. Six men were thought to have been killed, and sporadic exchanges of gunfire echoed throughout the neighborhood in the morning. No U.S. casualties were initially reported.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, meanwhile, said Iraqi forces will take over security next month in a southern province where Japanese troops are based. The decision, announced after Mr. al-Maliki met with Japan's ambassador, does not necessarily mean that any coalition forces will be withdrawn from Muthanna province.

Families Anxiously Await Confirmation Of Missing Soldiers' Status (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

AUSTIN, June 19 -- About a week ago, Army Pfc. Kristian Menchaca called his mother in South Texas and said he was exhausted, having just finished an overnight shift working a vehicle checkpoint in Iraq. It was tough, tense and dangerous work, he said.

Working that same duty on Friday, Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, were apparently kidnapped following an attack by Iraqi insurgents outside the town of Yusufiyah, south of Baghdad. The Pentagon said a third soldier working with Menchaca and Tucker, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed.

Menchaca's mother, Maria Guadalupe Vasquez, said in a telephone interview from her home in Brownsville: "The sergeants came and told us he was missing and that they were searching land and sea for him. They told us to pray. They said we just needed to pray for him."

As Vasquez and Tucker's family in Madras, Ore., awaited word Monday on the whereabouts of their sons, a message was posted on the Internet saying the soldiers were abducted by an Islamic group. A Marine spokesman in Baghdad had not been able to verify the authenticity of the statement, which was purportedly posted by al-Qaeda in Iraq under the name of the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups.

A representative of the Tucker family referred calls to the public affairs office of the Oregon National Guard. Phone calls to a spokeswoman there were not returned.

Menchaca's wife, Christina, 18, was in Big Spring, Tex., with her family but was not taking phone calls, a family representative said.

The couple married last September and had met through Christina's brother, who is also in the Army, Vasquez said. Menchaca was deployed to Iraq a month after he was married.

"I'd like to know her, but she hasn't come down here yet. I've only seen her picture," Vasquez said of her daughter-in-law. "But we spoke by phone and she's very worried."

Vasquez said her son attended schools in Brownsville and nearby San Benito but dropped out of high school. He moved to Houston, where his older brother lives, and worked as a cashier at a fast-food restaurant. He also took adult education classes and completed his GED, she said. Vasquez said her son joined the Army because he wanted to further his studies and eventually become a U.S. Customs and Border Protection agent.

Vasquez said she last saw her son in April, when he was in Brownsville on a 10-day leave following his first tour in Iraq. "He was very changed," she said.

"He talked about killing people. He couldn't sleep. He came traumatized," she said. "I was scared."

Two weeks ago, he called his mother asking her to send him Cheetos, insect repellent and cleaning wipes. She was about to ship the items when the sergeants came to her home Friday afternoon. "I have it all here," Vasquez said. "Then this happened."

Senate Democrats Coalesce Around Iraq Plan (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 20, 2006

Senate Democrats coalesced Monday around a proposal urging the Bush administration to start pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq by year's end, brushing aside calls by some in the party for a firm withdrawal timetable.

"Three-and-a-half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent," said Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich., who helped write the nonbinding resolution that quickly drew criticism from Republican leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0035422

"Let me be clear: Retreat is not a solution," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said, chastising Democrats for espousing a "cut-and-run" strategy that "threatens our national security and poses unacceptable risks to Americans."

The Senate is to take up the resolution Tuesday and vote on it before Friday as debate on Iraq spills over into a second week on Capitol Hill, less than five months before midterm elections that will decide whether Democrats or Republicans control Congress.

Last week, the GOP-controlled Senate and House soundly rejected timetables for pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq, back-to-back votes that forced lawmakers in both parties to go on record on a major issue in re-election campaigns nationwide.

As the U.S. death toll and war spending continue to climb, polls show the public increasingly uncomfortable with the direction of the conflict, which began in spring 2003 when the United States invaded Iraq to topple dictator Saddam Hussein.

Democrats in Congress have long been divided over the way ahead in Iraq.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., failed to get her caucus to rally around one position last week. Senate Democrats also spent the week trying to come up with a "consensus" position, and it appeared they had largely succeeded.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada backs the resolution and his aides say they expect 38 to 40 Democrats and a few Republicans to vote for the symbolic statement. However, they don't expect to get the 51 votes needed to attach the resolution to an annual military bill.

The resolution would urge — but not require — the administration to begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces" in 2006 and, by year's end, give Congress its plan for "continued redeployment" thereafter.

Additionally, the resolution calls for American troops, which have been focused on combat operations in Iraq, to more quickly switch to "a limited mission of training and logistic support of Iraqi security forces, protection of U.S. personnel and facilities, and targeting counterterrorism activities."

It also maps out steps Senate Democrats say the fledgling Iraqi government must take to lay the foundation for a successful democracy and calls for an international conference to help Iraq overcome problems it faces.

Even as the GOP leadership criticized the resolution, Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, called it "a very serious-minded approach." He declined to endorse it but nonetheless promised to give it careful consideration.

Three Democrats distanced themselves from the resolution.

Seeking a stronger position on Iraq, John Kerry of Massachusetts, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Barbara Boxer of California intend to push for a vote on their own proposal.

It would require the administration to withdraw all combat troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007, leaving in place only U.S. troops essential to training Iraqi security forces, conducting counterterrorism operations and protecting U.S. personnel and facilities.

"A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country," Kerry and Feingold, two Democrats eying potential presidential candidacies in 2008, said in a joint statement.

Their proposal is expected to be rejected overwhelmingly.

Aside from Iraq, other fights are brewing as the Senate works on the annual military bill.

Rankling Republicans, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., on Monday proposed attaching long-sought legislation to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour in three steps.

Frist objected and then countered by seeking to attach to the bill legislation that would make it illegal in most cases to transport minors seeking abortions across state lines to circumvent laws in some states requiring parental notification.

Votes on those proposals could occur this week.

Senate Democrats Urge Beginning Of An Iraq Pullout This Year, But Avoid A Firm Schedule (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Trying to bridge party divisions on the eve of a Senate debate, leading Democrats called Monday for American troops to begin pulling out of Iraq this year. They avoided setting a firm timetable for withdrawal but argued that the Bush administration's open-ended commitment to the war would only prevent Iraqis from moving forward on their own.

Coming the week after partisan and often angry House debate over the war, the Senate proposal, a nonbinding resolution, was carefully worded to deflect any accusations that the Democrats were "cutting and running," as their position has been depicted by Republicans. The Democrats behind the measure did not even use the term "withdrawal," and talked about how to guarantee "success" for Iraq, not about any failures of the war.

"The administration's policy to date — that we'll be there for as long as Iraq needs us — will result in Iraq's depending upon us longer," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, who has been designated by the Democratic leadership to present the party's strategy on Iraq. "Three and a half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent."

DOJ_NMG_0035423

The resolution was cobbled together by moderate Democrats trying to smooth over differences within the party. The minority leadership has tried to distance itself from a proposal by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a mandatory deadline for American combat troops to be out of Iraq by the end of this year, a limit that Mr. Kerry modified only marginally on Monday. Some Republican lawmakers and the White House pointed to that proposal last week in attacking Democrats as inconsistent and weak on national security.

Mr. Levin's resolution did nothing to stop the Republicans' ridicule, with Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky dismissing it in a Fox News interview as "cut and jog."

"The last thing you want to do when you have the terrorists on the run is give them notice that you're going to leave," said Mr. McConnell, the Senate's No. 2 Republican.

President Bush spoke similarly at a Republican fund-raiser here Monday night, asserting: "An early withdrawal would embolden the terrorists. An early withdrawal would embolden Al Qaeda and bin Laden. There will be no early withdrawal so long as we run the Congress and occupy the White House."

The Democrats said their measure, which will be debated this week as an amendment to a military policy bill, built on a resolution that passed the Senate last year with wide support from Republicans. Democrats said they hoped this earlier resolution, which pledged that 2006 would be a year of "significant transition" toward an independent Iraq, would be followed by some Republican backing for the latest one.

But Senator John W. Warner, who as chairman of the Armed Services Committee was crucial to the adoption of last year's resolution, did not stand with the new proposal Monday.

"In this form, I could not support it," said Mr. Warner, Republican of Virginia.

Republicans said they were still exploring how to respond to the Democrats' latest approach. They are sensitive to the needs of senators in tough races, and therefore may bring an amendment of their own to express support for the troops in Iraq, giving those senators a chance to cast a vote backing a resolution instead of simply fighting one.

Such an amendment was the essence of the measure that House Republicans proposed last week, on which they prevailed.

But Senate Republicans also said they were inclined to debate the Democratic resolution head on. So, in contrast to the more predictable House debate, the Senate showdown could bring a more serious exchange of views on how best to deal with the war.

In any event, the resolution failed to satisfy Mr. Kerry. Late last week he said he was withholding his amendment in hopes that Democrats could find a "broad consensus." But on Monday he altered his proposal only slightly, to set the deadline for July 2007 instead of Dec. 31, 2006.

The Levin amendment would leave some American troops, focused on counterterrorism and training Iraqi security forces, in place. But it calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq by the end of this year, and for the president to submit a plan to Congress by then outlining preparations for further redeployment. Mindful of accusations that they are trying to micromanage a war from half a world away, the Democrats said they wanted to leave the "speed and pace" of the withdrawal to military commanders.

"This amendment is not cut and run," said Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, who joined Mr. Levin in proposing it. "This is not about a date certain. This is about getting the president to do the job correctly, something he has failed to do for the last three years and three months."

The resolution calls for an international conference to determine ways to secure Iraq and the region, and offers steps the Democrats said the Iraqis needed to make to take charge of their own country: sharing political power and economic resources among different groups, disarming the militias and rooting out disloyal members of security forces.

"As long as we're there to do this heavy lifting," Mr. Reed said, "even though they want to do it themselves, they won't do it."

Senate Democrats Push Phased Iraq Redeployment (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Top Senate Democrats, who last week voted against a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq, yesterday introduced a measure to start a phased troop redeployment by the end of the year.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan said Iraqis must stop looking at the United States as a "security blanket" with an open-ended commitment of support.

DOJ_NMG_0035424

"The administration's policy that we'll be there as long as Iraq needs us will result in Iraq depending upon us longer," Mr. Levin said before introducing the amendment to the defense authorization bill being considered this week. "Three and a half years into the conflict, we should tell the Iraqis that the American security blanket is not permanent."

Mr. Levin said phased redeployment -- not a timetable -- would encourage the Iraqi leaders to make "hard compromises" and secure their country.

Under the amendment, a phased redeployment of U.S. troops would begin by Dec. 31, when the Bush administration would be required to submit a plan for continued redeployment beyond 2006.

The co-sponsors are Democratic Sens. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, Dianne Feinstein of California and Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Republicans seized on the proposal as "cutting and running."

"Retreat is not an option," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "Those calling for an early withdrawal of American troops from Iraq utterly fail to understand the potentially catastrophic implications of their proposal."

A White House official last night dismissed the amendment, saying it calls for an arbitrary timeline that will encourage terrorists to wait for the United States to leave. "The choice is to stay and win or to allow Iraq to come become a safe haven for terrorists to plot against the United States," the official said.

Mr. Reed accused Republicans of using Iraq as a political football.

"Instead of offering a blueprint for success, the Bush administration has used the Iraq debate to attack Democrats for wanting to cut and run," he said.

Mr. Reed said redeployment should begin "as quickly as possible" to ease the strain on the troops, but added that the measure does not establish a pace.

The measure has Democratic support from Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sens. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Mrs. Clinton said the amendment would send the Iraqi government a message that the U.S. commitment is not indefinite and that Iraq must be responsible for its own security, a Clinton staffer said.

None of the amendment's announced sponsors or supporters backed a withdrawal measure Thursday that failed on a 93-6 vote.

Three Democrats who did vote for withdrawal, Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Barbara Boxer of California and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, today will submit a competing amendment to redeploy troops by July 1, 2007.

"We must redeploy to succeed," Mr. Kerry and Mr. Feingold said in a joint statement, calling a prolonged U.S. stay a "crutch" for Iraqis.

"A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country," they said.

Both amendments would leave in place military units with a limited mission of training and logistical support of Iraqi security forces, counterterrorist work and personnel protection.

The Levin amendment expresses a "sense of the Senate," but the Kerry measure would be binding.

The House on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution rejecting an "arbitrary" date for troop withdrawal by a 256-153 vote.

For Democrats, A Delicate Balance On Iraq (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Debate over Iraq will dominate the Senate this week, with Democrats scrambling to find a Goldilocks solution: not too hot on withdrawing U.S. troops quickly, but not so cold as to alienate large numbers of Democratic voters furious about the war and eager to bring the Americans home.

Four Democratic senators yesterday introduced a resolution intended to strike a just-right balance and to serve as an alternative to Sen. John F. Kerry's push for a hard deadline for a troop withdrawal. Their nonbinding "sense of the Senate" resolution would call on President Bush to begin a "phased redeployment" of U.S. troops by the end of this year. But it does not specify how quickly the drawdown should proceed or when it should be completed.

"This amendment is not cut-and-run," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), who co-sponsored the measure with Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). "This is not about a date certain" for a withdrawal, he said, but it is intended to spur the Iraqi government to prepare its army and police for self-sufficiency. Also endorsing the measure, to be offered as an amendment to the 2007 defense authorization bill, were Democrats Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.).

Democrats said they hope that most of their party's senators -- and perhaps some Republicans -- will back the Levin-Reed amendment. Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will support it, his office said.

But liberals and antiwar activists will lean toward an alternative amendment offered by Democrats Kerry (Mass.), Barbara Boxer (Calif.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.). It would direct the administration to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007. The only personnel allowed to remain beyond that date would be those "essential to completing the mission of standing up Iraqi security forces, conducting targeted counter-terrorist operations and protecting U.S. personnel and facilities."

Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, previously proposed bringing the troops home by the end of this year. Several colleagues urged him to reconsider, saying Republicans would portray Democrats during campaigning for the November elections as soft on terrorism and national security. Kerry agreed to extend the deadline by seven months, but he still calls for a firm date for most troops to be out.

"With the administration's failure to offer a coherent or effective strategy in Iraq, it is long past time for Congress to offer a plan to redeploy our troops so we can give Iraq its best chance at stability, and refocus on al Qaeda and the terrorist networks that threaten the security of all Americans," Kerry and Feingold said in a joint statement.

Levin told reporters yesterday: "We do not feel comfortable with a specific timetable for the redeployment of all of our forces or the pace of that."

Senate GOP aides said they were unsure whether the party's leaders would offer their own Iraq language or be content trying to defeat the Levin-Reed and Kerry-Feingold amendments.

The Senate jockeying follows last week's House vote, in which 42 Democrats joined 214 Republicans in backing a nonbinding measure rejecting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Between debates on matters military, the Senate may also get a chance to vote to raise the minimum wage for the first time since 1997. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced an amendment yesterday that would lift the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25, calling congressional action "a moral issue."

The House was to act on the minimum wage as well this week, after Democrats attached a wage increase last week to the annual spending bill that funds labor, health and education programs. But Republican leaders put off consideration of the bill on the House floor, believing the measure could be defeated in an embarrassing procedural debate over the minimum-wage hike and ongoing disputes with House GOP moderates over its funding levels.

"With the minimum wage on there, coupled with level of expenditures in the bill, it was just too heavy a lift," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

The Senate's passage of a minimum-wage increase in 1997 created so much pressure on House Republicans in industrial districts in the Northeast and Midwest that GOP leaders were forced to bring the issue to the floor. Democrats are hoping to re-create that political dynamic.

But first they have to clear the Senate. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) used a procedural move yesterday to ensure that before any vote on the minimum wage, the Senate must vote on a Republican measure criminalizing the transport of a minor across state lines to get an abortion. That vote could give some swing-state Democrats so much of a headache that the two parties will agree to drop both amendments and go back to defense.

Also on tap is a House vote on Thursday on Bush's line-item-veto proposal. Lawmakers have been unable to stop themselves from approving narrowly tailored "earmarks" that fund home-district pet projects, but Republicans appear eager to let the president stop them.

Democrats Shape Plans On Iraq (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Leading Senate Democrats called Monday for a "phased withdrawal" of U.S. forces from Iraq, outlining what they hope will become a consensus position on the war that will help their party speak with a more unified voice.

Some Democratic lawmakers have called for an immediate withdrawal, others for a continued presence of U.S. troops to foster security. Democratic leaders have been working to develop a consensus to rebut Republican accusations that they are divided and indecisive.

The new Democratic proposal sets a starting point for withdrawing troops but does not set an end date or demand a particular pace for the redeployment, said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. He said he planned to offer the measure as an amendment to a defense spending bill being debated this week in the Senate.

"Our amendment does not establish a timetable for redeployment," Levin said. "It does urge that a phased redeployment begin this year, partly as a way of moving away from an open-ended commitment and a way of avoiding Iraqi dependency on a U.S. security blanket."

It also calls on the administration to develop a plan for the continued withdrawal of troops beyond 2006, and to change the definition of the mission from occupation to training, logistical support and counter-terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0035426

The measure is co-sponsored by Sens. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.). It has gained the support of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and other party leaders.

"This amendment was crafted to get the support of a majority of Democrats as well as some Republicans," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

A second proposal, from Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), calls for complete withdrawal by July 2007. It appears to have the support of half a dozen senators, including Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has signed on as a sponsor.

Many of the senators who support the Kerry proposal are expected to back the Levin amendment too, aides said.

"We need a deadline for the redeployment of U.S. forces in Iraq," Kerry and Feingold said in a statement. "A deadline gives Iraqis the best chance for stability and self-government, and most importantly, it allows us to begin refocusing on the true threats that face our country."

Progress in Iraq is expected to be a central issue in the fall congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential election. Kerry and Feingold are both expected to seek the Democratic nomination for president.

"After three years and three months of American presence, and after all the casualties that we have taken and the treasure which we have spent, the Iraqis are going to need to step up now and take over the security responsibility and deal with the militias," Levin said. "It's not a criticism of the Iraqis. It's a way forward in order to improve the chances of success."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, denounced the Levin proposal as "cutting and running."

"Let me be clear: Retreat is not a solution. Our national security requires us to follow through on our commitments," Frist said in a statement. "Artificial deadlines are not the solution…. Cutting and running is bad policy that threatens our national security and poses unacceptable risks to Americans."

The Senate is expected to spend much of the week debating Iraq. Last week, the House passed a resolution expressing support for the administration's policies and rejecting an "artificial timeline" for withdrawal.

Vice President Dick Cheney, speaking to reporters at a journalism awards ceremony, said Monday that he stood by his assertion a year ago that the Iraqi insurgency was in its "last throes." But he acknowledged the intensity of the insurgency surprised the administration.

"I don't think anybody anticipated the level of violence that we've encountered," Cheney said. "I guess the other area that I look at, in terms of an area where I think we were faced with difficulties we didn't anticipate, was the devastation that 30 years of Saddam's rule had wrought, if you will, on the psychology of the Iraqi people. Very, very hard to go from the way they were forced to live for a long period of time to a situation in which they have the opportunity for self-government."

Last week, both of California's senators intended to offer their own withdrawal proposals, but they agreed over the weekend to coalesce around the two approaches announced Monday.

"I believe an open-ended commitment is no longer sustainable in Iraq," Feinstein said in a statement. "It seems to me the president should have come forward with something more specific than 'Stay the course' and 'We will stand down as they stand up.' "

Cheney Stands By His 'Last Throes' Remark (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Vice President Cheney yesterday defended his much-criticized claim a year ago that the Iraq insurgency was in its "last throes" and said he believes that Iraq "turned a corner" last year when its people held elections creating a constitution and a government.

Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney predicted that 10 years from now people will look back at 2005 and say, "That's when we began to get a handle on the long-term future of Iraq."

But he also acknowledged that the administration underestimated the strength of the insurgency. "I don't think anybody anticipated the level of violence that we've encountered," he said. He added: "We didn't anticipate . . . the devastation that 30 years of Saddam's rule had wrought, if you will, on the psychology of the Iraqi people."

Cheney has repeatedly stood by his May 2005 declaration that the insurgency was waning, even as Democratic politicians and comedians have mocked it. It has joined a litany of administration statements about Iraq cited as examples of wishful thinking, including that reconstruction would be inexpensive for U.S. taxpayers and that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators.

DOJ_NMG_0035427

The most famous optimistic assessment came nearly three years ago, when President Bush stood on an aircraft carrier off California under a banner that read "Mission Accomplished." "We have seen the turning of the tide," he said then. Since that statement, more than 2,300 Americans have died in Iraq.

Despite Cheney's assertion that no one foresaw how difficult the post-invasion phase would be, defense and Middle East experts have said that administration officials during the run-up to the war ignored their warnings about potential obstacles ahead.

For example, a group of specialists who met at the Army War College in December 2002, three months before the U.S. invaded Iraq, warned: "The possibility of the United States winning the war and losing the peace is real and serious." Iraq had been strained by decades of misrule, wars and sanctions, they observed, noting that "if the United States assumes control of Iraq, it will therefore assume control of a badly battered economy." The writers of the Army report emphasized that Iraq was going to be tougher than the administration was acknowledging publicly. "Successful occupation will not occur unless the special circumstances of this unusual country" are heeded, they warned.

Likewise, 70 national security experts and Middle East scholars met about the same time for two days at the National Defense University and then issued a report concluding that occupying Iraq "will be the most daunting and complex task the U.S. and the international community will have undertaken since the end of World War II." One participant, Army Col. Paul Hughes, sent a copy of the conference report to the office of Douglas J. Feith, then the undersecretary of defense for policy, but "never heard back from him or anyone else" over there, he said.

Cheney: U.S. Action Averts New Attacks (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

The United States' biggest terrorism threat is “an al-Qaeda cell armed with a nuclear weapon or a biological agent in the middle of one of our own cities,” Vice President Cheney said Monday.

Speaking at the National Press Club, Cheney credited aggressive U.S. action for preventing terrorist attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. “The fact of the matter is we have been safe and secure here at home,” he said. “That's not an accident. It didn't happen just because we got lucky.”

Cheney said improved intelligence-gathering and preventive steps have thwarted attacks on U.S. soil. He singled out the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program as important in the war on terrorism and said it “clearly is legal” and is “consistent with the Constitution.”

The NSA program involves monitoring international communications of people in the USA without a court warrant when one party may have ties to terrorism.

Critics, including Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., say a 1978 law requires the spy agency to get court warrants before eavesdropping on U.S. targets.

The Interior Department reversed a controversial proposal that would have allowed more snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles in national parks at the expense of conservation.

New guidelines emphasize preserving natural resources over developing more recreation opportunities at national parks. The management policy says parks should aim for the highest clean air standard, preserve solitude and keep wilderness lands free from snowmobiles, ATVs and other intrusions.

“That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment,” Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said.

The plan, which becomes final in three weeks, is one of the first moves for Kempthorne. He replaced Gale Norton last month.

Coleen Rowley, a former lawyer in the FBI's Minneapolis field office who is running for Congress as a Democrat in Minnesota, received both praise and criticism in a Justice Department inspector general's report on the investigation of al-Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui.

The report credits Rowley for blowing the whistle on FBI headquarters for not aggressively investigating Moussaoui before the 9/11 attacks in 2001. It faults her for not pursuing other avenues, such as a traditional search warrant. She focused on obtaining a search warrant from a special intelligence court that operates in secret.

The report was released last year, but the Moussaoui part was withheld pending his trial. He was sentenced last month to life in prison.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said he is leaving to join investment house Goldman Sachs and concentrate on trying to develop investment markets around the world. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Zoellick, 52, as her “alter ego.” She did not say who will replace Zoellick when he leaves next month.

DOJ_NMG_0035428

Japan Plans To Bring Troops Home As Iraqis Take Over (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

TOKYO, June 20 -- Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi announced a plan Tuesday to withdraw Japan's 550 troops from Iraq, ending a landmark mission that became Tokyo's largest military operation since World War II, according to a Japanese official.

On Monday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced that Iraqi troops would take over security next month around the southern city of Samawah, where the Japanese and other forces are stationed. Officials here have repeatedly said that the Japanese -- whose withdrawal has been anticipated for months -- had been awaiting that decision before finalizing withdrawal plans.

Koizumi revealed his plan at a meeting of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, saying he would make a public announcement of the pullout later in the day, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

At a news conference Monday, Koizumi declined to give a specific timeline on the withdrawal but said Japan will continue to provide reconstruction and humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people even after the troops are pulled out.

"When the time comes," Koizumi said, "I will decide when will be the appropriate timing to have the SDF troops return home safely after getting the understanding of other countries and the Iraqi government."

Koizumi's decision to pull out, officials say, is likely to be contingent on an announcement by the British and Australians to withdraw the forces around Samawah that had been protecting the Japanese. In Canberra, Australia, Defense Minister Brendan Nelson said Tuesday that Australia would reassign its 460 troops now protecting Japanese forces to help the Iraqi military secure the border with Syria. Nelson said the troops would be redeployed when Japan withdrew.

The Japanese withdrawal is not expected to dramatically affect the effort to rebuild Iraq. Analysts have said the Japanese mission there is more symbolic than strategic. The troops have provided engineering guidance and humanitarian services but are limited in their role by Japan's pacifist constitution and have had to count on other foreign forces for protection.

The contentious move to dispatch Japanese troops to Iraq was seen as a dramatic step for Japan, which after decades of engaging in what came to be known as "checkbook diplomacy" has shown more willingness to deploy its forces.

Despite public opposition, Koizumi pushed through the plan to dispatch Japanese ground troops in December 2003, largely in an effort to demonstrate support for the U.S.-Japan alliance. Japanese troops began arriving in Iraq in February 2004.

U.S. officials have requested that Japan continue to provide air transport assistance in Kuwait and surrounding areas. The Japanese said they would consider the request, and analysts have said Koizumi is likely to agree to the proposal.

'Coalition Of The Willing' Shrinks In Iraq (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And David Pilling

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

The shrinking US "coalition of the willing" in Iraq has come to resemble more a coalition of the reluctant, as allies weigh up the costs of continued involvement in an unpopular war against the benefits of backing President George W. Bush for the rest of his second term.

Japan is expected to become the latest coalition member to announce a schedule for its withdrawal in a public statement on Tuesday. Italy's new foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, met Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, last week to discuss the Italian pullout by the end of the year, meaning in effect an end to operations by September.

Spain withdrew its 1,300 soldiers from Iraq in 2004 after a change of government. The Netherlands, Ukraine, Nicaragua, the Philippines and Honduras have also pulled out. Only several thousand foreign troops remain along side some 130,000 US soldiers.

The UK on Monday confirmed that Iraqi security forces would take over responsibility for security in the southern Muthana province, where Japanese forces were based. British and Australian troops – who provided security for the Japanese as they carried out reconstruction projects – will be redeployed.

Analysts say only the UK provided a sizeable military force that actually made a difference in operational capability. Contributions from most other countries had more meaning in terms of political support for the US when the Bush administration failed to win enough backing for a second resolution at the UN.

Senior Japanese cabinet ministers met on Monday to discuss a timetable for the withdrawal, increasing the possibility that the pull-out could take place to coincide with a planned visit by Junichiro Koizumi, prime minister, to Washington at the end of this month.

DOJ_NMG_0035429

Last year, at the start of Mr Bush's second term, Ms Rice launched a drive to rebuild alliances, particularly in Europe, for the Iraq effort. Ultimately she failed as Mr Bush took on the appearance of a lame duck president, commented Lawrence Korb, senior analyst at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think-tank.

But he said countries like Japan could not be accused of "cutting and running" as they never thought over three years ago that they would have to stay that long.

Anthony Cordesman, senior analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the changes in the coalition were much more important for the political symbolism than operational reality. The war, he said, had led to serious political problems at home for contributing states as public support steadily deteriorated.

"A steady pace of withdrawal and cuts from the coalition of the willing sends a message that the war does not have the support when it started, and nor does the US," he said.

The US said it expected to issue a statement on the status of the coalition last night.

The original coalition of the willing, as announced when the invasion began, brought together a disparate group of 44 declared members. But these included many that had virtually no military resources to offer, such as Afghanistan, and others that later broke ties with the US, including Uzbekistan.

Diplomats are also concerned that reconstruction efforts will be hindered by the withdrawals as it is not clear how planned joint military-civilian Provincial Reconstruction Teams will be made secure.

Japanese ministers have hinted that Japan will offer the US other logistical support, including more transport flights to Baghdad and elsewhere, by the air self-defence force (ASDF), Japan's version of an air force.

The ASDF has three C-130 transportation aircraft based in Kuwait from where it transports goods and personnel to Basra and a base near Samawah, where Japanese ground forces are based. The ASDF does not currently operate regular flights to Baghdad.

Australia's prime minister, John Howard, said on Monday that some of Australia's 460-member taskforce could remain in Iraq, possibly supporting Iraqi forces stationed at Tallil, a major coalition base near the city of Nasririyah.

"We would continue to see a role, albeit a somewhat different role, for our forces in southern Iraq. The operations will be likely to be based in and around Tallil. The primary purpose would be to provide a security reinforcement or back-up for the Iraqi security forces and also an ongoing training role," he said.

Japan To Withdraw Its Troops From Iraq (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

TOKYO — Japan's government will withdraw its troops from Iraq, ending a mission that broke postwar taboos by sending its troops into foreign combat zones for the first time since 1945.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi told executives of his ruling party that the roughly 600 Japanese soldiers stationed in the southern Iraqi city of Samawah would come home over the next two months, according to Japanese media reports.

"We've finished this chapter," Koizumi reportedly told the officials.

The mission has been controversial in Japan, where polls show a majority of the public opposes the war.

Koizumi had to ensure that the deployment conformed to Japan's pacifist constitution, which prohibits the country from using force to resolve international disputes.

Tokyo had portrayed the mission as strictly humanitarian, with troops focused on improving water supplies and rebuilding hospitals and schools. Security was provided by allies to avoid situations in which Japanese soldiers might have to fire their weapons or risk injury or death.

The Iraqi government, noting the relative calm in the Samawah region, announced this week that it would be the first place where Iraqi forces would assume security duties from foreign troops.

The Japanese mission was more important politically than militarily. The small deployment gave Washington the comfort of having another ally present in Iraq, while allowing Tokyo to establish the precedent of sending troops into a hostile environment.

Japanese critics say their government used the deployment as a means of stretching its constitutional limits on sending soldiers abroad.

The Way Out Of Iraq: A Road Map (WP)

By Mowaffak Al-Rubaie

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

There has been much talk about a withdrawal of U.S. and coalition troops from Iraq, but no defined timeline has yet been set. There is, however, an unofficial "road map" to foreign troop reductions that will eventually lead to total withdrawal of U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0035430

troops. This road map is based not just on a series of dates but, more important, on the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq.

Iraq has a total of 18 governorates, which are at differing stages in terms of security. Each will eventually take control of its own security situation, barring a major crisis. But before this happens, each governorate will have to meet stringent minimum requirements as a condition of being granted control. For example, the threat assessment of terrorist activities must be low or on a downward trend. Local police and the Iraqi army must be deemed capable of dealing with criminal gangs, armed groups and militias, and border control. There must be a clear and functioning command-and-control center overseen by the governor, with direct communication to the prime minister's situation room.

Despite the seemingly endless spiral of violence in Iraq today, such a plan is already in place. All the governors have been notified and briefed on the end objective. The current prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has approved the plan, as have the coalition forces, and assessments of each province have already been done. Nobody believes this is going to be an easy task, but there is Iraqi and coalition resolve to start taking the final steps to have a fully responsible Iraqi government accountable to its people for their governance and security. Thus far four of the 18 provinces are ready for the transfer of power -- two in the north (Irbil and Sulaymaniyah) and two in the south (Maysan and Muthanna). Nine more provinces are nearly ready.

With the governors of each province meeting these strict objectives, Iraq's ambition is to have full control of the country by the end of 2008. In practice this will mean a significant foreign troop reduction. We envisage the U.S. troop presence by year's end to be under 100,000, with most of the remaining troops to return home by the end of 2007.

The eventual removal of coalition troops from Iraqi streets will help the Iraqis, who now see foreign troops as occupiers rather than the liberators they were meant to be. It will remove psychological barriers and the reason that many Iraqis joined the so-called resistance in the first place. The removal of troops will also allow the Iraqi government to engage with some of our neighbors that have to date been at the very least sympathetic to the resistance because of what they call the "coalition occupation." If the sectarian issue continues to cause conflict with Iraq's neighbors, this matter needs to be addressed urgently and openly -- not in the guise of aversion to the presence of foreign troops.

Moreover, the removal of foreign troops will legitimize Iraq's government in the eyes of its people. It has taken what some feel is an eternity to form a government of national unity. This has not been an easy or enviable task, but it represents a significant achievement, considering that many new ministers are working in partisan situations, often with people with whom they share a history of enmity and distrust. By its nature, the government of national unity, because it is working through consensus, could be perceived to be weak. But, again, the drawdown of foreign troops will strengthen our fledgling government to last the full four years it is supposed to.

While Iraq is trying to gain its independence from the United States and the coalition, in terms of taking greater responsibility for its actions, particularly in terms of security, there are still some influential foreign figures trying to spoon-feed our government and take a very proactive role in many key decisions. Though this may provide some benefits in the short term, in the long run it will only serve to make the Iraqi government a weaker one and eventually lead to a culture of dependency. Iraq has to grow out of the shadow of the United States and the coalition, take responsibility for its own decisions, learn from its own mistakes, and find Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems, with the knowledge that our friends and allies are standing by with support and help should we need it.

The writer is Iraq's national security adviser.

Murder Charges For 3 G.I.'s In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Three American soldiers suspected of killing three detainees in Iraq and then threatening a soldier with death if he reported the shootings have been charged with premeditated murder and obstructing justice, Army officials said Monday.

The accused soldiers, two enlisted men and a noncommissioned officer, also face charges of attempted murder, conspiracy and threatening in connection with the deaths of the three detainees on May 9, the Army's documents showed.

One Defense Department official said investigators had evidence that the soldiers had released the detainees deliberately before they were shot, apparently to have a pretext for killing them as they fled.

In Iraq on Monday, an Islamic militant group linked to Al Qaeda said it had captured two American soldiers listed as missing, but it offered no proof, and American military officials remained skeptical. The two soldiers disappeared Friday night in an ambush southwest of Baghdad, and the military has organized a force of 8,000 American and Iraqi troops to find them.

The three soldiers charged by the Army were identified as Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard, Specialist William B. Hunsaker and Pfc. Corey R. Clagett. A conviction of murder under the Uniform Code of Military Justice can carry the death penalty. A conviction of attempted murder carries a maximum punishment of life in prison, as does a conviction of conspiracy. A conviction for wrongfully communicating a threat carries a maximum term of five years.

DOJ_NMG_0035431

The victims remained unidentified and were listed on the charge sheets only as male detainees apparently of Middle Eastern descent.

The three soldiers, assigned to the Third Brigade Combat Team of the 101st Airborne Division, were jailed in Kuwait last Thursday to await hearings to determine whether they would face courts-martial, officials said.

The charge sheets list a number of instances in which the suspects are said to have threatened another soldier with death if he assisted investigators. The charge sheets quote the suspects as saying to the soldier, a private first class, " 'I will kill you if you tell anyone,' or words to that effect," and " 'You better not talk or I will kill you,' or words to that effect."

Military officials said over the weekend that the allegation of wrongdoing was raised by an enlisted soldier. Military officials said the soldiers suspected in the killings initially asserted that the three detainees had died as they were trying to escape.

The shootings occurred near the Muthanna Chemical Complex along the Tharthar Canal, in southern Salahuddin Province, a restive Sunni Arab region in north-central Iraq, according to the military statements.

Military officials said the shootings came during a joint American-Iraqi raid of suspected insurgent positions inside the chemical complex.

Few other details were available.

"On the day the alleged murders occurred, the unit commander ordered an inquiry to determine the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the three detainees," the military said in a statement.

Regarding the search for the two soldiers who have been missing since Friday, a message posted Monday on a Web site of the Council of Holy Warriors, which says it oversees Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and seven other militant groups, said, "Our brothers in the military wing" had seized the soldiers near Yusufiya, the town where the military began its search.

"We will provide you with more details on this incident in the next few days," the group said.

It was not clear whether the assertion was true: the group's posting was unusually brief and did not say precisely where the soldiers had been seized. It offered no pictures of the soldiers.

In a separate posting, the same group said it had kidnapped four Russian Embassy employees in the upscale neighborhood of Mansour in early June. The group gave the Russian government 48 hours to withdraw from Chechnya, a rebellious Muslim republic within Russia, and to release Muslim detainees from Russian prisons.

The Russian Foreign Ministry, in a statement on Monday, called for the release of the embassy employees.

An American military spokeswoman said the military was investigating the claim about the soldiers, but an American official in Baghdad cautioned that the military viewed the Web statement with some skepticism. It contained only information that could have been easily gleaned from news articles on the Internet.

Also, the official said, the council is an umbrella group and does not itself have the fighters needed to carry out an attack like the one it says led to the soldiers' capture.

The sweeping search continued for the soldiers, identified by the military on Monday as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed when insurgents attacked the three at a traffic checkpoint.

Since Friday, troops had searched 12 villages, detained 34 Iraqis and conducted 12 cordon-and-search operations, the military said. Troops were supported by fighter jets and pilotless Predator drones.

A resident in Karagol, the village that appeared to be closest to where the soldiers were taken, said the Americans had shut off all water and electricity in the town.

The troops appear to have met some resistance. Since Friday, three Iraqis identified as insurgents have been killed, the military said, and seven American soldiers have been wounded.

Another Internet posting surfaced Monday in which Ansar al-Sunna, a militant group operating in northern Iraq, said it had captured an Iraqi woman serving as a translator, Salma Gasem Hamadi, a Shiite who the group said was working for the American military in Tikrit.

The posting included a chilling warning for translators in the area to "leave your work immediately before we get you," according to a translation provided by the SITE Institute, a group that tracks militant Web sites.

In Rome on Monday, three Italian prosecutors requested the indictment of an American soldier for the shooting of an Italian intelligence agent, Nicola Calipari, who was killed by gunfire at a checkpoint in Iraq last year, the Italian news agency ANSA reported.

According to the report, the Italian prosecutors have asked that the soldier, identified as Specialist Mario Lozano, a member of the New York National Guard, stand trial on charges of murder and attempted murder.

DOJ_NMG_0035432

On March 4, 2005, just after securing the release of an Italian journalist who had been kidnapped in Baghdad, Mr. Calipari was killed when the car carrying him and the journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, came under fire at a checkpoint.

A spokesman for the United States Embassy in Rome said the embassy had not been contacted about the indictments and declined further comment.

Also on Monday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Iraqi troops would assume full responsibility in July for security in Muthanna Province, where British forces oversee a multinational force of Australians and Japanese troops. Muthanna would be the first of Iraq's provinces outside of the Kurdish north to be under full Iraqi control.

In all, 13 Iraqis were killed and 36 wounded Monday in violence in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, Iraqi authorities said.

U.S. To Charge Soldiers In Iraq Detainee Deaths (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

The Army announced murder charges yesterday against three American soldiers in the May 9 deaths of Iraqi detainees.

A brief statement in Baghdad did not identify the three soldiers or their ranks. It said they are members of the 101st Airborne Division, based in Tikrit, and were being held in pretrial confinement in anticipation of an Article 32 hearing that could lead to courts-martial. The military said three Iraqi detainees were killed May 9 near the Thar Thar Canal in northern Salahuddin province.

The case could be the first in a series of murder charges against soldiers and Marines in the deaths of Iraqi civilians. The command is conducting a forcewide retraining program on the importance of ethics and protecting noncombatants. The murder counts send a message to the troops that the military is prepared to lodge the ultimate charge against its own in the confusing environment of counterinsurgency warfare.

Two major cases remain under investigation. The Marine Corps is holding seven Marines and one Navy hospital corpsman at Camp Pendleton, Calif., while the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) probes the death of an Iraqi man in April in the town of Hamandiyah.

The NCIS also has been investigating the killing of 24 civilians by Marines Nov. 19 in the Anbar province town of Haditha. Criminal defense attorneys have said they expect one or more Marines to be charged with murder in that case. The Marines' attorneys say they did nothing wrong. They say the deaths came after their convoy was attacked by an improvised explosive device, and they cleared three houses in which civilians and suspected insurgents were interspersed.

In the 101st Airborne case, the military did not release the official charge sheets that typically identify the accused and provide more details. The statement said the three enlisted soldiers face charges of murder, attempted murder, conspiracy, communicating a threat and obstruction of justice.

"On the day the alleged murders occurred, the unit commander ordered an inquiry to determine the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the three detainees," the statement said.

This is not the first time the military has filed charges in the case of a detainee death in Iraq. But no soldier has been convicted of murder. The most serious sentence in a detainee-abuse case was a 10-year sentence handed to former Army Spc. Charles A. Graner Jr., who supervised the abuse and humiliation of prisoners at Abu Ghraib.

In the global war on terror, the Army has processed more than 56,000 detainees and is holding about 15,000 in Afghanistan, Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Army has conducted more than 600 criminal investigations resulting in charges against 251 soldiers who went before courts-martial or faced administrative punishment.

Army Cancels Contract For New Iraqi Prison (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 19 — The Army Corps of Engineers said Monday that it had canceled a $99.1 million contract with Parsons, one of the largest companies working in Iraq, to build a prison north of Baghdad after the firm fell more than two years behind schedule, threatened to go millions of dollars over budget and essentially abandoned the construction site.

The move is another harsh rebuke for Parsons, only weeks after the corps canceled more than $300 million of the company's contracts to build and refurbish hospitals and clinics across Iraq. A federal oversight office had found that some of the clinics were little more than empty shells and that only 20 of 150 called for in the contract would be completed without new financing.

DOJ_NMG_0035433

But the prison, originally scheduled to be completed this month, appears to be the largest single rebuilding project canceled for failing to achieve its goals under the $45 billion American rebuilding program for Iraq. The corps said Parsons officials had recently estimated that it could not be completed before September 2008, and would cost an additional $13.5 million.

"I have other contractors that hold to their schedules," said Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy Jr., commander of the corps' Gulf Region Division. "And when they hold to their schedules, there's no problem."

In the case of the prison contract, General McCoy said, "I've got to stop the bleeding."

The corps says it intends to complete 3,700 rebuilding projects. But that number is much smaller than once planned and there is no independent overall assessment of their success. For example, among the water and sanitation projects, only 49 of the 136 projects originally envisioned are expected to be completed, according to Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who leads the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, an independent federal oversight office.

The move over the prison contract pushes further into the open a series of bitter disagreements between Parsons and the corps over who is ultimately responsible for the failure of its rebuilding projects. When a senior Parsons official was informed by telephone that General McCoy had released word of the cancellation, the official replied, "He would, wouldn't he?"

The official referred a reporter to Parsons corporate headquarters in the United States for permission to conduct an interview for attribution about the development. But the request was turned down, and the company released a brief statement through a spokeswoman instead.

"Parsons performed our work in Iraq in conformance with the contract terms and the direction given to us by the U.S. government," said the spokeswoman, Erin Kuhlman, by e-mail. "We're extremely proud of our dedicated employees who have performed very well under extremely difficult and dangerous circumstances."

Another corps official, Col. Andrew Q. Knapp, said that even the new September 2008 completion date cited by Parsons was not realistic because the company had stopped working on the site two months ago. "So the date's kind of meaningless," Colonel Knapp said.

The company declined to clarify why it had stopped the work.

The largest single project previously canceled in Iraq appears to have been a $75.7 million dollar contract that called for KBR, formerly Kellogg Brown & Root, to restore a set of oil pipelines across the Tigris River.

The loss of business for Parsons in Iraq may not be over. General McCoy said a broad review of Parsons' work in Iraq had turned up problems in sector after sector. According to news releases on the Parsons Web site, the company has received contracts worth as much as $4 billion in Iraq.

Parsons' contracts with the corps called for building and refurbishing scores of police stations, border forts, fire stations, courthouses, prisons and Iraqi government buildings. "We found overruns in almost every case," General McCoy said.

Corps officials also said that they had asked the company to explain delays and overruns on another prison project, south of Nasiriya, for which it has an $82.7 million contract.

Mr. Bowen, the inspector general, said after he issued a pair of scathing reports on the clinics that he intended to review all of the Parsons work in Iraq. Mr. Bowen's reports said the $243 million program to build 150 clinics would complete only 20 unless new financing were found.

In some cases, the reports found, the clinics were little more than empty shells of uneven bricks and concrete that were already crumbling into dust. But those reports focused much of their criticism on what they called the failure of the corps to exercise proper oversight of the work.

Shortly after those reports were issued, General McCoy canceled the clinics contract, and shortly thereafter voided a $70 million Parsons project to refurbish 20 hospitals in Iraq. General McCoy said Sunday that he had found $62 million in his budget to finish the remaining clinics by letting construction contracts directly to Iraqi companies.

The general said he would also contract directly with Iraqi companies to finish the 1,800-inmate prison, the Khan Bani Saad Correctional Facility. Colonel Knapp said that about 40 percent of the project had been completed and that what was in place appeared to be sound.

"It's just primarily cost and schedule," Colonel Knapp said of the reasons for canceling the Parsons prison contract. "There's an urgent need for prisons right now for the country of Iraq, and it's simply not getting there fast enough."

An inspection team led by Mr. Bowen visited the Nasiriya prison project in May and found that the workmanship was good but that the construction schedule had slipped by nearly a year for reasons no one there could explain. General McCoy said he was aware of Mr. Bowen's findings and asked the company for an explanation.

"We've given them about 10 days to come back to us," General McCoy said.

Battlefield Conversion Employees Of Contractor Barred From Iraq Resurrect Its Business (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

On Jan. 3, 2005, Jerry Cullen signed an unusual document at the Baghdad headquarters of his employer, Custer Battles LLC, which the U.S. military had accused of fraud and barred from receiving any new Iraq contracts.

The document was a single-page "bill of sale." Attached were several pages detailing assets such as cars, trucks, prefabricated housing and communications gear that Custer Battles was selling. The buyer was a little-known company in Bucharest, Romania, called Danubia Global Inc. The document said Danubia would pay Custer Battles "U.S. One Dollar" upfront, and an unspecified amount of money in the future. The company never gave Custer Battles any additional money, Danubia executives say.

While the U.S. sanctions technically put Custer Battles out of business, it never actually shut down. After paying its dollar, Danubia took on most of Custer Battles's employees, who continued to work out of Custer Battles trailers on the grounds of Baghdad's airport. They were paid, for a time, from Custer Battles bank accounts. Danubia's owner, Richard Levinson, was a former Custer Battles senior executive. After signing the sale document, Mr. Cullen left Custer Battles to work for Danubia as a consultant.

Now, the Custer Battles-Danubia link is the focus of a federal criminal investigation. Law-enforcement authorities are exploring whether Danubia was an artificial entity created to evade the government ban on Custer Battles, according to investigators involved in the probe. They're examining whether Danubia executives defrauded the federal government by obtaining millions of dollars of contracts they weren't entitled to receive.

Mr. Levinson says in a phone interview that Danubia has no continuing ties to Custer Battles or that company's two founders. He stresses that neither he nor any of the employees who went with him were linked to the wrongdoing at their former firm. "I can say simply, honestly, and without reservation that Danubia is not a shell company," he says.

Meanwhile Danubia is wrestling with another controversy. This one stems from an April clash near the Baghdad airport, in which Iraqi police personnel said Danubia security guards fired on them without provocation, killing several officers including a colonel. Danubia denies wrongdoing and says its guards were fired on first. The U.S. military is pursuing a formal investigation -- separate from the one about ties to Custer Battles -- and has barred Danubia from operating in the area.

The Bush administration's effort to rebuild Iraq has been marred by mismanagement and instances of corruption. U.S. audits have found evidence that hundreds of millions of dollars was spent without proper authorization, given to contractors who performed shoddy work, or paid to firms charging unreasonably high prices. The audits have also found cases where corrupt contractors and U.S. and Iraqi government officials stole money.

The U.S. has budgeted $20.9 billion specifically for Iraq reconstruction, not counting money for smaller projects that comes from the military's budget. Mindful of the problems, the White House didn't include any further money for the reconstruction program in its latest budget request, meaning the program is likely to end later this year when its funds run out.

Custer Battles was one of the first American contractors suspended by the government, and it is often held up as a leading example of wrongdoing. In a civil trial earlier this year, a federal jury in Alexandria, Va., found that Custer Battles defrauded the government of $3 million by filing faked invoices. The company has asked U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, who presided over the trial, to set aside the verdict.

Custer Battles was founded in late 2002 by two former Army Rangers, Scott Custer and Michael Battles. After the U.S.-led invasion ousted Saddam Hussein, the two men won contracts to guard Baghdad's airport and provide logistical support for the introduction of Iraq's new currency. Soon Custer Battles had hundreds of employees in Iraq.

The American-run Coalition Provisional Authority grew suspicious of bills the firm was submitting and summoned Messrs. Custer and Battles to an October 2003 meeting. The session deteriorated into a shouting match, according to participants. After the meeting, CPA officials discovered the Custer Battles executives had left behind a spreadsheet. It showed the company had spent $4 million fulfilling the currency contract but charged the CPA $10 million.

The government opened a formal probe the following day. It concluded the company had reaped outsized profits by exaggerating costs. In September 2004, the Air Force, which signed contracts on behalf of the CPA, suspended the firm from bidding for new contracts or renewing existing ones. The move effectively put Custer Battles out of business.

Danubia came into existence a short time later.

Financial registration documents from the British Virgin Islands show that the company was incorporated in the city of Tortola on Dec. 7, 2004, with $50,000 in authorized capital. Danubia said it operated out of Bucharest, which lies on a tributary of the Danube River. It listed its corporate parent as a second British Virgin Islands firm called Security Ventures International Ltd. Mr. Levinson, the Danubia owner, says he also owns Security Ventures International. He explains that he created the companies to avoid paying U.S. taxes in the event the firms were later sold and to minimize his liability in American courts if employees were killed or wounded in Iraq.

Series of Setbacks

DOJ_NMG_0035435

Mr. Levinson, a 53-year-old lawyer, joined Custer Battles as a contract manager in December 2003 after a series of personal and professional setbacks.

He had worked for a time in the State Department, where he served as a political officer at the American Embassy in Rome. He was also an aide to senior officials including then-Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke. He left the State Department in 1998 for the private sector.

Mr. Levinson says his marriage ended in the early 1990s in a divorce that took more than 12 years and $1 million in legal fees to resolve. Toward the end of the battle with his ex-wife, Mr. Levinson was laid off and spent 18 months looking for work. In July 2003, Mr. Levinson and his second wife filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection, citing liabilities of nearly $400,000.

After the demise of Custer Battles, Mr. Levinson says he saw Danubia as a way to ensure a steady income for himself and former colleagues. He says Messrs. Custer and Battles agreed to effectively give him the company's Iraq assets as a reward for past work. "It was a kind of severance package," he says.

The new company quickly got off the ground. Custer Battles's remaining security contractors and support staff were summoned to the small office housing the firm's Baghdad operations center. They were told their positions were being eliminated but they could apply for identical positions with Danubia, Mr. Levinson says. Virtually all of them went to work for the new company, he says.

Several Danubia employees had their salaries paid from Custer Battles bank accounts until at least the end of May, according to bank-account statements.

Mr. Levinson says Danubia was actually paying the salaries but the money was funneled through Custer Battles's accounts to take advantage of the established firm's payroll system. Mr. Cullen, whose responsibilities as a consultant to Danubia are similar to those he had at Custer Battles, didn't reply to emails seeking comment.

David Douglass, a lawyer representing Custer Battles in its bid to get the jury verdict against the company overturned, says Custer Battles and Danubia are separate entities. "Custer Battles sold Danubia some equipment and some of its people went to work for Danubia in Iraq, but you're talking about two completely different companies," he says. Messrs. Douglass and Levinson say Messrs. Custer and Battles have no link to Danubia.

Danubia decided to focus its operations on volatile western Iraq, the scene of near-daily violence, marking a shift from Custer Battles's work around Baghdad. Marines stationed in western Iraq employ logistics companies to deliver supplies, and the logistics firms hire security firms to guard their convoys.

Danubia's business strategy called for undercutting rival security companies. Danubia general manager Amy Clark -- who held a similar position with Custer Battles -- says other companies charged $15,000 per convoy, while Danubia charged just $7,500. "We told people that we were the Target of security, not the Nordstrom's," she says.

The firm won a series of government-related contracts worth $1.28 million per month, according to internal Danubia emails.

Just two months after taking over Custer Battles's assets, Danubia itself sought a buyer, hoping an infusion of cash would help it meet payroll and other obligations. The suitor was Windmill International, a Virginia-based financial-services firm run by Douglas Combs, who had served as a special assistant to acting Secretary of the Navy Hansford Johnson in 2003. On May 26 of last year, Windmill International put out a press release announcing that it had "acquired a major shareholding in Danubia."

The announcement was premature. As Windmill International executives carried out their final due diligence, they grew alarmed about the murky nature of Danubia's ties to Custer Battles. "It began to feel like a shell game," says Christopher Johnson, Windmill International's attorney.

Hoping to salvage the deal, Mr. Levinson met in July with Windmill International's chief operating officer, Peter Majeranowski, in downtown Bucharest. Mr. Majeranowski says in an interview that Mr. Levinson had the demeanor of a "beaten man laying all of his cards out on the table" during the three-hour session, which ended close to midnight.

Mr. Levinson says he told Mr. Majeranowski that Danubia was unable to make its payroll in Iraq or raise money to expand the business because of its perceived ties to Custer Battles. He says he cited the example of a Kurdish security company that claimed Custer Battles owed it several hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Levinson says the Kurdish company was withholding payments it owed Danubia as a way of recovering the disputed funds. He added that Danubia's then-general manager in Iraq resigned after continually being presented with bills that belonged to Custer Battles.

Mr. Majeranowski says he felt sympathetic to Mr. Levinson personally. "He kept saying that he wasn't a wealthy guy and that he needed the job, and I never felt like he was being dishonest," Mr. Majeranowski says.

Still, after the meeting, Mr. Majeranowski told colleagues in an email that Windmill International should "pull out and pull out hard" of the deal, because of potential legal and operational problems posed by Danubia's association with Custer Battles. The company ended the negotiations with Danubia in late August.

A Crisis Hits

DOJ_NMG_0035436

Danubia managed to generate enough revenue to keep operating in Iraq. Two months ago, crisis hit. On the morning of April 10, a long convoy of supply trucks guarded by Danubia personnel left the Camp Victory compound near Baghdad's international airport. The convoy was bound for an American military outpost outside Fallujah.

When the convoy approached a bridge in Fallujah, a roadside bomb tore into one of the security vehicles, puncturing its tires, destroying its bulletproof windshield and wounding the head of the Danubia security force and another Danubia guard, according to Danubia reports of the encounter. The vehicles limped into a military compound outside the city to regroup, then made their way to their original destination, a American military outpost on the other side of Fallujah called Taqqadam.

Later that afternoon, as the convoy attempted to return to Baghdad, the vehicles were hit by a trio of roadside bombs. They pushed forward to a small Marine checkpoint, where they took sniper fire from a nearby mosque and machine-gun fire from a passing vehicle full of Iraqi police officers, Danubia said later. The Danubia team suffered four more casualties. A wounded Pakistani truck driver was dragged away by insurgents and several of the gravel trucks were destroyed.

The Danubia team made its way through Fallujah, and linked up with a second Danubia convoy to make the return trip to Baghdad. What happened next is subject to dispute. In an account submitted to the U.S. military, a Danubia security guard said uniformed Iraqi National Guard personnel and men on nearby roofs wearing ski masks fired at the convoy as it tried to enter the Baghdad airport complex. The Danubia personnel returned fire and finally made it back to the Danubia base in Baghdad that evening, thinking the incident over.

It wasn't. The following day, a convoy belonging to a second Western security company was stopped by Iraqi National Guardsmen who said they were looking for a group of security contractors who had killed one of their officers the day before, according to an internal military investigative report compiled in the aftermath of the clashes. The Iraqi personnel later told military investigators Danubia had fired on them without provocation because it mistook them for insurgents, according to U.S. military officials familiar with the investigation. The Iraqis said that Danubia personnel killed three Iraqi officers, including a high-ranking colonel, according to the military investigative documents.

With Iraqi officers killed, possibly by Americans, the U.S. military told Danubia that it was opening a formal probe into Danubia's conduct in Fallujah and suspending the company from operating in western Iraq. Danubia was warned that personnel trying to evade the ban would be arrested by the U.S. military and detained for up to two weeks.

Ms. Clark, the Danubia general manager, says the military has yet to tell her the details of its investigation. Danubia's formal suspension was lifted after about a month, but when Danubia has sought routine clearance to operate convoys in western Iraq the military has refused, she says. Ms. Clark left for the U.S. and is unsure if she will return to Iraq. The company has reduced the number of employees in Iraq to 12 from 70.

But Danubia remains active in the country, providing teams of Western bodyguards to protect American and British engineers charged with repairing and modernizing Iraq's electricity infrastructure in and around Baghdad. Ms. Clark says the company is looking for new work and hoping the military will soon allow it to resume its security work in western Iraq.

Prosecution Urges Death For Saddam (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Prosecutors in the war crimes trial of Saddam Hussein recommended Monday that the former Iraqi dictator be sentenced to death for his role in a “revenge” attack on a mostly Shiite village in the 1980s.

“The prosecution asks for the maximum punishment against these defendants,” chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi said during closing arguments.

“They showed no mercy for women, children, and even the trees were not safe from their oppression. The law calls for the death penalty and this is what we ask be implemented,” al-Moussawi said.

“Well done,” Saddam said sarcastically, a grin spreading across his face.

The attack followed a failed attempt on Saddam's life when his convoy passed through Dujail in 1982. Forty-six people from the village died from torture or the harsh conditions of imprisonment, al-Moussawi said. Saddam's Revolutionary Court also sentenced 148 people to death after a “show trial in which the defendants did not appear and had no chance for defense,” he said. Farms and homes in Dujail were razed.

Al-Moussawi also recommended the death penalty for Barzan Ibrahim — Saddam's half-brother and head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency — and former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan.

Al-Moussawi asked for leniency for three other defendants and for dismissal of charges against Mohammed Azawi Ali, a former Baath Party official from Dujail, because of a lack of evidence. He left it up to the courts to decide a punishment for Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of Saddam's Revolutionary Court.

DOJ_NMG_0035437

The 8-month-old trial is adjourned until July 10, when the defense will present its closing arguments. A panel of five judges will then determine the defendants' fate by majority vote. The defendants can appeal.

The defense has argued that the crackdown on Dujail was justified, even while denying the scope of the sweep that the prosecution portrayed.

Arduous Hussein Trial Winding Up (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD

As they began the closing phase of an often-troubled trial, Iraqi prosecutors Monday called for death sentences against Saddam Hussein and three former aides for crimes against humanity that "spread corruption on earth and where not even the trees escape their oppression."

Chief Judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman held firm control of a court that has sunk into disarray and farce at times during the eight months it has heard the case of Dujail, where 148 people were killed after a 1982 assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein.

The trial was designed to bring justice to a nation starved of it during a generation of Hussein's authoritarian rule. But ending that era, and instilling new faith in the rule of law among Iraqis, is proving difficult in the face of insurgency, chronic insecurity, and sectarian bloodshed - not to mention courtroom antics that have often been more comical than judicial.

Hussein, with a graying beard and hair apparently dyed black, sat poker-faced Monday, occasionally cracking a bemused smile. When the prosecutor finished his arguments, Hussein muttered sarcastically: "Well done."

The Dujail case is the first of a string of cases against Hussein and the former regime, most of greater magnitude. They include the gassing of Halabja that killed 5,000 Kurds in 1988, and the Anfal campaign against the Kurds in northern Iraq that same year, which left some 100,000 dead and 4,000 villages destroyed.

Investigators are continuing to unearth mass graves as they collect evidence for subsequent proceedings. Already they say they have documented evidence of more than 100,000 victims from an anti-Shiite crackdown after the 1991 Gulf War.

"I think in the future, the cases will get better ... the evidence will be better," says Zuhair al-Maliky, former head of the Central Criminal Court of Iraq. "In my opinion, Dujail is the weakest case. I would not use that as a starting point for the tribunal."

If Hussein is found guilty, the verdict will be appealed, but the sentence could be carried out before other cases are heard.

Experts say this trial has not been conducted according to international standards, a concern raised when the decision was first made to hold it in Iraq. The global import of similar cases has led to international tribunals, beginning with the Nuremburg trials of Nazis to more recently ones for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in The Hague and in Tanzania.

But some observers argue that this process has been uniquely Iraqi, and has enabled Iraqis to own and be closer to the outcome. Omar, a mechanic in Baghdad, is glued to the proceedings. "It's a show" he never misses on TV, he says.

Monday, chief prosecutor Jafar al-Musawi told the court that, "The suffering of the Dujail people turned their days into night.... It peaked when Saddam Hussein visited them on July 8, 1982. What followed were barbaric and cruel and savage acts."

Those included an execution order for 148 villagers, though a document from Hussein's intelligence service noted that "of those who were sentenced to death, 46 ... had been eliminated or died during the investigation." Beyond that "harsh torture," prosecutor said, nearly 400 people were held in the desert for four years, and the aerial bombing of Dujail orchards "led to murder."

The prosecutor said the attack was "motivated by revenge," and cast doubt on whether an assassination attempt took place at all. "This was not a criminal investigation, but a military operation ... that led to the death of women, children, and elderly men," Mr. Musawi said. "Even the trees did not escape."

The prosecutor called for the "maximum punishment" for the former Iraqi leader, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan, and the former head of the Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamid al-Bandar.

The prosecution also called for charges to be dropped against farmer Mohammad Azzawi Ali, and "minimum" sentences for the three other low-ranking defendants. The defense team will make its closing arguments on July 10, after which the five judges will consider their verdict.

The air of relative civility that prevailed in the courtroom Monday masked a messy trial that has seen the murder of two defense lawyers, defense boycotts, the resignation of a chief judge, and long political speeches by the defendants that have only been reined in since Judge Abdel-Rahman took control last January.

The quiet image of the men in the dock stood in stark contrast to scenes after the regime was toppled in 2003: scores of mass graves; more than 900 individual graves near Abu Ghraib, crippled survivors of Halabja, and a nation damaged by more than two decades of war and sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0035438

In court Monday, the name "Saddam" rang out again and again, as the prosecutor and lawyers sought to punch holes in the defense team's case that all acts were legally carried out.

One lawyer, who could not be named or shown on the time-delayed TV, said the "so-called assassination attempt ... was imaginary," and that the regime had violated UN conventions on human rights and genocide.

Another lawyer said some testimony was faked, referring to confessions from four defense witnesses that they lied under oath.

Indeed, defense witnesses have often made contradictory or strikingly consistent statements. That was the case last Tuesday, when three former Hussein bodyguards, testifying from behind a curtain, each said the target car had been marked by a woman who had just slaughtered a sheep, using her bloody handprints. Each said the presidential convoy halted 50 yards after coming under gunfire from an orchard on the left. Each said that they heard Hussein issue orders to halt return fire.

"My understanding is that he did not want a single animal to be injured," the witness said. When asked by a defense attorney if such a man could ever order revenge, he replied: "I know the president has such high moral standards; his conscience would not allow him...."

At that, the judge dropped his head into his hands, clearly disgusted.

Such exchanges have kept Iraqis tuned into the 35 sessions so far. Several members of one family laughed about an exchange last week, when defendant Ibrahim complained that two guards were afraid to testify. "Afraid of whom? Ghosts?" asked Abdel-Rahman. "Afraid of this terrifying court," replied Ibrahim. "They're afraid to talk to you anymore." "You're terrifying," the judge shot back.

Within minutes, Ibrahim was removed from the court as defense lawyers cried: "They're assaulting him ... beating him!"

"Defense lawyers ... made a stupid strategy ... of challenging the legitimacy of the court," says Judge Maliky. "Instead of discussing evidence, they say: 'This court is illegal. This judge is illegal.' "

"They've done it for publicity," he charges, "to say: 'I was the lawyer of Saddam.'"

Iraqi Prosecutor Formally Seeks Death Penalty For Hussein (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — The chief prosecutor asked an Iraqi judge Monday to put deposed dictator Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, capping months of grim testimony over the alleged 1982 massacre of Shiite Muslim villagers.

Lead prosecutor Jaafar Mousawi also urged the death penalty for two co-defendants: Barzan Ibrahim Hasan, a half brother to Hussein and Iraq's onetime intelligence chief, and former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan.

"The prosecutor general requests from the court to issue the most severe punishment against them," Mousawi told the judge in his closing arguments. "They did not have mercy on either the elderly or the children."

The prosecutor also urged that Awad Hamed Bandar, the former head of Hussein's Revolutionary Court who doled out death sentences against the villagers, be punished for the killings. But he did not specifically call for the death penalty.

Hussein and seven co-defendants were charged with carrying out a campaign of arbitrary arrest, torture, forced deportation and killing against the people of Dujayl, a predominantly Shiite village north of Baghdad where the former president survived an attempt on his life in 1982. Prosecutors describe a witch hunt that culminated with 148 people, including elderly residents and scores of children, being put to death without fair trials.

The prosecutor asked the judge to dismiss charges or "minimize the punishment" in the cases of four defendants. All were local officials at the time of the assassination attempt, and were described in testimony as relatively powerless figures with little choice but to follow orders from Baghdad.

Hussein broke into a broad grin and chuckled to himself as Mousawi urged Chief Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel Rahman to impose the death penalty on him. The former president has frequently been an avid participant in his own trial. Watching the testimony unfold from the witness box, Hussein has interrupted regularly to offer his guidance to the judge or pontificate on the nature of justice.

The case is the first in a series of trials planned against the former dictator and his deputies. The Dujayl trial, which opened last fall, is scheduled to reconvene July 10 with closing arguments by the defense.

In keeping with the often sweeping historical tone of the arguments, Mousawi opened his statement Monday by invoking the hardships suffered by Iraqis under Hussein. He painted the Dujayl victims as icons of an entire nation, symbols of uncounted oppression.

"The people in the old times passed through dark times and calamities," he said. "The people of Dujayl lived through the darkest nights, they suffered injustice and oppression. Their troubles began with the visit of Saddam Hussein to their town."

DOJ_NMG_0035439

Prosecutors have described years of retribution and collective punishment suffered by the people of Dujayl. Even the town's farmlands and orchards were destroyed by government forces, they say. Women and children were banished into the desert.

Both prosecutors and defense lawyers have sought to justify their position by painting opposing versions of Iraq's past.

The defense team has tried to downplay the punishment of the people of Dujayl by portraying the brutality as self-protection carried out by a threatened government. The lawyers have pointed out that Iran and Iraq were at war at the time of the assassination attempt and have accused the Shiite-led government in Tehran of collaborating with Iraqi Shiites to kill Hussein.

By invoking Iranian involvement and directing sharp accusations at Iraq's Islamic Dawa Party, a onetime opposition group that is at the center of Baghdad politics in the new, Shiite-dominated Iraq, defense lawyers have tried to portray the violence as a justified act of war.

Defense lawyers also have disputed the number of dead, contending that some of the 148 victims named are still alive.

Each side has accused the other of paying cash to witnesses in exchange for conveniently twisted narratives.

The prosecution has dismissed the assassination attempt as a few bullets fired by renegade gunmen. At times, prosecutors and their witnesses have even contended that there was no attempt on Hussein's life, that the shots came from villagers firing their guns in the air to celebrate the president's visit.

"The alleged assassination attempt against Saddam involved only eight to 15 bullets fired from behind a wall," Mousawi told the judge Monday. "It was proved there were no heavy weapons. If it had been an assassination attempt, it would have been a suicide mission."

The people were caught under a brutal and relentless regime, prosecutors said. Some of the people didn't live long enough to be formally executed, Mousawi said, because they were tortured to death in prison.

The prosecutor reviewed documents alleging that intelligence officers met to discuss the punishments of the villagers. He traced signatures and telephone conversations into the highest reaches of Iraq's government at the time, listing documents that appeared to indicate Hussein knew what had happened to the people of Dujayl.

"The court procedures at the time that followed, were they applied legally?" Mousawi asked. "The procedures pursued were cruel and harsh."

Prosecutor Seeks Death For Hussein (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 19 -- The chief prosecutor in the trial of Saddam Hussein rested his case Monday with a dispassionate recounting of the deaths of 148 people from an Iraqi village, then a call for the ultimate penalty against the former Iraqi president and two subordinates.

"They showed no mercy for women, children, and even the trees were not safe from their oppression," said prosecutor Jafar al-Mousawi in a Baghdad courtroom, a hint of bitterness entering his voice. "The law calls for the death penalty, and this is what we ask be implemented."

"Well done," Hussein muttered sarcastically from his seat a few feet away.

The trial on charges of crimes against humanity -- the killing of residents of the Shiite Muslim village of Dujail after a failed assassination attempt on Hussein there -- entered its final phase with the prosecution recommending sentences for the eight co-defendants. The prosecutor also called for the deaths of Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half-brother and the former Iraqi intelligence chief, and Taha Yassin Ramadan, the country's former vice president.

The prosecutor said a fourth defendant, Awad Haman Bander, a judge who presided over a court that issued death warrants for the people in Dujail, should also be sentenced for murder, but he did not explicitly say what that sentence should be. The prosecutor asked Judge Raouf Abdel Rahman to abandon the charges against three of the remaining four defendants and reduce the sentence of the fourth.

Since it began in October, the Hussein trial has endured frequent disruptions. Defendants walked out and mocked the trial as illegitimate. Judges resigned and two defense attorneys were assassinated. The court adjourned after Monday's session until July 10, when the defense will offer its closing statements.

In previous sessions of the trial, Hussein's side has variously maintained that the executions were a legal, and legitimate, response to an attempt on the life of a head of state and that many people said to have been killed are in fact still alive.

The Dujail killings are the first acts for which the deposed president is being prosecuted. He is separately accused of leading a chemical attack that killed an estimated 5,000 ethnic Kurds in the town of Halabja in 1988 and of ordering a brutal crackdown on a Shiite rebellion after the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

DOJ_NMG_0035440

Monday's session began with attorneys for the families of the dead villagers reviewing their evidence against Hussein. They said that in July 1982, a convoy carrying Hussein came under fire from an orchard in the village, but they played down the incident's significance. One attorney denied it entirely: "The assassination attempt was merely an imaginary, Machiavellian invention by Saddam Hussein," the attorney said.

In response to the gunfire, the prosecutor said, Hussein launched a "widespread, systematic attack against civilians" that included firing on the village from helicopters, draining and bulldozing orchards, and arresting hundreds of people.

Those who survived the initial attack and alleged torture in prison, the prosecutor said, were referred to a revolutionary court in an order signed by Hussein. After a two-week trial in 1984, at which none of the defendants was present, the court ordered 148 people to be put to death by hanging -- an order that was confirmed by a presidential decree two days later, according to the prosecutor. In all, 48 people ages 12 to 19 were killed, he said.

"The court was a fake, imaginary court," the prosecutor said.

He said Ibrahim, as the head of Iraq's intelligence service at the time, led the brutal investigation. According to the prosecution, Bander issued the death sentences for the 148 people and Ramadan received direct orders from Hussein to use his militia to lead the operations in Dujail.

Ramadan "ordered the officials in Dujail to destroy the houses and loot the property and destroy the orchards, which left the people of Dujail living in poverty," the prosecutor said. "Ramadan watched the operation from a hill."

In the courtroom, the prosecution described the Dujail killings as genocide and violations of U.N. human rights conventions and Iraqi law. The prosecution said that at least a dozen other people still in hiding are wanted in connection with the killings.

Prosecutor In Hussein Trial Calls For The Death Penalty (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 19 — Saddam Hussein uttered only two laconic words — "Well done!" — on Monday as the chief prosecutor at his trial demanded that Mr. Hussein and three top associates be given the death penalty for their role in the persecution of a mainly Shiite town after an assassination attempt Mr. Hussein said was made against him there in 1982.

Mr. Hussein's riposte echoed his attitude throughout the eight-month trial, at which he has frequently said that the outcome has been predetermined by American and Iraqi officials. During the trial, the 69-year-old former Iraqi ruler has said several times that he expected the death penalty, that the prospect held no fears for him and that, in any case, he has "escaped death" so often that he expected to do so again.

The prosecutor also demanded death sentences for Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half-brother and former chief of the Mukhabarat, the secret police; Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former vice president and leader of a militia known as the Popular Army associated with Mr. Hussein's Baath Party; and Awad al-Bandar, former chief judge of the Revolutionary Court, which handed down death sentences for 148 residents of Dujail, a town 35 miles north of Baghdad that was at the center of the brutalities described at the trial.

Jaafar al-Moussawi, the prosecutor, urged the acquittal of Mohammed Azawi, one of four low-ranking Baath Party members from Dujail who were charged as accomplices. He said the judges should "minimize the punishment" of three other defendants, Abdullah Ruwayid, his son Mizhar Ruwayid, and Ali Dayeh Ali. They were accused by the prosecution, along with Mr. Azawi, of helping Mr. Hussein's secret police round up townspeople after the shooting during Mr. Hussein's visit to Dujail.

With his mitigating arguments on behalf of the four Dujail men, Mr. Moussawi narrowed the court's focus to Mr. Hussein and his three associates. They are charged with crimes against humanity for offenses that included the executions; the deaths under torture of 46 men and youths who had already been killed when Mr. Bandar's court sentenced them to death; the deportation of 399 other townspeople, including women and children, to a remote desert detention camp; and the razing of a vast acreage of orchards and date palm groves around Dujail.

Mr. Moussawi said the trial had shown that falsification was central to everything Mr. Hussein and his associates did. He said evidence had shown that even the assassination attempt had been faked, with a weak volley of gunfire aimed at Mr. Hussein's motorcade from a nearby orchard as it passed through Dujail set up in advance to justify cracking down on Shiites at a time when Mr. Hussein had begun a war with Shiite-ruled Iran. "The assassination attempt was a Machiavellian invention by Saddam Hussein," he said.

Similarly, he said, the trial presided over by Mr. Bandar had been "a trial only on paper." He said it had been a proceeding with no defense lawyers, no presentation of evidence, few written records, no appeals and 20 youths among the 148 sent to the gallows who were under the legal age of 18 for execution. On top of this, he said, were the death sentences passed on 46 people who had already been killed, which he described as "a sort of second death sentence."

DOJ_NMG_0035441

At the session on Monday, Mr. Hussein was mostly, and uncharacteristically, subdued. With the Dujail trial now in its closing stages, and less than a month remaining before the judges are expected to adjourn to consider their verdicts, he listened intently, in his shapeless gray suit and tieless white shirt, to the prosecutor's summary of the evidence against him and his associates, occasionally stroking his bearded chin or taking notes on a yellow legal pad. Even his ritual insistence that the court recognize him as Iraq's lawful president was stilled.

The prosecutor said Mr. Hussein's actions, and those of his associates, fit the international standard for crimes against humanity, a "widespread and systematic" persecution of a civilian population. He said Mr. Hussein ordered the roundup of civilians in Dujail, and, directly or through bodies he controlled — including the presidential office and the Revolutionary Command Council of the Baath Party — approved the executions, the promotion of intelligence officers involved in the crackdown, and the destruction of the Dujail orchards and groves.

Citing the Nuremberg trials of Nazi leaders that followed World War II, Mr. Moussawi said Mr. Hussein and his associates had no right to claim immunity, as they have before the court, for actions taken in their official capacity. He said Mr. Hussein — "this criminal," as he referred to him more than once — met the standard of "command responsibility" set down at Nuremberg. "He was responsible for these crimes, either because he knew about them, or because they were carried out under orders he had personally approved," Mr. Moussawi said.

The prosecutor cited several provisions in Iraqi criminal law as it stood under Mr. Hussein — including Section 406a, still valid — that provided the death penalty for premeditated murder. "The prosecution asks for the maximum punishment for these defendants," he said. "They showed no mercy, even for women or children, and even the trees in the orchards were not safe from their repression. The law provides the death penalty for these offenses, and we demand it be applied in the cases of these men."

Officials of the special court, known as the Iraqi High Tribunal, have said that any death sentences upheld on appeal will be carried out by hanging. But that eventuality, at least for Mr. Hussein, could still be many months, or even years, away.

He has already been identified as a defendant in a second case, involving the killing of 50,000 Iraqi Kurds in the so-called Anfal military campaign that began in 1988 and involved chemical weapons attacks and wholesale purges that sent entire village populations to execution in mass graves. That trial is expected to begin while the Dujail case is in recess later in the summer.

The Shiite leaders who now dominate the government have said they want Mr. Hussein and his associates to go to trial in a third case under preparation, involving the killing of at least 100,000 Shiites when Mr. Hussein put down an uprising in southern Iraq that followed the Persian Gulf war in 1991.

Prosecution Seeks Death For Saddam (WT/AP)

By Bushra Juhi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The prosecution demanded the death penalty for former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein in its closing arguments yesterday, saying he had shown "no mercy" in the killings of women and children during a crackdown on Shi'ite Muslims in the 1980s.

After a three-week recess, the defense gets to sum up its case, then a panel of judges will begin weighing the fate of the ousted leader and his seven co-defendants.

A U.S. official close to the court said the judges could take about 60 days in their deliberation, meaning verdicts likely would be announced in late September or early October. The official spoke on the condition on anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the court.

If Saddam is convicted and sentenced to death by hanging, it could be months before the sentence is carried out. The defendants have the right to appeal, and Saddam faces a second trial for a military campaign against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s that killed about 100,000 people.

No date for that trial has been set, and Iraqi officials have not said what will happen if the appeals from the first case run out while the second is going on.

The courtroom largely was silent throughout the three-hour session yesterday as chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi delivered his final arguments concerning the 1980s crackdown on the Shi'ite town of Dujail. Saddam, dressed in a black suit, sat calmly alongside his fellow defendants and occasionally took notes.

Mr. al-Moussawi reviewed the evidence against each man, then concluded by asking for the death penalty against Saddam, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim, who was the head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency at the time, and Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former senior regime member.

DOJ_NMG_0035442

"The prosecution asks for the harshest penalty against them, because they spread corruption on earth. They showed no mercy even for the old, for women or for children; and even the trees were not safe from their oppression," he said. "The law calls for the death penalty, and this is what we ask be implemented."

"Well done," Saddam muttered sarcastically.

Mr. al-Moussawi also sought a death sentence for Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of Saddam's Revolutionary Court, which sentenced 148 Shi'ites to death. The prosecutor said Mr. al-Bandar's actions "supported the crimes" committed by the others and asked that he be sentenced under articles of the Iraqi criminal code for premeditated murder, which calls for the death penalty.

The prosecutor asked for lenient sentences for three defendants -- Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid; his son, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid; and Ali Dayim Ali -- saying they committed their "acts to carry out orders issued by their superiors."

He urged the release of the final defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, saying the evidence against him was not sufficient.

Many of Iraq's Shi'ite majority and Kurdish minority are eager to see Saddam and his cohorts executed in revenge for the oppression of their communities by his Sunni-dominated regime.

But the perceived fairness of the trial will be a key question. Many Sunni Arabs see the court as a case of "victors' justice" carried out by the Shi'ites and Kurds, who have dominated Iraq's government since Saddam's fall in 2003.

Iraq, As Seen Through 9 Lives (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

With all the spin surrounding Iraq, figuring out just what is going on there can be difficult. But one of the most valuable measures, as any war correspondent can attest, is the quality of life for the people caught up in conflicts.

That is why a recent diplomatic cable from Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is so telling. Marked "sensitive" and obtained by The Washington Post, it paints a compelling picture of how nine Iraqi employees of the U.S. Embassy live when they are outside the fortified safety of the Green Zone.

Quite apart from their bravery — just disclosing that they work for the Americans can be a death sentence, and most don't even tell relatives — their descriptions of life at neighborhood level suggest fundamentalists and militias are fast obtaining the kind of power that destroys governments. To whit: "The central government, our staff says, is not relevant; even local mukhtars (leaders) have been displaced or coopted by militias."

The reported details — filed just hours before President Bush's upbeat surprise trip to Iraq — underscore the uphill battle faced by the fledgling Iraqi government and U.S. forces, the limited time they have to assert control, and even whether that is still possible. For example:

· Women are increasingly warned to wear head-to-toe coverings.

· To better survive, employees "adopt the clothing, language, and traits" of other neighborhoods when they visit them.

· Electricity is still maddeningly intermittent — often as little as one hour in six.

· Increasing ethnic and other tensions among staff, as well as despair, mirror the broad social fragmentation. Many Iraqis, one said, even accuse the United States of punishing some populations as Saddam Hussein once did.

Nine lives do not tell the story of an entire country, nor is the cable reason to bring troops home. Other measures paint a brighter picture. Nevertheless, for those who wonder whom to believe in Iraq, the U.S. ambassador reporting privately about the lives of the Iraqis closest to him is a source that can hardly be ignored.

Culpability Deficit Disorder (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Ever since Thomas Riley Marshall, Woodrow Wilson's vice president, uttered the immortal phrase "What this country needs is a really good five-cent cigar," people have felt challenged to better it. So if you Google the phrase "what this country needs," you will find that it needs many things, including a national architect, better infrastructure or this peach of an idea from Will Rogers: "dirtier fingernails and cleaner minds." Allow me, though, a suggestion that applies to the war in Iraq: Ritalin.

This drug for attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) is sorely needed. ADHD explains why few seem to challenge the call to continue the mission in Iraq, apparently forgetting that the mission has changed and no one is quite sure what it is now. It explains why after just 100 hours the first President Bush concluded the Persian Gulf War with Saddam Hussein still in power and his helicopters slaughtering rebellious Shiites and Kurds. And it explains why the Carter, Reagan and first Bush administrations so ardently supported Hussein and then -- an administration later -- made it U.S. policy to topple him. We were always forgetting the kind of guy he was.

DOJ_NMG_0035443

ADHD also explains why we are still fighting in Afghanistan almost five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that launched the war against the Taliban. It's because our attention got diverted from the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda, which had attacked us, to Iraq, which had not. Take two pills for this one.

Finally, ADHD explains -- if anything possibly can -- why the United States went into Iraq with virtually no idea of what to do the day after the war was essentially won. Not only did the United States lack the patience to do nation-building -- what to do with the army, the police, the Baath Party? -- but it would not even supply the troops to secure government offices and ministries. Widespread looting broke out; public property was not protected. "It is not exaggerating to say that the United States may have lost the war on the very day it took Baghdad, April 9, 2003," writes Peter W. Galbraith in his forthcoming book, "The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End."

This is just the latest book to detail the virtually inexplicable: how Washington screwed up so badly in Iraq. But since Galbraith starts his book by reviewing previous administrations and their dealings with Iraq, it also serves as a useful antidote to the current infatuation with so-called foreign policy realists. These are the supposedly hard-bitten, pragmatic, realpolitik guys who eschew dreamy moralism and ask, always: What's in it for us? They include, prominently, President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state, James A. Baker, and his national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft. Neither of them, it is often said, would have taken us to war again in Iraq.

Yes indeed. But they did give Hussein every reason to believe he could get away with anything he wanted. The first Bush administration, as with the Reagan administration before it, was ever solicitous of the Kurd-gassing Hussein, and it later reacted with torpor as Iraq mobilized for its invasion of Kuwait. Even after the United States had gone to war, Bush ended hostilities prematurely, preferring to leave Hussein in power rather than deal with an unruly Iraq. The "realists" unrealistically set the stage for the next gulf war. I agree with Galbraith: Had the first Bush and the blustery Norman Schwarzkopf ("You fly, you die," he said of Iraqi helicopters. They did and they didn't.) applied a bit more pressure, the Iraqi military would have taken care of Saddam Hussein. This appalling "realism" resulted in the murder of thousands of Shiites.

The first rule of warfare is kill your enemy -- or make sure, in some way, that he can no longer do you any damage. The first Bush administration ignored that rule with Saddam Hussein and now the second one has ignored it with Osama bin Laden. It allowed this mass murderer to escape, and he will come back to haunt us; it is what he lives for. Bin Laden does not suffer from ADHD.

As any ADHDer can tell you, it is the moment that counts. What comes next or before is over the horizon. This is particularly true in a sound-bite, bitterly partisan era in which it is possible to say "cut and run" and think (or pretend) you have actually said something. It's easy enough to say that America's leaders suffer from ADHD, but on the basis of all this, it's apparent that so do we all. We always forget to hold them accountable.

Pass the Ritalin, please.

Revived Taliban Waging 'full-blown Insurgency' (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, June 20, 2006

PANJWAI DISTRICT, Afghanistan — In their biggest show of strength in nearly five years, pro-Taliban fighters are terrorizing southern Afghanistan — ambushing military patrols, assassinating opponents and even enforcing the law in remote villages where they operate with near impunity.

"We are faced with a full-blown insurgency," says Pakistani journalist Ahmed Rashid, author of Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil & Fundamentalism in Central Asia.

Four and a half years after they overthrew the Islamic militia that had controlled much of Afghanistan, U.S.-led forces have been forced to ramp up the battle to stabilize this impoverished, shattered country. More than 10,000 U.S., Canadian, British and Afghan government troops are scouring southern and eastern Afghanistan in a campaign called Operation Mountain Thrust.

Even before fighting heated up this spring, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, warned Congress that the insurgents "represent a greater threat" to the pro-U.S. government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai "than at any point since late 2001."

More than 500 people — mostly insurgents — have died since mid-May in the fiercest fighting since the fall of the Taliban regime. Since Operation Enduring Freedom began in October 2001, more than 300 U.S. troops have died, 165 of them killed in action. NATO's 36-country International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) has lost 60.

Despite the damage they can do, the insurgents do not have enough support to topple Karzai, who was elected two years ago and enjoys international support. "We are not in a situation yet where the Karzai government is threatened," says Joanna Nathan, Afghan analyst for the International Crisis Group, a non-profit research organization. But in places where they are strong, the insurgents have been able to harass government operations and relief efforts — so much so that reconstruction has come to a virtual standstill in the south and east.

DOJ_NMG_0035444

"It is hurting us," says Afghan Finance Minister Anwar ul-Haq Ahady. "We build a school, and they come and they burn it. We build a clinic, and they come and burn it. We build a bridge, and they knock it down. Security is the No. 1 issue."

The fear is that an ungovernable Afghanistan will revert to what it was before the overthrow of the Taliban: a failed state that can spread instability across Central Asia and be used as a launchpad for international terrorism. "If the Taliban get their way, Afghanistan will again become a training camp for terrorists," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told CBC, Canada's public broadcaster, this month.

The influence of the fundamentalist Islamic militia is obvious in Panjwai district, in the heart of Taliban country. Villagers on this dry, dusty plain 15 miles west of Kandahar say they are trapped between the Taliban and the U.S. and Afghan troops hunting them. If they cooperate with the coalition or with the Afghan government, they risk Taliban reprisals.

Just outside Makuan village here, Noor Mohammed, deputized as a security guard at a radio tower, goes to work in plainclothes. "If I wear a uniform, they will kill me," he tells Canadian army Capt. Jonathan Snyder, 24, who is patrolling the area two days after a Canadian convoy was ambushed nearby. Snyder is exasperated: "You shouldn't fear for your life," he tells the frightened man. "They should be fearing for their lives because of you."

The insurgency is a loose alliance of Taliban guerrillas, followers of former prime minister and fundamentalist warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, al-Qaeda terrorists recruited from across the Islamic world, opium traffickers and local fighters whose murky motives are rooted in tribal politics.

Taliban commander Mullah Dadallah told al-Jazeera television last month that the insurgents can call on 12,000 fighters. In an interview, Taliban leader Naseeruddin Haqqani says there also are hundreds of suicide bombers. The Taliban's claims probably are exaggerated, Rashid says, but they can draw on hundreds of fighters.

The insurgency began a few months after U.S.-led forces drove the Taliban out of the Afghan capital, Kabul, in November 2001. It became more effective two years ago, when insurgents switched to new tactics, including breaking up into small groups of 10 fighters or less, attacking "soft" civilian targets and limiting head-on confrontations with coalition and Afghan troops.

Like their counterparts in Iraq, the insurgents use the Internet to pick up tips on making roadside bombs, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, has said. They increasingly rely on suicide bombers. Writing in The New York Review of Books this month, Rashid noted 40 suicide attacks in the past nine months vs. five in the previous five years.

Insurgent leaders — such as Taliban spiritual leader Mullah Mohammed Omar; Jalaluddin Haqqani, father of Naseeruddin Haqqani; and Hekmatyar, who heads the radical Islamic Hizb-i-Islami group — "do not exert power the way a military general does," Seth Jones, an analyst for the California-based think tank RAND Corp., wrote in the spring edition of the journal Survival. Instead, they leave "tactical and operational" control to local cells, "which act as franchises."

Al-Qaeda, which supports the insurgency with training, supplies and occasionally manpower, operates much the same way.

The loose alliance opposed to the Karzai government and the U.S.-led reconstruction of Afghanistan has gained strength because:

·The insurgents have found sanctuary in Pakistan, "fairly brazenly" staying "beyond the reach of Afghan and international security forces," Nathan says. Pakistan's powerful spy agency, the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), supported the Taliban against rival Afghan factions when the fundamentalist movement formed in the mid-1990s. Pakistan's military regime wants to counter the separatist instincts of Pashtun tribesmen who live in both countries. The government's pro-Taliban policy changed under U.S. pressure after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Rashid says Pakistan has done nothing to eliminate Taliban forces operating openly out of Baluchistan, a Pakistani province opposite southern Afghanistan. The reason, he says, is that the Baluchistan insurgents are "pure Taliban" — remnants of the ISI-supported fundamentalist regime that ruled most of Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001. The insurgents based in Waziristan, by contrast, include many foreign jihadi fighters and members of al-Qaeda — fighters the United States has pressured Pakistan to pursue. "That suited the Pakistanis quite well," Rashid says.

·Ordinary Afghans won't risk their lives to support Karzai's government, which many view as weak and corrupt. Afghanistan's problem is "not necessarily the strong enemy," Eikenberry said in Washington last month. "It's the very weak institutions of the state."

The government also is widely seen as corrupt and dominated by warlords linked to the bloody civil war during the 1990s. "Day by day, corruption, bribery and narcotics go up," says Noor ul-Haq Ulumi, a member of the Afghan parliament from Kandahar. "Weak governors we have every place. They think only about their benefit, not their country's benefit."

DOJ_NMG_0035445

·The United States and its allies have scrimped on money and manpower, critics say. Rashid says Iraq has distracted the United States from the difficult tasks of subduing the Taliban and rebuilding Afghanistan. “For Afghanistan, the results have been too few Western troops, too little money and a lack of coherent strategy,” Rashid wrote in The New York Review of Books.

According to RAND, international aid to Afghanistan equals $57 per person, compared with $679 in Bosnia and $206 in Iraq. RAND also found that Afghanistan has one soldier for every 1,000 people vs. seven in Iraq, 19 in Bosnia and 20 in Kosovo. RAND's Jones reckons Afghanistan needs 200,000 Afghan and foreign troops and police officers to establish order. The country has about 120,000.

Insurgents test the resolve of NATO forces in the process of taking over combat responsibility from U.S. forces in southern Afghanistan. The incoming NATO commander, British Lt. Gen. David Richards, insists NATO forces “will deal most robustly” with insurgents.

Rashid says the rules of engagement are “incredibly unclear.”

“They bifurcate NATO into countries that will fight and countries that won't fight, and that's a dangerous thing,” Rashid says.

The insurgents are eager to bloody the NATO newcomers, to find out which ones will fight and to target those that won't. “This is a testing time, a transition time, and is likely to be messy,” Nathan says.

Insurgents “are betting that the West doesn't have the political will to remain in Afghanistan for the long run,” Jones wrote. “Proving them wrong is the key challenge.”

Sending troops to back Karzai's government and keeping them there is “a sacrifice worth making,” Nathan says. “Sept. 11 demonstrated what happened last time the international community abandoned Afghanistan.”

Afghan Guerrillas Kill 32 With Ties To Legislator (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 19 — Suspected Taliban guerrillas in the southern province of Helmand ambushed and killed 32 people on Sunday, all of them relatives and tribesmen of an influential member of Parliament, among them a former local government official, the legislator said Monday.

The attack, in broad daylight, was the latest sign of the strength of the suspected Taliban insurgents in Helmand, a poppy-growing province where NATO and the Afghan Army have recently increased their troops in an effort to contain the spreading insurgency.

The legislator, Dad Muhammad, who was the intelligence chief of Helmand after the fall of the Taliban and is now an elected member of the upper house of Parliament, said his 15-year-old son and two of his brothers, one a former chief of the Sangin district, were killed in the fighting, which lasted most of Sunday.

Another son of Mr. Muhammad was among five people wounded, he said. Ten more people were missing and thought to have been abducted by the insurgents. All of those killed were relatives or supporters, he said.

Mr. Muhammad and the brother who was the former district chief have worked to rid the area of the suspected Taliban insurgents, who are believed to be in league with drug traffickers in the poppy trade.

"We buried 32 people," he said. "Ten are missing. They are in Taliban hands, we don't know if they are dead or alive." He ruled out a personal vendetta, though, and said the Taliban had about 2,000 fighters in the area.

Mr. Muhammad, speaking in Kabul, said it was too dangerous for him to travel to his home. His surviving relatives were now under siege from the Taliban in their home in the town of Sangin, he said.

The attack took place a mile outside Sangin, a mile or two from a military base where British and Afghan Army troops are stationed, but neither the local police nor the military came to their aid, he said. It was unclear whether the military knew of the attack.

Mr. Muhammad said he had been told that the attackers first ambushed the car of the brother who was the former district chief at 7 a.m. as the brother was returning home with four other family members. When his second brother, Mr. Muhammad's sons and tribesmen came to the brother's aid, he said, they were also attacked and fought a fierce battle until 3 p.m.

In Tribal Pakistan, A Tide Of Militancy (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan -- In North Waziristan, barbers are ordered not to shave off beards, and thieves have been swiftly beheaded. In Swat, television sets and VCRs have been burned in public. In Dir, religious groups openly recruit teenagers to fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan. In the Khyber area, armed squads have burst into rooming houses, forcing people to pledge to obey Islamic law.

DOJ_NMG_0035446

A tide of Islamic militancy is spreading across and beyond the semiautonomous tribal areas of northwest Pakistan that hug the Afghan border, despite the deployment of some 70,000 Pakistani army troops there, according to a variety of people with close family, professional or political ties to the tribal regions.

Senior army officers in this provincial capital say they are making steady progress in pacifying the restive tribal belt and reining in religious extremists, who U.S. and Afghan authorities say have fomented much of the violence that has led to more than 500 deaths in Afghanistan in the past two months.

"We have them on the defensive now," Lt. Gen. Mohammed Hamid Khan, commander of the 11th Army Corps, said in an interview. "The miscreants have gone into their shells, and things have cooled down tremendously." Khan said the army had shifted from mass raids to "snap operations" based on intelligence and now controls key towns once in the hands of militants.

But other observers say the army's aggressive efforts since 2004 have backfired, alienating the populace with heavy-handed tactics and undermining the traditional authority of tribal elders and officials. They say the local Taliban movement, which has close ethnic and theological links to the Taliban across the border in Afghanistan, has won new supporters and been able to carve out enclaves of alternative power.

"Things are starting to spin out of control," one Western diplomat in Islamabad said of the tribal areas, which have historically been deeply conservative. "In some areas, it's beginning to look like they are setting up a government within a government."

The tribal areas are off-limits to foreign visitors, including journalists, except for periodic, brief helicopter visits with military authorities. But in recent interviews here, tribal lawyers, educators and politicians with knowledge of events in the areas described growing fundamentalist influence and intimidation that is spilling beyond the sparsely inhabited tribal zones and edging closer to settled, government-run localities.

In the past six months, they said, dozens of tribal elders and officials have been killed, including an uncle of the current provincial chief minister. Fundamentalist clerics have freely used FM radio stations to preach holy war and set up public recruiting offices in towns such as Dir and Bannu just outside the tribal areas. Music stores have been shut down and thieves executed before crowds.

"North and South Waziristan are in the grip of Talibanization" and all of the seven federally administered tribal agencies "can come under its grip, too," said Afrasiab Khattak, a human rights activist and official of the secular Awami National Party. "The army has put up an honest fight, but it has failed, and the government has failed. The traditional system has been made ineffective, and the Taliban have moved into the vacuum."

One university instructor, who comes from South Waziristan, said that when he visited a year ago the area was blanketed with army troops, but that when he went back several months ago for a funeral, not a uniformed soldier was in sight while armed men in Taliban-style turbans patrolled in trucks. He asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation.

"The situation is not what the government says," he said. "The Taliban are totally in control. The people welcome them and the youths idolize them. There is no government, only the security forces who kill people. The Taliban settle disputes and deliver justice on the spot. The tribal areas are becoming nurseries for the Taliban, and the army can't stop it."

Last week, the discovery that a journalist in North Waziristan had been assassinated generated expressions of alarm and protests in multiple cities. Hayatullah Khan, who had been missing since December after reporting that the United States appeared to have staged a missile attack on Pakistani soil, was found shot in the head and handcuffed. Officials blamed religious extremists, but Khan's relatives and others said they suspected Pakistani intelligence agencies were behind his killing.

Many government critics here accuse the intelligence services of fomenting religious extremism in the tribal areas as a means of keeping Afghanistan unstable and vulnerable to Pakistani control. Senior Afghan officials, including President Hamid Karzai, have also made such claims, which Pakistani officials deny.

"In my view, stability for Afghanistan is the best thing for Pakistan," said Hamid Khan, the army corps commander. "All the turmoil there affects us; we get the refugees, the criminals, the drugs, the weapons. The miscreants have much safer sanctuaries on that side than on ours. If we want strategic depth, better we should have good relations than instability."

The Pakistani army has suffered numerous casualties since it entered the tribal areas two years ago under pressure from Washington to crack down on Islamic radicals. There have been repeated bloody clashes with tribal militiamen and, more recently, a spate of roadside bombings and one suicide bombing that targeted an army convoy. Visitors to the conflict zone describe soldiers as being largely confined to their outposts.

Until recently, most religious violence was limited to North and South Waziristan, the poorest and most isolated of the tribal areas, where Islamic fervor has always been strong. Although a recent truce has calmed South Waziristan, the fundamentalist fervor now seems to be erupting in other parts of the region.

In Swat, a peaceful agricultural valley, Islamic preachers persuaded people to hand over their television sets in May and burned stacks of them in public. In the Khyber Agency, a prosperous commercial area that straddles a major highway into

DOJ_NMG_0035447

Afghanistan, armed followers of an Islamic preacher burst into shops and lodging houses in early June, demanding at gunpoint that people pledge to follow Islamic law. In the ensuing clashes with another religious militia, several dozen people were killed.

"There are elements that have decided to create Taliban enclaves and to 'Waziristanize' the other tribal agencies," said Khattak, the human rights activist. "The government says it is taking action, but it is not. The source of the problem is here, not in Afghanistan. If such a bloody drama can happen in Khyber, it can happen anywhere."

Even in Peshawar, a huge city with a landscaped military district and a modern university, support for the revived Taliban movement is evident among students and worshipers at numerous mosques. Secular politicians say the militant fervor is being encouraged by the Islamic political parties that dominate the provincial government.

On a recent Friday, men emerging from prayer services said they were upset about army attacks on civilians in tribal areas and worried that U.S. forces in Afghanistan would enter Pakistan as well. One man, an English teacher, said the U.S. forces were "savages and barbarians" while the Taliban were "religious scholars and sincere people."

Another man with a black turban and bushy beard proudly identified himself as a former Taliban member who had fought in the capture of Kabul in 1996. Today, he said, the same conditions of lawlessness and immorality have returned on both sides of the border, demanding new action.

"Under the Taliban there was peace, there was order, there was justice. Now our people are facing cruelty, injustice and crime. It has all come back, and it cannot be allowed to continue," said Wahidullah, 32, who runs a religious academy for boys. "If I didn't have other responsibilities now, I would love to join the fight again."

Pulling No Punches In Push For Navy SEALs (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

CORONADO, Calif. -- As Navy Ensign Brandon lay slapped by wave after black wave of frigid Pacific surf, his arms linked with a row of other would-be Navy SEALs, a cold but comforting thought surfaced from his murky consciousness: "No matter what," he reassured himself, "they're not going to kill me."

Shaking uncontrollably in the cold brine, the slight, 22-year-old from Ohio dreaded the nighttime "surf torture" as one of the toughest ordeals of the SEALs' aptly named Hell Week, designed to break down the bodies and wills of all but the steeliest young men.

Today, one of the Pentagon's main dilemmas is how to get more candidates such as Brandon to outlast the trials of selection -- without lowering standards -- as it tries to expand the ranks of SEALs and other elite U.S. military forces for critical missions in the war on terrorism.

Facing their biggest deployments in history, as much as 80 percent of the combat forces of the 53,000-strong U.S. Special Operations Command -- including Navy SEALs, Army Green Berets and Rangers, and Delta Force operatives -- are committed in Iraq, Afghanistan and surrounding countries. That leaves too few for other vital missions, many of them clandestine, such as intelligence gathering and partnering with forces in nations where the United States is not at war, according to senior military officials.

Stepped-up war-zone rotations are cutting into training time, and shortages in the force mean hundreds of Special Operations jobs are unfilled, leading to more reliance on civilian contractors, they said.

"We as a nation are taking great risk" by having too few maritime commandos, said Rear Adm. Joseph Maguire, commander of Naval Special Warfare Command (NSWC) here. NSWC should have 2,200 SEALs but is undermanned by about 400 men on SEAL teams and scores of officers, he said.

The Pentagon in February announced a plan to add 13,000 more Special Operations troops to meet demands. But producing such highly skilled troops is not easy -- especially as war, low unemployment and negative health trends such as obesity shrink the military's overall pool of candidates.

Of all the elite forces, SEALs pose the biggest recruiting challenge. The Pentagon's goal is to add 500 new SEALs in the next two years. Maguire says 2010 is more realistic. But the number of SEAL applicants has dwindled by hundreds in recent years. This year's goal is to bring in 1,400 to try out, but by late April, only 364 had been sent to boot camp, according to Navy statistics. "We're behind the power curve," said Ed Kearl, a Navy recruiting official.

Ground zero for the push to create more SEALs is the rugged beaches and pounding surf off Coronado, where the young men of Basic Under Water Demolition/SEAL (BUD/S) Class 259 found out who had "the right stuff."The Start of Hell Week

It was a Monday night in May, about 24 hours into Hell Week for Class 259, and Seaman Brian was sitting on the beach next to his rubber dinghy, eating a chili-mac packaged military meal. For security reasons, all SEALs except senior leaders spoke on the condition that only their first names be used.

DOJ_NMG_0035448

Similar to the rest of his class, Brian had no sleep, was soaked and shaking. He had muscle cramps from lunging with 15-foot-long sandy logs. His legs were chafed raw. "It's like taking a piece of sandpaper to your skin for a week," said Brian, 23, who is from Ventura, Calif.

As the sky darkened, the entire group knew what was next -- surf torture (officially called "water immersion"), jumping on and off a pier and being hosed down with cold water.

Suddenly, Brian saw a friend stand and walk stiffly toward a bell hung on a wooden frame. Ringing the bell was how candidates dropped out. "Clang!"

"I was like, 'Wow,' " Brian said.

Next, shocking everyone, the Class 259 leader, known as the OIC or "officer in charge," got up. "Clang!" About 12 other recruits followed in a mass exodus. The class that started in March with 193 men was down to 100.

"It was a big psych for a lot of guys because our OIC left. That was hard," said Brian, who dropped out the next morning, his right leg swollen with tendinitis.

The buckling of the class leader underscored how difficult it is to predict who will make it. "They don't want to deal with the discomfort . . . it's kind of frustrating," said Capt. Christopher R. Lindsay, commander of the Naval Special Warfare Center. To help more pass, Maguire said they may eliminate some "water immersion" sessions.

Finding candidates in top physical condition also helps, but until recently, concerns over legal liability prevented potential recruits from being given a swim test. "They would get to boot camp and, 'Oh, by the way they can't swim,' " said Kearl, who said 70 percent of candidates were failing the test. "That's a big problem."

Now candidates must pass a 500-yard, 12 1/2 -minute swim test at the YMCA -- and do at least 50 sit-ups, six pull-ups, 42 push-ups and a 1 1/2 -mile run -- or lose their SEAL contract. Those who pass with minimum standards will earn a $1,000 bonus, and $2,000 goes to the best performers -- but still only 60 percent succeed.

Maguire is also asking SEAL instructors to be less subjective in disqualifying candidates. But having "given enough flags away" to the families of fallen SEALs, he says he can't compromise the highly competitive standards.

"Everything is a race," said Lindsay, as the seven-man teams hit the surf Tuesday in the red dinghies they carry everywhere.

"If you drop the boat, I will cut your head off!" shouted a veteran SEAL instructor as he ordered laggard boat teams to race around and around a building -- holding their boats on their heads. "Nineteen, 20, 21 . . . get back in line!" he barked to the slowest team.

Garrett, 23, of Hilo, Hawaii, felt his arms start to give way. "We would come in last, and obviously it was because of me," he said. Teammates complained. Instructors put another recruit in his place to show he was the "weak link."

Later Tuesday night, Garrett dropped out, adding another green helmet to the line representing those who failed.Staggering to the Finish Line

At 4:30 a.m. on Wednesday, the 79 remaining candidates staggered out of the mud flats of the 65-degree San Diego Bay, looking like a scene from "Night of the Living Dead."

"They're basically zombies," said Cmdr. Adam Curtis, looking on. Awake for 55 hours, the men could only shuffle. But they were expected to follow directions.

Brandon, a boat team leader, was having trouble.

"You're trying to cheat me, Sir," berated an instructor. Brandon's team had paddled their boat by hand instead of swimming beside it in the last race. Now, they would pay the price.

"Prepare down boat -- down boat! Prepare up boat -- up boat!" the instructor spat commands with a bullhorn. Next the offenders had to roll in the sand.

"We're going to have a little bath," the instructor said, ordering them into the bay. Each time a device beeped they bobbed underwater, green light sticks glowing eerily on their life vests.

Hell Week is designed to simulate the rigors of a combat mission. "They can't say 'I quit' because no one will come get them," explained Command Master Chief Lu, a 25-year Navy veteran and instructor. The end result, Lu said, is impressive. On a recent tour in Baghdad, he fought side by side with former SEAL students and found that "I trusted them as much as guys I was with 20 years," he said.

To qualify, over a six-month period SEAL candidates must swim 150 miles in the ocean and run more than 1,300 miles in sand wearing boots, and later they must learn to dive, parachute, shoot and conduct close-quarters combat.

Born from World War II underwater demolition units, Navy Sea Air Land teams focus on maritime skills, including diving, forced ship boardings, laying undersea charges and reconnaissance. But today, SEALs are occupied mainly on land. Most 16-man SEAL platoons are in Iraq training Iraqi forces, using snipers to watch for insurgents planting bombs and guarding Iraqi leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0035449

New missions, many secretive, are creating demands for a more diverse force trained in language and culture. "We are a relatively white, non-Hispanic force. It's nice to have someone who can blend in more," said Capt. Gary Bonelli, NSWC chief of staff. Class 259 has only a handful of minorities.

SEAL recruiters this year are attending dozens of events, such as wrestling matches and "X-games," manning a new call center, and offering a $40,000 bonus to all new SEALs, said recruiting chief Cmdr Duncan A. Smith.

Still, nothing can guarantee that recruits will have the tolerance for stress, flexibility and what Lindsay calls the "fire in the gut" that psychological studies show is critical.

By Friday morning, the class was down to 73, having lost a few more to pneumonia and injuries. In a finale, the exhausted recruits had to low-crawl from the beach to an obstacle course obscured with smoke and rocked by the blast of simulated grenades. Worming their way under concertina wire as instructors fired off blanks from rifles, they slid through a drainpipe into a muddy pool. Barely able to move his legs, Brandon dragged himself forward with his arms, third to last.

"You knew you'd never quit. . . . The courage, the mental toughness is contagious," Lindsay told the bedraggled class on the beach afterward. "You guys are what we want to work with to become Navy SEALs!"

"Hooyah!" Class 259 yelled.

Relaxing later in dry clothes with a pizza and Gatorade, the victorious few reflected on how they made it. "It's just putting one foot in front of the other," said Brandon, rubbing swollen calves.

Still shivering, Airman Brandon said that after his body broke down, his mind took over. "The main thing I thought about," he said, "was doing things that every guy dreams of doing, but few do."

Stress Disorder Seen Soaring Among Returning Troops (KRT)

By David Goldstein

Knight Ridder, June 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Veterans Affairs is on a pace to see nearly 20,000 new cases of post-combat stress this year among service members who've served in Iraq or Afghanistan, more than six times the number of cases that officials had expected.

The latest report on patient visits to VA medical facilities shows that nearly 5,000 service members were initially diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder during the first three months of this year, on top of nearly 5,000 new diagnoses that the VA had reported for the last three months of 2005.

The VA had predicted that it would see 2,900 new cases in fiscal 2006, which runs from Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 30, 2006.

The VA declined to comment Monday.

"The demand for mental health is not going down," said Cathy Wiblemo, the deputy director for mental health services at the American Legion. "It's definitely going up."

Knight Ridder reported last month that the VA had dramatically underestimated the number of service members who would return from Iraq and Afghanistan with post-traumatic stress disorder.

The new report drew immediate criticism from some in Congress.

"Frankly, I don't think that VA's budget planned for this number of new veterans with mental health concerns," Rep. Michael Michaud, D-Maine, a member of the House Veteran's Affairs Committee, said in a statement.

Post-traumatic stress disorder is an anxiety disorder that can cause serious psychiatric and social problems. Combat, a plane crash or other traumatic experiences can trigger it. Untreated, it can lead to drug addiction, homelessness and other social problems.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have been particularly stressful because they involve urban warfare amid civilians who are hard to distinguish from the enemy. There are no front lines or safe areas, and the enemy uses improvised bombs and ambushes.

A statement from the Democratic members of the House VA Committee said that even as the number of post-traumatic stress disorder cases increased, the VA had cut back the number of PTSD therapy sessions for veterans by 25 percent in the last 10 years.

In a related issue, the Government Accountability Office recently found that the Pentagon didn't seek further mental-health treatment for eight out of 10 soldiers deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan who showed signs of post-combat stress.

William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, responded that the GAO report was "flawed."

Iraq War May Add Stress For Past Vets (WP)

By Donna St. George

DOJ_NMG_0035450

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

More than 30 years after their war ended, thousands of Vietnam veterans are seeking help for post-traumatic stress disorder, and experts say one reason appears to be harrowing images of combat in Iraq.

Figures from the Department of Veterans Affairs show that PTSD disability-compensation cases have nearly doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of more than 260,000. The biggest bulge has come since 2003, when war started in Iraq.

Experts say that, although several factors may be at work in the burgeoning caseload, many veterans of past wars reexperience their own trauma as they watch televised images of U.S. troops in combat and read each new accounting of the dead.

"It so directly parallels what happened to Vietnam veterans," said Raymond M. Scurfield of the University of Southern Mississippi's Gulf Coast campus, who worked with the disorder at VA for more than 20 years and has written two books on the subject. "The war has to be triggering their issues. They're almost the same issues."

At VA, officials said the Iraq war is probably a contributing factor in the rise in cases, although they said they have conducted no formal studies.

PTSD researcher John P. Wilson, who oversaw a small recent survey of 70 veterans -- nearly all from Vietnam -- at Cleveland State University, said 57 percent reported flashbacks after watching reports about the war on television, and almost 46 percent said their sleep was disrupted. Nearly 44 percent said they had fallen into a depression since the war began, and nearly 30 percent said they had sought counseling since combat started in Iraq.

"Clearly the current Iraq war, and their exposure to it, created significantly increased distress for them," said Wilson, who has done extensive research on Vietnam veterans since the 1970s. "We found very high levels of intensification of their symptoms. . . . It's like a fever that has gone from 99 to 104."

Vietnam veterans are the vast majority of VA's PTSD disability cases -- more than 73 percent. Veterans of more recent wars -- Iraq, Afghanistan and the 1991 Persian Gulf War -- together made up less than 8 percent in 2005.

VA officials said other reasons for the surge in cases may include a lessening of the stigma associated with PTSD and the aging of the Vietnam generation -- explanations that veterans groups also suggest.

PTSD is better understood than it once was, said Paul Sullivan, director of programs for the group Veterans for America. "The veterans are more willing to accept a diagnosis of PTSD," he said, "and the VA is more willing to make it."

In addition, as Vietnam veterans near retirement age, "they have more time to think, instead of focusing on making a living all the time, and for some this is not necessarily a good thing," said Rick Weidman, executive director for policy and government affairs at Vietnam Veterans of America.

Max Cleland, a former U.S. senator from Georgia and onetime head of the VA who was left a triple amputee by the Vietnam War, said the convergence of age and the Iraq war has created problems for many of his fellow veterans -- as well as for himself.

"As we Vietnam veterans get older, we are more vulnerable," he said. When the war started in 2003, he said, "it was like going back in time -- it was like 1968 again."

Now he goes for therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and is wary of news from Iraq. "I don't read a newspaper," he said. "I don't watch television. It's all a trigger. . . . This war has triggered me, and it has triggered Vietnam veterans all over America."

PTSD has become a volatile topic lately, with some skeptics questioning whether the rise in claims is driven by overdiagnosis or by financial motives. A report last week from the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academies, concluded that "PTSD is a well characterized medical disorder" for which "all veterans deployed to a war zone are at risk."

VA's growing PTSD caseload became an issue last August, when the agency announced a new review of 72,000 PTSD compensation cases, expressing concerns about errors and a lack of evidence. That probe was dropped after a sample of 2,100 cases turned up no instances of fraud.

Still, some experts are not convinced that the Iraq war has driven up the caseload. "I'm skeptical that it accounts for a broad swath of this phenomenon," said psychiatrist Sally Satel, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "These men have had deaths in their families, they had all kinds of tragedies over 30 years that surely affected them emotionally but they coped with."

Although a small percentage of veterans might be deeply affected, she said, she doubts "they have become chronically disabled because of it."

Around the country, many veterans dwell on the similarities between the wars in Vietnam and Iraq: guerrilla tactics, deadly explosives, fallen comrades, divisive politics. The way they see it, "Iraq is Vietnam without water," Weidman said.

"We have people who have symptoms that they haven't had in a long time," said Randy Barnes, 65, who works in the Kansas City offices of Vietnam Veterans of America. For some, "the nightmares and flashbacks have been very hard to deal with," he said. Group therapy sessions are "much more crowded," he said, "with Vietnam veterans particularly, but now also with the Iraq and Afghanistan veterans."

DOJ_NMG_0035451

Barnes served as a combat medic in Vietnam from 1968 to 1969 and went into treatment only in the late 1990s. By the time the Iraq war started, he said, he felt steadier -- but then his symptoms ramped up again.

"Depending on what I saw or heard that day or read, I would have night problems -- nightmares, night sweats," he said. Sometimes, he said, he would roll out of bed and wake up crawling on the floor, "seeking safety, I guess."

A study published in February by VA experts showed that veterans under VA care experienced notable mental distress after the war started and as it intensified. While younger veterans, ages 18 to 44, showed the greatest reactions to the war, "Vietnam era VA patients reported particularly high levels" of distress consistently, the study reported.

Powerful images of war have revived combat trauma in the past. "Traumatized people overreact to things that remind them of their original trauma," said Scurfield, the PTSD expert in Mississippi.

When the movie "Saving Private Ryan" was released, World War II veterans sought mental health help in great numbers, said Wilson of Cleveland State. "It rekindled it all," he said.

Perfect Vision, Via Surgery, Is Helping And Hurting Navy (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BETHESDA, Md., June 17 — Almost every Thursday during the academic year, a bus carrying a dozen or so Naval Academy midshipmen leaves Annapolis for the 45-minute drive to Bethesda, where Navy doctors perform laser eye surgery on them, one after another, with assembly-line efficiency.

Nearly a third of every 1,000-member Naval Academy class now undergoes the procedure, part of a booming trend among military personnel with poor vision. Unlike in the civilian world, where eye surgery is still largely done for convenience or vanity, the procedure's popularity in the armed forces is transforming career choices and daily life in subtle but far-reaching ways.

Aging fighter pilots can now remain in the cockpit longer, reducing annual recruiting needs. And recruits whose bad vision once would have disqualified them from the special forces are now eligible, making the competition for these coveted slots even tougher.

But the surgery is also causing the military some unexpected difficulties. By shrinking the pool of people who used to be routinely available for jobs that do not require perfect eyesight, it has made it harder to fill some of those assignments with top-notch personnel, officers say.

When Ensign Michael Shaughnessy had the surgery in his junior year at the Naval Academy, his new 20-20 vision qualified him for flight school. And that is where he decided to go after graduating last month ranked in the top 10 percent of his class, rather than pursuing a career as a submarine officer.

"The cramped environment in submarines is something that turned me off," Ensign Shaughnessy, 22, said.

For generations, Academy graduates with high grades and bad eyes were funneled into the submarine service. But in the five years since the Naval Academy began offering free eye surgery to all midshipmen, it has missed its annual quota for supplying the Navy with submarine officers every year.

Officers involved say the failure to meet the quota is due to many factors, including the perception that submarines no longer play as vital a national security role as they once did. But the availability of eye surgery to any midshipman who wants it is also routinely cited.

"Some of the guys with glasses who would have gone to submarines or become navigators are getting the chance to do something they'd rather do, and the communities that are losing the people are not as happy about it as the aviation community, which is gaining better candidates," said Cmdr. Joseph Pasternak, the ophthalmologist who oversees the program at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda.

In the Naval Academy's class of 2006, 349 of the 993 midshipmen had the surgery, up from 50 five years ago, according to Naval Academy records. Fewer than 30 percent of the academy students whose eyes qualify for the surgery choose not to get it, and the number of holdouts is dropping every year, Commander Pasternak said.

Last week, a little after 10:40 a.m., Colin Carroll, a 21-year-old midshipman from Olney, Md., put anesthetic drops in his eyes and lay down under the laser as Capt. Kerry Hunt, a Navy doctor, and two assistants prepared to begin. "We're locking the laser on now," Captain Hunt told him.

Midshipman Carroll had originally hoped to enter flight school but discovered not only that his eyes were not good enough, but also that he was prone to kidney stones, ruling him out of aviation entirely. He said he was "resigned" to entering the Marine Corps or becoming an officer on a surface ship, neither an assignment requiring perfect vision.

But he decided to get the surgery anyway.

DOJ_NMG_0035452

By 10:49, both eyes were done, though extremely bloodshot, and Mr. Carroll walked out wearing sunglasses, declaring he could already see better.

The procedure used by the Navy, photorefractive keratectomy, or PRK, is different from the one used on most civilians. That approach, known as laser-in situ keratomileusis, or Lasik, requires cutting a flap in the surface of the cornea and then using a laser to reshape the cornea. But military doctors worry that the flap could come loose during combat, especially in a supersonic fighter.

So rather than slicing into the cornea covering, Navy doctors grind it away. The approach requires a longer recovery as the covering re-forms but leaves the eye more stable.

The Air Force also limits its pilots to PRK, but nonpilots can get either procedure; because most students admitted to the academy aspire to fly, and have already met strict vision standards, relatively few cadets have the surgery, compared with the number at the Naval Academy. Army personnel, including helicopter pilots and other aviators, are allowed to get either procedure.

One in every 200 midshipmen who has the surgery suffers initial complications, which can usually be corrected, Commander Pasternak said. A study by the Navy soon after the program began concluded that pilot trainees who had the surgery graduated from flight school at higher rates than other pilots, he added.

Now that most midshipmen meet the vision requirements, getting into pilot training is harder than ever, depending almost entirely on academic class rank, military performance while at the academy and other physical criteria.

Last year, 310 midshipmen competed for 272 flight training slots. Of those, 104 had undergone laser eye surgery.

"If we didn't have PRK, where would those 104 midshipmen have gone?" said Capt. Michael Jacobsen, of the Naval Academy's office of professional development. "Tough to say, but we know they wouldn't have gone into flight training."

Expanding the pool of potential pilots and members in the Navy Seals was the original goal of making the surgery available, Commander Pasternak said, but it has become increasingly popular with marines, who say it eliminates concerns that their glasses will be damaged or clouded in dust storms during combat in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We get at least five times as many requests every year as we can keep up with," said Commander Pasternak, a 1984 Naval Academy graduate who said he nearly left the academy after learning his eyes were not good enough to allow him into flight training.

The growing number of aspiring pilots has also made it harder to find candidates to become "back-seaters," officers who serve as navigators and weapons officers on planes, Navy officials say.

The failure to produce enough submarine officers, though, is the source of greatest worry to academy officials and the Navy as a whole. This year the academy's quota was 120, but only 88 midshipmen chose to go into submarines, according to academy records.

Acknowledging the decline, Capt. John R. Daugherty, the chief of staff in the Commander Naval Submarine Forces, said in a statement, "There are many potential contributing factors."

The shortfall in the submarine quota is made up from officers joining the Navy who do not attend the academy.

While there are no plans to restrict the availability of the surgery, some Navy officials concede that the procedure contributes to the submarine service losing midshipmen at the top of their class, like Ensign Shaughnessy, a native of Rochester, Minn., who formerly could not have gone to flight school.

Going into submarines "requires a lot more school, and after the academy a lot of people aren't looking to go to a high-paced environment for a long period," Ensign Shaughnessy said. "And some people also might see submarines as a less glamorous service assignment."

In recent years, many of the midshipmen to choose submarines have come from lower in the class rankings than they did a decade ago, said a senior Navy official who declined to release specific data and who was granted anonymity so he would discuss internal Navy personnel matters.

And academy graduates have been washing out of nuclear power school, which they must complete before being commissioned as a submarine officer, at an increasing rate over the last five years, according to the Navy official and an outside expert who has studied the issue.

In response, the Navy has begun offering $15,000 bonuses and other incentives to get midshipmen with better grades to join the submarine program.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Attorney Asks Black For More Bond Security (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Federal prosecutors in Chicago are demanding that former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, who was released on a $20 million bond last year, provide additional security to remain out on bail until his trial on fraud and racketeering charges next year.

In documents filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald says he is asking for more security on the bond because Mr. Black has failed to pay the mortgage on his Palm Beach, Fla., home -- which is part of his bail bond -- and "has provided false statements to the government about his financial assets."

Edward Greenspan, a lawyer for Mr. Black, said "there are numerous misstatements" and "numerous half-truths" in the documents. "The prosecution filed its material this morning with practically no notice about what allegations were going to be included," Mr. Greenspan said. Mr. Black has pleaded not guilty to the fraud and racketeering charges.

The bail dispute offers a glimpse into Mr. Black's finances since his ouster as head of Chicago-based Hollinger International Inc. Mr. Black's dealings at the company were first scrutinized by a board committee after shareholders complained about excessive corporate compensation and executive perquisites, such as a luxuriously outfitted private jet.

The government is seeking a forced sale of his oceanside Palm Beach estate because a payment due June 15 wasn't made on a $10 million promissory note that is secured by the mortgage on the property, the documents say. As a result, the interest rate on the loan was pushed up to 26% from 21%, and the government's ability to eventually recover equity from the property has been jeopardized, according to the documents.

In addition, the government is demanding that Mr. Black put up his stake in Horizon Operations Ltd., a closely held publisher of community newspapers that Mr. Black owns with former Hollinger lieutenant David Radler. According to the prosecutors, Mr. Black has been in discussions to sell his Horizon stake for $16 million.

A financial affidavit provided by Mr. Black at the time of his bail arrangements disclosed four Canadian bank accounts. But Mr. Black may be holding back on disclosing all of his assets, prosecutors argue. He recently paid taxes of about $460,000 on the Palm Beach house and made a donation of 500,000 Canadian dollars (US$446,000) to the Canadian Opera Company in Toronto, according to the documents. Mr. Black's bail conditions allow him to live in Canada, with trips to Chicago for court dates.

Mr. Greenspan is to file his response to the demand for new bail conditions Thursday, and Judge Amy St. Eve is expected to rule on the issue next week.

Black Broke Agreement On Bail Bond, U.S. Tells Court (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris

Bloomberg, June 20, 2006

June 19 (Bloomberg) -- Conrad Black's $20 million bail bond should be modified or revoked, U.S. prosecutors said, claiming the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman hadn't been honest about the value of assets securing his freedom.

Black overstated the value of a Palm Beach, Florida, home he pledged for bail, the U.S. said in a court filing and hearing. He understated a Canadian tax lien on the property and didn't disclose his wife was part owner, prosecutors said.

U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve delayed today's hearing until June 26. The government said Black, once among the world's largest publishers of English-language newspapers, should put up additional collateral or have his bail revoked. A former U.S. prosecutor said Black must take the possibility seriously.

``Judges tend to get angry when they feel a defendant is possibly playing games with the court," said Andrew Genser, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a partner at Kirkland & Ellis. ``Mr. Black's lawyers on June 26 would want to come in with an answer to these allegations that's convincing or have substitute assets ready to post."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Sussman said, ``We're here because Mr. Black is in default" on the property's mortgage, and asked the judge to order the publisher to put up ``untainted" collateral or lose his liberty.

Edward Genson, Black's lawyer, said in court that he received the government filing only this morning.

`Flat Out Wrong'

``A lot of things in there are flat out wrong," Genson told St. Eve. Black wasn't in the courtroom.

Black faces a trial next year on 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. The U.S. accuses him of using a Toronto holding company, Hollinger Inc., to enrich himself and his associates at shareholders' expense.

Prosecutors charged Black and others with pilfering $92 million from Hollinger International by moving the money through other companies they owned.

David Radler, former publisher of Hollinger's Chicago Sun- Times, pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0035454

Black was freed on bail in December 2005. As a condition of his release, he was required to put up the $20 million bail bond backed by the Palm Beach home and $8.5 million he made from the sale of a Park Avenue apartment in Manhattan.

The government already had targeted those assets in a forfeiture proceeding, arguing they were the fruits of his looting of Hollinger International.

In a separate filing, the Justice Department asked St. Eve to order the Palm Beach property sold so that the proceeds can be escrowed pending the outcome of the forfeiture proceedings.

Entitlement in Doubt

``In essence, the government agreed to allow defendant to post assets for which there was probable cause to believe defendant was never legally entitled to own," Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Siskel wrote in today's court filing.

Black told prosecutors the Palm Beach property was owned by his Conrad Black Capital Corp., Siskel said. The property was encumbered by a $10 million mortgage and a Canadian tax lien of C$13 million ($8.9 million) to C$14 million.

Black said, and prosecutors accepted as fact, that there was at least $8 million in equity remaining, the government said.

Prosecutors now say that Black owes the Canadian government more than C$16 million in back taxes, that he defaulted on the Palm Beach mortgage and that his wife is a part owner of the property. In court, Sussman questioned what, if any, equity Black still has in the property.

Genson, Black's lawyer, told the judge that Black's wife, Barbara Amiel Black, holds only nonvoting shares in Conrad Black Capital Corp. He offered prosecutors a chance to talk directly with Canadian authorities about the size of the lien.

Hollinger Founder

Black founded Hollinger and led it for eight years as a public company until he was forced out in November 2003.

Black at his height trailed only Rupert Murdoch and Gannett Co. among the biggest owners of English-language newspapers. Hollinger published London's Daily Telegraph, the Jerusalem Post and 60 percent of Canada's dailies.

Shareholders of Hollinger International last week voted to change the company name to Sun-Times Media Group Inc.

Black's trial is set to start on March 5.

The case is U.S. v. Black, 1:05-cr-00727, U.S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois (Chicago).

Denver Lawyer Could Sharpen Focus On Weiss In Milberg Probe (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 20, 2006

Federal prosecutors who indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman last month are in talks with a Denver lawyer whose testimony could sharpen the investigation's focus toward Melvyn Weiss, founding partner of the New York-based law firm, according to sources familiar with the government's probe.

Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles returned an indictment against Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, alleging that they obtained $216.1 million in attorney fees by paying $11.3 million in secret and illegal kickbacks to three individuals who served as lead plaintiffs in their cases. USA v. Lazar, No. 05cr00587 (C.D. Calif.).

Bershad and Schulman have taken leaves of absence from the firm.

Prosecutors have said that the investigation is ongoing, leaving open the possibility of additional indictments against Weiss and William Lerach, a senior partner who left the firm in 2004 to found San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

According to the indictment, a senior partner at Milberg Weiss met in 2003 with the Denver lawyer and agreed that a percentage of attorney fees in two cases would go to Howard Vogel, a retired real estate mortgage broker whose retirement fund or family members were serving as plaintiffs for Milberg Weiss. In April, Vogel admitted to charges in a plea deal that he provided false information in federal court and has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

According to sources familiar with the case, the senior partner at that 2003 meeting was Weiss, and the Denver lawyer was Gary Lozow, a shareholder at Isaacson Rosenbaum.

"Mr. Lozow is working closely with the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, and we expect that will continue," said John Walsh, a partner at Denver's Hill & Robbins who represents Lozow. He declined to comment further.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, declined to comment. Weiss' lawyer, Benjamin Brafman at New York-based Brafman & Associates, said: "There is nothing that Mr. Lozow could truthfully say that in any way implicates Mr. Weiss in any wrongdoing because Mr. Weiss did not ever knowingly violate the law."

LOOKING FOR A LINK

So far, prosecutors have failed to establish a direct link to Weiss and Lerach in their years-long investigation against Milberg Weiss. In February, prosecutors told both lawyers that they would not bring charges against them anytime soon.

Last summer, prosecutors indicted Seymour Lazar, an alleged paid plaintiff for Milberg Weiss, and his lawyer, Paul Selzer. In the past few months, prosecutors have obtained guilty pleas from Los Angeles lawyer Richard Purtich, who admitted taking payments from Milberg Weiss and passing them on to another paid plaintiff, and from Vogel, who along with his family is alleged to have received almost $2.5 million in kickbacks from Milberg Weiss.

In two cases involving Vogel, the indictment makes the most prominent references to "Partner A," who is believed to be Weiss, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

According to court papers, in June 2003, Milberg Weiss received $40 million in attorney fees in a class action securities case against Oxford Health Plans. Howard Vogel v. Oxford Health Plans, No. 97cv02325 (D. Conn.).

In September 2003, Vogel, whose retirement fund was a plaintiff in that case, sent a memo to Schulman stating that a lawyer, referred to in the indictment as "Vogel Intermediary A," would be calling the secretary for "Partner A" to arrange a phone call about the payments in that case. "Vogel Intermediary A" is believed to be Lozow, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

Vogel also wanted to discuss payments in a separate case in which his stepson was serving as a plaintiff against Baan Co., the indictment says.

In response, Schulman told Vogel that "Partner A" would not discuss the matter by phone, but that "Vogel Intermediary A" should meet with him in person at Milberg Weiss' New York office, the indictment says.

On Nov. 10, 2003, "Partner A" met with "Vogel Intermediary A" at the firm's New York office and "agreed that Milberg Weiss would pay Vogel a percentage of its attorney fees obtained in connection with Oxford Health and Baan," the indictment says. On Dec. 18, 2003, Milberg Weiss, Schulman and "Partner A" sent "Vogel Intermediary A" two checks, one for $1.1 million and one for $120,000. Those checks were wired to a bank account controlled by Vogel.

Schulman's lawyer, Herbert Stern, did not return calls seeking comment.

If Lozow agrees to plead guilty or sign an immunity deal with prosecutors, that would move the case one step closer to Weiss, say sources familiar with the investigation.

"They'd love to turn Lozow," said one lawyer familiar with the case who requested anonymity. "He'd make a great case if he came in and said, 'I conspired with Schulman and Weiss.'"

Father, Son Plead Guilty To SureWest Fraud (SACBIZ)

Sacramento Business Journal, June 20, 2006

A former treasury analyst for SureWest Communications and his father pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to charges that they had taken $2 million from the Roseville-based telecom company.

Arrested in early 2004 were former SureWest treasury analyst Jeffrey Wells, 31, of Roseville; his father, Larry Wells, 60, of Pebble Beach; and a business associate, Henry M. Kaiser, 59, of Piedmont.

The trio had been charged with illegally diverting several million dollars in SureWest cash and investment funds controlled by Jeffrey Wells to outside accounts to secure financing for Quivira Ventures, owned or controlled by the elder Wells and Kaiser.

The U.S. Justice Department said that the money transfers were made "so that Quivira could demonstrate to potential investors that it had sufficient funds on deposit to be a venture capital firm and thereby attract new investors."

Kaiser, grandson of industrialist Henry J. Kaiser, stepped down from the Kaiser Permanente board after he was charged. In April 2004, Kaiser admitted guilt to "interstate transportation of money obtained by fraud and conducting a monetary transaction in criminally derived property."

On Monday, Jeffrey Wells pleaded guilty to 10 counts of wire fraud, while his father pleaded guilty to two counts of wire fraud and two counts of engaging in transactions with criminally derived property.

"We're all happy to have begun to put this long and difficult chapter behind us," said Larry Wells' attorney, William Portanova of Sacramento. Sentencing is scheduled for Aug. 29.

It took less than nine months after the trio's arrest in 2004 for Roseville-based SureWest (Nasdaq: SURW - News) to regain all $25 million that the company said was misappropriated. All but $1.8 million was returned upon the arrests, and SureWest's insurer paid the rest, the company reported.

Fed Governor Olson To Head Accounting Board (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Ending months of regulatory uncertainty for the accounting industry, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday named Mark W. Olson, a Federal Reserve Board governor, to head the agency that regulates accounting firms.

DOJ_NMG_0035456

Mr. Olson's appointment to chair the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board is one of the most significant to be made by Mr. Cox since he took the helm of the nation's markets watchdog last year. The PCAOB oversees accounting firms that audit public companies and was formed in the wake of corporate scandals such as those at Enron Corp. Its creation ended decades of self-regulation by the accounting industry.

Mr. Olson, 63 years old, will become the PCAOB's second full-time chairman, a position that pays $615,000 annually. He fills the spot left vacant last fall by the resignation of the board's first chairman, William McDonough, also a former Federal Reserve governor. Mr. Olson will take over from acting PCAOB Chairman Willis Gradison, 77, a former Republican Congressman who will remain on the board.

Mr. Olson said in an interview yesterday that he wasn't going into the position with a preset agenda, although he expected that debate over how to implement rules related to companies' internal controls would continue as a big issue for the board. He said he expects to take up his new position in early July.

Mr. Cox also filled yesterday a second opening at the PCAOB, announcing that founding board member Kayla Gillan will remain in her seat. Ms. Gillan, a former general counsel to the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or Calpers, had continued to serve on the board since her term expired last fall. Board members earn $500,000 a year.

The selection of Mr. Olson to lead the PCAOB opens another seat on the seven-member Federal Reserve Board for President Bush to fill. All the existing board members are Bush appointees. Mr. Olson has been on the Fed board since December 2001 and has overseen administrative matters as well as chaired the Fed's committee on consumer and community affairs.

Although he has a banking background, Mr. Olson is a former partner with Big Four accounting firm Ernst & Young LLP. In addition, he was staff director of a Senate subcommittee overseeing the SEC, accounting issues and the insurance industry.

Lone Star Is Cleared In Probe Of KEB Deal (WSJ)

By Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

HONG KONG -- South Korean regulators cleared Lone Star Funds of any wrongdoing in its purchase of Korea Exchange Bank. Instead, they accused KEB's former management and several government agencies of mishandling the bank's sale in 2003, when many of the country's financial institutions were reeling from mounds of bad credit-card debt.

While exonerating Lone Star and allaying concerns that regulators would seek to nullify the deal, the report of the Board of Audit and Inspection does little to relieve the Dallas private-equity fund's other major worry: that it might have to pay full taxes on its profit from the sale of its KEB stake, to Korea's Kookmin Bank, once the sale is finalized.

That deal now awaits the conclusion of Korean prosecutors, who are conducting their own probe of the KEB transaction, including Lone Star's role.

Lone Star didn't return calls seeking comment.

The audit board's report, released yesterday, says KEB executives exaggerated the bank's losses at the time of the sale, understating its capital-adequacy ratio and deeming the bank "troubled," a designation that allowed a foreign buyer -- in this case, Lone Star -- to step in, speeding the sale. The audit board singled out KEB's chief executive at the time, Lee Kang Won, saying he undervalued the bank by making unrealistic assumptions.

Mr. Lee currently heads Korea Investment Corp., a state-run investment company set up last year by the Finance Ministry. KIC had no immediate comment.

In addition, the audit board said that regulators, including Korea's Ministry of Finance and Economy, gave approval without checking adequately to ensure that the bank's condition was truly dire. A Finance Ministry spokeswoman declined to comment.

The audit board's report comes as Korean business leaders and bureaucrats are being subjected to increased scrutiny. It was issued about a month after the indictment of Hyundai Motor Co. Chairman Chung Mong Koo, who stands accused of creating a "slush fund" used to pay for influence among government bureaucrats and financial-industry executives.

In carrying out its three-month investigation, the audit board summoned for questioning several current and former government officials, including Mr. Lee; Kim Seok Dong, deputy finance minister and former head of the Financial Supervisory Commission; and Byeon Yang Ho, former head of the Finance Ministry's banking policy bureau. Separately, Mr. Byeon was arrested last week on allegations he accepted bribes from a lobbyist for Hyundai Motor.

For Lone Star, a recommendation by the audit board that the 2003 KEB sale be quashed could have proved disastrous, as the fund's investors might have received little more than their principal sum in return. Under Lone Star's current plan to sell Korea Exchange Bank to Kookmin Bank, the fund and its investors stand to reap $4.5 billion in profit on a $1.2 billion investment.

But the prosecutor's probe remains, as does the tax issue.

DOJ_NMG_0035457

Foreign funds operating in South Korea, such as Lone Star, have largely avoided taxes by registering in offshore jurisdictions that have tax treaties with Seoul. The treaties are designed to give tax relief to foreigners, who then are expected to pay capital gains and other taxes in their home jurisdictions. But many of the jurisdictions in which the funds register don't levy capital-gains taxes. The tax issue has inflamed the Korean public, as foreign funds recently have reaped huge profits by cashing out of equity stakes bought on the cheap after the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis and Korea's subsequent widespread credit-card debt defaults.

Carlyle Group, for instance, initially didn't pay any taxes in South Korea after selling KorAm Bank to Citigroup Inc. in 2004 for $2.73 billion, a deal that more than doubled the fund's investment. The U.S. private-equity firm later paid an undisclosed sum after authorities last year conducted an audit of five funds, including Carlyle and Lone Star, slapping them with a combined assessment of $207 million. Newbridge Capital hasn't paid any taxes on its sale of Korea First Bank to Standard Chartered PLC.

Without tax-treaty protection, foreign investors who sell shares in South Korea pay either an 11% withholding tax on the proceeds, or 27.5% of capital gains, whichever is less. Lone Star has agreed to set aside about $700 million to cover any taxes resulting from the KEB sale.

Lone Star has said it is willing to pay some taxes on the KEB sale, but people close to the fund say it is likely to fight a full tax assessment.

Further weighing on Lone Star's reputation in South Korea, the firm's former head in the country, Steven Lee, has admitted to embezzling from the fund about $12 million over several years in a scheme that involved filing false invoices. Authorities are also looking into Lone Star's dealings in nonperforming loans.

Options Timing Raises Concerns Among Insurers (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The controversy over executive stock options has the insurance industry casting a wary eye at the liability protection it provides to corporate officers and directors, a development that could in some cases push premiums higher or reduce coverage for directors and executives.

At least three dozen companies are facing federal probes over whether they backdated or manipulated stock options, timing them to boost the payoff for executives. Shareholders in some cases have responded by filing lawsuits, and insurers are bracing for a slew of claims.

"The underwriters are obviously concerned that it's going to be a major source of claims," said John Schwonke, a senior vice president at ABD Insurance and Financial Services, an insurance broker based in Redwood City, Calif., that handles directors and officers, or "D&O," insurance for more than 100 publicly traded companies.

At this point, premiums haven't started to rise. But insurers have begun asking their own questions about the options practices of clients. Some, for example, are asking customers whether they have ever backdated options or received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission on the timing of grants.

"If we have any cause for concern, we may exclude the risk," said James Bronner, a senior vice president and chief underwriting officer for Chubb Specialty Insurance, a unit of Chubb Corp., one of the nation's leading D&O insurers. "If a company grants options on a different day each year -- and if that happens to be the 52-week low point for its stock each year -- we're going to be suspicious."

The scrutiny has the potential to shake up the market for D&O insurance, which is intended to protect top corporate officials from facing personal losses for decisions they make in their posts running companies. The insurance, usually paid for by the company, typically reimburses the company or its officials for expenses such as legal fees. No hard figures exist for the size of the D&O insurance market, but insurance-industry executives estimate it generates several billion dollars in premiums annually.

The D&O market saw considerable upheaval and a sharp rise in premiums in 2002 and 2003, in part because of accounting scandals at companies including Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. Cases such as those could be costly for insurers and, in some cases, directors. Eleven former board members of WorldCom, for example, agreed to pay $20.2 million out of their own pockets to settle a suit, and their insurers agreed to shell out another $35 million.

With new insurers recently entering the market and competing for D&O business, premium prices have generally fallen in the past two years after soaring amid the accounting scandals. Last year, U.S. for-profit companies paid about 18% less on average for D&O premiums than in 2003, according to an annual survey by Tillinghast, an insurance-industry consulting firm and a unit of Towers Perrin.

That survey found that a U.S. for-profit company with $5 billion in assets had D&O coverage of as much as $104.8 million on average. The average total premium for U.S. companies was $257,223.

DOJ_NMG_0035458

Prices are expected to rise again eventually because claims are becoming gradually more common and more expensive. The recent questions about the dating of stock options could be the precipitating event for a rise, said Elissa Sirovatka, the principal author of the Tillinghast survey. Increases could be focused in industries like technology, where the options practices of numerous companies are under scrutiny.

Shareholders have filed several lawsuits relating to options-granting practices. Two pension funds from Ohio filed suit in May accusing board members at UnitedHealth Group Inc. of allowing the "backdating" of stock options. A spokesman for UnitedHealth said the company will vigorously defend the lawsuit and continue to focus on customers and improving the health-care system. American Tower Corp. said last month that a shareholder had filed suit against some current and former directors related to past options-granting practices; the board has formed a special committee to evaluate the suit. American Tower declined to comment further.

It isn't clear how severely the D&O market will be hit by the evolving situation. Much depends on how many lawsuits are filed and the outcomes of those suits. That is unlikely to be known for months or years. Moreover, brokers say they would resist any attempts by insurers to limit coverage.

"The question really is: How widespread is the issue?" said John Doyle, a senior vice president at American International Group Inc., another underwriter of D&O insurance.

Companies generally grant options with a "strike" price equivalent to the share price when the grant was approved. In theory, the recipient will earn money if the company does well and the stock rises. Backdating -- moving the grant to a prior date when the share price was lower -- gives the recipient an instant paper profit, regardless of how the company performs.

"Just the sheer cost of defense" could be a significant concern even absent a major settlement, said Mr. Schwonke of ABD.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff May See Delayed Sentence (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

The Justice Department and attorneys for disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff have agreed to postpone for at least three months the day he has to report to federal prison — the latest sign that Abramoff's continued cooperation with an ongoing corruption probe in Washington, D.C., is proving helpful to prosecutors.

Abramoff had been scheduled to surrender himself to the Bureau of Prisons on June 29 to begin the 70-month prison sentence handed down by Judge Paul Huck of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. Abramoff and Adam Kidan, Abramoff's former business partner in a Florida-based gambling cruise ship company, pleaded guilty in January to mail and wire fraud in that case, and each received the same prison sentence from Huck.

Abramoff and Kidan also were ordered to pay a total of $21.7 million in restitution.

Justice officials and Abramoff's lawyers filed a joint motion with Huck on Friday night asking for a three-month reprieve for Abramoff, who is cooperating with federal prosecutors in an ongoing probe that has roiled official Washington.

Abramoff also has pleaded guilty in that case and faces as much as 11 years in prison after admitting to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials, although he has not been sentenced yet. Abramoff next meets with the judge overseeing the Washington case on Sept. 6. Whatever sentence Abramoff receives in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia will be served concurrently with the Florida charges.

It was unclear at press time whether Huck has approved the joint motion, which was filed after the federal court in Miami closed on Friday. Several calls to Huck's office were not returned.

Several sources close to the case believe Abramoff may not be required to begin his prison sentence in the Florida case until next year, depending on how the Washington corruption probe is progressing.

One lawyer who asked not to be identified said Huck "is not the kind of judge that will allow [Abramoff] to walk around" without an incarceration date, meaning that Huck could end up approving several 90-day extensions before the one-time lobbying superstar enters prison. A three-month extension from his current incarceration date would allow Abramoff to remain free until the end of September on the Florida charges.

Another issue for Abramoff's attorneys is where he will serve his prison sentence. Abramoff is an Orthodox Jew, and his lawyers have said they will seek to have him incarcerated at a federal facility where he can attend religious services, a source close to the case said.

Abramoff would like to be sent to a prison that would allow him to have some access to his wife and five children.

DOJ_NMG_0035459

Three other individuals close to Abramoff have pleaded guilty in the Washington corruption probe, and a fourth's fate is still being weighed by a federal jury, although none has been sentenced, much less received a date for his incarceration to begin.

Michael Scanlon, a one-time aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), pleaded guilty in November to conspiracy to bribe public officials and commit mail and wire fraud. Scanlon's sentencing has been postponed, and he will next appear before a federal judge in September to review the status of his case.

Tony Rudy, another DeLay aide, pleaded guilty in March to federal fraud and lobbying violations charges. His next court date is July 11.

Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), admitted in May to conspiracy to commit fraud and violating the one-year ban on lobbying by former top Congressional aides. His next court date is Aug. 10.

David Safavian, a former Bush administration official, is currently on trial in federal court for allegedly lying to federal and Congressional investigators over his relationship with Abramoff. At press time, the jury was deliberating the charges against Safavian. Volz appeared as a prosecution witness during Safavian's trial.

Hiring Trial Shown Alleged Clout List (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos, Rudolph Bush And Todd Lighty, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 20, 2006

A who's who of Chicago political power brokers and the job seekers they sponsored was unveiled Monday by federal prosecutors in the City Hall corruption trial.

The list of more than 5,700 politically connected job applicants became public as a longtime secretary in Mayor Richard Daley's office testified for federal prosecutors against former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich.

Although city officials insisted for years that they did not engage in patronage hiring, secretary Patricia Molloy said aides in the mayor's office kept track of job seekers and their political sponsors, beginning shortly after Daley's election in 1989 and during much of his 17-year tenure.

The names of the mayor's three brothers--Michael, John and William Daley--were entered into the database as sponsors of people seeking jobs or promotions, according to court records. Other sponsors on the list include longtime mayoral political strategist Jeremiah Joyce and former top aides Timothy Degnan, Victor Reyes and John Doerrer.

At least two applicants were described as friends of the mayor, and Gov. Rod Blagojevich also was identified as a sponsor of a successful job seeker on the list, which Molloy compiled between 1990 and 1997.

Sorich and three other former Daley administration officials are charged with rigging city hiring and promotions to favor applicants backed by the mayor's office. Prosecutors say the fraud scheme benefited the mayor's political organization and was intended to get around a federal court decree restricting patronage hiring.

The hiring of political allies fueled the infamous Chicago Democratic machine for decades, but patronage was supposed to have ended when the city agreed to the Shakman decree more than 20 years ago. Daley has said machine politics play no role in his dominance of local politics.

On Monday, a Daley administration spokeswoman said city officials declined to comment on Molloy's testimony.

Molloy, who lives in the Daley family's Bridgeport power base, was secretary to Sorich and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Testifying under a grant of immunity from prosecution, Molloy described how she kept computerized databases and paper files related to hiring at Intergovernmental Affairs.

The names on the lists came from pro-Daley political coordinators who visited Sorich at his City Hall office or called him at work, she said. Molloy said Sorich then relayed that information to her, and she used it to compile a database on a city-issued Compaq laptop.

The 59-page list entered into evidence Monday contained 5,743 names. There were columns for the applicants' names, race, Social Security numbers, the jobs that they wanted, and their political sponsors. Another column on the list, Molloy said, was used to record when the applicants received a city job.

A James Reilly was listed as "Friend-Mayor" and received a job in January 1990, according to the list.

City records show that Reilly joined the payroll on Jan. 22, 1990. In an interview Monday, he scoffed at the suggestion that he owed his job to political influence, saying he worked his way up from the bottom rung of the Cook County state's attorney's office.

"I've worked with the mayor for over 25 years and have a longstanding relationship with him," said Reilly, now the city's director of administrative hearings.

Daley brothers on list

William Daley, the Midwest chairman of JPMorgan Chase & Co., appears on the list as a sponsor four times.

Michael Daley, partner in the Daley & George law firm, pops up three times.

Cook County Commissioner John Daley, who leads the 11th Ward Democratic Organization, was listed as the backer of two applicants, including Paul Ready.

Ready, a $38.25-an-hour city hoisting engineer, said in an interview that he never went to John Daley or Intergovernmental Affairs for help in getting hired. Asked if he knew how his name ended up on the list from Intergovernmental Affairs, Ready said, "I do, but it's none of your business."

David Axelrod, a top political consultant to the mayor, appears on the list as the sponsor of David Woods. Axelrod acknowledged that he made a job recommendation for Woods after meeting him during pickup basketball games at a YMCA on North Halsted Street more than 10 years ago.

"Over time, we became friendly, and I learned a little about him," Axelrod said. "His goal was to become a bricklayer. It was a better-paying job."

Woods, who was a toll collector on the Chicago Skyway, volunteered to work on campaigns, but Axelrod said he did not care about that.

"I knew he was an African-American and he wanted to get a trades job," Axelrod said. "That's a good thing, since some of the trades traditionally have not been open to African-Americans."

Axelrod said he placed a call to Intergovernmental Affairs for Woods but does not recall whom he spoke to. Woods became a city bricklayer, records show.

Secretary of State Jesse White's name pops up on the list about two dozen times. Spokesman David Druker said White recalled a couple of the names on the list.

Druker said White did not remember whether he wrote letters to the mayor's office or placed calls on behalf of job seekers when White was county recorder of deeds.

"He told people that his recommendation would not guarantee them a job," Druker said. "He would never expect a government agency to do anything unethical or illegal in order to help someone get a job."

Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said applicant James Haskins wanted to return to work for the city after a stint in Blagojevich's congressional office, "so the governor was a reference for him."

Asked who, if anyone, Blagojevich contacted at the city to help Haskins get a city job, Ottenhoff said, "I have no idea."

Judging by the list, those with the most clout in city hiring during the 1990s included the pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization and the Coalition for Better Government, based on the Northwest Side.

Organizations had clout

Many job applicants were listed as enjoying the support of Reyes, the HDO leader who directed Intergovernmental Affairs from 1995 until 2000. Other high-ranking HDO members, including retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez and state Sen. Antonio "Tony" Munoz (D-Chicago), also were listed as sponsors.

Coalition for Better Government leaders Dominic Longo and Ron Calicchio sponsored dozens of applicants for jobs and promotions, according to the list.

Other sponsors named repeatedly include Ald. Isaac Carothers (29th Ward); Tom Dart, the Democratic nominee for Cook County sheriff; and former laborers union leader Bruno Caruso.

Several religious leaders appeared on the list as sponsors. Among them was Rev. Jack Wall of Old St. Patrick's Church, where the mayor attends services.

Molloy began working in the mayor's office shortly after Daley's election in 1989. She testified that she also kept paper records of hiring requests in Intergovernmental Affairs.

Molloy said she destroyed two cabinet drawers of those documents in 2002 at Sorich's request.

Under cross-examination by Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, Molloy said the process that she described began before Sorich joined Intergovernmental Affairs in 1993.

Molloy said she never told anyone outside Intergovernmental Affairs about the job lists. She said Sorich's predecessor, Michael Broderick, told her, "It was something that was not supposed to be done in the office."

Tribune staff reporters Robert Becker and Gary Washburn contributed to this report.

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

rrbush@tribune.com

tlighty@tribune.com

-page Clout List Is 5,000 Strong (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, FRAN SPIELMAN, MARK J. KONKOL AND TIM NOVAK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 20, 2006

Call it a Who's Who of city clout.

Excerpts of a list of more than 5,000 names that was never supposed to see the light of day were projected on a large overhead screen in federal court Monday as part of the criminal trial of Mayor Daley's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich.

The 60-page list gives the most detailed snapshot yet of politicians, powerbrokers and mayoral friends vying for city jobs or promotions for their families, friends and supporters.

The list was kept on the laptop computer of an employee at the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. Prosecutors contend it was part of a corrupt scheme to rig the city-hiring process to award city jobs and promotions to people doing political work for Daley.

Patricia Molloy, a former secretary of Sorich, testified Monday that the computerized list she kept ran from 1989 to 1997 and that Sorich later told her to shred paper copies of similar lists.

Prosecutors call the scheme illegal. Defense attorneys for Sorich and three other former city employees on trial contend their clients were following orders as part of a long city tradition and never intended to commit crimes.

The list released Monday shows the names of candidates for jobs or promotions. It notes in some instances what ward the person is coming from and often notes the person's political sponsor. The list is not clear on whether the candidates got their jobs or promotions, although in many instances they did.

Not all candidates fared well.

"Arrogant," read one note on a man seeking a city job. "Shot his own foot again."

11th Ward appears over 450 times

Three Daley brothers, Cook County Commissioner John Daley, former U.S. Commerce Secretary William Daley and Michael Daley are on the list as making a few recommendations for job seekers. Other job candidates are referred to on the list as friends of the mayor.

A secretary of Mayor Daley's offered names for job candidates, and one of his bodyguards, Sam Roti, tried to get his wife a city post too.

Current or former mayoral friends, including trucking magnate Michael Tadin and businessman Oscar D'Angelo, grace the list as sponsors.

The Rev. Jack Wall, pastor of Old St. Patrick's Church downtown, which Mayor Daley attends, recommended two people.

Daley's political base, the 11th Ward, came up more than 450 times as the sponsoring ward for job candidates.

Gov. Blagojevich, whose administration is accused of having its own clout list, is on the city list one time -- for referring his own employee for a city post back when Blagojevich was a congressman, his spokeswoman explained.

Cook County Sheriff Michael Sheahan is on the list for referring people. So is the man likely to replace him, the Democratic nominee for sheriff, Tom Dart.

Many times, the list is a family affair, with the clout-heavy trying to help family. Mayor Daley's former deputy aviation commissioner, Robert Repel, for instance, asked the city to hire his son, Michael, in July 1996. Seven months later, Michael Repel was arrested for breaking into a car. He pleaded guilty to burglary and was sentenced to three years in prison.

While on parole, Michael Repel, 33, was hired in November 1999 as a city laborer. He has a lengthy arrest record and once admitted to being a gang member.

Bruno Caruso, who was forced out as boss of Laborers' Union Local 1001 because of his alleged ties to organized crime, repeatedly asked city officials to give jobs and promotions to his union members as well as his family.

Caruso and the union sought jobs or promotions for several cousins as well as his cousin's wife. Caruso declined to comment on the list -- as did most people contacted.

"I don't have any comment on anything related to the trial," said Ald. Isaac Carothers (29th), whose name appeared on the list more than any other aldermen.

Carothers made his requests before becoming alderman. He was working as a high-ranking Streets and Sanitation official and was a key lieutenant in Daley's political army.

"I'm getting ready to leave on vacation. A man just pulled up to get me. I have to leave right now," Carothers said.

'All my guys were qualified'

A spokesman for Illinois Secretary of State Jesse White acknowledged White made some recommendations but always believed the candidates were qualified and never thought anything improper would be done to get them jobs.

Political operative Dominic Longo, of the controversial Coalition for Better Government group, made no apologies for going to bat for his people. "All my guys were qualified," Longo said.

Charles Bowen, who retired two years ago as Daley's liaison to black ministers, appears frequently as a sponsor.

"It wasn't for any benefit for me. It was because I thought somebody deserved a position," Bowen said.

"Why would I apologize for doing something I think is right? I wouldn't apologize for that. Absolutely not."

Contributing: Abdon M. Pallasch, Natasha Korecki

Ex-agent Testifies To Probe Of Bulger (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 20, 2006

Says Senate chief targeted in '83 case

A retired FBI official testified yesterday that then-Massachusetts Senate president William M. Bulger was the target of a 1983 FBI investigation that was compromised by leaks while his gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, was an FBI informant.

Robert Fitzpatrick, who was an assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI wanted to ``get" three of the state's top politicians at the time: House majority whip Vincent J. Piro , House Speaker Thomas W. McGee , and Bulger.

``He was the target, I believe," said Fitzpatrick, referring to William Bulger. But there was ``a leak situation, and it got tanked," he said. ``It just went down the tubes."

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, accepted a $5,000 bribe in 1983 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a mall developer trying to get liquor licenses, then returned it three weeks later. The bribe was to ensure Legislative approval of the licenses. Piro was recorded on tape saying some of the money would be used to ``grease a few guys." Piro argued government entrapment at trial and was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness at Piro's 1985 trial testified that Piro had demanded upfront money because ``I need to consider some people, like the speaker." McGee denied any involvement. He was never charged. No evidence surfaced against Bulger. Yesterday, Fitzpatrick didn't elaborate on why the FBI targeted him.

Boston lawyer R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and represented William Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's testimony ridiculous and said William Bulger's name has never previously been linked to the Piro case.

``It's absolutely ridiculous to suggest that Bill Bulger would have been involved in anything that would have amounted to impropriety, let alone a matter that would have been the subject of an investigation of this type," Popeo said.

Prosecutors contended that Piro returned the bribe because he was tipped off to the true identity of the FBI undercover agent. On the stand, Fitzpatrick said the investigation was among nine in the FBI's Boston office during his tenure that he believed were compromised by leaks to Whitey Bulger, other informants, or others outside the office.

Popeo said, ``Nothing came to our attention prior to trial, during the trial, or after the trial that gives any validity to any suggestion that [Piro] was the beneficiary of any leak."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's fifth day on the stand in US District Court in Boston, where he is testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the government by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The family says the government negligently caused McIntyre's death by mishandling Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi and Whitey Bulger, both longtime FBI informants.

Flemmi testified earlier that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, after their handler, FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. , warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had implicated the gangsters in an unsuccessful effort to ship weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, including that of McIntyre.

Bulger, who is wanted for 19 killings, has been a fugitive since 1995. Connolly, who was convicted of racketeering in 2002, is serving a 10-year prison term.

Fitzpatrick, who had urged his superiors to drop Bulger as an informant in the 1980s, testified yesterday that he also wrote a letter to the FBI's third in command at headquarters in 1983, complaining about ``malfeasance" in the bureau's Boston office. He said he never received a response to his letter.

Fitzpatrick said he was concerned that Whitey Bulger, who was being eyed by the FBI as a suspect in at least three murders by 1983, was getting leaks from Connolly about ongoing investigations.

Earlier yesterday, Emily McIntyre, 77, of Quincy, spent an hour on the stand, sobbing uncontrollably at times as she clung to a photograph of her son, John McIntyre.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb grilled Emily McIntyre about her son's character, asking her if she knew he had allegedly abused his wife and had been charged with drunk driving and assault in the years before his slaying.

``No, I don't know that," Emily McIntyre said repeatedly, defending her son's reputation. ``He was such a beautiful person."

Judge Orders FBI To Turn Over Agent's Desperate Letter (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet
Boston Herald, June 20, 2006

Federal Judge Reginald C. Lindsay has ordered attorneys for the FBI to turn over a tell-all letter penned to the agency's second-in-command 23 years ago by a desperate manager in Boston.

After only two years as assistant special agent in charge of Boston, Robert Fitzpatrick testified yesterday at a Quincy family's $50 million wrongful death suit, he was at his wit's end in 1983 when he decided to confide in a friend at headquarters.

The family of John McIntyre, 32, a government witness murdered by James "Whitey" Bulger in 1984, has accused the FBI of being complicit in his death.

Because Fitzpatrick "wasn't getting anywhere" with formal complaints of malfeasance and obstruction of justice, he said, "I outlined my grievances" to Lee Caldwell about FBI agents destroying investigations with "severe leaks" to mob informants like Bulger. Caldwell was a man he thought he could trust, but Fitzpatrick said, "I never heard back."

FBI To Add Agents To Wales Case (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER
Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 20, 2006
New supervisor holds meeting on 2001 killing

The FBI is sending in the cavalry in an attempt to solve the 5 1/2-year-old killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Tom Wales.

A week after the FBI's top brass removed the Seattle office from management of the investigation, its new manager -- Portland Special Agent in Charge Robert Jordan -- announced he's boosting the number of agents and analysts assigned to find the killer.

"This is an extremely important case to us (the FBI)," said Jordan, after emerging from a Monday meeting in Seattle to discuss the case. "We are not going to walk away from this. And we are going to commit as many resources as possible."

FBI officials in Seattle recently cut in half the number of agents assigned to the investigation. A federal criminal justice source said the move reflected a lack of progress in the Wales investigation, and the FBI balanced the resources dedicated to it against other investigative priorities.

A bullet killed Wales on Oct. 11, 2001, as he sat in front of a computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home. The killing shocked his colleagues at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle as well as the nation's federal criminal justice establishment.

"We can find no precedent for a federal prosecutor being murdered, perhaps because of his job," Jordan said. "To anyone who carries a gun and a badge, it's a visceral case."

There had been four agents assigned to the case before Seattle FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin cut that to two agents in May.

Jordan wouldn't reveal the numbers of agents who will ultimately be assigned to the investigation, but said it would be more than four. One of Jordan's agents in Portland with extensive cold-case, homicide experience will be assigned to help find the killer.

Quick to assert "this is not a cold case," Jordan said there are several promising leads that could pave the way to the murderer.

Jordan said he was grateful for the continued commitment of the Seattle Police Department in trying to track down the killer.

"Chief (Gil) Kerlikowske offered up as many resources as we need," Jordan said. "We're going to be taking him up on that."

There has been a Seattle police detective assigned to work in partnership with the four FBI agents. That number will likely increase, he said.

"In this ongoing investigation, we'll assist them in any way we can to bring this killer to justice," Kerlikowske said Monday.

Day-to-day management of the agents will be provided by one of Jordan's Portland supervisors who will be moving to Seattle.

Present at the meeting Monday were Kerlikowske, King County Deputy Prosecutor Roger Davidheiser, special federal prosecutor Steven Clymer, and some of the investigators working the case.

Jordan would not name the agents who will be assigned to the case, but said at least one of the agents previously assigned to the investigation will continue with it in order to provide continuity. Federal criminal justice sources said two agents currently assigned will remain on the job.

Jordan said discussion at the meeting included "what are the leads we should let go of and what are the leads we should pursue."

"It's an exciting opportunity to take another look at this case -- a very important case." Jordan said. "You need a fresh set of eyes -- a fresh focus is always a good thing."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

Two Officers In Bribery Scheme Plead Guilty (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. -- Two former Charlottesville police officers accused of taking bribes of sexual favors and cash to ignore illegal activities at a strip club pleaded guilty Monday to lying to federal agents about having sex with a teenager and covering up a traffic offense.

Roy Fitzgerald, 46, and Charles Saunders, 47, will be sentenced on Sept. 22.

The officers declined comment Monday.

The pleas were part of a deal announced last week; Fitzgerald, a 15-year veteran and Saunders, with the department since 1999, will no longer face bribery, conspiracy and witness tampering charges.

The officers were accused of ignoring illegal activities involving to Charles Phillips, the manager of the now-defunct Max nightclub, starting as far back as 1996.

In one incident, authorities said Saunders had sex with a blindfolded 16-year-old girl at the home of Phillips' associate, Jason Madison. Other times, authorities said the officers would watch nude dancers at the club after hours while in uniform and on duty.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. said in exchange, the officers protected Phillips from prosecution for traffic offenses and warned him about a prostitution investigation, exposing an undercover officer in the process.

During an FBI and Virginia State Police investigation, Bondurant said Saunders lied about intervening with another officer concerning the traffic offense.

The men have resigned from the department.

Two Ex-officers Plead Guilty (RTD)

By Carlos Santos, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times Dispatch, June 20, 2006

They lied to FBI in Charlottesville probe into police corruption

CHARLOTTESVILLE -- Two former Charlottesville police officers pleaded guilty yesterday in a federal court to felony charges after an investigation into corruption at the police department.

As part of a plea bargain, Charles Saunders and Roy Fitzgerald each entered guilty pleas to one felony count of making a false statement to a federal agent.

Saunders, 47, and Fitzgerald, 46, have resigned from the police department, city spokesman Ric Barrick said yesterday.

U.S. District Court Judge Norman K. Moon accepted the guilty pleas from Saunders and Fitzgerald after a brief summation of the evidence against them from Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant.

Bondurant said the two men accepted sexual favors and sexually explicit entertainment from women provided by the manager of a now-defunct nightclub in exchange for overlooking illegal activities at the club.

Bondurant said the men, who worked the night shift, attended after-hour events at the nightclub in uniform. Bondurant said the men even tipped off the club's manager to a city undercover operation looking into prostitution.

At one point, the two former officers gave false statements to FBI agents investigating the corruption, Bondurant said.

Indictments on charges of bribery, conspiracy and witness tampering were dropped as part of the plea bargain.

The two men, veteran police officers with more than 10 years on the force, will be sentenced next month by Moon. They could receive up to five years in prison.

Justices Draw A Line On What Evidence Is Admissible (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — An alleged crime victim's emergency 911 call can be used at trial even if he or she does not testify and undergo cross-examination, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled Monday.

However, by an 8-1 vote, the justices also ruled that if an alleged victim recounts an incident to police at the scene after it occurs, the account cannot be used at trial unless the defendant is able to cross-examine the accuser.

The pair of rulings in cases from Washington and Indiana addressed the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, which ensures that a defendant may closely question witnesses against him or her. In 2004, the court had barred the use of “testimonial” statements at trial unless the witness was unavailable or had been cross-examined earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0035465

In Monday's cases, the justices defined “testimonial” by drawing a line between statements made in emergency situations — which the court said could be permitted as evidence at trial without cross-examination — and statements gathered later by police “to establish or prove past events,” which the court barred without cross-examination.

In the Washington dispute, Michelle McCottry had told a 911 operator that her former boyfriend was attacking her: “He's here jumpin' on me again. …. He's usin' his fists.” McCottry told the operator that the assailant's name was Adrian Martell Davis. When Davis was tried for felony violation of a domestic no-contact order, prosecutors offered McCottry's statement as evidence. She did not testify. Lower courts rejected Davis' claim that the admission of the 911 recording violated his constitutional rights.

Writing for the court, Justice Antonin Scalia said statements made to authorities responding to an “ongoing emergency” should be allowed as evidence.

In the Indiana case, Amy Hammon was questioned by police officers who had responded to a report of domestic disturbance at her home. She signed a report that said her husband, Hershel Hammon, had hit her in the chest and shoved her to the floor.

Scalia said a trial judge erred in allowing the wife's report to be used as evidence at her husband's domestic battery trial. Scalia said the report, given when there was no immediate threat, was “testimonial.” Justice Clarence Thomas dissented.

Also Monday, the justices offered a series of opinions that, for now, will let U.S. regulators continue to block development on wetlands even when the lands are far from rivers and other navigable waters.

For the court, the issue in two cases from Michigan was the extent to which the Clean Water Act protects wetlands adjacent to non-navigable tributaries that eventually drain into rivers and lakes. No clear rule emerged in the court's opinions, and lower-court judges will be left to decide whether long-standing federal protections for hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands should be curtailed.

Four conservative justices — Scalia, Thomas, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito — sought to narrowly define wetlands and reduce the power of the Army Corps of Engineers to regulate development and the discharge of pollutants. The justices would limit protected wetlands to those adjacent to permanent standing or continuously flowing bodies of water. They said a lower court should reconsider its decision allowing the corps to deny permits to property owners for a shopping mall and condominiums.

The court's four most liberal justices — David Souter, Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and John Paul Stevens — signed a dissenting opinion that stressed the importance of deferring to the corps and its goal of preserving wetlands. They said they would have affirmed the lower-court ruling that sided with regulators against developers.

The ninth justice, Anthony Kennedy, agreed with Scalia that there should be a new hearing in the cases, but he offered a legal standard more favorable to environmentalists. Kennedy said the corps should be able to protect wetlands whose ecological health is linked to that of rivers and lakes. Kennedy also said evidence in the Michigan cases suggested the corps was right in denying the building permits.

Georgetown University professor Richard Lazarus, an environmental law specialist, said the decisions inject “tremendous uncertainty into wetlands regulations. It will present great challenges for regulators and for landowners.”

Absent Accusers' 911 Calls Ruled Admissible (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court issued new guidelines on the use of evidence from witnesses who cannot or will not testify in person yesterday, ruling that information conveyed to 911 emergency operators may be admitted in criminal cases while statements to police officers in calmer settings may not.

Yesterday's opinion was a much-anticipated follow-up to a 2004 case in which the court, invoking the constitutional right of a defendant to confront his accusers, put new limits on the admissibility of testimony by witnesses who had not been cross-examined and could not or would not repeat their stories in front of a jury.

At issue was the meaning of the "confrontation clause" of the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees defendants' right "to be confronted" with the witnesses against them. The 2004 ruling was considered one of the court's most important on criminal law in recent years, because it overturned precedent that had said an unavailable witness's out-of-court statement could be admissible if a judge found it clearly trustworthy.

Yet the 2004 decision, Crawford v. Washington , did not define "testimony," and yesterday's decision was intended to fill that gap.

In an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, the court analyzed two situations, both involving charges of domestic violence.

DOJ_NMG_0035466

Michelle McCottry and Amy Hammon were both alleged victims of domestic violence. McCottry called 911 to report a beating that her boyfriend had just administered; Hammon gave an account of a fresh attack by her husband to police who came to her home.

McCottry and Hammon did not testify at the men's trials; the state won convictions anyway, based in part on the women's statements.

Scalia wrote that the 911 call containing McCottry's accusations against her boyfriend, Adrian Davis, could be used to convict him even though she did not come to court, because the "primary purpose" of the call was "to meet an ongoing emergency."

By contrast, Scalia wrote, answers Hammon gave to a police officer after an alleged incident of abuse by her husband, Hershel, were not admissible without her coming to court, because the emergency was over, and the primary purpose of the police officer's questioning of Amy was to "establish or prove past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution."

In both cases -- Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705 -- all the justices except Clarence Thomas concurred.

He dissented in the Hammon case, saying that Amy Hammon's statement should also have been admissible, and that the court's proposed distinction based on the "primary purpose" of police questioning would be "difficult for courts to apply."

The cases had attracted attention because of their implications not only for domestic-violence cases but all criminal cases in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court.

Adrian Davis and Hershel Hammon, who said the Sixth Amendment requires the state to bring its witnesses to court, put them under oath and allow them to be cross-examined, were supported by the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the D.C. Public Defender Service.

On the other side, voicing concerns about witness intimidation, particularly in domestic-abuse cases, were the states of Indiana and Washington, supported by the Bush administration; 27 other states, including Maryland; the National Network to End Domestic Violence; and the National District Attorneys Association.

The court's resolution of the issue drew positive comments from both sides yesterday.

"This puts real teeth into the notion that fair trials require live testimony in front of jurors," said Timothy P. O'Toole, chief of the Special Litigation Division of the District's Public Defender Service.

Fernando R. LaGuarda, who co-wrote a friend-of-the-court brief on behalf of several domestic-violence advocacy organizations, praised the decision for its "tremendous clarity on 911 calls."

At oral argument, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg had voiced specific concerns about the potential impact of the case on domestic violence victims, and the court's opinion included a section noting that "this particular type of crime is notoriously susceptible to intimidation or coercion of the victim to ensure she does not testify at trial."

Thus, the court noted, courts should be empowered to admit out-of-court statements from victims when there is evidence that the alleged perpetrator is guilty of witness intimidation.

No Bond For Alleged Mob Figure (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 20, 2006

Suggesting that Frank Calabrese Sr. is a danger to anyone who might testify against the Outfit, a federal judge on Monday refused to grant bail to the reputed mob lieutenant.

Calabrese, 69, linked by authorities to 13 slayings, will remain incarcerated before he and others named in the Operation Family Secrets case are tried next spring, U.S. District Judge James Zagel ruled.

"Defendant perceives himself, as he made clear in several statements, to be a loyal member of an organization that engages in criminal acts and whose members obey the orders of their superiors under pain of death," the judge wrote. "If released, there is a distinct possibility that he will attempt to deprive the prosecution of as many living witnesses as he can to comply with such orders."

Calabrese's brother Nicholas is cooperating and has tied Calabrese to some of the killings, Zagel noted. His son, Frank Calabrese Jr., secretly recorded him discussing his past.

In a hearing last week, prosecutors played tapes of Calabrese talking about a ceremony where he became a made member of the mob, as well as the murders of Michael Albergo in 1970, William and Charlotte Dauber in 1980, and Richard Ortiz and Arthur Morawski in 1983.

"While in theory defendant could offer innocent explanations for these conversations, it is difficult to imagine what they might be," the judge wrote. The evidence against him is strong, increasing the likelihood of flight, he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0035467

Calabrese's lawyer, Joseph Lopez, said Calabrese is eager to face his accusers in court. On Monday Lopez said he was not surprised by the judge's ruling.

He had joked to the court last week that arguing for Calabrese's bail was like trying to get Ray Charles a driver's license.

"Ray Charles ain't driving," he said Monday.

jcoen@tribune.com

Ex-Stock Picker Gets Prison Sentence (LAT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

NEW YORK — A former stock picker who teamed up with a rogue FBI agent in a scheme to manipulate stocks was sentenced Monday to more than 11 years in federal prison.

Anthony Elgindy also was ordered by U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie to forfeit $1.5 million

Elgindy, of San Diego, was convicted in January 2005 of racketeering, conspiracy and securities fraud.

He and four others were charged in May 2002 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice.

Federal prosecutors accused FBI special agent Jeffrey Royer of New Mexico of leaking details of investigations and executives' criminal histories to Elgindy.

Elgindy shorted penny stocks, then drove down their prices by publicizing damaging information he received from Royer. He also extorted companies by offering to withhold the information in exchange for cash.

Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

Judge Sentences Trader Elgindy To More Than 11 Years In Jail (WSJ)

A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- A federal judge sentenced short-seller Anthony Elgindy to more than 11 years in prison for his role in a scheme to manipulate the stocks of small-cap companies.

In addition to the prison term of 135 months, U.S. District Court Judge Raymond Dearie ordered Mr. Elgindy to forfeit $1.5 million.

Mr. Elgindy was convicted in January 2005 of racketeering, conspiracy and securities fraud. He and four others were charged in May 2002 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York with securities fraud, extortion and obstruction of justice.

Federal prosecutors accused Mr. Elgindy of using confidential government information obtained from Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer to manipulate stock. Mr. Royer was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

Mr. Elgindy rose to prominence in the late 1990s as a frequent message poster on Internet stock chat sites, such as Silicon Investor. He subsequently started a private chat site where members paid a fee to obtain his stock insights, which mostly focused on shorting securities. Short selling is a trading technique that produces profits when a company's stock price falls. Shorting a stock can be perfectly legal -- depending on how it is done.

Man Gets 17 Years For Investing Scam (MH)

By Roberto Santiago

The Miami Herald, June 20, 2006

Con artist Charles Paul Hoffecker, who with a partner fleeced more than 1,000 investors out of $14 million in a huge boiler-room operation, was sentenced Monday to 17 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark sentenced Hoffecker, 53, of Pompano Beach.

His partner in crime, Charles Edward Meyers, 66, of Fort Lauderdale, will be sentenced June 26.

They will also have to pay $2.6 million in restitution to their victims.

Robert Kirsch, an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey who helped prosecute the case, said Monday's sentencing was long and emotional, with Hoffecker and his family pleading for mercy.

The two were found guilty last March of ripping off people who believed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver.

Amitex was actually a one-room office in the Bahamas. The money-generating sales pitches were done in boiler rooms they ran in New York, Nevada, California, Georgia and Florida, Kirsch said.

He said the largest Amitex boiler room was in an office on Commercial Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale.

A boiler room is a base of operations -- often a rented office or a home basement -- from which con artists run phony telemarketing schemes.

Hoffecker and Meyers were caught as part of a 10-year investigation by the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

To nab them, authorities set up their own boiler room, called Commodities Investors Corp., in East Brunswick, N.J.

A press release from the New Jersey state attorney's office said that Hoffecker tried to ``recruit the operators of CIC to sell the Amitex investment."

Supreme Court Upholds California's Searches Of Parolees (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

Parolees in California do not enjoy a constitutional right to be free from suspicionless searches by law-enforcement officials.

Instead, they can be searched at any time, even when officials have no reason to believe that they may be involved in wrongdoing.

In an important privacy ruling with major implications for individuals on parole, the US Supreme Court voted 6 to 3 Monday to uphold a California law that requires all state prisoners to agree as a condition of release that they consent to warrantless searches by law enforcement.

"Examining the totality of the circumstances pertaining to petitioner's status as a parolee ... we conclude that petitioner did not have an expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate," writes Justice Clarence Thomas in the majority opinion.

The state, Justice Thomas writes, has substantial interests in supervising parolees because they are "more likely to commit future criminal offenses."

He adds: "That some states and the federal government require a level of individualized suspicion is of little relevance to our determination whether California's supervisory system is drawn to meet its needs and is reasonable, taking into account a parolee's substantially diminished expectation of privacy."

In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens writes that suspicionless searches are the kind of improper government action the Fourth Amendment was intended to prevent.

"What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty," Justice Stevens writes in a dissent joined by Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer. "Combining faulty syllogism with circular reasoning, the court concludes that parolees have no more legitimate an expectation of privacy in their persons than do prisoners."

The decision stems from an incident on Sept. 6, 2002, in which a San Bruno, Calif., police officer happened upon Donald Samson. Mr. Samson was walking in a residential area with a friend and her 3-year-old son.

The officer, Alex Rohleder, knew Samson was on parole. He thought a warrant may have been issued for Samson's arrest. He conducted a pat-down search of Samson for weapons.

Officer Rohleder found no weapons and discovered from his dispatch officer that Samson was not wanted on any outstanding warrant. Nonetheless, the officer conducted a second, more thorough search. He found a plastic baggie containing methamphetamine inside a cigarette box in Samson's pocket. Rohleder then placed him under arrest for drug possession.

Samson's lawyer asked a judge to suppress the prosecutor's use of the drugs as evidence because they were the product of an illegal search. The judge disagreed. Samson was convicted and sentenced to seven years in prison. The state appeals court upheld the conviction, and the California Supreme Court declined to take up the case.

In affirming the conviction, Thomas said that people released from prison on parole are subject to a long list of terms and conditions that restrict their freedom, including mandatory drug testing and rules that prohibit them from associating with felons or gang members. Parolees must also report to parole officers and request permission to travel more than 50 miles from home.

"The extent and reach of these conditions clearly demonstrate that parolees like petitioner have severely diminished expectations of privacy by virtue of their status alone," Thomas writes.

Stevens says in his dissent that the high court's precedents had recognized a higher level of privacy protection for parolees than prison inmates. He says Monday's decision "runs roughshod" over those prior holdings.

"Once one acknowledges that parolees do have legitimate expectations of privacy beyond those of prisoners, our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence does not permit the conclusion, reached by the court here for the first time, that a search supported by neither individualized suspicion nor 'special needs' is nonetheless 'reasonable,' " Stevens writes.

DOJ_NMG_0035469

Supreme Court Rules That Parolees Can Be Searched Without Cause (LAW/AP)

By Toni Locy, The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

California parolees can routinely be searched by police as a condition of their release from prison, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

By a 6-3 vote, justices said the 1996 law is a legitimate attempt by state officials to deal with a large population of repeat offenders who pose a danger to public safety.

Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the majority, said California has a "special governmental interest" to control its parolees, an interest that outweighs a parolee's privacy.

In California, most prisoners eventually receive parole. But before release, each parolee is required to consent in writing to searches by police during the term of their supervision. If they refuse, they are not allowed out of prison.

Under the law, police can conduct such a search as long as it is not arbitrary, capricious or conducted to harass the parolee.

Thomas said parolees do not have any "expectation of privacy that society would recognize as legitimate" because of the danger posed by California's large recidivist population.

"The state's interests, by contrast, are substantial," Thomas wrote, citing a 68-to-70 percent recidivism rate among California's parolees.

But Justice John Paul Stevens, writing in dissent, said the majority had "run roughshod" over previous court rulings on unreasonable searches and improperly allowed California to create another form of punishment for its prisoners.

"What the court sanctions today is an unprecedented curtailment of liberty," Stevens wrote on behalf of himself and Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer.

Stevens wrote that California has given its police "a blanket grant of discretion untethered by any procedural safeguards."

Only California allows parolees to be searched for no specific reason. Thirty other states and the federal government require parolees to submit to searches, but there must be reasonable grounds for the search to occur.

In September 2002, a San Bruno, Calif., police officer spotted Donald Samson walking down a street with a woman and her 3-year-old son. The officer knew Samson was a parolee and suspected there was a warrant out for his arrest on a parole violation.

The officer searched Samson, who then told him that the warrant had been "taken care of." After confirming Samson's assertion, the officer searched him again. Inside a cigarette box Samson was carrying, the officer found a plastic baggie containing methamphetamine.

Samson was not charged with a parole violation. Instead, he was charged with drug possession, convicted and sentenced to seven years in state prison.

California's Court of Appeal upheld Samson's conviction, rejecting his argument that a suspicionless search of a parolee violated the Fourth Amendment.

The case is Samson v. California, 04-9728.

Court OKs Random Searches Of Parolees (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Supreme Court ruled Monday that police may randomly search criminal parolees, continuing the deference it has shown law enforcement since the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

The 6-3 ruling keeps in place a California law allowing such searches even when there is no clear evidence or suspicion of wrongdoing.

Writing for the majority, Justice Clarence Thomas noted, "As the recidivism rates demonstrate, most parolees are ill prepared to handle the pressures of reintegration. Thus most parolees require intense supervision."

He added, "A requirement that searches be based on individualized suspicion would undermine the state's ability to effectively supervise parolees and protect the public from criminal acts by reoffenders."

Upon their release, California parolees must sign a requirement allowing police searches during their supervision. Failure or refusal to sign means they must stay behind bars.

Thomas rejected complaints that parolees are being singled out and suffer an unconstitutional diminished right of privacy.

The ruling was supported by Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Clarence Thomas, Anthony Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Samuel Alito.

DOJ_NMG_0035470

The case involves Donald Samson, paroled in 2003 after a firearms felony conviction. A San Bruno police officer knew Samson was on parole when he observed him walking down a street.

The officer, after determining there were no outstanding warrants on Samson, began a search of him.

Methamphetamine was found in a pocket and Samson went back to prison for seven years.

Dissenting was Justice John Paul Stevens, who acknowledged parolees do not have protection "as robust as that afforded ordinary citizens."

But, he wrote, the court's past decisions do not support "a regime of suspicionless searches."

The Samson case was one of two search-and-seizure appeals from California argued this term. The justices in March unanimously allowed to stand the conviction of a man who bought video showing minors engaged in sex acts.

The Bush administration Justice Department and law enforcement agencies around the country have asked the courts for greater powers to conduct searches of homes and cars, along the borders, and at sobriety and neighborhood crime checkpoints.

The federal government in some cases has raised the increased threat of domestic terrorism since 9/11 as a reason for more crime-fighting discretion.

The majority-conservative Supreme Court has generally been supportive of such efforts, but has not been shy about limiting such powers when the justices felt they overstep constitutional boundaries.

School Janitor Pleads Guilty To Making Peephole Films In Women's Rest Room (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 20, 2006

Nobody knew what janitor Phillip Winkle was up to until the day in early February when two other janitors at Center Area Middle School wondered what he was doing by himself in a dark storage room.

It turned out he was making his own child pornography collection using a peephole camera he installed to record 600 video images of girls and women using the toilet.

That's going to cost him 10 years in federal prison.

Yesterday in U.S. District Court, he waived indictment and pleaded guilty to child porn charges and agreed to be sentenced to that likely term in September.

State charges of invasion of privacy, filed in Beaver County Common Pleas Court in February, will be dropped.

Mr. Winkle drilled a hole through the wall that separated the storage room from a girls' bathroom in an isolated part of the school's lower level.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Kaufman said Mr. Winkle installed a camera that looked into one stall, sometimes operating it manually and other times setting it to record automatically.

The bathroom served a small number of classrooms and tended to be used by both staff and students.

From July 2005 until February, he made 131 recordings of female faculty and another 40 of girls using the toilet. Most of the girls were about 12, Mr. Kaufman said, but "one girl was so young she had to lift herself up onto the toilet seat."

Most of the recordings included sound, and in some cases Mr. Winkle made slow-motion images. In all, he downloaded 600 images onto two computers at his house.

He apparently maintained the collection for his own use, as there was no evidence he distributed any of the videos. None of the images show sex acts, but they qualify as child pornography under federal law.

After the two suspicious janitors caught him, Mr. Winkle confessed to Center police, who charged him with invasion of privacy and called the FBI.

Since federal child-porn laws are harsher than state charges, prosecutors decided to bring the case in federal court.

Mr. Winkle's lawyer, Gerald Benyo, and the U.S. attorney's office stipulated to the statutory maximum of 10 years.

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab doesn't have to abide by that stipulation but almost certainly will.

Mr. Winkle is free on $10,000 bond until his sentencing.

Perpetrator Problem: It's Hard To Run Away In Falling Trousers (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

One sunny afternoon in January, Vicki Chandler, a 55-year-old underwriting associate at Cigna HealthCare in Chattanooga, Tenn., was walking to her car when a teenager in loose khaki pants approached her, pointed to her pocketbook and said, "I need that." As she recounts the incident, he snatched the purse and took off.

But then he ran into trouble. As he ran, his loose trousers slipped down below his hips. As he reached down to hold them up, the teen was forced to throw the purse aside.

DOJ_NMG_0035471

"That boy, he could run fast but he got caught up by his pants, which were real big and baggy," says Ms. Chandler, whose purse was retrieved by a parking attendant who had heard her cries for help.

It's a problem for perpetrators. Young men and teens wearing low-slung, baggy pants fairly regularly get tripped up in their getaways, a development that has given amused police officers and law-abiding citizens a welcome edge in the fight against crime.

James Green might have made a clean getaway when he stole seven DVDs from a Blockbuster store in Ferndale, Mich., last October. But he, too, was undone by his baggy pants.

Mr. Green, 30, rode away on a bicycle, with copies of "Donnie Brasco," "The Bourne Identity" and "Sin City." When a patrol car knocked over the bike, he fled on foot. As he ran, his trousers slipped down past his hips, and he tripped. He hitched up his pants and ran a few more yards before falling again.

Things got worse and worse for Mr. Green. He finally kicked off his pants and shoes and "ran into the yard of 1720 Beaufield," police officer Kenneth Jaklic said in a report of the incident. "I ran after [Mr. Green], yelling at him to stop." Instead, Mr. Green jumped over a fence behind a garage, and Mr. Jaklic immobilized him with two Taser darts in the back.

Mr. Green pleaded guilty to charges of resisting arrest and retail fraud and spent 30 days in jail. He could not be located for comment.

Denny Fuhrman, a 58-year-old police officer in Lynnwood, Wash., was escorting a handcuffed suspect to his patrol car one afternoon in 2004 when the youngster twisted free and took off running.

As he bolted, the baggy blue jeans he was wearing fell down around his ankles, sending him tumbling onto the pavement of a busy street. "He was rolling around in traffic, looking like a fish out of water," recalls Mr. Fuhrman.

Mr. Fuhrman's suspect wiggled out of his trousers before getting up from the street and running toward a nearby mall, as the police officer radioed a description to his colleagues: "White male, running, no pants, in handcuffs," Mr. Fuhrman recalls saying. The young man was arrested at the entrance of a J.C. Penney store after Janice Lewis, a 61-year-old passerby, grabbed his shirt collar and held on to him until police arrived.

"He was pretty wild," says Ms. Lewis, a grandmother of 10 who broke a knuckle during the scuffle. "I didn't even realize he was in his underwear till the police flipped him over."

Police declined to release the full name of the youth, identified only as Jason in written reports, because he was not convicted of a crime in connection with the incident. He had been arrested after allegedly trying to access a bank account that wasn't his.

Low-hanging baggy pants have been a fashion statement for young men for more than a decade, inspired by the advent of beltless prison jeans, says Andy Gilchrist, a California fashion consultant who has written a book on men's clothes. Over time, the tough-guy image associated with oversized trousers helped make the look standard for hip-hop performers, alternative music bands, skateboarders and snowboarders as it migrated from mostly black city streets to affluent white suburbs.

Just about every other week, Jim Matheny, a 41-year-old police lieutenant in Stamford, Conn., says he gets into foot chases with youths. He says it's getting easier to capture them because they can't run fast or far in those loose jeans.

"When I catch them, I tell them they'd do much better if they had pants that fit," says Lt. Matheny, who says he has had to help hold up the pants of his suspects while patting them down to search for drugs or weapons. "It's like: 'Hey dude, buy a belt and save yourself some trouble.' "

Ill-fitting pants aren't suited for jumping, either, as Noah Donell Brown of Hendersonville, N.C., learned. The 24-year-old tried to leap over the counter of a Subway sandwich shop during a robbery attempt, but he stumbled and came crashing down in front of several startled store employees. Mr. Brown, armed with a gun, got up and fled into a nearby residential neighborhood as the police were notified.

Police didn't have to work hard to arrest him. As Mr. Brown tried to scale a picket fence in someone's backyard, he caught his pants, according to the police department. He was found dangling upside down, his pants at his ankles and tangled in the fence.

"He didn't make a good jump," said Hendersonville Police Chief Donnie Parks, who spotted Mr. Brown on the fence. "The only reason we caught the guy was because his pants fell down," he said, adding: "He was wearing underwear, thank goodness."

Hendersonville police used a knife to cut Mr. Brown free. He is currently serving time in prison after pleading guilty to attempted robbery with a dangerous weapon. His lawyer, Greg Newman, who has since become the mayor of Hendersonville, said he had not spoken to Mr. Brown since 2003. Mr. Brown, serving his sentence at Gaston Correctional Center in Dallas, N.C., could not be contacted for comment.

Dwight Oliver showed up for a court hearing in Seminole County, Fla., wearing loose pants and tennis shoes without laces. While waiting for his case to be called, Mr. Oliver tried to flee. He lost his pants as he ran down the steps of the courthouse.

He was later found in gray boxer shorts in a library three blocks from the courthouse and was arrested after a scuffle with police officers. It turned out the charges he was scheduled to face in court that day were dropped. He was slapped with new charges of resisting arrest and sentenced to two and a half years in jail for the incident. He served 17 months and was released in April.

"Those pants certainly didn't help him escape, and if he had just sat and waited, he would have been fine," said F. Wesley "Buck" Blankner Jr., who was Mr. Oliver's lawyer. Mr. Oliver didn't return calls seeking comment. His mother, Alice Oliver, said: "He wears pants like that, but he usually wears a belt."

Karl Franklin tried to run from police in Tallahassee, Fla., in pants that were on fire. According to a police report, the 30-year-old had stashed a lighted cigarette in his baggy pants and appeared to be preparing to urinate at a traffic intersection.

Seth Stoughton, a police officer at the time, approached Mr. Franklin and noticed the man's pocket was smoldering. Mr. Franklin, who could not be reached, started to run, but his pants dropped and tripped him up.

"I tried to slap the fire out, but he was struggling and kicking me, so I couldn't do much but hold him down," recalls Mr. Stoughton, who now works as a fraud investigator. When other officers arrived, they cut off the burning patch of cloth and arrested Mr. Franklin. He was charged with resisting arrest, but he later pleaded guilty to lesser charges and spent 10 days in jail.

CIVIL LAW:

Court To Address Abortion Restrictions (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday that it will broaden its review of whether a federal law banning a controversial abortion method is constitutional, taking the second case in four months that will reveal whether the court has shifted significantly on abortion rights with two new conservative members.

The court agreed to rule next term on a California case in which a federal appeals court struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, a statute that was a political victory for abortion opponents but that lower courts have been finding unconstitutional.

The court said in February that it would consider a separate case in which a group of Nebraska doctors had challenged the same law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit, based in St. Louis, ruled last year that the federal ban is unconstitutional because the law does not provide an exception that would allow doctors to use the abortion technique if a woman's life is in danger.

In accepting the California case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America , the court essentially agreed to evaluate a wider range of legal issues that the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit cited last winter when it, too, found the law unconstitutional.

The 9th Circuit found the law posed an undue burden on women because the statute is so vague it could be interpreted to forbid other abortion methods beyond one that is used rarely late in pregnancy. In addition, the 9th Circuit dealt with whether a court could "remedy" the law to permit the procedure when women's health is imperiled, ruling that it could not because lawmakers had deliberately omitted such an exception.

The high court did not say whether it intends to consider the two cases together.

The abortion cases will be the first the court has heard since Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined in February and the second since John G. Roberts Jr. became chief justice last fall. Both men have conservative records and were nominated by President Bush, who favors restrictions on abortion rights, including the "partial-birth" law.

Leading advocates and opponents of such rights said yesterday that the court could use the pair of cases to place significant new limits on women's access to abortion.

"Look, you don't know how anyone is going to rule, but I'm optimistic," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, which supports the ban.

Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said she has "a very, very deep fear" that the court will "eviscerate" Roe v. Wade , the 1973 decision that legalized abortion nationwide. Without striking down Roe , she said, the justices could rule that restrictions on the procedure no longer need to ensure that women can get an abortion if a pregnancy harms their health.

The court last considered the issue of "partial-birth" bans six years ago, when it ruled, 5 to 4, that a Nebraska statute -- similar to laws in many states that had been adopted during the late 1990s -- was unconstitutional, because it lacked a health exception. The deciding vote in that 2000 case was cast by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito has succeeded.

DOJ_NMG_0035473

The Bush administration urged the court to consider the 8th Circuit case. It recommended, however, that the court hold the California case without ruling until the first one is decided. Eve Gartner, senior staff attorney for Planned Parenthood, which brought the lawsuit in California on behalf of the group's clinics and physicians nationwide, said it had asked the high court to take the case.

Supreme Court Adds Second Abortion Case To Docket (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court said Monday it would consider a second Bush administration appeal that seeks to reinstate a government ban on what opponents call partial-birth abortion.

Justices had already said they would decide this fall whether the law is unconstitutional.

The court will review a pair of cases from lower courts, which both struck down the law. Those courts are the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis and the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco.

Congress had voted in 2003 to prohibit the type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester of a nine-month pregnancy, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb and its skull punctured or crushed. The law was challenged on behalf of physicians who could be sentenced to up to two years in prison for violating the law.

Justice Samuel Alito is expected to be a key vote in the case, because the court had split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law barring the same procedure because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired in January was replaced by Alito.

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Judge Approves Extension For Auto Supplier Delphi To File Reorganization Plan (FINDLAW/AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A bankruptcy judge on Monday approved a motion by Delphi Corp. to extend the auto supplier's deadline to exclusively file its reorganization plan, before creditors can weigh in with alternate proposals.

The new deadline for the company is Feb. 1, 2007, and the deadline for responses to the plan is April 2. Judge Robert Drain approved the extension, which is the company's second and moves the filing deadline from Aug. 5.

The company reserved the right to file other extensions if needed.

An attorney for Delphi, John W. Butler, also said the company planned to file a motion later Monday to seek the court's approval of a new concessions deal with Delphi's second-largest union, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America.

The auto parts supplier announced over the weekend that it had reached an agreement with the IUE-CWA and General Motors to offer buyouts to hourly workers. The deal was similar to the one reached earlier with the United Auto Workers, the largest union representing Delphi employees.

The judge said the matter would be considered in a June 29 meeting.

Under the plan, about 8,000 hourly workers represented by the IUE-CWA are eligible to participate. Some may be offered a lump sum payment of $35,000 (â‚¬27,798) to retire, Delphi said, while eligible employees may decide to accept buyout packages ranging from $40,000 (â‚¬31,769) to $140,000 (â‚¬111,190).

The plan also permits the transition of up to 3,200 Delphi workers represented by the IUE-CWA to GM for retirement purposes, Delphi said.

Also on Monday, the court set at $5 million (â‚¬4 million) the maximum value of creditors' claims Delphi can settle without court approval. Delphi's motion had asked the judge to set that at $20 million (â‚¬15.9 million).

Representatives of the ad hoc creditors committee and the equity committee objected, saying the process needed greater transparency. At the bar date, or deadline for creditors to file claims, Delphi may make a new motion to raise that threshold. The company's bar date is scheduled for July 31.

Lobbying Bill Stuck In Limbo (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Clear progress on a lobbying reform bill continues to elude House and Senate Republican leaders, with the two chambers stalemated over the fate of a controversial provision targeting the independent political groups known as 527s.

DOJ_NMG_0035474

Cracking down on the groups, which historically have favored Democrats, is a top election-year priority for national Republicans. When the House took up legislation to overhaul lobbying, GOP leaders made a point of inserting a provision to sideline 527s. But that plan is running into growing resistance in the Senate, initially from Democrats, but now from some conservative Republicans as well.

Members of both camps are pledging to oppose the provision — with a filibuster if necessary.

"That's a huge roadblock right now," said a senior House Republican aide. "Obviously, House leaders want it really bad, and many Senators don't." Another House aide confirmed that the issue was first among those confronting House and Senate negotiators.

As long as lawmakers engage in a cross-Capitol staring contest over the issue, the long-stalled reform bill will remain idle. House Republican leaders have been predicting quick action on the measure since that chamber approved its version of the bill in early May. But those projections have consistently slid, as agreements on differences between the two bills have proved hard to come by.

The latest deadline — outlined in a joint statement earlier this month by House and Senate Republican leaders — has both chambers wrapping work on a conference agreement by the July Fourth recess. Now, even that goal appears imperiled, with GOP aides predicting little action in the two weeks left of this work period.

While Senate conferees were announced late last month, House negotiators have not yet been named and several insiders said they expect them to be appointed only after the sticky issues have been ironed out.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), who chair their respective chambers' Rules panels, have been in frequent consultation in recent weeks. Lott last week predicted a draft conference report could be ready within days.

But while GOP aides said that negotiators are close to agreement on several other contentious issues, including new earmark and disclosure requirements, the matter of the 527 groups doesn't appear much closer to a resolution.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) last week complicated what was looking like a partisan showdown in the Senate when he, along with six other conservative Senators, sent a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) expressing objections to new rules for the groups.

The Senators pointed to First Amendment concerns in opposing a crackdown on the groups. The lawmakers have high-powered backing in that effort from the conservative Club for Growth, itself a 527 group, which has been piling pressure on Republicans to back off new rules. The organization has launched a Free Speech Action Center to gin up opposition to the measure and announced it would award points in its annual rankings to lawmakers who stood with them.

"I think it's clear it will be a tough sell in the Senate because it has nothing to do with lobbying," said David Keating, executive director of Club for Growth.

However, a stark political reality is encouraging Republicans to take action: The current laws, which allow 527s to raise and spend money freely, are providing Democrats a much-needed financial boost. For the first quarter of this year, Democratic-leaning 527 groups specializing in federal campaigns have raised almost three times as much as their Republican counterparts, according an analysis by the Campaign Finance Institute. The groups have collected nearly $43 million as of March 31, compared to just $16 million raised by their GOP rivals.

As the process has dragged on, and with the proposed reforms falling so far short of what reformers have sought, outside watchdog groups have all but washed their hands of the process. They have derided the Senate and House measures as "weak tea" and "warm spit," respectively, and hold out little hope for meaningful improvements during conference negotiations.

Instead, the groups are set to rally around a bill expected this week from Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) that will include reform provisions that were dropped or blocked from the leadership-approved overhaul measures.

The bill would create an Office of Public Integrity to oversee compliance with new lobbying rules; require more frequent and fuller disclosures by lobbyists of their activities; ban gifts to lawmakers; and force them to pay fair market value for rides they catch on private planes.

"This will serve as a marker for the reform groups who will be criticizing the conference report," said Public Citizen's Craig Holman.

To try to keep campaign and ethics reform measures front and center in this fall's midterm elections, a coalition of watchdog and issue groups on Wednesday plan to launch a program designed to get Congressional candidates to sign a pledge that they'll support public financing of elections as well as anti-corruption and lobbying reforms, Holman said.

DOJ_NMG_0035475

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Preferential Hawaiian School Admissions Questioned In Court (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Niesse, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

(AP) - HONOLULU-A wealthy private school created exclusively for Hawaii's indigenous people may be forced to admit non-Hawaiians if it loses a legal challenge.

Fifteen judges on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments Tuesday in San Francisco over whether the Kamehameha Schools can continue to limit enrollment to Native Hawaiians.

The case is an important test of racial preference programs in school admissions.

While the courts have generally ruled against favoritism in education based on race, the Kamehameha case is different in that the school was founded based on the will of a Hawaiian princess and doesn't receive federal funding.

"Her whole intent was to provide a means for educating her people so they could compete in a society that was changing so quickly," said Kekoa Paulsen, a spokesman for Kamehameha Schools. "We are providing a remedy for a ... people in their own homeland who are suffering."

Hawaii was an independent kingdom until a U.S.-backed overthrow of the leaders in 1893. It eventually became a U.S. territory and was made a state in 1959.

A three-judge panel of the circuit court in California initially ruled against Kamehameha's admissions policy with a 2-1 vote in August. But the court announced in February it would reconsider the school's 118-year-old policy.

The lawsuit was filed on behalf of an anonymous white student who was denied admission to the school in 2003 and claimed he was discriminated against because he didn't have Hawaiian blood.

"We've had a lot of conflict, including the Civil War, about treating people differently based on their race. I think we're mostly past that, but unfortunately Kamehameha wants to go back to an era of privilege for citizens depending on what race you are," said Eric Grant, a Sacramento, California, attorney representing the boy, who recently graduated from a public school.

Kamehameha Schools was established under the 1883 will of Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop as part of a trust now worth $6.8 billion (â‚¬5.4 billion). Part of the school's mission is to counteract historical disadvantages Hawaiians face in employment, education and society.

Kamehameha is the largest private landowner in Hawaii and is one of the richest trusts in the United States.

Admission to the elite school is first granted to all qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings left available. Only one in eight eligible applicants get in, and tuition costs are 60 percent subsidized.

Out of 5,400 students enrolled at the school's three campuses, only two students do not have Hawaiian ancestry. One of those students initially claimed he was Hawaiian, but his acceptance into the school was rescinded when he couldn't prove his bloodline. He was later admitted to the school as the result of a legal settlement.

Attorneys for Kamehameha plan to argue that their admissions policy should be permitted to comply with the wishes of the princess' will and to help remedy some of the wrongs done during the U.S.-backed overthrow of the Hawaiian kingdom, Paulsen said.

"The lands that support Kamehameha Schools ... are designated for a certain set of beneficiaries, and the beneficiaries in this case are the children of Native Hawaiian ancestry," said Jon Van Dyke, a University of Hawaii law professor who consulted for the school. "The Native Hawaiian people have a great need for education. They are still at the bottom of the socio-economic ladder."

A lawyer for the boy countered that claim by saying the school's history isn't relevant to the issue of fundamental fairness.

"You have the school saying, 'Yeah, we discriminate by race, we admit that,'" said John Goemans, a Big Island attorney. "What the hell? That isn't America."

On the Net:

Kamehameha Schools: http://www.ksbe.edu/

9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals: http://www.ca9.uscourts.gov/

Federal Judge Tosses $240,000 Verdict In Age Bias Lawsuit (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035476

Overturning a jury's verdict of more than $240,000 in an age discrimination suit, a federal magistrate judge has ruled that a plaintiff who was fired at the age of 50 failed to prove an essential element of his case because the four workers who assumed his duties had an average age of less than seven years younger than he was.

In his 60-page opinion in Steward v. Sears Roebuck & Co., U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas J. Rueter concluded that plaintiff Gunnar Steward failed to make out a prima facie case of age discrimination.

The decision is a stunning setback for Steward and his lawyers, Carmen R. Matos of Doylestown, Pa., and George P. Wood of Stewart & Wood in Norristown, Pa., and overturns a jury's award of nearly $93,000 in back pay and $148,000 in front pay.

Matos and Wood argued that after Steward was fired, his duties were taken over by two men in their 30s and one in his mid-40s, with an average age of less than 38, or more than 12 years younger than Steward.

But Rueter sided with Sears and its lawyers -- Sidney R. Steinberg and Robert J. Toy of Post & Schell -- who said the evidence showed that a 60-year-old woman also took over some of his duties.

As a result, Rueter concluded that the average age of the workers who assumed Steward's duties was just 6.75 years -- a difference the judge found to be not enough for a prima facie case.

Rueter's ruling could force the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to revisit a vexing question that often arises in age discrimination suits -- just how much younger must the more favorably treated employee be in order to be deemed "sufficiently younger" than the plaintiff? The answer for courts in the 3rd Circuit, Rueter found, is that a difference of less than seven years is not enough.

Although the 3rd Circuit has held, in a pair of cases handed down in the mid-90s, that eight- and nine-year age differences were sufficient to establish a prima facie case, Rueter found that the appellate court's 2000 decision in Narin v. Lower Merion School District held that a seven-year age difference was insufficient.

Rueter also cited a 2003 decision from the 6th Circuit in Grosjean v. First Energy Corp. that said "the overwhelming body of cases in most circuits has held that age differences of less than 10 years are not significant enough to make out the fourth part of the age discrimination prima facie case."

On appeal, Matos and Wood face a truly daunting challenge because Rueter also said that, as an alternative to granting judgment in favor of Sears, he would at least order a new trial because the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

And even if they win at the 3rd Circuit on the age difference question, they have a second significant hurdle to clear because Rueter found another fundamental and fatal flaw in Steward's case.

Under the burden-shifting scheme of employment discrimination law, Rueter said, Sears satisfied its burden of offering nondiscriminatory reasons, and the burden then shifted to Steward to prove that the proffered reasons were merely a "pretext" for discrimination.

Rueter concluded that Steward never met that burden, and that failing to do so was a second reason for tossing out the jury's verdict.

"Even if this court were to conclude that plaintiff had established a prima facie case, the court would find that it was a very weak prima facie case established by only the slimmest of margins," Rueter wrote.

"Such a weak prima facie case, coupled with the lack of evidence showing that defendant's proffered reasons for terminating plaintiff were pretextual, would not be sufficient for plaintiff to carry its ultimate burden of proving intentional discrimination."

Matos, in an interview, suggested that the case is likely to be appealed, and that she believes Rueter intruded on the jury's role by resolving factual disputes.

Rueter's 60-page opinion included several fact-intensive sections.

In the section on the age difference issue, Rueter looked at the evidence of precisely how Steward's duties were taken over by other Sears employees after he was fired.

The plaintiff's lawyers argued that a 33-year-old man took over all or most of Steward's duties, with some duties handled by two others aged 35 and 45.

But Sears insisted that it was the 45-year-old who took over for Steward, and that, casting a wider net, the evidence showed the work was spread among four workers ranging in age from 33 to 60.

Likewise, Rueter delved deep into the facts in his analysis of whether Sears had offered valid reasons for the firing and, since it had, whether Steward had mounted a valid attack on the credibility of those reasons.

Sears had faulted Steward for, among other things, failing to complete assigned tasks; and for not responding to customer complaints.

Rueter found that Steward failed to show the reasons were pretextual.

"It is irrelevant if plaintiff thought he had completed all of these tasks correctly," Rueter wrote.

"Plaintiff's belief that the quality of his work was 'A+' or that the work difficulties were not his fault, does not demonstrate such 'weaknesses, implausibilities, inconsistencies, incoherencies or contradictions' in defendant's proffered legitimate reasons for its action that a reasonable fact-finder could rationally find them 'unworthy of credence' and hence infer 'that the employer did not act for [the asserted] nondiscriminatory reasons,'" Rueter wrote.

Critically lacking in Steward's case, Rueter said, was any evidence that Steward's boss did not believe in the reasons he offered for his decision to fire Steward.

S.D. Voters To Decide Fate Of Abortion Ban (AP-Y2)

By Chet Brokaw

AP2, June 19, 2006

Voters will have the final say on South Dakota's tough new law that bans almost all abortions.

Secretary of State Chris Nelson said Monday that the law's opponents had collected enough signatures to put a question on the Nov. 7 ballot asking voters if the law should go into effect as planned or be dumped.

The state's abortion law, among the strictest in the nation, bans the procedure in all cases except when necessary to save a woman's life, with no exceptions for rape or incest.

Supporters hoped it would prompt a court challenge that would give the U.S. Supreme Court an opportunity to overturn its 1973 Roe. v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

Instead of challenging it in court, opponents, who argue the law is too extreme, gathered enough petition signatures to put the question directly to voters.

A coalition of groups opposed to the law turned in about 38,000 petition signatures on May 30 to put the question on the ballot. The secretary of state's office determined that the petitions contained at least the 16,728 that were required.

The Legislature passed the measure and the governor signed it in March. It was scheduled to take effect July 1 but is now on hold pending the outcome of the public vote.

Both sides pledged Monday to conduct all-out campaigns on the issue.

Leslee Unruh, one of the main promoters of the new law, said the campaign to preserve the ban will seek to convince voters that abortion must be stopped because it harms both unborn babies and the women who have abortions.

"It's probably the loudest cry we've heard," said Unruh, who runs a center that counsels women considering an abortion. "It's because there are so many women who have been harmed by abortion, myself being one of them, who have come together."

Jan Nicolay, a former state lawmaker who led the effort to refer the ban to a statewide vote, said the issue should remain about South Dakota.

"It's no slam dunk. We've got a lot of work ahead of us," Nicolay said. "We'll give it all we've got, I can tell you that."

Pentagon Lists Homosexuality As Disorder (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, June 19, 2006

A Pentagon document classifies homosexuality as a mental disorder, decades after mental health experts abandoned that position.

The document outlines retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities, and in a section on defects lists homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders.

Critics said the reference underscores the Pentagon's failing policies on gays, and adds to a culture that has created uncertainty and insecurity around the treatment of homosexual service members, leading to anti-gay harassment.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Jeremy M. Martin said the policy document is under review.

The Pentagon has a "don't ask, don't tell" policy that prohibits the military from inquiring about the sex lives of service members but requires discharges of those who openly acknowledge being gay.

The Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military, at the University of California at Santa Barbara, uncovered the document and pointed to it as further proof that the military deserves failing grades for its treatment of gays.

Nathaniel Frank, senior research fellow at the center, said, "The policy reflects the department's continued misunderstanding of homosexuality and makes it more difficult for gays and lesbians to access mental health services."

The document, called a Defense Department Instruction, was condemned by medical professionals, members of Congress and other experts, including the American Psychiatric Association.

DOJ_NMG_0035478

"It is disappointing that certain Department of Defense instructions include homosexuality as a 'mental disorder' more than 30 years after the mental health community recognized that such a classification was a mistake," said Rep. Marty Meehan (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass.

Congress members noted that other Pentagon regulations dealing with mental health do not include homosexuality on any lists of psychological disorders. And in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Monday, nine lawmakers asked for a full review of all documents and policies to ensure they reflect that same standard.

"Based on scientific and medical evidence the APA declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder in 1973 — a position shared by all other major health and mental health organizations based on their own review of the science," James H. Scully Jr., head of the psychiatric association, said in a letter to the Defense Department's top doctor earlier this month.

There were 726 military members discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy during the budget year that ended last Sept. 30. That marked the first year since 2001 that the total had increased. The number of discharges had declined each year since it peaked at 1,227 in 2001, and had fallen to 653 in 2004.

Flag Needs Protection (USAT)

By Dianne Feinstein

USA Today, June 20, 2006

On the morning of February 24, 1945 — when I was a 12-year-old girl — I picked up a copy of the San Francisco Chronicle. On its cover, there was a full-page picture of the now iconic Joe Rosenthal photograph of American marines raising the United States flag at Iwo Jima.

For me and for the nation, the photograph was a jolt of electricity boosting our morale during the terrible island-to-island Pacific battles of World War II. The sight of those troops hoisting Old Glory forever cemented my view of our flag.

Today, our flag remains a vibrant symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, and our eternal memory of those who have sacrificed to defend these principles. It is because of all that our flag embodies that I have co-sponsored the Flag Protection Amendment.

Throughout our nation's history, the flag has been protected by law. In 1989, 48 of our 50 states had statutes restricting flag desecration. In 1974, Supreme Court Justice Byron White wrote that: "(T)here would seem to be little question about the power of Congress to forbid the mutilation of the Lincoln Memorial or to prevent overlaying it with words or other objects. The flag is itself a monument, subject to similar protection."

I agree with Justice White — the American flag is our monument in cloth.

But its protection ended in 1989, when the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Texas law prohibiting flag desecration. Congress responded by passing the Flag Protection Act of 1989, but the Supreme Court struck down that law as well. The only way to restore protection to the flag is to amend the Constitution. Otherwise, any legislation passed by Congress would be struck down.

The Flag Protection Amendment would not prohibit flag burning. Rather, the Amendment would simply return to Congress the ability to protect the flag as it has been protected throughout most of this nation's history.

Some opponents of the Flag Protection Amendment argue that we must choose between trampling on the flag and trampling on the First Amendment. I strongly disagree.

There is no idea or thought expressed by the burning of the American flag that cannot be expressed equally well in another manner. This Amendment would leave both the flag and free speech safe.

Dianne Feinstein is a Democratic senator from California.

Congress Nears Choice: Protect Freedom Or Stoke Anger? (USAT)

USA Today, June 20, 2006

In early June an allegedly drunken man in West Haven, Conn., yelled racial epithets and tore up an American flag while arguing with police and passersby. Earlier in the spring, instances of vandalism involving flags were reported in New Hampshire and New York.

Those three episodes of 2006 — as compiled by the Citizens Flag Alliance, a group pushing for a constitutional amendment to protect the flag — constitute the raging menace of flag desecration.

In fact, they show what a non-issue flag desecration is. Instances are rare and easily addressed by local laws. They hardly require the extraordinary act of amending the Constitution.

But in a Congress unwilling to address important matters — its own ruinous spending and flagrant corruption to name just two — symbolism is the politically convenient substitute for substance. The Senate will soon take up an amendment to stop flag burning, and the vote is expected to be razor close. The House of Representatives has passed it, meaning that it could soon be sent to state legislatures, where it would be ratified if three-quarters approve.

DOJ_NMG_0035479

While it's tempting to dismiss this as trivial election-year posturing, the precedent is troubling. It would for the first time alter the cornerstone of American freedom, the Constitution's First Amendment.

That is not a small matter. The First Amendment is the reason Americans are free to say what they think. It is also the reason people here can worship as they wish, associate with whomever they please, and get news and information from a free and independent press. It gives citizens a right to have grievances redressed. To limit those rights — especially for so trivial a reason — is to say they are no longer sacrosanct.

They should be. They are what makes America unique.

If Congress banned something as pathetic as flag desecration to score political points, surely it would consider limiting other unpopular speech.

The amendment's wording virtually guarantees that outcome. Would it, for instance, cover depictions of flags as well as actual cloth banners? Would sitting on a flag patch sewn onto the back of a pair of jeans count?

And what about the issue of flying a flag upside down? This has already become the preferred form of protest for people pushing for everything from an immediate withdrawal from Iraq to better psychiatric care for veterans. These protesters often say that they respect the values the flag represents, but that they believe those values are being subverted by people in power. Does this country really want to criminalize such a nuanced form of political dissent?

These issues would be left to legislation drafted by future Congresses and interpreted by courts. All of that, in turn, would weaken individual rights that are at the Constitution's heart.

And for what gain? Proponents of an amendment say the flag is such an important symbol of American democracy that it deserves a special status. But the Connecticut flag burner was charged with seven offenses ranging from public consumption of alcohol to criminal mischief. Surely, that is sufficient.

In fact, what makes the flag so special is this: It stands for a nation that deems individual liberties so important, it tolerates unpopular minority opinion.

The main threat to the flag comes not from the occasional burning of Old Glory. It comes from those who would sacrifice the principles the flag represents.

'A White Individual' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

With Congress poised to extend, for another quarter-century, certain "temporary" provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, it's worth pondering some of the political mischief taking place these days in the name of "voting rights."

Take New York's 11th Congressional District, a safe Democratic seat covering several neighborhoods in Brooklyn. The seat is currently occupied by Major Owens, a black Democrat who has held it since 1983 and is retiring this year. One of the four candidates to replace him is David Yassky, a white Democrat who represents some of the same Brooklyn neighborhoods as a city councilman.

Mr. Owens has one of Congress's most liberal voting records, and there's nothing in the background of Mr. Yassky, a protégé of New York Senator Chuck Schumer, that suggests he would vote much differently. Even so, Mr. Owens and the three other candidates, all of whom are black, are on a mission to force Mr. Yassky out of the race. In the case of Mr. Owens, this has partly to do with the fact that his son is among those running in the September 12 Democratic primary. But Mr. Owens, the other black candidates and local black officials have stressed that their overriding concern is the color of Mr. Yassky's skin. And they're using the Voting Right Act to justify old-fashioned race-baiting.

New York's 11th District is a product of racial gerrymandering linked to passage of the Voting Rights Act. When Congress passed the law 40 years ago to address black disenfranchisement primarily in the Deep South, some provisions were made permanent and others temporary. Gone forever were poll taxes and grandfather clauses, but Section 5 provisions of the law dealing with "preclearance," or federal oversight of local election practices, were meant to be short-term.

Study after study shows that preclearance is no longer necessary. Black voter registration and participation rates, along with the growth of minority officeholders -- often elected with white "cross-over" votes -- demonstrate that blacks are no longer disenfranchised. Yet Congress continues to reauthorize these Section 5 provisions because they allow both Republicans and Democrats to keep drawing racially gerrymandered districts in the name of protecting voting rights.

"A law passed to protect minority voters -- to ensure free and fair access to the polls -- has become much like every other affirmative action policy," says Edward Blum, a visiting fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and the author of a forthcoming book on the unintended consequences of the Voting Rights Act. "It has become, literally, a racial set-aside. The law is being used to justify actual racial proportionality."

DOJ_NMG_0035480

It's bad enough that such gerrymandering has all but eviscerated inter-party competition for seats in Congress, creating so many "safe" Republican and Democratic strongholds that the outcome of most races is a foregone conclusion. But another pernicious byproduct of gerrymandering is the racial polarization and hyper-partisanship that we see in places like New York's 11th District. These so-called "majority-minority" gerrymanders tend to nurture political division and extremism by reducing incentives for candidates to make appeals to anyone other than their racial or ethnic voting base.

Representative Owens has labeled Mr. Yassky a "colonizer." Al Sharpton, ever the statesman, has called the candidate, who is Jewish, "greedy." And the New York Sun reported last week that Albert Vann, a city councilman who opposes Mr. Yassky's candidacy, sent an email to black elected officials nationwide announcing that "we are in peril of losing a 'Voting Rights' district . . . as a result of the well financed candidacy of Council Member David Yassky, a white individual."

Ironically, such rhetoric is one reason so few minorities are able to seek and win higher office. Once you're appealing to people on completely racial grounds in order to win a House seat, you have a hard time making the broader appeals necessary to win statewide.

But don't expect any of this to matter as Congress ramrods through another extension of the provisions that feed these bad outcomes. A House vote is due any day, and the Senate is expected to follow sometime prior to the July 4 recess. Congress has never let balkanization of the electorate get in the way of protecting its own political hide, especially when it can claim to be siding with the "voting rights" angels.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Report Highlights Progress In Intellectual Property Protection (INFOWEEK)

By Larry Greenemeier, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, June 20, 2006

The Justice Department two years ago promised to beef up efforts to protect the intellectual property of software development, music, and movies. Here's the result of its efforts.

The technology world has long agonized over the government's shortcomings in protecting intellectual property. Theft of source code or even finished products costs tech firms money and potential revenue and dampens the incentive to invest in original research and development. The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday plans to issue a report signaling a positive change.

The Justice Department's Intellectual Property Task Force has made progress in protecting the content created by companies in a number of disciplines, including software development, music recording, and motion pictures, the report says. Essentially, Justice wants to convince businesses that it has followed up on promises made in 2004 to bring the hammer down on those caught lifting other people's work for their own purposes.

The Justice Department, as promised, has increased the number of prosecutors in the field by creating five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units in the District of Columbia, Nashville, Orlando, Fla., Pittsburgh, and Sacramento. Justice also opened another seven in Austin, Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, Newark, N.J., New Haven, Conn., and Philadelphia--all cities where cybercrime and intellectual property offenses are significant problems, the new report states.

Justice has also broadened its focus internationally by placing a federal prosecutor in Southeast Asia as an intellectual property law-enforcement coordinator and got funding to place a similar official in Eastern Europe. The department has trained and provided technical help to more than 2,000 foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges in the area of intellectual property investigations and prosecutions, the report states.

In March 2004, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft established the Intellectual Property Task Force, directing it to examine and suggest improvements to all the department's intellectual property enforcement efforts. By October 2004, the task force returned to Ashcroft with recommendations in the areas of criminal enforcement, international cooperation, civil enforcement, antitrust enforcement, legislation, and prevention. By the following February, Alberto Gonzalez had assumed attorney general responsibilities, appointed new task force members, and directed them to fully implement the 2004 report's recommendations.

The president's Intellectual Property Protection Act of 2005 is part of the plan. In partnership with the U.S. Patent Trademark Office, the Justice Department plans to dedicate $900,000 over three years for piracy prevention efforts with nonprofit educational organizations.

The Justice Department's progress report cites an Office of the U.S. Trade Representative statistic that intellectual property theft costs American corporations $250 billion each year. "Modern technology has increased the innovativeness of companies and the amount of new intellectual property being created, but it has also made intellectual property theft easier and more anonymous," the report states. "Computer technology and the Internet generate inexpensive and far-flung opportunities for piracy and distribution."

DOJ_NMG_0035481

The Justice Department is, along with the departments of Commerce, Homeland Security, the Office of the United States Trade Representative, and the Food and Drug Administration, part of the Bush administration's Strategy Targeting Organized Piracy effort, or STOP, and has co-chaired the National Intellectual Property Law Enforcement Coordination Council since its 1999 inception.

The FBI's intellectual property enforcement program has been increasingly busy in recent years. Between fiscal year 2003 and fiscal year 2005, the number of open intellectual property investigations increased 22%, from 304 to 372 investigations annually. The number of undercover investigations increased 87%. During the same time period, the number of indictments filed from intellectual property investigations increased 38%, from 92 to 127. Since 2001, Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Customs and Border Protection divisions have initiated more than 31,000 seizures of counterfeit products with an estimated retail value in excess of $482 million.

Impressive statistics, but as with any crackdown, the program's success will ultimately rely on a healthy dose of prevention. This has partly been addressed through a number of intellectual-property education programs for America's youth. One such program is called "Activate Your Mind: Protect Your Ideas" and consists of a series of educational events nationwide involving students, teachers, government representatives, and victims of intellectual property theft.

Real Estate System Criticized (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Consumer Group Alleges Anticompetitive Practices

A national consumer advocacy group yesterday condemned real estate trade groups as a "cartel" that sets prices and blocks competition to maintain its traditional commission structure and to keep discount firms from gaining market share.

The commission system is "cockamamie," said Stephen Brobeck, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America. Even some inexperienced real estate agents are charging a 7 percent sales commission, he said -- an amount he likened to the cost of a new car. And he questioned why the brokerage fee on an $800,000 houses is four times higher than that for a $200,000 house, saying the work involved is basically equal.

The District-based federation applauded efforts by government antitrust regulators to put pressure on the trade groups to change the way they do business, but Brobeck said no one had yet found the "magic bullet" to reduce costs. He said consumers have been left on their own and urged home buyers and sellers to negotiate over the sales commissions they are charged and make sure it is clear who is representing whom, what each agent will be paid and for what services.

Thomas M. Stevens, a local real estate broker who is president of the National Association of Realtors, fired back within hours, saying the Consumer Federation is ill-informed and incorrect.

"It's clear and evident that they don't understand the real estate business," Stevens said. "Real estate is probably one of the most competitive industries out there."

Stevens said real estate agents put themselves at financial risk showing clients from house to house and advertising homes for sale in hopes a transaction will be completed. He said that more than 2 million people in the United States hold real estate licenses and that the work has grown only more competitive and difficult with the real estate slowdown of recent months.

The federation's report came as the Michigan legislature prepares to enact rules sought by the state real estate industry to define the responsibilities of agents in ways that critics say would favor traditional firms and make it more difficult for discount and Internet-based firms to compete. The Realtor association in Michigan says the rule change is needed because some of the new firms are offering consumers poor service, leaving traditional real estate agents scrambling to keep deals together.

In October, federal antitrust regulators at the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission wrote to Michigan legislators urging them to shelve the proposed rule. The agencies said it "would reduce consumer choice and cause Michigan consumers to pay more for real estate brokerage services," according to a Justice Department statement.

Lawyer Robert Campau, vice president of public policy and legal affairs at the Michigan Association of Realtors, said that the industry welcomes the new business models but that roles need to be more clearly defined.

"What the Michigan legislation attempts to do is to make clear what people are contracting for, against the backdrop of statute already existing in Michigan," Campau said. He said that about 100 Michigan state legislators voted for the industry-backed bill and that fewer than five voted against it. He expects similar, "fairly overwhelming" support when the state Senate considers the measure in the next few days.

Federal regulators have sought to influence the debate in other states, too. In West Virginia last month, the state Real Estate Commission rescinded a rule prohibiting rebates and other discounts to consumers, after receiving a warning letter from the Justice Department. South Dakota and Kentucky also rescinded similar rules last year. But in Alabama and Texas, legislation sought by the traditional real estate firms flew to passage almost unanimously.

DOJ_NMG_0035482

The Justice Department has sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging its Internet multiple listing service policy prevents nontraditional brokers from gaining equal access to sales listing information. The trade group said it has changed its policies and is seeking to have a judge dismiss the lawsuit.

"Both sides looked for common grounds to settle, but it didn't get very far," said Stevens of the National Association of Realtors. "If the judge doesn't dismiss the case, it'll go to trial."

Justice Dept Won't Challenge Collaborative Labor Database (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. Justice Department on Monday said it won't take antitrust action against a collaborative initiative by retailers and manufacturers to develop a shared database on international factory and labor conditions.

The initiative, Fair Factories Clearinghouse, asked the Justice Department to decide whether it was concerned about potential antitrust problems with the initiative.

"The Department of Justice has no current intention to institute antitrust enforcement action against the Fair Factories Clearinghouse initiative," Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said in a letter sent to the organization.

The group's request to Justice officials described safeguards it will require member companies to take to avoid antitrust conflicts through the database sharing.

The Fair Factories Clearinghouse is designed to improve available audit information on the standards and conditions at factories around the world, according to the group's Web site.

- By Mark H. Anderson, Dow Jones Newswires, 202 862-9254; mark.anderson@ dowjones.com

FTC Signs Off On Internet Legal Referrals (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 20, 2006

Although it may not be a match made in heaven, Internet legal referral services that promise to match lawyers with potential clients have found a powerful new admirer -- the Federal Trade Commission.

In a recent letter to the State Bar of Texas, the FTC planning and policy chief, Maureen Ohlhausen, said that the Internet-based client/attorney matching services "have the potential to lower consumer costs of obtaining information about the price and quality of legal services, which is likely to lead to more intense competition among attorneys, ultimately benefiting Texas consumers."

There has been a long simmering debate in state bars around the country since the advent of these services in 1999 about whether they violate ethical rules on advertising and the bans on nonlawyer referrals for legal help.

The Arizona and Washington state bars issued ethics opinions last year foreclosing use of the services, saying that lawyers may not pay to participate in for-profit Internet matching services. Meanwhile, Rhode Island approved the online matching in 2004 as a boon to consumers, quickly joined by North Carolina, South Carolina and Utah.

The FTC letter "is a powerful endorsement of the industry," said Anna Ostrovsky, general counsel for San Francisco-based LegalMatch.

Legal matching services generally charge lawyers to sign up. Consumers seeking legal help with divorces, wills, child custody and trademark issues help describe their needs and locations online. The service sends this to lawyers in the same region and interested attorneys respond -- something like a dating service -- with their qualifications and rates, allowing clients to shop for the right match.

Most states have been sitting on their hands. The nation's largest state bars, California and New York, remain mum on the topic, but have ethics committees pondering it.

Texas may be the key.

LegalMatch asked Texas to clarify whether the service violates Texas Ethical Rule 7.03, which prohibits state lawyers from paying a nonlawyer to solicit or refer prospective clients. In August 2005, the Texas bar's ethical opinion, No. 561, indicated that lawyers may not pay to be listed on a privately sponsored Internet site that gathers information about potential clients. But it was not clear whether it covered all of the online matching services.

In response, the FTC letter states, "online legal matching services are likely to make it less expensive for consumers to evaluate providers of legal services. The information sent to inquiring clients is likely to allow consumers to compare the price and quality among several competing attorneys more cheaply than other methods of comparison."

DOJ_NMG_0035483

Ohlhausen concluded: "The burden should rest on the proponents of a restriction on competition to show that it is necessary to prevent significant consumer harm and that it is narrowly drawn to minimize its anticompetitive impact."

Austin attorney W. John Glancy, chairman of the Texas bar's Professional Ethics Committee, said that he could not disclose how the panel is leaning, when it might make a decision or who besides the FTC has submitted comments.

"It has been complete limbo for us for seven years," Ostrovsky said. "That's why we are so excited about [the FTC letter]. We asked the FTC to intervene six months ago to offer third-party guidance," she said.

Ostrovsky said that state bar rules on advertising were written before the Internet and many states have been slow to change. The ethics opinions "only add to the confusion" for lawyers, she said.

"California has not done anything either positive or negative, they simply ignored the issue," Ostrovsky said. "New York is in the same situation."

While some states take no formal position, they create confusion among lawyers who call ethics hotlines and are told they can't participate, she said.

Dennis Maio, a lawyer with the San Francisco office of Reed Smith and a member of the State Bar of California ethics committee, said, "I think the issue has been brooded about a bit." But he said the panel has not taken a position.

He described concerns that arise in considering a potential client who writes a 2,000-word e-mail about needing a divorce only to have the lawyer representing the client's spouse receive the Internet solicitation. "Now there is no confidentiality and the lawyer is obligated to use it against her," he said.

James Cooper, FTC deputy director of policy planning, said the key is whether the services are really a referral. "When you go to the state bar for a referral you get the next person on the Rolodex," he said. "[With the Internet service] you get five or six offers. It is a different model and has the potential to offer benefits to consumers."

LegalMatch, one of at least four providing the services, has found it hard to keep up with the growing consumer demand. Ostrovsky said that there are thousands of lawyers participating in their system and tens of thousands of cases coming in each month from people looking for help.

The New York state bar is reviewing, but has not resolved, the matching-service issue, a spokesman said. Among new restrictions on attorney advertising proposed by New York's appellate courts is updating all manner of attorney advertising online.

Congress Weighs Rules Of Net Access (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

Call it a battle for the future of the Internet.

As the Senate takes up the first overhaul of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, this week's debate will pitch one of the most unlikely lineups in recent political history against an entrenched industry lobby.

On one side: the big phone companies and cable providers, who want Congress to help them speed up the move into the video market and keep government regulation at a minimum. It's one of the most well-funded and experienced industry groups on Capitol Hill.

On the other side: those who use their services, who want Congress to make sure that the Internet does not become a fast lane for those who can pay - and a dirt road for those who can not. The Save the Internet Coalition includes Google Inc., Amazon.com, Microsoft, and eBay, thousands of bloggers, and more than 700 groups. It's one of the most diverse coalitions ever to lobby a bill.

At stake is whether the Baby Bells and cable companies can charge more for fast, reliable service or "discriminate" against online competitors. Groups ranging from the Christian Coalition, Gunowners of America, and Moveon.org - which are bookends on most other issues - want the government to ensure "network neutrality."

This week, the Senate Commerce Committee marks up its version of this bill. A draft released Monday includes a new Internet Consumer Bill of Rights, including a change to the Federal Communications Commission to "preserve the free flow of ideas and information on the Internet" and to "promote public discourse."

Groups lobbying for guarantees of network neutrality say that doesn't go far enough. "Despite that list of protections, there is no protection from discrimination by telephone or cable companies in favor of companies in which they have a financial interest or receive extra payments," says Art Brodsky, spokesman for Public Knowledge, an advocacy group that works in telecommunications and intellectual property issues.

"It doesn't give the egalitarian access we have now. Any time you see the Christian Coalition and Moveon.org agreeing on anything, you know something important is on the line," he adds.

DOJ_NMG_0035484

In the run-up to the Commerce Committee markup on Thursday, groups are stepping up their lobbying. Last week, the Christian Coalition and Moveon.org delivered petitions with more than 1 million signatures to Senate offices.

Meanwhile, the Bells and cable companies are filling inside-the-Beltway newspapers with full-page ads, by coalitions such as Hands Off the Internet, that argue against "legislating massive new regulations" that they say will stifle Internet growth and innovation.

It's an issue that cuts across party lines. The House passed its version of telecommunications reform June 8, after rejecting a Democratic proposal to establish network-neutrality requirements for broadband providers. The proposal, which barred blocking, impairing, degrading, or discriminating against lawful content, was rejected by 211 Republicans and 58 Democrats.

Now the focus shifts to the Senate, where a bipartisan coalition led by Sens. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine and Byron Dorgan (D) of North Dakota is calling for stronger language on net neutrality in the bill.

"As we read this bill, broadband operators will still be able to create a two-tiered Internet system, whereby people who pay more get faster and better service. Everyone else has to settle for the slow lane. That's not what made the Internet so revolutionary, and that's what needs to be preserved," says Barry Piatt, a spokesman for Senator Dorgan.

In earlier drafts of the Senate bill, Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska, who chairs the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, called only for an annual FCC study of the issue, with the promise that Congress would address any problems that develop.

"The FCC would conduct an annual study to look into net neutrality and see if any blocking is occurring. Then, Congress would act immediately," says Aaron Saunders, a spokesman for the Senate Commerce Committee.

In fact, there's nothing simple about net neutrality, critics say. The Snowe- Dorgan bill would trigger "lengthy and very cumbersome efforts by the FCC," said Mike McCurry of Hands Off the Internet at a debate at George Washington University on Friday.

For many lawmakers in rural areas, the concern is that, despite the promises, their constituents will find themselves on a slower Internet track.

Op-Ed: Don't Be Gun Shy Due To 'Jumping The Gun' Antitrust Fears (LAW)

Legal Times, June 20, 2006

Overreaction to 'Qualcomm' case should not keep in-house counsel from dealing during merger waiting periods

Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed

In almost any merger or acquisition, the acquiring company insists on "conduct of business" covenants to ensure that the target company maintains the value of its assets before closing. Imagine that in the middle of negotiating an important acquisition agreement, your antitrust counsel suddenly opines that certain routine conduct-of-business covenants are no longer permissible.

This is precisely what is happening as some counsel overreact to the Department of Justice's recent gun-jumping lawsuit against Qualcomm Inc. In-house counsel need to be skeptical of such overly cautious gun-jumping advice, which can jeopardize the success of corporate transactions.

JUMPING THE GUN

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires that transactions of a certain size be reported to the two federal antitrust authorities (the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission) and that merging parties observe a pre-closing waiting period. This waiting period gives the antitrust agencies a chance to review a transaction for potential anti-competitive effects before the parties can close the transaction.

Gun jumping occurs when a buyer exercises control over the to-be-acquired firm before the expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period. When parties are competitors, certain joint activity or information sharing before closing can also violate the Sherman Act. Whether a gun-jumping violation exists is a separate question from whether the underlying business combination violates the antitrust laws.

Unfortunately, neither of the antitrust agencies has provided specific guidelines governing what is and what is not allowable during the period between signing and closing. Although guidelines were promised by then-Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Charles James in September 2002, his successors appear to have concluded that the fact-intensive nature of this area may make such guidelines too vague to be of any use.

Because of the very limited case law in this area and the lack of agency guidelines, antitrust counsel are left to interpret agency "lore" in the form of speeches, comments, case filings, informal opinions and articles by FTC and Justice Department staff.

These materials can be overly cautionary, contradictory and subject to competing interpretations. A 1999 speech by a former director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, for example, made the incredible claim that "once a purchase contract is signed, the parties may not proceed further with joint activity." Statements such as these fail to recognize merging parties' legitimate needs for integration planning and encourage excessive caution on the part of some counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0035485

A November 2005 speech by William Blumenthal, general counsel for the FTC, retracted some of the more extreme agency statements in this area and signaled that some counsel were being overly cautious. He noted that the antitrust "agencies recognize that some information exchanges and pre-consummation collaboration necessarily occur in all mergers." Although he did provide some general guidance on due diligence and integration planning, Blumenthal unfortunately did not address merger covenants in any detail.

Perhaps because of the paucity of precedent, there are few more contentious areas among antitrust lawyers than the scope of allowable coordination and integration planning among merging parties before Hart-Scott-Rodino clearance or closing of the transaction.

As a result, in-house counsel are left to the mercy of their (and opposing) antitrust counsel's tolerance for risk. In-house counsel are frequently given lists of rigid "don'ts" that may conflict with the need to protect their bargain or plan for integration. The worst result is when the target's antitrust counsel takes an overly conservative view, thus driving the pace and scope of integration planning.

THE QUALCOMM COMPLAINT

The Justice Department has repeatedly said bringing gun-jumping cases is a priority. In April of this year, President George W. Bush's administration brought its third gun-jumping case, in which it sued and simultaneously settled with Qualcomm and Flarion Technologies.

In the Qualcomm complaint, the Justice Department alleged that Qualcomm obtained operational control of Flarion's business before Hart-Scott-Rodino clearance, in part through application and enforcement of various covenants in the parties' merger agreement. The merger agreement prohibited Flarion from acquiring, selling or licensing its intellectual property to third parties; entering into material contracts; hiring employees (except in the ordinary course of business); and making business proposals to customers without Qualcomm's prior consent.

The Justice Department also alleged that Qualcomm and Flarion's actual behavior went well beyond the scope of the covenants and permissible conduct. The department alleged that Qualcomm exercised significant, day-to-day control over Flarion's business, including participating in the routine hiring of employees, participating in the marketing of products and services to customers and prospective customers (which entailed approving price quotations and margin targets), discouraging Flarion from serving smaller customers and discouraging Flarion from providing pricing information to potential customers. Through these efforts, Qualcomm appears to have attempted to bring Flarion's policies and operations in accord with Qualcomm's practices and its future plans for Flarion's technology.

The Qualcomm case has received attention because the gun-jumping violation was based in part on merger covenants, rather than just the parties' conduct. This is not unprecedented, however. Several years ago, the Justice Department challenged considerably more problematic covenants in the Computer Associates case, including covenants that required the purchaser's approval for the prices and terms the target company would offer to its customers.

Although the Qualcomm complaint has been interpreted by some as expanding the range of prohibited conduct by merging parties, the case was in fact entirely consistent with previous gun-jumping cases brought by both the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission.

The Justice Department's complaint should not be read (as some have done) to say the merger covenants, standing alone, were sufficient to violate the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. Except for the prohibition on making proposals to customers, the covenants are fairly common and, by themselves, not problematic. In interviews after the case, enforcement officials indicated that Qualcomm's actual conduct, more than the merger provisions, was the basis for the lawsuit.

Counsel, particularly in-house counsel, should be wary of advice suggesting that standard merger covenants are now illegal or ill-advised. In the prior two gun-jumping cases (Gemstar and Computer Associates), the Justice Department expressly permitted ordinary course covenants, material-adverse-change limitations (a common means of allocating risks between the signing and the closing of an acquisition agreement), and reasonable due diligence. The division's censure in the Computer Associates case, for example, was directed at covenants that established prices or discounts or that gave one party the right to negotiate or approve the other's proposed purchases or sales.

Unlike other gun-jumping cases, Qualcomm and Flarion reported and corrected the alleged violation. Historically, the antitrust agencies have been willing to limit or forgo penalties when the merging parties quickly and fully report and correct gun-jumping activity. Here, the parties eliminated the covenant requiring Qualcomm's approval to make proposals to customers -- the only really problematic merger covenant -- and put a stop to Qualcomm's day-to-day control of Flarion.

In return for voluntarily reporting and correcting the prohibited activity, Qualcomm obtained a favorable settlement with the Justice Department. Although Qualcomm will still pay a $1.8 million fine, this represents only half of the maximum penalty available. In addition, the final judgment does not include the onerous and embarrassing conduct prohibitions and monitoring requirements typically required. For example, the final judgments in the Gemstar and Computer Associates cases require 10 years of compliance reporting and monitoring. In addition, Qualcomm and Flarion were not charged with a Sherman Act violation, which they clearly could have been, as they had been competitors in the sale and licensing of technology for wireless networks.

DOJ_NMG_0035486

THE ROLE OF IN-HOUSE COUNSEL

As counsel with the best understanding of their clients' reason for doing a deal, the business opportunities to be captured and the risk of deterioration of the target company's assets, in-house counsel have a significant role to play in securing appropriate merger covenants.

As the lawyers closest to the integration planning and activity, in-house counsel also have a critical role in preventing gun-jumping violations. They have the best opportunity to educate key people on gun-jumping issues, to monitor ongoing activity, to stop and modify conduct that is across the line, and, if appropriate, to report prohibited conduct to the government to avoid a lengthy, disruptive investigation that may delay the closing of the transaction.

Although it is customary to advise deal counsel and deal clients to bring antitrust counsel in early to avoid gun-jumping activity, in-house counsel must be alert to an excessively cautious approach by outside counsel, either from their side of the table or from across the table. Such an approach can have serious implications for the success of the transaction, as the antitrust agencies have recently recognized.

In-house counsel should push their outside counsel to think creatively about how to obtain the business objectives of the proposed transaction without running afoul of gun-jumping prohibitions. Good antitrust counsel should be able to advise in-house counsel how (not whether) an acquiring company can obtain needed due diligence, obtain necessary merger covenants and engage in integration planning with the other company -- even when the two companies are competitors.

Although merging parties certainly can go too far in interacting with one another before closing a transaction, there is more flexibility than some antitrust lawyers advise, and the Qualcomm case in no way limits merging parties' ability to achieve their business objectives.

Darren S. Tucker and Bilal Sayyed are counsel in the D.C. office of O'Melveny & Myers, where they specialize in antitrust law. O'Melveny & Myers represented Gemstar in the gun-jumping matter discussed here.

Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid For Denver Firm (AP)

By Sandy Shore, AP Business Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

Morgan Stanley Boosts Bid for Denver Energy Firm by 3 Percent a Share

DENVER (AP) -- Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc. boosted its offer for TransMontaigne Inc. by 3 percent a share, escalating a bidding war that appeared to be over last month when the fuel distribution company accepted a lower bid from SemGroup LP.

The Transmontaigne board was scheduled to meet Monday to determine whether the new Morgan Stanley offer of $11.35 a share in cash -- delivered Sunday -- would be considered superior to the SemGroup offer of $11.25 a share. The company said it would be prepared to terminate its agreement with SemGroup if the Morgan Stanley offer were better.

A TransMontaigne spokeswoman declined to comment further.

In a letter delivered to TransMontaigne on Sunday, John Shapiro, president of Morgan Stanley Capital Group Inc., said the offer would expire on Friday morning if no action were taken.

"We believe that this offer will deliver better value with greater speed and certainty than your current proposed transaction," he wrote.

Shapiro also noted that SemGroup has received a request for more information from the Federal Trade Commission which could delay any deal between SemGroup and TransMontaigne. "We do not expect to have any such delay," he said.

Mike Brochetti, a SemGroup senior vice president of finance, declined to comment on the development. If the Morgan Stanley offer were deemed superior, SemGroup would have three days to submit a counteroffer.

TransMontaigne's stock closed up 25 cents, or 2.2 percent, to $11.54 a share in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange. In the past year, it has traded between $5.07 a share and $13.20 a share.

With a market value of about $576.5 million, Denver-based TransMontaigne is a refined petroleum products company that has terminals, pipelines, and tug-and-barge operations primarily along the Gulf Coast, and in the Midwest and South.

The bidding war began in March when Morgan Stanley, which owns 10 percent of TransMontaigne, offered $8.50 a share. It has increased the offer twice amid counter proposals from SemGroup, a privately held Tulsa, Okla.-based company that delivers products from the wellhead to the wholesale marketplace.

DOJ_NMG_0035487

Late last month, TransMontaigne accepted SemGroup's latest acquisition bid of $11.25 per share in cash. The agreement between the two companies included a $10 million termination fee payable by SemGroup to TransMontaigne, should the deal be terminated by antitrust authority.

Judge Tosses Port Authority Suit (FAIRNM)

By Chris Eshleman, Staff Writer

Fairbanks (AK) News-Miner, June 20, 2006

A federal judge on Monday dismissed an antitrust lawsuit filed last year by the Alaska Gasline Port Authority against two North Slope oil companies. Judge Ralph Beistline found fault with a number of arguments raised by the port authority, finding among them that it lacked the standing needed to pursue the lawsuit in federal court.

The port authority filed the suit in federal District Court in Fairbanks, alleging BP and Exxon Mobil had conspired to keep North Slope natural gas out of the marketplace.

Beistline agreed with lawyers for the oil companies who said the state's Stranded Gas Development Act, which lays out a negotiating process for finding a way to transport natural gas to market, pre-empts the authority's lawsuit.

The judge said the port authority's project "appears well-intentioned, has accomplished a great deal to date, and may well have a valid plan."

"Decisions, however, regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska state Legislature and the people of Alaska," Beistline wrote.

Beistline's order was a response to a motion filed by the two oil companies asking the court to dismiss the case. A trial date had not been set.

Port Authority Chairman Jim Whitaker, who is also mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, declined to comment on whether the group planned to appeal.

"The Alaska Gasline Port Authority respectfully disagrees with the court's decision. We are in the process of reviewing the decision and the appropriate next steps," Whitaker said.

Bob Davis, a spokesman for Exxon Mobil, said the company was pleased with the decision. The company wants to bring North Slope gas, over which Exxon Mobil and other companies hold leases, to market but through a project different from what the port authority proposes.

"Our company has clearly demonstrated its desire to bring Alaska's North Slope gas to market through the funding of more than $125 million in technical and engineering studies related to the project, our good-faith negotiations with the state to develop a proposed fiscal contract and other actions such as discussions with the Canadian government on regulatory issues and ongoing research and technology commitments," Davis said.

Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips have negotiated an agreement with Gov. Frank Murkowski that calls for setting fiscal terms for a longer pipeline that would run parallel to the Alaska Highway through Canada. That agreement requires legislative approval in order to proceed, and the Legislature has yet to give its consent. ConocoPhillips was not a target of the port authority lawsuit.

"We're pleased that the court agreed with us that the port authority's case has zero basis of credibility and was without merit," BP spokesman Daren Beaudo said. "A gas pipeline can't be built on lawsuits, advertisements and Power Point presentations. It has to be based on good business, and Alaskans now have the opportunity to support a fiscal contract that will move a real gas pipeline project forward."

The port authority, the municipal consortium formed in 1999 by voters in the Fairbanks North Star Borough, the North Slope Borough and the city of Valdez, claimed in its lawsuit to be ready to move forward on its plan to pipe North Slope gas to Valdez, liquefy it and ship it by tanker to West Coast markets.

The consortium even found a potential business partner, Sempra Energy, willing to help it develop and finance the pipeline project and to buy and market the gas. Its lawsuit claimed the two oil companies' refusal to sell natural gas scared Sempra away from the project.

Beistline found several faults with the lawsuit.

In one part of his ruling, he rejects the port authority's claim that mergers and acquisitions performed by BP and Exxon Mobil amounted to an illegal attempt to monopolize control over North Slope natural resources.

The judge said the suit failed to show the mergers, including BP's acquisition of Amoco Corp. and Atlantic Richfield Co., had any effect on the companies' decision not to sell North Slope gas. He also found that the port authority's claims of antitrust activity were made after the federal statute of limitations has passed.

DOJ_NMG_0035488

The suit asked the court to force the companies to sell the authority some gas—gas it said it needs to gain financing—and for damages. But Beistline agreed with the oil companies' lawyers, who argued in a Fairbanks courthouse that the port authority's "ability to finance the construction of its proposed pipeline is speculative at best," he wrote.

The two companies can decide not to sell natural gas to the port authority if they choose, Beistline wrote.

State lawmakers recently wrapped up a month-long review of the contract proposed by the state and the oil companies. During that review, talk between legislators over the possible implications of the lawsuit was scant, said Sen. Gene Therriault, R-North Pole.

"I don't think there weren't a lot of people that based their decision-making on the outcome of this particular case," Therriault said.

A proposed all-Alaska pipeline project has received resolutions of support in the past from the Alaska Municipal League and the Alaska Conference of Mayors.

The port authority also filed a different lawsuit earlier last fall in Alaska Superior Court, alleging the state's Department of Natural Resources has mismanaged the North Slope's Point Thomson oil and gas unit, which contains at least 8 trillion cubic feet of gas and millions of barrels of crude oil but that sits undeveloped.

Port authority officials have said Point Thomson's reserves, if developed, would provide a key component for their project.

After the Point Thomson lawsuit was filed, the state's then-oil and gas director Mark Myers denied Exxon's development plan for the site, saying that if Exxon and fellow leaseholders BP and Chevron don't develop the field they should give their leases back to the state.

That ruling, however, has been suspended by Natural Resources Commissioner Mike Menge.

Judge Dismisses Port Authority's Lawsuit Against Oil Companies (AP)

By Anne Sutton, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) -- A federal judge on Monday tossed out an antitrust lawsuit alleging two oil companies that operate the largest gas fields on the North Slope are refusing to sell natural gas to an Alaska pipeline project other than their own.

The Alaska Gas Port Authority claims Exxon Mobil Corp. and BP PLC have conspired to crush competition and restrict the nation's supply of natural gas, and that has stymied the port authority's efforts to develop a gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope to Valdez.

But U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline on Monday sided with the oil companies and said the port authority's case could upend a competing effort by the state to forge a contract with Exxon Mobil, BP and ConocoPhillips to build a North Slope gas pipeline to Canada and markets in the Midwest.

Beistline said the port authority, as a "political subdivision" of the state, did not have the legal standing to take action that could frustrate the laws and policies of Alaska.

"Decisions regarding who, when, where, and how to accomplish this monumental task should involve all interested parties and are best made by the Alaska State Legislature and the people of Alaska," wrote Beistline.

He said the port authority failed to prove that any laws were violated. He also said great uncertainty remained concerning the viability of the authority's own gasline proposal.

High Court Seeks Government View In IPO Underwriter Appeal (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

MarketWatch, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday requested comments from the federal government on an appeal from 16 major Wall Street underwriters and investment firms trying to stop a class-action lawsuit that alleges firm commitment initial public offering practices on Wall Street violate federal antitrust laws.

The high court's request for a brief from the U.S. Solicitor General's office gives the Wall Street firms additional time to try and stop a class-action lawsuit alleging underwriter tie-in agreements - such as requiring the purchase of additional securities in the aftermarket - violate antitrust laws. A number of other claims in the lawsuit were thrown out by a U.S. District Court, but litigation over tie-in agreements was revived by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York.

The appeal, led by Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., a unit of Credit Suisse Group (CSR), also includes a number of prominent Wall Street firms. Those firms include Bear Stearns & Co., a unit of Bear Stearns Cos. (BSC); Citigroup Global Markets Inc., a unit of Citigroup Inc. (C); Goldman Sachs & Co., a unit of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. (GS); J.P. Morgan Securities Inc., a unit of JPMorgan Chase & Co. (JPM); Lehman Brothers Inc., a unit of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. (LEH);

DOJ_NMG_0035489

Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, a unit of Merrill Lynch & Co. (MER); and Morgan Stanley & Co., a unit of Morgan Stanley (MS).

The class-action lawsuit represents purchasers of stock issued by about 900 Internet and technology companies before the stock market bubble burst in the late 1990s. The lawsuit targets a number of IPO underwriting practices, arguing they are anticompetitive, and seeks financial damages. Additional related lawsuits are pending separately.

Securities and Exchange Commissioner Paul Atkins, in a Wall Street Journal op-ed column last week, said the antitrust lawsuit is "a serious threat to our capital markets" that could, if allowed to continue, spark a trend of antitrust-based suits against securities underwriters and "devastate America's process of capital formation."

Initially, a U.S. District Court judge threw out the lawsuit, ruling in 2003 that, among other things, the SEC's regulation of underwriting practices bars challenges under antitrust laws. The Second Circuit revived a portion of it in September 2005, ruling the tie-in agreements aren't covered by this immunity.

"The SEC, the expert agency charged by Congress with regulating the IPO underwriting business, has advocated immunity from these antitrust actions in the most emphatic terms," the Wall Street firms said in a court brief. "The Second Circuit's rejection of the commission's view - in an area so central to the nation's economy and the SEC's expertise - makes this a case of extraordinary public importance."

The securities industry, in several friend-of-the-court briefs, also urged Supreme Court review of the Second Circuit decision, arguing among other things that the decision would open Wall Street up to a new wave of lawsuits.

Russel Beatie, a New York attorney for the class-action investors, said the decision won't encourage frivolous lawsuits. "The decision has not encouraged the filing of antitrust strike suits because it is limited to conduct that violates the antitrust laws," Beatie said. "If defendants wish to avoid future liability, they should not engage in conduct the Second Circuit described as an 'epic Wall Street conspiracy.'"

The case is Credit Suisse First Boston v. Billing, 05-1157. The government's brief is likely to be filed later this year.

Senate Panel Proposes Net User 'bill Of Rights' (CNET)

By Anne Broache, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON--The latest Net neutrality provisions in a mammoth Senate communications bill stopped short of giving Internet companies and consumer advocacy groups all the assurances they've requested.

Unveiled formally at a briefing here for reporters on Monday, new provisions in the latest draft of the sweeping Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act would allow the Federal Communications Commission to police subscribers' complaints of "interference" in their Internet activities and to levy fines on violators.

Specifically, the bill (click here for PDF) would require all Internet service providers to adhere to what the proposal calls an "Internet consumer bill of rights." The nine principles outlined under that heading include: allowing consumers to access and post any lawful content they please; to access and run any Web page, search engine or application that they choose (including voice and video programs); and to connect any legal devices they please to the network.

Carve-outs would exist for network management purposes, such as parental control technologies and security software.

All Internet service providers, if they're not already doing so, would also be obligated to offer broadband access on a standalone, or "naked," basis--without also requiring, for example, purchase of telephone or cable subscriptions.

But critics say the latest draft, scheduled for an initial committee vote on Thursday afternoon, refrained from addressing a major complaint of advocates of network neutrality--that is, the idea that network operators should give equal treatment to all content that travels across their pipes.

Under the new proposal, "the Internet still ends up split into Lexus lanes and dirt roads, and an FCC rendered powerless to protect American consumers," the It's Our Net Coalition, a group in favor of Net neutrality mandates, said in a statement Monday. Backed primarily by Amazon.com, eBay, Google, Microsoft and Yahoo, the group includes other members such as the Christian Coalition, the Association of Research Libraries and the Consumer Federation of America.

They'd rather see passage of a bill introduced by North Dakota Democrat Byron Dorgan, Maine Republican Olympia Snowe and seven other Democrats that would flatly prohibit network operators from making deals with content providers and charging premium prices for the privilege of speedier delivery or other special treatment--what they disparagingly call a "two-tiered" Internet.

Some form of that proposal will likely be offered as an amendment to the Senate bill at a committee vote scheduled for Thursday afternoon. But its prospects may not be good--a similar, Democratic-backed amendment was soundly defeated in the House, and Senate Republicans have indicated strong opposition to the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0035490

Network operators, for their part, have said repeatedly that they have no intention of blocking or degrading their subscribers' Internet activities and have deemed bills like the Snowe-Dorgan one a solution in search of a problem. Supported mostly by conservative groups, they have defended the business model decried by Net neutrality fans as a way to guarantee better quality of service for high-bandwidth applications and to offset what they describe as vast investments in new fiber.

Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican, had emphasized in earlier remarks that he didn't want to get involved in regulating the way that companies do business--a "battle of the titans," he called it. He said instead that he believed it was important to offer protections for consumers, and his bill is designed to reflect those views, committee aides said Monday.

The new language followed ongoing negotiations between Stevens and Co-Chairman Daniel Inouye, a Hawaii Democrat. Inouye and other Democrats had criticized the original version of the sweeping broadband bill, which simply instructed the FCC to scrutinize the state of broadband competition and to report back to Congress on its findings, for not going far enough. The latest draft retains that provision in addition to the others.

Inouye said in a statement Monday that he still wasn't satisfied with the latest draft's provisions, saying they "utterly fail to protect consumers and preserve an open Internet."

The Senate's latest approach is similar to a version approved earlier this month in the House of Representatives' communications bill. Rather than legislating a detailed "consumer bill of rights," the House addresses the Net neutrality issue by giving the FCC the power to fine violators of its broadband access principles from last summer (click here for PDF). Neither bill would allow the FCC to create new rules--an idea that has also come under attack by Net neutrality fans.

The Senate version isn't immune from new complications. The Senate Judiciary Committee recently indicated it might offer a new legislative proposal that would police violations of Net neutrality under antitrust law. A similar approach offered on the House side was approved initially by the House Judiciary Committee but has stalled since then, failing to gain acceptance of an amendment to the larger House communications bill.

Mittal Says Bid Is Gaining Support (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Mittal Steel Co. is becoming increasingly confident its €23.19 billion ($29.31 billion) hostile offer for Arcelor SA is gaining momentum, pointing to pressure from Arcelor shareholders in favor of the Mittal bid.

Mittal, the world's largest steel company by output, launched its cash-and-stock bid for Arcelor in January, but Arcelor has thrown up several roadblocks to the transaction, including plans to merge with Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal, led by billionaire Alexey Mordashov, in a move to fend off Mittal's bid.

Arcelor had planned a company buyback of €5 billion that shareholders were scheduled to vote on tomorrow. But Arcelor said yesterday that it was canceling the meeting because of current talks between its management and Mittal Steel. The company said its board may decide later to reconvene the meeting "in case the unsolicited offer by Mittal Steel was not successful."

Lakshmi Mittal, chief executive and chairman of the Rotterdam, Netherlands-based company, said during an interview with Wall Street Journal editors in New York that Arcelor postponed the meeting because Arcelor knew shareholders wouldn't approve the buyback. The decision follows news that French-Polish financier and Arcelor shareholder Romain Zaleski -- who has opposed Arcelor's effort to fend off Mittal -- had picked up an additional 2.4% of Arcelor shares Friday, taking his stake in the company to 7.44%.

"The shareholders want choice to be given to them," he said. "They want to see both bids separate and cast their vote." He said the buyback would have allowed Mr. Mordashov to obtain 38% of Arcelor rather than 32%, and a postponing or withdrawing of the buyback proposal improves his company's chances to acquire Arcelor.

He also said he believed Arcelor board members pressured management to enter into talks with Mittal. "There must be a change," said Mr. Mittal. He noted that when Arcelor recently rejected Mittal's increased bid, the Arcelor board required management to enter discussions with Mittal. "Otherwise, they wouldn't have started dialogue with us," he said.

Many funds that track indexes sold their holdings in Arcelor Friday after the company was temporarily thrown out of the CAC 40 French blue-chip index. The French market regulator has said Arcelor was thrown out because of Mittal's offer for the company and would be allowed back in once the offer period is over.

In Paris yesterday, shares of Arcelor rose 20 European cents, or less than 1%, to €34.70. In Amsterdam, Mittal rose 68 European cents, or 2.8%, to €24.88. Mittal's offer currently is valued at €34.93 a share.

Mr. Zaleski's holding company, Carlo Tassara International SA, said last week that it would have voted against Arcelor's planned share buyback because it is "a transfer of cash from Arcelor to its shareholders, without any value creation." It "would destroy shareholder value, since it would protect Arcelor from any takeover bid," and the Arcelor share price would be affected, the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0035491

Mr. Mittal, Mr. Mordashov and Arcelor CEO Guy Dollé are all giving speeches at a steel-industry conference in New York today. During the interview yesterday, Mr. Mittal said he believes shareholders are increasingly moving toward his position as Arcelor executives have maneuvered to keep their company out of Mittal's hands and, in the process, have made remarks that "were very insulting" about Mr. Mittal and his company.

Siemens To Sell Stake In Corporate-Service Unit (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

On the heels of an agreement to combine its telecommunications-equipment business with that of Nokia Corp., Siemens AG said it is in talks to sell a majority stake in its enterprise unit, which supplies packages of telecom gear and services to corporate customers.

Siemens didn't identify the potential buyers for the unit, which has about €3.5 billion, or about $4.4 billion, in annual sales. But with the potential sale and its planned joint venture with Finland's Nokia, the German electronics-and-engineering giant is dismantling its telecom unit known as Com, which posted €13.14 billion in sales for fiscal 2005.

Siemens shares rose 6.7% to €66.99 ($84.67) in Frankfurt Monday as the company scales back its exposure to a sector it has struggled to master. American depositary shares of Nokia rose 12 cents to $20.09 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Technology shares boosted European markets on the news. (See related article1.)

As expected, the European technology giants confirmed Monday they will combine their businesses that supply telecom carriers into a 50-50 joint venture. The combination provides increased bulk at a time when more equipment makers are joining forces.

"I definitely think that the consolidation in the industry will mean that smaller players will be in a quite difficult position going forward," said Nokia's chief executive, Olli-Pekka Kallasvuo, in an interview.

The new company, to be known as Nokia Siemens Networks, will be No. 3 in the industry by sales, just behind the combination of Alcatel SA of France and Lucent Technologies Inc. of the U.S., which recently agreed to merge, and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden. The Nokia-Siemens agreement "validates the strategies and the market dynamics underlying our own proposed merger with Alcatel," said Bill Price, a spokesman for Lucent, which expects to complete its tie-up between October and March.

But the planned joint venture faces large challenges. A separate wave of combinations among telecom carriers means there are fewer contracts for equipment suppliers to win and slimmer margins on those due to competition from lower-priced Asian rivals.

Siemens telecom-equipment operations that supply telecom-network owners include both fixed-line and wireless equipment. By sharing its large fixed-line business with Nokia, which has been focused on wireless equipment, Siemens gives its partner a foot in the market for faster-growing broadband Internet access. It also puts Nokia in position to sell equipment that combines fixed and wireless capability at a time when many phone-service companies are moving to combine their networks.

"The boundaries are blurring here," said Simon Beresford-Wylie, the Nokia executive who will head the joint venture, at a news conference.

Still, the fixed-line business is tougher than wireless and "most of the industry has really struggled to make their respective wire-line businesses earn a decent turn," Nomura analyst Richard Windsor said in a research report. "Nokia's management has little experience of this part of the industry and is now tasked with fixing businesses that have long eluded the best efforts of Siemens."

Siemens doesn't separate the performances of its fixed-line and wireless businesses in its financial reports, but management has acknowledged the fixed-line arm has underperformed its wireless-equipment operations. During the quarter ended March 31, the Com unit as a whole posted revenue of €3.83 billion but a profit of only €27 million.

Nokia and Siemens estimate that by joining forces, they can generate cost savings of €1.5 billion a year by 2010. The combined company, which will have its headquarters in Helsinki, will begin with 60,000 workers but plans to reduce staff by 10% to 15% during the next four years.

Nokia and Siemens hope to close their venture agreement by Jan. 1.

Subsidizing Yesterday's Telephones (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035492

WHEN MONOPOLISTS CALL FOR a "level playing field," beware: Most often, what they really want is to hold back the competition. Such is the case in telephone service, as local phone monopolies are trying to saddle high-tech competitors with fees designed to subsidize the traditional phone network.

At issue is how federal and state regulators will treat voice over Internet protocol, or VOIP, services like Vonage that use high-speed Internet connections, not conventional phone circuits, to transmit calls. So far, these services have been able to escape much of the byzantine regulation that permeates the telecommunications business. In particular, they've avoided the access charges that long-distance and wireless companies have to pay local phone companies when connecting to their customers. These charges not only cover the cost of connecting calls but also subsidize phone lines in rural and other high-cost areas. VOIP also has been exempt from federal and state "universal service" fees, another source of subsidies for traditional phone lines.

Those exemptions are in danger, however. The House has passed a bill that would let the Federal Communications Commission and state regulators impose access charges or universal service fees on VOIP. On Thursday, the Senate Commerce Committee is scheduled to take up a similar proposal. Meanwhile, the FCC is expected to rule this week that VOIP firms must pay federal universal service fees.

Backers of the changes argue that VOIP users should pay to maintain and extend the phone network just like everybody else who places calls. In reality, though, firms like Vonage already are paying indirectly, through contracts with the companies that connect their calls to local phone networks. Besides, the current system is already rife with inexplicable inequalities. Local phone companies demand anywhere from a fraction of a penny to more than 30 cents a minute, depending on the source of the call.

More fundamentally, these proposals don't recognize how radically communications have changed over the last decade. Traditional phone lines aren't being displaced by VOIP services; they're being replaced by high-speed Internet connections, which offer a slew of communications alternatives. VOIP, like e-mail and instant messaging, is just an application.

With the distinction between local and long-distance evaporating, the FCC has been struggling to phase out access charges and overhaul universal service. Rather than dragging VOIP services into the morass of subsidies for phone circuits, lawmakers and regulators should focus on pushing high-speed Internet connections to every U.S. home and business. If that means people using VOIP save a few bucks at the expense of those who use other phone services, so be it. With luck, VOIP will drive up the demand for broadband and hasten its spread, diminishing the need to subsidize plain old telephone lines.

ENVIRONMENT:

Supreme Court Affirms Wetlands Protections (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland

AP2, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled Monday that the government can block development on hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands, even on land miles away from waterways, as long as regulators prove a significant connection to the waterways.

Chief Justice John Roberts, in his first major environmental case, came up one vote short of dramatically limiting the scope of the landmark Clean Water Act.

At the same time, property rights advocates won a new test for when wetlands can be regulated. Moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said there must be a "significant nexus" between the wetland and a navigable waterway.

Virtually any land in America would be covered under the government's interpretation of the law, Roberts and the court's other three conservatives complained in an opinion.

The court's four liberal members said the conservatives would have opened up sensitive wetlands to polluters.

It was a dramatic conclusion to a pair of property rights cases the justices agreed to review last fall, just days after Roberts joined the court. The Bush administration defended the law and had urged the court to stay out of the case.

The justices were so splintered that there were five separate opinions covering 100 pages.

The key decision was by Kennedy, who agreed with the liberal members that federal regulations can apply to land adjacent to tributaries, including tributaries that are not filled with water all year.

Kennedy, however, joined conservatives in ruling that regulators may have misinterpreted the Clean Water Act when they refused to let two Michigan property owners build a shopping mall and condominiums on wetlands they own.

The justices voided rulings against Keith Carabell and John Rapanos. Carabell wanted to build condos on wetlands on property about a mile from Lake St. Clair in Macomb County, Mich. Rapanos filled in wetlands near Midland, Mich., on property that is about 20 miles from a river that empties into Lake Huron. Rapanos was prosecuted by the federal government and faced a separate civil lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0035493

Justices sent the cases back to a federal appeals court for further review.

"The court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper, a Pacific Legal Foundation attorney who represented Rapanos.

Environmental groups were relieved the ruling was not sweeping.

"Five justices of the Supreme Court wrote or joined opinions that support broad protection for rivers, streams, and wetlands under the Clean Water Act," said Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel.

Jim Murphy, a lawyer with the National Wildlife Federation, said: "Justice Kennedy saves it from being an absolute disaster."

Justices seemed worried about the impact of the ruling.

Roberts said the result was confusing and that "lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

Justice John Paul Stevens, the leader of the court liberals, said Congress or the Army Corps of Engineers — and not appointed judges — should clarify the issue.

He predicted developers will be confused about whether they must get permits to do work, and federal regulators will struggle to apply a test spelled out by Kennedy to determine whether land has a connection to a navigable waterway.

Kennedy said the wetlands must "significantly affect the chemical, physical, and biological integrity" of nearby navigable waters to come under the Clean Water Act.

"There's going to be a lot of administrative headaches," said Timothy Searchinger, an attorney with Environmental Defense. "Ultimately every water body that's protected today should still be protected."

Justice Antonin Scalia led the conservative bloc, including Roberts, Justice Clarence Thomas and new Justice Samuel Alito.

Scalia said federal regulators contend they have jurisdiction over as much as 300 million acres of swampy lands in America, "including half of Alaska and an area the size of California in the lower 48 states."

"The entire land area of the United States lies in some drainage basin," he wrote.

Scalia had said the Corps of Engineers misinterpreted the term "waters of the United States."

"In applying the definition to `ephemeral streams,' `wet meadows,' storm sewers and culverts, ... man-made drainage ditches, and dry arroyos in the middle of the desert, the Corps has stretched the term `waters of the United States' beyond parody," he wrote.

Stevens said Scalia's opinion "needlessly jeopardizes the quality of our waters." He laid out a history of the 1972 Clean Water Act and said "the importance of wetlands for water quality is hard to overstate."

Scalia, Stevens and Kennedy spent nearly a half hour Monday explaining their votes from the bench.

"Important public interests are served by the Clean Water Act in general and by the protection of wetlands in particular," Kennedy said in his decision. Scalia's opinion, Kennedy said, "seems unduly dismissive of the interests asserted by the United States in these cases."

The case follows a line of difficult environmental cases at the court. In 2002, justices deadlocked 4-4 in a case that asked whether farmers should have more freedom to work in wetlands. In 2001, the court split 5-4 in ruling that the Clean Water Act does not cover isolated ponds and mud flats.

The cases are Rapanos v. United States, 04-1034, Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers, 04-1384.

___

On the Net:

Supreme Court rulings: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/opinions/05slipopinion.html

Court Divided Over Wetlands Protections (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — The Supreme Court on Monday came close to rolling back one of the country's fundamental environmental laws, issuing a fractured decision that, while likely to preserve vigorous federal enforcement of the law, the Clean Water Act, is also likely to lead to new regulatory battles, increased litigation by property owners and a push for new legislation.

With four justices on one side arguing for a sharp restriction in the definition of wetlands that are subject to federal jurisdiction, and four justices on the other arguing for retaining the broad definition that the Army Corps of Engineers has used for decades, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy controlled the outcome in a solitary opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0035494

Justice Kennedy said that to come within federal protection under a proper interpretation of the Clean Water Act, a wetland needs to have a "significant nexus" to a body of water that is actually navigable.

He then made clear, in his 30-page opinion, that whether such a relationship existed in any specific case was largely a technical and scientific judgment on which courts should defer to the federal regulators. The four parcels of land at issue in the case, all in Michigan, were likely to meet the definition, he said.

Environmental advocacy groups reacted to the decision, which sends the cases back to an appeals court, as if they had dodged a bullet, which in many respects they had. An opinion for four justices, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, would have stripped protection from many areas that federal regulators have treated as wetlands under the 1972 law.

Justice Scalia's opinion, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and by Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., said the Army Corps of Engineers had stretched its authority under the Clean Water Act "beyond parody" by regulating land that contained nothing but storm sewers, drainage ditches and "dry arroyos in the middle of the desert."

He said the agency had trampled on state authority by exercising a "scope of discretion that would befit a local zoning board."

The only wetlands properly subject to federal jurisdiction, Justice Scalia said, are those "with a continuous surface connection" to actual waterways, "so that there is no clear demarcation between 'waters' and wetlands."

The waters to which the wetlands must be adjacent, he continued, are only those that are "relatively permanent, standing or flowing." These are the only bodies of water that come within the statute's reference to "the waters of the United States," he said.

On the other side was Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. Accusing the Scalia group of "antagonism to environmentalism," Justice Stevens said the Scalia opinion "needlessly jeopardizes the quality of our waters."

Further, Justice Stevens said, the Scalia group "disregards the deference it owes the executive" as well as "its own obligation to interpret laws rather than to make them."

This, of course, was a sly reference to the slogan often heard in connection with conservative nominations to the federal courts. In effect, Justice Stevens was accusing the Scalia group of judicial activism.

The case, which was argued in February and was the oldest undecided case on the court's docket, was clearly the subject of a major internal battle that undercut any image of good fellowship and unanimity on the Roberts court.

The chief justice himself wrote a brief concurring opinion, noting that "it is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the court." He added: "What is unusual in this instance, perhaps, is how readily the situation could have been avoided."

It was not clear whether he was aiming this comment at Justice Kennedy or at the Army Corps of Engineers, which he said had failed to respond properly to a Supreme Court decision five years ago that rejected federal jurisdiction under the Clean Water Act over isolated ponds visited by migratory birds.

The chief justice noted that the Army Corps had embarked after that decision on issuing new, more limited regulations, but had abandoned the effort. "Rather than refining its view of its authority in light of our decision," he said, "the Corps chose to adhere to its essentially boundless view of the scope of its power." He concluded: "The upshot today is another defeat for the agency."

Given Justice Kennedy's refusal to go along, the extent of that defeat was far from certain. At the least, the Army Corps of Engineers may now feel impelled to embark on a new rulemaking process, leading to a regulation that would incorporate Justice Kennedy's "significant nexus" test.

Under that test, regulators need not show that a wetland is adjacent to, or connected with, a navigable body of water. Rather, it is sufficient to show that it is adjacent to a tributary that itself flows into such waters.

Justice Kennedy said the Corps needed to be more specific in defining the tributaries that count for this purpose. He said it needed to identify those "categories of tributaries" that were "significant enough that wetlands adjacent to them are likely, in the majority of cases, to perform important functions for an aquatic system incorporating navigable waters."

The current standard used by the Corps, he said, was too open-ended in permitting regulation of remote drains, ditches and streams that did not affect "the integrity of an aquatic system."

The impact of this approach will become more clear when the appeals court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, revisits the two decisions that the Supreme Court vacated. With Justice Kennedy agreeing that the appeals court needed to take a fresh look at the cases, there were five votes for a judgment to "vacate and remand."

But as Justice Stevens pointed out, one "unusual feature" of the judgment was that there were not five votes for the standard that the appeals court should apply. The judgments should be reinstated as long as the appeals court finds that Justice Kennedy's test is met, disregarding the test proposed by Justice Scalia, Justice Stevens said.

DOJ_NMG_0035495

The appeals court, in two separate cases, ruled against Michigan property owners in their battles with federal regulators. In the lead case, Rapanos v. United States, No. 04-1034, John A. Rapanos, after being informed that three parcels he wanted to develop probably contained regulated wetlands, cleared and filled the land without obtaining a Clean Water Act permit.

The government brought criminal charges against Mr. Rapanos. He was convicted, and the Supreme Court denied review of his case in 2004. The case the court decided on Monday grew out of his appeal in a civil case the government brought against him, in which he faces millions of dollars in fines.

His property is as much as 20 miles away from water that is navigable in the traditional sense. But the parcels are within the drainage systems of Lake Huron and two navigable rivers.

In the second case, Carabell v. United States Army Corps of Engineers, No. 04-1034, the Army Corps denied a permit to a couple who wanted to fill part of their property in order to develop condominiums.

In both cases, the property owners challenged the jurisdiction of the Army Corps both under the Clean Water Act and under the Constitution, arguing that if Congress had conferred such broad jurisdiction in the Clean Water Act, it exceeded its authority under the Commerce Clause.

Justice Scalia's opinion, without directly endorsing the constitutional attack, said the agency's interpretation of its authority "stretches the outer limits of Congress's commerce power." Justice Kennedy, however, said that wetlands as defined by his test "raise no serious constitutional or federalism difficulty."

However the case unfolds from here, it was plain that something went awry in the court's handling of its most high-profile environmental case in years.

Given the structure of the principal opinions, including their relative length and tone, it is possible that Justice Stevens had initially controlled the case and, on the assumption that he had five votes on his side, had assigned it to Justice Kennedy, who then strayed somewhat from the more categorical view of the Stevens four. Although he speaks only for himself, his opinion reads like a majority opinion, while Justice Scalia's opinion reads like a dissent.

Supreme Court Splits Over Protecting Wetlands (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

The federal government does not have the power to reach far upstream to protect every ditch and wetland in a watershed.

In a ruling restricting federal authority to protect the environment, the US Supreme Court on Monday said the reach of federal regulators under the Clean Water Act is limited. But the high court's nine justices were unable to reach majority agreement about how and where to draw those limits.

The result is a decision best described as 4-1-4. Four justices agreed that the law called for a restrictive view of the scope of federal jurisdiction to reach remote wetlands. Four other justices concluded that the statute permits the government to take upstream actions to prevent downstream degradation of federal water resources.

At dead center of the court sits Justice Anthony Kennedy, who provided the critical fifth vote on the restrictive side of the case. That action sends the two consolidated cases back to the lower courts where judges must divine a coherent approach to federal jurisdiction from the high court's splintered decision.

"It is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act," writes Chief Justice John Roberts in a concurrence on the restrictive side of the case. "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

The decision is a setback for environmentalists seeking to push tough federal regulations to the broadest possible swath of threatened wetlands.

"It is a defeat, absolutely," says Jim Murphy, wetlands counsel at the National Wildlife Federation. "It really places practical burdens on regulation and it also makes it more difficult for holistic watershed approaches to be used to really protect all the small waters that collectively have huge water quality implications." Partial victory for landowners

The decision marks a partial victory for developers and other landowners who believe state and local government - not federal bureaucrats - should decide how local land is developed.

The opinion relates to two cases from Michigan that were consolidated for oral argument on Feb. 21. The cases are Carabell v. US Army Corps of Engineers, and Rapanos v. United States.

In both cases, federal regulators refused to permit the development projects to go forward on lands they said were restricted wetlands. The would-be developers challenged the federal government's assertion of authority over their land.

The government claimed jurisdiction under the Clean Water Act. Lawyers for the developers argued that the wording of the Clean Water Act only extends federal jurisdiction to "navigable waters" used in interstate trade. The Supreme Court has since extended that jurisdiction to adjacent wetlands, but the high court has never identified the outer boundary of federal authority under the Clean Water Act.

DOJ_NMG_0035496

It also failed to do so in Monday's decision.

Specifically at issue in the Rapanos case was whether rainwater runoff occasionally flowing off the proposed development site was enough of a connection to federal navigable waters to trigger US government control over the development site.

In the Carabell case, the proposed development site was behind a berm. Thus, there was no runoff from the site.

Writing for the plurality, Justice Antonin Scalia said the Clean Water Act does not extend jurisdiction to channels through which water flows intermittently or channels that provide drainage for rainfall. "The [US Army Corps of Engineers'] expansive interpretation of "the waters of the United States" is ... not based on a permissible construction of the statute," Justice Scalia writes.

Although he concurred in Scalia's opinion, Justice Kennedy said the critical issue to him is whether the land has a "significant nexus" to waters that are or were navigable - thus falling within federal jurisdiction.

Kennedy says Scalia's plurality opinion is "inconsistent with the [Clean Water Act's] text, structure, and purpose."

"Justice Scalia's opinion has language that would radically restrict the act's jurisdiction, but it appears that Justice Kennedy has a more expansive read on the term 'significant nexus,' " says Mr. Murphy of the National Wildlife Federation. Carabells' condo plan ran into opposition

The Carabell case involves an effort to build a condominium project on a 19-acre site classified as a wetland. State officials were reluctant to allow the developers, June and Keith Carabell and Frances and Harvey Gordenker, to build on one of the last remaining pieces of wooded property in the area.

After the developers agreed to reduce the size of the project and set aside nearly four acres as a wetlands-water retention area, state environmental officials approved the plan.

Federal officials disagreed. They moved to block the project, arguing that the land fell within federal jurisdiction and could not be developed without a Clean Water Act permit. They refused to issue a permit. The developers sued and lost at both the trial court and appeals court levels.

In their appeal to the Supreme Court, lawyers for developers argued that there is no flow of water from their tract. Water is retained on the property in part because of a man-made berm between the tract and a drainage ditch. Since there is no flow to a tributary of a "navigable water," there is no federal jurisdiction, the developers' lawyers say.

The Rapanos case involves efforts by developers John and Judith Rapanos to build on three tracts in Michigan. Like the Carabells, they challenged the assertion of federal authority over their land. The Environmental Protection Agency claims Clean Water Act jurisdiction because rainwater runoff from each of the three properties drains into a tributary that leads to "navigable waters." Lawyers for Rapanos argued there must be a stronger connection than mere runoff from a property to trigger federal authority. Court has confronted the issue twice before

The Supreme Court has addressed similar issues twice in the past 20 years. In 1985, the court ruled 9-0 that the act's jurisdiction extends to wetlands that are adjacent to navigable waters. But the high court added in a footnote that the justices were not expressing an opinion about whether the jurisdiction extends to wetlands that are "not adjacent to bodies of open water."

The second case was decided in 2001.

In that case, the court ruled that the act does not cover an abandoned sand and gravel pit that had filled with water. The Corps of Engineers had claimed authority over the site by saying that migratory birds used the pond as habitat. The justices ruled 5-4 that the Corps was claiming powers not granted by Congress by attempting to extend its jurisdiction to ponds with no connection to navigable waters.

Split Supreme Court Narrows Use Of Wetlands Act (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A splintered Supreme Court rolled back coverage of the Clean Water Act, ruling federal regulators had gone too far in protecting wetlands lying more than 10 miles from navigable waters.

No majority of justices could agree on how to define the waters protected by the act, muddying the legal landscape for lower courts that will have to apply the ruling. The court's lineup in the case illustrated the rising role of Justice Anthony Kennedy as a swing vote on major issues.

Writing for a plurality of four conservatives, Justice Antonin Scalia castigated federal regulators as "enlightened despots" who over the law's three decades had ranged far afield of their authority. Four liberal-leaning dissenters, meanwhile, accused the majority of elevating its disdain for environmental regulation over long-standing practices accepted by Congress, lower courts and the majority of states.

DOJ_NMG_0035497

But the pivotal vote was that of Justice Kennedy, whose solo concurrence provided the fifth vote ordering a lower court to reconsider the case. "While the plurality reads nonexistent requirements into the act, the dissent reads a central requirement out," Justice Kennedy wrote.

Justice Kennedy could also be the deciding vote in a handful of potentially significant cases that remain before the court's adjournment at month's end. Those cases include President Bush's plan to prosecute suspected foreign terrorists in military courts that limit defendants' rights, and a challenge to the partisan remapping of U. S. House districts in Texas orchestrated by Republican former Rep. Tom DeLay.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired this year, often served as a swing vote on issues such as abortion and affirmative action, though not on regulatory matters.

The Clean Water decision also suggests that the early harmony of Chief Justice John Roberts's Court -- which has been noted for unanimous decisions and reluctance to issue multiple concurring opinions -- may be ebbing as the justices wrestle over deeply held views. At the court's session yesterday, not only did Justice Scalia read his plurality opinion, but Justice Kennedy and Justice John Paul Stevens took the unusual step of reading their own concurring and dissenting opinions.

Yesterday's ruling marked the second time in a week that Justice Kennedy cast the deciding vote in an ideologically charged case. Thursday, he joined conservatives in weakening prohibitions against no-knock police searches, but wrote separately to otherwise preserve the general practice of excluding evidence police seize illegally.

Yesterday, Justice Kennedy agreed that lower courts had used the wrong standard by deferring to the Army Corps of Engineers' authority over wetlands. But rather than follow the dictionary definition of waterway proposed by Justice Scalia, Justice Kennedy wrote that lower courts should examine whether the water or wetland possesses a "significant nexus to waters that are or were navigable in fact or that could reasonably be so made."

Still, the plurality and Justice Kennedy agreed that the government had exceeded its power by defining almost any place where water might be found as qualifying for protection as "waters of the United States."

"The corps has stretched the term ... beyond parody," Justice Scalia wrote, encompassing "storm drains, roadside ditches, ripples of sand in the desert that may contain water once a year, and lands that are covered by floodwaters once every 100 years."

While the act covered wetlands adjacent to interstate waterways, it couldn't be seen as protecting those that lie wholly within a single state, far from interstate channels, Justice Scalia wrote. To qualify for regulation, they must contain "a relatively permanent body of water connected to traditional interstate navigable waters" and feature "a continuous surface connection with that water, making it difficult to determine where the 'water' ends and the 'wetland' begins," he wrote, joined by Justice Clarence Thomas and the court's two new Bush appointees, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

In dissent, Justice Stevens said that "the two controlling opinions propose two very different tests for the courts below to follow" and suggested they should uphold federal regulations that pass either one. Participants in the property-rights wars agreed that the court had clarified little. "It leaves the landowner totally perplexed," said Timothy Bishop, an attorney for the American Farm Bureau Federation, which filed a friend of the court brief opposing the government. The "real uncertainty" means that farmers will play it safe and continue to seek federal permits, he said.

Joan Mulhern, an attorney with the environmental advocacy group Earthjustice, said that nearly 60% of the nation's streams could be considered "intermittent" and thus likely to invite court disputes over their coverage by the water act.

The justices ordered a lower court to reconsider decisions barring the backfilling of wetlands on property belonging to two landowners in Michigan. Justice Scalia made clear he had little doubt that the principal property in dispute, a 54-acre parcel belonging to developer John Rapanos, little resembled "waters of the United States." Reluctant to call the disputed area a wetland, Justice Scalia described it as "land with sometimes-saturated soil conditions" lying "11 to 20 miles away" from "the nearest body of navigable water."

Justice Kennedy complained that "the plurality's overall tone and approach ... seems unduly dismissive" of the government's effort to protect the environment. He took issue with the Scalia plurality limiting the act to "relatively permanent, standing or flowing bodies of water" such as oceans, rivers and lakes. "The Los Angeles River, for instance, ordinarily carries a trickle of water and often looks more like a dry roadway than a river," Justice Kennedy, a Californian, wrote. "Yet it periodically releases water-volumes so powerful and destructive that it has been encased in concrete and steel over a length of some 50 miles."

But Justice Kennedy said the dissenters, too, had misread the act, failing to limit it to "navigable" waters, or those wetlands that "significantly affect the chemical, physical and biological integrity of other covered waters more readily understood as 'navigable.'"

DOJ_NMG_0035498

Justices Rein In Clean Water Act (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that new limits could be placed on the federal government's power to enforce the 34-year-old Clean Water Act, but a set of opinions handed down by the justices did little to define what those limits might be.

The splintered decision was the clearest sign yet that the court's long-standing ideological divisions have not disappeared with the addition of two conservative justices. It also underscored that, perhaps more than ever, forming a majority in significant cases depends on winning the vote of a single justice -- moderate conservative Anthony M. Kennedy.

In yesterday's ruling, a five-justice majority agreed that the Army Corps of Engineers, the lead federal agency on wetlands regulation, exceeded its authority when it denied two Michigan developers permits to build on wetlands. The court said the Corps had gone beyond the Clean Water Act by making landowners obtain permits to dump rocks and dirt not only in marshes directly next to lakes and rivers but also in areas linked to larger bodies of water only through a network of ditches and drains.

But there was no clear majority as to where the Corps should have drawn the line, with a four-justice plurality made up of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. arguing for an across-the-board reduction in the Corps' regulatory role but Kennedy rejecting that view and calling for a case-by-case approach.

The net effect of the most important Clean Water Act case to reach the court in recent years was thus neither the outright rollback of federal wetlands regulation that property rights advocates have long sought nor the reaffirmation of the Clean Water Act that environmental organizations had desired.

Instead, unless Congress amends the law or federal regulators change their rules, the likely outcome is more litigation in lower courts, with property owners, U.S. agencies and federal judges trying to figure out how to satisfy the standards sketched in Kennedy's solo opinion.

"The practical effect is that some bright-line rules that have been applied for decades haven't been thrown out . . . but have had a significant cloud set over them by Justice Kennedy," said Richard J. Lazarus, a professor of environmental law at Georgetown University.

The key issue in the twin cases decided yesterday, Rapanos v. U.S. , No. 04-1034, and Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers , No. 04-1384, was the meaning of a single phrase in the Clean Water Act.

The landmark 1972 environmental legislation gave federal regulators the power to control the discharge of pollutants into "navigable waters." On the theory that what gets dumped upstream eventually winds up downstream, the government has interpreted that term to include not only large lakes and rivers but also their smaller tributaries, including some ditches or stream beds that are dry for all or most of the year and wetlands near those tributaries.

The Bush administration, backed by environmental organizations and more than 30 state governments, told the court that any narrower interpretation would cripple the Clean Water Act.

But property owners, backed by home builders, developers, farmers, ranchers and some water districts from the arid West, say that the Army Corps' view has federalized every drop of water in the country, putting Washington in charge of development miles away from any recognizably navigable waters.

The Michigan properties at issue included the Rapanos family's three parcels, of which one is close to the Pine River, a tributary of Lake Huron, and two are wetlands that drain into creeks that drain into two other rivers that flow into navigable waters. June Carabell's 19 acres are about a mile from Lake St. Clair but are connected to it by a network of man-made ditches.

Two recent Supreme Court rulings pointed in different directions. In 1985, the court ruled that the federal government could regulate wetlands "adjacent" to navigable waters. But in 2001 it ruled that the federal government could not control waste dumping in isolated water-filled depressions in Illinois. Though the Corps said it had jurisdiction over the ponds because migratory birds flocked there, the court ruled they lacked a "significant nexus" to navigable waters.

In an opinion for the four-justice plurality yesterday, Scalia wrote of "the immense expansion of federal regulation of land use that has occurred under the Clean Water Act" and argued that the only way to cut back on it was to restore a common-sense definition of navigable waters as "relatively permanent standing or flowing bodies of water."

But Kennedy disagreed. Borrowing from the court's 2001 opinion, he suggested that the proper definition could include temporary channels of water, as long as they had a "significant nexus" to larger bodies. They must "significantly affect the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of other covered waters more readily understood as 'navigable,' " he wrote. Those wetlands with only a "speculative or insubstantial" connection would not qualify, Kennedy noted.

Both sides in the debate rushed to put the most favorable interpretation on Kennedy's opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0035499

M. Reed Hopper, principal attorney for the Pacific Legal Foundation, who represented the Michigan property owners in the case, said it was a "great win for the regulated public" because it "specifically rejected the idea that the Army Corps . . . could regulate no matter how insignificant" the connection to navigable waters.

But Timothy Searchinger, a senior attorney with Environmental Defense, said in a prepared statement: "Justice Kennedy agrees that wetlands in the Upper Midwest can protect against vast water quality problems in the Gulf of Mexico. What his opinion seeks is that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers set forth that proof. The proof is there, and when it is presented, I am confident that the reach of the Clean Water Act will change very little."

Lazarus likened the splintered decision to the 1978 Bakke case, in which four justices voted to uphold a minority admissions quota at a California medical school, four voted to strike it down, and a ninth justice, Lewis F. Powell Jr., voted to strike it down but suggested an alternative legal basis, diversity, for other race-conscious admissions policies.

The status of Powell's opinion was debated over the next 25 years, until a majority of the Supreme Court finally embraced it in a 2003 case.

That assessment of yesterday's result seemed to be shared by some members of the court.

In a brief concurring opinion, Roberts alluded to the affirmative-action cases and noted that it was "unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act." He added: "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

And Justice John Paul Stevens, in a dissenting opinion joined by Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, argued that Kennedy's approach will not cut back on the scope of the Clean Water Act "in the long run." But, in the meantime, it "will have the effect of creating additional work for all concerned parties," Stevens wrote.

Stevens argued that the court should have accepted the Army Corps of Engineers' view of its own authority, as both Congress and the executive branch had acquiesced to it for decades.

Supreme Court Justices Show Support For Wetlands Protection (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court today upheld the broad power of federal environmental regulators to protect most wetlands from development, even in areas that are dry much of the year.

The decision by five justices dashed the hopes of private property advocates who believed that the more conservative court was ready to sharply cut back the reach of the Clean Water Act.

At issue was an estimated 300 million acres of sometimes swampy ground that includes half of Alaska and an area as large in California. Since the 1970s, the Army Corps of Engineers has said the owners of this land may not fill it or drain it without a permit.

Last year, the court voted to take up a property rights challenge to the broad reach of federal authority. It was brought on behalf of John Rapanos, a Michigan developer who was fined heavily after he had filled in wetlands on three farm fields that were about 20 miles from Lake Huron. After a heavy rain, water from these fields flowed into a drainage ditch, and from there to a tiny stream.

Rapanos acknowledged that federal authorities could prevent the pollution of "navigable" rivers, bays and lakes, but he maintained that they could not exercise control over inland wetlands like those on his fields.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., both new to the court in the past year, agreed with Rapanos and joined an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia. They argued that only wetlands that were connected to steadily flowing streams came under federal protection, an opinion that Justice Clarence Thomas also accepted.

This opinion would have stripped away federal protection from most wetlands that are well inland and nearly all those in the West because their streambeds are dry most of the year.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a native of Sacramento, balked and wrote a separate opinion that essentially upheld the broad reach of the law. He cited the Los Angeles River and other streams in the West that send "torrents thundering" downstream, but only for short periods of the year.

Kennedy said Scalia's opinion was "unduly dismissive" of the importance of wetlands and was "inconsistent with the text, structure and purpose" of the Clean Water Act. This measure was passed a few years after an oil slick on the Cuyahoga River in Cleveland caught fire in 1969, an embarrassment that focused the nation's attention on polluted water.

Afterward, Congress sought to clean up the "waters of the United States" by giving federal regulators broad authority to stop pollution at its source. A few years later, the Army Corps of Engineers said wetlands helped filter pollution from water and lessen the impact of flooding.

DOJ_NMG_0035500

Kennedy said federal authority did not extend to isolated wetlands whose filling would have no effect on "downstream water quality." However, if environmental regulators could show that dredging or filling a wetland could "significantly affect" the waters downstream, they could protect it from development.

Until today, federal regulators — including the Bush administration — said wetlands were under federal jurisdiction if a single drop of water could flow from them to the sea. Lower federal courts for Michigan upheld the government's fine of Rapanos based on that theory.

Kennedy voted with his conservative colleagues to overturn the trial court's initial ruling and give the court an opportunity to reconsider the issue. As guidance, he also said there appeared to be evidence that filling the fields on Rapanos' land had an effect on downstream waters.

He described his view of the law as being closer to the interpretation of the court's four liberals — who said they would have upheld without question the broad reach of the Clean Water Act — than that of the four conservatives.

The court's 4-1-4 split left activists on both sides of the issue a bit unsure about the future.

Several environmentalists expressed relief. "Today, five justices of the Supreme Court wrote or joined opinions that support broad protection of rivers, streams and wetlands," said Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel.

The National Resources Defense Council said it was pleased the court "rejected an attempt by the court's conservative wing to dramatically roll back" a key environmental measure. But it also said the outcome "muddies the water" because it will force more legal battles over which wetlands are protected.

The Pacific Legal Foundation, which represented Rapanos, said it was pleased the court had "rejected unlimited federal control" of wetlands.

"It is not the role of the federal government to micromanage every pond, puddle and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper, a lawyer for the foundation.

Supreme Court Splits Sharply On Wetlands Protections (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 20, 2006

On a day that foreshadowed politically charged battles ahead, the Supreme Court on Monday divided sharply on the scope of the Clean Water Act while also agreeing to widen its review of the federal partial-birth abortion ban next fall.

In the long-awaited Clean Water Act cases Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States, Justice Antonin Scalia won three other votes for a narrow interpretation of the act's scope, while Justice Anthony Kennedy concurred in the judgment but offered his own more sweeping interpretation -- guaranteeing continued litigation.

In Scalia's view, the law requiring permits to fill "navigable waters" covers only "relatively permanent" streams, rivers, and lakes -- not intermittent or merely "hydrologically connected" waters. However, Kennedy's concurrence sketched out a much broader standard, one that would apply the law's permit requirement to those seeking to fill any waters and wetlands with a "significant nexus" to navigable waters.

Environmental groups seized on Kennedy's concurrence as the controlling opinion and expressed relief that their fears of a substantial loss of Clean Water Act jurisdiction had not come to pass.

"The ultimate effect of the Supreme Court's decision on the Clean Water Act is to leave the Act's protection of wetlands and other water bodies in place, but subject to proof that they do in fact have a 'substantial nexus' to downstream water quality," said Tim Searchinger, lawyer with the group Environmental Defense, in a statement. "The decision kicks the ball down the road and will create some major administrative headaches, but in the end, the protection of this country's water bodies should change little."

In cases where no opinion garners five votes, the opinion that concurs with the judgment on the narrowest grounds is usually regarded as the most important. The most famous example of this rule is the 1978 landmark affirmative action case Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, in which a concurrence by Justice Lewis Powell Jr. for himself alone was viewed as the controlling opinion in the case.

"Environmental law now has its own Bakke," said Georgetown University Law Center professor Richard Lazarus, who said the Kennedy concurrence controls the case because it rejects Scalia's more sweeping reinterpretation of the law.

The Clean Water Act cases were seen as the first test of the environmental views of the Court's new justices, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. Both joined Scalia's plurality opinion.

Spectators in the Court chamber on Monday witnessed the rare sight of Scalia criticizing, from the bench, not only the dissent by Justice John Paul Stevens but also Kennedy's concurrence for "ignoring the text" of the Clean Water Act. Kennedy and Stevens also summarized their writings from the bench. It is rare for a concurring justice to read from his or her opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0035501

Also on view was a dispirited liberal wing of the Court. Though Stevens, 86, read from his dissent vigorously, the justices who joined him -- Stephen Breyer, David Souter, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- appeared gloomy and fatigued.

In the Clean Water Act cases, the Court seemed aware that its resolution of the case would satisfy almost no one. Roberts lamented that because no opinion commanded a majority of the justices, "lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

Dissenting Justice Stevens said the Scalia opinion "disregards the fundamental significance of the Clean Water Act" and trivializes its protection of wetlands adjacent to waterways.

The cases before the Court involved two Michigan developers thwarted in their plans by environmental regulations. John Rapanos has been trying for nearly 20 years to build a shopping center near Midland, Mich. His sites were deemed to be wetlands, but Rapanos -- arguing that the nearest navigable water is 20 miles away -- began construction without permits. Similarly, June Carabell sought to build condominiums on forested wetlands in Macomb County, Mich. She applied for a fill permit, but the Army Corps of Engineers turned her down.

The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against both developers and in favor of federal jurisdiction over the projects. The administration argued for the broader view of jurisdiction.

The effect of Monday's ruling is to return both cases to the 6th Circuit for review in light of the high court ruling. Scalia said it would be up to the lower courts to decide if the wetlands involved fit his definition of "possessing a continuous surface connection" with navigable waters. Kennedy said the lower court should use his "significant nexus" standard. And Stevens -- noting that under his four-justice dissent, Army Corps of Engineers jurisdiction was guaranteed no matter which standard is used -- said that the earlier circuit court rulings should be reinstated if either Scalia's or Kennedy's test is met.

Lawyers opposed to the broad interpretation of the law were also heartened by the decision. "The Court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle, and ditch in our country," said Reed Hopper of the Pacific Legal Foundation, which represented Rapanos. "We are encouraged by this decision and believe it represents a good first step toward common sense regulation."

Also Monday, over the objection of the Solicitor General's Office, the Court granted review in a second case that tests the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. The Court has already docketed Gonzales v. Carhart, a Nebraska challenge to the same law based on the law's omission of a "health exception" that allows the controversial procedure if needed to preserve the health of the mother.

The new case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood of America, stemmed from a 9th Circuit ruling that struck down the law on the additional ground that it was unconstitutionally vague.

In briefs filed with the Court, the administration appealed the 9th Circuit ruling but urged it to hold the case in abeyance pending a decision in the Nebraska case. The Court rejected the advice. The two cases are likely to be argued in tandem this fall, but no date has been set.

The Court on Monday also issued two rulings that followed up on its landmark 2004 ruling in Crawford v. Washington, which strengthened the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause. That clause guarantees the right of criminal defendants to be confronted at trial with the witnesses against them. In Crawford, the Court barred the use in criminal trials of testimonial statements made by witnesses who did not appear at trial.

In companion cases Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, the Court said the rule does not exclude use of the tape of a 911 call that was made to seek police help in a domestic-violence emergency. Statements made in such a call are not testimonial, said Scalia for an 8-1 majority, and therefore do not violate the Confrontation Clause. The Court also found, however, that an after-the-fact affidavit given by a woman to police in a separate domestic-violence case was a testimonial statement and therefore could not be introduced as evidence at trial in lieu of the witness.

Clean Water Act Reach Limited: U.S. Supreme Court Overview (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, June 20, 2006

June 19 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court limited the reach of the Clean Water Act, saying it applies only to wetlands with a close connection to a river, lake or some other major waterway.

The justices, voting 5-4, ordered a new round of hearings for two sets of Michigan landowners whose efforts to build on their property have been stymied by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. The majority was divided in its reasoning, with Justice Anthony Kennedy refusing to join four other justices in putting even more restraints on the federal regulators.

Kennedy's separate opinion now becomes the controlling law. He established a new test, saying the Corps can regulate only wetlands that have a ``significant nexus" to a major waterway. He also said that in both cases before the justices, the Corps had at least some evidence of that type of connection.

DOJ_NMG_0035502

Kennedy's reasoning drew criticism from both ends of the court. Justice Antonin Scalia called Kennedy's test ``opaque'' and said it ``tips a wink at the agency, inviting it to try its same expansive reading again.''

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Samuel Alito and Clarence Thomas joined Scalia's opinion. The case marked the first environmental test for the court's newest justices, Roberts and Alito.

Stevens Dissent

Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the four dissenters, said Kennedy's test will create new uncertainty and additional work for regulators and landowners. He also said the new test ``will probably not do much to diminish the number of wetlands covered by the act in the long run.''

Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter also dissented.

The ruling is a partial setback for environmentalists and the Bush administration, which argued in favor of broad federal power to restrict development.

Kennedy's test has ``never been applied or used anywhere,'' said Joan Mulhern, senior legislative counsel at Earthjustice, an environmental group based in Oakland, California. ``I'd hesitate to say I agree with it or to say I don't agree with it because I'm not sure what it means.''

Groups backing the landowners included homebuilders Pulte Homes Inc. and Centex Corp. and trade associations representing the real-estate, oil and farming industries.

``The court is clearly troubled by the federal government's view that it can regulate every pond, puddle and ditch in our country,'' said Reed Hopper, a Sacramento, California, lawyer who represented landowner John Rapanos in one of the cases. ``We are encouraged by this decision and believe it represents a good first step toward common sense regulation.''

Commerce Clause

In focusing on the meaning of the Clean Water Act, the court didn't decide a more far-reaching question presented by the case -- whether Congress has power to regulate those wetlands under the Constitution's Commerce Clause.

Separately, the court today ruled that crime victims' statements to police 911 operators about an ``ongoing emergency'' can later be used as trial evidence when the victim isn't available for cross-examination.

The court also:

-- Asked the Bush administration for advice on a securities- industry bid to block antitrust lawsuits that accuse investment banks of rigging initial public offerings.

-- Agreed to consider a bid by Michigan to regulate Wachovia Corp.'s mortgage-lending business in a case that may open banks to new oversight across the country.

-- Broadened its review of a federal law banning what opponents call ``partial-birth abortion'' by adding a California case to its 2006-07 argument schedule. The justices were already set to hear arguments from a group led by a Nebraska doctor.

Juvenile Murderers

-- Refused to reconsider its year-old decision barring executions of murderers who were under 18 at the time of the crime, turning away an appeal by Alabama's attorney general.

-- Refused to question Swedish Match AB's right to sell cigars in the U.S. under the Cohiba brand name, turning away an appeal by a company owned by the Cuban government.

-- Rejected a challenge by five states to part of the funding mechanism for the new Medicare prescription-drug program.

The two wetlands disputes raised slightly different questions. Rapanos was accused of destroying wetlands, without a permit, on three central Michigan sites he hoped to develop. Regulators are seeking as much as $13 million in fines and restoration of the site.

Nearest Tributary

The Cincinnati-based 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that the Clean Water Act covered Rapanos's property because the land had a hydrological connection to navigable waterways, ultimately draining into either the Tittabawassee River or Lake Huron. Rapanos says his land is far away from the nearest tributary -- 20 miles in the case of one site.

In the second case, a group led by accountant Keith Carabell wants to build a condominium complex on land near Detroit. The 6th Circuit said the property was an ``adjacent wetland,'' covered under the Clean Water Act, because only a man-made barrier separated the land from tributaries of Lake Huron and Lake Erie.

Carabell says no hydrological connection, either on the surface or underground, exists between his land and any tributary. The Bush administration disputes that contention.

The court scaled back the clean-water law in 2001, when it struck down a Corps of Engineers rule designed to protect migratory bird habitats on local ponds. The justices in that case said the rule lacked a ``significant nexus'' to the ``navigable waterways'' that are covered under the Clean Water Act.

Environmental Consequences

DOJ_NMG_0035503

Kennedy today said the ``significant nexus" phrase provides the key to applying the Clean Water Act, even though that language doesn't appear in the statute itself.

In the Rapanos case, Kennedy pointed to expert testimony about the environmental consequences of developing the land and a trial judge's finding of a surface connection to tributaries of navigable waterways. He said that type of evidence would help the Corps make its case, ``particularly if supplemented by further evidence about the significance of the tributaries."

At the same time, Kennedy said the appeals court went too far in permitting regulation any time a hydrological connection exists. ``Absent some measure of the significance of the connection for downstream water quality, this standard was too uncertain," he wrote.

In the Carabell case, Kennedy said the lower courts should assess ``the quality and regularity of flow in the adjacent tributaries."

Scalia would have required a continuous surface connection to a river, lake or other permanent body of water, saying that was the most plausible reading of the Clean Water Act's language. He said Kennedy ``has devised his new statute all on his own."

Stevens would have upheld the 6th Circuit's ruling, saying the Corps ``has reasonably interpreted its jurisdiction to cover non-isolated wetlands."

The cases are Rapanos v. U.S., 04-1034, and Carabell v. Army Corps of Engineers, 04-1384.

Clean Water At Risk (NYT)

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The United States Supreme Court issued a decision on wetlands yesterday whose main virtue is that it could have been much worse. It sided with two developers who want to build on endangered wetlands, but the court's conservatives could not muster the fifth vote they needed for a very restricted view of the Clean Water Act. Still, the signs are ominous. Right now, Justice Anthony Kennedy, the swing vote in the case, is all that appears to stand in the way of gutting critical environmental protections.

The court ruled on a case arising out of Michigan, where developers filled in wetlands without a permit. The issue is whether these particular wetlands — which are not directly adjacent to navigable waters, but are adjacent to tributaries to those waters — are protected by the Clean Water Act. The Army Corps of Engineers, the administrative body charged by Congress with making these decisions, ruled that they are.

Four justices — including Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, the two newest appointees — wanted to apply a dangerously difficult, and largely invented, test for what constitutes a wetland. The court's four most liberal members voted, rightly, to uphold the Army Corps' decision. Justice Kennedy sided with the conservatives on overturning the corps, but set out his own standard for which waters are covered. His test is a moderate one, and there is every reason to believe the corps will meet it when this case continues on remand.

Congress, though, should clear up any confusion by passing the Clean Water Authority Restoration Act. By doing so, it will reiterate that it wants extremely broad protection for the nation's waterways, and that it, not the judiciary, should decide which ones are protected.

For all the talk of liberal judicial activists, it was Justice Antonin Scalia and his fellow conservatives who voted to substitute their own preferences for a decision made by the executive branch, in the form of the Army Corps, interpreting a statute passed by Congress. It was the liberals who were "judicially modest," to use a favorite phrase of Chief Justice Roberts, deferring to the elected branches.

Justice Kennedy's role is especially notable. He wrote a careful opinion, much in the tradition of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, that refused to go along with any large-scale assault on ecologically fragile lands. His opinion suggests that in this sharply divided court, at least in environmental law, the precarious center can hold.

Parsing The Waters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The Supreme Court tiptoed up to the edge of a landmark property-rights ruling yesterday, but in the end it merely dipped a toe in the water without deciding whether to jump in or not.

The vote in the case left little room for doubt about the reason for the Court's indecision -- his name is Justice Anthony Kennedy. The Court split, in effect, 4-1-4 in Rapanos v. U.S., which covered two separate cases concerning federal jurisdiction over "wetlands" under the Clean Water Act. Mr. Rapanos had filled a wetland that was essentially a drainage ditch without a permit back in 1989. Five years later, the government filed suit against him. Mr. Rapanos lost, and that decision was upheld by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0035504

The Supreme Court vacated that decision Monday and sent it back to the lower courts to try again. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for four of the Justices, clearly would have gone farther in reining in the expansive interpretations of the Clean Water Act that have taken hold over the last three decades. Thanks to the Army Corps of Engineers, the definition of "navigable waters" can now include puddles and drainage ditches and has turned the law-abiding likes of Mr. Rapanos into wetlands desperadoes.

In his own separate opinion, Justice Kennedy agreed to vacate the ruling but refused to go as far as the rest of the majority. The result is that the final outcome in both the Rapanos case and Carabell v. U.S., another drainage ditch fiasco also decided yesterday, remains in doubt. On remand, the lower courts could modify their reasoning but uphold their decisions. As Justice Scalia noted in his opinion, Justice Kennedy seemed to "tip a wink" at the government in his concurrence, "inviting it to try its same expansive reading again" as long as it cites Justice Kennedy's logic.

Chief Justice John Roberts -- who, with Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito, joined with Justice Scalia's opinion -- also wrote a concurrence in which he lamented that it was "unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court on precisely how to read Congress' limits on the reach of the Clean Water Act." As a result, he warned, "Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

In other words, welcome to the Kennedy Court. It didn't take a brilliant legal mind to see that, after the confirmations of Justices Alito and Roberts, the protean Justice Kennedy would seek to become the "swing" vote. The Rapanos case illustrates this in spades, with Justice Kennedy trying to define a middle ground between the liberal and conservative minorities on the court.

The result is an opinion that no one else saw fit to join, and yet could well prove controlling in future wetlands cases -- assuming anyone can determine just what Justice Kennedy was trying to say. His concurrence is a Kennedy classic, with a hifalutin-sounding "significant nexus" test for lower courts to apply and no shortage of ersatz objectivity and even-handedness.

As Justice Scalia tartly observed, at least the four liberal Justices defer to the Army Corps of Engineers. Justice Kennedy's opinion essentially rewrites the Clean Water Act, substituting his inventive afflatus for the Congress and the Corps and the rest of the bench -- a kind of activist trifecta.

Chief Justice Roberts also needled Justice Kennedy by pointing out that the Court's confused message here "is certainly not unprecedented," citing specifically the 2003 Grutter v. Bollinger decision. That was a racial quotas muddle issued by the Court's previous great muddler, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but in which Mr. Kennedy dissented. The Chief Justice also lamented "how readily the situation could have been avoided" -- i.e., had Justice Kennedy not decided to play philosopher king.

Some court-watchers predicted that Justices Roberts and Alito would help draw Anthony Kennedy to the right, lest he feel isolated by the high-powered intellects of the Court's four conservatives. The good news from yesterday's ruling is that the Court's two newest members came down solidly on the side of property rights in their first big environmentalism case. The bad news is that Justice Kennedy lacked the courage of their convictions.

Panel Reaches Deal On Drilling Off U.S. Coasts (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — The chairman of the House resources committee said Monday that the committee had reached bipartisan agreement on a measure that would open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas exploration.

Representative Richard W. Pombo of California, the chairman, said the agreement was a compromise that would give states the option to drill in waters that the federal government had kept off limits to energy exploration for decades. At the same time, lawmakers also tried to satisfy lawmakers from Florida and other states who have opposed any drilling within 100 miles of their coastlines.

The agreement, scheduled for a committee vote on Wednesday, would replace a longstanding executive order barring most drilling on the shelf with legislation that would bar drilling in the first 50 miles of coastal waters unless states chose to opt out by vote of their Legislature and the approval of their governor.

In areas between 50 and 100 miles offshore, states would have one year after the legislation is enacted to prohibit drilling for natural gas and three years to prohibit drilling for oil.

The bill would also give the secretary of the Interior Department the authority to renegotiate royalty agreements with energy companies.

Calling the measure "comprehensive, balanced and forward-thinking," Mr. Pombo said it addressed the growing need for the country to develop more of the energy resources it controlled.

Mr. Pombo said the House leadership had assured him that the bill would come to the floor for a vote this year, but its prospects beyond that are uncertain.

DOJ_NMG_0035505

Scent Of Ballots Is In Air, And Energy Bills Are Blooming (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Senator Larry E. Craig, Republican of Idaho, has introduced a bill that would allow American oil companies to work in partnership with Cuba, drilling for energy supplies off its coastline. A proposed measure from Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, Democrat of New York, would eliminate a slew of tax breaks for oil and gas companies.

Representative Dan Lungren, Republican of California, has proposed legislation that would award $1 billion to the first automaker in the United States to sell 60,000 mid-size sedans that can travel 100 miles on a gallon of gas.

Any notion that energy policy was set for a while after President Bush signed the first major energy bill in a decade last August would be wrong. Not only are gasoline prices higher now than they were then — more than $3 a gallon in many parts of the country — but elections are approaching. Judging from the bulk of new energy-related legislation floating around Congress, woe to the lawmaker with no response to the voter who asks, "So, what have you done about energy costs?"

"Not a legislator in the United States wants to go home over the July 4 holiday and not point to something he or she did," said Jason S. Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, a coalition of experts that works for bipartisan energy policy. "Whether that's a cynical politician or one who's reacting to his constituents is a matter of perspective."

Since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita shut down refineries in the Gulf of Mexico region last summer, speeding the rise of gasoline costs, House members have introduced 267 energy-related bills and senators have introduced 210, according to an analysis by the Senate energy committee.

Many of the bills are directed at gasoline prices as lawmakers seek to increase domestic oil supplies; other proposals would help expand refinery capacity; and some would overturn offshore-drilling bans. At least one would lower personal income taxes to offset rising gas prices.

John B. Breaux, a former Democratic senator from Louisiana and now a lobbyist who has represented energy companies, called the flurry of bills being introduced "acts of desperation by Congress to address very serious problems."

"The energy bill will do a lot of good," he said. "But this is an election year, the problems are still there and people want immediate solutions."

Whether they get them is another matter. Energy experts agree that the world crude oil price, now about $64 a barrel, has greater influence on gasoline costs than anything Congress does, short of changing the federal per-gallon tax.

Beyond that, energy legislation rarely passes easily, given how lawmakers are divided over the long-term changes needed to wean the country from foreign oil and to lower prices. Republicans and energy producers generally favor expanding domestic fuel supplies through drilling and nuclear development. Democrats and environmental groups generally prefer greater use of renewable fuels and more emphasis on conservation.

A further complication is the limited time available for debate before the mid-October recess that precedes the Nov. 7 elections.

Last year's energy bill was the rare piece of omnibus legislation that drew the parties together, largely because it had something for everybody and satisfied the growing realization across party lines that renewable energy would play a growing role in the nation's energy portfolio. As one example of its even-handed approach, the bill gave energy companies tax breaks for exploration yet offered no path toward opening new energy fields in the Arctic National Wildlife Preserve or the Outer Continental Shelf.

"The energy bill was massive, but it was a compromise," said Representative Joe L. Barton of Texas, chairman of the House energy committee. "A lot of the things the most aggressive environmental groups wanted, they didn't get. A lot of the things proponents of domestic development wanted, they didn't get."

"Now," he added, "they're coming back to get them."

The result is a flow of legislation, which has had a dizzying effect on the committee chairmen who have to decide which measures deserve consideration and which have a chance to win bipartisan support. Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the energy committee, said the 2005 bill had served as "an open invitation for people introducing legislation that purports to solve one or more problems in one or more ways."

"If you can dream up a solution," he said, "we'll have five bills tomorrow."

But none of the measures are likely to pass, he added, without strong support from both parties, especially in the Senate, where Democrats have routinely used the threat of filibuster to block initiatives they oppose, like drilling in the Arctic reserve.

Of all the energy measures that build on the 2005 law, three have a modest chance to pass both houses this year. One would open a new section of the Gulf of Mexico to drilling. One would define and outlaw gasoline price gouging. A third would give the president authority to set fuel efficiency standards for cars. Interest is also growing to increase the use of ethanol in gasoline blends.

DOJ_NMG_0035506

Mr. Grumet, whose coalition helped get the 2005 law passed, predicted that any bill of consequence would pass only if it addressed both demand and supply issues. As an example, he said lawmakers were discussing a measure that would combine the Gulf drilling bill with one that reduced demand for oil.

"There's a Goldilocks problem with energy issues," he said. "Bills are usually too hot or too cold. They're almost never just right to legislate."

Blame Oil Prices For Those Potholes (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drivers, be prepared for some bumpy roads.

Asphalt prices are skyrocketing as costs for oil, a key component of the paving material, are near records. In some parts of the country, there are asphalt shortages.

Both price and availability problems are forcing local governments across the USA to scale back or cancel road projects this summer, the main paving season in much of the country.

For drivers, that means some roads likely will be worse than they otherwise would be later this year and beyond.

“Some roads are going to continue to get worse and worse, and eventually some will be converted to gravel whether we like it or not,” says Dirk Rogers, highway superintendent in Brown County, S.D.

Brown County pavers will hit only about 60% as many roads as last year. Prices have doubled in just two years, while the county budget has barely budged.

Construction companies have been laying off workers in Hawaii because of asphalt shortages caused, in part, by the recent closing of an asphalt plant. The problem was compounded last week after a fire at what is now the only asphalt producer in the state.

In most parts of the country, however, the bigger issue is price.

Nationwide, asphalt prices are up 42% in the second quarter from the same time a year ago, according to the Engineering News-Record.

Asphalt is made from sand, gravel and other substances that are bound together by a goopy substance called liquid asphalt. Liquid asphalt is made from the remnants of oil after it is refined into gasoline and other products.

Making matters worse, U.S. asphalt production was down more than 5% from January through March compared with a year ago, the Energy Department says.

A number of issues are to blame, including refinery outages caused by last year's hurricanes. At the same time, road construction is booming because of a strong economy and the need for post-hurricane rebuilding. The tight supply-demand balance is boosting prices.

“There are a multitude of issues going on,” Global Insight economist Michele Halickman says.

Ernie Skretteberg, contracts administrator at McGarvin-Moberly Construction in Worland, Wyo., says higher prices mean the company is losing money on projects that it bid on months ago when prices were lower. But the shortages are causing him the biggest headaches.

“We never thought availability would be an issue,” he says.

Skretteberg says he's concerned road projects will get delayed for so long that they won't be completed before the weather changes in October. “We have such a limited window in this part of the country … that we have to get going to get on schedule,” Skretteberg says.

The longer the roads go without being maintained, the worse they will get and the harder and more costly they will be to repair, says Donald Wessel, general manager of crude and refined product consulting at Poten & Partners.

“Eventually, you're going to have to fix those roads. But if you're out of money, you're out of money,” he says.

Snowmobile-Friendly Plan For National Parks Rejected (LAT)

By Julie Cart

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

The Bush administration on Monday reversed a proposed policy that would have opened some of America's national parks to snowmobiles and other motorized recreation and permitted increased commercialization.

DOJ_NMG_0035507

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne — who has been on the job less than a month — threw out a draft of the National Park Service Management Policies that would have weakened protections for wildlife and natural resources, instead restoring the longtime standard that national parks must emphasize preservation over any other activity.

"That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment," Kempthorne said during a ceremony in Washington.

The new policy, which is to become final in three weeks, explicitly instructs park managers to maintain clean air, water and natural sounds, and not allow any activities that might damage park resources.

The revised management plan also contains sections that acknowledge the impact of global climate change in the parks and encourage cultural diversity.

The guidelines scrapped most of the changes called for last year by former Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Paul Hoffman, a political appointee who sought to include recreation as a core park mission.

Hoffman's draft — which downplayed the role of science in managing the nation's parks and allowed for religious references to be placed inside their borders — drew 45,000 comments from the public and an angry reaction from congressional critics.

Of particular concern were policy changes that would have allowed snowmobiles to travel over any paved road in any national park in the winter, protected livestock grazing and mining, and weakened air quality standards.

Interior officials at the time said the revisions were intended as a starting point to facilitate discussion.

According to a park service manager who worked on the latest version, the draft that Kempthorne presented came directly from the service, not the Interior Department.

Traditionally, park service policies have afforded the highest level of natural resource protection of any federally managed land.

National parks do not have a mandate to offer recreational opportunities to the public; rather, they were established to protect wildlife and cultural and historic resources and to provide educational programs to visitors.

The policies — which many park superintendents call "the bible" — instruct officials to balance visitor use with wildlife needs, resource protection and historic preservation, generally holding protection and preservation as their highest goals.

Ron Tipton of the National Parks Conservation Assn. said Monday that recreation groups long had petitioned for more access to national parks — and had pushed for language included in the Hoffman management plan.

"The impetus had come from some elements of the motorized recreation industry," he said. "We welcome a strong, clear statement that says that park resources should be protected."

Restoring Sanity To The Interior (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

IN ONE OF HIS FIRST ACTS as Interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne took the gratifying step of tossing out a proposal that would have ruined our national parks. Gone is language that would have opened them to mining and grazing as well as increased commercial development, snowmobiling and off-road-vehicle use. Restored is the National Parks Service's commitment to conservation.

The parks were never intended for the mixed industrial and recreational uses commonly allowed on property under the Bureau of Land Management. Instead, their purpose is to preserve the nation's natural treasures as close to their original state as possible and to provide for recreation as long as it does not conflict with the main goal of conservation.

On Monday, by announcing that he had rejected a management plan drafted under his predecessor, Gale Norton, Kempthorne returned to that original vision for the parks. It was a welcome and somewhat surprising move from the novice secretary who was no tree-hugger as a senator and governor from Idaho. Not that the public should expect Kempthorne to denounce the idea of drilling for oil in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge (he has long been a supporter) or move for new protections for old-growth trees in national forests (as governor, he favored the building of more roads in federal forests).

But Kempthorne has shown that he at least understands what Norton never seemed to get: The public wholeheartedly embraces the conservation of its national parks and monuments. The government should respect this position.

With the creation of the vast Northwestern Hawaiian Islands National Monument last week and Kempthorne's announcement this week, the Bush administration appears to have a welcome new attitude toward the nation's natural treasures. Here's hoping it lasts.

Tiger, Tiger . . . Lost Forever (WP)

By Margaret Mittelbach And Michael Crewdson

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035508

The Earth has lost many creatures as a result of human activity: The dodo and the passenger pigeon are among the best known. But in more recent years, one of the most spectacularly tragic losses in nature was Thylacinus cynocephalus, commonly called the thylacine, or Tasmanian tiger.

The Tasmanian tiger was a truly unusual species. Shaped like a wolf or hyena, it had a ginger-colored coat streaked with gorgeous, Dr. Seussian black stripes. A predator, it could open its jaws astonishingly wide, so that its toothy gape resembled that of a crocodile. Most intriguing of all, this striped creature was a marsupial: It carried its young -- as many as four at a time -- in a pouch like a kangaroo.

For thousands of years, Thylacinus cynocephalus lived in Tasmania, an island ark 150 miles south of the Australian mainland, which is still home to some of Earth's most extraordinary animals. And it lived well into the 20th century.

So what happened to this glorious beast?

Tasmania was colonized by the British in 1803, and the settlers soon brought in a large-scale sheep-raising industry. Tasmanian tigers occasionally raided their livestock, and as a result, a government bounty was set up and money paid to anyone who brought in a dead tiger. Shooting and snaring these rare marsupials became a lucrative business.

By the mid-1800s, naturalists were sending up red flags about the creature's imminent extinction. In 1863 the famed British wildlife artist John Gould warned, "When the comparatively small island of Tasmania becomes more densely populated, and its primitive forests are intersected with roads from the eastern to the western coast, the numbers of this singular animal will speedily diminish, extermination will have its full sway." He noted that the demise of the Tasmanian tiger would be a "source of much regret."

By 1914 Gould's prediction was coming true. In that year biologist T. Thomas Flynn (the father of Tasmanian-born movie star Errol Flynn) proposed the establishment of a wildlife sanctuary to save the tigers from annihilation. But his warnings, like those of other naturalists, were ignored. Tigers continued to be shot and trapped. By the 1930s they were hardly ever seen, and in 1936, the last known Tasmanian tiger died at a Tasmanian zoo.

The extinction of the Tasmanian tiger is a source of much regret. And it's a source of mystification, too. Looking back, it's hard to comprehend how the Tasmanian settlers could have been so cavalier about the tiger's biological uniqueness -- so heedless of the consequences. It would have been easy to save the animal, but the only law ever passed to protect the species was enacted the same year the last captive one died.

Today the tiger remains the island of Tasmania's symbol, pictured on coins, flags and license plates. But it has, sadly, fallen into the realm of myth and mystery. Search parties are still sent out to locate any surviving wild tigers, but in 70 years, no physical evidence has been uncovered. This magnificent animal survives primarily in people's hopes and imaginations.

In 2006 many of us still have trouble foreseeing the consequences of our actions -- and scientists continue to predict a disconcerting future. Last month the World Conservation Union issued its 2006 "Red List," which identified more than 16,000 plants and animals -- a greater number than ever before -- as threatened with extinction, largely due to human activities. These include habitat destruction, the introduction of invasive species, overhunting and overfishing, pollution, and climate change.

On the Red List for the first time this year was Ursus maritimus, the polar bear -- not surprising given that the polar bear has become the emblematic species for global warming. The World Conservation Union's polar bear specialist group estimates that, because of the melting of Arctic pack ice, polar bear populations will decline by "more than 30 percent within the next 35 to 50 years. The principal cause of this decline is climatic warming."

Their language is not as poetic as Gould's, but the message is the same. Will the polar bear cross from the realm of the living into the realm of myth, too? And what will be the fates of the hippo (also appearing on the list for the first time) and thousands of other red-listed species? Will we regret our actions? History tells us that when it comes to preserving natural resources, human beings can be very foolish. But hindsight tells us we can change course and save these animals.

Margaret Mittelbach and Michael Crewdson are the authors of "Carnivorous Nights: On the Trail of the Tasmanian Tiger."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Houston County Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Gun Charges (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — A former Houston County deputy pleaded guilty to selling a gun to a convicted felon and supplying him with cocaine to sell, authorities said Monday.

Michael Shawn Campbell, 27, of Dothan pleaded guilty Monday to possession with intent to distribute cocaine and sale of a firearm to a convicted felon, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

DOJ_NMG_0035509

Campbell, who was a deputy with Houston County's narcotic unit at the time, admitted to selling the gun and supplying crack cocaine to Joshua Whigan, an Ashford man Campbell knew to be a convicted felon, authorities said. Whigan reported Campbell to authorities and worked with the FBI and Ashford Police Department on the case.

Whigan has since pleaded guilty to unrelated drug possession charges in federal court, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Both men are awaiting sentencing.

Campbell faces $2 million in fines and five to 40 years in prison for the drug charge. He faces $250,000 in fines and a maximum 10-year sentence for the firearm charge. Other articles:

Bridgeport Mayor Admits To Cocaine Use (AP)

By John Christoffersen, The Associated Press

AP, June 20, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn. (AP) — Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi has admitted using cocaine since taking office, telling the Connecticut Post he feels ashamed and humiliated.

Fabrizi was interviewed by the newspaper's editorial board Monday after he had called seeking the meeting. The mayor said he quit using the illegal drug well over a year ago.

"I'm ashamed. I'm humiliated for myself. I never meant to let the world know. I didn't want my family to know," Fabrizi told the newspaper.

Fabrizi, a Democrat, said last week he had made "poor choices in the past" but declined to be more specific after an FBI report surfaced in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine.

Fabrizi would not say how he obtained cocaine, but said he occasionally spent $20 or $40 to purchase it. The mayor offered to take periodic drug tests if anyone doubts he has stopped using cocaine. He said he has sought treatment and has not used the drug since late 2004.

"I used it very intermittently. I don't want to use excuses of recreational or social use. I used it some during the period when I was on the council," said Fabrizi, who was City Council president before he took office after Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003.

Adversaries had been calling on Fabrizi to resign, while supporters urged him to specifically address allegations he used cocaine.

Fabrizi planned to make a public statement Tuesday morning in an address to city employees, said his spokeswoman, Caryn Kaufman.

"He is not resigning tomorrow. This is not what this is about," Kaufman said Monday. She declined to comment further.

Fabrizi participated in a City Council meeting Monday night. He gave a brief statement, but the council did not discuss the allegations during the meeting.

"I take this opportunity to apologize for the recent headlines in the news," Fabrizi said. He invited public officials at the meeting to attend his address Tuesday morning.

Bridgeport, Connecticut's largest city, has struggled with violent drug dealers who gave the city a reputation as the murder capital of the state in the 1990s before the homicide rate plummeted.

"I do believe that he's got to resign," said Rick Torres, a Republican who ran against Fabrizi in 2003. "How do we explain to children drug use is dangerous and can ruin your life if the top guy is a drug user?"

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said Friday that Fabrizi was not a target of the drug investigation. He said FBI reports are typically filed under seal. He apologized to Fabrizi after the document was released.

Workers' Positive Drug Tests Decrease (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour And Del Jones

USA Today, June 20, 2006

Illegal drug use among workers in the USA fell to its lowest level in nearly two decades in a trend driven in part by tougher drug-testing practices, putting cold medicines behind the counter and closing down methamphetamine labs in America.

Overall, workers testing positive for drugs fell to 4.1% in 2005, Quest Diagnostics said Monday, the lowest percentage in the 17 years that the giant workplace drug-testing company has been releasing data. It started at 13.6% in 1988 and had fallen to 4.5% in 2003 and 2004.

The percentage of employees testing positive for methamphetamine also tumbled, indicating a reversal of a trend that had become a concern of employers in 2001 and 2002. Positive tests for amphetamines declined 8% in 2005 and is down 45% since 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0035510

Data for the first five months of the year also show amphetamine use continuing to decline. Employees testing positive for amphetamine use fell by 10% from January through May.

Quest performs 7.3 million drug tests a year. Marijuana continues to be by far the drug that appears most often in workplace drug tests, although marijuana positives are down 20% since 2001.

"We were pleasantly surprised," says Barry Sample, director of science and technology for Quest's employer solutions division. "Methamphetamine is at the lowest (level) since 2002. Simply having a drug-testing program is an effective deterrent. Testing works and is effective."

It's an issue of importance to employers: More than 70% of substance abusers hold jobs, according to the American Council for Drug Education. Drug use on the job leads to increased accident risks, lower productivity, higher insurance costs and reduced profits.

"Employers have the single-most-effective weapon in the war on drugs: a paycheck," says Mark de Bernardo, executive director of the Institute for a Drug-Free Workplace.

The White House said on Monday that seizures of meth labs dropped more than 30% last year. It said the reason was that more states and retail drugstores limited access to cold medications that are used to make meth. "The workplace data has been very powerful in that it's based on many, many tests," says John Walters, director of National Drug Control Policy.

Drug testing often occurs during the pre-employment process, and employers may test hair, urine and saliva. The worrisome trend now, de Bernardo says, is abused prescription drugs including Percocet and Oxycontin.

"There are more employers (testing). It's great that the positive results are down, but it's a little preliminary," says Nancy Delogu, a Washington, D.C., employment lawyer. "The drugs-in-the-workplace problem has not gone away."

Reports Suggest Gain In Fight On Meth Labs (NYT/AP)

By Associated Press

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 (AP) — Seizures of methamphetamine labs dropped by more than 30 percent last year, the Bush administration said Monday, as more states and drugstore chains began limiting access to ingredients that are used to make the highly addictive drug.

Even as that statistic was released, Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company, said that in the first five months of this year, the rate of job applicants and workers testing positive for meth was 31 percent lower than last year.

The top White House drug control official, John P. Walters, said the two reports were evidence that the "one-two punch" of restricting chemicals and educating the public about the effects of methamphetamine addiction was having an effect.

"What this information shows is, on supply and demand, we are making a dramatic difference," said Mr. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

But some federal lawmakers give most of the credit to state and local governments, saying meth abuse has declined despite an absence of national direction.

Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican who heads the House Government Reform drug policy subcommittee, said the administration had refused to make combating meth a priority. Mr. Souder criticized a White House budget proposal to cut federal spending for state and local law enforcement agencies to fight the drug.

In an interview, Mr. Walters dismissed such criticism. "No one's trying to downplay it," he said. "There's no drug worse than meth." But he said his office could not focus too much on a single drug at the expense of fighting other threats, like heroin, cocaine and marijuana.

Monday's figures on the seizing of methamphetamine labs came from the Drug Enforcement Administration, whose El Paso intelligence center compiles information on clandestine laboratories confiscated within the country. The agency said meth lab seizures declined to 12,185 last year from 17,562 in 2004.

The drop was steepest in the West, particularly in states that were among the first hit by methamphetamine abuse. The drop in Oklahoma, for example, was 68 percent, in Montana 66 percent and in Oregon 60 percent.

Meth Activity Down, Two New Reports Show (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace.

Local law enforcement officials say there is still a strong appetite for the highly addictive drug and warned that meth makers in Mexico and other countries are moving to fill the supply void.

DOJ_NMG_0035511

The number of meth lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states put in place laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center.

Meanwhile, the nation's largest drug testing company said Monday that the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Those figures are based on the results of more than 7 million drug tests in 2005 and about 3 million tests from January to May 2006 conducted by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc.

White House drug policy director John Walters called the data an encouraging sign of progress.

"The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand," said Walters, head of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Meth lab seizures fell from 17,562 in 2004 to 12,185 last year, with Western and central western states like Oklahoma, Montana and Washington seeing some of the sharpest declines. Missouri, which leads the nation in the number of lab seizures, saw a 22 percent decline.

In Oregon, where lab busts fell 60 percent, the biggest reason is a state law requiring cold medicines to be placed behind pharmacy counters, said Capt. Craig Durbin, former head of the Oregon State Police's drug enforcement section. The law has helped stop meth makers from buying large quantities of cold pills to extract pseudoephedrine, the ingredient used along with other household chemicals to cook meth.

Durbin said the demand for meth still remains high and is increasingly fed by supplies from Mexico and Canada. "When we talk to our task forces, they're still able to go out at a moment's notice and purchase meth," Durbin said. "Until we see start seeing that change, I don't think we can say we've got anything close to being under control."

Oregon is among at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications in an effort to starve meth manufacturers of their key ingredient. The federal Combat Meth Act, signed into law in March, will enforce similar restrictions across the country by Sept. 30.

While the drug czar praised the "robust response nationwide" for the good news, some federal lawmakers said much of the credit should go to state and local governments working without much national direction.

Rep. Mark Souder, chairman of the House drug policy subcommittee, said the administration has refused to make the fight against meth abuse a priority. He also criticized a White House budget proposal to slash federal spending for state and local law enforcement to fight meth.

"Efforts to continue to downplay the threat, after working to cut funding for anti-meth efforts, are only making those who fight the meth epidemic daily more angry at this administration," said Souder, R-Ind.

Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., agreed that the administration's budget requests this year were "fundamentally inadequate," but he said it is now "catching up in other respects and doing better."

In Jefferson County, Mo., a rural area on the fringes of suburban St. Louis, Sheriff Glenn Boyer said success in busting meth labs is directly related to federal grant money.

"We live and die by the grants, especially in the rural areas," Boyer said. "They don't have the resources that you would have in a major city where you have a huge tax base."

Earlier this month, the White House drug policy office set a goal to cut meth use by 15 percent by 2009 and increase seizures of meth labs by 25 percent. A priority is stemming the flow of meth from superlabs in Mexico, which supply about 80 percent of the drug to the United States.

On the Net:

White House Office of National Drug Control Policy: www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov/

Quest Diagnostics Inc.: www.questdiagnostics.com/

Drug Enforcement Administration El Paso Intelligence Center: www.dea.gov/programs/epic.htm

Number Of Meth Labs Closed In Past 2 Years (AP)

The New York Times, June 19, 2006

A look at the number of methamphatamine labs shut down by law enforcement officials in each state in 2005 and 2004, and the percentage change.

State 2004 2005 Change

Ala. 419 276 -34.1

Alaska 66 37 -43.9

Ariz. 128 75 -41.4

DOJ_NMG_0035512

Ark. 805 426 -47.1
Calif. 766 469 -38.8
Colo. 233 149 -36.1
Conn. 0 3
Del. 3 0
D.C. 1 0
Fla. 280 273 -2.5
Ga. 266 131 -50.8
Hawaii 13 11 -15.4
Idaho 42 21 -50.0
Ill. 1101 931 -15.4
Ind. 1073 954 -11.1
Iowa 1383 753 -45.6
Kan. 589 375 -36.3
Ky. 576 573 -0.5
La. 122 98 -19.7
Maine 4 5
Md. 1 2
Mass. 1 3
Mich. 293 341 16.4
Minn. 167 88 -47.3
Miss. 277 184 -33.6
Mo. 2798 2170 -22.4
Mont. 73 25 -65.8
Neb. 263 228 -13.3
Nev. 81 52 -35.8
N.H. 2 6
N.J. 0 3
N.M. 120 59 -50.8
N.Y. 48 20 -58.3
N.C. 318 322 1.3
N.D. 232 159 -31.5
Ohio 302 332 9.9
Okla. 667 217 -67.5
Ore. 471 189 -59.9
Pa. 107 79 -26.2
R.I. 0 0
S.C. 170 88 -48.2
S.D. 31 16 -48.4
Tenn. 1430 861 -39.8
Texas 473 269 -43.1
Utah 71 50 -29.6
Vt. 1 1
Va. 75 52 -30.7
Wash. 954 532 -44.2
W.Va. 168 213 26.8
Wis. 77 55 -28.6
Wyo. 21 9 -57.1
Percentage not indicated in states with fewer than nine labs.

Source: Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center Clandestine Lab Seizure System.

DOJ_NMG_0035513

Workplace Drug Use Declines In 2005 (UPI)

UPI, June 19, 2006

NEW YORK (UPI) -- Drug use among U.S. workers declined to a 17-year low last year a report released Monday by a New York drug-testing company says.

Quest Diagnostics said of tests for all drugs performed by the company for the combined U.S. workforce, 4.1 percent had positive results in 2005 compared to 13.6 percent in 1988.

In addition to the drop for overall workplace drug use, Quest said a preliminary review of amphetamine test results for the first five months of this year showed a sharp drop of 10 percent in positive results. Among federal safety workers, the rate of decline was 20 percent for the same period.

Since 2004, the incidence of amphetamines drug-test positives has dropped 45 percent, Quest reported.

Fewer Failing Drug Tests; Dope Still Most Common (SAEN)

By Travis E. Poling

San Antonio Express News, June 20, 2006

U.S. workers might be cleaning up their act when it comes to drug use if the semiannual Drug Testing Index from Quest Diagnostics Inc. is any indication.

Quest, a New Jersey-based company that has tracked drug test data since 1988, reported Monday that 4.1 percent of 7.3 million workplace drug tests were positive for drugs in 2005. The previous year, about 4.5 percent tested positive.

As pre-screening becomes more prevalent, the percentage of applicants testing positive has declined from 13.6 percent when Quest first started the Drug Testing Index.

"During 2005, we detected a downward trend in amphetamines and methamphetamines positive test results in the general U.S. work force, and in 2006 the trend took hold among all U.S. workers," said Barry Sample, Quest's director of science and technology.

Those testing positive for marijuana represented 52.5 percent of the positive results, down from 60.6 percent in 2001. At 15.7 percent, cocaine was No. 2 on the list of drugs found in workers.

In San Antonio, results are mixed, with one testing company observing a possible decrease in overall drug use and another noticing an upward trend, especially in methamphetamine use.

Texas MedClinic reported 1,387 positive tests among the pre-employment, random and post-accident drug tests it conducted for employers last year. That's 68 more positives than in 2004, but Marketing Director Karen Walker said the company did more tests last year. She did not immediately have access to the number.

Analytical Toxicology Corp., a San Antonio-based company that tests hair, urine and saliva samples for drugs, reports an 8 percent positive rate in its testing throughout South Texas. Marijuana and cocaine use are the most common findings, but Analytical has noticed an increase in the use of methamphetamine and Ecstasy.

What's more, there has been in a rise in the number of adulterated samples, according to a spokeswoman for Analytical Toxicology.

The semiannual report from Quest suggests that state policymakers and stores may be helping to reduce drug use by limiting access to pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient used to make methamphetamine illegally, Sample said.

Preliminary reviews of data from the first five months of this year show that use of amphetamines has dropped to its lowest level among both general employees and workers for whom testing is federally mandated since becoming popular in 2002-03, Sample said.

War On Meth Yields Results (KCS)

By John Shultz

The Kansas City Star, June 20, 2006

The Bush administration said Monday that laws cracking down on the sale of common methamphetamine ingredients are stymieing small-time meth cooks throughout the country.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy credits the laws, which put tighter controls on pseudoephedrine, with helping to spark a steep nationwide reduction in the seizure of meth labs and meth-making equipment — 12,000 such incidents nationwide last year, versus 17,000 in 2004.

And while law enforcement officials believe that Mexican drug traffickers have been quick to replenish any supply deficit caused by the crackdown on small-time cooks, other recent research suggests that dents have been made on the demand side as well.

DOJ_NMG_0035514

Quest Diagnostics, the country's largest drug-testing company, said Monday that a smaller percentage of employees and job seekers tested positive for the drug in 2005 and that the number continued to trend downward for the first five months of 2006.

Also, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Youth Behavior Risk Survey in 2005 found fewer high schoolers identifying themselves as serious meth users.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Missouri, which led the nation in seizures, had about a fifth fewer such incidents in 2005 compared with the previous year's 2,788. Kansas saw a drop of more than a third, from 584 to 375.

Both Missouri and Kansas have laws that limit the amount of pseudoephedrine that can be purchased at one time and require buyers to show ID.

John Walters, national drug czar, in a statement called nationwide efforts to reduce both supply and demand "an effective one-two punch against methamphetamine."

But while meth has long been associated in the public consciousness as a modern-day moonshine cooked up in household labs, the lion's share of the drug in the U.S. for years has been provided by traffickers. Megalabs in Mexico are the most common source.

The Mexican product is now cheaper and more readily available than in years past.

"You have the people out there who are addicted to meth because of the small toxic labs," said Shirley Armstead, a spokeswoman for the DEA in Missouri, "then they turn and get it from the traffickers. … All of the small toxic labs paved the way for the Mexican drug traffickers to exploit."

Armstead said that last year in the St. Louis area, all of the meth interdictions involved imported crystal meth rather than the homemade powdered product that used to make up the majority of seizures.

Kansas City, Kan., police turned to the DEA for help last year when the Mexican meth trade sparked a wave of violence. The resulting law enforcement operation led to 23 arrests and the dismantling of four trafficking organizations.

Many in law enforcement have embraced efforts to crack down on the little labs, even though they haven't necessarily cut supply, because the dangerous mix of volatile chemicals required for meth-making can lead to fiery explosions.

"I would much, much, much prefer it be imported from Mexico, because that way we avoid the explosions," said Kansas Bureau of Investigations spokesman Kyle Smith. "Law enforcement had to divert so many resources toward meth labs that we had to take away from the other drugs."

Fewer than 1 percent of the country's population uses meth, but many counties around the country still list it as their leading drug problem.

In cities with prevalent meth trades, a large percentage of arrestees often test positive for the drug, according to a 2003 federal survey of arrestees in a few dozen target cities — about a third of the men arrested in San Jose, San Diego and Spokane, Wash; about 28 percent in Des Moines, Iowa.

The 2004 federal National Survey on Drug Use and Health, the most recent available, found that meth usage numbers had been largely stagnant in the first half of the decade.

New users numbered about 300,000 in 2002, 2003 and 2004.

The research released by drug testers Quest Diagnostics suggests a potential reduction in meth usage, at least among the employed and job applicants.

In the first five months of 2006, Quest logged 45 percent fewer positive tests for meth than during the same time period in 2005.

Positive tests for other amphetamines have also trended down during that period.

Meth Lab Busts Are Down By 40% In State (LADN)

By Susan Abram

Los Angeles Daily News, June 20, 2006

Restrictions on ingredients are working, authorities say

Seizures of methamphetamine labs across California declined by nearly 40 percent last year, in part due to laws restricting the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make the drug, government officials said Monday.

The continued decline in California mirrored trends nationwide, which saw a 30 percent decline in seizures from 2004 to 2005. Nationally, police seized 12,100 labs in 2005, compared with 17,500 in 2004, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The federal government hopes a sweeping law that would require drugs containing pseudoephedrine - the main ingredient in meth - to be sold from behind the pharmacy counter will further reduce the meth supply in the United States. Though California already has such laws in place, the nationwide mandate will begin Sept. 30.

DOJ_NMG_0035515

"Communities once paralyzed by the threat of this dangerous drug are emerging healthier and safer because we have reduced the diversion of precursor chemicals and the number of meth labs," John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a statement.

Local law enforcement agencies attribute the drops to stepped-up enforcement, as well as pharmacies that restrict the sale of medicines such as Sudafed, which contains pseudoephedrine.

Officials at Pfizer Inc., the makers of Sudafed, said the company is in favor of those policies though initially it was not convinced that selling the product from behind the counter was the best solution. Still, the company admits that progress is being made on the war on meth because of the changes.

Pfizer now is focused on Mexico, where superlabs have continued to grow.

"We're restricted in the amount of pseudoephedrine that we can buy from Mexico, and

Advertisement

we support that," said Erica Johnson, spokeswoman Pfizer Consumer Healthcare. "We're trying to work alongside the government to provide solutions."

But various agencies in Los Angeles County still see meth use as a significant problem.

Researchers for Phoenix House, a national group of rehabilitation facilities, found that from 1997 to 2002, the number of teens placed into drug treatment centers in Los Angeles County rose from 1,609 to 5,572. The increase is attributed to meth use.

And the federal Drug Enforcement Administration cautions that while lab seizures have declined, arrests and use have remained steady, said Sarah Pullen, Los Angeles spokeswoman for the DEA.

"The large meth labs, or superlabs, have gone across the border, but Los Angeles is a distribution point for the rest of the country," said Capt. William Ryan, for the Los Angeles County Narcotics Bureau. "The demand is still out there."

The Antelope Valley, once a haven for superlabs, saw less than a dozen lab seizures last year, Ryan said.

Meth, also known as crank or tweak, sells for $5,000 to $6,500 per pound. But ice, a purer form of meth, sells for $8,000 to $11,000 a pound, Ryan said.

"It's still a high priority for us," Ryan said. "We still see a lot of it."

Two Brothers Could Be Charged With Fentanyl Related Death (WXYZ)

By Kimberly Craig

WXYZ-TV, June 19, 2006

Monday, police arrested two men accused of supplying a Bloomfield Hills teenager with a deadly combination of heroin and Fentanyl. The suspects could become the first two in Michigan to be charged with a Fentanyl related death.

Saturday night, on Keating Street in Detroit, officers with the major crimes division and DEA agents raided the home of two suspected drug dealers who are brothers.

Sources said the brothers supplied 17-year-old Lauren Jolly with the heroin laced with Fentanyl and then let her die.

It was reported that Jolly died in her car, but witnesses said she actually died in the drug dealer's home.

When Jolly began having problems, witnesses said, the drug dealers used intimidation to stop them from helping her. They then waited for her to die before moving her to her car. She was later found dead on 8 Mile.

When asked if the suspects would face murder charges, prosecutors said they were not yet commenting on the case.

The suspects were being held on unrelated charges and Detroit Police said they are looking to see if they are connected to any other deadly overdoses.

Siblings May Be Linked To Fentanyl (DN)

By Ronald J. Hansen

Detroit News, June 20, 2006

DETROIT -- Two men arrested in a federal raid of a drug house Sunday morning may be linked to the distribution of drugs laced with fentanyl, a painkiller suspected in the deaths of at least 79 people in Metro Detroit in the last four weeks, law enforcement sources said.

Authorities believe that one of the victims, Lauren Jolly of Bloomfield Township, died in May at the drug house from a lethal mix of heroin and fentanyl, and her body was placed in her car and taken to Eight Mile and Gratiot.

Brothers Donald and James Edgar Coleman were among those arrested in the raid in the 20000 block of Keating Street, sources familiar with the investigation said. Some were charged with ordinance-type violations, police said.

James Coleman appeared Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit on an unspecified drug charge. He remains in custody and is due back in court today.

DOJ_NMG_0035516

A toxicology report examining what killed Jolly, 17, will take eight to 12 weeks, authorities said. For now, at least, no one is charged with her death. Jolly was a junior at Birmingham Groves High School.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration had been monitoring the Coleman property for some time, police said.

Authorities first realized a fentanyl emergency after 12 people died from overdoses of the drug in a two-day span last month. Since then, investigators have worked to discover the source of the drug, which has been linked to another 130 deaths since January 2005.

Since April, cities in at least eight other states have similarly reported a sudden surge in overdoses.

The matter is the subject of a nationwide investigation by the DEA and police departments from Philadelphia to Chicago.

But for months, as fentanyl-related deaths accumulated, authorities in Detroit have said some of the clues that could have alerted them earlier to the growing toll were obscured by the regular toll of drug deaths in the county.

Also, testing limitations kept authorities from quickly linking any of the deaths to the lethal mixture.

There were early warnings, however. In November, the DEA's office in Detroit issued an alert saying agents had bought heroin on the street cut with "potentially lethal" levels of fentanyl.

The Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office saw that alert as part of a routine bulletin from the DEA, officials said.

Freelance writer David G. Grant contributed to this report.

6 Drug Deaths Reported; Heroin Suspected In 3 (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, June 19, 2006

COOK COUNTY -- Five Chicago men and one Elk Grove Village man died Saturday and early Sunday of suspected drug overdoses, officials said.

Three of the six may have been heroin users, said a spokesman for the Cook County medical examiner. Autopsies were completed Sunday for four of the men, but results were withheld pending toxicology results.

The men's ages ranged from 25 to 48.

Lake Charles Doctor Pleads Guilty To Illegally Supplying Medicine (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

LAKE CHARLES, La. (AP) — A Lake Charles doctor pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to illegally dispensing pain medication in exchange for sexual favors.

Dr. Kevin E. Gorin, 46, was charged with four counts of distribution of a controlled dangerous substance and one count of possession of a controlled dangerous substance with intent to distribute.

After entering his plea before U.S. District Judge Patricia Minaldi, she set sentencing for Sept. 20. Gorin is facing a maximum jail term of up to 20 years and a $1 million fine on each of the four counts of distribution and up to three years and a $250,00 fine on the possession count.

Gorin, who was the medical director for the Institute for Pain Management and Rehabilitation at Lake Charles Memorial Hospital, was allowed to remain out of jail on bond.

Gorin's arrest culminated an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Beauregard Parish Sheriff's Office, and the DeRidder Police Department. Court documents obtained by the (Lake Charles) American Press state the investigation into Gorin's alleged activities began last October and continued up to his arrest on Jan. 12.

"The investigation utilized a cooperating witness, an undercover officer, audio devices and video devices which were monitored and recorded by law enforcement surveillance teams," the documents state.

According to court documents, Gorin gave the cooperating witness prescriptions for Diazepam and Percocet on Nov. 4, 2005 while visiting her in DeRidder. "There was no physical examination to justify these prescriptions," the documents state.

In other meetings, the undercover agent picked up illegal prescriptions from Gorin for the witness to sell the drugs and make money from their sale, documents show.

On Jan. 10, Gorin told the witness in a phone conversation that he had a "business proposition to discuss with her which included the sale of Oxycontin so they could both make money," documents show.

Two days later, Gorin met the witness and undercover agent at a DeRidder motel to discuss the plan "in exchange and in anticipation of sexual favors for the direct or indirect benefit of the doctor," according to the documents.

During his arrest, authorities found six Percocet and six Xanex in Gorin's pocket. A prescription bottle with 142 Percocet and a box of 24 Xanex were also found in his vehicle.

Lab That Tested OU Coach's Hair Has Had Its Share Of Run-ins With Regulators (ANE)

By Jonathan Hunt

DOJ_NMG_0035517

Athens News, June 19, 2006

The Columbus laboratory that reported finding an extremely high amount of GHB in Ohio University head football coach Frank Solich's hair has come under repeated scrutiny by regulators, records show.

A review of public documents by The Athens NEWS has uncovered numerous run-ins in recent years between Toxicology Associates, Inc. and government agencies charged with ensuring lab accuracy and fair advertising.

Additionally, the laboratory has had to defend itself against a bevy of lawsuits from creditors seeking payment of bills or taxes.

Despite repeated attempts by The Athens NEWS to contact lab representatives for comment, no one at Toxicology Associates, Inc. would discuss its test methodology, regulatory compliance or the name and qualifications of its current lab director.

In one case, when a NEWS reporter asked to speak to the lab's owner, he was told that the owner could not discuss client information. The paper's request for an interview was still refused even after the reporter explained that he was not seeking any sensitive client information, and described the focus of his story.

Heightened scrutiny of Toxicology Associates, Inc. flows from its involvement in the high-profile case of Solich, because the purported GHB result has been questioned by independent experts, and the test forms the basis of the coach's effort to overturn his November drunken driving conviction.

Columbus defense attorney Samuel Shamansky contends that somebody spiked Solich's drink with GHB on the night of Nov. 26 at Casa Cantina in Athens. Solich pleaded no contest to DUI on Nov. 28.

On June 2, Shamansky filed a plea withdrawal motion in Athens County Municipal Court, arguing that the coach would not have entered the plea had he known GHB was in his system. The hair sample was taken Jan. 5, according to the lab report.

GHB, or gamma hydroxybutyrate, is naturally present in the human body, but was made illegal in 1990 by the federal government. GHB causes drowsiness with sufficient dosage, and has become known as a "date-rape" drug. State-of-the-art methods can detect one-time dosages of GHB, and can even determine approximately when it was ingested by isolating segments of hair, which grows at a rate of about one centimeter per month. The lab report claims Solich ingested the drug around the time when he visited Casa Cantina.

Athens patrol officer Krishea Osborne found the coach passed out at the wheel of his Nissan SUV facing the wrong way on West Union Street shortly after he left the West State Street bar and eatery. Solich refused an Intoxilyzer 5000 alcohol breath test, but witnesses said he consumed margaritas and shots of alcohol at Casa Cantina, and Osborne's police report indicated he had a "very strong" odor of alcohol when arrested.

Earlier this month, two respected toxicologists told The Athens NEWS that the 569.4 nanograms per milligram of GHB allegedly found in a sample of Solich's hair by the Columbus lab is simply implausible. Dr. Pascal Kintz of Laboratoire ChemTox in Illkirch, France and Dr. Bruce Goldberger of the University of Florida College of Medicine were responding to the 569.4 ng/mg result, which is attached as "Exhibit 3" to Solich's plea withdrawal motion.

Kintz authored a 2003 research article in the Journal of Forensic Science entitled "Testing for GHB in Hair by GC/MS/MS after a Single Exposure - Application to Document Sexual Assault." Goldberger, who also holds robust qualifications in his field, explained that a properly conducted test could not find so much GHB in human hair and would employ controls to detect if the substance had been smeared on beforehand. He also asserted that lab reports should be signed and certified by qualified personnel. Solich's wasn't.

Against the backdrop of these questions about the OU coach's case, The Athens NEWS examined the recent history of Toxicology Associates, Inc.

It found that on May 16, 2006, The U.S. Food and Drug Administration sent a warning letter to Benjamin Corpus, who owns the lab. The FDA warned that three home test kits - for influenza viruses, streptococcus bacteria and infectious mononucleosis - were offered on the company's toxassociates.com Web site without "approval from the FDA for (over-the-counter) sale of these products."

"Therefore, you are violating the law," continued the FDA letter, which also maintained that the Web site "contains statements that are misleading ... because such statements create an impression of official approval of a device (that has been cleared for interstate commerce)."

Federal officials received no response from Corpus for three months after initially trying to contact him about the FDA violations in January, according to the letter. When they finally reached Corpus on April 3, the letter said, he stated he would respond within a week, but did not.

In 2002, a Pennsylvania judge ruled that Toxicology Associates, Inc. had violated the state's Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law by selling anthrax test kits over the Internet. Pennsylvania Attorney General Mike Fisher said the Columbus lab apparently capitalized on the post-9/11 anthrax scare, by "using the nation's heightened sense of vulnerability to turn a profit," according to published reports.

DOJ_NMG_0035518

The anthrax test kits, which used a nasal swab, were deemed unreliable by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, which also said that Toxicology Associates, Inc. was unqualified to analyze them.

The lab, which never responded to the lawsuit and lost the case via a default judgment, was ordered to refund money to anthrax kit purchasers, pay $5,000 in civil fines, $2,265 in investigative costs and stop selling the kits in Pennsylvania.

The FDA or state attorneys general hold authority over drug product marketing, but an agency of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services is responsible for inspecting and certifying commercial laboratory testing done for clinical purposes.

Tests carried out for hospitals or other health care institutions on a contract basis by labs such as Toxicology Associates, Inc. are regulated by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, under the Clinical Laboratory Improvement Amendments (CLIA), a federal law.

CLIA does not apply to testing done for private individuals such as Solich, but the Columbus lab's track record for tests that are regulated does little to erase doubts about the GHB finding.

On Nov. 21, 2001, a CLIA inspector conducted a complaint investigation at the Toxicology Associates, Inc. facility on Bethel Road in Columbus. The "statement of deficiencies" prepared by the inspector afterward indicated that the lab had failed to obtain accreditation, and that no inspection had been done between 1996 and 2001.

The inspector found the lab in violation of multiple CLIA provisions - including testing of proficiency samples, general quality control, toxicology quality control, laboratory director qualifications and responsibilities, testing personnel responsibilities and quality assurance.

"Laboratory failed to have documentation to assure that any of the facility personnel from the Laboratory Director to the testing personnel were qualified," the inspector wrote, emphasizing that this and other violations were "repeat deficiencies" from 1996.

"Eight days of patient testing records were randomly selected and reviewed and laboratory failed to have documentation of quality control on all eight days," it continued. "Facility personnel could not explain why the eight days of patient test results reviewed failed go have documentation on any quality controls being performed."

"This is a simple problem of record keeping," wrote lab owner and president Benjamin Corpus on the deficiencies statement. "Dr. Benito Corpus has resigned on 12-1-2001, and Lucilla Casabar, MD will assume the position as a laboratory director."

During the next CLIA inspection, which happened less than three months later, Dr. Casabar quit. The inspector was unconvinced of Casabar's qualifications after reviewing her curriculum vitae, and asked the lab's technical supervisor - possibly Benjamin Corpus - for more documentation.

"The Technical Supervisor left the conference room to 'call' the designated (lab) director, his Aunt. When the Technical Supervisor returned, he said (Casabar) has resigned effective immediately."

Casabar was replaced as lab director by Dr. Alfred E. Staubus, according to notations from Corpus on the Feb. 25, 2002 deficiencies statement.

The 2002 inspection determined that "The Plan of Correction was not followed," found many repeat violations and detected a lack of "instrument function checks" for the lab's gas chromatograph machine.

On Jan. 6, 2003, at about 10 a.m., CLIA inspectors performed a surprise complaint investigation at the lab.

"The owner refused to allow the investigation to be initiated," wrote the inspector. "He was ... guided through accessing the Code of Federal Regulations on his computer ... He was told that failure to allow the investigation would result in enforcement action to terminate his CLIA certificate ... He began stating his health was limited and he needed to postpone the investigation due to his health ... CMS staff (in the Chicago Regional Office) agreed the investigation was to continue ... The owner continued to refuse ... The surveyor left the facility at 10:45 a.m. to return to the office."

The lab's CLIA certificate was suspended on Feb. 8, 2003, and inspectors made another unannounced visit on June 27 of that year to ensure that the lab was no longer conducting clinical testing.

They found no system in place to separate clinical from non-clinical samples, and continued noncompliance for quality assurance and instrument calibration procedures.

"Based on interview with the Laboratory Director, it was determined that he was unaware of the location of any quality control or quality assurance records for the laboratory since May 2002," wrote the inspector.

Staubus and Corpus claimed they were sending any samples from anthrax test kits still sold on the Internet - this had only been banned in Pennsylvania - to another lab.

A Jan. 13, 2004, CLIA inspection found continued noncompliance, including documentation and calibration problems with the lab's spectrophotometer and gas chromatograph machine -

the same technologies used to test coach Solich's hair. Inspectors also determined that a chemical reagent being used by the lab "was dated 1979."

Inspectors reported that the lab "did not have a system in place to ensure test results were reported accurately."

"Acceptable levels of analytic performance are not maintained," the deficiencies statement continued.

At the next lab visit, on April 11, 2005, a CLIA inspector noted that the lab had changed some of its quality control practices, and was "preparing their own controls" for certain procedures, but that lab personnel still were not keeping adequate records or ensuring that "quality assessment activities as defined by the facility were monitored and documented."

It remains unclear whether the lab is now in compliance with CLIA regulations, or what actions, if any, have been taken to restore its CLIA certificate. Lab inspection duties are shared, in some cases, by the Ohio Department of Health and the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS). The Athens NEWS has requested full CLIA compliance documentation for Toxicology Associates, Inc. from the Chicago regional CMS office. Statements of deficiencies cited in this article were obtained from the state health department.

Toxicology Associates, Inc. has been sued eleven times in Franklin County Municipal Court between 1994 and 2005, and five times in Franklin County Common Pleas Court between 1985 and 2002. In all sixteen cases, the lab was the defendant, and in twelve of them, somebody was trying to collect payment on a debt. Three of the cases were small claims complaints against the business.

Plaintiffs seeking payment from the lab have included the Ohio Department of Taxation, the Columbus city Division of Income Tax, the Franklin County Treasurer, Baxter Healthcare, United Transportation Inc., Huntington National Bank and Abbott Laboratories.

Toxicology Associates, Inc. does testing for steroids and "designer" drugs, and lab personnel have offered expert-witness services in court cases. The toxassociates.com Web site offers "legal consultation" for "$250 per question per case" on "any matter that is legal in nature or has legal implication."

Ohio State Board of Pharmacy Assistant Director Tim Benedict said Friday that the pharmacy board's oversight over labs is primarily limited to monitoring the possession of prescription drugs, but that Toxicology Associates, Inc. has failed to renew a required state license by the deadline three times - in 1989, 1995 and 1999. However, its pharmacy board license is currently valid, said Benedict.

A group supervisor for the Columbus diversion group office of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency said Friday that she knows of no problems encountered by the DEA in its oversight of the lab's handling of controlled substances. The DEA license held by Toxicology Associates, Inc. is current, she reported.

Dr. Staubus, a pharmacology professor at The Ohio State University in Columbus, is listed as the lab director for the business on the most recent available documents. However, Staubus, when reached at his OSU office on Friday, said he is no longer associated with Toxicology Associates, Inc.

"It's been approaching one year (since working there)," he said. Asked about the lab's compliance record, Staubus replied, "That's something that you will need to talk to Ben (Corpus) about."

CLIA deficiency statements and other documents indicate that Benito Corpus, Benjamin Corpus and Lucilla Casabar have held prominent roles at Toxicology Associates, Inc., along with Staubus, but it remains unclear exactly which responsibilities are presently held by whom at the facility.

Other labs or clinics doing business in Texas or other states under the name Toxicology Associates appear to be unconnected to the Columbus lab.

Athens City Prosecutor Lisa Eliason said Friday that an evidentiary hearing on Solich's request for a plea withdrawal would likely not occur until August. If Municipal Court Judge William Grim lets Solich withdraw his plea, the case would go to trial, allowing attorney Shamansky to mount a unique GHB doping defense.

Eliason confirmed that she has been in contact with Dr. Goldberger, the University of Florida toxicologist who questioned the coach's GHB hair test, and with another expert, Dr. Laureen Marinetti, chief forensic toxicologist for the Montgomery County Coroner's Office and the Miami Valley Regional Crime Lab in Dayton.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Bill Hit Over Work-site Enforcement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0035520

Senate Republicans warned yesterday that the immigration bill approved by the Senate last month won't stop companies from hiring illegal aliens -- the very magnet that has drawn some 12 million illegals to the United States.

"Less than one hour of floor time was devoted to this subject during the debates on the Senate floor," said Sen. John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who called a subcommittee hearing on the topic yesterday. "Now, this concerns me because not only do I see work-site enforcement as the critical means, or linchpin, really, of successful immigration reform, but also because the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security has told me that several provisions in the Senate bill would make the system unworkable."

They say the promises included in the current bill aren't much better than those included in the immigration bill of 1986, which granted amnesty to 3 million illegals and paved the way for 12 million new ones to come here.

"The American people are now once again being asked to accept the same bargain today, and the cornerstone of this deal is a new electronic employment-verification system," Mr. Cornyn said. "Unfortunately, the Senate has conducted virtually no open debate on this subject."

Yesterday's hearing was the first of its kind, and government officials acknowledged the general inability of the federal government to prevent the hiring of illegal aliens.

They blamed the plethora of documents illegals can use to prove their eligibility for employment and the burgeoning market for counterfeit documents. Also, they said, the growing problem of identity theft has further stymied their efforts.

The Senate bill grants amnesty to illegals for all forms of document fraud and identity theft and also grants blanket amnesty to all employers who have hired -- even knowingly -- illegals in the past.

Federal officials also blamed the war against terrorism for drawing attention away from immigration. But all that's changed now, they promised.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement "is reinvigorating our work-site enforcement efforts," said Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of ICE. "We are seeking to change the culture of illegal employment across the country by pursuing the most egregious employers engaged in the employment of illegal workers and educating the private sector to institute best hiring practices."

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said there was little hope for improvement with current proposals.

"I am concerned that the worker verification title passed in the current Senate immigration bill only takes us halfway there, and will not eliminate the activity that currently allows millions of illegal immigrants to steal Social Security numbers and obtain work fraudulently," he said. "It's important not only to stop illegal immigration, but to stop identity theft; there must be safeguards to ensure that someone is actually who he claims to be."

Many Illegals Entered U.S. With Visas (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Nearly half of the 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens now in the United States entered the country legally, but never left.

Carrying visas and U.S.-approved border crossing cards, they were inspected by immigration officers at 300 sea, air and land ports of entry and many -- according to a year-old U.S. Customs and Border Protection policy -- were told to "Have a nice day."

A little-noticed study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center says 45 percent of America's illegal alien population -- 4.5 million to 6 million -- carried legally issued border crossing cards for short-term visits or business and tourist visas for longer but temporary stays.

Ultimately, they became what the government refers to as "overstayers," hiding in plain sight, working, sending their children to school and using health care services.

"Although Congress authorized several initiatives to track foreign visitors following the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and then again after the September 11 attacks, the U.S. government currently has no means of determining whether all the foreign nationals admitted for temporary stays actually leave the country," said the center, a nonpartisan, nonprofit research group.

The influx continues to stream into America unchecked despite efforts by President Bush to send 6,000 National Guard troops to better secure border areas between the ports of entry, where Congress will spend $1.2 billion to hire and station more U.S. Border Patrol agents.

Michael Cutler, a retired U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) senior agent, said the government is spending billions to secure the border but has "failed miserably" at interior enforcement.

"We are not doing enough to make sure these people leave the country when they are supposed to and that impacts significantly on national security," he said. "Remember, all of the 19 al Qaeda hijackers who slammed jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon entered the country legally.

DOJ_NMG_0035521

"There is no high-tech solution to the problem. We have to hire personnel to go out and arrest these people," he said, noting that the government has only about 3,000 agents nationwide to enforce immigration laws in the nation's interior. "We are supposed to be dealing with this issue, but five years after the attacks, we're not doing enough."

The Pew report said that 4 million to 5.5 million illegal aliens entered legally through established ports of entry with tourist or business visas and that 250,000 to 500,000 used border crossing cards.

Steven Camarota, director of research at the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies, said the government has failed to enforce existing immigration laws by denying visas to those deemed likely to overstay -- including persons who are unmarried, have no property, are unemployed or have lived outside of their home countries for a while.

"One such person who fits that category and was in this country legally with a visa was Mohamed Atta, leader of the September 11 hijackers," he said. "We have the ability based on past experience to weed out people with a high probability of overstaying, but it's not being done.

"The government, under tremendous pressure to issue these visas, has never thought about developing any kind of enforcement strategy for those who overstay their temporary visas," he said.

Homeland Security has sought to target overstays through a program called US-VISIT, a biometric verification system that scans the fingers of each foreign national entering the country and matches them against government databases to verify that the visa holder is the person to whom a visa was issued.

The program, begun in 2004, is in place at 115 airports, 15 seaports and in the secondary inspection areas of 154 land ports of entry, although Mexicans and Canadians entering the country with border crossing cards are not required to complete an arrival-departure record, known as Form I-94, unless they are requesting an extended stay.

US-VISIT exit procedures are operating at 12 airports and two seaports.

The program has identified many terrorists, criminals and other undesirable foreign visitors, but U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the Homeland Security agency responsible for interior enforcement, has only a limited number of personnel assigned to that task -- and most of them have been assigned to find criminal aliens, migrants who were ordered deported but disappeared and those who pose national-security threats.

The Pew report said that when fully implemented, US-VISIT is supposed to provide computerized records of arrivals and departures and a means of checking the identity of visitors with biometric data. In the meantime, it said, "only handwritten forms track some foreign visitors."

"In effect, the government has a pretty good idea of how many people come into the country if they fill out one of the forms, but it does not have a full count of how many leave," the report said.

Mr. Cutler, who headed major drug investigations for INS for two decades, said, "Even if the system was working flawlessly at all the U.S. ports -- logging the entry and exit of foreign nationals and generating many investigative leads -- who's going to respond if they don't hire an adequate number of agents? It's like having a sophisticated 911 system but no cars to send if people call for help."

New Scrutiny Of Illegal Immigrants In Minor Crimes (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — It did not sit right with the sheriff in this law-abiding city that illegal immigrants who landed in his jail for minor crimes were later released into the community and never deported.

The immigrants had been arrested for drunken driving or striking a spouse, usual police blotter material in a foothills county on the eastern rim of the Rockies.

Immigration agents, overwhelmed by a decade-old surge in illegal immigration to Colorado, said they had neither the time nor the resources to pick up the illegal immigrants whose violations were not grave.

But to Sheriff Jim Alderden of Larimer County, the facts seemed plain.

"They violated our borders and then they committed other crimes," Sheriff Alderden said. "I think these offenders should be deported."

Across the country, local law enforcement officials and irritated taxpayers are turning up the pressure on federal immigration authorities to identify illegal immigrants who are behind bars and deport them after they are freed.

Although that has generally been the practice with violent felons, illegal immigrants who commit lesser crimes are often overlooked by federal authorities, who say their resources are scarce.

Now, however, immigration agents say they are beginning to take the first steps to change that. The agents say they are rethinking the triage that led them to pass over the estimated hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants with lesser offenses, even if they were imprisoned.

DOJ_NMG_0035522

In some cases, the federal agents are allowing local authorities to screen immigrants to help detect those who should be deported.

In 2005, at least 270,000 illegal immigrants spent time in local jails and state prisons, according to the Justice Department. In federal prisons, more than 35,000 inmates, 19 percent of the total, were immigrants.

Although not all the immigrants in federal prisons were illegal when they went in, their felony convictions made it likely that they would lose any legal status and be required to leave the United States when they came out.

In a report in April, the inspector general of the Homeland Security Department estimated that in the coming year 302,000 immigrants who should be deported upon release would be sent to local jails and state prisons.

But based on recent deportation results, the inspector general predicted that most of those immigrants would be freed here. Shortages of money, agents and detention beds have created an unofficial "mini-amnesty" for criminal immigrants, the inspector general found.

The country is polarized between those who want a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and those who want to deport them. But just about everyone agrees that the doubly illegal, immigrants with no documents and who have committed crimes, are not welcome.

In some states, the numbers have soared. Up to 25 percent of the 22,000 inmates in the Los Angeles County jails on any day are illegal immigrants, Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the sheriff's office there, said. The county's annual costs for housing the illegal are at least $80 million, Mr. Whitmore said.

In California state prisons, at least 20,000 inmates have been listed for deportation by immigration authorities, officials said.

In Colorado, immigrants behind bars have become part of the debate on the costs of illegal immigration. According to federal figures, Colorado paid $46 million in 2005 for the upkeep of illegal immigrant inmates.

On average, Sheriff Alderden said, about 6 percent of the 546 beds in his spotless jail have been filled by Mexicans, a majority illegal. He estimated that illegal Mexican inmates cost Larimer $1 million a year.

The overall crime rate in the county's immigrant communities is not high, officials said. But jail officers remember many illegal immigrants whom they book repeatedly.

It used to be that when an illegal immigrant's offense was a misdemeanor, "it didn't pay to call immigration," Sheriff Alderden said. Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement said they were busy rounding up violent felons, as the law requires, and most of the felons were in state prisons.

Last month, the situation changed. Under a pilot program, every day the sheriff sends the immigration agency a list of the foreigners in his jail. Federal agents visit regularly to interview those inmates and identify those who have to leave the country.

In the first two weeks, 26 inmates were added to the deportation list.

Fernando Guadarrama, 21, a construction worker from Mexico, was one of the 26 caught in the expanded net. Newly outfitted in an orange jail uniform, Mr. Guadarrama said his bad luck began when an officer pulled over his pickup because the rear license plate light was out. He had just a Mexican driver's license and, overconfident after seven years in the United States, he told the officer that he could not obtain an American one because of his illegal status.

Mr. Guadarrama found himself in the Larimer jail and then in an interview with an immigration agent, on the roster for a quick departure from the United States.

Mr. Guadarrama was philosophical as he made hasty plans to move his Mexican wife and two children, both American citizens, back to Mexico and start a small business there.

"I thank God every day for the United States," he said. "It allowed me to make enough money to have a decent life."

