Other potential jurors demonstrated the complications thrown up by the number of journalists, lawyers and officials here.

In the second day of juror screening in the case of the former aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr., a prospective juror testified that he once worked for Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, lived across an alley from Tim Russert of NBC News and went to school with Maureen Dowd of The New York Times.

Mr. Woodward and Mr. Russert are expected to be witnesses at the trial. The prospective juror remained in the pool.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents in an investigation of who leaked to journalists the name of Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative, in July 2003.

Judge Reggie M. Walton has voiced hope that opening arguments can be given on Monday. But by the end of Wednesday, only 24 jurors had qualified for what is supposed to be a panel of 36 that will then be whittled down to 12 jurors and 4 alternates.

One woman was asked whether she had formed any opinion of the Bush administration that might affect her ability to judge Mr. Libby.

"I certainly have an opinion that I can't believe any statement by the Bush administration," she replied.

Did that extend to Mr. Libby?

"Yes," she said. She was excused.

A woman said she hoped that her belief in the presumption of innocence would overcome her distaste for the administration. But she eventually acknowledged that she might not believe administration witnesses who testified for Mr. Libby. Two people were dismissed on Tuesday after saying they did not trust Mr. Cheney, who will testify for Mr. Libby.

On the other hand, a woman who worked for Lockheed Martin, the military contractor, expressed admiration for the administration on Wednesday and for Mr. Cheney in particular. She stayed in the pool.

A prospective juror who produced reports from Iraq for National Public Radio was excused after testifying that he held Judith Miller, a former reporter for The New York Times, in low esteem for her prewar reports that Iraq had unconventional weapons. He said would not be able to credit her testimony at the trial.

Ms. Miller is expected to testify for the prosecution that Mr. Libby spoke with her about Ms. Wilson. The indictment charges that Mr. Libby falsely said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson with Ms. Miller.

A candidate testified that he regarded Ms. Miller as courageous for going to jail for 85 days for refusing initially to disclose Ms. Libby as a source. That juror, a retired math teacher, also produced laughter when questioned about whether he had problems with Mr. Cheney's credibility. No problems, he said, but he "wouldn't go hunting with him," a reference to Mr. Cheney's accidental shooting of a hunting partner last year. He stayed in the pool.

DOJ_NMG_0118112

In Libby Trial, Big Names Make Jury Picks A Tall Order (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

To see how small a town Washington really is, drop in on jury selection at the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, where so far nearly every juror candidate seems to have a connection to the players or events surrounding the leak of an undercover CIA officer's identity.

There is the software database manager whose wife works as a prosecutor for the Justice Department, and who counts the local U.S. attorney and a top official in Justice's criminal division as neighbors and friends. A housecleaner who works at the Watergate and knows Condoleezza Rice, not by her title of secretary of state, but as the "lady who lives up on the fifth floor." And a former Washington Post reporter whose editor was now-Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward; he went to barbecues at the house of NBC's Tim Russert, a neighbor, and just published a book on the CIA and spying.

Such is the challenge as U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton tries to seat a jury of 12 peers for Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, in one of Washington's biggest trials in years.

It has always been difficult to select juries in Washington, where the pool is small compared with the number of trials, and half the people summoned to be jurors don't even show up. But the star power of the players in this case has complicated matters.

Libby is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the disclosure of CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity to the media in 2003, shortly after the Iraq war began. He is accused of fabricating a story to conceal the nature of his conversations with reporters and his role in a White House effort to discredit Plame's husband, a prominent critic of the invasion of Iraq.

Defense lawyers for Libby contend that he forgot the details and timing of those conversations amid the crush of his daily workload and believed he had heard about Plame from Russert. Only later, they say, did he remember that he had actually learned her identity from his boss, Cheney.

By the end of yesterday's session, Walton and lawyers for both sides had quizzed 33 potential jurors and excused nine. The 24 remaining in the pool, and others who will be questioned starting this morning, still could be struck by lawyers on either side. Walton said he wanted to complete the selection of 12 jurors and four alternates by the end of today. Jurors cannot be identified by name, under an order from the judge.

Members of the government and media elite are the key players and witnesses expected to be called in a case that will often focus on the administration's justification for war in Iraq. As the slow questioning of potential jurors in Courtroom 16 of the federal court wound through a second day yesterday, it became clear that those celebrities rub shoulders a lot with the regular folks in this 13-mile-wide city of 550,000.

One journalist, for instance, said she had met a reporter and an editor on the witness list, Matthew Cooper and Jay Carney of Time magazine, when they appeared repeatedly on a foreign-affairs television show she produces at Voice of America.

Another candidate, the former Post journalist, seemed to have a link to nearly every key player in the case. He had worked in the newspaper's Metro section, he said, where his editor was Woodward, a key defense witness. Until recently, he lived across an alley from Russert, a star witness for the prosecution. And he had gone to parties with The Post's Walter Pincus, another defense witness.

He said he would understand if the lawyers believed he couldn't be impartial, but he promised he would use his reporter training to sort through the facts fairly.

"If I were in your seats, I'd be skeptical," he said.

Then he noted that one of his best friends plays in an over-40 football league with Libby. And he has heard that Libby "has a great arm."

Did he mention that he went to grade school with Maureen Dowd, he asked the judge? That would be the New York Times columnist who publicly savaged colleague Judith Miller after some of Miller's reporting on the Iraq war came to light around the time of the Plame investigation. Miller is a witness for the prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0118113

One juror, a middle-aged woman, told the judge that she had worked in the "executive residence" -- that is, the White House. She was an administrative assistant in the grounds office from the Reagan administration until the inauguration of President Bush.

Another woman said she helped develop health policy in the office of the secretary of health and human services. She said she could be impartial about the administration but acknowledged she was "not particularly impressed" by how Cheney has handled certain events.

Not every potential juror knew the people in the case. A retired math teacher who moved here from North Carolina said he had no basis for judging the credibility of White House officials, including Cheney -- although he admitted that he was "not sure I would like to go bird hunting with him, either."

Walton chuckled, and Libby burst into laughter, burying his face in his hands.

Libby Seeks Jurors Who Trust Cheney (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A potential juror in the perjury trial of former White House aide "Scooter" Libby was allowed to remain in the jury pool Wednesday after saying she would be impartial and put aside her tepid impression of Vice President Dick Cheney, an expected defense witness.

"I'm not particularly impressed with a lot of his manners of being, but I can't speak to his credibility," said the woman, who works for the Department of Health and Human Services, as jury selection continued for a second day.

Cheney's credibility has emerged as a key issue, with defense lawyers looking for a panel that can trust the vice president, expected to testify on behalf of Libby, his former chief of staff. Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with journalists about an outed CIA officer.

Libby's attorneys say it's critical they know whether potential jurors view the vice president as credible. Two people who expressed doubts about that were dismissed from the jury pool Tuesday.

"I don't have the highest opinion of him," a young financial analyst said. "If I had to rank people as to credibility, I wouldn't put him at the top of the list."

He was dismissed, as was a young woman who said she was "completely without objectivity" about Bush administration officials who might be called to testify.

"There is nothing they could say or do that would make me think anything positive about them," the woman said moments before she was excused from the jury pool by U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton.

Opening arguments are planned Monday in a trial expected to take up to six weeks.

CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity was leaked to the press in 2003, around the time her husband, Joseph Wilson, was criticizing the Bush administration's march to war. The trial hinges not on the source of the leak but whether Libby lied to investigators.

He says he forgot his conversations with reporters because he had more pressing matters on his mind.

___

Associated Press Writer Michael J. Sniffen contributed to this report.

Attorney Says Racism Involved In Case Against Peete (WMC)

WMC-TV, January 18, 2007

Memphis City Council member Rickey Peete's attorney called the corruption case against him racist Wednesday morning.

Speaking outside federal court after entering a "not guilty" plea, attorney Handel Durham, Jr. alleged racism in the corruption case against Peete.

"There has never been, in Memphis, Tennessee, a successful black man in this city that has not suffered some form of attack," he said.

The indictment against Peete alleges he accepted $14,500 in bribes. Fellow Council member Edmund Ford is accused of accepting almost $9,000 in bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0118114

Durham alleged racism because of the large number of black elected officials that have been indicted in federal stings, including Operation Tennessee Waltz and Operation Main Street Sweeper.

"You have approximately 17 black leaders indicted," he said. "What do you think? I mean, what would a reasonable individual come to? They would have to say something."

Former Shelby County Commission candidate Joe Cooper was also named in the complaint against Peete and Ford.

Man Who Scammed AOL Users Convicted (AAS)

By Bob Keefe, WEST COAST BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, January 18, 2007

Guilty verdict for California spammer is the first under the federal CAN-SPAM Act.

SAN DIEGO — A California man has been found guilty under the federal CAN-SPAM Act of using fraudulent, unsolicited e-mail to trick America Online users into giving up bank account numbers and other personal information.

At a weeklong trial that ended Friday, 16 victims testified they had been tricked by the e-mail. Some said they lost hundreds of dollars.

Jeffrey Goodin, 45, was found guilty by a Los Angeles jury of using accounts he set up through Atlanta-based EarthLink Inc. to send e-mail that appeared to come from AOL's billing department. The messages warned AOL users that their accounts were in jeopardy unless they sent credit card or bank account information to "update" them.

Goodin, of Azusa, Calif., is to be sentenced June 11. He could face 101 years in prison for violating the 2003 CAN-SPAM Act and other laws, although prosecutors acknowledged it's highly unlikely he'll get such a lengthy sentence.

Goodin set up and shut down the EarthLink e-mail accounts in rapid succession, according to prosecutors.

An EarthLink official testified that the company lost more than $1 million because of Goodin's "phishing" scam, according to prosecutor Wesley Hsu. On more than one occasion, AOL barred EarthLink subscribers from its network because of spam coming from EarthLink accounts, according to Hsu.

"This was sort of the ideal case that I think Congress had targeted with the CAN-SPAM Act," said Hsu, an assistant U.S. attorney in the Justice Department's central California district office.

"This guy changed the sending e-mail to make it look like an AOL billing address, and as a result we had lots of victims fooled . . . thinking they'd lose their AOL service if they didn't give them their billing information," he said.

Hsu said it's unclear whether public frustration with spam played into the jury's decision. And while he said he hoped the case would be a deterrent, Hsu acknowledged that even with the federal law, spam isn't going away anytime soon.

"I've already encountered cases where people are sending spam from Canada," he said. "And we can't do anything about that."

Goodin's case was the first jury conviction under the federal CAN-SPAM Act. In September 2004, Hsu helped oversee the first guilty plea under the law, which Congress passed four years ago amid public outcry about the overwhelming volume of unsolicited, fraudulent e-mail.

In the earlier case, Nicholas Tombros, 37, of Marina del Rey, Calif., admitted tapping into private wireless Internet networks in the Los Angeles area to send spam advertising pornographic Web sites.

Belleville Woman Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Jim Suhr

AP, January 18, 2007

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. - Among the many accounts of heartache and horror swept in by Hurricane Katrina, Tina Marie Winston's story was certainly disturbing.

Winston, 34, said she watched helplessly as a torrent of water from the Gulf of Mexico rolled in and swept away her two daughters, ages 5 and 6. The floodwaters swamped her New Orleans home, she said, costing her everything else.

She said the tragedy left her unable to function, in need of counseling and desperate for money to pay for a memorial service held for her two dead daughters under a St. Louis bridge.

But the gripping, chilling tale that brought Winston thousands of dollars in federal aid turned out to be a lie.

DOJ_NMG_0118115

And on Wednesday, the woman who cried for sympathy after the disaster got little of it from a federal judge who ordered her to spend four years in prison and repay about $24,000 for various scams over more than a decade, including $4,358 she defrauded from the Federal Emergency Management Agency after the hurricane.

U.S. District Judge William Stiehl told Winston that he understood she had a troubled, possibly abusive upbringing and mental illness, but duping the government with tales of dead daughters "was simply outrageous."

"She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances," said the judge.

Winston never had daughters, much less a New Orleans home. When Katrina knocked the Gulf coast to its knees in August 2005, Winston was 600 miles away, safe in the St. Louis suburb of Belleville, Ill., where she had moved from Arkansas in July 2004 - more than a year before Katrina.

"These are the types of crimes that absolutely outrage taxpayers," eroding their confidence in government, federal prosecutor Suzanne Garrison told Stiehl in labeling Winston's conduct "extraordinarily undignified."

"She had pretty much dug herself in a hole, not building any future for herself, living in this way by systematically lying to get free handouts," Garrison said.

In court, Winston said simply, "I apologize to the court and ask you to show leniency on me."

When Stiehl asked her if she wanted to say anything else, Winston replied, "That'd be it," before federal marshals led her away in shackles.

Winston, who also goes by the name Tina Gilmore, pleaded guilty in October to defrauding FEMA after the hurricane by using a bogus Social Security number to file for assistance online. Winston also admitted spending $1,321 from an electronic debit card she got through FEMA after claiming the hurricane left her jobless. The agency deactivated the card when Winston exceeded the spending limit, the government has said.

Though FEMA sent Winston $4,358 for housing and rental aid, she still requested more - $10,075 to cover property she said she lost to the storm, and $2,530 for unspecified dental expenses. She apparently never got the extra money.

Officials said Winston also duped various government agencies during a recent 12-year stretch by failing to report her marriage and her husband's income.

As a result, the government said, Winston was overpaid more than $13,000 in Social Security benefits and $4,659 in food stamps. By falsely claiming her husband was her cousin and lying about their income, she also tried to get government-subsidized housing valued at more than $6,700.

"This defendant has, in effect, intended to defraud the taxpayers of this country by every means that cropped into her mind," Stiehl said.

A 12th Dallas Convict Is Exonerated By DNA (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 17 — A 50-year-old Dallas man whose conviction of raping a boy in 1982 cost him nearly half his life in prison and on parole won a court ruling Wednesday declaring him innocent. He said he was not angry, “because the Lord has given me so much.”

The parolee, James Waller, was exonerated by DNA testing, the 12th person since 2001 whose conviction in Dallas County has been overturned long after the fact as a result of genetic evidence, lawyers said.

“Nowhere else in the nation have so many individual wrongful convictions been proven in one county in such a short span,” said Barry C. Scheck, co-founder of the Innocence Project, the legal clinic that championed Mr. Waller’s case. In fact, Mr. Scheck said, those 12 such instances are more than have occurred anywhere else except the entire states of New York and Illinois since the nation’s first DNA exoneration, in 1989.

In the aftermath of the new evidence, prosecutors had joined defense lawyers in calling for the clearing of Mr. Waller, who spent more than 10 years behind bars before he was paroled in 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0118116

"I'm sorry that happened to you, man," Craig Watkins, the county's new district attorney, told Mr. Waller on Wednesday, shaking his hand in the Dallas courtroom where a judge later approved a motion to vacate the conviction. That motion now goes to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals for formal approval.

Mr. Waller broke down once at the hearing, when describing how his car crashed on the way to a court proceeding in 2001, an accident that killed his pregnant wife, Doris, and the unborn daughter they had wanted to call Grace. "I said, 'Well, I don't want to live no more,' " he recalled, mopping his face with a tissue.

One of his lawyers, Nina Morrison, patted him on the back. "He lost 10 years 11 months and 3 days of his liberty literally picking cotton in the fields for no pay," she told the court. "His perseverance is an inspiration to all of us."

The judge, John C. Creuzot of Criminal District Court, sought to console Mr. Waller, who stood before him in a tan suit, a white shirt and a tie. "A lot of times we are tested in life, and you certainly had a terrible test," Judge Creuzot said. "On behalf of any and all public officials at that time, I want to apologize."

Earlier in the day, the Innocence Project provided synopses of the county's dozen DNA exonerations. "Nobody knows the reason why we have 12-and-counting here in Dallas, but we'll find out the answers," Mr. Scheck said. One Texas lawmaker, State Senator Rodney Ellis, a Houston Democrat, has introduced a bill that would establish a Texas Innocence Commission to study exonerations for ways of eliminating wrongful convictions.

The case against Mr. Waller was largely based on the 12-year-old victim's identification of him, court papers show.

Around 6 a.m. on Nov. 2, 1982, the boy, identified only as Jay S., was alone in his family's dark apartment with his 7-year-old brother when he was sodomized by an intruder he described as a black man about 5-foot-8 and weighing 150 pounds, his lower face concealed by a red bandana.

By the boy's account, he heard the voice of his attacker that night at a 7-Eleven near his home, and turned to see Mr. Waller, who was then 25 and lived with his family in the same apartment complex as the victim, the only black family there. Although there were discrepancies in the boy's account — Mr. Waller is almost 6-foot-4 and was heavy — and although Mr. Waller presented witnesses saying he was home at the time, he was convicted in 46 minutes and sentenced to 30 years. He won parole in 1993 but had to register as a sex offender.

He had begun petitioning for retesting of the state's rape evidence in 1989, and redoubled his efforts in 2001 after Texas passed a law granting post-conviction access to DNA testing. Results of hair testing appeared to rule out Mr. Waller as the attacker, but the Court of Criminal Appeals found it inconclusive.

Still, "the Lord kept pushing me because I wanted my name back," Mr. Waller said Wednesday.

Last month the Innocence Project, through use of a previously unavailable technology called Y-STR DNA, found that genetic material recovered from the victim conclusively excluded Mr. Waller and the victim and could have come only from someone else.

Mr. Waller has started a lawn care business, but remains on parole pending the formal action of the appeals court and must shy from all contact with children. "It has been a long struggle for me," he said. "They look at you like you're an animal."

Mr. Watkins, Dallas County's first African-American district attorney, took office two weeks ago in a Democratic sweep. "I can say I'm sorry all day," he told Mr. Waller in court. "I know that doesn't mean much to you, but I can guarantee to you in the future when I'm the district attorney we will insist that we will not send anyone who's innocent to prison."

"The sad thing," he said, "is the person who actually did this crime is still out there on the streets."

DNA Databases May Be Growing Too Quickly (LAW)

By Vesna Jaksic, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 18, 2007

As state DNA databases expand, a growing number of "cold cases" are getting solved, but that's leading to a new problem: Local jurisdictions can't keep up with their burgeoning caseloads.

"I see it nationally as becoming a major problem," said Ted Hunt, chief trial assistant in the Jackson County Prosecutor's Office in Kansas City, Mo. "We're lucky to have a cold case homicide unit and a branch of sex crimes that works on cold cases, but many jurisdictions lack those resources."

DOJ_NMG_0118117

And DNA databases are certain to grow even more in several states.

While all states now require that samples be collected from convicted felons, a growing number of states -- including Texas and Virginia -- collect samples from certain arrestees, such as those picked up for violent crimes. Kansas and New Mexico are scheduled to expand their databases to include arrestees this month. California is expected to do the same in 2009.

As of October 2006, the FBI's national database contained profiles for more than 3.7 million convicted offenders, which helped with more than 40,000 investigations. Florida topped the list with 4,907 investigations aided, followed by Illinois, New York and Virginia, according to the FBI.

The state of Virginia illustrates how fast databases have grown. When the state's cold case program started in 1993, the Virginia Department of Forensic Science's database contained 2,184 samples. It currently holds 253,156 samples. Since 2001, Virginia's database has grown by 50 percent.

Virginia's database has resulted in 3,600 "hits," which refers to cases for which DNA samples from the crime scene match DNA samples stored in felon databases. Those hits have helped 3,518 investigations, according to the department. But like many other states, it has been struggling to keep up with its growing workload.

"It's hard to think of cases these days where there isn't the possibility of DNA evidence," said Paul Ferrara, the department's director. "With cold cases, the ones they haven't solved from 20 years ago, all of a sudden you see the light bulbs going off and say, 'Wait a minute, I have this case and the DNA might be good.' That's fine but I think the largest challenge we do have is capacity and turnaround time."

VIRGINIA INVESTIGATIONS

The growth of DNA databases has triggered other problems. Virginia authorities have been investigating why thousands of felons' samples have been left out of the database.

And some civil rights groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union, have challenged states' efforts to expand databases to include people without convictions, saying that doing so contradicts the presumption of innocence until proven guilty and violates privacy.

California has more than 662,000 DNA samples in its database, which has led to 3,346 offender matches, including some for cold cases, said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for California's former attorney general, Bill Lockyer.

But Rockne Harmon, senior deputy district attorney in Alameda County, Calif., said many cold hits don't lead to anything, often because of limited resources.

"It's a great tool but you have to be careful because what we've seen in California, and I know it's a problem elsewhere too, is an unknown number of these cold hits gets stuck in the police departments and nothing happens," he said. Harmon added that there is no way to determine how many hits fail to lead to charges and cases being filed. "While there have been great success stories, no one can really tell you what has happened to all of their cold hits."

Federal funds are helping states with their cold case programs. In fiscal year 2005, the National Institute of Justice distributed more than $14 million in grants to 38 state and local programs for solving cold cases with DNA.

The Denver District Attorney's Office credits federal money for making its program one of the most aggressive in the nation. More than 4,000 cases have been reviewed and 20 new cases have been filed as a result of cold hits, said Mitchell Morrissey, Denver's district attorney. Grant money has allowed the DNA laboratory to double its capacity by hiring two full-time DNA analysts, improve its instruments and fund detective overtime, according to Morrissey's office. Future goals include investigation of cases dating back as far as the 1950s.

OLD CRIMES, NEW CHALLENGES

But Morrissey stressed that old crimes carry their challenges, such as statutes of limitations and difficulties with finding everyone involved." A lot of people just think, 'OK, you get a DNA match and now you've got a case,'" he said. "That's not true. You still have to do a lot of investigating. Sometimes you still have to find the victim. Sometimes you still have to find the suspect."

Defense attorneys are finding challenges of their own. David Bell, an assistant public defender in Kansas City, Mo., who represented a defendant successfully prosecuted by Hunt for a crime committed 20 years ago, said there are plenty of obstacles for the defense.

DOJ_NMG_0118118

"One of the problems with these cold-hit cases is that it truly shifts the burden to the defendant," said Bell, who plans to appeal the case. "Prosecutors get blinded by the DNA. DNA is a powerful tool, there is no doubt, but it must be placed in the context of everything else."

In the Kansas City case, Bell argued that his client had consensual sex with the victim but did not remember it because it was a casual, one-time encounter that occurred 20 years ago. Bell also presented DNA evidence in the trial, trying to shift blame to the victim's husband, whose DNA also was found at the crime scene.

Ex-Keyport Mayor Pleads Guilty To Bribery (NSL)

By Guy Sterling, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 18, 2007

Merla, ensnared in probe of Monmouth corruption, took payoffs

A former mayor of Keyport admitted to a federal judge yesterday that he accepted a $2,500 bribe in exchange for helping a federal informant posing as the owner of a construction and demolition business obtain an emergency, no-bid contract to fix a local bulkhead.

John Merla, 45, had been charged with taking the money at his brother's birthday party on Dec. 7, 2003. While pleading guilty yesterday to a count of bribery, he indicated the investment by the cooperating witness was a good one.

"Did the borough pay (the cooperating witness) a total of approximately $36,200 to complete the work on the bulkhead?" Merla was asked by Rachael A. Honig, an assistant U.S. attorney assigned to the case. "Yes," Merla replied.

He later acknowledged to U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark that he also pocketed three other illegal cash payments from the informant and undercover FBI agents in 2003 and 2004. In all, the payoffs totaled $24,000, said Mark McCarren, the other federal prosecutor handling the matter.

"Did you accept these additional payments knowing that they were being made in exchange for your agreement to assist (the cooperating witness) in obtaining municipal contracts?" asked Honig. "Yes," Merla responded.

Merla faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and fines ranging to $250,000 when he is sentenced in May. But McCarren and Michael Pappa, Merla's lawyer, said the actual prison term will fall between 24 and 30 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

The beefy Merla, who lost his supervisor's job with the New Jersey Turnpike Authority when he was charged in the sting two years ago, left the courtroom quickly after yesterday's plea and did not respond to questions. Pappa said Merla is currently working in his family's restaurant business.

Merla choose not to run for re-election in November after serving as Keyport's mayor from 2003. He had also served as a member of the borough council during a lengthy political career in the Monmouth County community.

In recent weeks, Merla had maintained he was preparing to go to trial and Pappa had gone so far as to send out subpoenas to potential witnesses. Merla's reasons for pleading guilty were "personal," but he did so with the support of his family, Pappa said yesterday.

"John feels a deep sense of remorse for compromising the trust placed in him by the people of Keyport," the defense attorney added.

Ex-Keyport Mayor Admits Taking Bribe (JERSJ)

Jersey Journal, January 18, 2007

NEWARK - The former mayor of Keyport pleaded guilty yesterday to extorting a $2,500 bribe from an undercover informant posing as a contractor in return for helping the contractor obtain a $36,200 contract.

At his court hearing, John Merla acknowledged he took payments from the informant and undercover FBI agents on three other occasions from September 2003 to November 2004. The plea involved one bribery count, but prosecutors said he received four bribes totaling about $24,000.

"Merla traded his public position and influence for cash," U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said. "The list of public officials in Monmouth County who were willing to do that is disappointingly long."

DOJ_NMG_0118119

Merla, 45, was among a dozen officials snared by the undercover sting, "Operation Bid Rig," in Monmouth County February 2005. Many have pleaded guilty, along with several contractors.

Despite his arrest, Merla refused to resign, and left office when his term ended at year's end, just over two weeks ago.

Merla faces 24 years to 30 years in federal prison.

Somerville Subpoenaed Over Developer Projects (COURNEWS)

By MARTIN C. BRICKETTO, Staff Writer

Courier-News, January 18, 2007

U.S. Attorney's Office requesting information related to Jack Morris

SOMERVILLE -- Borough offices have been served with subpoenas from the U.S. Attorney's Office requesting information related to developer Jack Morris, the mayor confirmed Wednesday.

Somerville officials declined to speculate on the motivation behind the subpoenas.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined comment.

Mayor Brian Gallagher said the FBI served subpoenas to the borough Office of Community Development, the Planning Board, the Borough Council and the borough clerk on Friday afternoon, seeking all documents involving JSM at Somerville, Edgewood Properties and Jack Morris since 2003.

"We'll comply with every request that they make," Gallagher said. "I've already instructed all people to begin assembling that info so we can submit it to them expeditiously."

Owned by Morris, JSM is the owner of the Downtown Somerville Shopping Center and the site's borough-designated redeveloper, according to court documents. Edgewood is another Morris company.

A spokesperson for Morris did not return a request for comment.

JSM wants to demolish the existing shopping center on Main Street for a $65 million redevelopment project with commercial and residential components.

Morris' role in a major redevelopment plan on the west end of the borough's downtown was called into question in court documents filed last year.

Pathmark, a holdout tenant at the center, filed a legal brief in September that said Edgewood made a $10,000 contribution to the Somerset County Republican Executive Committee in 2003, the day after the Somerville Planning Board passed a resolution designating the shopping center as a redevelopment area.

Gallagher, who was campaigning for mayor at the time, received funds from the committee, according to Pathmark's legal brief.

The Borough Council then passed a resolution designating JSM as the redeveloper of the center the day after Gallagher was elected mayor, according to the brief.

Morris reportedly had close business ties with John Lynch, an influential Democratic party boss who entered federal prison Tuesday after pleading guilty to fraud and tax evasion charges.

When Pathmark's legal brief was filed, Gallagher described the implications of a pay-to-play scenario between the borough and Morris as a smear campaign, noting the redevelopment was first recommended in the 1990s.

"Our approach with developers has been straightforward and clear," Gallagher said Wednesday.

The borough has moved to condemn the leases of two other holdout tenants at the center, Hollywood Video and Country Fresh restaurant.

Planning Board Chairman Bernie Navatto said he was not sure what the U.S. Attorney's office was looking for but said there was no foundation to what Pathmark suggested in its court filing.

"I'm 100 percent confident," Navatto said. "What they (the U.S. Attorney's Office) asked for is a matter is a public record, and they're going to get it."

Justices Scrutinize Death Penalty In Texas (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The Supreme Court on Wednesday resumed its long-running effort to monitor the use of the death penalty in Texas, hearing arguments in three cases that put the strains and internal contradictions of the court's capital punishment jurisprudence fully on display.

One case was familiar, at least to the seven justices who were on the court when LaRoyce L. Smith's previous appeal of his death sentence came before them in 2004. At that time, the court voted 7 to 2 to overturn the sentence, only to see it promptly reinstated by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on the ground that the constitutional error the justices had identified was "harmless." The question now is whether that was an acceptable response by the state court to the Supreme Court's mandate.

The other two cases, while unfamiliar in their particulars, were very familiar in what they represented: the latest, but almost certainly not the last round in a fitful dialogue between the Supreme Court and the federal appeals court that oversees habeas corpus cases filed in federal court by Texas inmates.

All three cases offer a window on the recent history of capital punishment in the United States, which to a large degree is the history of capital punishment in Texas. Since 1976, when the Supreme Court permitted states to resume executions, Texas has put to death 380 people, far more than any other state. (The next highest, Virginia, has executed 98.)

In 1989, the Supreme Court ruled that the jury instructions that Texas was using were constitutionally deficient because they failed to ensure that jurors could give meaningful consideration to a defendant's mitigating evidence. Under the Texas system, jurors were instructed to respond to only two questions: whether the killing was deliberate, and whether the defendant posed a continuing threat to society. If the answers to both were yes, a death sentence was automatic.

The Texas Legislature addressed the problem two years later by instructing jurors to take "all of the evidence" into consideration, including the defendant's character and background. But in the interim, during which Mr. Smith was sentenced to death for murdering a former co-worker at a Taco Bell in Dallas, judges tried to address the problem by telling jurors that if they thought the mitigating evidence warranted a sentence of life in prison rather than death, they should simply answer no to one of the two questions, even if they believed that the proper answer was yes.

Eventually, the Supreme Court held that this "nullification instruction" was constitutionally inadequate as well. It applied that ruling to Mr. Smith's earlier appeal, overturning his sentence in 2004 and sending it back to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, which in turn reinstated it, finding the error "harmless" because Mr. Smith had failed to show that the nullification instruction had caused him "grievous harm."

In his new appeal, Mr. Smith, represented by a University of Texas Law School professor, Jordan M. Steiker, is arguing that the state court's resolution of the case flew in the face of the Supreme Court's analysis. The state court, having failed in the first round to apply its "harmless error" rule, should not be permitted to introduce it after the fact, Mr. Steiker said.

Although several justices, most notably Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, clearly agreed with him, Mr. Steiker encountered stiff resistance from Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. The chief justice said the Texas court had handled the case in an appropriate and even "desirable" way.

Because the state court did not initially regard the nullification instruction as an error, Chief Justice Roberts said, it had no reason at that point to decide whether the error was harmless. "Wouldn't it be normal exercise of judicial restraint to say we don't have to reach out and decide whether this error was harmless if we've already decided there's no error at all?" he asked.

Texas was represented by its solicitor general, R. Ted Cruz, and supported by a second lawyer, Gene C. Schaerr, representing California and 20 other states that entered the case, Smith v. Texas, No. 05-11304, as "friends of the court" for Texas. Mr. Schaerr said the case presented an important federalism issue of "whether states have the ability under our federal Constitution to choose their own harmless error standards."

A total of 47 of Texas' 392 inmates on death row were sentenced under the procedure the Supreme Court later found unconstitutional.

In a second argument on Wednesday, the court heard the combined appeals of two other inmates, Jalil Abdul-Kabir and Brent R. Brewer. Their crimes, both murders committed during robberies, were unrelated. But both are challenging the refusal by a federal appeals court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, to grant their habeas corpus petitions.

Their cases, Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman, No. 05-11284, and Brewer v. Quarterman, No. 05-11287, have acquired a new twist since the court accepted them in October. In a separate case last month, the Fifth Circuit abruptly shifted course and suggested that it had been wrong to deny habeas corpus to this entire group of inmates. The lawyer for the two, Robert C. Owen, another University of Texas law professor, is asking that the cases be sent back to the Fifth Circuit for reconsideration.

DOJ_NMG_0118121

High Court Hears 3 Death Penalty Cases (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

It was death penalty day yesterday at the Supreme Court, coincidentally 30 years to the day since Gary Gilmore became the first person to be executed under the country's modern capital punishment laws.

The court heard three death penalty cases from Texas even as executions are on hold in an increasing number of states, from Maryland to California, and as the number of new death sentences continues to fall.

The work of the court so far this term shows that the complicated legal process that attends executing a murderer -- the balance of state laws and federal constitutional guarantees -- can take decades to unspool. Even a trip to the Supreme Court is sometimes not enough to settle the issue.

The cases of at least nine death row inmates nationwide -- who are not proclaiming innocence but are protesting their sentences -- are on the court's docket in this term. Just as the justices scrutinized Virginia's system for carrying out the death penalty several years ago, they are examining four cases from Texas this year, including the three heard yesterday.

The number of capital cases is not unusual for the court, those who follow the issue say. But because the justices so far this year have taken a smaller number of cases overall, the death penalty accounts for "a larger fraction of their work," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center. Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University, said: "It's probably the normal number, but I always think they take too many. Especially at a moment when the docket is so light." The justices have taken a decreasing number of cases in recent years, and this term, which will end this summer, is likely to continue that trend.

Sometimes the court's decisions are dramatic, such as 2005's Roper v. Simmons, which forbade the execution of those who were younger than 18 at the time of their crimes. But Berman, who writes regularly for and runs the Sentencing Law and Policy blog, said the court's decisions in most death penalty cases affect only a handful of people in the states from which the cases arise. He would like to see the court spend time on other sentencing disparities "that affect thousands of people every day."

Indeed, the Texas cases heard yesterday had all been decided more than 15 years ago, when Texas juries were asked to answer only yes or no to two questions when deciding whether to impose death. They were asked whether the killing was deliberate and whether the killer constituted a continuing threat to society.

Several Supreme Court decisions have said that jurors also need to consider mitigating evidence, such as the IQ of the defendant or an abusive background.

In 2004, the court decided 7 to 2 in the case of LaRoyce Smith, who had murdered a Taco Bell manager in Dallas, that there were broad problems with the Texas law, which has since been changed. It sent the case back. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, nevertheless, reaffirmed the death sentence, saying that if an error was made, it was harmless to the outcome of the jury's decision.

And so Smith v. Texas (05-11304) was back before the Supreme Court yesterday, with Smith's advocates and others -- including four retired federal appeals court judges -- arguing that the state court ignored specific directions from the Supreme Court.

As Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg put it, it was as though the state court were saying, "Thanks, thanks, that's very interesting advice," but we're deciding it on different grounds.

But the state appeared to have strong supporters in Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia.

Scalia said the Texas court decided that, though the mitigating evidence should have been presented more straightforwardly, it was in the best position to decide that such evidence would not have affected the jury's decision to sentence Smith to death. And Roberts defended the state's interpretations. "Why do we remand these cases for further proceedings not inconsistent with our opinion if there's nothing further to be considered?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0118122

University of Texas law professor Jordan M. Steiker, representing Smith, said that the Texas court's actions were indeed contradictory and inconsistent.

Texas Solicitor General R. Ted Cruz said that complying with the Supreme Court's evolving decisions governing the death penalty "is not an easy task, and state and federal courts have struggled for two decades to draw the appropriate lines."

That struggle is evident on the court's docket, in which most of the death penalty cases come from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, which covers Texas and much of the South, and the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. "The Ninth looks so clearly from a defendant's perspective, and the Fifth looks at it from a prosecutorial perspective," Berman said.

Two of yesterday's cases, Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman (05-11284) and Brewer v. Quarterman (05-11287), were appeals from the 5th Circuit. The high court in this term has already reversed a 9th Circuit decision that overturned a death sentence.

Dieter said the justices are "in a rather complex area of the law. Maybe they are trying to draw some lines down the middle."

Middle ground could be difficult for a court that has shown itself divided on important aspects of capital punishment. The swing vote on the issue seems to belong to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the only justice in the 5 to 4 majority both to uphold Kansas's death penalty and the Roper decision abolishing capital punishment for juveniles.

High Court Hears Texas Death Penalty Cases (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 18, 2007

The Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday in three Texas death penalty cases that were billed as a test of wills between the high court and lower court judges who have effectively defied its decisions on the use of mitigating evidence.

But whatever anger the Court held toward the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals and the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seems to have largely dissipated. On Wednesday, its newest members, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., appeared ready to give greater deference to Texas in administering its capital-punishment laws.

It was a marked contrast to 2004, when the Supreme Court had angrily sent one of the cases back to the Texas appeals court, only to have the Texas court reaffirm its prior ruling. At the Jan. 17 argument, Roberts seemed to show sympathy for the state court's desire to exercise its own judgment instead of just following the Supreme Court's guidance. "Why do we remand these cases," Roberts asked rhetorically, "if there's nothing further to be considered?"

As the cases were argued inside the Court, outside nine anti-death penalty demonstrators were arrested on the steps for unfurling a banner that read "STOP EXECUTIONS!" The civil-disobedience action coincided with the Texas arguments but was also intended to mark the 30th anniversary of the resumption of capital punishment in 1977, when Gary Gilmore was put to death in Utah.

In all three cases argued before the Court on Wednesday, guilt was not in doubt; at issue instead was the much-litigated question of how jurors should give weight to mitigating evidence. All three defendants were sentenced to death by jurors who were given a jury instruction on mitigating evidence that the Supreme Court has since struck down.

The first case argued, Smith v. Texas, was the one making a return visit. LaRoyce Smith was convicted in 1991 of murdering a former co-worker at a Dallas Taco Bell restaurant. In 2004 the Supreme Court admonished the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals for erroneously relying on a test "we never countenanced and now have unequivocally rejected." The instruction did not allow the jurors to fully consider evidence about Smith's low IQ and troubled childhood.

On remand, the Texas court reaffirmed the sentence, finding that the mitigating evidence was adequately considered and that if there was any error, it was harmless.

Supported by former federal judges and public-interest groups, Smith returned to the Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, that the Texas court had ignored the Supreme Court's mandate.

The Texas court's action "threatens this Court's authority as the final arbiter of federal constitutional law," former Solicitor General Seth Waxman told the justices in a brief for the Constitution Project, which pushes to improve safeguards and fairness in the administration of the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0118123

During the arguments, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg mocked the Texas court, suggesting it had said to the Supreme Court, "Thanks, that's very interesting advice." Justices Stephen Breyer and David Souter also expressed mild disapproval of the Texas court, but much of the hour was spent on the procedural details of the case. Both Roberts and Alito seemed to indicate they thought the issue was one of Texas, not federal, law.

Gene Schaerr of Winston & Strawn bolstered their views in his argument on behalf of 21 states that sided with Texas. Those states, Schaerr said, wanted to "apply their own varied standards" for harmless-error analysis to death penalty cases.

In the second hour of argument Wednesday, the Court considered Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman and Brewer v. Quarterman. Jalil Abdul-Kabir and Brent Brewer were both convicted in separate murders that occurred during robberies. Both were sentenced to death by jurors who, as with the Smith case, had been given a jury instruction found inadequate in other cases by the Supreme Court and since abandoned by the state. Both filed federal habeas petitions that the 5th Circuit denied.

The high court has overturned similar rulings by the 5th Circuit, using increasingly strong language to instruct the circuit to require greater consideration of mitigating evidence. But the 5th Circuit declined to order new trials. Texas contends that the 5th Circuit has given effect to the Supreme Court's decisions.

In an eleventh-hour development, lawyers for both Brewer and Abdul-Kabir last month urged the Supreme Court to return the cases to the 5th Circuit in light of its Dec. 11 en banc decision in Nelson v. Quarterman. In the Nelson case, the appeals court, using language more conciliatory toward the Supreme Court, "decisively changed course" on the mitigation issue, in the words of lawyers for Brewer. As a result, the cases before the Supreme Court no longer needed to be ruled on by the justices, Brewer and Abdul-Kabir argued.

But the Supreme Court did not act on their requests, so the cases were argued Wednesday.

Robert Owen, representing Brewer and Abdul-Kabir, told the justices the Nelson ruling "profoundly changed" the underpinnings of the cases and asked the Court to remand them to the 5th Circuit.

But Ginsburg noted that Texas is likely to appeal the Nelson case, so a remand would only delay resolution of the issue.

Owen, like Smith's lawyer, Jordan Steiker, is a professor at the University of Texas School of Law.

First Lady: Do More To Stop Child Porn (AP)

By Christine Ollivier, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Laura Bush said at a gathering of first ladies Wednesday that police must work with counterparts in other countries to keep children safe from abuse and Internet pornographers.

French first lady Bernadette Chirac hosted the one-day conference on missing and exploited children, which brought together first ladies including Suzanne Mubarak of Egypt and Lyudmila Putin of Russia, as well as Queen Silvia of Sweden and Queen Paola of Belgium.

Mrs. Bush briefed participants on efforts to protect children in the United States, touting the Amber Alert system that mobilizes TV, radio and highway signs to get word out whenever a child goes missing.

"So far, Amber Alerts have saved more than 300 young lives in the United States, and similar programs are now saving lives in countries across the globe, including France," she said.

France's new system, modeled on the U.S. alerts, helped authorities track down three missing children last week.

The women proposed that the system be extended throughout the European Union, so all its member nations are alerted when a child goes missing.

Mrs. Bush said the U.S. alert system helped increase the percentage of missing children found to 94 percent today, compared to 62 percent in 1990.

The first lady also urged international cooperation in fighting online child pornography. She cited the case of a police officer in Denmark who found child pornography online and alerted Interpol. Eventually, the FBI traced images of an abused girl to North Carolina and a relative of the child was sentenced to 100 years in prison.

The relative had 175,000 images on his computer, and police used them to track down other child abusers. "Because one person in Denmark tipped off Interpol, four children in the United States were saved," Mrs. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0118124

The conference was a meeting of the honorary board of directors of the International Center for Missing & Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, Va. A study by the group examined all 186 Interpol member countries and found that up to 95 of them had no laws on child pornography, while 136 of them do not consider possession of child pornography a crime.

"This is a global phenomenon, and if we do nothing, it will become a huge epidemic," Mrs. Mubarak said.

___

On the Net:

http://www.icmec.org

Governor Is Challenged On Ethics By Bruno (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

ALBANY, Jan. 17 — The honeymoon may be coming to an end. Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican Senate majority leader, accused Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Wednesday of being hypocritical for championing campaign finance reform while headlining a $25,000-a-couple fund-raiser later this week for the state Democratic Party.

Mr. Spitzer has been campaigning for Craig M. Johnson, the Nassau County Democrat running for the Senate seat that opened when the governor tapped Senator Michael A. L. Balboni, a Republican, to serve in his administration. Mr. Bruno and his shrinking Republican majority in the State Senate have made keeping the seat a priority.

"I wouldn't be talking campaign finance reform on one hand, and then on the other hand, doing 25,000 price of admission to funnel money — funnel money, launder money — into a Senate contest," Mr. Bruno said. "I think it's inappropriate, I think it's inequitable, I think it's unfair, and I think it's time to step up and tell it like it is."

Shortly after he was elected, Mr. Spitzer unilaterally placed a $10,000 limit on campaign contributions that he would accept, and asked the Legislature to pass a law significantly lowering the limits on donations. But his aides said he would abide by the higher limits that exist under the current law when raising money for other entities — in this case, the state Democratic Party. The money could end up being used on the Senate race.

An e-mailed invitation to the fund-raiser, which will be held Thursday evening on the Upper East Side, promises "an intimate evening with New York State Governor Eliot Spitzer" and lists a minimum ticket price of $25,000 per couple.

Up to now, Mr. Bruno has gone out of his way to praise Mr. Spitzer publicly. But in campaigning for Mr. Johnson, Mr. Spitzer has shown he is willing to break the so-called nonaggression pact that has sometimes existed in Albany between governors and lawmakers of the opposing party whose support they need to govern.

Christine Anderson, Mr. Spitzer's press secretary, said he was glad to campaign for Mr. Johnson. "The governor is asking people in the district to support reform, and he is proud of that," she said.

Mr. Bruno's decision to criticize the popular new governor's ethics was something of a gamble, given his announcement late last year that the F.B.I. has been looking into his business dealings. Senate Republicans have long shifted money between campaign accounts to protect incumbents.

The campaign of the Republican candidate in Nassau County, Maureen O'Connell, is being supported indirectly by Mr. Balboni, the new member of the Spitzer administration she hopes to succeed. Campaign filings show that he sent $110,000 from his campaign account to the New York State Senate Republican Campaign Committee on Dec. 27. On Jan. 8 the committee sent Ms. O'Connell $330,000, the vast majority of what she has raised so far.

Mr. Johnson has raised over $125,000, and taken in $92,500 more in personal and family loans, campaign finance filings show.

Jury Selected In Coke Case (HC/AP)

By Harry R. Weber Ap Business Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 18, 2007

ATLANTA — Twelve jurors were selected Wednesday to decide the fate of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

Opening statements in Joya Williams' trial remain scheduled for Monday, her lawyer, Janice Singer, said.

DOJ_NMG_0118125

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and at least one is expected to testify against her.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

On Wednesday, 15 potential jurors were excused because they own Coca-Cola stock. Another 10 were excused for various reasons not disclosed by the court.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers then began individual questioning of the remaining potential jurors in an effort to select the 12 jurors who will hear the case _ six men and six women _ and the two alternates who will step in if needed. Both alternates are men. The pool consisted of 100 people.

Jury selection began Tuesday. The trial is expected to last up to two weeks.

Williams' lawyer plans to attack the credibility of the two men with whom Williams was charged.

The two men served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than one year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

Medicaid Fraud Charge (NSDY)

By Reid J. Epstein, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 18, 2007

Man is accused in probe that finds he bought $660G home and drove a Hummer while collecting assistance for needy

A Lido Beach man filed more than $420,000 in fraudulent Medicaid claims, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi said yesterday.

Police and Department of Social Services officials said Ricky DiBernardo lied about his finances to qualify for Medicaid benefits. DiBernardo was arrested and pleaded not guilty Monday on a charge of grand larceny, a felony, and remained in jail yesterday on bail of $400,000.

"This is simply an abuse of the Medicaid system," Suozzi said. "This individual is receiving taxpayer-funded medical benefits instead of simply buying his own health insurance."

Suozzi and county officials offered few details about how DiBernardo, 44, was able to qualify for Medicaid, which helps cover health care costs for the needy. In 2004, DiBernardo purchased a $660,000 home at 325 Lido Blvd. and owned a black 2003 Hummer H2, which remained parked in the driveway yesterday.

On the mortgage application for the Lido Boulevard home, DiBernardo listed his annual income as $150,000, Suozzi said. DiBernardo owns an auto repair shop in Island Park, according to Nicole Watkins, Suozzi's Medicaid czar. She could not identify it by name.

Suozzi said DiBernardo deposited more than $334,000, mostly in cash, in a bank account between July 2004 and last March, and paid more than $20,000 to American Express in two months in late 2004.

Watkins said officials do not doubt the validity of DiBernardo's medical claims and cannot say for what he used the Medicaid funds. She also could not say why the county was unable - for 12 years - to determine that DiBernardo should not have qualified for Medicaid assistance.

"It's not a perfect system in terms of identifying sources of income," she said.

Social Services officials began investigating DiBernardo last January after receiving an anonymous tip that he drove the Hummer, which has a blue book value of about $28,000, Watkins said.

DOJ_NMG_0118126

DiBernardo was represented by a Legal Aid attorney at his Monday arraignment. Legal Aid attorneys would not comment on DiBernardo's case yesterday.

DiBernardo pleaded no contest in 1986 to a cocaine trafficking charge in Broward County, Fla., and was sentenced to 4 years in prison. He is also the son of Robert DiBernardo, the Gambino crime family pornography boss who disappeared June 5, 1986.

John Gotti admitted in FBI tapes played at his 1992 trial that he ordered the elder DiBernardo to be killed. Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano later admitted to killing him.

Neteller Ceases Handling U.S. Transfers (HC/AP)

By Robert Barr Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 18, 2007

LONDON — Neteller PLC, a Britain-based online money transfer business, said Thursday it is ceasing to handle gambling transactions from U.S. customers because of restrictive legislation and uncertainties about regulations.

The company's move came three days after former directors arrested and charged in the United States with funneling billions of dollars in gambling proceeds to overseas betting operations.

"As of today ... at 12:01 AM GMT, U.S. resident customers were no longer able to transfer funds using Neteller's services to or from any online gambling site," the company said in a statement to the London Stock Exchange.

Neteller said it would focus operations on markets in Europe, Asia and other countries in the Americas.

Trading in Neteller shares on the London Stock Exchange was suspended Tuesday following the announcement of the arrests of the two former directors.

Neteller is an Internet payment services company that has grown in popularity as an increasing number of credit card companies have begun refusing to accept payments to online gambling sites.

Neteller essentially acts as a middleman between gamblers and offshore betting operations. For example, a gambler who wants to place bets at offshore sports books can fund an account with Neteller, which in turn will transfer the money to the betting sites. Prosecutors say Neteller facilitated the transfer of billions of dollars of illegal gambling proceeds.

On Tuesday, U.S. authorities announced the arrests of former directors John David Lefebvre, 55, and Stephen Eric Lawrence, 46, both Canadian citizens who were indicted by a grand jury in New York.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the men knew when they took their company public that its activities were illegal.

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon, assistant director of the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, said the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry is "a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

Lefebvre and Lawrence were charged in connection with the creation and operation of an Internet payment services company that facilitated the transfer of billions of dollars of illegal gambling proceeds from U.S. citizens to the owners of overseas Internet gambling companies.

Lefebvre was arrested Monday in Malibu, California. Lawrence, who resides in Paradise Island, Bahamas, was arrested Monday in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

They joined in 1999 to found Neteller, which is based in the Isle of Man and is publicly traded in the United Kingdom.

Lawrence left the company's board of directors in October and Lefebvre left in December 2005, prosecutors said.

The company's announcement noted the arrests of its former directors, but said the decision to cease gambling transfers in the United States "reflects the culmination of a series of deliberations and steps the group has taken since the passing of the UIGEA (Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act) in October 2006."

Several British-based online gambling operations, including PartyGaming PLC, Sportingbet PLC, BetOnSports PLC and Leisure & Gaming PLC, withdrew from the lucrative U.S. market as a result of the act and enforcement action by U.S. authorities.

Sportingbet PLC Chairman Peter Dicks, 64, was detained in New York on Sept. 6 when customs officials discovered he had an outstanding warrant issued by the Louisiana State Police Gaming Enforcement Division.

DOJ_NMG_0118127

The warrant, issued in May, charged Dicks with gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a US$25,000 (19,700) fine. He resigned as the company's non-executive chairman after being detained. He was later released after New York Governor George Pataki declined to sign a warrant extraditing him to Louisiana.

Former BetOnSports Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers remains under house arrest in the United States awaiting trial on federal charges based on the 1961 Wire Act.

Eight U.S. states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling: Washington, Nevada, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, South Dakota, Michigan and Oregon. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states had taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Millions of American players bet an estimated US$6 billion (euro4.7 billion) per year online, according to industry figures.

___

On the Net: http://www.netellergroup.com

2 Convicted In Kidnap-ransom Scheme In Which Victims Were Dumped In California Reservoir (FINDLAW/AP)

By Greg Risling, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-Two men were convicted Wednesday of orchestrating a ruthless kidnapping-for-ransom scheme targeting Russian immigrants that resulted in the killings of five people whose bodies were found at the bottom of a Northern California reservoir.

A federal jury found Iouri Mikhel, 41, and Jurijus Kadamovas, 40, guilty of three counts of hostage-taking and three counts of conspiracy. Both could face the death penalty.

Neither defendant showed reaction. Relatives of some victims sobbed and held each other as the jury's decision was announced.

During the 4 1/2-month trial, federal prosecutors portrayed the two defendants as the leaders of a group that sought to amass a fortune by kidnapping affluent Russian immigrants from Los Angeles in late 2001 and early 2002 and extorting money from their families and friends.

Regardless of whether ransoms were paid, prosecutors said, victims were killed and their bodies tied with weights and dumped in a reservoir near Yosemite National Park. The kidnappers had promised some of their hostages that they would be freed, prosecutors said.

Defense attorneys countered that accomplices who cut deals with prosecutors for lesser prison sentences were the brains of the operation. Mikhel's attorney Richard Callahan said his client may have been involved in money laundering but would have been too smart to leave behind crucial evidence.

The penalty phase of the trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 24.

Ex-Official Of Red Cross Is Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 17 — A former California accounting executive at the Orange County Chapter of the American Red Cross was indicted Wednesday on federal embezzling charges, adding to concerns raised by watchdogs over the financial management of the Red Cross and some of its chapters.

The official, Karen Shuerger, 58, who was the assistant director of accounting, was charged with misappropriating more than $100,000 over the final five years of a 17-year career at the chapter. The investigation, however, is continuing to determine if the misdeeds were broader, said officials in the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles, which is prosecuting the case.

Ms. Shuerger, the indictment said, used the chapter's traveler's checks and a credit card issued by the organization to make purchases for herself at places that included a gambling hall in Nevada, a beach resort in Hawaii and the San Diego Zoo.

DOJ_NMG_0118128

The embezzlement came to light, prosecutors said, after Ms. Shuerger, who had been in charge of monitoring money received by the chapter and preparing financial records, retired in the fall of 2005.

Her replacement noticed discrepancies in the accounting books, and the organization conducted an audit in 2006 that suggested possible criminal activity, said Robb C. Adkins, the assistant United States attorney prosecuting the case. The results were turned over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, leading to Ms. Shuerger's indictment.

Ms. Shuerger, who moved from Santa Ana, Calif., to Henderson, Nev., after she retired, could not be reached for comment. She is being issued a summons to appear in court next month.

Her lawyer, Charles Fasano, expressed surprise at the indictment, saying he had been in discussions with prosecutors over the case, but he declined to comment on them or the charges.

The American Red Cross has been under fire for its management practices. Officials said they had put in place or planned several changes to address the criticism, and they pointed to the cooperation with the F.B.I. as an example of a quick response to fraud accusations.

"The American Red Cross takes a very aggressive stance against fraud and works closely with law enforcement when criminal activity is discovered," Stanley V. Perdue, the chief executive, said in a statement distributed by the United States attorney's office.

Tales From The Whitey Watch (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 18, 2007

Former DEA agent recounts 2 years of stealth, frustrations

They tracked him any way they could, watching him through binoculars, bugging his Ford Crown Victoria, flying over him in a Cessna plane to pick up his conversations, or trying to intercept them with an antenna atop the Dorchester Heights Memorial in South Boston.

It was a two-year game of cat and mouse, as federal investigators monitored the movements of gangster James "Whitey" Bulger and his lieutenants in a frustrating quest to snare him for extorting profits from drug dealers in the neighborhood.

The investigation by the DEA and Boston Police led to federal cocaine charges against 51 people in 1990, but no charges against Bulger.

For the first time, in an interview this week with the Globe, a Drug Enforcement Administration agent assigned to the investigation 18 years ago told of the twists, turns, dramatic encounters, and disappointments of the chase.

Mike Swidwinski, a retired special agent now living in Michigan, also provided never-before-published photos that he took of Bulger, Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, and Kevin J. Weeks from 1989, saying the public should see them and know the story behind them, because it is part of the city's history.

The surveillance photos provide rare glimpses of Bulger, now on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list, patting a dog on the head near Columbia Park, holding forth at Castle Island, and relaxing on lounge chairs with Flemmi and Weeks at a time when they ran a criminal enterprise in Boston that rivaled that of the Mafia.

Swidwinski's candid account shows what it was like to be on the other side of the Bulger gang, sometimes stealthily watching, other times coming face to face with their prey.

"In retrospect, a lot of us didn't know what a dangerous man he was," said Swidwinski, who had just five years with the DEA at the time of the surveillance operation.

Bulger, 77, a longtime FBI informant, was indicted in 1995 on federal racketeering charges but fled just before the indictment and has been a fugitive since . He is also charged with 19 murders. Flemmi, also a longtime FBI informant, is serving a life sentence for 10 murders and is currently cooperating with the government.

Investigators involved in the surveillance operation, including Swidwinski, were always suspicious that the FBI hindered their attempts to get Bulger.

DOJ_NMG_0118129

Bulger's longtime handler, John J. Connolly Jr., was convicted of racketeering in 2002 for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution and leaking them information. However, Connolly was never charged with compromising the 1989 DEA investigation, and Weeks told the Globe this week that it was obvious they were being watched during that period.

Swidwinski said the Bulger investigation "was a piece of history that we actually participated in" and, with Bulger still on the run, the case is "sort of an unfinished memory" for him.

Swidwinski and his partner were trying to quietly gather evidence to show that South Boston-based cocaine dealers were paying Bulger a cut of their profits. They tapped Bulger's cellphone (a rarity for that era) and a mailbox and even buried a bug in a patch of dirt near where he walked regularly at Castle Island.

Bulger seemed always vigilant. One time Swidwinski was parked in a van across from Columbia Park (now known as Moakley Park), watching Bulger through binoculars. Suddenly, as he focused on Bulger, he realized that Bulger was staring back at him, through his own binoculars. And then the gangster started walking toward him, with Weeks at his side. The agent quickly drove away to avoid a confrontation, he said.

Another day, after agents suspected that Bulger and his deputies had discovered a bug that had been planted inside Bulger's Crown Victoria, they went to retrieve it. They stopped Bulger during a planned traffic stop, and Swidwinski ordered Bulger out of the car.

"My only bragging rights is I think I'm the only guy in history who ever took Whitey Bulger out of a car at gunpoint," said Swidwinski, now 57, who retired two years ago after 22 years with the DEA. He remembers grabbing Bulger's car keys and looking at the key ring, which had a pendant with a devil's face on it and the words "Born to Raise Hell."

Retired Boston police sergeant detective Frank Dewan, who worked alongside Swidwinski in the investigation, recounted how one day he was following Bulger and his girlfriend, Catherine Greig, when Bulger suddenly turned and began following him. "It was cat and mouse," said Dewan, adding that it was "just to let us know that he knew we were there."

Other efforts to bug Bulger also proved unsuccessful, said Dewan, recalling how the bug planted in the ground at a Castle Island spot where the gangster often stopped to discuss business with his henchmen malfunctioned, picking up nothing but WBZ radio.

Swidwinski's description of the surveillance operation recalls a lower-tech time in law enforcement. The investigators planted a bug in Bulger's car from Dec. 21, 1989, to Jan. 19, 1990, which acted as a transmitter and sent a signal to a DEA-operated Cessna that would fly overhead, following Bulger during the day, Swidwinski said. An agent in the plane would record the conversations.

At night and during poor daytime weather conditions, DEA agents would climb to the top of the Dorchester Heights monument on Telegraph Hill with another antenna to capture Bulger's conversations as he moved around South Boston.

"The weather conditions in the middle of the winter up in that tower were just horrific," said Swidwinski.

But none of Bulger's conversations were of any value, prompting investigators to yank the bug, Swidwinski said. The agents believed that Bulger suspected his car was bugged, because when Weeks would start to talk, Bulger would warn, "I told you, don't talk in the car."

"Either he is a highly intelligent person, or he just kept getting tipped off," Swidwinski said.

Bulger always suspected he was being bugged and knew he was followed by the airplane, according to Weeks, who struck a deal with the government after his 1999 arrest and is now a free man after serving five years for assisting Bulger in five murders.

"You'd look up in the sky and see this plane doing figure-eights over us," said Weeks during a telephone interview yesterday. "We'd drive to the Cape, we'd be on the highway, and we'd see the plane."

Weeks said that he and Bulger were aware of the DEA surveillance because they had police scanners in their cars, set to the DEA's frequency. In fact, he said, he learned from listening to the scanner that agents were about to make arrests in August 1990, prompting him and Bulger to hang out at Boston Common that morning until they were sure they weren't going to be arrested.

Swidwinski has read books by Weeks and others about Bulger and surfs the Internet for updates about the international effort to catch him. He said he has no idea where Bulger might be, but if he encountered the gangster on the street, he believes he could recognize him, just from his stern and sometimes menacing voice.

DOJ_NMG_0118130

"He didn't have that Boston accent," Swidwinski said. "He kind of had what I'd call a normal accent. There were times when he'd raise his voice and you could almost see the smoke coming out of his nostrils. . . . He pretty much spoke with authority."

TJX Says Customer Data Was Stolen (NYT)

By Brad Stone And Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The TJX Companies, the retailer that operates the T. J. Maxx and Marshalls discount clothing chains, has joined the ignominious list of companies that have had sensitive customer financial data pilfered by identity thieves.

Yesterday the company, based in Framingham, Mass., said that as early as 2003 and during most of last year, an intruder had gained access to a computer system containing the private records of customers, including credit and debit cards, checks and driver's license numbers.

Both its flagship chains were affected, as well as HomeGoods and A. J. Wright stores in the United States, and its Winners and HomeSense chains in Canada. The company said it was still trying to determine whether data from its 36 Bob's Stores locations in the United States had also been compromised.

"We are deeply concerned about this event and the difficulties it may cause our customers," Ben Cammarata, the chief executive of the TJX Companies, said in a news release posted on the company's Web site.

The company did not specify precisely how many customers were put at risk. Sherry Lang, vice president for investor and public relations, said that the intruder had taken the credit and debit card records of "a limited number of people, substantially less than millions of people," as well as a small number of driver's license numbers. Ms. Lang said the company did not know whether other account information was also stolen, and declined to be more specific.

The major credit card companies said yesterday that they were aware of the breach and had notified the banks that issue their cards to monitor for suspicious account activity.

The TJX Companies detected the break-in last month, when an outside consultant noted suspicious activity on its network, Ms. Lang said.

The company said it was working with the Secret Service, the Justice Department and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the Secret Service, would not disclose any details about the investigation but said the agency was actively involved.

Avivah Litan, a data security analyst at Gartner Inc., said that TJX most likely suffered an attack on its centralized processing center, which holds customer account data. Ms. Litan said the company appeared to be storing information from its point-of-sale control terminals, which would include data from the magnetic stripes of credit cards and other sensitive information that most data security experts advise companies not to keep.

Privacy experts said the disclosure of the breach indicated that the data had not been encrypted, though TJX declined to address that question.

Beth Givens at the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit consumer-advocacy project based in San Diego, said that leaving customer data exposed on networked computers was a mistake many companies still make. "Given not only the financial hit but the public relations black eye, you would think that companies would be taking security far more seriously than they appear to be," Ms. Givens said.

2002 Sniper 'Witness' Convicted Of Rape, Murder (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Matthew M. Dowdy served a short but well-publicized jail stint for his false claim that he witnessed a sniper shooting in 2002. His latest offense was far less notorious but probably will land him in prison for the rest of his life.

A Fairfax County jury convicted Dowdy yesterday of first-degree murder and rape for the September 2005 stabbing of Judy J. "Jaimie" Coate in the Falls Church area. The jury then sentenced Dowdy, 42, to life in prison on the murder charge and 30 years on the rape charge -- terms that Circuit Court Judge Stanley P. Klein can impose or decrease at sentencing April 20.

DOJ_NMG_0118131

The slaying of Coate, 31, of Falls Church, whose body was discovered behind a large utility box on Lee Highway on Sept. 27, 2005, was unrelated to Dowdy's arrest in October 2002, at the height of the region's terror over the sniper slayings. Dowdy claimed he saw a man with a rifle fire from the parking lot at the Home Depot in the Seven Corners area, killing Linda G. Franklin.

Surveillance tapes soon showed that Dowdy was inside the store and could not have seen the shooting. His lawyer later claimed that Dowdy was simply relaying information from a friend, though the shot was actually fired from a community center across the street from the store. Dowdy pleaded no contest to a charge of making a false statement to an officer, was fined $1,000 and was sentenced to six months in jail.

In 2005, Dowdy was living in a motel in the city of Falls Church. When Coate's body was found in some underbrush, she had been stabbed in the neck, head, stomach and back, said Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. And "a great deal of blood," Coate's blood, was on the utility box, he said.

Examiners testified that Dowdy's fingerprint and palm print were in Coate's blood on the box, and they said his DNA was found at the scene. There were no witnesses to the killing.

Dowdy testified that he had been with Coate and had consensual sex with her but had not killed her. Defense attorney Daniel T. Lopez said that the fingerprint evidence had been "handled poorly" by investigators and that the palm print was not Dowdy's.

The jury deliberated about seven hours over two days before reaching its verdict.

Suspect In Kidnapping May Be Linked To 1991 Abduction (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

POTOSI, Mo., Jan. 17 — The investigation of a suburban St. Louis man accused of kidnapping widened Wednesday as law enforcement officials pursued links between him and a 1991 abduction.

Prosecutors in Washington County on Wednesday charged the man, Michael Devlin, 41, with kidnapping and using a deadly weapon, asserting that Shawn Hornbeck, 15, may have faced a handgun when he was abducted four years ago near his home in Redwoods, Mo., a rural town southwest of St. Louis.

The police found Shawn at Mr. Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, a St. Louis suburb, on Friday while searching for another boy, William Ownby, 13, who had been missing for four days. Mr. Devlin was arrested Friday and charged with one count of kidnapping William, who is known as Ben. He is being held on $3 million bail and is to be arraigned Thursday.

In Lincoln County, northwest of St. Louis, investigators named Mr. Devlin as a possible suspect in the 1991 disappearance of Charles Arlin Henderson. Charles, known as Arlin, disappeared — like Shawn — while riding his bike, near his home in Moscow Mills. He was also 11, and, a police spokesman said, looked a lot like Shawn and Ben.

"It may mean nothing; it may mean everything," said Lt. Rick Harrell of the Lincoln County Sheriff's Office.

Debra Henderson-Griffith, Arlin's mother, agreed that there was a resemblance between the boys.

"His coloring, his face, his build, his smile, he looks a lot like Ben," Ms. Henderson-Griffith said of the son who disappeared one evening as she cooked dinner for him. .

"If he's dead, I want justice," she said. "But I think he's alive, and I want him home. I'm never going to give up hope until somebody brings me a body."

In Washington County, John D. Ruff, the prosecutor, would not discuss the weapons charge.. But in a statement of probable cause given to the court, the Washington County sheriff, Kevin Schroeder, said Mr. Devlin, 41, abducted Shawn "utilizing force for the purpose of terrorizing the victim."

But both men said their evidence discredited rumors that Shawn was a runaway. "Shawn was abducted against his will — period," Mr. Ruff said. "End of story."

Sheriff Schroeder added: "This is something that is so bizarre that the normal individual cannot grasp what this 11-year-old boy went through. Nobody knows. Nobody was in that situation."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0118132

Utah Attorney Argues Brother's Death In Denver Court (SLT)

By Keith Coffman, Special to The Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, January 18, 2007

Jesse Trentadue says prison guards in Oklahoma killed

DENVER - In the past dozen years, Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue has lost his parents, his law partner and his younger brother.

The latter was the most traumatic. Kenneth Trentadue was found hanged in 1995 in a federal prison in Oklahoma.

Since then, Trentadue has fought to disprove the official finding of suicide and prove his theory that Kenneth Trentade was murdered by guards who mistook him for an accomplice in the Oklahoma City bombing.

On Wednesday, in the latest hearing in a bitter legal wrangle, the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments on two issues in the case.

The first was the federal government's request to overturn a judge's ruling giving $1.1 million to the family for emotional distress caused by how Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials handled the aftermath of Trentadue's death.

The second was whether to allow family members to press ahead with their claim that authorities tried to derail their quest to prove murder by attempting to bring bogus obstruction of justice charges against Jesse Trentadue.

Michael E. Robinson, a Justice Department attorney, said the record showed that emotional distress allegedly caused by the handling of the inmate's death did not affect the daily activities of all Trentadue family members.

Advertisement

He also pointed out that only a few family members saw the bruises and autopsy incisions on Trentadue's body after it had been sent to a California funeral home. Oklahoma law distinguishes between bystanders and individuals who were directly involved, Robinson said.

"They were more like bystanders," he said of the Trentadues who were not present when funeral home workers removed the body from a coffin and photographed it.

Judge Terrence O'Brien questioned Robinson about whether the emotional distress the Trentadues suffered came "from the runaround they got from the BOP."

Robinson said that "they essentially learned of the condition of the body after the fact" and, therefore, could not get damages for emotional distress.

Trentadue countered that the government "skirts the issue" of the emotional distress by not producing the full record of the evidence.

He also argued that the government tried to get inmates who were in prison with his brother "to say I paid them to lie."

Kenneth Trentadue, who had served time for bank robbery, was arrested near San Diego in June 1995, two months after the bombing that killed 168 people at the federal building in Oklahoma City. He was sent to the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City for an alleged parole violation.

On Aug. 21, guards found Trentadue's blood-soaked body in his cell hanging from a noose made of torn bedsheets. Prison officials say the 44-year-old inmate committed suicide.

According to Jesse Trentadue, his brother bore a strong resemblance to Richard Lee Guthrie, a bank robber and alleged accomplice of McVeigh. He maintains that authorities mistakenly thought his brother was Guthrie - a member of the Midwest Bank Robbery Gang, an arm of the Aryan Republican Army that stole from financial institutions to fund attacks on government buildings - and killed him during an interrogation that got out of hand.

The family filed suit over the death. U.S. District Judge Tim Leonard in Oklahoma City ruled in 2001 that Trentadue committed suicide, but awarded the family $1.1 million for emotional distress.

The matter was appealed once before and the 10th Circuit ordered further findings by Leonard, who reinstated the award. The case went back to Denver on the appeal of the award and the family's request to be allowed to bring a claim on the alleged attempts to stop their inquiry.

Robinson declined comment after the hearing.

Trentadue, who said he was tired and drained, said the years since 1995 have been hard.

"They'll lie when the truth will serve them better," he said of federal authorities.

The appeals court took the arguments under consideration and will issue a ruling later.

Schering Sales To Pay $435m In Drug Pricing, Marketing Case (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

AP, January 18, 2007

BOSTON - Schering Sales Corp. and its parent company were sentenced to pay $435 million Wednesday as part of a settlement with the Justice Department over accusations it improperly marketed drugs for unapproved uses and lied to the government about drug prices.

Under a settlement announced in August, Schering Sales pleaded guilty to conspiracy and agreed to pay a criminal fine of $180 million. Its parent company, Schering-Plough Corp., agreed to pay another $255 million to resolve civil aspects of the case.

The sentencing closes the loop on an investigation by the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston that began in 2001.

Investigators said Schering-Plough marketed drugs for uses that had not been approved by the Food & Drug Administration. One example was Temodar, a drug the FDA had approved to treat a type of brain tumor called anaplastic astrocytoma. Prosecutors said Schering promoted Temodar to treat several other types of brain cancer, which the FDA had not approved. The company also promoted the unapproved use of Intron A for the treatment of cancer on the surface of the bladder, prosecutors said.

Although doctors are allowed to prescribe drugs for unapproved uses, drug companies are prohibited from marketing drugs for these so-called "off-label" uses.

As part of the settlement, the company pleaded guilty to making false statements to the Food & Drug Administration and the Health Care Financing Administration.

U.S. District Judge Patti Saris scolded Schering and the entire pharmaceutical industry for promoting non-FDA approved uses for drugs. She noted that several other major drug companies have also been fined for illegal marketing, including Pfizer Inc., which in 2004 agreed to pay $430 million on allegations that Warner-Lambert, which Pfizer acquired in 2000, promoted non-approved uses of the anti-seizure drug Neurontin.

"You cannot thumb your nose at the FDA," Saris said.

"At the end of the day, you can't market off-label. ... It's wrong."

Brien O'Connor, an attorney for Schering, said the company never lied to doctors about the uses the drugs had been approved for, but simply spoke to doctors and gave them peer-reviewed articles about other uses for the drugs.

"We told the truth about Temodar and Intron, and we didn't mislead the doctors," O'Connor said after the sentencing.

Thomas Sabatino Jr., general counsel for Schering-Plough, said that after a new management team took over the company in 2003 the company put a strict compliance program in place, including training all employees on its code of conduct and putting a compliance officer in each of its business units.

"We have a clear focus on business integrity, compliance, and honestly, doing the right thing," Sabatino said.

Prosecutors said Schering-Plough, based in Kenilworth, N.J., also reported a false best price to the Health Care Financing Administration on Claritin RediTabs to avoid paying millions of dollars in rebates to Medicaid. Under Medicaid rules, pharmaceutical companies must provide their products at the best price made available to commercial buyers, including HMOs.

Lawsuit Points To MRI Kickbacks (WSJ)

By David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

A whistleblower lawsuit unsealed Wednesday details a widespread scheme among Chicago-area MRI operators to win referrals from doctors by allegedly signing the doctors to phony equipment lease deals that result in the physicians getting a kickback when they order scans for patients.

The action, originally filed last February, was unsealed after the Illinois attorney general decided to intervene in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0118134

The lawsuit strikes at an increasingly common arrangement between magnetic-resonance-imaging centers and doctors that is blamed for helping to fuel a staggering increase in the number of medical imaging tests done each year in the U.S.

The action names 11 MRI centers allegedly engaged in the illegal kickback scheme.

According to the complaint, the MRI service centers sign lease deals with physicians that purportedly call for the doctors to rent time on MRI machines to scan their patients. In reality, the lawsuit charges, the physicians never perform any of the scans. The scans are done by the MRI center employees at their facility.

The arrangements are "subterfuge" to hide kickbacks to the doctors, the lawsuit alleges. By entering into a "lease arrangement," the referring physician can claim part of the insurance payment even though he hasn't done any work related to the scan. For the MRI centers, the arrangements help generate referrals.

The lawsuit claims thousands of MRI scans have been conducted under these lease deals in the past 18 months.

By intervening, the Illinois attorney general will now prosecute the civil case, said Benjamin Weinberg, the chief of the public interest division. Mr. Weinberg said the attorney general will seek an injunction to stop the alleged kickback schemes as well as pursuing restitution and damages related to the insurance payments for the scans. He said the office did not yet have an estimate of how much insurers were billed under the lease arrangements.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Who Tried To Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 33 Months (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

CLEVELAND (AP) — A man who admitted he spread mercury around an interracial couple's house two years ago to try to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced Wednesday to nearly three years in federal prison, the Justice Department announced.

U.S. District Judge Patricia Gaughan said she wanted to send a clear message with the 33-month prison term that such conduct won't be tolerated.

David Fredericy, 50, who is white, pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, making false statements to federal investigators and interference with housing rights.

In his signed plea agreement, Fredericy said he and neighbor Joseph Kuzlik, who is also white, wanted to drive black residents out of their Slavic Village neighborhood. The two would yell racial slurs and threaten black neighbors, the agreement said.

The neighborhood in southeast Cleveland has been filled with racial tension in recent years.

Kuzlik, who pleaded guilty in November to similar charges, is to be sentenced next month.

In February 2005, Fredericy used a syringe to squirt mercury around the interracial couple's house and on their porch, while Kuzlik acted as a lookout, authorities said. The neighbors touched the liquid, which can be toxic, and brought it into their home on their shoes. No one was injured.

Gaughan also ordered Fredericy to repay the state and federal environmental protection agencies for the cleanup.

Expert: Party Official Used Racial Slurs To Disenfranchise Whites (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, January 18, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A black Noxubee County Democratic Party official and his allies exploit racial tensions to disenfranchise white candidates and voters, a federal judge was told Wednesday in the government's first use of the Voting Rights Act to allege discrimination against whites.

Theodore Arrington, a political science professor at the University of North Carolina, testified as an expert witness for the U.S. Justice Department. He compared the current treatment of whites in east Mississippi's Noxubee County to the disfranchisement of black voters in the racially segregated South of the past.

DOJ_NMG_0118135

Noxubee County has a majority black population. The Justice Department accuses Ike Brown - chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee - of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation.

"Ike Brown and his associates do not uphold the law and customs that prevent bias and fraud in the administration of the Democratic primary, which is tantamount to elections in Noxubee County," Arrington testified. "And he cannot be trusted to do so in the future. Indeed, he is behind much of that fraud."

Wil Colom, one of Brown's defense attorneys, strongly objected to Arrington's statements, but U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee allowed the testimony to continue. Lee is hearing the case without a jury.

Arrington said Brown and others use racial slurs as "bullying techniques" to bring people in line and further polarize elections.

The testimony came in the second day of the trial that accuses Brown and his associates of allowing unqualified black candidates to run in the county's elections. Brown, among other things, is also accused of rejecting whites' absentee ballots while accepting blacks' ballots with similar defects.

The court recessed for lunch before Brown's defense team was able respond to the accusations in a cross examination.

Brown, a former tax preparer, who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns. He is a driving force in politics in Noxubee County.

Whites once controlled politics in the Noxubee County, a rural area along the Alabama line with a population of 12,500, but now there's only one white countywide office holder. The Justice Department says Brown is the reason for that, claiming he manipulates elections.

The population in the county is about 70 percent black and 30 percent white. Democratic candidates are virtually guaranteed to win elections.

Feds Urged To Probe State's Mental Hospitals (AJC)

By Alan Judd, Andy Miller, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 18, 2007

The National Alliance on Mental Illness, a consumer advocacy group, Wednesday asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate what it called "unacceptable and intolerable" conditions in Georgia's seven state mental hospitals.

The group said its letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was prompted by an Atlanta Journal-Constitution investigation that found a pattern of neglect, abuse and poor medical care in the Georgia psychiatric hospitals.

The newspaper reported at least 115 suspicious deaths of patients and more than 190 substantiated cases of physical or sexual abuse by hospital employees since 2002.

The suspicious deaths included 36 who died from choking on food, vomit or foreign objects, or by aspirating those substances into their lungs. A similar number died for lack of emergency treatment or from questionable medical care. Twelve committed suicide.

"I cannot emphasize enough the outrage of NAMI members to such conditions," Michael Fitzpatrick, executive director of the Virginia-based group, said in the letter.

"The Georgia scandal represents an especially egregious, systemic violation of civil rights."

A Department of Justice spokeswoman said late Wednesday that its Civil Rights Division had not yet received the letter. "But when we do, we will certainly review it," said Cynthia Magnuson, the spokeswoman.

Under a federal civil rights statute intended to protect people in government institutional care, Justice has investigated conditions in mental hospitals and facilities for the mentally retarded in several states. The federal investigations often lead to a state agreement to launch reforms.

"It's premature for us to comment" on the request for an investigation, said Dena Smith, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Human Resources, which operates the hospitals.

Earlier Wednesday, DHR's board met but its top officials did not mention the Journal-Constitution's series of four reports.

DOJ_NMG_0118136

NAMI describes itself as a grass-roots organization dedicated to improving the lives of people living with serious mental illness and their families. It has about 200,000 members nationally.

Federal intervention "is a last resort," Ron Honberg, legal director for NAMI, said in an interview.

"Generally the Justice Department gets involved if there's a pattern of problems that's pervasive."

The group's letter also cited patient overcrowding and hospital understaffing that the newspaper concluded contributed to deaths and abuse cases.

Honberg called conditions in Georgia's seven mental hospitals "unacceptable and intolerable."

DHR said earlier Wednesday that its 2008 budget included money for an additional 83 forensic beds for patients who are under court supervision.

Since fiscal 2004, the seven hospitals' operating budgets — which include state and federal money — have declined by 12 percent. But the average daily number of adult mental health patients will have risen about 12 percent by the end of this fiscal year, officials project.

NAMI's Honberg said federal intervention "is by no means the only potential remedy. We shouldn't hang our hats only on this."

Justice Department action, though, has served as a catalyst to improve hospitals in states such as Alabama, Vermont and Virginia, NAMI said.

The group's Georgia chapter, along with other advocacy groups in the Mental Health Services Coalition, plans a Tuesday news conference to call for the Legislature to address what they call "a crisis" in mental health services.

To read the investigative report, A Hidden Shame: Danger and Death in Georgia's Mental Hospitals, go to www.ajc.com/hiddenshame.

NY Congressman Wants Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - A second congressman has urged the Department of Justice to investigate whether the district attorney in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault violated the rights of the defendants.

Rep. Peter King, whose Long Island district includes relatives of one of the accused students, Collin Finnerty, urged Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to begin an investigation into Mike Nifong, who asked last week to be recused from the case.

"I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case," King wrote to Gonzales, arguing that the FBI should investigate whether the prosecutor may have violated Finnerty's civil rights, including the right to due process under the law.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said it was too early to launch a federal probe.

"It would be premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other procedures are pending in the state of North Carolina," Magnuson said.

A message left at Nifong's office was not immediately returned.

King, the top Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee, is the son of a New York Police Department lieutenant. His request for an investigation is the latest addition to the chorus of public criticism of Nifong's handling of the case.

Justice Department officials said Tuesday they had rejected a similar request from North Carolina Rep. Walter Jones, also a Republican. Jones' spokeswoman, Kathleen Joyce, said the congressman still planned to meet next week with the head of the department's Civil Rights Division.

Special prosecutors with the North Carolina attorney general's office have been assigned to take over the case against the three accused lacrosse players - Finnerty, Dave Evans and Reade Seligmann.

The three are accused of attacking a stripper hired to perform at a team party in March.

Nifong dropped rape charges against the players last month after the woman wavered on some key details, but the men still face sexual offense and kidnapping charges. The players have strongly proclaimed their innocence.

DOJ_NMG_0118137

Meanwhile, a letter signed by dozens of Duke professors and posted on the Internet said while they also presume the players are innocent, they won't apologize for a widely criticized ad published in the campus newspaper. That ad included anonymous quotes from students discussing racism and sexual assault on Duke's campus.

"The ad has been read as a comment on the alleged rape, the team party, or the specific students accused," the letter said. "Worse, it has been read as rendering a judgment in the case. ... We reject all attempts to try the case outside the courts, and stand firmly by the principle of the presumption of innocence."

The letter is signed by 87 faculty members, many of whom endorsed the ad in April.

Since he was recused, Nifong has handed over thousands of pages of information to the special prosecutors. One of them, Mary Winstead, worked with Nifong as an assistant district attorney in Durham for several years in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

Some lawyers said she was an unusual choice for the case considering that Nifong's handling of the case has been heavily criticized.

"She may not be investigating Mike, but she's investigating Mike's work," said attorney Alex Charns, who represents an unindicted lacrosse player. "(Nifong's) conduct is part and parcel of this prosecution. There's no way to untangle that."

The North Carolina State Bar has filed ethics charges against Nifong for making misleading and inflammatory comments about the lacrosse team early in the case.

Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Two former U.S. Border Patrol agents surrendered yesterday to begin prison sentences for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico.

Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, said goodbye to their wives and six children -- three each -- as they turned themselves over to U.S. Marshals shortly after 1:30 p.m. at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, the California Republican who has been at the forefront of efforts to have the prosecution reviewed and the agents re-tried, yesterday criticized the White House for not acting in the case.

"This is the worst betrayal of American defenders I have ever seen," Mr. Rohrabacher said of President Bush. "It's shameful this was done by someone who is in the Republican Party. He obviously thinks more about his agreements with Mexico than the lives of American people and backing up his defenders.

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former "Agent of the Year" nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the agency, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after the smuggling suspect, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was located in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and was given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

"How will my children cope with this?" Patty Compean asked reporters as her husband prepared to turn himself over to federal authorities. "My husband is a good man and a good father. Sometimes I just don't know how this all happened."

The White House refused last week a request by Republican House members to keep the two men out of prison pending their appeal. Bush spokesman Tony Snow said that the case against the agents had been mischaracterized, that they had violated regulations and that they had been convicted by a jury.

The two men surrendered after U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone, who heard the case, denied a motion that they remain free on bond pending an appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans for a new trial.

DOJ_NMG_0118138

"Because defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence, he is eligible for release pending appeal only for exceptional reasons," Judge Cardone said in denying the motion. "The court finds that no exceptional reasons exist in this case."

Both men were handcuffed and taken to the county jail for two weeks to a month until they can be transported to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to be housed in Mississippi, while Compean will be incarcerated in Ohio.

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said that more than 252,000 signatures were collected and that the petition was presented this week to the White House.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the Rio Grande along the border with Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

The government's prosecution began after an investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General located Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after the suspect's mother complained to a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot.

President Calls For Genetic Privacy Bill (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — President Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to pass long-stalled legislation to safeguard genetic privacy, a measure experts say would encourage millions of Americans to undergo testing that could lead to prevention and treatment of cancer and other diseases.

“If a person is willing to share his or her genetic information, it is important that that information not be exploited in improper ways,” Mr. Bush said at the National Institutes of Health. “And Congress can pass good legislation to prevent that from happening.” He added, “We want medical research to go forward without an individual fearing personal discrimination.”

For years, scientists and patients’ advocates have pushed for legislation barring employers and insurance companies from discriminating based on the results of genetic tests. A so-called genetic discrimination bill passed the Senate unanimously in 2003, but died in the House.

The bill was reintroduced in the House this week. With Congress now under Democratic control, the bill’s backers are optimistic . They include Dr. Francis S. Collins, director of the National Human Genome Research Institute at the health institutes, who participated in a roundtable discussion with Mr. Bush on Wednesday.

Dr. Collins said Mr. Bush’s statement, along with the possibility of Congressional action, “gives us renewed hope that all Americans will finally receive the protections they need to benefit from gene-based medicine.”

The Spread Of The Credit Check As Civil Rights Issue (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

Lisa Bailey worked for five months at Harvard University as a temp entering donations into a database. When the university made the job a salaried position, Ms. Bailey, who is black, saw a chance to lift herself out of dead-end jobs.

Bailey's superiors encouraged her to apply, she says, but turned her down after discovering her bad credit history.

Bailey, with her lawyer, has lodged a complaint against Harvard charging racial discrimination. The reason: Studies show that minorities are more likely to have bad credit, but credit problems have not been shown to negatively affect job performance.

Some privacy and minority advocates are now seeing credit as a civil rights issue as minorities start to fight employers and insurers who base decisions on credit histories. Their effort could slow the near doubling in credit checks by employers in the past decade, which impacts millions of Americans who are struggling with debt.

DOJ_NMG_0118139

"It's definitely a civil rights issue because of the growing use of credit reports and credit scores for hiring, renting an apartment, insurance, and the fact that people of color have not been integrated into the credit scoring system as much as traditional, white, middle-class America," says Evan Hendricks, author of "Credit Scores & Credit Reports: How the System Really Works, What You Can Do."

In a 2004 study involving 2 million people, the Texas Department of Insurance found that blacks have an average credit score roughly 10 percent to 35 percent worse than whites; Hispanics have scores 5 percent to 25 percent worse than whites.

Credit checks are a growing factor in hiring, with 35 percent of employers checking applicants' credit in 2003, up from 19 percent in 1996, according to the Society of Human Resource Management (SHRM). Typically credit reports are done if a person is going to deal with money, says John Dooney, a manager of strategic research at SHRM.

A case for considering credit

Employers should look at credit only for jobs where the information is relevant, says Lester Rosen, president of Employment Screening Resources, a national background screening firm in California. He cites a few examples:

• For jobs handling money, people may have the motive to steal if their debts surpass their salary.

• For jobs requiring travel, bad credit could bar applicants from renting cars or buying tickets.

• For jobs managing money, the report can offer some clues on how applicants manage their own.

Particularly in that last scenario, he cautions employers to be circumspect since blemishes might be errors or beyond the person's control, such as sudden medical expenses. Legally, employers must receive written permission from applicants to do a credit check, and must give those denied because of credit a chance to respond.

Mr. Rosen defends the careful consideration of credit in the hiring process. "If Harvard hired a person and did not use a credit report and the person embezzled, what would the headline be?" he asks.

So far, there's a lack of data supporting a relationship between bad credit and theft by employees. In perhaps the only study published on the subject, Jerry Palmer and Laura Koppes at Eastern Kentucky University in Richmond in 2003 found no correlation between employee credit reports and negative performance or termination for dishonesty.

Antidiscrimination laws bar a hiring practice that disadvantage minorities – even inadvertently – unless a company can prove it's related to measuring a person's capability to do a job. Bailey's lawyer, Piper Hoffman, has taken on several cases in which companies used credit as a factor in the hiring process. In one 2004 case, she says, an employee's lawsuit against Johnson & Johnson resulted in a settlement that changed the way the company used credit in its hiring practices.

"In the larger picture, we're hoping to get Harvard and other employers to stop using credit as a criterion in hiring," Ms. Hoffman says.

Bailey lodged her complaint in November with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), which reviews all such cases before any lawsuits can be filed. Agency officials say there's anecdotal evidence these cases are on the rise.

"Employers seem to be assuming that somebody with a poor credit history is more likely to steal, and I don't think there's any kind of evidence that supports that," says Dianna Johnston, assistant legal counsel with the EEOC. "To the extent that the employer has done an in-depth look and found other indices of dishonesty, they would be on more solid ground."

In a statement, Harvard noted that a "relatively small percentage" of jobs at the university require a credit check.

"The university conducts credit history reviews for employment purposes as required by credit card issuers, as well as to fulfill our fiduciary and data privacy responsibilities," says the statement. "Those responsibilities include protecting the private credit card data of our students, faculty, parents, and alumni."

Bailey says that if Harvard was concerned she might steal, the university should have looked at criminal records instead. "I was a cashier for many years and I've never been rich and I've never stolen money," she says.

She ran into credit-card debt she couldn't pay back when she spent some time unemployed. Harvard, she says, offered to reconsider if she could clear up her report in one week.

"The only way I can get it cleaned up in seven days is if I have money, so there was no way," says Bailey.

Catch-22 for poor people

Ernest Haffner, an attorney adviser with the EEOC, notes that employers who screen for credit are setting up a Catch-22 for poor people: They need jobs to get good credit, but employers won't hire them because they don't have it.

DOJ_NMG_0118140

The racial component to credit histories has been challenged in the insurance arena, too. The Texas Department of Insurance study found a relationship between credit scores and claims filed.

However, a class-action lawsuit against Allstate has just been settled, which resulted in the company changing the way they evaluate credit reports, says Wendy Harrison, a Phoenix-based lawyer who brought the case.

"What we've argued in our [insurance] cases is that you can adjust for [racial bias]," Ms. Harrison says, who has also handled cases of credit screening by employers.

Employers, however, are probably not relying on a number rating that can be adjusted, since, according to Rosen, agencies only give them specialty reports that don't include a score. Harvard says their report had no score.

As for Bailey, she still wants the Harvard job, and says there would be "no hard feelings." But first she wants to change the system for herself and others. "I hope I win. It might be beneficial to other people, too," she says.

Show Us The Money (WP)

By Cyrus Habib

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Blind Americans may soon find themselves able to use money just like anyone else. That is unless the Treasury Department is successful this month in its appeal of a recent federal court order that paper currency be made recognizable to the blind, who are currently unable to distinguish one denomination from another.

I, for example, rely on the generosity of cab drivers, baristas and store clerks each time I make a purchase with cash. That I have rarely been ripped off is a testament to their honesty or my charm, but I cannot help but protest the perpetual necessity for either. After all, there are 180 countries in which this is not the case, because their currency is designed to be distinguishable by all.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson asked the Treasury Department to determine the best means of making money distinguishable by the blind, citing the myriad solutions proposed by the organization that filed the lawsuit, the American Council of the Blind. These included using raised ink, modifying the size of certain bills and producing a tactile mark to indicate a bill's denomination. The Treasury Department has objected to all such solutions, claiming that the $75 million price tag is simply too high.

Of course, Treasury's lawyers fail to mention that the cost would have been far lower had the department acted voluntarily when the $20 bill was redesigned in 1998 and the $10 bill was modified last year. Instead, it has decided to spend our tax money fighting the blind in court, appealing Judge Robertson's decision even before a final judgment on the nature of a solution could be reached.

Blind people in the United States suffer from a staggering 70 percent unemployment rate, and a disproportionately high percentage of those who are employed occupy jobs in the low end of the service sector. There is no question that the catastrophic poverty of America's blind requires a solution. Why not begin by giving us access to money at the most atomic level? How can blind Americans become truly independent, achieving the success we deserve and leaving behind the stigma of federal and state aid, without being able to differentiate between a dollar bill and a fifty?

The Treasury Department suggests using debit and credit cards, disregarding the fact that the lives of many blind Americans hinge upon financial exchanges for which plastic is often useless, such as catching a crosstown bus, purchasing a cup of coffee or getting change for laundry.

These basic day-to-day experiences may not constitute reality for Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his team, but they certainly do for millions of blind and low-vision Americans.

Some have called the lawsuit frivolous, arguing that blind people have managed to survive for years by relying on others for help. Such reasoning does more than ignore the overwhelming poverty and hardship that plague the blind community; it dishonors the sacrifices millions of disabled Americans made to help bring about passage of the landmark Americans With Disabilities Act. Money is essential to a person's participation in society. Its accessibility to blind people should be considered as important as that of wheelchair ramps or Braille in elevators.

DOJ_NMG_0118141

When it comes to accommodating disabilities such as blindness, let us continue to lead the world in practice as well as in principle. More important still, let us tell the world that we, too, believe that blindness should not be an obstacle to financial independence. In doing so, let us also take a significant step toward ameliorating the living conditions of blind Americans, now and for years to come.

The Treasury Department should obey Judge Robertson's order and show us the money.

The writer, a Rhodes Scholar and JD candidate at Yale Law School, is preparing an amicus brief on this case with Dean Harold Hongju Koh.

The Lost Voice Of Protest (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

On the evening of the fourth of April, 1967, one year to the day (almost to the hour) before his assassination, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. walked into Riverside Church in Manhattan and delivered a speech that was among his least well known, yet most controversial.

"I come to this magnificent house of worship tonight," he said, "because my conscience leaves me no other choice."

The speech was an eloquent, full-throated denunciation of the war in Vietnam, one of the earliest public critiques by such a high-profile American. Silence in the face of the horrors of that war, said Dr. King, amounted to a "betrayal."

The speech unleashed a hurricane of criticism. Even the N.A.A.C.P. complained about Dr. King stepping out of his perceived area of expertise, civil rights, to raise his voice against the evil of the war. The Times headlined an editorial, "Dr. King's Error."

The war would go on for another eight years, ultimately taking the lives of 58,000 Americans and a million to two million Vietnamese. Dr. King himself would be silenced, at the age of 39, by a bullet in Memphis.

The widespread celebration of Dr. King's birthday on Monday brought that Vietnam speech to mind. It's both gratifying and important that we honor this great man with a national holiday. But it's disturbing that we pay so much more attention to the celebrations than we do to the absolutely crucial lessons that he spent much of his life trying to teach us.

Whether it's the war in Iraq, or the plight of New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, or the violence and self-destructive behavior that plagues so many black Americans, our attitude toward the wisdom of Dr. King has been that of the drug addict or alcoholic to the notion that there might be a better way. We give lip service to it, and then we ignore it.

In the Vietnam speech, Dr. King said, "A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death." He may as well have been speaking into the void. The war in Iraq, a reprise of Vietnam, will cost us well over a trillion dollars before we're done, and probably more than two trillion. More than 3,000 American G.I.'s have been killed and the death toll for Iraqis is tallied by the scores of thousands.

No one knows what to do, although the politicians and the pundits are all over television, day and night, background singers to the carnage.

Here at home the city of New Orleans is on life support, struggling to survive the combined effects of a catastrophic flood, the unconscionable neglect of the federal government, and the monumental ineptitude of its own local officials. As ordinary residents of New Orleans continue to suffer, the rest of the nation has casually turned away. The debacle is no longer being televised. So it must be over.

Dr. King held the unfashionable view that we had an obligation to help those who are in trouble, and to speak out against unfair treatment and social injustice. "Our lives begin to end," he said, "the day we become silent about things that matter."

New Orleans matters. And the long dark night of the war in Iraq must surely matter. But not enough voices of protest are being raised in either case. The anger quotient is much too low. You can't stop America's involvement in a senseless war or revive a dying American city if your greatest passion is kicking back with pizza and beer and tuning in to "American Idol."

The quality of life for black Americans more than 38 years after the death of Dr. King is a mixed bag. Blacks are far better off economically and educationally than ever before. Barack Obama is a leading candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and the last two secretaries of state have been black.

DOJ_NMG_0118142

But the ominous shadow of racial prejudice is still with us. Even President Bush acknowledged that conditions in New Orleans pre-Katrina were proof of that. The nation's prisons are filled to the bursting point with black men who have failed, or been failed, and have no viable future. And too many black Americans are willing and even eager to see themselves in the culturally depraved lineup of gangsters, pimps and whores.

Dr. King would be 78 now, and I can't believe that he would be too thrilled by what's going on. In his view: "He who passively accepts evil is as much involved in it as he who helps to perpetrate it. He who accepts evil without protesting against it is really cooperating with it."

We miss his leadership, all of us, whether we're wise enough to realize it or not.

ANTITRUST:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case To Report To Department Of Justice (AP)

By David Pitt, AP Business Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) The plaintiffs in a class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. claim they have uncovered information that indicates the software manufacturer is violating an agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice.

Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin and her co-counsel Richard Hagstrom, of Minneapolis, claim that during their research for the class-action case under way in Polk County District Court they discovered information that indicates the company isn't complying with a 2002 federal court decree.

Conlin asked Judge Scott Rosenberg's permission to tell the DOJ and the Iowa attorney general about the information.

Conlin said she will discuss two issues with the DOJ and Iowa attorney general's office within a few days.

``We feel as officers of the court it is our responsibility to do this," Conlin said Wednesday. ``It's simply our duty as citizens and lawyers to let the Department of Justice know that we are in possession of information that goes to the issue of whether Microsoft is in compliance."

She plans to write letters to the agencies but, according to Rosenberg's ruling, can only provide the information if a court order or subpoena is issued seeking it.

She said she could not be specific about what she's uncovered because Rosenberg's ruling prohibits the information from being shared beyond the appropriate authorities.

``The court finds that the plaintiffs and its expert witnesses may contact the appropriate authorities responsible for the enforcement and compliance of any orders, judgments or decrees in the other judicial matter concerning the defendant and inform such authorities that it is in possession of information that may be relevant to such enforcement and compliance," Rosenberg said in his ruling filed on Tuesday.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said the company is monitored to ensure compliance and must appear before the federal judge that presided over the DOJ case quarterly to show compliance with the court's final decree.

He said the government resources are considerable and he doubted that Conlin would have any information that would surprise the government and its independent experts.

``We are doing our job in complying with the consent decree," Wallis said.

A DOJ spokeswoman said Wednesday that she couldn't comment because no information has been received from the Iowa case.

Bob Brammer, a spokesman for the Iowa attorney general, said states have a team that tracks Microsoft's compliance with court orders and would be interested in any information Conlin may have.

``We will be glad to review what they send us," he said.

Conlin and Hagstrom represent thousands of Iowans who purchased Microsoft software between 1994 and 2006. They claim in the lawsuit that the company engaged in illegal monopolization and anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

Their expert witnesses will place damages at more than $300 million.

DOJ_NMG_0118143

Microsoft denies the allegations and its attorneys said they'll show Iowa customers received quality products at a fair price.

Microsoft was sued by the federal government, which alleged the company unlawfully used its monopoly in operating systems. The case was settled with an agreement that required Microsoft to share certain information with other software developers, which would allow their programs to work with Windows.

Wallis said Microsoft did not object to Conlin's motion and only wanted to be sure that no Microsoft confidential information would be released.

In another unusual development, Rosenberg has permitted Conlin and Hagstrom to operate an Internet site, which lists daily transcripts of testimony, rulings and press releases written by a media company hired by the plaintiffs.

The Web site also shows exhibits admitted into evidence, which by the end of this week should total more than 3,000 documents.

The trial, expected to last at least six months, has progressed even more slowly than anticipated.

Extensive arguments are presented to Rosenberg before the jurors arrive in the morning, during midday breaks and after the court session ends in the afternoon.

The arguments center around admissibility of evidence, witness testimony and numerous legal issues.

A month into the trial, the first live witness, Ronald S. Alepin, a plaintiff technical expert, appeared on the stand. He testified for seven days about how he believed Microsoft crushed competitors and leveraged its monopoly in operating systems to keep software competitors from gaining market share.

Prior to his testimony, witnesses appeared in videotaped depositions, some recorded many years ago.

The case has fallen behind schedule, and last week the second witness, software developer John Constant, returned to his home in England because he tired of waiting in Des Moines to be called to testify. Conlin said he will be called later.

Microsoft is expected to call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses in February.

The Iowa case, tried before a jury, is one of two remaining state-level antitrust cases remaining against the software manufacturer. The other is in Mississippi.

The Iowa jury could be the first to decide a verdict since other state court cases were settled before a jury began deliberations.

FTC Updates Merger Filing Thresholds (DEAL)

By Bill McConnell, The Deal

The Deal, January 18, 2007

The Federal Trade Commission Tuesday announced this year's increase in the size of deals that must be submitted to antitrust enforcers before a merger is completed.

The new thresholds determine whether merging parties must file Hart-Scott-Rodino Act notification with the FTC and the Department of Justice and take effect 30 days after their upcoming publication in the Federal Register.

The agency must revise the thresholds annually, based on the change in the gross national product.

Hart-Scott-Rodino Act notification must be filed if a deal meets thresholds contained in one of two tests.

Under the first test, notification is required if the assets being acquired exceed $59.8 million and total assets for one of parties exceeds $119.6 million and the other party exceeds $12 million. Previously, notification was required if assets acquired were valued at more than $56.7 million and the size of the merging parties was greater than $113.4 million and the other party exceeded $11.3 million, respectively.

Under the second test, notification is mandatory if the total value of the transaction exceeds $239.2 million, regardless of the size of the merging parties. The previous threshold was $226.8 million.

To adjust for the threshold changes, the FTC also updated its filing fee levels. For transactions between $59.8 million and $119.6 million, the fee is $45,000; for deals up to $597.9 million, the fee is $125,000; and for those of $597.9 million or more, the charge is $280,000.

Rivals Offer $38 Billion For A REIT (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The gloves have come off in buyouts.

Late yesterday, a group of investors offered $38 billion for the nation's largest office landlord, setting off the biggest buyout battle since the landmark fight for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago.

The upstart bid for Equity Office Properties, the real estate investment trust that was founded by Samuel Zell, tops a $36 billion deal that Equity Office had reached with the Blackstone Group in November. Either bid would win the crown as the largest buyout ever, surpassing last summer's $33 billion deal for HCA.

The battle for Equity Office pits some of the most powerful and colorful financiers against each other. Blackstone is controlled by Stephen A. Schwarzman, who has created one of the largest, if not the largest, private equity firms in the nation.

The rival group includes Steven Roth of Vornado, once the king of New Jersey strip malls; Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital, who created the hotel chain and then left the company after a falling-out with its board; and Neil Bluhm, a Chicago real estate mogul who backed Barack Obama's successful run for the United States Senate. Mr. Sternlicht worked for Mr. Bluhm as a young analyst in the late 1980s.

Since the Blackstone offer was announced, James S. Corl, the chief investment officer for real estate at Cohen & Steers, the largest institutional investor in Equity Office, has argued that the price of $48.50 a share was too low because the office market is expected to keep improving over the next couple of years.

But the battle may not be tilted in favor of the new bidders, Vornado Realty Trust, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital. For one, 40 percent of their $52-a-share offer is in shares of Vornado, at an unspecified ratio, compared with Blackstone's all-cash bid. And Blackstone has already completed many of the steps needed to close the deal. In addition, Blackstone has the right to match any rival offer.

"A tentative proposal relying upon the potential issuance, many months from now, of more than $10 billion in stock trading at near record prices is inferior and carries vastly more risk than Blackstone's all-cash deal closing in approximately two weeks," a Blackstone spokesman said.

If successful, the Vornado group would break up Equity Office, which has some 590 buildings and over 105 million square feet of office space in major metropolitan markets, including the Verizon Building in Manhattan. They would divide the properties among themselves, with Vornado getting roughly half of the properties on the East and West coasts.

The consortium calls itself Dove Parent, apparently a mocking reference to the Blackstone-created buyout entity, Blackhawk. Both bidders would assume $16 billion in debt. Equity Office said that its board "will consider the proposal as soon as practicable."

The offer from the Vornado group is the latest sign that the cozy world of buyouts is becoming less genteel. In recent years, the giants in private equity seemed to have avoided stepping on each other's deals while banding together on others. Indeed, private equity firms have come under scrutiny from the Justice Department, which has started an inquiry into whether private equity firms have broken antitrust laws.

And few public companies have shown a willingness to compete with private equity's war chest. Private equity firms have been gobbling up publicly traded companies at a record pace, spending some $660 billion last year. The battle for RJR Nabisco in the late 1980s showed that bidding wars can get out of control.

Last summer, however, a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Bain Capital jumped in to offer a rival bid to a Blackstone offer to buy Freescale Semiconductor. Blackstone then raised its bid and won the deal, but that showdown was a sign that competition for deals was turning cutthroat.

The new bid for Equity Office may also demonstrate the differences between private equity and the much scrappier real estate business.

Mr. Roth of Vornado leads a real estate investment trust whose holdings include office buildings in New York and Washington, shopping centers and merchandise marts, and the retailer Toys "R" Us.

One of his company's most recent transactions was the purchase of the Manhattan Mall, a shopping center and office building in the Herald Square area of New York City, where real estate values have been rapidly appreciating.

DOJ_NMG_0118145

In their letter to Mr. Zell, Mr. Roth and his partners said they would create the "largest office REIT in the U.S. with the pre-eminent position in the best markets on both coasts."

The breakup fee for a buyer who is able to push Blackstone aside is $200 million. "Sam Zell set this up in a very shareholder-friendly manner," said Barry Vinocur, the editor of Realty Stock Review, a newsletter. "Blackstone wanted a higher breakup fee." Mr. Zell is the largest individual shareholder of Equity Office.

The rival bid for Equity is being financed in part by JPMorgan Chase, Lehman Brothers and UBS. JPMorgan's involvement has raised some eyebrows on Wall Street because of its long ties with Blackstone.

Keven S. Lindemann, the director of real estate for SNL Financial in Charlottesville, Va., said Equity Office shareholders would have to consider whether the Vornado shares were overvalued.

Developer Mills Corp. Agrees To Buyout (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Chevy Chase shopping-mall pioneer Mills Corp. yesterday agreed to a $1.35 billion sale to a Canadian investment company, capping months of turmoil in which the firm struggled with heavy debt and an accounting scandal.

The deal, which at least one major Mills shareholder called inferior to other offers, would give the owner of Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland a financial boost after the company reported it had enough cash to operate only through March 31.

The buyer, Brookfield Asset Management, the owner of New York's World Financial Center, would take control at a time when Mills is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible misconduct by management and for accounting errors totaling up to $352 million.

The sale marks the latest chapter in the Mills saga. The local company helped popularize the notion that a shopping mall could be an entertainment destination. It also built sprawling "shoppertainment" centers throughout the United States and Europe that combined retail outlets with outsize restaurants, movie theaters and other amenities. One project, Madrid Xanadu, featured a bowling alley and indoor ski resort. Another Xanadu, planned for New Jersey, was to have a 30-story Ferris wheel.

But in recent weeks, an internal review at Mills found the company's rapid growth may have contributed to its accounting problems. The company has been working to restate earnings dating to 2001, and its stock price has been battered in the past year. The review concluded that Mills' "overall culture and 'tone at the top' were heavily focused on meeting external and internal expectations," according to a summary filed with the SEC.

Under the deal announced yesterday, Brookfield will pay $21 per share for Mills. The deal, including debt and preferred stock, is worth $7.5 billion. Mills will become a new subsidiary of Brookfield, and the new company will be publicly traded and managed by Brookfield.

Mills shareholders may either receive up to a 20 percent stake in the new company or receive $21 per share in cash. Mills' board unanimously approved the deal though it is subject to shareholder approval, and some may oppose the offer. Two other major Mills investors had offered to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in the company just a day earlier.

Farallon Capital, a hedge fund, offered to invest $499 million at $20 a share. Fund managers declined to comment yesterday. An Israeli real estate company, Gazit-Globe, offered an average of $21 a share.

"We are disappointed that the Mills Corporation has chosen to accept what we believe is an inferior proposal," Bruce Rubin, a spokesman for Gazit, said in a statement, according to the Associated Press. He added that Gazit is reviewing its options.

If the Brookfield deal is approved, it is slated to close in the second half of 2007.

"We think this is a significant opportunity to build on our depth of experience in real estate and assist a company that's in operational and financial distress," said Katherine C. Vyse, a spokeswoman for Brookfield, which manages $50 billion in assets and owns hydroelectric power plants and office buildings throughout the country, including 23 in the Washington area. "We see it as an opportunity to return [Mills] to profitability and foster growth," Vyse said.

DOJ_NMG_0118146

Mills chief executive Mark Ordan said he does not foresee layoffs and expects the company, with 300 employees locally, to remain in its new headquarters on Wisconsin Avenue.

"This strengthens the organization because it gives it the ability to do the things we need to do," he said. "In the past few months, we've been financially constrained. It will now be a fully capitalized company which has a platform for growth.

Well-known Washington developer Herbert S. Miller founded Mills. He hired Laurence C. Siegel in the early 1980s as the lead leasing agent, and as such Siegel worked on some of Miller's early developments.

Mills pioneered the concept of the hybrid mall when it opened Potomac Mills in Woodbridge in 1985, combining outlet and off-price stores with traditional retailers in a more upscale environment. The mall opened with 1.2 million square feet and brought one of the first Ikeas, the cheap-chic Swedish home-furnishings store, to North America.

"They were the first one to understand that the luxury shopper could also be enticed to do this," said C. Britt Beemer, head of America's Research Group, a consumer-behavior research firm. "Just because you're an outlet shopper doesn't mean you want to shop in a boring experience."

After renaming itself, Mills went public in 1994. A year later, Miller retired after a disagreement with the board, which was dominated by directors from one of its largest investors, German real estate company Kan Am. Siegel was named chief executive in 1995, and under him, the company grew rapidly from four mega-malls and 11 community shopping centers to dozens of projects, including in Southern California, Texas, Arizona and Canada.

"People thought these guys were revolutionary in creating a new retail environment that didn't exist in the past," said Benjamin Yang, an analyst at Green Street Advisors. But some analysts say Mills' ambitious plans made it grow too fast. Last year, Miller filed a lawsuit against Mills, alleging mismanagement and said the company's auditors "raised red flags" in 2002 about its accounting woes. Miller alleged that Mills' problems had hurt the value of his continued investments in the company's projects.

Miller said he was now optimistic, given Brookfield's involvement. "It's been in limbo since all the bad news started with the potential bankruptcy," he said. "Now the logjam is broken."

Staff writer Ylan Q. Mui contributed to this report.

Buyout May End Mills' Troubles (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Embattled local mall developer Mills Corp. agreed yesterday to be bought by a Toronto investment company, potentially ending a year of accounting problems and declining market value.

Brookfield Asset Management Inc. plans to buy the Chevy Chase developer for $1.35 billion, beating out at least two other firms.

Mills, which recently revealed that its executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, owns 38 shopping centers nationwide. Locally, it owns Lakeforest Mall in Gaithersburg, Potomac Mills and Potomac Town Center in Prince William County, Marley Station in Glen Burnie, Md., and Arundel Mills in Hanover, Md.

Brookfield did not return a phone call yesterday to learn whether the shopping centers would remain open.

Mills Chief Executive Officer and President Mark Ordan said the Brookfield offer was the "best possible result" out of a number of offers.

"We believe the transaction with Brookfield not only provides certain value to the Mills' stockholders, but also affords them the opportunity to participate in the upside potential created by this transaction," he said.

The deal, which comes to $7.5 billion including assumed debt and preferred stock, was approved unanimously by the company's board of directors. But it still must be voted on by shareholders, leaving the window open for counterbids.

Brookfield plans to pay $21 per share, 15 percent more than Tuesday's closing price of $17.77 on the New York Stock Exchange. By the close yesterday, Mills' shares climbed 26 percent to $22.46.

The stock price climbed over $21 after Gazit-Globe Ltd., an Israeli real estate company, said in a Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filing that earlier in the day it submitted a new bid that came to $22 per share.

DOJ_NMG_0118147

Gazit and fellow major shareholder Farallon Capital Management, a San Francisco hedge fund, submitted bids to pour money into the company, trying in part to rescue their own investments.

Farallon proposed $20 per share in a $499 million recapitalization plan.

But those bids merely infused Mills with cash; Brookfield's offer is to buy the company. A purchase offer is more attractive, said RBC Capital Markets analyst Richard C. Moore.

"That's what we've been calling for for months," Mr. Moore said. "A purchase is the only outcome likely in our minds."

Under the Brookfield offer, Mills would become a publicly traded entity of the company, which manages more than $50 billion worth of office space in the United States and Canada and shopping centers in Brazil.

One of its subsidiaries, Brookfield Properties, owns 25 buildings in the Washington area, including Silver Spring Metro Plaza, Sunrise Technology Park in Reston and 1200 K Street Northwest.

"We are pleased to be able to work with the Mills Corp. to move beyond the recent issues it had encountered," said J. Bruce Flatt, managing partner and chief executive officer of Brookfield Asset Management.

During 2006, Mills' value fell from $42.28 per share in January to $12.94 in August, before climbing back to $17.77 Tuesday.

The company said earlier this month in an SEC filing that its executives may have engaged in misconduct, creating four years worth of earnings restatements. The SEC is investigating. It also warned that unless it could negotiate a loan extension, it would run out of money on March 31. Its loan was $1.1 billion, slightly less than the Brookfield purchase offer.

The Brookfield deal, if approved by shareholders, is expected to be completed during the second half of this year.

GE Is Near Deal For Abbott Unit (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Kathryn Kranhold And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

General Electric Co. last night was nearing a deal to purchase the diagnostics division of Abbott Laboratories, people familiar with the matter said, as the conglomerate makes a deeper push into the world of health care and medical devices.

Details of GE's plans couldn't be learned last night, and it is possible GE may be purchasing a large part but not all of the Abbott unit. Through last year's first nine months, the division posted revenue of about $2.9 billion and an operating profit of approximately $300 million, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings, representing about 18% of Abbott's revenue and just 7% of its operating profit.

GE, Fairfield, Conn., declined to comment. Abbott spokeswoman Melissa Brotz declined to comment.

The deal would broaden GE's $17 billion health-care business, which has moved aggressively into health-care-information technology and molecular diagnostics in the past few years. The deal could mark GE's entry into "in vitro" diagnostics, which includes routine instrumentation and test kits for diseases such as HIV and cancer. The revenue of Abbott's core in-vitro diagnostics business has been flat for several years.

Last month, GE Chairman and Chief Executive Jeffrey Immelt indicated he was looking to expand the company's health-care business and add new platforms through acquisitions. Mr. Immelt told analysts and investors, "We've always wanted to build a broader diagnostics company."

GE's main health-care business remains diagnostic equipment, including ultrasound and X-ray machines as well as more sophisticated screening equipment.

Mr. Immelt made his biggest strategic move in health care in 2004, when he paid more than $9 billion for Britain's Amersham, a bioscience and medical-diagnostic firm. Through Amersham, GE entered the molecular-diagnostic market. GE is now developing molecular agents to be injected into the bloodstream to target specific diseases. The agents then show up during screenings indicating that a patient has a particular cancer or disease. Diagnostics related to breast cancer have been among GE's areas of focus.

The diagnostics business of Abbott, of Abbott Park, Ill., is driven by growth in two segments: glucose monitoring for diabetics and molecular tests for diseases such as breast cancer. Sara Michelmore, an analyst at Cowen & Co., forecasts 2006 diagnostics revenue of around $3.9 billion. The core in-vitro business accounts for $2.5 billion of that, and is flat compared with 2005. She says the molecular products rose year-over-year by about 20%, while the glucose-monitoring segment rose 9%.

DOJ_NMG_0118148

The diagnostics division has been a bit of a thorn in Abbott's side since 1999, when regulators found one of its manufacturing facilities in violation of Food and Drug Administration regulations. The plant in question made chemical kits used to test for diseases, and despite Abbott's attempts to resolve the matter, a consent decree continued to hamper it for several years.

Within the past year Abbott acquired Guidant Corp.'s vascular wing for $4.1 billion and Kos Pharmaceuticals for $3.7 billion. It spun off low-growth hospital-products unit Hospira Inc. in 2004. That same year, it beefed up the glucose-monitoring side of the diagnostics business with a $1.2 billion deal for TheraSense.

Other similar deals of late have brought in hefty revenue multiples. In June, Siemens AG of Germany paid $5.3 billion for German drug maker Bayer AG 's diagnostics division, which had about $1.8 billion in 2005 sales. Siemens bought Diagnostic Products last year for $1.86 billion, a large premium to that company's roughly $480 million in 2005 sales. If Siemens' purchase price of Bayer is any indication, Abbott's diagnostic unit could go for as much as $9 billion.

Write to Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com1, Kathryn Kranhold at kathryn.kranhold@wsj.com2 and Avery Johnson at avery.johnson@WSJ.com3

G.E. May Buy Abbott's Diagnostic Unit (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Claudia Deutsch

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

General Electric is near a deal to buy Abbott Laboratories' medical diagnostics unit for as much as $5 billion, according to people involved in the negotiations.

Acquiring the Abbott business, which makes and sells glucose monitoring systems, blood test kits and other chemically based diagnostic tools, would enable G.E.'s health care unit to expand its growing stable of diagnostic products and services.

The G.E. unit, GE Healthcare, has annual revenue of about $16 billion and has long been a leader in expensive diagnostic machines like CAT scanners and MRI equipment. The Abbott product line would help G.E. add nursing homes and other nonhospital medical settings to its base, analysts said.

They predicted that G.E. would quickly wring efficiencies from the Abbott Diagnostics unit. GE Healthcare's margins generally top 16 percent, they said, while Abbott Diagnostics' margins are about 7 percent.

The diagnostics business, while profitable for Abbott Laboratories, is far smaller than the company's drug business, which had profits of $3.1 billion on sales of $9.84 billion in the first nine months of 2006. Abbott Diagnostics, by contrast, had profits of only $306 million during that period, on sales of $2.98 billion.

In November, Abbott Laboratories expanded its drug business by agreeing to buy Kos Pharmaceuticals for $3.7 billion.

Abbott is also betting on growth in its cardiovascular stent business. Early last year the company paid $4.1 billion to acquire Guidant's stent and other vascular business as part of the deal that enabled Boston Scientific to acquire Guidant.

Abbott is now hoping to win federal approval to enter the lucrative market of selling drug-coated stents — tiny metal devices that are designed to prop open coronary arteries after blockages have been cleared.

Abbott's diagnostics business, though, has been under something of a cloud since the company agreed in 1999 to pay $100 million to settle accusations that it had failed to meet federal quality standards in producing its test kits.

"They lost a lot of ground to competitors," said one analyst, who said that he could not be identified until the deal was formally announced. "Shedding it to streamline management makes some sense," the analyst said. "It's a natural progression of their morphing away from the hospital supply business."

He noted that Abbott in 2004 had sold off its hospital products business into an entity called Hospira.

For G.E.'s part, the acquisition continues an acquisition strategy that has included buying Amersham, a British diagnostic pharmaceuticals and biosciences company, for more than $9 billion in 2004.

But some analysts wondered whether G.E. was overpaying.

"G.E. is getting a reputation as a place that will pay top dollar for a fixer-upper," said another analyst, who declined to be identified because he had not yet written to his clients about the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0118149

The deal would comes just after G.E. announced on Monday that it was buying Smiths Aerospace for $4.8 billion. That announcement came less than a week after word emerged that G.E. had put its lackluster plastics business on the auction block, in the hope of getting $8 billion to $10 billion for it.

EOP Bids Show Real Estate Is Still Kicking (WSJ)

By Henny Sender, Jennifer S. Forsyth And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The high-stakes game for the country's largest office landlord is the strongest sign yet of the seemingly limitless appreciation of big-city office real estate -- at a time when the prices of homes and condominiums are suffering.

Yesterday, a consortium of real-estate investors launched a competing $21.5 billion offer for Equity Office Properties Trust, hoping to knock off an existing $20.1 billion deal with buyout shop Blackstone Group.

The battle reveals a series of tight friendships and rivalries that, behind the scenes, is influencing the flow of billions of dollars in capital and personal prestige alike. Blackstone's deal is regarded as the largest leveraged buyout in history, at $36 billion, when factoring in Equity Office's $16 billion in existing debt.

In this atmosphere, a topping bid that bests Blackstone's by some measures might have shocked real-estate experts a year ago. Today, it gets merely a shrug.

"Honestly, I don't think anything can be too surprising anymore," said Michael Knott, an analyst with Green Street Advisors, a real-estate research and trading firm based in Newport Beach, Calif. "It just seems there's no limit to the prices being paid."

In a short statement released last night, real-estate firms Vornado Realty Trust, Starwood Capital and Walton Street Capital offered to purchase Chicago-based Equity Office for $52 a share, 60% of it in Vornado shares and the remainder in cash. That represents a 7% premium to the $48.50-a-share offer that Equity Office agreed to last November. In response, Blackstone termed the Vornado-led bid as "inferior," adding that the competing bid "carries vastly more risk" than its own deal, which is set to close in about two weeks. (See more on the EOP battle1.)

In New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Equity Office shares gained $1.09, or 2.2%, to $50.94. The shares edged higher in after-hours trading as well, hovering just below the Vornado offer price. Vornado's shares fell $3.38, or 2.7%, to $122.55 in New York Stock Exchange trading. The investors said they planned to divvy up Equity Office's nationwide collection of office buildings, which dot the skylines of New York, Seattle and Boston, among other cities.

Vornado said it would take about half of EOP's portfolio. Combined with its current holdings, the new acquisitions would leave Vornado with a significant presence in the New York, Washington, D.C., Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles office markets, according to the company's statement.

A flood of money from around the globe is creating higher values for local assets, such as commercial real estate. Private-equity funds like Blackstone are absorbing cash from global investors, and Wall Street continues to issue bonds secured against real estate that are in turn gobbled up by international hedge funds and insurers.

At the heart of the deal remains Sam Zell, a 65-year-old investor and dealmeister who built up Equity Office over the decades from his perch in Chicago. Known for a quick wit, a collection of motorcycles and his blue jeans, Mr. Zell earned the nickname "Gravedancer" for his proficiency at sweeping in like a vulture and buying distressed properties, rehabilitating them and then selling them at huge profits.

After the bid from Blackstone, some investors wondered whether the deal indicated the top of the real-estate market. But Mr. Zell himself has said he thinks the office markets will be on the upswing for at least another two years.

Some of the nation's most shrewd real-estate players appear to agree with Mr. Zell -- and then some. Vornado, led by Chief Executive Steven Roth, has a deep presence in New York City and Washington D.C., and carries a market capitalization of $18.6 billion. At times, it has acted more like an investment fund than a REIT, participating in the privatization of Toys "R" Us in 2005.

Barry Sternlicht's Starwood Capital vehicle has assumed much of the deal-making bravado that Mr. Sternlicht brought to the Starwood lodging company he built into an industry titan. He is no longer associated with that firm, called Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide, Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0118150

Investor Neil Bluhm, meanwhile, helps run Walton Street Capital, after helping found a firm called JMB Realty, once a formidable real-estate presence in Chicago, but that faltered in the real-estate downturn of the early 1990s.

The deal underscores how small the financial world can be. A young Mr. Sternlicht worked for Mr. Bluhm as an analyst at JMB, from 1986 to 1991. When Mr. Sternlicht established Starwood, Mr. Bluhm was one of his original backers, along with the Ziff family. John Schreiber, who was one of the founders of Blackstone's real-estate group and still serves as an adviser to Blackstone, also worked at JMB and now finds himself on the other side of what will likely be a bitter takeover battle.

The group hasn't yet had access to Equity Office's books, and to get that access, it has to convince Equity Office's board it has the financial wherewithal to offer a superior bid. That is a steep hurdle for what is the largest private-equity deal ever, but the group has lined up substantial financing from J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., UBS AG, Barclays Capital PLC and Royal Bank of Scotland. Perhaps the largest obstacle for the Vornado group is Blackstone's "matching rights," which allow it to have the last look at any competing bid.

There are other obstacles as well. The new bidders have to convince the board that an offer involving stock is as valuable as cash, especially given the steep appreciation of Vornado shares over the past twelve months. Also, since the deal is subject to Vornado shareholders' approval, the timing of any deal could stretch into months, rather than the two weeks to closing for Blackstone. For its part, the Vornado group could decide to withdraw after doing its due diligence.

In a statement issued last night, the EOP board said it will consider the Vornado group's proposal "as soon as practicable." The statement also said that the board has not changed its recommendation to merge with Blackstone. The shareholder vote remains Feb. 5.

Looming over the proceedings is the state of Blackstone's relationship with J.P. Morgan. The two have had a tight bond over the past few years, although J.P. Morgan has generally not been involved in financing Blackstone's real-estate deals. Helping "jump" the deal creates another fraught dynamic that Wall Streeters are watching. A J.P. Morgan spokesman declined to comment.

Perhaps Vornado was romanced by the idea of a second chance at the bride. In the shareholder proxy, Equity Office said that four suitors had flirted with a merger but none was willing to pay Mr. Zell's minimum price of $45 a share until Blackstone came through with its offer in November. Vornado was widely reported to have been one of those suitors.

Mr. Knott said he would have expected Vornado to try to cut a deal with Blackstone to purchase a group of buildings it covets, rather than jumping in for the whole transaction. That way, Vornado wouldn't have had to pay Blackstone the $200 million break-up fee.

Write to Henny Sender at henny.sender@wsj.com6 and Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com7

SKorea Antitrust Regulator Fines Hyundai (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

South Korean Antitrust Regulator Fines Hyundai Motor for Unfair Practices

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said Thursday it has fined Hyundai Motor Co. 23 billion won (US$25 million; euro19 million) for unfair market practices, the latest in a series of woes to hit the world's sixth-largest automaker.

The Fair Trade Commission said the company issued warnings to and discontinued contracts with car dealerships which failed to meet "excessive" sales targets.

"Hyundai Motor used its monopolistic market status to set excessive annual sales targets for car dealers," the commission said in a statement.

In addition, the carmaker didn't allow the dealers to move to other areas or to recruit salespeople to help achieve their sales goals last year, the commission said.

Hyundai and affiliate Kia Motors Corp. accounted for 73.3 percent of the domestic market last year.

The regulator said it carried out an investigation into suspected violations of fair trading rules by Hyundai Motor between February and November last year.

The fine is the latest blow to the automaker. On Tuesday, prosecutors demanded that Hyundai Chairman Chung-Mong-koo be sentenced to six years in prison over embezzlement and breach of trust charges. A verdict in Chung's trial is expected next month.

The company has also been plagued by a series of strikes. The latest ended Wednesday after management and the company's labor union reached an accord on bonus payments.

Hyundai's union has walked off the job every year but one since it was founded in 1987.

For all of 2006, Hyundai Motor, the world's sixth-largest carmaker in tandem with Kia, sold a total of 581,092 vehicles in South Korea, up 1.8 percent from a year earlier.

ENVIRONMENT:

Neb. Egg Company Is Fined For Pollution (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

Egg Processing Company M.G. Waldbaum Is Fined $1.05 Million for Violating Clean Water Act

WAKEFIELD, Neb. (AP) -- An egg processing company has been fined $1.05 million for violating the federal Clean Water Act.

M.G. Waldbaum Co., a subsidiary of Minnetonka, Minn.-based Michael Foods, has agreed to complete a $16 million wastewater treatment plant for its egg processing plant in 2009. And it will better manage manure from several area poultry farms, the U.S. Department of Justice said in a news release.

According to the original consent decree that averted further litigation, the state and federal governments will split the fine.

Treasurer and secretary Mark Witmer of Michael Foods said Waldbaum has resolved the pollution issues that first arose in 2004 and that work on the wastewater plant will finished in 2008.

The city of Wakefield, which is about 30 miles northeast of Norfolk, will pay a $20,000 fine for letting its sewage lagoons be overloaded by waste from the egg plant, the Justice Department said in a recent news release.

The city also agreed to improve monitoring of its sewage plant.

Lobbying Firm Cuts Ties To Name Partner Under Investigation In Abramoff Probe (LAW)

By Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 18, 2007

Lobbying firm Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles has severed ties with former Department of the Interior Deputy Secretary J. Steven Griles.

Griles has been targeted in the Justice Department's ongoing corruption probe stemming from the lobbying activities of Jack Abramoff.

Griles, who had been a name partner at the firm, was a lobbyist for coal and energy interests both before and after his tenure at the Interior Department from 2001 to 2005. During Griles' stint at Interior, which oversees lucrative drilling and mining licenses on millions of acres of federal land, his ties to industry were the subject of a number of internal investigations.

Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles did not respond to detailed questions about Griles' departure, including whether Griles was forced out by his partners and whether the firm would be renaming itself. Instead, the firm provided a statement saying Griles resigned as a partner effective Jan. 10. That same day, a number of news outlets reported Griles had been informed he was a target of federal prosecutors. A lawyer for Griles declined to comment on his departure.

In testimony before Congress in 2005, Griles told senators that as the Interior Department's No. 2, he had been approached by Abramoff about joining Greenberg Traurig, the firm where Abramoff worked. Griles told the senators, however, that he had not granted Abramoff or his Indian tribal clients special access to the department. In January 2006, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding several of those clients, among other charges. He was later sentenced to five years in prison.

A source with knowledge of the investigation says prosecutors are exploring whether to charge Griles with lying to Congress and honest-services fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0118152

As a lobbyist, Griles has most recently represented the American Petroleum Institute, Mettiki Coal, Newmont Mining Corp., and other large mining and energy interests on a number of environmental and regulatory issues.

Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles generated $780,000 in lobbying revenue during the first six months of 2006, according to disclosure forms filed with the Senate.

Bills On Climate Move To Spotlight In New Congress (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Andrew C. Revkin

New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The climate here has definitely changed.

Legislation to control global warming that once had a passionate but quixotic ring to it is now serious business. Congressional Democrats are increasingly determined to wrest control of the issue from the White House and impose the mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions that most smokestack industries have long opposed.

Four major Democratic bills have been announced, with more expected. One of these measures, or a blend of them, stands an excellent chance of passage in this Congress or the next, industry and environmental lobbyists said in interviews.

Many events have combined to create the new direction — forsythia blooming in lawmakers' gardens in January, polar bears lacking the ice they need to hunt and Al Gore's movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," along with pragmatic executives seeking an idea of future costs and, especially, the arrival of a Democratic-controlled Congress. There was evidence of the changed mood all over Washington this week.

On Wednesday, leading scientists and evangelical pastors jointly declared their intention to fight the causes of climate change and the public confusion on the subject. Cheryl Johns, a professor at the Church of God Theological Seminary, called that problem "nature deficit disorder."

Another news conference on Wednesday featured executives of the heavily regulated electric utility industry embracing Senators Dianne Feinstein of California and Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, both Democrats. The senators were offering separate bills to add regulations, including a cap on carbon dioxide emissions.

One sign of the Democrats' determination to move on climate bills occurred when a Democratic Congressional aide confirmed that Speaker Nancy Pelosi wanted to create a special committee on climate, apparently an end run around Representative John D. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Mr. Dingell, through an aide, Jodi Seth, said Wednesday that such committees were "as relevant and useful as feathers on a fish."

Mr. Dingell's firm support of the automobile industry, a leading source of carbon dioxide emissions, and his earlier lack of enthusiasm for climate measures have made him suspect among advocates of strong climate laws.

To add excitement, the man of the moment, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, lent his name to the best-known brand in climate-change legislation, a measure by Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut.

That means that two of the three sponsors, Mr. Obama and Mr. McCain, are leading presidential contenders in 2008.

Neither party is united around any one position. And for all the flurry of news conferences and proffered solutions, the big unanswered question was what will President Bush do?

A tantalizing hint came from James L. Connaughton, chairman of the president's Council on Environmental Quality, in an interview on Tuesday.

"There are a number of pathways for getting to a shared goal, and we should explore all of them," Mr. Connaughton said.

He added, "Part of that, by the way, is learning about some of the flaws in the design of the economywide cap-and-trade approach, which, if corrected, might make it a workable tool."

That suggests that some version of an emissions cap may eventually win White House support. Persistent rumors that the president might support an emissions cap, circulating in Washington and Europe, were rejected Tuesday by his press secretary, Tony Snow.

DOJ_NMG_0118153

But White House aides have hinted for months that Mr. Bush was planning a dramatic announcement on the subject in his annual address. Last year, the president said, "America is addicted to oil," and stimulated a debate over dependence on foreign oil that has overlapped with environmental groups' calls for cleaner-burning domestic fuels.

The mechanism that Mr. Snow ruled out is the basis for most of the Democratic measures, capping carbon dioxide emissions and then giving or selling to companies allowances, effectively permits to create a certain level of emissions.

Cleaner factories or utilities could then sell the allowances and gain a new revenue source. Factories with higher than allowable emissions would have to buy the permits they need.

Such a market, already in effect in Europe, in theory would set a price for a ton of carbon dioxide emissions, and the market would stimulate innovation in technologies that would reduce emissions or produce goods or power without the same high emissions common today.

Diplomats and environmental groups speculated in Washington this week that the Bush administration would look at other mandatory actions, perhaps not an emissions cap but rather expanding the decision to increase marginally fuel-economy standards for light trucks.

A similar move for passenger vehicles, coupled with a call for sharp increases in ethanol and other renewable fuels plus new money for research into clean-energy technologies would be a bouquet approach that would expand policies Mr. Bush has put forward.

European allies have been trying to nudge Mr. Bush toward their cap-and-trade model. The White House says that would shift jobs, and emissions from one country to another without slowing worldwide growth in emissions.

The president' s opposition to mandatory caps retains strong support on Capitol Hill.

Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the trade group of the utility industry, said Wednesday: "Everything is different, but it's also the same in some ways. You still need 60 votes to get something big done in the Senate. And there are still many complex, thorny issues that stand in the way of enactment."

The Democratic bills announced in the last two weeks cover a broad range. A proposal by Senator Jeff Bingaman, the New Mexico Democrat who is chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, would decrease the rate of emissions growth before capping emissions and would build in a "safety valve," freeing industries from the caps in certain circumstances.

Groups like Environmental Defense say the safety valve would undermine market mechanisms.

In an interview, Mr. Bingaman said, "The way I look at it it's a question of what we can get agreement on."

Less draconian than that proposal is the Lieberman-McCain approach. It would tighten controls more gradually and include subsidies for nuclear power. An emissions cap for just utilities is the centerpiece of yet another bill, by Ms. Feinstein.

Some scientists and economists have expressed concern in recent weeks that the discussions here is overly focused on emissions caps, with too little attention on what they say is an essential need, greatly expanded government-financed research on nonpolluting energy technologies.

Richard G. Richels, a climate expert and an economist at the Electric Power Research Institute, an organization in Palo Alto, Calif., that conducts energy studies for the utility industry, said a carbon dioxide cap would mainly prompt industry to deploy existing cleaner technologies that provide gains, but fail to come close to solving the climate problem.

Mr. Richels added that it would not spur long-term investments seeking breakthroughs like new ways to store intermittent power from windmills.

Democrats Push Climate Change To Front Burner (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka And David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Strategy Aims to Draw Bush Into Negotiations; Industries Sort Options

WASHINGTON -- The new Democratic-led Congress is trying to put its mark on one of the most contentious environmental and economic problems within reach: climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0118154

The initiative is one of the starkest signs of the transformation of Washington's agenda as a result of November's election. While the Senate has debated climate-change moves for several years, the House of Representatives, under Republican control for the past 12 years, has done relatively little.

Now House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is moving to ramp up debates on energy and how to curb so-called greenhouse gases, which most scientists believe are accelerating global warming by trapping the sun's heat in the atmosphere. But the Californian already is discovering how controversial any effort will be -- even within her own party. Ms. Pelosi is expected to announce today that she is creating a select committee on climate change and energy independence that will be empowered to hold hearings.

Her strategy is to raise the profile of the issue and press for action by early summer. In an interview last evening, Ms. Pelosi said she saw energy independence and climate-change legislation as part of the next phase of the Democratic agenda after passing bills on issues such as the minimum wage and student loans.

"Tomorrow, we finish our 100 hours, and I will talk about what comes next, and included in that is energy independence. Climate change is part of energy independence," she said. "We're asking our chairmen to have their hearings and submit their legislation...in time for us to introduce an energy independence package no later than the Fourth of July."

By raising the issues' profile, Democrats say Ms. Pelosi will be better able to put pressure on the White House to come to the bargaining table. But her effort is angering committee chairmen less eager to move quickly, particularly powerful Michigan Rep. John Dingell. The Michigan lawmaker has expressed his ire at what he considers an intrusion into his House Energy and Commerce Committee's jurisdiction over energy and climate-change legislation.

Bills already circulating in the Senate have in common a mandatory cap on emissions, a step that, according to the White House, President Bush isn't prepared to advocate in next week's State of the Union address. However, industry and environmental groups see Mr. Bush as a potential broker who could help shape a consensus, particularly in the Senate, where 60 votes would be needed to overcome a filibuster promised by Oklahoma Republican Sen. James Inhofe.

The effort has enormous implications for American businesses and manufacturers, which are split on the best course. The coal-mining, oil-production and utility sectors are likely to be hardest hit, since they sell fossil fuels containing carbon dioxide -- the most common greenhouse gas -- or derive their energy from it. Among the forces urging action are industries worried that states are producing a patchwork of regulations. California has a new law to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, while New Mexico, Minnesota, South Carolina and Florida are working on their own plans. Dozens of U.S. cities have imposed emissions restrictions. A federal law could preempt further local and state efforts.

The most striking example of U.S. industry's evolution toward engaging the issue is oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp., which has long been a leading opponent of emissions rules but has begun talking about how to structure them. The oil industry also faces other pressures; today the House is set to vote on whether to cut subsidies for U.S. oil production.

"We now believe the legislative dance has formally begun," says Steve Cochran, a legislative analyst for Environmental Defense, a New York-based group which has been leading the charge for a cap-and-trade approach that would encourage trading in emissions credits that could soften the impact on industries. Companies that reduce their emissions below assigned caps could earn credits to sell to other companies that want to avoid penalties for exceeding their caps.

The flagship among the cap-and-trade bills was unveiled last week by Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Democratic Sens. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Barack Obama of Illinois. The legislation would require industries to reduce their emissions to 2004 levels by 2012 and then further decrease emissions by about 2% a year through 2020. The measure calls for the nation's emissions to be reduced by two-thirds by 2050. Less-demanding versions of the bill were rejected by the Senate twice before.

A more modest approach, being prepared by Democratic Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, calls for industries to stabilize their emissions by 2020 at levels registered in 2013. After that, the Bingaman bill would impose reductions below 2013 levels. The bill, expected to attract some industry and Republican support, is regarded as a fallback measure if the McCain-Lieberman-Obama approach fails. "We want to occupy the center ground," a Bingaman spokesman says.

A third approach, sponsored by Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, calls on the nation to reduce emissions to 1990 levels by 2020 and to make an 80% reduction by 2050. Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California, chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, calls this bill, with its steep cuts, the "gold standard." Her panel will play a major role on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0118155

While these bills would require utilities, coal mines, oil companies and other businesses across the economy to make the cuts, a fourth measure, submitted yesterday by Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, focuses only on utilities that make electricity. They would be required to reduce their emissions by 25% by 2020. The bill is supported by six major utilities, including California's PG&E Corp. and Florida Power & Light, companies that have long experience with emissions trading required by the Clean Air Act.

In the House, the climate-change issue is already stoking tensions. Democratic Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts is the leading candidate to head the new select committee, which is designed to be largely a communications vehicle able to cut across the traditional lines of the tax-writing, energy, science and environment panels.

But Mr. Dingell, who is the most upset about the Pelosi approach, is expected to host a meeting today of his committee's Democrats who, by chance, also include chairmen of other relevant panels such as the Science and Oversight and Government Reform committees.

Ms. Pelosi said the proposed select committee would "absolutely not" intrude on jurisdiction of existing panels, but serve to collect information and raise the profile of the issue. Her office said the new panel won't be empowered to initiate legislation. But committee heads expressed concern it would distract from their work and permit changes to be imposed on their bills through the House Rules Committee, which the speaker controls.

There is also a potential disconnect between the goals of Ms. Pelosi's agenda: The increase in domestic oil, gas and coal production likely needed to achieve energy independence would entail heightened output of greenhouse gases.

A significant part of the debate on climate change will focus on the bills' impact on the economy. However, some people who have designed the computer software used to calculate the projections say the bills contain many imponderables -- including assumptions about the potential emergence of cleaner technologies -- that can't be modeled.

So far, only the cost of Mr. Bingaman's bill has been estimated: The Energy Department's Energy Information Administration projects it would reduce the nation's gross domestic economy by 0.1%, or $232 billion, between 2009 and 2030.

But the Energy Department study assumes the emergence of a new generation of nuclear-power plants and other emission-reduction technologies that haven't appeared yet, says Alan Beamon, who helped prepare the study. "There's an awful lot of uncertainty on how markets will evolve to meet those needs," he says.

Computer models have diverged before. A study on the 2003 version of the McCain-Lieberman bill by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology predicted the measure would increase consumer costs by 0.02% over a couple of decades, while CRA International, a Boston-based consulting group, put the cost at 10 times higher.

"Models all assume that technological change happens smoothly," says Anne Smith, a vice president of CRA, "but when they do that, they underestimate the effort it will take of solving some of these problems."

Jason Grumet, staff director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy, says the uncertainty of the models requires a "safety valve" in any emissions-trading plan so that the government could step in if legislation threatened economic stability.

Pelosi May Create Global Warming Panel (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, intent on putting global warming atop the Democratic agenda, is shaking up traditional committee fiefdoms dominated by some of Congress' oldest and most powerful members.

She's moving to create a special committee to recommend legislation for cutting greenhouse gases, most likely to be chaired by Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a Democratic leadership aide said Wednesday.

Markey has advocated raising mileage standards for cars, trucks and SUVs and is one of the House's biggest critics of oil companies and U.S. automakers,

DOJ_NMG_0118156

Pelosi has discussed the proposal with at least two Democratic committee chairmen: fellow Californian Henry Waxman of Oversight and Government Reform, and West Virginia Rep. Nick Rahall, who heads the Natural Resources panel. Pelosi intends to announce the move this week, said the leadership aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because not all of the details have been worked out.

The move, to some degree, would sidestep two of the House's most powerful Democratic committee bosses, in shaping what's expected to be at least a yearlong debate on global warming:

• Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell of Michigan, a defender of the auto industry and at 80 the longest serving member of the House.

• New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who as the 76-year-old chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, would have to clear any tax on carbon-based fuels like coal, oil or natural gas, which have been blamed for warming the atmosphere. A chief advocate of such a tax is former Democratic Vice President Al Gore.

Rahall said he had spoken with Pelosi about the idea of a new select committee. Rahall's panel oversees energy development on public lands, including coal, oil and natural gas as well as cleaner, non-carbon sources such as geothermal and windmills.

"I've been assured that no legislative jurisdiction would be taken away from any committee," Rahall said. "No legislative responsibility would be shifted from any committee."

As chair of Energy and Commerce, Dingell oversees the Clean Air Act — and would have the most to lose by letting another panel take the lead. The panel's staff chief, Dennis Fitzgibbons, a former auto company lobbyist, said Dingell was philosophically opposed to Pelosi's plan.

"He has always been cool to the idea, because it undermines the fundamental idea for establishing committees in the first place, which is to acquire expertise in a certain area," Fitzgibbons said.

Dingell, asked about the new committee, said, "I have not been officially informed."

Waxman, like Markey a one-time protege of Dingell, said that Pelosi discussed the idea of a special committee with him several days ago. He, too, is a skeptic.

"I believe the existing committees can deal effectively with global warming," he said Wednesday. "But I can also understand why the speaker believes it's important to highlight this issue."

A new committee would give Pelosi a vehicle to push a regulatory scheme for reducing greenhouse gases and pit her against President Bush, who plans to outline his global warming approach in his State of the Union next week. Bush has repeatedly opposed any mandatory reductions in carbon dioxide emissions, instead advocating voluntary approaches and research on new technologies. Pelosi has supported mandatory reductions with specific target dates for achieving them.

"It's an issue that the speaker thinks is critical to address," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider.

Democratic officials said the committee would be responsible for advising the best legislative approaches while the actual bill-writing duties would likely still be done by Dingell's and Rangel's committees. Among the topics being negotiated are how long the committee should exist and how broad its focus should be, since global climate change affects virtually everything.

Pelosi hasn't shied from taking on other powerful House Democrats. She endorsed the losing effort by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., to become majority leader over Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md. She also has approved of six-year term limits for committee chairmen over objections from Dingell and other senior Democrats.

She also has a history with Dingell, who backed Hoyer over Pelosi in a 2001 race for the party whip's post. Pelosi backed a Democratic primary challenger to Dingell's re-election the following year.

___

Associated Press writers Jim Kuhnhenn and H. Josef Hebert contributed to this report.

IN THE LOOP, ON THE HILL: A New Panel Forms Under Jurisdictional Cloud (WP)

By Lois Romano

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118157

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi moved quickly yesterday to deal with a furor that erupted over her decision to create a committee dedicated to global warming that will undoubtedly wander onto the turf of the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee.

Pelosi plans on announcing the new committee today, over the protestations of Energy Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) and Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), also on the committee. Sources say that Pelosi will likely name as chairman Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass), who has built a 30-year career as a leader on environmental issues. Markey's office has no comment.

A Hill aide with knowledge of the flap said that the new committee will have no legislative jurisdiction. However, Pelosi sees this as a high-profile, attention-getting committee that will put pressure on Energy and Commerce to move on climate change, say Hill sources.

Pelosi, who has made global warming and the environment a priority, has been frustrated with what she has perceived as a lack of commitment from Dingell to limit U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, to protect the auto industry in his district. A spokesman for Dingell, however, said that the chairman has put the auto industry on notice that he's moving forward with hearings on climate control and emission standards.

Last Friday, Dingell sent a memo to his committee members announcing plans for hearings on climate change, and he has invited former vice president Al Gore to testify. "I recognize that there is a wide range of opinion on climate change and it is my intention that we hear the full spectrum of views," Dingell wrote.

Spokeswoman Jodi Seth said that Dingell and the committee have begun planning a series of hearings, and that creating a new committee would only duplicate work already underway. She added that Dingell met yesterday with U.N. executive secretary for climate Eyvo de Boer.

More succinctly the chairman said in a statement: "These kinds of committees are as useful in relevance as feathers on a fish."The Wages of No Action

House and Senate members have been given a serious incentive to complete work on the minimum-wage legislation ASAP -- no raises for them until the job is done. Both the House and Senate bills require the two chambers to pass the legislation before their automatic cost-of-living increases are posted in February.

Meanwhile, Senate aides are none-too-pleased that president pro temp of the Senate, Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) has suggested that it would be inappropriate to authorize a cost-of-living wage increase for Senate employees while Congress is still operating under a continuing resolution--meaning the new budget is not yet in place and therefore the funds are not technically there.

A spokesman for Byrd said that decision will likely be reconsidered when the full-year funding level for the Senate is determined.Excused Absences

A databank of "missed votes" maligned Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, reporting him as the top House vote misser this year. Turns out the poor guy had a wicked skiing accident in Colorado over the holidays and ripped his knee up pretty bad, requiring surgery. He hobbled back to vote for the GOP leadership, then flew home for surgery and to recuperate. Sen. Sam Brownback missed 100 percent of his votes these past few weeks -- again with good reason. The senator was traveling last week in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Ethiopia. And Sen. Daniel Inouye was another at the 100 percent mark because he stayed in Hawaii to give a speech on Iraq, said a spokesman.Hold the Dough for the Crooks

One week before former Ohio congressman Robert Ney (R) is scheduled to be sentenced for accepting bribes, the House is poised to vote on legislation that would deny future legislators-turned-felons their federal pensions.

The measure, which sailed through the Senate, would not be retroactive. So Ney and those who stole before him will not be deprived of their benefits.

Sens. John Kerry (Mass.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.) were the primary co-sponsors of what became known as the Duke Cunningham Act, for the eponymous California legislator who went down in flames last year after treating a lobbyist's checkbook as his own and accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

The measure would only touch those funds that were matched by the federal government -- not the legislators' own contributions.

DOJ_NMG_0118158

According to National Taxpayers Union estimates, Ney would receive $29,000 a year, and Cunningham gets about $40,000, as does former congressman James Traficant (R-Ohio), who was convicted in 2002 of bribery and racketeering.

Former congressman Dan Rostenkowski-- who served 17 months in prison for mail fraud -- is estimated with cost-of-living increases to be receiving $131,000 -- almost as much as his full salary in 1994 when he was defeated for reelection.

It's A Consensus: The End Is Near (LAT)

By Bryn Nelson

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — In an extraordinary display of the mounting concern over climate change, an international group of physicists and an alliance of scientists and evangelical Christians each issued calls to action Wednesday aimed at preventing a doomsday that includes global environmental catastrophe.

The independent initiatives, announced at nearly simultaneous news conferences, reflect the new bonds forged from a growing consensus that human-wrought environmental damage is a moral issue for Christians and scientists alike.

At one event, the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists moved the minute hand of its famous "Doomsday Clock" to 11:55 p.m., with midnight being the figurative end of civilization. For the first time since the clock's creation in 1947, the organization's board of directors added the threat of climate change to unresolved nuclear dangers in the decision to advance the clock.

Meanwhile, a coalition of scientific and religious leaders affirmed their commitment to protecting the environment, calling for "fundamental changes in values, lifestyles and public policies required to address these worsening problems before it is too late."

Randy Isaac, executive director of the American Scientific Affiliation, a fellowship of Christians in scientific disciplines, said the "Urgent Call to Action" signed by 28 researchers and evangelicals reflected a successful search for common ground.

"Representatives of both groups have come together to rally around a common passion: the need to preserve God's creation," he said.

Carl Safina of the Blue Ocean Institute in Cold Spring Harbor, N.Y., said in an interview Wednesday: "We may have slightly different perspectives of where we came from, but the intensity of the problems that we face are becoming too big and too obvious, and they are making those differences [look] increasingly trivial. We're all on this boat together."

Martian Logic (WP)

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

AYEAR and a half ago, the National Academy of Sciences reported that the country's climate-monitoring systems were "at risk of collapse." This week, in a 400-page-plus knockout of a study, the academy concluded that those systems are even worse off now. This is a stunning indictment of an administration that has parried complaints about inaction on climate change with claims of at least having generously funded research.

The chief problem is President Bush's misplaced funding priorities at NASA, the space agency that doesn't just launch rockets but, along with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, also maintains a series of satellites and other sensors to monitor global climate and weather patterns. The network is essential to detecting and responding to the effects of global warming and other climate phenomena. But Mr. Bush, without significantly increasing NASA's budget, has insisted that it push ahead with plans to establish a human presence on the moon and assume the enormous job of preparing for a manned mission to Mars. These ambitions, coming as the ailing shuttle program also has demanded more money, have forced NASA to cut deeply into earth science and other research programs.

Those earth science programs now have an annual budget that is about $500 million less (in 2006 dollars) than they had at the end of the Clinton administration, says Berrien Moore III, one of the co-chairmen of the committee that drafted the report. The budget for research and analysis for NASA's science missions, the money that pays for experts to make sense of data collected, declined by 30 percent in the past six years. The result is a raft of delayed or canceled projects, many of which are needed to replace antique hardware, and a scientific community increasingly wary of dealing with NASA. This week, to deflect the report's criticisms, the White House is touting funding increases at NOAA, but those aren't enough to pick up the slack, especially after NOAA has had to pare down its own climate-monitoring goals because of huge cost overruns.

Mr. Moore and his co-chairman, Richard A. Anthes, say that Mr. Bush need only restore earth science research funding at NASA to the levels of late in the Clinton administration and spend reasonably on a discrete set of projects to repair the system, a goal that should be reachable if he reconsiders how to pay for his ambitious space missions. If the president must go to the moon or Mars, he should find the money for it responsibly, not by chopping away at other, more vital programs.

Will Al Gore Melt? (WSJ)

By Flemming Rose And Bjorn Lomborg

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Al Gore is traveling around the world telling us how we must fundamentally change our civilization due to the threat of global warming. Today he is in Denmark to disseminate this message. But if we are to embark on the costliest political project ever, maybe we should make sure it rests on solid ground. It should be based on the best facts, not just the convenient ones. This was the background for the biggest Danish newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, to set up an investigative interview with Mr. Gore. And for this, the paper thought it would be obvious to team up with Bjorn Lomborg, author of "The Skeptical Environmentalist," who has provided one of the clearest counterpoints to Mr. Gore's tune.

The interview had been scheduled for months. Mr. Gore's agent yesterday thought Gore-meets-Lomborg would be great. Yet an hour later, he came back to tell us that Bjorn Lomborg should be excluded from the interview because he's been very critical of Mr. Gore's message about global warming and has questioned Mr. Gore's evenhandedness. According to the agent, Mr. Gore only wanted to have questions about his book and documentary, and only asked by a reporter. These conditions were immediately accepted by Jyllands-Posten. Yet an hour later we received an email from the agent saying that the interview was now cancelled. What happened?

One can only speculate. But if we are to follow Mr. Gore's suggestions of radically changing our way of life, the costs are not trivial. If we slowly change our greenhouse gas emissions over the coming century, the U.N. actually estimates that we will live in a warmer but immensely richer world. However, the U.N. Climate Panel suggests that if we follow Al Gore's path down toward an environmentally obsessed society, it will have big consequences for the world, not least its poor. In the year 2100, Mr. Gore will have left the average person 30% poorer, and thus less able to handle many of the problems we will face, climate change or no climate change.

Clearly we need to ask hard questions. Is Mr. Gore's world a worthwhile sacrifice? But it seems that critical questions are out of the question. It would have been great to ask him why he only talks about a sea-level rise of 20 feet. In his movie he shows scary sequences of 20-feet flooding Florida, San Francisco, New York, Holland, Calcutta, Beijing and Shanghai. But were realistic levels not dramatic enough? The U.N. climate panel expects only a foot of sea-level rise over this century. Moreover, sea levels actually climbed that much over the past 150 years. Does Mr. Gore find it balanced to exaggerate the best scientific knowledge available by a factor of 20?

Mr. Gore says that global warming will increase malaria and highlights Nairobi as his key case. According to him, Nairobi was founded right where it was too cold for malaria to occur. However, with global warming advancing, he tells us that malaria is now appearing in the city. Yet this is quite contrary to the World Health Organization's finding. Today Nairobi is considered free of malaria, but in the 1920s and '30s, when temperatures were lower than today, malaria epidemics occurred regularly. Mr. Gore's is a convenient story, but isn't it against the facts?

He considers Antarctica the canary in the mine, but again doesn't tell the full story. He presents pictures from the 2% of Antarctica that is dramatically warming and ignores the 98% that has largely cooled over the past 35 years. The U.N. panel estimates that Antarctica will actually increase its snow mass this century. Similarly, Mr. Gore points to shrinking sea ice in the Northern Hemisphere, but don't mention that sea ice in the Southern Hemisphere is increasing. Shouldn't we hear those facts? Mr. Gore talks about how the higher temperatures of global warming kill people. He specifically mentions how the European heat wave of 2003 killed 35,000. But he entirely leaves out how global warming also means less cold and saves lives. Moreover, the avoided cold deaths far outweigh the number of heat deaths. For the U.K. it is estimated that 2,000 more will die from global warming. But at the same time 20,000 fewer will die of cold. Why does Mr. Gore tell only one side of the story?

DOJ_NMG_0118160

Al Gore is on a mission. If he has his way, we could end up choosing a future, based on dubious claims, that could cost us, according to a U.N. estimate, $553 trillion over this century. Getting answers to hard questions is not an unreasonable expectation before we take his project seriously. It is crucial that we make the right decisions posed by the challenge of global warming. These are best achieved through open debate, and we invite him to take the time to answer our questions: We are ready to interview you any time, Mr. Gore -- and anywhere.

Mr. Rose is culture editor of Jyllands-Posten, in Copenhagen. Mr. Lomborg is a professor at the Copenhagen Business School.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-FBI Agent Denies He Fought Police (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, January 18, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — A retired FBI agent said he stood with his arms raised, looking down at the snow under his feet, when a deputy U.S. marshal charged at him and struck him with a "cold, metallic instrument."

Gary John's testimony Wednesday contradicted that of Deputy U.S. Marshal James Masterson, who said the former agent kept moving around, refused to show his hands and punched him during a Dec. 8, 2005, arrest in Stratford's Oronoque Village.

At the time, federal marshals were seeking John for allegedly violating a no-contact restraining order involving his ex-wife in Rhode Island. They traced him to a condominium on Piute Lane, where John was living with the mother of his now ex-girlfriend from Milford.

Early this afternoon, U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall is expected to send the case to the 12-member jury to determine whether John should be convicted of assaulting a federal law enforcement officer.

John has been in custody since his arrest.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Kaplan questioned John about a letter he sent to his ex- Milford girl friend last summer about "not wanting to go back to prison."

John claimed he meant he did not want to spend the summer incarcerated, but outside enjoying "Connecticut's coastline."

The 58-year-old, 6-foot, 165- pound former FBI agent took the stand to tell his side of the story after spending a day listening to marshals and police officers testify about his conduct.

Responding to questions from Robert Mann,

Advertisement

his lawyer, John said he was standing near the trunk of his car when he heard Masterson shout his name around 10 p.m. on Dec. 8, 2005. Then, he said, he saw the marshal pointing a gun at him.

"I could not understand why a law enforcement officer would have a gun pointed at me," John told the jury in a soft, calm voice. "Nothing in my background justifies that level of force being necessary."

He testified that during most of the ordeal he kept his hands raised, his palms to the ground and his fingers opened except once, when he placed a cell phone call to his girlfriend from Milford.

Asked by Mann why he did not follow Masterson's orders to lie face down, John said there was a 3-inch coating of snow and ice on the ground. "I was wearing a pretty expensive jacket," the former agent explained. "I could not see a reason to tarnish my dress clothes."

When Masterson's backup arrived, John admitted knowing he "was about to be taken into custody. My arms were up, my palms facing out and my eyes looking down at the snow so I would be in a non-threatening position."

Seconds later, John said, he "received a surprise blow" to his cheek from a "metallic instrument. The next thing I felt was an overwhelming force of individuals from behind me."

John claimed that as he was falling he "instinctively and reactively" reached out and grabbed onto someone's outer arms to try to break the fall. He then felt a punch to his left forehead under his left eyebrow and fell to the ground.

On the ground, he said, his face was shoved into the snow making it impossible for him to breathe and his right arm was pulled "so viciously and violently" causing him to shout 'you're breaking my arm.' "

At the time several Stratford police officers, Rhode Island sheriffs and deputy U.S. marshals were on the scene.

"I did not strike Deputy U.S. Marshal James M. Masterson or anyone else," John said. "I never attempted to punch or make any aggressive move."

Masterson testified Tuesday John repeatedly failed to listen to his commands and threw roundhouse punches at him during the arrest.

Earlier in the day, Constance Guerrere, who owned the condominium outside which John was arrested, said she saw numerous law enforcement officers jump John during the arrest.

"The police came and jumped Gary. They threw him on the ground," testified Guerrere, the 78-year-old mother of John's ex-girlfriend. "They had his face in the ice. It was so horrendous, I couldn't watch."

Officials Suprised By DEA Raid On Pot Clinics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Federal drug agents raided eleven medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles Wednesday afternoon, seizing several thousand pounds of processed marijuana, along with weapons and money, as part of an ongoing investigation, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said.

At least three people in West Hollywood were taken into custody in a raid of five outlets there. Six other outlets in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills were also raided.

In West Hollywood, agents in bullet-proof vests, dark sunglasses, gloves and face masks piled out of a storefront with boxes and black trash bags stuffed full, as 50 protestors gathered, booing and shouting "States' Rights". The evidence was loaded into dark blue SUVs and vans.

At one dispensary, The Farmacy on Santa Monica Boulevard, amateur videographers and others mobbed officers piling three cars with evidence.

West Hollywood city officials said the raid took them by surprise. The West Hollywood Sheriff's station was not notified until 2 p.m., a half-hour before the raid began, said Lt. David Smith.

City spokeswoman Helen Goss said West Hollywood has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people suffering from illnesses like HIV and AIDS, and city officials said they were taken by surprise, learning of the raid as it was going on.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. The federal drug agency, which does not recognize California laws legalizing medical marijuana use, recently stepped up enforcement, contending that the amount of money involved proves that the burgeoning dispensaries are nothing more than fronts for high-stakes drug dealing.

DEA Raids 11 Medical Marijuana Clinics In Los Angeles Area (MHCA)

Monterey (CA) Herald, January 18, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Federal drug agents raided nearly a dozen medical marijuana clinics Wednesday, seizing several thousand pounds of processed marijuana, along with weapons and money, authorities said.

Several people were detained, although no arrests were made after five dispensaries in West Hollywood and six others in Venice, Hollywood and the San Fernando Valley were searched, said Sarah Pullen, a spokeswoman with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Pullen declined to provide details of the investigation, saying the search warrants remained under seal. "But obviously we are looking for marijuana and other illegal drugs, marijuana edibles and evidence of ongoing criminal activity and anything from paperwork to documents -- you name it," Pullen said.

Officials in West Hollywood said they were surprised by the action, learning of the raid as it was happening.

West Hollywood spokeswoman Helen Goss said the city has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people suffering from illnesses like HIV and AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0118162

Agents in bulletproof vests, gloves and face masks left a West Hollywood storefront with boxes and trash bags filled, as about 50 protesters booed and shouted "states' rights."

At one dispensary, The Farmacy on Santa Monica Boulevard, amateur videographers and others mobbed officers filling three cars with evidence.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. The DEA, which does not recognize California laws legalizing medical marijuana use, has recently stepped up its enforcement.

"Today's enforcement operations show that these establishments are nothing more than drug-trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools," said Ralph W. Partridge, head of the DEA in Los Angeles.

Feds Raid 5 Of 7 Medical Marijuana Clinics In WeHo (CBS2)

CBS 2, January 18, 2007

(CBS) WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. Federal agents raided five of the seven medical marijuana dispensaries in West Hollywood Wednesday, along with six others throughout Los Angeles County, authorities said.

West Hollywood city officials said Drug Enforcement Administration raids were carried out at dispensaries at 7828, 7825, 7901 and 8464 Santa Monica Blvd., and at a dispensary at 8921 Sunset Blvd.

Sarah Pullen of the DEA said six other dispensaries were searched, including four in the San Fernando Valley, one in Hollywood and one in Venice.

She said she could not provide specifics of the raids because the warrants were under court seal, "but obviously we are looking for marijuana and other illegal drugs, marijuana edibles and evidence of ongoing criminal activity and anything from paperwork to documents -- you name it."

Several people were detained but none were arrested, Pullen said, although she said arrests may be forthcoming.

She said although medical marijuana is legal in California, "federal law doesn't differentiate. Marijuana is illegal in any form."

"... The DEA is here to enforce federal drug laws," she said.

"Federal law does have supremacy over state law where there is a difference between federal law and state law by a ruling of the Supreme Court. Therefore, marijuana is illegal."

West Hollywood officials decried the raids.

"The city of West Hollywood has had a long-standing commitment to the compassionate use of medical marijuana for those persons who are facing catastrophic illnesses," City Manager Paul Arevalo said.

Pullen said the places that were served with search warrants were chosen through "citizen complaints and increased criminal activities surrounding the establishments, from parking violations to armed robbery to break ins to graffiti to hand-to-hand sales outside."

She said there are at least 200 marijuana distribution centers operating in Los Angeles County.

Sheriff's Deputy Ed Hernandez said the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department provided traffic control and security in the West Hollywood locations.

West Hollywood City Councilman Jeffrey Prang said he drove by one of the locations this afternoon and it had been taped off.

"The DEA was inside, going through computer files and papers," said Prang, who is employed by the Sheriff's Department in a civilian capacity.

The raids came on the heels of a vote by the West Hollywood City Council last night "toughening the restrictions affecting these establishments," said Prang.

"West Hollywood has been a leader and advocate of the compassionate use of marijuana for people with HIV and other serious illnesses who find it brings them relief," Prang said.

DOJ_NMG_0118163

He said marijuana is known to lessen the nausea connected with chemotherapy treatments used to treat cancer and also helps people with HIV or AIDS who get "wasting syndrome."

The marijuana helps them maintain their appetite, he said.

"I'm not an expert, but if people are terminally sick or are suffering, why would one deny them access?" he said.

He said another medical marijuana dispensary was raided in the San Fernando Valley last week, and several in Northern California were raided over the last few weeks.

Arevalo said the city had no advance knowledge of the raids.

"It is regrettable that the federal, state and local governments cannot work together on this issue," he said.

Supporters of the medical marijuana dispensaries said they plan to stage a protest at West Hollywood City Hall tomorrow to condemn the raids.

"The DEA continues to say that they are not going after patients," said Steph Sherer, executive director of Americans for Safe Access. "But every time they raid a medical cannabis dispensary, hundreds of the most seriously ill lose their access to medicine."

Feds Bust Bay Area Pot-Growing Operation (NBC4)

NBC4.TV, January 18, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Calif. -- Federal agents are breaking up a multi-million dollar drug operation that stretches from the San Francisco Bay Area to the Central Valley.

Drug Enforcement Agency agents found pot and indoor pot-growing equipment in 48 homes in suburbs such as Lathrop and Stockton.

According to court documents, the growers are from the Bay Area.

Agents spent months tracking them from upscale homes in the Central Valley to San Francisco and Oakland.

Agents served several search warrants and arrested eight people in San Francisco's Chinatown and the outer Mission neighborhood on Friday.

Investigators are still trying to figure out who is in charge of the operation, which they say produced $20 million worth of pot every year.

Officials Link Bay Area Raids To Area Marijuana Operation (SACBEE)

By Ryan Lillis, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, January 18, 2007

Authorities raided three Bay Area homes Wednesday that they believe are connected to an alleged large-scale indoor marijuana operation uncovered in the Sacramento region last year.

Agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Elk Grove and Stockton police departments raided homes in San Francisco, Daly City and Union City, said DEA Special Agent Gordon Taylor.

Agents found "documentary evidence" that the homes were connected to 48 homes raided as part of the widespread investigation the past six months, Taylor said.

Tuesday's raids followed a series of busts last week in which search warrants were served at homes in Lathrop, Tracy, San Francisco and Oakland, Taylor said.

Authorities said they made eight arrests during those raids and confiscated weapons, processed marijuana, ecstasy pills and more than $60,000.

"It appears this is a Bay Area crime syndicate that has exported its indoor marijuana operations to Sacramento and San Joaquin counties," Taylor said. "They showed up unannounced, unexpected and uninvited, and today we're turning the tables on them."

Police Charge 4 In Drug Scheme (NASHTEL)

By Andrew Wolfe, Telegraph Staff

Nashua Telegraph, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118164

CONCORD – Some car buffs like low profile tires, big, flashy rims and walloping sound systems with bone-jarring bass.

Federal prosecutors charge that four men at two Massachusetts auto repair shops catered to yet another type of car customizer: the sort who wants well-hidden, mechanized compartments large enough to hold several kilograms of cocaine or heroin.

Danilo DeLeon, of 192 Garden St., and Jose "Chocha" Rojas, of 29 Bromfield St., both in Lawrence, Mass., are charged along with Felipe Espada of 485 Granite St., Manchester, and Melvin "Flaco" Rosario, ofspiracy case pending in U.S. District Court.

Prosecutors charge that DeLeon and Rojas installed a hidden compartment, or "clavo," in a Honda Odyssey van for two informants last March at DeLeon Auto Sales in Lawrence.

"Clavo," which means "nail" in Spanish, is slang for a compartment used to stash drugs, DEA Special Agent Todd Prough wrote in an affidavit describing the investigation.

DeLeon and Rojas are charged with conspiracy to sell drug paraphernalia and aiding and abetting drug distribution, according to federal court records.

DeLeon also introduced the informants to Espada and Rosario, who handled a second custom installation on a Mitsubishi Montero, and also agreed to sell the informants a kilo of cocaine for $23,000, Prough's affidavit states.

Espada and Rojas face the same charges as DeLeon, but also are charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine.

The four men all were arrested and charged in November, and their case is scheduled for trial March 20 in U.S. District Court before Judge Joseph DiClerico Jr.

An informant first met with DeLeon at DeLeon Auto Sales, 58 E. Haverhill St., Lawrence, on March 21, and arranged for a "clavo" large enough to hold "two kilos" to be installed in the Honda Odyssey, Prough wrote.

DeLeon later towed the van from Salem, N.H., and charged $600 for the job, which was finished April 5. The compartment was hidden beneath plastic molding over the rear bumper, and DeLeon told the informants it would hold up to five kilos, Prough wrote.

On June 15, the informants met with Rojas at DeLeon Auto Sales and asked about getting an electronically operated compartment installed in a Mitsubishi Montero, large enough to hold "15 kilos" of cocaine, heroin "or anything," Prough wrote.

DeLeon towed the Montero to DeLeon Auto, but later arranged for Espada and Rosario to handle the job, Prough wrote. The compartment was to open electronically, with a piston, he wrote, and Rosario and Espada showed the informants a white Jaguar with a similar compartment at another shop, Rodriguez Auto Repair, in Methuen, Mass., Prough wrote.

On Oct. 12, Prough wrote, Espada and Rosario met the two informants in an apartment in Lawrence, where they had brought a kilo of cocaine to sell. All four men were arrested that day.

Espada and Rosario have remained jailed since their arrests, and DiClerico has denied Rosario's requests for bail, court records show. DeLeon was released after posting a $50,000 bond. Rojas was released on bail, but then jailed again after failing drug tests, court records show.

Andrew Wolfe can be reached at 594-6410 or awolfe@nashuatelegraph.com.

$50 Million Drug-money Seizure May Be Biggest Score Ever (CNN)

CNN, January 18, 2007

Colombian police find millions in U.S. currency, euros in three raids

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Colombian national police recovered close to $50 million in U.S. currency as well as other money during three raids in the past week on houses used to stash drug proceeds, a U.S. official told CNN on Wednesday.

It is thought to be the most money ever seized by a law enforcement agency in the world, said the official, who requested anonymity due to the sensitive nature of the investigation.

The raids were conducted following a tip from a source working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the official told CNN. The DEA then provided information to the Colombian National Police.

The first of the raids -- all of which were conducted in the Cali area -- took place Friday, and $13 million and more than €2 million was seized. The cash was in a false cabinet and wall that led to a hidden room. Another cash seizure took place Tuesday, when police recovered $16 million to $18 million.

Separately, another house was searched on Wednesday and a large quantity of gold was found. Officials said a wall had to be destroyed to get to the gold.

DEA agents accompanied Colombian police on the raids, the DEA official said.

The money and gold likely belonged to a member of the Norte Valle Cartel, which dominates the cocaine trade in Colombia, the official told CNN.

IMMIGRATION:

Justices Grease Wheels For Deporting Noncitizen Car Thieves (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court made it easier today for the government to deport thousands of legal immigrants who have been involved in car thefts.

In a 9-0 decision, the justices said noncitizens who have been convicted or plead guilty in California to the theft of a motor vehicle are also guilty of an "aggravated felony" under the immigration laws, even if they simply helped another person carry out the theft.

Under a strict 1996 law, legal immigrants who have an aggravated felony on their records are automatically deported from the United States.

Today's ruling reverses a decision of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which said California's law swept too broadly and could brand some minor participants as serious criminals deserving of deportation.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer disagreed. California's law on vehicle thefts applies not only to those who steal a car, but also to others who "aid or abet" the thief. "We cannot agree that California's law is somehow special," he wrote.

Government lawyers said the 9th Circuit's ruling, which applied throughout the West, had blocked the deportation of more 8,000 immigrants.

The high court's ruling was not a total victory for the government, however. The justices stopped short of deciding whether mere "joyriding" could be deemed an aggravated felony.

They also left open the question of whether the deportation law should also extend to persons who were "accessories after the fact" to car theft by, for example, traveling in a stolen car. These issues can be decided later, the court said.

While today's decision focused on California's law on motor vehicle thefts, the decision will apply across the nation, since the court said every state has a similar measure on the books.

Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a 32-year old native of Peru and a permanent legal resident, pleaded guilty in 1992 to the theft of a Honda Accord in Marin County. He was sentenced to three years in state prison.

As he neared the end of his prison term, U.S. immigration authorities moved to deport him. The 9th Circuit blocked that move, ruling it was not clear whether Duenas-Alvarez intended to steal the car.

Today's ruling in Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez represented a setback for the immigrant, but not a final defeat.

"The decision expressly leaves open our ability to present additional arguments to the Court of Appeals," said Christopher J. Meade, a New York lawyer who represented Duenas-Alvarez's case to the high court.

Justices Uphold Deporting Alien For Car Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118166

The Supreme Court yesterday sided with the Bush administration in a case the government says could have a "substantial effect on the administration of immigration laws," ruling that a foreign national and legal U.S. resident convicted for car theft can be deported.

In the near-unanimous opinion, the high court overturned a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which rejected government arguments that under the 1996 Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), aliens can be deported for a category of aggravated felonies called "theft offenses" for which the punishment is at least one year in prison.

The appeals court had vacated an order by a U.S. immigration judge that the 2002 conviction of Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez constituted an aggravated felony and ruled that the Peruvian-born immigrant and legal U.S. resident since 1998 could not be deported.

But the Supreme Court, in an 18-page opinion, said U.S. immigration law provides for removing a foreign-born national convicted of a theft offense, including aiding and abetting, when the term of imprisonment is at least one year.

The high court agreed that a conviction on state charges of car theft rose to the level envisioned by Congress when the INA was passed.

"To find that state law creates a crime outside the generic definition of a listed crime in a federal statute requires a realistic probability, not a theoretical possibility, that the state would apply its statute to conduct falling outside the generic definition," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said in writing the opinion.

Joining Justice Breyer were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Samuel A. Alito Jr. Justice John Paul Stevens sided with his colleagues on three of four issues under debate, but he said the court should withhold comment on the issue of California law until after the appeals court has addressed it.

In 2002, Duenas-Alvarez pleaded guilty to violating the California Vehicle Code, which makes it "illegal to take a vehicle without the owner's consent or to aid or abet in such a taking." He was sentenced to three years in prison.

The Department of Homeland Security sought Duenas-Alvarez's deportation based on the INA. Theft offenses are one type of crime included in the category of aggravated felonies for which the government can deport aliens.

In February 2004, Homeland Security initiated removal proceedings, and a U.S. immigration judge ruled that the California offense of unlawful driving or taking of a vehicle was a theft offense and ordered Duenas-Alvarez removed to Peru. The Board of Immigration Appeals dismissed Duenas-Alvarez's appeal.

The 9th Circuit overturned the deportation order, saying that because the California statute allows for convictions based solely on aiding and abetting, conviction under the statute did not necessarily mean Duenas-Alvarez had committed a theft offense.

But U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, in arguing the case for the government, called the appeals court ruling "incorrect," saying Duenas-Alvarez's case provided the ideal situation with which to clarify federal immigration law.

In court papers, Mr. Clement said a Supreme Court decision on the matter would directly affect an estimated 8,000 immigrants in the 9th Circuit who have been charged with theft offenses.

He argued that the 9th Circuit ruling was in conflict with decisions of other courts of appeals, and if left unreviewed, "it will have a substantial effect on the administration of immigration laws."

Dems In No Rush To Build Border Fence (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A law to erect hundreds of miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexican border is on the books, and money to start it has been approved. Still, the next step is uncertain.

Republicans worry that now they have lost control of Congress, they never will see the fence built. Democrats in charge today generally oppose the fence.

The law passed last year says Congress does not have to release the money until lawmakers approve how the fence will be built.

DOJ_NMG_0118167

Based on the comments of some Democrats, there is no rush.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said he wants the Bush administration to offer a plan for securing the northern and southern borders.

"My preference is to delay the construction of a fence until we have a plan," said Thompson, D-Miss.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said this week Democrats want "the best possible way" to secure the border.

Hoyer voted against the fence last year, as did House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Though the total fencing was believed to be about 700 miles, congressional researchers say it is closer to about 850 miles.

A separate law on Homeland Security Department spending provided $1.2 billion for the fencing. That law also withholds $950 million of the sum until the House and Senate appropriations committees approve the department's plan for spending the money.

Attempts to get comment from the chairmen of the House and Senate appropriations committees were not immediately successful.

Some Republicans have written President Bush asking him to request more money for the fence's construction in his 2008 budget.

In a recent news conference, GOP Reps. Duncan Hunter of California and Steve King of New York said the cost of the fence would be in line with the Congressional Budget Office's estimate: $3 million a mile, for a total of $2.6 billion.

"It's just a fence. It's the kind of fence we build in America every day," Hunter said.

In a Dec. 12 report, the Congressional Research Service said costs could be higher.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers estimated a double-layer fence would cost a little over $1 million a mile, not including buying the land on which it would be built, the research service said. In addition, maintenance could run from $16.4 million to $70 million a mile over 25 years, the Corps said.

The Homeland Security Department has contracted with Boeing for the Secure Border Initiative, consisting of a "virtual fence" of cameras, surveillance technology and new procedures for border agents. The first phase is to be completed in Arizona in June. A recent audit report said that project could cost between $8 billion and $30 billion.

TAX:

Senate Panel OKs Business Tax Breaks (AP)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Tax breaks aimed at easing the burden of a minimum-wage increase on small businesses sailed through the Senate's tax-writing committee Wednesday.

The unanimous voice vote by the Senate Finance Committee paves the way for the full Senate to consider boosting the minimum wage to $7.25 over the next two years. The wage plan is next in line for debate after the Senate wraps up work on an ethics and lobbying overhaul.

But the committee's action drew protests from the House's No. 2 Democrat, who said it would "complicate and delay" passage of the minimum-wage increase. The House passed its version without any tax breaks for the small businesses, which typically employ the greatest number of minimum-wage workers.

The House also is guarding its right under the Constitution to initiate tax bills and says procedural gridlock might ensue if the Senate goes first.

"Minimum-wage earners have already waited nine years and four months for a raise. Congress should not make them wait any longer," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

The tax provisions would help restaurants, retailers and other businesses that hire welfare and food stamp recipients as well as ex-convicts, the disabled and others who might have difficulty landing a job.

DOJ_NMG_0118168

In keeping with promises by Democratic leaders to accompany the tax cuts with balancing revenue increases, the measure would close tax loopholes and curb corporate tax shelters that have passed the Senate in recent years, only to die in the once GOP-dominated House.

The popularity of the wage increase meant easy approval of a narrowly written bill through the Democratic-run House. The bill would raise the wage in three steps, starting with an increase from $5.15 to $5.85 per hour.

In the notoriously balky Senate, however, Democratic leaders have opted to add the $8 billion in tax relief. That would help ease passage by avoiding a fight with business lobbyists and the possibility of a filibuster by minority Republicans.

"A minimum wage hike would likely not pass the Senate without small business tax relief," said Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, the top Republican on the Senate Finance Committee.

The Senate's move probably will delay the minimum wage bill and has generated hard feelings between House and Senate tax writers.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel said the Senate is trampling on his chamber's right under the Constitution to initiate tax bills.

Rangel, D-N.Y., said the Senate must try to pass the bill as a stand-alone measure without the tax provisions.

"We're not going to accept a tax cut of $8 billion on our minimum wage bill," Rangel said. "It's a Senate problem."

House leaders want to avoid long delays in enacting the minimum wage increase. They are sending signals privately that they ultimately will accept some tax provisions rather than risk deadlock.

The Senate measure also would scale back the ability of corporate executives to postpone paying taxes on deferred compensation plans, limiting the amount of deferrable income to $1 million. This would raise $806 million over the next decade.

Rolling back the plans, which are popular with highly paid executives, led to objections from the business lobby.

All told, the Senate measure would provide about $8 billion in tax incentives for small business by extending the ability of small businesses to defray the cost of equipment purchases. It would allow restaurant and store owners — who typically hire many minimum wage workers — accelerated tax benefits on improvements to their facilities.

The measure would extend for five years the work opportunity tax credit. This gives businesses tax relief for hiring people that employers often are reluctant to take on — welfare recipients, ex-felons, the mentally and physically disabled and inner city youths, for example.

Under both the House and Senate bills, the minimum wage would rise to $5.85 an hour 60 days after it signed into law by the president; then to $6.55 an hour a year later; and to $7.25 an hour a year after that.

Minimum-Wage Deal Hinges On Taxes (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some banks, foreign companies and top corporate executives could feel the pinch of tax changes the Senate is considering to fund sweeteners for small businesses as part of a federal minimum-wage boost.

The Senate Finance Committee yesterday approved an $8 billion package of tax breaks over 10 years for small businesses that may be affected by the proposed increase in the minimum wage. The pay raise passed the House and could be taken up in the full Senate as soon as next week. The Senate package extends for another year a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses and allows restaurants quicker recovery of costs for improving their premises. It also extends for five years a tax credit for companies that hire certain disadvantaged groups, such as at-risk youth. The committee added veterans disabled during service on or after Sept. 11, 2001, to the list of hires eligible for the credit.

The Senate move shows the changed dynamic in the new Congress, where Democrats have said fiscal responsibility and helping the middle class will be their focus. Rather than pairing the pay boost for low-income workers with a cut in the estate tax, as was the case last year, the Senate is combining the minimum-wage increase with a narrow package of tax breaks for small firms that is offset with tax restrictions for other companies. The debate is an early test of the ability of Democratic leaders in the Senate and House to bridge differences between the chambers.

DOJ_NMG_0118169

To pay for the tax breaks, the panel agreed to further restrict a tax shelter known as a "sale-in, lease-out," or SILO, transaction. The committee also agreed to collect taxes from more companies that have used "corporate inversion" deals to avoid them -- essentially reincorporating in a foreign country to avoid paying U.S. taxes on foreign income. In addition, the panel agreed to greatly limit the earnings that executives and other highly paid workers can put tax-free into deferred compensation plans, among other changes.

In 2004, Congress cracked down on SILO transactions, but not as rigorously as today. In SILO transactions, a tax-exempt entity such as a city government sells property to an investor and then leases the property back for use. The investor, in turn, can take advantage of tax breaks associated with the property that wouldn't benefit the seller. The Finance Committee's bill would raise an estimated $4.3 billion over five years by restricting the deals no matter when they occurred; current law disallows those that occurred after March 12, 2004. Among the losers if the change becomes law: Banks such as Wachovia Corp. and Bank of America Corp. that have entered into such transactions. Both companies declined to comment on the move.

The finance panel's changes to corporate inversions would affect companies including drilling-service contractors Nabors Industries Ltd. and Noble Corp., that got a reprieve from such restrictions when Congress debated them a few years ago. At that time, House Republicans insisted on a later effective date for corporate-inversion curbs than the Senate wanted. Now, the Senate panel's plan would move back the effective date about a year. Noble declined to comment and Nabors Industries didn't respond to a request for comment.

As for the changes to deferred-compensation packages, critics said the Senate panel's plan would have unintended consequences. As written, the provisions would cause an "upheaval," said Lynn Dudley, vice president for retirement policy at the American Benefits Council, which advocates for large companies that provide employee benefits.

Ms. Dudley said the panel's limits might affect compensation arrangements for middle managers, not just top executives, or could disrupt the common practice of providing two-year severance packages.

In 2004, Congress targeted companies that let executives defer compensation to delay paying taxes and then allowed them to dip into that kitty without limit. It set rules, some still being implemented by the IRS, detailing how and when compensation could be deferred, requiring, for instance, a fixed schedule for paying out the money. The new provision, one of the first tangible responses to concern about executive compensation in the new Congress, would limit that to the lesser of $1 million or the person's average taxable compensation for the prior five years.

Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) said the offset provisions, many of which had been passed by the panel in past years, would rein in corporate abuses in order to help small businesses in states like his.

Mr. Baucus said the tax package would be crucial to passing a minimum-wage increase in the Senate. But the package faces resistance from tax writers in the House, which last week passed a bill boosting the hourly minimum wage to $7.25 from $5.15 without any tax breaks. The Senate's approach has rankled House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.) because it puts him in the position of having the Senate initiate a revenue measure, contrary to Constitutional precedents that require all tax bills to begin in the House.

Mr. Rangel appears to have staked out a bargaining position that Senate Democrats should at least first try to pass the wage increase without the tax breaks. "Why do you need a tax break to do the right thing?" Mr. Rangel asked. "Maybe he (Sen. Baucus) doesn't have a strong feel for the depth of support that this bill has. ... I strongly disagree that this thing would be filibustered." Mr. Baucus said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) would have to work out the differences.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Quarrel Stalls Movement Of Ethics Bill In Senate (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118170

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — It is an open secret that many members of Congress from both parties would be relieved to scuttle proposed changes in ethics rules. After all, the changes tend to limit the personal perks and political advantages of their positions.

In the Senate, that wish appeared to come true on Wednesday. A proposed ethics overhaul collapsed when a procedural question turned into a feud between the Democratic and Republican leaders, each accusing the other of failing to address a major theme of the fall elections.

By about 10 p.m., the proposals appeared dead for now after 46 Senate Republicans blocked a vote on a broad ethics and lobbying bill. Fifty Democrats and one Republican, Senator Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, supported going ahead with the vote, but under Senate rules, 65 votes were needed to prevail.

In an interview after the vote, Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada and majority leader, said, "The Republicans killed ethics reform, period. There is no way to put frosting on this. This is as sour as any piece of legislation."

Mr. Reid said he would give the Republicans another chance to vote for the bill Thursday afternoon, but then would set the measure aside if they did not come around. The 21 Republican senators who will be up for re-election in 2008 "for the next two years are going to have to go home and explain what they did to try to destroy the most significant ethics and lobbying reform since Watergate," Mr. Reid said.

Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, called Mr. Reid's accusations spin. He said the issue was Mr. Reid's refusal to hold a vote on a Republican proposal to include in the ethics bill a version of a presidential line-item veto, a provision that Mr. Reid said was irrelevant to ethics.

Mr. McConnell argued that such a veto power would help eliminate waste or corruption from the pet spending projects known as earmarks, which lawmakers tuck into complicated legislation.

Although Mr. Reid publicly vowed to hold another vote on a presidential line-item veto, Mr. McConnell said the Republicans would block passage of the ethics-and-lobbying rules package unless Mr. Reid allowed a vote on the proposal as an amendment.

"No amount of spin is going to convince anyone that Republicans don't want to pass this bill," Mr. McConnell said in a speech on the floor.

The Senate ethics and lobbying reform bill under debate was introduced by the leaders of both parties and closely resembles a bill passed under Republican control last year. It is considerably weaker than a counterpart bill that the House recently passed. But roll calls on a series of proposed amendments are forcing lawmakers to choose between casting embarrassing no votes or accepting more sweeping changes.

The new House rules, for example, includes a prohibition on House members' accepting gifts, meals or trips paid for by lobbyists; a ban on accepting discounted use of corporate jets; and a requirement of public disclosure of the sponsor, cost and purpose of each earmark.

The original Senate ethics bill included looser restrictions and major loopholes. Mr. Reid, one of the biggest users of discounted corporate jet trips, introduced an amendment to roughly match the House rules on gifts, meals or jet use.

But when a Republican introduced a proposed amendment to match the House requirement on earmarks, Mr. Reid tried unsuccessfully to block it. Then he embraced it with small modifications.

Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi and a former party leader, said he was "amused" by the fracas. "I guess there is a little bit of a manhood thing here where one side is going to show the other," Mr. Lott said.

Still, Mr. Lott, who oversaw the weaker bill that was introduced last year, also acknowledged some impatience with the zeal for new rules.

"It's gotten out of control," Mr. Lott said. "We're involved in a long process of self-flagellation."

Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, agreed. "I think this whole process has gotten out of control," he said. "Only in Washington, when somebody like Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham breaks the law, you suddenly have to change the law."

Line-Item Veto Stalls Ethics Bill (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

DOJ_NMG_0118171

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Republican Senators threatened Wednesday to derail a lobbying and ethics overhaul package if Democrats block consideration of a presidential line-item veto the GOP wants added to the bill.

The blow-up brought consideration of other proposed amendments to a halt Wednesday afternoon and threw into uncertainty the prospects for a measure invested with so much importance that Senate Democrats tagged it S.1.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) tried to avert a showdown by guaranteeing he would provide floor time before the Easter recess for a stand-alone bill granting the president rescission authority, and, if it passed, would send it to conference negotiations with the House. But in a floor debate with Reid, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who offered the amendment, appeared to reject the offer.

"Why not do it now?" he asked.

Senate leaders had hoped to reach an agreement about how to deal with more than a dozen remaining amendments and vote to cut off debate on the bill Wednesday evening. With Republican leaders pledging to filibuster unless the line-item veto was considered, Senators were poised at press time to vote sometime after midnight on the procedural motion ending debate.

Democrats charged Republicans with grasping for a last-minute way to torpedo the ethics legislation.

"If it wasn't this amendment, they had any other number of poison pills designed to kill this bill," a senior Democratic Senate aide said.

On the floor, Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Republicans had read over the bill's provisions during their weekly policy luncheon Wednesday and gotten "indigestion."

But Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), one of the bill's floor managers, retorted that he had presented the ethics bill at the gathering and "there was no suggestion that we should try to take this bill down with a subterfuge."

At least one powerful Republican on Wednesday voiced discomfort with the scope of the bill. Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) said the reform drive had spun out of control.

"We're in total free fall. We're trying to react to press reports," he said. "I think that a lot of this is hypocritical ... We're making a lot of mistakes in this, in my opinion."

The House last year approved the line-item veto, but it stalled in the Senate, where it was packaged with a number of other budget reforms. Senate Democrats on Wednesday said the proposal raises Constitutional issues and is too complex to deal with quickly.

The standoff over the Gregg amendment marks the second time in as many weeks a partisan blow-up has stalled progress on the Senate ethics bill. Democrats have stressed the importance of bipartisan cooperation on the measure, but last week they tried to kill an amendment from Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) aimed at boosting transparency for earmarks. When that failed, they blocked an attempt to adopt the measure on a voice vote, as is common practice in such circumstances.

Democrats relented the next day, offering an amendment making some technical changes to DeMint's proposal and then getting behind it.

Meanwhile, Senate aides and outside budget hawks were struggling to understand how earmark reform provisions adopted earlier this week will be put into practice.

The measure now requires disclosure of earmarks at two points in the process: once those earmarks are adopted into a bill at the committee level, and again, 48 hours before the bill is brought to the floor. Adding to the confusion, more information is required at the committee stage than right before consideration by the full Senate.

Once a Senate panel decides to add an earmark to a bill, the committee is required to disclose the sponsoring lawmaker, the intended recipient, the earmark's purpose, and include a certification that it will not yield a financial benefit to the sponsor or that lawmaker's family. The bill requires that information be made available online in a searchable format.

But once the bill is poised for floor consideration, only a list of earmarks and their sponsors must accompany the bill in a separate report. A Senate aide said any hiccups between the two disclosure requirements likely would be ironed out as the measures are implemented. A single, searchable online database likely would be developed to handle the new disclosures, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118172

Steve Ellis, from the budget watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, called the new disclosure requirements "a good step forward."

"We're not going to let the perfect be the enemy of the good. There's going to be a lot of information in here for taxpayers to determine whether their tax dollars are being spent wisely," he said.

The flare-up over Gregg's line-item veto amendment capped a day that saw no progress on the ethics bill. Reid has been aiming to wrap work on the bill Friday, but Senators took no votes on amendments Wednesday and debated only portions of the bill.

A proposal by Bennett to strike new disclosure requirements for "Astroturf" lobbying campaigns sparked arguments across the aisle, with several Democrats rising to defend the provision, and Bennett and other Republicans calling it unnecessary and potentially ruinous for small groups looking to make their voices heard on Capitol Hill.

Reform groups are urging Senators to reject the Bennett amendment and approve a slate of addendums, including one from Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.) requiring lobbyists to disclose campaign checks they bundle; two more from Feingold banning lobbyists from sponsoring lavish parties honoring lawmakers at party conventions and expanding the scope of the revolving-door ban; and one from Reid tightening gift and travel bans and requiring lawmakers to pay charter rates for flights on corporate jets.

Emily Pierce contributed to this report.

Grass-roots Groups Qualify As Lobbyists Under Ethics Bill (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

The ethics bill before the Senate not only cracks down on lawmakers, but also subjects politically active ministers and neighborhood groups to the same rules as K Street lobbyists.

Under the legislation, grass-roots organizations that attempt to "influence the general public" to contact members of Congress would have to register as lobbyists and file financial reports -- or face a $200,000 fine. The requirements could apply to a preacher who goes on TV or radio and tells listeners to call their congressman in support of a particular issue, such as a constitutional amendment against homosexual "marriage."

But late last night, in the session's first display of the muscle that even a minority party has in the upper chamber, the entire ethics bill was jeopardized when Republicans blocked a procedural vote. Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, had refused to allow a vote on an amendment to give the president authority to strip spending "earmarks" from bills.

Republicans retaliated by voting in near-lockstep against a parliamentary motion needed to vote on the entire bill. The motion won a 51-46 majority, far short of the two-thirds majority needed. No action is now scheduled on the bill, though negotiations between the two parties continued into the night.

The vote capped a day of squabbling over the ethics bill, in which the Senate's Democratic leaders clashed repeatedly with Republicans on numerous details, starting with the measure to broaden the scope of lobbyist rules. Democratic backers of the measure say it will expose phony grass-roots organizations, sometimes called "astroturf," that front for monied special interests.

"The problem is these organizations have hired guns paid by undisclosed special interest organizations," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and chairman of the Rules and Administration Committee.

She said the proposal was "bona fide, helpful and overdue."

But issue groups spanning the political spectrum -- from National Right to Life and Focus on the Family to the League of Conservation Voters and the American Civil Liberties Union -- say the expanded definition of lobbyist will imperil citizens' constitutional rights to free speech and to petition the government.

"This bill goes way too far," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. "This gets at the citizen groups who are really the ones making their voices heard about our democracy."

An identical proposal has been introduced in the House.

The first Senate squabble stemmed from an amendment by Sen. Robert F. Bennett, Utah Republican, that would delete the provision on grass-roots lobbying.

DOJ_NMG_0118173

"This should be struck from the bill," Mr. Bennett said. "I was taught in civics in high school that [contacting Congress members] was what we were supposed to do."

The grass-roots provision would exempt unions and other organizations that attempt to influence only their members, shareholders and employees. It also would apply only to groups that collect or spend more than $25,000 in three months.

"I gather some groups are upset," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent who supports the bill. "But it is really aimed at attempts to influence Congress by these astroturf groups."

Mr. Lieberman said the $25,000 threshold would protect real grass-roots activists, an assertion that drew criticism from Jay Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice.

"Some of the big churches spend more than that in a week," said Mr. Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative constitutional-law group. "We have a constitution that gives us the free exercise of religion, and part of that is being able to address the moral and religious values of the day."

The late procedural block came over a proposal by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, to give the president the authority, with the approval of Congress, to eliminate individual spending items in broader-scope legislation.

"The new majority party has been very vocal about ... fiscal responsibility and spending restraint," Mr. Gregg said. "Yet it seems to be dragging its feet when it comes time to put those words into action."

Democrats refused to allow a vote, saying the amendment was not relevant to the ethics bill. After the Republican-backed procedural vote, Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said he hoped that "this is going to be just a bump in the road."

McCain Does About-face On Grassroots Reform Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 18, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has told conservative activists that he will vote to strip a key provision on grassroots lobbying from the reform package he previously supported.

The provision would require grassroots organizations to report on their fundraising activities and is strongly opposed by groups such as the National Right to Life Committee, Gun Owners of America, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

While grassroots groups on both sides of the political spectrum oppose the proposal, social conservative leaders such as Dr. James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, who broadcasts a radio program to hundreds of thousands of evangelical Christians, have been its most vehement critics.

McCain sponsored legislation last Congress that included an even broader requirement for grassroots lobbying coalitions to reveal their financial donors. But now he will vote to defeat a similar measure.

It would be politically dangerous for McCain to support disclosure because it would anger many conservative activists, including those who advocate against abortion rights or for gun ownership rights. He is courting many of them for his 2008 presidential campaign. McCain's presidential exploratory committee announced yesterday that Maxine Sieleman, a socially conservative leader who founded the Iowa chapter of Concerned Women for America, had joined its camp.

In letters circulated on Capitol Hill this week, the National Right to Life Committee and Gun Owners of America warned senators that votes on the grassroots lobbying provision would affect legislative scorecards they tabulate for each lawmaker.

Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) has sponsored the amendment to the lobbying reform package that would strip the provision. His amendment is expected to come to the floor for a vote today, said advocates opposing it.

Bennett said he was "a little" surprised to hear that McCain would support him but was "delighted." McCain is considered one of the most authoritative voices on ethics- and lobbying-related issues in the Senate.

"It's a very high priority," said Douglas Johnson, director of legislative affairs for the National Right to Life Committee. Johnson said ordinary grassroots activists from Arizona who had called McCain's office were told by aides that he would support Bennett's amendment.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, told The Hill that he had received confirmation from McCain's staff yesterday that he would oppose the disclosure proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0118174

"It's huge," Sekulow said of the issue's importance. "It's the most significant restriction on grassroots activity in recent history. I'd put it up there with the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act."

McCain was the chief sponsor of the landmark 2002 campaign finance bill, a history that still angers many conservatives. They cite McCain's sponsorship of that legislation as something that makes them wary about supporting his presidential bid. But McCain's recent action could redefine him.

"He'll do everything he can to appeal to conservatives he has already tried to silence," said John Velleco, director of federal affairs at Gun Owners of America, referring to McCain's support of campaign finance reform. "I think he's trying to gain the support of conservatives as much as he can."

"Romney's doing the same thing," Velleco added, explaining that McCain's rival for the nomination, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, is re-evaluating his past positions on gun ownership rights.

While McCain has privately told conservative groups that he will side with them, he was not ready to reveal his position yesterday. He opened yesterday's floor debate with a 15-minute speech on the lobbying reforms under consideration. While he urged his colleagues to support the creation of an office of public integrity, he made no mention of grassroots lobbying.

Immediately afterward he declined to state his position on grassroots disclosure.

"I'll address it when it comes up," he told The Hill.

But McCain's spokeswoman, Eileen McMenamin, confirmed that he would support the Bennett amendment.

"Initially when Sen. McCain introduced legislation last year it had a grassroots provision," she said. "Subsequent to that that he got a lot of feedback from groups that the requirements would be too onerous on them because of the reporting requirements."

McMenamin added that a grassroots lobbying disclosure requirement was not included in reform legislation McCain introduced at the beginning of this month.

Johnson, of the National Right to Life Committee, said that there is confusion about which groups would be affected by the pending regulation.

"Under Section 220, anyone who is paid anything by an organization that spends any money at all to encourage more than 500 members of the general public to communicate with members of Congress, if he or she also has contacted congressional offices directly as few as two times, and has spent as little as 20 percent of his or her time on such direct lobbying and grassroots-motivating activities, would be required to register with Congress as a 'lobbyist' and file detailed quarterly reports," wrote Johnson in a letter to Senate offices, adding, "If enacted, it will disrupt the constitutionally protected activities of thousands of issue-oriented citizen groups from coast to coast. …"

McCain's past allies in battles to reform government strongly support disclosure and were surprised to discover his position had changed.

"We saw him supporting it last year," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist for Public Citizen.

"It surprises me and it will surprise the rest of the reform community. I was really expecting him not to get involved in that provision and I had received no indication from his office that he was leaning against it."

Senate Democrats Fight Proposal To Ban Relatives Lobbying (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the Senate works on sweeping new ethics rules this week, Majority Leader Harry Reid and other leading Democrats are resisting changes that strike close to home.

A proposal by Sen. David Vitter, R-La., that would ban senators' spouses from lobbying the chamber has triggered intense debate with key senators such as Reid and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., promising to oppose it if it affects senators already married to lobbyists.

Reid, D-Nev., would support the ban "as along as it's not retroactive," his spokesman Jim Manley said Wednesday. Feinstein, who oversees the committee that governs Senate rules, also backs a provision that would exempt current senator-lobbyist couples.

DOJ_NMG_0118175

"No one has been able to produce a problem," related to the spousal lobbying, she said.

The bill failed to clear a legislative hurdle Wednesday when it did not get the 65 votes needed to advance it. Both Democrats and Republicans said they were negotiating to overcome the impasse.

It's hard to quantify how many members of Congress are related to lobbyists. Some prominent examples include Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and her husband, Bob, the former Senate Republican leader who lobbies on behalf of DP World. Reid's sons and son-in-law have worked as lobbyists.

Vitter said current congressional rules, which permit relatives of senators and House members to work as lobbyists, allow special interests "to write a big check straight into the bank account of a sitting senator."

His plan would exempt spouses who had been lobbyists for at least a year before their husbands or wives were elected to the Senate.

Vitter said that if Democrats move to more broadly exempt current lobbyists and senators from his proposal, it would send a "cynical" message: "Yeah, we're going to get serious about ethics as long as it doesn't affect our friends."

The Vitter proposal is one of two Republican plans targeting lawmakers whose relatives have ties to special interests. Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., wants to ban senators from inserting special projects, known as earmarks, in spending bills that financially benefit senators, their staffers or their relatives including spouses, children, stepchildren and in-laws.

"From an ethical standpoint, there's no way you should ever do an earmark that benefits you financially or someone who is close to you," Coburn said.

The GOP proposals go further than the current ethics package proposed by Senate Democrats, which would require lawmakers to publicly disclose the projects they insert in bills, now often done in secret. Ethics rules adopted by the House this month require lawmakers to disclose their special projects and declare in writing whether they or their spouses have financial stakes in the projects.

Neither House nor Senate Democrats have proposed ending lobbying by relatives.

A USA TODAY investigation in October of the ties between lobbyists and the lawmakers who make spending decisions in Congress found, in 2005 alone, $750 million in special projects pushed by lobbyists with relatives on committees that wrote the bills.

Asked about the prospects for the Republican proposals, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democratic leader, said, "I won't rule out other possibilities, but I will keep my focus on disclosure." He wants every earmark posted on the Internet 48 hours before senators vote on it.

Durbin's wife, Loretta, works as a lobbyist, but concentrates on state issues and is not registered to lobby on the federal level, he said. "She doesn't involve herself in any of the issues before Congress," he said.

Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., the top Republican on the Appropriations Committee, and other senators said they would support Coburn's plan. Manley said Reid is reviewing the proposal to see if whether it strengthens existing Senate rules.

Senate Debates Ethics Of Travel Perks (AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Being good sometimes comes with a cost.

Legislation moving through the Senate would end one of the most beloved benefits of Congress, being able to hitch rides on corporate jets at heavily subsidized rates. Instead, senators would be required to pay far more expensive charter rates for private air travel.

That would apply both to official business, when senators skip airport lines to use private planes for trips to their districts or tour areas in their states, and to political or fundraising trips. The latter would come out of a lawmaker's campaign funds.

The House has gone further, barring its members from using official or campaign funds to pay for noncommercial, corporate jets. Lawmakers trying to reach that remote village, disaster site or campaign stop will have to turn to charter plane services.

DOJ_NMG_0118176

The new travel rules are part of ethics and lobbying changes that Democrats, who campaigned on a promise of ending the "culture of corruption" in Washington, have made their first order of business after taking over control of Congress. The legislation would also bar lobbyists from paying for, or participating in, privately funded trips for lawmakers.

The change, when enacted, will be particularly painful for senators from large western states who depend on private aircraft to get them to areas inaccessible by road or commercial flights.

"I've used these airplanes a lot," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, sponsor of language that would require senators to pay charter rates for private travel rather than the current practice of reimbursing the plane owners with the equivalent of a first-class ticket.

He emphasized that never had a jet owner asked for a legislative favor in exchange for a ride. But in an age when the integrity of Congress is being questioned, "I've come to the realization that this practice presents a major perception problem" and lawmakers must pay the full charter rate, he said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said the travel rules were now a "huge loophole in the current gift rules." The average American, he said, "would love to fly around the country on very comfortable corporate-owned aircraft and only be charged the cost of a first-class ticket. It is a pretty good deal we have got going here."

It's also been a well-used perk. PoliticalMoneyLine, which tracks congressional spending, said nine members of Congress spent more than $50,000 in campaign funds in 2006 to pay for the use of corporate jets. Leading the list was Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., who paid $165,724 to catch rides with corporate giants such as BellSouth Corp. and Federal Express Corp.

But Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, disputed "these images of fat-cat legislators sitting in cushy corporate aircraft."

She said that in Alaska, where 80 percent of towns and villages cannot be accessed by road, lawmakers trying to meet constituents have no choice but to catch rides on turboprops, seaplanes and other small private craft. "My options are so severely limited by this" new rule, she said, "that I don't know how I would operate."

She said she would have to pay some $15,000 for the full cost of a charter flight from Anchorage to the Aleutian Islands. A commercial flight to the Aleutian fishing town of Dutch Harbor, if available, costs $890 roundtrip.

"The taxpayer will foot the bill for the amendment, and the only real change will be more money in the pockets of those who own and operate the private planes," said Alaska's senior senator, Republican Ted Stevens.

If passed, he said, "my budget will run out in the first month or two of the calendar year. It would not permit us to travel to these remote communities throughout the year."

Stevens tried to carve out an exception for cases when there is no more than one daily flight between communities within a member's state and there was no conflict of interest involved. But he withdrew that proposal after Reid gave assurances that the government would pay the extra air travel costs.

The new restrictions also hit a snag in the House when Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., a private pilot, wrote the House ethics committee complaining that the new House rules could be construed as banning private pilots from flying on the job. "This rule has an additional flaw in that it offers no exception for members using their personal funds for flying aircraft they personally own," he said.

John Santore, spokesman for Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, chair of the House Rules Committee, said the intention of the rule was clear, to prevent corporations and lobbyists from buying access to members of Congress and not to keep private pilots out of the cockpit.

In the Senate, Sen. Jim Inhofe, R-Okla., a pilot with a half-century of experience, succeeded in revising the provision to exempt private pilots.

___

The Senate bill is S.1.

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Earmark Victory (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0118177

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

If Republicans are wondering how best to shorten their time in the minority, they could do worse than to build on this week's Senate earmark victory. That reform success proves how good policy translates into good politics.

The Senate on Tuesday passed significant earmark reform, 98-0. But that unanimous tally masks the bitter battle that preceded the vote. When Republican freshmen Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint first launched an effort last summer to make earmarks more transparent, they struggled. Republicans had to be dragged into even minimal reform, and among their first acts after losing the election was to attempt to slip thousands more earmarks into their lame-duck spending bills.

Still, minority status has a way of focusing the mind, and combined with continued DeMint-Coburn shaming, Senate Republicans appear to have re-embraced some principles. When Majority Leader Harry Reid last week attempted to water down House Democrats' earmark reform, Messrs. Coburn and DeMint rallied enough fellow Republicans (and a few Democrats) to outmaneuver the spenders. Red-faced at getting caught trying to submarine their own party's plan for reform, Senate Democrats did an about-face and jumped on the earmark-reform bandwagon.

The result was a mini-competition as to which side of the aisle was tougher on earmarks, and a final bill that goes beyond even the House reform. Senator DeMint passed (98-0) an amendment that broadens the definition of an earmark; even those slipped into last-minute conference reports will have to be disclosed. Under the original Senate legislation, 95% of earmarks would have escaped scrutiny.

More amazing was Democrats' new enthusiasm for oversight. Illinois Democrat Dick Durbin -- who started off trying to tank Mr. DeMint's reform -- finished by passing an amendment (also 98-0) that requires lawmakers to post their earmark requests on the Internet 48 hours before a vote. (The House version of the bill simply requires a public disclosure form.) California Democrat Dianne Feinstein also joined in, passing by voice vote a provision that would bar lawmakers from including earmarks in the classified parts of a bill or a conference report unless they also included language in unclassified terms describing the project, funding levels and sponsor. Classified reports were among the ways that former Rep. Duke Cunningham -- now in federal prison -- hid his earmark payoffs.

None of this is to suggest earmarks will disappear in Washington. The real test will be whether lawmakers can restrain themselves from inserting pork-barrel projects. The news isn't encouraging. We hear federal agency telephones have been ringing off the hook, as Congressmen use back-channels to secure earmarks that they'd rather not appear in public.

Still, the reform is a good start. Republicans made headlines with their demands last week, and the news stories were a welcome change for a public appalled by Congress's spend-happy ways. If conservatives had shown this sort of commitment to their small-government ideals back when it mattered, they might still be in the majority.

5 Down, 1 To Go On Dems' House Agenda (AP)

By Kasie Hunt, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Five down, one more on tap as House Democrats sprint through their list of promises, not even in sight of the 100 hours set aside for that goal.

About seven more hours ticked away Wednesday on House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for passing each item on an agenda that Democrats told voters they would enact after sweeping to victory in November.

The final piece was on deck for a vote Thursday: energy legislation that imposes billions in fees, taxes and royalties on oil and gas companies and uses the money to promote renewable fuels.

According to Pelosi's count, it has taken just over 34 hours to pass the first five bills, including a measure approved Wednesday to lower interest rates on some student loans.

The House actually has been in session for more than 72 hours since the 110th Congress was sworn in on Jan. 4. But the clock on Pelosi's Web site suggested that 34 hours, 5 minutes had elapsed by the close of House business Wednesday.

The San Francisco Democrat's clock only tracks hours spent on legislation.

The items passed so far would:

_make the government negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices. It passed last Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0118178

_expand federally funded stem cell research. It passed Jan. 11.

_raise the federal minimum wage. It passed Jan. 10.

_seek to bolster terrorism-fighting efforts. It passed Jan. 9.

_change rules governing ethics, lobbying and the budget. These changes were passed on Jan. 4-5.

Democrats' Rift Stalls Legislation (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

House Democrats are proudly trumpeting the conclusion today of their initial spurt of legislative items, but few -- if any -- are likely to become law as passed.

Of the six items they promised to approve in the first "100 hours" of a new Democratic Congress, three have met resistance from the Democratic Senate, at least one appears likely to be vetoed by President Bush and two others have come under heavy criticism from outside groups.

Yesterday, Senate Democrats attached tax cuts to the bill raising the minimum wage, a condition House Democrats have called unacceptable.

"Republicans were insistent that if the minimum wage were to be increased -- since the bulk of its financial impact falls disproportionately on small businesses -- that we needed to do everything we could to enable small businesses to continue to create jobs, continue to grow, be economically viable so that they could afford to pay this increased minimum wage," Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said yesterday of the tax cuts that were written into the bill in the Finance Committee.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said yesterday he is disappointed by the Senate's action.

"The choice to tie a bill raising the minimum wage to tax breaks for businesses will cost taxpayers $8 billion and complicate and delay the passage of an increase," he said. "Passing a clean minimum-wage bill is a matter of doing what is right and what is fair."

On the promise to "fully implement" all the recommendations of the September 11 commission, Democrats declined to include several provisions -- such as placing all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department. And the House provision that distributes anti-terror funding based on risk so that major cities such as New York and Los Angeles get the bulk of it also likely will be changed by the Senate, where small and rural states have greater sway.

On lobbying reform, Senate Democrats already are working on a decidedly different bill than the one passed by House Democrats, which means the differences still must be hammered out.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, even argued for keeping one provision out of the Senate bill because it mirrored the House lobbying bill.

"This is exactly like the House provision," he said on the Senate floor last week. "That's one of the problems I have. I frankly don't think that they spent the time on this that we have."

Asked yesterday if he is concerned about throwing cold water on the House Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda, Mr. Reid said that for 220 years Congress has been two chambers "and we can't send anything to the president until we both agree on it."

He also applauded the House's efforts, however.

"I think the House has done remarkably good work. I think that they have brought to the attention of the American people some things that had been lacking for the last six years, at least," he said.

The remaining items also have an uncertain future. Mr. Bush is expected to veto legislation approved last week to expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, as he did last year.

The White House has sent similar signals that it disapproves of the bill approved yesterday to reduce interest rates on student loans through taxpayer subsidies. Instead, administration officials say, such legislation should focus on getting more students into college by making it more affordable.

And last week's legislation requiring the federal government to negotiate drug prices has been criticized by veterans groups, disease advocacy groups and even liberal editorial pages such as that of The Washington Post.

Happy Hours (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0118179

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

SOMETHING odd happened on Capitol Hill this week. Something that seemed to start out as a publicity stunt — the House Democratic leadership's 100-hour agenda — actually turned into a ...qualified success.

The passage of the Democrats' eight-part legislative package — to be completed today — sets the stage for striking possibilities, some advantageous to the party, others threatening.

In the short term, the leadership has achieved two goals:

First, Democrats have shown basic competence and authority after four decades of defeat and division, whether in the majority or minority.

Second, the House has now approved legislation directly addressing public concerns: raising the minimum wage, ethics reform, interest rate reductions on subsidized college loans and expanded federal support for stem cell research. It has put in place rule changes to promote fiscal responsibility and adopted recommendations from the 9/11 commission. Today, the House is expected to repeal tax breaks for oil companies. Poll-tested and guaranteed to be political winners, these achievements constitute a modest start toward a saleable centrist agenda for a party too often in the past labeled as extreme.

More important in terms of substantive future legislation, the ability of the Democrats to win over significant numbers of Republicans on most votes signals the slim but enticing possibility of Democratic mastery over a demoralized Republican Party — one that has thrived on polarized partisan warfare in recent years.

If the new bipartisanship takes root, the prospects for health care legislation and immigration reform sharply improve. These proposals cannot survive without backing from both Democrats and Republicans. When it comes to health care, a key corporate lobby, the Business Roundtable, has already formed a tentative alliance with organized labor, thereby giving cover to wavering members of Congress from both ends of the political spectrum. A parallel alliance among business, Roman Catholic Church leaders and progressive organizations like the National Council of La Raza has already formed in support of immigration legislation.

Similarly, Republican willingness to cross the aisle strengthens the hand of those who want to build Congressional opposition to the Iraq war. Every Republican who joins the opposition makes it easier for Democrats in red states and districts to become public critics of the war, and for more Republicans to join with them. (Witness the suddenly outspoken Senator Gordon Smith of Oregon.) Without some measure of Republican support, Democrats who challenge the war — particularly those who vote to deny appropriations — run the risk of being portrayed as unpatriotic and unwilling to support American troops in the midst of battle.

The potential for Republican defection is a new thing. Conservatives have long recognized — and worked hard to prevent — the danger of a breakdown in party discipline. In 1993, William Kristol, then chairman of the Project for the Republican Future, orchestrated the defeat of the Clintons' health care plan. In an influential memo, Mr. Kristol wrote: "Any Republican urge to negotiate a 'least bad' compromise with the Democrats, and thereby gain momentary public credit for helping the president 'do something' about health care, should also be resisted. ...The plan should not be amended; it should be erased." Judging from the early days of this Congress, however, Republican solidarity has begun to erode.

On another front, the restoration of Congressional bipartisanship may well have unintended consequences. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has based his presidential campaign on a dysfunctional political system: "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions," he told supporters this week.

Insofar as Congress regains efficacy, a compelling rationale of the Obama campaign is undermined. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has cast herself as working effectively within the system, can only benefit when the system appears to be functional. A functional Congress also potentially diminishes the taint of Washington tenure for candidates like Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

While there are upsides to the early success of House Democrats, they are by no means home free. Many Republicans see Democrats undermining themselves with the adoption of pay-as-you-go budget rules, which require new expenditures to be accompanied by equivalent spending reductions or tax hikes. At some point, Republicans argue, Democrats will be forced to make unwelcome cuts, raise taxes, or go back on their word. With these rules, argues Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, Democrats have set the stage to once again become the "tax and spend" party.

DOJ_NMG_0118180

Mr. Norquist may have a point. A yet-to-be-released post-election poll of 36,000 respondents by the Cooperative Congressional Election Survey showed virtually no public support for a tax increase. Asked to pick alternative ways to reduce the deficit, 49 percent said they would cut domestic spending, 32 percent said they would cut defense spending and only 15 percent said they would raise taxes. For freshman Democrats who won seats in centrist states like Indiana and Kansas, support for a tax increase would probably be political suicide.

Many Democrats acknowledge that the pressure to raise taxes will intensify, especially if expensive health care programs make it onto the agenda. Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, asked about taxes on "Face the Nation," said that any tax increase would be limited to the wealthy. Taking back "tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money — $500,000 a year — might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children," she said. "We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year ... It's an option, it's not a first resort."

The Democratic Party is walking a tightrope. Arguably, the party had the last election handed to it on a plate — war, corruption, pederasty — what more could one ask for? In addition, voter repudiation of the president's strategy in the Middle East does not mean Americans trust Democrats on national security.

There are plenty of other reasons to be skeptical of continued Democratic success. Middle-class anxiety about jobs, retirement and health care are in fact scarcely touched by the 100 hours. Race and ethnic prejudice have not evaporated. And George Bush won't be here to kick around forever.

Still, the first days of this new Democratic-led Congress turned out better than anyone might have expected. Given the party's recent Congressional history, any success is notable — even if it's only 100 hours long.

House Votes To Reduce Rates On Student Loans (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The House overwhelmingly approved a bill yesterday that is designed to cut interest rates on college loans, creating a plan that potentially could save students $2,300 over the course of a loan. But the reduction in rates would be phased in and would not take full effect until 2011, when the legislation would automatically expire unless renewed by Congress.

By a vote of 356 to 71, House Democrats checked off another priority item from their fall campaign as part of a 100-hour march to pass legislative priorities by the close of business this week.

However, even the staunchest supporters of the provision -- which would drop the rate paid on federally subsidized student loans from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent over five years -- acknowledged that the action was only a small piece of what House Democrats hope to do to reduce the cost of higher education.

"This is a down payment," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

The Democrats broke into loud applause when the final gavel came down on the vote, the fifth of their "Six for '06" agenda items to pass since the party took over the chamber earlier this month.

But the bill marks an early instance of conflict between two Democratic campaign promises: The interest-rate-reduction measure runs up against a pledge to install strict spending limits known as pay-as-you-go, or pay-go, creating a budgetary restriction on how far the newly empowered caucus can go in keeping its word.

The plan, which won the backing of 124 Republicans, would cost $6 billion over five years, according to congressional estimates. But the reduction would sunset after five years, cutting in half the benefits for borrowers. According to Democratic estimates, the plan could nearly double the $2,300 in savings for borrowers if the rate were left at 3.4 percent into the future.

But a permanent cut of the interest payments would cost billions of dollars more, and Democrats would have had to come up with savings in their spending plans under the newly installed pay-go rules.

However, Democrats are hopeful that, if enacted, the lower interest rates would prove popular and would be extended before 2011.

DOJ_NMG_0118181

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (Calif.), the ranking Republican on the House Education and Labor Committee, called the plan "flawed legislation" and tried to offer an alternative that would limit the reduced interest rates to college graduates who make $65,000 or less, as well as to active-duty military personnel.

However, as has been the case throughout the 100-hour program, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) closed off the minority's ability to offer its alternative, prompting McKeon to complain that the bill's process was "badly flawed."

Republicans said that a college student taking out a loan in the fall of 2011 would save just $7 a month under the plan.

Miller rejected the premise of limiting the reduced rates to borrowers with a $65,000 annual salary, contending that a married couple who serve as public school teachers would probably not qualify and would have to pay the higher rate.

Democrats would pay for the plan by cutting subsidies provided to banks and lenders. Without those subsidies, the lending industry asserts that costs will be passed on to borrowers in the form of higher fees and poorer service.

"They will all have to figure out how to make up for the lost revenues," said Harrison Wadsworth, special counsel to the Consumer Bankers Association. "It costs money to provide good service."

The lending industry is hoping that its allies in the Senate, where the Democratic margin is narrow, would obtain more accommodations to soften the financial blow to lenders. Wadsworth said his association came out against the plan only after Democrats detailed how it would be paid for, calling it "piling on" to cut $6 billion in subsidies.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, supports the reduction in interest rates but plans to consider it as part of a broader package of bills to deal with the soaring costs of higher education. In February, Kennedy's committee is expected to take up a plan that will include the reduced interest rates, as well as increasing the Pell grant from $4,050 to $5,100 and limiting student loan payments to 15 percent of a borrower's annual income.

Miller supports those provisions and hopes to bring them up in his panel later this year, but he added that yesterday's action was important legislatively and symbolically because it was a key plank of last fall's Democratic electoral agenda.

"That's what we said we were going to do. That's what this 100 hours is about," he said.

House Approves Cuts In Cost Of Student Loans (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House of Representatives passed a bill yesterday that would lower interest rates for many student-loan holders.

The rate cuts -- which would be paid for by cutting government payments to banks and other student-loan firms, and raising their fees -- are one of a number of changes House Democrats heralded in last year's campaign and promised to pass within the first 100 hours of the congressional session.

Democrats, who had talked about halving interest rates on student loans before the election, have narrowed their focus to just a segment of the federal Stafford loan program. Aides say they plan on examining broader college affordability measures later, such as raising the maximum amount needy students can receive from the federal Pell Grant program.

The legislation, approved 356-71, applies only to new, undergraduate borrowers of "subsidized" Stafford loans, which are available to needier students. The cuts would phase in over five years, starting July 1. If the legislation is enacted, a four-year undergraduate who starts to take out subsidized loans next fall would save roughly $1,000 in interest payments on total debt of $10,000 over a 10-year repayment term, according to Mark Kantrowitz, publisher of FinAid.org.

In the subsidized program, the government pays the interest while the student is in school. Less needy students still can qualify for an "unsubsidized" Stafford loan, but they are responsible for the interest that accumulates while they are in school.

The Stafford loan program is the government's biggest student-loan program, with more than six million undergraduates borrowing nearly $37 billion in the 2005-06 academic year. More than half of those received subsidized loans, according to data from the College Board.

Half of subsidized Stafford loan borrowers have family incomes of $26,000 to $68,000, according to congressional staffers. In 2003-04, the median income for families of borrowers was $45,000.

DOJ_NMG_0118182

The cuts would cost about $7 billion over six fiscal years, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Representatives of the student-loan industry, which stands to bear the brunt of the cuts' costs, argue the interest-rate cuts could lead them to cut back on customer service, such as 24-hour hot lines, and discounts for on-time payments.

Some higher-education lobbyists already are questioning the Democrats' focus on relieving student debt, when they would prefer to make outright grants to needy students. The annual limit that Pell Grant recipients can receive has been stuck at $4,050 for four years, even as college costs have risen far faster than the rate of inflation. (Democrats say they want to lift that limit to $5,100.)

It is unclear how the proposal will fare in the Senate, and there is always the specter of a presidential veto: The White House released a statement this week saying it opposes the legislation. Instead, it favors increasing grants to low-income students.

Write to Anne Marie Chaker at anne-marie.chaker@wsj.com1

House Cuts Interest Rate For Some College Loans (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — House Democrats on Wednesday pushed through legislation cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized loans to college students, drawing on large bipartisan support despite opposition by the White House.

The bill's easy passage — by 356 to 71, with 124 Republicans joining Democrats to support it — underscored the broad appeal of college affordability as an issue. And it was another step in the Democrats' drive to pass key bills in their early days in control of the House.

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, who sponsored the bill, said it illustrated his party's commitment to strengthening the middle class. "With this vote, the House took the first step towards guaranteeing that every student who is qualified to go to college will be able to afford to go," he said.

Representative Roscoe G. Bartlett, Republican of Maryland, said he could not fathom why his party's leaders opposed the bill.

"I just think that we need more of our kids going to school," Mr. Bartlett said, after casting his vote. "This is one of the better places to invest money, and as long as we're taking people's money, we should put it back where it's needed."

The measure, which will halve the interest rate over the next five years, is estimated to cost $6 billion, which would be financed by increasing fees that lenders pay to the government and by reducing the 30 or so largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits on student loans.

In a statement opposing the bill issued on Wednesday morning, well before the vote, the White House said the measure did nothing to improve access to college, because it only helped ease the burden of repayment for graduates. Instead, the White House called for increased grant aid to lower-income students.

The White House statement also said access to higher education should be improved by containing costs. The responsibility for helping families, the statement said, "must be shared with colleges, which also have a central role in making higher education affordable."

The White House did not threaten a veto, but the size of Wednesday's majority indicated that Democrats would have the strength to override one.

The afternoon's debate gave little hint of the broad bipartisan support the measure would garner. Republicans derided the bill as a gimmick — "bait and switch," in the words of Representative Tom Price of Georgia, who said it would take full effect only five years from now, and then for only six months, barring further Congressional action.

But ultimately the issue's appeal for many Republicans was too strong. Representative Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, voted for the bill, describing it as "a step towards assisting college students pay for the soaring costs of higher education." Mr. Castle added, however, that the bill "barely skims the surface of the true problem of how we can help increase access and affordability for all students."

DOJ_NMG_0118183

The bill comes as tuition increases at public and private institutions routinely outpace inflation, putting college out of reach for many students, and increasing the debt they carry upon graduation. The average student graduates college carrying more than $18,000 in debt.

"No one wants to be on the receiving end of a campaign ad attacking an incumbent for siding with bank lenders over middle-class voters," said Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

According to the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, the bill would save the average student who starts college next year about $2,300 in interest payments over the life of a 15-year loan.

Representative Tom Latham, Republican of Iowa, also voted for the interest cuts. "The savings students will receive is commendable," he said, "and deserves our support."

A similar bill in the Senate, sponsored by Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the education committee, would also reduce the interest rates on student loans, along with making a raft of other changes. His bill would also increase the maximum Pell grant to $5,100.

Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the education committee's ranking Republican, contended that the House measure would only make repayment terms easier for graduates, whose expected lifetime earnings top $1 million.

The bill cuts the interest rate on subsidized Stafford loans to 3.4 percent from the current rate of 6.8 percent in stages over five years, beginning with loans taken after July 1. To make the bill affordable, the full benefit of the loan's promise of 3.4 percent interest rates applies only to loans made after July 1, 2012, and expires by the end of that year. The subsidized Stafford loans are also open to middle income families.

The student loan industry lobbied against the bill, but appeared resigned to its passage in the House. The Consumer Bankers Association said some lawmakers saw the student lending program as "a bottomless pit of budget savings that can be drawn on repeatedly to fund changes to student aid programs."

House Passes Student-loan Interest Bill (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — With fanfare and substantial bipartisan support, the House delivered Wednesday on the fifth of six bills that Democrats had vowed to quickly pass, voting overwhelmingly to cut the interest rate on some college student loans.

The bill, however, was much scaled back from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's campaign promise to cut all student loans in half.

Instead, the House measure, passed 356 to 71, applies to the 5.5 million subsidized Stafford loans given each year to students whose families earn $26,000 to $68,000 annually, but would not increase Pell Grants or student tax credits, as originally considered. The bill also sets a five-year phase-in of the interest rate reduction from 6.8% to 3.4%, but then, after six months at 3.4%, returns the rate to the original percentage.

House Democrats called it a "first step" on delivering some relief to students and their parents as college costs have skyrocketed 41% in public universities and 17% in private ones, and as college debt has doubled between 1993 and 2004, according to the independent U.S. Public Interest Research Group.

"This is only the beginning," said Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. "This is a down payment."

The bill faces an uncertain future. In the Senate, education panel Chairman Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) is considering a broader bill that would increase grants and tax credits as well.

And the Bush administration questioned the wisdom of encouraging more loans rather than grants. "Student debt loads have soared in recent years, and it is not clear that encouraging more loans is a wise course. Instead, the administration would support efforts to direct savings to additional grant support for low-income students," said a statement issued by the Office of Management and Budget.

DOJ_NMG_0118184

House Democrats, eager to keep their pledge to voters to pass long-stalled measures in their first 100 legislative hours, have sailed through four other bills: implementation of the Sept. 11 commission recommendations, an increase in the federal minimum wage, support for embryonic stem cell research and a plan to lower Medicare's prescription drug prices.

Today, the House is expected to finish its juggernaut with a bill that would raise $14 billion over 10 years by rolling back tax credits and other breaks for oil companies.

"Last year, we said we were going to take America in a new direction," Miller said at a news conference with education leaders and students before the debate. "By voting to cut student loan interest rates in half, we are showing we meant it."

But the student loan bill required some deft maneuvering. Miller laid aside the original plan, which would have cost an estimated $45 billion, in favor of the slimmed-down and phased-in approach, whose $5.8-billion cost would be offset by cutting payments to lenders and guarantee agents.

Miller pledged that later in this congressional session, Democrats would find ways to increase Pell Grants, to make tax credits easier to understand, and to press colleges and universities to "do their part" in holding down costs.

Critics said the measure was the first casualty of the Democrats' "pay-as-you-go" rule, which requires House members to find ways to offset spending increases.

"This is nothing but a sham," said Rep. Virginia Foxx (R-N.C.), a former college administrator who said she took seven years to work her way through college. "They're not keeping their promises. All they are doing is inviting colleges to increase tuition and fees. It's very cynical."

Democrats said their party's House leaders had shown more fiscal responsibility than their predecessors. "Unlike the huge tax breaks for the energy industry at a time when they receive the most profit in their history, this bill doesn't add to the deficit," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews (D-N.J.). "This bill is paid for."

Almost everyone who spoke during the three hours of debate agreed that skyrocketing college costs risked burdening a generation of students and their parents with debt, and that universities needed to do more to hold down costs.

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (R-Santa Clarita), who managed the bill for Republicans, cited extravagant spending by colleges and universities, such as the University of Houston, to put hot tubs and other amenities in student centers.

The floor debate seemed, by Washington standards, civil, even amusing. At one point, McKeon offered three minutes to a colleague to speak on the bill and then turned to introduce him, saying, "My good friend from … Where is my good friend from?" (His good friend is from Mississippi.)

But the partisan divide showed itself clearly across the aisle. Democrats charged that Republicans during their 12 years in power had "raided" student loans for $12 billion. Republicans replied that they cut lending fees and put some of the $12 billion in savings into Pell Grants.

Republicans alleged that Democrats were rushing to the floor — without benefit of vetting by committees — a bill that would give them a "Pyrrhic victory" during the 110th Congress' first 100 hours, but do little to lower college costs. Democrats replied that they hoped to extend the lower loan rate beyond the five-year window in subsequent legislation.

Democrats chided the GOP for funding the Iraq war instead of investing in education. "It's a shame, a disgrace that this country is willing to spend billions to fight a war in Iraq we know is a mistake while the doors of our colleges are closed to too many of our young people," said Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.).

Lenders bemoaned the Democrats' tactic of paying for the bill by passing the increased costs to them. "A strategy of raiding a financial aid program to fund modest proposals is inadequate to the challenge; it is neither a bold nor bipartisan solution to making college affordable for every American," said Kevin Bruns, executive director of America's Student Loan Providers.

But education advocates were jubilant. "Twelve months ago, Congress was putting the finishing touches on a $12-billion cut to student loan programs," said Luke Swarthout, the Public Interest Research Group's higher-education lobbyist. "Now we're talking about real policy to make college more affordable for millions of students. This is the right conversation to be having."

*

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

House Dems Target Special Breaks For Big Oil Thursday (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — After taking on the restaurant, drug and banking industries, House Democrats top off their first 100 hours of majority status Thursday with a swipe at Big Oil.

Their legislation would roll back tax breaks and rewrite drilling leases given to oil and gas companies during the last 12 years of Republican rule. Less clear is where the estimated $14 billion over 10 years would go; the bill creates a fund for alternative forms of energy but leaves out specifics.

"This is not the solution to the problem of global warming or the price of gasoline," says Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash.

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., says it's an effort to show that "mature industries do not need government handouts."

The Senate will take longer to pass legislation. Democrats in both houses say they want to go further toward eliminating subsidies and investing in alternative fuels. A memo sent by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., to Democratic senators Wednesday says the United States should "lead the world in combating global warming and enact a mandatory program to reduce greenhouse gas emissions."

President Bush has called for reducing the nation's dependence on foreign oil in each of his six State of the Union addresses and is expected to do so again next week. A policy statement issued by the White House on Wednesday said the administration opposes the major provisions of the House bill, which could require that new fees be imposed on oil and gas companies. It also criticized Democrats' "tax and spend" use of the revenue to promote alternative forms of energy.

Ever since gas topped $3 a gallon this summer and ExxonMobil reported record quarterly profits in October, attacking oil companies has had populist appeal — particularly for Democrats, who receive far less in campaign contributions from the oil and gas industry. The industry helped Bush and Vice President Cheney, both former oil men, win election in 2000 and 2004, and gave five times more to Republican candidates in 2006.

But with oil imports continuing to rise, the industry's influence has been weakened. Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., lead sponsor of the House bill, said today's vote will be bipartisan.

"We will transition to alternative energy. Geology will ensure it," Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, R-Md., a co-sponsor, said Wednesday.

House Democrats' energy bill follows passage of three other measures opposed by business groups. Restaurateurs and other small businesses criticized a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage. Pharmaceutical companies lobbied against requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices. And banks opposed Wednesday's vote to cut interest rates on some student loans.

The energy bill sets up a fund for renewable fuels but doesn't choose winners and losers among solar, wind, hydrogen and other types of energy. That leads some analysts to predict political hijinks. "When you get a pot of money in this town, you've got to be very careful with it," says John Felmy, chief economist for the American Petroleum Institute, which says the measure could raise consumers' prices or reduce investors' earnings.

Others with ties to the oil industry say the Democrats' agenda is flawed. "Our energy sector is going to become dumbed down," says Tom Tanton, vice president of the Houston-based Institute for Energy Research. "We're increasingly rewarding the failing technologies."

Democrats plan to go much further toward rewriting U.S. energy policy in this Congress, with initiatives to increase automobile fuel efficiency and new technologies, cut carbon dioxide and greenhouse gas emissions, fully fund low-income energy assistance programs and eliminate other tax subsidies.

"I see this as opening the door widely so that we'll be able to advance other, more comprehensive pieces of energy legislation," says Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y.

Democrats Say House Energy Bill Will Pass (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118186

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — House Democrats, brushing aside objections from the Bush administration, said on Wednesday that they had ample votes to pass a bill on Thursday that would eliminate $14 billion in subsidies and tax breaks for oil companies and channel the money to renewable-energy projects.

In a sign of how political sentiment on energy issues has shifted, lawmakers in both parties expect the bill to draw considerable support from Republicans, many of whom voted in favor of the tax breaks three years ago.

On Wednesday, the White House said it "strongly opposes" several provisions in the bill but only hinted at a possible veto if the bill increased overall government spending in 2007 above limits that Mr. Bush set last year.

Few lawmakers expect Mr. Bush to resort to a veto, if only because the energy bill would lead to a tiny increase in revenue in its first year.

Much of the criticism involves two provisions, one that would repeal a major tax break for oil and gas drillers and a second that would pressure oil companies to renegotiate certain offshore leases. The leases allow them to avoid billions of dollars in royalties on oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters in the Gulf of Mexico.

In a statement of the administration's position, the White House said the bill would unfairly single out the oil industry by making it ineligible for a tax break offered to "domestic manufacturers." The tax break was created in 2004, mainly to compensate manufacturing companies that had been forced to give up a separate tax break for exporters. Oil companies had never qualified for the export tax break, but were included in the definition of "domestic manufacturing."

The administration also reiterated its opposition to a provision that would pressure oil companies to renegotiate the offshore drilling leases.

The bill, which would also repeal several smaller royalty incentives that Congress passed in 2005, would raise about $6.3 billion over 10 years in additional royalties from oil and gas companies. The provisions that repeal several tax breaks would raise about $7.6 billion over the same period.

In its statement, the administration said it agreed that drilling companies had no need for federal incentives. But it opposed what it said was an effort to force companies into renegotiating contracts that the government had signed.

The measure would pressure companies to renegotiate leases they signed with the federal government in 1998 and 1999, when the Interior Department inadvertently allowed them lucrative royalty incentives regardless of how high oil and gas prices might climb.

The measure would punish companies that refuse to accept "price thresholds" — clauses that were included in leases for other years that eliminated the royalty incentives if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Companies that refuse to change their leases would be required to either pay a "conservation fee" of $9 for each barrel of oil they produce on the leases or give up their right to acquire any additional leases.

The oil industry has criticized the proposals, saying they signed the leases in good faith and should not be forced to change them because the government made a mistake.

The Bush administration has echoed those concerns, saying that the leasing errors occurred during the Clinton administration and that it is trying to persuade companies to make voluntary changes. So far, five companies that own about 20 percent of the leases have agreed to alterations. But many of the biggest players in the gulf, including Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have refused.

Senate Democrats are expected to support the royalty provisions of the House bill. On Wednesday, Senate Democrats on the Joint Economic Committee argued that the government spends billions of dollars on royalty incentives for offshore drillers yet gets little in the way of increased production.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, said he would seek the elimination of all royalty incentive programs.

US House Takes On Big Oil (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

A Bill To Be Voted On Thursday Would Cut Federal Benefits By A Third And Give Them To Renewable-energy Programs.

DOJ_NMG_0118187

The House of Representatives is poised Thursday to play Robin Hood with energy policy.

It aims to cut $14 billion in federal oil and gas tax breaks and other benefits over the next 10 years and give them instead to renewable-energy programs.

Such a change would represent a noticeable trim in government support for the oil and gas industry at a time when it is trying to boost domestic production. It would provide a huge boost to renewable energy industries as they try to replace fossil fuels with cleaner energy that's also domestically produced.

Nevertheless, the proposed cuts go only so far. Even if the House's new clean-energy legislation becomes law, the oil and gas industry will remain by far the largest recipient of federal energy largesse, receiving by some estimates four times the money of the next largest recipient: the nuclear industry.

That prospect has many renewable-energy advocates and budget hawks pushing for more cuts even as conventional-energy experts warn of the fallout from the current round of proposed rollbacks.

"What the Democrats have cut is a big number," says Steve Ellis, a spokesman for Taxpayers for Common Sense, a Washington watchdog group. But "if you look at the whole universe of federal oil and gas breaks, it's a much larger number than this legislation cuts."

"If Congress imposes these additional costs on the companies, it just makes them more likely to look overseas," responds Mark Kibbe, senior tax-policy analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, a lobbying arm of the oil industry in Washington. "If you make these changes, you decrease US production, US jobs, and increase US reliance on imported oil."

Congress envisions slashing $14 billion – an average of $1.4 billion a year – over the next 10 years. This includes cutting $7.7 billion in tax incentives and toughening royalty-payment rules to bring in $6.3 billion that otherwise would flow to oil and gas companies.

The proposed cuts, when adjusted for inflation, would total per year roughly a third of the $3.6 billion in tax incentives the oil and gas industry got in 2005, the Government Accountability Office reported in September.

Left untouched would be one of the industry's most important federal tax breaks – the oil and gas percentage depletion allowance, created in 1916. Between 2006 and 2010 that break will cost taxpayers nearly $1 billion a year by allowing smaller, independent oil companies to deduct 15 percent of sales revenue to reflect the declining value of their investment, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation (JCT), which reports to Congress on the costs of federal tax legislation.

Another surviving tax break permits big oil companies to immediately deduct 70 percent of their "intangible drilling costs," such as the cost of wages, supplies, and site preparation. Smaller companies are permitted to deduct all of those costs. That break will be worth a little over $1 billion a year through 2010, the JCT found.

Industry officials deem such breaks as critical to US domestic oil production that they say would otherwise dwindle, since it costs far more to produce oil domestically than import it.

That claim is overblown, some analysts say. Even if such subsidies were triple their current level, they would have practically no effect on reducing oil prices and boost domestic production by only 0.2 percent, writes Gilbert Metcalf, a Tufts University economist in a recent study.

The industry receives federal largesse beyond tax breaks and relief from royalty payments. Add in research and development subsidies and accounting breaks and the total looks more like $6 billion a year for the next five years, according to a Friends of the Earth tally of JCT data.

Other economists say the industry's federal subsidies are far higher. They average about $39 billion annually if items such as defense of oil lanes in the Persian Gulf, guarding domestic infrastructure like the Alaska Pipeline, and paying to maintain the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve are also included, says Doug Koplow, founder of Earth Track, a Boston consulting firm that analyzes natural-resource subsidies.

"There probably is a public interest in government involvement in maintaining security of supply and reducing price, but those costs should be borne by oil markets and not by taxpayers," he argues.

The strategic reserve, for instance, stores about a two-month supply of oil for the nation in salt domes in Louisiana and Texas. Maintaining it costs the nation an average $2 billion or so a year, Mr. Koplow says. Guarding Middle East oil lanes averages about $19 billion a year, he found, which doesn't include the recent surge in spending because of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0118188

If Congress were to cut $1.4 billion a year in subsidies, as House Democrats urge, the industry would still get more than $37 billion a year from government coffers, according to this analysis, four times the amount spent on the nuclear industry and six times the amount spent on ethanol.

Others dispute such analyses.

"It just depends on how you want to define a subsidy," says Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "A lot of these oil companies pay more in taxes to the government than they pay to stockholders. The argument they're being given preferential tax treatment is a myth."

Mr. Kibbe, the oil industry official, says Koplow's analysis raises the question of "where you draw a line. Does that mean every mile of road we put in is a benefit to the car companies?"

Of course, renewable-energy industries also get government help, with ethanol receiving half the subsidies, Koplow estimates. Roughly half of that largesse comes in the form of a tax credit worth 51 cents per gallon to ethanol producers. Overall, ethanol subsidies in 2006 were about $6 billion a year using Koplow's broader definition, which includes federal tariffs, renewable fuel standards, and other factors.

Here, too, energy subsidies distort markets and are a negative for taxpayers and the economy, he argues.

"Right now Congress is giving billions to ethanol, biodiesel, and the nuclear industry," Koplow says. "There may end up being a positive impact on climate change from these. But it may not be the quickest, or the cheapest, way to deal with the problem."

Leading Democrats in the House want to use the $14 billion from the oil and gas industry to create a strategic energy-efficiency and renewables reserve to accelerate the use of renewable energy. They also want to promote the use of energy-efficient products and boost research and development for renewable fuels.

"What the Democrats are doing is a great down payment, shifting these oil and gas giveaways over to renewable energy and conservation," says Erich Pica, domestic program director for Friends of the Earth. "But there's still more to be done."

U.S. Will Re-negotiate Free Trade Deals (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger, Ap Economics Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration, facing a Democratic Congress, said Wednesday it would seek a "substantive adjustment" to the labor provisions in free trade agreements already negotiated with Peru, Colombia and Panama.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau told reporters that the three countries had been notified. He predicted that an agreement on revised language could be reached without a lengthy delay.

Other U.S. trade officials said the new talks do not mean that other sections of the agreements will be renegotiated or that the deals will have to be signed again. The revisions could take the form of side letters to the main agreement.

The agreements with Peru and Colombia have been signed while the agreement with Panama, reached in December, is being reviewed by government attorneys from both countries to make sure the language is correct.

USTR spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel said in a statement that the administration believed that the necessary adjustments to the labor provisions "can be made through some binding instrument and it is not necessary to reopen the text of the agreement."

The announcement that the administration wants changes in the labor provisions was the strongest signal to date that President Bush is prepared to modify his trade policies in light of last November's election in which Democrats gained control of the House and Senate.

"We are open to a dialogue," Veroneau said. He said the governments of the three nations "understand we need to make changes to achieve" the goal of getting the deals approved by Congress.

"We have informed Peru, Colombia and Panama that we ... need to make some substantive adjustment" in the area of labor provisions, Veroneau said.

DOJ_NMG_0118189

Democrats, backed by U.S. labor unions, have long complained that the free trade deals being negotiated by the administration did not include enough protections for American workers. They said that because of this, the U.S. workers' jobs would be jeopardized by competition from low-wage countries with lax labor laws.

However, Republicans and their business supporters have fought inclusion of tougher language on labor rights, arguing that such provisions could be used to block increased trade rather than lowering trade barriers.

Business groups are also concerned that including tougher language on the right of workers to form unions could give organized labor in the United States leverage to challenge in American courts the restrictions they currently face on organizing.

"Republicans in Congress are worried that new language in the trade agreements could give unions a footing to challenge U.S. labor laws and they don't want that," said Gary Hufbauer, a trade economist at the Peterson Institute for International Economics, a Washington think tank.

Thea Lee, policy director for the AFL-CIO, said her group would not see side letters as an adequate way to fix what labor leaders see as inadequate protections for American workers.

"Will they really renegotiate the agreements or will they just go down and get some cosmetic side letters?" Lee asked.

She said unions see as a good standard the labor and environmental provisions that were included in the free trade agreement the Clinton administration negotiated with Jordan which won congressional approval after Bush took office in 2001.

The deals with Peru, Colombia and Panama are the latest free trade agreements negotiated by the Bush administration, which has pushed these deals as a way to support both economic and foreign policy objectives.

Veroneau said he still expected the agreements will win approval before the president's authority to negotiate agreements under expedited procedures expires July 1.

He made his comments at a briefing with reporters about his trip week to discuss trade issues in Chile, Uruguay and Argentina.

Free-trade Pacts Face Labor Issues (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration is evaluating how to respond to Democrats' concerns over labor issues in pending free-trade agreements with Peru, Colombia and Panama, an official in the U.S. Trade Representative's Office said yesterday.

The administration wants the three agreements to be approved before the president's trade promotion authority, which allows Congress to only vote on trade pacts without amendments, expires July 1.

Democrats have long pushed for tougher labor standards in free-trade agreements, saying that deals negotiated by the Bush administration do not include enough protections for workers in those countries or American workers.

According to the official in the U.S. Trade Representative's Office, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, the administration is responding to concerns by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel of New York and other Democrats about pay and other labor conditions in the three countries.

The official stressed that the free-trade agreements themselves will not be renegotiated, but that the administration is trying to work out how to address those concerns outside of the formal pacts.

The agreements with Peru and Colombia have been signed, while the pact with Panama, reached in December, is being reviewed by attorneys from both countries to make sure the language is correct.

The official spoke after Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau told reporters that the administration is "open to dialogue" with Congress on the issue.

"It is clear that some adjustments to that chapter will be made before Congress takes those up," he said.

USTR spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel issued a clarification in the afternoon saying that in the case of signed agreements that have not been approved by Congress, such as the three pacts, "We believe these adjustments can be made through some binding instrument and it is not necessary to reopen the text of the agreement."

Another official said: "How those adjustments will be made is not clear, but we will not be reopening the text of the agreements."

DOJ_NMG_0118190

AFL-CIO policy director Thea Lee said it seemed like the administration was trying to come up with "some kind of a cosmetic side letter that they can wave around" and gain Democratic votes.

Seoul Helps All North Korean Defectors (WSJ)

http://online.wsj.com/page/2_0048.html, January 17, 2007

In response to the article "Defections Tweak Seoul" ("Leading the News," Jan. 9), Evan Ramstad made a number of incorrect assertions about the South Korean government's handling of Mr. Choi Wook-Il, a South Korean citizen who recently escaped 31 years of captivity in North Korea. The article claims the South Korean consulate in Shenyang refused to assist Mr. Choi, until public pressure forced officials to provide refuge for the 67-year-old. I would like to correct your accounting of the events.

First, it is not true that the South Korean consulate general in Shenyang started working to secure Mr. Choi's protection only after the Korean public expressed outrage at the government. In fact, ever since it became aware of his defection from the North, the South Korean government has consistently exerted its utmost diplomatic efforts for Mr. Choi's speedy repatriation home.

Second, it is a completely unfounded allegation that the South Korean government is walking a tightrope with North Korea and the United States, and consequently showing a passive attitude in supporting South Koreans kidnapped by the North. The South Korean government has dealt with the North Korean refugee problem in the spirit of brotherhood and from a humanitarian basis -- and has accepted all North Korean refugees in foreign countries in all cases, if they wish to come to South Korea. The South Korean government has also cooperated closely with related international organizations such as the the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the governments of countries in which North Korean defectors are likely to stay, in a bid to prevent the possibility of such defectors being sent back to North Korea against their will.

Third, it is not true that the South Korean government has reduced the resettlement subsidy for North Korean defectors. There has only been a change in the way the subsidy is provided. Originally, the South Korean government provided a portion of the subsidy in a lump sum, to resettle North Korean defectors. However, these defectors experienced many difficulties in spending the government subsidy effectively, often stemming from their unfamiliarity with a market-based economic system. As a result, while maintaining the overall size of the resettlement subsidy, the South Korean government decided to reduce the initial cash support and provide, instead, other supporting services to the defectors, such as expanded job training, educational opportunities and increased workplace salaries.

Kim Heung-soo
Director, Press Relations
Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade
Seoul, South Korea

Defense Official Says Pentagon Hid Unspent Funds In Accounts (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has hidden at least $1.4 billion in other agencies' accounts instead of returning unspent money to the U.S. Treasury, the Defense Department's internal watchdog told Congress Wednesday.

Thomas Gimble, the Pentagon's acting inspector general, said Pentagon offices between 2002 and 2005 used the General Services Administration (GSA) and the Interior Department "to 'park' or 'bank' funds that were expiring."

GSA and Interior then spent the money on Pentagon contracts, circumventing the law, Gimble said.

Pentagon officials did this because they either wanted to hire a particular company, spend money before it had to be returned or could not respond quickly enough to Defense Department customers, Gimble said.

In written responses to Gimble and other federal investigators, Pentagon and Interior officials have acknowledged problems with their contracting processes and said they are working to fix them. GSA officials have returned $600 million in unused funds to the Defense Department.

When his office started its work, Gimble said, the Pentagon had "unclear" policies about how to use such accounts. The Pentagon's chief financial officer issued new, clearer policies in October, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118191

Gimble told a Senate Armed Services panel that a $100 million office space contract for the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) was more evidence of a pattern of poor oversight of military contracts.

Often, he said, Pentagon contracting officers award billions of dollars in deals without proper planning, documentation or oversight.

The 10-year, $100 million CIFA lease was "one of the potentially most serious problems" his investigators found with contracts made through an Interior Department office, Gimble said. That arrangement of using Interior, he said, is supposed to save time and money but often results in expensive and possibly illegal deals.

Such contracts also make "end runs" around Congress and higher-level agency officials and hide how the Pentagon spends its money, Gimble said.

The Pentagon needs to clean up its act, senators said.

"If there's not accountability when something like that happens, we might as well throw in the towel," said freshman Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo.

At CIFA's request, Interior hired a company called TKC Communications to provide office space. The agency oversees efforts to track and block terrorism and espionage threats against U.S. military bases and personnel.

The deal was written as one for office space management, but the payments went to lease and renovate that space, investigators found. That arrangement was probably illegal and evaded required Pentagon and congressional oversight, Gimble and a separate Interior report found.

Federal contracting records show Interior has paid TKC more than $66 million since 2003, including more than $11 million after auditors criticized the deal.

Interior officials have defended the contract, saying it was legal and approved by Interior and Justice Department lawyers

Brooke Smith, TKC's chief operating officer, said in an interview that no one from the Pentagon questioned the contract and that CIFA liked the arrangement.

Senate Taking Up FEC Picks (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Senate Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said Wednesday that the Federal Election Commission's four reappointed commissioners will appear before her committee this year, a rare move that could reignite controversy avoided last Congress though presidential recess appointments.

"They are subject to confirmation," Feinstein said. "We will hold hearings."

The commissioners' appearance before the committee could create a debate not seen in more than a half-decade when former Republican Commissioner Bradley Smith went through the Rules panel confirmation process in 2000.

Smith's confirmation hearings set off a Senate firestorm among Democrats, prompting threats by then-Rules Chairman Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) that he would block the re-nomination of then-Commissioner Danny Lee McDonald, a Democratic pick.

Of the FEC's current six-member panel, Republican nominee Hans von Spakovsky and Democratic nominees Steven Walther and Chairman Robert Lenhard must be confirmed by the Senate by year's end in order to maintain their positions. The agency's Republican-nominated Vice Chairman David Mason also must go through the confirmation process. But because he is the lone term-limit exempted commissioner, he may continue after his appointment expires when Congress adjourns sine die this year.

Despite having just one FEC commissioner who will have to go through the full committee process, Republicans may be put on the hot seat defending the past writings of von Spakovsky. Last year, von Spakovsky found himself in the crosshairs of Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). The Washington Post reported that the former civil rights division lawyer at the Justice Department "played a central role in approving" a highly controversial voter identification program in Georgia, von Spakovsky's home state. According to the Post, von Spakovsky also wrote an anonymous law journal article in favor of the policy before the state's proposal was submitted to Justice for review.

DOJ_NMG_0118192

"I'm extremely troubled by reports that Hans von Spakovsky ... may be nominated and recess appointed to the Federal Election Commission," Kennedy wrote in a publicized December 2005 letter to then-Senate Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and former ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.). "There are serious questions about whether Mr. von Spakovsky is committed to upholding voting rights for all Americans."

For Democrats, Lenhard, a former union lawyer who has signed legal briefs arguing against portions of the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, often is named as the commissioner whose background could draw the most Senate scrutiny, especially from campaign finance reform-minded lawmakers such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the BCRA author who harshly criticized President Bush's use of recess appointments to fill FEC slots last year.

"I am troubled to learn that the president has decided to use recess appointments to fill the vacancies at the Federal Election Commission (FEC)," McCain said. "Individuals chosen to fill the FEC vacancies at this crucial time should go through the regular confirmation process so the Senate can be assured that they are qualified for the position and committed to carrying out the FEC's important mission to faithfully interpret and enforce the law."

S.M.U. Chief Says Bush Library Would Be A Boon For The Campus (NYT)

By Gretel C. Kovach

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

DALLAS, Jan. 17 — The president of Southern Methodist University told professors on Wednesday evening that the university would benefit if it became the site of President Bush's presidential library.

The university president, R. Gerald Turner, spoke at the spring faculty meeting and addressed questions posed by professors after Southern Methodist learned on Dec. 21 that it had emerged as the sole finalist for the library.

Many professors, including some who want the library on campus, are concerned about the relationship between a proposed Bush policy institute and the library and the effects the institute might have on the university's academic independence.

But Dr. Turner said the library and the institute would raise the national profile of the private university, spur economic development in the community and, most importantly, enhance academic resources and professional interaction.

"This presidential library will obviously contain a treasure trove of documents and artifacts that describe one of the most intense and controversial periods in our history," he said. "Any real or perceived fears about the institute or the library in any way inhibiting this institution's history of academic freedom are unfounded."

What's more, Southern Methodist stands to lose prestige and donor support if it were to fail in its bid for the library at this stage, he added. "It would raise questions of donor confidence in our ability to compete for this tremendous asset," he said.

Both the interim provost and the president of the Faculty Senate cautioned "outsiders" not to mistake vigorous academic debate for widespread opposition. But several faculty members said Wednesday that they believed there was deep opposition to the plan on the faculty, particularly to the Bush institute.

A history professor, Kathleen Wellman, said she did not want the institute on campus. "I think it will generate what I consider to be political propaganda and overshadow much of the other work done at S.M.U.," she said.

An art history professor, Janis Bergman-Carton, said, "I am afraid we are mortgaging our reputation and our students, actually and symbolically, to an administration that 70 percent of this country thinks is incompetent and unethical."

Benjamin Johnson, an assistant professor and a scholar of modern American and Texas history, asked, "How can it be a good thing to turn over the public faith of this university to the cronies of one of the most divisive, partisan and unpopular administrations in American history?"

Students returned to class on Tuesday, and they tend to be more conservative and supportive of the idea than the faculty, said the student body president, Taylor Russ.

"If the institute brings politics to the campus, I think all students, whether or not they agree with President Bush, see that it brings another opportunity to learn and interact with each other," Mr. Russ said.

Faculty Of Dallas University Less Than Thrilled At Prospect Of A Bush Library (WP)

By Matthew C. Wright

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118193

The site-selection committee for the George W. Bush presidential library and institute has narrowed its search to First Lady Laura Bush's alma mater, Southern Methodist University in Dallas, though the panel has not made a final decision.

Many SMU professors are wary and at a recent closed meeting declared that "our fundamental role as faculty is to ensure that the university holds to fundamental principles of academic freedom and that the best interests of the university are protected," according to memo summarizing the meeting.

The memo, from Faculty Senate President Rhonda Blair, outlined a series of questions many professors have for university president R. Gerald Turner about the library plans:

? What promises, if any, has SMU already made to the Bush Foundation about the library and institute?

? What guarantees will there be in writing regarding the relationship between SMU and the Presidential library and institute?

? Should SMU have some kind of oversight of the institute, or would that oversight identify us as being too closely associated with the institute?

? Have studies been done to determine the increased security risks attached to having the library and institute?

? Since universities with presidential libraries tend to be larger and/or more widely known than SMU, what will be the impact of the library and institute on SMU and its reputation?

? Could the library and particularly the institute simply be geographically near, but not be part of, SMU? Wouldn't SMU generally reap the same benefits from its presence?

? What would be the impact of the library and institute on SMU's ability to recruit students and faculty, especially in areas such as the Northeast, and what would be the impact on rankings and evaluations?

FEDERAL DIARY: Leadership Problems, Cont. (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Uncle Sam's leadership woes apparently are not going away anytime soon.

Only 49 percent of federal employees have a high level of respect for senior leaders in their agencies, and only 41 percent say they are satisfied with their leaders' policies and practices, the third in a series of government-wide surveys, released yesterday, showed.

The views on leadership are similar to those expressed by federal workers in a 2004 survey, an indication that political appointees and career executives continue to struggle to connect with the rank and file.

Less than half -- 47 percent -- of federal employees said they were satisfied with the information they get from management. They also were fairly evenly split on whether their leaders spur high levels of motivation and commitment in the federal workforce.

Despite the Bush administration's focus on improving government performance, the percentage of federal workers who think their managers review and evaluate progress toward their agency's goals dropped by 11 percentage points from 2002 -- to 56 percent.

The employees also were less likely to say they have a reasonable workload, compared with 2002 -- 59 percent said this, vs. 65 percent four years earlier.

The most recent survey was conducted in the summer of 2006, the third effort by the Office of Personnel Management to collect data on the attitudes and job satisfaction of federal employees. More than 220,000 employees in 88 agencies answered 84 questions, for a response rate of 57 percent. Most of the questions were asked in 2002 and 2004 surveys, but some have been dropped and others added.

One new question for the 2006 survey asked employees if they had trust and confidence in the person who directly supervises their work. Sixty-four percent said they did. Sixty-six percent also said they believe their supervisors are doing a good job. The response to that question, which has been asked in other surveys, registered an increase of 5 percentage points from 2002.

Linda M. Springer, the OPM director, said the survey findings show that many federal employees do not believe their agencies reward high performance and that the government has a long way to go in dealing with poor performers.

DOJ_NMG_0118194

But the survey, Springer said, also showed that the commitment to public service by federal employees remains strong: 90 percent believe their work is important, 83 percent know how their work relates to agency goals, and 83 percent said their co-workers cooperate to get the job done.

High marks in those categories suggest that "morale is good" across the government, Nancy H. Kichak, an OPM associate director in charge of the survey, said.

Especially encouraging, she said, was a finding that relatively few employees plan to leave in the next year or two, even though more than half the federal workforce is eligible to retire.

Only 4 percent of the respondents said they plan to retire within a year, and just 12 percent said they plan to retire in one to three years.

A majority of employees -- 69 percent -- said they were not considering leaving their agencies. Sixteen percent said they were considering taking another job elsewhere in the government.

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this column. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Disaster Fund Faces Financial Shortfall (NYT)

By Ron Nixon And Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The federal government's biggest program to help people rebuild after natural disasters is on the verge of running out of operating money because of budgeting problems at the agency that runs it, the Small Business Administration.

If Congress does not intervene in the next month or so to cover the administrative costs of the program, it will have to shut down, according to an internal agency memorandum given to The New York Times by a critic of the agency.

Agency officials say, and Congressional leaders agree, that the legislature will almost certainly act to keep the program running. "It would be very surprising to us if they wouldn't address this," said Steven C. Preston, the administrator of the S.B.A.

But even a temporary shutdown could delay aid to victims of the ice storms in the Midwest and other recent natural disasters, and would further hamper a program that was widely criticized for its slow response to the hurricanes that hit the Gulf Coast in 2005.

The current money shortage is related to what agency officials concede was an unusual decision in early 2005 not to ask Congress for any money to pay for running the disaster program in the 2006 fiscal year, relying instead on money left over from previous disasters. The program also ran into financial trouble last year and required an emergency infusion of money in February.

Longtime critics of the agency said the current problem highlighted a continuing pattern of mismanagement and poor planning at the S.B.A.

"We need to look at a comprehensive overhaul of the agency as well as the disaster loan program," said Representative Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York and the new chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee. "Something has to change in the management of this agency."

After the 2005 hurricanes, the agency did not have enough employees to handle the 423,000 loan applications it ultimately received from homeowners and businesses, and had switched to a troubled computer system that slowed its disaster response. The Government Accountability Office cited the agency's poor planning as a factor in "significant delays and backlogs in processing loan applications."

In the face of withering criticism from disaster victims, government officials and even agency employees, the director of the agency, Hector V. Barreto, resigned last April. His successor, Mr. Preston, has pledged to improve the disaster response.

The small-business agency has now approved more than $8 billion in loans to homeowners trying to rebuild after the hurricanes, according to its own data, but has distributed less than half of that amount. Businesses have received loans of about $1.2 billion, although the agency has approved almost $2.6 billion in loans.

In the Senate, Democrats have proposed major changes to the disaster assistance program, including allowing banks to make disaster loans, rather than funneling them all through the S.B.A.'s staff.

DOJ_NMG_0118195

"The administration mismanaged the response to Katrina from Day 1," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and the new chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, said in a statement yesterday. "We need legislation to overhaul the program and make it work efficiently for every business owner and homeowner in the country."

But Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine and the former head of the committee, blamed Congress for the current financial problem, saying it stemmed from lawmakers' failure to approve the agency's budget request for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, which agency officials said included about $200 million to run the disaster program.

"It is unacceptable that at a time when we are all too aware of how valuable these programs are to American families whose lives have been turned upside down by disaster, we were unable to provide the S.B.A. with the funding it requested for this fiscal year," Ms. Snowe said in a statement yesterday.

The Republican-led Congress passed 2 of 11 spending bills last year. The new Democratic leadership decided to keep most government agencies operating by extending their current budget levels and is expected to continue those spending levels until fall.

The 2006 budget is the one that did not ask for money to operate the disaster program. According to the internal memorandum, which was prepared by the agency's chief financial officer, Jennifer Main, the agency needs $306 million for administrative costs in the current fiscal year but had only $157 million left as of Sept. 30.

The short-term problem could be solved, as in the past, if Congress allows the agency to cover administrative costs by dipping into some of the money it has allocated for loans, said C. Edward Rowe III, the agency's chief liaison to Congress.

But Ms. Velázquez said she would oppose such a measure. "I am not willing to take money out of disaster money intended for victims to cover administrative costs," she said.

The agency is also facing a shortfall of about $20 million in its regular budget, which has dropped by about 30 percent since 2001. According to the memorandum, the shortfall could require the agency to take drastic steps, including furloughing every one of its employees one day a month until the end of September.

"We don't really think Congress will forget to fund disaster assistance," said Joel Szabat, the agency's chief of staff. "The real issue is the $20 million."

Under the disaster loan program, homeowners can borrow up to $200,000 at low interest rates to repair houses; owners and renters can borrow up to $40,000 to replace damaged furnishings. Businesses of any size can borrow up to $1.5 million to cover physical losses, and some small businesses are eligible for loans to cover economic losses. Maximum interest rates range from 4 percent to 8 percent.

The disaster loan program also serves as a screening mechanism for some grants from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which referred 2.4 million people to the S.B.A after the hurricanes. Only after they are rejected by the S.B.A. do applicants become eligible for some FEMA grants.

The homeowner loan program has come under fire in Louisiana and Mississippi because it is requiring people who receive federally financed recovery grants through state-run programs to use the money to repay S.B.A. loans.

Taking Power, Sharing Cereal (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

SOME of the most powerful Democrats in America are split over a most incendiary household issue: rodents.

"I once had to pick up a mouse by the tail that Durbin refused to pick up," complained Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, referring to his roommate Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois.

This characterization is not fair to Mr. Durbin, interjected another tenant in the Capitol Hill row house, Representative Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts. For starters, it overlooks Mr. Durbin's gift for killing rats. "He will kill them with his bare hands," Mr. Delahunt marveled.

"Oh, will you stop with the rats," said the annoyed fourth roommate, Representative George Miller of California. He owns the house and is sensitive to any suggestion that he harbors pestilence. It's dicey enough that he harbors politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0118196

Think MTV's "Real World" with a slovenly cast of Democratic power brokers. While Washington may have more than its share of crash pads for policy-debating workaholics, few, if any, have sheltered a quorum as powerful as this one. About a quarter-mile southeast of the Capitol, the inelegantly decorated two-bedroom house has become an unlikely center of influence in Washington's changing power grid. It is home to the second- and third-ranking senators in the new Democratic majority (Mr. Durbin, the majority whip, and Mr. Schumer, the vice chairman of the Democratic caucus) and the chairman of the House Democratic Policy Committee (Mr. Miller).

Mr. Delahunt, a six-term congressman, is the least prominent of the four but perhaps the funniest. More to the point, he is the only one willing to sleep in the living room with a close-up view of Mr. Schumer slumbering a few feet away in his boxers.

Mr. Miller began taking in weary lawmakers in 1982, but this is the first time in 12 years that four members of a Democratic majority have lived here simultaneously. The four men were once host to a fund-raiser for Senator Barbara Boxer of California at their divey dwelling, raising $80,000. Given the prevailing attire in the place on many nights, guests were given pairs of custom-made "Barbara Boxer shorts."

As a general rule, the abode is hardly fit for entertaining, or even for a health inspector. It is used for convenience: sleeping, ditching stuff, and fast-food consumption — the kinds of functions prized by vagabond politicians whose families are back in their home states and who generally spend only their working weekdays here.

"Everybody in the world says they're going to do a television series based on us," said Mr. Durbin, who was collapsed on the couch on a recent Monday night. Still in a tie, he sipped ice water from a massive Chicago Cubs cup while waiting for the Chinese food to arrive.

"But then they realize that the story of four middle-aged men, with no sex and violence, is not going to last two weeks," he said. The prevailing topics of their discussions are grandchildren and Metamucil, he added.

"Hey, speak for yourself, Durbin," Mr. Delahunt said, protesting the claim of no sex and violence.

"There is a lot of violence in here," Mr. Schumer said.

In fact, the roommates have never resorted to violence, at least with one another. (Crickets are another story.) Their weapons are verbal, and often aimed at Mr. Schumer, who admits to a serious dereliction of roommate duties, like grocery shopping. He is also prone to a blatant disregard for conserving a most precious household resource, cereal.

"I love cereal," Mr. Schumer said, digging into his second bowl of granola, going a long way toward depleting a box that Mr. Miller had just purchased.

The night of the national championship football game between the University of Florida and Ohio State, Jan. 8, was a rare instance of the four roommates being home and awake at the same time. It had not happened since the election in November, and the neighborhood has changed considerably since then. Several Republicans on the block lost their race or left Congress (the latter category includes the disgraced Representative Mark Foley, who lived down the street).

"This street was just devastated by the election," Mr. Miller said. "Who says Republicans are good for property values?"

He added that no Republican had ever set foot in the place, at least to their knowledge.

"We just have to vote with them, not live with them," he said.

Mr. Miller bought the house in 1977 and started taking in renters a few years later. Early tenants included former Representative Marty Russo of Illinois and former Representative Leon E. Panetta of California, who was forced to move out when President Clinton appointed him head of the Office of Management and Budget. (Ethics laws prohibited a White House official from paying rent to a member of Congress.)

Mr. Schumer joined them in 1982, and Mr. Durbin moved in a decade later on condition that he get one of the two bedrooms upstairs. Mr. Miller sleeps in the other, bigger bedroom, asserting his ownership privileges, and Mr. Delahunt began occupying the second living room bed four years ago, after a previous tenant, former Representative Sam Gejdenson, was evicted by voters in Connecticut.

Mr. Miller charges rent of $750 a month, which Mr. Durbin pays by direct deposit and Mr. Schumer's wife pays by sending Mr. Miller six checks twice a year. Mr. Schumer says his wardrobe at the apartment consists of boxers and suits, nothing in between.

DOJ_NMG_0118197

Women rarely set foot in the place, excluding the Haitian cleaning lady who comes every week and who everyone promises is a legal immigrant. The common bathroom upstairs is stocked with supersize bottles of Listerine, CVS cocoa butter, Suave shampoo (with dandruff control) and a hair dryer.

Little thought is given to entertainment besides the big-screen television that Mr. Durbin recently purchased against the wishes of Mr. Schumer and Mr. Delahunt, who liked the old one. The refrigerator is mostly empty save for apples, grapes and about two dozen bottles of beer.

"The icemaker is back on," boasted Mr. Miller, pointing to the inside of what might be the most unseemly freezer in Washington this side of Representative William Jefferson's. (F.B.I. agents found $90,000 in the freezer of Mr. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, who is being investigated on bribery charges.)

Once, Mr. Miller's son shot a deer and presented the house with an abundant supply of venison. It remained in the freezer for 12 years, at which point it was deemed to have reached its term limit and was discarded.

"Whatever happened to that venison?" Mr. Schumer wondered.

"I think it just got up and walked away," Mr. Delahunt said.

The roommates then repaired to couches to watch Florida-Ohio State and to stuff their faces with Sichuan beef and kung pao chicken. Mr. Durbin began talking about meetings he had last month with the presidents of Bolivia and Ecuador on a Congressional delegation to Latin America. Then he and Mr. Schumer started arguing about Mr. Schumer's refusal to make his bed.

Budget Balancing Is A Bad News-Good News Story (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

The good news on the budget front is that both the Bush administration and Congressional Democrats want to eliminate the deficit by 2012.

The bad news is that they are at daggers-drawn about how to do it. President Bush wants to keep all of his tax cuts alive indefinitely and freeze domestic spending, while Democrats have a huge spending wish list and want to end the tax cuts for the richest Americans.

There's more bad news as Bush prepares to deliver his State of the Union address and unveil his fiscal 2008 budget: Democrats suspect that his balancing act will be based on overly rosy tax revenue estimates and on impossible policy assumptions, rendering his budget DOA on Capitol Hill.

White House officials say that Bush will rely on a 6.5 percent annual increase in government tax receipts to achieve balance, which they say is possible because his tax cuts have spurred robust economic growth.

However, while tax revenues have surged lately — achieving a high of 14.5 percent growth in fiscal 2005 — the average for past economic recoveries is in the 4 percent range.

Moreover, the administration is expected to assume that the alternative minimum tax remains in place, though Congress annually has passed a "fix" to prevent it from socking middle-class taxpayers.

One top Democratic budget staffer said he expected Bush, too, to propose a freeze in programs like veterans' health and impose cuts in Medicare doctors' fees — "items even the Republican Congress rejected."

Democrats also anticipate that — despite promises to the contrary — Bush again will fail to adequately build Iraq War costs into his budget. "We are expecting a not-serious, credible budget," the staffer said.

Meantime, while Democrats are promising to exercise fiscal responsibility and resist urgent appeals from constituency groups for more domestic spending, Republicans charge they've already started a spending binge during their first "100 hours" — on homeland security, for example — and won't be able to resist demands from farmers, teachers unions and health lobbies. All of this presages epic battles over appropriations later this year.

That's the short-term picture as the two sides try to pare an estimated $260 billion deficit down to zero in five years. Bad news.

DOJ_NMG_0118198

Longer term, the news is much worse. As the Heritage Foundation's Stuart Butler puts it, "If they did succeed in balancing the budget by 2012, it'd be like having a margarita on the beach before the tsunami hits."

That's because, as the baby boomer generation reaches retirement age, the costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid entitlement spending will surge after 2015, rising by 2040 to eat up the entire federal budget and requiring a 50 percent tax increase on workers or drastic benefit cuts for seniors to pay for defense and other government services.

But wait — there is good news. Serious bipartisan efforts are under way at the think tank level to educate the public about the fiscal crisis ahead and establish consensus about a possible "grand bargain" to achieve long-term balance.

And, after Democrats last year rejected Bush's call to form a bipartisan commission on entitlement reform, there's hope this year that some panel could be formed — preferably of real Congressional and administration decision-makers — to work on a long-term deal.

The ideological breadth — and intellectual heft — of participation in the think tank exercise is truly impressive. It includes Butler on the right and the Brookings Institution's Belle Sawhill on the left and Robert Bixby of the Concord Coalition and Comptroller General David Walker of the Government Accountability Office in the center.

These four — plus occasional additional experts, recently including Bush budget director Rob Portman — have conducted nearly 20 "wake-up call" seminars around the country, mainly at university schools of public policy, making the point that America's long-term fiscal outlook is "unsustainable" — in fact, perilous to the nation's prosperity and security.

The experts call for action — the earlier the better — such as imposing even tighter controls on spending than the Democrats' new "pay-as-you-go" rules, reforming health care to control costs and cover the uninsured, increasing the Social Security retirement age, means-testing Medicare benefits and raising revenues.

Both administration officials, including Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, and key Members of Congress like Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) and House Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) have expressed willingness to talk about entitlement reform.

Bush has said he is even willing to talk about revenue increases, though he's said he'd resist tax hikes. White House adviser Karl Rove has offered to bet — but only $5 — that there won't be any tax increases on Bush's watch.

So, the good news is that there's bipartisan agreement on both short-term and long-term ends. The bad news is that the two sides are far, far apart on means. But both sides are scared enough about the long-term danger to be willing to negotiate seriously.

Now, all they have to do is to see the short term as the prelude to the long term. Democrats have to restrain spending, Republicans have to raise revenues. The fix isn't conceptually complicated. It just takes political courage. What great news it would be if our leaders found some.

A 'Paygo' History Lesson (WSJ)

By Dick Armey

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Promising to bring new ideas and a fresh commitment to fiscal discipline, House Democrats launched their new majority by embracing Pay As You Go budgeting -- one of the worst fiscal management tools Republicans ever invented. "Paygo" was first concocted by Richard Darman, George H.W. Bush's budget director, as part of the 1990 budget deal that raised taxes in hopes of reining in the deficit. That version, just like the new House rule, mandated that any change in taxes or entitlements resulting in revenue losses be offset with higher taxes or "cuts" in other entitlement spending.

With such a sensible sounding name, who could be against paygo? Recent history has seen countless efforts to reform the budget process, typically pernicious changes with deceptively reassuring titles. The most infamous was Lyndon Johnson's "Unified Budget" (who could support an un-unified budget?) -- which allowed appropriators to get their hands on payroll tax surpluses, dramatically expanding government spending. Later, the serious-sounding Impoundment Control Act of 1974 allowed a Democratic Congress to strip the executive branch of its ability to rescind or defer spending authority from annual appropriations legislation. Today, President Bush has little choice but to veto an entire spending bill if he opposes even a single earmark, a highly confrontational tactic he has chosen not to employ.

DOJ_NMG_0118199

There are only two examples during my 18 years in Washington where the Congress actually reduced domestic discretionary spending from the previous year. The first was the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act of 1985 (GRH), which legislated hard deficit reduction targets and automatic spending sequesters to enforce them. GRH was so successful that Congress amended it in 1987, easing the deficit targets to avoid additional spending reductions. But GRH continued to provide significant fiscal discipline until it was emasculated in 1990.

Domestic discretionary spending fell again with Republican control of Congress in the mid-1990s. We cut spending this time around by disciplining appropriators. It was a clear commitment to fiscal restraint that allowed the GOP leadership, led by the House, to keep spending under the targets established by the Budget Resolution for three consecutive years, FY 1996-1998. We cut outdated domestic programs, sought efficiencies and forced appropriators to make tough choices between competing priorities.

Over time, that commitment to spending discipline was replaced by a commitment to get re-elected at any cost -- and new spending records were set. The Democrats now in charge have promised, to quote Nancy Pelosi, "no new deficit spending, no new bridges to nowhere." But deficit spending is caused by too much spending -- and under the House Democrats' paygo rule, entitlement spending, the lion's share of the federal budget, will grow unabated, as will the massive unfunded liabilities of Medicare and Social Security (currently approaching $70 trillion), which are not acknowledged under existing budgeting practices. Meanwhile, there are no enforceable caps on domestic discretionary spending -- and thus earmarks, even if restrained as promised, will do next to nothing to promote deficit reduction.

Social Security reforms that turn empty promises into personally owned accounts -- real assets for retirement -- cannot be funded under paygo without massive tax increases or deep reductions in promised benefits. In effect, paygo makes serious entitlement reform politically impossible without a word of debate. Meanwhile, as surplus payroll tax dollars currently diverted into other spending programs continue to disappear, the pressure on the deficit will become insurmountable.

While paygo might restrain Democrat promises to further expand prescription drug benefits under Medicare Part D, its most certain outcome will be massive tax increases. Unlike "mandatory" spending that grows on autopilot, the various Bush tax cuts are set to expire. Democrats, already inclined to oppose lower taxes, will be hard-pressed to find other new tax revenue, or spending offsets from cherished entitlements, that would allow for making the tax provisions permanent.

Two important factors created the budget surpluses of the late 1990s: spending restraint and robust economic growth. Bill Clinton's enormous tax increase generated less than half of the promised new revenue by 1996, but cuts in the capital gains tax and death tax helped make up the difference. More importantly, technological innovation and higher economic growth generated new revenues. These new dollars, coupled with spending discipline, balanced the budget and paid down a substantial portion of the debt.

Pay As You Go has a different history. At Mr. Darman's urging, George H.W. Bush broke his famous 1988 campaign promise and signed on to a deficit reduction package that increased taxes and instituted paygo. The economy tanked, the deficit ballooned and the GOP suffered an electoral rout in 1992. Maybe there's a history lesson in there somewhere.

Mr. Armey, House majority leader from 1995 to 2002, is chairman of FreedomWorks.

OTHER NEWS:

Gain In Manufacturing Output Bodes Well For Economic Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The U.S. manufacturing sector, one of the weak links in the nation's economy, might not be a drag on economic growth much longer, the latest data suggest. It's also doing its part to keep inflation in check.

The Federal Reserve reported yesterday that U.S. industrial production increased a seasonally adjusted 0.4% in December from the previous month, driven largely by a 0.7% rise in manufacturing output.

While production in housing-related industries, such as furniture, declined or posted only meager gains, output of durable goods, such as home electronics, surged, reflecting the buoyant consumer spending on those items in recent months. The overall rise in output contrasts sharply with the previous three months: After revisions, industrial production showed declines in all three.

DOJ_NMG_0118200

Economists saw the production data as broadly consistent with their consensus forecast for 2007: that the economy should regain momentum as slowdowns in housing and manufacturing fade. "This could be an early sign that things are turning around for manufacturing," says Haseeb Ahmed, U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. in New York.

The picture for manufacturers remains far from ideal. On an annualized basis, production fell 1.4% in the fourth quarter from the third quarter. A slowdown in demand in mid-2006 left manufacturers with large stockpiles of unsold goods: As of November, the latest data available, it would have taken 1.24 months of sales to get rid of their inventories, up from 1.15 months in May.

Some indicators, though, suggest manufacturers' overhang is decreasing, thanks in part to stronger-than-expected consumer spending in the fourth quarter. In the latest survey from the Institute for Supply Management, a trade group for corporate purchasing managers, manufacturers said their inventory levels had fallen in December.

"We are slowly working down inventory," says Steve Wieting, U.S. economist at Citigroup Inc. in New York. "We just got slightly out of position, not way out of position."

A separate Federal Reserve survey of regional economic activity, known as the "beige book," broadly supported the idea that manufacturing held up in late November and December. Most of the Fed's 12 districts reported expansion in the sector, along with positive trends in services. Manufacturers in the Boston district, for example, described prospects for 2007 with words such as "good," "solid" and "decent," though some said business connected to consumer spending and housing deteriorated in late 2006.

Nearly all parts of the country reported persistent weakness in the housing market, but the latest survey from the National Association of Home Builders offered a glimmer of optimism. The association's index of builders' sentiment rose to 35, its highest level since July, while their assessment of future home sales held steady at 49, up from a low of 37 in September. A number below 50 still indicates that negative responses outweighed positive responses.

Meanwhile, the Labor Department's latest report on wholesale prices showed goods-producing businesses, which make up a bit more than a third of the nation's economy, doing a decent job of keeping prices under control.

Driven by a bounce in energy prices, wholesale prices for finished goods rose a seasonally adjusted 0.9% in December from the previous month -- more than what economists had expected. But so-called core wholesale prices, which exclude food and energy, rose a moderate 0.2%. Core prices of intermediate goods, such as components for manufacturing, fell 0.1%, suggesting decreased inflation pressure in the production pipeline. For all of 2006, wholesale prices rose 1.1% overall, while core prices rose 2.0%.

"The trend in core producer-price inflation is encouraging, and mirrors the recent subsiding of inflation pressures observed in consumer prices," wrote Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight, in a report. Consumer prices were flat in November. The Labor Department will report on December consumer prices today.

Write to Mark Whitehouse at mark.whitehouse@wsj.com1

Fed Official Says Housing Isn't Focus; Beige Book Indicates Modest Growth (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Monetary-policy makers should focus on stable inflation and employment and not be drawn into any attempt to prevent bubbles from developing in asset markets such as housing, Federal Reserve governor Frederic Mishkin said Wednesday.

Separately, the Federal Reserve said the U.S. economy continued growing at a "modest pace" in the latter part of the fourth quarter and early January, as retail sales grew moderately amid tight labor markets and a continued housing slump.

"Central banks should not give a special role to house prices in the conduct of monetary policy but should respond to them only to the extent that they have foreseeable effects on inflation and employment," Mr. Mishkin said in prepared remarks to the

DOJ_NMG_0118201

Forecasters Club of New York. Mr. Mishkin's prepared text didn't address the outlook for the U.S. economy or monetary policy. (Read the speech.1)

Mr. Mishkin cited examples in Europe when policy makers seemed to use house prices as a justification for an interest-rate decision. He argued that central banks have no better means of identifying potential bubbles than private markets do. In addition, any bursting of a housing bubble "is unlikely to produce financial instability," Mr. Mishkin said, citing the U.S. economy's ability to weather the stock market decline of 2000 and 2001, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and corporate accounting scandals.

Mr. Mishkin said in his speech that instead of trying to "preemptively" deal with bubbles, which he added "is almost impossible to do," central banks should "minimize financial instability by being ready to react quickly" should an asset price collapse occur.

Housing's effect on the economy has in recent months gained considerable attention in financial markets and at the Fed. Fed officials noted in their December policy statement that a "substantial cooling" in housing helped slow the economy over the course of last year.

Many financial market participants, meanwhile, had thought the Fed would have to lower official interest rates in early 2007 as the housing slump rippled through the economy. But those hopes were quelled by the recent slew of robust economic reports, which included some indications that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

Beige Book

Residential housing continued a downward trend, according to the Fed's "beige book" report on regional economies. "Nearly all districts reported a continued softening in housing markets, and high inventories of new homes have generally led to a slowing in residential building," the periodic report said, although there were exceptions.

"All districts reported slow home sales, except for Richmond, which saw a modest increase," while Boston, New York, Atlanta and Chicago all reported decreases in home prices.

In contrast, commercial real estate activity continued to see "strong activity in most districts," the Fed said. Cleveland, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis and San Francisco all reported increases in commercial building.

"Most reports from the Federal Reserve District Banks indicated that economic activity expanded at a moderate pace," the Fed said. "Districts generally reported modest increases in retail sales," despite "sluggish" vehicle sales in several districts, the Fed added.

Most of the districts reported moderate growth, although Cleveland saw "softening activity," and the Boston region reported economic activity was "mixed."

Reports from the Fed districts "generally described labor markets as tightening and cited examples of some businesses having difficulty finding qualified workers," according to the beige book.

But while hiring expanded in several districts, the banks reported "relatively moderate gains in wages," although some districts reported there were concerns for some businesses about "increases in the benefit portion of compensation." Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Dallas and San Francisco all noted higher costs for benefits, particularly health care, according to the report.

The beige book is a summary report of economic activity for use at the central bank's next Federal Open Market Committee meeting in late January. The latest was prepared by the Minneapolis district.

On the inflation front, the Fed said "overall prices increased moderately," as prices for energy and a number of materials eased, and "competition has kept prices for final goods in check."

Manufacturing continued to expand in most districts, according to the Fed, with Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and San Francisco all reporting increased activity. But Chicago, Minneapolis and Kansas City reported slower manufacturing growth. Several districts also reported weakness in manufacturing businesses that support the residential housing industry.

The report adds regional anecdotal evidence to national economic data and Fed officials' recent public remarks, which suggest the Fed remains focused on keeping inflation in check, despite some expectations in the financial markets for interest-rate cuts.

Home Builders' Confidence Rises

DOJ_NMG_0118202

Meanwhile, in an indication that the worst may be past for the housing bubble, the confidence of U.S. home builders swung upward at the start of 2007, according to data reported Wednesday.

The National Association of Home Builders reported that its index for sales of new single-family homes rose to 35 in January from 33 in December. While the trade group gauge indicates builders generally remain pessimistic, the last time the index sat so high was July, when the reading was 39.

"Builders are starting to see that the worst is behind them and that buying conditions have improved to the point that greater optimism is warranted," NAHB chief economist David Seiders said Wednesday.

"The same factors that were evident at the end of 2006 continue to hold true in today's housing market -- improving affordability measures, strengthening consumer assessments of home buying conditions and an upswing in applications for mortgages to buy homes," Mr. Seiders added.

Within the NAHB's housing-market index, the component for present sales of single-family homes rose to 36 in January from 33 in December. Expectations for sales in the next six months held steady during January at 49 points, the NAHB said. The traffic of prospective buyers rose to 26 from 23 in December.

"Builders are responding to increased buyer interest at the end of 2006 and beginning of 2007," said David Pressly, a home builder from Statesville, N.C., and the president of the NAHB. "This bodes well for the upcoming spring buying season."

The index in January was based on a survey of 387 home builders, who answer questions about sales prospects now and in the near term. When the Housing Market Index exceeds 50, it means the number of builders who see "good" sales outnumber the number who see "poor" sales. The numbers used in compiling the index are adjusted for seasonal variations.

--Jeff Bater and Benton Ives-Halperin contributed to this article.

Fed Officials' Comments Point To Little Chance Of Rate Cuts Anytime Soon (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve shouldn't raise interest rates to prevent housing bubbles from forming, but it can take steps to ensure lenders act responsibly or to ease the pain of a market tumble, a Fed official said Wednesday.

"The issue of how central banks should respond to house price movements is therefore not whether they should respond at all," Fed Governor Frederic Mishkin said in a speech in New York. Rather it's whether central banks should respond "over and above" actions required to meet their main mission of ensuring stable inflation and employment, Mishkin said.

In a separate speech in Arizona, San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen said that even though the current housing market decline has "been significant and will probably continue for a while longer," concerns that it will result in a "devastating collapse — one that might be big enough to cause a recession in the U.S. economy — have been largely allayed."

But Yellen said the Fed, which is trying to steer the economy to a soft landing by raising rates enough to reduce inflation without killing growth, isn't in the clear yet. The biggest unknown is why the job market is going "gangbusters" while growth has slowed, and what that could mean for inflation.

"While I am inclined to see labor market tightness as transitory, I do take it as a serious risk," Yellen said.

After raising short-term interest rates steadily from mid-2004 to mid-2006, the Fed has held the target for short-term rates steady at 5.25% since June. The rates are used as a benchmark for consumer and business loans.

Yellen's comments, coupled with reports Wednesday showing that wholesale prices rose more than expected in December and factory production firmed, make it unlikely the Fed will cut rates soon.

Many market analysts had expected a rate cut early this year, based partly on forecasts that the housing correction could have a major impact on the overall economy. Home building has fallen 25% from last year and new home sales about 15%.

The Labor Department's producer price index rose 0.9% in December, down from a 2% increase the previous month, but a larger move than economists expected. For 2006, wholesale prices rose 1.1%, compared with a 5.4% jump the previous year.

Stuart Hoffman, PNC chief economist, said in an advisory to clients that the new data mean it "will take clear evidence of weakness outside of the housing and the domestic auto industries to make a funds rate cut a more realistic probability by early summer."

DOJ_NMG_0118203

Mishkin said there is mixed economic research on whether raising interest rates deflates dangerous bubbles or can make a downturn worse. Meddling in markets could also undermine public support for central banks, he said. He also noted that housing prices are less volatile than stock prices.

PPI Data Add To US Inflation Fears (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

US producer prices rose more than expected last month, according to government figures which underlined the Federal Reserve's concern about persistent inflation pressures.

Core prices – which exclude volatile food and energy prices – gained 0.2 per cent following a 1.3 per cent increase in November, data released on Wednesday showed.

The increase will add to the Fed's concern that elevated wholesale costs could lead to higher prices for consumers that would erode purchasing power.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman brothers, said: "The elevated measures of inflation in the pipeline will keep the Fed worried about an eventual feeding through of producer prices to consumer prices."

"Growth didn't slow in the fourth quarter in the way the Fed anticipated, and because of that they will pay more attention to indicators of potential inflation pressures," he added.

The Fed has said it is prepared to raise interest rates further if price pressures build, despite investor expectations that slower economic growth will prompt rate cuts in the year ahead.

The central bank has kept interest rates on hold since August and is expecting the economy to grow at a moderate pace in the coming months and withstand an ongoing slowdown in the housing market and weakness in manufacturing.

The rise in core prices in December brings the total increase for last year to 2 per cent, up from 1.4 per cent in 2005.

The overall producer price index rose 0.9 per cent in December following a record rise of 2 per cent in November, which was the largest jump in more than three decades

The swings in the headline rate in recent months have been driven largely by volatility in global energy markets and structural and seasonal changes in the auto sector.

The Department of Labor said energy prices rose 2.5 per cent last month after surging by 6.1 per cent in November, while prices for passenger cars were down 0.2 per cent after strong gains in the previous month.

Stocks Sag On Weak Profits, Oil Uptick, Economic News (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Stocks seesawed through the day but ended lower, hurt by tepid corporate earnings, an uptick in crude-oil prices and sobering economic news.

At its intraday high, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was up 31.41 points and at its low point was down 32.04. An afternoon round of selling pushed the blue-chip indicator into the red for good, to end the session down 5.44 points, or 0.04%, at 12577.15, up 0.9% on the year.

In particular, the average was hindered by a 5.7% decline in component Intel, following the chipmaker's lackluster earnings report late Tuesday.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index suffered, too, declining 0.7%, or 18.36 points, to 2479.42, still up 2.7% on the year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.28 points, to 1430.62, up 0.9% on the year.

Crude-oil futures have fallen sharply this year, down 14%, in large part because of unseasonably mild weather in the U.S. Northeast and rising inventories. That has generally buoyed stock prices, because lower energy costs help businesses and consumers.

The trend yesterday was the opposite. The price of crude-oil contracts for February delivery jumped $1.03, or 2%, to $52.24 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0118204

Traders said the move was driven by a combination of factors, including a reshuffling of some investors' positions to cover expiring options contracts and renewed interest by some speculators who sensed a buying opportunity amid this month's overall decline.

Energy broker Mike Fitzpatrick, of Fimat USA, said the day's rally didn't necessarily signal an end to crude's early-2007 slide.

"If anything, the news still favors lower prices," he said, citing inventory statistics due today from the federal Energy Information Administration. Many traders expect the report to show a weekly increase in U.S. crude reserves.

Economic news yesterday seemed to point away from a quick interest-rate cut by the Federal Reserve this year -- a scenario some investors have been hoping for because lower borrowing costs would likely spur consumer spending, corporate profits and a stock rally.

The Fed released its "beige book" of economic indicators, in which the central bank noted a "modest pace" of recent growth. It also noted tight labor markets that have put upward pressure on wages -- not ideal conditions for a rate cut.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1 and bonds decreased2. The 10-year note shed 9/32 point, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.788%. The 30-year bond declined 18/32 to yield 4.882%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose slightly to 120.66 yen from 120.63 yen. The euro rose to $1.2936 from $1.2915.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com4

Herndon Anti-Solicitation Law Challenged (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

A Reston man ticketed by police for hiring a day laborer in the parking lot of a Herndon 7-Eleven is taking the town to court, contending that its anti-solicitation ordinance is unconstitutional.

The legal challenge, filed in Fairfax County District Court, is the newest turn in Herndon's campaign to discourage illegal immigrants from living and finding work in the town of 23,000 near Dulles International Airport. It is also the latest in a series of court actions around the country questioning the legitimacy of similar laws.

According to court documents, Stephen A. Thomas, 44, drove into the parking lot on Elden Street on Sept. 16, got out and approached two men about doing yard work. After reaching agreement with one of them, Thomas was driving home with the worker when he was stopped by Herndon police and cited for violating the ordinance.

He faces up to six months in jail and a fine of up to $1,000. Lt. Jerry Keys, a police spokesman, said yesterday that the laborer in the car with Thomas was not cited, although it was not clear why, other than that the officer involved was exercising his discretion.

Thomas could not be reached for comment.

The ordinance, enacted in September 2005, bars anyone in a vehicle from trying to hire someone standing on the sidewalk or street. Conversely, it prohibits anyone on the street from asking someone in a vehicle -- or who has just gotten out of one -- for work.

Although town officials cited traffic safety as their chief concern, the law was passed in the midst of a debate over the impact of immigrant day laborers, who congregated in the parking lot on Elden Street in the mornings to seek work.

Thomas's attorneys, Rodney G. Leffler and Alexa K. Moseley of Fairfax, asked that the case be dismissed on First Amendment grounds, saying that solicitation has long been protected by the courts as free speech. Specifically, they said Herndon's law is flawed because it focuses only on solicitation for employment, while leaving other forms of solicitation -- such as charitable contributions or the sale of goods -- unrestricted.

Fairfax District Judge Lorraine Nordlund has scheduled a hearing for Feb. 14 but indicated that she could rule earlier based on written arguments. The lawsuit was filed last week.

DOJ_NMG_0118205

Herndon Town Attorney Richard B. Kaufman declined to comment. "The Town of Herndon does not comment on ongoing criminal prosecutions," he said.

Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch said the Town Council can rewrite the ordinance, if necessary.

"We're going to work this through one step at a time, and if we have to modify the language, we'll do what we have to do," he said.

Police figures show a recent spike in anti-solicitation citations, with 51 issued in the past three months, after just 19 in the previous 10 months. It's not clear what is behind the recent increase.

The law was passed several weeks before the opening of the Herndon Official Workers Center, a site created by the town as a gathering place for laborers and those seeking to employ them. The town has said that the existence of the site allows them to bar solicitation for employment on the streets.

Similar laws have been successfully challenged in other court cases. A federal judge in California ruled last May that day laborers in Redondo Beach had the right to look for jobs on public sidewalks. In 2004, city police arrested 60 workers in a sting operation under an ordinance the city passed in 1987 as a traffic control measure.

Last November, a federal judge ruled that officials in the New York City suburb of Mamaroneck had harassed day laborers in a racially motivated attempt to discourage them from seeking work in the streets.

In both cases, the locality involved did not have an alternate site, such as Herndon's worker center, where workers could gather. But the Town Council's recently approved plan to hire a firm that would restrict access to the center to lawful immigrants potentially complicates the town's legal position.

This is the second time in recent days that Herndon's actions have been challenged on constitutional grounds. Last week, state officials informed the town that a law it sought from the General Assembly, authorizing local governments to criminalize the hiring of illegal immigrants, is most likely unconstitutional. State officials said such a measure is preempted by existing federal law.

Appeals Court Rules For Wal-Mart In Maryland Health Care Case (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

When Maryland legislators passed a first-of-its-kind law in 2006 forcing Wal-Mart Stores to spend more on employee health care, the measure was held up as a model for other states grappling with mounting Medicaid bills.

But yesterday, after a second court found that the Maryland's fair-share health care rule violated federal labor laws, the concept that states can compel companies to offer more generous health care is suddenly in doubt, experts said.

By a 2-to-1 ruling, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Baltimore found that the Maryland requirement — which affected only Wal-Mart — violated a 32-year-old federal labor law known by its shorthand, Erisa.

The law, known to regulators as the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, was intended to allow big companies to set up uniform health benefits across the country, rather than navigate state-by-state requirements.

By forcing Wal-Mart to revamp health care plans in Maryland, the court found, the Maryland law directly violated Erisa.

That decision, upholding a lower court decision in July, threatens to derail health care legislation known as fair share that is under consideration in states across the country.

"State level health care reform is still possible, but it's not going to be the Maryland model," said Naomi Walker, the director of state legislative programs at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., which lobbied for the Maryland law. "We have to go back to the drawing board."

Unlike Erisa, the Maryland health care bill was never about making life easier for big companies like Wal-Mart. Rather, it was about shifting the burden for insuring the working poor from state Medicaid plans, with the clear implication that Wal-Mart had shirked its obligations.

Specifically, the Maryland law forced corporations with 10,000 or more workers to spend 8 percent of their payrolls on health insurance, or pay the difference into a state fund. Four companies in the state have more than 10,000 workers, but only Wal-Mart met all the criteria.

DOJ_NMG_0118206

The Maryland legislature was never shy about its motives for aiming at Wal-Mart, a company with $12 billion in annual profit.

In the debate that the preceded passage of the law, lawmakers complained that thousands of Wal-Mart's workers rely on Medicaid in states like Maryland and Georgia.

That narrow focus on a single company, legal experts said, may have also influenced the court's decision.

Wal-Mart said the bill was politically motivated and would do little to address the cause of America's health care crisis — spiraling costs. Yesterday, it praised the appeals court decision.

"Not only was this legislation widely viewed as bad public policy, the courts have confirmed that it violates the law," said Nate Hurst, a spokesman for the chain.

But critics of the company, including Maryland lawmakers, said they could claim credit for improving Wal-Mart's health care offerings, even if the law did not survive.

In the last 18 months, Wal-Mart has made its insurance available to the children of part-time workers, reduced the waiting time before new employees are eligible for insurance and created a plan with monthly premiums as low as $11.

And the Maryland law may still survive. The state attorney general can appeal yesterday's decision to a full panel of the Fourth Circuit or to the United States Supreme Court. A spokeswoman for the attorney general, J. Joseph Curran Jr., said he had two weeks to decide.

Maryland lawmakers may also choose to rewrite the law, using an approach upheld in several other states that requires companies with uninsured workers to pay them higher wages that can be used for health care premiums, said Paul Sonn, deputy director of the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law and an expert on fair share health care legislation.

The Maryland law proved popular among the state's residents, according to polls, and that sentiment is likely to guide lawmakers.

"The overwhelming majority of the public wants to require large profitable corporations to pay their fair share for health care," said Paul Blank, the campaign director for WakeUpWalMart.com, a union-backed group critical of the giant retailer. "This form may not work, but lawmakers will work on new way to accomplish the same thing."

The lawsuit that overturned the Maryland law was sponsored by the Retail Industry Leaders Association, a Virginia-based trade group of which Wal-Mart is a member. In an interview, Sandra L. Kennedy, the trade group's president, said, "The court has a sent a strong message at states looking at similar bills: these violate federal law."

Court Upholds Killing Of 'Wal-Mart Bill' (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. doesn't have to pay additional health care costs for its Maryland employees, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday, likely killing similar legislation in other states.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond upheld a U.S. District Court decision that said Maryland's "Wal-Mart bill" violated the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), a federal law that sets minimum standards for pensions and health plans.

A spokeswoman for Maryland Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler said the office is reviewing the opinion and has 14 days to ask for a rehearing in front of all members of the 4th Circuit. The opinion issued yesterday was reviewed by three members.

A year ago, the General Assembly passed the law, which said state employers of 10,000 or more employees were required to contribute at least 8 percent of their payroll to health care. Because of the size requirement and exceptions for the three other employers with that many employees in the state -- Johns Hopkins University, Giant Food and Northrop Grumman -- Wal-Mart was the only company affected by the law.

Democratic lawmakers who supported the bill said it was a necessary attempt to address out-of-control health care costs.

But opponents, including former Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, who unsuccessfully vetoed the bill, said it unfairly targeted one employer.

DOJ_NMG_0118207

The Retail Industry Leaders Association (RILA), an Arlington trade group that includes Wal-Mart, appealed the law and argued that it violated ERISA, which is designed to eliminate a patchwork of state and local employer health guidelines.

In July, U.S. District Judge J. Frederick Motz agreed; yesterday, the federal appeals court upheld that decision.

"Were we to approve Maryland's enactment solely for its noble purpose, we would be leading a charge against a foundational policy of ERISA, and surely other states and local governments would follow," Judge Paul V. Niemeyer, appointed by the first President Bush, wrote in his opinion, which Judge William B. Traxler Jr., appointed by President Clinton, joined.

Judge Niemeyer said the law was enacted to reduce Maryland Wal-Mart employees' reliance on Medicaid, a federal program for the poor and disabled that is administered by the states.

"Not disguised was Maryland's purpose to require Wal-Mart to change, at least in Maryland, its employee-benefit plans and how they are administered," he wrote.

Judge M. Blane Michael, also appointed by Mr. Clinton, dissented, saying that because Wal-Mart would have a choice to boost health care spending on employees or pay a penalty to the state, it did not violate ERISA.

He called the law a "creative" response to the rising problem of covering health care costs. In Maryland, the 2006 Medicaid shortfall was estimated to be $130 million.

"The Maryland act is part of the state's effort to deal with the mounting funding pressures," he wrote.

Wal-Mart said yesterday it was pleased with the decision.

"Not only was this legislation widely viewed as bad public policy, the courts have confirmed that it violates the law," spokesman Nate Hurst said. "This politically motivated legislation did nothing to control the cost of health care or improve access to health care, so it's no wonder that legislators across the country have rejected this as bad public policy."

The ruling is binding on federal courts in Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina and could stop other jurisdictions from trying to pass similar legislation.

"The court's decision sends a strong message that similar bills under consideration in other states and municipalities also violate federal law," said RILA President Sandy Kennedy.

RNC Readies For Martinez Fight (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

A member of the Republican National Committee from President Bush's home state yesterday escalated the rebellion against Mr. Bush's choice to head the committee going into the 2008 presidential elections.

Texas RNC member Denise McNamara said the attempt by Mr. Bush's supporters on the national committee to name Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida as general chairman "is like pouring gas on an already smoldering electorate," citing Mr. Martinez's role in promoting last year's "comprehensive" immigration bill in the Senate.

"Choosing an RNC chairman who supports amnesty [for illegal aliens] is tantamount to telling the conservative majority of Americans that they do not matter."

The fight over the party chairmanship reflects grass-roots discontent, heightened by Republican midterm election losses in November, as the 168-member RNC convenes for its annual winter meeting today at the Grand Hyatt Hotel downtown.

Mr. Martinez's opponents are ready to challenge the White House's efforts to force on the party a general chairman whose views on illegal immigration, they say, are opposed by 80 percent of the electorate.

They cite polls indicating that the issue has split the party and contributed to its November losses.

The vote is scheduled for tomorrow.

"The question is whether the Martinez fight will be a skirmish or a full-scale rebellion," said New Jersey RNC member David Norcross, a former RNC general counsel who oversaw the 2004 Republican presidential nominating convention in New York. "I think it will be a skirmish, but I am preparing for a full-scale rebellion."

One of Mr. Martinez's supporters, Florida RNC member Paul Senft Jr., told the Tallahassee Democrat newspaper: "With some people, the issue of amnesty is a litmus test and anything short of a concentration camp is amnesty."

DOJ_NMG_0118208

A Virginia-based group, English First, has created a Web site, StopMartinez.com, that declares the senator from Florida is: "Wrong on English. Wrong on Amnesty. Wrong for the Republican National Committee."

Mr. Norcross plans to introduce a motion at the meeting tomorrow to create the position of national chairman. He says the RNC's rules adopted at the 2004 national convention allow for the creation of such a position and for it to be filled by a nonmember. Mr. Martinez's opponents point out that he is not an RNC member.

Mr. Norcross and other RNC leaders scheduled a 10 p.m. strategy session yesterday to deal with the rebellion. At least one rebel faction scheduled its own strategy session last night.

Some members oppose in principle the creation of the general chairmanship, to be filled by the president's handpicked choice. They say the national committee, whose members are elected by party activists in each state and territory, should be led by an elected member.

Some conservatives say the Martinez move will impede RNC fundraising and make electing a Republican president and restoring the party's dominance of Congress all the more difficult next year.

"It is hard to motivate voters who are angry and who feel betrayed. He is simply the wrong choice at the wrong time," Mrs. McNamara said.

The Texas committee member recalled that in November, "speculation was swirling about the possible nomination of [former Maryland Lt. Gov.] Michael Steele" as RNC chairman, and said that "excitement began to build at the prospect of a new face to lead the RNC."

"Unfortunately, White House political strategist Karl Rove had other ideas. He announced Martinez as the president's choice for RNC chair, crushing the hope of millions of Republican grass-roots activists," Mrs. McNamara said.

Although many Texas Republicans had urged her to support Mr. Steele, she said, "I had three times as many calls asking me to oppose Senator Martinez."

Democrats Seeking To Drive Stem Cell Wedge In Minn., N.H. (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 18, 2007

In 2006, two Republican House members with tough races ahead changed their views to favor an embryonic stem cell research bill.

With the same bill having already passed the House in the 110th Congress, embryonic stem cell advocates are hoping for more converts, and many see the heaviest pressure likely to land squarely on the shoulders of two swing-state senators up in 2008 — Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and John Sununu (R-N.H.).

Democrats are already trying to drive a wedge into Coleman's and Sununu's reelection bids, hoping it could hurt them as it was supposed to have hurt former Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) in November. But experts are divided about the issue's impact.

Talent's narrow November loss occurred alongside the narrow passage of a statewide embryonic stem cell initiative that he opposed.

The bill, which would allow federal funding to be used for embryonic stem cell research and would override President Bush's limits, could come to a vote in the Senate next month. It passed both chambers last cycle but was vetoed by Bush.

Coleman will again vote against the measure, as it currently stands, his office said. Sununu's office did not return numerous calls seeking comment.

In most polls, a majority of Americans support federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The bill has received solid majorities in both chambers but has fallen short of a veto-proof majority in either.

The 2006 election added three pro-embryonic votes to the 63 already there, meaning one convert would likely give the bill a veto-proof Senate.

After last week's 253-174 vote, the House is still 37 votes shy of the two-thirds majority needed. But attaining the goal in the Senate would represent concrete progress and an important symbolic goal for embryonic backers and patient groups, and they are in turn focusing their efforts on those seen as the most likely defectors.

DOJ_NMG_0118209

"They're going to go after people in tough races; they're going to go after anybody who's new," said Gail Pressberg, a senior fellow at the Civil Society Institute and co-author of a book on stem cell politics. "I think it's a strong wedge issue in which the Republicans have a lot to lose."

Coleman's recent turn against the Iraq war and a past marked by shifting politics — he switched from Democrat to Republican when he was mayor of St. Paul — have Democrats predicting he might switch on the stem cell issue.

During the 2004 Democratic National Convention, Coleman led the Republican "truth squad," which criticized Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) for his "flip-flops" on the Iraq war and other matters.

Sununu's state experienced about as big of a political overhaul as any in the nation in November, and he remains one of few anti-embryonic votes in the Northeast. Challengers have already begun to line up to face him.

The two of them, along with Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), were recently cited by Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) as the three most vulnerable Republicans up in 2008. Allard announced Monday that he wouldn't run for a third term.

All three come from swing states that trended blue in November. Both of New Hampshire's Republican House members lost, and Democrat Amy Klobuchar soundly beat Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 58-38 for Minnesota's other Senate seat.

The Democratic parties in Minnesota and New Hampshire wasted little time setting up Coleman and Sununu for their potential "flip-flops," issuing nearly identically worded statements.

Minnesota Democrats keyed on Coleman's Iraq conversion. A longtime backer of Bush on the war, Coleman came out against the 21,000-troop surge last week, taking a similar tack to fellow 2008 candidates Sens. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

"Now that [Coleman has] been recognized nationally as one of the most vulnerable Republicans of 2008, we can expect him to keep chasing the spotlight," Minnesota Democratic Party Chairman Brian Melendez said. "Maybe he thinks no one will notice he switched parties — again."

Coleman is also against changing the Medicare drug benefit to allow the government to negotiate drug prices. He missed the vote on a negotiation measure in the last Congress, but recently told The Hill he will vote against the politically popular bill this year.

Coleman continues to emphasize a compromise on the stem cell issue.

"Sen. Coleman has consistently been seeking ways to advance stem cell research without using federal dollars for the destruction of embryos," press secretary LeRoy Coleman (no relation) said. "He believes a solution can be found that is consistent with the protection of the unborn, while offering funding for scientific research for those living with the hope of a cure."

New Hampshire Democrats noted that Sununu's "no" vote last year came even as the state's two Republican House members voted to override Bush's veto.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) also voted for the bill.

"Now that the Democratic Congress has provided [the] leadership by passing this critical bill, I call on Sen. Sununu to do the right thing and join Democrats in fighting President Bush's efforts to veto this bill," New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said.

But experts aren't completely sold on embryonic stem cell research as a wedge issue. Talent said after the election that the issue probably "cost me votes in some places and got me votes in other places" and wasn't a major factor in his 50-47 loss to now-Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.).

McCaskill didn't heavily emphasize the issue on the campaign trail, but said she benefited from ads featuring actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease.

The issue likely played some role in the Missouri and Maryland Senate races, where the Fox ads ran, said Marcy Darnovsky, associate executive director of the Center for Genetics and Society. But she said it doesn't necessarily have the wedge-issue prowess the Democrats think it does.

"In Missouri, the proponents spent $30 million on it, and they squeaked by with 51-49 percent," Darnovsky said. "That's an indication that it doesn't always work" as well as research advocates and Democrats think.

DOJ_NMG_0118210

Skeptics cite the issue's complexity as a main factor. Polling on embryonic stem cell research varies widely, depending on how the questions are framed.

Former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), and Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.) switched their positions in favor of the embryonic stem cell bill in 2006. Weldon lost reelection, while Reichert narrowly survived.

Groups including the Christian Coalition of America are closely monitoring the votes of House freshmen on the issue.

Rep. Boyda's Seat Top Target For Divided GOP (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 18, 2007

When newly elected National Republican Campaign Committee chief Rep. Tom Cole talks about specific seats he wants to take back in 2008, he repeatedly mentions Kansas's 2nd district.

Cole (R-Okla.) referred to the seat as one of the targets that fits the criteria for an NRCC priority in 2008. It is one of 61 seats Democrats hold that voted for President Bush in 2004, and the Democrat who won it in the midterms did so with less than 55 percent of the vote.

That Democrat, Rep. Nancy Boyda (D), may have just been sworn in, but Republicans from Washington to Topeka are marking her name with a big, red bulls-eye.

"I certainly expect this to be one of their top-targeted races," Boyda said. "I didn't get into this thinking this would be a cakewalk."

Boyda defeated then-Rep. Jim Ryun with 51 percent of the vote in a year that saw Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, running with a candidate for lieutenant governor who earlier in the year had defected from the Republican Party, win reelection with 57 percent.

Cole said 2006 was an anomaly in Kansas politics, an arena in which he has worked in the past.

"I'm right next door to Kansas and [I've] done a lot of political activity over there in another lifetime, and I can tell you that for the first time in all the years we've been up there, the legislative ballot in Kansas was generically Democrat," Cole said. "That's unbelievable. So, they're probably not going to get another year like that."

But if 2006 was a bad year for Republicans nationwide, in Kansas the party split in half like the Titanic: Both sides sank.

In a state long regarded as a bastion of conservative politics — President Bush won the 2nd district with 59 percent of the vote in 2004 — the GOP witnessed numerous defections to the Democratic Party, and a rift between the conservative and moderate wings of the party resulted in Democratic victories in traditional Republican strongholds.

The executive director of the state Democratic Party, Mike Gaughan, said as long as a faction of the Kansas GOP continues to focus solely on social issues such as abortion, candidates viewed as moderates, like Boyda, would reap the benefits.

"Certainly, there's an element in the Republican Party that's more interested in purging themselves than common-sense solutions for Kansas families," Gaughan said.

Outgoing state GOP chairman Tim Shallenburger, conceding his tenure as chairman has been rocky at best, said that rift, combined with a poisoned national environment, was at the root of the GOP's ills last year.

Phill Kline, a former state attorney general known nationally for his move to subpoena the records of state abortion clinics, drew a lot fire from moderate and independent voters, Shallenburger said.

Kline, who was defeated by another Republican defector, Paul Morrison, was on the list of names Shallenburger identified as potential challengers to Boyda, perhaps running as the standard-bearer for the conservative faction of the party. Kline, who doesn't currently live in the district, did not return phone calls for comment.

"Unfortunately, the conservatives can't seem to elect anybody," Shallenburger said, adding that because of the rift he is anticipating a primary. "They can get them through primaries, but they can't get them through generals."

Shallenburger said a list of serious candidates should come to light after the state GOP's Kansas Day convention later this month. Right now, Shallenburger, who isn't running for reelection, said possible candidates include former state House Speaker

DOJ_NMG_0118211

Doug Mays, Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh and state Treasurer Lynn Jenkins. Boyda said she anticipated Ryun might want a rematch.

Shallenburger, a former gubernatorial candidate in his own right (Cole served as his pollster), said he would be willing to discuss a possible run with the NRCC chairman, but right now he isn't leaning toward a run.

Both Cole and Shallenburger said that while 2006 was a bad year for them because of an unfavorable national environment and party turmoil, 2008 will be different because a presidential election year will allow for GOP healing and unity.

"You know, Kansas hasn't gone through some road to Damascus and morphed into a liberal state," Cole said. "Next election cycle, the Republican presidential nominee, I'm willing to bet today, without knowing who it is or who the Democrats will have, will carry Kansas.

"You want to bet who's going to win Kansas-02 in the presidential race? I've got a pretty good idea. I'm willing to make that prediction today."

Shallenburger added that regardless of whom Republicans pick, state Republicans will unify in their dislike of the Democratic candidate. That, combined with county commissioner races, will drive turnout and grassroots efforts.

"I think a presidential election gives us common ground," Shallenburger said. "If it's [Sen. Hillary Rodham] Clinton (D-N.Y.) or [Sen. Barack] Obama (D-Ill.), I can't imagine that either of those two would gain much Republican support."

But Shallenburger said that because Democrats already have proven they can win in the Republican district, much of the Republican strategy will depend on Boyda's voting record.

Boyda might have given those aiming for her seat some early ammunition by voting for the House stem cell research bill last week.

But Boyda insists the often acidic ideological tones have subsided a great deal since her first congressional run in 2004, and though some voters might disagree with her on social issues like stem cell research, she said most will come to see her overall goal is to brighten the future for the district.

"I intend to just do my job," she said. "It's that simple."

No Challenger Yet For Vulnerable Landrieu (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Because Republicans must defend almost twice as many seats, the 2008 Senate landscape appears to favor Democrats. Nonetheless, Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) might be the most vulnerable incumbent this cycle.

Democrats won control of the Senate last November, in part, by flipping seats in not-necessarily Democratic territory. But that likely will be of little comfort to Landrieu, especially in a presidential election year.

In the 2004 cycle alone, Democrats lost five open-Senate seats in the South — including one in Louisiana.

Factor in Landrieu's narrow 2002 re-election — in which she received 52 percent of the vote — and the population loss in her stronghold of New Orleans, and the scion of one of the Pelican State's best known political families faces unfavorable odds.

"She's always just seemed vulnerable; she's moved as much to the right as she could and still be a Democrat in Washington but there's still the thought in many parts of Louisiana that she's too liberal," said John Maginnis, who pens a weekly newsletter on Louisiana politics. "She's always had close elections and there's no reason to think it wouldn't be another close election."

One knowledgeable Democratic strategist, who did not want to be named, agreed.

"Democrats win in Louisiana by about 5,000 votes and we lost 200,000 people; and most of the people were Democrats," the strategist said. "New Orleans is half the size it used to be."

Landrieu owes her 2002 re-election to the wide margin of victory she racked up in the Big Easy. If the huge number of voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina never return, Democrats will be at a fundamental disadvantage, the source added.

Despite such dire predictions, and Republicans' desire to make her their top target, no Republican has stepped up to challenge Landrieu this early in the cycle.

DOJ_NMG_0118212

Longtime Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) took his name out of the mix this week, saying Tuesday that he would not run for Senate.

"We don't know who might run in 2008," said McCrery, who just signed on to be Congressional liaison for the presidential campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R). "My guess is there will be competition for the Senate seat in Louisiana."

Other GOP names being bandied about are Rep. Richard Baker, Louisiana Secretary of State Jay Dardenne and state Sen. Walter Boasso.

Boasso told Roll Call that he has no interest in running for the Senate but is contemplating a gubernatorial bid.

Additionally, speculation runs rampant that state Treasurer John Kennedy (D) will switch parties and take Landrieu on as a Republican.

Kennedy ran for the Senate in 2004, finishing third in the all-party primary despite pressure from Democratic leaders that he bow out in favor of then-Rep. Chris John (D-La.).

GOP Reps. Charles Boustany and Bobby Jindal also have been mentioned as Landrieu challengers, but some political watchers think Boustany, who was just elected to a second term, is too green. Jindal is almost certain to run for governor this year.

A recent survey showed him holding a 24-point lead over Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D), whose reputation resembles New Orleans' levies as a result of Katrina. Blanco defeated Jindal by 4 points in 2003, and if she loses this November, that could also be a troubling sign for Landrieu.

The Democratic strategist conceded that all of the potential Republican candidates could be formidable, though the source dismissed the notion that Kennedy could prevent Landrieu from winning a third term.

"If the treasurer does switch parties and does try to run as a Republican, Mary can beat him; that's a mistake," the strategist said.

Maginnis said Dardenne looks like the strongest option.

"A lot of people think he has the right stuff," Maginnis said, noting that he would not have to relinquish his current office to seek the Senate.

Dardenne, a former state legislator, also is the only Republican under discussion who has won statewide office.

Also working against Landrieu is the unsuccessful campaign of her brother, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D), who failed to dislodge embattled New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin during the city's racially tinged runoff election last year.

That "tarnishes the name," the Democratic strategist said.

A Landrieu aide said the Senator's office did not want to comment about 2008, other than to confirm that she does plan to seek re-election.

One bright spot for Landrieu is the elimination of Louisiana's blanket primary for federal elections. Prior to 2008, all candidates for a particular office, regardless of party, appeared on one primary ballot. If no one exceeded 50 percent, the top two vote-getters — regardless of party — then went on to a runoff election.

Given the large number of candidates for major offices, incumbents frequently failed to garner 50 percent of the primary vote.

No Democrat of stature is expected to challenge Landrieu, allowing her to focus solely on the general election. The Democratic strategist said there is "no question" that will help Landrieu, especially if multiple Republican candidates have to slug it out for the nomination.

McCrery said it is impossible to know now who it will help.

"It could make it more difficult for her or it could make it more difficult for the Republicans," he said. "It's hard to tell."

Why Georgia May Not Be On Democrats' Minds (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118213

A couple of days after the midterm elections, I checked out the Senate class of 2008 and noticed that Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) is on the list. I wondered, could Democrats, who held both of Georgia's Senate seats and the state's governorship as recently as 1990, knock off Chambliss?

The wise answer is that it may be possible, but at this point it's unlikely. The better answer may well be a resounding, "Are you nuts?"

While 49 states seemed to move toward the Democratic Party in November's elections, Georgia, the state that gave the nation Jimmy Carter, Martin Luther King Jr. and Jackie Robinson, continued its shift toward the GOP. In fact, Georgia was the only state in the nation where Republicans significantly improved their standing in the 2006 midterms.

Republicans retained their 34-22 majority in the state Senate and gained two more seats in the Georgia House, making Georgia one of the rare states where Democrats did not make state legislative gains. In addition, Republicans re-elected their governor handily and gained two statewide offices — lieutenant governor and secretary of state — that previously had been held by Democrats.

At the Congressional level, state Republicans held on to all of the seven seats that they had going into the midterms, and they came within a hair of picking up another district or two. Given what happened nationally, that was a notable result. In fact, Georgia was the only state with at least two Congressional districts where Republicans had more opportunities for House takeovers — Rep. Jim Marshall's 8th district and Rep. John Barrow's 12th district — than Democrats did.

Georgia was not one of the earliest Southern states to move away from the Democratic Party. South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and a number of other former states of the Confederacy moved to the Republican Party well before Georgia did, in part because Carter's two presidential races kept Peach State Democrats loyal to their party.

But over the past six years, Georgia has been making up for lost time, moving toward the GOP column more vigorously than virtually any other state in the nation. As respected University of Georgia political science professor Charles S. Bullock III noted in a column of the online newsletter InsiderAdvantageGeorgia, Georgia has more white evangelicals, more Republicans and a higher percentage of Iraq War supporters than the country as a whole.

Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) clobbered the state's sitting lieutenant governor, Democrat Mark Taylor, by almost 20 points, and Republican Casey Cagle, who won a bitter primary over Ralph Reed, won the open lieutenant governor's office by almost a dozen points.

Yes, Democrats still hold three statewide offices — attorney general, state labor commissioner and agriculture commissioner — but all three of those Democrats have served for years, and state Attorney General Thurbert Baker, an African-American, isn't exactly a liberal activist. He won an award last year from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for his work on legal reform and for his efforts to "broaden cooperation" between the business community and state attorneys general.

In recent years, a Democratic governor, Roy Barnes, and a Democratic Senator, Max Cleland, were ousted from office, even though both incumbents were at one time portrayed as invincible. And defeated gubernatorial hopeful Taylor was just the kind of Democratic good old boy who once easily won elections in Georgia.

The only high-profile Democrat who might have been able to carry the state recently was former Sen. Zell Miller (D), who not only voted more like a Republican than a Democrat but who actually gave the keynote address at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

More than anything else, the national political environment has defined Georgia Democrats, and that has strengthened the Republicans' hand.

So far, the only name circulating as a possible challenger to Chambliss is DeKalb County CEO Vernon Jones. But whatever Jones' personal qualifications and appeal (I have not met him), it is very difficult to imagine a young, Democratic, African-American officeholder from Atlanta with some personal and legal baggage winning a Senate race next year — even one who has admitted voting for President Bush in 2004.

While 2006 was a bad year for Republicans almost everywhere, it was "less bad" in the South. The region is likely to be the GOP's strongest area in 2008, and the presidential election guarantees that the two parties' national images will be in the spotlight, making it difficult for Senate candidates to run purely "local" races.

DOJ_NMG_0118214

None of this means that Saxby Chambliss is invulnerable in 2008. But it does mean that Democrats are likely to have far better Senate opportunities elsewhere than they will in increasingly Republican Georgia.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Obama's Past Offers Ammo For Critics (AP)

By Ryan Keith, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama may have a lot of explaining to do.

He voted against requiring medical care for aborted fetuses who survive. He supported allowing retired police officers to carry concealed weapons, but opposed allowing people to use banned handguns to defend against intruders in their homes. And the list of sensitive topics goes on.

With only a slim, two-year record in the U.S. Senate, Obama doesn't have many controversial congressional votes which political opponents can frame into attack ads. But his eight years as an Illinois state senator are sprinkled with potentially explosive land mines, such as his abortion and gun control votes.

Obama — who filed papers this week creating an exploratory committee to seek the 2008 Democratic nomination — may also find himself fielding questions about his actions outside public office, from his acknowledgment of cocaine use in his youth to a more recent land purchase from a political supporter who is facing charges in an unrelated kickback scheme involving investment firms seeking state business.

Obama was known in the Illinois Capitol as a consistently liberal senator who reflected the views of voters in his Chicago district. He helped reform the state death penalty system and create tax breaks for the poor while developing a reputation as someone who would work with critics to build consensus.

He had a 100 percent rating from the Illinois Planned Parenthood Council for his support of abortion rights, family planning services and health insurance coverage for female contraceptives.

One vote that especially riled abortion opponents involved restrictions on a type of abortion where the fetus sometimes survives, occasionally for hours. The restrictions, which never became law, included requiring the presence of a second doctor to care for the fetus.

"Everyone's going to use this and pound him over the head with it," said Daniel McConchie, vice president and chief of staff for Americans United for Life.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said voters will be able to judge distorted accounts of his votes against his legislative career in general.

"I don't doubt that if you take a series of votes and twist them and kind of squint, you can write a narrative the way you want to write it," Gibbs said. "I think what people understand is that (what matters) is taking the full measure of his career and the full measure of his legislative efforts."

Abortion opponents see Obama's vote on medical care for aborted fetuses as a refusal to protect the helpless. Some have even accused him of supporting infanticide.

Obama — who joined several other Democrats in voting "present" in 2001 and "no" the next year — argued the legislation was worded in a way that unconstitutionally threatened a woman's right to abortion by defining the fetus as a child.

"It would essentially bar abortions because the equal protection clause does not allow somebody to kill a child, and if this was a child then this would be an anti-abortion statute," Obama said in the Senate's debate in March 2001.

During his 2004 run for U.S. Senate, Obama said he supported similar federal legislation that included language clarifying that the measure did not interfere with abortion rights.

Such hot-button issues were the exception in a legislative career that focused more on building consensus to improve the justice system and aid the poor.

Gibbs noted Obama's leadership on legislation requiring police to videotape interrogations in murder cases. It started out as a controversial idea but ended up passing the Senate unanimously.

DOJ_NMG_0118215

Allies and opponents alike say he listened to those who disagreed, cooperated with Republicans and incorporated other people's suggestions for improving legislation.

"He was looked upon by members of both parties as someone whose view we listened carefully to," said Republican state Sen. Kirk Dillard from Hinsdale, Ill.

Obama regularly supported gun-control measures, including a ban on semiautomatic "assault weapons" and a limit on handgun purchases to one a month.

He also opposed letting people use a self-defense argument if charged with violating local handgun bans by using weapons in their homes. The bill was a reaction to a Chicago-area man who, after shooting an intruder, was charged with a handgun violation.

Supporters framed the issue as a fundamental question of whether homeowners have the right to protect themselves.

Obama joined several Chicago Democrats who argued the measure could open loopholes letting gun owners use their weapons on the street. They said local governments should have the final say, but the self-defense exception passed 41-16 and ultimately became state law.

"It's bad politics to be on the wrong side of the Second Amendment come election time," said Wayne LaPierre, executive vice president of the National Rifle Association. "It will certainly be talked about. You can take that to the bank."

On the other hand, Obama parted company with gun control advocates when he backed a measure to let retired police officers and military police carry concealed weapons.

Obama occasionally supported higher taxes, joining other Democrats in pushing to raise more than 300 taxes and fees on businesses in 2004 to help solve a budget deficit. The increases passed the Senate 30-28.

That's one reason Illinois business groups gave Obama a low rating, while labor groups praised him. But even Obama's allies say he refused to become a rubber stamp for their legislation.

"He always wants to understand an issue and think it through," said Roberta Lynch, deputy director for Council 31 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "You have to make your case no matter who you are."

For six years, Obama served in a Republican-controlled Senate, so he and fellow Democrats only got a fraction of their bills signed into law.

During his last two years, Democrats controlled the chamber and he was the go-to guy on a variety of issues. He helped pass legislation overhauling Illinois' troubled capital punishment system and was a key figure in requiring a massive statewide study of traffic stops to look for signs of racial profiling. Although police groups opposed the legislation, they say Obama listened to their concerns and accepted some of their suggestions to improve the bill.

Even when he was in the political minority, Obama sometimes played a critical role. He helped write one of the rare ethics laws in a state known for government corruption and worked on welfare reform with Republicans.

He sponsored legislation to bar job and housing discrimination against gays, and he helped create a state version of the earned income tax credit for the poor. Obama also led efforts to reject federal rules that would have put workers' overtime checks in jeopardy.

A Look At Obama's Record In Illinois (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 18, 2007

Some of the key issues U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, an Illinois Democrat poised to a run for president, sponsored or voted on during his eight years as a state senator:

BUDGET & TAXES

• Voted to raise the minimum wage in Illinois from $5.15 an hour to $6.50 an hour over two years. (2003)

• Helped pass a 5 percent earned-income tax credit for low-income working families in 2000; made the credit permanent in 2003.

• Voted to end $300 million worth of tax breaks for businesses. (2004)

• Voted against making permanent the repeal of the state's 5 percent sales tax on gasoline. (2000)

DOJ_NMG_0118216

HEALTH CARE

• Voted for having Illinois endorse embryonic stem cell research. (2004)

• Successfully sponsored the Health Care Justice Act, a study of ways to implement a universal health care system statewide. (2004)

• Voted against restrictions on public funding of abortion. (2000)

• Successfully co-sponsored a prescription drug discount buying club program for seniors and the disabled. (2003)

CRIME & GUN CONTROL

• Voted against letting people argue self-defense in court if charged with violating local weapons bans by using a gun in their home. (2004)

• Voted to let retired police and military police carry concealed weapons. (2004)

• Successfully sponsored requirement that law enforcement videotape interrogations of suspects in some serious crimes. (2003)

• Successfully sponsored law enforcement study of the race of people pulled over for traffic tickets. (2003)

• Helped pass an overhaul of the state's troubled death penalty system. (2003)

• Unsuccessfully sponsored measure to expunge some criminal records and create an employment grant program for ex-criminals. (2002)

• Unsuccessfully sponsored limit of one handgun purchase per month. (2000)

• Voted against making gang members eligible for the death penalty if they kill someone to help their gang. (2001)

MISCELLANEOUS

• Unsuccessfully co-sponsored ban on discrimination based on sexual orientation. The measure became law after Obama was elected to the U.S. Senate. (2003)

• Successfully sponsored move to shield Illinois workers from federal rules that threatened overtime pay for some employees.

• Successfully co-sponsored major ethics reform called the Gift Ban Act. (1998)

• Voted against giving tax credits to parents who send their children to private school. (1999)

___

On the Net:

Illinois General Assembly Web site: http://www.ilga.gov

As The Skeptics Ask Why, Obama Asks Why Not? (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — There is always, it seems, a fresh new face breezing into a presidential race, offering himself as the person to change the tone, eliminate the vitriol and transform the old ways of politics.

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois is auditioning for that role in the 2008 campaign. He said so himself, leaping into the Democratic contest this week on a promise to "advance the cause of change and progress that we so desperately need."

A long line of Democrats, Republicans and independents have gone before him, casting themselves as the sparkling candidate of the new politics only to find that their freshness withers well before the balloting begins. Think John Anderson, Gary Hart, Ross Perot.

How can Mr. Obama avoid a similar fate?

"Novelty alone is not a criteria for success, nor should it be," he said in an interview on Wednesday as he walked through the hallways of the Senate. "I do think there are moments in American history where there are opportunities to change the language of politics or set the country's sights in a different place, and I think we're in one of those moments."

Then, after pausing for a moment, he added: "Whether I'm the person to help move that forward or somebody else is, is not for me to determine."

DOJ_NMG_0118217

One day after opening his presidential exploratory committee, a procedural move that created an extraordinary tide of publicity, Mr. Obama returned to work in the Senate. It was the first reminder that even though he bills himself as a man intent on reforming Washington, he still has to report to his day job. In Washington.

And that point alone distinguished Mr. Obama from recent presidential hopefuls who presented themselves as not-from-Washington candidates. Four years ago, for example, Howard Dean returned to the governor's office in Vermont after his initial foray into the race, and instantly began railing against his rivals stuck in the nation's capital.

The biography and charisma of Mr. Obama, 45, have catapulted him into early prominence and set him apart from the parade of former presidential hopefuls like Mr. Dean, Mr. Perot, Jerry Brown and others who have challenged the status quo. But like them, he aspires to tap into a similar grass-roots following even as he gains endorsements from the party's traditional kingmakers.

"There has been more smoke blown in his direction than anyone in his lifetime, but that's not why he's running," said former Senator Bob Kerrey, Democrat of Nebraska, who has talked to Mr. Obama in recent weeks. "He's not lost his reasons for doing this. He realizes that it's his time."

During his two years in the Senate, Mr. Obama has sought to build a reputation for occasionally stepping across party boundaries. And in his announcement on Tuesday, he did not so much as utter the word "Democrat," perhaps signaling a desire to expand his appeal.

But Mr. Kerrey, who unsuccessfully ran for president in 1992, said he was not sure today's political climate would afford candidates that much leeway, particularly in a cutthroat primary aimed at the Democratic Party's most loyal base.

"The technique of applause lines are such that you are encouraged to say things that are a bit divisive," said Mr. Kerrey, who is not yet aligned with any of the candidates. "If it's a Democratic audience, they aren't going to give you a round of applause if you say the Republicans are pretty good people."

Indeed, Mr. Obama intends to frame his candidacy around a story from long ago. By formally declaring his candidacy on Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill., in the shadow of Abraham Lincoln's home, Mr. Obama will strive to make the point that America's 16th president did not have much government experience either, but led the nation through one of its most trying times.

"Just because something is new doesn't necessarily mean that it's right," Mr. Obama said in an interview. "And just because something is old doesn't mean it's wrong."

Still, an early test of his candidacy could come as candidates try to distinguish themselves and emerge from a field of up to 10 contenders during a series of presidential debates that are scheduled to begin by April. That is when an appealing biography gives way to questions about whether a candidate is actually prepared to govern.

Who, after all, could forget the moment in the 1984 primary when Walter Mondale ridiculed the candidacy of his rival, Mr. Hart, a Colorado senator who was running as an outsider on a message of hope, pragmatism and youth.

In a televised debate, Mr. Mondale declared, "When I hear your new ideas, I'm reminded of that ad, 'Where's the beef?' "

Reporters Swarm Obama After Announcement (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A photographer or two on the beach in Hawaii is nothing compared to the Capitol Hill swarm that greeted the newest presidential hopeful — Sen. Barack Obama.

Emerging from a lunch with colleagues Wednesday, reporters pressed the Illinois Democrat, who gave away little about his budding campaign. His appearance at a routine committee hearing drew every camera in the room, while the more senior senators who are thinking of running were ignored.

"Is there something rare at this table among competitors?" a smiling Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., remarked as he sat with Obama on his left and two other potential 2008 candidates — Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Biden of Delaware — on his right.

After months of hype, the freshman senator jumped into the White House race Tuesday by forming a presidential exploratory committee and disclosing that an official announcement would come Feb. 10. Obama got in the race despite saying a day earlier that he was concerned to find a photographer "lurking in the bushes" when he was on vacation in Hawaii with his family last month.

DOJ_NMG_0118218

Obama avoided media appearances Tuesday when he announced his decision on his Web site. Reporters found him Wednesday as he walked into the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to the rat-a-tat-tat of camera clicks.

Biden, the committee chairman, could have been accused of trying to undercut his rivals. He forgot to call on Kerry and moved to cut off Obama when his allotted time was up.

"Mr. Chairman, how am I doing on time?" Obama asked as he wrapped up. Biden and Kerry had been whispering and laughing at a private joke while Obama questioned the panel of experts promoting a diplomatic strategy in Iraq.

"Eight seconds," Biden replied.

"I have eight seconds? That's enough to get one question in," Obama said.

But as he started to talk, Biden cut him off. "You're out of time, but go for it," Biden said with a wave of his hand.

"That was a quick second!" Obama protested, and continued with his question as senators are wont to do.

Biden gave Kerry his time after Nelson pointed out that the 2004 presidential nominee was being skipped over. Biden said he'd been out of the room on a phone call and lost track.

Shortly thereafter, most of the media left the room, too, on the heels of Obama.

The media reassembled — and grew in ranks — outside the weekly Democratic caucus lunch in the Capitol. Reporters surrounded Obama as he tried to leave, and he was asked how he plans to be a father while running for president.

"I always care about my kids," Obama said, stepping onto an elevator but unable to escape a the persistent reporter's follow-up question with her colleagues blocking the doors.

How are you going to be a father to your kids running for president? "Well, these are all considerations that I'm taking into account as I make my decisions about moving forward," he said, drawing farther into the elevator and away from outstretched arms jostling tape recorders.

Another reporter asked for Obama's reaction to a proposal by likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., to cap the number of troops in Iraq. He didn't directly answer, but only said there are many proposals that Democrats are considering as they try to reverse President Bush's troop increase.

Asked if he will offer his own idea, Obama said cryptically, "That will be coming soon."

Finally, another elevator offered an escape — at least for the day.

___

On the Net:

http://www.barackobama.com

Obama Thrills Blacks Who See Shot At History (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The first black presidential candidate with a real shot at the White House is generating excitement and early support among blacks who see a chance to help make history.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama is all but certain to compete for the Democratic nomination and win a large share of black votes. That creates challenges for New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and other hopefuls.

Obama is by no means the first black candidate for president. Other contenders have included Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton.

Roger Wilkins, a race and politics expert at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va., calls him the first "truly serious" prospect. "This guy is not a civil rights leader who comes to politics or a preacher who comes to politics," Wilkins says. "He is a bona fide lawyer-politician. I've heard black people say 'I'm going to help this guy' — you don't want to be standing around when the first guy who has a real chance to be president is running."

Bill Clinton bonded so tightly with black voters that author Toni Morrison once called him "the first black president." That legacy and her own work have made Hillary Clinton popular among blacks. Clinton was favored by 39% of black Democrats and independents in combined USA TODAY/Gallup Polls conducted in November, December and this month; 31% chose Obama. The margin of error was +/—8 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0118219

Obama has room to improve; one-third of all those polled in December, regardless of race or party, said they had never heard of him, and 14% said they had no opinion. Comparable ratings for Clinton in November were 53% favorable, 42% unfavorable and 5% no opinion.

Obama partisans and some other observers say they expect him to become more popular among blacks and other voters when his official campaign gets rolling. He plans a formal announcement Feb. 10.

"I would expect him in most places to get the majority of the black votes" in primaries, says David Bositis, an expert on black voting behavior at the Joint Center for Economic and Political Studies.

Minyon Moore, a longtime Clinton friend who was political director in the Clinton White House, says it is way too early to talk about "a wholesale giveaway" of black votes to one candidate or another. She says black voters have grown sophisticated as a result of past campaigns by black hopefuls.

"We can make wise choices of who will work for our best interests regardless of color," she said. "It's not like African-Americans are breaking ground anymore."

Some, such as Wilkins and Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., argue that Obama is breaking ground in his broad-based appeal across racial and demographic lines. Other pluses: his level of political talent and his breadth of experience, from community organizing to Harvard Law Review to representing poor black constituents in the Illinois Senate and a diverse state in the U.S. Senate. They also cite his potential as a role model for black families.

"If Barack Obama is elected president of the United States, it will be possible to say to your children, this is what is attainable. You can be anything you want to in this country," Davis says.

Black voters don't figure largely in the nomination race until early February 2008. The competition moves at that point to South Carolina and Alabama, two states in which nearly half of Democratic primary voters are black.

"There is no question in my mind that Sen. Obama will get the lion's share of that vote," says Davis, a Harvard Law School classmate already pledged to Obama.

Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., said Obama's presence in his state will make it "very difficult" for Clinton and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, who was born in South Carolina and won its primary in 2004. But he said the black vote is not monolithic and ultimately black people will vote based on candidates' records and proposals.

Clinton is well positioned in that respect, both from her own work and her husband's, analysts say.

Beyond Bill Clinton's emotional ties to blacks, "he put into place policies that worked very favorably for African-Americans," Bositis says. One example: economic polices that helped black household income rise $5,000 in Clinton's second term as president.

Hillary Clinton has dealt with issues "of great importance to black people, such as creating a world in which poor children can flourish," Wilkins says. Still, he adds, "it's a chunk of support that they're going to have to fight like hell to keep. Hillary is not Bill. This election is not about putting Bill Clinton back in the Oval Office."

He's In (WP)

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

NO MATTER what your political leanings are, you're likely to feel at least a twinge of excitement about Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's decision to compete for the Democratic presidential nomination. At a minimum, Mr. Obama's entry guarantees a fascinating political season. A nomination that once looked like New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's for the taking now appears to be much more of a jump ball, with a gratifyingly crowded field that includes fellow senators Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.); the 2004 vice presidential nominee, former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

Mr. Obama, 45, presents himself as part of a new generation and a new brand of politician. It's not just that he's the son of a Kenyan father and a Kansan mother, a Midwesterner who spent part of his childhood in an Indonesian village. It's that he promises to transcend the boundaries of what many voters see as the tired racial and party politics of the past. The excitement about Mr. Obama speaks in part to Americans' desire to believe, whether true or not, that this country has come to a point when it can rise above its ugly history of racism; and in part to the desire to believe that, if it could just overcome the divisions that foul modern politics, the nation could get unstuck on many fronts. As Mr. Obama said this week, "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

DOJ_NMG_0118220

That's a fair if unsurprising diagnosis, and Mr. Obama's speeches and books leave no doubt that he grasps the complexities of the problems America faces. Mr. Obama has demonstrated the ability to see all sides of any issue; his willingness to try to understand rather than to dismiss the arguments of the other side is admirable. Less proven is his capacity to choose wisely from among competing imperatives -- he's had a scant two years in the Senate -- or his ability to withstand the unrelenting scrutiny of a presidential race. This is, after all, a man who didn't face a single negative ad during his Senate campaign.

"I am new enough on the national political scene that I serve as a blank screen on which people of vastly different political stripes project their own views," Mr. Obama wrote in his book "The Audacity of Hope." As he begins to fill in the blanks -- and as his opponents try to sketch in their own version -- Mr. Obama knows he's "bound to disappoint" some voters. But given his talent, and the depth of the growing field of candidates, it may not be too much to hope for a more thoughtful, less scripted debate than usual.

The Democratic Field (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Illinois Senator Barack Obama's announcement this week that he's likely to enter the Presidential race adds a dash of glamour and excitement to the Democratic field. But all of his media attention doesn't change the basic truth of the 2008 primary contest: The race is between Hillary Rodham Clinton and everybody else.

New York's junior Senator hasn't announced yet, but her troops have long been massing, ready to march on her orders. And what a political machine it is, starting with her husband, who has made it clear he is aching for her to run. Psychoanalyzing the Clintons is perilous, but we suspect the former President doesn't like the way his years in office ended, with impeachment, the Marc Rich pardon and Al Gore's failure to deliver a third symbolic term. A victory for his wife would be a kind of political redemption for him too.

Mrs. Clinton brings her own considerable strengths, not least intelligence and self-discipline. She has performed far more smoothly in the Senate than many observers expected, and she hasn't been a polarizing figure in New York (winning 67% of the vote in November).

Then there are those Clinton legions -- of fund-raisers, union chiefs, party bosses, think tank operatives, media consultants. Mrs. Clinton blew through more than $30 million during her all but uncontested Senate re-election campaign, and she will have little trouble raising another $100 million or more. Longtime aide Harold Ickes -- famous for his silent depositions in Clinton II -- is the seasoned hand on money matters and he'll also bring on Big Labor. Meanwhile, former White House chief of staff John Podesta has set up the Center for American Progress, from which she can poach left-leaning policy ideas.

From her national perch on the Armed Services Committee, Mrs. Clinton has so far also walked a remarkable tightrope on the Iraq war, only recently coming out for some sort of "cap" on the number of troops. A major story over the coming year will be whether she can resist the defeatist tug of her party's antiwar left as she tries to win the Democratic nomination.

Which brings up her biggest liability -- the fear in many Democratic hearts that she's not "electable." Mrs. Clinton carries much of the scandal baggage of her husband's tenure without much of his political charisma. If one potential Democratic theme is to run against the "divisive" Bush Republicans, Hillary is not your ideal "uniter." Perhaps American voters won't want to hear about Arkansas, et cetera, all over again, but then is that a risk Democrats want to take?

This is where Mr. Obama comes in, bidding to be the un-Hillary. At age 45, he's already managed the remarkable feat of writing his own autobiography, literally and politically. He's applauded for saying he's proud that he did inhale, and he has the virtue of being a genuinely fresh face. But campaigns have a way of filling in a candidate's resumes in ways other than they design, including their positions on actual issues. Mr. Obama is already moving left on national security -- which is dangerous ground for a political rookie amid what the Pentagon calls "the long war" on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0118221

North Carolina's John Edwards is another vigorous contender, though the erstwhile Vice Presidential candidate failed to deliver his home state to John Kerry last time around. This time he's raising the decibels on his "two Americas" campaign theme, hoping to catch some of that Hubert Humphrey political magic. If he can sell this message as a millionaire trial lawyer, he'll have earned the nomination.

The rest of the Democratic field includes two governors -- Iowa's Tom Vilsack and New Mexico's Bill Richardson -- who have solid state records, and Mr. Richardson also has foreign-policy credentials. But both will have trouble breaking through the fund-raising barriers erected by the campaign-finance limits they themselves have supported. This is a shame, because both men have something to offer. And then there is the usual gaggle of Senators -- Dodd, Biden and even Kerry -- who are running because . . . well, because that seems to be what their DNA has programmed them to do.

If we were betting on a wild card challenger, we'd look instead to Al Gore. The former Vice President has been coy about his intentions. But he might be getting a ton of free publicity for his global warming "documentary" come Oscar time, and there's little doubt he could raise money if he got in. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, there are a lot of Democrats who feel passionately about him and his near-win in 2000.

There are cycles in politics, and, after eight years of Republicans in the White House, Democrats in 2008 will have the public's normal desire for change on their side. On the other hand, they will also have to show they can be trusted on national security in a post 9/11 world, especially running against the likes of Republicans John McCain or Rudy Giuliani. Mrs. Clinton's studied middle-ground on security suggests she understands that. The main Democratic drama of the coming months will be whether her party really trusts that she and her husband have learned enough not to repeat the mistakes of the 1990s.

McCain's War Stance Alienates Many (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. John McCain's vocal support for sending more U.S. troops to Iraq has set him apart from most of the emerging crop of major presidential contenders. And that position could harm his political prospects, according to a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll.

More than one-third of those polled — 36% — said they would be "much less likely" to back the Arizona Republican for the White House because of his position. Six percent said his stand made them "somewhat less likely" to vote for him.

Only 13% said they were somewhat or much more likely to support him because of his embrace of a force escalation; 42% said it had no effect on their view of him; and 3% gave no answer to the question.

Perhaps most ominously for McCain, the survey found that his advocacy of a troop buildup could undercut what has been one of his political strengths: the ability to attract independents.

In the poll, 43% of independents said they were somewhat or much less likely to vote for him because he has backed President's Bush plan to deploy 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Among Democrats, 59% said McCain's view made them less likely to support him.

His position helped him only among his fellow Republicans, and within this group the impact was not substantial — 24% said McCain's stance made them more likely to support him, 16% said they were less likely to do so, and the rest said that it had no effect or that they did not have an opinion on the matter.

In another sign of the soured public attitude toward the war in Iraq, opposition to the troop increase is a boost for the three leading Democrats expected to square off for their party's nomination: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Among the 1,344 adults interviewed for the poll, 34% said they were more likely to support one of these Democrats for president, knowing of their opposition to troop escalation; 18% said they were less likely to back any of them because of their stance.

Also, 38% said they were more likely to back a presidential candidate who supported a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, a position the Bush administration has adamantly opposed. Twelve percent said they were less likely to vote for a candidate favoring a specific schedule for withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0118222

Forty-six percent said the candidate's position on a timetable would not affect their support, whereas 4% expressed no opinion.

The poll was conducted Saturday through Tuesday; for the entire sample, it has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

'Move On' Takes Aim At McCain's Iraq Stance (CQ)

By Greg Giroux

Congressional Quarterly, January 18, 2007

If more evidence was needed that the 2008 presidential campaign is hitting full stride months ahead of schedule, here it is:

The political arm of the liberal organization Moveon.org launched television advertisements Wednesday that assail Arizona Sen. John McCain, a top-tier prospect for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, over his stance on the Iraq war.

Plans for the television ad campaign were announced last week by Moveon.org Poltitical Action, a federal political action committee, and will cost an estimated $250,000. The ads are airing in television markets in Iowa and New Hampshire, which respectively will hold the first caucuses and primary of the 2008 nomination season next January. They also will appear on cable television in New York and Washington, D.C.

Specifically, the ads take McCain to task for supporting President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq. The move, long advocated by McCain, is aimed at quelling sectarian violence that is greatly destabilizing that war-torn nation and threatening to turn into an all-out civil war.

But the war in general and the troop buildup in particular are opposed by most Democratic politicians and liberal activists.

The ad describes the proposed troop buildup as "McCain's idea" and frequently pictures the Arizona senator alongside Bush, whose poor job approval ratings are attributed mainly to public opposition to the Iraq war.

"The McCain plan to escalate: going from bad to worse," a narrator intones in the ad.

The ad echoes criticism aimed at McCain — who is polling strongly among GOP hopefuls — by Democrats such as former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee. A declared candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination and avowed Iraq war opponent, Edwards has taken to referring to the administration proposal as "the McCain Doctrine."

McCain has acknowledged that his support for a troop increase in Iraq carries risks for his all-but-announced White House bid. While he has long supported beefing up the U.S. military presence in Iraq, he has said a so-called "surge" needs to be matched with a change in strategy in Iraq that would include requiring that nation's fledgling government to meet new benchmarks.

"The presence of additional coalition forces would allow the Iraqi government to do what it cannot accomplish today on its own: impose its rule throughout the country," McCain said at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Jan. 12.

McCain's campaign told the Associated Press last week — when news of the ads surfaced — that Moveon.org was an "out-of-the-mainstream organization that has a long history of airing inflammatory material."

McCain does not stand alone in the potential Republican field as a supporter of the administration's position. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who say they are exploring candidacies, also back Bush on the troop increase.

But Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who also is considering a bid, opposes increasing American troop strength in Iraq as counter-productive. And Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, an independent-minded Republican who also is considering a White House bid, has excoriated the Bush administration over the policy.

Hagel on Wednesday was one of three senators who introduced a non-binding resolution that says it is "not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

Hagel sponsored the resolution along with Delaware Democrat Joseph R. Biden Jr., who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and says he is a candidate for his party's presidential nomination, and Michigan Democrat Carl Levin, who chairs the Armed Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0118223

Biden joins other Democratic hopefuls in opposing the troop increase, which they say is tantamount to an “escalation” of the war.

Permalink | NEW! Bookmark This Article: del.icio.us or Newsvine | Related Topics: President 2008

Name:

E-mail Address (for verification only; not for publication):

Remember personal info?

Comments:

© 2007 • All Rights Reserved • Congressional Quarterly Inc.

1255 22nd Street N.W. • Washington, D.C. 20037 • 202-419-8500

About CQ | Privacy Policy | Masthead | Terms & Conditions

Before Running, Candidates Must Explore (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) has one, as do several Republicans: Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and John McCain (Ariz.), former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney. And any day now, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) may be compelled to form her own.

It's this season's must-have political entity: the presidential exploratory committee. The legal equivalent of sticking one toe in the campaign waters, an exploratory committee allows prospective candidates to begin raising money for a campaign while they are still deciding whether to take the plunge.

Obama hand-delivered his committee paperwork to the Federal Election Commission on Tuesday morning, explaining that he would announce a formal decision Feb. 10. The five-page file reveals little beyond who's keeping the books and which bank the campaign is using (Citibank). But it puts his campaign on firm legal ground. Most candidates would prefer not to announce a candidacy this early, but given the massive sums they must raise to compete these days, they need all the time they can get.

The straggler is Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, who has been mum on her plans. An aide said yesterday evening that the senator "would likely be making her intentions clear in a matter of weeks, not months."

But at some point soon, whatever political advantage Clinton may gain by waiting could collide with the firm legal requirements that accompany a candidacy, even one in the exploratory phase.

The most significant of those, said FEC commissioner Michael E. Toner, is that she cannot legally raise money for a presidential bid without first forming an exploratory committee. Obama's filing "ups the ante," Toner said, "in that he has tremendous potential to raise money."

She may also find it increasingly difficult to sidestep the array of legal triggers that, if tripped, would require her to form a committee, said Scott Thomas, a former FEC chairman. Those include raising or spending more than $5,000 toward a presidential bid from her leadership political action committee, HillPAC, a separate account used to support candidates and party committees.

"If her leadership PAC is paying for her to fly around and speak in public settings, and it looks like that activity is toward a campaign effort, that would trigger a requirement that she file," Thomas said.

The word "exploratory" is not in any FEC regulations. Instead, the phase is referred to as "testing the waters," and an exploratory committee is legally just a campaign committee with "exploratory" in its name. When a formal campaign is announced, the candidate usually changes the name of the committee -- for instance, from "Obama Exploratory Committee," as the senator named his new entity, to something like "Obama for President."

"If you want to just test the waters, assess your viability, you don't necessarily have to register a committee with us," said FEC spokesman Robert W. Biersack. "But in exchange, you cannot do certain things: create a war chest, actively campaign, generate material that says 'Vote for me.' "

Some campaign-finance experts complain that the current law gives prospective candidates too much wiggle room. For instance, Clinton and Obama have been lining up staffs for weeks, if not months, including fundraisers, policy experts and field organizers, on a far bigger scale than even a Senate leadership operation would warrant.

Several presidential campaign insiders, speaking on background, said their lawyers have cautioned against heavy hiring as well as excessive fundraising. "We ought to have a much cleaner system here for presidential candidates raising and spending money," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a government-ethics watchdog group. "These are very murky waters."

Lieberman's Party, But Someone Else's Fight (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

HARTFORD, Jan. 17 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman's critics frequently enjoy referring to him as a member of "the party of one."

At least in the technical sense, that was true for a while in the Connecticut for Lieberman party. But now, things are getting complicated and mutiny is breaking out in the ranks — though those ranks are few in number.

The senator's supporters created the party line last summer, solely to give Mr. Lieberman a spot on the ballot in the general election after he lost the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont.

With the knowledge that neither Mr. Lieberman nor his supporters planned to take the reins, one of Mr. Lieberman's loudest critics, John Orman, filed papers after the election with the secretary of state declaring himself chairman of the party. His rules stated that anyone who shared a name with Mr. Lieberman or disagreed with him could join.

Earlier this month, the secretary of state's office said everything appeared in order with Mr. Orman's filing.

But a supporter of Mr. Lieberman's, Stuart R. Korchin, was furious to learn that Mr. Orman was hijacking the party. After reading the news of Mr. Orman's self-appointed leadership position, Mr. Korchin sent him an e-mail message, stating that he, in fact, was the sole member and chairman of the newly created political organization. Mr. Korchin, in a personal protest over the results of the Democratic primary, changed his party registration on Aug. 9 to Connecticut for Lieberman.

"I was unaware that you wished to join," Mr. Korchin wrote. "Please contact me if you are interested in helping to organize the party. I'm sure someone with your talents will be welcome."

Apparently, when Mr. Korchin filled out a short form in August at the Cheshire Town Hall changing his party affiliation from Democrat to Connecticut for Lieberman, the information could not be properly entered in the state's electronic voter database. So when Mr. Orman contacted the secretary of state, there was no record that anyone else belonged to the nascent party.

Now the two men are at loggerheads over who controls the party, which, to anyone's knowledge, includes only the two of them.

"He can say whatever he wants; the fact of the matter is I was there first," Mr. Korchin said in an interview.

"I held a meeting, wrote the rules and filed with the secretary of state," Mr. Orman said. "It is the real thing."

On Wednesday, Mr. Korchin received a letter from a lawyer in the secretary of state's office, stating that the state had "very limited jurisdiction" over intraparty battles, and was not taking a position over just who was in charge. The secretary of state's office noted that it had already received a rules document from Mr. Orman.

On Thursday, Mr. Orman will hold what he says is the second meeting of the party, at a hotel in Milford.

Shades Of Grey (WSJ)

By John Fund

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif.--Ted Kennedy, the nation's most persistent backer of nationalized health care, must be smiling at the irony. Almost four decades after he first proposed the idea, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Kennedy relative by marriage, is touting his own version of universal coverage, and, if adopted, the idea could go nationwide quickly. It's no wonder critics are already dubbing the ostensibly Republican chief executive "Schwarzenkennedy."

DOJ_NMG_0118225

This isn't the first time Mr. Kennedy has found a Republican to carry water for him. In 1971, after Medicare spending had increased by more than 70% in five years (although the number of people enrolled grew by only 6%), Richard Nixon declared a "health-care cost crisis" and worked with Mr. Kennedy to propose mandatory employer-provided health insurance. The idea foundered, but a modified version now has been revived by Mr. Schwarzenegger, who wants to require that every person buy health insurance, or be covered by an employer or the government. Massachusetts has a more modest law in place, and an adviser to Mitt Romney helped Schwarzenegger aides on their plan.

Liberals are overjoyed at the about-face by a governor who in 2005 vetoed a Democratic bill that would have merely expanded the state's coverage of children, saying the $300 million price tag was too high. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez praises the governor's new proposal: "This is a plan Assembly Democrats could have written."

Indeed, they already have--and Mr. Schwarzenegger fiercely opposed it at the time. In 2003, then-Gov. Gray Davis, fighting to stave off his recall, signed a law mandating employers with 20 or more employees provide health coverage or pay into a state fund that would provide it. After Mr. Davis was recalled, Mr. Schwarzenegger helped lead an effort to repeal what he called a "job-killing health-care tax." In 2004, 51% of voters agreed and repealed universal coverage in the same election in which George W. Bush lost the state by 10 percentage points and the highly liberal Sen. Barbara Boxer was re-elected by 20 points.

But the next year, Mr. Schwarzenegger suffered a stinging defeat as public employee unions spent $130 million in a special election to defeat four reform initiatives he supported. A chastened governator swung left by hiring as top aides Susan Kennedy and Daniel Zingale, two former deputy chiefs of staff to the recalled Mr. Davis; Jason Kinney, a Davis speechwriter, joked that he had decided "to finish the second term of Gray Davis." No one is laughing now. The behind-the-scenes architects of much of the governor's plan were Ms. Kennedy and Mr. Zingale, who also served as Mr. Davis's director of managed health care.

Last November, Gov. Schwarzenegger won landslide re-election in part by winning 91% of Republicans with an ironclad pledge not to raise taxes. He pounded Phil Angelides, his Democratic opponent, for wanting to raise taxes by $7 billion to pay for universal health care. But now the estimated cost of the Schwarzenegger plan to cover California's uninsured, including two million illegal aliens, is $12 billion. State subsidies for people to buy insurance will extend to those earning up to $50,000 a year, more than California's median income. "He's creating a welfare state where more than half the people are in the wagon being pulled than outside the wagon pulling," says one health-care analyst.

As bad as the policy implications are, the governor's plan may be fatally flawed, politically. He insists it doesn't raise taxes, despite billions in new charges on doctors, hospitals and employers. He prefers to call the new revenue "in-lieu fees" and "coverage dividends." "He excoriated Phil Angelides, rightly, for proposing the same tax increases he has put on the table," says GOP state Sen. Tom McClintock. "He is now pushing the second largest tax increase in California history. I won't be able to trust anything he says."

Whether the new revenue is a tax or not is important, because if it is a tax the plan must garner a very difficult two-thirds vote in both legislative houses. Barring that, the California Supreme Court will have trouble with the concept. A fee on employers who don't offer health insurance probably requires only a majority vote. However, the imposition of a levy on the gross revenues of doctors and hospitals is almost certainly a tax that would require two-thirds approval.

Then there are the feds. The $5 billion a year in extra federal Medicaid money, which the governor is banking on, is shaky. An even greater barrier is Erisa, the 1974 federal pension law that preempts all state laws that regulate employee benefits. Last summer, a federal judge threw out Maryland's so-called "Wal-Mart law" requiring large firms to spend 8% of their payroll on health care because "state laws which impose health or welfare mandates on employers are invalid under Erisa." Just yesterday a federal appeals court upheld the ruling voiding the Maryland law.

Rather than pursue a legally dubious universal coverage proposal, Mr. Schwarzenegger should have pursued the universal access he used to tout. He could sign up more of the nearly one million Californians eligible for current health programs but not yet enrolled. The 49 coverage mandates that make insurance so expensive (Idaho has only 13) could be reduced and residents allowed to buy coverage from other states. Nurse practitioners could be allowed to set up their own clinics. Instead, the governor's plan piles on a new mandate that bars insurers from turning down anyone based on health status or age. When New Jersey instituted a similar rule in 1993, premiums jumped 500%.

DOJ_NMG_0118226

Mr. Schwarzenegger insists he is pursuing a centrist course that borrows from both the right and left. But more realistically, he is imitating Richard Nixon's old strategy of throwing rhetorical bones to his right while attempting to appease the left with liberal programs. Emmet John Hughes, an Eisenhower speechwriter who knew Nixon well, once said he "judged any declaration of speech not by its content but by its impact." That explains Nixon's dramatic lurches into or toward wage price controls, a guaranteed annual income and mandatory employer health insurance.

Arnold Schwarzenegger used to claim he admired Ronald Reagan most "because he stuck by his principles when others wouldn't." But with his Rube Goldberg health plan Mr. Schwarzenegger has demonstrated that at his core he prefers roles more suited to Tricky Dick than the Gipper. Should he succeed, the long-term dream of nationalized health care held by Ted Kennedy, and Hillary Clinton, will be closer to reality than ever.

Homeless In America (WSJ)

By Julia Vitullo-martin

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Can urban street homelessness be ended? In a sort of Nixon-goes-to-China reversal of expectations, the Bush White House argues that the answer is yes -- and is putting substantial effort and resources (over $4 billion annually) into proving it. "We're setting a new marker in front of the country," says Philip Mangano, executive director of the White House's U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness. "After 20 years of seeing the problem get worse, we're no longer 'managing' the homeless crisis. We're ending the disgrace." He cites impressive declines in street counts since the White House started their big push in 2003: 50% in Philadelphia, 30% in Miami, 28% in San Francisco, 26% in Dallas, 21% in Nashville. New York City has seen a 13% decrease since 2005, the first year in which a citywide street census was taken.

Usually male and enduring some impairment -- mental illness, drug or alcohol addiction, disease -- those who've lived on the streets for more than a year ("the chronics") make up about 10% of the two million or so Americans regarded as homeless. They regularly consume a disproportionate amount of public resources -- sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars per person. They also often wreak disproportionate havoc on both commercial areas and residential neighborhoods -- inducing compassion fatigue even in usually tolerant cities like New York and San Francisco.

Traditional homeless advocates have seldom paid attention to the destructive effects some street people had on neighborhoods. That's been changing, in part at the insistence of mayors, who fund most homeless services, and corporate leaders. New York's Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who calls street homelessness "intolerable" on both humanitarian and economic grounds, says, "I was elected to take on the tough issues, the ones people said you couldn't do anything about -- and that some people pander on." Not one to shy from a fight, he gave a speech in July calling on mayors and communities to free themselves from the tyranny of the advocates.

"How well a city takes care of the least of its people says a great deal about it from a business recruitment point of view," says Horace Sibley, chairman of Atlanta's Regional Commission on Homelessness. In 2001 Mayor Shirley Franklin appointed Mr. Sibley to head a commission on homelessness, organized with the United Way. After the commission issued a report in 2002, the mayor asked members to stay on, implementing their recommendations, which combined permanent housing with medical care, mental health and substance abuse counseling, job training and placement to help people move toward living independently. "It's much less expensive to put chronically homeless folks in safe and decent housing, giving them the support system they need," says Mr. Sibley, "than it is to have them perpetually rotating in and out of hospitals, jails, ambulances and psychiatric hospitals." Over the last year the number of street people in Atlanta has declined 8.5%. The plan seems to be working, says A.J. Robinson, executive director of Central Atlanta Progress. "The business community will rally around strong political leadership that offers solutions on this thorny issue."

Atlanta and other cities have been building on the findings of University of Pennsylvania Professor Dennis Culhane, who pointed out in the late 1990s that a $12,000 per-year supportive housing unit was far more effective in keeping people off the street than a $35,000 per-year shelter bed. But the homeless industry remained oriented to the big shelters created in the mid-1980s, which Mr. Mangano calls the "old status quo response of ad hoc, uncoordinated, well-intentioned, but ineffective crisis intervention." A bowl of soup and a blanket was thought to be the best we could do, he adds. Armed with Mr. Culhane's data and convinced that concentrating resources on the chronics could produce results, Mr. Mangano approached his job (left vacant by President Clinton) zealously. Believing in the effectiveness of political will, partnership and 10-year plans, he traveled the country relentlessly, working with states, counties, cities and the private sector to coordinate systematic approaches. "No one level of government can get the job done alone," he says, in part because federal resources go to the states as block grants that are spent by multiple jurisdictions.

DOJ_NMG_0118227

The ideas that form the basis of the most successful 10-year plans -- and that are revolutionizing the long stagnant field of homeless services -- originated in New York, once the epicenter of street homelessness and now the model to be emulated. Not all of the ideas sound very Republican, but Mr. Mangano is an eminently practical and non-ideological man. The basic strategy, called Housing First, comes from a Harlem-based group, Pathways to Housing, which does not require psychiatric or substance-abuse training as a qualification for housing. Clients do not have to be either sober or drug-free.

This rubs many people the wrong way, including many advocates. Others, like Rosanne Haggerty, executive director of Common Ground Community, which builds and manages supportive housing in Manhattan, say it is right to shift the emphasis from private to public behavior. "We don't ask our lease-holding tenants, any more than any landlord asks, whether a tenant is drinking in his or her apartment. But we're very strict about behavior. If someone behaves badly, we get on it quickly -- figuring out what needs to be changed. We have few rules, but we enforce them vigorously." From the neighborhood's point of view -- and Ms. Haggerty runs buildings in once-notorious Times Square -- it is the public behavior that matters.

Atlanta's Mr. Sibley agrees, adding, "What appeals to us is that once a person has a decent place to live, [he] can get [his] life in order step by step. Each individual still has to take responsibility for [his] own future." Which leads to the perennial problem: employment. If the goal of independent living for former street people is to be achieved, or even attempted, training and counseling have to be part of the mix. Atlanta's model was a New York employment program -- Ready, Willing and Able. George McDonald, founder and former businessman, estimates that at least half of the men he works with for the first time have previously been homeless for substantial periods. "The vast majority of homeless single adults in our program," says Mr. McDonald, "are coming out of prison or jail, don't have an education, and do have substance abuse problems."

Well over half of every cohort of new RWA clients succeed the first time they try to live and work on their own after graduating from the program. In Atlanta, Mr. Sibley says the RWA model has helped 60 formerly chronically homeless people move into housing and employment, at a savings to the city of about $1 million.

Yet Mr. Mangano lives with one huge failure: Los Angeles, which he calls the Ground Zero of American street homelessness. Entangled in bureaucratic wrangling among government agencies, the city has made virtually no progress in ending the encampments of 5,000-plus homeless people on the former Skid Row. The high floors of elegant new downtown skyscrapers look out on block after block of tents, shacks and cardboard, a sight reminiscent of the Great Depression.

"Los Angeles is doing phenomenally well economically," says Mr. Mangano. "So of course we can get to the bottom of street homelessness. Because while we're doing this for moral, spiritual and human reasons, it's the economic reasons that drive the political will." Mr. Mangano intends to deploy a task force of the most successful homeless officials and operators to work with the city.

Will economics eventually end the "disgrace" of street homelessness in America's wealthiest cities? It's about one-third of the way there.

Ms. Vitullo-Martin is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Business Drops The Doha Ball (WSJ)

By Fredrik Erixon And Andreas Freytag

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The Doha train has started to run again. The trade talks are still moving at a snail's pace, but the meetings in Washington last week between the Bush administration and European leaders have spurred some optimism. Trans-Atlantic leadership for the current round of trade liberalization has been needed for many years, and bridging the diverging opinions across the pond is certainly necessary. But if this new optimism is going to materialize, movement is also required from an actor that has been conspicuously absent from this round: business.

DOJ_NMG_0118228

The World Trade Organization has often been portrayed by antitrade groups as a corporate puppet. But one key problem in this round has been the relative silence on industry's part. Business has been the dog that didn't bark.

There are exceptions. Chief executives of some big U.S. firms in transport and financial services have intervened and twisted arms in the U.S. Congress and in Geneva. Victor Fung, the U.S.-Hong Kong businessman, and Peter Sutherland, the former WTO chief who now chairs BP and Goldman Sachs International, continue to be tireless campaigners of multilateral trade liberalization. Marcus Wallenberg, chairman of a number of multinational companies, has geared up the efforts of the International Chamber of Commerce and taken the business case for Doha to political leaders across the globe. Yet they haven't gotten much help.

Business leaders' absence from the game is understandable. All the global-governance hubris, windy rhetoric and political grandstanding invariably displayed at big WTO meetings offer ample reasons for outsiders to take a rain check. The round has effectively been stalemated from day one, and all "last-minute" rescue attempts so far have only diluted the agenda and exempted some key business interests from the round. For everyone who wants the WTO to remain relevant in the future, this is cause for concern.

Yet the Doha agenda still has serious appeal for businesses interested in freer trade. Business opportunities in goods and industrial products will be significantly improved, particularly when it comes to exports to major developing countries. And binding countries to their currently applied tariffs -- which are lower than the ones agreed in the last multilateral talks, the Uruguay Round -- can increase stability and certainty in world trade. The Doha Round will not substantially liberalize trade in services, but it can lock in already achieved liberalizations, especially for investment, as well as dismantle some of the worst nontariff barriers to trade. What's more, the vast majority of the business community has a lot to gain from a WTO deal that puts limits on antidumping measures, today the weapon of choice for protectionist governments, and prohibits egregious abuses of other trade-defense instruments.

Compared to the alternatives, such as bilateral free trade agreements, or FTAs, the Doha agenda is the best offer around for global corporations. One can argue at length over bilateralism versus multilateralism, but this is a superficial exercise that only clouds the real issues. They are neither opposites nor substitutes for each other. There is room for both of them. But one should be wary of replacing the possible outcome of the Doha Round with the sales pitches for FTAs.

America's FTA policy has been a State Department charm offensive rather than a function of business priorities. Asian FTAs are a hodgepodge of weak and partial bilateral agreements. The EU has recently lifted its moratorium on new FTA negotiations and outlined a very ambitious agenda for new bilateral deals with Asian countries. But even if all of them are successfully concluded, which is highly unrealistic, business will stand to gain far less than Brussels claims.

Though roughly 300 FTAs or regional agreements have been achieved, they only account for about a third of the market openings facilitated by the eight multilateral trade rounds. If one exempts the 10 biggest bilateral and regional agreements, the market-access provision in the average agreement is modest to unrecognizable.

This is not to say they are of no use. Many FTAs have reduced trade bureaucracy, liberalized regulatory barriers to trade and improved the conditions for trade in intellectual property. But they cannot be expected to deliver new business opportunities on a par with a WTO deal -- particularly as FTAs come with complicated rules-of-origin regulations that place heavy administrative burdens on business to prove that not too much of a good's production has been done in a third country outside the FTA. In fact, the arcane world of rules-of-origin regulations in many countries is too complex for even the biggest multinational companies to understand, and many of the ones that do understand them would just as soon pay a higher, non-FTA tariff.

The presence of free-trade-minded businesses is necessary to accelerate the Doha train. The WTO, as most other trading arrangements, has a mercantilistic superstructure in which "producer interests" trump "consumer interests." Yet the producer interests that have flexed their muscles in this round have not been inclined toward liberalization. And they are the ones that have been twisting arms, knocking on the doors of congressmen and members of parliament, and telephoning political leaders.

If nothing substantial happens in the next few weeks the round will only have a past and no future. This is the last call for Doha.

DOJ_NMG_0118229

Mr. Erixon is a director and founder of Ecipe, a Brussels-based think tank. Mr. Freytag is a senior fellow of Ecipe and a professor of economics at the Friedrich Schiller University in Jena, Germany.

The Biggest Losers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

One of the more intriguing statistics in demography is migration among the 50 states. And especially revealing is the data on "out-migration," or those residents of a state who flee to what they must figure will be better climes.

The Empire Center think tank of New York has inspected the latest Census Data on migration, and it finds that two of the three biggest losers of people from 2005 to 2006 were California and New York. Louisiana was the biggest net loser, as 241,000 fled the state for a rate of 54.85 per 1,000 residents, but it is a special case after Hurricane Katrina.

New York, which finished second, has no such act-of-God excuse. It lost more than 225,000, or a rate of 11.69 per 1,000 from 2005 to 2006, and more than 1.2 million New Yorkers have moved out since 2000. California lost the most people (287,000) of any state from 2005 to 2006, but because it is the most populous state its out-migration rate was a merely dreadful 7.92. Without immigrants who have made up some of the difference, both states, and especially New York, would have declining overall populations and thus shrinking tax bases.

Authors E. J. McMahon and Kathryn McCall point out that no single cause can explain these migration trends. Housing costs, New York's stagnant upstate economy and heavy tax burdens no doubt play a role. On the other hand, weather probably counts for less, since Alaska, New Hampshire, Maine, Wisconsin and Minnesota have all added population even as New Yorkers have left by the tens of thousands.

Our own guess is that taxes and economic opportunity are decisive in many cases, especially for the mobile young and the well-to-do old. Even New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer doesn't think he can change the weather, so he'll have to do something about those anti-growth policies.

The Mayor And His Tax Cuts (NYT)

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

Michael Bloomberg was elected mayor five years ago after a self-financed campaign in which he shunned the politician label. So it was particularly striking to see his turnaround become all but complete in his State of the City speech yesterday, when he offered up a crowd-pleasing promise to cut taxes by $1 billion. It was an undeniable moment of political triumph, but it was less clear that it was a triumph for prudent governance.

Mr. Bloomberg is riding high these days, as polls confirm, and he took some well-deserved bows for a job well done. He has also been cutting a national profile on issues like guns and poverty, and now he has added taxes to the list.

The latest tax cuts can only help his standing with voters. It cannot be lost on aides who have been pressing the mayor to run for president that hacking away at voters' tax bills is almost always good politics.

But it is not always good municipal management. It is true that the city has a budget surplus of more than $2 billion now, but the black ink may not last. Mr. Bloomberg showed more caution last year, using a surplus to pay down future obligations.

The new tax cuts are not wildly imprudent. The proposed 5 percent property tax cut will largely be offset by the increases homeowners will see because New York real estate values have continued their steady rise — and it will be for just one year. Some of his other proposed cuts, including rolling back taxes on clothing and small businesses, will need Albany's approval, which is hardly assured.

The tax cuts could end up helping the city's fiscal outlook by improving its competitiveness, especially for small businesses. But Mr. Bloomberg will have to make the case that any such gains would not come at the expense of the fiscal responsibility he himself has long championed.

US, Germany Relaunch Mideast Quartet (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118230

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and current EU president Germany said the international quartet for Middle East peace would meet next month, calling the time ripe for a fresh initiative.

Rice and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told reporters after talks in Berlin that representatives from the United Nations, the United States, Russia and the European Union would meet in Washington "probably February 1 or 2."

"I look forward to that meeting as we re-energize the quartet in its efforts to support the progress in the Middle East that could lead to a two-state solution and a Palestinian state living side by side in peace, democracy and freedom," Rice said.

Germany, in its capacity as the current EU president, has pushed for a revitalized role for the quartet at what it considers to be an auspicious time to bring an end to the bloodshed.

"A solution to that problem is more urgent today than ever," Steinmeier said. "We are both of the opinion that the time is ripe for a meeting of the quartet."

Its last full meeting was in September.

Rice came to Germany from Kuwait after completing a six-country tour of the Middle East during which she announced she would hold a three-way summit with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas within a month.

She said in Berlin it would take "a few weeks" to organize the three-way summit.

"I think it will be useful to have the meeting with the quartet in advance of that meeting," Rice said.

Rice said Sunday Washington wanted to build on what she called "the momentum that is currently in Palestinian-Israeli relations."

Steinmeier said he believed the stalled roadmap -- the peace plan drawn up in 2003 by the members of the quartet with the aim of establishing a viable Palestinian state living peacefully alongside Israel -- remained the best option for progress.

In Berlin, Rice also met Christopher Hill, the top US envoy to six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program, who is holding discussions with the North's negotiator in the German capital.

She said she hoped the six-party negotiations would resume "soon" and that Hill's talks in the German capital would pave the way for "a more favorable atmosphere" when the discussions continue.

Rice and Steinmeier also discussed Iran's nuclear ambitions. Rice underscored the US administration's refusal to engage in bilateral talks with Tehran until it stops enriching uranium.

"This is not the time to break a longstanding American policy of not engaging with the Iranians bilaterally," she said. "It's just not the time."

Germany, which has with EU partners Britain and France negotiated with Iran on its nuclear program, has frequently called on Washington to open a dialogue with the Islamic republic.

Rice's trip to the Middle East had the dual aims of breathing new life into the Palestinian-Israeli peace process and winning support for the Bush administration's plan to deploy more than 20,000 additional US troops in Iraq.

After talks with Rice in Kuwait City Tuesday, the six members of the pro-US Gulf Cooperation Council along with Egypt and Jordan gave the plan a cautious welcome and issued a call for Iraq's neighbors not to meddle in the strife-torn country.

The Gulf states and the US said they wanted to prevent Iraq "becoming a battleground for regional and international powers". This could also refer to Syria which has been repeatedly accused by Washington of fueling the Iraqi insurgency.

"We expressed our desire to see the president's plan to reinforce the American military presence in Baghdad as a vehicle... to stabilize Baghdad and to prevent Iraq from sliding into this ugly war," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheikh Mohammad al-Sabah said.

Rice admitted that Iraq's predominantly Sunni Arab neighbors were skeptical about the ability of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite government to halt the sectarian violence that has pitted Sunni Arabs against Shiites.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an even-handed, non-sectarian path... but everybody wants to give this a chance. That is the position of the people in the region and there is in fact a burden on the Iraqi government to perform," she said in Kuwait.

She will continue on to London, the last stop of her tour, Thursday after talks with German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

DOJ_NMG_0118231

Rice Announces Mideast Strategy Session (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 18, 2007

Pushing to bring Israelis and Palestinians closer to peace, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday both sides will need international help.

"Undoubtedly they will reach difficult moments, they will reach times when things are not moving forward," Rice said in announcing that U.S., German and other diplomats will hold a Mideast strategy session early next month in Washington.

The meeting of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations will come before a U.S.-backed summit in the Mideast among Rice, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Leader Mahmoud Abbas.

Rice came to the German capital after five days in the Mideast, where she promoted a renewed peace process and sought support for President Bush's Iraq plan.

In Jerusalem and the West Bank, Rice won agreement for a three-way meeting that she said would help build confidence after years of fighting. Rice was careful to repeat that that session does not supplant a dormant 2003 peace plan, although it skips past difficult requirements the plan makes of each side.

The group gathering in Washington represents would-be administrators of the plan, which Israelis and Palestinians have endorsed but never put in force.

The group has become something of a Greek chorus as the mood between Israel and the Palestinians generally soured over the past three years and as Abbas struggles for internal control against Palestinian Hamas radicals.

Before she arrived in Berlin, her chief negotiator for six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program offered an olive branch to North Korea, saying Wednesday the U.S. wants a normal country-to-country relationship with the newly nuclear power.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and the North's Kim Kye Gwan held unusual direct talks, meeting Tuesday and Wednesday at the U.S. Embassy in Berlin.

Rice asked Hill to return to Asia on Thursday to continue talks meant to hasten the next round of six-nation disarmament talks.

Hill said his talks in Berlin were part of an effort to show North Korea that Washington is sincere and wants a "normal relationship," established through a "bilateral process." That is an implicit promise to stop treating the communist North as a pariah state.

The North would have to renounce nuclear weapons to win that prize, Hill said, a caveat reinforced more strongly by his boss, Rice.

"It's very clearly in the context of the denuclearization — complete, verifiable ... (and) irreversible denuclearization," Rice said during a press conference with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

In 2005, North Korea pledged to dismantle its weapons program in return for security guarantees and economic aid, but the accord has not gone into place. North Korea boycotted further talks for more than a year, and in the meantime proved its nuclear capability with an underground explosion in October.

Hill said he hopes the next round of six-nation disarmament talks will take place by the end of the month.

Rice Cool To Temporary Palestinian State (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sounded cool to the notion of a placeholder Palestinian state in temporary borders, an idea that Israelis had said might energize the dormant peace process.

Rice, speaking to reporters Tuesday, did not rule out the idea, though. Palestinians reject it as a nonstarter, arguing that temporary lines would be too hard to redraw and Israel might end up with large swaths of the West Bank that Palestinians claim is theirs.

DOJ_NMG_0118232

"My own view, and I frankly have been telling people this, (is) that if we get to that point it seems to me that it may be more difficult to negotiate a provisional state than just to go to the end game" of final borders, Rice said. "We're not there yet, and we'll see."

Rice planned to brief German and British leaders this week about the possible next steps toward peace. She was dining with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin on Wednesday and with British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett in London on Thursday.

The Bush administration supports an eventual independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. That is the goal of a 2003 U.S.-backed international peace plan that has gotten little traction.

Rice spent a long weekend in Israel and the West Bank assessing the possible next steps toward peace, and on Monday said she will attend a three-way confidence-building session with Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas prefer an informal session to a larger regional or international peace conference, Rice said, referring to an idea advanced in Europe and some Arab capitals.

"That really raises expectations that something is imminent," Rice told reporters traveling with her on a Mideast tour.

In the same session, Rice channeled her background as a college professor for what sounded like her answer Tuesday to criticism that the Bush administration won't talk to its adversaries.

Iraq Study Group authors and piqued senators are among those who accuse the Bush administration of being shortsighted in rejecting talks with Iran and Syria that might help reduce the sectarian violence in Iraq.

"There's a tendency to think about diplomacy as something that is done untethered to the conditions underlying it or the balance underlying it," Rice said partway through a lengthy academic disquisition on the difficulty of recognizing big historical change.

"That's not the way that it works," Rice said. "You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating. It is not dealmaking."

Bush's plan, announced last week, rejects the idea of outreach to Iran and Syria and would add U.S. forces in Iraq.

Syrian, Israeli Backdoor Talks Now Emerging (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

The last time there was a peace breakthrough that surprised the world, a few offbeat Israeli and Palestinian intellectuals gathered in 1993 at a country house in Norway and came away with the Oslo Accords.

So when news broke this week in Israel's respected newspaper Haaretz, that Israel and Syria had reached a series of secret understandings, it is no surprise that it sent shock waves through a region often plagued by stalemate and violence.

Officials here are distancing themselves from the meetings that took place between Israelis and Syrians in Europe from September 2004 to June 2006, portraying them as an "academic" exercise. But that doesn't mean Israel isn't open to a deal with Syria.

In fact, some Israelis see Syria as a possible key to undermining Hizbullah's threat. The Israeli losses to Shiite militants in Lebanon last summer prompted Wednesday's resignation of the Israeli army's chief of staff, and is triggering calls for the prime minister and defense minister to follow. Swapping the Golan Heights – for Syria withdrawing support for Hizbullah – might be considered, say Israeli analysts.

And, the very fact that Israelis have been meeting with Syrian representatives is indicative of a willingness on the part of some of the region's players to restart a peace track that has long been viewed as derailed indefinitely.

"If it would be up to us academics, we could have solved it a long time ago. But it is up to the leadership," says Moshe Moaz, an Israeli political scientist and Syria scholar at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Dr. Moaz – speaking by telephone from Boston, where he is currently on sabbatical at Harvard University – was involved in several of the meetings that took place, which involved both a combination of academics, officials, and former officials, he says.

"I have the sense that the government was informed, but didn't approve of it," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0118233

Reports of a resurrection of the Israeli-Syrian track, which broke off officially around the same time Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations collapsed in the summer of 2000, conjure deeply different reactions – and come at a volatile, precarious time in the region.

Proponents of talking see Damascus as holding the key to reining in Hizbullah, stopping the flow of arms from Iran into Lebanon, and sizing down the tactical might of Hamas, whose most powerful Palestinian figure, Khaled Mashal, resides in the Syrian capital.

And ever since the end of the brutal war last summer in Lebanon, opinion-makers here have been trying to point the nation's compass for compromise in the direction of Syria. Only a deal with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, some analysts say, can prevent Israel from finding itself in another war with Hizbullah.

On the other end of this viewpoint are skeptics, both Israeli and Arab, who say that the powerbrokers are as far away from coming to terms as they were before. Israeli officials, as well as many in the Bush administration, various sources here say, view Syria as a country continuing to sponsor terrorist activities. Therefore, they say, it's a country that should be isolated, not engaged.

Moreover, if the assumed price for a peace deal between Israel and Syria is an Israeli withdrawal from Golan, pollsters show that the cost is still too high in the minds of most Israelis.

Even further, observers here say they find it hard to imagine Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his defense minister, Amir Peretz, have anything approaching the political capital necessary for a deal with Syria. Both men have very low approval ratings – one newspaper last week put Mr. Olmert's at 14 percent.

Olmert said in late December that he would consider restarting talks with Syria, but only if Damascus first ended its support for Hizbullah and other anti-Israeli groups.

The resignation Wednesday of Israeli army Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, coupled with an investigation into Olmert's role in a banking sale, might only bolster the image of Olmert's helm as one too racked with scandal to sell the people on peace.

General Halutz stepped down after dozens of internal inquiries into the month-long Lebanon war found widespread problems in the military's performance.

"The war clearly was mismanaged, and when a war is clearly mismanaged, there is no doubt the chief of staff is responsible," said opposition lawmaker Ran Cohen, a former high-ranking military officer. "The responsibility is shared by him, the prime minister and the defense minister, and sooner or later, they, too, will have to leave."

Some of the specifics of the talks between Israelis and Syrians, as reported in Haaretz, indicated a willingness of Israel to withdraw entirely from the Golan Heights, which it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war. Israel later settled the territory, which now has about 16,000 Israelis living on it along with some 18,000 Syrian Druze, and officially annexed the land. The move never received international recognition, but is seen in Israel as part of the national "consensus."

The would-be deal, according to the report, includes the establishment of a large "buffer zone" near the Sea of Galilee, which would be converted into a park for use by Israelis and Syrians.

In opinion surveys, only a minority of Israelis have indicated a willingness to withdraw fully from the Golan Heights. And following the disengagement plan of 2005, the public appears keen to have peace but reluctant to repeat the uprooting of settlers for questionable returns.

Although the Haaretz report indicated that senior officials here had full knowledge of the talks that broke off last summer, Israeli government officials have sharply denied the report.

"We're not questioning that these talks took place," says Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for the prime minister's office. "But there was no official sanctioning or knowledge of these meetings. This was not a back channel that was sanctioned in any way by this prime minister or the last prime minister [Ariel Sharon].

"It's sort of academic, and there are lots of meetings like that," Ms. Eisin adds. "I can list all kinds of academics that have all kind of meetings and can solve all kinds of world problems. But it doesn't have anything to do with officials."

Although Israeli officials have gone to lengths to deny that the contacts were sanctioned at the highest levels, Haaretz is not the only major Israeli paper to suggest that the Israeli-Syrian track may have yet have some electricity running through it.

The Maariv newspaper reported earlier this week that Uzi Arad, the director of the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, Israel, has floated a plan for an Israeli-Syrian-Lebanese peace that would not require Israel to withdraw fully from the Golan Heights.

DOJ_NMG_0118234

The concept, dubbed the "Arad Plan," would allow Israel to keep a 150-square-mile strip of the western Golan Heights in exchange for an equivalent piece of land elsewhere.

Mohammed Musleh, a professor of Middle Eastern Studies at Long Island University in Brookville, N.Y., says that would be totally unacceptable to the Syrians.

"For there to be a public park that will be used by the Israelis with or without Syrian approval, in violation of Syrian sovereignty, will not be. And Israel has insisted since the start that it must have total control," says Dr. Musleh, a Palestinian academic, during a visit to Jerusalem.

"It's a nonstarter," he says. "This plan also showed that Israel will control sources of the Jordan [River]. But the dispute between Israel on the one hand, and Syrian, Jordan, and Egypt [on the other] over the sources of Jordan, were one of the underlying causes of the war in 1967, because Israel succeeded in diverting the sources of the Jordan River."

Moreover, he says, the demands placed on Syria to come to the table would come at a premium that he doubts Mr. Assad would be willing to pay.

"Syria should distance itself from Iran, on one hand, and Hamas on the other hand. But why should Syria do that in return for nothing? Syria is very much interested in renewing the peace talks with Israel, but neither Washington nor Tel Aviv is interested in peace talks with Syria. The Bush Administration is against any kind of engagement with Syria, and it doesn't want Israel to have any engagement, either."

A New Chance For Peace? (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

I am concerned that public discussion of my book "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" has been diverted from the book's basic proposals: that peace talks be resumed after six years of delay and that the tragic persecution of Palestinians be ended. Although most critics have not seriously disputed or even mentioned the facts and suggestions about these two issues, an apparently concerted campaign has been focused on the book's title, combined with allegations that I am anti-Israel. This is not good for any of us who are committed to Israel's status as a peaceful nation living in harmony with its neighbors.

It is encouraging that President Bush has announced that peace in the Holy Land will be a high priority for his administration during the next two years. On her current trip to the region, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has called for an early U.S.-Israeli-Palestinian meeting. She has recommended the 2002 offer of the 23 Arab nations as a foundation for peace: full recognition of Israel based on a return to its internationally recognized borders. This offer is compatible with official U.S. policy, previous agreements approved by Israeli governments in 1978 and 1993, and the "road map" for peace developed by the "quartet" (the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations).

The clear fact is that Israel will never find peace until it is willing to withdraw from its neighboring occupied territories and permit the Palestinians to exercise their basic human and political rights. With land swaps, this "green line" can be modified through negotiations to let a substantial number of Israeli settlers remain in their subsidized homes east of the internationally recognized border. The premise of exchanging Arab territory for peace has been acceptable for several decades to a majority of Israelis but not to a minority of the more conservative leaders, who are unfortunately supported by most of the vocal American Jewish community.

These same premises, of course, will have to be accepted by any government that represents the Palestinians. A March 2006 poll by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah found 73 percent approval among citizens in the occupied territories, and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh has expressed support for talks between President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and pledged to end Hamas's rejectionist position if a negotiated agreement is approved by the Palestinian people.

Abbas is wise in repeating to Secretary Rice that he rejects any "interim" boundaries for the Palestinian state. The step-by-step road-map formula promulgated almost three years ago for reaching a final agreement has proved to be a non-starter -- and an excuse for not making any progress. I know from experience that it is often more difficult to negotiate an interim agreement, with all its future uncertainties, than to address the panoply of crucial issues that will have to be resolved to reach the goal of peace.

DOJ_NMG_0118235

Given these recent developments and with the Democratic Party poised to play a more important role in governing, this is a good time to clarify our party's overall policy in the broader Middle East. Numerous options are available as Congress attempts to correlate its suggestions with White House policy, and there is little doubt that the basic proposals of the Iraq Study Group provide a good foundation on which Democrats might reach something of a consensus (recognizing that individual lawmakers could still make their own proposals on details). This party policy would provide a reasonable answer to the allegation that Democrats have no alternatives of their own to address the Iraq quagmire.

A key factor in an Iraq policy would be strong demands on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government to cooperate in ending sectarian violence, prodded by a clear notice of plans for troop withdrawals. A commitment to regional cooperation, including opportunities for Iran and Syria to participate, would be beneficial in assuring doubtful Iraqis that America will no longer be the dominant outside power shaping their military, political and economic future.

Although Israel's prime minister has criticized these facets of the Iraq Study Group's report, the most difficult recommendation for many Democrats could be the call for substantive peace talks on the Palestinian issue. The situation in the occupied territories will be a crucial factor, and it would be helpful for both the House and Senate to send a responsible delegation to the West Bank and Gaza to observe the situation personally, to meet with key leaders and to ascertain the prospects if peace talks can be launched.

I am convinced that, with bipartisan support, this is a good opportunity for progress.

The writer was the 39th president and is a Nobel Peace Prize laureate. His most recent book is "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid."

Arabs Are Cool To Bush's Iraq Plan (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

AP, January 18, 2007

Arab leaders were deeply skeptical Wednesday of the U.S. plan for Iraq, a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice tried to sell it to them. Kuwait's emir told Rice that America should work with Iran and Syria, officials said — a move President Bush has rejected.

Underscoring the obstacles to U.S. efforts to win over Arab leaders, a U.S. diplomat said the Bush administration plans 1to send Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nicholas Burns on another Mideast shuttle to offer more details of the president's plan.

Meeting with Rice on Tuesday in Kuwait, eight Arab foreign ministers raised tough questions about Bush's new strategy. The ministers — from six Persian Gulf states plus Egypt and Jordan — were particularly concerned about whether the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can reach out to Iraq's minority Sunni Arabs to end their resistance and lure them to the political process, according to Arab diplomats.

"Arabs need to know specifically what can the Americans and the Iraqis do to end sectarian domination of the government," said one diplomat familiar with Rice's talks, referring to the Iraqi Shiite-Kurdish alliance which controls the Baghdad government. He and other diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because the discussions during the closed meeting were private.

A statement put out by the ministers reflected their distrust of al-Maliki's government. They gave vague support for Bush's plan, welcoming a U.S. commitment to defend "the territorial integrity of Iraq and to ensure a successful, fair and inclusive political process."

But they also said it is the "responsibility of the Iraqi government to achieve these goals."

The most upbeat comments came from Egypt.

"Bush's strategy is not merely a military action or operation or a unilateral military program. It represents a vision with different political, military and economic aspects," Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told reporters in Cairo on Wednesday.

Still, Gheit said he underlined to Rice that U.S. and Iraqi forces must crack down on Shiite militias that "have been killing Iraq's Sunnis."

DOJ_NMG_0118236

During her five-day tour, Rice acknowledged concerns about whether the Iraqi government would take "an evenhanded, nonsectarian path" by targeting Shiite militiamen as well as Sunni insurgents and seek reconciliation.

Many Arab leaders feared it would not.

"The main objective now is how to achieve national reconciliation," said Ahmed al-Qatan, the Saudi ambassador to the Arab League. "Unfortunately, the deteriorating conditions cannot provide any hope."

"The situation won't stabilize soon, and the current curve (of violence) will continue for a long time," he told Cairo's leading newspaper, Al Ahram.

Many in the media depicted Rice's visit as a failure. "The whole jet-setting trip turned out to be yet another stage-managed, futile diplomatic exercise. ... In effect, Rice returns to Washington empty-handed with a lot of false promises rather than optimism," the Doha, Qatar-based Peninsula newspaper wrote in editorial.

Jordanian analyst Labib Kamhawi said that besides their doubts over the plan itself, Arab leaders had a difficult time throwing support behind it "when there has been a total failure in Iraq and the Palestinian territories with no attempt to soften the anger that is seething in the Arab and Muslim countries."

The emir of Kuwait was surprised that the Bush plan excludes Iran and Syria from contacts on Iraq.

It is important to have a "dialogue with Syria, in particular, and with Iran in the interest of Gulf security in general," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheik Mohammed Al Sabah quoted the emir as telling Rice.

Bush took a tough line on Syria and Iraq in announcing his plan. He accused them of supporting militants in Iraq and made clear his rejection of proposals for engaging the two countries to use their influence to calm the violence.

Saudi Arabia, meanwhile, is pressing the U.S. to take more active steps to revive the Arab-Israeli peace process in return for helping in stabilize Iraq. The deal, dubbed "Iraq for Land," echoes widespread Arab feelings that resolution to the conflict is key to Mideast stability.

Saudi columnist Dawoud al-Shriyan said Rice should take the calls seriously.

"Every time the Americans are in trouble in Iraq, they remember that Arabs have a cause named Palestine. Therefore, they float some statements to create the impression that they continue their efforts in the peace process," he wrote in the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat newspaper.

Burns' mission to the region next week aims to mitigate Arabs worries.

"Everything (Rice) has been doing in the region, he's going to try to explain," said Hilary Olsin-Windecker, spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Abu Dhabi, the Emirates capital. Burns will "flesh out specifics" of U.S. policy changes that Rice outlined, Olsin-Windecker said.

Burns also is expected to make a major policy address that details new U.S. steps in Iraq and the Gulf in hopes of finally persuading skeptical Gulf allies to support America's project in Iraq, said Mustafa Alani, who oversees military policy at the Gulf Research Center.

Analysis: Rice Sees Iraq, Not Too Close (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 18, 2007

Iraq looks placid from 37,000 feet. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spent a lot of time talking about Iraq's troubles during five days in the Middle East, but the closest she came to the country was on an airplane ride Wednesday as she left the region on a crystal blue day. The flight took Rice smack between the violent cities of Baghdad and Fallujah.

Windows on her plane's left side offered a tranquil view of rolling river valleys. On the right was the sprawling capital, where a suicide car bomb struck a market Wednesday in the Shiite district of Sadr City, killing more than a dozen people. Later Wednesday in Baghdad, a convoy carrying members of a U.S. democracy group was ambushed and four workers, including an American woman, were killed, an official with the group said.

Electronic maps in the Air Force plane's passenger section charted the aircraft's path across what was labeled "Mesopotamia," southern Iraq's name in ancient times.

DOJ_NMG_0118237

Rice had made the rounds of Arab leaders to ask for support for President Bush's new plan to secure Baghdad and salvage a war that most Americans, and many Arabs, do not support.

In Kuwait, she met with foreign ministers from eight nations whose governments are friendly to the United States despite broad anti-American feeling among their populations. Rice got what she came for — or as much as she might have really expected: a bland statement from the group welcoming the U.S. commitment in Iraq.

Kuwait is next to Iraq, as much of the world was reminded when Saddam Hussein invaded his much smaller, militarily weak neighbor in 1990. But Rice does not talk so often anymore about how Iraqis are much better off since the dictator's overthrow.

Rice's flight to Berlin, where she briefed European leaders on her trip, provided a footnote to the troubled U.S.-Iraq history. Her route to Europe bisected the old southern Iraq "no-fly zone," imposed after the 1990-1991 Gulf War but rendered moot by the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

___

Rice is known for keeping a punishing pace on the road. Packed schedules frequently include stops in two or more countries in a single day.

She is not much for taking in the sights, so it was notable when word came that Rice and her party would tour the fabled ruins of the ancient Temple of Luxor in Egypt. It was only about 20 minutes on the schedule, but what a 20 minutes it would be: Sphinxes! An obelisk! Nefertiti!

Alas, Rice was running late so her tour was scrapped.

She might have caught a glimpse of the stunning temple from her motorcade en route to meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who had invited her to the southern Egyptian city, where the west bank of the Nile holds the celebrated Valley of Kings. Usually the leaders meet in the smoggy capital, Cairo.

While Rice worked, a small group from her party wandered happily among the statues and walls.

___

Rice began the trip with sessions in Jerusalem and the West Bank intended to energize the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

As usual, Rice saw Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his headquarters in the West Bank town of Ramallah. The complex is barely recognizable as the same one where Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat holed up under Israeli siege in 2002. He died two years later.

The rubble is gone. Construction crews are busy building a mosque and burial shrine for Arafat.

The Bush administration refused to deal with Arafat and clearly was relieved by the election of the moderate Abbas as his successor. The U.S. now is looking for ways to bolster Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas radicals.

Visiting Abbas at the headquarters has symbolic value, showing respect for Palestinian self-rule. But Arafat's lingering presence is a delicate matter for U.S. officials.

Arafat's picture is everywhere in the complex, although Abbas' has often been added alongside. A portrait of a grinning Arafat that once hung over the dais where Rice and Abbas speak to reporters was gone this time.

On previous visits, Rice's motorcade swept past Arafat's temporary glassed-in burial shine without a pause. Other leaders and diplomats would walk over to the building, which resembled nothing so much as a suburban car dealership, to lay a wreath.

This time, Rice's motorcade entered the complex from the opposite direction. She did not pass by the site.

Kuwait Tells U.S. To Talk To Iran, Syria (AP)

By Diana Elias

AP, January 18, 2007

Kuwait's emir told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Washington should talk to Syria and Iran to improve the situation in Iraq, the Kuwaiti foreign minister said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0118238

Sheik Mohammed Al Sabah told reporters that when Rice met Kuwait's emir, Sheik Sabah Al Ahmed Al Sabah, on Tuesday, she had spoken of the "the difficulties facing the Iraqi government in imposing security, and (difficulties caused by) outside interference."

"That is why his highness (the emir) stressed the importance of a dialogue with (Iraq's) neighbors, and the importance that there is no estrangement between them and America," Sheik Mohammed said.

He quoted the emir as telling Rice it was important to have a "dialogue with Syria, in particular, and with Iran in the interest of Gulf security in general."

Rice was in Kuwait on Tuesday for a meeting on Iraq with her counterparts from the six Arab Gulf states plus Jordan and Egypt.

Speaking at Kuwait airport before flying to Oman, Sheik Mohammed did not reveal what the eight foreign ministers told Rice about the new U.S. plan for Iraq. But he said Rice had told the emir that President Bush had found it difficult to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq, but he had made the decision to prevent the country from slipping into a civil war.

In announcing his Iraq plan last week, Bush rejected the recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan U.S. panel, which had urged talks with Damascus and Tehran on ways of curbing the sectarian violence in Iraq.

Bush accused Iran and Syria of failing to stop fighters from crossing into Iraq to join the insurgency, and blamed Iran in particular for providing material for attacks on American troops — a charge that Tehran denies.

Iran and Syria are believed to have influence with insurgents in Iraq. Iran has strong ties with Iraqi Shiites, who have powerful militias, and Syria is believed to host senior members of the deposed Baathist regime in Iraq, which is playing a significant role in the insurgency.

Political Rivals Join To Slam President (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 18, 2007

TEHRAN -- Conservatives and reformists are openly challenging President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's hard-line nuclear diplomacy -- an unusual agreement across Iran's political spectrum -- with many saying his provocative remarks have increasingly isolated their country.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously last month to impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt uranium enrichment. Some critics view the sanctions as an indication that Iran must change its policy.

After a year of silence, reformists are demanding that Iran dispel fears that it is seeking to build atomic weapons, pressing for a return to the enrichment suspension policy under President Mohammed Khatami. Uranium enrichment can produce the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs.

"Resisting the U.N. Security Council resolution will put us in a more isolated position," said the Islamic Iran Participation Front, the largest reformist party.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's popularity already was weakened after his close conservative allies were defeated last month in local elections, which were widely seen as a referendum on his 18 months in power.

Even some conservatives warn that his confrontational tactics are backfiring.

"Your language is so offensive ... that it shows that the nuclear issue is being dealt with a sort of stubbornness," the hard-line daily Jomhuri-e-Eslami said in an editorial.

Some lawmakers on both sides of the political spectrum are considering impeaching Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki if the Security Council approves more resolutions against Iran.

"That all 15 members of the Security Council unanimously voted, against the claim by our diplomatic apparatus that there was no unanimity against Iran, shows the weakness of our diplomatic apparatus," said Noureddin Pirmoazzen, a reformist lawmaker.

Despite the criticism, Mr. Ahmadinejad has remained defiant, escalating Iran's nuclear standoff with the United States and its allies. He has refused to suspend enrichment, even under pressure from Iran's trade allies Russia and China. Iran denies U.S. assertions that it is secretly trying to build a bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0118239

On Saturday, Mr. Ahmadinejad met with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a fellow U.S. critic, at the start of a Latin America tour -- his second such visit in four months. Critics say the trip was partly aimed at diverting attention from the disapproval at home.

Mr. Ahmadinejad also has distanced some of his conservative base by calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and hosting a conference last month that cast doubt on the Holocaust. Many feel he has spent too much time defying the West and too little tackling Iran's domestic issues.

Coalition Of The Concerned Grows In Iran (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

A new political coalition is emerging in Iran in response to growing US pressure, especially over Tehran's nuclear programme, and in concern over the radical approach of President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad in both foreign and domestic policy.

It stretches from reformists and even secular intellectuals to fundamentalists, and results from a belief that Iran may be facing the most serious challenge of its modern history.

"New informal regroupings are being formed based on concern . . . over the fate of the country and the regime," said Behzad Nabavi, a leading reformist. "A common sense of danger [is overcoming] differences over democracy and cultural issues."

Although it remains unclear what direct impact this so-called "coalition of the concerned" can have on nuclear policy or Iran's relationship with Iraq, for instance, its aim is to put Tehran's case more clearly internationally and perhaps craft conciliatory measures. It also wants Iran's supreme leader to rein in Mr Ahmadi-Nejad.

The United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran last month over its nuclear and missile programmes and set a 60-day deadline for Tehran to suspend almost all nuclear activity or face further sanctions. But Iran's concern is less over sanctions than military attack in the not-too-distant future. US troops raided Iran's "consulate" in northern Iraq last week and seized five "diplomats", accusing Tehran of fuelling insurgency. Increasing American naval deployment in the Gulf has heightened tension.

"We are facing the most serious political challenges, domestically and internationally in our modern history," said a regime insider. "The ruling clerics may be forced into compromises that even the Qajar kings [1795-1925] didn't make."

Iranians remember the Qajar period for weakness, stagnation and humiliating concessions to great powers, including ceding territory to Russia and control of fin-ance and oil to the British.

The coalition is gathered partly around two former presidents, Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a conservative pragmatist, and the reformist Mohammad Khatami.

With the UN resolution and US military build-up feeding fears that Washington's aim is not stopping Iran's uranium enrichment but overthrowing its regime, sen-ior figures argue, the national interest cannot tolerate an inexperienced president whose rhetoric is inflammatory. Mr Rafsanjani, who has been at the centre of Iranian politics since the 1979 revolution and the 1980-88 war with Iraq, repeatedly gives warning that Iran must be "careful" and not fuel "US adventurism". Such wariness is apparently shared by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader, who waited two weeks before public comment on the UN resolution. The president attacked the resolution as "illegal".

"The regime's strategic policy remains avoiding confrontation because the US has the upper hand, even though Iran is being treated unjustly," said Mohammad Atrianfar, editor of the ban-ned reformist daily, Shargh.

Some of Iran's most seasoned politicians and officials fear that the US and Israel seek nothing short of the country's break-up. "I backed talks with the US for a long time but sadly I've reached the conclusion they want to cut Iran into pieces," a diplomat said.

Iran is a multinational state with a variety of groups who feel discrimination by the majority Persians and Shia Muslims. Tehran accuses Britain and the US of stirring unrest among Kurdish and Arab minorities in the north-west and oil-rich south.

DOJ_NMG_0118240

"The leaders of the Islamic revolution managed to maintain Iran's territorial integrity at critical times, but I'm not sure they can do the same this time if they face the US's destructive power," said a senior reformist. While some insiders argue that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad has little role in the nuclear issue, they worry that his rhetoric is taken seriously by the west and even welcomed by hardliners in the US and Israel.

Even parts of the conservative media have blamed Mr Ahmadi-Nejad for the UN resolution and for disrupting nuclear talks with Europe.

Pragmatists from across the spectrum are looking to Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, to revive talks with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, that stalled last year. They are encouraged by his response to the UN resolution. Facing reporters' insistence on Wednesday that he clarify Iran's position on the nuclear issue, Mr Larijani stressed the importance of a "thoughtful" rather than a "hasty" reaction.

Criticism of the president have been encouraged by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's setback in elections last month.

The emboldened approach appears designed to create a consensus that leads Ayatollah Khamenei to rein in – or even remove – the president. "The leader is still quiet about election results, probably trying to analyse them, but he doesn't seem happy with Mr Ahmadi-Nejad any more," said one insider. "Mr Ahmadi-Nejad consults the leader less than any previous president but, if one day he ignores the leader's orders, he'll be finished within a week through impeachment by parliament."

Parliament is in uproar, accusing the government of gross mismanagement as prices and unemployment rise. But such a dramatic move as impeachment – unknown in the Islamic Republic's 28 years – would need Ayatollah Khamenei's backing to succeed.

"Ayatollah Khamenei still doesn't believe the president should go," said a former Iranian diplomat. "And if the international crisis becomes more serious, the leader would not allow an impeachment that would make Iran look weak domestically."

U.N. Nuclear Agency Stops Some Iran Aid (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, January 18, 2007

The U.N. nuclear agency has suspended some aid to Iran in line with Security Council sanctions calling for an end to assistance for programs that could be misused to make an atomic weapon, diplomats said Wednesday.

The diplomats emphasized that the freeze was temporary for now and subject to review and approval by the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Agency officials now are looking at the full list of technical aid programs to Iran and will propose culling those that could serve non-peaceful nuclear aims when the board next meets in March. It is up to board members to make the final decision.

A U.N. official and a diplomat accredited to the IAEA said the suspension was imposed in recent days. Both spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment on the issue to the media.

Another diplomat said the aid was suspended for programs "where there is a clear prohibition by the Security Council, specifically applying to enrichment, reprocessing and heavy water (production)." He said the agency planned to separate the projects into those where Security Council bans applied, those deemed uncontroversial and a "gray list" of projects that need closer examination as to whether they could be used in weapons production.

"Whatever is absolutely clearly banned by the resolution is now on hold," he added.

The agency's decision to temporarily shelve some projects even before a final decision by the board was interpreted by some diplomats who deal with the Vienna-based IAEA as a victory for the United States.

Washington is the key critic of Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment. While Tehran says it wants to develop an enrichment program to generate energy, the Americans say the Islamic republic is more interested in the program's other application — creating the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

Still, a U.S. push to halve IAEA aid to Iran as part of Security Council sanctions is facing opposition from traditional U.S. allies in the European Union as well as from developing nations, diplomats said. Such European opposition is worrisome from Washington's point of view because it could dilute attempts to present a unified Western front against Iran's nuclear defiance.

DOJ_NMG_0118241

Iran gets IAEA technical aid for more than 15 projects and dozens more that also involve other countries. Diplomats familiar with American strategy for the next IAEA board meeting March 5 say Washington wants at least half of the aid projects permanently eliminated.

But that is opposed by Germany, which holds the rotating European Union presidency, and many other EU nations. The diplomats said that — unless Washington moderates its stance — confrontation is inevitable at the March meeting.

The United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany all want Iran to mothball its enrichment program and have acted as a group in trying to engage Tehran on the issue. But their approaches and priorities have differed over the past year — resulting in often visible strains in what is meant to be a joint initiative.

Russian and Chinese reluctance to slap harsh sanctions on Tehran — as initially demanded by Washington — have created the greatest pressures. Both nations share economic and strategic interests with Iran

But problems also have surfaced in the ranks of European allies, with Germany traditionally the least hawkish and the French recently nudging the British aside to become the most loyal European backers of the Americans.

Differences over how severely to punish Tehran for its refusal to suspend enrichment led to months of disputes before agreement was reached last month on a Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions that fell short of the harsher measures the Americans had pushed for.

The sanctions include a review of technical aid to Iran — programs meant to bolster the peaceful use of nuclear energy in medicine, agriculture or power generation.

In November, the board of the agency indefinitely suspended an IAEA project that would have helped Iran put safety measures in place for a heavy water reactor that, once completed, will produce plutonium — like enriched uranium, a potential pathway to nuclear arms. That decision, however, was relatively straightforward, considering the Security Council had already indirectly called for an end to construction of the reactor.

In contrast, most of the projects up for review at the March meeting are for programs that have less obvious potential weapons applications.

They include cancer therapy programs, nuclear safety projects and requests for help in international nuclear licensing procedures.

Pressure Mounts On Olmert To Resign (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, January 18, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz came under renewed pressure to resign Wednesday after the Israeli army's chief of staff stepped down in the wake of the flawed Lebanon war.

The sudden departure of Israel's top military official, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, delivered another setback to the prime minister, whose popularity has plummeted following last summer's war and a string of political scandals. On Tuesday, Israel's attorney general opened a criminal probe into Olmert's role in a 2005 bank privatization.

Halutz stepped down after dozens of internal inquiries into the monthlong Lebanon war found widespread problems in the military's performance. Halutz had previously rejected calls to resign, despite the growing loss of confidence of his political superiors and subordinates in the army.

With Halutz on his way out, critics quickly clamored for the heads of the country's other wartime leaders, Olmert and Peretz.

"The war clearly was mismanaged, and when a war is clearly mismanaged, there is no doubt the chief of staff is responsible," said opposition lawmaker Ran Cohen, a former high-ranking military officer. "The responsibility is shared by him, the prime minister and the defense minister, and sooner or later, they, too, will have to leave."

Peretz expressed regret Halutz's decision, but he warned Israel's enemies not to misinterpret the move.

Speaking at the graduation ceremony for naval commanders in Haifa, Peretz said Halutz's decision was "premature."

"I am sorry he won't be with us to complete the task" of restoring the army after the failures of the summer's war in Lebanon, Peretz said.

DOJ_NMG_0118242

Peretz, who is also under fire about the war, had a message for Israel's enemies. "Do not misinterpret the army chief's decision to resign as a sign of weakness," he said.

Olmert made a routine appearance at parliament, sparring with lawmakers over unrelated domestic issues and promising to appoint a new military chief within days. Peretz said he would begin interviewing candidates for the vacant military post immediately.

But pressure on Olmert and Peretz is likely to increase ahead of the release of a wide-ranging government inquiry into the war. The investigative panel, focusing on the performance of military and political leaders, is expected to announce its conclusions in the coming weeks.

"Halutz's step was unavoidable, but he was not the only one responsible for the failures of the war — the government was too," lawmaker Ophir Pines-Paz, a member of Peretz's Labor Party, told Army Radio.

He stopped short of calling on Olmert and Peretz to resign, saying he wanted to wait for the government panel to reach its conclusions.

An opinion poll published last week showed Olmert's approval rating at just 14 percent, and his Kadima Party losing if new elections were held.

"It is not clear whether the prime minister will be able to survive the resignation of chief of staff Halutz and his own political problems," said Ephraim Inbar, a political scientist at Bar-Ilan University near Tel Aviv. "We may see pressure in his own party to replace him. This resignation is definitely the beginning of political turmoil in Israel."

Peretz's public standing, meanwhile, is equally dismal. The former union leader won the defense portfolio under a coalition deal with Olmert's Kadima Party, despite his scant military experience.

The war's many flaws only cemented sweeping doubts about his fitness to serve as defense minister, and he now faces multiple challenges to his leadership within his own Labor Party, which is scheduled to hold primaries for chairman in May.

Both Peretz and Olmert "are in a very shaky position," said political scientist Avraham Diskin of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Israel went into the war with a united front against Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas just hours after they killed three Israeli soldiers and captured two in a July 12 cross-border raid, but that solidarity collapsed after the fighting ended.

Critics questioned whether Olmert moved too hastily with a full-scale campaign that ended without achieving its declared aims — recovering the captured soldiers and crushing Hezbollah.

More than 1,200 people were killed on both sides, most in Lebanon, according to U.N., Israeli and Lebanese officials. Israel claims it killed 600 guerrillas, but that number has not been substantiated, and Lebanon says most of its casualties were civilians.

A total of 159 Israelis were killed, including 39 civilians who died in rocket attacks. Soldiers returning from battle complained of poor planning and shortages of ammunition, food and water.

Uri Guralcky, 30, a graduate student and electronics vendor in Jerusalem, said Peretz and Olmert must accept responsibility for the war's failures. "They must go together with Halutz," he said.

Hezbollah legislator Hussein Haj Hassan told The Associated Press that Halutz's resignation "is the result of the defeat of the Israeli enemy in Lebanon."

Israeli Officials Under Pressure To Quit (AP)

By Josef Federman

AP, January 18, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz faced new calls to resign Wednesday after Israel's army chief stepped down, succumbing to widespread outrage over the handling of last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz became the first Israeli chief of staff to resign since the 1973 war, but the government's political troubles may not end with his departure. With a government probe into the war looming, and a criminal investigation into Olmert's role in a banking deal, the prime minister's troubles appear likely to grow.

DOJ_NMG_0118243

The Israeli public has largely blamed Halutz — along with Olmert and Peretz — for failing to crush Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon and halt Katyusha rocket attacks against civilians.

"Halutz's resignation is a positive and unavoidable move," said Ophir Pines-Paz, a member of Peretz's Labor Party. "But the political leadership also has to take responsibility."

Israel launched the war hours after Hezbollah guerrillas killed three Israeli soldiers and captured two others in a July 12 cross-border raid.

Critics say Olmert moved too hastily with a campaign that ended without achieving its declared aims — including the recovery of the two captured soldiers. Soldiers returning from the battlefield said they were poorly trained, lacked basic ammunition and food supplies, and received conflicting orders.

The prime minister, who is supported by a solid majority in parliament, is not expected to resign soon. But the uproar over the alleged mishandling of the war against Hezbollah could harm his chances to remain in office in the long term.

"It is not clear whether the prime minister will be able to survive the resignation of chief of staff Halutz and his own political problems," said Ephraim Inbar, a political scientist at Bar-Ilan University near Tel Aviv. "We may see pressure in his own party to replace him. This resignation is definitely the beginning of political turmoil in Israel."

Nearly 160 Israelis and more than 1,000 Lebanese died in the fighting, according to tallies by government agencies, humanitarian groups and The Associated Press.

The count includes 250 Hezbollah fighters that the group's leaders now say died during Israel's intense air, ground and sea bombardments in Lebanon. Israel has estimated its forces have killed 600 Hezbollah fighters.

Many Israelis criticized the army's inability to stop Hezbollah from firing nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel. Analysts say that failure has dealt a major blow to the army's prestige in the Arab world and its ability to deter attacks.

In Lebanon, Hezbollah legislator Hussein Haj Hassan called Halutz's resignation "the result of the defeat of the Israeli enemy in Lebanon." Demonstrators in Beirut, at their nightly anti-government protest, celebrated with fireworks when Halutz's resignation was announced.

In his first public comment since Halutz resigned, Peretz warned Israel's enemies, "Do not misinterpret the army chief's decision to resign as a sign of weakness." Speaking Wednesday evening in Haifa at a graduation ceremony for naval commanders, Peretz said Halutz's decision was "premature. I am sorry he won't be with us to complete the task" of restoring the army after the summer's war in Lebanon.

Peretz insisted that he would continue to guide the reforms — instead of resigning. Olmert and Peretz hoped to pick a new army chief within days.

Halutz stepped down after internal army inquiries found widespread problems in the military's performance. Halutz, a decorated former combat pilot, had previously defended the army's performance and rejected calls to resign.

Critics quickly clamored for the heads of the other wartime leaders, Olmert and Peretz.

"I believe the chief of staff took the right decision after the inquiries in the army. I think that now the question is about his superiors, the defense minister and prime minister," said Yossi Beilin, leader of the opposition Yahad party. "It will be very difficult for both of them to stay in power."

Olmert did not comment publicly about the resignation calls. "It's business as usual in the prime minister's office," said his spokeswoman, Miri Eisin.

But pressure on Olmert and Peretz could increase ahead of the release of a wide-ranging government probe into the war. The investigative panel, focusing on the performance of military and political leaders, is expected to announce its conclusions in the coming weeks.

Voicing popular sentiment, Uri Guralcky, 30 of Jerusalem, said Peretz and Olmert must accept responsibility for the war's failures. "They must go together with Halutz," he said.

A poll broadcast on Channel 10 TV backed that up. Asked whether Olmert should resign, 69 percent agreed. Eighty-five percent said Peretz should quit. The Smith Research poll, conducted by telephone, questioned 425 Israelis and had a margin of error of 4.8 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0118244

Olmert's troubles were compounded by the announcement that police were opening a criminal probe into his role in the government's 2005 sale of a controlling stake in a bank. Olmert, then finance minister, is suspected of trying to rig the bidding.

An opinion poll published last week showed Olmert's approval rating at just 14 percent, and said his Kadima Party would lose if new elections were held. Peretz's public standing is equally dismal. The former union leader won the defense portfolio under a coalition deal despite his scant military experience. The war's flaws only cemented doubts about his fitness to serve as defense minister, and he now faces multiple challenges to his leadership within the Labor Party.

Top US Envoy Holds 'Useful' N Korea Talks In Berlin (AFP)

By Deborah Cole

AFP, January 18, 2007

The top US envoy to six-way talks on North Korea's nuclear arms said he was having "useful discussions" with his Pyongyang counterpart here and hoped negotiations would resume this month.

"When you have six hours of conversations and you're going to have some more... certainly you can characterize them as useful discussions," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said, referring to an initial meeting Tuesday with the North's negotiator Kim Kye-gwan.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said that discussion was followed up with one or two hours of talks Wednesday at the North Korean embassy in Berlin before Hill travels to Asia Thursday.

Hill, speaking at an American Academy event in Berlin, declined to answer questions on the substance of the meeting but said he hoped the six-party talks, which collapsed in December in Beijing with no discernible progress, would start again "in January."

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on a visit to the German capital Wednesday that she hoped Hill's talks would set the tone for a positive start to new six-party negotiations soon.

"These discussions that Chris is having... should help prepare the way for a more favorable atmosphere at the time of the resumption of the six-party talks, which we would hope would be soon," she said.

She stressed that Washington would not consider normalizing relations with Pyongyang until it implemented "a complete, verifiable nuclearization -- and I should say irreversible denuclearization."

The Berlin meetings came ahead of Hill's visits beginning Friday to South Korea, China and Japan to continue consultations with key partners in the six-party talks on how to make progress in the next round of negotiations.

Hill noted that the Berlin talks were the first bilateral discussions he had held with Kim outside Beijing.

The two powers held landmark talks in Berlin in 1999 that ultimately led to the lifting of a half-century of restrictions on trade, travel and banking against North Korea after it agreed to a moratorium on missile tests.

But the crisis erupted again in 2002.

Six-party negotiations involving the United States, the two Koreas, Japan, Russia and China were suspended in late 2005 after North Korea walked out in protest at US financial sanctions imposed on a Macau bank accused of illicit dealings on behalf of Pyongyang.

The talks resumed in December last year -- following the North's October 9 nuclear weapons test -- and ended in deadlock as Pyongyang insisted the financial sanctions be lifted before it would discuss nuclear disarmament.

Russia on Wednesday called the US sanctions an obstacle to the resumption of talks and urged flexibility on both sides.

"The United States should have taken some steps toward the Koreans on lifting financial sanctions and discussing this question with them," Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov, the head Russian negotiator on North Korea, was quoted as saying by state-run news agency RIA Novosti.

Losyukov also called on North Korea to reconsider its refusal to rejoin the negotiations on account of the US sanctions. "The link is not 100 percent justified," he was quoted as saying.

In a concession to North Korea, the United States agreed to hold parallel discussions on the financial sanctions issue.

A first round of those talks took place on the sidelines of the last six-party negotiations in Beijing in late December.

Neither Hill nor Casey said when the financial discussions might resume.

DOJ_NMG_0118245

Japan and South Korea welcomed the Berlin talks and voiced hope for an early resumption of multilateral discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear arms program.

"Dialogue is a good thing," Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki, the top government spokesman, told reporters.

"The Berlin meeting should lay a good groundwork for an agreement on what initial steps to take to implement the September 19 statement," South Korea's foreign minister Song Min-Soon said, referring to a 2005 accord offering the North security and economic aid guarantees in return for disarmament.

Hill described that agreement as "a sort of bible for us" and said he hoped it would be the basis for a new agreement.

North Korea And U.S. Envoys Meet In Berlin (NYT)

By Mark Landler And Thom Shanker

New York Times, January 18, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 17 — Seeking to revive stalled negotiations to end North Korea's nuclear weapons program, the United States held "substantive" talks with North Korean diplomats here on Tuesday and Wednesday, said the chief American envoy, Christopher R. Hill.

The unusual one-on-one sessions, the first to be held outside Beijing during the Bush administration, were signs of progress since negotiations broke off in December after North Korea demanded that Washington lift financial sanctions against it.

"It was a substantive discussion," Mr. Hill said in an interview on Wednesday, though he refused to give details. "The proof of the pudding will be when we all sit down together in the six-party negotiations."

Mr. Hill briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his meetings upon her arrival in Germany after a mission through the Middle East and Persian Gulf. Ms. Rice said later that Mr. Hill's discussions "should help to prepare the way for a more favorable atmosphere at the time of the resumption of the six-party talks, which we would hope would be soon."

Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, expressed hopes that those broader negotiations — which would also include China, South Korea, Japan and Russia — would resume by the end of this month in Beijing, the traditional host for these talks.

An official in the North Korean Embassy here declined to comment on the talks, which are being led on its side by Kim Kye-gwan.

Persuading North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, to abandon his nuclear ambitions has seemed an increasingly hopeless exercise since October, when North Korea tested a nuclear device and declared itself a nuclear state. The most recent talks, American officials said, foundered when the North Korean negotiators proved unyielding on the most basic issues.

Still, the United States was eager to try again, seizing on a visit to Berlin by Mr. Kim to arrange a meeting with Mr. Hill, who was here ostensibly to give a talk at the American Academy in Berlin. American officials appeared encouraged by the tone of the discussions.

North Korea, they noted, was open to talking despite declaring last month that it would not discuss disarmament unless the United States lifted penalties against the Banco Delta Asia in Macao, which held North Korean assets.

The measures, which the United States said it imposed because of North Korea's counterfeiting of American money and laundering of proceeds from drug running, cut off one of the North's valuable channels to international financial markets.

On Wednesday, Russia called on the United States to remove the measures. "The United States should make some step towards the Koreans by lifting the sanctions," the new Russian chief negotiator, Aleksandr Lusyakov, said in an interview with a Russian news agency, RIA.

Treasury officials have held their own negotiations with North Korea to resolve this standoff, and plan to meet again next week, either in Beijing or New York, according to Mr. Hill. But he suggested that the United States did not intend to ease the pressure on North Korea's finances.

"We've had to make it clear to the North Koreans that as long as they are involved in nuclear weapons production, their international financing will come under scrutiny," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118246

Because of the arcane way that Washington and North Korea communicate in their relationship as long-term adversaries and occasional negotiating partners, some brief language in a speech Mr. Hill delivered here Wednesday provoked significant interest.

Mr. Hill issued what some heard as a tantalizing offer that the United States, within the obligations of a 2005 agreement emerging from the six-party talks, looked forward "to establishing a normal relationship with North Korea."

"Obviously this is via a bilateral process, which will take a long time," he said.

North Korea has long tried to push the United States into formal bilateral talks, as a means of seeking status and legitimacy as well as to decouple Washington from its regional allies. The United States has insisted that formal talks with North Korea be held only in the six-party format.

Asked to clarify whether the United States was dangling a new relationship before the North Koreans, Ms. Rice said late Wednesday that United States-North Korea ties would have to evolve within the six-party framework, and that Washington was unwavering in demanding a complete and verifiable end to the North's nuclear program.

The 2005 statement signed by the six parties "envisioned that the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula would lead to a bilateral — a normalization of relations between the United States and the D.P.R.K.," Ms. Rice said, using the initials of North Korea's official name.

By engaging North Korea directly, outside China, the United States must tread carefully, a senior official involved in the talks said. American officials informed China of the meeting in Berlin, and Mr. Hill is headed to Beijing, as well as to Seoul and Tokyo, after he leaves Germany.

Though the six-party talks have been held exclusively in Beijing, North Korea has used Berlin as a diplomatic venue in the past, for example during the 1990s for talks with the Clinton administration. It maintains a large embassy here, a legacy of the days of East German Communism.

Ms. Rice landed here after completing meetings with Arab allies in the Middle East and Persian Gulf, and she flew over Iraq en route to Berlin.

Her trip also included talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories, an effort to push ahead stalled peace talks.

During an evening news conference here, Ms. Rice announced that the so-called quartet — a group of negotiators that includes the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — will meet in Washington in early February to help restart the Middle East talks.

U.S. Open To Bilateral Talks On Ties With N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 17 -- If North Korea gives up its nuclear programs, the United States is willing to engage in "a bilateral process" to establish "a normal relationship," the chief U.S. negotiator said here Wednesday after two days of one-on-one talks with his North Korean counterpart.

"We are prepared to go on that road and to really offer North Korea a hand as it moves along the road," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said in a speech here in the midst of his talks, the first time he has met with senior North Korean officials outside Asia. He said he has been trying to "make sure they understand very clearly what we are intending to do, what our intentions are."

Hill's comments mark the first time a U.S. official has publicly emphasized the possibility of such bilateral discussions, something the Pyongyang government has long sought. Ever since the North Korean nuclear crisis began in 2002, the Bush administration has resisted such negotiations, preferring to work through a somewhat cumbersome forum that also includes China, Russia, South Korea and Japan.

The question of how normalization would take place was contentious during the negotiations that led to a September 2005 joint statement, in which North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear programs. The U.S. delegation specifically sought the removal of the word "dialogue" from the section describing the normalization of relations from the final draft of the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0118247

Critics of the administration have urged it to provide North Korea more detail on possible enticements for giving up its weapons program. Hill's comments appeared to be part of an effort to flesh out the details.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was briefed by Hill on the talks after she arrived here from Kuwait for discussions with German officials on the Middle East. Asked at a news conference about Hill's statement, Rice emphasized the 2005 document, noting that it would "lead to a bilateral, a normalization of relations."

The agreement "is very clearly in the context of the denuclearization -- complete, verifiable denuclearization, and I should say irreversible denuclearization -- to the Korean Peninsula," Rice said. "We believe that the six-party context might allow that evolution to take place."

Hill also noted the September 2005 agreement in his speech, which was organized at the American Academy in Berlin. But the final draft of the agreement is vague about the process of normalization.

The key sentence, using the abbreviation for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, said, "The DPRK and the United States undertook to respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together, and take steps to normalize their relations subject to their respective bilateral policies." That sentence was crafted after the United States balked at a version referring to "bilateral policies and dialogue."

On Wednesday, Hill said that "we have an adequate bilateral mechanism within the six-party talks to exchange our views with the North Koreans." The comment appeared to refer to the increasingly frequent meetings he has held with his counterpart, Kim Gye Gwan, when the six-party sessions were not taking place. Previously, the meetings with Kim were held in Beijing, generally in preparation for another round of six-party talks, but no new round is currently scheduled.

At the last round of six-nation talks in December, North Korean officials balked at substantive discussions, insisting that the United States lift punitive measures intended to halt alleged money-laundering operations.

Rice flew to Germany after four days in the Middle East, visiting Israel, the West Bank, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Germany currently holds both the rotating presidency of the European Union and the chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrialized countries, giving it substantial diplomatic clout in the first half of the year. German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made it known she is eager to elevate the European role in the search for peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

Rice will fly to London on Thursday to meet with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and plans to return to Washington on Friday.

U.S. General In S.Korea Warns Of Changes (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, January 18, 2007

The top U.S. general in South Korea warned Thursday that changes to the command structure on the peninsula could damage the ability of allied forces to maintain the more than half-century-old armistice with North Korea.

South Korea has requested it retake wartime command of its own forces, which it turned over to the U.S.-led U.N. Command during the 1950-53 Korean War. The transition is expected to occur sometime between 2009 and 2012.

The top U.S. officer in South Korea, U.S. Army Gen. B.B. Bell, also serves as chief of the U.N. Command. He cautioned that changes to alliance structures must not harm the U.N. commander's ability to quickly mobilize forces to protect the cease-fire between North and South.

"Unless addressed, this situation will make it impossible to credibly maintain the armistice," Bell told a news conference.

He said the problem should be carefully considered during peacetime because on the Korean Peninsula "crisis escalation could quickly, indeed almost instantaneously, lead to combat operations."

"There could be no time to make changes in our command structure while crisis escalates," he said. However, he added that he didn't expect any renewed war.

"If we fail to make adjustments as military leaders, we fail in our responsibilities," Bell said.

North Korea has long maintained that the U.N. Command is irrelevant and a thinly veiled U.S. effort to claim international legitimacy for its forces here. Some 29,500 U.S. troops remain stationed in South Korea as a legacy of the Korean War, with their numbers set to decline to about 25,000 in coming years.

DOJ_NMG_0118248

Although other nations contributed forces during the war in the 1950s, U.S. troops are the only actual fighting elements left on the peninsula in addition to the South Korean military.

Bell argued the U.N. command was still needed.

"Until a lasting peace is achieved on the peninsula, there will continue to be a major role for the U.N. Command," he said.

Somalis Must Reach Out For Unity, U.S. Official Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration's point person on Somalia expressed concern yesterday over the slow pace of efforts to form a unity government there.

A lack of willingness by the internationally backed transitional government to reach out to other groups and clans, including "moderate" representatives of an ousted Islamic movement, "frankly, remains our greatest challenge," said Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs.

In particular, the transitional government's decision yesterday to fire the parliamentary speaker, Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, who had made peace overtures to the Islamic movement, would have a "negative impact," Frazer said at a conference on Somalia at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

The administration had been clear in discussions with the government, she said, that it "must reach out" to other groups in order to break the cycle of violence in Somalia.

In Nairobi, the U.S. ambassador to Kenya, Michael E. Ranneberger, told reporters that Aden was "the kind of person who could pull people together."

In a separate address at the Washington conference, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) said the transitional government was "already running the risk of missing a critical window to establish itself as a credible, transparent and representative government." Feingold criticized what he said was the Bush administration's slow response to the situation in Somalia and its focus on capturing al-Qaeda suspects it says are being harbored by the Islamic movement.

The U.S. military targeted al-Qaeda suspects in an airstrike this month in southern Somalia, where they had fled after Ethiopian troops invaded in late December and installed the transitional government in Mogadishu, the Somali capital. The strike killed as many as 10 people but none of the targets.

A more "comprehensive strategy" including assistance for security, governance, reconstruction and humanitarian needs "has yet to be developed," said Feingold, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on African affairs. He said he would hold early hearings on Somalia.

Frazer said the administration already has a comprehensive strategy covering those areas. There are continuing efforts to enlist an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopian military, she said, although Uganda remains the only country that has made a commitment to the mission. Details are being worked out for a U.S. airlift of the 1,500 Ugandan troops, who she said should arrive by mid-February.

"I'm so keen on this I feel like maybe we should just hire some planes and pick them up and drop them at the Mogadishu airport," she said.

In addition to promoting political stability and a peacekeeping force, Frazer said, the administration was committed to providing reconstruction and humanitarian assistance. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recently announced an initial $40 million in U.S. aid.

Senator Calls For New US Push On Somalia (AFP)

AFP, January 18, 2007

The US Senate's top Africa hand urged the Bush administration to work urgently to establish a peacekeeping force and an international trust fund for stricken Somalia.

"The window of opportunity to effect change in Somalia is closing," Senator Russ Feingold, the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations panel's Africa subcommittee said.

DOJ_NMG_0118249

Washington needs to "quickly and aggresively on all fronts," Feingold said, warning that without action, Somalia's status as a security threat to US interests would grow.

Chasing Al-Qaeda cells in Somalia in US strikes, was not enough, Feingold said, opening a half-day conference on Somalia's plight, sponsored by several policy groups at the Center for Strategic and International Studies think-tank.

Washington must crank up diplomatic efforts towards the formation of a representative national government in Somalia, as well as on a trust fund backed by international donors, he said, adding that the US government should also appoint a special envoy to rally global efforts.

"The price tag will be significant ... (but) we are spending eight billion dollars a week in Iraq, a place where Al-Qaeda wasn't in the first place.

"But we can't even (have an) increase over the 40 million we are doing now with regards to Somalia ... we are just not thinking straight."

Feingold was speaking hours after fresh signs emerged of Somalia's fractured political climate, as lawmakers sacked the speaker of parliament. Sharif Hassan Sheikh Aden, and days after a US strike against an alleged Al-Qaeda cell.

Ethiopian troops entered Somalia in December to support the weak Somali transitional government against powerful Islamists and quickly ousted the Islamists from Mogadishu and much of southern Somalia.

Along with the United States, United Nations and others, Ethiopia, supports deployment of an African peacekeeping force to stabilize Somalia and assist the Somali government in consolidating its limited power.

Aid Groups Warn Of Wider Darfur Crisis (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, January 18, 2007

In a sweeping call for help, a wide range of U.N. aid agencies appealed Wednesday to warring parties to end the violence in Darfur, warning the relief keeping millions alive will be "irreversibly jeopardized" if it does not stop.

The humanitarian groups said a massive influx of foreign aid was the only thing "holding the line" for 2.5 million refugees and over 1 million other civilians in Darfur.

"That line cannot be held much longer," warned the statement issued by 14 United Nations agencies working in Sudan.

Aid groups and U.N. officials have for months been alarmed by the rapidly deteriorating conditions faced by civilians in Darfur, where over 200,000 people have been killed since rebels took up arms against the central Sudanese government in 2003, accusing it of neglect.

The government is accused of having retaliated against civilians with air raids and by unleashing the janjaweed, militias of Arab nomads blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict.

"Villages have been burned, looted and arbitrarily bombed, and crops and livestock destroyed. Sexual violence against women is occurring at alarming rates. This situation is unacceptable," the statement warned.

The humanitarian groups said what pushed them to issue the appeal Wednesday was the increased targeting of aid workers in the region. The splintering of rebel groups into lawless factions without clear leadership, as well as government restrictions, is making it ever more difficult for aid workers to operate, they said.

"The humanitarian space that we operate in is shrinking," said Ted Chaiban, Sudan country manager for UNICEF, which signed with appeal. Other signatories included the World Food Program, the U.N. Development Program, and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

With repeated military attacks and shifting front lines, December was the worst month in Darfur in over two years, the statement said. It followed six months of escalating violence, during which 30 U.N. and other aid compounds were attacked, forcing some 400 U.N. and other aid workers to relocate. During the same period, 12 aid workers were killed in zones controlled by rebels and government forces.

"Before, aid workers were being caught up in the violence. Now they're actually being targeted," said Alun McDonald, spokesman for the British aid group Oxfam in Sudan. "It's not the occasional vehicle getting lost, it's compounds being looted in coordinated attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0118250

U.N. and other humanitarian groups say the turning point came on Dec. 18, when at least four aid organizations were attacked in the South Darfur camp of Gereida, the region's largest with 130,000 refugees.

Offices and housing compounds were simultaneously raided, cars and radio equipment plundered, some aid workers endured mock executions and assailants raped a female aid worker from the French aid group Action Contre la Faim.

"We're still trying to understand what happened," said the French agency's Sudan coordinator Philippe Conraud. "The fact that we can't assess why this took place is worrying us for the future."

Nearly all aid workers have evacuated Gereida, a zone reputed to be controlled by fighters from the faction of the Sudan Liberation Movement led by Minni Minawi, the one rebel leader who signed a peace agreement with the government last May.

Conraud said Minawi had provided "very little explanation," but had promised to investigate the incident.

"If the raids were a clear message that aid groups aren't welcome in Gereida anymore, then we'll have to move out permanently," he said.

Meanwhile, 130,000 people who depend on aid to survive in Gereida have not received food since mid-December. "The situation could become very alarming within a few weeks," Conraud said, pointing to World Food Program estimates that more than 170,000 people are now out of reach in South Darfur alone and are seriously at risk for malnutrition.

Deteriorating hygiene in the crowded refugee camps and the isolation of villages have triggered a new surge of cholera, the aid groups said, with 147 dead and more than 2,700 suffering from the epidemic in 2006.

"If this situation continues, the humanitarian operation and welfare of the population it aims to support will be irreversibly jeopardized," the U.N. statement warned.

The U.N. aid groups called on Khartoum's government and the rebels to "take concrete steps toward a peaceful settlement in Darfur and the respect of international humanitarian law and principles" and to hold the perpetrators of crimes accountable.

Pulling out of the region for good is not an option, the aid groups insisted. But the current violence "raises the question of whether we are having an impact that justifies those risks," said Chaiban of UNICEF.

U.N. agencies say Darfur has been their single largest humanitarian effort, with nearly 1 million tons of food delivered at a cost of over $1 billion since April 2004, and the mobilization of some 15,000 Sudanese and international aid workers.

___

Associated Press Writer Mohamed Osman contributed to this article in Khartoum, Sudan.

Ban Ki-moon Vows To Reform The U.N. (AP)

By Kasie Hunt, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

The United Nations will see a series of reforms and be "reborn" under new leadership, new U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Wednesday.

"I am very much committed to changing the culture of the United Nations," Ban told reporters at the U.S. Capitol after meeting with members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Ban also called on Congress to reverse a law that caps U.S. spending on U.N. peacekeeping missions at 25 percent of the total cost. A U.N. agreement requires the U.S. to pay approximately 27 percent of the costs. Congress voted for the cap in April 2005 in response to the allegations of corruption and mismanagement in the oil-for-food program for Iraq, sexual abuses by peacekeepers and other scandals.

Ban's pledge of additional reforms came in the wake of Tuesday's indictment of U.N. oil-for-food chief Benon Sevan, who was charged with taking a $160,000 (euro124,000) bribe to influence who could buy Iraqi oil under the scandal-tainted humanitarian program.

That scandal sullied the record of then-Secretary-General Kofi Annan when an investigation led by former Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker blamed shoddy U.N. management and the world's most powerful nations for allowing corruption in the $64 billion program to go on for years.

Ban, who was South Korea's foreign minister, took over for Annan on Jan. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0118251

The Democratic chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Tom Lantos of California, praised Ban for promising reforms and pledging to release his own financial records. Lantos said this would be a first in the U.N.'s history.

The panel's top Republican, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, said: "The U.S. spends a lot of money on the U.N. system, and we want to see real results and real reforms."

The meeting with members of Congress came a day after Ban met with President Bush at the White House. Bush and Ban suggested they want to put behind them the discord typified by the administration's clash with the United Nations over the U.S.-led war that overthrew Saddam Hussein in Iraq.

Ban said he would need congressional help as he tries to mend that relationship.

"We need very active and continuing support from the U.S. Congress," Ban said.

Workers Allege Abuse By Kuwaiti Attache (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Three Indian women who worked in the McLean home of a Kuwaiti military attache filed a lawsuit yesterday alleging that they were brought to the United States illegally and abused and exploited by the diplomat and his wife.

One of the women, Mani Kumari Sabbithi, fled the family's home after the diplomat and his wife became angry over a mistake she made in preparing a meal for the couple's triplets, then 1 year old, the suit alleges.

The wife, Maysaa Al Omar, pulled Sabbithi's hair and threatened to cut off her tongue, the suit alleges. The husband, Maj. Waleed Al Saleh, started screaming at Sabbithi and pushed her to the floor, knocking her out, the suit alleges.

Soon after, Sabbithi went to the home of a sympathetic neighbor to whom the women had confided their problems, according to the lawsuit.

A few months later, in January 2006, the other two workers, Joquina Quadros and Gila Sixtina Fernandes, fled as well, pretending they were going upstairs to do laundry but instead ducking out while their bosses were in the basement, the lawsuit said.

Filed against the couple and the government of Kuwait, the lawsuit is the latest legal effort to curb the exploitation of foreign domestic workers, particularly by diplomats, whose immunity can make it difficult for authorities to investigate allegations of abuse, let alone act to halt such conduct.

Jasem Albudaiwi, the first secretary of the Kuwaiti Embassy in Washington, said Kuwaiti officials learned of the allegations yesterday after media inquiries about the lawsuit and were not able to immediately address the accusations.

"We're investigating all aspects," Albudaiwi said. "We in the embassy don't tolerate any sort of abuse, especially of domestic helpers."

Al Saleh, who lives in the 7000 block of Elizabeth Drive, did not respond to a request made through an embassy spokeswoman for comment on the allegations against him and his wife.

The lawsuit was filed at the federal courthouse in Washington by lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union. It seeks an unspecified amount of damages for economic losses as well as mental and emotional anguish.

Like many domestic workers who accompany expatriates on assignments to the United States, the women had been granted visas that are conditioned on their continued employment with the person who sponsored them -- a condition that gives the employer tremendous leverage and that can pose a perilous obstacle to filing a complaint about mistreatment.

In this case, the women came from impoverished backgrounds in rural India, the suit said. They alleged a range of abuse, threats and exploitation. At least two of the women were given contracts promising salaries of roughly $1,300 a month for eight-hour work days, the suit alleges. Instead, they were forced to work up to 12 to 18 hours every day doing "backbreaking work" by caring for the couple's four children and performing numerous household chores, the suit said. They were paid just a few hundred dollars a month, according to the suit.

In addition, the money was never given directly to them but instead was sent to relatives in the Middle East, the suit alleges.

Now living in New York state, Fernandes, 39, Quadros, 40, and Sabbithi, 33, have been granted special temporary visas issued to victims of human trafficking, said a lawyer for the women, Claudia Flores of the ACLU.

The ACLU's Women's Rights Project in New York and the law firm Dechert LLP drafted the suit, which alleges human trafficking, forced labor, involuntary servitude, false imprisonment, assault, battery and other violations of the law.

Flores said arguments of diplomatic immunity can be overcome if the case involves a commercial relationship outside the scope of official responsibilities. In those instances, she said, the diplomat's conduct might not be covered by the Vienna Convention.

The exploitation of foreign domestic workers, particularly from South Asia, is a pervasive problem in Kuwait, the lawsuit claims, citing reports by the U.S. State Department and the advocacy group Human Rights Watch.

Victim Of His Power Grab (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Chavez's Nationalization Disillusions Utility-Owner AES

Dennis W. Bakke remembers Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez as a charming conversationalist. Chavez loved to talk about baseball and closely followed the fortunes of Venezuelan players in the U.S. major leagues.

And when it came time to talk business, Chavez was supportive. Bakke, then chief executive of AES, wanted to know what the populist leader of Venezuela thought about an Arlington power-generation company spending about $1.7 billion to buy a controlling stake in the Caracas electric utility.

"He was very reassuring," Bakke says. On April 28, 2000, after one of their meetings, Bakke and Chavez emerged from the presidential residence La Casona all smiles, according to one newspaper report. Chavez called Bakke a "revolutionary entrepreneur who wanted to invest in Venezuela." Bakke said he had come to Caracas to "learn how to be a revolutionary businessman."

Seven years later, no one at AES is smiling, and there was nothing reassuring about the Jan. 8 announcement by Chavez that he would nationalize the telecommunications and electric utility industries, including the 82 percent AES stake in the Grupo La Electricidad de Caracas (EDC). The minister of mines and energy, Rafael Ramirez, said on Monday that it was a "reasonable" goal to take over EDC by June as part of a nationalization in which at least four utilities could revert to state control.

Ramirez didn't say how the Venezuelan government would compensate AES or other investors, but the mere talk of nationalization has knocked $138 million, or 15 percent, off EDC's market capitalization on the Venezuelan stock exchange. AES stock dropped as much as 5.4 percent after the announcement, though it has since rebounded.

"Taking risks is what business is all about," Bakke said in an interview yesterday. "The question is how much risk you take." In this case, he said, "we took too much."

Forbes magazine at the time said the AES move was "perplexing," noting that other investors were fleeing because they saw Chavez as an unpredictable, self-styled revolutionary autocrat. But Bakke, now retired from AES and running a chain of charter schools, said the opinion of AES executives and directors was unanimous back then.

"Now I think it was a mistake," he said. "Not so much doing it; you're going to make mistakes. You'd like to be smarter about how big a mistake."

Ramirez suggested that Chavez had "serious complaints" about the way AES has been running the utility, but Michael Shifter, vice president of the Inter-American Dialogue, said AES has simply been caught in Venezuela's political vortex. Since his inauguration last week, Chavez has moved to tighten control of a major private TV station and said the state would soon take majority interest in four international oil projects. Flush with oil revenue, Chavez has shown little concern for plummeting foreign investment.

Critics say that the government's plan to create a new state power firm, 40 percent owned by the state oil company, is a recipe for inefficiency. El Nacional, a major newspaper in Caracas, reported yesterday that official data show that in 2006, EDC had the lowest number of blackouts of any of the country's 11 electricity companies. The paper said that in 2006, there were 148 hours of service cuts. By comparison, Cadafe, the most inefficient of six state-owned firms, had 34,536 hours of cuts, the paper said.

DOJ_NMG_0118253

"It is very hard to find an economic rationale for these decisions," Shifter said. "This is arbitrary autocratic rule. Chavez makes his decisions according to a political calculus."

Back in 2000, that political calculus was different. EDC was founded in 1895, and Chavez was happy to have local investors, most of whom opposed his presidency, bought out. Local stock markets, in a slump since Chavez took power, rebounded after the AES investment. And Chavez was impressed by Bakke, a devout Christian who still believes that "the purpose of business is not making money or making a stock price go up, but to do something wonderful for society . . . in an economically sustainable manner."

Asked about the AES investment by a Venezuelan newspaper in May 2000, Chavez said, "I do not have to meddle in that, because I consider it strictly private." He said the company's executives "displayed a quite progressive vision."

For AES at that time, there were reasons to take the risk. Because so many foreign investors were nervous about Venezuela, the price of EDC shares was attractive. EDC paid out $184 million in dividends to AES in 2004 and 2005, according to the AES Web site. EDC has generating plants, about 2,600 employees and more than 1 million customers.

Bakke said the EDC investment was one of a handful made during his tenure that violated his own guidelines limiting AES's exposure in any one place.

Current AES chief executive Paul Hanrahan, who was a key player in the Venezuela deal in 2000, and other AES officials declined to comment for this article. But today the company is more diversified than ever, with 121 power generation projects in 26 countries and 14 distribution companies. And Hanrahan says the company expects to devote about 30 percent of its capital spending in the next five to seven years to alternate energy projects. (The chairman of the AES board is now former federal budget director and Carlyle Group partner Richard Darman; one of the directors is Charles Rossotti, former Internal Revenue Service commissioner.)

The breadth of AES operations today has cushioned the impact of the Venezuela news, but it could still be substantial. Shelby G. Tucker, a utility analyst with Bank of America, told investors that if AES does not get any compensation for EDC, it would lose about $1.5 billion, or about 10 percent, of its value. But the minority investors in EDC are Venezuelans, and analysts think Ch?vez will want to compensate them. "All signs are that the government intends to push forward and wants to give fair value for the assets," said Guilherme Paiva, a Latin America equity analyst for Deutsche Bank Securities. "Now what is fair value? That is the million-dollar question."

Pulling The Plug On Anti-Chavez TV (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 17 -- Inside Radio Caracas Television, actors make racy soap operas about love gone bad while an influential television host pillories President Hugo Ch?vez. Outside the station, none of that sits well with Alberto Carias, a beefy man with a bullhorn whose agitated followers promise that the days of Radio Caracas Television are numbered.

He makes no pretense about who made the decision -- the president, who is poised for sweet revenge against one of his most dogged antagonists, known here by its call letters, RCTV.

"Here they practice yellow journalism, treacherous journalism that goes against the people's rights," Carias told a crowd earlier this week. And then, discussing the entertainment side, he said: "The children are the ones affected for many years by the sex, by the violence of these programs that go against the morality of children, that go against the morality of the Venezuelan people."

As Chavez accelerates his country's shift toward "21st-century socialism," a decision not to renew RCTV's broadcast license is among the government's more dramatic steps, and one that has caused serious concern among free-press advocates. While Venezuelan officials have accused the 54-year-old station of having collaborated with organizers of a 2002 coup against Chavez, the Committee to Protect Journalists in New York, the Organization of American States and the Catholic Church have warned that press freedoms in Venezuela are in danger.

The case has attracted widespread attention from officials in Washington and Latin America, for whom the non-renewal of a license has echoes of right-wing dictatorships of the past, when newspapers and broadcasters were closed if they veered from the party line. Though self-censorship and slayings of journalists remain common, particularly in Colombia and Mexico, the closing of a media outlet for political reasons has not occurred in years.

DOJ_NMG_0118254

"The RCTV case is clearly a case of censorship and the most grave step back in the region since Fujimori," said Jos? Miguel Vivanco, Americas director for Human Rights Watch, referring to widespread manipulation of the media by Peruvian President Alberto Fujimori in the 1990s. "Chavez is not renewing the concession to punish a medium for its opposition to the government."

RCTV produces Venezuela's sappy soaps, known as telenovelas, which are wildly popular and have been exported to more than 80 countries. It runs an academy that trained 5,600 actors, journalists and technicians last year, and its news operation has 250 staff members and offices in 10 cities across the country.

Much to the bane of the government, it also features Miguel Angel Rodr?guez, whose three-year-old program, "The Interview," makes mincemeat of Chavez's government every weekday morning. Sitting before a giant screen where Chavez's speeches are replayed, Rodriguez and his guests, usually staunch foes of Chavez, dissect the president's statements and declare his government anti-democratic and incompetent.

"Could we say to Venezuelans that a person of this sort, Hugo Chavez, is rising up against the liberty of Venezuelans?" Rodriguez asked a guest on a recent morning. "Is this constitutional reform, the enabling law and this giant step to consolidate 21st-century socialism a method of finding a legal way to install totalitarianism?"

Government officials openly disparage RCTV's daily programming -- seeing its soaps as akin to pornography. The president has accused RCTV of "poisoning the souls of children with irresponsible sex."

But what really angers the government is what happened before and after April 11, 2002, when an anti-government protest ended in violence and the ouster of Ch?vez. RCTV, like three other major private television stations, encouraged the protests and, once Ch?vez was ousted, celebrated his removal. But when the interim government that replaced him began to collapse, RCTV and other stations blacked out the news -- which the government says was done to keep Venezuelans from rising up against the coup organizers.

The director of the station, Marcel Granier, denies taking part in the coup. "That doesn't apply to me," he said. "I was never in any of those meetings." Granier does acknowledge participating in efforts to mount a recall referendum against Ch?vez in 2004 that failed when the president won 59 percent of the vote. But he contends that RCTV tries to be fair, offering invitations to government officials that are usually ignored.

"What we have tried to do is preserve spaces for pluralism so that different opinions are heard," he said.

Government officials say RCTV has shown nothing but contempt for them. "They were part of the team of conspirators," said Saul Ortega, a congressman. "It's a subversive channel that skirts the law. In no other country would that have been permitted."

Still, the government has not filed charges against any of RCTV's directors. Officials cite the station's anti-government position as a motivation for the non-renewal of its license, set to expire at the end of May.

William Lara, the communications minister, told a delegation from the Committee to Protect Journalists that the station violated a vaguely worded 2004 law by broadcasting sexually suggestive programming during daylight hours. But the government has never provided the station, nor the committee, with an official detailed explanation for the non-renewal.

"The government's decision not to renew the concession is a decision that lacks transparency," said Carlos Lauria, an Argentine journalist who headed the committee's delegation. "We are worried because this can have consequences for the exercise of free expression."

Free expression is exercised in Venezuela. Another influential television station, Globovision, lambastes the government frequently, and Caracas boasts a range of newspapers, many of them with an anti-government bent.

But the government has steadily been pressuring the opposition media -- prompting a once aggressive station, Venevision, to dramatically tone down its news reports. Journalists say access to information is routinely denied, and state advertising is withheld from some opposition media outlets. The government is now planning to close many press relations offices, funneling all information through the communications minister, according to a report in El Universal newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0118255

The state funds hundreds of community radio stations and numerous newspapers. State television channels run Chavez's speeches and forums where moderators extol the virtues of the government. In 2005, the government founded Telesur, a network for Latin America that Chavez says is a leftist alternative to CNN En Espanol.

If the government follows through with its plans on RCTV, it will mark the end of an era for a station that produced the long-running humor program "Radio Rochela" and famous telenovelas such as "Through These Streets," which dealt with social tensions, and "My Fat Beauty," a humorous look at its lovable protagonist.

In RCTV's sprawling facility, which includes a network news center, studios for soaps, editing rooms and warehouses, workers are trying to stay optimistic.

Cameras roll, directors give orders from a control booth and technicians test for sound in a warren of editing rooms.

Sitting in the makeup room this week, with her hair being blow-dried, actress Hilda Abrahamz was wistful when asked about RCTV's future. She is working on the latest soap in her 25-year career at the station.

"Here, I was born as an actress," she said. "I owe my artistic career to Radio Caracas because they gave me the opportunity to start here."

Border Agent Kills Immigrant; Mexican Government Protests (NYT)

By Jonathan Clark

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

BISBEE, Ariz., Jan. 17 —A Mexican immigrant was shot and killed on Friday by a Border Patrol agent in Arizona, prompting an investigation by federal authorities and condemnation from President Felipe Calderón of Mexico.

The immigrant, Francisco Javier Domínguez Rivera, 22, was shot as he and six others were being taken into custody by a Border Patrol agent, shortly after they crossed illegally into Cochise County in southeastern Arizona, between Naco and Douglas. Before he was shot, Mr. Domínguez Rivera scuffled with the agent, whose identity was not released, a Border Patrol spokesman said.

It was the first fatal shooting by a Border Patrol agent since Aug. 26, 2006, when an agent killed a man who was throwing rocks from the Mexican side of the border near Andrade, Calif., Xavier Rios, an agency spokesman, said.

The Cochise County Sheriff's Department and the federal Department of Homeland Security, the parent agency of United States Customs and Border Protection, are investigating the shooting.

The F.B.I. is also looking at the case and will review the results of the other inquiries before determining whether to expand its investigation, said an agency spokeswoman in Phoenix.

“Any time there’s an assault on a federal agent, we’re involved,” Deborah McCarley, the Federal Bureau of Investigation spokeswoman, said. “As we go along, if information surfaces that there’s been a civil rights violation, then we obviously would take a look at that.”

Lt. Cmdr. Mark Dannels, a sheriff's department spokesman, said the shooting was prompted by stone throwing. A Border Patrol statement called it a scuffle but did not mention stone throwing.

Also, the two agencies' descriptions of where the shooting occurred differed by several miles.

Initial reports suggested that Mr. Domínguez Rivera was unarmed, Jesus Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, said. Officials would not be able to say for certain until the investigation was completed, Mr. Rodriguez said.

President Calderón, who took office in December, said at a news conference on Sunday, “I want to begin by extending my deepest condolences, and then my most energetic protest over the death of our countryman, a native of Puebla, who died in Arizona from a gunshot after having been detained by the U.S. Border Patrol.”

The Mexican Ministry of Foreign Relations sent a formal note to the State Department expressing “its serious concern over the recurrence of this type of incident.”

At a news conference on Wednesday, Tom Casey, a State Department deputy spokesman said, “My understanding is we have received a diplomatic note from the government of Mexico on this incident.”

Any response would depend on the outcome of the federal inquiries, Mr. Casey said.

Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Two former U.S. Border Patrol agents surrendered yesterday to begin prison sentences for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico.

Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, said goodbye to their wives and six children -- three each -- as they turned themselves over to U.S. Marshals shortly after 1:30 p.m. at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, the California Republican who has been at the forefront of efforts to have the prosecution reviewed and the agents re-tried, yesterday criticized the White House for not acting in the case.

"This is the worst betrayal of American defenders I have ever seen," Mr. Rohrabacher said of President Bush. "It's shameful this was done by someone who is in the Republican Party. He obviously thinks more about his agreements with Mexico than the lives of American people and backing up his defenders.

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former "Agent of the Year" nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the agency, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after the smuggling suspect, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was located in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and was given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

"How will my children cope with this?" Patty Compean asked reporters as her husband prepared to turn himself over to federal authorities. "My husband is a good man and a good father. Sometimes I just don't know how this all happened."

The White House refused last week a request by Republican House members to keep the two men out of prison pending their appeal. Bush spokesman Tony Snow said that the case against the agents had been mischaracterized, that they had violated regulations and that they had been convicted by a jury.

The two men surrendered after U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone, who heard the case, denied a motion that they remain free on bond pending an appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans for a new trial.

"Because defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence, he is eligible for release pending appeal only for exceptional reasons," Judge Cardone said in denying the motion. "The court finds that no exceptional reasons exist in this case."

Both men were handcuffed and taken to the county jail for two weeks to a month until they can be transported to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to be housed in Mississippi, while Compean will be incarcerated in Ohio.

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said that more than 252,000 signatures were collected and that the petition was presented this week to the White House.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the Rio Grande along the border with Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

The government's prosecution began after an investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General located Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after the suspect's mother complained to a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Faults Judges' Terror Rulings (AP) 4
Secret Court To Govern Wiretapping Plan (AP) 4
Court Will Oversee Wiretap Program (WP) 5
Court To Oversee U.S. Wiretapping In Terror Cases (NYT) 7
White House In U-turn On Wiretapping (FT) 9
FISA Court Will Monitor Domestic Wiretapping (WT) 9
Warrantless Wiretaps To Cease (WSJ) 10
U.S. Ceases Warrantless Spy Operation (LAT) 11
Court To Oversee Wiretap Program (USAT) 12
White House Retreats Under Pressure (NYT) 13
Court To Monitor Bush Eavesdropping Program (MCT) 14
Attorney General: NSA Spy Program To Be Reformed (CNET) . 15
Secret Court Will Oversee Spying Program, U.S. Says (Update3) (BLOOM) 17
Administration To Let Court Monitor Domestic Spying (CNN) 18
US DOJ: Surveillance Program Now Court-approved (IDG) 19
A Spy Program In From The Cold (NYT) 19
No Court Order Needed (USAT) 20
Detainee's Letters Give Peek At Life At Guantanamo (WP) 21
Pentagon Aide Regrets Stance On Law Firms For Detainees (NYT) 22
Witness Against Militant Posada Reports A Bomb Under His Pickup (MH) 22
Philippine Militant Slain (LAT) 23

Homeland Response:

TSA Chief Hits Plan To Check Cargo (USAT) 25
No-fly List Checked For Accuracy, Cut (AP) 25
Appeals For Delayed Travelers (NYT) 26
Don't Demonize Security (USAT) 26
Grand Jury Looking At Katrina Insurer (NYT) 27

War News:

Measure In Senate Urges No Troop Rise In Iraq (NYT) 28
Congress Unleashes Antiwar Proposals (LAT) 29
Second Republican Opposes Bush Iraq Plan (AP) 30
Bipartisan Senate Measure Confronts Bush Over Iraq (WP) 31
Senate Plans Vote Against Troop Surge (WT) 32
GOP Struggles For War Unity (RC) 33
The GOP In A Quagmire (WP) 35
Senators Introduce Resolution Opposing More Troops For Iraq (MCT) 36
White House: Capping Iraq Troop Levels Would Be "Extreme" (WSJ) 37
Sen. Clinton Keeps Pace With Public Opinion Against Iraq War (CHIT) 37
Hillary Clinton Opposes Buildup (LAT) 39
Senator Clinton Calls Bush Plan 'a Losing Strategy' (NYT) 40
Clinton Steps Up Criticism Of War In Iraq (WP) 41
Sen. Clinton Calls For Troop Cap In Iraq (AP) 42
The Dems' Antiwar Shuffle (LAT) 43
Presidential Aspirants Assail Plan For Iraq Buildup (USAT) 43
Dodd Introduces Bill To Cap U.S. Troops In Iraq (WP) 44
Brownback Calls For Diplomacy To Resolve Iraq Conflict (FWST) 46
'08 Dems Up Ante On Iraq (HILL) 46
Congressional Procession Of Iraq Proposals Likely To Lead Nowhere (WP) 47
Inside The Beltway (WT) 49
Commanding Majority Opposes More Troops In Iraq (LAT) 50
Can Congress Stop The War? (USAT) 51
Anatomy Of A Wrong Approach (WP) 52
Maliki Stresses Urgency In Arming Iraqi Forces (WP) 53
Maliki Talks Tough, Sees U.S. Withdrawal Near (LAT) 55
Hamilton Warns That Al-Maliki May Fail Bush (HILL) 56
U.S. Ambassador Expects Progress Within Months (USAT) 57
Shiite Fighters Arrested In Crackdown, Iraq Says (NYT) 58
In Course Change, Roles Extended To Baathists (LAT) 60
Iraqis Answer Global Critics By Tackling Troubling Issues (NYT) 60
Iraqi Factories, Aging And Shut, Now Give Hope (NYT) 61
Timing Of Hearing Is Blow To The White House (LAT) 63
American Woman Killed In Baghdad Attack (LAT) 64
Sadr City Market Bomb Kills 17 (WT/AP) 65
Lost In Translation: Iraq's Injured "Terps" (WSJ) 66
Officer Facing Court-martial Denounces War (LAT) 69
U.S. Eyes More Troops For Afghanistan (CHIT) 70
Gates May Seek More Afghanistan Troops (AP) 71
Gates Backs Generals' Afghan Distress Call (NYT) 72
Commanders Seek More Troops In Afghanistan (WT) 73
US Pressures Pakistan Over Taliban (FT) 74
Terror Suspect Dies In Shootout In Philippines (WP/AP) 75
How The Left Led Us Into 9/11 (LAT) 75

DOJ:

Conyers, Berman Seek Answers From Attorney General (HILL) 76

Lam's Exit Draws Scrutiny By Dems (LAT) 77
Politics And The Corruption Fighter (NYT) 77
Federal Prosecutor In BALCO Probe Resigns (FINDLAW/AP) .. 78
U.S. Attorney Ryan's Departure May Be Part Of Bush Administration Purge (LAW) 78
New Questions Raised In Bonds Investigation (NYT) 79
Federal Prosecutor In BALCO Probe Quits (NYT/AP) 80
Outgoing BALCO Prosecutor: Probe To Go On (USAT) 81
Wood Nominated For U.S. Attorney In Kansas City (AP) 81

Corporate Scandals:

Monster Options Investigation Widens (WSJ) 82
Forbes Sentenced In Cendant Case (WSJ/AP) 82
Forbes Gets 151 Months For Cendant Fraud (USAT) 83
Ex-Head Of Cendant Sentenced (WP/BLOOM) 83
Conrad Black's Lawyers Urge Judge To Bar Co-defendants' Statements (FINDLAW/AP) 84
Senate Panel Limits Pay Deferrals For Executives (WP) 85
VW Executive Admits Guilt In Scandal (FT) 86
Accounting Rules Won't Be Delayed (WSJ) 86

Criminal Law:

Political Opinions Complicate Screening For Libby Jurors (NYT) 87
In Libby Trial, Big Names Make Jury Picks A Tall Order (WP) ... 88
Libby Seeks Jurors Who Trust Cheney (AP) 89
Attorney Says Racism Involved In Case Against Peete (WMC) . 89
Man Who Scammed AOL Users Convicted (AAS) 90
Belleville Woman Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Katrina Fraud (AP) 90
A 12th Dallas Convict Is Exonerated By DNA (NYT) 91
DNA Databases May Be Growing Too Quickly (LAW) 92
Ex-Keyport Mayor Pleads Guilty To Bribery (NSL) 93
Ex-Keyport Mayor Admits Taking Bribe (JERSJ) 94
Somerville Subpoenaed Over Developer Projects (COURNEWS) 94
Justices Scrutinize Death Penalty In Texas (NYT) 95
High Court Hears 3 Death Penalty Cases (WP) 96
High Court Hears Texas Death Penalty Cases (LAW) 97
First Lady: Do More To Stop Child Porn (AP) 98
Governor Is Challenged On Ethics By Bruno (NYT) 98
Jury Selected In Coke Case (HC/AP) 99
Medicaid Fraud Charge (NSDY) 100
Neteller Ceases Handling U.S. Transfers (HC/AP) 100
2 Convicted In Kidnap-ransom Scheme In Which Victims Were Dumped In California Reservoir (FINDLAW/AP) 101
Ex-Official Of Red Cross Is Charged With Fraud (NYT) 102
Tales From The Whitey Watch (BOS) 102
TJX Says Customer Data Was Stolen (NYT) 104
2002 Sniper 'Witness' Convicted Of Rape, Murder (WP) 104
Suspect In Kidnapping May Be Linked To 1991 Abduction (NYT)105

Civil Law:

Utah Attorney Argues Brother's Death In Denver Court (SLT) .. 105
Schering Sales To Pay $435m In Drug Pricing, Marketing Case (AP) 106
Lawsuit Points To MRI Kickbacks (WSJ) 107

Civil Rights:

Man Who Tried To Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 33 Months (AP) 107
Expert: Party Official Used Racial Slurs To Disenfranchise Whites (AP) 108
Feds Urged To Probe State's Mental Hospitals (AJC) 108
NY Congressman Wants Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor (AP) 109
Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT) 110
President Calls For Genetic Privacy Bill (NYT) 111
The Spread Of The Credit Check As Civil Rights Issue (CSM). 111
Show Us The Money (WP) 113
The Lost Voice Of Protest (NYT) 113

Antitrust:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case To Report To Department Of Justice (AP) 114
FTC Updates Merger Filing Thresholds (DEAL) 115
Rivals Offer $38 Billion For A REIT (NYT) 116
Developer Mills Corp. Agrees To Buyout (WP) 117
Buyout May End Mills' Troubles (WT) 118
GE Is Near Deal For Abbott Unit (WSJ) 119
G.E. May Buy Abbott's Diagnostic Unit (NYT) 120
EOP Bids Show Real Estate Is Still Kicking (WSJ) 120
SKorea Antitrust Regulator Fines Hyundai (AP) 122

Environment:

Neb. Egg Company Is Fined For Pollution (AP) 122
Lobbying Firm Cuts Ties To Name Partner Under Investigation In Abramoff Probe (LAW) 122
Bills On Climate Move To Spotlight In New Congress (NYT) 123
Democrats Push Climate Change To Front Burner (WSJ) 124
Pelosi May Create Global Warming Panel (AP) 126
IN THE LOOP, ON THE HILL: A New Panel Forms Under Jurisdictional Cloud (WP) 127
It's A Consensus: The End Is Near (LAT) 128
Martian Logic (WP) 128
Will Al Gore Melt? (WSJ) 129

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-FBI Agent Denies He Fought Police (CTPOST) 130
Officials Suprised By DEA Raid On Pot Clinics (LAT) 131
DEA Raids 11 Medical Marijuana Clinics In Los Angeles Area (MHCA) 131
Feds Raid 5 Of 7 Medical Marijuana Clinics In WeHo (CBS2) .. 132
Feds Bust Bay Area Pot-Growing Operation (NBC4) 133
Officials Link Bay Area Raids To Area Marijuana Operation (SACBEE) 133
Police Charge 4 In Drug Scheme (NASHTEL) 133
$50 Million Drug-money Seizure May Be Biggest Score Ever (CNN) 134

Immigration:

Justices Grease Wheels For Deporting Noncitizen Car Thieves (LAT) 134
Justices Uphold Deporting Alien For Car Theft (WT) 135
Dems In No Rush To Build Border Fence (AP) 136

DOJ_NMG_0118259

Tax:

Senate Panel OKs Business Tax Breaks (AP) 136
Minimum-Wage Deal Hinges On Taxes (WSJ) 137

Congress-Administration:

Quarrel Stalls Movement Of Ethics Bill In Senate (NYT)..... 138
Line-Item Veto Stalls Ethics Bill (RC)..... 139
Grass-roots Groups Qualify As Lobbyists Under Ethics Bill (WT)140
McCain Does About-face On Grassroots Reform Bill (HILL) 141
Senate Democrats Fight Proposal To Ban Relatives Lobbying (USAT) 142
Senate Debates Ethics Of Travel Perks (AP) 143
Earmark Victory (WSJ) 144
5 Down, 1 To Go On Dems' House Agenda (AP) 145
Democrats' Rift Stalls Legislation (WT) 145
Happy Hours (NYT) 146
House Votes To Reduce Rates On Student Loans (WP)..... 147
House Approves Cuts In Cost Of Student Loans (WSJ) 148
House Cuts Interest Rate For Some College Loans (NYT)..... 149
House Passes Student-loan Interest Bill (LAT) 150
House Dems Target Special Breaks For Big Oil Thursday (USAT) 151
Democrats Say House Energy Bill Will Pass (NYT) 152
US House Takes On Big Oil (CSM)..... 153
U.S. Will Re-negotiate Free Trade Deals (AP) 154
Free-trade Pacts Face Labor Issues (WT) 155
Seoul Helps All North Korean Defectors (WSJ)..... 156
Defense Official Says Pentagon Hid Unspent Funds In Accounts (USAT) 156
Senate Taking Up FEC Picks (RC)..... 157
S.M.U. Chief Says Bush Library Would Be A Boon For The Campus (NYT)..... 158
Faculty Of Dallas University Less Than Thrilled At Prospect Of A Bush Library (WP) 158
FEDERAL DIARY: Leadership Problems, Cont. (WP) 159
Disaster Fund Faces Financial Shortfall (NYT) 160
Taking Power, Sharing Cereal (NYT) 161
Budget Balancing Is A Bad News-Good News Story (RC)..... 162
A 'Paygo' History Lesson (WSJ) 163

Other News:

Gain In Manufacturing Output Bodes Well For Economic Growth (WSJ) 164
Fed Official Says Housing Isn't Focus; Beige Book Indicates Modest Growth (WSJ) 165
Fed Officials' Comments Point To Little Chance Of Rate Cuts Anytime Soon (USAT) 167
PPI Data Add To US Inflation Fears (FT) 167
Stocks Sag On Weak Profits, Oil Uptick, Economic News (WSJ)168
Herndon Anti-Solicitation Law Challenged (WP) 168
Appeals Court Rules For Wal-Mart In Maryland Health Care Case (NYT) 169
Court Upholds Killing Of 'Wal-Mart Bill' (WT)..... 170
RNC Readies For Martinez Fight (WT)..... 171
Democrats Seeking To Drive Stem Cell Wedge In Minn., N.H. (HILL) 172
Rep. Boyda's Seat Top Target For Divided GOP (HILL)..... 173
No Challenger Yet For Vulnerable Landrieu (RC) 175
Why Georgia May Not Be On Democrats' Minds (RC) 176
Obama's Past Offers Ammo For Critics (AP) 177
A Look At Obama's Record In Illinois (AP) 178
As The Skeptics Ask Why, Obama Asks Why Not? (NYT) 179
Reporters Swarm Obama After Announcement (AP)..... 180
Obama Thrills Blacks Who See Shot At History (USAT)..... 181
He's In (WP) 182
The Democratic Field (WSJ)..... 182
McCain's War Stance Alienates Many (LAT)..... 183
'Move On' Takes Aim At McCain's Iraq Stance (CQ) 184
Before Running, Candidates Must Explore (WP) 185
Lieberman's Party, But Someone Else's Fight (NYT)..... 186
Shades Of Grey (WSJ) 186
Homeless In America (WSJ)..... 187
Business Drops The Doha Ball (WSJ)..... 189
The Biggest Losers (WSJ) 190
The Mayor And His Tax Cuts (NYT) 190
US, Germany Relaunch Mideast Quartet (AFP)..... 191
Rice Announces Mideast Strategy Session (AP) 192
Rice Cool To Temporary Palestinian State (AP) 192
Syrian, Israeli Backdoor Talks Now Emerging (CSM)..... 193
A New Chance For Peace? (WP) 194
Arabs Are Cool To Bush's Iraq Plan (AP) 195
Analysis: Rice Sees Iraq, Not Too Close (AP)..... 197
Kuwait Tells U.S. To Talk To Iran, Syria (AP)..... 197
Political Rivals Join To Slam President (AP) 198
Coalition Of The Concerned Grows In Iran (FT)..... 199
U.N. Nuclear Agency Stops Some Iran Aid (AP)..... 200
Pressure Mounts On Olmert To Resign (AP) 201
Israeli Officials Under Pressure To Quit (AP) 202
Top US Envoy Holds 'Useful' N Korea Talks In Berlin (AFP) 203
North Korea And U.S. Envoys Meet In Berlin (NYT) 204
U.S. Open To Bilateral Talks On Ties With N. Korea (WP)..... 205
U.S. General In S.Korea Warns Of Changes (AP) 206
Somalis Must Reach Out For Unity, U.S. Official Says (WP).... 206
Senator Calls For New US Push On Somalia (AFP) 207
Aid Groups Warn Of Wider Darfur Crisis (AP)..... 207
Ban Ki-moon Vows To Reform The U.N. (AP) 209
Workers Allege Abuse By Kuwaiti Attache (WP)..... 209
Victim Of His Power Grab (WP)..... 210
Pulling The Plug On Anti-Chavez TV (WP) 211
Border Agent Kills Immigrant; Mexican Government Protests (NYT) 213
Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT) 213

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0118260

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Faults Judges' Terror Rulings (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales rapped federal judges Wednesday for ruling on cases that affect national security policy. Judges, he contended, are unqualified to decide terrorism issues that he said are best settled by Congress or the president.

In a sharply worded speech directed at the third, and equal, branch of the government, Gonzales outlined some of the qualities the Bush administration looks for when selecting candidates for the federal bench. He condemned what he termed activist judges with lifetime appointments who "undermine the right of the people to govern themselves."

In nominating a judge, "we want to determine whether he understands the inherent limits that make an unelected judiciary inferior to Congress or the president in making policy judgments," Gonzales said in the 20-minute speech to American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank. "That, for example, a judge will never be in the best position to know what is in the national security interests of our country."

Gonzales did not cite any specific activist jurists or give examples of national security cases.

Pressed later for examples, he noted that Congress approved the Military Commissions Act, which authorizes military trials for terrorism suspects, four months after the Supreme Court ruled the trials would violate U.S. and international law.

"I don't think the judiciary is equipped at all to make decisions about what's in the national security interests of our country," Gonzales said. "How would they go about doing that? They don't have embassies around the world to give them that information. They don't have intelligence agencies gathering up intelligence information. ... It was never intended that they would have that role."

Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia, said it is inevitable that courts would decide some of the most contentious questions involving national security.

"Some of the most difficult issues are about national security, how to balance national security and civil liberties - especially in the context of domestic surveillance and enemy combatants," Tobias said. "Those are critically important issues that the courts are being asked to resolve."

Gonzales, a former Texas Supreme Court justice, also characterized efforts to retaliate against unpopular rulings as misguided. He mentioned a failed South Dakota proposal to sue or jail judges for making unpopular court decisions.

He also urged Congress to consider increasing the number of federal judges to handle heavy workloads and to offer them higher salaries to lure and keep the best ones on the bench.

Secret Court To Govern Wiretapping Plan (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration has agreed to shift course and let a secret but independent panel of federal judges oversee the government's controversial domestic spying program.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have final say in approving wiretaps on communications involving people with suspected terror links, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Since Jan. 10, when the court began overseeing the program, at least one request has been approved to monitor communications of a person believed to be linked to al-Qaida or an associated terror group.

In his letter to Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Gonzales wrote that "any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program will now be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court."

The Bush administration secretly launched the Terrorist Surveillance Program in 2001 to monitor international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. Gonzales said Bush would not reauthorize the program.

DOJ_NMG_0118261

The shift in oversight means that all wiretaps or other eavesdropping tools by the federal government must be approved by court order. Previously, the program allowed investigators to spy without a warrant — resulting in widespread criticism from lawmakers and others who questioned the legality.

"The issue has never been whether to monitor suspected terrorists but doing it legally and with proper checks and balances to prevent abuses," Leahy, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said Wednesday in welcoming the change. "Providing efficient but meaningful court review is a major step toward addressing those concerns."

The turnaround came after more than a year of stubborn insistence by the White House that oversight by the secret court was not required by law and, in fact, would be a hindrance to stopping terrorists. The FISA court was established in the late 1970s to review requests for warrants to conduct surveillance inside the United States.

Bush has maintained that the warrantless surveillance program's existence was "fully consistent with my constitutional responsibilities and authorities," and has said he would continue to reauthorize it "for as long as our nation faces a continuing threat from al-Qaida and related groups." He has said circumventing the FISA court "enables us to move faster and quicker."

On Wednesday, the White House said it is satisfied with the new guidelines to address administration officials' concerns about national security.

"The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has put together its guidelines and its rules and those have met administration concerns about speed and agility when it comes to responding to bits of intelligence where we may to be able to save American lives," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Snow said he could not explain why those concerns could not have been addressed before the program was started. He said the president will not reauthorize the present program because the new rules will serve as guideposts.

A federal judge in Detroit last August declared the program unconstitutional, saying it violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. In October, a three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals the Detroit decision.

Additionally, the Justice Department's inspector general is investigating the agency's use of information gathered in the spying program. In testimony last fall in front of the Senate panel, FBI Director Robert Mueller said he was not allowed to discuss classified details that could show whether it has curbed terrorist activity in the United States.

Congressional intelligence committees have already been briefed on the court's orders, Gonzales said in his letter. It was sent to the Senate Judiciary Committee the day before he is set to testify before the panel, which oversees the Justice Department.

Some Democrats said the change still may not go far enough.

"While this may be a step in the right direction, it should not deflect the attention of the American people or the Congress from seeking answers about the current and past operation of this program," said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich.

Court Will Oversee Wiretap Program (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration said yesterday that it has agreed to disband a controversial warrantless surveillance program run by the National Security Agency, replacing it with a new effort that will be overseen by the secret court that governs clandestine spying in the United States.

The change -- revealed by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee -- marks an abrupt reversal by the administration, which for more than a year has aggressively defended the legality of the NSA surveillance program and disputed court authority to oversee it.

Under the new plan, Gonzales said, the secret court that administers the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, will oversee eavesdropping on telephone calls and e-mails to and from the United States when "there is probable cause to believe" that one of the parties is a member of al-Qaeda or an associated terrorist group.

Under the previous approach, such intercepts were authorized by intelligence officers without the involvement of any court or judge -- prompting objections from privacy advocates and many Democrats that the program was illegal.

Administration officials suggested that the move was aimed in part at quelling persistent objections to the NSA spying by Democrats who now control Congress and that it is intended to slow or even derail challenges making their way through the federal courts. The Justice Department immediately filed a notice with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit yesterday informing the panel of the new program and promising to file papers "addressing the implications of this development" on pending litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0118262

Some Justice officials also said that receiving approval from the secret court will enable authorities to more easily use the information they obtain in future criminal prosecutions.

But many details of the new approach remained unclear yesterday, because administration officials declined to describe specifically how the program will work.

Officials would not say, for example, whether the administration will be required to seek a warrant for each person it wants to monitor or whether the FISA court has issued a broader set of orders to cover multiple cases. Authorities also would not say how many court orders are involved or which judge on the surveillance court had issued them.

One official familiar with the discussions characterized the change as "programmatic," rather than based on warrants targeting specific cases. This official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the judge who issued the Jan. 10 order was not U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, the FISA panel's chief judge, but rather one of that court's rotating members who was assigned to hear cases that week.

President Bush first issued a secret order in October 2001 authorizing the NSA to monitor telephone calls and e-mail between the United States and overseas if one party was thought to be linked to al-Qaeda or related groups. The initiative, revealed publicly by the New York Times in December 2005, was later dubbed the "Terrorist Surveillance Program" by the administration.

Many Democrats and privacy advocates who had questioned the legality of the program argued yesterday that the administration had effectively conceded defeat by agreeing to place its surveillance efforts under the secret judicial panel whose members approve wiretaps and searches under FISA.

"The issue has never been whether to monitor suspected terrorists but doing it legally and with proper checks and balances to prevent abuses," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Providing efficient but meaningful court review is a major step toward addressing those concerns."

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, said the decision was "confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary."

Rockefeller, who had secretly lodged an early challenge to the NSA program in a confidential letter to Vice President Cheney, said the committee still intends to investigate the program's legality and effectiveness.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), a member of the House intelligence panel, also referred to the new approach as "programmatic approval" and said it "does not have the protections for civil liberties" in FISA or in a bill she introduced last year.

In his letter to lawmakers, Gonzales said that the administration has been exploring ways to seek approval from the surveillance court since spring 2005 but that "it took considerable time and work to develop" an approach that "would have the speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al-Qaeda." An unidentified judge on the FISA court issued orders on Jan. 10 that effectively bring the NSA program under the secret court's authority, Gonzales wrote.

He and other administration officials had argued that operating the NSA spying program through the surveillance court would be slow and cumbersome. Justice officials released statistics yesterday showing improvements in the amount of time it takes to obtain intelligence warrants.

White House and Justice officials said the president was not retreating from his stance that he has the constitutional and legislative authority to order warrantless surveillance on international calls but said the new rules promulgated by the surveillance court have satisfied concerns about whether the FISA process can move quickly enough to authorize surveillance.

"They moot any questions we have had in the past about speed and agility," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We're satisfied that this will be effective. We found a happy agreement that allows the whole thing to be placed under the FISA court."

Another official, not authorized to discuss the matter publicly, said both the director of national intelligence and the head of the NSA "have assured the president that the program and that the capabilities to protect this country remain intact under this new order."

Some Democrats remained critical of the secretive process that resulted in yesterday's announcement. Some staff members of the Senate and House intelligence committees were briefed on the plans last week, officials said, but the Judiciary panel was not notified until yesterday.

"This announcement can give little solace to the American people, who believe in the rule of law and ask for adequate judicial review," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Judiciary Committee. "And why it took five years to go to even this secret court is beyond comprehension."

Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, which has been sharply critical of the NSA spying program, called the decision "an adroit back flip" by the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0118263

"It's clearly a flip-flop because they saw the writing on the wall," Romero said. "But it still does not address questions about whether the president broke the law. Complying with FISA now does not make his actions over the last 4 1/2 years legal."

Even before it was revealed publicly, the NSA program had infuriated Kollar-Kotelly and some other members of the FISA court, who questioned the program's legality and who warned the Justice Department that it could not use information from such monitoring to obtain warrants under FISA.

Advocacy groups filed lawsuits challenging the legality of the NSA surveillance. In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled that the program was unconstitutional and should be halted. The government took the case to the 6th Circuit in Cincinnati, which allowed the program to continue on appeal and is scheduled to hear arguments in the case on Jan. 31.

The fight over the NSA program also raged in Congress, which did not act last year on dueling proposals to authorize the surveillance. A proposal by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), then chairman of Judiciary, would have allowed -- but not required -- the administration to receive blanket approval for the program from the FISA court.

In a background briefing with reporters, one Justice Department official said the change to FISA oversight is likely to have a "significant impact" on a number of the court cases now pending, particularly lawsuits seeking to halt a program that is now being abandoned.

The official also said the administration hopes that the change will slow attempts by Congress to hold hearings on the NSA program. "This should remove or take away the heat or need for such a debate," the official said.

Officials said that Bush has issued orders every 45 days to reauthorize the NSA surveillance program and that he will not seek to renew it when the current term expires. The new orders from the FISA court will last 90 days, officials said.

Gonzales had been mum on the topic during media and public appearances in recent days, including a speech yesterday during which he contended that federal judges are unqualified to decide terrorism issues best handled by Congress or the president. Gonzales is scheduled to appear today before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Court To Oversee U.S. Wiretapping In Terror Cases (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And David Johnston

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The Bush administration, in a surprise reversal, said on Wednesday that it had agreed to give a secret court jurisdiction over the National Security Agency's wiretapping program and would end its practice of eavesdropping without warrants on Americans suspected of ties to terrorists.

The Justice Department said it had worked out an "innovative" arrangement with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court that provided the "necessary speed and agility" to provide court approval to monitor international communications of people inside the United States without jeopardizing national security.

The decision capped 13 months of bruising national debate over the reach of the president's wartime authorities and his claims of executive power, and it came as the administration faced legal and political hurdles in its effort to continue the surveillance program.

The new Democratic-led Congress has pledged several investigations. More immediately, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales is expected to face hostile questioning on Thursday from the Senate Judiciary Committee on the program. And an appellate court in Cincinnati is scheduled to hear arguments in two weeks on the government's appeal of an earlier ruling declaring the program illegal and unconstitutional.

Some legal analysts said the administration's pre-emptive move could effectively make the court review moot, but Democrats and civil rights advocates said they would press for the courts and Congress to continue their scrutiny of the program of wiretapping without warrants, which began shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Democrats praised the administration's decision, but said it should have come much sooner.

"The announcement today is welcome news," said Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat who leads the Intelligence Committee. "But it is also confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary."

Mr. Rockefeller added, "I intend to move forward with the committee's review of all aspects of this program's legality and effectiveness."

Since the surveillance program was publicly disclosed in December 2005 by The New York Times, the White House has maintained, in scores of court filings, policy papers and press statements, that the president has the inherent power to conduct wiretaps without a court warrant even though a 1978 law put intelligence surveillance under judicial review. The administration failed to win Congressional approval for the program last year after months of lobbying, and some Democrats are still trying to ban it outright.

DOJ_NMG_0118264

The administration continued to assert on Wednesday that the N.S.A. program had operated legally, but it also said the time had come to allow the intelligence surveillance court, known as the FISA court, to review all warrants on all wiretaps in terrorism investigations.

"There's obviously an advantage to having all three branches involved," said a senior Justice Department official, who briefed reporters on the decision on condition of anonymity. "This issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny on the Hill, and just considering all these circumstances, the president determined that this is the appropriate course."

President Bush has authorized the continuation of the N.S.A. program every 45 days by executive order to allow the N.S.A. to conduct wiretaps on international communications without a court warrant. When the current order expires, however, President Bush has decided not to reauthorize the program, officials said.

The Justice Department said Wednesday that it had obtained multiple orders, or warrants, a week ago from the FISA court allowing it to monitor international communications in cases where there was probable cause to believe one of the participants was linked to Al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist group.

"As a result of these orders," Mr. Gonzales told leaders of Congressional Intelligence and Judiciary Committees in a letter dated Wednesday, "any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program will now be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court."

Justice Department officials said that the FISA court orders, which were not made public, were not a broad approval of the surveillance program as a whole, an idea that was proposed last year in Congressional debate over the program. They strongly suggested that the orders secured from the court were for individual targets, but they refused to provide details of the process used to identify targets — or how court approval had been expedited — because they said it remained classified. The senior Justice Department official said that discussing "the mechanics of the orders" could compromise intelligence activities.

Justice Department officials would not describe whether the court had agreed to new procedures to streamline the process of issuing orders or accepted new standards to make it easier for the government to get approval to monitor suspect e-mail and phone communications.

But the officials suggested that the effort to obtain the court's approval for orders on Jan. 10 was not easy. "These aren't some sort of advisory rulings," one official said. "These are orders issued by the FISA court, not some cookie-cutter order. These orders are complex. It took a long time to work on this."

The officials said the new approach was based on evolving legal interpretations of the foreign surveillance law by the Justice Department, changes in the foreign surveillance statute in recent years and precedents set by the FISA court in approving specific requests to conduct electronic monitoring.

The N.S.A., which has run the program of surveillance without warrants since Mr. Bush secretly approved it in October 2001, is known to have used broad pattern analysis in tracking terrorist communications and identifying possible terrorists.

But senior lawmakers said they were still uncertain Wednesday, even after the administration's announcement, about how the court would go about approving warrants, how targets would be identified, and whether that process would differ from the court's practices since 1978.

The administration said it had briefed the full House and Senate Intelligence Committees in closed sessions on its decision.

But Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, who serves on the Intelligence committee, disputed that, and some Congressional aides said staff members were briefed Friday without lawmakers present.

Ms. Wilson, who has scrutinized the program for the last year, said she believed the new approach relied on a blanket, "programmatic" approval of the president's surveillance program, rather than approval of individual warrants.

Administration officials "have convinced a single judge in a secret session, in a nonadversarial session, to issue a court order to cover the president's terrorism surveillance program," Ms. Wilson said in a telephone interview. She said Congress needed to investigate further to determine how the program is run.

Democrats have pledged to investigate the N.S.A. program and other counterterrorism programs they say may rely on excessive presidential authority. Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said the announcement appeared to be intended in part to head off criticism Mr. Gonzales was likely to face at Thursday's judiciary committee hearing.

"I don't think the timing is coincidental," Mr. Schumer said in a telephone interview. "They knew they had a very real problem, and they're trying to deflect it."

But Justice Department officials said the timing of the announcement was driven solely by the FISA court's notification in recent days that it had approved the new orders. The officials said the orders were the result of two years of discussing with the court how to bring the eavesdropping program under court review, a process they said began long before the program become public.

DOJ_NMG_0118265

A Justice Department official said the department would file a motion with the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in Cincinnati, arguing that the court's review of the issue in a lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union "is now moot" in light of this week's developments.

But several legal analysts said the issue might not be resolved that simply.

Bruce Fein, a Justice Department official in the Reagan administration who has been critical of the program, said the appellate court was likely to send the issue back to the trial court to re-examine the issue.

Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the A.C.L.U., said the appellate court should still examine the legality of the program and whether the it had violated intelligence law for the last five years.

"It's not academic when the president violates the law," Mr. Romero said.

White House In U-turn On Wiretapping (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Alim Remtulla In Washington

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

The White House has agreed to place its controversial domestic spying programme under court supervision in a major policy reversal.

The move came the day before the Senate judiciary committee was expected to grill Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, over the Terrorist Surveillance Programme, which Mr Bush approved after the September 11 attacks of 2001.

The White House has argued that the programme – which allows the National Security Agency to intercept the communications of Americans with suspected links to al-Qaeda without obtaining a warrant – is legal because of the president's inherent powers as commander-in-chief.

But critics accused him of ignoring a 1978 law that requires the government to seek approval from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. In declaring the programme unconstitutional last year, a federal court rebuked Mr Bush by ruling that there were "no hereditary kings in America".

The Justice d\Department has appealed the decision. Asked whether the latest move was linked to the pending appeals case, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, replied: "No, no, no, no, no, no, no."

But the American Civil Liberties Union described the move as a "quintessential flip-flop".

"The NSA was operating illegally and this 11th-hour ploy is clearly an effort to avoid judicial and congressional scrutiny," said Anthony Romero, ACLU executive director. "Despite this adroit back flip, the constitutional problems with the president's actions remain unaddressed."

Officials said the administration had asked the intelligence court to find a way to bring the programme under the auspices of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act before details of the programme were leaked to the media in 2005.

Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, questioned why the administration had not made that clear to Congress earlier.

"It is regrettable that these steps weren't taken a long time ago," said Mr Specter, who was one of the few Republican critics of the programme. "I'd like to have an explanation as to why it took from last spring of 2005...when there has been such a public furore and public concern."

Mr Specter added that he wanted the administration to explain whether the court would approve warrants on a case-by-case basis, or whether the administration had blanket authority to monitor communications of Americans where there is "probable cause" they have links to al-Qaeda and its affiliates.

A senior Justice Department official said the move should "take some of the political heat off the debate" in Congress over the programme. But he said the administration still wanted Congress to pass legislation to reform the FISA court process.

Democrats, before regaining control of Congress in November, were previously cautious about criticising the programme out of fear they would be labelled weak on national security. Nancy Pelosi, the House Democratic majority leader, said the move invalidated the administration's argument that the FISA court was too cumbersome.

But Justice Department officials briefing reporters said the administration still wanted Congress to update the FISA to make the process more efficient.

FISA Court Will Monitor Domestic Wiretapping (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said that an independent court will monitor Justice Department intercepts of international calls involving terror suspects in this country, allowing independent oversight of President Bush's domestic surveillance program.

DOJ_NMG_0118266

In a letter to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, and the panel's ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Mr. Gonzales said that the department had agreed to let the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court oversee the program and that the court already had approved one request.

Mr. Gonzales said an order establishing the court's oversight was issued Jan. 10 and gives the department, which conducts the program through the National Security Agency (NSA), the "necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages."

The move is a major concession for Mr. Bush, who since the program was publicly disclosed in 2005, has argued he did not need -- or want -- to use the special intelligence court.

White House press secretary Tony Snow yesterday said it was the court that changed its procedures, which is what made the new arrangement possible.

But members of Congress and others wondered why the White House could not have simply proposed these changes itself a year ago.

"Since this program was first revealed, I have urged this administration to inform Congress what the government is doing and to comply with the checks and balances Congress wrote into law," Mr. Leahy said. "We must engage in all surveillance necessary to prevent acts of terrorism, but we can and should do so in ways that protect the basic rights of all Americans, including the right to privacy."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and a Judiciary Committee member, said the decision to give the court the authority to monitor the surveillance program "flies in the face of the fundamentals of American justice."

He said the decision should have come after the matter was fully and openly debated.

"This announcement can give little solace to the American people, who believe in the rule of law and ask for adequate judicial review," he said. "And why it took five years to go to even this secret court is beyond comprehension."

Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, called the announcement "a quintessential flip-flop."

"The NSA was operating illegally and this 11th-hour ploy is clearly an effort to avoid judicial and congressional scrutiny," he said. "Despite this adroit back flip, the constitutional problems with the president's actions remain unaddressed."

The surveillance program had secretly given law-enforcement authorities the ability to monitor international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

The Bush administration had vigorously defended the legality of the program, saying it would be impossible to obtain warrants in time to intercept international phone calls of those suspected of belonging to al Qaeda to and from the United States.

Mr. Gonzales is scheduled to testify today before the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he has come under fire from Democrats and Republicans over his refusal to release documents detailing the program.

·Charles Hurt contributed to this article.

Warrantless Wiretaps To Cease (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it would discontinue warrantless wiretaps of calls between the U.S. and overseas, a reversal that could help it dodge a confrontation with the Democratic majority in Congress and head off chances a federal appeals court will find the program illegal.

Justice Department officials said future surveillance targeting those suspected of links to terrorism will be conducted under authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, a special panel of federal judges that oversees counterintelligence investigations.

The announcement on the eve of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales's first appearance before the Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee was the administration's latest nod to the new political reality on Capitol Hill. The administration dropped plans this week to install a conservative Idahoan into a federal appellate judgeship traditionally held by a Californian, an act that had irritated California's Democratic senators. Earlier, the White House said it was giving up hopes to confirm four other appellate-judge nominees that Democrats considered unacceptable.

After the warrantless-surveillance program was disclosed by the New York Times in December 2005, President Bush insisted national-security concerns made it too risky to seek warrants even from the surveillance court. The program involved the National Security Agency tapping conversations of people suspected of terrorist links where one party resided in the U.S. and the other overseas.

Critics contended the program ran afoul of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established the secretive court as a compromise between counterespionage investigations and civil-liberties concerns. The law requires "a prior judicial warrant for all electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence or counterintelligence purposes in the United States in which communications of U.S. persons might be intercepted," according to the statement President Carter appended when signing the bill into law. Last year, a federal judge in Detroit ruled the wiretaps were illegal. Yesterday, the government advised an appellate court that the program had been discontinued and suggested it would seek to dismiss the case before a scheduled hearing on Jan. 31.

DOJ_NMG_0118267

In a press briefing yesterday, two Justice Department officials wouldn't discuss details of the new approach. They suggested that last year's amendments to the surveillance act, along with the department's establishment of a National Security Division to oversee counterterrorism operations, had streamlined procedures needed to get warrant applications before a surveillance-court judge.

Democrats offered guarded approval. House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers (D., Mich.) said in a statement, "This may be a step in the right direction," but "it should not deflect the attention of the American people or the Congress from seeking answers about the current and past operation of this program."

Write to Jess Bravin at jess.bravin@wsj.com3

U.S. Ceases Warrantless Spy Operation (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Greg Miller, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Domestic surveillance will be conducted only with a court order.

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration, reversing itself on one of its most controversial counterintelligence measures, said Wednesday that it would no longer secretly eavesdrop on the international calls of terrorism suspects in this country without first getting a court order.

The so-called Terrorist Surveillance Program was launched weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks and remained secret until it was exposed in news reports in late 2005, provoking a public outcry. The program was cited by civil liberties groups and others as a leading example of how the administration's war on terrorism was infringing on privacy rights of ordinary citizens.

The change, announced in a letter from U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales to senior members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, appears to be a concession to mounting political and legal challenges to the program.

The administration had been attempting to get congressional authority for the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping, but the chances of that happening in a Democratic Congress are considered slim. And legal challenges to the program are working their way through the courts.

Gonzales said the administration already had obtained "orders" from a special court that reviews surveillance requests, allowing it to continue the wiretapping in some form. But it was not clear whether the secret tribunal, known as the FISA court after the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that created it, had agreed to give the administration substantial latitude or whether major changes were made.

After the existence of the program was reported in the New York Times, administration officials defended the warrantless process as necessary, saying the court reviews were too cumbersome.

In his letter Wednesday, Gonzales wrote: "The orders the government has obtained will allow the necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages. Accordingly, under these circumstances the president has determined not to reauthorize the Terrorist Surveillance Program."

Gonzales and other officials refused to divulge details of the orders that the FISA court adopted Jan. 10. A senior Justice Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, acknowledged there had been "modifications" in the program. But the official said the court did not grant blanket approval to the program, indicating that officials would continue to have to establish probable cause of individual links to terrorism, at least in some cases. The surveillance orders are good for 90 days and can be renewed.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said that the new procedures culminated a nearly two-year process begun in spring 2005, and that the shift was not in response to court action or legislation.

But Snow acknowledged that the new plan answered "political objections a number of people have been raising" about the program. He said that the congressional intelligence committees were notified last week and that the Senate Judiciary Committee was informed Wednesday.

Action applauded

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), formerly the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the Bush administration faced the difficulty of justifying a range of national security programs to "a much more active Congress. I think they are picking their battles and, frankly, [the wiretapping program] was a very unpopular position with the Republican base."

Harman said the reversal by the White House was not brought about by any modification to FISA. "The bottom line here is they will have to get individualized warrants if they want to listen to the communications of Americans in America," she said.

However, she added, "I'm not talking about people who are not Americans or U.S. persons." Harman declined to elaborate, saying that the details in the FISA procedures are classified. But her comment suggests that individuals who do not meet the legal definition of "U.S. persons" might fall under a more lenient legal standard that would allow the government to place them under surveillance without going through the same FISA application process.

The action was embraced Wednesday by lawmakers and civil liberties groups who said the move was an overdue recognition by the administration that it had been overstepping legal bounds.

"The announcement today is welcome news, but it is also confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary," said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. "The president could have and should have worked with the Congress immediately following Sept. 11, 2001, to fashion a surveillance program that was in compliance with all existing statutes."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said: "This announcement can give little solace to the American people, who believe in the rule of law and ask for adequate judicial review. And why it took five years to go to even this secret court is beyond comprehension."

Other lawmakers called on the Justice Department and the FISA court to release further details. Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the panel's ranking Republican, wrote to the court's presiding judge Wednesday, asking that she supply the committee with copies of the new orders authorizing the surveillance and, when possible, make them public.

Gonzales is set to testify this morning before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Changed landscape

The administration's about-face comes as it confronts a much different political landscape than it did five years ago. Democrats are vowing closer scrutiny of its use of executive power. And White House-backed legislation that would have amended the law to allow for the sort of surveillance Bush was conducting died when the GOP Congress was voted out.

In fact, a federal court in Detroit ruled in August that the warrantless program was unconstitutional, and many legal experts believe the Supreme Court would agree.

The Justice Department on Wednesday wrote the federal appellate court in Cincinnati that is hearing an appeal of the Detroit ruling to inform the court that the department was now subjecting the program to court oversight. It was unclear what the impact would be on the appeal.

Lawyers challenging the program said it was bound to be struck down by the courts.

The administration decision "restores the rule of law and ends a program that rested on the president's assertion that as commander in chief he can secretly order that federal criminal statutes be violated and Americans spied upon," said David Cole, a Georgetown University law professor who has been representing the Center for Constitutional Rights in a lawsuit challenging the wiretap program. "That position was lawless."

Court To Oversee Wiretap Program (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration said Wednesday that it will allow an independent court to oversee its controversial surveillance program in which the National Security Agency has electronically eavesdropped on Americans and others without obtaining court warrants.

The move, announced by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, comes amid increasing criticism from Democrats and some Republicans in Congress who say the NSA's Terrorist Surveillance Program has infringed on privacy rights and wrongly bypassed a special court of federal judges that secretly monitors classified intelligence-gathering within the USA.

Established by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), the panel issues what essentially are secret search warrants to FBI, CIA and other federal agents who want to set up wiretaps or other electronic surveillance in cases in which national security is thought to be at stake. The court's workload has soared since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; last year it approved more than 2,000 requests for surveillance, the Justice Department says.

The administration, however, repeatedly has questioned whether the FISA court could move quickly enough to approve surveillance requests to respond to emerging threats. After the 9/11 attacks, President Bush secretly issued an executive order authorizing NSA terrorism investigators to conduct warrantless surveillance on communications coming into or going out of the USA. It's unclear how many people have been subject to such surveillance, or what threats have been targeted.

The NSA program was disclosed by The New York Times in December 2005, prompting a vigorous debate over whether the administration was trying to avoid judicial oversight and violating the Constitution in its efforts to prevent terrorism. Gonzales and other officials continue to say the warrantless surveillance program is legal, but say they now are satisfied the FISA court can respond quickly to developing threats. They say it has dramatically cut its backlog of surveillance requests and the time it takes to approve them.

In a letter to leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales said the NSA program now will answer to the FISA court. He said that on Jan. 10, the court issued orders authorizing the government to monitor phone calls and e-mails into and out of the USA in cases in which one of the parties is suspected of having ties to al-Qaeda or other terrorist groups. The FISA court will review each request for surveillance, he said.

The White House's reversal on warrantless searches came as Gonzales was preparing for tough questions today from the Judiciary Committee, which like the rest of Congress swung to Democratic control after the November elections. Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has been particularly critical of the NSA surveillance program. Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's top Republican, also has criticized the program and said he still has questions about whether it is legal.

House Intelligence Committee member Jane Harman, D-Calif., said the administration's move was long overdue. "We could have been here a year ago," she said. "America operates under the rule of law, and eavesdropping on Americans in America must comply with our laws and Constitution."

In 2005, the FISA court approved all 2,072 applications for surveillance the government submitted, a Justice Department report says. However, the court altered the requests in 61 of the cases, the report says.

White House Retreats Under Pressure (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The Bush administration's abrupt abandonment on Wednesday of its program to eavesdrop inside the United States without court approval is the latest in a series of concessions to Congress, the courts and public opinion that have dismantled major elements of its strategy to counter the terrorist threat.

In the aftermath of the 2001 attacks, President Bush asserted sweeping powers to conduct the hunt for operatives of Al Qaeda, the detention of suspects and their interrogation to uncover the next plot. But facing no new attack to justify emergency measures, as well as a series of losses in the courts and finally the Democratic sweep of the November election, Mr. Bush has had to retreat across the board.

"I think there's no question that both politically and legally, the president has been chastened," said Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University and generally a supporter of the administration's interpretation of executive power.

Harold Hongju Koh, the dean of Yale Law School and a critic of the administration's legal theories, said the president's strategy might have provoked so strong a judicial and Congressional rebuff that it would ultimately accomplish the opposite of his goal. "I think historians will see it as an exorbitant and extreme theory of executive power that ended up weakening the presidency," Mr. Koh said.

That would be an extraordinary outcome, and one that is far from assured. In some areas, the administration has preserved its freedom to act, notably in persuading Congress last fall to deny prisoners held in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, the right to challenge their detention in American courts. The full details of the new approach to the domestic eavesdropping program have not been publicly disclosed.

Mr. Bush's legal strategy has been directed not only by the practical need to prevent attacks but also by the belief, expressed most fervently by Vice President Dick Cheney, that presidential powers, and the war-making power in particular, were excessively curbed in reaction to the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal.

Among the laws passed in the post-Vietnam, post-Watergate era was the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, a hard-fought compromise between the security agencies and civil libertarians. The National Security Agency and the F.B.I. could keep eavesdropping on spy and terror suspects in the United States, but only by justifying their actions to a federal judge in secret hearings before the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

For more than two decades, that compromise served, and government eavesdropping on American soil took place only under court order. But after the Sept. 11 attacks, the White House decided that the court approval process was too slow and cumbersome to match the terrorist threat and that the president had the power to bypass the FISA act and order surveillance on his own authority as commander in chief.

In December 2005, a few days after the program of eavesdropping without warrants was disclosed by The New York Times, Mr. Cheney linked it explicitly to the broader question of executive power. "It was true during the cold war, as well as I think what is true now, the president of the United States needs to have his constitutional powers unimpaired, if you will, in terms of the conduct of national security policy," Mr. Cheney told reporters. "So when you're asking about my view of the presidency, yes, I believe in a strong, robust executive authority."

DOJ_NMG_0118270

The same philosophy guided administration actions in other areas. Hundreds of men were labeled unlawful enemy combatants and imprisoned at Guantánamo Bay, a location chosen in the hope that it would be beyond the reach of American courts. Dozens of terrorist suspects were seized by the Central Intelligence Agency and held in secret overseas locations.

Some of those C.I.A. prisoners were interrogated using techniques far harsher than anything approved in earlier wars, including waterboarding, a simulated drowning that many human rights advocates believe crossed the line into torture.

Slowly but surely, each of those programs has been eroded. In some cases, the press has uncovered them, creating an outcry from civil libertarians and some Democrats in Congress and often revealing a rift inside the administration.

In others, the courts have weighed in, upholding some of the administration's moves but setting firm limits to others. In the Hamdi case in 2004, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote for the Supreme Court's majority, "We have long since made clear that a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens."

Last year, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the court rejected the rules for military commissions to try unlawful combatants. Mr. Bush subsequently ordered the C.I.A. to move its 14 so-called high-value Qaeda suspects to Guantánamo to await legal proceedings. Though a new list of approved interrogation techniques has not been finalized, officials say it will not include waterboarding.

The N.S.A. program, too, has faced tough scrutiny.

A federal judge in Detroit ruled the program unconstitutional, a finding now on appeal. Under pressure from some Republicans as well as Democrats in Congress, the administration first agreed to brief the full Senate and House intelligence committees on the closely guarded program and then accepted the idea of legislation to bring the program under the law. The several proposals pending in Congress to rein in the N.S.A.'s eavesdropping may now become moot.

But even if Mr. Bush has again backed away in the face of legal and political trouble, he has by no means given up on the national security agenda that he clearly sees as his legacy, for better or worse. Despite strong opposition from Congress and the public, he has decided to send more American troops into combat in Iraq. Mr. Bush remains commander in chief, whose constitutional powers remain formidable.

Democrats may have been empowered by the election and by the administration's recent setbacks, but while voicing loud protests over Mr. Bush's new plan for Iraq, they are moving cautiously, with most willing at least for now to embrace only symbolic resistance.

Court To Monitor Bush Eavesdropping Program (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor And Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - In a major retreat, the Bush administration disclosed Wednesday that it has obtained approval for its domestic spying program from a special national security court and no longer will resort to warrantless telephone taps to search for terrorists.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales revealed the secret arrangement with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court on the eve of his first appearance before the Democratic-controlled Congress and amid an appeals court fight over a federal judge's ruling striking down the spying program as illegal and unconstitutional.

But Gonzales' disclosure left unclear whether the secret court has set up a special program that simply gives broad authority for wiretaps or requires the administration to seek warrants the same as always under a 1978 national security law. Under that law, the government obtained warrants on a case-by-case basis, after demonstrating a likelihood that the subject was a terrorist.

Since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, the National Security Agency has been wiretapping Americans' international phone calls, e-mail and other electronic communications when at least one party is suspected of supporting or engaging in terrorist activities. The disclosure of the program in 2005 provoked an outcry from civil liberties groups and members of Congress, including some Republicans.

The new procedures appeared to mark a dramatic shift from the administration's previous position that the president had the authority to eavesdrop on Americans without court scrutiny to ensure the nation's security. Justice Department lawyers, however, maintained that the president retains that power.

Administration officials said the shift results from secret "orders" issued by a judge on the seven-member court that authorize the surveillance so long as the government has probable cause to believe the subject of the eavesdropping is linked to al-Qaida or affiliated terrorist groups - conditions that mirror those in the original law.

In a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee announcing the new arrangement, Gonzales said any electronic surveillance that was occurring under the old program would now be subject to approval by the FISA court.

Gonzales said the administration began exploring options for seeking such approval in the spring of 2005 - months before the media revealed the program's existence. He said it took "considerable time and work for the government to develop the approach that was proposed to the court" to approve the orders.

He didn't explain the reason for the shift in policy, other than to say that the government was seeking a way under the 28-year-old Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to obtain the "speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al Qaida."

But Democrats and some Republicans questioned why the administration waited years to bring the controversial program under the oversight of the FISA court when both parties were willing to adjust the law to address the administration's concerns.

"This decision is welcome news, if long overdue," said Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. "It proves that this surveillance has always been possible under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and that there was never a good reason to evade the law."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a leading critic of the program, said, "It is regrettable that these steps weren't taken a long time ago."

In a Senate floor speech, Specter questioned what evidence the administration will have to disclose to the court before undertaking the surveillance and whether the Justice Department is required to seek warrants on a case-by-case basis, or whether it has been given some sort of blanket authority by the court.

Senior Justice Department officials, in a briefing to reporters, refused to go into detail about the arrangement, but denied that they have such blanket authority.

"These are orders that comply with the terms and requirements of the FISA statute, just like other orders issued by the FISA court," said the official, who spoke on condition on anonymity because of agency policy. "The orders we're talking about here are not some cookie-cutter order where you can just ... slap it together and file it with the court."

President Bush confirmed the existence of the program only after The New York Times reported it. Bush said the revelation had seriously damaged national security, and he rejected charges that the program was illegal.

Democrats, civil liberties advocates and some Republicans contended that Bush violated the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and violated the current laws that require approval from the court.

Ann Beeson, national security director for the American Civil Liberties Union, which won a lawsuit over the program, said it hardly seems a coincidence that the administration backed off just two weeks before a federal appeals court hearing on the ACLU's injunction on the surveillance program.

Beeson said Bush had allowed for the court's involvement only "under pressure." How much involvement, she said, wasn't revealed in the letter to leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. John Rockefeller, D-W. Va., the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and who first raised questions about the program in a letter to the White House in 2003, said the new arrangement was "confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary.

"The president could have and should have worked with the Congress immediately following September 11, 2001, to fashion a surveillance program that was in compliance with all existing statutes."

Rockefeller said his committee will move ahead with a review "of all aspects of this program's legality and effectiveness."

Democrats on the Senate intelligence and judiciary committees are likely to demand more details on how the program worked, who was under surveillance and the legal justification for the program.

Jonathan S. Landay contributed to this story.

Attorney General: NSA Spy Program To Be Reformed (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 18, 2007

Alberto Gonzales said the controversial domestic surveillance program will now be overseen by a secret court in Washington.

The Bush administration will substantially alter its controversial domestic surveillance program by seeking approval for wiretaps from a secret court, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday.

The surprise announcement by Gonzales said President Bush has agreed that "any electronic surveillance that was occurring" under the program will be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court in Washington, D.C. The program is conducted by the National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0118272

In a two-page letter (PDF) to the U.S. Senate's Judiciary committee, Gonzales did not specify what prompted the abrupt policy change. Gonzales did say that it took "considerable time and work" for the Justice Department to devise a method that suited both prosecutors and the judges on the court.

The change appears to represent a concession to critics of the NSA program, who have charged that it was illegal and unconstitutional for the government to spy on Americans without any judicial oversight. The Bush administration claims that only international communications involving someone with ties to terrorism are targeted.

It's not clear if the letter was prompted by legal or political concerns. Gonzales' announcement came less than 24 hours before he is scheduled to appear before the now Democrat-controlled Senate for a public hearing about Justice Department activities.

Democratic politicians welcomed the news. "We must engage in all surveillance necessary to prevent acts of terrorism, but we can and should do so in ways that protect the basic rights of all Americans including the right to privacy," Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the head of the Judiciary committee, said in a statement. "The issue has never been whether to monitor suspected terrorists, but doing it legally and with proper checks and balances to prevent abuses."

In addition, the Bush administration signaled on Wednesday that it would use the announcement to delay or derail lawsuits that arose out of the NSA program. In a letter (click for PDF) sent to the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, the government said it will file legal briefs "addressing the implications of this development on the litigation." (One federal judge already has ruled the program to be unconstitutional.)

Cindy Cohn, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation in San Francisco, said it's too early to say whether her group's lawsuit against AT&T would be affected. "It's too early for us to comment," Cohn said. "I don't think we can say anything definitive one way or another."

That lawsuit, which a federal judge let proceed on November 17, claims that the telecommunications company unlawfully opened its networks to the NSA. AT&T has not confirmed or denied participating, though one of its lobbyists has pointedly described "very specific federal statutes that prescribe means, in black and white law, for provision of information to the government under certain circumstances."

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, is known as a secret court because its hearings are held behind closed doors and its proceedings are kept confidential. Only certain Justice Department attorneys may attend its sessions.

Bush's decision does not take effect immediately. He has renewed the NSA surveillance program every 45 days since it began shortly after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and Gonzales' letter says only that Bush has "determined not to reauthorize" it after the current period expires.

What Gonzales' letter did not do is reveal, even in general terms, how the FISA court will oversee the administration's electronic surveillance requests.

One possibility is that the secret court has approved the entire surveillance program with a blanket order for future use--and did not require the Justice Department to provide case-by-case information about eavesdropping targets. Justice Department officials refused to confirm or deny that there was a blanket order, according to a Washington Post article.

Last year, former judges of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court urged Congress to enact a law forcing the president to use the court and expressed skepticism about the executive branch's constitutional authority to bypass it.

If a blanket order exists, attorneys from groups like the EFF or American Civil Liberties Union could argue that it amounts to an unconstitutional "general warrant" of the sort used by the British against the American colonists, which was banned in the Bill of Rights.

The ACLU said it will ask the court to release information on how the new surveillance orders work. "The legality of this unprecedented surveillance program should not be decided by a secret court in one-sided proceedings," said ACLU attorney Ann Beeson. "And without a court order that prohibits warrantless wiretapping, Americans can't be sure that their private calls and e-mails are safe from unchecked government intrusion."

On January 31, the 6th Circuit is scheduled to hear the Bush administration's appeal of a case brought by the ACLU in which a trial judge declared the NSA program to be unconstitutional. The Justice Department could use Gonzales' announcement to argue the case is "moot" and should be dismissed without further proceedings.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday that the timing of the announcement had nothing to do with the avalanche of lawsuits. "No, no, no, no, no. No. No," Snow said. "As a matter of fact, it may be interesting to see how it plays out in federal courts, but no, this is not a response." (Gonzales' letter alluded to discussions with the FISA court beginning in early 2005.)

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act permits the secret court to authorize telephone surveillance, Internet monitoring, and even physical "black bag jobs." It was amended by the 2001 Patriot Act to allow surveillance for terrorism-related offenses, defined as violent acts that appear to be intended "to intimidate or coerce a civilian population" or "to influence the policy of a government by intimidation."

In a statement Wednesday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said that "the judge's order announced today needs to be reviewed thoroughly." Pelosi earlier had called for hearings on the topic.

Another open question is whether Gonzales' letter, which talks about only the "Terrorist Surveillance Program" that Bush has publicly discussed, is meant to sweep in other eavesdropping or Internet monitoring programs that are even more highly classified.

Documents that came to light in the EFF case against AT&T suggest that the telecommunications company has opened its data network to the federal government far more than Bush or his allies have ever acknowledged publicly. One declaration (PDF) in the case says that AT&T has created a facility "well suited to process huge volumes of data, including user content, in real time. It is thus well suited to the capture and analysis of large volumes of data for purposes of surveillance."

Secret Court Will Oversee Spying Program, U.S. Says (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt And James Rowley

Bloomberg, January 18, 2007

Jan. 17 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration, after a year of refusing to allow outside supervision of its domestic eavesdropping program, agreed to seek approval for the electronic surveillance from a secret federal court.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disclosed the change in a letter today to leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee. He said the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court last week issued orders approving Justice Department requests for eavesdropping under the program, which previously had bypassed judicial oversight.

``As a result of these orders, any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program will now be conducted subject to the approval'' of the court, Gonzales wrote.

He said the Justice Department had been ``exploring options'' for judicial oversight since early 2005. Still, his announcement comes as Democrats, highly critical of the program, have taken power in both houses of Congress pledging greater oversight of the administration's conduct of the war on terror.

President George W. Bush spent a year defending the legality of the spying since it was disclosed in December 2005. The program, established in 2001 after the Sept. 11 attacks, allows monitoring of international communications into or out of the U.S. when one of the parties is tied to al-Qaeda.

Congressional Resolution

Bush has said he had power to conduct the surveillance under a congressional resolution authorizing the war on terror and under his constitutional role as commander-in-chief. In his letter today, Gonzales said Bush wouldn't renew the program, instead letting the court review requests for surveillance.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said today the administration is satisfied the change won't sacrifice ``speed and agility when it comes to responding to bits of intelligence where you may be able to save American lives.''

Some lawmakers and administration officials said permitting court oversight of the program may defuse tensions on Capitol Hill. Gonzales will testify before the Senate Judiciary Committee tomorrow.

``If it happens to be true, it solves most of our problems,'' said Jay Rockefeller, a West Virginia Democrat and the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. The shift in policy suggests ``a rather large inconsistency with what the administration said'' months ago, he added.

Justice Department Briefing

The Justice Department briefed both the House and Senate intelligence committees on the change several days ago and plans to brief Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, and the panel's senior Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, shortly, officials said.

``It appears they have done a complete back flip,'' Leahy said. ``But, if they are doing a back flip toward following the law, that's a lot better than their original position.''

The announcement is ``good news, it will help keep the country safe,'' said Senator Pat Roberts, a Kansas Republican and former Intelligence Committee chairman. Roberts said the change should eliminate any need for Congress to pass legislation concerning the program.

International Communications

In his letter today, Gonzales said the surveillance court issued orders Jan. 10 ``authorizing the government to target for collection international communications into or out of the United States where there is a probable cause to believe that'' one of the parties is ``a member or agent of al-Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization.''

DOJ_NMG_0118274

The attorney general didn't give details of the court's orders. A senior Justice Department official, speaking on background to a group of reporters, said the court approved more than one order allowing monitoring for 90 days. He also declined to be more specific.

The court, created by a 1978 law, meets in secret at the Justice Department's Washington headquarters and has authority to approve government eavesdropping of U.S. citizens linked to a foreign power.

Administration To Let Court Monitor Domestic Spying (CNN)

CNN.com, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Reversing a position it defended for more than a year, the Bush administration announced Wednesday that it has begun getting court approval before eavesdropping on the communications of suspected terrorists or their associates.

The Justice Department notified Congress that a court set up to specialize in wiretapping would oversee its "terrorist surveillance program," which the administration has said could operate without judicial review. Critics said that violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which set up a special court to review wiretap applications in intelligence cases.

In a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote that the administration still believes the program is legal, but that a judge on the court has set rules that preserve "the speed and agility necessary" to battle terrorism.

"The president is committed to using all lawful tools to protect our nation from the terrorist threat, including making maximum use of the authorities provided by FISA and taking full advantage of developments in the law," Gonzales wrote. (Read Gonzales' letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee)

Neither Gonzales nor Justice Department officials disclosed details of the rules set by the court, arguing that details were classified. But Gonzales said President Bush would no longer authorize the existing program, which administration officials said was necessary because the court set up under FISA was too slow to respond to new terrorist threats.

"To save American lives, we must be able to act fast and to detect these conversations so we can prevent new attacks," Bush said in December 2005.Gonzales to face Senate committee

The administration's reversal comes a day before Gonzales was scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Its chairman, Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, said he welcomed the decision.

"As I pointed out for some time, and as other senators on both sides of the aisle pointed out, that was, at the very best, of doubtful legality," Leahy said. He said surveillance was needed to prevent terrorist attacks, "but we can and we should do it in ways that protect the basic rights of all Americans."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-California, called the move "a long-overdue recognition" that existing laws can protect the country. "Although the judge's order announced today needs to be reviewed thoroughly, the fact that the president will no longer be authorizing unilaterally intrusive surveillance of people in the United States is good news," Pelosi said in a written statement.

Democratic Rep. Silvestre Reyes of Texas, the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, called the decision "welcome news, if long overdue."

"It proves that this surveillance has always been possible under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and that there was never a good reason to evade the law," Reyes said in a written statement.

The government now will ask the court to approve surveillance requests for 90 days, after which it must seek renewed permission. Justice Department officials said the court issued more than one order governing the program, but they refused to provide details of the still-classified program.

The officials also refused to comment on how the procedures could be implemented without damaging national security, as top administration figures insisted.

Gonzales wrote that the administration has been working with the court for two years to bring the program under FISA, even as it defended the program and resisted calls for greater oversight. But the White House dismissed suggestions that the announcement was influenced by political concerns.

"It's an example of a case where we take hits for doing what's right rather than getting credit for what seems to be expedient," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on calls to or from people suspected of having ties to al Qaeda shortly after the terror network's September 2001 attacks on New York and Washington. The program remained secret for four years, and ignited a controversy once it was disclosed.

Sen. Arlen Specter, then chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said FISA "flatly prohibits" electronic eavesdropping without a judge's permission. A federal judge ruled the program unconstitutional in July.ACLU skeptical of motives

The American Civil Liberties Union, which led the court challenge to the program, called the decision to submit the program to the FISA court "an effort to avoid judicial and congressional scrutiny."

"The legality of this unprecedented surveillance program should not be decided by a secret court in one-sided proceedings," said Ann Beeson, the lead attorney in the group's lawsuit. The group said it would urge the FISA court to release more information about its new orders, which Gonzales said were issued January 10.

Specter, now the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, said he wants to see more detail about how the program will now be run.

"I think we need to know more about the procedures on the determination of probable cause, whether it is on individualized warrants or it is a group program," he said. "And we will need to know more about the determination of the individual being an agent of al Qaeda."

A senior Justice Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said the department still believes the 1978 law should be modified to account for advances in electronic communication. Wednesday's announcement will "take some political heat off the debate," he said.

"These orders allow us to do the same thing that we've been doing, but we will be operating under the orders we've obtained from a FISA judge," the official said.

US DOJ: Surveillance Program Now Court-approved (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, January 18, 2007

NSA wiretapping program to be replaced by a FISA program that requires court approval

A controversial surveillance program to wiretap telephone and Internet communications in and out of the U.S. will now fall under the jurisdiction of a U.S. court, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said Wednesday.

A judge with the secret U.S. Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISA) on Jan. 10 authorized the U.S. government to wiretap phone or Internet communications involving suspected members of al Qaeda or other terrorist organizations, the DOJ said. The FISA-approved surveillance would replace the Terrorist Surveillance Program at the U.S. National Security Agency (NSA), authorized by U.S. President George Bush in 2002 to create wiretaps without court-issued warrants.

The FISA ruling will allow the surveillance program to essentially continue as it has, only with court approval, a senior DOJ official said. Under the NSA program, U.S. agents were allowed to wiretap Internet and telephone communications into and out of the U.S. in which one participant was suspected to be linked to al Qaeda.

Civil liberties groups had protested the NSA program, saying its lack of court oversight violated the U.S. Constitution. The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) has filed a lawsuit against AT&T for allegedly participating in the NSA program, and in August, a U.S. district judge in Michigan ruled the NSA program was illegal.

Bush is "committed to using all lawful tools to protect our nation from the terrorist threat," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote in a Wednesday letter to members of the U.S. Congress. "Although ... the Terrorist Surveillance Program fully complies with the law, the orders the government has obtained will allow the necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages," Gonzales wrote.

Bush will not reauthorize the old NSA program when it expires sometime in the next 45 days, the senior DOJ official, who requested anonymity, said Wednesday. But the FISA-authorized program will have the same capability as the old program, the official said.

The FISA court will approve wiretap requests for 90 days at a time, the DOJ official said. The court will have authority to review individual wiretap requests, but the DOJ official declined to provide specific information about how the FISA program will work.

Bush administration officials denied that the FISA court acted to provide political and legal cover for the NSA program, but the DOJ official said the FISA ruling will allow Congress to step back and look at the wiretap program without legal questions hanging over it. The FISA ruling "should take some of the political heat off the debate," the DOJ official said.

The EFF didn't have an immediate comment on the FISA decision.

A Spy Program In From The Cold (NYT)

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

Of the many ways that President Bush has trampled civil liberties and the balance of powers since the 9/11 attacks, one of the most egregious was his decision to order wiretaps of Americans' international calls and e-mail without court approval. It was good news, then, when the administration announced yesterday that it would now seek a warrant from the proper court for that sort of eavesdropping.

DOJ_NMG_0118276

The president's decision hardly ends this constitutional crisis. Among other things, the public needs to know why Mr. Bush broke the law for more than five years and what should be done to ensure there will be no more abuses of the wiretap statute.

But we're pleased that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales informed leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee that Mr. Bush had decided to end the warrantless program. He said the administration had worked out a way to speed the process of getting a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to intercept communications to and from the United States "where there is probable cause to believe that one of the communicants is a member or agent of Al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization."

He said the court — created by the 1978 law on domestic wiretapping — issued an order on Jan. 10 governing this new process and that eavesdropping under "the terrorist surveillance program" would be subject to the court's approval. There are still some big unanswered questions. For one thing, because the new warrant process is secret, we don't know whether the court has issued a blanket approval for wiretapping, which would undermine the intent of the law, or whether the administration agreed to seek individual warrants.

It was also troubling that Mr. Gonzales repeated his insistence that the warrantless spying was legal. That suggests that the administration — which has never explained why it could not have sought warrants from the start and turned down offers to amend the law — will continue to resist legislative oversight of the wiretapping. It's also likely to argue that the lawsuits challenging the eavesdropping should be dismissed. The damage has already been done by the president's decision to ignore the law, and the lawsuits should proceed.

Mr. Gonzales's announcement clearly was politically timed: he will appear today before the Judiciary Committee, now controlled by Democrats who have vowed to investigate the eavesdropping.

We hope they will do that. Congress has a legitimate interest in the creation of this program, which has always seemed motivated more by the president's relentless campaign to expand his powers than by a real need to speed intelligence gathering.

We strongly agree with John Rockefeller IV, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, that "the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary" and that the White House should turn over documents on the creation of the wiretapping program. If the 1978 law needs to be updated, that should happen in public, not in a secret court.

This administration long ago forfeited the public trust on these issues.

No Court Order Needed (USAT)

USA Today, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration did a stunning about-face on Wednesday. After insisting for more than a year that its warrantless wiretapping program was perfectly proper, the administration agreed to put the program under the supervision of a special court.

The move, as welcome as it was belated, was a nod to legal and political reality: A federal judge in Detroit had declared the program unconstitutional, and it faced a hostile reception in the new Democratic Congress.

The turnaround means that government eavesdropping will at least have judicial oversight, although the details remain murky. But it doesn't mean the government can't still gather personal information about Americans without a court order.

How? Through something called a National Security Letter. Unlike the warrantless wiretapping program, these letters don't violate any laws, though perhaps they should.

National Security Letters have their origin in the 1970s as exceptions to laws that bar companies from divulging their customers' data. After 9/11 and the passage of the USA Patriot Act, their use greatly expanded.

These letters — which government agencies can use to demand or request information about people's phone, credit and banking records — have a number of troubling features. Chief among them are that they can be issued without judicial review and that their recipients are subject to a gag order.

It's bad enough that the FBI has issued thousands of these letters; now, according to a New York Times report confirmed by Vice President Cheney, the Defense Department and CIA are also getting into the act.

The Bush administration has trampled so many civil liberties in the name of the war on terror that it's tempting to shrug off yet another example. Yet the Pentagon's expanding role in domestic intelligence is alarming. This country has tried to keep the military out of law enforcement since the Posse Comitatus Act in 1878, with exceptions for such things as drug interdiction and border enforcement.

Perhaps even more important, however, is what this latest disclosure says about how the war on terror is going. If the United States is going to prevent terror attacks, it needs its departments and agencies to work together better than they did before 9/11.

The fact that the CIA and the Pentagon are conducting their own domestic investigations does not bode well for this cause. It suggests that turf wars and empire building remain more important than collaboration.

DOJ_NMG_0118277

For the military, this behavior fits all too well into the campaign of mission creep advanced by former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. For him it wasn't enough to have a military that fights the nation's wars. He wanted one that did diplomacy, intelligence gathering and, apparently, domestic law enforcement. For the CIA, it suggests that the longtime divide between it and FBI has not been fully bridged.

If the letters continue to be sanctioned by law, the program should at least be consolidated into the Justice Department. If not, the administration may have found a way to simultaneously go too far in undermining individual liberties while not going far enough to fight the war on terror.

Detainee's Letters Give Peek At Life At Guantanamo (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Majid Khan, a terrorism suspect secretly detained for years by the CIA and now held in the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, told his Pakistani wife in a letter that she should not dwell on the thought of his return because "if I come back, it will be a miracle of God."

The handwritten letter and three others to his family in suburban Baltimore are the first substantial communication from any of the 14 "high-value" detainees to become public since the captives were transferred in September from what were called CIA "black" sites to the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo.

Khan's letters, redacted in places by military censors, reveal that he has embraced religion in ways that he had not as a high school student in Owings Mills, according to family members and teachers. Khan commanded his wife, Rabia Yaqoob, to study the Koran "with all the footnotes and the explanations" and thanked her for "giving me a daughter in the midst of your sadness."

"Our life is not less than a story from the movies," he wrote. "If you add a few songs to it, it would make a very good film."

The government has denied Khan, 26, and the other high-value detainees access to lawyers, asserting in court that the "alternative interrogation methods" to which Khan was subjected are among the nation's most sensitive national security secrets. As a result, little is known about the arrests, detentions or interrogations of those captives.

U.S. officials say Khan, a Pakistani national, took orders from Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the man accused of orchestrating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and who is also a high-value detainee at Guantanamo. Khan was allegedly asked to research the poisoning of U.S. reservoirs and the blowing up of U.S. gas stations, and was considered for an operation to assassinate the Pakistani president.

The letters Khan wrote to his wife and family were delivered through the International Committee of the Red Cross, whose representatives are permitted to visit the detainees on the condition that the agency does not publicly disclose information gathered during the meetings.

Khan's letter to his wife, written in Urdu, was introduced in court in Pakistan and has been published on an Urdu-language Web site operated by the BBC. Yaqoob's attorney, Nisar A. Mujahid, said the letter, by revealing Khan's desperation, supports his contention that the government of Pakistan should use diplomatic pressure to help protect Khan's rights.

Khan's oldest brother, Mahmood Khan, said yesterday that the family was releasing the letters it received to draw attention to the case. Mahmood Khan said that, for several days after the letters arrived last month, he could not bring himself to read them.

"The more you read about how much he loves us, the things going through his mind, what he's been through -- what am I going to say to him?" asked Mahmood Khan, speaking at the family's home.

The letters in English are rife with spelling and grammatical errors. Khan wrote that he is held in solitary confinement, that he is allowed to leave his cell "to get sunburn" for one hour each day, and that he can sometimes talk with other inmates through cell walls. Beyond those particulars, the details of his confinement are few.

"In this letter I am going to mention some of the things I have been through," he wrote on Oct. 20. The next 19 lines of text are blacked out. After the redaction comes Khan's complaint that he did not have his glasses during his first two years of detention and that the military prison lacks basketball courts and other comforts common in U.S. prisons.

"But in some way this place is still better and in some way other were better," he wrote.

Gitanjali Gutierrez, a lawyer who has been seeking access to Khan, said the redactions, although expected, raised questions. "So many of the interrogation techniques are already known," said Gutierrez, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many detainees at Guantanamo.

Majid Khan was detained while he was staying with a brother in Pakistan in March 2003, according to his family and court filings by his attorneys. They said men who were not in uniform burst into the brother's apartment in Karachi late one night and put hoods over the faces of those inside: Majid, his brother Mohammad and his brother's wife. The couple's one-month-old son was also taken into custody.

DOJ_NMG_0118278

Although the others were released without charges over the course of three months, Majid Khan's whereabouts were not officially disclosed until September, when President Bush named him as one of the 14 high-value detainees.

Mahmood Khan said his brother, a 1999 graduate of Owings Mills High School, dreamed of being a deejay or a rap musician, even for a time a U.S. Marine, but not a terrorist.

Khan was most recognizable as that young man in the earliest of the notes. He thanked his family for the letters they had sent, bragged that he could do 100 push-ups in 80 seconds, and asked for news of deaths and marriages. "And I don't need to tell you how much I love and miss you guys," he wrote.

Khan was more serious in the second letter. He wrote that he had grown a beard and had studied Islam deeply since his capture, that he now wrote poetry and could read the Koran without translation.

He asked his father for forgiveness and wrote that he had sinned, a reference, according to Mahmood Khan, not to criminal activity but to the pursuit of material indulgences.

"Things never stay the same, and life goes on, so please don't worry about me," he wrote. "Remember it's my sins who brought me here. When my sins are forgiven then I'll get freedom, so it's between me and Allah."

Pentagon Aide Regrets Stance On Law Firms For Detainees (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — A senior Pentagon official apologized on Wednesday to the lawyers of Guantánamo Bay detainees for suggesting that corporations should consider severing business ties with law firms that represent the detainees.

The official, Charles D. Stimson, deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs, wrote in a letter published on Wednesday in The Washington Post that his comments in a radio interview last week did not reflect his “core beliefs.”

Mr. Stimson wrote: “Regrettably, my comments left the impression that I question the integrity of those engaged in the zealous defense of detainees in Guantánamo. I do not.”

Mr. Stimson sparked outrage with his interview for Federal News Radio in which he named more than 12 law firms defending the detainees.

He said, “I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.’s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.’s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms.”

The president of the American Bar Association, Karen J. Mathis of Denver, said it was proper for Mr. Stimson to apologize, but she added that his original comments reminded Americans “that every accused person deserves legal representation.”

Mr. Stimson, a former Navy defense lawyer, wrote in his letter that “I believe that our justice system requires vigorous representation.”

He said he “zealously represented unpopular clients.”

On Friday, a spokesman for the Pentagon, Bryan Whitman, said Mr. Stimson’s comments did “not represent the views of the Defense Department or the thinking of its leadership.” Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a human rights group that is coordinating the detainees’ legal representation, said of the apology: “It is the minimum they should have done. It is basically a message to Stimson and the government to let people be represented.”

Witness Against Militant Posada Reports A Bomb Under His Pickup (MH)

By Jay Weaver And Alfonso Chardy

The Miami Herald, January 18, 2007

An FBI informant who is a key witness against anti-Castro militant Luis Posada Carriles discovered a pipe bomb attached to the bottom of his pickup truck Sunday and drove it to the Hialeah Police Department, law-enforcement authorities say.

Gilberto Abascal -- whose testimoney also helped convict anti-Castro activists Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat on weapons charges -- somehow spotted the device strapped to the undercarriage of his red 2005 Ford F-150 truck while he cruised around Hialeah, two federal investigators familiar with the incident said.

Despite finding the explosive device, Abascal drove several blocks to the Hialeah police station.

Hialeah police and Miami-Dade bomb squad officers shut down the area and detonated the device. The police picked up the bomb scraps, which included wires and gun shells. The FBI is now investigating, although spokeswoman Judy Orihuela declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0118279

Sunday was not the first time that Abascal -- who is supposed to be in a witness protection program well outside Miami-Dade County -- has claimed an attempt on his life. Last August, he told police that an unknown gunman pulled alongside his pickup at a Hialeah eatery, Rancho Grande, and shot at him, according to a police report. Abascal told police he pulled a 9mm pistol from his glove box and shot back.

WORK FOR THE FBI

Abascal did not return calls to his cellphone or home phone. He has worked off and on as an FBI informant on probes involving Cuban exile militants since at least 2001. Abascal has received more than $25,000 from the FBI for his testimony, expenses and relocation.

Defense attorneys for the Cuban exiles implicated in recent criminal investigations called Abascal a "double agent" whose clients are the FBI and Cuban leader Fidel Castro. Abascal -- along with federal authorities -- has repeatedly denied that he is a double agent, although Coast Guard officers found him among a small group that was illegally trying to motor a boat to Cuba in 1999.

Last fall, Abascal was the main federal witness who helped convict ant-Castro militants Alvarez and Mitat on weapons-conspiracy charges in South Florida, and in last week's indictment of former CIA operative Posada on fraud offenses.

A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas, charged Posada, 78, with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005.

The same grand jury also charged Alvarez, 65, and Mitat, 64, with contempt of court for refusing to testify about Posada's entry. Three other associates have been charged with contempt.

Attorneys for Posada, Alvarez and Mitat -- all in federal custody -- said their clients were not involved in any attempt on Abascal's life.

"My client had nothing to do with it," Posada's immigration attorney, Eduardo Soto, told The Miami Herald.

One defense lawyer questioned why Abascal, after spotting a pipe bomb, would drive several blocks to the police instead of just calling them to come and get him.

"If your information is correct, I caution law enforcement to be very careful in verifying the claim," said attorney Ben Kuehne, a member of Alvarez's legal team. ``Abascal, we believe, has an active history of being an agent for the Castro government and engaging in his own brand of wrongdoing."

Kuehne also said Alvarez had nothing to do with the alleged bomb threat: ``As much as Mr. Alvarez has spent his life trying to bring democracy to his native land, he remains governed by the rule of law in the United States. He would not attempt self-help remedies against any Castro operatives in the United States."

Many in the exile community have dubbed Abascal a traitor for informing on Alvarez, Mitat and Posada.

HOW POSADA ARRIVED

Posada has long maintained that he came into the United States by crossing the Mexican border with the assistance of a migrant smuggler, not by sea -- as prosecutors now allege. By charging Posada, the Justice Department signaled its willingness to target a man who has been in investigators' cross hairs since 1997, when he was first suspected of masterminding tourist-site bombings in Cuba.

A grand jury in New Jersey is looking at evidence gathered anew by the FBI, which is focusing on money wire transfers and a reporter's tape in which Posada allegedly confesses to plotting the Cuba bombings, which killed one Italian tourist.

Last week's indictment is built on a statement given to the FBI by Abascal, who said Posada entered the country on a shrimping boat called Santrina manned by Alvarez, Mitat and others, including the informant himself. He said the crew on the Santrina picked up Posada on the Mexican island of Isla Mujeres and took him to the United States.

"I have always told the truth and have not lied about anything," Abascal told a Miami Herald reporter by telephone last week, before the pipe-bomb event. ``Even if they insult me or kill me, I'll continue telling the truth."

Posada supporters have scheduled a rally for noon to 6 p.m. Friday at Little Havana's Bay of Pigs monument, Southwest Eighth Street at 13th Avenue. The monument honors exiles who died trying to overthrow Castro in 1962.

Miguel Saavedra, an organizer of the rally, said the demonstration is designed to send a message to the White House that Posada and other "Cuban exile patriots in American jails" should be pardoned.

Philippine Militant Slain (LAT)

By Paul Watson And Al Jacinto, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Jainal Antel Sali Jr., a leader of Abu Sayyaf, was linked to Al Qaeda and had been sought in a Californian's killing.

JOLO ISLAND, PHILIPPINES — A militant leader linked to Al Qaeda and wanted in the beheading of a California tourist was killed in a jungle battle, the Philippine army announced Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0118280

The military first reported that it had wounded Jainal Antel Sali Jr., also known as Abu Solaiman, on Tuesday when special forces raided a hide-out of the Abu Sayyaf militant group on Jolo island, about 600 miles south of Manila.

But Sali, also wanted in the kidnapping of two American missionaries, was later confirmed dead at a news conference in Manila, where the chief of the armed forces, Gen. Hermogenes Esperon, showed photographs of the corpse.

"We have resolved that this group and their major commanders must be finished off, that this notorious group should see its end," the general said.

Sali was buried Wednesday on Jolo island after relatives and friends identified the body. He had the hole of a soldier's bullet in his chest and a piece of wood, about an inch long, embedded in his left cheek. It was pulled out by two imams hired by the military to clean and bury the corpse in accordance with Muslim custom.

"It was him, all right. It was Abu Solaiman," said Karim Muktar, a Muslim rebel turned government soldier. "His time finally has come, and it's the end of the road for Solaiman."

Sali, a 42-year-old native of Zamboanga who was a civil engineer, commanded an Abu Sayyaf unit known as the urban terrorist group, blamed for a series of bombings in the southern Philippines. He was also an Abu Sayyaf spokesman.

Philippine officials linked Sali to a February 2004 bombing on a ferry, which triggered a fire that killed 116 people.

Wanted by the FBI

Sali was on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists, and the U.S. State Department had offered a reward of up to $5 million for his capture. He was indicted by a U.S. court in 2002 on charges including the murder of an American outside the U.S. and kidnapping resulting in death, the FBI said. Guillermo Sobero, 40, of Corona, Calif., was beheaded after he was kidnapped in May 2001 with American missionaries Martin and Gracia Burnham, of Wichita, Kan., and 17 Filipinos at an island resort in the southern Philippines.

Sobero's torso was found months after his abduction. Abu Sayyaf, which says it is fighting to establish Islamic rule in the region, said it had executed him.

The Burnhams and other hostages were held for more than a year, during which they were constantly on the move in forced marches through the jungle. Martin Burnham was killed in June 2002 when Philippine commandos launched a rescue mission. Gracia Burnham was wounded in the leg but survived. A Philippine nurse also died, as did several soldiers and guerrillas.

Gracia Burnham released a statement Wednesday after the death of Sali.

"Based on the six months I had close contact with Solaiman during our year of captivity, I would say he was the most dangerous of the Abu Sayyaf leaders because he was filled with hate," the Associated Press reported her saying in the statement.

"Martin and Solaiman had long talks about their beliefs and beliefs in general while we were in the jungle, so today my heart is filled with sadness for Solaiman because his next step is to face almighty God to be judged."

In early 2002, President Bush sent hundreds of American troops, including Special Forces, to advise and train Philippine soldiers battling militants in the south.

The U.S. forces were restricted to noncombat roles and are permitted to fire only in self-defense.

The battle that led to Sali's death raged for more than three hours Tuesday as Philippine troops clashed with about 60 Abu Sayyaf fighters at a hide-out on Mt. Daho, army Lt. Col. Bartolome Bacarro said as the operation was underway. Two Philippine soldiers were wounded.

Plenty of cover

Mt. Daho is an active volcano whose thick canopy of trees and countless crevices provide excellent cover for guerrillas.

Bacarro said Philippine forces had found at least 17 bunkers, camouflaged by large trees, at the guerrillas' camp. Troops also recovered assorted materials used for making crude bombs, including blasting caps.

On Wednesday, the Philippine military sent troops to join the hundreds of soldiers on Jolo who launched an offensive against Abu Sayyaf guerrillas in August.

An air force C-130 cargo plane transported soldiers and weapons, including rockets, that were delivered in a convoy of trucks and armored vehicles to an army base in the town of Jolo, where U.S. troops are stationed.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to visit Jolo to inspect U.S. troops before the start of joint anti-terrorism exercises with Philippine forces next month, a Philippine government source said.

*

paul.watson@latimes.com

Times staff writer Watson reported from Jakarta, Indonesia, and special correspondent Jacinto from Jolo island.

DOJ_NMG_0118281

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

TSA Chief Hits Plan To Check Cargo (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Requiring inspection of all cargo on passenger planes could potentially make them more vulnerable to terrorist attack while also hindering commerce, the nation's aviation security chief said Wednesday.

In his first public comments on a bill approved by the House on Jan. 9, Transportation Security Administration (TSA) chief Kip Hawley said inspecting all passenger-plane cargo would add "a very small, incremental benefit for security."

Hawley said it also could divert airport screeners from other activities such as screening airport employees, inspecting passenger travel documents and looking for suspicious travelers.

"If you spend all your resources opening boxes and not applying your resources more generally, that opens up another vulnerability," Hawley told the Senate Aviation Subcommittee. "The adaptive terrorist will go there."

Passenger planes carry about 6 billion tons of cargo a year, typically goods that need fast shipment such as seafood and auto parts. The items are held in the belly of jets with passenger luggage, which is inspected for bombs. Only a small portion of such cargo is checked by bomb-detection machines or dogs.

The House bill aimed at strengthening domestic security would require the cargo to get the same screening as luggage by October 2009.

Hawley said requiring the cargo inspection by late 2009 "is not feasible without impeding the legitimate flow of commerce and imposing an unreasonable cost on the government." Much air cargo is brought to airports in large containers that won't fit through a luggage-bomb detector, Hawley said.

The House bill does not specify whether the TSA or airlines would inspect cargo.

The Senate Aviation Subcommittee plans to propose its own aviation-security bill that is likely to be less far-reaching on cargo than the House bill.

Subcommittee Chairman Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., wants to give TSA flexibility in improving cargo security and will "carefully weigh" how a new law affects airlines and the economy, spokeswoman Wendy Morigi said.

Airline and cargo-shipping groups oppose inspecting all passenger-plane cargo. The Air Transport Association, which represents major airlines, welcomed Hawley's testimony, saying it "has always believed that physical screening of air cargo is not the most effective way to assure the security of air travelers."

Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., a leading advocate for inspecting cargo, said technology could do the job without disrupting commerce.

Hawley said the TSA has strengthened cargo security by requiring packages that people bring directly to airports to go through luggage-bomb detectors, and by adding dog teams. The agency largely regulates cargo by setting security requirements for companies that ship goods on passenger planes.

Hawley also said agencies are reviewing a watch list that keeps people off airplanes and removing about half the names. That should reduce incidents in which innocent travelers' names match those of terrorism suspects, and the travelers are barred from flying.

No-fly List Checked For Accuracy, Cut (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

The AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration is checking the accuracy of a watch list of suspected terrorists banned from traveling on airliners in the U.S. and will probably cut the list in half, the head of the Transportation Security Administration said Wednesday.

Kip Hawley told Congress that the more accurate list, combined with a new passenger screening system, should take care of most incidents of people wrongly being prevented from boarding a flight or frequently being picked out for additional scrutiny.

A "no-fly" list of suspected terrorists and criminals considered too dangerous to travel on commercial airliners in this country has existed for decades. But since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the list expanded. Tightened security procedures have led to closer scrutiny of air travelers and resulted in many complaints.

The TSA has been working with intelligence agencies and the FBI to improve the watch list. Before the 9/11 attacks, almost every intelligence agency had its own list of undesirables and resisted sharing it with other agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0118282

Even cutting the list in half is "nice but not all that meaningful," said Barry Steinhardt, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union. He noted that various estimates of the list's size, which is classified, have ranged from 50,000 to 350,000 names.

"Cutting a list of 350,000 names is not all that impressive," Steinhardt added.

At a hearing of the Senate Commerce Committee, Hawley ran into inquiries from lawmakers with family members or friends who had encountered problems at airport checkpoints.

Among them was Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who complained that his wife, Catherine, was being identified as "Cat" Stevens and frequently stopped due to confusion with the former name of the folk singer now known as Yusuf Islam, whose name is on the list. In 2004 he was denied entry into the U.S., but officials declined to explain why.

Hawley explained that Secure Flight, the new passenger screening program, which he hopes will be running in 2008, would make such problems "a thing of the past."

Hawley said his agency sends correctives to the airlines.

"Unfortunately, it depends airline by airline how their individual systems work as to how effectively that's done," he said.

Hawley was questioned by Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., about the lack of screening for passengers on private aircraft, which Rockefeller called "very disturbing."

Hawley said there are many security measures in place on the ground around general aviation terminals, but that the department is considering the longer-term issue of whether such private flight passengers should be subjected to individual screening.

Senators also asked Hawley about a provision recommended by the 9/11 Commission, and passed by the House last week, that would require 100 percent physical inspection of all air cargo loaded onto passenger planes. The Senate has yet to act on the measure.

"We prefer not to have a 100 percent requirement on anything," Hawley said. "Because you tend to be focused then on, how do we accomplish what is written in the law, as opposed to a smarter security that says, okay, we're in a risk-based business, how are we going to stop the bomb from being in here?"

Also Wednesday, the Homeland Security Department launched a new program for passengers who feel wronged to try correcting the list.

The program will give travelers "a clearly-defined process" to report problems, said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff in a written statement.

Beginning Feb. 20, the program, dubbed Traveler Redress Inquiry Program, will serve as a central processing point for all inquiries about Homeland Security agencies' databases.

Appeals For Delayed Travelers (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The Department of Homeland Security is setting up a new, simplified way for travelers to file an appeal if their journey is disrupted by security queries. The new system will allow travelers who have been denied or delayed boarding an airplane or entering the United States, or have been subjected to more intense searches or questioning by a department official to question why they were the target of such scrutiny. The new system, called the Traveler Redress Inquiry Program, will allow the person to file and track the status of the claim online and is scheduled to start late next month.

Don't Demonize Security (USAT)

By James Jay Carafano

USA Today, January 18, 2007

Here's the recipe for a scary, post-9/11 news story about liberties vs. security:

·First, find a legitimate domestic surveillance program. Make sure it's one most Americans ignore — the more obscure, the better. It doesn't matter if the courts have ruled it constitutional. It doesn't matter if it helps fight crime or protect national security.

·Next, find an "expert" to denounce the program as an unnecessary expansion of executive authority. Rail about the potential for abuse (even when there's no evidence of actual abuse). Argue that the program could be a threat, even if it hasn't, in fact, been misused.

·Finally, stimulate the "Luddite response" — a fear of technology. Rant about how the information age is destroying any hope of privacy. More information and technology equals power. And with more power comes more abuse.

Combining these ingredients is guaranteed to shock sensibilities and spark congressional hearings. It's been done many times, starting with the tools authorized in the Patriot Act to fight terrorism, like delayed-notification warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0118283

U.S. military domestic investigations are the latest intelligence and law enforcement tool to receive the treatment. A spate of recent news reports revealed that the armed forces use "national security" letters to request business records, such as phone and bank data. It sounds scary, but it shouldn't.

The military has a legitimate, limited mission to conduct intelligence inside the United States. It is written into law and funded by Congress. National security letters are perfectly legal, and the Defense Department is authorized to issue them. Requesting business records is a common intelligence and law enforcement practice and does not in many cases require a warrant.

Finally, there is a domestic security threat to worry about. On 9/11, there was an attack on American soil, and others have been plotted since then. Keeping America safe, free and prosperous requires both liberty and order. Protecting the safety and freedom of Americans is not served well by simply demonizing security.

James Jay Carafano is a senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, and author of G.I. Ingenuity. (The Bush administration declined to provide an opposing view to this editorial.)

Grand Jury Looking At Katrina Insurer (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

A grand jury in Mississippi began hearing testimony yesterday on possible criminal charges against State Farm for its handling of claims after Hurricane Katrina, people close to the proceedings said.

The start of the grand jury proceedings in the marble circuit courthouse in Pascagoula, on the Gulf Coast, raised new questions about efforts to settle hundreds of lawsuits filed after the storm in 2005.

Early last week, State Farm and other participants in the settlement talks said they were close to an agreement that could put hundreds of millions of dollars into the hands of policyholders along the coast who have been waiting for insurance money to begin rebuilding.

Several participants in the talks said State Farm wanted to reach agreement before a grand jury began hearing evidence on whether it ordered adjusters and independent engineers to file paperwork that would lead to underpayments to homeowners. As part of the agreement, State Farm was insisting that Jim Hood, the attorney general of Mississippi, drop a criminal investigation into the company's handling of claims and call off the grand jury, which would decide whether there was probable cause to return an indictment.

But the talks were jolted last Thursday by decisions by a federal judge and jury in Gulfport that awarded a couple in Biloxi $2.7 million, mostly in punitive damages, in a separate lawsuit against State Farm.

Lawyers opposing State Farm said they feared that the insurer, the biggest in Mississippi and the nation, would break off the talks.

The next day, however, State Farm was back at the table with trial lawyers and Mississippi officials.

The negotiations gathered speed throughout the long holiday weekend, and some participants thought an agreement might be announced as early as Tuesday.

But, according to several participants, Mr. Hood refused to sign off on the deal. That enabled the grand jury to be seated in Pascagoula. It also meant that another of State Farm's conditions was not met: A requirement that Mr. Hood also drop a civil lawsuit against it and other insurers.

When the grand jury began hearing testimony yesterday, participants in the talks said, State Farm lawyers seemed on the verge of ending the negotiations.

But in a brief interview late yesterday, Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm, said that the insurer continued "talking with all parties" and remained optimistic a settlement could be reached.

As for the grand jury proceedings, Mr. Supple said State Farm "is cooperating fully with the attorney general's grand jury investigation." He would not confirm reports that one witness had been Terry Blalock, State Farm's senior claims executive in Mississippi.

In late summer, two independent adjusters provided evidence to Mississippi officials that they said supported claims of impropriety against State Farm. The two adjusters contended that State Farm destroyed large numbers of documents related to their payments for Hurricane Katrina damage. State Farm has insisted that it did nothing wrong.

An aide to Mr. Hood said late Wednesday that he was in a meeting and could not speak with a reporter.

Lawyers and others who have been following the settlement talks and the claims disputes with insurers along the Mississippi coast, where tens of thousands of homes were damaged or destroyed by high wind and surging floodwaters, said several witnesses went before the grand jury yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0118284

WAR NEWS:

Measure In Senate Urges No Troop Rise In Iraq (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The Senate set the stage on Wednesday for a direct clash with President Bush over the war, with two senior Democrats and a prominent Republican introducing a symbolic measure to declare that the administration's plan to send additional troops to Iraq runs counter to the national interest.

The resolution, proposed by Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican, would not be binding, and the White House said it would have no effect on Mr. Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq.

But sponsors of the measure said Congressional passage would send a powerful message that the president could not ignore, and its adoption could be a precursor to further efforts by opponents of the war to place limits on his use of the military in Iraq or to limit financing for the war.

The measure says that the United States cannot sustain an open-ended commitment to Iraq, that the chief responsibility for quelling unrest there rests with Iraqi security forces and that the United States should seek a political solution. [Resolution text: nytimes.com/washington.]

"This resolution will demonstrate — and it will demonstrate it right away — that support is not there for the president's policy in Iraq," said Mr. Biden, the Foreign Relations Committee chairman. "The sooner he recognizes that reality and acts on it, the better off all of us will be."

Mr. Biden's committee expects to take up the resolution next Wednesday, pushing any votes on the measure past Mr. Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday night. Senate Democratic leaders have said they will bring it to the floor relatively quickly. House Democrats have made it clear that they will not take up any similar proposal until after the Senate has voted on one.

Republican leaders promised to offer an alternative that would call for time to allow Mr. Bush's new policy to work — an attempt to provide Republicans unhappy with the war an avenue to express their view without backing the more critical proposal.

Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a longtime Democrat who was re-elected last year as an independent, was the only non-Republican to pledge support so far. But Mr. Kyl said he believed that many of his Republican colleagues would ultimately find it difficult to vote against the White House.

"You cannot micromanage a war from the United States Senate," Mr. Kyl said. "At least, you can't effectively or constitutionally do that. If you vote to fund the military, then you need to leave the tactical decisions to the commanders on the ground and the commander in chief."

But another Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, quickly got behind the new resolution, and Mr. Hagel predicted that others would as well. "Now is the time for the Congress to make its voice heard on a policy that has such significant implications for the nation, the Middle East and the world," Ms. Snowe said in a statement.

Other Republicans who have expressed unease about the troop buildup, including Senators Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, took no immediate stance on the resolution. They expressed some reservations about the tone and scope of the proposal, which refers to escalating the war, which some Republicans believe has become a loaded partisan description.

In an effort to limit defections, wavering Republicans were invited to the White House for briefings on Wednesday. Tony Snow, Mr. Bush's press secretary, reiterated the administration's contention that a vote in opposition to Mr. Bush's policy would send a mixed message about American intentions.

"What signal does it send to the Iraqis in terms of steadfastness ?" he asked. "What does it say — does it make the troops feel better about their support from the United States?"

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, accused the resolution's three sponsors of political gamesmanship in advocating a nonbinding vote rather than taking on the more difficult issue of limiting funding for American forces. "Rather than have a serious debate we see this kind of posturing," Mr. Cornyn said.

Mr. Hagel bristled at that comment. "This is a serious resolution put forward by serious people who care about our country," he said. "There is no moral high ground that one group of senators has over the other."

DOJ_NMG_0118285

Democratic leaders in the House and Senate say they believe that they can reach an early consensus on symbolic votes opposing the president and then later consider putting restrictions on spending for the war after gauging the depth of resistance. The House Defense Appropriations subcommittee on Wednesday began a series of closed hearings on potential limits on military spending.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, gained Democratic support for requiring the president to seek new authority from Congress before raising troop levels.

House Republicans introduced a measure that would prohibit Congress from cutting off or restricting "funding for units and members of the armed forces in harm's way."

Congress Unleashes Antiwar Proposals (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Setting up a showdown with the White House that could come next week, several antiwar senators, including one Republican, introduced a resolution Wednesday opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

The bipartisan resolution drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) would not place any legal limits on what the president can do in Iraq.

But it marks the leading edge of a rapidly expanding legislative front that will confront Bush as he tries to chart a new Iraq policy.

Wednesday, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) also touted separate plans to halt the deployment of more troops to Iraq. And later in the day, a second GOP senator joined Hagel to support the resolution.

On the other side of the Capitol, liberal Democrats in the House, led by three Californians, unveiled an even more sweeping plan for withdrawing all U.S. troops from Iraq over the next six months.

"The November elections showed just how fed up the American public is with the president's failed Iraq policy," Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma) said while unveiling her measure, co-sponsored by Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) and Barbara Lee (D-Oakland). "It is now up to the Congress to catch up with the will of the American public."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said congressional resolutions would not deter Bush. "The president has obligations as commander in chief, and he will go ahead and execute them," Snow said.

Senate plan

Senate leaders have shown little interest in pushing as far as the more aggressive antiwar lawmakers in the House, who want to mandate a phased withdrawal in law. But, stern and defiant, the three authors of the Senate resolution cast it as an important first step in building bipartisan congressional support for challenging the White House. "I cannot believe the president of the United States will not pay attention," Biden said.

Hagel, a conservative Republican who has lambasted Bush's plan, called it "dangerously irresponsible" and promised, "I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy as he outlined it Wednesday night."

"The Congress of the United States has a role to play," Hagel said at a news conference with Biden and Levin in the U.S. Capitol. "I don't believe we have played that role very effectively over the last four years."

The carefully worded five-page resolution restates in 18 detailed "whereas" clauses the critiques made by war critics in Congress and elsewhere about rising U.S. casualties, strains on the military and past failures of the Iraqi government.

"It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence in Iraq," the resolution reads in the first of six conclusions.

It also calls for American forces to shift their mission to protecting Iraq's borders, training Iraqi forces and conducting counterterrorism activities.

And it concludes by calling for the United States to "transfer, under an appropriately expedited timeline, responsibility for internal security and halting sectarian violence in Iraq to the government of Iraq and Iraqi security forces."

At the news conference, Biden said, "When the president goes way off course … the single and most effective way to get him to change course is to demonstrate that his policy has waning or no support from both parties."

Since announcing his plans last week, the president has insisted in several television interviews that he would not be stopped by congressional opposition.

But over the last 10 days, the White House has worked to persuade GOP lawmakers to stick with the president, and on Wednesday morning invited a group of senators to meet with national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley, a leading architect of the president's plan.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), normally a loyal Bush ally, said White House officials expressed frustration that their message wasn't getting out. "To some extent, people have tuned the president out," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118286

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who has spoken out against the Bush plan, said Hadley mainly listened to the lawmakers, many of whom have publicly criticized the president's proposal since he announced it last week.

Cornered by reporters outside the Senate chamber, Coleman said there was some discussion of delaying the deployment of additional troops to give the Iraqi government a chance to demonstrate its commitment. Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle have complained about the failure of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's administration to do more to halt sectarian violence.

But Coleman said nothing was decided at the meeting. "I went there with concerns. I left with concerns," he said. "I would suspect there was very little mind changing that went on there."

Coleman said he was still reviewing the language of the resolution, which calls the troop buildup an "escalation," a word some Republicans have complained is politically loaded because it harks back to the Vietnam War.

Wednesday evening, Maine Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, a moderate Republican who has frequently criticized the Bush administration's war policy, became the second Republican to support the Biden-Hagel-Levin resolution.

"Now is the time for the Congress to make its voice heard," Snowe said.

Facing the threat of a Republican filibuster, Senate Democrats would need at least 10 Republicans to get the 60 votes needed to bring the resolution to a vote.

House plan

In the House, Republicans, including Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), were lining up behind a proposal by Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) to explicitly prohibit any cuts in funding for troops "in harm's way."

Biden said the Foreign Relations Committee, which he chairs, would consider the resolution on Wednesday, the day after the president delivers his State of the Union address, in hopes of getting it to the floor as soon as the end of next week.

Neither he nor Levin, who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, would say whether they planned to pursue legislation to cut funds for the buildup. "What goes on beyond that is going to depend on the reaction to it," Levin said.

But other Democrats are already pushing forward.

Dodd said Wednesday that he planned to try to amend the resolution to require Bush to get congressional authorization for any increase in troop levels in Iraq, explaining that he believes the president has exceeded the power that Congress gave him in the original war resolution.

"I do not believe that the authorization provided by the Congress in 2002 gives the president the unlimited authority to send additional troops to Iraq for a mission which is totally different," Dodd said.

Clinton, who until now has remained largely in the background while debate over the war escalated, said she would introduce a bill next week requiring congressional authorization for any troop increases.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced legislation last week to do much the same thing.

In a conference call with antiwar activists Wednesday, Kennedy said he wanted to move forward with his bill in the next week to 10 days. "This is the moment for congressional action to bring this war to an end," he said.

Second Republican Opposes Bush Iraq Plan (AP)

By Anne Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A second Republican signed onto a Senate resolution on Wednesday opposing President Bush's 21,500-troop buildup in Iraq, setting a marker for a major clash between the White House and Congress over the unpopular war.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, a moderate from Maine, said she would support a nonbinding resolution that would put the Senate on record as saying the U.S. commitment in Iraq can be sustained only with support from the American public and Congress.

Snowe's decision to join the effort came as the White House and GOP leaders struggled to keep Republicans from endorsing the resolution, and raised questions about how many more defections there might be.

"Now is time for the Congress to make its voice heard on a policy that has such significant implications for the nation, the Middle East and the world," Snowe said in a written statement.

Earlier, Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Nebraska Republican and potential 2008 presidential candidate, joined Democrats at a news conference announcing the resolution.

"I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy as he outlined it Wednesday night," Hagel said. "I think it is dangerously irresponsible."

Even as skeptical Republicans were summoned to private meetings with Bush and national security adviser Stephen Hadley at the White House, Bush's aides made clear that the Capitol Hill challenge would be met aggressively by the administration.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow said resolutions passed by Congress will not affect Bush's decision-making.

"The president has obligations as a commander in chief," he said. "And he will go ahead and execute them."

DOJ_NMG_0118287

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., a chief author of the Senate resolution, said it says "we do not support increased troops, deeper military involvement" and calls for shifting the mission of U.S. troops from combat to training, counterterrorism and protecting Iraq's territorial integrity.

He said it also calls for "the greater engagement of other countries in the region in the stabilization and reconstruction of Iraq."

The resolution does not call for a withdrawal of troops or threaten funding of military operations, as many Democrats have suggested. Instead, the legislation says the U.S. should transfer responsibility to the Iraqis "under an appropriately expedited timeline," though it is not specific.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, told reporters that she is considering supporting the resolution and said she believed it heads in the right direction.

"I want to make sure it's something I can support," said Snowe, who has been adamantly opposed to the increase in troops.

The group planned to introduce the resolution Wednesday, with a review by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Jan. 24, one day after Bush delivers his State of the Union address.

Hagel's agreement to help Democrats champion the resolution amounts to a setback to the administration and to Bush, who has argued vehemently that some 21,500 additional U.S. troops are needed to help the Iraqi government calm sectarian violence in Baghdad and Anbar province.

Bush announced on Jan. 10 that he planned to increase the 130,000 U.S. forces in Iraq with an additional 21,5000 troops.

The resolutions in Congress seemed likely to be largely symbolic and they would not affect the Pentagon's war budget or challenge the president's authority over U.S. forces. Such votes, however, could be a shot across the bow to Bush.

The resolutions also would help Democrats measure GOP support for more aggressive legislative tactics, such as cutting off funds for the war.

Such a vote puts many Republicans in an uncomfortable position. They will have to decide whether to stay loyal to an unpopular GOP president and risk angering voters disillusioned by the war or buck the party line.

Republicans are crafting alternative proposals, including a House bill introduced by Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, that would vow to protect funding for U.S. troops in combat. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., is considering a resolution expressing support for the findings by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said Wednesday she thinks there should be a cap on U.S. troops in Iraq and said she wants "to condition American aid to the Iraqis on their meeting political benchmarks."

"I am opposed to this escalation," she said on NBC's "Today" program. "The Bush administration has frankly failed to put any leverage on this government," said Clinton, considered a likely 2008 Democratic presidential front-runner, although she has not yet entered the race.

Bush has been trying to sell his revised war plan to the public in a series of television interviews. He told PBS's Jim Lehrer in an interview this week that keeping his old policies in place would lead to "a slow failure," but withdrawing from Iraq, as some Democrats and other critics suggest, would result in an "expedited failure."

Several GOP members of Congress have offered only lukewarm endorsements of Bush's plan. Lining up behind Bush in the Senate are Republican stalwarts and a few members who have long backed sending more troops to Iraq, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Bipartisan Senate Measure Confronts Bush Over Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

A bipartisan group of senators announced a formal resolution of opposition yesterday to President Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq, calling for more diplomacy, international cooperation and an "appropriately expedited" transfer of military responsibilities to Iraqi security forces.

The nonbinding resolution, which could come to a vote within two weeks, moves Congress a major step closer to a public confrontation with the Bush administration over war policy. A Senate vote would be followed quickly by action in the House. But even before the resolution's introduction, prominent lawmakers, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), were pushing for far tougher measures that could cut off funding for the war and legislatively thwart Bush's "surge" of 21,500 additional troops.

Clinton said yesterday that she intends to support the resolution, drafted by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). But, she added, "we will eventually have to move to tougher requirements on the administration to get their attention."

DOJ_NMG_0118288

A week after Bush addressed the nation on his policy shift, bipartisan opposition appears to be gaining steam, despite continuing White House efforts to tamp down a congressional revolt. No fewer than four measures were introduced yesterday to block the war policy, including the Senate resolution and multiple proposals demanding congressional authorization before additional troop deployments. By day's end, the resolution of opposition had picked up another Republican co-sponsor, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine).

"I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy, as he outlined it Wednesday night," Hagel said, referring to Bush's speech last week. "I think it is dangerously irresponsible."

Administration officials summoned at least half a dozen skeptical Republican senators to the White House and dispatched Vice President Cheney to the Senate GOP's weekly policy lunch.

"A lot of members of Congress at this point, I think, are still trying to figure out what are all the parts of the plan, how does it work," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "They've got questions, and they have concerns."

While the White House kept its pronouncements low key, Bush's allies in Congress ratcheted up their rhetoric, questioning the wisdom and seriousness of colleagues who are pushing toward a confrontation with the administration. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) dismissed the resolution as a "political ploy."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) called the resolution "the worst of all outcomes . . . a symbolic going-to-the-pier before the troops ship off to say, 'We believe in you, but you're going to lose.' "

But the president's position continued to erode.

"The bottom line is: I went there with concerns, I left with concerns," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), a participant in the White House meeting.

"I think we clarified for them what the reality is," added Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), another attendee.

The Senate resolution minces no words, declaring that "it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq." But it goes well beyond a simple statement of opposition. Drawing heavily from the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, it calls for an acceleration of the training of Iraqi forces and the use of U.S. troops to secure Iraq's borders to prevent meddling by its neighbors.

It requests an "appropriately expedited timeline" for the transfer of internal security duties to the Iraqi government, and it urges the administration to "engage nations in the Middle East to develop a regional, internationally-sponsored peace and reconciliation process."

The measure will come before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after Tuesday's State of the Union address and is likely to be reported out for action in the full Senate the following week. A few lawmakers, as well as antiwar activists, have decried the resolution as toothless, but its sponsors said yesterday that a strong bipartisan vote would have a resounding impact.

"The single most important thing to do is generate a consensus here in the United States Congress," Biden said. "I cannot believe that the president of the United States would not pay heed to a bipartisan resolution" from the Senate.

But there is no shortage of legislative proposals to follow the resolution. Clinton, an expected contender for the White House, proposed limiting troop levels in Iraq to about 135,000, bolstering troop strength in Afghanistan, and delivering both Bush and Iraq an ultimatum: Disarm the sectarian militia, reach agreement on Iraqi oil-revenue sharing, amend the Iraqi constitution to ensure minority rights, and convene a regional peace conference -- or lose funding for the fledgling Iraqi security forces.

It was the strongest statement of dissent yet from Clinton, who has taken heat from liberal activists for her initial support for the war. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), a White House aspirant, proposed his own bill, demanding that Bush seek congressional authorization before any additional troop deployments to Iraq. The bill differs only slightly from one introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that would require congressional authorization before any money could be spent on additional troops. House Democrats introduced several other measures, most of which were in line with the growing consensus that Congress should demand the right of reauthorization.

House Republicans countered with a bill to block the cutoff of any funds that would affect troops in the field, while Senate GOP leaders neared completion of their own resolution calling the Iraq war part of the "global struggle" against terrorism and saying the president's new policy will ensure victory in Iraq.

Senate Plans Vote Against Troop Surge (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Senators introduced a resolution yesterday disapproving of President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, setting up a confrontation with the White House, which warned that those who vote for it will face charges that they don't support the troops.

DOJ_NMG_0118289

The resolution -- written by the top Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees and Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska -- has no binding effect on Mr. Bush, but the authors said they hope an overwhelming vote will prove the president lacks the support to move forward.

"This resolution will give every senator a chance to say where he or she stands on the president's plan," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and Foreign Relations chairman. "The single and most effective way to get him to change course is to demonstrate that his policy has waning or no support from both parties."

The White House pleaded for lawmakers to take more time, study the president's plan and ask more questions.

Mr. Bush last week proposed sending more than 17,000 additional soldiers to Baghdad to help Iraqi troops stem sectarian violence and 4,000 more Marines to Anbar province to fight al Qaeda. He said Iraqi officials have promised more troops of their own and have pledged not to interfere as the U.S. and Iraqi forces go after politically sensitive targets.

The president's spokesman, Tony Snow, said yesterday that Mr. Bush is going to forge ahead with his plan and said members of Congress should be wary of how their opposition will affect the troops.

"Think about what message resolutions would send," Mr. Snow said. He said he will not be the judge of what does or does not support the troops, but said, "It is a question that those are talking about these resolutions will have to answer to themselves and to the public."

Some House and Senate Republicans skeptical of Mr. Bush's proposal went to the White House yesterday to hear the administration's case, while Vice President Dick Cheney met with Republican senators on Capitol Hill. Now Republican leaders are trying to craft a unified position.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, emerged from the meeting with the vice president to tell reporters that Republican senators unanimously support "fair procedures" for voting on the new resolution. It was a stance far short of the nearly full support they've shown the White House on the war during the past four years.

In the House, Rep. Sam Johnson, Texas Republican, offered a bill to ensure that Congress does not cut off or restrict funding for troops in a combat zone such as Iraq, and Republican House leaders urged support.

But opposition to Mr. Bush's plan is firming up.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, Maine Republican, announced her support for the Senate resolution opposing the troop surge, and Sen. Sam Brownback said sending more troops to the region is a bad idea.

The Kansas Republican who has long been supportive of Mr. Bush and is now considering a White House run, said he's "been committed to a free, safe and secure Iraq from the very beginning."

But after a visit to the front lines last week, he said he "found less reason for optimism."

"Sunni leaders blame everything on the Shi'a. Shi'a leaders, likewise, blame everything on the Sunnis. The Kurdish leadership pointed out that the Sunni and Shi'a only meet when the Kurds call the meeting," he said in a speech on the Senate floor.

Even more frustrating, he said: "All of this suggests that at the present time, the United States cares more about a peaceful Iraq than the Iraqis do. If that is the case, it is difficult to understand why more U.S. troops would make a difference."

Also back from a trip to Iraq was Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat.

"We saw American service men and women performing bravely and magnificently, and we also saw a strategy that is not working," said the likely presidential contender. "I, personally, did not see the kind of tangible evidence of actions that we should be expecting from the Iraqi government."

She, along with fellow Democratic Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, called for more troops to be deployed in Afghanistan.

Meanwhile Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat and another possible 2008 candidate, said he will offer legislation capping the number of troops in Iraq and requiring the president to get congressional approval before adding more.

But Mr. Snow said that would "bind the hands of the commander in chief."

"To tie one's hand in a time of war is a pretty extreme move," he said.

GOP Struggles For War Unity (RC)

By John Stanton And Susan Davis

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Even as a bipartisan group of Senators unveiled a nonbinding resolution Wednesday opposing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 soldiers, Republican leaders were fighting a losing battle to maintain a unified front in support of the White House and were hunkering down for what could be a months-long political storm over the Iraq War.

The tensions among Congressional Republicans spilled into the public Wednesday during a press conference by Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Joseph Biden (D-Del.) to unveil the bipartisan "surge" resolution. Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) endorsed the resolution later in the day.

DOJ_NMG_0118290

But as the lawmakers were detailing the proposal, the office of Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) sent out a blistering press release accusing the sponsors of playing politics with the Iraq issue and questioning the seriousness of proposing a nonbinding resolution.

Hagel, a Vietnam veteran, bristled at the charges. "To somehow come to the conclusion that it's a 'lack of seriousness,' I'm a little befuddled by the Senator from Texas," Hagel said, adding that those who "question the motivation of someone who challenges the president ... need a little more schooling on this business."

At the same time, Senate Democrats appear to be preparing for the second phase of the fight over Bush's surge proposal that will start when the White House makes its formal budget pitch later this year.

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) broached the topic during his party's weekly policy luncheon Wednesday, highlighting the administration's $1 billion Iraqi economic reconstruction plan as a potentially plum target for Democrats.

During his presentation of recent polling data on various aspects of the troop surge, Durbin highlighted the fact that in recent polls the Iraqi economic stimulus package is opposed by overwhelming majorities of Americans — significantly more than the basic troop increase underlying the plan, a source familiar with the presentation said.

A senior Democratic leadership aide said that while it is difficult to know how much opposition the plan would draw until Bush outlines the spending proposal, Democrats will use the Appropriations Committee and other committees with oversight authority to scrutinize it closely.

"Democrats are prepared to give the troops everything they need, but not everything Halliburton and the other contractors want," the aide said.

Senate Republican leaders emerged from their weekly luncheon — which included an appearance by Vice President Cheney — with a Conference deeply divided over the surge proposal.

Despite lobbying from President Bush, Cheney and other top administration officials, GOP leadership aides said their party is too fractured on Iraq for a unified position. One aide said that while GOP leaders will engage Democrats on the issue, the divisions are so deep that it is unlikely major pressure will be brought to bear on wayward Republicans.

"At some point twisting arms has the opposite effect. You don't want to go around pissing off the [Ohio Republican Sen. George] Voinoviches of the world," the aide said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) did not directly address his party's divisions, but he told reporters Wednesday that Republicans would go into the Iraq debate unified around a demand for "a fair process that gives us several different votes."

Senate Republicans, unlike the Democrats, are not planning a major public relations push on Iraq, although McConnell and his leadership team will coordinate floor speeches and other messaging activities.

Instead, Republicans are discussing proposing a series of amendments or alternative resolutions during the Iraq debate, which will not start until the end of next week at the earliest.

"There's a lot of interest in trying to widen the net and bring more people into the resolution. ... The idea was to bring a broad cross-section of people in on a bipartisan basis," Cornyn said about GOP efforts to present an alternative Iraq resolution.

When asked if the Republican alternative would be supportive of Bush's plan, Cornyn said the resolution instead would be "broadly supportive of not giving up in Iraq."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said Republicans would be looking to put Democrats on record on some of the more controversial proposals their Members have floated. "We may want Democrats to vote on some of the things they say they're for," said Lott, who mentioned Biden's plan to partition Iraq as one of the issues Republicans might seek a vote on.

Another option under consideration would be to propose an amendment or resolution defunding troops, which would surely be defeated, allowing Republicans to "say 'Look, even Democrats say it's a bad idea,'" a GOP aide said.

In the House, Republican leaders have yet to coalesce around a single strategy to respond to the Democratic resolution expected on the House floor in the coming weeks.

"The issue of war is a delicate one," Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) conceded Wednesday, as he called for full Congressional hearings on the president's strategy.

The House GOP leadership made its first offensive effort on Iraq on Wednesday as they rallied behind a piece of legislation by Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas), a popular Member and Vietnam War veteran, that would prevent Congress from restricting funds for U.S. military forces in the field.

However, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and leading House Democrats have repeatedly said they will make no moves to cut money from troops already on the ground.

Yet Republicans are using the legislation as a counter-punch to the expected Democratic resolution that will serve as a referendum on Bush's plan for Iraq,

DOJ_NMG_0118291

House GOP leaders cast the resolution as meaningless because it is nonbinding and has no force of law. On Tuesday, Boehner called such resolutions "just more political rhetoric" that "means nothing." GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) called the move a "legislative fig leaf," and House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) questioned whether such votes are a matter of conscience because he viewed it as a political document.

But on Wednesday, Republican leaders rallied behind Johnson's bill and made a pointed effort to make it a piece of legislation rather than a resolution. Johnson's bill is unlikely to make it to the House floor.

"Mr. Johnson introduced a bill, not just a Sense of the Congress resolution to bind the House to a firm funding commitment for our troops," said Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Boehner. "The debate and vote on the Johnson bill will come with consequences rather than empty political rhetoric."

In a separate attempt to build consensus, Republican Policy Committee Chairman Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.) has led a number of "listening sessions" with rank-and-file Members along with Putnam.

McCotter said Wednesday that approximately 60 Members have attended the sessions and more could be scheduled this week. He acknowledged that Members' views are spread across the spectrum on Iraq.

"It's very heartening in the sense that our Members are conscientiously dealing with the issue," McCotter said. "Our Members are unified in that we don't want this to be viewed as a political situation, it's a national situation."

Bush has been meeting with lawmakers this week to continue to build support for his strategy. Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), an Air Force veteran, said Wednesday that she is undecided on the resolution. Wilson was one of a group of Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee scheduled to meet with Bush on Wednesday afternoon to discuss Iraq. Wilson also noted that Republicans are overwhelmingly united in opposing any legislative effort to starve funds from U.S. military forces on the ground.

A House vote on a resolution is not expected until after the president's State of the Union address next Tuesday, and more likely toward the end of the month.

Emily Pierce contributed to this report.

The GOP In A Quagmire (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The sense of impending political doom that clutches Republican hearts one week after President Bush presented his new strategy on Iraq to the nation is stoked by the alarming intelligence brought back from Baghdad by Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota and passed around Capitol Hill.

In a pre-Christmas visit to Iraq, Coleman and Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida met with Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the Iraqi government's national security adviser. Coleman described their astounding encounter in a Dec. 19 blog entry: Dr. Rubaie "maintains that the major challenge facing Iraq is not a sectarian conflict, but rather al-Qaeda and disgruntled Baathists seeking to regain power. Both Senator Nelson and I react with incredulity to that assessment. Rubaie cautions against more troops in Baghdad."

Rubaie denied the overriding reality of sectarian violence in Baghdad because his government is tied to the Shiite belligerents in that conflict. While Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki pays lip service to Bush's demand that he crack down on Mahdi Army commander Moqtada al-Sadr, U.S. officials recognize that Maliki's political support depends on the Shiite militia leader. Thus, Maliki's government is in denial about sectarian conflict. Maliki did not show up for a news conference in which he was scheduled to comment on Bush's new strategy, and he personally remains silent about the plan at this writing.

This hastens the desire of Republicans, who once cheered the Bush Doctrine in the Middle East, to remove U.S. forces from a politically deteriorating condition as soon as possible. "Iraq is a black hole for the Republican Party," a prominent party strategist told me this week. What makes his comments so important is that he is not a maverick Republican in Congress but one of Bush's principal political advisers.

As they adjust to the 2006 election returns, Republicans recognize that this was no isolated bump in the road. The loss of about 320 state legislative seats across the country to the Democrats classifies last year's election as a midrange electoral disaster.

The internal Republican debate concerns how much Iraq contributed to this outcome. The White House and Republican members of Congress who voted for intervention in Iraq contend that many issues led to their defeat: incompetent management of the Hurricane Katrina crisis, widespread cases of corruption and abandonment of spending restraint. But Republicans at the grass roots tell me that Iraq was the central problem and must be erased as an issue.

DOJ_NMG_0118292

Former Maryland governor Robert Ehrlich, a popular and effective Republican who had nothing to do with Iraq policy, believes his defeat was wholly caused by the war. Republicans in a variety of states -- such as Maryland, New Hampshire, Oregon and Missouri -- blame defeats, down to the local level, on Iraq.

One nationally prominent Republican pollster reported confidentially on Capitol Hill after the president's speech that if at the end of the year U.S. troops are still in Iraq and U.S. blood is still being spilled there, the GOP disaster in 2008 will eclipse 2006. Thus, many Republican members of Congress have tied their hopes to Bush's pledge that Iraqi forces will take over local security by September.

But Republican opposition has intensified rather than diminished since the president's speech. What was whispered privately is now declared publicly. At last week's hearing, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's second-ranking Republican -- Chuck Hagel -- called Bush's new strategy "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

The conservative elite of the House of Representatives, members who had 100 percent positive voting records as measured by the American Conservative Union, gathered Wednesday morning for an ACU breakfast on Capitol Hill. They still talked about "winning" in Iraq and deplored the consequences of "surrendering."

But they do not know how that victory can be achieved if the Iraqi government is tied to the Shiite militias, a political dilemma in Iraq that no increase in U.S. troops can solve. Republicans can only hope that Democratic House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her sidekick, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, overplay their hands by cutting off funds to U.S. troops in the field. It is a slim hope for now.

Senators Introduce Resolution Opposing More Troops For Iraq (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - Four leading senators - two Democrats and two Republicans - introduced a resolution Wednesday that says President Bush's plan to add 21,500 American troops in Iraq isn't in the United States' national interests.

The resolution, effectively a vote of no confidence in Bush's plan, also calls for more regional and international pressure on Iraqi politicians to make compromises and end rampant killings.

The resolution, sponsored by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del.; Carl Levin, D-Mich.; Chuck Hagel, R-Neb.; and Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, is the leading tool that congressional opponents of Bush's war plan are using to persuade him to change course. Democrats consider it their best chance to attract broad backing from members of both parties.

Other Democrats are floating tougher plans.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., announced Wednesday that she'd support the resolution but also planned to propose a cap on U.S. troop deployments in Iraq at Jan. 1 levels and a funding cut for Iraqi forces unless Iraq's government takes steps to end the violence.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., introduced a plan that would require a new congressional authorization for the war. Dodd argued that the 2002 authorization was obsolete because the reasons given for the war then are obsolete, as weapons of mass destruction never were found and dictator Saddam Hussein is now dead.

The no-confidence resolution wouldn't have the force of law, but Biden argued that it was important nonetheless.

"I believe that when a president goes way off course on something as important as Iraq, the single most effective way to get him to change course is to demonstrate that his policy has waning or no support from both parties," Biden said.

Hagel called Iraq "one of the most challenging issues that has ever faced our country," and said a national debate was needed to find agreement on a new strategy.

"No one wants to see this country humiliated, defeated or lose its purpose," said Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and possible Republican presidential contender in 2008 who has been a longtime critic of the war.

The resolution doesn't assign blame for the war and doesn't venture into some of the thorny specifics of how to proceed.

For example, it doesn't address the timing of a U.S. withdrawal. Instead, it says the United States should turn over responsibility for security to the Iraqis "under an appropriately expedited timeline."

It calls for regional and international support for a peace process for Iraq, but doesn't specify which nations should be involved. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has rejected talks with Iran and Syria.

Biden said he would present the resolution to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which he chairs, on Thursday for debate. The committee probably will vote on it after the president's State of the Union speech next Tuesday night. The House of Representatives plans to let the Senate go first, then consider a similar resolution.

Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida, a member of the House Republican leadership, criticized the Democrats' tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0118293

"House Democrats continue to be divided over the war in Iraq. Now in the majority, they wish to wait on the Senate before coming forward with a resolution opposing the president's plan, which allows them to debate amongst themselves over which course of cut-and-run they support," he said in a statement.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said he opposed Bush's troop increase and might support the no-confidence resolution if some of the language were changed. Coleman was among a group of Republican senators who met Wednesday at the White House with national security adviser Stephen Hadley.

"A lot of us talked. He took notes," Coleman said. "The bottom line is that I went in there with a lot of concerns. I left with a lot of concerns. ... There was very little mind changing that went on."

Separately, Democratic Reps. Barbara Lee, Lynn Woolsey and Maxine Waters of California announced a bill that calls for withdrawing all American forces in six months, more money for Iraqi forces and a ban on permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq.

Margaret Talev contributed to this report.

White House: Capping Iraq Troop Levels Would Be "Extreme" (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--Capping the number of troops in Iraq, as Sen. Hillary Clinton proposed Wednesday, would be a "pretty extreme move" that weakens President George W. Bush's ability to address the situation there, the White House said.

Fresh off a trip to Iraq, the New York Democrat suggested the U.S. boost the number of U.S. forces in Afghanistan and cap the number in Iraq. Clinton - who is against Bush's new strategy of injecting 21,500 additional troops into Iraq - also said she's in favor of redeploying troops out of Baghdad and eventually all of Iraq.

"The idea of placing a cap on troops... what it does is something that no commander in chief, I think, would want to have, which is it binds the hands of the commander in chief and also the generals and, frankly, also the troops on the ground in terms of responding to situations and contingencies that may occur there," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

"To tie one's hand in a time of war is a pretty extreme move."

The spokesman said Clinton's proposal on redeployment would raise the risk of "fast failure" by damaging security in Baghdad.

"The other thing is it raises the question in terms of the Iraqis -- will they take us at our word when we say we support them? And will it in fact make it easier for suitors, whether they be Iranians or al-Qaida members, to say, well, look, you can count on us," Snow said.

A trio of senators, including Republican Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have unveiled a resolution opposing Bush's new Iraq strategy. Bush is meeting with House Republicans at the White House later Wednesday, a group of lawmakers that Snow said is mostly skeptical of the administration's Iraq plans.

Snow said some lawmakers haven't had a chance to evaluate Bush's plan, and actually agree with the president in some critical areas. Like Clinton, Bush supports putting conditions on the Iraqi government before giving more economic aid.

"The president made it very clear that the American public has limited patience when it come to Iraq, and we do expect to see things happening," Snow said. "We understand that despite the conditions of violence, it's important to go ahead and continue on the political track, where it's possible."

Sen. Clinton Keeps Pace With Public Opinion Against Iraq War (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Last year, liberal Democratic activists booed, hissed and heckled Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) as she reiterated her firm opposition to setting a date for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq.

But now, fresh from her third trip to Iraq, Clinton has launched a public relations blitz, emphatically declaring her opposition to President Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops and calling for American forces to begin leaving Baghdad.

For Clinton, widely considered to be at the top of the list of potential Democratic presidential nominees in 2008, the conflict in Iraq is proving to be a tightrope walk of the highest order. She is trying to keep pace with public opinion against the war.

She's contending with likely Democratic opponents, such as Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, eager to outflank her. But she's also working to preserve her credibility on military matters for the general election.

DOJ_NMG_0118294

Meanwhile, Democratic senators and Republicans Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine introduced a symbolic, non-binding resolution Wednesday opposing the increase in U.S. troops in Iraq and America's deepening military involvement there. It is a tack that Clinton said she supports.

"What I came away with is a strong opposition to the president's plan for escalation," Clinton said on National Public Radio Wednesday morning following an appearance on NBC's "Today Show." "Instead, I would like to see us cap the number of American troops in Iraq at the level we had as of Jan. 1, and begin to deploy them out of Baghdad and eventually out of Iraq." There now are about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

In that same interview, Clinton pointedly refused to answer the question of whether Obama, who on Tuesday established a presidential exploratory committee, was qualified to be president. She insisted that was an issue for voters to decide.

Of all the Democratic candidates for president, none has struck a more hawkish stance than Clinton, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. She voted for the resolution to go to war in Iraq and has resisted calls to leave precipitously. Now that position is decidedly out of sync with most Democrats.

Meanwhile, her likely opponents in the Democratic field have either renounced their earlier support for the war, or, like Obama, have noted longstanding opposition.

A spokesman for Obama, Robert Gibbs, declined to comment on Clinton's position on the war, but pointedly noted that Obama never supported the war in the first place. Obama was an Illinois state senator when Congress voted in 2002 to authorize military action against Iraq.

"Barack Obama is proud that he's been a consistent opponent against this war," Gibbs said. "And that the critique that he gave in 2002 as to why this was a bad idea and what would happen in its aftermath has sadly become true. As a United States senator, he's frustrated that we are dealing with an open-ended commitment of authority that was given to the president that should never (have) been given."

A strategist for a rival Democratic campaign accused Clinton of being "trapped by gender" in needing to appear tough enough to govern, in the mold of Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, or India Prime Minister Indira Gandhi.

"She and her campaign understandably have been obsessed with preserving her general election viability," said the strategist, who would speak only on the condition of anonymity. "They understand that a liberal dovish woman is not about to be elected president in a post-9/11 America. So they find themselves trailing public opinion on the war, badly trailing Democratic primary opinion on the war and just hoping the left gives her a pass."

Friends and supporters of Clinton, however, point out that she has been consistent in her own way, criticizing the poor execution of the war and the lack of post-war planning and pressing for the ouster of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"She's been clear about that," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), a former high-ranking aide to President Bill Clinton.

And those who know her scoff at the notion that Clinton is trying too hard to be tough because of her gender.

"She just doesn't project a sense of weakness," said Paul Begala, another former Clinton White House official. "I think generally where she is, is where Americans are. There's always going to be people to the left of you and to the right of you, so you just have to decide what's best and be true to that."

However, Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, said every candidate for president must demonstrate a capacity to be commander-in-chief, including Clinton.

"Since no other woman has been commander-in-chief, any woman who aspires to that and is the first woman to run for that, is going to have to answer the unspoken question," Mandel said. "It's there, in the air, it hovers and has to be taken into account."

Of greater concern for Clinton, perhaps, is a lack of enthusiasm among liberal, grassroots activists who play a pivotal role in the Democratic primary process.

"I think it's because the grassroots of the party has been critical of the war from the beginning and thought she was slow to come to the realization that we were on the wrong track," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, where Clinton was booed last year.

Tom Matzzie, the Washington director for MoveOn.Org, said voters will reward candidates who are working to get the nation out of Iraq—not just opposing the increase in troops.

"If people think that she's not being genuine in her advocacy, then that's a problem for her," he said. "Right now I think she's making a good step forward, but she needs to do more. Not just how she's trying to stop the escalation, but how we're going to get out."

DOJ_NMG_0118295

At a jam-packed news conference on Capitol Hill Wednesday, Clinton described the Bush administration's priorities as "upside down." She criticized the president for providing an "open-ended presence" of U.S. troops in Iraq. And she called for fewer American soldiers in Iraq and more in Afghanistan.

Clinton also said she would introduce legislation to cap the number of troops in Iraq and require the administration to get congressional authorization to send any additional troops there, similar to a measure announced by Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.), another candidate for the presidential nomination.

Further, Clinton's bill would impose conditions for the continued funding of Iraqi security forces and the private contractors working for the Iraqis.

"We could demonstrate your failure to do X, Y, and Z leads to these consequences," she said. "And that's why I am arguing that in the first instance we link the consequences to funding for Iraqi security forces, including the private contractors, because I think nothing short of that will concentrate the mind and attention of the Iraqi leadership."

Clinton insisted that she's been entirely consistent on Iraq policy for the last year and a half as she voted for resolutions calling for a phased redeployment without specific deadlines.

And yet, when pushed during an interview last month, Clinton grudgingly acknowledged a small sense of regret about her 2002 vote authorizing the invasion.

"Obviously, if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way," Clinton said during a December appearance on the "Today Show."

Hillary Clinton Opposes Buildup (LAT)

By Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Newly returned from a fact-finding trip to Iraq and under growing pressure from antiwar Democrats as she weighs entering the 2008 presidential race, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called Wednesday for a cap on the number of U.S. troops stationed in the war zone.

The New York senator's proposal to freeze troop levels faces dubious prospects in a divided Congress and was quickly spurned by the White House. But the political urge to weigh in against President Bush's "surge" of military personnel to Iraq appeared irresistible. Even as Clinton unveiled her plan, two of her possible presidential rivals — Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, (D-Conn.) — announced their own troop cap proposals.

Accusing the Bush administration of a "failed strategy" in Iraq, Clinton said she wanted to freeze the number of U.S. military personnel in Iraq as of Jan. 1, before President Bush announced a planned increase of 21,500 troops to help patrol strife-racked Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

"The president is sending mixed signals. We need to change course," Clinton said.

The New York senator also said she would introduce legislation that would limit funds for Iraqi security forces if they failed to take an effective role in quelling internecine violence between Shiite and Sunni factions. At the same time, Clinton called for more U.S. troops in Afghanistan to ward against a feared Taliban offensive and voiced concern that some "surge" forces in Iraq would be siphoned off from Afghan units.

Clinton did not elaborate on how Congress could impose a troop cap, an action that probably would be complicated by the rapid moves already made by the administration to set its troop increase in motion. And she acknowledged the dim prospects of nudging a troop cap through Congress despite the slim Democratic majority.

"We're all going to try to do whatever we can" to pressure the administration, she said. "But I can count," Clinton added, referring to the deepening divisions over the war between the two parties.

As she explained her nuanced new stance, Clinton appeared to carefully navigate between the urge to hone her antiwar credentials while protecting her flank from White House attacks that she was not supporting U.S. troops. Even as she insisted she would press for a "phased redeployment" from Iraq, she was unwilling to name a target date for completing a military pullout.

"I'm not going to support a specific deadline," she said. "We still have vital national security interests in Iraq."

Clinton's careful posturing did not impress the White House. In remarks during his daily briefing, White House spokesman Tony Snow said her proposed troop cap was "a pretty extreme move" that would "bind the hands of the commander in chief and also the generals, and frankly, also, the troops on the ground."

The liberal advocacy group MoveOn.org, also weighed in Wednesday, urging Clinton to take a stronger stance against the Iraq call-up.

Clinton's vote in 2002 to authorize the Bush administration's war in Iraq has long been a sore point among war critics and could be an Achilles heel in the 2008 presidential race. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who has already announced his intention to run in 2008 and publicly recanted his 2002 vote for the Iraq war authorization, appeared at a church in Harlem over the weekend and warned Democratic legislators: "It is no longer OK to study your options and keep your own private counsel. Silence is betrayal. Speak out and stop this escalation now."

DOJ_NMG_0118296

Clinton's aides, interpreting Edwards' remarks as an attack on her, responded quickly. "In 2004, John Edwards used to constantly brag about running a positive campaign," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson. "He has unfortunately chosen to open his campaign with political attacks on Democrats who are fighting the Bush administration's Iraq policy."

Edwards later denied he was talking about Clinton.

While Clinton tied her proposed troop cap to the Jan. 1 military presence in Iraq, Dodd introduced a measure Wednesday that would simply cap the number of troops at roughly 130,000. Congress should vote directly on Bush's plan to send additional troops to the country, added Dodd, who announced last week that he would run for the presidency in 2008.

Obama, who said Tuesday that he had formed an exploratory committee for a presidential run, said Wednesday in a statement that he would also introduce a bill to press for a troop cap and a "phased redeployment I called for two months ago."

stephen.braun@latimes.com

Senator Clinton Calls Bush Plan 'a Losing Strategy' (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — Fresh from a weekend trip to Iraq, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton this morning intensified her opposition to President Bush's new plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Baghdad, calling it "a losing strategy" and a "very bad mission" and proposing new limits and conditions on the overall war effort.

In laying out her latest set of positions and talking points on Iraq during appearances on the NBC and CBS morning shows, and on National Public Radio, Mrs. Clinton — a likely candidate for president in 2008 — did not call for a fixed deadline for withdrawing all American forces, saying only that the troops should leave Iraq "eventually." Nor did she endorse blocking money for the new troop deployment. Those two positions are favored by many antiwar Democrats who are expected to be a force in the presidential primaries, and by at least one likely rival in 2008, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

Instead, Mrs. Clinton called for capping the number of American forces in Iraq to the total number there on Jan. 1 — before Mr. Bush proposed adding forces. That total is roughly 140,000. She also proposed making a new threat to Iraqi government leaders to force their cooperation: the loss of American funds to train and equip Iraqi forces, rebuild the economy, and, to make the pressure more acute, to provide security for the leaders themselves.

Mrs. Clinton did not outline benchmarks for that progress, but she indicated that the Shiite-led government would be expected to crack down on sectarian militias in Baghdad and elsewhere and to find new ways to work with Sunni political groups.

She also called for sending more troops to support the American military mission in Afghanistan, which she referred to as "quite a success story." And she opposed any shift of forces out of Afghanistan as part of the troop expansion in Iraq.

Yet when it came to a threshold political issue for many Democrats — the end of the American military effort in Iraq — Senator Clinton did not embrace an instant withdrawal or a specific timetable for doing so.

"I'm for redeploying our troops out of Baghdad and eventually out of Iraq so we can make sure that they're not in the midst of a civil war," she said on CBS's "Early Show."

Mrs. Clinton's appearances on the morning shows had the effect of cutting into some of the coverage of Tuesday's announcement by Senator Barack Obama of Illinois that he would run for president. Clinton advisers said that she was not trying to upstage Mr. Obama; rather, her trip to Iraq on Saturday was always intended to bolster a new set of statements by Mrs. Clinton about the war, and she used network television and public radio this morning to try to speak directly to as many people as possible.

After her stop in Iraq, Senator Clinton visited American troops in Afghanistan and Germany before returning on Monday. She delayed a new conference on Tuesday after a member of her delegation, Representative John McHugh, a Republican from New York, took ill. That news conference is now scheduled for this afternoon.

Mrs. Clinton, who met with American commanders and Iraqi officials during her visit to Baghdad, said she received "lip service" during her meeting with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal Al-Maliki.

"This is clearly an abdication of responsibility by this government — we need some leverage on them," Senator Clinton said on CBS.

"Enough of the talk," she added, noting that Americans were protecting Iraqi leaders and training Iraqi troops yet reaping no rewards. "Let's just say, we're not going to do that anymore."

She insisted that sectarian violence would continue in Iraq regardless of whether there were more or fewer troops, because the Iraqi government was not committed to the mission.

DOJ_NMG_0118297

"They're waiting us out," she said on NBC's "Today" show. "They intend to do everything they can to impose a particular brand of dominance over the Sunnis, and there's no reason for the Sunni insurgency therefore to stop."

Senator Clinton also said on NBC that Congress had limited ability to block the president's troop plan outright.

"The president has enormous authority under our constitutional system to do exactly what he's doing," Mrs. Clinton said. "He already has the money appropriated in the budget."

She said she was troubled that the Bush administration seemed willing to shift troops from Afghanistan to take part in a "losing strategy" in Iraq; a moment later, she expressed concern about sending more troops "to Iraq on this very bad mission."

Mrs. Clinton was asked about her presidential plans on both NBC and CBS, and declined to say anything about her thinking or timetable. She was also asked about the decision by Senator Obama to form a presidential exploratory committee. He is expected to formally announced for the presidency in Springfield, Ill., on Feb. 10.

Mrs. Clinton avoided making any pointed criticisms of Mr. Obama, but, on CBS, she did make a glancing reference to the importance of experience. Mr. Obama has served in the United States Senate for just over two years; he was an Illinois state senator and a law professor before that.

"I'm looking forward to a spirited and substantive debate about issues, about goals, about aspirations, about experience, about the kinds of things that voters will be interested in," Mrs. Clinton said.

Clinton Steps Up Criticism Of War In Iraq (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) offered her harshest assessment to date of President Bush's Iraq war strategy yesterday, continuing her steady evolution from one of the war's staunchest supporters to one of the administration's most prominent critics.

Clinton's stepped-up criticism came as she nears an announcement of her plans for a likely 2008 presidential campaign and during a period of increased antiwar activity in the Democratic Party aimed at blocking Bush's proposal to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Her long support for the war and past reluctance to break more significantly with the administration have left her at odds with many liberal activists, who will play an influential role in the Democratic nomination battle. Yesterday, she stopped short of embracing a timetable for withdrawing troops from the conflict, an idea many activists support.

Just returned from a weekend visit to Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan, Clinton said Bush's new proposal threatens the missions in Iraq, where she said more troops are not the answer, and in Afghanistan, where she said additional troops are badly needed. "The president's team is pursuing a failed strategy in Iraq as it edges closer to collapse, and Afghanistan needs more of our concerted effort and attention," she said.

Clinton said that she supports a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's plan but that she would go further by introducing legislation to limit the number of U.S. forces in Iraq at their levels of Jan. 1, while establishing conditions for the Iraqi government that, if not met, would result in cuts in funding for Iraqi security forces.

More significant, she said the legislation would establish conditions for the U.S. government as well, such as certifying that the Iraqi government had disarmed the sectarian militias and made constitutional changes to ensure rights for all ethnic minorities, as well as requiring participating in diplomatic activities with Iraq's neighbors.

If those conditions are not met, the legislation would require a congressional resolution authorizing the mission in Iraq. That could take away from the administration the authority that Congress granted in October 2002 that led to the invasion and that was supported by many Democrats, including Clinton.

That resolution haunted her politically as public support for the war began to erode, particularly among Democrats. As other Democrats recanted their support for the resolution -- including Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.) -- she resisted.

That put her on a twisting path that moved her slowly away from the vote and that finally led her a month ago to say that, knowing what she knows now, she would not have voted for the resolution. But unlike Edwards, who is an announced candidate for president, and Kerry, who may run, she has not apologized for that decision.

Clinton sought high-profile forums yesterday to deliver her gloomy assessment of conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan and to rail against an administration that she said has been unwilling to embrace the kind of change in strategy that could improve the situation.

She appeared on morning television programs, did an interview with National Public Radio and spoke at a joint news conference with Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.), who traveled with her to the region. The conference drew an overflow crowd of reporters to the Senate Radio-TV gallery in the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0118298

Her appearances shifted some of the spotlight away from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who formed his presidential exploratory committee on Tuesday to enormous media attention.

Clinton was particularly harsh in her critique of the Iraqi government. She met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki over the weekend and is pessimistic that he will do what is necessary to bring order to Baghdad. "The Iraqi government is not committed to taking the steps both militarily and politically that would help them to gain control over Baghdad and other places in the country," she said on NBC's "Today Show."

The Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), recently proposed removing virtually all combat forces from Iraq by early next year. Clinton praised the report when it was issued late last year, saying, "I hope the White House takes the recommendations seriously."

Yesterday she said she does not agree with the group's proposed timetable for troop withdrawal. "I don't think you can pull out one of their recommendations and just look at that in isolation," she said. "I think the Iraq Study Group gave us a very good blueprint for what needs to be done in Iraq, but you have to look at it comprehensively."

Clinton drew responses yesterday from the White House and her party's liberal wing. White House press secretary Tony Snow called the proposal to limit U.S. forces "a pretty extreme move" that would tie the president's hands during a time of war. Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org, which has been pushing to block the new troop deployments, challenged Clinton to follow through. "A key test is how any senator puts words into action," he said in a statement.

Sen. Clinton Calls For Troop Cap In Iraq (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a potential presidential candidate, on Wednesday called for capping the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and linking funds for Iraqi security forces to the government's control of the violence-plagued nation.

Back from a weekend trip to Iraq and Afghanistan, the New York senator also called for increasing U.S. forces in Afghanistan, arguing more troops are necessary as Taliban forces are waiting to attack when weather permits.

Clinton was quick to seize the spotlight the day after Illinois Sen. Barack Obama took a major step toward entering the 2008 race. She made a round of appearances on network television and radio and participated in a Capitol Hill news conference.

Clinton said she would offer legislation that would not cut funding to U.S. troops, as some lawmakers want, but would, after a six-month time period, cut off money for Iraqi troops.

She said cutting off funds for security forces and private security contractors who guard many Iraqi leaders would show the U.S. government is serious about imposing "real world consequences" to failing to reduce the sectarian conflict killing tens of thousands civilians a year.

"I do not support cutting funding for American troops, but I do support cutting funding for Iraqi forces if the Iraqi government does not meet set conditions," Clinton said, appearing at a news conference with the two lawmakers who traveled with her to Iraq and Afghanistan, Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., and Rep. John McHugh, R-N.Y.

Clinton argued the Bush administration has failed to put any real pressure on Iraqi leaders at the same time the president is escalating the U.S. commitment there by sending 21,500 more troops.

"I think we will eventually have to move to tougher requirements on the administration to get their attention," said Clinton, arguing that she wanted "a change of course, not adding more troops pursuing a strategy that under present circumstances, cannot be successful."

More than 130,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed Clinton's proposal.

"The idea of placing a cap on troops — what it does is something that no commander in chief would want to have, which is it binds the hands of the commander in chief and also the generals and frankly also the troops on the ground," Snow said.

Clinton's bill would, if Iraqis cannot show progress after six months, require Bush to get congressional authority for any additional troops in Iraq.

Even as she jousts with the White House, Clinton also is feeling heat from Democratic rivals, due largely to her position as the presumptive front-runner in a presidential race she has yet to enter.

On Wednesday, Obama called Iraq troop escalation "a terrible consequence of the decision to give him the broad, open-ended authority to wage this war in 2002," an indirect shot at the voting record of Clinton and other Democrats.

Obama did say he favors a cap of U.S. troop levels in Iraq and the phased redeployment of troops, both of which Clinton support.

DOJ_NMG_0118299

In a statement, Tom Mattzie of the liberal group MoveOn.org said they would like Clinton to "use her powers as a senator to stop the escalation and move toward a redeployment. A key test is how any senator puts words into action. We would welcome her future leadership."

Clinton and Bayh sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates Wednesday calling for an increase in Afghanistan of two or possibly three infantry battalions, some 2,300 troops.

"Unlike in Iraq," the senators wrote, "we have a government in Afghanistan committed to promoting national interests over sectarian ones, is making tangible progress in governance, sincerely wants more U.S. help, and is fighting the enemy that brought us Sept. 11."

The Dems' Antiwar Shuffle (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

A MONTH AGO, the contest between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination was shaping up as a battle of the "firsts." Would Democrats rally 'round Clinton because she would be the first female president? Or Obama because he would be the first African American in the White House? This week, the faceoff between the two senators — not the party's only would-be nominees but certainly the most talked about — shifted from identity politics to Iraqi politics. That's not necessarily an improvement.

On Tuesday, as Obama was launching his 2008 exploratory committee, supporters of the freshman senator from Illinois were publicizing a website called obamawasright.com. Visitors to the site are reminded that Obama in 2002 called a war to topple Saddam Hussein "dumb" and "rash." Next to a picture of Clinton, who voted to authorize the war, is her statement in 2002 that "it is clear … that if left unchecked, Saddam Hussein will continue to increase his capacity to wage biological and chemical warfare, and will keep trying to develop nuclear weapons." Take that, Hillary.

But she isn't taking it. On Wednesday, freshly returned from Afghanistan and Iraq, Clinton recalibrated her position on the war. She announced that she will support a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's planned surge of 21,500 troops to Iraq, as will many other congressional Democrats and some Republicans. The senator from New York also unveiled legislation to cap U.S. forces at Jan. 1, 2007, levels, though she indicated that she wouldn't vote to cut off funding for troops on the ground. (In Afghanistan, by contrast, Clinton proposed an increase in U.S. forces.)

Yes, Clinton has a political need for an orderly retreat from her earlier pro-war stance. But this is an ill-advised approach. As she herself has conceded, the Bush administration already has the necessary appropriations in hand to implement the surge in Iraq. Moreover, even some Democrats see constitutional problems in congressional micromanagement of troop deployments.

Still, Clinton is being forced to burnish her antiwar credentials against a contender who has the luxury of not having been in the Senate in 2002. And so, like many of her fellow Democratic senators, she is scrambling to get on what her party's primary voters deem the right side of history.

For Bush, the evolution in Clinton's position is another reminder that, in his own words, Americans' patience with the Iraqi government "is not unlimited" and that the surge must be a final effort to stabilize Iraq, not "stay the course" under another name. For Democrats, Clinton's dialing-up of her opposition to the war may mean that they will have to choose between her and other would-be nominees — Obama included — on other grounds. That could be a positive development.

Presidential Aspirants Assail Plan For Iraq Buildup (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday led a parade of potential 2008 presidential candidates — including two Republicans — in blasting President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq.

Clinton, D-N.Y.,who has been criticized on the war by liberals in her own party, announced that she'll support a resolution disapproving of Bush's policy and will introduce legislation designed to keep troop levels in Iraq from going up. In her first detailed comments on the president's plan since returning from a four-day trip to Iraq and Afghanistan, Clinton said the Bush strategy is "not working."

The maneuvering underscored the deteriorating political situation for the president on Capitol Hill as Bush and Republican congressional leaders scrambled to head off a potentially embarrassing vote of no-confidence on his Iraq policy.

It also heightened the stakes for the State of the Union address that Bush will deliver to Congress on Tuesday. The following day, Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden, D-Del., plans to have the panel vote on a bipartisan resolution that declares Bush's planned increase in troops "not in the national interest."

The measure, which gained the support Wednesday of Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, was co-authored by Biden, Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a Vietnam War combat veteran. "I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy," Hagel said at a news conference to announce the resolution. "I think it's dangerously irresponsible."

DOJ_NMG_0118300

Biden and Hagel have said they are considering running for president in 2008. Other potential presidential candidates who aired misgivings about the president's policy Wednesday:

·Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., announced he'll introduce a bill, similar to Clinton's proposal, to cap troop strength in Iraq at current levels.

·Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who said he returned from a trip to Iraq discouraged about its prospects, observed in a floor speech: "The United States seems to care more about a peaceful Iraq than the Iraqis do. If that is the case, it is difficult to understand why more U.S. troops would make a difference."

·Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said he'd support a cap on troop levels but also would introduce legislation calling for a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq.

Obama's announcement came minutes after Clinton's, intensifying the competition between the two celebrity Democrats. Obama announced this week he's raising money to explore a White House run.

His interest increases pressure on Clinton. The New York senator, the wife of former president Bill Clinton, has not yet declared her intention to run but is the front-runner among Democrats in public opinion polls.

She was booed last summer, however, at a conference of Democratic liberals when she refused to back a definite timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq. Clinton said Wednesday she has not changed her position; she favors a redeployment of U.S. troops but is not willing to put a date on when that should happen. "We do have national security interests in Iraq," she said.

In addition to capping troop levels, Clinton said, she wants to increase troops in Afghanistan and tie U.S. aid to Iraq to certain benchmarks. White House spokesman Tony Snow called Clinton's proposed cap "pretty extreme" because it would "tie one's hand in a time of war."

Bush spent part of Wednesday meeting with Republicans about his Iraq strategy. Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, said the president and his aides spent more time listening to lawmakers' concerns than trying to persuade them to back the plan. Voinovich, still undecided about how he'll vote, said the main accomplishment of the session was to give the president a sense of how much convincing he has to do.

"I think we clarified for them what the reality is," he said.

Dodd Introduces Bill To Cap U.S. Troops In Iraq (WP)

By William Branigin And Howard Schneider

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Senate Democrats today introduced competing measures in opposition to President Bush's planned buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq, with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) seeking a legislative cap on American forces there and a group that includes a leading Republican promoting a nonbinding resolution against the plan.

Dodd introduced legislation to cap the number of troops in Iraq at roughly 130,000, saying that lawmakers should take an up-or-down vote on Bush's plan to send additional troops to the country and not settle for the nonbinding resolution several Senate leaders prefer.

Later, however, Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Carl M. Levin (Mich.) were joined by Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska in putting forward a resolution that describes Bush's troop buildup in Iraq as "not in the national interest of the United States." Hagel, a Vietnam War veteran, is considered a potential GOP presidential candidate in 2008.

"I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy as he outlined it on Wednesday night," Hagel said in a joint news conference on Capitol Hill with Biden and Levin. "I think it is dangerously irresponsible to continue to put American lives in the middle of a clearly defined tribal sectarian civil war."

In a separate news conference this afternoon, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said she would support the nonbinding resolution, but she left open the possibility that she would later back "tougher" congressional action aimed at forcing the administration to change course in Iraq.

"From what I've heard out of the administration thus far, I think we will eventually have to move to tougher requirements on the administration to get their attention," said Clinton, who recently returned from a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq with Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.).

The administration's priorities "are upside down," and more U.S. forces should be sent to Afghanistan instead of Iraq, Clinton said.

DOJ_NMG_0118301

"Rather than an escalation of U.S. troops, which I do not believe will contribute to long-term success in Iraq, we should be beginning a phased redeployment of U.S. troops as a way to put pressure on the Iraqi government to take responsibility for its own security and future," she said.

"We need to change course," said Clinton, who is weighing a 2008 presidential run. "It would be a great irony if the administration's emphasis on escalating our presence in Iraq caused it to ignore the threat facing Afghanistan, where those responsible for planning the September 11 attacks are still our enemies."

White House spokesman Tony Snow denied that Bush is moving U.S. troops from Afghanistan to Iraq.

"That's just not the case," he told a news briefing. "There will not be any direct move [of] just shipping people from one theater of battle to the other."

Dodd, who last week declared his candidacy in the 2008 presidential race, said that "the issues are far too important" for nonbinding measures. "Other than expressing opposition, I felt we should do something more," he said, calling for quick action before any troop increase becomes a fait accompli.

"The president has laid down the gauntlet by saying he is going to go forward and I don't care what you say," said Dodd. He argued that the authorization Congress gave Bush in 2002 to send troops to Iraq, leading to the March 2003 invasion and occupation, did not cover a situation that has since degenerated into a civil war among rival religious, ethnic and political sects.

Dodd announced his proposed legislation on a day when Clinton, in a series of interviews on morning television, endorsed troop limits and a possible cutoff of funds to the Iraqi government if it fails to meet security benchmarks.

Clinton said she supports starting "a phased redeployment out of Baghdad and eventually out of Iraq completely." However, she would not specify whether she would vote to block funding for the additional U.S. troops Bush wants to send to Iraq.

In staking out their positions today, the two probable competitors are likely to intensify debate over how aggressively Congress should challenge Bush's war policy -- and particularly his intent to commit an additional 21,500 troops.

Bush meanwhile called Republican senators to the White House today in an effort to rally support for his plan and dissuade GOP lawmakers from backing any resolutions against the troop buildup. The White House declined to say who was invited but acknowledged that lawmakers are generally skeptical of Bush's plan.

On the House side, Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) came out in support of a bill introduced by Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Tex.) to prevent Congress from restricting funds to troops already in combat. Blunt said any such restrictions would be "a recipe for troop demoralization."

Congress cannot "dictate strategy to the commander-in-chief," and lawmakers' power of the purse "is not to be taken lightly," Blunt said. "I hope Republicans and Democrats can unite behind the message that we support our troops in the field, and we will not cut their funding while they carry out their mission far away from their families and loved ones."

Unveiled in a nationally televised address last week, Bush's plan would focus on quelling sectarian violence in Baghdad and bolster forces in the volatile Anbar province.

Although announced in tandem with increased Iraqi efforts to take charge of their own security, the initiative has drawn bipartisan criticism in Congress and has received little support in public opinion polls.

But, despite winning control of the House and Senate in November elections that turned in part on public dissatisfaction with the direction of the Iraq war, Democrats are split on whether to simply criticize the president, or try to change his policies by imposing spending limits or other measures to restrict U.S. troop involvement in the conflict.

The split came into sharper focus this afternoon when Biden, the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Levin, who now chairs the senate Armed Services Committee, released their nonbinding resolution opposing the troop increase, with Hagel as a co-sponsor.

The resolution declared that "it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating U.S. troop presence in Iraq."

Clinton, in her television interviews, said she wanted to cap the number of troops and cut funding to the Iraqi government -- "for the training of their military, for the protection of the leaders, for economic reconstruction assistance" -- unless it makes progress on rebuilding its security forces and policing the country.

"I am opposed to this escalation," Clinton said on CBS News's "The Early Show."

She and Bayh plan to send a letter to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates today urging the United States to send additional forces to battle an expected Taliban surge this spring. She said the United States should add two battalions in the southern part of the country, and keep a battalion in place in eastern Afghanistan, rather than send those forces to Iraq.

Bush is "taking troops away from Afghanistan, where I think we need to be putting more troops, and sending them to Iraq on a mission that I think has a very limited, if any, chance for success," Clinton said on NBC's "Today" show.

DOJ_NMG_0118302

Snow, the White House spokesman, said today that members of Congress can do "whatever they want" regarding resolutions on the Iraq war but that they cannot infringe on the constitutional powers of the president. He said lawmakers should consider the message that their actions would send to U.S. troops and the public.

"I'm not going to try to characterize whether it does or does not constitute support for the troops," Snow told reporters, "but it is a question that those who are talking about these resolutions will have to answer to themselves and to the public."

Staff writer Debbi Wilgoren contributed to this report.

Brownback Calls For Diplomacy To Resolve Iraq Conflict (FWST)

By Sam Hananel

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - Back from a weeklong trip to the Middle East and Africa, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback said Wednesday he is disappointed at the lack of security in Baghdad and urged the Bush administration to launch a serious diplomatic effort to resolve the conflict in Iraq.

Brownback, one of a small group of Republicans to publicly oppose sending more U.S. troops to Iraq, called on Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to begin "shuttle diplomacy" with leaders of the three major Iraqi groups.

Brownback painted a bleak picture of his meetings with Iraqi leaders, saying Sunni leaders "blame everything" on Shiites and vice versa. Although Sunnis are a distinct minority in Iraq, they had dominated the government until the U.S.-led ouster of Saddam Hussein left Shias in control.

"All of this suggests that at the present time, the United States cares more about a peaceful Iraq than the Iraqis do," Brownback said in a speech on the Senate floor. "If that is the case, it is difficult to understand why more U.S. troops would make a difference."

Brownback has not said whether he would vote for a Senate resolution opposing Bush's plan for a 21,500 troop buildup in Iraq. A group of senators, including Republican Chuck Hegel of Nebraska, announced agreement Wednesday on a resolution opposing the troop buildup.

While Brownback said it is up to Iraqis to resolve sectarian differences causing much of the bloodshed in Iraq, he said he was not calling on the United States to withdraw troops "and leave behind a security vacuum."

Only a broadly supported, bipartisan strategy will allow the United States to remain in Iraq, Brownback said, and he urged Democrats to outline what level of commitment they would support.

Brownback said shuttle diplomacy would involve meetings among Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders outside of Iraq. The meetings would be similar to the Dayton accords that helped resolve conflicts in Bosnia, he said.

It has been nearly two years since Brownback's last visit to Baghdad, but he said the city is no more secure than it was in March 2005.

"The three mortar rounds that exploded during one meeting I had with an Iraqi vice president - no one was harmed - they were launched from some way out, but still they hit," Brownback said. "It shows just how insecure the city remains."

Brownback suggested, as he has in the past, the possibility of dividing Iraq into three states, with the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds each controlling an autonomous region of the country. Baghdad would become a federal city.

'08 Dems Up Ante On Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

Hill, January 18, 2007

Three Democrats who will likely face off for the White House suggested yesterday that they want to go further than their Senate leaders on Iraq, calling for a stronger effort to cap the U.S. military presence than the nonbinding resolution that will be marked up next week.

As Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), and Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) detailed their plans on Iraq, other Democrats outlined their own bipartisan resolution, which is backed by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.). Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden, Jr. (D-Del.) will bring that resolution, co-written with Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), to his panel one day after President Bush's State of the Union.

But Biden and Levin's partnership with Hagel vied for primacy with other Democratic proposals to force congressional approval of new troops in Iraq. Biden plans to formally launch a White House bid this year, and Hagel also could join the race soon.

DOJ_NMG_0118303

Clinton, recently returned from a codel to Iraq and Afghanistan, vowed to support the nonbinding measure but said Congress would "have to move to tougher requirements on the administration to get their attention."

Clinton is readying legislation that would require Bush to get congressional consent for any increases above this month's troop levels, similar to a plan Dodd announced late Tuesday, and set several other conditions for political and security progress before Iraqi troops received new funding. Dodd, however, may be able to preempt Clinton by offering his bill as an amendment in Foreign Relations, where Clinton has no vote.

"I want to reach out to her," Dodd said of Clinton, who would be the third Democratic cosponsor of his bill, after Sens. Barbara Boxer (Calif.) and Edward Kennedy (Mass.). Kennedy has offered his own legislation that would allow Congress to shut off funding for the troop increase, which Clinton and several fellow Democratic senators have stopped short of endorsing.

Progressive Democrats leaning on their party leaders to use the congressional majority as a means to end U.S. involvement in Iraq cautiously hailed Clinton's decision to take a position the 2008 presidential contender called "consistent … but [with] more teeth."

"Well – yay," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), Congressional Progressive Caucus co-chairwoman. "To me, this is obviously a reaction to the election on Nov. 7, when the public clearly said they expect Democrats to make changes in Iraq."

One House Democratic aide remarked on the political necessity for Clinton to take a strong stance against the troop "surge" strategy as she readies a White House run and Obama, another Foreign Relations member, jolts Capitol Hill with his 2008 exploratory bid.

"It would be unimaginable for a Democratic presidential candidate not to oppose the president's plan … and work to bring our troops home," the aide said.

Obama said he is reading both Dodd's and Kennedy's proposals to forge his own course on Iraq and indicated he could prepare amendments to the nonbinding resolution for next week's markup. In a later statement, Obama expanded on his criticism of new troop commitments to move even closer to Clinton's position.

"I not only favor capping the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, but believe it's imperative that we begin the phased redeployment I called for two months ago, and intend to introduce legislation that does just that," Obama said.

While Democrats maneuvered for a power position that could assert the new Congress' authority before Bush's military increase is complete, Republicans sought to keep their conference united in advance of the committee vote. GOP senators already critical of the surge, particularly those facing reelection pressures in 2008, left the door open for more to follow Hagel in support of his nonbinding resolution.

"There is some time to have further discussions" before next Wednesday's markup, Foreign Relations member Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who is up for reelection, said. "There are some things in the resolution that some of us who don't support a surge aren't comfortable with."

The crux of the discomfort is the word "escalating" to describe the White House plan in Iraq, which appears in the nonbinding resolution after several introductory findings. Some Republicans consider the term too partisan and political, akin to Democratic disapproval of "cut and run," but Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) did not appear to share her colleagues' concerns.

"A troop increase does represent an escalation," said Snowe, who will back the nonbinding resolution.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.), a Foreign Relations member already fielding reelection challenges, declined to comment on the nonbinding resolution until its language was publicly released. Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who may be challenged for reelection by Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) told reporters she has not decided how she would vote on the Biden-Levin-Hagel measure. Allen voted against the 2002 Iraq war resolution.

Several Foreign Relations Republicans met early yesterday with Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, at the White House to discuss strategy on the resolution. Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), a former Armed Services chairman and foreign-policy elder statesman, said he would brief GOP senators on his own plans late yesterday for a resolution responding to the "surge."

"[I am] not supportive of what Democrats are trying to do in their resolution," Warner said yesterday en route to the Republican policy lunch, where Vice President Dick Cheney was a guest. He said his plan would use the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report and "basically [rework] it to make the president's program work."

Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.), who accompanied Clinton and Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) to the Middle East, pointed to the forthcoming war supplemental as a means to rein in the Bush administration's open-ended commitment in Iraq. But McHugh acknowledged that Congress would have little to no time to cap funding for the surge before more troops arrived: "We're in a congressional catch-22."

Congressional Procession Of Iraq Proposals Likely To Lead Nowhere (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

"You cannot run a war by committee," Vice President Cheney said over the weekend.

Oh? Just watch them.

Lawmakers were introducing Iraq legislation at a mad pace yesterday, at one point in the afternoon scheduling news conferences in half-hour intervals. By the end of the day, they had issued more bills than Pepco.

Early risers saw Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) in the Senate television gallery introducing his proposal to limit U.S. troops in Iraq to 130,000 and to hold a vote on whether to reauthorize the war. Those who lingered until lunchtime could catch Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) and other House liberals demanding a withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Iraq within six months.

Booking the Senate TV studio at 2:30 p.m. were Sens. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), with their own Iraq resolution. They had to vacate the room at 3 p.m. for the arrival of Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.); Clinton floated a variation of the Dodd plan. Minutes after that session, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) issued a statement announcing legislation ordering a "phased redeployment" of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Even Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, who gave up his Senate seat, tried to get a piece of the action yesterday. His campaign sent out a fundraising appeal, asking: "Please chip in to help stop this escalation today."

The parade of lawmakers past the microphones lured a crowd to the Senate TV studio, where nearly 200 reporters and staffers squeezed four deep in the aisles; scores more were stuck outside. "I'm not going to have any senators in here before I have order in this room!" cried the gallery director.

But the excitement was misplaced. For all the bills introduced yesterday, none is likely to force President Bush to change course in Iraq. Proposals such as Biden's are "nonbinding" and others don't have enough votes to pass. "There is very little chance in the short run that we are going to pass any legislation," Clinton confided during her news conference. Asked to elaborate, she explained: "I can count."

If anything, the competing proposals could strengthen Bush's hand. Though largely united in opposition to Bush's plan, members of Congress, carved up by the presidential ambitions of Clinton, Obama, Dodd, Biden and others, can't unite around an alternative.

"Look," McHugh acknowledged in his appearance with Clinton and Bayh yesterday, "Congress right now has no effective role in this process."

Dodd, who last week declared his presidential bid on "Imus in the Morning," was the first to demonstrate McHugh's thesis. "It is time," he said at his morning news conference, to "offer meaningful action." He would require a new war authorization.

So would he enforce this by cutting off funding for the war?

"No, we've stayed away from the funding here," Dodd answered.

Any co-sponsors? "I haven't asked."

How about supporters in the House? "I haven't talked to anyone on the House side about it, either."

Next in the Senate TV studio: Biden, another Democratic presidential candidate, introducing his nonbinding resolution. Unlike Dodd, Biden had co-sponsors, but he could not remember everybody's name.

"Good afternoon, folks," he began. "Today, Senator Hagel and Senator Lugar and I . . ."

"Levin," Levin corrected him.

"Levin!" Biden agreed, putting his arm around Levin. "Jiminy Christmas. I just left Lugar."

The difficulties were just beginning. "If you feel so strongly, why a symbolic, nonbinding resolution?" asked ABC News's Jake Tapper.

Biden reasoned: "I cannot believe that the president of the United States would not pay heed to a bipartisan resolution passed by the United States, notwithstanding it's not binding."

Senate gallery rules are binding, however, and Biden's group vacated the room at 3:01 p.m. because the Clinton entourage had booked the studio. The New York senator wasted little time dismissing the Biden plan.

"I certainly will support that," she said. "But from what I've heard out of the administration thus far, I think we will eventually have to move to tougher requirements on the administration to get their attention." One of her tougher requirements: the limit on troop levels.

But even one of the participants in Clinton's news conference wasn't necessarily on board with that. Additional troops "may already be in theater," McHugh said. "And I'd be hard-pressed to vote, while they are there, to say: 'Well, we have concerns about your mission.' "

The former first lady had no illusions that her plan would become law. "This is a work in progress," she told questioners. Still, she did have confidence in one prediction: "Others will come forward, you know, in the days ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0118305

In the minutes ahead, as it turned out. Clinton had barely left the studio when Obama, who may be her presidential rival, sent out a press release one-upping her. "I not only favor capping the number U.S. troops in Iraq, but believe it's imperative that we begin the phased redeployment I called for two months ago," he said, "and intend to introduce legislation that does just that."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Tough month

On Dec. 5, Newsweek magazine touted an interview with then-incoming House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence Chairman Rep. Silvestre Reyes as an "exclusive." And for good reason.

"In a surprise twist in the debate over Iraq," the story began, Mr. Reyes "said he wants to see an increase of 20,000 to 30,000 U.S. troops as part of a 'stepped up effort to dismantle the militias.' "

"We have to consider the need for additional troops to be in Iraq, to take out the militias and stabilize Iraq," the Texas Democrat said to the surprise of many, "I would say 20,000 to 30,000."

Then came President Bush's expected announcement last week, virtually matching Mr. Reyes' recommendation and argument word-for-word -- albeit the president proposed only 21,500 troops.

Wouldn't you know, hours after Mr. Bush announced his proposal, Mr. Reyes told the El Paso Times that such a troop buildup was unthinkable.

"We don't have the capability to escalate even to this minimum level," he said.

The chairman's "double-talk" did not go unnoticed. Among others, Rep. Joe Wilson, South Carolina Republican and a member of the House Armed Services Committee, says such blatant "hypocrisy" undermines both national security and the war on terrorism.

Unfortunately for the new House intelligence chief, this is his second (some would argue his third) major blunder in the space of one month. When asked by Congressional Quarterly reporter Jeff Stein whether al Qaeda was a Sunni or Shi'ite organization, he answered: "Predominantly, probably Shi'ite."

As Mr. Stein wrote later: "He couldn't have been more wrong. Al Qaeda is profoundly Sunni. If a Shi'ite showed up at an al Qaeda clubhouse, they'd slice his head off and use it for a soccer ball."

The reporter added: "To me, it's like asking about Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland: Who's on what side?"

In the same interview, Mr. Stein had asked Mr. Reyes about the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah.

His now-infamous reply: "Hezbollah. Uh, Hezbollah? ... Why do you ask me these questions at 5 o'clock? Can I answer in Spanish? Do you speak Spanish?"

Understand Congress?

Former Indiana Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, director of the Center on Congress and recent co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, will join with former Connecticut Rep. Ron Sarasin, head of the U.S. Capitol Historical Society, and Schering-Plough Chief Executive Officer Fred Hassan at the U.S. Capitol today to present "The Citizens Guide to Understanding Congress." (That'll be the day.)

The 5 p.m. event in the Mansfield Room, touted as a "wine, cheese and civics" affair, marks the debut of an updated citizens' guide to navigating the House and Senate. (It's free for the asking through each congressional office.)

We took a peek at the guide, which concedes that many Americans are "frustrated by the system they feel is stacked against them." However, it quotes the now-deceased Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis (who was appointed by President Woodrow Wilson in 1916 and served until 1939) as saying: "The only title in our democracy superior to that of president is the title of citizen."

Happy 50th

J.W. "Bill" Marriott Jr., the native Washingtonian who learned his hospitality ropes while working for his parents' Hot Shoppes restaurant chain during high school and college, will mark Marriott International's 50th anniversary tomorrow with a 1950s-themed celebration in Bethesda.

It was in January 1957 that Marriott's first hotel -- the 356-room Twin Bridges Marriott Motor Hotel in Arlington -- opened its doors. Today, Marriott operates 85 hotels in the Washington area alone, and 2,800 properties worldwide, employing nearly 150,000 people.

Hundreds of Marriott employees will be dressed in their best 1950s attire when greeting guests in the lobby of Marriott international headquarters for the celebration.

Launching Lompoc

DOJ_NMG_0118306

The one positive thing about a column "typo" is that we get to hear from our many distinguished readers, including Wayne Hembree, formerly NASA's search-and-rescue mission manager at Goddard Space Flight in Greenbelt, who now is a consultant for the space agency.

"Glad to hear that 'Vandenberg, Alaska' was a typo and that everyone really knew it is in California," he writes. "We in NASA and those in the Air Force remember how our polar orbiting satellite launches moved from Cape Canaveral, Florida, to Vandenberg Air Force Base, California, after the State Department botched the analysis of Fidel Castro, thinking him a reformer and not a Communist ...

"When Castro took Cuba into the Soviet camp, the U.S. decided it could not continue launching polar orbiting satellites on rockets flying south from Cape Canaveral, right over Cuba. Vandenberg profited by Florida's loss, and thus the bumper sticker: 'Where [in] the [world] is Lompoc?' -- the town we learned to love, outside Vandenberg AFB."

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin@washingtontimes.com.

Commanding Majority Opposes More Troops In Iraq (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — A commanding majority of Americans oppose President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq and just over half the country wants Congress to block the deployment, a Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

As he seeks to chart a new course in Iraq, Bush also faces pervasive resistance and skepticism toward the U.S. commitment — more than three-fifths of those surveyed said the war was not worth fighting and only one-third approved of his handling of the conflict.

And in a striking measure of Bush's declining credibility, half said they believed he deliberately misled the U.S. in making his case for invading Iraq.

On all three questions, these are Bush's weakest showing in a Times poll.

Asked about Bush's recent announcement that he would dispatch another 21,500 troops to Iraq, three-fifths said they opposed the move, while just over one-third backed it.

Even Bush's political base, a source of support throughout his presidency, showed signs of cracking: about one-fourth of Republicans said they do not believe the war was worth fighting and a roughly equal number opposed the troop increase.

"I want us to get out. I want us to leave," said poll respondent Beth Anderson, a Republican from Belle Center, Ohio, who has a son in the Army.

Anderson, an X-ray technician, added: "I think I was one of the biggest, 'Yes, we need to go over there.'…And then, little by little, it just got to be too long and too much and the cost is, wow, awful."

The poll's findings drive home the extent to which Iraq has politically weakened Bush, whose reelection just over two years ago stirred dreams among his advisors of cementing an enduring GOP electoral majority in Washington.

The results also underscore the formidable conundrum confronting Bush — the public's loss of faith in the war's direction, his handling of the conflict and his credibility all make it more difficult for him to rally support for the new direction he argues is necessary to turn the tide.

The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg Poll, supervised by Times polling director Susan Pinkus, surveyed 1,344 adults nationwide by telephone Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

With attitudes about Iraq weighing heavily against him, Bush's overall job approval rating stood at 39%, with 59% disapproving. Those figures are comparable to what had been Bush's worst showing in a Times poll — last winter, his approval rating was 38%, with 58% disapproving.

On Iraq, only 33% approved of Bush's handling of the war, with 65% disapproving.

The sole ray of light for Bush in the poll may be signs of public ambivalence about Congress' proper response to his plans on Iraq. Despite the widespread opposition to the troop escalation, Americans divide more closely on whether lawmakers should try to stop it.

The public clearly wants Congress to address the issue in some fashion: 45% of those polled said Iraq should be Capitol Hill's first priority, more than double the next closest issue (dealing with healthcare, which drew 20%).

A narrow majority — 51% — want Congress to try to block Bush from sending more troops to Iraq. Of those, 25% said lawmakers should deny funding for the increase and 26% said they should find other legislative measures to stop him. Forty-one percent said Congress should not attempt to stop Bush, with the rest unsure.

Carl Edwards, a welder from Morganton, N.C., expressed the divided beliefs of many when he said he wanted Congress to try to prevent the new deployment, but worried about hurting the troops in the field.

DOJ_NMG_0118307

"They should stop sending funds to [Bush], but not cut the military funds down to where it is hurting the soldiers," he said.

Americans divide in similar proportions when asked whether Congress should attempt to require Bush "to begin withdrawing the troops already in Iraq."

Exactly half said Congress should take steps to begin removing troops (42% opposed such an effort).

On the other hand, 48% were against Congress establishing a mandatory deadline for the withdrawal of all troops, while 45% said Congress should set such a deadline either by terminating funding (17%) or through other means (28%).

Despite the conflict about Congress' role, responses to a succession of questions showed that a solid majority of Americans want the U.S. to begin extricating itself from Iraq rather than expanding its military commitment.

When asked how the U.S. should proceed, only 30% said it should maintain troops in Iraq "for as long as it takes to win the war."

By contrast, nearly two-thirds wanted troop withdrawals to begin within the next year, with 46% saying the process should start over that period and another 19% saying all troops should be sent home immediately.

Similarly, 60% agreed that the U.S. should withdraw "most troops from Iraq by early 2008 while keeping military training forces there to assist and train Iraq troops." Opposing that idea were 31%.

These results closely tracked the reaction to Bush's decision to deploy more troops to Iraq — 60% opposed it, 36% supported it.

"It's just too little, too late," said Charles Davis, a market research analyst and Democrat from New York.

Dale Sibley, a salesman in Clinton, Miss., typified those who backed Bush's decision to send more troops.

The deployment might create greater stability in Iraq and allow the U.S. to bring home its forces faster, said Sibley, a Republican. "I think [U.S. troops] have got to get the job done a little better before they can turn it over to the Iraqis," he said.

Part of Bush's problem is that relatively few of those polled shared Sibley's opinion that a troop increase would meaningfully improve conditions in Iraq. Less than 30% said more U.S. troops would translate into less violence in Iraq; almost 25% said it would increase violence and more than 40% said it would have no effect.

Kevin Steelman, a truck driver from Yadkinville, N.C., was among the skeptics. "It's going to be a never-ending battle," he said. "I don't foresee a big change by sending more troops over there."

Another key element of Bush's revised plan for Iraq — a public works program for the country — drew a more mixed but still skeptical response.

While 55% said they did not believe the U.S. had a moral obligation to pay for Iraqi reconstruction, respondents divided about evenly on whether a public works program would discourage young Iraqis from joining the insurgency: 38% said it would, 43% said it would not, with the rest uncertain.

Most of those polled said that rather than Bush's plan, they would prefer that the administration follow the direction charted last month by the independent Iraq Study Group.

That panel, led by James A. Baker, the secretary of State during the presidency of Bush's father, and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), proposed that the U.S. begin withdrawing troops from Iraq during the next year and talk with Iran and Syria about promoting stability in the region.

Asked to choose between that approach and Bush's new plan, 53% said they preferred the study group's recommendations, nearly double the 28% that favored the president's proposal.

"If [Secretary of State Condoleezza] Rice has to go to Iran or Syria and talk, and there are 1,000 or 2,000 lives of American soldiers saved, that is cheaper than letting those soldiers die," said Democrat Daljit Bajwa, a real estate broker from La Habra, Calif.

Asked whether Bush "deliberately misled Congress and the American people" with his prewar claims that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction, 50% said they agreed with that statement, while 44% said they did not.

But for most Americans, finding a way forward in Iraq apparently seems daunting enough without reopening arguments about the past — half of those polled said they did not want Congress to hold hearings to investigate Bush's prewar claims.

Can Congress Stop The War? (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, January 18, 2007

Over the next week, Congress will vote on a non-binding resolution denouncing President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq. Many people have already noted that with thousands of dead soldiers and hundreds of billions of dollars lost, Congress might be able to manage more than a legislative "Dear John" letter. Yet, if you listen to the president and some Democratic leaders, Congress can do little to stop the hemorrhaging of lives and treasure.

DOJ_NMG_0118308

The truth is that there is a lot that Congress could do. Among other things, it could stop the war. But neither the president nor many Democrats want to publicly entertain such a possibility. Indeed, the president has insisted, again, that he alone makes such decisions. When asked about what Congress can do if it opposes his build-up, Bush was dismissive and said, "Frankly, that's not their responsibility." Of course, the president acknowledged, "They could try to stop me from doing it … but I made my decision, and we're going forward."

Democratic leaders seem to be encouraging the same view of an unchecked executive. The new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., and other members suggested last week that it may be unconstitutional for Congress to cut funds for an escalation.

All of this would have come as a great surprise to the framers. Far from being some type of constitutional eunuchs, legislators hold the very power that determines whether a war will continue, expand or end: the power of the purse. The framers specifically justified this congressional power as a check on the president's ability to entangle the nation in disastrous foreign adventures.

Congress has historically used its power of the purse to deter, limit or end armed conflicts. During the Mexican and Civil wars, Congress used its appropriations to influence or restrict the conduct of the wars. During the Vietnam War, Congress not only repealed its authorization for the war, but it set a date to cut off funds for combat operations — forcing the war to an end.

Congress has also acted to restrict past presidents in other ways. Congress barred the use of funds by President Ford for any intervention in Angola and barred such funds by President Reagan to support the contras in Nicaragua. President Clinton was limited in his use of troops in Somalia and Bosnia.

After campaigning on the war, Democrats are struggling to lower the expectations that they created. Yet, two out of three Americans oppose the president's plan for escalation. More than 60% believe the president was wrong to invade Iraq in the first place. Worse still, recent polls in Iraq show that not only do 70% of Iraqis want us out within a matter of months, but more than 60% actually support the killing of our troops.

With all of its power, Congress' use of a non-binding resolution is akin to a surgeon trying to shout out a malignant tumor. Congress has the means; it is only a question of its will.

For his part, Bush is playing a dangerous game of chicken by moving to send troops to Iraq before any authorization of funds is made. Bush knows that Congress is unlikely to have the courage to pull funds once troops are in place.

The use of military personnel as hostages in a fight with Congress is not new. Teddy Roosevelt had many fights with Congress over the composition and use of the military. One such dispute occurred over Roosevelt's desire to send his "Great White Fleet" around the world to show the American flag — an enterprise viewed by many as an expensive vanity. When Congress balked in appropriating funds for fuel and support, Roosevelt used what fuel he had to send the fleet halfway around the world. He then informed Congress that if it wanted its new fleet back, it would be wise to send the fuel.

It is not clear how long Congress will wait before using its authority. As Democrats look for a personally convenient moment to act and the president tries to spend himself to victory, the country continues to pay a dear price. If it takes a projected $500 billion and nearly 26,000 dead or wounded soldiers to get Congress to the point of a non-binding resolution, one can only imagine what it would take to cut off funds. Yet, rest assured: When members finally feel comfortable with acting to end this war, they will find all the authority they need in the Constitution and all the reasons they need in Iraq.

Jonathan Turley is the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington University and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Anatomy Of A Wrong Approach (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The third or fourth time I heard Vice President Cheney tell Fox News's Chris Wallace on Sunday that al-Qaeda was gambling that the United States "doesn't have the stomach" to keep up the fight in Iraq, it crossed my mind that Cheney may be staring at the wrong part of the national anatomy.

The question, really, is not whether we have the stomach for the fight but the brains to figure out what to do in Iraq.

The vice president's effort to reduce it to a question of courage -- to suggest that those who want to expand the war are braver than those urging steps to limit it -- is a standard rhetorical trick. Whenever any Bush policy is questioned, someone from the administration almost automatically charges that its critics are soft on terrorism.

Iraq requires thought, not just gut instinct, because we are struggling with a situation we've never faced before. What does America really know about how to deal with a Shiite-Sunni civil war in a land devastated by years of dictatorship, damaged by invasion, infiltrated by terrorists and surrounded by countries with their own territorial ambitions? Not much, which is why it behooves us to move with caution.

DOJ_NMG_0118309

The most serious thinking, inside and outside the administration, has concluded that it is fundamentally up to the government in Baghdad to curb the militias controlled by rival Sunni and Shiite clans. President Bush says the Iraqis can't do it alone, so he is sending more troops, 20,000 of them, to help Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his forces.

Trouble is, no one knows if those Iraqi forces will show up to fight or, if they do, whether they will target anyone other than their Sunni enemies.

The Iraq Study Group and a good many others urged Bush to demand action from Maliki before offering any further help. They said, let him show an effort to take control of the corrupt and sect-filled ministries, launch serious constitutional reform, divide up the oil revenue, start delivering services.

Bush instead bought Maliki's argument that none of that is possible until Baghdad is more secure, and securing Baghdad means sending more troops into its high-risk urban warfare.

Given the decision that Bush has made, is there anything Congress can do to protect American interests and save as many American lives as possible? Yes, there is. The lawmakers should hold Bush and Defense Secretary Robert Gates strictly to account for monitoring the action -- or inaction -- of the Maliki government.

There is a lot of talk now on Capitol Hill about nonbinding resolutions opposing the "surge" of troops, or some sort of measure to limit or cut off the funds for that deployment. No such action is likely to have any impact on the president. The deployment has begun, and Bush is adamant about his authority as commander in chief to continue it.

What Congress can demand is regular, frequent -- even weekly -- updates from the Pentagon, relayed from the able Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander in Iraq, about what the Iraqis are doing. The State Department should be delivering similar reports from the embassy in Baghdad on the operation of Maliki's government. Members of Congress ought to be traveling to Iraq themselves, checking out the reports with the troops who are bearing the brunt of the fighting.

The administration may complain about this intense monitoring and call it micromanagement. But after the blunders of the past three years, neither the president nor our allies in Baghdad have earned the right to operate with a free hand.

If Petraeus and his staff can provide specific measures of Iraqi military cooperation and progress, good. If the U.S. Embassy sees signs that the Maliki government is getting its act together, better yet. And if members of Congress can confirm these impressions on the ground in Baghdad, then take it to the bank.

If not, then Congress should call on the president to "show some stomach" and tell Maliki that the game is coming to an end.

Without a credible threat to walk away, there is every reason to believe that Maliki will attempt to use this expanded American force as a shield for the Shiite effort to drive the Sunni minority out of their homes and far from any share of power.

That is not a goal worth one American life. And if it turns out that's what all this amounts to, then we will have no choice.

Maliki Stresses Urgency In Arming Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 17 -- The Iraqi government's need for American troops would "dramatically go down" in three to six months if the United States accelerated the process of equipping and arming Iraq's security forces, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Wednesday.

The head of Iraq's Shiite Muslim-led government defended his country's independence and sovereignty and called on U.S. leaders to show faith in his ability to lead.

Maliki disputed President Bush's remarks broadcast Tuesday that the execution of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein "looked like it was kind of a revenge killing" and took exception to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's Senate testimony last week that Maliki's administration was on "borrowed time."

The prime minister said statements such as Rice's "give morale boosts for the terrorists and push them toward making an extra effort and making them believe they have defeated the American administration," Maliki said. "But I can tell you that they have not defeated the Iraqi government."

Speaking through an interpreter to a group of reporters for an hour in his offices in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, Maliki found several ways to say that Iraq is beholden to no country. He defended Iraq's constitutional right to the death penalty, its commitment to dialogue with Iran and Syria despite U.S. opposition to those governments, and its determination to use Iraqi troops to lead the latest effort to pacify Baghdad.

At a time when Bush has committed an additional 21,500 troops to the fight in Iraq, Maliki went further than he has before in establishing a time frame for drawing down the U.S. presence.

DOJ_NMG_0118310

"If we succeed in implementing the agreement between us to speed up the equipping and providing weapons to our military forces, I think that within three to six months our need for the American troops will dramatically go down. That's on the condition that there are real strong efforts to support our military forces and equipping them and arming them," Maliki said.

In a statement issued by Maliki's office Tuesday, he said Iraq would continue to build up its armed forces "so it will be possible to withdraw the Multinational forces from cities, or withdraw 50,000 soldiers from Iraq."

Maliki faces deep skepticism in Iraq and abroad about whether he has the political will or ability to steer his country away from civil war, or even to keep his position as prime minister. His comments amounted to a defense of the viability of his government, which he pledged to lead "until I achieve the peace and prosperity that Iraq deserves."

In an interview Dec. 24, Maliki sounded less committed to his office. "I wish I could be done with it before the end" of his four-year term, he told the Wall Street Journal. "I would like to serve my people from outside the circle of senior officials, maybe through parliament."

In the interview Wednesday, Maliki said many American and Iraqi lives would have been spared if the Iraqi forces had been better equipped. But he did not elaborate on what he wanted in terms of weapons or materiel, or whether his needs exceeded what is proposed in the $1.5 billion military sales agreement Iraq reached with the United States last month. Under that deal, the Iraqi government will receive an additional 300 armored personnel carriers, 600 more "up-armored" Humvees, helicopters and other equipment this year, according to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. Iraq's proposed 2007 budget devotes $7 billion to building up the armed forces.

"President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki agreed in November to accelerate not only the training of the Iraqi security forces but also accelerate the transfer of equipment," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said Wednesday.

One Maliki aide said the prime minister wants "heavier weapons" and is concerned that Iraqi security forces are outgunned by militias and insurgents.

"Basically the level of weapons in the current army is really a disgrace," said the aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak publicly about the matter. In many cases, gunmen are "definitely better armed" than the police and the army, the aide said.

Bush administration officials have long expressed concern in private about delivering military equipment to Iraq because of uncertainty that it would be kept out of the hands of militiamen, common criminals and insurgents.

The prime minister's critics in Iraq and Washington say he is unable to target the Shiite militias run by his political allies, but Wednesday he reiterated his commitment to defeating militants of any sect. Over the past few days, he said, his government had arrested 400 members of the Mahdi Army, the burgeoning Shiite militia led by cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, a political supporter of Maliki, and staged a mission in the Shiite holy city of Karbala targeting people who attempted to assassinate a member of the provincial council. He said he has prohibited the Iraqi security forces from openly paying homage to sectarian leaders, such as Sadr, or from joining political parties.

"There will not be any house or party headquarters or any office that has impunity from security operations," he said.

A Sadr spokesman, Abdul Razak al-Nadawi, denied that 400 Mahdi Army members had been arrested and said he was unaware of an operation in Karbala.

Maliki addressed at length Bush's recent critical comments about Hussein's hanging, in which attendees shouted Sadr's name and told Hussein to "go to hell" while he stood at the gallows.

The execution, Maliki said, followed a legitimate trial and conviction -- for Hussein's role in the killing of 148 men and boys from a Shiite village in the 1980s -- and Hussein "was not subjected to any act of revenge, any physical attack, and it was a judicial process that ended with him being sentenced to death according to Iraqi law."

"I know President Bush and I know him as a strong person that does not get affected by the media pressure, but it seems the pressure has gone to a great extent that led to the president giving this statement," Maliki said.

Maliki spoke slowly and seriously for most of the conversation, but occasionally broke into a smile, such as when he was asked whether Bush needs him more than he needs Bush. "This is an evil question," he said, laughing.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, who was traveling with Rice in Europe on Wednesday, defended the secretary's comment about the Maliki administration. "It was a restatement of what others have said, including the president, underscoring the importance and urgency of the Iraqi government acting on behalf of the Iraqi people," he said.

A convoy carrying members of a U.S. democracy group was ambushed Wednesday in Baghdad, and four of the workers, including an American woman, were killed, an official with the group told the Associated Press.

Gunmen attacked the three-car convoy belonging to the National Democratic Institute, said Les Campbell, the group's Middle East director. Besides the American, a Hungarian, a Croat and an Iraqi were killed, he said.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, a truck laden with explosives blew up outside a police station, killing 10 people, including four policemen, and wounding 45 others, according to the Kirkuk police chief. The blast damaged houses and destroyed cars, collapsed a mosque and took down a cellphone tower. There is growing conflict between ethnic Kurds and Turkmens in the city, and the police station was located in a predominantly Turkmen area.

DOJ_NMG_0118311

Later in the day, a second car bomb exploded in Kirkuk outside a Kurdish political office.

In Baghdad, a car bomb exploded in a suicide attack near a busy restaurant in a market in the Shiite slum of Sadr City. The blast killed 20 people and wounded 23 others, according to Brig. Gen. Abdullah Sami of the Interior Ministry.

Maliki Talks Tough, Sees U.S. Withdrawal Near (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki promised Wednesday to crack down on Shiite Muslim militias and Sunni Arab insurgents, warning that no one — not even political ally Muqtada Sadr — would be above the law.

"We will not allow any politicians to interfere with this Baghdad security plan ... whether they are Sunnis or Shiites, Arabs or Kurds, militias or parties, insurgents or terrorists," Maliki said in a rare interview.

The prime minister's comments appeared to align his government's security plan with the Bush administration's call to confront Shiite militias. But in other remarks, Maliki underscored his differences with the U.S., suggesting that American miscalculations had worsened the bloodshed in Iraq, and warning that his patience for political negotiation with warring factions was wearing thin.

"When military operations start in Baghdad, all other tracks will stop," Maliki said. "We gave the political side a great chance, and we have now to use the authority of the state to impose the law and tackle or confront people who break it."

U.S. officials have said that renewed military operations should go hand in hand with efforts at political reconciliation between warring Shiites and Sunnis.

Maliki said if Iraqi security forces were given sufficient training and equipment, they could stabilize the country enough to allow the withdrawal of U.S. troops starting in three to six months — a period in which President Bush's proposed troop buildup would still be underway.

He said if better U.S. training and supplies had come earlier, lives could have been saved.

"I think that within three to six months our need for the American troops will dramatically go down," Maliki said. "That's on the condition that there are real strong efforts to support our military forces."

The U.S.-Iraq security plan involves sending 21,500 more American troops to Iraq and 8,000 to 10,000 Iraqi forces to Baghdad in an effort to quell the civil war between Sunnis and Shiites that on average kills more than 100 people a day.

Maliki said Iraqi security forces this week had detained 400 Shiite militiamen affiliated with Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric whose followers constitute part of Maliki's political base. He offered no further details.

Return to political form

The interview, which took place in a pavilion inside the heavily fortified Green Zone, was a return to the freewheeling style that characterized Maliki's political manner before he became prime minister last year.

When asked whether the Bush administration needed him now more than he needed the administration, Maliki laughed uproariously, calling it an "evil question."

Throughout, Maliki appeared confident and seemed to relish the chance to respond to statements by Bush and U.S. officials, including allegations that his government had botched the hanging of deposed leader Saddam Hussein and had not done enough to stop the sectarian violence.

Commenting on a recent statement by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, he said, "Rice is expressing her own point of view if she thinks that the [Iraqi] government is on borrowed time," humorously suggesting that it might be the Bush administration that is on borrowed time.

"I understand and realize that inside the American administration there is some kind of a crisis situation, especially after the results of the last election," he said.

Maliki said suggestions by Bush officials that the U.S. did not fully support his government played into the hands of insurgents.

"I believe such statements give a morale boost to the terrorists and push them toward making an extra effort, making them believe they have defeated the American administration," Maliki said. "But I can tell you, they haven't defeated the Iraqi government."

Concern all around

The widening split between the U.S. and Iraqi governments comes at an inopportune time.

Maliki has promised to carry out a security plan to halt the civil war, but his government has been riddled with sectarian fighting and corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0118312

The Bush administration is under fire in the U.S. over the Iraq security plan. The strategy to send more American troops is being resisted by many Democrats, who control the House and the Senate.

In Washington on Wednesday, a group of senators introduced a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup.

In the Middle East, there is great concern that Iraq's civil war could spill over into neighboring countries.

When Rice visited Kuwait this week, officials told her that the U.S. needed to start talks with Syria and Iran in order to ease the violence in Iraq. But the White House has resisted the suggestion, also put forward by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

U.S. rhetoric directed at Iran has become more aggressive even as Iraq is working to strengthen its ties with its eastern neighbor and largest trade partner.

When American forces detained five Iranians in northern Iraq last week, some Iraqi officials were angered by what they saw as U.S. interference in their foreign affairs.

In the interview, Maliki asserted his government's independence from U.S. interests in the region. But he underscored that the U.S. and Iraqi governments shared basic goals for his country: stability and prosperity.

"The success that can be achieved in Iraq will be a success for President Bush and the United States, and vice versa," Maliki said. "A failure here would be a failure for President Bush and the United States."

He took issue with Bush's contentions during a PBS interview Tuesday that Maliki's government "has still got some maturation to do," and that it had botched Hussein's execution by allowing Shiite guards to taunt the former leader and videotape his hanging.

Maliki said that Hussein and his codefendants were given a fair trial, and that it was his government's constitutional prerogative to carry out the death penalty. He said Hussein was shown greater respect than the former president gave to his rivals.

Maliki appeared to bristle at Bush's criticism, but he acknowledged that "mistakes had happened." He said he had personally given orders to his deputies to treat Hussein with respect before and after he was hanged.

He said the pressure Bush was feeling might have prompted the critical remarks.

"Maybe this has led to President Bush saying that he's sorry, or he's not happy, about the way the execution happened."

Hamilton Warns That Al-Maliki May Fail Bush (HILL)

By Albert Eisele

The Hill, January 18, 2007

The co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group said Wednesday that he has serious doubts about the ability of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to reduce the level of sectarian violence and achieve national reconciliation, and warned that President Bush's new Iraq strategy is likely to fail if he isn't able to.

"The rhetoric of Maliki is fine but his performance has been disappointing," former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) told The Hill. "So here we find ourselves in this extraordinary position. The U.S. is the superpower of the world, the sole superpower, and the success of our policy in Iraq depends on the actions of the Maliki government, a government that has been weak and that has not performed on these central benchmarks of national reconciliation."

He added, "I think everything has to work right, it has to work quickly, and even if it does, our chances of success are no better than 50-50."

Asked if he agrees that this was the president's last chance for success in Iraq, Hamilton said, "I don't see what his backup plan is. It seems to me he's putting a lot of chips on the Maliki government. … That's a hugely interesting question; what happens if we fail … if the surge doesn't work?"

Hamilton, who with former Secretary of State James Baker headed the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that issued its report in December, said he had a "mixed reaction" to Bush's speech. However, he emphasized he wasn't speaking for Baker or other members of the group.

"I think the president moved quite a ways in the speech … in his disappointment with sectarian violence and other things. So I consider that an important plus. If you go back six weeks this kind of language from the president just would not have been heard, that the situation in Iraq was unacceptable. So there were a number of statements that I find encouraging in the president's remarks."

However, Hamilton made it clear that he was disappointed that the president ignored some of the study group's key recommendations.

"Most important is that the primary mission of the American forces is the training of Iraqi troops," he said. "The president says that's an essential mission. That's good but he doesn't say it's the primary mission. If the surge becomes the primary mission, then training becomes second. They argue that they can do both, but it's not likely that we can put the same kind of emphasis on both."

DOJ_NMG_0118313

Second, he said, are the conditions Bush has placed on giving aid to the Maliki government. "He is unwilling to put any penalty on Maliki if he does not perform," Hamilton said in an interview in his office at the Wilson Center for International Scholars, which he heads.

"And we very much think that if Maliki does not perform, we should reduce aid. In other words, we make a link. We think certain things ought to be done in Iraq because that government has repeated[ly] promised performance and has not performed.

"And of course, the third point is diplomacy. We think that we should develop the international support group and it should include Iran and Syria and an effort to reenergize the Arab-Israeli talks. It appears that Secretary [of State Condoleezza] Rice is trying to do the latter, and I hope she will."

Hamilton said he and Baker will testify before Congress in the coming days. He is scheduled to testify before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at 2 p.m. today, and before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Friday morning, as well as at several other committees next week.

But he said today's hearing may be postponed because Baker "may prefer to move it to next week."

Asked if any other members of the study group have expressed enthusiastic support for the president's new strategy, Hamilton said, "Not to my knowledge."

Hamilton emphasized that the Iraq Study Group report "said we would not succeed in Iraq unless there is a unity of effort. And one of the real huge challenges in front of the president and in front of Congress is to try to develop, with deep differences notwithstanding, a unified effort. We do have American interests in the region and we want to protect those interests and we best do that if we speak with a unified voice."

However, he said, "We are not thus far speaking with a unified voice as a country on Iraq today."

Hamilton predicted "a lot of clashes" in Congress over Iraq, starting with a Senate non-binding resolution to oppose the recent troop-surge announcement.

"I don't know what that resolution says, and it will be non-biding, but it will be very important symbolically, sending a message, and I see a series of very vigorous debates in Congress on Iraq policy, arising in several different places on the legislative calendar."

Asked if that debate will make it more difficult to achieve unity, Hamilton said, "My hope here is that when you run through this process, which I think will be difficult and messy, my hope is that the country will have come to a greater unity of effort. I don't expect unlimited unity, but I would hope there will be greater meeting of the minds than exists today."

He added, "This is a very complex problem. It will take the integration of all of the tools of American power. I still worry that we focus way too much on the military, which is a hugely important part of this policy, but it is not the whole part of it. The economic, political and diplomatic parts are also hugely important and we've got to get it all right. We've had a history over the last few years where we have not gotten it all right and our chances of success are not 100 percent. It's a very daunting challenge for us."

U.S. Ambassador Expects Progress Within Months (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's leaders will need at least a few more months to hammer out political deals central to President Bush's security overhaul, the outgoing U.S. ambassador said Wednesday.

In an interview with USA TODAY, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad laid out a timetable for Iraqi politicians to resolve long-simmering disagreements, such as how to share Iraq's oil wealth.

Khalilzad also said the United States was "committed to going after" Iranian operatives in Iraq, who he said were responsible for supplying sophisticated bombs used against U.S. forces.

Bush has called on Sunni and Shiite politicians to resolve their differences and help ease sectarian tensions as an additional 21,500 U.S. troops begin arriving in Iraq. There are about 137,000 U.S. troops in Iraq now.

"Iraqi leaders understand that the patience of the American people, the patience of the leadership of the political forces in the United States, is running out," Khalilzad said.

He declined to say whether Iraq's government would face repercussions for not resolving key political issues, calling such talk "counterproductive."

"We have to recognize this is a sovereign country with an elected prime minister," he said. "We can't appear to be dictating in a way that, 'You must do this by this week, you must do this by that week.' "

The initiatives include:

·An oil law. Drafters finalized an energy bill Tuesday that would define how Iraq's oil wealth would be distributed to different regions, Khalilzad said.

DOJ_NMG_0118314

Sunni-dominated territories possess a relatively small percentage of Iraq's oil reserves, and Sunni politicians want to make sure they receive a share of future royalties.

The bill needs Cabinet approval before the parliament votes on it and will probably take a month to pass into law, Khalilzad said.

·De-Baathification. U.S. officials are reviewing a draft law that would partially lift a ban that prevents former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, most of them Sunnis, from holding government jobs. The law is probably two months away from passage, Khalilzad said.

·Constitutional amendments. A bill that would outline how Iraq's constitution could be amended — a point of heated debate between Iraqi sects — is being studied and is "several months" from completion, Khalilzad said.

Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders have agreed to allow U.S. forces unfettered access to Baghdad neighborhoods. Such access is key to disarming militias. "We'll have the freedom of action to go anywhere in the city in pursuing these objectives," he said. "We have to wait and see whether what has been agreed to, which is quite satisfactory, is actually implemented."

Also on Wednesday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki chastised the United States for suggesting his government was living on "borrowed time." He told The Times of London that such statements have bolstered Iraq's extremists.

"I wish that we could receive strong messages of support from the U.S. so we don't give some boost to the terrorists and make them feel that they might have achieved success," al-Maliki said.

He said the United States' refusal to give Baghdad's security forces sufficient guns and equipment has hurt their ability to secure the capital. If given the proper equipment, he said, U.S. forces could reduce their numbers within six months, he said. Al-Maliki also rejected claims that he is lenient on Shiite militias, saying 400 Mahdi Army members have been arrested in recent days.

Shiite Fighters Arrested In Crackdown, Iraq Says (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 17 — Facing intense pressure from the Bush administration to show progress in securing Iraq, senior Iraqi officials announced Wednesday that they had moved against the country's most powerful Shiite militia, arresting several dozen senior members in the past few weeks.

It was the first time the Shiite government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had claimed significant action against the militia, the Mahdi Army, one of the most intractable problems facing his administration. The militia's leader, the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, helped put Mr. Maliki in power, but pressure to crack down on the group has mounted as its killings in the capital have driven a wedge into efforts to keep the country together.

Although the announcement seemed timed to deflect growing scrutiny by an American administration that has grown increasingly frustrated with Mr. Maliki, American officers here offered some support for the government's claims, saying that at least half a dozen senior militia leaders had been taken into custody in recent weeks.

In perhaps the most surprising development, the Americans said, none of the members had been prematurely released, a chronic problem as this government has frequently shielded Shiite fighters.

"There was definitely a change in attitudes," in the past three to four weeks, a senior American military officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Mr. Maliki, in a meeting with foreign journalists on Wednesday, said 400 Mahdi militiamen had been arrested "within the last few days." A senior government official said later by telephone that the total number arrested was 420 and that they had been detained in 56 operations beginning in October. Several dozen senior leaders have been detained in the past several weeks, the senior official said on condition of anonymity. He said the total number of senior commanders did not exceed 100.

Still, some American military officials remained skeptical that the effort was more than just a short-term attempt to appease them at a time when American government support for Mr. Maliki appeared to have sunk to an all-time low.

"The question is whether it will be sustained," another American military official said. "This shouldn't be done to weather some short-term political storm. This has to stick in the long run."

Whatever the case, changes have been felt on the street. In Shiite neighborhoods across the capital, militia members seem to have dropped from view in recent weeks, residents and militia members say. Shiite foot soldiers have tucked away their machine guns and have melted back into bustling city blocks, preparing for what they say they believe will be an American military onslaught against them.

"They have not run checkpoints for a week," said Ali, a merchant who lives in northern Baghdad and does business with the militia. "They hid their weapons. They are bored."

DOJ_NMG_0118315

An influential Shiite sheik, Adel Ibrahim Subihawi, said of senior Mahdi members, “They are making new passports right now to leave.”

It was not immediately clear whether the vanishing act was related to fear over the arrests or was a calculated move to wait out the coming American troop increase and prepare to re-emerge later.

But Iraqi and American officials acknowledge that the militia is the central challenge in the new effort to stop the cycle of violence in the capital, especially given the fighters’ ability to move and hide freely in tightly knit Shiite neighborhoods.

It is a vast task ahead: American military intelligence officials have estimated that there are around 7,000 Mahdi militiamen in Baghdad. Many have split off into their own fiefs.

“They are like amoebas,” one Shiite politician said. “Always dividing and multiplying.”

American military commanders are now debating whether a large-scale offensive in Sadr City, a vast grid of cinder-block houses in northeastern Baghdad that is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, should be the way to confront the fighters. American soldiers battled the militia twice in 2004, but it emerged stronger after Mr. Sadr entered the political system and helped install Mr. Maliki as Iraq’s prime minister last spring.

One senior military official said a large-scale operation “cannot be taken off the table,” but others speak of plans to isolate the militia by cutting off northeastern neighborhoods where the militia dominates, and then continuing to chip away at its networks elsewhere.

In an interesting twist, the militia’s leadership has not visibly fought back against the crackdown. American commanders say that the arrests do not draw the howling objections they used to in 2004, because Mr. Sadr’s militia has splintered so deeply since then that the members they are arresting are more criminal than political and considered by Mr. Sadr to be disloyal renegades.

In that assessment, Mr. Sadr could even be using the government and the American military to purge his own ranks of undesirables.

Mr. Maliki, in the meeting on Wednesday, denied he was influenced by Mr. Sadr, and he offered as proof the fact that his government was finally taking painful action against his own Shiite constituency.

“In the entire four years I only talked to him twice,” he insisted.

Iraqis who live in the neighborhoods where the Mahdi Army is strong say the primary motivation for avoiding full-scale confrontation with the Americans is money. Members have grown rich on political channels of financing from Iran as well as from Iraqi government ministries, the residents say, and the militiamen do not want to fight the Americans directly for fear of losing their newfound status.

Ali, the merchant, said the reluctance to fight could be summed up in two words: “Italian shoes.”

“They know they will lose everything if they fight,” he said.

The Iraqi official, for his part, attributed the ease of the arrests to the government’s intensive political efforts with Mr. Sadr through the fall.

“As soon as he distanced himself from these death squads, we started hitting them really hard,” the official said.

The effort seems to be having some effect. In Ur, a Mahdi Army neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad whose empty eastern edge is a dumping ground for bodies, the local police station reported that the number of bodies found so far in January was 25, far fewer than the 68 bodies found in the same time period a month earlier.

Shiite neighborhoods present a particular challenge for the American military as it prepares to place thousands of soldiers into Baghdad in the coming months. In Topchi, a Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad that is now largely empty of Sunnis, Shiites have formed intricate networks of tribes, militiamen and local policemen to maintain order. Residents say that American soldiers coming into the neighborhood would be disruptive.

“There’s no security if the Americans come in,” said Ali Hussein Abdallah, a 43-year-old falafel shop owner who had to close for three days during a recent American raid, in which soldiers tore down a poster of Mr. Sadr that was hanging on his wall. “They create confusion. When they come they make a lot of trouble and maybe fighting.”

The attitude is a measure of just how much alliances have shifted in nearly four years of war. Early on, Sunni Arabs spurned the Americans, and Shiites embraced them. Now Sunni areas ask for American protection, and Shiites want them to stay out of their areas.

“There is a wariness,” said Abu Fatma al-Musawi, a Mahdi Army member in Sadr City. “We feel that this new strategy is against the Mahdi Army. We are worried the American troops might attack our area.”

Military action will be all the more difficult because the militias are deeply embedded in the fabric of society. In Topchi, residents pay 3,000 Iraqi dinars a month, or about $2.40, to support local Mahdi Army members. Fighters are members of the local council, and they arrange trash collections and housing for Shiite refugees, often settling them into empty Sunni houses.

DOJ_NMG_0118316

"If they don't make relations with local councils I am sure they will fail," said one prominent tribal member in Topchi who spoke on condition of anonymity. "If they use only force, like before, they will make many more problems."

It is unclear whether militias would choose to fight Americans. For now, militia members in Topchi, like Jafar Sadik, a 22-year-old student at Baghdad University, simply left their checkpoints during the recent American raid.

For now, it is Sunni violence that shatters neighborhood calm and draws the Shiites out, perpetuating the war. A bombing at a largely Shiite university on Tuesday that killed about 70 has already prompted Mahdi militia members to reinstate some checkpoints in eastern Baghdad, residents said. A drive-by shooting on the same day in the upscale Shiite neighborhood of Binouk that killed 12 has set revenge reactions into motion.

To isolate Mr. Sadr, Americans and several prominent Iraqis, including Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a powerful Shiite, and Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's Sunni vice president, tried to assemble a new political coalition that excluded him. Those efforts seem to have foundered in recent weeks, marred by events that divided the Iraqi groups — the arrests of Iranians in Mr. Hakim's compound and the indignation surrounding the execution of Saddam Hussein.

Baha al-Aaraji, a senior representative for Mr. Sadr in Parliament, said Mr. Sadr's supporters knew that recent American efforts were aimed at weakening them, and eventually Mr. Maliki, whom they support.

"The main goals are to exclude the Sadrists from decision-making and, after the formation of a new bloc, to replace the prime minister," he said.

But in the current political situation, in which Islamists are overwhelmingly popular among voters, the efforts are likely to fail, he said.

"In the election, Islamists from both sides won," he said. "It is a reality."

In Course Change, Roles Extended To Baathists (LAT)

By Said Rifai, Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Ahmad Chalabi, a perennial Iraqi insider and political survivor, held out an olive branch to his former enemies Wednesday by publicly welcoming onetime members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party back into the public life.

Chalabi, who heads a commission charged with removing former ranking Baath Party members from public office, told reporters at a Baghdad news conference that the Iraqi government had changed course and was trying to lure more Baathists back into government.

The de-Baathification laws established by American administrator L. Paul Bremer after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion rankled Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, which served in Saddam's political party in greater proportion than other Iraqi groups. Reforming those laws has been a key demand of the Bush administration as well as the Sunnis, whose alienation from the political process has fueled violence.

Chalabi said more than 2,300 high-ranking Baath Party members had been or were being reinstated to their former government jobs or were being given pensions.

He also said that under new rules the de-Baathification committee's only role would be to identify former members of the party and their rank. "Deciding whether they are allowed to participate in the political process or not is up to the Iraqi judicial system," he said.

However, Chalabi gave assurances that the ongoing reinstatements would not allow those who committed crimes against Iraqis under the former regime to be given "amnesty." He added: "Justice will take its course in the event that any of these individuals were to be suspected of implication in crimes against humanity or corruption."

Chalabi is a secular Shiite who was once favored by those advocating the U.S. invasion of Iraq. He emerged as a divisive symbol of occupation -- a longtime exile advanced by some American officials to help lead a country for which he showed little understanding.

His political party failed to win a single seat in December 2005 elections.

Chalabi was an early advocate of the policy to remove Baath Party members from power, a campaign that fueled the anger of insurgents. But Wednesday, he said his committee would refer to court any instances where provincial or municipal governments refused to reinstate exonerated former party members.

It was time for Iraqis of all political stripes to make amends, he said.

"All of these modifications to the de-Baathification law are being carried out in the interests of both the political and reconciliation processes in addition to absorbing those individuals with relevant experience which could be utilized by the government to better the current situation," he said.

Iraqis Answer Global Critics By Tackling Troubling Issues (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0118317

By Damien Cave

New York Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 17 — Iraqi political leaders stepped up efforts to persuade the world that they were tackling the country's thorniest problems on Wednesday, highlighting crackdowns on militias, progress on a national oil law and new examples of reconciliation with former Baathists.

The flurry of activity on the part of the Shiite-led government comes after weeks of punishing criticism from American, European and Middle Eastern leaders, who have focused on everything from the government's botched execution of Saddam Hussein to the mounting chaos in Baghdad.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki seemed to have taken as a challenge President Bush's assessment that the Iraqi government had "fumbled" Saddam Hussein's hanging. During an hourlong meeting with several foreign journalists on Wednesday, he suggested that Mr. Bush had been pushed to express disapproval by the momentum of public opinion.

"I would like to correct President Bush that Saddam, that person, was not subjected to any act of revenge, any physical attack," Mr. Maliki said on a tape of the interview made available to The New York Times. "But it was a judicial process that ended with him executed or sentenced to death according to Iraqi law that sentences such criminals to death.

"I know President Bush and I know him as a strong person that does not get affected by the media pressure," Mr. Maliki continued. "But it seems that the pressure has gone to a great extent that led to the president giving this statement."

He went on to assert that Iraq "is not witnessing a war of ethnic or sectarian cleansing" because Sunnis and Shiites are still meeting together and trying "to salvage Iraq," and he rejected the widely held notion that his government tolerated militia infiltration of Iraq's security forces, saying it had been detaining Shiite militiamen.

He also anticipated an increase in the budget this year. And he emphasized that the new security plan was set to start in coming weeks and included the addition of more than 20,000 American troops. He said it would be directed by Iraqis — a contention that has been greeted by some American military officials with skepticism.

Other Iraqi officials, meanwhile, scrambled to show that they were making progress.

Falah Shanshel, one of about 30 lawmakers affiliated with the renegade Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, said the Sadr bloc would end its boycott of Parliament in the next few days. In Iraqi Kurdistan, Anwar Dolani, the military leader who oversees one of the brigades slated for the new Baghdad effort, said the last group of his troops left Wednesday for the capital.

There were also hints of progress on two of the White House's most challenging legislative demands: a new national oil law, and a revised de-Baathification policy that would let more low- and medium-level government workers return to their former jobs.

Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister who heads Iraq's Oil Committee, said that a final draft of the oil law, expected for more than a month, could reach Parliament as early as next week. "We are finalizing the draft, and we have the lawyers going over it to make sure it is intact and consistent," he said. But he declined to outline many of the latest draft's details, suggesting that negotiations may still be incomplete.

Asim Jihad, a spokesman for the Iraqi Oil Ministry, said Wednesday that the new law included provisions for centralized oversight of contracts with foreign energy companies by a council of appointees from several ministries and the prime minister's office. If so, that would be a defeat for the Kurds on their longstanding demand for regional control, but it was unclear on Wednesday whether they had found another way to exert their authority. Mr. Salih, a Kurd, said only that the law "would have some surprises."

Also on Wednesday, Ahmad Chalabi, the former exile who helped the United States build the case for invading Iraq and who heads a committee on de-Baathification, appeared at a rare outdoor news conference in the Green Zone to announce that more than 700 Baathists had returned to their old government jobs. Smiling behind a bank of television microphones as bombs and gunfire interrupted his speech, Mr. Chalabi, who had advocated a strong de-Baathification effort, said the government's roster of rehired workers would continue to grow.

Violence continued in Baghdad. For the second day in a row, a car bomb exploded in Sadr City, killing at least 11 people.

The United States military also said two American soldiers had died in Anbar Province, one on Wednesday, another on Monday.

In Washington, the National Democratic Institute, a nonprofit democracy-building group, reported that an American employee and three of her bodyguards from Croatia, Hungary and Iraq were killed Wednesday when their three-vehicle convoy was attacked in Baghdad.

The group released no names, saying it was "making contact with the families affected."

Iraqi Factories, Aging And Shut, Now Give Hope (NYT)

By James Glanz

DOJ_NMG_0118318

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq, Jan. 16 — Inside a huge shuttered factory on the gritty western fringes of this outlaw desert town, thousands of ornate porcelain sinks, toilets and other fixtures sit in row after row next to the automated ovens and assembly lines that once churned out the products but lie silent under a thin film of yellow desert dust.

However, neither the fancy ceramics nor the machines appear to be damaged, a miracle that no one can quite explain in one of the most dangerous cities of a country that looters have ravaged since 2003.

Whatever the explanation, some American and Iraqi officials believe that surviving factories like this one — once considered inefficient, government-subsidized behemoths — could present a last chance of sorts for dealing with two problems that have remained stubbornly unsolved since the invasion: Iraq's reconstruction and its insurgency.

The factories, state-owned enterprises under Saddam Hussein's government, would appear to be the unlikeliest of saviors — things like a bus factory in an ethnically riven area south of Baghdad, a tomato paste factory in the Kurdish north, and a second plant in Ramadi that makes floor tiles with silk-screened floral patterns. The factories went dark after the invasion for a variety of reasons, including an insistence by the initial American occupation authority that once they closed, vibrant free markets would spring into existence to fill the void.

But neither those markets nor the expected commercial and social benefits of the $30 billion American-financed reconstruction program have materialized. So a few officials and local leaders are returning to the shuttered plants in hopes of finding a cheaper way to help the economy and perhaps create jobs to attract young men who might otherwise join the insurgency.

The dusty old plants are more evocative of guys with lunch pails than the big thinkers who once believed that expensive American reconstruction projects would remake the face of Iraq. "Any opportunity to re-employ more people and give the government a chance to get income from these factories is important," said Sheik Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi, an Anbar tribal leader, as he toured the porcelain and tile factories in his flowing black-and-gold robes. "Especially in this time when Anbar is experiencing terrorism."

The sheik added, in reference to the idle Iraqis who put the unemployment rate at anywhere from an estimated 30 percent to 60 percent, "They are normal human beings — they would rather work than make violence."

In Ramadi on Tuesday, Sheik Sattar and several Iraqi officials, including the Anbar governor and the manager of the ceramics plant, met with Paul A. Brinkley, a senior Pentagon official who, following up on a tip from the American military command, has taken it upon himself to push the revival of state-owned enterprises that he thinks can be restarted with modest financing.

"That factory could be running in a week," Mr. Brinkley said just after the visit. "It's amazing to me in this city, after all that this city has gone through, that a factory with that level of robotic equipment is still in that kind of condition."

Still, the meeting — in an unheated second-floor conference room within a ransacked office building next to the plant — revealed some of the barriers that this last-ditch effort is likely to face. Those barriers include vast inertia within the Iraqi government bureaucracy and questions about whether even the small amounts of cash needed for the effort will be forthcoming from either Iraqi or American sources.

There are also serious questions on whether officials in the focus of the United States presence in Iraq, within the fortified Green Zone in Baghdad, are ready to support factories that were seen as no more than relics of an era that American ingenuity and reconstruction were going to make forever obsolete.

As with so much else in Iraq, there is no clear measure of how extensive the network of state-owned industries is, although the government lists at least 192 companies outside the energy and security sectors. Government and business officials estimate that more than 600,000 employees are still receiving at least some of their salaries, even though almost all of the factories are closed.

After presiding over the collapse of that network in the early days of the war, the United States now appears ready to lend some help to Mr. Brinkley's efforts to revive parts of it. Maj. Gen. Darryl A. Scott, who leads the Joint Contracting Command for Iraq and Afghanistan and is based in Baghdad, said in an interview that he was making a push to use Iraqi companies for supplying things like housing and basic services for the American military here.

General Scott said that although his prime goal was not revitalizing factories, if one of the companies Mr. Brinkley was working with made the right product, it would be given fair consideration. "It's kind of a version of matchmaking," he said.

How far that process will take Mr. Brinkley's effort is unclear. Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, said in a recent interview that he was in favor of using military purchases to give Iraqi companies a boost, but that ultimately the United States would promote private enterprise over government entities. "That's obviously the right thing to do," he said. "The question is, how do you get from here to there?"

DOJ_NMG_0118319

But a senior United States official said he believed that at least until recently, officials at the center of American power here, in the Green Zone, had retained their unbending orientation toward privatization. The official said that he asked Americans in the Green Zone why they were buying buses abroad for use in Iraq when a struggling state-owned Iraqi firm in Iskandariya, south of Baghdad, was making a similar vehicle.

"The answer was shocking," the official said. "It was, 'We've denied these people access to the global free market for 15 years; I'm not going to go back to them and say that you've got to buy buses from some state-owned enterprise.' "

During a visit last week to Erbil, in Iraq's Kurdish north, Mr. Brinkley said in a meeting with local officials that when the enterprises "are laying idle due to our policy of shutting them off, we have an obligation to restore them to the Iraqi people."

Each of the factories comes with different and highly specific challenges, a fact illustrated by the closed tomato paste factory in Erbil, which Mr. Brinkley also visited. With distribution across Iraq before the invasion, the factory limped along for a while afterward and as recently as 2004 produced 804,210 cans — "without loss of one can due to quality," said the plant engineer, Satar S. Mustafa.

Since then, a financial group in Erbil has bought the modest-sized factory, with its shiny chutes, choppers, ovens and other equipment. But the operation is still waiting for what the Erbil group hopes is an American investor, said Azzat M. Othman, who is the group's executive manager and says he worked on Wall Street in various capacities for 25 years before returning home to Kurdistan.

"What we are really looking for is an investor who has an interest in this type of operation," said Mr. Othman, who estimates that the factory will generate 100 to 150 jobs.

The porcelain factory is another case entirely. When a worker unlocks a set of big metal doors and slides them back with a boom, a darkened interior perhaps 100 yards in either direction shelters machinery that looks as if it had just been purchased. Half-finished sinks sit in rows along the assembly lines like sculptures left by some artist who intended to return and complete the work with a few strokes of the chisel.

And there is inventory. An assessment by the American occupation officials who shut this factory concluded that it was too small and inefficient to turn a profit in a competitive marketplace, but sinks with paisley and vine patterns look as if they could be sitting on shelves at Home Depot. The toilets are sturdy.

The Iraqis, who intend to keep the plant within the government and say that it could start up again if given an allocation of electricity, insisted that an American take one of the sinks as a sample. It was shoved into one of the armored vehicles belonging to the American military unit that brought the officials here.

But even if everything else here works perfectly, the question hovering over the project is whether the factory will be attacked now that it is associated with Americans. Sheik Sattar, who has already gained fame in Iraq for leading a coalition of Anbar tribes against Al Qaeda, said that would not be a problem.

After all, he said, the factory has remained in good condition until now. "We protected it," he said. Whether the same assurances can be given for the other factories around the country remains to be seen.

Timing Of Hearing Is Blow To The White House (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a setback for the White House, the Senate Armed Services Committee has agreed to hold a hearing Tuesday on the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the next military commander in Iraq — a move that could set the stage for a potentially bitter battle over the future of the current top general in the war, congressional officials said Wednesday.

White House officials are concerned that Congress may try to "scapegoat" Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who has overseen the Iraq war since 2004 and has been nominated as Army chief of staff, the service's highest post. Army and administration officials had planned for Casey to be considered first, in the belief that the urgency of appointing Petraeus as his successor would dissuade lawmakers from engaging in a long and divisive fight over his handling of the war.

But last week, several senators pressed Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to have Petraeus' nomination sent to them quickly so he could take over command of military operations in Iraq.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and one of the chief advocates of President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq, has attacked Casey's command of the war and has embraced Petraeus, who shares his support for a troop increase and a change in strategy in Iraq.

Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, another GOP supporter of the troop increase, has argued that the appointment of Petraeus is at least as important to turning around the war as sending additional forces.

DOJ_NMG_0118320

Although Defense officials had indicated Casey's nomination would go to the Senate first, White House officials sent over three nominations simultaneously Tuesday — those of Petraeus, Casey and Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, who has been nominated to head the U.S. Central Command, which oversees all U.S. military activity in the Mideast.

On Wednesday, Senate Democrats, at McCain's urging, moved to put Petraeus' confirmation hearing on the committee's calendar. Casey's has not yet been scheduled.

Though he is a strong proponent of the troop increase, Petraeus has been praised by Democrats as well as Republicans. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) indicated during a hearing last week that the committee could act quickly to send his nomination to the full Senate.

But the swift consideration of Petraeus could mean a rougher time for Casey, who has been criticized by McCain and others for failing to seek additional troops or commit existing forces to Al Anbar province, a stronghold of the Sunni insurgency.

The nomination of Casey as chief of staff has drawn comparisons of him and Gen. William C. Westmoreland, the controversial commander who oversaw the Vietnam War from 1964 to 1968. When Westmoreland was replaced in Vietnam, he too was nominated as Army chief of staff and served in that post for four years.

The Army was forced to scrap plans to nominate Casey's predecessor, Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, for a four-star job over fears that his confirmation hearing would devolve into a bitter debate over the Abu Ghraib prison scandal and the rise of the insurgency in Iraq.

Under Casey's watch, Iraq became embroiled in sectarian violence, and the planned drawdown of American forces had to be shelved. Administration officials have said repeatedly that it is unfair to blame Casey, arguing that the Iraqi government has failed to make the necessary concessions or compromises that could lead to an easing of the security problems.

Gates recommended Casey for the Army's top job, saying he believes that the general's time in Iraq makes him well positioned to understand the strains the war has placed on the service.

But critics of Casey say privately that he should have questioned the administration's strategy more vigorously and contend that it is reasonable to hold him accountable for the lack of success the military has had in Iraq over the last two years.

The next Army chief of staff will oversee Bush's proposal to expand the Army as well as help muster additional forces for Iraq if the troop increase lasts more than a short amount of time.

Democrats may use the Casey nomination to review the missteps in American strategy over the last two years. Some senators are likely to hit Casey with pointed questions over how the Iraq strategy was formed, why it failed and why it was not altered sooner.

"I think there will be some who want to get into it," said a Democratic Senate staffer who requested anonymity when discussing party strategy. "We have not had a nomination like this."

Casey could also come under criticism from Republicans who support the president's plan. Although he has backed the decision to increase the number of troops, he is widely seen as skeptical about whether additional U.S. forces will improve the overall security situation.

And some Republicans worry that Casey, in his new job, could be in a position to undermine the troop increase. As Army chief of staff, he would have no direct say in how the war is fought but would be responsible for providing additional forces for Iraq; any increase in the number of forces requires creativity by the Army to figure out where the personnel can come from. He would also sit on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which provides advice on the conduct of the war.

Top Army officers argue privately that after handling one of the most difficult jobs on the planet for 2 1/2 years, Casey deserves the top Army post. Army officials have also said that under the current Pentagon rules, if Casey remains unconfirmed for too long, he could lose his four-star rank and be automatically demoted to a two-star general.

American Woman Killed In Baghdad Attack (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD — An American woman working for a U.S. nonprofit organization in Iraq to help strengthen the fledgling government was among four people killed Wednesday in a roadside ambush.

The woman, whose name was withheld pending notification of her family, worked for the National Democratic Institute, a Washington organization that advises political parties around the world.

Les Campbell, director of the group's operations in the Middle East and North Africa, said the three other people killed — a Hungarian, a Croat and an Iraqi — were bodyguards from the private security firm Unity Resources Group.

Two other guards were injured, one seriously, Campbell said.

He said details of the attack on the victims' convoy remained sketchy.

"The people who lived to tell the tale are injured," Campbell said from Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0118321

He said the attack occurred when the National Democratic Institute employee was leaving a morning training seminar in Baghdad that she had conducted for Iraqi political parties.

He said the ambush in the Yarmouk neighborhood led to an extended gunfight between the attackers and the security guards. The attackers also threw grenades.

Campbell said the woman had been in Iraq for three months on an expected 18-month tour to work with political parties.

A National Democratic Institute official in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity for security reasons, said the victim "was an extremely hardworking and dedicated young woman."

"She brought a lot of enthusiasm. She believed in what she was doing," the official said.

The National Democratic Institute is among a small group of charities and nongovernmental groups still working in the country, often expending large amounts of money for security.

Typically, the organization's staff members put on workshops, seminars and discussion groups to show political parties how to recruit activists, research public needs and promote their ideas to voters.

The National Democratic Institute and several like-minded organizations are cloistered in a well-guarded central Baghdad compound outside the heavily fortified Green Zone. But an Iraqi official at one of the organizations said he thought the woman had lived in the Green Zone.

An April 2005 suicide bombing of another National Democratic Institute convoy killed Marla Ruzicka, a 28-year-old activist from Lakeport, Calif., who worked with the nonprofit Campaign for Innocent Victims in Conflict.

Campbell said that although his group remained committed to its work in Iraq, it would reevaluate how it did business in the country and could reconsider its presence in Baghdad.

"Something like this shakes us," he said.

The attack came on a day when car bombs killed at least 27 people in Baghdad and northern Iraq.

In the deadliest blast, a suicide bomber rammed an explosives-packed car into a busy market in the capital's mostly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Sadr City, the stronghold of radical cleric Muqtada Sadr and his Al Mahdi militia. At least 17 people were killed and 45 injured, including a family of four in a passing car.

A truck bomb aimed at a police station in the oil-rich city of Kirkuk killed at least 10 people and injured 42.

The U.S. military announced that a soldier died Wednesday and another died Monday of wounds sustained in combat in Al Anbar province. Their names were not released.

Gunfire erupted and rocket shells landed on Baghdad's Haifa Street, a volatile Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold near the Green Zone.

A roadside bomb targeting a police patrol in the capital killed one officer and injured two others.

Gunmen kidnapped a Baghdad city councilman and killed four of his bodyguards.

Police in Hillah, south of the capital, discovered the body of a police officer who was hanged.

Sadr City Market Bomb Kills 17 (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide car bomber killed 17 Shi'ites at a teeming Sadr City market yesterday, while gunmen in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Baghdad shot up a convoy of democracy workers in an ambush that took the lives of an American woman and three bodyguards.

An Iraqi army officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of security concerns, said the attack on the Western convoy took place in Yarmouk, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad.

The three-car convoy belonged to the Washington-based National Democratic Institute, said Les Campbell, the not-for-profit group's Middle East director. He said the four dead included an American woman along with three security contractors: a Hungarian, a Croatian and an Iraqi. Two others were wounded, one seriously, Mr. Campbell said by telephone from Washington. Their names were withheld until their families could be notified.

"It appeared to be an attack with fairly heavy weapons; we don't know what kind," Mr. Campbell said. "We have some information that a firefight ensued. Our security company responded to the attack."

Mr. Campbell said the ambush took place at midday as the group returned from a program elsewhere in Baghdad.

The last known American female civilian to be killed was Marla Ruzicka, a 28-year-old rights activist from California who died in a car bombing in April 2005.

The suicide car bomb exploded a day after twin car bombs struck Al-Mustansiriya University in Baghdad, killing at least 70 students lined up for the ride home in what appeared to be a renewed campaign of Sunni insurgent violence against Shi'ites. More than 130 were injured.

DOJ_NMG_0118322

It was the single deadliest attack on civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when a series of car bombs and mortar attacks by suspected al Qaeda in Iraq fighters in Sadr City slum killed at least 215 persons.

Another suicide car bomb exploded earlier yesterday at a checkpoint in the city of Kirkuk after guards opened fire as the driver approached a police station, police said. The blast, in the center of the oil-rich city 180 miles north of Baghdad, killed eight persons and injured dozens.

Violence is rising in northern Iraq even as the government and U.S. forces prepare for a massive security operation aimed at stopping sectarian attacks in the capital.

The escalation of deadly attacks coincided with Tuesday's release of U.N. figures that showed an average of 94 civilians died each day in sectarian bloodshed last year.

Two more American soldiers died this week, the U.S. military said. One soldier from the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died yesterday from wounds sustained in an operation in Anbar, the Sunni insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad. Another soldier, from Regimental Combat Team 5, died Monday, the military said without elaborating.

The deaths brought the toll of U.S. military members who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003 to 3,028, according to an Associated Press count.

Lost In Translation: Iraq's Injured "Terps" (WSJ)

By Joel Millman, Gina Chon

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

AMMAN, Jordan -- Cocky, cheerful Ali Adil thought he found his calling as an interpreter with the Third Marines, patrolling Iraq's most dangerous ground. The pay was good and he loved bantering about women and rock 'n' roll with young Americans. By helping Marines root out insurgents, he believed he was building a peaceful and just Iraq.

But since July -- when a suicide bomber drove an explosives-filled tanker into a building his unit was guarding -- the 20-year-old Mr. Adil has faced a different future. After suffering severe burns, he has undergone nine skin grafts at a hospital in Amman and lives in a dormitory with a dozen other wounded Iraqi interpreters -- "Terps" as the Americans call them.

Looking to avoid adding refugees, Jordan wants the Iraqis to leave the country when they are released from the hospital and no longer need postoperative treatment. The interpreters look at a return to Iraq as a death sentence. Their absence from home already may have endangered their families. "When someone is gone for a while, and nobody knows if he's really dead, the militias start asking, 'Is he with the Americans?' " says Mr. Adil, who says his family routinely receives death threats from Shiite militias in his old Basra neighborhood.

Since the start of the war, 257 Iraqi interpreters have been killed, says Titan Corp. of San Diego, which just completed a five-year, $4.6 billion Pentagon contract to provide linguists to U.S. forces. Most of those killed were assassinated while on home leave, the company says.

Hobbling on crutches or rolling through their days in wheelchairs, the Terps see themselves as combat veterans of America's war, which should entitle them to medical care, pensions and safety. Most want to emigrate to the U.S.

After lobbying by the U.S. Marine Corps, Congress approved a special immigration program for translators in 2005. But just 50 slots a year were granted, which must be shared between Iraqi and Afghan applicants with at least a year's service with U.S. combat troops. More than 5,000 locals have served in Iraq as interpreters. Some lawmakers and U.S. officials have argued that if the U.S. made it too easy for skilled Iraqis to leave, fewer would remain to help build Iraq. And if special benefits are carved out for interpreters, thousands more Iraqis who have worked with Americans -- from drivers to nurses to soldiers -- would also demand similar help.

This week, during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, lawmakers from both parties said more should be done to help Iraqis, particularly those who have helped the U.S. war effort. Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said only 466 Iraqis have been admitted to the U.S. as refugees since 2003, and because of increasing violence last year, more Iraqis are fleeing their homes than are returning to them.

In their dormitory here, interpreters display the kind of tolerance U.S. war planners hoped would take root in Iraq. Shiites, Sunnis, Christians and Kurds mingle, their combat experience outweighing religious and ethnic divisions. The Terps come from secular households and call each other by their combat nicknames, adding to their sense of solidarity and distance from Iraq's murderous sectarianism.

Swapping Stories

Mr. Adil, a Shiite, is "Milan" because he liked to play as the AC Milan soccer team in PlayStation soccer games. Moghera al-Gaylany, a wealthy Sunni who learned English from a Welsh nanny, is "M2." He suffered eye and arm injuries from shrapnel. Abdul al-Basit, a Kurd who was hit by sniper fire in his arms and abdomen, is "Alan." Between therapy sessions, the interpreters swap stories and sometimes view video of the attacks that sent them to Amman. Such videos were usually taken by intelligence officers on the scene.

DOJ_NMG_0118323

The wounded Terps sent here for treatment -- about 100 last year -- stay weeks or months. The hospital's management asked that the facility's name not be published for fear of attack. Amputees are the norm. Diyer Hassan arrived in November, still in a coma after leaving Iraq, where he had been on a predawn Baghdad patrol with the U.S. Army's 26th Infantry. The 20-year-old awoke in a hospital room to discover his legs amputated just below the pelvis. He had been working to raise cash to finish at Baghdad University and earn an accounting degree.

In a nearby room is one of the oldest Terps, Rabeh Khafaji, a 52-year-old Shiite nicknamed "Marcos." He was close to troops he patrolled with and says he "adopted" his 23-year-old platoon leader, Lt. Emily Perez. Told recently that she died in the same explosion that took both his lower legs, the former merchant seaman clutched Ms. Perez's photo to his chest and sobbed, "My beautiful child."

Cooks' Jobs

When U.S. and British forces swept through Iraq in 2003, Mr. Adil was hopeful about the future. He says his father, an elderly Shiite shopkeeper, and his Christian mother did their best to steer their eight sons from trouble. When two were drafted during the Iran-Iraq war, the family bribed a base commander to assign them cooks' jobs far from the front. When other Shiites rebelled against Saddam Hussein after the 1991 war, "we hid under our beds," he says. The family longed for the dictator's demise, and joined neighbors greeting the first troops entering Basra.

Fresh out of a two-year technical high school, the slim teenager was eager to test his rudimentary English, learned mostly from listening to an older brother's Pink Floyd records and by surfing the Internet. He says he landed a job paying $200 a month as an interpreter for a company of the British army's Royal Engineers.

Mr. Adil, the second-youngest child, suddenly became the family's principal breadwinner. While one brother lined up work as a policeman, most of the others held day laborer jobs. One brother, Amjad Adil, now 29, drove his own cab until carjackers took it. He, too, then went to work for the British, and was quickly dubbed "Tommy Gun" for his admiration of automatic weapons.

Although the Adil brothers say their work was routine -- translating for British officers meeting local dignitaries -- insurgents slipped at least three threatening letters under the family's front door warning them to quit. Letters tacked to nearby lampposts listed neighbors already killed for collaborating.

Worried about his safety, Ali left for Baghdad in January 2005 and found work with Titan, the main contractor supplying U.S. forces with interpreters. Titan paid him $1,050 a month -- three times the salary of Iraqi police -- which included a small bonus for working in the dangerous Sunni Triangle. (The few U.S. citizens who work as interpreters, and have high security clearances, make 10 times as much as bilingual Iraqis.)

In October, Amjad fled to Baghdad to work for Titan too, after he and another interpreter were fired on by four men in Basra. Amjad Adil escaped injury; his friend was shot in the face.

Tours With the Marines

The two brothers remember their tours with the Marines starting in late 2005 as the most gratifying part of the war. "Motivation! Mobilization!" Ali Adil shouted when asked what he loved about the Marines, nearly jumping from a chair as he assumed his battlefield stance.

In al Anbar province, he joined raids on suspected terrorists' safe houses, often discovering weapons, cash and computer files whose data led Marines to other targets. Some of the finds were unsettling. The Marines couldn't tell if U.S.-issued M-16s and body armor they found had been stripped from dead comrades or stolen by infiltrators working on U.S. bases.

Night raids were an adrenaline rush. After a fusilier launched a concussion grenade through an open window, Mr. Adil would dash into the building with other troops as an explosion shook the building and filled its entrance with blinding light. "It's something you never forget, not for the rest of your life," he says. Nothing terrified him as much as hearing a patrol leader bark the order, "Take cover, sniper!" and hitting the ground.

"He was the best interpreter we had," says Sgt. Nate Royster, a squad leader with the Third Marines. The chatty Mr. Adil would strike up friendships with Iraqi families passing through Marine checkpoints and over time would persuade them to identify Iraqis who were shooting at the Marines or planting bombs. He was also great at picking out Iraqis who were lying, Sgt. Royster says.

Mr. Adil and his brother swapped emails regularly from bases three hours apart. After six months, they had a week off together at the main Marine base in Haditha, where they shopped and played videogames. "We would call home together, both of us talking to our mother and father," Amjad Adil recalls. "It was like a family reunion."

News from home often was grim. During some calls, the brothers could hear mortar rounds landing near the family's home, which is close to a British base. Their parents provided updates on childhood friends who had been killed or seized. One neighbor family paid a large ransom when their son was kidnapped, but the young man never returned, the Adil parents said.

DOJ_NMG_0118324

One day in July, Ali Adil walked downstairs from a Marine rooftop post near Haditha to join Iraqi troops making morning tea. At the same moment, a stolen tanker, filled with at least 400 pounds of explosives, rammed into the building. The driver and several Iraqi soldiers were killed. Mr. Adil, who suffered burns over one-third of his body, and three Marines with life-threatening wounds were evacuated to Baghdad.

After waking from a two-week coma, Mr. Adil was transferred to Amman for long-term care. For two months, nurses tried to make him comfortable before skin-graft treatment began. His jaw was wired shut to let several small fractures heal. Most days he simply lay in bed, sucking soup from a straw when he felt hungry enough to eat.

Now he's able to walk on his own and passes time either in Internet cafes or telephoning his brother. Despite the trauma, Mr. Adil retains his good cheer. "How's it going on, dude?" he greets another Terp.

Titan, a subsidiary of L3 Communications Holdings Inc., says it will pay Mr. Adil's medical bills and two-thirds of his salary until he is officially discharged from treatment, which he expects to occur later this month. The principal insurer for U.S. contractors, American International Group Inc.'s AIG WorldSource division, won't specify how much treating interpreters cost last year, except to say that it runs into "millions" of dollars. One interpreter, Victor Yousif, has medical bills of more than $1 million alone, hospital administrators say.

Mr. Adil's remaining benefit is an injury-compensation package. Such packages can range from $20,000 to $200,000. The money is intended to cover potential income interpreters can expect to lose as a result of their injuries.

Many interpreters say the awards don't come close to covering their needs, especially those who support extended families trying to flee Iraq. For the most part, though, interpreters accept what's offered because they need the money immediately.

"They gave me $88,500 for this," says one middle-aged former professor, who worked as an interpreter for a U.S. Army unit, as he lifts an empty pant leg and then shows a right hand shorn of all but the middle finger.

Death Benefit

Families of translators killed on the job receive a death benefit. Spouses receive 50% of the interpreter's weekly salary until they remarry or die. If there is no spouse, the benefit goes to a parent. Because of Iraq's chaotic situation, it's often difficult to obtain reports and witness statements necessary to prove a claim. It can take several months to a year to settle a claim.

During his three years working for the U.S. military, one Iraqi translator received numerous threats. On Sept. 15, 2006, he was killed in a drive-by shooting as he drove home after a day of working with the Army Reserve's 412th Civil Affairs Battalion. Capt. Brian Freeman says he relied on the interpreter as his "eyes and ears" and also for political connections. For the man's nine-member family, the loss took away not only a loved one, but the main provider. They relied on his $900-a-month salary. His pregnant wife and other family members are waiting to receive the death benefit.

Chris Winans, vice president of media relations at AIG, says the company doesn't discuss individual claims. But he says that when claims can't be settled quickly, it's usually related to problems of documentation or locating next of kin. "Our top priority is promptly settling compensable claims for injured defense-contract workers, and that's the way it works in much more than 90% of claims," he says.

During many U.S. wars, evacuating local allies wasn't a big issue. The vast majority of local allies stayed put after conflicts ended, eager to rebuild their countries.

Hundreds of thousands of former South Vietnamese soldiers and other American allies were left behind when U.S. forces withdrew in 1975 -- many spending much of the next decade scrambling for ways to get to America. About 120,000 Vietnamese collaborators and their dependents managed to get to the U.S. by 1976, although many more languished for years in refugee camps in Thailand, Hong Kong and the Philippines.

After the 1991 Gulf War, the U.S. admitted around 15,000 Iraqi Shiite refugees, who escaped a crackdown by Saddam Hussein. In Iraq today, the U.S. military discourages fraternizing with local hires. Even so, Terps and military personnel often forge close ties.

Sharon Smith, a major in the U.S. Army reserves, married her Iraqi interpreter in 2005, after she hired a judge and had him transported to the fortified Green Zone in Baghdad to perform the ceremony. After a bureaucratic tussle over visas that lasted a year, the interpreter, who had been wounded in action, was able join his wife in Richmond, Va., just before Thanksgiving.

Other wounded interpreters, who lack such ties to Americans, worry they will soon be stateless -- pressured to leave Jordan, unable to return to Iraq, where they fear their names already are on a hit list, but barred from the U.S.

"If I tell [doctors in Iraq] how I am wounded, I am killed in one day," said a 27-year-old translator from Karbala, who requested that only his first name, Haider, appear in print. "The militias rule the hospitals in Iraq," he added, as fellow exiles in the Amman dormitory nodded in agreement.

Under the 2005 special immigration program for translators, about 200 visas have been approved so far. Of the more than 5,000 locals who have served in Iraq as interpreters, many are desperate to leave. Few qualify because they need a letter of recommendation from a military "flag" officer, either a four-star general or a Navy admiral.

DOJ_NMG_0118325

"The highest rank we meet are lieutenants, maybe a captain," says Abdul al-Basit, the Kurdish translator who has been trying to emigrate since being wounded by a sniper last year in al Hawijah. "How are we going to meet a general?"

Two married Iraqi interpreters -- who asked to be identified by their Terp nicknames "Mike" and "Joy" -- won translator visas in 2006. The couple -- who won't use their real names for fear of identifying family members still in Iraq -- served together in western Iraq, with Mike accompanying a Marine combat unit, and Joy assigned to help nurses at a mobile surgical unit. Early in the war, insurgents seized the bus she was taking to a U.S. base and held her for awhile.

It wasn't just their war records, but their lobbying skills that helped them win visas. After three years of service, they befriended influential U.S. officers, including Capt. Joseph Grimm, a Marine attorney, who helped them with the paperwork and lobbied the Pentagon brass and lawmakers on their behalf.

Last month, Mike and Joy visited their wounded counterparts in Amman. "You were in al Anbar, dude? That's awesome," said a young Terp who calls himself "Opie," reaching up to slap Mike's hand with the stub of his own. A few Terps asked them for ideas on how to get to the U.S.

But other interpreters found the visit dispiriting. Noticing the couple's sleek clothing, their digital camera and, most of all, their incredible good fortune, only deepened their sense of isolation. By the end of the evening, Mike was bummed out too, as he realized few of the Terps had a chance of winning a visa. "I have citations, like a hundred of them," he said, sounding more defensive than proud. "Some of these guys have, like, two."

One of the Terps at the dormitory, Mr. al-Gaylany, who was wounded by a roadside bomb last summer, has made some bureaucratic headway. He spends his days tapping out emails in search of soldiers from the military police unit he served with to ask for their help. Staff Sgt. Jason Rogers has already written to his senator.

'He's Stuck There'

"We rotate in and rotate out, but he's stuck there," says Sgt. Rogers, now stationed with a National Guard unit in Bay City, Mich. "I'd like to see him become a U.S. citizen. It would be a great way to show appreciation for what he's done."

Joanna Gonzalez, spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security, says, "If any Iraqi translator, or any Iraqi for that matter, outside Iraq fears persecution if he or she returns to Iraq, then they can apply for refugee settlement in the U.S." She says that this year up to 5,500 refugees will be allowed into the U.S. from the Near East and South Asia -- a region that includes Iraq as well as Afghanistan, Iran, Saudi Arabia, India, Pakistan and other countries. There are also 20,000 refugee slots for 2007 that aren't tied to a specific area and will be allocated based on need.

Terps are especially vulnerable, says Enrique Kelly, casualty manager for U.S. defense contractor Titan. "The interpreters are on no one's side," the retired U.S. soldier says. "The Shi'a hate them, the Sunnis hate them. The Americans don't trust them because they could be infiltrators. As soon as they lose our protection they'll be hunted down."

Mr. Adil and his brother figure they'll never qualify for visas. Neither knows any senior military officials, and Amjad doesn't plan to stay in Iraq long enough to apply. He wants to move to Syria where several Terps already have found haven. "I told my mother this was the end for me," he said as he prepared to return to his Marine base after a vacation in December. "She cried. She doesn't want any of us to do this anymore."

For his part, Ali expects to leave Amman by the end of this month. Rather than return to a translator job in Iraq, he plans to wait for his settlement, which he figures will be about $20,000. He thinks that ought to be enough to hire a smuggler who will lead him to a path other Iraqis have followed to Tijuana, Mexico, then on to San Diego.

There he's confident he'll be allowed to petition U.S. authorities for asylum, or at least find someone in Southern California's growing Iraqi community to put up bond if he's jailed. He's also counting on help from former Marine mates, many of whom live in San Diego County.

"I risked my life with the Marines," he says. "How can they refuse me?"

Officer Facing Court-martial Denounces War (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

The nation's first Army officer to refuse deployment to Iraq urged the public in a statement Wednesday to "stop the war so that the death and sacrifices of American soldiers will not be in vain" after a major legal setback in his court-martial proceedings.

First Lt. Ehren Watada, who is based at Ft. Lewis near Seattle, faces six years in prison for failing to deploy to Iraq last year with his Stryker brigade and for criticizing President Bush and the war in statements to the media and at a peace convention.

The 28-year-old Honolulu native has argued that the war is illegal because Bush did not obtain proper authorization for it, and that Army rules and the Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II required Watada to disobey orders to participate.

On Tuesday, however, Lt. Col. John M. Head, the military judge in the case, rejected Watada's request to debate the legality of the war at his court-martial next month. Although Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, had sought to open the question so the soldier could explain why he defied his deployment orders, Head ruled that the war's legality was a political question irrelevant to the charges at hand.

DOJ_NMG_0118326

Head also rejected motions to dismiss charges of "conduct unbecoming an officer" related to Watada's criticism of Bush and the war.

Seitz had argued that the 1st Amendment protected Watada's remarks. But Head disagreed in his written decision, saying that courts have ruled that soldiers do not enjoy the same degree of free-speech protections as civilians.

In an interview, Seitz said he was "appalled" by the rulings. "They are extraordinarily broad and subjective, which I find reprehensible. They are essentially saying there is no right to criticize, which we all know is not true," he said, vowing to appeal any conviction to the federal courts.

Watada's court-martial is scheduled for Feb. 5 at Ft. Lewis.

Despite the setback, Watada's statement urged Americans to "fulfill their civic obligations" by protesting the war. "I firmly stand by my belief that this war is illegal and immoral."

U.S. Eyes More Troops For Afghanistan (CHIT)

By Kim Barker

Chicago Tribune, January 18, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- With the Bush administration already planning a build-up of troops in Iraq, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Wednesday that military commanders in Afghanistan have appealed for more U.S. soldiers to reverse the gains of Taliban insurgents at a time of growing violence.

Gates, wrapping up his first visit to Afghanistan, did not say how many troops were requested. But other military officials have suggested that an additional 1,000 or 1,200 troops are needed, especially in anticipation of a spring offensive by the Taliban.

Gates indicated he would likely recommend a troop increase to President Bush.

"I think it is important that we not let this success here in Afghanistan slip away from us and that we keep the initiative," he told reporters at Bagram air base during a refueling stop before leaving the country.

Separately, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), a potential candidate for the presidency in 2008, said Wednesday that commanders in Afghanistan told her on a visit to the region that they have "an urgent need" for about 2,300 more troops, some of whom could be held in reserve.

"It would be tragic if we fail in Afghanistan because of an unwillingness to deploy a manageable size of additional troops to aid an important and willing ally during a time of true need," she wrote in a letter to Gates that also was signed by Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who accompanied her on the trip over the last week.

The extra troops would mean more strain on the U.S. military, which was already being tested on two major fronts when President Bush announced a new plan to add 21,500 troops in Iraq. Bush said he will ask Congress to increase the size of both the Army and the Marines. Many current soldiers have fought in both Iraq and Afghanistan, sometimes twice.

Gates said the idea of more troops for Afghanistan will be discussed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff before he makes a recommendation to President Bush.

"I think we have the forces" to increase deployments to both Iraq and Afghanistan, Gates said. "What we have to look at is what the impact is if we were to add more forces here. Ultimately, obviously, it would be the president's decision."

Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who met up with Gates in Afghanistan, said a larger deployment of troops would stretch the military in the short term, but that if done correctly, could speed up the day when U.S. forces could withdraw from Afghanistan altogether.

An increase in U.S. troops in Afghanistan would also add to questions about the role of NATO, which has taken over most responsibilities in the war but which has not been able to persuade its member nations to fulfill all of its troop requests.

Now, 11,000 of the 31,000 NATO troops are from the U.S. As many as 13,000 other U.S. troops are also in the country, training the Afghan army, building roads or hunting for terrorists.

The top U.S. commander in Afghanistan also has asked to extend the combat tour of about 1,200 soldiers already in the country, in preparation for the Taliban offensive.

The Taliban has regrouped in the past year, making their biggest push against international and Afghan troops since being chased from power in late 2001 during the U.S.-led invasion. A reported 4,000 people died in the violence last year, the highest annual death toll so far.

NATO announced Wednesday that a prominent Taliban commander, Mohammed Nabi, had been detained during a raid on a compound in Helmand.

DOJ_NMG_0118327

Also Wednesday, Afghanistan ratcheted up its accusations that neighboring Pakistan is harboring and training the Taliban in the lawless tribal areas along the border.

Afghan officials handed out video CDs with a confession by a self-proclaimed spokesman for the Taliban captured Monday. In the confession, Mohammed Hanif said that Mullah Mohammed Omar, the reclusive leader of the Taliban, is living in the Pakistan frontier city of Quetta under the protection of the Pakistani intelligence agency, Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI.

Hanif said the Taliban staged suicide and bombing attacks with the direct help of the ISI, and that Hamid Gul, the retired head of the ISI, was responsible for paying for an Islamic boarding school in the tribal area that trained suicide bombers.

Pakistan officials denied the charges.

"We don't know what the circumstances were under which he made these baseless allegations," said Tasneem Aslam, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokeswoman. "We don't know who he is. ... It's possible he's being made to say these things."

Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, said in an interview Wednesday that he believed Pakistan has not been given enough credit for helping in the fight against the Taliban. He said a clear distinction needs to be drawn between what is happening in Pakistan and the government of Pakistan. He also doubted that the current ISI is supporting the Taliban.

"If Hanif says the ISI is doing it, my strong conviction is that it is not the case," Richards said.

Gates May Seek More Afghanistan Troops (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 17, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert Gates suggested Wednesday he would ask President Bush to send more troops to Afghanistan, an increase that could intensify pressure on a U.S. military already straining to wage the war in Iraq.

After two days of talks with American, NATO and Afghan officials, Gates said he was impressed with progress toward stabilizing and rebuilding Afghanistan. Yet he also said military commanders want to add U.S. troops to the 24,000-strong American force now there, the highest level of a 5-year-old war.

While Gates used no figures, a senior official traveling with him said the prospective increase would not be large — possibly one or two battalions, no more than a couple of thousand soldiers. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because no decision had been made.

Gates stopped short of saying he would recommend the increase. Yet he offered a rationale for reinforcing a war effort that has seen the quick toppling of the Taliban rulers of a country that had been sanctuary for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, only to have combat flare in recent months with renewed Taliban attacks.

"I think it is important that we not let this success here in Afghanistan slip away from us and that we keep the initiative," he told reporters traveling with him. "There's no reason to sit back and let the Taliban regroup."

A U.S. troop increase in Afghanistan would come on top of Bush's decision to send 21,500 more soldiers and Marines to Iraq over the coming four months — adding to the roughly 132,000 already there. That boost had been opposed by many Pentagon uniformed officers, who worry that it would be too much stress on a force that is already sending soldiers to Iraq for multiple tours.

The two wars, each now longer than U.S. involvement in World War II, have stretched American land forces so thin that the Army and Marines are requesting tens of billions more in funding and have persuaded Bush to ask Congress to increase their size.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said new troop commitments for Afghanistan would further strain the U.S. military in the short run. But if done as part of a successful strategy against the Taliban, it might hasten the day when the U.S. military can withdraw its combat forces altogether, said Pace, who joined Gates for part of his Mideast trip.

Gates said the number of extra troops "depends on different scenarios," which now will be examined.

Thomas Donnelly, defense specialist with the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the military could handle troop increases in both Iraq and Afghanistan, but he added, "It would be an additional straw on the camel's back of American land forces."

Michael DeLong, a retired Marine lieutenant general who was a commander during the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, said he believed the military could sustain a relatively small troop increase in Afghanistan, but he said the need for the added troops signaled that the conflict was not going as well as hoped.

"When we first went in, the issue in Afghanistan was not to look like the Soviets because too many people become a target," he said, referring to the larger force the Soviet Union sent to Afghanistan a quarter century ago. "Things have changed in Afghanistan, things are not as good as they used to be."

DOJ_NMG_0118328

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., a potential 2008 presidential candidate who just returned from a trip to the Middle East, said commanders in Afghanistan told her they have an urgent need for about 2,300 more troops, including some who might be held in reserve.

"It would be tragic if we fail in Afghanistan because of an unwillingness to deploy a manageable size of additional troops," she wrote in a letter to Gates. The letter was also signed by Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., who was on the trip, too.

Gates said the Joint Chiefs — the top uniformed officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force — will discuss the increase with Pace, and then Gates will decide what to recommend to Bush. It was not clear how long this might take.

"I think we have the forces" needed to expand the military commitments in both Iraq and Afghanistan, Gates said. "What we have to look at is what the impact is if we were to add more forces here. Ultimately, obviously, it would be the president's decision."

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, has already pushed for more troops.

Eikenberry said Tuesday he has asked the Pentagon to order a battalion of the 10th Mountain Division to remain in Afghanistan until the end of the year rather than leave this spring. The unit already is scheduled to deploy to Iraq later this year — an example of how thinly stretched the military has become.

It was not clear how many other troops have been requested for Afghanistan. The U.S. military has about 3,500 troops at Bagram Air Base, which is a hub for air supply operations and is the headquarters of the main U.S. contingent in the country, a brigade of the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Drum, N.Y.

The rest of the U.S. troops are largely in the east, along the Pakistan border, and in the south as part of a NATO-commanded force.

In addition to the U.S. force, NATO has about 20,000 troops around the country.

Gates made a point of saying that NATO, which has yet to deploy about 3,000 of the troops it pledged last year, should fulfill its commitments without delay. He said he would be pressing the allies at a NATO defense ministers meeting — his first since taking office last month — in Spain in early February.

At the midpoint in a weeklong overseas trip, Gates later flew to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, where he met with King Abdullah and other officials to discuss the situation in Iraq and regional concerns about Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Gates made a pitch for more Saudi help in Iraq, including economic assistance, but made no specific requests, said a senior official speaking on condition of anonymity who attended the talks and briefed reporters later.

The discussion also included Iran, with Gates noting the U.S. decision to send a second aircraft carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf and deploy Patriot missiles in the area. They did not discuss other military plans, the official said.

Gates Backs Generals' Afghan Distress Call (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Jan. 17 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Wednesday that American and NATO military commanders in Afghanistan, worried about a resurgent Taliban insurgency, had asked for additional troops and that he was sympathetic to the request.

Speaking to reporters after a two-day visit to Afghanistan and before heading here for meetings with Saudi officials, Mr. Gates said commanders had "indicated what they could do with different force levels," but he would not divulge the size of the increases under consideration. A senior Defense official said late Tuesday that the commanders were seeking fewer than 3,500 more American troops as well as about 1,000 more troops from NATO allies.

He said that the request would be studied by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who will make a recommendation on troop levels after consulting with the other service chiefs.

The appeal follows the Bush administration's announcement last week that it was sending more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, where the United States already has about 132,000 troops.

Any significant increase in the current force levels in Afghanistan of 21,000 American troops and 20,000 from other NATO countries could be problematic for the United States Army, which has been strained by deployments over the last five years and is struggling to come up with the new forces for Iraq.

Mr. Gates's openness to adding troops to Afghanistan as well as Iraq is a sharp contrast to the approach of his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued for holding down force levels to speed two countries toward taking the lead in military operations on their soil.

Mr. Gates has indicated that he favored aggressive action to root out the Taliban, the country's ousted former rulers. American officials have said in recent days that Taliban fighters are mounting increasingly brazen cross-border attacks from Pakistan and are preparing to intensify attacks in the spring.

DOJ_NMG_0118329

“There’s no reason to sit back and let the Taliban regroup,” Mr. Gates said. “I think it’s very important that we not let this success in Afghanistan slip away from us.”

General Pace, who accompanied Mr. Gates during his stopover in Afghanistan, has also seemed open to troop increases. “Clearly any kind of deployment of force is going to add to the short-term strain,” he said Wednesday. But it was possible, he said, that additional troops for Afghanistan would produce “a success, so you have to have less stress on the force for a longer period of time.”

Mr. Gates said military planners needed to examine “what role additional forces might play and where they would be assigned” in Afghanistan. Pentagon officials would have to look at whether more forces were available, he added.

Lt. Gen Karl Eikenberry, the top American commander in Afghanistan, told reporters this week that he wanted a 1,200-soldier battalion on a four-month deployment to remain beyond its planned departure date. Officials would not say how many more American troops General Eikenberry was seeking.

Mr. Gates met with Gen. David J. Richards of Britain, the NATO commander in Afghanistan, who has complained that unmet pledges of troops and equipment from NATO countries have left him 10 to 15 percent short of the forces he needs.

“Clearly there is a need to fulfill those commitments, and I’ll be asking them to do that,” General Richards said.

NATO is especially short of helicopters and airplanes for evacuating the wounded and moving supplies. In addition, General Richards still has not received 1,200 troops for a reserve force that can be deployed on short notice. A Polish battalion to arrive in March was originally designated for that task, but officials said that it would be sent to eastern Afghanistan instead.

Mr. Gates met late Wednesday with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia at the king’s hunting lodge outside Riyadh. A senior Defense official traveling with Mr. Gates said he had described the White House plan to send more troops to Iraq and reassured the king that President Bush was committed to stabilizing Iraq.

Commanders Seek More Troops In Afghanistan (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- U.S. military commanders have requested additional troops and aid for Afghanistan to combat a growing Taliban insurgency, Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates said yesterday.

Although the numbers are likely to be a fraction of the more than 21,500 additional troops President Bush has asked for to quell violence in Iraq, the request would put further strain on already stretched U.S. military resources.

After completing a fact-finding tour of Afghanistan, the new Pentagon chief flew to the Saudi capital of Riyadh to meet last night with King Abdullah for private talks on the war in Iraq and the growing strategic threat posed by Iran.

Mr. Gates said he and his top generals were considering a range of "different scenarios" on force levels in Afghanistan, but indicated he was likely to send a recommendation to Mr. Bush for an increase in Afghanistan if his commanders wanted it.

"I think it is very important not to let the success we have had in Afghanistan slip away from us," Mr. Gates said. "There is no reason to sit back and let the terrorists regroup."

The request for more troops was not a surprise, given concerns expressed by Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry and other U.S. military officials in Afghanistan about rising attacks from the fundamentalist Taliban and from terrorist groups linked to al Qaeda.

Last year saw the highest number of attacks on U.S., Afghan and NATO forces since the U.S.-led invasion in late 2001 that ousted the Taliban from power.

Mr. Gates headed to Saudi Arabia yesterday after two days of briefings in Afghanistan, which included a visit to a U.S.-Afghan base near the border with Pakistan where insurgents have been increasingly active. There are more than 23,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, some attached to the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force and some helping to train the Afghan army and police force.

Gen. Eikenberry told reporters traveling with Mr. Gates this week that he wanted to assemble a reserve force of about 1,200 troops that could be deployed on short notice to problem spots across the country, but would not say how many new U.S. troops he was seeking.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said a "plus-up" in U.S. forces in Afghanistan could put "short-term stress" on the military, but would mean less strain on the force over the long run if the extra troops brought stability to the country.

But U.S. commanders in Afghanistan, speaking on background, said that an expected Taliban spring offensive could make 2007 even bloodier than 2006 and that the high levels of violence could continue into 2008.

Mr. Gates said that he was heartened by his visit, because U.S. and Afghanistan forces were working well in the field against the Taliban threat.

DOJ_NMG_0118330

In Saudi Arabia, he met with King Abdullah and top Saudi officials for more than two hours at an elaborate royal hunting lodge near Riyadh. Iraq and Iran dominated the evening's conversation, according to a senior U.S. defense official traveling with Mr. Gates.

"The Saudis are nervous about the trends in the region, and our pitch was that the Iraqi government deserves their support," the official said.

The official said Saudi Arabia sees Iran "as an even greater threat than we do," a rising Shi'ite power with a nuclear program and rising influence in Iraq and across the region.

Defense Department officials had said that Mr. Gates planned to press Iraq's Arab neighbors to come through on promised aid for the beleaguered government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but the defense official last night said Mr. Gates did not press the funding issue specifically in his talks with the king.

The defense secretary's "main mission," the official said, was to communicate Mr. Bush's resolve to follow through on his new Iraq strategy. "There's no doubt [the Saudis] want us to succeed there," the official said.

Asked before the meeting whether he was seeking the king's help in containing Iran's nuclear program, Mr. Gates said, "We can always use Saudi cooperation in dealing with issues in the Gulf region."

US Pressures Pakistan Over Taliban (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Farhan Bokhari

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

The US is stepping up pressure on Islamabad to clamp down on Taliban havens inside Pakistan as US and Nato forces prepare for a tough spring campaign in Afghanistan by the Islamic fundamentalists.

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, this week laid down clear markers that it wanted General Pervez Musharraf, president of Pakistan, to crack down on Taliban militants in Pakistan.

“There are more attacks coming across the border, there are al-Qaeda networks operating on the Pakistan side of the border, and these are issues that we clearly will have to pursue with the Pakistani government,” Mr Gates said in Kabul.

Relations between Washington and Islamabad improved significantly in the wake of the 2001 al-Qaeda attacks on the US after Gen Musharraf pledged full co-operation in defeating extremism. Washington has since been careful to calibrate its public criticism of Islamabad because of the co-operation Pakistani forces have provided the US military and CIA in hunting down al-Qaeda operatives in the ungoverned border areas of Afghanistan and Pakistan.

But as the pace of Taliban attacks in Afghanistan picked up over the past year – and with a tough spring offensive expected – US commanders are frustrated that Pakistan is not doing more to help.

John Negroponte, the US intelligence chief, told Congress last week in harsher than normal language that while Pakistan was a partner in the “war on terror” it was also a “major source of Islamic extremism”.

Talat Masood, a retired Pakistani general, says Washington wavers between complimenting the regime of Gen Musharraf and unleashing criticism. “Its a very difficult balancing act,” he says. “

Pakistani analysts say that the US policy towards the country is inherently flawed, driven mainly by continuing support for a controversial military-led regime while failing to press harder for a return to full democracy, more than six years after a bloodless coup brought Gen Musharraf to power.

Lisa Curtis, a former CIA analyst now at the Heritage Foundation, says the increased rhetoric from Washington is partly aimed at eliminating doubts among some members of the Pakistani government and armed forces that the US is committed to the operations in Afghanistan.

“I think there is probably a serious debate within the Pakistani security establishment on this issue and that is why we need to be clear on what the US commitment and goals are in the region so that this debate can stop and Pakistanis can put their full force behind reining in the Taliban.”

One senior American official said part of the problem was that Pakistan’s co-operation has been “episodic”. Pakistan has helped the US capture members of al-Qaeda, such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. But the official says Islamabad’s reluctance to crack down on the Taliban is partly responsible for the fact that the US has only killed or captured five or six Taliban operatives on its top 100 list.

Edward Luttwak of the Center for Strategic and International Studies says the US is particularly concerned that Islamabad has allowed the northern tribal area of Waziristan to become a de facto independent province where the Taliban can operate freely.

The senior US official said the US was frustrated with tribal deals struck under which Islamabad agreed to withdraw Pakistani troops from the ungoverned areas in return for tribal leaders agreeing to stop co-operating with al-Qaeda and Taliban operatives. But the official said the deal ended up helping the Taliban become more dominant in the tribal areas.

DOJ_NMG_0118331

"Pakistanis had options but chose the easy way out," says Mr Luttwak. "They thought they would get away with it. They are not getting away with it because the Americans are reacting. I think they will bite the bullet."

Stephen Cohen, an expert on Pakistan at the Brookings Institution, says Mr Musharraf may have over-estimated the strength of the US-Pakistan relationship in deciding not to crack down on the Taliban.

"[The Pakistanis] are aware that the Pakistan-US relationship broke once before over the nuclear programme and perhaps it might break again over Pakistan's support for the Taliban," says Mr Cohen. "But their calculation is that they have support at the top of the US government so don't need to worry much about what the Afghans and Indians are saying."

While American officials are stepping up pressure on Islamabad, Democrats in Congress are likely to urge Mr Bush to tackle Pakistani support for the Taliban. One piece of legislation before Congress would tie US aid to Pakistan to a presidential certification that Pakistan was co-operating in dealing with the Taliban.

If passed, the legislation could have a sobering effort on Islamabad. Alan Kronstadt, a South Asia expert at the non-partisan Congressional Research Service, estimates that the Pentagon is providing Pakistan with about $80m (€62m, £41m) a month – 25 per cent of the Pakistani military expenditures – for counter-terrorism operations.

"The Americans think they have struck a great bargain with having Musharraf support," says Ghazi Salahuddin, a political columnist for The News, Pakistan's large circulation English newspaper. "The reality is, they have struck what appears to be a very poor bargain."

Terror Suspect Dies In Shootout In Philippines (WP/AP)

By Jim Gomez, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

MANILA, Jan. 17 -- A militant leader tied to al-Qaeda and accused of masterminding one of Southeast Asia's worst terror attacks has been killed, the Philippine military said Wednesday.

Jainal Antel Sali Jr., popularly known as Abu Sulaiman -- a top leader of the Abu Sayyaf rebel group -- died in a fierce gun battle Tuesday with army special forces, military chief Gen. Hermogenes Esperon Jr. said. Sulaiman was the highest-ranking Abu Sayyaf commander to be killed by U.S.-backed troops.

Sulaiman allegedly helped plot a February 2004 bombing that triggered a ferry fire in waters near Manila, killing 116 people in Southeast Asia's second-worst terrorist attack. Three years earlier, he had been involved in the kidnapping of three Americans.

One of the former hostages, Gracia Burnham, said in a statement that Sulaiman now faces judgment by God.

"Based on the six months I had close contact with Sulaiman during our year of captivity, I would say he was the most dangerous of the Abu Sayyaf leaders because he was filled with hate," she said.

She and her husband, Martin, were held hostage by Abu Sayyaf for more than a year before he was killed and she was wounded in the rescue effort that freed her. The third American, Guillermo Sobero, was beheaded.

"Martin and Sulaiman had long talks about their beliefs and beliefs in general while we were in the jungle, so today my heart is filled with sadness for Sulaiman because his next step is to face almighty God to be judged," she said.

Matthew Lussenhop, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Manila, congratulated the Philippine government, describing Sulaiman's killing as "a major success."

How The Left Led Us Into 9/11 (LAT)

By Dinesh D'souza, Dinesh D'souza, A Fellow At The Hoover Institution At Stanford University, Is The Author, Most Recen

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

The Clinton and Carter administrations made the U.S. look like a weak, attractive target for terrorists.

IN CONSIDERING a funding cutoff for U.S. troops in Iraq, the liberal leadership in Congress runs the risk of making the United States more vulnerable to future attacks, not just in the Middle East but here at home. To understand this, it's not enough to revisit the factors that led to the Iraq invasion. We must consider the roots of 9/11 itself. Only by understanding the policies that sowed the seeds of 9/11 can we intelligently decide how best to proceed in fighting the war on terror.

Pundits on the left say that 9/11 was the result of a "blowback" of resistance from the Islamic world against U.S. foreign policy. At first glance, this seems to make no sense. American colonialism in the Middle East? The U.S. has no history of colonialism there. Washington's support for unelected dictatorial regimes in the region? The Muslims can't be outraged about this, because there are no other kinds of regimes in the region. U.S. support for Israel and wars against the Muslims? Yes, but the U.S. has frequently fought on the side of the Muslims, as in Afghanistan in the 1980s or in the Persian Gulf War.

DOJ_NMG_0118332

But in a sense the liberal pundits are right. The U.S. made two gigantic foreign policy blunders in recent decades that did sow the seeds of 9/11. What the liberals haven't recognized is that these blunders were the direct result of their policies and actions, and were carried out by Democratic presidents — Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton.

To understand this, we need a little perspective. Radical Islam became a global force in 1979, when it captured its first major state, Iran. Before that, radical organizations such as the Muslim Brotherhood were fighting losing battles to overthrow their local governments. This changed with the success of the Khomeini regime in Iran. The Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was the first Muslim leader to describe the U.S. as the "Great Satan" and to counsel martyrdom and jihad against it. Iran continues to be a model for radical Muslims.

Khomeini's ascent to power was aided by Carter's policies. Carter came into office stressing his support for human rights. His advisors told him that he could not consistently support the shah of Iran, who had secret police and was widely accused of violating human rights. The administration began to withdraw its support and finally pulled the rug out from under the shah, forcing him to step down.

The result was Khomeini, whose regime was vastly more tyrannical than the shah's. The Khomeini revolution provided state sponsorship for Islamic radicalism and terrorism and paved the way for Osama bin Laden and 9/11.

Clinton's policies also helped to provoke 9/11. After the Cold War, leading Islamic radicals returned to their home countries. Bin Laden left Afghanistan and went back to Saudi Arabia; Ayman Zawahiri returned to Egypt. They focused on fighting their own rulers — what they termed the "near enemy" — in order to establish states under Islamic law. But in the mid- to late 1990s, these radicals shifted strategy. They decided to stop fighting the near enemy and to attack the "far enemy," the U.S.

The world's sole superpower would seem to be much more formidable than local Muslim rulers such as Hosni Mubarak in Egypt or the Saudi royal family. Bin Laden argued, however, that the far enemy was actually weaker and more vulnerable. He was confident that when kicked in their vital organs, Americans would pack up and run. Just like in Vietnam. Just like in Mogadishu.

Bin Laden saw his theory of American weakness vindicated during the Clinton era. In 1993, Islamic radicals bombed the World Trade Center. The Clinton administration did little. In 1996, Muslim terrorists attacked the Khobar Towers facility on a U.S. base in Saudi Arabia. No response. In 1998, Al Qaeda bombed two U.S. embassies in Africa. Clinton responded with a few perfunctory strikes in Sudan and Afghanistan. These did no real harm to Al Qaeda and only strengthened the perception of American ineptitude. In 2000, Islamic radicals bombed the U.S. destroyer Cole. Again, the Clinton team failed to act. By his own admission, Bin Laden concluded that his suspicion of American pusillanimity and weakness was correct. He became emboldened to plot the 9/11 attacks.

Still, the 2001 attacks might have been averted had the Clinton administration launched an effective strike against Bin Laden in the years leading up to them. Clinton has said he made every effort to get Bin Laden during his second term. Yet former CIA agent Michael Scheuer estimates that there were about 10 chances to capture or kill Bin Laden during this period and that the Clinton people failed to capitalize on any of them.

Between 1996 and mid-2000, Bin Laden was not in deep hiding. He gave sermons in Kandahar's largest mosque. He talked openly on his satellite phone. He also granted a number of media interviews: in 1996, with author Robert Fisk; in 1997, with Peter Arnett of CNN; in 1998, with John Miller of ABC News; in 1999, with a journalist affiliated with Time magazine. Isn't it strange that all these people could find Bin Laden but the Clinton administration couldn't?

Two lessons can be drawn from these sorry episodes. The first one, derived from Carter's actions, is: In getting rid of the bad regime, make sure that you don't get a worse one. This happened in Iran and could happen again, in Iraq, if leading Democrats in Congress have their way. The second lesson, derived from Clinton's inaction, is that the perception of weakness emboldens our enemies. If the Muslim insurgents and terrorists believe that the U.S. is divided and squeamish about winning the war on terror, they are likely to escalate their attacks on Americans abroad and at home. In that case, 9/11 will be only the beginning.

DOJ:

Conyers, Berman Seek Answers From Attorney General (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 18, 2007

House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.) Wednesday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to clarify the administration's request for U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's resignation.

Lam, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California, announced Tuesday that she has submitted her resignation Feb. 15. A report in the San Diego Union-Tribune suggested that Lam was asked to resign because she had led a wide-ranging corruption case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) that has spawned pending probes involving other GOP members.

In a letter to Gonzales, Conyers and Berman defended Lam's record on immigration-related prosecutions, one of the reasons media reports have cited for the administration's request for her resignation. Conyers and Berman wrote that during the months of May through July of last year, the office was one of the top three U.S. attorney's offices in immigration prosecutions, "hardly a record that would lead to removal," they wrote.

"Forcing Ms. Lam's resignation now leaves the appearance that this growing public corruption probe may be part of the Administration's motivation in removing her," the letter states. "If this is untrue, it is vitally important that this perception be corrected, and we ask you to share with us the basis of your request for her resignation."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse dismissed accusations that Lam's resignation request was politically motivated in any way.

"The department's record of rooting out public corruption is tremendous," he said. "These cases have been brought by career prosecutors directed by departmental leadership to seek out corruption wherever it exists."

Lam's Exit Draws Scrutiny By Dems (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Congressmen ask if U.S. attorney in San Diego was forced out over her role in corruption case.

Two prominent Democratic congressmen asked the U.S. Justice Department on Wednesday whether the Bush administration forced San Diego U.S. Atty. Carol Lam to resign because of her vigorous prosecution of public corruption cases, including that of a longtime Republican lawmaker.

In a letter to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzalez, Reps. John Conyers of Michigan, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and Howard Berman of California, a member of the committee, said they were "perplexed" that Lam was being removed at a time when her leadership of the office has drawn praise from law enforcement officials in San Diego.

"Since her appointment as U.S. attorney in 2002, we have heard no suggestion that she was either unqualified for the position or that she was guilty of misconduct in her office," the congressmen wrote.

Moreover, they noted, Lam had been heading a continuing high-profile public corruption probe that already has led to the federal conviction and imprisonment of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham for bribery and tax evasion.

"We do not doubt that removing Lam from the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego now will disrupt this investigation," the congressmen wrote, adding that the forced resignation "leaves the appearance that this growing public corruption probe may be part of the administration's motivation in removing her.

"If this is untrue, it is vitally important that this perception be corrected, and we ask you to share with us the basis of your request for her resignation," they said.

While Lam has not been available for comment, a Justice Department spokesman denied that the career prosecutor and former Superior Court judge was asked to resign because of her work in public corruption cases.

"These allegations are reckless and inaccurate since the department does not make decisions about the criminal justice system based on politics," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

"I am not going to comment on speculation about any U.S. attorney that was rumored to have been encouraged to leave. However, it is erroneous to believe that anyone would be encouraged to resign in an effort to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case," he said.

"The department's record rooting out public corruption is tremendous. These cases are brought by the career prosecutors directed by DOJ leadership to seek out corruption wherever it exists."

In a Senate speech Tuesday, California Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein charged that Lam and six other U.S. attorneys, including the top federal prosecutor in San Francisco, Kevin V. Ryan, had been forced to resign recently without explanation. Feinstein said she planned to raise the issue today with Gonzalez at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Politics And The Corruption Fighter (NYT)

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

In its secretive purge of key United States attorneys, the Bush administration is needlessly giving comfort to any number of individuals now under federal investigation. Most prominently, there is Representative Jerry Lewis, the California Republican whose dealings as appropriations chairman have been under scrutiny in the continuing investigation of lawmakers delivering quid pro quo favors for contractors and lobbyists.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego is one of a number of prosecutors (there's no official tally) being forced from office without the courtesy of an explanation. A career professional, Ms. Lam ran a first-rate investigation of Randy Cunningham, the former Republican congressman from California, who admitted taking more than $2.4 million in bribes.

Ms. Lam then turned her attention to Mr. Lewis as she plumbed Congress's weakness for "earmarks" — legislation that lawmakers customize on behalf of deep-pocketed campaign contributors. The focus moved to Mr. Lewis — who has denied any wrongdoing — after the disclosure that one of his staff aides became a lobbyist and arranged windfall contracts worth hundreds of millions.

Stymied by the previous Republican Congress, Ms. Lam was negotiating with the new Democratic leadership to obtain extensive earmarks documentation for her investigation when the administration forced her resignation.

Legal professionals are defending Ms. Lam, with the F.B.I. chief in San Diego asking: "What do you expect her to do? Let corruption exist?" It's especially alarming that the White House can use a loophole in the Patriot Act to name a successor who will not have to face questions or confirmation by the Senate. The administration owes the nation a full explanation of a move that reeks of politics.

Federal Prosecutor In BALCO Probe Resigns (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-The federal prosecutor who has led the high-profile probe into U.S. athlete doping abuse announced he was stepping down, and critics alleged it was because of political pressure from the government.

Kevin Ryan, U.S. attorney for California's Northern District, has headed the investigation into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the Burlingame supplements lab at the center of the doping scandal that has touched some of U.S. professional sports' biggest stars.

The BALCO investigation has led to five guilty pleas, spurred congressional hearings and cast suspicion on San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds. A federal grand jury is probing whether Bonds lied to an earlier grand jury about whether he knowingly used performance-enhancing substances.

Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters are facing jail for refusing to tell prosecutors who leaked secret BALCO grand jury testimony to them.

Ryan is one of 11 top federal prosecutors who have resigned or announced their resignations since an obscure provision in the USA Patriot Act reauthorization last year enabled the U.S. attorney general to appoint replacements without Senate confirmation. Carol Lam, who headed California's Southern District, also announced on Tuesday she would be leaving.

California Senator Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, complained on the Senate floor on Tuesday that the White House is using the provision to oust Ryan, Lam and other federal prosecutors and replace them with Republican allies.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied the claim, saying administration officials "in no way politicize these decisions."

Ryan, who was appointed to his post in 2002, replacing now-FBI director Robert Mueller, reached a "mutually agreeable decision with Washington" to step down, spokesman Luke Macaulay said. He declined to say whether President George W. Bush had asked Ryan to resign.

Ryan did not give a date for his last day on the job.

Criticism of Ryan mostly has focused on his administration of the office. Last year, a Justice Department audit reportedly questioned Ryan's management and rated staff morale as low.

U.S. Attorney Ryan's Departure May Be Part Of Bush Administration Purge (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 18, 2007

Just about the entire San Francisco federal bar figured U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan would be on his way out this year.

They just didn't bank on his departure being part of an apparent Bush administration purge of U.S. Attorneys.

Rumors of Ryan's departure have gained steam over the past year, as his first four-year term neared its end last July -- and since two Department of Justice audits knocked his management style and cited the office's flagging morale.

Then there was the fact that in recent weeks, law firms have been receiving resumes from Ryan and his top deputy, Eumi Choi, according to several sources.

But in a surprising twist, it appeared that Ryan may have been swept up in what some are calling a Bush administration housecleaning of several U.S. Attorneys -- and not a victim of the audits performed last spring by the Department of Justice's Evaluation and Review Staff.

Ryan spokesman Luke Macaulay had no comment on whether Ryan was leaving in connection with the audits. But Macaulay acknowledged that the decision was not Ryan's alone.

"Like all U.S. Attorneys, Kevin has always served at the pleasure of the president," Macaulay said. "It's a mutually agreeable departure."

Ryan sent an e-mail announcing his departure to attorneys in his San Francisco office.

"As my oldest son prepares to enter college this fall, I have been contemplating the next step in my career," he wrote. "After much thought, my family and I have decided that it is a good time for me to move on."

As of Tuesday, it wasn't clear what Ryan's next move would be, or who would be replacing him. One person with a large law firm said Ryan and Choi have been looking for jobs -- and sending their resumes out in tandem -- for at least a few weeks.

"They're not necessarily going together," the law firm source said. "He was being shopped around, and his resume has been sent out."

Since taking office in 2002, Ryan has embarked on several large and controversial undertakings. These include focusing his organized-crime unit on street gangs -- cases that have resulted in four ongoing capital cases -- and the seemingly endless investigation of steroid use in Major League Baseball. The BALCO steroids probe has encompassed several well-known ballplayers and resulted in prosecutions of steroid suppliers and coaches.

More recently, Ryan's office indicted the first case to come out of the nationwide stock option backdating investigations, as well as several large environmental cases.

Ryan's exit was first reported Tuesday in a Wall Street Journal story about an apparent purge of U.S. Attorneys by the Bush administration. The story followed complaints last week from three Democratic senators over a rumored push to fire a handful of top federal prosecutors.

"It has come to our attention that the Bush Administration is pushing out U.S. Attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation," Sen. Dianne Feinstein said in a press statement last week.

She reiterated that sentiment on the Senate floor Tuesday, adding that somewhere between five and 10 U.S. Attorneys are being forced out.

San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam also resigned this week, and on Tuesday, a spokesman for Republican Rep. Darrell Issa told a San Diego paper that Lam had been asked to step down.

WHO'S NEXT?

The Journal story took many in Ryan's office by surprise, and it wasn't until Tuesday afternoon that the U.S. Attorney sent the e-mail announcing his departure.

Ryan's message didn't surprise many in the local legal community, especially since Alice Fisher, the Department of Justice's criminal division chief, began looking into potential replacements for Ryan last summer.

Several people familiar with the communications said that Morgan, Lewis & Bockius partner Leslie Caldwell and Shearman & Sterling partner Patrick Robbins -- both registered Republicans and former San Francisco Assistant U.S. Attorneys -- were called, though the inquiries were described as "preliminary."

Those calls were not followed with formal interviews, and Justice Department sources say it seems unlikely that Caldwell and Robbins -- both of whom are better known for their legal experience rather than political connections -- are serious candidates to replace Ryan.

Who those candidates might be remains unclear.

"I haven't been asked," said Joseph Russoniello, a former San Francisco U.S. Attorney, active Republican and of counsel at Cooley Godward Kronish. But he said a string of departures isn't unprecedented.

"There were a number of U.S. Attorneys in my time who were asked to step down for one reason or another," he said. "We served at the pleasure of the president."

That statement was reiterated in a Tuesday letter sent by Richard Hertling, the acting assistant attorney general, to Feinstein and Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

U.S. Attorneys, he wrote, "may be removed for any reason or no reason."

That statement is unlikely to placate Feinstein, who pointed out that the Arkansas U.S. Attorney was recently asked to resign, and replaced by a 37-year-old Bush administration lawyer.

"We know that this is not an isolated occurrence, but we don't know how many U.S. Attorneys have been asked to resign," Feinstein told the Senate.

New Questions Raised In Bonds Investigation (NYT)

By Carol Pogash

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — In December 2003, Barry Bonds testified before the grand jury investigating the Balco steroid scandal. That grand jury expired without indicting him. Bonds's case was hauled over to a second grand jury, which focused on whether he had perjured himself before the first grand jury. In July 2006, that grand jury also expired without an indictment. A third grand jury continued the investigation.

Now the sudden resignation of Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California, raises questions of what this will mean for Bonds.

Luke Macaulay, the spokesman for the United States attorney's office here, would not comment on a specific case, but he wrote in an e-mail message, "The U.S. attorney has established an infrastructure with institutional knowledge that should allow for the office's cases to continue moving forward."

Bonds's lawyer, Michael Rains, however, said he was optimistic. "It's almost a forgone conclusion that the scope of the Balco case will change dramatically," he said. "It bodes well for Barry."

It was announced Tuesday that 5 to 10 federal prosecutors are being removed by the Justice Department. A conservative Republican who has been criticized for poor managerial skills, Ryan has not announced when his resignation will take effect.

The Balco investigation has been a high-profile case for much of Ryan's four-year tenure as United States attorney. Last year, four men involved in steroid distribution pleaded guilty and were given what were considered light sentences. But Bonds's former trainer, Greg Anderson, who pleaded guilty and was sentenced to three months in prison, remains jailed for his refusal to talk about Bonds.

Mark Geragos, the lawyer for Anderson, said, "One would hope that a new U.S. attorney would take a fresh look and recognize it's an exercise in futility because he's never going to talk." Geragos said that Anderson's imprisonment "is nothing but punitive."

Robert Weisberg, a professor of law at Stanford University Law School and head of its criminal justice center, said, "I don't think anybody could describe what's happened in the Balco case as efficacious."

A new prosecutor may question how many more years and how many more resources would be required to indict Bonds. Weisberg said prosecutors may avoid an indictment by coming up with a social solution, a quiet bargain that would preserve Hank Aaron's career home run record: If the federal government drops its investigation of Bonds, he would agree to retire.

"That office has too much invested in Balco," said Peter Keane, dean of the Golden Gate University School of Law here. "I think Balco will continue pretty much in the same way it's been going.

"Balco will be bopping around for quite awhile."

Federal Prosecutor In BALCO Probe Quits (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

Filed at 4:51 p.m. ET

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- The federal prosecutor who has led the high-profile BALCO steroids investigation announced he's stepping down.

Kevin Ryan, U.S. attorney for California's Northern District, has handled the probe into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the lab at the center of a doping scandal that has touched some of sports' biggest stars.

Ryan, appointed to the post in 2002, did not give a date for his last day on the job.

The BALCO case has resulted in five guilty pleas, and a federal grand jury is investigating whether slugger Barry Bonds perjured himself when he told a 2003 grand jury he hadn't knowingly taken any performance-enhancing drugs. Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters are facing jail for refusing to tell prosecutors who leaked secret BALCO grand jury testimony to them.

U.S. attorney spokesman Luke Macaulay said Tuesday that Ryan reached a "mutually agreeable decision with Washington" to step down.

Ryan is one of 11 top federal prosecutors who have resigned or announced their resignations since an obscure provision in the USA Patriot Act reauthorization last year enabled the U.S. attorney general to appoint replacements without Senate confirmation.

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, complained on the Senate floor Tuesday that the White House is using the provision to oust Ryan and other federal prosecutors and replace them with Republican allies.

"The Bush administration is pushing out U.S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements," Feinstein said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied the claim, saying administration officials "in no way politicize these decisions."

Macaulay declined to say whether President Bush had asked Ryan to resign.

Outgoing BALCO Prosecutor: Probe To Go On (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale, Usa Today

USA Today, January 18, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Kevin V. Ryan, the federal prosecutor who has led the investigation into sports' biggest steroid scandal, says he wants to continue his efforts even after announcing plans to leave his job as U.S. attorney.

Ryan was appointed by President Bush in 2002 as U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California and shortly after began handling the probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, which has been at the center of a widespread doping scandal.

The investigation has led to seven indictments, including track coach Trevor Graham's and cyclist Tammy Thomas' late last year, and five convictions, Ryan said. In addition, the office continues to investigate slugger Barry Bonds for possible tax evasion and perjury charges.

"I don't know what the future holds for me," Ryan told USA TODAY, "but when I leave, this (investigation) won't just fall off the map. The infrastructure is in place. We have good prosecutors on it. A good review process. Good institutional knowledge. So when I move on, there are those that can carry forward with it without a problem.

"I think we have had a tremendous impact in this case, and I understand there still needs to be open dialogue and debate about it. For those reasons, I'm still interested. If the opportunity presents itself in the future that I can still be involved in it, I'll avail myself to it."

Ryan is one of 11 top federal prosecutors who have announced their resignation as a result of a provision in the USA Patriot Act reauthorization last year that enabled the U.S. attorney general to appoint replacements without Senate confirmation.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., complained on the Senate floor Tuesday that the White House is using the provision to oust Ryan and other federal prosecutors and replace them with Republican allies.

Ryan and spokesman Luke Macaulay declined to say whether Ryan was asked to resign, saying they reached a "mutually agreeable decision with Washington." Ryan did not say when his last day will be, but he expects to remain on the job for several more weeks.

"These jobs are temporary jobs, and people come and go," Ryan says. "But I think we made a tremendous impact. This case, whether measured by the courtroom or the greater arena of public opinion, it has been a success. I'm proud of what we've done.

"This case has been for the good. It has been the right thing to do, and it has had the right impact.

"And we're not done."

Contributing: The Associated Press

Wood Nominated For U.S. Attorney In Kansas City (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - The White House has nominated John Wood, a former Bush administration official, to be the new U.S. attorney for Kansas City.

Wood most recently served as chief of staff to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. He resigned from that post in November.

If he is confirmed by the Senate, Wood would replace interim U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman, who took over last March after U.S. Attorney Todd Graves resigned. The White House announced Woods' nomination late Tuesday.

The U.S. attorney's office in Kansas City is responsible for prosecuting violations of federal law and representing the U.S. government in civil litigation in the 66 counties in the western half of the state.

Wood is a St. Louis native and graduate of Harvard Law School who clerked for U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. After working for a large Washington law firm, he became deputy associate attorney general at the Justice Department.

Wood moved to the White House in 2002, where he was deputy general counsel for the Office of Management and Budget.

He later returned to the Justice Department to serve as counselor to then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. In that post, he helped oversee the department's civil, civil rights, antitrust, tax and environmental divisions.

Ashcroft issued a statement late Tuesday praising Wood for his "legal skill, sound judgment, and strong work ethic."

DOJ_NMG_0118338

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster Options Investigation Widens (WSJ)

By James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Federal prosecutors are intensifying their criminal probe into stock-option manipulation at Monster Worldwide Inc., prompted in part by emails written by the company's former general counsel that suggest he knew the accounting implications of backdated options, say people familiar with the probe.

The emails were written by Myron Olesnyckyj, the former general counsel who was suspended and then fired by Monster last year.

The company, the parent of the popular Monster.com job-search Web site, last month admitted to "intentional" backdating of stock options over a six-year period by former officials, without naming anybody. Monster's founder, Andrew McKelvey, stepped down from his chief executive post last fall, and soon after resigned from the board after declining to be reinterviewed by lawyers conducting an internal probe of the options matter. Monster Worldwide lowered nine years of net income by $272 million to account for extra compensation costs associated with improperly dated options.

The probe into options abuses at Monster is being handled by the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York., considered among the most experienced in the country in prosecuting white-collar securities cases. At least two assistant U.S. attorneys have been assigned to the Monster case.

An attorney for Mr. Olesnyckyj declined to comment.

People familiar with the case say prosecutors may be seeking to focus on Mr. Olesnyckyj, or may try to win his cooperation in investigating more senior officials. Prosecutors have sought to interview several former and current Monster employees.

Monster is one of nearly 140 companies under federal investigation for possible stock options manipulations. Options let recipients buy company shares some time in the future, usually at the price on the day they are granted. That means that recipients can benefit if share prices rise. Backdating involves pretending that the grant date was earlier than it actually was, so that the recipient can later buy for a lower price, thus enhancing potential profit.

Mr. McKelvey founded a predecessor of Monster 40 years ago as a Yellow Pages advertising company. In recent years it has become a major force in online employment advertising. Based in Manhattan, it has about $1 billion in annual revenue.

Monster has said its backdating troubles affected a "substantial number" of grants between 1997 and 2003. The company selected favorable grant dates for new hires, for salesman-of-the-year awards, and for senior executives, say people familiar with the situation.

Under accounting rules in place at the time, a company was supposed to take a charge against its earnings for any options issued with an exercise price lower than the level at which the stock was trading on the day of the grant.

In emails with senior finance and human resources officials, Mr. Olesnyckyj indicated his understanding of the accounting rules and how grants should be properly handled, according to a person familiar with the matter. Separately, another email involving high level officials discussed "the finessing" of outside auditors, according to people who have seen the email.

Prosecutors also are looking at other matters involving Mr. McKelvey, including the granting of stock options to several of his personal employees, including three pilots and a mechanic for his airplane, according to one person close to the situation. Personal employees and Mr. McKelvey's adult relatives also had health-care benefits paid for by Monster, this person said. The amount totaled $362,000 from 1997 to 2006, the company has said. Mr. McKelvey recently repaid that sum, with interest.

Mr. McKelvey's attorney, Steven F. Reich, declined to comment. Mr. McKelvey didn't get stock options from Monster.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan Michael J. Garcia said the office could neither confirm nor deny the existence of an investigation.

--Paul Davies contributed to this article.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com3

Forbes Sentenced In Cendant Case (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. -- Former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison and ordered to pay $3.28 billion in restitution for leading the largest accounting fraud of the 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0118339

In October, a jury found Mr. Forbes guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements in a massive fraud scheme that cost the travel and real-estate company and its investors more than $3 billion. He was found not guilty of a fourth count, securities fraud.

The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years.

"We're very pleased with the result," said New Jersey U.S. Attorney Chris Christie, whose office prosecuted the case. "The public has waited many years for Walter Forbes to be brought to justice."

It was the latest lengthy sentence handed down to a corporate executive convicted of corruption, experts said.

Mr. Forbes, 64 years old, was released on $1.2 million bond. No date was set for him to report to prison. His attorney, Brendan Sullivan, indicated in court that Mr. Forbes intends to appeal. Both Messrs. Sullivan and Forbes declined to comment as they left U.S. District Court.

Prosecutors said they will oppose a defense request for Mr. Forbes to remain out on bail pending his appeal. Senior U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas agreed to a defense request to recommend Mr. Forbes serve his time at a minimum-security federal prison camp in Otisville, N.Y.

Prosecutors say Mr. Forbes participated in a scheme to inflate the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million. Mr. Forbes, who testified during the trial, has argued he knew nothing about the fraud. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted in 2005 of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC. Mr. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion restitution.

Forbes Gets 151 Months For Cendant Fraud (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, January 18, 2007

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — A federal judge sentenced Walter Forbes, the former chairman of Cendant, to 12½ years in prison Wednesday, bringing an end to a criminal inquiry that began almost a decade ago. With the jail term, Forbes becomes the latest member of a rogues' gallery of former CEOs packed off to prison in recent years for presiding over accounting debacles.

In addition to handing him a prison term of 151 months, U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas ordered Forbes to pay $3.275 billion in restitution, an amount roughly equal to what shareholders received in a settlement with Cendant and auditor Ernst & Young in 1999.

In a two-hour hearing Wednesday morning, Nevas rejected arguments from Forbes' lawyers that he should get the same 10-year sentence received by a subordinate, Kirk Shelton, who was convicted in the same fraud two years ago.

Nevas also rebuffed Forbes' attempt to get a reduced sentence based on the $2.5 million in charitable contributions he had made over a 17-year period. Noting that Forbes was worth more than $200 million in 1997, Nevas described Forbes' generosity as "very modest."

As Nevas read his sentence, Forbes, 64, stood erect, betraying no emotion. His wife, Caren, seated directly behind him, also remained composed. For now, Forbes is free on $1.2 million bail until the judge decides whether he can remain free while his conviction is appealed.

From 1976 to 1997, Forbes was chief executive of Comp-U-Card International (CUC), a shopping club that allowed consumers to purchase goods directly from manufacturers.

The company grew each year through acquisitions, a practice that allowed Forbes to manipulate earnings, prosecutors alleged. In 1997, Forbes merged his company with HFS, a travel services firm, to form Cendant.

In early 1998, accountants from HFS noticed problems with CUC's merger reserves. The disclosure of CUC's earnings problems in April 1998 caused Cendant's stock price to plummet, wiping out $14 billion in market capitalization in one day.

In 2004, prosecutors put Forbes and Shelton, his top lieutenant, on trial in Hartford, Conn., charging they fabricated $252 million in non-existent earnings. Shelton was convicted, but the jury deadlocked on Forbes. A year later, another jury also deadlocked on the matter.

In October, after the case was moved to Bridgeport, a third trial ended in a conviction.

Christopher Christie, the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, whose office brought the original case against Forbes, said the sentence "sends the correct message that everyone in our society should be held accountable for criminal conduct."

Ex-Head Of Cendant Sentenced (WP/BLOOM)

By David Voreacos And Jane Mills, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118340

Former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison and ordered to pay $3.28 billion in restitution for leading the largest accounting fraud of the 1990s.

U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas sentenced Forbes, 64, on charges of inflating income by $252 million at CUC International CUC merged with HFS in 1997 to create Cendant, a travel and real estate company. Forbes, CUC's chief executive, was convicted Oct. 31 of conspiracy and false reporting about company finances. His conviction came after two mistrials.

"Your case is the case of a person who has accomplished a great deal in his lifetime and was successful in business but now stands here convicted of a felony, a serious felony," Nevas told Forbes at a hearing yesterday in Bridgeport, Conn.

Cendant and its auditors, Ernst & Young, paid $3.34 billion to settle investor lawsuits and will divide the restitution. Forbes, who testified he was worth $200 million in 1997, claimed he couldn't afford a fine because he has a negative net worth. Nevas waived a fine.

Forbes didn't speak during the hearing and showed no reaction to the sentence. Nevas said he woul decide if Forbes can remain free on $1.2 million bail while he appeals. "We're very pleased with the sentence," U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said. Christie is the top federal prosecutor in New Jersey, where Cendant was once based. His office spent more than eight years pursuing Forbes, keeping the case when it was transferred to Connecticut in 2002.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Martinez urged Nevas to impose a term within the range of 12 1/2 to 15 1/2 years under advisory guidelines in effect at the time of the crimes. Current standards would recommend a 25-year term, he said.

Former CUC president E. Kirk Shelton was convicted at the first trial, sentenced to 10 years and ordered to pay Cendant $3.28 billion. Brendan Sullivan, an attorney for Forbes, asked for 10 years for his client, saying he and Shelton faced "virtually identical circumstances."

Forbes testified at trial that he was a visionary who was ignorant of company finances and operations.

The scandal foreshadowed frauds at Enron and WorldCom. Former WorldCom chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers is serving 25 years in prison, and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is serving 24 years.

The market value of Cendant fell $14 billion on April 15, 1998, when it disclosed accounting irregularities at CUC. Cendant, with franchises including the Avis car rental and Days Inn hotel chains, never recovered and split into four companies last year, including New Jersey-based Avis Budget Group.

Conrad Black's Lawyers Urge Judge To Bar Co-defendants' Statements (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Former newspaper tycoon Conrad M. Black's lawyers urged the judge presiding over his racketeering case to bar prosecutors from using statements his co-defendants made against him.

The Canadian and his three co-defendants are charged with plundering millions of dollars from the Hollinger International newspaper empire Black once ran in Britain, Israel and elsewhere.

The investigation focused on the sell-off of small newspapers across the United States and Canada by Hollinger and so-called non-compete agreements that sent millions of dollars to Black and fellow executives.

Prosecutors say Black and the other executives were not entitled to the non-compete payments and effectively swindled Hollinger shareholders.

Under Black, Hollinger International owned the Chicago Sun-Times, the Daily Telegraph of London and the Jerusalem Post, among other newspapers. The Daily Telegraph and the Jerusalem Post have been sold, and the name of the company is now the Sun-Times Media Group Inc.

Prosecutors want to use remarks that the co-defendants, top executives under Black at Hollinger, made during an internal investigation at the company.

But Black's lawyers said the request was "the culmination of a lengthy campaign of leveling baseless allegations against Mr. Black." They argued his constitutional rights to confront his accusers would be violated if the statements are allowed into evidence.

Besides Black, those charged in the case due to go to trial March 14 are former Hollinger executives Jack Boultbee, Peter Atkinson and Mark Kipnis, along with Ravelston Corp., the private Canadian corporation Black had used for leverage to gain control of his newspaper empire.

After the newspaper properties were sold off, a committee was formed within Hollinger to investigate and determine whether shareholders were receiving fair treatment. That led to the federal investigation.

Black's attorneys dismissed any suggestion that remarks made by his fellow executives to the corporate investigators showed an attempt to conceal a fraud scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0118341

Senate Panel Limits Pay Deferrals For Executives (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The Senate Finance Committee approved legislation yesterday to limit one element of the big pay packages awarded to corporate executives, a move that business lobbyists saw as the harbinger of an assault on corporations and the wealthy now that Democrats control Congress.

On a voice vote, the committee agreed to change rules permitting some executives to amass millions of dollars in tax-deferred accounts. Limiting that perquisite would raise $806 million over 10 years, by congressional estimates. The money would be used to help cover tax breaks for small businesses hurt by a proposed increase in the minimum wage, a top Democratic priority.

Highly paid executives are not the only target of the new Democratic majority. In an indication of the shifting priorities on Capitol Hill, oil and gas companies could lose tax breaks for drilling to raise money for renewable-energy initiatives. Drug companies are battling a House-passed plan to require the government to negotiate lower prices for Medicare recipients. And a variety of businesses, from insurance companies to wholesalers, are trying to block proposals that would increase their taxes to generate cash for Democratic proposals.

"In an environment like the one we face today, every business is at risk," said Dirk Van Dongen, president of the National Association of Wholesaler Distributors, which is fighting some measures.

"I don't think most people have grasped what they may be facing yet," tax lobbyist Kenneth Kies said. "Every industry should worry."

Stan Collender, who follows congressional budget-making at the public relations firm Qorvis Communications, said that though the business community is rightly nervous, "the Democrats at least are trying to find ways to pay for additional spending by going where the money is: corporate tax breaks and subsidies."

The proposal to limit an executive perk known as deferred compensation is linked, in a complex way, to a proposal to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15.

The measure symbolizes an effort on Capitol Hill to find a new political center in a Congress that Democrats control by a narrow margin. The Democrats have placed a high priority on increasing the minimum wage, which has fallen, in inflation-adjusted dollars, to its lowest level in more than 50 years. Senate Republicans, who might have the votes to block the measure, will go along only if there are tax breaks for small businesses that would have to pay higher wages.

But Democrats criticized the federal budget deficit during the campaign, and have pledged not to increase it. To pay for the small-business tax breaks, they came up with a plan to revoke tax provisions that they regard as corporate loopholes and tax shelters.

The result is a grab-bag bill that contains 13 tax breaks worth $8.3 billion over 10 years -- and 14 provisions aimed at raising taxes by a similar amount on corporations, their chief executives and other highly paid workers. The tax package is to be merged on the Senate floor with a minimum-wage bill that has already passed the House. The Senate is expected to take up the issue as soon as next week.

While business lobbyists said they were concerned about several of the tax-raising measures, provisions aimed at executive compensation are causing the most controversy.

The measure would place new restrictions on one of the most popular executive benefits in corporate America. About 95 percent of Fortune 1000 companies offer deferred-compensation packages in some form, said Jeff Varblow, senior vice president of the Cochlan Group, a Chicago firm that specializes in designing and administering the plans.

The plans typically function as high-end retirement accounts for corporate executives. In principle, they work a lot like Individual Retirement Accounts or 401(k) retirement plans, but involve far larger sums.

The plans allow the executives to put part of their income, sometimes several million dollars a year, into a special account without immediately paying taxes. The money earns interest, which isn't taxed right away, either. After retirement, the executive withdraws the money and pays taxes on it, but the earlier tax deferrals mean an account may have grown millions of dollars larger than an ordinary savings account would have.

The practice allows executives to "retire in the same type of lifestyle they were used to living," Varblow said.

The measure approved yesterday would limit the amount an executive could put in such a plan to $1 million a year or the amount of the executive's annual salary, whichever is less. Anyone who exceeded the allowable amount would be forced to pay taxes on all income deferred since Dec. 31, 2006, plus a 20-percent penalty.

Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said limiting the accounts is a declaration that "more Americans should be treated equally."

DOJ_NMG_0118342

"For the vast, vast majority of families, there's a limit on deferred compensation that's not taxed of about $15,000" a year, Baucus said, referring to the sum ordinary people can put in a 401(k) plan. "I just think the general rule should apply to all Americans, even the very highly compensated executives." Limiting their annual deferral to $1 million "is not an unfair burden," he said.

The measure faces trouble in the House, where many Democrats oppose more tax breaks for business. House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) yesterday said he was "disappointed" by the Finance Committee's action.

"The choice to tie a bill raising the minimum wage to tax breaks for businesses will cost taxpayers $8 billion and complicate and delay the passage of an increase," Hoyer said in a statement. "Eighty-nine percent of the American people support an increase in the federal minimum wage, and they should not have to spend $8 billion in order for Congress to do the right thing."

VW Executive Admits Guilt In Scandal (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

Peter Hartz, former Volkswagen executive and German labour market reformer, on Wednesday admitted personally endorsing €2.5m in illegal payments in a perks-and-prostitutes scandal that damaged Europe's largest carmaker and prompted the former personnel chief's dramatic fall from grace.

Speaking through his lawyer on the opening day of his trial in Braunschweig, northern Germany, Mr Hartz admitted that between 1995 and 2004 he organised secret bonuses worth €1.9m ($2.5m, £1.2m) for Klaus Volkert, head of the VW works council. He also endorsed €600,000 in payments for luxury holidays, clothing, jewellery and fake consultancy fees for the employee representative and his Brazilian girlfriend.

The court also heard how a slush fund, named after VW's internal account "1860", was used for holidays in India, Mexico, Brazil and elsewhere for VW employees, top managers and accompanying prostitutes.

Mr Hartz admitted to 44 charges of misusing VW funds without the company's knowledge, and breaking Germany's co-determination laws, which bar companies from favouring workers' representatives.

"My client admits the charges," Egon Müller, Mr Hartz's lawyer said, adding that the former executive had a "bad conscience" about "failing in his responsibility to use company funds wisely". Mr Hartz "made payments for Mr Volkert and then looked away", he said.

Mr Hartz made the secret payments to retain good relations with Mr Volkert, who in turn played a key role in backing Mr Hartz's labour restructuring programmes.

Until his resignation in mid-2005, Mr Hartz was one of Germany's most respected business executives, a reputation that led Gerhard Schröder, the former chancellor, to ask him in 2002 to draw up labour market reform proposals.

The resulting "Hartz" reforms, which cut the level and duration of jobless benefits and increased pressure on the unemployed to find work, are credited with helping to increase flexibility and lower claimant numbers. But they remain controversial. Campaign groups protested on Wednesday outside the courthouse against Mr Hartz and the benefit cuts associated with his name.

Mr Hartz said the case highlighted shortcomings in Germany's cosy system of labour-management relations, crystallised in the system of Mitbestimmung, or co-determination. He stood by VW's advanced form of Mitbestimmung that gives works councillors unparalleled influence over company decision-making but said there had been "insufficient controls" to stop the abuses that took place.

He said no other VW top managers, including Ferdinand Piëch, former chief executive, were aware of the payments.

Under a deal made ahead of the trial between the defence and prosecutors based on Mr Hartz's expected guilty plea, he is expected to receive a modest sentence – a two-year suspended prison sentence plus a fine.

The judge acknowledged that Mr Hartz did not benefit from the scandal and "acted in the interests of VW". VW, which lodged the initial legal complaints against Mr Hartz in 2005, refused to comment.

The deal also means no prostitutes or other witnesses are to be called, thus shortening the trial and sparing Mr Hartz further embarrassment, court officials say. The presiding judge this week defended the agreement, arguing that it also led to Mr Hartz's confession on the €2.5m payments.

A dozen other people also face trial in the scandal, including Mr Volkert. Mr Hartz's trial continues on January 25.

Accounting Rules Won't Be Delayed (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118343

Accounting-rule makers decided unanimously against postponing new rules coming into force this year that require companies to take a more-stringent approach to reporting uncertain tax positions on their financial statements.

Led by industry group Tax Executives Institute, companies had called on the Financial Accounting Standards Board to delay the rule, which takes effect this year. The FASB, meeting in its Norwalk, Conn., offices, rejected any postponement.

The rule, known as Fin 48, requires companies to examine and document their tax positions, evaluating whether those that aren't certain are more likely than not to withstand a challenge by the Internal Revenue Service. Companies will be able to book only a portion of the tax benefit from positions that meet this threshold. In the past, companies had great leeway in deciding what tax benefits may withstand scrutiny.

Previously taken tax benefits that don't stand up to the new standard will result in adjustments to companies' tax reserves as they start applying the new standard in their first-quarter results. Companies will give a range of the likely impact in their annual reports for 2006, but they won't actually begin applying the rule on an annual basis until next year.

Regulators, along with FASB, hope the more stringent approach will help make companies' tax practices more comparable for investors, while additional disclosure will give them more information about the types of tax positions companies are taking.

While FASB members expressed some sympathy for companies grappling with documentation requirements associated with the rule, as well as more difficult judgment calls that have to be made, they said this didn't warrant a delay. Board members noted that they had already twice delayed the effective date for the rules, which companies will have to begin following with issuance of their first-quarter reports, and that under existing rules companies should already be documenting uncertain tax positions.

FASB Chairman Robert Herz said the new rule was prompted by officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission who found that companies weren't taking a uniform approach to the way they booked potential benefits from tax positions. "Their observation was that there were diverse practices, there was opacity and in their view that lent itself to potential earnings management opportunities," he said.

Mr. Herz added that investors wanted more information about companies' tax positions, given the impact these can have both on reported profit and the balance sheet. "Certainly investors we've talked to say this is needed information and it's needed now," he said in casting a vote against a delay of the rule's implementation. "The overall benefit to investors and the capital market of getting this done and getting it done in the time frame we've talked about is the overriding objective."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Political Opinions Complicate Screening For Libby Jurors (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The difficulties of seating a jury for the perjury trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff were evident on Wednesday as more prospective jurors expressed criticism of the Bush administration.

Other potential jurors demonstrated the complications thrown up by the number of journalists, lawyers and officials here.

In the second day of juror screening in the case of the former aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr., a prospective juror testified that he once worked for Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, lived across an alley from Tim Russert of NBC News and went to school with Maureen Dowd of The New York Times.

Mr. Woodward and Mr. Russert are expected to be witnesses at the trial. The prospective juror remained in the pool.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents in an investigation of who leaked to journalists the name of Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative, in July 2003.

Judge Reggie M. Walton has voiced hope that opening arguments can be given on Monday. But by the end of Wednesday, only 24 jurors had qualified for what is supposed to be a panel of 36 that will then be whittled down to 12 jurors and 4 alternates.

One woman was asked whether she had formed any opinion of the Bush administration that might affect her ability to judge Mr. Libby.

"I certainly have an opinion that I can't believe any statement by the Bush administration," she replied.

Did that extend to Mr. Libby?

"Yes," she said. She was excused.

A woman said she hoped that her belief in the presumption of innocence would overcome her distaste for the administration. But she eventually acknowledged that she might not believe administration witnesses who testified for Mr. Libby. Two people were dismissed on Tuesday after saying they did not trust Mr. Cheney, who will testify for Mr. Libby.

DOJ_NMG_0118344

On the other hand, a woman who worked for Lockheed Martin, the military contractor, expressed admiration for the administration on Wednesday and for Mr. Cheney in particular. She stayed in the pool.

A prospective juror who produced reports from Iraq for National Public Radio was excused after testifying that he held Judith Miller, a former reporter for The New York Times, in low esteem for her prewar reports that Iraq had unconventional weapons. He said would not be able to credit her testimony at the trial.

Ms. Miller is expected to testify for the prosecution that Mr. Libby spoke with her about Ms. Wilson. The indictment charges that Mr. Libby falsely said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson with Ms. Miller.

A candidate testified that he regarded Ms. Miller as courageous for going to jail for 85 days for refusing initially to disclose Ms. Libby as a source. That juror, a retired math teacher, also produced laughter when questioned about whether he had problems with Mr. Cheney's credibility. No problems, he said, but he "wouldn't go hunting with him," a reference to Mr. Cheney's accidental shooting of a hunting partner last year. He stayed in the pool.

In Libby Trial, Big Names Make Jury Picks A Tall Order (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

To see how small a town Washington really is, drop in on jury selection at the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, where so far nearly every juror candidate seems to have a connection to the players or events surrounding the leak of an undercover CIA officer's identity.

There is the software database manager whose wife works as a prosecutor for the Justice Department, and who counts the local U.S. attorney and a top official in Justice's criminal division as neighbors and friends. A housecleaner who works at the Watergate and knows Condoleezza Rice, not by her title of secretary of state, but as the "lady who lives up on the fifth floor." And a former Washington Post reporter whose editor was now-Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward; he went to barbecues at the house of NBC's Tim Russert, a neighbor, and just published a book on the CIA and spying.

Such is the challenge as U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton tries to seat a jury of 12 peers for Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, in one of Washington's biggest trials in years.

It has always been difficult to select juries in Washington, where the pool is small compared with the number of trials, and half the people summoned to be jurors don't even show up. But the star power of the players in this case has complicated matters.

Libby is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the disclosure of CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity to the media in 2003, shortly after the Iraq war began. He is accused of fabricating a story to conceal the nature of his conversations with reporters and his role in a White House effort to discredit Plame's husband, a prominent critic of the invasion of Iraq.

Defense lawyers for Libby contend that he forgot the details and timing of those conversations amid the crush of his daily workload and believed he had heard about Plame from Russert. Only later, they say, did he remember that he had actually learned her identity from his boss, Cheney.

By the end of yesterday's session, Walton and lawyers for both sides had quizzed 33 potential jurors and excused nine. The 24 remaining in the pool, and others who will be questioned starting this morning, still could be struck by lawyers on either side. Walton said he wanted to complete the selection of 12 jurors and four alternates by the end of today. Jurors cannot be identified by name, under an order from the judge.

Members of the government and media elite are the key players and witnesses expected to be called in a case that will often focus on the administration's justification for war in Iraq. As the slow questioning of potential jurors in Courtroom 16 of the federal court wound through a second day yesterday, it became clear that those celebrities rub shoulders a lot with the regular folks in this 13-mile-wide city of 550,000.

One journalist, for instance, said she had met a reporter and an editor on the witness list, Matthew Cooper and Jay Carney of Time magazine, when they appeared repeatedly on a foreign-affairs television show she produces at Voice of America.

Another candidate, the former Post journalist, seemed to have a link to nearly every key player in the case. He had worked in the newspaper's Metro section, he said, where his editor was Woodward, a key defense witness. Until recently, he lived across an alley from Russert, a star witness for the prosecution. And he had gone to parties with The Post's Walter Pincus, another defense witness.

He said he would understand if the lawyers believed he couldn't be impartial, but he promised he would use his reporter training to sort through the facts fairly.

"If I were in your seats, I'd be skeptical," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118345

Then he noted that one of his best friends plays in an over-40 football league with Libby. And he has heard that Libby "has a great arm."

Did he mention that he went to grade school with Maureen Dowd, he asked the judge? That would be the New York Times columnist who publicly savaged colleague Judith Miller after some of Miller's reporting on the Iraq war came to light around the time of the Plame investigation. Miller is a witness for the prosecution.

One juror, a middle-aged woman, told the judge that she had worked in the "executive residence" -- that is, the White House. She was an administrative assistant in the grounds office from the Reagan administration until the inauguration of President Bush.

Another woman said she helped develop health policy in the office of the secretary of health and human services. She said she could be impartial about the administration but acknowledged she was "not particularly impressed" by how Cheney has handled certain events.

Not every potential juror knew the people in the case. A retired math teacher who moved here from North Carolina said he had no basis for judging the credibility of White House officials, including Cheney -- although he admitted that he was "not sure I would like to go bird hunting with him, either."

Walton chuckled, and Libby burst into laughter, burying his face in his hands.

Libby Seeks Jurors Who Trust Cheney (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A potential juror in the perjury trial of former White House aide "Scooter" Libby was allowed to remain in the jury pool Wednesday after saying she would be impartial and put aside her tepid impression of Vice President Dick Cheney, an expected defense witness.

"I'm not particularly impressed with a lot of his manners of being, but I can't speak to his credibility," said the woman, who works for the Department of Health and Human Services, as jury selection continued for a second day.

Cheney's credibility has emerged as a key issue, with defense lawyers looking for a panel that can trust the vice president, expected to testify on behalf of Libby, his former chief of staff. Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with journalists about an outed CIA officer.

Libby's attorneys say it's critical they know whether potential jurors view the vice president as credible. Two people who expressed doubts about that were dismissed from the jury pool Tuesday.

"I don't have the highest opinion of him," a young financial analyst said. "If I had to rank people as to credibility, I wouldn't put him at the top of the list."

He was dismissed, as was a young woman who said she was "completely without objectivity" about Bush administration officials who might be called to testify.

"There is nothing they could say or do that would make me think anything positive about them," the woman said moments before she was excused from the jury pool by U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton.

Opening arguments are planned Monday in a trial expected to take up to six weeks.

CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity was leaked to the press in 2003, around the time her husband, Joseph Wilson, was criticizing the Bush administration's march to war. The trial hinges not on the source of the leak but whether Libby lied to investigators.

He says he forgot his conversations with reporters because he had more pressing matters on his mind.

___

Associated Press Writer Michael J. Sniffen contributed to this report.

Attorney Says Racism Involved In Case Against Peete (WMC)

WMC-TV, January 18, 2007

Memphis City Council member Rickey Peete's attorney called the corruption case against him racist Wednesday morning.

Speaking outside federal court after entering a "not guilty" plea, attorney Handel Durham, Jr. alleged racism in the corruption case against Peete.

"There has never been, in Memphis, Tennessee, a successful black man in this city that has not suffered some form of attack," he said.

The indictment against Peete alleges he accepted $14,500 in bribes. Fellow Council member Edmund Ford is accused of accepting almost $9,000 in bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0118346

Durham alleged racism because of the large number of black elected officials that have been indicted in federal stings, including Operation Tennessee Waltz and Operation Main Street Sweeper.

"You have approximately 17 black leaders indicted," he said. "What do you think? I mean, what would a reasonable individual come to? They would have to say something."

Former Shelby County Commission candidate Joe Cooper was also named in the complaint against Peete and Ford.

Man Who Scammed AOL Users Convicted (AAS)

By Bob Keefe, WEST COAST BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, January 18, 2007

Guilty verdict for California spammer is the first under the federal CAN-SPAM Act.

SAN DIEGO — A California man has been found guilty under the federal CAN-SPAM Act of using fraudulent, unsolicited e-mail to trick America Online users into giving up bank account numbers and other personal information.

At a weeklong trial that ended Friday, 16 victims testified they had been tricked by the e-mail. Some said they lost hundreds of dollars.

Jeffrey Goodin, 45, was found guilty by a Los Angeles jury of using accounts he set up through Atlanta-based EarthLink Inc. to send e-mail that appeared to come from AOL's billing department. The messages warned AOL users that their accounts were in jeopardy unless they sent credit card or bank account information to "update" them.

Goodin, of Azusa, Calif., is to be sentenced June 11. He could face 101 years in prison for violating the 2003 CAN-SPAM Act and other laws, although prosecutors acknowledged it's highly unlikely he'll get such a lengthy sentence.

Goodin set up and shut down the EarthLink e-mail accounts in rapid succession, according to prosecutors.

An EarthLink official testified that the company lost more than $1 million because of Goodin's "phishing" scam, according to prosecutor Wesley Hsu. On more than one occasion, AOL barred EarthLink subscribers from its network because of spam coming from EarthLink accounts, according to Hsu.

"This was sort of the ideal case that I think Congress had targeted with the CAN-SPAM Act," said Hsu, an assistant U.S. attorney in the Justice Department's central California district office.

"This guy changed the sending e-mail to make it look like an AOL billing address, and as a result we had lots of victims fooled . . . thinking they'd lose their AOL service if they didn't give them their billing information," he said.

Hsu said it's unclear whether public frustration with spam played into the jury's decision. And while he said he hoped the case would be a deterrent, Hsu acknowledged that even with the federal law, spam isn't going away anytime soon.

"I've already encountered cases where people are sending spam from Canada," he said. "And we can't do anything about that."

Goodin's case was the first jury conviction under the federal CAN-SPAM Act. In September 2004, Hsu helped oversee the first guilty plea under the law, which Congress passed four years ago amid public outcry about the overwhelming volume of unsolicited, fraudulent e-mail.

In the earlier case, Nicholas Tombros, 37, of Marina del Rey, Calif., admitted tapping into private wireless Internet networks in the Los Angeles area to send spam advertising pornographic Web sites.

Belleville Woman Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Jim Suhr

AP, January 18, 2007

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. - Among the many accounts of heartache and horror swept in by Hurricane Katrina, Tina Marie Winston's story was certainly disturbing.

Winston, 34, said she watched helplessly as a torrent of water from the Gulf of Mexico rolled in and swept away her two daughters, ages 5 and 6. The floodwaters swamped her New Orleans home, she said, costing her everything else.

She said the tragedy left her unable to function, in need of counseling and desperate for money to pay for a memorial service held for her two dead daughters under a St. Louis bridge.

But the gripping, chilling tale that brought Winston thousands of dollars in federal aid turned out to be a lie.

And on Wednesday, the woman who cried for sympathy after the disaster got little of it from a federal judge who ordered her to spend four years in prison and repay about $24,000 for various scams over more than a decade, including $4,358 she defrauded from the Federal Emergency Management Agency after the hurricane.

U.S. District Judge William Stiehl told Winston that he understood she had a troubled, possibly abusive upbringing and mental illness, but duping the government with tales of dead daughters "was simply outrageous."

"She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances," said the judge.

DOJ_NMG_0118347

Winston never had daughters, much less a New Orleans home. When Katrina knocked the Gulf coast to its knees in August 2005, Winston was 600 miles away, safe in the St. Louis suburb of Belleville, Ill., where she had moved from Arkansas in July 2004 - more than a year before Katrina.

"These are the types of crimes that absolutely outrage taxpayers," eroding their confidence in government, federal prosecutor Suzanne Garrison told Stiehl in labeling Winston's conduct "extraordinarily undignified."

"She had pretty much dug herself in a hole, not building any future for herself, living in this way by systematically lying to get free handouts," Garrison said.

In court, Winston said simply, "I apologize to the court and ask you to show leniency on me."

When Stiehl asked her if she wanted to say anything else, Winston replied, "That'd be it," before federal marshals led her away in shackles.

Winston, who also goes by the name Tina Gilmore, pleaded guilty in October to defrauding FEMA after the hurricane by using a bogus Social Security number to file for assistance online. Winston also admitted spending $1,321 from an electronic debit card she got through FEMA after claiming the hurricane left her jobless. The agency deactivated the card when Winston exceeded the spending limit, the government has said.

Though FEMA sent Winston $4,358 for housing and rental aid, she still requested more - $10,075 to cover property she said she lost to the storm, and $2,530 for unspecified dental expenses. She apparently never got the extra money.

Officials said Winston also duped various government agencies during a recent 12-year stretch by failing to report her marriage and her husband's income.

As a result, the government said, Winston was overpaid more than $13,000 in Social Security benefits and $4,659 in food stamps. By falsely claiming her husband was her cousin and lying about their income, she also tried to get government-subsidized housing valued at more than $6,700.

"This defendant has, in effect, intended to defraud the taxpayers of this country by every means that cropped into her mind," Stiehl said.

A 12th Dallas Convict Is Exonerated By DNA (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 17 — A 50-year-old Dallas man whose conviction of raping a boy in 1982 cost him nearly half his life in prison and on parole won a court ruling Wednesday declaring him innocent. He said he was not angry, “because the Lord has given me so much.”

The parolee, James Waller, was exonerated by DNA testing, the 12th person since 2001 whose conviction in Dallas County has been overturned long after the fact as a result of genetic evidence, lawyers said.

“Nowhere else in the nation have so many individual wrongful convictions been proven in one county in such a short span,” said Barry C. Scheck, co-founder of the Innocence Project, the legal clinic that championed Mr. Waller’s case. In fact, Mr. Scheck said, those 12 such instances are more than have occurred anywhere else except the entire states of New York and Illinois since the nation’s first DNA exoneration, in 1989.

In the aftermath of the new evidence, prosecutors had joined defense lawyers in calling for the clearing of Mr. Waller, who spent more than 10 years behind bars before he was paroled in 1993.

“I’m sorry that happened to you, man,” Craig Watkins, the county’s new district attorney, told Mr. Waller on Wednesday, shaking his hand in the Dallas courtroom where a judge later approved a motion to vacate the conviction. That motion now goes to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals for formal approval.

Mr. Waller broke down once at the hearing, when describing how his car crashed on the way to a court proceeding in 2001, an accident that killed his pregnant wife, Doris, and the unborn daughter they had wanted to call Grace. “I said, ‘Well, I don’t want to live no more,’ ” he recalled, mopping his face with a tissue.

One of his lawyers, Nina Morrison, patted him on the back. “He lost 10 years 11 months and 3 days of his liberty literally picking cotton in the fields for no pay,” she told the court. “His perseverance is an inspiration to all of us.”

The judge, John C. Creuzot of Criminal District Court, sought to console Mr. Waller, who stood before him in a tan suit, a white shirt and a tie. “A lot of times we are tested in life, and you certainly had a terrible test,” Judge Creuzot said. “On behalf of any and all public officials at that time, I want to apologize.”

Earlier in the day, the Innocence Project provided synopses of the county’s dozen DNA exonerations. “Nobody knows the reason why we have 12-and-counting here in Dallas, but we’ll find out the answers,” Mr. Scheck said. One Texas lawmaker, State Senator Rodney Ellis, a Houston Democrat, has introduced a bill that would establish a Texas Innocence Commission to study exonerations for ways of eliminating wrongful convictions.

The case against Mr. Waller was largely based on the 12-year-old victim's identification of him, court papers show.

Around 6 a.m. on Nov. 2, 1982, the boy, identified only as Jay S., was alone in his family's dark apartment with his 7-year-old brother when he was sodomized by an intruder he described as a black man about 5-foot-8 and weighing 150 pounds, his lower face concealed by a red bandana.

By the boy's account, he heard the voice of his attacker that night at a 7-Eleven near his home, and turned to see Mr. Waller, who was then 25 and lived with his family in the same apartment complex as the victim, the only black family there. Although there were discrepancies in the boy's account — Mr. Waller is almost 6-foot-4 and was heavy — and although Mr. Waller presented witnesses saying he was home at the time, he was convicted in 46 minutes and sentenced to 30 years. He won parole in 1993 but had to register as a sex offender.

He had begun petitioning for retesting of the state's rape evidence in 1989, and redoubled his efforts in 2001 after Texas passed a law granting post-conviction access to DNA testing. Results of hair testing appeared to rule out Mr. Waller as the attacker, but the Court of Criminal Appeals found it inconclusive.

Still, "the Lord kept pushing me because I wanted my name back," Mr. Waller said Wednesday.

Last month the Innocence Project, through use of a previously unavailable technology called Y-STR DNA, found that genetic material recovered from the victim conclusively excluded Mr. Waller and the victim and could have come only from someone else.

Mr. Waller has started a lawn care business, but remains on parole pending the formal action of the appeals court and must shy from all contact with children. "It has been a long struggle for me," he said. "They look at you like you're an animal."

Mr. Watkins, Dallas County's first African-American district attorney, took office two weeks ago in a Democratic sweep. "I can say I'm sorry all day," he told Mr. Waller in court. "I know that doesn't mean much to you, but I can guarantee to you in the future when I'm the district attorney we will insist that we will not send anyone who's innocent to prison."

"The sad thing," he said, "is the person who actually did this crime is still out there on the streets."

DNA Databases May Be Growing Too Quickly (LAW)

By Vesna Jaksic, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 18, 2007

As state DNA databases expand, a growing number of "cold cases" are getting solved, but that's leading to a new problem: Local jurisdictions can't keep up with their burgeoning caseloads.

"I see it nationally as becoming a major problem," said Ted Hunt, chief trial assistant in the Jackson County Prosecutor's Office in Kansas City, Mo. "We're lucky to have a cold case homicide unit and a branch of sex crimes that works on cold cases, but many jurisdictions lack those resources."

And DNA databases are certain to grow even more in several states.

While all states now require that samples be collected from convicted felons, a growing number of states -- including Texas and Virginia -- collect samples from certain arrestees, such as those picked up for violent crimes. Kansas and New Mexico are scheduled to expand their databases to include arrestees this month. California is expected to do the same in 2009.

As of October 2006, the FBI's national database contained profiles for more than 3.7 million convicted offenders, which helped with more than 40,000 investigations. Florida topped the list with 4,907 investigations aided, followed by Illinois, New York and Virginia, according to the FBI.

The state of Virginia illustrates how fast databases have grown. When the state's cold case program started in 1993, the Virginia Department of Forensic Science's database contained 2,184 samples. It currently holds 253,156 samples. Since 2001, Virginia's database has grown by 50 percent.

Virginia's database has resulted in 3,600 "hits," which refers to cases for which DNA samples from the crime scene match DNA samples stored in felon databases. Those hits have helped 3,518 investigations, according to the department. But like many other states, it has been struggling to keep up with its growing workload.

"It's hard to think of cases these days where there isn't the possibility of DNA evidence," said Paul Ferrara, the department's director. "With cold cases, the ones they haven't solved from 20 years ago, all of a sudden you see the light bulbs going off and say, 'Wait a minute, I have this case and the DNA might be good.' That's fine but I think the largest challenge we do have is capacity and turnaround time."

VIRGINIA INVESTIGATIONS

The growth of DNA databases has triggered other problems. Virginia authorities have been investigating why thousands of felons' samples have been left out of the database.

DOJ_NMG_0118349

And some civil rights groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union, have challenged states' efforts to expand databases to include people without convictions, saying that doing so contradicts the presumption of innocence until proven guilty and violates privacy.

California has more than 662,000 DNA samples in its database, which has led to 3,346 offender matches, including some for cold cases, said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for California's former attorney general, Bill Lockyer.

But Rockne Harmon, senior deputy district attorney in Alameda County, Calif., said many cold hits don't lead to anything, often because of limited resources.

"It's a great tool but you have to be careful because what we've seen in California, and I know it's a problem elsewhere too, is an unknown number of these cold hits gets stuck in the police departments and nothing happens," he said. Harmon added that there is no way to determine how many hits fail to lead to charges and cases being filed. "While there have been great success stories, no one can really tell you what has happened to all of their cold hits."

Federal funds are helping states with their cold case programs. In fiscal year 2005, the National Institute of Justice distributed more than $14 million in grants to 38 state and local programs for solving cold cases with DNA.

The Denver District Attorney's Office credits federal money for making its program one of the most aggressive in the nation. More than 4,000 cases have been reviewed and 20 new cases have been filed as a result of cold hits, said Mitchell Morrissey, Denver's district attorney. Grant money has allowed the DNA laboratory to double its capacity by hiring two full-time DNA analysts, improve its instruments and fund detective overtime, according to Morrissey's office. Future goals include investigation of cases dating back as far as the 1950s.

OLD CRIMES, NEW CHALLENGES

But Morrissey stressed that old crimes carry their challenges, such as statutes of limitations and difficulties with finding everyone involved." A lot of people just think, 'OK, you get a DNA match and now you've got a case,'" he said. "That's not true. You still have to do a lot of investigating. Sometimes you still have to find the victim. Sometimes you still have to find the suspect."

Defense attorneys are finding challenges of their own. David Bell, an assistant public defender in Kansas City, Mo., who represented a defendant successfully prosecuted by Hunt for a crime committed 20 years ago, said there are plenty of obstacles for the defense.

"One of the problems with these cold-hit cases is that it truly shifts the burden to the defendant," said Bell, who plans to appeal the case. "Prosecutors get blinded by the DNA. DNA is a powerful tool, there is no doubt, but it must be placed in the context of everything else."

In the Kansas City case, Bell argued that his client had consensual sex with the victim but did not remember it because it was a casual, one-time encounter that occurred 20 years ago. Bell also presented DNA evidence in the trial, trying to shift blame to the victim's husband, whose DNA also was found at the crime scene.

Ex-Keyport Mayor Pleads Guilty To Bribery (NSL)

By Guy Sterling, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 18, 2007

Merla, ensnared in probe of Monmouth corruption, took payoffs

A former mayor of Keyport admitted to a federal judge yesterday that he accepted a $2,500 bribe in exchange for helping a federal informant posing as the owner of a construction and demolition business obtain an emergency, no-bid contract to fix a local bulkhead.

John Merla, 45, had been charged with taking the money at his brother's birthday party on Dec. 7, 2003. While pleading guilty yesterday to a count of bribery, he indicated the investment by the cooperating witness was a good one.

"Did the borough pay (the cooperating witness) a total of approximately $36,200 to complete the work on the bulkhead?" Merla was asked by Rachael A. Honig, an assistant U.S. attorney assigned to the case. "Yes," Merla replied.

He later acknowledged to U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark that he also pocketed three other illegal cash payments from the informant and undercover FBI agents in 2003 and 2004. In all, the payoffs totaled $24,000, said Mark McCarren, the other federal prosecutor handling the matter.

"Did you accept these additional payments knowing that they were being made in exchange for your agreement to assist (the cooperating witness) in obtaining municipal contracts?" asked Honig. "Yes," Merla responded.

Merla faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and fines ranging to $250,000 when he is sentenced in May. But McCarren and Michael Pappa, Merla's lawyer, said the actual prison term will fall between 24 and 30 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0118350

The beefy Merla, who lost his supervisor's job with the New Jersey Turnpike Authority when he was charged in the sting two years ago, left the courtroom quickly after yesterday's plea and did not respond to questions. Pappa said Merla is currently working in his family's restaurant business.

Merla choose not to run for re-election in November after serving as Keyport's mayor from 2003. He had also served as a member of the borough council during a lengthy political career in the Monmouth County community.

In recent weeks, Merla had maintained he was preparing to go to trial and Pappa had gone so far as to send out subpoenas to potential witnesses. Merla's reasons for pleading guilty were "personal," but he did so with the support of his family, Pappa said yesterday.

"John feels a deep sense of remorse for compromising the trust placed in him by the people of Keyport," the defense attorney added.

Ex-Keyport Mayor Admits Taking Bribe (JERSJ)

Jersey Journal, January 18, 2007

NEWARK - The former mayor of Keyport pleaded guilty yesterday to extorting a $2,500 bribe from an undercover informant posing as a contractor in return for helping the contractor obtain a $36,200 contract.

At his court hearing, John Merla acknowledged he took payments from the informant and undercover FBI agents on three other occasions from September 2003 to November 2004. The plea involved one bribery count, but prosecutors said he received four bribes totaling about $24,000.

"Merla traded his public position and influence for cash," U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said. "The list of public officials in Monmouth County who were willing to do that is disappointingly long."

Merla, 45, was among a dozen officials snared by the undercover sting, "Operation Bid Rig," in Monmouth County February 2005. Many have pleaded guilty, along with several contractors.

Despite his arrest, Merla refused to resign, and left office when his term ended at year's end, just over two weeks ago.

Merla faces 24 years to 30 years in federal prison.

Somerville Subpoenaed Over Developer Projects (COURNEWS)

By MARTIN C. BRICKETTO, Staff Writer

Courier-News, January 18, 2007

U.S. Attorney's Office requesting information related to Jack Morris

SOMERVILLE -- Borough offices have been served with subpoenas from the U.S. Attorney's Office requesting information related to developer Jack Morris, the mayor confirmed Wednesday.

Somerville officials declined to speculate on the motivation behind the subpoenas.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined comment.

Mayor Brian Gallagher said the FBI served subpoenas to the borough Office of Community Development, the Planning Board, the Borough Council and the borough clerk on Friday afternoon, seeking all documents involving JSM at Somerville, Edgewood Properties and Jack Morris since 2003.

"We'll comply with every request that they make," Gallagher said. "I've already instructed all people to begin assembling that info so we can submit it to them expeditiously."

Owned by Morris, JSM is the owner of the Downtown Somerville Shopping Center and the site's borough-designated redeveloper, according to court documents. Edgewood is another Morris company.

A spokesperson for Morris did not return a request for comment.

JSM wants to demolish the existing shopping center on Main Street for a $65 million redevelopment project with commercial and residential components.

Morris' role in a major redevelopment plan on the west end of the borough's downtown was called into question in court documents filed last year.

Pathmark, a holdout tenant at the center, filed a legal brief in September that said Edgewood made a $10,000 contribution to the Somerset County Republican Executive Committee in 2003, the day after the Somerville Planning Board passed a resolution designating the shopping center as a redevelopment area.

Gallagher, who was campaigning for mayor at the time, received funds from the committee, according to Pathmark's legal brief.

The Borough Council then passed a resolution designating JSM as the redeveloper of the center the day after Gallagher was elected mayor, according to the brief.

DOJ_NMG_0118351

Morris reportedly had close business ties with John Lynch, an influential Democratic party boss who entered federal prison Tuesday after pleading guilty to fraud and tax evasion charges.

When Pathmark's legal brief was filed, Gallagher described the implications of a pay-to-play scenario between the borough and Morris as a smear campaign, noting the redevelopment was first recommended in the 1990s.

"Our approach with developers has been straightforward and clear," Gallagher said Wednesday.

The borough has moved to condemn the leases of two other holdout tenants at the center, Hollywood Video and Country Fresh restaurant.

Planning Board Chairman Bernie Navatto said he was not sure what the U.S. Attorney's office was looking for but said there was no foundation to what Pathmark suggested in its court filing.

"I'm 100 percent confident," Navatto said. "What they (the U.S. Attorney's Office) asked for is a matter is a public record, and they're going to get it."

Justices Scrutinize Death Penalty In Texas (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The Supreme Court on Wednesday resumed its long-running effort to monitor the use of the death penalty in Texas, hearing arguments in three cases that put the strains and internal contradictions of the court's capital punishment jurisprudence fully on display.

One case was familiar, at least to the seven justices who were on the court when LaRoyce L. Smith's previous appeal of his death sentence came before them in 2004. At that time, the court voted 7 to 2 to overturn the sentence, only to see it promptly reinstated by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on the ground that the constitutional error the justices had identified was "harmless." The question now is whether that was an acceptable response by the state court to the Supreme Court's mandate.

The other two cases, while unfamiliar in their particulars, were very familiar in what they represented: the latest, but almost certainly not the last round in a fitful dialogue between the Supreme Court and the federal appeals court that oversees habeas corpus cases filed in federal court by Texas inmates.

All three cases offer a window on the recent history of capital punishment in the United States, which to a large degree is the history of capital punishment in Texas. Since 1976, when the Supreme Court permitted states to resume executions, Texas has put to death 380 people, far more than any other state. (The next highest, Virginia, has executed 98.)

In 1989, the Supreme Court ruled that the jury instructions that Texas was using were constitutionally deficient because they failed to ensure that jurors could give meaningful consideration to a defendant's mitigating evidence. Under the Texas system, jurors were instructed to respond to only two questions: whether the killing was deliberate, and whether the defendant posed a continuing threat to society. If the answers to both were yes, a death sentence was automatic.

The Texas Legislature addressed the problem two years later by instructing jurors to take "all of the evidence" into consideration, including the defendant's character and background. But in the interim, during which Mr. Smith was sentenced to death for murdering a former co-worker at a Taco Bell in Dallas, judges tried to address the problem by telling jurors that if they thought the mitigating evidence warranted a sentence of life in prison rather than death, they should simply answer no to one of the two questions, even if they believed that the proper answer was yes.

Eventually, the Supreme Court held that this "nullification instruction" was constitutionally inadequate as well. It applied that ruling to Mr. Smith's earlier appeal, overturning his sentence in 2004 and sending it back to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, which in turn reinstated it, finding the error "harmless" because Mr. Smith had failed to show that the nullification instruction had caused him "grievous harm."

In his new appeal, Mr. Smith, represented by a University of Texas Law School professor, Jordan M. Steiker, is arguing that the state court's resolution of the case flew in the face of the Supreme Court's analysis. The state court, having failed in the first round to apply its "harmless error" rule, should not be permitted to introduce it after the fact, Mr. Steiker said.

Although several justices, most notably Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, clearly agreed with him, Mr. Steiker encountered stiff resistance from Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. The chief justice said the Texas court had handled the case in an appropriate and even "desirable" way.

Because the state court did not initially regard the nullification instruction as an error, Chief Justice Roberts said, it had no reason at that point to decide whether the error was harmless. "Wouldn't it be normal exercise of judicial restraint to say we don't have to reach out and decide whether this error was harmless if we've already decided there's no error at all?" he asked.

Texas was represented by its solicitor general, R. Ted Cruz, and supported by a second lawyer, Gene C. Schaerr, representing California and 20 other states that entered the case, Smith v. Texas, No. 05-11304, as "friends of the court" for

DOJ_NMG_0118352

Texas. Mr. Schaerr said the case presented an important federalism issue of "whether states have the ability under our federal Constitution to choose their own harmless error standards."

A total of 47 of Texas' 392 inmates on death row were sentenced under the procedure the Supreme Court later found unconstitutional.

In a second argument on Wednesday, the court heard the combined appeals of two other inmates, Jalil Abdul-Kabir and Brent R. Brewer. Their crimes, both murders committed during robberies, were unrelated. But both are challenging the refusal by a federal appeals court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, to grant their habeas corpus petitions.

Their cases, Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman, No. 05-11284, and Brewer v. Quarterman, No. 05-11287, have acquired a new twist since the court accepted them in October. In a separate case last month, the Fifth Circuit abruptly shifted course and suggested that it had been wrong to deny habeas corpus to this entire group of inmates. The lawyer for the two, Robert C. Owen, another University of Texas law professor, is asking that the cases be sent back to the Fifth Circuit for reconsideration.

High Court Hears 3 Death Penalty Cases (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

It was death penalty day yesterday at the Supreme Court, coincidentally 30 years to the day since Gary Gilmore became the first person to be executed under the country's modern capital punishment laws.

The court heard three death penalty cases from Texas even as executions are on hold in an increasing number of states, from Maryland to California, and as the number of new death sentences continues to fall.

The work of the court so far this term shows that the complicated legal process that attends executing a murderer -- the balance of state laws and federal constitutional guarantees -- can take decades to unspool. Even a trip to the Supreme Court is sometimes not enough to settle the issue.

The cases of at least nine death row inmates nationwide -- who are not proclaiming innocence but are protesting their sentences -- are on the court's docket in this term. Just as the justices scrutinized Virginia's system for carrying out the death penalty several years ago, they are examining four cases from Texas this year, including the three heard yesterday.

The number of capital cases is not unusual for the court, those who follow the issue say. But because the justices so far this year have taken a smaller number of cases overall, the death penalty accounts for "a larger fraction of their work," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center. Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University, said: "It's probably the normal number, but I always think they take too many. Especially at a moment when the docket is so light." The justices have taken a decreasing number of cases in recent years, and this term, which will end this summer, is likely to continue that trend.

Sometimes the court's decisions are dramatic, such as 2005's Roper v. Simmons, which forbade the execution of those who were younger than 18 at the time of their crimes. But Berman, who writes regularly for and runs the Sentencing Law and Policy blog, said the court's decisions in most death penalty cases affect only a handful of people in the states from which the cases arise. He would like to see the court spend time on other sentencing disparities "that affect thousands of people every day."

Indeed, the Texas cases heard yesterday had all been decided more than 15 years ago, when Texas juries were asked to answer only yes or no to two questions when deciding whether to impose death. They were asked whether the killing was deliberate and whether the killer constituted a continuing threat to society.

Several Supreme Court decisions have said that jurors also need to consider mitigating evidence, such as the IQ of the defendant or an abusive background.

In 2004, the court decided 7 to 2 in the case of LaRoyce Smith, who had murdered a Taco Bell manager in Dallas, that there were broad problems with the Texas law, which has since been changed. It sent the case back. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, nevertheless, reaffirmed the death sentence, saying that if an error was made, it was harmless to the outcome of the jury's decision.

And so Smith v. Texas (05-11304) was back before the Supreme Court yesterday, with Smith's advocates and others -- including four retired federal appeals court judges -- arguing that the state court ignored specific directions from the Supreme Court.

As Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg put it, it was as though the state court were saying, "Thanks, thanks, that's very interesting advice," but we're deciding it on different grounds.

But the state appeared to have strong supporters in Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia.

Scalia said the Texas court decided that, though the mitigating evidence should have been presented more straightforwardly, it was in the best position to decide that such evidence would not have affected the jury's decision to sentence

DOJ_NMG_0118353

Smith to death. And Roberts defended the state's interpretations. "Why do we remand these cases for further proceedings not inconsistent with our opinion if there's nothing further to be considered?" he asked.

University of Texas law professor Jordan M. Steiker, representing Smith, said that the Texas court's actions were indeed contradictory and inconsistent.

Texas Solicitor General R. Ted Cruz said that complying with the Supreme Court's evolving decisions governing the death penalty "is not an easy task, and state and federal courts have struggled for two decades to draw the appropriate lines."

That struggle is evident on the court's docket, in which most of the death penalty cases come from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, which covers Texas and much of the South, and the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. "The Ninth looks so clearly from a defendant's perspective, and the Fifth looks at it from a prosecutorial perspective," Berman said.

Two of yesterday's cases, Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman (05-11284) and Brewer v. Quarterman (05-11287), were appeals from the 5th Circuit. The high court in this term has already reversed a 9th Circuit decision that overturned a death sentence.

Dieter said the justices are "in a rather complex area of the law. Maybe they are trying to draw some lines down the middle."

Middle ground could be difficult for a court that has shown itself divided on important aspects of capital punishment. The swing vote on the issue seems to belong to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the only justice in the 5 to 4 majority both to uphold Kansas's death penalty and the Roper decision abolishing capital punishment for juveniles.

High Court Hears Texas Death Penalty Cases (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 18, 2007

The Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday in three Texas death penalty cases that were billed as a test of wills between the high court and lower court judges who have effectively defied its decisions on the use of mitigating evidence.

But whatever anger the Court held toward the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals and the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seems to have largely dissipated. On Wednesday, its newest members, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., appeared ready to give greater deference to Texas in administering its capital-punishment laws.

It was a marked contrast to 2004, when the Supreme Court had angrily sent one of the cases back to the Texas appeals court, only to have the Texas court reaffirm its prior ruling. At the Jan. 17 argument, Roberts seemed to show sympathy for the state court's desire to exercise its own judgment instead of just following the Supreme Court's guidance. "Why do we remand these cases," Roberts asked rhetorically, "if there's nothing further to be considered?"

As the cases were argued inside the Court, outside nine anti-death penalty demonstrators were arrested on the steps for unfurling a banner that read "STOP EXECUTIONS!" The civil-disobedience action coincided with the Texas arguments but was also intended to mark the 30th anniversary of the resumption of capital punishment in 1977, when Gary Gilmore was put to death in Utah.

In all three cases argued before the Court on Wednesday, guilt was not in doubt; at issue instead was the much-litigated question of how jurors should give weight to mitigating evidence. All three defendants were sentenced to death by jurors who were given a jury instruction on mitigating evidence that the Supreme Court has since struck down.

The first case argued, Smith v. Texas, was the one making a return visit. LaRoyce Smith was convicted in 1991 of murdering a former co-worker at a Dallas Taco Bell restaurant. In 2004 the Supreme Court admonished the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals for erroneously relying on a test "we never countenanced and now have unequivocally rejected." The instruction did not allow the jurors to fully consider evidence about Smith's low IQ and troubled childhood.

On remand, the Texas court reaffirmed the sentence, finding that the mitigating evidence was adequately considered and that if there was any error, it was harmless.

Supported by former federal judges and public-interest groups, Smith returned to the Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, that the Texas court had ignored the Supreme Court's mandate.

The Texas court's action "threatens this Court's authority as the final arbiter of federal constitutional law," former Solicitor General Seth Waxman told the justices in a brief for the Constitution Project, which pushes to improve safeguards and fairness in the administration of the death penalty.

During the arguments, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg mocked the Texas court, suggesting it had said to the Supreme Court, "Thanks, that's very interesting advice." Justices Stephen Breyer and David Souter also expressed mild disapproval of the Texas court, but much of the hour was spent on the procedural details of the case. Both Roberts and Alito seemed to indicate they thought the issue was one of Texas, not federal, law.

DOJ_NMG_0118354

Gene Schaerr of Winston & Strawn bolstered their views in his argument on behalf of 21 states that sided with Texas. Those states, Schaerr said, wanted to "apply their own varied standards" for harmless-error analysis to death penalty cases.

In the second hour of argument Wednesday, the Court considered Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman and Brewer v. Quarterman. Jalil Abdul-Kabir and Brent Brewer were both convicted in separate murders that occurred during robberies. Both were sentenced to death by jurors who, as with the Smith case, had been given a jury instruction found inadequate in other cases by the Supreme Court and since abandoned by the state. Both filed federal habeas petitions that the 5th Circuit denied.

The high court has overturned similar rulings by the 5th Circuit, using increasingly strong language to instruct the circuit to require greater consideration of mitigating evidence. But the 5th Circuit declined to order new trials. Texas contends that the 5th Circuit has given effect to the Supreme Court's decisions.

In an eleventh-hour development, lawyers for both Brewer and Abdul-Kabir last month urged the Supreme Court to return the cases to the 5th Circuit in light of its Dec. 11 en banc decision in Nelson v. Quarterman. In the Nelson case, the appeals court, using language more conciliatory toward the Supreme Court, "decisively changed course" on the mitigation issue, in the words of lawyers for Brewer. As a result, the cases before the Supreme Court no longer needed to be ruled on by the justices, Brewer and Abdul-Kabir argued.

But the Supreme Court did not act on their requests, so the cases were argued Wednesday.

Robert Owen, representing Brewer and Abdul-Kabir, told the justices the Nelson ruling "profoundly changed" the underpinnings of the cases and asked the Court to remand them to the 5th Circuit.

But Ginsburg noted that Texas is likely to appeal the Nelson case, so a remand would only delay resolution of the issue.

Owen, like Smith's lawyer, Jordan Steiker, is a professor at the University of Texas School of Law.

First Lady: Do More To Stop Child Porn (AP)

By Christine Ollivier, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Laura Bush said at a gathering of first ladies Wednesday that police must work with counterparts in other countries to keep children safe from abuse and Internet pornographers.

French first lady Bernadette Chirac hosted the one-day conference on missing and exploited children, which brought together first ladies including Suzanne Mubarak of Egypt and Lyudmila Putin of Russia, as well as Queen Silvia of Sweden and Queen Paola of Belgium.

Mrs. Bush briefed participants on efforts to protect children in the United States, touting the Amber Alert system that mobilizes TV, radio and highway signs to get word out whenever a child goes missing.

"So far, Amber Alerts have saved more than 300 young lives in the United States, and similar programs are now saving lives in countries across the globe, including France," she said.

France's new system, modeled on the U.S. alerts, helped authorities track down three missing children last week.

The women proposed that the system be extended throughout the European Union, so all its member nations are alerted when a child goes missing.

Mrs. Bush said the U.S. alert system helped increase the percentage of missing children found to 94 percent today, compared to 62 percent in 1990.

The first lady also urged international cooperation in fighting online child pornography. She cited the case of a police officer in Denmark who found child pornography online and alerted Interpol. Eventually, the FBI traced images of an abused girl to North Carolina and a relative of the child was sentenced to 100 years in prison.

The relative had 175,000 images on his computer, and police used them to track down other child abusers. "Because one person in Denmark tipped off Interpol, four children in the United States were saved," Mrs. Bush said.

The conference was a meeting of the honorary board of directors of the International Center for Missing & Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, Va. A study by the group examined all 186 Interpol member countries and found that up to 95 of them had no laws on child pornography, while 136 of them do not consider possession of child pornography a crime.

"This is a global phenomenon, and if we do nothing, it will become a huge epidemic," Mrs. Mubarak said.

___

On the Net:

http://www.icmec.org

Governor Is Challenged On Ethics By Bruno (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118355

ALBANY, Jan. 17 — The honeymoon may be coming to an end. Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican Senate majority leader, accused Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Wednesday of being hypocritical for championing campaign finance reform while headlining a $25,000-a-couple fund-raiser later this week for the state Democratic Party.

Mr. Spitzer has been campaigning for Craig M. Johnson, the Nassau County Democrat running for the Senate seat that opened when the governor tapped Senator Michael A. L. Balboni, a Republican, to serve in his administration. Mr. Bruno and his shrinking Republican majority in the State Senate have made keeping the seat a priority.

"I wouldn't be talking campaign finance reform on one hand, and then on the other hand, doing 25,000 price of admission to funnel money — funnel money, launder money — into a Senate contest," Mr. Bruno said. "I think it's inappropriate, I think it's inequitable, I think it's unfair, and I think it's time to step up and tell it like it is."

Shortly after he was elected, Mr. Spitzer unilaterally placed a $10,000 limit on campaign contributions that he would accept, and asked the Legislature to pass a law significantly lowering the limits on donations. But his aides said he would abide by the higher limits that exist under the current law when raising money for other entities — in this case, the state Democratic Party. The money could end up being used on the Senate race.

An e-mailed invitation to the fund-raiser, which will be held Thursday evening on the Upper East Side, promises "an intimate evening with New York State Governor Eliot Spitzer" and lists a minimum ticket price of $25,000 per couple.

Up to now, Mr. Bruno has gone out of his way to praise Mr. Spitzer publicly. But in campaigning for Mr. Johnson, Mr. Spitzer has shown he is willing to break the so-called nonaggression pact that has sometimes existed in Albany between governors and lawmakers of the opposing party whose support they need to govern.

Christine Anderson, Mr. Spitzer's press secretary, said he was glad to campaign for Mr. Johnson. "The governor is asking people in the district to support reform, and he is proud of that," she said.

Mr. Bruno's decision to criticize the popular new governor's ethics was something of a gamble, given his announcement late last year that the F.B.I. has been looking into his business dealings. Senate Republicans have long shifted money between campaign accounts to protect incumbents.

The campaign of the Republican candidate in Nassau County, Maureen O'Connell, is being supported indirectly by Mr. Balboni, the new member of the Spitzer administration she hopes to succeed. Campaign filings show that he sent $110,000 from his campaign account to the New York State Senate Republican Campaign Committee on Dec. 27. On Jan. 8 the committee sent Ms. O'Connell $330,000, the vast majority of what she has raised so far.

Mr. Johnson has raised over $125,000, and taken in $92,500 more in personal and family loans, campaign finance filings show.

Jury Selected In Coke Case (HC/AP)

By Harry R. Weber Ap Business Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 18, 2007

ATLANTA — Twelve jurors were selected Wednesday to decide the fate of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

Opening statements in Joya Williams' trial remain scheduled for Monday, her lawyer, Janice Singer, said.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and at least one is expected to testify against her.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

On Wednesday, 15 potential jurors were excused because they own Coca-Cola stock. Another 10 were excused for various reasons not disclosed by the court.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers then began individual questioning of the remaining potential jurors in an effort to select the 12 jurors who will hear the case _ six men and six women _ and the two alternates who will step in if needed. Both alternates are men. The pool consisted of 100 people.

Jury selection began Tuesday. The trial is expected to last up to two weeks.

Williams' lawyer plans to attack the credibility of the two men with whom Williams was charged.

DOJ_NMG_0118356

The two men served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than one year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

Medicaid Fraud Charge (NSDY)

By Reid J. Epstein, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 18, 2007

Man is accused in probe that finds he bought $660G home and drove a Hummer while collecting assistance for needy

A Lido Beach man filed more than $420,000 in fraudulent Medicaid claims, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi said yesterday.

Police and Department of Social Services officials said Ricky DiBernardo lied about his finances to qualify for Medicaid benefits. DiBernardo was arrested and pleaded not guilty Monday on a charge of grand larceny, a felony, and remained in jail yesterday on bail of $400,000.

"This is simply an abuse of the Medicaid system," Suozzi said. "This individual is receiving taxpayer-funded medical benefits instead of simply buying his own health insurance."

Suozzi and county officials offered few details about how DiBernardo, 44, was able to qualify for Medicaid, which helps cover health care costs for the needy. In 2004, DiBernardo purchased a $660,000 home at 325 Lido Blvd. and owned a black 2003 Hummer H2, which remained parked in the driveway yesterday.

On the mortgage application for the Lido Boulevard home, DiBernardo listed his annual income as $150,000, Suozzi said. DiBernardo owns an auto repair shop in Island Park, according to Nicole Watkins, Suozzi's Medicaid czar. She could not identify it by name.

Suozzi said DiBernardo deposited more than $334,000, mostly in cash, in a bank account between July 2004 and last March, and paid more than $20,000 to American Express in two months in late 2004.

Watkins said officials do not doubt the validity of DiBernardo's medical claims and cannot say for what he used the Medicaid funds. She also could not say why the county was unable - for 12 years - to determine that DiBernardo should not have qualified for Medicaid assistance.

"It's not a perfect system in terms of identifying sources of income," she said.

Social Services officials began investigating DiBernardo last January after receiving an anonymous tip that he drove the Hummer, which has a blue book value of about $28,000, Watkins said.

DiBernardo was represented by a Legal Aid attorney at his Monday arraignment. Legal Aid attorneys would not comment on DiBernardo's case yesterday.

DiBernardo pleaded no contest in 1986 to a cocaine trafficking charge in Broward County, Fla., and was sentenced to 4 years in prison. He is also the son of Robert DiBernardo, the Gambino crime family pornography boss who disappeared June 5, 1986.

John Gotti admitted in FBI tapes played at his 1992 trial that he ordered the elder DiBernardo to be killed. Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano later admitted to killing him.

Neteller Ceases Handling U.S. Transfers (HC/AP)

By Robert Barr Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 18, 2007

LONDON — Neteller PLC, a Britain-based online money transfer business, said Thursday it is ceasing to handle gambling transactions from U.S. customers because of restrictive legislation and uncertainties about regulations.

The company's move came three days after former directors arrested and charged in the United States with funneling billions of dollars in gambling proceeds to overseas betting operations.

"As of today ... at 12:01 AM GMT, U.S. resident customers were no longer able to transfer funds using Neteller's services to or from any online gambling site," the company said in a statement to the London Stock Exchange.

Neteller said it would focus operations on markets in Europe, Asia and other countries in the Americas.

Trading in Neteller shares on the London Stock Exchange was suspended Tuesday following the announcement of the arrests of the two former directors.

Neteller is an Internet payment services company that has grown in popularity as an increasing number of credit card companies have begun refusing to accept payments to online gambling sites.

DOJ_NMG_0118357

Neteller essentially acts as a middleman between gamblers and offshore betting operations. For example, a gambler who wants to place bets at offshore sports books can fund an account with Neteller, which in turn will transfer the money to the betting sites. Prosecutors say Neteller facilitated the transfer of billions of dollars of illegal gambling proceeds.

On Tuesday, U.S. authorities announced the arrests of former directors John David Lefebvre, 55, and Stephen Eric Lawrence, 46, both Canadian citizens who were indicted by a grand jury in New York.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the men knew when they took their company public that its activities were illegal.

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon, assistant director of the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, said the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry is "a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

Lefebvre and Lawrence were charged in connection with the creation and operation of an Internet payment services company that facilitated the transfer of billions of dollars of illegal gambling proceeds from U.S. citizens to the owners of overseas Internet gambling companies.

Lefebvre was arrested Monday in Malibu, California. Lawrence, who resides in Paradise Island, Bahamas, was arrested Monday in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

They joined in 1999 to found Neteller, which is based in the Isle of Man and is publicly traded in the United Kingdom.

Lawrence left the company's board of directors in October and Lefebvre left in December 2005, prosecutors said.

The company's announcement noted the arrests of its former directors, but said the decision to cease gambling transfers in the United States "reflects the culmination of a series of deliberations and steps the group has taken since the passing of the UIGEA (Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act) in October 2006."

Several British-based online gambling operations, including PartyGaming PLC, Sportingbet PLC, BetOnSports PLC and Leisure & Gaming PLC, withdrew from the lucrative U.S. market as a result of the act and enforcement action by U.S. authorities.

Sportingbet PLC Chairman Peter Dicks, 64, was detained in New York on Sept. 6 when customs officials discovered he had an outstanding warrant issued by the Louisiana State Police Gaming Enforcement Division.

The warrant, issued in May, charged Dicks with gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a US$25,000 (19,700) fine. He resigned as the company's non-executive chairman after being detained. He was later released after New York Governor George Pataki declined to sign a warrant extraditing him to Louisiana.

Former BetOnSports Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers remains under house arrest in the United States awaiting trial on federal charges based on the 1961 Wire Act.

Eight U.S. states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling: Washington, Nevada, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, South Dakota, Michigan and Oregon. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states had taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Millions of American players bet an estimated US$6 billion (euro4.7 billion) per year online, according to industry figures.

___

On the Net: http://www.netellergroup.com

2 Convicted In Kidnap-ransom Scheme In Which Victims Were Dumped In California Reservoir (FINDLAW/AP)

By Greg Risling, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-Two men were convicted Wednesday of orchestrating a ruthless kidnapping-for-ransom scheme targeting Russian immigrants that resulted in the killings of five people whose bodies were found at the bottom of a Northern California reservoir.

A federal jury found Iouri Mikhel, 41, and Jurijus Kadamovas, 40, guilty of three counts of hostage-taking and three counts of conspiracy. Both could face the death penalty.

Neither defendant showed reaction. Relatives of some victims sobbed and held each other as the jury's decision was announced.

During the 4 1/2-month trial, federal prosecutors portrayed the two defendants as the leaders of a group that sought to amass a fortune by kidnapping affluent Russian immigrants from Los Angeles in late 2001 and early 2002 and extorting money from their families and friends.

Regardless of whether ransoms were paid, prosecutors said, victims were killed and their bodies tied with weights and dumped in a reservoir near Yosemite National Park. The kidnappers had promised some of their hostages that they would be freed, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0118358

Defense attorneys countered that accomplices who cut deals with prosecutors for lesser prison sentences were the brains of the operation. Mikhel's attorney Richard Callahan said his client may have been involved in money laundering but would have been too smart to leave behind crucial evidence.

The penalty phase of the trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 24.

Ex-Official Of Red Cross Is Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 17 — A former California accounting executive at the Orange County Chapter of the American Red Cross was indicted Wednesday on federal embezzling charges, adding to concerns raised by watchdogs over the financial management of the Red Cross and some of its chapters.

The official, Karen Shuerger, 58, who was the assistant director of accounting, was charged with misappropriating more than $100,000 over the final five years of a 17-year career at the chapter. The investigation, however, is continuing to determine if the misdeeds were broader, said officials in the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles, which is prosecuting the case.

Ms. Shuerger, the indictment said, used the chapter's traveler's checks and a credit card issued by the organization to make purchases for herself at places that included a gambling hall in Nevada, a beach resort in Hawaii and the San Diego Zoo. The embezzlement came to light, prosecutors said, after Ms. Shuerger, who had been in charge of monitoring money received by the chapter and preparing financial records, retired in the fall of 2005.

Her replacement noticed discrepancies in the accounting books, and the organization conducted an audit in 2006 that suggested possible criminal activity, said Robb C. Adkins, the assistant United States attorney prosecuting the case. The results were turned over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, leading to Ms. Shuerger's indictment.

Ms. Shuerger, who moved from Santa Ana, Calif., to Henderson, Nev., after she retired, could not be reached for comment. She is being issued a summons to appear in court next month.

Her lawyer, Charles Fasano, expressed surprise at the indictment, saying he had been in discussions with prosecutors over the case, but he declined to comment on them or the charges.

The American Red Cross has been under fire for its management practices. Officials said they had put in place or planned several changes to address the criticism, and they pointed to the cooperation with the F.B.I. as an example of a quick response to fraud accusations.

"The American Red Cross takes a very aggressive stance against fraud and works closely with law enforcement when criminal activity is discovered," Stanley V. Perdue, the chief executive, said in a statement distributed by the United States attorney's office.

Tales From The Whitey Watch (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 18, 2007

Former DEA agent recounts 2 years of stealth, frustrations

They tracked him any way they could, watching him through binoculars, bugging his Ford Crown Victoria, flying over him in a Cessna plane to pick up his conversations, or trying to intercept them with an antenna atop the Dorchester Heights Memorial in South Boston.

It was a two-year game of cat and mouse, as federal investigators monitored the movements of gangster James "Whitey" Bulger and his lieutenants in a frustrating quest to snare him for extorting profits from drug dealers in the neighborhood.

The investigation by the DEA and Boston Police led to federal cocaine charges against 51 people in 1990, but no charges against Bulger.

For the first time, in an interview this week with the Globe, a Drug Enforcement Administration agent assigned to the investigation 18 years ago told of the twists, turns, dramatic encounters, and disappointments of the chase.

Mike Swidwinski, a retired special agent now living in Michigan, also provided never-before-published photos that he took of Bulger, Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, and Kevin J. Weeks from 1989, saying the public should see them and know the story behind them, because it is part of the city's history.

The surveillance photos provide rare glimpses of Bulger, now on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list, patting a dog on the head near Columbia Park, holding forth at Castle Island, and relaxing on lounge chairs with Flemmi and Weeks at a time when they ran a criminal enterprise in Boston that rivaled that of the Mafia.

Swidwinski's candid account shows what it was like to be on the other side of the Bulger gang, sometimes stealthily watching, other times coming face to face with their prey.

DOJ_NMG_0118359

"In retrospect, a lot of us didn't know what a dangerous man he was," said Swidwinski, who had just five years with the DEA at the time of the surveillance operation.

Bulger, 77, a longtime FBI informant, was indicted in 1995 on federal racketeering charges but fled just before the indictment and has been a fugitive since . He is also charged with 19 murders. Flemmi, also a longtime FBI informant, is serving a life sentence for 10 murders and is currently cooperating with the government.

Investigators involved in the surveillance operation, including Swidwinski, were always suspicious that the FBI hindered their attempts to get Bulger.

Bulger's longtime handler, John J. Connolly Jr., was convicted of racketeering in 2002 for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution and leaking them information. However, Connolly was never charged with compromising the 1989 DEA investigation, and Weeks told the Globe this week that it was obvious they were being watched during that period.

Swidwinski said the Bulger investigation "was a piece of history that we actually participated in" and, with Bulger still on the run, the case is "sort of an unfinished memory" for him.

Swidwinski and his partner were trying to quietly gather evidence to show that South Boston-based cocaine dealers were paying Bulger a cut of their profits. They tapped Bulger's cellphone (a rarity for that era) and a mailbox and even buried a bug in a patch of dirt near where he walked regularly at Castle Island.

Bulger seemed always vigilant. One time Swidwinski was parked in a van across from Columbia Park (now known as Moakley Park), watching Bulger through binoculars. Suddenly, as he focused on Bulger, he realized that Bulger was staring back at him, through his own binoculars. And then the gangster started walking toward him, with Weeks at his side. The agent quickly drove away to avoid a confrontation, he said.

Another day, after agents suspected that Bulger and his deputies had discovered a bug that had been planted inside Bulger's Crown Victoria, they went to retrieve it. They stopped Bulger during a planned traffic stop, and Swidwinski ordered Bulger out of the car.

"My only bragging rights is I think I'm the only guy in history who ever took Whitey Bulger out of a car at gunpoint," said Swidwinski, now 57, who retired two years ago after 22 years with the DEA. He remembers grabbing Bulger's car keys and looking at the key ring, which had a pendant with a devil's face on it and the words "Born to Raise Hell."

Retired Boston police sergeant detective Frank Dewan, who worked alongside Swidwinski in the investigation, recounted how one day he was following Bulger and his girlfriend, Catherine Greig, when Bulger suddenly turned and began following him. "It was cat and mouse," said Dewan, adding that it was "just to let us know that he knew we were there."

Other efforts to bug Bulger also proved unsuccessful, said Dewan, recalling how the bug planted in the ground at a Castle Island spot where the gangster often stopped to discuss business with his henchmen malfunctioned, picking up nothing but WBZ radio.

Swidwinski's description of the surveillance operation recalls a lower-tech time in law enforcement. The investigators planted a bug in Bulger's car from Dec. 21, 1989, to Jan. 19, 1990, which acted as a transmitter and sent a signal to a DEA-operated Cessna that would fly overhead, following Bulger during the day, Swidwinski said. An agent in the plane would record the conversations.

At night and during poor daytime weather conditions, DEA agents would climb to the top of the Dorchester Heights monument on Telegraph Hill with another antenna to capture Bulger's conversations as he moved around South Boston.

"The weather conditions in the middle of the winter up in that tower were just horrific," said Swidwinski.

But none of Bulger's conversations were of any value, prompting investigators to yank the bug, Swidwinski said. The agents believed that Bulger suspected his car was bugged, because when Weeks would start to talk, Bulger would warn, "I told you, don't talk in the car."

"Either he is a highly intelligent person, or he just kept getting tipped off," Swidwinski said.

Bulger always suspected he was being bugged and knew he was followed by the airplane, according to Weeks, who struck a deal with the government after his 1999 arrest and is now a free man after serving five years for assisting Bulger in five murders.

"You'd look up in the sky and see this plane doing figure-eights over us," said Weeks during a telephone interview yesterday. "We'd drive to the Cape, we'd be on the highway, and we'd see the plane."

Weeks said that he and Bulger were aware of the DEA surveillance because they had police scanners in their cars, set to the DEA's frequency. In fact, he said, he learned from listening to the scanner that agents were about to make arrests in August 1990, prompting him and Bulger to hang out at Boston Common that morning until they were sure they weren't going to be arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0118360

Swidwinski has read books by Weeks and others about Bulger and surfs the Internet for updates about the international effort to catch him. He said he has no idea where Bulger might be, but if he encountered the gangster on the street, he believes he could recognize him, just from his stern and sometimes menacing voice.

"He didn't have that Boston accent," Swidwinski said. "He kind of had what I'd call a normal accent. There were times when he'd raise his voice and you could almost see the smoke coming out of his nostrils. . . . He pretty much spoke with authority."

TJX Says Customer Data Was Stolen (NYT)

By Brad Stone And Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The TJX Companies, the retailer that operates the T. J. Maxx and Marshalls discount clothing chains, has joined the ignominious list of companies that have had sensitive customer financial data pilfered by identity thieves.

Yesterday the company, based in Framingham, Mass., said that as early as 2003 and during most of last year, an intruder had gained access to a computer system containing the private records of customers, including credit and debit cards, checks and driver's license numbers.

Both its flagship chains were affected, as well as HomeGoods and A. J. Wright stores in the United States, and its Winners and HomeSense chains in Canada. The company said it was still trying to determine whether data from its 36 Bob's Stores locations in the United States had also been compromised.

"We are deeply concerned about this event and the difficulties it may cause our customers," Ben Cammarata, the chief executive of the TJX Companies, said in a news release posted on the company's Web site.

The company did not specify precisely how many customers were put at risk. Sherry Lang, vice president for investor and public relations, said that the intruder had taken the credit and debit card records of "a limited number of people, substantially less than millions of people," as well as a small number of driver's license numbers. Ms. Lang said the company did not know whether other account information was also stolen, and declined to be more specific.

The major credit card companies said yesterday that they were aware of the breach and had notified the banks that issue their cards to monitor for suspicious account activity.

The TJX Companies detected the break-in last month, when an outside consultant noted suspicious activity on its network, Ms. Lang said.

The company said it was working with the Secret Service, the Justice Department and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the Secret Service, would not disclose any details about the investigation but said the agency was actively involved.

Avivah Litan, a data security analyst at Gartner Inc., said that TJX most likely suffered an attack on its centralized processing center, which holds customer account data. Ms. Litan said the company appeared to be storing information from its point-of-sale control terminals, which would include data from the magnetic stripes of credit cards and other sensitive information that most data security experts advise companies not to keep.

Privacy experts said the disclosure of the breach indicated that the data had not been encrypted, though TJX declined to address that question.

Beth Givens at the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit consumer-advocacy project based in San Diego, said that leaving customer data exposed on networked computers was a mistake many companies still make. "Given not only the financial hit but the public relations black eye, you would think that companies would be taking security far more seriously than they appear to be," Ms. Givens said.

2002 Sniper 'Witness' Convicted Of Rape, Murder (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Matthew M. Dowdy served a short but well-publicized jail stint for his false claim that he witnessed a sniper shooting in 2002. His latest offense was far less notorious but probably will land him in prison for the rest of his life.

A Fairfax County jury convicted Dowdy yesterday of first-degree murder and rape for the September 2005 stabbing of Judy J. "Jaimie" Coate in the Falls Church area. The jury then sentenced Dowdy, 42, to life in prison on the murder charge and 30 years on the rape charge -- terms that Circuit Court Judge Stanley P. Klein can impose or decrease at sentencing April 20.

The slaying of Coate, 31, of Falls Church, whose body was discovered behind a large utility box on Lee Highway on Sept. 27, 2005, was unrelated to Dowdy's arrest in October 2002, at the height of the region's terror over the sniper slayings. Dowdy claimed he saw a man with a rifle fire from the parking lot at the Home Depot in the Seven Corners area, killing Linda G. Franklin.

DOJ_NMG_0118361

Surveillance tapes soon showed that Dowdy was inside the store and could not have seen the shooting. His lawyer later claimed that Dowdy was simply relaying information from a friend, though the shot was actually fired from a community center across the street from the store. Dowdy pleaded no contest to a charge of making a false statement to an officer, was fined $1,000 and was sentenced to six months in jail.

In 2005, Dowdy was living in a motel in the city of Falls Church. When Coate's body was found in some underbrush, she had been stabbed in the neck, head, stomach and back, said Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. And "a great deal of blood," Coate's blood, was on the utility box, he said.

Examiners testified that Dowdy's fingerprint and palm print were in Coate's blood on the box, and they said his DNA was found at the scene. There were no witnesses to the killing.

Dowdy testified that he had been with Coate and had consensual sex with her but had not killed her. Defense attorney Daniel T. Lopez said that the fingerprint evidence had been "handled poorly" by investigators and that the palm print was not Dowdy's.

The jury deliberated about seven hours over two days before reaching its verdict.

Suspect In Kidnapping May Be Linked To 1991 Abduction (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

POTOSI, Mo., Jan. 17 — The investigation of a suburban St. Louis man accused of kidnapping widened Wednesday as law enforcement officials pursued links between him and a 1991 abduction.

Prosecutors in Washington County on Wednesday charged the man, Michael Devlin, 41, with kidnapping and using a deadly weapon, asserting that Shawn Hornbeck, 15, may have faced a handgun when he was abducted four years ago near his home in Redwoods, Mo., a rural town southwest of St. Louis.

The police found Shawn at Mr. Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, a St. Louis suburb, on Friday while searching for another boy, William Ownby, 13, who had been missing for four days. Mr. Devlin was arrested Friday and charged with one count of kidnapping William, who is known as Ben. He is being held on $3 million bail and is to be arraigned Thursday.

In Lincoln County, northwest of St. Louis, investigators named Mr. Devlin as a possible suspect in the 1991 disappearance of Charles Arlin Henderson. Charles, known as Arlin, disappeared — like Shawn — while riding his bike, near his home in Moscow Mills. He was also 11, and, a police spokesman said, looked a lot like Shawn and Ben.

"It may mean nothing; it may mean everything," said Lt. Rick Harrell of the Lincoln County Sheriff's Office.

Debra Henderson-Griffith, Arlin's mother, agreed that there was a resemblance between the boys.

"His coloring, his face, his build, his smile, he looks a lot like Ben," Ms. Henderson-Griffith said of the son who disappeared one evening as she cooked dinner for him. .

"If he's dead, I want justice," she said. "But I think he's alive, and I want him home. I'm never going to give up hope until somebody brings me a body."

In Washington County, John D. Ruff, the prosecutor, would not discuss the weapons charge.. But in a statement of probable cause given to the court, the Washington County sheriff, Kevin Schroeder, said Mr. Devlin, 41, abducted Shawn "utilizing force for the purpose of terrorizing the victim."

But both men said their evidence discredited rumors that Shawn was a runaway. "Shawn was abducted against his will — period," Mr. Ruff said. "End of story."

Sheriff Schroeder added: "This is something that is so bizarre that the normal individual cannot grasp what this 11-year-old boy went through. Nobody knows. Nobody was in that situation."

CIVIL LAW:

Utah Attorney Argues Brother's Death In Denver Court (SLT)

By Keith Coffman, Special to The Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, January 18, 2007

Jesse Trentadue says prison guards in Oklahoma killed

DENVER - In the past dozen years, Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue has lost his parents, his law partner and his younger brother.

The latter was the most traumatic. Kenneth Trentadue was found hanged in 1995 in a federal prison in Oklahoma.

DOJ_NMG_0118362

Since then, Trentadue has fought to disprove the official finding of suicide and prove his theory that Kenneth Trentade was murdered by guards who mistook him for an accomplice in the Oklahoma City bombing.

On Wednesday, in the latest hearing in a bitter legal wrangle, the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments on two issues in the case.

The first was the federal government's request to overturn a judge's ruling giving $1.1 million to the family for emotional distress caused by how Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials handled the aftermath of Trentadue's death.

The second was whether to allow family members to press ahead with their claim that authorities tried to derail their quest to prove murder by attempting to bring bogus obstruction of justice charges against Jesse Trentadue.

Michael E. Robinson, a Justice Department attorney, said the record showed that emotional distress allegedly caused by the handling of the inmate's death did not affect the daily activities of all Trentadue family members.

Advertisement

He also pointed out that only a few family members saw the bruises and autopsy incisions on Trentadue's body after it had been sent to a California funeral home. Oklahoma law distinguishes between bystanders and individuals who were directly involved, Robinson said.

"They were more like bystanders," he said of the Trentadues who were not present when funeral home workers removed the body from a coffin and photographed it.

Judge Terrence O'Brien questioned Robinson about whether the emotional distress the Trentadues suffered came "from the runaround they got from the BOP."

Robinson said that "they essentially learned of the condition of the body after the fact" and, therefore, could not get damages for emotional distress.

Trentadue countered that the government "skirts the issue" of the emotional distress by not producing the full record of the evidence.

He also argued that the government tried to get inmates who were in prison with his brother "to say I paid them to lie."

Kenneth Trentadue, who had served time for bank robbery, was arrested near San Diego in June 1995, two months after the bombing that killed 168 people at the federal building in Oklahoma City. He was sent to the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City for an alleged parole violation.

On Aug. 21, guards found Trentadue's blood-soaked body in his cell hanging from a noose made of torn bedsheets. Prison officials say the 44-year-old inmate committed suicide.

According to Jesse Trentadue, his brother bore a strong resemblance to Richard Lee Guthrie, a bank robber and alleged accomplice of McVeigh. He maintains that authorities mistakenly thought his brother was Guthrie - a member of the Midwest Bank Robbery Gang, an arm of the Aryan Republican Army that stole from financial institutions to fund attacks on government buildings - and killed him during an interrogation that got out of hand.

The family filed suit over the death. U.S. District Judge Tim Leonard in Oklahoma City ruled in 2001 that Trentadue committed suicide, but awarded the family $1.1 million for emotional distress.

The matter was appealed once before and the 10th Circuit ordered further findings by Leonard, who reinstated the award. The case went back to Denver on the appeal of the award and the family's request to be allowed to bring a claim on the alleged attempts to stop their inquiry.

Robinson declined comment after the hearing.

Trentadue, who said he was tired and drained, said the years since 1995 have been hard.

"They'll lie when the truth will serve them better," he said of federal authorities.

The appeals court took the arguments under consideration and will issue a ruling later.

Schering Sales To Pay $435m In Drug Pricing, Marketing Case (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

AP, January 18, 2007

BOSTON - Schering Sales Corp. and its parent company were sentenced to pay $435 million Wednesday as part of a settlement with the Justice Department over accusations it improperly marketed drugs for unapproved uses and lied to the government about drug prices.

Under a settlement announced in August, Schering Sales pleaded guilty to conspiracy and agreed to pay a criminal fine of $180 million. Its parent company, Schering-Plough Corp., agreed to pay another $255 million to resolve civil aspects of the case.

The sentencing closes the loop on an investigation by the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston that began in 2001.

Investigators said Schering-Plough marketed drugs for uses that had not been approved by the Food & Drug Administration. One example was Temodar, a drug the FDA had approved to treat a type of brain tumor called anaplastic astrocytoma. Prosecutors said Schering promoted Temodar to treat several other types of brain cancer, which the FDA had not approved. The company also promoted the unapproved use of Intron A for the treatment of cancer on the surface of the bladder, prosecutors said.

Although doctors are allowed to prescribe drugs for unapproved uses, drug companies are prohibited from marketing drugs for these so-called "off-label" uses.

As part of the settlement, the company pleaded guilty to making false statements to the Food & Drug Administration and the Health Care Financing Administration.

U.S. District Judge Patti Saris scolded Schering and the entire pharmaceutical industry for promoting non-FDA approved uses for drugs. She noted that several other major drug companies have also been fined for illegal marketing, including Pfizer Inc., which in 2004 agreed to pay $430 million on allegations that Warner-Lambert, which Pfizer acquired in 2000, promoted non-approved uses of the anti-seizure drug Neurontin.

"You cannot thumb your nose at the FDA," Saris said.

"At the end of the day, you can't market off-label. ... It's wrong."

Brien O'Connor, an attorney for Schering, said the company never lied to doctors about the uses the drugs had been approved for, but simply spoke to doctors and gave them peer-reviewed articles about other uses for the drugs.

"We told the truth about Temodar and Intron, and we didn't mislead the doctors," O'Connor said after the sentencing.

Thomas Sabatino Jr., general counsel for Schering-Plough, said that after a new management team took over the company in 2003 the company put a strict compliance program in place, including training all employees on its code of conduct and putting a compliance officer in each of its business units.

"We have a clear focus on business integrity, compliance, and honestly, doing the right thing," Sabatino said.

Prosecutors said Schering-Plough, based in Kenilworth, N.J., also reported a false best price to the Health Care Financing Administration on Claritin RediTabs to avoid paying millions of dollars in rebates to Medicaid. Under Medicaid rules, pharmaceutical companies must provide their products at the best price made available to commercial buyers, including HMOs.

Lawsuit Points To MRI Kickbacks (WSJ)

By David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

A whistleblower lawsuit unsealed Wednesday details a widespread scheme among Chicago-area MRI operators to win referrals from doctors by allegedly signing the doctors to phony equipment lease deals that result in the physicians getting a kickback when they order scans for patients.

The action, originally filed last February, was unsealed after the Illinois attorney general decided to intervene in the case.

The lawsuit strikes at an increasingly common arrangement between magnetic-resonance-imaging centers and doctors that is blamed for helping to fuel a staggering increase in the number of medical imaging tests done each year in the U.S.

The action names 11 MRI centers allegedly engaged in the illegal kickback scheme.

According to the complaint, the MRI service centers sign lease deals with physicians that purportedly call for the doctors to rent time on MRI machines to scan their patients. In reality, the lawsuit charges, the physicians never perform any of the scans. The scans are done by the MRI center employees at their facility.

The arrangements are "subterfuge" to hide kickbacks to the doctors, the lawsuit alleges. By entering into a "lease arrangement," the referring physician can claim part of the insurance payment even though he hasn't done any work related to the scan. For the MRI centers, the arrangements help generate referrals.

The lawsuit claims thousands of MRI scans have been conducted under these lease deals in the past 18 months.

By intervening, the Illinois attorney general will now prosecute the civil case, said Benjamin Weinberg, the chief of the public interest division. Mr. Weinberg said the attorney general will seek an injunction to stop the alleged kickback schemes as well as pursuing restitution and damages related to the insurance payments for the scans. He said the office did not yet have an estimate of how much insurers were billed under the lease arrangements.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Who Tried To Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 33 Months (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118364

CLEVELAND (AP) — A man who admitted he spread mercury around an interracial couple's house two years ago to try to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced Wednesday to nearly three years in federal prison, the Justice Department announced.

U.S. District Judge Patricia Gaughan said she wanted to send a clear message with the 33-month prison term that such conduct won't be tolerated.

David Fredericy, 50, who is white, pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, making false statements to federal investigators and interference with housing rights.

In his signed plea agreement, Fredericy said he and neighbor Joseph Kuzlik, who is also white, wanted to drive black residents out of their Slavic Village neighborhood. The two would yell racial slurs and threaten black neighbors, the agreement said.

The neighborhood in southeast Cleveland has been filled with racial tension in recent years.

Kuzlik, who pleaded guilty in November to similar charges, is to be sentenced next month.

In February 2005, Fredericy used a syringe to squirt mercury around the interracial couple's house and on their porch, while Kuzlik acted as a lookout, authorities said. The neighbors touched the liquid, which can be toxic, and brought it into their home on their shoes. No one was injured.

Gaughan also ordered Fredericy to repay the state and federal environmental protection agencies for the cleanup.

Expert: Party Official Used Racial Slurs To Disenfranchise Whites (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, January 18, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A black Noxubee County Democratic Party official and his allies exploit racial tensions to disenfranchise white candidates and voters, a federal judge was told Wednesday in the government's first use of the Voting Rights Act to allege discrimination against whites.

Theodore Arrington, a political science professor at the University of North Carolina, testified as an expert witness for the U.S. Justice Department. He compared the current treatment of whites in east Mississippi's Noxubee County to the disfranchisement of black voters in the racially segregated South of the past.

Noxubee County has a majority black population. The Justice Department accuses Ike Brown - chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee - of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation.

"Ike Brown and his associates do not uphold the law and customs that prevent bias and fraud in the administration of the Democratic primary, which is tantamount to elections in Noxubee County," Arrington testified. "And he cannot be trusted to do so in the future. Indeed, he is behind much of that fraud."

Wil Colom, one of Brown's defense attorneys, strongly objected to Arrington's statements, but U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee allowed the testimony to continue. Lee is hearing the case without a jury.

Arrington said Brown and others use racial slurs as "bullying techniques" to bring people in line and further polarize elections.

The testimony came in the second day of the trial that accuses Brown and his associates of allowing unqualified black candidates to run in the county's elections. Brown, among other things, is also accused of rejecting whites' absentee ballots while accepting blacks' ballots with similar defects.

The court recessed for lunch before Brown's defense team was able respond to the accusations in a cross examination.

Brown, a former tax preparer, who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns. He is a driving force in politics in Noxubee County.

Whites once controlled politics in the Noxubee County, a rural area along the Alabama line with a population of 12,500, but now there's only one white countywide office holder. The Justice Department says Brown is the reason for that, claiming he manipulates elections.

The population in the county is about 70 percent black and 30 percent white. Democratic candidates are virtually guaranteed to win elections.

Feds Urged To Probe State's Mental Hospitals (AJC)

By Alan Judd, Andy Miller, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 18, 2007

The National Alliance on Mental Illness, a consumer advocacy group, Wednesday asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate what it called "unacceptable and intolerable" conditions in Georgia's seven state mental hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0118365

The group said its letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was prompted by an Atlanta Journal-Constitution investigation that found a pattern of neglect, abuse and poor medical care in the Georgia psychiatric hospitals.

The newspaper reported at least 115 suspicious deaths of patients and more than 190 substantiated cases of physical or sexual abuse by hospital employees since 2002.

The suspicious deaths included 36 who died from choking on food, vomit or foreign objects, or by aspirating those substances into their lungs. A similar number died for lack of emergency treatment or from questionable medical care. Twelve committed suicide.

"I cannot emphasize enough the outrage of NAMI members to such conditions," Michael Fitzpatrick, executive director of the Virginia-based group, said in the letter.

"The Georgia scandal represents an especially egregious, systemic violation of civil rights."

A Department of Justice spokeswoman said late Wednesday that its Civil Rights Division had not yet received the letter. "But when we do, we will certainly review it," said Cynthia Magnuson, the spokeswoman.

Under a federal civil rights statute intended to protect people in government institutional care, Justice has investigated conditions in mental hospitals and facilities for the mentally retarded in several states. The federal investigations often lead to a state agreement to launch reforms.

"It's premature for us to comment" on the request for an investigation, said Dena Smith, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Human Resources, which operates the hospitals.

Earlier Wednesday, DHR's board met but its top officials did not mention the Journal-Constitution's series of four reports.

NAMI describes itself as a grass-roots organization dedicated to improving the lives of people living with serious mental illness and their families. It has about 200,000 members nationally.

Federal intervention "is a last resort," Ron Honberg, legal director for NAMI, said in an interview.

"Generally the Justice Department gets involved if there's a pattern of problems that's pervasive."

The group's letter also cited patient overcrowding and hospital understaffing that the newspaper concluded contributed to deaths and abuse cases.

Honberg called conditions in Georgia's seven mental hospitals "unacceptable and intolerable."

DHR said earlier Wednesday that its 2008 budget included money for an additional 83 forensic beds for patients who are under court supervision.

Since fiscal 2004, the seven hospitals' operating budgets — which include state and federal money — have declined by 12 percent. But the average daily number of adult mental health patients will have risen about 12 percent by the end of this fiscal year, officials project.

NAMI's Honberg said federal intervention "is by no means the only potential remedy. We shouldn't hang our hats only on this."

Justice Department action, though, has served as a catalyst to improve hospitals in states such as Alabama, Vermont and Virginia, NAMI said.

The group's Georgia chapter, along with other advocacy groups in the Mental Health Services Coalition, plans a Tuesday news conference to call for the Legislature to address what they call "a crisis" in mental health services.

To read the investigative report, A Hidden Shame: Danger and Death in Georgia's Mental Hospitals, go to www.ajc.com/hiddenshame.

NY Congressman Wants Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON - A second congressman has urged the Department of Justice to investigate whether the district attorney in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault violated the rights of the defendants.

Rep. Peter King, whose Long Island district includes relatives of one of the accused students, Collin Finnerty, urged Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to begin an investigation into Mike Nifong, who asked last week to be recused from the case.

"I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case," King wrote to Gonzales, arguing that the FBI should investigate whether the prosecutor may have violated Finnerty's civil rights, including the right to due process under the law.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said it was too early to launch a federal probe.

"It would be premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other procedures are pending in the state of North Carolina," Magnuson said.

A message left at Nifong's office was not immediately returned.

DOJ_NMG_0118366

King, the top Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee, is the son of a New York Police Department lieutenant. His request for an investigation is the latest addition to the chorus of public criticism of Nifong's handling of the case.

Justice Department officials said Tuesday they had rejected a similar request from North Carolina Rep. Walter Jones, also a Republican. Jones' spokeswoman, Kathleen Joyce, said the congressman still planned to meet next week with the head of the department's Civil Rights Division.

Special prosecutors with the North Carolina attorney general's office have been assigned to take over the case against the three accused lacrosse players - Finnerty, Dave Evans and Reade Seligmann.

The three are accused of attacking a stripper hired to perform at a team party in March.

Nifong dropped rape charges against the players last month after the woman wavered on some key details, but the men still face sexual offense and kidnapping charges. The players have strongly proclaimed their innocence.

Meanwhile, a letter signed by dozens of Duke professors and posted on the Internet said while they also presume the players are innocent, they won't apologize for a widely criticized ad published in the campus newspaper. That ad included anonymous quotes from students discussing racism and sexual assault on Duke's campus.

"The ad has been read as a comment on the alleged rape, the team party, or the specific students accused," the letter said. "Worse, it has been read as rendering a judgment in the case. ... We reject all attempts to try the case outside the courts, and stand firmly by the principle of the presumption of innocence."

The letter is signed by 87 faculty members, many of whom endorsed the ad in April.

Since he was recused, Nifong has handed over thousands of pages of information to the special prosecutors. One of them, Mary Winstead, worked with Nifong as an assistant district attorney in Durham for several years in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

Some lawyers said she was an unusual choice for the case considering that Nifong's handling of the case has been heavily criticized.

"She may not be investigating Mike, but she's investigating Mike's work," said attorney Alex Charns, who represents an unindicted lacrosse player. "(Nifong's) conduct is part and parcel of this prosecution. There's no way to untangle that."

The North Carolina State Bar has filed ethics charges against Nifong for making misleading and inflammatory comments about the lacrosse team early in the case.

Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Two former U.S. Border Patrol agents surrendered yesterday to begin prison sentences for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico.

Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, said goodbye to their wives and six children -- three each -- as they turned themselves over to U.S. Marshals shortly after 1:30 p.m. at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, the California Republican who has been at the forefront of efforts to have the prosecution reviewed and the agents re-tried, yesterday criticized the White House for not acting in the case.

"This is the worst betrayal of American defenders I have ever seen," Mr. Rohrabacher said of President Bush. "It's shameful this was done by someone who is in the Republican Party. He obviously thinks more about his agreements with Mexico than the lives of American people and backing up his defenders.

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former "Agent of the Year" nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the agency, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after the smuggling suspect, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was located in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and was given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

"How will my children cope with this?" Patty Compean asked reporters as her husband prepared to turn himself over to federal authorities. "My husband is a good man and a good father. Sometimes I just don't know how this all happened."

DOJ_NMG_0118367

The White House refused last week a request by Republican House members to keep the two men out of prison pending their appeal. Bush spokesman Tony Snow said that the case against the agents had been mischaracterized, that they had violated regulations and that they had been convicted by a jury.

The two men surrendered after U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone, who heard the case, denied a motion that they remain free on bond pending an appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans for a new trial.

"Because defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence, he is eligible for release pending appeal only for exceptional reasons," Judge Cardone said in denying the motion. "The court finds that no exceptional reasons exist in this case."

Both men were handcuffed and taken to the county jail for two weeks to a month until they can be transported to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to be housed in Mississippi, while Compean will be incarcerated in Ohio.

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said that more than 252,000 signatures were collected and that the petition was presented this week to the White House.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the Rio Grande along the border with Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

The government's prosecution began after an investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General located Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after the suspect's mother complained to a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot.

President Calls For Genetic Privacy Bill (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — President Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to pass long-stalled legislation to safeguard genetic privacy, a measure experts say would encourage millions of Americans to undergo testing that could lead to prevention and treatment of cancer and other diseases.

“If a person is willing to share his or her genetic information, it is important that that information not be exploited in improper ways,” Mr. Bush said at the National Institutes of Health. “And Congress can pass good legislation to prevent that from happening.” He added, “We want medical research to go forward without an individual fearing personal discrimination.”

For years, scientists and patients’ advocates have pushed for legislation barring employers and insurance companies from discriminating based on the results of genetic tests. A so-called genetic discrimination bill passed the Senate unanimously in 2003, but died in the House.

The bill was reintroduced in the House this week. With Congress now under Democratic control, the bill’s backers are optimistic . They include Dr. Francis S. Collins, director of the National Human Genome Research Institute at the health institutes, who participated in a roundtable discussion with Mr. Bush on Wednesday.

Dr. Collins said Mr. Bush’s statement, along with the possibility of Congressional action, “gives us renewed hope that all Americans will finally receive the protections they need to benefit from gene-based medicine.”

The Spread Of The Credit Check As Civil Rights Issue (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

Lisa Bailey worked for five months at Harvard University as a temp entering donations into a database. When the university made the job a salaried position, Ms. Bailey, who is black, saw a chance to lift herself out of dead-end jobs.

Bailey's superiors encouraged her to apply, she says, but turned her down after discovering her bad credit history.

Bailey, with her lawyer, has lodged a complaint against Harvard charging racial discrimination. The reason: Studies show that minorities are more likely to have bad credit, but credit problems have not been shown to negatively affect job performance.

Some privacy and minority advocates are now seeing credit as a civil rights issue as minorities start to fight employers and insurers who base decisions on credit histories. Their effort could slow the near doubling in credit checks by employers in the past decade, which impacts millions of Americans who are struggling with debt.

"It's definitely a civil rights issue because of the growing use of credit reports and credit scores for hiring, renting an apartment, insurance, and the fact that people of color have not been integrated into the credit scoring system as much as traditional, white, middle-class America," says Evan Hendricks, author of "Credit Scores & Credit Reports: How the System Really Works, What You Can Do."

DOJ_NMG_0118368

In a 2004 study involving 2 million people, the Texas Department of Insurance found that blacks have an average credit score roughly 10 percent to 35 percent worse than whites; Hispanics have scores 5 percent to 25 percent worse than whites.

Credit checks are a growing factor in hiring, with 35 percent of employers checking applicants' credit in 2003, up from 19 percent in 1996, according to the Society of Human Resource Management (SHRM). Typically credit reports are done if a person is going to deal with money, says John Dooney, a manager of strategic research at SHRM.

A case for considering credit

Employers should look at credit only for jobs where the information is relevant, says Lester Rosen, president of Employment Screening Resources, a national background screening firm in California. He cites a few examples:

· For jobs handling money, people may have the motive to steal if their debts surpass their salary.

· For jobs requiring travel, bad credit could bar applicants from renting cars or buying tickets.

· For jobs managing money, the report can offer some clues on how applicants manage their own.

Particularly in that last scenario, he cautions employers to be circumspect since blemishes might be errors or beyond the person's control, such as sudden medical expenses. Legally, employers must receive written permission from applicants to do a credit check, and must give those denied because of credit a chance to respond.

Mr. Rosen defends the careful consideration of credit in the hiring process. "If Harvard hired a person and did not use a credit report and the person embezzled, what would the headline be?" he asks.

So far, there's a lack of data supporting a relationship between bad credit and theft by employees. In perhaps the only study published on the subject, Jerry Palmer and Laura Koppes at Eastern Kentucky University in Richmond in 2003 found no correlation between employee credit reports and negative performance or termination for dishonesty.

Antidiscrimination laws bar a hiring practice that disadvantage minorities – even inadvertently – unless a company can prove it's related to measuring a person's capability to do a job. Bailey's lawyer, Piper Hoffman, has taken on several cases in which companies used credit as a factor in the hiring process. In one 2004 case, she says, an employee's lawsuit against Johnson & Johnson resulted in a settlement that changed the way the company used credit in its hiring practices.

"In the larger picture, we're hoping to get Harvard and other employers to stop using credit as a criterion in hiring," Ms. Hoffman says.

Bailey lodged her complaint in November with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), which reviews all such cases before any lawsuits can be filed. Agency officials say there's anecdotal evidence these cases are on the rise.

"Employers seem to be assuming that somebody with a poor credit history is more likely to steal, and I don't think there's any kind of evidence that supports that," says Dianna Johnston, assistant legal counsel with the EEOC. "To the extent that the employer has done an in-depth look and found other indices of dishonesty, they would be on more solid ground."

In a statement, Harvard noted that a "relatively small percentage" of jobs at the university require a credit check.

"The university conducts credit history reviews for employment purposes as required by credit card issuers, as well as to fulfill our fiduciary and data privacy responsibilities," says the statement. "Those responsibilities include protecting the private credit card data of our students, faculty, parents, and alumni."

Bailey says that if Harvard was concerned she might steal, the university should have looked at criminal records instead. "I was a cashier for many years and I've never been rich and I've never stolen money," she says.

She ran into credit-card debt she couldn't pay back when she spent some time unemployed. Harvard, she says, offered to reconsider if she could clear up her report in one week.

"The only way I can get it cleaned up in seven days is if I have money, so there was no way," says Bailey.

Catch-22 for poor people

Ernest Haffner, an attorney adviser with the EEOC, notes that employers who screen for credit are setting up a Catch-22 for poor people: They need jobs to get good credit, but employers won't hire them because they don't have it.

The racial component to credit histories has been challenged in the insurance arena, too. The Texas Department of Insurance study found a relationship between credit scores and claims filed.

However, a class-action lawsuit against Allstate has just been settled, which resulted in the company changing the way they evaluate credit reports, says Wendy Harrison, a Phoenix-based lawyer who brought the case.

"What we've argued in our [insurance] cases is that you can adjust for [racial bias]," Ms. Harrison says, who has also handled cases of credit screening by employers.

Employers, however, are probably not relying on a number rating that can be adjusted, since, according to Rosen, agencies only give them specialty reports that don't include a score. Harvard says their report had no score.

DOJ_NMG_0118369

As for Bailey, she still wants the Harvard job, and says there would be "no hard feelings." But first she wants to change the system for herself and others. "I hope I win. It might be beneficial to other people, too," she says.

Show Us The Money (WP)

By Cyrus Habib

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Blind Americans may soon find themselves able to use money just like anyone else. That is unless the Treasury Department is successful this month in its appeal of a recent federal court order that paper currency be made recognizable to the blind, who are currently unable to distinguish one denomination from another.

I, for example, rely on the generosity of cab drivers, baristas and store clerks each time I make a purchase with cash. That I have rarely been ripped off is a testament to their honesty or my charm, but I cannot help but protest the perpetual necessity for either. After all, there are 180 countries in which this is not the case, because their currency is designed to be distinguishable by all.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson asked the Treasury Department to determine the best means of making money distinguishable by the blind, citing the myriad solutions proposed by the organization that filed the lawsuit, the American Council of the Blind. These included using raised ink, modifying the size of certain bills and producing a tactile mark to indicate a bill's denomination. The Treasury Department has objected to all such solutions, claiming that the $75 million price tag is simply too high.

Of course, Treasury's lawyers fail to mention that the cost would have been far lower had the department acted voluntarily when the $20 bill was redesigned in 1998 and the $10 bill was modified last year. Instead, it has decided to spend our tax money fighting the blind in court, appealing Judge Robertson's decision even before a final judgment on the nature of a solution could be reached.

Blind people in the United States suffer from a staggering 70 percent unemployment rate, and a disproportionately high percentage of those who are employed occupy jobs in the low end of the service sector. There is no question that the catastrophic poverty of America's blind requires a solution. Why not begin by giving us access to money at the most atomic level? How can blind Americans become truly independent, achieving the success we deserve and leaving behind the stigma of federal and state aid, without being able to differentiate between a dollar bill and a fifty?

The Treasury Department suggests using debit and credit cards, disregarding the fact that the lives of many blind Americans hinge upon financial exchanges for which plastic is often useless, such as catching a crosstown bus, purchasing a cup of coffee or getting change for laundry.

These basic day-to-day experiences may not constitute reality for Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his team, but they certainly do for millions of blind and low-vision Americans.

Some have called the lawsuit frivolous, arguing that blind people have managed to survive for years by relying on others for help. Such reasoning does more than ignore the overwhelming poverty and hardship that plague the blind community; it dishonors the sacrifices millions of disabled Americans made to help bring about passage of the landmark Americans With Disabilities Act. Money is essential to a person's participation in society. Its accessibility to blind people should be considered as important as that of wheelchair ramps or Braille in elevators.

When it comes to accommodating disabilities such as blindness, let us continue to lead the world in practice as well as in principle. More important still, let us tell the world that we, too, believe that blindness should not be an obstacle to financial independence. In doing so, let us also take a significant step toward ameliorating the living conditions of blind Americans, now and for years to come.

The Treasury Department should obey Judge Robertson's order and show us the money.

The writer, a Rhodes Scholar and JD candidate at Yale Law School, is preparing an amicus brief on this case with Dean Harold Hongju Koh.

The Lost Voice Of Protest (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

On the evening of the fourth of April, 1967, one year to the day (almost to the hour) before his assassination, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. walked into Riverside Church in Manhattan and delivered a speech that was among his least well known, yet most controversial.

“I come to this magnificent house of worship tonight,” he said, “because my conscience leaves me no other choice.”

DOJ_NMG_0118370

The speech was an eloquent, full-throated denunciation of the war in Vietnam, one of the earliest public critiques by such a high-profile American. Silence in the face of the horrors of that war, said Dr. King, amounted to a "betrayal."

The speech unleashed a hurricane of criticism. Even the N.A.A.C.P. complained about Dr. King stepping out of his perceived area of expertise, civil rights, to raise his voice against the evil of the war. The Times headlined an editorial, "Dr. King's Error."

The war would go on for another eight years, ultimately taking the lives of 58,000 Americans and a million to two million Vietnamese. Dr. King himself would be silenced, at the age of 39, by a bullet in Memphis.

The widespread celebration of Dr. King's birthday on Monday brought that Vietnam speech to mind. It's both gratifying and important that we honor this great man with a national holiday. But it's disturbing that we pay so much more attention to the celebrations than we do to the absolutely crucial lessons that he spent much of his life trying to teach us.

Whether it's the war in Iraq, or the plight of New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, or the violence and self-destructive behavior that plagues so many black Americans, our attitude toward the wisdom of Dr. King has been that of the drug addict or alcoholic to the notion that there might be a better way. We give lip service to it, and then we ignore it.

In the Vietnam speech, Dr. King said, "A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death." He may as well have been speaking into the void. The war in Iraq, a reprise of Vietnam, will cost us well over a trillion dollars before we're done, and probably more than two trillion. More than 3,000 American G.I.'s have been killed and the death toll for Iraqis is tallied by the scores of thousands.

No one knows what to do, although the politicians and the pundits are all over television, day and night, background singers to the carnage.

Here at home the city of New Orleans is on life support, struggling to survive the combined effects of a catastrophic flood, the unconscionable neglect of the federal government, and the monumental ineptitude of its own local officials. As ordinary residents of New Orleans continue to suffer, the rest of the nation has casually turned away. The debacle is no longer being televised. So it must be over.

Dr. King held the unfashionable view that we had an obligation to help those who are in trouble, and to speak out against unfair treatment and social injustice. "Our lives begin to end," he said, "the day we become silent about things that matter."

New Orleans matters. And the long dark night of the war in Iraq must surely matter. But not enough voices of protest are being raised in either case. The anger quotient is much too low. You can't stop America's involvement in a senseless war or revive a dying American city if your greatest passion is kicking back with pizza and beer and tuning in to "American Idol."

The quality of life for black Americans more than 38 years after the death of Dr. King is a mixed bag. Blacks are far better off economically and educationally than ever before. Barack Obama is a leading candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and the last two secretaries of state have been black.

But the ominous shadow of racial prejudice is still with us. Even President Bush acknowledged that conditions in New Orleans pre-Katrina were proof of that. The nation's prisons are filled to the bursting point with black men who have failed, or been failed, and have no viable future. And too many black Americans are willing and even eager to see themselves in the culturally depraved lineup of gangsters, pimps and whores.

Dr. King would be 78 now, and I can't believe that he would be too thrilled by what's going on. In his view: "He who passively accepts evil is as much involved in it as he who helps to perpetrate it. He who accepts evil without protesting against it is really cooperating with it."

We miss his leadership, all of us, whether we're wise enough to realize it or not.

ANTITRUST:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case To Report To Department Of Justice (AP)

By David Pitt, AP Business Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) The plaintiffs in a class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. claim they have uncovered information that indicates the software manufacturer is violating an agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice.

Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin and her co-counsel Richard Hagstrom, of Minneapolis, claim that during their research for the class-action case under way in Polk County District Court they discovered information that indicates the company isn't complying with a 2002 federal court decree.

Conlin asked Judge Scott Rosenberg's permission to tell the DOJ and the Iowa attorney general about the information.

Conlin said she will discuss two issues with the DOJ and Iowa attorney general's office within a few days.

``We feel as officers of the court it is our responsibility to do this," Conlin said Wednesday. ``It's simply our duty as citizens and lawyers to let the Department of Justice know that we are in possession of information that goes to the issue of whether Microsoft is in compliance."

She plans to write letters to the agencies but, according to Rosenberg's ruling, can only provide the information if a court order or subpoena is issued seeking it.

She said she could not be specific about what she's uncovered because Rosenberg's ruling prohibits the information from being shared beyond the appropriate authorities.

``The court finds that the plaintiffs and its expert witnesses may contact the appropriate authorities responsible for the enforcement and compliance of any orders, judgments or decrees in the other judicial matter concerning the defendant and inform such authorities that it is in possession of information that may be relevant to such enforcement and compliance," Rosenberg said in his ruling filed on Tuesday.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said the company is monitored to ensure compliance and must appear before the federal judge that presided over the DOJ case quarterly to show compliance with the court's final decree.

He said the government resources are considerable and he doubted that Conlin would have any information that would surprise the government and its independent experts.

``We are doing our job in complying with the consent decree," Wallis said.

A DOJ spokeswoman said Wednesday that she couldn't comment because no information has been received from the Iowa case.

Bob Brammer, a spokesman for the Iowa attorney general, said states have a team that tracks Microsoft's compliance with court orders and would be interested in any information Conlin may have.

``We will be glad to review what they send us," he said.

Conlin and Hagstrom represent thousands of Iowans who purchased Microsoft software between 1994 and 2006. They claim in the lawsuit that the company engaged in illegal monopolization and anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

Their expert witnesses will place damages at more than $300 million.

Microsoft denies the allegations and its attorneys said they'll show Iowa customers received quality products at a fair price.

Microsoft was sued by the federal government, which alleged the company unlawfully used its monopoly in operating systems. The case was settled with an agreement that required Microsoft to share certain information with other software developers, which would allow their programs to work with Windows.

Wallis said Microsoft did not object to Conlin's motion and only wanted to be sure that no Microsoft confidential information would be released.

In another unusual development, Rosenberg has permitted Conlin and Hagstrom to operate an Internet site, which lists daily transcripts of testimony, rulings and press releases written by a media company hired by the plaintiffs.

The Web site also shows exhibits admitted into evidence, which by the end of this week should total more than 3,000 documents.

The trial, expected to last at least six months, has progressed even more slowly than anticipated.

Extensive arguments are presented to Rosenberg before the jurors arrive in the morning, during midday breaks and after the court session ends in the afternoon.

The arguments center around admissibility of evidence, witness testimony and numerous legal issues.

A month into the trial, the first live witness, Ronald S. Alepin, a plaintiff technical expert, appeared on the stand. He testified for seven days about how he believed Microsoft crushed competitors and leveraged its monopoly in operating systems to keep software competitors from gaining market share.

Prior to his testimony, witnesses appeared in videotaped depositions, some recorded many years ago.

The case has fallen behind schedule, and last week the second witness, software developer John Constant, returned to his home in England because he tired of waiting in Des Moines to be called to testify. Conlin said he will be called later.

Microsoft is expected to call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses in February.

The Iowa case, tried before a jury, is one of two remaining state-level antitrust cases remaining against the software manufacturer. The other is in Mississippi.

The Iowa jury could be the first to decide a verdict since other state court cases were settled before a jury began deliberations.

FTC Updates Merger Filing Thresholds (DEAL)

By Bill McConnell, The Deal

The Deal, January 18, 2007

The Federal Trade Commission Tuesday announced this year's increase in the size of deals that must be submitted to antitrust enforcers before a merger is completed.

The new thresholds determine whether merging parties must file Hart-Scott-Rodino Act notification with the FTC and the Department of Justice and take effect 30 days after their upcoming publication in the Federal Register.

The agency must revise the thresholds annually, based on the change in the gross national product.

Hart-Scott-Rodino Act notification must be filed if a deal meets thresholds contained in one of two tests.

Under the first test, notification is required if the assets being acquired exceed $59.8 million and total assets for one of parties exceeds $119.6 million and the other party exceeds $12 million. Previously, notification was required if assets acquired were valued at more than $56.7 million and the size of the merging parties was greater than $113.4 million and the other party exceeded $11.3 million, respectively.

Under the second test, notification is mandatory if the total value of the transaction exceeds $239.2 million, regardless of the size of the merging parties. The previous threshold was $226.8 million.

To adjust for the threshold changes, the FTC also updated its filing fee levels. For transactions between $59.8 million and $119.6 million, the fee is $45,000; for deals up to $597.9 million, the fee is $125,000; and for those of $597.9 million or more, the charge is $280,000.

Rivals Offer $38 Billion For A REIT (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The gloves have come off in buyouts.

Late yesterday, a group of investors offered $38 billion for the nation's largest office landlord, setting off the biggest buyout battle since the landmark fight for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago.

The upstart bid for Equity Office Properties, the real estate investment trust that was founded by Samuel Zell, tops a $36 billion deal that Equity Office had reached with the Blackstone Group in November. Either bid would win the crown as the largest buyout ever, surpassing last summer's $33 billion deal for HCA.

The battle for Equity Office pits some of the most powerful and colorful financiers against each other. Blackstone is controlled by Stephen A. Schwarzman, who has created one of the largest, if not the largest, private equity firms in the nation.

The rival group includes Steven Roth of Vornado, once the king of New Jersey strip malls; Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital, who created the hotel chain and then left the company after a falling-out with its board; and Neil Bluhm, a Chicago real estate mogul who backed Barack Obama's successful run for the United States Senate. Mr. Sternlicht worked for Mr. Bluhm as a young analyst in the late 1980s.

Since the Blackstone offer was announced, James S. Corl, the chief investment officer for real estate at Cohen & Steers, the largest institutional investor in Equity Office, has argued that the price of $48.50 a share was too low because the office market is expected to keep improving over the next couple of years.

But the battle may not be tilted in favor of the new bidders, Vornado Realty Trust, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital. For one, 40 percent of their $52-a-share offer is in shares of Vornado, at an unspecified ratio, compared with Blackstone's all-cash bid. And Blackstone has already completed many of the steps needed to close the deal. In addition, Blackstone has the right to match any rival offer.

"A tentative proposal relying upon the potential issuance, many months from now, of more than $10 billion in stock trading at near record prices is inferior and carries vastly more risk than Blackstone's all-cash deal closing in approximately two weeks," a Blackstone spokesman said.

If successful, the Vornado group would break up Equity Office, which has some 590 buildings and over 105 million square feet of office space in major metropolitan markets, including the Verizon Building in Manhattan. They would divide the properties among themselves, with Vornado getting roughly half of the properties on the East and West coasts.

The consortium calls itself Dove Parent, apparently a mocking reference to the Blackstone-created buyout entity, Blackhawk. Both bidders would assume $16 billion in debt. Equity Office said that its board "will consider the proposal as soon as practicable."

The offer from the Vornado group is the latest sign that the cozy world of buyouts is becoming less genteel. In recent years, the giants in private equity seemed to have avoided stepping on each other's deals while banding together on others. Indeed, private equity firms have come under scrutiny from the Justice Department, which has started an inquiry into whether private equity firms have broken antitrust laws.

DOJ_NMG_0118373

And few public companies have shown a willingness to compete with private equity's war chest. Private equity firms have been gobbling up publicly traded companies at a record pace, spending some $660 billion last year. The battle for RJR Nabisco in the late 1980s showed that bidding wars can get out of control.

Last summer, however, a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Bain Capital jumped in to offer a rival bid to a Blackstone offer to buy Freescale Semiconductor. Blackstone then raised its bid and won the deal, but that showdown was a sign that competition for deals was turning cutthroat.

The new bid for Equity Office may also demonstrate the differences between private equity and the much scrappier real estate business.

Mr. Roth of Vornado leads a real estate investment trust whose holdings include office buildings in New York and Washington, shopping centers and merchandise marts, and the retailer Toys "R" Us.

One of his company's most recent transactions was the purchase of the Manhattan Mall, a shopping center and office building in the Herald Square area of New York City, where real estate values have been rapidly appreciating.

In their letter to Mr. Zell, Mr. Roth and his partners said they would create the "largest office REIT in the U.S. with the pre-eminent position in the best markets on both coasts."

The breakup fee for a buyer who is able to push Blackstone aside is $200 million. "Sam Zell set this up in a very shareholder-friendly manner," said Barry Vinocur, the editor of Realty Stock Review, a newsletter. "Blackstone wanted a higher breakup fee." Mr. Zell is the largest individual shareholder of Equity Office.

The rival bid for Equity is being financed in part by JPMorgan Chase, Lehman Brothers and UBS. JPMorgan's involvement has raised some eyebrows on Wall Street because of its long ties with Blackstone.

Keven S. Lindemann, the director of real estate for SNL Financial in Charlottesville, Va., said Equity Office shareholders would have to consider whether the Vornado shares were overvalued.

Developer Mills Corp. Agrees To Buyout (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Chevy Chase shopping-mall pioneer Mills Corp. yesterday agreed to a $1.35 billion sale to a Canadian investment company, capping months of turmoil in which the firm struggled with heavy debt and an accounting scandal.

The deal, which at least one major Mills shareholder called inferior to other offers, would give the owner of Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland a financial boost after the company reported it had enough cash to operate only through March 31.

The buyer, Brookfield Asset Management, the owner of New York's World Financial Center, would take control at a time when Mills is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible misconduct by management and for accounting errors totaling up to $352 million.

The sale marks the latest chapter in the Mills saga. The local company helped popularize the notion that a shopping mall could be an entertainment destination. It also built sprawling "shoppertainment" centers throughout the United States and Europe that combined retail outlets with outsize restaurants, movie theaters and other amenities. One project, Madrid Xanadu, featured a bowling alley and indoor ski resort. Another Xanadu, planned for New Jersey, was to have a 30-story Ferris wheel.

But in recent weeks, an internal review at Mills found the company's rapid growth may have contributed to its accounting problems. The company has been working to restate earnings dating to 2001, and its stock price has been battered in the past year. The review concluded that Mills' "overall culture and 'tone at the top' were heavily focused on meeting external and internal expectations," according to a summary filed with the SEC.

Under the deal announced yesterday, Brookfield will pay $21 per share for Mills. The deal, including debt and preferred stock, is worth $7.5 billion. Mills will become a new subsidiary of Brookfield, and the new company will be publicly traded and managed by Brookfield.

Mills shareholders may either receive up to a 20 percent stake in the new company or receive $21 per share in cash. Mills' board unanimously approved the deal though it is subject to shareholder approval, and some may oppose the offer. Two other major Mills investors had offered to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in the company just a day earlier.

Farallon Capital, a hedge fund, offered to invest $499 million at $20 a share. Fund managers declined to comment yesterday. An Israeli real estate company, Gazit-Globe, offered an average of $21 a share.

"We are disappointed that the Mills Corporation has chosen to accept what we believe is an inferior proposal," Bruce Rubin, a spokesman for Gazit, said in a statement, according to the Associated Press. He added that Gazit is reviewing its options.

If the Brookfield deal is approved, it is slated to close in the second half of 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0118374

"We think this is a significant opportunity to build on our depth of experience in real estate and assist a company that's in operational and financial distress," said Katherine C. Vyse, a spokeswoman for Brookfield, which manages $50 billion in assets and owns hydroelectric power plants and office buildings throughout the country, including 23 in the Washington area. "We see it as an opportunity to return [Mills] to profitability and foster growth," Vyse said.

Mills chief executive Mark Ordan said he does not foresee layoffs and expects the company, with 300 employees locally, to remain in its new headquarters on Wisconsin Avenue.

"This strengthens the organization because it gives it the ability to do the things we need to do," he said. "In the past few months, we've been financially constrained. It will now be a fully capitalized company which has a platform for growth.

Well-known Washington developer Herbert S. Miller founded Mills. He hired Laurence C. Siegel in the early 1980s as the lead leasing agent, and as such Siegel worked on some of Miller's early developments.

Mills pioneered the concept of the hybrid mall when it opened Potomac Mills in Woodbridge in 1985, combining outlet and off-price stores with traditional retailers in a more upscale environment. The mall opened with 1.2 million square feet and brought one of the first Ikeas, the cheap-chic Swedish home-furnishings store, to North America.

"They were the first one to understand that the luxury shopper could also be enticed to do this," said C. Britt Beemer, head of America's Research Group, a consumer-behavior research firm. "Just because you're an outlet shopper doesn't mean you want to shop in a boring experience."

After renaming itself, Mills went public in 1994. A year later, Miller retired after a disagreement with the board, which was dominated by directors from one of its largest investors, German real estate company Kan Am. Siegel was named chief executive in 1995, and under him, the company grew rapidly from four mega-malls and 11 community shopping centers to dozens of projects, including in Southern California, Texas, Arizona and Canada.

"People thought these guys were revolutionary in creating a new retail environment that didn't exist in the past," said Benjamin Yang, an analyst at Green Street Advisors. But some analysts say Mills' ambitious plans made it grow too fast. Last year, Miller filed a lawsuit against Mills, alleging mismanagement and said the company's auditors "raised red flags" in 2002 about its accounting woes. Miller alleged that Mills' problems had hurt the value of his continued investments in the company's projects.

Miller said he was now optimistic, given Brookfield's involvement. "It's been in limbo since all the bad news started with the potential bankruptcy," he said. "Now the logjam is broken."

Staff writer Ylan Q. Mui contributed to this report.

Buyout May End Mills' Troubles (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Embattled local mall developer Mills Corp. agreed yesterday to be bought by a Toronto investment company, potentially ending a year of accounting problems and declining market value.

Brookfield Asset Management Inc. plans to buy the Chevy Chase developer for $1.35 billion, beating out at least two other firms.

Mills, which recently revealed that its executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, owns 38 shopping centers nationwide. Locally, it owns Lakeforest Mall in Gaithersburg, Potomac Mills and Potomac Town Center in Prince William County, Marley Station in Glen Burnie, Md., and Arundel Mills in Hanover, Md.

Brookfield did not return a phone call yesterday to learn whether the shopping centers would remain open.

Mills Chief Executive Officer and President Mark Ordan said the Brookfield offer was the "best possible result" out of a number of offers.

"We believe the transaction with Brookfield not only provides certain value to the Mills' stockholders, but also affords them the opportunity to participate in the upside potential created by this transaction," he said.

The deal, which comes to $7.5 billion including assumed debt and preferred stock, was approved unanimously by the company's board of directors. But it still must be voted on by shareholders, leaving the window open for counterbids.

Brookfield plans to pay $21 per share, 15 percent more than Tuesday's closing price of $17.77 on the New York Stock Exchange. By the close yesterday, Mills' shares climbed 26 percent to $22.46.

The stock price climbed over $21 after Gazit-Globe Ltd., an Israeli real estate company, said in a Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filing that earlier in the day it submitted a new bid that came to $22 per share.

Gazit and fellow major shareholder Farallon Capital Management, a San Francisco hedge fund, submitted bids to pour money into the company, trying in part to rescue their own investments.

Farallon proposed $20 per share in a $499 million recapitalization plan.

DOJ_NMG_0118375

But those bids merely infused Mills with cash; Brookfield's offer is to buy the company. A purchase offer is more attractive, said RBC Capital Markets analyst Richard C. Moore.

"That's what we've been calling for for months," Mr. Moore said. "A purchase is the only outcome likely in our minds."

Under the Brookfield offer, Mills would become a publicly traded entity of the company, which manages more than $50 billion worth of office space in the United States and Canada and shopping centers in Brazil.

One of its subsidiaries, Brookfield Properties, owns 25 buildings in the Washington area, including Silver Spring Metro Plaza, Sunrise Technology Park in Reston and 1200 K Street Northwest.

"We are pleased to be able to work with the Mills Corp. to move beyond the recent issues it had encountered," said J. Bruce Flatt, managing partner and chief executive officer of Brookfield Asset Management.

During 2006, Mills' value fell from $42.28 per share in January to $12.94 in August, before climbing back to $17.77 Tuesday.

The company said earlier this month in an SEC filing that its executives may have engaged in misconduct, creating four years worth of earnings restatements. The SEC is investigating. It also warned that unless it could negotiate a loan extension, it would run out of money on March 31. Its loan was $1.1 billion, slightly less than the Brookfield purchase offer.

The Brookfield deal, if approved by shareholders, is expected to be completed during the second half of this year.

GE Is Near Deal For Abbott Unit (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Kathryn Kranhold And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

General Electric Co. last night was nearing a deal to purchase the diagnostics division of Abbott Laboratories, people familiar with the matter said, as the conglomerate makes a deeper push into the world of health care and medical devices.

Details of GE's plans couldn't be learned last night, and it is possible GE may be purchasing a large part but not all of the Abbott unit. Through last year's first nine months, the division posted revenue of about $2.9 billion and an operating profit of approximately $300 million, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings, representing about 18% of Abbott's revenue and just 7% of its operating profit.

GE, Fairfield, Conn., declined to comment. Abbott spokeswoman Melissa Brotz declined to comment.

The deal would broaden GE's $17 billion health-care business, which has moved aggressively into health-care-information technology and molecular diagnostics in the past few years. The deal could mark GE's entry into "in vitro" diagnostics, which includes routine instrumentation and test kits for diseases such as HIV and cancer. The revenue of Abbott's core in-vitro diagnostics business has been flat for several years.

Last month, GE Chairman and Chief Executive Jeffrey Immelt indicated he was looking to expand the company's health-care business and add new platforms through acquisitions. Mr. Immelt told analysts and investors, "We've always wanted to build a broader diagnostics company."

GE's main health-care business remains diagnostic equipment, including ultrasound and X-ray machines as well as more sophisticated screening equipment.

Mr. Immelt made his biggest strategic move in health care in 2004, when he paid more than $9 billion for Britain's Amersham, a bioscience and medical-diagnostic firm. Through Amersham, GE entered the molecular-diagnostic market. GE is now developing molecular agents to be injected into the bloodstream to target specific diseases. The agents then show up during screenings indicating that a patient has a particular cancer or disease. Diagnostics related to breast cancer have been among GE's areas of focus.

The diagnostics business of Abbott, of Abbott Park, Ill., is driven by growth in two segments: glucose monitoring for diabetics and molecular tests for diseases such as breast cancer. Sara Michelmore, an analyst at Cowen & Co., forecasts 2006 diagnostics revenue of around $3.9 billion. The core in-vitro business accounts for $2.5 billion of that, and is flat compared with 2005. She says the molecular products rose year-over-year by about 20%, while the glucose-monitoring segment rose 9%.

The diagnostics division has been a bit of a thorn in Abbott's side since 1999, when regulators found one of its manufacturing facilities in violation of Food and Drug Administration regulations. The plant in question made chemical kits used to test for diseases, and despite Abbott's attempts to resolve the matter, a consent decree continued to hamper it for several years.

Within the past year Abbott acquired Guidant Corp.'s vascular wing for $4.1 billion and Kos Pharmaceuticals for $3.7 billion. It spun off low-growth hospital-products unit Hospira Inc. in 2004. That same year, it beefed up the glucose-monitoring side of the diagnostics business with a $1.2 billion deal for TheraSense.

Other similar deals of late have brought in hefty revenue multiples. In June, Siemens AG of Germany paid $5.3 billion for German drug maker Bayer AG 's diagnostics division, which had about $1.8 billion in 2005 sales. Siemens bought Diagnostic

DOJ_NMG_0118376

Products last year for $1.86 billion, a large premium to that company's roughly $480 million in 2005 sales. If Siemens' purchase price of Bayer is any indication, Abbott's diagnostic unit could go for as much as $9 billion.

Write to Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com1, Kathryn Kranhold at kathryn.kranhold@wsj.com2 and Avery Johnson at avery.johnson@WSJ.com3

G.E. May Buy Abbott's Diagnostic Unit (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Claudia Deutsch

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

General Electric is near a deal to buy Abbott Laboratories' medical diagnostics unit for as much as $5 billion, according to people involved in the negotiations.

Acquiring the Abbott business, which makes and sells glucose monitoring systems, blood test kits and other chemically based diagnostic tools, would enable G.E.'s health care unit to expand its growing stable of diagnostic products and services.

The G.E. unit, GE Healthcare, has annual revenue of about $16 billion and has long been a leader in expensive diagnostic machines like CAT scanners and MRI equipment. The Abbott product line would help G.E. add nursing homes and other nonhospital medical settings to its base, analysts said.

They predicted that G.E. would quickly wring efficiencies from the Abbott Diagnostics unit. GE Healthcare's margins generally top 16 percent, they said, while Abbott Diagnostics' margins are about 7 percent.

The diagnostics business, while profitable for Abbott Laboratories, is far smaller than the company's drug business, which had profits of $3.1 billion on sales of $9.84 billion in the first nine months of 2006. Abbott Diagnostics, by contrast, had profits of only $306 million during that period, on sales of $2.98 billion.

In November, Abbott Laboratories expanded its drug business by agreeing to buy Kos Pharmaceuticals for $3.7 billion.

Abbott is also betting on growth in its cardiovascular stent business. Early last year the company paid $4.1 billion to acquire Guidant's stent and other vascular business as part of the deal that enabled Boston Scientific to acquire Guidant.

Abbott is now hoping to win federal approval to enter the lucrative market of selling drug-coated stents — tiny metal devices that are designed to prop open coronary arteries after blockages have been cleared.

Abbott's diagnostics business, though, has been under something of a cloud since the company agreed in 1999 to pay $100 million to settle accusations that it had failed to meet federal quality standards in producing its test kits.

"They lost a lot of ground to competitors," said one analyst, who said that he could not be identified until the deal was formally announced. "Shedding it to streamline management makes some sense," the analyst said. "It's a natural progression of their morphing away from the hospital supply business."

He noted that Abbott in 2004 had sold off its hospital products business into an entity called Hospira.

For G.E.'s part, the acquisition continues an acquisition strategy that has included buying Amersham, a British diagnostic pharmaceuticals and biosciences company, for more than $9 billion in 2004.

But some analysts wondered whether G.E. was overpaying.

"G.E. is getting a reputation as a place that will pay top dollar for a fixer-upper," said another analyst, who declined to be identified because he had not yet written to his clients about the deal.

The deal would comes just after G.E. announced on Monday that it was buying Smiths Aerospace for $4.8 billion. That announcement came less than a week after word emerged that G.E. had put its lackluster plastics business on the auction block, in the hope of getting $8 billion to $10 billion for it.

EOP Bids Show Real Estate Is Still Kicking (WSJ)

By Henny Sender, Jennifer S. Forsyth And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The high-stakes game for the country's largest office landlord is the strongest sign yet of the seemingly limitless appreciation of big-city office real estate -- at a time when the prices of homes and condominiums are suffering.

Yesterday, a consortium of real-estate investors launched a competing $21.5 billion offer for Equity Office Properties Trust, hoping to knock off an existing $20.1 billion deal with buyout shop Blackstone Group.

The battle reveals a series of tight friendships and rivalries that, behind the scenes, is influencing the flow of billions of dollars in capital and personal prestige alike. Blackstone's deal is regarded as the largest leveraged buyout in history, at $36 billion, when factoring in Equity Office's $16 billion in existing debt.

In this atmosphere, a topping bid that bests Blackstone's by some measures might have shocked real-estate experts a year ago. Today, it gets merely a shrug.

DOJ_NMG_0118377

"Honestly, I don't think anything can be too surprising anymore," said Michael Knott, an analyst with Green Street Advisors, a real-estate research and trading firm based in Newport Beach, Calif. "It just seems there's no limit to the prices being paid."

In a short statement released last night, real-estate firms Vornado Realty Trust, Starwood Capital and Walton Street Capital offered to purchase Chicago-based Equity Office for $52 a share, 60% of it in Vornado shares and the remainder in cash. That represents a 7% premium to the $48.50-a-share offer that Equity Office agreed to last November. In response, Blackstone termed the Vornado-led bid as "inferior," adding that the competing bid "carries vastly more risk" than its own deal, which is set to close in about two weeks. (See more on the EOP battle1.)

In New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Equity Office shares gained $1.09, or 2.2%, to $50.94. The shares edged higher in after-hours trading as well, hovering just below the Vornado offer price. Vornado's shares fell $3.38, or 2.7%, to $122.55 in New York Stock Exchange trading. The investors said they planned to divvy up Equity Office's nationwide collection of office buildings, which dot the skylines of New York, Seattle and Boston, among other cities.

Vornado said it would take about half of EOP's portfolio. Combined with its current holdings, the new acquisitions would leave Vornado with a significant presence in the New York, Washington, D.C., Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles office markets, according to the company's statement.

A flood of money from around the globe is creating higher values for local assets, such as commercial real estate. Private-equity funds like Blackstone are absorbing cash from global investors, and Wall Street continues to issue bonds secured against real estate that are in turn gobbled up by international hedge funds and insurers.

At the heart of the deal remains Sam Zell, a 65-year-old investor and dealmeister who built up Equity Office over the decades from his perch in Chicago. Known for a quick wit, a collection of motorcycles and his blue jeans, Mr. Zell earned the nickname "Gravedancer" for his proficiency at sweeping in like a vulture and buying distressed properties, rehabilitating them and then selling them at huge profits.

After the bid from Blackstone, some investors wondered whether the deal indicated the top of the real-estate market. But Mr. Zell himself has said he thinks the office markets will be on the upswing for at least another two years.

Some of the nation's most shrewd real-estate players appear to agree with Mr. Zell -- and then some. Vornado, led by Chief Executive Steven Roth, has a deep presence in New York City and Washington D.C., and carries a market capitalization of $18.6 billion. At times, it has acted more like an investment fund than a REIT, participating in the privatization of Toys "R" Us in 2005.

Barry Sternlicht's Starwood Capital vehicle has assumed much of the deal-making bravado that Mr. Sternlicht brought to the Starwood lodging company he built into an industry titan. He is no longer associated with that firm, called Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide, Inc.

Investor Neil Bluhm, meanwhile, helps run Walton Street Capital, after helping found a firm called JMB Realty, once a formidable real-estate presence in Chicago, but that faltered in the real-estate downturn of the early 1990s.

The deal underscores how small the financial world can be. A young Mr. Sternlicht worked for Mr. Bluhm as an analyst at JMB, from 1986 to 1991. When Mr. Sternlicht established Starwood, Mr. Bluhm was one of his original backers, along with the Ziff family. John Schreiber, who was one of the founders of Blackstone's real-estate group and still serves as an adviser to Blackstone, also worked at JMB and now finds himself on the other side of what will likely be a bitter takeover battle.

The group hasn't yet had access to Equity Office's books, and to get that access, it has to convince Equity Office's board it has the financial wherewithal to offer a superior bid. That is a steep hurdle for what is the largest private-equity deal ever, but the group has lined up substantial financing from J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., UBS AG, Barclays Capital PLC and Royal Bank of Scotland. Perhaps the largest obstacle for the Vornado group is Blackstone's "matching rights," which allow it to have the last look at any competing bid.

There are other obstacles as well. The new bidders have to convince the board that an offer involving stock is as valuable as cash, especially given the steep appreciation of Vornado shares over the past twelve months. Also, since the deal is subject to Vornado shareholders' approval, the timing of any deal could stretch into months, rather than the two weeks to closing for Blackstone. For its part, the Vornado group could decide to withdraw after doing its due diligence.

In a statement issued last night, the EOP board said it will consider the Vornado group's proposal "as soon as practicable." The statement also said that the board has not changed its recommendation to merge with Blackstone. The shareholder vote remains Feb. 5.

Looming over the proceedings is the state of Blackstone's relationship with J.P. Morgan. The two have had a tight bond over the past few years, although J.P. Morgan has generally not been involved in financing Blackstone's real-estate deals. Helping "jump" the deal creates another fraught dynamic that Wall Streeters are watching. A J.P. Morgan spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0118378

Perhaps Vornado was romanced by the idea of a second chance at the bride. In the shareholder proxy, Equity Office said that four suitors had flirted with a merger but none was willing to pay Mr. Zell's minimum price of $45 a share until Blackstone came through with its offer in November. Vornado was widely reported to have been one of those suitors.

Mr. Knott said he would have expected Vornado to try to cut a deal with Blackstone to purchase a group of buildings it covets, rather than jumping in for the whole transaction. That way, Vornado wouldn't have had to pay Blackstone the $200 million break-up fee.

Write to Henny Sender at henny.sender@wsj.com6 and Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com7

SKorea Antitrust Regulator Fines Hyundai (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

South Korean Antitrust Regulator Fines Hyundai Motor for Unfair Practices

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said Thursday it has fined Hyundai Motor Co. 23 billion won (US$25 million; euro19 million) for unfair market practices, the latest in a series of woes to hit the world's sixth-largest automaker.

The Fair Trade Commission said the company issued warnings to and discontinued contracts with car dealerships which failed to meet "excessive" sales targets.

"Hyundai Motor used its monopolistic market status to set excessive annual sales targets for car dealers," the commission said in a statement.

In addition, the carmaker didn't allow the dealers to move to other areas or to recruit salespeople to help achieve their sales goals last year, the commission said.

Hyundai and affiliate Kia Motors Corp. accounted for 73.3 percent of the domestic market last year.

The regulator said it carried out an investigation into suspected violations of fair trading rules by Hyundai Motor between February and November last year.

The fine is the latest blow to the automaker. On Tuesday, prosecutors demanded that Hyundai Chairman Chung-Mong-koo be sentenced to six years in prison over embezzlement and breach of trust charges. A verdict in Chung's trial is expected next month.

The company has also been plagued by a series of strikes. The latest ended Wednesday after management and the company's labor union reached an accord on bonus payments.

Hyundai's union has walked off the job every year but one since it was founded in 1987.

For all of 2006, Hyundai Motor, the world's sixth-largest carmaker in tandem with Kia, sold a total of 581,092 vehicles in South Korea, up 1.8 percent from a year earlier.

ENVIRONMENT:

Neb. Egg Company Is Fined For Pollution (AP)

AP, January 18, 2007

Egg Processing Company M.G. Waldbaum Is Fined $1.05 Million for Violating Clean Water Act

WAKEFIELD, Neb. (AP) -- An egg processing company has been fined $1.05 million for violating the federal Clean Water Act.

M.G. Waldbaum Co., a subsidiary of Minnetonka, Minn.-based Michael Foods, has agreed to complete a $16 million wastewater treatment plant for its egg processing plant in 2009. And it will better manage manure from several area poultry farms, the U.S. Department of Justice said in a news release.

According to the original consent decree that averted further litigation, the state and federal governments will split the fine.

Treasurer and secretary Mark Witmer of Michael Foods said Waldbaum has resolved the pollution issues that first arose in 2004 and that work on the wastewater plant will finished in 2008.

The city of Wakefield, which is about 30 miles northeast of Norfolk, will pay a $20,000 fine for letting its sewage lagoons be overloaded by waste from the egg plant, the Justice Department said in a recent news release.

The city also agreed to improve monitoring of its sewage plant.

Lobbying Firm Cuts Ties To Name Partner Under Investigation In Abramoff Probe (LAW)

By Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118379

Lobbying firm Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles has severed ties with former Department of the Interior Deputy Secretary J. Steven Griles.

Griles has been targeted in the Justice Department's ongoing corruption probe stemming from the lobbying activities of Jack Abramoff.

Griles, who had been a name partner at the firm, was a lobbyist for coal and energy interests both before and after his tenure at the Interior Department from 2001 to 2005. During Griles' stint at Interior, which oversees lucrative drilling and mining licenses on millions of acres of federal land, his ties to industry were the subject of a number of internal investigations.

Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles did not respond to detailed questions about Griles' departure, including whether Griles was forced out by his partners and whether the firm would be renaming itself. Instead, the firm provided a statement saying Griles resigned as a partner effective Jan. 10. That same day, a number of news outlets reported Griles had been informed he was a target of federal prosecutors. A lawyer for Griles declined to comment on his departure.

In testimony before Congress in 2005, Griles told senators that as the Interior Department's No. 2, he had been approached by Abramoff about joining Greenberg Traurig, the firm where Abramoff worked. Griles told the senators, however, that he had not granted Abramoff or his Indian tribal clients special access to the department. In January 2006, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding several of those clients, among other charges. He was later sentenced to five years in prison.

A source with knowledge of the investigation says prosecutors are exploring whether to charge Griles with lying to Congress and honest-services fraud.

As a lobbyist, Griles has most recently represented the American Petroleum Institute, Mettiki Coal, Newmont Mining Corp., and other large mining and energy interests on a number of environmental and regulatory issues.

Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles generated $780,000 in lobbying revenue during the first six months of 2006, according to disclosure forms filed with the Senate.

Bills On Climate Move To Spotlight In New Congress (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Andrew C. Revkin

New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — The climate here has definitely changed.

Legislation to control global warming that once had a passionate but quixotic ring to it is now serious business. Congressional Democrats are increasingly determined to wrest control of the issue from the White House and impose the mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions that most smokestack industries have long opposed.

Four major Democratic bills have been announced, with more expected. One of these measures, or a blend of them, stands an excellent chance of passage in this Congress or the next, industry and environmental lobbyists said in interviews.

Many events have combined to create the new direction — forsythia blooming in lawmakers' gardens in January, polar bears lacking the ice they need to hunt and Al Gore's movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," along with pragmatic executives seeking an idea of future costs and, especially, the arrival of a Democratic-controlled Congress. There was evidence of the changed mood all over Washington this week.

On Wednesday, leading scientists and evangelical pastors jointly declared their intention to fight the causes of climate change and the public confusion on the subject. Cheryl Johns, a professor at the Church of God Theological Seminary, called that problem "nature deficit disorder."

Another news conference on Wednesday featured executives of the heavily regulated electric utility industry embracing Senators Dianne Feinstein of California and Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, both Democrats. The senators were offering separate bills to add regulations, including a cap on carbon dioxide emissions.

One sign of the Democrats' determination to move on climate bills occurred when a Democratic Congressional aide confirmed that Speaker Nancy Pelosi wanted to create a special committee on climate, apparently an end run around Representative John D. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Mr. Dingell, through an aide, Jodi Seth, said Wednesday that such committees were "as relevant and useful as feathers on a fish."

Mr. Dingell's firm support of the automobile industry, a leading source of carbon dioxide emissions, and his earlier lack of enthusiasm for climate measures have made him suspect among advocates of strong climate laws.

To add excitement, the man of the moment, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, lent his name to the best-known brand in climate-change legislation, a measure by Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut.

That means that two of the three sponsors, Mr. Obama and Mr. McCain, are leading presidential contenders in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0118380

Neither party is united around any one position. And for all the flurry of news conferences and proffered solutions, the big unanswered question was what will President Bush do?

A tantalizing hint came from James L. Connaughton, chairman of the president's Council on Environmental Quality, in an interview on Tuesday.

"There are a number of pathways for getting to a shared goal, and we should explore all of them," Mr. Connaughton said.

He added, "Part of that, by the way, is learning about some of the flaws in the design of the economywide cap-and-trade approach, which, if corrected, might make it a workable tool."

That suggests that some version of an emissions cap may eventually win White House support. Persistent rumors that the president might support an emissions cap, circulating in Washington and Europe, were rejected Tuesday by his press secretary, Tony Snow.

But White House aides have hinted for months that Mr. Bush was planning a dramatic announcement on the subject in his annual address. Last year, the president said, "America is addicted to oil," and stimulated a debate over dependence on foreign oil that has overlapped with environmental groups' calls for cleaner-burning domestic fuels.

The mechanism that Mr. Snow ruled out is the basis for most of the Democratic measures, capping carbon dioxide emissions and then giving or selling to companies allowances, effectively permits to create a certain level of emissions.

Cleaner factories or utilities could then sell the allowances and gain a new revenue source. Factories with higher than allowable emissions would have to buy the permits they need.

Such a market, already in effect in Europe, in theory would set a price for a ton of carbon dioxide emissions, and the market would stimulate innovation in technologies that would reduce emissions or produce goods or power without the same high emissions common today.

Diplomats and environmental groups speculated in Washington this week that the Bush administration would look at other mandatory actions, perhaps not an emissions cap but rather expanding the decision to increase marginally fuel-economy standards for light trucks.

A similar move for passenger vehicles, coupled with a call for sharp increases in ethanol and other renewable fuels plus new money for research into clean-energy technologies would be a bouquet approach that would expand policies Mr. Bush has put forward.

European allies have been trying to nudge Mr. Bush toward their cap-and-trade model. The White House says that would shift jobs, and emissions from one country to another without slowing worldwide growth in emissions.

The president' s opposition to mandatory caps retains strong support on Capitol Hill.

Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the trade group of the utility industry, said Wednesday: "Everything is different, but it's also the same in some ways. You still need 60 votes to get something big done in the Senate. And there are still many complex, thorny issues that stand in the way of enactment."

The Democratic bills announced in the last two weeks cover a broad range. A proposal by Senator Jeff Bingaman, the New Mexico Democrat who is chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, would decrease the rate of emissions growth before capping emissions and would build in a "safety valve," freeing industries from the caps in certain circumstances.

Groups like Environmental Defense say the safety valve would undermine market mechanisms.

In an interview, Mr. Bingaman said, "The way I look at it it's a question of what we can get agreement on."

Less draconian than that proposal is the Lieberman-McCain approach. It would tighten controls more gradually and include subsidies for nuclear power. An emissions cap for just utilities is the centerpiece of yet another bill, by Ms. Feinstein.

Some scientists and economists have expressed concern in recent weeks that the discussions here is overly focused on emissions caps, with too little attention on what they say is an essential need, greatly expanded government-financed research on nonpolluting energy technologies.

Richard G. Richels, a climate expert and an economist at the Electric Power Research Institute, an organization in Palo Alto, Calif., that conducts energy studies for the utility industry, said a carbon dioxide cap would mainly prompt industry to deploy existing cleaner technologies that provide gains, but fail to come close to solving the climate problem.

Mr. Richels added that it would not spur long-term investments seeking breakthroughs like new ways to store intermittent power from windmills.

Democrats Push Climate Change To Front Burner (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka And David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Strategy Aims to Draw Bush Into Negotiations; Industries Sort Options

DOJ_NMG_0118381

WASHINGTON -- The new Democratic-led Congress is trying to put its mark on one of the most contentious environmental and economic problems within reach: climate change.

The initiative is one of the starkest signs of the transformation of Washington's agenda as a result of November's election. While the Senate has debated climate-change moves for several years, the House of Representatives, under Republican control for the past 12 years, has done relatively little.

Now House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is moving to ramp up debates on energy and how to curb so-called greenhouse gases, which most scientists believe are accelerating global warming by trapping the sun's heat in the atmosphere. But the Californian already is discovering how controversial any effort will be -- even within her own party. Ms. Pelosi is expected to announce today that she is creating a select committee on climate change and energy independence that will be empowered to hold hearings.

Her strategy is to raise the profile of the issue and press for action by early summer. In an interview last evening, Ms. Pelosi said she saw energy independence and climate-change legislation as part of the next phase of the Democratic agenda after passing bills on issues such as the minimum wage and student loans.

"Tomorrow, we finish our 100 hours, and I will talk about what comes next, and included in that is energy independence. Climate change is part of energy independence," she said. "We're asking our chairmen to have their hearings and submit their legislation...in time for us to introduce an energy independence package no later than the Fourth of July."

By raising the issues' profile, Democrats say Ms. Pelosi will be better able to put pressure on the White House to come to the bargaining table. But her effort is angering committee chairmen less eager to move quickly, particularly powerful Michigan Rep. John Dingell. The Michigan lawmaker has expressed his ire at what he considers an intrusion into his House Energy and Commerce Committee's jurisdiction over energy and climate-change legislation.

Bills already circulating in the Senate have in common a mandatory cap on emissions, a step that, according to the White House, President Bush isn't prepared to advocate in next week's State of the Union address. However, industry and environmental groups see Mr. Bush as a potential broker who could help shape a consensus, particularly in the Senate, where 60 votes would be needed to overcome a filibuster promised by Oklahoma Republican Sen. James Inhofe.

The effort has enormous implications for American businesses and manufacturers, which are split on the best course. The coal-mining, oil-production and utility sectors are likely to be hardest hit, since they sell fossil fuels containing carbon dioxide -- the most common greenhouse gas -- or derive their energy from it. Among the forces urging action are industries worried that states are producing a patchwork of regulations. California has a new law to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, while New Mexico, Minnesota, South Carolina and Florida are working on their own plans. Dozens of U.S. cities have imposed emissions restrictions. A federal law could preempt further local and state efforts.

The most striking example of U.S. industry's evolution toward engaging the issue is oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp., which has long been a leading opponent of emissions rules but has begun talking about how to structure them. The oil industry also faces other pressures; today the House is set to vote on whether to cut subsidies for U.S. oil production.

"We now believe the legislative dance has formally begun," says Steve Cochran, a legislative analyst for Environmental Defense, a New York-based group which has been leading the charge for a cap-and-trade approach that would encourage trading in emissions credits that could soften the impact on industries. Companies that reduce their emissions below assigned caps could earn credits to sell to other companies that want to avoid penalties for exceeding their caps.

The flagship among the cap-and-trade bills was unveiled last week by Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Democratic Sens. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Barack Obama of Illinois. The legislation would require industries to reduce their emissions to 2004 levels by 2012 and then further decrease emissions by about 2% a year through 2020. The measure calls for the nation's emissions to be reduced by two-thirds by 2050. Less-demanding versions of the bill were rejected by the Senate twice before.

A more modest approach, being prepared by Democratic Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, calls for industries to stabilize their emissions by 2020 at levels registered in 2013. After that, the Bingaman bill would impose reductions below 2013 levels. The bill, expected to attract some industry and Republican support, is regarded as a fallback measure if the McCain-Lieberman-Obama approach fails. "We want to occupy the center ground," a Bingaman spokesman says.

A third approach, sponsored by Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, calls on the nation to reduce emissions to 1990 levels by 2020 and to make an 80% reduction by 2050. Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California, chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, calls this bill, with its steep cuts, the "gold standard." Her panel will play a major role on the issue.

While these bills would require utilities, coal mines, oil companies and other businesses across the economy to make the cuts, a fourth measure, submitted yesterday by Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, focuses only on utilities that make electricity. They would be required to reduce their emissions by 25% by 2020. The bill is supported by six major utilities, including California's PG&E Corp. and Florida Power & Light, companies that have long experience with emissions trading required by the Clean Air Act.

DOJ_NMG_0118382

In the House, the climate-change issue is already stoking tensions. Democratic Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts is the leading candidate to head the new select committee, which is designed to be largely a communications vehicle able to cut across the traditional lines of the tax-writing, energy, science and environment panels.

But Mr. Dingell, who is the most upset about the Pelosi approach, is expected to host a meeting today of his committee's Democrats who, by chance, also include chairmen of other relevant panels such as the Science and Oversight and Government Reform committees.

Ms. Pelosi said the proposed select committee would "absolutely not" intrude on jurisdiction of existing panels, but serve to collect information and raise the profile of the issue. Her office said the new panel won't be empowered to initiate legislation. But committee heads expressed concern it would distract from their work and permit changes to be imposed on their bills through the House Rules Committee, which the speaker controls.

There is also a potential disconnect between the goals of Ms. Pelosi's agenda: The increase in domestic oil, gas and coal production likely needed to achieve energy independence would entail heightened output of greenhouse gases.

A significant part of the debate on climate change will focus on the bills' impact on the economy. However, some people who have designed the computer software used to calculate the projections say the bills contain many imponderables -- including assumptions about the potential emergence of cleaner technologies -- that can't be modeled.

So far, only the cost of Mr. Bingaman's bill has been estimated: The Energy Department's Energy Information Administration projects it would reduce the nation's gross domestic economy by 0.1%, or $232 billion, between 2009 and 2030.

But the Energy Department study assumes the emergence of a new generation of nuclear-power plants and other emission-reduction technologies that haven't appeared yet, says Alan Beamon, who helped prepare the study. "There's an awful lot of uncertainty on how markets will evolve to meet those needs," he says.

Computer models have diverged before. A study on the 2003 version of the McCain-Lieberman bill by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology predicted the measure would increase consumer costs by 0.02% over a couple of decades, while CRA International, a Boston-based consulting group, put the cost at 10 times higher.

"Models all assume that technological change happens smoothly," says Anne Smith, a vice president of CRA, "but when they do that, they underestimate the effort it will take of solving some of these problems."

Jason Grumet, staff director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy, says the uncertainty of the models requires a "safety valve" in any emissions-trading plan so that the government could step in if legislation threatened economic stability.

Pelosi May Create Global Warming Panel (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, intent on putting global warming atop the Democratic agenda, is shaking up traditional committee fiefdoms dominated by some of Congress' oldest and most powerful members.

She's moving to create a special committee to recommend legislation for cutting greenhouse gases, most likely to be chaired by Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a Democratic leadership aide said Wednesday.

Markey has advocated raising mileage standards for cars, trucks and SUVs and is one of the House's biggest critics of oil companies and U.S. automakers,

Pelosi has discussed the proposal with at least two Democratic committee chairmen: fellow Californian Henry Waxman of Oversight and Government Reform, and West Virginia Rep. Nick Rahall, who heads the Natural Resources panel. Pelosi intends to announce the move this week, said the leadership aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because not all of the details have been worked out.

The move, to some degree, would sidestep two of the House's most powerful Democratic committee bosses, in shaping what's expected to be at least a yearlong debate on global warming:

· Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell of Michigan, a defender of the auto industry and at 80 the longest serving member of the House.

· New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who as the 76-year-old chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, would have to clear any tax on carbon-based fuels like coal, oil or natural gas, which have been blamed for warming the atmosphere. A chief advocate of such a tax is former Democratic Vice President Al Gore.

DOJ_NMG_0118383

Rahall said he had spoken with Pelosi about the idea of a new select committee. Rahall's panel oversees energy development on public lands, including coal, oil and natural gas as well as cleaner, non-carbon sources such as geothermal and windmills.

"I've been assured that no legislative jurisdiction would be taken away from any committee," Rahall said. "No legislative responsibility would be shifted from any committee."

As chair of Energy and Commerce, Dingell oversees the Clean Air Act — and would have the most to lose by letting another panel take the lead. The panel's staff chief, Dennis Fitzgibbons, a former auto company lobbyist, said Dingell was philosophically opposed to Pelosi's plan.

"He has always been cool to the idea, because it undermines the fundamental idea for establishing committees in the first place, which is to acquire expertise in a certain area," Fitzgibbons said.

Dingell, asked about the new committee, said, "I have not been officially informed."

Waxman, like Markey a one-time protege of Dingell, said that Pelosi discussed the idea of a special committee with him several days ago. He, too, is a skeptic.

"I believe the existing committees can deal effectively with global warming," he said Wednesday. "But I can also understand why the speaker believes it's important to highlight this issue."

A new committee would give Pelosi a vehicle to push a regulatory scheme for reducing greenhouse gases and pit her against President Bush, who plans to outline his global warming approach in his State of the Union next week. Bush has repeatedly opposed any mandatory reductions in carbon dioxide emissions, instead advocating voluntary approaches and research on new technologies. Pelosi has supported mandatory reductions with specific target dates for achieving them.

"It's an issue that the speaker thinks is critical to address," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider.

Democratic officials said the committee would be responsible for advising the best legislative approaches while the actual bill-writing duties would likely still be done by Dingell's and Rangel's committees. Among the topics being negotiated are how long the committee should exist and how broad its focus should be, since global climate change affects virtually everything.

Pelosi hasn't shied from taking on other powerful House Democrats. She endorsed the losing effort by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., to become majority leader over Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md. She also has approved of six-year term limits for committee chairmen over objections from Dingell and other senior Democrats.

She also has a history with Dingell, who backed Hoyer over Pelosi in a 2001 race for the party whip's post. Pelosi backed a Democratic primary challenger to Dingell's re-election the following year.

___

Associated Press writers Jim Kuhnhenn and H. Josef Hebert contributed to this report.

IN THE LOOP, ON THE HILL: A New Panel Forms Under Jurisdictional Cloud (WP)

By Lois Romano

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi moved quickly yesterday to deal with a furor that erupted over her decision to create a committee dedicated to global warming that will undoubtedly wander onto the turf of the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee.

Pelosi plans on announcing the new committee today, over the protestations of Energy Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) and Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), also on the committee. Sources say that Pelosi will likely name as chairman Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass), who has built a 30-year career as a leader on environmental issues. Markey's office has no comment.

A Hill aide with knowledge of the flap said that the new committee will have no legislative jurisdiction. However, Pelosi sees this as a high-profile, attention-getting committee that will put pressure on Energy and Commerce to move on climate change, say Hill sources.

Pelosi, who has made global warming and the environment a priority, has been frustrated with what she has perceived as a lack of commitment from Dingell to limit U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, to protect the auto industry in his district. A spokesman for Dingell, however, said that the chairman has put the auto industry on notice that he's moving forward with hearings on climate control and emission standards.

Last Friday, Dingell sent a memo to his committee members announcing plans for hearings on climate change, and he has invited former vice president Al Gore to testify. "I recognize that there is a wide range of opinion on climate change and it is my intention that we hear the full spectrum of views," Dingell wrote.

Spokeswoman Jodi Seth said that Dingell and the committee have begun planning a series of hearings, and that creating a new committee would only duplicate work already underway. She added that Dingell met yesterday with U.N. executive secretary for climate Eyvo de Boer.

More succinctly the chairman said in a statement: "These kinds of committees are as useful in relevance as feathers on a fish."The Wages of No Action

House and Senate members have been given a serious incentive to complete work on the minimum-wage legislation ASAP -- no raises for them until the job is done. Both the House and Senate bills require the two chambers to pass the legislation before their automatic cost-of-living increases are posted in February.

Meanwhile, Senate aides are none-too-pleased that president pro temp of the Senate, Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) has suggested that it would be inappropriate to authorize a cost-of-living wage increase for Senate employees while Congress is still operating under a continuing resolution--meaning the new budget is not yet in place and therefore the funds are not technically there.

A spokesman for Byrd said that decision will likely be reconsidered when the full-year funding level for the Senate is determined.Excused Absences

A databank of "missed votes" maligned Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, reporting him as the top House vote misser this year. Turns out the poor guy had a wicked skiing accident in Colorado over the holidays and ripped his knee up pretty bad, requiring surgery. He hobbled back to vote for the GOP leadership, then flew home for surgery and to recuperate. Sen. Sam Brownback missed 100 percent of his votes these past few weeks -- again with good reason. The senator was traveling last week in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Ethiopia. And Sen. Daniel Inouye was another at the 100 percent mark because he stayed in Hawaii to give a speech on Iraq, said a spokesman.Hold the Dough for the Crooks

One week before former Ohio congressman Robert Ney (R) is scheduled to be sentenced for accepting bribes, the House is poised to vote on legislation that would deny future legislators-turned-felons their federal pensions.

The measure, which sailed through the Senate, would not be retroactive. So Ney and those who stole before him will not be deprived of their benefits.

Sens. John Kerry (Mass.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.) were the primary co-sponsors of what became known as the Du ke Cunningham Act, for the eponymous California legislator who went down in flames last year after treating a lobbyist's checkbook as his own and accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

The measure would only touch those funds that were matched by the federal government -- not the legislators' own contributions.

According to National Taxpayers Union estimates, Ney would receive $29,000 a year, and Cunningham gets about $40,000, as does former congressman James Traficant (R-Ohio), who was convicted in 2002 of bribery and racketeering.

Former congressman Dan Rostenkowski-- who served 17 months in prison for mail fraud -- is estimated with cost-of-living increases to be receiving $131,000 -- almost as much as his full salary in 1994 when he was defeated for reelection.

It's A Consensus: The End Is Near (LAT)

By Bryn Nelson

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — In an extraordinary display of the mounting concern over climate change, an international group of physicists and an alliance of scientists and evangelical Christians each issued calls to action Wednesday aimed at preventing a doomsday that includes global environmental catastrophe.

The independent initiatives, announced at nearly simultaneous news conferences, reflect the new bonds forged from a growing consensus that human-wrought environmental damage is a moral issue for Christians and scientists alike.

At one event, the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists moved the minute hand of its famous "Doomsday Clock" to 11:55 p.m., with midnight being the figurative end of civilization. For the first time since the clock's creation in 1947, the organization's board of directors added the threat of climate change to unresolved nuclear dangers in the decision to advance the clock.

Meanwhile, a coalition of scientific and religious leaders affirmed their commitment to protecting the environment, calling for "fundamental changes in values, lifestyles and public policies required to address these worsening problems before it is too late."

Randy Isaac, executive director of the American Scientific Affiliation, a fellowship of Christians in scientific disciplines, said the "Urgent Call to Action" signed by 28 researchers and evangelicals reflected a successful search for common ground.

"Representatives of both groups have come together to rally around a common passion: the need to preserve God's creation," he said.

Carl Safina of the Blue Ocean Institute in Cold Spring Harbor, N.Y., said in an interview Wednesday: "We may have slightly different perspectives of where we came from, but the intensity of the problems that we face are becoming too big and too obvious, and they are making those differences [look] increasingly trivial. We're all on this boat together."

Martian Logic (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0118385

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

AYEAR and a half ago, the National Academy of Sciences reported that the country's climate-monitoring systems were "at risk of collapse." This week, in a 400-page-plus knockout of a study, the academy concluded that those systems are even worse off now. This is a stunning indictment of an administration that has parried complaints about inaction on climate change with claims of at least having generously funded research.

The chief problem is President Bush's misplaced funding priorities at NASA, the space agency that doesn't just launch rockets but, along with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, also maintains a series of satellites and other sensors to monitor global climate and weather patterns. The network is essential to detecting and responding to the effects of global warming and other climate phenomena. But Mr. Bush, without significantly increasing NASA's budget, has insisted that it push ahead with plans to establish a human presence on the moon and assume the enormous job of preparing for a manned mission to Mars. These ambitions, coming as the ailing shuttle program also has demanded more money, have forced NASA to cut deeply into earth science and other research programs.

Those earth science programs now have an annual budget that is about $500 million less (in 2006 dollars) than they had at the end of the Clinton administration, says Berrien Moore III, one of the co-chairmen of the committee that drafted the report. The budget for research and analysis for NASA's science missions, the money that pays for experts to make sense of data collected, declined by 30 percent in the past six years. The result is a raft of delayed or canceled projects, many of which are needed to replace antique hardware, and a scientific community increasingly wary of dealing with NASA. This week, to deflect the report's criticisms, the White House is touting funding increases at NOAA, but those aren't enough to pick up the slack, especially after NOAA has had to pare down its own climate-monitoring goals because of huge cost overruns.

Mr. Moore and his co-chairman, Richard A. Anthes, say that Mr. Bush need only restore earth science research funding at NASA to the levels of late in the Clinton administration and spend reasonably on a discrete set of projects to repair the system, a goal that should be reachable if he reconsiders how to pay for his ambitious space missions. If the president must go to the moon or Mars, he should find the money for it responsibly, not by chopping away at other, more vital programs.

Will Al Gore Melt? (WSJ)

By Flemming Rose And Bjorn Lomborg

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Al Gore is traveling around the world telling us how we must fundamentally change our civilization due to the threat of global warming. Today he is in Denmark to disseminate this message. But if we are to embark on the costliest political project ever, maybe we should make sure it rests on solid ground. It should be based on the best facts, not just the convenient ones. This was the background for the biggest Danish newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, to set up an investigative interview with Mr. Gore. And for this, the paper thought it would be obvious to team up with Bjorn Lomborg, author of "The Skeptical Environmentalist," who has provided one of the clearest counterpoints to Mr. Gore's tune.

The interview had been scheduled for months. Mr. Gore's agent yesterday thought Gore-meets-Lomborg would be great. Yet an hour later, he came back to tell us that Bjorn Lomborg should be excluded from the interview because he's been very critical of Mr. Gore's message about global warming and has questioned Mr. Gore's evenhandedness. According to the agent, Mr. Gore only wanted to have questions about his book and documentary, and only asked by a reporter. These conditions were immediately accepted by Jyllands-Posten. Yet an hour later we received an email from the agent saying that the interview was now cancelled. What happened?

One can only speculate. But if we are to follow Mr. Gore's suggestions of radically changing our way of life, the costs are not trivial. If we slowly change our greenhouse gas emissions over the coming century, the U.N. actually estimates that we will live in a warmer but immensely richer world. However, the U.N. Climate Panel suggests that if we follow Al Gore's path down toward an environmentally obsessed society, it will have big consequences for the world, not least its poor. In the year 2100, Mr. Gore will have left the average person 30% poorer, and thus less able to handle many of the problems we will face, climate change or no climate change.

Clearly we need to ask hard questions. Is Mr. Gore's world a worthwhile sacrifice? But it seems that critical questions are out of the question. It would have been great to ask him why he only talks about a sea-level rise of 20 feet. In his movie he shows scary sequences of 20-feet flooding Florida, San Francisco, New York, Holland, Calcutta, Beijing and Shanghai. But were realistic levels not dramatic enough? The U.N. climate panel expects only a foot of sea-level rise over this century. Moreover, sea levels actually climbed that much over the past 150 years. Does Mr. Gore find it balanced to exaggerate the best scientific knowledge available by a factor of 20?

Mr. Gore says that global warming will increase malaria and highlights Nairobi as his key case. According to him, Nairobi was founded right where it was too cold for malaria to occur. However, with global warming advancing, he tells us that malaria is now appearing in the city. Yet this is quite contrary to the World Health Organization's finding. Today Nairobi is considered free of malaria, but in the 1920s and '30s, when temperatures were lower than today, malaria epidemics occurred regularly. Mr. Gore's is a convenient story, but isn't it against the facts?

DOJ_NMG_0118386

He considers Antarctica the canary in the mine, but again doesn't tell the full story. He presents pictures from the 2% of Antarctica that is dramatically warming and ignores the 98% that has largely cooled over the past 35 years. The U.N. panel estimates that Antarctica will actually increase its snow mass this century. Similarly, Mr. Gore points to shrinking sea ice in the Northern Hemisphere, but don't mention that sea ice in the Southern Hemisphere is increasing. Shouldn't we hear those facts? Mr. Gore talks about how the higher temperatures of global warming kill people. He specifically mentions how the European heat wave of 2003 killed 35,000. But he entirely leaves out how global warming also means less cold and saves lives. Moreover, the avoided cold deaths far outweigh the number of heat deaths. For the U.K. it is estimated that 2,000 more will die from global warming. But at the same time 20,000 fewer will die of cold. Why does Mr. Gore tell only one side of the story?

Al Gore is on a mission. If he has his way, we could end up choosing a future, based on dubious claims, that could cost us, according to a U.N. estimate, $553 trillion over this century. Getting answers to hard questions is not an unreasonable expectation before we take his project seriously. It is crucial that we make the right decisions posed by the challenge of global warming. These are best achieved through open debate, and we invite him to take the time to answer our questions: We are ready to interview you any time, Mr. Gore -- and anywhere.

Mr. Rose is culture editor of Jyllands-Posten, in Copenhagen. Mr. Lomborg is a professor at the Copenhagen Business School.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-FBI Agent Denies He Fought Police (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, January 18, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — A retired FBI agent said he stood with his arms raised, looking down at the snow under his feet, when a deputy U.S. marshal charged at him and struck him with a "cold, metallic instrument."

Gary John's testimony Wednesday contradicted that of Deputy U.S. Marshal James Masterson, who said the former agent kept moving around, refused to show his hands and punched him during a Dec. 8, 2005, arrest in Stratford's Oronoque Village.

At the time, federal marshals were seeking John for allegedly violating a no-contact restraining order involving his ex-wife in Rhode Island. They traced him to a condominium on Piute Lane, where John was living with the mother of his now ex-girlfriend from Milford.

Early this afternoon, U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall is expected to send the case to the 12-member jury to determine whether John should be convicted of assaulting a federal law enforcement officer.

John has been in custody since his arrest.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Kaplan questioned John about a letter he sent to his ex- Milford girl friend last summer about "not wanting to go back to prison."

John claimed he meant he did not want to spend the summer incarcerated, but outside enjoying "Connecticut's coastline."

The 58-year-old, 6-foot, 165- pound former FBI agent took the stand to tell his side of the story after spending a day listening to marshals and police officers testify about his conduct.

Responding to questions from Robert Mann,

Advertisement

his lawyer, John said he was standing near the trunk of his car when he heard Masterson shout his name around 10 p.m. on Dec. 8, 2005. Then, he said, he saw the marshal pointing a gun at him.

"I could not understand why a law enforcement officer would have a gun pointed at me," John told the jury in a soft, calm voice. "Nothing in my background justifies that level of force being necessary."

He testified that during most of the ordeal he kept his hands raised, his palms to the ground and his fingers opened except once, when he placed a cell phone call to his girlfriend from Milford.

Asked by Mann why he did not follow Masterson's orders to lie face down, John said there was a 3-inch coating of snow and ice on the ground. "I was wearing a pretty expensive jacket," the former agent explained. "I could not see a reason to tarnish my dress clothes."

When Masterson's backup arrived, John admitted knowing he "was about to be taken into custody. My arms were up, my palms facing out and my eyes looking down at the snow so I would be in a non-threatening position."

Seconds later, John said, he "received a surprise blow" to his cheek from a "metallic instrument. The next thing I felt was an overwhelming force of individuals from behind me."

John claimed that as he was falling he "instinctively and reactively" reached out and grabbed onto someone's outer arms to try to break the fall. He then felt a punch to his left forehead under his left eyebrow and fell to the ground.

On the ground, he said, his face was shoved into the snow making it impossible for him to breathe and his right arm was pulled "so viciously and violently" causing him to shout 'you're breaking my arm.' "

At the time several Stratford police officers, Rhode Island sheriffs and deputy U.S. marshals were on the scene.

"I did not strike Deputy U.S. Marshal James M. Masterson or anyone else," John said. "I never attempted to punch or make any aggressive move."

Masterson testified Tuesday John repeatedly failed to listen to his commands and threw roundhouse punches at him during the arrest.

Earlier in the day, Constance Guerrere, who owned the condominium outside which John was arrested, said she saw numerous law enforcement officers jump John during the arrest.

"The police came and jumped Gary. They threw him on the ground," testified Guerrere, the 78-year-old mother of John's ex-girlfriend. "They had his face in the ice. It was so horrendous, I couldn't watch."

Officials Suprised By DEA Raid On Pot Clinics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

Federal drug agents raided eleven medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles Wednesday afternoon, seizing several thousand pounds of processed marijuana, along with weapons and money, as part of an ongoing investigation, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said.

At least three people in West Hollywood were taken into custody in a raid of five outlets there. Six other outlets in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills were also raided.

In West Hollywood, agents in bullet-proof vests, dark sunglasses, gloves and face masks piled out of a storefront with boxes and black trash bags stuffed full, as 50 protestors gathered, booing and shouting "States' Rights". The evidence was loaded into dark blue SUVs and vans.

At one dispensary, The Farmacy on Santa Monica Boulevard, amateur videographers and others mobbed officers piling three cars with evidence.

West Hollywood city officials said the raid took them by surprise. The West Hollywood Sheriff's station was not notified until 2 p.m., a half-hour before the raid began, said Lt. David Smith.

City spokeswoman Helen Goss said West Hollywood has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people suffering from illnesses like HIV and AIDS, and city officials said they were taken by surprise, learning of the raid as it was going on.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. The federal drug agency, which does not recognize California laws legalizing medical marijuana use, recently stepped up enforcement, contending that the amount of money involved proves that the burgeoning dispensaries are nothing more than fronts for high-stakes drug dealing.

DEA Raids 11 Medical Marijuana Clinics In Los Angeles Area (MHCA)

Monterey (CA) Herald, January 18, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Federal drug agents raided nearly a dozen medical marijuana clinics Wednesday, seizing several thousand pounds of processed marijuana, along with weapons and money, authorities said.

Several people were detained, although no arrests were made after five dispensaries in West Hollywood and six others in Venice, Hollywood and the San Fernando Valley were searched, said Sarah Pullen, a spokeswoman with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Pullen declined to provide details of the investigation, saying the search warrants remained under seal. "But obviously we are looking for marijuana and other illegal drugs, marijuana edibles and evidence of ongoing criminal activity and anything from paperwork to documents -- you name it," Pullen said.

Officials in West Hollywood said they were surprised by the action, learning of the raid as it was happening.

West Hollywood spokeswoman Helen Goss said the city has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people suffering from illnesses like HIV and AIDS.

Agents in bulletproof vests, gloves and face masks left a West Hollywood storefront with boxes and trash bags filled, as about 50 protesters booed and shouted "states' rights."

DOJ_NMG_0118388

At one dispensary, The Farmacy on Santa Monica Boulevard, amateur videographers and others mobbed officers filling three cars with evidence.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. The DEA, which does not recognize California laws legalizing medical marijuana use, has recently stepped up its enforcement.

"Today's enforcement operations show that these establishments are nothing more than drug-trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools," said Ralph W. Partridge, head of the DEA in Los Angeles.

Feds Raid 5 Of 7 Medical Marijuana Clinics In WeHo (CBS2)

CBS 2, January 18, 2007

(CBS) WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. Federal agents raided five of the seven medical marijuana dispensaries in West Hollywood Wednesday, along with six others throughout Los Angeles County, authorities said.

West Hollywood city officials said Drug Enforcement Administration raids were carried out at dispensaries at 7828, 7825, 7901 and 8464 Santa Monica Blvd., and at a dispensary at 8921 Sunset Blvd.

Sarah Pullen of the DEA said six other dispensaries were searched, including four in the San Fernando Valley, one in Hollywood and one in Venice.

She said she could not provide specifics of the raids because the warrants were under court seal, "but obviously we are looking for marijuana and other illegal drugs, marijuana edibles and evidence of ongoing criminal activity and anything from paperwork to documents -- you name it."

Several people were detained but none were arrested, Pullen said, although she said arrests may be forthcoming.

She said although medical marijuana is legal in California, "federal law doesn't differentiate. Marijuana is illegal in any form."

"... The DEA is here to enforce federal drug laws," she said.

"Federal law does have supremacy over state law where there is a difference between federal law and state law by a ruling of the Supreme Court. Therefore, marijuana is illegal."

West Hollywood officials decried the raids.

"The city of West Hollywood has had a long-standing commitment to the compassionate use of medical marijuana for those persons who are facing catastrophic illnesses," City Manager Paul Arevalo said.

Pullen said the places that were served with search warrants were chosen through "citizen complaints and increased criminal activities surrounding the establishments, from parking violations to armed robbery to break ins to graffiti to hand-to-hand sales outside."

She said there are at least 200 marijuana distribution centers operating in Los Angeles County.

Sheriff's Deputy Ed Hernandez said the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department provided traffic control and security in the West Hollywood locations.

West Hollywood City Councilman Jeffrey Prang said he drove by one of the locations this afternoon and it had been taped off.

"The DEA was inside, going through computer files and papers," said Prang, who is employed by the Sheriff's Department in a civilian capacity.

The raids came on the heels of a vote by the West Hollywood City Council last night "toughening the restrictions affecting these establishments," said Prang.

"West Hollywood has been a leader and advocate of the compassionate use of marijuana for people with HIV and other serious illnesses who find it brings them relief," Prang said.

He said marijuana is known to lessen the nausea connected with chemotherapy treatments used to treat cancer and also helps people with HIV or AIDS who get "wasting syndrome."

The marijuana helps them maintain their appetite, he said.

"I'm not an expert, but if people are terminally sick or are suffering, why would one deny them access?" he said.

He said another medical marijuana dispensary was raided in the San Fernando Valley last week, and several in Northern California were raided over the last few weeks.

Arevalo said the city had no advance knowledge of the raids.

"It is regrettable that the federal, state and local governments cannot work together on this issue," he said.

Supporters of the medical marijuana dispensaries said they plan to stage a protest at West Hollywood City Hall tomorrow to condemn the raids.

DOJ_NMG_0118389

"The DEA continues to say that they are not going after patients," said Steph Sherer, executive director of Americans for Safe Access. "But every time they raid a medical cannabis dispensary, hundreds of the most seriously ill lose their access to medicine."

Feds Bust Bay Area Pot-Growing Operation (NBC4)

NBC4.TV, January 18, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Calif. -- Federal agents are breaking up a multi-million dollar drug operation that stretches from the San Francisco Bay Area to the Central Valley.

Drug Enforcement Agency agents found pot and indoor pot-growing equipment in 48 homes in suburbs such as Lathrop and Stockton.

According to court documents, the growers are from the Bay Area.

Agents spent months tracking them from upscale homes in the Central Valley to San Francisco and Oakland.

Agents served several search warrants and arrested eight people in San Francisco's Chinatown and the outer Mission neighborhood on Friday.

Investigators are still trying to figure out who is in charge of the operation, which they say produced $20 million worth of pot every year.

Officials Link Bay Area Raids To Area Marijuana Operation (SACBEE)

By Ryan Lillis, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, January 18, 2007

Authorities raided three Bay Area homes Wednesday that they believe are connected to an alleged large-scale indoor marijuana operation uncovered in the Sacramento region last year.

Agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Elk Grove and Stockton police departments raided homes in San Francisco, Daly City and Union City, said DEA Special Agent Gordon Taylor.

Agents found "documentary evidence" that the homes were connected to 48 homes raided as part of the widespread investigation the past six months, Taylor said.

Tuesday's raids followed a series of busts last week in which search warrants were served at homes in Lathrop, Tracy, San Francisco and Oakland, Taylor said.

Authorities said they made eight arrests during those raids and confiscated weapons, processed marijuana, ecstasy pills and more than $60,000.

"It appears this is a Bay Area crime syndicate that has exported its indoor marijuana operations to Sacramento and San Joaquin counties," Taylor said. "They showed up unannounced, unexpected and uninvited, and today we're turning the tables on them."

Police Charge 4 In Drug Scheme (NASHTEL)

By Andrew Wolfe, Telegraph Staff

Nashua Telegraph, January 18, 2007

CONCORD – Some car buffs like low profile tires, big, flashy rims and walloping sound systems with bone-jarring bass.

Federal prosecutors charge that four men at two Massachusetts auto repair shops catered to yet another type of car customizer: the sort who wants well-hidden, mechanized compartments large enough to hold several kilograms of cocaine or heroin.

Danilo DeLeon, of 192 Garden St., and Jose “Chocha” Rojas, of 29 Bromfield St., both in Lawrence, Mass., are charged along with Felipe Espada of 485 Granite St., Manchester, and Melvin “Flaco” Rosario, ofspiracy case pending in U.S. District Court.

Prosecutors charge that DeLeon and Rojas installed a hidden compartment, or “clavo,” in a Honda Odyssey van for two informants last March at DeLeon Auto Sales in Lawrence.

“Clavo,” which means “nail” in Spanish, is slang for a compartment used to stash drugs, DEA Special Agent Todd Prough wrote in an affidavit describing the investigation.

DeLeon and Rojas are charged with conspiracy to sell drug paraphernalia and aiding and abetting drug distribution, according to federal court records.

DeLeon also introduced the informants to Espada and Rosario, who handled a second custom installation on a Mitsubishi Montero, and also agreed to sell the informants a kilo of cocaine for $23,000, Prough’s affidavit states.

Espada and Rojas face the same charges as DeLeon, but also are charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine.

The four men all were arrested and charged in November, and their case is scheduled for trial March 20 in U.S. District Court before Judge Joseph DiClerico Jr.

An informant first met with DeLeon at DeLeon Auto Sales, 58 E. Haverhill St., Lawrence, on March 21, and arranged for a "clavo" large enough to hold "two kilos" to be installed in the Honda Odyssey, Prough wrote.

DeLeon later towed the van from Salem, N.H., and charged $600 for the job, which was finished April 5. The compartment was hidden beneath plastic molding over the rear bumper, and DeLeon told the informants it would hold up to five kilos, Prough wrote.

On June 15, the informants met with Rojas at DeLeon Auto Sales and asked about getting an electronically operated compartment installed in a Mitsubishi Montero, large enough to hold "15 kilos" of cocaine, heroin "or anything," Prough wrote.

DeLeon towed the Montero to DeLeon Auto, but later arranged for Espada and Rosario to handle the job, Prough wrote. The compartment was to open electronically, with a piston, he wrote, and Rosario and Espada showed the informants a white Jaguar with a similar compartment at another shop, Rodriguez Auto Repair, in Methuen, Mass., Prough wrote.

On Oct. 12, Prough wrote, Espada and Rosario met the two informants in an apartment in Lawrence, where they had brought a kilo of cocaine to sell. All four men were arrested that day.

Espada and Rosario have remained jailed since their arrests, and DiClerico has denied Rosario's requests for bail, court records show. DeLeon was released after posting a $50,000 bond. Rojas was released on bail, but then jailed again after failing drug tests, court records show.

Andrew Wolfe can be reached at 594-6410 or awolfe@nashuatelegraph.com.

$50 Million Drug-money Seizure May Be Biggest Score Ever (CNN)

CNN, January 18, 2007

Colombian police find millions in U.S. currency, euros in three raids

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Colombian national police recovered close to $50 million in U.S. currency as well as other money during three raids in the past week on houses used to stash drug proceeds, a U.S. official told CNN on Wednesday.

It is thought to be the most money ever seized by a law enforcement agency in the world, said the official, who requested anonymity due to the sensitive nature of the investigation.

The raids were conducted following a tip from a source working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the official told CNN. The DEA then provided information to the Colombian National Police.

The first of the raids -- all of which were conducted in the Cali area -- took place Friday, and $13 million and more than €2 million was seized. The cash was in a false cabinet and wall that led to a hidden room. Another cash seizure took place Tuesday, when police recovered $16 million to $18 million.

Separately, another house was searched on Wednesday and a large quantity of gold was found. Officials said a wall had to be destroyed to get to the gold.

DEA agents accompanied Colombian police on the raids, the DEA official said.

The money and gold likely belonged to a member of the Norte Valle Cartel, which dominates the cocaine trade in Colombia, the official told CNN.

IMMIGRATION:

Justices Grease Wheels For Deporting Noncitizen Car Thieves (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court made it easier today for the government to deport thousands of legal immigrants who have been involved in car thefts.

In a 9-0 decision, the justices said noncitizens who have been convicted or plead guilty in California to the theft of a motor vehicle are also guilty of an "aggravated felony" under the immigration laws, even if they simply helped another person carry out the theft.

Under a strict 1996 law, legal immigrants who have an aggravated felony on their records are automatically deported from the United States.

Today's ruling reverses a decision of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which said California's law swept too broadly and could brand some minor participants as serious criminals deserving of deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0118391

Justice Stephen G. Breyer disagreed. California's law on vehicle thefts applies not only to those who steal a car, but also to others who "aid or abet" the thief. "We cannot agree that California's law is somehow special," he wrote.

Government lawyers said the 9th Circuit's ruling, which applied throughout the West, had blocked the deportation of more 8,000 immigrants.

The high court's ruling was not a total victory for the government, however. The justices stopped short of deciding whether mere "joyriding" could be deemed an aggravated felony.

They also left open the question of whether the deportation law should also extend to persons who were "accessories after the fact" to car theft by, for example, traveling in a stolen car. These issues can be decided later, the court said.

While today's decision focused on California's law on motor vehicle thefts, the decision will apply across the nation, since the court said every state has a similar measure on the books.

Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a 32-year old native of Peru and a permanent legal resident, pleaded guilty in 1992 to the theft of a Honda Accord in Marin County. He was sentenced to three years in state prison.

As he neared the end of his prison term, U.S. immigration authorities moved to deport him. The 9th Circuit blocked that move, ruling it was not clear whether Duenas-Alvarez intended to steal the car.

Today's ruling in Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez represented a setback for the immigrant, but not a final defeat.

"The decision expressly leaves open our ability to present additional arguments to the Court of Appeals," said Christopher J. Meade, a New York lawyer who represented Duenas-Alvarez's case to the high court.

Justices Uphold Deporting Alien For Car Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

The Supreme Court yesterday sided with the Bush administration in a case the government says could have a "substantial effect on the administration of immigration laws," ruling that a foreign national and legal U.S. resident convicted for car theft can be deported.

In the near-unanimous opinion, the high court overturned a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which rejected government arguments that under the 1996 Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), aliens can be deported for a category of aggravated felonies called "theft offenses" for which the punishment is at least one year in prison.

The appeals court had vacated an order by a U.S. immigration judge that the 2002 conviction of Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez constituted an aggravated felony and ruled that the Peruvian-born immigrant and legal U.S. resident since 1998 could not be deported.

But the Supreme Court, in an 18-page opinion, said U.S. immigration law provides for removing a foreign-born national convicted of a theft offense, including aiding and abetting, when the term of imprisonment is at least one year.

The high court agreed that a conviction on state charges of car theft rose to the level envisioned by Congress when the INA was passed.

"To find that state law creates a crime outside the generic definition of a listed crime in a federal statute requires a realistic probability, not a theoretical possibility, that the state would apply its statute to conduct falling outside the generic definition," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said in writing the opinion.

Joining Justice Breyer were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Samuel A. Alito Jr. Justice John Paul Stevens sided with his colleagues on three of four issues under debate, but he said the court should withhold comment on the issue of California law until after the appeals court has addressed it.

In 2002, Duenas-Alvarez pleaded guilty to violating the California Vehicle Code, which makes it "illegal to take a vehicle without the owner's consent or to aid or abet in such a taking." He was sentenced to three years in prison.

The Department of Homeland Security sought Duenas-Alvarez's deportation based on the INA. Theft offenses are one type of crime included in the category of aggravated felonies for which the government can deport aliens.

In February 2004, Homeland Security initiated removal proceedings, and a U.S. immigration judge ruled that the California offense of unlawful driving or taking of a vehicle was a theft offense and ordered Duenas-Alvarez removed to Peru. The Board of Immigration Appeals dismissed Duenas-Alvarez's appeal.

The 9th Circuit overturned the deportation order, saying that because the California statute allows for convictions based solely on aiding and abetting, conviction under the statute did not necessarily mean Duenas-Alvarez had committed a theft offense.

But U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, in arguing the case for the government, called the appeals court ruling "incorrect," saying Duenas-Alvarez's case provided the ideal situation with which to clarify federal immigration law.

DOJ_NMG_0118392

In court papers, Mr. Clement said a Supreme Court decision on the matter would directly affect an estimated 8,000 immigrants in the 9th Circuit who have been charged with theft offenses.

He argued that the 9th Circuit ruling was in conflict with decisions of other courts of appeals, and if left unreviewed, "it will have a substantial effect on the administration of immigration laws."

Dems In No Rush To Build Border Fence (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A law to erect hundreds of miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexican border is on the books, and money to start it has been approved. Still, the next step is uncertain.

Republicans worry that now they have lost control of Congress, they never will see the fence built. Democrats in charge today generally oppose the fence.

The law passed last year says Congress does not have to release the money until lawmakers approve how the fence will be built.

Based on the comments of some Democrats, there is no rush.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said he wants the Bush administration to offer a plan for securing the northern and southern borders.

"My preference is to delay the construction of a fence until we have a plan," said Thompson, D-Miss.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said this week Democrats want "the best possible way" to secure the border.

Hoyer voted against the fence last year, as did House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Though the total fencing was believed to be about 700 miles, congressional researchers say it is closer to about 850 miles.

A separate law on Homeland Security Department spending provided $1.2 billion for the fencing. That law also withholds $950 million of the sum until the House and Senate appropriations committees approve the department's plan for spending the money.

Attempts to get comment from the chairmen of the House and Senate appropriations committees were not immediately successful.

Some Republicans have written President Bush asking him to request more money for the fence's construction in his 2008 budget.

In a recent news conference, GOP Reps. Duncan Hunter of California and Steve King of New York said the cost of the fence would be in line with the Congressional Budget Office's estimate: $3 million a mile, for a total of $2.6 billion.

"It's just a fence. It's the kind of fence we build in America every day," Hunter said.

In a Dec. 12 report, the Congressional Research Service said costs could be higher.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers estimated a double-layer fence would cost a little over $1 million a mile, not including buying the land on which it would be built, the research service said. In addition, maintenance could run from $16.4 million to $70 million a mile over 25 years, the Corps said.

The Homeland Security Department has contracted with Boeing for the Secure Border Initiative, consisting of a "virtual fence" of cameras, surveillance technology and new procedures for border agents. The first phase is to be completed in Arizona in June. A recent audit report said that project could cost between $8 billion and $30 billion.

TAX:

Senate Panel OKs Business Tax Breaks (AP)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Tax breaks aimed at easing the burden of a minimum-wage increase on small businesses sailed through the Senate's tax-writing committee Wednesday.

The unanimous voice vote by the Senate Finance Committee paves the way for the full Senate to consider boosting the minimum wage to $7.25 over the next two years. The wage plan is next in line for debate after the Senate wraps up work on an ethics and lobbying overhaul.

But the committee's action drew protests from the House's No. 2 Democrat, who said it would "complicate and delay" passage of the minimum-wage increase. The House passed its version without any tax breaks for the small businesses, which typically employ the greatest number of minimum-wage workers.

DOJ_NMG_0118393

The House also is guarding its right under the Constitution to initiate tax bills and says procedural gridlock might ensue if the Senate goes first.

"Minimum-wage earners have already waited nine years and four months for a raise. Congress should not make them wait any longer," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

The tax provisions would help restaurants, retailers and other businesses that hire welfare and food stamp recipients as well as ex-convicts, the disabled and others who might have difficulty landing a job.

In keeping with promises by Democratic leaders to accompany the tax cuts with balancing revenue increases, the measure would close tax loopholes and curb corporate tax shelters that have passed the Senate in recent years, only to die in the once GOP-dominated House.

The popularity of the wage increase meant easy approval of a narrowly written bill through the Democratic-run House. The bill would raise the wage in three steps, starting with an increase from $5.15 to $5.85 per hour.

In the notoriously balky Senate, however, Democratic leaders have opted to add the $8 billion in tax relief. That would help ease passage by avoiding a fight with business lobbyists and the possibility of a filibuster by minority Republicans.

"A minimum wage hike would likely not pass the Senate without small business tax relief," said Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, the top Republican on the Senate Finance Committee.

The Senate's move probably will delay the minimum wage bill and has generated hard feelings between House and Senate tax writers.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel said the Senate is trampling on his chamber's right under the Constitution to initiate tax bills.

Rangel, D-N.Y., said the Senate must try to pass the bill as a stand-alone measure without the tax provisions.

"We're not going to accept a tax cut of $8 billion on our minimum wage bill," Rangel said. "It's a Senate problem."

House leaders want to avoid long delays in enacting the minimum wage increase. They are sending signals privately that they ultimately will accept some tax provisions rather than risk deadlock.

The Senate measure also would scale back the ability of corporate executives to postpone paying taxes on deferred compensation plans, limiting the amount of deferrable income to $1 million. This would raise $806 million over the next decade.

Rolling back the plans, which are popular with highly paid executives, led to objections from the business lobby.

All told, the Senate measure would provide about $8 billion in tax incentives for small business by extending the ability of small businesses to defray the cost of equipment purchases. It would allow restaurant and store owners — who typically hire many minimum wage workers — accelerated tax benefits on improvements to their facilities.

The measure would extend for five years the work opportunity tax credit. This gives businesses tax relief for hiring people that employers often are reluctant to take on — welfare recipients, ex-felons, the mentally and physically disabled and inner city youths, for example.

Under both the House and Senate bills, the minimum wage would rise to $5.85 an hour 60 days after it signed into law by the president; then to $6.55 an hour a year later; and to $7.25 an hour a year after that.

Minimum-Wage Deal Hinges On Taxes (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some banks, foreign companies and top corporate executives could feel the pinch of tax changes the Senate is considering to fund sweeteners for small businesses as part of a federal minimum-wage boost.

The Senate Finance Committee yesterday approved an $8 billion package of tax breaks over 10 years for small businesses that may be affected by the proposed increase in the minimum wage. The pay raise passed the House and could be taken up in the full Senate as soon as next week. The Senate package extends for another year a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses and allows restaurants quicker recovery of costs for improving their premises. It also extends for five years a tax credit for companies that hire certain disadvantaged groups, such as at-risk youth. The committee added veterans disabled during service on or after Sept. 11, 2001, to the list of hires eligible for the credit.

The Senate move shows the changed dynamic in the new Congress, where Democrats have said fiscal responsibility and helping the middle class will be their focus. Rather than pairing the pay boost for low-income workers with a cut in the estate tax, as was the case last year, the Senate is combining the minimum-wage increase with a narrow package of tax breaks for small firms that is offset with tax restrictions for other companies. The debate is an early test of the ability of Democratic leaders in the Senate and House to bridge differences between the chambers.

To pay for the tax breaks, the panel agreed to further restrict a tax shelter known as a "sale-in, lease-out," or SILO, transaction. The committee also agreed to collect taxes from more companies that have used "corporate inversion" deals to avoid them -- essentially reincorporating in a foreign country to avoid paying U.S. taxes on foreign income. In addition, the panel agreed to greatly limit the earnings that executives and other highly paid workers can put tax-free into deferred compensation plans, among other changes.

DOJ_NMG_0118394

In 2004, Congress cracked down on SILO transactions, but not as rigorously as today. In SILO transactions, a tax-exempt entity such as a city government sells property to an investor and then leases the property back for use. The investor, in turn, can take advantage of tax breaks associated with the property that wouldn't benefit the seller. The Finance Committee's bill would raise an estimated $4.3 billion over five years by restricting the deals no matter when they occurred; current law disallows those that occurred after March 12, 2004. Among the losers if the change becomes law: Banks such as Wachovia Corp. and Bank of America Corp. that have entered into such transactions. Both companies declined to comment on the move.

The finance panel's changes to corporate inversions would affect companies including drilling-service contractors Nabors Industries Ltd. and Noble Corp., that got a reprieve from such restrictions when Congress debated them a few years ago. At that time, House Republicans insisted on a later effective date for corporate-inversion curbs than the Senate wanted. Now, the Senate panel's plan would move back the effective date about a year. Noble declined to comment and Nabors Industries didn't respond to a request for comment.

As for the changes to deferred-compensation packages, critics said the Senate panel's plan would have unintended consequences. As written, the provisions would cause an "upheaval," said Lynn Dudley, vice president for retirement policy at the American Benefits Council, which advocates for large companies that provide employee benefits.

Ms. Dudley said the panel's limits might affect compensation arrangements for middle managers, not just top executives, or could disrupt the common practice of providing two-year severance packages.

In 2004, Congress targeted companies that let executives defer compensation to delay paying taxes and then allowed them to dip into that kitty without limit. It set rules, some still being implemented by the IRS, detailing how and when compensation could be deferred, requiring, for instance, a fixed schedule for paying out the money. The new provision, one of the first tangible responses to concern about executive compensation in the new Congress, would limit that to the lesser of $1 million or the person's average taxable compensation for the prior five years.

Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) said the offset provisions, many of which had been passed by the panel in past years, would rein in corporate abuses in order to help small businesses in states like his.

Mr. Baucus said the tax package would be crucial to passing a minimum-wage increase in the Senate. But the package faces resistance from tax writers in the House, which last week passed a bill boosting the hourly minimum wage to $7.25 from $5.15 without any tax breaks. The Senate's approach has rankled House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.) because it puts him in the position of having the Senate initiate a revenue measure, contrary to Constitutional precedents that require all tax bills to begin in the House.

Mr. Rangel appears to have staked out a bargaining position that Senate Democrats should at least first try to pass the wage increase without the tax breaks. "Why do you need a tax break to do the right thing?" Mr. Rangel asked. "Maybe he (Sen. Baucus) doesn't have a strong feel for the depth of support that this bill has. ... I strongly disagree that this thing would be filibustered." Mr. Baucus said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) would have to work out the differences.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Quarrel Stalls Movement Of Ethics Bill In Senate (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — It is an open secret that many members of Congress from both parties would be relieved to scuttle proposed changes in ethics rules. After all, the changes tend to limit the personal perks and political advantages of their positions.

In the Senate, that wish appeared to come true on Wednesday. A proposed ethics overhaul collapsed when a procedural question turned into a feud between the Democratic and Republican leaders, each accusing the other of failing to address a major theme of the fall elections.

By about 10 p.m., the proposals appeared dead for now after 46 Senate Republicans blocked a vote on a broad ethics and lobbying bill. Fifty Democrats and one Republican, Senator Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, supported going ahead with the vote, but under Senate rules, 65 votes were needed to prevail.

DOJ_NMG_0118395

In an interview after the vote, Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada and majority leader, said, "The Republicans killed ethics reform, period. There is no way to put frosting on this. This is as sour as any piece of legislation."

Mr. Reid said he would give the Republicans another chance to vote for the bill Thursday afternoon, but then would set the measure aside if they did not come around. The 21 Republican senators who will be up for re-election in 2008 "for the next two years are going to have to go home and explain what they did to try to destroy the most significant ethics and lobbying reform since Watergate," Mr. Reid said.

Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, called Mr. Reid's accusations spin. He said the issue was Mr. Reid's refusal to hold a vote on a Republican proposal to include in the ethics bill a version of a presidential line-item veto, a provision that Mr. Reid said was irrelevant to ethics.

Mr. McConnell argued that such a veto power would help eliminate waste or corruption from the pet spending projects known as earmarks, which lawmakers tuck into complicated legislation.

Although Mr. Reid publicly vowed to hold another vote on a presidential line-item veto, Mr. McConnell said the Republicans would block passage of the ethics-and-lobbying rules package unless Mr. Reid allowed a vote on the proposal as an amendment.

"No amount of spin is going to convince anyone that Republicans don't want to pass this bill," Mr. McConnell said in a speech on the floor.

The Senate ethics and lobbying reform bill under debate was introduced by the leaders of both parties and closely resembles a bill passed under Republican control last year. It is considerably weaker than a counterpart bill that the House recently passed. But roll calls on a series of proposed amendments are forcing lawmakers to choose between casting embarrassing no votes or accepting more sweeping changes.

The new House rules, for example, includes a prohibition on House members' accepting gifts, meals or trips paid for by lobbyists; a ban on accepting discounted use of corporate jets; and a requirement of public disclosure of the sponsor, cost and purpose of each earmark.

The original Senate ethics bill included looser restrictions and major loopholes. Mr. Reid, one of the biggest users of discounted corporate jet trips, introduced an amendment to roughly match the House rules on gifts, meals or jet use.

But when a Republican introduced a proposed amendment to match the House requirement on earmarks, Mr. Reid tried unsuccessfully to block it. Then he embraced it with small modifications.

Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi and a former party leader, said he was "amused" by the fracas. "I guess there is a little bit of a manhood thing here where one side is going to show the other," Mr. Lott said.

Still, Mr. Lott, who oversaw the weaker bill that was introduced last year, also acknowledged some impatience with the zeal for new rules.

"It's gotten out of control," Mr. Lott said. "We're involved in a long process of self-flagellation."

Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, agreed. "I think this whole process has gotten out of control," he said. "Only in Washington, when somebody like Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham breaks the law, you suddenly have to change the law."

Line-Item Veto Stalls Ethics Bill (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Republican Senators threatened Wednesday to derail a lobbying and ethics overhaul package if Democrats block consideration of a presidential line-item veto the GOP wants added to the bill.

The blow-up brought consideration of other proposed amendments to a halt Wednesday afternoon and threw into uncertainty the prospects for a measure invested with so much importance that Senate Democrats tagged it S.1.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) tried to avert a showdown by guaranteeing he would provide floor time before the Easter recess for a stand-alone bill granting the president rescission authority, and, if it passed, would send it to conference negotiations with the House. But in a floor debate with Reid, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who offered the amendment, appeared to reject the offer.

"Why not do it now?" he asked.

Senate leaders had hoped to reach an agreement about how to deal with more than a dozen remaining amendments and vote to cut off debate on the bill Wednesday evening. With Republican leaders pledging to filibuster unless the line-item veto was considered, Senators were poised at press time to vote sometime after midnight on the procedural motion ending debate.

Democrats charged Republicans with grasping for a last-minute way to torpedo the ethics legislation.

"If it wasn't this amendment, they had any other number of poison pills designed to kill this bill," a senior Democratic Senate aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0118396

On the floor, Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Republicans had read over the bill's provisions during their weekly policy luncheon Wednesday and gotten "indigestion."

But Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), one of the bill's floor managers, retorted that he had presented the ethics bill at the gathering and "there was no suggestion that we should try to take this bill down with a subterfuge."

At least one powerful Republican on Wednesday voiced discomfort with the scope of the bill. Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) said the reform drive had spun out of control.

"We're in total free fall. We're trying to react to press reports," he said. "I think that a lot of this is hypocritical ... We're making a lot of mistakes in this, in my opinion."

The House last year approved the line-item veto, but it stalled in the Senate, where it was packaged with a number of other budget reforms. Senate Democrats on Wednesday said the proposal raises Constitutional issues and is too complex to deal with quickly.

The standoff over the Gregg amendment marks the second time in as many weeks a partisan blow-up has stalled progress on the Senate ethics bill. Democrats have stressed the importance of bipartisan cooperation on the measure, but last week they tried to kill an amendment from Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) aimed at boosting transparency for earmarks. When that failed, they blocked an attempt to adopt the measure on a voice vote, as is common practice in such circumstances.

Democrats relented the next day, offering an amendment making some technical changes to DeMint's proposal and then getting behind it.

Meanwhile, Senate aides and outside budget hawks were struggling to understand how earmark reform provisions adopted earlier this week will be put into practice.

The measure now requires disclosure of earmarks at two points in the process: once those earmarks are adopted into a bill at the committee level, and again, 48 hours before the bill is brought to the floor. Adding to the confusion, more information is required at the committee stage than right before consideration by the full Senate.

Once a Senate panel decides to add an earmark to a bill, the committee is required to disclose the sponsoring lawmaker, the intended recipient, the earmark's purpose, and include a certification that it will not yield a financial benefit to the sponsor or that lawmaker's family. The bill requires that information be made available online in a searchable format.

But once the bill is poised for floor consideration, only a list of earmarks and their sponsors must accompany the bill in a separate report. A Senate aide said any hiccups between the two disclosure requirements likely would be ironed out as the measures are implemented. A single, searchable online database likely would be developed to handle the new disclosures, he said.

Steve Ellis, from the budget watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, called the new disclosure requirements "a good step forward."

"We're not going to let the perfect be the enemy of the good. There's going to be a lot of information in here for taxpayers to determine whether their tax dollars are being spent wisely," he said.

The flare-up over Gregg's line-item veto amendment capped a day that saw no progress on the ethics bill. Reid has been aiming to wrap work on the bill Friday, but Senators took no votes on amendments Wednesday and debated only portions of the bill.

A proposal by Bennett to strike new disclosure requirements for "Astroturf" lobbying campaigns sparked arguments across the aisle, with several Democrats rising to defend the provision, and Bennett and other Republicans calling it unnecessary and potentially ruinous for small groups looking to make their voices heard on Capitol Hill.

Reform groups are urging Senators to reject the Bennett amendment and approve a slate of addendums, including one from Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.) requiring lobbyists to disclose campaign checks they bundle; two more from Feingold banning lobbyists from sponsoring lavish parties honoring lawmakers at party conventions and expanding the scope of the revolving-door ban; and one from Reid tightening gift and travel bans and requiring lawmakers to pay charter rates for flights on corporate jets.

Emily Pierce contributed to this report.

Grass-roots Groups Qualify As Lobbyists Under Ethics Bill (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

The ethics bill before the Senate not only cracks down on lawmakers, but also subjects politically active ministers and neighborhood groups to the same rules as K Street lobbyists.

Under the legislation, grass-roots organizations that attempt to "influence the general public" to contact members of Congress would have to register as lobbyists and file financial reports -- or face a $200,000 fine. The requirements could apply to a preacher who goes on TV or radio and tells listeners to call their congressman in support of a particular issue, such as a constitutional amendment against homosexual "marriage."

DOJ_NMG_0118397

But late last night, in the session's first display of the muscle that even a minority party has in the upper chamber, the entire ethics bill was jeopardized when Republicans blocked a procedural vote. Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, had refused to allow a vote on an amendment to give the president authority to strip spending "earmarks" from bills.

Republicans retaliated by voting in near-lockstep against a parliamentary motion needed to vote on the entire bill. The motion won a 51-46 majority, far short of the two-thirds majority needed. No action is now scheduled on the bill, though negotiations between the two parties continued into the night.

The vote capped a day of squabbling over the ethics bill, in which the Senate's Democratic leaders clashed repeatedly with Republicans on numerous details, starting with the measure to broaden the scope of lobbyist rules. Democratic backers of the measure say it will expose phony grass-roots organizations, sometimes called "astroturf," that front for monied special interests.

"The problem is these organizations have hired guns paid by undisclosed special interest organizations," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and chairman of the Rules and Administration Committee.

She said the proposal was "bona fide, helpful and overdue."

But issue groups spanning the political spectrum -- from National Right to Life and Focus on the Family to the League of Conservation Voters and the American Civil Liberties Union -- say the expanded definition of lobbyist will imperil citizens' constitutional rights to free speech and to petition the government.

"This bill goes way too far," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. "This gets at the citizen groups who are really the ones making their voices heard about our democracy."

An identical proposal has been introduced in the House.

The first Senate squabble stemmed from an amendment by Sen. Robert F. Bennett, Utah Republican, that would delete the provision on grass-roots lobbying.

"This should be struck from the bill," Mr. Bennett said. "I was taught in civics in high school that [contacting Congress members] was what we were supposed to do."

The grass-roots provision would exempt unions and other organizations that attempt to influence only their members, shareholders and employees. It also would apply only to groups that collect or spend more than $25,000 in three months.

"I gather some groups are upset," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent who supports the bill. "But it is really aimed at attempts to influence Congress by these astroturf groups."

Mr. Lieberman said the $25,000 threshold would protect real grass-roots activists, an assertion that drew criticism from Jay Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice.

"Some of the big churches spend more than that in a week," said Mr. Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative constitutional-law group. "We have a constitution that gives us the free exercise of religion, and part of that is being able to address the moral and religious values of the day."

The late procedural block came over a proposal by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, to give the president the authority, with the approval of Congress, to eliminate individual spending items in broader-scope legislation.

"The new majority party has been very vocal about ... fiscal responsibility and spending restraint," Mr. Gregg said. "Yet it seems to be dragging its feet when it comes time to put those words into action."

Democrats refused to allow a vote, saying the amendment was not relevant to the ethics bill. After the Republican-backed procedural vote, Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said he hoped that "this is going to be just a bump in the road."

McCain Does About-face On Grassroots Reform Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 18, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has told conservative activists that he will vote to strip a key provision on grassroots lobbying from the reform package he previously supported.

The provision would require grassroots organizations to report on their fundraising activities and is strongly opposed by groups such as the National Right to Life Committee, Gun Owners of America, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

While grassroots groups on both sides of the political spectrum oppose the proposal, social conservative leaders such as Dr. James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, who broadcasts a radio program to hundreds of thousands of evangelical Christians, have been its most vehement critics.

McCain sponsored legislation last Congress that included an even broader requirement for grassroots lobbying coalitions to reveal their financial donors. But now he will vote to defeat a similar measure.

DOJ_NMG_0118398

It would be politically dangerous for McCain to support disclosure because it would anger many conservative activists, including those who advocate against abortion rights or for gun ownership rights. He is courting many of them for his 2008 presidential campaign. McCain's presidential exploratory committee announced yesterday that Maxine Sieleman, a socially conservative leader who founded the Iowa chapter of Concerned Women for America, had joined its camp.

In letters circulated on Capitol Hill this week, the National Right to Life Committee and Gun Owners of America warned senators that votes on the grassroots lobbying provision would affect legislative scorecards they tabulate for each lawmaker.

Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) has sponsored the amendment to the lobbying reform package that would strip the provision. His amendment is expected to come to the floor for a vote today, said advocates opposing it.

Bennett said he was "a little" surprised to hear that McCain would support him but was "delighted." McCain is considered one of the most authoritative voices on ethics- and lobbying-related issues in the Senate.

"It's a very high priority," said Douglas Johnson, director of legislative affairs for the National Right to Life Committee. Johnson said ordinary grassroots activists from Arizona who had called McCain's office were told by aides that he would support Bennett's amendment.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, told The Hill that he had received confirmation from McCain's staff yesterday that he would oppose the disclosure proposal.

"It's huge," Sekulow said of the issue's importance. "It's the most significant restriction on grassroots activity in recent history. I'd put it up there with the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act."

McCain was the chief sponsor of the landmark 2002 campaign finance bill, a history that still angers many conservatives. They cite McCain's sponsorship of that legislation as something that makes them wary about supporting his presidential bid. But McCain's recent action could redefine him.

"He'll do everything he can to appeal to conservatives he has already tried to silence," said John Velleco, director of federal affairs at Gun Owners of America, referring to McCain's support of campaign finance reform. "I think he's trying to gain the support of conservatives as much as he can."

"Romney's doing the same thing," Velleco added, explaining that McCain's rival for the nomination, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, is re-evaluating his past positions on gun ownership rights.

While McCain has privately told conservative groups that he will side with them, he was not ready to reveal his position yesterday. He opened yesterday's floor debate with a 15-minute speech on the lobbying reforms under consideration. While he urged his colleagues to support the creation of an office of public integrity, he made no mention of grassroots lobbying.

Immediately afterward he declined to state his position on grassroots disclosure.

"I'll address it when it comes up," he told The Hill.

But McCain's spokeswoman, Eileen McMenamin, confirmed that he would support the Bennett amendment.

"Initially when Sen. McCain introduced legislation last year it had a grassroots provision," she said. "Subsequent to that that he got a lot of feedback from groups that the requirements would be too onerous on them because of the reporting requirements."

McMenamin added that a grassroots lobbying disclosure requirement was not included in reform legislation McCain introduced at the beginning of this month.

Johnson, of the National Right to Life Committee, said that there is confusion about which groups would be affected by the pending regulation.

"Under Section 220, anyone who is paid anything by an organization that spends any money at all to encourage more than 500 members of the general public to communicate with members of Congress, if he or she also has contacted congressional offices directly as few as two times, and has spent as little as 20 percent of his or her time on such direct lobbying and grassroots-motivating activities, would be required to register with Congress as a 'lobbyist' and file detailed quarterly reports," wrote Johnson in a letter to Senate offices, adding, "If enacted, it will disrupt the constitutionally protected activities of thousands of issue-oriented citizen groups from coast to coast. …"

McCain's past allies in battles to reform government strongly support disclosure and were surprised to discover his position had changed.

"We saw him supporting it last year," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist for Public Citizen.

"It surprises me and it will surprise the rest of the reform community. I was really expecting him not to get involved in that provision and I had received no indication from his office that he was leaning against it."

Senate Democrats Fight Proposal To Ban Relatives Lobbying (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118399

WASHINGTON — As the Senate works on sweeping new ethics rules this week, Majority Leader Harry Reid and other leading Democrats are resisting changes that strike close to home.

A proposal by Sen. David Vitter, R-La., that would ban senators' spouses from lobbying the chamber has triggered intense debate with key senators such as Reid and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., promising to oppose it if it affects senators already married to lobbyists.

Reid, D-Nev., would support the ban "as along as it's not retroactive," his spokesman Jim Manley said Wednesday. Feinstein, who oversees the committee that governs Senate rules, also backs a provision that would exempt current senator-lobbyist couples.

"No one has been able to produce a problem," related to the spousal lobbying, she said.

The bill failed to clear a legislative hurdle Wednesday when it did not get the 65 votes needed to advance it. Both Democrats and Republicans said they were negotiating to overcome the impasse.

It's hard to quantify how many members of Congress are related to lobbyists. Some prominent examples include Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and her husband, Bob, the former Senate Republican leader who lobbies on behalf of DP World. Reid's sons and son-in-law have worked as lobbyists.

Vitter said current congressional rules, which permit relatives of senators and House members to work as lobbyists, allow special interests "to write a big check straight into the bank account of a sitting senator."

His plan would exempt spouses who had been lobbyists for at least a year before their husbands or wives were elected to the Senate.

Vitter said that if Democrats move to more broadly exempt current lobbyists and senators from his proposal, it would send a "cynical" message: "Yeah, we're going to get serious about ethics as long as it doesn't affect our friends."

The Vitter proposal is one of two Republican plans targeting lawmakers whose relatives have ties to special interests. Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., wants to ban senators from inserting special projects, known as earmarks, in spending bills that financially benefit senators, their staffers or their relatives including spouses, children, stepchildren and in-laws.

"From an ethical standpoint, there's no way you should ever do an earmark that benefits you financially or someone who is close to you," Coburn said.

The GOP proposals go further than the current ethics package proposed by Senate Democrats, which would require lawmakers to publicly disclose the projects they insert in bills, now often done in secret. Ethics rules adopted by the House this month require lawmakers to disclose their special projects and declare in writing whether they or their spouses have financial stakes in the projects.

Neither House nor Senate Democrats have proposed ending lobbying by relatives.

A USA TODAY investigation in October of the ties between lobbyists and the lawmakers who make spending decisions in Congress found, in 2005 alone, $750 million in special projects pushed by lobbyists with relatives on committees that wrote the bills.

Asked about the prospects for the Republican proposals, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democratic leader, said, "I won't rule out other possibilities, but I will keep my focus on disclosure." He wants every earmark posted on the Internet 48 hours before senators vote on it.

Durbin's wife, Loretta, works as a lobbyist, but concentrates on state issues and is not registered to lobby on the federal level, he said. "She doesn't involve herself in any of the issues before Congress," he said.

Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., the top Republican on the Appropriations Committee, and other senators said they would support Coburn's plan. Manley said Reid is reviewing the proposal to see if whether it strengthens existing Senate rules.

Senate Debates Ethics Of Travel Perks (AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Being good sometimes comes with a cost.

Legislation moving through the Senate would end one of the most beloved benefits of Congress, being able to hitch rides on corporate jets at heavily subsidized rates. Instead, senators would be required to pay far more expensive charter rates for private air travel.

That would apply both to official business, when senators skip airport lines to use private planes for trips to their districts or tour areas in their states, and to political or fundraising trips. The latter would come out of a lawmaker's campaign funds.

The House has gone further, barring its members from using official or campaign funds to pay for noncommercial, corporate jets. Lawmakers trying to reach that remote village, disaster site or campaign stop will have to turn to charter plane services.

DOJ_NMG_0118400

The new travel rules are part of ethics and lobbying changes that Democrats, who campaigned on a promise of ending the "culture of corruption" in Washington, have made their first order of business after taking over control of Congress. The legislation would also bar lobbyists from paying for, or participating in, privately funded trips for lawmakers.

The change, when enacted, will be particularly painful for senators from large western states who depend on private aircraft to get them to areas inaccessible by road or commercial flights.

"I've used these airplanes a lot," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, sponsor of language that would require senators to pay charter rates for private travel rather than the current practice of reimbursing the plane owners with the equivalent of a first-class ticket.

He emphasized that never had a jet owner asked for a legislative favor in exchange for a ride. But in an age when the integrity of Congress is being questioned, "I've come to the realization that this practice presents a major perception problem" and lawmakers must pay the full charter rate, he said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said the travel rules were now a "huge loophole in the current gift rules." The average American, he said, "would love to fly around the country on very comfortable corporate-owned aircraft and only be charged the cost of a first-class ticket. It is a pretty good deal we have got going here."

It's also been a well-used perk. PoliticalMoneyLine, which tracks congressional spending, said nine members of Congress spent more than $50,000 in campaign funds in 2006 to pay for the use of corporate jets. Leading the list was Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., who paid $165,724 to catch rides with corporate giants such as BellSouth Corp. and Federal Express Corp.

But Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, disputed "these images of fat-cat legislators sitting in cushy corporate aircraft."

She said that in Alaska, where 80 percent of towns and villages cannot be accessed by road, lawmakers trying to meet constituents have no choice but to catch rides on turboprops, seaplanes and other small private craft. "My options are so severely limited by this" new rule, she said, "that I don't know how I would operate."

She said she would have to pay some $15,000 for the full cost of a charter flight from Anchorage to the Aleutian Islands. A commercial flight to the Aleutian fishing town of Dutch Harbor, if available, costs $890 roundtrip.

"The taxpayer will foot the bill for the amendment, and the only real change will be more money in the pockets of those who own and operate the private planes," said Alaska's senior senator, Republican Ted Stevens.

If passed, he said, "my budget will run out in the first month or two of the calendar year. It would not permit us to travel to these remote communities throughout the year."

Stevens tried to carve out an exception for cases when there is no more than one daily flight between communities within a member's state and there was no conflict of interest involved. But he withdrew that proposal after Reid gave assurances that the government would pay the extra air travel costs.

The new restrictions also hit a snag in the House when Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., a private pilot, wrote the House ethics committee complaining that the new House rules could be construed as banning private pilots from flying on the job. "This rule has an additional flaw in that it offers no exception for members using their personal funds for flying aircraft they personally own," he said.

John Santore, spokesman for Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, chair of the House Rules Committee, said the intention of the rule was clear, to prevent corporations and lobbyists from buying access to members of Congress and not to keep private pilots out of the cockpit.

In the Senate, Sen. Jim Inhofe, R-Okla., a pilot with a half-century of experience, succeeded in revising the provision to exempt private pilots.

___

The Senate bill is S.1.

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Earmark Victory (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

If Republicans are wondering how best to shorten their time in the minority, they could do worse than to build on this week's Senate earmark victory. That reform success proves how good policy translates into good politics.

The Senate on Tuesday passed significant earmark reform, 98-0. But that unanimous tally masks the bitter battle that preceded the vote. When Republican freshmen Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint first launched an effort last summer to make earmarks more transparent, they struggled. Republicans had to be dragged into even minimal reform, and among their first acts after losing the election was to attempt to slip thousands more earmarks into their lame-duck spending bills.

DOJ_NMG_0118401

Still, minority status has a way of focusing the mind, and combined with continued DeMint-Coburn shaming, Senate Republicans appear to have re-embraced some principles. When Majority Leader Harry Reid last week attempted to water down House Democrats' earmark reform, Messrs. Coburn and DeMint rallied enough fellow Republicans (and a few Democrats) to outmaneuver the spenders. Red-faced at getting caught trying to submarine their own party's plan for reform, Senate Democrats did an about-face and jumped on the earmark-reform bandwagon.

The result was a mini-competition as to which side of the aisle was tougher on earmarks, and a final bill that goes beyond even the House reform. Senator DeMint passed (98-0) an amendment that broadens the definition of an earmark; even those slipped into last-minute conference reports will have to be disclosed. Under the original Senate legislation, 95% of earmarks would have escaped scrutiny.

More amazing was Democrats' new enthusiasm for oversight. Illinois Democrat Dick Durbin -- who started off trying to tank Mr. DeMint's reform -- finished by passing an amendment (also 98-0) that requires lawmakers to post their earmark requests on the Internet 48 hours before a vote. (The House version of the bill simply requires a public disclosure form.) California Democrat Dianne Feinstein also joined in, passing by voice vote a provision that would bar lawmakers from including earmarks in the classified parts of a bill or a conference report unless they also included language in unclassified terms describing the project, funding levels and sponsor. Classified reports were among the ways that former Rep. Duke Cunningham -- now in federal prison -- hid his earmark payoffs.

None of this is to suggest earmarks will disappear in Washington. The real test will be whether lawmakers can restrain themselves from inserting pork-barrel projects. The news isn't encouraging. We hear federal agency telephones have been ringing off the hook, as Congressmen use back-channels to secure earmarks that they'd rather not appear in public.

Still, the reform is a good start. Republicans made headlines with their demands last week, and the news stories were a welcome change for a public appalled by Congress's spend-happy ways. If conservatives had shown this sort of commitment to their small-government ideals back when it mattered, they might still be in the majority.

5 Down, 1 To Go On Dems' House Agenda (AP)

By Kasie Hunt, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Five down, one more on tap as House Democrats sprint through their list of promises, not even in sight of the 100 hours set aside for that goal.

About seven more hours ticked away Wednesday on House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour clock for passing each item on an agenda that Democrats told voters they would enact after sweeping to victory in November.

The final piece was on deck for a vote Thursday: energy legislation that imposes billions in fees, taxes and royalties on oil and gas companies and uses the money to promote renewable fuels.

According to Pelosi's count, it has taken just over 34 hours to pass the first five bills, including a measure approved Wednesday to lower interest rates on some student loans.

The House actually has been in session for more than 72 hours since the 110th Congress was sworn in on Jan. 4. But the clock on Pelosi's Web site suggested that 34 hours, 5 minutes had elapsed by the close of House business Wednesday.

The San Francisco Democrat's clock only tracks hours spent on legislation.

The items passed so far would:

_make the government negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices. It passed last Friday.

_expand federally funded stem cell research. It passed Jan. 11.

_raise the federal minimum wage. It passed Jan. 10.

_seek to bolster terrorism-fighting efforts. It passed Jan. 9.

_change rules governing ethics, lobbying and the budget. These changes were passed on Jan. 4-5.

Democrats' Rift Stalls Legislation (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

House Democrats are proudly trumpeting the conclusion today of their initial spurt of legislative items, but few -- if any -- are likely to become law as passed.

Of the six items they promised to approve in the first "100 hours" of a new Democratic Congress, three have met resistance from the Democratic Senate, at least one appears likely to be vetoed by President Bush and two others have come under heavy criticism from outside groups.

DOJ_NMG_0118402

Yesterday, Senate Democrats attached tax cuts to the bill raising the minimum wage, a condition House Democrats have called unacceptable.

"Republicans were insistent that if the minimum wage were to be increased -- since the bulk of its financial impact falls disproportionately on small businesses -- that we needed to do everything we could to enable small businesses to continue to create jobs, continue to grow, be economically viable so that they could afford to pay this increased minimum wage," Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said yesterday of the tax cuts that were written into the bill in the Finance Committee.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said yesterday he is disappointed by the Senate's action.

"The choice to tie a bill raising the minimum wage to tax breaks for businesses will cost taxpayers $8 billion and complicate and delay the passage of an increase," he said. "Passing a clean minimum-wage bill is a matter of doing what is right and what is fair."

On the promise to "fully implement" all the recommendations of the September 11 commission, Democrats declined to include several provisions -- such as placing all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department. And the House provision that distributes anti-terror funding based on risk so that major cities such as New York and Los Angeles get the bulk of it also likely will be changed by the Senate, where small and rural states have greater sway.

On lobbying reform, Senate Democrats already are working on a decidedly different bill than the one passed by House Democrats, which means the differences still must be hammered out.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, even argued for keeping one provision out of the Senate bill because it mirrored the House lobbying bill.

"This is exactly like the House provision," he said on the Senate floor last week. "That's one of the problems I have. I frankly don't think that they spent the time on this that we have."

Asked yesterday if he is concerned about throwing cold water on the House Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda, Mr. Reid said that for 220 years Congress has been two chambers "and we can't send anything to the president until we both agree on it."

He also applauded the House's efforts, however.

"I think the House has done remarkably good work. I think that they have brought to the attention of the American people some things that had been lacking for the last six years, at least," he said.

The remaining items also have an uncertain future. Mr. Bush is expected to veto legislation approved last week to expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, as he did last year.

The White House has sent similar signals that it disapproves of the bill approved yesterday to reduce interest rates on student loans through taxpayer subsidies. Instead, administration officials say, such legislation should focus on getting more students into college by making it more affordable.

And last week's legislation requiring the federal government to negotiate drug prices has been criticized by veterans groups, disease advocacy groups and even liberal editorial pages such as that of The Washington Post.

Happy Hours (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

SOMETHING odd happened on Capitol Hill this week. Something that seemed to start out as a publicity stunt — the House Democratic leadership's 100-hour agenda — actually turned into a ...qualified success.

The passage of the Democrats' eight-part legislative package — to be completed today — sets the stage for striking possibilities, some advantageous to the party, others threatening.

In the short term, the leadership has achieved two goals:

First, Democrats have shown basic competence and authority after four decades of defeat and division, whether in the majority or minority.

Second, the House has now approved legislation directly addressing public concerns: raising the minimum wage, ethics reform, interest rate reductions on subsidized college loans and expanded federal support for stem cell research. It has put in place rule changes to promote fiscal responsibility and adopted recommendations from the 9/11 commission. Today, the House is expected to repeal tax breaks for oil companies. Poll-tested and guaranteed to be political winners, these achievements constitute a modest start toward a saleable centrist agenda for a party too often in the past labeled as extreme.

More important in terms of substantive future legislation, the ability of the Democrats to win over significant numbers of Republicans on most votes signals the slim but enticing possibility of Democratic mastery over a demoralized Republican Party — one that has thrived on polarized partisan warfare in recent years.

If the new bipartisanship takes root, the prospects for health care legislation and immigration reform sharply improve. These proposals cannot survive without backing from both Democrats and Republicans. When it comes to health care, a key corporate lobby, the Business Roundtable, has already formed a tentative alliance with organized labor, thereby giving cover to wavering members of Congress from both ends of the political spectrum. A parallel alliance among business, Roman Catholic Church leaders and progressive organizations like the National Council of La Raza has already formed in support of immigration legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0118403

Similarly, Republican willingness to cross the aisle strengthens the hand of those who want to build Congressional opposition to the Iraq war. Every Republican who joins the opposition makes it easier for Democrats in red states and districts to become public critics of the war, and for more Republicans to join with them. (Witness the suddenly outspoken Senator Gordon Smith of Oregon.) Without some measure of Republican support, Democrats who challenge the war — particularly those who vote to deny appropriations — run the risk of being portrayed as unpatriotic and unwilling to support American troops in the midst of battle.

The potential for Republican defection is a new thing. Conservatives have long recognized — and worked hard to prevent — the danger of a breakdown in party discipline. In 1993, William Kristol, then chairman of the Project for the Republican Future, orchestrated the defeat of the Clintons' health care plan. In an influential memo, Mr. Kristol wrote: "Any Republican urge to negotiate a 'least bad' compromise with the Democrats, and thereby gain momentary public credit for helping the president 'do something' about health care, should also be resisted. ...The plan should not be amended; it should be erased." Judging from the early days of this Congress, however, Republican solidarity has begun to erode.

On another front, the restoration of Congressional bipartisanship may well have unintended consequences. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois has based his presidential campaign on a dysfunctional political system: "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions," he told supporters this week.

Insofar as Congress regains efficacy, a compelling rationale of the Obama campaign is undermined. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has cast herself as working effectively within the system, can only benefit when the system appears to be functional. A functional Congress also potentially diminishes the taint of Washington tenure for candidates like Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

While there are upsides to the early success of House Democrats, they are by no means home free. Many Republicans see Democrats undermining themselves with the adoption of pay-as-you-go budget rules, which require new expenditures to be accompanied by equivalent spending reductions or tax hikes. At some point, Republicans argue, Democrats will be forced to make unwelcome cuts, raise taxes, or go back on their word. With these rules, argues Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, Democrats have set the stage to once again become the "tax and spend" party.

Mr. Norquist may have a point. A yet-to-be-released post-election poll of 36,000 respondents by the Cooperative Congressional Election Survey showed virtually no public support for a tax increase. Asked to pick alternative ways to reduce the deficit, 49 percent said they would cut domestic spending, 32 percent said they would cut defense spending and only 15 percent said they would raise taxes. For freshman Democrats who won seats in centrist states like Indiana and Kansas, support for a tax increase would probably be political suicide.

Many Democrats acknowledge that the pressure to raise taxes will intensify, especially if expensive health care programs make it onto the agenda. Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, asked about taxes on "Face the Nation," said that any tax increase would be limited to the wealthy. Taking back "tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money — $500,000 a year — might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children," she said. "We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year ... It's an option, it's not a first resort."

The Democratic Party is walking a tightrope. Arguably, the party had the last election handed to it on a plate — war, corruption, pederasty — what more could one ask for? In addition, voter repudiation of the president's strategy in the Middle East does not mean Americans trust Democrats on national security.

There are plenty of other reasons to be skeptical of continued Democratic success. Middle-class anxiety about jobs, retirement and health care are in fact scarcely touched by the 100 hours. Race and ethnic prejudice have not evaporated. And George Bush won't be here to kick around forever.

Still, the first days of this new Democratic-led Congress turned out better than anyone might have expected. Given the party's recent Congressional history, any success is notable — even if it's only 100 hours long.

House Votes To Reduce Rates On Student Loans (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118404

The House overwhelmingly approved a bill yesterday that is designed to cut interest rates on college loans, creating a plan that potentially could save students $2,300 over the course of a loan. But the reduction in rates would be phased in and would not take full effect until 2011, when the legislation would automatically expire unless renewed by Congress.

By a vote of 356 to 71, House Democrats checked off another priority item from their fall campaign as part of a 100-hour march to pass legislative priorities by the close of business this week.

However, even the staunchest supporters of the provision -- which would drop the rate paid on federally subsidized student loans from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent over five years -- acknowledged that the action was only a small piece of what House Democrats hope to do to reduce the cost of higher education.

"This is a down payment," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

The Democrats broke into loud applause when the final gavel came down on the vote, the fifth of their "Six for '06" agenda items to pass since the party took over the chamber earlier this month.

But the bill marks an early instance of conflict between two Democratic campaign promises: The interest-rate-reduction measure runs up against a pledge to install strict spending limits known as pay-as-you-go, or pay-go, creating a budgetary restriction on how far the newly empowered caucus can go in keeping its word.

The plan, which won the backing of 124 Republicans, would cost $6 billion over five years, according to congressional estimates. But the reduction would sunset after five years, cutting in half the benefits for borrowers. According to Democratic estimates, the plan could nearly double the $2,300 in savings for borrowers if the rate were left at 3.4 percent into the future.

But a permanent cut of the interest payments would cost billions of dollars more, and Democrats would have had to come up with savings in their spending plans under the newly installed pay-go rules.

However, Democrats are hopeful that, if enacted, the lower interest rates would prove popular and would be extended before 2011.

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (Calif.), the ranking Republican on the House Education and Labor Committee, called the plan "flawed legislation" and tried to offer an alternative that would limit the reduced interest rates to college graduates who make $65,000 or less, as well as to active-duty military personnel.

However, as has been the case throughout the 100-hour program, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) closed off the minority's ability to offer its alternative, prompting McKeon to complain that the bill's process was "badly flawed."

Republicans said that a college student taking out a loan in the fall of 2011 would save just $7 a month under the plan.

Miller rejected the premise of limiting the reduced rates to borrowers with a $65,000 annual salary, contending that a married couple who serve as public school teachers would probably not qualify and would have to pay the higher rate.

Democrats would pay for the plan by cutting subsidies provided to banks and lenders. Without those subsidies, the lending industry asserts that costs will be passed on to borrowers in the form of higher fees and poorer service.

"They will all have to figure out how to make up for the lost revenues," said Harrison Wadsworth, special counsel to the Consumer Bankers Association. "It costs money to provide good service."

The lending industry is hoping that its allies in the Senate, where the Democratic margin is narrow, would obtain more accommodations to soften the financial blow to lenders. Wadsworth said his association came out against the plan only after Democrats detailed how it would be paid for, calling it "piling on" to cut $6 billion in subsidies.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, supports the reduction in interest rates but plans to consider it as part of a broader package of bills to deal with the soaring costs of higher education. In February, Kennedy's committee is expected to take up a plan that will include the reduced interest rates, as well as increasing the Pell grant from $4,050 to $5,100 and limiting student loan payments to 15 percent of a borrower's annual income.

Miller supports those provisions and hopes to bring them up in his panel later this year, but he added that yesterday's action was important legislatively and symbolically because it was a key plank of last fall's Democratic electoral agenda.

"That's what we said we were going to do. That's what this 100 hours is about," he said.

House Approves Cuts In Cost Of Student Loans (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House of Representatives passed a bill yesterday that would lower interest rates for many student-loan holders.

The rate cuts -- which would be paid for by cutting government payments to banks and other student-loan firms, and raising their fees -- are one of a number of changes House Democrats heralded in last year's campaign and promised to pass within the first 100 hours of the congressional session.

DOJ_NMG_0118405

Democrats, who had talked about halving interest rates on student loans before the election, have narrowed their focus to just a segment of the federal Stafford loan program. Aides say they plan on examining broader college affordability measures later, such as raising the maximum amount needy students can receive from the federal Pell Grant program.

The legislation, approved 356-71, applies only to new, undergraduate borrowers of "subsidized" Stafford loans, which are available to needier students. The cuts would phase in over five years, starting July 1. If the legislation is enacted, a four-year undergraduate who starts to take out subsidized loans next fall would save roughly $1,000 in interest payments on total debt of $10,000 over a 10-year repayment term, according to Mark Kantrowitz, publisher of FinAid.org.

In the subsidized program, the government pays the interest while the student is in school. Less needy students still can qualify for an "unsubsidized" Stafford loan, but they are responsible for the interest that accumulates while they are in school.

The Stafford loan program is the government's biggest student-loan program, with more than six million undergraduates borrowing nearly $37 billion in the 2005-06 academic year. More than half of those received subsidized loans, according to data from the College Board.

Half of subsidized Stafford loan borrowers have family incomes of $26,000 to $68,000, according to congressional staffers. In 2003-04, the median income for families of borrowers was $45,000.

The cuts would cost about $7 billion over six fiscal years, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Representatives of the student-loan industry, which stands to bear the brunt of the cuts' costs, argue the interest-rate cuts could lead them to cut back on customer service, such as 24-hour hot lines, and discounts for on-time payments.

Some higher-education lobbyists already are questioning the Democrats' focus on relieving student debt, when they would prefer to make outright grants to needy students. The annual limit that Pell Grant recipients can receive has been stuck at $4,050 for four years, even as college costs have risen far faster than the rate of inflation. (Democrats say they want to lift that limit to $5,100.)

It is unclear how the proposal will fare in the Senate, and there is always the specter of a presidential veto: The White House released a statement this week saying it opposes the legislation. Instead, it favors increasing grants to low-income students.

Write to Anne Marie Chaker at anne-marie.chaker@wsj.com1

House Cuts Interest Rate For Some College Loans (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — House Democrats on Wednesday pushed through legislation cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized loans to college students, drawing on large bipartisan support despite opposition by the White House.

The bill's easy passage — by 356 to 71, with 124 Republicans joining Democrats to support it — underscored the broad appeal of college affordability as an issue. And it was another step in the Democrats' drive to pass key bills in their early days in control of the House.

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, who sponsored the bill, said it illustrated his party's commitment to strengthening the middle class. "With this vote, the House took the first step towards guaranteeing that every student who is qualified to go to college will be able to afford to go," he said.

Representative Roscoe G. Bartlett, Republican of Maryland, said he could not fathom why his party's leaders opposed the bill.

"I just think that we need more of our kids going to school," Mr. Bartlett said, after casting his vote. "This is one of the better places to invest money, and as long as we're taking people's money, we should put it back where it's needed."

The measure, which will halve the interest rate over the next five years, is estimated to cost $6 billion, which would be financed by increasing fees that lenders pay to the government and by reducing the 30 or so largest lenders' government-guaranteed profits on student loans.

In a statement opposing the bill issued on Wednesday morning, well before the vote, the White House said the measure did nothing to improve access to college, because it only helped ease the burden of repayment for graduates. Instead, the White House called for increased grant aid to lower-income students.

The White House statement also said access to higher education should be improved by containing costs. The responsibility for helping families, the statement said, "must be shared with colleges, which also have a central role in making higher education affordable."

The White House did not threaten a veto, but the size of Wednesday's majority indicated that Democrats would have the strength to override one.

DOJ_NMG_0118406

The afternoon's debate gave little hint of the broad bipartisan support the measure would garner. Republicans derided the bill as a gimmick — "bait and switch," in the words of Representative Tom Price of Georgia, who said it would take full effect only five years from now, and then for only six months, barring further Congressional action.

But ultimately the issue's appeal for many Republicans was too strong. Representative Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, voted for the bill, describing it as "a step towards assisting college students pay for the soaring costs of higher education." Mr. Castle added, however, that the bill "barely skims the surface of the true problem of how we can help increase access and affordability for all students."

The bill comes as tuition increases at public and private institutions routinely outpace inflation, putting college out of reach for many students, and increasing the debt they carry upon graduation. The average student graduates college carrying more than $18,000 in debt.

"No one wants to be on the receiving end of a campaign ad attacking an incumbent for siding with bank lenders over middle-class voters," said Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

According to the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, the bill would save the average student who starts college next year about $2,300 in interest payments over the life of a 15-year loan.

Representative Tom Latham, Republican of Iowa, also voted for the interest cuts. "The savings students will receive is commendable," he said, "and deserves our support."

A similar bill in the Senate, sponsored by Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the education committee, would also reduce the interest rates on student loans, along with making a raft of other changes. His bill would also increase the maximum Pell grant to $5,100.

Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the education committee's ranking Republican, contended that the House measure would only make repayment terms easier for graduates, whose expected lifetime earnings top $1 million.

The bill cuts the interest rate on subsidized Stafford loans to 3.4 percent from the current rate of 6.8 percent in stages over five years, beginning with loans taken after July 1. To make the bill affordable, the full benefit of the loan's promise of 3.4 percent interest rates applies only to loans made after July 1, 2012, and expires by the end of that year. The subsidized Stafford loans are also open to middle income families.

The student loan industry lobbied against the bill, but appeared resigned to its passage in the House. The Consumer Bankers Association said some lawmakers saw the student lending program as "a bottomless pit of budget savings that can be drawn on repeatedly to fund changes to student aid programs."

House Passes Student-loan Interest Bill (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — With fanfare and substantial bipartisan support, the House delivered Wednesday on the fifth of six bills that Democrats had vowed to quickly pass, voting overwhelmingly to cut the interest rate on some college student loans.

The bill, however, was much scaled back from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's campaign promise to cut all student loans in half.

Instead, the House measure, passed 356 to 71, applies to the 5.5 million subsidized Stafford loans given each year to students whose families earn $26,000 to $68,000 annually, but would not increase Pell Grants or student tax credits, as originally considered. The bill also sets a five-year phase-in of the interest rate reduction from 6.8% to 3.4%, but then, after six months at 3.4%, returns the rate to the original percentage.

House Democrats called it a "first step" on delivering some relief to students and their parents as college costs have skyrocketed 41% in public universities and 17% in private ones, and as college debt has doubled between 1993 and 2004, according to the independent U.S. Public Interest Research Group.

"This is only the beginning," said Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. "This is a down payment."

The bill faces an uncertain future. In the Senate, education panel Chairman Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) is considering a broader bill that would increase grants and tax credits as well.

And the Bush administration questioned the wisdom of encouraging more loans rather than grants. "Student debt loads have soared in recent years, and it is not clear that encouraging more loans is a wise course. Instead, the administration would support efforts to direct savings to additional grant support for low-income students," said a statement issued by the Office of Management and Budget.

DOJ_NMG_0118407

House Democrats, eager to keep their pledge to voters to pass long-stalled measures in their first 100 legislative hours, have sailed through four other bills: implementation of the Sept. 11 commission recommendations, an increase in the federal minimum wage, support for embryonic stem cell research and a plan to lower Medicare's prescription drug prices.

Today, the House is expected to finish its juggernaut with a bill that would raise $14 billion over 10 years by rolling back tax credits and other breaks for oil companies.

"Last year, we said we were going to take America in a new direction," Miller said at a news conference with education leaders and students before the debate. "By voting to cut student loan interest rates in half, we are showing we meant it."

But the student loan bill required some deft maneuvering. Miller laid aside the original plan, which would have cost an estimated $45 billion, in favor of the slimmed-down and phased-in approach, whose $5.8-billion cost would be offset by cutting payments to lenders and guarantee agents.

Miller pledged that later in this congressional session, Democrats would find ways to increase Pell Grants, to make tax credits easier to understand, and to press colleges and universities to "do their part" in holding down costs.

Critics said the measure was the first casualty of the Democrats' "pay-as-you-go" rule, which requires House members to find ways to offset spending increases.

"This is nothing but a sham," said Rep. Virginia Foxx (R-N.C.), a former college administrator who said she took seven years to work her way through college. "They're not keeping their promises. All they are doing is inviting colleges to increase tuition and fees. It's very cynical."

Democrats said their party's House leaders had shown more fiscal responsibility than their predecessors. "Unlike the huge tax breaks for the energy industry at a time when they receive the most profit in their history, this bill doesn't add to the deficit," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews (D-N.J.). "This bill is paid for."

Almost everyone who spoke during the three hours of debate agreed that skyrocketing college costs risked burdening a generation of students and their parents with debt, and that universities needed to do more to hold down costs.

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (R-Santa Clarita), who managed the bill for Republicans, cited extravagant spending by colleges and universities, such as the University of Houston, to put hot tubs and other amenities in student centers.

The floor debate seemed, by Washington standards, civil, even amusing. At one point, McKeon offered three minutes to a colleague to speak on the bill and then turned to introduce him, saying, "My good friend from … Where is my good friend from?" (His good friend is from Mississippi.)

But the partisan divide showed itself clearly across the aisle. Democrats charged that Republicans during their 12 years in power had "raided" student loans for $12 billion. Republicans replied that they cut lending fees and put some of the $12 billion in savings into Pell Grants.

Republicans alleged that Democrats were rushing to the floor — without benefit of vetting by committees — a bill that would give them a "Pyrrhic victory" during the 110th Congress' first 100 hours, but do little to lower college costs. Democrats replied that they hoped to extend the lower loan rate beyond the five-year window in subsequent legislation.

Democrats chided the GOP for funding the Iraq war instead of investing in education. "It's a shame, a disgrace that this country is willing to spend billions to fight a war in Iraq we know is a mistake while the doors of our colleges are closed to too many of our young people," said Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.).

Lenders bemoaned the Democrats' tactic of paying for the bill by passing the increased costs to them. "A strategy of raiding a financial aid program to fund modest proposals is inadequate to the challenge; it is neither a bold nor bipartisan solution to making college affordable for every American," said Kevin Bruns, executive director of America's Student Loan Providers.

But education advocates were jubilant. "Twelve months ago, Congress was putting the finishing touches on a $12-billion cut to student loan programs," said Luke Swarthout, the Public Interest Research Group's higher-education lobbyist. "Now we're talking about real policy to make college more affordable for millions of students. This is the right conversation to be having."

*

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

House Dems Target Special Breaks For Big Oil Thursday (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — After taking on the restaurant, drug and banking industries, House Democrats top off their first 100 hours of majority status Thursday with a swipe at Big Oil.

Their legislation would roll back tax breaks and rewrite drilling leases given to oil and gas companies during the last 12 years of Republican rule. Less clear is where the estimated $14 billion over 10 years would go; the bill creates a fund for alternative forms of energy but leaves out specifics.

DOJ_NMG_0118408

"This is not the solution to the problem of global warming or the price of gasoline," says Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash.

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., says it's an effort to show that "mature industries do not need government handouts."

The Senate will take longer to pass legislation. Democrats in both houses say they want to go further toward eliminating subsidies and investing in alternative fuels. A memo sent by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., to Democratic senators Wednesday says the United States should "lead the world in combating global warming and enact a mandatory program to reduce greenhouse gas emissions."

President Bush has called for reducing the nation's dependence on foreign oil in each of his six State of the Union addresses and is expected to do so again next week. A policy statement issued by the White House on Wednesday said the administration opposes the major provisions of the House bill, which could require that new fees be imposed on oil and gas companies. It also criticized Democrats' "tax and spend" use of the revenue to promote alternative forms of energy.

Ever since gas topped $3 a gallon this summer and ExxonMobil reported record quarterly profits in October, attacking oil companies has had populist appeal — particularly for Democrats, who receive far less in campaign contributions from the oil and gas industry. The industry helped Bush and Vice President Cheney, both former oil men, win election in 2000 and 2004, and gave five times more to Republican candidates in 2006.

But with oil imports continuing to rise, the industry's influence has been weakened. Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., lead sponsor of the House bill, said today's vote will be bipartisan.

"We will transition to alternative energy. Geology will ensure it," Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, R-Md., a co-sponsor, said Wednesday.

House Democrats' energy bill follows passage of three other measures opposed by business groups. Restaurateurs and other small businesses criticized a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage. Pharmaceutical companies lobbied against requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices. And banks opposed Wednesday's vote to cut interest rates on some student loans.

The energy bill sets up a fund for renewable fuels but doesn't choose winners and losers among solar, wind, hydrogen and other types of energy. That leads some analysts to predict political hijinks. "When you get a pot of money in this town, you've got to be very careful with it," says John Felmy, chief economist for the American Petroleum Institute, which says the measure could raise consumers' prices or reduce investors' earnings.

Others with ties to the oil industry say the Democrats' agenda is flawed. "Our energy sector is going to become dumbed down," says Tom Tanton, vice president of the Houston-based Institute for Energy Research. "We're increasingly rewarding the failing technologies."

Democrats plan to go much further toward rewriting U.S. energy policy in this Congress, with initiatives to increase automobile fuel efficiency and new technologies, cut carbon dioxide and greenhouse gas emissions, fully fund low-income energy assistance programs and eliminate other tax subsidies.

"I see this as opening the door widely so that we'll be able to advance other, more comprehensive pieces of energy legislation," says Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y.

Democrats Say House Energy Bill Will Pass (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — House Democrats, brushing aside objections from the Bush administration, said on Wednesday that they had ample votes to pass a bill on Thursday that would eliminate $14 billion in subsidies and tax breaks for oil companies and channel the money to renewable-energy projects.

In a sign of how political sentiment on energy issues has shifted, lawmakers in both parties expect the bill to draw considerable support from Republicans, many of whom voted in favor of the tax breaks three years ago.

On Wednesday, the White House said it “strongly opposes” several provisions in the bill but only hinted at a possible veto if the bill increased overall government spending in 2007 above limits that Mr. Bush set last year.

Few lawmakers expect Mr. Bush to resort to a veto, if only because the energy bill would lead to a tiny increase in revenue in its first year.

Much of the criticism involves two provisions, one that would repeal a major tax break for oil and gas drillers and a second that would pressure oil companies to renegotiate certain offshore leases. The leases allow them to avoid billions of dollars in royalties on oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters in the Gulf of Mexico.

In a statement of the administration’s position, the White House said the bill would unfairly single out the oil industry by making it ineligible for a tax break offered to “domestic manufacturers.” The tax break was created in 2004, mainly to compensate manufacturing companies that had been forced to give up a separate tax break for exporters. Oil companies had never qualified for the export tax break, but were included in the definition of "domestic manufacturing."

DOJ_NMG_0118409

The administration also reiterated its opposition to a provision that would pressure oil companies to renegotiate the offshore drilling leases.

The bill, which would also repeal several smaller royalty incentives that Congress passed in 2005, would raise about $6.3 billion over 10 years in additional royalties from oil and gas companies. The provisions that repeal several tax breaks would raise about $7.6 billion over the same period.

In its statement, the administration said it agreed that drilling companies had no need for federal incentives. But it opposed what it said was an effort to force companies into renegotiating contracts that the government had signed.

The measure would pressure companies to renegotiate leases they signed with the federal government in 1998 and 1999, when the Interior Department inadvertently allowed them lucrative royalty incentives regardless of how high oil and gas prices might climb.

The measure would punish companies that refuse to accept "price thresholds" — clauses that were included in leases for other years that eliminated the royalty incentives if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Companies that refuse to change their leases would be required to either pay a "conservation fee" of $9 for each barrel of oil they produce on the leases or give up their right to acquire any additional leases.

The oil industry has criticized the proposals, saying they signed the leases in good faith and should not be forced to change them because the government made a mistake.

The Bush administration has echoed those concerns, saying that the leasing errors occurred during the Clinton administration and that it is trying to persuade companies to make voluntary changes. So far, five companies that own about 20 percent of the leases have agreed to alterations. But many of the biggest players in the gulf, including Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have refused.

Senate Democrats are expected to support the royalty provisions of the House bill. On Wednesday, Senate Democrats on the Joint Economic Committee argued that the government spends billions of dollars on royalty incentives for offshore drillers yet gets little in the way of increased production.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, said he would seek the elimination of all royalty incentive programs.

US House Takes On Big Oil (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

A Bill To Be Voted On Thursday Would Cut Federal Benefits By A Third And Give Them To Renewable-energy Programs.

The House of Representatives is poised Thursday to play Robin Hood with energy policy.

It aims to cut $14 billion in federal oil and gas tax breaks and other benefits over the next 10 years and give them instead to renewable-energy programs.

Such a change would represent a noticeable trim in government support for the oil and gas industry at a time when it is trying to boost domestic production. It would provide a huge boost to renewable energy industries as they try to replace fossil fuels with cleaner energy that's also domestically produced.

Nevertheless, the proposed cuts go only so far. Even if the House's new clean-energy legislation becomes law, the oil and gas industry will remain by far the largest recipient of federal energy largesse, receiving by some estimates four times the money of the next largest recipient: the nuclear industry.

That prospect has many renewable-energy advocates and budget hawks pushing for more cuts even as conventional-energy experts warn of the fallout from the current round of proposed rollbacks.

"What the Democrats have cut is a big number," says Steve Ellis, a spokesman for Taxpayers for Common Sense, a Washington watchdog group. But "if you look at the whole universe of federal oil and gas breaks, it's a much larger number than this legislation cuts."

"If Congress imposes these additional costs on the companies, it just makes them more likely to look overseas," responds Mark Kibbe, senior tax-policy analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, a lobbying arm of the oil industry in Washington. "If you make these changes, you decrease US production, US jobs, and increase US reliance on imported oil."

Congress envisions slashing $14 billion – an average of $1.4 billion a year – over the next 10 years. This includes cutting $7.7 billion in tax incentives and toughening royalty-payment rules to bring in $6.3 billion that otherwise would flow to oil and gas companies.

DOJ_NMG_0118410

The proposed cuts, when adjusted for inflation, would total per year roughly a third of the $3.6 billion in tax incentives the oil and gas industry got in 2005, the Government Accountability Office reported in September.

Left untouched would be one of the industry's most important federal tax breaks – the oil and gas percentage depletion allowance, created in 1916. Between 2006 and 2010 that break will cost taxpayers nearly $1 billion a year by allowing smaller, independent oil companies to deduct 15 percent of sales revenue to reflect the declining value of their investment, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation (JCT), which reports to Congress on the costs of federal tax legislation.

Another surviving tax break permits big oil companies to immediately deduct 70 percent of their "intangible drilling costs," such as the cost of wages, supplies, and site preparation. Smaller companies are permitted to deduct all of those costs. That break will be worth a little over $1 billion a year through 2010, the JCT found.

Industry officials deem such breaks as critical to US domestic oil production that they say would otherwise dwindle, since it costs far more to produce oil domestically than import it.

That claim is overblown, some analysts say. Even if such subsidies were triple their current level, they would have practically no effect on reducing oil prices and boost domestic production by only 0.2 percent, writes Gilbert Metcalf, a Tufts University economist in a recent study.

The industry receives federal largesse beyond tax breaks and relief from royalty payments. Add in research and development subsidies and accounting breaks and the total looks more like $6 billion a year for the next five years, according to a Friends of the Earth tally of JCT data.

Other economists say the industry's federal subsidies are far higher. They average about $39 billion annually if items such as defense of oil lanes in the Persian Gulf, guarding domestic infrastructure like the Alaska Pipeline, and paying to maintain the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve are also included, says Doug Koplow, founder of Earth Track, a Boston consulting firm that analyzes natural-resource subsidies.

"There probably is a public interest in government involvement in maintaining security of supply and reducing price, but those costs should be borne by oil markets and not by taxpayers," he argues.

The strategic reserve, for instance, stores about a two-month supply of oil for the nation in salt domes in Louisiana and Texas. Maintaining it costs the nation an average $2 billion or so a year, Mr. Koplow says. Guarding Middle East oil lanes averages about $19 billion a year, he found, which doesn't include the recent surge in spending because of the Iraq war.

If Congress were to cut $1.4 billion a year in subsidies, as House Democrats urge, the industry would still get more than $37 billion a year from government coffers, according to this analysis, four times the amount spent on the nuclear industry and six times the amount spent on ethanol.

Others dispute such analyses.

"It just depends on how you want to define a subsidy," says Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "A lot of these oil companies pay more in taxes to the government than they pay to stockholders. The argument they're being given preferential tax treatment is a myth."

Mr. Kibbe, the oil industry official, says Koplow's analysis raises the question of "where you draw a line. Does that mean every mile of road we put in is a benefit to the car companies?"

Of course, renewable-energy industries also get government help, with ethanol receiving half the subsidies, Koplow estimates. Roughly half of that largesse comes in the form of a tax credit worth 51 cents per gallon to ethanol producers. Overall, ethanol subsidies in 2006 were about $6 billion a year using Koplow's broader definition, which includes federal tariffs, renewable fuel standards, and other factors.

Here, too, energy subsidies distort markets and are a negative for taxpayers and the economy, he argues.

"Right now Congress is giving billions to ethanol, biodiesel, and the nuclear industry," Koplow says. "There may end up being a positive impact on climate change from these. But it may not be the quickest, or the cheapest, way to deal with the problem."

Leading Democrats in the House want to use the $14 billion from the oil and gas industry to create a strategic energy-efficiency and renewables reserve to accelerate the use of renewable energy. They also want to promote the use of energy-efficient products and boost research and development for renewable fuels.

"What the Democrats are doing is a great down payment, shifting these oil and gas giveaways over to renewable energy and conservation," says Erich Pica, domestic program director for Friends of the Earth. "But there's still more to be done."

U.S. Will Re-negotiate Free Trade Deals (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger, Ap Economics Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118411

The Bush administration, facing a Democratic Congress, said Wednesday it would seek a "substantive adjustment" to the labor provisions in free trade agreements already negotiated with Peru, Colombia and Panama.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau told reporters that the three countries had been notified. He predicted that an agreement on revised language could be reached without a lengthy delay.

Other U.S. trade officials said the new talks do not mean that other sections of the agreements will be renegotiated or that the deals will have to be signed again. The revisions could take the form of side letters to the main agreement.

The agreements with Peru and Colombia have been signed while the agreement with Panama, reached in December, is being reviewed by government attorneys from both countries to make sure the language is correct.

USTR spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel said in a statement that the administration believed that the necessary adjustments to the labor provisions "can be made through some binding instrument and it is not necessary to reopen the text of the agreement."

The announcement that the administration wants changes in the labor provisions was the strongest signal to date that President Bush is prepared to modify his trade policies in light of last November's election in which Democrats gained control of the House and Senate.

"We are open to a dialogue," Veroneau said. He said the governments of the three nations "understand we need to make changes to achieve" the goal of getting the deals approved by Congress.

"We have informed Peru, Colombia and Panama that we ... need to make some substantive adjustment" in the area of labor provisions, Veroneau said.

Democrats, backed by U.S. labor unions, have long complained that the free trade deals being negotiated by the administration did not include enough protections for American workers. They said that because of this, the U.S. workers' jobs would be jeopardized by competition from low-wage countries with lax labor laws.

However, Republicans and their business supporters have fought inclusion of tougher language on labor rights, arguing that such provisions could be used to block increased trade rather than lowering trade barriers.

Business groups are also concerned that including tougher language on the right of workers to form unions could give organized labor in the United States leverage to challenge in American courts the restrictions they currently face on organizing.

"Republicans in Congress are worried that new language in the trade agreements could give unions a footing to challenge U.S. labor laws and they don't want that," said Gary Hufbauer, a trade economist at the Peterson Institute for International Economics, a Washington think tank.

Thea Lee, policy director for the AFL-CIO, said her group would not see side letters as an adequate way to fix what labor leaders see as inadequate protections for American workers.

"Will they really renegotiate the agreements or will they just go down and get some cosmetic side letters?" Lee asked.

She said unions see as a good standard the labor and environmental provisions that were included in the free trade agreement the Clinton administration negotiated with Jordan which won congressional approval after Bush took office in 2001.

The deals with Peru, Colombia and Panama are the latest free trade agreements negotiated by the Bush administration, which has pushed these deals as a way to support both economic and foreign policy objectives.

Veroneau said he still expected the agreements will win approval before the president's authority to negotiate agreements under expedited procedures expires July 1.

He made his comments at a briefing with reporters about his trip week to discuss trade issues in Chile, Uruguay and Argentina.

Free-trade Pacts Face Labor Issues (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration is evaluating how to respond to Democrats' concerns over labor issues in pending free-trade agreements with Peru, Colombia and Panama, an official in the U.S. Trade Representative's Office said yesterday.

The administration wants the three agreements to be approved before the president's trade promotion authority, which allows Congress to only vote on trade pacts without amendments, expires July 1.

Democrats have long pushed for tougher labor standards in free-trade agreements, saying that deals negotiated by the Bush administration do not include enough protections for workers in those countries or American workers.

According to the official in the U.S. Trade Representative's Office, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, the administration is responding to concerns by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel of New York and other Democrats about pay and other labor conditions in the three countries.

DOJ_NMG_0118412

The official stressed that the free-trade agreements themselves will not be renegotiated, but that the administration is trying to work out how to address those concerns outside of the formal pacts.

The agreements with Peru and Colombia have been signed, while the pact with Panama, reached in December, is being reviewed by attorneys from both countries to make sure the language is correct.

The official spoke after Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau told reporters that the administration is "open to dialogue" with Congress on the issue.

"It is clear that some adjustments to that chapter will be made before Congress takes those up," he said.

USTR spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel issued a clarification in the afternoon saying that in the case of signed agreements that have not been approved by Congress, such as the three pacts, "We believe these adjustments can be made through some binding instrument and it is not necessary to reopen the text of the agreement."

Another official said: "How those adjustments will be made is not clear, but we will not be reopening the text of the agreements."

AFL-CIO policy director Thea Lee said it seemed like the administration was trying to come up with "some kind of a cosmetic side letter that they can wave around" and gain Democratic votes.

Seoul Helps All North Korean Defectors (WSJ)

http://online.wsj.com/page/2_0048.html, January 17, 2007

In response to the article "Defections Tweak Seoul" ("Leading the News," Jan. 9), Evan Ramstad made a number of incorrect assertions about the South Korean government's handling of Mr. Choi Wook-Il, a South Korean citizen who recently escaped 31 years of captivity in North Korea. The article claims the South Korean consulate in Shenyang refused to assist Mr. Choi, until public pressure forced officials to provide refuge for the 67-year-old. I would like to correct your accounting of the events.

First, it is not true that the South Korean consulate general in Shenyang started working to secure Mr. Choi's protection only after the Korean public expressed outrage at the government. In fact, ever since it became aware of his defection from the North, the South Korean government has consistently exerted its utmost diplomatic efforts for Mr. Choi's speedy repatriation home.

Second, it is a completely unfounded allegation that the South Korean government is walking a tightrope with North Korea and the United States, and consequently showing a passive attitude in supporting South Koreans kidnapped by the North. The South Korean government has dealt with the North Korean refugee problem in the spirit of brotherhood and from a humanitarian basis -- and has accepted all North Korean refugees in foreign countries in all cases, if they wish to come to South Korea. The South Korean government has also cooperated closely with related international organizations such as the the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the governments of countries in which North Korean defectors are likely to stay, in a bid to prevent the possibility of such defectors being sent back to North Korea against their will.

Third, it is not true that the South Korean government has reduced the resettlement subsidy for North Korean defectors. There has only been a change in the way the subsidy is provided. Originally, the South Korean government provided a portion of the subsidy in a lump sum, to resettle North Korean defectors. However, these defectors experienced many difficulties in spending the government subsidy effectively, often stemming from their unfamiliarity with a market-based economic system. As a result, while maintaining the overall size of the resettlement subsidy, the South Korean government decided to reduce the initial cash support and provide, instead, other supporting services to the defectors, such as expanded job training, educational opportunities and increased workplace salaries.

Kim Heung-soo
Director, Press Relations
Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade
Seoul, South Korea

Defense Official Says Pentagon Hid Unspent Funds In Accounts (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has hidden at least $1.4 billion in other agencies' accounts instead of returning unspent money to the U.S. Treasury, the Defense Department's internal watchdog told Congress Wednesday.

Thomas Gimble, the Pentagon's acting inspector general, said Pentagon offices between 2002 and 2005 used the General Services Administration (GSA) and the Interior Department "to 'park' or 'bank' funds that were expiring."

GSA and Interior then spent the money on Pentagon contracts, circumventing the law, Gimble said.

DOJ_NMG_0118413

Pentagon officials did this because they either wanted to hire a particular company, spend money before it had to be returned or could not respond quickly enough to Defense Department customers, Gimble said.

In written responses to Gimble and other federal investigators, Pentagon and Interior officials have acknowledged problems with their contracting processes and said they are working to fix them. GSA officials have returned $600 million in unused funds to the Defense Department.

When his office started its work, Gimble said, the Pentagon had "unclear" policies about how to use such accounts. The Pentagon's chief financial officer issued new, clearer policies in October, he said.

Gimble told a Senate Armed Services panel that a $100 million office space contract for the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) was more evidence of a pattern of poor oversight of military contracts.

Often, he said, Pentagon contracting officers award billions of dollars in deals without proper planning, documentation or oversight.

The 10-year, $100 million CIFA lease was "one of the potentially most serious problems" his investigators found with contracts made through an Interior Department office, Gimble said. That arrangement of using Interior, he said, is supposed to save time and money but often results in expensive and possibly illegal deals.

Such contracts also make "end runs" around Congress and higher-level agency officials and hide how the Pentagon spends its money, Gimble said.

The Pentagon needs to clean up its act, senators said.

"If there's not accountability when something like that happens, we might as well throw in the towel," said freshman Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo.

At CIFA's request, Interior hired a company called TKC Communications to provide office space. The agency oversees efforts to track and block terrorism and espionage threats against U.S. military bases and personnel.

The deal was written as one for office space management, but the payments went to lease and renovate that space, investigators found. That arrangement was probably illegal and evaded required Pentagon and congressional oversight, Gimble and a separate Interior report found.

Federal contracting records show Interior has paid TKC more than $66 million since 2003, including more than $11 million after auditors criticized the deal.

Interior officials have defended the contract, saying it was legal and approved by Interior and Justice Department lawyers

Brooke Smith, TKC's chief operating officer, said in an interview that no one from the Pentagon questioned the contract and that CIFA liked the arrangement.

Senate Taking Up FEC Picks (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Senate Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said Wednesday that the Federal Election Commission's four reappointed commissioners will appear before her committee this year, a rare move that could reignite controversy avoided last Congress though presidential recess appointments.

"They are subject to confirmation," Feinstein said. "We will hold hearings."

The commissioners' appearance before the committee could create a debate not seen in more than a half-decade when former Republican Commissioner Bradley Smith went through the Rules panel confirmation process in 2000.

Smith's confirmation hearings set off a Senate firestorm among Democrats, prompting threats by then-Rules Chairman Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) that he would block the re-nomination of then-Commissioner Danny Lee McDonald, a Democratic pick.

Of the FEC's current six-member panel, Republican nominee Hans von Spakovsky and Democratic nominees Steven Walther and Chairman Robert Lenhard must be confirmed by the Senate by year's end in order to maintain their positions. The agency's Republican-nominated Vice Chairman David Mason also must go through the confirmation process. But because he is the lone term-limit exempted commissioner, he may continue after his appointment expires when Congress adjourns sine die this year.

Despite having just one FEC commissioner who will have to go through the full committee process, Republicans may be put on the hot seat defending the past writings of von Spakovsky. Last year, von Spakovsky found himself in the crosshairs of Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). The Washington Post reported that the former civil rights division lawyer at the Justice Department "played a central role in approving" a highly controversial voter identification program in Georgia, von Spakovsky's home state. According to the Post, von Spakovsky also wrote an anonymous law journal article in favor of the policy before the state's proposal was submitted to Justice for review.

DOJ_NMG_0118414

"I'm extremely troubled by reports that Hans von Spakovsky ... may be nominated and recess appointed to the Federal Election Commission," Kennedy wrote in a publicized December 2005 letter to then-Senate Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and former ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.). "There are serious questions about whether Mr. von Spakovsky is committed to upholding voting rights for all Americans."

For Democrats, Lenhard, a former union lawyer who has signed legal briefs arguing against portions of the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, often is named as the commissioner whose background could draw the most Senate scrutiny, especially from campaign finance reform-minded lawmakers such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the BCRA author who harshly criticized President Bush's use of recess appointments to fill FEC slots last year.

"I am troubled to learn that the president has decided to use recess appointments to fill the vacancies at the Federal Election Commission (FEC)," McCain said. "Individuals chosen to fill the FEC vacancies at this crucial time should go through the regular confirmation process so the Senate can be assured that they are qualified for the position and committed to carrying out the FEC's important mission to faithfully interpret and enforce the law."

S.M.U. Chief Says Bush Library Would Be A Boon For The Campus (NYT)

By Gretel C. Kovach

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

DALLAS, Jan. 17 — The president of Southern Methodist University told professors on Wednesday evening that the university would benefit if it became the site of President Bush's presidential library.

The university president, R. Gerald Turner, spoke at the spring faculty meeting and addressed questions posed by professors after Southern Methodist learned on Dec. 21 that it had emerged as the sole finalist for the library.

Many professors, including some who want the library on campus, are concerned about the relationship between a proposed Bush policy institute and the library and the effects the institute might have on the university's academic independence.

But Dr. Turner said the library and the institute would raise the national profile of the private university, spur economic development in the community and, most importantly, enhance academic resources and professional interaction.

"This presidential library will obviously contain a treasure trove of documents and artifacts that describe one of the most intense and controversial periods in our history," he said. "Any real or perceived fears about the institute or the library in any way inhibiting this institution's history of academic freedom are unfounded."

What's more, Southern Methodist stands to lose prestige and donor support if it were to fail in its bid for the library at this stage, he added. "It would raise questions of donor confidence in our ability to compete for this tremendous asset," he said.

Both the interim provost and the president of the Faculty Senate cautioned "outsiders" not to mistake vigorous academic debate for widespread opposition. But several faculty members said Wednesday that they believed there was deep opposition to the plan on the faculty, particularly to the Bush institute.

A history professor, Kathleen Wellman, said she did not want the institute on campus. "I think it will generate what I consider to be political propaganda and overshadow much of the other work done at S.M.U.," she said.

An art history professor, Janis Bergman-Carton, said, "I am afraid we are mortgaging our reputation and our students, actually and symbolically, to an administration that 70 percent of this country thinks is incompetent and unethical."

Benjamin Johnson, an assistant professor and a scholar of modern American and Texas history, asked, "How can it be a good thing to turn over the public faith of this university to the cronies of one of the most divisive, partisan and unpopular administrations in American history?"

Students returned to class on Tuesday, and they tend to be more conservative and supportive of the idea than the faculty, said the student body president, Taylor Russ.

"If the institute brings politics to the campus, I think all students, whether or not they agree with President Bush, see that it brings another opportunity to learn and interact with each other," Mr. Russ said.

Faculty Of Dallas University Less Than Thrilled At Prospect Of A Bush Library (WP)

By Matthew C. Wright

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The site-selection committee for the George W. Bush presidential library and institute has narrowed its search to First Lady Laura Bush's alma mater, Southern Methodist University in Dallas, though the panel has not made a final decision.

Many SMU professors are wary and at a recent closed meeting declared that "our fundamental role as faculty is to ensure that the university holds to fundamental principles of academic freedom and that the best interests of the university are protected," according to memo summarizing the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0118415

The memo, from Faculty Senate President Rhonda Blair, outlined a series of questions many professors have for university president R. Gerald Turner about the library plans:

? What promises, if any, has SMU already made to the Bush Foundation about the library and institute?

? What guarantees will there be in writing regarding the relationship between SMU and the Presidential library and institute?

? Should SMU have some kind of oversight of the institute, or would that oversight identify us as being too closely associated with the institute?

? Have studies been done to determine the increased security risks attached to having the library and institute?

? Since universities with presidential libraries tend to be larger and/or more widely known than SMU, what will be the impact of the library and institute on SMU and its reputation?

? Could the library and particularly the institute simply be geographically near, but not be part of, SMU? Wouldn't SMU generally reap the same benefits from its presence?

? What would be the impact of the library and institute on SMU's ability to recruit students and faculty, especially in areas such as the Northeast, and what would be the impact on rankings and evaluations?

FEDERAL DIARY: Leadership Problems, Cont. (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Uncle Sam's leadership woes apparently are not going away anytime soon.

Only 49 percent of federal employees have a high level of respect for senior leaders in their agencies, and only 41 percent say they are satisfied with their leaders' policies and practices, the third in a series of government-wide surveys, released yesterday, showed.

The views on leadership are similar to those expressed by federal workers in a 2004 survey, an indication that political appointees and career executives continue to struggle to connect with the rank and file.

Less than half -- 47 percent -- of federal employees said they were satisfied with the information they get from management. They also were fairly evenly split on whether their leaders spur high levels of motivation and commitment in the federal workforce.

Despite the Bush administration's focus on improving government performance, the percentage of federal workers who think their managers review and evaluate progress toward their agency's goals dropped by 11 percentage points from 2002 -- to 56 percent.

The employees also were less likely to say they have a reasonable workload, compared with 2002 -- 59 percent said this, vs. 65 percent four years earlier.

The most recent survey was conducted in the summer of 2006, the third effort by the Office of Personnel Management to collect data on the attitudes and job satisfaction of federal employees. More than 220,000 employees in 88 agencies answered 84 questions, for a response rate of 57 percent. Most of the questions were asked in 2002 and 2004 surveys, but some have been dropped and others added.

One new question for the 2006 survey asked employees if they had trust and confidence in the person who directly supervises their work. Sixty-four percent said they did. Sixty-six percent also said they believe their supervisors are doing a good job. The response to that question, which has been asked in other surveys, registered an increase of 5 percentage points from 2002.

Linda M. Springer, the OPM director, said the survey findings show that many federal employees do not believe their agencies reward high performance and that the government has a long way to go in dealing with poor performers.

But the survey, Springer said, also showed that the commitment to public service by federal employees remains strong: 90 percent believe their work is important, 83 percent know how their work relates to agency goals, and 83 percent said their co-workers cooperate to get the job done.

High marks in those categories suggest that "morale is good" across the government, Nancy H. Kichak, an OPM associate director in charge of the survey, said.

Especially encouraging, she said, was a finding that relatively few employees plan to leave in the next year or two, even though more than half the federal workforce is eligible to retire.

Only 4 percent of the respondents said they plan to retire within a year, and just 12 percent said they plan to retire in one to three years.

A majority of employees -- 69 percent -- said they were not considering leaving their agencies. Sixteen percent said they were considering taking another job elsewhere in the government.

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this column. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Disaster Fund Faces Financial Shortfall (NYT)

By Ron Nixon And Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

The federal government's biggest program to help people rebuild after natural disasters is on the verge of running out of operating money because of budgeting problems at the agency that runs it, the Small Business Administration.

If Congress does not intervene in the next month or so to cover the administrative costs of the program, it will have to shut down, according to an internal agency memorandum given to The New York Times by a critic of the agency.

Agency officials say, and Congressional leaders agree, that the legislature will almost certainly act to keep the program running. "It would be very surprising to us if they wouldn't address this," said Steven C. Preston, the administrator of the S.B.A.

But even a temporary shutdown could delay aid to victims of the ice storms in the Midwest and other recent natural disasters, and would further hamper a program that was widely criticized for its slow response to the hurricanes that hit the Gulf Coast in 2005.

The current money shortage is related to what agency officials concede was an unusual decision in early 2005 not to ask Congress for any money to pay for running the disaster program in the 2006 fiscal year, relying instead on money left over from previous disasters. The program also ran into financial trouble last year and required an emergency infusion of money in February.

Longtime critics of the agency said the current problem highlighted a continuing pattern of mismanagement and poor planning at the S.B.A.

"We need to look at a comprehensive overhaul of the agency as well as the disaster loan program," said Representative Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York and the new chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee. "Something has to change in the management of this agency."

After the 2005 hurricanes, the agency did not have enough employees to handle the 423,000 loan applications it ultimately received from homeowners and businesses, and had switched to a troubled computer system that slowed its disaster response. The Government Accountability Office cited the agency's poor planning as a factor in "significant delays and backlogs in processing loan applications."

In the face of withering criticism from disaster victims, government officials and even agency employees, the director of the agency, Hector V. Barreto, resigned last April. His successor, Mr. Preston, has pledged to improve the disaster response.

The small-business agency has now approved more than $8 billion in loans to homeowners trying to rebuild after the hurricanes, according to its own data, but has distributed less than half of that amount. Businesses have received loans of about $1.2 billion, although the agency has approved almost $2.6 billion in loans.

In the Senate, Democrats have proposed major changes to the disaster assistance program, including allowing banks to make disaster loans, rather than funneling them all through the S.B.A.'s staff.

"The administration mismanaged the response to Katrina from Day 1," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and the new chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, said in a statement yesterday. "We need legislation to overhaul the program and make it work efficiently for every business owner and homeowner in the country."

But Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine and the former head of the committee, blamed Congress for the current financial problem, saying it stemmed from lawmakers' failure to approve the agency's budget request for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, which agency officials said included about $200 million to run the disaster program.

"It is unacceptable that at a time when we are all too aware of how valuable these programs are to American families whose lives have been turned upside down by disaster, we were unable to provide the S.B.A. with the funding it requested for this fiscal year," Ms. Snowe said in a statement yesterday.

The Republican-led Congress passed 2 of 11 spending bills last year. The new Democratic leadership decided to keep most government agencies operating by extending their current budget levels and is expected to continue those spending levels until fall.

The 2006 budget is the one that did not ask for money to operate the disaster program. According to the internal memorandum, which was prepared by the agency's chief financial officer, Jennifer Main, the agency needs $306 million for administrative costs in the current fiscal year but had only $157 million left as of Sept. 30.

The short-term problem could be solved, as in the past, if Congress allows the agency to cover administrative costs by dipping into some of the money it has allocated for loans, said C. Edward Rowe III, the agency's chief liaison to Congress.

But Ms. Velázquez said she would oppose such a measure. "I am not willing to take money out of disaster money intended for victims to cover administrative costs," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0118417

The agency is also facing a shortfall of about $20 million in its regular budget, which has dropped by about 30 percent since 2001. According to the memorandum, the shortfall could require the agency to take drastic steps, including furloughing every one of its employees one day a month until the end of September.

"We don't really think Congress will forget to fund disaster assistance," said Joel Szabat, the agency's chief of staff. "The real issue is the $20 million."

Under the disaster loan program, homeowners can borrow up to $200,000 at low interest rates to repair houses; owners and renters can borrow up to $40,000 to replace damaged furnishings. Businesses of any size can borrow up to $1.5 million to cover physical losses, and some small businesses are eligible for loans to cover economic losses. Maximum interest rates range from 4 percent to 8 percent.

The disaster loan program also serves as a screening mechanism for some grants from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which referred 2.4 million people to the S.B.A after the hurricanes. Only after they are rejected by the S.B.A. do applicants become eligible for some FEMA grants.

The homeowner loan program has come under fire in Louisiana and Mississippi because it is requiring people who receive federally financed recovery grants through state-run programs to use the money to repay S.B.A. loans.

Taking Power, Sharing Cereal (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

SOME of the most powerful Democrats in America are split over a most incendiary household issue: rodents.

"I once had to pick up a mouse by the tail that Durbin refused to pick up," complained Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, referring to his roommate Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois.

This characterization is not fair to Mr. Durbin, interjected another tenant in the Capitol Hill row house, Representative Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts. For starters, it overlooks Mr. Durbin's gift for killing rats. "He will kill them with his bare hands," Mr. Delahunt marveled.

"Oh, will you stop with the rats," said the annoyed fourth roommate, Representative George Miller of California. He owns the house and is sensitive to any suggestion that he harbors pestilence. It's dicey enough that he harbors politicians.

Think MTV's "Real World" with a slovenly cast of Democratic power brokers. While Washington may have more than its share of crash pads for policy-debating workaholics, few, if any, have sheltered a quorum as powerful as this one. About a quarter-mile southeast of the Capitol, the inelegantly decorated two-bedroom house has become an unlikely center of influence in Washington's changing power grid. It is home to the second- and third-ranking senators in the new Democratic majority (Mr. Durbin, the majority whip, and Mr. Schumer, the vice chairman of the Democratic caucus) and the chairman of the House Democratic Policy Committee (Mr. Miller).

Mr. Delahunt, a six-term congressman, is the least prominent of the four but perhaps the funniest. More to the point, he is the only one willing to sleep in the living room with a close-up view of Mr. Schumer slumbering a few feet away in his boxers.

Mr. Miller began taking in weary lawmakers in 1982, but this is the first time in 12 years that four members of a Democratic majority have lived here simultaneously. The four men were once host to a fund-raiser for Senator Barbara Boxer of California at their divey dwelling, raising $80,000. Given the prevailing attire in the place on many nights, guests were given pairs of custom-made "Barbara Boxer shorts."

As a general rule, the abode is hardly fit for entertaining, or even for a health inspector. It is used for convenience: sleeping, ditching stuff, and fast-food consumption — the kinds of functions prized by vagabond politicians whose families are back in their home states and who generally spend only their working weekdays here.

"Everybody in the world says they're going to do a television series based on us," said Mr. Durbin, who was collapsed on the couch on a recent Monday night. Still in a tie, he sipped ice water from a massive Chicago Cubs cup while waiting for the Chinese food to arrive.

"But then they realize that the story of four middle-aged men, with no sex and violence, is not going to last two weeks," he said. The prevailing topics of their discussions are grandchildren and Metamucil, he added.

"Hey, speak for yourself, Durbin," Mr. Delahunt said, protesting the claim of no sex and violence.

"There is a lot of violence in here," Mr. Schumer said.

In fact, the roommates have never resorted to violence, at least with one another. (Crickets are another story.) Their weapons are verbal, and often aimed at Mr. Schumer, who admits to a serious dereliction of roommate duties, like grocery shopping. He is also prone to a blatant disregard for conserving a most precious household resource, cereal.

"I love cereal," Mr. Schumer said, digging into his second bowl of granola, going a long way toward depleting a box that Mr. Miller had just purchased.

DOJ_NMG_0118418

The night of the national championship football game between the University of Florida and Ohio State, Jan. 8, was a rare instance of the four roommates being home and awake at the same time. It had not happened since the election in November, and the neighborhood has changed considerably since then. Several Republicans on the block lost their race or left Congress (the latter category includes the disgraced Representative Mark Foley, who lived down the street).

"This street was just devastated by the election," Mr. Miller said. "Who says Republicans are good for property values?"

He added that no Republican had ever set foot in the place, at least to their knowledge.

"We just have to vote with them, not live with them," he said.

Mr. Miller bought the house in 1977 and started taking in renters a few years later. Early tenants included former Representative Marty Russo of Illinois and former Representative Leon E. Panetta of California, who was forced to move out when President Clinton appointed him head of the Office of Management and Budget. (Ethics laws prohibited a White House official from paying rent to a member of Congress.)

Mr. Schumer joined them in 1982, and Mr. Durbin moved in a decade later on condition that he get one of the two bedrooms upstairs. Mr. Miller sleeps in the other, bigger bedroom, asserting his ownership privileges, and Mr. Delahunt began occupying the second living room bed four years ago, after a previous tenant, former Representative Sam Gejdenson, was evicted by voters in Connecticut.

Mr. Miller charges rent of $750 a month, which Mr. Durbin pays by direct deposit and Mr. Schumer's wife pays by sending Mr. Miller six checks twice a year. Mr. Schumer says his wardrobe at the apartment consists of boxers and suits, nothing in between.

Women rarely set foot in the place, excluding the Haitian cleaning lady who comes every week and who everyone promises is a legal immigrant. The common bathroom upstairs is stocked with supersize bottles of Listerine, CVS cocoa butter, Suave shampoo (with dandruff control) and a hair dryer.

Little thought is given to entertainment besides the big-screen television that Mr. Durbin recently purchased against the wishes of Mr. Schumer and Mr. Delahunt, who liked the old one. The refrigerator is mostly empty save for apples, grapes and about two dozen bottles of beer.

"The icemaker is back on," boasted Mr. Miller, pointing to the inside of what might be the most unseemly freezer in Washington this side of Representative William Jefferson's. (F.B.I. agents found $90,000 in the freezer of Mr. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, who is being investigated on bribery charges.)

Once, Mr. Miller's son shot a deer and presented the house with an abundant supply of venison. It remained in the freezer for 12 years, at which point it was deemed to have reached its term limit and was discarded.

"Whatever happened to that venison?" Mr. Schumer wondered.

"I think it just got up and walked away," Mr. Delahunt said.

The roommates then repaired to couches to watch Florida-Ohio State and to stuff their faces with Sichuan beef and kung pao chicken. Mr. Durbin began talking about meetings he had last month with the presidents of Bolivia and Ecuador on a Congressional delegation to Latin America. Then he and Mr. Schumer started arguing about Mr. Schumer's refusal to make his bed.

Budget Balancing Is A Bad News-Good News Story (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

The good news on the budget front is that both the Bush administration and Congressional Democrats want to eliminate the deficit by 2012.

The bad news is that they are at daggers-drawn about how to do it. President Bush wants to keep all of his tax cuts alive indefinitely and freeze domestic spending, while Democrats have a huge spending wish list and want to end the tax cuts for the richest Americans.

There's more bad news as Bush prepares to deliver his State of the Union address and unveil his fiscal 2008 budget: Democrats suspect that his balancing act will be based on overly rosy tax revenue estimates and on impossible policy assumptions, rendering his budget DOA on Capitol Hill.

White House officials say that Bush will rely on a 6.5 percent annual increase in government tax receipts to achieve balance, which they say is possible because his tax cuts have spurred robust economic growth.

However, while tax revenues have surged lately — achieving a high of 14.5 percent growth in fiscal 2005 — the average for past economic recoveries is in the 4 percent range.

Moreover, the administration is expected to assume that the alternative minimum tax remains in place, though Congress annually has passed a "fix" to prevent it from socking middle-class taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0118419

One top Democratic budget staffer said he expected Bush, too, to propose a freeze in programs like veterans' health and impose cuts in Medicare doctors' fees — "items even the Republican Congress rejected."

Democrats also anticipate that — despite promises to the contrary — Bush again will fail to adequately build Iraq War costs into his budget. "We are expecting a not-serious, credible budget," the staffer said.

Meantime, while Democrats are promising to exercise fiscal responsibility and resist urgent appeals from constituency groups for more domestic spending, Republicans charge they've already started a spending binge during their first "100 hours" — on homeland security, for example — and won't be able to resist demands from farmers, teachers unions and health lobbies. All of this presages epic battles over appropriations later this year.

That's the short-term picture as the two sides try to pare an estimated $260 billion deficit down to zero in five years. Bad news.

Longer term, the news is much worse. As the Heritage Foundation's Stuart Butler puts it, "If they did succeed in balancing the budget by 2012, it'd be like having a margarita on the beach before the tsunami hits."

That's because, as the baby boomer generation reaches retirement age, the costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid entitlement spending will surge after 2015, rising by 2040 to eat up the entire federal budget and requiring a 50 percent tax increase on workers or drastic benefit cuts for seniors to pay for defense and other government services.

But wait — there is good news. Serious bipartisan efforts are under way at the think tank level to educate the public about the fiscal crisis ahead and establish consensus about a possible "grand bargain" to achieve long-term balance.

And, after Democrats last year rejected Bush's call to form a bipartisan commission on entitlement reform, there's hope this year that some panel could be formed — preferably of real Congressional and administration decision-makers — to work on a long-term deal.

The ideological breadth — and intellectual heft — of participation in the think tank exercise is truly impressive. It includes Butler on the right and the Brookings Institution's Belle Sawhill on the left and Robert Bixby of the Concord Coalition and Comptroller General David Walker of the Government Accountability Office in the center.

These four — plus occasional additional experts, recently including Bush budget director Rob Portman — have conducted nearly 20 "wake-up call" seminars around the country, mainly at university schools of public policy, making the point that America's long-term fiscal outlook is "unsustainable" — in fact, perilous to the nation's prosperity and security.

The experts call for action — the earlier the better — such as imposing even tighter controls on spending than the Democrats' new "pay-as-you-go" rules, reforming health care to control costs and cover the uninsured, increasing the Social Security retirement age, means-testing Medicare benefits and raising revenues.

Both administration officials, including Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, and key Members of Congress like Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) and House Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) have expressed willingness to talk about entitlement reform.

Bush has said he is even willing to talk about revenue increases, though he's said he'd resist tax hikes. White House adviser Karl Rove has offered to bet — but only $5 — that there won't be any tax increases on Bush's watch.

So, the good news is that there's bipartisan agreement on both short-term and long-term ends. The bad news is that the two sides are far, far apart on means. But both sides are scared enough about the long-term danger to be willing to negotiate seriously.

Now, all they have to do is to see the short term as the prelude to the long term. Democrats have to restrain spending, Republicans have to raise revenues. The fix isn't conceptually complicated. It just takes political courage. What great news it would be if our leaders found some.

A 'Paygo' History Lesson (WSJ)

By Dick Armey

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Promising to bring new ideas and a fresh commitment to fiscal discipline, House Democrats launched their new majority by embracing Pay As You Go budgeting -- one of the worst fiscal management tools Republicans ever invented. "Paygo" was first concocted by Richard Darman, George H.W. Bush's budget director, as part of the 1990 budget deal that raised taxes in hopes of reining in the deficit. That version, just like the new House rule, mandated that any change in taxes or entitlements resulting in revenue losses be offset with higher taxes or "cuts" in other entitlement spending.

With such a sensible sounding name, who could be against paygo? Recent history has seen countless efforts to reform the budget process, typically pernicious changes with deceptively reassuring titles. The most infamous was Lyndon Johnson's "Unified Budget" (who could support an un-unified budget?) -- which allowed appropriators to get their hands on payroll tax surpluses, dramatically expanding government spending. Later, the serious-sounding Impoundment Control Act of 1974 allowed a Democratic Congress to strip the executive branch of its ability to rescind or defer spending authority from annual appropriations legislation. Today, President Bush has little choice but to veto an entire spending bill if he opposes even a single earmark, a highly confrontational tactic he has chosen not to employ.

DOJ_NMG_0118420

There are only two examples during my 18 years in Washington where the Congress actually reduced domestic discretionary spending from the previous year. The first was the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act of 1985 (GRH), which legislated hard deficit reduction targets and automatic spending sequesters to enforce them. GRH was so successful that Congress amended it in 1987, easing the deficit targets to avoid additional spending reductions. But GRH continued to provide significant fiscal discipline until it was emasculated in 1990.

Domestic discretionary spending fell again with Republican control of Congress in the mid-1990s. We cut spending this time around by disciplining appropriators. It was a clear commitment to fiscal restraint that allowed the GOP leadership, led by the House, to keep spending under the targets established by the Budget Resolution for three consecutive years, FY 1996-1998. We cut outdated domestic programs, sought efficiencies and forced appropriators to make tough choices between competing priorities.

Over time, that commitment to spending discipline was replaced by a commitment to get re-elected at any cost -- and new spending records were set. The Democrats now in charge have promised, to quote Nancy Pelosi, "no new deficit spending, no new bridges to nowhere." But deficit spending is caused by too much spending -- and under the House Democrats' paygo rule, entitlement spending, the lion's share of the federal budget, will grow unabated, as will the massive unfunded liabilities of Medicare and Social Security (currently approaching $70 trillion), which are not acknowledged under existing budgeting practices. Meanwhile, there are no enforceable caps on domestic discretionary spending -- and thus earmarks, even if restrained as promised, will do next to nothing to promote deficit reduction.

Social Security reforms that turn empty promises into personally owned accounts -- real assets for retirement -- cannot be funded under paygo without massive tax increases or deep reductions in promised benefits. In effect, paygo makes serious entitlement reform politically impossible without a word of debate. Meanwhile, as surplus payroll tax dollars currently diverted into other spending programs continue to disappear, the pressure on the deficit will become insurmountable.

While paygo might restrain Democrat promises to further expand prescription drug benefits under Medicare Part D, its most certain outcome will be massive tax increases. Unlike "mandatory" spending that grows on autopilot, the various Bush tax cuts are set to expire. Democrats, already inclined to oppose lower taxes, will be hard-pressed to find other new tax revenue, or spending offsets from cherished entitlements, that would allow for making the tax provisions permanent.

Two important factors created the budget surpluses of the late 1990s: spending restraint and robust economic growth. Bill Clinton's enormous tax increase generated less than half of the promised new revenue by 1996, but cuts in the capital gains tax and death tax helped make up the difference. More importantly, technological innovation and higher economic growth generated new revenues. These new dollars, coupled with spending discipline, balanced the budget and paid down a substantial portion of the debt.

Pay As You Go has a different history. At Mr. Darman's urging, George H.W. Bush broke his famous 1988 campaign promise and signed on to a deficit reduction package that increased taxes and instituted paygo. The economy tanked, the deficit ballooned and the GOP suffered an electoral rout in 1992. Maybe there's a history lesson in there somewhere.

Mr. Armey, House majority leader from 1995 to 2002, is chairman of FreedomWorks.

OTHER NEWS:

Gain In Manufacturing Output Bodes Well For Economic Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The U.S. manufacturing sector, one of the weak links in the nation's economy, might not be a drag on economic growth much longer, the latest data suggest. It's also doing its part to keep inflation in check.

The Federal Reserve reported yesterday that U.S. industrial production increased a seasonally adjusted 0.4% in December from the previous month, driven largely by a 0.7% rise in manufacturing output.

While production in housing-related industries, such as furniture, declined or posted only meager gains, output of durable goods, such as home electronics, surged, reflecting the buoyant consumer spending on those items in recent months. The overall rise in output contrasts sharply with the previous three months: After revisions, industrial production showed declines in all three.

DOJ_NMG_0118421

Economists saw the production data as broadly consistent with their consensus forecast for 2007: that the economy should regain momentum as slowdowns in housing and manufacturing fade. "This could be an early sign that things are turning around for manufacturing," says Haseeb Ahmed, U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. in New York.

The picture for manufacturers remains far from ideal. On an annualized basis, production fell 1.4% in the fourth quarter from the third quarter. A slowdown in demand in mid-2006 left manufacturers with large stockpiles of unsold goods: As of November, the latest data available, it would have taken 1.24 months of sales to get rid of their inventories, up from 1.15 months in May.

Some indicators, though, suggest manufacturers' overhang is decreasing, thanks in part to stronger-than-expected consumer spending in the fourth quarter. In the latest survey from the Institute for Supply Management, a trade group for corporate purchasing managers, manufacturers said their inventory levels had fallen in December.

"We are slowly working down inventory," says Steve Wieting, U.S. economist at Citigroup Inc. in New York. "We just got slightly out of position, not way out of position."

A separate Federal Reserve survey of regional economic activity, known as the "beige book," broadly supported the idea that manufacturing held up in late November and December. Most of the Fed's 12 districts reported expansion in the sector, along with positive trends in services. Manufacturers in the Boston district, for example, described prospects for 2007 with words such as "good," "solid" and "decent," though some said business connected to consumer spending and housing deteriorated in late 2006.

Nearly all parts of the country reported persistent weakness in the housing market, but the latest survey from the National Association of Home Builders offered a glimmer of optimism. The association's index of builders' sentiment rose to 35, its highest level since July, while their assessment of future home sales held steady at 49, up from a low of 37 in September. A number below 50 still indicates that negative responses outweighed positive responses.

Meanwhile, the Labor Department's latest report on wholesale prices showed goods-producing businesses, which make up a bit more than a third of the nation's economy, doing a decent job of keeping prices under control.

Driven by a bounce in energy prices, wholesale prices for finished goods rose a seasonally adjusted 0.9% in December from the previous month -- more than what economists had expected. But so-called core wholesale prices, which exclude food and energy, rose a moderate 0.2%. Core prices of intermediate goods, such as components for manufacturing, fell 0.1%, suggesting decreased inflation pressure in the production pipeline. For all of 2006, wholesale prices rose 1.1% overall, while core prices rose 2.0%.

"The trend in core producer-price inflation is encouraging, and mirrors the recent subsiding of inflation pressures observed in consumer prices," wrote Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight, in a report. Consumer prices were flat in November. The Labor Department will report on December consumer prices today.

Write to Mark Whitehouse at mark.whitehouse@wsj.com1

Fed Official Says Housing Isn't Focus; Beige Book Indicates Modest Growth (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Monetary-policy makers should focus on stable inflation and employment and not be drawn into any attempt to prevent bubbles from developing in asset markets such as housing, Federal Reserve governor Frederic Mishkin said Wednesday.

Separately, the Federal Reserve said the U.S. economy continued growing at a "modest pace" in the latter part of the fourth quarter and early January, as retail sales grew moderately amid tight labor markets and a continued housing slump.

"Central banks should not give a special role to house prices in the conduct of monetary policy but should respond to them only to the extent that they have foreseeable effects on inflation and employment," Mr. Mishkin said in prepared remarks to the Forecasters Club of New York. Mr. Mishkin's prepared text didn't address the outlook for the U.S. economy or monetary policy. (Read the speech.1)

Mr. Mishkin cited examples in Europe when policy makers seemed to use house prices as a justification for an interest-rate decision. He argued that central banks have no better means of identifying potential bubbles than private markets do. In addition, any bursting of a housing bubble "is unlikely to produce financial instability," Mr. Mishkin said, citing the U.S. economy's ability to weather the stock market decline of 2000 and 2001, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and corporate accounting scandals.

Mr. Mishkin said in his speech that instead of trying to "preemptively" deal with bubbles, which he added "is almost impossible to do," central banks should "minimize financial instability by being ready to react quickly" should an asset price collapse occur.

DOJ_NMG_0118422

Housing's effect on the economy has in recent months gained considerable attention in financial markets and at the Fed. Fed officials noted in their December policy statement that a "substantial cooling" in housing helped slow the economy over the course of last year.

Many financial market participants, meanwhile, had thought the Fed would have to lower official interest rates in early 2007 as the housing slump rippled through the economy. But those hopes were quelled by the recent slew of robust economic reports, which included some indications that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

Beige Book

Residential housing continued a downward trend, according to the Fed's "beige book" report on regional economies. "Nearly all districts reported a continued softening in housing markets, and high inventories of new homes have generally led to a slowing in residential building," the periodic report said, although there were exceptions.

"All districts reported slow home sales, except for Richmond, which saw a modest increase," while Boston, New York, Atlanta and Chicago all reported decreases in home prices.

In contrast, commercial real estate activity continued to see "strong activity in most districts," the Fed said. Cleveland, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis and San Francisco all reported increases in commercial building.

"Most reports from the Federal Reserve District Banks indicated that economic activity expanded at a moderate pace," the Fed said. "Districts generally reported modest increases in retail sales," despite "sluggish" vehicle sales in several districts, the Fed added.

Most of the districts reported moderate growth, although Cleveland saw "softening activity," and the Boston region reported economic activity was "mixed."

Reports from the Fed districts "generally described labor markets as tightening and cited examples of some businesses having difficulty finding qualified workers," according to the beige book.

But while hiring expanded in several districts, the banks reported "relatively moderate gains in wages," although some districts reported there were concerns for some businesses about "increases in the benefit portion of compensation." Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Dallas and San Francisco all noted higher costs for benefits, particularly health care, according to the report.

The beige book is a summary report of economic activity for use at the central bank's next Federal Open Market Committee meeting in late January. The latest was prepared by the Minneapolis district.

On the inflation front, the Fed said "overall prices increased moderately," as prices for energy and a number of materials eased, and "competition has kept prices for final goods in check."

Manufacturing continued to expand in most districts, according to the Fed, with Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and San Francisco all reporting increased activity. But Chicago, Minneapolis and Kansas City reported slower manufacturing growth. Several districts also reported weakness in manufacturing businesses that support the residential housing industry.

The report adds regional anecdotal evidence to national economic data and Fed officials' recent public remarks, which suggest the Fed remains focused on keeping inflation in check, despite some expectations in the financial markets for interest-rate cuts.

Home Builders' Confidence Rises

Meanwhile, in an indication that the worst may be past for the housing bubble, the confidence of U.S. home builders swung upward at the start of 2007, according to data reported Wednesday.

The National Association of Home Builders reported that its index for sales of new single-family homes rose to 35 in January from 33 in December. While the trade group gauge indicates builders generally remain pessimistic, the last time the index sat so high was July, when the reading was 39.

"Builders are starting to see that the worst is behind them and that buying conditions have improved to the point that greater optimism is warranted," NAHB chief economist David Seiders said Wednesday.

"The same factors that were evident at the end of 2006 continue to hold true in today's housing market -- improving affordability measures, strengthening consumer assessments of home buying conditions and an upswing in applications for mortgages to buy homes," Mr. Seiders added.

Within the NAHB's housing-market index, the component for present sales of single-family homes rose to 36 in January from 33 in December. Expectations for sales in the next six months held steady during January at 49 points, the NAHB said. The traffic of prospective buyers rose to 26 from 23 in December.

"Builders are responding to increased buyer interest at the end of 2006 and beginning of 2007," said David Pressly, a home builder from Statesville, N.C., and the president of the NAHB. "This bodes well for the upcoming spring buying season."

DOJ_NMG_0118423

The index in January was based on a survey of 387 home builders, who answer questions about sales prospects now and in the near term. When the Housing Market Index exceeds 50, it means the number of builders who see "good" sales outnumber the number who see "poor" sales. The numbers used in compiling the index are adjusted for seasonal variations.

--Jeff Bater and Benton Ives-Halperin contributed to this article.

Fed Officials' Comments Point To Little Chance Of Rate Cuts Anytime Soon (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve shouldn't raise interest rates to prevent housing bubbles from forming, but it can take steps to ensure lenders act responsibly or to ease the pain of a market tumble, a Fed official said Wednesday.

"The issue of how central banks should respond to house price movements is therefore not whether they should respond at all," Fed Governor Frederic Mishkin said in a speech in New York. Rather it's whether central banks should respond "over and above" actions required to meet their main mission of ensuring stable inflation and employment, Mishkin said.

In a separate speech in Arizona, San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen said that even though the current housing market decline has "been significant and will probably continue for a while longer," concerns that it will result in a "devastating collapse — one that might be big enough to cause a recession in the U.S. economy — have been largely allayed."

But Yellen said the Fed, which is trying to steer the economy to a soft landing by raising rates enough to reduce inflation without killing growth, isn't in the clear yet. The biggest unknown is why the job market is going "gangbusters" while growth has slowed, and what that could mean for inflation.

"While I am inclined to see labor market tightness as transitory, I do take it as a serious risk," Yellen said.

After raising short-term interest rates steadily from mid-2004 to mid-2006, the Fed has held the target for short-term rates steady at 5.25% since June. The rates are used as a benchmark for consumer and business loans.

Yellen's comments, coupled with reports Wednesday showing that wholesale prices rose more than expected in December and factory production firmed, make it unlikely the Fed will cut rates soon.

Many market analysts had expected a rate cut early this year, based partly on forecasts that the housing correction could have a major impact on the overall economy. Home building has fallen 25% from last year and new home sales about 15%.

The Labor Department's producer price index rose 0.9% in December, down from a 2% increase the previous month, but a larger move than economists expected. For 2006, wholesale prices rose 1.1%, compared with a 5.4% jump the previous year.

Stuart Hoffman, PNC chief economist, said in an advisory to clients that the new data mean it "will take clear evidence of weakness outside of the housing and the domestic auto industries to make a funds rate cut a more realistic probability by early summer."

Mishkin said there is mixed economic research on whether raising interest rates deflates dangerous bubbles or can make a downturn worse. Meddling in markets could also undermine public support for central banks, he said. He also noted that housing prices are less volatile than stock prices.

PPI Data Add To US Inflation Fears (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

US producer prices rose more than expected last month, according to government figures which underlined the Federal Reserve's concern about persistent inflation pressures.

Core prices – which exclude volatile food and energy prices – gained 0.2 per cent following a 1.3 per cent increase in November, data released on Wednesday showed.

The increase will add to the Fed's concern that elevated wholesale costs could lead to higher prices for consumers that would erode purchasing power.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman brothers, said: "The elevated measures of inflation in the pipeline will keep the Fed worried about an eventual feeding through of producer prices to consumer prices."

"Growth didn't slow in the fourth quarter in the way the Fed anticipated, and because of that they will pay more attention to indicators of potential inflation pressures," he added.

The Fed has said it is prepared to raise interest rates further if price pressures build, despite investor expectations that slower economic growth will prompt rate cuts in the year ahead.

The central bank has kept interest rates on hold since August and is expecting the economy to grow at a moderate pace in the coming months and withstand an ongoing slowdown in the housing market and weakness in manufacturing.

The rise in core prices in December brings the total increase for last year to 2 per cent, up from 1.4 per cent in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0118424

The overall producer price index rose 0.9 per cent in December following a record rise of 2 per cent in November, which was the largest jump in more than three decades

The swings in the headline rate in recent months have been driven largely by volatility in global energy markets and structural and seasonal changes in the auto sector.

The Department of Labor said energy prices rose 2.5 per cent last month after surging by 6.1 per cent in November, while prices for passenger cars were down 0.2 per cent after strong gains in the previous month.

Stocks Sag On Weak Profits, Oil Uptick, Economic News (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Stocks seesawed through the day but ended lower, hurt by tepid corporate earnings, an uptick in crude-oil prices and sobering economic news.

At its intraday high, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was up 31.41 points and at its low point was down 32.04. An afternoon round of selling pushed the blue-chip indicator into the red for good, to end the session down 5.44 points, or 0.04%, at 12577.15, up 0.9% on the year.

In particular, the average was hindered by a 5.7% decline in component Intel, following the chipmaker's lackluster earnings report late Tuesday.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index suffered, too, declining 0.7%, or 18.36 points, to 2479.42, still up 2.7% on the year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.28 points, to 1430.62, up 0.9% on the year.

Crude-oil futures have fallen sharply this year, down 14%, in large part because of unseasonably mild weather in the U.S. Northeast and rising inventories. That has generally buoyed stock prices, because lower energy costs help businesses and consumers.

The trend yesterday was the opposite. The price of crude-oil contracts for February delivery jumped $1.03, or 2%, to $52.24 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Traders said the move was driven by a combination of factors, including a reshuffling of some investors' positions to cover expiring options contracts and renewed interest by some speculators who sensed a buying opportunity amid this month's overall decline.

Energy broker Mike Fitzpatrick, of Fimat USA, said the day's rally didn't necessarily signal an end to crude's early-2007 slide.

"If anything, the news still favors lower prices," he said, citing inventory statistics due today from the federal Energy Information Administration. Many traders expect the report to show a weekly increase in U.S. crude reserves.

Economic news yesterday seemed to point away from a quick interest-rate cut by the Federal Reserve this year -- a scenario some investors have been hoping for because lower borrowing costs would likely spur consumer spending, corporate profits and a stock rally.

The Fed released its "beige book" of economic indicators, in which the central bank noted a "modest pace" of recent growth. It also noted tight labor markets that have put upward pressure on wages -- not ideal conditions for a rate cut.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1 and bonds decreased2. The 10-year note shed 9/32 point, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.788%. The 30-year bond declined 18/32 to yield 4.882%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose slightly to 120.66 yen from 120.63 yen. The euro rose to $1.2936 from $1.2915.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com4

Herndon Anti-Solicitation Law Challenged (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

A Reston man ticketed by police for hiring a day laborer in the parking lot of a Herndon 7-Eleven is taking the town to court, contending that its anti-solicitation ordinance is unconstitutional.

The legal challenge, filed in Fairfax County District Court, is the newest turn in Herndon's campaign to discourage illegal immigrants from living and finding work in the town of 23,000 near Dulles International Airport. It is also the latest in a series of court actions around the country questioning the legitimacy of similar laws.

DOJ_NMG_0118425

According to court documents, Stephen A. Thomas, 44, drove into the parking lot on Elden Street on Sept. 16, got out and approached two men about doing yard work. After reaching agreement with one of them, Thomas was driving home with the worker when he was stopped by Herndon police and cited for violating the ordinance.

He faces up to six months in jail and a fine of up to $1,000. Lt. Jerry Keys, a police spokesman, said yesterday that the laborer in the car with Thomas was not cited, although it was not clear why, other than that the officer involved was exercising his discretion.

Thomas could not be reached for comment.

The ordinance, enacted in September 2005, bars anyone in a vehicle from trying to hire someone standing on the sidewalk or street. Conversely, it prohibits anyone on the street from asking someone in a vehicle -- or who has just gotten out of one -- for work.

Although town officials cited traffic safety as their chief concern, the law was passed in the midst of a debate over the impact of immigrant day laborers, who congregated in the parking lot on Elden Street in the mornings to seek work.

Thomas's attorneys, Rodney G. Leffler and Alexa K. Moseley of Fairfax, asked that the case be dismissed on First Amendment grounds, saying that solicitation has long been protected by the courts as free speech. Specifically, they said Herndon's law is flawed because it focuses only on solicitation for employment, while leaving other forms of solicitation -- such as charitable contributions or the sale of goods -- unrestricted.

Fairfax District Judge Lorraine Nordlund has scheduled a hearing for Feb. 14 but indicated that she could rule earlier based on written arguments. The lawsuit was filed last week.

Herndon Town Attorney Richard B. Kaufman declined to comment. "The Town of Herndon does not comment on ongoing criminal prosecutions," he said.

Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch said the Town Council can rewrite the ordinance, if necessary.

"We're going to work this through one step at a time, and if we have to modify the language, we'll do what we have to do," he said.

Police figures show a recent spike in anti-solicitation citations, with 51 issued in the past three months, after just 19 in the previous 10 months. It's not clear what is behind the recent increase.

The law was passed several weeks before the opening of the Herndon Official Workers Center, a site created by the town as a gathering place for laborers and those seeking to employ them. The town has said that the existence of the site allows them to bar solicitation for employment on the streets.

Similar laws have been successfully challenged in other court cases. A federal judge in California ruled last May that day laborers in Redondo Beach had the right to look for jobs on public sidewalks. In 2004, city police arrested 60 workers in a sting operation under an ordinance the city passed in 1987 as a traffic control measure.

Last November, a federal judge ruled that officials in the New York City suburb of Mamaroneck had harassed day laborers in a racially motivated attempt to discourage them from seeking work in the streets.

In both cases, the locality involved did not have an alternate site, such as Herndon's worker center, where workers could gather. But the Town Council's recently approved plan to hire a firm that would restrict access to the center to lawful immigrants potentially complicates the town's legal position.

This is the second time in recent days that Herndon's actions have been challenged on constitutional grounds. Last week, state officials informed the town that a law it sought from the General Assembly, authorizing local governments to criminalize the hiring of illegal immigrants, is most likely unconstitutional. State officials said such a measure is preempted by existing federal law.

Appeals Court Rules For Wal-Mart In Maryland Health Care Case (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

When Maryland legislators passed a first-of-its-kind law in 2006 forcing Wal-Mart Stores to spend more on employee health care, the measure was held up as a model for other states grappling with mounting Medicaid bills.

But yesterday, after a second court found that the Maryland's fair-share health care rule violated federal labor laws, the concept that states can compel companies to offer more generous health care is suddenly in doubt, experts said.

By a 2-to-1 ruling, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Baltimore found that the Maryland requirement — which affected only Wal-Mart — violated a 32-year-old federal labor law known by its shorthand, Erisa.

The law, known to regulators as the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, was intended to allow big companies to set up uniform health benefits across the country, rather than navigate state-by-state requirements.

By forcing Wal-Mart to revamp health care plans in Maryland, the court found, the Maryland law directly violated Erisa.

DOJ_NMG_0118426

That decision, upholding a lower court decision in July, threatens to derail health care legislation known as fair share that is under consideration in states across the country.

"State level health care reform is still possible, but it's not going to be the Maryland model," said Naomi Walker, the director of state legislative programs at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., which lobbied for the Maryland law. "We have to go back to the drawing board."

Unlike Erisa, the Maryland health care bill was never about making life easier for big companies like Wal-Mart. Rather, it was about shifting the burden for insuring the working poor from state Medicaid plans, with the clear implication that Wal-Mart had shirked its obligations.

Specifically, the Maryland law forced corporations with 10,000 or more workers to spend 8 percent of their payrolls on health insurance, or pay the difference into a state fund. Four companies in the state have more than 10,000 workers, but only Wal-Mart met all the criteria.

The Maryland legislature was never shy about its motives for aiming at Wal-Mart, a company with $12 billion in annual profit.

In the debate that the preceded passage of the law, lawmakers complained that thousands of Wal-Mart's workers rely on Medicaid in states like Maryland and Georgia.

That narrow focus on a single company, legal experts said, may have also influenced the court's decision.

Wal-Mart said the bill was politically motivated and would do little to address the cause of America's health care crisis — spiraling costs. Yesterday, it praised the appeals court decision.

"Not only was this legislation widely viewed as bad public policy, the courts have confirmed that it violates the law," said Nate Hurst, a spokesman for the chain.

But critics of the company, including Maryland lawmakers, said they could claim credit for improving Wal-Mart's health care offerings, even if the law did not survive.

In the last 18 months, Wal-Mart has made its insurance available to the children of part-time workers, reduced the waiting time before new employees are eligible for insurance and created a plan with monthly premiums as low as $11.

And the Maryland law may still survive. The state attorney general can appeal yesterday's decision to a full panel of the Fourth Circuit or to the United States Supreme Court. A spokeswoman for the attorney general, J. Joseph Curran Jr., said he had two weeks to decide.

Maryland lawmakers may also choose to rewrite the law, using an approach upheld in several other states that requires companies with uninsured workers to pay them higher wages that can be used for health care premiums, said Paul Sonn, deputy director of the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law and an expert on fair share health care legislation.

The Maryland law proved popular among the state's residents, according to polls, and that sentiment is likely to guide lawmakers.

"The overwhelming majority of the public wants to require large profitable corporations to pay their fair share for health care," said Paul Blank, the campaign director for WakeUpWalMart.com, a union-backed group critical of the giant retailer. "This form may not work, but lawmakers will work on new way to accomplish the same thing."

The lawsuit that overturned the Maryland law was sponsored by the Retail Industry Leaders Association, a Virginia-based trade group of which Wal-Mart is a member. In an interview, Sandra L. Kennedy, the trade group's president, said, "The court has a sent a strong message at states looking at similar bills: these violate federal law."

Court Upholds Killing Of 'Wal-Mart Bill' (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. doesn't have to pay additional health care costs for its Maryland employees, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday, likely killing similar legislation in other states.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond upheld a U.S. District Court decision that said Maryland's "Wal-Mart bill" violated the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), a federal law that sets minimum standards for pensions and health plans.

A spokeswoman for Maryland Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler said the office is reviewing the opinion and has 14 days to ask for a rehearing in front of all members of the 4th Circuit. The opinion issued yesterday was reviewed by three members.

A year ago, the General Assembly passed the law, which said state employers of 10,000 or more employees were required to contribute at least 8 percent of their payroll to health care. Because of the size requirement and exceptions for the three other employers with that many employees in the state -- Johns Hopkins University, Giant Food and Northrop Grumman -- Wal-Mart was the only company affected by the law.

DOJ_NMG_0118427

Democratic lawmakers who supported the bill said it was a necessary attempt to address out-of-control health care costs.

But opponents, including former Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, who unsuccessfully vetoed the bill, said it unfairly targeted one employer.

The Retail Industry Leaders Association (RILA), an Arlington trade group that includes Wal-Mart, appealed the law and argued that it violated ERISA, which is designed to eliminate a patchwork of state and local employer health guidelines.

In July, U.S. District Judge J. Frederick Motz agreed; yesterday, the federal appeals court upheld that decision.

"Were we to approve Maryland's enactment solely for its noble purpose, we would be leading a charge against a foundational policy of ERISA, and surely other states and local governments would follow," Judge Paul V. Niemeyer, appointed by the first President Bush, wrote in his opinion, which Judge William B. Traxler Jr., appointed by President Clinton, joined.

Judge Niemeyer said the law was enacted to reduce Maryland Wal-Mart employees' reliance on Medicaid, a federal program for the poor and disabled that is administered by the states.

"Not disguised was Maryland's purpose to require Wal-Mart to change, at least in Maryland, its employee-benefit plans and how they are administered," he wrote.

Judge M. Blane Michael, also appointed by Mr. Clinton, dissented, saying that because Wal-Mart would have a choice to boost health care spending on employees or pay a penalty to the state, it did not violate ERISA.

He called the law a "creative" response to the rising problem of covering health care costs. In Maryland, the 2006 Medicaid shortfall was estimated to be $130 million.

"The Maryland act is part of the state's effort to deal with the mounting funding pressures," he wrote.

Wal-Mart said yesterday it was pleased with the decision.

"Not only was this legislation widely viewed as bad public policy, the courts have confirmed that it violates the law," spokesman Nate Hurst said. "This politically motivated legislation did nothing to control the cost of health care or improve access to health care, so it's no wonder that legislators across the country have rejected this as bad public policy."

The ruling is binding on federal courts in Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina and could stop other jurisdictions from trying to pass similar legislation.

"The court's decision sends a strong message that similar bills under consideration in other states and municipalities also violate federal law," said RILA President Sandy Kennedy.

RNC Readies For Martinez Fight (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

A member of the Republican National Committee from President Bush's home state yesterday escalated the rebellion against Mr. Bush's choice to head the committee going into the 2008 presidential elections.

Texas RNC member Denise McNamara said the attempt by Mr. Bush's supporters on the national committee to name Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida as general chairman "is like pouring gas on an already smoldering electorate," citing Mr. Martinez's role in promoting last year's "comprehensive" immigration bill in the Senate.

"Choosing an RNC chairman who supports amnesty [for illegal aliens] is tantamount to telling the conservative majority of Americans that they do not matter."

The fight over the party chairmanship reflects grass-roots discontent, heightened by Republican midterm election losses in November, as the 168-member RNC convenes for its annual winter meeting today at the Grand Hyatt Hotel downtown.

Mr. Martinez's opponents are ready to challenge the White House's efforts to force on the party a general chairman whose views on illegal immigration, they say, are opposed by 80 percent of the electorate.

They cite polls indicating that the issue has split the party and contributed to its November losses.

The vote is scheduled for tomorrow.

"The question is whether the Martinez fight will be a skirmish or a full-scale rebellion," said New Jersey RNC member David Norcross, a former RNC general counsel who oversaw the 2004 Republican presidential nominating convention in New York. "I think it will be a skirmish, but I am preparing for a full-scale rebellion."

One of Mr. Martinez's supporters, Florida RNC member Paul Senft Jr., told the Tallahassee Democrat newspaper: "With some people, the issue of amnesty is a litmus test and anything short of a concentration camp is amnesty."

A Virginia-based group, English First, has created a Web site, StopMartinez.com, that declares the senator from Florida is: "Wrong on English. Wrong on Amnesty. Wrong for the Republican National Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0118428

Mr. Norcross plans to introduce a motion at the meeting tomorrow to create the position of national chairman. He says the RNC's rules adopted at the 2004 national convention allow for the creation of such a position and for it to be filled by a nonmember. Mr. Martinez's opponents point out that he is not an RNC member.

Mr. Norcross and other RNC leaders scheduled a 10 p.m. strategy session yesterday to deal with the rebellion. At least one rebel faction scheduled its own strategy session last night.

Some members oppose in principle the creation of the general chairmanship, to be filled by the president's handpicked choice. They say the national committee, whose members are elected by party activists in each state and territory, should be led by an elected member.

Some conservatives say the Martinez move will impede RNC fundraising and make electing a Republican president and restoring the party's dominance of Congress all the more difficult next year.

"It is hard to motivate voters who are angry and who feel betrayed. He is simply the wrong choice at the wrong time," Mrs. McNamara said.

The Texas committee member recalled that in November, "speculation was swirling about the possible nomination of [former Maryland Lt. Gov.] Michael Steele" as RNC chairman, and said that "excitement began to build at the prospect of a new face to lead the RNC."

"Unfortunately, White House political strategist Karl Rove had other ideas. He announced Martinez as the president's choice for RNC chair, crushing the hope of millions of Republican grass-roots activists," Mrs. McNamara said.

Although many Texas Republicans had urged her to support Mr. Steele, she said, "I had three times as many calls asking me to oppose Senator Martinez."

Democrats Seeking To Drive Stem Cell Wedge In Minn., N.H. (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 18, 2007

In 2006, two Republican House members with tough races ahead changed their views to favor an embryonic stem cell research bill.

With the same bill having already passed the House in the 110th Congress, embryonic stem cell advocates are hoping for more converts, and many see the heaviest pressure likely to land squarely on the shoulders of two swing-state senators up in 2008 — Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and John Sununu (R-N.H.).

Democrats are already trying to drive a wedge into Coleman's and Sununu's reelection bids, hoping it could hurt them as it was supposed to have hurt former Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) in November. But experts are divided about the issue's impact.

Talent's narrow November loss occurred alongside the narrow passage of a statewide embryonic stem cell initiative that he opposed.

The bill, which would allow federal funding to be used for embryonic stem cell research and would override President Bush's limits, could come to a vote in the Senate next month. It passed both chambers last cycle but was vetoed by Bush.

Coleman will again vote against the measure, as it currently stands, his office said. Sununu's office did not return numerous calls seeking comment.

In most polls, a majority of Americans support federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The bill has received solid majorities in both chambers but has fallen short of a veto-proof majority in either.

The 2006 election added three pro-embryonic votes to the 63 already there, meaning one convert would likely give the bill a veto-proof Senate.

After last week's 253-174 vote, the House is still 37 votes shy of the two-thirds majority needed. But attaining the goal in the Senate would represent concrete progress and an important symbolic goal for embryonic backers and patient groups, and they are in turn focusing their efforts on those seen as the most likely defectors.

"They're going to go after people in tough races; they're going to go after anybody who's new," said Gail Pressberg, a senior fellow at the Civil Society Institute and co-author of a book on stem cell politics. "I think it's a strong wedge issue in which the Republicans have a lot to lose."

Coleman's recent turn against the Iraq war and a past marked by shifting politics — he switched from Democrat to Republican when he was mayor of St. Paul — have Democrats predicting he might switch on the stem cell issue.

During the 2004 Democratic National Convention, Coleman led the Republican "truth squad," which criticized Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) for his "flip-flops" on the Iraq war and other matters.

Sununu's state experienced about as big of a political overhaul as any in the nation in November, and he remains one of few anti-embryonic votes in the Northeast. Challengers have already begun to line up to face him.

DOJ_NMG_0118429

The two of them, along with Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), were recently cited by Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) as the three most vulnerable Republicans up in 2008. Allard announced Monday that he wouldn't run for a third term.

All three come from swing states that trended blue in November. Both of New Hampshire's Republican House members lost, and Democrat Amy Klobuchar soundly beat Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 58-38 for Minnesota's other Senate seat.

The Democratic parties in Minnesota and New Hampshire wasted little time setting up Coleman and Sununu for their potential "flip-flops," issuing nearly identically worded statements.

Minnesota Democrats keyed on Coleman's Iraq conversion. A longtime backer of Bush on the war, Coleman came out against the 21,000-troop surge last week, taking a similar tack to fellow 2008 candidates Sens. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

"Now that [Coleman has] been recognized nationally as one of the most vulnerable Republicans of 2008, we can expect him to keep chasing the spotlight," Minnesota Democratic Party Chairman Brian Melendez said. "Maybe he thinks no one will notice he switched parties — again."

Coleman is also against changing the Medicare drug benefit to allow the government to negotiate drug prices. He missed the vote on a negotiation measure in the last Congress, but recently told The Hill he will vote against the politically popular bill this year.

Coleman continues to emphasize a compromise on the stem cell issue.

"Sen. Coleman has consistently been seeking ways to advance stem cell research without using federal dollars for the destruction of embryos," press secretary LeRoy Coleman (no relation) said. "He believes a solution can be found that is consistent with the protection of the unborn, while offering funding for scientific research for those living with the hope of a cure."

New Hampshire Democrats noted that Sununu's "no" vote last year came even as the state's two Republican House members voted to override Bush's veto.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) also voted for the bill.

"Now that the Democratic Congress has provided [the] leadership by passing this critical bill, I call on Sen. Sununu to do the right thing and join Democrats in fighting President Bush's efforts to veto this bill," New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said.

But experts aren't completely sold on embryonic stem cell research as a wedge issue. Talent said after the election that the issue probably "cost me votes in some places and got me votes in other places" and wasn't a major factor in his 50-47 loss to now-Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.).

McCaskill didn't heavily emphasize the issue on the campaign trail, but said she benefited from ads featuring actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease.

The issue likely played some role in the Missouri and Maryland Senate races, where the Fox ads ran, said Marcy Darnovsky, associate executive director of the Center for Genetics and Society. But she said it doesn't necessarily have the wedge-issue prowess the Democrats think it does.

"In Missouri, the proponents spent $30 million on it, and they squeaked by with 51-49 percent," Darnovsky said. "That's an indication that it doesn't always work" as well as research advocates and Democrats think.

Skeptics cite the issue's complexity as a main factor. Polling on embryonic stem cell research varies widely, depending on how the questions are framed.

Former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), and Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.) switched their positions in favor of the embryonic stem cell bill in 2006. Weldon lost reelection, while Reichert narrowly survived.

Groups including the Christian Coalition of America are closely monitoring the votes of House freshmen on the issue.

Rep. Boyda's Seat Top Target For Divided GOP (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 18, 2007

When newly elected National Republican Campaign Committee chief Rep. Tom Cole talks about specific seats he wants to take back in 2008, he repeatedly mentions Kansas's 2nd district.

Cole (R-Okla.) referred to the seat as one of the targets that fits the criteria for an NRCC priority in 2008. It is one of 61 seats Democrats hold that voted for President Bush in 2004, and the Democrat who won it in the midterms did so with less than 55 percent of the vote.

That Democrat, Rep. Nancy Boyda (D), may have just been sworn in, but Republicans from Washington to Topeka are marking her name with a big, red bulls-eye.

DOJ_NMG_0118430

"I certainly expect this to be one of their top-targeted races," Boyda said. "I didn't get into this thinking this would be a cakewalk."

Boyda defeated then-Rep. Jim Ryun with 51 percent of the vote in a year that saw Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, running with a candidate for lieutenant governor who earlier in the year had defected from the Republican Party, win reelection with 57 percent.

Cole said 2006 was an anomaly in Kansas politics, an arena in which he has worked in the past.

"I'm right next door to Kansas and [I've] done a lot of political activity over there in another lifetime, and I can tell you that for the first time in all the years we've been up there, the legislative ballot in Kansas was generically Democrat," Cole said. "That's unbelievable. So, they're probably not going to get another year like that."

But if 2006 was a bad year for Republicans nationwide, in Kansas the party split in half like the Titanic: Both sides sank.

In a state long regarded as a bastion of conservative politics — President Bush won the 2nd district with 59 percent of the vote in 2004 — the GOP witnessed numerous defections to the Democratic Party, and a rift between the conservative and moderate wings of the party resulted in Democratic victories in traditional Republican strongholds.

The executive director of the state Democratic Party, Mike Gaughan, said as long as a faction of the Kansas GOP continues to focus solely on social issues such as abortion, candidates viewed as moderates, like Boyda, would reap the benefits.

"Certainly, there's an element in the Republican Party that's more interested in purging themselves than common-sense solutions for Kansas families," Gaughan said.

Outgoing state GOP chairman Tim Shallenburger, conceding his tenure as chairman has been rocky at best, said that rift, combined with a poisoned national environment, was at the root of the GOP's ills last year.

Phill Kline, a former state attorney general known nationally for his move to subpoena the records of state abortion clinics, drew a lot fire from moderate and independent voters, Shallenburger said.

Kline, who was defeated by another Republican defector, Paul Morrison, was on the list of names Shallenburger identified as potential challengers to Boyda, perhaps running as the standard-bearer for the conservative faction of the party. Kline, who doesn't currently live in the district, did not return phone calls for comment.

"Unfortunately, the conservatives can't seem to elect anybody," Shallenburger said, adding that because of the rift he is anticipating a primary. "They can get them through primaries, but they can't get them through generals."

Shallenburger said a list of serious candidates should come to light after the state GOP's Kansas Day convention later this month. Right now, Shallenburger, who isn't running for reelection, said possible candidates include former state House Speaker Doug Mays, Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh and state Treasurer Lynn Jenkins. Boyda said she anticipated Ryun might want a rematch.

Shallenburger, a former gubernatorial candidate in his own right (Cole served as his pollster), said he would be willing to discuss a possible run with the NRCC chairman, but right now he isn't leaning toward a run.

Both Cole and Shallenburger said that while 2006 was a bad year for them because of an unfavorable national environment and party turmoil, 2008 will be different because a presidential election year will allow for GOP healing and unity.

"You know, Kansas hasn't gone through some road to Damascus and morphed into a liberal state," Cole said. "Next election cycle, the Republican presidential nominee, I'm willing to bet today, without knowing who it is or who the Democrats will have, will carry Kansas.

"You want to bet who's going to win Kansas-02 in the presidential race? I've got a pretty good idea. I'm willing to make that prediction today."

Shallenburger added that regardless of whom Republicans pick, state Republicans will unify in their dislike of the Democratic candidate. That, combined with county commissioner races, will drive turnout and grassroots efforts.

"I think a presidential election gives us common ground," Shallenburger said. "If it's [Sen. Hillary Rodham] Clinton (D-N.Y.) or [Sen. Barack] Obama (D-Ill.), I can't imagine that either of those two would gain much Republican support."

But Shallenburger said that because Democrats already have proven they can win in the Republican district, much of the Republican strategy will depend on Boyda's voting record.

Boyda might have given those aiming for her seat some early ammunition by voting for the House stem cell research bill last week.

But Boyda insists the often acidic ideological tones have subsided a great deal since her first congressional run in 2004, and though some voters might disagree with her on social issues like stem cell research, she said most will come to see her overall goal is to brighten the future for the district.

"I intend to just do my job," she said. "It's that simple."

DOJ_NMG_0118431

No Challenger Yet For Vulnerable Landrieu (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

Because Republicans must defend almost twice as many seats, the 2008 Senate landscape appears to favor Democrats. Nonetheless, Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) might be the most vulnerable incumbent this cycle.

Democrats won control of the Senate last November, in part, by flipping seats in not-necessarily Democratic territory. But that likely will be of little comfort to Landrieu, especially in a presidential election year.

In the 2004 cycle alone, Democrats lost five open-Senate seats in the South — including one in Louisiana.

Factor in Landrieu's narrow 2002 re-election — in which she received 52 percent of the vote — and the population loss in her stronghold of New Orleans, and the scion of one of the Pelican State's best known political families faces unfavorable odds.

"She's always just seemed vulnerable; she's moved as much to the right as she could and still be a Democrat in Washington but there's still the thought in many parts of Louisiana that she's too liberal," said John Maginnis, who pens a weekly newsletter on Louisiana politics. "She's always had close elections and there's no reason to think it wouldn't be another close election."

One knowledgeable Democratic strategist, who did not want to be named, agreed.

"Democrats win in Louisiana by about 5,000 votes and we lost 200,000 people; and most of the people were Democrats," the strategist said. "New Orleans is half the size it used to be."

Landrieu owes her 2002 re-election to the wide margin of victory she racked up in the Big Easy. If the huge number of voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina never return, Democrats will be at a fundamental disadvantage, the source added.

Despite such dire predictions, and Republicans' desire to make her their top target, no Republican has stepped up to challenge Landrieu this early in the cycle.

Longtime Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) took his name out of the mix this week, saying Tuesday that he would not run for Senate.

"We don't know who might run in 2008," said McCrery, who just signed on to be Congressional liaison for the presidential campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R). "My guess is there will be competition for the Senate seat in Louisiana."

Other GOP names being bandied about are Rep. Richard Baker, Louisiana Secretary of State Jay Dardenne and state Sen. Walter Boasso.

Boasso told Roll Call that he has no interest in running for the Senate but is contemplating a gubernatorial bid.

Additionally, speculation runs rampant that state Treasurer John Kennedy (D) will switch parties and take Landrieu on as a Republican.

Kennedy ran for the Senate in 2004, finishing third in the all-party primary despite pressure from Democratic leaders that he bow out in favor of then-Rep. Chris John (D-La.).

GOP Reps. Charles Boustany and Bobby Jindal also have been mentioned as Landrieu challengers, but some political watchers think Boustany, who was just elected to a second term, is too green. Jindal is almost certain to run for governor this year.

A recent survey showed him holding a 24-point lead over Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D), whose reputation resembles New Orleans' levies as a result of Katrina. Blanco defeated Jindal by 4 points in 2003, and if she loses this November, that could also be a troubling sign for Landrieu.

The Democratic strategist conceded that all of the potential Republican candidates could be formidable, though the source dismissed the notion that Kennedy could prevent Landrieu from winning a third term.

"If the treasurer does switch parties and does try to run as a Republican, Mary can beat him; that's a mistake," the strategist said.

Maginnis said Dardenne looks like the strongest option.

"A lot of people think he has the right stuff," Maginnis said, noting that he would not have to relinquish his current office to seek the Senate.

Dardenne, a former state legislator, also is the only Republican under discussion who has won statewide office.

Also working against Landrieu is the unsuccessful campaign of her brother, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D), who failed to dislodge embattled New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin during the city's racially tinged runoff election last year.

That "tarnishes the name," the Democratic strategist said.

A Landrieu aide said the Senator's office did not want to comment about 2008, other than to confirm that she does plan to seek re-election.

DOJ_NMG_0118432

One bright spot for Landrieu is the elimination of Louisiana's blanket primary for federal elections. Prior to 2008, all candidates for a particular office, regardless of party, appeared on one primary ballot. If no one exceeded 50 percent, the top two vote-getters — regardless of party — then went on to a runoff election.

Given the large number of candidates for major offices, incumbents frequently failed to garner 50 percent of the primary vote.

No Democrat of stature is expected to challenge Landrieu, allowing her to focus solely on the general election. The Democratic strategist said there is "no question" that will help Landrieu, especially if multiple Republican candidates have to slug it out for the nomination.

McCrery said it is impossible to know now who it will help.

"It could make it more difficult for her or it could make it more difficult for the Republicans," he said. "It's hard to tell."

Why Georgia May Not Be On Democrats' Minds (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 18, 2007

A couple of days after the midterm elections, I checked out the Senate class of 2008 and noticed that Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) is on the list. I wondered, could Democrats, who held both of Georgia's Senate seats and the state's governorship as recently as 1990, knock off Chambliss?

The wise answer is that it may be possible, but at this point it's unlikely. The better answer may well be a resounding, "Are you nuts?"

While 49 states seemed to move toward the Democratic Party in November's elections, Georgia, the state that gave the nation Jimmy Carter, Martin Luther King Jr. and Jackie Robinson, continued its shift toward the GOP. In fact, Georgia was the only state in the nation where Republicans significantly improved their standing in the 2006 midterms.

Republicans retained their 34-22 majority in the state Senate and gained two more seats in the Georgia House, making Georgia one of the rare states where Democrats did not make state legislative gains. In addition, Republicans re-elected their governor handily and gained two statewide offices — lieutenant governor and secretary of state — that previously had been held by Democrats.

At the Congressional level, state Republicans held on to all of the seven seats that they had going into the midterms, and they came within a hair of picking up another district or two. Given what happened nationally, that was a notable result. In fact, Georgia was the only state with at least two Congressional districts where Republicans had more opportunities for House takeovers — Rep. Jim Marshall's 8th district and Rep. John Barrow's 12th district — than Democrats did.

Georgia was not one of the earliest Southern states to move away from the Democratic Party. South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and a number of other former states of the Confederacy moved to the Republican Party well before Georgia did, in part because Carter's two presidential races kept Peach State Democrats loyal to their party.

But over the past six years, Georgia has been making up for lost time, moving toward the GOP column more vigorously than virtually any other state in the nation. As respected University of Georgia political science professor Charles S. Bullock III noted in a column of the online newsletter InsiderAdvantageGeorgia, Georgia has more white evangelicals, more Republicans and a higher percentage of Iraq War supporters than the country as a whole.

Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) clobbered the state's sitting lieutenant governor, Democrat Mark Taylor, by almost 20 points, and Republican Casey Cagle, who won a bitter primary over Ralph Reed, won the open lieutenant governor's office by almost a dozen points.

Yes, Democrats still hold three statewide offices — attorney general, state labor commissioner and agriculture commissioner — but all three of those Democrats have served for years, and state Attorney General Thurbert Baker, an African-American, isn't exactly a liberal activist. He won an award last year from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for his work on legal reform and for his efforts to "broaden cooperation" between the business community and state attorneys general.

In recent years, a Democratic governor, Roy Barnes, and a Democratic Senator, Max Cleland, were ousted from office, even though both incumbents were at one time portrayed as invincible. And defeated gubernatorial hopeful Taylor was just the kind of Democratic good old boy who once easily won elections in Georgia.

The only high-profile Democrat who might have been able to carry the state recently was former Sen. Zell Miller (D), who not only voted more like a Republican than a Democrat but who actually gave the keynote address at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

More than anything else, the national political environment has defined Georgia Democrats, and that has strengthened the Republicans' hand.

DOJ_NMG_0118433

So far, the only name circulating as a possible challenger to Chambliss is DeKalb County CEO Vernon Jones. But whatever Jones' personal qualifications and appeal (I have not met him), it is very difficult to imagine a young, Democratic, African-American officeholder from Atlanta with some personal and legal baggage winning a Senate race next year — even one who has admitted voting for President Bush in 2004.

While 2006 was a bad year for Republicans almost everywhere, it was "less bad" in the South. The region is likely to be the GOP's strongest area in 2008, and the presidential election guarantees that the two parties' national images will be in the spotlight, making it difficult for Senate candidates to run purely "local" races.

None of this means that Saxby Chambliss is invulnerable in 2008. But it does mean that Democrats are likely to have far better Senate opportunities elsewhere than they will in increasingly Republican Georgia.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Obama's Past Offers Ammo For Critics (AP)

By Ryan Keith, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama may have a lot of explaining to do.

He voted against requiring medical care for aborted fetuses who survive. He supported allowing retired police officers to carry concealed weapons, but opposed allowing people to use banned handguns to defend against intruders in their homes. And the list of sensitive topics goes on.

With only a slim, two-year record in the U.S. Senate, Obama doesn't have many controversial congressional votes which political opponents can frame into attack ads. But his eight years as an Illinois state senator are sprinkled with potentially explosive land mines, such as his abortion and gun control votes.

Obama — who filed papers this week creating an exploratory committee to seek the 2008 Democratic nomination — may also find himself fielding questions about his actions outside public office, from his acknowledgment of cocaine use in his youth to a more recent land purchase from a political supporter who is facing charges in an unrelated kickback scheme involving investment firms seeking state business.

Obama was known in the Illinois Capitol as a consistently liberal senator who reflected the views of voters in his Chicago district. He helped reform the state death penalty system and create tax breaks for the poor while developing a reputation as someone who would work with critics to build consensus.

He had a 100 percent rating from the Illinois Planned Parenthood Council for his support of abortion rights, family planning services and health insurance coverage for female contraceptives.

One vote that especially riled abortion opponents involved restrictions on a type of abortion where the fetus sometimes survives, occasionally for hours. The restrictions, which never became law, included requiring the presence of a second doctor to care for the fetus.

"Everyone's going to use this and pound him over the head with it," said Daniel McConchie, vice president and chief of staff for Americans United for Life.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said voters will be able to judge distorted accounts of his votes against his legislative career in general.

"I don't doubt that if you take a series of votes and twist them and kind of squint, you can write a narrative the way you want to write it," Gibbs said. "I think what people understand is that (what matters) is taking the full measure of his career and the full measure of his legislative efforts."

Abortion opponents see Obama's vote on medical care for aborted fetuses as a refusal to protect the helpless. Some have even accused him of supporting infanticide.

Obama — who joined several other Democrats in voting "present" in 2001 and "no" the next year — argued the legislation was worded in a way that unconstitutionally threatened a woman's right to abortion by defining the fetus as a child.

"It would essentially bar abortions because the equal protection clause does not allow somebody to kill a child, and if this was a child then this would be an anti-abortion statute," Obama said in the Senate's debate in March 2001.

During his 2004 run for U.S. Senate, Obama said he supported similar federal legislation that included language clarifying that the measure did not interfere with abortion rights.

Such hot-button issues were the exception in a legislative career that focused more on building consensus to improve the justice system and aid the poor.

Gibbs noted Obama's leadership on legislation requiring police to videotape interrogations in murder cases. It started out as a controversial idea but ended up passing the Senate unanimously.

DOJ_NMG_0118434

Allies and opponents alike say he listened to those who disagreed, cooperated with Republicans and incorporated other people's suggestions for improving legislation.

"He was looked upon by members of both parties as someone whose view we listened carefully to," said Republican state Sen. Kirk Dillard from Hinsdale, Ill.

Obama regularly supported gun-control measures, including a ban on semiautomatic "assault weapons" and a limit on handgun purchases to one a month.

He also opposed letting people use a self-defense argument if charged with violating local handgun bans by using weapons in their homes. The bill was a reaction to a Chicago-area man who, after shooting an intruder, was charged with a handgun violation.

Supporters framed the issue as a fundamental question of whether homeowners have the right to protect themselves.

Obama joined several Chicago Democrats who argued the measure could open loopholes letting gun owners use their weapons on the street. They said local governments should have the final say, but the self-defense exception passed 41-16 and ultimately became state law.

"It's bad politics to be on the wrong side of the Second Amendment come election time," said Wayne LaPierre, executive vice president of the National Rifle Association. "It will certainly be talked about. You can take that to the bank."

On the other hand, Obama parted company with gun control advocates when he backed a measure to let retired police officers and military police carry concealed weapons.

Obama occasionally supported higher taxes, joining other Democrats in pushing to raise more than 300 taxes and fees on businesses in 2004 to help solve a budget deficit. The increases passed the Senate 30-28.

That's one reason Illinois business groups gave Obama a low rating, while labor groups praised him. But even Obama's allies say he refused to become a rubber stamp for their legislation.

"He always wants to understand an issue and think it through," said Roberta Lynch, deputy director for Council 31 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "You have to make your case no matter who you are."

For six years, Obama served in a Republican-controlled Senate, so he and fellow Democrats only got a fraction of their bills signed into law.

During his last two years, Democrats controlled the chamber and he was the go-to guy on a variety of issues. He helped pass legislation overhauling Illinois' troubled capital punishment system and was a key figure in requiring a massive statewide study of traffic stops to look for signs of racial profiling. Although police groups opposed the legislation, they say Obama listened to their concerns and accepted some of their suggestions to improve the bill.

Even when he was in the political minority, Obama sometimes played a critical role. He helped write one of the rare ethics laws in a state known for government corruption and worked on welfare reform with Republicans.

He sponsored legislation to bar job and housing discrimination against gays, and he helped create a state version of the earned income tax credit for the poor. Obama also led efforts to reject federal rules that would have put workers' overtime checks in jeopardy.

A Look At Obama's Record In Illinois (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 18, 2007

Some of the key issues U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, an Illinois Democrat poised to a run for president, sponsored or voted on during his eight years as a state senator:

BUDGET & TAXES

· Voted to raise the minimum wage in Illinois from $5.15 an hour to $6.50 an hour over two years. (2003)

· Helped pass a 5 percent earned-income tax credit for low-income working families in 2000; made the credit permanent in 2003.

· Voted to end $300 million worth of tax breaks for businesses. (2004)

· Voted against making permanent the repeal of the state's 5 percent sales tax on gasoline. (2000)

HEALTH CARE

· Voted for having Illinois endorse embryonic stem cell research. (2004)

· Successfully sponsored the Health Care Justice Act, a study of ways to implement a universal health care system statewide. (2004)

· Voted against restrictions on public funding of abortion. (2000)

· Successfully co-sponsored a prescription drug discount buying club program for seniors and the disabled. (2003)

CRIME & GUN CONTROL

DOJ_NMG_0118435

· Voted against letting people argue self-defense in court if charged with violating local weapons bans by using a gun in their home. (2004)

· Voted to let retired police and military police carry concealed weapons. (2004)

· Successfully sponsored requirement that law enforcement videotape interrogations of suspects in some serious crimes. (2003)

· Successfully sponsored law enforcement study of the race of people pulled over for traffic tickets. (2003)

· Helped pass an overhaul of the state's troubled death penalty system. (2003)

· Unsuccessfully sponsored measure to expunge some criminal records and create an employment grant program for ex-criminals. (2002)

· Unsuccessfully sponsored limit of one handgun purchase per month. (2000)

· Voted against making gang members eligible for the death penalty if they kill someone to help their gang. (2001)

MISCELLANEOUS

· Unsuccessfully co-sponsored ban on discrimination based on sexual orientation. The measure became law after Obama was elected to the U.S. Senate. (2003)

· Successfully sponsored move to shield Illinois workers from federal rules that threatened overtime pay for some employees.

· Successfully co-sponsored major ethics reform called the Gift Ban Act. (1998)

· Voted against giving tax credits to parents who send their children to private school. (1999)

___

On the Net:

Illinois General Assembly Web site: http://www.ilga.gov

As The Skeptics Ask Why, Obama Asks Why Not? (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 — There is always, it seems, a fresh new face breezing into a presidential race, offering himself as the person to change the tone, eliminate the vitriol and transform the old ways of politics.

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois is auditioning for that role in the 2008 campaign. He said so himself, leaping into the Democratic contest this week on a promise to "advance the cause of change and progress that we so desperately need."

A long line of Democrats, Republicans and independents have gone before him, casting themselves as the sparkling candidate of the new politics only to find that their freshness withers well before the balloting begins. Think John Anderson, Gary Hart, Ross Perot.

How can Mr. Obama avoid a similar fate?

"Novelty alone is not a criteria for success, nor should it be," he said in an interview on Wednesday as he walked through the hallways of the Senate. "I do think there are moments in American history where there are opportunities to change the language of politics or set the country's sights in a different place, and I think we're in one of those moments."

Then, after pausing for a moment, he added: "Whether I'm the person to help move that forward or somebody else is, is not for me to determine."

One day after opening his presidential exploratory committee, a procedural move that created an extraordinary tide of publicity, Mr. Obama returned to work in the Senate. It was the first reminder that even though he bills himself as a man intent on reforming Washington, he still has to report to his day job. In Washington.

And that point alone distinguished Mr. Obama from recent presidential hopefuls who presented themselves as not-from-Washington candidates. Four years ago, for example, Howard Dean returned to the governor's office in Vermont after his initial foray into the race, and instantly began railing against his rivals stuck in the nation's capital.

The biography and charisma of Mr. Obama, 45, have catapulted him into early prominence and set him apart from the parade of former presidential hopefuls like Mr. Dean, Mr. Perot, Jerry Brown and others who have challenged the status quo. But like them, he aspires to tap into a similar grass-roots following even as he gains endorsements from the party's traditional kingmakers.

"There has been more smoke blown in his direction than anyone in his lifetime, but that's not why he's running," said former Senator Bob Kerrey, Democrat of Nebraska, who has talked to Mr. Obama in recent weeks. "He's not lost his reasons for doing this. He realizes that it's his time."

DOJ_NMG_0118436

During his two years in the Senate, Mr. Obama has sought to build a reputation for occasionally stepping across party boundaries. And in his announcement on Tuesday, he did not so much as utter the word “Democrat,” perhaps signaling a desire to expand his appeal.

But Mr. Kerrey, who unsuccessfully ran for president in 1992, said he was not sure today’s political climate would afford candidates that much leeway, particularly in a cutthroat primary aimed at the Democratic Party’s most loyal base.

“The technique of applause lines are such that you are encouraged to say things that are a bit divisive,” said Mr. Kerrey, who is not yet aligned with any of the candidates. “If it’s a Democratic audience, they aren’t going to give you a round of applause if you say the Republicans are pretty good people.”

Indeed, Mr. Obama intends to frame his candidacy around a story from long ago. By formally declaring his candidacy on Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill., in the shadow of Abraham Lincoln’s home, Mr. Obama will strive to make the point that America’s 16th president did not have much government experience either, but led the nation through one of its most trying times.

“Just because something is new doesn’t necessarily mean that it’s right,” Mr. Obama said in an interview. “And just because something is old doesn’t mean it’s wrong.”

Still, an early test of his candidacy could come as candidates try to distinguish themselves and emerge from a field of up to 10 contenders during a series of presidential debates that are scheduled to begin by April. That is when an appealing biography gives way to questions about whether a candidate is actually prepared to govern.

Who, after all, could forget the moment in the 1984 primary when Walter Mondale ridiculed the candidacy of his rival, Mr. Hart, a Colorado senator who was running as an outsider on a message of hope, pragmatism and youth.

In a televised debate, Mr. Mondale declared, “When I hear your new ideas, I’m reminded of that ad, ‘Where’s the beef?’ ”

Reporters Swarm Obama After Announcement (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

A photographer or two on the beach in Hawaii is nothing compared to the Capitol Hill swarm that greeted the newest presidential hopeful — Sen. Barack Obama.

Emerging from a lunch with colleagues Wednesday, reporters pressed the Illinois Democrat, who gave away little about his budding campaign. His appearance at a routine committee hearing drew every camera in the room, while the more senior senators who are thinking of running were ignored.

"Is there something rare at this table among competitors?" a smiling Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., remarked as he sat with Obama on his left and two other potential 2008 candidates — Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Biden of Delaware — on his right.

After months of hype, the freshman senator jumped into the White House race Tuesday by forming a presidential exploratory committee and disclosing that an official announcement would come Feb. 10. Obama got in the race despite saying a day earlier that he was concerned to find a photographer "lurking in the bushes" when he was on vacation in Hawaii with his family last month.

Obama avoided media appearances Tuesday when he announced his decision on his Web site. Reporters found him Wednesday as he walked into the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to the rat-a-tat-tat of camera clicks.

Biden, the committee chairman, could have been accused of trying to undercut his rivals. He forgot to call on Kerry and moved to cut off Obama when his allotted time was up.

"Mr. Chairman, how am I doing on time?" Obama asked as he wrapped up. Biden and Kerry had been whispering and laughing at a private joke while Obama questioned the panel of experts promoting a diplomatic strategy in Iraq.

"Eight seconds," Biden replied.

"I have eight seconds? That's enough to get one question in," Obama said.

But as he started to talk, Biden cut him off. "You're out of time, but go for it," Biden said with a wave of his hand.

"That was a quick second!" Obama protested, and continued with his question as senators are wont to do.

Biden gave Kerry his time after Nelson pointed out that the 2004 presidential nominee was being skipped over. Biden said he'd been out of the room on a phone call and lost track.

Shortly thereafter, most of the media left the room, too, on the heels of Obama.

The media reassembled — and grew in ranks — outside the weekly Democratic caucus lunch in the Capitol. Reporters surrounded Obama as he tried to leave, and he was asked how he plans to be a father while running for president.

"I always care about my kids," Obama said, stepping onto an elevator but unable to escape a the persistent reporter's follow-up question with her colleagues blocking the doors.

DOJ_NMG_0118437

How are you going to be a father to your kids running for president? "Well, these are all considerations that I'm taking into account as I make my decisions about moving forward," he said, drawing farther into the elevator and away from outstretched arms jostling tape recorders.

Another reporter asked for Obama's reaction to a proposal by likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., to cap the number of troops in Iraq. He didn't directly answer, but only said there are many proposals that Democrats are considering as they try to reverse President Bush's troop increase.

Asked if he will offer his own idea, Obama said cryptically, "That will be coming soon."

Finally, another elevator offered an escape — at least for the day.

___

On the Net:

http://www.barackobama.com

Obama Thrills Blacks Who See Shot At History (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — The first black presidential candidate with a real shot at the White House is generating excitement and early support among blacks who see a chance to help make history.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama is all but certain to compete for the Democratic nomination and win a large share of black votes. That creates challenges for New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and other hopefuls.

Obama is by no means the first black candidate for president. Other contenders have included Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton.

Roger Wilkins, a race and politics expert at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va., calls him the first "truly serious" prospect. "This guy is not a civil rights leader who comes to politics or a preacher who comes to politics," Wilkins says. "He is a bona fide lawyer-politician. I've heard black people say 'I'm going to help this guy' — you don't want to be standing around when the first guy who has a real chance to be president is running."

Bill Clinton bonded so tightly with black voters that author Toni Morrison once called him "the first black president." That legacy and her own work have made Hillary Clinton popular among blacks. Clinton was favored by 39% of black Democrats and independents in combined USA TODAY/Gallup Polls conducted in November, December and this month; 31% chose Obama. The margin of error was +/—8 percentage points.

Obama has room to improve; one-third of all those polled in December, regardless of race or party, said they had never heard of him, and 14% said they had no opinion. Comparable ratings for Clinton in November were 53% favorable, 42% unfavorable and 5% no opinion.

Obama partisans and some other observers say they expect him to become more popular among blacks and other voters when his official campaign gets rolling. He plans a formal announcement Feb. 10.

"I would expect him in most places to get the majority of the black votes" in primaries, says David Bositis, an expert on black voting behavior at the Joint Center for Economic and Political Studies.

Minyon Moore, a longtime Clinton friend who was political director in the Clinton White House, says it is way too early to talk about "a wholesale giveaway" of black votes to one candidate or another. She says black voters have grown sophisticated as a result of past campaigns by black hopefuls.

"We can make wise choices of who will work for our best interests regardless of color," she said. "It's not like African-Americans are breaking ground anymore."

Some, such as Wilkins and Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., argue that Obama is breaking ground in his broad-based appeal across racial and demographic lines. Other pluses: his level of political talent and his breadth of experience, from community organizing to Harvard Law Review to representing poor black constituents in the Illinois Senate and a diverse state in the U.S. Senate. They also cite his potential as a role model for black families.

"If Barack Obama is elected president of the United States, it will be possible to say to your children, this is what is attainable. You can be anything you want to in this country," Davis says.

Black voters don't figure largely in the nomination race until early February 2008. The competition moves at that point to South Carolina and Alabama, two states in which nearly half of Democratic primary voters are black.

"There is no question in my mind that Sen. Obama will get the lion's share of that vote," says Davis, a Harvard Law School classmate already pledged to Obama.

DOJ_NMG_0118438

Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., said Obama's presence in his state will make it "very difficult" for Clinton and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, who was born in South Carolina and won its primary in 2004. But he said the black vote is not monolithic and ultimately black people will vote based on candidates' records and proposals.

Clinton is well positioned in that respect, both from her own work and her husband's, analysts say.

Beyond Bill Clinton's emotional ties to blacks, "he put into place policies that worked very favorably for African-Americans," Bositis says. One example: economic polices that helped black household income rise $5,000 in Clinton's second term as president.

Hillary Clinton has dealt with issues "of great importance to black people, such as creating a world in which poor children can flourish," Wilkins says. Still, he adds, "it's a chunk of support that they're going to have to fight like hell to keep. Hillary is not Bill. This election is not about putting Bill Clinton back in the Oval Office."

He's In (WP)

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

NO MATTER what your political leanings are, you're likely to feel at least a twinge of excitement about Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's decision to compete for the Democratic presidential nomination. At a minimum, Mr. Obama's entry guarantees a fascinating political season. A nomination that once looked like New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's for the taking now appears to be much more of a jump ball, with a gratifyingly crowded field that includes fellow senators Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.); the 2004 vice presidential nominee, former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

Mr. Obama, 45, presents himself as part of a new generation and a new brand of politician. It's not just that he's the son of a Kenyan father and a Kansan mother, a Midwesterner who spent part of his childhood in an Indonesian village. It's that he promises to transcend the boundaries of what many voters see as the tired racial and party politics of the past. The excitement about Mr. Obama speaks in part to Americans' desire to believe, whether true or not, that this country has come to a point when it can rise above its ugly history of racism; and in part to the desire to believe that, if it could just overcome the divisions that foul modern politics, the nation could get unstuck on many fronts. As Mr. Obama said this week, "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

That's a fair if unsurprising diagnosis, and Mr. Obama's speeches and books leave no doubt that he grasps the complexities of the problems America faces. Mr. Obama has demonstrated the ability to see all sides of any issue; his willingness to try to understand rather than to dismiss the arguments of the other side is admirable. Less proven is his capacity to choose wisely from among competing imperatives -- he's had a scant two years in the Senate -- or his ability to withstand the unrelenting scrutiny of a presidential race. This is, after all, a man who didn't face a single negative ad during his Senate campaign.

"I am new enough on the national political scene that I serve as a blank screen on which people of vastly different political stripes project their own views," Mr. Obama wrote in his book "The Audacity of Hope." As he begins to fill in the blanks -- and as his opponents try to sketch in their own version -- Mr. Obama knows he's "bound to disappoint" some voters. But given his talent, and the depth of the growing field of candidates, it may not be too much to hope for a more thoughtful, less scripted debate than usual.

The Democratic Field (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Illinois Senator Barack Obama's announcement this week that he's likely to enter the Presidential race adds a dash of glamour and excitement to the Democratic field. But all of his media attention doesn't change the basic truth of the 2008 primary contest: The race is between Hillary Rodham Clinton and everybody else.

New York's junior Senator hasn't announced yet, but her troops have long been massing, ready to march on her orders. And what a political machine it is, starting with her husband, who has made it clear he is aching for her to run. Psychoanalyzing the Clintons is perilous, but we suspect the former President doesn't like the way his years in office ended, with impeachment, the Marc Rich pardon and Al Gore's failure to deliver a third symbolic term. A victory for his wife would be a kind of political redemption for him too.

Mrs. Clinton brings her own considerable strengths, not least intelligence and self-discipline. She has performed far more smoothly in the Senate than many observers expected, and she hasn't been a polarizing figure in New York (winning 67% of the vote in November).

Then there are those Clinton legions -- of fund-raisers, union chiefs, party bosses, think tank operatives, media consultants. Mrs. Clinton blew through more than $30 million during her all but uncontested Senate re-election campaign, and she will have little trouble raising another $100 million or more. Longtime aide Harold Ickes -- famous for his silent depositions in Clinton II -- is the seasoned hand on money matters and he'll also bring on Big Labor. Meanwhile, former White House chief of staff John Podesta has set up the Center for American Progress, from which she can poach left-leaning policy ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0118439

From her national perch on the Armed Services Committee, Mrs. Clinton has so far also walked a remarkable tightrope on the Iraq war, only recently coming out for some sort of "cap" on the number of troops. A major story over the coming year will be whether she can resist the defeatist tug of her party's antiwar left as she tries to win the Democratic nomination.

Which brings up her biggest liability -- the fear in many Democratic hearts that she's not "electable." Mrs. Clinton carries much of the scandal baggage of her husband's tenure without much of his political charisma. If one potential Democratic theme is to run against the "divisive" Bush Republicans, Hillary is not your ideal "uniter." Perhaps American voters won't want to hear about Arkansas, et cetera, all over again, but then is that a risk Democrats want to take?

This is where Mr. Obama comes in, bidding to be the un-Hillary. At age 45, he's already managed the remarkable feat of writing his own autobiography, literally and politically. He's applauded for saying he's proud that he did inhale, and he has the virtue of being a genuinely fresh face. But campaigns have a way of filling in a candidate's resumes in ways other than they design, including their positions on actual issues. Mr. Obama is already moving left on national security -- which is dangerous ground for a political rookie amid what the Pentagon calls "the long war" on terror.

North Carolina's John Edwards is another vigorous contender, though the erstwhile Vice Presidential candidate failed to deliver his home state to John Kerry last time around. This time he's raising the decibels on his "two Americas" campaign theme, hoping to catch some of that Hubert Humphrey political magic. If he can sell this message as a millionaire trial lawyer, he'll have earned the nomination.

The rest of the Democratic field includes two governors -- Iowa's Tom Vilsack and New Mexico's Bill Richardson -- who have solid state records, and Mr. Richardson also has foreign-policy credentials. But both will have trouble breaking through the fund-raising barriers erected by the campaign-finance limits they themselves have supported. This is a shame, because both men have something to offer. And then there is the usual gaggle of Senators -- Dodd, Biden and even Kerry -- who are running because . . . well, because that seems to be what their DNA has programmed them to do.

If we were betting on a wild card challenger, we'd look instead to Al Gore. The former Vice President has been coy about his intentions. But he might be getting a ton of free publicity for his global warming "documentary" come Oscar time, and there's little doubt he could raise money if he got in. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, there are a lot of Democrats who feel passionately about him and his near-win in 2000.

There are cycles in politics, and, after eight years of Republicans in the White House, Democrats in 2008 will have the public's normal desire for change on their side. On the other hand, they will also have to show they can be trusted on national security in a post 9/11 world, especially running against the likes of Republicans John McCain or Rudy Giuliani. Mrs. Clinton's studied middle-ground on security suggests she understands that. The main Democratic drama of the coming months will be whether her party really trusts that she and her husband have learned enough not to repeat the mistakes of the 1990s.

McCain's War Stance Alienates Many (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. John McCain's vocal support for sending more U.S. troops to Iraq has set him apart from most of the emerging crop of major presidential contenders. And that position could harm his political prospects, according to a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll.

More than one-third of those polled — 36% — said they would be "much less likely" to back the Arizona Republican for the White House because of his position. Six percent said his stand made them "somewhat less likely" to vote for him.

Only 13% said they were somewhat or much more likely to support him because of his embrace of a force escalation; 42% said it had no effect on their view of him; and 3% gave no answer to the question.

Perhaps most ominously for McCain, the survey found that his advocacy of a troop buildup could undercut what has been one of his political strengths: the ability to attract independents.

In the poll, 43% of independents said they were somewhat or much less likely to vote for him because he has backed President's Bush plan to deploy 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Among Democrats, 59% said McCain's view made them less likely to support him.

His position helped him only among his fellow Republicans, and within this group the impact was not substantial — 24% said McCain's stance made them more likely to support him, 16% said they were less likely to do so, and the rest said that it had no effect or that they did not have an opinion on the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0118440

In another sign of the soured public attitude toward the war in Iraq, opposition to the troop increase is a boost for the three leading Democrats expected to square off for their party's nomination: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Among the 1,344 adults interviewed for the poll, 34% said they were more likely to support one of these Democrats for president, knowing of their opposition to troop escalation; 18% said they were less likely to back any of them because of their stance.

Also, 38% said they were more likely to back a presidential candidate who supported a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, a position the Bush administration has adamantly opposed. Twelve percent said they were less likely to vote for a candidate favoring a specific schedule for withdrawal.

Forty-six percent said the candidate's position on a timetable would not affect their support, whereas 4% expressed no opinion.

The poll was conducted Saturday through Tuesday; for the entire sample, it has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

'Move On' Takes Aim At McCain's Iraq Stance (CQ)

By Greg Giroux

Congressional Quarterly, January 18, 2007

If more evidence was needed that the 2008 presidential campaign is hitting full stride months ahead of schedule, here it is:

The political arm of the liberal organization Moveon.org launched television advertisements Wednesday that assail Arizona Sen. John McCain, a top-tier prospect for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, over his stance on the Iraq war.

Plans for the television ad campaign were announced last week by Moveon.org Poltitical Action, a federal political action committee, and will cost an estimated $250,000. The ads are airing in television markets in Iowa and New Hampshire, which respectively will hold the first caucuses and primary of the 2008 nomination season next January. They also will appear on cable television in New York and Washington, D.C.

Specifically, the ads take McCain to task for supporting President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq. The move, long advocated by McCain, is aimed at quelling sectarian violence that is greatly destabilizing that war-torn nation and threatening to turn into an all-out civil war.

But the war in general and the troop buildup in particular are opposed by most Democratic politicians and liberal activists.

The ad describes the proposed troop buildup as "McCain's idea" and frequently pictures the Arizona senator alongside Bush, whose poor job approval ratings are attributed mainly to public opposition to the Iraq war.

"The McCain plan to escalate: going from bad to worse," a narrator intones in the ad.

The ad echoes criticism aimed at McCain — who is polling strongly among GOP hopefuls — by Democrats such as former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee. A declared candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination and avowed Iraq war opponent, Edwards has taken to referring to the administration proposal as "the McCain Doctrine."

McCain has acknowledged that his support for a troop increase in Iraq carries risks for his all-but-announced White House bid. While he has long supported beefing up the U.S. military presence in Iraq, he has said a so-called "surge" needs to be matched with a change in strategy in Iraq that would include requiring that nation's fledgling government to meet new benchmarks.

"The presence of additional coalition forces would allow the Iraqi government to do what it cannot accomplish today on its own: impose its rule throughout the country," McCain said at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Jan. 12.

McCain's campaign told the Associated Press last week — when news of the ads surfaced — that Moveon.org was an "out-of-the-mainstream organization that has a long history of airing inflammatory material."

McCain does not stand alone in the potential Republican field as a supporter of the administration's position. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who say they are exploring candidacies, also back Bush on the troop increase.

But Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who also is considering a bid, opposes increasing American troop strength in Iraq as counter-productive. And Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, an independent-minded Republican who also is considering a White House bid, has excoriated the Bush administration over the policy.

Hagel on Wednesday was one of three senators who introduced a non-binding resolution that says it is "not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0118441

Hagel sponsored the resolution along with Delaware Democrat Joseph R. Biden Jr., who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and says he is a candidate for his party's presidential nomination, and Michigan Democrat Carl Levin, who chairs the Armed Services Committee.

Biden joins other Democratic hopefuls in opposing the troop increase, which they say is tantamount to an "escalation" of the war.

Permalink | NEW! Bookmark This Article: del.icio.us or Newsvine | Related Topics: President 2008

Name:

E-mail Address (for verification only; not for publication):

Remember personal info?

Comments:

© 2007 · All Rights Reserved · Congressional Quarterly Inc.

1255 22nd Street N.W. · Washington, D.C. 20037 · 202-419-8500

About CQ | Privacy Policy | Masthead | Terms & Conditions

Before Running, Candidates Must Explore (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) has one, as do several Republicans: Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and John McCain (Ariz.), former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney. And any day now, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) may be compelled to form her own.

It's this season's must-have political entity: the presidential exploratory committee. The legal equivalent of sticking one toe in the campaign waters, an exploratory committee allows prospective candidates to begin raising money for a campaign while they are still deciding whether to take the plunge.

Obama hand-delivered his committee paperwork to the Federal Election Commission on Tuesday morning, explaining that he would announce a formal decision Feb. 10. The five-page file reveals little beyond who's keeping the books and which bank the campaign is using (Citibank). But it puts his campaign on firm legal ground. Most candidates would prefer not to announce a candidacy this early, but given the massive sums they must raise to compete these days, they need all the time they can get.

The straggler is Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, who has been mum on her plans. An aide said yesterday evening that the senator "would likely be making her intentions clear in a matter of weeks, not months."

But at some point soon, whatever political advantage Clinton may gain by waiting could collide with the firm legal requirements that accompany a candidacy, even one in the exploratory phase.

The most significant of those, said FEC commissioner Michael E. Toner, is that she cannot legally raise money for a presidential bid without first forming an exploratory committee. Obama's filing "ups the ante," Toner said, "in that he has tremendous potential to raise money."

She may also find it increasingly difficult to sidestep the array of legal triggers that, if tripped, would require her to form a committee, said Scott Thomas, a former FEC chairman. Those include raising or spending more than $5,000 toward a presidential bid from her leadership political action committee, HillPAC, a separate account used to support candidates and party committees.

"If her leadership PAC is paying for her to fly around and speak in public settings, and it looks like that activity is toward a campaign effort, that would trigger a requirement that she file," Thomas said.

The word "exploratory" is not in any FEC regulations. Instead, the phase is referred to as "testing the waters," and an exploratory committee is legally just a campaign committee with "exploratory" in its name. When a formal campaign is announced, the candidate usually changes the name of the committee -- for instance, from "Obama Exploratory Committee," as the senator named his new entity, to something like "Obama for President."

"If you want to just test the waters, assess your viability, you don't necessarily have to register a committee with us," said FEC spokesman Robert W. Biersack. "But in exchange, you cannot do certain things: create a war chest, actively campaign, generate material that says 'Vote for me.' "

Some campaign-finance experts complain that the current law gives prospective candidates too much wiggle room. For instance, Clinton and Obama have been lining up staffs for weeks, if not months, including fundraisers, policy experts and field organizers, on a far bigger scale than even a Senate leadership operation would warrant.

Several presidential campaign insiders, speaking on background, said their lawyers have cautioned against heavy hiring as well as excessive fundraising. "We ought to have a much cleaner system here for presidential candidates raising and spending money," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a government-ethics watchdog group. "These are very murky waters."

Lieberman's Party, But Someone Else's Fight (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

HARTFORD, Jan. 17 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman's critics frequently enjoy referring to him as a member of "the party of one."

At least in the technical sense, that was true for a while in the Connecticut for Lieberman party. But now, things are getting complicated and mutiny is breaking out in the ranks — though those ranks are few in number.

The senator's supporters created the party line last summer, solely to give Mr. Lieberman a spot on the ballot in the general election after he lost the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont.

With the knowledge that neither Mr. Lieberman nor his supporters planned to take the reins, one of Mr. Lieberman's loudest critics, John Orman, filed papers after the election with the secretary of state declaring himself chairman of the party. His rules stated that anyone who shared a name with Mr. Lieberman or disagreed with him could join.

Earlier this month, the secretary of state's office said everything appeared in order with Mr. Orman's filing.

But a supporter of Mr. Lieberman's, Stuart R. Korchin, was furious to learn that Mr. Orman was hijacking the party. After reading the news of Mr. Orman's self-appointed leadership position, Mr. Korchin sent him an e-mail message, stating that he, in fact, was the sole member and chairman of the newly created political organization. Mr. Korchin, in a personal protest over the results of the Democratic primary, changed his party registration on Aug. 9 to Connecticut for Lieberman.

"I was unaware that you wished to join," Mr. Korchin wrote. "Please contact me if you are interested in helping to organize the party. I'm sure someone with your talents will be welcome."

Apparently, when Mr. Korchin filled out a short form in August at the Cheshire Town Hall changing his party affiliation from Democrat to Connecticut for Lieberman, the information could not be properly entered in the state's electronic voter database. So when Mr. Orman contacted the secretary of state, there was no record that anyone else belonged to the nascent party.

Now the two men are at loggerheads over who controls the party, which, to anyone's knowledge, includes only the two of them.

"He can say whatever he wants; the fact of the matter is I was there first," Mr. Korchin said in an interview.

"I held a meeting, wrote the rules and filed with the secretary of state," Mr. Orman said. "It is the real thing."

On Wednesday, Mr. Korchin received a letter from a lawyer in the secretary of state's office, stating that the state had "very limited jurisdiction" over intraparty battles, and was not taking a position over just who was in charge. The secretary of state's office noted that it had already received a rules document from Mr. Orman.

On Thursday, Mr. Orman will hold what he says is the second meeting of the party, at a hotel in Milford.

Shades Of Grey (WSJ)

By John Fund

Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif.--Ted Kennedy, the nation's most persistent backer of nationalized health care, must be smiling at the irony. Almost four decades after he first proposed the idea, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Kennedy relative by marriage, is touting his own version of universal coverage, and, if adopted, the idea could go nationwide quickly. It's no wonder critics are already dubbing the ostensibly Republican chief executive "Schwarzenkennedy."

This isn't the first time Mr. Kennedy has found a Republican to carry water for him. In 1971, after Medicare spending had increased by more than 70% in five years (although the number of people enrolled grew by only 6%), Richard Nixon declared a "health-care cost crisis" and worked with Mr. Kennedy to propose mandatory employer-provided health insurance. The idea foundered, but a modified version now has been revived by Mr. Schwarzenegger, who wants to require that every person buy health insurance, or be covered by an employer or the government. Massachusetts has a more modest law in place, and an adviser to Mitt Romney helped Schwarzenegger aides on their plan.

Liberals are overjoyed at the about-face by a governor who in 2005 vetoed a Democratic bill that would have merely expanded the state's coverage of children, saying the $300 million price tag was too high. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez praises the governor's new proposal: "This is a plan Assembly Democrats could have written."

Indeed, they already have--and Mr. Schwarzenegger fiercely opposed it at the time. In 2003, then-Gov. Gray Davis, fighting to stave off his recall, signed a law mandating employers with 20 or more employees provide health coverage or pay into a state fund that would provide it. After Mr. Davis was recalled, Mr. Schwarzenegger helped lead an effort to repeal what he called a "job-killing health-care tax." In 2004, 51% of voters agreed and repealed universal coverage in the same election in which George W. Bush lost the state by 10 percentage points and the highly liberal Sen. Barbara Boxer was re-elected by 20 points.

DOJ_NMG_0118443

But the next year, Mr. Schwarzenegger suffered a stinging defeat as public employee unions spent $130 million in a special election to defeat four reform initiatives he supported. A chastened governator swung left by hiring as top aides Susan Kennedy and Daniel Zingale, two former deputy chiefs of staff to the recalled Mr. Davis; Jason Kinney, a Davis speechwriter, joked that he had decided "to finish the second term of Gray Davis." No one is laughing now. The behind-the-scenes architects of much of the governor's plan were Ms. Kennedy and Mr. Zingale, who also served as Mr. Davis's director of managed health care.

Last November, Gov. Schwarzenegger won landslide re-election in part by winning 91% of Republicans with an ironclad pledge not to raise taxes. He pounded Phil Angelides, his Democratic opponent, for wanting to raise taxes by $7 billion to pay for universal health care. But now the estimated cost of the Schwarzenegger plan to cover California's uninsured, including two million illegal aliens, is $12 billion. State subsidies for people to buy insurance will extend to those earning up to $50,000 a year, more than California's median income. "He's creating a welfare state where more than half the people are in the wagon being pulled than outside the wagon pulling," says one health-care analyst.

As bad as the policy implications are, the governor's plan may be fatally flawed, politically. He insists it doesn't raise taxes, despite billions in new charges on doctors, hospitals and employers. He prefers to call the new revenue "in-lieu fees" and "coverage dividends." "He excoriated Phil Angelides, rightly, for proposing the same tax increases he has put on the table," says GOP state Sen. Tom McClintock. "He is now pushing the second largest tax increase in California history. I won't be able to trust anything he says."

Whether the new revenue is a tax or not is important, because if it is a tax the plan must garner a very difficult two-thirds vote in both legislative houses. Barring that, the California Supreme Court will have trouble with the concept. A fee on employers who don't offer health insurance probably requires only a majority vote. However, the imposition of a levy on the gross revenues of doctors and hospitals is almost certainly a tax that would require two-thirds approval.

Then there are the feds. The $5 billion a year in extra federal Medicaid money, which the governor is banking on, is shaky. An even greater barrier is Erisa, the 1974 federal pension law that preempts all state laws that regulate employee benefits. Last summer, a federal judge threw out Maryland's so-called "Wal-Mart law" requiring large firms to spend 8% of their payroll on health care because "state laws which impose health or welfare mandates on employers are invalid under Erisa." Just yesterday a federal appeals court upheld the ruling voiding the Maryland law.

Rather than pursue a legally dubious universal coverage proposal, Mr. Schwarzenegger should have pursued the universal access he used to tout. He could sign up more of the nearly one million Californians eligible for current health programs but not yet enrolled. The 49 coverage mandates that make insurance so expensive (Idaho has only 13) could be reduced and residents allowed to buy coverage from other states. Nurse practitioners could be allowed to set up their own clinics. Instead, the governor's plan piles on a new mandate that bars insurers from turning down anyone based on health status or age. When New Jersey instituted a similar rule in 1993, premiums jumped 500%.

Mr. Schwarzenegger insists he is pursuing a centrist course that borrows from both the right and left. But more realistically, he is imitating Richard Nixon's old strategy of throwing rhetorical bones to his right while attempting to appease the left with liberal programs. Emmet John Hughes, an Eisenhower speechwriter who knew Nixon well, once said he "judged any declaration of speech not by its content but by its impact." That explains Nixon's dramatic lurches into or toward wage price controls, a guaranteed annual income and mandatory employer health insurance.

Arnold Schwarzenegger used to claim he admired Ronald Reagan most "because he stuck by his principles when others wouldn't." But with his Rube Goldberg health plan Mr. Schwarzenegger has demonstrated that at his core he prefers roles more suited to Tricky Dick than the Gipper. Should he succeed, the long-term dream of nationalized health care held by Ted Kennedy, and Hillary Clinton, will be closer to reality than ever.

Homeless In America (WSJ)

By Julia Vitullo-martin

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

Can urban street homelessness be ended? In a sort of Nixon-goes-to-China reversal of expectations, the Bush White House argues that the answer is yes -- and is putting substantial effort and resources (over $4 billion annually) into proving it. "We're setting a new marker in front of the country," says Philip Mangano, executive director of the White House's U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness. "After 20 years of seeing the problem get worse, we're no longer 'managing' the homeless crisis. We're ending the disgrace." He cites impressive declines in street counts since the White House started their big push in 2003: 50% in Philadelphia, 30% in Miami, 28% in San Francisco, 26% in Dallas, 21% in Nashville. New York City has seen a 13% decrease since 2005, the first year in which a citywide street census was taken.

DOJ_NMG_0118444

Usually male and enduring some impairment -- mental illness, drug or alcohol addiction, disease -- those who've lived on the streets for more than a year ("the chronics") make up about 10% of the two million or so Americans regarded as homeless. They regularly consume a disproportionate amount of public resources -- sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars per person. They also often wreak disproportionate havoc on both commercial areas and residential neighborhoods -- inducing compassion fatigue even in usually tolerant cities like New York and San Francisco.

Traditional homeless advocates have seldom paid attention to the destructive effects some street people had on neighborhoods. That's been changing, in part at the insistence of mayors, who fund most homeless services, and corporate leaders. New York's Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who calls street homelessness "intolerable" on both humanitarian and economic grounds, says, "I was elected to take on the tough issues, the ones people said you couldn't do anything about -- and that some people pander on." Not one to shy from a fight, he gave a speech in July calling on mayors and communities to free themselves from the tyranny of the advocates.

"How well a city takes care of the least of its people says a great deal about it from a business recruitment point of view," says Horace Sibley, chairman of Atlanta's Regional Commission on Homelessness. In 2001 Mayor Shirley Franklin appointed Mr. Sibley to head a commission on homelessness, organized with the United Way. After the commission issued a report in 2002, the mayor asked members to stay on, implementing their recommendations, which combined permanent housing with medical care, mental health and substance abuse counseling, job training and placement to help people move toward living independently. "It's much less expensive to put chronically homeless folks in safe and decent housing, giving them the support system they need," says Mr. Sibley, "than it is to have them perpetually rotating in and out of hospitals, jails, ambulances and psychiatric hospitals." Over the last year the number of street people in Atlanta has declined 8.5%. The plan seems to be working, says A.J. Robinson, executive director of Central Atlanta Progress. "The business community will rally around strong political leadership that offers solutions on this thorny issue."

Atlanta and other cities have been building on the findings of University of Pennsylvania Professor Dennis Culhane, who pointed out in the late 1990s that a $12,000 per-year supportive housing unit was far more effective in keeping people off the street than a $35,000 per-year shelter bed. But the homeless industry remained oriented to the big shelters created in the mid-1980s, which Mr. Mangano calls the "old status quo response of ad hoc, uncoordinated, well-intentioned, but ineffective crisis intervention." A bowl of soup and a blanket was thought to be the best we could do, he adds. Armed with Mr. Culhane's data and convinced that concentrating resources on the chronics could produce results, Mr. Mangano approached his job (left vacant by President Clinton) zealously. Believing in the effectiveness of political will, partnership and 10-year plans, he traveled the country relentlessly, working with states, counties, cities and the private sector to coordinate systematic approaches. "No one level of government can get the job done alone," he says, in part because federal resources go to the states as block grants that are spent by multiple jurisdictions.

The ideas that form the basis of the most successful 10-year plans -- and that are revolutionizing the long stagnant field of homeless services -- originated in New York, once the epicenter of street homelessness and now the model to be emulated. Not all of the ideas sound very Republican, but Mr. Mangano is an eminently practical and non-ideological man. The basic strategy, called Housing First, comes from a Harlem-based group, Pathways to Housing, which does not require psychiatric or substance-abuse training as a qualification for housing. Clients do not have to be either sober or drug-free.

This rubs many people the wrong way, including many advocates. Others, like Rosanne Haggerty, executive director of Common Ground Community, which builds and manages supportive housing in Manhattan, say it is right to shift the emphasis from private to public behavior. "We don't ask our lease-holding tenants, any more than any landlord asks, whether a tenant is drinking in his or her apartment. But we're very strict about behavior. If someone behaves badly, we get on it quickly -- figuring out what needs to be changed. We have few rules, but we enforce them vigorously." From the neighborhood's point of view -- and Ms. Haggerty runs buildings in once-notorious Times Square -- it is the public behavior that matters.

Atlanta's Mr. Sibley agrees, adding, "What appeals to us is that once a person has a decent place to live, [he] can get [his] life in order step by step. Each individual still has to take responsibility for [his] own future." Which leads to the perennial problem: employment. If the goal of independent living for former street people is to be achieved, or even attempted, training and counseling have to be part of the mix. Atlanta's model was a New York employment program -- Ready, Willing and Able. George McDonald, founder and former businessman, estimates that at least half of the men he works with for the first time have previously been homeless for substantial periods. "The vast majority of homeless single adults in our program," says Mr. McDonald, "are coming out of prison or jail, don't have an education, and do have substance abuse problems."

DOJ_NMG_0118445

Well over half of every cohort of new RWA clients succeed the first time they try to live and work on their own after graduating from the program. In Atlanta, Mr. Sibley says the RWA model has helped 60 formerly chronically homeless people move into housing and employment, at a savings to the city of about $1 million.

Yet Mr. Mangano lives with one huge failure: Los Angeles, which he calls the Ground Zero of American street homelessness. Entangled in bureaucratic wrangling among government agencies, the city has made virtually no progress in ending the encampments of 5,000-plus homeless people on the former Skid Row. The high floors of elegant new downtown skyscrapers look out on block after block of tents, shacks and cardboard, a sight reminiscent of the Great Depression.

"Los Angeles is doing phenomenally well economically," says Mr. Mangano. "So of course we can get to the bottom of street homelessness. Because while we're doing this for moral, spiritual and human reasons, it's the economic reasons that drive the political will." Mr. Mangano intends to deploy a task force of the most successful homeless officials and operators to work with the city.

Will economics eventually end the "disgrace" of street homelessness in America's wealthiest cities? It's about one-third of the way there.

Ms. Vitullo-Martin is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Business Drops The Doha Ball (WSJ)

By Fredrik Erixon And Andreas Freytag

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

The Doha train has started to run again. The trade talks are still moving at a snail's pace, but the meetings in Washington last week between the Bush administration and European leaders have spurred some optimism. Trans-Atlantic leadership for the current round of trade liberalization has been needed for many years, and bridging the diverging opinions across the pond is certainly necessary. But if this new optimism is going to materialize, movement is also required from an actor that has been conspicuously absent from this round: business.

The World Trade Organization has often been portrayed by antitrade groups as a corporate puppet. But one key problem in this round has been the relative silence on industry's part. Business has been the dog that didn't bark.

There are exceptions. Chief executives of some big U.S. firms in transport and financial services have intervened and twisted arms in the U.S. Congress and in Geneva. Victor Fung, the U.S.-Hong Kong businessman, and Peter Sutherland, the former WTO chief who now chairs BP and Goldman Sachs International, continue to be tireless campaigners of multilateral trade liberalization. Marcus Wallenberg, chairman of a number of multinational companies, has geared up the efforts of the International Chamber of Commerce and taken the business case for Doha to political leaders across the globe. Yet they haven't gotten much help.

Business leaders' absence from the game is understandable. All the global-governance hubris, windy rhetoric and political grandstanding invariably displayed at big WTO meetings offer ample reasons for outsiders to take a rain check. The round has effectively been stalemated from day one, and all "last-minute" rescue attempts so far have only diluted the agenda and exempted some key business interests from the round. For everyone who wants the WTO to remain relevant in the future, this is cause for concern.

Yet the Doha agenda still has serious appeal for businesses interested in freer trade. Business opportunities in goods and industrial products will be significantly improved, particularly when it comes to exports to major developing countries. And binding countries to their currently applied tariffs -- which are lower than the ones agreed in the last multilateral talks, the Uruguay Round -- can increase stability and certainty in world trade. The Doha Round will not substantially liberalize trade in services, but it can lock in already achieved liberalizations, especially for investment, as well as dismantle some of the worst nontariff barriers to trade. What's more, the vast majority of the business community has a lot to gain from a WTO deal that puts limits on antidumping measures, today the weapon of choice for protectionist governments, and prohibits egregious abuses of other trade-defense instruments.

Compared to the alternatives, such as bilateral free trade agreements, or FTAs, the Doha agenda is the best offer around for global corporations. One can argue at length over bilateralism versus multilateralism, but this is a superficial exercise that only clouds the real issues. They are neither opposites nor substitutes for each other. There is room for both of them. But one should be wary of replacing the possible outcome of the Doha Round with the sales pitches for FTAs.

America's FTA policy has been a State Department charm offensive rather than a function of business priorities. Asian FTAs are a hodgepodge of weak and partial bilateral agreements. The EU has recently lifted its moratorium on new FTA negotiations and outlined a very ambitious agenda for new bilateral deals with Asian countries. But even if all of them are successfully concluded, which is highly unrealistic, business will stand to gain far less than Brussels claims.

DOJ_NMG_0118446

Though roughly 300 FTAs or regional agreements have been achieved, they only account for about a third of the market openings facilitated by the eight multilateral trade rounds. If one exempts the 10 biggest bilateral and regional agreements, the market-access provision in the average agreement is modest to unrecognizable.

This is not to say they are of no use. Many FTAs have reduced trade bureaucracy, liberalized regulatory barriers to trade and improved the conditions for trade in intellectual property. But they cannot be expected to deliver new business opportunities on a par with a WTO deal -- particularly as FTAs come with complicated rules-of-origin regulations that place heavy administrative burdens on business to prove that not too much of a good's production has been done in a third country outside the FTA. In fact, the arcane world of rules-of-origin regulations in many countries is too complex for even the biggest multinational companies to understand, and many of the ones that do understand them would just as soon pay a higher, non-FTA tariff.

The presence of free-trade-minded businesses is necessary to accelerate the Doha train. The WTO, as most other trading arrangements, has a mercantilistic superstructure in which "producer interests" trump "consumer interests." Yet the producer interests that have flexed their muscles in this round have not been inclined toward liberalization. And they are the ones that have been twisting arms, knocking on the doors of congressmen and members of parliament, and telephoning political leaders.

If nothing substantial happens in the next few weeks the round will only have a past and no future. This is the last call for Doha.

Mr. Erixon is a director and founder of Ecipe, a Brussels-based think tank. Mr. Freytag is a senior fellow of Ecipe and a professor of economics at the Friedrich Schiller University in Jena, Germany.

The Biggest Losers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 18, 2007

One of the more intriguing statistics in demography is migration among the 50 states. And especially revealing is the data on "out-migration," or those residents of a state who flee to what they must figure will be better climes.

The Empire Center think tank of New York has inspected the latest Census Data on migration, and it finds that two of the three biggest losers of people from 2005 to 2006 were California and New York. Louisiana was the biggest net loser, as 241,000 fled the state for a rate of 54.85 per 1,000 residents, but it is a special case after Hurricane Katrina.

New York, which finished second, has no such act-of-God excuse. It lost more than 225,000, or a rate of 11.69 per 1,000 from 2005 to 2006, and more than 1.2 million New Yorkers have moved out since 2000. California lost the most people (287,000) of any state from 2005 to 2006, but because it is the most populous state its out-migration rate was a merely dreadful 7.92. Without immigrants who have made up some of the difference, both states, and especially New York, would have declining overall populations and thus shrinking tax bases.

Authors E. J. McMahon and Kathryn McCall point out that no single cause can explain these migration trends. Housing costs, New York's stagnant upstate economy and heavy tax burdens no doubt play a role. On the other hand, weather probably counts for less, since Alaska, New Hampshire, Maine, Wisconsin and Minnesota have all added population even as New Yorkers have left by the tens of thousands.

Our own guess is that taxes and economic opportunity are decisive in many cases, especially for the mobile young and the well-to-do old. Even New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer doesn't think he can change the weather, so he'll have to do something about those anti-growth policies.

The Mayor And His Tax Cuts (NYT)

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

Michael Bloomberg was elected mayor five years ago after a self-financed campaign in which he shunned the politician label. So it was particularly striking to see his turnaround become all but complete in his State of the City speech yesterday, when he offered up a crowd-pleasing promise to cut taxes by $1 billion. It was an undeniable moment of political triumph, but it was less clear that it was a triumph for prudent governance.

Mr. Bloomberg is riding high these days, as polls confirm, and he took some well-deserved bows for a job well done. He has also been cutting a national profile on issues like guns and poverty, and now he has added taxes to the list.

The latest tax cuts can only help his standing with voters. It cannot be lost on aides who have been pressing the mayor to run for president that hacking away at voters' tax bills is almost always good politics.

But it is not always good municipal management. It is true that the city has a budget surplus of more than $2 billion now, but the black ink may not last. Mr. Bloomberg showed more caution last year, using a surplus to pay down future obligations.

The new tax cuts are not wildly imprudent. The proposed 5 percent property tax cut will largely be offset by the increases homeowners will see because New York real estate values have continued their steady rise — and it will be for just one year.

DOJ_NMG_0118447

Some of his other proposed cuts, including rolling back taxes on clothing and small businesses, will need Albany's approval, which is hardly assured.

The tax cuts could end up helping the city's fiscal outlook by improving its competitiveness, especially for small businesses. But Mr. Bloomberg will have to make the case that any such gains would not come at the expense of the fiscal responsibility he himself has long championed.

US, Germany Relaunch Mideast Quartet (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 18, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and current EU president Germany said the international quartet for Middle East peace would meet next month, calling the time ripe for a fresh initiative.

Rice and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told reporters after talks in Berlin that representatives from the United Nations, the United States, Russia and the European Union would meet in Washington "probably February 1 or 2."

"I look forward to that meeting as we re-energize the quartet in its efforts to support the progress in the Middle East that could lead to a two-state solution and a Palestinian state living side by side in peace, democracy and freedom," Rice said.

Germany, in its capacity as the current EU president, has pushed for a revitalized role for the quartet at what it considers to be an auspicious time to bring an end to the bloodshed.

"A solution to that problem is more urgent today than ever," Steinmeier said. "We are both of the opinion that the time is ripe for a meeting of the quartet."

Its last full meeting was in September.

Rice came to Germany from Kuwait after completing a six-country tour of the Middle East during which she announced she would hold a three-way summit with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas within a month.

She said in Berlin it would take "a few weeks" to organize the three-way summit.

"I think it will be useful to have the meeting with the quartet in advance of that meeting," Rice said.

Rice said Sunday Washington wanted to build on what she called "the momentum that is currently in Palestinian-Israeli relations."

Steinmeier said he believed the stalled roadmap -- the peace plan drawn up in 2003 by the members of the quartet with the aim of establishing a viable Palestinian state living peacefully alongside Israel -- remained the best option for progress.

In Berlin, Rice also met Christopher Hill, the top US envoy to six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program, who is holding discussions with the North's negotiator in the German capital.

She said she hoped the six-party negotiations would resume "soon" and that Hill's talks in the German capital would pave the way for "a more favorable atmosphere" when the discussions continue.

Rice and Steinmeier also discussed Iran's nuclear ambitions. Rice underscored the US administration's refusal to engage in bilateral talks with Tehran until it stops enriching uranium.

"This is not the time to break a longstanding American policy of not engaging with the Iranians bilaterally," she said. "It's just not the time."

Germany, which has with EU partners Britain and France negotiated with Iran on its nuclear program, has frequently called on Washington to open a dialogue with the Islamic republic.

Rice's trip to the Middle East had the dual aims of breathing new life into the Palestinian-Israeli peace process and winning support for the Bush administration's plan to deploy more than 20,000 additional US troops in Iraq.

After talks with Rice in Kuwait City Tuesday, the six members of the pro-US Gulf Cooperation Council along with Egypt and Jordan gave the plan a cautious welcome and issued a call for Iraq's neighbors not to meddle in the strife-torn country.

The Gulf states and the US said they wanted to prevent Iraq "becoming a battleground for regional and international powers". This could also refer to Syria which has been repeatedly accused by Washington of fueling the Iraqi insurgency.

"We expressed our desire to see the president's plan to reinforce the American military presence in Baghdad as a vehicle... to stabilize Baghdad and to prevent Iraq from sliding into this ugly war," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheikh Mohammad al-Sabah said.

Rice admitted that Iraq's predominantly Sunni Arab neighbors were skeptical about the ability of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite government to halt the sectarian violence that has pitted Sunni Arabs against Shiites.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an even-handed, non-sectarian path... but everybody wants to give this a chance. That is the position of the people in the region and there is in fact a burden on the Iraqi government to perform," she said in Kuwait.

DOJ_NMG_0118448

She will continue on to London, the last stop of her tour, Thursday after talks with German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Rice Announces Mideast Strategy Session (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 18, 2007

Pushing to bring Israelis and Palestinians closer to peace, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday both sides will need international help.

"Undoubtedly they will reach difficult moments, they will reach times when things are not moving forward," Rice said in announcing that U.S., German and other diplomats will hold a Mideast strategy session early next month in Washington.

The meeting of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations will come before a U.S.-backed summit in the Mideast among Rice, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Leader Mahmoud Abbas.

Rice came to the German capital after five days in the Mideast, where she promoted a renewed peace process and sought support for President Bush's Iraq plan.

In Jerusalem and the West Bank, Rice won agreement for a three-way meeting that she said would help build confidence after years of fighting. Rice was careful to repeat that that session does not supplant a dormant 2003 peace plan, although it skips past difficult requirements the plan makes of each side.

The group gathering in Washington represents would-be administrators of the plan, which Israelis and Palestinians have endorsed but never put in force.

The group has become something of a Greek chorus as the mood between Israel and the Palestinians generally soured over the past three years and as Abbas struggles for internal control against Palestinian Hamas radicals.

Before she arrived in Berlin, her chief negotiator for six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program offered an olive branch to North Korea, saying Wednesday the U.S. wants a normal country-to-country relationship with the newly nuclear power.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and the North's Kim Kye Gwan held unusual direct talks, meeting Tuesday and Wednesday at the U.S. Embassy in Berlin.

Rice asked Hill to return to Asia on Thursday to continue talks meant to hasten the next round of six-nation disarmament talks.

Hill said his talks in Berlin were part of an effort to show North Korea that Washington is sincere and wants a "normal relationship," established through a "bilateral process." That is an implicit promise to stop treating the communist North as a pariah state.

The North would have to renounce nuclear weapons to win that prize, Hill said, a caveat reinforced more strongly by his boss, Rice.

"It's very clearly in the context of the denuclearization — complete, verifiable ... (and) irreversible denuclearization," Rice said during a press conference with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

In 2005, North Korea pledged to dismantle its weapons program in return for security guarantees and economic aid, but the accord has not gone into place. North Korea boycotted further talks for more than a year, and in the meantime proved its nuclear capability with an underground explosion in October.

Hill said he hopes the next round of six-nation disarmament talks will take place by the end of the month.

Rice Cool To Temporary Palestinian State (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sounded cool to the notion of a placeholder Palestinian state in temporary borders, an idea that Israelis had said might energize the dormant peace process.

Rice, speaking to reporters Tuesday, did not rule out the idea, though. Palestinians reject it as a nonstarter, arguing that temporary lines would be too hard to redraw and Israel might end up with large swaths of the West Bank that Palestinians claim is theirs.

"My own view, and I frankly have been telling people this, (is) that if we get to that point it seems to me that it may be more difficult to negotiate a provisional state than just to go to the end game" of final borders, Rice said. "We're not there yet, and we'll see."

Rice planned to brief German and British leaders this week about the possible next steps toward peace. She was dining with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin on Wednesday and with British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett in London on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0118449

The Bush administration supports an eventual independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. That is the goal of a 2003 U.S.-backed international peace plan that has gotten little traction.

Rice spent a long weekend in Israel and the West Bank assessing the possible next steps toward peace, and on Monday said she will attend a three-way confidence-building session with Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas prefer an informal session to a larger regional or international peace conference, Rice said, referring to an idea advanced in Europe and some Arab capitals.

"That really raises expectations that something is imminent," Rice told reporters traveling with her on a Mideast tour.

In the same session, Rice channeled her background as a college professor for what sounded like her answer Tuesday to criticism that the Bush administration won't talk to its adversaries.

Iraq Study Group authors and piqued senators are among those who accuse the Bush administration of being shortsighted in rejecting talks with Iran and Syria that might help reduce the sectarian violence in Iraq.

"There's a tendency to think about diplomacy as something that is done untethered to the conditions underlying it or the balance underlying it," Rice said partway through a lengthy academic disquisition on the difficulty of recognizing big historical change.

"That's not the way that it works," Rice said. "You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating. It is not dealmaking."

Bush's plan, announced last week, rejects the idea of outreach to Iran and Syria and would add U.S. forces in Iraq.

Syrian, Israeli Backdoor Talks Now Emerging (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, January 18, 2007

The last time there was a peace breakthrough that surprised the world, a few offbeat Israeli and Palestinian intellectuals gathered in 1993 at a country house in Norway and came away with the Oslo Accords.

So when news broke this week in Israel's respected newspaper Haaretz, that Israel and Syria had reached a series of secret understandings, it is no surprise that it sent shock waves through a region often plagued by stalemate and violence.

Officials here are distancing themselves from the meetings that took place between Israelis and Syrians in Europe from September 2004 to June 2006, portraying them as an "academic" exercise. But that doesn't mean Israel isn't open to a deal with Syria.

In fact, some Israelis see Syria as a possible key to undermining Hizbullah's threat. The Israeli losses to Shiite militants in Lebanon last summer prompted Wednesday's resignation of the Israeli army's chief of staff, and is triggering calls for the prime minister and defense minister to follow. Swapping the Golan Heights – for Syria withdrawing support for Hizbullah – might be considered, say Israeli analysts.

And, the very fact that Israelis have been meeting with Syrian representatives is indicative of a willingness on the part of some of the region's players to restart a peace track that has long been viewed as derailed indefinitely.

"If it would be up to us academics, we could have solved it a long time ago. But it is up to the leadership," says Moshe Moaz, an Israeli political scientist and Syria scholar at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Dr. Moaz – speaking by telephone from Boston, where he is currently on sabbatical at Harvard University – was involved in several of the meetings that took place, which involved both a combination of academics, officials, and former officials, he says.

"I have the sense that the government was informed, but didn't approve of it," he says.

Reports of a resurrection of the Israeli-Syrian track, which broke off officially around the same time Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations collapsed in the summer of 2000, conjure deeply different reactions – and come at a volatile, precarious time in the region.

Proponents of talking see Damascus as holding the key to reining in Hizbullah, stopping the flow of arms from Iran into Lebanon, and sizing down the tactical might of Hamas, whose most powerful Palestinian figure, Khaled Mashal, resides in the Syrian capital.

And ever since the end of the brutal war last summer in Lebanon, opinion-makers here have been trying to point the nation's compass for compromise in the direction of Syria. Only a deal with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, some analysts say, can prevent Israel from finding itself in another war with Hizbullah.

On the other end of this viewpoint are skeptics, both Israeli and Arab, who say that the powerbrokers are as far away from coming to terms as they were before. Israeli officials, as well as many in the Bush administration, various sources here say, view Syria as a country continuing to sponsor terrorist activities. Therefore, they say, it's a country that should be isolated, not engaged.

DOJ_NMG_0118450

Moreover, if the assumed price for a peace deal between Israel and Syria is an Israeli withdrawal from Golan, pollsters show that the cost is still too high in the minds of most Israelis.

Even further, observers here say they find it hard to imagine Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his defense minister, Amir Peretz, have anything approaching the political capital necessary for a deal with Syria. Both men have very low approval ratings – one newspaper last week put Mr. Olmert's at 14 percent.

Olmert said in late December that he would consider restarting talks with Syria, but only if Damascus first ended its support for Hizbullah and other anti-Israeli groups.

The resignation Wednesday of Israeli army Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, coupled with an investigation into Olmert's role in a banking sale, might only bolster the image of Olmert's helm as one too racked with scandal to sell the people on peace.

General Halutz stepped down after dozens of internal inquiries into the month-long Lebanon war found widespread problems in the military's performance.

"The war clearly was mismanaged, and when a war is clearly mismanaged, there is no doubt the chief of staff is responsible," said opposition lawmaker Ran Cohen, a former high-ranking military officer. "The responsibility is shared by him, the prime minister and the defense minister, and sooner or later, they, too, will have to leave."

Some of the specifics of the talks between Israelis and Syrians, as reported in Haaretz, indicated a willingness of Israel to withdraw entirely from the Golan Heights, which it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war. Israel later settled the territory, which now has about 16,000 Israelis living on it along with some 18,000 Syrian Druze, and officially annexed the land. The move never received international recognition, but is seen in Israel as part of the national "consensus."

The would-be deal, according to the report, includes the establishment of a large "buffer zone" near the Sea of Galilee, which would be converted into a park for use by Israelis and Syrians.

In opinion surveys, only a minority of Israelis have indicated a willingness to withdraw fully from the Golan Heights. And following the disengagement plan of 2005, the public appears keen to have peace but reluctant to repeat the uprooting of settlers for questionable returns.

Although the Haaretz report indicated that senior officials here had full knowledge of the talks that broke off last summer, Israeli government officials have sharply denied the report.

"We're not questioning that these talks took place," says Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for the prime minister's office. "But there was no official sanctioning or knowledge of these meetings. This was not a back channel that was sanctioned in any way by this prime minister or the last prime minister [Ariel Sharon].

"It's sort of academic, and there are lots of meetings like that," Ms. Eisin adds. "I can list all kinds of academics that have all kind of meetings and can solve all kinds of world problems. But it doesn't have anything to do with officials."

Although Israeli officials have gone to lengths to deny that the contacts were sanctioned at the highest levels, Haaretz is not the only major Israeli paper to suggest that the Israeli-Syrian track may have yet have some electricity running through it.

The Maariv newspaper reported earlier this week that Uzi Arad, the director of the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, Israel, has floated a plan for an Israeli-Syrian-Lebanese peace that would not require Israel to withdraw fully from the Golan Heights. The concept, dubbed the "Arad Plan," would allow Israel to keep a 150-square-mile strip of the western Golan Heights in exchange for an equivalent piece of land elsewhere.

Mohammed Musleh, a professor of Middle Eastern Studies at Long Island University in Brookville, N.Y., says that would be totally unacceptable to the Syrians.

"For there to be a public park that will be used by the Israelis with or without Syrian approval, in violation of Syrian sovereignty, will not be. And Israel has insisted since the start that it must have total control," says Dr. Musleh, a Palestinian academic, during a visit to Jerusalem.

"It's a nonstarter," he says. "This plan also showed that Israel will control sources of the Jordan [River]. But the dispute between Israel on the one hand, and Syrian, Jordan, and Egypt [on the other] over the sources of Jordan, were one of the underlying causes of the war in 1967, because Israel succeeded in diverting the sources of the Jordan River."

Moreover, he says, the demands placed on Syria to come to the table would come at a premium that he doubts Mr. Assad would be willing to pay.

"Syria should distance itself from Iran, on one hand, and Hamas on the other hand. But why should Syria do that in return for nothing? Syria is very much interested in renewing the peace talks with Israel, but neither Washington nor Tel Aviv is interested in peace talks with Syria. The Bush Administration is against any kind of engagement with Syria, and it doesn't want Israel to have any engagement, either."

A New Chance For Peace? (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

DOJ_NMG_0118451

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

I am concerned that public discussion of my book "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" has been diverted from the book's basic proposals: that peace talks be resumed after six years of delay and that the tragic persecution of Palestinians be ended. Although most critics have not seriously disputed or even mentioned the facts and suggestions about these two issues, an apparently concerted campaign has been focused on the book's title, combined with allegations that I am anti-Israel. This is not good for any of us who are committed to Israel's status as a peaceful nation living in harmony with its neighbors.

It is encouraging that President Bush has announced that peace in the Holy Land will be a high priority for his administration during the next two years. On her current trip to the region, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has called for an early U.S.-Israeli-Palestinian meeting. She has recommended the 2002 offer of the 23 Arab nations as a foundation for peace: full recognition of Israel based on a return to its internationally recognized borders. This offer is compatible with official U.S. policy, previous agreements approved by Israeli governments in 1978 and 1993, and the "road map" for peace developed by the "quartet" (the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations).

The clear fact is that Israel will never find peace until it is willing to withdraw from its neighboring occupied territories and permit the Palestinians to exercise their basic human and political rights. With land swaps, this "green line" can be modified through negotiations to let a substantial number of Israeli settlers remain in their subsidized homes east of the internationally recognized border. The premise of exchanging Arab territory for peace has been acceptable for several decades to a majority of Israelis but not to a minority of the more conservative leaders, who are unfortunately supported by most of the vocal American Jewish community.

These same premises, of course, will have to be accepted by any government that represents the Palestinians. A March 2006 poll by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah found 73 percent approval among citizens in the occupied territories, and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh has expressed support for talks between President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and pledged to end Hamas's rejectionist position if a negotiated agreement is approved by the Palestinian people.

Abbas is wise in repeating to Secretary Rice that he rejects any "interim" boundaries for the Palestinian state. The step-by-step road-map formula promulgated almost three years ago for reaching a final agreement has proved to be a non-starter -- and an excuse for not making any progress. I know from experience that it is often more difficult to negotiate an interim agreement, with all its future uncertainties, than to address the panoply of crucial issues that will have to be resolved to reach the goal of peace.

Given these recent developments and with the Democratic Party poised to play a more important role in governing, this is a good time to clarify our party's overall policy in the broader Middle East. Numerous options are available as Congress attempts to correlate its suggestions with White House policy, and there is little doubt that the basic proposals of the Iraq Study Group provide a good foundation on which Democrats might reach something of a consensus (recognizing that individual lawmakers could still make their own proposals on details). This party policy would provide a reasonable answer to the allegation that Democrats have no alternatives of their own to address the Iraq quagmire.

A key factor in an Iraq policy would be strong demands on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government to cooperate in ending sectarian violence, prodded by a clear notice of plans for troop withdrawals. A commitment to regional cooperation, including opportunities for Iran and Syria to participate, would be beneficial in assuring doubtful Iraqis that America will no longer be the dominant outside power shaping their military, political and economic future.

Although Israel's prime minister has criticized these facets of the Iraq Study Group's report, the most difficult recommendation for many Democrats could be the call for substantive peace talks on the Palestinian issue. The situation in the occupied territories will be a crucial factor, and it would be helpful for both the House and Senate to send a responsible delegation to the West Bank and Gaza to observe the situation personally, to meet with key leaders and to ascertain the prospects if peace talks can be launched.

I am convinced that, with bipartisan support, this is a good opportunity for progress.

The writer was the 39th president and is a Nobel Peace Prize laureate. His most recent book is "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid."

Arabs Are Cool To Bush's Iraq Plan (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

AP, January 18, 2007

Arab leaders were deeply skeptical Wednesday of the U.S. plan for Iraq, a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice tried to sell it to them. Kuwait's emir told Rice that America should work with Iran and Syria, officials said — a move President Bush has rejected.

DOJ_NMG_0118452

Underscoring the obstacles to U.S. efforts to win over Arab leaders, a U.S. diplomat said the Bush administration plans 1to send Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nicholas Burns on another Mideast shuttle to offer more details of the president's plan.

Meeting with Rice on Tuesday in Kuwait, eight Arab foreign ministers raised tough questions about Bush's new strategy. The ministers — from six Persian Gulf states plus Egypt and Jordan — were particularly concerned about whether the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can reach out to Iraq's minority Sunni Arabs to end their resistance and lure them to the political process, according to Arab diplomats.

"Arabs need to know specifically what can the Americans and the Iraqis do to end sectarian domination of the government," said one diplomat familiar with Rice's talks, referring to the Iraqi Shiite-Kurdish alliance which controls the Baghdad government. He and other diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because the discussions during the closed meeting were private.

A statement put out by the ministers reflected their distrust of al-Maliki's government. They gave vague support for Bush's plan, welcoming a U.S. commitment to defend "the territorial integrity of Iraq and to ensure a successful, fair and inclusive political process."

But they also said it is the "responsibility of the Iraqi government to achieve these goals."

The most upbeat comments came from Egypt.

"Bush's strategy is not merely a military action or operation or a unilateral military program. It represents a vision with different political, military and economic aspects," Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told reporters in Cairo on Wednesday.

Still, Gheit said he underlined to Rice that U.S. and Iraqi forces must crack down on Shiite militias that "have been killing Iraq's Sunnis."

During her five-day tour, Rice acknowledged concerns about whether the Iraqi government would take "an evenhanded, nonsectarian path" by targeting Shiite militiamen as well as Sunni insurgents and seek reconciliation.

Many Arab leaders feared it would not.

"The main objective now is how to achieve national reconciliation," said Ahmed al-Qatan, the Saudi ambassador to the Arab League. "Unfortunately, the deteriorating conditions cannot provide any hope."

"The situation won't stabilize soon, and the current curve (of violence) will continue for a long time," he told Cairo's leading newspaper, Al Ahram.

Many in the media depicted Rice's visit as a failure. "The whole jet-setting trip turned out to be yet another stage-managed, futile diplomatic exercise. ... In effect, Rice returns to Washington empty-handed with a lot of false promises rather than optimism," the Doha, Qatar-based Peninsula newspaper wrote in editorial.

Jordanian analyst Labib Kamhawi said that besides their doubts over the plan itself, Arab leaders had a difficult time throwing support behind it "when there has been a total failure in Iraq and the Palestinian territories with no attempt to soften the anger that is seething in the Arab and Muslim countries."

The emir of Kuwait was surprised that the Bush plan excludes Iran and Syria from contacts on Iraq.

It is important to have a "dialogue with Syria, in particular, and with Iran in the interest of Gulf security in general," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheik Mohammed Al Sabah quoted the emir as telling Rice.

Bush took a tough line on Syria and Iraq in announcing his plan. He accused them of supporting militants in Iraq and made clear his rejection of proposals for engaging the two countries to use their influence to calm the violence.

Saudi Arabia, meanwhile, is pressing the U.S. to take more active steps to revive the Arab-Israeli peace process in return for helping in stabilize Iraq. The deal, dubbed "Iraq for Land," echoes widespread Arab feelings that resolution to the conflict is key to Mideast stability.

Saudi columnist Dawoud al-Shriyan said Rice should take the calls seriously.

"Every time the Americans are in trouble in Iraq, they remember that Arabs have a cause named Palestine. Therefore, they float some statements to create the impression that they continue their efforts in the peace process," he wrote in the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat newspaper.

Burns' mission to the region next week aims to mitigate Arabs worries.

"Everything (Rice) has been doing in the region, he's going to try to explain," said Hilary Olsin-Windecker, spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Abu Dhabi, the Emirates capital. Burns will "flesh out specifics" of U.S. policy changes that Rice outlined, Olsin-Windecker said.

Burns also is expected to make a major policy address that details new U.S. steps in Iraq and the Gulf in hopes of finally persuading skeptical Gulf allies to support America's project in Iraq, said Mustafa Alani, who oversees military policy at the Gulf Research Center.

DOJ_NMG_0118453

Analysis: Rice Sees Iraq, Not Too Close (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 18, 2007

Iraq looks placid from 37,000 feet. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spent a lot of time talking about Iraq's troubles during five days in the Middle East, but the closest she came to the country was on an airplane ride Wednesday as she left the region on a crystal blue day. The flight took Rice smack between the violent cities of Baghdad and Fallujah.

Windows on her plane's left side offered a tranquil view of rolling river valleys. On the right was the sprawling capital, where a suicide car bomb struck a market Wednesday in the Shiite district of Sadr City, killing more than a dozen people. Later Wednesday in Baghdad, a convoy carrying members of a U.S. democracy group was ambushed and four workers, including an American woman, were killed, an official with the group said.

Electronic maps in the Air Force plane's passenger section charted the aircraft's path across what was labeled "Mesopotamia," southern Iraq's name in ancient times.

Rice had made the rounds of Arab leaders to ask for support for President Bush's new plan to secure Baghdad and salvage a war that most Americans, and many Arabs, do not support.

In Kuwait, she met with foreign ministers from eight nations whose governments are friendly to the United States despite broad anti-American feeling among their populations. Rice got what she came for — or as much as she might have really expected: a bland statement from the group welcoming the U.S. commitment in Iraq.

Kuwait is next to Iraq, as much of the world was reminded when Saddam Hussein invaded his much smaller, militarily weak neighbor in 1990. But Rice does not talk so often anymore about how Iraqis are much better off since the dictator's overthrow.

Rice's flight to Berlin, where she briefed European leaders on her trip, provided a footnote to the troubled U.S.-Iraq history. Her route to Europe bisected the old southern Iraq "no-fly zone," imposed after the 1990-1991 Gulf War but rendered moot by the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

___

Rice is known for keeping a punishing pace on the road. Packed schedules frequently include stops in two or more countries in a single day.

She is not much for taking in the sights, so it was notable when word came that Rice and her party would tour the fabled ruins of the ancient Temple of Luxor in Egypt. It was only about 20 minutes on the schedule, but what a 20 minutes it would be: Sphinxes! An obelisk! Nefertiti!

Alas, Rice was running late so her tour was scrapped.

She might have caught a glimpse of the stunning temple from her motorcade en route to meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who had invited her to the southern Egyptian city, where the west bank of the Nile holds the celebrated Valley of Kings. Usually the leaders meet in the smoggy capital, Cairo.

While Rice worked, a small group from her party wandered happily among the statues and walls.

___

Rice began the trip with sessions in Jerusalem and the West Bank intended to energize the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

As usual, Rice saw Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his headquarters in the West Bank town of Ramallah. The complex is barely recognizable as the same one where Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat holed up under Israeli siege in 2002. He died two years later.

The rubble is gone. Construction crews are busy building a mosque and burial shrine for Arafat.

The Bush administration refused to deal with Arafat and clearly was relieved by the election of the moderate Abbas as his successor. The U.S. now is looking for ways to bolster Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas radicals.

Visiting Abbas at the headquarters has symbolic value, showing respect for Palestinian self-rule. But Arafat's lingering presence is a delicate matter for U.S. officials.

Arafat's picture is everywhere in the complex, although Abbas' has often been added alongside. A portrait of a grinning Arafat that once hung over the dais where Rice and Abbas speak to reporters was gone this time.

On previous visits, Rice's motorcade swept past Arafat's temporary glassed-in burial shine without a pause. Other leaders and diplomats would walk over to the building, which resembled nothing so much as a suburban car dealership, to lay a wreath.

This time, Rice's motorcade entered the complex from the opposite direction. She did not pass by the site.

Kuwait Tells U.S. To Talk To Iran, Syria (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0118454

By Diana Elias

AP, January 18, 2007

Kuwait's emir told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Washington should talk to Syria and Iran to improve the situation in Iraq, the Kuwaiti foreign minister said Wednesday.

Sheik Mohammed Al Sabah told reporters that when Rice met Kuwait's emir, Sheik Sabah Al Ahmed Al Sabah, on Tuesday, she had spoken of the "the difficulties facing the Iraqi government in imposing security, and (difficulties caused by) outside interference."

"That is why his highness (the emir) stressed the importance of a dialogue with (Iraq's) neighbors, and the importance that there is no estrangement between them and America," Sheik Mohammed said.

He quoted the emir as telling Rice it was important to have a "dialogue with Syria, in particular, and with Iran in the interest of Gulf security in general."

Rice was in Kuwait on Tuesday for a meeting on Iraq with her counterparts from the six Arab Gulf states plus Jordan and Egypt.

Speaking at Kuwait airport before flying to Oman, Sheik Mohammed did not reveal what the eight foreign ministers told Rice about the new U.S. plan for Iraq. But he said Rice had told the emir that President Bush had found it difficult to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq, but he had made the decision to prevent the country from slipping into a civil war.

In announcing his Iraq plan last week, Bush rejected the recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan U.S. panel, which had urged talks with Damascus and Tehran on ways of curbing the sectarian violence in Iraq.

Bush accused Iran and Syria of failing to stop fighters from crossing into Iraq to join the insurgency, and blamed Iran in particular for providing material for attacks on American troops — a charge that Tehran denies.

Iran and Syria are believed to have influence with insurgents in Iraq. Iran has strong ties with Iraqi Shiites, who have powerful militias, and Syria is believed to host senior members of the deposed Baathist regime in Iraq, which is playing a significant role in the insurgency.

Political Rivals Join To Slam President (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 18, 2007

TEHRAN -- Conservatives and reformists are openly challenging President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's hard-line nuclear diplomacy -- an unusual agreement across Iran's political spectrum -- with many saying his provocative remarks have increasingly isolated their country.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously last month to impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt uranium enrichment. Some critics view the sanctions as an indication that Iran must change its policy.

After a year of silence, reformists are demanding that Iran dispel fears that it is seeking to build atomic weapons, pressing for a return to the enrichment suspension policy under President Mohammed Khatami. Uranium enrichment can produce the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs.

"Resisting the U.N. Security Council resolution will put us in a more isolated position," said the Islamic Iran Participation Front, the largest reformist party.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's popularity already was weakened after his close conservative allies were defeated last month in local elections, which were widely seen as a referendum on his 18 months in power.

Even some conservatives warn that his confrontational tactics are backfiring.

"Your language is so offensive ... that it shows that the nuclear issue is being dealt with a sort of stubbornness," the hard-line daily Jomhuri-e-Eslami said in an editorial.

Some lawmakers on both sides of the political spectrum are considering impeaching Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki if the Security Council approves more resolutions against Iran.

"That all 15 members of the Security Council unanimously voted, against the claim by our diplomatic apparatus that there was no unanimity against Iran, shows the weakness of our diplomatic apparatus," said Noureddin Pirmoazzen, a reformist lawmaker.

Despite the criticism, Mr. Ahmadinejad has remained defiant, escalating Iran's nuclear standoff with the United States and its allies. He has refused to suspend enrichment, even under pressure from Iran's trade allies Russia and China. Iran denies U.S. assertions that it is secretly trying to build a bomb.

On Saturday, Mr. Ahmadinejad met with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a fellow U.S. critic, at the start of a Latin America tour -- his second such visit in four months. Critics say the trip was partly aimed at diverting attention from the disapproval at home.

Mr. Ahmadinejad also has distanced some of his conservative base by calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and hosting a conference last month that cast doubt on the Holocaust. Many feel he has spent too much time defying the West and too little tackling Iran's domestic issues.

Coalition Of The Concerned Grows In Iran (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 18, 2007

A new political coalition is emerging in Iran in response to growing US pressure, especially over Tehran's nuclear programme, and in concern over the radical approach of President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad in both foreign and domestic policy.

It stretches from reformists and even secular intellectuals to fundamentalists, and results from a belief that Iran may be facing the most serious challenge of its modern history.

"New informal regroupings are being formed based on concern . . . over the fate of the country and the regime," said Behzad Nabavi, a leading reformist. "A common sense of danger [is overcoming] differences over democracy and cultural issues."

Although it remains unclear what direct impact this so-called "coalition of the concerned" can have on nuclear policy or Iran's relationship with Iraq, for instance, its aim is to put Tehran's case more clearly internationally and perhaps craft conciliatory measures. It also wants Iran's supreme leader to rein in Mr Ahmadi-Nejad.

The United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran last month over its nuclear and missile programmes and set a 60-day deadline for Tehran to suspend almost all nuclear activity or face further sanctions. But Iran's concern is less over sanctions than military attack in the not-too-distant future. US troops raided Iran's "consulate" in northern Iraq last week and seized five "diplomats", accusing Tehran of fuelling insurgency. Increasing American naval deployment in the Gulf has heightened tension.

"We are facing the most serious political challenges, domestically and internationally in our modern history," said a regime insider. "The ruling clerics may be forced into compromises that even the Qajar kings [1795-1925] didn't make."

Iranians remember the Qajar period for weakness, stagnation and humiliating concessions to great powers, including ceding territory to Russia and control of fin-ance and oil to the British.

The coalition is gathered partly around two former presidents, Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a conservative pragmatist, and the reformist Mohammad Khatami.

With the UN resolution and US military build-up feeding fears that Washington's aim is not stopping Iran's uranium enrichment but overthrowing its regime, sen-ior figures argue, the national interest cannot tolerate an inexperienced president whose rhetoric is inflammatory. Mr Rafsanjani, who has been at the centre of Iranian politics since the 1979 revolution and the 1980-88 war with Iraq, repeatedly gives warning that Iran must be "careful" and not fuel "US adventurism". Such wariness is apparently shared by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader, who waited two weeks before public comment on the UN resolution. The president attacked the resolution as "illegal".

"The regime's strategic policy remains avoiding confrontation because the US has the upper hand, even though Iran is being treated unjustly," said Mohammad Atrianfar, editor of the ban-ned reformist daily, Shargh.

Some of Iran's most seasoned politicians and officials fear that the US and Israel seek nothing short of the country's break-up. "I backed talks with the US for a long time but sadly I've reached the conclusion they want to cut Iran into pieces," a diplomat said.

Iran is a multinational state with a variety of groups who feel discrimination by the majority Persians and Shia Muslims. Tehran accuses Britain and the US of stirring unrest among Kurdish and Arab minorities in the north-west and oil-rich south.

"The leaders of the Islamic revolution managed to maintain Iran's territorial integrity at critical times, but I'm not sure they can do the same this time if they face the US's destructive power," said a senior reformist. While some insiders argue that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad has little role in the nuclear issue, they worry that his rhetoric is taken seriously by the west and even welcomed by hardliners in the US and Israel.

Even parts of the conservative media have blamed Mr Ahmadi-Nejad for the UN resolution and for disrupting nuclear talks with Europe.

Pragmatists from across the spectrum are looking to Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, to revive talks with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, that stalled last year. They are encouraged by his response to the UN resolution. Facing reporters' insistence on Wednesday that he clarify Iran's position on the nuclear issue, Mr Larijani stressed the importance of a "thoughtful" rather than a "hasty" reaction.

Criticism of the president have been encouraged by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's setback in elections last month.

DOJ_NMG_0118456

The emboldened approach appears designed to create a consensus that leads Ayatollah Khamenei to rein in – or even remove – the president. “The leader is still quiet about election results, probably trying to analyse them, but he doesn’t seem happy with Mr Ahmadi-Nejad any more,” said one insider. “Mr Ahmadi-Nejad consults the leader less than any previous president but, if one day he ignores the leader’s orders, he’ll be finished within a week through impeachment by parliament.”

Parliament is in uproar, accusing the government of gross mismanagement as prices and unemployment rise. But such a dramatic move as impeachment – unknown in the Islamic Republic’s 28 years – would need Ayatollah Khamenei’s backing to succeed.

“Ayatollah Khamenei still doesn’t believe the president should go,” said a former Iranian diplomat. “And if the international crisis becomes more serious, the leader would not allow an impeachment that would make Iran look weak domestically.”

U.N. Nuclear Agency Stops Some Iran Aid (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, January 18, 2007

The U.N. nuclear agency has suspended some aid to Iran in line with Security Council sanctions calling for an end to assistance for programs that could be misused to make an atomic weapon, diplomats said Wednesday.

The diplomats emphasized that the freeze was temporary for now and subject to review and approval by the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Agency officials now are looking at the full list of technical aid programs to Iran and will propose culling those that could serve non-peaceful nuclear aims when the board next meets in March. It is up to board members to make the final decision.

A U.N. official and a diplomat accredited to the IAEA said the suspension was imposed in recent days. Both spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment on the issue to the media.

Another diplomat said the aid was suspended for programs "where there is a clear prohibition by the Security Council, specifically applying to enrichment, reprocessing and heavy water (production)." He said the agency planned to separate the projects into those where Security Council bans applied, those deemed uncontroversial and a "gray list" of projects that need closer examination as to whether they could be used in weapons production.

"Whatever is absolutely clearly banned by the resolution is now on hold," he added.

The agency's decision to temporarily shelve some projects even before a final decision by the board was interpreted by some diplomats who deal with the Vienna-based IAEA as a victory for the United States.

Washington is the key critic of Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment. While Tehran says it wants to develop an enrichment program to generate energy, the Americans say the Islamic republic is more interested in the program's other application — creating the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

Still, a U.S. push to halve IAEA aid to Iran as part of Security Council sanctions is facing opposition from traditional U.S. allies in the European Union as well as from developing nations, diplomats said. Such European opposition is worrisome from Washington's point of view because it could dilute attempts to present a unified Western front against Iran's nuclear defiance.

Iran gets IAEA technical aid for more than 15 projects and dozens more that also involve other countries. Diplomats familiar with American strategy for the next IAEA board meeting March 5 say Washington wants at least half of the aid projects permanently eliminated.

But that is opposed by Germany, which holds the rotating European Union presidency, and many other EU nations. The diplomats said that — unless Washington moderates its stance — confrontation is inevitable at the March meeting.

The United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany all want Iran to mothball its enrichment program and have acted as a group in trying to engage Tehran on the issue. But their approaches and priorities have differed over the past year — resulting in often visible strains in what is meant to be a joint initiative.

Russian and Chinese reluctance to slap harsh sanctions on Tehran — as initially demanded by Washington — have created the greatest pressures. Both nations share economic and strategic interests with Iran

But problems also have surfaced in the ranks of European allies, with Germany traditionally the least hawkish and the French recently nudging the British aside to become the most loyal European backers of the Americans.

Differences over how severely to punish Tehran for its refusal to suspend enrichment led to months of disputes before agreement was reached last month on a Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions that fell short of the harsher measures the Americans had pushed for.

The sanctions include a review of technical aid to Iran — programs meant to bolster the peaceful use of nuclear energy in medicine, agriculture or power generation.

In November, the board of the agency indefinitely suspended an IAEA project that would have helped Iran put safety measures in place for a heavy water reactor that, once completed, will produce plutonium — like enriched uranium, a potential pathway to nuclear arms. That decision, however, was relatively straightforward, considering the Security Council had already indirectly called for an end to construction of the reactor.

DOJ_NMG_0118457

In contrast, most of the projects up for review at the March meeting are for programs that have less obvious potential weapons applications.

They include cancer therapy programs, nuclear safety projects and requests for help in international nuclear licensing procedures.

Pressure Mounts On Olmert To Resign (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, January 18, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz came under renewed pressure to resign Wednesday after the Israeli army's chief of staff stepped down in the wake of the flawed Lebanon war.

The sudden departure of Israel's top military official, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, delivered another setback to the prime minister, whose popularity has plummeted following last summer's war and a string of political scandals. On Tuesday, Israel's attorney general opened a criminal probe into Olmert's role in a 2005 bank privatization.

Halutz stepped down after dozens of internal inquiries into the monthlong Lebanon war found widespread problems in the military's performance. Halutz had previously rejected calls to resign, despite the growing loss of confidence of his political superiors and subordinates in the army.

With Halutz on his way out, critics quickly clamored for the heads of the country's other wartime leaders, Olmert and Peretz.

"The war clearly was mismanaged, and when a war is clearly mismanaged, there is no doubt the chief of staff is responsible," said opposition lawmaker Ran Cohen, a former high-ranking military officer. "The responsibility is shared by him, the prime minister and the defense minister, and sooner or later, they, too, will have to leave."

Peretz expressed regret Halutz's decision, but he warned Israel's enemies not to misinterpret the move.

Speaking at the graduation ceremony for naval commanders in Haifa, Peretz said Halutz's decision was "premature."

"I am sorry he won't be with us to complete the task" of restoring the army after the failures of the summer's war in Lebanon, Peretz said.

Peretz, who is also under fire about the war, had a message for Israel's enemies. "Do not misinterpret the army chief's decision to resign as a sign of weakness," he said.

Olmert made a routine appearance at parliament, sparring with lawmakers over unrelated domestic issues and promising to appoint a new military chief within days. Peretz said he would begin interviewing candidates for the vacant military post immediately.

But pressure on Olmert and Peretz is likely to increase ahead of the release of a wide-ranging government inquiry into the war. The investigative panel, focusing on the performance of military and political leaders, is expected to announce its conclusions in the coming weeks.

"Halutz's step was unavoidable, but he was not the only one responsible for the failures of the war — the government was too," lawmaker Ophir Pines-Paz, a member of Peretz's Labor Party, told Army Radio.

He stopped short of calling on Olmert and Peretz to resign, saying he wanted to wait for the government panel to reach its conclusions.

An opinion poll published last week showed Olmert's approval rating at just 14 percent, and his Kadima Party losing if new elections were held.

"It is not clear whether the prime minister will be able to survive the resignation of chief of staff Halutz and his own political problems," said Ephraim Inbar, a political scientist at Bar-Ilan University near Tel Aviv. "We may see pressure in his own party to replace him. This resignation is definitely the beginning of political turmoil in Israel."

Peretz's public standing, meanwhile, is equally dismal. The former union leader won the defense portfolio under a coalition deal with Olmert's Kadima Party, despite his scant military experience.

The war's many flaws only cemented sweeping doubts about his fitness to serve as defense minister, and he now faces multiple challenges to his leadership within his own Labor Party, which is scheduled to hold primaries for chairman in May.

Both Peretz and Olmert "are in a very shaky position," said political scientist Avraham Diskin of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Israel went into the war with a united front against Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas just hours after they killed three Israeli soldiers and captured two in a July 12 cross-border raid, but that solidarity collapsed after the fighting ended.

DOJ_NMG_0118458

Critics questioned whether Olmert moved too hastily with a full-scale campaign that ended without achieving its declared aims — recovering the captured soldiers and crushing Hezbollah.

More than 1,200 people were killed on both sides, most in Lebanon, according to U.N., Israeli and Lebanese officials. Israel claims it killed 600 guerrillas, but that number has not been substantiated, and Lebanon says most of its casualties were civilians.

A total of 159 Israelis were killed, including 39 civilians who died in rocket attacks. Soldiers returning from battle complained of poor planning and shortages of ammunition, food and water.

Uri Guralcky, 30, a graduate student and electronics vendor in Jerusalem, said Peretz and Olmert must accept responsibility for the war's failures. "They must go together with Halutz," he said.

Hezbollah legislator Hussein Haj Hassan told The Associated Press that Halutz's resignation "is the result of the defeat of the Israeli enemy in Lebanon."

Israeli Officials Under Pressure To Quit (AP)

By Josef Federman

AP, January 18, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz faced new calls to resign Wednesday after Israel's army chief stepped down, succumbing to widespread outrage over the handling of last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz became the first Israeli chief of staff to resign since the 1973 war, but the government's political troubles may not end with his departure. With a government probe into the war looming, and a criminal investigation into Olmert's role in a banking deal, the prime minister's troubles appear likely to grow.

The Israeli public has largely blamed Halutz — along with Olmert and Peretz — for failing to crush Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon and halt Katyusha rocket attacks against civilians.

"Halutz's resignation is a positive and unavoidable move," said Ophir Pines-Paz, a member of Peretz's Labor Party. "But the political leadership also has to take responsibility."

Israel launched the war hours after Hezbollah guerrillas killed three Israeli soldiers and captured two others in a July 12 cross-border raid.

Critics say Olmert moved too hastily with a campaign that ended without achieving its declared aims — including the recovery of the two captured soldiers. Soldiers returning from the battlefield said they were poorly trained, lacked basic ammunition and food supplies, and received conflicting orders.

The prime minister, who is supported by a solid majority in parliament, is not expected to resign soon. But the uproar over the alleged mishandling of the war against Hezbollah could harm his chances to remain in office in the long term.

"It is not clear whether the prime minister will be able to survive the resignation of chief of staff Halutz and his own political problems," said Ephraim Inbar, a political scientist at Bar-Ilan University near Tel Aviv. "We may see pressure in his own party to replace him. This resignation is definitely the beginning of political turmoil in Israel."

Nearly 160 Israelis and more than 1,000 Lebanese died in the fighting, according to tallies by government agencies, humanitarian groups and The Associated Press.

The count includes 250 Hezbollah fighters that the group's leaders now say died during Israel's intense air, ground and sea bombardments in Lebanon. Israel has estimated its forces have killed 600 Hezbollah fighters.

Many Israelis criticized the army's inability to stop Hezbollah from firing nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel. Analysts say that failure has dealt a major blow to the army's prestige in the Arab world and its ability to deter attacks.

In Lebanon, Hezbollah legislator Hussein Haj Hassan called Halutz's resignation "the result of the defeat of the Israeli enemy in Lebanon." Demonstrators in Beirut, at their nightly anti-government protest, celebrated with fireworks when Halutz's resignation was announced.

In his first public comment since Halutz resigned, Peretz warned Israel's enemies, "Do not misinterpret the army chief's decision to resign as a sign of weakness." Speaking Wednesday evening in Haifa at a graduation ceremony for naval commanders, Peretz said Halutz's decision was "premature. I am sorry he won't be with us to complete the task" of restoring the army after the summer's war in Lebanon.

Peretz insisted that he would continue to guide the reforms — instead of resigning. Olmert and Peretz hoped to pick a new army chief within days.

Halutz stepped down after internal army inquiries found widespread problems in the military's performance. Halutz, a decorated former combat pilot, had previously defended the army's performance and rejected calls to resign.

Critics quickly clamored for the heads of the other wartime leaders, Olmert and Peretz.

DOJ_NMG_0118459

"I believe the chief of staff took the right decision after the inquiries in the army. I think that now the question is about his superiors, the defense minister and prime minister," said Yossi Beilin, leader of the opposition Yahad party. "It will be very difficult for both of them to stay in power."

Olmert did not comment publicly about the resignation calls. "It's business as usual in the prime minister's office," said his spokeswoman, Miri Eisin.

But pressure on Olmert and Peretz could increase ahead of the release of a wide-ranging government probe into the war. The investigative panel, focusing on the performance of military and political leaders, is expected to announce its conclusions in the coming weeks.

Voicing popular sentiment, Uri Guralcky, 30 of Jerusalem, said Peretz and Olmert must accept responsibility for the war's failures. "They must go together with Halutz," he said.

A poll broadcast on Channel 10 TV backed that up. Asked whether Olmert should resign, 69 percent agreed. Eighty-five percent said Peretz should quit. The Smith Research poll, conducted by telephone, questioned 425 Israelis and had a margin of error of 4.8 percentage points.

Olmert's troubles were compounded by the announcement that police were opening a criminal probe into his role in the government's 2005 sale of a controlling stake in a bank. Olmert, then finance minister, is suspected of trying to rig the bidding.

An opinion poll published last week showed Olmert's approval rating at just 14 percent, and said his Kadima Party would lose if new elections were held. Peretz's public standing is equally dismal. The former union leader won the defense portfolio under a coalition deal despite his scant military experience. The war's flaws only cemented doubts about his fitness to serve as defense minister, and he now faces multiple challenges to his leadership within the Labor Party.

Top US Envoy Holds 'Useful' N Korea Talks In Berlin (AFP)

By Deborah Cole

AFP, January 18, 2007

The top US envoy to six-way talks on North Korea's nuclear arms said he was having "useful discussions" with his Pyongyang counterpart here and hoped negotiations would resume this month.

"When you have six hours of conversations and you're going to have some more... certainly you can characterize them as useful discussions," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said, referring to an initial meeting Tuesday with the North's negotiator Kim Kye-gwan.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said that discussion was followed up with one or two hours of talks Wednesday at the North Korean embassy in Berlin before Hill travels to Asia Thursday.

Hill, speaking at an American Academy event in Berlin, declined to answer questions on the substance of the meeting but said he hoped the six-party talks, which collapsed in December in Beijing with no discernible progress, would start again "in January."

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on a visit to the German capital Wednesday that she hoped Hill's talks would set the tone for a positive start to new six-party negotiations soon.

"These discussions that Chris is having... should help prepare the way for a more favorable atmosphere at the time of the resumption of the six-party talks, which we would hope would be soon," she said.

She stressed that Washington would not consider normalizing relations with Pyongyang until it implemented "a complete, verifiable nuclearization -- and I should say irreversible denuclearization."

The Berlin meetings came ahead of Hill's visits beginning Friday to South Korea, China and Japan to continue consultations with key partners in the six-party talks on how to make progress in the next round of negotiations.

Hill noted that the Berlin talks were the first bilateral discussions he had held with Kim outside Beijing.

The two powers held landmark talks in Berlin in 1999 that ultimately led to the lifting of a half-century of restrictions on trade, travel and banking against North Korea after it agreed to a moratorium on missile tests.

But the crisis erupted again in 2002.

Six-party negotiations involving the United States, the two Koreas, Japan, Russia and China were suspended in late 2005 after North Korea walked out in protest at US financial sanctions imposed on a Macau bank accused of illicit dealings on behalf of Pyongyang.

The talks resumed in December last year -- following the North's October 9 nuclear weapons test -- and ended in deadlock as Pyongyang insisted the financial sanctions be lifted before it would discuss nuclear disarmament.

Russia on Wednesday called the US sanctions an obstacle to the resumption of talks and urged flexibility on both sides.

DOJ_NMG_0118460

"The United States should have taken some steps toward the Koreans on lifting financial sanctions and discussing this question with them," Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov, the head Russian negotiator on North Korea, was quoted as saying by state-run news agency RIA Novosti.

Losyukov also called on North Korea to reconsider its refusal to rejoin the negotiations on account of the US sanctions. "The link is not 100 percent justified," he was quoted as saying.

In a concession to North Korea, the United States agreed to hold parallel discussions on the financial sanctions issue.

A first round of those talks took place on the sidelines of the last six-party negotiations in Beijing in late December.

Neither Hill nor Casey said when the financial discussions might resume.

Japan and South Korea welcomed the Berlin talks and voiced hope for an early resumption of multilateral discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear arms program.

"Dialogue is a good thing," Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki, the top government spokesman, told reporters.

"The Berlin meeting should lay a good groundwork for an agreement on what initial steps to take to implement the September 19 statement," South Korea's foreign minister Song Min-Soon said, referring to a 2005 accord offering the North security and economic aid guarantees in return for disarmament.

Hill described that agreement as "a sort of bible for us" and said he hoped it would be the basis for a new agreement.

North Korea And U.S. Envoys Meet In Berlin (NYT)

By Mark Landler And Thom Shanker

New York Times, January 18, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 17 — Seeking to revive stalled negotiations to end North Korea's nuclear weapons program, the United States held "substantive" talks with North Korean diplomats here on Tuesday and Wednesday, said the chief American envoy, Christopher R. Hill.

The unusual one-on-one sessions, the first to be held outside Beijing during the Bush administration, were signs of progress since negotiations broke off in December after North Korea demanded that Washington lift financial sanctions against it.

"It was a substantive discussion," Mr. Hill said in an interview on Wednesday, though he refused to give details. "The proof of the pudding will be when we all sit down together in the six-party negotiations."

Mr. Hill briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his meetings upon her arrival in Germany after a mission through the Middle East and Persian Gulf. Ms. Rice said later that Mr. Hill's discussions "should help to prepare the way for a more favorable atmosphere at the time of the resumption of the six-party talks, which we would hope would be soon."

Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, expressed hopes that those broader negotiations — which would also include China, South Korea, Japan and Russia — would resume by the end of this month in Beijing, the traditional host for these talks.

An official in the North Korean Embassy here declined to comment on the talks, which are being led on its side by Kim Kye-gwan.

Persuading North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, to abandon his nuclear ambitions has seemed an increasingly hopeless exercise since October, when North Korea tested a nuclear device and declared itself a nuclear state. The most recent talks, American officials said, foundered when the North Korean negotiators proved unyielding on the most basic issues.

Still, the United States was eager to try again, seizing on a visit to Berlin by Mr. Kim to arrange a meeting with Mr. Hill, who was here ostensibly to give a talk at the American Academy in Berlin. American officials appeared encouraged by the tone of the discussions.

North Korea, they noted, was open to talking despite declaring last month that it would not discuss disarmament unless the United States lifted penalties against the Banco Delta Asia in Macao, which held North Korean assets.

The measures, which the United States said it imposed because of North Korea's counterfeiting of American money and laundering of proceeds from drug running, cut off one of the North's valuable channels to international financial markets.

On Wednesday, Russia called on the United States to remove the measures. "The United States should make some step towards the Koreans by lifting the sanctions," the new Russian chief negotiator, Aleksandr Lusyakov, said in an interview with a Russian news agency, RIA.

Treasury officials have held their own negotiations with North Korea to resolve this standoff, and plan to meet again next week, either in Beijing or New York, according to Mr. Hill. But he suggested that the United States did not intend to ease the pressure on North Korea's finances.

"We've had to make it clear to the North Koreans that as long as they are involved in nuclear weapons production, their international financing will come under scrutiny," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118461

Because of the arcane way that Washington and North Korea communicate in their relationship as long-term adversaries and occasional negotiating partners, some brief language in a speech Mr. Hill delivered here Wednesday provoked significant interest.

Mr. Hill issued what some heard as a tantalizing offer that the United States, within the obligations of a 2005 agreement emerging from the six-party talks, looked forward “to establishing a normal relationship with North Korea.”

“Obviously this is via a bilateral process, which will take a long time,” he said.

North Korea has long tried to push the United States into formal bilateral talks, as a means of seeking status and legitimacy as well as to decouple Washington from its regional allies. The United States has insisted that formal talks with North Korea be held only in the six-party format.

Asked to clarify whether the United States was dangling a new relationship before the North Koreans, Ms. Rice said late Wednesday that United States-North Korea ties would have to evolve within the six-party framework, and that Washington was unwavering in demanding a complete and verifiable end to the North’s nuclear program.

The 2005 statement signed by the six parties “envisioned that the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula would lead to a bilateral — a normalization of relations between the United States and the D.P.R.K.,” Ms. Rice said, using the initials of North Korea’s official name.

By engaging North Korea directly, outside China, the United States must tread carefully, a senior official involved in the talks said. American officials informed China of the meeting in Berlin, and Mr. Hill is headed to Beijing, as well as to Seoul and Tokyo, after he leaves Germany.

Though the six-party talks have been held exclusively in Beijing, North Korea has used Berlin as a diplomatic venue in the past, for example during the 1990s for talks with the Clinton administration. It maintains a large embassy here, a legacy of the days of East German Communism.

Ms. Rice landed here after completing meetings with Arab allies in the Middle East and Persian Gulf, and she flew over Iraq en route to Berlin.

Her trip also included talks in Israel and the Palestinian territories, an effort to push ahead stalled peace talks.

During an evening news conference here, Ms. Rice announced that the so-called quartet — a group of negotiators that includes the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — will meet in Washington in early February to help restart the Middle East talks.

U.S. Open To Bilateral Talks On Ties With N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 17 -- If North Korea gives up its nuclear programs, the United States is willing to engage in "a bilateral process" to establish "a normal relationship," the chief U.S. negotiator said here Wednesday after two days of one-on-one talks with his North Korean counterpart.

"We are prepared to go on that road and to really offer North Korea a hand as it moves along the road," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said in a speech here in the midst of his talks, the first time he has met with senior North Korean officials outside Asia. He said he has been trying to "make sure they understand very clearly what we are intending to do, what our intentions are."

Hill's comments mark the first time a U.S. official has publicly emphasized the possibility of such bilateral discussions, something the Pyongyang government has long sought. Ever since the North Korean nuclear crisis began in 2002, the Bush administration has resisted such negotiations, preferring to work through a somewhat cumbersome forum that also includes China, Russia, South Korea and Japan.

The question of how normalization would take place was contentious during the negotiations that led to a September 2005 joint statement, in which North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear programs. The U.S. delegation specifically sought the removal of the word "dialogue" from the section describing the normalization of relations from the final draft of the statement.

Critics of the administration have urged it to provide North Korea more detail on possible enticements for giving up its weapons program. Hill's comments appeared to be part of an effort to flesh out the details.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was briefed by Hill on the talks after she arrived here from Kuwait for discussions with German officials on the Middle East. Asked at a news conference about Hill's statement, Rice emphasized the 2005 document, noting that it would "lead to a bilateral, a normalization of relations."

The agreement "is very clearly in the context of the denuclearization -- complete, verifiable denuclearization, and I should say irreversible denuclearization -- to the Korean Peninsula," Rice said. "We believe that the six-party context might allow that evolution to take place."

DOJ_NMG_0118462

Hill also noted the September 2005 agreement in his speech, which was organized at the American Academy in Berlin. But the final draft of the agreement is vague about the process of normalization.

The key sentence, using the abbreviation for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, said, "The DPRK and the United States undertook to respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together, and take steps to normalize their relations subject to their respective bilateral policies." That sentence was crafted after the United States balked at a version referring to "bilateral policies and dialogue."

On Wednesday, Hill said that "we have an adequate bilateral mechanism within the six-party talks to exchange our views with the North Koreans." The comment appeared to refer to the increasingly frequent meetings he has held with his counterpart, Kim Gye Gwan, when the six-party sessions were not taking place. Previously, the meetings with Kim were held in Beijing, generally in preparation for another round of six-party talks, but no new round is currently scheduled.

At the last round of six-nation talks in December, North Korean officials balked at substantive discussions, insisting that the United States lift punitive measures intended to halt alleged money-laundering operations.

Rice flew to Germany after four days in the Middle East, visiting Israel, the West Bank, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Germany currently holds both the rotating presidency of the European Union and the chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrialized countries, giving it substantial diplomatic clout in the first half of the year. German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made it known she is eager to elevate the European role in the search for peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

Rice will fly to London on Thursday to meet with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and plans to return to Washington on Friday.

U.S. General In S.Korea Warns Of Changes (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, January 18, 2007

The top U.S. general in South Korea warned Thursday that changes to the command structure on the peninsula could damage the ability of allied forces to maintain the more than half-century-old armistice with North Korea.

South Korea has requested it retake wartime command of its own forces, which it turned over to the U.S.-led U.N. Command during the 1950-53 Korean War. The transition is expected to occur sometime between 2009 and 2012.

The top U.S. officer in South Korea, U.S. Army Gen. B.B. Bell, also serves as chief of the U.N. Command. He cautioned that changes to alliance structures must not harm the U.N. commander's ability to quickly mobilize forces to protect the cease-fire between North and South.

"Unless addressed, this situation will make it impossible to credibly maintain the armistice," Bell told a news conference.

He said the problem should be carefully considered during peacetime because on the Korean Peninsula "crisis escalation could quickly, indeed almost instantaneously, lead to combat operations."

"There could be no time to make changes in our command structure while crisis escalates," he said. However, he added that he didn't expect any renewed war.

"If we fail to make adjustments as military leaders, we fail in our responsibilities," Bell said.

North Korea has long maintained that the U.N. Command is irrelevant and a thinly veiled U.S. effort to claim international legitimacy for its forces here. Some 29,500 U.S. troops remain stationed in South Korea as a legacy of the Korean War, with their numbers set to decline to about 25,000 in coming years.

Although other nations contributed forces during the war in the 1950s, U.S. troops are the only actual fighting elements left on the peninsula in addition to the South Korean military.

Bell argued the U.N. command was still needed.

"Until a lasting peace is achieved on the peninsula, there will continue to be a major role for the U.N. Command," he said.

Somalis Must Reach Out For Unity, U.S. Official Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

The Bush administration's point person on Somalia expressed concern yesterday over the slow pace of efforts to form a unity government there.

A lack of willingness by the internationally backed transitional government to reach out to other groups and clans, including "moderate" representatives of an ousted Islamic movement, "frankly, remains our greatest challenge," said Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0118463

In particular, the transitional government's decision yesterday to fire the parliamentary speaker, Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, who had made peace overtures to the Islamic movement, would have a "negative impact," Frazer said at a conference on Somalia at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

The administration had been clear in discussions with the government, she said, that it "must reach out" to other groups in order to break the cycle of violence in Somalia.

In Nairobi, the U.S. ambassador to Kenya, Michael E. Ranneberger, told reporters that Aden was "the kind of person who could pull people together."

In a separate address at the Washington conference, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) said the transitional government was "already running the risk of missing a critical window to establish itself as a credible, transparent and representative government." Feingold criticized what he said was the Bush administration's slow response to the situation in Somalia and its focus on capturing al-Qaeda suspects it says are being harbored by the Islamic movement.

The U.S. military targeted al-Qaeda suspects in an airstrike this month in southern Somalia, where they had fled after Ethiopian troops invaded in late December and installed the transitional government in Mogadishu, the Somali capital. The strike killed as many as 10 people but none of the targets.

A more "comprehensive strategy" including assistance for security, governance, reconstruction and humanitarian needs "has yet to be developed," said Feingold, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on African affairs. He said he would hold early hearings on Somalia.

Frazer said the administration already has a comprehensive strategy covering those areas. There are continuing efforts to enlist an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopian military, she said, although Uganda remains the only country that has made a commitment to the mission. Details are being worked out for a U.S. airlift of the 1,500 Ugandan troops, who she said should arrive by mid-February.

"I'm so keen on this I feel like maybe we should just hire some planes and pick them up and drop them at the Mogadishu airport," she said.

In addition to promoting political stability and a peacekeeping force, Frazer said, the administration was committed to providing reconstruction and humanitarian assistance. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recently announced an initial $40 million in U.S. aid.

Senator Calls For New US Push On Somalia (AFP)

AFP, January 18, 2007

The US Senate's top Africa hand urged the Bush administration to work urgently to establish a peacekeeping force and an international trust fund for stricken Somalia.

"The window of opportunity to effect change in Somalia is closing," Senator Russ Feingold, the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations panel's Africa subcommittee said.

Washington needs to "quickly and aggresively on all fronts," Feingold said, warning that without action, Somalia's status as a security threat to US interests would grow.

Chasing Al-Qaeda cells in Somalia in US strikes, was not enough, Feingold said, opening a half-day conference on Somalia's plight, sponsored by several policy groups at the Center for Strategic and International Studies think-tank.

Washington must crank up diplomatic efforts towards the formation of a representative national government in Somalia, as well as on a trust fund backed by international donors, he said, adding that the US government should also appoint a special envoy to rally global efforts.

"The price tag will be significant ... (but) we are spending eight billion dollars a week in Iraq, a place where Al-Qaeda wasn't in the first place.

"But we can't even (have an) increase over the 40 million we are doing now with regards to Somalia ... we are just not thinking straight."

Feingold was speaking hours after fresh signs emerged of Somalia's fractured political climate, as lawmakers sacked the speaker of parliament. Sharif Hassan Sheikh Aden, and days after a US strike against an alleged Al-Qaeda cell.

Ethiopian troops entered Somalia in December to support the weak Somali transitional government against powerful Islamists and quickly ousted the Islamists from Mogadishu and much of southern Somalia.

Along with the United States, United Nations and others, Ethiopia, supports deployment of an African peacekeeping force to stabilize Somalia and assist the Somali government in consolidating its limited power.

Aid Groups Warn Of Wider Darfur Crisis (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

DOJ_NMG_0118464

AP, January 18, 2007

In a sweeping call for help, a wide range of U.N. aid agencies appealed Wednesday to warring parties to end the violence in Darfur, warning the relief keeping millions alive will be "irreversibly jeopardized" if it does not stop.

The humanitarian groups said a massive influx of foreign aid was the only thing "holding the line" for 2.5 million refugees and over 1 million other civilians in Darfur.

"That line cannot be held much longer," warned the statement issued by 14 United Nations agencies working in Sudan.

Aid groups and U.N. officials have for months been alarmed by the rapidly deteriorating conditions faced by civilians in Darfur, where over 200,000 people have been killed since rebels took up arms against the central Sudanese government in 2003, accusing it of neglect.

The government is accused of having retaliated against civilians with air raids and by unleashing the janjaweed, militias of Arab nomads blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict.

"Villages have been burned, looted and arbitrarily bombed, and crops and livestock destroyed. Sexual violence against women is occurring at alarming rates. This situation is unacceptable," the statement warned.

The humanitarian groups said what pushed them to issue the appeal Wednesday was the increased targeting of aid workers in the region. The splintering of rebel groups into lawless factions without clear leadership, as well as government restrictions, is making it ever more difficult for aid workers to operate, they said.

"The humanitarian space that we operate in is shrinking," said Ted Chaiban, Sudan country manager for UNICEF, which signed with appeal. Other signatories included the World Food Program, the U.N. Development Program, and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

With repeated military attacks and shifting front lines, December was the worst month in Darfur in over two years, the statement said. It followed six months of escalating violence, during which 30 U.N. and other aid compounds were attacked, forcing some 400 U.N. and other aid workers to relocate. During the same period, 12 aid workers were killed in zones controlled by rebels and government forces.

"Before, aid workers were being caught up in the violence. Now they're actually being targeted," said Alun McDonald, spokesman for the British aid group Oxfam in Sudan. "It's not the occasional vehicle getting lost, it's compounds being looted in coordinated attacks."

U.N. and other humanitarian groups say the turning point came on Dec. 18, when at least four aid organizations were attacked in the South Darfur camp of Gereida, the region's largest with 130,000 refugees.

Offices and housing compounds were simultaneously raided, cars and radio equipment plundered, some aid workers endured mock executions and assailants raped a female aid worker from the French aid group Action Contre la Faim.

"We're still trying to understand what happened," said the French agency's Sudan coordinator Philippe Conraud. "The fact that we can't assess why this took place is worrying us for the future."

Nearly all aid workers have evacuated Gereida, a zone reputed to be controlled by fighters from the faction of the Sudan Liberation Movement led by Minni Minawi, the one rebel leader who signed a peace agreement with the government last May.

Conraud said Minawi had provided "very little explanation," but had promised to investigate the incident.

"If the raids were a clear message that aid groups aren't welcome in Gereida anymore, then we'll have to move out permanently," he said.

Meanwhile, 130,000 people who depend on aid to survive in Gereida have not received food since mid-December. "The situation could become very alarming within a few weeks," Conraud said, pointing to World Food Program estimates that more than 170,000 people are now out of reach in South Darfur alone and are seriously at risk for malnutrition.

Deteriorating hygiene in the crowded refugee camps and the isolation of villages have triggered a new surge of cholera, the aid groups said, with 147 dead and more than 2,700 suffering from the epidemic in 2006.

"If this situation continues, the humanitarian operation and welfare of the population it aims to support will be irreversibly jeopardized," the U.N. statement warned.

The U.N. aid groups called on Khartoum's government and the rebels to "take concrete steps toward a peaceful settlement in Darfur and the respect of international humanitarian law and principles" and to hold the perpetrators of crimes accountable.

Pulling out of the region for good is not an option, the aid groups insisted. But the current violence "raises the question of whether we are having an impact that justifies those risks," said Chaiban of UNICEF.

U.N. agencies say Darfur has been their single largest humanitarian effort, with nearly 1 million tons of food delivered at a cost of over $1 billion since April 2004, and the mobilization of some 15,000 Sudanese and international aid workers.

___

Associated Press Writer Mohamed Osman contributed to this article in Khartoum, Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0118465

Ban Ki-moon Vows To Reform The U.N. (AP)

By Kasie Hunt, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 18, 2007

The United Nations will see a series of reforms and be "reborn" under new leadership, new U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Wednesday.

"I am very much committed to changing the culture of the United Nations," Ban told reporters at the U.S. Capitol after meeting with members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Ban also called on Congress to reverse a law that caps U.S. spending on U.N. peacekeeping missions at 25 percent of the total cost. A U.N. agreement requires the U.S. to pay approximately 27 percent of the costs. Congress voted for the cap in April 2005 in response to the allegations of corruption and mismanagement in the oil-for-food program for Iraq, sexual abuses by peacekeepers and other scandals.

Ban's pledge of additional reforms came in the wake of Tuesday's indictment of U.N. oil-for-food chief Benon Sevan, who was charged with taking a $160,000 (euro124,000) bribe to influence who could buy Iraqi oil under the scandal-tainted humanitarian program.

That scandal sullied the record of then-Secretary-General Kofi Annan when an investigation led by former Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker blamed shoddy U.N. management and the world's most powerful nations for allowing corruption in the $64 billion program to go on for years.

Ban, who was South Korea's foreign minister, took over for Annan on Jan. 1.

The Democratic chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Tom Lantos of California, praised Ban for promising reforms and pledging to release his own financial records. Lantos said this would be a first in the U.N.'s history.

The panel's top Republican, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, said: "The U.S. spends a lot of money on the U.N. system, and we want to see real results and real reforms."

The meeting with members of Congress came a day after Ban met with President Bush at the White House. Bush and Ban suggested they want to put behind them the discord typified by the administration's clash with the United Nations over the U.S.-led war that overthrew Saddam Hussein in Iraq.

Ban said he would need congressional help as he tries to mend that relationship.

"We need very active and continuing support from the U.S. Congress," Ban said.

Workers Allege Abuse By Kuwaiti Attache (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Three Indian women who worked in the McLean home of a Kuwaiti military attache filed a lawsuit yesterday alleging that they were brought to the United States illegally and abused and exploited by the diplomat and his wife.

One of the women, Mani Kumari Sabbithi, fled the family's home after the diplomat and his wife became angry over a mistake she made in preparing a meal for the couple's triplets, then 1 year old, the suit alleges.

The wife, Maysaa Al Omar, pulled Sabbithi's hair and threatened to cut off her tongue, the suit alleges. The husband, Maj. Waleed Al Saleh, started screaming at Sabbithi and pushed her to the floor, knocking her out, the suit alleges.

Soon after, Sabbithi went to the home of a sympathetic neighbor to whom the women had confided their problems, according to the lawsuit.

A few months later, in January 2006, the other two workers, Joquina Quadros and Gila Sixtina Fernandes, fled as well, pretending they were going upstairs to do laundry but instead ducking out while their bosses were in the basement, the lawsuit said.

Filed against the couple and the government of Kuwait, the lawsuit is the latest legal effort to curb the exploitation of foreign domestic workers, particularly by diplomats, whose immunity can make it difficult for authorities to investigate allegations of abuse, let alone act to halt such conduct.

Jasem Albudaiwi, the first secretary of the Kuwaiti Embassy in Washington, said Kuwaiti officials learned of the allegations yesterday after media inquiries about the lawsuit and were not able to immediately address the accusations.

"We're investigating all aspects," Albudaiwi said. "We in the embassy don't tolerate any sort of abuse, especially of domestic helpers."

Al Saleh, who lives in the 7000 block of Elizabeth Drive, did not respond to a request made through an embassy spokeswoman for comment on the allegations against him and his wife.

DOJ_NMG_0118466

The lawsuit was filed at the federal courthouse in Washington by lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union. It seeks an unspecified amount of damages for economic losses as well as mental and emotional anguish.

Like many domestic workers who accompany expatriates on assignments to the United States, the women had been granted visas that are conditioned on their continued employment with the person who sponsored them -- a condition that gives the employer tremendous leverage and that can pose a perilous obstacle to filing a complaint about mistreatment.

In this case, the women came from impoverished backgrounds in rural India, the suit said. They alleged a range of abuse, threats and exploitation. At least two of the women were given contracts promising salaries of roughly $1,300 a month for eight-hour work days, the suit alleges. Instead, they were forced to work up to 12 to 18 hours every day doing "backbreaking work" by caring for the couple's four children and performing numerous household chores, the suit said. They were paid just a few hundred dollars a month, according to the suit.

In addition, the money was never given directly to them but instead was sent to relatives in the Middle East, the suit alleges.

Now living in New York state, Fernandes, 39, Quadros, 40, and Sabbithi, 33, have been granted special temporary visas issued to victims of human trafficking, said a lawyer for the women, Claudia Flores of the ACLU.

The ACLU's Women's Rights Project in New York and the law firm Dechert LLP drafted the suit, which alleges human trafficking, forced labor, involuntary servitude, false imprisonment, assault, battery and other violations of the law.

Flores said arguments of diplomatic immunity can be overcome if the case involves a commercial relationship outside the scope of official responsibilities. In those instances, she said, the diplomat's conduct might not be covered by the Vienna Convention.

The exploitation of foreign domestic workers, particularly from South Asia, is a pervasive problem in Kuwait, the lawsuit claims, citing reports by the U.S. State Department and the advocacy group Human Rights Watch.

Victim Of His Power Grab (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

Chavez's Nationalization Disillusions Utility-Owner AES

Dennis W. Bakke remembers Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez as a charming conversationalist. Chavez loved to talk about baseball and closely followed the fortunes of Venezuelan players in the U.S. major leagues.

And when it came time to talk business, Chavez was supportive. Bakke, then chief executive of AES, wanted to know what the populist leader of Venezuela thought about an Arlington power-generation company spending about $1.7 billion to buy a controlling stake in the Caracas electric utility.

"He was very reassuring," Bakke says. On April 28, 2000, after one of their meetings, Bakke and Chavez emerged from the presidential residence La Casona all smiles, according to one newspaper report. Chavez called Bakke a "revolutionary entrepreneur who wanted to invest in Venezuela." Bakke said he had come to Caracas to "learn how to be a revolutionary businessman."

Seven years later, no one at AES is smiling, and there was nothing reassuring about the Jan. 8 announcement by Chavez that he would nationalize the telecommunications and electric utility industries, including the 82 percent AES stake in the Grupo La Electricidad de Caracas (EDC). The minister of mines and energy, Rafael Ramirez, said on Monday that it was a "reasonable" goal to take over EDC by June as part of a nationalization in which at least four utilities could revert to state control.

Ramirez didn't say how the Venezuelan government would compensate AES or other investors, but the mere talk of nationalization has knocked $138 million, or 15 percent, off EDC's market capitalization on the Venezuelan stock exchange. AES stock dropped as much as 5.4 percent after the announcement, though it has since rebounded.

"Taking risks is what business is all about," Bakke said in an interview yesterday. "The question is how much risk you take." In this case, he said, "we took too much."

Forbes magazine at the time said the AES move was "perplexing," noting that other investors were fleeing because they saw Chavez as an unpredictable, self-styled revolutionary autocrat. But Bakke, now retired from AES and running a chain of charter schools, said the opinion of AES executives and directors was unanimous back then.

"Now I think it was a mistake," he said. "Not so much doing it; you're going to make mistakes. You'd like to be smarter about how big a mistake."

Ramirez suggested that Chavez had "serious complaints" about the way AES has been running the utility, but Michael Shifter, vice president of the Inter-American Dialogue, said AES has simply been caught in Venezuela's political vortex. Since his inauguration last week, Chavez has moved to tighten control of a major private TV station and said the state would soon take majority interest in four international oil projects. Flush with oil revenue, Chavez has shown little concern for plummeting foreign investment.

DOJ_NMG_0118467

Critics say that the government's plan to create a new state power firm, 40 percent owned by the state oil company, is a recipe for inefficiency. El Nacional, a major newspaper in Caracas, reported yesterday that official data show that in 2006, EDC had the lowest number of blackouts of any of the country's 11 electricity companies. The paper said that in 2006, there were 148 hours of service cuts. By comparison, Cadafe, the most inefficient of six state-owned firms, had 34,536 hours of cuts, the paper said.

"It is very hard to find an economic rationale for these decisions," Shifter said. "This is arbitrary autocratic rule. Chavez makes his decisions according to a political calculus."

Back in 2000, that political calculus was different. EDC was founded in 1895, and Chavez was happy to have local investors, most of whom opposed his presidency, bought out. Local stock markets, in a slump since Chavez took power, rebounded after the AES investment. And Chavez was impressed by Bakke, a devout Christian who still believes that "the purpose of business is not making money or making a stock price go up, but to do something wonderful for society . . . in an economically sustainable manner."

Asked about the AES investment by a Venezuelan newspaper in May 2000, Chavez said, "I do not have to meddle in that, because I consider it strictly private." He said the company's executives "displayed a quite progressive vision."

For AES at that time, there were reasons to take the risk. Because so many foreign investors were nervous about Venezuela, the price of EDC shares was attractive. EDC paid out $184 million in dividends to AES in 2004 and 2005, according to the AES Web site. EDC has generating plants, about 2,600 employees and more than 1 million customers.

Bakke said the EDC investment was one of a handful made during his tenure that violated his own guidelines limiting AES's exposure in any one place.

Current AES chief executive Paul Hanrahan, who was a key player in the Venezuela deal in 2000, and other AES officials declined to comment for this article. But today the company is more diversified than ever, with 121 power generation projects in 26 countries and 14 distribution companies. And Hanrahan says the company expects to devote about 30 percent of its capital spending in the next five to seven years to alternate energy projects. (The chairman of the AES board is now former federal budget director and Carlyle Group partner Richard Darman; one of the directors is Charles Rossotti, former Internal Revenue Service commissioner.)

The breadth of AES operations today has cushioned the impact of the Venezuela news, but it could still be substantial. Shelby G. Tucker, a utility analyst with Bank of America, told investors that if AES does not get any compensation for EDC, it would lose about $1.5 billion, or about 10 percent, of its value. But the minority investors in EDC are Venezuelans, and analysts think Ch?vez will want to compensate them. "All signs are that the government intends to push forward and wants to give fair value for the assets," said Guilherme Paiva, a Latin America equity analyst for Deutsche Bank Securities. "Now what is fair value? That is the million-dollar question."

Pulling The Plug On Anti-Chavez TV (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, January 18, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 17 -- Inside Radio Caracas Television, actors make racy soap operas about love gone bad while an influential television host pillories President Hugo Ch?vez. Outside the station, none of that sits well with Alberto Carias, a beefy man with a bullhorn whose agitated followers promise that the days of Radio Caracas Television are numbered.

He makes no pretense about who made the decision -- the president, who is poised for sweet revenge against one of his most dogged antagonists, known here by its call letters, RCTV.

"Here they practice yellow journalism, treacherous journalism that goes against the people's rights," Carias told a crowd earlier this week. And then, discussing the entertainment side, he said: "The children are the ones affected for many years by the sex, by the violence of these programs that go against the morality of children, that go against the morality of the Venezuelan people."

As Chavez accelerates his country's shift toward "21st-century socialism," a decision not to renew RCTV's broadcast license is among the government's more dramatic steps, and one that has caused serious concern among free-press advocates. While Venezuelan officials have accused the 54-year-old station of having collaborated with organizers of a 2002 coup against Chavez, the Committee to Protect Journalists in New York, the Organization of American States and the Catholic Church have warned that press freedoms in Venezuela are in danger.

The case has attracted widespread attention from officials in Washington and Latin America, for whom the non-renewal of a license has echoes of right-wing dictatorships of the past, when newspapers and broadcasters were closed if they veered from the party line. Though self-censorship and slayings of journalists remain common, particularly in Colombia and Mexico, the closing of a media outlet for political reasons has not occurred in years.

DOJ_NMG_0118468

"The RCTV case is clearly a case of censorship and the most grave step back in the region since Fujimori," said Jos? Miguel Vivanco, Americas director for Human Rights Watch, referring to widespread manipulation of the media by Peruvian President Alberto Fujimori in the 1990s. "Chavez is not renewing the concession to punish a medium for its opposition to the government."

RCTV produces Venezuela's sappy soaps, known as telenovelas, which are wildly popular and have been exported to more than 80 countries. It runs an academy that trained 5,600 actors, journalists and technicians last year, and its news operation has 250 staff members and offices in 10 cities across the country.

Much to the bane of the government, it also features Miguel Angel Rodr?guez, whose three-year-old program, "The Interview," makes mincemeat of Chavez's government every weekday morning. Sitting before a giant screen where Chavez's speeches are replayed, Rodriguez and his guests, usually staunch foes of Chavez, dissect the president's statements and declare his government anti-democratic and incompetent.

"Could we say to Venezuelans that a person of this sort, Hugo Chavez, is rising up against the liberty of Venezuelans?" Rodriguez asked a guest on a recent morning. "Is this constitutional reform, the enabling law and this giant step to consolidate 21st-century socialism a method of finding a legal way to install totalitarianism?"

Government officials openly disparage RCTV's daily programming -- seeing its soaps as akin to pornography. The president has accused RCTV of "poisoning the souls of children with irresponsible sex."

But what really angers the government is what happened before and after April 11, 2002, when an anti-government protest ended in violence and the ouster of Ch?vez. RCTV, like three other major private television stations, encouraged the protests and, once Ch?vez was ousted, celebrated his removal. But when the interim government that replaced him began to collapse, RCTV and other stations blacked out the news -- which the government says was done to keep Venezuelans from rising up against the coup organizers.

The director of the station, Marcel Granier, denies taking part in the coup. "That doesn't apply to me," he said. "I was never in any of those meetings." Granier does acknowledge participating in efforts to mount a recall referendum against Ch?vez in 2004 that failed when the president won 59 percent of the vote. But he contends that RCTV tries to be fair, offering invitations to government officials that are usually ignored.

"What we have tried to do is preserve spaces for pluralism so that different opinions are heard," he said.

Government officials say RCTV has shown nothing but contempt for them. "They were part of the team of conspirators," said Saul Ortega, a congressman. "It's a subversive channel that skirts the law. In no other country would that have been permitted."

Still, the government has not filed charges against any of RCTV's directors. Officials cite the station's anti-government position as a motivation for the non-renewal of its license, set to expire at the end of May.

William Lara, the communications minister, told a delegation from the Committee to Protect Journalists that the station violated a vaguely worded 2004 law by broadcasting sexually suggestive programming during daylight hours. But the government has never provided the station, nor the committee, with an official detailed explanation for the non-renewal.

"The government's decision not to renew the concession is a decision that lacks transparency," said Carlos Lauria, an Argentine journalist who headed the committee's delegation. "We are worried because this can have consequences for the exercise of free expression."

Free expression is exercised in Venezuela. Another influential television station, Globovision, lambastes the government frequently, and Caracas boasts a range of newspapers, many of them with an anti-government bent.

But the government has steadily been pressuring the opposition media -- prompting a once aggressive station, Venevision, to dramatically tone down its news reports. Journalists say access to information is routinely denied, and state advertising is withheld from some opposition media outlets. The government is now planning to close many press relations offices, funneling all information through the communications minister, according to a report in El Universal newspaper.

The state funds hundreds of community radio stations and numerous newspapers. State television channels run Chavez's speeches and forums where moderators extol the virtues of the government. In 2005, the government founded Telesur, a network for Latin America that Chavez says is a leftist alternative to CNN En Espanol.

If the government follows through with its plans on RCTV, it will mark the end of an era for a station that produced the long-running humor program "Radio Rochela" and famous telenovelas such as "Through These Streets," which dealt with social tensions, and "My Fat Beauty," a humorous look at its lovable protagonist.

In RCTV's sprawling facility, which includes a network news center, studios for soaps, editing rooms and warehouses, workers are trying to stay optimistic.

DOJ_NMG_0118469

Cameras roll, directors give orders from a control booth and technicians test for sound in a warren of editing rooms.

Sitting in the makeup room this week, with her hair being blow-dried, actress Hilda Abrahamz was wistful when asked about RCTV's future. She is working on the latest soap in her 25-year career at the station.

"Here, I was born as an actress," she said. "I owe my artistic career to Radio Caracas because they gave me the opportunity to start here."

Border Agent Kills Immigrant; Mexican Government Protests (NYT)

By Jonathan Clark

The New York Times, January 18, 2007

BISBEE, Ariz., Jan. 17 —A Mexican immigrant was shot and killed on Friday by a Border Patrol agent in Arizona, prompting an investigation by federal authorities and condemnation from President Felipe Calderón of Mexico.

The immigrant, Francisco Javier Domínguez Rivera, 22, was shot as he and six others were being taken into custody by a Border Patrol agent, shortly after they crossed illegally into Cochise County in southeastern Arizona, between Naco and Douglas. Before he was shot, Mr. Domínguez Rivera scuffled with the agent, whose identity was not released, a Border Patrol spokesman said.

It was the first fatal shooting by a Border Patrol agent since Aug. 26, 2006, when an agent killed a man who was throwing rocks from the Mexican side of the border near Andrade, Calif., Xavier Rios, an agency spokesman, said.

The Cochise County Sheriff's Department and the federal Department of Homeland Security, the parent agency of United States Customs and Border Protection, are investigating the shooting.

The F.B.I. is also looking at the case and will review the results of the other inquiries before determining whether to expand its investigation, said an agency spokeswoman in Phoenix.

"Any time there's an assault on a federal agent, we're involved," Deborah McCarley, the Federal Bureau of Investigation spokeswoman, said. "As we go along, if information surfaces that there's been a civil rights violation, then we obviously would take a look at that."

Lt. Cmdr. Mark Dannels, a sheriff's department spokesman, said the shooting was prompted by stone throwing. A Border Patrol statement called it a scuffle but did not mention stone throwing.

Also, the two agencies' descriptions of where the shooting occurred differed by several miles.

Initial reports suggested that Mr. Domínguez Rivera was unarmed, Jesus Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, said. Officials would not be able to say for certain until the investigation was completed, Mr. Rodriguez said.

President Calderón, who took office in December, said at a news conference on Sunday, "I want to begin by extending my deepest condolences, and then my most energetic protest over the death of our countryman, a native of Puebla, who died in Arizona from a gunshot after having been detained by the U.S. Border Patrol."

The Mexican Ministry of Foreign Relations sent a formal note to the State Department expressing "its serious concern over the recurrence of this type of incident."

At a news conference on Wednesday, Tom Casey, a State Department deputy spokesman said, "My understanding is we have received a diplomatic note from the government of Mexico on this incident."

Any response would depend on the outcome of the federal inquiries, Mr. Casey said.

Prison 'Rewards' Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 18, 2007

Two former U.S. Border Patrol agents surrendered yesterday to begin prison sentences for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico.

Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, said goodbye to their wives and six children -- three each -- as they turned themselves over to U.S. Marshals shortly after 1:30 p.m. at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, the California Republican who has been at the forefront of efforts to have the prosecution reviewed and the agents re-tried, yesterday criticized the White House for not acting in the case.

"This is the worst betrayal of American defenders I have ever seen," Mr. Rohrabacher said of President Bush. "It's shameful this was done by someone who is in the Republican Party. He obviously thinks more about his agreements with Mexico than the lives of American people and backing up his defenders.

DOJ_NMG_0118470

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former "Agent of the Year" nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the agency, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after the smuggling suspect, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was located in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and was given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

"How will my children cope with this?" Patty Compean asked reporters as her husband prepared to turn himself over to federal authorities. "My husband is a good man and a good father. Sometimes I just don't know how this all happened."

The White House refused last week a request by Republican House members to keep the two men out of prison pending their appeal. Bush spokesman Tony Snow said that the case against the agents had been mischaracterized, that they had violated regulations and that they had been convicted by a jury.

The two men surrendered after U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone, who heard the case, denied a motion that they remain free on bond pending an appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans for a new trial.

"Because defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence, he is eligible for release pending appeal only for exceptional reasons," Judge Cardone said in denying the motion. "The court finds that no exceptional reasons exist in this case."

Both men were handcuffed and taken to the county jail for two weeks to a month until they can be transported to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to be housed in Mississippi, while Compean will be incarcerated in Ohio.

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said that more than 252,000 signatures were collected and that the petition was presented this week to the White House.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the Rio Grande along the border with Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

The government's prosecution began after an investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General located Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after the suspect's mother complained to a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot.

DOJ_NMG_0118471

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 19, 2007 8:22 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, January 19, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070119.pdf; agnb070119.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration's Post-9/11 Policies Under Fire On The Hill 4
Ally Of Posada Surrenders Cache Of Illegal Weapons.....9
DOJ Plans To Store DNA Of Terror Suspects, Illegal Immigrants.....9
Pentagon Releases Procedural Manual For Trials Of Detainees.....10
NYTimes Suggests Stimson Should Be Disciplined By Bar Association 10

Homeland Response:

DOJ Official Says Bush Could Order Killing Of Terror Suspects In US 10
Chertoff Urges Editors To Use Caution In Reporting On Threats, Emergencies 11
GAO Urges TSA To Assess Terror Risks For Rail System.....11
FBI Wants To Question California Man About Subway Mercury Spill 11
Many Families Of 9/11 Victims Face Estrangement 12
NYTimes Says Administration Must Extend Temporary Housing For Katrina Victims 12

War News:

Pelosi Says House Democrats Will Back Anti-Surge Resolution.....12
Questions Surround Petraeus Counterinsurgency Strategy...14
Casey Likely To Face Difficult Confirmation Hearing.....15
Mahdi Army Says It Is Under Siege In Sadr City.....15
Debates Over Iraqi Budget Further Doubts About Maliki Government.....15
Iraq Reviewing Diplomatic Protocols With Iran 15
Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For US Civilian's Death In Iraq.....15
Corporal Is First To Plead Guilty To Murder In Hamdania Case.....16
Biden Says More Troops Needed In Afghanistan.....16

DOJ:

Gonzales Defends Prosecutors' Dismissals 16

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Treasurer To Be Released From Home Confinement.....17
Breedon Moves From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss18
US Charges Two Former CVS Executives With Rhode Island Corruption 18

Criminal Law:

Gonzales Promises To Examine Milwaukee Crime Trends..18
Attorneys Spar Over Jury Picks At Libby Trial 19
Cunningham Case Figure Is Focus Of Lewis Probe 19
Judge Grants Defense Motion For Delay In Connolly Murder Trial.....20
Judge Gets Input Before Ney Sentencing.....20
Idaho Triple Murderer Charged In Unsolved Slaying.....20
Program For Addicted Prisoners Under Fire For Alleged Scientology Links.....20
Missouri Man Pleads Not Guilty To Kidnapping 21
Second Chance Act Defended 21

Civil Law:

DOJ Seeks To Block Wage Payout By New York Center 21
Study On Nicotine Raises Calls For Heightened Regulation .21

Civil Rights:

Jury Sentences Truck Driver In Immigrant Deaths To Life In Prison 22
Government's Expert Grilled By Defense Attorney In Mississippi Voting Rights Trial.....23
Bush Sees Possibility Of Pardon For Convicted Border Agents 23
Lawmakers Call For DOJ Probe Into Duke Lacrosse Prosecutions.....24

Cardin Asks For DOJ Probe Of Maryland Republican Campaign Tactics 24
DOJ Studying Washington City's Elections After Report Raises Questions 24
Abortion Rights Backers Lower Expectations 25
Robert E. Lee's Legacy Under Reevaluation 25

Antitrust:

FBI Raids Florida Citrus Firm Offices In Antitrust Probe 25
Mittal Discussing Sale Of Weirton Steel To Esmark 26
Microsoft Seeks To Question Iowa Class-Action Plaintiffs 26
Delta Pilots Seek To Testify At Airline Merger Hearing 26
GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Shows CEO's New Strategy 26

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Coalition Of Industry, Environmentalists To Push For Action On Climate Change 27
House Approves Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties 28
Indian Tribes Hiring More Big Law Firms 29
Sioux Tribe Asks U Of Illinois To Return Mascot's Tribal Regalia 29

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Los Angeles Officials Announces Crackdown On Gangs 29
Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Back Off Of Reporters' Subpoenas In BALCO Probe 30
FBI Launches Email Alert System 31
Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle 31
Mitchell Pushes For Cooperation From Baseball Players, Owners In Steroids Investigation 31
Ohio Drug Trafficker Sentenced To Life In Prison 32
Protest Follows Marijuana Dispensary Raids In Los Angeles County 32
In New York, Three Face Charges For Roles In Heroin-Smuggling Ring 33
Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People 33

Tax:

New Hampshire Man Holes Up In Home After Tax Conviction 34
Businesses Critical Of Bush "Withholding Tax" Provision 34
Senate Democrats Want To Increase Tax Collections 34

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Address Iraq, Domestic Issues In State Of The Union 34
Democrats Finish 100 Hours Agenda With Time To Spare 35
Senate Passes Ethics Bill 96-2 36
GSA Head Sought To Give Friend's Firm No-Bid Contract 37
Kerry Seeks Probe Into DOD Surplus Sales 37
House Bill Would Rescind $14 Billion Energy Industry Tax Breaks 37
Methodist Ministers Oppose Bush Library At SMU 37
Brill Expected To Replace Joseph At State Department 38
House Democrats Want Tougher Trade Restrictions 38
Hospitals Worry Bush Budget Will Cut Medicare Payments 38
Official Says NTEU Should Be Certified To Represent Customs, Border Workers 38
White House Usher Says Bush Is "Steadfast." 38
Ignatius Examines "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence." 38

Other News:

Bernanke Warns Entitlement Costs Could Weaken US Economy 38
Judge Declares Mistrial In California Vioxx Cases 40
Personal Attacks Mark Rancor On Michigan High Court 40
New York Bar Panel Urges Law Firms Not To Force Retirements 41
Groups Unveil Plan To Cover Uninsured 41
Martinez Faces Potential Revolt From RNC Members 41
Purchasers Of Edwards' DC House Focus Of Corporate Probe 42
Some Black Leaders Remain Unswayed By Potential Obama Bid 42
Gingrich Sees Fundraising As Major Barrier To '08 Run 43
McCain Campaign Said To Lack Clear Lines Of Authority 43
US Launches "Intensive" Diplomatic Effort To Restart Mideast Talks 43
Former State Official Says Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions 44
Pyongyang Says "Agreement" Reached With US 45
China Faces Broad Criticism Over Anti-Satellite Weapons Test 46
Somalia Seeks US Aid For Military, Intelligence Services 46
European Court Says Russia Failed To Investigate Chechen Torture Claims 47
South American Leaders Debate Future Of Mercosur Under Pressure From Chavez 47
Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People 47

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 47

DOJ_NMG_0118474

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 48

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration's Post-9/11 Policies Under Fire On The Hill. ABC World News (1/18, story 6, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M), the only network to report on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, said last night the hearing was "a dramatic display on just how things have changed on Capitol Hill. Now the Democrats are in charge." Gonzales "did more listening than talking. Anger on the administration's conduct in the war on terror came pouring out." ABC (Thomas) added, "The new Democratic Chairman of the Judiciary Committee accused the Attorney General and the Bush Administration of trampling the Constitution." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "I have never seen a time when our Constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government." Gonzalez "fired back that the country faces a ruthless enemy." Gonzales: "At the Department of Justice, every day is September 12th." But "Democrats, and even some Republicans, engaged in an often searing assault on a range of issues. On the practice of rendition specifically whether the US Should have sent a Canadian terror suspect to Syria, where the man was allegedly tortured."

Print coverage was markedly negative toward the Administration. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Schmit, Miller, Savage, 850K) says "the Bush administration refused to provide details to Congress of how a new court-review process for terror-related wiretaps would work, triggering a fresh round of complaints and suspicions from Democrats about what the administration was doing. At the same time, President Bush and other administration officials indicated that little had changed in the electronic eavesdropping program. … With Gonzales and other officials mum about the program's details, Democrats refused to accept their assurances. It was not immediately clear how that stalemate might be resolved."

The Financial Times (1/19, Sevastopulo), under the headline "Senators Blast Bush Security Policies," notes the Administration's "policy U-turn" on warrantless surveillance "comes just weeks before an appeals court was scheduled to hear the case, but Mr Gonzales denied that the administration's switch was related to the legislation."

USA Today (1/19, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports Committee Chairman Pat "Leahy and other senators made it clear that they remained unhappy about the administration's handling of surveillance issues. They said they will be watching how the program operates now that surveillance requests will be vetted by the court established in 1978 by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). 'For years, the administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans, I believe contrary to the law,' Leahy said." He added, "The Justice Department has been complicit in advancing these government policies, which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution."

The New York Times (1/19, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "In a four-paragraph letter on Wednesday announcing that the Bush administration had reversed its position and would submit its domestic surveillance program to judicial supervision," Gonzales "used one phrase three times. A secret court, he said, had fashioned a way to allow the program to be monitored by the judiciary without compromising the need for 'speed and agility.'" That phrase also "captures, some critics say, the administration's moving-target litigation strategy, one that often seeks to change the terms of the debate just as a claim of executive authority is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress. … In other cases, too, the timing of litigation decisions by the government has been suggestive." For example, "shortly before the Supreme Court heard a set of three detainee cases in 2004, the administration reversed course and allowed two Americans held incommunicado by the military to meet with their lawyers, mooting that issue. After the court ruled that one of the men, Yaser Hamdi, could challenge his detention in court, the administration instead freed him and sent him to Saudi Arabia." And "just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review the case of the second man, Jose Padilla, he was transferred to the criminal justice system last year, mooting his appeal."

Time (1/19, Bennett) reports, "Alberto Gonzales spent two hours every day for the last three weeks steeling himself for today's hearing before the Democrat-led Senate Judiciary committee, says a close aide. Staffers peppered him with possible questions that each Senator might ask. He went in armed for the fight with freshly penned letter to the chairmen of that committee — Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — telling them not to worry about the whole warrant-less wiretapping issue anymore; it has been approved by judge. It seemed like a nimble pre-emptive duck to take a contentious issue off the table. Some Senators thought it felt more they were being led down a rabbit hole." Time continues, "In an often-heated exchange, Gonzales refused to disclose details about the court's decision and exactly how it applied to the President's controversial wiretapping program. … The big question was whether there will be some genuine judicial oversight that monitors how individual wiretaps are being used, or if the court approval is a one-time pass for the entire program. Frustrated Senators pointed out that it was still unclear what procedures, if any, will actually change with the court order, issued on Jan. 10 by a single judge sitting on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court."

DOJ_NMG_0118476

The AP (1/19, Jordan) reports Gonzales "offered few answers" yesterday, "maintaining during 3 1/2 hours of sharp rebukes that disclosing details of the program would expose sensitive security information. His resistance was underscored by a letter from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's presiding judge, offering to detail some of its new authority with lawmakers if allowed to by the Bush administration." At one point, Leahy asked, "Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced? … Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?" Gonzales responded, "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential." The Washington Times (1/19, Seper, 88K) notes "both Democrats and Republicans on the committee demanded more information about the court's oversight role, citing a letter from FISA's presiding judge saying the court would have no objection to giving the panel confidential information, but it would have to be provided by the Justice Department."

The Washington Post (1/19, A6, Eggen, 690K) reports the Administration "quickly locked horns with Democratic lawmakers," adding the "debate underscored continued skepticism among Democrats and some Republicans over the parameters and legality of the administration's surveillance efforts, even with court approval, and signaled that Congress and the executive branch are likely to continue sparring over the details." The Post adds, "Although the precise contours and scope of the revised spying program remain unclear, some new information emerged yesterday." GOP. Sen. Arlen Specter "said Justice Department briefers told him the effort was based on 'individualized' warrants, rather than a blanket order that would allow broader surveillance. Four other people who have been briefed on the program, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the program is classified, described it as a hybrid effort that includes both individual warrants and the authority for eavesdropping on more broadly defined groups of people."

The New York Times (1/19, Johnston, Shane, 1.16M) also says "a Congressional official who has been briefed on the new procedures called it a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval." At the hearing, Gonzales "tried, apparently without success, to quell the flood of questions." The session "quickly became a forum for senators to say the administration was withholding pertinent information about the decision. House Democrats raised similar concerns."

The AP (1/19, Raum) describes the Administration's "about-face on warrantless wiretapping" as "the latest in a series of White House retreats and reversals. This is a different day for a president known for his stubbornness and insistence on seeing things his way. In just two months, Bush has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, sacked Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and given up the fight for John Bolton at the United Nations." He "has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 -- after aggressively presiding over record deficits and tax cuts; Democrats also have set such a target. And the president has agreed tentatively to increasing the minimum wage." Bush "seems to be bending to the realities of the new Democratic control of Congress - and laying down markers to keep the last two years of his presidency from being seen as only about Iraq." The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Grier, 59K) runs a similar report titled "White House Backs Down On Wartime Powers," in which it says Bush "has claimed some far-reaching powers for the executive branch in its prosecution of the war against global terrorism – but in the face of legal challenges and newly empowered Democrats, some of those powers slowly are being curtailed."

McClatchy Newspapers (1/19, Gordon) reports, "Until now, the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, launched in the months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, has monitored overseas phone calls and other electronic communications involving Americans without court warrants. … But Gonzales repeatedly rejected senators' assertions that it was illegal, saying the program was within President Bush's emergency war powers." McClatchy continues, "Testifying under oath in his first congressional appearance since Democrats took control of Capitol Hill this month, Gonzales was pummeled with allegations that the program and other administration anti-terrorism programs have trampled on federal civil rights laws and the Constitution. He also faced sharp questions about rising violent crime in some medium-sized cities, allegations of voting rights abuses against African-Americans in Maryland and his agency's recent dismissal of a half-dozen U.S. attorneys." McClatchy notes, "Leahy and Specter wrote to the FISA court's chief judge on Wednesday requesting copies of the new orders. Chief Judge Colleen Kollar-Cotelly responded that she had 'no objection' to making the material public, but that it's the court's practice to refer requests for classified information to the Justice Department. … Gonzales repeatedly emphasized that all members of the Senate and House intelligence committees have been briefed on the orders and didn't immediately say how he'd respond to the demand from the Judiciary Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0118477

The Houston Chronicle (1/19, Roth) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to promise a Senate committee that the administration would let it review the text of an agreement ending its warrantless wiretapping program." The Chronicle continues, "During a contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Thursday, Democrats said they wanted more details about how the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will approve federal eavesdropping on U.S. residents suspected of having ties to terrorists. … Committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was taken aback when Gonzales wouldn't commit to turning over the FISA order spelling out the domestic wiretapping program." The Chronicle adds, "In his first appearance before the Judiciary Committee under Democratic control, the Texas lawyer spent much of the day fielding often hostile questions."

Bloomberg (1/19, Rowley, Schmidt) reports, "Gonzales was also questioned about Bush's assertion, after signing postal authorization legislation, that he can order Americans' mail opened without a warrant. … 'To my knowledge there is no physical search of mail' unless authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, Gonzales said."

Long Island Newsday (1/19, Brune) reports, "Gonzales wouldn't budge when Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) disclosed a letter from the FISA court chief judge expressing a willingness to release the orders to the committee. … 'Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?' Leahy asked. 'Are we Alice in Wonderland here?' … Gonzales said it wasn't his decision, but added, 'Certainly in the application, there's going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential.'" Newsday notes, "Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) was also caustic in his questioning, noting it took Justice Department lawyers 19 months to win the court order, while he wrote a bill to do it in a year. … 'I cannot help but conclude there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency to get this done faster,' Specter said. … Gonzales said, 'I somewhat take issue with Sen. Specter's innuendo that this was something that we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks.' … Gonzales said the confidential briefings would help senators understand the orders."

CNET News (1/19, Broache) reports that "Gonzales' appearance before a key U.S. Senate committee Thursday yielded little new information about the Bush administration's sudden revelation that it would seek court approval for its domestic eavesdropping activities." CNET reports that Leahy and Specter "said they were pleased to hear that future activities associated with a controversial National Security Agency operation known as the Terrorist Surveillance Program would undergo review by judges on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. … But many critical questions about the scope and content of the court orders remain unanswered, committee members said."

National Journal's Technology Daily (1/19, Noyes) reports, "Gonzales remained guarded throughout the hearing and refused to answer a number of questions asked by committee" members. "Government lawyers are slated to appear before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in two weeks to challenge a lawsuit filed by the ACLU over the NSA program. The ACLU said a ruling remains important because the president still believes in his 'inherent authority to engage in wiretapping without the oversight of the [Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act] court.'"

Leahy Grills Gonzales On Arar. The Canadian Press (1/19, Gorham) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, lambasted by an irate senator Thursday over how Maher Arar was treated by American authorities, said he'll try to release more information about the case next week." CP continues, "Democrat Patrick Leahy, who heads the Senate judiciary committee, told Gonzales that officials knew 'damn well' Arar would be tortured when they deported him to Syria and Canadians are 'justifiably upset' about a matter that's 'beneath the dignity' of the U.S. … He also wanted to know why Arar remains on the U.S. security watch list despite being exonerated of any terrorist link … 'This country has not said anything at all, that we made a mistake or had an apology,' said Leahy. … 'Why is he on a government watch list if he's been found completely innocent by this Canadian commission, which actually had the information from us?'" CP adds, "According to Canada's Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, there's no reason at all. … Day, in town for meetings on security matters, said Canadians have finally seen the Arar file that American authorities refused to share until now and there's 'nothing new' to suggest he's a safety risk. … For his part, Gonzales promised a briefing for senators and said he hoped to release the information publicly."

DOJ_NMG_0118478

Local Television. Nationwide, major and small cities broadcasted this story. Cities include: Washington, DC, New York, NY, Los Angeles, CA, Chicago, IL, San Francisco and Sacramento, CA, Dallas, Houston, TX, Boston, MA, Detroit, MI, Tampa, Miami, FL, and Phoenix, AZ. Some examples are: WRNN-TV, New York, NY (1/18, 8:30 p.m.) broadcasted, "Today, Senators demanded details from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about new orders putting the government's domestic spying program under court review. Meanwhile, the presiding judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court said she had no objection to disclosing legal orders and opinions about the program that targets people linked to Al-Qaida, but the Bush Administration would have to approve release of the information. Gonzales and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said it was uncertain whether the court orders and details about the program will be disclosed." KABC-TV, Los Angeles, CA (1/18, 11:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Senators demanded details from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, one day after the Bush Administration agreed to put the government's domestic spying program under court are view. The day after the Bush Administration surprised rehearsed of the wiretapping program, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appeared in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee." KDAF-TV, Dallas, Ft. Worth, TX (1/18, 9:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The President's domestic wiretap program went under the microscope on Capitol Hill this morning. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. Yesterday, the Bush Administration announced it had reversed the position on the program. Gonzales says Federal investigators will get court approval."

More Commentary. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (1/19), Dale McFeatters writes, "After a year spent fighting it, the Bush administration has made an abrupt about-face and put its wiretap program under the jurisdiction of a secret court, which many believe the law requires anyway." McFeatters continues, "The concession does not constitute a White House change of heart in its sweeping assertions of executive power, but rather a move to head off challenges to its warrantless eavesdropping in the courts and Congress that it seemed destined to lose. By folding now, the president retains the prerogative of reasserting the power later. … The Justice Department had already lost a challenge at the district court level and will now seek to have the case declared moot. The then-Republican Congress refused to ratify the program last year when its existence became known, and the Democrats might well have overturned it legislatively." McFeatters adds, "In essence, the administration said it would comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and seek warrants from the secret panel of federal judges for its monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States, a process that it had insisted before was too slow and too cumbersome. … Still, questions remain about what the new compliance, under what the Justice Department says is an 'innovative' arrangement with the FISA court, really means. Must the National Security Agency seek individual warrants, or does the administration feel that blanket warrants are acceptable? Or does it believe a simple court approval of the program as a whole is OK? These are fair questions for the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees to put to the administration. … The Bush administration has been forced to scale back from a number of its assertions of unbridled presidential power -- detention without trial, military commissions, torture, secret prisons -- but that is hardly a wholesale embrace of civil liberties, due process and personal privacy."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/19, 850K) says that the Administration's "abrupt acknowledgment that it can, after all, track suspected terrorists without shredding the privacy rights of Americans inspires mixed reactions -- relief that the rule of law has triumphed, suspicion that the administration's concession isn't all that it's cracked up to be and, most of all, anger at the president and his surrogates for suggesting that any criticism of their tactics was tantamount to treason. … In a background briefing for reporters, a Justice Department official refused to be pinned down on whether the administration is now asking the FISA court for authorization to monitor each individual suspect or whether there is a broader grant of authority. This is unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0118479

Under the headline "Bush's Wiretap Surrender," the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "The Iraq War has been hurting…Bush's poll ratings for a couple of years now. But keeping him from political free fall is the fact that the United States has suffered no terrorist attacks since 2001, and the widespread belief that White House policy might have something to do with it. So count us baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender Wednesday on warrantless wiretapping authority that even the Carter Administration believed was well within the Constitutional power of the executive branch." The White House "may think this FISA concession will allow it to escape more onerous legislative restrictions. But Congress may now merely take this concession and codify it anyway."

The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (1/19) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would have Americans believe that, after years of asserting that national security depended upon the administration's ability to tap terror suspects' phone lines without waiting for the slow Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to OK the spying, the court suddenly became capable of instantly approving such wiretaps the very same week Democrats took control of Congress. … Is the administration trying to lose its last remaining shreds of credibility?" The Leader adds, "The administration is backing out of a program and a constitutional argument it previously labeled essential to national security. It is doing so in such a way as to make its previous assertions appear entirely disingenuous. … Retreating from a program that until now he has claimed was absolutely essential to stopping terrorist attacks on U.S. soil is either an inexcusable dereliction of duty, or a tacit admission that his previous claim was utter baloney."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/19) editorializes, "That sound you don't hear is one hand clapping. The Bush administration has surprisingly reversed itself on its anti-terrorism policy of eavesdropping on Americans without warrants, something that certainly deserves support and praise. But it would be unwise to get carried away." The Post-Gazette continues, "After all, this is the reversal of a policy that never should have been adopted in the first place. While Americans certainly want their government to root out terrorists and while they understand that tapping phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States may be necessary in some cases, many don't want such surveillance to be done without regard to the law. … This high disdain for legal procedures in the pursuit of warrantless surveillance has been going on for years, and it has been as shocking as it has been unnecessary. The nation lost much on 9/11 and it does not have to junk its traditional civil-liberty protections to achieve security, or so many Americans believe." The Post-Gazette adds, "Unfortunately, the Bush administration is not among the believers. After the attacks in 2001, the executive branch asserted a theory of executive ascendancy that, in the name of fighting the war on terror, was bolder and more far-reaching than any of its recent predecessors. The presidency has become something of an imperial institution that recognizes no restraints on its power. … Now supposedly an arrangement has been worked out that allows the court to oversee the National Security Agency's spying program 'with the speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al-Qaida,' as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales put it. Why this couldn't be done years ago and is happening now is not hard to guess: Congress is in the hands of the Democrats. … The details of the new program are murky and it must be taken on faith that this is progress -- a very big leap of faith indeed, given recent history. The administration, of course, does not concede that it did anything wrong. In other words, use the hand that's not clapping to cross your fingers."

The Portland Oregonian (1/19) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that, at the Department of Justice, 'every day is Sept. 12.' … Would that it were so." The Oregonian continues, "That day 64 months ago is worth remembering. It was a day of sorrow. Of mourning. Of unity. Of resolve. It was the day after congressional Republicans and Democrats stood together on the steps of the Capitol and sang 'God Bless America.' … It was also a day when the laws governing Justice Department activities were still respected. Americans still believed, for example, that the Justice Department still complied with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It was years before the public would learn that the department had electronically eavesdropped on people suspected of links to terrorism without seeking the legally required approval from a secret federal court." The Oregonian adds, "That seems like a long time ago now. On a Thursday when the committee chairman shouted at Gonzales and the attorney general responded with characteristic dismissiveness, the Justice Department let it be known that it had decided to resume complying with the law that governs wiretapping. Investigators would conduct such surveillance under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as critics had demanded, Gonzales said. … The Justice Department is acknowledging now that, contrary to earlier assertions, it won't be too burdensome to get approval from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court when it wants to eavesdrop. In fact, Gonzales said Thursday, the program allows 'the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat.' … The threat is real, as we knew well on Sept. 12. And as we know now, lost liberty is no phantom."

DOJ_NMG_0118480

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (1/19) editorializes, "When a federal judge ruled last summer against President Bush's claim that he had full authority to order wiretaps of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails, he scolded her for not understanding 'the nature of the world in which we live.' … With his abrupt turnaround on domestic surveillance, the president seems to be starting to acknowledge that he is the one who has been out of touch." The Star-Ledger continues, "Congress will need to press harder to curb the White House's impulses toward secrecy. But Democrats, who are now the majority on the Hill, must be careful not to abridge executive power to the point of crippling the presidency, as Congress did in the wake of the Vietnam War. The Bush administration is not wrong that times of threat can require a president to assert unique authority. One of the many failures of the Bush administration is that it has so abused that authority as to jeopardize it entirely."

Ally Of Posada Surrenders Cache Of Illegal Weapons. The Miami Herald (1/19, Weaver) reports, "An ally of Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles turned over a stockpile of illegal machine guns, dynamite and a grenade launcher to federal agents this week in a bid to reduce his prison sentence, several sources familiar with the arms surrender said." The Herald continues, "Santiago Alvarez, a wealthy Miami developer convicted last fall on a weapons-conspiracy charge, arranged for the turnover of the new cache of firearms on Wednesday at his attorney's office in downtown Miami, sources said." The Herald adds, "Alvarez and convicted co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat are seeking to reduce their respective four- and three-year prison sentences by one or more years. The unusual arms surrender has no connection to Posada's latest troubles with federal authorities. … The Alvarez stash consisted of dozens of machine guns, rifles, C-4 explosive, dynamite, detonators, a grenade launcher and ammunition, sources said. The cache was considerably larger than the nine illegal firearms seized by federal agents in late 2005 when Alvarez and Mitat were first indicted on weapons charges in Broward County." The Herald notes, "Agents for the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives collected the latest stash of weapons at the Miami law office of Silvia Piñera-Vazquez and Sofia Powell-Cosio. The lawyers were granted temporary immunity to surrender the firearms to federal authorities on behalf of their clients, Alvarez and Mitat. Piñera-Vazquez, who declined to comment for this article, personally delivered a letter to the U.S. attorney's office on Tuesday detailing the proposed weapons turnover."

DOJ Plans To Store DNA Of Terror Suspects, Illegal Immigrants. The Arizona Republic (1/19, House, Wagner) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to add DNA from undocumented immigrants, suspected terrorists and other detainees to the FBI's national crime database, a move pushed by Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl and Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio." The Republic continues, "The federal database now only includes the DNA of felons and some misdemeanor offenders. The new plan would add the DNA of individuals who may never be convicted of a crime. … 'The (Department of Justice) is engaged in extensive consultation with affected agencies and is moving forward to issue the implementing regulations,' department spokesman Erick Ablin confirmed Thursday." The Republic adds, "Proponents say the move will help to solve more crimes. … Opponents call it a mistake. … 'People will end up in this database even without probable cause for their arrest or detention,' said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C." The Republic notes, "It could be more than a year before the Justice Department plan is finalized to collect DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, terrorism suspects and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses. … A draft proposal is only now circulating internally within the Justice Department and its agencies. The plan also must be sent to other affected agencies outside of the Justice Department, and to the White House Office of Management and Budget. Officials would not release a copy of that draft."

USA Today (1/19, Willing) reports, "The federal government could add DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, captives in the war on terrorism and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses to the FBI's crime-fighting database under a plan being finalized by the Justice Department." USA continues, "Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, confirmed the plan, which hasn't been publicly disclosed, and said details are expected to be completed soon. … Proponents of the plan, including U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Maricopa County, Ariz., Sheriff Joe Arpaio, say taking DNA from federal detainees would solve many crimes committed by illegal immigrants and make it easier to identify and track potential terrorists. … Opponents, such as Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, say such mass seizures of DNA violate privacy and do little to improve law enforcement." USA adds, "Fredrickson says the law that defines federal detainees is so broad that it could apply to hikers stopped by park rangers or airline passengers selected for screening. Authorization for taking the DNA was included in a bill reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act that President Bush signed last year. … The DNA samples, which contain an individual's unique genetic code, would be compared against genetic profiles from 3.9 million criminals and 157,000 unsolved crimes held by the system of federal and state DNA databases that the FBI administers. The FBI says its system has aided more than 41,000 criminal investigations since 1990. … DNA from federal arrestees and detainees would be held on a computer index, enabling law enforcement to track illegal immigrants who return after being expelled from the USA or who commit crimes after being released. War-on-terrorism detainees, who often use aliases, could be positively identified by DNA and linked to evidence seized at suspected terrorist sites."

DOJ_NMG_0118481

Pentagon Releases Procedural Manual For Trials Of Detainees. The AP (1/18, Flaherty) reports Pentagon "set rules Thursday for detainee trials that could allow terror suspects to be convicted and perhaps executed using hearsay testimony and coerced statements, setting up a new clash between President Bush and Congress." The Pentagon said the rules, laid out in a 238-page manual, "are fair." Congressional Democrats "said they would hold hearings and revive legislation on the plan, and human rights organizations complained that the regulations would allow evidence that would not be tolerated in civilian or military courtrooms." The Washington Post (1/19, A13, Smith, 690K) reports the manual "is meant to prescribe how military commissions will try some of the roughly 395 prisoners now detained at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Officials predicted yesterday that 60 to 80 will face the commissions."

The New York Times (1/19, Mazzetti, 1.16M) says the new procedures "follow the guidelines Congress set down in the Military Commissions Act late last year." The manual "explicitly forbids military prosecutors from using evidence obtained through torture. At the same time, it makes a distinction between torture and coercion, allowing testimony that came as the result of coercive techniques used by military and intelligence officials until late 2005, when Congress passed a law banning cruel and inhumane treatment of prisoners." USA Today (1/19, Biskupic, 2.27M) says the manual's release "triggered a fresh round of questions and criticism Thursday about the administration's handling of detainees."

NYTimes Suggests Stimson Should Be Disciplined By Bar Association. Under the headline "Apology Not Accepted," the New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is hard to render a convincing apology when you are not really apologizing. Consider Charles Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of state for detainee affairs, who has been trying to spin his way out of his loathsome attempt to punish lawyers who represent inmates of the Guantánamo Bay internment camp. ... On Wednesday, Mr. Stimson said he apologized and regretted that his comments 'left the impression' that he was attacking the integrity of those lawyers. It was not just an impression. It was exactly what he did. ... Stimson's appalling behavior should not be overlooked by the relevant bar disciplinary committee."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOJ Official Says Bush Could Order Killing Of Terror Suspects In US. Newsweek (2/13, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "In the latest twist in the debate over presidential powers, a Justice Department official suggested that in certain circumstances, the president might have the power to order the killing of terrorist suspects inside the United States." During Office of Legal Counsel acting director Steven Bradbury's Senate intelligence committee testimony about the NSA surveillance program last week, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein asked Bradbury questions about the extent of presidential powers to fight Al Qaeda; could Bush, for instance, order the killing of a Qaeda suspect known to be on U.S. soil? Bradbury replied that he believed Bush could indeed do this, at least in certain circumstances." Newsday notes, "At a public intel-committee hearing, Feinstein was told by intel czar John Negroponte and FBI chief Robert Mueller that they were unaware of any case in which a U.S. agency was authorized to kill a Qaeda-linked person on U.S. soil. Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, told NEWSWEEK: 'Mr. Bradbury's meeting was an informal, off-the-record briefing about the legal analysis behind the president's terrorist-surveillance program. He was not presenting the legal views of the Justice Department on hypothetical scenarios outside of the terrorist-surveillance program.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118482

Chertoff Urges Editors To Use Caution In Reporting On Threats, Emergencies. The AP (1/18, Lumpkin) reported, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told newspaper editors Thursday they should use caution and context in reporting about threats or emergencies. 'We owe you information that's accurate,' he said, 'and you need to resist the temptation to just get something fast.'" Chertoff "invited the media to continue to participate in a series of dialogues and exercises his department has been conducting on how best to communicate information during a crisis." He said that threats "of limited credibility" must "be run down and investigated," but "shouldn't become public during that stage." Meanwhile, "he said, when information is shared with state and local officials, department officials are aware that 'very likely this information is going to get out.' Then the issue is one of context, and he urged editors to use good judgment." Still "more is at stake, he warned, in reporting on actual emergencies, because people immediately want to know what they should do to protect themselves. In this regard, Chertoff warned the editors against over-reliance on dubious experts."

Recounting a recent bomb scare on a Carnival cruise ship heading into San Juan, Puerto Rice, USA Today (1/19, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Five years after 9/11 and the 2001 anthrax attacks caused a spike in false threats, senior federal officials say they still are forced to run down hoaxes nearly every day, creating a huge drain on agents' ability to pursue real threats to the nation's security. … On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because 'people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety.'" USA Today devotes a significant amount of space to the listing hoaxes that have been in the news. "Charlie Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer, says hoaxes and bogus tips come in 'almost on a daily basis.'" USA notes, "At police stations and FBI offices across the country hoaxes are 'a serious drain,' says Ken Wainstein, head of the Justice Department's National Security Division. 'These terror hoaxes distract law enforcement.' … They also scare people. … On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because 'people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety.' … The department posts Internet hoaxes on its website to reassure citizens and encourage them not to pass on bogus e-mailed chain letters. Among those that have been circulating for several years, the website says, is a fake government warning that someone bought $32,000 worth of United Parcel Service (UPS) uniforms off eBay. The fraudulent message urges people to be wary if a UPS employee comes to their door."

GAO Urges TSA To Assess Terror Risks For Rail System. The AP (1/18, De La Cruz) reported GAO officials told members of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee Thursday that the Transportation Security Administration has "yet to assess the risks of a terror attack on the nation's passenger rail system," and that until it does, "the agency may not know which rail systems are more at risk than others. 'Given competing priorities and limited homeland security resources, difficult policy decisions have to be made by Congress and the executive branch to prioritize security efforts and direct resources to areas of greatest risk,'" said Cathleen Berrick, the GAO's director of homeland security and justice issues. "TSA Director Edmund S. 'Kip' Hawley said the agency is working with a host of other federal agencies and entities to make sure passenger rail systems are safe." However, "Several committee members were critical of TSA's efforts. 'I'm frustrated with the Bush administration's foot-dragging on measures to secure the nation's rail systems,' said Sen. Frank Lautenberg."

FBI Wants To Question California Man About Subway Mercury Spill. The AP (1/19) reports from Los Angeles, "A man seen on videotape spilling a small amount of mercury onto the platform of a subway station was wanted for questioning by police, the FBI and other members of a multi-agency terrorism task force. There was no evidence to suggest the actions were terrorist or criminal acts, but authorities wanted to ask the unidentified man why he was carrying mercury and what was his motivation for apparently spilling the toxic substance, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller." After spilling the liquid, "the man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill, the FBI said."

DOJ_NMG_0118483

MTA Admits Flawed Response To Incident. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Blankstein, Guccione, 850K) reports that in December, "officials quickly labeled it a harmless accident. But Thursday, officials acknowledged that the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority botched its response, waiting eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill. Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts. The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials such as mercury." The Times notes, "Several terrorism experts said Thursday that the MTA's handling of the incident was troubling."

Many Families Of 9/11 Victims Face Estrangement. The New York Times (1/19, Vitello, 1.16M) runs a feature on family separations among the children of 9/11 victims, writing that "one 9/11 family advocate said he had encountered more than 100 conflicts in which aging parents of a World Trade Center victim, desperate to remain connected to the children of their lost offspring, had found themselves in bitter struggles with a surviving spouse who would rather they did not. A mediator who helped negotiate settlements among 9/11 families in the early years after the attacks said 1 in 10 of his cases involved estranged grandparents."

NYTimes Says Administration Must Extend Temporary Housing For Katrina Victims. Under the headline "Nowhere To Turn For Shelter," the New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "In the long and sordid story of Hurricane Katrina, a new low may be approaching. In Louisiana alone, tens of thousands of displaced families who rely on the government to provide trailers or rent will lose their temporary housing next month — unless the Bush administration extends the standard 18-month time limit for their federal aid." The Times says "the temporary help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot end until the victims have somewhere else to go. And the federal and local governments have moved far too slowly in providing the necessary reconstruction money and building guidance." The Times states, "The response to the drowning of New Orleans has been a failure on every level." The Bush administration "must extend the temporary housing provisions immediately, then make every effort to shift aid recipients to the longer-term Section 8 voucher program." Meanwhile, the new Democratic leaders in Congress "need to quickly outline their own plans for salvaging New Orleans, so evacuees can once again call their city home."

WAR NEWS:

Pelosi Says House Democrats Will Back Anti-Surge Resolution. The AP (1/18, Espo) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Democrats in her chamber will back "legislation declaring that President Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is 'not in the national interest of the United States.' Pelosi's commitment came as Senate Democrats said they intend to begin advancing a nonbinding measure next week that criticizes the White House's new strategy." The Washington Times (1/19, Hurt, 88K) reports Pelosi "has made clear her disdain for the 'surge' proposal since before Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation last week, but yesterday's remarks were her first indication of the language that she will want the House to approve." In a preview of a "Good Morning America" interview with Pelosi, ABC World News (1/18, story 4, 1:05, Sawyer, 8.78M) showed Pelosi saying, "Democrats will never cut off funding for our troops when they are in harm's way. I think it is very difficult for the President to sustain a war of this magnitude without the support of the American people, and without the support of the Congress of the United States. That's why Congress will vote to oppose the President's escalation."

Clinton Joins Critics Of Surge. Sen. Hillary Clinton said on PBS' NewsHour (1/18, Ifill), "I think that certainly our strategy has not succeeded, and I don't think there's any doubt about that anywhere, including in the White House. The question is, what do we do now going forward? And the President's proposal to add 21,500 troops in an escalation of the combat situation is not going to work, in the absence of a comprehensive approach that tries to put some pressure on the Maliki government. ... For more than a year and a half, I've been in favor of phased redeployment of our troops, bringing them home as quickly as possible, but based on a comprehensive strategy that looked at the diplomatic, political, and economic challenges and exert some leverage on the Iraqis." Clinton made similar comments on the surge on Fox News' On The Record (1/18, Van Susteren), saying, "I opposed it, based on what I knew about the situation before I went, and I'm even more strongly against it now because I think the chances for success are limited at best. ... Here is what I think we have to do now. I want to cap the number of troops that we have at the number that was in country January . I want to start a phased redeployment of our troops. ... I think it's also important though to try to get the Maliki government to deal with some of the political and economic challenges on the ground which we have all been asking for."

DOJ_NMG_0118484

Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Rush To Join Surge Critics. ABC World News (1/18, story 3, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The war in Iraq is dominating the political debate in this country. But it really gets political when discussed by two Democratic presidential candidates, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama." ABC (Tapper) added, "Last week, anti-war liberals...were angry with" Clinton and Obama "for not saying they would actually try to do anything to stop the President's proposed surge in Iraq. Well, this week, Charlie, all that changed and the one-upsmanship began." John Edwards "threw down the gauntlet, attacking fellow Democrats for their timidity," and when Obama "announced his presidential exploratory committee, he made sure to remind voters that he never would have voted for the Iraq war to begin with. ... Wednesday, Sen. Clinton suddenly declared she would try to stop the President, introducing forceful legislation to cap troop levels, and require that benchmarks be met by both the Iraqi government and the Bush Administration."

More Congressional Criticism Of Bush Plan. Sen. Olympia Snowe said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), "Why should we be taking more risks with our troops when" the Iraqis are "not willing to take risks to make the political decisions and their own military decisions by confronting the militias and disarming them?"

Sen. Joseph Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/19, Blitzer), "We should be letting Maliki know that he's not going to get our help, if he doesn't straighten out and have a political solution here. And that is why the Iraqi Study Group, why Joe Biden, why Les Gelb, why everyone across the board, including the President's own generals, have said: Mr. President, we should be telling them we're going to be ramping down, not ramping up, because he cannot count on us to, in fact, be the fodder for his civil war. He has to make some political compromises." On MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), Biden said, "What made me realize how fractured this was is when we had Condoleezza Rice before my committee. It was stunning that 20 of the 21 senators, meaning 10 of whom were Republicans, absolutely made it clear they were not at all supportive of the President's new policy."

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), Sen. Jon Kyl was asked if it is "true" that "you stand firmly behind the President." Kyl replied, "Yes, I do. I think everybody said that the President needed to announce a new strategy. He's done that. It seems to me we ought to give it a chance to work. ... None of the President's critics have proposed an alternative that would work. They have a lot of different ideas about how to leave, to leave in six months, to start now and phase it in, to leave within a year. A lot of different plans to leave. No other plan to win."

Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), "What's more important is what the commanders think. And most of the commanders have said that they don't believe the escalation of troops door to door, urban combat like this, 25,000 troops in a city of six million people, is actually going to do the job."

Rep. Charles Rangel said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), "I think the American people are so far ahead of us and by the time we get finished with the hearings, the testimony, people under oath, really trying to find out what does a surge mean...Republicans in the Senate, as well as in the House, are telling the President we've had enough of the war."

Rep. Chris Carney said on Fox News' Your World (1/18, Cavuto), "I don't favor a surge. I don't think we can trust Mr. Maliki to deliver the goods."

Antiwar Movement May Be Reaching "Critical Moment." The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "Nearly four years into US combat in Iraq, the antiwar movement has yet to generate the kind of mass protest seen during the Vietnam War. There's no shutting down universities or blocking traffic at military bases -- no tense face-offs with police. But with the new Congress, the Bush administration's surge strategy (which critics deem an 'escalation' of the conflict), and increasingly negative public opinion polls on the war, this may be a critical moment for the antiwar movement." The Monitor says "one key reason that opposition to the war has been less overt, organizers recognize, is the lack of a military draft. Also, the scale of the war is different. There were four times as many troops involved and 10 times as many American casualties over a comparable period in Vietnam." And "only a handful of Americans are directly affected by the war or asked to sacrifice for it."

DOJ_NMG_0118485

Rangel Outlines Rationale For Resumption Of Draft. During an appearance on CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), Rep. Charles Rangel detailed his call for a reinstatement of the draft, saying, "I make the case that you cannot be for the war and expect that you've got to take 21,000 troops, people who have already served three or four times in Iraq, and just rotate them, sending them back, putting them in harm's way and now believe that other people's kids from more affluent communities should not make a sacrifice, too. It seems to me that we should not have a concept that we fight these wars, support the wars, with other people's kids. So if, indeed, it's believed by the people of the United States that our national security is threatened, there's no way in the world that we shouldn't say everybody should be involved in the sacrifice."

Questions Surround Petraeus Counterinsurgency Strategy. The New York Times (1/19, Gordon, 1.16M) reports that when Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus "assumes his duties as the new American commander in Iraq, he will be guided by a new military doctrine on counterinsurgency that makes the security of the population a chief objective. But a pressing question that is likely to emerge when the Senate takes up his confirmation next week is whether the administration's new Iraq strategy will draw on enough forces to ensure security -- as measured against the general's own guidelines." The five new combat brigades to be sent to Baghdad "would roughly double the size of the American force involved in the security operation there, about 15,000 troops. But as a whole, that would still represent only a small portion of the 120,000-strong force that would be required to secure the entire capital according to the force ratios outlined in the military's new field manual for counterinsurgency."

The CBS Evening News (1/18, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) led by reporting that President Bush "is running out of places to look for support for his new war strategy. ... Most of the public is against it, most of the Congress, and today, some retired generals went on the attack. And this won't help: A new Defense Department audit estimates as much as 15% of the nearly $22 billion already spent on reconstruction may have been wasted because of poor security in Iraq."

"Red Team" Of Skeptics Dispatched To Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Barnes, 850K) writes that "while the Bush administration is reworking its overall strategy in Iraq, military leaders in Baghdad are searching for new ways to improve the decisions and choices they make closer to the ground." The military "has sent to Iraq a five-person team of dedicated skeptics, known in military jargon as a 'red team.' In a war known for its missteps and unanticipated results, the team will be assigned to review, and question, military operations. It will attempt to predict how enemies will react to various missions and what the unintended consequences might be."

Egypt, Saudis Give "Cautious Backing" To Bush Plan. The Financial Times (1/19, England) reports Egypt and Saudi Arabia, "two of the US's most important Sunni allies," gave "cautious backing" to President Bush's Iraq strategy, "while a third, Jordan, reiterated the need for Iraq's Sunni to be given a greater role in their country's political processes. But the 'support' also came with a clear message" to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "in the hope that Washington may finally be ready to listen to its Arab allies -- a military solution alone is not enough."

Krauthammer Expects Maliki Government To Undermine Strategy. In his Washington Post (1/19, A19, 690K) column, Charles Krauthammer writes, "If it were my choice, I would not 'surge' American troops in defense" of the current Iraqi government. Petraeus "thinks otherwise. ... He believes that with an augmentation of U.S. troops, a change of tactics and the support of three additional Iraqi brigades, he can pacify Baghdad. ... I am confident that Petraeus knows what he's doing and that U.S. troops will acquit themselves admirably. I'm afraid the effort will fail, however, because the Maliki government will undermine it."

NYTimes Criticizes Means Of Informing Troops Of Extended Tours. The New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is bad enough for troops in Iraq to learn that their tours of duty have been extended. It is terrible for them to have to hear about it from loved ones at home rather than from their military commanders. This is what happened to about 150 New Jersey National Guard troops who had been scheduled to return home in March after having served in Iraq for a year. ... A day after Mr. Bush announced the troop increase in a televised speech, the National Guard in New Jersey told family members that their relatives would have to stay on. The news quickly made it back to the troops in Iraq through anguished phone calls and e-mail. Not until Sunday -- four days after Mr. Bush's speech -- were the troops notified by their Army commanders."

DOJ_NMG_0118486

Casey Likely To Face Difficult Confirmation Hearing. The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that "rumblings on the Senate side are that Gen. George Casey's confirmation as Army chief of staff is going to be a tough sell, especially with the Democrats in charge" and "even some Armed Services Committee Republicans are uneasy." Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) told the Post's Tom Ricks, "The chief of staff of the Army is the guy everybody looks up to. We were under Casey's leadership [in Iraq] for the last three years, and it hasn't gone well." Chambliss "said that he hasn't made up his mind whether to support the nomination." Meanwhile, Kamen says "there's even talk that the administration is concerned Casey is unconfirmable with the Senate in the mood it's in. So the White House may try to move Casey's nomination and that of Adm. William J. Fallon to head Centcom as a package along with the nomination of highly regarded Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead US forces in Iraq."

Mahdi Army Says It Is Under Siege In Sadr City. The AP (1/18, Hurst) reports insurgents in Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army fighters said they were "under siege in their Sadr City stronghold as U.S. and Iraqi troops killed or seized key commanders in pinpoint nighttime raids. Two commanders of the Shiite militia said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has stopped protecting the group under pressure from Washington and threats from Sunni Muslim Arab governments." ABC World News (1/18, story 2, 2:05, Harris, 8.78M) reported Sadr "is a fellow Shiite who helped Maliki take power. But in an interview to be published in the Italian newspaper 'La Repubblica,' Sadr confirms 400 of his men have been arrested."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/19, A15, Pincus, Tyson, 690K) says US intelligence leaders told Congress that Sadr "will probably lower the profile of his powerful militia in Baghdad and watch to see whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy of placing more troops in the city is aimed at uncontrolled violence or specifically at him and his organization."

Debates Over Iraqi Budget Further Doubts About Maliki Government. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Daragahi, Roug, 850K) writes, "It's budget time in Iraq, and the lively debates that have erupted would strike a familiar chord for observers of such talks in any American statehouse or European parliament. But war-ravaged Iraq is no ordinary country, and the murkiness surrounding many items in the proposed 2007 budget has contributed to the general distrust between sectarian factions as well as widespread doubts about the ability" of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government "to manage the nation." Nearly $2 billion of the $41 billion budget "is allocated to agencies beyond the oversight of the central government at a time when potential international donors have balked at tossing more money into what has been viewed as a black hole."

Iraq Reviewing Diplomatic Protocols With Iran. The New York Times (1/19, A8, Glanz, 1.16M) reports Iraq is carrying out "an extensive review of its diplomatic protocols with Iran and may place new restrictions on them, the Iraqi foreign minister said in an interview on Thursday." Recent raids by American forces have "deeply embarrassed Iraqi officials, who say that the United States did not consult with them before it detained the Iranians, who were properly accredited visitors to this country." At the same time, Iraqi officials "have been put in an awkward position by their neighbor, as the Iraqis concede that at least some of the Iranians appear to have been working with Shiite militias, just as the Americans claimed." As a result, Iraq "has decided to tighten diplomatic controls on Iranian officials, insisting on detailed itineraries for their missions here, closer coordination with Baghdad and pledges that the officials will not work with armed groups outside the government," Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said.

Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For US Civilian's Death In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/18, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A terror group linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility today for the ambush that killed an American civilian and three other people in Baghdad. Andrea Parhamovich was from the Cleveland area and she worked for the National Democratic Institute. She was advising Iraqi political parties on the tools they need to establish a democracy. She was 28 years old." The AP (1/18, Youssef) that the "a graduate of Marietta College...had been working with NDI in Iraq since late 2006 as a communications specialist advising Iraqi political parties on how to reach out to voters and constituents. She was helping 'build the kind of national level political institutions that can help bridge the sectarian divide and improve Iraqi lives,' NDI said." The Washington Post (1/19, A15, Partlow, 690K) says Parhamovich "is at least the fifth American civilian woman killed in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion." The New York Times (1/19, Maag, 1.16M) and the Los Angeles Times (1/19, Roug, 850K) are among the newspapers running sympathetic profiles of Parhamovich.

DOJ_NMG_0118487

Corporal Is First To Plead Guilty To Murder In Hamdania Case. The New York Times/AP (1/19) reports Marine Cpl. Trent Thomas pleaded guilty "to kidnapping and murdering an unarmed Iraqi civilian" in Hamdania in April 2006, year, saying "he and other servicemen went after him because they were 'sick and tired of getting bombed.'" Thomas "is the first of seven marines and a Navy medic accused in the case to plead guilty to murder. Four others have pleaded guilty to reduced charges in exchange for their testimony."

Biden Says More Troops Needed In Afghanistan. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews) if he wants more US troops in Afghanistan, Sen. Joseph Biden said, "Yes. When the President announced his surge, I made the case that he should be surging in Afghanistan, not in Iraq. ... Imagine if we fail in Afghanistan. What that will mean is Musharraf will cut even a closer deal with al Qaeda and with the Taliban, and if he doesn't, he puts himself in the position of being overthrown more than he is now. That is a radicalized country. It has nuclear weapons and it will be a disaster. If there was a totally just war since World War II, it is the war in Afghanistan, and we are not dealing with it properly."

DOJ:

Gonzales Defends Prosecutors' Dismissals. The Washington Post (1/19, A2, Eggen) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged yesterday that some U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign their posts in recent weeks because of performance issues, but he denied any political motives and vowed to quickly submit new nominees for the jobs to the Senate for confirmation. … 'What we're trying to do is ensure that for the people in each of these respective districts, we have the very best possible representative for the Department of Justice,' Gonzales testified, adding later: 'I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it.'" The Post continues, "Gonzales's remarks in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and other lawmakers about the forced removals of at least six U.S. attorneys, including several who have overseen some of the government's highest-profile corruption prosecutions." The Post adds, "Officials say the removals include those of Carol C. Lam in San Diego, who led the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.), and Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco, who has handled the probe into a lab at the center of a sports doping scandal involving baseball player Barry Bonds and other athletes. … Another recent change that has attracted widespread criticism from Democrats came in Arkansas, where U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock was replaced on an interim basis by J. Timothy Griffin, a former research director for the Republican National Committee. … Feinstein said she knows of at least six cases in which prosecutors have been asked to leave. She said she is concerned about the way the firings have been handled and about whether the Justice Department is attempting to evade Senate oversight of U.S. attorneys."

The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19, Tetreault) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday declined to say how many U.S. attorneys are being removed from their jobs and defended the practice to senators as 'good management' to replace them with 'the best possible people.'" The Review-Journal continues, "Gonzales said 11 U.S. attorney vacancies have been created since the law was passed but he declined to say how many were forced resignations. … The nation's chief law enforcement officer acknowledged that some of the chief prosecutors were asked to leave. … 'But that happens during every administration during different periods for different reasons,' Gonzales said. 'That fact that that happens quite frankly some people should view that as a sign of good management. What we do is make an evaluation about the performance of individuals, and I have a responsibility that we have the best possible people in that position. … '" The Review-Journal adds, "Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday that Bogden got a bad deal that will force him to end a 16- year career as a federal prosecutor. … By replacing veteran prosecutors, the Bush administration is seeking to build 'a farm team for Gonzales,' Reid said. 'He can farm out to somebody who drove him to work one afternoon."

DOJ_NMG_0118488

Nevada US Attorney Stepping Down. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19, Puit, Batt) reports, "Three days after Nevada's two senators said the Department of Justice had forced out Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada, Bogden broke his silence on the matter, confirming that he will be leaving his post next month." The Review-Journal continues, "Bogden's announcement late Wednesday came one day after Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, belatedly responded to questions about the matter by saying that Bogden was still the U.S. attorney in Nevada. … Collins also claimed that media reports regarding Bogden's ouster were 'erroneous.'" The Review-Journal adds, "In the issued statement, Bogden, who was appointed to the job by the Bush administration in 2001, said his resignation is effective Feb. 28. … Neither Bogden nor Collins has addressed whether Bogden was forced out of office as the senators contend, and if so, why. … He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced to resign in the last couple of months."

The AP (1/19, Ritter) reports, "Bogden, 50, made public his resignation with a statement issued late Wednesday 'after consultations with officials at Department of Justice,' he said. He declined to identify those officials." The AP continues, "He said he planned to spend the next six weeks ensuring a smooth transition for his successor, and said he had no idea whom it would be. … Bogden's four-page statement cited successful prosecutions and included quotes of praise for his work from local, state and federal law enforcement officials and a federal judge in Las Vegas. … His resignation was his first public response to reports Sunday and Monday from aides to Nevada Sens. John Ensign and Harry Reid that he would be replaced. Justice Department officials have not responded to requests for comment."

Krugman Says Move Was "Preemptive Strike." In his New York Times column (1/19), Paul Krugman says, "There's something happening here, and what it is seems completely clear: the Bush administration is trying to protect itself by purging independent-minded prosecutors." Since the "middle of last month, the Bush administration has pushed out at least four U.S. attorneys, and possibly as many as seven, without explanation." Such a "wholesale firing of prosecutors midway through an administration isn't normal." Krugman says it appears "the administration is really worried about where corruption investigations might lead." The "purge of U.S. attorneys looks like a pre-emptive strike against the gathering forces of justice."

More Commentary. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19) editorializes, "Whether the White House is disappointed with the cases these attorneys chose to prosecute, or with those they chose not to prosecute, or with their level of success, time may tell. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did tell The Associated Press on Tuesday that the removals were not politically motivated, whatever that means. .. Although the appointments of U.S. attorneys are subject to Senate confirmation, they exercise executive authority which the Constitution vests solely in the president. Therefore, they serve at the president's pleasure -- he can fire them at will. … 'The president just no longer found it pleasurable,' as one local former prosecutor said Thursday, with a smile." The Review-Journal continues, "Now, anyone is free to criticize the president's actions and to question whether the replacements -- whoever they may be -- are better qualified than those now packing their bags. … But Democrats in Washington, led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein of the Judiciary Committee, have tried to characterize this minor housecleaning as some kind of dirty deed. … Not only that, the very same Democrats who are now up in arms sat by quietly in 1993 as Bill Clinton fired U.S. attorneys 'sweepingly and without cause,' possibly because Mr. Clinton was firing prosecutors who had been appointed by Republican Presidents Reagan and Bush. … Whereas, given that U.S. attorneys serve four-year appointments, while George W. Bush has now been president for six, President Bush is now firing U.S. attorneys who he himself appointed or re-appointed. … Now such interim appointments pending confirmation -- should the president find it necessary to take that route -- are perfectly legal, thanks to a provision of the Patriot Act reauthorization bill, approved last year by the, um ... the U.S. Senate."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer To Be Released From Home Confinement. The AP (1/19, Porretto) reports, "Ben Glisan Jr., the first former Enron executive to go directly to jail after pleading guilty to conspiracy in 2003, is expected to finish a stint of home confinement after three years in prison, his attorney and the federal Bureau of Prisons said Thursday." The AP continues, "Glisan, the former Enron treasurer, pleaded guilty on Sept. 10, 2003, in the corporate scandal that brought down the energy company and rocked Wall Street. He received a five-year sentence." The AP adds, "Glisan, 37 at the time of his plea, spent time in two federal prisons in Texas — one near Bastrop, the other in Beaumont — before being confined to his Houston home since September, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Felicia Ponce said. That confinement is scheduled to end Sunday, Ponce said. … Glisan's attorney, Tom Allen, said his client will be on probation once he's free to leave home, but he didn't elaborate. … During court proceedings, Glisan admitted helping design financial deals that enriched him and illegally kept investment losses off Enron's books. … He agreed to forfeit nearly $1 million in profits from an off-the-books deal at Enron and agreed to not seek a refund of $412,000 in income taxes he paid on that profit."

DOJ_NMG_0118489

Breedon Moves From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss. The New York Times (1/19, Browning) reports, "As the court-appointed guardian and self-described fixer of some of America's most wayward companies, Richard C. Breeden, the former top securities regulator, is considered a pillar of corporate ethics and governance. … Now he trying to become another paragon — that of savvy investor in troubled companies. And in the coming months he will face his first major test: taking on the Applebee's International restaurant chain in a proxy fight." The Times continues, "Mr. Breeden's fledgling advocacy hedge fund, Breeden Partners, which owns a 5.2 percent stake in Applebee's, began its battle last month, when Mr. Breeden nominated four close friends to its board. …. Hedge funds, the lucrative private investment pools for institutions like endowments and pensions, and for the wealthy, are nearly always managed by former Wall Street traders or money managers. .. Mr. Breeden — a Harvard-trained securities lawyer — has no investing experience. But he is seeking to bring his knowledge of securities laws and corporate governance into investing in underperforming companies. … But what Mr. Breeden may lack in investing experience, he makes up for in other ways, according to his friends, who cite his hard-driving nature, his intellect, his attention to detail and his decisiveness, if marred at times by a divalike attitude."

US Charges Two Former CVS Executives With Rhode Island Corruption. The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/19, C2) reports from Providence, RI, "Two former executives at drugstore chain CVS Corp. were charged in a probe into influence peddling at the Rhode Island statehouse." The AP continues, "John R. 'Jack' Kramer, former senior vice president for corporate affairs and government relations, and Carlos Ortiz, former vice president of government affairs, were charged with one count each of conspiracy and bribery and 21 counts each of fraud for allegedly paying former state Sen. John Celona to kill legislation CVS opposed or sponsor bills the company supported." The AP adds, "Mr. Celona, who resigned from the General Assembly in 2004, pleaded guilty to federal mail-fraud charges the following year and has been cooperating with the government. … Messrs. Kramer and Ortiz have been on leaves of absence from Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS since 2004. … U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said the probe into statehouse corruption was continuing. CVS, which hasn't been charged, said it has fully cooperated with the probe."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Promises To Examine Milwaukee Crime Trends. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/19, Hoffer) reports, "Sen. Herb Kohl elicited a promise Thursday from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to look at the rise in violent crime in Milwaukee and tell him whether federal funding could be provided to bolster the police." The Sentinel continues, "Gonzales testified at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that covered issues from domestic surveillance to Internet pornography, all of which are under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Justice Department. … Kohl, a senior committee member, first raised the trend of increases in robberies and assaults in Milwaukee at a Judiciary Committee hearing last month. He asked FBI Director Robert Mueller, who was testifying at the time, to go to Milwaukee to study the problem first-hand and to give the city more federal resources in the form of additional federal agents. Mueller said he would "take a specific look at Milwaukee" but did not commit to travel there." The Sentinel adds, "At the December hearing, Kohl also criticized the bureau for taking money earmarked for violent crime prevention and reallocating it to investigate terrorism. … In Thursday's hearing, Kohl repeated the charge, saying the FBI used almost 2,200 'fewer agents in 2004 on traditional crime matters than it did in 2000 due to the essential focus on terrorism.' … In addition, he said, the Milwaukee Police Department received $1 million in federal money specifically for police in 2002 but last year didn't receive any. As a result, the police force was reduced by 55 officers and fewer police are on the streets. … Gonzales acknowledged that 'keeping our communities and citizens safe from violent crime is a top priority for law enforcement at all levels,' but most of the work is done by local police."

DOJ_NMG_0118490

Attorneys Spar Over Jury Picks At Libby Trial. The AP (1/19, Apuzzo) reports, "The prosecutor sparred with defense attorneys Thursday over several potential jurors and their opinions of the Bush administration, a debate that further slowed jury selection in the trial of a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton had hoped to have a jury seated by Thursday afternoon, but legal wrangling slowed the process. Attorneys for former I. Lewis Libby have weeded out of the jury pool the most outspoken critics of the Bush administration." The AP adds, "Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told Walton that defense attorneys had crossed the line when they told jurors the case was political and about war policies. … 'The jury will not be asked to render a verdict on the war or what they think of the war,' Fitzgerald said." The AP notes, "Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame in 2003. Because Plame's husband was among the administration's most outspoken critics, the trial is set to the backdrop of the war in Iraq and politics."

The New York Times (1/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "task of seating a jury for the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. did not get easier Thursday when a majority of the candidates interviewed were disqualified, mainly because they expressed deep distrust of the Bush administration and the Iraq war." The "attitudes of many potential jurors to Mr. Cheney and the Iraq war have upset the judge's schedule for the trial, which envisioned opening arguments Monday."

Columnist Urges Bush To Pardon Libby. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (1/19), Dan K. Thomasson writes, "If George W. Bush really wants to strike a blow for justice he should pardon I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby now before his prosecution costs the taxpayers one dime more. It is really time to put an end to one of the most bizarre and disruptive politically inspired cases in recent memory." Thomasson continues, "Libby, as most Americans know, is the scapegoat for a non- crime that involved the public identification of a one-time undercover operative of the CIA, Valerie Plame, the wife of a small time diplomat, Joseph Wilson, who tweaked the White House over its claims that Saddam Hussein was seeking nuclear material in Africa. Plame, the White House claims, had a hand in the agency's assigning her husband to investigate the claims, which were among those contentions used to justify the invasion of Iraq. Wilson found the claims unsubstantiated." Thomasson adds, "Now we are at the beginning of a senseless, albeit sensational trial brought about by Fitzgerald's decision to find someone in the White House to bring to ground despite his own discovery that no crime had been committed. He settled on Libby, an aide to Vice President Richard Cheney, whom he charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury and obstructing justice in the pursuit of answers he (Fitzgerald) already had. Libby said he first heard about Plame from a television personality, Tim Russert, but Russert denies the claim even as he concedes he talked to Libby. … There is some indication that (Fitzgerald) really wanted to nail the president's chief political advisor, Carl Rove, but settled finally on Libby, who is not known as an ideologue or even wildly political. His wife, who also is a lawyer, is in fact on the other side of most political issues, according to reports. … Severe damage, however, has been done to the First Amendment by an over zealous prosecutor who, among other things, insisted on jailing a reporter for not revealing her source for a story she never wrote, undercutting a policy and tradition that has been a bulwark of press freedom since the beginning of the nation. The result is a chilling impact on the role of the Fourth Estate as the watchdog of democracy. … So, Mr. President, it is time you exercised your own constitutional prerogatives and ended this nonsense immediately. Even if an impartial jury could be selected, which is highly doubtful in this venue, the trial is an injustice."

Cunningham Case Figure Is Focus Of Lewis Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A8, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports entrepreneur is Brent Wilkes, "a key figure in the case against former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham," is now the focus of the federal investigation of Rep. Jerry Lewis. Wilkes's firm "received defense and intelligence contracts with congressional help from Mr. Cunningham. The former lawmaker pleaded guilty in November to charges that included soliciting bribes from Mr. Wilkes and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison. Prosecutors in Los Angeles are examining whether Mr. Lewis may have improperly helped Mr. Wilkes's companies obtain government contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0118491

Judge Grants Defense Motion For Delay In Connolly Murder Trial. The Boston Globe (1/19, 413K) reported in its "New England in Brief" section, "A Miami judge agreed yesterday to a defense request to delay the murder trial of retired FBI special agent John J. Connolly Jr. until Oct. 22 to give lawyers more time to prepare. Connolly was indicted in May 2005 on state murder charges in allegedly helping longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi orchestrate a 1982 gangland slaying in Florida. The victim, John B. Callahan, a Winchester financier, was killed allegedly because the gangsters feared he would tell the FBI they were involved in the slaying of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler, who owned World Jai Alai."

Judge Gets Input Before Ney Sentencing. Gannett News Service (1/19, Rulon) reports, "The federal judge who will sentence disgraced former Rep. Bob Ney to prison Friday has received a barrage of opinions about how much prison time he should get, according to documents filed Thursday." Gannett continues, "Most of the 75 letters sent to the judge came from supporters, including a handwritten note from Ney's parents, and letters from childhood friends, his doctor, local officials, including Dover Mayor Richard P. Homrighausen, and several former staff members and campaign workers. … Ney, of Heath, pleaded guilty in October to two felony charges of conspiracy to commit fraud and making false statements. The charges stem from a series of free trips, meals and gifts Ney accepted from convicted former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others in exchange for official favors." Gannett adds, "His actions carry a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, but Justice Department prosecutors have agreed as part of Ney's plea deal to ask for a little over two years in prison and between $5,000 and $60,000 in fines. … Nine letters came from people who want U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle to sentence Ney to the maximum amount of time possible. … The former six-term congressman has been undergoing treatment for alcohol abuse since September, and in court papers, his lawyers have asked Huvelle to allow him to continue his treatment while incarcerated. … Several letters also included requests that Ney continue his treatment. … 'Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m.,' wrote Matt Parker, Ney's former campaign manager."

Idaho Triple Murderer Charged In Unsolved Slaying. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Reston, 850K) reports, "A drifter who brutally murdered at least three members of an Idaho family in 2005 and kidnapped two of their young children was charged Thursday with the decade-old slaying of a 10-year-old Beaumont boy abducted at knifepoint near his backyard. … Joseph Edward Duncan III, 43, was named as a suspect in" the death of Anthony Martinez "in 2005 after he reportedly told FBI agents he was involved in the slaying. Investigators also said Duncan's fingerprint was discovered near Anthony's body, which was found nude and bound with duct tape on a remote canyon road north of Indio." The Times notes that Riverside County (ID) District Attorney Rod Pacheco "vowed to seek the death penalty."

Program For Addicted Prisoners Under Fire For Alleged Scientology Links. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Etter) reports from Albuquerque, NM, "Last November, in a cedar sauna cranked up to 160 degrees, a crowd of sweaty men read books and chatted amid mariachi music. They emerged to nibble from a tray of raw vegetables or take shots of olive oil. … This is not a spa. This is Second Chance, one of the country's most unusual alternatives to the nation's prison systems. Founded by a Scientologist and former real-estate developer -- and funded partly by federal tax dollars -- Second Chance is a treatment program for nonviolent prisoners with substance-abuse problems." The Journal continues, "It is based on principles of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of the Scientology religion, who argued that toxins from drugs and pesticides accumulate in the body's fatty tissues, making it difficult for addicts to kick their habit. Saunas and vitamins are intended to purge these residues. Facing few options for successful long-term ways to treat criminal defendants with serious drug problems, 24 of New Mexico's 84 district judges have sentenced more than 50 prisoners to terms at Second Chance. … Even before it opened its doors to inmates last September, Second Chance and its unconventional methods had ignited a controversy in New Mexico's legal community. At the center of the debate are two former friends and sometime adversaries. William Lang, chief district judge in the area that includes

DOJ_NMG_0118492

Albuquerque, doesn't want his colleagues to sentence inmates to Second Chance. On the other side is Judge Lang's predecessor, W. John Brennan, who was hired by Second Chance to convince judges to do just that. … But Judge Lang says he is 'highly suspicious' of the program. 'If it is connected to Scientology, just say so,' he says. Second Chance officials and a spokeswoman for the Church of Scientology say there are no ties."

Missouri Man Pleads Not Guilty To Kidnapping. The Washington Post (1/19, A03, Lydersen) reports, "Michael J. Devlin, the suburban St. Louis man accused of abducting two boys and holding one for four years, pleaded not guilty yesterday in Franklin County, Mo., court to one count of kidnapping in last week's abduction of William 'Ben' Ownby, 13. … Devlin was also charged with felony kidnapping and felony armed criminal action in nearby Washington County, Mo., on Wednesday in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, 15. Prosecutor John D. Rupp Jr. has alleged that Devlin, 41, initially brandished a handgun to control Shawn, then 11 years old." The Post continues, "Shawn told Oprah Winfrey during an interview aired yesterday that he did not try to flee from Devlin because he was 'terrified,' even though he would regularly ride his bike alone and had access to a cellphone and a computer. He confirmed that he posted a message signed 'Shawn Devlin' on the Web site that his parents, Pam and Craig Akers, set up to search for him and other missing children. The post, which asked how long the Akerses planned to look for their son, was an effort to send a signal, he told Winfrey." The Post notes, "The Akerses told Winfrey they thought Shawn had been sexually abused during his time with Devlin, though they said they had not asked him directly. … Hornbeck and Ownby were found last week after police recognized Devlin's white pickup truck while serving a warrant to another resident at the apartment complex where he lived. … The Franklin County prosecutor's office, which would not comment further, said Devlin's first hearing will be March 15. His attorneys are asking for a change of venue for the trial. Devlin is being held in isolation in the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail, and his bail is set at $3 million in Washington County. … The U.S. attorney's office in St. Louis has been working with local prosecutors, but no federal charges have been filed, said local Justice spokeswoman Jan Diltz. An FBI spokesman in St. Louis said federal charges will be considered."

Second Chance Act Defended. In the Washington Times (1/19, 88K), Deborah Simmons writes, "Every year, 600,000 or so prisoners are given their walking papers to return to a neighborhood near you," and they are most likely to return. Sometimes, "we pay upward of $40,000 per prisoner." The Second Chance Act has bipartisan support and "fits comfortably into the mold of compassionate conservatism with a faith-based component." Simmons writes, "Either we can allow policies to continue as they have been and throw good money after ornery lawmaking, or we can change course slightly and experiment."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Seeks To Block Wage Payout By New York Center. The Buffalo News (1/19, Gryta) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department renewed efforts Wednesday to block a state court from approving payment of wages owed to 85 former employees of the government-closed St. Augustine Center." The News continues, "A week ago, State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek refused to permit the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in the court case, which is aimed at closing the human services center's financial books and paying the back wages." The News adds, "Wednesday, the Justice Department asked U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin to quash that case, claiming that it 'threatens to impair the ability of the U.S. to enforce its tax liens.' … In its latest legal effort, the Justice Department has filed a federal civil action against State Supreme Court in Erie County, the state Labor Department and Adam W. Perry, the Buffalo attorney Michalek named last year to serve as receiver to close the books on the center. … 'I'm very disappointed that the government is attempting to deny the employees wages that they earned' in closing down the center and ensuring all its clients were properly placed with other Buffalo-area human services agencies, Perry said. … Last February, Michalek ordered the shutdown of the debt-plagued nonprofit agency, which for decades had served Buffalo's black community."

Study On Nicotine Raises Calls For Heightened Regulation. The New York Times (1/19, Harris) reports, "A Harvard study concluding that cigarette makers have for years deliberately increased nicotine levels in cigarettes to make them more addictive led to renewed calls Thursday for greater federal oversight of the industry. … 'Given the harm that tobacco causes, it shouldn't be a game of cat-and-mouse to figure out what the industry is doing to cigarettes,' said Dr. Josh Sharfstein, commissioner of health for the City of Baltimore." The Times continues, "Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is now chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to reintroduce within weeks a bill that would allow the Food and Drug Administration to regulate cigarettes. … Mr. Kennedy said the Harvard study, which was released this week, 'is dramatic new proof that Big Tobacco is addicted to addicting millions of young smokers.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Kennedy's bill passed the Senate in 2004 but failed in the House. With Democrats now in control of both houses, public health advocates said they had new hope that the legislation — debated for more than a decade — could pass. … Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette maker, released a statement Wednesday taking issue with the Harvard study but saying the company supported Mr. Kennedy's bill. … The company, which is owned by the Altria Group, said its own reports showed that nicotine yields for its top-selling Marlboro brand were the same in 2006 as they were in 1997. Changes between those years, it said, "reflect that there are random variations in cigarette nicotine yields." … Cigarette makers have for decades denounced scientific efforts to measure the byproducts and effects of cigarette smoking. And for decades, experts have been arguing over the best ways to measure smoke from smoking. … One common way has been to use machines to mimic smoking. For years, these tests were done at the Federal Trade Commission. … In recent years, however, government regulators have asked cigarette makers to do these machine tests themselves. And beginning in 1997, Massachusetts regulations required cigarette makers to file an annual report with health regulators on the results of these tests. … In August, in a racketeering suit brought by the Justice Department against the tobacco industry, a federal judge found that tobacco companies had for decades 'manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction.' … In ordering strict new limitations on tobacco marketing, the judge, Gladys Kessler of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, also said that for decades, tobacco companies had "lied, misrepresented and deceived the American public.""

DOJ_NMG_0118493

WPost Says FDA Should Regulate Tobacco Industry. The Washington Post (1/19, A18, 690K) editorializes that Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's (D) "plans to reintroduce the 2004 legislation before the end of the month," are a "good idea that has languished for too long." The FDA "would have the power to require reasonable changes in the composition of the product so that it would be less dangerous to smokers and those around them." These "common-sense policies such as high cigarette excise taxes and smoking bans reduce the prevalence of smoking nationwide," and the FDA "should be allowed to do the same to tobacco's harmful effects."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Jury Sentences Truck Driver In Immigrant Deaths To Life In Prison. The AP (1/19, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver was sentenced to life in prison Thursday, avoiding a death sentence for his role in the United States' deadliest human smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died from dehydration and suffocation inside an overheated tractor-trailer." The AP continues, Tyrone Williams, 36, was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants. … A jury deliberated for 5 1/2 days before sentencing Williams, himself an immigrant from Jamaica." The AP adds, "Williams was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for each of the 19 counts of transporting the illegal immigrants who died. U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal will sentence Williams on Aug. 23 for the remaining 38 counts of harboring and transporting immigrants and for the conspiracy count. The maximum sentence for the conspiracy count is life in prison. … Williams looked down as the verdict was read and gave no visible reaction. His attorney, former U.S. Rep. Craig Washington, wept and wiped his eyes with a tissue. … Prosecutor Daniel Rodriguez looked grim after the sentence was announced as his boss, U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, spoke to reporters. … 'We did everything we could to impose a sentence of death. Nineteen life sentences is not something to be disappointed about,' DeGabrielle said. 'One human being had the chance to let those people out. That was Tyrone Williams.'"

The New York Times (1/19, Blumenthal) reports, "On one count of conspiracy, the jury left it up to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal to impose sentence. She set Aug. 23 for a sentencing hearing." The Times adds, "The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, presented anguished testimony of survivors and argued that Mr. Williams was the only one who could have saved the victims. But Mr. Washington repeatedly questioned why Mr. Williams, the only major African-American defendant among the ring of human smugglers, should be singled out for execution when co-conspirators made deals to testify for the government. … Mr. Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 of all 58 counts of human smuggling. Mr. Washington said he would appeal. … A first trial ended in March 2005 with the jury's finding of guilty on 38 counts but deadlocking on 20 others, including some eligible for death. The incomplete verdict was thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit."

DOJ_NMG_0118494

Government's Expert Grilled By Defense Attorney In Mississippi Voting Rights Trial. The AP (1/19, Dellenger) reports from Jackson, MS, "Attorneys for Noxubee County Democratic Party official Ike Brown continued a rigorous cross-examination of a government witness on Thursday in an attempt to find flaws in the witness' testimony." The AP continues, "Theodore Arrington, a University of North Carolina political science professor testifying for the U.S. Justice Department, examined the politics of Noxubee County and found that Brown and the county's Democratic Executive Committee are disenfranchising white voters. … He took the witness stand early Wednesday morning and finished at 4 p.m. Thursday after sometimes heated exchanges with Brown's defense attorney. … 'I think we destroyed the expert,' Brown said after testimony concluded." The AP adds, "The department accuses Brown of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation. … It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population. … While on the stand, Arrington said the government pays him $150 an hour during his investigations. Over the last five years, he has made hundreds of thousands of dollars, he said. … 'The weight of the government and their resources are against us,' said Brown, whose attorney is working for free. … Arrington testified Wednesday that Brown, the county Democratic Executive Committee's chairman, and others used racial slurs to alienate blacks who support white candidates. He also referred to six lawsuits prompted by complaints of voter irregularity in Noxubee County." The AP notes, "Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, closely questioned Arrington on Thursday about his earlier testimony and his investigative documents. Of the six election complaints cited by Arrington, five were overturned. The one upheld was the only election that took place under Brown's supervision as head of the executive committee."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/19, Gates) reports, "Ike Brown mobilizing black voters in Noxubee County isn't illegal. It's admirable, a government expert testified Thursday on cross-examination. … But University of North Carolina Political Science chairman Theodore Arrington reiterated earlier testimony that he believes evidence shows Brown and his associates have engaged in a pattern of racial activities that discriminate against white voters in the majority-black county." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … Arrington testified Wednesday for the Justice Department in federal court in Jackson that Brown, chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee, uses race to get his way and bully people who don't agree with the candidates he supports. … Also, Arrington said Brown and his associates had formed racial intent and discriminated against white voters in their actions. … But Thursday, Arrington said he couldn't identify any black person given preferential treatment over a white person at a Noxubee County polling place."

Bush Sees Possibility Of Pardon For Convicted Border Agents. The AP (1/19, Gamboa) reports, "President Bush on Thursday left open the possibility of a pardon for two Border Patrol agents serving federal prison sentences for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled and covering up the crime." The AP continues, "Bush said 'there's a process for pardons' and the case has to work its way through the system. In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Bush said the White House will review the case, and he urged people to 'take a sober look at the case.' … 'People need to take a tough look at the facts, the evidence a jury looked at, as well as the judge. And I will do the same thing,' he said." The AP adds, "Several lawmakers have urged the president to pardon former Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos for the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, who retreated to Mexico after he was shot and later admitted he was transporting marijuana while in the country illegally. … The agents began serving their sentences Wednesday — 11 years and one day for Ramos and 12 years for Compean. Both were fired after their convictions on several charges, including assault with a deadly weapon, obstruction of justice, and a civil rights violation. … Rancor over the convictions and sentencing of the agents has been simmering for months, and the two have become a cause celebre among conservatives and on talk shows. Their supporters have said they were defending themselves and have called them heroes. The agents' prosecution occurred as the issue of illegal immigration was being debated in Congress and amid campaigns for last November's midterm elections."

DOJ_NMG_0118495

Lawmakers Call For DOJ Probe Into Duke Lacrosse Prosecutions. The Washington Times (1/19, Seper) reports, "Did a North Carolina prosecutor, members of his staff, Durham police and a DNA testing laboratory conspire to violate the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players in bringing high-profile rape charges against them? … That is what Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and former chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, wants to know, calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales this week to assign Justice Department attorneys and the FBI to find out. … 'I have been following with great interest and deepening concern the prosecution by Durham County District Attorney Michael B. Nifong,' Mr. King said in a terse letter to Mr. Gonzales. 'I have done so not only because members of Collin Finerty's family are my constituents but because I have been accorded the privilege of representing all the citizens in this country and their interest in guaranteeing not only the appearance of justice but its actual implementation.'" The Times adds, "Mr. King said a review he conducted of documents and summaries of Mr. Nifong's investigation, along with discussions with other members of Congress, led to his call for the Justice Department probe. … 'I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case,' Mr. King said, referring to rejections last week of probe requests by Reps. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, and Carolyn McCarthy, New York Democrat. … 'I urge you to reconsider your decision.'" The Times notes, "Mr. King said the Justice Department probe should target Mr. Nifong and members of his staff, including investigator Lindell Wilson; the Durham Police Department, including Officers Mark Gottlieb and Benjamin Himan; and DNA Security Inc., including its director, Brian Meehan."

Cardin Asks For DOJ Probe Of Maryland Republican Campaign Tactics. The DC Examiner (1/19, Fowler) reports, "U.S. Sen. Ben Cardin is calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate instances of voter intimidation and election fraud the senator says occurred in Maryland before the November election. … Cardin, D-Md., made the request Thursday during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing." The Examiner continues, "The accusations involve former Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich and then Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Ehrlich was seeking re-election, while Steele was competing with Cardin for an open Senate seat. Both candidates lost. … Democrats blasted Ehrlich and Steele on Election Day after their campaigns sent out a last-minute voter guide titled 'Ehrlich-Steele Democrats' that targeted black voters. … Called an 'Official Voter Guide' for 'Ehrlich-Steele Democrats,' the Ehrlich and Steele campaigns mailed a 'Democratic Sample Ballot' to residents, encouraging them to vote for Ehrlich, Steele and a variety of Democrats, including state attorney general candidate Douglas Gansler and comptroller candidate Peter Franchot." The Examiner adds, "Cardin told The Examiner Thursday said he wants Gonzales to look at the situation in Maryland and around the country. … 'I would like to see election officials know and candidates know that there is a price to pay if they do not conduct their responsibilities as election officials properly, and as candidates there is a limit to what you can do,' Cardin said. … In predominantly black Prince George's County, the sample ballot cover featured pictures of three black Democrats — former U.S. Rep. Kweisi Mfume, former Prince George's County Executive Wayne Curry and Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson."

DOJ Studying Washington City's Elections After Report Raises Questions. The Yakima (WA) Herald-Republic (1/19, Muir) reports from Sunnyside, WA, "The U.S. Justice Department is looking into the way this city elects its leaders after a recent Whitman College report said the city's system violates the Voting Rights Act and keeps Hispanics from being elected." The Herald-Republic continues, "Four people -- including a former city councilwoman and a community activist -- say they've been in contact with a Washington D.C. attorney from the department's civil rights division about the study." The Herald-Republic adds, "In December, Whitman College released a report by Ian Warner, an undergraduate, showing that Sunnyside's at-large council elections create barriers to more equitable representation, a violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. Under the 1964 Act, a violation can be proven if there is a discrepancy in representation and there is racially polarized voting -- if people of one race vote predominantly for candidates of the same race. … Warner says he proved this by comparing thousands of voting records against a Hispanic surname list that showed Hispanic candidates got more votes in precincts with high Hispanic populations. … Warner and the professor who oversaw the research both say the Justice Department attorney, Sean O'Donnell, contacted them after an article about the study was published in the Yakima Herald-Republic. … 'He's obviously taking it seriously and thinks there are some legal implications,' said Paul Apostolidis, chairman of Whitman's politics department and the professor for whom Warner wrote the report. The Herald-Republic notes, "Former Sunnyside Councilwoman Bengie Aguilar and local Hispanic activist Hector Franco say they too have talked about Warner's study with O'Donnell. The attorney was in Yakima County last month to talk with them about bilingual voting materials when the article was published. O'Donnell took an interest in the story, Aguilar and Franco said. … O'Donnell declined to comment for this story. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said it's the agency's policy not to comment on such matters."

DOJ_NMG_0118496

Abortion Rights Backers Lower Expectations. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that as "the Roe v. Wade decision reaches 34-year anniversary, abortion-rights activists press the Democratic Congress for enhanced access to emergency contraception for rape and incest victims, and parity in health-plan contraception coverage." Nancy Keenan, chief of NARAL Pro-Choice America, "cautions, 'One election can't change everything,' as clear opponents of abortion rights still outnumber advocates by 219 to 165 in the House and 48 to 35 in Senate; other lawmakers have mixed positions."

Robert E. Lee's Legacy Under Reevaluation. The Washington Post (1/19, B01, Schulte) reports, "Today, the United Daughters of the Confederacy plan to fly a Confederate flag on Washington Street in Alexandria, on the statue of a rebel soldier who faces South. The Virginia Sons of Confederate Veterans will gather for dinner in Richmond to honor the man they hail as 'one of the greatest Americans.' … It's the 200th birthday of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate general who is revered by some and reviled by others. Commemorations and protests are planned across Virginia and other Southern states, proving that more than 140 years after the end of the Civil War, Lee is still a pivotal, controversial and complicated figure in American history and continuing race and culture wars." The Post continues, "In Virginia, where Lee was born, fought in the Civil War and died -- no matter whether he's viewed as a hero who fought brilliantly and valiantly for state's rights or as a traitor bent on protecting his state's right to own slaves -- his legacy looms large. Lee highways crisscross the state, including in the Washington region, Lee bridges cross rivers, high schools are named for him and the phone book lists hundreds of Robert E. Lees. … But beyond the heat and noise created by Lee's 21st-century defenders and detractors, there is a new move to reevaluate Lee and his legacy." The Post adds, "The premise of the new look is perhaps as controversial as Lee's image: As the South has become more racially and ethnically diverse and has prospered economically, perhaps the South doesn't need Lee so much anymore. Or at least not in the same way. Perhaps it is time to let him pass from marble icon and touchstone of white Southern identity into the annals of history as a charismatic and important human figure."'

ANTITRUST:

FBI Raids Florida Citrus Firm Offices In Antitrust Probe. The Treasure Coast (FL) Palm (1/19, Turner) reports from Fort Pierce, FL, "FBI agents served warrants and inspected computer records at citrus businesses on the Treasure Coast at the request of the antitrust division of the U.S. Department of Justice." The Palm continues, "DNE World Fruit Sales in Fort Pierce and Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach are alleged to have colluded to set prices, according to Richard Carnell, general counsel for fruit importer DNE. … Carnell dismissed the allegations. They 'ultimately will be seen to be meritless and have no substance to it,' he said." The Palm adds, "Federal officials weren't talking about the charges. … Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Thursday evening that she could not confirm the nature of the warrants, and agents for the FBI in Miami and Atlanta deferred comment to the department." The Palm notes, "Carnell said he knew little of the claims, but that it appears the investigation is the result of a disgruntled competitor in the citrus industry. … 'Frankly, it's a pretty litigious society and people try to air their grievances by filing claims,' he said. 'The investigators came in this morning and are looking at records, primarily involving the import programs from South Africa and Australia.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118497

Mittal Discussing Sale Of Weirton Steel To Esmark. The Baltimore Sun (1/19, Connolly) reports, "Sparrows Point owner Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday it is in negotiations with Esmark Inc. of Chicago to sell part or all of its plant in Weirton, W.Va., a sale that would likely keep the Baltimore County steel mill in the hands of the world's largest steel conglomerate." The Sun continues, "Netherlands-based Mittal has previously said it would sell either Weirton or Sparrows Point to satisfy Justice Department concerns that Mittal would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Arcelor SA of Luxembourg. The combined company, to be named Arcelor Mittal, would be the world's largest steel producer with annual output of more than 110 million tons. … But the Justice Department has the final say, and it wants Mittal to sell another subsidiary, Dofasco Inc., by Jan. 28. … 'The matter is still open and pending,' Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said yesterday. She declined to comment about Mittal's negotiations with Esmark, which took control late last year of nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp." The Sun adds, "Dofasco, a profitable Canadian company that makes high-grade metal sheet for the North American auto industry, is tied up in a Dutch trust, and Mittal said last week that it will not sue to release it. … During its nearly six-month pursuit of Arcelor, Mittal had promised to sell Dofasco to German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG if it were successful. However, in an effort to thwart Mittal's advances, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch foundation. … Despite agreeing to the merger in June, Arcelor has no control over the trust, which prevents a sale for five years unless the trustees approve."

Microsoft Seeks To Question Iowa Class-Action Plaintiffs. The Des Moines Register (1/19) reports, "The focus of the Microsoft trial in Polk County District Court shifted Thursday to the named plaintiffs and their relationship to Des Moines lawyer Roxanne Conlin, who is one of the attorneys representing the four individually named plaintiffs, as well as all other Iowans who purchased certain Microsoft products between 1994 and 2006." The Register continues, "With no jury present, lawyers for Microsoft renewed an earlier request that they be allowed to ask the individual plaintiffs about their connections with Conlin. The earlier request was turned down last year by Judge Scott Rosenberg, who indicated he might rule on the new request as early as Friday." The Register adds, "Conlin was visibly angered by the request and acknowledged that some of the four named plaintiffs were friends of hers before the case began. She said the request was unfair and a 'propaganda move' by Microsoft. … 'Microsoft is trying to show that the people with the most to gain are the lawyers, and that is not proper in this law suit or any law suit,' Conlin said." The Register notes, "Conlin and Minneapolis attorney Richard Hagstrom are co-lead counsels in the class-action, antitrust suit which is seeking as much as $330 million in damages from Microsoft for Iowa consumers. … In a similar case in Minnesota in 2004, in which Conlin and Hagstrom were the lead counsels, Microsoft settled the case, after a jury trial had begun, for about $175 million, which was less than half what the plaintiffs were seeking in that case."

Delta Pilots Seek To Testify At Airline Merger Hearing. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/19, Grantham) reports, "Delta Air Lines' pilots union is angling to put its objections to US Airways' hostile takeover bid in the national spotlight next week at a Senate hearing on airline mergers." The AJC continues, "Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta unit of the Air Line Pilots Association, said Thursday that the union has asked to testify on the at the Senate commerce committee hearing scheduled for Wednesday. … 'We're not leaving this to chance. ...We will not stop until this [deal] is dead.'" The AJC adds, "The union, which opposes US Airways' $10 billion-plus bid for Delta, last week announced that it temporarily moved its officers to Washington D.C. and budgeted $15 million for its lobbying, legal and public relations fight against the deal. … Delta's unsecured creditors committee, which will have a large say in whether Delta is acquired or emerges from bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier, has remained mum since US Airways boosted its bid last week by 20 percent. The pilots union is a major creditor on the committee. … While creditors mostly weigh the financial aspects of a buyout, they must also consider the chances that a Delta-US Airways merger would be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, and political sentiment could play a role in that calculation."

GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Shows CEO's New Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, C3, Kranhold, Johnson) reports, "General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion deal with Abbott Laboratories is the latest step in GE Chairman Jeffrey Immelt's strategy to redouble investment in the conglomerate's market-leading businesses, from aviation to health care." The Journal continues, "The companies confirmed that GE had agreed to acquire Abbott's laboratory-testing unit and a smaller blood-analysis division. The deal, which needs regulatory approval, is expected to close in the first half of the year. … The acquisition would mark GE's entry into what is known as "in vitro" diagnostics, or laboratory testing, while Abbott sheds a unit growing more slowly than other parts of its business. … 'In vitro' diagnostics generally test blood or urine for diseases from cancer to HIV. Germany's Siemens AG, a GE rival in medical equipment, entered the market last year by paying $5.3 billion for Bayer AG's diagnostic unit." The Journal notes, "The Abbott unit had sales of roughly $2.5 billion last year. GE would also acquire Abbott's smaller point-of-care diagnostic group, which makes testing tools used at the bedside in hospitals, among other diagnostic tools. … The proposed deal is comparable to one of Mr. Immelt's boldest moves since taking over in 2001 -- the $9 billion-plus acquisition of Britain's Amersham PLC, which took GE into bioscience and molecular diagnostics. Most of GE's $17 billion in annual health-care sales stems from diagnostic equipment such as sophisticated X-ray machines, ultrasounds and MRI."

DOJ_NMG_0118498

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Coalition Of Industry, Environmentalists To Push For Action On Climate Change. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A10, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports, "A new coalition of environmental groups and major corporations such as Alcoa Inc., General Electric Co., DuPont Co. and Duke Energy Corp. will boost pressure on Congress and President Bush next week to address climate change more rapidly." The informal coalition "will suggest that Congress and the administration move quickly to address global warming through steps such as capping greenhouse-gas emissions and discouraging construction of conventional coal-burning power plants." Although the US "rejected the Kyoto accord that created greenhouse-gas caps and an emissions-credit trading system for developed countries in Europe and elsewhere, some U.S. executives believe such regulation is inevitable here. They want more certainty about the future, as they plan for capital investments."

The New York Times (1/19, Barringer, 1.16M) says, "The diversity of the coalition — some members had already come out for other forms of emissions control, like a carbon tax or voluntary controls, but others had been silent on climate-change issues until now — could send a strong signal that businesses want to get ahead of the increasing political momentum for federal emissions controls, in part to ensure that their long-term interests are protected." The Times adds, "Many energy producers and manufacturers have expressed concern that various state efforts, if not coordinated, could lead to a scattershot system of regulation. Others worry that harsher measures, like a stiff tax on fossil fuels, the biggest contributor to global-warming gases, could be imposed if they do not reach a consensus on a legislative approach." The group is to be formally announced "the day before President Bush is to deliver his State of the Union address and offer the administration's newest basket of proposals to promote energy security and combat global warming."

Pelosi Says Climate Change Next On Democrats' Agenda. The Financial Times (1/19, Daniel) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "Thursday vowed to make energy independence and climate change legislation the next focus of Democrats' congressional agenda." She "said she would create a new select committee to focus attention on energy independence and global warming. 'I want a package of legislation through the committees by July 4 towards fully declaring our energy independence.'" The Times adds, "In the clearest sign the White House is responding to international and domestic pressure to act on climate change, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, on Thursday said that in the president's State of the Union on Tuesday Mr Bush would seek to 'balance the needs of security and, at the same time, also the environment. And you can expect him to make that linkage in the speech.' Making a more explicit link between energy security and the environment would be a significant step for the administration."

Global Warming "Catastrophe" Said To Be Unfolding In Antarctica. NBC Nightly News (1/18, story 8, Williams, 9.87M) reported on a trip to Antarctica "to see in dramatic fashion the impact of climate change on planet earth. Correspondent Lawrence McGinty of our British partner ITN reports tonight from the stunning landscape of Antarctica, a place he says where a catastrophe is unfolding slowly but surely." NBC (McGinty) added, "If you want to see global warming in action this is the place to come. The Antarctica peninsula is now three degrees warmer than it was 50 years ago. Once this glacier was surrounded by a huge ice shelf floating on the sea. Because of warming that has collapsed." NBC added, "Scientists fear we could be approaching a point of no return. A tipping point that would irreversibly change our climate and our world."

DOJ_NMG_0118499

Industrialized World Using Less Oil. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, Bahree, 2.04M) reports that "a largely overlooked factor in the recent plunge in oil prices may portend an end to the multiyear rise in crude: For the first time in years, the developed world is burning less of it. Fresh data from the International Energy Agency show oil consumption in the 30 member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development fell 0.6% in 2006." It is "the first annual drop in more than 20 years among the OECD countries." The "fall in oil use by the industrialized world is a sign that the reactions to higher oil prices by businesses and consumers from the U.S. to Germany to Japan may be adding up to a cycle-turning downdraft in demand." Other signals "have been popping up for some time: Demand for gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles has been falling, while investment in and sales of alternative fuels such as ethanol are booming. Even the Bush administration is vowing to reduce America's dependence on crude."

Climate Change Seen As Key 2008 Issue. The Washington Times (1/19, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Presidential candidates for 2008 mostly agree that global warming is a problem that merits government action, a signal that debate on the issue will be more practical than conceptual. Democrats actively seeking the nomination or thought to be considering White House bids say climate change is real and promise plans to curb carbon emissions, a view shared by several Republican hopefuls." The Times adds, "Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, are co-authors of a bill aimed at drastically reducing greenhouse gas emissions." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has said climate change is a pressing problem." And Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. "this week introduced a resolution calling on the United States to negotiate to join the Kyoto Protocol treaty."

Friedman Calls For "Green New Deal." In his New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Al Hubbard, the president's economic adviser, says Mr. Bush will soon unveil an energy independence strategy that will produce 'headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off.' Since everything the president has done on energy up to now has left my socks firmly in place, I will be eager to hear what Mr. Bush says." Friedman adds, "Neither the White House nor the Democratic Party seems to grasp that the public and business community are miles ahead of them on this energy/environment issue. The presidential candidate who finally figures that out, though — and comes up with a compelling energy/environment agenda — is going to have a real leg up in 2008." The "right rallying call is for a 'Green New Deal.' ... If we are to turn the tide on climate change and end our oil addiction, we need more of everything: solar, wind, hydro, ethanol, biodiesel, clean coal and nuclear power -- and conservation." Friedman concludes, "[W]hen the president unveils his energy proposals, if they don't call for higher efficiency standards and higher prices for fossil fuels — take your socks off yourself. It's going to get hot around here."

House Approves Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties. The Washington Times (1/19, Debose) reports, "The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade." The Times continues, "The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs." The Times adds, "The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress. … House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming." The Times notes, "Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units. … The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars."

DOJ_NMG_0118500

Indian Tribes Hiring More Big Law Firms. The California Recorder (1/19, Elinson) reports, "When the Pojoaque Pueblo in New Mexico decided to go ahead with a huge $245 million casino, resort and infrastructure development last year, they turned to the capital markets for financing instead of the bank loans or government grants traditionally used by tribes. … They also turned to mega law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe for legal advice on the financing instead of a more traditional legal resource -- Indian law boutiques. … 'When I started, it was a practice area that only a few boutique firms were involved in,' said Townsend Hyatt, who advised on the Pojoaque financing and, a decade after entering the practice, now heads Orrick's tribal finance group. 'As tribes have expanded economically, politically, numerically -- and certainly, as their socio-economic status has risen -- they have the economic means to hire law firms that they would not have hired before.'" The Recorder adds, "To serve this need, larger firms are increasingly organizing formal Indian law practice groups. Holland & Knight, Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, Dorsey & Whitney and Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman are some of the other Am Law 100 firms with similar practice groups, most of which range from 10 to 30 lawyers. … Those lawyers are kept busy. Tribes have to deal with federal law, state and local laws, large business partners such as Las Vegas casino operators and major financial institutions. … Litigation that ends up in a federal court is complex enough, but transactional lawyers face an added challenge -- they often have to learn the particular laws governing each tribe. Any detail of a proposed transaction may be governed by a unique tribal regulation. … The trend doesn't just mean more business for the tribes' lawyers. Large companies and financiers are increasingly interested in doing business with the tribes …"

Sioux Tribe Asks U Of Illinois To Return Mascot's Tribal Regalia. The Chicago Tribune (1/19, Cohen, Keller), reports, "In a 1982 halftime ceremony at Memorial Stadium, a 93-year-old Oglala Sioux chief and medicine man presented the University of Illinois with tribal regalia for use by the university's mascot, Chief Illiniwek. … The university paid $3,500 for the moccasins, blanket, peace pipe pouch, breastplate and war bonnet with 90 eagle feathers, all owned by Sioux Chief Frank Fools Crow, according to the university's archives." The Tribune continues, "On Thursday, Oglala Sioux tribal members, including Fools Crow's grandson, asked for it all back. … The tribe's demands are the latest in a growing campaign by students, faculty, Native American groups and the National Collegiate Athletic Association—which has already penalized the U. of I.—to dump the mascot." The Tribune notes, "A resolution passed Thursday by the Oglala Sioux asks the university to stop using the mascot and return the attire, including the original feathers. … Eagle feathers were replaced on the mascot's headdress with painted turkey feathers by 1990, according to the school's sports media guide. Where the original eagle feathers now are is unclear, both with the university and with tribal headquarters on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota. … University officials, already mulling the future of Chief Illiniwek, first learned of the demand at a trustees meeting Thursday."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Los Angeles Officials Announces Crackdown On Gangs. Under the headline "FBI Joins L.A. Policing Effort In War On Gang Crime," the Los Angeles Times (1/19, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III joined local law enforcement officials Thursday as they announced a campaign for the 'strategic dismantling' of two street gangs after the killing last month of 14-year-old Cheryl Green in the Harbor Gateway area." Mueller "stood with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Police Chief William J. Bratton, [Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee] Baca and others in front of a market in the tiny gang-plagued neighborhood as officials outlined their multi-agency attack on the 204th Street group and an affiliate, the Eastside Torrance gang. … Federal agents will provide electronic surveillance of gang activity and operate observation posts in the neighborhood; the U.S. attorney may use federal hate crime and civil rights laws to put violators in federal prison, where sentences are longer, officials said. 'We will be working shoulder to shoulder with police officers in these areas,' Mueller said." The Times notes, "Earlier in the day, Mueller told about 100 members of the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce that increases in gang violence were being seen across the nation but that the problem was a special challenge in Southern California. 'Los Angeles, for better or worse, is ground zero for modern gang activities,' Mueller said. 'Here in Los Angeles the ratio of gang members to police officers is overwhelming,' he added. 'This is where we in the FBI can help.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118501

The Los Angeles Daily News (1/19, Orlov, Anderson) reports Mueller "pledged to work with local and state law enforcement agencies to crack down on gangs and use federal resources, intelligence and laws to crush gang leadership. 'Taking apart a gang is much like demolishing a building,' Mueller said. 'Hacking away at individual walls and beams only does so much. But using federal drug and racketeering statutes is akin to dynamiting the foundation. Once the gang's leadership infrastructure implodes, all members are weakened. It becomes more difficult for the gang to operate, and eventually it crumbles.'" At the Chamber luncheon, Mueller told Bratton "that his 700 agents in Los Angeles would work more closely with the LAPD, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies. … Mueller also plans to use emerging technologies to investigate gangs, including databases that show the geographic locations of gang members, their bench warrants, shootings and those overstaying their visas." However, "Connie Rice, co-director of The Advancement Project, said smart law enforcement techniques are only part of the solution to reducing gang violence. … 'The best research shows that gangs do not exist in a vacuum. They have to have conditions to brood in. If you don't get rid of those conditions, the gang will simply perpetrate.'"

The AP (1/19, Marquez) reports, "'Our intention is ... to look at each gang individually to determine who we can best attack them,' said Bratton, who was joined by…Mueller and other law enforcement officials. Mueller, who earlier in the day called Los Angeles 'ground zero for modern gang activity,' said he would bring to bear the federal government's resources in gang investigations. … Mueller said there were more than 30,000 gangs and 800,000 members nationwide. 'Like a cancer,' he said earlier in the day, 'gangs are spreading across America.'" The New York Times (1/19, Archibold, 1.16M) notes, "The announcement was made in the heart of the gang's territory…by Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa; Chief William Bratton of the Los Angeles police; the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III; and city and county prosecutors." The Times adds, "Gang crackdowns have in the past yielded mixed results at best. Typically, the violence subsides until the police pull back as pressure to patrol other areas increases. 'It's like a ship passing in water,' said Wes McBride, executive director of the California Gang Investigators Association." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (1/18) also reported on the crackdown, on its Web site and in a broadcast story.

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Wood, 59K), not mentioning Mueller's visit or yesterday's announcement, reports on the rise in racially-charged gang violence, noting, "Los Angeles police are ratcheting up enforcement with tactics such as 'Top Ten' lists – one of 'worst gangs' and one of 'worst leaders' – to target the most egregious suspected offenders of the city's 720 street gangs and their 40,000 members. They are increasing the use of injunctions to prevent public gathering of gangs and nuisance-abatement lawsuits that target their permanent hangouts. New collaborations with federal, state, and local agencies will pool money and resources. Among new ideas: better tracking of gang members who reenter neighborhoods after release from prison. But officials say they have come to realize that the gang epidemic here is largely immune to increased crime crackdowns."

Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Back Off Of Reporters' Subpoenas In BALCO Probe. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Weinstein) reports, "The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and an influential Republican congressman asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Thursday to withdraw grand jury subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters facing 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose their confidential sources of information about steroid use in professional sports." The Times continues, "In 2004, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams wrote articles quoting closed-door testimony of Barry Bonds of the San Francisco Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees and sprinter Tim Montgomery about the use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as BALCO. … Five defendants, including Victor Conte, BALCO's founder, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. Another grand jury is investigating whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he knowingly used steroids. … 'There can be no doubt that the work of' Fainaru-Wada and Williams 'has been significant,' Rep. John Conyers, D-Michigan, and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ranking minority member on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, wrote to Gonzales. … 'This coverage spurred Congress to action ... and forced Major League Baseball, among others, to announce an historic change in their steroid rules and policies,' the congressmen added. 'The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment.' … Although a protective order is 'an important interest,' they said, 'this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism of serious criminal conduct.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118502

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/19, Coile) reports, "The Justice Department was still reviewing the letter late Thursday, but a spokeswoman insisted the agency 'issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary.' … The unusual bipartisan letter showed that Congress is closely watching the case of the two Bay Area journalists, who could be ordered to jail for refusing to comply with a federal judge's order to divulge their sources. Lawmakers and legal experts say it's a crucial test of far the government will be allowed to go to extract information from journalists. … 'It sends a message that really goes beyond these two courageous reporters,' Conyers said in an interview Thursday. 'It sends a message to all reporters that this could happen to you.'" The Chronicle notes, "The Chronicle case has become Exhibit A for lawmakers pushing a federal shield law that would protect journalists from efforts by the government to force them to name their sources or turn over notes. The measure stalled in the Republican-controlled Congress last year, partly because of Justice Department opposition. Democrats are vowing to revive efforts to pass the law, but it still faces major hurdles. … Some lawmakers believe that if the two reporters are sent to jail, it could actually increase the chances that Congress would approve a media shield bill this year."

USA Today/AP (1/19) reports, "Conyers sent a letter to Gonzales asking the attorney general to withdraw the subpoenas. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., also signed the letter. … 'Like most Americans, we have watched with great concern as the Department of Justice issued grand jury subpoenas to the reporters and their newspaper to learn the identities of their confidential sources on some of the most significant reporting in the history of professional sports,' Conyers and Davis wrote. 'We write to you now to express my deep concern over the issuance of these subpoenas and to urge you to withdraw them.' … Davis, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, held a steroids hearing in March 2005, when the witnesses included former baseball players Mark McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro and Jose Canseco. Davis was one of a handful of representatives and senators who sponsored bills proposing to mandate stronger steroid testing and penalties for U.S. pro sports."

FBI Launches Email Alert System. US News & World Report (1/18, Ragavan) reported on its Web site, "The FBI has sent out 600,000 E-mail alerts to a base of 14,000 subscribers, the bureau tells U.S. News. The E-mail alert program was launched in October to provide the public, businesses, and law enforcement agencies with timely information on everything from terrorists to fugitives, scammers, and crooks, as well as updated information on terrorist threats. John Miller, FBI chief spokesman, said the system can also be used for crisis communication during a disaster or terrorist attack. To sign up, one clicks on red envelope icons on the FBI's main website or its 56 field office websites and provides an E-mail address. No personal information is required." US News added, "Miller said the FBI expects the alert system will also help them catch criminals. 'It's a fast, effective way of keeping our partners and the public informed,' he said."

Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle. The Washington Post (1/19, B3, Lengel, 690K) reports, "Seven weapons, including two submachine guns, were stolen last weekend from an FBI agent's vehicle in Southwest Washington, the agency said yesterday. … The theft triggered an intensive search for the property and whoever took it. The FBI decided yesterday to seek the public's help by offering a $25,000 reward." The Post notes, "A second bureau-issued car belonging to an agent at the FBI's headquarters also was vandalized, but nothing of importance was taken, authorities said. Both FBI agents live in the area and were issued vehicles to take home because of their assignments." FBI Washington Field Office chief Joseph Persichini Jr. said that the agent "stored equipment in his vehicle… because he has to be in a 'ready position 24-7' as part of a special response team."

The Washington Times (1/19, Taylor, 88K) reports, "The car was one of about 20 that were vandalized in a public parking lot…sometime between midnight and 3 a.m. Saturday, the FBI said." FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said yesterday, "We have some very good leads and we're working on those leads trying to solve this crime as soon as possible."

Mitchell Pushes For Cooperation From Baseball Players, Owners In Steroids

DOJ_NMG_0118503

Investigation. There are more than 350 media references to former Sen. George Mitchell seeking better cooperation in the investigation of steroid use in baseball. For example, the Los Angeles Times (1/19, Shaikin) reports Mitchell "urged owners and players to cooperate with his probe or face the possibility of a new round of congressional subpoenas. … Mitchell's investigators spoke with club officials and former players last year and plan to talk to active players this year. Mitchell cannot force anyone to speak with his investigators. … Agent Barry Axelrod said he understands the union and management have agreed on guidelines for active players willing to cooperate, but such guidelines have not been distributed. Axelrod said he represents two former players who were asked to speak with Mitchell's investigators last year; one accepted and one declined." The Los Angeles Times (1/19) also has posted Mitchell's remarks on its Web site.

The AP (1/19, Bagnato) reports Mitchell "said he intends to interview active players and raised the possibility that Congress or other government authorities could compel testimony. 'I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation,' Mitchell said in remarks that were released to reporters." ABC News, USA Today, Forbes, the New York Times, Washington Post, Arizona Republic, San Francisco Chronicle, and Houston Chronicle, are among the news outlets that used the widely-reported AP story.

The Arizona Republic (1/19) reports Mitchell "told the owners that he and his staff already had reviewed 'tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews.' But he said the investigation was dragging because 'cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others.'"

The Baltimore Sun (1/19, Barker) reports Mitchell "suggested that baseball, which unsuccessfully challenged the committee's subpoena power in 2005, would be wise to avoid tangling with Congress again. If a governmental entity gets involved, Mitchell warned, 'the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now.'"

Bloomberg (1/18) reported Mitchell "pointed to results of the last week's Hall of Fame voting as an indication that the steroid cloud over baseball won't fade away. Mark McGwire, whose 583 career home runs are tainted by steroid suspicions, received 23.5 percent of the vote, less than a third of what's needed for induction. A lack of cooperation would further extend the length of the investigation, Mitchell said."

Ohio Drug Trafficker Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Cincinnati Enquirer (1/19, Horn, 209K) reports, "Clarence 'The General' Remble left Los Angeles for Ohio several years ago to run a drug trafficking network. He'll spend the rest of his life in prison instead. A federal judge imposed the life sentence Thursday after prosecutors described him as the ringleader of a gang that operated in Middletown, Zanesville and other southern Ohio communities. … Rather than target Cincinnati or larger cities, prosecutors say, Remble and other gang members tried to build up their drug network in smaller towns." The Enquirer notes, "The FBI arrested Remble in July 2005 after tracking a shipment of 44 pounds of cocaine from California to southern Ohio, prosecutors say."

The Middletown (OH) Journal (1/19, Greber) adds, "Remble is one of 20 people who have been arrested and charged in a major drug bust that was coordinated by the FBI, Middletown Division of Police and several other law enforcement agencies. The joint federal, state and local investigation in Middletown began in January 2005, spearheaded by the local department. To date, 18 of the 20 individuals involved in the drug ring have been convicted."

Protest Follows Marijuana Dispensary Raids In Los Angeles County. The Los Angeles Times (1/18) reported about 100 people "demonstrated outside West Hollywood City Hall [Thursday], protesting a series of federal raids that shut 11 outlets for medical marijuana in the county. … The simultaneous raids, part of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, were the largest such operation in the county in recent memory. Five dispensaries in West Hollywood were raided with the other six in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills. … Sarah Pullen, spokeswoman for the DEA's Los Angeles field division, said agents seized large quantities of marijuana-laced edibles that included 'anything from ice cream bars to lollipops to cookies to candies and candy bars.'"

The Los Angeles Daily News (1/18) reported the raids "came a day after Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton denounced the storefront medicinal clinics as crime magnets that have begun to prey on teenagers - including passing out fliers at Grant High School in Van Nuys this past summer - and called for a moratorium on the facilities. '(These) enforcement operations send a message to these drug traffickers,'" said Pullen. The number of clinics "has exploded from five in 2005 to 143 by the end of last year. Bratton said many of the clinics are lucrative operations aimed at recreational users."

DOJ_NMG_0118504

On its Web site, KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (1/18) reports Pullen "said that about 20 people were detained. She did not have immediate numbers regarding possible arrests or how much marijuana was seized. … The West Hollywood City Council voted Tuesday night to strengthen restrictions on marijuana outlets, but some council members have sympathized with those who contend they need pot as medicine."

KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (1/18) reports on its Web site that during the raids, about 50 protesters "shadowed DEA agents …as they carted away evidence." KNBC notes that Los Angeles County "has an estimated 200 marijuana outlets."

Advocacy Group's Headquarters Raided. The Washington Times (1/19, Seper) reports federal agents in California and Washington state "have raided several medical marijuana distribution centers, seizing thousands of pounds of the drug, marijuana-laced edibles, weapons and cash. There were no arrests. … In California, according to the DEA, there is no state regulation or standard of the cultivation or distribution of medical marijuana. The state leaves the establishment of any guidelines to local jurisdictions, which can vary widely." Drug enforcement agents "also raided the Everett, Wash., headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents said were more than 1,000 marijuana plants and computers whose owners said contain personal information on 200 people authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/18) reported a detective "assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, which launched Friday's raid, scoffed at the notion that CannaCare -- run out of the home of medical marijuana advocate Steve Sarich -- was anything other than a drug-dealing enterprise. Detective Roy Alloway said it was 'absurd' to think that the number of plants Sarich was tending would be covered by his medical authorization. 'It's clear that Sarich is a guy that's selling drugs,' said Alloway, who noted that state law allows no more than a 60-day supply of marijuana for medical use."

The Kitsap Sun (1/18) reported the seizure "has angered CannaCare's members, who believe federal authorities are attempting to undermine the state's medical marijuana law, passed as an initiative by Washington voters in 1998. … The case is being examined by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Charges against Sarich, who was not arrested in the raid, and other CannaCare members may be coming."

On its Web site, KING-TV, Seattle (1/18) reports investigators "raided members of a medical marijuana advocacy group called CannaCare, saying it was the home of a big-time drug dealer. But resident Steve Sarich said it's a home of compassion."

In New York, Three Face Charges For Roles In Heroin-Smuggling Ring. The New York Times (1/19) reports three people "have been extradited and charged with participating in an international heroin-smuggling operation, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The three…are charged with involvement in a smuggling operation that bought heroin in Thailand and moved it through various routes to cities in the United States, including New York." Authorities said the ring "recruited couriers who smuggled heroin by swallowing it or using false compartments in suitcases."

Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Moffett, 2.04M) reports that "millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot," his brother Guillermo "faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages." Guillermo currently "faces a US indictment alleging that he helped 'set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies' and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way." However, Roberto works with the Reconciliation Network, which offers classes for community leaders and "helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas."

DOJ_NMG_0118505

TAX:

New Hampshire Man Holes Up In Home After Tax Conviction. The AP (1/19, Elliott) reports from Concord, NH, "A man who has holed up with armed supporters in his cement-walled house for most of his tax evasion trial was found guilty Thursday, along with his wife, of failing to pay federal income taxes for a decade." The AP continues, "Ed Brown has said he will defend himself against capture if necessary. … U.S. Marshal Stephen Monier said Thursday that members of his staff continued talking by telephone with Brown and had no plans to confront him. … Ed Brown's wife, Elaine, a dentist who earned most of the couple's income, has been staying with a son in Massachusetts and attended the trial." The AP adds, "The Browns, of Plainfield, contend the law does not require them to pay federal income tax, while the government says the Browns owe more than $625,000. The Browns stopped paying income taxes in 1996 and stopped filing returns in 1998, a prosecutor said. They could each face decades in prison. … A jury decided they employed a scheme to hide their income and avoid taxes in part by using postal money orders in increments just below the reporting threshold to pay for their hilltop compound. Courts have routinely rejected similar attempts by other taxpayers. … Marshals now have to consider how to seize the Browns' assets. The jury was deliberating whether the Browns should lose their home."

Businesses Critical Of Bush "Withholding Tax" Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that some businesses say "provision signed by Bush for 3% 'withholding tax' on payments to federal contractors represents interest-free loan to the government. Some in Congress move to accelerate 2011 effective date. 'In an environment where they are looking for revenue, it will be difficult' to stop, says Dorothy Coleman of National Association of Manufacturers."

Senate Democrats Want To Increase Tax Collections. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Senate Democrats want to "jump-start administration proposals to shrink tax gap." To "finance small-business tax breaks in a minimum wage bill," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus "embraces two Bush ideas that languished under Republican control. One would make it easier for the Internal Revenue Service to collect from employers who don't make payroll tax payments; another intensifies scrutiny of firms that 'lease' employees to others."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Address Iraq, Domestic Issues In State Of The Union. USA Today (1/19, Jackson, 2.27M) reports that when President Bush "delivers his State of the Union address Tuesday, he'll be facing a new audience on an old issue: a Democratic majority in Congress that is strongly opposed to his new plan for the Iraq war." White House spokesman Tony Snow said "explaining the proposal to boost U.S. troop strength by 21,500 in Iraq is a major goal of Bush's speech," even as "Democrats and some Republicans push forward a non-binding resolution against it." Snow said, "We understand it's going to be a skeptical audience." Snow also said the State of the Union "'has a large domestic component' that will be crafted to find common ground with the Democrats who control Congress. The agenda includes immigration, education and energy."

The Washington Times (1/19, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "will deliver a stripped-down State of the Union address, leaving out the usual laundry list of policy initiatives, and emphasizing common ground with Democrats in a nod to the new political reality on Capitol Hill, the White House said yesterday." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "Some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course." Snow said Bush "will focus on a few broad themes, including the war on terrorism, energy, health care, immigration and education."

The AP (1/19, Riechmann) reports Bush's speech "will avoid the traditional laundry list of initiatives and focus on a few issues, such as energy and health care, where he might find common ground with the Democratic-controlled Congress." Bush is "considering ways to make health care affordable and seek the power to raise gas mileage standards for passenger cars, according to former administration and industry officials." With Bush's "low approval ratings, a narrowly tailored national address might keep the public from tuning out or reaching for the remote, White House officials reason." The President "plans to highlight the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism as well as immigration and education, Snow said." On the school front, Bush is "expected to urge that Congress renew the No Child Left Behind law, the signature domestic policy of his first term."

DOJ_NMG_0118506

"Real" State Of The Union Seen As Bleak. In his Washington Post column (1/19, A19), Eugene Robinson writes his version of the "real state of the union: A president who reduces the near-infinite variety of humankind to 'with us' or 'against us' has mired the nation in a disastrous, unnecessary war. Comparisons to Vietnam are imprecise -- the American casualties in Iraq are lower, the geopolitical stakes are much higher and the damage to our nation's standing in the world has been incalculable." Only "recently has the president begun to pay grudging lip service to global warming, while firmly resisting measures -- such as capping carbon emissions -- that might actually mitigate the pressure humans are putting on the climate system." And "more than a year after the president pledged to rebuild New Orleans, the city is still a ghost of its former self."

Democrats Finish 100 Hours Agenda With Time To Spare. The AP (1/19, Kuhnhenn) reports the House "wrapped up the Democrats' '100 Hours' legislative sprint Thursday with time to spare, voting to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from oil and gas companies and roll back industry tax breaks." The energy bill "capped a two-week drumbeat of votes on legislation that, while popular with voters last fall, awaits a sketchy fate in the Senate." Democrats "accomplished their early legislative goals in 87 hours, adopting new ethics rules and passing bills raising the minimum wage, expanding taxpayer financed research into embryonic stem cells, forcing more homeland security measures, directing the federal government to negotiate for cheaper Medicare prescription drugs and lowering interest rates on subsidized student loans."

ABC World News (1/18, story 5, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A short while ago, the Democratic part of the House declared its final measure of its first 100 hours in office." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, House Speaker: "The bill is passed." Gibson: "It was an energy bill that would encourage investment in alternative energy sources and lower oil industry subsidies. The House began its legislative sprint by voting to make more 911 Commission recommendations reality. And then, in this order, an increase in the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. A bill that would expand stem cell research and overturn President Bush's restrictions. A measure requiring the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices on behalf of Medicare patients. And they agreed to cut interest rates on student loans. The bills are headed to the Senate, where most of them face an uphill battle. The House completed their 100 hours of work, in just about 42 hours. They can put the other 58 in the bank."

The New York Times (1/19, Hulse, 1.16M) reports House Democrats claimed "their successes proved they could govern. Republicans derided the hurry-up nature of the effort as a bit of one-sided political showmanship that undercut the Democrats' pledge that the new Congress would be more bipartisan." But the "easy approval of the half-dozen measures in the 100-hour agenda — dealing with the minimum wage, embryonic stem cell research, health care, national security, education and energy — was celebrated by the new majority as a validation of the blitz, an idea born on the campaign trail that blossomed into a central House Democratic theme." Speaker Nancy Pelosi said, "It was a way to say that this Congress will no longer be a place where optimism and good ideas come to die."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, 59K) reports that in the 110th Congress's "first 100 legislative hours, which wrapped up Thursday, House Democrats drew a significant number of GOP votes on their 'Six for '06' agenda, despite giving minority Republicans little voice in shaping the legislation." The "bipartisan, problem-solving mantra is one that lawmakers of both stripes say they took straight from voters in the midterm election."

Poll Finds Bipartisan Support For Democrats' Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Hook, 850K) reports a "bipartisan majority of Americans strongly supports the bills that whisked through the House in the first days of the Democratic-controlled Congress, but many remain uncertain about where the party wants to lead the nation, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found." Only "25% of those surveyed believed that Democrats have formulated a clear direction for the country; 58% said they had failed to." Overall, the poll "found 36% approve of how Congress is doing its job - hardly a mandate, but up from 30% in September." The Times/Bloomberg poll "surveyed 1,344 adults by telephone Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

Pelosi Favorability Ratings On Rise. Bloomberg (1/19, Przybyla) reports, "Americans are warming to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they give the Democratic-led Congress high marks for its initial legislative priorities." A "new Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll shows positive views of Pelosi, 66, climbed over the past month and are considerably higher than the marks Americans gave one of her highly publicized predecessors, Republican Newt Gingrich, in the first weeks of his tenure as speaker in 1995." Thirty-four percent gave Pelosi "a favorable rating, up from 27 percent who did so in a poll conducted in December." By contrast, "a Los Angeles Times poll in January 1995 found that Gingrich, who engineered the Republican congressional landslide in 1994, had more unfavorable ratings, at 39 percent, than favorable, at 26 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0118507

Senate Passes Ethics Bill 96-2. The AP (1/19, Abrams) reports Senate leaders "worked to resuscitate an ethics and lobbying measure Thursday, with the new Democratic majority trying to stave off defeat on its first major bill and Republicans wanting to avoid being blamed for obstructing an overhaul." The dispute arose "over an attempt by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., to get a vote on a modified version of a line-item veto. It would allow the president to single out spending items for elimination." The two sides "were working on an agreement under which Gregg would be guaranteed consideration of his bill at a later date."

USA Today (1/19, Schouten, 2.27M) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "called it the 'most significant legislation in ethics and lobbying reform we've had in the history of this country.'" Earlier, Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "worked behind the scenes to broker a compromise that would allow lawmakers to move forward on the bill. It is the first measure being pushed by the Democrats who won control of the Senate in November's elections." The changes, "which have bipartisan support, bar senators from taking meals, gifts and sports tickets from lobbyists. They also restrict lobbyist-funded travel and impose new limits on senators' travel on private planes."

The New York Times (1/19, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports the Senate "on Thursday overwhelmingly passed sweeping changes to ethics and lobbying rules, overcoming bipartisan reluctance to ban many of the favors that lobbyists do for lawmakers and to illuminate the shadowy legislative practice of earmarking money for special projects." The Senate's action "makes the start of the 110th Congress a watershed moment in the history of K Street and Capitol Hill." The measure "passed around 9 p.m. by a vote of 96 to 2. Senators Orrin Hatch of Utah and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, both Republicans, were the only members to vote against the bill." Of "all the bill's provisions, it was the disclosure requirements for bundled checks that met the stiffest resistance behind the scenes in the Democratic caucus because of the potential to make it harder for incumbent lawmakers to tap K Street lobbyists as surrogate fund-raisers, aides involved in negotiations over the bill said."

The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Weisman, Birnbaum, 690K) reports in a front page story that the Senate Democrats and Republicans "broke a difficult stalemate last night and approved 96 to 2 expansive legislation to curtail the influence of lobbyists, tighten congressional ethics rules and prevent the spouses of senators from lobbying senators and their staffs." The Senate legislation, "hailed by proponents as the most significant ethics reform since Watergate, would ban gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists, and would force lawmakers to attach their names to special-interest provisions and pet projects that they slip into bills."

The Washington Times (1/19, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "overwhelmingly passed an ethics bill after breaking a day-long stalemate over a Republican proposal on earmarks that had threatened to kill the legislation." The impasse "had centered on an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states -- and send the legislation back to Congress for a second look and another vote. Republicans wanted to vote on their amendment as part of the ethics bill, but Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, had been single-handedly blocking a deal." The Senate "also voted 55-43 to adopt a Republican amendment that deleted a provision of the ethics bill that would have expanded the definition of lobbyist to include grass-roots organizers, possibly including ministers and neighborhood groups."

The Washington Post (1/19, A2, Milbank, 690K) recounts the debate over the Senate ethics bill, which was nearly sidetracked on Wednesday by Sen. Gregg's amendment. While senators "engaged in a bench-clearing brawl over ethics legislation, Reid and fellow Democrats abandoned the Senate floor and went to the television studio to condemn the Republicans. 'What they wanted -- and they were afraid to spew it out of their mouths -- they hate this legislation!' Reid sputtered." After a "day of bitter exchanges, the two sides finally reached a deal behind closed doors and then went to the Senate floor last night in a public act of reconciliation. Reid praised the Republicans he had just berated. McConnell hailed a 'successful example of good negotiating, though it took a while, for a favorable result.'" It

DOJ_NMG_0118508

"did seem to be a needlessly difficult journey for legislation that in the end was opposed by only two senators."

GSA Head Sought To Give Friend's Firm No-Bid Contract. The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports in a front page story that runs about 2200 words that the chief of the US General Services Administration "attempted to give a no-bid contract to a company founded and operated by a longtime friend, sidestepping federal laws and regulations, according to interviews and documents obtained by The Washington Post." Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan, "a former government contractor appointed by President Bush, personally signed the deal to pay a division of her friend's public relations firm $20,000 for a 24-page report promoting the GSA's use of minority- and woman-owned businesses, the documents show." The contract was "terminated last summer after GSA lawyers and other agency officials pointed out possible procurement violations, including the failure to adequately justify the no-bid deal or have it reviewed in advance by trained procurement officers, officials said."

Kerry Seeks Probe Into DOD Surplus Sales. The AP (1/18, Theimer) reports Sen. John Kerry is calling for an "investigation into security weaknesses in the Defense Department's surplus sales that have let buyers for Iran and China acquire aircraft parts and other valuable military gear. ... The surplus sales include parts for F-14 'Tomcat' fighter jets, a plane retired last year by the United States and now flown only by Iran," which bought the jets in the 1970s. Kerry said, "There is no way that Iran should be getting these sensitive military parts, especially with the situation in the Mideast so turbulent."

House Bill Would Rescind $14 Billion Energy Industry Tax Breaks. The New York Times (1/19, Andrews, 1.16M) reports House Democrats "easily passed legislation on Thursday that would rescind $14 billion in tax breaks and subsidies for oil drillers and reserve the money to develop alternative energy projects and conservation technologies." The measure "passed 264 to 163, with many Republicans joining a bloc of Democrats. Passage came despite opposition from the oil industry and the Bush administration, which said the bill singled out the companies for higher taxes and could increase the country's dependence on foreign oil." The bill will "rescind $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil drillers that Congress passed in 2004 and 2005 and will add $6.3 billion in royalties from companies that pump oil and gas in publicly owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off Alaska."

The Washington Post (1/19, A4, Mufson, 690K) reports House Democrats "capped their '100 hours' agenda with the passage of an energy bill yesterday, the sixth piece of legislation approved in two weeks, and Democratic leaders said the package marked "a beginning, not an end" to their legislative ambitions." The measure would repeal a tax break oil and gas firms received in 2004 that effectively lowered their corporate tax rates. It would also bar oil companies from bidding on new federal leases unless they pay a fee on or renegotiated improperly drafted leases from 1998 and 1999 that did not require royalty payments on Gulf of Mexico production."

The Washington Times (1/19, DeBose, 88K) says the energy bills are "aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade." The "Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs."

Methodist Ministers Oppose Bush Library At SMU. The AP (1/19, Brown) reports a "group of Methodist ministers from across the nation launched an online petition drive Thursday urging Southern Methodist University to stop trying to land George W. Bush's presidential library." The petition, "on a new Web site, http://www.protectsmu.org, says that 'as United Methodists, we believe that the linking of his presidency with a university bearing the Methodist name is utterly inappropriate.'" Brad Cheves, SMU's "vice president for external affairs and development, said Thursday that the Methodist church is diverse in its membership and opinions and that those involved with the petition reflect only one view." The AP adds President Bush "said Thursday that he was 'leaning heavily toward SMU' and was close to a decision."

SMU's Selection For Bush Library Questioned. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/19, W13), Naomi Schaeffer Riley, the Journal's deputy Taste editor, says, "Certain members of the SMU faculty did not react well to the news of their campus's selection. In an op-ed article for the college newspaper, two professors from the university's theology school asked: 'Do we want SMU to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad international opinion?'" A letter "sent to SMU's president last week, signed by 68 current and past members of the faculty, echoed this theme." Which "raises the question: Why would Mr. Bush want to have anything to do with such hostile -- not to mention graceless and cliché-obsessed -- people?"

DOJ_NMG_0118509

Brill Expected To Replace Joseph At State Department. The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that Kenneth C. Brill, "a career diplomat who has been in the director of national intelligence's office as the director of the National Counterproliferation Center, is rejoining his pal, Deputy Secretary of State-designate John Negroponte." Brill is said to be "the likely pick to replace the outgoing undersecretary for arms control and international security, Robert Joseph." The move is seen as "a potentially huge change on nonproliferation stances, focusing more on diplomacy and less on confrontation." Kamen notes that Brill "frequently crossed swords with Bush administration harder-liners on policies toward North Korea and Iraq."

House Democrats Want Tougher Trade Restrictions. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that eleven Democrats "on House Ways and Means Committee press US Trade Representative Schwab to renegotiate pacts with Peru and Colombia; they seek specific steps against trade in illegal logging. Thirty-nine freshmen House Democrats push Ways and Means Chairman Rangel 'to deliver on the promise' in 2006 campaign with tougher trade stance against Bush."

Hospitals Worry Bush Budget Will Cut Medicare Payments. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column hospitals are bracing "for deep Medicare cuts in Bush's budget next month. Some lobbyists expect administration to seek up to $90 billion over five years from hospitals and other health providers as White House pursues balanced budget by 2012."

Official Says NTEU Should Be Certified To Represent Customs, Border Workers. Under the headline, "NTEU Closer To Representing Customs And Border Workers," the Washington Post's (1/19, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Washington regional director of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, in a decision issued late Wednesday, said the National Treasury Employees Union should be certified to represent about 30,000 workers in Customs and Border Protection, a major bureau in the Homeland Security Department. NTEU defeated the American Federation of Government Employees" for "the right to represent the employees. AFGE filed objections to the election, but a review conducted by Robert P. Hunter, the Washington FLRA regional director, found no merit to the claims." The Post notes, "Bush administration officials have closely followed the election battle because the union that is certified as the winner will gain a larger voice in workplace issues and perhaps even policy debates on Capitol Hill."

White House Usher Says Bush Is "Steadfast." In the Washington Post (1/19, A17, 690K), Chief White House Usher Gay Walters gives his reflections of the presidents and first ladies in the White House. On President Bush, he said, "The steadfastness of his beliefs in what he's doing. ... In his mind, this is the road to go down, and he has not wavered." He also said that First Lady Laura Bush "knows what she wants, but is…willing…to sit and look at something for a while before she makes a decision." He reflected on presidents dating back to Richard Nixon.

Ignatius Examines "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence." In the Washington Post (1/19, A19, 690K), David Ignatius writes a column titled "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence," in which he says that one of "Washington's enduring mysteries," is "how does Vice President Cheney shape decisions in the tight inner circle of the Bush administration?" After Bush's first term was known as the "OVP," there's a "sense that Cheney's influence is on the rise again, at least with Iraq policy, but that's after many months in which his allies say his role was diminished." The mystery of his influence "may finally be clarified in the coming trial of Libby," where he will give his testimony.

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Warns Entitlement Costs Could Weaken US Economy. The AP (1/19, Aversa) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "warned on Thursday that the economy could be gravely hurt if Social Security and Medicare aren't revamped, and he urged lawmakers to tackle the nation's thorny fiscal issues sooner rather than later." In testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Bernanke said, "If early and meaningful action is not taken, the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened." He said "future generations…will bear much of the cost." The AP adds it "marked the Fed chief's most forceful warning to date on the potential problems facing the United States with the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers, the oldest of whom will start retiring next year. This huge wave of retirees will hit the U.S. budget as well as the economy, Bernanke said." He said "absent policy changes by Congress and the White House, rising budget deficits are likely in the years ahead to increase the amount of federal debt outstanding to unprecedented levels."

DOJ_NMG_0118510

The Financial Times (1/19, Guha, Callan, Tassell) reports Bernanke "stepped up the pressure on Congress to address the budgetary impact of soaring spending on entitlement programmes on Thursday, warning that they could one day cause a 'fiscal crisis' in the US." Bernanke "told the Senate budget committee that the recent improvement in US public finances was only the 'calm before the storm.' He urged immediate action to head off the looming Medicare and Social Security funding gap, saying the right time to start was 'ten years ago.' But Mr Bernanke refused to comment on whether this should be done by curbing spending, raising taxes or some combination of the two, saying that was for elected officials to decide."

The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Bernanke "delivered a stern warning to members of Congress this morning to address the national debt, which has spiraled due to spending on federal programs, especially Social Security and Medicare, and threatens to harm the national economy." Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad "described his comments as 'a clarion call.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/19, lp, 2.04M) reports Bernanke "warned that rising health-care and Social Security spending could create a 'vicious cycle' of rising debt and interest payments and an eventual fiscal crisis." Though Bernanke "lacks the stature of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, his strong language, coupled with what appears to be a growing respect for his views from lawmakers in both parties, could add impetus to efforts to overhaul entitlement programs, principally Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid." Since taking office last year, Bernanke "has met extensively with members of both parties, and the outreach appears to be paying off. Budget Committee Chairman Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota yesterday thanked Mr. Bernanke for insights he provided over lunch a few weeks ago."

The New York Times (1/19, Weisman, 1.16M) reports Bernanke warned "against complacency over the federal deficit," saying "that recent positive trends on the budget were a 'calm before the storm,' masking a long-term danger posed by looming deficits in Social Security and Medicare." Bernanke's "comments were consistent with his past warnings, and those of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, about the unfinanced cost of the postwar generation's retirement. But his tone was more urgent, and it seemed aimed at the arrival of a new Democratic-led Congress that is just now setting its priorities."

The Washington Post (1/19, D2, Henderson, 690K) reports Bernanke "cited Congressional Budget Office projections that spending on the big entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- will equal 15 percent of the nation's gross domestic product by 2030, double last year's level." Bernanke, "who was a top White House economic adviser until last year, declined to take a position on whether to extend President Bush's tax cuts, many of which are set to expire by 2010. He said he would be nonpartisan as Fed chairman, offering general economic analysis but no specific recommendations on taxes or spending."

Fed Vacancies Make Rate Predictions Harder. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Cathy Minehan's "retirement from the Boston Fed and the expected retirement of Chicago's" Michael Moskow "mean nine of 12 banks will have changed presidents since 2003. Changes make it harder to predict rates and Fed rhetoric." Another "opening: Fed's top monetary policy staff job in Washington, as veteran Vincent Reinhart retires in September."

Inflation Falls In 2006 To Lowest Level In Three Years. The Washington Post (1/19, D1, Henderson, Schneider, 690K) reports inflation "fell in 2006 to its lowest rate in three years, as tumbling fuel prices and a slowing economy cooled the pace of consumer price increases." Meanwhile, other data "released yesterday showed unexpected signs of improvement in the housing market, adding to an overall picture of an economy that ended the year in relatively good health." Ebbing inflation "means that the Federal Reserve may avoid raising interest rates this year, holding them at levels likely to keep unemployment low and encourage economic growth. Several analysts said, however, that inflation trends in recent years have mirrored swings in oil prices -- which have fallen lately but could go up again. The analysts also said the unusually warm weather last month might have encouraged more hiring, shopping and home construction, temporarily brightening the economic picture in December."

DOJ_NMG_0118511

The New York Times (1/19, Uchitelle, 1.16M) reports the economy "seems to be shaking off a slowdown brought on by the precipitous drop in housing, the latest economic data suggested yesterday." More new home construction "was started in December than in November, the Census Bureau reported, and the Consumer Price Index, the nation's best-known inflation gauge, rose at its fastest pace in eight months — on the surface, at least, an indication of robust demand. Fine print in the reports, however, signaled that the five-year-old recovery is far from being on solid ground."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Scherer, 59K) reports, "Now, economists are wondering if the 2.6 percent rate may be about as low as it's going to get for a while." While this "does not mean that inflation will become a dominant issue for the economy, it probably means that the Federal Reserve is going to continue to fret about it. And that may mean that instead of cutting rates this spring, the Fed sits tight until at least midyear."

Stock Markets Down On Apple Inc. Concerns. NBC Nightly News (1/18, story 10, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Before we continue here, a quick look at stocks. They were down today. The Dow was off just over nine points [to close at 12,567.93]. Nasdaq lost more than 36 points [to close at 2,443.21] on the day's trading."

The Wall Street Journal (1/19, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports a "6.2% decline in the consumer-electronics giant" Apple's "shares led technology shares lower, in a selloff that spread to other areas of the market. Apple Inc.'s earnings announcement late Wednesday included fiscal first-quarter profits that beat analysts' expectations but a lukewarm second-quarter outlook." The stock market's "losses came despite another big drop in crude-oil prices, which flirted with the first close under $50 a barrel in more than 1½ years." The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 0.3%, or 4.25 points, to 1426.37, up 0.6% on the year."

Judge Declares Mistrial In California Vioxx Cases. The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/19, A2) reports from Los Angeles, "A hung jury forced a mistrial Thursday in lawsuits by two men who blamed their heart attacks on Vioxx, the once-popular painkiller made by pharmaceutical company Merck & Co." the AP continues, "The two cases were tried together before a Superior Court jury that deadlocked when they reached the third question on a lengthy verdict form." The AP adds, "The jury did answer 'yes' to the first two questions, finding that Vioxx did have potential risks or side-effects that were known or knowable and that they presented a substantial danger to users of Vioxx. The third question asked if the plaintiffs' physicians would have recognized the potential risks or side-effects. … The first two answers were rendered moot when Judge Victoria G. Chaney declared a mistrial." The AP notes, "The jury had sent a note to the court saying it was having trouble with the third question and lawyers were allowed to reargue that point. The jury then went back for more talks, but ultimately said there was an impasse. … It wasn't clear when there might be a retrial of the lawsuits brought by Lawrence Appell, of Scottsdale, Ariz., and Rudolph Arrigale, of Westminster, Calif. … Mr. Arrigale sought to recover more than $177,000 in medical costs as well as additional compensatory and punitive damages. Mr. Appell sought compensatory damages on behalf of himself and his wife, plus punitive damages and more than $105,000 to cover medical expenses."

Personal Attacks Mark Rancor On Michigan High Court. The New York Times (1/19, Liptak) reports, "In a recent series of written dissents, Justice Elizabeth A. Weaver of the Michigan Supreme Court has accused four of her colleagues of 'bully tactics,' 'abuses of power and grossly unprofessional conduct' and trying to censor her. … In response, in a confidential draft opinion, the court's chief justice has accused Justice Weaver of behaving like 'a child engaging in a tantrum.' In the opinion, Chief Justice Clifford W. Taylor suggested that she continue her protests with a hunger strike, as that 'seemed to have the potential for everyone to be a winner.'" The Times continues, "Students of judicial history in Michigan and elsewhere said they could not remember a similar judicial melee. … 'The justices of the Michigan Supreme Court are making spectacles of themselves,' said Richard D. Friedman, a law professor at the University of Michigan. 'They really should start acting like grown-ups.'" The Times adds, "The justices' exchanges, which continued this week, have been fueled by personal animus. But their disagreements involve serious issues, including First Amendment principles and judicial ethics. … The justices differ about whether they may disclose the details of the court's internal deliberations, about whether lawyers are free to criticize them personally and about how motions seeking their disqualification should be treated." The Times notes, "Judicial deliberations are almost universally protected from outside scrutiny. There is not much law, however, on the question of whether participants in the deliberations may themselves be forbidden to disclose exchanges in which they participated. … Justice Weaver wrote last month that the immediate purpose of the new rule was to suppress a dissent that she had written in a disciplinary case. She added that her primary obligations were to the public rather than her colleagues."

DOJ_NMG_0118512

New York Bar Panel Urges Law Firms Not To Force Retirements. The New York Times (1/19, Creswell) reports, "A special committee of the New York State Bar Association is calling on law firms to end the practice of mandatory retirement for partners." The Times continues, "In a strongly worded report that is to be released today, the committee concluded that 'mandatory retirement — requiring a partner to leave the firm upon reaching an arbitrary age — is not an acceptable practice.'" The Times adds, "Retirement practices at law firms is becoming a hot topic as many of the nation's lawyers enter their 60s and face policies aimed at pushing them out the door. About 57 percent of law firms with more than 100 lawyers reported having a mandatory retirement age, ranging from 65 to 72, according to a 2005 survey conducted by Altman Weil, a law firm management consulting company. … But firms that push lawyers out at an arbitrary age without taking into consideration the individual's productivity and contribution to the firm could be missing out, said Mark H. Alcott, 67, a lawyer with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, who is president of the bar association and who formed the special committee. … Law firms that have adopted more-corporate structures have long argued that older partners needed to be moved out to give more opportunities and a bigger chunk of profits to younger lawyers. … But members of the special committee said that some firms adopted the policies simply to avoid uncomfortable discussions with a senior partner whose skills may be diminishing."

Groups Unveil Plan To Cover Uninsured. The New York Times (1/19, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "A broad coalition of business and consumer groups, doctors, hospitals and drug companies laid out a major proposal on Thursday to provide health coverage to more than half of the nation's 47 million uninsured by expanding federal benefit programs and offering new tax credits to individuals and families." The proposal arrived at a "possible turning point in the debate over national health insurance…" Senior vice president of UnitedHealth Group, Dr. Reed V. Tuckson, said, "It's a careful balance of public and private solutions."

Healthcare Seen As Emerging As A Top Political Issue. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Solomon, Wessel, 2.04M) reports, "Suddenly, the long-festering issue of providing health coverage to the one in six Americans who lack it seems to have leapt to the top of the national to-do list." Even President Bush is "is expected to talk about his ideas for shrinking the ranks of the uninsured." This "increases the chances that Washington will try to tackle at least a piece of a health-care problem," but "it still doesn't necessarily mean anything big will happen, at least nationally, in the next couple of years." The "primary reason" is that "there's nothing approaching a consensus on what to do." However, Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, says that with the current Congress, "It's the perfect time…You have everyone lined up on the side of universal coverage."

Martinez Faces Potential Revolt From RNC Members. The Washington Times (1/19, Hallow, 88K) reports Republican National Committee members "think they will get a secret ballot on today's election of a new general chairman, which would protect members opposed to the White House's push to fill the new slot with an advocate of an amnesty for illegal aliens." RNC member Curly Haugland of North Dakota said, "If we get the secret ballot as promised, then every member will feel free to express his or her view without the fear of coercion or intimidation." The move "to create a new top office on the committee and fill it with Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida is scheduled to take place today, on the third day of the annual RNC winter meeting here. Mr. Martinez supports President Bush's plans for what conservative critics call amnesty for illegal aliens." The RNC leadership's "desires historically almost always carry the day, especially when a Republican is in the White House, but some members yesterday said they saw hope that things might turn out differently this time."

The New York Times (1/19, Broder, 1.16M) reports Martinez is "expected to win the job by a large margin, but a handful of dissidents plan to vote against him because of his support for liberalized immigration laws." One Martinez opponent, Randall Pullen, "Republican national committeeman from Arizona, said that illegal immigration was the biggest problem in Arizona 'and it's not getting any better.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118513

Mehlman Urges RNC To Work With Democrats, Independents. The Washington Post/AP (1/19, Sidoti) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman "challenged his GOP brethren to work with Democrats and independents to defeat terrorism and solve the country's problems, a call for bipartisanship at a time of intense political polarization." Speaking at the Republican National Committee's winter meeting, Mehlman said, "Let's work to put aside our differences on other issues and march together to defeat this common enemy, who threatens our common values -- values that aren't red or blue, but red, white and blue. This doesn't mean we abandon our philosophy. But on many issues, we can follow the example of Ronald Reagan, and think broadly about how to work better with Democrats and independents to accomplish our mission." The Post adds the remarks, "in Mehlman's final major speech as party chairman, were a nod to the new reality on Capitol Hill -- Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate while Republicans continue to control the White House, a potential recipe for legislative gridlock."

The New York Times (1/19, Broder, 1.16M) reports Mehlman "warned on Thursday that his party would suffer even more devastating losses in 2008 than it did in 2006 if it did not reach out to minorities and address voter concerns about ethics." Mehlman said "that the 2006 elections, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress, was not a fluke that could be attributed to the calendar, a few scandal-tainted candidates and the tough going in Iraq." Mehlman said, "Each of these factors combined to create an environment that was unfavorable for Republicans. But, folks, these factors cannot be an excuse."

Purchasers Of Edwards' DC House Focus Of Corporate Probe. The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Solomon, Romano, 690K) reports in a front page story that when "former North Carolina senator and Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards finally succeeded last month in selling his imposing Georgetown mansion for $5.2 million after it had languished on the market, the names of the buyers were not publicly disclosed." At the time, Edwards's spokeswoman "told reporters that the house had been sold to an unidentified corporation. In reality, the buyers were Paul and Terry Klaassen, according to several sources and confirmed by Edwards's spokeswoman yesterday." The "wealthy founders of the nation's largest assisted-living housing chain for seniors, the Klaassens are currently cooperating with a government inquiry in connection with accounting practices and stock options exercised by them and other company insiders. They are also the focus of legal complaints by some of the same labor unions whose support Edwards has been assiduously courting for his presidential bid."

Edwards' Approach To Budget, Healthcare Praised. In his Washington Post column (1/19, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Edwards's ideas on the budget have the additional virtue of reminding us that the argument over arriving at a balanced budget by 2012 is largely phony. The real issue, given the burgeoning costs of health care and the retirement of the baby boomers, is how to put policies in place now that achieve sustainable fiscal balance -- meaning low if not zero deficits -- over the next 30 years. What needs to be done? Hint No. 1: Extending President Bush's tax cuts to eternity will make the long-term problem much worse. Hint No. 2: The hardest part will be how -- simultaneously -- to meet the fiscal need to rein in health costs and the social need to get health insurance to everyone. Hint No. 3: Most Democrats don't like to talk about it, but somebody's taxes are going to have to go up." Edwards, "at least, is willing to say which taxes he would raise to keep the deficit from going through the roof. He would start by eliminating Bush's tax cuts for the top 2 percent of income earners, which he defines roughly as those earning more than $180,000 to $200,000 a year." Edwards "deserves points for honesty and for stating the politically difficult truth that both fiscal and social balance demand a comprehensive health-care fix."

Some Black Leaders Remain Unswayed By Potential Obama Bid. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "As pastor of the Mt. Zion Missionary Baptist Church in tiny Sumter, S.C., the Rev. James Blassingame feels pride at the thought of electing the country's first black president. But Blassingame, one of his state's most prominent black ministers, will not support Sen. Barack Obama's bid to achieve that historic goal." He will instead "campaign for one of Obama's white rivals," ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D). Blassingame said that Obama "is a 'stranger' with a faraway home and little-known biography, while Edwards -- 'he's a homeboy.' Other black leaders are wary that the relatively untested Obama might prove weak in the general election. 'Obama's ambition could bring all of black America down,' said state Sen. Robert Ford of South Carolina." Meanwhile, "actor Bill Cosby told the Chicago Defender, a black newspaper, that the country is ready for a black president, but he suggested that Obama might not be the best candidate in the 2008 race."

DOJ_NMG_0118514

Gingrich Sees Fundraising As Major Barrier To '08 Run. Newt Gingrich said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/18), "We're in an era where, because of the McCain-Feingold bill, it is so hard for a middle-class candidate to raise money that that's always going to be -- that's part of the reasons you see these guys out here so early. They have to raise so much money in such small units that most of them will spend 90% of the time raising money. That's part of why, frankly, I don't want to even look at a candidacy. I don't want to go around for the next eight months and go to six meetings a day begging for money." Asked if he can win the Republican nomination if he waits until September to decide on a bid, Gingrich said, "I don't know. I think Ronald Reagan got in October, in November. Bill Clinton got it in October. ... If the American people decided to promote somebody, which is very different than hiring consultants and promoting yourself, that could be a 10-day phenomenon. That could be a three-week phenomenon. Remember that Howard Dean was everybody's candidate of choice to win Iowa until 10 days before the caucus."

McCain Campaign Said To Lack Clear Lines Of Authority. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a "Republican veteran warns 'no one's in charge' of McCain's campaign, as strategist John Weaver, 2000 manager Rick Davis, Senate chief of staff Mark Salter, and ex-Bush hand Terry Nelson all play major roles." But one McCain adviser said "Nelson has 'hiring and firing authority.'" The Journal adds "war woes jeopardize the Arizona senator's appeal to wary conservatives: as Republican best-positioned to beat Hillary Clinton. An unaffiliated Democratic strategist notes Obama's entry has dented Clinton's aura of inevitability, too."

US Launches "Intensive" Diplomatic Effort To Restart Mideast Talks. AFP (1/19, Lanteaume) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she hoped to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas by February 15 in a bid to revive the peace process." However, ahead of a meeting Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Rice noted that "the next couple of weeks will be pretty intensive on the diplomatic front." On February 2 Rice will host talks with members of the Quartet "to agree steps on how to revive the peace process." The following week Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit will travel to the United States with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. Other officials from the region could also travel to Washington, Rice said. Meanwhile, "David Welch, the US State Department's top Middle East envoy, and Elliott Abrams, the White House national security adviser on the Middle East, will then travel to the region to prepare for informal trilateral talks."

USA Today (1/19, Slavin, 2.27M) notes Rice "said conditions were better for a deal now than they were six years ago when President Bush first took office," and that a peace agreement "would help the US position in the region because of the priority America's Arab allies place on creation of a Palestinian state."

The AP (1/19, Gearan) notes Rice said Israel and the Palestinians "can pick any agenda they want for a preliminary peacemaking summit with the United States, but it is too early to tackle the toughest issues." Speaking to reporters at the end of her week-long trip to the Mideast and Europe, Rice said, "We're not yet at the point where I think we can determine what we would do about formal negotiations, when and if" they can occur. The AP also notes that Rice's "second in command planned another round of diplomatic calls in the region next week."

Rice's Trip Seen As Accomplishing Little. In a news analysis, the New York Times (1/19, A8, Shanker, 1.16M) says Secretary Rice "flies home on Friday…with just enough progress to shield herself from criticism that the trip was a bust." The Palestinian president and the Israeli prime minister "promised to join her for three-way talks within a month" and "powerful Arab states gave their blessing, however reserved, to Mr. Bush's initiatives to try to snatch victory from the growing chaos that is Iraq." However, the Times observes, "Rice's Israeli and Palestinian negotiating partners have been weakened," and the White House "is also struggling" as Bush's new plan for Iraq "is meeting deep resistance from Democrats in Congress and even from the Iraqi prime minister."

DOJ_NMG_0118515

In its own analysis of the Secretary's trip, the Washington Post (1/19, A14, Kessler, 690K) says the "results after six stops on the ground in the Middle East did not match her lofty rhetoric." Although Rice announced that she had arranged a three-way meeting to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state, she "sidestep[ed] questions about the political weakness of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders who would make a deal." She also found "generally tepid support" from Arab leaders in the region for Bush's Iraq plan, while "shrug[ing] off a request from the emir of Kuwait that the United States engage directly with Iran and Syria."

Under the headline "How Rice Uses History Lessons," the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A4, King, 2.04M) writes, Secretary Rice "often calls herself 'a student of history.' And increasingly, she is using history -- or her chosen slice of it -- both to explain and justify the Bush administration's Middle East policy." The Journal notes that "when Ms. Rice talks about the challenges the US faces across the Mideast, she points, somewhat surprisingly, to Europe after World War II and to the West's decades-long face-off against the Soviet Union, which happens to be her area of expertise." Citing the Cold War's "denouement as context for today's bloodshed and tumult may seem far-fetched to some. But Ms. Rice uses the analogy both to beg for patience -- the Cold War, after all, consumed decades -- and to try to elucidate a diplomatic strategy that is increasingly assailed for its lack of assertiveness."

Rice Comments Linked To Episode Of "The Simpsons." The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that Secretary Rice "didn't seem to be trying to make much news on her swing this week through the Middle East. Still, she offered an interesting take on what she called 'a challenging time' in the region." Kamen notes that on Tuesday Rice "pontificated" that although she doesn't read Chinese, "I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is weiji, which means both danger and opportunity." Rice "did not say where she learned this aphorism," but Kamen notes that "oddly enough it was once featured on 'The Simpsons.'" Kamen observes, "Echoing Lisa Simpson on the Middle East or on the Chinese language may not be a great idea."

Former State Adviser Decries Rice's Claim That Diplomacy Isn't About "Making Deals." Aaron David Miller, former adviser to secretaries of state from George Schulz to Colin Powell, writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/19, 850K), "Having worked for six secretaries of State on Arab-Israeli negotiations, I nearly fell off my chair the other day when I read Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comment to reporters that diplomacy wasn't about making deals. Maybe 'making deals' is too glib a phrase for her, but it's precisely what effective American diplomacy in the Middle East is mostly about." Miller welcomes Rice's decision to make the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a priority as "a good beginning," but warns that in order "to have any chance of succeeding, the administration will have to change its software, develop a sustained two-year effort and a strategy that -- for both sides -- is balanced, tough and reassuring. In the end, it will require Rice to accept the obvious fact that diplomacy -- and its hundreds of hours of problem solving -- is really about making deals after all."

Former State Official Says Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions. The AP (1/19) reports Vice President Dick Cheney rejected "an Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq and end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas" in 2003, a former top State Department official told the British Broadcasting Corp. The State Department was "open to the offer, which came in an unsigned letter sent shortly after the American invasion of Iraq," Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told BBC's Newsnight in a program broadcast Wednesday night. But according to Wilkerson, Cheney "vetoed the deal." Wilkerson said State Department officials "thought it was a very propitious moment" to strike a deal, "but as soon as it got to the White House, and as soon as it got to the vice president's office, the old mantra of 'We don't talk to evil'...reasserted itself." State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Thursday he "wasn't aware of any letter from the Iranians to the US government in 2003."

Ahmadinejad Condemns US Military Buildup In Gulf. The AP (1/19, Dareini) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "lashed out at a US military buildup in the Gulf" Thursday, saying Iran is "ready for any possibility in the standoff over its nuclear program." He "made clear he was not backing down in his tough rhetoric toward the United States, despite criticism at home."

However, the New York Times (1/19, A8, Cloud, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates Thursday "played down the possibility of American military action against Iran but said it was not the right time for diplomatic engagement, either." Speaking to reporters while traveling in the Persian Gulf, Gates said, "Frankly, right at this moment there's really nothing the Iranians want from us, and so in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant." His comments were seen as "a blunt acknowledgment that the Bush administration, despite its increasingly tough comments toward Iran in recent weeks, has limited options to compel its leaders to halt their nuclear program or to play a more supportive role in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0118516

The AP (1/19, Burns) reports when asked about the prospects for military conflict with Iran, Gates said, "There are many courses of action available that do not involve an open conflict with Iran — there's no need for that." The Washington Times (1/19, Sands, 88K) also reports on Gates' comments.

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/19, Dinmore) reports, "Increasingly tough talk on Iran from the Bush administration…has rattled politicians and diplomats in Washington worried that the war in Iraq is set to widen." While "few lay claim to understanding what George W. Bush has in mind," there is "a widespread sense that the likelihood of some kind of military clash or conflict with Iran…has risen since the US president accused Tehran last week of 'providing material support for attacks on American troops' in Iraq." Departing Saudi Ambassador Price Turki al-Faisal told the Times, "The air is filled with the possibility of action against Iran's nuclear capability," warning that the consequences would be "catastrophic." Prince Turki said there was concern "in the region" that Bush's authority "had been eroded by the Republicans' loss of Congress in November's elections."

In Iran, the New York Times (1/19, A1, Fathi, Slackman, 1.16M) reports on its front page, that Ahmadinejad "appears to be under pressure from the highest authorities…to end his involvement in its nuclear program, a sign that his political capital is declining as his country comes under increasing international pressure." Two "hard-line newspapers, including one owned by the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called on the president to stay out of all matters nuclear," in a "public rebuke" seen as "a sign that the supreme leader…might no longer support the president as the public face of defiance to the West." It is also the "first sign that Mr. Ahmadinejad has lost any degree of Ayatollah Khamenei's confidence, a potentially damaging development for a president who has rallied his nation and defined his administration by declaring nuclear power Iran's 'inalienable right.'"

US Lawmakers Ask Bush To Consult Congress Before Invading Iran. AFP (1/19) reports a House bill has been introduced calling on President Bush "to obtain approval from Congress before using military force against Iran." The bill, introduced by Republican Rep. Walter Jones and five other US lawmakers, "calls on the president obtain authorization for an attack on Iran, unless the United States or US interests are attacked first."

Germany Proposes Wider Iran Sanctions. The Financial Times (1/19, Schmid, Dombey) reports the European Union "could expand the range of sanctions against Iran beyond United Nations-mandated measures," according to a document obtained by newspaper. A proposal by Germany, holder of the EU's revolving presidency, "would ban individuals linked to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes from visiting the EU and reaffirm the EU's opposition to selling arms to Tehran." The EU proposals, put forward ahead of a foreign ministers meeting on Monday, "would also ban travel to the EU of the individuals on the UN list and take steps to restrict Iranians studying proliferation-sensitive subjects within the EU."

Diplomats Warn Iran May Start Enrichment. The AP (1/19, Jahn) reports Iran is "ready to start assembling thousands of centrifuges to produce enriched uranium…after finishing most preliminary work on an underground facility housing such machines," a diplomat and a U.N. official said Thursday. The two officials "said much, but not all, of the hardware needed for the installation of the centrifuges was now in place at the Natanz facility." The revelations, which are based on reports by inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency visiting Natanz this week, "appeared to strengthen claims from Tehran that it is moving toward large-scale enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges."

Pyongyang Says "Agreement" Reached With US. The AP (1/19, Herman) reports Pyongyang said Friday that it had reached an agreement with the US during talks this week in Germany, "but the top American envoy said it had yet to be seen whether progress could be made at six-nation disarmament negotiations." North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the talks between Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and North Koreans negotiator Kim Kye Gwan had been held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there." No further details were given. But Hill, who arrived Friday in Seoul, "said he wasn't sure what agreement the statement was referring to." He called the talks in Berlin "very useful discussions" and

DOJ_NMG_0118517

"added he was pleased that it appeared the North was also positive about them."

On its front page, the Washington Times (1/19, A1, Kralev, 88K) says Pyongyang "expressed interest in a US-backed proposal that it suspend its nuclear program and allow U.N. inspectors to verify the suspension as an initial step toward dismantling its nuclear capabilities," diplomats said yesterday. During three days of talks in Berlin that ended yesterday, Kim reportedly asked Hill "what the United States would be willing to do if the North turned off its nuclear reactor." However, "A US response, if any, was not made public."

US Denies Meetings Signal Policy Shift. Meanwhile, AFP (1/19, Millikin) reported earlier Thursday that US officials denied that the "rare series of meetings" held this week in Berlin "marked a break with the Bush administration's long-standing refusal to negotiate directly with the Stalinist regime." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "This is not an instance of bilateral negotiations." The spokesman and "other officials insisted the Berlin contacts broke no new ground and were part of an ongoing set of six-party negotiations."

WSJournal Editor Urges Scrutiny Of UN's Operations In North Korea. Melanie Kirkpatrick, deputy editor of paper's editorial page, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A15, 2.04M) that "Saddam Hussein managed to pull off the $100 billion Oil for Food scam right under the noses of the United Nations officials charged with administering it. Now another dictator with nuclear ambitions has succeeded in a similar trick, this time manipulating the United Nations Development Program in North Korea." The details of the UNDP's "lack of oversight" of its operations in North Korea are "revealed in previously undisclosed documents and an exchange of letters between US and U.N. officials." American officials "have been pushing for months for more transparency in UNDP operations in North Korea, while the UNDP has resisted." Kirkpatrick says "an independent, outside audit" of the program "is an essential first step," but "a full-scale investigation along the lines of the Volcker Commission's Oil for Food probe would be even better." She also notes that the "North Korean operations of other U.N. agencies -- Unicef, the World Food Program, the Population Fund -- also deserve scrutiny."

In an editorial responding to Kirkpatrick's claims, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A14, 2.04M) writes, "The U.N.'s Oil for Food disgrace rolls on, with this week's indictment by a federal prosecutor in New York of the program's former administrator Benon Sevan. But now a new dollars-for-dictators scandal is breaking into the open, this one involving the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) and North Korea's Kim Jong Il." The Journal says the situation provides "one more chance to make the U.N. shape up, and to stop financing a global menace in the bargain."

China Faces Broad Criticism Over Anti-Satellite Weapons Test. The AP (1/18) reports the US "criticized China on Thursday for conducting an anti-satellite weapons test in which an old Chinese weather satellite was destroyed by a ballistic missile." National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, "The United States believes China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area. We and other countries have expressed our concern to the Chinese." The New York Times (1/19, Broad, Sanger, 1.16M) says China "successfully carried out its first test of an antisatellite weapon last week, signaling its resolve to play a major role in military space activities and bringing expressions of concern from Washington and other capitals." Only the US and the USSR "previously destroyed spacecraft in antisatellite tests, most recently the United States in the mid-1980s."

The Washington Post (1/19, Kaufman, Linzer, 690K) reports on its front page that China's action "drew sharp protests from other nations with satellite programs -- a predictable response that experts said dramatically illustrates Chinese willingness to face broad international criticism when it comes to space, which Beijing considers a key part of the push to modernize its military and increase its ability to compete in high-tech warfare." The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Spiegel, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the "shoot-down has rattled U.S. defense officials, who are concerned both about the commercial crafts and government spy and military satellites that operate at that height."

Somalia Seeks US Aid For Military, Intelligence Services. The AP (1/19, Gedda) reports Somalia "is asking the US government for help in building efficient police, military and intelligence organizations." The requests were contained in a three-page memo submitted to the State Department by Dahir Mirreh Jibreel, a US representative of the Transition Federal Government in Somalia." On top of the list of Somali requests "was the appointment of a US ambassador to Somalia." There was no immediate comment Thursday from the State Department on the request, but the AP says "large-scale assistance seems unlikely until Somali authorities are able to create a stable environment in the country."

DOJ_NMG_0118518

Somali Warlords Provide Protection As Violence Continues. The New York Times (1/19, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Somalia may be at a turning point, with a potentially viable government for the first time since 1991. But senseless violence is still the norm." The Times notes that Somalia's "warlord issue is complicated." While "some people call them thugs," in "a world with no police and no security, the clan warlord was sometimes the only protection."

European Court Says Russia Failed To Investigate Chechen Torture Claims. The Washington Post (1/19, A14, Finn, 690K) reports the European Court of Human Rights "ruled Thursday that two Chechen brothers were tortured in their strife-torn Russian republic and that authorities there failed to investigate their allegations of abuse." It was "the first decision on torture in Chechnya issued by the court," but human rights groups "have long contended that torture is widespread in Chechnya." Thursday's ruling "follows a series of judgments against Russia concerning disappearances and the indiscriminate use of force by the Russian military and its proxies in the southern republic," the Post notes.

South American Leaders Debate Future Of Mercosur Under Pressure From Chavez. The New York Times (1/19, Rohter, 1.16M) reports South American leaders began gathering in Brazil Thursday "for discussions focused on a single, contentious issue: should the Mercosur trade group continue to emphasize economic integration, as Brazil and Argentina prefer, or transform itself into a political alliance with an 'anti-imperialist' tint, the path President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela favors?" The conference's Brazilian hosts "tried to minimize the prospect of tensions," with Foreign Minister Celso Amorim talking of a "reinforced Mercosur" that he said "belongs to everybody." However, Chávez "declined to play along with diplomatic niceties, bluntly staking out his position the instant he got off the plane on Thursday morning." Chávez said his goal is "to contribute with something we consider to be absolutely necessary: the reformatting of Mercosur" and "decontaminating the contamination of neoliberalism."

Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Moffett, 2.04M) reports that "millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot," his brother Guillermo "faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages." Guillermo currently "faces a US indictment alleging that he helped 'set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies' and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way." However, Roberto works with the Reconciliation Network, which offers classes for community leaders and "helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Chinese Missile Strikes Satellite."
"Art Buchwald, 81; Pulitzer-Winning Columnist Found Humor Even In Death."
"This City Knows The Drill."
"Senate Approves Major Overhaul Of Ethics Rules."
"Black Leaders Still Sizing Up Obama."
"Luxury Wrapped In Gridlock."

USA Today:

"O'Toole Still Has An Eye On That Elusive Statue."
"Overall Cancer Deaths Decline Again, But Statistics Not As Rosy For Blacks."
"Court To Oversee Wiretap Program."

New York Times:

"Flexing Muscle, China Destroys Satellite In Test."
"Rebuke In Iran To Its President On Nuclear Role."
"Senate Passes Vast Ethics Overhaul."
"White House Shifting Tactics In Surveillance Cases."
"Art Buchwald, Whose Humor Poked The Powerful, Dies at 81."
"Parents of 9/11 Victims Torn From Grandchildren."

DOJ_NMG_0118519

Washington Post:
"Senate Passes Ethics Package."
"Run Schools Together, Fenty Urges Council."
"China Criticized For Anti-Satellite Missile Test."
"GOP Drafts Broad Plan For Va. Transportation."
"Art Buchwald, 1925-2007."
"Identity Of Edwards Home's Buyers Veiled."
"GSA Chief Scrutinized For Deal With Friend."
"O'Malley 'Conservative' In '08 Budget Proposal."

Washington Times:
"House To Echo Criticism Of Troop Surge."
"GOP Expects Secret Ballot."
"Church Dispute Headed To Court."
"Senate Passes Ethics Reform By 96-2 Margin."
"N. N. Korea Interested In Deal To Halt Nukes."

Detroit Free Press:
"Should Oakland Hold The Fat?"
"Red Ink Deepens For State."
"Focused On The Future."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Off-Field Problems Erode Vick's Image."
"Fed Chief: Boomer's Benefits A Danger."
"Georgia's Declaration."
"Two Hip Hop DJ's arrest Spotlight Atlanta As Hotbed For Music Piracy."

Houston Chronicle:
"Jury Spares Trucker In Smuggling Deaths."
"Oil Slips, But Price At Pump Barely Dips."
"Study Cites Possible Link Between Ship Channel Air, Cancer."
"Jurors Say Many Tears Were Shed For Victims."
"Girls Parents Sue Myspace Increased Safety Controls."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Harvard Big Tobacco Study; Maliki Cracks Down; Campaign 2008; Pelosi Interview; Congress 1st 100 Hours; Judiciary Committee Hearings; "Consumer Reports" Traction; Hornbeck On Oprah; Art Buchwald Obit; Dear Rescue; Living Longer.
CBS: New Iraq Strategy-Under Attack; New Iraq Strategy-Analysis; Iraq Sectarian Violence; American Civilian Killed-Iraq; "Consumer Reports" Traction; Winter Weather; Winter Freeze-California; Technology Breakthrough-The Blind; Hornbeck On Oprah; Art Buchwell Obit.
NBC: "Consumer Reports" Traction; Breast Cancer Study; New Iraq Strategy-Under Fire; Harsh Words From Maliki; Violent Weather-Europe; Winter Weather; Hornbeck On Oprah; Global Warming-Antarctica; Animal Helpers; Stock Market; Art Buchwald Obit.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: House-Democratic 100-Hour Agenda Completed; Muqtada al-Sadr Aide Arrested; Secretary Gates-Iraq Visit; OK, TX, MO-Snow Forecast; Study-Male Drivers And Car Crashes; Tokyo Stock Exchange.
CBS: Secretary Gates-Iraq Visit; China Uses Missile To Destroy Space Satellite; House-Democratic 100-Hour Agenda Completed; Consumer Reports To Investigate Infant Car Seat Test Results; OK, TX, MO-Snow Forecast; Oil Prices; Mate Selection-Eye Color Survey; Atlanta Falcons QB Being Investigated For Water Bottle Incident.
NPR: Secretary Gates-Iraq Visit; Senate-Ethics Bill Passes; AG Gonzales-Mail Searches; OK, TX, MO-Snow Forecast; TX-Winter Storm Cleanup; Wall Street; Fed. Chairman-Senate Budget Committee; House-Democratic 100-Hour Agenda Completed; Pelosi-Democrats Will Support Resolution Against Troop Increase; Tokyo Stock Exchange.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS AND APPROPRIATIONS _ HELP Full Committee and Labor, Health and Human Services Subcommittee of Appropriations. Joint hearing on ``Can Congress Help fulfill the Promise of Stem Cell Research?" Director Story Landis of the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke; George Daley, Children's Hospital, Boston; Lauren Stanford, juvenile diabetes patient, Plymonth, Mass.; John Wagner, University of Minnesota Medical School. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. ___ Strengthening the Page Board of the House. H.R. ___ - Congressional pension accountability.

9:30 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Water Resources and Environment

DOJ_NMG_0118520

Subcommittee. Hearing on the need for renewed investment in clean water infrastructure. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Iraq Study Group report. Co-chair Lee Hamilton, former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: HOMELAND SECURITY-LEGAL _ The American Bar Association Section of Administrative Law and Regulatory Practice sponsors the 2nd Annual Homeland Security Law Institute. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. DHS Assistant Secretary Robert Stephan. 9 a.m. - 10:15 a.m. Panel on ``Transportation and Supply Chain Security." Participants include American Bar Association Executive Director Henry F. White Jr. 10:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. Session on ``Immigration Policy and Legal Issues." Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza SW.

REPUBLICANS-WINTER MEETING _ The Republican National Committee holds its 2007 Winter Meeting. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. General Session. Speakers: Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman, and newly-elected RNC Officers. Constitution Ballroom. 12:30 p.m. Member's luncheon with Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., Minority Leader. Independence Ballroom. 12:30 p.m. Media availability with new officers. Wilson/Roosevelt Rooms. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. UK Army Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, deputy commander of Multi-National Force-Iraq and senior British representative in Iraq, will brief live from Iraq with an update on operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS _ 9 a.m. NARAL Pro-Choice America releases its 16th annual report on women's reproductive rights in the U.S. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRACY-DEVELOPMENT _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. Freedom House hosts a forum, ``Democracy and Development: Maximizing Performance in Two Dimensions," focusing on a look ahead to the 2007 Community of Democracies ministerial meeting in Bamako. Panelists will examine the relationship between democratic governance and economic development. Participants include: Dr. Paula Dobriansky, Under Secretary of State for Democracy and Global Affairs; Ambassador John Danilovich, Chief Executive Officer of the Millennium Challenge Corporation; Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., chair, Foreign Operations Sub-Committee of the House Appropriations Committee; and Abdoulaye Diop, ambassador of the Republic of Mali to the U.S. Location: 8th floor conference room, 1225 Eye St. NW.

ENVIRONMENT _ 9:15 a.m. Conservation, environmental and scientific activists hold a telephone briefing to discuss the Bush energy policy and to release their own agenda to address clean energy and global warming. Notes: Callin number: 800-311-9407; passcode: Energy 1.

NEY SENTENCING _ 9:30 a.m. Former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who has pleaded guilty to a two-count information charging him with, among other things, honest services fraud and making false statements, will be sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle. Location: Courtroom 14, U.S. Distict Court, 3rd Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

MARTINEZ-PROTEST _ 9:45 a.m. Protest demonstration against the proposed election of Sen. Mel Martinez as RNC chairman. Location: In front of the Grant Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

ECONOMY PREDICTIONS _ 10 a.m. The American Bankers Association holds a news conference with bank chief economists to present monetary policy predictions for 2007. Location: ABA Boardroom 7th floor, 1120 Connecticut Ave. NW.

PETROLEUM REVIEW _ 10 a.m. The American Petroleum Institute holds a briefing to discuss its end-year statistical review. Location: 12th floor, 1220 L St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-SOU _ 10:30 a.m. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid discuss The State of the Union 2007. Location: National Press Club, Ballroom.

BLUE DOGS-IRAQ _ 11:30 a.m. Members of the fiscally conservative, Democratic Blue Dog Coalition hold a press conference on the war in Iraq. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

PENTAGON-PERSONNEL _ 11:30 a.m. Under Secretary of Defense David S. Chu will brief on details of recent military personnel announcements. Location: DOD briefing studio, Pentagon 2E579.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 12 p.m. Senator Edward Kennedy and Congressman George Miller hold a press conference with Edward Kuntz, executive chairman of the board, Kindred Healthcare; and Lew Prince, co-owner of Vintage Vinyl, businessmen who strongly support an increase in the minimum wage. Location: Room 226, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0118521

CONGRESS-IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. The American Constitution Society for Law and Policy holds a briefing on the esclation in Iraq, Congress and the Constitution, with Neil Kinkopf of Georgia State University law school; attorney David Rivkin; Christopher Schroeder of Duke University School of Law, others. Location: Room 253, Russell.

COASTAL GRANTS _ 1 p.m. Deputy Interior Secretary Lynn Scarlett holds a telephone briefing to announce 25 projects which will receive about $19 million in grants under the coastal wetlands conservation program. Notes: Callin number: 888-395-6878; passcocde: 9719038.

SALAZAR-SOU _ 1 p.m. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., delivers the first Spanish langauge preview address of the State of the Union. Location: Room S-120, Capitol.

MEDICARE DRUGS NEGOTIATION _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts a discussion, ``Can Government Price Negotiation Work for the Medicare Drug Benefit? Panelists include Gerard Anderson, Johns Hopkins University; Joseph Antos, AEI; Mark McClellan, AEI-Brookings Joint Center. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

DRUG SENTENCING _ 2:30 p.m. Two former senior Guatemalan anti-narcotics law enforcment officers, Adan Castillo Aguilar and Jorge Aguilar Garcia, will be sentenced on cocaine manufacturing and distribution charges before U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Mayer Collyer. Location: Courtroom 6, U.S. District Courthouse, 3rd Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

SAUDI AMBASSADOR _ 3 p.m. Saudi Ambasador Prince Turki Al-Faisal speaks on ``The Islamic World and the West: Steps to Achieving and Lasting, Peaceful Dialogue, `` sponsored by American University. Location: School of International Service lounge, on campus.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration's Post-9/11 Policies Under Fire On The Hill..... 3
Ally Of Posada Surrenders Cache Of Illegal Weapons 7
DOJ Plans To Store DNA Of Terror Suspects, Illegal Immigrants 7
Pentagon Releases Procedural Manual For Trials Of Detainees.. 8
NYTimes Suggests Stimson Should Be Disciplined By Bar Association..... 8

Homeland Response:

DOJ Official Says Bush Could Order Killing Of Terror Suspects In US 8
Chertoff Urges Editors To Use Caution In Reporting On Threats, Emergencies 9
GAO Urges TSA To Assess Terror Risks For Rail System..... 9
FBI Wants To Question California Man About Subway Mercury Spill 9
Many Families Of 9/11 Victims Face Estrangement..... 10
NYTimes Says Administration Must Extend Temporary Housing For Katrina Victims..... 10

War News:

Pelosi Says House Democrats Will Back Anti-Surge Resolution 10
Questions Surround Petraeus Counterinsurgency Strategy 11
Casey Likely To Face Difficult Confirmation Hearing 12
Mahdi Army Says It Is Under Siege In Sadr City..... 12
Debates Over Iraqi Budget Further Doubts About Maliki Government 13
Iraq Reviewing Diplomatic Protocols With Iran..... 13
Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For US Civilian's Death In Iraq 13
Corporal Is First To Plead Guilty To Murder In Hamdania Case. 13
Biden Says More Troops Needed In Afghanistan 13

DOJ:

Gonzales Defends Prosecutors' Dismissals..... 13

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Treasurer To Be Released From Home Confinement..... 15
Breedon Moves From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss.... 15
US Charges Two Former CVS Executives With Rhode Island Corruption 15

Criminal Law:

Gonzales Promises To Examine Milwaukee Crime Trends 15
Attorneys Spar Over Jury Picks At Libby Trial..... 16
Cunningham Case Figure Is Focus Of Lewis Probe 16
Judge Grants Defense Motion For Delay In Connolly Murder Trial 17
Judge Gets Input Before Ney Sentencing 17
Idaho Triple Murderer Charged In Unsolved Slaying..... 17
Program For Addicted Prisoners Under Fire For Alleged Scientology Links 17
Missouri Man Pleads Not Guilty To Kidnapping 17
Second Chance Act Defended 18

Civil Law:

DOJ Seeks To Block Wage Payout By New York Center..... 18
Study On Nicotine Raises Calls For Heightened Regulation..... 18

Civil Rights:

Jury Sentences Truck Driver In Immigrant Deaths To Life In Prison 19
Government's Expert Grilled By Defense Attorney In Mississippi Voting Rights Trial..... 19
Bush Sees Possibility Of Pardon For Convicted Border Agents . 20
Lawmakers Call For DOJ Probe Into Duke Lacrosse Prosecutions 20
Cardin Asks For DOJ Probe Of Maryland Republican Campaign Tactics..... 20
DOJ Studying Washington City's Elections After Report Raises Questions..... 21
Abortion Rights Backers Lower Expectations..... 21
Robert E. Lee's Legacy Under Reevaluation..... 21

Antitrust:

FBI Raids Florida Citrus Firm Offices In Antitrust Probe 22
Mittal Discussing Sale Of Weirton Steel To Esmark..... 22
Microsoft Seeks To Question Iowa Class-Action Plaintiffs..... 22
Delta Pilots Seek To Testify At Airline Merger Hearing 22
GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Shows CEO's New Strategy..... 23

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Coalition Of Industry, Environmentalists To Push For Action On Climate Change 23
House Approves Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties 24

Indian Tribes Hiring More Big Law Firms..... 24
Sioux Tribe Asks U Of Illinois To Return Mascot's Tribal Regalia25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Los Angeles Officials Announces Crackdown On Gangs25
Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Back Off Of Reporters' Subpoenas In BALCO Probe 26
FBI Launches Email Alert System 27
Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle..... 27
Mitchell Pushes For Cooperation From Baseball Players, Owners In Steroids Investigation 27
Ohio Drug Trafficker Sentenced To Life In Prison 27
Protest Follows Marijuana Dispensary Raids In Los Angeles County..... 28
In New York, Three Face Charges For Roles In Heroin-Smuggling Ring..... 28
Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People 29

Tax:

New Hampshire Man Holes Up In Home After Tax Conviction... 29
Businesses Critical Of Bush "Withholding Tax" Provision 29
Senate Democrats Want To Increase Tax Collections..... 29

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Address Iraq, Domestic Issues In State Of The Union . 29
Democrats Finish 100 Hours Agenda With Time To Spare 30
Senate Passes Ethics Bill 96-2 31
GSA Head Sought To Give Friend's Firm No-Bid Contract..... 31
Kerry Seeks Probe Into DOD Surplus Sales 32
House Bill Would Rescind $14 Billion Energy Industry Tax Breaks 32
Methodist Ministers Oppose Bush Library At SMU 32
Brill Expected To Replace Joseph At State Department..... 32
House Democrats Want Tougher Trade Restrictions..... 33
Hospitals Worry Bush Budget Will Cut Medicare Payments 33
Official Says NTEU Should Be Certified To Represent Customs, Border Workers..... 33
White House Usher Says Bush Is "Steadfast." 33
Ignatius Examines "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence."..... 33

Other News:

Bernanke Warns Entitlement Costs Could Weaken US Economy33
Judge Declares Mistrial In California Vioxx Cases 35
Personal Attacks Mark Rancor On Michigan High Court..... 35
New York Bar Panel Urges Law Firms Not To Force Retirements..... 35
Groups Unveil Plan To Cover Uninsured..... 35
Martinez Faces Potential Revolt From RNC Members 36
Purchasers Of Edwards' DC House Focus Of Corporate Probe. 36
Some Black Leaders Remain Unswayed By Potential Obama Bid 37
Gingrich Sees Fundraising As Major Barrier To '08 Run..... 37
McCain Campaign Said To Lack Clear Lines Of Authority..... 37
US Launches "Intensive" Diplomatic Effort To Restart Mideast Talks..... 37
Former State Official Says Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions . 38
Pyongyang Says "Agreement" Reached With US 39
China Faces Broad Criticism Over Anti-Satellite Weapons Test. 40
Somalia Seeks US Aid For Military, Intelligence Services..... 40
European Court Says Russia Failed To Investigate Chechen Torture Claims 40
South American Leaders Debate Future Of Mercosur Under Pressure From Chavez..... 41
Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 42

DOJ_NMG_0118524

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration's Post-9/11 Policies Under Fire On The Hill. ABC World News (1/18, story 6, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M), the only network to report on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, said last night the hearing was "a dramatic display on just how things have changed on Capitol Hill. Now the Democrats are in charge." Gonzales "did more listening than talking. Anger on the administration's conduct in the war on terror came pouring out." ABC (Thomas) added, "The new Democratic Chairman of the Judiciary Committee accused the Attorney General and the Bush Administration of trampling the Constitution." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "I have never seen a time when our Constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government." Gonzalez "fired back that the country faces a ruthless enemy." Gonzales: "At the Department of Justice, every day is September 12th." But "Democrats, and even some Republicans, engaged in an often searing assault on a range of issues. On the practice of rendition specifically whether the US Should have sent a Canadian terror suspect to Syria, where the man was allegedly tortured."

Print coverage was markedly negative toward the Administration. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Schmit, Miller, Savage, 850K) says "the Bush administration refused to provide details to Congress of how a new court-review process for terror-related wiretaps would work, triggering a fresh round of complaints and suspicions from Democrats about what the administration was doing. At the same time, President Bush and other administration officials indicated that little had changed in the electronic eavesdropping program. … With Gonzales and other officials mum about the program's details, Democrats refused to accept their assurances. It was not immediately clear how that stalemate might be resolved."

The Financial Times (1/19, Sevastopulo), under the headline "Senators Blast Bush Security Policies," notes the Administration's "policy U-turn" on warrantless surveillance "comes just weeks before an appeals court was scheduled to hear the case, but Mr Gonzales denied that the administration's switch was related to the legislation."

USA Today (1/19, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports Committee Chairman Pat "Leahy and other senators made it clear that they remained unhappy about the administration's handling of surveillance issues. They said they will be watching how the program operates now that surveillance requests will be vetted by the court established in 1978 by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). 'For years, the administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans, I believe contrary to the law,' Leahy said." He added, "The Justice Department has been complicit in advancing these government policies, which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution."

The New York Times (1/19, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "In a four-paragraph letter on Wednesday announcing that the Bush administration had reversed its position and would submit its domestic surveillance program to judicial supervision," Gonzales "used one phrase three times. A secret court, he said, had fashioned a way to allow the program to be monitored by the judiciary without compromising the need for 'speed and agility.'" That phrase also "captures, some critics say, the administration's moving-target litigation strategy, one that often seeks to change the terms of the debate just as a claim of executive authority is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress. … In other cases, too, the timing of litigation decisions by the government has been suggestive." For example, "shortly before the Supreme Court heard a set of three detainee cases in 2004, the administration reversed course and allowed two Americans held incommunicado by the military to meet with their lawyers, mooting that issue. After the court ruled that one of the men, Yaser Hamdi, could challenge his detention in court, the administration instead freed him and sent him to Saudi Arabia." And "just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review the case of the second man, Jose Padilla, he was transferred to the criminal justice system last year, mooting his appeal."

Time (1/19, Bennett) reports, "Alberto Gonzales spent two hours every day for the last three weeks steeling himself for today's hearing before the Democrat-led Senate Judiciary committee, says a close aide. Staffers peppered him with possible questions that each Senator might ask. He went in armed for the fight with freshly penned letter to the chairmen of that committee — Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — telling them not to worry about the whole warrant-less wiretapping issue anymore; it has been approved by judge. It seemed like a nimble pre-emptive duck to take a contentious issue off the table. Some Senators thought it felt more they were being led down a rabbit hole." Time continues, "In an often-heated exchange, Gonzales refused to disclose details about the court's decision and exactly how it applied to the President's controversial wiretapping program. … The big question was whether there will be some genuine judicial oversight that monitors how individual wiretaps are being used, or if the court approval is a one-time pass for the entire program. Frustrated Senators pointed out that it was still unclear what procedures, if any, will actually change with the court order, issued on Jan. 10 by a single judge sitting on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court."

DOJ_NMG_0118525

The AP (1/19, Jordan) reports Gonzales "offered few answers" yesterday, "maintaining during 3 1/2 hours of sharp rebukes that disclosing details of the program would expose sensitive security information. His resistance was underscored by a letter from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's presiding judge, offering to detail some of its new authority with lawmakers if allowed to by the Bush administration." At one point, Leahy asked, "Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced? … Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?" Gonzales responded, "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential." The Washington Times (1/19, Seper, 88K) notes "both Democrats and Republicans on the committee demanded more information about the court's oversight role, citing a letter from FISA's presiding judge saying the court would have no objection to giving the panel confidential information, but it would have to be provided by the Justice Department."

The Washington Post (1/19, A6, Eggen, 690K) reports the Administration "quickly locked horns with Democratic lawmakers," adding the "debate underscored continued skepticism among Democrats and some Republicans over the parameters and legality of the administration's surveillance efforts, even with court approval, and signaled that Congress and the executive branch are likely to continue sparring over the details." The Post adds, "Although the precise contours and scope of the revised spying program remain unclear, some new information emerged yesterday." GOP. Sen. Arlen Specter "said Justice Department briefers told him the effort was based on 'individualized' warrants, rather than a blanket order that would allow broader surveillance. Four other people who have been briefed on the program, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the program is classified, described it as a hybrid effort that includes both individual warrants and the authority for eavesdropping on more broadly defined groups of people."

The New York Times (1/19, Johnston, Shane, 1.16M) also says "a Congressional official who has been briefed on the new procedures called it a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval." At the hearing, Gonzales "tried, apparently without success, to quell the flood of questions." The session "quickly became a forum for senators to say the administration was withholding pertinent information about the decision. House Democrats raised similar concerns."

The AP (1/19, Raum) describes the Administration's "about-face on warrantless wiretapping" as "the latest in a series of White House retreats and reversals. This is a different day for a president known for his stubbornness and insistence on seeing things his way. In just two months, Bush has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, sacked Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and given up the fight for John Bolton at the United Nations." He "has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 -- after aggressively presiding over record deficits and tax cuts; Democrats also have set such a target. And the president has agreed tentatively to increasing the minimum wage." Bush "seems to be bending to the realities of the new Democratic control of Congress - and laying down markers to keep the last two years of his presidency from being seen as only about Iraq." The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Grier, 59K) runs a similar report titled "White House Backs Down On Wartime Powers," in which it says Bush "has claimed some far-reaching powers for the executive branch in its prosecution of the war against global terrorism – but in the face of legal challenges and newly empowered Democrats, some of those powers slowly are being curtailed."

McClatchy Newspapers (1/19, Gordon) reports, "Until now, the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, launched in the months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, has monitored overseas phone calls and other electronic communications involving Americans without court warrants. … But Gonzales repeatedly rejected senators' assertions that it was illegal, saying the program was within President Bush's emergency war powers." McClatchy continues, "Testifying under oath in his first congressional appearance since Democrats took control of Capitol Hill this month, Gonzales was pummeled with allegations that the program and other administration anti-terrorism programs have trampled on federal civil rights laws and the Constitution. He also faced sharp questions about rising violent crime in some medium-sized cities, allegations of voting rights abuses against African-Americans in Maryland and his agency's recent dismissal of a half-dozen U.S. attorneys." McClatchy notes, "Leahy and Specter wrote to the FISA court's chief judge on Wednesday requesting copies of the new orders. Chief Judge Colleen Kollar-Cotelly responded that she had 'no objection' to making the material public, but that it's the court's practice to refer requests for classified information to the Justice Department. … Gonzales repeatedly emphasized that all members of the Senate and House intelligence committees have been briefed on the orders and didn't immediately say how he'd respond to the demand from the Judiciary Committee."

The Houston Chronicle (1/19, Roth) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to promise a Senate committee that the administration would let it review the text of an agreement ending its warrantless wiretapping program." The Chronicle continues, "During a contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Thursday, Democrats said they wanted more details about how the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will approve federal eavesdropping on U.S. residents suspected of having ties to terrorists. …

DOJ_NMG_0118526

Committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was taken aback when Gonzales wouldn't commit to turning over the FISA order spelling out the domestic wiretapping program." The Chronicle adds, "In his first appearance before the Judiciary Committee under Democratic control, the Texas lawyer spent much of the day fielding often hostile questions."

Bloomberg (1/19, Rowley, Schmidt) reports, "Gonzales was also questioned about Bush's assertion, after signing postal authorization legislation, that he can order Americans' mail opened without a warrant. … 'To my knowledge there is no physical search of mail' unless authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, Gonzales said."

Long Island Newsday (1/19, Brune) reports, "Gonzales wouldn't budge when Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) disclosed a letter from the FISA court chief judge expressing a willingness to release the orders to the committee. … 'Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?' Leahy asked. 'Are we Alice in Wonderland here?' … Gonzales said it wasn't his decision, but added, 'Certainly in the application, there's going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential.'" Newsday notes, "Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) was also caustic in his questioning, noting it took Justice Department lawyers 19 months to win the court order, while he wrote a bill to do it in a year. … 'I cannot help but conclude there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency to get this done faster,' Specter said. … Gonzales said, 'I somewhat take issue with Sen. Specter's innuendo that this was something that we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks.' … Gonzales said the confidential briefings would help senators understand the orders."

CNET News (1/19, Broache) reports that "Gonzales' appearance before a key U.S. Senate committee Thursday yielded little new information about the Bush administration's sudden revelation that it would seek court approval for its domestic eavesdropping activities." CNET reports that Leahy and Specter "said they were pleased to hear that future activities associated with a controversial National Security Agency operation known as the Terrorist Surveillance Program would undergo review by judges on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. … But many critical questions about the scope and content of the court orders remain unanswered, committee members said."

National Journal's Technology Daily (1/19, Noyes) reports, "Gonzales remained guarded throughout the hearing and refused to answer a number of questions asked by committee" members. "Government lawyers are slated to appear before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in two weeks to challenge a lawsuit filed by the ACLU over the NSA program. The ACLU said a ruling remains important because the president still believes in his 'inherent authority to engage in wiretapping without the oversight of the [Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act] court.'"

Leahy Grills Gonzales On Arar. The Canadian Press (1/19, Gorham) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, lambasted by an irate senator Thursday over how Maher Arar was treated by American authorities, said he'll try to release more information about the case next week." CP continues, "Democrat Patrick Leahy, who heads the Senate judiciary committee, told Gonzales that officials knew 'damn well' Arar would be tortured when they deported him to Syria and Canadians are 'justifiably upset' about a matter that's 'beneath the dignity' of the U.S. … He also wanted to know why Arar remains on the U.S. security watch list despite being exonerated of any terrorist link … 'This country has not said anything at all, that we made a mistake or had an apology,' said Leahy. … 'Why is he on a government watch list if he's been found completely innocent by this Canadian commission, which actually had the information from us?'" CP adds, "According to Canada's Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, there's no reason at all. … Day, in town for meetings on security matters, said Canadians have finally seen the Arar file that American authorities refused to share until now and there's 'nothing new' to suggest he's a safety risk. … For his part, Gonzales promised a briefing for senators and said he hoped to release the information publicly."

Local Television. Nationwide, major and small cities broadcasted this story. Cities include: Washington, DC, New York, NY, Los Angeles, CA, Chicago, IL, San Francisco and Sacramento, CA, Dallas, Houston, TX, Boston, MA, Detroit, MI, Tampa, Miami, FL, and Phoenix, AZ. Some examples are: WRNN-TV, New York, NY (1/18, 8:30 p.m.) broadcasted, "Today, Senators demanded details from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about new orders putting the government's domestic spying program under court review. Meanwhile, the presiding judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court said she had no objection to disclosing legal orders and opinions about the program that targets people linked to Al-Qaida, but the Bush Administration would have to approve release of the information. Gonzales and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said it was uncertain whether the court orders and details about the program will be disclosed." KABC-TV, Los Angeles, CA (1/18, 11:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Senators demanded details from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, one day after the Bush Administration agreed to put the government's domestic spying program under court are view. The day after the Bush Administration surprised rehearsed of the wiretapping program, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appeared in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee." KDAF-TV, Dallas, Ft. Worth, TX (1/18, 9:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The President's domestic wiretap program went under the microscope on Capitol Hill this morning. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. Yesterday, the Bush Administration announced it had reversed the position on the program. Gonzales says Federal investigators will get court approval."

DOJ_NMG_0118527

More Commentary. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (1/19), Dale McFeatters writes, "After a year spent fighting it, the Bush administration has made an abrupt about-face and put its wiretap program under the jurisdiction of a secret court, which many believe the law requires anyway." McFeatters continues, "The concession does not constitute a White House change of heart in its sweeping assertions of executive power, but rather a move to head off challenges to its warrantless eavesdropping in the courts and Congress that it seemed destined to lose. By folding now, the president retains the prerogative of reasserting the power later. … The Justice Department had already lost a challenge at the district court level and will now seek to have the case declared moot. The then-Republican Congress refused to ratify the program last year when its existence became known, and the Democrats might well have overturned it legislatively." McFeatters adds, "In essence, the administration said it would comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and seek warrants from the secret panel of federal judges for its monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States, a process that it had insisted before was too slow and too cumbersome. … Still, questions remain about what the new compliance, under what the Justice Department says is an 'innovative' arrangement with the FISA court, really means. Must the National Security Agency seek individual warrants, or does the administration feel that blanket warrants are acceptable? Or does it believe a simple court approval of the program as a whole is OK? These are fair questions for the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees to put to the administration. … The Bush administration has been forced to scale back from a number of its assertions of unbridled presidential power -- detention without trial, military commissions, torture, secret prisons -- but that is hardly a wholesale embrace of civil liberties, due process and personal privacy."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/19, 850K) says that the Administration's "abrupt acknowledgment that it can, after all, track suspected terrorists without shredding the privacy rights of Americans inspires mixed reactions -- relief that the rule of law has triumphed, suspicion that the administration's concession isn't all that it's cracked up to be and, most of all, anger at the president and his surrogates for suggesting that any criticism of their tactics was tantamount to treason. … In a background briefing for reporters, a Justice Department official refused to be pinned down on whether the administration is now asking the FISA court for authorization to monitor each individual suspect or whether there is a broader grant of authority. This is unacceptable."

Under the headline "Bush's Wiretap Surrender," the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "The Iraq War has been hurting…Bush's poll ratings for a couple of years now. But keeping him from political free fall is the fact that the United States has suffered no terrorist attacks since 2001, and the widespread belief that White House policy might have something to do with it. So count us baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender Wednesday on warrantless wiretapping authority that even the Carter Administration believed was well within the Constitutional power of the executive branch." The White House "may think this FISA concession will allow it to escape more onerous legislative restrictions. But Congress may now merely take this concession and codify it anyway."

The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (1/19) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would have Americans believe that, after years of asserting that national security depended upon the administration's ability to tap terror suspects' phone lines without waiting for the slow Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to OK the spying, the court suddenly became capable of instantly approving such wiretaps the very same week Democrats took control of Congress. … Is the administration trying to lose its last remaining shreds of credibility?" The Leader adds, "The administration is backing out of a program and a constitutional argument it previously labeled essential to national security. It is doing so in such a way as to make its previous assertions appear entirely disingenuous. … Retreating from a program that until now he has claimed was absolutely essential to stopping terrorist attacks on U.S. soil is either an inexcusable dereliction of duty, or a tacit admission that his previous claim was utter baloney."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/19) editorializes, "That sound you don't hear is one hand clapping. The Bush administration has surprisingly reversed itself on its anti-terrorism policy of eavesdropping on Americans without warrants, something that certainly deserves support and praise. But it would be unwise to get carried away." The Post-Gazette continues, "After all, this is the reversal of a policy that never should have been adopted in the first place. While Americans certainly want their government to root out terrorists and while they understand that tapping phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States may be necessary in some cases, many don't want such surveillance to be done without regard to the law. … This high disdain for legal procedures in the pursuit of warrantless surveillance has been going on for years, and it has been as shocking as it has been unnecessary. The nation lost much on 9/11 and it does not have to junk its traditional civil-liberty protections to achieve security, or so many Americans believe." The Post-Gazette adds, "Unfortunately, the Bush administration is not among the believers. After the attacks in 2001, the executive branch asserted a theory of executive ascendancy that, in the name of fighting the war on terror, was bolder and more far-reaching than any of its recent predecessors. The presidency has become something of an imperial institution that recognizes no restraints on its power. … Now supposedly an arrangement has been worked out that allows the court to oversee the National Security Agency's spying program 'with the speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al-Qaida,' as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales put it. Why this couldn't be done years ago and is happening now is not hard to guess: Congress is in the hands of the Democrats. … The details of the new program are murky and it must be taken on faith that this is progress -- a very big leap of faith indeed, given recent history. The administration, of course, does not concede that it did anything wrong. In other words, use the hand that's not clapping to cross your fingers."

DOJ_NMG_0118528

The Portland Oregonian (1/19) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that, at the Department of Justice, 'every day is Sept. 12.' … Would that it were so." The Oregonian continues, "That day 64 months ago is worth remembering. It was a day of sorrow. Of mourning. Of unity. Of resolve. It was the day after congressional Republicans and Democrats stood together on the steps of the Capitol and sang 'God Bless America.' … It was also a day when the laws governing Justice Department activities were still respected. Americans still believed, for example, that the Justice Department still complied with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It was years before the public would learn that the department had electronically eavesdropped on people suspected of links to terrorism without seeking the legally required approval from a secret federal court." The Oregonian adds, "That seems like a long time ago now. On a Thursday when the committee chairman shouted at Gonzales and the attorney general responded with characteristic dismissiveness, the Justice Department let it be known that it had decided to resume complying with the law that governs wiretapping. Investigators would conduct such surveillance under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as critics had demanded, Gonzales said. … The Justice Department is acknowledging now that, contrary to earlier assertions, it won't be too burdensome to get approval from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court when it wants to eavesdrop. In fact, Gonzales said Thursday, the program allows 'the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat.' … The threat is real, as we knew well on Sept. 12. And as we know now, lost liberty is no phantom."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (1/19) editorializes, "When a federal judge ruled last summer against President Bush's claim that he had full authority to order wiretaps of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails, he scolded her for not understanding 'the nature of the world in which we live.' … With his abrupt turnaround on domestic surveillance, the president seems to be starting to acknowledge that he is the one who has been out of touch." The Star-Ledger continues, "Congress will need to press harder to curb the White House's impulses toward secrecy. But Democrats, who are now the majority on the Hill, must be careful not to abridge executive power to the point of crippling the presidency, as Congress did in the wake of the Vietnam War. The Bush administration is not wrong that times of threat can require a president to assert unique authority. One of the many failures of the Bush administration is that it has so abused that authority as to jeopardize it entirely."

Ally Of Posada Surrenders Cache Of Illegal Weapons. The Miami Herald (1/19, Weaver) reports, "An ally of Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles turned over a stockpile of illegal machine guns, dynamite and a grenade launcher to federal agents this week in a bid to reduce his prison sentence, several sources familiar with the arms surrender said." The Herald continues, "Santiago Alvarez, a wealthy Miami developer convicted last fall on a weapons-conspiracy charge, arranged for the turnover of the new cache of firearms on Wednesday at his attorney's office in downtown Miami, sources said." The Herald adds, "Alvarez and convicted co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat are seeking to reduce their respective four- and three-year prison sentences by one or more years. The unusual arms surrender has no connection to Posada's latest troubles with federal authorities. … The Alvarez stash consisted of dozens of machine guns, rifles, C-4 explosive, dynamite, detonators, a grenade launcher and ammunition, sources said. The cache was considerably larger than the nine illegal firearms seized by federal agents in late 2005 when Alvarez and Mitat were first indicted on weapons charges in Broward County." The Herald notes, "Agents for the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives collected the latest stash of weapons at the Miami law office of Silvia Piñera-Vazquez and Sofia Powell-Cosio. The lawyers were granted temporary immunity to surrender the firearms to federal authorities on behalf of their clients, Alvarez and Mitat. Piñera-Vazquez, who declined to comment for this article, personally delivered a letter to the U.S. attorney's office on Tuesday detailing the proposed weapons turnover."

DOJ Plans To Store DNA Of Terror Suspects, Illegal Immigrants. The Arizona Republic (1/19, House, Wagner) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to add DNA from undocumented immigrants, suspected terrorists and other detainees to the FBI's national crime database, a move pushed by Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl and Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio." The Republic continues, "The federal database now only includes the DNA of felons and some misdemeanor offenders. The new plan would add the DNA of individuals who may never be convicted of a crime.

DOJ_NMG_0118529

… 'The (Department of Justice) is engaged in extensive consultation with affected agencies and is moving forward to issue the implementing regulations,' department spokesman Erick Ablin confirmed Thursday." The Republic adds, "Proponents say the move will help to solve more crimes. … Opponents call it a mistake. … 'People will end up in this database even without probable cause for their arrest or detention,' said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C." The Republic notes, "It could be more than a year before the Justice Department plan is finalized to collect DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, terrorism suspects and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses. … A draft proposal is only now circulating internally within the Justice Department and its agencies. The plan also must be sent to other affected agencies outside of the Justice Department, and to the White House Office of Management and Budget. Officials would not release a copy of that draft."

USA Today (1/19, Willing) reports, "The federal government could add DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, captives in the war on terrorism and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses to the FBI's crime-fighting database under a plan being finalized by the Justice Department." USA continues, "Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, confirmed the plan, which hasn't been publicly disclosed, and said details are expected to be completed soon. … Proponents of the plan, including U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Maricopa County, Ariz., Sheriff Joe Arpaio, say taking DNA from federal detainees would solve many crimes committed by illegal immigrants and make it easier to identify and track potential terrorists. … Opponents, such as Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, say such mass seizures of DNA violate privacy and do little to improve law enforcement." USA adds, "Fredrickson says the law that defines federal detainees is so broad that it could apply to hikers stopped by park rangers or airline passengers selected for screening. Authorization for taking the DNA was included in a bill reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act that President Bush signed last year. … The DNA samples, which contain an individual's unique genetic code, would be compared against genetic profiles from 3.9 million criminals and 157,000 unsolved crimes held by the system of federal and state DNA databases that the FBI administers. The FBI says its system has aided more than 41,000 criminal investigations since 1990. … DNA from federal arrestees and detainees would be held on a computer index, enabling law enforcement to track illegal immigrants who return after being expelled from the USA or who commit crimes after being released. War-on-terrorism detainees, who often use aliases, could be positively identified by DNA and linked to evidence seized at suspected terrorist sites."

Pentagon Releases Procedural Manual For Trials Of Detainees. The AP (1/18, Flaherty) reports Pentagon "set rules Thursday for detainee trials that could allow terror suspects to be convicted and perhaps executed using hearsay testimony and coerced statements, setting up a new clash between President Bush and Congress." The Pentagon said the rules, laid out in a 238-page manual, "are fair." Congressional Democrats "said they would hold hearings and revive legislation on the plan, and human rights organizations complained that the regulations would allow evidence that would not be tolerated in civilian or military courtrooms." The Washington Post (1/19, A13, Smith, 690K) reports the manual "is meant to prescribe how military commissions will try some of the roughly 395 prisoners now detained at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Officials predicted yesterday that 60 to 80 will face the commissions."

The New York Times (1/19, Mazzetti, 1.16M) says the new procedures "follow the guidelines Congress set down in the Military Commissions Act late last year." The manual "explicitly forbids military prosecutors from using evidence obtained through torture. At the same time, it makes a distinction between torture and coercion, allowing testimony that came as the result of coercive techniques used by military and intelligence officials until late 2005, when Congress passed a law banning cruel and inhumane treatment of prisoners." USA Today (1/19, Biskupic, 2.27M) says the manual's release "triggered a fresh round of questions and criticism Thursday about the administration's handling of detainees."

NYTimes Suggests Stimson Should Be Disciplined By Bar Association. Under the headline "Apology Not Accepted," the New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is hard to render a convincing apology when you are not really apologizing. Consider Charles Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of state for detainee affairs, who has been trying to spin his way out of his loathsome attempt to punish lawyers who represent inmates of the Guantánamo Bay internment camp. ... On Wednesday, Mr. Stimson said he apologized and regretted that his comments 'left the impression' that he was attacking the integrity of those lawyers. It was not just an impression. It was exactly what he did. ... Stimson's appalling behavior should not be overlooked by the relevant bar disciplinary committee."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOJ Official Says Bush Could Order Killing Of Terror Suspects In US. Newsweek (2/13, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "In the latest twist in the debate over presidential powers, a Justice Department official suggested that in certain circumstances, the president might have the power to order the killing of terrorist suspects inside the United States." During Office of Legal Counsel acting director Steven Bradbury's Senate intelligence committee testimony about the NSA surveillance program last week, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein asked Bradbury questions about the extent of presidential powers to fight Al Qaeda; could Bush, for instance, order the killing of a Qaeda suspect known to be on U.S. soil? Bradbury replied that he believed Bush could indeed do this, at least in certain circumstances." Newsday notes, "At a public intel-committee hearing, Feinstein was told by intel czar John Negroponte and FBI chief Robert Mueller that they were unaware of any case in which a U.S. agency was authorized to kill a Qaeda-linked person on U.S. soil. Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, told NEWSWEEK: 'Mr. Bradbury's meeting was an informal, off-the-record briefing about the legal analysis behind the president's terrorist-surveillance program. He was not presenting the legal views of the Justice Department on hypothetical scenarios outside of the terrorist-surveillance program.'"

DOJ_NMG_0118530

Chertoff Urges Editors To Use Caution In Reporting On Threats, Emergencies. The AP (1/18, Lumpkin) reported, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told newspaper editors Thursday they should use caution and context in reporting about threats or emergencies. 'We owe you information that's accurate,' he said, 'and you need to resist the temptation to just get something fast.'" Chertoff "invited the media to continue to participate in a series of dialogues and exercises his department has been conducting on how best to communicate information during a crisis." He said that threats "of limited credibility" must "be run down and investigated," but "shouldn't become public during that stage." Meanwhile, "he said, when information is shared with state and local officials, department officials are aware that 'very likely this information is going to get out.' Then the issue is one of context, and he urged editors to use good judgment." Still "more is at stake, he warned, in reporting on actual emergencies, because people immediately want to know what they should do to protect themselves. In this regard, Chertoff warned the editors against over-reliance on dubious experts."

Recounting a recent bomb scare on a Carnival cruise ship heading into San Juan, Puerto Rice, USA Today (1/19, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Five years after 9/11 and the 2001 anthrax attacks caused a spike in false threats, senior federal officials say they still are forced to run down hoaxes nearly every day, creating a huge drain on agents' ability to pursue real threats to the nation's security. … On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because 'people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety.'" USA Today devotes a significant amount of space to the listing hoaxes that have been in the news. "Charlie Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer, says hoaxes and bogus tips come in 'almost on a daily basis.'" USA notes, "At police stations and FBI offices across the country hoaxes are 'a serious drain,' says Ken Wainstein, head of the Justice Department's National Security Division. 'These terror hoaxes distract law enforcement.' … They also scare people. … On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because 'people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety.' … The department posts Internet hoaxes on its website to reassure citizens and encourage them not to pass on bogus e-mailed chain letters. Among those that have been circulating for several years, the website says, is a fake government warning that someone bought $32,000 worth of United Parcel Service (UPS) uniforms off eBay. The fraudulent message urges people to be wary if a UPS employee comes to their door."

GAO Urges TSA To Assess Terror Risks For Rail System. The AP (1/18, De La Cruz) reported GAO officials told members of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee Thursday that the Transportation Security Administration has "yet to assess the risks of a terror attack on the nation's passenger rail system," and that until it does, "the agency may not know which rail systems are more at risk than others. 'Given competing priorities and limited homeland security resources, difficult policy decisions have to be made by Congress and the executive branch to prioritize security efforts and direct resources to areas of greatest risk,'" said Cathleen Berrick, the GAO's director of homeland security and justice issues. "TSA Director Edmund S. 'Kip' Hawley said the agency is working with a host of other federal agencies and entities to make sure passenger rail systems are safe." However, "Several committee members were critical of TSA's efforts. 'I'm frustrated with the Bush administration's foot-dragging on measures to secure the nation's rail systems,' said Sen. Frank Lautenberg."

FBI Wants To Question California Man About Subway Mercury Spill. The AP (1/19) reports from Los Angeles, "A man seen on videotape spilling a small amount of mercury onto the platform of a subway station was wanted for questioning by police, the FBI and other members of a multi-agency terrorism task force. There was no evidence to suggest the actions were terrorist or criminal acts, but authorities wanted to ask the unidentified man why he was carrying mercury and what was his motivation for apparently spilling the toxic substance, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller." After spilling the liquid, "the man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill, the FBI said."

DOJ_NMG_0118531

MTA Admits Flawed Response To Incident. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Blankstein, Guccione, 850K) reports that in December, "officials quickly labeled it a harmless accident. But Thursday, officials acknowledged that the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority botched its response, waiting eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill. Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts. The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials such as mercury." The Times notes, "Several terrorism experts said Thursday that the MTA's handling of the incident was troubling."

Many Families Of 9/11 Victims Face Estrangement. The New York Times (1/19, Vitello, 1.16M) runs a feature on family separations among the children of 9/11 victims, writing that "one 9/11 family advocate said he had encountered more than 100 conflicts in which aging parents of a World Trade Center victim, desperate to remain connected to the children of their lost offspring, had found themselves in bitter struggles with a surviving spouse who would rather they did not. A mediator who helped negotiate settlements among 9/11 families in the early years after the attacks said 1 in 10 of his cases involved estranged grandparents."

NYTimes Says Administration Must Extend Temporary Housing For Katrina Victims. Under the headline "Nowhere To Turn For Shelter," the New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "In the long and sordid story of Hurricane Katrina, a new low may be approaching. In Louisiana alone, tens of thousands of displaced families who rely on the government to provide trailers or rent will lose their temporary housing next month — unless the Bush administration extends the standard 18-month time limit for their federal aid." The Times says "the temporary help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot end until the victims have somewhere else to go. And the federal and local governments have moved far too slowly in providing the necessary reconstruction money and building guidance." The Times states, "The response to the drowning of New Orleans has been a failure on every level." The Bush administration "must extend the temporary housing provisions immediately, then make every effort to shift aid recipients to the longer-term Section 8 voucher program." Meanwhile, the new Democratic leaders in Congress "need to quickly outline their own plans for salvaging New Orleans, so evacuees can once again call their city home."

WAR NEWS:

Pelosi Says House Democrats Will Back Anti-Surge Resolution. The AP (1/18, Espo) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Democrats in her chamber will back "legislation declaring that President Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is 'not in the national interest of the United States.' Pelosi's commitment came as Senate Democrats said they intend to begin advancing a nonbinding measure next week that criticizes the White House's new strategy." The Washington Times (1/19, Hurt, 88K) reports Pelosi "has made clear her disdain for the 'surge' proposal since before Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation last week, but yesterday's remarks were her first indication of the language that she will want the House to approve." In a preview of a "Good Morning America" interview with Pelosi, ABC World News (1/18, story 4, 1:05, Sawyer, 8.78M) showed Pelosi saying, "Democrats will never cut off funding for our troops when they are in harm's way. I think it is very difficult for the President to sustain a war of this magnitude without the support of the American people, and without the support of the Congress of the United States. That's why Congress will vote to oppose the President's escalation."

Clinton Joins Critics Of Surge. Sen. Hillary Clinton said on PBS' NewsHour (1/18, Ifill), "I think that certainly our strategy has not succeeded, and I don't think there's any doubt about that anywhere, including in the White House. The question is, what do we do now going forward? And the President's proposal to add 21,500 troops in an escalation of the combat situation is not going to work, in the absence of a comprehensive approach that tries to put some pressure on the Maliki government. ... For more than a year and a half, I've been in favor of phased redeployment of our troops, bringing them home as quickly as possible, but based on a comprehensive strategy that looked at the diplomatic, political, and economic challenges and exert some leverage on the Iraqis." Clinton made similar comments on the surge on Fox News' On The Record (1/18, Van Susteren), saying, "I opposed it, based on what I knew about the situation before I went, and I'm even more strongly against it now because I think the chances for success are limited at best. ... Here is what I think we have to do now. I want to cap the number of troops that we have at the number that was in country January . I want to start a phased redeployment of our troops. ... I think it's also important though to try to get the Maliki government to deal with some of the political and economic challenges on the ground which we have all been asking for."

DOJ_NMG_0118532

Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Rush To Join Surge Critics. ABC World News (1/18, story 3, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The war in Iraq is dominating the political debate in this country. But it really gets political when discussed by two Democratic presidential candidates, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama." ABC (Tapper) added, "Last week, anti-war liberals...were angry with" Clinton and Obama "for not saying they would actually try to do anything to stop the President's proposed surge in Iraq. Well, this week, Charlie, all that changed and the one-upsmanship began." John Edwards "threw down the gauntlet, attacking fellow Democrats for their timidity," and when Obama "announced his presidential exploratory committee, he made sure to remind voters that he never would have voted for the Iraq war to begin with. ... Wednesday, Sen. Clinton suddenly declared she would try to stop the President, introducing forceful legislation to cap troop levels, and require that benchmarks be met by both the Iraqi government and the Bush Administration."

More Congressional Criticism Of Bush Plan. Sen. Olympia Snowe said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), "Why should we be taking more risks with our troops when" the Iraqis are "not willing to take risks to make the political decisions and their own military decisions by confronting the militias and disarming them?"

Sen. Joseph Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/19, Blitzer), "We should be letting Maliki know that he's not going to get our help, if he doesn't straighten out and have a political solution here. And that is why the Iraqi Study Group, why Joe Biden, why Les Gelb, why everyone across the board, including the President's own generals, have said: Mr. President, we should be telling them we're going to be ramping down, not ramping up, because he cannot count on us to, in fact, be the fodder for his civil war. He has to make some political compromises." On MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), Biden said, "What made me realize how fractured this was is when we had Condoleezza Rice before my committee. It was stunning that 20 of the 21 senators, meaning 10 of whom were Republicans, absolutely made it clear they were not at all supportive of the President's new policy."

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), Sen. Jon Kyl was asked if it is "true" that "you stand firmly behind the President." Kyl replied, "Yes, I do. I think everybody said that the President needed to announce a new strategy. He's done that. It seems to me we ought to give it a chance to work. ... None of the President's critics have proposed an alternative that would work. They have a lot of different ideas about how to leave, to leave in six months, to start now and phase it in, to leave within a year. A lot of different plans to leave. No other plan to win."

Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews), "What's more important is what the commanders think. And most of the commanders have said that they don't believe the escalation of troops door to door, urban combat like this, 25,000 troops in a city of six million people, is actually going to do the job."

Rep. Charles Rangel said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), "I think the American people are so far ahead of us and by the time we get finished with the hearings, the testimony, people under oath, really trying to find out what does a surge mean...Republicans in the Senate, as well as in the House, are telling the President we've had enough of the war."

Rep. Chris Carney said on Fox News' Your World (1/18, Cavuto), "I don't favor a surge. I don't think we can trust Mr. Maliki to deliver the goods."

Antiwar Movement May Be Reaching "Critical Moment." The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "Nearly four years into US combat in Iraq, the antiwar movement has yet to generate the kind of mass protest seen during the Vietnam War. There's no shutting down universities or blocking traffic at military bases -- no tense face-offs with police. But with the new Congress, the Bush administration's surge strategy (which critics deem an 'escalation' of the conflict), and increasingly negative public opinion polls on the war, this may be a critical moment for the antiwar movement." The Monitor says "one key reason that opposition to the war has been less overt, organizers recognize, is the lack of a military draft. Also, the scale of the war is different. There were four times as many troops involved and 10 times as many American casualties over a comparable period in Vietnam." And "only a handful of Americans are directly affected by the war or asked to sacrifice for it."

Rangel Outlines Rationale For Resumption Of Draft. During an appearance on CNN's The Situation Room (1/18, Blitzer), Rep. Charles Rangel detailed his call for a reinstatement of the draft, saying, "I make the case that you cannot be for the war and expect that you've got to take 21,000 troops, people who have already served three or four times in Iraq, and just rotate them, sending them back, putting them in harm's way and now believe that other people's kids from more affluent communities should not make a sacrifice, too. It seems to me that we should not have a concept that we fight these wars, support the wars, with other people's kids. So if, indeed, it's believed by the people of the United States that our national security is threatened, there's no way in the world that we shouldn't say everybody should be involved in the sacrifice."

Questions Surround Petraeus Counterinsurgency Strategy. The New York Times (1/19, Gordon, 1.16M) reports that when Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus "assumes his duties as the new American commander in Iraq, he will be guided by a new military doctrine on counterinsurgency that makes the security of the population a chief objective. But a pressing question that is likely to emerge when the Senate takes up his confirmation next week is whether the administration's new Iraq strategy will draw on enough forces to ensure security -- as measured against the general's own guidelines." The five new combat brigades to be sent to Baghdad "would roughly double the size of the American force involved in the security operation there, about 15,000 troops. But as a whole, that would still represent only a small portion of the 120,000-strong force that would be required to secure the entire capital according to the force ratios outlined in the military's new field manual for counterinsurgency."

DOJ_NMG_0118533

The CBS Evening News (1/18, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) led by reporting that President Bush "is running out of places to look for support for his new war strategy. ... Most of the public is against it, most of the Congress, and today, some retired generals went on the attack. And this won't help: A new Defense Department audit estimates as much as 15% of the nearly $22 billion already spent on reconstruction may have been wasted because of poor security in Iraq."

"Red Team" Of Skeptics Dispatched To Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Barnes, 850K) writes that "while the Bush administration is reworking its overall strategy in Iraq, military leaders in Baghdad are searching for new ways to improve the decisions and choices they make closer to the ground." The military "has sent to Iraq a five-person team of dedicated skeptics, known in military jargon as a 'red team.' In a war known for its missteps and unanticipated results, the team will be assigned to review, and question, military operations. It will attempt to predict how enemies will react to various missions and what the unintended consequences might be."

Egypt, Saudis Give "Cautious Backing" To Bush Plan. The Financial Times (1/19, England) reports Egypt and Saudi Arabia, "two of the US's most important Sunni allies," gave "cautious backing" to President Bush's Iraq strategy, "while a third, Jordan, reiterated the need for Iraq's Sunni to be given a greater role in their country's political processes. But the 'support' also came with a clear message" to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "in the hope that Washington may finally be ready to listen to its Arab allies -- a military solution alone is not enough."

Krauthammer Expects Maliki Government To Undermine Strategy. In his Washington Post (1/19, A19, 690K) column, Charles Krauthammer writes, "If it were my choice, I would not 'surge' American troops in defense" of the current Iraqi government. Petraeus "thinks otherwise. ... He believes that with an augmentation of U.S. troops, a change of tactics and the support of three additional Iraqi brigades, he can pacify Baghdad. ... I am confident that Petraeus knows what he's doing and that U.S. troops will acquit themselves admirably. I'm afraid the effort will fail, however, because the Maliki government will undermine it."

NYTimes Criticizes Means Of Informing Troops Of Extended Tours. The New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is bad enough for troops in Iraq to learn that their tours of duty have been extended. It is terrible for them to have to hear about it from loved ones at home rather than from their military commanders. This is what happened to about 150 New Jersey National Guard troops who had been scheduled to return home in March after having served in Iraq for a year. ... A day after Mr. Bush announced the troop increase in a televised speech, the National Guard in New Jersey told family members that their relatives would have to stay on. The news quickly made it back to the troops in Iraq through anguished phone calls and e-mail. Not until Sunday -- four days after Mr. Bush's speech -- were the troops notified by their Army commanders."

Casey Likely To Face Difficult Confirmation Hearing. The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that "rumblings on the Senate side are that Gen. George Casey's confirmation as Army chief of staff is going to be a tough sell, especially with the Democrats in charge" and "even some Armed Services Committee Republicans are uneasy." Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) told the Post's Tom Ricks, "The chief of staff of the Army is the guy everybody looks up to. We were under Casey's leadership [in Iraq] for the last three years, and it hasn't gone well." Chambliss "said that he hasn't made up his mind whether to support the nomination." Meanwhile, Kamen says "there's even talk that the administration is concerned Casey is unconfirmable with the Senate in the mood it's in. So the White House may try to move Casey's nomination and that of Adm. William J. Fallon to head Centcom as a package along with the nomination of highly regarded Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead US forces in Iraq."

Mahdi Army Says It Is Under Siege In Sadr City. The AP (1/18, Hurst) reports insurgents in Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army fighters said they were "under siege in their Sadr City stronghold as U.S. and Iraqi troops killed or seized key commanders in pinpoint nighttime raids. Two commanders of the Shiite militia said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has stopped protecting the group under pressure from Washington and threats from Sunni Muslim Arab governments." ABC World News (1/18, story 2, 2:05, Harris, 8.78M) reported Sadr "is a fellow Shiite who helped Maliki take power. But in an interview to be published in the Italian newspaper 'La Repubblica,' Sadr confirms 400 of his men have been arrested."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/19, A15, Pincus, Tyson, 690K) says US intelligence leaders told Congress that Sadr "will probably lower the profile of his powerful militia in Baghdad and watch to see whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy of placing more troops in the city is aimed at uncontrolled violence or specifically at him and his organization."

DOJ_NMG_0118534

Debates Over Iraqi Budget Further Doubts About Maliki Government. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Daragahi, Roug, 850K) writes, "It's budget time in Iraq, and the lively debates that have erupted would strike a familiar chord for observers of such talks in any American statehouse or European parliament. But war-ravaged Iraq is no ordinary country, and the murkiness surrounding many items in the proposed 2007 budget has contributed to the general distrust between sectarian factions as well as widespread doubts about the ability" of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government "to manage the nation." Nearly $2 billion of the $41 billion budget "is allocated to agencies beyond the oversight of the central government at a time when potential international donors have balked at tossing more money into what has been viewed as a black hole."

Iraq Reviewing Diplomatic Protocols With Iran. The New York Times (1/19, A8, Glanz, 1.16M) reports Iraq is carrying out "an extensive review of its diplomatic protocols with Iran and may place new restrictions on them, the Iraqi foreign minister said in an interview on Thursday." Recent raids by American forces have "deeply embarrassed Iraqi officials, who say that the United States did not consult with them before it detained the Iranians, who were properly accredited visitors to this country." At the same time, Iraqi officials "have been put in an awkward position by their neighbor, as the Iraqis concede that at least some of the Iranians appear to have been working with Shiite militias, just as the Americans claimed." As a result, Iraq "has decided to tighten diplomatic controls on Iranian officials, insisting on detailed itineraries for their missions here, closer coordination with Baghdad and pledges that the officials will not work with armed groups outside the government," Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said.

Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For US Civilian's Death In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/18, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A terror group linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility today for the ambush that killed an American civilian and three other people in Baghdad. Andrea Parhamovich was from the Cleveland area and she worked for the National Democratic Institute. She was advising Iraqi political parties on the tools they need to establish a democracy. She was 28 years old." The AP (1/18, Youssef) that the "a graduate of Marietta College...had been working with NDI in Iraq since late 2006 as a communications specialist advising Iraqi political parties on how to reach out to voters and constituents. She was helping 'build the kind of national level political institutions that can help bridge the sectarian divide and improve Iraqi lives,' NDI said." The Washington Post (1/19, A15, Partlow, 690K) says Parhamovich "is at least the fifth American civilian woman killed in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion." The New York Times (1/19, Maag, 1.16M) and the Los Angeles Times (1/19, Roug, 850K) are among the newspapers running sympathetic profiles of Parhamovich.

Corporal Is First To Plead Guilty To Murder In Hamdania Case. The New York Times/AP (1/19) reports Marine Cpl. Trent Thomas pleaded guilty "to kidnapping and murdering an unarmed Iraqi civilian" in Hamdania in April 2006, year, saying "he and other servicemen went after him because they were 'sick and tired of getting bombed.'" Thomas "is the first of seven marines and a Navy medic accused in the case to plead guilty to murder. Four others have pleaded guilty to reduced charges in exchange for their testimony."

Biden Says More Troops Needed In Afghanistan. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/18, Matthews) if he wants more US troops in Afghanistan, Sen. Joseph Biden said, "Yes. When the President announced his surge, I made the case that he should be surging in Afghanistan, not in Iraq. ... Imagine if we fail in Afghanistan. What that will mean is Musharraf will cut even a closer deal with al Qaeda and with the Taliban, and if he doesn't, he puts himself in the position of being overthrown more than he is now. That is a radicalized country. It has nuclear weapons and it will be a disaster. If there was a totally just war since World War II, it is the war in Afghanistan, and we are not dealing with it properly."

DOJ:

Gonzales Defends Prosecutors' Dismissals. The Washington Post (1/19, A2, Eggen) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged yesterday that some U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign their posts in recent weeks because of performance issues, but he denied any political motives and vowed to quickly submit new nominees for the jobs to the Senate for confirmation. … 'What we're trying to do is ensure that for the people in each of these respective districts, we have the very best possible representative for the Department of Justice,' Gonzales testified, adding later: 'I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it.'" The Post continues, "Gonzales's remarks in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and other lawmakers about the forced removals of at least six U.S. attorneys, including several who have overseen some of the government's highest-profile corruption prosecutions." The Post adds, "Officials say the removals include those of Carol C. Lam in San Diego, who led the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.), and Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco, who has handled the probe into a lab at the center of a sports doping scandal involving baseball player Barry Bonds and other athletes. … Another recent change that has attracted widespread criticism from Democrats came in Arkansas, where U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock was replaced on an interim basis by J. Timothy Griffin, a former research director for the Republican National Committee. … Feinstein said she knows of at least six cases in which prosecutors have been asked to leave. She said she is concerned about the way the firings have been handled and about whether the Justice Department is attempting to evade Senate oversight of U.S. attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0118535

The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19, Tetreault) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday declined to say how many U.S. attorneys are being removed from their jobs and defended the practice to senators as 'good management' to replace them with 'the best possible people.'" The Review-Journal continues, "Gonzales said 11 U.S. attorney vacancies have been created since the law was passed but he declined to say how many were forced resignations. … The nation's chief law enforcement officer acknowledged that some of the chief prosecutors were asked to leave. … 'But that happens during every administration during different periods for different reasons,' Gonzales said. 'That fact that that happens quite frankly some people should view that as a sign of good management. What we do is make an evaluation about the performance of individuals, and I have a responsibility that we have the best possible people in that position. … '" The Review-Journal adds, "Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday that Bogden got a bad deal that will force him to end a 16- year career as a federal prosecutor. … By replacing veteran prosecutors, the Bush administration is seeking to build 'a farm team for Gonzales,' Reid said. 'He can farm out to somebody who drove him to work one afternoon."

Nevada US Attorney Stepping Down. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19, Puit, Batt) reports, "Three days after Nevada's two senators said the Department of Justice had forced out Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada, Bogden broke his silence on the matter, confirming that he will be leaving his post next month." The Review-Journal continues, "Bogden's announcement late Wednesday came one day after Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, belatedly responded to questions about the matter by saying that Bogden was still the U.S. attorney in Nevada. … Collins also claimed that media reports regarding Bogden's ouster were 'erroneous.'" The Review-Journal adds, "In the issued statement, Bogden, who was appointed to the job by the Bush administration in 2001, said his resignation is effective Feb. 28. … Neither Bogden nor Collins has addressed whether Bogden was forced out of office as the senators contend, and if so, why. … He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced to resign in the last couple of months."

The AP (1/19, Ritter) reports, "Bogden, 50, made public his resignation with a statement issued late Wednesday 'after consultations with officials at Department of Justice,' he said. He declined to identify those officials." The AP continues, "He said he planned to spend the next six weeks ensuring a smooth transition for his successor, and said he had no idea whom it would be. … Bogden's four-page statement cited successful prosecutions and included quotes of praise for his work from local, state and federal law enforcement officials and a federal judge in Las Vegas. … His resignation was his first public response to reports Sunday and Monday from aides to Nevada Sens. John Ensign and Harry Reid that he would be replaced. Justice Department officials have not responded to requests for comment."

Krugman Says Move Was "Preemptive Strike." In his New York Times column (1/19), Paul Krugman says, "There's something happening here, and what it is seems completely clear: the Bush administration is trying to protect itself by purging independent-minded prosecutors." Since the "middle of last month, the Bush administration has pushed out at least four U.S. attorneys, and possibly as many as seven, without explanation." Such a "wholesale firing of prosecutors midway through an administration isn't normal." Krugman says it appears "the administration is really worried about where corruption investigations might lead." The "purge of U.S. attorneys looks like a pre-emptive strike against the gathering forces of justice."

More Commentary. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/19) editorializes, "Whether the White House is disappointed with the cases these attorneys chose to prosecute, or with those they chose not to prosecute, or with their level of success, time may tell. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did tell The Associated Press on Tuesday that the removals were not politically motivated, whatever that means. .. Although the appointments of U.S. attorneys are subject to Senate confirmation, they exercise executive authority which the Constitution vests solely in the president. Therefore, they serve at the president's pleasure -- he can fire them at will. … 'The president just no longer found it pleasurable,' as one local former prosecutor said Thursday, with a smile." The Review-Journal continues, "Now, anyone is free to criticize the president's actions and to question whether the replacements -- whoever they may be -- are better qualified than those now packing their bags. … But Democrats in Washington, led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein of the Judiciary Committee, have tried to characterize this minor housecleaning as some kind of dirty deed. … Not only that, the very same Democrats who are now up in arms sat by quietly in 1993 as Bill Clinton fired U.S. attorneys 'sweepingly and without cause,' possibly because Mr. Clinton was firing prosecutors who had been appointed by Republican Presidents Reagan and Bush. … Whereas, given that U.S. attorneys serve four-year appointments, while George W. Bush has now been president for six, President Bush is now firing U.S. attorneys who he himself appointed or re-appointed. … Now such interim appointments pending confirmation -- should the president find it necessary to take that route -- are perfectly legal, thanks to a provision of the Patriot Act reauthorization bill, approved last year by the, um ... the U.S. Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0118536

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer To Be Released From Home Confinement. The AP (1/19, Porretto) reports, "Ben Glisan Jr., the first former Enron executive to go directly to jail after pleading guilty to conspiracy in 2003, is expected to finish a stint of home confinement after three years in prison, his attorney and the federal Bureau of Prisons said Thursday." The AP continues, "Glisan, the former Enron treasurer, pleaded guilty on Sept. 10, 2003, in the corporate scandal that brought down the energy company and rocked Wall Street. He received a five-year sentence." The AP adds, "Glisan, 37 at the time of his plea, spent time in two federal prisons in Texas — one near Bastrop, the other in Beaumont — before being confined to his Houston home since September, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Felicia Ponce said. That confinement is scheduled to end Sunday, Ponce said. … Glisan's attorney, Tom Allen, said his client will be on probation once he's free to leave home, but he didn't elaborate. … During court proceedings, Glisan admitted helping design financial deals that enriched him and illegally kept investment losses off Enron's books. … He agreed to forfeit nearly $1 million in profits from an off-the-books deal at Enron and agreed to not seek a refund of $412,000 in income taxes he paid on that profit."

Breedon Moves From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss. The New York Times (1/19, Browning) reports, "As the court-appointed guardian and self-described fixer of some of America's most wayward companies, Richard C. Breeden, the former top securities regulator, is considered a pillar of corporate ethics and governance. … Now he trying to become another paragon — that of savvy investor in troubled companies. And in the coming months he will face his first major test: taking on the Applebee's International restaurant chain in a proxy fight." The Times continues, "Mr. Breeden's fledgling advocacy hedge fund, Breeden Partners, which owns a 5.2 percent stake in Applebee's, began its battle last month, when Mr. Breeden nominated four close friends to its board. …. Hedge funds, the lucrative private investment pools for institutions like endowments and pensions, and for the wealthy, are nearly always managed by former Wall Street traders or money managers. .. Mr. Breeden — a Harvard-trained securities lawyer — has no investing experience. But he is seeking to bring his knowledge of securities laws and corporate governance into investing in underperforming companies. … But what Mr. Breeden may lack in investing experience, he makes up for in other ways, according to his friends, who cite his hard-driving nature, his intellect, his attention to detail and his decisiveness, if marred at times by a divalike attitude."

US Charges Two Former CVS Executives With Rhode Island Corruption. The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/19, C2) reports from Providence, RI, "Two former executives at drugstore chain CVS Corp. were charged in a probe into influence peddling at the Rhode Island statehouse." The AP continues, "John R. 'Jack' Kramer, former senior vice president for corporate affairs and government relations, and Carlos Ortiz, former vice president of government affairs, were charged with one count each of conspiracy and bribery and 21 counts each of fraud for allegedly paying former state Sen. John Celona to kill legislation CVS opposed or sponsor bills the company supported." The AP adds, "Mr. Celona, who resigned from the General Assembly in 2004, pleaded guilty to federal mail-fraud charges the following year and has been cooperating with the government. … Messrs. Kramer and Ortiz have been on leaves of absence from Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS since 2004. … U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said the probe into statehouse corruption was continuing. CVS, which hasn't been charged, said it has fully cooperated with the probe."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Promises To Examine Milwaukee Crime Trends. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/19, Hoffer) reports, "Sen. Herb Kohl elicited a promise Thursday from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to look at the rise in violent crime in Milwaukee and tell him whether federal funding could be provided to bolster the police." The Sentinel continues, "Gonzales testified at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that covered issues from domestic surveillance to Internet pornography, all of which are under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Justice Department. … Kohl, a senior committee member, first raised the trend of increases in robberies and assaults in Milwaukee at a Judiciary Committee hearing last month. He asked FBI Director Robert Mueller, who was testifying at the time, to go to Milwaukee to study the problem first-hand and to give the city more federal resources in the form of additional federal agents. Mueller said he would "take a specific look at Milwaukee" but did not commit to travel there." The Sentinel adds, "At the December hearing, Kohl also criticized the bureau for taking money earmarked for violent crime prevention and reallocating it to investigate terrorism. … In Thursday's hearing, Kohl repeated the charge, saying the FBI used almost 2,200 'fewer agents in 2004 on traditional crime matters than it did in 2000 due to the essential focus on terrorism.' … In addition, he said, the Milwaukee Police Department received $1 million in federal money specifically for police in 2002 but last year didn't receive any. As a result, the police force was reduced by 55 officers and fewer police are on the streets. … Gonzales acknowledged that 'keeping our communities and citizens safe from violent crime is a top priority for law enforcement at all levels,' but most of the work is done by local police."

DOJ_NMG_0118537

Attorneys Spar Over Jury Picks At Libby Trial. The AP (1/19, Apuzzo) reports, "The prosecutor sparred with defense attorneys Thursday over several potential jurors and their opinions of the Bush administration, a debate that further slowed jury selection in the trial of a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton had hoped to have a jury seated by Thursday afternoon, but legal wrangling slowed the process. Attorneys for former I. Lewis Libby have weeded out of the jury pool the most outspoken critics of the Bush administration." The AP adds, "Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told Walton that defense attorneys had crossed the line when they told jurors the case was political and about war policies. … 'The jury will not be asked to render a verdict on the war or what they think of the war,' Fitzgerald said." The AP notes, "Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame in 2003. Because Plame's husband was among the administration's most outspoken critics, the trial is set to the backdrop of the war in Iraq and politics."

The New York Times (1/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "task of seating a jury for the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. did not get easier Thursday when a majority of the candidates interviewed were disqualified, mainly because they expressed deep distrust of the Bush administration and the Iraq war." The "attitudes of many potential jurors to Mr. Cheney and the Iraq war have upset the judge's schedule for the trial, which envisioned opening arguments Monday."

Columnist Urges Bush To Pardon Libby. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (1/19), Dan K. Thomasson writes, "If George W. Bush really wants to strike a blow for justice he should pardon I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby now before his prosecution costs the taxpayers one dime more. It is really time to put an end to one of the most bizarre and disruptive politically inspired cases in recent memory." Thomasson continues, "Libby, as most Americans know, is the scapegoat for a non- crime that involved the public identification of a one-time undercover operative of the CIA, Valerie Plame, the wife of a small time diplomat, Joseph Wilson, who tweaked the White House over its claims that Saddam Hussein was seeking nuclear material in Africa. Plame, the White House claims, had a hand in the agency's assigning her husband to investigate the claims, which were among those contentions used to justify the invasion of Iraq. Wilson found the claims unsubstantiated." Thomasson adds, "Now we are at the beginning of a senseless, albeit sensational trial brought about by Fitzgerald's decision to find someone in the White House to bring to ground despite his own discovery that no crime had been committed. He settled on Libby, an aide to Vice President Richard Cheney, whom he charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury and obstructing justice in the pursuit of answers he (Fitzgerald) already had. Libby said he first heard about Plame from a television personality, Tim Russert, but Russert denies the claim even as he concedes he talked to Libby. … There is some indication that (Fitzgerald) really wanted to nail the president's chief political advisor, Carl Rove, but settled finally on Libby, who is not known as an ideologue or even wildly political. His wife, who also is a lawyer, is in fact on the other side of most political issues, according to reports. … Severe damage, however, has been done to the First Amendment by an over zealous prosecutor who, among other things, insisted on jailing a reporter for not revealing her source for a story she never wrote, undercutting a policy and tradition that has been a bulwark of press freedom since the beginning of the nation. The result is a chilling impact on the role of the Fourth Estate as the watchdog of democracy. … So, Mr. President, it is time you exercised your own constitutional prerogatives and ended this nonsense immediately. Even if an impartial jury could be selected, which is highly doubtful in this venue, the trial is an injustice."

Cunningham Case Figure Is Focus Of Lewis Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A8, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports entrepreneur is Brent Wilkes, "a key figure in the case against former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham," is now the focus of the federal investigation of Rep. Jerry Lewis. Wilkes's firm "received defense and intelligence contracts with congressional help from Mr. Cunningham. The former lawmaker pleaded guilty in November to charges that included soliciting bribes from Mr. Wilkes and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison. Prosecutors in Los Angeles are examining whether Mr. Lewis may have improperly helped Mr. Wilkes's companies obtain government contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0118538

Judge Grants Defense Motion For Delay In Connolly Murder Trial. The Boston Globe (1/19, 413K) reported in its "New England in Brief" section, "A Miami judge agreed yesterday to a defense request to delay the murder trial of retired FBI special agent John J. Connolly Jr. until Oct. 22 to give lawyers more time to prepare. Connolly was indicted in May 2005 on state murder charges in allegedly helping longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi orchestrate a 1982 gangland slaying in Florida. The victim, John B. Callahan, a Winchester financier, was killed allegedly because the gangsters feared he would tell the FBI they were involved in the slaying of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler, who owned World Jai Alai."

Judge Gets Input Before Ney Sentencing. Gannett News Service (1/19, Rulon) reports, "The federal judge who will sentence disgraced former Rep. Bob Ney to prison Friday has received a barrage of opinions about how much prison time he should get, according to documents filed Thursday." Gannett continues, "Most of the 75 letters sent to the judge came from supporters, including a handwritten note from Ney's parents, and letters from childhood friends, his doctor, local officials, including Dover Mayor Richard P. Homrighausen, and several former staff members and campaign workers. … Ney, of Heath, pleaded guilty in October to two felony charges of conspiracy to commit fraud and making false statements. The charges stem from a series of free trips, meals and gifts Ney accepted from convicted former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others in exchange for official favors." Gannett adds, "His actions carry a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, but Justice Department prosecutors have agreed as part of Ney's plea deal to ask for a little over two years in prison and between $5,000 and $60,000 in fines. … Nine letters came from people who want U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle to sentence Ney to the maximum amount of time possible. … The former six-term congressman has been undergoing treatment for alcohol abuse since September, and in court papers, his lawyers have asked Huvelle to allow him to continue his treatment while incarcerated. … Several letters also included requests that Ney continue his treatment. … 'Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m.,' wrote Matt Parker, Ney's former campaign manager."

Idaho Triple Murderer Charged In Unsolved Slaying. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Reston, 850K) reports, "A drifter who brutally murdered at least three members of an Idaho family in 2005 and kidnapped two of their young children was charged Thursday with the decade-old slaying of a 10-year-old Beaumont boy abducted at knifepoint near his backyard. … Joseph Edward Duncan III, 43, was named as a suspect in" the death of Anthony Martinez "in 2005 after he reportedly told FBI agents he was involved in the slaying. Investigators also said Duncan's fingerprint was discovered near Anthony's body, which was found nude and bound with duct tape on a remote canyon road north of Indio." The Times notes that Riverside County (ID) District Attorney Rod Pacheco "vowed to seek the death penalty."

Program For Addicted Prisoners Under Fire For Alleged Scientology Links. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Etter) reports from Albuquerque, NM, "Last November, in a cedar sauna cranked up to 160 degrees, a crowd of sweaty men read books and chatted amid mariachi music. They emerged to nibble from a tray of raw vegetables or take shots of olive oil. … This is not a spa. This is Second Chance, one of the country's most unusual alternatives to the nation's prison systems. Founded by a Scientologist and former real-estate developer -- and funded partly by federal tax dollars -- Second Chance is a treatment program for nonviolent prisoners with substance-abuse problems." The Journal continues, "It is based on principles of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of the Scientology religion, who argued that toxins from drugs and pesticides accumulate in the body's fatty tissues, making it difficult for addicts to kick their habit. Saunas and vitamins are intended to purge these residues. Facing few options for successful long-term ways to treat criminal defendants with serious drug problems, 24 of New Mexico's 84 district judges have sentenced more than 50 prisoners to terms at Second Chance. … Even before it opened its doors to inmates last September, Second Chance and its unconventional methods had ignited a controversy in New Mexico's legal community. At the center of the debate are two former friends and sometime adversaries. William Lang, chief district judge in the area that includes Albuquerque, doesn't want his colleagues to sentence inmates to Second Chance. On the other side is Judge Lang's predecessor, W. John Brennan, who was hired by Second Chance to convince judges to do just that. … But Judge Lang says he is 'highly suspicious' of the program. 'If it is connected to Scientology, just say so,' he says. Second Chance officials and a spokeswoman for the Church of Scientology say there are no ties."

Missouri Man Pleads Not Guilty To Kidnapping. The Washington Post (1/19, A03, Lydersen) reports, "Michael J. Devlin, the suburban St. Louis man accused of abducting two boys and holding one for four years, pleaded not guilty yesterday in Franklin County, Mo., court to one count of kidnapping in last week's abduction of William 'Ben' Ownby, 13. … Devlin was also charged with felony kidnapping and felony armed criminal action in nearby Washington County, Mo., on Wednesday in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, 15. Prosecutor John D. Rupp Jr. has alleged that Devlin, 41, initially brandished a handgun to control Shawn, then 11 years old." The Post continues, "Shawn told Oprah Winfrey during an interview aired yesterday that he did not try to flee from Devlin because he was 'terrified,' even though he would regularly ride his bike alone and had access to a cellphone and a computer. He confirmed that he posted a message signed 'Shawn Devlin' on the Web site that his parents, Pam and Craig Akers, set up to search for him and other missing children. The post, which asked how long the Akerses planned to look for their son, was an effort to send a signal, he told Winfrey." The Post notes, "The Akerses told Winfrey they thought Shawn had been sexually abused during his time with Devlin, though they said they had not asked him directly. … Hornbeck and Ownby were found last week after police recognized Devlin's white pickup truck while serving a warrant to another resident at the apartment complex where he lived. … The Franklin County prosecutor's office, which would not comment further, said Devlin's first hearing will be March 15. His attorneys are asking for a change of venue for the trial. Devlin is being held in isolation in the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail, and his bail is set at $3 million in Washington County. … The U.S. attorney's office in St. Louis has been working with local prosecutors, but no federal charges have been filed, said local Justice spokeswoman Jan Diltz. An FBI spokesman in St. Louis said federal charges will be considered."

DOJ_NMG_0118539

Second Chance Act Defended. In the Washington Times (1/19, 88K), Deborah Simmons writes, "Every year, 600,000 or so prisoners are given their walking papers to return to a neighborhood near you," and they are most likely to return. Sometimes, "we pay upward of $40,000 per prisoner." The Second Chance Act has bipartisan support and "fits comfortably into the mold of compassionate conservatism with a faith-based component." Simmons writes, "Either we can allow policies to continue as they have been and throw good money after ornery lawmaking, or we can change course slightly and experiment."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Seeks To Block Wage Payout By New York Center. The Buffalo News (1/19, Gryta) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department renewed efforts Wednesday to block a state court from approving payment of wages owed to 85 former employees of the government-closed St. Augustine Center." The News continues, "A week ago, State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek refused to permit the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in the court case, which is aimed at closing the human services center's financial books and paying the back wages." The News adds, "Wednesday, the Justice Department asked U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin to quash that case, claiming that it 'threatens to impair the ability of the U.S. to enforce its tax liens.' … In its latest legal effort, the Justice Department has filed a federal civil action against State Supreme Court in Erie County, the state Labor Department and Adam W. Perry, the Buffalo attorney Michalek named last year to serve as receiver to close the books on the center. … 'I'm very disappointed that the government is attempting to deny the employees wages that they earned' in closing down the center and ensuring all its clients were properly placed with other Buffalo-area human services agencies, Perry said. … Last February, Michalek ordered the shutdown of the debt-plagued nonprofit agency, which for decades had served Buffalo's black community."

